If I am correct, this means that the levir retained his own covenant line despite marriage to his sister-in-law. He was not asked by God to forfeit his own covenant line for the sake of his brother. He was asked only to forfeit his firstborn son through his brother's wife for the sake of his brother. If he had been unmarried, his biologically firstborn son would not be his covenantally firstborn son. His biologically firstborn son through his wife would bear another man's name. Any additional biologically sons through her would become his covenantal sons. His second-born son would become his heir, a name sake for him.¹⁹

17. The mark of adoption in the Old Covenant was circumcision.

18. Chapter 50.

19. The theme of the second-born son who inherits is repeated in the Old Covenant. It points to the distinction between Adam and Jesus as the true heir of God. In

If he was already married, the incorporation into his household of additional sons through the brother's wife would have reduced the size of the plots inherited by the sons of his first wife. There is no doubt that this dilution of her sons' inheritance would have been resisted by the first wife. This dilution would have constituted their partial economic disinheritance, though not covenantal disinheritance. The children of the first wife would not have lost their family names, only a portion of their father's land. His would have constituted a double disinheritance. If the husband refused to marry his sister-in-law, then at her death or at her remarriage to a non-kinsman, her late husband's land would have passed to his brethren. Perhaps the levir was the only brother. From an economic standpoint, performing the duty of the levir imposed a double economic burden on the children of the first wife: first, the dilution of their legacy, which they would then share with the new wife's later-born children; second, the future forfeiture of the levir's portion of his deceased brother's land. If polygamy was mandated by this law, then a wise wife would have recommended a move away from the jointly operated family farm until such time as a newly married brother produced his first child.

Because of the potential disinheritance aspect of the arrangement under polygamy, I conclude that this law did not apply to a brother who was already married. The biological sons of the levir would have had to forfeit too much. The firstborn son would have gained all of the dead man's legacy, while his older half brothers and younger brothers would have had to divide up the legacy of their biological father. Such a division of property would have been too heavily weighted to the economic advantage of one son.

The firstborn of a non-polygamous levirate marriage received his legacy from the dead man's estate—biologically, his uncle; covenantally, his father. His younger brothers, if any, divided up the levir's estate. Under such an arrangement, the second-born son would inherit the double portion of the biological father's estate. That was clearly an advantage for him. This estate would be larger than it would have been had there been no legacy from the dead man. The biologically firstborn son did not share in his father's landed legacy. This was an advantage for all of the brothers. Their judicial half brother received a large legacy, but this legacy would not have been in the family, had the first husband not died, so this legacy did not cost the other brothers anything that they might otherwise have inherited.

this case, however, the distinction had nothing to do with sin and rebellion by the firstborn.

The economics of the levirate marriage points to potential economic disinheritance in a polygamous arrangement. This is not proof that a married levir was not mandated to marry his sister-in-law, for covenantal concerns in Israel were to be respected over economic concerns when the two were in conflict. But in the absence of specific language dealing with the question of polygamy, we can legitimately look for potential injustice that would have resulted from polygamy. Economic disinheritance was surely a negative factor.

Because a wise wife would have had an economic incentive to recommend departure from the family farm upon the marriage of a brother, the levirate law governed unmarried levirs. The economics of the arrangement under polygamy would have undermined the enforcement of the law. This would have reduced the number of levirate marriages. It seems unreasonable to suppose that God would have mandated polygamy, only to leave an obvious escape hatch for first wives to recommend: moving the family off the family's land for a year or two until the brother had an heir. If this law's covenantal effects were so important that it mandated polygamy, there would have been no loophole. But there was a loophole: moving away. I conclude that this law was not intended to apply to married levirs.

We must consider briefly the refusal of Elimelech's relative to marry Ruth. He could have justified his refusal by invoking the fact that his kinsman had died outside the land. Clearly, the two had not been living close to each other. Instead, he invoked the economic implications of inheritance: "I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar mine own inheritance." If he was not married, then in what way would marrying Ruth have been a threat to his inheritance? One answer: he was a widower with sons. Any sons born to Ruth beyond the first would have diluted his sons' inheritance. Another possible answer: he would have had to spend time and money in building up the land that his biologically firstborn son would inherit. So, this passage cannot be used to prove that he was married. Nevertheless, this passage also cannot be used to disprove the possibility that he was already married or was a widower with sons. It does not provide sufficient information.

Conclusion

The levirate marriage law was a Mosaic seed law that increased the likelihood of the eschatological survival of all family lines within a tribe. It placed family name above immediate bloodline relationships. The firstborn of a levirate union would inherit both name and land from the deceased covenantal father, not from the biological father. The levir, as a kinsman redeemer, acted to establish his dead brother's covenant line.

In the post-A.D. 70 era, there are no covenantally relevant tribal lines, for Jacob's prophecy was fulfilled in Jesus Christ. Furthermore, in the post-ascension New Covenant era, Jesus Christ serves as the kinsman redeemer/blood avenger. This office exists nowhere else. There are no longer any cities of refuge. There is no longer an earthly high priest whose death liberates a man who is seeking refuge from the blood avenger. Both in its capacity as a seed law and as a law regulating the office of kinsman redeemer, this law has been annulled by the New Covenant.

JUST WEIGHTS AND JUSTICE

Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the LORD thy God (Deut. 25:13–16).

The theocentric focus of this law is the fixity of God's law. Man may not lawfully change it.

A. Reference Points

Diverse weights are the equivalent of arbitrary law and injustice. They are a form of theft. This was not a land law or a seed law. It was a cross-boundary law.¹

To serve as a weight or measure, a physical object must not be subject to extensive change. There will be some change, imperceptible over short or even fairly long periods, because man and his world decay. Physical objects are subject to the processes of decline. They are under the burden of cursed nature: entropy.² But a weight or a measure is noted for its comparative permanence in a world of flux. This permanence is what gives the weight or measure its unique capability of serving as a means of comparison over time. Men can compare different things over time because these things can be compared to a third thing, which serves as a reference point.³ Without reference points, history would be nothing but flux. God and His covenant law

1. On the categories of the Mosaic law, see Appendix J.

2. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

3. For example, modern man is told by scientists that space is curved. The correct reply is: "Compared to what?"

are man's reference points. Weights and measures are analogies to God's covenant.

By comparing the man who uses unjust weights to an abomination, this law points to the worst transgressions of the Egyptians and Canaanites.⁴ But why is this form of theft so repulsive to God? Because it is a representative act: to identify God as a liar and false gods as truth-tellers. Using a dishonest weight is not merely theft; it is a major moral crime, analogous to idolatry—a deception that was representative of Satan's deception of man kind: calling man to worship a false god.

I have commented on the judicial meaning of weights and measures in Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus.⁵ I reprint that section here.

* * * * *

B. Just Measures and a Just Society

The familiar Western symbol of justice is the blindfolded woman holding a balance scale. The blindfold symbolizes the court's unwillingness to recognize persons. The scale symbolizes fixed standards of justice: a fixed law applied to the facts of the case. Justice is symbolically linked to weights.

1. Quantification

Justice cannot be quantified,⁶ yet symbolically it is represented by the ultimate determinant of quantity: a scale. An honest scale registers very tiny changes in the weight of the things being weighed. A scale can be balanced only by adding or removing a quantity of the thing being measured until the weights on each side are equal, meaning as

4. "And Moses said, It is not meet so to do; for we shall sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the LORD our God: lo, shall we sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not stone us?" (Ex. 8:26). "And the land is defiled: therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you: (For all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, and the land is defiled;)" (Lev. 18:25–27). "The graven images of their gods shall ye burn with fire: thou shalt not desire the silver or gold that is on them, nor take it unto thee, lest thou be snared therein: for it is an abomination to the LORD thy God" (Deut. 7:25).

5. Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012.

6. See below, section on "Intuition and Measurement."

close to equal as the scale can register.⁷ Even here, the establishment of a precise balance may take several attempts. An average of the attempts then becomes the acceptable measure.

The ability of men to make comparisons is best exemplified in the implements of physical measurement. Men adopt the language of physical measurement when they speak of making historical or judicial comparisons. For example, the customer balances his check book. This does not mean that he places it on a scale. Or he weighs the expected advantages and disadvantages of some decision.

The economist constructs what is known as an index number in order to compare the price level—meaning prices of specific goods and services—in one period of time with those in another period. He assigns weights to certain factors in the mathematical construct known as an index number. He says, for example, that a change in the price of automobiles—Hondas rather than Rolls-Royces, of course—is more important to the average customer than a change in the price of tea. This was not true, however, in Boston in 1773. So, the economist-as-historian has to keep re-examining his “basket of relevant (representative) goods” from time to time. He must ask himself: “Which goods and services are more important to the average person’s economic well-being?” But there is no literal real-world basket of goods; there is no literal real-world average customer; there is no means of literally weighing the importance of anything. Yet we can barely think about making economic comparisons without importing the symbolism of weights and measures.

The language of politics also cannot avoid the metaphor of measurement. The political scientist speaks of checks and balances in the constitutional order of a federalist system. These are supposed to reduce the likelihood of the centralization of power into the hands of a clique or one man. That is, there are checks and balances on the exercise of power. These are institutional, not literal.

The language of measurement is inescapable. This is an implication of point three of the biblical covenant model: standards.⁸ As surely as societies create bureaus that establish standards of measurement, so God has established permanent judicial standards. Both kinds of standards must be observed by law-abiding people.

7. There are physical limits on the accuracy of scales. God’s civil law calls for equal justice, not perfect justice. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 19: “Perfect Justice.”

8. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstympl>)

2. The Representative Case

The preservation of just weights and measures in the Mosaic covenant was important for symbolic reasons as well as economic reasons. As case law, it represented a wider class of crimes. It was important in itself: prohibiting theft through fraud. But there was something unique about a case law governing weights and measures: it was representative of injustice in general. “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard [length], in weight, or in measure” (Lev. 19:35).⁹ The language of unrighteousness and judgment has a wider application than merely economic transactions. “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour” (Lev. 19:15).¹⁰ This is the fundamental principle of all biblical justice.

To understand why weights and measures are representative of civil justice in general, we need to understand what was involved in the specific violation. The seller can better afford the specialized weighing equipment of his trade than the individual buyer can. He is therefore in a position to cheat the buyer by rigging the equipment. But the narrowly defined crime of using rigged measures is representative of the whole character of the civil order: a violation of justice at the most fundamental level. Analogous to the businessman, the judge is not to use his specialized skills or his authority to rig any case against one of the disputants. The legal structure is regarded as a specialized piece of equipment, analogous to a scale. No one in charge of its operations is allowed to tamper with this system in order to benefit any individual or class of individuals. To do so would constitute theft. Injustice is seen in the Bible as a form of theft.

And Samuel said unto all Israel, Behold, I have hearkened unto your voice in all that ye said unto me, and have made a king over you. And now, be hold, the king walketh before you: and I am old and gray-headed; and, be hold, my sons are with you: and I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day. Behold, here I am: witness against me before the LORD, and before his anointed: whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I defrauded?

9. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 19.

10. Ibid., chaps. 14, 15.

whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith? and I will restore it you. And they said, Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken ought of any man's hand. And he said unto them, The LORD is witness against you, and his anointed is witness this day, that ye have not found ought in my hand. And they answered, He is witness (I Sam. 12:1–5).

Injustice is also linked to false weights and measures. Isaiah made all these connections clear in his initial accusation against the rulers of Israel: “Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water: Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves: every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards: they judge not the fatherless, neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them” (Isa. 1:22–23). False measures in silver and wine; princes in rebellion against God but companions of thieves; universal bribe-seeking; oppression of widows and orphans: all are linked in God’s covenant lawsuit brought by the prophet. In Isaiah’s day, it was all part of a great spiritual apostasy—an apostasy that would be reversed by the direct intervention of God: “Therefore saith the Lord, the LORD of hosts, the mighty One of Israel, Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries, and avenge me of mine enemies: And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin: And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, the faithful city” (Isa. 1:24–26). When the rulers of Israel’s northern kingdom remained unwilling to enforce God’s law, generation after generation, God raised up Assyria to bring corporate negative sanctions for Him (Isa. 10:5–6).

Because weights and measures are representative of the moral condition of society in general, the prophets used the metaphor of weights and measures in bringing their covenant lawsuits. The Psalmist had set the example: “Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie: to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity” (Ps. 62:9). Micah castigated the whole society, warning of judgment to come, for they honored “the statutes of Omri” and did the works of his son Ahab (Mic. 6:16).

The LORD’S voice crieth unto the city, and the man of wisdom shall see thy name: hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it. Are there yet the treasures of wickedness in the house of the wicked, and the scant measure that is abominable? Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances, and with the bag of deceitful weights? For the rich men thereof are full of violence, and the inhabitants thereof have spoken lies, and their tongue is deceitful in their mouth (Mic. 6:9–12).

The essence of their rebellion, Micah said, was the injustice of the civil magistrates: “The good man is perished out of the earth: and there is none upright among men: they all lie in wait for blood; they hunt every man his brother with a net. That they may do evil with both hands earnestly, the prince asketh, and the judge asketh for a reward; and the great man, he uttereth his mischievous desire: so they wrap it up” (Mic. 7:2–3).

Daniel’s announcement to the rulers of Babylon regarding the meaning of the message of the handwriting on the wall is perhaps the most famous use in Scripture of the imagery of the balance. “And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. TEKEL; Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. PERES; Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians” (Dan. 5:25–28).

Corrupt measures are a token—representative—of moral corruption. To be out of balance judicially is to be out of covenantal favor. The most representative civil transgression in society is the adoption of false weights and measures.

C. Intuition and Measurement

“Add a pinch of salt.” How many cooks through the centuries have recommended this unspecific quantity? There are cooks who cannot cook with a recipe book, but who are master chefs without one. Their skills are intuitive, not numerical. This is true in every field.

1. Analogical Reasoning

There are limits to measurement because there are limits to our perception. There are also limits on our ability to verbalize and quantify those measurements that we perceive well enough to act upon. Oskar Morgenstern addressed this problem in the early paragraphs of his classic book, On the Accuracy of Economic Observations.¹¹ Our eco-

11. Oskar Morgenstern, On the Accuracy of Economic Observations, 2nd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1963). Morgenstern wrote a book on game theory with John von Neumann, one of the most gifted mathematicians of the twentieth century. Morgenstern was aware of the limits of mathematics as a tool of conomic knowledge is inescapably a mixture of objective and subjective knowledge.¹² We think as persons; we are not computers. We do not think digitally. We think analogically, as persons made in God's image. We are required to think God's thoughts after Him. To do this, we need standards provided by God that are perceptible to man. God has given us such standards (point three of the biblical covenant model). We also need to exercise judgment in understanding and applying them (point four). This judgment is not digital; it is analogical: thinking God's thoughts after Him. We are required by God to assess the performance of others in terms of God's fixed ethical and judicial standards.

In order to achieve a "fit" between God's standards and the behavior of others, we must interpret God's objective law (a subjective task), assemble the relevant objective facts (a subjective task), discard the irrelevant objective facts (a subjective task), and apply this law to those facts (a subjective task). The result is a judicially objective decision. At every stage of the decision-making or judgment-rendering process, there is an inescapably personal element, for which we are held personally responsible by God.¹³

When we speak of objective facts, we often invoke the language of economic analysis. A more recent treatment of the problem is Andrew M. Kamarck's Economics and the Real World (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1983). See also Thomas Mayer, Truth versus Precision in Economics (Hampshire, England: Elgar, 1993).

12. Morgenstern wrote: "All economic decisions, whether private or business, as well as those involving economic policy, have the characteristic that quantitative and non-quantitative information must be combined into one act of decision. It would be desirable to understand how these two classes of information can best be combined. Obviously, there must exist a point at which it is no longer meaningful to sharpen the numerically available information when the other, wholly qualitative, part is important, though a notion of its 'accuracy' or 'reliability' has not been developed. . . . There are many reasons why one should be deeply concerned with the 'accuracy' of quantitative economic data and observations. Clearly, anyone making use of measurements and data wishes them to be accurate and significant in a sense still to be defined specifically. For that reason a level of accuracy has to be established. It will depend first of all on the particular purpose for which the measurement is made. . . . The very notion of accuracy and the acceptability of a measurement, observation, description, count—whatever the concrete case might be—is inseparably tied to the use to which it is to be put. In other words, there is always a theory or model, however roughly formulated it may be, a purpose or use to which the statistic has to refer, in order to talk meaningfully about accuracy. In this manner the topic soon stops being primitive; on the contrary, very deep-lying problems are encountered, some of which have only recently been recognized." Morgenstern, Accuracy, pp. 3–4.

13. North, Boundaries and Dominion, Appendix G, "The Covenantal Structure of Judgment."

physical measurement. This is because we think analogically. Making subjective judgments is analogous to measuring things objectively. Yet we never measure things objectively, meaning exclusively objectively. It is men who do the measuring, and men are not machines—and even machines have limits of perception. We ask: “Is the balance even?” “Is the bubble in the level equidistant between two points?” At some point, we say: “It’s a judgment call.” Discovering the answer is a judgment call: an evaluation based on one’s observation of something that is beyond the limits of one’s ability to perceive distinctions. For example, consider the task of an umpire or referee in any sport. He makes judgment calls. In modern philosophy, we find that the major schools of thought are analogous to the umpire’s standard explanations of his decision. In baseball, the umpire “calls a strike.” He announces that the pitched baseball passed within the strike zone of the batter’s body (a variable in terms of his height) and above home plate. The batter protests. It was a “ball,” he insists: either outside his strike zone or not above home plate. The umpire offers one of three answers. These three answers are expressions of the three dominant views of Western epistemology.

“I call ’em as they are.” (Newton)

“I call ’em as I see ’em.” (Hume)

“They are what I call ’em.” (Kant)¹⁴

To make a biblically valid judgment regarding the public record of the event under scrutiny, judges must perceive the limits of the law and the limits of the records. The public record of the event must reveal (represent) an act that took place within the “strike zone” of God’s law. The actor must clearly have violated that zone—that boundary—of God’s law. In the language of the common law courts, it must have violated that boundary “beyond reasonable doubt.” The language of the law is imprecise here because the act of rendering judgment is imprecise. Yet juries decide, judges hand down punishments, and society goes on.

2. Intuition and Creation

Intuition cannot be verbalized, catalogued, or quantified, for by

14. There is a fourth possible reply: “Shut up. You’re only a figment of my imagination.” (Berkeley) definition intuition possesses no rational structure, yet it exists nevertheless. Every philosophical system ultimately must appeal to intuition to bridge the chasm between mind and events.¹⁵ Without such a bridge, according to humanists, human choice and therefore personal responsibility disappear into one of three kinds of universe: a chaotic cosmos, a deterministic cosmos of mechanical-mathematical cause and effect, or a dialectical cosmos—mechanism infused by randomness, and vice versa.¹⁶ (All three are said to be governed by the second law of thermodynamics and are headed for the heat death of the universe.)¹⁷

There is a fourth possibility: a covenantal, providential, created cosmos. Here is the biblical solution to the problem of human knowledge: the doctrine of creation. The world was created by God in such a way that men, made in God's image, may exercise dominion over it. This theory of knowledge also relies on intuition: biblically informed intuition. Intuition is an inescapable concept. It is never a case of "intuition vs. no intuition." It is always a case of whose intuition according to whose standards.

Spiritual maturity is the ability to make biblically well-informed judgments. Christians must presume that intuitive judgments that come after years of studying God's Bible-revealed laws and making decisions in terms of them will be more reliable—i.e., more pleasing to God—than intuitive judgments that come from other traditions or that are the products of unsystematic approaches. There is no way to test the accuracy of this presumption except by observing God's sanctions in history on those groups that are under the authority of specifically covenanted judges.¹⁸

15. For case studies of this assertion in the field of economics, see Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976), ch. 5.

16. James Gleick, Chaos: Making a New Science (New York: Viking, 1987).

17. North, Is the World Running Down, ch. 2.

18. If God's sanctions in history are random in the New Covenant era, as Meredith Kline insists that they are, then there is no way to test this presumption. Intuition-based decisions would become as random in their effects as God's historical sanctions supposedly are. For an assertion of such randomness, see Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

D. Objective Standards

God decrees everything. History happens exactly as He has decreed it. God evaluates history, moment by moment, in terms of His permanent standards. This judgment is objective because God makes it, and it is also subjective because God makes it.

Man is responsible for thinking God's thoughts after Him. Man must obey God by conforming his thoughts and actions to God's law. Men do not have the ability to read God's mind (Deut. 29:29), but they do have the ability to obey. Men do not issue valid autonomous decrees, nor does history follow such decrees. God proposes, and then God disposes.¹⁹

1. Weights and Measures

The same is true of weights and measures. There are objective standards, and these are known perfectly by God. This perfect knowledge is a mark of His sovereignty. "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?" (Isa. 40:12). Man must seek to conform his actions and judgments to these objective standards. He does so by discovering and adopting fixed standards. Physical standards are the most readily enforced. The archetypical standards are weight and measure. Even the passage of time is assessed by means of a measure. In earlier centuries, these measures were frequently governed by weight, such as water clocks or hourglasses filled with sand.²⁰ Measures have been perfected over time, including measurements of time itself.²¹

19. The humanism of Marx's partner Frederick Engels can be seen in his statement that "when therefore man no longer merely proposes, but also disposes—only then will the last alien force which is still reflected in religion vanish; and with it will also vanish the religious reflection itself, for the simple reason that then there will be nothing left to reflect." Engels, Herr Eugen Dühring's Revolution in Science (Anti-Dühring), in Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Collected Works (New York: International Publishers, [1878] 1987), 25, p. 302.

20. The sun dial was an exception, but it could not be used at night or on cloudy days.

21. David Landes persuasively argued that improvements in the measurement of time in the late medieval and early modern eras were the most important physical advances in the history of Western Civilization, without which few of the other advances would have been likely. David S. Landes, Revolution in Time: Clocks and the Making of the Modern World (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Belknap/Harvard University Press, 1983).

Occult man sees ritual as a means of gaining supernatural power for himself. Christian man sees ritual as a means of worshipping God and gaining dominion over himself and his environment, to the glory of God. Occult man sees measurement as a means of obtaining supernatural power. Christian man sees measurement as a tool of dominion, beginning with self-dominion. The West is the product of such a view of measurement. A man wearing a wristwatch is someone under the influence of the Christian view of time. In the ancient pagan world, priests were the monopolists of calendars. This information was a major factor in maintaining their power over the general population, which possessed no reliable measurements.²² In the West, very few educated people understand the details of the astronomical basis of calculating time, let alone modern cesium atom clocks, but virtually every one has ready access to a calendar and a clock with an alarm. No longer does an elite priesthood exercise power through its monopolistic knowledge of the astronomical calendar. The advent of cheap calendars transferred enormous power to the individual. Cheap calendars and clocks have decentralized power. But in doing so, they have made individuals more responsible for the use of time, which is man's only truly irreplaceable resource.

The universality of the wristwatch²³ makes it impossible for employers or sellers to cheat large numbers of people regarding time. Because access to this information is cheap, time-cheating becomes more difficult. In fact, the employee is far more able to cheat the employer. The employee is the seller of services. If he is paid by the hour, he is tempted to find ways to collect his pay without delivering the work expected from him. The salaried employee cheats more easily on his time account; the commissioned salesman cheats more easily on his expense account.

2. Specialized Knowledge and Responsibility

The biblical law of weights and measures teaches that God identifies the seller—the receiver of money—as legally responsible. This requires an explanation. The buyer (customer) has legal control over the distribution of the most marketable commodity: money. Because he possesses the most marketable commodity, he possesses greater flexibility and therefore greater economic authority in the over all economy. We speak of consumer's sovereignty in a free market.²⁴ (Because man's sovereignty is never final but always delegated by God, it is better to speak of customer's authority.) Then why is the seller singled out by biblical law as the potential violator? Doesn't greater responsibility accompany greater authority (Luke 12:47–48)?²⁵

22. This was especially true of ancient agricultural dynasties that were dependent on rivers. Karl Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism: A Comparative Study of Total Power (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1957] 1964), pp. 29–30. For an extraordinary examination of ancient man's priestly mastery of both astronomy and time, see Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill: An essay on myth and the frame of time (Boston: Gambit, [1969] 1977).

23. This is beginning to fade. Younger people do not wear them. They carry cell phones, which have clocks. The wristwatch is dismissed as a single-function device.

The legal question must be decided in terms of comparative authority in specific transactions, not comparative authority in the economy generally. A seller of goods and services possesses highly specialized knowledge regarding his market. Cheating by a seller of goods and services is therefore more likely than cheating by a buyer because the seller has an advantage in information. This is why biblical law singles out weights and measures as the representative implements of justice. Physical implements of measurement can be created more easily than other kinds of evaluation devices. The existence of a precise (though never absolute) physical standard makes it relatively easy to create close approximations for commercial use.²⁶ The availability of devices and techniques to specialists employed as agents of the civil government, in the name of the buyers, allows the operation of checks and balances on the checks and balances. The state has greater ability to police the sellers in this area than in most other areas.

On what biblical basis do magistrates enforce weights and measures? Answer: to defend the unsuspecting victim. The problem here is analogous to the problem of measuring pollution or noise. The victims are not easy to identify, for they may not know that they have been

24. See below, "Competition and the Margins of Cheating."

25. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

26. The United States National Bureau of Standards (founded in 1901, but in principle authorized by the United States Constitution of 1787) establishes key lengths by using a platinum-iridium bar stored at a specific temperature. This, in turn, is based on a not quite identical bar stored by the International Bureau of Weights and Measurements in Sèvres, France. These bars do not match. Also, when cleaned, a few molecules are shaved away. Scientists now prefer to measure distance in terms of time and the speed of light. A meter is defined today as the distance a light particle travels in one 299,792,458th of a second. Time is measured in terms of the number of microwave-excited vibrations of a cesium atom particle when excited by a hydrogen maser. One second is defined as the time that passes during 9,192,631,770 cesium atomic vibrations. Malcolm W. Browne, "Yardsticks Almost Vanish As Science Seeks Precision," New York Times (Aug. 23, 1993).

cheated. The extent of the cheating cannot easily be ascertained by the victims in retrospect. The cost of gathering this information is too high. As a cost-saving measure (the language of measurement is incapable) for past victims and potential future victims, the state imposes public standards, and sellers are required to conform. As in the case of protecting potential future victims of speeding automobiles, the state establishes boundaries in advance. The police impose negative sanctions for violations of speed limits, even though the victims have not publicly complained against this particular speeder. The driver did increase the statistical risk of having an accident, so there were unidentified victims.²⁷ They are represented by the judicial system: the police officer who catches the speeder and the court that convicts him.

E. Competition and the Margins of Cheating

The International Bureau of Standards was established by the General Conference on Weights and Measures in 1875. National governments covenanted with each other by the Treaty of the Meter. The member nations' governments pledged to honor the standards agreed upon. These standards did not originate in 1875, however, nor did they originate with civil government. It does not require a treaty to establish such standards. There can be official standards, but unofficial standards are far more widespread. The free market can and does establish such standards. In fact, the more technologically innovative a society is, the less likely that a civil government will be the primary creator or enforcer of the bulk of the prevailing standards. When it comes to establishing standards, the state's salaried bureaucrats are usually playing catch-up with profit-seeking innovators.

Standards have boundary ranges. Market standards are likely to be less precise technically than the language found in civil statutes, for participants in markets understand that the development, selection, and enforcement of standards are not cost-free. The degree of variance from any standard depends on the costs and benefits of enforcement. It also depends on the locus of sovereignty of such enforcement: the customers.

27. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 41:C.

1. Buyers and Sellers

In a free market, the buyer of goods and services (i.e., the seller of money) is economically sovereign, not the seller of goods and not the state. This means that the buyer possesses final authority to buy or not buy. The customer has greater economic flexibility than the entrepreneur does. He can take his money elsewhere. This is another way of saying that the cost to him of seeking and obtaining an alternative offer for what he wants to sell (money) is normally far lower than the cost to the seller of specialized goods or services to seek and obtain an alternative offer. The seller of money has maximum liquidity. Money is properly defined as the most marketable commodity;²⁸ hence, the customer, as the seller of money, is economically sovereign (meaning authoritative).

The seller uses implements to make measurements. No seller can do without such implements, even if he is selling services. At the very least, he will use a clock. The seller is warned by God to make sure that he uses these implements consistently as he goes about his business. Yet this is not quite true. The seller is not to supply less than the standard determines; he may lawfully give more. If he gives any buyer less than he has said he is giving, he steals from him. If he gives a buyer more than he says, he is not stealing. He is offering charity, or giving a gift, or being extra careful, or building good will to increase repeat sales. So, the business owner is allowed to give more than he has indicated to the buyer that the buyer will receive; he is not allowed to give less. The seller need not tell the buyer that he is giving an extra amount, but he is required to tell him if he is giving less.²⁹ The boundary, therefore, is a seller's floor rather than a ceiling.

Sellers compete against sellers; buyers compete against buyers. This is the fundamental principle of free market competition, one which is not widely understood. The buyer is playing off one seller against another when he bargains, even if the second seller is a phantom;³⁰ the seller is playing off buyer against buyer. Buyers compete directly against sellers only when all parties have imperfect information regarding the alternatives. No one knowingly pays one ounce of silver

28. Ludwig von Mises, The Theory of Money and Credit (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1912] 1953), pp. 32–33. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTMC>)

29. A non-owning manager or employee must be precise: to give more on his own authority is to steal from the owner; to give less is to steal from the buyer.

30. The phantom buyer may walk in this afternoon. The seller is not sure. Neither is the buyer.

for something that is selling next door for half an ounce. The seller will not sell something to a buyer at a low price if he knows that another buyer is waiting in line to buy at a higher price. Neither will a buyer buy at a high price if he knows that another seller waits across the hallway to sell the same item at a lower price.

This being the case, it should be obvious why sellers who use false scales find themselves pressured by market forces to re-set their scales closer to the prevailing market standard. Their competitors provide a greater quantity of goods and services for the same price. It may take time for word to spread, but it does spread. Buyers like to brag about the bargains they have bought. Even though their tales of bargains increase the number of competing buyers at bargain shops, and therefore could lead to higher prices in the future, they do like to brag. This bragging gets the word out.³¹ A seller who consistently sets his scales below the prevailing competitive standard risks losing customers. This pressure does not mean that all or even most scales will be set identically, but it does lead to a market standard of cheating: competitive boundaries. The better the information available to buyers, the narrower the range of cheating. None of this assumes the existence of a standard enforced by civil government.

2. The Scales of Justice

Much the same is true of the scales of civil justice. Word spreads about the availability of righteous civil justice. If there is open immigration, as there was to be in Mosaic Israel, it is possible for those suffering injustice to seek justice elsewhere. (This is a major advantage of federalism: those living in one state can move to another if they disapprove of the prevailing local situation. This allows the testing of ideas regarding the proper role of civil government.) The Bible assumes that word about national justice does spread:

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom

31. There are limits to this. If the buyer has found an exceptionally inexpensive seller, especially a small, local seller who may be ill-informed about market demand, and if he expects to return to make additional purchases, he may not say anything to potential competitors. He does not want to let the seller know that there are many buyers available who are willing to pay more. There is a "bragging range." That is, there are boundaries on the spread of accurate information. Accurate information is not a free good.

and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).³²

The existence of a righteous nation in a fallen world of nations can lead to a competitive uplifting of civil justice in those nations that experience a net migration out. Emigration pressures unjust nations to revise their judicial standards. This is why totalitarian regimes place barriers at their borders. The threat of the loss of “the best and the brightest,” also known as the brain drain, is too great. The barbed wire goes up to place a boundary around the “ideological paradises.”

The tearing down of the Berlin Wall in late 1989 was a symbolic event that shook Europe. It was the visible beginning of the rapid end of the legacy of the French Revolution of 1789: left-wing Enlightenment humanism.³³ It was a sign that the economically devastating effects of Marxist socialism were the inevitable product of injustice.³⁴

32. Chapter 8.

33. We can date the end of that tradition in the West: August 21, 1991, when the Soviet Communist coup begun on August 19 failed. Boris Yeltsin and his associates sat in the Russian Parliament building for three days, telephoning leaders in the West, sending and receiving FAX messages, sending and receiving short wave radio messages, and ordering deliveries of Pizza Hut pizza. So died the French Revolutionary tradition. Sliced pizza replaced the guillotine’s sliced necks.

34. This was the message of F. A. Hayek in his 1944 book, The Road to Serfdom, which became an international best-seller. Western intellectuals scoffed at its thesis for over four decades, though in diminished tones after 1974, when he won the Nobel Prize in economics. The scoffing stopped in 1989 with the fall of the Berlin Wall and the collapse of the Soviet Union’s economy. A few months before he died in 1992, Hayek was awarded the United States medal of freedom. He had outlived the Soviet Union. He also had outlived most of the original scoffers. As he told me and Mark Skousen in an interview in 1985, he had never believed that he would live to see the acclaim that came to him after 1974. Few men who move against the intellectual currents of their eras live long enough to see such vindication. He died in March, 1992, at the age of 92, receiving international acclaim: “In praise of Hayek,” The Economist (March 28, 1992); John Gray, “The Road From Serfdom,” National Review (April 27, 1992). As The Economist noted, “In the 1960s and 1970s he was a hate-figure for the left, derided by many as wicked, loony, or both.” By 1992, no one remembered such scurrilous attacks as Herman Finer’s The Road to Reaction (Boston: Little, Brown, 1945). Milton Friedman, who was on the same University of Chicago faculty as Hayek and Finer, wrote that Hayek “unquestionably became the most important intellectual leader of the movement that has produced a major change in the climate of opinion.” National Review, op. cit., p. 35.

People in Marxist paradises wanted to escape. Given the opportunity, they would “vote with their feet.” With the Berlin Wall down, there was an immediate mass exodus from East Germany. Simultaneously, Western justice began to be imported by East Germany. This leavening effect was positive. East and West Germany were legally reunited.

For this emigration process to serve as a national leaven of righteousness, there must be sanctuaries of righteousness. There must be just societies that open their borders to victims of injustice, including economic oppression.³⁵ This is what Mosaic Israel offered the whole ancient world: sanctuary. This was God’s means of pressuring unrighteous nations to become more just. He imposed a cost on evil empires: the loss of productive people to Israel.

On the other hand, widespread immigration can pressure a just society to become less just if the newcomers gain political authority. If they are allowed to vote, they will seek to change some aspects of the sanctuary nation’s legal structure. For example, they may seek to legislate compulsory welfare payments: politically coerced subsidies paid to immigrants by the original residents. It is not God’s intention to pay for a rising standard of justice in evil empires by means of falling standards of justice in covenanted sanctuary nations. His goal is to raise standards of justice everywhere. So, political pluralism is prohibited by God’s law. Suffrage (the vote) is by covenantal affirmation and church membership, not mere geographical residence. *This is why the biblical concept of sanctuary requires a biblical judicial boundary: covenantal citizenship.*³⁶

If justice produced indeterminate economic effects, and if injustice produced indeterminate economic effects, there would be no economic pressure on totalitarian regimes to tear down the boundary barriers. But justice does not produce indeterminate economic effects. Similarly, if the social world were what Meredith G. Kline insists that it is—a world in which God’s visible sanctions in history are indeterminate for both covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking³⁷—then there could be no historical resolution of the competition between civil righteousness and civil perversity. A quasi-Manichean denial of such a resolution is the implicit and sometimes explicit assumption of amillennial-

35. Gary North, “The Sanctuary Society and Its Enemies,” Journal of Libertarian Studies, XIII (Summer 1998), pp. 205–19. (<http://bit.ly/NorthSanctuary>)

36. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

37. Meredith G. Kline, “Comments on an Old-New Error,” Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

ism.³⁸ The leaven of justice in such a world would have no advantage over the leaven of injustice. But there is no neutrality in life. Therefore, in a world of totally depraved people, such cultural neutrality could not be maintained for long. The leaven of evil would triumph. Yet it does not triumph, long term. Pharaonic tyrannies have all collapsed or become culturally impotent throughout history. This fact testifies to fallen mankind that God's sanctions in history are not indeterminate. Honesty really is the best policy, as Ben Franklin long ago insisted. In the competition between good and evil, the leaven of righteousness spreads as time goes on. Its visible results are so much better (Lev. 26:1–13;³⁹ Deut. 28:1–14⁴⁰).

3. The Forces of Competition

The pressure of international economic competition cannot be withstood for long. It brought down Soviet Communism. Marxist tyrannies could not gain the economic fruits of righteousness without the moral roots.⁴¹ They could not permit a modern economy based on computers, data bases, FAX machines, and rationally allocated capital in their rigged, corrupt, fantasy world of central economic planning and credit money.⁴² The reality of the Russian workers' saying could not be suppressed forever: "We pretend to work, and they pretend to pay us." This inescapable reality led to a falling standard of living and the eventual collapse of European Communism.

The international free market has no universally enforceable standards of weights and measures, yet it operates more successfully than any other economic system in history. Private arbitration some times is invoked. Usually, national standards are closely observed by market participants. There are great and continuing debates over which standards should be adopted internationally, especially as international trade increases. But even without formal political resolutions to these debates, the international market continues to flourish. In the medieval world, there was an internationally recognized "law merchant," and

38. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 76–92; ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

39. North, Boundaries and Dominion, chaps. 32–34.

40. Chapter 69.

41. Konstantin Simis, USSR: The Corrupt Society: The Secret World of Soviet Capitalism (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982).

42. On the truly fantastic nature of the Soviet economy, see Leopold Tyrmand, The Rosa Luxemburg Contraceptives Cooperative: A Primer on Communist Civilization (New York: Macmillan, 1972).

it has been revived in modern times.⁴³

But what about Gresham's Law? "Bad money drives out good."⁴⁴ This is the pessimillennial view of history as applied to monetary theory. But Gresham's Law is misleading. It has an implied condition, but only people who understand economics recognize the unique nature of this condition. The law only applies when a civil government establishes and enforces a price control between two kinds of money. Then the artificially overvalued money remains in circulation, while the artificially undervalued money goes into hoards, into the black market, or is exported. Bad money drives out good money only when governments pass laws that attempt to override the free market's assessment of relative monetary values. This is not to say that there should not be civil laws against counterfeiting, but it does mean that counterfeiters must be very skilled to compete in a free market order. Laws against counterfeiting raise the cost of being a counterfeiter, thereby lowering the supply of counterfeit money.

Counterfeiting applies to religion. Christians must contend with cults, but cults are imitations of Christianity. Today, we see no fertility cults that self-consciously imitate the older Canaanite religions. Bacchanalia festivals are no longer with us, at least not in a self-consciously cultic form.⁴⁵ New Age advocates may seem numerous, especially in Hollywood and New York City, but there are very few openly New Age congregations of the faithful. Religious counterfeits take on the characteristic features of Christianity in order to extend their influence beyond traditional borders. The rites of Christianity have many imitations around the globe, but the rites of Santeria do not.⁴⁶

A wise counterfeiter will not try to pass a bill that has a picture of Karl Marx on it, let alone Groucho Marx. Successful counterfeits in a competitive market must resemble the original. This is why there is,

43. Benson, Enterprise of Law, pp. 30–35, 62, 224–27. See also Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), ch. 11. The Jews who dominate the international diamond trade make bargains without public contracts, and they never appeal to the state to settle disputes. These merchants have their own courts that settle disputes. It seems likely that they do not pay income taxes on every profitable trade.

44. "Bad money drives out good money," the law really states. Yet in a very real sense, the familiar formulation is correct: bad money does drive out good. It creates black markets, cheating, and many other evils.

45. Mardi Gras in New Orleans and Carnival in the Caribbean are such festivals.

46. Bill Strube, "Possessed with Old Fervor: Santeria in Cuba," The World & I (Sept. 1993). This African-Cuban voodoo cult is closely associated with homosexuality. Ibid., p. 254.

over time, a tendency for covenant-breakers to conform themselves to the external requirements of God's law until they cannot stand the contradiction in their lives any longer.⁴⁷ Then they rebel, and God imposes negative sanctions, either through His ordained covenant representatives or through the creation.⁴⁸

F. A Final Sovereign

The Bible identifies judges as covenantal agents of God. Unlike the free market, where customers are sovereign, the state requires a voice of final earthly authority. This does not mean that one person or one institution has final authority. Biblically, no institution or person possesses such authority in history; only the Bible does. But there must be someone who officially announces "guilty" or "not guilty." Someone must impose the required sanctions. Civil sanctions are imposed by the state.

This means that legal standards must not fluctuate so widely that men cannot make reasonable predictions about the outcome of trials. If there is no predictability of the outcome, then there will be endless trials. Conflicting parties will not settle their disputes before they enter the courtroom. A society should encourage predictable outcomes; otherwise, individuals cannot be confident about receiving what the law says they deserve.⁴⁹ It is because the outcomes of trials are reasonably predictable that conflicts are settled before they come to trial.

1. Legal Predictability

Hayek's comments in this regard are very relevant. He announced a conclusion, one based on decades of study of both economic theory and legal history: "There is probably no single factor which has contributed more to the prosperity of the West than the relative certainty of the law which has prevailed here. This is not altered by the fact that complete certainty of the law is an ideal which we must try to approach but which we can never perfectly attain." He then went on to make this observation, one which relies on the concept of the thing not seen: "But the degree of the certainty of the law must be judged by the disputes which do not lead to litigation because the outcome is practically certain as soon as the legal position is examined. It is the cases that never come before the courts, not those that do, that are the measure of the certainty of the law.”⁵⁰ In other words, self-government is basic to all government, but predictable law, predictable enforcement, and predictable sanctions must reinforce self-government if a society is to remain productive. The clogged courts of the United States in the final third of the twentieth century testified to the breakdown of the certainty of civil law, as well as to the effects of tax-financed law schools that have produced over 700,000 lawyers.⁵¹

47. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

48. Ibid., ch. 8.

49. "Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison" (Matt. 5:25).

There is little doubt that the proliferation of lawyers in the United States in the latter years of the twentieth century was a sign of a major breakdown of its moral and legal order. The United States in 1990 had some 730,000 lawyers—70% of the world’s total. In 1990, Japan had 11 lawyers per 100,000 in population; the United Kingdom, 82; Germany, 111; the United States, 281. Japan had 115 scientists and engineers per lawyer; United Kingdom, 14.5; Germany, 9.1; United States, 4.8.⁵² The idea that the state can provide perfect justice is a costly myth.⁵³

Civil government today has become what Frédéric Bastiat predicted in 1850: an instrument of legalized plunder.⁵⁴ After 1870, throughout the West, the view of the state as an agency of compulsory social salvation spread. It escalated rapidly after 1900, when Social Darwinism moved from its “dog-eat-dog” phase to its state-planned evolution phase.⁵⁵ This vision faded in the early 1970s, according to Peter Drucker, one of the modern world’s most astute observers.⁵⁶ Wheat on College economics professor P. J. Hill has described the earlier process: the decline of predictable law and the rise of the transfer society. “The idea of the transfer society is a society where property rights are up for grabs.”⁵⁷ The problem with such a society is that so many people start

50. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), p. 208.

51. In the case of lawyers, Say’s famous law holds true: production creates its own demand. The old story is illustrative: when only one lawyer lives in town, he has little work. When another lawyer arrives, they both have lots of work from then on.

52. “Punitive Damages,” National Review (Nov. 4, 1991).

53. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974).

54. Frédéric Bastiat, The Law (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, 2007), pp. 13–18, 21. (<http://mises.org/books/thelaw.pdf>)

55. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A.

56. Peter Drucker, The New Realities (New York: Harper, 1989), ch. 2.

57. “The Transfer Society: An Interview with P. J. Hill,” Religion and Liberty, I grabbing rather than producing. The rule of law is collapsing.

We've become a society in which the rules are in flux, thereby prodding people to spend a large amount of their time and resources trying to change the rules to their benefit. Our book⁵⁸ argues that in the beginning the Constitution was a set of rules for a few areas that pretty much encouraged the entrepreneurial type of person to go out and make better mousetraps, to create wealth. Somewhere around the 1870's the constitutional climate started changing dramatically, not by amendment but by interpretation. The Constitution became interpreted in a more casual way. There was a rise in what we call "reasonable regulations;" the Supreme Court said the state legislatures could pass any sort of regulations they wanted about economic affairs so long as they were "reasonable."

That meant, of course, that people spent a lot of time trying to get regulations written to their advantage or to the disadvantage of their competitors, because there was no clear-cut standard. And today almost nothing in the economic arena is unconstitutional. . . .

Today, much of the economic game is in the political arena. It is played by getting rules on your side, or making sure that somebody else doesn't get the rules on their side against you. The action is in Washington, D.C.

It's interesting to look at the statistics of many large companies and see how much of their time goes into lobbying, where their business headquarters are, who the big players are, etc. It turns out that it's just as important to try to make sure that the rules favor you as it is to produce better products. Any society in which the rules are not clearly defined, whatever they are, is at risk. You need a society of stable, legitimate and just rules in order to have people productively engaged.

I would put it this way: Theft is expensive. In a society where theft is prevalent people will put a lot of their efforts into protecting themselves—into locks and police guards, etc.

Government can prevent theft, but can also be an agency of theft. If this is the case, then people will look to government to use its coercive arm to take from other citizens. In such a world of "legal theft" people will devote resources to protecting themselves and to (Nov./ Dec. 1991), p. 1. This is a publication of the Acton Institute.

58. Peter J. Hill and Terry Anderson, The Birth of a Transfer Society (Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1989).

getting government on their side.⁵⁹

2. Open Entry vs. Open Access

Open entry to economic competitors in a free market is not the same thing as open access to political competitors in a civil government. The free market is not a covenantal institution that possesses a lawful monopoly as an ordained representative of God. Civil government is. Allowing open access for office-seekers within a single governmental structure is not the same as allowing rival governmental structures within the same sphere of political authority. There has to be a hierarchy of authority, meaning a chain of command, in all three covenantal governments: church, family, and state. There is no such hierarchy in a free market. The customer's decision is economically sovereign on a free market: to buy or not to buy. He is not comparably sovereign in a covenantal institution: to obey or not to obey apart from the threat of lawful sanctions.⁶⁰ He is under external authority.

Civil government must enforce certain physical standards of measurement, if only for purposes of tax collection. The idea that a free market can provide profit-seeking courts as a complete substitute for the final earthly sovereignty of a civil court is a myth of libertarianism. The essence of a free market system is that it does not and cannot make final declarations. Why not? Because the essence of the free market is that anyone can step in at any time and announce a higher bid. The market, if it is truly free, cannot legally keep out those who offer higher bids. Therefore, there can be no final, covenantally binding bid in a free market, since the market system allows no appeal to a superior, covenantally binding institution. If voluntary agreements are subsequently broken, there must be an agent economically outside of the market and judicially above the market who can sovereignly enforce the terms of the agreement. The free market is open-ended because it offers open entry. The resolution of disputes requires the presence of a representative covenantal agent who can dispense justice in God's name. Disputes are usually resolved before they reach this final declaration, but only because of the presence of this ultimately joint agency of final declaration.⁶¹ This final court of appeal must be able to appeal to a higher court: God's.

59. Hill, "The Transfer Society," pp. 1–2. Cf. Gary North, "The Politics of the Fair Share," The Freeman (Nov. 1993). (<http://bit.ly/NorthFairShare>)

60. Chapter 51.

61. Chapter 41.

G. Victim's Rights and Restitution

The fundamental principle of biblical civil jurisprudence is victim's rights. The state is to act as the agent of injured parties. If the injured party is unwilling to prosecute, the state is not to prosecute.⁶² The state may not prosecute the seller who is discovered cheating by means of false weights and measures.

There are criminal cases in which there is no identifiable victim. The classic example is the case of a driver who exceeds the speed limit and does not injure anyone. He has imposed risk on other drivers and pedestrians. The state in this case is allowed to impose fines on the convicted speeder. The money should be used to provide restitution for those who are injured by a hit-and-run driver who cannot subsequently be located or convicted.

What about the seller who uses rigged scales? The state cannot prove when this practice began; it can only prove when the practice was discovered. It probably cannot identify who was defrauded. This means that many of the victims cannot sue for damages. Should the seller not suffer negative sanctions?

One possible way to resolve this dilemma is for the state to require the seller to provide discounts for a period of time to all of his past customers. The discount would be determined by the degree of scale-tampering: double restitution. If the scales were 10% off, then he must offer 20% discounts. To make sure he does not simply raise his retail prices before he starts offering the discounts, the state would fix his retail prices as of the day the infraction was discovered. A sales receipt would entitle a customer to the discounts.

Because of modern packaging and mass production, not many stores would come under this threat. The butcher in the meat section of a supermarket would be one seller whose scales would be basic to the business. But, on the whole, modern technology transfers responsibility back to the companies that sell the packaged products to retail outlets. How, then, could the law be enforced on them? To require them to offer a discount to a retailer does not benefit the customer; it provides a profit to the retailer. One way would be for those who have receipts for a product to be able to buy that firm's products for a period of time at a discount. The firm would then be forced to reimburse the retailer for the difference. This is a sales technique used by manufacturers in gaining market share in supermarkets: discount coupons.

62. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 33.

It could be imposed by the state as a penalty. This would reward those customers who save their receipts. If this procedure is too complicated for the victims to be fairly compensated, because of the nature of the product—a “small-ticket item”—then the firm could be required to offer discounts across the board to all future buyers of that specific product for a period of time. The firm would also be required to identify on the packaging of that product an admission of guilt, so that the discounts would not be regarded as an advertising strategy. Finally, the discount reimbursements to retailers would not be tax-deductible as a business expense to the seller.

H. Evangelical Antinomianism

For a scale to operate, it must have fixed standards. If it is a balance scale like the one the famous lady of justice holds, it must have fixed weights in one of its two trays. There is no escape from the covenantal concept of judicial weights. This is the issue of ethical and judicial standards: point three of the biblical covenant model. Mosaic law stated that within the boundaries of Israel, honest (predictable) weights were mandatory. It did not matter whether the buyer was rich or poor, circumcised or not circumcised: the same weights had to be used by the seller. Israel was to become a sanctuary for strangers seeking justice. The symbol of this justice was the honest scale.

Which judicial standards were mandatory? The Bible is clear: God’s revealed law. National Israel was not some neutral sanctuary in which rationally perceived natural law categories were enforced. That unique sanctuary was where biblical law was enforced. Those seeking sanctuary in Israel had to conform to biblical civil law. The metaphorical weights in the tray of civil justice’s scale were the Mosaic statutes and case laws.

Because the modern Christian evangelical world is self-consciously and defiantly antinomian—“We’re under grace, not law!”—Christians emphatically deny the New Covenant legitimacy of the concept of biblically revealed laws. They assume that men can develop universal, religiously non-specific moral standards in the same way that the world has developed universal physical weights and measurements. They prefer to ignore what the Bible reveals about covenant-breakers: those who hate God love death (Prov. 8:36b). The closer that covenant-breakers get to the doctrine of God, the more perverse they are in rejecting the testimony of the Bible. They interpret God, man, law, sanctions, and time differently from what the Bible specifies as the standard. They affirm rival covenantal standards.

A holy commonwealth would establish the law of God as the civil standard, but modern evangelical Christians hate the revealed law of God above every other system of law. First, they affirm as the binding standard the myth of neutrality: religiously neutral natural law. Second, they affirm their willingness to submit themselves to any system of law except biblical law. They announce: “A Christian can live peacefully under any legal or political system,” with only one exception: biblical law. Modern Christians see themselves as perpetual strangers in the perpetual unholy commonwealths of covenant-breaking man. They deny that liberty can be attained under God’s revealed law. God’s revealed law, they insist, is the essence of tyranny. They seek liberty through religious neutrality: the rule of anti-Christian civil law. They seek, at most, “equal time for Jesus” in the satanic kingdoms of this world. They forget: the “equal time” doctrine is the lie that Satan’s servants use while dwelling in holy commonwealths. When Satan’s disciples gain civil power, they adopt a new rule: “As little time for Jesus as the state can impose through force.”

I. Geisler’s Norm

Norman Geisler, a fundamentalist philosopher with a Ph.D. issued by a Roman Catholic university, and a devout follower of Thomas Aquinas,⁶³ has insisted that all civil law must be religiously neutral. We must legislate morality, he says, but not religion. This means that civil morality can be religiously neutral. “The cry to return to our Christian roots is seriously misguided if it means that government should favor Christian teachings. . . . First, to establish such a Bible-based civil government would be a violation of the First Amendment. Even mandating the Ten Commandments would favor certain religions. . . . Furthermore, the reinstitution of the Old Testament legal system is contrary to New Testament teaching. Paul says clearly that Christians ‘are not under the law, but under grace’ (Rom. 6:14). . . . The Bible may be informative, but it is not normative for civil law.”⁶⁴ The suggestion by those whom he calls “the biblionomists” [biblionomy: Bible law] that God’s law still applies today is, in Geisler’s words, a “chilling legalism.”⁶⁵

63. Aquinas, he said in 1988, “was the most brilliant, most comprehensive, and most systematic of all Christian thinkers and perhaps all thinkers of all time.” Angela Elwell Hunt, “Norm Geisler: The World Is His Classroom,” Fundamentalist Journal (Sept. 1988), p. 21. This magazine was published by Rev. Jerry Falwell’s Liberty University. Geisler was at the time a professor there. The magazine has ceased publication. Geisler resigned from the school in 1991.

We need legal reform “What kind of laws should be used to accomplish this: Christian laws or Humanistic laws? Neither. Rather, they should simply be just laws. Laws should not be either Christian or anti-Christian; they should be merely fair ones.”⁶⁶ There is supposedly a realm of neutral civil law in between God and humanism: the realm of “fairness.” This means that Mosaic civil law was never fair. Those who believe that the Mosaic civil law was unfair refuse to say that this is what they believe. It sounds ethically rebellious against the unchanging God of the Bible, which it in fact is. Nevertheless, this rebellious outlook was universal within Protestantism in the twentieth century; it has been since at least the late seventeenth century.

This theory of neutral civil law denies Christ’s words concerning the impossibility of neutrality: “No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon” (Matt. 6:24).⁶⁷ “He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad” (Matt. 12:30). Yet Geisler wrote: “God ordained Divine Law for the church, but He gave Natural Law for civil government.”⁶⁸ For this assertion, they rarely offer any biblical exegesis. They insist, as Geisler insists, that true civil justice can be obtained only by removing all visible traces of Christianity from civil government. Neutrality!

But there is no neutrality. There has never been a neutral kingdom of civil law, and there never will be. Facing the reality of this historical fact, this question inevitably arises: “Which is worse, secular humanism or God’s law?” When push comes to shove, Geisler identifies the greater evil: God’s law. “Thoughtful reflection reveals that this ‘cure’ of reconstructionism is worse than the disease of secularism.”⁶⁹ Christi-

64. Norman L. Geisler, “Should We Legislate Morality?” ibid. (July/Aug. 1988), p. 17.

65. Idem.

66. Ibid., p. 64.

67. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

68. Geisler, “Should We Legislate Morality?” p. 17.

69. Norman L. Geisler, “Human Life,” in William Bentley Ball (ed.), In Search of a National Morality (Baker Book House [conservative Protestant] and Ignatius Press

ans must content themselves with living as strangers in a strange land until Jesus personally returns in power.⁷⁰

The Christian antinomians' view of civil law has implications for their doctrine of eschatology. This is why virtually all amillennialists and premillennialists defend natural law theory and political pluralism, while attacking theonomy.⁷¹ They see God's people as cultural losers in history.⁷² The most they hope for is a cultural stalemate.⁷³ They prefer to live meekly and impotently inside cultural ghettos rather than fight a cultural war in the name of Christ.⁷⁴ They do not believe they can win; therefore, they deny the basis of fighting in such a war, namely, a uniquely biblical judicial alternative to humanistic law. They deny the legitimacy of Bible-revealed judicial standards that would make possible an explicitly Christian social order during the era of the church. Their antinomian social ethics is a corollary to their pessimistic view of the church's future. God has granted them their desire: they live at the mercy of their enemies who control the various social orders of our day. But the walls of their ghettos have huge holes in them: public schools, television, movies, rock music, and all the rest of humanism's lures.

Unlike the Israelites in Egypt, who cried out to God for deliverance (Ex. 3:7), today's Christians have generally preferred their life in Egypt to life in the Promised Land. God cursed the exodus generation: death in the wilderness. But He did not allow them to return to Egyptian bondage. Today's Christians may grumble about certain peripheral aspects of their bondage, but they do not yet seek deliverance from their primary bonds, most notably their enthusiastic acceptance of religious and political pluralism, natural law theory, and the first-stage humanist promise of "equal time for the ethics of Jesus." They hate the very [conservative Roman Catholic], 1992), p. 115.

70. A question for premillennialists: "Will Jesus enforce the Mosaic law or a system of neutral natural law during His premillennial kingdom?" Premillennial defenders of natural law theory refuse to address this question in print. If they answer "Mosaic law," they have admitted that it is intrinsically morally superior to natural law. If they answer "natural law," they sever the God who declared the Mosaic law from that law. They prefer to remain silent.

71. See Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise."

72. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, chaps. 7–9.

73. Gary North, Backward, Christian Soldiers? An Action Manual for Christian Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1984] 1988), ch. 11. (<http://bit.ly/gnback>)

74. Gary North, "Ghetto Eschatologies," Biblical Economics Today, XIV (April/May 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gnghetto>) thought of their responsibility before God to establish covenanted Trinitarian national sanctuaries.

* * * * *

J. Fractional Reserve Banking

Modern banking is based on the use of false weights and measures. Fractional reserve banking rests on fraud.⁷⁵ It replaces a voluntary currency system that is based on a particular weight and fineness of a precious metal or some other commodity. The origin of fractional reserve banking was the issuing of a warehouse receipt for an asset—a money metal—that was not actually held in reserve. The banker issued a promise to pay gold or silver when he could not redeem all of the signed promises. The false warehouse receipt circulated as money as if it had been the actual commodity promised. This enabled the issuer to charge interest on loaned funds: something (for him) for nothing (in his warehouse). The losers were those who attempted to redeem their receipts during a bank panic. The bank went bankrupt (bank + rupture), leaving late-arriving depositors with nothing. Prior to the bank run, there were other losers: people who had to pay higher prices for goods and services because of the inflationary effects of unbacked warehouse receipts that circulated as if they were money. These receipts were used by buyers to bid up prices. Those people without access to these newly printed false receipts consumed fewer goods and services because of increased prices.

The modern banking system has fraud at its heart.⁷⁶ Because of this, everyone today is at risk of a collapse of this house of—false receipts. When the system of monetary payments breaks down, as it will when this fraud becomes widely perceived as a threat to men's wealth, and the bank runs begin, all those who have planned their futures in terms of a predictable, continuous supply of credit money issued by commercial banks will find their plans destroyed. The modern world's unprecedented division of labor, which has been made possible by a system of payments based on commercial bank's promises to pay, will collapse. Unemployment will soar when workers find that their labor services are too narrowly focused to be purchased at the prices that prevailed before the banks went bankrupt. We call this event a depression. It occurs when there is an unforeseen contraction in the division of labor. This takes place whenever the fractional reserve banking payments system breaks down, as it did during the economic depression of the 1930's.

75. Gary North, Honest Money: The Biblical Blueprint for Money and Banking (Ft. Worth: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/gnmoney>)

76. Murray N. Rothbard, The Mystery of Banking (New York: Richardson & Snyder, 1983). This book has been posted in PDF format on-line by the Ludwig von Mises Institute. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardBanking>)

There are negative sanctions in history for breaking God's law. An economic depression is the economy's built-in negative sanction against banking fraud.⁷⁷ If the state refuses to enforce God's law governing weights and measures as it applies to money and banking, then the economic system will refute it. The justification for having the state enforce a law mandating 100% reserve banking⁷⁸ is God's threat to bring corporate negative sanctions against any society that disobeys His law.

In the modern world, central banking lies at the heart of a massive, centuries-long deception by the politicians and the bankers. Here is the essence of the arrangement. The nation-state issues a monopoly of credit creation to a privately owned bank. In exchange, the central bank guarantees to buy the state's debt. This quid pro quo has operated continually in England ever since the founding of the Bank of England in 1694.⁷⁹ It became the world's model for banking in the twentieth century. The world's central bankers want to create a single central bank that issues a single currency. This implies the existence of a common fiscal (taxing and spending) policy for the nations that are inside the international central banking system, i.e., the abolition of national sovereignty. The bankers and the politicians want the benefits of a gold standard without its restraints. They are unwilling to allow a common currency based on a commodity, most likely gold, for this would restrain the issuing of credit money and the issuing of government debt. They want the pleasant effects of gold—a predictable means of payment—without the restraints imposed by geology: the high cost of extracting this metal. They want to be sovereign over money, so that they can get something for nothing. The politicians want the state to pay below-market interest rates on its debt, and the bankers want interest payments for credit issued out of nothing, with the state's debt certificates as the central banks' legal reserves—the privilege of a state-created monopoly in a nation that does not enforce God's laws of weights and measures.

77. Murray N. Rothbard, America's Great Depression (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1963] 2000). (<http://bit.ly/RothbardAGD>)

78. Murray N. Rothbard, "The Case for a 100 Percent Gold Dollar," in Leland B. Yeager (ed.), In Search of a Monetary Constitution (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1962), ch. 4. This essay has been reprinted as a booklet, The Case for a 100 Percent Gold Dollar (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, 1991). (<http://bit.ly/RothbardGD>)

79. In the years immediately following World War II, the government nationalized the Bank of England, but management has remained the exclusive prerogative of commercial bankers. Non-bankers are not allowed inside the bank, as I found out by accident in 1985, when Mark Skousen and I walked into it, thinking it was Lloyd's Bank. A man dressed in the traditional beekeeper uniform politely asked us to leave. Feigning the ignorance common to American tourists, I asked: "You mean I can't open an account?" I was assured that I could not.

Perhaps someday the corporate negative sanction known as economic depression will be widely recognized by political leaders and articulate voters as the inevitable result of monetary inflation, especially fractional reserve banking.⁸⁰ If they fail to recognize this, then the world will continue to suffer from periodic depressions.

Conclusion

“Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity” (Job 31:6). The imagery of the balance scale is basic to understanding each person's relation to God, either as a covenant-keeper or a covenant-breaker. Weights and measures are also representative biblically of the degree of civil justice available in a society. If those who own the measuring instruments of commerce tamper with them in order to defraud customers, either specific groups of customers—especially resident aliens—or customers in general, they have sinned against God. They have stolen. If the civil government does not prosecute such thieves, then the society is corrupt. The continued existence of false weights and measures testifies against a society.

There are limits to our perception and the accuracy of scales. This applies both to physical measurement and civil justice. Society cannot attain perfect justice. There must always be an appeal to the judge's intuition in judicial conflicts where contested public acts were not clearly inside or outside the law. This does not mean that there are limits to God's perception and God's justice. Thus, there will be a day of perfect reckoning. Over time, covenantally faithful individuals and institutions approach as a limit, but never reach, the perfect justice of that final judgment. This brings God's positive sanctions to covenant-keeping individuals and institutions, making them more responsible by making them more powerful. Progressive sanctification, both personal and corporate, necessarily involves an increase in God's blessings and therefore also an increase in personal responsibility.

80. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 20. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

The state is required by God to enforce His standards. The free market social order—a development that has its origins in the twin doctrines of personal responsibility and self-government—requires civil government as a legitimate court of appeal. But the bulk of law enforcement has to be individual: “Every man his own policeman.” No other concept of law enforcement will suffice if a society is not to become a society of informants and secret police. Second, law enforcement must be associative: market competition. Buyers and sellers determine the degree of acceptable fluctuation around agreed-upon standards. Only in the third stage is law enforcement to become civil. Here, the standards are to be much more precise, much more rigid, and much more predictable. Representative cases are to become guidelines for self-government and voluntary associative government.

THE FIRSTFRUITS OFFERING: A TOKEN PAYMENT

And it shall be, when thou art come in unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, and possessest it, and dwellest therein; That thou shalt take of the first of all the fruit of the earth, which thou shalt bring of thy land that the LORD thy God giveth thee, and shalt put it in a basket, and shalt go unto the place which the LORD thy God shall choose to place his name there. And thou shalt go unto the priest that shall be in those days, and say unto him, I profess this day unto the LORD thy God, that I am come unto the country which the LORD sware unto our fathers for to give us (Deut. 26:1–3).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's establishment of a holy commonwealth, a place set aside by God for His holy people. This relates both to boundaries and ethics.

A Liturgy of Thanksgiving

God was about to deliver the land of Canaan into their hands. They had not conquered it yet. To identify himself as a lawful resident, the Israelite or circumcised resident alien would be required to say to the priest, "I am come unto the country which the LORD sware unto our fathers for to give us" (v. 3). Then he was to say, "And now, behold, I have brought the firstfruits of the land, which thou, O LORD, hast given me. And thou shalt set it before the LORD thy God, and worship before the LORD thy God" (v. 10). This was cause of celebration: "And thou shalt rejoice in every good thing which the LORD thy God hath given unto thee, and unto thine house, thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you" (v. 11). God had sworn that He would deliver Canaan into their hand (v. 3). Because He had fulfilled this promise of inheritance, each Israelite owed Him a firstfruits offering.

This offering had to be brought to Jerusalem once each year (Ex.

23:16). This was the feast of Weeks or Pentecost (Deut. 16:9–10). The men of Israel owed God a trip to the central city and a token payment of the forthcoming harvest. The cost of the trip was far more than the market value of the token payment. Clearly, this law was a land law.¹ It had to do with the conquest of Canaan.

The Israelites had to suffer economic losses in order to demonstrate their thankfulness toward God. This passage makes it clear that this thankfulness looked back to the exodus and the conquest. In some sense, a token payment looked forward to the full harvest, but the text indicates that this was thankfulness for God's positive corporate sanctions in the past. The Passover had to do with God's deliverance. So did Firstfruits (Weeks/Pentecost), but this deliverance was the deliverance of Canaan into their hands. At Passover, the children were to ask what the ritual meal meant, and the father was to tell them about God's overnight deliverance of the nation (Ex. 12:26–27). At Firstfruits, the male head of household was to declare before a priest what the meaning of this ritual was. The man bringing the offering was required to make this historical confession:

And thou shalt speak and say before the LORD thy God, A Syrian [Aramean—NASB] ready to perish was my father, and he went down into Egypt, and sojourned there with a few, and became there a nation, great, mighty, and populous: And the Egyptians evil entreated us, and afflicted us, and laid upon us hard bondage: And when we cried unto the LORD God of our fathers, the LORD heard our voice, and looked on our affliction, and our labour, and our oppression: And the LORD brought us forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand, and with an outstretched arm, and with great terribleness, and with signs, and with wonders: And he hath brought us into this place, and hath given us this land, even a land that floweth with milk and honey. And now, behold, I have brought the firstfruits of the land, which thou, O LORD, hast given me. And thou shalt set it before the LORD thy God, and worship before the LORD thy God (Deut. 26:5–10).

This offering was used to support the priests, but its economic value was minimal compared with the cost of making the journey to Jerusalem. Had this offering been strictly economic, the priests would have done far better financially had men been allowed to pay them the money equivalent of the journey. This indicates that what was important was the public confession, not the offering itself. It was the cost associated with the journey that demonstrated each man's commitment to God. This cost was the main burden.

1. On land laws, see Appendix J.

At the same time, there was a benefit: corporate worship. “And thou shalt rejoice in every good thing which the LORD thy God hath given unto thee, and unto thine house, thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you” (v. 11). Here the thanksgiving is said to be personal. This celebration was supposed to be more important than the money value of the offering. By requiring the men of Israel to come to Jerusalem to confess their thanks giving for God’s prior deliverance of Israel, both corporately and individually, God created in His people a sense of corporate membership.

The feast of Firstfruits/Weeks/Pentecost was to be a celebration of God’s supernatural intervention in history on behalf of His people. Included in this corporate celebration was the stranger (geyr). This was a resident alien who had consented to live under God’s civil law. Israel’s inheritance was corporate. It was also familistic. The feast of Firstfruits celebrated both forms of inheritance. The required feast was God’s reminder to them that He, not the power of their own hands (Deut. 8:17),² had gained this inheritance for them. The message was clear: to continue to maintain this inheritance, the men of Israel had to acknowledge their dependence on God. This honoring involved corporate worship and the expenses thereof.

B. Token Payments for Blessings Received

The main sacrifice at Pentecost was not the handful of grain which the participant brought; it was the time and expense of travelling. This sacrifice testified to the covenantal faithfulness of the participant. There were costs associated with this benefit: forfeited time, energy, and a handful of grain. God was extracting a great deal of productivity from his people. This was another reminder to them that their wealth did not depend on a conventional allocation of time, seed, and labor. It depended entirely on their covenantal faithfulness.

God does not need our gifts in order to extend His kingdom. He grants to His people the honor of bringing offerings to Him so that they can demonstrate the seriousness of their commitment to Him and their dependence on Him. The Israelites’ public commitment was one means of securing the continuing blessings of God. It was also a way to secure each man’s commitment to the stipulations of the covenant. If a man verbally confessed that God had delivered the nation and had secured their inheritance, and then took days to walk to and from the place of confession, he had put his money where his mouth was.

2. Chapter 21.

When someone forfeits the ownership of capital for the sake of another person, we say that he is either buying something or being charitable. But what do we call such an expenditure when the recipient does not use the asset? There was no suggestion in Old Covenant religion that God ate the sacrifices brought to Him. This made biblical religion different from ancient religions generally.³ But if the Israelite was sacrificing something of value, what did he expect in return? God's favor. Then was he buying God's favor? Was the arrangement a true quid pro quo? Could he expect to receive a stream of income if he provided a trickle of sacrifice?

1. Job's Dilemma

This, basically, was the assumption of three of Job's four questioners. They assumed that he had done something wrong to warrant God's wrath. They were wrong; it was his righteousness that had gained him such adversity, by way of Satan. But Job did not understand why the afflictions had come upon him. He had sacrificed on behalf of his children (Job 1:5), yet they had all been killed at a feast (Job 1:19). Where was the justice of God? That was Job's question. God's answer in chapters 38–41 was a series of rhetorical questions that boiled down to this: "I'm God, and you're not."

The sacrifices were the Israelite's public acknowledgment that whatever he possessed had come from God. Job asked his rebellious wife: "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" (Job 2:10b). God is sovereign over all. But in chapter 3, Job abandoned this testimony. The Book of Job is the account of how he regained his original confession.

The theological problem here is the predictability of God's historical sanctions. If God's curses come as unpredictably as His blessings in response to covenantal faithfulness, the world takes on the appearance of ethical randomness. This is the world of Meredith G. Kline: "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways.”⁴

³ Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1-16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 59.

The conclusion of the Book of Job indicates that the predictability of God’s covenant sanctions is a reliable assumption. “So the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses” (Job 42:12). This passage indicates that God’s objective sanctions in history are not always immediately revealed, but they are nevertheless predictable. They are not random.

2. A Token Payment

God required the beneficiaries of His blessings to acknowledge the source of these blessings. The means of acknowledgment was their assembling at a formal place of worship. Their sacrifice was their formal admission that God was the source of their blessings. This implied that there would be further blessings. This was an aspect of the covenant’s system of sanctions. “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁵ The positive sanction of wealth affirmed the covenant. That is, God demonstrated His commitment to the covenant by creating a predictable stream of blessings for them. By acknowledging retroactively that God had shown grace to Israel, the Israelites were securing future blessings. Grace is to be followed by a token payment. God’s grace to Israel was greater than the payment required. The token payment nevertheless was adequate to secure another round of grace. Then were they buying God’s grace? Not in the sense of full payment for services rendered. It was a token payment to God for services already rendered. This testified to their awareness that grace was the basis of their blessings. Grace is not paid for by its recipients.

Token payments are important in maintaining covenantal faithfulness. Paul wrote that man’s token payment involves everything he owns: “I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service” (Rom. 12:1).⁶ Everything that man can bring before God in payment for services rendered is a token payment. “So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do” (Luke 17:10).⁷ So, in effect, the firstfruits offering was a token payment of a token payment.

4. Meredith G. Kline, “Comments on an Old-New Error,” Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

5. Chapter 22.

6. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

Conclusion

The firstfruits offering was a token payment for blessings already received: corporate blessings and personal blessings. Israelites sacrificed more wealth to get to Jerusalem than they did in surrendering ownership of a handful of grain. They acknowledged that God was the source of their blessings. They acknowledged also that their token payments were not sufficient to repay God.

Their covenantal faithfulness in participating in a liturgy of thanks giving secured for themselves a continuing stream of blessings. The historical predictability of God’s visible corporate sanctions for covenantal faithfulness was at the heart of this ritual feast. It reminded them that God could be trusted to deliver them in the future, just as He had delivered them in the past. Past sanctions testified to future sanctions. Two festivals of Israel, Passover and Firstfruits, looked back in history to God’s deliverance of the nation, but they also looked forward to the maintenance of the kingdom inheritance. The past was prologue.

7. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 41.

POSITIVE CONFESSION AND CORPORATE SANCTIONS

When thou hast made an end of tithing all the tithes of thine increase the third year, which is the year of tithing, and hast given it unto the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, that they may eat within thy gates, and be filled; Then thou shalt say before the LORD thy God, I have brought away the hallowed things out of mine house, and also have given them unto the Levite, and unto the stranger, to the fatherless, and to the widow, according to all thy commandments which thou hast commanded me: I have not transgressed thy commandments, neither have I forgotten them: I have not eaten thereof in my mourning, neither have I taken away ought thereof for any unclean use, nor given ought thereof for the dead: but I have hearkened to the voice of the LORD my God, and have done according to all that thou hast commanded me. Look down from thy holy habitation, from heaven, and bless thy people Israel, and the land which thou hast given us, as thou swarest unto our fathers, a land that floweth with milk and honey (Deut. 26:12–15).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's oath-bound status as the sanctions-bringer in Israel. To prove loyalty to God, the covenant-keeper had to make a public declaration: "I have not transgressed thy commandments, neither have I forgotten them." The oath was an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant model. But the content of the oath had to do with law: point three.¹

A. Confession and Sanctions

In this passage, we see the intimate relation among points two, three, and four of the biblical covenant model. The passage begins with tithing: one's economic acknowledgment of subordination to God and His church. This relates to point two.² It also affirms obedience to God's law: point three. It then calls for God to bring positive corporate sanctions: point four.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

The supplicant called on God to enforce His covenant through sanctions: "Look down from thy holy habitation, from heaven, and bless thy people Israel, and the land which thou hast given us, as thou swarest unto our fathers, a land that floweth with milk and honey" (v. 15). He called for God to bless His people today, just as He had blessed their fathers. This law was revealed before God had given Canaan into Israel's hands. God would soon demonstrate the covenantal basis of this law, namely, Israel's victory over Canaan. The victory over Canaan would ratify this law. This was a land law, i.e., having to do with tribal celebrations.

The laws governing the second and third tithes appear in Deuteronomy 14:22–23.³ This law was different. It mandated a public oath after the presentation of the third tithe, meaning the local third-year tithe of celebration. This oath went beyond the presentation of the tithe. This oath was a means of covenant renewal. It belonged in point four of the biblical covenant model.

The person had just brought his tithe into the town. He then was required to declare this tithe as representative of all the other commandments. As surely as he had not cheated God and the recipients of this holy (hallowed) tithe, so he had not broken any of God's commandments. "Then thou shalt say before the LORD thy God, I have brought away the hallowed things out of mine house, and also have given them unto the Levite, and unto the stranger, to the fatherless, and to the widow, according to all thy commandments which thou hast commanded me: I have not transgressed thy commandments, neither have I forgotten them: I have not eaten thereof in my mourning, neither have I taken away ought thereof for any unclean use, nor given ought thereof for the dead: but I have hearkened to the voice of the LORD my God, and have done according to all that thou hast commanded me" (vv. 10–13). This was comprehensive self-testimony. It covered everything.

For a man to make such a claim, he would have had to be perfect. Such perfection included making atonement and restitution for his sins. In this sense, he was to be as perfect as Job: "There was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job; and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil. . . . And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually" (Job 1:1, 5).

2. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

3. Chapter 35.

To make an affirmation as comprehensive as the one mandated by this passage meant that the individual making it was renewing his covenant with God. This oath must have been taken in front of a Levite, for the sins in question were not merely civil crimes. He then called down God's positive sanctions on the nation based on his affirmation of his own atoned-for legal status. "Look down from thy holy habitation, from heaven, and bless thy people Israel, and the land which thou hast given us, as thou swarest unto our fathers, a land that floweth with milk and honey" (v.15). He was adding his public testimony to the nation's covenantal request for God's positive corporate sanctions. This of course assumed that others in Israel also were making this affirmation. On the basis of their individual confessions of purity, they called corporately on God to bring positive sanctions.

Was the excommunicated Israelite required to take this oath? Was the resident alien? I cannot imagine why. A man outside the ecclesiastical covenant could hardly have been required to renew it. Although he was required to pay his tithe as the land's steward, because the tithe was the Levites' lawful inheritance (Num. 18:1–4),⁴ he was not required to take an oath that would have been inherently false. As a non-citizen, he was in no position to call formally on God to impose positive sanctions. He was not under oath-bound ecclesiastical sanctions.

B. Historical Sanctions

This oath was a positive confession personally and a positive confession corporately. It did not call down God's blessings on the individual except insofar as he was under God's corporate sanctions. The positive personal confession had to do with his obedience in the past. The positive corporate confession invoked God's past sanctions on Israel's behalf at the conquest as the precedent for His future sanctions.

4. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 10.

By testifying to their continuing obedience to God's law in the past, they affirmed their confidence in His covenantal sanctions in the future.

A loss of faith in God's past sanctions would have been fatal for this oath. Such a loss of faith would have undermined the confession. Their faith in those sanctions also would have persuaded them to avoid confessing their own individual perfection. If they lied, they could expect no positive sanctions. They could also expect negative sanctions. To the degree that they believed in God's past sanctions against Canaan, they should have believed in God's future sanctions against themselves for disobedience. "And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God" (Deut. 8:19–20).⁵

Once in each seven-year cycle, they were required to get right publicly with God. The outward evidence of getting right with God was their presentation of the third tithe. The third tithe was celebrated locally (Deut. 14:28).⁶ People would have known each other. This would have kept sinners more humble. Their positive confession regarding their sin-free judicial condition invoked God's corporate sanctions: negative if they were lying; positive if they were telling the truth. The nation could not reasonably expect continued blessings if most of the confessors were either lying or ignorant of their own sins.

This act of covenant renewal was preparatory for national blessings. A little over three years prior to the beginning of the sabbatical year, they called on God to provide national blessings. If their prayer was answered, they would have excess crops. This would be a source of the reserves required to store up food for the sabbatical year. A negative response from God would make these preparations much more expensive. Then they repeated the rite in year six.

C. God's Sanctions and Pagan Confession

What God did in the past, He is willing to do in the future. There is continuity in history. The next passage affirms that God's goal for Israel was international acclaim:

5. Chapter 23.

6. Chapter 35.

This day the LORD thy God hath commanded thee to do these statutes and judgments: thou shalt therefore keep and do them with all thine heart, and with all thy soul. Thou hast avouched [said] the LORD this day to be thy God, and to walk in his ways, and to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and to hearken unto his voice: And the LORD hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people, as he hath promised thee, and that thou shouldest keep all his commandments; And to make thee high above all nations which he hath made, in praise, and in name, and in honour; and that thou mayest be an holy people unto the LORD thy God, as he hath spoken (vv. 16–19).

The basis of historical continuity is obedience to God's revealed law. Without obedience, there will be a negative discontinuity (Deut. 8:19–20).⁷ The twin sanctions of cursing and blessing determine discontinuity and continuity.

Obedience would gain Israel a great international reputation. This means that the pagan nations would honor Israel as a great nation. They would confess the truth about Israel and God's law (Deut. 4:4–8). There would be consistency among God's imputed righteousness to Israel, Israel's actual performance in history, and pagan nations' subjective acknowledgment of Israel's objective righteousness. Two of God's blessings in history are corporate righteousness and corporate confession, even by covenant-breakers. Although members of covenant-breaking nations had a different view of God, man, law, sanctions, and time, they would nonetheless confess that Israel's visible success, based on the Bible's view of God, man, law, sanctions, and time, was superior to their own. Their public confession would conform to God's confession. They would acknowledge God's blessings as blessings. In this sense, they would disavow their own ethical standards and affirm God's standards. This is why covenant law is a form of evangelism.⁸ Because biblical law is attached to positive corporate sanctions and continuity—long-term development—its visible results are so manifest that covenant-breakers are compelled by the evidence to confess its superiority.

The pagan's ability to recognize and confess the truth is an aspect of common grace. The objectivity of God's corporate blessings in history overcomes the hostile confession and false perception of God and His kingdom by covenant-breakers. Isaiah prophesied this eschatolo-

7. Chapter 23.

8. Chapter 8.

gical condition:

Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment. And a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. And the eyes of them that see shall not be dim, and the ears of them that hear shall hearken. The heart also of the rash shall understand knowledge, and the tongue of the stammerers shall be ready to speak plainly. The vile person shall be no more called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful. For the vile person will speak villany, and his heart will work iniquity, to practise hypocrisy, and to utter error against the LORD, to make empty the soul of the hungry, and he will cause the drink of the thirsty to fail. The instruments also of the churl are evil: he deviseth wicked devices to destroy the poor with lying words, even when the needy speaketh right. But the liberal deviseth liberal things; and by liberal things shall he stand (Isa. 32:1–8).

This does not mean that covenant-breakers are converted to soul-saving faith by the testimony of their own eyes. Conversion is by God's special grace. Those who are not converted will, in the final rebellion, join with Satan in an attack on what is good and successful. The objective testimony of God's blessings on a covenant-keeping social order will enrage covenant-breakers and goad them into a final act of destruction. This will end history. "And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever" (Rev. 20:9–10). When they rebel, they will rebel against a universal, triumphant civilization that is objectively so successful that it calls forth the religion of revolution.⁹

Conclusion

The Israelites had to bring their third-year tithes. A failure to do so would have undermined this confession. But this confession used the tithe as a model of covenantal obedience in general. They had to declare publicly, one by one, that they had obeyed all of God's laws in the previous seven-year period. This was a covenant renewal ceremony. It called down God's positive sanctions, but this necessarily involved the risk of negative sanctions for false oath-taking.

9. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

How could they dare to make such a perfectionist affirmation? Only on the judicial basis of the covering provided by personal repentance, restitution, and public sacrifices. Covenantally, this oath was valid only because of the ultimate covering: Jesus Christ's future sacrifice on the cross. The same oath is assumed to have been taken privately by every adult Christian prior to participating in the Lord's Supper.

This corporate event sealed Israel's legal condition until the sabbatical year of release, as either a covenant-keeping nation or a covenant-breaking nation. If God withheld His blessings, they would be tempted to plant crops during the year of release. This would have brought down even greater negative sanctions.

This corporate oath ceremony ceased to be required when the third-year tithe ceased to be required. The third tithe was a land law primarily and a seed law secondarily. This tithe was a communal tithe that united the members of each tribe in the tribe's towns. It was a tribal law. With the cessation of Israel's tribes in A.D. 70, this law was annulled.

Part IV: Oath/Sanctions (27–30)

68

LANDMARK AND CURSE

Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's landmark. And all the people shall say, Amen (Deut. 27:17).

The transition to the fourth section of Deuteronomy is marked by the formal declaration by the Levites of God's curses and blessings. The people were to respond with "Amen," which was a formal corporate ratification by oath (vv. 14–26): point four of the biblical covenant model. This liturgy was covenant renewal: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹ This liturgy was to be preceded by the establishment of a monument of stones inside the boundaries of the land. On these stones were to be written the law (vv. 2–8). The theocentric focus of the landmark law is God's office as the sanctions-bringer. Sanctions are associated with point four.

A. Disinheritance by Theft

This chapter begins with a command to set up stones on Canaan's side of the Jordan (v. 2). These stones would have the law of God written on them (v. 3). They would be made into an altar on which burnt offerings (negative) and peace offerings (positive) would be offered by the people (v. 6). The Levites would then pronounce a series of curses on specific acts (vv. 14–26). This chapter marks a shift from law to sanctions in the Book of Deuteronomy. It begins Part 4.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

This law required public confession was a recapitulation of the law governing landmarks: "This law thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it" (Deut. 19:14).² The focus was inheritance: each family's inheritance of land and also the nation's inheritance of the land of Canaan.

The sin of removing a neighbor's landmark in order to enlarge one's own inheritance involves disinheriting one's neighbor. It is an act of theft. It violates the eighth commandment: "Thou shalt not steal" (Ex. 20:15). This was not a land law. It is universal.³

Moses told the people the following: after the nation had crossed the Jordan and had entered the land, they were to assemble at the dual mountains of the dual sanctions, Gerizim (blessing) and Ebal (cursing) (Deut. 27:12–13). The Levites were then to declare specific acts that would bring cursing to the violators. After each declaration, the assembled nation would respond, "Amen." That is, the assembled nation would ratify each law and its declared curse. This would constitute an act of national covenant renewal. The new generation would renew formally what their parents had ratified at Mt. Sinai a generation earlier (Ex. 19). This ratification was to be corporate; all the people would participate.

The law of the landmark is the only one in the list (vv. 15–26) that was explicitly economic. None of them was a land law or a seed law. Two other laws may have had economic aspects, but they had to do with the perversion of justice: "Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow. And all the people shall say, Amen" (v. 19). "Cursed be he that taketh reward to slay an innocent person. And all the people shall say, Amen" (v. 25). The presumption in these two instances is that the civil law would be misused for someone's benefit. The sought-for benefit would turn into a curse.

The list of curses ended with the requirement that the entire list be ratified: "Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them. And all the people shall say, Amen" (v. 26). That is, partial ratification would lead to a curse, and the nation was to invoke this curse. He who refused to invoke the whole of the law and its curses thereby placed himself under the covenant's curse. This fact was publicly to be declared by all the other participants. The nation would soon exercise the democratic right of sealing the national covenant on behalf of every member of this covenant, present and future.

2. Chapter 44.

3. On land laws and cross-boundary laws (universal), see Appendix J.

The people could not exercise what might be called a pick-and-choose veto over God. They could not pick and choose from among a large list of provisions. They were confronted with a comprehensive list of provisions. God established the covenant. They could ratify all of its stipulations and thereby escape the curses.

B. Boundaries and Sanctions

The landmark is a physical boundary, but it is also an ethical boundary. This corporate confession appears in a list of boundaries. The nation was required to confess that there were curses attached to violations of these ethical boundaries.

If God chose to remove Israel from the land because of Israel's sin, the families' geographical boundaries would lose their binding moral character. Almost a thousand years later, the prophet Ezekiel announced a change in the land law: after the nation's return from the exile, non-covenanted people living in the land would gain the right to purchase rural land (Ezek. 47:22–23).⁴

1. Classical Religion

This law was in stark contrast to the boundary laws of classical Greece and Rome, whose boundaries were marked by markers called termini. A terminus was a god. Once established as a boundary marker, this god could not lawfully be moved. This practice was found even before Rome among the Sabines and the Etruscans.⁵ In Greece, each family had its own gods—dead ancestors—and its own sacrificial hearth. The worship of these household gods was tied to the soil. Fustel de Coulanges described the theology of family ownership of land. Ownership of land was tied to each household's sacred fire.

The sacred fire, which was so intimately associated with the worship of the dead, belonged, in its essential character, properly to each family. It represented the ancestors; it was the providence of a family, and had nothing in common with the fire of a neighboring family, which was another providence. Every fire protected its own and repulsed the stranger. The whole of this religion was enclosed within the walls of each house. The worship was not public. All the ceremonies, on the contrary, were kept strictly secret. Performed in the midst of the family alone, they were concealed from every stranger. The hearth was never placed either outside the house or even near the outer door, where it would have been too easy to see. The Greeks always placed it in an enclosure, which protected it from the contact, or even the gaze, of the profane. The Romans concealed it in the interior of the house. All these gods, the sacred fire, the Lares, and the Manes, were called the consecrated gods, or gods of the interior. To all the acts of this religion secrecy was necessary.⁶

4. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

5. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), II:VI, p. 68.

This was polytheism. It divided family from family, family from stranger. "Each family was most completely independent."⁷ Classical religion defended property in land as a sacred right which rested on sacred rites. It also rested on sacred space. Fustel's description reveals how very different classical religion was from biblical religion, which placed the God of creation on top. The following lengthy extract from The Ancient City indicates the centrality of a family's religious rites in classical religion.

Religion, and not laws, first guaranteed the right of property. Every domain was under the eyes of household divinities, who watched over it. Every field had to be surrounded, as we have seen for the house, by an enclosure, which separated it completely from the domains of other families. This enclosure was not a wall of stone; it was a band of soil, a few feet wide, which remained uncultivated, and which the plough could never touch. This space was sacred; the Roman law declared it indefeasible; it belonged to the religion. On certain appointed days of each month and year, the father of the family went round his field, following this line; he drove victims before him, sang hymns, and offered sacrifices. By this ceremony he believed he had awakened the benevolence of his gods towards his field and his house; above all, he had marked his right of property by proceeding round his field with his domestic worship. The path which the victims and prayers had followed was the inviolable limit of the domain. On this line, at certain points, the men placed large stones or trunks of trees, which they called Termini. We can form a good idea as to what these bounds were, and what ideas were connected with them, by the manner in which the piety of men established them. "This," says Seculus flaccus, "was the manner in which our ancestors proceeded: They commenced by digging a small hole, and placing the Terminus upright near it; next they crowned the Terminus with garlands of grasses and flowers; then they offered a sacrifice. The victim being immolated, they made the blood flow into the hole, they threw in live coals (kindled, probably, at the sacred fire of the hearth), grain, cakes, fruits, a little wine, and some honey. When all this was consumed in the hole, they thrust down the stone or piece of wood upon the ashes while they were still warm." It is easy to see that the object of the ceremony was to make of this Terminus a sort of sacred representation of the domestic worship. To continue this character for it, they renewed the sacred act every year, by pouring out libations and reciting prayers. The Terminus, once placed in the earth became in some sort the domestic religion implanted in the soil, to indicate that this soil was forever the property of the family. Later, poetry lending its aid, the Terminus was considered as a distinct god. . . .

6. Ibid., I:IV, p. 37.

7. Idem.

The Terminus once established according to the required rites, there was no power on earth that could displace it. It was to remain in the same place through all ages. This religious principle was expressed at Rome by a legend: Jupiter, having wished to prepare himself a site on the Capitoline hill for a temple, could not displace the god Terminus. This old tradition shows how sacred property had become; for the immovable Terminus signified nothing less than inviolable property.

In fact, the Terminus guarded the limit of the field, and watched over it. A neighbor dared not approach too near it: "For then," says Ovid, "the god, who felt himself struck by the ploughshare, or mattock, cried, 'Stop: this is my field; there is yours.'" To encroach upon the field of a family, it was necessary to overturn or displace a boundary mark, and this boundary mark was a god. The sacrilege was horrible, and the chastisement severe. According to the old Roman law, the man and the oxen who touched a Terminus were devoted—that is to say, both man and oxen were immolated in expiation. The Etruscan law, speaking in the name of religion, says, "He who shall have touched or displaced a bound shall be condemned by the gods; his house shall disappear; his race shall be extinguished; his land shall no longer produce fruits; hail, rust, and the fires of the dog-star shall destroy his harvests; the limbs of the guilty one shall become covered with ulcers, and shall waste away." We do not possess the text of the Athenian law on this subject; there remain of it only three words, which signify, "Do not pass the boundaries." But Plato appears to complete the thought of the legislator when he says, "Our first law ought to be this: Let no person touch the bounds which separate his field from that of his neighbor, for this ought to remain immovable....

Let no one attempt to disturb the small stone which separates friendship from enmity, and which the land-owners have bound themselves by an oath to leave in its place.”⁸

The soil was sacred in classical religion because the soil was unbreakably associated with local gods of the family. This was not true of biblical religion, where God was seen as the owner. In biblical religion, private property is not sacred and liturgical; rather, it is judicial and moral. In classical religion, the gods had to be fed. They needed a system of inviolable sacred inheritance, so that they could be fed. But the God of the Bible is in no way dependent on rites performed by men. The ownership of land is therefore not inviolable. Under the Mosaic law, land was bounded by laws of inheritance that were established so that men could extend God’s kingdom. The landmarks could not lawfully be moved, but this was an aspect of family inheritance and dominion, not the maintenance of exclusive family hearths.

The Mosaic law promised the sanction of no miscarriages for obedience. “There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil” (Ex. 23:26).⁹ It also promised large families as a positive sanction for obedience. So, the land would not support people as families grew. This was an impulse for Israelites to spread across the earth, bringing the religion of God along with them in foreign nations.¹⁰

This was not true of classical religion, which was polytheistic. For classical religion, the only unity outside the family had to be at bottom political. The system was based on primogeniture: the eldest son inherited all of the family’s land.¹¹ A city could establish colonies through military conquest. This led eventually to a quest for empire. Conquest had to be military. It was not evangelical. Militarism mandated the defeat of local gods: either their elimination or their subordination. Alliances could be established only by formally equating the gods of each city and creating joint rites.¹² The Roman pantheon was political: the equality of all gods under the unity of imperial politics. Religion became subordinate to politics because only through politics

8. Ibid., II:VI, pp. 67–69.

9. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012) Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 55.

10. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24:G.

11. Fustel, Ancient City, II:VII:6, pp. 83–85.

12. Ibid., III:XV, p. 209.

could the cacophony of polytheism-familism be overcome in classical religion. As in every society, unity had to be established through confession and ritual, but Roman religion required a political confession. It involved an affirmation of the genius of the emperor and, later, his divinity. This was unacceptable to Christians. A bloody war for confessional supremacy took three centuries. Rome imposed bloodshed, but Christian confession triumphed in the end.

2. Curses

Those Christians who deny that the Mosaic law carries into the New Covenant should review this list of curses. Which of them is no longer operable?

Cursed be the man that maketh any graven or molten image, an abomination unto the LORD, the work of the hands of the craftsman, and putteth it in a secret place. And all the people shall answer and say, Amen. Cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother. And all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's landmark. And all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that maketh the blind to wander out of the way. And all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow. And all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that lieth with his father's wife; because he uncovereth his father's skirt. And all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that lieth with any manner of beast. And all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that lieth with his sister, the daughter of his father, or the daughter of his mother. And all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that lieth with his mother in law. And all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that smiteth his neighbour secretly. And all the people shall say, Amen. Cursed be he that taketh reward to slay an innocent person. And all the people shall say, Amen (Deut. 27:15–26).

If all of these seem to be still in force, then what about the concluding confession? "Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them. And all the people shall say, Amen" (v. 26). In other words, if all of these laws carry into the New Covenant, then what about God's negative sanctions against those who violate them? What kinds of negative sanctions can the violators reasonably expect? If a man is cursed who violates these laws, then what about the Mosaic law's civil sanctions against such acts? On what judicial basis can these sanctions be said to have been annulled? Are these sins today less heinous in God's eyes than they were in Moses' day? Are they not still crimes? Has the coming of the New Covenant made men less responsible before God than before Christ's revelation? Is it a biblical principle that less is expected from those to whom more has been given? Or is it rather the reverse (Luke 12:48)?¹³

Conclusion

This prohibition against moving the landmark appears in a passage that specified the judicial content of the corporate act of national covenant renewal by the conquest generation. It pronounced a curse against the person who moves his neighbor's landmark, thereby disinheriting his neighbor and his heirs.

The invocation of a curse marks each of these boundaries as covenantal. The Bible-affirming commentator who denies that the Mosaic law applies in the New Covenant has a major problem with this passage: there is no explicit covenantal principle of discontinuity that annuls any of these prohibitions. There is also no explicit covenantal principle that revokes their curses. Then on what judicial basis have the civil sanctions attached to these sins been annulled? This raises the issue of hermeneutics: the biblical principle of biblical interpretation.

13. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

OBJECTIVE WEALTH AND HISTORICAL PROGRESS

Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store. . . . The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. . . . And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD swore unto thy fathers to give thee (Deut. 28:4–5, 8, 11).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God as the sanctions-bringer. The entire chapter of Deuteronomy 28 is a chapter on sanctions.

A. Visible Testimony Under the Mosaic Covenant

God here promises to bring blessings on the nation in response to Israel's covenantal obedience (Deut. 28:1–2). These blessings include wealth. Deuteronomy 28 is a recapitulation of Leviticus 26. It announces dual sanctions: blessing and cursing. The chapter begins with blessing; it ends with cursing. The section on cursing is much longer than the section on blessing.

This was not a land law. The entire passage is not a land law.¹ Modern commentators who reject theonomy regard this passage as a land law, although they may use some other term to describe it. They do not acknowledge that these threatened corporate sanctions carry into the New Covenant. They are incorrect. These sanctions are historical. They are predictable. Covenantal rebellion by a society will lead to God's imposition of these sanctions. This is why this passage and Leviticus 26 are among the most important in the Bible—I believe the most important—for an explicitly biblical social theory.

1. On land laws, see Appendix J.

These promises related to measurable quantities—"increase," "plenteous"—of specific goods: cattle, kine (domesticated oxen), and sheep. "Increase" here referred to storage implements: basket, store houses. The numerical objectivity of these reference points is crucial for this passage. These were not inward blessings. The fulfillment of these covenantal promises, Moses told the nation, will be visible to the Israelites and their enemies. They will serve as evidence of God's sovereignty over history through the predictability of His covenant relationships. The blessings and cursings of God under the Mosaic covenant were sure. They were not disconnected from God's law. There was a bedrock objectivity that united covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. That which God regarded as a blessing, He told Israel, all men would regard as a blessing; the same was true of cursing. The lists of blessings and cursings in Deuteronomy 28 were premised on an agreement among subjective evaluators. There is a shared universe of discourse and evaluation. This objectivity is not undermined by subjective evaluations by individuals or groups. The subjectivism of individual perception would not overcome the objectivity of the corporate sanctions. Israel would enjoy more blessings than the surrounding nations did if the people obeyed God's law. They would be visibly, objectively cursed if they disobeyed.

The idea of national blessings and cursings rests on the existence of objective measures. For men to make such evaluations, numerical measures must apply to the external world. To own a larger number of desirable goods is superior to owning fewer of them. However clever or arcane the methodological subjectivist² may become, there is no escape from Deuteronomy 28. The objective superiority of more is assumed by God. Other things being equal, it is better to be rich and healthy than it is to be poor and sick.

This passage ratifies the legitimacy of individual comparisons of national wealth. An individual may lawfully seek out evidence of superior performance of any society. At the same time, this passage does not ratify the legitimacy of government-funded comparisons of national wealth. The collection of economic or other performance data by the government, except for military-related purposes or other aspects of law enforcement, is illegitimate. To use state coercion to fund data-gathering is a form of illicit numbering. The Mosaic law made it clear that numbering was lawful only in preparation for holy warfare. It was not to be a common activity of the state. Defenders of the central planning state can justify its efficiency only on the basis of its possession of more accurate and more relevant information than the private sector possesses. Statistics becomes a necessary justification for socialism and interventionism. Strip the state of its access to pretended knowledge, and you strip away its aura of omniscience.³

2. On methodological subjectivism, see Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5; North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1990] 2012), Appendix H; North, "Economics: From Reason To Intuition," in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976), ch. 5.

The point of Deuteronomy 28 is not that there are objective measures of economic performance that are available to state economic planners. On the contrary, the point of this passage is this: the way to wealth, both individual and corporate, is through systematic adherence to biblical law. Employees of the state are not supposed to search the records of historical data for tax policies or other forms of coercion that lead, statistically speaking, to a greater likelihood of an increase in per capita wealth. Instead, they are to content themselves with the enforcement of God's law in a quest for civil justice. When they are successful in this venture, per capita wealth will increase. Justice produces wealth. Any attempt to discover economic laws of wealth based on a detailed search of detailed economic statistics reverses the Bible's concept of moral cause and economic effect. It places economic causation above moral causation in the wealth of nations.

Adam Smith understood this; his disciples rarely have. Before he wrote An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations (1776), he wrote The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759). His moderate Deism was a desiccated version of the covenantal Presbyterianism of his Scottish forbears. His contractualism was a man-centered version of their covenantalism. His orderly world of economic causation rested on moral cause and effect in history. The seeming autonomy of his economic theory from morality, and of his morality from theology, is an illusion. Smith's epistemology moved in the direction of autonomy, no doubt, but his economic theory was not an exercise in value-free methodology. He recognized that an economy is grounded in moral causation, for society rests on justice. "Society may subsist, though not in the most comfortable state, without beneficence; but the prevalence of injustice must utterly destroy it.”⁴ Social order is not the product of immoral behavior, however profitable vice may be in the short run. “Vice is always capricious—virtue only is regular and orderly.”⁵ Self-interest that is devoid of love of the neighbor cannot build a civilization. “As to love our neighbour as we love ourselves is the great law of Christianity, so it is the great precept of nature that we love ourselves only as we love our neighbour, or, what amounts to the same thing, as our neighbour is capable of loving us.”⁶ Smith did not pursue this theme in The Wealth of Nations. The doctrine of ethics is not part of its methodological framework. His disciples have ignored his instruction on justice as systematically as Newton’s disciples have ignored his God, creation, and providence.⁷

3. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 2.

B. Capital and Covenant

Evaluating God’s favor to a society by an appeal to numerical measures is valid. But this evaluation must always be governed by the economist’s qualification: “other things being equal.” The “other things” in this case are ethical. Ethics comes first. For most people, it is better for them to be middle class than wealthy. Why? Because of the ethical temptations associated with great wealth. “Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain” (Prov. 30:8–9).⁸ If a person’s ethical status could be ensured irrespective of wealth, then more would always be better than less. But it is inherent in the covenantal structure of a fallen world that wealth and ethics are intertwined. Adam Smith understood this: “The virtue of frugality lies in a middle between avarice and profusion, of which the one consists in an excess, the other in a defect, of the proper attention to the objects of self-interest.”⁹ He lauded frugality in the name of capital formation, but not frugality to the point of greed. He praised spending by the wealthy as a source of benefit for workers, but not to

4. Adam Smith, The Theory of Moral Sentiments (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Classics, 1976), p. 167.

5. Ibid., p. 368.

6. Ibid., p. 72.

7. Isaac Newton, Principia (1687), “General Scholium,” Section 4.

8. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 85.

9. Ibid., p. 438.

the point of wasting one's inheritance.

Here is where biblical covenantalism gets tricky. On the one hand, wealth is designed to confirm the national covenant. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).¹⁰ But it can just as easily undermine the covenant: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17).¹¹ The same numerical sanction—wealth—can become a means of grace or a means of wrath. One's covenantal status determines which effect wealth has. The trouble is, we are not always sure about what our covenantal status is, nor are we sure what it will become under different economic conditions. This is why the author of the Proverbs prayed for middling wealth. It is safer.

In genetics, this tendency is called "regression to the mean." It was discovered by Francis Galton, Darwin's cousin.¹² One scholar of the history of statistics says that this tendency has applied to every system we have discovered.¹³ He exaggerates. There are many systems in which another phenomenon operates: Pareto's 80-20 law.

1. Pareto's Law and Regression to the Mean

There is a pattern that is found in every nation that economists study, irrespective of its politics, religion, or the people's educational attainment. About 80% of a nation's capital is owned by 20% of its population. The shape of either a nation's wealth distribution curve or its income distribution curve does not resemble the shape of its population curve. The population curve in a Western nation bulges with the middle class. In an economically undeveloped nation, it bulges with the poor. In contrast, both the income distribution curve and the wealth distribution curve bulge with the rich, generation after generation. This does not mean that the same families remain rich. It does mean that the richest 20% of the population owns most of the nation's wealth and gains most of the income generated by this capital at any given time. The shape of the income distribution curve resists alteration.

10. Chapter 22.

11. Chapter 21.

12. Peter L. Bernstein, Against the Odds: The Remarkable Story of Risk (New York: Wiley, 1996), p. 167.

13. Ibid., ch. 10.

Italian sociologist-economist Vilfredo Pareto in the late nineteenth century made detailed investigations of the distribution of income in European nations. He discovered an amazing fact: the slope of the income curve, from the richest to the poorest members of society, was similar in every nation that he studied. The richest members received most of a nation's income. This statistical relationship, first published in 1897,¹⁴ has not changed significantly over the last century, irrespective of the economic policies of individual industrial nations. Later studies by other economic historians indicated that in 1835–40, 1883, and 1919 in Great Britain, the richest 10% received 50% of the nation's income.¹⁵ This statistical relationship has come to be known as the Pareto law or the Pareto rule or the 20-80 rule. A 20-80 distribution has been found to apply in social institution after institution, as well as in their diverse operations.¹⁶ No one seems to know why. An economist wrote in 1965: "For a very long time, the Pareto law has lumbered the economic scene like an erratic block on the landscape; an empirical law which nobody can explain."¹⁷

I would like to say that I have an answer to this seemingly irreconcilable question regarding 80-20. The phenomenon exists. Why does it exist? Why doesn't regression to the mean eliminate it? I do not have an explanation. I have searched the World Wide Web for anything that discusses the contradiction between these two statistical outcomes I have found nothing, and very few documents that even contain the phrases. I had not recognized the conflict when I published the first edition of this commentary in 1999.

Pareto offered a famous sociological theory: circulating elites. He argued that the same families or social groups will not be found in the top 20%, generation after generation. Over long periods of time, this appears to be true, but it is not easy to prove. Statistics do not prove it in the way that they validate wealth distribution. The theory is consistent with the hierarchical aspect of the biblical covenant model. The question is: Why does the distribution of income remain skewed, des-

14. Vilfredo Pareto, Cours d'Economie Politique, vol. 2 (1897), pp. 370–72. The book has still not been translated into English, although it remains famous.

15. D. H. Macgregor, "Pareto's Law," Economic Journal (March 1936), pp. 81, 86. Reprinted in Mark Blaug (ed.), Vilfredo Pareto (1848-1923) (Brookfield, Vermont: Edward Elgar, 1992), pp. 21, 26.

16. Richard Koch, The 80/20 Principle: The Secret of Achieving More With Less (New York: Currency/Doubleday, 1998).

17. Josef Steindl, Random Processes and the Growth of Firms: A Study of the Pareto Law (London: Charles Griffin, 1965), p. 18. Cited in ibid., p. 3.

pite either government intervention or free market competition? We do not know.

2. Covenantal Blessings

Here is what Christians do know: God is sovereign over the poor. He raises them up—not all of them, but some of them. “The LORD maketh poor, and maketh rich: he bringeth low, and lifteth up. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory: for the pillars of the earth are the LORD’S, and he hath set the world upon them” (I Sam. 2:7–8). God can intervene in history to break the cycle of poverty as surely as He breaks the cycle of wealth. The question is: Is there a cycle of poverty? Is there a cycle of wealth? Do the rich get richer and the poor get poorer, “other things being equal”?

This is another way of asking: Is God capricious? Does He raise up some and cast down others for no particular reason? Deuteronomy 28 denies this. God has established a structure of economic order. First, there are not many extremely poor men in a covenant-keeping society. “I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread” (Ps. 37:25). Second, there are not many rich men. Capital is hard to earn and harder to retain unless the state intervenes to protect existing holders of capital from new sources of competition. If a state does this, then its national economy eventually falls behind free market societies that refuse to grant such coercive protection to special-interest groups.

If a society is getting richer than its rivals, the poor inside this society may become richer than the middle class in another. Can this lead be maintained indefinitely? To answer this question, I begin with a statistical observation: the effects of long-term economic growth are cumulative. A small rate of growth, if compounded, creates huge effects over centuries. A slightly higher rate of growth, if maintained, creates huge disparities of wealth between nations over centuries. But huge disparities of anything within a system are what call forth the counter-effects: either regression to the mean (which does not seem to govern wealth distribution) or the circulation of elites (which does seem to operate in income distribution). If a nation has a competitive lead, other nations will be tempted to imitate it, assuming that the sources of its advantage become known. There is a great personal eco-conomic incentive for outsiders to discover and appropriate these secrets.

Can God's covenantal blessings be maintained indefinitely? To answer this question, we must not appeal to the Old Covenant's category of original sin. The familiar Genesis pattern of creation, Fall, and redemption appeared continually in the Old covenant, but the New Covenant has broken that pattern through the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ. The possibility of sustained confession and sustained economic growth does exist as a theoretical ideal. The history of the West after 1750 has demonstrated this possibility with respect to the economy. Men have found the secrets of widespread wealth: individual freedom, enforceable contracts, future-orientation, capital accumulation, and technology. England discovered these secrets first. The United States replaced England as an engine of growth early in the twentieth century. Asia has begun to replace the United States at the beginning of the twenty-first.

A nation is subject to the lure of autonomy: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth." It can lose its position of leadership. Historically, every leading nation has. But the New Covenant has overcome original sin in a fundamental way. It has made possible the Mosaic law's ideal of long-term compound growth. It has given man a new eschatology, one which is no longer trapped by the cyclicalism of the pagan world. Linear history—creation, Fall, redemption, final judgment—can be applied to nations and societies. Society is not organic. It does not parallel biology: birth, growth, decline, death. Society is covenantal: confession, obedience/disobedience, sanctions, inheritance/disinheritance.

Contrary to what I wrote in the 1999 version of this book, there is no bell-shaped distribution of wealth within a society. A minority of about 20% of the population owns about 80% of the capital. But there is change in who occupies the top positions, although this may take generations.

The Bible says that at one end of the income distribution curve, the rich man is tempted to forget God. If he succumbs, he loses his wealth. Or his heirs forget to honor the moral basis of wealth-creation. They dissipate their inheritance. The process of inheritance rewards the righteousness. At the other end of the curve, the poor man who steals is eventually caught and sold into bondage under a successful person. His victim receives payment; he receives training; his buyer receives a stream of labor services. If the servant is successful and buys his way out of bondage, he re-enters society as a disciplined man, and presumably a self-disciplined man. He accumulates wealth.

Can a family maintain its advantage? No more than a society can. Then what about society? It is possible for a covenantally faithful society to retain its advanced position until such time as: (1) it succumbs to the temptation of autonomy; (2) other nations imitate it and become even more faithful. On the one hand, sin can undermine a society. It can pull it back into comparative poverty. On the other hand, the gospel can spread, bringing other nations into the growth mode. The deciding factor here is grace, not statistics.

Nations rise and fall, or else get overtaken, but none can maintain a permanent lead apart from its continued lead in the area of ethical sanctification. Wealth has followed the gospel: westward.

C. Visible Testimony Under the New Covenant

The visible outcome of covenant-keeping is external blessing. This theme is basic to the Pentateuch. I argue that it is basic to the entire Bible. My argument is not taken seriously by Christian commentators and Christian social theorists. They argue that there has been a great discontinuity between the Old Covenant and the New Covenant. This discontinuity supposedly has broken the predictability of God's visible responses in history to man's obedience or disobedience. But if there has been a great discontinuity, then what of the evangelism aspect of God's Bible-revealed law (Deut. 4:5–8)?¹⁸ Has ethical cause and effect been annulled by God? Are the differences between covenant-keeping nations and covenant-breaking nations no longer visible to covenant-breakers? Has God annulled this tool of evangelism in the New Covenant, an era which is generally regarded by Christians as the great era of evangelism, i.e., the Great Commission? The critics of biblical law assume that this is the case, but they rarely say so publicly. This implication of their hostility to biblical law is just to embarrassing.

Under the Mosaic covenant, covenant-breakers could see that the outcome of covenant-keeping was superior to other outcomes. This realization was designed by God to call forth the above confession. But Christians today assume that under the New Covenant, this older relationship between national obedience and national wealth is gone. The objective testimony that God gave to covenant-breakers through Israel under the Old Covenant supposedly no longer exists. The arrival of the

18. Chapter 8.

New Covenant has supposedly left modern man with less excuse. Under the Old Covenant, foreigners could see that Israel's law-order was superior. Under the New Covenant, they supposedly cannot see this because no nation possesses or can possess any such covenantal law order. No such law-order exists, we are told. Under the Mosaic law, in short, covenant-breakers supposedly possessed greater clarity regarding the blessings of the covenant, and therefore had greater responsibility for rejecting the covenant than they have today. This strange theory of covenantal responsibility is implicitly held by the vast majority of Christians today. We are asked to believe that the New Covenant has left covenant-breaking men with more excuse for their rebellion, for the clearer covenantal categories of the Old Covenant have been superseded by a less clear covenantal order.

The antinomian critic seeks to evade this implication by arguing that the Holy Spirit's presence in the New Covenant has more than offset the loss of clarity regarding ethical cause and effect. The theological temptation here—one that is widely succumbed to—is that some form of antinomian mysticism will replace judicial theology. An antinomian doctrine of the Holy Spirit replaces the objective testimony taught by Deuteronomy 28.

I argue that a theory of the regressive covenants—more personal responsibility for covenant-breakers despite reduced objective testimony—is incorrect. Antinomian mysticism is also incorrect. There is progress in covenantal history. Theological contrasts get clearer over time, not more muddled.¹⁹ The death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ in history have made the Great Commission possible (Matt. 28:18–20).²⁰ The sending of the Holy Spirit has granted to God's people greater understanding than Old Covenant saints possessed. "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come" (John 16:13). With greater knowledge comes greater responsibility (Luke 12:48).²¹ With the spread of the gospel across national borders has come a spread of knowledge. There remain differences between the national blessings of God and national cursings. Modern Christian academics assure us that these distinctions no longer exist. This is Meredith G. Kline's position, as we shall see. It is the position of every Christian social theorist who denies the New Covenant applicability of Deuteronomy 28, which means all except the theonomists. I contend the opposite: it is not covenant-breakers who are blind to these differences but rather Christian academic social theorists.

19. C. S. Lewis, That Hideous Strength: A Modern Fairy Tale for Grown-ups (New York: Macmillan, 1945), p. 283.

20. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

21. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

D. Social Theory

Deuteronomy 28 and Leviticus 26, more than any other passages in the Bible, serve as the basis for the development of a uniquely Christian social theory. If this system of predictable covenantal blessings and cursings was applicable only to the Mosaic era, then there is no possibility of a uniquely Christian social theory. Christians would have to pick and choose among various humanistic theories of social causation. This in fact is what they have been doing since about 1700. Even before then, most Christian social theorists went to the Greeks and Romans before they went to the Mosaic law. After 1700, they all did. There was no distinctly Christian social theory from the demise of casuistry, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, after 1700.²² Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law (1973) revived the lost art of casuistry. He had begun preaching the weekly sermons that became the Institutes in the late 1960s, exactly paralleling the advent of the situation ethics movement in liberal churches.

Meredith G. Kline attacked Christian Reconstruction in the name of covenantal randomness: "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways."²³ But his criticism went beyond the Christian Reconstruction movement. His broader target was the New Covenant ideal of Christendom. He denied that such an ideal has its roots in the New Covenant. He was not alone in this viewpoint. It is shared by virtually all of modern Protestant Christianity. The debate among Christian social theorists centers on which baptized humanist ideal should be substituted for the ideal of Christendom.

22. Thomas Wood, English Casuistical Divinity in the Seventeenth Century (London: S.P.C.K., 1952). On the decline of Roman Catholic casuistry in 1700, see Albert J. Jonsen and Stephen Toulmin, The Abuse of Casuistry: A History of Moral Reasoning (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988), p. 269.

23. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

In the Protestant West, academically certified evangelicals tend to baptize left-wing Enlightenment social theory, while fundamentalists baptize right-wing Enlightenment social theory. Both groups dismiss as theocratic any judicial system that invokes the Mosaic law as a binding standard for social policy. It is generally considered legitimate to invoke the Ten Commandments, but even here, there is deep suspicion. The first three commandments are considered off limits for civil law; the fourth is considered problematical for civil law; and five through ten are regarded as valid aspects of the civil order only to the extent that they are enforced only as universal statements of a common-ground moral law. Both groups prefer to live under humanism's theocracy rather than the Bible's theocracy. Both groups proclaim, "we're under grace, not law," meaning that both groups baptize the rule of humanistic lawyers. Both proclaim that God rules in history, but only through the tender mercies of covenant-breakers.

Because Kline's theology is opposed to the ideal of Christendom, it is opposed to the ideal of Christian social theory. He offered no social theory. The same is true of his disciples. They have no theory of history. Because they regard the Mosaic law and the civil sanctions that God imposed to defend it as an "intrusion" in the history of the covenant,²⁴ Kline and his followers can offer no theory of history either before or after the Mosaic era. History is inscrutable for them, and they insist that this is history's fault rather than theirs.

E. The Covenantal Structure of History

The biblical covenant is an integrated system. It cannot be accurately discussed apart from all five points. Sanctions link law and eschatology. God's sovereignty enforces this link through hierarchy. He is over the creation, yet He acts through the creation. He is different from the creation, yet He is manifested by the creation. The judicial basis of His wrath on covenant-breakers and their works is two-fold: (1) original sin; (2) the fact that the creation reflects God's moral character to all men. "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness; Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse" (Rom. 1:18–20).²⁵

24. The term "intrusion" is Kline's, which he applies to the entire Mosaic covenant. Kline, "Intrusion and Decalogue," Westminster Theological Journal, XVI (1953/54); Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 154-71.

The system of historical sanctions described in Deuteronomy 28 is the basis of men's understanding of God's eternal character. This system is representational. What happens in history is analogous to what happens in eternity: the extension of God's kingdom. This extension is, first of all, visible in history. Second, it is based on the predictable outcome of covenantal sanctions. The kingdom of God rests on the moral authority of God's law.

To argue that the kingdom's extension in history is not predictably connected to men's corporate responses to God's law is to argue for the processes of history as either indeterminate (Kline) or perverse (Van Til). Van Til wrote that the future will bring persecution for Christians at the hands of ever more powerful covenant-breakers.

But when all the reprobate are epistemologically self-conscious, the crack of doom has come. The fully self-conscious reprobate will do all he can in every dimension to destroy the people of God. So while we seek with all our power to hasten the process of differentiation in every dimension we are yet thankful, on the other hand, for "the day of grace," the day of undeveloped differentiation. Such tolerance as we receive on the part of the world is due to this fact that we live in the earlier, rather than in the later, stage of history. And such influence on the public situation as we can effect, whether in society or in state, presupposes this undifferentiated stage of development.²⁶

Van Til's position is clear: as history develops, the persecution of Christians by the reprobates increases. The good get better, while the bad get worse. Good people therefore become less influential, while bad people become increasingly dominant. But everyone becomes more self-conscious ethically. Spiritual darkness spreads as this self-awareness spreads. Christians should therefore be thankful that they live today rather than later. Christians are tolerated today, he says; then, they will be persecuted. Only the discontinuous end of history will bring relief to Christians. This is the traditional amillennial view of the future. The good news of the gospel for a Christian theory of history supposedly is that history will end before things so bad that the gospel is completely overcome culturally.

25. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

26. Cornelius Van Til, Common Grace (1947), reprinted in Common Grace and the Gospel (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1972), p. 85.

In such a view, the final state beyond the grave represents a radical discontinuity from history. It is not simply that corruption does not inherit incorruption. All Christians agree on this principle.

So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. . . . Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory (I Cor. 15:42–44, 50–54).

The divisive issue is whether history points clearly and objectively to God's objective victory in eternity. Paul's emphasis on discontinuity in I Corinthians 15 appears in the context of continuity: the rule of Christ in history. Specifically, Paul wrote of the first resurrection as a testimony to the final resurrection. In between these two supernatural events, "he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet." This "he" is not Satan.

For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all (I Cor. 15:21–28).²⁷

There are two passages in the Bible that amillennialists cannot deal with in a straight forward manner: Isaiah 65:17–23²⁸ and this one. These are the two great stumbling blocks for amillennialists. When these passages appear, amillennialists announce: “Let the mumbling begin.” In short, “when you stumble, mumble.”

What is significant for social theory in Van Til’s view of the coming eschatological discontinuity is the radical nature of the discontinuity in the inheritance/disinheritance process, time vs. eternity. At the end of time, history’s supposedly progressive disinheritance of covenant-keepers by covenant-breakers becomes the complete inheritance by covenant-keepers. For covenant-keepers, eternal victory is snatched out of the jaws of historical defeat. For covenant-breakers, the reverse is true. In Van Til’s version of amillennialism, eternity is not an extension of covenantal history; on the contrary, it is the great reversal of covenantal history. For Van Til, the New Covenant history’s system of cultural sanctions is exactly the opposite of what is described in Deuteronomy 28. This is why I call his theory of common grace ethically perverse.²⁹ My standard is Deuteronomy 28.

F. Epistemological Self-Consciousness

Van Til argued that history will reveal an increase in epistemological self-consciousness. I have argued that he really meant ethical self-consciousness.³⁰ Van Til’s theory of common grace raises an interesting question. If the covenant-breaker becomes more consistent with his God-denying presuppositions over time, then he must depart further and further from the truth. As an amillennialist, he argued that this would increase the covenant-breaker’s power. As a postmillennialist, I argue that this would decrease his power. But a more interesting question is this: To what extent is the truth-denying covenant-breaker ready and willing to abandon consistency for the sake of pragmatism? If Deuteronomy 28 is still in force in the New Covenant, then the consistent covenant-breaker is headed for comparative poverty. The cov-

27. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on first Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

28. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 15.

29. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

30. Idem.

enant-keeper will excel him in productivity.

Look at the history of the Soviet Union if you want an example of covenant-breaking consistency run amok. Look at Red China's "Great Leap Forward," 1959–62: as many as 30 million people may have starved—the records are not clear.³¹ In the late 1980s, the Soviet Union collapsed in bankruptcy. Red China under Deng in the 1980s abandoned socialism for the sake of economic growth. This experiment worked. China has experienced historically unprecedented economic growth, 1979–2005. Men's desire for wealth has undermined socialism as an ideal, for they now recognize that socialism produces poverty. Socialism as a theory finally crashed and broke apart on the rocks of economic reality, 1988–1991. The world is no longer in the grip of the idea of socialism.³² When socialism faded as an ideal, it faded incredibly fast. Pragmatism overcame it almost overnight. The world looked at Gorbachev's Russia and concluded: "Loser." Nobody wants to be a loser. The Marxist promise of world domination foundered: in the financial markets, in Afghanistan, and in the Persian Gulf.³³ Communism's eschatology of victory has become a joke. Stripped of faith in Communism's positive, confident eschatology,³⁴ Communists were doomed to defeat. The movement's total failure was reflected almost overnight in the discount book bins of the West: books on Marxism became unsalable at retail prices. Publishers immediately ceased publishing them. Except in university book stores, where tenured radicals are still employed, we no longer find Marxist books offered for sale. That twentieth-century ideological war is over. Marxism died with a whimper, not a bang.

Left-wing Western humanist intellectuals have replaced their once-confident defenses of socialism with half-hearted affirmations of the concept of private ownership (with extensive qualifications).³⁵ They have grudgingly adopted more of the Bible's truth in the name of 31. The most detailed account in English is Jasper Becker, Hungry Ghosts: Mao's Secret Famine (New York: Free Press, 1997).

32 32. Clarence B. Carson, The World in the Grip of an Idea (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1979).

33. Iraq was a client state of the Soviet Union. Its defeat in early 1991 by the U.S. military broke the spell of the Soviet Union as a military powerhouse. In 1996, the Russian army was defeated by the army of the breakaway state of Chechenya. The Russian army has become a rag-tag force of unpaid beggars in the streets. Michael Specter, "In Triage, a Wasted Russia Sacrifices Veterans," New York Times (Jan. 19, 1997).

34. F. N. Lee, Communist Eschatology (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1974).

35. So have left-wing Christian intellectuals. See Appendix F: "The Economic Re-Education of Ronald J. Sider."

practical reality. Pragmatism has overcome ideology. The desire for the good life has overcome the desire for full-scale state control over the economy among the West's left-wing intelligentsia. Full-scale socialism—state ownership of the tools of production—became politically incorrect in the late 1980s, despite all of the opprobrium heaped by the political and academic establishments on England's Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and America's President Ronald Reagan. Socialism has become a god that has visibly failed. No one today wants to be known as someone who worships in socialism's shrine. Socialism committed the ultimate sin for modern intellectuals: it became passé.

At the end of history, there will be a great satanic rebellion. "And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever" (Rev. 20:9–10). This rebellion will be a rebellion against success, not failure. It will be a rebellion against an established Christian civilization, not against some marginalized ghetto culture. The whole point of Satan's rebellion is to rebel. To describe this rebellion as if it will be a huge majority movement against a tiny handful of poverty-stricken, politically impotent Christians makes no sense.³⁶

Covenant-breakers become less intellectually consistent over time, not more consistent. They become more pragmatic, more willing to subordinate themselves to a culture that delivers the goods—in the long run, Christian culture. Whenever they become more consistent, they produce the bad society, one that fails to deliver the goods. They want the fruits of covenant-keeping more than they want the fruits of covenant-breaking. This is why there can be social progress in history. Covenant-breakers will progressively recognize in the New Covenant what they recognized in the Old Covenant: "Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?)” (Deut. 4:5–8).³⁷

36. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), pp. 525–28. (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

At the end, they will rebel. That is why it will be the end.³⁸ But to imagine that the good get weaker and the bad get stronger over time is to imagine a vain thing: the reversal—not merely the annulment—of Deuteronomy 28.

Conclusion

Deuteronomy 28 sets forth blessings and cursings. These sanctions are national covenant sanctions. They have not been annulled by the New Covenant. Deuteronomy 28 sets forth the hope of progress in history: obedience brings inheritance; disobedience brings disinheritance. Covenant-keepers will inherit in history if they obey. The decisive issue here is not power; it is obedience.

The objectivity of the blessings in history points to the power of common grace in history. Men who do not worship God nevertheless perceive the benefits of obeying God’s law. Men see with their eyes and acknowledge with their tongues that covenant-keeping brings more of the good things in life than covenant-breaking does. The objectivity of God’s historical sanctions testifies to the reality of the objectivity of God’s eternal sanctions. This is as it should be. It brings covenant-breakers under greater condemnation in history and eternity than if there were no predictability and objectivity to God’s covenant sanctions in history.

There are two ways of denying the continuing authority of God’s system of covenant sanctions in history. First, by denying that the New Covenant’s corporate sanctions are continuous with the Old. This denial needs to be proven exegetically, not assumed automatically. Second, by denying that covenant-breaking men will subjectively see and acknowledge the admittedly objective structure of covenantal sanctions in history. But this attributes to covenant-breaking men a degree of continuous commitment to holding down the truth in unrighteousness far greater than their desire for the good life, which can be obtained by conforming to the external requirements of God’s law. What we have seen throughout history is that covenant-breakers are repeatedly willing to conform to God’s external laws for the sake of gaining the covenant’s objective blessings. Admittedly, they would become steadily more consistent with their own atheistic presuppositions if they could do so at zero price. But such consistency has a high price tag: economic stagnation and other unpleasant cursings. Men refuse to pay this price for too long, once they have seen that freedom works, elevating their rivals. When, at the Moscow Olympics in 1980, the Soviet elite saw what Western tourists owned, compared to the shoddy, pathetic goods the Soviet elite enjoyed, Communism's doom was sealed. Eleven years later, after an entombed nuclear reactor, a bankrupt economy, and a failed war in Afghanistan, the Soviet Union fell. It took only three days: August 19 to 21, 1991.

37. Chapter 8.

38. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

Deuteronomy 28 provides the basis of a self-consciously biblical social theory. But Deuteronomy 28 is rejected by modern Christian social theorists. This is why they refuse to provide anything explicitly biblical in the way of social theory. They baptize this or that humanist system. They reject the Pentateuch as a source of either the judicial content or the formal structure of social theory. "The Bible does not offer economic blueprints," they insist, which is why they are little more than cheerleaders for humanism rather than designers of a new civilization. "We're under grace, not law," they proclaim, which is why they are under humanist politicians, bureaucrats, and lawyers.

Christian social theory must accept the New Testament continuity of the corporate sanctions of Deuteronomy 8 and 28. Yet Christians who regard themselves as laying the intellectual foundations of an academic Christian worldview have rejected the Book of Deuteronomy. They have come to readers in the name of Christ, yet they have invariably proclaimed some sort of common-ground philosophy with humanism: natural law, political pluralism, Enlightenment social philosophy, God as Creator but not Savior, common grace. Every suggested common-ground system has led to the transfer of legal sovereignty and political power to humanists, who gladly accept the gift and then tighten the screws on Christians and the institutional church. Christian social theorists then return to the drawing board, vainly searching for yet another common-ground alternative to Deuteronomy 28, vainly expecting those who hate God to share with God's people the delegated sovereignty of power. Moses is not good enough for Christian social theorists, so they have instead invoked Aquinas, Grotius, Locke, Rousseau, Smith, Madison, Burke, Marx, Mill, and other assorted defenders of the social ideal of human autonomy. They have placed God in the dock by way of Moses. Then they wonder why neither the humanists nor the theonomists take them seriously.

CREDIT AS A TOOL OF DOMINION

The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them (Deut. 28:12–13).

The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail (Deut. 28:43–44).

The theocentric issue here is God as the source of both positive and negative economic sanctions. These sanctions lead either to the corporate inheritance or disinheritance of nations. The nations will become Israel's inheritance if Israel obeys God. Israel will become the owner of the other nations' capital. This will in turn elevate Israel's political power over them. In short, "The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender" (Prov. 22:7).¹

All of this seems hard to believe. How could a tiny nation in Palestine become rich and powerful to this degree? The answer involves the theological doctrine of God's sovereignty over history, coupled with the corporate sanctions of Bible-revealed covenant law. Modern humanist man believes in neither doctrine. Neither does modern Christian man: Arminian, antinomian, and eschatologically escapist.²

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 67.

2. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

A. Trade, Credit, and Debt

When a person sells an item to another person, there is either an immediate exchange of present assets or the establishment of a debt-credit relationship. In the first case, one participant receives goods, services, or money from the other. The other party to the transaction receives the reciprocal. In the second case, one participant receives present assets in exchange for a promise to pay future assets.

Credit and debt are simultaneous and reciprocal. One person surrenders ownership of goods, or legal claims on future goods, or else he supplies present services. For this, he receives the other person's promise to pay future goods or services, or ownership of a third party's promise to provide goods or services in the future.

There is present value received on both sides of the transaction. Promises to pay often possess present value. The more trustworthy the promisor is, the greater the economic value of the promise, i.e., the lower the risk of default.

Because promises to pay possess present value, there is value for value exchanged. Neither party in the exchange is asked to surrender something for nothing. Neither party is expected to gain something for nothing. Each party exchanges in order to receive something of greater value to him than what he surrenders. But there is not an exchange of presently consumable wealth. One (or more) party in the transaction promises to pay future consumable wealth.

In most exchanges in a modern economy, there is an element of delayed payment. *Most exchanges have an element of debt and therefore credit.*³ Most exchanges are by check or credit card. Only a comparative handful of exchanges involve currency, which in fact means current payment. Very few exchanges are pure barter. Barter is characteristic of a low division of labor society, i.e., a backward society. Therefore, the greater the division of labor, the greater the level of debt-credit. The greater the division of labor, the greater the specialization of both production and consumption, i.e., the greater the number of choices. The greater the number of choices, the greater the wealth of the society. If credit produces wealth through thrift, then so does debt. Credit and debt are two sides of the same legal relationship. We can accurately say, then, that debt produces wealth. There is no way around this fact until such time as all electronic payments are cleared instantaneously.

3. Chapter 61.

The high per capita output of modern society rests on an extensive division of labor and therefore extensive debt-credit. Without debt/credit, most of the world's population would die within a few weeks.

There is a tendency for traditional critics of modern life to disparage debt. They may quote Paul: "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law" (Rom. 13:8).⁴ But the debt discussed here, which Paul rejected, is not the debt of 30-day deferred payments (credit cards) or the period needed for checks to clear the banks. The debt in question is long-term debt. As to how long a debt period must be before critics begin to challenge its legitimacy, there is no way to say in advance.

Debt establishes a legal bond between creditor and debtor. A person who writes a check to buy something has established a legal relationship with the seller. This relationship lasts until the check clears and the seller's bank account is credited with the money. Then the legal relationship ends, unless there was some sort of guarantee with respect to the good or service.

A guarantee is another form of debt. When an automobile manufacturer sells a vehicle with a six-year or 100,000-mile (or kilometer) guarantee, the manufacturer becomes a debtor to the buyer. This is not usually called a debt by the common person, but surely the sales contract establishes a debt. There are people who claim to be opponents of debt who would accept the legitimacy of a performance guarantee of some kind. This indicates that they have not thought through the meaning of debt.

B. Debt and Subordination

We do not think of an automobile manufacturer as being subservient to the product buyers, but surely it is subservient. It has issued legal guarantees. From time to time, we read of vehicle recalls by an automobile company. The company offers to make a free repair of a faulty part. It costs millions of dollars just to inform the buyers of the recall, let alone make the repairs.

The buyers may be subservient to the automobile manufacturer. Buyers usually buy on credit. The credit may be issued by a bank, but it also may be issued by the manufacturer, who has set up a division for making loans. The extension of debt by the seller of goods is part of the overall sales campaign. There may be more profit in the debt contract than in the sale of the product. A manufacturer may be using the product as a means of persuading buyers to accept debts.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12.

So, for buyers and sellers, mutual promises over time may extend for years. Each party is subservient to the other in some way. Each has extended credit and accepted debt in order to facilitate the original transaction.

Then why does the text say that the nation that has extended credit is the master, and the nation that has accepted a debt is the servant? What have nations got to do with anything, analytically speaking? The transactions are all individual. In what way are national entities involved?

1. Corporate Blessings and Curses

God says clearly in these passages that the extension of credit is a means of dominion. There are winners and losers. These individual winners and losers belong to specific covenantal associations, called nations. Gains and losses, when added up, establish criteria for winning nations and losing nations, or rival groups within a nation. “The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low” (v. 43).

Who was the stranger in Mosaic Israel? The Hebrew word here is geyr. This was not a nokree, a part-time foreign visitor. This was a resident alien who was under the Mosaic law, including even some of the sacrificial restrictions.

Therefore I said unto the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood, neither shall any stranger that sojourneth among you eat blood (Lev. 17:12).

And every soul that eateth that which died of itself, or that which was torn with beasts, whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger, he shall both wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even: then shall he be clean (Lev. 17:15).

But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt: I am the LORD your God (Lev. 19:34).

Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Molech; he shall surely be put to death:

the people of the land shall stone him with stones (Lev. 20:2).

And he that blasphemeth the name of the LORD, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the LORD, shall be put to death (Lev. 24:16).

But the seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; that thy manservant and thy maidservant may rest as well as thou (Deut. 5:14).

Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy, whether he be of thy brethren, or of thy strangers that are in thy land within thy gates (Deut. 24:14).

Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless; nor take a widow's raiment to pledge (Deut. 24:17).

Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow. And all the people shall say, Amen (Deut. 27:19).

Despite the protection offered to the stranger by the Mosaic law, Moses says here that it is a curse on Israel if strangers collectively are net lenders to the Israelites collectively. Strangers were to be treated well, but they were also to remain subservient to the Israelites. One means of establishing their subservience within Israel was by the Israelites' extension of credit to them. This was certainly the means of dominion with respect to geographically foreign nations: "Thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow" (v. 12).

2. Debt and Class Membership

There can be no question of God's assessment of credit and debt. First, it is better to lend than to borrow. "The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender" (Prov. 22:7). Second, this is as true of nations as of individuals. Third, the extension of credit is a tool of dominion. If you wish to rule, become rich. If you wish to rule, extend credit.

What is not said here, but is surely implied, is that one means of becoming rich is to extend credit. The creditor gains present legal title to future goods by surrendering present title to present goods. He values the future goods promised by the debtor more than he values the present goods that he surrenders to the debtor in order to establish the creditor/debtor relationship. He presumably is more future-oriented than the debtor. He is therefore in a higher class.⁵

High present-orientation is not true of a debtor who is using the debt to build a business or gain an education or in some other way become more productive. He has adopted an economic position described by the Bible as subservient, but he does this temporarily for a purpose: to become a ruler later. This pathway from servant to ruler is basic to the entire Bible story, from Adam, who was required to obey God in the garden before becoming a ruler over the earth, to Joseph, who served Potiphar and the prison master, to Moses, God's servant, to Christ, as the archetype of servant become master.

Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ Lord, to the glory of God the Father (Phil. 2:5–11).

This is why debt for productive purposes is legitimate for a dominion-oriented covenant-keeper. Nevertheless, the debt-burdened covenant-keeper should acknowledge the reality of his subordinate condition during the period of the debt. He is paying for his future authority to rule by spending a period in bondage. This is not a cost-free arrangement.

Israel was a servant of Egypt, but at the exodus, Israel collected what was owed (Ex. 12:35–36). There are periods of subordination for a nation, and then there may be periods of dominance. During the nineteenth century, England was the world's money-lender and investor. The United States was a debtor nation to England. But the debt was productive debt. It was used to build canals, railroads, and other capital projects. After World War I bankrupted the nations of Europe, the United States became a creditor nation.

5. On future-orientation as the basis of class position, see Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), ch. 3.

The same legal relationship—creditor/debtor—changes character when the debt is used for consumption. When an individual borrows money to purchase goods that depreciate, he consumes his capital. What capital? First, it is his ability to borrow, which is a capital asset. He uses it for present consumption rather than future production. Second, he consumes his future income, which is now owed to the creditor. This income could have been used to lend out or create a business, but it belongs to the creditor until the debt is repaid.

3. Capital and Choice

Long-term capital consumption is the road to poverty and servitude. This process reduces a person's future options, i.e., his choices. This is the meaning of poverty: few choices. Capital consumption reduces a person's ability to become more productive. If done in old age, it reduces one's economic legacy. We must consume in order to live. Some luxury spending is part of God's rewards in history: post-production, not pre-production. Charity is also positive. But only in emergency conditions should a person use borrowed money to provide charity, which is usually consumed rapidly. Charity creates long-term dependence on the donor by the recipient, unless it is designed to avoid this effect. Charity that establishes dependence is like credit that establishes dependence. It is a tool of dominion. Charity that is financed with borrowed money creates a hierarchy of dependence: from the creditor to the borrower to the recipient.

A nation whose members are expanding their credit through their thrift is extending its dominion. Properly put, a nation whose residents have extended credit, net, to residents of other nations have extended the dominion of their nation or society. As individuals acting in their own self-interest, they have extended their nation's corporate dominion. This market-produced fusion of personal dominion and corporate dominion was not widely understood prior to the publication of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations (1776). Conversely, Deuteronomy 28:43–44 indicates that a nation that is a net borrower may be under a long-term curse, or it may be involved in a capital-formation program. It depends on what the debt is being used for: consumption or capitalization.

This assessment of a corporate condition implies that the reason for individual indebtedness is influenced by a shared corporate worldview and a shared corporate rate of time-preference. Individuals with in a group view dominion in much the same way: it is either worth sacrificing present consumption in order to attain or else not worth it. This means that corporate groups are more than the individuals who compose them. It also means that methodological individualism is not biblical. Three of the four covenants of God are corporate: familial, ecclesiastical, and civil. Confessions can also be national. “And Moses came and called for the elders of the people, and laid before their faces all these words which the LORD commanded him. And all the people answered together, and said, All that the LORD hath spoken we will do. And Moses returned the words of the people unto the LORD” (Ex. 19:7–8). Covenant sanctions are corporate.

C. Clustering and Commerce

If the means of establishing a credit/debt relationship between individuals is trade, then so is the means of establishing a credit/debt relationship among groups, including nations.

Trade across borders is conducted between individuals: across national borders, across state borders, across city borders, and across the street. Despite the fact that trade is between individuals, trade has corporate effects within borders. A familiar proverb says, “Birds of a feather flock together.” So do people. People with a shared worldview tend to adopt similar spending and saving habits. These habits create corporate patterns of thrift.

In the late twentieth century, market researchers discovered the existence of a series of comprehensive, statistically significant correlations among people who live in the same zip code, i.e., a postal delivery neighborhood. These correlations are lifestyle correlations. Over 60 separate postal code lifestyle classifications were known to exist in the United States in the 1990s. These correlations are geographical. Marketers make accurate decisions in terms of these geographical correlations. This phenomenon has been called clustering.⁶ To limit a discussion of trade to pairs of individuals would lead the analyst to overlook clustering. This clustering can be intensely local. It can also be international.

Most of the time, the extent of clustering is not perceived by residents. While most people can recognize differences of neighborhood income and such neighborhood phenomena as mowed lawns, painted homes, and other aesthetic identification markers, the techniques of scientific surveying reveal subtle differences that residents do not consciously recognize, such as favored brands of products or favored forms of recreation.

6. Michael J. Weiss, The Clustered World: How We Live, What We Buy, and What it all Means About Who We Are (Boston: Little, Brown, 2000).

Because such detailed and objective local distinctions can be identified scientifically and verified by the results of test marketing by profit-seeking companies, local characteristics can accurately be said to exist. There are also well-known characteristics of nations that residents inside and outside readily acknowledge. The old joke about purgatory being a world in which Germans are the policemen, the French run the bureaucracies, Italians own the banks, India runs the transportation system, and the English are the chefs, is amusing because national characteristics are widely recognized. As time goes on, the Americans will replace Germans as the policemen in the joke. The Japanese will provide the humor.

Racial and national characteristics provide the most familiar distinguishing marks of "them vs. us." People identify themselves as members of a group that provides them with meaning, security, and a sense of belonging to an inter-generational group that offers personal significance. Less meaningful in industrial societies are tribal distinctions that once were matters of life and death. Clan membership used to be significant for survival in Scotland, but no longer. And, because of the effects of humanism, theological confession has been relegated to official insignificance in the civil realm. Yet humanism proclaims an intensely theological confession regarding the nature of God, man, law, causation, and time.

Trade between individuals can and does result in corporate assessments regarding corporate winning and losing, kingdom-building and kingdom-surrendering. The assessments in Deuteronomy 28 regarding the comparative success of Israel among the nations points to the possibility of corporate progress over time. Trade by individuals is rarely discussed in the Mosaic law, other than in the context of oppression or sabbath-breaking. The personal benefits of trade are rarely mentioned. Yet the national effects of debt are discussed here in terms of covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking. The Bible's main passages that discuss economic results—Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28—begin with collectives, not individuals.

The text makes it clear that it is better to extend credit than to amass debt. Yet to extend credit is to indebt the recipient. The context of these passages is the exercise of lawful rule. The passage discusses international politics, not wealth-creation. It discusses the results of a series of voluntary exchanges between sellers and buyers. The corporate results are national debt, meaning national subordination, and national credit, meaning national domination. Out of millions of politically unplanned, mutually agreed-upon voluntary exchanges comes national servitude or dominion. Out of many, two.

How can this be? How can a series of unplanned individual exchanges produce long-term corporate results are described here as covenantal curses and blessings? Because of causation in history. Social causation is covenantal. It has to do with confession and life style, with word and deed. The confession and lifestyle that God mandates in Deuteronomy rests on His national covenant. Those who had covenanted with God—Israelites—were distinguished from resident aliens and residents in other lands. The individual covenant is structured so as to produce dominion for God’s corporate kingdom. So are the familial and ecclesiastical covenants. They are of one piece. They are a “package deal.” All work together to extend God’s kingdom in history. (I deliberately use the present tense.) If a society abandons one of the pieces, it has compromised its status as covenantal under God.

This means that God’s covenants capitalize the kingdom of God. They create a lifestyle that is favorable to economic growth. This means that the laws of the covenants promote personal thrift, hard work, careful planning, honest money, private property, and entrepreneurship. Yet the actual words of the four covenants do not require the oath-taker to pursue allegiance to most of these economic means to the larger end, namely, the extension of God’s kingdom in history. The eighth commandment does require the oath-taker to forego theft.⁷ This is an affirmation of private property. The tenth commandment against covetousness reinforces this affirmation. While adherence to these two commandments by covenant-keepers does extend God’s kingdom in history, there is no mention of this goal in the decalogue.

D. New Testament Teaching

The New Testament’s clearest statement with respect to lending is found in Jesus’ parable of the talents.

7. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012) Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 28.

Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed: And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine. His lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed: Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents. For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath. And cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth (Matt. 25:24-30).

The parable is about the stewardship of a man's God-given resources in history. The man who buried his talents, returning nothing extra, had misunderstood the biblical principle of value-added living. He was criticized harshly by the owner, who told him that he should have lent the money at usury.

This passage legitimizes banking and interest. The money returned to the owner should have been more than the money delivered because interest was available to the risk-averse steward. By forfeiting any interest return, the steward cheated the owner of a legitimate return on the use of his money.⁸

Conclusion

God tells His people to become creditors to covenant-breakers. The alternative is for covenant-breakers to become creditors to covenant-keepers. This is evidence that debt and credit are inescapable concepts. It is never a question of avoiding credit/debt. It is a question of who extends credit to whom.

As a people, covenant-keepers are to run balance of payments surpluses, i.e., sell more to covenant-breakers than covenant-breakers buy from them. Covenant-keepers are to lend money to covenant-breakers. How can this take place? Because covenant-breakers spend more of their money on goods and services sold by covenant-keepers than they spend on goods and services sold by covenant-breakers. The difference in the total is lent by covenant-keepers to covenant-breakers.

8. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 47.

Isn't this a way to enable covenant-breakers to enjoy additional income without present production? Yes. The idea behind this arrangement is that covenant-breakers are more present-oriented than covenant-keepers are. They buy consumption goods now. Covenant-keepers thereby become owners of foreign capital, reaping a future return by lending in the present. By extending credit, they purchase the future productivity of covenant-breakers. This is another way by which God extends His rule over the earth in history. He allows His people to act as His stewards, purchasing the future output of covenant-breakers. Covenant-keepers buy back the capital of covenant-breakers. They establish a legal claim to an ever-growing proportion of the world's output.

This passage, as with all of Deuteronomy 28, establishes the principle of methodological covenantalism.⁹ There are economic issues that are not dealt with accurately on the assumption that we must begin our economic analysis with either the autonomous individual or the corporate state.

9. Chapter 68.

THE COVENANT OF PROSPERITY

Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them, that ye may prosper in all that ye do. Ye stand this day all of you before the LORD your God; your captains of your tribes, your elders, and your officers, with all the men of Israel, Your little ones, your wives, and thy stranger that is in thy camp, from the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water: That thou shouldest enter into covenant with the LORD thy God, and into his oath, which the LORD thy God maketh with thee this day: That he may establish thee to day for a people unto himself, and that he may be unto thee a God, as he hath said unto thee, and as he hath sworn unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. Neither with you only do I make this covenant and this oath; But with him that standeth here with us this day before the LORD our God, and also with him that is not here with us this day (Deut. 29:9–15).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as the king of the covenant. God called His people to come before Him to ratify His covenant. This has to do with point four of the covenant: oath.¹ There is no doubt that He initiated this public ratification meeting. They were to respond to His call. They did not call Him; He called them.

A. God's Call to Prosperity

The positive sanction of prosperity is assured on the basis of covenant-keeping. This was an inter-generational covenant: “Neither with you only do I make this covenant and this oath; But with him that standeth here with us this day before the LORD our God, and also with him that is not here with us this day.” Those who would later inherit from this generation would be bound by the same covenantal stipulations. That is, the stipulations remained with the inheritance. The property could not be alienated from the legal conditions that had established the original right of inheritance. This was not a seed law or a land law.² It was the law of the covenant: past, present, and future. This includes the church and every nation in covenant with God through the church. “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

“Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them, that ye may prosper in all that ye do.” These words constituted a call to prosperity. This was a call to dominion. It was a call to added responsibility. God expects more from those to whom He has given more than from those who have received less (Luke 12:48).³

Because we live in a culture that attributes enormous importance to prosperity, we may find it difficult to believe that men need to be called to prosperity. Nevertheless, there are cultures in which envy is dominant. To own too much is to invite reprisals. The very idea of seeking prosperity is anathema in such cultures. To set oneself apart through wealth is regarded as a transgression of fundamental cultural values. This is especially true in primitive cultures.⁴ This is what keeps them primitive.

A similar mentality has been pervasive in American fundamentalist circles for over a century. Economic success is considered this-worldly. To pursue it is to risk being identified as a person whose reference points are temporal rather than eternal. The same kind of hostility to wealth can be found in liberal and neo-evangelical academic circles. History professor Ronald Sider’s best-selling book of the 1970s, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (1977), was a tract for its time. Two decades later, however, the allure of such tracts had diminished considerably. I can understand why Sider re-wrote his.⁵ The lure of a well-funded retirement portfolio is much greater today. A retirement portfolio of half a million dollars is considered too small by professors who were undergraduate cheerleaders for Sider in 1977.

This passage makes it plain that prosperity is a valid goal. This is

2. See Appendix J.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

4. Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt Brace & World, [1966] 1970), pp. 41, 295, 304, 305, 330.

5. See Appendix F: “The Economic Re-Education of Ronald J. Sider.”

why God has attached positive economic sanctions to His law. Obey Him, and you will tend to become wealthy. This tendency may be offset by uncharacteristic adversity, such as chronic sickness, or by a calling⁶ that gains little monetary income, such as foreign missions. But, on the whole, God's people are supposed to be abnormally prosperous because they are to be abnormally obedient. God rewards obedience. This means that covenant-keepers are to exercise dominion in history.

Wealth is a tool of dominion. As such, it is a legitimate goal. As surely as a tradesman seeks to own the tools that will increase his productivity, so should Christians seek to obey God's revealed laws. God's positive sanctions will pour down on those societies that obey Him. Men thus rewarded will find it easier to extend their influence into new areas or deeper into their own areas of service. Their wealth will enable them to extend the kingdom of God in history. Wide spread poverty is a social curse, not a blessing. It will be the disciples of Satan, not the disciples of God, who will be impoverished as history unfolds.

B. Future-Orientation

The text prophesies of future generations that will come under the covenant of prosperity. God was making a covenant with them, too. They might not ratify it nationally in the same way that this generation was being asked to ratify it. God would call them together to renew it every seven years (Deut. 31:10–12).⁷ He might not call them to proclaim verbally their allegiance to Him. They would not have to. Their possession of the inheritance would be proof enough that the terms of the covenant still were binding. The formal ratification by the conquest generation would judicially represent the heirs.

If prosperity was to come to the conquest generation, why not also to each subsequent inheriting generation, as long as each would continue to uphold the terms of the covenant? The oath was binding across the generations. The covenant possessed continuity over time. Its authority would be demonstrated continually by the presence of visible sanctions. The inheritance itself was one of these sanctions.

It should have been obvious to everyone that, over time, Israel's population would increase in response to their covenantal obedience. A fixed supply of land in the face of a growing population would guarantee smaller plots for each succeeding generation.⁸ So, the inheritance was more than rural land. The economic inheritance was mainly the ability of covenant-keeping families to generate increased income. What was being guaranteed was not land but prosperity. God had delivered into the hands of Israel the secrets of amassing wealth. Would they keep the law and extend the kingdom grant? Or would they rebel?

6. Calling: the most important work you can do in which you would be most difficult to replace.

7. Chapter 75.

God was setting before them a unique gift: the ability to create wealth. This process of wealth-creation could extend down through the ages. God was telling Israel that wealth was supposed to extend through the generations. This was their inheritance. It was intended to ratify the covenant: “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁹

God was also setting before them a theory of history that was both linear and progressive. They could extend the covenant over centuries. This kingdom grant was theirs. It would provide their heirs with blessings. These blessings would testify to the continuing presence of God and to the continuity of His covenant. Israel’s future would not be cyclical. They would not inevitably lose whatever God had given them. In fact, they could not permanently lose it, just so long as they did not break the covenant through lack of faith and lack of obedience. God was giving them a crucial tool of dominion: long-term future orientation. He was giving them the psychological basis of an upper-class mentality: faith in the future. It is this mentality that provides men with a way out of poverty.¹⁰

Neither linear time nor the concept of compound growth was common in any other ancient society. The concept of cyclical time was all-pervasive in the ancient world. What God was telling Israel was that continuity through time is provided by the covenant itself. A man’s efforts today can lead to ever-greater wealth for his heirs. But these efforts must not be limited to thrift and technological experimentation. They must also be ethical. “Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD: And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates" (Deut. 6:4–9).¹¹

8. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24:G.

9. Chapter 22.

10. Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 48–54.

Conclusion

God called Israel to prosperity. He told them that their covenant ratification would extend to other people who were not present on that day. The covenant would carry down through the generations. The inheritance would constitute proof of the continuing validity of the covenant.

This was a new mental outlook for the ancient world: linear history and progressive history. History would be affected by what Israel would do that day. History would be shaped by the covenant. From Abraham before them to unnamed multitudes after them, the covenant would bind together the generations of Israel. This covenant would include growing wealth. God was not offering them per capita economic stagnation. He was offering them per capita economic growth. Prosperity means expansion: of wealth, of population, of dominion, of the kingdom grant.

11. Chapter 15.

CAPTIVITY AND RESTORATION

And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee, And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul; That then the LORD thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the LORD thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: And the LORD thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers (Deut. 30:1–5).

The theocentric focus of this prophecy is God as the sanctions-bringer: point four of the covenant.¹ He promised to preserve the inheritance of Israel, despite the sanction of captivity. This is part of the inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant.²

A. A Prophecy of Captivity

Moses made it clear to the generation of the conquest that there would eventually be a time of captivity and scattering in Israel's future. This was an aspect of God's negative historical sanctions. This would not constitute a break in the covenant. On the contrary, it would visibly confirm the covenant. The covenant's authority, like God's, extended beyond the geographical boundaries of Canaan.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2010), ch. 3.

2. Ibid., ch. 5.

Immediately prior to Moses' death, God reconfirmed His prophecy regarding the future defection of Israel: "And the LORD said unto Moses, Behold, thou shalt sleep with thy fathers; and this people will rise up, and go a whoring after the gods of the strangers of the land, whither they go to be among them, and will forsake me, and break my covenant which I have made with them. Then my anger shall be kindled against them in that day, and I will forsake them, and I will hide my face from them, and they shall be devoured, and many evils and troubles shall befall them; so that they will say in that day. Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us? And I will surely hide my face in that day for all the evils which they shall have wrought, in that they are turned unto other gods" (Deut. 31:16–18).³ Without the promise of restoration, this passage would have constituted a prophecy of the cutting off of Israel. Moses warned them: "For I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you; and evil will befall you in the latter days; because ye will do evil in the sight of the LORD, to provoke him to anger through the work of your hands" (Deut. 31:29). Nevertheless, there remained hope: "Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people: for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful unto his land, and to his people" (Deut. 32:43).

This was a land law.⁴ It applied to Israel as a holy nation in the land where God dwelled. It was a testimony against the theology of the ancient world: local gods that dwelt in regions. This was an affirmation of the universality of God's rule. This universality would be demonstrated by the captivity of an entire nation and its subsequent return to the Promised Land.

B. Outside the Land

The inheritance included the land, but it was not limited to the land. This was why God could threaten Israel with removal from the land. He would demonstrate His authority over them by removing them from the geographical confines of Israel.

This was a unique outlook in the ancient world, where local gods were tied to the soil of the family or city. The land was the place of residence of the gods. The mark of their defeat was the military defeat of the city and its destruction or captivity.⁵ There could be no continuity as a people apart from the religious rites, especially rites of fire, associated with the worship of family and city gods.⁶ Israel, however, was told that at some point, the nation would be sent into captivity outside the land. The people would nevertheless retain their unique status as God's people. They would maintain a separate existence abroad. They would eventually return to the land.

3. Chapter 76.

4. On land laws, see Appendix J.

The restoration of the land would be a mark of their inheritance. This promise tied them to the land because it acknowledged that God's covenant involved more than land. Because it was more extensive than the land, their removal from land became a proof of the covenant's authority, just so long as there would be restoration. This is what God promised.

The mark of a broken covenant would be the dispersion of the Jews without restoration. If God ever extinguished the fires of the temple and refused to rekindle them, this would mean the permanent disinheritation of Israel. If captivity was not followed by a return to the land, then the continuity provided by the covenant no longer was in force. This promise of restoration implied a means of disinheritation, should Israel and the temple not be restored to the land. This is why Jesus' prophecy of the transfer of the kingdom to a new nation (Matt. 21:43) constituted an assault on the temple and the nation. He was saying that the Jews would be forcibly removed from the land and not allowed to return. This took place on a preliminary basis in A.D. 70 and finally in A.D. 135, after Bar Kochba's rebellion.

The creation of the modern state of Israel in 1948 has been seen by dispensationalists as a partial ratification of the Old Covenant's promises in the New Covenant era. "In the twentieth century," write the editors of the New Scofield Bible, "initial steps toward a restoration of the exiled people to their homeland have been seen."⁷ What has not yet been seen is the restoration of temple sacrifices. This makes it difficult for dispensationalists definitively to connect the modern state of Israel with this passage in Deuteronomy. The hope for restored temple sacrifices is an important motivation for popular dispensational authors to predict—and even finance—the rebuilding of the temple, despite the fact that the thirty-five acre site of the old temple is now occupied by a Muslim mosque.⁸ They fully understand that by promoting this, they are risking war between Muslims and Jews—all the better to create the conditions for Armageddon, three and a half years after the not-so-secret Rapture. They also know that they are promoting the restoration of the temple's sacrifices. I suppose that the thought of Christians' contributing money for the restoration of temple sacrifices is no more appalling—and no less—than the idea that the future kingdom era of millennial blessings will be Jewish, with temple sacrifices throughout. “. . . [T]his interpretation is in keeping with God's prophetic program for the millennium. The Church is not in view here, but rather it is a prophecy for the consummation of Israel's history on earth.”⁹ The implication is obvious: temple sacrifices, as “memorials,”¹⁰ will replace the cross of Jesus Christ as the Christian memorial. Then on what basis will Passover not replace the Lord's Supper? Christian tradition perhaps, or maybe the high cost of hotel space in Jerusalem, but surely not theology. The Book of Hebrews is unlikely to play any major role in the future millennial kingdom, except possibly in memorial services for the Church Age.

5. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Book III, Chapter XV, p. 207.

6. Ibid., I:III, pp. 25–33.

7. The New Scofield Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967), p. 251n.

C. Cursing and Blessing

The promised restoration of Israel would not only involve blessings on the people of Israel; it would also involve cursings on Israel's enemy. Both sanctions would still be in operation. Payday would come for those gentile nations that served as God's rods of iron by placing Israel under the yoke. “And the LORD thy God will put all these curses upon thine enemies, and on them that hate thee, which persecuted thee. And thou shalt return and obey the voice of the LORD, and do all his commandments which I command thee this day. And the LORD thy God will make thee plenteous in every work of thine hand, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy land, for good: for the LORD will again rejoice over thee for good, as he rejoiced over thy fathers” (Deut. 30:7–9).

8. Don Stewart and Chuck Missler, The Coming Temple: Center Stage for the Final Countdown (Orange, California: Dart, 1991); Thomas Ice and Randall Price, Ready to Rebuild: The Imminent Plan to Rebuild the Last Days Temple (Eugene, Oregon: Harvest House, 1992).

9. New Scofield Bible, p. 884n.

10. C. I. Scofield called these offerings “memorials.” Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1909), p. 890n.

Consider the implications of these verses. Because of Israel’s rebellion, God would raise up pagan nations that would bring negative corporate sanctions against Israel. Isaiah announced this in advance: “O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their hand is mine indignation. I will send him against an hypocritical nation, and against the people of my wrath will I give him a charge, to take the spoil, and to take the prey, and to tread them down like the mire of the streets. Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so; but it is in his heart to destroy and cut off nations not a few. For he saith, Are not my princes altogether kings?” (Isa. 10:5–8). God would raise up Assyria, a nation that would boast in its own power. But in that boast, Assyria would seal its doom.

Wherefore it shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon mount Zion and on Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks. For he saith, By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom; for I am prudent: and I have removed the bounds of the people, and have robbed their treasures, and I have put down the inhabitants like a valiant man: And my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the people: and as one gathereth eggs that are left, have I gathered all the earth; and there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped. Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith? or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it? as if the rod should shake itself against them that lift it up, or as if the staff should lift up itself, as if it were no wood. Therefore shall the Lord, the Lord of hosts, send among his fat ones leanness; and under his glory he shall kindle a burning like the burning of a fire (Isa. 10:12–16).

God’s love of Israel was the basis of His corporate negative sanctions against Israel. “If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; If they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; Then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes” (Ps. 89:30–32). This was a mark of Israel’s sonship. “Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the LORD thy God chasteneth thee” (Deut. 8:5). What God would do with Israel, the Israelites were to do to their own sons. “He that spareth his rod hateth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes” (Prov. 13:24). But this was not to give comfort to the rod. The implement is never greater than the user.

The issue, then, was obedience. The restoration of Israel would come, but only on condition of obedience. "If thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which are written in this book of the law, and if thou turn unto the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul" (Deut. 30:10). If not, then not. Without obedience, Israel would be transformed into a rod that God would use against His newly adopted sons, the gentiles. This reversal of covenantal roles took place definitively at the crucifixion of Christ. Then came the stoning of Stephen. Then came the persecution of the Jerusalem church. "And Saul was consenting unto his death. And at that time there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem; and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judaea and Samaria, except the apostles" (Acts 8:1). Finally came the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The marked the final cutting off of Old Covenant Israel.¹¹ With the extinguishing of the temple's fire, the Old Covenant ceased forever. The fire was applied to the temple; Roman soldiers burned it. The covenantal roles were reversed, gentile vs. Jew. The prophecy of Isaiah regarding Israel's kindling of Assyria was reversed in A.D. 70; the rod would itself be consumed: "Therefore shall the Lord, the Lord of hosts, send among his fat ones leanness; and under his glory he shall kindle a burning like the burning of a fire. And the light of Israel shall be for a fire, and his Holy One for a flame: and it shall burn and devour his thorns and his briars in one day; And shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field, both soul and body: and they shall be as when a standardbearer fainteth" (Isa. 10:16–18). The light of the New Israel has served as a flame. The church is now the Israel of God (Gal. 6:16). The church inherited Old Covenant Israel's status as God's son, both to suffer early chastisement by the jealous older brother, who was now disinherited, and to serve as God's fire in history.

Conclusion

This prophecy continued the theme of sanctions: section four of Deuteronomy. The negative sanction of dispersal and captivity would be overcome by Israel's return to the land. The positive sanction of regathering would offset the negative sanction of removal from the land. There would be covenantal continuity for Israel outside the land. This continuity would be demonstrated for all to see by God's restoration of Israel to her inheritance inside the land. Israel would maintain her national identity by means of the covenant and through hope of restoration. The discontinuity of dispersion would be healed by the greater continuity of restoration. The continuity of the covenant would overcome the discontinuity of dispersion. If it ever failed in this regard, the Old Covenant would come to an end.

11. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

LIFE AND DOMINION

I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live: That thou mayest love the LORD thy God, and that thou mayest obey his voice, and that thou mayest cleave unto him: for he is thy life, and the length of thy days: that thou mayest dwell in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them (Deut. 30:19–20).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as the cosmic judge of life and death. This is an aspect of sanctions: point four of the covenant.¹ But the promise is to the seed: inheritance. This is point five.²

A. Long Life in the Promised Land

God here invoked the language of a covenant lawsuit. For any capital crime, there must be two witnesses (Deut. 19:15). He called heaven and earth to testify as His witnesses. In this covenant lawsuit, God's witnesses for either the prosecution or the defense were heaven and earth: the creation. He is the creator of heaven and earth. God is sovereign in His court. This was not a seed law.³ The New Testament's invocation of the promise of long life on earth as an application of the promised Mosaic positive sanction of long life in the land (Eph. 6:3) makes clear that this was not a land law.

These words conclude the fourth section of the Book of Deuteronomy, which is the section dealing with sanctions. Section five begins with Deuteronomy 31.⁴ What is important in this regard is the nature of the judicial sanctions: life and death. Death is the ultimate form of disinheritance. He who is not alive cannot inherit. Life is the starting point of inheritance. We have here evidence of the unbreakable link between point four of the biblical covenant model and point five. Sanctions are inseparably linked covenantally to inheritance and disinheritance. To separate the discussion of point four from point five, and vice versa, inevitably produces a partial covenant theology.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2010), ch. 3.

2. Ibid., ch. 5.

3. On seed laws, see Appendix J.

Verse 20 contains these words regarding God: “he is thy life, and the length of thy days.” He is the source of long life, which is a universally honored positive sanction. But for Israel, long life was not sufficient. The goal was life in the land. The promise of long life had a goal, “that thou mayest dwell in the land which the LORD swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them.” The good life was life in the land.

Here again, we see the connection between point four and point five. Long life is a positive sanction. It is the basis of the inheritance. Dead men do not inherit. But is long life sufficient? The text specifies that the additional years given to God’s covenantally faithful servants were to be used to extend Israel’s dominion over the land. Dominion was the goal. The land was the arena. Long life was the means. But what was their tool of dominion? God’s law. God called them to obedience (v. 20).

In the passage immediately preceding this one, God set forth the threat of negative sanctions. “But if thine heart turn away, so that thou wilt not hear, but shalt be drawn away, and worship other gods, and serve them; I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish, and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land, whither thou passest over Jordan to go to possess it” (Deut. 30:17–18). To worship false gods is to commit suicide, both personal and corporate. God threatened Israel with the sanction of removal from the land. Israel’s arena of dominion would be removed. To escape this negative sanction, God called on them to choose life.

This was a this-worldly frame of reference. It was also immediate. This was not pie in the sky, bye and bye. “For this commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it?”

4. Sutton, That You May Prosper, p. 96.

Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it" (vv. 11–14). Because the law was close to them—imbedded in their thoughts—the covenant's earthly blessings were also close to them. God announced this to a generation that was about to inherit the land.

B. Compound Economic Growth

The theme of compound economic growth is basic to the Book of Deuteronomy. As the fifth book in the Pentateuch, its theme is succession or inheritance. That is, its theme is the future. God promised Israel that the nation would persevere and prosper if it remained faithful to God's law. This perseverance was not merely a matter of linear succession; it was a matter of dominion. Dominion requires population growth. It requires personal wealth. It therefore requires compound economic growth. This is what God promised: "And the LORD thy God will make thee plenteous in every work of thine hand, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy land, for good: for the LORD will again rejoice over thee for good, as he rejoiced over thy fathers" (v. 9). But the basis of this process is obedience, both internal and external: "If thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which are written in this book of the law, and if thou turn unto the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul" (v. 10). To maintain the kingdom grant, Israel had to obey.

Here God promised Israel expanding wealth. In verse 16, He promised biological reproduction. God therefore promised to match population growth with economic growth. Population growth was not a threat to them. It would not produce increasing misery as the number of mouths increased without a comparable increase in the food to feed them. Nowhere in the Bible can we find a warning of increasing numbers of covenant-keeping people who are suffering hunger as a result of their increased numbers. Hunger, yes, but always in the context of an external imposition of various sanctions of death.

Men are called to choose life. The more who survive, the longer they can reproduce. The more they reproduce, the faster the growth of population. By choosing life in the context of God's covenant, men thereby choose growth. They choose dominion. They also choose responsibility, for with blessings and power come responsibility (Luke 12:48–49).⁵ The extension of covenant-keeping man's dominion is the goal of the God's system of sanctions.

The modern intellectuals' hatred of both population growth and economic growth is indicative of a radical hatred of life, man, and God. That the legalization of abortion has accompanied the various zero-growth movements is not surprising. The humanist world is a culture of death because it is a culture built on a lie: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17).⁶ This invocation of man's autonomy is suicidal. "But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death" (Prov. 8:36). Two centuries of unprecedented economic growth and population growth have disturbed many God-haters who fear hell. They fear God's final judgment, as well they should. They see that compound growth in a finite universe points to one of two things: the end of growth or the end of time. Seeking to avoid dealing with the latter, they deny the legitimacy of the former. The war on growth is a war on God. It is a war on man's dominion.

It is the sign of a terrible compromise with evil that we now find Christians—generally academics who have spent their lives in humanist institutions—echoing this anti-growth propaganda. Christians today are bombarded by alien messages from morning to night when they participate in the world around them. They pick up the clichés of humanists who dominate culture today. Christians have not been taught to think biblically, meaning covenantally, meaning judicially. They cannot sort out the wheat of common grace from the chaff of ethical rebellion. They pick up slogans from God-haters who are at war with the dominion covenant. They internalize bits and pieces of an alien worldview that is at war with the biblical doctrines of God, man, law, sanctions, and time. They do not recognize that they have joined the enemies of God. They have not self-consciously switched sides. Some have, of course: wolves in sheep's clothing.⁷ But the typical Christian layman is stumbling through life in a kind of intellectual fog. He does not recognize his immediate surroundings: the bog of humanism.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

6. Chapter 21.

7. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996). (<http://bit.ly/gncrossed>)

Conclusion

God calls on men to choose life. This passage makes it clear that at least four things are involved in choosing life: longer life spans, a greater number of heirs, greater wealth, and an arena of service to God. Also implied are greater authority, dominion, and responsibility. This is the meaning of biblical inheritance: an increase in the tools of dominion both individually and corporately and a commensurate increase in both personal and corporate responsibility for exercising dominion.

The positive sanction of life is contrasted with the negative sanction of death. But death in this context—the conquest of Canaan—meant removal from the Promised Land. Death meant life outside the land. It meant life under another nation’s gods and governments. Death meant the tyranny of pagan idolatry because idolatry produces death. “But if thine heart turn away, so that thou wilt not hear, but shalt be drawn away, and worship other gods, and serve them; I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish, and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land, whither thou passest over Jordan to go to possess it” (vv. 17–18). Idolatry is the way of spiritual death. Spiritual death leads to historical disinheritance.

Modern Christians, especially academic theologians, do not believe this. They insist that this historical cause-and-effect relationship ended with advent of the New Covenant. They are persuaded that historical cause and effect is either random or perverse. Either there is no relationship between idolatry and wealth or else the relationship is perverse: evil prospers and righteousness starves. Both views are antithetical to the concept of dominion by covenant, or at least dominion by God’s covenant. Both views proclaim that dominion is by man’s covenant. Because covenant-breaking man is dominant culturally today, the defender of random cause and effect proclaims the long-term victory of evil-doers by default.⁸ In partial contrast is the defender of perverse cause and effect in history. He insists that covenant-breaking man extends dominion because covenant-breaking man possesses the wealth formula: power religion.⁹

In stark contrast to both views is dominion religion, which proclaims dominion by God’s covenant. It rests on faith in the continuing

8. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 7. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

9. Ibid., ch. 4; cf. North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>) applicability of God's law. Specifically, it rests on the Book of Deuteronomy, which sets forth God's law, God's sanctions, and the visible triumph of God's people in history. Deuteronomy tells men to choose life. This does not mean life lived in the shadows of history or life lived in a pietistic ghetto, meaning life lived in fear of the enemies of God, who supposedly hold the keys to the ghetto's door. It means a life of progressive dominion over the creation.

Part V: Succession/Inheritance (31–33)

74

COURAGE AND DOMINION

And the LORD shall do unto them as he did to Sihon and to Og, kings of the Amorites, and unto the land of them, whom he destroyed. And the LORD shall give them up before your face, that ye may do unto them according unto all the commandments which I have commanded you. Be strong and of a good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them: for the LORD thy God, he it is that doth go with thee; he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou must go with this people unto the land which the LORD hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it. And the LORD, he it is that doth go before thee; he will be with thee, he will not fail thee, neither forsake thee: fear not, neither be dismayed (Deut. 31:4–8).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as the sanctions-bringer in history. As such, we would expect this passage to be part of the fourth section of the book. Yet those commentators who have seen a five-part pattern in Deuteronomy identify chapter 31 as the beginning of the fifth section.¹ Kline treated this section as Moses' last testament. The passage begins with Moses' announcement of his great age: "And he said unto them, I am an hundred and twenty years old this day; I can no more go out and come in: also the LORD hath said unto me,

1. Meredith G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy: Studies and Commentary (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963), pp. 135–49; Ray R. Sutton, That You May Pros per: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 5.

Thou shalt not go over this Jordan” (v. 2). In this transition passage, Moses spoke first to the nation, but then he spoke to Joshua. He was in the process of transferring his mantle of leadership to Joshua. The mark of this leadership was courage.

A. “Forward . . . March!”

This was a land law.² It invoked the immediately concluded wars against the kings on the wilderness side of the Jordan River. It referred to the immediate conquest. The assurance of specific victory over Canaan was tied to God’s promise to Abraham (Gen. 15:16).

Deuteronomy is the book of covenantal inheritance. The Book of Joshua marks a new covenant: the book of the conquest. First, God gave title to the Promised Land to Israel. Joshua would soon lead the people to impose the transfer. What Moses told Joshua in his last testament, the representatives of the nation repeated to Joshua after Moses’ death. I cite the whole passage in order to prove my point. The language of courage is the language of conquest.

Now after the death of Moses the servant of the LORD it came to pass, that the LORD spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses’ minister, saying, Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel. Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses. From the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast. There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life: as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I sware unto their fathers to give them. Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success. Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the LORD thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest (Josh. 1:1–9).

2. On land laws, see Appendix J.

Notice the judicial frame of reference: “Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest” (v. 7).

The imagery here is based on a battlefield formation. The leader marches at the head of his troops. He is out in front. He is the point man, fully visible to the enemy and the target of the archers. Normally, this would be suicidal. The senior military commander stays at the rear, protected by his troops. But this image is different. The leader is visible as the point man. At his side there is no one. His officers and troops are behind him. This leader has his flanks unprotected. He can be blindsided if his troops fail to rush forward to protect him. Yet this passage indicates that the warrior who marches at the head of the army is not to look to the right or the left around him—at his undefended flanks, in other words. He is not to worry about his flanks. He is to keep his eyes on the enemy who is in front of him. He is also not to look to the right or the left as a way to escape. He is to march forward, into the valley of the shadow of death. He should fear no evil.

On what basis was Joshua expected to take this forward position? Only because God was serving as his senior commander. If Joshua and Israel pleased God, they would not have to worry about their flanks. They could march forward in safety and therefore great confidence. How could they please God? By obedience. God had promised to impose the negative sanctions of the law on their enemies. “And the LORD shall give them up before your face, that ye may do unto them according unto all the commandments which I have commanded you” (Deut. 31:5). This is why the people repeated Moses’ words to Joshua: he was to stay within the narrow boundaries of God’s law. His flanks and the army’s flanks would be undefended apart from his obedience to the law.

The military strategy appropriate to such a formation is called a frontal assault. It assumes that the army can penetrate the enemy’s defenses by overpowering them. Such a strategy assumes overwhelming offensive superiority. It is not an appropriate tactic for a smaller army, let alone a guerilla band. Only if a smaller army has either some remarkable superiority in weaponry or the advantage of surprise should it attempt a frontal assault. Yet the language of Joshua 1 points to a frontal assault.

Contrary to higher critics of the Bible, Israel had a very large army: 600,000 men. In addition, God was on their side. A frontal assault was the appropriate formation. It would strike terror into the hearts of their enemies. Here was a leader who did not fear the arrow, the stone, the javelin, or the chariot.

B. Narrow Is the Way

The covenant's sanctions are positive and negative. In a war, the positive sanctions for one army are negative sanctions for its rival. God had already promised them victory over future enemies that had temporarily conquered them. "And the LORD thy God will put all these curses upon thine enemies, and on them that hate thee, which persecuted thee" (Deut. 30:7). Therefore, how much more would He impose negative sanctions on the Canaanites, whose prophetic time had come (Gen. 15:16)!

The success of Israel's military strategy depended on ethics. Achan's secret theft of Jericho's banned goods led to the defeat of Israel at Ai (Josh. 7). The stoning of Achan, his family, and his animals led to the victory over Ai (Josh. 8). Yet even in this case, the strategy was not based on a frontal assault. It was based on deception, whose success in turn rested on Israel's previous defeat. Achan's sin had altered the army's strategy.

The path to victory was a path of righteousness. City by city, Israel was to conquer Canaan. The nation was told to obey the law—all of the law—in order to achieve military victory. The path that mattered most was the ethical path. The law hedged them in. They were not to stray outside the boundaries of the law: either to the right or the left.

In a sense, this is also a matter of military strategy: the massed formation. The offensive army overpowers its enemy because it applies massive force to one section of the enemy's defensive line. The offensive army seeks a breakthrough in the enemy's line, which will split the enemy force into two uncoordinated and fearful smaller armies. This is the strategy of divide and conquer. The enemy commander keeps reserves for just this purpose: to send them into a breach in the line. To keep his army from breaking apart, he risks the lives of his reserves.

The massed formation of God's army is also a tightly knit formation. The wedge of the leader and his troops smashes into the enemy's defensive line, hopefully at its weakest point. The ethical imagery of the straight and narrow path is tied to the imagery of a military formation. The offensive army does not dissipate its force by spreading across the battlefield. It concentrates its force like a battering ram. This is the imagery of the narrow path. When covenant-keepers wander off this path into sins of all kinds, the army of the Lord is weakened and scattered across the battlefield. It is men's adherence to God's law that keeps them in a tight formation. Jesus warned: "Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in there at: Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it" (Matt. 7:13–14).³

C. Optimism and Victory

The language of this passage is military language. This was appropriate: Moses was passing leadership to Joshua, who would soon lead the nation into battle. Joshua was to be above all a military leader. Almost all of the Book of Joshua deals with the conquest and the subsequent partitioning of the inheritance in Canaan. Moses did his best to impart to the next generation the confidence which his own generation had lacked. It was their excessive fear of their enemies' sanctions and their insufficient of fear of God's sanctions that had kept them wandering for four decades in the wilderness. Moses had spent the final third of his life herding fearful sheep who kept wandering off ethically.

The context of this passage is the coming invasion of Canaan. The Israelites' confidence was to rest on two things: (1) their adherence to God's commandments (v. 5) and (2) His promise to previous generations (v. 7). Man's obedience and God's promises are linked covenantally.⁴ But if this is true of the life-and-death matter of warfare, how much more is it true of the other areas of life!

This passage sets forth a fundamental principle of entrepreneurship: knowledge is not sufficient; there must also be action. A person who has accurate knowledge of the future must act in terms of this knowledge if his knowledge is to give him an advantage over those who do not know. In fact, knowledge without action can place the person in a worse position. He is paralyzed with fear of the future, which is why he cannot act. The person who is unaware of the future but who makes decisions that will produce profits in the future is better off than the person who knew, but who feared to act. Ignorance is bliss compared to knowledge accompanied by fear-induced paralysis.

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 17.

4. Chapter 10.

Shakespeare places into Julius Caesar's mouth the phrase, "Cowards die many times before their deaths; the valiant never taste of death but once." The man who fears the future is at a disadvantage with a man who sees it and does not fear it. He may even be at a disadvantage with a man who does not see it and does not fear it. The fear of failure hampers the righteous man. This fear of risk and failure is part of the West's folk wisdom. We are told, "A bird in hand is worth two in the bush." Perhaps it is, but is it worth three? At some expected ratio, a bird in hand should be let loose so as to make possible a two-hand capture of a bushel full of birds. There are counter-insights in Western folk wisdom, such as "Nothing ventured, nothing gained" and "He who hesitates is lost."

The man who knows the future, but who then fails to act on his knowledge, is like a race track tout who knows which horse will win but neither bets nor convinces anyone else to bet on that horse. His knowledge will not affect the pre-race betting odds, nor will it make him any money. Or he is like a military commander who knows where his enemy's forces are, but fails to deploy his forces to take advantage of this knowledge.

Similarly, a definition of entrepreneurship that rests on knowledge of the future alone, without capital invested in terms of this knowledge, is a useless definition. It is not enough to know the ratio of present prices to future prices. The entrepreneur must have capital available to him that will enable him to buy present goods or sell future goods in order to take advantage between the actual ratio in the future and today's ratio, which reflects investors' inaccurate knowledge of the future. He must also have the courage of his convictions. He must put his money where his mind is. (Not where his mouth is, however. A wise entrepreneur will keep his mouth shut, since by opening it, he gives away valuable information that may affect the market's present/future price ratio, which he plans to take advantage of.)

The presence of optimism is not sufficient. There must also be accurate knowledge. Paul writes of the Jews' condemnation by God as having been the product of zeal without knowledge (Rom. 9:31–10:4). The zeal engendered by courage can lead to destruction as readily as knowledge without zeal. In military affairs, there has to be a willingness to engage the enemy. In entrepreneurial affairs, there has to be a willingness to engage a future different from what one's competitors imagine it will be.

Conclusion

Moses gave to Joshua a command: be courageous. This meant that Joshua must move forward, not being deflected by concerns about what was going on at his right or his left. The same is true of our adherence to God's law. If we stick to God's revealed pathway, veering neither to the right nor the left, we shall be victorious. God will stand with us for His own glory, delivering His enemies into our hands.

Moses made it plain that action was required. Risks had to be taken. By whom? By Joshua, above all. His courage under fire would set the pattern for his men. It was a good sign that the Israelites commanded Joshua to be courageous after Moses' death. It indicated that they were ready to receive the long-promised inheritance. Title to the land had been transferred to them by Moses by the second reading of the law. Now it was time to collect.

LAW AND LIBERTY

And Moses wrote this law, and delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and unto all the elders of Israel. And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles, When all Israel is come to appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing. Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the LORD your God, and observe to do all the words of this law: And that their children, which have not known anything, may hear, and learn to fear the LORD your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it (Deut. 31:9–13).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as the giver of the kingdom grant: the national inheritance. This is point five of the biblical covenant.¹

A. The Year of Release

To maintain the kingdom grant, Israel's priests would have to read the Mosaic law publicly to the entire nation at the feast of Tabernacles (Booths). This was the annual week-long feast in Jerusalem that followed by five days the day of local celebration: the day of atonement (Lev. 23:27, 34). The priests and elders were responsible for the reading of the Mosaic law to the people, presumably Exodus 20–23. They may also have read the case laws of the other four books. This case law does not say.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 5.

We might have expected that the law would have been read at Pas-over. Instead, it was read at Booths. Why? Because Booths was closely associated with the day of atonement. The day of atonement was the day of liberation for Israel. This law illustrates a fundamental principle of theology: grace precedes law. The day of atonement and day of release preceded the reading of the law. This was both a land law and a priestly law.² It no longer applies nationally. But the judicial principle that undergirds it—the need for covenant-keepers to hear biblical law—is still in force.

The year of release was the sabbatical year (Deut. 15). In this year, during the feast of Booths, all zero-interest charity loans to fellow Israelites and to resident aliens [geyr] were to be cancelled (Deut. 15:2). Any Israelite or resident alien who had been required to serve as a bondservant because he had defaulted on a charitable loan had to be released. He was to be given capital—food, wine, and herd animals—when he left (vv. 13–14).³

Consider the timing of the reading of the Mosaic law. Once every seven years, the entire nation was to assemble at Jerusalem. Five days earlier, poor people who still owned rural land had been released from charitable debts or any related debt bondage. As debt-free men, they came to Jerusalem to celebrate. There, they heard the law.

For a newly released bondservant, the reading of the law would have reminded him of the importance of obedience. He had fallen into debt through no moral fault of his own, at least in the opinion of his creditor. The way to avoid future debt bondage was to remain obedient to God's law, for the law promised external blessings for obedience. The Mosaic law was read to a nation of free men. It provided the guidelines for remaining free.

The year of release was associated with the jubilee year. In the year following the seventh sabbatical year—the sabbatical year of sabbatical years—the jubilee year was to take place. All rural land was to revert to the heirs of the conquest generation. This reversion was to take place on the day of atonement (Lev. 25:9). This means that Israel's other class of debtors also regained their freedom on that day. Those debtors who had defaulted on commercial loans had those debts cancelled and had their share of the ancestral land returned to them. Except for criminals sold into slavery to pay off debts to their victims,⁴ and except

2. On land laws and priestly laws, see Appendix J.

3. Chapter 35.

4. Gary North, Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus (Tyler, Texas: Instifor foreign slaves (Lev. 25:44–46),⁵ the year of jubilee was to be Israel's universal year of release. Charitable debts had been cancelled the previous year. The nation had heard the reading of the law. Then came the jubilee.

B. One Nation Under God

Israel was truly one nation under God. This law made it clear that the entire nation was to hear the priests and elders read the law. These laws were civil laws, yet priests and elders read them. More than any other passage in the Bible, this one makes it clear: there can be no absolute separation of church and state. The two institutions can be differentiated, analogous to the ways in which the three persons of the Trinity are differentiated, but there can be no absolute separation. When it came to God's law, the priests and elders were required by God to read it publicly. Everybody residing inside the land, including strangers [geyr], was required to come to hear the law. God was the source of justice in Israel. The priests were the agents delegated by God to interpret His law. Interpretation was not a monopoly.

The nation was under God. One proof of this was the fact that all permanent residents were under God's revealed law. This included strangers. They were required to hear the law read in public once every seven years, and not merely listen, but also pay for a journey to the central city. They were all to participate in a national celebration of covenant renewal. This was not limited to ecclesiastical covenant renewal, for strangers were required to attend.

It was at Booths that the 70 bulls were offered annually as sacrifices (Num. 29:13–32), presumably for the 70 nations that represented the gentiles (Jud. 1:7), and one additional bull (Num. 29:36), presumably for Israel. The day of atonement, celebrated locally, was immediately followed by Booths, which was celebrated nationally. Localism was followed by nationalism. The Levites were the tribe that represented the nation. They were a source of national unity.

C. The Rule of Specially Revealed Law

Moses commanded the priests and elders to gather the people together. By what authority did he tell them this? Not as high priest, tute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 134–35. (<http://bit.ly/gntools>)

5. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 30.

which he was not, but as the nation's prophet. He was God's delegated intermediary between God and Israel. As such, he laid down the law.

Civil law is common to all men who reside in a geographical area. The Bible teaches this. Those inside the boundaries of Israel were required to obey God's law. The Mosaic covenant mandated that God's law must apply to all men equally, thereby upholding the principle that the rule of law is to be upheld (Ex. 12:49). Civil law in Mosaic Israel was revelational. Civil law in Israel was not the autonomous discovery of rational men searching the logic of their minds and the raw material of the creation.

Was attendance required by civil law? That is, were civil sanctions applied to those who refused to attend? No negative sanction is listed in the text. There would have been an ecclesiastical sanction: excommunication. This would have threatened a stranger who participated in Passover (Ex. 12:48). It would not have threatened a resident alien who did not attend Passover. It would have threatened an Israelite, for citizenship was based on membership in God's holy army. This membership was a priestly office, which is why members paid atonement money to the priests (Ex. 30:12–16).⁶

Access to the office of judge was based on participation in the national reading of the Mosaic law. What does this fact reveal about the authority of natural law in Israel? This: what was judicially common to residents of Israel was not confession of faith but God's specially revealed law. Those who were not eligible to serve as judges nevertheless had to obey the law. They were invited to attend Booths once every seven years in order to participate in a priestly ritual that served as national covenant renewal. Yet the stranger had not necessarily affirmed the national covenant by consenting to circumcision. He was supposed to attend, although no civil sanction threatened him for refusing to attend. His voice had no covenantal authority in renewing the covenant, for he did not possess the legal authority to impose civil sanctions. Yet he was supposed to attend.

Why should he have attended? First, to learn what the law expected of him. Second, to learn what the state was authorized to do to him if he broke the law. This national day of legal education was a means of placing restrictions on both the church and the state. The public reading of the Mosaic law gave to the listeners the means of defending themselves from evil-doers, including officers of church and state. Residents were to be protected from each other by the law. They were strongly encouraged to attend the festival to hear the formal reading of the law. In a society in which there was no printing press and literacy was not common, this was an important way to place the authorities on a judicial chain. Men would understand their rights—their legal immunities from the state—because they had heard the law. The state could not lawfully prohibit the public reading of the law. It was the church that had been given the joint authority to read the law. The priests would have a part in making access to the law easier in Israel.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58.

This limitation on civil power meant that an independent legal hierarchy was present in Israel that would serve as a check on the state. Any attempt by the state to restrict the priests from exercising their God-given authority to read the law before the nation would incur the resistance of the priests and the wrath of God.

D. Natural Law vs. Theocracy

Natural law theory rests on the assumption that there is a source of common ethics and common wisdom irrespective of theological confession. This common system of ethics is said to serve as the only legitimate basis of a common judicial system. This common legal order is supposedly accessible to all rational men, however men define rational. This presumed commonality is the basis of the civil law's legitimacy. Natural law is said to be grounded in the nature of man as a rational being, whether or not he was created by God. Because natural law supposedly possesses authority irrespective of theological confession, it is said to be the basis of civil government, for civil government has authority over all men who reside in a geographical area irrespective of their confession of faith. So runs the familiar intellectual defense of natural law theory.

The traditional Christian version of natural law theory adds that it is man in his office as God's image-bearer that establishes the possibility of natural law. It is God in His office as universal Father (Acts 17:26) rather than as the redemptive, adopting Father, who establishes civil government. The natural law theorist distinguishes between God the Creator and God the Redeemer in discussing natural law. God as Creator is universal; God as Redeemer is particular. It is God as universal who lays down the civil laws that all men must obey.

The Christian defender of natural law theory usually argues that God placed Israel under the rule of a civil order that was particular. In God's redemptive-historical plan, Israel's narrow parochialism—grounded in God as redeeming Father—temporarily superseded the universal. Why, we are not told. It just did. The New Covenant, we are told, is the triumph of the universal. The New Covenant delivers us into the hands of civil rulers whose authority does not rest on their confession of God as Father, either universal or particular. Their civil confession of faith need be implicit only: a confession of self-professed autonomous man as the universal. Man is the law-giver because humanity is common to man.

The humanism of natural law theory is obvious. Prior to Darwin's implicit destruction of all natural law theory, natural law theory was Western humanism's primary judicial alternative to Christian law. Darwin destroyed men's faith in a common legal order grounded in man's reason. Why? Because men are individuals caught in a purposeless evolutionary process that has no fixed ethical standards.⁷ Nevertheless, a few Christian social theorists still cling to a doctrine of humanistic law that has to be defended today by an appeal to biblical revelation: the doctrine of special creation. Only by invoking special creation can they save natural law theory from Darwinism. But the rationality of unredeemed mankind opposes the Bible's doctrine of special creation. So, Christian defenders of natural law theory wind up in the peculiar position of having to affirm the authority of biblical revelation in order to defend a theory of civil law that denies any independent civil authority of biblical revelation. They affirm that which common reason rejects as irrational or irrelevant. They do so in order to defend a system of humanistic civil law which rests on the assumption of the authority of common reason and common ethics. God as Redeemer is replaced by God as Creator. God as Creator is then said to legitimize the civil order of autonomous man. In this way, the city of man replaces the city of God in the political theory of fundamentalists, who hate the idea of biblical theocracy far more than they hate the reality of humanist theocracy. They turn over the right of civil rulership to humanists, and they believe they are doing God and society a favor in this pre-emptive surrender.

If men of all confessions can successfully govern themselves, as though they were covenant-keepers, by means of a civil law order that is in no way grounded on God's Bible-revealed law, then why did God require the Israelites to hear the reading of the Mosaic law? Why was national covenant renewal grounded in a public reading of the Mosaic law? If covenant-keepers in the New Testament era are not supposed to invoke the authority of biblical law as the justification of their efforts to establish a God-honoring civil government, then why was this insight not given to God's covenant people prior to the advent of Roman Stoicism? Why did God's people have to wait for Roman Stoics to discover the theory of natural law, by which they explained why Rome had the authority to create an empire out of the ruins of the Greek city-states? The Stoics in the era of the Roman empire provided a philosophical justification for that empire. A defense of empire had not been provided by the polytheism of classical religion, which had undergirded the autonomous city-states of Greece.⁸ Yet Christians are expected to believe that God waited until the advent of the tyrannical Roman Empire in order to inform His covenant people of the sole authority of man's universal reason in establishing civil law. God supposedly raised up Stoic philosophers rather than prophets to bring this message to the church. Furthermore, it was not until tiny Rhode Island's Roger Williams in the early 1640's discovered pluralism's principle of religiously neutral civil commonwealth that God's church was presented with this theory in the name of Christianity.⁹ This implicit theory of the origins of civil freedom seems an odd one for Christian intellectuals to hold, but they do. They refuse to state it this baldly, but they do believe it. Their theory of natural law demands it.¹⁰

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A.

This text forces us to consider the obvious fact that in order to preserve liberty in Mosaic Israel, the nation corporately had to hear the law once every seven years. The basis of judicial liberty was not the interior speculations of everyman. The basis of judicial liberty in Israel was obedience to God's specially revealed law. What the modern Christian political pluralist must maintain is that judicial liberty comes from the common-ground logic and/or experience of covenant-breaking man. It is not the Bible, he insists, that presents the basis of liberty; rather, God's enemies do. There simply has to be some common-ground moral vision which unites covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers, and this vision must serve all mankind as the basis of liberty. Adam's Fall has therefore not seriously blinded men to moral truth.

8. Sheldon Wolin, Politics and Vision: Continuity and Innovation in Western Political Thought (Boston: Little, Brown, 1960), pp. 77–82.

9. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 249–50. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

10. See Appendix H: "Week Reed: The Politics of Compromise."

Covenant-keeping rational man holds back or suppresses the truth in unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18), yet somehow this process of self-imposed blindness does not undermine the outcome of his moral reason, a moral reason shared by all rational men. Covenant-breaking man's moral and judicial speculations are said to possess greater authority than the Mosaic law does, or than the Bible as a whole does, or so we are assured by modern defenders of natural law theory, whether Christian or pagan.

E. Biblical Economics

Biblical economists should take a stand against the rationalist's claim that only that which is common to all men's reason is epistemologically valid. This is the modern economist's defense of wertfrei: value-neutral logic. He defends this nineteenth-century epistemological doctrine with greater enthusiasm and confidence than representatives of the other social sciences do. Biblical economics does not rest on faith in any theory of epistemological neutrality. It recognizes that any claim of epistemological neutrality evaporates as a result of a key doctrine of modern economics: the scientific impossibility of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility.¹¹ There is no common objective scale of subjective values; there is no measuring device. Thus, according to the epistemological assumptions of methodological individualism, there can be no such thing as applied economics.¹² Between the theoretical speculations of the economist and the world of economic advice and policy-making there can be no connection made without destroying the doctrine of exclusively subjective value. This, no non-Marxist economist wants to admit.

The correct solution to this epistemological dilemma is an appeal to the Bible: the covenantal doctrines of God's absolute sovereignty, man as made in God's image, the world under God's law (including Bible-revealed law), God as the sovereign evaluator/imputer, and judicial continuity. It is in through twin doctrines of God's creation and providence that we can discover ways of reconciling subjective value and objective value. It is in the doctrine of the Trinity that we can discover ways of reconciling the personal imputation of subjective value

11. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science (London: Macmillan, 1932), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

12. See Appendix A, section on "Value Theory at an Epistemological Impasse." See also Appendix B.

with the corporate imputation of objective value.¹³

Conclusion

The nation of Israel was told by God to assemble at a central city once every seven years, in order to hear the public reading of God's revealed law. God did not call them into university classrooms to cogitate on the inherent wisdom of the common man. He did not call them to devise systems of law that would be acceptable to covenant-breaking strangers in the land. Instead, He called them to corporate covenant renewal through hearing the priests read the Mosaic law. No passage in the Bible more clearly reveals the illegitimacy of political pluralism and its corollary, natural law theory.

By undermining natural law theory, this passage also undermines the case for value-free economics. A correct understanding of the law of God rests on a theory of Bible-revealed law. So does a correct understanding of the laws of economics.

Law and liberty are linked by biblical law. This includes political liberty and economic liberty. While the natural man can, through common grace, understand a great deal about the creation, his presupposition regarding the availability of true knowledge apart from the written revelation of the God of the Bible is incorrect. Liberty begins with God's grace and is sustained by God's grace, which includes the grace of biblical law.

13. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix H.

A COVENANTAL SONG OF NEAR-DISINHERITANCE

And the LORD said unto Moses, Behold, thou shalt sleep with thy fathers; and this people will rise up, and go a whoring after the gods of the strangers of the land, whither they go to be among them, and will forsake me, and break my covenant which I have made with them. Then my anger shall be kindled against them in that day, and I will forsake them, and I will hide my face from them, and they shall be devoured, and many evils and troubles shall befall them; so that they will say in that day, Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us? And I will surely hide my face in that day for all the evils which they shall have wrought, in that they are turned unto other gods (Deut. 31:16–18).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God as the maintainer of the kingdom grant. The grant was the inheritance: point five of the covenant.¹

This was not a law. It was a prophecy. God told Moses that Israel would surely rebel against Him after they entered the Promised Land. The very prosperity of that land would lead them astray. “For when I shall have brought them into the land which I swore unto their fathers, that floweth with milk and honey; and they shall have eaten and filled themselves, and waxen fat; then will they turn unto other gods, and serve them, and provoke me, and break my covenant” (v. 20).

God instructed Moses to write a song. This song would provide an account of God’s deliverance of Israel—not out of Egypt, but rather out of the wilderness. It would begin with the fourth generation’s inheritance of the land. “And it shall come to pass, when many evils and troubles are befallen them, that this song shall testify against them as a witness; for it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed: for I know their imagination which they go about, even now, before I have brought them into the land which I swear" (v. 21).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 5.

The song begins with a statement of God's sovereignty: "He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he" (Deut. 32:4). This is point one of the biblical covenant model.

Point two describes Israel's rebellion against God's hierarchy: "They have corrupted themselves, their spot is not the spot of his children: they are a perverse and crooked generation. Do ye thus requite the LORD, O foolish people and unwise? is not he thy father that hath bought thee? hath he not made thee, and established thee?" (vv. 5–6)

Point three describes God's establishment of the boundaries of the nations and of Israel (v. 8). He led them inside the boundaries of the wilderness (vv. 10–12).

Point four describes God's positive sanctions: food in abundance (vv. 13–14). This led to Israel's fatness and her subsequent loss of faith: sacrificing to false gods (vv. 15–16), i.e., a new oath and new covenant. This produced negative sanctions (vv. 20–22). "I will heap mischiefs upon them; I will spend mine arrows upon them" (v. 23).

Point five, disinheritance, would not come, not for Israel's sake but for the honor of God's name. "I said, I would scatter them into corners, I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men: Were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy, lest their adversaries should behave themselves strangely, and lest they should say, Our hand is high, and the LORD hath not done all this" (vv. 26–27). But Israel would not recognize this as God's motivation during her rebellion. "For they are a nation void of counsel, neither is there any understanding in them. O that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!" (vv. 28–29).

The arrogance of the enemy nations would bring them down. "To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence; their foot shall slide in due time: for the day of their calamity is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste. For the LORD shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone, and there is none shut up, or left" (vv. 35–36). This meant that the disinheritance that would rightfully come upon Israel would instead be replaced by a new inheritance. This would produce the disinheritance of those nations that would serve as God's rods of iron against Israel. "Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people: for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful unto his land, and to his people" (v. 43). This ended the song of Moses (v. 44).

Moses then called on the nation to obey the law: "And he said unto them, Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day, which ye shall command your children to observe to do, all the words of this law" (v. 46). Obedience is the basis of life: "For it is not a vain thing for you; because it is your life: and through this thing ye shall prolong your days in the land, whither ye go over Jordan to possess it" (v. 47). Once again, obedience is here identified as the basis of maintaining the kingdom grant.

Moses was then instructed by God to climb Mt. Nebo, so that he could see the land into which he would not be allowed to march (v. 49). Disobedience had kept him outside the land (vv. 51–52). What was true of Moses would surely be true for Israel: disobedience would undermine the inheritance.

Conclusion

The chief inheritance of Israel was the law itself. "Moses commanded us a law, even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob" (Deut. 33:4). The law was their tool of dominion, the standard of their continuing economic inheritance.

Moses then blessed each of the tribes as his last will and testament, just as Jacob had done with his twelve sons in Egypt. The expulsion of the Canaanites was imminent:

The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms: and he shall thrust out the enemy from before thee; and shall say, Destroy them. Israel then shall dwell in safety alone: the fountain of Jacob shall be upon a land of corn and wine; also his heavens shall drop down dew. Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the LORD, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency! and thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee; and thou shalt tread upon their high places (vv. 27–29).

Moses then did as he had been told: he went up Mt. Nebo to see the Promised Land. Then he died. But before he died, he transferred leadership to Joshua by the laying on of hands (v. 9). This represented the transfer of inheritance to Israel.

CONCLUSION

Moses commanded us a law, even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob (Deut. 33:4).

The Book of Deuteronomy is the Pentateuch's book of inheritance. The fifth and final section of Deuteronomy has to do with inheritance in the broadest sense. The primary inheritance of Israel was God's specially revealed law. This was Israel's tool of dominion.¹ Obedience to the law was Israel's basis of maintaining the inheritance and extending it in history. But it was not sufficient for Israel to maintain the inheritance; Israel had to extend it. There is a war in history between God's kingdom and Satan's. There is no permanent peace treaty between these two kingdoms. There is no neutrality. There can be no stalemate. Israel forgot this, which is why the kingdom was removed from her (Matt. 21:43). Modern Christians also tend to forget this.²

Moses consummated his writing of the book of the inheritance with a series of blessings, tribe by tribe (Deut. 33:6–25), just as Jacob had, almost two and a half centuries earlier (Gen. 49).³ As for the nation, Moses said, "Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the LORD, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency! and thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee; and thou shalt tread upon their high places" (Deut. 33:29). Then he went off to Mt. Nebo to die. But before he did, he laid hands on Joshua. "And Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him: and the children of Israel hearkened unto him, and did as the LORD commanded Moses" (Deut. 34:9). This completed the transfer of authority from Moses to Joshua.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

2. Gary North, Backward, Christian Soldiers? An Action Manual for Christian Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1984] 1988), ch. 11. (<http://bit.ly/gnback>)

3. Israel's sojourn inside the boundaries of Egypt was 215 years. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 1:A.

This was Joshua's long-awaited inheritance.

Deuteronomy presents a recapitulation of the Mosaic law. The inheriting generation was required to affirm their commitment to this law. In this sense, Deuteronomy is a book of covenant renewal. This would seem to place the book under point four of the covenant: oath. But the book also involves the transfer of the judicial inheritance to the generation of the conquest. In this sense, Deuteronomy is an aspect of point five: succession. This is another reason why I believe that points four and five of the biblical covenant model are so intimately related. In fact, the full consummation of Deuteronomy did not take place until the Israelites had crossed over Canaan's boundary (point three) and were circumcised (point four) at Gilgal (Josh. 5:3). Israel had to be circumcised before the historical transfer of title to Canaan could take place. The covenant oath that was implied by circumcision was mandatory prior to Israel's receiving the inheritance of Canaan. We can say that the inheritance of the law and the re-affirmation of the promise came with the Book of Deuteronomy. The historical inheritance of Canaan by Israel is described in the Book of Joshua. Circumcision confirmed confession. More than this: circumcision constituted confession. It was an oath-sign.⁴

Deuteronomy sets forth the legal basis of Israel's inheritance of Canaan. It presents God's law and refers to the sanctions attached to this law-order. Israel's acceptance of this covenant document was to serve as the judicial basis of the oath-sign to be imposed across the Jordan. The transfer of the law was the covenantal basis of the transfer of the inheritance. In this sense, the law was Israel's primary inheritance: received first. The Promised Land was the secondary inheritance: received second.

A. Promise and Conditions

There could be no legitimate doubt that this generation would inherit. It was the fourth generation after Jacob's descent into Egypt. "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16). Nevertheless, the fulfillment of this promise was conditional. First, Israel formally had to subordinate the nation to God (point two) by affirming God's law (point three) and its historical sanctions (point four). The proof of their acceptance of the law's historical sanctions was their willingness to submit to the oath-sign of circumcision. Without such ritual submission, they could not become true sons of Abraham and therefore heirs of the promise to Abraham. There should be no doubt here: the Abrahamic promise was conditional. Had the Israelites rejected God by rejecting His law, as manifested by their refusal to be circumcised, they would not have inherited. They could inherit the law without circumcision, and they did (Deuteronomy), but they could not inherit the land without circumcision (Joshua).

4. Meredith G. Kline, By Oath Consigned: A Reinterpretation of the Covenant Signs of Circumcision and Baptism (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1968), ch. 3.

This conditionality of the Abrahamic covenant creates a minor theological problem that is easy to solve. Unfortunately, it has long been dealt with by theologians as if it were a major problem that is very difficult to solve. Here is the problem: How can a promise made by God and then sealed by His oath be conditional? If the fulfillment of an oath-bound covenantal promise is conditional, then its fulfillment in history seems to depend on man rather than God. Sovereignty is thereby transferred to man. How can this be?

The correct and relatively simple answer is theological: the fulfillment of God's promises is secured by God's sovereign decree. God does not predestinate in a vacuum. He does not predestinate single events within a contingent historical framework. When He announces a promise or a prophecy, His sovereign decree secures the comprehensive historical conditions necessary for its fulfillment. God's sovereignty over history at no point is transferred to man. God retains it absolutely. The complete fulfillment of the covenant's conditions is as secure as the complete fulfillment of the promise.

It is one of those oddities of ecclesiastical history that Calvinist theologians who call themselves covenant theologians have debated the fine points of conditional versus unconditional promises. I do not understand why. Of all theologians who should not bother to debate this topic in an either/or framework, Calvinists ought to be first in line. It is only in Calvinism's twin doctrines of predestination and the absolute sovereignty of God that we find a solution to this theological problem. It is time to say it loud and clear: there is no such thing as an unconditional covenantal promise. To imagine that there is such a thing is to imagine that the covenants of God were not secured by the perfect life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ. Everything in history after God's cross-examination of Adam and Eve has been conditional on the work of Jesus Christ in history. Was there any possibility that Jesus would not fulfill these conditions? Not a chance:

"And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!" (Luke 22:22). This means, ultimately, that there is no such thing as chance. God promised Adam and Eve the following: "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel" (Gen. 3:15). Was this promise conditional on Christ's advent and perfect work in history? Of course. Was there any chance that the covenant's conditions would not be fulfilled by Christ? None. This promise was conditional on Christ's work, yet there was no possibility that these conditions would not be met perfectly by Christ's work.

Obviously, some promises are more openly ethical and conditional than others, in the sense that the outcome of the promise can be different from what was predicted. This is the case with some covenant lawsuits. The best representative example is Jonah's warning to Nineveh: "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown" (Jonah 3:4b). Nineveh believed this and repented (turned around). "And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil, that he had said that he would do unto them; and he did it not" (v. 9). They repented; God also repented. But other covenant lawsuits have been predestined to come out just as God had promised: badly for the accused. "Then shalt thou say unto them, Thus saith the LORD, Behold, I will fill all the inhabitants of this land, even the kings that sit upon David's throne, and the priests, and the prophets, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, with drunkenness. And I will dash them one against another, even the fathers and the sons together, saith the LORD: I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy them" (Jer. 13:13–14). And so He did. Jeremiah was not to pray otherwise.

And now, because ye have done all these works, saith the LORD, and I spake unto you, rising up early and speaking, but ye heard not; and I called you, but ye answered not; Therefore will I do unto this house, which is called by my name, wherein ye trust, and unto the place which I gave to you and to your fathers, as I have done to Shiloh. And I will cast you out of my sight, as I have cast out all your brethren, even the whole seed of Ephraim. Therefore pray not thou for this people, neither lift up cry nor prayer for them, neither make intercession to me: for I will not hear thee (Jer. 7:13–16).

Because the office of prophet ceased after A.D. 70,⁵ all covenant

5. Chapter 33.

lawsuits today are of the Jonah variety: repentance must always be assumed to be an option for the hearers. No one lawfully brings a New Covenant lawsuit that does not offer the option of repentance. God no longer reveals in advance the specific outcome of a particular covenant lawsuit: blessing or cursing. In this sense, all New Covenant lawsuits are pecially conditional, i.e., their outcome is unknown to man because the response of the accused is unknown to man. We must also affirm that, judicially speaking, all covenant lawsuits, promises, and prophecies are generally conditional: there is no escape from God's sanctions in history. What the future response of men would be was not always clear to those who heard these lawsuits, promises, and prophecies in the Old Covenant. But sometimes it was clear. For example, God did not offer Nineveh's option of repentance to the Amorites of Canaan. The Amorites' iniquity would surely be filled, not emptied by their repentance. Yet even in this case, the Gibeonites cleverly subordinated themselves to God through subordination to Israel, and they escaped the promised destruction (Josh. 9).

B. Compound Growth and National Covenant Renewal

Deuteronomy presents a covenant theology that allows for compound growth, both of population and the economy. More than this: growth is presented as morally mandatory. Put another way, the absence of growth is seen as a sign of God's curse. This growth-oriented outlook distinguished biblical religion from all other ancient religions. The key elements of Deuteronomy's covenant theology are found in Deuteronomy 8.⁶

First, there was a promise of population growth. This promise was conditional on Israel's obedience. "All the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye observe to do, that ye may live, and multiply, and go in and possess the land which the LORD swore unto your fathers. And thou shalt remember all the way which the LORD thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no" (Deut. 8:1–2).

Second, there was a warning attached to the promised blessing of economic growth. This is because economic growth leads to a temptation: the temptation of autonomy. "And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied; Then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the LORD thy God, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage; Who led thee through that great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and drought, where there was no water; who brought thee forth water out of the rock of flint; Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna, which thy fathers knew not, that he might humble thee, and that he might prove thee, to do thee good at thy latter end; And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:13–17).

6. Chapters 17–23.

Third, there was a declaration of the inescapability of blessings. These blessings were built into the Mosaic law. Here, in one verse, is the most important single statement in ancient literature regarding the possibility of long-term economic growth. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (v. 18). The unique blessing of the power to get wealth serves as a means of confirming God's covenant in history. I say serves, not served. This covenant is still in force. He who denies this also implicitly denies the possibility of Christian economic theory.⁷

Consider the implications of cause-and-effect relationships among external covenant-keeping, visible wealth, and covenantal confirmation. The visible blessings that result from covenant-keeping are designed to increase men's faith in God and His covenant. The covenant's confirmation by corporate economic growth becomes a motivation for corporate covenant renewal. Greater corporate faith is supposed to produce greater spiritual maturity, which in turn is to produce greater corporate blessings. Economists call such a process positive feedback. Here we have a vision of that most wonderful of all social wonders: compound economic growth. Deuteronomy 8 tells us that it is possible for a society to sustain corporate economic growth by means of corporate covenantal obedience. This means that limits to growth can be overcome progressively. More than this: they must be steadily overcome. Compound corporate economic growth is an ethical imperative because corporate obedience to God is an ethical imperative. Economic growth is a social imperative, not an option.

7. Sometimes this rejection of biblical economic theory is explicit. See the comments of William Diehl, cited in my Preface, under "The Hatred of God's Law." He displayed near contempt for my heavy reliance on Deuteronomy in my biblical defense of the free market. Then he went on to deny the legitimacy of biblical economic theory: "The fact that our Scriptures can be used to support or condemn any economic philosophy suggests that the Bible is not intended to lay out an economic plan which will apply for all times and places. If we are to examine economic structures in the light of Christian teachings, we will have to do it in another way." William E. Diehl, "A Guided-Market Response," in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), p. 87. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>). He was reacting to my article defending free market capitalism. That article is reprinted as Appendix E.

The compounding process eventually produces an exponential curve: a number approaching infinity as a limit. But in a finite world, nothing grows forever.⁸ In a finite world, an exponential curve reaches environmental limits very fast. Population growth is the most obvious example. Yet we are told in Deuteronomy 8 that wealth can compound indefinitely. By this, God means finitely. The ultimate environmental limit to growth is time. If growth continues over time in a world of economic scarcity, including living space, time must run out. It will run out before covenant-keeping men reach society's physical limits to growth. This covenantal fact points clearly to the near-term consummation of history if men remain faithful to God by obeying His law. Time runs out when God's people obey Him and reap their appropriate reward: approaching the objective limits to growth.

Prior to the end of history, that which will bring economic growth to a halt is not any environmental limit to growth, but rather corporate sin. "And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God" (vv. 19–20).⁹ Or, as John described it in the Book of Revelation, "And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, And shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever" (Rev. 20:7–10). In short, bad guys finish last.

8. Gary North, "The Theology of the Exponential Curve," The Freeman (May 1970; reprinted in Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

9. Chapter 23.

C. Pessimillennialism vs. Inheritance

Moses' argument regarding the forthcoming conquest of Canaan rested on the presence of predictable corporate sanctions: "Behold, I set before you this day a blessing and a curse; A blessing, if ye obey the commandments of the LORD your God, which I command you this day: And a curse, if ye will not obey the commandments of the LORD your God, but turn aside out of the way which I command you this day, to go after other gods, which ye have not known" (Deut. 11:26–28). If there had been no judicial connection between God's law and His predictable corporate sanctions in history, then Israel's fulfillment of God's definitive promise to Abraham regarding the inheritance would have had no value as a confirmation of God's covenant. But God had already told them that their wealth would come as a confirmation of the covenant (Deut. 8:18). To separate law, sanctions, and inheritance is to deny the biblical covenant. They are part of an integrated whole. To ignore either the one (integration) or the many (each part) is a mistake.

The suggestion that God's covenant laws and sanctions still apply in New Covenant history is an affront to most schools of theological opinion, Christian and non-Christian. By linking Bible-revealed law and corporate historical sanctions, the covenant theologian makes a statement regarding the growth of the kingdom of God in history. He argues that the kingdom of God will progressively extend its authority across borders. God enables His people to redeem—buy back—all rival covenant-breaking social orders. God supplies them with the tools necessary for this redemption, beginning with His law.¹⁰ "The rich get richer and the poor get poorer" is a biblical concept that has been stolen and re-branded by covenant-breakers. When the rich get richer by covenantal faithfulness through serving customers, the poor who break God's law are supposed to get poorer in relation to covenant-keepers.¹¹ This process of compound economic and demographic growth for covenant-keepers and compound losses for covenant-breakers is the covenant's framework. This process transfers the inheritance to covenant-keepers over several generations. This is God's plan for the ages.

10. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion.

11. I am not arguing that they get absolutely poorer. The free market social order makes almost all people richer over time: the collective effect of slow but steady compound economic growth. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 27.

Pessimillennialists¹² and humanists deny this. A growth-oriented outlook calls into question the premillennialist's assertion that the church must fail in its attempt to fulfill the Great Commission until Jesus returns in person to set up a world-wide bureaucracy, probably with headquarters in Jerusalem. (The dispensationalist insists that this is where head quarters must be; the historic premillennialist is silent on this topic.) Until Jesus returns, says the premillennialist, the church will experience successes and failures, but it will not experience the continuity of growth and cultural victory. The amillennialist agrees with the premillennialist's view of church history. He adds, however, that there will be no era of millennial blessings in history under a Christ returned to earth. The amillennialist, in Rushdoony's words, is a premillennialist without earthly hope.

It is not surprising that premillennialists and amillennialists agree that biblical law is no longer valid in New Covenant times. If valid, biblical law's predictable corporate sanctions would lead to the inheritance of the earth by covenant-keepers and the disinheritance of covenant-breakers. That is, if biblical law and its mandatory sanctions are still in force, there is a covenantal basis for predicting that God's plain prophecies will be fulfilled in history. Let us review:

His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (Ps. 25:13).

For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth (Ps. 37:9).

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace (Ps. 37:11).

This inheritance is the kingdom of God. It is a kingdom visibly manifested by growth in history. Daniel told Nebuchadnezzar:

Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshingfloors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth (Dan. 2:34–35).

12. The term is F. N. Lee's.

And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure (Dan. 2:44–45).

I keep repeating these kingdom-inheritance verses because they are not believed by modern Christians. Christians read them and then immediately deny them. Premillennialists remove the fulfillment of these prophecies from church history and place their fulfillment in the millennial age, when Jesus will rule in person. Premillennialists insist on a radical discontinuity between the work of today's Christians and the work of those who will rule with Christ during the millennial kingdom. Premillennialists affirm the legitimacy of a literal interpretation of these prophecies of victory, but they deny the legitimacy of institutional continuity between the church's work today and the era of fulfillment. They deny the legitimacy of Christians' hope in their own efforts to leave behind a comprehensive covenantal inheritance in history. Nothing of lasting value survives the seven-year Great Tribulation, according to dispensationalism. The church's legacy will be lost.¹³

In contrast, amillennialists deny that these prophecies are to be taken literally. They affirm continuity between the church's work today and the future, but then they categorically deny that there will ever be a cultural victory for Christianity. They "spiritualize" away Christians' victory and earthly inheritance. They convert the Bible's clear language regarding an earthly inheritance into an unearthly inheritance. They convert the visible historical triumph of Christian culture—Christendom—into an invisible mental triumph of isolated, besieged Christians who find themselves in the midst of a triumphant covenant-breaking culture.¹⁴

13. The dispensational movement's theologians refuse to discuss publicly this aspect of their eschatology, but the conclusion is implied by the system and acted on by the movement's lay followers. They care nothing about building anything that will be left behind after the Rapture.

14. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology,

The postmillennialists, few in number today, alone assert both the literal fulfillment of these prophecies and the covenantal continuity between the past and future. In other words, they assert a progressive continuity of victory. Postmillennialists insist that each generation of Christians inherits a legacy from earlier generations, and each generation has a moral obligation to increase this legacy and then transfer it to those who follow. Postmillennialists insist on the continuity of growth: the compounding process.

For this reason, pessimillennialists stand arm in arm rejecting postmillennialism.¹⁵ Premillennialists despise postmillennialism's assertion of historical continuity, while amillennialists despise postmillennialism's assertion of Christianity's literal cultural victory in history. Both sides agree to oppose the common enemy. Both sides wallow in the visible failure of today's eschatologically disarmed Christianity, which they themselves have disarmed. Both sides proclaim today's setbacks for Christianity as the wave of the future until Jesus comes again in person. Both sides, in the final (eschatological) analysis, believe that the work of the Holy Spirit is to oversee the near-total defeat of His kingdom in history. Premillennialists and amillennialists agree: there is no corporate earthly hope for Christians until Jesus replaces the Holy Spirit in history by returning bodily in power and judgment, either millennial judgment (premillennialism) or final judgment (amillennialism). The mere presence of the Holy Spirit in the midst of the church (John 16:5–10) is insufficient to enable Christians to replace covenant-breakers as the creators and arbiters of civilization. When these people think "civilization," they think "humanism." They are theologically incapable of regarding Christian civilization as either a possibility or a desirable cultural option. Their eschatology shapes their thinking in every area of theology and most areas of life.

Their outlook is best expressed by the senior theologian of the Protestant Reformed Church, a Dutch-American denomination that split from the Dutch-American Christian Reformed Church in 1923 over the question of common grace, which the PRC denies.¹⁶ In an attempt to refute the obvious and inescapable literalism of Isaiah 65:17–

2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1997), Appendix A. (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

15. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

16. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), Introduction. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

21, he cries out against the very idea of Christian culture. Why? Because sin has ruined everything, and will throughout history.

There will be sin in the postmillennial kingdom. Every day we will know our misery of guilt and shame, the worst misery of all. Every day anew we will have to battle indwelling sin, which wrenches from us the groan, "O, wretched man that I am." What difference does it make that Gary North sits on the throne of the world and that Kenneth Gentry, Jr., is in charge of radio, television, movies, and the internet worldwide? . . .

There will be no vision of God in the face of Jesus Christ in this kingdom of postmillennialism. Still only in a glass darkly.

For these reasons alone, we Reformed amillennialists would not be enthusiastic over Christian Reconstructionism's kingdom. Indeed, we would be groaning, as we do today, waiting for the redemption of our body (Rom. 8:23). We would be crying night and day for divine vengeance on Christ's and our enemies (Luke 18:1-8). We would be praying fervently, "Lord, put an end to this postmillennial business as soon as possible, and come quickly."¹⁷

This is forthright, self-conscious, proud cultural despair. It is a despair born of a worldview that proclaims that anything short of perfection in heaven is so utterly tainted with sin that Christianity can make no difference culturally. But neutrality is never an option for a pessimillennialist. He really prefers the culture of humanism, Islam, or anything other than Christianity. Paraphrasing Orwell's pig, "All cultures are evil, but some (Satan's) are more equal than others." When men adopt a dead-end eschatology, they are driven by the logic of their position to accept a dead-end culture, which they then proclaim as the best that Christians can hope for: anti-Christianity. The Holy Spirit becomes the defender of the hard-pressed faithful rather than the implementer of a strategy of kingdom conquest: the cultural replacement of evil with good. Pessimillennialism strips them of all earthly hope. They abandon the church's God-given inheritance. This is not for them: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). Neither is this: "For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:47b).¹⁸ Seeking to avoid responsibility, they not only hand back the inheritance to God, they announce to their followers that it is in fact Satan's gift to his disciples—tainted beyond redemption. Defeat is their rallying cry. "Let's go out and lose this culture for Christ!"

17. David J. Engelsma, "A Defense of (Reformed) Amillennialism." (<http://bit.ly/AmilDefense>)

D. Eschatology

Deuteronomy's covenantal worldview is rejected by humanists and most Christians. Covenant theology is impossible without eschatology. Because humanists and Christians reject Deuteronomy's eschatology, they also reject the Pentateuch's doctrine of covenantal inheritance: "Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous. That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (Deut. 16:19–20).¹⁹ They offer other eschatologies and therefore other covenants.

Humanists reject biblical covenantalism because they reject the doctrine of final judgment. There will be no final judgment by God, they insist. There will be either the heat death of the universe²⁰ or a cyclical recapitulation of the Big Bang of creation: contraction, bang, expansion, ad infinitum.²¹ Both of these cosmic possibilities are impersonal. The humanists' hypothetical universe is a universe devoid of cosmic personalism, for their universe was not created by God.

The humanists' rejection of final judgment has implications for economic theory. There are two rival views: pro-growth and anti-growth. First, the typical economist insists that the limits to growth are always marginal. At the margin, there are no fixed limits to growth. There are only marginal limits to resources. Any ultimate objective limit to growth may be ignored for now—in fact, must be ignored, now and forevermore. At some price, there is always room for one more, no matter what it is we are talking about: such is the confession of the

18. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

19. Chapter 40.

20. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

21. The Big Bang that follows each cosmic contraction somehow will overcome the second law of thermodynamics: entropy. The heat death of the universe will be avoided.

economist. The marginalism of modern subjective economic theory lends itself to a concept of growth that has no objective limits. Growth cannot go on forever, the economist may admit if pressured for an answer, but it can surely go on for another year. Maybe two. The mainstream economist trains himself not to think about ultimate objective limits; he thinks only about marginal limits. Eschatology—the doctrine of the last things—is anathema to him. There are no last things, only marginal decisions.

Second, the anti-growth humanist asserts that mankind has become a destroyer, that nature's limits must be honored by rapacious man, and therefore the state must impose restrictions on the use of private property because of capitalism's insatiable quest for more. This outlook insists that there are objective limits to growth in nature, and therefore the state must restrict private individuals from pressing against these limits. Anti-growth legislation is necessary in order to avoid an inevitable collective catastrophe—there are numerous humanistic doomsday scenarios—that must occur when mankind reaches the environmental limits to growth. This eschatology is an eschatology of historical disaster. Anti-growth humanists are not concerned with the cosmic end of the world, i.e., the heat death of the universe. They do not predict the end of the world. Rather, they predict either the end of autonomous man's attempts to subdue nature or else the end of autonomous nature. They prefer the former.²²

Contemporary pessimillennial Christians, in contrast to humanists, are more deeply concerned about eschatology than history. They assume that eschatology is discontinuous with culture, i.e., a breaking into time that will overthrow man's works rather than heal and extend them. In effect, they deny to the creation what Christ's resurrected body was for history: continuous with history (recognizable), yet transcendent beyond history, as the ascension subsequently revealed to the disciples. They do not see the end of time as the death and resurrection of cursed history. They oppose biblical covenantalism because it places the end of history within the context of Christendom's extension of the limits to growth. They reject any suggestion that mankind will reach objective limits to growth as a result of the spread of the gospel, the conversion of billions of people, the division of labor, and men's widespread obedience to biblical law, for this scenario suggests a postmillennial eschatology that modern pessimillennialism rejects.

22. Bill McKibben, The End of Nature (New York: Random House, 1989).

This is why pessimillennial Christians have no explicitly biblical economic theory. Without the Bible's doctrine of the covenant, they cannot reason both biblically and economically.

Once a person accepts the continuing validity and authority of the covenantal message of Deuteronomy, it is only by arguing that the triumph of covenant-breaking society is inevitable in history that he can escape the postmillennial implications of Deuteronomy. Theologians do this, of course, but in doing so, they must appeal to the failure of Old Covenant Israel as a binding model for all history. This leads them to dismiss or at least ignore the doctrine of Christ's bodily ascension in history, an event that confirmed the Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20). Only by denying the possibility of progressively fulfilling the Great Commission in history can anyone who accepts the covenantal authority of Deuteronomy legitimately deny postmillennialism.²³ Such a denial inescapably rests on this presupposition, which is never publicly admitted by those who deeply believe it: Christ's bodily ascension plays no significant role in empowering the church to fulfill the Great Commission through the post-ascension advent of the Holy Spirit. Such a view of history also denies any significance for the doctrine of the ascension in the development of either eschatology or Christian social theory. In the final analysis, pessimillennialism substitutes the experience of Old Covenant Israel for the doctrine of empowerment by the Holy Spirit.

If the biblical doctrine of the covenant includes corporate compound economic growth as a confirmation of the covenant (Deut. 8:17),²⁴ then biblical covenantalism has eschatological implications. Here is the big one: the meek shall inherit the earth. Covenant-keepers who are meek before God, as evidenced by their confession of faith and their way of life—obedience to God's Bible-revealed law—are empowered by the Holy Spirit in history to extend the kingdom of God in history. That is, they are empowered in history by the Holy Spirit to fulfill progressively, though never perfectly, the terms of the dominion covenant.

23. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

24. Chapter 21.

E. The Structure of Theonomy²⁵

Theonomy is covenantal. The covenant is marked by five points: God's transcendence/presence; man's representative, hierarchical authority over creation and under God; God's Bible-revealed law; God's historical sanctions, positive and negative; and covenant-keepers' inheritance or succession, in time and eternity. In chapter 19, I wrote that theonomy is not simply a matter of God's law; rather, it is a matter of the covenant: God's absolute sovereignty, man's subordinate authority, Bible-revealed law's continuity, historical sanctions' predictability, and postmillennialism. Put as a slogan, theonomy is a package deal.

On this point, I break with Greg Bahnsen, who argues in By This Standard: "What these studies present is a position in Christian (normative) ethics. They do not logically commit those who agree with them to any particular school of eschatological interpretation."²⁶ Logically, perhaps not; I defer here to Bahnsen's abilities as a logician. Theologically, God's biblically revealed law cannot be separated covenantally from sanctions and eschatology.

I can appreciate Dr. Bahnsen's dilemma. First, he believes that the Westminster Confession of Faith teaches theonomy.²⁷ Second, the ordination standards of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, which ordained him, are explicitly committed to what is known as "eschatological liberty," or better put, "eschatological opinions as Confessional adiaphora," i.e., things indifferent to the Confession's statement of faith. Presbyterianism formally asserts the proposition that an ordained officer can lawfully affirm, or refuse to affirm, any one of at least three totally incompatible theories of eschatology, at least two of which have to be biblically incorrect and therefore heretical. In order to escape the burden of endless heresy trials and shattered churches, Reformed churches relegate eschatology to the realm of adiaphora.²⁸

Bahnsen does not want to fight a three-front war: law vs. antinomianism; postmillennialism vs. amillennialism; postmillennialism vs. premillennialism. He formally separates his discussion of theonomy,

25. Written prior to the death of Greg Bahnsen.

26. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Tex as: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), p. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

27. Greg L. Bahnsen, "M. G. Kline on Theonomic Politics: An Evaluation of His Reply," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VI (Winter, 1979–80), pp. 200–202.

28. In this sense, Lutherans are correct when they insist that they are not Reformed. They are creedally committed to amillennialism.

which he believes is both the biblically mandated position and also consistent with the Westminster Confession and its two catechisms, from postmillennialism, which he believes is the biblically mandated position and therefore inconsistent, if postmillennialism really is biblically mandated, with the formal Presbyterian ideal of eschatology as a moot point theologically. The five-point covenant model, if true, pulls eschatology into ethics and vice versa by way of historical sanctions. This may be another reason for Bahnsen's lack of enthusiasm for Ray Sutton's and Meredith Kline's five-point covenant model, especially Sutton's, who does not relegate the covenant and its five points to the legal status of the Mosaic "intrusion," to use Kline's terminology.²⁹ I, on the other hand, am committed not only to the five-point structure of the covenant, but also to the five-point structure of the Pentateuch, as well as Exodus, Leviticus, Deuteronomy, and the Book of Revelation.³⁰

Conclusion

I have come to the conclusion of the Conclusion to the book that concludes the Pentateuch.

The Pentateuch is structured in terms of the Bible's five-point covenant model. So is Deuteronomy. Deuteronomy is a future-oriented book. It deals with inheritance. It looks forward to the events chronicled in Joshua. It lays down the law a second time. The law was Israel's tool of dominion. Now that the nation was about to inherit the long-promised land of Canaan, the law was vital. By obeying the Mosaic law, Israel could maintain the kingdom grant until the era of the gentiles arrived. If Israel rebelled, God would remove the grant and transfer it to another nation. Jesus prophesied: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). This finally took place in A.D. 70.

Deuteronomy, in Kline's words, is the treaty of the Great King.³¹ The question is: Was this treaty abrogated forever by Jesus, or were its stipulations merely modified? The answer to this question divides theonomists from their critics, whose name is legion.³² Theonomists insist that this treaty is still in force. God still brings a covenant lawsuit against His enemies in terms of this covenant's laws. Theonomy's critics deny this. But the critics have a problem with Deuteronomy 5: the recapitulation of the Ten Commandments. The section ends with this warning: "Ye shall observe to do therefore as the LORD your God hath commanded you: ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left. Ye shall walk in all the ways which the LORD your God hath commanded you, that ye may live, and that it may be well with you, and that ye may prolong your days in the land which ye shall possess" (Deut. 5:32–33).³³ If this promise of blessing ended with Jesus' ministry, why did Paul cite the fifth commandment and reaffirm its life-extending promise? "Children, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right. Honour thy father and mother; (which is the first commandment with promise;) That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth" (Eph. 6:1–3). He extended the scope of the positive sanction's applicability from the geographical confines of Canaan to the whole earth. This is not what I would call judicial annulment.

29. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), Appendix 7: "Meredith G. Kline: Yes and No." (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

30. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

31. Meredith G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy: Studies and Commentary (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963).

When covenant-breakers abandon the treaty of the Great King, we should not be surprised. The very concept of the Great King of the covenant offends them. But we also find that covenant-keepers insist, generation after generation, that they agree with covenant-breakers about the non-binding character of Deuteronomy's laws and sanctions. They are allied with covenant-breakers against those who argue that the treaty is still in force, and that God's corporate judgments in history are imposed in terms of its stipulations. Covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers seek a different treaty, with different laws and different sanctions. While they rarely agree on what this treaty might be, the terms of discourse are today set by covenant-breakers. Both groups insist that the presuppositions regarding what constitutes justice and how we can both ascertain it and impose its laws must be a neutral, common-ground endeavor. Lo and behold, the conclusions reached by the two groups are presented to the public in terms of autonomous man and his moral and intellectual standards.

32. In May, 1997, a committee of the tiny Free Kirk of Scotland declared theonomy heretical. In doing so, the committee broke with the Westminster Confession. See Martin A. Foulner (ed.), Theonomy and the Westminster Confession: an annotated sourcebook (Edinburgh: Marpet Press, 1997). What remains of this once-great ecclesiastical body is an operational alliance between theological liberals, who hate the law of God, and pietists who fear institutional squabbling and who are unfamiliar with historical scholarship, especially the history of seventeenth-century Scottish theology. We have seen all this before, in the American Presbyterian Church. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996). (<http://bit.ly/gncrossed>)

33. Chapter 13.

There is no neutrality. Protestant American Christians today are willing to say this in public far more often than they were when I began writing my economic commentary on Genesis in April of 1973. This confessional reversal constitutes the beginning of a revolution in religious thought. When Christians at long last decide to follow this statement regarding neutrality to its logical conclusion—the denial of political pluralism³⁴—they will have begun a major journey toward theonomy. To speed up this process of self-awareness, I ask, one more time: If not God’s law, then whose? If not God’s law, then what? I suggest three choices. God’s law or chaos. God’s law or tyranny. God’s law or chaos followed by tyranny.

“And Elijah came unto all the people, and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? if the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word” (I Kings 18:21). Then came the negative sanction: “Then the fire of the LORD fell, and consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench. And when all the people saw it, they fell on their faces: and they said, The LORD, he is the God; the LORD, he is the God” (vv. 38–39). God’s people learn slowly, but they do eventually learn. The trouble is, this learning process generally requires them to suffer extensive negative sanctions.

End of Volume 3

34. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

INHERITANCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON DEUTERONOMY

VOLUME 4

APPENDIXES

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

INHERITANCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON DEUTERONOMY

VOLUME 4

GARY NORTH

Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy

Volume 4

Formerly:

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1

| | |
|--|------|
| Foreword | xi |
| Preface | xxxi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| Part I: Transcendence/Presence (1:1–5) | |
| 1. The God Who Brings Judgment in History (Deut. 1:1–5) . | 17 |
| Part II: Hierarchy/Representation (1:6–4:49) | |
| 2. A Delayed Inheritance (Deut 1:6–8) | 23 |
| 3. Delegated Authority and Social Order (Deut. 1:9–13) | 36 |
| 4. The Face of Man (Deut. 1:17) | 44 |
| 5. Bureaucratic Counsel (Deut. 1:21–23) | 52 |
| 6. The Skills of Foreign Trade (Deut. 2:4–6) | 63 |
| 7. Transferring the Inheritance (Deut. 3:27–28) | 71 |
| 8. Evangelism Through Law (Deut. 4:5–8) | 78 |
| 9. Hear, Fear, and Testify (Deut. 4:9–10) | 84 |
| 10. Removing the Inheritance (Deut. 4:25–28) | 96 |
| Part III: Ethics/Law/Boundaries (5–26) | |
| 11. Judicial Continuity (Deut. 5:1–5) | 108 |
| 12. Sabbath and Liberation (Deut. 5:14–15) | 116 |
| 13. Law and Sanctions (Deut. 5:32–33) | 125 |
| 14. The Wealth of Nations (Deut. 6:1–3) | 133 |
| 15. Law and Inheritance (Deut. 6:4–9) | 145 |
| 16. Genocide and Inheritance (Deut. 7:1–5) | 161 |
| 17. By Law or By Promise? (Deut. 8:1) | 182 |
| 18. Miracles, Entropy, and Social Theory (Deut. 8:2–4) | 191 |
| 19. Chastening and Inheritance (Deut. 8:5–7) | 209 |
| 20. Overcoming Poverty (Deut. 8:9) | 215 |
| 21. The Assertion of Autonomy (Deut. 8:10–17) | 223 |
| 22. Economic Growth (Deut. 8:18) | 228 |
| 23. Disinheriting the Heirs (Deut. 8:19–20) | 251 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 24. Overcoming the Visible Odds (Deut. 9:1–6) | 263 |
| 25. Sonship, Servitude, and Inheritance (Deut. 9:26–29) | 283 |
| 26. Sonship, Obedience, and Immigration (Deut. 10:12–16) | 291 |
| 27. Oath, Sanctions, and Inheritance (Deut. 10:20–22) | 306 |
| 28. Rain and Inheritance (Deut. 11:10–14) | 313 |
| 29. Law, Sanctions, and Inheritance (Deut. 11:18–21) | 323 |

Volume 2

| | |
|---|-----|
| 30. Common Grace (Deut. 12:1–3) | 339 |
| 31. Communal Meals (Deut. 12:5–10) | 358 |
| 32. The Murderous Gods of Canaan (Deut. 12:28–31) | 369 |
| 33. The Lure of Magic (Deut. 13:1–5) | 376 |
| 34. Commerce and Covenant (Deut. 14:21) | 395 |
| 35. Tithes of Celebration (Deut. 14:22–29) | 407 |
| 36. The Charitable Loan (Deut. 15:1–5) | 429 |
| 37. Lending and Dominion (Deut. 15:6) | 445 |
| 38. Consuming Capital in Good Faith (Deut. 15:19–22) | 453 |
| 39. Individual Blessing (Deut. 16:14–17) | 461 |
| 40. Casuistry and Inheritance (Deut. 16:18–20) | 468 |
| 41. Israel's Supreme Court (Deut. 17:8–13) | 483 |
| 42. Boundaries on Kingship (Deut. 17:14) | 500 |
| 43. Levitical Inheritance Through Separation (Deut. 18:1–2) | 517 |
| 44. Landmarks and Social Cooperation (Deut. 19:14) | 526 |
| 45. The Penalty for Perjury (Deut. 19:15–19) | 536 |
| 46. A Hierarchy of Commitments (Deut. 20:5–7) | 551 |
| 47. A Few Good Men (Deut. 20:8) | 559 |
| 48. Limits against Empire (Deut. 20:10–18) | 567 |
| 49. Fruit Trees as Covenantal Testimonies (Deut. 20:19–20) | 584 |
| 50. Double Portion, Double Burden (Deut. 21:15–17) | 594 |
| 51. Executing a Rebellious Adult Son (Deut. 21:18–21) | 608 |
| 52. Lost and Found (Deut. 22:1–4) | 629 |
| 53. Nature's Roots and Fruits (Deut. 22:6–7) | 643 |
| 54. The Rooftop Railing Law (Deut. 22:8) | 649 |
| 55. Laws Prohibiting Mixtures (Deut. 22:9–11) | 659 |
| 56. The Fugitive Slave Law (Deut. 23:15–16) | 670 |
| 57. Usury: Yes and No (Deut. 23:19–20) | 679 |
| 58. Vows, Contracts, and Productivity (Deut. 23:21–23) | 692 |
| 59. Free for the Picking (Deut. 23:24–25) | 704 |

Volume 3

| | |
|---|-----|
| 60. Collateral, Servitude, and Dignity (Deut. 24:6) | 727 |
| 61. Wages and Oppression (Deut. 24:14–15) | 744 |
| 62. Gleaning: Charitable Efficiency (Deut. 24:19–22) | 766 |
| 63. Unmuzzling the Working Ox (Deut. 25:4) | 782 |
| 64. Levirate Marriage and Family Name (Deut. 25:5–6) | 796 |
| 65. Just Weights and Justice (Deut. 25:13–16) | 812 |
| 66. The Firstfruits Offering (Deut. 26:1–3) | 844 |
| 67. Positive Confession (Deut. 26:12–15) | 850 |
| Part IV: Oath/Sanctions (27–30) | |
| 68. Landmark and Curse (Deut. 27:17) | 857 |
| 69. Objective Wealth and historical Progress (Deut. 28:4–5) . . | 865 |
| 70. Credit as a Tool of Dominion (Deut. 28:12–13, 43–44) . . | 884 |
| 71. The Covenant of Prosperity (Deut. 29:9–15) | 896 |
| 72. Captivity and Restoration (Deut. 30:1–5) | 901 |
| 73. Life and Dominion (Deut. 30:19–20) | 908 |
| Part V: Succession/Inheritance (31–33) | |
| 74. Courage and Dominion (Deut. 31:4–8) | 914 |
| 75. Law and Liberty (Deut. 31:9–13) | 921 |
| 76. A Covenantal Song (Deut. 31:16–18) | 930 |
| Conclusion | 933 |

Volume 4

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A—Modern Economics as a Form of Magic | 983 |
| APPENDIX B—Individualism, Holism, and Covenantalism | 971 |
| APPENDIX C—Syncretism, Pluralism, and Empire | 984 |
| APPENDIX D—The Demographics of American Judaism | 998 |
| APPENDIX E—Free Market Capitalism | 1017 |
| APPENDIX F—The Economic Re-education of Ronald J. Sider . . | 1052 |
| APPENDIX G—Strong Drink | 1068 |
| APPENDIX H—Weak Reed: The Politics of Compromise | 1075 |
| APPENDIX I—Eschatology, Law, and Pietism | 1084 |
| APPENDIX J—Categories of the Mosaic Law | 1111 |

Appendix A

MODERN ECONOMICS AS A FORM OF MAGIC¹

Take the rod, and gather thou the assembly together, thou, and Aaron thy brother, and speak ye unto the rock before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water, and thou shalt bring forth to them water out of the rock: so thou shalt give the congregation and their beasts drink (Num. 20:8).

And Moses lifted up his hand, and with his rod he smote the rock twice: and the water came out abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their beasts also (Num. 20:11).

In a previous situation, God had told Moses to strike a rock with his rod, and water would flow out of it (Ex. 17:6). This procedure had worked exactly as promised. Now, God's command was different: speak to a rock. In both cases, the Israelites would get what they wanted for no effort or payment on their part. Moses would pay the price—a below-market price by anyone's standards. His words would bring them God's supernatural blessing.

This time, Moses struck the rock twice. He made up a ritual of his own to substitute for God's explicit command to him. He hit the rock twice. The water flowed, just as it had at Marah, but this act of autonomy, lack of faith in God, and outright defiance against God's command cost Moses entrance into the Promised Land. "And the LORD spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them" (Num. 20: 12). In what did Moses' lack of faith consist? He had substituted ritual magic for covenantal obedience. He had imagined that a ritual—a formula of some kind—would enable Israel to gain supernatural blessings from God.² Israel would get something for nothing. This plan worked for Israel, but Moses paid a heavy price.

1. I wrote this essay in 1998. It was published in the Bulletin of the Association of Christian Economists (1998). This essay is a frontal assault against modern economics. Nothing like this had been written before. It was a call for Christian economists to abandon the methodology of humanistic economics. I received no written responses. Christian economists are uninterested in epistemology, as are most humanistic economists.

God wanted to teach Israel a lesson, namely, that obedience to God's revealed word produces blessings in history, no matter how low the statistical probabilities of success appear to be. Moses substituted a different lesson: adherence to precise formulas is what produces blessings in history. This is the magician's worldview.

A. The Economist's Worldview

Economics is a highly rationalistic social science, if not the rationalistic social science. Economists do not recommend invoking supernatural forces as a means of explaining anything or changing anything. Economics is an entirely man-centered discipline. How, then, can it be considered magical? Because economists propose a worldview that insists that wealth-creation can take place, and does take place, by means of techniques and institutional arrangements that supposedly have no necessary connection to God's word. Economic theory substitutes formulas for biblical ethics in its explanation of how the world works.

The economist proposes the magician's quest: discovering the proper techniques for gaining external blessings apart from external conformity to the stipulations of God's specially revealed cross-boundary laws.³ If wealth-creation is governed by social laws and techniques that are independent of ethics, then man can gain something valuable apart from the costs of obedience to God. This is also the magician's worldview. The magician seeks an arcane formula or procedure to invoke, or some other source of power over nature that he can manipulate to gain his ends, that does not ask him to change his commitment to his own self-centered ends. Modern economics is the academic incarnation of this outlook, an entire worldview that interprets most of society's operations in terms of men's individual solutions to one simple question: "What's in it for me?"

Post-Scholastic economics has generally asserted that wealth-creation is not a matter of ethics except insofar as a man's willingness to conform to certain behavior patterns increases the statistical probability of his gaining voluntary cooperation from others. Wealth-creation is seen as a matter of the efficient application of ethically neutral knowledge to the problems of scarcity. For the economist, the phrase, "honesty is the best policy," is epistemologically meaningful only if honesty can be shown statistically to earn a rate of return above the rate of interest obtainable by investing in "risk-free" short-term government debt.

2. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 11.

3. On cross-boundary laws, see Appendix J.

Ever since the late seventeenth century, economics has rested self-consciously on the methodological assumption of agnosticism regarding God. It has sought to avoid any invocation of the authority of religion. Operationally, this agnosticism is atheism. This confessionally atheistic worldview was first extended into scholarship by the economists. William Letwin's book, The Origins of Scientific Economics (1963), remains the most detailed study of this development. He wrote: "Nevertheless there can be no doubt that economic theory owes its present development to the fact that some men, in thinking of economic phenomena, forcefully suspended all judgments of theology, morality, and justice, were willing to consider the economy as nothing more than an intricate mechanism, refraining for the while from asking whether the mechanism worked for good or evil. That separation was made during the seventeenth century. . . . The economist's view of the world, which the public cannot yet comfortably stomach, was introduced by a remarkable tour de force, an intellectual revolution brought off in the seventeenth century."⁴ He went on to assert that "the making of economics was the greatest scientific achievement of the seventeenth century."⁵ While the development of Newtonian physics would seem to deserve that honor, there should be no question that scientific economics was the greatest atheistic intellectual achievement of the seventeenth century, retaining this title until Darwin's Descent of Man (1871). Newton the physicist at least tipped his academic hat to a deistic unitarian god who sustained sufficient order in the cosmos to make applicable men's knowledge of mathematics. The economists, then as now, tipped their academic hats to no god at all.

Adam Smith seems to be an exception. He was a deist of some sort. This is clear from scattered passages in his book, The Theory of 4. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Garden City, New York: Anchor, [1963] 1965), pp. 158–59. This book was published first by M.I.T. Press.

5. Ibid., p. 159.

Moral Sentiments (1759). The book is barely known, rarely read, and never discussed in the textbooks as a contribution to economic thought. Smith made no analytical use of its vague theology in the Wealth of Nations (1776).⁶ His famous “invisible hand”⁷ was a mental construct, not a god. “The hand’s going to get you” was not what he had in mind.

Economists ever since the late nineteenth century have proclaimed the ideal of value-free economics: economic science devoid of ethical content. They have to this extent become magicians. The magician seeks something for nothing by means of ritual formulas. The economist seeks ways for society to attain “more for less”⁸ by means of insights generated by means of arcane mathematical formulas.

B. Equilibrium as Conceptual Magic

Modern economics assures us that a society can create wealth if it implements production techniques within a framework accurately described by a series of simultaneous equations. Léon Walras, a French economist living in Switzerland, in the 1870s described the market order in this way. Oskar Lange in the 1930s argued that socialist central planning could match the efficiency of the free market by adhering to such mathematical equations in a trial-and-error process.⁹ These equations presume the economist’s concept of equilibrium: a condition in which no further economic change is beneficial because all of the society’s production opportunities have been maximized. It is a world without profit or loss, a world without mistakes.¹⁰

For this to take place at any point in history, all of the participants in a free market, or the central planners in a socialist economy, would have to possess perfect knowledge, including perfect knowledge of the future. They must be omniscient. Economists do not use such decidedly theological terminology when describing equilibrium. If they

6. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix C.

7. Smith, Wealth of Nations, Cannan edition, p. 423. Smith, Theory of Moral Sentiments (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, 1976), pp. 304–5.

8. More precisely, he seeks to obtain more value from a given cost of resource inputs, or a given value from less costly resource inputs.

9. See Oskar Lange and Fred M. Taylor, On the Economic Theory of Socialism (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, [1938] 1956), pp. 72–83. This essay first appeared in the Review of Economic Studies in 1937.

10. Israel M. Kirzner, Market Theory and the Price System (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1963), pp. 246–49. (<http://bit.ly/KirznerMTPS>)

were more forthright about the presumptions of equilibrium theory, they would not be taken seriously by anyone outside of their profession. Roger Leroy Miller wrote in his textbook: "Equilibrium in any market is defined as a situation in which the plans of buyers and the plans of sellers exactly mesh, causing the quantity supplied to equal the quantity demanded."¹¹ Gwartney and Stroup agreed: "When a market is in equilibrium, there is a balance of forces such that the actions of buyers and suppliers are consistent with one another. In addition, when long-run equilibrium is present, the conditions will persist into the future."¹² How can such a meshing of plans occur? Through perfect forecasting: "In summary, an output rate can be sustained into the future only when the prior choices of decision-makers were based on a correct anticipation of the current price level."¹³ The phrase "correct anticipation" has to be interpreted as "perfect foreknowledge," but the authors are too scientific to say this. Their peers know what they really mean—equilibrium is an impossible condition to fulfill—and the average student is not too inquisitive about the relationship between a theory based on human omniscience and details in the real world.

Edwin Dolan summarizes the professional economist's definition of the condition of economic equilibrium: "The separately formulated plans of all market participants may turn out to mesh exactly when tested in the marketplace, and no one will have frustrated expectations or be forced to modify plans. When this happens, the market is said to be in equilibrium."¹⁴ E. H. Phelps writes in The New Palgrave (1987), the English-speaking economics profession's dominant dictionary: "Economic equilibrium, at least as the term has traditionally been used, has always implied an outcome, typically from the application of some inputs, that conforms to the expectations of the participants in the economy."¹⁵ There seems to be perfect agreement here: a kind of theoretical equilibrium among economists. The definitions mesh.

So does their blandness. This textbook definition of equilibrium

11. Roger Leroy Miller, Economics Today, 5th ed. (New York: Harper & Row, 1985), p. 49.

12. James D. Gwartney and Richard L. Stroup, Economics: Public and Private Choice, 4th ed. (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1982), p. 186.

13. Ibid., p. 187.

14. Edwin G. Dolan, Basic Economics, 2nd ed. (Hinsdale, Illinois: Dryden, 1980), pp. 44–45.

15. Edmund S. Phelps, "equilibrium: an expectational concept," in The New Palgrave: A Dictionary of Economics, eds. John Eatwell, Murray Milgate, and Peter Newman, 4 vols. (New York: Macmillan 1987), II, p. 177.

seems so subdued and uncontroversial, perhaps even plausible. The economists' language certainly gives the impression that equilibrium applies to a real-world phenomenon: "a situation in which the plans of buyers and the plans of sellers exactly mesh," "when a market is in equilibrium," and "the separately formulated plans of all market participants may turn out to mesh exactly when tested in the marketplace." We can almost visualize a dedicated student writing down the definition of equilibrium on an index card, to be filed away in a card box or electronic filing software until the night before the final exam, when the note will be retrieved and the definition filed for 24 hours in a much less reliable storage device.

Now, for the sake of argument, let me provide a somewhat more controversial though more complete definition of equilibrium:

Equilibrium is the condition of the world economy which occurs whenever all three billion market participants on earth (not counting their non-participating children) have perfectly forecasted the supply-and-demand effects of all of the economic decisions of all of the other three billion economic decision-makers, so that their plans mesh perfectly without error. This is why there is no incentive for plan-revision. No one has anything more to sell at the existing prices, and everyone has purchased all that he wants at the existing prices, so prices will not change as a result of anyone's changing his mind. Equilibrium requires that every market participant forecast perfectly the economic future, which has therefore ceased to be uncertain. In short, equilibrium occurs whenever everyone on earth has previously attained what Christian theologians refer to as one of God's incommunicable attributes: omniscience.

This note card might generate a second reading, even the night before the final exam. Perhaps an A-level student might think to himself, "This economic condition does not seem altogether plausible." I would go so far as to suggest that even a few of the B-level students might wonder, at least briefly, whether this definition applies to the real world. The C-level students will surely do their best to commit the definition to memory, though without success. The others do not bother to use note cards.

Equilibrium as a concept applies only to a never-never land where men possess one of the attributes of God. This never-never land is the realm of simultaneous equations and the calculus, not people. Yet time and time again, we find economists seriously discussing a theoretical problem in economics as if this never-never land could conceivably occur in the real world. So, to put it as bluntly as I can, almost the entire academic economics profession has been involved in a self-conscious deception of new students and the general public. The economists have fooled lots of people, especially themselves.

B. Lange vs. Mises

Let us consider a real-world example of “applied equilibrium” thinking by economists, one which had considerable impact on the history of economic thought for half a century. This example comes from one of the most important debates in the history of economic thought. Ludwig von Mises argued in a 1920 essay that socialist economic calculation is impossible because of the absence of market prices; therefore, socialist planning is inherently irrational.¹⁶ Oskar Lange responded in 1937: “Let us see how economic equilibrium is established by trial-and-error in a competitive market.”¹⁷ He asserted the ability of socialist central planners, in the absence of private ownership and private capital markets, to coordinate the economy by means of trial-and-error pricing.

1. A Communist’s Theory

So confident was Lange in the real-world applicability of his solution that he began his book with a rhetorical dismissal of Mises that became far more familiar than the details of Lange’s arguments. Socialists are beholden to Mises, he said, because Mises articulated the irrational calculation argument better than anyone else. “Both as an expression of recognition for the great service rendered by him and as a memento of the prime importance of sound economic accounting, a statue of Professor Mises might occupy an honorable place in the great hall of the Ministry of Socialization or of the Central Planning Board of the socialist state.”¹⁸ Less familiar is his Marxian follow-up: “[E]ven the sta[u]nchest of bourgeois economists unwittingly serve the proletarian cause.”¹⁹

Lange was no vague socialist. He was a Communist. This made him unique on the University of Chicago economics faculty, 1938–45, 16. Ludwig von Mises, “Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth” (1920); reprinted in F. A. Hayek (ed.), Collectivist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1935] 1963), ch. 3. (<http://www.mises.org/econcalc.asp>)

17. Lange, Socialism, p. 65.

18. Ibid., pp. 57–58.

19. Ibid., p. 58.

which was generally free market-oriented. During World War II, he broke with the Polish government-in-exile in London, openly switching his allegiance to the Lublin Committee, sponsored by the Soviet Union. In 1944, he served as a diplomatic go-between for Roosevelt and Stalin in matters regarding post-war Polish borders and its government.²⁰ He renounced his United States citizenship in 1945 to become the Polish ambassador to the United States. In 1947, he returned to Poland to serve as an economist. In 1957, he was appointed chairman of the Polish Economic Council. Here is the kicker: he did not suggest the implementation of his 1937 solution to Mises' challenge. Instead, he appealed to the new god—the computer—to solve the problem of coordinating scarce resources. He died in 1965.²¹ His abandonment in practice of his own suggested solution did not penetrate the thinking of the myriad of Mises' critics in the Western world, who continued to cite his 1937 essay as if it were gospel truth. In short, "Better to accept a defunct theory by a Communist planner in a poverty-stricken backward nation than to accept the legitimacy of a comprehensive theoretical criticism of socialism in general." Ironically, it was Poland that first broke loose from Soviet Communism's tyranny. The Solidarity labor movement understood that Communism cannot work—yes, even before certain best-selling Western economists did. The Poles began their high-risk protest against the USSR in 1981. Yet as late as 1989, Nobel Prize-winning economist Paul Samuelson wrote in his best-selling economics textbook: "The Soviet economy is proof that, contrary to what many skeptics had earlier believed, a socialist command economy can function and even thrive."²² That same year, the Soviet Union went bankrupt in full public view, and the Berlin Wall came down. In 1991, senior Soviet Communists folded up shop, looted ("privatized") the Party's funds, and publicly abandoned Communism.

2. Theory and Reality

The theoretical problem with Lange's appeal to trial-and-error as a means leading to equilibrium is that for equilibrium to occur, there must first be omniscience by the person or persons in charge of resource allocation. There is no need for trials because there is no possibility of errors by those who possess omniscience. Equilibrium is the negation of trial and error. Now, to be fair to Lange, he must have had in mind the argument that trial and error by socialist planners is as efficient—no, more efficient—in reaching equilibrium than the profit-seeking decisions of resource owners. More equitable, too. Or, to paraphrase Orwell, “All equilibrium conditions are equal, but some are more equal than others.” All we need to assume, as good socialists, is “freedom of choice in consumption and freedom of choice in occupation,”²³ and the central planners can bring equilibrium into existence as well as entrepreneurs can. In fact, better. “Once the parametric function of prices is adopted as an accounting rule, the price structure is established by the objective equilibrium conditions.”²⁴ In short, what Mises and the Austrian school of economists always insisted is impossible in history—equilibrium conditions—Lange appealed to as the solution to the problem of socialist economic calculation.

20. "Oskar Ryszard Lange, 1904–1965," History of Economic Thought Website, New School of Social Research. (<http://bit.ly/LangeBio>)

21. Dolan, Basic Economics, p. 686.

22. Paul A. Samuelson and William D. Nordhaus, Economics, 13th ed. (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1989), p. 837, cited in Mark Skousen, Economics on Trial: Lies, Myths, and Realities (Homewood, Illinois: Business One Irwin, 1991), p. 208.

For over half a century, this argument was accepted by most economists as a theoretically valid dismissal of Mises, i.e., Mises’ theory of entrepreneurship in a world of economic uncertainty and subjectively imputed prices. Lange’s argument was also, by implication, a dismissal of Frank H. Knight’s 1921 classic, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit, which rested on the same theory of entrepreneurship that Mises offered.²⁵ Lange’s proposed practical solution, which was never adopted by any socialist planning agency, was regarded by his academic peers as having solved the real-world problems raised by Mises. As socialist economist Robert Heilbroner admitted in 1990, the year after the Berlin Wall came down, and the year before the Soviet Union collapsed: “Fifty years ago, it was felt that Lange had decisively won the argument for socialist planning.” It has turned out, Heilbroner belatedly admitted, that Lange was wrong, and “Mises was right.”²⁶ Fifty years of criticism from a handful of free market economists that Lange’s solution, based on equilibrium conditions, was no solution at all, in no way affected the thinking of the majority of academic economists.²⁷ This is

23. Lange, Socialism, p. 72.

24. Ibid., p. 81.

25. Knight also taught at the University of Chicago.

26. Robert Heilbroner, “After Communism,” The New Yorker (Sept. 10, 1990), p. 92.

27. Peter G. Klein, “Introduction,” The Fortunes of Liberalism: Essays on Austrian Economics and the Ideal of Freedom, ed. Peter G. Klein, vol. IV of The Collected Works not surprising. Academic economists were equally committed to equilibrium as a legitimate model with which to critique free market capitalism,²⁸ and so they refused to pay any attention to Lange's critics.²⁹ What finally persuaded them was not Mises' arguments but socialism's visible irrationality: the bankruptcy of the Soviet-bloc nations.

Israel Kirzner argued that what is lacking in the neoclassical economics of Walras, Marshall, and their disciples is some means of explaining how equilibrium can occur, thereby giving life to the advanced textbook world of simultaneous equations. "However, when price is described as being above or below equilibrium, it is understood that a single price prevails in the market. The uncomfortable question, then, is whether we may assume that a single price emerges before equilibrium is attained. Surely a single price can be postulated only as the result of the process of equilibrium itself. . . . The procedure also assumes too much. It takes for granted that the market already knows when the demand price of the quantity now available exceeds the supply price. But disequilibrium occurs precisely because market participants do not know what the market-clearing price is."³⁰ This applies even more forcefully to Lange's socialist planning board. This line of argumentation, which is Mises' Austrian argument, undercuts Walras as well as Lange. The economics profession has not given this idea careful consideration in its journals and textbooks. Walras was the original spinner of invisible clothing for the emperors of economics. Emperors who wear invisible clothes prefer to keep clear-eyed critics away from their parades.

Invoking equilibrium when discussing economic policy-making is an exercise in conceptual magic. Equilibrium rests on the assumption of the possibility of mankind's simultaneous omniscience. Yet neoclassical economics, including Keynesianism, invokes the equilibrium of F. A. Hayek (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992), p. 10.

28. For example, the once-popular "perfect competition" model was used to show why capitalism fails in practice. But in the perfect competition model, there is no competition, since everyone is omniscient regarding the uses of scarce resources. See Israel Kirzner's criticisms of E. H. Chamberlin in Kirzner, Competition and Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), chaps. 3, 4.

29. The most widely known response was by Hayek in Economica (1940); reprinted in F. A. Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1949), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIEO>) The most detailed criticism was by the little-known economist, T. J. B. Hoff, Economic Calculation in the Socialist Society (London: William Hodge & Co., 1949). (<http://bit.ly/HoffCalc>)

30. Israel M. Kirzner, Perception, Opportunity, and Profit: Studies in the Theory of Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), pp. 4–5.

concept continually.³¹

D. Economic Theory vs. Ethical Value

Ethical value is publicly stripped of all authority in modern economic theory.³² Those few economists who have argued that value-free economic analysis is mythical have had almost no influence on the profession. If they have had any influence, this topic was not the area in which they established their reputations.³³ The one well-respected American economist who argued forcefully for the reintroduction of values into economic theory, Kenneth Boulding, was regarded as somewhat eccentric for promoting the idea that ethics should be incorporated into the tools of analysis.

Meanwhile, the use of high-level mathematics as a tool of theoretical analysis, especially since the days of Walras, reveals just how committed the economics profession is to arcane formulas. There is even an element of priestly ritual about this procedure. Liberal economist John Kenneth Galbraith, who spurned mathematics, formulas, and graphs throughout his career, once revealed a little-known side of the profession. The editors of the professional journals, which are the avenues of career advancement, play a game regarding the use of mathematics. "The layman may take comfort from the fact that the most esoteric of this material is not read by other economists or even by the editors who publish it. In the economics profession the editorship of a learned journal not specialized to econometrics or mathematical statistics is a position of only moderate prestige. It is accepted, moreover, that the editor must have a certain measure of practical judgment. This means that he is usually unable to read the most prestigious contributions which, nonetheless, he must publish. So it is the practice of the editor to associate with himself a mathematical curate who passes on this part of the work and whose word he takes. A certain embarrassed silence covers the arrangement."³⁴ Outsiders are unaware of the massive deception that is now endemic within the academic economics profession.

31. The Austrians invoke it occasionally, but only as a mental construct. Mises called it the evenly rotating economy (E.R.E.). He used it only to prove that the interest rate is a universal phenomenon. One exception to this refusal to invoke equilibrium is Kirzner's 1963 discussion of perfect competition, which he said is impossible to attain. This appeared in his out-of-print upper division economics textbook, Market Theory and the Price System, pp. 108–109. He never revised this book to incorporate his later studies of entrepreneurship. For a critique of the E.R.E., see Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), p. 449.

32. Walter A. Weisskopf, Alienation and Economics (New York: Dutton, 1971), ch. 4.

33. Robert Heilbroner is a good example. His popular book on the history of economic thought, The Worldly Philosophers, is a standard text in both history and economics departments. It was assigned by the millions. But his essay on the impossibility of value-free economics was not published in an economics journal. Robert L. Heilbroner, "Economics as a 'Value-free' Science," Social Research, XL (1973), pp. 129–43; reprinted in William L. Marr and Baldev Raj (eds.), How Economists Explain: A Reader in Methodology (Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1982). The publisher did not bother to typeset this volume. It was written on a typewriter.

E. Value Theory at an Epistemological Impasse

The attempt to create an economic science as devoid of value judgments or ethics as physics has led to a theoretical impasse. This impasse was first discussed in detail in the 1930s, but it is almost never mentioned today because it cannot be solved, given the presuppositions of modern economics. Economists in the 1870s³⁵ began to abandon classical economics' concept of objective economic value. They substituted individual value preferences for objective value. All economic value is imputed by individuals, modern economics insists.

If this is true, then in order to make any kind of policy recommendation, the economist must assume that the value preferences or value scales of individuals can be compared with each other. To say that a policy benefits a lot of people assumes that the economist can compare the value scales of all of these people, or at least a statistically valid sample of them (but how can we be sure it is valid?), as well as the value scales of those who are not benefitted by the policy. He must be able to total up benefits and costs. He must be able to aggregate individual value preferences. But this is impossible to do. There can be no scientifically valid interpersonal comparison of subjective value. This was Lionel Robbins' conclusion in 1932,³⁶ and while he partially recanted in 1938, he did not explain why he had been incorrect in 1932.³⁷

34. John Kenneth Galbraith, Economics Peace and Laughter (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1971), p. 41n.

35. William Jevons, Carl Menger, and Léon Walras. Cf. Karl Pribram, A History of Economic Reasoning (Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983), Part VI.

36. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, 1932), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

37. On his debate with Sir Roy Harrod in 1938, see North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5:C:1. Cf. Mark A. Lutz and Kenneth Lux, The Challenge of Humanistic Eco-

There is no common scale of values in human action, economic or otherwise. There is no value scale. Scales are physical devices used by physicists and chemists. An idea of a “scale of values” is at best a useful teaching device. It is not only mythical, it is misleading if it is associated with actual measurement. It makes economics sound like a physical science. Individual value preferences can be ranked; they cannot be measured.³⁸ As for social value, it has no role to play in a science that denies that it is possible to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. The problem, however, is that the concept of social value plays an enormous role in economics. Indeed, economics as a social science is inconceivable apart from the concept of social value. Economics without a concept of social value would be like physics without a concept of mass.

The quest for a value-free economic science is ultimately the quest for man’s autonomy from God and His law. It is a quest for meaning apart from “thou shalt not.” The socialist economist is less likely to indulge in this quest than the free market economist is, since he invokes the benefits and legitimacy of social justice despite all socialist economies’ declining economic output. There are “higher values” than “mere statistical output,” he insists. The state must redistribute resources in order to benefit the oppressed or whichever the favored group is. Theoretically speaking, a strictly value-free free market economist cannot respond to the socialist by appealing to the free market’s measurable efficiency and growth without violating the principle of individually imputed value. There can be no scientifically valid measure of aggregate economic value, so there is no way to measure economic efficiency.³⁹

This admission would undermine all discussions by economists of government economic policy. Neither the socialist economists nor the free market economists want to see this happen. To have lots of people understand that economists as scientists must remain mute in all gov-nomics (Menlo Park, California: Benjamin/Cummings, 1979), pp. 83–87. These two authors were as little known as their publisher.

38. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), p. 258. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>) ernment policy matters is not in the economists' personal self-interest. They might lose their jobs.

39. Murray N. Rothbard, “Comment: The Myth of Efficiency,” in Mario Rizzo (ed.), Time, Uncertainty, and Disequilibrium (Lexington, Massachusetts: Lexington Books, 1979), p. 90. Cf. Gary North, The Coase Theorem: A Study in Economic Epistemology (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gncoase>)

The economist pretends to pull a rabbit (a policy recommendation) out of an empty hat (value-free economics). But he put the rabbit in the hat before he went on stage. He has definite value preferences. His economic analysis will reflect this fact. He will defend or attack this or that government policy in terms of his preferences. He cannot do this as a scientist, given the impossibility of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. He does so as a self-interested propagandist who pretends to be a neutral scientist for the sake of being taken seriously by policy makers and voters. This kind of magic is prestidigitation. It is based on manipulation and illusion. Sometimes I think the primary victims of this illusion are the economists themselves, most of whom seem blissfully unaware of the epistemological subterfuge they are promoting.

F. The Trinity and Imputation of Value

Without the presupposition of an omniscient God who imputes value subjectively in terms of a scale of values, a God who can measure value scales and make interpersonal comparisons of men's subjective utility, there can be no economic science. Modern economic science rests unofficially on the assumption of collective value scales and preferences, and also their measurability, even though officially economists deny their existence. Economists must assume what they officially deny.

There must be socially objective value and a socially objective value scale if there is a legitimate economic evaluation of social policy. There must be a value scale undergirding every evaluation; that is what "evaluate" means. God's judgments are objective in the sense of being both eternal and historical. He brings visible judgments in terms of His law. These judgments are both objectively grounded and subjectively grounded in the fixed moral character of God: "For I am the LORD, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed" (Mal. 3:6).⁴⁰ God knows objectively whatever He knows subjectively, and vice versa. In Him, both subjective value and objective value reside. They reside there personally, for God is personal.

40. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (James 1:17).

A corollary to the doctrine of God as an imputing agent is this: if individual men were not made in God's image, imputing value in a creaturely fashion, there could be no economic science. Men can impute value only because God has already done so. An individual can make useful estimates of social costs and benefits only because God makes precise calculations of social costs and benefits.

Finally, there is this corollary: if men were not able to impute value corporately, even as the Triune God of the Bible imputes value corporately, there could be no social theory, including economic theory. There could be no epistemological basis for policy formation. Societies can make judgments corporately because God does. The doctrine of the Trinity is the foundation of social theory.

This is all denied by the modern economist. Economics has adopted the confession of the magician, not in the sense of invoking the supernatural, but in the sense of attributing wealth-creation to value-free techniques governed by formulas. The socialist invokes state planning; the free market economist invokes private property. Both deny that wealth is the product of obedience to God's laws. >From economics, the original social science,⁴¹ has come the confessional model of all the others: "There is no necessary and sufficient god but man, either individual or collective."

The right-wing Enlightenment began with the English Whigs' political protests against a state-established church, but the concept of an evolving autonomous social order was first articulated by the Scottish common-sense rationalists in the mid-eighteenth century. They described society as the result of human action but not of human design.⁴² This model later served Erasmus Darwin and his grandson Charles as the model of biological evolution.⁴³

The Scots' social model was a kind of secularized Presbyterianism: a bottom-up appeals court system. It was paralleled by Continental left-wing Enlightenment social theory, whose model was secularized Jesuitism: a top-down authoritarian order. Scottish moral philosophy replaced theology (eighteenth century). Then political economy replaced moral philosophy (nineteenth century). Finally, economics replaced political economy (twentieth century). With each step, economics has moved further away from any concept of a divinely sanctioned moral order.

41. Political philosophy, as distinguished from political science, began its march into atheism with Machiavelli. But Machiavelli had no explicitly scientific pretensions.

42. F. A. Hayek, "The Results of Human Action but not of Human Design" (1967), in Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), ch. 6.

43. The influence here was David Hume. Hayek, "The Legal and Political Philosophy of David Hume" (1963), ibid., p. 119n.

Conclusion

Man lives in a world of imputed meaning, for he is a creature under God. God imputes original meaning and value to the creation. Man is God's subordinate, required by God to think his own thoughts after Him, in a law-abiding, creaturely manner. But this is both too much and too little for covenant-breaking man. He wants to be less than the image of God and more than the agent of God. If he is God's image, he is responsible to God. He wants autonomy from God; so, he subordinates himself to nature instead. Rejecting God's law as a guide to human action, he finds himself entrapped by impersonal forces, which are in turn governed by (or are they merely revealed by?) impersonal formulas. Covenant-breaking man seeks out formulas as the pathways to wealth and power. Some people prefer astrological formulas; others prefer statistical averages. Fate or chance or an impersonal mixture of the two: Which will it be? "Get your bets down, gentlemen. The window is about to close."

But why do any of these formulas work? Consider mathematics, the most popular source of power-granting formulas in our day. Men master the discipline of mathematics in order to understand and control their world, rarely pausing to contemplate the utter unreasonableness of the fact that a mental construct that is governed exclusively by its own rules of logic nevertheless applies in so many powerful ways to the operations of the external world.⁴⁴

Economics allows the use of higher mathematics as a tool of theoretical analysis only where equilibrium conditions exist, i.e., where one or more men are presumed to be omniscient. "Ye shall be as gods" is the applicable phrase here. Every other use of mathematics in economics is either a simplified hypothetical example of price ratios for the sake of teaching or else statistics applied to historical data. Yet modern economics is overwhelmingly mathematical in its formal presentations, as a survey of any three professional journals will prove (within a statistically acceptable range or error, of course) to skeptical readers.

44. Eugene Wigner, "The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences," Communications on Pure and Applied Mathematics, 13 (1960), pp. 1–14. Wigner won the Nobel Prize in physics. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>)

Modern economics, the original strictly humanistic social science, cannot avoid these humanist antinomies. For example, in seeking autonomy from God, modern economists propose a world in which only individuals impute value to the creation. But then they find that these autonomous imputations cannot be aggregated: no common measure exists. It is impossible to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. So, policy-making on a scientific basis must logically be abandoned. But the economist does not want to abandon either science or policy-making, especially government policy-making, where the power is, or seems to be. So, he refuses to think about the logic of his position.

The economics profession is becoming ever more self-conscious in its quest for analytical tools that abandon any trace of ethics. Some economists are even bothered by the traditional concept of choice.⁴⁵ They may adopt indifference curves as a way to avoid the more psychological, and therefore more scientifically suspect, concept of utility. But if acting man is truly indifferent between two possible outcomes, how can he choose? Will he stand motionless, like Buridan's ass, until the threat of deprivation pressures him to take action, at which point he abandons his indifference?⁴⁶

Economists adopt cost curves, supply curves, all kinds of curves. But a curve is made up of infinitesimal points. Prices and quantities are described by curves as changing in infinitesimally small moves. Infinitesimal changes are not aspects of decision-making. But curves are subject to the calculus, which for the modern economist is surely a more important explanatory tool than human action is.

Economists rest their case for economics as a science on theoretical constructs that assume that man is omniscient. But there is no human choice in a world in which man knows outcomes; there are only responses.⁴⁷ Economists invoke complex mathematical formulas in their quest for knowledge and influence, while abandoning the idea of rational human choice. Armen Alchian, a free market economist of the 45. Most notable is Armen Alchian: "Uncertainty, Evolution, and Economic Theory" (1950), in The Collected Works of Armen Alchian, 2 vols. (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Fund, 2006), I, pp. 3–17.

46. Murray N. Rothbard, "Toward a Reconstruction of Utility and Welfare Economics," in On Freedom and Free Enterprise: Essays in Honor of Ludwig von Mises, ed. Mary Sennholz (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1956), p. 238. (<http://bit.ly/On-Freedom>)

47. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 249. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

Chicago School, writes: "The essential point is that individual motivation and foresight, while sufficient, are not necessary" for economic theory to be true.⁴⁸

Step by step, humanistic economics is abandoning man. Economics substitutes a behaviorist concept of man for the decision-maker who inhabits the real world. Man disappears in the world of simultaneous equations. God is not mocked . . . not at zero price, anyway.

48. Alchian, "Uncertainty, Evolution and Economic Theory," in Alchian, Economic Forces at Work, p. 27.

Appendix B

INDIVIDUALISM, HOLISM, AND COVENANTALISM

And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied. . . (Deut. 8:13).

The language of mathematics infuses Moses' discussion of Israel's blessings. This language points to objective wealth: the multiplication of valuable things. This raises a problem for economic theory. How is value measured? How is wealth measured? If value is objective, it can be measured, but modern economic theory officially places the individual's subjective valuation—economic imputation—at the heart of its theory of value. Subjective evaluations cannot be measured, even by those who make these evaluations. There is no objective value scale, either personally or interpersonally. Yet modern economists have been obsessed with the intellectual challenge of establishing reliable indexes of national wealth, prices, and corporate social utility. They have persuaded governments around the world to spend billions of dollars to collect economic data from private citizens and firms. In fact, this data collection has justified the establishment of government economic planning. Without statistics, government planners could not claim the ability to plan the economy.¹

Humanist economic theory has been unable to resolve the dichotomy between subjective value and objective value.² If value is imputed

1. Murray N. Rothbard, "The Politics of Political Economists: Comment," Quarterly Journal of Economics, 74 (Nov. 1960). Rothbard, "Fact-finding is a proper function of government," Clichés of Politics, ed. Mark Spangler (Irvington, New York: Foundation for Economic Education, 1994). The essay was first published in The Freeman in June, 1961: "Statistics: Achilles' Heel of Government." Cf. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 2, section on "Statistics and Government Planning."

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch.5. Cf. North, Authority and Domin-

subjectively by an individual, it is impossible for another individual to measure objectively this value. In fact, it is impossible for the first individual to impute cardinal numbers to his own valuation. He can only establish an ordinal ranking of values: first, second, third, etc. As Rothbard wrote,

It is important to realize that there is never any possibility of measuring increases or decreases in happiness or satisfaction. Not only is it impossible to measure or compare changes in the satisfaction of different people; it is not possible to measure changes in the happiness of any given person. In order for any measurement to be possible, there must be an eternally fixed objectively given unit with which other units may be compared. There is no such objective unit in the field of human valuation. The individual must determine subjectively for himself whether he is better or worse off as a result of any change. His preference can only be expressed in terms of simple choice, or rank. . . . There is no possible unit of happiness that can be used for purposes of comparison, and hence of addition or multiplication. Thus, values cannot be measured; values or utilities cannot be added, subtracted, or multiplied. They can only be ranked as better or worse.³

If this is true, then it is scientifically impossible to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. This was Lionel Robbins' assertion in 1932.⁴ But if he was correct, then it is impossible for economists as scientists to make policy recommendations based on the superiority of one outcome to another. Roy Harrod pointed this out in a 1938 essay.⁵ Robbins then capitulated, announcing that he did accept the legitimacy of idea of economic policy-making.⁶ He never reconciled his two positions.⁷ So far, neither has anyone else.

This is the problem of epistemological subjectivism and policy-making. It applies to every social science, not just economics. It is more obvious in economics, however. The economics profession sys-ion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1990] 2012), pp. 1093–1100. ??? (App. D:e)

3. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), pp. 18–19.

4. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science (New York: St. Martins, 1932), p. 140. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

5. R. F. Harrod, "Scope and Method of Economics," Economic Journal, XLVIII (1938), pp. 396–97.

6. Lionel Robbins, "Interpersonal Comparisons of Utility: A Comment," ibid. (1938), p. 637–39.

7. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5:C:1.

tematically avoids discussing it. Economists dearly love their role as policy experts. They do not want to admit to their students, let alone to the general public, that the foundations of modern economics make such a role scientifically fraudulent.

B. Welfare Economics, Ethics, and Subjectivism

Whether we use the language of multiplication or the language of social utility, we are dealing with collectives. If we use such terminology to assert an increase in social wealth, we are aggregating individual utilities. But this procedure is illegitimate if economic value is exclusively subjective. Thus, we cannot move scientifically from the individual to the group on the basis of economic analysis. Conclusion: there is no such thing as scientific welfare economics.

1. Rothbard on Welfare Economics

Rothbard attempted to make this move in a 1956 essay. First, he denied the existence of total utility. "We must conclude then that there is no such thing as total utility; all utilities are marginal."⁸ Second, he announced: "The problem of 'welfare economics' has always been to find some way to circumvent this restriction on economics, and to make ethical, and particularly political, statements directly."⁹ Third, he stated that all ethical issues are imported from outside the discipline of economics.¹⁰ Fourth, he asserted that all economic advising denies the ethical neutrality dictum.¹¹ Then how can an economist make any statement regarding social welfare? Only on one basis: if any change increases at least one person's utility and has not reduced any other person's utility. This is Pareto's unanimity rule.

There is one overwhelming objection to this rule: the existence of envy. If one person is made richer by some change in the economy, and another person resents this outcome, the benefit to the first person may be offset by the negative feelings of the second. Rothbard in 1956 acknowledged this as a theoretical problem, but then he dismissed it. Envy is strictly internal; it does not lead to action, and only action counts. "How do we know that this hypothetical envious one

8. Murray N. Rothbard, "Toward a Reconstruction of Utility and Welfare Economics," in Mary Sennholz (ed.), On Freedom and Free Enterprise: Essays in Honor of Ludwig von Mises (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1956), p. 234.

9. Ibid., p. 244.

10. Ibid., p. 247.

11. Ibid., p. 248.

loses in utility because of the exchanges of others? Consulting his verbal opinions does not suffice, for his proclaimed envy might be a joke or a literary game or a deliberate lie.”¹² Conclusion: “We are led inexorably, then, to the conclusion that the processes of the free market always lead to a gain in social utility. And we can say this with absolute validity as economists, without engaging in ethical judgments.”¹³ So, there is an aggregate called social utility after all. We can postulate an increase in social utility whenever we can identify a voluntary exchange: two people are better off, and no one else is worse off, just so long as there is no such thing as envy. Rothbard imported an aggregate into his analysis, as all welfare economists must, and with welfare economics comes ethics—the end of value-free economics.

Unfortunately for the acceptability of this thesis, Rothbard later wrote a classic essay in 1971 on the importance of envy in society, especially as the basis of socialism.¹⁴ By moving envy out of the realm of the merely hypothetical into the realm of the politically significant, Rothbard undermined his reconstruction of welfare economics. Envy does exist after all in the world of demonstrated preferences; it is a major foundation of socialism. Therefore, the economist who uses some version of Pareto’s analysis—at least two market participants are better off, while no one is worse off—in order to prove an increase in social utility yet without invoking ethics, is deluding himself. He has imported ethics into economic analysis the moment the issue of envy is introduced. He has assumed that envy is ethically illegitimate and therefore cannot legitimately be used to criticize that libertarian version of welfare economics which supposedly enables an economist to assert an increase of social utility based on the existence of voluntary exchanges. Ethics, in short, becomes determinative in “value-free” economic science. This hostility to envy as a legitimate aspect of economic analysis rests on an ethical foundation.

2. Kirzner on Welfare Economics

Three decades later, Israel Kirzner—a disciple of Mises and also a

12. Ibid., p. 250.

13. Idem.

14. Rothbard, “Freedom, Inequality and the Division of Labor,” Modern Age (Summer 1971); reprinted in Kenneth Templeton (ed.), The Politicalization of Society (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyPress, 1978), pp. 83–126. The essay was also reprinted as a monograph by the Mises Institute, Auburn, Alabama. (<http://www.mises.org/fipan-dol.asp>)

rabbi of Orthodox Judaism¹⁵—profusely praised Rothbard’s 1956 essay for its rejection of aggregates. “To attempt to aggregate utility is not merely to violate the tenets of methodological individualism and subjectivism (by treating the sensations of different individuals as being able to be added up); it is also to engage in an entirely meaningless exercise: economic analysis has nothing to say about sensations, it deals strictly with choices and their interpersonal implications.”¹⁶

Kirzner rejected the idea of “Pareto optimality” because “a Pareto optimal move is considered to advance the well-being of society—considered as a whole.”¹⁷ He was correct; this is exactly what Pareto optimality implies. But Rothbard’s essay rested on Pareto optimality: two people being better off and no one else (except the envious, who were dismissed by definition) worse off. Kirzner completely missed the fundamental point—a highly non-individualistic point—of Rothbard’s essay: social utility is an aggregate, and this aggregate can be said to increase only because of Pareto optimality. In the essay following Kirzner’s, I set forth these challenges to Rothbard:

If the economist cannot make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility . . . as Rothbard insists, then how can he be certain that “the free market maximizes social utility”?¹⁸ What is “social utility” in an epistemological world devoid of interpersonal aggregates?

If “in human action there are no quantitative constants,”¹⁹ and therefore no index number is legitimate,²⁰ then how can we say that monetary inflation produces price inflation? What is price inflation without an index number? What is an index number without interpersonal aggregation?

If we cannot define “social utility,” or price inflation, then how can we know that “money, in contrast to all other useful commodit-

15. Economist Aaron Levine has referred to Kirzner as “Rabbi Dr. Israel Kirzner, Talmudist extraordinaire. . . .” Levine, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law: Aspects of Jewish Business Ethics (New York: KTAV, 1980), p. xi.

16. Israel M. Kirzner, “Welfare Economics: A Modern Austrian Perspective,” in Walter Block and Llewellyn H. Rockwell, Jr. (eds.), Man, Economy, and Liberty: Essays in Honor of Murray N. Rothbard (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, 1988), p. 79. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMEL>)

17. Idem.

18. Rothbard, Power and Market: Government and the Economy (Menlo Park, California: Institute for Humane Studies, 1970), p. 13. Reprinted in Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, p. 1065.

19. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, p. 845.

20. Ibid., pp. 845–46.

ies employed in production or consumption, does not confer a social benefit when its supply increases"?²¹ How can we legitimately say anything about the aggregate entity, "social benefit"?²²

Kirzner understood that these aggregates are illegitimate from the point of view of methodological subjectivism, and he refrained from arguing publicly as an economist for any social policy throughout his career. He saw that, in terms of pure subjectivism in economics, to discuss the concept of social choice is "to engage in a metaphor."²³ "To choose, presupposes an integrated framework of ends and means; without such a presumed framework allocative choice is hardly a coherent notion at all."²⁴

Such a statement identifies Kirzner as a very precise follower of Mises and a less precise follower of Moses. Without the concept of aggregate, corporate social curses and blessings, there can be no national covenant between God and His people. Without the idea of a series of corporate covenants there could be neither Judaism nor Christianity. The covenants of Israel were judicially objective. To demonstrate this objectivity, God provided objective economic blessings that were visible to anyone who looked at the evidence.

And because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them, and brought thee out in his sight with his mighty power out of Egypt; To drive out nations from before thee greater and mightier than thou art, to bring thee in, to give thee their land for an inheritance, as it is this day. Know therefore this day, and consider it in thine heart, that the LORD he is God in heaven above, and upon the earth beneath: there is none else (Deut. 4:37–39).

And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full (Deut. 6:10–11).

21. Rothbard, "The Case for a 100% Gold Dollar," in Leland B. Yeager (ed.), In Search of a Monetary Constitution (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1962), p. 121.

22. Gary North, "Why Murray Rothbard Will Never Win the Nobel Prize!" in Man, Economy, and Liberty, p. 105.

23. Kirzner, "Welfare Economics," p. 80.

24. Ibid., p. 81.

The LORD shall establish thee an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, and walk in his ways. And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the LORD; and they shall be afraid of thee. And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD swore unto thy fathers to give thee. The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow (Deut. 28:9–12).

The consistent methodological subjectivist refuses to see with his own eyes. He does not acknowledge the scientific relevance of either corporate blessings or corporate cursings. This was Israel's problem in Isaiah's day.

Also I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I; send me. And he said, Go, and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed. Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate, And the LORD have removed men far away, and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land (Isa. 6:8–12).

Such blindness is judicial blindness. God blinds men so that they cannot see with their own eyes. Judicial blindness is a mark of His covenantal curse. Men interpret what they see in terms of what they believe, and what covenant-breakers believe is that God does not bring corporate, objective, measurable, covenantal sanctions in history.

Kirzner rejected classical economics in the name of subjectivism. He therefore rejected biblical economics in the name of subjectivism. For methodological subjectivism, there is no such thing as national wealth, economically speaking, for there is no collective. If nation A is devastated by a plague, leaving behind only one alcoholic survivor who now owns the contents of every liquor store in the nation, while nation B has not suffered such a plague, there is no way for a subjectivist economist to say which nation is now better off. The alcoholic is clearly a happy man. Who is to say scientifically that the collective joy of nation

B, which avoided the plague, is greater than the collective joy of nation A, i.e., the drunk who is feeling no pain? There is no such thing as collective joy, says the methodological subjectivist. In Kirzner's words, "economic analysis has nothing to say about sensations." Contrast this with Moses' economic analysis: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17).²⁵ Moses spoke this to the assembled nation, not to a private individual.

Moses was raising the question that fascinated Adam Smith: the origin of the wealth of nations. Kirzner dismissed this whole question as epistemologically misguided.

During the period of classical economics it was, of course, taken for granted that a society was economically successful strictly insofar as it succeeded in achieving increased wealth. Adam Smith's Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations expressed this approach to the economics of welfare simply and typically. It was taken for granted that a given percentage increase in a nation's physical wealth (with wealth often seen as consisting of bushels of 'corn') meant a similar percentage increase in the nation's well-being. From this perspective a physical measure of a nation's wealth provides an index of that nation's economic success, regardless of its distribution. A bushel of wheat is a bushel of wheat. Clearly this notion of welfare offends the principles of methodological individualism and subjectivism; it was swept away by the marginalist (subjectivist) revolution of the late nineteenth century.²⁶

But Smith's perception of objective national wealth was closer to the covenantal wisdom of the Bible than radical subjectivism is.²⁷

25. Chapter 21.

26. Kirzner, "Welfare Economics," p. 78.

27. The phrase "radical subjectivism" is Ludwig Lachmann's. He claimed in 1982 that radical subjectivism "inspired the Austrian revival of the 1970s. . . ." Ludwig M. Lachmann, "Ludwig von Mises and the Extension of Subjectivism," in Israel M. Kirzner (ed.), Method, Process, and Austrian Economics: Essays in Honor of Ludwig von Mises (Lexington, Massachusetts: Lexington Books, 1982), p. 37. Lachmann was being simultaneously overly modest and overly arrogant. It was his lectures in defense of radical subjectivism at the 1974 South Royalton, Vermont, conference (which I attended) that split the Austrian movement into the Rothbardian and Lachmanian camps. Radical subjectivism was surely an aspect of the revival of Austrian economics, for it split the movement into two irreconcilable factions. Radical subjectivism was hardly basis of Austrianism's revival. Lachmann also invoked the economics of "Shackle, the master subjectivist" (p. 38). But Shackle was never an Austrian School economist. Lachmann pretended otherwise. See Lachmann, "From Mises to Shackle: An Essay on Austrian Economics and the Kaleidic Society," Journal of Economic Literature, XIV

By stripping all traces of objective value theory out of economics, radical subjectivism produces an intellectual world of sustained incoherence. A handful of academic economists have trained themselves to dismiss the visibly obvious as epistemologically irrelevant.²⁸ Their academic peers do not go along with them, but they also do not offer refutations of this epistemological nihilism that are based on epistemological subjectivism/individualism.

B. Dualism: Objective vs. Subjective Economics

I am not speaking here of Kant's dualism between the realm of man's mind and the realm of physical causation.²⁹ Mises, as a good Kantian, acknowledged the legitimacy of this dualism.³⁰ I am speaking here of the dualism between aggregative, objective value theory and individualistic, subjective value theory.

The epistemological problem with all forms of welfare economics and all forms of economic policy-making is the problem of reconciling aggregative values or preferences, whose existence is denied by extreme economic individualists, yet also invoked by them at some point, and subjective values, which are dismissed as morally peripheral by methodological holists, but which are also invoked by them at some point. This topic is avoided like the plague within the economics profession, since there has never been a widely agreed-upon humanistic solution to this dualism.

1. Indeterminacy

The methodological individualist moves epistemologically toward complete indeterminacy. There is no explainable continuity between the external world and the world of subjective evaluation. The momentary subjective states of the individual are said to lose contact with the external world and even with his own previous subjective states.³¹

(March 1976). In the history of economic thought, G. L. S. Shackle is the most consistent defender of Kant's noumenalism as an economic methodology. I regard Kirzner's theory of entrepreneurship as Lachmanian.

28. In short, says the economist, "Your facts cannot be sustained by economic theory."

29. Richard Kroner, Kant's Weltanschauung (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1914] 1956).

30. Ludwig von Mises, Theory and History: An Interpretation of Social and Economic Evolution (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1957), p. 1.(<http://bit.ly/MisesTAH>)

31 31. Lachmann wrote: "The human mind can, it is true, transcend the present

This epistemological indeterminacy was named by the radical subjectivist economist, Ludwig Lachmann: kaleidic perceptualism. He self-consciously invoked as his image of society the child's toy, the kaleidoscope.³² A kaleidoscope is a tube that uses mirrors to produce ever-changing, unrepeatable, visually fascinating, and conceptually meaningless patterns out of shifting, colored pieces of glass.

For Lachmann, and also for Kirzner, it is illegitimate to speak of national economic growth or per capita economic growth.³³ Yet Mises argued to the contrary: "Saving, capital accumulation, is the agency that has transformed step by step the awkward search for food on the part of savage cave dwellers into modern ways of industry."³⁴ For the radical subjectivist, it is illogical to argue that an increase in per capita capital leads to greater per capita wealth. Per capita capital is "a wholly artificial construct," wrote Kirzner.³⁵ Yet Mises argued: "There is but one means available to improve the material conditions of mankind: to accelerate the growth of capital accumulated as against the growth in population. The greater the amount of capital invested per head of the worker, the more and the better goods can be produced and consumed."³⁶ Mises' original radical subjectivism has run aground on the shoals of a far more radical subjectivism. The result of pure subjectivism is the end of meaning, not just for economics but for human thought in general. It destroys continuity: through time and between individuals.

2. Central Planning

In contrast, the methodological holist moves toward central planning in imagination and memory, but the moment-in-being remains nevertheless always self-contained and solitary. . . . It follows that it is impossible to compare human actions undertaken at different moments in time." Ludwig M. Lachmann, Capital, Expectations, and the Market Process (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, 1977), p. 83.

32. Ludwig Lachmann, "An Austrian Stocktaking: Unsettled Questions and Tentative Answers," in Louis Spadaro (ed.), New Directions in Austrian Economics (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, 1978), p. 7. This book might well have been titled Kaleidic Developments in Austrian Economics, or perhaps The Epistemological Breakdown of Austrian Economics.

33. Ludwig Lachmann, Capital and Its Structure (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, 1977), p. 37.

34. Ludwig von Mises, The Anti-Capitalist Mentality (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1956), p. 39. (<http://bit.ly/MisesAnti>)

35. Israel M. Kirzner, An Essay on Capital (New York: Augustus Kelly, 1966), p. 120.

36. Mises, Anti-Capitalist Mentality, p. 5.

ning. The concept of social goods and social evils implies a single planning mind and a single standard of good and evil. This is what alienates the individualists. They want to preserve human freedom; the holist wants to improve the human condition systematically, meaning through central planning and coercion. The individualist does not trust the state; the holist does not trust the free market. The individualist rejects state compulsion; the holist rejects social and even personal indeterminacy, which radical subjectivists such as Lachmann preach with fervor. The individualist wants the consumer to be sovereign; the holist wants the voter or bureaucrat to be sovereign. The individualist defends the sovereignty of individual plans; the holist defends the sovereignty of the state's plan.

The individualist proclaims faith in the rationality of the market and its ability to improve the human condition. He then denies the epistemological legitimacy of any objective unit of measurement that would allow an outside observer to assess such improvement. In contrast, the holist proclaims faith in the rationality of the state and its ability to improve the human condition. He then denies the appropriateness of any unit of measurement that points to the failure of central planning to deliver the goods. Denying the relevance of socialism's objective failure, he proclaims his faith in intangible socialist goods that provide dignity and meaning in socialism's world of stagnant or declining economic output. Both the individualist and the holist seek justification in a hypothetical realm of the spirit—Kant's noumenal realm—which lies outside the domain of objective measurement, i.e., Kant's phenomenal realm. In search of meaning, members of both schools of economic thought flee to the zone of man's indeterminate subjective freedom: Kant's noumenal realm. The holist seeks justification for his views in terms of the collective "quality of life," which cannot be scientifically measured. The individualist seeks justification for his views in terms of the individually perceived productivity of the entrepreneurial flash of insight, which cannot be measured, taught, or even described scientifically.³⁷

37. Kirzner's entrepreneurial "ah, ha," alertness, or hunch is the premier example of this flight to the noumenal in search of explanations. He called entrepreneurial alertness "the instant of an entrepreneurial leap of faith. . . ." Kirzner, Perception, Opportunity, and Profit: Studies in the Theory of Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), p. 163. This moment of discovery is beyond the constraints of logical cause and effect. "Once the entrepreneurial element in human action is perceived, one can no longer interpret the decision as merely calculative—capable in principle of being yielded by mechanical manipulation of the 'data' or already com-

C. Resolution: Methodological Covenantalism

The methodological covenantalist finds the solution to these inherent and permanent dualisms in the concept of a sovereign, omniscient God. God has a plan. He matches ends and means. He issues a decree for history, and this decree will be fulfilled. "And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing; and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" (Dan. 4: 35). The presupposition of a sovereign God replaces the presupposition of sovereign man.

To the extent that men think God's thought after Him, they adopt God's standards—His hierarchy of legitimate ends—with respect to their lives. God enables people to coordinate their plans through human action because His decree and plan are above theirs. "A man's heart deviseth his way: but the LORD directeth his steps" (Prov. 16: 9). "The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will" (Prov. 21:1). In Joseph's words to his brothers, who had sold him into slavery, "But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive" (Gen. 50:20). God's law-order provides the framework of productive coordination, in economics as in other areas of life. His sanctions in history provide both the incentives and disincentives that confirm His covenant law.

The methodological individualist does not begin with the methodological covenantalist's presupposition of an omniscient God. Such a God would thwart the individualist's autonomy. Neither does the methodological holist begin with God; he begins with some substitute source of planning and accurate information, most commonly the state. The idea of cosmic personalism is foreign to humanistic economics.³⁸ Economics since the late seventeenth century has been self-consciously agnostic,³⁹ i.e., militantly atheistic with a thin veneer of humility for academic propriety's sake. The result is epistemological chaos, which is concealed from public view, even from the occasionally pletely implied in these data." Kirzner, Competition and Entrepreneurship (University of Chicago Press, 1973), p. 35. He spoke of the entrepreneur's "propensity to sense what prices are realistically available to him" (p. 40). The essence of this sense is that it is beyond calculation, i.e., beyond Kant's phenomenal realm.

38. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 1.

39. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: M.I.T. Press, 1963).

inquisitive eyes of graduate students, by a kind of embarrassed silence. Should anyone enquire about this epistemological dualism, he will be assured that such matters are irrelevant to what economists do. And what do economists do? Economics. Then what is economics? Whatever economists do. (These definitions were offered, respectively, by Jacob Viner and Frank Knight.)

Conclusion

The Bible's objective language of national wealth undermines methodological individualism. But rarely do methodological individualists pursue their position to its logical conclusion. The language of statistical averages and price indexes is common to most methodological individualists.

Because biblical cosmic personalism is true, there can be a resolution to the philosophical problem of the seeming contradiction between subjective and objective knowledge. In economics, this contradiction is seen most clearly in the debates over objective and subjective value. The Bible's objective value theory is grounded in the objective Person of God—His declarations, standards, and evaluations. God's subjective declaration of value to His objective creation—"it is good"—and His objective declarations of blessings and cursings in history indicate that subjectivism and objectivism are correlative. They are grounded in the objective character of God's subjective declarations. The mind of man is capable of making objective evaluations of external conditions because his mind reflects God's mind. He is made in God's image. His evaluations become progressively accurate as they approach God's evaluations as a limit. He thinks God's thought after Him.

There is corporate wealth. Men can subjectively perceive objective differences between rich and poor nations, rich and poor corporations, and rich and poor governments. I can remember being challenged verbally by Mises in the fall of 1971 to defend my statement that we can make objectively meaningful comparisons between subjectively perceived human conditions. I said, "It is better to be rich and healthy than it is to be poor and sick." He said, "Yes, that's so." This was not a great philosophical exchange, but it got to the point. That point was not noumenal.

Appendix C

SYNCRETISM, PLURALISM, AND EMPIRE

And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things: and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise. And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potters' clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay. And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken. And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay. And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure (Dan. 2:40–45).

Daniel's prophecy to Babylon's Nebuchadnezzar foretold the rise of a series of empires. The last worldwide political empire would be Rome's. It would break apart. It would be replaced by a new empire, a new world order: the church, the stone cut from the mountain made without hands. There is no political empire capable of replacing the church as the basis of an integrated world order. Every self-proclaimed new world order will fail.

In our day, we have seen two rival claimants to the throne of empire, each claiming to be a builder of a New World Order: international Communism and Western humanism. Soviet Communism visibly collapsed in 1991. Today, Western humanists believe that they are capable of putting together an international order based on free trade, central banking, currency manipulation, and international bureaucratic agencies with the power to control the legal framework of international production. This ideal, like the ideal of Communism, will smash on the rocks of economic efficiency. This ideal is built on faith in political controls, which today means faith in central banking, taxation, and computers.¹

A. A Common Pantheon

The strategy of the ancient empires was syncretism: the fusion of competing religious faiths. It still is, but today it is called pluralism. The idols of the conquered cities could be brought into the pantheon of the empire's gods. This was Rome's strategy. Local idols lost their exclusivity when they entered the empire's pantheon. Rome sought to maintain the regional authority of the gods of the classical city-state by incorporating them into the Roman pantheon. By honoring the geographical significance of local deities, Rome sought to subordinate them all to the pantheon itself, i.e., to the empire. The Roman pantheon ("all gods"), manifested politically by the genius and later the divinity of the emperor, universalized the implied divinity of the classical city-state.

It was the exclusivity and universalism of the God of the Bible that identified Jews and Christians as politically untrustworthy and even revolutionary subjects. They refused to worship either the genius or the divinity of the Roman emperor. They would not acknowledge the authority of the Roman empire's pantheon of gods. They would not acknowledge the God of the Bible as just one more regional god among many. The God of the Bible, they insisted, was above the creation and outside it. This confession was revolutionary in ancient Rome. Rushdoony explained why:

The essence of the ancient city-state, polis, and empire was that it constituted the continuous unity of the gods and men, of the divine and the human, and the unity of all being. There was thus no possible independence in society for any constituent aspect. Every element of society was a part of the all-absorbing one. Against this, Christianity asserted the absolute division of the human and the divine. Even in the incarnation of Christ, the human and the divine were in union without confusion, as Chalcedon [451 A.D.] so powerfully defined it. Thus, divinity was withdrawn from human society and returned to the heavens and to God. No human order or institution could claim divinity and thereby claim to represent total and final order. By divinizing the world, Christianity placed all created orders, including church and state, under God.²

1. The international financial crisis that began in late 2008 has yet to be resolved.

The Roman Empire could not coexist with Christianity. The Roman authorities recognized this fact over two centuries before the Christians did. While Christians were honest, hard-working, peace-loving citizens, they were necessarily the enemies of pagan Rome. Their God would not submit; He ordered His people not to submit. The Christians sought peace through religious pluralism, but Rome sought dominion through syncretism: the absorption of all religions into the religion of empire. Syncretism is the enemy of orthodoxy. Political pluralism—the equal authority (little or none) in civil law of all supernatural gods—is a grand illusion. But Christian believers generally have not yet recognized in political pluralism the syncretism that underlies it and the humanistic empire which is pluralism's long-term goal.³

Christians under Roman rule called for religious toleration—the right not to worship the emperor as a condition of citizenship or even resident alien status—but Rome's authorities knew better. They recognized what early Christians refused to acknowledge, namely, that the God of the Bible recognizes no other gods, rejects syncretism, and therefore calls for the subordination of culture to Him and His Bible-revealed law. Rome recognized early that pluralism is a politically convenient short-term illusion and a long-run impossibility. There would either be a judicially impotent Christian establishment under the authority of a political priesthood or else covenant religion would govern the nation's political oath of allegiance. The result of this early recognition was Rome's intermittent persecution of Christians for almost three centuries, followed by the fall of Rome and the inheritance of Rome's infrastructure—roads, laws, and customs—by Christians in the fourth century. Rome's syncretism failed as surely as the Christians' early pluralism failed.

2. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), p. 131.

3. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

B. Tertullian's Apology

In the late second or early third century, Tertullian (145–220), the intellectual founder of Latin Christianity, wrote his famous Apology, a defense of Christianity as a pietistic religion of heart and hearth which should have been acceptable to Rome's power religion. It was addressed to "Rulers of the Roman Empire. . . ."⁴ It was a critique of Rome's demand that Christians must worship the divinity of the emperor for the sake of the prosperity of the empire.

He attributed to ignorance the rulers' hostility to Christianity. "So we maintain that they are both ignorant while they hate us, and hate us unrighteously while they continue in ignorance, the one thing being the result of the other either way of it."⁵ In Chapter 25, he pointed out that the complex pantheon of Rome in his day had not been the religion of the early Romans. "But how utterly foolish it is to attribute the greatness of the Roman name to religious merits, since it was after Rome became an empire, or call it still a kingdom, that the religion she professes made its chief progress! Is it the case now? Has its religion been the source of the prosperity of Rome?" On the contrary, he argued: "Indeed, how could religion make a people great who have owed their greatness to their irreligion? For, if I am not mistaken, kingdoms and empires are acquired by wars, and are extended by victories. More than that, you cannot have wars and victories without the taking, and often the destruction, of cities. That is a thing in which the gods have their share of calamity. Houses and temples suffer alike; there is indiscriminate slaughter of priests and citizens; the hand of rapine is laid equally upon sacred and on common treasure. Thus the sacrileges of the Romans are as numerous as their trophies."⁶ The sacredness of Rome's pantheon of gods is an illusion; the gods of Rome are idols. "But divinities unconscious are with impunity dishonored, just as in vain they are adored."⁷

If this was calculated to persuade Rome's rulers, it was an apologetic failure. Tertullian did not understand, or pretended not to understand, the inherently political nature of classical religion. The gods of Rome were thoroughly political in Tertullian's era. This is not surprising. In classical religion, the gods of allied cities, as well as allied famil-

4. Tertullian, Apology, ch. I, opening words. Reprinted in The Ante-Nicene Fathers (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1870] 1978), III, p. 17.

5. Idem.

6. Ibid., p. 40.

7. Idem.

ies and clans within a city, had always been political. They had always been creations for the sake of politics.⁸ Peace treaties between warring cities were treaties between their gods.⁹ While the ancients believed that the gods did bring sanctions, positive and negative, in history, they also believed that these sanctions were applied to members of oath-bound, custom-bound, and ritual-bound groups: families, clans, and city-states. The heart of Roman religion was its public piety.¹⁰ Jews and Christians remained aloof from these public ceremonies, not because the rituals were public, but because they formally invoked idols. On the other hand, they were persecuted, not because they refused to believe in the power of idols, but because they refused to participate in acts of public piety. The judicial issue for Rome was the oath—formal invocation—not personal belief. The public oath affirmed men's obedience to representatives of the gods of the pantheon—representatives who were, above all, political agents of the emperor.

In Chapter 28, Tertullian called for religious toleration generally, affirming strict voluntarism in worship. Christians cannot in good conscience "offer sacrifice to the well-being of the emperor." Yet for this refusal, he complained, they have been illegitimately condemned as treasonous. Roman religion was itself sacrilegious, he said, "for you do homage with a greater dread and an intense reverence to Caesar, than Olympian Jove himself."¹¹ Of course they did; the Olympian Jove was a political construct. Caesar was the earthly manifestation of Rome's political power, and classical religion was power religion. Tertullian sought to condemn Rome's rulers for "showing impiety to your gods, inasmuch as you show a greater reverence to a human sovereignty than you do to them."¹² His strategy was naive; the heart of all power religion, from Pharaoh to the latest political messiah, is the honoring of human sovereignty.¹³

In Chapter 29, he argued that the gods of Rome did not protect Caesar; rather, Caesar protected the gods. "This, then, is the ground on

8. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Book III, ch. VI.

9. Ibid., III:XV.

10. Robert L. Wilken, The Christians as the Romans Saw Them (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1984), p. 64.

11. Ibid., p. 41.

12. Idem.

13. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985).

which we are charged with treason against the imperial majesty, to wit, that we do not put the emperors under their own possessions; that we do not offer a mere mock service on their behalf, as not believing their safety rests in leaden hands.”¹⁴ This was also a naive argument, yet one still revered by most Christian defenders of modern political pluralism. To pray publicly for Caesar in the name of the pantheon of Rome’s gods was to acknowledge that Caesar was the common reference point, the common spokesman, for the inherently political gods of classical culture.

The syncretism of Rome’s religion was the theological justification for the administration of Rome’s political empire: a hierarchy of sanctified power from Caesar to the lowest officials in the otherwise autonomous city-states that made up the empire. This hierarchy of power was sacred, a matter of formal ritual.

The source of law in society is its god.¹⁵ Caesar was the source of law in the name of the gods of the pantheon. There was no operational hierarchy above him; there was a political and military hierarchy below him. This much Tertullian understood. This was the heart of his argument against the seriousness of Roman religion. But to maintain widespread faith in the legitimacy of any social order, the authorities must foster faith in a sacred—though not necessarily supernatural—law-order, i.e., laws to which non-political and cosmic sanctions are attached. Civil authorities seek to instill the fear of the society’s gods in the hearts of the subjects of the sacred political order. This is why Tertullian was unquestionably treasonous, for he was undermining men’s faith in the higher order which the authorities insisted undergirded Rome’s legitimacy. Tertullian was challenging the civil covenant of Rome, an overwhelmingly political social order. He challenged Rome’s gods, the authority of Rome’s rulers to command allegiance to the primary representative of these gods, Rome’s law, Rome’s sanctions against treasonous Christians, and ultimately Rome’s succession in history. There was no more revolutionary act than this. Taking up weapons was a minor infraction compared to this.

In vain did Tertullian cry out for toleration, just as modern Christian defenders of political pluralism cry out vainly. “Why, then, are we not permitted an equal liberty and impunity for our doctrines as they have, with whom, in respect of what we teach, we are compared?"¹⁶ The answer should have been obvious: they—the tolerated religions—publicly acknowledged the legitimacy of the covenant of Rome's power religion. Christianity could not acknowledge such legitimacy and remain faithful to God.

14. Tertullian, Apology, pp. 41–42.

15. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 5.

Tertullian had mystical tendencies, and he spent the end of his life as a member of a cult, the Montanists, which had been founded half a century earlier by a tongues-speaking, self-styled prophet, Montanus, and two women who were also said to be prophetesses. They taught the imminent bodily return of Christ.¹⁷ After Christ's bodily return, they taught, He would set up an earthly kingdom.¹⁸ Tertullian's Apolo-gy was governed by an outlook hostile to time, dominion, and political involvement. His political pluralism was an outworking of his theological pietism, a pietism which eventually led him into a premillennial cult that called for asceticism, suffering, and martyrdom prior to the imminent Second Coming.¹⁹ His political pluralism was consistent with his later theology: a call, not for the victory of Christianity in history, but merely for peace until such time as Christ returns to set up a millennial kingdom. For Tertullian, history offered little hope. Yet even so, his limited critique of Rome in the name of political pluralism and toleration went too far for Rome's hierarchs.

C. Julian the Apostate

The Roman authorities understood the implications of the rival religion which Tertullian preached. They were unimpressed with his arguments that Christians were the best citizens of Rome because they gave alms freely and paid their taxes.²⁰ The Christians were by far the most dangerous citizens of Rome, as the last pagan emperor Julian (361–63) fully understood. The victorious Christians designated him posthumously as "Julian the Apostate." This name has stuck, even in textbooks written by his spiritual heirs. A secret convert from Christianity to occult mysteries at age 20, Julian took steps to weaken the Christians immediately after he attained the office of Emperor. Julian

16. Tertullian, Apolo-gy, ch. XLVI, Ante-Nicene Fathers, III, p. 50.

17. Kenneth Scott Latourette, A History of Christianity (New York: Harper & Row, 1953), p. 128.

18. W. H. C. Frend, The Rise of Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984), p. 254.

19. W. H. C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church: A Study of a Conflict from the Maccabees to Donatus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, [1965] 1981), p. 292.

20. Apolo-gy, ch. XLII, Ante-Nicene Fathers, III, p. 49.

was the first Renaissance ruler, a lover of Greek antiquity.²¹ He concealed his conversion to paganism throughout his adult life until he gained uncontested political power in 361. This is understandable, given the fact that his late cousin, the Arian Emperor Constantius, had ordered the murder of Julian's father and mother in the year Constantine died, 337, when Julian was five years old.²² There was great resentment in Julian.

One of his earliest acts as emperor was to establish pagan review boards governing the appointment of all teachers. Teachers henceforth would have to teach classical religion along with traditional rhetoric.²³ Christians, however, were forbidden by Julian to teach such texts. He understood the social authority of formal education. He dismissed the Christians in his work, Against the Galileans: "It seems to me that you yourselves must be aware of the very different effect of your writings on the intellect compared to ours, and that from studying yours no man could achieve excellence or even ordinary human goodness, whereas from studying ours every man can become better than before."²⁴ As is true today, the possession of a formal education was basic to social advancement.²⁵ Christians had long understood this, and those seeking social advancement had capitulated to the requirement of mastering rhetoric, but in a watered-down, minimal-paganism form. Wilken writes: "For two centuries Christian intellectuals had been forging a link between Christianity and the classical tradition, and with one swift stroke Julian sought to sever that link. . . . Christian parents, especially the wealthy, insisted that their sons receive the rhetorical education, and it now appeared as though Julian were limiting this to pagans."²⁶ The more things change, the more things stay the same.²⁷ What Julian attempted, the United States Department of Education has achieved.²⁸ So have other similar politically

21. Wilken, Christians as the Romans Saw Them, p. 171.

22. John Holland Smith, The Death of Classical Paganism (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1976), p. 93.

23. Wilken, Christians as the Romans Saw Them, pp. 173–74.

24. Cited in Smith, Death of Classical Paganism, p. 109.

25. Wilken, Christians as the Romans Saw Them, p. 175.

26. Idem.

27. Marsden, Soul of the American University, op. cit.

28. Only in the summer of 1995 did the United States Department of Education allow a non-regional accrediting organization begin to offer accreditation to colleges. The regional associations are all secular. The new association is equally secular, but its recommended curriculum is more traditional, rather like late-nineteenth-century pagan college education.

appointed and coercive review boards throughout the world.

In a very real sense, Julian's edict launched a dilemma that has faced the Western church since the eleventh century. If the knowledge of pagan texts is the legitimate basis of a gentleman's education—an assumption acknowledged by the Christian West until the Darwinian educational reforms of late nineteenth century—then why should Christians seek to become gentlemen? Why should they not content themselves with the study of the Scriptures and commentaries on the Scriptures, just as Jewish scholars in the West contented themselves for eighteen centuries with the study of the Talmud? One answer: because Christians do not want to live in ghettos, having seen what ghetto living did to the Jews prior to about 1850. On the other hand, won't exposure to classical learning undermine Christians' commitment to the truths of Scripture, just as secular education has undermined modern Judaism? We see this continuing debate in Christians' rival commitment to two forms of higher education: (1) the Christian liberal arts college, which has unquestionably gone increasingly humanistic and liberal;²⁹ and (2) the fundamentalist Bible college, which does not seek academic accreditation from state-licensed, monopolistic, humanistic accreditation organizations, nor would receive it if sought. This is the dilemma of the hypothetical but non-existent Christian law school that would teach biblical law and which therefore could not receive academic accreditation from the humanistic American Bar Association (ABA), which is mandatory for a school's graduates to gain access to the state-licensed monopoly of pleading the law for money.³⁰ Darwinism has replaced classicism in the modern curriculum, and college graduates are not so much gentlemen as bureaucrats, but the dilemma is in principle the same.

The solution is the biblical covenant, which provides Christians with revelational standards of evaluation that are to govern both the form and the content of education, but Christians have never believed this strongly enough to establish biblical guidelines for education. The 29. James D. Hunter, Evangelicalism: The Coming Generation (University of Chicago Press, 1987), pp. 171–78.

30. This was the dilemma of Regent University's law school, which received provisional accreditation by the ABA on the basis of its dean's public commitment to an as-yet undeveloped, updated version of James Madison's pre-Darwinian, eighteenth-century political pluralism, and which in 1993 fired the dean and promised to adopt a more mainstream curriculum. "Titus Breaks His Silence," World (Feb. 5, 1994). The dean was Herbert Titus, who wrote an appendix in R. J. Rushdoony's book, Law and Society, vol. 2 of Institutes of Biblical Law (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1982).

answer, in short, is theocracy—"God rules through God's rules"—but this suggestion is as abhorrent to modern pietistic Christians as it was to Julian.

D. Modernism's Gods

Modernism's gods are the lineal descendants of the gods of the Hellenistic world, which were influence, wealth, and sophistication. They are gods of a systematically secular civilization: politics, economics, and formal education. Their confessional demands are not so clearly stated as the traditional gods of Canaan were. They offer so many benefits and seem to demand very few formal sacrifices. They offer the universally pursued fruits of the division of labor in every field. They invite into their company all those who are willing to endure intellectual separation from the communities in which they were born. They demand this separation, initially, only in those areas of life that produce wealth and social advantages. They rigidly segregate the realm of formal worship from the world of economic productivity and civil service. They relegate the confessional world of revealed religion to the fringes of culture. They condescendingly allow the regularly scheduled formal worship of these culturally banished gods, but these schedules are limited by custom, and sometimes are banned by law (e.g., tax-funded anything in the United States).

Modernism's gods are like the gods of classical humanism, for they are part of the creation. Modernism denies judicial significance to anything outside the space-time continuum. Modernism's gods are gods of man's professed autonomy. Unlike the gods of classical humanism, they are universal gods that honor no geographical boundaries. They are idols of the mind and spirit. They offer power, wealth, and prestige to those who are willing to submit to their impersonal laws. They serve as the foundations of empire: man's empire. They claim the allegiance of all who would be successful.

Because they are impersonal gods, their various priesthoods can comfort the worshippers of personal gods by assuring them that the honoring of modernism's gods in no way dishonors the religion of any traditional god. The priests of modernism thereby proclaim the universal reign of humanism's kingdom, a reign unaffected by the competing claims of the worshippers of traditional deities.

Behind the competing dogmas of the great religions is the agreed-upon god of numerical relationships. Also above competing claims by the priests of the gods of revelation is the transfiguring promise of compound economic growth. The traditional priest takes your money and gives you assurances of eternal peace. The banker takes your money and gives you three to five percent, compounded. The many-colored robes of a hundred priestly orders cannot compete with the dazzling white smocks of the scientific priesthood. Or so it seems.

It takes a highly sophisticated skeptic to perceive that the relevance of numerical relationships cannot be explained logically,³¹ that compound economic growth cannot continue indefinitely in a finite world,³² and that science places man on a meaningless treadmill of discovery in which every truth will be superseded, in which there is no long-term security of belief.

The reality of the permanent conflict between God and the gods of modernism can be seen in the outcome of their respective historical sanctions. Jews, as the original covenant people, regard themselves as heirs of the covenant. If any people should be immune to the lure of false gods, Jews believe, they are that people. Yet the worship of the gods of modernism has made great inroads in the Jewish community. They have trusted the modern state, only to be repeatedly betrayed by it.³³ They have trusted the economy, only to be blamed as malefactors and conspirators because of their economic success.³⁴ They have trusted education, only to have lost their confessional identity. The phrase,

31. Eugene Wigner, "The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences," Communications on Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. Wigner won the Nobel Prize in physics. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>)

32. Gary North, "The Theology of the Exponential Curve," The Freeman (May 1970). Reprinted in Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/NorthICE>)

33. Benjamin Ginsberg, The Fatal Embrace: Jews and the State (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993).

34. Norman Cohn, Warrant for Genocide: The myth of the Jewish world-conspiracy and the Protocols of the Elders of Zion (New York: Harper & Row, 1967); Albert Lee, Henry Ford and the Jews (New York: Stein & Day, 1980); Sheldon Marcus, Father Caughlin: The Tumultuous Life of the Priest of the Little Flower (Boston: Little, Brown, 1973), pp. 146–79. Primary sources include Maj.-Gen. Count Cherep-Spiridovich, The Secret World Government or "The Hidden Hand" (New York: Anti-Bolshevist Pub. Assn., 1926); John Beaty, The Iron Curtain Over America (Dallas: Wilkenson, 1951); William Guy Carr, Red Fog Over America, 2nd ed. (Toronto: National Federation of Christian Laymen, 1957); Carr, Pawns in the Game, 4th ed. (Los Angeles: St. George Press, 1962); Olivia Marie O'Grady, The Beasts of the Apocalypse (Benicia, California: O'Grady Publications, 1959); Wilmot Roberston, The Dispossed Majority, rev. ed. (Cape Canaveral, Florida: Howard Allen, 1972), ch. 15. Most of these anti-Semitic books are out of print. They were always little-known, privately published, and consigned to the far-right fringe of American conservatism.

"I'm a Jew," today masks an absence of any agreed-upon theological or judicial content.

Over time, one begins to perceive that Jews are over-represented in the ranks of mathematicians, bankers, scientists, Hollywood celebrities, and in other fields. Meanwhile, there do not seem to be many rabbis who still defend the infallibility of the five books of Moses. In fact, the relationship seems to be inverse: the fewer the number of Torah-affirming rabbis, the more Jews who are visible in leadership positions inside the priesthoods of modernism.

E. Pietism and Politics

"Fewer Torah-affirming rabbis, more successful Jews." Because of the visible success of the Jewish minority in the West, this observation is easy to make. But the same inverse relationship seems to operate in Christian fundamentalist circles, although in the opposite form: "More Bible-believing ministers, fewer successful Christians." There are reasons for this. Many fundamentalist Christians conclude that success in this world is a spiritual trap to be avoided, a goal to be shunned. "Politics is dirty. Riches are a trap. Too much education is a bad thing." Pre-millennial dispensationalism has called into question the time available to Christians to pursue projects that rely on long-term compounding for success. As Rev. J. Vernon McGee put it in the early 1950s, "You don't polish brass on a sinking ship." In recent years, this success-rejecting presupposition has been called into question in some charismatic circles.³⁵ They are a minority.

Meanwhile, as American fundamentalist Christians have become politically active since 1976, they have steadily abandoned their commitment to dispensationalism. This is especially true of fundamentalism's national leaders.³⁶ They rarely speak about eschatology any more, and when they do, what they say about the future is at odds with what their multi-million dollar organizations are doing. An eschatology that confidently preaches inevitable failure in history for Christians is inconsistent with Christian political mobilization. The goal of politics is to win, not lose. Also, the rise of the independent Christian education movement since 1965 has been accompanied by the idea that Christian education should be better than secular education, which places a new degree of responsibility on Christians to develop superior curriculum materials. While fundamentalists have proven incapable of doing this, especially for students above the age of 15, they at least have understood that the task is necessary. But after three centuries of having to choose between right-wing Enlightenment humanism and left-wing Enlightenment humanism, Protestant Christians are not in a position to offer a well-developed alternative. Fundamentalists have generally chosen right-wing humanism—Adam Smith, James Madison—but they have at best baptized it in the name of vague biblical principles. They have not shown exegetically how the Bible leads to right-wing humanism's policy conclusions.

35. The "positive confession" movement is the most obvious example.

36. I predicted this in my essay, "The Intellectual Schizophrenia of the New Christian Right," Christianity and Civilization, 1 (1982), pp. 1-40. ???

Calvinists and Lutherans never adopted such a comprehensive world-rejecting outlook, where at least middle-class success has been assumed to be normative, but they have also been deeply compromised by humanist education, especially at the collegiate level. Calvinist and Lutheran leaders and churches have gone theologically liberal and then politically liberal with far greater regularity than fundamentalist leaders and churches have.

The gods of the modern world, being universal in their claims, imitate the universalism of the kingdom of God. They undergird the kingdom of man. Their proffered blessings are not uniquely tied to the land as the gods of the ancient world were. These gods are not placated by sacred offerings of the field. They are placated only by confession and conformity: the affirmation of their autonomous jurisdiction within an ever-expanding realm of law—civil, private, or both. Their priestly agents offer positive sanctions to those who conform covenantally: the traditional human goals of health, wealth, power, fame, and security, as well as the great lure of the twentieth century, low-cost entertainment. The last goal has become necessary to offset the side effect of the first five: boredom.

America's mainline Protestant denominations have suffered the same fate confessionally during the same period.³⁷ Catholicism resisted the trend until the mid-1960s, but this resistance collapsed almost overnight, 1965–75.³⁸ The evangelicals are also succumbing.³⁹ Only 37. William R. Hutchison, The Modernist Impulse in American Protestantism (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1976).

38. Malachi Martin, The Jesuits: The Society of Jesus and the Betrayal of the Church (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987). For a representative primary source, see A New Catechism: Catholic Faith for Adults (New York: Herder & Herder, 1967). It was re-released by the bishops of the Netherlands in 1966.

39. Hunter, Evangelicalism.

fundamentalists, charismatics, and a handful of Calvinists and Lutherans, especially those committed to Christian education through high school, are maintaining their resistance by proclaiming late eighteenth-century right-wing Enlightenment humanism as an ideal. Church growth is taking place in those American churches that are resisting the liberal humanist tide. This has been true ever since the mid-1920s,⁴⁰ the very period in which liberal Protestant church growth peaked in the United States.⁴¹

Conclusion

The ancient empires adopted syncretism as a way to hold together the political order. Just as the syncretistic gods of the families and clans in Greece and Rome entered into the common pantheon of the city-state, becoming political gods, so did the gods of conquered city-states enter into the pantheon of the Roman Empire. The welcoming of these gods into the Roman pantheon undermined the ritual-theological foundations of the Roman Republic. Empires in the ancient world required the subordination of local gods to the political order.

This is in principle no different in modern pluralism. What has changed is the local character of the participating gods. They have become universalistic, mimicking the God of the Bible. The modern pantheon is not filled with idols. Pluralism acknowledges all religions as equal, just as syncretism acknowledged all idols as equal. But in both cases, this equality was the equality of subordination to the god of politics. This god is the supreme god of every political empire.

The anti-Christian leaders of the modern world are now campaigning for the creation of a New World Order. This is another move in the direction of empire. It will not come to pass. Babel always falls.

40. Joel A. Carpenter, "Fundamentalist Institutions and the Rise of Evangelical Protestantism, 1929–1942," Church History, 49 (1980), p. 65.

41. Robert Handy, "The American Religious Depression, 1925–1935," ibid., 29 (1960), pp. 3–16.

Appendix D

THE DEMOGRAPHICS OF AMERICAN JUDAISM: A STUDY IN DISINHERITANCE

For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins (Rom. 11:25–27).

Jews worry a lot about their corporate future. The continuing recurrence of this fear has been unique to Jews. Members of no other ethnic group have gone into print so often to proclaim the possibility that they might disappear as a separate people.¹ As Otto Scott, of Irish descent, once remarked: “Can you imagine an Irishman worrying in public about this possibility?” Yet, eschatologically speaking, this Jewish fear is legitimate. Paul in Romans 11 taught that the Jews will eventually disappear as a separate covenantal confessional group and be welcomed into the church.² They will, alongside many other ethnic groups, retain their cultural accents and dialects, but the grammar of their confession will be Trinitarian. They will cease to be Jews. Never-

1. See, for example, Alan M. Dershowitz, The Vanishing American Jew: In Search of Jewish Identity for the Next Century (Boston: Little, Brown, 1997).

2. “And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graft them in again. For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree?” (Rom. 11:23–24). Cf. Charles Hodge, Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1864] 1950), p. 365; Robert Haldane, An Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans (Mac Dill Air Force Base, Florida: MacDonald Pub. Co., [1839] 1958), pp. 632–33; John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965), II, pp. 65–103. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 3rd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000], 2012), ch. 8.

theless, until this happens, Jews will successfully maintain their separate covenantal identity as a people. The question is: Which Jews? The answer is: Jews who both understand and apply the covenantal principle of inheritance and disinheritance.

Judaism, in the sense of adherence to the teachings of the Talmud, is a minority religion even in the State of Israel. A minority religion's greatest threat is not genocide. It is intermarriage. Genocide is not a comparable threat, as the early church learned in the Roman Empire. It is never complete because it is always geographically and temporally bounded: this group of adherents in this region persecuted by this State for this period of time. Genocide reinforces the sense of solidarity among the targeted victims, especially first-generation refugees. Genocide creates a reaction: among the victors, who eventually grow weary of the bloodshed and grow embarrassed by the world's reaction, and among the victims, who adopt social strategies of survival. Threats strengthen the will to resist. Seduction weakens it.

A. The Sociology of Seduction

Seduction is the Jews' problem—seduction in the broadest sense, but also in the narrowest. The seduction that threatens a confessional religion more than any other is marital seduction: the confessionally mixed marriage. God warned Israel about this: "For thou shalt worship no other god: for the LORD, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God: Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, and they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice unto their gods, and one call thee, and thou eat of his sacrifice; And thou take of their daughters unto thy sons, and their daughters go a whoring after their gods, and make thy sons go a whoring after their gods" (Ex. 34:14–16). Moses did not warn the daughters not to marry Canaanite husbands; he warned the men not to marry Canaanite wives. Women were seen as the seducers of covenant religion.

Judaism had its origin in the triumph of the Pharisees after the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple removed the Sadducees from power.³ Judaism has always viewed seduction as asymmetrical covenantally: wives have the upper hand in mixed marriages. Judaism has been structured to take advantage of this aspect of the mixed marriage. It defines a Jew as someone born of a Jewish mother. The mother's love of her children, which is the most powerful and universal social force there is, is harnessed to the judicial definition of what constitutes a Jew. A Jewish woman may be seduced away from her parents' plans, but she is not automatically disinherited. She is held less responsible than her brothers in this area of life. She does not bear the mark of the Jewish covenant: circumcision. Her flesh does not testify against her marriage vow, as it does with a maritally seduced Jewish male. She abandons less than he does. Her status as a Jew is transmitted to her children, if they confess the faith. This gives her a great incentive to rear her children as Jews, if possible. Her husband, whose faith was sufficiently weak to permit him to marry someone outside his faith, is not in a strong position to oppose her.

3. Louis Finkelstein, The Pharisees: The Sociological Background of Their Faith, 2 vols., 3rd ed. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1962); Jacob Neusner, From Politics to Piety: The Emergence of Pharisaic Judaism (New York: KTAV, [1973] 1978).

This asymmetric condition is reflected in the statistics of religious training among the children of mixed marriages: Jews with others. In 1971, 86% of the children of Jewish mothers and gentile fathers were reared as Jews, while only 17% of the children of Jewish fathers and gentile mothers were reared as Jews.⁴ In the mutual seduction of a mixed marriage, American Jewish women have retained the upper hand.

This is why the negative sanction of disinheritance of sons has always been crucial for the survival of Judaism. Jewish daughters have seldom inherited, so the threat of disinheritance has not been equally great. The Mosaic law allowed daughters to inherit rural land only when there was no son (Num. 36).⁵ So, Judaism's threat of disinheritance has been aimed at keeping sons in line. Jewish daughters have always had less to lose and more to gain than their brothers when entering into mixed marriages. Because Jewish women did not inherit money, and because their children could inherit their mothers' judicial status, the gentiles' seduction of Jewish women has never been the same degree of threat to the survival of Judaism. It is the seduction of sons that has been the primary threat. To defend against this, Judaism imposed harsh sanctions. When it ceased to impose them, it began a march into self-annihilation through seduction.

But who is the chief seducer? Not Christianity or any other confessional supernatural religion. Christianity cannot adopt mixed marriages as tools of evangelism; such marriages are forbidden. They break the covenant, which is necessarily confessional. For the humanist, however, marriage is not seen as a covenant based on a mutual oath before God. It is seen as a cultural institution based on a breakable oath before the state, and the state is seen as religiously neutral. The humanist therefore sees no confessional problem with mixed marriages, for marriage is not perceived as a covenant that is based on a shared confession of faith. He encourages confessionally mixed marriages as a means of undermining the testimony of both partners to their children. This is why humanism is the supreme threat to modern Judaism. Unlike supernatural-confessional religions that are also threatened by seduction and which oppose mixed marriages, humanism proclaims the equality of all supernatural religious confessions—an equality of cultural irrelevance. Humanism seeks to seduce the sons and daughters of every supernatural religion. Thus, humanism is an equal opportunity seducer: men and women of all faiths are equally its targets.

4. This was the finding of the National Jewish Population Study of 1970–71, reported by U. O. Schmelz and Sergio Dellapergola, "Basic Trends in American Jewish Demography," in Steven Bayme (ed.), Facing the Future: Essays On Contemporary Jewish Life (n.p.: KTAV Publishing House and American Jewish Committee, 1989), p. 92.

5. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 22.

The ideal of the confessionally mixed marriage has led, step by step, to the ideal of the sexually mixed college dormitory. The humanist believes in the efficacy of seduction. He believes that, in the competition between lust and the covenant, lust will win in the 18–24 age group. He believes that the children of Israel, if given the opportunity, will rise up to play.

This is why humanism constitutes the greatest threat to Judaism in its history. A majority religion can survive the assaults of mixed marriage much longer than a minority religion can. There are more candidates for marriage for the members of a majority religion. A minority religion cannot afford the temporary luxury of tolerating mixed marriages. This is especially true of American Jews, who are experiencing birth rates well below the replacement rate of 2.1 children per family. “If Jews, who in most parts of the United States constitute a tiny minority, were to choose their spouses at random, hardly any endogamous Jewish couples would be formed at all.”⁶

Humanism calls on all partners to choose their marital partners on a confessionally random basis. To encourage this, humanism has created the most powerful marriage bureau in history: the tax-funded secular university. No group has responded with greater enthusiasm to the siren call of the secular university than the Jews, a topic I shall discuss later in this essay.

6. Schmelz and Dellapergola, “Basic Trends,” in Bayme, op. cit., p. 91.

B. The Ghetto and Cultural Identity

European Jews prior to the Napoleonic wars (1798–1815) were isolated inside their own autonomous communities: ghettos. Some of these ghettos were urban; others were in small towns. When religious discrimination began to be repealed by Napoleonic law in the first half of the nineteenth century, Jews began to venture out of the ghetto, both intellectually and geographically.⁷ The Jewish community's abandonment of traditional Judaism began at that time. A division appeared between reforming Jews and defenders of Talmudic knowledge. Historian Paul Johnson writes: "The pious Jew—and there could be no other—did not admit the existence of two kinds of knowledge, sacred and secular. There was only one. Moreover, there was only one legitimate purpose in acquiring it: to discover the exact will of God, in order to obey it."⁸ Reform Judaism rejected this outlook; it sought to bring Jews into the world around them. It appeared in the second decade of the nineteenth century.⁹ The term "Orthodox Judaism" did not appear until the second quarter of the nineteenth century. The term was coined by Reform critics of traditional Judaism.¹⁰

In Germany, legal discrimination against Jews faded steadily after 1820 and was gone by 1880.¹¹ Legal equality brought legal integration into the gentile community. Secular law revoked the long-standing special legal situation of Jews, where rabbis and elders possessed the authority to impose civil sanctions on members of the Jewish community. This separate legal status went back to the late Roman Empire. Israel Shahak writes of European Jewry in general: "This was the most important social fact of Jewish existence before the advent of the modern state: observance of the religious laws of Judaism, as well as their inculcation through education, were enforced on Jews by physical co-

7. Paul Johnson, A History of the Jews (New York: Harper & Row, 1987), Part 5.

8. Ibid., p. 327.

9. Ibid., pp. 332–33.

10. I. Grunfeld, "Samson Raphael Hirsch—The Man and His Mission," in Judaism Eternal: Selected Essays from the Writings of Samson Raphael Hirsch, 2 vols. (London: Soncino, 1956), I, p. xxiii. Grunfeld said that Hirsch accepted this term of opprobrium and, through his leadership, transformed it into an acceptable self-definition.

11. Hasia R. Diner, A Time for Gathering: The Second Migration, 1820–1880, vol. 3 of The Jewish People in America, 5 vols. (Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992), p. 17.

ercion, from which one could escape by conversion to the religion of the majority, amounting in the circumstances to a total social break and for that reason very impracticable, except during a religious crisis.”¹² Paralleling this change in the Jews’ legal status was an increase in animosity against them, although they never constituted more than 1.3% of the German population.¹³ Social discrimination against Jews in Germany remained common, culminating with the systematic Nazi persecutions, 1933–45.

In contrast, there was almost no social discrimination against Jews in the United States prior to the Civil War (1861–65). Jews had lived in North America as a culturally assimilated people from the mid-seventeenth century. Beginning in the mid-eighteenth century, they had become part of American urban life: in clothing, hair styles, and architecture.¹⁴ In New York, Jews became eligible for citizenship as early as 1715, although this was unique in pre-Revolutionary America.¹⁵ They never received a separate grant of authority to impose civil sanctions on deviant members of the synagogue. As a result, Jews were far more integrated into American life than their counterparts were in Europe prior to the 1820s. Sephardic Jews from Spain and Portugal and Ashkenazic Jews from Germany and Poland lived together from the beginning in New Amsterdam. This continued when it became New York City in 1664. They worked out an agreement on common worship and rule, 1728–1825; elsewhere in America, separate synagogues were common.¹⁶

American Jews were a tiny percentage of the population throughout the nineteenth century. In 1820, there were about 2,700 Jews in America.¹⁷ The overall American population in 1820 was 9.6 million.¹⁸ There were so few Jews that there were no rabbis. Until 1840, there was no ordained, functioning rabbi in the United States, i.e., someone who had graduated from a recognized rabbinical school or who had been certified by a talmudic scholar of distinction who had been li-

12. Israel Shahak, “The Jewish religion and its attitude to non-Jews,” Khamsin, VIII (1981), p. 28. See also Diner, Gathering, p. 18.

13. Diner, Gathering, p. 9.

14. Eli Faber, A Time for Planting: The First Migration, 1654–1820, vol. 1 of The Jewish People in America (Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992), ch. 4.

15. Ibid., pp. 100–1.

16. Ibid., pp. 60–61, 125.

17. Ibid., p. 107.

18. Historical Statistics of the United States: Colonial Times to 1970, 2 vols. (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1975), I:8, Series A 1–5.

censed.¹⁹ By 1840, the number of Jews in the United States had risen to 6,000. In 1848, there were 50,000.²⁰ As a means of comparison, consider that in 1840, there were 17 million Americans; in 1850 there were 23 million.²¹

Then, in the 1850s, came the steamship.²² This changed both the volume and pattern of immigration: from northern Europe to eastern, central, and southern Europe. The great waves of immigration hit America from all over Europe, not just Protestant northern Europe. American demographics changed rapidly. Among the tens of millions of immigrants were millions of Jews. Total immigration of Jews to the United States was no more than 150,000 as of 1880.²³ From 1860 to 1880, more of these came from eastern Europe than from Germany.²⁴ There were about 240,000 Jews in America in 1880.²⁵ Of these, 200,000 were from Germany.²⁶ Over the next 45 years, some 2.5 million Jews arrived, with the vast majority from eastern Europe, especially Russia.²⁷ From 1880 to 1920, one-third of all the Jews in Eastern Europe emigrated, and over 80% of them came to the United States.²⁸ Diner argues—implausibly, in my view—that this new immigration was not fundamentally different from the old: same Judaism, same immigration motivation, i.e., economic opportunity.²⁹ This is the equivalent of saying that, culturally speaking, New York City's Episcopalians were not fundamentally different from the Baptists of the American frontier. Even this comparison understates the difference. Episcopalians were separated from the Baptists by the Allegheny mountains. The Sephardic Jews, assimilated into the German-Polish Jewish community from 1841 to 1920,³⁰ were separated from the Russian Jews in New York

19. Jacob Rader Marcus, "The Handsome Young Priest in the Black Gown: The Personal World of Gershom Seixas," Hebrew Union College Annual, XL-XLI (1969–70), p. 411.

20. Diner, Gathering, p. 56.

21. Historical Statistics, loc. cit.

22. Diner, Gathering, p. 43.

23. Ibid., p. 233.

24. Ibid., p. 53.

25. Ibid., p. 56.

26. Gerold Sorin, A Time for Building: The Third Migration, 1880–1920, vol. 3 of The Jewish People in America (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992), p. 2.

27. Dinar, Gathering, p. 233.

28. Sorin, Building, pp. xv, 1.

29. Diner, Gathering, pp. 232–33.

30. Jacob Rader Marcus, "The Periodization of American Jewish History," Publication of the American Jewish Historical Society, XLVII (Sept. 1957–June 1958), p. 129.

City by a horse carriage ride and the money to purchase it.³¹

The hostile reactions of the gentile community after 1870 marked a change in its opinion regarding the perceived differences of the new immigration, not merely the latter's increased volume but its social characteristics. In the 1870s, Jews began to be kept out of exclusive resorts and social clubs, and Jewish girls were excluded from certain eastern women's colleges, but this was the extent of the discrimination.³² (By the early twenty-first century, social club exclusion is all that remains, and only just barely.) After 1900, social discrimination against Jews increased.³³ After World War I, it increased dramatically.³⁴ This exclusion reflected social opinion within the Jewish community. Sorin comments: "The farther west in Europe one's origins, the higher one's status." He calls this "the geographical origins rule."³⁵

The great reversal came in 1945 in reaction to the defeat of the Nazis. Anti-Semitism became unfashionable within educated circles, which more and more circles became. Anti-semitism had never been consistent with the religious pluralism of American life, the "live and let live" attitude which has been characteristic of American culture—an application of nineteenth-century Americans' laissez faire outlook. The Nazi ideology had been defeated on the battlefield, and this re-

31. Stephen Birmingham, "Our Crowd": The Great Jewish Families of New York (New York: Harper & Row, 1967); Birmingham, The Grandees: America's Sephardic Elite (New York: Harper & Row, 1971). Birmingham titled Chapter 16, "The Jewish Episcopalians." There has been a reaction to this view among a few Jewish historians. Some of the authors and the general editor of The Jewish People in America (1992), which was funded by the American Jewish Historical Society, reject the familiar periodization of Jewish immigration to America: Sephardic, German-Polish (Ashkenazic), and eastern European. This periodization scheme, familiar to American Jewish historians by 1900, was defended by Marcus, "Periodization of American Jewish History," op. cit., pp. 125–33. With respect to the final wave of immigration, 1880 to 1920, I do not see how its overwhelming eastern European character can be denied. Marcus dated the beginning of the east European Jewish immigration: 1852 (p. 130). This correlates with the advent of the steamship. He dated the triumph of the Russian Jewish tradition: 1920 (p. 130). Simon Kuznets, one of the most respected statisticians in American history and a Nobel Prize winner in economics, remarked that from 1820 to 1870, fewer than 4,000 Jews immigrated from Russia and 4,000 from Poland. From 1881 to 1914, two million Jews immigrated, and over 1.5 million were from Russia: 75%. Kuznets, "Immigration of Russian Jews to the United States: Background and Structure," Perspectives in American History, IX (1975), p. 39. Only 15,000 Jews arrived from Russia in the decade, 1871–80. Ibid., p. 43.

32. John Higham, "Social Discrimination Against Jews in America, 1830–1930," Publication of the Jewish Historical Society, XLVII (1958), p. 13.

33. Ibid., pp. 13–19.

34. Ibid., pp. 19–23.

35. Sorin, Building, p. 2.

duced the appeal of the old inconsistency. Discrimination was replaced by toleration, and toleration by acceptance, in one generation: 1945 to 1975. But this acceptance has a confessional premise: "My religion is as good as yours, and all religions should be limited to home and congregation." The day that this confession is widely believed by members of a minority religion is the day that it moves toward assimilation. A Baptist can afford to confess this in a Methodist culture, or visa versa, but for a Jew in a humanist culture, such a confession is demographically suicidal. It undermines the traditional answers to the question: "What is a Jew?" A new answer now comes back: "A Unitarian with better business connections."

C. Jews and the Gods of Modernism

Throughout the nineteenth century, Jews actively began to pursue the gods of the gentiles around them: gods of marketplace. They got rich in Germany in that century, moving from poverty in 1820 to middle-class affluence by 1880.³⁶ The same upward movement of Jews took place in America. There was even less discrimination here. The common goal of Americans was making money. De Tocqueville wrote in 1835, "I know no other country where love of money has such a grip on men's hearts. . . ."³⁷ Access to the free market was open to all people except slaves in the antebellum South. Jews, who had been small traders in Europe, fit in well. They flourished. Like the members of many other ethnic groups, Jews wrote home to relatives in Europe about America's economic opportunities and its lack of religious discrimination. The waves of immigration grew larger.

In the twentieth century, another group of cosmopolitan gods became a temptation for Jews: gods of the academy. For about 25 years, 1920 to 1945, the prestigious American private colleges, universities, and medical schools placed quotas on the number of Jews. (The University of Chicago was an exception.)³⁸ Yet even in this case, discrimination was fairly lax. At Columbia University in New York City, the Jewish student population had climbed to 40% by 1920.³⁹ The school's

36. Diner, Gathering, pp. 12–13.

37. Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, edited by J. P. Meyer, 12th ed. (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1848] 1969), p. 54.

38. Diner, Gathering, p. 22. This school has been described as a Baptist institution where atheist students study Thomas Aquinas taught by Jewish professors. My assessment is that their Jewish professors are also atheists.

39. Henry L. Feingold, A Time for Searching: Entering the Mainstream, 1920–1945, vol. 4 of The Jewish People in America (Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins Univer-move farther away from the Jewish parts of the city in 1910 failed to reduce the flood of Jewish students when a subway line down the West side was constructed shortly thereafter. Quotas imposed in 1921 reduced this percentage to 22% in 1922.⁴⁰ Harvard's Jewish population, enhanced by "tram" commuters from Boston, climbed to 20% in 1920. The school's president then announced a quota of 10%. This decision was formally repealed by a special committee in 1923, but Harvard's new policies of accepting more students from the Midwest pushed Jewish enrolment back to 10% by 1930.⁴¹

Jews had long possessed legal access to tax-supported American schools and universities that came into existence after the Civil War. At the City College of New York in 1920, between 80 and 90% of the students were Jewish. At the Washington Square campus of the private New York University, the figure was 93%.⁴² In the 1930's, Jews constituted 3.5% of the American population—the high point—and 10% of its college population. The same drive for education had been present in Europe for a century.⁴³

Jews have flourished in this academic environment. Statistically, the biological heirs of Ashkenazic Jews are the most intelligent ethnic group in the United States.⁴⁴ Herrnstein and Murray comment: "A fair estimate seems to be that Jews in America and Britain have an overall IQ mean somewhere between a half and a full standard deviation above the mean, with the source of the difference concentrated in the verbal component. . . . But it is at least worth noting that their mean IQ was .97 standard deviation above the mean of the rest of the population and .84 standard deviation above the mean of whites who identified themselves as Christian."⁴⁵ These are statistically significant differences. The result has been the exceptional success of Jews in higher education and in the professions, which are screened by means of academic performance and competitive examination systems. "My son, the doctor" and "my son, the lawyer" are not just quaint phrases of sity Press, 1992), p. 15.

40. Idem.

41. Ibid., p. 18.

42. Ibid., p. 15.

43. Ibid., p. 14.

44. M. D. Storfer, Intelligence and Giftedness: The Contributions of Heredity and Early Environment (San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 1990), pp. 314–23; cited in Richard J. Herrnstein and Charles Murray, The Bell Curve: Intelligence and Class Structure in American Life (New York: Free Press, 1994), p. 275.

45. Idem.

proud but formally uneducated Jewish mothers in the 1920s through the 1940s. They are representative summaries of the success of Jews in entering the state-licensed professions, an ethnic penetration way out of proportion to their percentage in the overall population.

But there has been a heavy price to pay: initially, the undermining of confessional Judaism; secondarily, the undermining of cultural Judaism. The West's universities have made the same Faustian bargain to all: come to be certified, but give up your claims in the classroom to academically relevant knowledge based on revelation.⁴⁶ The Jews, as a minority based on religious confession, and as a minority with a competitive edge based on intelligence, have had the most to gain economically from this bargain, and the most to lose confessionally. For any religious group self-consciously to adopt a dualism that proclaims "two paths of knowledge" is to risk losing its best and brightest to the world of autonomous humanism. The seeming universalism of humanism's ideology offers to its initiates the power and productivity of the division of intellectual labor. To become a participant in this intellectual division of labor, the initiate need only abandon those aspects of his religious worldview that are irreconcilable or not readily shared with the segregating ideals of rival faiths. Jews have responded to this offer with greater enthusiasm and success than any other religious group in the West.⁴⁷ Edward Shapiro commented on the effect of secular values on Jewish professors.

Most Jewish professors had only a slight relationship to Jewish culture and Judaism. Data collected by the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education in 1969 revealed that while 32 percent of professors with a Protestant background and 25 percent with a Catholic background were either indifferent or opposed to religion, 67 percent of Jewish professors were indifferent or opposed to religion. And while 16 percent of Protestant professors and 23 percent of Catholic professors considered themselves deeply religious, only 5 percent of Jewish professors defined themselves as such. In comparison to other Jews, Jewish academicians observed fewer Jewish rituals, were more hostile to religion, affiliated with Jewish communal institutions less frequently, and intermarried more often. . . .

46. An example of an Orthodox Jew who accepted the bargain is a Harvard Law School professor, Alan Dershowitz, whose study of the effects of secularization reveals the plight of American Jewry: at the present rate of intermarriage, there will be no trace of the Jews in a century. Dershowitz, Vanishing American Jew.

47. See Irving Greenberg, "Jewish Survival and the College Campus," Judaism, XVII (Summer 1968).

Just as its investment in formal education was greater, so American Jewry spent more time, energy, and money than any other American ethnic or religious group in cultivating and analyzing its intellectuals. There must be something seriously wrong with American Jewry, it was argued, if it could not retain the loyalty of its brightest and best-educated members. The alienation of the Jewish intellectual from the American Jewish community occasioned much wringing of hands. There was, however, little that could have been done to bring Jewish intellectuals back to the fold. The sermons of rabbis and the proclamations of Jewish organizations could hardly convince intellectuals and academicians to abandon their secular and universalist outlook.⁴⁸

So, by worshipping in the shrines of secular culture, Jews are disappearing as a separate religious force. They are a political force, but not a religious force. Their separate legal status, which was an aspect of the judicial discrimination against them in Christian civilization, had enabled them to preserve their separate religious status for almost two millennia. With the coming to power of the gods of secular humanism—politics, money, and education—Jews left the ghetto and entered the public square to worship with their votes, their taxes, and their children. Public schools have become the established churches of Western civilization. Like the gentiles around them, Jews have tithed their children to the state. Also, since at least the 1930s, a majority of American Jews has consistently voted to allow the state to extract an ever-greater percentage of their income.⁴⁹ The saying is, “American Jews have the income of Episcopalians and the voting record of Puerto Ricans.”⁵⁰ Non-observant Jews have favored the welfare state.⁵¹ As an Orthodox and politically conservative rabbi has put it, “many non-observant Jews desperately pursue liberalism as a way out of their covenant. This is the true purpose of liberalism and Jews are its chief champions because it alone offers an escape from having to accept Jewish law—the Torah.”⁵²

48. Edward S. Shapiro, A Time for Healing: American Jewry since World War II, vol. 5 of The Jewish People in America (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992), pp. 112, 113.

49. Nathaniel Weyl, The Jew in American Politics (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1968), ch. 12.

50. Cf. Peter Steinfels, “American Jews Stand Firmly to the Left,” New York Times (Jan. 8, 1989).

51. Benjamin Ginsberg, The Fatal Embrace: Jews and the State (University of Chicago Press, 1993), pp. 125ff.

52. Daniel Lapin, “Why Are So Many Jews Liberal?” Crisis: A Journal of Lay Cath-

One Jewish leader in the American financial community has said of the Jewish New York elite of the 1820–1920 era: “Our Crowd is deadlier than a doornail. Ninety percent have disappeared and few are Jewish anymore.”⁵³ This problem is not confined to the United States; European Jews are also disappearing through assimilation.⁵⁴

D. The Disappearance of Non-Observant Jews

The non-observant Jews in the United States are not reproducing. “In present trends continue,” wrote sociologist Ernest van den Haag in 1969, “in the year 2000 there will have never been more handsome, better-endowed synagogues in America, nor so many; nor so few Jews.”⁵⁵ He argued that the intermarriage problem threatens the survival of American Judaism.⁵⁶ By 1969, this problem had been challenging non-observant American Jews for several decades, yet it was not even mentioned in sociologist Marshall Sklare’s 1957 anthology, The Jews: Social Patterns of an American Group. But in April, 1964, Sklare sounded a warning in the Jewish publication, Commentary, in an article titled, “Intermarriage and the Jewish Future.” He sounded the alarm even louder in a second Commentary article (March 1970): “Intermarriage and Jewish Survival.”⁵⁷ But alarms rarely change social patterns, especially convenient ones. People continue to do whatever they have been doing.

A 1971 study showed that the rate of intermarriage was over 30%.⁵⁸ In 1973, Reform Judaism, the largest and most liberal branch of American Judaism, made its last public pronouncement opposing such intermarriage. It has subsequently accepted the new reality and has tried to deal with it.⁵⁹ In these mixed marriages, only 20% of the spouses convert to Judaism. Three-quarters of the children in families in which the spouse fails to convert are not reared as Jews. Very few of these olic Opinion (April 1993).

53. Alan Greenberg of Bear, Stearns & Co. Cited in Jean Bear, The Self-Chosen: “Our Crowd” is Dead (New York: Arbor House, 1982), p. 23.

54. Bernard Wasserstein, Vanishing Diaspora: The Jews in Europe Since 1945 (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1996).

55. Ernest van den Haag, The Jewish Mystique (New York: Dell, [1969] 1971), p. 181.

56. Ibid., ch. 16.

57. Shapiro, Healing, pp. 234–35.

58. Ibid., p. 235.

59. Ibid., pp. 238–39.

children marry Jews.⁶⁰ One Jewish historian has called this process “the demographic hemorrhaging of American Jewry.”⁶¹ The birth rate for Jews is one quarter to one-third less than for gentiles. It is the lowest ethnic birthrate in America.⁶² Meanwhile, “Of the major American religious groups, the Jews consistently placed last in surveys of religious attendance and belief.”⁶³ As van den Haag predicted, synagogue attendance declined in the 1970s and 1980s. This was especially true in Conservative synagogues, the group positioned between the liberal Reform Jews and the Orthodox Jews.⁶⁴ Edward Shapiro ended his book, the fifth in a five-volume history, The Jewish People in America, with this forlorn hope: “Jews have survived one crisis after another, and perhaps they will also survive the freedom and prosperity of America.”⁶⁵ In 1996, the World Jewish Congress, held in Jerusalem, issued a demographic report, State of World Jewry. It reported that in the United States, over half of all Jews who married in the 1980s married a non-Jewish partner. About one-quarter of the children of such mixed marriages are reared as Jews.⁶⁶

As with all academic matters, this view is controversial and has critics within the Jewish academic community. The demographic data are not sufficiently comprehensive to be certain. But in a carefully reasoned, highly qualified essay, two Jewish scholars conclude that the pessimists have the trends on their side. American Jews are not reproducing at a rate high enough to replace themselves. Whites in general are in the same situation; Jews, however, reproduce at a rate lower than whites in general. They have the lowest rates of reproduction among whites in the United States. The replacement rate is 2.1 children per family. In the mid-1980's, Jews had a rate of under 1.5; whites in general, 1.7.⁶⁷

Mixed marriages by the mid-1980s were in the range of 30%. The authors comment that “the inferred U.S. rate of 30% for individuals means that 45 percent of all couples with at least one Jewish partner

60. Ibid., p. 253.

61. Ibid., p. 239.

62. Ibid., p. 243.

63. Ibid., p. 254.

64. Ibid., p. 255.

65. Ibid., p. 257.

66. Religious News Service, reported in Christian News (Feb. 12, 1996), p. 9.

67. Schmelz and Dellapergola, “Basic Trends,” Facing the Future, op. cit., p. 75: Table 1.

are mixed.”⁶⁸ Few of the non-Jewish spouses convert to Judaism.⁶⁹ This leads to the disinheritance of Judaism. The authors report on a remarkable finding. “A study in Philadelphia covering three generations found that mixed marriages in one generation entailed greater percentages of mixed marriages and increasingly smaller percentages of Jewish children in the following generations. If both parents of the Jewish respondent whose marriage was mixed had been Jews, 37 percent of the grandchildren were Jews; if the grandparents had been a mixed couple, none of the grandchildren were found to be Jewish in this particular study.”⁷⁰

By the late 1990s, intermarriage was at the 50% rate. Charles Krauthammer wrote that more Jews marry Christians (he meant gentiles) than marry Jews: about 52%.⁷¹ With only one in four of the children of these mixed marriages being reared Jewish, the future is grim for the survival of Judaism in America. “A population in which the biological replacement rate is 70 percent and the cultural replacement rate is 70% is headed for extinction. By this calculation, every 100 Jews are raising 56 Jewish children. In just two generations, 7 out of 10 Jews will vanish.”⁷² He concluded that the future of Judaism is dependent on the survival of the State of Israel. The Jews have put most of their eggs—in both senses—in one basket.⁷³

We can begin to understand why Jews prior to the First World War excommunicated adult children who converted to another religion, mainly Christianity. They would hold burial services: symbols of covenantal death. They would cut these defecting children out of their lives. They would not see their grandchildren grow up. They suffered the terrible pain of disinheriting their children, especially their sons, for the sake of the preservation of the religion of Judaism. It was a matter of survival.

Today, the religion of Judaism has been progressively replaced by the culture of Judaism—a culture without a public confession that invokes a supernatural God. Today, most American Jews do not believe that the God of the Bible brings covenantal sanctions in history for or against Jews on the basis of the community’s use of sanctions against

68. Ibid., p. 91.

69. Ibid., pp. 91–92.

70. Ibid., p. 93.

71. Charles Krauthammer, “At Last, Zion: Israel and the Fate of the Jews,” Weekly Standard (May 11, 1998), p. 24.

72. Ibid., p. 25.

73. Ibid., p. 29.

covenantal disinheritance. Tolerance has made mixed marriages acceptable. The defecting children are not cut off through the equivalent of excommunication. The grandchildren are not cut off. But the grandchildren are unlikely to bear children who will be reared as Jews. Under the conditions of mixed marriage, the great grandchildren of Jewish couples will not be Jews. Refusing to disinherit children who marry outside the faith, they disinherit Judaism instead. Covenantal tolerance within Jewish families produces heirs with a different confession of faith. This produces extinction of the original confession.

Judaism is a minority religion. Tolerance within the covenantal bond of marriage leads to absorption. If confession is not seen as more fundamental than sexual attraction, and therefore not a matter of corporate sanctions, the minority faith will disappear. The contest between passion and confession, if left to youth to decide, will lead to the demise of confession. If the surrounding population is larger than those doing the confessing, the aging minority confessors will not be replaced.

The rise of a far more self-conscious Orthodox Judaism, which recruits actively in the secularized Reform Jewish community, has gained considerable publicity. It is not clear yet that this activism has produced any statistically significant change in the religious commitment of most Jews. The high birth rates among Orthodox Jews may in time reverse the larger Jewish community's demographic decline, but in the early twenty-first century, American Judaism is slowly disappearing. Jews are a rapidly aging group: the oldest of all American ethnic groups.⁷⁴ This demographic fact is masked by the high visibility of Jewish political involvement and influence in national politics. The rise of Jewish national political influence since the end of World War II has paralleled the rise of influence of the farm bloc. The smaller the number of people actually represented by each bloc, the greater its highly concentrated and well-funded political influence. Both are down to about two percent of the population.⁷⁵

74. Thomas Sowell, Ethnic America: A History (New York: Basic Books, 1981), p. 95.

75. In 1991, Jews were two percent of the population. Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1994 (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1994), Table 85. In 1993, agriculture employed 2.5% of the work force. Ibid., Table 641. The rise of the gay rights movement after 1970 is an even better example. Homosexuals are a tiny minority—under one percent of the population—yet they have enormous political influence in the United States. As AIDS has reduced the number of homosexual men since the early 1980s, their political influence has increased dramatically.

Alan Dershowitz refers to an article in the October 1996 issue of Moment magazine. The article reports that, given present birth rates, by the fourth generation, 200 secular Jews will have produced 10 great-grandchildren, while the same number of Orthodox Jews will have produced more than 5,000.⁷⁶ It is clear what will happen unless covenantal attitudes regarding the future are reversed. Non-observant Jews in the United States will simply disappear.

What we see here is a fulfillment, three and a half millennia later, of Moses' warning. "Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you; (For the LORD thy God is a jealous God among you) lest the anger of the LORD thy God be kindled against thee, and destroy thee from off the face of the earth" (Deut. 6:14–15). The eighteenth century saw the construction of modernism's political temple by the Enlightenment, right wing and left wing. The acceptance of the legitimacy of this temple by the churches began the erosion of the ideal of Christendom.⁷⁷ The entrance of Jews into this temple in the nineteenth century was the beginning of a great apostasy for Judaism. The leaders of both religions concluded that there could be a reconciliation of confessions through the adoption of a neutral, common-ground confession: humanism. This common confession—politics, money, and education—seemed to offer a new era of economic growth, which in fact occurred. But with Western society's unprecedented increase in economic output has come a rise in philosophical despair, war, crime, decadence, family dissolution, and suicide.

Conclusion

Jews who live outside of the State of Israel suffer from a major problem: they do not face organized opposition. Dershowitz titles chapter two of The Vanishing American Jew, "Will the End of Anti-Semitism Mean the End of the Jews?" Jews do not face an armed majority that seeks their destruction. In the State of Israel, a nation surrounded by enemies, they do.

Organized opposition has always been a major factor in the preservation of the Jews' identity as a separate people. Western society was confessional. Jews did not share this confession. The ghetto was the solution for both sides. (For the anti-Talmudic Karaites, a ghetto within the ghetto was the solution.)⁷⁸ With the demise of the ghetto and the rise of Reform Judaism, the old barriers began to disappear. So did the Jews' old opposition to gentile culture. Jews had built effective cultural defenses against the conversion of individual Jews to rival religions, especially Christianity. But few Jews in 1850 perceived that secular humanism is a rival religion; even fewer perceived this in 1950. Christianity and Islam had a place for Jews as Jews, but outside the corridors of power. Humanism has a place for Jews as humanists inside the corridors of power. "Come one, come all," cry the humanists, "but you must leave your revelational civil laws outside the common Temple of Understanding." Jews in unprecedented numbers have succumbed to the siren song of social participation and leadership on these confessional terms.

76. Dershowitz, Vanishing American Jew, p. 25.

77. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Part 3. (Hhttp://bit.ly/gnpolpol) See Gary North, Conspiracy in Philadelphia: Origins of the United States Constitution (Harrisonburg, Virginia: Dominion Educational Ministries, 2004). (<http://garynorth.com/philadelphia.pdf>)

The cost has been high: escalating absorption. This has always been a threat to Jews. What is unique about humanism's theology of absorption is its theology of a common confession based either on natural law theory or evolutionary political participation. Judaism must now find ways to maintain itself apart from the shawmah Israel. The words of shawmah Israel—"Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD" (Deut. 6:4)—are still intact, but they have been revised in spirit: "Hear, O Israel, we are not gentiles." But there are two simple, all-too-familiar phrases that have proven incredibly powerful in negating the effects of this revised shawmah Israel. First, "Grandma, I won a scholarship to college." Grandma is dutifully proud. This is followed a few years later by, "Grandma, I'd like you to meet my fiancé." Pride is then accompanied by a sense of loss and a sense of foreboding. Both the sense of loss and the sense of foreboding should have accompanied the first announcement.

Pluralism has a program of assimilation. First, it offers the ballot. Then it offers the full-tuition scholarship. Then it offers the co-ed dorm. Then there is the sound of wedding bells—if things go well.⁷⁹ Then there is the sound of the pitter-patter of little feet. That sound, delightful as it is, has steadily drowned out the sound of the shawmaw

78. This was the case in twelfth-century Constantinople, according to Benjamin of Tudela, whose Book of Travels is a major primary source document of the era. Some 2,500 Jews lived in a fenced-off quarter: 2,000 Talmudists and 500 Karaites. A fence separated the two groups. Paul Johnson, A History of the Jews (New York: Harper & Row, 1987), p. 169.

79. The other possibility is the silent scream of the aborted child.

Israel.

Then how can the Jews be preserved until the time of the great eschatological conversion? Only by their abandonment of their toleration of mixed marriages and by their abandonment of small families. Jews do not evangelize the general population; hence, there are no workable survival strategies except population growth and the disinheritance of those within the community who abandon the shawmaw Israel. Jews cannot persevere as humanists. The demographics of Reform and Conservative Judaism will lead to their replacement by the Orthodox. Orthodox Jews rely on confessional prophylaxis, not biological. Liberal religion is having the same effect on American Protestantism's mainline denominations as it had a century ago on Europe's. Why should Reform and Conservative Jews think they are immune?

Meanwhile, Orthodox Jews, who frown on contraception, are biding their time while filling cribs.

Appendix E

FREE MARKET CAPITALISM

[This essay appeared in the 1984 book edited by Robert Clouse, Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views, published by InterVarsity Press. It was the first essay. Within a year, InterVarsity Press pulled the book off the market. It sold 6,000 copies to my company, Dominion Press, at 25 cents each. Dr. Clouse wrote to me saying that he could not understand this; the book had been selling well. I like to think that it was my essay and my three rejoinders to the statist who wrote the other three essays. I like to think that I was a great embarrassment to them. The neo-evangelicals who ran IVP were politically liberal, as their publication of D. Gareth Jones' pro-abortion book, Brave New People (1984), indicated. IVP soon suppressed that book, too, because of a successful public relations campaign by anti-abortion Christians. The English branch of IVP kept it in print, which tells you something about the evangelical community in England. I have retained the format in which my essay was originally submitted, including IVP's footnoting style. I have added letters designating the subheads for easier reference. I include this essay in this book because it reveals the extent to which I relied on Deuteronomy, a fact noted at the time by one of the other essayists, William Diehl, a Keynesian, who contemptuously dismissed my essay because of this.]

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour. (Lev. 19:15, KJV)¹

I have been young, and now am old; yet I have not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread. (Ps 37:25)

The topic of wealth and poverty should not be discussed apart from a consideration of the law of God and its relationship to the covenants, for it is in God's law that we find the Bible's blueprint for economics. Biblical justice, biblical law, and economic growth are intimately linked. The crucial section of Scripture which explains this relationship is Deuteronomy 28. There are external blessings for those societies that conform externally to the laws of God (vv. 1–14), and there are external curses for those societies that fail to conform externally to these laws (vv. 15–68).

1. All of my citations of Scripture in this essay are from the King James Version.

And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth: And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God. Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field. Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store. . . . The LORD shall establish thee an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, and walk in his ways. And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the LORD; and they shall be afraid of thee. And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers to give thee (Deut 28:1–5, 9–11).

Deuteronomy 28 is an extension and expansion of chapter 8, in which the relationship between law, blessings, and the covenant is outlined. God was about to bring his people into the Promised Land, as the fulfilment of the promise given to Abraham. The “iniquity of the Amorites” (Gen 15:16) was at last full. The Canaanites’ era of dominion over the land was about to end. On what terms would the Hebrews hold title to the land and its productivity? Deuteronomy 8 spells it out: covenantal faithfulness. This meant adherence to the laws of God.²

Deuteronomy 8 reveals to us the foundations of economic growth. First, God grants to his people the gift of life. This is an act of grace. He sustained them in the years of wandering in the wilderness, humbling them to prove their faith—their obedience to his commandments (v. 2)—and providing them with manna, so that they might learn that “man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth men live” (v. 3b). A 40-year series of miracles sustained them constantly, for their clothing did not grow old, and their feet did not swell (v. 4). He also provided them with chastening, so that they might learn to respect his commandments (vv. 5-6)—the way of life. Second, God provided them with land, namely, the land flowing with milk and honey (vv. 7-8): “A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass” (v. 9). This also was an act of grace.

2. On the question of Old Testament law in New Testament times, see Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics (Nutley, N.J.: Craig Press, 1977).

Life and land: Here are the two fundamental assets in any economic system. Human labor, combined with natural resources over time, is the foundation of all productivity. The third familiar feature of economic analysis, capital, is actually the combination of land plus labor over time. (The time factor is important. From it stems the economic phenomenon of the rate of interest: the discount of future goods against the identical goods held in the present.³ (Warning: I use footnotes to add explanatory material, to keep from cluttering up the text too much.) The original sources of production are land and labor.⁴ If the Hebrews were willing to dig, the land would produce its fruits.

So much for the gifts. What about the conditions of tenure? They were not to forget their God. They were not to “accept the gift but forget the Giver,” to use a familiar expression.

The very fulness of the external, visible, measurable blessings would serve as a source of temptation for them:

When thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shalt bless the LORD thy God for the good land which he hath given thee. Beware that thou forget not the LORD thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day: Lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein; and when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied; Then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the

3. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action, 3rd ed. (Chicago: Regnery, 1966), chap. 18. Let me give an example of the “discount for time.” If I were to announce that you have just won a new Rolls-Royce, and that you have a choice of delivery date, today or one year from today, which delivery date would you select (other things being equal)? You would want immediate delivery. Why? Because present goods are worth more to you than the same goods in the future. You might accept the Rolls-Royce a year from now if I paid you a rate of interest, in addition to the car. In fact, at some rate of interest you would accept the later date, unless you have a terminal disease, or an unquenchable lust for a Rolls-Royce.

4. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, 2 vols. (1962; reprinted., New York: New York University Press, 1979), I, pp. 284–87, 410–24. See esp. chap. 6. [This book was republished in 1993 by the Mises Institute, Auburn, Alabama.]

LORD thy God. . . . (Deut 8:10–14a)

God provides gifts: life and land. He also provides a law-order which enables his people to expand their holdings of capital assets (the implements of production) and consumer goods. But these assets are not held by men apart from the ethical terms of God's covenant. The temptation before man is the same as the temptation before Adam: to forget God and to substitute himself as God (Gen 3:5). It is the assumption of all Satanic religion, the assumption of humanism, the sovereignty of man. God warned the Israelites against this sin—the sin of presuming their own autonomy:

And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day (Deut 8:17–18).

These words lay the foundation of all sustained economic growth—and I stress the word sustained. While it is possible for a society to experience economic growth without honoring God's law, eventually men's ethical rebellion leads to external judgment and the termination of economic growth (Deut 28:15–68). It is this concept of God as the giver which underlay James's announcement: "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." (Jas 1:17)

If men whose society has been (and therefore is still) covenanted with God should fall into this temptation to forget God and to attribute their wealth to the might of their own hands, then God will judge them:

And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God. (vv. 19–20).

God has given us an outline of the covenantal foundations of a holy commonwealth.⁵ This is as close as the Bible comes to a univer-

5. On the holy commonwealth ideal in early American history, see Rousas J. Rushdoony, This Independent Republic (1964 reprint ed., Fairfax, Va.: Thoburn Press, sally valid “stage theory” of human history or economic development.⁶ Long-term economic growth is based on men’s honoring the explicit terms of God’s law. The stages are as follows:

1. God’s grace in providing life, land, and law
2. Society’s adherence to the external terms of God’s law
3. External blessings in response to this faithfulness
4. Temptation: the lure of autonomy
5. Response:
 - a. Capitulation that leads to external judgment; or
 - b. Resistance that leads to further economic growth

The covenant is supposed to be self-reinforcing, or as economists sometimes say, it offers a system of positive feedback. Verse 18 is the key: God gives his people external blessings in order “that he may establish his covenant which he swore unto thy fathers. . . .” The promise would be visibly fulfilled by their entry into the Promised Land, thereby giving them confidence in the reliability of God’s word. God’s law-order is reliable, which means that men can rely on biblical law as a tool of dominion, which will enable them to fulfill (though imperfectly, as sinners) the terms of God’s dominion covenant: “And God blessed them [Adam and Eve], and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth” (Gen 1:28). This covenant was reaffirmed with Noah (Gen 9:1–7). It is still binding on Noah’s heirs.⁷

The paradox of Deuteronomy 8 is this: Blessings, while inescapable for a godly society, are a great temptation. Blessings are a sign of God’s favor, yet in the fifth stage—the society’s response to the temptation of autonomy—blessings can result in comprehensive, external, social judgment. Thus, there is no way to determine simply from the existence of great external wealth and success of all kinds—the successes listed in Deuteronomy 28:1–14—that a society is facing either the prospect of continuing positive feedback or imminent negative feedback (namely, destruction). The ethical condition of the people, not their financial condition, is determinative.

1978), esp. chap. 8.

6. Daniel’s interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar’s dream about the great image was historically specific: four human empires (Babylon, Medo-Persia, Macedonia, and Rome), followed by the fifth Empire, God’s (Dan 2:31–45). This was not an “ideal type,” to use Max Weber’s terminology, nor was it a developmental model. Hesiod’s seemingly similar construction (Greece, 8th century, B.C.)—from the Age of Gold to the Age of Iron—was, in contrast, an attempt at constructing a universal model of the process of decay in man’s history. Hesiod, Works and Days, trans. Richmond Lattimore (Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1959), lines 109–201. The Bible’s developmental model is based on ethics—conformity to or rebellion against God’s covenant—not metaphysics, meaning some sort of inescapable aspect of the creation.

7. Gary North, The Dominion Covenant: Genesis (Tyler, Tex.: Institute for Christian Economics, 1982).

Visible success is a paradox: It can testify to two radically different ethical conditions. Biblical ethical analysis, because it recognizes the binding nature of revealed biblical law, is therefore a fundamental aspect of all valid historiography, social commentary, and economic analysis. An index number of economic wealth is a necessary but insufficient tool of economic analysis. The numbers do not tell us all we need to know about the progress of a particular society or civilization. We also need God's law as an ethical guide, our foundation of ethical analysis.

A. Ethics and Economic Analysis

A great debate has raged for over a century within the camp of the economists: "Is capitalism morally valid?" Marxists and socialists ask this question and then answer it: no. "But capitalism is efficient," respond the defenders of the free market. A few of the defenders also try to muster ethical arguments based on the right of individuals to control the sale of their property, including their labor services, without interference from the civil government.⁸ They rest their moral case on the presumed autonomy of the individual.

This sort of ethical analysis has not convinced many critics of capitalism. They reject the operating presupposition of free market economic analysis: methodological individualism. As methodological collectivists, they deny the right of men to use their property against the "common good." Problem: Who defines the common good? (The Christian answers that the Bible defines the common good, and sets forth the institutional arrangements that will achieve it. The Bible teaches neither collectivism nor individualism; it proclaims methodological covenantalism.)⁹ Another problem: Even if the common good can be defined by humanistic social commentators, who has the right to enforce it? Finally, can the state, through its bureaucracy, enforce the common good in a cost-effective manner? Will the results resemble the official ethical goals of the planners? What kinds of incentives can be built into a state-planned economy that will enable it to perform as efficiently as a profit-seeking free market economy?¹⁰

8. Murray N. Rothbard, The Ethics of Liberty (Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1982).

9. Gary North, "Methodological Covenantalism," Chalcedon Report (Oct., 1977), published by the Chalcedon Foundation, Box 158, Vallecito, California, 95251.

The fundamental issue is ethical. The question of efficiency is a subordinate one. Few Marxists or socialist scholars seriously argue any longer that the substitution of socialist ownership of the means of production will lead to an increase of per capita output beyond what private ownership would have produced. The debates today rage over what kinds of economic output are morally valid. Also, who should determine what “the people”—whoever they are—really need? The free market, with its system of private ownership and freely fluctuating prices? Or the civil government, with its system of political competition and lifetime bureaucratic functionaries?¹¹

The real debate is a debate over ethical issues, something that economists have tried to hide or deny since the seventeenth century.¹² Economist William Letwin, who is wholeheartedly enthusiastic about this supposed triumph of value-free economics, does admit that there are difficulties with this outlook: “It was exceedingly difficult to treat economics in a scientific fashion, since every economic act, being the action of a human being, is necessarily also a moral act. If the magnitude of difficulty rather than the extent of the achievement be the measure, then the making of economics was the greatest scientific ac-

10. One of the finest books ever written in economics covers these questions in detail: Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980). Sowell is an ex-Marxist, so he knows the arguments well. See also Ludwig von Mises, Socialism: An Economic and Sociological Analysis (1922; reprint ed., Indianapolis, Ind.: Liberty Press, 1981). This was first published in the United States by Yale University Press in 1953.

11. Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, N.J.: Craig Press, 1973), chap. 20: “Statist Bureaucracy in the Modern Economy.”

12. “The distinction between moral and technical knowledge is elusive. . . . From the standpoint of any science the distinction is absolutely essential. A subject is not opened to scientific enquiry until its technical aspect has been sundered from its moral aspect. . . . [T]here can be no doubt that economic theory owes its present development to the fact that some men, in thinking of economic phenomena, forcefully suspended all judgments of theology, morality, and justice, were willing to consider the economy as nothing more than an intricate mechanism, refraining for the while from asking whether the mechanism worked for good or evil. That separation was made during the seventeenth century. . . . The economist’s view of the world, which the public cannot yet comfortably stomach, was introduced by a remarkable tour de force, an intellectual revolution brought off in the seventeenth century.” William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (1963; reprint ed., Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday/Anchor, 1965), pp. 158–59.

complishment of the seventeenth century.”¹³ Apparently even more important than Newton’s discoveries!¹⁴ This faith in analytic neutrality has been reaffirmed by the developers of the two most prominent schools of free market economic analysis, Milton Friedman¹⁵ and Ludwig von Mises.¹⁶

One reason why the critics have been so successful in their attack against the academic economists’ hypothetically neutral defense of the free market is this: Hardly anyone in the secular world really believes any longer that moral or intellectual neutrality is possible. This is why Christian economics offers a true intellectual alternative: it rests on a concept of objective revelation by a true Person, the Creator of all knowledge and the Lord of history. The Bible affirms that neutrality is a myth; either we stand with Christ or we scatter abroad (Matt 12:30).¹⁷ The works of the law—not the law, but the works of the law—are written on every human heart (Rom 2:14–15).¹⁸ No man can escape the testimony of his own being, and nature itself, to the existence if a Creator (Rom 1:18–23).

Socialists deny the possibility of neutral economic analysis, and

13. Ibid., p. 159.

14. Letwin does not actually say this. Perhaps he forgot about Newton. Or perhaps he was referring solely to social science when he named economics as “the greatest scientific accomplishment of the seventeenth century.” Or possibly he really meant what he wrote, which boggles the mind.

15. Milton Friedman, in a classic essay on epistemology, writes: “Positive economics is in principle independent of any particular ethical position or normative judgment.” Friedman, Essays in Positive Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953), p. 4. For a critique of the hypothesis of neutrality in economics, see Gary North, “Economics: From Reason to Intuition,” in North, ed., Foundations of Christian Scholarship (Vallecito, Calif.: Ross House Books, 1976).

16. Mises writes: “In considering changes in the nation’s legal system, in rewriting or repealing existing laws and writing new laws, the issue is not justice, but social expediency and social welfare. There is no such thing as an absolute notion of justice not referring to a definite system of social organization. It is not justice that determines the decision in favor of a definite social system. It is, on the contrary, the social system which determines what should be deemed right and what wrong. There is neither right nor wrong outside the social nexus. . . . It is nonsensical to justify or to reject interventionism from the point of view of fictitious and arbitrary absolute justice. It is vain to ponder over the just delimitation of the tasks of government from any preconceived standard of perennial values.” Mises, Human Action, p. 721.

17. On the impossibility of neutrality, see the writings of Cornelius Van Til, especially The Defense of the Faith, rev. ed.. (Phillipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1963).

18. For a discussion of the similarities and differences between “the law” and “the works of the law” written on human hearts, see John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 1959), I, pp. 74–76.

their criticism has become far more effective as humanistic scholarship has drifted from faith in objective knowledge into an ever-growing awareness that all human knowledge is relative. (Marxists still believe in objective knowledge for Marxists, but not for any other ideological group.)¹⁹ Since all intellectual analysis is tied to a man's operating presuppositions about the nature of reality, and since these presuppositions, being pre-theoretical, cannot be disproven by logic, the socialist critic's logic is also undergirded by his equally unprovable presuppositions.²⁰ (There is a problem for non-Christian subjectivist thought, however: the breakdown of objective science.)²¹ Even a few economists are slowly coming to face the implications of subjectivism with respect to objective, neutral analysis, but not many, and their books are not yet influential. These men tend to be associated with "new left" economics, and the "establishment" is not impressed.²²

As Christians we must always maintain that ethics is basic to all social analysis. We must make clear what most professional economists prefer to ignore: It is never a question of analysis apart from ethical evaluation; it is only a question of which ethical system, meaning whose law-order: God's or self-professed autonomous man's? Because

19. Marxists believe in objective truth—proletarian truth—but they hold that all other approaches are intellectual defenses of a particular class perspective. All philosophy is class philosophy—a weapon used by one class against its rivals. Since history is objectively on the side of the proletariat, there can be objective truth for Marxists only. See Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution (Nutley, N.J.: Craig Press, 1968), pp. 61–71. [Reprinted in 1989 by the Institute for Christian Economics.] (<http://bit.ly/gnmrnr>)

20. Compare Thomas Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, rev. ed. (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1970). See also Imre Lakatos and Alan E. Musgrave, eds., Criticism and the Growth of Knowledge (Cambridge: At the University Press, 1970). The works of Herman Dooyeweerd, the Dutch legal philosopher, deal extensively with the pre-theoretical presuppositions of all philosophy: In the Twilight of Western Thought (Philipsburg, N.J.: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1960); A New Critique of Theoretical Thought, 4 vols. (Presbyterian and Reformed, 1954).

21. Stanley L. Jaki, The Road of Science and the Ways to God (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1978), chap. 15.

22. See, for example, Walter A. Weisskopf, Alienation and Economics (New York: E. P. Dutton, 1971); Mark A. Lutz and Kenneth Lux, The Challenge of Humanistic Economics (Menlo Park, California: Benjamin/Cummings, 1979). Lux is a clinical psychologist, not an economist, and Lutz taught at an obscure college. Benjamin/Cummings is not a familiar name in publishing. I am not berating these men, their publisher, or their employers, though I do not share their economic views. I am pointing to the difficulty of getting such views discussed within the normal channels of the economics profession. The economics profession has not adopted the forthright acceptance by these men of the obvious implications of subjectivism for the neutrality doctrine.

the Bible provides us with a comprehensive system of ethics, it thereby provides us with a blueprint for economics.²³

B. Biblical Law and Exploitation

The prophets came before Israel and called the people back to the law of God. The people did not respond; the result was captivity. The law of God, when enforced, prevents exploitation. The case-law applications of the law are therefore to be honored. Even the supposedly obscure case laws often have implications far beyond their immediate setting. For example, “Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn” (Deut 25:4). Paul tells us that this law gives us a principle: “The labourer is worthy of his reward” (1 Tim 5:18b). Christ also said that the laborer is worthy of his hire (Lk 10:7). In short, if we must allow our beasts of burden to enjoy the fruits of their labor, how much more should human laborers enjoy the fruits of their labor!

Problem: Who decides how much to pay laborers? The church? The state? The free market? The Bible is quite clear on this point: Laborers and employers should bargain together. The parable of the laborers in the vineyard is based on the moral validity of the right of contract. The employer hired men throughout the day, paying each man an agreed-upon wage, a penny. Those hired early in the morning complained when others hired late in the day received the same wage. In other words, they accused their employer of “exploitation.” This was an “unfair labor practice.” His answer:

Friend, I do thee no wrong; didst not thou agree with me for a penny? Take [that which] thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this last [laborer], even as unto thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good? (Matt 20:13–15)

Wasn't he morally obligated—and shouldn't he have been legally obligated—to have paid more, retroactively, to those hired early in the day? No. When they were hired, he offered them the best deal they believed they had available to them. He was “meeting the market.” Had a better offer been available elsewhere, they would have accepted it. Alternatively, should he have paid less to the men hired later in the day? No. He owed them the wage he had agreed to pay. Those hired in the morning had not known that a job would be available later in the day at the same wage. They faced economic uncertainty. (Economic uncertainty about the future is an inescapable fact of human action in a world in which only God is omniscient. Any system of economics that in any way ignores or de-emphasizes the economic effects of uncertainty is innately, inescapably erroneous, for it relies on a false doctrine of man.) They took the best offer that any employer made. If they had been omniscient, they might have waited, lounged around for almost the whole day, and then accepted an eleventh-hour job offer. "A full day's pay for an hour's labor: what a deal!" (An analogous approach to salvation: refuse to accept the Gospel in your youth, so that you can "eat, drink, and be merry," and then accept Christ on your deathbed. "A full life's worth of salvation for a last-minute repentance: what a deal!") But men are not omniscient. So they act to benefit themselves with the best knowledge at their disposal.²⁴ The employer had done them no wrong. Their eye was evil.

23. David Chilton, “The Case of the Missing Blueprints,” Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VIII (Summer, 1981).

Christ used this parable to illustrate a theological principle, the sovereignty of God in choosing men: "So the last shall be first, and the first last; for many be called, but few chosen" (v. 16). The employer had a job opportunity to offer men; God offers salvation in the same way. The employer paid a full day's wage to those coming late in the day. If this action of the employer was wrong, then God's analogous action in electing both young and old ("late comers" and "early comers") to the same salvation is even more wrong. But this is the argument of the ethical rebel; Paul dismisses it as totally illegitimate. "What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion" (Rom 9:14–15).

One of the most important facts of economics is this: Employers compete against employers, while workers compete against workers. Employers do not want rival employers to buy any valuable economic factor of production at a discount. Those who hire laborers do so in order to use their services profitably. They have no incentive to pass along savings to their competitors. If a worker's labor is worth five shekels per hour to two different potential employers, and the worker is about to be hired by one of them for four shekels, the second employer has an incentive to offer him more. He will offer him enough to lure him away from the competitor, but not so much that he expects to lose money on the transaction. The free market's competitive auction process therefore offers economic rewards to employers for doing the morally correct thing, namely, honoring the biblical principle that the laborer is worthy of his hire.

24. Again, consult Sowell's book, Knowledge and Decisions, for a detailed analysis of this issue. Also, see the classic study by Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (1921; reprint ed., New York: Augustus M. Kelley, Pubs., n.d.).

Similarly, workers compete against workers. They want jobs. If an employer is offering a job to one employee for more than another person willing to work for, the second person has an incentive to step in and utter those magic words: "I'll work for less!" He underbids the competition. (When I say "underbid," I mean underbid in terms of money; I could also say that he overbids his competitors in terms of the hours of labor that he offers the employer for a given wage payment.) The free market's auction process offers an incentive to workers to offer employers "an honest day's labor for an honest day's pay." In short, the free market offers economic rewards to laborers for doing the morally correct thing, just as it offers employers.

Very, very rarely do employers and workers in a modern industrialized economy compete head to head. These instances take place when neither the worker nor the employer has a good idea of his own competition, or when one of the two is ignorant. Laborers may not know the going wage rate. Employers may not know if other workers are available for the money they are willing to pay. So it becomes a question of negotiation, the same kind of negotiation that Esau and Jacob transacted for Esau's birthright (Gen 23:29–34).

There is nothing wrong with competitive bargaining, as I explain in chapter eighteen of my economic commentary on the Bible, The Dominion Covenant: Genesis. Normally, competing offers are well known to all parties; advertising has made information on pricing and services widely available. "Help wanted" signs and classified ads do more for the income of the majority of laborers than all the trade unions in the land—legalized monopolies established by one group of workers to deny the legal right of other workers to compete against them.²⁵ Nevertheless, where there are gaps in men's information, men must pay to improve their knowledge. Information is not a zero-cost good. Any system of economic analysis which ignores or de-emphasizes this economic fact of life is innately, inescapably erroneous.

When a society guarantees men that they will be allowed to keep the fruits of their labor, it promotes the spread of information. Men can afford to invest in the expensive process of improving their knowledge. They are able to capitalize their efforts. If they are successful in improving their knowledge about competing economic offers, either as employers or laborers, they reap the rewards. Members of society are the beneficiaries, since better knowledge means less waste—fewer scarce economic resources expended to achieve given economic ends. The ends are set by competing bidders in the “auction” for consumer goods and services.²⁶ It should be recognized from the beginning that a deeply felt hostility toward the moral legitimacy of the auction process undergirds the socialist movements of our era.

25. Gary North, "A Christian View of Labor Unions," Biblical Economics Today (April/May 1978), published by the Institute for Christian Economics.

C. Predictable Law

The Bible instructs a nation’s rulers not to respect persons when administering justice (Deut 1:17). Both the rich man and the poor man, the homeborn and the stranger, are to be ruled by the same law (Ex 12:49). Biblical law is a form of God’s grace to mankind; it is to be dispensed to all without prejudice. This is the implication of Leviticus 19:15, which introduced this chapter. The predictability of the judicial system is what God requires of those in positions of authority.

Predictable (“inflexible”) law compels the state and the church to declare in advance just exactly what the law requires. This allows men to plan for the future more efficiently. “Flexible” law is another word for arbitrary law. When a man drives his automobile at 55 miles per hour in a 55 m.p.h. zone, he expects to be left alone by highway patrol officers. The predictability of the law makes it possible for highway rules to be effective. Men can make better judgments about the decisions of other drivers when speed limits are posted and highway patrol officers enforce them. The better we can plan for the future, the lower the costs of our decision-making. *Predictable law reduces waste.*²⁷

The Hebrews were required by God to assemble the nation—rich and poor, children and strangers—every seventh year to listen to the reading of the law (Deut 31:10–13). Ignorance of the law was no excuse. At the same time, biblical law was comprehensible. It was not so complex that only lawyers in specialized areas could grasp its principles. The case laws, such as the prohibition on muzzling the ox as he treaded out the corn, brought the general principles down into concrete, familiar terminology. In this sense, biblical faith is essentially a democratic faith, as G. Ernest Wright argues, for it can be laid hold of with power by the simplest and most humble. We are surrounded by mystery, and ultimate knowledge is beyond our grasp. Yet God has brought himself (Deut 4:7) and his word to us. We can have life by faith and by loyal obedience to his covenant, even though our knowledge is limited by our finitude. One need not wait to comprehend the universe in order to obtain the promised salvation. It is freely offered in the covenant now.²⁸

26. Gary North, “Exploitation and Knowledge,” The Freeman (January 1982), published by the Foundation for Economic Education, Irvington, New York, 10533.

27. Perhaps the most eloquent and scholarly work that argues for the connection between predictable law, human freedom, and economic productivity is the book by the Nobel Prize winner in economics, F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1960), esp. the first 15 chapters. See also his trilogy, Law, Legislation and Liberty (Chicago: Univ. of Chicago Press, 1973–80).

The law of God gives to men a tool of dominion over an otherwise essentially mysterious nature, including human nature—not dominion as exercised by a lawless tyrant, but dominion through obedience to God and service to man.²⁹

For example, consider the effects of the eighth commandment, “Thou shalt not steal.” Men are made more secure in the ownership of property. This commandment gives men security. They can then make rational (cost-effective) judgments about the best uses of their property, including their skills. They make fewer mistakes. This lowers the costs of goods to consumers through competition.

Christian commentators have from earliest times understood that the prohibition of theft, like the prohibition against covetousness, serves as a defense of private property. Theft is a self-conscious, willful act of coercive wealth redistribution, and therefore it is a denial of the legitimacy and reliability of God’s moral and economic law-order.

The immediate economic effect of widespread theft in society is the creation of insecurity. This lowers the market value of goods, since people are less willing to bid high prices for items that are likely to be stolen. Uncertainty is increased, which requires that people invest a greater proportion of their assets in buying protection services or devices. Scarce economic resources are shifted from production and consumption to crime fighting. This clearly lowers per capita productivity and therefore per capita wealth, at least among law-abiding people. Theft leads to wasted resources.

28. G. Ernest Wright, “Deuteronomy,” in The Interpreter’s Bible, vol. 2, p. 509; cited by R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, vol. 2, Law and Liberty (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1982), p. 413.

29. Rushdoony, Law and Society, pp. 403–6.

The internal restraints on theft that are provided by godly preaching and upbringing help to reduce crime, thereby increasing per capita wealth within the society. Godly preaching against theft is therefore a form of capital investment for the society as a whole (what the economists call “social overhead capital”), for it releases scarce economic resources that would otherwise have been spent on the protection of private and public property. Such preaching also reduces the necessary size of the civil government, which is important in reducing the growth of unwarranted state power.

What is true about the reduction of theft is equally true concerning the strengthening of men’s commitment to private property in general. When property rights are carefully defined and enforced, the value of property increases. Allen and Alchian, in their standard economics textbook, have commented on this aspect of property rights:

For market prices to guide allocation of goods, there must be an incentive for people to express and to respond to offers. If it is costly to reveal bids and offers and to negotiate and make exchanges, the gains from exchange might be offset. If each person speaks a different language [as they did at the tower of Babel], if thievery is rampant, or if contracts are likely to be dishonored, then negotiation, transaction, and policing costs will be so high that fewer market exchanges will occur. If property rights in goods are weaker, ill-defined, or vague, their reallocation is likely to be guided by lower offers and bids. Who would offer as much for a coat likely to be stolen?³⁰

The authors believe that the higher market value attached to goods protected by strong ownership rights spurs individuals to seek laws that will strengthen private-property rights. Furthermore, to the extent that private-property rights exist, the power of the civil government to control the uses of goods is thereby decreased. This, unfortunately, has led politicians and jurists to resist the spread of secured private-property rights.³¹

There is no question that a society which honors the terms of the commandment against theft will enjoy greater per capita wealth than one which does not, other things being equal. Such a society rewards honest people with greater possessions. This is as it should be. A widespread hostility to theft, especially from the point of view of self-government (self-restraint), allows men to make more accurate decisions concerning what they want to buy, and therefore what they need to produce in order to offer something of value in exchange for the items they want. Again, I cite Allen and Alchian:

30. Armen A. Alchian and William R. Allen, University Economics: Elements of Inquiry, 3rd ed. (Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1972), p. 141. Italics in the original.

31. Idem.

The more expensive is protection against theft, the more common is thievery. Suppose that thievery of coats were relatively easy. People would be willing to pay only a lower price for coats. The lower market price of coats will understate the value of coats, for it will not include the value to the thief. If the thief were induced to rent or purchase a used coat, the price of coats would more correctly represent their value to society. It follows that the cheaper the policing costs, the greater the efficiency with which values of various uses or resources are revealed. The more likely something is to be stolen, the less of it that will be produced.³²

When communities set up “neighborhood watches” to keep an eye on each other’s homes, and to call the police when something suspicious is going on, the value of property in the community is increased, or at least the value of the property on the streets where the neighbors are helping each other.

We want sellers to respond to our offers for goods or services. At the same time, we as producers want to know what buyers are willing and able to pay for our goods and services. The better everyone’s knowledge of the markets we deal in, the fewer the resources necessary for advertising, negotiating, and guessing about the future. These resources can then be devoted to producing goods and services to satisfy wants that would otherwise have gone unsatisfied. The lower our transaction costs, in other words, the more wealth we can devote to the purchase and sale of the items involved in the transactions.

One transaction cost is the defense of property against theft. God graciously steps in and offers us a “free good”: a heavenly system of punishment. To the extent that criminals and potential criminals believe that God does punish criminal behavior, both on earth and in heaven, their costs of operation go up. When the price of something rises, other things being equal, less of it will be demanded. God raises the risks (“price”) of theft to thieves. Less criminal behavior is therefore a predictable result of a widespread belief in God’s judgments, both temporal and final. When the commandment against theft is preached, and when both the preachers and the hearers believe in the God who has announced his warning against theft, then we can expect less crime and greater per capita wealth in that society. God's eternal criminal justice system is flawless, and it is also inescapable, so it truly is a free good—a gift from God which is a sign of his grace. This is one aspect of the grace of law.³³ It leads to increased wealth for those who respect God's laws.

32. Ibid., p. 239.

D. Compulsory Wealth Redistribution

The Bible says, "Thou shalt not steal." It does not say, "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote." A society which begins to adopt taxation policies that exceed the tithe—10 per cent of income—thereby increases economic uncertainty, as do other types of theft, both public and private. This increase in uncertainty may be even more disrupting, statistically, than losses from burglary or robbery, because private insurance companies can insure against burglary and robbery. After all, who can trust a civil government which claims the right to take more of a person's income than God requires for the support of his kingdom? What kind of protection from injustice can we expect from such a civil government? The next wave of politically imposed wealth redistribution is always difficult to predict, and therefore difficult to prepare for, so the costs of production increase.

When Samuel came before the Hebrews to warn them about the evils of establishing a king in Israel, he thought he might dissuade them by telling them that the king would take a whopping 10 per cent of their production (1 Sam 8:15). They did not listen. (And, for the record, neither have Christians listened to warnings against the forty and fifty per cent taxation levels of the modern welfare state.) The Pharaoh of Joseph's day imposed a tax of 20 per cent (Gen 47: 24–26). Egypt was one of the great tyrannies of the ancient world.³⁴ It was probably the most massive bureaucracy in man's history until the twentieth century.³⁵ Yet every modern welfare state—meaning every Western industrial nation in the late twentieth century—would have to cut its total 33. Ernest F. Kevan, The Grace of Law: A Study in Puritan Theology (1963; reprint ed., Grand Rapids, Mich.: Baker Book House, 1983).

34. See the study by Karl Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism: A Comparative Study of Total Power (New Haven: Conn.: Yale Univ. Press, 1957).

35. Lewis Mumford, "The First Megamachine," Daedalus (1966); reprinted in Lewis Mumford, Interpretations and Forecasts: 1922–1972 (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973). See also Max Weber, "Max Weber on Bureaucratization" (1909), in J. P. Meyer, Max Weber and German Politics: A Study in Political Sociology (London: Faber & Faber, 1956), p. 127.

tax burden by at least half in order to return to the twenty per cent level of Egypt in Joseph's day.³⁶

E. Foreign Aid: State to State

Foreign aid means an increase in taxes in one nation, so that money can go to other nations. State-to-state aid must go through official, bureaucratic channels. Only in major emergencies—famines, floods, earthquakes—do foreign governments allow Western nations to bring food and clothing directly to their citizens. They understand the obvious: The increasing dependence of citizens on goods from a foreign civil government increases their direct dependence on that foreign civil government. He who pays the piper is in a position to call the tune. Oddly enough, intellectual proponents of increased state welfare fail to recognize what leaders in Third World nations understand immediately, namely, "there ain't no such thing as a free lunch." With the benefits come controls and future political or diplomatic obligations.

When the United States sends food under Public Law 480 (passed in 1954), to India, the Indian government, not private businesses, allocates it—or whatever is left after the rats at the docks and in the storage facilities consume approximately half of it. (Rats and sacred cows in India consume half of that nation's agricultural output. It would take a train 3,000 miles long to haul the grain eaten by Indian rats in a single year.³⁷)

There is a great temptation for government officials of underdeveloped nations to use this food to free up state-controlled capital which is then used to increase investments in heavy industry—investments that produce visible results that are politically popular—projects that cynics refer to as pyramids. These large-scale industrial projects are in effect paid for by the food subsidies sent by the West. Without the free food sent by the West, these uneconomical, large-scale projects would be out of the question politically. Even worse, foreign aid enables governments to spend heavily on military equipment that will be used to suppress political opponents or other Third World

36. For a discussion of why Joseph's imposition of a twenty per cent tax in Egypt was not part of God's law for Israel, see Gary North, Dominion Covenant: Genesis, chap. 23.

37. The estimate of Dr. Max Milner of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He says that in one recent year, rats in the Philippine Islands consumed over half the sugar and corn, and ninety per cent of the rice crop. "Over 40% of the World's Food Is Lost to Pests," Washington Post, 6 March 1977.

nations—themselves recipients of Western foreign aid.³⁸

What would happen if the West were to stop shipping food at below-market prices? Local farmers in the recipient nations have been hurt—or in some cases, driven into bankruptcy—by the West's below-production-cost food, so they have reduced investments in the agricultural system. These nations have become increasingly dependent on the West's free food. If the subsidies were to cease, the agricultural base might be insufficient to provide for the domestic population, for agricultural output has been reduced as a result of taxpayer-financed cut-throat competition from Western governments that gave away the food. At the same time, if the subsidies were to cease, heavy industry projects could also go bankrupt (or, more accurately, may lose even more tax money than they lose already, and therefore become political liabilities).

Let us not be naive about the political impetus for shipments of American farm products under Public Law 480. The farm bloc and the large multinational grain companies are major supporters of the compulsory "charity" of foreign food aid, just as farmers favor the food stamp program. Farmers can sell their crops to the U.S. government at above-market prices, and then the government can give the food away to people who would not have bought it anyway. Politicians like the program also because the U.S. government uses the promise of free food as a foreign policy lever.³⁹ Government subsidies to agriculture have become a way of life in the United States, as have government controls on agriculture.⁴⁰

We know that foreign governments are hostile to what they refer to as "Western control," when private foreign capital comes into their nations. Why this hostility? Because pro-socialist political leaders in underdeveloped nations resent the shift of sovereignty from civil government to the private sector, both foreign and domestic. Yet these same officials beg for more state-to-state aid from the West. Why? Because they control the allocation of this form of economic aid after it arrives. The question of foreign aid, like all other forms of compulsory economic redistribution, raises questions of sovereignty.

Should we recommend increased taxes in Western nations in order to “feed the starving poor” in foreign nations? Is this what Christ meant by loving our neighbors? Are Western tax revenues really feeding the starving poor, or are they financing the bureaucratic institutions of political control that have been created by pro-socialist, Western-educated political leaders who dominate so many of the Third World’s one-party “democracies”? Are poor people in the West being taxed to provide political support to wealthy politicians in the Third World? Does the Bible teach that state-to-state wealth transfers are ethically valid? Or does the Bible require personal charity, or church-to-church charity—charity which is not administered by foreign politicians?

38. P. T. Bauer, Equality, the Third World and Economic Delusion (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Univ. Press, 1981), p. 94.

39. For background on the political support for Public Law 480 and the program's use as a tool of American foreign policy, see Dan Morgan, Merchants of Grain (New York: Viking, 1979), pp. 100–2, 122–28, 258–68.

40. William Peterson, The Great Farm Problem (Chicago: Regnery, 1959).

These are fundamental questions regarding sovereignty, authority, and power. In the construction of the kingdom of God on earth, should we promote the increased sovereignty of the political state? Samuel’s warning is clear: no (1 Sam 8). Any discussion of government “charity”—compulsory wealth redistribution—must deal with this issue of sovereignty. Other questions, closely related to the preceding ones, are these: Is the poverty of the Third World the fault of the West? Is the Third World hungry because people in Western industrial nations eat lots of food? Does the West, meaning Western civil governments, owe some form of reparations (restitution) to Third World civil governments?

F. “We Eat; They Starve”

Consider the words of theologian-historian Ronald Sider, whose best-selling book, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger, has become one of the most influential books on seminary and Christian college campuses all over the United States. His introduction to the book sets forth the problem:

The food crisis is only the visible tip of the iceberg. More fundamental problems lurk just below the surface. Most serious is the unjust division of the earth’s food and resources. Thirty per cent of the world’s population lives in the developed countries. But this minority of less than one-third eats three-quarters of the world’s protein each year. Less than 6 per cent of the world’s population lives in the United States, but we regularly demand about 33 per cent of most minerals and energy consumed every year. Americans use 191 times as much energy per person as the average Nigerian. Air conditioners alone in the United States use as much energy each year as does the entire country of China annually with its 830 million people. One-third of the world's people have an annual per capita income of $100 or less. In the United States it is now about $5,600 per person. And this difference increases every year.⁴¹

I can remember reading textbooks written in the 1950s that affirmed the wonders of American capitalism, and that pointed with pride to the fact that 6 per cent of the world's population produced 40 per cent (or 33 per cent, or whatever) of the world's goods. But that argument grew embarrassing for those who proclaimed the supposed productivity of socialism. Socialist nations just never caught up. So, capitalism's critics now complain that 6 per cent of the world's population (Americans) annually uses up one-third of the world's annual production, as if this consumption were not simultaneously a process of production, as if production could take place apart from the using up of producer goods. This is word magic. It makes productivity appear evil.

It is true that Westerners eat a large proportion of the protein that the world produces each year. This has been used by vegetarian socialists to create a sense of guilt in Western meat-eating readers of socialist literature. You see, our cattle eat protein-rich grains. "Corn-fed beef" is legendary—or notorious, in the eyes of the critics. Because of this, argues Dr. Sider, the "feeding burden" of the United States is not a mere 210 million (the number of human mouths to feed), but 1.6 billion.⁴² "No wonder more and more people are beginning to ask whether the world can afford a United States or a Western Europe."⁴³ (Outside of college and seminary campuses, not many people seem to be asking this question, as far I can see. Certainly the Haitian boat people and Latin American refugees aren't asking it. Neither are Jews who are emigrating from the Soviet Union.)

The psalmist proclaimed a poetic truth about God's ownership of the world by identifying these words as God's: "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills" (Ps 50:10). But "liberation theologians" are not impressed. Dr. Sider informs us:

The U.S. Department of Agriculture reports that when the total life of the animal is considered, each pound of edible beef represents seven pounds of grain. That means that in addition to all the grass, hay and other food involved, it also took seven pounds of grain to produce a typical pound of beef purchased in the supermarket. Fortunately, the conversion rates for chicken and pork are lower: two or three to one for chicken and three or four to one for pork. Beef is the cadillac of meat products. Should we move to compacts?⁴⁴

41. Ronald Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1977), p. 18. This book was co-published by the liberal Roman Catholic publishing house, the Paulist Press. Unquestionably, it represents an ecumenical publishing venture. Presumably, it reflects the thinking of a broad base of Christian scholars.

42. Ibid., p. 152.

43. Ibid., p. 153.

Must we rewrite the words of the psalm (with the seven-to-one ration in operation): "For every chicken of the forest is mine, and the soybeans upon seven thousand hills"? Perhaps the greatest irony of all is that a 1982 study by the U.S. Department of Agriculture indicates that low-income Americans—the people who liberation theologians supposedly want to deliver from "oppressive institutions"—eat more meat per capita than high-income Americans do. Blacks consume more meat per capita than other racial groups do.⁴⁵ Thus, the "less meat" program would reduce one of the prime pleasures of the poor in America.

Unquestionably, Third World populations sometimes suffer protein deficiencies. But any program of "social salvation through protein exports" is going to encounter problems that the wealth-redistributionists seldom consider. People's food is fundamental to their culture. Trying to stay on a diet has confounded millions of Americans. Eating habits are very difficult to alter, even when the eater knows that he should change. An education program to get Third World peasants to change their diets is going to be incredibly expensive, and probably futile. "Rice-eating people would often rather starve than eat wheat or barley, which are unknown to them," writes biologist Richard Wagner.⁴⁶

This problem goes beyond mere habits. Sometimes we find that people's diets have conditioned their bodies so completely that the introduction of a new food may produce biological hazards for them. This is sometimes the case with protein. Wagner comments:

Another even more bizarre instance was seen in Colombia, where a population was found with a 40 percent infestation of Entamoeba histolytica, a protozoan that generally burrows into the intestinal wall, causing a serious condition called amoebiasis. However, despite

44. Ibid., p. 43.

45. Associated Press story, Tyler Morning Telegraph, 18 December 1982.

46. Richard H. Wagner, Environment and Man, 3rd ed. (New York: Norton, 1978), p. 523.

the high level of Entamoeba infestation, the incidence of amoebiasis was negligible. The answer to this puzzle was found in the high-starch diet of the people. Because of the low protein intake, production of starch-digesting enzymes was reduced, allowing a much higher level of starch to persist in the intestine. The protozoans were found to be feeding on this starch rather than attacking the intestinal wall. If this population had been given protein supplements without concurrent efforts to control Entamoeba infestation, the incidence of amoebiasis would probably have soared, causing more problems than the lack of protein.⁴⁷

G. Cultures Are “Package Deals”

When a foreign culture introduces a single aspect of its culture into the life of another, there will be complications. This single change serves as a sort of cultural wedge. As the historian Arnold Toynbee puts it, “In a cultural encounter, one thing inexorably goes on leading to another when once the smallest breach has been made in the assaulted society’s defenses.”⁴⁸ Changing people’s eating habits, apart from changing their understanding of medicine, costs of production, agricultural technology, risks of blight, marketing, and an indeterminate number of other contingent aspects of the recommended change, is risky when possible, and frequently impossible.

Third World peasants often recognize the implications of a particular “cultural wedge” perhaps better than the Western “missionary” does: It may have a far-reaching impact on the culture as a whole—an impact which traditional peasants may choose to avoid. Unless the opportunity offered by the innovator is seen by the recipient as being worth the risks of unforeseen “ripple effects,” the attempt to force a change in the recipient’s buying or eating habits may lead to a disaster. Or, more likely, it will probably lead to a wall of resistance. Missionaries, whether Christian or secular, whether sponsored by a church or the Peace Corps, had better understand one fundamental principle before they go to the mission field: You cannot change only one thing.

One of the classic horror stories that illustrates this principle is the Sub-Sahara Sahel famine of the 1970s. This arid and semiarid area is vast. It stretches across the African continent, and it includes the nations of Senegal, Mauritania, Mali, Chad, Ghana, Niger, Upper Volta, Sudan, Ethiopia, Somalia, and part of Kenya. For 15 years, from the early 1960s through the mid-1970s, the West's civil governments poured hundreds of millions of dollars into this region. Yet between the late 1960s and 1974, hundreds of thousands of people starved, along with twenty million head of livestock. They are still starving. Why? As with most agricultural tragedies, there was no single cause. The area gets little rain: perhaps twenty-five inches in its southernmost regions, tapering off to an inch per year closer to the Sahara. The nomads needed water for their herds, as they had from time immemorial. The West gave them the water. Here was a totally new factor in the region's ecology. It destroyed them. This was one major cause.

47. Ibid., pp. 518–19.

48. Arnold Toynbee, Civilization on Trial and The World and the West (New York: World, 1958), pp. 286–87.

The other cause was the absence of enforceable property rights in land. The nomads did not assign specific plots to specific families. No one was made personally and economically responsible for the care of the land. "All trees, shrubs, and pasture are common-access resources, so no individual tribesman has an incentive to conserve them, or add to their stock. No individual can reap the returns of planting or sowing grass, which hold the soil together and prevent 'desertification.'"⁴⁹

Beneath the rock and clay and sand, there is water. A subterranean lake of half a million square miles underlies the eastern end of the Sahara. Drilling rigs can hit water at one thousand or two thousand feet down. These boreholes were drilled with Western foreign aid money at $20,000 to $200,000 apiece. About ten thousand head of cattle at a time can drink their fill. Therein lies the problem. Claire Sterling describes what happened:

The trouble is that wherever the Sahel has suddenly produced more than enough for the cattle to drink, they have ended up with nothing to eat. Few sights were more appalling, at the height of the drought last summer [1973], than the thousands upon thousands of dead and dying cows clustered around Sahelian boreholes. Indescribably emaciated, the dying would stagger away from the water with bloated bellies to struggle to fight free of the churned mud at the water's edge until they keeled over. As far as the horizon and beyond, the earth was as bare and bleak as a bad dream. Drought alone didn't do that: they did.

What 20 million or more cows, sheep, goats, donkeys, and camels have mostly died of since this grim drought set in is hunger, not thirst. Although many would have died anyway, the tragedy was compounded by a fierce struggle for too little food among Sahelian herds increased by then to vast numbers. Carried away by the promise of unlimited water, nomads forgot about the Sahel's all too limited forage. Timeless rules, apportioning just so many cattle to graze for just so many days within a cow's walking distance of just so much water in traditional wells, were brushed aside. Enormous herds, converging upon the new boreholes from hundreds of miles away, so ravaged the surrounding land by trampling and overgrazing that each borehole quickly became the center of its own little desert forty or fifty miles square.⁵⁰

49. John Burton, "Epilogue," in Steven Cheung, The Myth of Social Cost (San Francisco: Cato Institute, 1980), p. 66.

In Senegal, soon after boreholing became popular (around 1960), the number of cows sheep and goats rose in two years from four million to five million. "In Mali, during the five years before 1960, the increase had been only 800,000. Over the next ten years the total shot up another 5 million to 16 million, more than three animals for every Malian man, woman, and child."⁵¹ It is not just Americans and West Europeans who raise and eat "protein on the hoof."

The traditional nomad way of life is dead. Western specialists know it; the nomads know it. They live in tent camps now, dependent on handouts from their governments, which in turn rely heavily on the West's foreign aid programs. The West and the nomads forgot to honor (and deal with) this principle: You cannot change only one thing.

H. Cultural Transformation

The goal of charitable organizations that deal in foreign aid should be to bring the culture of the West to the underdeveloped nations. By "the culture of the West," I mean the law-order of the Bible, not the humanist, secularized remains of what was once a flourishing Christian civilization. This means that these organizations cannot be run successfully by cultural and philosophical relativists. Missionaries should seek to impart a specifically Western way of looking at the world: future-oriented, thrift-oriented, education-oriented, and responsibility-oriented. This world-and-life view must not be cyclical. It must offer men hope in the power of human reason to understand the external world and to grasp the God-given laws of cause and effect that control it. It must offer hope for the future. It must be future-oriented. To try to bring seed corn to a present-oriented culture that will eat it is futile. With the seed corn must come a world-and-life view that will encourage people to grow corn for the future.

50. Claire Sterling, "The Making of the Sub-Sahara Wasteland," Atlantic (May, 1974), p. 102.

51. Ibid., p. 103.

It does little good to give these cultures Western medicine and not Western attitudes toward personal hygiene and public health. It does little good to send them protein-rich foods if their internal parasites will eat out their intestines. The naive idea that we can simply send them money and they will “take off into self-sustained economic growth” cannot be taken seriously any longer.⁵² To attack the West because voters are increasingly unwilling to continue to honor the tenets of a naive faith in state-to-state aid—faith in the power of political confiscation, faith in the power of using Western tax revenues to prop up socialist regimes in Third World nations—is unfair.⁵³

P. T. Bauer of the London School of Economics made the study of economic development his life's work. He emphasized what all economists should have known, but what very few acknowledged until quite recently, namely, that in the long run, people's attitudes are more important for economic growth than money. His list of what ideas and attitudes not to subsidize with Western capital is comprehensive. No program of foreign aid, whether public or private, should be undertaken apart from an educational program to reduce men's faith in the following attitudes. These attitudes are favorable to the development of a society that will experience economic growth.

Examples of significant attitudes, beliefs and modes of conduct unfavourable to material progress include lack of interest in material advance, combined with resignation in the face of poverty; lack of initiative, self-reliance and a sense of personal responsibility for the economic future of oneself and one's family; high leisure preference, together with a lassitude found in tropical climates; relatively high prestige of passive or contemplative life compared to active life; the 52. W. W. Rostow, The Stages of Economic Growth: A Non-Communist Manifesto (Cambridge: At the University Press, 1960). This was a best-seller on college campuses in the early 1960s. For a critique, see the essays by several economic historians in Rostow, ed., The Economics of Take-Off into Sustained Growth (New York: St. Martin's, 1963).

53. Examples of socialist (centrally planned) economies that have been propped up by U.S. government aid are Costa Rica, Uruguay, El Salvador, and Ghana. See Melvyn B. Krauss, Development Without Aid: Growth, Poverty and Government (New York: New Press, McGraw-Hill, 1983), pp. 24–32. Another example is Zaire (formerly the Belgian Congo). Consider also that government-guaranteed loans, as well as below-market loans through such agencies as the Export-Import Bank, constitute foreign aid, for banks loan investors' dollars to high-risk socialist nations that would otherwise not have been loaned. The Soviet Bloc has done exceedingly well in this regard for decades. On this point, see Antony Sutton, Western Technology and Soviet Economic Development, 3 vols. (Stanford, Calif.: Hoover Institution, 1968–73).

prestige of mysticism and of renunciation of the world compared to acquisition and achievement; acceptance of the idea of a preordained, unchanging and unchangeable universe; emphasis on performance of duties and acceptance of obligations, rather than on achievement of results, or assertion or even a recognition of personal rights; lack of sustained curiosity, experimentation and interest in change; belief in the efficacy of supernatural and occult forces and of their influence over one's destiny; insistence on the unity of the organic universe, and on the need to live with nature rather than conquer it or harness it to man's needs, an attitude of which reluctance to take animal life is a corollary; belief in perpetual reincarnation, which reduces the significance of effort in the course of the present life; recognized status of beggary, together with a lack of stigma in the acceptance of charity; opposition to women's work outside the home.⁵⁴

A long sentence, indeed. If the full-time promoters of Western guilt understood the implications of what Bauer is saying, there would be greater hope for both the West and the Third World. What he describes is essentially the very opposite of what has come to be known as "the Protestant Ethic."⁵⁵ What is remarkable is the extent to which ideologically motivated guilt-manipulators have adopted so many of the very attitudes that Bauer says are responsible for the economic backwardness of the Third World.

Yes, the West continues to eat. The Third World finds it difficult to grow sufficient food. But Christians in the West are supposedly complacent. They are well-fed, while their "global neighbors" go hungry.⁵⁶ It appears that the ancestors of "rich Christians" and rich Westerners in general were very smart: They all moved to those regions of the world where food is now abundant. The Plains Indians, before Europeans came on the scene, experienced frequent famines. There were under half a million of them at the time.⁵⁷ Yet, somehow, European immigrants to the Plains arrived just in time to see agricultural productivity flourish. They now consume more than their "fair share" of the food, and their only excuse is that they produce it. This, it 54. P. T. Bauer, Dissent on Development (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Univ. Press, 1972), pp. 78–79.

55. Max Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1958). This book appeared originally as a series of scholarly journal articles in 1904–5. See also S. N. Eisenstadt, ed., The Protestant Ethic and Modernization (New York: Basic Books, 1968).

56. Sider, Rich Christians, p. 30.

57. R. J. Rushdoony, The Myth of Over-Population (1969; reprint ed., Fairfax, Va.: Thoburn Press, 1978), pp. 1–3.

seems, is not a good enough answer—certainly not a morally valid answer. The West needs to come up with a cure for the hungry masses of the world, but not the one that worked in the West, namely, the private ownership of the means of production.

Ronald Sider has a cure—if not for the world's hungry masses, then at least for the now-guilty consciences of his readers, not to mention the not-yet-guilt-burdened consciences of the American electorate. "We ought to move toward a personal lifestyle that could be sustained for a long period of time if it were shared by everyone in the world. In its controversial Limits to Growth, the Club of Rome suggested the figure of $1,800 per year per person. In spite of the many weaknesses of that study, the Club of Rome's estimate may be the best available."⁵⁸ And which agencies should be responsible for collecting the funds and sending them to the poor in foreign lands? United Nations channels.⁵⁹ Private charity is acceptable—indeed, it is better than the United States government, which sends food and supplies to "repressive dictatorships"⁶⁰—but not preferable. We need state-enforced "institutional change," not reliance on private charity, because "institutional change is often morally better. Personal charity and philanthropy still permit the rich donor to feel superior. And it makes the recipient feel inferior and dependent. Institutional changes, on the other hand, give the oppressed rights and power."⁶¹

But if the United States government is not really a reliable state to impose such institutional change, what compulsory agency is reliable? He neglects to say. The one agency he mentions favorably in this context is the United Nations—the organization which has formally indicted Israel as a "racist" nation, and which welcomed the Palestine Liberation Organization's Yassir Arafat, pistol on his hip, to speak before the membership.⁶²

It is interesting that the Club of Rome drastically revised its no-

58. Ronald J. Sider, "Living More Simply for Evangelism and Justice," the Keynote Address to the International Consultation on Simple Lifestyle, England (17–20 March 1980), mimeographed paper, p. 17.

59. Sider, Rich Christians, p. 216.

60. Idem.

61. Sider, "Ambulance Drivers or Tunnel Builders" (Philadelphia: Evangelicals for Social Action, n.d.), p. 4.

62. For a critical analysis of Sider's views, see David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald Sider, rev. ed. (Tyler, Tex.: Institute for Christian Economics, 1982). The book is now in the third edition, reprinted in 1996.

growth position in 1976,⁶³ and in 1977, the year Rich Christians was published, the Club of Rome published a pro-growth, pro-technology study.⁶⁴ As William Tucker observes, “When you’re leading the parade, it’s always fun to make sudden changes in direction just to try to keep everyone on their toes.”⁶⁵ Of course, it was favorable to vast state-to-state foreign aid programs.

I. A Zero-Sum Economy?

A zero-sum game is a game in which the winners’ earnings come exclusively from the losers. But what applies to a game of chance does not apply to an economy based on voluntary exchange. Unfortunately, many critics of the free market society still cling to this ancient dogma. They assume that if one person profits from a transaction, the other person loses proportionately. Mises objects:

... the gain of one man is the damage of another; no man profits but by the loss of others. This dogma was already advanced by some ancient authors. Among modern writers Montaigne was the first to restate it; we may fairly call it the Montaigne dogma. It was the quintessence of the doctrines of Mercantilism, old and new. It is at the bottom of all modern doctrines teaching that there prevailed, within the frame of the market economy, an irreconcilable conflict among the interests of various social classes within a nation and furthermore between the interests of any nation and those of all other nations. . . .

What produces a man’s profit in the course of affairs within an unhampered market society is not his fellow citizen’s plight and distress, but the fact that he alleviates or entirely removes what causes his fellow citizen’s feeling of uneasiness. What hurts the sick is the plague, not the physician who treats the disease. The doctor’s gain is not an outcome of the epidemics, but of the aid he gives to those affected. The ultimate source of profits is always the foresight of future conditions. Those who succeeded better than others in anticipating future events and in adjusting their activities to the future state of the market, reap profits because they are in a position to satisfy the most urgent needs of the public. The profits of those who have produced goods and services for which the buyers scramble are not the source of losses of those who have brought to the market commodit-

63. Time, 26 April 1976.

64. Jan Tinbergen (coordinator), RIO—Reshaping the International Order: A Report to the Club of Rome (New York: New American Library, Signet Books, 1977).

65. William Tucker, Progress and Privilege: America in the Age of Environmentalism (Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor/Doubleday, 1982), p. 193.

ies in the purchase of which the public is not prepared to pay the full amount of production costs expended. These losses are caused by the lack of insight displayed in anticipating the future state of the market and the demand of the consumers.⁶⁶

The “Montaigne dogma” is still with us. The economic analysis presented by Ronald Sider assumes it. He can be regarded as a dogmatic theologian, but his dogma is Montaigne’s. Consider for a moment his statistics, such as the Club of Rome’s assertion that $1,800 a year would just about equalize the living standards of the world. The Club of Rome assumes tremendous per capita wealth in the hands of the rich—so much wealth, that a program of compulsory wealth-redistribution could make the whole world middle class, or at least reasonably comfortable. But the capital of the West—roads, educational institutions, communications networks, legal systems, banking facilities, monetary systems, manufacturing capital, managerial skills, and attitudes toward life, wealth, and the future—cannot be divided up physically. Furthermore, there is little evidence that it would be sufficient to produce world-wide per capita wealth of this magnitude, even if it could be physically divided up and redistributed.⁶⁷

If we divided only the shares of ownership held by the rich—stocks, bonds, annuities, pension rights, cash-value life insurance policies, and so forth—we would see a market-imposed redistribution process begin to put the shares back into the hands of the most efficient producers. The inequalities of ownership would rapidly reappear.

The important issue, however, is the Montaigne dogma. It views the world as a zero-sum game, in which winnings exactly balance losses. Then how do societies advance? If life is a zero-sum game, how can we account for economic growth? A free market economy is not a zero-sum game. We exchange with each other because we expect to gain an advantage. Both parties expect to be better off after the exchange has taken place. Each party offers an opportunity to the other person. If each person did not expect to better himself, neither would make the exchange. There is no fixed quantity of economic benefits. The free market economy is not a zero-sum game.

We understand this far better in the field of education. For example, if I learn that two plus two equals four, I have not harmed anyone. In the area of knowledge, we all know that the only people who lose when someone gains new, accurate knowledge are those who have invested in terms of older, inaccurate knowledge. Could anyone seriously argue that the acquisition of knowledge is a zero-sum game (except, perhaps, in the case of a competitive examination)? Would anyone argue that we should suppress the spread of new, accurate knowledge in order to protect those who have made unfortunate investments in terms of old information?

66. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action, pp. 664–65. Italics in original.

67. Gary North, “Trickle-Down Economics,” The Freeman (May 1982).

What should we conclude? The Third World needs what all men need: faith in Jesus Christ and his law-order. The Third World needs the increased economic output that is the inevitable product of true conversion to Christ. It needs a new attitude toward the future (optimism). It needs a new attitude concerning the power of biblical law as a tool of dominion. It needs to abandon the bureaucratic state agricultural control systems that pay farmers only a fraction of what their agricultural output is worth, with the difference going into state treasuries. It is not uncommon for West African governments to pay producers as little as fifty per cent of the market value of their crops.⁶⁸

What the Third World needs is what we all need: less guilt, less civil government, lower taxes, more freedom, and churches that enforce the tithe through the threat of excommunication⁶⁹—not a “graduated tithe,” but a fixed, predictable ten per cent of income. (A “graduated tithe” means a graduated ten per cent, which is contradictory. It is a political slogan, not a theological concept. It certainly is not a standard for state taxation: 1 Sam 8.)

J. Land Reform

We are told endlessly that Latin American nations need land reform. The government is supposed to intervene, confiscate the landed wealth of the aristocracy, and give it to the poor. This is a variation of Lenin’s old World War I slogan, “peace, land, bread.” [Note: in 2003 I discovered on my own that Lenin seems never to have used this slogan.] Is such a program legitimate? Is it practical?

The Bible has a standard for land tenure: private ownership. First, how can we respect this principle and still expand the holdings of land by the peasants? Second, how can we keep agricultural output from collapsing when unskilled, poor peasants take over land tenure?

68. P. T. Bauer, Dissent on Development, pp. 401–3.

69. Note, 2005: I have changed my mind on this point. The threat should not be excommunication but rather revocation of voting rights in the congregation.

The answer to the first question is relatively simple in theory: We need to adopt the biblical principle of inheritance. All sons receive part of the inheritance, with the eldest son obtaining a double portion, since he has the primary responsibility for caring for aged parents. Rushdoony's comments are important:

The general rule of inheritance was limited primogeniture, i.e., the oldest son, who had the duty of providing for the entire family in case of need, or of governing the clan, receiving a double portion. If there were two sons, the estate was divided into three portions, the younger son receiving one third. . . . The father could not alienate a godly first-born son because of personal feelings, such as a dislike for the son's mother and a preference for a second wife (Deut 21: 15–17). Neither could he favor an ungodly son, an incorrigible delinquent, who deserved to die (Deut 21:18–21). Where there was no son, the inheritance went to the daughter or daughters (Num 27:1–11). . . . If there were neither sons nor daughters, the next of kin inherited (Num 27:9–11).⁷⁰

By instituting the biblical mode of inheritance, the great landed estates of the Latin American world would be broken up. The civil government would immediately gain the support of the younger sons of the aristocracy. Land holdings would get smaller. Those sons who choose not to farm can sell their land to productive peasants, or if the poor people have no capital initially, hire them as sharecroppers. (In a capital-poor society, such as the American South immediately after the Civil War, sharecropping proved to be an economically sound arrangement.)⁷¹ The sons can buy the necessary capital, assuming they do not inherit it.

With each death, the land holdings get smaller. Will this lead to the destruction of productive, large-scale agriculture? Not if it is really productive. The size of land holdings could be increased by purchase by productive farmers. Also, corporations could be set up that would issue shares of stock to owners. The holders would leave shares of stock to their heirs, not the actual land. Then heirs could sell these shares to other people, including members of the rising middle class. Without single-inheritor primogeniture, there could be a rising middle class.

70. R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, N.J.: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 180–81.

71. Blacks preferred sharecropping to working for wages on white-owned farms: Roger Ransom and Richard Sutch, One Kind of Freedom: The Economic Consequences of Emancipation (New York: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1977), pp. 67–70.

One of the preludes to the American Revolution, especially in southern colonies, was the abolition of the English version of eldest-son primogeniture.⁷² Puritan New England never did adhere to eldest-son primogeniture. Historian Kenneth Lockridge writes:

The leaders of the [Massachusetts Bay] colony reflected a general awareness of the unique abundance of the New World in the novel inheritance law they created. In England, the lands of a man who left no will would go to the eldest son under the law of primogeniture, whose aim was to prevent the fragmentation of holdings which would follow from a division among all the sons. The law arose from a mentality of scarcity. It left the landless younger sons to fend for themselves. In New England the law provided for the division of the whole estate among all the children of the deceased. Why turn younger sons out on the society without land or perhaps daughters without a decent dowry, why invite social disorder, when there was enough to provide for all?⁷³

There was never a landed aristocracy in the New England because of this policy. Primogeniture and entail (prohibiting the from selling the land) disappeared in all but two colonies prior to the American Revolution.

I offer this example of one possible social and economic reform to demonstrate how relevant biblical law is for all societies, and how a deviation from biblical law has led, over centuries, to the creation of a ticking time bomb in Latin American nations. Instead of broadly based private property in land, and the development of a responsible middle class, Latin American nations now face the likelihood of Marxist revolution, with the state, not the people, gaining control over the land. As Rushdoony remarks, "The state, moreover, is making itself progressively the main, and in some countries, the only heir. The state in effect is saying that it will receive the blessing above all others. It offers to educate all children and to support all needy families as the great father of all. It offers support to the aged as the true son and heir who is entitled to collect all of the inheritance as his own. In both roles, however, it is the great corrupter and is at war with God's established order, the family."⁷⁴

72. Robert Nisbet, the conservative American sociologist, concludes that the abolition of primogeniture and entail (fixing land to the family line) was an important symbol of the American Revolution. He admits, however, that few of the colonies in 1775 were still enforcing these laws. Nisbet, "The Social Impact of the Revolution," in America's Continuing Revolution: An Act of Conservation (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, 1975), p. 80. Nisbet cites Frederick Le Play and Alexis de Tocqueville as sources for his opinion on the importance of the abolition of primogeniture and entail, pp. 82–83.

73. Kenneth A. Lockridge, A New England Town, The First Hundred Years: Dedham, Massachusetts, 1636-1736 (New York: Norton, 1970), pp. 71–72.

Conclusion

God's law is clear enough: The family is the primary agency of welfare—in education, law enforcement (by teaching biblical law and self-government), care for the aged. The church, as the agency for collecting the tithe, also has social welfare obligations.⁷⁵ The civil government has almost none. Even in the case of the most pitiable people in Israel, the lepers, the state had only a negative function, namely, to quarantine them from other citizens. The state provided no medical care or other tax-supported aid (Lev 13 and 14).⁷⁶

The balance of earthly sovereignties between the one (the state or church) and the many (individuals, voluntary associations) is mandatory if we are to preserve both freedom and order. The Bible tells us that God is both one and many, one Being yet three Persons. His creation reflects this unity and diversity. Our social and political institutions are to reflect this. We are to seek neither total unity (statism) nor total diversity (anarchism).⁷⁷ Biblical law provides us with the guidelines by which we may achieve a balanced social order. We must take biblical law seriously.⁷⁸

The most effective social movements of the twentieth century's masses—Marxism, Darwinian science, and militant Islam—have held variations of the three doctrines that are crucial for any comprehensive program of social change: providence, law, and optimism. The Christian faith offers all three of these, not in a secular framework, but in a revelational framework. The failure of Christianity to capture the minds of the masses, not to mention the world's leaders, is in part due

74. Ibid., p. 181. See also Gary North, "Familistic Capital," in the forthcoming book, The Dominion Covenant: Exodus (Tyler, Tex.: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), forthcoming. [The book was eventually titled, Moses and Pharaoh: Dominion Religion vs. Power Religion, 1985.]

75. James B. Jordan, "Tithing: Financing Christian Reconstruction," in Gary North, ed., Tactics of Christian Resistance (Tyler, Tex.: Geneva Divinity School Press, 1983).

76. Gary North, "Quarantines and Public Health," Chalcedon Report (April 1977).

77. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (1971; reprint ed., Fairfax, Va.: Thoburn Press, 1978).

78. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics.

to the unwillingness of the representatives of Christian orthodoxy to preach all three with uncompromising clarity. The world will stay poor for as long as men cling to any vision of God, man, and law that is in opposition to the biblical outline.

We need faith in the meaning of the universe and the sovereignty of God. We need confidence that biblical law offers us a reliable tool of dominion. Finally, we need an historical dynamic: optimism. We need a positive future-orientation for our earthly efforts, in eternity of course, but also in time and on earth. People need to surrender unconditionally to God in order to exercise comprehensive dominion, under God and in terms of God's law, over the creation.⁷⁹ There is no other long-term solution to long-term poverty. God will not be mocked.

79. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Tex.: Geneva Divinity School Press, 1983). See also Roderick Campbell, Israel and the New Covenant (1954; reprint ed., Tyler, Tex.: Geneva Divinity School Press, 1982).

Appendix F

THE ECONOMIC RE-EDUCATION OF RONALD J. SIDER¹

To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them (Isa. 8:20).

I began this economic commentary project in the spring of 1973: monthly essays in the Chalcedon Report. I escalated it in August of 1977, when I moved to Durham, North Carolina. At that time, I began to devote 10 hours a week, 50 weeks a year, to this commentary project. I still do.

In that same year, 1977, another historian, Ronald J. Sider, had his book, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study, co-published by the Paulist Press (liberal Roman Catholic) and InterVarsity Press (neo-evangelical Protestant). The fate of these rival publishing projects throws light on contemporary Protestant evangelical theology.

In mid-1997, the fourth edition of Sider's book appeared. On the cover, it proclaims: "Over 350,000 copies in print." Most of these copies were the first edition. The original publishers surrendered control over it in 1990, when Word Books picked it up and issued the third edition. Publishers do not surrender books that are still selling well. The second edition was forced on Sider in 1984 by David Chilton's book, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators (1981), which I hired Chilton to write and which the Institute for Christian Economics published. Sider prudently refused to mention Chilton in that second edition . . . also in the third edition/latest edition.

A. He Changed His Mind

In a Christianity Today interview, published in the same issue as an obituary for David Chilton (April 28, 1997), Sider made it clear that he no longer was of the same opinion as he had been in 1977. "The times have changed, and so have I" (p. 68). Furthermore, "I admit, though, that I didn't know a great deal of economics when I wrote the first edition of Rich Christians" (pp. 68–69). Or, he could accurately have added, the second and third editions. It is clear who his nemesis has been since 1981, the unnamed David Chilton: "I had no interest in trying to psychologically manipulate people into some kind of false guilt" (p. 68). Chilton had recognized the appeal to guilt throughout Sider's book. Sider now said that this was not his intention.

1. Published first as an Institute for Christian Economics report in 1997.

What happened to change his mind? First, the fall of the Berlin wall in 1989; second, the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. Times had changed, and so had he. Like so many academics who switched in the 1990s, he no longer argues for socialism. It was not David Chilton's arguments that persuaded him; it was a shift in liberalism's climate of opinion, and therefore academic neo-evangelicalism's opinions.

Sider's popularity began to fade about the time ICE published Chilton's book. Chilton's writing style—he was a master of clarity as well as rhetoric—his mastery of the Bible,² and his mastery of free market economics turned Sider's book into a retroactive embarrassment. I heard the following on many occasions: "I don't believe everything in Sider's book, but don't you think Chilton went to extremes?" Obviously, I didn't. Strong rhetoric catches people's attention. This was true of Sider's first edition, too. He used very strong rhetoric—most of which disappeared from the 1997 edition. If strong rhetoric is backed up by proof, it will accomplish its task far more effectively than the verbal equivalent of lukewarm oatmeal. Chilton's book was designed to teach biblical free market principles by means of a public dissection of a popular anti-free market book. Chilton's book did its work well. It sold better than any book that ICE ever published. I thought at the time that it was an almost perfect book. I still do.³

Let me use an analogy. To stop a group of amateur sportsmen from going over a waterfall in a rented motor boat, you have to yell really loud and wave your arms at them. They may complain later about all the undignified shouting and waving, but they may pull over to the shore. Even Sider pulled over, although not because of Chilton's

2. I sat in an office next to his. I would yell, "David, where is that passage about. . . ?" He would yell back, "It's somewhere in the middle of chapter [] of the Book of []." It always was.

3. The fatter revised edition is longer and a bit harder to read, for it had to respond to Sider's second edition, the one that included "a response to my critics," except Chilton.

shouting or mine. His ideology's outboard motor just broke down—a familiar experience with socialist products. He has now publicly tossed this burnt-out motor overboard. He deserves credit for this.

Still, he really owed it to his readers to have written something like this at the beginning of the new edition: "David Chilton was basically correct in his criticisms of my economic views. I have adopted many of his proposals, including the following: . . ." But there is not a word about Chilton or his book. This is consistent with the second and third editions.

B. Sider Led an Ideological Exodus

We are all familiar with the student who goes off to college and comes home after the first year spouting liberal nonsense that he learned in the classroom. This phenomenon has been around since the days of classical Greece. Aristophanes wrote a comedy about such a youth: Clouds. A young man goes off to Socrates' academy and then comes home a know-it-all jerk. Students usually get over this phase by age 30 unless they go to graduate school. In graduate school, the damage to both common sense and moral sense can become permanent.

The Christian version of this tale is the youth who comes home spouting nonsense and quoting the Bible out of context to defend his views. Maybe he quotes Israel's jubilee law (Lev. 25) as a model of state-directed wealth-redistribution. No one told him that the jubilee's legal basis was genocide: the destruction of an entire civilization by the Israelites, i.e., wealth-distribution by military conquest. No one told him that the same jubilee law authorized the permanent enslavement of foreigners and their children (Lev. 25:44–46).

He insists that he is still a Christian, but he declares that a Christian can be a liberal: an in-your-face, in-your-wallet, tax collector's gun-in-your-belly kind of liberal. He announces, in so many words, "You'll have to pay; government gets to spend the money on the poor (after skimming off 50% for handling); and it's all in the name of Jesus. Jesus loves a cheerful taxpayer."

With the publication of Rich Christians in 1977, Ronald Sider became the Moses of the American Protestant evangelicals' version of this kind of home-from-college liberal. (By 1977, John R. Stott had long served this role in England.) The trouble was, Sider never came home from college: he was still there—teaching. He led the neo-evangelicals in a unique kind of exodus: out of the fundamentalist prayer closets of their youth. They thought they were on the cutting edge of a new, caring kind of Christianity. They imagined that they were headed into the Promised Land of social relevance and political influence. They believed that their students would follow them. The students did, too, for about three years. Then they changed their minds, voted for Ronald Reagan, and went into real estate development or the brokerage business. (This, too, shall pass, but that is another story.)

The original version of Rich Christians was a tract for the times. They were rotten times, ideologically speaking. The economic debate, as far as Christian intellectuals knew, was between Keynesians and Marxists. Not today. Everything has changed. Marxism is dead. Keynesianism is in its terminal stages, taking tiny, halting steps like an octogenarian with a walker. Sider recognized this, and he turned back toward what he used to call Egypt. "No, no: the Promised Land lies in this direction!" Most of this army turned back in the 1980s, and they have bought up all the choice real estate.

Sider began his revised edition with this admission: "My thinking has changed. I've learned more about economics."⁴ So have his former readers. Socialist radicalism has fallen out of favor all over the world. The climate of opinion in the liberal media changed in 1991. Ron Sider changed right along with it. I think of Joe Sobran's warning: he would rather be in a church that has not changed its beliefs in 5,000 years than in one that spends its days huffing and puffing to catch up with the latest shift in media opinion.

The 20th edition is barely recognizable. It even has a new subtitle: Moving from Affluence to Generosity. The earlier editions had been subtitled, A Biblical Study. The new subtitle is less pretentious. It also sounds more private than statist, which reflects the book's perspective.

Here is an example of just how much the book has changed. You may remember Sider's call to statist action on behalf of the poor. His argument in 1977 was this: God is on the side of the poor. ". . . the God of the Bible is on the side of the poor just because he is not biased, for he is a God of impartial justice."⁵ What did he say in 1997? "Is God biased in favor of the poor? Is he on their side in a way that he is not on the side of the rich? Some theologians say yes. But until we clarify the meaning of the question, we cannot answer it correctly.”⁶ The next chapter backpeddles away from the first edition.

4. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: Moving from Affluence to Generosity (Dallas: Word, 1997), p. xiii.

5. Ronald L. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1977), p. 84.

In his 1985 edition, Chilton summarized Sider’s policy recommendations, and he offered footnotes from Rich Christians for every point: national (state) food policy, (state to state) foreign aid, a guaranteed national income, international taxation, land reform, bureaucratically determined “just prices,” national health care, population control, and the right of developing nations to nationalize foreign holdings.⁷ In Sider’s 1997 edition, foreign aid is mentioned briefly (pp. 31–38). But even here, Sider cited reports on how recipient governments have misused this aid in the past. Sider used the same kind of bureaucratic examples that Chilton used against Sider’s early editions (pp. 258–59). As for the recycled oil money loaned to the Third World, “Too much of what was loaned was spent on armaments, ill-planned projects, or wasted because of official corruption” (p. 260). He still mentioned land reform, but only briefly (p. 260). He wanted lower tariffs against foreign products. He was adamant about this.⁸ This was Chilton’s suggestion.⁹

As he became more cautious—openly so—he dropped almost all traces of his previous toying with socialism and statist coercion. The new edition was not the same book. It was not even a first cousin of the first three editions. His new edition was basically a retraction of the earlier editions—a kind of belated apology to the 350,000 buyers of his book who bought intellectually damaged goods.

But he still refused to mention Chilton’s book, even in the bibliography. He reminds me of Winston Smith in Orwell’s Nineteen Eighty-Four, who dutifully dropped inconvenient historical information into the “memory hole.” Nevertheless, the new bibliography contained some very good books by such fine free market scholars as P. T. Bauer—to whom Chilton dedicated the third edition, since Bauer was a big fan of *Productive Christians*¹⁰—George Gilder, Brian Griffiths,¹¹ Julian

6. Sider, Rich Christians (1997), p. 41.

7. David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), p. 35. (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>)

8. Sider, Rich Christians (1997), pp. 147–50, 244–45.

9. Chilton, Productive Christians, pp. 101–103.

10. He called Chilton on the phone at least once to tell him how much he liked the book. Chilton had initially thought it was someone who was pulling a trick on him.

11. When I visited him in 1985—the day that Margaret Thatcher’s policy unit hired him as an advisor—Prof. Griffiths told me that he had not heard about Christian economics until he read my Introduction to Christian Economics.

Simon, and Calvin Beisner. Unfortunately, he did not actually quote from any of these authors in his 37 pages of endnotes, except to attack Bauer as an extremist.¹² He quoted mainly from UNICEF, other United Nations agencies, and the World Bank. He still avoided citing economists generally and free market economists specifically. But at least his bibliography gave the illusion that he had thought through the reasons why his first three editions were wrong.

How did this happen? I attribute it to a dramatic shift in the climate of public opinion. This climate of opinion was beginning to change in 1981, when Chilton's book appeared and when I debated Sider at Gordon-Conwell Divinity School. But it was not yet changing among Christian academics. They follow the lead of secular humanist opinion leaders, usually by about five to 10 years. I was not well received by the faculty of Gordon-Conwell (or at any other seminary, now that I think of it).

C. Harbinger and Fad

Sider's book was part harbinger, part fad. It was a harbinger of things to come because, in 1977, Protestant evangelicals were just barely coming back into American politics as an identifiable voting bloc. The 1976 Presidential candidacy of Southern Baptist and Trilateral Commission member Jimmy Carter had made acceptable the label "evangelical" in the political arena. A majority of white Southern Protestants actually voted against Carter, but hardly anyone recognized this in 1977 or even today. The pundits incorrectly attributed his victory to the unpredicted appearance of the evangelicals.¹³

From the era of the media-orchestrated humiliation of fundamentalist Christianity at the Scopes' "monkey" trial in 1925 until the election of 1976, American evangelicals had been conspicuous by their absence.¹⁴ They generally opposed politics, or at least identifiably Christi-

12. Sider, Rich Christians (1997), p. 307.

13. He won mainly because Gerald Ford had been a Vice President who came into office because of Richard Nixon's 1974 resignation under a cloud of scandal. Ford immediately pardoned Nixon for unnamed crimes that Nixon had not been tried for. Then the 1975 recession hit. Meanwhile, the newly created Trilateral Commission went looking for a political unknown who could be palmed off on the scandal-weary American voters as an outsider. This strategy worked, but only for one election.

14. See Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996), chaps. 7, 9. Cf. George Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth-Century Evangelicalism, 1870–1925 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1980), pp. 184–86; an participation in partisan politics. Roman Catholics did that sort of thing, it was widely believed, "and you know what we think about Catholicism!" For decades, political liberals who controlled the theologically liberal National Council of Churches had chided fundamentalists, calling on them to get out of their prayer closets and get active in politics. They got their wish answered in 1980: the election of Ronald Reagan, whose personal commitment to salvation through faith in Christ was never proclaimed by him in public, and by his defeat of Carter, whose public commitment to Christ was considered media-worthy, but whose personal commitment was to theologians such as Paul Tillich. The National Council crowd never knew what hit them. Reagan stood firm, at least rhetorically, against the NCC's version of the eighth commandment: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote." He was re-elected in 1984. The NCC has never recovered. Like some emphysemic middle-aged athlete still dreaming of his glory days, the NCC continues to issue study guides and newsletters. No one pays any attention.

1. Sider and Social Action

Immediately after my debate with Sider at Gordon-Conwell, a reporter privately asked me what I thought of Sider. I told him that I appreciated Sider for softening up the market for my work. I told him that Sider was preparing the way for evangelicals to get involved in social action and politics, but that my economic opinions, not Sider's, were representative of the broad mass of evangelical opinion. That statement had been verified the previous fall, with Reagan's defeat of Carter. Sider had been part of the minority of white evangelicals who were favorable to Carter's worldview and hostile to Reagan's. Sider's fame was based on the opinion of classroom professors and liberal arts editors, what I have referred to as the Wheaton College-Christianity Today-Calvin College axis. This cloistered non-profit community of liberal arts graduates is part of the modern chattering class, but it never has reflected the opinions of donors in the pews. The man in the pew always knew that socialism is simply Communism for people without the testosterone to man the barricades.

I have maintained for four decades that neo-evangelicals pick up fads that have been discarded by secular liberals. Sider's book is proof.

Ralph Reed, After the Revolution: How the Christian Coalition is Impacting America (Dallas: Word, 1996), p. 53. Note that Reed's publisher was also Sider's.

The tenured academic community of Christians was mildly socialistic when the American media were. Now they are mildly free market, just as the media are. What caused the change? The failure of the Soviet Union. Mr. Gorbachev admitted in the late 1980s that his nation was economically bankrupt. This stunned the West's academics. They had always insisted that the USSR had a growing economy. Only a handful of free market economists had questioned this. In 1991, Gorbachev was unceremoniously thrown out of power. So were the Communists. They had neither money nor power by August 21, 1991, the day the Communist coup against Boris Yeltsin failed. With neither money nor power, Communism fell out of favor in the West overnight. The secular humanist West worships money and power. Lose these, and you're instantly passé.

Overnight, discount book bins filled up with Marxist books written by and for the college market. Marxists in the Western academic community found that their peers were laughing at them. Never before had this happened. They had always been taken seriously. Why? Because the Communists had the power to terrorize people without threat of retaliation, and Western liberals have great respect for this degree of power. They had raged for decades selectively only against military dictatorships in small nations—dictatorships that might be overthrown. Now the “impersonal forces of history” had turned against the Communists. This was bad news for tenured professors who had publicly worshipped the forces of history, as reported by the New York Times. They rushed in panic to get on board the last train out of socialism's world of empty promises and emptier souls.

They have now become born-again democratic capitalists. What is a democratic capitalist? Someone who has modified the eight commandment as follows: “Thou shalt not steal quite so much as before, except by majority vote.”

2. The Echo Effect: Neo-evangelicalism

Sider's book was partly a fad because it promoted a kind of warmed-over political liberalism that suited the times. In 1977, Jimmy Carter had just been elected President of the United States. He was a political liberal, and he was a self-proclaimed evangelical, despite his commitment to neo-orthodox theologians. Two years later, Margaret Thatcher became Prime Minister of Great Britain. In 1980, Ronald Reagan was elected President of the United States. Those two politicians restructured political rhetoric in the West. They made political conservatism acceptable. More important, they made liberals look both weak and silly. They oversaw major shifts in public opinion, even among intellectuals. In the year of Reagan's retirement,¹⁵ the Berlin Wall was torn down, and the East German troops did nothing to stop it, as if in response to Reagan's words to Mikhail Gorbachev: "Mr. Gorbachev, tear down this wall." Gorbachev sat tight. Two years after that, he was thrown out of office, along with Communism.

Overnight, the liberation theology fad died. Marxism became passé—the ultimate humiliation in the modern intellectual world. This was the year after the third edition of Sider's book appeared, which sank without a trace. Ronald Reagan had destroyed the climate of opinion that had made Ronald Sider's book a best-seller among college-educated Christian evangelicals. Reagan had destroyed Sider's market as surely as David Chilton had destroyed Sider's arguments. Sider admitted as much: "Communism has collapsed. Expanding market economies and new technologies have reduced poverty. 'Democratic capitalism' has won the major economic/political debate of the twentieth century. Communism's state ownership and central planning have proven not to work; they are inefficient and totalitarian."¹⁶ This was what David Chilton had argued back in 1981. Sider wrote: "One of the last things we needed was another ghastly Marxist-Leninist experiment in the world."¹⁷ Yet in 1977, he offered this bold-faced, capitalized question: IS GOD A MARXIST?¹⁸ He never answered this question; instead, he wrote several pages on how God "wreaks horrendous havoc on the rich."¹⁹ In 1997, he answered his own question. This is progress. It took him only 20 years.

D. The New, Improved Version

Dr. Sider has admitted that he didn't understand much about economics in 1977. That was clear to Chilton and me when we finally got around to reading his book in 1980. In 1997, he changed his tune. In the 1997 edition, for example, he continued to call for a "graduated

15. Required by the United States Constitution; had he run again, he would almost certainly have been elected a third time.

16. Sider, Rich Christians, p. xiii.

17. Ibid., pp. 182–83.

18. Sider, Rich Christians (1977), p. 72.

19. Ibid., p. 77. See Chilton, Productive Christians, p. 267.

tithe.” But he said this is strictly personal; he did not mention the state.²⁰ He assured us: “Certainly it is not a biblical norm to be prescribed legalistically for others.”²¹ Throughout the book, he called for private Christian charity—exactly what Chilton had called for. He made a few gratuitous genuflections toward government intervention, but mainly in the most conventional areas, such as public health matters and education²²—activities that the typical Southern Baptist layman would agree with. Most revealing, he stripped his book of confrontational rhetoric against the free market or in favor of big government. His rare negative rhetorical flourishes were now directed against Marxism. This edition was marked by academic caution. It is an apology rather than an apologetic.

Chilton’s arguments did not change Sider’s mind. By the time Communism fell, making anti-capitalism passé, he had written two revisions without even mentioning Chilton or his other free market critics. Even in his third revised edition (1990), he provided not one reference to Chilton’s book, and not one reference to me or this commentary series. The climate of opinion has not changed that much! It was not logic or the Bible that changed Sider’s mind. It was the change in the climate of secular academic opinion. He was not prepared to swim upstream. Neo-evangelicals always swim downstream with the liberal current, for liberals can impose academic sanctions.

I have been swimming upstream ever since I was 14 years old, when I attended a lecture by the anti-Communist Fred Schwarz in 1956. Bit by bit, inch by inch, I have seen the intellectual tide of opinion turn—not 180 degrees, but at least 110. It reached university professors last, especially in the humanities departments. Schwarz was surprised at how just fast the tide turned after 1989.²³ He had been swimming upstream since the mid-1940s. Swimming upstream is the price of overcoming evil in an era in which evil is entrenched. It is the price of launching a paradigm shift.

Sider’s earlier editions were subtitled, A Biblical Study. In 1997, he moved away from that sort of unacceptable positioning. He wrote: “When the choice is communism or democratic capitalism, I support democratic government and market economics.” Not quite. When the

20. Ibid., pp. 193–96.

21. Ibid., p. 193.

22. Ibid., p. 237.

23 23. Frederick Schwarz, M.D., Beating the Unbeatable Foe (Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1996), ch. 38.

choice was between Communism and market economics, he was not ready to attack Marxism, and he attacked the free market with a vengeance. It was only after the academic world was laughing at Marxists that he switched.

He went on to say, "That does not mean, however, that the Bible prescribes either democracy or markets."²⁴ To argue, as I have and Chilton did, that decentralized constitutional democracy and the free market are exactly what the Bible prescribes, is just too theonomic for Dr. Sider.²⁵ In 1997, Ron Sider was closer to the biblical truth, but not on the basis of the Bible, and not on the basis of economic logic, which was as absent in his 1997 edition as it was in 1977.²⁶ He dismissed my defense of the free market²⁷ as little more than an extension of Adam Smith, whom he correctly identified as an Enlightenment thinker.²⁸ He refused to tell his readers about this economic commentary series or my public attack on right-wing Enlightenment political theory.²⁹ He did not mention theonomy's commitment to searching for judicially binding social blueprints in the Bible. He did not inform his readers that free market economics as a discipline began, not with the Enlightenment, but with the late-medieval scholastic school of Salamanca, a fact that I have tried to get people to understand ever since I published Murray Rothbard's article on the topic in 1975.³⁰ These scholastics used rationalism, not the Bible, to defend their case; so did the late-seventeenth-century mercantilists,³¹ so did Smith; so does the entire

24. Sider, Rich Christians (1997), p. 237.

25. My position on biblical law and economics is stated in Chapter 52: "Biblical moral law, when obeyed, produces a capitalist economic order. Socialism is anti-biblical. Where biblical moral law is self-enforced, and biblical civil law is publicly enforced, capitalism must develop. One reason why so many modern Christian college professors in the social sciences are vocal in their opposition to biblical law is that they are deeply influenced by socialist economic thought. They recognize clearly that their socialist conclusions are incompatible with biblical law, so they have abandoned biblical law."

26. There is nothing on the price mechanism as a means of coordination, nothing on the division of labor, nothing on entrepreneurship as the source of profits, etc.

27. Appendix E.

28. Sider, Rich Christians, p. 92, note 5.

29. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

30. Murray N. Rothbard, "Late Medieval Origins of Free Market Economic Thought," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Summer 1975), pp. 62–75; Rothbard, Economic Thought before Adam Smith: An Austrian Perspective on the History of Economic Thought (Brookfield, Vermont: Elgar, 1985), ch. 4.

31. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: M.I.T. Press, 1963).

economics profession. So what? Did Sider think that his favorite economists in 1977—there were not many cited in his footnotes—and non-economists were not also heirs of the Enlightenment? As with his academic peers, and virtually the entire Christian world, he hated theonomy, yet he implied that the Enlightenment left an unreliable legacy. To which I ask, one more time: If not biblical law, then what?

Sider affirmed what his academic peers affirm: the Bible offers no judicially binding economic, political, and social blueprints. But at least in the 1997 edition, we find no traces of his original inflammatory, anti-free market rhetoric—the outlook and rhetoric that made his book a best-seller. There is also no hint at the existence of some as yet-unpublished plan that might make statism work. He knew by 1997 that statism will not work. He could not tell us theoretically why this should be true. He showed no familiarity with Mises' 1920 article on the economic irrationality of socialist planning.³² That article was always the most important theoretical critique of socialism, which socialist economist Robert Heilbroner finally admitted in 1990 was correct.³³

Anti-Communism is pragmatic if it is not based on economic theory, or biblical law, or some other moral ground. Sider now rejects Communism as evil. Why did he wait so long? I contend that it was because the climate of secular liberal opinion had not yet shifted. Until secular pragmatists saw that the Communists could no longer maintain their terrorist apparatus, they rejected all economic criticisms of Communism that were based on its inherently irrationality and/or its moral evil. Until that point, the West's liberal media rejected all uncompromisingly anti-Communist authors and opinions as biased and unscholarly.³⁴

How much civil government is appropriate? We just do not know, Sider said. "We need intensive study of how much and what kind of government activity promotes both political freedom and economic justice. Through painstaking analysis and careful experimentation, we must discover how much government can work within a basic market framework to empower the poor and restrain those aspects of today's markets that are destructive.”³⁵ Notice what is the framework: free markets, not civil government.

32. Ludwig von Mises, "Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth" (1920), in F. A. Hayek (ed.), Socialist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1935] 1963), ch. 3. (<http://www.mises.org/econcalc.asp>)

33. Robert Heilbroner, "After Communism," The New Yorker (Sept. 10, 1990), p. 92.

34. Jean-François Revel, The Flight from Truth: The Reign of Deceit in the Age of Information (New York: Random House, [1988] 1991).

Guilt for poverty must now be shared internationally, perhaps like foreign aid. “As we saw in chapter 7, North Americans and Europeans are not to blame for all the poverty in the world today. Sin is not just a White European phenomenon.”³⁶

What of the effects of multinational corporations? “For the purposes of this book, however, we do not have to know the answer to the question of their overall impact.”³⁷ Some of them do damage; others do not. (This is sociology’s only known law: “some do; some don’t.”) What of colonialism? “It would be simplistic, of course, to suggest that the impact of colonialism and subsequent economic and political relations with industrialized nations was entirely negative. Among other things, literacy rates rose and health care improved.”³⁸ This, from the man who wrote in the second edition, “It is now generally recognized by historians that the civilizations Europe discovered were not less developed or underdeveloped in any sense” (pp. 124–25). He went on: “It would be silly, of course, to depict colonialism as the sole cause of present poverty. Wrong personal choices, misguided cultural values, disasters and inadequate technology all play a part.”³⁹ They do, indeed—Chilton’s point in 1981. Well, then, is there enough food being produced in the Third World today? Is the Third World facing famine? Here, too, we just do not know. The World Bank says there is no threat. Lester Brown—whose pessimistic assessment was prominent in the 1977 edition—says there is a threat. “The final verdict? Non-specialists like you and me cannot be sure.”⁴⁰

Here is what we can be sure of: this is not the Rich Christians that sold 350,000 copies.

Sider offered reworked versions of his old “institutionalized evil” and jubilee year chapters, but his heart just was not in it. Reading the 1997 edition of Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger is like going to your college class’s 20th reunion and running into the campus radical, who is there mainly to sing the old songs. He cannot remember half of the words, but he can still hum most of the tunes. A good time will be had by all—all 350,000.

35. Sider, Rich Christians (1997), p. 236.

36. Ibid., p. 228.

37. Ibid., p. 176.

38. Ibid., p. 135.

39. Ibid., p. 136.

40. Ibid., p. 165.

E. Who Is the Targeted Audience?

Every author should decide who his targeted audience is before he begins to write. He must also decide the time frame for this particular book's influence. Some books are tracts for the times. Others are written for the long haul. Some are aimed at large numbers of buyers. Others are aimed at opinion leaders.

I do not expect more than a handful of people to read all 30 volumes of this commentary, yet portions of it will be still be read by some opinion-makers in 500 years. I say this in complete confidence. Why? First, because the Internet will keep it available. Second, because search engines will find videos of my summaries, and from there, viewers will find the chapters. Third, because pastors are always looking for help in dealing with problem passages, and the Pentateuch is filled with problem passages. Commentaries survive, in contrast to best-selling Christian books on contemporary issues. Recall that prior to the late 1960s, there were almost no books on contemporary Christian issues written by and for fundamentalists, and very few for academic evangelicals. This, too, was an aspect of the climate of opinion.

One idea or slogan in a book may long outlast the sale of the book, but who can successfully predict this? Not an author, surely. Not his publisher, either. Think of Malthus' formulation in his anonymous first edition of Essay on Population (1798): humans increase geometrically, while food supplies increase arithmetically. The idea was silly, the evidence was nonexistent, and the author dropped the phrase in subsequent editions. Nevertheless, it is the one thing most people who remember Malthus remember about him.

In contrast, another suggestion by Malthus, rarely associated with his name, was that nature produces huge numbers of offspring that perish. This idea was picked up six decades later by an unknown naturalist, Alfred Wallace, and applied to a wholly new way: some of the survivors survive because of unique biological traits, and these traits are passed on to their offspring. This insight became the basis of Wallace's formulation of the concept of evolution through natural selection. He suggested this to Charles Darwin in a letter. Darwin instantly saw that Wallace was about to beat him to the punch. Darwin had seen the same passage in Malthus and had reached the same conclusion, but he had hesitated for two decades to publish his researches. Darwin then decided that joint credit was better than no credit at all. He convinced Wallace to publish a jointly signed article in 1858. It had no influence at all. A year later, Darwin's Origin of Species appeared. His publisher had not expected the book to sell well. His publisher was wrong. As it has turned out, Wallace received none of the credit and is long forgotten except among specialized historians. And all of this came as a result of Parson Malthus' observation about a factor in population dynamics. So it goes in the world of publishing.

How can a book survive the free market's competition?⁴¹ There is fierce competition today in the oceans of new book titles that get printed each year. The general rule is that a book that hits the best-seller list rarely retains influence. It is too much a product of its time, i.e., tied too closely to the prevailing climate of opinion. It becomes a best-seller because it is an expression of the prevailing views of the day. Even if it is in opposition, it is within the dominant culture's acceptable boundaries of public discourse.⁴² But any climate of opinion can and will change dramatically from time to time. That is why we call it a climate. The best-sellers of one era are seldom read in the next, except by historians who are trying to explain how such mediocre books could have prospered. The fable about the hare and the tortoise applies well to books whose authors hope will change people's opinions and keep them changed. This thought comforts authors whose books have not sold well.

The trick here is keeping your book(s) in print. Slow sales kill books, especially in an age in which inventory taxes place negative sanctions on marginally profitable titles. The back list that was once the bread and butter for publishers has been undermined by taxation policies. The advent of books that can be produced on demand, one copy at a time, and Internet Web sites that may some day prove profitable for downloaded books, should keep help to book titles alive until their day dawns (if ever). The bankruptcy and then collapse of the modern welfare state will also help.

41. The book market is a free market. While college textbooks are subsidized indirectly by state-funded tuition, rarely does anyone change a deeply felt opinion because of something he read in a textbook. Nobody goes back to read his college textbooks, as distinguished from intelligent monographs or classics assigned in upper division classes.

42. Allan Bloom's The Closing of the American Mind and William Bennett's Book of Virtues are examples of such opposition books: the first, an eloquent defense of classical education written for conservatives who have never had to trudge through that barren humanist ordeal; the second, a compilation of rewritten children's stories for grandmothers to give as Christmas presents to public school children who would be bored stiff by them if they ever bothered to read the book, which is unlikely.

Conclusion

I am writing for future generations of Christians who at long last become fed up with the results of compromises with humanism, whether right wing or left-wing. I say to them: to the law and to the testimony; trust and obey, for there's no other way; you can't beat something with nothing. I say a lot of things. Given the length of this book, I have said too much already. But this much I feel morally compelled say: beginning around 1960, I have learned that it is far safer to trust in the Bible than in the climate of opinion, especially tenured Christian academic opinion. Better to write and then see one's first (and last) edition appear on a remaindered book discount list than to become a best-selling author, only to publish a disguised retraction two decades later with the belated admission, "Well, it sounded good at the time."

Appendix G

STRONG DRINK¹

And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth: and thou shalt eat there before the LORD thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household, And the Levite that is within thy gates; thou shalt not forsake him; for he hath no part nor inheritance with thee (Deut. 14:26–28).

This text, more than any other, refutes modern fundamentalism's moral and legal prohibition against the consumption of alcohol. There is no exegetical answer to this text, so it is usually ignored by fundamentalists.

The standard fundamentalist response to biblical references to wine-drinking by righteous people is that this must have been unfermented wine. But, prior to 1869, no one had ever heard of unfermented wine. In that year, a pietistic and disgruntled communion steward, Thomas B. Welch, began producing non-alcoholic, pasteurized “wine” explicitly for use in the Lord’s Supper. He called it “Dr. Welch’s Unfermented Wine.” The product caught on among Protestant pietists and then became a separate commercial product. His son re-named it Welch’s Grape Juice, which was the foundation of a multi-million dollar company.² Grape juice as a commercial product is possible only because of pasteurization. The ancients did not possess this technology. Nevertheless, modern Protestant pietists have created an oral history which says that Jesus turned water into grape juice.

When Jesus turned water into wine, the feast’s organizer remarked that Jesus’ wine tasted better. This was unheard of, he said; party organizers always served their best wine first. "Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse: but thou hast kept the good wine until now" (John 2:10). Why did party organizers do this? Because after many hours of drinking wine, the drinkers were "feeling no pain." They did not notice or care that the later wine was of lower quality. Less expensive wine could serve the celebrational purpose. Conclusion: Jesus created wine, not grape juice. Pietism's oral history of the wedding feast of Cana makes no sense in terms of the actual text.

1. Written in 1997. Kenneth Gentry’s book, God Gave Us Wine: What the Bible Says About Alcohol (Lincoln, California: Oakdown, 2001) provides a detailed analysis of the theology and exegesis of the Christian critics of wine.

2. Theodore Morrison, Chautauqua: A Center for Education, Religion, and the Arts in America (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974), p. 11.

Jesus, in describing the growth of God's kingdom, compared it to fermenting wine. Both expand. "And no man putteth new wine into old bottles [skins]; else the new wine will burst the bottles, and be spilled, and the bottles shall perish. But new wine must be put into new bottles; and both are preserved. No man also having drunk old wine straightway desireth new: for he saith, The old is better" (Luke 5:37–39). First, Jesus predicted expansion. Old Covenant Israel would not be able to contain this new manifestation of the kingdom of God in history. The kingdom's Mosaic boundaries would soon be broken. This imagery was tied to the bubbling expansion of the fermentation process. No pasteurization here! Second, Jesus said that old wine tastes better to experienced drinkers. That is, the more fermented wine tastes better. Applying this imagery to the issue of the two Israels, Jesus was predicting that the defenders of Old Covenant Israel would be critical of New Covenant Israel. They would prefer the familiar taste of traditional wine.

The imagery adopted by Jesus to describe the expansion of the kingdom of God was tied to the fermentation process. But grape juice is anti-expansion. Pasteurization kills the living organisms that make fermentation possible. The Jews would prefer old wine, Jesus predicted: familiar taste, no further expansion. Modern pietists prefer grape juice. If we take Christ's imagery seriously, we can see a reason for pietism's commitment to grape juice in the Lord's Supper. Premillennial pietism opposes the expansion of God's comprehensive kingdom in history. It wants "souls only" evangelism, not Christendom.

A. Strong Drink and Intoxication

Pietism's mythology of unfermented wine does not escape the exegetical problem. The crucial bibulous phrase in Deuteronomy 14 is not "wine"; it is "strong drink." The absence of strong drink had been one of God's curses on the people during their wilderness wandering, just as the absence of bread had been. Moses reminded them of this: "And I have led you forty years in the wilderness: your clothes are not waxen old upon you, and thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot. Ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink: that ye might know that I am the LORD your God" (Deut. 29: 5–6). But good times were about to replace the bad times! During the good days in Egypt, when Joseph wanted to reward his brothers before he revealed his identity to them, he gave him strong drink: "And he took and sent messes [portions] unto them from before him: but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs. And they drank, and were merry with him" (Gen. 43:34). The word "merry" is translated from the Hebrew root word meaning to become tipsy or intoxicated, the word from which the Hebrew word for "strong drink" is derived. Strong's Concordance defines the word as follows: "Shekar, shay-kaw'r'; from Heb 7937; an intoxicant, i.e. intensely alcoholic liquor:—strong drink, + drunkard, strong wine."

The tithe of national celebration allowed families to spend money on liquor—liquor that was stronger than table wine. This was God's money, yet it was legitimately used to become slightly intoxicated, i.e., to make merry. The priestly tribe was to join in the festivities.³ This was not grape juice. It was good, old-fashioned, buzz-producing booze, and God wanted His people to experience its pleasures. But fundamentalist pietists hate liquor so much they refuse to acknowledge the clear teaching of the Bible. Their all-consuming hatred of liquor clouds their understanding as surely as the all-consuming love of liquor clouds the understanding of alcoholics.

This obvious etymological usage has been denied by dispensational fundamentalist Robert Teachout in his Dallas Theological Seminary Th.D. dissertation, as well as in his 1983 book. He insists that shaykar can mean "drink deeply" rather than "become drunk." Context determines which way to translate it, he insists. The Hebrew lexicons are therefore wrong. "The idea of drunkenness so often associated with both the noun and the verb is dependent upon the context (and the beverage that is imbibed), then, and is not the innate meaning of the word, despite the simplistic rendering of Hebrew lexicons.” Therefore, Deuteronomy 14:26 means “satisfying grape juice.”⁴

3. In the Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America, every pastor ("Levite") must take an oath of total abstinence from alcohol. They call themselves "Covenanters," after the Scottish Covenanters, yet they serve grape juice at the Lord's Supper. So do most Calvinistic Presbyterian churches. Yet the Scottish Presbyterian tradition always accepted the non-liturgical consumption of intoxicating liquor, such as Scotch.

While he is not so open as to admit what he really means—this reference is brief—here is what he means: when the Bible says not to drink strong drink (e.g., Proverbs 31:4: “It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes strong drink”), the word means alcohol. But when it says that strong drink may be consumed (e.g., Proverbs 31:6: “Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts”), it means grape juice. Fundamentalists write as though they actually believe that grape juice creates a merry heart, which indicates the degree of experience fundamentalists have with merry hearts. (Try to imagine a party where a room full of fundamentalists are working on their third punch bowl of grape juice. “Whoopie! Yippee! Halleluia!”) In short, we are asked to believe that the standard Hebrew lexicons are wrong, Strong’s Concordance is wrong, but Teachout is correct: what Deuteronomy 14:26 authorized was the consumption of a beverage that was not technologically possible to transport over long distances without fermenting. Fundamentalists ask us to believe that unfermented grape juice was common in a society that had never heard of pasteurization. My conclusion: false theological presuppositions can distort one’s perception of reality as surely as excessive consumption of strong drink can.

B. Fundamentalism and Phariseeism

It is typical of modern fundamentalism that drunkenness is singled out as a sin, but gluttony is rarely mentioned. In the concordance to the Scofield Reference Bible (1909), there is no entry for “glutton.” There are three for drunkenness: “drunk,” “drunkard,” and “drunkenness.” Deuteronomy 21:20 and Proverbs 23:21 passage are both cited under “drunkard.” The fundamentalist insists that any consumption of alcohol is a sin.⁵ Yet he does not offer any comparable accusation against fattening foods. Modern sugar beet products, which became common only two generations prior to Dr. Welch’s “unfermented wine," are never equally the target of fundamentalist moral concern, if they are mentioned at all. The bloated stomachs and posteriors of fundamentalists are not causes for tongue-wagging; falling-down drunkenness is. Fundamentalists single out one sin and ignore the other. We are still waiting for a fundamentalist tract on the sin of gluttony. Tracts and books on the sin of liquor have been common since the 1870's. The thesis of such tracts regarding pasteurized wine was not believable prior to Dr. Welch.

4. Robert Teachout, Wine: The Biblical Imperative: Total Abstinence (Columbia, South Carolina: Richbarry, 1983), p. 66.

5. Typical of this outlook are these books: William Patton, D.D., Bible Wines: Or, the Laws of Fermentation and the Wines of the Ancients (Ft. Worth, Texas: Star Bible Publications, 1871); Dr. Jack Van Impe, Alcohol: The Beloved Enemy (Nashville, Tennessee: Nelson, 1980); David Wilkerson, Sipping Saints (Old Tappan, New Jersey: Revell, 1978).

The Women's Christian Temperance Movement (WCTU)—temperance being defined by its members as total abstinence—was begun in 1874 in Chautauqua, New York, not far from Dr. Welch's vineyard. It was an early feminist organization. Fundamentalists joined it in large numbers. It still exists. The New York Times described it in 1989 as follows: "The group's philosophy is simple: What you can't drink can't hurt you. It has an axiom, too. 'We build a fence at the top of the cliff, so you don't need an ambulance at the bottom.'"⁶ This analogy of the protective fence was adopted by the Pharisees two millennia ago to describe the purpose of the oral law, which had become the Babylonian Talmud by A.D. 500. Judaism's oral law was a system of supplementary laws which placed outer boundaries—man-made interpretations—around the Mosaic law. Writes George Horowitz: "Rabbinical enactments were prohibitions called gezerot (decrees) and regulations of a positive character called takkanot (ordinances). With respect to gezerot one of the maxims of the Men of the Great Assembly was: 'Make a fence for the Torah' (Avot 1,1) i.e.: Protect the laws by a hedge of prohibitions more stringent than the letter. A warrant for this was found in Lev. 18, 30 interpreted as 'Make an injunction additional to my injunction' (Mo'ed Katon 5a; sifra, Ahare f. 86d, ed. Weiss; II Dor 247. The explicit prohibition of Deut. 4,2: 'Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, nor shall ye take aught from it' was easily got over by reliance upon Deut. 17, 8–11, quoted above, where implicit confidence in the courts of each generation and obedience to them are prescribed. Thus, paradoxical as it may seem the Rabbis believed that it was their right and duty to make changes in the Biblical law if imperatively required, while maintaining, nevertheless, that the commands of the Torah were unchangeable and might not be added to or diminished."⁷ It was this post-exilic system of interpretation that Jesus challenged with His phrase: "You have heard it said . . . but I say unto you. . ."⁸

6. Dirk Johnson, "Temperance Union Still Going," New York Times (Sept. 14, 1989).

7. Horowitz, The Spirit of Jewish Law (New York: Central Book Co., 1973), p. 94.

Fundamentalist legalism is notorious. Rejecting the Mosaic law, sometimes even including the Ten Commandments,⁹ the fundamentalist hastens to construct non-biblical fences and hedges around other men's Bible-authorized pastimes. Fundamentalists act as though they regard themselves as holier than God. So did the Pharisees.

Conclusion

There is no general prohibition against the use of intoxicating drinks in the Bible, except for kings (Prov. 31:4). There are no more God-anointed kings today. That office ceased with the Old Covenant. (So did the offices of priest and prophet.)

The Mosaic law authorized the consumption of wine and even stronger drink at the national festivals. Critics of alcohol logically must argue that the New Testament has imposed a more rigorous standard on God's people. What was part of the national covenant's national festival in Mosaic Israel has somehow become a sin today: the consumption of alcohol. There are no longer any mandatory national feasts. This, the critics might argue—indeed, they must argue—has not only removed God's authorization of alcohol; it has substituted a prohibition. To argue this way is to argue that the resurrected Jesus has removed a blessing from His people, a blessing that He graciously shared with others at the wedding feast at Cana. The problem is, there is no textual support for such a theological position. There is even evidence to the contrary. Paul wrote: "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities" (I Tim. 5:23). I would add "legalism" to this list of infirmities.

This passage makes it clear that strong drink is a blessing when it is under God's authority and man's emotional control. There are legitimate times and places for the consumption of intoxicating beverages.

8. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 3rd ed. (Nacogdoches, Texas: Covenant Media Foundation, [1977] 2002), ch. 3.

9. Former Dallas Seminary professor S. Lewis Johnson publicly rejected the Ten Commandments as the heart of legalism. Legalism for him meant the Ten Commandments. He approvingly quoted fundamentalist Presbyterian pastor Donald Gray Barnhouse, who argued that "It was a tragic hour when the Reformation wrote the Ten Commandments into their creeds and catechisms and sought to bring Gentile believers into bondage to Jewish law, which was never intended either for the Gentile nations or for the church." S. Lewis Johnson, "The Paralysis of Legalism," Bibliotheca Sacra, (April/June 1963), p. 109.

Most important, wine in the Lord's Supper is required by God. Dr. Welch was wrong—morally and theologically—to call into question the use of wine in communion. So are his spiritual heirs.

Appendix H

WEAK REED: THE POLITICS OF COMPROMISE

And they met Moses and Aaron, who stood in the way, as they came forth from Pharaoh: And they said unto them, The LORD look upon you, and judge; because ye have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants, to put a sword in their hand to slay us (Ex. 5:20–21).

Politically conservative American Christians prefer affluent bondage under free market humanism rather than searching for a Bible-based alternative, for they recognize where the answer will lead: either to their belated acceptance of Christian theocracy or their belated public acceptance of the legitimacy of some other form of theocracy. Christians want to believe that they can avoid theocracy. They can't. Theocracy (theos = God; kratos = rule) is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of theocracy vs. no theocracy. It is a question of whose god rules. That which a society believes is its source of law is its operational god.¹

Christians do not want to admit this fact of political life, either to the public or to themselves. It embarrasses them. Typical are the views of Dr. Ralph Reed, an articulate political technician who, beginning in his late twenties, built Pat Robertson's political training organization, the Christian Coalition. Robertson is the son of a United States Senator, a multimillionaire television personality, and a former ordained Baptist minister with Pentecostal leanings. He ran for the Republican Party's nomination for President of the United States in 1988. Naturally, he lost.² He devoted the next dozen years to building up a non-partisan, grass roots political training organization, which Reed ran it for him until 1997, when he resigned to become an independent political consultant and a highly paid part-time political consultant for the now-infamous and bankrupt Enron Corporation.³

1. T. Robert Ingram, The World Under God's Law: Criminal Aspects of the Welfare State (Houston, Texas: St. Thomas Press, 1962), p. 3. Cf. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 5.

2. Vice President George Bush, Sr., won the nomination and the election.

For Reed, politics is a profession. For the sake of partisan Republican Party politics, he walked away from considerable influence in the national media, which he enjoyed solely because he ran a non-partisan national political organization that in 1994 had over a million people in its computerized data base, which generated donations of $20 million a year⁴—in short, a major political force.

Before he decided that running individual political campaigns for a living was a far better use of his time than shaping and articulating the political agenda of millions of American evangelicals—a conclusion I wholeheartedly agree with, given his views of what constitutes legitimate political compromise—he wrote Active Faith (1996). It was published by the Free Press, a secular international book publisher owned by the huge Simon & Schuster publishing company. He received that book contract because at the time he possessed a great deal of national influence. A year after its publication, he possessed almost none. I bought the book in a used book store in September, 1997, for half price.

A. Clinton, Yes; Rushdoony, No

In that book, Reed specifically attacked Christian Reconstruction. He did so within the context of his defense of President Bill Clinton: “I oppose President Clinton’s policies. But I do not despise him. Nor do I despise Mrs. Clinton, who has come under a blizzard of attacks in recent times. If Bill Clinton is a sinner, then he is no worse or less than you or me.”⁵

In 1996, the media’s reporting on Clinton’s continuing sexual scandals had long since been suppressed by senior editors. The Monica Lewinsky scandal was two years away, a scandal that led to his impeachment by the House of Representatives, though not his conviction

3. Enron went bankrupt in January, 2002, which at the time was the largest bankruptcy in American history. A few months later, WorldCom’s bankruptcy dwarfed it. Reed was paid $10,000 to $20,000 a month from 1997 through 2001. Robert Scheer, “A Walk Through the Valley of Greed,” Los Angeles Times (Jan. 29, 2002).

4. Ralph Reed, After the Revolution: How the Christian Coalition is Impacting America (Dallas: Word, 1996), p. 200. The median price of a home was $130,000.

5. Ralph Reed, Active Faith: How Christians Are Changing the Soul of American Politics (New York: Free Press, 1996), p. 261.

by the Senate. Had any pastor in the Christian Right done to a young female aide what Clinton did to Miss Lewinsky, his career would have ended, and the liberal media would have had a feast on his remains. Clinton lied to the public about the affair, admitting the truth only when her semen-stained dress revealed that it was his semen. But the dominant liberal media treated Clinton's critics as naive and politically motivated defenders of a long-dead sexual morality which has no role to play in politics. The voting public generally agreed with the media on this issue, which was indicative of the moral debauchery of the late twentieth century. The public also ignored Clinton's bombing of a harmless aspirin factory in Sudan on August 20, 1998,⁶ the same day that Monica Lewinsky testified to the grand jury for the second time.

President Clinton's public sins were a great deal worse than those of Mr. Reed's targeted readership: politically conservative Christians, who were hostile to Clinton. Reed was self-consciously making a statement by his defense of Clinton. Reed's statement placed him in the camp of the loyal opposition. This is where a day-to-day political operative always has to be. He expects equal loyalty from his opponents if his candidate wins. Problem: for a Christian political leader to become a member of the loyal opposition in an era of moral crisis, when Christians have at long last begun to become politically active, is to betray the future on behalf of the present. He offers tinkering with peripheral issues at a time when shaping the future requires a principled break with the present order. Political operatives exchange influence in the future for influence in the present. They are paid to do this. Their creed is: "Business almost as usual." Dr. Reed did what he was paid to do: keep the deck chairs of the Titanic neatly arranged in a joint effort with Mr. Clinton's supporters.

Christian Reconstructionists are on the other side of this bet. Almost no one else is—surely not in the Christian community. We are on the other side because of our conviction that God will continue to extend His visible kingdom in history, which includes politics. God says of the power of every covenant-breaking social order, contrary to political operatives in every generation: "I will overturn, overturn, overturn, it: and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him" (Ezek 21:27). This idea appalls Dr. Reed.

Dr. Reed wrote in 1996: "Some of the harshest criticisms of Clinton have come from the 'Christian nation' or Reconstructionist community, which argues that the purpose of Christian political involvement should be to legislate biblical law. Some of the more unyielding elements even advocate legislating the ancient Jewish law laid out in the Old Testament: stoning adulterers, executing homosexuals, even mandating dietary laws."⁷ Unyielding elements? Unyielding to what? To President Clinton? Most of the Reconstructionist authors I know ignored both the man and his wife. We are not all that interested in politics. I have written far more in criticism of George Bush, Sr.'s New World Order rhetoric than I have written about Bill Clinton. Both Rushdoony and I publicly opposed Bush's invasion of Iraq in 1991. It is also worth noting that I do not remember seeing Mr. Reed take on Mr. Bush's New World Order rhetoric in print, although this may be because I have not spent much time reading things written by Mr. Reed. Life is too short.

6. "Al-Shifa pharmaceutical factory," Wikipedia (<http://bit.ly/SudanBombing>) "Lewinsky Completes Second Day of Testimony," CNN (Aug. 20, 1998). (<http://bit.ly/SudanLewinsky>)

I am aware of no Christian Reconstructionist who believes that the state should enforce the Mosaic dietary laws. Rushdoony personally adhered to the dietary laws, and he has written, possibly, up to a total of three whole pages on this topic, scattered among his thousands of pages of books and articles. He never called for the state to enforce them. Dr. Reed may or may not understand this. Either he misunderstood Rushdoony's position on the dietary laws, or else he was cynically misrepresenting it. In either case, he called his own would-be scholarship into question.

B. Faking It Academically

Next, he misinformed his readers about Reconstructionism's eschatology. He described it as premillennial. Here, he moved from merely misleading rhetoric to good, old fashioned ignorance of the position of those whom he criticized. He hasn't a clue that he is dealing with postmillennialists—something that, by this stage, I should imagine that everyone else who knows anything about Reconstructionism understands. "Led by R. J. Rushdoony, a theologian who serves as the intellectual fountainhead of the movement, they believe that the primary objective of Christian activism should be to perfect society so that it is ready when Christ returns for His millennial reign."⁸ On the contrary, we teach that the progressively righteous society is the millennial kingdom made visible in history. Christ reigns in history through His people, not in person. This is the traditional postmillennial argument—nothing unique here—but Dr. Reed was oblivious to it. Yet he wrote as if he were a master of Reconstruction’s literature.

7. Reed, Active Faith, p. 261.

8. Ibid., pp. 261–62.

By now, I suppose that I should be used to this treatment. Our critics are legion. In most cases, they are not scholars. They do not know how to debate in public. They do not have the training or the inclination to engage in scholarly debate. But Ralph Reed earned a Ph.D. in history at an academically rigorous institution, Emory University, one of the most liberal universities in the United States. Had he handed in an equally unsupported critique of some liberal figure or movement to one of his liberal professors, he would have received an F. “Don’t submit your right-wing fundamentalist tirades in my class, sir. This term paper is not scholarship; this is character assassination, and shoddy scholarship at that.” Obviously, Dr. Reed did not do this when his liberal professors were grading him. He survived. But once out from under their control, he has reverted to form. He is a political operative with footnotes—although not enough of them. His main professional concern is neither theology nor truth; it is politics.

The basic rule of scholarship is that you must understand your opponent’s position and be able to summarize it accurately before you attack it. The humanists are way ahead of most Christians in matters academic. Christians too often ignore the rules of honest criticism. This leaves them vulnerable to rebuttals such as this one. They wind up looking like dolts, with or without Ph.D.’s. While we Reconstructionists are often highly critical of other intellectual positions, no one has ever accused us of not providing the footnotes that prove that our targeted victims have written exactly what we say they have written. Dr. Reed abandoned both his humanist training and the ninth commandment here. He offered not a single footnote in his attack on Christian Reconstruction. He did not understand our position, yet he wrote authoritatively as though he had mastered it. He dismissed it without understanding it, except for its current political liabilities, which he does not mention. For sincere but uninformed Christians to follow a man who conducts himself in public in this manner would be a blot on the church. Christ deserves better.

C. “Moses Was a Tyrant”

Dr. Reed was shocked—shocked!—at Christian Reconstruction-

ism's hostile attitude toward taxpayer-funded education. "Many reject school choice and efforts to reform public education as short-sighted and self-defeating. Instead, they call for the eventual elimination of public schools."⁹ He had that right. Oppose the public schools? Oppose the idea that education can never be religiously neutral? Can such things be? Dr. Reed could see clearly where this is leading: to tyranny. Christian Reconstruction promotes the tyranny of parents' control over their own children's education through direct parental control over its funding. He might well have added that we also promote the same negative view of state-funded retirement programs and state-funded medicine. Dr. Reed understood exactly what this meant in the late 1990s: lost elections. And so, he wrote, "Reconstructionism is an authoritarian ideology that threatens the most basic civil liberties of a free society."¹⁰ Yes, it does: it threatens the civil liberty to steal from other citizens by means of the ballot box, which is modern politics' most cherished principle.

Let us be quite clear about his position. Dr. Reed was arguing that the God of the Old Testament laid down as mandatory an authoritarian system of civil laws which "threatens the most basic civil liberties of a free society." He was not saying that Christian Reconstructionists have misinterpreted Old Testament law. On the contrary, he was saying that we have promoted, as he so delicately put it, "the ancient Jewish law laid out in the Old Testament." Because of our deviant judicial practice in this regard, he insisted, the pro-family movement "must unequivocally dissociate itself from Reconstructionism and other efforts to use the government to impose biblical law through political action. It must firmly and openly exclude the triumphant and authoritarian elements from the new theology of Christian political involvement."¹¹

Triumphant politics. Imagine that! Christian Reconstructionists actually believe that the purpose of political action is—you won't believe this—victory! They believe that civil laws cannot be religiously neutral, and that—you won't believe this, either—religious neutrality is a myth. They believe, fantastic as it seems, that when Jesus said, "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad" (Matt. 12:30), He was including civil law and lawyers.

9. Ibid., p. 262.

10. Idem.

11. Idem.

Please do not imagine that I am contemptuous of Dr. Reed. That would be like being contemptuous of an unhousebroken St. Bernard puppy that has just relieved itself on the living room carpet. The puppy did not know what else to do when nature called. Nature called the puppy in the same way that natural law theory called Dr. Reed, and the results are analogous. Dr. Reed did not know any better: he had a Ph.D. from Emory University. The average carpet owner knows enough to clean up puppy's pile, but only after rubbing the puppy's nose in it, so that he will not do it again. That is what I am doing here with Dr. Reed.

Actually, Dr. Reed has done my educational work for me. He used Pat Robertson's Christian Coalition to persuade millions of American evangelicals to get involved in politics. He indirectly trained millions of them. His organization's Web site announces, "As executive director of the Christian Coalition in the 1990s, he built one of the most effective grassroots organizations in modern American politics. During his tenure, the organization's budget grew from $200,000 to $27 million, and its support base grew from two thousand to two million members and supporters in thousands of local chapters."¹² These troops or their spiritual heirs at some point will be ready for theologically principled action. The day will come when Dr. Reed's "loyal oppositionist" views will be abandoned as naive, deeply compromised, and no longer relevant. Christian activists will be compelled by the crisis to ask themselves: "If not biblical law, then what?" In the early 1990s, Dr. Reed softened up the evangelicals for Christian Reconstructionism, just as Dr. Ron Sider softened them up in the late 1970s.¹³

I have devoted this much space to Dr. Reed, not because his views of Christian Reconstruction ever amounted to anything important, but because his kind of "big tent" Christian political compromise cannot be sustained in a time of major crisis. Such compromise is appropriate as a temporary tactic—never as a permanent principle—only in times of Christian cultural impotence and early institution-building. But there are always Christian leaders like Dr. Reed in every era, men who seek to justify a temporary tactic as a desirable permanent condition. They are given access to the public arena by humanists, who control the media and who want Christians to remain contented with sitting in the back of humanism's bus, though paying full fare. This is why Dr.

12. <http://www.gagop.org/AboutReed.asp> This page is dead. The paragraph remains on the Web: <http://bit.ly/ReedBuilt>.

13. Appendix F.

Reed's website proclaimed: "He is the best-selling author and editor of three books, and his columns have appeared in the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal."

Reed got a lot of bad publicity in the first half of the twenty-first century. He became a highly paid consultant for Enron, the corporate fraud that became the largest bankruptcy in American history at the time of its demise in 2001.¹⁴ Five years later, it was discovered that he had been involved in a lobbying scandal involving American Indian gambling casinos. His associate Jack Abramoff went to jail.

On June 22, 2006 the U.S. Senate Committee on Indian Affairs released its final report on the scandal. The report states that under the guidance of the Mississippi Choctaw tribe's planner, Nell Rogers, the tribe agreed to launder money because "Ralph Reed did not want to be paid directly by a tribe with gaming interests." It also states that Reed used non-profits, including Grover Norquist's Americans for Tax Reform, as pass-throughs to disguise the origin of the funds, and that "the structure was recommended by Jack Abramoff to accommodate Mr. Reed's political concerns."¹⁵

No doubt Dr. Reed still thinks that all it will take to please God in the political realm is a national Christian political campaign based on the slogan, "Back to religious neutrality: Equal time for Satan!" No more of that Old Testament stuff. God was all wrong back then. God used to be the promoter of "an authoritarian ideology that threatens the most basic civil liberties of a free society," but no longer. God has changed His mind. He has come to his senses. Dr. Reed and his political peers applaud God. God now has their full approval. This no doubt is a great comfort to God.

We have seen all this before. The religious authorities in Jerusalem were part of the loyal opposition. Jesus had been disloyal. The Establishment crucified Him for His disloyalty. He had told them plainly, "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). But it took the Jerusalem church from the stoning of Stephen until Nero's persecutions in A.D. 64 to break with the Jewish political Establishment. The Christians finally left Jerusalem permanently shortly after Nero's death in A.D. 68, or so church tradition says. Then, in A.D. 70, the Jewish political Establishment fell to pagan Rome's Establishment. Rome's army destroyed Jerusalem. Never again would the church be in loyal opposition to the Jewish political Establishment. That Establishment was gone.

14. Robert Scheer, "A Walk Through the Valley of Greed," The Nation (Feb. 11, 2002). (<http://bit.ly/ReedGreed>)

15. "Jack Abramoff Indian lobbying scandal," Wikipedia (July 23, 2011) (<http://bit.ly/ReedAbramoff>)

Conclusion

Christians are supposed to understand their times. We have limited resources. We cannot fight every battle. We must select our battles accordingly. To regard political tinkering and the working out of marginal political compromises as a legitimate substitute for prophetic confrontation at a turning point in history is a great mistake. This is the mistake of substituting the peripheral concerns of the fleeting present for the future of God's kingdom in history. I pray that you will not make this mistake.

If this be triumphalism, make the best of it.

Appendix I

ESCHATOLOGY, LAW, AND PIETISM

And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen (Matt. 28:18–20).

A. The Great Commission

The Great Commission was comprehensive: all power, heaven and earth, all nations, all things. Nothing was left out.¹ There is no zone of neutrality in the world. Nothing is excluded from the redemptive power of the gospel of Jesus Christ. I am aware of no Bible-affirming Christian theologian who has gone into print to argue that the Great Commission excludes any area of life. It would be difficult to make such an argument. It would be even more difficult to defend it.

The debate over Christian eschatology is ultimately a debate over whether God has decreed that the Great Commission will be fulfilled in history. Premillennialists and amillennialists deny that it can be fulfilled by today's Christian church. This is why I call these people pessimillennialists.² Most premillennialists argue that it will be fulfilled by force after Christ returns bodily to set up His earthly kingdom. But they also insist that Christians cannot fulfill the Great Commission by using the gifts that God has provided to the church during the period of Christ's bodily absence. Postmillennialists alone affirm that the Great Commission will become a cultural reality in a world in which

1 . Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/kggreatcom>)

2. The term was coined by F. N. Lee.

Christ is absent bodily, yet ruling through His people and their covenantal institutions.³

If the Great Commission cannot be fulfilled, then this puts Christians in a grim position: as cultural outsiders forever looking in, as workers whose work will never come to the degree of fruition commanded by Christ, as men without the tools of dominion, as people frustrated by a God-given assignment that God Himself has decreed eschatologically cannot come to fruition. Yet the vast majority of Christians believe that the Great Commission cannot be fulfilled. The church, with only the exceptions of the Puritans, seventeenth-century Dutch Calvinists, and Scottish Calvinists, has always believed this.

Those Christians who insist that the Great Commission will never be fulfilled in history invariably have in mind a preferred practical alternative to an eschatologically impossible world in which the things that Christ has commanded are obeyed by the vast majority of mankind. They owe it to themselves and also to their followers to set forth plainly and in print their preferred practical alternative. They should then call their followers to support the establishment of this preferred alternative, while at the same time reminding them to work sacrificially and without compromise to proclaim and extend the Great Commission, which unfortunately can never come to fruition in history. They should forthrightly teach their followers to themselves this question: “If not ‘all those things’ that Christ has commanded, then what?” But they do not want to put it this way. This is because the question sounds very much like a moral compromise, a quest for second-best in a world in which Christ has commanded comprehensive obedience. It sounds too much like this question: “What other social system is a legitimate practical substitute for that which Christ has commanded?” The answer to this second question is obvious: none. They perceive this, so they do not ask this question in public. But the various answers to this privately asked question necessarily shape their thinking, which in turn shapes their social agendas—usually hidden agendas. There is no neutrality. “He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad” (Matt. 12:30).⁴ Therefore, the question regarding a practical and acceptable substitute for the Christendom of the Great Commission cannot be legitimately evaded. Neither can an answer.

3. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

There has been a continuing search by Christians for a long-term cultural compromise. Christian theologians implicitly and sometimes explicitly ask themselves the following questions: (1) If Christianity cannot be triumphant in history, then what should Christians settle for as being second-best to what God has commanded? (2) Which anti-Christian culture, law-order, and worldview can and should Christians learn to live with in their lifelong quest for survival in a world at war with the God of the Bible?

These are ultimately eschatologically driven questions. They are this question: "Is there some way, other than cultural victory for Christ's gospel, in which the following passage can be avoided in my lifetime?"

And ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars: see that ye be not troubled: for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet. For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places. All these are the beginning of sorrows. Then shall they deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you: and ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake (Matt. 24:6–9).

The eschatological preterist argues that the fulfillment of this prophecy took place at the fall of Jerusalem to Rome in A.D. 70.⁵ He does not believe that this prophecy is hanging over the church. But non-preterist amillennialists worry about it, which means most amillennialists. So do post-tribulation premillennialists. Pre-tribulation premillennialists (dispensationalists) find solace only in their belief that Christ will rapture the church out of history before this horrendous event takes place. But dispensationalism's rapture fever⁶ produces a view of the church's role in history that is always one of culturally defensive compromise with the prevailing anti-Christian civilization. As dispensationalist theologian Thomas D. Ice has put it, "Premillennialists have always been involved in the present world. And, basically, they have picked up on the ethical positions of their contemporaries."⁷

5. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

6. Gary North, Rapture Fever: Why Dispensationalism Is Paralyzed (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1993). (<http://gnrapture>)

7. April 12, 1988; cited by Gary DeMar, The Debate Over Christian Reconstruction, p. 185. The debate was Dave Hunt and Tommy Ice vs. Gary North and Gary DeMar.

Theology is a package deal. The Christian who asks the rhetorical question, “Is eschatology so important that it must divide Christians?” has no understanding of the integrated nature of theology.

B. Theology and Eschatology

The most important theological issue is theology proper: the doctrine of God. He who gets this doctrine wrong will suffer eternal negative sanctions. The early church fought long and hard to establish orthodoxy in this area of theology. It is here, and only here, that the church has come to an agreement: Trinitarianism. Regarding the other four covenantal issues—hierarchy, law, sacraments, and eschatology—there has been constant disagreement.

Eschatology is the fifth point of Christian theology: (1) God, (2) man, (3) law, (4) sanctions, (5) eschatology.⁸ It is also chronologically the fifth great theological debate in the history of the Western church. The first was theology proper. This debate was settled in the fourth century.⁹ The solution was the doctrine of the Trinity. None of the rest of the five debates has been settled. The second debate was over hierarchy: church vs. church (the East-West split came in 1054) and church vs. state (the conflict between Pope Gregory VII and Emperor Henry IV in 1076). The third debate was over law. This debate began in the Western church in the eleventh century: canon law vs. a revived secular Roman law.¹⁰ Scholasticism soon appeared: the philosophical attempt to reconcile these two legal and philosophical systems. The attempt failed. The Reformation was fought mainly over point four: sanctions. The Reformation was a culture-transforming and culture-splitting public debate over the role of Papal indulgences (the issue of the sanction of purgatory), the number and meaning of the sacraments (realism vs. nominalism),¹¹ the judicially binding character of vows of celibacy made by the clergy and nuns, and the judicially binding char-

8. On the five points of covenant theology, see Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rsthymp>)

9. R. J. Rushdoony, The Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1968] 1998), chaps. 2, 3.

10. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983).

11. Covenantalism is implied by Calvin's rejection of Roman Catholicism's realism (real presence) and also Anabaptism's nominalism (remembrance). But his invocation of "mystery" did not solve the problem.

acter of excommunication by the Roman Church. Finally, in the late 1800s, eschatology became the fifth major divisive issue in Protestantism. This debate began in earnest with the success in the United States of Jesus Is Coming (1878), written by W.E.B.,¹² and the advent of prophecy conferences.

Christian theology is theocentric. Theology proper is the foundation of the other four doctrines. Get theology proper wrong, and you will get the other four wrong by identifying the wrong god as sovereign. This is why the Book of Genesis is the most important book in the Pentateuch. Genesis describes the origin of the universe and presents the Creator-creature distinction. The debate over origins has been the fundamental debate between Christianity and paganism from the beginning. Evolutionism has been around a long time. So has the doctrine of the eternity of matter.¹³ In our day, the evolution-creation debate has dwarfed all others as the chief theological battlefield of the church. More intellectual ground has been surrendered faster by Christianity since the advent of Darwinism than ever before in the history of the church. Even Islam's invasion of the West and its complete conquest of North Africa, 622–711, was a minor affair compared to the surrender of the modern church to a peculiar hybrid of Darwinism and theism: theistic evolution. Darwinists regard theistic evolution as ludicrous, but the idea gives psychological comfort to Christians who have adopted an evolutionary time scale. The church has preferred to baptize evolutionism rather than resist it.

The debate over eschatology has become a major dividing line within the Protestant church ever since the 1870s, about the time of Darwinism's extension into all academic fields. The comprehensive and rapid triumph of Darwinism in both the academic world and the political world has been paralleled by the triumph of dispensationalism in the Arminian, pietistic Protestant world.¹⁴ Darwinism has conquered the thinking of humanists. At the same time, dispensationalism has provided fundamentalist Christians with both a theological explanation and a justification for their surrender of cultural territory to the Darwinists. That which Christianity has surrendered to the humanists has been identified by pietists in general and dispensationalists in particular as either beyond the redemptive power of the gospel during this dispensation or else inherently part of Satan's kingdom. The typical American fundamentalist's pre-1976 assessment, "politics is dirty," is more of a description of politics in general than politics merely in this temporary dispensation. The same negative assessment applies to culture in general. We are confidently assured: "There is no such thing as Christian [politics, economics, psychology, etc.]" This is accompanied by a corollary: "The Bible isn't a blueprint for [politics, economics, psychology, etc.]" Judicially, "we're under grace, not law." Above all: "You don't polish brass on a sinking ship."¹⁵ This statement of faith is eschatological.

12. William E. Blackstone.

13. Aristotle, Physics, VIII.

14. The one major exception: the Church of Christ (Campbellite).

Nevertheless, we are also assured of the opposite. "The Bible has answers for every question." "There is no neutrality." "Jesus calls men to surrender to Him totally." "The redemptive power of the gospel heals all sin." That these assertions are in complete opposition to the previous ones is not recognized by most fundamentalists.

Eschatology is part of the covenant: point five. The church can get the last four points incorrect and still persevere in history, but it cannot inherit in history until it gets correct all five points and their applications. The progressive cultural disinheritance of the church, which has accelerated since the publication of Darwin's Origin of Species (1859), began long before Darwin. It began no later than 1700: the rise of the Newtonian Enlightenment.¹⁶ But modern evolutionism offers the most coherent theological system in the history of the war between belief and unbelief: from its doctrine of impersonal creation (the Big Bang) to its doctrine of the impersonal last judgment (the heat death of the universe).¹⁷

Rival theologies have always confronted Christianity. These rival theologies have always occupied territory within the church and its allied academic agencies. So have rival eschatologies. Communism surely offered a rival eschatology.¹⁸ Today, as in 622, so does Islam.

C. Pessimillennialism vs. Deliverance in History

Amillennialism and premillennialism deny that Christianity can create a culture in history. Amillennialists say this can never happen. Premillennialists say it will not happen until Jesus appears with His an-

15. This phrase was popularized in the 1950s by radio preacher J. Vernon McGee.

16. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 334–55. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

17. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

18. F. N. Lee, Communist Eschatology (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig, 1974).

gels to set up an international Christian bureaucracy.

1. Amillennialism

To relegate formal eschatology to the final judgment and the post-resurrection world, which amillennialism does, is a fundamental error that has culturally debilitating consequences. It means surrendering civilization to covenant-breakers as a consequence of eschatological, prophetic inevitability. No one has put it more clearly than amillennialist theologian David Engelsma. He is the senior theologian of the tiny Protestant Reformed Church, which split from the Christian Reformed Church in 1923 over the issue of common grace, which the PRC says does not exist.¹⁹ As you read this diatribe, think “carnal = fallen men; spiritual = persecuted Christians.” Engelsma writes:

Carnal dominion is earthly victory. It is victory according to the thinking of man. It consists of numbers—the conversion of a majority of humans; of physical force—a Christian police force and army; of control of culture—godly television, radio, and newspapers; of deliverance from worldly cares and natural miseries—the virtual eradication of poverty, sickness, and war; and of material prosperity—jobs, money, houses, and long life.

This is the dominion of Christ that is proclaimed by postmillennialism, especially by Christian Reconstruction. This is supposed to be the victory of Christ in history, the flourishing of the Messianic kingdom.

It is a carnal dominion.

The victory heralded by Reformed amillennialism is spiritual. It is real victory. It is real victory here and now. But it is victory according to the thinking of God. It is contrary to human standards of victory, including that of Christian Reconstructionism, foolishness. No one can see this victory, just as no eye can see the kingdom that is established by this victory. The victory and kingdom of Christ can be known only by faith.

The true victory of Christ in history is His saving of the elect church from sin. It is His empowering that church to confess His name. It is His preservation of the church in holiness unto life eternal. To this saving of the church belongs Christ’s institution of true churches that preach the gospel purely, administer the sacraments

19. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 1.(<http://bit.ly/gndcgg>)

properly, and exercise Christian discipline rightly.²⁰

To put it as bluntly and as graphically as I can, amillennialism's archetypal victory in a progressively sinful civilization is the victory of a handful of Christians who are locked in their cells at night in a concentration camp, and who are worked like slaves during their waking hours. God's victory is demonstrated by never allowing all of the concentration camps to snuff out weekly worship services. God shows Christians victorious grace by persuading the camp's warden to let them meet once a week in the camp's latrine area, and to take the Lord's Supper once a month.

For the amillennialist, victory in history is manifested best by the existence of the Barbed Wire Reformed Church. For the amillennialist, the enduring authoritative example of God's victory in history is Israel in Egypt, after the Pharaoh of the persecution but before Moses arrived to put the nation into conflict with the Pharaoh of the exodus. None of that deliverance stuff! All talk of deliverance only gets good people into trouble with the lawful authorities. Such talk is carnal. This was the message of the shackled rulers of Israel to Moses and Aaron.

And they met Moses and Aaron, who stood in the way, as they came forth from Pharaoh: And they said unto them, The LORD look upon you, and judge; because ye have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants, to put a sword in their hand to slay us (Ex. 5:20–21).

If you doubt me, consider Engelsma's warning. "To mock this spiritual victory of Christ is unbelief. To be dissatisfied with it is ingratitude."²¹ Like the elders of Israel in Egypt, Engelsma calls to account anyone who dared to call attention to the obvious fact that slavery is not liberty and servitude is not victory.

Engelsma was a consistent amillennialist. He was also a consistent pietist. The pietist adamantly rejects any suggestion of the legitimacy and desirability of Christianity's cultural dominance in history. This is a form of neoplatonism. The pessimillennialist adds to this a sigh of relief: God has predestined this lack of influence. Failure is guaranteed eschatologically. The less cultural influence, the better spiritually, says the pietist.

Engelsma was forthright: earthly success, he defines as carnal, i.e., 20. David J. Engelsma, Christ's Spiritual Kingdom: A Defense of Reformed Amillennialism (Redlands, California: Reformed Witness, 2001), p. 123.

21. Ibid., p. 125.

either evil or at least spiritually immature. But there is an exegetical dilemma facing Engelsma, one which he conveniently ignores. Paul uses “carnal” pejoratively with respect to sin. He uses “spiritual” positively with respect to God’s law. “For we know that the law is spiritual: but I am carnal, sold under sin” (Rom. 7:14). Moses taught explicitly that corporate obedience to Bible-revealed law guarantees the external dominion in history by God’s covenant people. It is not the law and its promises regarding history that are carnal, Paul taught; rather, it is the sinful condition of men who do not obey God’s law. Engelsma tried his rhetorical best to tar and feather biblical law and its cultural promises with Paul’s language of carnality. But Paul argued the other way: the spirituality of God’s law. Such is the fate of amillennialists who are also pietists. They do not think covenantally.

Engelsma’s theology bordered on neoplatonism, as all pietism does: a contemptuous dismissal of matter as manifested in culture. Rushdoony defined neoplatonism as follows:

For Greek thought, two substances existed; on the one hand are ideas, mind, or spirit, the world of forms, and on the other hand is the world of matter, of particulars against universals, of the many as against the one. Since each was an independent substance, there was no effective and necessary link between the world of mind and the world of matter, and, as a result, the two tended to fall apart as philosophy pursued the logic of each starting point.

Neoplatonism developed in Alexandria and spread throughout the ancient world. Basic to neoplatonism was the emphasis on mind or ideas as the true or more important substance, so that the superior man, discerning the irrelevance and/or illusory nature of the material world, concentrated on the things of the mind or spirit.²²

The pietist dismisses as material both cultural creativity and cultural dominion, for both are confined to history, which is ultimately irrelevant except as the brief period of time available for each person’s regeneration. The ideal of cultural dominion is said to be carnal. The Christian neoplatonist dismisses any claim that Christianity can or should create its own defining culture, even though he readily admits that every other religion creates its own defining culture. Therefore, he views the war between Christianity and all rival religions as a war in which Christians will at best be allowed by God to live in one or another er pagan culture. God supposedly has predestined this outcome. Christianity will not transform culture. It will barely be able to preserve a defensive ghetto culture in the Gulag. The culture war is therefore not worth fighting. "Pull up the drawbridge!"

22. R. J. Rushdoony, The Flight from Humanity: A Study of the Effect of Neoplatonism on Christianity (Vallecito, California: Chalcedon, [1973] 2008), p. 6. ????

The main differences between amillennialism and postmillennialism center around the degree to which history will visibly manifest the judicial inheritance which Jesus Christ obtained through His death and resurrection, and which He announced to His disciples in Matthew 28:18. Will His legal title to all things, which was granted to Him by God the Father after the resurrection, progressively manifest itself culturally in the work of Christians in building up the kingdom of God on earth and in history?

Because of confusion on this point, let me clarify: the New Covenant kingdom of God was established definitively in history by Jesus prior to His death and resurrection. "But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you" (Matt. 12:28). Title to the earth was transferred to Him by God after the resurrection. Jesus transferred title to the church, His bride, no later than Pentecost (Acts 2). Thus, the New Covenant kingdom of God began before title was transferred. The church lawfully invokes its legal title, but this title is reclaimed from Satan progressively, through Christian reconstruction, i.e., working out our faith with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12), in every area of life—matching Christ's transferred title to everything—through service to others: "But Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. But so shall it not be among you: but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister: And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mark 10:42–45). The dominion covenant is progressively achieved by Christians in history on a culture-wide basis by means of the church's division of labor (Rom. 12; I Cor. 12), which I have discussed in my commentaries on these two Pauline epistles: Cooperation and Dominion and Judgment and Dominion.

The postmillennialist argues as follows: that which was judicially definitive in history at the resurrection will be extended progressively in history to the entire culture. This process is analogous to Jesus' sin-free final and perfect sanctification, which is judicially transferred to believers definitively at the time of their redemption,²³ but which they must work out in history.²⁴ God gave Abraham legal title to the Promised Land, but actual possession had to wait four generations (Gen. 15:16).²⁵ What Abraham received definitively by promise was achieved by his circumcised heirs, although they subsequently surrendered geographically for a time (the exile) and then covenantally in Christ's day (Matt. 21:43). Eschatologically, Old Covenant Israel moved steadily toward apostasy and defeat in history, beginning with the incomplete conquest of Canaan.

The amillennialist argues the opposite: that which was judicially definitive in history at the resurrection will not be extended progressively in history to the entire culture. Not only is there is no positive correlation between (1) Christ's definitive title to ownership of the world and (2) the church's extension of the kingdom of God in history to culture, there is a negative correlation. Satan's theft of culture through Adam will never be overcome in history. That which was definitive in Christ's resurrection from the dead and His lawful reclaiming of the inheritance will never have a widespread effect in history. There must be a growing historical gap between Christ's definitive inheritance of the earth at the resurrection and His final inheritance of the earth at the final judgment. In between, Satan and his disciples retain control and even increase their control.

Is the church also moving progressively toward final defeat, though not complete apostasy? I ask: Why should the church be defeated in history? I know why Israel was defeated. Israel was defeated because Israel apostatized completely. No conservative Trinitarian theologian argues that the entire church will apostatize completely, yet most Christian theologians believe that the church will be defeated culturally. The cultural history of the church will supposedly be found on that last day to have recapitulated the cultural history of Old Covenant Israel. So teach amillennialism and premillennialism.

23. "But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, Saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered" (Rom. 4:5–7). See John Murray, Redemption Accomplished and Applied (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1955).

24. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

25. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

2. Premillennialism

There is another variation of the same pietistic error: dispensational premillennialism. This view of eschatology consigns the fulfillment of Old Testament's prophecies of universal victory for the kingdom of God to the post-Church Age era. Only after Christ bodily returns victoriously, along with his angels (and, in some popular versions, with resurrected saints),²⁶ which dispensationalism asserts, will it be possible to establish Christian culture. Premillennialists refuse to describe this future culture.

Dispensationalism is as pietistic and therefore as neoplatonic as amillennialism is. It has equally culturally debilitating consequences. Dispensationalism teaches explicitly that no Old Testament prophecy has been literally fulfilled or can be literally fulfilled by the Church in this, the so-called Church Age (the "Great Parenthesis").²⁷ For now, the church must resign itself to minority status and cultural impotence. Dispensational author David Allen Lewis offered this reason for rejecting Christian Reconstruction: such views will upset the humanists, who will inevitably become more powerful. "... as the secular, humanistic, demonically-dominated world system becomes more and more aware that the Dominionists and Reconstructionists are a real political threat, they will sponsor more and more concerted efforts to destroy the Evangelical church. Unnecessary persecution could be stirred up."²⁸ This was the response of the Hebrew elders to Moses and Aaron (Ex. 5:2). Those Christians who live in fear of the Egyptians of this world proclaim cultural impotence as a way of life.

My assessment of dispensationalism as equally neoplatonic as amillennialism also applies to generic premillennialism's insistence on the church's inevitably declining cultural influence in the pre-millennial era, in which the church supposedly must experience prior to Christ's eschatologically discontinuous return with His angels to establish His new headquarters on earth, rather than remain seated at the right hand of God in heaven. The church will fall into persecution in history unless it is raptured out of history.²⁹

26. Thomas D. Ice, "Preface," final paragraph, in H. Wayne House and Ice, Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse? (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah, 1988). For a brief critique, see North, Rapture Fever, p. 136.

27. "If the prophecies of the Old Testament concerning the promises of the future made to Abraham and David are to be literally fulfilled, then there must be a future period, the millennium, in which they can be fulfilled, for the Church is not now fulfilling them in any literal sense." Charles Caldwell Ryrie, Dispensationalism Today (Chicago: Moody Press, 1965), p. 158. Ryrie, Dispensationalism (Chicago: Moody Press, 1995), p. 147.

28. Lewis, Prophecy 2000 (Green Forest, Arkansas: New Leaf Press, 1990), p. 277.

Then how is the New Covenant church any better protected from evil than the Old Covenant church was? Israel fell away repeatedly. How is it that the incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ leaves His church no better equipped for victory?

D. Christ's Ascension and Social Theory

This raises a very embarrassing question: Is the post-ascension church always in the same eschatological condition as pre-ascension Israel?

1. Amillennial Social Theory

The amillennialist seeks to evade this question, but when pressed, his answer is yes. He believes, but refuses to say in public, that the bodily ascension of Jesus Christ in history and the sending of the Holy Spirit in history are insufficient to empower the church in history to break out of its sad pathway to visible cultural defeat. Amillennialists have an implicit but unstated conclusion with regard to the doctrine of the bodily ascension of Christ: the cultural power of sin is greater in history than the cultural power of redemption. They relegate the prophesied victory of the church in history to the realm of personal victory over sin, while affirming the church's inevitable visible defeat. The bodily resurrection of Jesus Christ took place in history, but for all the good it does the church culturally, it might as well never have happened. The ascension's impact is internal and individual, not external and cultural, insists the amillennialist.

Theological liberals have been far more consistent in their view of the resurrection and ascension: they have relegated both historical events to the realm of the spirit. To them, the bodily ascension of Christ is a phrase testifying to the spiritual optimism of the early church, not a visible, verifiable historical event. Amillennialists believe the same thing regarding the promised victory of the church in history. When the Bible repeatedly predicts that covenant-keepers will inherit the earth in history, the amillennialist says, "Spiritual, not literal!"

Postmillennialists believe that Christ's bodily ascension to heaven and the sending of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost empowered the church in history to recapture lost territory in every realm of life. Amillennialists believe that such reconquest cannot take place in history; the church will surrender territory, should it ever actually recapture it. The church's cultural inheritance supposedly will go the way of the Mosaic land inheritance. Christ's ascension plays no role in amillennial social theory. Here is what I wrote in the conclusion of Chapter 6 in Leviticus.

29. North, Rapture Fever.

There is remarkably little discussion of the ascension of Christ in modern orthodox theology.³⁰ This topic inevitably raises fundamental historical, cosmological, and cultural implications that modern premillennial and especially amillennial theologians find difficult to accept, such as the progressive manifestation of Christ's rule in history through His representatives: Christians.³¹ In a world in which grace is believed to be progressively devoured by nature, there is little room for historical applications of the doctrine of the historical ascension. Covenantal postmillennialism alone can confidently discuss the doctrine of Christ's ascension, for postmillennialism does not seek to confine the effects of Christ's ascension to the realms of the internal and the trans-historical.³² That is to say, postmillennialism does not assert the existence of supposedly inevitable boundaries around the effects of grace in history. On the contrary, it asserts that all such boundaries will be progressively overcome in history, until on judgment day the very gates (boundaries) of hell will not be able to stand against the church (Matt. 16:18).³³

Both amillennialism and premillennialism teach the inevitable disinheritance of the church in history and the illegitimacy of the ideal of Christendom as applying to civilization prior to the bodily return of

30. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 227–29. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

31. No theological or eschatological school denies that there can be prolonged setbacks in this manifestation of Christ's rule. Conversely, none would totally deny progress. I know of no one who would argue, for example, that the creeds of the church prior to the fourth century were more rigorous or more accurate theologically than those which came later.

32. This is why amillennialism drifts so easily into Barthianism: the history of mankind for the amillennialist has no visible connection with the ascension of Jesus Christ. Progressive sanctification in this view is limited to the personal and ecclesiastical; it is never cultural or civic. The ascension of Christ has no transforming implications for society in amillennial theology. The ascension was both historical and publicly visible; its implications supposedly are not. The Barthian is simply more consistent than the amillennialist: he denies the historicity of both Jesus' ascension and His subsequent grace to society. Christ's ascension, like His grace, is relegated to the trans-historical. See North, Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 111–13.

33. Gentry, He Shall Have Dominion, chaps. 12, 13.

Christ. Eschatology shapes social theory.

2. Covenantal Social Theory

Covenantal representation—point two of the biblical covenant model—is not merely contemporary; it is also historical and eschatological. For all mankind, it is historical representation in the past: Adam's Fall. For Old Covenant Israel, it was also eschatological representation in the future: Christ's bodily resurrection and bodily ascension to the right hand of God. New Covenant eschatological representation is based on the fact that there will inevitably be a cultural victory for the church in history because of Christ's bodily death, resurrection, and ascension, all of which were historical events. Christ's judicially representative victory in history is the covenantal foundation of the kingdom's triumph in history. Paul was adamant on this point: Christ's resurrection from the dead is the church's guarantee of victory in history.

But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all (I Cor. 15:20–28).³⁴ Christ's bodily resurrection was the visible evidence of God's transfer of earthly power to Christ in history. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen" (Matt.

34. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 16.

28:18–20). Next, His bodily ascension was the visible evidence of His transfer of judicial authority to the church. “But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judaea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth. And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight” (Acts 1:8–9). The angels told the witnesses not to stand around gazing into heaven. “Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven” (Acts 1:11).

The historicity of Christ's bodily ascension makes this event crucial for biblical social theory. Neither premillennialism nor amillennialism has a developed theology of the ascension. The amillennial system implicitly denies the relevance of this doctrine for social theory.³⁵ The premillennial system in practice concentrates on standing around and gazing upward in expectation of Christ's imminent return.³⁶ Both viewpoints reject the possibility of developing an explicitly biblical social theory—i.e., a social theory without any compromise with natural law—because both viewpoints ignore the implications of Christ's ascension for church history. Neither system acknowledges the five-point aspect of Christ's covenantal incarnation in history: (1) transcendence/immanence (both God and perfect man in one person with two natures); (2) hierarchy/representation (the divine office of Son in the economical Trinity and the human office of second Adam); (3) ethics/law (Christ's perfect fulfillment of the law); (4) oath/sanctions (death and bodily resurrection); (5) succession/inheritance (bodily ascension and the sending of the Holy Spirit). Pessimillennial systems have substituted a doctrine of Satanic inheritance in church history for the doctrine of Christendom. This is a reversal of what Jesus taught: the meek will inherit the earth.

Covenant-keeping men's confidence in God's transforming work in history wanes when they no longer see evidence of God's predictable sanctions in history, an historical and psychological fact to which twentieth-century Christianity testified eloquently. This loss of perception is not a valid excuse for abandoning hope regarding the future, for God's word testifies to the victory of God's visible kingdom in history.³⁷ Nevertheless, Christians lose confidence easily, including theologians; they cannot live indefinitely with contradictions between what they say they believe and what they see—"cognitive dissonance," as scholars call it. Theologians have re-written kingdom eschatology because they could no longer persuade themselves that what they and their peers see all around them testified to the predictability of God's corporate sanctions as described in the Old Testament. Premillennialism is an eschatology of predictable sanctions—both personal and corporate—that must be deferred until Jesus returns to earth in total power to impose them in person. Amillennialism is an eschatology of predictable, long-run, negative historical sanctions against God's people and His kingdom. So is premillennialism until such time as Christ returns in person to impose sanctions through a gigantic, international, top-down bureaucracy staffed by Christians.³⁸ But predictable, corporate, historical sanctions are an inescapable concept. It is never a question of "predictable, corporate, historical sanctions vs. no predictable, corporate, historical sanctions"; it is always a question of what kind of predictable, corporate, historical sanctions.³⁹ It is ultimately a question of whose law-order governs the imposition of such historical sanctions. It is a debate over who rules in history, Christ or antiChrist.

35. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 227–35.

36. Ibid., pp. 256–57.

Almost from the beginning, the church substituted rival eschatologies that were based on an ethically perverse system of predictable, corporate, historical sanctions during the church age. These pessimilennial eschatologies teach that God will impose negative sanctions in history against covenant-keepers, and positive sanctions for covenant-breakers.⁴⁰ This is consistent with the church's opposition to biblical law and especially its sanctions.

Christian theologians have publicly rejected God's revealed law and its mandated civil sanctions, and they have also rejected the biblical doctrine of predictable historical blessings for men's corporate obedience and cursings for their disobedience. They have substituted other laws—"natural" laws—and other systems of predictable corporate sanctions, such as those imposed by a supposedly ethically neutral and culturally autonomous free market or those drawn up by a com-

37. Roderick Campbell, Israel and the New Covenant (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1954).

38. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 4.

39. Ibid., chaps. 7, 8.

40. Ibid., chaps. 5, 11.

mittee of central planners. In short, they have abandoned biblical law, biblical sanctions, and biblical eschatology. They have vaguely understood that these three covenantal doctrines are a coherent, unbreakable unit—points three, four, and five of the biblical covenant model—and so they have consistently abandoned all three.⁴¹

3. Pietism's Social Theory

A representative example of pietism is Peter Toon's book, The Ascension of Our Lord (1984). The book was originally a series of lectures at Dallas Theological Seminary, the world's leading dispensational seminary. Books on the ascension are rare, so this one affords us an opportunity to see how the doctrine is understood in the evangelical Protestant community.

There is nothing in this book on the relationship between Christ's ascension and the extension of the kingdom of God as biblical civilization. There are chapters on Jesus the King, Jesus the Priest, and Jesus the Prophet. We might expect something on social theory in the chapter on Jesus the king. What we get is pure pietism: Jesus the suffering servant. Jesus does not reign so much as He suffers. This is because Jesus and His body, the church, are separated in history. They will remain separated until the end of the age.⁴²

Not only is Christ separated from His body, the church, and therefore must remain unfulfilled until the end of the age, says Toon, Christ actually suffers. His ascension has not overcome His suffering. Toon wrote:

Furthermore, there is a sense in which Christ, in relation to his body, is imperfect. Paul told the Colossian church: "I now rejoice in my sufferings for you and fill up in my flesh what is lacking in the afflictions of Christ, for the sake of His body, which is the church" (1:24). There were no deficiencies in the personal sufferings of Jesus Christ and there was no lack of worth in his sufferings. However, in and through his body, Christ still suffers, must suffer, and will suffer before the consummation of the work of God in this body (cf. 2 Cor. 12:9). Yet, as he suffers in and through his body, he also brings succor to those who are suffering; we have a High Priest who is touched with the feeling of our infirmities and tribulations (Heb. 4:15).⁴³

41. A good example is Cornelius Van Til. For a detailed analysis of Van Til's views on points three through five, see North, Political Polytheism, ch. 3.

42. Peter Toon, The Ascension of Our Lord (Nashville: Nelson, 1984), p. 45.

43. Ibid., p. 46.

To call this argument bizarre is saying too little. Hebrews 4:15 teaches that Jesus suffered in history. "For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." Jesus suffered definitively in history, as Toon said. He suffered all there was to suffer in principle. But this does not deny the progressive suffering in history by His covenantal representatives. Jesus was also definitively perfect in history. This does not deny that His people work out Christ's judicially imputed moral perfection in history. "Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling" (Phil 2:12). This is progressive sanctification. Colossians 3 deals with progressive suffering. Neither passage has anything to do with Christ's supposedly shared condition in heaven.

How could Toon make such a blatant theological error, i.e., the idea of Christ's suffering in heaven along with His earthly church? Because his presentation in this book is completely colored by his pietism. Rather than discuss the Holy Spirit's empowering of Christians for kingdom-extending service, he called attention to the succoring of Christians by Christ. Christ's kingship is not manifested by Christianity's visible dominion in history, but rather by Christ's invisible succoring of besieged Christians in history. There is not one word in the book on either cultural dominion or the kingdom of God manifested in institutions other than the church. There is nothing on empowerment for cultural rule. Rather than empowering His covenant people to rule in His name, the ascended Christ is content to succor them in their permanent historical defeat. This is pure, 24-karat pietism. And, like 24-karat gold, it bends and can be flattened.

Toon cited the Westminster Larger Catechism (1647). He cited it selectively: Answer 45. He ignored Answer 54:

Christ is exalted in his sitting at the right hand of God, in that as God-man he is advanced to the highest favour with God the Father, with all fulness of joy, glory, and power over all things in heaven and earth; and doth gather and defend his church, and subdue their enemies; furnisheth his ministers and people with gifts and graces, and maketh intercession for them.

Note that this passage refers to history, i.e., the church militant: "furnisheth his ministers and people with gifts and graces, and maketh intercession for them." Christ's subduing of His enemies therefore has to take place in history, not only at the last judgment. Note also that there is no mention of suffering. On the contrary, the text proclaims “all fulness of joy, glory, and power over all things in heaven and earth.”

Toon ignored this passage for good reason. He was engaged in a reinterpretation of the Larger Catechism to make it conform with pessimillennial pietism. This is not an easy task, for the document was produced by theocrats, many of whom were postmillennial, as Answer 191 indicates. Toon confined his discussion to the institutional church. He also confined his discussion to the psychology of individual Christians. He relegated all victory to the end of the world. Here is how he interprets Answer 45. (The italicized sentences are from the Larger Catechism. My responses are inside parentheses.) He calls out a people to himself. This means that Christ sends evangelists.⁴⁴ (So far, so good.) He gives them officers, laws, and censures. This refers exclusively to the institutional church.⁴⁵ (No problem yet.) He bestows saving grace on the elect. This refers exclusively to the institutional church.⁴⁶ He rewards their obedience. “This reward will be given in heaven, but its exact nature is not disclosed in the New Testament.”⁴⁷ *He corrects them for their sins.*⁴⁸ (No problem here.) He preserves and supports them under all circumstances. (Big problem here. Does this mean that He brings them external victory in history? No, said Toon. This support is strictly psychological.) “Yet Christ the King orders their circumstances and inwardly helps them by his Spirit so that they are able to stand firm in faith and joyfully confess his name in word and deed.”⁴⁹ Christ restrains and overcomes all our enemies. (But when? Only at the final judgment, said Toon.) “Before his return to earth, Jesus the Lord and King restrains the evil power of Satan and his hosts, so that what they can achieve is limited. When he appears in glory to judge the living and the dead he will overcome all his enemies and they will be judged and punished.”⁵⁰

Toon's pietism colored everything in the book. He said that Satan and his host possess limited authority. There is nothing unique about this observation. Every Christian admits this. But he neglected to say

44. Idem.

45. Ibid., p. 47.

46. Idem.

47. Ibid., p. 48.

48. Idem.

49. Idem.

50. Ibid., p. 49.

explicitly what this admission means for a pietist. The pietist affirms that Satan presently rules the affairs of this world: culture, politics, education, etc. But, at the final judgment, Christ will overcome Satan by His divine, bodily intervention. This overcoming is supposedly not representative for Christ through His church in history. This overcoming is also not a process; rather, it comes only at the end of the process, i.e., at the end of history. In stark contrast to his view of Christ's non-dominion in history, the pietist believes that cultural dominion is judicially representative for Satan. Satan rules history through his covenant people. He does not rule from a throne in some earthly location. The pietist insists that neither Satan nor his host will be overcome by Christ's representatives in church history. Therefore, the pietist insists, what works for Satan until the end of time—representative dominion through covenantal agents—cannot work for Christ. Anyway, he would insist this if he had ever thought about this aspect of his theology, which he hasn't. But what did Jesus say about the church? This: the gates of hell shall not prevail against it (Matt. 16:18).

Toon did not refer to the future millennial kingdom, when Jesus supposedly will rule on earth in person. I have never read any premillennialist author who attempts to relate the theology of ascension, meaning Christ's cosmic rulership from on high, with the Great Commission's call for comprehensive redemption.⁵¹ We hear nothing about His rulership on earth and in history through His covenantal representatives. Yet pietism's theologians are quite willing to affirm that Satan's representatives in history do rule in his name, despite his physical absence. These theologians refuse to consider this same representative arrangement with respect to Christians. They openly affirm that Satan's representatives have achieved cultural dominion in history, despite their lord's physical absence, yet they categorically reject Christian cultural dominion as being impossible for Spirit-empowered Christians in the post-ascension era.

Then what has Christ's bodily ascension accomplished for the kingdom of God in history, according to pietists? Not dominion, surely. Not a comprehensive civilization. Not even a comprehensive theory of civilization. The pietist rejects the Middle Ages, when Christianity was culturally influential, as "triumphalism," theocratic, and tyrannical. He is happy that the church makes no such claims today. Better to live under the rule of covenant-breakers. Better to suffer.

51. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C: "Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action." (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

In an appendix, Toon wrote: "Third, the Ascension means that he is, and will be, the conqueror and judge of the enemies of God."⁵² This view of Christ's conquest incorporates two of the three traditional explanations of Christ's work of redemption ("buying back"): definitive and final. But something is missing: progressive. This is always missing in amillennialism, and it is always missing in premillennialism's view of the pre-millennial era of the church. Neither eschatological system has a doctrine of church history that relates Christ's definitive and final sanctification. That is, there is no temporal connection between definitive sanctification and final sanctification. There is also no corporate sanctification. Yet for the bride of Christ to be presented pure and undefiled to the Bridegroom at the end of history, there has to be progressive corporate sanctification in history. Amillennialists and premillennialists reject such a notion. So do pietists.

The chief theological problem with this omission is that Christ's resurrection and ascension were historical. The proof of Christ's definitive conquest over both sin and Satan were His resurrection (I Cor. 15) and His ascension (Eph. 4:8–10). Paul appealed to the doctrine of Christ's ascension to make his case for the church's corporate progressive sanctification in history. "For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Eph. 4:12–13). Amillennialism and premillennialism place in history Christ's definitive perfection and dominion. They place His final dominion at the end of history. Then what of Christ's progressive dominion? For pessimillennialism, there is none for the church, only for Satan's kingdom. Satan achieves this representatively through the disinherited sons of Adam. Christ does not achieve this representatively through His adopted sons.

This is why amillennialism and premillennialism are asymmetric theologies. Their theology of covenantal representation applies to Satan and his kingdom, but not to Christ and His kingdom. Both of these eschatologies affirm that Satan rules representatively, exercising dominion in history through his disciples, whereas Christ, having achieved definitive victory in history over Satan through His resurrection, suffers post-ascension historical defeat representatively through his ever-besieged church. Christ can achieve cultural victory only by ruling in person, whereas Satan has achieved cultural victory without ruling in person. For the amillennialist and the premillennialist, cultural dominion in church history is a contest whose rules are rigged in favor of Satan: “Heads, Satan wins; tails, Christ loses.” What works for Satan fails for Christ: representative rule. Yet Jesus taught that the two kingdoms are so similar that the wheat and the tares must coexist side by side until the end of time (Matt. 13:24–30, 36–43).⁵³

52. Toon, op. cit., p. 147.

By restricting Christ’s kingship to the institutional church—Christ the Priest—and by involving Him in the suffering of his people—again, Christ the Priest—and by confining His rulership to the final judgment, Toon stripped Jesus the King of His reign, His kingdom, and His cultural authority in history. All pietists do this, but Toon was more self-conscious than most.

Toon was not ignorant. He was familiar with Anglo-American church history and historical theology. He knew that the many of the Puritans and Scottish Presbyterians were postmillennialists. Although he did not mention any of his books on Puritanism in the list of published books that appears in his book on the ascension, he was the author of Puritans, the Millennium and the Future of Israel (1970). It is a book on postmillennialism.

Toon self-consciously replaced the concept of the Great Commission, which governs everything under heaven, with pietism’s world of suffering redeemed sinners who cling to each other inside besieged local churches, and who pray for the return of Christ with His angels to overcome their culturally dominant and increasingly antagonistic covenantal enemies. Toon had no concept of Jesus as the king of culture because he rejects any concept of the kingdom of God as manifesting itself outside the institutional church (and perhaps the Christian family—he did not say). The implication of his theology of the ascension is that the ascension has produced a world in which Christianity possesses less cultural authority in history than Old Testament Israel lawfully possessed.

Toon has an eschatological agenda: to promote cultural retreat as God’s holy way of living. He ends his book by citing Colossians 3:1–5.

If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory. Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry.

53. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

Toon says that this passage should govern our thoughts in the present world. Why this passage? Why not the Great Commission? Because Christianity is inevitably losing the cultural and intellectual war. "As the process of secularization continues, and as the success of modern science and technology condition us to be merely this-worldly in our thinking, we need to follow the advice which Paul have to the church of Colossae."⁵⁴ In short, secularism should not be resisted by the Christians' development of a comprehensive counter-culture based on the Bible. No, it is to be resisted only by righteous individual living. By citing this particular Pauline passage, he offers an agenda for dominion that boils down to this: just stop fornicating. This, for Toon, constituted the essence of the visible cultural manifestation of the kingdom of God in history, the most that we can legitimately expect in history from the Great Commission. This, or something like it, is the conclusion of all forms of pessimillennialism.

This is pietism's worldview. It leads to legalism. And then, in Christians' legitimate reaction to legalism, it can lead to an illegitimate licentiousness. Both positions are antinomian with respect to God's Bible-revealed law, Old and New Testaments.

The theological answer to pietism's permanent dualism of legalism and licentiousness is covenant theology, which has what pietism does not: a doctrine of the kingdom of God as a civilization, not just a list of prohibited individual sins.

E. The Location of Kingdom Headquarters

The eschatological issue of headquarters should not be ignored. God's headquarters are in heaven. "And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held: And they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" (Rev. 6:9–10). Man's headquarters are on earth.

54. Ibid., p. 109.

Heaven does not come down to earth in history. Jesus did—once. After His ascension, His place of judgment is at the right hand of God, where He makes intercession on behalf of His people (Rom. 8: 34). The throne of grace is not on earth or in history. So, headquarters cannot be on earth or in history. This is equally true of Satan's kingdom, which premillennialists believe. Satan exercises dominion in history from beyond history. But Jesus doesn't, they teach.

The premillennialist associates Christ's dominion in history only with His bodily presence, not with His reign from on high. His reign from on high produces only cultural defeat in history for His representatives, both amillennialism and premillennialism teach. They do not relate Peter's words regarding Christ's location in heaven to His parallel dominion in history: "Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him" (I Peter 3:22).

Paul described our battles in history as battles against these supernatural powers. "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places" (Eph. 6:12). These are the supernatural powers that Christ, through His bodily resurrection, definitively defeated. "And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses; Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross; And having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a shew of them openly, triumphing over them in it" (Col. 2:13–15). Despite this, pessimillennialism teaches that these Satanic powers, which were definitively defeated by Christ in his resurrection, cannot be progressively defeated in history by Christ's pincer movement: power from His heavenly throne and power from His earthly church.

Eden was to serve Adam as his headquarters in the conquest of the world: the dominion covenant.⁵⁵ Adam was forcibly removed from headquarters after his rebellion. Headquarters for Noah was the ark, but only for a few months. After that, geography played no role until Abram was called out of Ur of the Chaldees. Ur could not serve as headquarters for Abraham; no place else could, either. Abraham wandered. After him, Israel wandered. Geographical headquarters was re-established only with Israel's conquest of Canaan. But the same threat existed for Israel as had existed for Adam, as Deuteronomy constantly warns: removal from headquarters. This happened at the time of the first exile, and then culminated with the removal of geographical headquarters with the fall of Jerusalem.

55. North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

Dispensational premillennialists assume that headquarters will be reestablished in Jerusalem by Jesus when He returns to set up His earthly kingdom.⁵⁶ Historic premillennialists remain silent regarding the place of earthly headquarters during the premillennial kingdom. Amillennialists and postmillennialists insist that kingdom headquarters in history has been transferred to heaven. Postmillennialists teach that this transfer will have visible cultural results in history: the progressive defeat of Satan's kingdom. Amillennialists also teach that this transfer will have visible cultural results in history: the progressive victory of Satan's kingdom.

With the transfer of God's kingdom to the replacement nation of the church (Matt. 21:43; 28:18–20), earthly headquarters no longer exist, even as an ideal. This has been a major transformation by the New Covenant. The church is decentralized. There are no biblically mandated international festivals. There are no international headquarters. While the Roman Catholic Church likes to think that it occupies international headquarters in the Vatican, as manifested by the Pope's authority, this faith was definitively shattered by its inability to enforce sanctions against the Eastern Church in 1054 and then against Luther after 1517. The Vatican after 1965 did not enforce effective discipline on the visible army of heretics who filled the church's seminaries, let alone the army of homosexuals who filled its pulpits. Its official proclamation of cultural authority may not be as devoid of visible evidence as Engelsma's standard of Christian cultural victory is, but it is close, and with respect to the sexual preferences of its ordained ministers, it is in even worse shape.

Conclusion

The law of God teaches that covenant-keeping will produce dominion in history for God's covenant people (Deut. 28:1–14). The issue of biblical law (point three) is tied to the issue of sanctions (point four) in history and therefore to eschatology (point five). This is why 56. While this is almost universally believed by dispensationalists, the movement's theologians have rarely mentioned it.

theonomy is necessarily postmillennial. This is a package deal. Biblical law's system of sanctions unbreakably connects point three and point five.

The attack on biblical law is an attack on point four: the law's sanctions, above all, civil sanctions. It is also an attack on point five: cultural dominion by covenant-keepers in history. This is why amillennialism and premillennialism are inherently pietistic. They denigrate Christianity's victory in history because they denigrate God's law. They denigrate God's law because they deny the law's historical sanctions, which produce cultural dominance for God's people. Denying this eschatological outcome, they must dismiss God's Bible-revealed law and its mandated civil sanctions as Old Testament intrusions into the history of the covenant. This dismissal delivers them into the hands of one or another system of anti-biblical law, which means anti-biblical ethics.

Appendix J

CATEGORIES OF THE MOSAIC LAW

This appendix appeared originally in the Conclusion to my book, Leviticus: An Economic Commentary (1994), pages 637–45. I have here retained the footnote references in that chapter. All of these laws are found in Leviticus, but they provide opportunities for Bible commentators and Christian ethicists to search for fundamental principles of interpretation for dealing with the Mosaic ordinances.

A. Land Laws and Seed Laws

Land laws and seed laws were laws associated with God's covenantal promises to Abraham regarding his offspring (Gen. 15–17). There was a chronological boundary subsequently placed on the seed laws: Jacob's prophecy and promise. "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). After Shiloh came, Jacob said, the scepter would depart from Judah. The unified concept of scepter and lawgiver pointed to the civil covenant: physical sanctions and law. Jacob prophesied that the lawful enforcement of the civil covenant would eventually pass to another ruler: Shiloh, the Messiah.

The Levitical land laws were tied covenantally to the Abrahamic promise regarding a place of residence for the Israelites (Gen. 15:13–16). These land laws were also tied to the Abrahamic promise of the seed. "In the same day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates" (Gen. 15:18). The mark of those included under the boundaries of these seed laws was the covenantal sign of circumcision (Gen. 17:9–14). Circumcision established a personal covenantal boundary. There were also family and tribal boundaries tied to the laws of inheritance. The ultimate inheritance law was above all a land law: the jubilee law (Lev. 25).

The fall of Jerusalem and the abolition of the temple's sacrifices forever ended the Mosaic Passover. The five sacrifices of Leviticus 1–7 also ended forever. There can be no question about the annulment of the inheritance laws by A.D. 70. But with this annulment of the inheritance laws also came the annulment of the seed laws. Once the Messiah came, there was no further need to separate Judah from his brothers. Once the temple was destroyed, there was no further need to separate Levi from his brothers. There was also no further need to separate the sons of Aaron (priests) from the sons of Levi (Levites). Therefore, the most important Mosaic family distinction within a single tribe—the Aaronic priesthood—was annulled: the ultimate representative case. The tribal and family boundaries of the Abrahamic covenant ceased to operate after A.D. 70. This annulled the Mosaic law's applications of the Abrahamic covenant's land and seed laws. The land and seed laws were aspects of a single administration: the Mosaic Covenant. The New Covenant—based exclusively and forthrightly on the covenantal concept of adoption¹—replaced the Mosaic Covenant.

By dividing the Mosaic law into land laws, seed laws, priestly laws, and cross-boundary laws, we can assess which laws are still binding in the New Covenant, and which are not.

1. Land Laws

Biblical quarantine (Lev. 13:45–46). This law dealt with a unique disease that came upon men as a judgment. Only when a priest crossed the household boundary of a diseased house did everything within its walls become unclean. This quarantine law ended when this judicial disease ended when the Mosaic priesthood ended.²

Promised land as a covenantal agent (Lev. 18:24–29). The land no longer functions as a covenantal agent. That temporary office was operational only after the Israelites crossed into Canaan. That office was tied to the presence of the sanctuary³

1. Infant baptism is not a confirmation of covenantal inheritance through biological inclusion but rather its opposite: the confirmation of covenantal inheritance through adoption, i.e., adoption into the family of God, His church. The one who baptizes is an agent of the church, not an agent of the family. This was true under the Abrahamic covenant, too: the male head of the household circumcised the males born into that household, but as an agent of the priesthood.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1984] 2012), ch. 9.

3. Ibid., ch. 10.

The laws of clean and unclean beasts (Lev. 20:22–26). This was a land law, for it was associated with the land's office as the agent of sanctions. These laws marked off Israel as a separate nation. This is true of the dietary laws generally, which is why God annulled them in a vision to Peter just before he was told to visit the house of Cornelius (Acts 10).⁴

The national sabbatical year of rest for the land (Lev. 25:1–7). This was an aspect of the jubilee year. The law was part of God's original grant of leaseholds at the time of the conquest. There is no agency of enforcement today. There has been no national grant of land.⁵

The jubilee law (Lev. 25:8–13). This law applied only to national Israel. It was a law uniquely associated with Israel's conquest of Canaan. It was in part a land law and in part a seed law: inheritance and citizenship. It was more judicial—citizenship—than economic. The annulment of the jubilee law was announced by Jesus at the beginning of his ministry (Luke 4:17–19). This prophecy was fulfilled at the final jubilee year of national Israel.⁶ This probably took place in the year that Paul's ministry to the gentiles began, two years after the crucifixion.⁷

The jubilee law prohibiting oppression centered around the possibility that the priests and magistrates might not enforce the jubilee law (Lev. 25:14–17). Thus, those who trusted the courts when leasing land would be oppressed by those who knew the courts were corrupt.⁸

The jubilee year was to be preceded by a miraculous year bringing a triple crop (Lev. 25:18–22). This designates the jubilee year law as a land law with a blessing analogous to the manna. The manna had ceased when the nation crossed the Jordan River and entered Canaan.⁹

The prohibition against the permanent sale of rural land (Lev. 25:23–24). This was a land law. It was an aspect of the conquest of Canaan: the original land grant. This law did not apply in walled cities that were not Levitical cities.¹⁰

The law promising rain, crops, peace in the land, and no wild beasts in response to corporate faithfulness (Lev. 26:3–6). This was a land law. Nature's predictable covenantal blessings were tied to the

4. Ibid., ch. 21.

5. Ibid., ch. 24.

6. Ibid., ch. 25.

7. James Jordan, "Jubilee (3)," Biblical Chronology, V (April 1993), [p. 2].

8. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 26.

9. Ibid., ch. 27.

10. Ibid., ch. 28.

office of the holy land as the agency of sanctions.¹¹

2. Seed Laws

Gleaning (Lev. 19:9–10). The gleaning law applied only to national Israel, and only to farming. It was a means of establishing a major form of charity in tribe-dominated rural regions. This law promoted localism and decentralization in Mosaic Israel. The moral principle of gleaning extends into New Covenant times as a charity law, but not as a seed law. The principle is this: recipients of charity who can work hard should. This law is not supposed to be applied literally. There were no applications in civil law. This law was enforced by the priesthood, not by the state, for no corporate negative sanctions were threatened by God, nor would it have been possible for judges to identify precisely which poor people had been unlawfully excluded.¹² This principle of interpretation also applies to the re-statement of the gleaning law in Leviticus 23:22.¹³

The laws against allowing different breeds of cattle to interbreed (Lev. 19:19). This was a temporary seed law. It reflected the laws of tribal separation. So did the law against sowing a field with mixed seeds. Also annulled is the prohibition against wearing wool-linen garments.¹⁴

The law against harvesting the fruit of newly planted trees for three years and setting aside the fourth year's crop as holy (Lev. 19:23–25). This was a seed law. It was a curse on Israel because of the failure of the exodus generation to circumcise their sons during the wilderness wandering. It is no longer in force.¹⁵

The law governing the enslavement of fellow Israelites (Lev. 25:39–43). This was a seed law, although by being governed by the jubilee law, there was an aspect of land law associated with it. There is no longer any long-term indentured servitude bringing a family under the authority of another family for up to 49 years.¹⁶

The law governing the permanent enslavement of foreigners (Lev. 25:44–46). This must have been a seed law rather than a land law, for it opened the possibility of adoption, either by the family that owned the

11. Ibid., ch. 33.

12. Ibid., ch. 11.

13. Ibid., ch. 22.

14. Ibid., ch. 17.

15. Ibid., ch. 18.

16. Ibid., ch. 30.

foreign slaves or by another Israelite family.¹⁷

The law governing the redemption of an Israelite out of a foreigner's household by the kinsman-redeemer (Lev. 25:47–55). This was a seed law.¹⁸

B. Priestly Laws

The laws of five sacrifices (Lev. 1–7). These were all priestly laws. They are no longer in force.¹⁹

The law prohibiting wine drinking by priests while inside the tabernacle or temple (Lev. 10:8–11). This law was exclusive to priests as mediatorial agents. The wine belonged to God; it had to be poured out before the altar. This law was tied to the holiness of the temple. It did not apply to Levites or priests outside of the temple's geographical boundaries.²⁰

The law establishing the official prices of people who take vows (Lev. 27:2–8). This was a law governing access to the priesthood. These vows governed those who were devoted—irrevocably adopted—to priestly service.²¹

The law establishing vows to priests and the inheritance of rural land (Lev. 27:9–15). This law was primarily priestly but secondarily a seed law: an aspect of inheritance. This law placed the negative sanction of disinheritance on those who vowed to support a priest through the productivity of a dedicated plot of land and then refused to honor the vow. The land went from being dedicated to devoted: beyond redemption.²²

C. Cross-Boundary Laws

Cross-boundary laws are still in force under the New Covenant. These are properly designated as Deuteronomy 4 laws: designed by God to bring men to repentance through the testimony of civil justice within a holy commonwealth.

Fraud and false dealing (Lev. 19:11–12). The laws against theft still prevail. They had no unique association with either the land or the

17. Ibid., ch. 31.

18. Ibid., ch. 32.

19. Ibid., chaps. 1–7.

20. Ibid., ch. 8.

21. Ibid., ch. 36.

22. Ibid., ch. 37.

promised seed.²³

The law against robbing an employee by paying him later than the end of the working day (Lev. 19:13). This law protects the weakest parties from unfair competition: the ability to wait to be paid.

The law against tripping the blind man and cursing the deaf man (Lev. 19:14). The weaker parties are to be protected by civil law.²⁴

The prohibition against enforcing laws that discriminate in terms of wealth or power (Lev. 19:15). This law had no unique association with Israel's land or seed laws. Its theological presupposition is that God is not a respecter of persons: a theological principle upheld in both covenants.²⁵

The prohibition against personal vengeance (Lev. 19:18). This establishes the civil government as God's monopoly agency of violence.²⁶

The law prohibiting judicial discrimination against strangers in the land (non-citizens) (Lev. 19:33–36). This law an aspect of the just weights law. Laws governing justice were not land-based or seed-based.²⁷

The law against offering a child to Molech (Lev. 20:2–5). This was a law governed by the principle of false worship, although it appears to be a seed law (inheritance) or perhaps a land law (agricultural blessings). It had to do with identifying the source of positive sanctions in history: either God or a false god. God's name is holy: sanctified.²⁸ This will never change.

The jubilee law prohibiting taking interest from poor fellow believers or resident aliens (Lev. 25:35–38). This law was an extension of Exodus 22:25. It was included in the jubilee code, but it was not derived from that code. In non-covenanted, non-Trinitarian nations, however, Christians are the resident aliens. Thus, the resident alien aspect of the law is annulled until such time as nations formally covenant under God.²⁹

The law promising fruitfulness and multiplication of seed (Lev. 26:9–10). This law was covenantal, not tied to the holy land or the tribal structure of inheritance. It was a confessional law, but because of

23. Ibid., ch. 12.

24. Ibid., ch. 13.

25. Ibid., ch. 14.

26. Ibid., ch. 16.

27. Ibid., ch. 19.

28. Ibid., ch. 20.

29. Ibid., ch. 29.

its universal promise, it was a common grace law.³⁰

Negative corporate sanctions (Lev. 26:13–17). These were promised to Israel, but they were not tied to either the holy land or the promised seed. The governing issue was the fear of God, which is still in force.³¹

The law of the tithe that applied to animals passing under a rod (Lev. 27:30–37). This law still applies, though it is no longer very important in a non-agricultural setting. God still prohibits individuals from structuring tithes in kind (goods) from pre-collection rearrangements that favor the tither.³²

D. The Traditional Categories

The traditional definition of the Mosaic laws as moral, ceremonial, and civil does not do justice to the judicial distinctions within the Moral law-order. This traditional classification system attempts to place a judicial barrier against any extension into the New Covenant of the Mosaic civil laws and ceremonial laws, while avoiding the pitfalls of antinomianism by affirming the continuing validity of the moral law. The problem with this traditional judicial hermeneutic is that the moral law, apart from specific Mosaic case laws and their Bible-mandated required civil sanctions, invariably has become intermixed with some version of paganism's natural law theory.

My approach has been, first, to identify the priestly laws that were annulled by Christ's ministry as the high priest, and the transformation of the priesthood from Levitical to Mechizedekal. The key New Testament document in this regard is the Epistle to the Hebrews. It sets forth this hermeneutical rule: "For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law" (Heb. 7:12). Second, I have looked for evidence of a Mosaic law's inextricable relationship with the land, which had to do with the maintenance of tribal boundaries. Third, I have looked for evidence of a law's indissoluble connection with landed inheritance: seed laws. The seed laws and land laws often overlap.

The fourth category, cross-boundary laws, correspond to what is traditionally called the moral law. But the phrase "moral law" sometimes has the connotation of not being an aspect of justice, especially civil justice. Rarely if ever do defenders of the category of moral law connect this moral law to the Mosaic law's mandated historical sanctions, especially civil sanctions. This view of the moral law transforms the moral law into exclusively self-disciplined law. This is the view of biblical law defended by pietists and secular humanists, who are united in their desire to restrict all biblical injunctions to the human conscience, where they possess no civil authority. This is the agenda, less and less hidden, of modern defenders of the category of biblical moral law. Those defenders who are not pietists are generally embarrassed by the severity of the Mosaic law's civil sanctions, especially in matters sexual.

30. Ibid., ch. 34.

31. Ibid., ch. 35.

32. Ibid., ch. 38.

There are also defenders of biblical moral law who have another agenda: to gain moral legitimacy for programs of state-mandated economic reform that were not mandated by the Mosaic law, and which may even be prohibited by the Mosaic law, all in the name of biblical justice. They invoke the moral law in the civil realm, but deliberately neglect or reject the specific context of a particular law. A familiar example of this political strategy is the invocation of the jubilee laws. The reformers insist that Christians must defend state programs of compulsory wealth redistribution in the name of these laws. Yet they refuse to acknowledge that the jubilee laws were aspects of genocide: Israel's mandated extermination of all of the residents of Canaan. They also refuse to acknowledge that these laws applied only to rural land and houses owned by Levites inside Levitical cities. They shout "liberation," but then mumble about not applying the jubilee laws literally. Here is an example of this strategy of deception. William Peltz, the Midwest regional coordinator of the Peoples Bicentennial Commission, at a meeting in Ann Arbor, Michigan, argued that conservative Christians can be turned into promoters of revolutionary politics if the revolutionaries can show them that the Bible teaches revolution. He then cited Leviticus 25, the chapter that contains the Jubilee land laws.³³ This tactic has subsequently become a popular theme of numerous radical Christians, including Ron Sider³⁴ and Sojourners magazine. The reformers have not bothered to tell their followers that if Leviticus 25 is still morally and legally binding, then lifetime slavery is still morally and legally valid, for it is only in Leviticus 25 that the Hebrews were told that they could buy and enslave foreigners for life, and then enslave their heirs forever (Lev. 25:44–46).³⁵ I wrote my book, Is the World Running Down? (1988),³⁶ to challenge the misuse of Scripture in supporting various socialist schemes.

33. The Attempt to Steal the Bicentennial, The Peoples Bicentennial Commission, Hearings Before the Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, 94th Congress, Second Session (March 17 and 18, 1976), p. 36.

34. David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1985] 1996).

Conclusion

To understand a Mosaic law, you must first understand its context. Was it a land law, a seed law, a priestly law, or a cross-boundary law? If it was one of the first three, you must then determine whether the New Testament has in some way adopted and adapted it to fit the New Covenant order. An example would be gleaning. This was clearly a land law, yet it may possess underlying moral principles that can assist Christians in the kingdom work of transforming society. The gleaning laws set forth the relationship between charity and hard work. The task of application—casuistry—should begin only after a Mosaic law has been assigned to one of the four categories.

End of Volume 4

35. North, Leviticus, ch. 31.

36. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988).

DISOBEDIENCE AND DEFEAT

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON THE HISTORICAL BOOKS

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
None Dare Call It Witchcraft (1976)
Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
Government by Emergency (1983)
Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
Coined Freedom (1984)
Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
Honest Money (1986)
Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
Inherit the Earth (1987)
Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
Healer of the Nations (1987)
The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
Political Polytheism (1989)
Judeo-Christian Tradition (1990)
The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
Victim's Rights (1990)
Millennialism and Social Theory (1990)
Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
The Coase Theorem (1992)
Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
Rapture Fever (1993)
Tithing and the Church (1994)
Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)
Crossed Fingers (1996)
The Covenantal Tithe (2011)
Mises on Money (2012)

DISOBEDIENCE AND DEFEAT

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON THE HISTORICAL BOOKS

GARY NORTH

Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

First Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduction | 1 |
| Introduction to Joshua | 8 |
| 1. Obey and Grow Rich (Josh. 1:6–8) | 12 |
| 2. Economic Safety Nets (Josh. 5:11–12) | 17 |
| 3. Sacred Wealth (Josh 6:12–19) | 23 |
| 4. Representative Evil (Josh. 7:11) | 26 |
| 5. Achan’s Sacrilege (Josh. 7:22–26) | 30 |
| 6. The Unclaimed Inheritance (Josh. 11:23) | 35 |
| Conclusion to Joshua | 42 |
| Introduction to Judges | 44 |
| 7. Jephthah’s Disinherited Daughter (Jud. 11:29–31) | 46 |
| Conclusion to Judges | 62 |
| Introduction to Ruth | 63 |
| 8. Lost Hope (Ruth 1:1–4) | 64 |
| 9. Gleaning (Ruth 2:1–2) | 67 |
| 10. The Matchmaker (Ruth 3:1–4) | 71 |
| 11. The Namesake’s Inheritance (Ruth 4:3–4) | 75 |
| Conclusion to Ruth | 89 |
| Introduction to Samuel | 91 |
| 12. The Great Reversal (I Sam. 2:5–8) | 93 |
| 13. Theories of Causation (I Sam. 6:7–9) | 97 |
| 14. Tyrannical Taxation (I Sam. 8:14–18) | 103 |
| Conclusion to Samuel | 107 |
| Introduction to Kings and Chronicles | 108 |
| 15. Wisdom and Wealth (1 Kings 3:11–13) | 110 |
| 16. The Productivity of Trade (I Kings 5:6–7) | 113 |
| 17. The Bible’s Crucial Date Marker (I Kings 6:1) | 120 |
| 18. A Prayer Invoking God’s Sanctions (I Kings 8:22–23) | 127 |
| 19. Feedback Loops (I Kings 10:25–26) | 133 |
| 20. Tax Revolt (I Kings 12:14) | 139 |
| 21. Concealed Miracles (I Kings 17:12–15) | 142 |
| 22. A Stolen Inheritance (I Kings 21:1–3) | 147 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| 23. Lying Spirits (I Kings 22:20–23) | 151 |
| 24. Labor As Debt Collateral (II Kings 4:1) | 155 |
| 25. Reciprocal Acts of Grace (II Kings 4:8–10) | 158 |
| 26. Profiting From Inside Information (II Kings 6:23–24) | 163 |
| 27. Public Interest vs. Self-Interest (II Kings 12:4–6) | 168 |
| 28. Low-Key Living (II Kings 20:12–13) | 173 |
| 29. Receipts and Accounting (II Kings 22:4–7) | 177 |
| 30. Holy Decoration (I Chron. 29:3–9) | 180 |
| 31. Predictable National Sanctions (II Chron. 17:3–5) | 183 |
| 32. A Corrupt Inheritance (II Chron. 21:2–6) | 188 |
| 33. Sunk Costs and Future Costs (II Chron. 25:5–6, 9–10) . . . | 193 |
| Conclusion to Kings and Chronicles | 197 |
| Introduction to Ezra | 199 |
| 34. To Rebuild the Temple (Ezra 1:1–4) | 202 |
| 35. Syncretism's Envy (Ezra 4:1–4) | 206 |
| 36. Freewill Offerings by Persian Rulers (Ezra 7:14–18) | 217 |
| Conclusion to Ezra | 221 |
| Introduction to Nehemiah | 223 |
| 37. A Wall of Covenantal Separation (Neh. 1:3) | 225 |
| 38. Debt Servitude (Neh. 5:3–5) | 230 |
| 39. The Final Stage of a Project (Neh. 6:1–2) | 236 |
| 40. Economic Inequality (Neh. 7:71–72) | 242 |
| 41. A Business-Free Sabbath (Neh. 10:28–31) | 245 |
| Conclusion to Nehemiah | 249 |
| Conclusion | 251 |

INTRODUCTION

On this side Jordan, in the land of Moab, began Moses to declare this law, saying, The LORD our God spake unto us in Horeb, saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: Turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the sea side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river Euphrates (Deut. 1:5–7).

A. A Shared Kingdom, Not an Empire

The Euphrates River comes closest to the city of Jerusalem about 326 air miles (525 kilometers) north of Jerusalem, at Aleppo in Northern Syria, and then 75 miles (120 km) east on foot. The river was far beyond families' walking distance for the nation's three annual feasts. The three feasts (Ex. 23:14–19) established geographical limits on the nation of Israel under the Old Covenant. They kept Israel from ever becoming a regional empire (Deut. 20:10–18).¹ The most that the rulers of Israel could expect from conquest was to receive tribute from cities located on trade routes north of Israel to the Euphrates.

God promised Abraham that his heirs would be given land all the way to the Euphrates (Gen. 15:18). This was a statement of initial conquest, but it was not a promise of long-term rule. God mandated the sacrificial system and the feasts, which negated the possibility of a kingdom of Israelites extending to the Euphrates. The northern territory might come under the rule of Israel by conversion or by tribute, but the Israelites could not possibly occupy the land all the way to the Euphrates.

1. The Geography of the Promised Land

Prior to the conquest, God repeated this command to conquer all the land, from Lebanon to the Euphrates.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 48:C:2.

Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be yours: from the wilderness and Lebanon, from the river, the river Euphrates, even unto the uttermost sea shall your coast be (Deut. 11:24).

Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses. From the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast. There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life: as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee (Josh. 1:3–5).

Rarely are these passages discussed in Bible commentaries. There is problem in explaining why the promise to Abraham could not be fulfilled. Yet God commanded the conquest after He had given the laws of sacrifices to the nation through Moses.

According to a passage in Joshua,

Know for a certainty that the LORD your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you; but they shall be snares and traps unto you, and scourges in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good land which the LORD your God hath given you. And, behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth: and ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the LORD your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof. Therefore it shall come to pass, that as all good things are come upon you, which the LORD your God promised you; so shall the LORD bring upon you all evil things, until he have destroyed you from off this good land which the LORD your God hath given you (Josh. 23:13–15).

He said, “not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the LORD your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof.”

When the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and mightier than thou; And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them (Deut 7:1–2).

The Hittites were residents of the region around the Northwest Euphrates.²

2. The Feasts

Here is the problem. First, the Israelites could not occupy the land around the Euphrates and also obey God regarding the feasts. Second, genocide would have left animals in control over the land. But God never wanted this. This is why he drove out the nations slowly, so that the animals would not occupy the land (Ex. 23:29). Third, if fertile land was left empty, other tribes would migrate in. There would be new enemies on Israel's northern border. The warfare would be interminable to collect tribute. Fourth, Israel could surrender control over the land. But this would have negated God's promise. So, orthodox Bible commentators judiciously avoid discussing these issues.

We know that David fought to regain a city on the edge of the Euphrates (II Sam. 8:3). One proposed map of his kingdom places the far edge at the Euphrates.

This passage indicates that David's kingdom temporarily was restored to Joshua's territorial limits. But there can be no question of this: Israel never occupied the land all the way to these border cities.

2. The Macmillan Bible Atlas, rev. ed. Yohannan Aharoni and Michael Avi-Yonah, eds. (New York: Macmillan, 1971), map 43.

The Promised Land was incapable of being occupied exclusively by Israelites, given the travel requirements of the feasts. There was no way that a family could walk home to the Euphrates from the Passover (Lev. 23:5–8), held in Jerusalem, a distance of at least 400 miles (650 km), and then turn around and walk back for Pentecost, arriving 49 days after Passover ended (Lev. 23:15–16). Families at the Euphrates region would have had to rent housing in Jerusalem for two months a year. Their farms would have been left unattended. This was not economically feasible. Conclusion: either the three festivals were not required for all Israelites or else the Promised Land was suitable only for tribute.

It does no good to ignore this issue. This was a matter of ethics. Either the Israelites obeyed the laws of the feasts or else they failed to exterminate all the peoples to the edge of the Euphrates, for which God held them responsible. Genocide made sense only when followed by occupation. But it was impossible for Israel to occupy the Promised Land.

3. Replacement Tribes

There was no question that genocide was mandated. But this meant that the Israelites would have to bring in new tribes and place them under tribute, just as the Assyrians and Babylonians did with the Promised Land eight centuries after the conquest. The Promised Land would become an empire that would have to be defended militarily, unless the Israelites actively evangelized the new tribes. But they could not adopt them, for that would have placed them under the laws of the festivals. So, the converts would have to be gentiles. They could worship the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but they would not be part of the covenant line biologically or through adoption into the tribes. To maintain legal title to the Promised Land, the Israelites would have to act as evangelists to gentiles, and also let the gentiles remain as covenant-keepers inside the land, but outside the festival laws. The kingdom of God would be extended confessionally, but not ritually.

The newcomers were to become as the Samaritans became eight centuries later, but without discrimination against them. The newcomers would be judicially suitable as residents of the land, yet not as Israelites. They would not be under the seed laws, the land laws, and the priestly laws. They would be under the cross-boundary laws.³ They would swear loyalty to God, but they would not be members of the tribes. They would therefore not be required to make the journey to Jerusalem for the festivals.

The Israelites did not exterminate God's enemies, as required. They placed them under tribute. This converted Israel into an empire. God had not intended Israel to be an empire.

B. A Catalogue of Failures

The historical books on the Old Testament, Joshua to Esther, are a detailed catalogue of their failures. Theirs was a failure of ethics. It was also a failure of nerve. The brightest spot in this entire section of the Bible was Esther's courage in going before the king to ask him to throw a party for Haman (Esth. 5). Only later did she inform him about her own covenantal/genetic origins.

Then Esther the queen answered and said, If I have found favour in thy sight, O king, and if it please the king, let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request: For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish. But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue, although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage (Esth. 7:3–4).

She saved the Jews from destruction, but it had taken her uncle's warning to force her hand.

Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther, Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews. For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this? (Esth. 4:13–14).

The story of the kingdom of priests, from Exodus 19 until the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, was a story of ethical rebellion. They had sworn allegiance to God at Sinai, on the basis of His promise to them nationally. "And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel” (Ex. 19:6). This special status ended in A.D. 70.⁴

3 3. On the four-fold categories of the Mosaic law, see Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Conclusion.

Jesus saith unto them, Did ye never read in the scriptures, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner: this is the Lord’s doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes? Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof (Matt. 21:42–43).

Peter wrote to gentiles living outside the land of Israel (I Peter 1:1). He told them of their inheritance.

But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light (I Peter 2:9).

Conclusion

It should have been clear to the Israelites at Joshua’s death that they were not going to receive God’s promised blessing with respect to territory—not without a change of heart. They did not obey God regarding genocide. They did not obey God regarding what was an inescapably aspect of the festivals: shared land, shared gospel, and shared kingdom. Rather than bring the replacement tribes under God, nearby nations would place them under tribute. They would come under God’s sanctions.

But if thine heart turn away, so that thou wilt not hear, but shalt be drawn away, and worship other gods, and serve them; I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish, and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land, whither thou passest over Jordan to go to possess it. I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live: That thou mayest love the LORD thy God, and that thou mayest obey his voice, and that thou mayest cleave unto him: for he is thy life, and the length of thy days: that thou mayest dwell in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them (Deut. 30:17–20).

They did not choose life. They repeatedly chose death. The historical books record the details of these choices.

4. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

Israel did not obey God. The nation therefore suffered continual setbacks: military, economic, and political. The nation chose disobedience over growth, negative sanctions over positive sanctions. The story of Israel is the story of corporate covenant-breaking. It is therefore the story of corporate defeat.

INTRODUCTION TO JOSHUA

For the LORD your God dried up the waters of Jordan from before you, until ye were passed over, as the LORD your God did to the Red sea, which he dried up from before us, until we were gone over: That all the people of the earth might know the hand of the LORD, that it is mighty: that ye might fear the LORD your God for ever (Josh. 4:23–24).

If I were to write a stand-alone commentary on Joshua, I would call it Conquest and Dominion. The conquest of Canaan produced the central economic event of Mosaic covenant Israel: the initial distribution of the land. The exodus was the central liturgical event, for it established the Passover. But it was not the central economic event.

A. Israel's Central Economic Event

The conquest was the fulfillment of the Abrahamic Covenant. “But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full” (Gen. 15:16).¹ That promise was given 470 years before the Israelites crossed over the Jordan River. From Abraham to the exodus was 430 years. “And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect” (Gal. 3:17). Then came 40 years of wandering. “For the children of Israel walked forty years in the wilderness, till all the people that were men of war, which came out of Egypt, were consumed, because they obeyed not the voice of the LORD: unto whom the LORD swore that he would not shew them the land, which the LORD swore unto their fathers that he would give us, a land that floweth with milk and honey” (Josh. 5:6).

How long did it take them to conquer Canaan? Seven years. We know this because of explicit chronology. “And the space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea, until we were come over the brook Zered, was thirty and eight years; until all the generation of the men of war were wasted out from among the host, as the LORD sware unto them" (Deut. 2:14). At Kadesh-barnea, Caleb and Joshua testified to the nation's readiness to conquer Canaan. The 10 other spies rejected this assessment. Caleb was 40 years old at that time.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

Then the children of Judah came unto Joshua in Gilgal: and Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite said unto him, Thou knowest the thing that the LORD said unto Moses the man of God concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnea. Forty years old was I when Moses the servant of the LORD sent me from Kadesh-barnea to espy out the land; and I brought him word again as it was in mine heart (Josh. 14:6–7).

And now, behold, the LORD hath kept me alive, as he said, these forty and five years, even since the LORD spake this word unto Moses, while the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness: and now, lo, I am this day fourscore and five years old (Josh. 14:10).

By subtracting 38 years from 45 years, we get seven years. When Caleb came to Joshua to ask for specific territory (Josh. 14:12), this was seven years after the Israelites had crossed the Jordan River. This was 475 years after God's promise to Abraham.

B. Inheritance and Disinheritance

God's promise to Abraham was a promise of inheritance. But, because the land was occupied and would remain occupied in the interim, it was also a promise of disinheritance. The Amorites would be dispossessed.

Joshua oversaw the distribution of the Promised Land. This distribution became the central economic event in Israel's history. The laws governing the inheritance of these plots of land are known collectively as the law of the jubilee (Lev. 25).² Rural land had to be returned to the heirs of the original owners every 49 years. This set a time limit on collateralized debt. The collateral had to be returned. It also set a time limit on Hebrew servitude, unless servitude was for payment of restitution by a criminal.

Jesus announced the beginning of His ministry by announcing His fulfillment of the jubilee. “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, To preach the acceptable year of the Lord” (Luke 4:18–19).³ By that time, the jubilee law was no longer enforced, assuming that it ever was. There is no biblical evidence that it was ever enforced. The Romans surely did not enforce it. The jubilees finally ended with the fall of Jerusalem to the Roman army in A.D. 70.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), chaps. 23–31.

So, Israel’s system of inheritance began with a conquest and ended with a conquest. It began with the near-genocide of Israel’s enemies and ended with the destruction of the Israelite nation. The Romans dispersed the Jews throughout the empire after the second rebellion, Bar Kochba’s, in A.D. 133–35.

The Mosaic Covenant extended from the nation’s covenant with God at Mt. Sinai (Ex. 19)⁴ until the fall of Jerusalem. Jesus had announced the transfer of Israel’s inheritance to the church. “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43).

The legal foundation of Israel’s conquest of Canaan was the Abrahamic Covenant (Gen. 15). This was renewed by the nation at Sinai. But this was more than covenant renewal. A new covenant sign had been added on the night before the exodus: Passover. God then gave a new legal order to Israel (Ex. 20–23). This established the Mosaic law. The nation was told by Moses and Joshua to conquer in the name of this law. “This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success” (Josh. 1:8).

Then, after the rebellion of the golden calf, Israel was given a new priesthood: the Levites. “Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp, and said, Who is on the LORD’S side? let him come unto me. And all the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him. And he said unto them, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour. And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moses: and there fell of the people that day about three thousand men” (Ex. 32:26–28). This confirmed the Mosaic Covenant. “For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law” (Heb. 7:12). To maintain the kingdom grant, the Israelites had to keep the Mosaic law.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

Conclusion

The conquest established the starting date for the sabbath year (Lev. 25:1–7) and the jubilee year. Joshua led them militarily. After the conquest, Joshua distributed the spoils: land and cities. This inheritance mandated the disinheritance of the Amorites. It mandated genocide.

Genocide was the judicial, ethical, and historical foundation of the jubilee land laws. This is never mentioned by left-wing Christians who propose some sort of government-mandated wealth-redistribution scheme for the modern world. Nor is it mentioned by right-wing Christians who propose some sort of government-mandated debt-cancellation scheme. The jubilee law had its origin in the genocide of the conquest. It ceased to be a legal requirement with the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

1

OBEY AND GROW RICH

Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I sware unto their fathers to give them. Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success (Josh. 1:6–8).

The theocentric principle here is the covenantal foundation of prosperity in the lives of covenant-keepers. God promises to bless those who obey His Bible-revealed law. He says that the book of the law must be the focus of Joshua's life, for he is the representative of the nation.

A. Moses' Last Testament

Moses had instructed the nation just prior to his reading of the Ten Commandments to the conquest generation.

Ye shall observe to do therefore as the LORD your God hath commanded you: ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left. Ye shall walk in all the ways which the LORD your God hath commanded you, that ye may live, and that it may be well with you, and that ye may prolong your days in the land which ye shall possess (Deut. 5:32–33).¹

Just prior to his death, Moses spoke one last time to the nation. He prophesied regarding what was about to begin on the far side of the

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 13.

Jordan River.

The LORD thy God, he will go over before thee, and he will destroy these nations from before thee, and thou shalt possess them: and Joshua, he shall go over before thee, as the LORD hath said. And the LORD shall do unto them as he did to Sihon and to Og, kings of the Amorites, and unto the land of them, whom he destroyed. And the LORD shall give them up before your face, that ye may do unto them according unto all the commandments which I have commanded you. Be strong and of a good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them: for the LORD thy God, he it is that doth go with thee; he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.

And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou must go with this people unto the land which the LORD hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it (Deut. 31:3–7).²

B. The Need for Courage and Biblical Law

Courage is basic to covenantal success. So is biblical law. He who wishes to succeed must believe that God stands behind him and over him in his endeavors. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews wrote: “But without faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him” (Heb. 11:6).³ The covenantal foundation of this confident New Covenant faith is found in these Old Covenant passages.

Courage here was military courage. The nation was about to inherit the Promised Land. This had been God’s promise to Abram 470 years earlier.⁴ “But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full” (Gen. 15:16).⁵ Joshua’s generation was the fourth generation.⁶

2. Ibid., ch. 74.

3. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 30.

4. “Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ. And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise” (Gal. 3:16–18).

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

6. “The son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi, the son of Israel” (1 Chron. 6:38). Levi was in the first generation, Kohath was in the second, Moses was in the

There must also be a legal structure. This is basic to the biblical covenant: point three.⁷ The positive sanctions of longevity (Deut. 5:33), military victory (Deut. 31:3–5), and prosperity (Josh. 1:8) rested forthrightly on the nation's adherence to the mandated legal structure.

It takes courage to believe that these sanctions are predictable. The covenant-keeper in faith launches new projects. He believes that there is a positive relationship between obedience to God's law and positive outcomes in history. Moses told the nation to believe this. God told the nation and Joshua to believe this. Courage is associated with obedience to God's book of the law. Courage that does not rest on faith in this predictable relationship between obedience to biblical law and success in history is courage that rests on a weak reed.

And the LORD said unto me, Arise, take thy journey before the people, that they may go in and possess the land, which I swore unto their fathers to give unto them. And now, Israel, what doth the LORD thy God require of thee, but to fear the LORD thy God, to walk in all his ways, and to love him, and to serve the LORD thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, To keep the commandments of the LORD, and his statutes, which I command thee this day for thy good? (Deut. 10:11–13).

There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love. We love him, because he first loved us (I John 4:18–19).

By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments. For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous (I John 5:2–3).

Moses told the nation to have confidence in their imminent corporate inheritance of the Promised Land. After Moses' death, God reconfirmed this in His instructions to Joshua. All of this is covenantal. It conforms to the five points of the biblical covenant model. A sovereign God (point one)⁸ sets up Joshua as the national leader (point two).⁹ He tells the nation and Joshua to be confident in the reliability of biblical third. Joshua received the mantle of leadership from Moses.

7. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

8. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 1. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 1.

9. Ibid., ch. 2. North, ch. 2.

law (point three)¹⁰ and the positive sanctions that widespread obedience to this law-order produces.¹¹ This will lead to inheritance (point five).¹²

Conclusion

God told Joshua what Moses had previously told him. Joshua had to be courageous in the face of the Canaanites. This confidence had to be confidence in the sovereign God of the Bible, who rewards obedience to His Bible-revealed law. Confidence in anything else is a snare and a delusion. Again and again, the Israelites trusted idols. The Israelites were at times quite confident, but in the wrong source of reliable sanctions in history.

Covenantal success in history is conditional. It rests on Christ's successful fulfilment of the Mosaic law's requirements (Matt. 5:17–18).¹³ The Holy Spirit then empowers covenant-keepers to obey God's law. This results in prosperity. This is the Bible's prosperity gospel.

This gospel is denied by those who say that Christianity cannot triumph in history, not because Christians fail to obey God's law, but because God supposedly does not call Christians to exercise dominion in history by means of supernatural faith in Christ and also faith in God's supernatural ethical commandments. These skeptics include all humanists, all Muslims, and most Christians.

Addendum: The Prosperity Gospel

The phrase, "the prosperity gospel," is usually applied to a particular variety of Protestant charismatics. They teach that God wants all of His people to be economically successful. The secret of personal success is said to be the exercise of faith in the promises of God regarding one's guaranteed personal success in history. This gospel of success is not applied to Christian society in general. Rarely do its proponents accept the concept of a Christian society: Christendom. Most of them are dispensational premillennialists who reject the possibility of Christian society.

This teaching is not found anywhere in the Bible. God never tells

10. Ibid., ch. 3. North, ch. 3.

11. Ibid., ch. 4. North ch 4.

12. Ibid., ch. 5. North, ch. 5.

13. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 3rd ed. (Nacogdoches, Texas: Covenant Media Press, [1977] 2002).

His people to have confidence in their future success, if this confidence is based on the intensity of their personal, individual confidence in the unconditional promises of God. These promises are always ethically conditional. God told Moses and Joshua that the basis of the nation's future military and economic success would be adherence to biblical law. They were to be intensely confident in biblical law and its historical sanctions, not the promise of prosperity irrespective of outward and inward conformity to biblical law.

The charismatic prosperity gospel relies too heavily on the concept of "think and grow rich."¹⁴ This was popularized in the mid-1950s in American liberal Protestant circles and the general public by Rev. Norman Vincent Peale's best-selling book, The Power of Positive Thinking (1952), which sold tens of millions of copies. Peale was a pastor in a confessionally Calvinistic Dutch-American denomination, the Reformed Church of America, but neither his theology nor his book had anything in common with Christianity, let alone Calvinism.

The charismatic version of the Bible's prosperity gospel ("gospel" means "good news") is antinomian. It preaches confidence in the promises of God without reference to the ethical and judicial terms of God's covenant. God did not tell Joshua to have confidence in the inheritance apart God's Bible-revealed law. On the contrary, God told Moses, and Moses told the people, that they could not maintain this inheritance apart from widespread obedience to the book of the law (Deut. 28:15–68).

14. Napoleon Hill, Think and Grow Rich (1937). He was the author of Law of Success (1928), and Success Through Positive Mental Attitude (1959). He died in 1970.

2

ECONOMIC SAFETY NETS

And they did eat of the old corn [grain] of the land on the morrow after the passover, unleavened cakes, and parched corn in the self-same day. And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more; but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year (Josh. 5:11–12).

The theocentric principle here is faith in God, who controls economic causation.

A. Covenantal Transition: Inheritance

Joshua 5 is a chapter on covenantal transition. Forty years earlier, the Israelites had crossed the boundary of the Red Sea. They had wandered for four decades (Ex. 16:35). Now they had crossed over the Jordan River into the Promised Land. This was the fourth generation prophesied by God to Abram. “But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full” (Gen. 15:16).¹ The geographical transition was therefore a generational transition. “And this is the cause why Joshua did circumcise: All the people that came out of Egypt, that were males, even all the men of war, died in the wilderness by the way, after they came out of Egypt” (Josh. 5:4).

To mark this generational transition, Joshua had the males circumcised. This generation had not been circumcised (v. 5). The third generation had not obeyed the law of the Abrahamic covenant in Egypt or in the wilderness. They had not brought their sons under the formal sanctions of the covenant. This was Egypt’s lasting reproach to Israel. “And the LORD said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day" (v. 9). Then they kept the Passover (v. 10).

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

The text then says that the manna ceased (v. 12). Manna had sustained the Israelites for four decades. "And the children of Israel did eat manna forty years, until they came to a land inhabited; they did eat manna, until they came unto the borders of the land of Canaan" (Ex. 16:35). That which had sustained the nation in the wilderness never appeared again. They fed themselves off the produce of the land as an invading army.

This marked the end of a set of miracles. Moses had catalogued these miracles in his second reading of the law. "And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live. Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years" (Deut. 8:3–4).² God had suspended the second law of thermodynamics—entropy—for four decades. Now He reintroduced it into their lives.

B. A Safety Net for Ex-Slaves

I discussed the manna in detail in Moses and Pharaoh (1985).³ I argued that the manna served as a transition out of slavery. In Egypt, the state had provided Israelites with food and capital. They had served others. Up until the return of Moses to Egypt, the Egyptian state had provided straw to make bricks. That changed when Moses and Aaron challenged the Pharaoh. As a punishment, the Pharaoh required them to gather their own straw (Ex. 5:10–11).⁴

The predictability of their lives changed at that point. It changed even more when they crossed the Red Sea into the wilderness. There would be no provision by the state any longer. God substituted manna.

Manna had unique characteristics. It appeared every morning, no matter where the Israelites made camp. It burned off every afternoon. "And they gathered it every morning, every man according to his eating; and when the sun waxed hot, it melted" (Ex. 16:21). Every family had just enough for every member to eat. “And when they did mete it with an omer, he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack; they gathered every man according to his eating” (v. 18). It could not be stored overnight. “And Moses said, Let no man leave of it till the morning. Notwithstanding they hearkened not unto Moses; but some of them left of it until the morning, and it bred worms, and stank: and Moses was wroth with them” (vv. 19–20). A double portion appeared on the sixth day. “And it came to pass, that on the sixth day they gathered twice as much bread, two omers for one man: and all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moses” (v. 22). On the next day, the leftovers were edible. “And they laid it up till the morning, as Moses bade: and it did not stink, neither was there any worm therein. And Moses said, Eat that to day; for to day is a sabbath unto the LORD: to day ye shall not find it in the field. Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, which is the sabbath, in it there shall be none” (vv. 24–26).

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 18.

3. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 18.

4. Ibid., ch. 7.

The manna was miraculous, yet it was also utterly predictable. It was supernatural, yet common. It pointed to a God who sets aside the laws of nature for His own purposes. This is a God of predictability. This is a God of continuity in history. Yet this God of continuity delivered the nation out of Egypt by a series of discontinuous interventions into history. He is a God who is present in history, yet He is transcendent over history: point one of the biblical covenant.⁵ He delivers His people: point two.⁶ He is a God of law: point three.⁷ He is a God of sanctions in history: point four.⁸ He is the God of inheritance in history: point five.⁹ The manna demonstrated all of this.

The third generation Israelites had been slaves. They were not yet ready to exercise dominion. Their children would be, but only after four decades of daily miracles. That generation learned about the predictability of the God who rules over nature. They needed this experience, for they needed confidence that this God also rules over history. Nature and history are autonomous man’s two chief idols.¹⁰

5. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

6. Ibid., ch. 2. North, ch. 2.

7. Ibid., ch. 3. North, ch. 3.

8. Ibid., ch. 4. North, ch. 4.

9. Ibid., ch. 5. North, ch. 5.

10. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confronta-

They were not the only people who had seen this God in action. The Canaanites had, too, and they feared greatly. That was what Rahab told the spies.

And she said unto the men, I know that the LORD hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land faint because of you. For we have heard how the LORD dried up the water of the Red sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt; and what ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites, that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed. And as soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man, because of you: for the LORD your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath (Josh. 2:9–11).

C. Removing the Safety Net

After the Israelites were circumcised, they celebrated Passover. That ended the manna. They had to learn new ways to feed themselves. They lived off the land. The land was theirs. It no longer belonged to the Canaanites. Thus began the transfer of inheritance from covenant-breakers to covenant-keepers. This transfer was by war and genocide. This was God's command. "And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee" (Deut. 7:16).

And the LORD thy God will put out those nations before thee by little and little: thou mayest not consume them at once, lest the beasts of the field increase upon thee. But the LORD thy God shall deliver them unto thee, and shall destroy them with a mighty destruction, until they be destroyed. And he shall deliver their kings into thine hand, and thou shalt destroy their name from under heaven: there shall no man be able to stand before thee, until thou have destroyed them (Deut. 7:22–24).

This was a one-time only event. After they conquered the land, the rules of warfare changed (Deut. 20:10–15,¹¹ 19–20¹²). But, until the conquest was complete, they were to show no mercy. By "complete," God meant genocide.

tion with American Society (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 11.

11. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 48.

12. Ibid., ch. 29.

But of the cities of these people, which the LORD thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth: But thou shalt utterly destroy them; namely, the Hittites, and the Amorites, the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites; as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee: That they teach you not to do after all their abominations, which they have done unto their gods; so should ye sin against the LORD your God (Deut. 20:16–18).

The fourth generation had to take great risks on the battlefield. They were not to expect any further agricultural safety net. They would have to fight for their suppers. They would live off the land. They would take food out of the mouths of the previous owners, who had planted their crops.

And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full; Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name. Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you; (For the LORD thy God is a jealous God among you) lest the anger of the LORD thy God be kindled against thee, and destroy thee from off the face of the earth (Deut. 6:10–15).

If they wanted to eat, then they had to kill. If they were hungry, then their growling stomachs motivated them to conquer another city. God would no longer let them enjoy a welfare economy.

Conclusion

The Israelites had lived in a welfare economy for four decades—not a welfare state, but a welfare economy. They had been sustained by continual daily miracles. This was not God’s long-term plan for His people. He would give them capital in the Promised Land. “For the LORD thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; A land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil olive, and honey; A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass” (Deut. 8:7–9).¹³

Then what of the safety net? That net would be His law. “When thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shalt bless the LORD thy God for the good land which he hath given thee. Beware that thou forget not the LORD thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day” (Deut. 8:10–11).¹⁴ If they refused to obey, the safety net would collapse.

But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day. And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut 8:18–20).¹⁵

13. Ibid., ch. 20.

14. Ibid., ch. 21.

15. Ibid., ch. 23.

3

SACRED WEALTH

And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing, lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing, and make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it. But all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the LORD: they shall come into the treasury of the LORD (Josh. 6:18–19).

The theocentric principle here is that God has placed some assets under a ban: cursed. To violate this ban was to become cursed.

This command referred to the spoils of Jericho. As the first city to be conquered inside the boundaries of the Promised Land, Jericho was under a ban. It was to be utterly destroyed. Only Rahab and those of her family members inside her house were to be spared. The city came under a curse. “And the city shall be accursed, even it, and all that are therein, to the LORD: only Rahab the harlot shall live, she and all that are with her in the house, because she hid the messengers that we sent” (Josh. 6:17).

The gold and silver of the city would serve as God’s spoils. These metals were to be made into implements for the tabernacle. As the conqueror of the city, God would confiscate everything of value. The Israelites, as His agents, would keep nothing. This was symbolic of their subordination to God. The city was conquered by a miracle: the collapse of its defensive walls. This took place after a one-time-only liturgical procedure: six days of marching one time around this city, followed by a march of seven encirclements on day seven (Josh. 6:13–16).¹ The walls fell, and the army invaded. “And they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword” (Josh. 6:21).

Jericho’s gold, silver, and vessels of brass and iron were off-limits to the Israelites. God set them aside for His purposes. That is, He put a

1. There was no sabbath that week.

“no trespassing” sign around them. He set them apart. This is the meaning of holiness: to be set apart. These metals were holy to the Lord. They could not lawfully be appropriated by anyone else.

This was unique to Jericho. It did not apply to the other cities. “And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves: lay thee an ambush for the city behind it” (Josh. 8:2).

To violate a sacred boundary constitutes a profane act. This is the meaning of profanity: the crossing of a sacred boundary by a common person.² This is what Achen did. He became profane. He stole from God. He became cursed. That is, negative sanctions would soon be applied by God. The immediate result of his theft was the defeat of the army at Ai and the death of three dozen men (Josh. 7:5). Next, it led to the destruction of Achan’s household by the community of saints (Josh. 7:20–25). The loot was buried inside his tent. Everything inside that boundary was profane. It came under the ban: total destruction. It became a mini-Jericho. The curse of Jericho extended inside Achan’s tent.³

Wealth is normally common, not sacred. Jericho’s wealth was an exception. It had been set aside by God, just as the forbidden tree had been set aside by Him. It represented God’s exclusive ownership of the land of Canaan. It was His to do with as He pleased. His pleasure was in having His agents, including hornets (Josh. 24:12), destroy all of Canaan’s inhabitants. *The inhabitants would be disinherited.*⁴ Their possessions would be inherited by the Israelites. But, to secure their legal claim to this inheritance, the Israelites had to pass over the metals of Jericho.

Conclusion

The banned metals were representatives of both God’s ownership and Jericho’s position as cursed. That which was cursed by God became a blessing for God. To the victor go the spoils. The fall of Jericho represented God’s sovereignty over all of Canaan. It was the first city to fall. He had the right to destroy the city. He had a right to the precious metals within the city. He demanded that Israelites acknowledge this by refusing to confiscate the wealth of the city as their own.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

3. Chapter 5.

4. This disinheritance was a down payment on eternity. What God does with covenant-breakers in eternity dwarfs what He did to the Canaanites.

The total destruction of Jericho sent fear into the hearts of the residents of the land. God's agents showed no mercy. They could not be bought off. They had turned over the city's precious metals to the priests. The destruction of Achan's household, as a mini-Jericho, sent the same message to the Israelites.

4

REPRESENTATIVE EVIL

Israel hath sinned, and they have also transgressed my covenant which I commanded them: for they have even taken of the accursed thing, and have also stolen, and dissembled also, and they have put it even among their own stuff (Josh. 7:11).

The theocentric issue here is the doctrine of representation: point two of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Covenantal Representation

Adam sinned representatively on behalf of the human race. This is the heart of the doctrine of original sin. It is also the heart of the doctrine of the substitutionary atonement. “For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: And that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again” (II Cor. 5:14–15).

Here, we learn of the cause of the defeat of Israel by Ai. How was it that one man’s sin was regarded by God as having represented the nation? The leaders did not know. They had ordered an attack on the city of Ai, and the Israelites were defeated. About 36 of them died (Josh. 7:5). This caught Joshua’s attention. Only then did God tell him what had happened. Then God led Joshua to the tribe, family, and household of the thief. The thief could no longer hide from the civil government.

And Joshua said unto Achan, My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the LORD God of Israel, and make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me. And Achan answered Joshua, and said, Indeed I have sinned against the LORD God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done: When I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted them, and took them; and, behold, they are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it (Josh. 7:19–21).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

This had been a great temptation for Achan. He did not resist. He violated the “no trespassing” sign hanging above the wealth of Jericho. This cost the lives of three dozen warriors. Then it cost the lives of every member of his family (vv. 24–25).² His sin was representative. The negative sanction of death was imposed by God on the warriors and by the court on Achan’s inheritance in the broadest sense.

B. Corporate Command

God had told the leaders of Israel what the rules were regarding Jericho. “And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing, lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing, and make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it. But all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the LORD: they shall come into the treasury of the LORD” (Josh. 6:18–19).³ He told them representatively. They conveyed this information to the holy army.

The judgment on the warriors at Ai was a visible indicator that something was wrong. This is why Joshua prayed to God. He prayed the way Moses had prayed, when God threatened to kill the Israelites and make Moses a leader of a new nation. Moses said not to do it; it would diminish God’s reputation in the eyes of covenant-breakers (Ex. 32:11–13).

And Joshua said, Alas, O Lord GOD, wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? would to God we had been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan! O Lord, what shall I say, when Israel turneth their backs before their enemies! For the Canaanites and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us round, and cut off our name from the earth: and what wilt thou do unto thy great name? (Joshua 7:7–9).

2. Chapter 6. See also Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Appendix A.

3. Chapter 3.

The negative sanctions had been visible and compelling. This was the price God imposed on Israel to persuade Joshua that there had been a serious infraction of His law. Someone had profaned the sacred boundary around Jericho's wealth. This would stand against the nation unless it was dealt with judicially.

This had been a corporate sin. This was because God had forbidden anyone in Israel to steal the assets. Because the command had been given to all, a single violation applied to all. The warriors outside the walls of Ai paid representatively because there had been a representative violation inside the boundaries of Jericho, whose walls had fallen.

The doctrine of covenantal representation can also work against negative corporate sanctions. Consider Abraham's bargaining with God regarding God's plan to destroy Sodom. Would God spare the city for the sake of 50 good men? Yes. How about 45? All right. What about 40? Agreed. And so on, all the way down to 10 (Gen. 18:26–32). This did Sodom no good. It did not have 10 righteous residents.

Joshua inquired of God, and God responded. God blamed the nation because of one man's sin. Joshua was able to deal with the problem because he had direct revelation from God regarding the violation. He also had indirect revelation in the process of narrowing down the suspects. A post-A.D. 70 society cannot gain access to such specific revelation. Civil magistrates must rely on conventional means of inquiry. But the principle of representation holds. There are still representative violations. This is why civil governments must bring negative sanctions against convicted violators. This keeps at bay God's direct negative sanctions against the corporate community. This action by civil magistrates testifies to the non-representative nature of the infraction. What is representative is covenant-keeping.

Conclusion

The defeat at Ai warned the leaders that something was wrong. It was not a random event. Negative covenantal sanctions on the battlefield testified to a prior violation inside the community. God blamed the nation for the sin of one man. This had to have been a representative sin. The sin was Cannanitic. It was the theft of God's spoils on behalf of a member of Israel. It imported forbidden spoils into the camp of the holy army. This was judicially comparable to leaven during Passover. It would corrupt the nation. It had to be expunged. “Seven days shall there be no leaven found in your houses: for whosoever eateth that which is leavened, even that soul shall be cut off from the congregation of Israel, whether he be a stranger, or born in the land” (Ex. 12:19). Achan was cut off.

5

ACHAN'S SACRILEGE

So Joshua sent messengers, and they ran unto the tent; and, behold, it was hid in his tent, and the silver under it. And they took them out of the midst of the tent, and brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel, and laid them out before the LORD. And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan the son of Zerah, and the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, and his sons, and his daughters, and his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had: and they brought them unto the valley of Achor. And Joshua said, Why hast thou troubled us? the LORD shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones. And they raised over him a great heap of stones unto this day. So the LORD turned from the fierceness of his anger. Wherefore the name of that place was called, The valley of Achor, unto this day (Josh. 7:22–26).

A. An Act of Sacrilege¹

Achan appropriated forbidden objects in Jericho. These objects had been previously set aside by God for His temple. “But all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the LORD: they shall come into the treasury of the LORD” (Josh. 6:19). This holy (set-apart) property is what Achan had appropriated. His was therefore an act of sacrilege. Sacrilege is a profane act, but a specific form of profanity: theft from a temple or a holy place.² Jericho was to be offered as the firstfruits sacrifice to God on God's fiery altar. The entire city was to be burned. Its confiscated treasures were to be set aside for God's temple.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Appendix A.

2. The Greek word for “sacrilege,” hierarsuleo, means “to rob a temple.” Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, trans. William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957), p. 374. New Testament examples: “Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege?” (Rom. 2:22). “For ye have brought hither these men, which are neither robbers of churches, nor yet blasphemers of your goddess” (Acts 19:37).

Because of Achan's act of sacrilege, God killed 36 Israelites in the first battle of Ai (Josh. 7:5). They were not responsible for his act of sacrilege, but God nonetheless imposed capital sanctions on them. This event was later used by Joshua in his strategy to take the city of Ai: "For they will come out after us till we have drawn them from the city; for they will say, They flee before us, as at the first: therefore we will flee before them" (Josh. 8:6). Nevertheless, the 36 dead men were dead because of a sin committed by a man in secret, a man who was not a representative civil ruler in Israel. Judicially, why did God kill them? Because of Achan's representative position as a priest (Greek: hieros) of God in the national hierarchy (Greek: hierarch = high priest).

B. Achan's Priestly Role in a Holy War

In his capacity as a warrior-priest, Achan had committed sacrilege. Jordan's assessment is correct: "All of Israel were [sic] a nation of priests, and it is the priests who prosecute holy war. God Himself had established a parallel between the war camp and the Tabernacle, both holy places. . . ." ³ As a member of God's holy army, Achan had been ordered to bring burning judgment against Jericho. His was not simply a run-of-the-mill capital crime of a father in his role as father; it was the sin of a man who had personally appropriated forbidden objects that were to be set apart for God, i.e., holy objects. His disobedience was a priestly act. The nation burned the remains of Achan and his family. God's direct sanction against false worship by a priest was fire (Lev. 10:2); it was also His punishment for a non-priest who offered incense illegally (Num. 16:35). ⁴

The crime of sacrilege under the Mosaic law carried with it a biblically unique degree of covenantal responsibility. The sanctions imposed by God and the state against this crime seem to have extended to all those who were under the criminal's legal jurisdiction. This analysis in turn suggests that Adam's primary crime was also sacrilege.⁵ He had eaten a prohibited communion meal by appropriating fruit that had been explicitly set aside by God. Sacrilege was the original crime that brought all of humanity under God's negative sanctions. Adam's sons and daughters have received a death sentence because of the sins of their father. This sanction appears to be a unique judicial aspect of sacrilege, both in Adam's case and Achan's.⁶

3. James B. Jordan, Judges: God's War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985), p. 93.

4. Prostitution was not specified as a capital crime in Israel, except when committed by a priest's daughter. "And the daughter of any priest, if she profane herself by playing the whore, she profaneth her father: she shall be burnt with fire" (Lev. 21:9). This indicates that a connection to the priesthood placed special restrictions on individuals, and violations brought a unique sanction: execution by fire.

The penalty imposed by Joshua and the court was the public execution of Achan, his family, and his entire inheritance. Even the stolen goods had become polluted through sacrilege, and therefore had to be burned with fire, along with the corpses (Josh. 7:25). God instructed the people of Israel to do with Achan what they had been instructed to do with Jericho. Worse; not even the silver and gold were to be salvaged for the tabernacle. The fire would be all-encompassing.

C. Fathers and Sons

There is no doubt that God sanctioned the execution of Achan and his household, for He immediately withdrew His anger and His negative sanctions (v. 26). Yet the targets of this public execution were Achan's family members. The crucial question is: Did they partake in their father's sin? If not, was this execution in violation of Deuteronomy 24:16? That text announces: "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin." Why were the sons and daughters executed for the sin of the father? The text in Joshua does not say that they knew of the crime, although they may have. It does speak of the burning of his tent. This indicates that the goods had been buried inside his tent. Those inside may have known what was going on. It is not stated specifically that some of the children were too young to know, nor does it state that some were old enough to be in their own tents. The point is, inside the judicial

5. Wrote Sir Henry Spelman in the seventeenth century: "Thus it appeareth that Sacrilege was the first sin, the master-sin, and the common sin at the beginning of the world, committed in earth by man in corruption, committed in paradise by man in perfection, committed in heaven itself by the angels in glory; . . ." Spelman, The History and Fate of Sacrilege (1698); Eades edition (London: John Hodges, 1888), p. 1; cited by R. J. Rushdoony, Law and Society, vol. 2 of Institutes of Biblical Law (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1982), p. 33.

6. A fiery sword was placed by God at the entrance of the garden to keep out the sacrilegious priest and his heirs (Gen. 3:24). Achan's remains were burned (Josh. 7:25).

boundary of Achan's tent, everything had been polluted. The tent represented the judicial boundary of Achan's authority as a household priest. Everything inside that boundary had become profane as a result of his unauthorized and self-conscious trespass of holy objects. Everything inside was fit for destruction.

Surely the animals did not know. Why were even the animals under his administration executed? What had these animals done to deserve stoning? They had done nothing more than the animals had done in Adam's representative Fall, yet they, too, had suffered the consequences, as have their descendants. A cursed form of death entered the animal kingdom as a judgment from God. The subordinates suffered as a result of their master's act of defiance.

Because the text of Joshua 7 is not specific regarding the knowledge of Achan's sons and daughters regarding their father's act of sacrilege, we cannot be sure that they did not know and understand what their father was doing. The fact that the family's animals were stoned does indicate that a comprehensive ban—hormah—had been placed by God on his whole household, irrespective of their knowledge or consent. If Deuteronomy 24:16 is accepted as a universally binding standard for Israel's civil government, then we must conclude that they both knew and understood. If they did not know and understand, then we must conclude that Deuteronomy 24:16 did not apply in cases of sacrilege. The text of Joshua 7 does not definitively prove one interpretation over the other, but the execution of the animals does suggest that sacrilege was a unique crime and therefore outside the judicial boundary of Deuteronomy 24:16 regarding innocent sons and guilty fathers.

The issue at stake was the conquest's judicial character as a uniquely holy war. God had directed the Israelites to destroy all the families inside the boundaries of Canaan. "And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them" (Deut. 7:2; cf. 7:16). They were not allowed to show mercy, except to Rahab and her family, since she had covenanted with Israel before the holy army entered the land. Once the army had crossed over the boundary of the land, no other mercy was to be extended to the inhabitants within that boundary. The normal rules of holy warfare did not apply. Israel was not allowed to offer terms of surrender to any

Canaanite city, unlike wars outside the land (Deut. 20:10–11).⁷

Conclusion

By stealing holy objects in Jericho—goods that God had appropriated for Himself—Achan had not only stolen from God; he had also united himself and his family covenantally with Jericho. By stealing part of God’s required first-fruits offering, Achan became a citizen of Jericho. He also became profane: the violator of a sacred boundary placed by God around the city of Jericho. He was therefore required to suffer the judgment of every citizen in Jericho: death. Achan’s covenantal citizenship extended down to his children and his property: the animals and the stolen goods. Just as Rahab had become a citizen of Israel by hiding the spies and placing the red string publicly in her window, so did Achan become a citizen of Jericho by hiding the banned goods. Just as Rahab’s family had survived because of her covenant, so did Achan’s family perish because of his covenant. Achan and his family became Canaanites, and therefore the entire family came under the covenantal ban: hormah.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 48.

6

THE UNCLAIMED INHERITANCE

So Joshua took the whole land, according to all that the LORD said unto Moses; and Joshua gave it for an inheritance unto Israel according to their divisions by their tribes. And the land rested from war (Josh. 11:23).

The theocentric issue here is God as the provider of Israel's inheritance.

A. The Euphrates

God had promised Canaan to Abraham 475 years earlier.¹ "In the same day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates" (Gen. 15:18). He had reconfirmed this promise to Moses. "Turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the sea side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river Euphrates" (Deut. 1:7). "Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be yours: from the wilderness and Lebanon, from the river, the river Euphrates, even unto the uttermost sea shall your coast be" (Deut. 11:24).

This promise had not yet been fulfilled. The Euphrates River (Baghdad) was about 600 miles east of Jerusalem. God's promise to Abram and Moses would never be fulfilled by the time that God's covenant with Israel ran out, when Roman legions conquered Jerusalem in A.D. 70.² Why not? Because God's promise had always been ethically conditional. It had always rested on obedience to God's commands, including His law. The Israelites had not obeyed.

1. See my Introduction to Joshua.

2. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

B. Insufficient Obedience

Israel was an army of 600,000 fighting men when it invaded Canaan.

These were the numbered of the children of Israel, six hundred thousand and a thousand seven hundred and thirty. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Unto these the land shall be divided for an inheritance according to the number of names. To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance: to every one shall his inheritance be given according to those that were numbered of him (Num. 26:51–54).

It took 600,000 fighting men seven years to conquer Canaan. Even then, the conquest was incomplete. Numerous cities were never conquered. The Israelites let the Canaanites occupy their portion of the Promised Land. They taxed them instead of destroying them.³ They violated God's clear commandment.

And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them: Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son. For they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods: so will the anger of the LORD be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly. But thus shall ye deal with them; ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire. For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God: the LORD thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth (Deut. 7:2–6).

God's command was clear: genocide. Nothing less would meet God's standards. The Israelites refused to obey. They substituted taxation for genocide. They concluded that having their civil government collect taxes was better than obeying God.

The ancient promise was not fulfilled. As it turned out, it would

3. "And they drave not out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer: but the Canaanites dwell among the Ephraimites unto this day, and serve under tribute" (Josh. 16:10). "Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute; but did not utterly drive them out" (Josh. 17:13).

never be fulfilled. They would fall to conquerors from the Euphrates: Nebuchadnezzar. That defeat forever ended the political independence of Israel. The civil laws of Moses after that would never be enforced inside the nation of Israel.

They had been given the law by Moses immediately after their national covenant at Mt. Sinai (Ex. 19).⁴ This was four decades before the conquest began. They had disinherited most of the Canaanites during the conquest. They inherited most of the Canaanites' land when the conquest ended. But they subsequently surrendered worship and then territory to their enemies. This set the pattern for Israel from then until the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. They repeatedly were seduced by other gods and other nations. They were conquered by their enemies. They were repeatedly occupied by foreigners in the days of the judges. Then the northern kingdom (Israel) was carried off by Assyria. Over a century later, the southern kingdom (Judah) was carried off by Babylon in the days of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Israelites were ruled by gentile kingdoms after a token number of them returned to the land of Israel from captivity: Medo-Persia, Macedonia, and Rome. They did not consistently obey God's law. Their courage ebbed and flowed. Their wealth ebbed and flowed.

C. The Division of the Land

The land of Canaan had to be allocated. "Now therefore divide this land for an inheritance unto the nine tribes, and the half tribe of Manasseh" (Josh. 13:7).⁵ This raised the question: On what basis? "All the inhabitants of the hill country from Lebanon unto Misrephoth-maim, and all the Sidonians, them will I drive out from before the children of Israel: only divide thou it by lot unto the Israelites for an inheritance, as I have commanded thee" (Josh. 13:6). The initial distribution was by God's supernatural intervention: by lot. The exception was the tribe of Levi. "Only unto the tribe of Levi he gave none inheritance; the sacrifices of the LORD God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance, as he said unto them" (Josh. 13:14). Levites received tithes on the net output of the other tribes' rural land rather than owning rural land themselves. "And, behold, I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation" (Num. 18:21). They would inherit 48 cities instead (Josh. 21:41). This allocation was made by the casting of lots (Josh. 21).

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

5. Two and a half tribes had received their inheritance on the far side of the Jordan River. "And Moses gave unto them, even to the children of Gad, and to the children of Reuben, and unto half the tribe of Manasseh the son of Joseph, the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, the land, with the cities thereof in the coasts, even the cities of the country round about" (Num. 32:33).

Tribe by tribe, the casting of lots distributed land. "By lot was their inheritance, as the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses, for the nine tribes, and for the half tribe" (Josh. 14:2).⁶ This was done under the authority of the civil head, the ecclesiastical head, and the tribal rulers. "And these are the countries which the children of Israel inherited in the land of Canaan, which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, distributed for inheritance to them" (Josh. 14:1). When the allocation was over, Joshua announced: "Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these nations that remain, to be an inheritance for your tribes, from Jordan, with all the nations that I have cut off, even unto the great sea westward" (Josh. 23:4).

What principle of land distribution governed the falling of the lots? The people did not ask. God did not say. The section in Joshua relating to the distribution of land and cities is the longest section in the Bible devoted to one corporate event. It extends from Joshua 13:6 through Joshua 22:8. The text is detailed in its description of which tribes received what. This record had to serve the nation for centuries, because family rural land was to remain in each family permanently: the jubilee year (Lev. 25).⁷ There was no system of longitude and latitude, no global positioning satellite system. This was as close as the Israelites could come to a precise description of tribal boundaries and captured cities. This became part of the Scriptural legacy, not just tablets stored in local archival collections. The records would persevere publicly down through the centuries.

There were local records of family plots. We know this because of the written arrangements that Jeremiah made with his cousin regarding the sale of family land.

And I bought the field of Hanameel my uncle's son, that was in Anathoth, and weighed him the money, even seventeen shekels of silver.
And I subscribed the evidence, and sealed it, and took witnesses, and

6. Joshua 15:1; 16:1; 17:1–2, 14, 17; 18:11; 19:1, 10, 17, 24; 32, 40.

7. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24.

weighed him the money in the balances. So I took the evidence of the purchase, both that which was sealed according to the law and custom, and that which was open: And I gave the evidence of the purchase unto Baruch the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, in the sight of Hanameel mine uncle's son, and in the presence of the witnesses that subscribed the book of the purchase, before all the Jews that sat in the court of the prison. And I charged Baruch before them, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which is sealed, and this evidence which is open; and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days. For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Houses and fields and vineyards shall be possessed again in this land (Jer. 32:9–15).

D. Inheritance Requires Disinheritance

The Israelites inherited the land of Canaan. This inheritance was theirs on a covenantal basis. God told Abraham:

And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age. But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full. And it came to pass, that, when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces. In the same day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates: The Kenites, and the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites, And the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Rephaims, And the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Girgashites, and the Jebusites (Gen. 15:15–21).⁸

God gave them the lands of these peoples. The transfer of this inheritance was to be by military conquest and total genocide. The collective deaths of the existing owners would verify a legal claim that had been established by covenant 475 years earlier. The transfer in the inheritance was by covenant. This transfer was judicially definitive. It would be accomplished progressively. This process included a time of slavery in Egypt. That was part of the terms of the covenant. “And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; And also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance”

8. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

(Gen. 15:13–14). The Israelites took the inheritance of the firstborn sons of Egypt, who died on the night of the first Passover. “And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment: And the LORD gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they lent unto them such things as they required. And they spoiled the Egyptians” (Ex. 12:35–36). Finally, Israel inherited. “And I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and oliveyards which ye planted not do ye eat” (Josh. 24:13). The capital of rival cultures became Israel’s.

This inheritance was a one-time event. Israel was not to become an empire. Different rules of warfare were in force outside of Canaan (Deut. 20:10–15).⁹ Once the final disinheritance of the residents of Canaan was accomplished, Israel was to conquer by example, not by military power.

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).¹⁰

This is disinheritance of covenant-breakers’ property. The means of disinheritance today are two-fold: economic competition and spiritual conversion.

Conclusion

This section of the Book of Joshua marked the culmination of almost five centuries of hope. A people that had owned no land now owned it. They had long looked forward to this day. The terms of God’s covenant with Abraham had not been completed. The nation would now demonstrate whether it would maintain its part.

9. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 48.

10. Ibid., ch. 8.

And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:19–20).¹¹

The nation was supposed to extend its conquest eastward to the Euphrates River. It never attempted this or even mentioned the possibility. The Israelites gave up. They remained content to occupy a small slice of the Promised Land, sharing the land with a remnant of the Canaanites. God fulfilled part of His promise when He arranged the nation's transport to the Euphrates under Nebuchadnezzar. Most of the Jews remained in Persia, close to the Euphrates, after Ezra and Nehemiah returned to Israel. That was where they codified their oral tradition in the Babylonian Talmud, beginning in the second century A.D. until the late fifth century. This Talmud became definitive for Judaism. The much shorter and fragmentary Jerusalem Talmud did not.

Covenantal inheritance is always by disinheritance. Covenantal inheritance is a zero-sum game. The model in the Old Testament is Jacob's inheritance from Esau. Isaac told Esau that he had no blessing for him. The blessing had been given to Jacob (Gen. 27:37). Esau persisted. Isaac gave him a blessing of leftovers (vv. 39–40). This is what covenant-breakers receive progressively in history. They lose even this in eternity.

11. Ibid., ch. 23.

CONCLUSION TO JOSHUA

Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses. From the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast (Josh. 1:3–4).

The text is clear: Israel was to conquer land all the way to the Euphrates River, 600 miles from Jerusalem. Yet Israel never got close to the Euphrates River until Babylon carried the nation into captivity. Except for a handful of returnees in the days of Ezra, 9 centuries after the exodus, there Israel remained. In short, God's prophecy to Abram, to Moses, and to Joshua never came true. Why not? Because the promise had always been ethically conditional. It had always rested on obedience to God's commands, including His law.

When Joshua spoke to them in his old age, God's promise was visibly incomplete:

Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these nations that remain, to be an inheritance for your tribes, from Jordan, with all the nations that I have cut off, even unto the great sea westward. And the LORD your God, he shall expel them from before you, and drive them from out of your sight; and ye shall possess their land, as the LORD your God hath promised unto you. Be ye therefore very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside therefrom to the right hand or to the left; That ye come not among these nations, these that remain among you; neither make mention of the names of their gods, nor cause to swear by them, neither serve them, nor bow yourselves unto them: But cleave unto the LORD your God, as ye have done unto this day (Josh. 23:4–8).

He reminded the nation of the inheritance that God had provided for them. He warned them, as Moses had warned him, that they must be courageous and obey God's law. This was how they would demonstrate to God and men that they worshipped the God of the covenant. They knew that the promise had not been fulfilled: “the nations that I have cut off, even unto the great sea westward.” From the great sea eastward to the Euphrates, the conquest was not only incomplete, it had not even been attempted.

They were given the tool of dominion by Moses: biblical law. They were given land to serve as a covenant-testing place, even as Adam and Eve had a covenant-testing place in the garden. The remainder of the historical books are an account of their performance.

INTRODUCTION TO JUDGES

Nevertheless the LORD raised up judges, which delivered them out of the hand of those that spoiled them. And yet they would not hearken unto their judges, but they went a whoring after other gods, and bowed themselves unto them: they turned quickly out of the way which their fathers walked in, obeying the commandments of the LORD; but they did not so. And when the LORD raised them up judges, then the LORD was with the judge, and delivered them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge: for it repented the LORD because of their groanings by reason of them that oppressed them and vexed them. And it came to pass, when the judge was dead, that they returned, and corrupted themselves more than their fathers, in following other gods to serve them, and to bow down unto them; they ceased not from their own doings, nor from their stubborn way. And the anger of the LORD was hot against Israel; and he said, Because that this people hath transgressed my covenant which I commanded their fathers, and have not hearkened unto my voice; I also will not henceforth drive out any from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died: That through them I may prove Israel, whether they will keep the way of the LORD to walk therein, as their fathers did keep it, or not (Jud. 2:16–22).

The Book of Judges is the story of four centuries of failure. From the beginning to the end, the Israelites refused to follow God's law. They repeatedly chased after the gods of the land, the local gods of Canaan. God repeatedly brought them under judgment through defeat by foreign nations. They did not learn from this experience.

God still refused to drive out the Canaanites. He had already refused. The Israelites' army of 600,000 took seven years to exterminate most of the Canaanites, but even under Joshua, some Canaanite cities survived.

The Book of Judges is about false worship and political oppression. The Israelites preferred false gods to the God of the Bible. They therefore showed a preference for tyranny over liberty.¹ Moses had made it plain that false worship would bring military defeat and economic losses (Deut. 28:15–68). The Israelites did not believe this. They did not believe it after four centuries of law-confirming negative corporate sanctions, from the death of Joshua to the anointing of Saul. Then they entered a new phase of nonbelief, which lasted until the captivity.

1. James B. Jordan, Judges: God's War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva

The Book of Judges has almost nothing relevant to say about economics. The one exception is the account of Jephthah's daughter. This account is unexplainable biblically without reference to one of the most obscure laws in the Mosaic code, the law governing vows to a priest.

JEPHTHAH'S DISINHERITED DAUGHTER

Then the Spirit of the LORD came upon Jephthah, and he passed over Gilead, and Manasseh, and passed over Mizpeh of Gilead, and from Mizpeh of Gilead he passed over unto the children of Ammon. And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the LORD, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, Then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the LORD'S, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering (Jud. 11:29–31).

The theocentric principle here is that a vow to God must be kept (Num. 30). This is point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. A Unique Vow

First, the Spirit of God was on Jephthah. Second, he made a vow to God. Third, God gave him the victory he desired. If the vow was foolish, then why did the Spirit of God direct him to make it? If the vow was immoral, the same question applies. Also this question arises: Why did God give him the victory?

What did he expect would come out of the door of his house? A lamb? A bullock? He knew it would be his daughter.

1. Burnt Offering, Votive Offering

What was the meaning of the phrase, “burnt offering”? It meant placing a dead animal on the altar of God (Lev. 1).² Is there any case in the Bible of such a lawful sacrifice of a human being? No. The Mosaic law said this: “And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Molech, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD” (Lev. 18:21).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 1.

There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch” (Deut. 18:10). God announced this through Jeremiah:

But they set their abominations in the house, which is called by my name, to defile it. And they built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind, that they should do this abomination, to cause Judah to sin. And now therefore thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, concerning this city, whereof ye say, It shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence (Jer. 32:34–36).

Then what did “burnt offering” mean in this context? It meant a permanent offering to God, a votive offering. A votive offering was associated with a vow to God. It was irreversible. The model was a burnt offering, which was irreversible.

To understand what was at stake, we need to consider one of the most obscure laws in the Mosaic law.

Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When a man shall make a singular vow, the persons shall be for the LORD by thy estimation. And thy estimation shall be of the male from twenty years old even unto sixty years old, even thy estimation shall be fifty shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary. And if it be a female, then thy estimation shall be thirty shekels. And if it be from five years old even unto twenty years old, then thy estimation shall be of the male twenty shekels, and for the female ten shekels. And if it be from a month old even unto five years old, then thy estimation shall be of the male five shekels of silver, and for the female thy estimation shall be three shekels of silver. And if it be from sixty years old and above; if it be a male, then thy estimation shall be fifteen shekels, and for the female ten shekels. But if he be poorer than thy estimation, then he shall present himself before the priest, and the priest shall value him; according to his ability that vowed shall the priest value him (Lev. 27:2–8).

The rabbinical commentators do not do a better job than the Christians in explaining this law, and the Christians are universally perplexed. It is obvious that vows were involved. Money payments were also involved. We need to answer two questions: What was the nature of the vow? What was the function of the money payment?

2. What Is a Vow?

To begin to sort out this pair of problems, we must answer this question: What is a vow? Biblically, a vow is a lawful invocation of God's covenantal sanctions, positive and negative. To escape God's corporate negative sanctions, there must be individual vows of repentance: covenant renewal. Covenant renewal involves a public reaffirmation of God's covenant: His sovereignty, authority, law, sanctions, and triumph (historical and eschatological). These are the five points of the biblical covenant model.³ A lawful public affirmation of God's covenant always comes in the form of a vow. In order to set oneself apart judicially before God, one takes a vow. Vows necessarily involve sanctions. They are self-maledictory oaths that invoke God's sanctions, positive and negative. Formal judicial separation is based on a vow; it always points to God's sanctions in history. This is why holiness (point three of the biblical covenant model) points to judgment (point four).

The vows in this instance were ecclesiastical. The Hebrew word that describes these vows, pawlaw, is translated here as "singular." The translation itself is singular: pawlaw is translated as "singular" in the King James Version only in this singular verse. It is elsewhere translated as "marvelous," "wondrous," or "separate." Lawful vows are always out of the ordinary, and these vows were very special vows among vows. They were marvelous vows. The question is: In what way?

Commentators argue about the possible reasons for the placement of this chapter at the end of Leviticus. Why should a section on vows appear at the end of a book on holiness? Gordon Wenham wrote: "It is a puzzle why ch. 27, which deals with vows, should appear in its present position, since ch. 26 with its blessings and curses would have made a fitting conclusion to the book."⁴ He offered two possible explanations, neither of them convincing.

I suggest the following explanation: the end of Leviticus marks a

3. Sutton, That You May Prosper, chaps. 1–5.

4. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 336.

transition from a book that centers on point three of the biblical covenant—holiness, boundaries—to a book that centers on point four: oaths, sanctions. But what about part five of the book, inheritance? Here is the central theme of this passage: the loss of inheritance in one tribe in exchange for inheritance in another tribe.

The previous chapter, Leviticus 26, deals with God's positive and negative corporate sanctions in history. The move from an emphasis on point four of the biblical covenant—sanctions—in chapter 26 to point five—succession—in chapter 27 is appropriate.⁵ Negative sanctions in the context of chapter 26 have to do with disinheritance. Chapter 26 presents a catalogue of God's corporate covenantal sanctions. Chapter 27 begins with rules governing a particular type of personal vow. This in turn raises the issue of covenantal continuity. Jordan wrote: "Payment of vows relates to the fifth commandment, as we give to our Divine parent and thereby honor Him, and to the tenth commandment, since payment of vows and tithes is the opposite of covetousness. Thus, this final section of Leviticus has everything to do with continuity."⁶ The passage is where it belongs: in part five. The vow relates to inheritance: family continuity over time.

B. Devoted to Temple Service: Irreversible

The text does not tell us what stipulations governed this type of vow. The text also does not provide a context. This is why the commentators get so confused. The old line about "text without context is pretext" is applicable.

1. Addressed to Priests

The law was addressed to priests: "the persons shall be for the LORD by thy estimation." Whose estimation? The priests. Anything dedicated to the Lord is assumed by commentators to have been dedicated to or through the priesthood. The text is silent about the nature of the dedication; it speaks only of pricing. A gift of individuals was in some way involved, because specific prices are associated in the text with specific genders and ages.

Wenham discussed this law as symbolic of a man's willingness to pledge himself or those under his authority as temple slaves. The vow-taker could not really serve God in this way, Wenham argued. Access to the temple was reserved to Levites and priests.⁷ Once the vow was made, Wenham said, the person who had made it was required to redeem himself and any other people under the vow's authority by making an appropriate payment to the temple. These singular vows specifically invoked mandatory payments. "To free themselves from the vow, they had instead to pay to the sanctuary the price they would have commanded in the slave market."⁸ Once made, the vow had to be paid. He cited Psalm 116: "I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people. Precious in the sight of the LORD is the death of his saints. O LORD, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid: thou hast loosed my bonds. I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the LORD. I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people" (Ps. 116:14–18).⁹ This was David's affirmation of the law of vows, which stated: "But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee. That which is gone out of thy lips thou shalt keep and perform; even a freewill offering, according as thou hast vowed unto the LORD thy God, which thou hast promised with thy mouth" (Deut. 23:22–23).¹⁰

5. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 17. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

6. Ibid., p. 39.

We need to answer two questions. First, was Wenham correct about the exclusively symbolic nature of this type of vow? Second, was he correct about the payment as a substitute for literal temple service? Most commentators have agreed with Wenham on this point. I do not. I argue that the terms of the vow were not symbolic, and the payment was not a substitute.

2. Devotion: Change in Legal Status

In the case of heathen slaves, Israelites possessed lawful title to the slave and the slave's heirs (Lev. 25:44–45).¹¹ There is no reason to assume that an Israelite could not transfer ownership of his slave to an individual priest or to the temple. The tabernacle-temple already employed permanent pagan slaves: the Gibeonites. They were the hewers of wood and drawers of water for the assembly; hence, they were in-

7. Wenham, Leviticus, p. 338.

8. Idem.

9. Idem.

10. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 58.

11. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 30.

volved in religious service. This permanent temple slavery had been specifically imposed on them by Joshua as a curse: “Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall none of you be freed from being bondmen, and hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God” (Josh. 9:23). They were permanently set apart—devoted—for temple service. This was the result of their deception in gaining the vow of peace from Joshua (Josh. 9). The covenantal blessing—peace in the land—because of the Gibeonites’ deception became their covenantal curse: permanent slavery under the priests. They had escaped God’s covenantal ban of hormah—either their total destruction or their permanent expulsion from the land—but they could not escape His covenantal ban of temple servitude. Hormah (chormah) means “devoted.” Its frame of reference was God’s total destruction: “And the LORD hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah” (Num. 21:3). A city devoted to total destruction was under hormah: a total ban. This destruction was a priestly act.¹²

I conclude that there is nothing in the Mosaic Covenant to indicate that pagan slaves could not be assigned to temple service even though they could not lawfully assist with the sacrifices. They were not allowed inside those temple boundaries that were lawfully accessible only to priests, but they still could work for the priests outside these boundaries. Thus, a symbolic transfer of ownership of a pagan slave to the priests is not the concern of this passage. The deciding issue contextually cannot be priestly ownership as such. The issue is also not the dedication or sanctification of household slaves. There was nothing special in Israel about the dedication of household slaves—nothing “singular.” It has to be something more fundamental: service within the normally sealed boundaries of the temple.

Then who were the vow-governed individuals of Leviticus 27:2–8? They were family members under the lawful authority of the vow-taker. The vow was a specific kind of vow, a vow of devotion. Devotion here was not an emotional state; it was a change in judicial status.

3. Devotion vs. Sanctification

At this point, I must introduce a crucial distinction of the Mosaic law: devotion vs. sanctification. A sanctified item was set apart for 12. On “hormah,” see James B. Jordan, Judges: God’s War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985), pp. 10–12.

God's use, though not necessarily on a permanent basis. A devoted thing was set apart permanently for priestly service or sacrifice. This distinction is based on the law that appears later in Leviticus:

Notwithstanding no devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the LORD of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the LORD. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death (Lev. 27:28–29).

Death here was not necessarily physical death; it was, however, necessarily covenantal death. This meant that the devoted item was placed within the irreversible boundaries of God's ban. This form of covenantal death meant that the item was beyond human redemption. The devoted object came under God's absolute control. In many passages in Scripture, the Hebrew word for "devoted" (khayrem) is translated as "accursed" or "cursed." Such a cursed item could not be used for anything other than sacrifice to God. If it was subsequently misused—violated or profaned, in other words—the person who violated God's boundary himself came under the ban: beyond human redemption.

And the city [Jericho] shall be accursed, even it, and all that are therein, to the LORD: only Rahab the harlot shall live, she and all that are with her in the house, because she hid the messengers that we sent. And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing, lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing, and make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it (Josh. 6:17–18).

But the children of Israel committed a trespass in the accursed thing: for Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, took of the accursed thing: and the anger of the LORD was kindled against the children of Israel (Josh. 7:1).¹³

But the people took of the spoil, sheep and oxen, the chief of the things which should have been utterly destroyed, to sacrifice unto 13. Because Achan had violated the holy ban that God placed around Jericho's spoils, he placed his whole household under the ban. It was legally possible for a father to place his family under God's ban—disinheritance from the family's land and legal status—through covenantal adoption into the priesthood. But in this case, Achan placed his family under hormah: God's absolute ban of destruction. As the head of his household, he went through an adoption process: not into the tribe of Levi, but rather into covenantal Jericho. Thus, it was mandatory that the civil government execute his entire household, including the animals, and bury all his assets with them (Josh. 7:24).

the LORD thy God in Gilgal (I Sam. 15:21).

It is worth noting that this Hebrew word is the very last word that occurs in the Old Testament, in the passage that prophesies the coming of Elijah (John the Baptist), the man Jesus identified as the last man of the Old Covenant.¹⁴ “Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the LORD: And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse” (Mal. 4:5–6). This was God’s threatened negative sanction: covenantal disinheritance—fathers vs. sons—that involved God’s curse on Old Covenant Israel. As Jesus later warned: “Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man’s foes shall be they of his own household” (Matt. 10:34–36).

The devoted item could not be redeemed by the payment of a price. It had been permanently transferred covenantally to God as a sacrificial offering. This is the meaning of the singular vow. The singular vow was a vow whose stipulations were irrevocable. The devoted item was placed within the confines of an absolutely holy boundary: beyond human redemption. The vow was voluntary; the resulting transfer was irrevocable: a singular vow.

4. Devotion Through Adoption

Could an Israelite lawfully devote his child to priestly service? Yes; as we shall see, Jephthah’s daughter was pledged by her father. Once a person was adopted into the family of Aaron specifically or into the tribe of Levi, he could not re-enter another Israelite tribe by a subsequent act of adoption. He had been devoted to the temple: beyond redemption. So had his covenantal heirs. If I am correct about this, then in the context of marriage—another form of legal adoption¹⁵—there was no option for an Israelite father to buy back his daughter from her priestly husband by returning the bride price to his son-in-law.¹⁶ Similarly, there was no way for a man to buy back himself, his wife, or his children from formally devoted service to God. In short, there was no redemption price for this kind of vow. This is why the vow was pawlaw: “singular.”

14. “The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it” (Luke 16:16).

15. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 31:B.

16. The dowry remained with the wife in any case; it was her protection, her inheritance from her father.

There is no indication that a man could place his adult male children into mandated priestly service. An adult son was not eligible for compulsory adoption. He was a lawful heir to the land and the legal status of his tribe and family. He could not be disinherited at his father’s prerogative. The crucial legal issue for identifying adulthood for men was military numbering. An adult male was eligible to be numbered at age 20 to fight in a holy war: “This they shall give, every one that passeth among them that are numbered, half a shekel after the shekel of the sanctuary: (a shekel is twenty gerahs:) an half shekel shall be the offering of the LORD” (Ex. 30:13). At age 20, a man came under the threat of God’s negative sanctions: going into battle without first having paid blood money to the temple.¹⁷ Once he became judicially eligible for numbering as a member of his tribe, he became judicially responsible for his own vows. He became, as we say, “his own man.” He became a member of God’s holy army. A father could no longer act in the son’s name.

C. A Disinherited Daughter

A daughter could not legally be numbered for service in God’s army. Thus, an unmarried daughter could be delivered into a priestly family, as we see in the peculiar case of Jephthah’s daughter.¹⁸ Jephthah’s vow to sacrifice the first thing to come out of his house could not legally be applied literally to a person. He could not lawfully burn a person, nor could the priests; therefore, any person who came under the terms of such a lawful vow had to be devoted to God in temple service.¹⁹ Jephthah had made a singular vow. It was irreversible. This means that his daughter had to be disinherited.²⁰ She was beyond redemption.

There was a distinction in Mosaic law between someone or something dedicated (sanctified) to the priesthood and someone or something devoted to the priesthood. The former could be redeemed by the payment of the market price plus a premium of one-fifth (Lev. 27:13,

17. Ibid., ch. 58.

18. I accept the standard interpretation of this story: she was not literally executed by her father.

19. Jordan, Judges, pp. 204–13.

20. Ibid., p. 205.

15, 19).²¹ The latter could not be redeemed.

Disinheritance was permanent in Mosaic Israel. This could only be by covenant: specifically, by covenantal death. This is why disinheritance was a form of devoted giving. The head of the household publicly gave his heirs over to God. He²² publicly broke the family's covenant with such a person. There were only three means of lawful disinheritance in Old Covenant Israel: civil execution for a capital crime, expulsion from the congregation for an ecclesiastical crime, or adoption into another family or tribe. All three involved broken covenants: civil, ecclesiastical, and familial. In the third instance, the broken family covenant was simultaneously replaced by a new family or tribal covenant. A daughter was normally disinherited by her father in this way, and if she was to become a wife rather than a concubine, she was to receive a dowry from her father.²³

D. Virginity and Disinheritance

Jephthah's daughter was disinherited in a unique way: by legal transfer into a priestly family. She bewailed her virginity (Jud. 11:37) because this was the mark of her unmarried condition, and therefore of her eligibility for transfer into the tribe of Levi apart from her own will. The standard interpretation of the story of Jephthah's daughter rests on the assertion that as a temple servant, she would have had to remain a virgin.²⁴ I am aware of no evidence from the Book of Leviticus or any other biblical text regarding the mandatory and therefore permanent virginity of female temple servants. Then why did she bewail her virginity? Not because she was bewailing her supposed future virginity, but because she was bewailing her present virginity. It was her virginity that bound her to the terms of her father's vow; otherwise, her husband's authority would have negated the father's vow.

Jephthah's daughter was, as the phrase goes, "her daddy's girl": a dynasty-coveting power-seeker. When her virginity cost her the inheritance of her father's political dynasty, she bewailed her virginity. Her heart was not right with God. What was an enormous honor—adoption into the tribe of Levi, the spiritual counsellors of the nation—she

21. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 36.

22. Or, in the case of a widow (Num. 30:9), she. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 16.

23. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 32.

24. Jordan takes this approach: Judges, p. 210.

saw as a thing to bewail in the mountains for two months (Jud. 11:37).

Jordan raised this question: “Why didn’t Jephthah substitute a money payment for his vow? These monetary substitutes are set out in Leviticus 27:1–8.”²⁵ He said that commentators who have addressed this question have no easy explanation for it. He referred to Leviticus 27:28–29: “Notwithstanding no devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the LORD of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the LORD. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death.” Thus, he concluded, Jephthah’s daughter could not be redeemed. “Since Jephthah vowed to offer this person as a whole burnt sacrifice, we realize that he was ‘devoting’ him or her to the Lord, and thus no ransom was possible.”²⁶ This is the correct interpretation.²⁷ But this answer raises a more important question: If she could not legally be redeemed from this vow of temple service, how could anyone be redeemed from a vow of temple service? If the answer is that no person could be redeemed from such a singular vow under Mosaic law—and this is the correct answer—then what are we to make of Leviticus 27:2–8?²⁸ What was the meaning of all those prices?

E. Not a Redemption Price

In the section of Leviticus 27 that follows this one, we read of the redemption price of animals that are set apart (sanctified) to be offered as sacrifices (vv. 9–13). Then, in the section following that one, we read of the redemption price of a house sanctified to the priesthood (vv. 14–15). Finally, in the next section, the laws governing sanctified fields are listed (vv. 16–25). In the second and third cases, the term “sanctify” (kawdash, holy) is used.²⁹ In all three cases, the redemption price was

25. Ibid., p. 206.

26. Ibid., pp. 206–7.

27. Jordan pointed out to me that the only other use of pawlaw—“singular,” as in singular vow—in the hiphil voice is found in Numbers 6:2, which relates to a Nazirite vow: “Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When either man or woman shall separate themselves to vow a vow of a Nazirite, to separate themselves unto the LORD: He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink, and shall drink no vinegar of wine, or vinegar of strong drink, neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat moist grapes, or dried. All the days of his separation shall he eat nothing that is made of the vine tree, from the kernels even to the husk” (Num. 6:2–4).

28. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 35.

29. In the first case, sacrificial animals, the cognate term for “sanctify” is used: kodesh, holy (vv. 9, 10).

the market price at the time of the redemption plus 20% (vv. 13, 15, 19).

Then comes Leviticus 27:26: “Only the firstling of the beasts, which should be the LORD’S firstling, no man shall sanctify it; whether it be ox, or sheep: it is the LORD’S.” This law specifically denies the legitimacy of sanctifying the animal. This means that no redemption of the animal was legal. It was a devoted animal, not a sanctified animal. Sanctification in this context meant “set apart until redeemed.” This legal condition was less rigorous than devotion. Devotion meant that the legal boundary around the object was permanent. The same is true of the vow of Leviticus 27:2–8. In this passage, there is no mention of a supplemental payment of one-fifth. This is evidence that what is being considered in verses 2–8 is not a series of redemption prices. Then what does this section refer to?

The preliminary answer was given in 1846 by Andrew Bonar. He concluded that the list of prices in Leviticus 27:2–8 is not a list of redemption prices. “There seems to me a mistake generally fallen into here by commentators. They suppose that these shekels of money were paid in order to free the offerers from the obligation of devoting the person. Now, surely, the whole chapter is speaking of things truly devoted to God, and cases of exchange and substitution are referred to in ver. 10, 13, 15. As for persons devoted, there was no substitution allowed. The mistake has arisen from supposing that this amount of money was ransom-money; whereas it was an addition to the offering of the person, not a substitution.” He pointed to the case of Jephthah’s daughter as evidence.³⁰

Bonar explained the additional monetary payment in terms of the giver’s gratitude. A person who was really grateful to God, he said, would add money to the transfer. This misses the judicial point. What we have here is an entry fee: a payment analogous to a marriage dowry. A person who desired to transfer himself or a member of his family into the tribe of Levi had to provide a “dowry”—not to the family, but to the temple.³¹ Why a dowry? Because, theologically speaking, the bride of God is not a concubine. She is a free wife. The free wife in Israel had to be provided with a dowry. Judicially speaking, the Levites

30. Andrew Bonar, A Commentary on Leviticus (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, [1846] 1966), p. 497.

31. This does not mean that the money could never go to the adopting family. Officers of the temple might choose to transfer the funds to an adopting family for various reasons, such as the education of young children who had been adopted, or the care of older people.

were freemen in Israel. For anyone within another tribe to become a member of the tribe of Levi, the person's family—the head of the household—had to offer an additional payment. This payment was judicial. It established the person's legal status: a freeman (wife) rather than a slave (concubine).

Members of the tribe of Levi could not normally own rural land outside of 48 specified cities (Num. 35:7).³² Thus, any person who was delivered by a vow and payment into temple service lost his or her claim to his or her ancestral land. We see this in the case of Jephthah's daughter, in an incident that has confused Bible commentators for centuries. As his only child (Jud. 11:34), she was the lawful heir of his land and its accompanying legal status, but only so long as she did not marry outside his tribe (Num. 35:6–9).³³ By being adopted into the tribe of Levi, she could not thereafter marry outside of the tribe of Levi. Thus, she had to forfeit her inheritance from Jephthah. She could not extend her father's dynasty, a point Jordan made.³⁴ A father alienated his family's inheritance forever from his heirs if his male children were under age 20 or his daughters were unmarried at the time he made his vow. This did not mean that they lost their legal status as freemen; Levites possessed freeman status. But the heirs did lose their claim on the family's land.

Could the priest annul the vow? Yes. There was no compulsion that he adopt someone into his family. The vow was analogous to the vow of a daughter or married woman: it could be annulled within 24 hours by the male head of the household (Num. 30:3–8). The priests, acting in God's name, as the heads of God's ecclesiastical household, could lawfully annul someone's vow of adoption into the tribe. But if the vow was accepted by a priest in authority, the vow-taker and any other members of his family covered by his vow were then adopted into the tribe of Levi if they could pay the entry fee. Once adopted by the priest's family, there was no way back into non-Levitical freeman-ship in Israel. At the time of the adoption, the adopted family's original inheritance had been forfeited to the kinsman-redeemer, the closest relative in their original tribe (Num. 27:9–11).³⁵ They could retain their

32. There were two exceptions: (1) when a family dedicated a piece of land to the priesthood and then refused to redeem it before the next jubilee year; (2) when a family dedicated a piece of land to the priesthood but then leased the whole property to someone else (Lev. 27:16–21); North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 36.

33. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 22.

34. Jordan, Judges, p. 205.

35. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 15.

status as freemen only as members of the tribe of Levi. Their family land was no longer part of their inheritance. But the males were still members of God's holy army. They were still citizens.

F. The Kinsman-Redeemer

Leviticus 27:2–8 is the passage governing the conditions of adoption into the tribe of Levi. There had to be a payment—the equivalent of a dowry—to the temple.³⁶ In the case of a slave, his owner had to provide the funds. If the adoptee was the head of a household, he had to make the payment on his own behalf, or else find someone to make it for him.

Who was the most likely person to make the payment for him if he could not afford to pay? Both judicially and economically, there is little doubt: the kinsman-redeemer. He would inherit title to the land left behind by a newly adopted family. The entry price was high; no one else was likely to have the same incentive to make so large a payment. This points to the work of Christ as the Kinsman-Redeemer of Israel and mankind. He has paid the fee for all those who are adopted into the New Covenant priesthood. No one else has either the incentive or the ability to pay this price. In His case, the incentive is not economic, for two reasons. First, Jesus Christ already is God the Father's lawful heir in history and eternity. He will inherit everything. Second, the entry price is too high—far beyond the very high price of 50 shekels in Old Covenant Israel. The price is the death of the Kinsman-Redeemer. His motivation was grace, not profit. Christians inherit as heirs of their Kinsmen-Redeemer, Jesus Christ. Everyone else is eternally disinherited.

Verse 8 reads: "But if he be poorer than thy estimation, then he shall present himself before the priest, and the priest shall value him; according to his ability that vowed shall the priest value him." The high priest, Jesus Christ, has paid the maximum price for each of His saints—those set apart by God judicially for priestly service. Entering

36. I do not think the price was paid to Levite families. Had the money gone to individual families, there would have been a strong motivation for Levites to recruit new members of the tribe. The entry fee was to serve as a barrier to entry, not a motivation to recruit new members. If the money went directly to the temple, local Levites would have had far less incentive to recruit non-Levites into the tribe. Aaronic priests would have possessed a veto over adoption: the men with the greatest authority in Israel. Adoption in this case was tribal, not familial, analogous to circumcised resident aliens who were adopted into tribal cities if they were accepted to serve in God's holy army.

with nothing of our own, we do not need to plead before a priest for a lower entry fee. The high priest has paid it all.

G. Annulled

If this analysis is correct, then it should be obvious that this law has been annulled with the New Covenant's change in the priesthood. The passage's variations in price—young vs. old, male vs. female—have nothing to do with economic productivity. They are irrelevant for the economic analysis of labor markets. They were equally irrelevant for such analytical purposes under the Mosaic Covenant.

The prices listed in Leviticus 27:2–8 were not redemption prices; they were entry barrier prices. They were not based on the expected economic productivity of people who were then immediately redeemed out of God's ecclesiastical service; they were based on the need to screen power-seekers and security-seekers from access to ecclesiastical service. They were not market prices; they were judicial prices. They were not barriers to escape from ecclesiastical service; they were barriers to entry into ecclesiastical service. Thus, rather than applying economic analysis to the productivity of the groups specified in Leviticus 27:2–8, we should apply economic analysis to the question of the judicial boundary separating the tribe of Levi from the other tribes.

Conclusion

This passage is not about human sacrifice. It is about adoption: Jephthah's daughter became a Levite. It is about a transfer of inheritance: from Jephthah's daughter to his nearest of kin, his kinsman-redeemer. It is about the disinheritance of his family line in Israel.

The story of Jephthah's daughter is the story of disinheritance through adoption into the tribe of the Levites. The Levites could not legally own rural land in Israel. By offering her as a burnt offering—irrevocable adoption by the Levites—Jephthah disinherited her.

CONCLUSION TO JUDGES

In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes (Jud. 21:25).

God wanted a politically decentralized society. This is why He set up tribes. They controlled the land in their region. The local families could not lawfully be displaced from rural land for more than 49 years. This was the law of the jubilee year (Lev. 25).¹ It rested on the genocide of the conquest: the post-conquest distribution of rural land.

This was the way of God. God told Samuel to warn the Israelites about calling for a king. The king would oppress them (I Sam. 8:14–17).² The Israelites did not pay attention to Samuel's warning.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24.

2. Chapter 14.

INTRODUCTION TO RUTH

And Boaz answered and said unto her, It hath fully been shewed me, all that thou hast done unto thy mother in law since the death of thine husband: and how thou hast left thy father and thy mother, and the land of thy nativity, and art come unto a people which thou knewest not heretofore. The LORD recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the LORD God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust (Ruth 2:11–12).

The Book of Ruth presents the story of redemption. A Moabite woman was redeemed through covenantal adoption into a family of marginal covenant-keepers at best. Her mother-in-law was redeemed by the example of her daughter-in-law. An older man was elevated from obscurity to permanent fame by means of an act of grace that normally would have left him in obscurity.

It is a book about the importance of the family covenant in Mosaic Israel—an importance that exceeded both wealth and biological heirship. It is a book about an obscure Mosaic law that twice was central to the coming of the Messiah, Jesus Christ. It is a book about grace and self-sacrifice for the sake of the dead. It is a book about loyalty.

The Book of Ruth should remind us that it is better to make our decisions in terms of God's covenant than in terms of wealth. It is best to place our wealth at the service of the kingdom of God. We should place our poverty there, too.

8

LOST HOPE

Now it came to pass in the days when the judges ruled, that there was a famine in the land. And a certain man of Bethlehemjudah went to sojourn in the country of Moab, he, and his wife, and his two sons. And the name of the man was Elimelech, and the name of his wife Naomi, and the name of his two sons Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Bethlehemjudah. And they came into the country of Moab, and continued there. And Elimelech Naomi's husband died; and she was left, and her two sons. And they took them wives of the women of Moab; the name of the one was Orpah, and the name of the other Ruth: and they dwelled there about ten years (Ruth 1:1–4).

The theocentric principle here is God's covenant, which includes inheritance.¹

This family left Israel to journey to Moab. Moab was a covenantally perverse nation. It had its origin in the sin of incest. Moab was the son of the scheming firstborn daughter of Lot and her drunken father (Gen. 19:37). The daughters of Lot had lost hope in God's inheritance. They committed a grievous sin to gain inheritance on their terms.

Moabites had long been hostile to the Israelites. They had opposed the Israelites during the wilderness period (Num. 22–25). This led to a curse on them.

An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of the LORD; even to their tenth generation shall they not enter into the congregation of the LORD for ever: Because they met you not with bread and with water in the way, when ye came forth out of Egypt; and because they hired against thee Balaam the son of Beor of Pethor of Mesopotamia, to curse thee. Nevertheless the LORD thy God would not hearken unto Balaam; but the LORD thy God turned the curse into a blessing unto thee, because the LORD thy God loved thee. Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever (Deut. 23:3–6).

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012).

To go to Moab for deliverance meant trusting in the gods of Moab. God told the Israelites not to seek the Moabites' peace and prosperity. Yet here was a family leaving Israel for residence in Moab in search of prosperity. This family had no faith in God.

The father died. The sons stayed for 10 years. They married Moabite women. Then they both died intestate. They never thought to return home. They looked to their future in Moab as the way to prosperity. Their inheritance would be in Moab. They were wrong.

When the sons died, their widowed mother decided to return home, but only because of good economic news from back home. "Then she arose with her daughters in law, that she might return from the country of Moab: for she had heard in the country of Moab how that the LORD had visited his people in giving them bread" (Ruth 1:6). It was not God's covenant that lured her back; it was bread.

Her daughters-in-law went with her. She allowed this for part of the journey. Then she changed her mind.

And Naomi said unto her two daughters in law, Go, return each to her mother's house: the LORD deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead, and with me. The LORD grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband. Then she kissed them; and they lifted up their voice, and wept. And they said unto her, Surely we will return with thee unto thy people (Ruth 1:8–10).

She expected them to remarry. She did not comprehend that they had subordinated themselves covenantally to the God of Israel through their marriages. She regarded their covenants with God as broken with the death of her sons. One daughter protested, but then took her advice. The other, Ruth, refused to be sent back into the land of Moab's gods. "And Ruth said, Intreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the LORD do so to me, and more also, if ought but death part thee and me" (Ruth 1:16–17). Ruth understood the marriage covenant. She had been adopted by marriage into the household of a covenant-keeper. Her sister-in-law did not understand this. Her sister-in-law was as theologically ignorant as her mother-in-law was.

Naomi was a bitter woman. She saw the covenant only in terms of negative sanctions and biological inheritance.

So they two went until they came to Bethlehem. And it came to pass, when they were come to Bethlehem, that all the city was moved about them, and they said, Is this Naomi? And she said unto them, Call me not Naomi, call me Mara: for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me. I went out full, and the LORD hath brought me home again empty: why then call ye me Naomi, seeing the LORD hath testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me? (Ruth 1:19–21).

She had no faith in the future because she was too old to have children. She had told the two women, “Turn again, my daughters, go your way; for I am too old to have an husband” (Ruth 1:12a). She failed to understand the central fact of the covenant after the Fall of man: redemption by adoption. Ruth had been redeemed by adoption—by God’s special grace and by her marriage vow. Her sister-in-law had not been redeemed, and so failed to honor the adoption. We are not told how Ruth learned this—surely not from her husband or mother-in-law.

Conclusion

The Book of Ruth is the great book in the Bible on redemption by adoption. A Moabite woman understood the doctrine. A family of Israelites did not. The contrast could not have been sharper.

Ruth and Boaz were the means by which Naomi was restored to faith. This restoration was grounded in a strange Mosaic law: the law we call the Levirate marriage. The word comes from “levir,” the Latin word for brother-in-law.

9

GLEANING

And Naomi had a kinsman of her husband's, a mighty man of wealth, of the family of Elimelech; and his name was Boaz. And Ruth the Moabitess said unto Naomi, Let me now go to the field, and glean ears of corn after him in whose sight I shall find grace. And she said unto her, Go, my daughter (Ruth 2:1–2).

Naomi and her sons did not return to Israel for a decade after the death of Elimilech (Ruth 1:4). Sometime between Naomi's departure from Israel and her return, Boaz became wealthy as a farmer. Elimilech's family remained outside of Bethlehem, yet they could have returned. The famine had subsided. They chose instead to remain in Moab. This showed a remarkable lack of faith in God.

A. The Gleaning Law

Ruth proposed that she go into the fields to serve as a gleaner. Naomi did not suggest this. This indicates the Ruth understood the implications of the law of gleaning better than Naomi did.

And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field, neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy harvest. And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger: I am the LORD your God (Lev. 19:9–10).¹

When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands. When thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. When thou gatherest the grapes of thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it afterward: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt: therefore I command thee to do this thing (Deut. 24:19–22).²

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 11.

The gleaning law was designed to protect the poor in rural locations. They had a moral claim on the leftovers of the land. The owners were not to strip a field bare of grain, or to strip the olive crop. The leftovers that fell to the ground would feed the very poor.

This system relied on the fact that gleaning produced a low return on invested time. A person so poor as to be reduced to gleaning had no higher output line of work available. Stooping in a field to pick up grain that the harvesters had missed was a low-productivity endeavor. Anyone who was dependent on food collected in this way had no better opportunity. This was a welfare program for the exceptionally poor.

The cost to the land owner was minimal. The extra time and work required to harvest fallen grain would not earn a high return. A man rich enough to hire harvesters was not poor. The economic return on the initial sweep across the fields was high. A second sweep would have been a low-return assignment. It was a better use of the harvesters' time to go on to the next section of the field, where the average return per investment of time and capital was high. The average return on the land itself was less. But the loss was minimal because of the low return on work expended. A harvester working on commission would not have wanted to spend time going through a field a second time. The gleaning law was advantageous to him. The owner would not assign the slim pickings to harvesters.

B. Ruth's Subordination

Ruth was in the right place at the right time. "And she went, and came, and gleaned in the field after the reapers: and her hap[penstance] was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech" (Ruth 2:3). Boaz showed up when she was in the field (v. 4). "Then said Boaz unto his servant that was set over the reapers, Whose damsel is this?" (v. 5). The servant said that she was a woman of Moab who had returned with Naomi (v. 6). She then asked permission of Boaz to glean in his field (v. 7). This indicates that the owner of the crop had the right to include some and exclude others. Boaz told her to glean only in his fields (v. 8). He also provided a social covering for her. "Have I not charged the young men that they shall not touch thee?" (v. 9b).

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 62.

Then she fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground, and said unto him, Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldest take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger? And Boaz answered and said unto her, It hath fully been shewed me, all that thou hast done unto thy mother in law since the death of thine husband: and how thou hast left thy father and thy mother, and the land of thy nativity, and art come unto a people which thou knewest not heretofore (Ruth 2:10–11).

Boaz understood that Ruth had covenanted with the God of Israel by returning to Israel when she was not required to. Her commitment to Naomi indicated that she had made a definitive break from the gods of Moab. He understood that Ruth was covenanted to God through Naomi. She had subordinated herself to God by subordinating herself to Naomi. Boaz made this clear to her. "The LORD recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the LORD God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust" (Ruth 2:12). He saw her as under the covenant and therefore a lawful recipient of God's positive sanctions. She was grateful. "Then she said, Let me find favour in thy sight, my lord; for that thou hast comforted me, and for that thou hast spoken friendly unto thine handmaid, though I be not like unto one of thine handmaidens" (v. 13). Boaz then went above and beyond the call of duty.

And Boaz said unto her, At mealtime come thou hither, and eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar. And she sat beside the reapers: and he reached her parched corn, and she did eat, and was sufficed, and left. And when she was risen up to glean, Boaz commanded his young men, saying, Let her glean even among the sheaves, and reproach her not (Ruth 2:14–15).

He had begun the process of dealing with her as a kinsman-redeemer deals with a poor relative. He dealt with her as the widow of a near kinsman. He would have done the same for Naomi, but Naomi had not subordinated herself as a gleaner.

Ruth had not known that Boaz was a near kinsman. That became clear only when she took the grain back to Naomi.

And her mother in law said unto her, Where hast thou gleaned to day? and where wroughtest thou? blessed be he that did take knowledge of thee. And she shewed her mother in law with whom she had wrought, and said, The man's name with whom I wrought to day is Boaz. And Naomi said unto her daughter in law, Blessed be he of the LORD, who hath not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead. And Naomi said unto her, The man is near of kin unto us, one of our next kinsmen (vv. 19–20).

Naomi told her to stay in Boaz's fields (v. 21). Ruth took her advice (v. 21).

Conclusion

Gleaning was a good way for land owners to provide protection to very poor people in the local community. It was hard work. It was low productivity work. Anyone choosing to be a gleaner had no better opportunities. Gleaning would have been no one's first choice of occupations.

One of the advantages of gleaning was that a hard-working person would have been seen by harvesters and perhaps even the land owner. Owners are always on the lookout for efficient, honest employees. Gleaning provided the close contact required by an owner to identify exceptionally good workers. Boaz spotted Ruth from the beginning.

10

THE MATCHMAKER

Then Naomi her mother in law said unto her, My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be well with thee? And now is not Boaz of our kindred, with whose maidens thou wast? Behold, he winnoweth barley to night in the threshingfloor. Wash thyself therefore, and anoint thee, and put thy raiment upon thee, and get thee down to the floor: but make not thyself known unto the man, until he shall have done eating and drinking. And it shall be, when he lieth down, that thou shalt mark the place where he shall lie, and thou shalt go in, and uncover his feet, and lay thee down; and he will tell thee what thou shalt do (Ruth 3:1–4).

A. The Family Name

The theocentric principle here was the preservation of the family's God-designated name. Under the Mosaic law, a man who died without a child would lose his name in Israel. His land would be inherited by his next of kin, who was also known as the kinsman-redeemer and the blood-avenger. The Mosaic law had a way to overcome this form of disinheritance.

If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her. And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel. And if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel, he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother. Then the elders of his city shall call him, and speak unto him: and if he stand to it, and say, I like not to take her; Then shall his brother's wife come unto him in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face, and shall answer and say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed (Deut. 25:5–10).¹

Naomi recognized that Boaz was a near kinsman of her dead son, Mahlon, who had died intestate. Ruth was the widow. Had Mahlon lived in close proximity to his brother in Israel, each would have been responsible to fulfill this requirement. But they did not live in Israel. They both died intestate. This excused the nearest male relative from having a child with Ruth. She lived in Moab.

Upon her return, this changed. The land that had belonged to Elimilech would go to the nearest male relative at Naomi's death. There were no grandsons to inherit. The land would not go to Orpah, who had returned to Moab. It would not go to Ruth, a Moabite woman who was not part of the covenant line. Only through marriage to the nearest of kin could Elimilech's name be preserved in Israel. Otherwise, his land and name would automatically become the possession of the kinsman-redeemer at her death. That would be his inheritance.

Naomi was at long last beginning to think covenantally. Had she decided in Moab to pursue this plan of action, she would not have tried to send back her sons' wives. Either of them could have secured her husband's name by marrying Elimilech's nearest of kin.

B. Naomi's Plan

Naomi saw a way out of this situation. If Boaz would marry Ruth, the name of Elimilech might be preserved in Israel. So might the name of Mahlon. Both men had died outside the land, but through the family's land, the family's name could still be preserved. This was only possible if the nearest of kin decided to marry Ruth. As it turned out, Boaz was not the nearest of kin. Naomi must have known this. She also must have known that the nearest of kin would have no incentive to marry Ruth. This was not required of him. Mahlon was not his brother, nor had they lived in close proximity. But if Boaz could be persuaded to marry her, assuming the kinsman-redeemer refused, Boaz could serve as the kinsman-redeemer.

Naomi's plan was straightforward. Ruth should go to Boaz after he had drunk enough wine to make him interested in a good-looking woman. Naomi understood a fundamental rule of marriage. "You marry the person who is most available when you are most vulnerable." Ruth would make herself available.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 64.

Because this was Naomi's idea, Ruth would be regarded at worst as an accomplice of a scheming woman. But, because of the law of the brothers, Naomi would not be regarded as a woman who was after Boaz's property. On the contrary, she was after her late husband's property. If Boaz married Ruth and had a child with her, this child would become Elimilech's heir, not Boaz's heir. Elimilech's name, not Boaz's name, would be preserved. Boaz's name would be preserved through Ruth's second and subsequent children. This would have nothing to do judicially with Naomi.

This form of marriage was by adoption. The wife was adopted into her husband's family. Ruth had been adopted by Mahlon. She was therefore in the family of Elimilech. But, without a child, her late husband's name would not be attached to land in Israel.

Ruth followed Naomi's plan.

And she went down unto the floor, and did according to all that her mother in law bade her. And when Boaz had eaten and drunk, and his heart was merry, he went to lie down at the end of the heap of corn: and she came softly, and uncovered his feet, and laid her down. And it came to pass at midnight, that the man was afraid, and turned himself: and, behold, a woman lay at his feet. And he said, Who art thou? And she answered, I am Ruth thine handmaid: spread therefore thy skirt over thine handmaid; for thou art a near kinsman. And he said, Blessed be thou of the LORD, my daughter: for thou hast shewed more kindness in the latter end than at the beginning, inasmuch as thou followedst not young men, whether poor or rich. And now, my daughter, fear not; I will do to thee all that thou requirest: for all the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman (Ruth 3:6–11).

This exchange reveals an important fact: Boaz was an older man. Ruth could have married a younger man. She must have been good looking. She choose him. This was not because of his physical appeal. It might have been for a more comfortable life, but she could have found some man to support her.

Why did this make her virtuous? Because she was acting on behalf of her late husband. She was honoring his name. She was subordinating her sexual interest for the sake of her late husband's name in Israel. This was an act of sacrifice on behalf of a dead man. This was a coven-antly sacrificial decision.

C. The Marriage Law

We know that Boaz fully understood the implications of Ruth's offer of marriage. She did not make her proposal on her own authority, but on Naomi's. Naomi was acting to secure her husband's name through Ruth.

Boaz knew he was not Mahlon's kinsman-redeemer. There was a closer relative. He told her:

And now it is true that I am thy near kinsman: howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I. Tarry this night, and it shall be in the morning, that if he will perform unto thee the part of a kinsman, well; let him do the kinsman's part: but if he will not do the part of a kinsman to thee, then will I do the part of a kinsman to thee, as the LORD liveth: lie down until the morning (Ruth 3:12–13).

He understood that she was not after him and his money but rather her husband's memory in Israel. He knew that she was willing to allow the other man to father her child. He did not ask her if she would do this. He knew that she would do this. That was what the Mosaic law required to secure Elimilech's inheritance.

He gave her grain to take home as a token of his commitment (v. 15). She took it to Naomi, who knew by this offering that Boaz was ready to take action. "Then said she, Sit still, my daughter, until thou know how the matter will fall: for the man will not be in rest, until he have finished the thing this day" (v. 18).

Conclusion

The story of the midnight encounter is not a story of seduction. It is a story of inheritance. Ruth acted on behalf of her father-in-law's name and her husband's name. This was a covenantal motivation. There were other men available, but they could not secure her husband's name. She presented herself to Boaz on behalf of her dead husband. Boaz was sufficiently impressed to take the next step: to secure that inheritance for her husband. He was willing to risk doing without her in order to fulfill the terms of the Mosaic law. He knew he would lose her if the kinsman-redeemer accepted the obligation.

11

THE NAMESAKE'S INHERITANCE

And he said unto the kinsman, Naomi, that is come again out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's: And I thought to advertise thee, saying, Buy it before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people. If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it: but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know: for there is none to redeem it beside thee; and I am after thee. And he said, I will redeem it (Ruth 4:3–4).

The theocentric principle here was inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant.¹ Who would inherit the land? That would depend on the degree of covenantal commitment.

A. An Offer of Land

Boaz told the kinsman-redeemer the truth, but not the whole truth. He presented the proposition in terms of land. The land would eventually go to the kinsman-redeemer by lawful inheritance. Naomi was childless. No heir of Elimelech would inherit.

Boaz acted on behalf of Elimelech, but in the name of Naomi. He said that she wanted to sell land that was part of the inheritance. The kinsman-redeemer could get possession of this land by buying it from her while she was still alive. If he refused, Boaz would buy it. This would not secure the land for himself permanently. He could use it until the jubilee year. Then the land would revert to Naomi. If she had died, it would have gone to the kinsman-redeemer. This assumes that the courts enforced the jubilee year. There is no evidence that this was ever done in pre-exilic Israel. If it was not enforced, then the kinsmanredeemer would still inherit it at her death. Boaz was making an offer to buy the use of the land until it legally was transferred to the kinsman-redeemer.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

The kinsman-redeemer decided to buy it. He wanted the use of it. He would become its owner before Naomi died.

At this point, Boaz provided additional information.

Then said Boaz, What day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance. And the kinsman said, I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar mine own inheritance: redeem thou my right to thyself; for I cannot redeem it (Ruth 4:5–6).

1. A Different Inheritance

The obligation to perform the levirate² marriage changed the economics of the arrangement. The kinsman-redeemer would not inherit the land. His child would. The child would legally be the child of Mahlon. Mahlon's name would persevere. The land would not become the kinsman-redeemer's. It would become his biological child's, who would not be his judicial child. Whatever money he paid Naomi for the land would become her possession. The land would become his biological child's possession, but Mahlon's name would attach to it. So committed to inheritance and name was the kinsman-redeemer that he turned down the offer. He could have had the use of the land until the jubilee year, or at least until he died. But name was more important than economics—for the kinsman-redeemer, for Naomi, for Ruth, and for Boaz.

Now this was the manner in former time in Israel concerning redeeming and concerning changing, for to confirm all things; a man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbour: and this was a testimony in Israel. Therefore the kinsman said unto Boaz, Buy it for thee. So he drew off his shoe. And Boaz said unto the elders, and unto all the people, Ye are witnesses this day, that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi. Moreover Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place: ye are witnesses this day (Ruth 4:7–10).

2. "Levir": Latin for brother-in-law.

Consider the reason offered by the kinsman for not marrying Ruth. It had to do with his own inheritance. "I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar mine own inheritance: redeem thou my right to thyself; for I cannot redeem it."³ He had hoped to inherit the land of his heirless deceased brother.³ His sister-in-law was too old to bear children. He was therefore willing to buy it from Naomi before she died. This would have given her money to live on. The land would have come to him eventually. But Boaz was proposing something else. If Boaz married Ruth, and if Ruth gave birth, then Elimelech's land would pass to the child of Ruth, who would become the family's firstborn son. This land would be part of the legacy of Ruth's dead husband.

Because of Boaz's willingness to become Ruth's husband, the closer kinsman could gain control over Naomi's land only by marrying Ruth. But if she bore him an heir, he could not pass this land to any other children by an existing marriage. The land would pass to Ruth's firstborn child. Assuming that he was single, and assuming that he married Ruth, the land owned by Elimelech could not become his namesake's land; it would become Elimelech's namesake's land: Ruth's firstborn child. His own flesh and blood would inherit this land, but this biological heir would not be his judicial namesake. So powerful was the concept of family name in Israel that the man turned down an opportunity to purchase land that his biological heir would eventually inherit.

2. Marriage

For the existing kinsman to lose the inheritance from Elimelech through Naomi, another kinsman had to marry Ruth. Ruth could never possess an inheritance in Israel to leave to her firstborn except through the decision of a kinsman of her late husband to adopt her as a wife. Without Ruth's marriage to a kinsman of Elimelech, the land would automatically pass at Naomi's death to Elimelech's nearest of kin, i.e., Elimelech's kinsman-redeemer.

The existing kinsman-redeemer had to approve of this transfer, which was why Boaz assembled elders as witnesses. The existing kinsman-redeemer could retain his claim on the inheritance only by marrying Ruth and then having Ruth remain barren, as she had been in Moab. If she bore a child who lived long enough to bear children to inherit, the existing kinsman-redeemer and his heirs could not inherit this land. He decided that this marriage was not worth the added economic risk. If he married Ruth, and she bore him a child, all of the capital that he would invest into the land would become part of another man's covenant line. It would be his biological child's family line, but not his family name's line. This is evidence that blood lines in Israel were regarded as less important than covenant lines. Family name was more important in Israel than biological generation.

3. The brother had fathered two sons, but both had died without children.

B. Name Above Biology

This is an extremely important theological point. Rahab the former harlot and Ruth the Moabite were adopted into their husbands' covenant lines. This adoption was by oath: a marriage oath. Through them came David the king and Jesus, who was a greater king than David. Through two foreign women, the covenant line was extended. More to the point, through these women the supreme covenant line in Israel was extended: Judah's. Most to the point, through them the promised Seed was born (Matt. 1:5, 16). The crucial covenant line was preserved through marriage, and, in Ruth's case, levirate marriage to the biological heir of Rahab: Boaz (Matt. 1:5).

1. The New Kinsman-Redeemer

Boaz became the kinsman-redeemer of Elimelech's line. He did this by marrying Ruth, a former gentile. Only through his marriage to Ruth could he serve as the kinsman-redeemer of Elimelech's line. That is, Boaz, as an heir in the line of Judah and, as it turned out, progenitor of Jesus the redeemer, exercised this office by marrying a Moabite. Moabite males took 10 generations to become citizens (Deut. 23:3). As heirs of an incestuous relationship between Lot and his firstborn daughter (Gen. 19:37), Moabites were regarded as far more perverse covenantally than Egyptians, who could become citizens in three generations (Deut. 23:7–8). But because of Boaz's judicial role as kinsman-redeemer through marriage, Ruth was adopted into the covenant line in just one generation. Of all legal relationships biblically, adoption is the most authoritative. Through adoption, the disinherited children of Adam re-enter the family of God. Adoption is the judicial basis of inheritance. Adoption is by covenant oath, not biology.

Ruth, a former gentile, was adopted into Israel's supreme covenant line by the willingness of a man to become a kinsman-redeemer to her late husband. "Moreover Ruth the Moabite, the wife of Mahlon, have

I purchased to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place: ye are witnesses this day" (Ruth 4:10). By lowering himself socially by marrying a former Moabite, and by being willing to raise up seed for his kinsman Elimelech by way of Elimelech's dead son, Boaz was granted an extraordinary blessing. He became the biological forefather of David and Jesus. Legally, these heirs were not part of his personal covenant line. Only through Elimelech's name could he participate in the crucial covenant line. Only by being willing to raise up seed on behalf of another did he unknowingly place himself as the key figure in the extension of the key covenant line in Israel and, for that matter, in all of history. Boaz became the biggest covenantal somebody in his generation only because he was willing to become a covenantal nobody in the extension of Elimelech's line. The land that he presumably bought from Naomi became the family inheritance in another man's line. Any improvements that he made in this land became another family line's property. By abandoning his own name covenantally, he thereby became the greatest name of his generation, a name that is listed in both of the messianic genealogies in the New Testament (Matt. 1:5; Luke 3:32).

2. The Imputation of a Man's Name

This case law was a seed law. As a law governing inheritance, it was also a land law. The firstborn of a levirate marital union inherited the deceased father's name. The inheritance was above all covenantal: part of God's promise to Abraham. The deceased man's name was imputed to the heir by God and by law, even though he was born of the levir. The imputation of a man's name was the essence of his inheritance: from his fathers and to his children. God had revealed this to Abraham: "And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. 12:2-3).

What the levirate law tells us is that the imputation of a man's name was more fundamental than either genetic inheritance or family discipline. In the context of the continuing academic debate between "nature" (genetics) and "nurture" (social environment), neither was fundamental in Israel. What was fundamental was judicial imputation. The levir performed a redemptive act on behalf of his brother's covenant line. This act was far more judicial than biological or social. He provided biological seed and family discipline, but the decisive factor was judicial-covenantal-eschatological, not biological or social. It was so decisive that the law prohibiting a brother from marrying his sister-in-law was suspended. That law had specifically stated that the negative sanction would be childlessness (Lev. 20:21). The levirate marriage was mandated by God specifically for producing an heir.

Because of Boaz's grace to Naomi through Ruth, a unique and judicially unconventional thing took place: Boaz replaced Elimelech in Israelite history as part of the covenant line of David (I Chron. 2:11–12). In terms of the law of the levir, the family line through Ruth was Elimelech's, but Elimelech is never mentioned in relation to David. It was Boaz's marriage to Ruth in the name of Elimelech that secured Boaz's place in history. As the heir of Rahab, his act of mercy grafted Rahab into the kingly line retroactively. Judicially, Boaz's family line was irrelevant to the coming of David. Yet because of his grace shown to a former gentile woman, his family name entered the most important family line in man's history. Boaz established his name and his family line's name in history by a merciful covenantal act which, in terms of the Mosaic law, submerged his name to Elimelech's. Boaz, who had not even been the closest of kin to Elimelech's son, and who had in no way been required to serve as levir, replaced Elimelech in Israel's family lists.

Jesus would imitate Boaz's judicial precedent, not by marrying, but by refusing to marry. By refusing to marry, He thereby transferred His inheritance to His kinsmen. He died on their behalf, so that they could be legally adopted into His covenant line.⁴ His death and resurrection have offered to the gentiles God's covenantal inheritance by means of adoption, just as Boaz's willingness to marry Ruth offered her covenantal inheritance through adoption. As the heir of Jacob's promise (Gen. 49:10), Jesus was the true heir in Israel, the son of David the king. But Jesus was not Joseph's biological heir. Here we see another act of mercy: Joseph's refusal to put Mary away for fornication with another man. Joseph adopted Jesus as his firstborn son, and in doing so, gained shame for himself: the birth of his firstborn son in fewer than nine months after marriage.

4. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will" (Eph. 1:3–5).

We do not know if Boaz had biological heirs through a former marriage. If he did, his property went to them. If he did not, then his second-born and later children inherited. Ruth was their mother, but they bore his name. In this case, Ruth became the agent for extending his name in history. The Bible is silent about this covenant line.

C. The Mosaic Family as a Tribal Unit

The seed laws and land laws existed because of Jacob's granting of blessings in Genesis 49, and specifically, his prophecy regarding the coming ruler, Shiloh.⁵ They were tribal laws, not laws governing the family unit as such. Had they been laws governing the family unit as such, they would have been cross-boundary laws, universal in scope then and now. The law of the levirate marriage would still be in force. This law is no longer in force because Jacob's prophecy was fulfilled by Jesus Christ.

Covenantal adoption has completely replaced the law of the levirate marriage in the New Covenant. Jesus established the model. His death, which ensured His lack of biological heirs, was inherent in His plan of adoption and the transfer of kingdom inheritance. Confession of faith has replaced tribal name as the basis of biblical inheritance. Confession of faith involves adopting a new family name. "And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch" (Acts 11:26b). A man's legal claim to a portion of God's kingdom inheritance is based on his possession of Christ's name through adoption. The New Covenant's preservation of Christ's name through adoption by conversion has replaced the Old Covenant's preservation of family name through adoption by reproduction.⁶ What has changed, above all, is the tribal basis of inheritance. Covenantally mandated tribes no longer exist. This is why the seed laws and land laws have been replaced by the laws governing confession of faith and church membership. The church is the new nation that has inherited God's kingdom (Matt. 21:43). It has no tribes.

5. The practice of levirate marriage existed earlier than Genesis 49. Onan's rebellion indicates that the practice did exist, and it was a law, for God's negative sanction came on him. Without law, there is no legitimate sanction. This was not, however, a written law. Its application was tied to the tribal units of Jacob's family. Lot's daughters had used a perverse application of the levirate marriage. They had deceived their father when he was drunk.

6. The mark of adoption in the Old Covenant was circumcision.

D. The Story of Tamar

The witnesses understood what was at stake judicially. “And let thy house be like the house of Pharez, whom Tamar bare unto Judah, of the seed which the LORD shall give thee of this young woman” (Ruth 4:12).

Tamar had been cheated of her inheritance as a mother through the son of Judah, Onan. Her first husband had died, and Onan his brother refused to obey the law of the levir. This law was in force before Moses. Onan may have thought he would inherit his late brother's land. His younger brother was too young to marry Tamar. There would be no child within the family for Tamar. Onan's calculation backfired immediately.

And the thing which he did displeased the LORD: wherefore he slew him also. Then said Judah to Tamar his daughter in law, Remain a widow at thy father's house, till Shelah my son be grown: for he said, Lest peradventure he die also, as his brethren did. And Tamar went and dwelt in her father's house (Gen. 38:10–11).

Tamar waited. Shelah grew up. But Judah did not give him to be her husband. Then Judah's wife died. So, Tamar decided to achieve her goal by deception. She disguised herself as a prostitute and went to a city where she knew Judah was visiting. He went in to her. He gave her collateral until he would send her a lamb as payment. They both returned home separately. When she was found to be pregnant three months later, he was ready to have her executed. On what basis? Tradition? It was not a capital crime to be a prostitute under the Mosaic law, except for the daughter of a priest (Lev. 21:9). It was a capital crime for both parties when a man committed adultery with a married woman (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22). Judah was a widower. Tamar was not married. So, she had not committed adultery with him.

Judah had cheated her out of motherhood, and he had cheated his first son out of his name in Israel. He did not compel Shelah to marry her. Tamar decided to get what belonged to her and her late husband from the closest kinsman who was available. In response to Judah's verbal judgment against her, Tamar presented the collateral goods that he had given to her. “And Judah acknowledged them, and said, She hath been more righteous than I; because that I gave her not to Shelah my son. And he knew her again no more” (Gen. 38:26). Israelites honored her for her successful deception. She had preserved her husband's name. Her firstborn son was Pharez.

E. The Covenant Line

Boaz gained the right to marry Ruth as the nearest of kin. "So Boaz took Ruth, and she was his wife: and when he went in unto her, the LORD gave her conception, and she bare a son" (Ruth 4:13). Ruth fully understood the judicial implications of this birth. "And the women said unto Naomi, Blessed be the LORD, which hath not left thee this day without a kinsman, that his name may be famous in Israel" (v. 14). Little did she know. Her son was Obed, who became the father of Jesse, who became the father of David. This was to become the supreme family line in Israel. Out of David's line came Jesus.

And Salmon begat Booz of Rachab; and Booz begat Obed of Ruth; and Obed begat Jesse (Matt. 1:5).

Which was the son of Jesse, which was the son of Obed, which was the son of Booz, which was the son of Salmon, which was the son of Naasson (Luke 3:32).

Yet, covenantally speaking, Obed was the son of Mahlon. Boaz and Ruth are the most unlikely names in the genealogies. Ruth was from Moab, the enemy of Israel. Boaz was not the covenantal father of Obed. Yet the story of Boaz and Ruth appears as a book on the Bible. Why? Because of her faithfulness in returning to Israel as Naomi's servant. This testified to her covenantal commitment to God. Similarly, the willingness of Boaz to subordinate his name to Mahlon's in Elimelech's covenant line testified to his willingness to sacrifice for his brother's name. He was not legally required to do this, because Mahlon had lived in Moab, not nearby. Ethics is central to God's covenants. These two were models of ethical righteousness.

F. Ten Generations to Freedom

The time restrictions placed on Hebrew servitude did not apply to non-Hebrew servants. They were the true slaves in Israel. Why were foreigners placed into slavery, generation after generation (Lev. 25:44–46)?⁷ The theological answer is clear: they were covenanted slaves to foreign gods. Their release from this covenantal bondage took 10 generations of faithful service to a family or institution under God's covenant.

7. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 30.

The foreigner or foreign nation that rejected God's older covenant faced judgment in history. One of these judgments in the Old Testament was to become a slave in Israel. "Thus saith the LORD, The labour of Egypt, and merchandise of Ethiopia and of the Sabeans, men of stature, shall come over unto thee, and they shall be thine: they shall come after thee; in chains they shall come over, and they shall fall down unto thee, they shall make supplication unto thee, saying, Surely God is in thee; and there is none else, there is no God" ["no other God": New King James Version] (Isa. 45:14). This was to be Israel's blessing and the foreigner's curse.

Yet with every curse in history there is a measure of blessing. Biblical servitude in the Old Testament was always intended to lead men to ethical reformation and spiritual freedom. What about heathen slaves? Weren't they slaves "forever"? Leviticus 25:46 says, "they shall be your bondmen forever." Then in what way was heathen slavery a means of redemption in Israel? We know that in one crucial case, the word "forever" meant 10 generations. Deuteronomy 23:3 specifies that it was to take 10 generations for sojourners from Ammon and Moab, the "bastard" nations that were the sons of Lot's incestuous relationships with his daughters (Gen. 19:30–38), to enter the congregation, thereby becoming full citizens in Israel. But Nehemiah 13:1 reads: "On that day they read in the book of Moses in the audience of the people; and therein was found written, that the Ammonite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of the LORD for ever." The Hebrews understood "forever" to mean 10 consecutive generations of covenant membership (circumcision).

Why 10 generations? This was the judicial curse imposed on bastards. There was also a 10-generation prohibition against a bastard's heirs' entering into the congregation of the Lord (Deut. 23:2). Judah and Tamar produced a bastard son, Pharez. David was symbolically the tenth-generation son of this illicit union (Ruth 4:18–20). He then became the mightiest king in Israel's history. He "entered the congregation" as the supreme civil judge. As Rushdoony wrote, "There is no reason to doubt that eunuchs, bastards, Ammonites, and Moabites regularly became believers and were faithful worshippers of God. Congregation has reference to the whole nation in its governmental function as God's covenant people."⁸ Those who were the circumcised heirs of bastards had to wait patiently until their own heirs could regain legal access to the civil office of judge. Rushdoony continued: "The purpose of the commandment is here the protection of authority. Authority among God's people is holy; it does require a separateness. It does not belong to every man simply on the ground of his humanity."⁹

What about heathen slaves? Would they ever regain freedom? Yes: if they remained in the household for 10 generations, they became full congregation members. At that point, they came under the laws that regulated Hebrew bondservants. At age 20, a Hebrew male became a legal adult, subject to military numbering (Ex. 30:14). It would have been illegal to keep such an adult, tenth-generation heathen slave in slavery after he reached age 20. Thus, it took 10 generations of "circumcised service" to God and to the Hebrew household to escape slavery. But escape was legally possible for one's distant heirs. Better to serve as a slave in a Hebrew household than to be at ease in paganism outside of Zion. Pagans, then as now, went to hell if they died outside the household of faith. They then become eternal slaves under God, the Eternal Slave-Master. Thus, enslavement in ancient Israel was a means of potential liberation for the heathen.

Then what about the Gibeonites? The author of the Book of Joshua (possibly it was the prophet Samuel) says that they remained slaves, "even unto this day." The Gibeonites were still in bondage at least four centuries after they became slaves in the tabernacle, for Saul slew many of them, despite the fact they were under his covenantal protection as a separate people within the land (II Sam. 21:1–2). Four centuries seems to be longer than 10 generations, for the average lifespan of the Hebrews had shortened to 70 years by Moses' day (Ps. 90:10). This is comparable to today's lifespans, and one generation is classified as under 40 years—usually closer to 30 years.

G. The Incomplete Genealogy in Ruth 4

Could this 400-year time period of Gibeonite slavery have been less than 10 generations after Joshua's covenant with them, in fact, a mere five generations? I ask this seemingly preposterous biological question because David is listed as the tenth generation after Tamar and Judah (Ruth 4:18–22), yet only five generations after the era of Joshua. What are we to make of this evidence? Jephthah said that it had been 300 years from Joshua's conquest to his own day (Jud. 11:26). The only way to explain the genealogy of David—assuming that the genealogy of Ruth 4 is complete—is to assume that those born after Nahshon attained abnormally long lives, such as the 130 years of Jehoiada (II Chron. 24:15), and also to assume that they fathered the covenant-line sons remarkably late in life: close to age 100. These assumptions are highly improbable. It is therefore unlikely that this genealogy is complete. The listed line of Judah was Pharez, Hezron, Ram, Aminadab, and Nahshon. Nahshon was a contemporary of Moses (Num. 1:7). Thus, only four generations are listed in between Nahshon and David: Salmon, who married Rahab (Matt. 1:5), Boaz (who married Ruth), Obed, Jesse, and then David.

8. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1973), p. 65.

9. Idem.

The Bible provides additional internal evidence that the genealogy is incomplete. First, Abraham was considered unique in having fathered a son at age 100, yet he lived centuries before the normal human lifespan had shortened to age 70 (Ps. 90:10). There is no mention of three consecutive abnormally long lifespans in the period of the judges (conquest to kingship). This silence is important evidence, though not conclusive, which testifies against the completeness of the genealogy of Ruth 4.

Second, the lifespans of those in the tribe of Judah had been comparatively short: five generations, Pharez to Nahshon, compared to four for the tribe of Levi: Levi to Moses (Ex. 6:16–26). Are we to believe that, without warning, every subsequent male in this family line fathered a child around age 100, while everyone else's lifespans had shortened to 70 years? This seems unlikely. If there had been such a return to pre-conquest lifespans in this single family line, why doesn't the Bible give us some reason for it? Caleb's strength at age 85 was a miracle, as he understood (Josh. 14:9–11): God's special sustaining of a faithful man because of God's promise to him 40 years earlier (Num. 14:30).

Third, Salmon was at most 59 when Jericho fell. The exodus generation perished in the wilderness. This meant that at the time of the exodus, Salmon was not old enough to have been numbered as an adult. Since numbering of adult males took place at age 20 (Ex. 30:14), Salmon at most was 19 years old at the exodus. Add to this 40 years of wandering in the wilderness, and we get age 59. He married Rahab, who as a prostitute was probably at least 20 years old, and perhaps 30, at the time of the fall of Jericho. Did she give birth to Boaz 40 years later (age 99 for Salmon)? How old was she if she did wait 40 years to bear Boaz? Sixty? Seventy? And if Salmon was under age 19 at the time of the exodus, and fathered Boaz around age 100, 50 or 60 years after the fall of Jericho, then Rahab would have been that much older. This seems extremely unlikely. It is therefore difficult to reject the conclusion that there were numerous unlisted generations in between Salmon and Boaz. It would be emotionally convenient to believe in the long lifespan view, Salmon to Jesse, and therefore to accept the genealogy of Ruth 4 at face value, but the internal evidence from Scripture makes it difficult to accept. The highly specific revelation concerning the chronology of the judges (Jud. 11:26) is God's means of pointing to the literary nature of the post-Salmon genealogy. It would be difficult to argue that Jephthah erred by several centuries, when we are also told that there were 480 years between the exodus and the beginning of the construction of the temple (I Kings 6:1), which began around 1012 B.C.¹⁰ Only by ignoring I Kings 6:1, and by dating the exodus centuries later than the early 1400s—which so many compromising Christian authors have done—could we shorten the period of the judges to such an extent that the lifespans of the final five generations of the Ruth 4 genealogy could be made to fit.

If the genealogy in Ruth 4 is incomplete, what explanation can we offer? I think it is because the author of Ruth wanted to emphasize the ethical basis of David's elevation to the throne: the liberating "tenth generation" after the covenantal mark of bastardy began. (This is additional indirect evidence for Samuel as the author of Ruth.) The shortened genealogy is a literary device pointing to a theological conclusion: liberty and authority after 10 generations. The genealogy's very incompleteness testifies to the importance of the tenth generation after the imposition of the covenantal curse. It points to the temporary nature of a curse in history that lasts "forever." It therefore points to God's grace to those who are patient in righteous living.

Conclusion

The law of the levir died with the death of the Old Covenant in A.D. 70. That law governed family name in a nation that was defined by family name: Israel. Jacob/Israel had pronounced this prophecy: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). The tribes had to be separated until Shiloh arrived. He arrived, and Israel crucified Him. Within one generation, Israel and the law of the levir ceased to exist.

10. Chapter 17.

In the era of Boaz and Ruth, the law of the levir was in force. Boaz was the nearest of kin who accepted his moral—but not legal—obligation to his deceased kinsman to preserve his kinsman's name. He promised to have children with Ruth. By this, as it turned out, his own name was preserved in Israel.

CONCLUSION TO RUTH

So Boaz took Ruth, and she was his wife: and when he went in unto her, the LORD gave her conception, and she bare a son. And the women said unto Naomi, Blessed be the LORD, which hath not left thee this day without a kinsman, that his name may be famous in Israel. And he shall be unto thee a restorer of thy life, and a nourisher of thine old age: for thy daughter in law, which loveth thee, which is better to thee than seven sons, hath born him. And Naomi took the child, and laid it in her bosom, and became nurse unto it (Ruth 4:13–16).

Ruth testified to the power of a kinsman-redeemer to restore life. She was not speaking of Boaz. She was speaking of Obed. The son born in a levirate marriage was Naomi's hope for the future.

This may seem strange to Western Christians. This is because they do not understand the Old Covenant's concept of inheritance. Obed was part of the family line of Judah. Jacob had prophesied to his sons, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. 49:10). This was a messianic prophecy. Jesus was born in the covenant line of Boaz and Ruth. He fulfilled Jacob's prophecy.

The law of the levirate marriage twice sustained this covenant line: first, with Judah and Tamar; second, with Boaz and Ruth.

Ruth was a woman of great loyalty: to her husband's name, to her mother-in-law, and to God. "And Ruth said, Intreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God" (Ruth 1:16). She has come down through the ages as an example of loyalty. But Boaz was no less loyal: loyal to his kinsman's name in Israel. He served as the kinsman-redeemer. Jesus did the same.

It would be a mistake to see Ruth as a gold-digger who was after Boaz's money. It was Naomi, not Ruth, who initiated the plan to gain Boaz as Ruth's husband. What was her motive? From Ruth's testimonial to her, it appears that her motive was to gain an heir who would bear her husband's name. This was a legitimate goal under the Mosaic Covenant. Yet, in retrospect, Obed bore Boaz's name. Judicially, he was Mahlon's son, but in terms of the power of the story, he bore Boaz's name. Boaz's name appears in the genealogies of Jesus, not Elimlech's and not Mahlon's.

INTRODUCTION TO SAMUEL

And all Israel from Dan even to Beer-sheba knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the LORD (I Sam. 3:20).

Samuel was a prophet. Samuel also served as a judge of Israel. He was the last of the judges. He anointed both Saul and David to be kings.

The two books of Samuel tell the story of the transition from judgeship to kingship, from political decentralization to centralization. It was an era of growing disbelief in God and increasing belief in the state. When the people came to Samuel requesting a king, Samuel saw what this meant.

But the thing displeased Samuel, when they said, Give us a king to judge us. And Samuel prayed unto the LORD. And the LORD said unto Samuel, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them. According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt even unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken me, and served other gods, so do they also unto thee. Now therefore hearken unto their voice: howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them, and shew them the manner of the king that shall reign over them. And Samuel told all the words of the LORD unto the people that asked of him a king (I Sam. 8:6–10).

There is very little economic information in the two books. First Samuel tells of the decline of the priesthood under Eli's two sons (I Sam. 2:22–25) and the fall of the judgeship under Samuel's two sons (I Sam. 8:1–3).

It begins with the story of Samuel's miraculous birth. When his mother learned she was pregnant, she sang a song of great reversals in history. Winners lose, and losers win. Mary sang a similar song when she learned that she was pregnant (Luke 1:46–55).¹ God raises up some, and He pulls down others. Her message was clear: God is in charge; men are not.

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd

The priests of Philistia believed that God might possibly be in charge. They had suffered plagues because they had brought the Ark of the Covenant inside their borders. Inside the cities, the Ark was followed by plagues. They wanted to believe in chance, but they were forced to believe in God. Causation is in His hands.

Finally, there is the story of kingship. Samuel warned the people not to centralize power in this way. They would pay for this rebellion with higher taxes. The people paid no attention. People down through history have refused to listen to this warning.

12

THE GREAT REVERSAL

They that were full have hired out themselves for bread; and they that were hungry ceased: so that the barren hath born seven; and she that hath many children is waxed feeble. The LORD killeth, and maketh alive: he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. The LORD maketh poor, and maketh rich: he bringeth low, and lifteth up. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory: for the pillars of the earth are the LORD'S, and he hath set the world upon them (1 Sam. 2:5–8).

The theocentric principle here is the absolute sovereignty of God in history.

A. The God of the Covenant

This is Hannah's song of rejoicing after she handed over her toddler son Samuel to Eli the priest. Samuel's birth had been an answer to her prayer, for she had been barren for many years. Shortly after his birth, she made a vow: "I will bring him, that he may appear before the LORD, and there abide for ever" (1 Sam. 1:22b). She fulfilled her vow when he was a toddler. "Therefore also I have lent him to the LORD; as long as he liveth he shall be lent to the LORD. And he worshipped the LORD there" (1 Sam. 1:28). God received a positive rate of return on that borrowed asset. In his office as judge, Samuel changed Israel forever.

Hannah viewed God as the source of blessings and cursings. In her song of praise, she spoke of both. She spoke of great reversals in history. Those on top fall. Those on the bottom rise. This is all due to God's absolute control over history. Hannah's song was clearly the model for Mary's magnificat a millennium later (Luke 1:46–55).¹ This fundamental issue is inheritance: “He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory.” She had just given up her recent inheritance by giving her son to the church.

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd

This view of God’s control over history is based on the five-point biblical covenant. God is sovereign over history: point 1.² “The LORD killeth, and maketh alive: he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up.” He places men in the economic hierarchy. “The LORD maketh poor, and maketh rich: He bringeth low, and lifteth up.” Hierarchy is point 2.³ He brings sanctions: point 4.⁴ He secures the inheritance of the righteous: point five.⁵ The only point that is not explicitly affirmed in her song is point 3: law.⁶ But, because the song praises God for reversing the positions of those up high and those down low, it implicitly assumes that the deciding issue is ethics. God does not randomly push people up or down on the hierarchies of life. Her son, a judge, would spend his career declaring God’s law and announcing God’s historical sanctions.

As the God of the covenant, God arranges the flow of history in terms of His plan. His plan conforms to the covenant and confirms it. Moses said: “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁷ God is predictable. The affairs of the world are not random. They conform to His law and His decree.

There are times when good people are on the bottom. That had been her situation. Her husband’s other wife had borne children. She lorded it over Hannah. “And her adversary also provoked her sore, for to make her fret, because the LORD had shut up her womb. And as he did so year by year, when she went up to the house of the LORD, so she provoked her; therefore she wept, and did not eat” (I Sam. 1:6–7). Her husband attempted to comfort her. “Then said Elkanah her hus-

ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

3. Ibid., ch. 2. North, ch. 2.

4. Ibid., ch. 4. North, ch. 4.

5. Ibid., ch. 5. North, ch. 5.

6. Ibid., ch. 3. North, ch. 3.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

band to her, Hannah, why weepest thou? and why eatest thou not? and why is thy heart grieved? am not I better to thee than ten sons?" (I Sam. 1:8). The answer was clearly "no, you are not." But Hannah held her peace. She prayed for years. Then Eli the priest told her that God would grant her request (v. 17). God did.

Hannah did not sing praises of a God who intervenes only to bring positive sanctions. She praised the God who brings negative sanctions. Making things right for the illegitimately downtrodden means bringing the trodders low.

B. Sacrifice for the Kingdom's Sake

Hannah was more interested in the kingdom of God than in her role as a mother. She saw her role as a mother as covenantal. She gave Samuel to God. In terms of the Mosaic law, she had to tell her husband. He had the right to veto it by the end of the day.

And if she had at all an husband, when she vowed, or uttered ought out of her lips, wherewith she bound her soul; And her husband heard it, and held his peace at her in the day that he heard it: then her vows shall stand, and her bonds wherewith she bound her soul shall stand. But if her husband disallowed her on the day that he heard it; then he shall make her vow which she vowed, and that which she uttered with her lips, wherewith she bound her soul, of none effect: and the LORD shall forgive her (Num. 30:6–8).⁸

From what we learn of him here, Elkanah was a weak-willed man who was not in control of his household. He could not control one wife. He could not comfort the other. He went along with Hannah's vow. He surrendered his role as a father of Samuel. They had more children. "And Eli blessed Elkanah and his wife, and said, The LORD give thee seed of this woman for the loan which is lent to the LORD. And they went unto their own home. And the LORD visited Hannah, so that she conceived, and bare three sons and two daughters. And the child Samuel grew before the LORD" (I Sam. 2:20–21). We hear nothing of Elkanah again.

We do not know the names of her other children. They left no mark on Israel's historical record. The son she voluntarily surrendered into Eli's hands changed Israel and human history. He made David king, and through David came Jesus (Matt. 1:1).

8. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 16.

Hannah surrendered Samuel through gratitude for the immediate past and faith in the long-term future. She believed that God would make better use of Samuel in the household of Eli than in her own household. What mattered most to her was what use God would make of him. She placed the kingdom first and herself second. She did not know what the positive sanctions would be for her. She did not know of five more children to come. But she knew of God's sanctions in history, which are not random. God had intervened on her behalf. She intervened on His behalf. She did not have to make her vow. She lawfully could have kept him at home. God could have raised him up to be a judge in her husband's household. But she did not know that he would become a judge. She saw only that he would be more likely to serve God well in the sanctuary of a priest's household than her husband's.

She visibly testified to the fact that she understood that parents are to serve as God's agents of instruction for their children. Their social function is covenantal. "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it" (Prov. 22:6). She provided a tutor for her son: Eli the priest. Instead of bringing the tutor into her household, she sent her son into his household. She did not cling to any notion that the best teacher is always a child's parents. Parents have a God-given responsibility to train their children, but this responsibility can lawfully be delegated to a specialist.

Conclusion

Hannah's song, like Mary's, speaks of great reversals. The poor get rich. The rich get poor. There is no security in history other than God and His covenant. God is completely in control. "The LORD maketh poor, and maketh rich: he bringeth low, and lifteth up." Impersonal social forces are not sovereign. Impersonal biological forces are not sovereign. Neither nature nor nurture is sovereign. God, and God alone, is sovereign. This is the message of Hannah's song. It serves as a crucial foundation for Christian economics, Christian political science, Christian sociology, and Christian theology. Any attempt to substitute another concept of historical causation is a fist waved in the face of God. We find its refutation in Psalm 2, a psalm written by the man Samuel anointed as king.

13

THEORIES OF CAUSATION

Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them: And take the ark of the LORD, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold, which ye return him for a trespass offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go. And see, if it goeth up by the way of his own coast to Bethshemesh, then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us (I Sam. 6:7–9).

The theocentric principle here is the covenantal structure of historical causation.

A. A Pattern of Negative Sanctions

The Philistines had a problem. They had defeated the Israelites. Their victory had come despite the presence of the Ark of the Covenant inside the Israelite army. As a token of their victory, they brought the captured Ark inside the boundaries of Philistia.

Every time the Ark was brought into a Philistine city, disasters followed. In Ashdod, the leaders put the Ark in the same temple in front of the image of the local deity, Dagon. This image was found the next day bowing before the Ark. The priests put it upright again. The next morning, it was found bowing to the Ark, with its hands and head broken off. Meanwhile, people in the city were struck with hemorrhoids (I Sam. 5:1–6). They drew the correct conclusion: “And when the men of Ashdod saw that it was so, they said, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us: for his hand is sore upon us, and upon Dagon our god” (v. 7). The leaders decided that Gath should have the honor of being the residence for the Ark. They sent the Ark to Gath.

The people of Gath were immediately struck with hemorrhoids (v.

9). “Therefore they sent the ark of God to Ekron. And it came to pass, as the ark of God came to Ekron, that the Ekronites cried out, saying, They have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to us, to slay us and our people” (v. 10). The Ekronites had figured out cause and effect here. “So they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philistines, and said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again to his own place, that it slay us not, and our people: for there was a deadly destruction throughout all the city; the hand of God was very heavy there” (v. 11).

We see here the speeding up of assessment and decision-making. In Ashdod, it took at least two days. In Gath, it took one day. The Ekronites knew what would happen even before the Ark entered the city. They all drew the same conclusion: the hand of God was on them, and the Ark was the reason. They all adopted the same policy: send the Ark somewhere else.

Ekron’s leaders knew enough to recommend sending the Ark back to Israel. But the decision-makers hesitated. That would be an admission of defeat. It would mean that the military victory they had enjoyed was due to God, not to the strength of the gods of Philistia. The token of that military victory was the Ark itself.

Inside the boundaries of Philistia, the Ark was dangerous. Gentiles were not to approach it. Inside Israel, it was defended by three layers of defenders: the three clans of Levi. Merari defended the outer circle (Num. 4:32–33); Gershon defended the second circle (Num. 4:26–28); Kohath defended the inner circle (Num. 4:15).

Any violation of the Ark’s sacred boundaries by an unauthorized person, meaning an unsanctified person, was an act of sacrilege: a profanation. By bringing the Ark inside the boundaries of Philistia, the Philistines committed sacrilege. They profaned the Ark. So, city by city, the scourges came. Still, the leaders refused to do what the leaders of Ekron knew should be done: send the Ark back inside the boundaries of Israel.

And the ark of the LORD was in the country of the Philistines seven months. And the Philistines called for the priests and the diviners, saying, What shall we do to the ark of the LORD? tell us wherewith we shall send it to his place (I Sam. 6:1–2).

The priests still refused to face the problem squarely. So, they hedged their bets. On the one hand, they recommended a trespass offering: five gold pieces fashioned in the shape of hemorrhoids, one for each city (I Sam. 6:17). That would publicly announce to God that they knew who was behind their specific affliction. Also to be included were golden mice (v. 18). On the other hand, they proposed a test. The test was the cart and the undomesticated cattle. Take the cart and the cattle to the edge of the nation. Let it loose. See where the cattle take it. Normally, the cattle would go home. If they went into Israel, the Philistines could then logically conclude that God had been behind all of their afflictions.

B. Profaning the Ark

Inside the cities, the locals knew who was behind their afflictions. This is why they sent the Ark to the next city. But, outside the cities, the afflictions ceased. They dared to keep the Ark for seven months inside the land. The afflictions ceased or subsided because the Ark was being profaned less specifically. Why? Because each city had its own god. The closer the Ark was to the gods of a city, the more threatening the afflictions. This was the same in Israel. The closer to the Ark a person approached, the greater his risk of divine intervention against him. If he was allowed to pass across the various defensive barriers, the greater the threat to those doing the guarding.

The sons of Eli had been the examples. They had profaned the Ark. A prophet had warned Eli, their father.

Behold, the days come, that I will cut off thine arm, and the arm of thy father's house, that there shall not be an old man in thine house. And thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation, in all the wealth which God shall give Israel: and there shall not be an old man in thine house for ever. And the man of thine, whom I shall not cut off from mine altar, shall be to consume thine eyes, and to grieve thine heart: and all the increase of thine house shall die in the flower of their age. And this shall be a sign unto thee, that shall come upon thy two sons, on Hophni and Phinehas; in one day they shall die both of them. And I will raise me up a faithful priest, that shall do according to that which is in mine heart and in my mind: and I will build him a sure house; and he shall walk before mine anointed for ever (I Sam. 2:31–35).

So outraged was God at the sinful performance of these sacrilegious men that God allowed the nation to be defeated on the field of battle.

And the Philistines put themselves in array against Israel: and when they joined battle, Israel was smitten before the Philistines: and they slew of the army in the field about four thousand men. And when the people were come into the camp, the elders of Israel said, Wherefore hath the LORD smitten us to day before the Philistines? Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the LORD out of Shiloh unto us, that, when it cometh among us, it may save us out of the hand of our enemies. So the people sent to Shiloh, that they might bring from thence the ark of the covenant of the LORD of hosts, which dwelleth between the cherubims: and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were there with the ark of the covenant of God (I Sam. 4:2–4).

God was after the two sons. The nation had allowed them to continue as officiating priests. The nation was now paying for this refusal to defend the Ark. “And the Philistines fought, and Israel was smitten, and they fled every man into his tent: and there was a very great slaughter; for there fell of Israel thirty thousand footmen. And the ark of God was taken; and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were slain” (I Sam. 4:10–11).

Eli had known. He had warned them.

Now Eli was very old, and heard all that his sons did unto all Israel; and how they lay with the women that assembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. And he said unto them, Why do ye such things? for I hear of your evil dealings by all this people. Nay, my sons; for it is no good report that I hear: ye make the LORD’s people to transgress (I Sam. 2:20–24).

His warning did no good. “Notwithstanding they hearkened not unto the voice of their father, because the LORD would slay them” (25b). To slay them, God also slew thousands of Israelites. This, not the gods of Philistia, was why the Philistines had defeated Israel’s holy army. That army was not holy; it was profane. It had not defended the holiness of the Ark. It had violated it.

The Philistines became even more profane when they brought the Ark inside the nation’s boundaries and cities. They were suffering the consequences.

C. A Rigged Test

The leaders obeyed their priests.

And the men did so; and took two milch kine, and tied them to the cart, and shut up their calves at home: And they laid the ark of the LORD upon the cart, and the coffer with the mice of gold and the images of their emerods. And the kine took the straight way to the way of Beth-shemesh, and went along the highway, lowing as they went, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left; and the lords of the Philistines went after them unto the border of Beth-shemesh (I Sam. 6:10–12).

The rulers of the cities had already figured this out. For seven months, the leaders refused to do what the Ekronites knew had to be done: send the Ark back to Israel. They procrastinated. Why?

The priests still wanted to leave a theological escape hatch. If the Ark could be kept in the land safely, its presence would publicly testify to the victory of the gods of Philistia. The defeat of Israel would not be seen by the Philistines as God's judgment on Israel, with Philistia serving as His agent of wrath. That would identify Philistia as a kind of backdrop to the history of God's covenant with Israel.

That was what Philistia was. The priests suspected this, which is why they designed the test. But they wanted a way out of this public admission of second-place temporary status in history. This way out would be determined by cattle.

Modern science uses the science of statistics to identify causation. In subatomic physics, probability replaces causation. For atomic physics and everything else, there is an endless epistemological battle between those who regard deviations from randomness as the test of causation vs. those who affirm logic as the source of causation. This goes back to the rival schools of pre-Socratic philosophy: Heraclitus (randomness) vs. Parmenides (logic). This debate has never been resolved.

The priests of Philistia adopted a version of randomness: a pair of milk cows. Their calves were separated from them. Normally, the cows would follow their calves. If the cows, who had never before been yoked, headed back across the border into Israel, then causation was not chance-based. It was ordered.

The test was rigged. There was no chance involved. The cows would normally follow their calves. Unless their calves wandered into Israel, the cows would not wander into Israel. The test was rigged in favor of the gods of Philistia. The priests did not let the calves make the decision. Who knows? One might have stayed in Philistia, while the other went into Israel. That would be chance. Instead of flipping a coin—coins had not yet been invented—the priests could have let the calves decide the issue. The calves didn't.

Like loaded dice, like a rigged roulette wheel, or like marked cards, the test was rigged. It was stacked against the God of Israel. The priests talked chance, but they did not really believe in it. They believed in self-interest: in this case, the self-interest of a pair of cows. The test was designed to favor the cows' self-interest. But, just in case God really was in charge this time, it would cost the nation some of its gold reserves. That was what happened.

Conclusion

Unsophisticated covenant-breakers believe in impersonal chance and impersonal fate. The two concepts are opposed. Covenant-breakers believe in randomness and unbreakable natural law. The two concepts are opposed. Scientific covenant-breakers believe that everything flows (Heraclitus), but everything is amenable to the fixed logical categories of the human mind (Parmenides). The two concepts are opposed. Philosophical covenant-breakers believe in an ever-shifting balance between these rival concepts (dialecticism). This balance cannot be proven logically or demonstrated statistically.

The priests of Philistia talked chance and believed in a rigged test. They saw the golden hemorrhoids as a just-in-case fall-back position: a kind of national insurance policy against the possible existence of the God of the Bible. They believed that a pair of heifers would serve as the means of determining the sovereignty of the rival gods.

The cart went to the city of Beth-shemesh. There, the people looked into the Ark. The Philistines had known better than to do this. God killed 50,070 men (v. 19). The Hebrew word is "males." That made almost as many widows. Men had greater responsibility. They paid a heavier price. This was not random. There is no known disease that kills only adult males. Like the Philistines, they also offered to send the Ark to a different city. Kirjath-jearim accepted. There the Ark remained for two decades (I Sam. 7:2).

Then Samuel began to serve as a judge (v. 3). He led Israel against the Philistines, and Israel won (v. 11).

So the Philistines were subdued, and they came no more into the coast of Israel: and the hand of the LORD was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel. And the cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored to Israel, from Ekron even unto Gath; and the coasts thereof did Israel deliver out of the hands of the Philistines. And there was peace between Israel and the Amorites. And Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life (vv. 13–15).

14

TYRANNICAL TAXATION

And he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your oliveyards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants. And he will take the tenth of your seed, and of your vineyards, and give to his officers, and to his servants. And he will take your menservants, and your maidservants, and your goodliest young men, and your asses, and put them to his work. He will take the tenth of your sheep: and ye shall be his servants. And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king which ye shall have chosen you; and the LORD will not hear you in that day (I Sam. 8:14–18).

The theocentric principle here is God as the king of Israelite society. He collected an ecclesiastical tithe of rural land's agricultural output for the support of the Levites. A replacement king would demand a tithe on everything.

A. The Desire for Centralization

The Israelites had grown tired of rule by independent judges. The text tells us nothing about Samuel's rule from the day he led the Israelites to victory against Philistia until his old age, when he appointed his sons to serve as judges (I Sam. 8:1–7). "And his sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment. Then all the elders of Israel gathered themselves together, and came to Samuel unto Ramah, And said unto him, Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king to judge us like all the nations" (I Sam. 8:3–5).

The Israelites wanted to imitate the nations around them. They wanted a single representative civil ruler. They no longer wanted decentralized rule by judges. They wanted centralization. This was consistent with the history of the nation. They preferred a single voice of civil authority. "But the thing displeased Samuel, when they said, Give us a king to judge us. And Samuel prayed unto the LORD. And the LORD said unto Samuel, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them. According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt even unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken me, and served other gods, so do they also unto thee” (I Sam. 8:6–8).

God told Samuel to warn them of what would inevitably result from this centralization of civil power. “Now therefore hearken unto their voice: howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them, and shew them the manner of the king that shall reign over them” (I Sam. 8:9). Samuel then listed the evils that would come upon them. Among these were higher taxes.

B. A Tithe to the King

The king would raise taxes. The nation would pay him a tenth of their production (vv. 15, 17), along with forfeited capital: fields, vineyards, and olive orchards (v. 14). This would be in addition to whatever they were paying local civil magistrates. They did not care. The Israelites still wanted a king. Moses had prophesied this. “When thou art come unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me. . . .” (Deut. 17:14).

The Israelites had suffered in Egypt from centralized political tyranny. The Pharaoh of Joseph’s era extracted an income tax of 20% (Gen. 47:24–26).¹ This had been God’s judgment on Egypt. They worshipped a Pharaoh who claimed to be divine. God raised up Joseph to give the Egyptians a taste of tyranny. They would learn what a supposedly divine monarch could collect in a centralized political order. Samuel warned the Israelites of something similar. They did not care. “Nevertheless the people refused to obey the voice of Samuel; and they said, Nay; but we will have a king over us; That we also may be like all the nations; and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles” (I Sam. 8:19–20). They wanted a man to do battle in their name. God’s name was not enough. “And the LORD said to Samuel, Hearken unto their voice, and make them a king. And Samuel said unto the men of Israel, Go ye every man unto his city” (I Sam.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 35.

8:22).

The people were willing to pay a tenth of their income to a king. They were willing to pay one man far more than they paid the Levites. The Levites' tithe was a tenth of agricultural production. This compensated them for not possessing an inheritance in rural land. Members of the other tribes possessed more rural land than would have been the case had the Levites not been granted the tithe. In contrast, the king would take a tenth from everyone, city dwellers and country dwellers. He would take more than what an entire tribe received. The priesthood was supported by a tithe placed on only the Levites: one percent of Israel's rural output. The king would take a tenth. The kingship would be the most centralized institution in Israel.

What benefits would a king provide? Leadership in warfare, the people replied. What else? Nothing that the judges did not already provide. The judges provided civil justice. They provided this on a decentralized basis. People could move out of a judge's jurisdiction if he became corrupt, as Samuel's sons did. They could vote with their feet. They could not do this when a king took control of the court system and its enforcement.

A judge could not create international alliances based on marriage. The king could. Solomon later did. The women brought their foreign gods into the household of the king (I Kings 11). The Mosaic law prohibited this. "Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away" (Deut. 17:17a).

A king could accumulate the weapons of war, including horses and chariots. The Mosaic law prohibited this. "But he shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses: forasmuch as the LORD hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way" (Deut. 17:16).²

The people did not have to follow a judge into war. At least three of the tribes had refused to come when Deborah called them to assemble (Jud. 5:16–17). The tribes could not easily avoid a national war initiated by a king.

Conclusion

There is an innate desire in men to go to war. James wrote: "From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?" (James 4:1). The Israelites wanted a king like other nations. He would lead them into battle. They did not care about higher taxes. They did not care about kingly marital preferences. They wanted to be able to be proud about their nation's military prowess. For this, they needed a king. He needed taxes. They were ready to pay.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 42.

For the modern world to return to the taxation level of the Pharaoh in Joseph's day, governments would have to cut taxes and spending by at least 50% in the lower-tax industrial nations. They would have to cut by 75% to reach the tax level that Samuel warned against.

Voters may complain about high taxes, but they do not rebel. They do not replace high-tax politicians with low-tax politicians. They do not perceive that, after World War I began in 1914, the world moved into tax tyranny. The free nations are tax tyrannies by comparison with ancient Egypt or ancient anywhere. The voters do not perceive this, so conditioned are they by tax-funded education, which sings the praises of the modern welfare-warfare state.

Voters want centralization. They want to be proud of their chief national leader. God has assessed this preference and has found it wanting. "And ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations; and ye have said unto him, Nay, but set a king over us. Now therefore present yourselves before the LORD by your tribes, and by your thousands" (I Sam. 10:19).

Switzerland has the longest tradition of political freedom of any large modern nation. It has no national leader. It has a rotating president who possesses no independent power and departs after one year. There is no head of state. There is a decentralized citizen militia. The nation stays neutral in foreign wars. It does not start wars. It is rarely invaded. The last period of non-neutrality was under Napoleon (1798–1815). Hitler decided not to invade: too high a price, no strategic payoff, and a decentralized militia to fight in the mountains, where all bridges and tunnels would have been blown up as a defensive strategy. The national government announced in advance that any post-invasion announcement of a surrender should be ignored.³ The nation has been a tax haven. It is rich. The only people who are afraid of Switzerland are tax collectors in other nations.

3. Stephen P. Halbrook, Target Switzerland: Swiss Armed Neutrality in World War II (Rockville Centre, New York: Sarpedon, 1998), p. 95. See also his speech to the University Club of New York City, July 21, 1998. (<http://bit.ly/SwissWW2>)

CONCLUSION TO SAMUEL

As the last judge in Israel's history, Samuel departed gracefully. He knew that his rebellious sons had provoked the people to demand a king (1 Sam. 8:1–4). He knew that Israel was about to enter a time of greatness under David. But he also knew that the people had rejected God when they rejected the system of local judges.

The economic message of Samuel is that God is in total control in history. He arranges things according to His pleasure. He has given mankind laws and courts. If people are faithful, they will triumph, just as his mother had triumphed over his potential stepmother, just as he had replaced Eli's evil sons as the true heir of Eli. To the extent that he wrote of economic affairs, he declared the sovereignty of God, not as capricious, but as the law-giver and sanctions-bringer. When the people chose a king, they chose higher taxes.

INTRODUCTION TO KINGS AND CHRONICLES

And the king of Assyria did carry away Israel unto Assyria, and put them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes: Because they obeyed not the voice of the LORD their God, but transgressed his covenant, and all that Moses the servant of the LORD commanded, and would not hear them, nor do them (II Kings 18:11–12).

The books of Kings and Chronicles are mostly about God's historical sanctions, and these were mostly negative. The historical books from the kingship of Solomon to the two captivities are extensions of the books of Samuel. They manifested in history Samuel's warning to the Israelites against kings (I Sam. 8).¹ The Israelites never learned that what they believed and did would come back on them through their kings. When they rebelled, their kings rebelled. Late in Israel's pre-exilic history, on three occasions, they were given good kings. All three times, they continued to offer sacrifices in high places.² Because they committed liturgical evil in high places, rulers in high places did evil things to them. Finally, they were removed from Israelite kings. They were ruled by empires. It is worth noting that they never again returned to the worship of foreign gods. They never again worshipped in high places.

These historical books record the character of civil government under kings. They record the economic sanctions. Sometimes, there were positive economic sanctions. Most often, the sanctions were negative. Under Solomon, things went well. There was peace, prosperity,

1. Chapter 14.

2. "But the high places were not taken away: the people still sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places" (II Kings 12:3). "Save that the high places were not removed: the people sacrificed and burnt incense still on the high places" (II Kings 15:4). "Howbeit the high places were not removed: the people sacrificed and burned incense still in the high places. He built the higher gate of the house of the LORD" (II Kings 15:35).

and extensive foreign trade. But the blessings of God hardened Solomon in his evil ways: polygamy and polytheism. He took the blessings for granted. His son was to take high taxes for granted. Then he lost the kingdom in a revolt initiated by even higher taxes.

There were positive sanctions for prophets and those around them. Elijah lived on miraculous food (I Kings 17).³ Elisha knew the future well enough to make accurate forecasts of commodity prices (II Kings 6).⁴

The two books tell us that rulers, both civil and ecclesiastical, have their own agendas. Rulers pursue these agendas in the name of God.

No matter how many times God provided blessings to kings, they turned against Him. Then came cursings. Sometimes the people repented. Occasionally, the rulers repented. But the nation always returned to evil, like a dog to its vomit. "As a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly" (Prov. 26:11).

First and Second Chronicles offer almost no economic information that does not appear in the books of Kings. The first 10 chapters of First Chronicles provide a detailed genealogy of the tribes. These genealogies served as the basis of inheritance.

3. Chapter 21.

4. Chapter 26.

15

WISDOM AND WEALTH

And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thyself long life; neither hast asked riches for thyself, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies; but hast asked for thyself understanding to discern judgment; Behold, I have done according to thy words: lo, I have given thee a wise and an understanding heart; so that there was none like thee before thee, neither after thee shall any arise like unto thee. And I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, both riches, and honour: so that there shall not be any among the kings like unto thee all thy days (I Kings 3:11–13).

The theocentric principle here is God as the sanctions-bringer in history.

A. Rendering Judgment

Solomon recognized that his supreme task as king of Israel was to render judgment in disputes. He had to apply the Mosaic law to specific circumstances. Rendering judgment is point four of the biblical covenant.¹

His bad judgment had already begun. He did not perceive this. “And Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh king of Egypt, and took Pharaoh’s daughter, and brought her into the city of David, until he had made an end of building his own house, and the house of the LORD, and the wall of Jerusalem round about” (I Kings 3:1). This practice of marital alliances with covenant-breakers would undermine his kingdom by the end of his life.

That was not the limit of his defective judgment. He allowed false worship. “Only the people sacrificed in high places, because there was no house built unto the name of the LORD, until those days" (v. 2). The lack of a building was no excuse. It got worse. "And Solomon loved the LORD, walking in the statutes of David his father: only he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places" (v. 3). Step by step, his life of covenantal compromise had begun.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

God appeared to him in a dream. He asked Solomon what he wanted from God (v. 5). Solomon responded with an acknowledgment of God's role as the sanctions-bringer. "And Solomon said, Thou hast shewed unto thy servant David my father great mercy, according as he walked before thee in truth, and in righteousness, and in uprightness of heart with thee; and thou hast kept for him this great kindness, that thou hast given him a son to sit on his throne, as it is this day" (v. 6). David was righteous; he received God's mercy. This mercy involved placing Solomon on the throne. This was a matter of inheritance: point five.² If continued, Solomon's name would be established down through the ages, until Shiloh arrived (Gen. 49:10).

He then professed humility. "And now, O LORD my God, thou hast made thy servant king instead of David my father: and I am but a little child: I know not how to go out or come in" (v. 7). Compared to the task of rendering judgment for a nation, his abilities were too limited. He had already shown such lack of judgment. God knew.

"And the speech pleased the Lord, that Solomon had asked this thing" (v. 10). God then rewarded him with good judgment. He also granted him visible riches. He had not asked for riches. Solomon would become legendary for his wisdom and his wealth. The nation also grew wealthy.

There is a system of predictable sanctions in history. Adherence to biblical law produces external blessings. Solomon understood this. God then promised him long life. "And if thou wilt walk in my ways, to keep my statutes and my commandments, as thy father David did walk, then I will lengthen thy days" (v. 14).

Solomon responded with a liturgical act. "And he came to Jerusalem, and stood before the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and offered up burnt offerings, and offered peace offerings, and made a feast to all his servants" (v. 15). The text then tells the story of the two harlots and the living child. Solomon's threat to have the infant cut in half has come down through the ages as an example of his wisdom in rendering civil judgment. "And the king said, Bring me a sword. And they brought a sword before the king. And the king said, Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one, and half to the other” (vv. 24–25).

2. Ibid., ch. 5. North, ch. 5.

Let us be clear about what he did. He lied to the women and his guards. He had no intention of killing the child. The lie worked. The two women believed he would do this. The mother responded to this threat. “O my lord, give her the living child, and in no wise slay it.” So did the other woman. “Let it be neither mine nor thine, but divide it” (v. 26). She was motivated by envy: the desire to destroy the other woman’s child, even though this would not benefit her. Solomon recognized whose story was true.

God had given him the ability to render good judgment. “And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king; for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment” (v. 28). This soon made his kingship unique in Israel’s history.

So king Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches and for wisdom. And all the earth sought to Solomon, to hear his wisdom, which God had put in his heart. And they brought every man his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and garments, and armour, and spices, horses, and mules, a rate year by year (I Kings 10:23–25).

Conclusion

Solomon asked for wisdom. He needed it in two areas: marriage and liturgy. He never did escape these two flaws. The flaws grew much worse in his old age. He did not root them out while he still could. They undermined his kingdom.

He was a man of superb judgment regarding disputes between residents of Israel. It was self-judgment that was his weak link.

16

THE PRODUCTIVITY OF TRADE

Now therefore command thou that they hew me cedar trees out of Lebanon; and my servants shall be with thy servants: and unto thee will I give hire for thy servants according to all that thou shalt appoint: for thou knowest that there is not among us any that can skill to hew timber like unto the Sidonians. And it came to pass, when Hiram heard the words of Solomon, that he rejoiced greatly, and said, Blessed be the LORD this day, which hath given unto David a wise son over this great people (I Kings 5:6–7).

The theocentric principle that undergirds this passage is God's absolute sovereignty in acts of creation. He is not dependent on the creation. He is the source of the creation. This is an incommunicable attribute. Mankind does not possess this degree of sovereignty. Thus, men must cooperate in order to increase their productivity. They are dependent on the creation, including each other.

A. Wisdom, Trade, and Peace

Solomon's goal was to build God's house. God had been specific. He wanted a house of cedar (II Sam. 7:7). Cedars grew in Lebanon, a region controlled by Sidon. Solomon therefore had to enlist the cooperation of the Sidonians. The Sidonians were the recognized experts in cedar-based construction. They had long specialized in working with cedar. Sidon had a competitive advantage internationally in the construction of cedar-based structures.

When Solomon sought a trade arrangement with Hiram, Hiram gave this response. "My servants shall bring them down from Lebanon unto the sea: and I will convey them by sea in floats unto the place that thou shalt appoint me, and will cause them to be discharged there, and thou shalt receive them: and thou shalt accomplish my desire, in giving food for my household" (v. 9). There was a potential trade arrangement: cedars for food. Solomon accepted the offer (vv. 12–13).

1. Peace

The text provides crucially important information: “And the LORD gave Solomon wisdom, as he promised him: and there was peace between Hiram and Solomon; and they two made a league together” (v. 12). God gave Solomon wisdom. This wisdom led to a league of peace between the two men, which meant a league of peace between two nations.

Had the two nations been at war, there would not have been an open exchange of food for cedars. There might have been some surreptitious trade, but nothing that could be admitted publicly by either king.¹

It is often said that free trade reduces the likelihood of warfare between trading nations. This argument rests on a fundamental principle of economics: when costs increase, output is reduced. Free trade creates mutual dependence of residents in both nations. The cost of warfare rises when mutual dependence increases. Why? Because of losses sustained when the division of labor is reduced in both nations. Specialization declines. Therefore, output per unit of resource input declines. It is therefore cheaper for non-trading nations to go to war with each other than trading nations. Put differently, the price of war is higher for trading nations. As economics teaches, when prices rise, less is demanded. When the price of war increases, less war is demanded (other things being equal).

Solomon and Hiram made a league of peace. This was not a covenant. A covenant is established through a mutual oath under God. Israel was prohibited from making covenants with the city-states of Canaan (Ex. 23:31–33; 34:15; Deut. 7:2–4). Sidon was not inside Canaan, but it did not worship the same God. Therefore, no covenant between Hiram and Solomon was lawful biblically. On the other hand, there could be a peace treaty between the two kings. There could be economic exchange between the two nations. These arrangements could be abrogated lawfully by the two parties. Why? Because the league was not a covenant. It was not judicially comparable to a marriage.

1. During World War II, the central bankers of the warring nations met in neutral Switzerland at the Bank for International Settlements. They settled their accounts in gold, which was held in Switzerland. The leaders of all the warring nations knew about this, but these meetings were top secret. The public never found out until after the war ended. Even today, only a few people have ever heard this story. So crucial was the continuation of trade that both sides believed that monetary cooperation was vital for their respective war efforts. Anyway, their central bankers and commercial bankers believed this. Their opinion predominated. The BIS was in Basle, close to the German border. Axis influence was strong. Yet the president of the BIS was an American in the war years, despite the fact that the United States had not officially joined the BIS. It was a very strange arrangement. Gianni Toniolo and Piet Clement, Central Bank Cooperation at the Bank for International Settlements, 1930–1973 (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005), ch. 7.

2. Benefits

The story of Solomon and the king of Sidon is unique in the Old Testament. The senior representatives of two rival confessional kingdoms had respect for each other. Each was willing to please the other. Solomon paid for services rendered. Hiram delivered the goods for payment rendered. But the cooperation went beyond financial gain. Hiram knew that Solomon was building a house for a rival God. Solomon told him.

And, behold, I purpose to build an house unto the name of the LORD my God, as the LORD spake unto David my father, saying, Thy son, whom I will set upon thy throne in thy room, he shall build an house unto my name. Now therefore command thou that they hew me cedar trees out of Lebanon; and my servants shall be with thy servants: and unto thee will I give hire for thy servants according to all that thou shalt appoint: for thou knowest that there is not among us any that can skill to hew timber like unto the Sidonians. And it came to pass, when Hiram heard the words of Solomon, that he rejoiced greatly, and said, Blessed be the LORD this day, which hath given unto David a wise son over this great people (I Kings 5:5–7).

A foreign covenant-breaker understood the benefits of wisdom and civil justice. Moses had said this would happen.

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).²

The agreement between the two kings offered economic growth for both nations. Both kingdoms prospered economically. This raises a theological question: Does free trade and peace, both of which are biblical goals, mean that the kingdom of God and the kingdom of man grow together? Do both benefit? In other words, does biblical law subsidize the kingdom of man? If so, in what way? Why?

B. Contractual Equality, Covenantal Hierarchy

Hiram was the subordinate in this relationship. Solomon was acting on behalf of the God of the Bible. The cedars of Lebanon would grace the temple. Hiram would receive payment, but the wealth of Hiram's nation would serve to extend the perception that God is sovereign. God's house would reflect this sovereignty aesthetically. The temple would last long after the payment to Hiram would be consumed. "And Solomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheat for food to his household, and twenty measures of pure oil: thus gave Solomon to Hiram year by year" (v. 11).

In terms of the economic relationship between the two men, meaning the two societies, there was contractual equality. Each surrendered ownership of something in order to gain something. The exchanges were voluntary. Each believed he was better off after the exchanges than before. Had this not been the case, there would have been no further exchanges. People do not exchange goods and services in order to become worse off.

Yet despite the contractual equality between Solomon and Hiram, there was covenantal inequality. This inequality had to do with point five of the biblical covenant: succession.³ The temple would bind the Israelites together until the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam. The temple would bind Judah and Benjamin together thereafter. After the return from Babylon, the rebuilt temple became the central reference point for the Jews. The memory of the original temple provided continuity, both confessional and historical. There was no comparable continuity for Sidon.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

3. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2010), ch. 5.

This raises a fundamental difference between humanistic free market economic theory and Christian economic theory. Humanistic theory proposes no hierarchy of exchange. Neither party has legal authority over the other. Each party benefits. Neither party can be said to benefit more. Why not? Because, according to subjective value theory, it is impossible to compare interpersonal subjective value. This was first argued by Lionel Robbins. He denied that there can be scientifically valid interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. This is because there is no objective measure of subjective utility.⁴

In contrast, Christian economics assesses exchange in terms of the extension of the two kingdoms. The benefits of God's kingdom compound over time when society's members adhere to God's law (Deut. 28:1–14).⁵ The benefits gained by covenant-breakers are eventually squandered (Deut. 28:15–68) or else inherited by covenant-keepers. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).⁶

Thus, there is a hierarchy of authority in exchanges between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. The covenant-keeper is in a stronger position. This is because of inheritance and compounding. The inheritance of the covenant-breaker is cut short. “Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me” (Ex. 20:5). The inheritance of the covenant-keeper compounds. “And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments” (Ex. 20:6).⁷ The word “thousands” refers here to generations, not population size. “Know therefore that the LORD thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations” (Deut. 7:9).

Put a different way, humanistic economics examines exchange in terms of the plans of the participants. The analysis is future-oriented—teleological—with respect to expected individual benefits. Christian

4. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science (London: Macmillan, 1932), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

5. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 69.

6. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 40.

7. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 22.

economics adds an element of corporate teleology: the kingdom of God. Voluntary exchange is teleological with respect to covenantal individual exchange and covenantal corporate exchange. In covenantal individual exchange, both parties expect to benefit. There is no hierarchy of authority. In covenantal corporate exchange, there is a hierarchy. Covenant-keeping societies extend the kingdom of God at the expense of the kingdom of Mammon. Covenantal corporate exchange is ultimately a zero-sum activity. God profits in history at the expense of Satan and his covenantal adherents.⁸ God profits in eternity in the same way. So do His disciples.

Humanistic economists assume a level judicial playing field: equal protection of property, which includes the right of exchange. So do Christian economics. Humanistic economists deny the epistemological relevance of corporate teleology. Christian economists affirm it. The economic playing field is not level. God's kingdom has an advantage: long-term economic growth. This is attained through obedience to God's Bible-revealed law-order.

C. Who Won? Who Lost?

Solomon and Hiram were judicial equals when it came to exchange. They were not equals with respect to the outcome of their exchanges. Solomon had the upper hand. He acted on behalf of the kingdom of God: point two of the biblical covenant model.⁹

Hiram had what Solomon wanted: cedars of Lebanon. Solomon had what Hiram wanted: food. Each of them wanted these things as representatives of the residents of their respective nations. Representation is point two of the biblical covenant model. The two kings came to a mutually beneficial arrangement: cedars for food.

To make this arrangement work, they established a league of peace between themselves and therefore between the residents of the two nations. This was not a covenant established by a self-maledictory oath under God: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹⁰ This was a contract that supplemented the trade agreement. The residents gained peace because the two leaders established peace. The leaders established peace because they wanted a superior situation for those whom they represented.

8. I am assuming here that postmillennialism is true. Amillennialism necessarily implies that Satan's kingdom (civilization) in history prospers at the expense of God's kingdom. Premillennialism necessarily implies that this is true until Jesus comes again to set up His earthly kingdom.

9. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 2.

10. Ibid., ch. 4. North, ch. 4.

Hiram prospered. His people prospered. Yet the kingdom of God was benefitted more. After almost five centuries, God got His house. The Sidonians received food. There was greater continuity for God's house. Both nations prospered, but the Israelites prospered more than the Sidonians. We know this, because God imputed greater value to His house than to the Sidonians' bellies.

Go and tell my servant David, Thus saith the LORD, Shalt thou build me an house for me to dwell in? Whereas I have not dwelt in any house since the time that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt, even to this day, but have walked in a tent and in a tabernacle. In all the places wherein I have walked with all the children of Israel spake I a word with any of the tribes of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people Israel, saying, Why build ye not me an house of cedar? (II Sam. 7:5-7).

Conclusion

This analysis leads to a fundamental principle of Christian economics, one which is denied by humanistic economics: voluntary exchange between the members of the two kingdoms extends God's kingdom more than it extends man's kingdom. God's kingdom increases at the expense of man's kingdom. Trade is not a zero-sum economic activity for the participants. The exchanging parties benefit. But voluntary trade benefits the kingdom of God more than it benefits the kingdom of man, assuming only that the things traded are not morally corrupt. Although the kingdom of man expands its wealth, this is short-lived. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).¹¹

If premillennial and amillennial pastors were scrupulously honest with their congregations, they would preach the opposite view forthrightly and often, namely, that Satan will win in pre-Second Coming history because his representatives will win. This view leads to a conclusion: all economic exchanges with covenant-breakers contribute to the triumph of Satan's kingdom in history.

11. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 41.

THE BIBLE'S CRUCIAL DATE MARKER

And it came to pass in the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, in the month Zif, which is the second month, that he began to build the house of the LORD (I Kings 6:1).

This is an important date marker in the Bible. Without this reference and the parallel reference in First Chronicles, it would be much more difficult to establish biblical chronology. Biblical chronology is at war with the chronologies of the textbooks on ancient history. There is no escape from this war.¹

A. Nebuchadnezzar's Victory

To determine the year in which Solomon began building the temple, we must work backward from a date that we can narrow down to a two-year period: the fall of Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar. A widely accepted date is 586 B.C. The two other dates are 587 and 588. Most scholars choose either 586 or 587.² I have decided to choose 586, in deference to a seeming majority of specialized scholars.³

Ezekiel informs us that it was 390 years from the division of the monarchy under Rehoboam to the fall of Jerusalem.

Lie thou also upon thy left side, and lay the iniquity of the house of Israel upon it: according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie

1. I agree with Floyd Nolen Jones: biblical chronology is one of the three major battlefields of modern biblical warfare. The other two are higher criticism of biblical texts and Darwinian evolution. Jones, The Chronology of the Old Testament, 15th ed. (Green Forest, Arkansas: Green Leaf Press, 2005), pp. 7–8. I have relied on his book for the presentation in this chapter.

2. Herman H. Hoeh, "When Did Nebuchadnezzar Conquer Jerusalem?" (1976), edited by Paul Finch (2005). (<http://bit.ly/HoehDating>) upon it thou shalt bear their iniquity. For I have laid upon thee the years of their iniquity, according to the number of the days, three hundred and ninety days: so shalt thou bear the iniquity of the house of Israel (Ezek. 4:4–5).

3. Jones accepted this date: op. cit., p. 23.

Adding 390 to 586 gives us 976 B.C.⁴ That was the last year of Solomon's reign. Maybe we could argue 977 B.C. It does not matter for this chapter. We know from two passages that Solomon ruled 40 years.⁵ Adding 40 to 976, we get 1016 B.C. for the beginning of his reign. In the fourth year of his reign, he began to build the temple.

Then Solomon began to build the house of the LORD at Jerusalem in mount Moriah, where the LORD appeared unto David his father, in the place that David had prepared in the threshingfloor of Ornan the Jebusite. And he began to build in the second day of the second month, in the fourth year of his reign (II Chron. 3:1–2).

Subtracting four years from 1016, we get 1012 B.C. This is the anchor date.

First Kings 6:1 is specific: the exodus took place 480 years before. Adding 480 years to 1012, we get 1492 B.C. as the date of the exodus, give or take a few years, depending on the date of the fall of Jerusalem and the dating by month of Solomon's coronation. Again, this variation matters little.

B. Abraham's Covenant

Paul wrote that it was 430 years from God's covenant with Abraham to the exodus. "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect" (Gal. 3:17). That identifies the date of the covenant: 1922 B.C.

Here is a problem. Which covenant was Paul referring to? There was the promise given to Abraham when God changed Abram's name to Abraham (Gen. 17). There was an earlier promise, when God told

4. Jones said it should be 975 B.C. Why? He said this: "inclusive numbering minus 1." dem. My view is that if an author does not precisely explain what he is talking about—"inclusive numbering minus 1"—the reader is entitled to conclude "case not proven." Chalk it up to the reader's ignorance. If an author is not clear, his reader is entitled to his ignorance. The text says 390. I stick with the text.

5. "And the time that Solomon reigned in Jerusalem over all Israel was forty years" (I Kings 11:42). "And Solomon reigned in Jerusalem over all Israel forty years" (II Chron. 9:30).

Abram that he would have heirs, and these heirs would return to conquer Canaan in the fourth generation (Gen. 15:16).⁶ The earlier promise came 14 years before God renewed His covenant with Abram. He was 99 years old at that time (Gen. 17:1). He was 86 when Hagar bore Ishmael (Gen. 16:16). He was therefore 85 when God made the first covenant with Abram.

I believe that Paul was referring to the initial covenant. Why? Because this was the initial reference involved the promise of seed. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. 3:16). But Genesis 17 also mentions seed. Genesis 15 has promise of inheritance of land in the fourth generation. This was the exodus and conquest. But, more important theologically, is this crucial verse: "And he believed in the LORD; and he counted it to him for righteousness" (Gen. 16:6). This is the passage Paul quotes. "Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness" (Gal. 3:6). The context of Paul's remarks was the initial covenant, not the renewed covenant 14 years later.

The date of this covenant was 1922 B.C. How long had Abram been in Canaan when Ishmael was conceived? A decade. "And Sarai Abram's wife took Hagar her maid the Egyptian, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan, and gave her to her husband Abram to be his wife" (Gen. 16:3). So, the date of Abram's entry into Canaan was 1932 B.C.

Abram did not leave Haran until his father Terah died.

And the days of Terah were two hundred and five years: and Terah died in Haran. Now the LORD had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee (Gen. 11:32–12:1).

Abram obeyed. "So Abram departed, as the LORD had spoken unto him; and Lot went with him: and Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran" (Gen. 12:4).

Terah was born 205 years before Abram went to Canaan: 1932 + 205 = 2137 B.C. From this point on, dating Noah's Flood is duck soup. The chronology of Genesis 11 is the most precise in the Bible.

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

C. Genesis 11

Because people usually ignore genealogies in the Bible, I reproduce it here.

These are the generations of Shem: Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the flood (v. 10).

And Shem lived after he begat Arphaxad five hundred years, and begat sons and daughters (v. 11).

And Arphaxad lived five and thirty years, and begat Salah (v. 12).

And Arphaxad lived after he begat Salah four hundred and three years, and begat sons and daughters (v. 13).

And Salah lived thirty years, and begat Eber (v. 14).

And Salah lived after he begat Eber four hundred and three years, and begat sons and daughters (v. 15).

And Eber lived four and thirty years, and begat Peleg (v. 16).

And Eber lived after he begat Peleg four hundred and thirty years, and begat sons and daughters (v. 17).

And Peleg lived thirty years, and begat Reu (v. 18).

And Peleg lived after he begat Reu two hundred and nine years, and begat sons and daughters (v. 19).

And Reu lived two and thirty years, and begat Serug (v. 20).

And Reu lived after he begat Serug two hundred and seven years, and begat sons and daughters (v. 21).

And Serug lived thirty years, and begat Nahor (v. 22).

And Serug lived after he begat Nahor two hundred years, and begat sons and daughters (v. 23).

And Nahor lived nine and twenty years, and begat Terah (v. 24).

This is the most detailed genealogy in the Bible. It is the only genealogy that provides the ages of fathers at the birth of the sons in Abraham's covenant line. This genealogy does not allow any wiggle room for those who want to discover long ages of gaps in the genealogy. There are no gaps. Adding the ages of each father, plus two years from Arphaxad to the Flood, we get 222 years from the Flood to the birth of Terah. Then we add this to 2137 B.C. We get 2359 B.C. as the date of Noah's Flood. Wiggle room: the date of the fall of Jerusalem (two years), the date of Solomon's death (one year), the date he began the temple (part of one year), and the date of the relevant Abrahamic covenant (14 years).

D. The Inescapable War Over Chronology

Think through a few of the implications of this date. In every world history book, we are told of events that happened earlier than 2359 B.C. We are told of great civilizations that built cities. We are told of the bronze age and the stone age. We are told of cave paintings on walls drawn by people 30,000 years before Christ.

The Bible says all of these estimates are wrong.

There is very little chronological wiggle room for people who say that they believe that the Genesis account is accurate. If that account is accurate, then the three sons of Noah began the re-population of the earth no earlier than 2359 B.C. There was no other surviving family. We know this because of the renewed covenant between God and Noah. It recapitulated the covenant God made with Adam.

And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth. And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea; into your hand are they delivered. Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things (Gen. 9:1–3).⁷

This was God's covenant renewal with the biological and covenantal replacements of Adam and Eve: the sons of Noah and their wives. It was a representative covenant that still applies to all of Noah's heirs. The races of mankind came later, probably shortly after the tower of Babel, less than two centuries later. God altered the genetic inheritances of mankind. This was not some slow evolutionary process. This was done within a two-century period. The science of genetics is governed by a chronology. Which chronology? The Bible's or Darwinism's?

The cultures of the world are less than 5,000 years old.

7. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 18.

This means that Christians must do the research necessary to re-write history and archeology, with this goal in mind: to discover the overlapping accounts in what appear to be sequential genealogies of ancient kings. They must also find another way to categorize the sequence of civilizations (meaning overlaid mounds of broken pottery and rusted tools) besides stone, bronze, and iron.

The world history textbooks published by Christian fundamentalist textbook publishers do not alert their young readers to this problem. They tell readers about the Egyptians, who supposedly built pyramids in 5000 B.C. It is as if the authors had never read Genesis 11. They suffer from intellectual schizophrenia: a two-chronologies timeline.

Almost no one in Christian academia wants to begin train up generations of historians and archaeologists who understand the war over chronology and who are ready to get involved. History teachers remain silent. They do not suggest research paradigms to unravel the enigmas of non-biblical chronologies. They should point to retired chemistry professor Donovan Courville's self-published book, The Exodus Problem and Its Ramifications (1971) as a model of what needs to be done. They are unaware of the book.

This game of let's pretend does Christianity no good.

Conclusion

Economic growth and population growth took place far more rapidly than the humanist chronologies suggest. Between the birth of Arphaxad sometime around 2357 B.C. and the exodus in approximately 1492 B.C., population grew so rapidly that the Israelites departed from Egypt with about 2.5 million people, leaving behind a larger Egyptian population that had enslaved this huge population.⁸

The Israelites moved into a region so densely populated that it took seven years for the Israelites to conquer Canaan partially.

And because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them, and brought thee out in his sight with his mighty power out of Egypt; To drive out nations from before thee greater and mightier than thou art, to bring thee in, to give thee their land for an inheritance, as it is this day (Deut. 4:37–38).

8. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 1.

Now it came to pass, when Adoni-zedek king of Jerusalem had heard how Joshua had taken Ai, and had utterly destroyed it; as he had done to Jericho and her king, so he had done to Ai and her king; and how the inhabitants of Gibeon had made peace with Israel, and were among them; That they feared greatly, because Gibeon was a great city, as one of the royal cities, and because it was greater than Ai, and all the men thereof were mighty (Josh. 10:1–2).

This does not deal with China, India, Southeast Asia, Mesoamerica, and all the other people's of the earth in 1492 B.C.

There is lots of academic work to be done, or else lots of compromises to be made with the doctrine of biblical infallibility. The six-day creation movement has ignored this historiographical challenge. Its defenders have imagined that this battle over chronology is confined to biology, geology, paleontology, and astrophysics. They have steadfastly avoided asking chronological questions with respect to civilizations.

Immanuel Velikovsky recognized that astronomy and ancient chronology are intertwined. He sought a scientific answer to the origin of the solar system: Worlds in Collision (1950). He found it, he believed, in the chronology and descriptive account of the exodus: Ages in Chaos (1952). He attempted to reconstruct ancient chronology and astrophysics. He remained a fringe figure and outcast for all of his academic career.⁹ That is the necessary price. He is to be applauded for his attempt.

Choose this day which chronology you will serve.

9. Alfred de Grazia (ed.), The Velikovsky Affair (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, 1966). (<http://bit.ly/VelikovskyAffair>)

A PRAYER INVOKING GOD'S SANCTIONS

And Solomon stood before the altar of the LORD in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and spread forth his hands toward heaven: And he said, LORD God of Israel, there is no God like thee, in heaven above, or on earth beneath, who keepest covenant and mercy with thy servants that walk before thee with all their heart (I Kings 8:22–23).

So begins Solomon's remarkable prayer. The temple had been completed (I Kings 7:51). The nation had been assembled in Jerusalem (I Kings 8:1). The Ark of the Covenant had been delivered to the temple (v. 4). God's glory had filled the temple (v. 10). Solomon reminded God of what he has done. "I have surely built thee an house to dwell in, a settled place for thee to abide in for ever" (v. 13). He has reminded the people that God raised up David, and God promised David that his son would build the temple (v. 20). God has brought this to pass (v. 21). Then he began his prayer. "And Solomon stood before the altar of the LORD in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and spread forth his hands toward heaven" (v. 22).

His prayer had these aspects: praise of God as unique; the God of the covenant and mercy (v. 23); the god of Israel (v. 24). This God dwells in heaven, which cannot contain Him (v. 27). Yet He will dwell in this house. "That thine eyes may be open toward this house night and day, even toward the place of which thou hast said, My name shall be there: that thou mayest hearken unto the prayer which thy servant shall make toward this place" (v. 29). Solomon then offered himself as a representative of the people: "And hearken thou to the supplication of thy servant, and of thy people Israel, when they shall pray toward this place: and hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place: and when thou hearest, forgive" (v. 30). He then prayed to God to respect the prayers of the Israelites.

A. Final Court of Appeal

When rivals swore civil oaths in a court, judges could not decide who was telling the truth. God had to decide.

If any man trespass against his neighbour, and an oath be laid upon him to cause him to swear, and the oath come before thine altar in this house: Then hear thou in heaven, and do, and judge thy servants, condemning the wicked, to bring his way upon his head; and justifying the righteous, to give him according to his righteousness (vv. 31–32).

There are limits on men's knowledge. There are none on God's knowledge. Men render imperfect judgment. God renders perfect judgment. Solomon invoked God as the supreme Judge. God had to intervene to separate the criminal from the victim. Solomon implored God to intervene in history and impose sanctions in terms of the truth.

This points to an appeals court that lies beyond the final earthly court. A court outside of history assesses history. It then imposes sanctions in history.

The existence of this court provides covenant-keeping man with hope in perfect judgment. He need not fret when covenant-breakers prosper in their wickedness. He can go about his business, knowing that God will sort out all claims perfectly.

Solomon did not call on God to restrict His judgment to eternity. He called on God to intervene in history. He believed that history is not autonomous. He saw a correspondence between evil and negative sanctions, between righteousness and positive sanctions. He saw the world as under God's law and God's predictable sanctions. He called on God to make these visible sanctions even more predictable.

B. Captivity and Return

When the nation sins and is carried off, Solomon prayed, do not leave it in a foreign land.

When thy people Israel be smitten down before the enemy, because they have sinned against thee, and shall turn again to thee, and confess thy name, and pray, and make supplication unto thee in this house: Then hear thou in heaven, and forgive the sin of thy people Israel, and bring them again unto the land which thou gavest unto their fathers (vv. 33–34).

Moses had warned them that God would deal with them as Canaanites if they followed the gods of Canaan.

And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:19–20).¹

Moses had prophesied that there would come such a day.

That then the LORD thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the LORD thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: And the LORD thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers (Deut. 30:3–5).²

Solomon realized that this will come true, and He asked God to honor His word that Moses had given to the conquest generation.

C. Meteorological Sanctions

There are negative sanctions imposed by nature. Solomon recognized this and implored God to honor His covenant law.

When heaven is shut up, and there is no rain, because they have sinned against thee; if they pray toward this place, and confess thy name, and turn from their sin, when thou afflictest them: Then hear thou in heaven, and forgive the sin of thy servants, and of thy people Israel, that thou teach them the good way wherein they should walk, and give rain upon thy land, which thou hast given to thy people for an inheritance (vv. 35–36).

Moses had warned them about this. The Promised Land would remain a covenantal agent. God used hornets to drive out the Canaanites (Deut. 7:20; Josh. 24:12). He would use nature to plague the people if they committed similar abominations.

Take care, Moses said, “That the land spue not you out also, when

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

2. Ibid., ch. 72.

ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you” (Lev. 18:28).³ “Ye shall therefore keep all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: that the land, whither I bring you to dwell therein, spue you not out” (Lev. 20:22).⁴ The land would become their enemy.

The goal of these negative sanctions was national repentance.

If there be in the land famine, if there be pestilence, blasting, mildew, locust, or if there be caterpillar; if their enemy besiege them in the land of their cities; whatsoever plague, whatsoever sickness there be; What prayer and supplication soever be made by any man, or by all thy people Israel, which shall know every man the plague of his own heart, and spread forth his hands toward this house: Then hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place, and forgive, and do, and give to every man according to his ways, whose heart thou knowest; (for thou, even thou only, knowest the hearts of all the children of men;) That they may fear thee all the days that they live in the land which thou gavest unto our fathers (vv. 37–40).

D. The Stranger in the Gates

Solomon prayed on behalf of the covenantal stranger.

Moreover concerning a stranger [nokree], that is not of thy people Israel, but cometh out of a far country for thy name's sake; (For they shall hear of thy great name, and of thy strong hand, and of thy stretched out arm;) when he shall come and pray toward this house; Hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for: that all people of the earth may know thy name, to fear thee, as do thy people Israel; and that they may know that this house, which I have builded, is called by thy name (vv. 41–43).

The strangers would come and had come. The Mosaic law was a tool of evangelism.

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).⁵

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 10.

4. Ibid., ch. 21.

E. The God of Battle

There would be wars, Solomon knew. Israel's defender was God.

If thy people go out to battle against their enemy, whithersoever thou shalt send them, and shall pray unto the LORD toward the city which thou hast chosen, and toward the house that I have built for thy name: Then hear thou in heaven their prayer and their supplication, and maintain their cause (vv. 44–45).

This was a unique reference to the need of the God's holy army to pray toward Jerusalem. When they obey, Solomon implored God, answer their prayer. Give them victory. For the God of historical sanctions, this is easy. Solomon expected this. He believed that historical causation is based on covenantal law.

He repeated his invocation of protection if the nation is carried out of the land (vv. 46–47). “And so return unto thee with all their heart, and with all their soul, in the land of their enemies, which led them away captive, and pray unto thee toward their land, which thou gavest unto their fathers, the city which thou hast chosen, and the house which I have built for thy name” (v. 48). Why should God do this? “For they be thy people, and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest forth out of Egypt, from the midst of the furnace of iron” (v. 51). He is the God of the covenant. They are the people of this covenant. “For thou didst separate them from among all the people of the earth, to be thine inheritance, as thou spakest by the hand of Moses thy servant, when thou broughtest our fathers out of Egypt, O Lord GOD” (v. 53).

Conclusion

Solomon publicly prayed to God, invoking covenant sanctions. He affirmed his faith that the God of the covenant is reliable. The negative corporate sanctions to come would be in terms of His law and its sanctions. Similarly, the deliverance of Israel would be based on His law and its sanctions. These sanctions were grounded in His mercy. Prayer was required, Solomon implied, to gain the benefits of the covenant. So, he ended his prayers with a final supplication, one based on the demonstrated reliability of God's promises.

5. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

And he stood, and blessed all the congregation of Israel with a loud voice, saying, Blessed be the LORD, that hath given rest unto his people Israel, according to all that he promised: there hath not failed one word of all his good promise, which he promised by the hand of Moses his servant. The LORD our God be with us, as he was with our fathers: let him not leave us, nor forsake us: That he may incline our hearts unto him, to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his statutes, and his judgments, which he commanded our fathers.

And let these my words, wherewith I have made supplication before the LORD, be nigh unto the LORD our God day and night, that he maintain the cause of his servant, and the cause of his people Israel at all times, as the matter shall require: That all the people of the earth may know that the LORD is God, and that there is none else. Let your heart therefore be perfect with the LORD our God, to walk in his statutes, and to keep his commandments, as at this day (vv. 55–61).

God heard his prayer. “And the LORD said unto him, I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication, that thou hast made before me: I have hallowed this house, which thou hast built, to put my name there for ever; and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually” (I Kings 9:3).

FEEDBACK LOOPS

And they brought every man his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and garments, and armour, and spices, horses, and mules, a rate year by year. And Solomon gathered together chariots and horsemen: and he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, and with the king at Jerusalem (I Kings 10:25–26).

The theocentric principle governing this passage is God as the defender of His covenant and its people.

A. Laws of Kingship

Moses in Deuteronomy 17 laid down laws governing kings of Israel. This was before there was a king in Israel, other than God. God regarded it as a rejection of His kingship when the people told Samuel to anoint a king. “And the LORD said unto Samuel, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them” (I Sam. 8:7). Still, God provided guidelines for kings. The people could judge a king’s performance by how well he adhered to these laws.

When thou art come unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me; Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the LORD thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee: thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother. But he shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses: forasmuch as the LORD hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way. Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away: neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold (Deut. 17:14–17).¹

More than any other king in Israel's history, Solomon violated these laws. He was the richest king. He had the least trouble with foreign wars. Yet he assembled a huge fighting force. He trusted in chariots. This was sin. "When thou goest out to battle against thine enemies, and seest horses, and chariots, and a people more than thou, be not afraid of them: for the LORD thy God is with thee, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt" (Deut. 20:1). Solomon did not believe this. "And Solomon gathered together chariots and horsemen: and he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, and with the king at Jerusalem" (I Kings 10:26).

There were actually cities devoted to chariots. "And all the cities of store that Solomon had, and cities for his chariots, and cities for his horsemen, and that which Solomon desired to build in Jerusalem, and in Lebanon, and in all the land of his dominion" (I Kings 9:19). He had a business of importing and exporting chariots. "And a chariot came up and went out of Egypt for six hundred shekels of silver, and an horse for an hundred and fifty: and so for all the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, did they bring them out by their means" (v. 29). The passage in Second Chronicles makes it clear that this was a business. "And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn: the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price. And they fetched up, and brought forth out of Egypt a chariot for six hundred shekels of silver, and an horse for an hundred and fifty: and so brought they out horses for all the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, by their means" (II Chron. 1:16–17).

B. Wealth Accumulation

Solomon accumulated gold. He could not get enough gold.

And Hiram sent in the navy his servants, shipmen that had knowledge of the sea, with the servants of Solomon. And they came to Ophir, and fetched from thence gold, four hundred and twenty talents, and brought it to king Solomon (I Kings 9:27–28).

And she gave the king an hundred and twenty talents of gold, and of spices very great store, and precious stones: there came no more such abundance of spices as these which the queen of Sheba gave to king Solomon (I Kings 10:10).

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 42.

Now the weight of gold that came to Solomon in one year was six hundred threescore and six talents of gold (I Kings 10:14).

And all king Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold, and all the vessels of the house of the forest of Lebanon were of pure gold; none were of silver: it was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon (I Kings 10:21).

He was obsessed with gold. He could have lowered taxes. He could have given away the gold brought to him by other kings and the queen of Sheba. But he played the role of pagan king, and pagan kings were expected to own gold.

He knew God's law. There is no indication that he did not follow these Mosaic rules governing kings.

And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites: And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the LORD his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them: That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left: to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel (Deut. 17:18–20).²

His problem was that he did not apply what he read to his own circumstances.

C. Self-Government Under God

There was no higher civil authority than the king within the borders of Israel. Kings outside Israel did not want to fight Solomon. More likely, they wanted to meet him. Word of his wealth and wisdom had spread. Among kings, he was a celebrity.

This made it imperative that Solomon place himself under the law of God. He would have to judge his own actions by the terms of God's law. If he failed to do this, there was no civil agency higher than the king that could bring negative sanctions against him. This placed him outside the normal boundaries. A prophet could challenge him, but none did. The priesthood could challenge him, but it never did. God allowed him free rein to test him. At the end of his life, he failed the test. He did not subject himself to the Mosaic law's rules for kings.

2. Ibid., ch. 14:G.

D. Sanctions

The sanctions were seemingly positive: fame, fortune, and women. He was universally acclaimed. This placed him in a dangerous condition. Because the sanctions were positive, they served as a positive feedback loop. The more he received, the more he pursued evil. By accumulating forbidden wealth, he became enmeshed in a perverse feedback loop. The positive sanctions encouraged him to ever-greater violations of the law governing kings.

The Mosaic law did not forbid other men from accumulating gold and silver. They did not possess civil power. Their wealth was not a threat to the nation. A king's wealth was, for it persuaded him that he was doing all the right things. The Mosaic law established a unique, historically unprecedented set of restrictions on kings. The Mosaic law warned kings not to accumulate what in private life would not be prohibited. A citizen is surrounded by restraints. A king is not. A successful king accumulates wealth as a sign of his success. "If you've got it, flaunt it!"³ The centralization of power is a threat to the nation, both internally and internationally. Wealth attracts enemies, as Hezekiah's successors learned to their dismay.

At that time Berodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present unto Hezekiah: for he had heard that Hezekiah had been sick. And Hezekiah hearkened unto them, and shewed them all the house of his precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour, and all that was found in his treasures: there was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominion, that Hezekiah shewed them not.

Then came Isaiah the prophet unto king Hezekiah, and said unto him, What said these men? and from whence came they unto thee? And Hezekiah said, They are come from a far country, even from Babylon. And he said, What have they seen in thine house? And Hezekiah answered, All the things that are in mine house have they seen: there is nothing among my treasures that I have not shewed them. And Isaiah said unto Hezekiah, Hear the word of the LORD.

3. The phrase comes from the comedy film, The Producers (1967, 2005).

Behold, the days come, that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store unto this day, shall be carried into Babylon: nothing shall be left, saith the LORD. And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away; and they shall be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon (II Kings 20:12–18).

He, too, accumulated gold and silver for himself. “And Hezekiah had exceeding much riches and honour: and he made himself treasures for silver, and for gold, and for precious stones, and for spices, and for shields, and for all manner of pleasant jewels” (II Chron. 32:27). Great wealth was a snare to both Solomon and Hezekiah. God’s judgment on Hezekiah and the nation resulted in the destruction of the temple that Solomon had built. The accumulated gold was inherited by the Babylonian Empire. Yet this took place over a century after Hezekiah conducted his grand tour.

God did impose some negative sanctions. God raised up Hadad the Edomite to trouble Solomon (I Kings 11:14). He also raised up Rezon, who reigned over Syria. This man troubled Solomon all of Solomon’s life (I Kings 11:23–25). But these were minor annoyances, not a direct threat to his kingship.

Conclusion

Solomon’s visible success led to his downfall. This became clear to all through his son’s downfall, which permanently ended David’s kingly line in a united nation. Solomon suffered from an exclusively positive feedback loop. He was not wise enough or morally strong enough to follow the Mosaic laws that governed kings. He broke these laws, yet the positive sanctions kept increasing. They ensnared him. The older he got, the less self-governed he became. He became a tool of his multiple wives. He became a polytheist, following their gods as well as Israel’s God.

His son forfeited both the kingship and his father’s wealth.

The division of the kingdom weakened Judah militarily. “And it came to pass in the fifth year of king Rehoboam, that Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem: And he took away the treasures of the house of the LORD, and the treasures of the king’s house; he even took away all: and he took away all the shields of gold which Solomon had made” (I Kings 14:25–26). Second Chronicles adds this of the rulers of Judah: “Nevertheless they shall be his servants; that they may know my service, and the service of the kingdoms of the countries” (II Chron. 12:8). God would teach them a lesson—the same lesson that He had been teaching Israel from the days of the judges. They would find no tender mercies under foreign kings and foreign gods.

Solomon had accumulated gold as a steward of God. God transferred it to a covenant-breaking steward: Shishak. Better that a covenant-breaker should get positive feedback than a nation which had defied God through a king with too many wives, too many chariots, and too much gold. Only for David’s sake did Solomon get away with all this.

Wherefore the LORD said unto Solomon, Forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant. Notwithstanding in thy days I will not do it for David thy father’s sake: but I will rend it out of the hand of thy son. Howbeit I will not rend away all the kingdom; but will give one tribe to thy son for David my servant’s sake, and for Jerusalem’s sake which I have chosen (I Kings 11:11–13).

Rehoboam was disinherited by God for his own bad judgment. But that bad judgment was the context of God’s judgment against his father. The Mosaic Covenant’s negative feedback loop reappeared with a vengeance.

20

TAX REVOLT

And spake to them after the counsel of the young men, saying, My father made your yoke heavy, and I will add to your yoke: my father also chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions (I Kings 12:14).

This theocentric focus of this passage is the sovereignty of God in bringing His word to pass.

Because Solomon had married 700 wives and kept 300 concubines (I Kings 11:3), he was led astray to worship other gods (v. 4). God had warned future kings of Israel about this. “Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away: neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold” (Deut. 17:17). God therefore told Solomon that his kingdom would not persevere.

Wherefore the LORD said unto Solomon, Forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant. Notwithstanding in thy days I will not do it for David thy father’s sake: but I will rend it out of the hand of thy son (I Kings 11:11–12).

Rehoboam would surely lose the kingdom. God did not say how or why, only that it would inevitably take place. It took place because of high taxes.

A basic principle of economics is this: at a higher price, less is demanded. This includes civil government. If taxes go too high in relation to perceived benefits, people resist paying. They want less civil government.

Immediately after the people made Rehoboam king (I Kings 12:1), a delegation came to him (v. 3). They had a complaint and a promise. “Thy father made our yoke grievous: now therefore make thou the grievous service of thy father, and his heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee” (v. 4). This was a threat. If he did not make their yoke lighter, they would not serve him.

He said that he would seek counsel. This was wise. His father had written, “Where no counsel is, the people fall: but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety” (Prov. 11:14). First, he consulted the old men (v. 6). They gave him excellent advice: become a public servant. “And they spake unto him, saying, If thou wilt be a servant unto this people this day, and wilt serve them, and answer them, and speak good words to them, then they will be thy servants for ever” (v. 7). He ignored this counsel. He then consulted younger men (v. 8). They gave him poor advice: to use power to compel obedience.

And the young men that were grown up with him spake unto him, saying, Thus shalt thou speak unto this people that spake unto thee, saying, Thy father made our yoke heavy, but make thou it lighter unto us; thus shalt thou say unto them, My little finger shall be thicker than my father’s loins. And now whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke: my father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions (vv. 10–11).

When the people returned, he conveyed this message (v. 14). Why was he so foolish? Because God had blinded him. “Wherefore the king hearkened not unto the people; for the cause was from the LORD, that he might perform his saying, which the LORD spake by Ahijah the Shilonite unto Jeroboam the son of Nebat” (v. 15). Ahijah had told Jeroboam that he would inherit the tribes (I Kings 11:29–31). In response to Rehoboam’s declaration, the people of the 10 tribes revolted against him (I Kings 12:16).

When Rehoboam assembled an army to suppress this revolt, God sent a messenger to him forbidding this. “Thus saith the LORD, Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren the children of Israel: return every man to his house; for this thing is from me. They hearkened therefore to the word of the LORD, and returned to depart, according to the word of the LORD” (v. 24). This permanently divided the tribal lands. After the Israelites’ return from the exile, members of the same tribes did not live with each other in the same tribal region.

Conclusion

Rehoboam thought there was no political limit to taxes. He thought that the threat of intense negative civil sanctions—scorpions—would bring the protests to an end. But the people understood better. Their consent was required for a king to collect taxes. A strong king could collect more taxes than a weak king. Solomon had been a strong king. The people of the 10 tribes recognized that Rehoboam was weaker than his father had been. He did not.

The kingship that the Israelites demanded from Samuel had, four kings down the road, resulted in tax tyranny. The 10 northern tribes revolted, but they did not abandon kings. They lived under a series of bad kings who were worse than Rehoboam.

Jeroboam immediately set up a system of corrupt worship as an imitation of the temple. "After this thing Jeroboam returned not from his evil way, but made again of the lowest of the people priests of the high places: whosoever would, he consecrated him, and he became one of the priests of the high places. And this thing became sin unto the house of Jeroboam, even to cut it off, and to destroy it from off the face of the earth" (I Kings 13:33–34). God cut off individual kings; the people did not. Finally, God brought the Assyrians to carry them out of the land. Never again did they live under an Israelite king.

21

CONCEALED MIRACLES

And she said, As the LORD thy God liveth, I have not a cake, but an handful of meal in a barrel, and a little oil in a cruse: and, behold, I am gathering two sticks, that I may go in and dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it, and die. And Elijah said unto her, Fear not; go and do as thou hast said: but make me thereof a little cake first, and bring it unto me, and after make for thee and for thy son For thus saith the LORD God of Israel, The barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail, until the day that the LORD sendeth rain upon the earth. And she went and did according to the saying of Elijah: and she, and he, and her house, did eat many days (I Kings 17:12–15).

The theocentric principle here is God’s miraculous intervention.

A. Miraculous Obscurity

This is the story of a long-term economic relationship. Elijah needed obscurity to evade King Ahab. The woman needed food. God provided a continuing miracle to provide them both with what they needed.

This relationship began with a revelation from God. “Arise, get thee to Zarephath, which belongeth to Zidon, and dwell there: behold, I have commanded a widow woman there to sustain thee. So he arose and went to Zarephath. And when he came to the gate of the city, behold, the widow woman was there gathering of sticks: and he called to her, and said, Fetch me, I pray thee, a little water in a vessel, that I may drink” (vv. 9–10). Her response would re-shape her destiny. She was crucial to God’s plan for Israel.

King Ahab wanted to locate Elijah. Three and a half years later, the king’s servant Obadiah told Elijah, “As the LORD thy God liveth, there is no nation or kingdom, whither my lord hath not sent to seek thee:

and when they said, He is not there; he took an oath of the kingdom and nation, that they found thee not" (I Kings 18:10).

How did he achieve concealment? By not interacting with any local residents. He did not look for a job. He did not beg. He did not perform miracles. He went into a house with a widow and her son. In that house there was food. God performed a daily miracle comparable to the manna in the wilderness. "And the barrel of meal wasted not, neither did the cruse of oil fail, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake by Elijah" (v. 16).

Elijah drew little attention. A few people may have noticed him. Some stranger lived, unmarried, with a widow. This was not the sort of arrangement anyone would suspect of a prophet of God from the nation of Israel. This was an ideal cover. It suggested an illicit arrangement.

B. How Poor Was She?

The woman claimed to be near death. This was hyperbolic language. She owned a house. She could have sold it for enough money to buy food. Her remark was intended to show that she was at the end of her rope. She would soon lose her residence. She could not find employment. She would soon be a beggar. Who was she to help a foreigner?

Elijah told her that she and her son would soon be the recipients of a long-term miracle. The little that she possessed would multiply. It would sustain all three of them. She believed him. But she was required to act in faith in order to confirm her trust in him. She had to give him something to eat. That would be the last of her reserves. The next step would be indebtedness, with her house as collateral, or else taking in a renter. Elijah was asking her to take him in. She demonstrated that she was ready to do this, for a price. The price was daily free food.

The miracle was not spectacular. It was not visible to the neighbors. No one would notice. The container of oil and the container of meal would not run out. The three could eat bread every day. This was a recapitulation of the manna. The fare would be boring, but it would keep the three of them alive.

For three and a half years—time, times, and half a time—the three of them would eat. She would have the basics covered. She could work for money if there was a job available. If there wasn't, they would eat.

Who would notice that she was not buying food on a daily basis? There are always competing grocers. One grocer would assume that she had bought from a rival. No one would notice how much food a widow bought, or failed to buy.

He would not be visible locally. He would remain out of sight, out of mind. He would be forgotten by anyone who might have noticed him, months or years earlier. There might be gossip, but for how long. Gossip fades if there is no reminder. The arrangement was ideal for avoiding reminders.

Life for him would be as boring as his meals. But, when you are avoiding capture, boredom is tolerable.

C. Working Capital

He told the woman that she would have free food until rain fell on Israel. She knew there was a time limit on the supply of welfare from God. She had time to develop an alternative stream of income. She could accumulate capital through thrift. She could save whatever her food would have cost. Her free food could serve as a source of capital. She might start a home business. She might get a regular job. When the rain came in Israel, she would have money or tools in reserve.

Elijah gave her another opportunity to make something of herself. She might take it. She might not. But God through Elijah was providing a way out. She had been on the ragged edge financially. She had almost run out of food. Then, without warning, Elijah had appeared. He was a man with a peculiar gift. He could provide free food.

Then he raised her child from the dead. Until that day, she regarded him as a miracle worker. But this was different. “And the woman said to Elijah, Now by this I know that thou art a man of God, and that the word of the LORD in thy mouth is truth” (I Kings 17:24). This indicates that workers of miracles were not unheard of. They were exceptional, just as miracles are exceptional, but the mere possession of this rare ability did not guarantee that someone was sent by God. Performing a resurrection from the dead was proof.

If Elijah could do this, then there was nothing to fear. He would not be there as a household miracle-worker forever, but while he was there, the woman was invulnerable to circumstances. This must have given her hope. The world around her was not so great a threat any longer. She could take risks without fear of a disaster. Her outlook must have changed.

D. When Free Lunches End

Then the free lunches ended, just as the manna ended for Israel. “And it came to pass after many days, that the word of the LORD came to Elijah in the third year, saying, Go, shew thyself unto Ahab; and I will send rain upon the earth. And Elijah went to shew himself unto Ahab. And there was a sore famine in Samaria” (I Kings 18:1–2). The text does not describe his departure. She is never mentioned again in the Old Testament. But she is mentioned in the New Testament. Jesus said:

And he said, Verily I say unto you, No prophet is accepted in his own country. But I tell you of a truth, many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when great famine was throughout all the land; But unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow (Luke 4:24–26).

The context of these remarks was Jesus’ announcement of His fulfillment of a messianic prophecy. He had just read from a scroll of Isaiah.

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears. And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. And they said, Is not this Joseph’s son? And he said unto them, Ye will surely say unto me this proverb, Physician, heal thyself: whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thy country. And he said, Verily I say unto you, No prophet is accepted in his own country (Luke 4:18–23).¹

This produced an Ahab-like reaction. “And all they in the synagogue, when they heard these things, were filled with wrath, And rose up, and thrust him out of the city, and led him unto the brow of the hill whereon their city was built, that they might cast him down headlong” (vv. 28–29).

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 6.

Israel was about to lose its special relationship with God. Jesus would later announce to the Jewish leaders, “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). The unique protection that Israel had enjoyed ever since the last seven plagues on Egypt was about to be removed. The leaders of Israel did not want to hear this. Those who are dependent on miracles rarely do.

Conclusion

The widow could provide what Elijah needed: rental space and obscurity. Elijah could provide what she needed: food. She immediately saw the benefit of the transaction. It would last for several years. This arrangement thwarted Ahab’s attempt to locate Elijah. It provided a cover.

To enter into this arrangement, she had to take a chance that he was a fraud. “And Elijah said unto her, Fear not; go and do as thou hast said: but make me thereof a little cake first, and bring it unto me.” His proposition began with “fear not.” Over the next three and a half years, she learned not to fear. Meanwhile, everyone in Israel was learning what fear is. They faced starvation. She had used the language of starvation rhetorically. Israelites faced starvation literally. God had removed Israel’s protection in order to weaken the authority of the king, his evil queen, and the court prophets of Baal. God provided literal protection for a foreign woman and her son. They played an important role in God’s confrontation with Israel. They were the beneficiaries of an arrangement that was not for their benefit, but rather for Israel’s—specifically, the remnant. God told Elijah after his return, “Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him” (I Kings 19:18). By providing cover for Elijah, she and her son acted on their behalf. She never knew this, and neither did they.

A STOLEN INHERITANCE

And it came to pass after these things, that Naboth the Jezreelite had a vineyard, which was in Jezreel, hard by the palace of Ahab king of Samaria. And Ahab spake unto Naboth, saying, Give me thy vineyard, that I may have it for a garden of herbs, because it is near unto my house: and I will give thee for it a better vineyard than it; or, if it seem good to thee, I will give thee the worth of it in money. And Naboth said to Ahab, The LORD forbid it me, that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee (I Kings 21:1–3).

The theocentric issue here is inheritance.

A. The Jubilee

The Mosaic law established the requirement that the original families of the conquest of Canaan not be allowed to sell rural land on a permanent basis. The laws of the 49th or national jubilee year included a law of landed inheritance (Lev. 25:8–13).¹

There was no absolute right of private property in rural land. There was only one legal way to transfer land to another family: an obscure law governing an unfulfilled vow to a priest (Lev. 27:20–21).² Naboth was not allowed to sell the land to Ahab on a permanent basis. He did have the right to lease it to Ahab until the jubilee year. There is no record that the jubilee law was ever honored in Israel. Ahab assumed that Naboth would sell the land to him at some price. He was mistaken. Naboth refused to sell. Without the jubilee law to protect his heirs' inheritance, the only way to secure his inheritance was to refuse to sell.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 29.

2. Ibid., ch. 36.

B. Property Rights

Ahab was depressed by the fact that he could not persuade Naboth to sell his land.

And Ahab came into his house heavy and displeased because of the word which Naboth the Jezreelite had spoken to him: for he had said, I will not give thee the inheritance of my fathers. And he laid him down upon his bed, and turned away his face, and would eat no bread. But Jezebel his wife came to him, and said unto him, Why is thy spirit so sad, that thou eatest no bread? And he said unto her, Because I spake unto Naboth the Jezreelite, and said unto him, Give me thy vineyard for money; or else, if it please thee, I will give thee another vineyard for it: and he answered, I will not give thee my vineyard (I Kings 21:4–6).

His wife devised a scheme to enable her husband to obtain the land. She paid two men to bring false witness against him for blasphemy against God and the king. “And there came in two men, children of Belial, and sat before him: and the men of Belial witnessed against him, even against Naboth, in the presence of the people, saying, Naboth did blaspheme God and the king. Then they carried him forth out of the city, and stoned him with stones, that he died” (I Kings 21:13).

What was blasphemy? In almost every case in the Bible, the Hebrew word translated here as “blaspheme” is translated as “bless.” The exceptions are in this chapter and in the Book of Job. There, it is translated as “curse” (Job 1:5; 2:5, 9). This was a capital crime. “And he that blasphemeth the name of the LORD, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the LORD, shall be put to death” (Lev. 24:16).

The congregation stoned Naboth for this act. “And it came to pass, when Jezebel heard that Naboth was stoned, and was dead, that Jezebel said to Ahab, Arise, take possession of the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, which he refused to give thee for money: for Naboth is not alive, but dead” (I Kings 21:15). Why would he get the land? There was no valid reason. The witnesses had said that Naboth blasphemed the king, too. He was the injured party. He was entitled to restitution. Naboth’s death was that restitution. He was not entitled to the inheritance. That belonged to Naboth’s heirs.

C. Confrontation

His wife told him to go to the field and take possession of it. Simultaneously, God told Elijah to go to the field to confront the king.

Arise, go down to meet Ahab king of Israel, which is in Samaria: behold, he is in the vineyard of Naboth, whither he is gone down to possess it. And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the LORD, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine (I Kings 21:18–19).

Ahab and Elijah did what they were told. They met in the field. “And Ahab said to Elijah, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? And he answered, I have found thee: because thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the LORD” (I Kings 21:20). Then Elijah cursed Ahab, as just Naboth was accused of having done to Ahab. The curse was the disinheritance of Ahab. “And will make thine house like the house of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and like the house of Baasha the son of Ahijah, for the provocation wherewith thou hast provoked me to anger, and made Israel to sin” (I Kings 21:22). He also cursed his wife. “And of Jezebel also spake the LORD, saying, The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel” (v. 23).

The prophet had the authority to place these curses on the enemies of God. The penalty for false witness is the penalty that was imposed on the victim.

And the judges shall make diligent inquisition: and, behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother; Then shall ye do unto him, as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you. And those which remain shall hear, and fear, and shall henceforth commit no more any such evil among you. And thine eye shall not pity; but life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot (Deut 19:18–21).³

God served as the judge of Ahab and his wife.

Conclusion

Ahab coveted another man’s inheritance. His wife arranged for him to inherit it. This required funding a conspiracy to commit perjury. The penalty for this false testimony was death. Ahab had sought to inherit what would have belonged to Naboth's heirs. His penalty was death on the battlefield and the disinheritance of his heirs. Her penalty was a cursed death: to be eaten by dogs.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

23

LYING SPIRITS

And the LORD said, Who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead? And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner. And there came forth a spirit, and stood before the LORD, and said, I will persuade him. And the LORD said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also: go forth, and do so. Now therefore, behold, the LORD hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets, and the LORD hath spoken evil concerning thee (I Kings 22:20–23).

The theocentric principle here is that when God wants to bring negative sanctions against a covenant-breaker, He will see to it that the person chooses a self-destructive course of action.

Ahab had been granted peace because he had humbled himself before God and Elijah regarding his theft of Naboth's land. God promised that He would not destroy Ahab. "Seest thou how Ahab humbleth himself before me? because he humbleth himself before me, I will not bring the evil in his days: but in his son's days will I bring the evil upon his house" (I Kings 21:29). But this promise was conditional. We know this because in the next section, God lures Ahab into a suicidal war against Syria.

There is nothing in the text that indicates that Ahab returned the land to Naboth's heirs. He did not make restitution, as required by the Mosaic law: "If a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep" (Ex. 22:1).¹ The sheep was dead: Naboth. Ahab owed at least four times the value of the property to the heirs.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43.

A. Prophecies: Lying and Truthful

God gave Ahab peace with Syria for three years (I Kings 22:1). Then the king of Judah paid a visit. Ahab asked him if he was willing to start a war with Syria to get back the city of Ramoth (v. 4). He spoke of this city as “ours,” but it was Ahab’s (v. 3). It was not in Judah. The king of Judah unwisely agreed (v. 4). But there was a condition. He wanted Ahab to consult his prophets (v. 5). These were court prophets, funded by Ahab. They assured Ahab that he would be victorious (v. 6). Jehosaphat was not convinced. He asked for a second opinion (v. 7). Ahab said that Micaiah was available, but that he always prophesied bad outcomes for Ahab (v. 8). That was the prophet who Jehosaphat wanted to consult (v. 8). So, Ahab sent for him (v. 9). Meanwhile, the court prophets reassured the two kings that victory over Syria was there for the taking (vv. 11–12).

Micaiah arrived. “So he came to the king. And the king said unto him, Micaiah, shall we go against Ramoth-gilead to battle, or shall we forbear? And he answered him, Go, and prosper: for the LORD shall deliver it into the hand of the king” (v. 15). Ahab recognized insincerity when he heard it. This was out of character for Micaiah. “And the king said unto him, How many times shall I adjure thee that thou tell me nothing but that which is true in the name of the LORD?” (v. 17). He knew the difference between a paid court prophet and a real one. Micaiah then told him the truth. “I saw all Israel scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd: and the LORD said, These have no master: let them return every man to his house in peace” (v. 17). This image was clear: Ahab would be killed in battle. “And the king of Israel said unto Jehosaphat, Did I not tell thee that he would prophesy no good concerning me, but evil?” (v. 18). Then Micaiah told him what else he had seen. “Hear thou therefore the word of the LORD: I saw the LORD sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him on his right hand and on his left” (v. 19). Then he revealed the story of God’s desire to locate a lying spirit to deceive Ahab’s court prophets.

The enraged one of the court prophets. “But Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah went near, and smote Micaiah on the cheek, and said, Which way went the Spirit of the LORD from me to speak unto thee?” (v. 24). Micaiah told him that in the day of Ahab’s death, Zedekiah would hide himself in the inner chamber (v. 25). At that point, Ahab ordered Micaiah imprisoned (vv. 26–27). Micaiah responded that if Ahab returned in peace from the battle, God had not spoken through Micaiah (v. 28).

The kings then went into battle (v. 29). Ahab knew he was at risk. He told Jehosaphat to wear kingly robes. Ahab, on the other hand, would disguise himself (v. 30). At this point, Jehosaphat should have said, "Let's both wear robes." As it turned out, the disguise did Ahab no good, and the robes did Jehosaphat no harm.

But the king of Syria commanded his thirty and two captains that had rule over his chariots, saying, Fight neither with small nor great, save only with the king of Israel. And it came to pass, when the captains of the chariots saw Jehoshaphat, that they said, Surely it is the king of Israel. And they turned aside to fight against him: and Jehoshaphat cried out. And it came to pass, when the captains of the chariots perceived that it was not the king of Israel, that they turned back from pursuing him (vv. 31–33).

At that point, God intervened.

And a certain man drew a bow at a venture, and smote the king of Israel between the joints of the harness: wherefore he said unto the driver of his chariot, Turn thine hand, and carry me out of the host; for I am wounded. And the battle increased that day: and the king was stayed up in his chariot against the Syrians, and died at even: and the blood ran out of the wound into the midst of the chariot (vv. 34–35).

The Hebrew word translated here as "at venture" means "simply." In the context, it means "at random." The man did not recognize that Ahab was the king. He just shot an arrow randomly. It reached its pre-ordained target. Micaiah's prophesy came true.

B. Untrustworthy Prophets

The court prophets thought they were providing accurate information. Zedekiah's reaction to Micaiah's description of what God had done to deceive the prophets indicates that he did not believe Micaiah's story.

King Jehosaphat did not fully trust the prophets. He wanted verification. Micaiah said that the court prophets had been deceived by a lying spirit. That spirit had been authorized by God to deceive the prophets. Why? To deceive Ahab. The covenant-breaker should not trust in prophets, Ezekiel warned.

For every one of the house of Israel, or of the stranger that sojourneth in Israel, which separateth himself from me, and setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumblingblock of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to a prophet to enquire of him concerning me; I the LORD will answer him by myself: And I will set my face against that man, and will make him a sign and a proverb, and I will cut him off from the midst of my people; and ye shall know that I am the LORD. And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the LORD have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel. And they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity: the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him; That the house of Israel may go no more astray from me, neither be polluted any more with all their transgressions; but that they may be my people, and I may be their God, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 14:7–11).

There is covenantal cause and effect in history. He who breaks covenant with God should not expect guidance when he most needs it. He is vulnerable to deception by God and by those who claim to speak on behalf of God. This will continue until the end of time, Paul wrote.

And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming: Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: That they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness (II Thes. 2:8–12).

Conclusion

King Ahab was a marked man—marked by God. He might have avoided death on the battlefield. He could have made restitution to Naboth's heirs. He refused. He could have let well enough alone with Syria. He refused. He could have listened to Micaiah. He refused. He thought he could reduce his risk on the battlefield by disguising himself. He was wrong. God lured him into a trap. Lying spirits lie. Covenant-breaking people believe. Power and signs and wonders are not guarantees of reliability.

LABOR AS DEBT COLLATERAL

Now there cried a certain woman of the wives of the sons of the prophets unto Elisha, saying, Thy servant my husband is dead; and thou knowest that thy servant did fear the LORD: and the creditor is come to take unto him my two sons to be bondmen (II Kings 4:1).

The theocentric principle is hierarchy: service to God is preferable to service to creditors. “The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender” (Prov. 22:7).¹

A. Collateralized Debt

The widow of a prophet’s son faced a crisis. He had gone into debt. He had died. The family still owed the debt. The creditor was coming to take the sons into service.

Why did the creditor have a legal claim on the labor of the sons? Because they were not yet of age to join God’s holy army: age 20 (Ex. 30:14).² They were subordinates in their father’s household. He could have benefited from their labor; hence, they were capital assets. The creditor had a legal claim on their labor services until they reached the age of maturity or until the sabbatical year released them because the debt was automatically canceled. “At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD’S release” (Deut. 15:1–2).³ But the year of release was associated with the sabbatical year of rest for the land. “Six years thou shalt sow thy field, and six years thou shalt prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof; But in the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land, a sabbath for the LORD: thou shalt neither sow thy field, nor prune thy vineyard” (Lev. 25:3–4).⁴ The problem was, the courts did not enforce the land’s rest. Also, the people sold into servitude for debt repayment were not released, as required. This is why God sent Judah into captivity. “Thus saith the LORD of hosts; The children of Israel and the children of Judah were oppressed together: and all that took them captives held them fast; they refused to let them go. Their Redeemer is strong; the LORD of hosts is his name: he shall thoroughly plead their cause, that he may give rest to the land, and disquiet the inhabitants of Babylon” (Jer. 50:33–34). So, the sons would not go free until they reached age 20. The widow would not have their support.

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 66.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

B. Conventional Steps in a Miracle

First, Elisha conducted an inventory. He asked her what assets she owned. A pot of oil was all (v. 2). He then told her to go to people in the neighborhood and collect empty jars. Her good reputation was an asset. She had not considered this. He told her to close the doors and, in the presence of her sons, pour oil from her jar into the containers. She did. When she poured out the oil, it kept pouring until every container was filled. This was a miracle comparable to the one that fed the widow, her son, and Elijah in Zerephath.⁵ “Then she came and told the man of God. And he said, Go, sell the oil, and pay thy debt, and live thou and thy children of the rest” (v. 7).

In assessing the economic aspects of this miracle, we must understand Elisha’s method of analysis. First, Elisha recognized that the debt had to be paid. Second, he assessed the nature of her assets: oil and a good reputation. Third, he recognized that there was a ready market for oil. She could obtain money to pay the creditor on short notice. There would be money left over for purchasing household necessities.

The miracle relied on the woman’s ability to borrow containers. There had to be some sense of neighborliness. Neighbors had to be willing to lend her capital assets for free. She had no spare cash. She could not rent containers. Had she not had a good reputation, she would not have been able to obtain that many containers on short notice. The miracle's effectiveness therefore rested on ethics: hers and her neighbors'.

4. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 23.

5. Chapter 21.

Conclusion

A godly man had gone into debt. This was probably not a commercial debt, although it may have been. It was probably an emergency debt. It was governed by the law of charitable loans (Deut. 15:1–7). The collateral was a man's labor. This included the labor of minor sons.

The year of release was not honored in Israel or Judah. So, the sons might be in bondage until they reached adulthood. Elisha recognized that these sons were their mother's comfort. He provided a miracle, which they performed in private. This solved their problem.

RECIPROCAL ACTS OF GRACE

And it fell on a day, that Elisha passed to Shunem, where was a great woman; and she constrained him to eat bread. And so it was, that as oft as he passed by, he turned in thither to eat bread. And she said unto her husband, Behold now, I perceive that this is an holy man of God, which passeth by us continually. Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall; and let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick: and it shall be, when he cometh to us, that he shall turn in thither (II Kings 4:8–10).

The theocentric principle here is God as the sanctions-bringer.

A. Grace vs. Reciprocity

This family could afford to add a room to their house in order to serve as an occasional guest room for Elisha. This would be wasted space most of the time. There would be no rental income from it. Because they never knew when he would pass by, they would have to leave it empty.

This was a gesture of support for Elisha. He responded by offering a far greater gesture of support. He asked his servant what the woman wanted in life. The servant said she had no child. Elisha had the servant call her, so that he could speak to her. This indicated that he was in a position to grant her this blessing. He did not ask her what she wanted. He announced that she would give birth (vv. 11–16). This was fulfilled the next year (v. 17). This was analogous to Abraham's visit from God, who granted Sarai the same gift, in response to Abraham's generosity in providing a free meal and lodging (Gen. 18:18).

This led to another miracle. The child later had a stroke and died. Elisha raised him from the dead, even as Elijah had raised the son of the widow (vv. 19–37). This was the supreme mark of a prophet. Jesus possessed the same ability. He raised Lazarus from the dead (John 11:44).

In two instances, Elisha demonstrated his ability to perform miracles. The opportunity had come because the woman had the idea of providing free lodging for Elisha and then followed through on it. She had asked for nothing in return. She just wanted to make his work less expensive.

Her generosity did not establish a quid pro quo. She had no economic claim on him. He responded in grace to an act of grace. This led to a pair of blessings that she could not have purchased with money.

The woman initiated the idea. Her husband went along with her. This looked as though it would be a net economic loss. They had enough wealth so that it was not a major financial burden. It was a little chamber. It led to a large blessing.

What the woman had done to Elisha was imitated by another faithful adherent. A man gave Elisha a lot of food for one man to eat. "And there came a man from Baal-shalisha, and brought the man of God bread of the firstfruits, twenty loaves of barley, and full ears of corn in the husk thereof" (II Kings 4:42). Elisha's response was to share this with people in the neighborhood. "And he said, Give unto the people, that they may eat. And his servitor said, What, should I set this before an hundred men? He said again, Give the people, that they may eat: for thus saith the LORD, They shall eat, and shall leave thereof. So he set it before them, and they did eat, and left thereof, according to the word of the LORD" (vv. 43–44). This was the historical background of Jesus' feeding of thousands of people on two occasions (Matt. 14:15–21; 15:30–38). The ability to multiply food was a mark of a prophet. Elisha was the type. Jesus was the archetype.

The text does not indicate that the man who gave Elisha the food was the recipient of any blessing from Elisha.

B. Blessings Are Not for Sale

Naaman was a great general for Syria. He contracted leprosy. In his household was a captive Israelite girl. The girl showed mercy to Naaman. "And she said unto her mistress, Would God my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria! for he would recover him of his leprosy" (II Kings 5:3). This became an opportunity to provide a witness for God to a pagan official.

The story got to Naaman. He, in turn, went to the king of Syria. He knew that he could not submit himself to a foreign prophet apart from the blessing of his king. He did not violate authority. The king, in turn, dealt with the king of Israel. He did not violate what he regarded as Israel's hierarchy of authority. "And the king of Syria said, Go to, go, and I will send a letter unto the king of Israel. And he departed, and took with him ten talents of silver, and six thousand pieces of gold, and ten changes of raiment" (II Kings 5:5). Naaman was clearly a crucial asset for the king of Syria.

The king of Syria sent Naaman with the gold and a letter of introduction to the king of Israel. The king of Israel thought it was some sort of deception. "And it came to pass, when the king of Israel had read the letter, that he rent his clothes, and said, Am I God, to kill and to make alive, that this man doth send unto me to recover a man of his leprosy? wherefore consider, I pray you, and see how he seeketh a quarrel against me" (II Kings 5:7). The letter must not have mentioned the prophet. The king of Syria regarded this power as inheriting in the person of Israel's king, as an agent of God.

Elisha knew of the king's rending of his clothes and came to him to inquire the reason. When told, he instructed the king to send Naaman to his house. "So Naaman came with his horses and with his chariot, and stood at the door of the house of Elisha. And Elisha sent a messenger unto him, saying, Go and wash in the Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean" (II Kings 5:9–10). Elisha dealt with Naaman as a subordinate. He did not meet with him directly. He was testing Naaman's submission. Naaman failed the test.

But Naaman was wroth, and went away, and said, Behold, I thought, He will surely come out to me, and stand, and call on the name of the LORD his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper. Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them, and be clean? So he turned and went away in a rage (II Kings 5:11–12).

He would not have been healed, but for the intervention of his subordinates. "And his servants came near, and spake unto him, and said, My father, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it? how much rather then, when he saith to thee, Wash, and be clean?" (II Kings 5:13). So, Naaman humbled himself and bathed in the Jordan. He was instantly cured. "And he returned to the man of God, he and all his company, and came, and stood before him: and he said, Behold, now I know that there is no God in all earth, but in Israel: now therefore, I pray thee, take a blessing of thy servant. But he said, As the LORD liveth, before whom I stand, I will receive none. And he urged him to take it; but he refused" (II Kings 5:15–16). Here, he humbled himself. This was appropriate. He offered to pay the prophet as a token of submission. Elisha refused. He was not in need of any gift. So, Naaman asked for another blessing.

And Naaman said, Shall there not then, I pray thee, be given to thy servant two mules' burden of earth? for thy servant will henceforth offer neither burnt offering nor sacrifice unto other gods, but unto the LORD. In this thing the LORD pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon: when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the LORD pardon thy servant in this thing (II Kings 5:17–18).

Naaman wanted dirt from Israel as a mark of his subordination to Israel's God. As a commander, he was required to accompany his king into the worship place for the regional god. Naaman wanted to carry a token of Israel back to Syria as a covenantal mark of his subordination to the God who had healed him. He did not ask to be circumcised. He did ask for God's forgiveness for mandatory acts of piety to a god he no longer believed in. Elisha granted him this request. "And he said unto him, Go in peace. So he departed from him a little way" (II Kings 5:19).

The king of Syria thought he could pay the king of Israel for healing. Naaman thought he could do some great thing to gain healing. Naaman's servants told him to do the small thing that the prophet had told him to do. They saw that what was required was subordination to something anyone could do, not proof of his own ability to meet the requirement.

God's grace is not for sale. Any performance required is not a purchase. It is a token of subordination.

C. A Servant's Error

Naaman's servants understood what needed to be done: ritual subordination, not a purchase. Elisha's servant did not understand this. He decided to take advantage of the situation. He pursued Naaman and asked for payment. "And he said, All is well. My master hath sent me, saying, Behold, even now there be come to me from mount Ephraim two young men of the sons of the prophets: give them, I pray thee, a talent of silver, and two changes of garments. And Naaman said, Be content, take two talents. And he urged him, and bound two talents of silver in two bags, with two changes of garments, and laid them upon two of his servants; and they bare them before him” (II Kings 5:22–23). For Naaman, this was a minimal payment. He was glad to offer twice as much. It made him feel as though he was being of some use to Elisha’s ministry. That, Elisha had previously denied to him.

Elisha knew what had taken place as soon as he had returned.

And he said unto him, Went not mine heart with thee, when the man turned again from his chariot to meet thee? Is it a time to receive money, and to receive garments, and oliveyards, and vineyards, and sheep, and oxen, and menservants, and maidservants? The leprosy therefore of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed for ever. And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow (II Kings 5:26–27).

This was a unique form of leprosy. It marked a man as having been under God’s curse, but it did not make him an outcast. Here was the law of leprosy. “Then the priest shall consider: and, behold, if the leprosy have covered all his flesh, he shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague: it is all turned white: he is clean” (Lev. 13:13). Gehazi could still remain a servant, but he would henceforth be a marked man. Leprosy was a judicial disease, not a communicable one.¹ A man was unclean judicially if he had leprosy, but not if he was entirely white. If he was entirely white, he had been under a curse, but he was not dangerous to the community.

Conclusion

There is no indication in the Bible that man can establish a positive balance sheet in history for himself by granting favors, large or small, to God. These acts of generosity are not acts of purchase. God does not offer His services for sale. Neither did the prophets. But God is always in a position to grant people their desires. These acts of grace need not be limited by the conventional operations of nature.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 9.

PROFITING FROM INSIDE INFORMATION

And it came to pass after this, that Ben-hadad king of Syria gathered all his host, and went up, and besieged Samaria. And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver (II Kings 6:24–25).

The theocentric principle here is imputation: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹ Men impute economic value in terms of their scale of values within the context of a specific time period.

A. When Money Fails

Syria besieged Jerusalem. No one from outside the city could bring food to the city. The productivity of the city was economically depressed because of its lack of trade with the rural countryside.

People need to eat. If they do not eat, they die. Eating is high on every person's value scale. But, as they become full, they devote additional wealth to purchasing other items. The greater the supply of food, the lower its cost. This is because people demand other things, once they have accumulated enough food to last for a specific time period. The marginal value of an additional unit of food falls below the marginal value of something else.

The siege changed the context. Food could not be resupplied. It ran low. People were willing to spend their savings of silver to buy food. Their silver would do them no good if they died of starvation.

This had happened to Egypt during the seven-year famine. "And when money failed in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came unto Joseph, and said, Give us bread: for why should we die in thy presence? for the money faileth” (Gen. 47:15).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

This does not mean that prices rose. It means that the price of food rose. The prices of other items fell. No one wanted the goods that sold well in times of peace. They would have had to sell these goods at a loss in order to buy silver. If the price of silver in relation to an ass’s head fell, then the prices of other nonessentials also fell.

B. Cannibalism

The king of Israel faced a problem. A woman approached him. She asked for help. He told her that he could not help her. He had no food (v. 26). But that was not her problem. She had a contractual difficulty. She needed a government official to enforce it.

And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, This woman said unto me, Give thy son, that we may eat him to day, and we will eat my son to morrow. So we boiled my son, and did eat him: and I said unto her on the next day, Give thy son, that we may eat him: and she hath hid her son. And it came to pass, when the king heard the words of the woman, that he rent his clothes; and he passed by upon the wall, and the people looked, and, behold, he had sackcloth within upon his flesh (vv. 28–30).

This was the fulfillment of a prophecy given by God to Moses.

The LORD shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand; A nation of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor shew favour to the young: And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land, until thou be destroyed: which also shall not leave thee either corn, wine, or oil, or the increase of thy kine, or flocks of thy sheep, until he have destroyed thee. And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trustedst, throughout all thy land: and he shall besiege thee in all thy gates throughout all thy land, which the LORD thy God hath given thee. And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters, which the LORD thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee: So that the man that is tender among you, and very delicate, his eye shall be evil toward his brother, and toward the wife of his bosom, and toward the remnant of his children which he shall leave: So that he will not give to any of them of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat: because he hath nothing left him in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates. The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her son, and toward her daughter, And toward her young one that cometh out from between her feet, and toward her children which she shall bear: for she shall eat them for want of all things secretly in the siege and straitness, wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee in thy gates (Deut. 28:49–57).

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 33.

What was the king's response? To blame Elisha. "Then he said, God do so and more also to me, if the head of Elisha the son of Shaphat shall stand on him this day" (v. 31).

C. Prices as Indicators of Supply and Demand

Elisha was not concerned. He had inside information. God had revealed the future to him. "Then Elisha said, Hear ye the word of the LORD; Thus saith the LORD, To morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria" (II Kings 7:1). He did not say how this would come about. Instead, he focused on the array of prices. There would be a radical shift in favor of holding silver rather than food.

One ruler was skeptical. He voiced his skepticism. Elisha responded by predicting the man's death. "Then a lord on whose hand the king leaned answered the man of God, and said, Behold, if the LORD would make windows in heaven, might this thing be? And he said, Behold, thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof" (v. 2).

Four lepers sat at the gate. They made a cost-benefit analysis: ". . . they said one to another, Why sit we here until we die?" (v. 3b).

If we say, We will enter into the city, then the famine is in the city, and we shall die there: and if we sit still here, we die also. Now therefore come, and let us fall unto the host of the Syrians: if they save us alive, we shall live; and if they kill us, we shall but die (v. 4).

Then they took action in terms of their cost-benefit analysis. "And they rose up in the twilight, to go unto the camp of the Syrians: and when they were come to the uttermost part of the camp of Syria, behold, there was no man there" (v. 5). God had scared away the army by the sound of an approaching army. They had all fled, leaving their food and money behind (vv. 6–7). “And when these lepers came to the uttermost part of the camp, they went into one tent, and did eat and drink, and carried thence silver, and gold, and raiment, and went and hid it; and came again, and entered into another tent, and carried thence also, and went and hid it” (v. 8).

They satisfied their highest priorities first. They ate and drank. Next, they confiscated spoils: silver, gold, and clothing. They hid this booty. Then, having worked their way down their individual scales of values, conscience struck them. “Then they said one to another, We do not well: this day is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace: if we tarry till the morning light, some mischief will come upon us: now therefore come, that we may go and tell the king’s household” (v. 9). They feared God, who brings negative sanctions. Their brethren were starving. “So they came and called unto the porter of the city: and they told them, saying, We came to the camp of the Syrians, and, behold, there was no man there, neither voice of man, but horses tied, and asses tied, and the tents as they were” (v. 10).

This information was carried to the king (v. 11). He suspected a trap. The Syrians were hiding, waiting to attack any who came out of the city for food (v. 12). So, he sent out a few men on the five remaining horses to investigate. This testified to his own lawless heart. Moses had been clear about kings with horses and chariots. “But he shall not multiply horses to himself (Deut. 17:16a). Yet he had blamed Elisha for his troubles. The scouts found that the Syrians had fled.

The residents wanted to get to the food. “And the people went out, and spoiled the tents of the Syrians. So a measure of fine flour was sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, according to the word of the LORD” (v. 16). Elisha’s prediction had come true. But one man missed the feast: the skeptic. “And the king appointed the lord on whose hand he leaned to have the charge of the gate: and the people trode upon him in the gate, and he died, as the man of God had said, who spake when the king came down to him” (v. 17). The text repeats this as a double witness (vv. 19–20).

The prophet had possessed accurate information about the future. God had given it to him. Anyone who trusted him and who had food to sell would have sold it for silver immediately. This way, they would have sold assets that were about to fall in price. If his listeners had believed him, a move toward the array of prices that he predicted for the next day would have begun to appear soon after he made the forecast.

Those with food would have sold it, driving down the price of food. But they did not hear it, and those who did hear it did not believe it. One man was so skeptical that it cost him his life.

D. Famine Was Coming

The siege was over. A famine was coming, one comparable in length to the one that struck down Egypt in Joseph's day. "Then spake Elisha unto the woman, whose son he had restored to life, saying, Arise, and go thou and thine household, and sojourn wheresoever thou canst sojourn: for the LORD hath called for a famine; and it shall also come upon the land seven years" (II Kings 8:1). She believed him. She and her family moved to Philistia. There is no indication that he told anyone else. The entire nation did not move. The entire nation suffered the famine.

When the seven years were over, she and her family returned. She was ready to re-claim her land. But squatters had occupied it. So, she went to the king. At that very moment, Elisha's servant Gehazi was talking to the king. He was still leprous, but pure white. He was ritually clean. He could lawfully interact with anyone inside the gates of a city. The king had asked Gehazi about Elisha's works. This king was now a believer in Elisha's power. Gehazi told him of the restoration to life of her son. At that moment, the woman gained access to their presence. The king asked her what she wanted. She wanted back her land. The king then ordered his officer to restore her land and whatever had been taken from it over the past seven years (v. 6).

Conclusion

The residents of Israel's capital city did not believe Elisha in the time of the siege. He proved to be accurate. Prior to the next famine, a woman and her family did believe him. He again proved to be accurate. Those who had used her abandoned land to grow food during the famine had to repay her. She was far better off at the end of the famine than she would have been, had she stayed in Israel.

He had inside information. He knew what the prices of goods would be the next day. Those who listened to his predictions and took appropriate action prospered. Those who ignored him didn't.

PUBLIC INTEREST VS. SELF-INTEREST

And Jehoash said to the priests, All the money of the dedicated things that is brought into the house of the LORD, even the money of every one that passeth the account, the money that every man is set at, and all the money that cometh into any man's heart to bring into the house of the LORD, Let the priests take it to them, every man of his acquaintance: and let them repair the breaches of the house, wheresoever any breach shall be found. But it was so, that in the three and twentieth year of king Jehoash the priests had not repaired the breaches of the house (II Kings 12:4–6).

The theocentric principle here is that the worship of God is more important than other uses of money donated to the church.

A. Bureaucratic Priests

The king was a righteous man. “And Jehoash did that which was right in the sight of the LORD all his days wherein Jehoiada the priest instructed him” (v. 2). Jehoiada was still in charge of the temple. Despite the fact that the dual structures of authority, church and state, were unified in their instructions, the priests did not follow orders.

The king grew tired of waiting for the priests to follow his orders and repair the temple. He decided to put on more pressure. He forbade any more collections by the priests until the temple was fixed. “Then king Jehoash called for Jehoiada the priest, and the other priests, and said unto them, Why repair ye not the breaches of the house? now therefore receive no more money of your acquaintance, but deliver it for the breaches of the house” (v. 17). The account in Second Chronicles has his words even more emphatic. “And the king called for Jehoiada the chief, and said unto him, Why hast thou not required of the Levites to bring in out of Judah and out of Jerusalem the collection, according to the commandment of Moses the servant of the LORD, and of the congregation of Israel, for the tabernacle of witness?" (II Chron. 24:6). There was a reason for the condition of the temple. "For the sons of Athaliah, that wicked woman, had broken up the house of God; and also all the dedicated things of the house of the LORD did they bestow upon Baalim" (II Chron. 24:7).

The priests, being good bureaucrats, had fully understood this problem. But they had done nothing to solve it. "And the priests consented to receive no more money of the people, neither to repair the breaches of the house" (v. 18). Now they were required to take action.

But Jehoiada the priest took a chest, and bored a hole in the lid of it, and set it beside the altar, on the right side as one cometh into the house of the LORD: and the priests that kept the door put therein all the money that was brought into the house of the LORD. And it was so, when they saw that there was much money in the chest, that the king's scribe and the high priest came up, and they put up in bags, and told the money that was found in the house of the LORD (II Kings 12:9–10).

Chronicles adds this:

And at the king's commandment they made a chest, and set it without at the gate of the house of the LORD. And they made a proclamation through Judah and Jerusalem, to bring in to the LORD the collection that Moses the servant of God laid upon Israel in the wilderness. And all the princes and all the people rejoiced, and brought in, and cast into the chest, until they had made an end (II Chron. 24:8–10).

This went on for some time.

Now it came to pass, that at what time the chest was brought unto the king's office by the hand of the Levites, and when they saw that there was much money, the king's scribe and the high priest's officer came and emptied the chest, and took it, and carried it to his place again. Thus they did day by day, and gathered money in abundance (II Chron. 24:11).

B. Delegation Without Monitoring

This was a joint operation. "And the king and Jehoiada gave it to such as did the work of the service of the house of the LORD, and hired masons and carpenters to repair the house of the LORD, and also such as wrought iron and brass to mend the house of the LORD"

(II Chron. 24:12; cf. II Kings 12:11–12).

These men did not do the more detailed work of the temple's implements. "Howbeit there were not made for the house of the LORD bowls of silver, snuffers, basons, trumpets, any vessels of gold, or vessels of silver, of the money that was brought into the house of the LORD: But they gave that to the workmen, and repaired therewith the house of the LORD" (II Kings 12:13–14). The workmen returned the leftover money. This money was then used to hire specialists. "And when they had finished it, they brought the rest of the money before the king and Jehoiada, whereof were made vessels for the house of the LORD, even vessels to minister, and to offer withal, and spoons, and vessels of gold and silver. And they offered burnt offerings in the house of the LORD continually all the days of Jehoiada" (II Chron. 24:14).

The craftsmen had done a good job. They did it under budget. The priests did not monitor them. "Moreover they reckoned not with the men, into whose hand they delivered the money to be bestowed on workmen: for they dealt faithfully" (II Kings 12:15).

The golden implements did not remain in the temple for long. "Then Hazael king of Syria went up, and fought against Gath, and took it: and Hazael set his face to go up to Jerusalem" (v. 17). King Joash then used the sacred implements of the temple to bribe Hazael. "And Jehoash king of Judah took all the hallowed things that Jehoshaphat, and Jehoram, and Ahaziah, his fathers, kings of Judah, had dedicated, and his own hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the LORD, and in the king's house, and sent it to Hazael king of Syria: and he went away from Jerusalem" (v. 18).

The author passed over the rest of the king's career. He referred to a missing book: "And the rest of the acts of Joash, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?" (v. 19). We are told only how the king died. "And his servants arose, and made a conspiracy, and slew Joash in the house of Mollo, which goeth down to Silla" (v. 20).

C. God Imposes Negative Sanctions

Second Chronicles reveals why this assassination took place. Joash and the princes of Judah had rebelled against God.

Now after the death of Jehoiada came the princes of Judah, and made obeisance to the king. Then the king hearkened unto them. And they left the house of the LORD God of their fathers, and served groves and idols: and wrath came upon Judah and Jerusalem for this their trespass. Yet he sent prophets to them, to bring them again unto the LORD; and they testified against them: but they would not give ear.

And the Spirit of God came upon Zechariah the son of Jehoiada the priest, which stood above the people, and said unto them, Thus saith God, Why transgress ye the commandments of the LORD, that ye cannot prosper? because ye have forsaken the LORD, he hath also forsaken you. And they conspired against him, and stoned him with stones at the commandment of the king in the court of the house of the LORD. Thus Joash the king remembered not the kindness which Jehoiada his father had done to him, but slew his son. And when he died, he said, The LORD look upon it, and require it.

And it came to pass at the end of the year, that the host of Syria came up against him: and they came to Judah and Jerusalem, and destroyed all the princes of the people from among the people, and sent all the spoil of them unto the king of Damascus. For the army of the Syrians came with a small company of men, and the LORD delivered a very great host into their hand, because they had forsaken the LORD God of their fathers. So they executed judgment against Joash. And when they were departed from him, (for they left him in great diseases,) his own servants conspired against him for the blood of the sons of Jehoiada the priest, and slew him on his bed, and he died: and they buried him in the city of David, but they buried him not in the sepulchres of the kings (II Chron. 24:17–25).

D. Sanctions and Bureaucracies

The decline into sin began with the priesthood. These men for years used money brought to the temple by the people to fund projects other than the repair of God's house. The king recognized that this was wrong. It placed the nation in jeopardy. God might bring negative sanctions against Judah. So, he ordered the priests to repair God's house. It had taken years for the king to recognize what was going on. This is indicative of how every bureaucracy works. If there are no negative sanctions threatening them, bureaucrats will continue to pursue their own agenda at the expense of the public.

Jehoiada had instigated the rebellion of the priests against the king. After his death at the ripe old age of 130 (II Chron. 24:15), the princes conspired against the priesthood by setting up rival places of worship. The king assented to this. When Jehoiada's son dared to criticize the princes, they killed him. The king did not bring negative sanctions against them. God therefore held him accountable. God brought negative sanctions against the nation. A small group of Syrians conquered a large army of Judah. Then the king's subordinates murdered him.

Step by step, the rulers of Judah—princes and priests—looked after their own interests. They did not look after God's interests. They had been raised up by God to serve as his ministers. Instead, they used their monopolistic positions to pursue their own interests at the expense of God's interests.

Conclusion

This passage does not tell us what the priests did with the money they held back from temple repairs. They deferred maintenance until the deterioration was visible to the king. They short-changed God. Then God short-changed them. He did so by bringing the Syrians against them. He allowed the king to strip the temple of its gold and silver. God cared about ethics more than gold and silver. He cared more about imposing negative sanctions on rebellious servants than he did about the adornment of His temple.

People pursue their own interests when they are granted monopolistic authority to pursue the public's interest. Beginning in the 1960s, a group of economists called public choice economists began to develop theories of how government employees work. People work for agencies that were set up to protect the public interest. The members nevertheless pursue their own economic self-interest, just as individuals do in non-governmental agencies. By assuming that employees pursue their own interests at the expense of the public's interest, in whose name they act, economists make better predictions about how government agencies operate than if they assume that the employees pursue the public's interest.

LOW-KEY LIVING

At that time Berodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present unto Hezekiah: for he had heard that Hezekiah had been sick. And Hezekiah hearkened unto them, and shewed them all the house of his precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour, and all that was found in his treasures: there was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominion, that Hezekiah shewed them not (II Kings 20:12–13).

The theocentric principle here is to avoid tempting the enemies of God by making yourself a target. It places God's kingdom at risk.

A. Putting God's Possessions at Risk

Hezekiah unwisely displayed to foreign dignitaries the wealth in God's temple.

Then came Isaiah the prophet unto king Hezekiah, and said unto him, What said these men? and from whence came they unto thee? And Hezekiah said, They are come from a far country, even from Babylon. And he said, What have they seen in thine house? And Hezekiah answered, All the things that are in mine house have they seen: there is nothing among my treasures that I have not shewed them. And Isaiah said unto Hezekiah, Hear the word of the LORD. Behold, the days come, that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store unto this day, shall be carried into Babylon: nothing shall be left, saith the LORD. And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away; and they shall be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon (II Kings 20:14–18).

This took place sometime around 703 B.C. We know this because he died in 687 B.C. Isaiah had just announced that the king would receive 15 additional years of life (v. 6). The Babylonians did not carry off the tribes of Judah and Benjamin to Babylon until approximately 586 B.C. So, this was a long-term prophecy. When Isaiah spoke of the king's sons, he meant distant heirs.

What had Hezekiah done wrong? Possibly nothing. Isaiah used the incident to introduce Hezekiah to a distant future. In Hezekiah's day, Assyria was the great empire (II Kings 19). Babylon was not yet the dominant kingdom. Yet Isaiah announced that Babylon would carry off Judah's population and the treasures of Jerusalem, including the temple's treasures. The news did not bother Hezekiah. "Then said Hezekiah unto Isaiah, Good is the word of the LORD which thou hast spoken. And he said, Is it not good, if peace and truth be in my days?" (v. 19). The announcement confirmed that none of this was likely to happen in his lifetime or the lifetimes of his near heirs. He had just received a 15-year stay of execution. This was stay of Judah's execution.

B. Tribute Money

Why did Isaiah approach the king immediately after this incident? He could have announced this when he announced that the king would live another 15 years. The warning was in fact a stay of execution for Judah. But he did not give it until after the visit from the representatives of Babylon.

The representatives saw the great wealth of the king and the temple. Yet twice in recent history, Judah's kings had stripped all of this wealth to pay tribute money to Assyria (II Kings 6:8; 18:14–15). The Babylonians would have known this. Advertising Assyria's successes in suppressing other cities was part of Assyria's system of regional control. Yet these two incidents were not the first time that the treasures of the king and the temple had been used to pay tribute. Syria had been a previous beneficiary (II Kings 12:18). So had the northern kingdom of Samaria (II Kings 14:14). This indicates that the productivity of the people of Judah was considerable. Their taxes and gifts to the temple had replaced what had been lost each time.

Any regional king would have known about the temple's wealth. Hezekiah made sure that the Babylonians knew. What was the point? Was it to proclaim the sovereignty of God? That sovereignty was not represented by the recently assembled gold in the temple. Temple gold had been used too often to pay tribute. If anything, this gold testified to the non-sovereignty of God. That was the opinion of the Assyrians.

The king's agent had sent this message to Hezekiah. "Behold, thou hast heard what the kings of Assyria have done to all lands, by destroying them utterly: and shalt thou be delivered? Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed; as Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph, and the children of Eden which were in Thelasar?" (II Kings 19:11–12). That led the king into a trap. Hezekiah prayed to God, and God decided to uphold His honor.

Therefore thus saith the LORD concerning the king of Assyria, He shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shield, nor cast a bank against it. By the way that he came, by the same shall he return, and shall not come into this city, saith the LORD. For I will defend this city, to save it, for mine own sake, and for my servant David's sake. And it came to pass that night, that the angel of the LORD went out, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred fourscore and five thousand: and when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses. So Sennacherib king of Assyria departed, and went and returned, and dwelt at Nineveh. And it came to pass, as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god, that Adrammelech and Sharezer his sons smote him with the sword: and they escaped into the land of Armenia. And Esar-haddon his son reigned in his stead (II Kings 19:32–37).

God did not intervene in order to save the gold in the temple. He intervened because He did not tolerate being compared with the defeated gods of regional city-states. Any would-be empire-builder would have lusted after the gold of the temple. The reports brought back to the king of Babylon by his representatives would have whetted his appetite.

Conclusion

Hezekiah would have been wise to be polite to the representatives of Babylon, but not given them the grand tour. "Look at all this" was not the kind of welcome a wise king would ever give in that region of the world. Better would have been this: "It could be worse. Now, I want to show you my fig orchard."

And Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig tree, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, all the days of Solomon (I Kings 4:25).

But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the LORD of hosts hath spoken it (Micah 4:4).

In that day, saith the LORD of hosts, shall ye call every man his neighbour under the vine and under the fig tree (Zech. 3:10).

RECEIPTS AND ACCOUNTING

Go up to Hilkiah the high priest, that he may sum the silver which is brought into the house of the LORD, which the keepers of the door have gathered of the people: And let them deliver it into the hand of the doers of the work, that have the oversight of the house of the LORD: and let them give it to the doers of the work which is in the house of the LORD, to repair the breaches of the house, Unto carpenters, and builders, and masons, and to buy timber and hewn stone to repair the house. Howbeit there was no reckoning made with them of the money that was delivered into their hand, because they dealt faithfully (II Kings 22:4–7).

The theocentric principle here is the fear of God. Where it is absent, men need receipts.

A. Independent Contractors

The young king, Josiah, ordered the high priest to begin repair work on the temple. This indicates a breakdown of responsibility within the priesthood. Why had the temple deteriorated to this extent, so that a teenage king could notice it? This is another example of the discrepancy between public goods and individual self-interest.¹

The high priest obeyed the king. He hired skilled craftsmen to perform the repair work. The high priest had been ordered to pay for this with money collected at the door of the temple. The high priest did not require the workmen to provide financial accounts of what they had spent. They did the work faithfully.

This indicates that the craftsmen were not part of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. They were independent contractors. The high priest did not require them to provide an accounting. It was not his responsibility to monitor how they ran their businesses. He hired the contractors to do the work.

1. Chapter 27.

The text does not say that they competed by placing initial bids on the jobs, but the absence of receipts points to this. Why? Because the high priest needed to give an account to the king. He had been ordered to do something specific: repair the temple with money collected at the temple's door. He was under authority. He needed to prove that he had complied. He also needed to show that he was not favoring cronies or relatives with jobs paid for by temple funds. The only way to do this would have been to open the bidding process to the public.

He did not need to get an accounting from the craftsmen with respect to how they spent the money. He needed only to receive receipts for money received by them from the priesthood. The quality of their work would testify to their faithfulness. The text indicates that they met the required standards.

It is the job of the independent contractor to decide what price he will pay for the materials and labor required to perform a task. He evaluates supply and demand. He calculates a profit margin. He is a specialist in such matters. The person who hires him is not. The person hiring him defers authority with respect to where to buy and how much to pay. He only agrees to pay for services rendered. It is of no importance to him how much money the craftsman will make or lose in meeting the contract. This information is outside the buyer's zone of responsibility.

The independent contractor possesses specialized information about the markets for materials and labor. This is his business. He prospers or fails in terms of his ability to keep costs below revenues. He has a direct self-interest to forecast accurately what costs will be. With respect to this information, the buyer has no legitimate reason to know how he assessed the market and delivered the final product. The buyer has only three areas of responsibility: to sign the initial contract, to evaluate the work, and to pay whatever the contract specifies upon completion of the work.

In the case of the repair of the temple, we are told that the workers "dealt faithfully." This had to do with the finished work. They did what they said they would do. They did it on schedule. They did it for the prices agreed to.

B. Salaried Contractors

The other model is for the hiring firm to place the craftsmen on the payroll. Here, the requirements change completely. The workers must not be evaluated merely in terms of the quality of work performed. They must do it on budget. They report to their superiors regarding what their work is costing. The employer is responsible for the cost of operations. Why? Because he did not open the production process to competitive bidding.

When an employer in-sources a job instead of outsourcing it, he has reasons. It is easier to monitor performance along the way. He does not need to hire a lawyer to sue for damages for work performed in a substandard way. He has hire and fire authority over the workers. There is tighter control. Part of this control is having access to receipts for materials and labor hired by the contractors. The costs of monitoring performance are higher. The hoped-for goal is lower cost. But this is more difficult to assess without extensive outsourcing. It is difficult to assess true cost, i.e., the price of this service in the open market. Without a free market for these services, employers are flying blind.

This is a variation of Ludwig von Mises' argument in 1920 that without private capital markets, central planners cannot evaluate economic cost rationally². Murray Rothbard extended this insight to apply to cartels. There will never be a single cartel, for it would not be able to assess costs of production without legally independent resource markets. It would be irrational.³

Conclusion

The high priest did not have to demand an accounting from the contract laborers, because they were independent contractors. They made the decisions regarding how to meet their contracts profitably. That was none of the high priest's business. All he had to do was to receive a receipt for payment upon completion of the work. He had to follow the money from the temple's door to the repairs. He did not have to follow any further.

2. Ludwig von Mises, "Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth" (1920). (<http://mises.org/econcalc.asp>)

3. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), pp. 659–61. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

HOLY DECORATION

Moreover, because I have set my affection to the house of my God, I have of mine own proper good, of gold and silver, which I have given to the house of my God, over and above all that I have prepared for the holy house, Even three thousand talents of gold, of the gold of Ophir, and seven thousand talents of refined silver, to overlay the walls of the houses withal: The gold for things of gold, and the silver for things of silver, and for all manner of work to be made by the hands of artificers. And who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the LORD? Then the chief of the fathers and princes of the tribes of Israel, and the captains of thousands and of hundreds, with the rulers of the king's work, offered willingly, And gave for the service of the house of God of gold five thousand talents and ten thousand drams, and of silver ten thousand talents, and of brass eighteen thousand talents, and one hundred thousand talents of iron. And they with whom precious stones were found gave them to the treasure of the house of the LORD, by the hand of Jehiel the Gershonite. Then the people rejoiced, for that they offered willingly, because with perfect heart they offered willingly to the LORD: and David the king also rejoiced with great joy (1 Chron. 29:3–9).

The theocentric principle here is the legitimacy of sacrifice to honor God.

A. Celebrating God's Majesty

David here enumerates all the treasure that he had accumulated to build the temple. The wealth was enormous. Then the people added far more.

This indicates that God wanted something magnificent to honor him. The temple under Solomon was spectacular. It contained all of this, plus whatever he added.

One of the cries throughout history has been “God wants this money for the poor.” It echoes Judas’ complaint.

Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment. Then saith one of his disciples, Judas Iscariot, Simon’s son, which should betray him, Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor? (John 12:3–5).

Judas had an ulterior motive. “This he said, not that he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein” (v. 6). The critics of cathedrals have not had ulterior motives. They have actually believed the slogan.

This text teaches that precious metals and precious stones are appropriate to celebrate God’s majesty. To celebrate it in this way, individuals must sacrifice great wealth. This sacrifice, like Mary’s, testifies to people’s respect for God and their appreciation of what He has done on their behalf.

The poor are always with us. There are always people in the bottom 20% of national income. If we were to refrain from celebrating God’s majesty until there are no poor, we would never celebrate God’s majesty.

Constructing the temple consumed enormous wealth. It took about 100,000 workers (I Kings 5:13–16) seven years (I Kings 6:38). When completed, Solomon offered sacrifices. “And Solomon offered a sacrifice of peace offerings, which he offered unto the LORD, two and twenty thousand oxen, and an hundred and twenty thousand sheep. So the king and all the children of Israel dedicated the house of the LORD” (I Kings 8:63). All this was expensive.

God had blessed Israel as a nation. The people gave a token payment back to Him. They announced: “We know there is more where that came from.” The magnificence of the temple was their testimony of confidence regarding the future.

B. To Give to the Poor

Giving to the poor was a requirement in the Old Covenant. It is required in the New Covenant. Yet there was no suggestion anywhere in Kings or Chronicles that God was displeased with the temple’s magnificence. Indeed, He had waited a long time for this public adoration.

For I have not dwelt in an house since the day that I brought up Israel unto this day; but have gone from tent to tent, and from one tabernacle to another. Wheresoever I have walked with all Israel, spake I a word to any of the judges of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people, saying, Why have ye not built me an house of cedars? (I Chron. 17:5–6).

God was tired of waiting. Solomon built the temple to please God, not to cheat the poor. The poor did not deserve what David and Solomon and the people lavished on God through the construction of the temple.

The poor have no legal claim on the rich. They do have a moral claim on successful brethren in times of crisis. They are morally entitled to zero-interest charity loans, so long as they are willing to be put into servitude for up to six years, should they default on the loan (Deut. 15:1–7).¹

There were people in economic need in Solomon's day. They had no moral or legal claim on God. They had no moral or legal claim on the people who funded the temple.

Socialist governments spend money on huge government buildings. Keynesian governments spend money on anything they think will get consumers to spend more money, including compulsory wealth-redistribution programs. Every government in history has spent abnormal amounts of money on favored groups and government buildings. Men honor power. When they refuse to honor God, then they generally honor the state.

Conclusion

Not every synagogue was a temple. Not every church building is a cathedral. But to deny in the name of the poor the right of God's people to honor God by a few great representative displays of wealth is to short-change God.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

31

PREDICTABLE NATIONAL SANCTIONS

And the LORD was with Jehoshaphat, because he walked in the first ways of his father David, and sought not unto Baalim; But sought to the LORD God of his father, and walked in his commandments, and not after the doings of Israel. Therefore the LORD stablished the kingdom in his hand; and all Judah brought to Jehoshaphat presents; and he had riches and honour in abundance (II Chron. 17:3–5).

The theocentric principle here is God as the sanctions-bringer in history. These sanctions are distributed in terms of covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking.

A. Representative Obedience

This account of Jehoshaphat, the son of king Asa of Judah, reveals that the system of corporate sanctions described in Deuteronomy 28 was still in operation in Judah. The king was the representative of the kingdom. As such, his adherence to God's law was reckoned by God as applying to the entire nation. Jehoshaphat did what he could to extend the knowledge of biblical law.

Also in the third year of his reign he sent to his princes, even to Ben-hail, and to Obadiah, and to Zechariah, and to Nethaneel, and to Michaiah, to teach in the cities of Judah. And with them he sent Levites, even Shemaiah, and Nethaniah, and Zebadiah, and Asahel, and Shemiramoth, and Jehonathan, and Adonijah, and Tobijah, and Tobadonijah, Levites; and with them Elishama and Jehoram, priests. And they taught in Judah, and had the book of the law of the LORD with them, and went about throughout all the cities of Judah, and taught the people (vv. 7–9).

The result extended across the borders of Judah.

And the fear of the LORD fell upon all the kingdoms of the lands that were round about Judah, so that they made no war against Jehoshaphat. Also some of the Philistines brought Jehoshaphat presents, and tribute silver; and the Arabians brought him flocks, seven thousand and seven hundred rams, and seven thousand and seven hundred he goats (vv. 10–11).

This was peace. This led to the growth of prosperity inside the nation's borders. "And Jehoshaphat waxed great exceedingly; and he built in Judah castles, and cities of store. And he had much business in the cities of Judah: and the men of war, mighty men of valour, were in Jerusalem" (vv. 12–13).

B. A Wicked Alliance

The author records the same account that the author of First Kings did. Jehoshaphat joined with Ahab to attack Syria, on behalf of Ahab, who wanted to regain a city that Syria had captured. Ahab's court prophets prophesied success. Jehoshaphat wanted a second opinion. Ahab called Micaiah. He said that Micaiah had always prophesied negative things for him. This was no exception. But why had the court prophets prophesied success? Micaiah explained why.

Again he said, Therefore hear the word of the LORD; I saw the LORD sitting upon his throne, and all the host of heaven standing on his right hand and on his left. And the LORD said, Who shall entice Ahab king of Israel, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead? And one spake saying after this manner, and another saying after that manner. Then there came out a spirit, and stood before the LORD, and said, I will entice him. And the LORD said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go out, and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And the LORD said, Thou shalt entice him, and thou shalt also prevail: go out, and do even so. Now therefore, behold, the LORD hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of these thy prophets, and the LORD hath spoken evil against thee (II Chron. 18:18–22; cf. I Kings 22:20–23).

In the ensuing battle, Ahab was killed. Jehoshaphat was spared.

And Jehoshaphat the king of Judah returned to his house in peace to Jerusalem. And Jehu the son of Hanani the seer went out to meet him, and said to king Jehoshaphat, Shouldest thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the LORD? therefore is wrath upon thee from before the LORD. Nevertheless there are good things found in thee, in that thou hast taken away the groves out of the land, and hast prepared thine heart to seek God (II Chron. 19:1–3).

C. Righteous Judgment

The king continued to reform the system of civil courts.

And said to the judges, Take heed what ye do: for ye judge not for man, but for the LORD, who is with you in the judgment. Wherefore now let the fear of the LORD be upon you; take heed and do it: for there is no iniquity with the LORD our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts. Moreover in Jerusalem did Jehoshaphat set of the Levites, and of the priests, and of the chief of the fathers of Israel, for the judgment of the LORD, and for controversies, when they returned to Jerusalem. And he charged them, saying, Thus shall ye do in the fear of the LORD, faithfully, and with a perfect heart. And what cause soever shall come to you of your brethren that dwell in their cities, between blood and blood, between law and commandment, statutes and judgments, ye shall even warn them that they trespass not against the LORD, and so wrath come upon you, and upon your brethren: this do, and ye shall not trespass (vv. 6–10).

After this, the Moabites came to attack Judah. Jehoshaphat went publicly before God in the temple. He affirmed the sovereignty of God.

And said, O LORD God of our fathers, art not thou God in heaven? and rulest not thou over all the kingdoms of the heathen? and in thine hand is there not power and might, so that none is able to withstand thee? Art not thou our God, who didst drive out the inhabitants of this land before thy people Israel, and gavest it to the seed of Abraham thy friend for ever? (II Chron. 20:6–7).

The king invoked the promise of the inheritance to bolster his case.

If, when evil cometh upon us, as the sword, judgment, or pestilence, or famine, we stand before this house, and in thy presence, (for thy name is in this house,) and cry unto thee in our affliction, then thou wilt hear and help. And now, behold, the children of Ammon and Moab and mount Seir, whom thou wouldest not let Israel invade, when they came out of the land of Egypt, but they turned from them, and destroyed them not; Behold, I say, how they reward us, to come to cast us out of thy possession, which thou hast given us to inherit. O our God, wilt thou not judge them? for we have no might against this great company that cometh against us; neither know we what to do: but our eyes are upon thee (vv. 9–12).

The nation stood with the king. “And all Judah stood before the LORD, with their little ones, their wives, and their children (v. 13). The king represented them.

A prophet came and told him not to fear, not even to attack the invaders. Just stand at a distance and watch.

And they rose early in the morning, and went forth into the wilderness of Tekoa: and as they went forth, Jehoshaphat stood and said, Hear me, O Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem; Believe in the LORD your God, so shall ye be established; believe his prophets, so shall ye prosper. And when he had consulted with the people, he appointed singers unto the LORD, and that should praise the beauty of holiness, as they went out before the army, and to say, Praise the LORD; for his mercy endureth for ever (vv. 20–21).

The invaders then went to war against themselves (v. 23). “And when Jehoshaphat and his people came to take away the spoil of them, they found among them in abundance both riches with the dead bodies, and precious jewels, which they stripped off for themselves, more than they could carry away: and they were three days in gathering of the spoil, it was so much” (v. 25).

This brought more peace. “And the fear of God was on all the kingdoms of those countries, when they had heard that the LORD fought against the enemies of Israel. So the realm of Jehoshaphat was quiet: for his God gave him rest round about” (vv. 29–30).

D. Another Bad Alliance

The king had not learned his lesson from the alliance with Ahab.

And after this did Jehoshaphat king of Judah join himself with Ahaziah king of Israel, who did very wickedly: And he joined himself with him to make ships to go to Tarshish: and they made the ships in Ezion-gaber. Then Eliezer the son of Dodavah of Mareshah prophesied against Jehoshaphat, saying, Because thou hast joined thyself with Ahaziah, the LORD hath broken thy works. And the ships were broken, that they were not able to go to Tarshish (vv. 35–37).

The negative sanctions were highly specific. The ships were lost. The alliance came to nothing. These negative sanctions warned the king. There is no indication in the text that he did this again. He died peacefully after a long reign. “Now Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David. And Jehoram his son reigned in his stead" (II Chron. 21:1).

Conclusion

King Jehoshaphat experienced highly specific sanctions, both positive and negative, in response to his actions. On one occasion, the sanction was positive despite evil. He was spared by the king of Syria in the battle that Ahab had lured him into. The positive sanction showed that God had honored him for his previous covenantal faithfulness. The prophet said, "Shouldest thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the LORD? therefore is wrath upon thee from before the LORD." What was the wrath? Military defeat. He did this once again, and the losses were specific: the failure of the joint venture with another king of Israel.

Generally, his actions were righteous. Judah experienced the blessings of peace and prosperity as a direct result.

A CORRUPT INHERITANCE

And he had brethren the sons of Jehoshaphat, Azariah, and Jehiel, and Zechariah, and Azariah, and Michael, and Shephatiah: all these were the sons of Jehoshaphat king of Israel. And their father gave them great gifts of silver, and of gold, and of precious things, with fenced cities in Judah: but the kingdom gave he to Jehoram; because he was the firstborn. Now when Jehoram was risen up to the kingdom of his father, he strengthened himself, and slew all his brethren with the sword, and divers also of the princes of Israel. Jehoram was thirty and two years old when he began to reign, and he reigned eight years in Jerusalem. And he walked in the way of the kings of Israel, like as did the house of Ahab: for he had the daughter of Ahab to wife: and he wrought that which was evil in the eyes of the LORD (II Chron. 21:2–6).

The theocentric principle here is inheritance by confession, not bloodline.

A. Inheritance and Disinheritance

The law of inheritance in Deuteronomy regarding the two wives specified that the firstborn son should inherit a double portion.

If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, and they have born him children, both the beloved and the hated; and if the firstborn son be hers that was hated: Then it shall be, when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved firstborn before the son of the hated, which is indeed the firstborn: But he shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the firstborn, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath: for he is the beginning of his strength; the right of the firstborn is his (Deut. 21:15–17).

This was a double portion of the entire inheritance. If a man had a total of five sons, the inheritance would be divided into six portions of equal value. The firstborn son would inherit two portions.¹

There was an associated law regarding lawless adult sons. They were to inherit nothing.

If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them: Then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place; And they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard. And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die: so shalt thou put evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear, and fear (Deut. 21:18–21).

This law mandated execution. A father did not possess this authority. Civil magistrates did. Parents were to bring a public covenant lawsuit against a rebellious son, for the sake of preserving social peace and also the family's good name. Inheritance was not by blood. It was by confession and by conformity to biblical law. The Mosaic law did not allow a lawless son to inherit.²

B. Lawless Inheritance

With respect to the sons of Jehoshaphat, their father should have followed the laws of inheritance with his sons. It appears that he did allow his younger sons to inherit. But the supreme inheritance was the kingship. Here, Jehoshaphat honored the principle of the firstborn. This turned out to be a catastrophic mistake. Jehoram killed all of his brothers. Presumably, this was to cut off all possibility that a prophet or a priest would anoint one of them in place of him, just as Zadok had anointed Solomon in the presence of Nathan the prophet (I Kings 1:39).

Jehoram was in a marital covenant with the daughter of Ahab. If his father had paid attention to the actions of this son, he would not have allowed him to inherit the kingship. But the father honored a different principle: the principle of the firstborn son.

Abraham had not honored this principle. Ishmael was the first-

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 50.

2. Ibid., ch. 51.

born son, not Isaac. Isaac would have allowed Esau to inherit, but God had told Rebekah that Jacob would inherit. Jacob was the second-born. Judah in turn inherited the scepter of civil power from Jacob. “The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be” (Gen. 49:10). Yet Judah was the fourth-born son (Gen. 29:35). Reuben was first. Samuel picked David for the kingship, passing over David’s older brothers. David picked a younger son to succeed him: Solomon. Solomon was the firstborn of Bathsheba. His firstborn was Amnon (II Sam. 3:2). Amnon was a moral monster who raped his own half-sister and then cast her aside (II Sam. 13). The other sons were passed over, killed, or were rejected by David.

And his second, Chileab, of Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite; and the third, Absalom the son of Maacah the daughter of Talmai king of Geshur; And the fourth, Adonijah the son of Haggith; and the fifth, Shephatiah the son of Abital; And the sixth, Ithream, by Eglah David’s wife. These were born to David in Hebron (II Sam 3:3–5).

There were other sons. “And David took him more concubines and wives out of Jerusalem, after he was come from Hebron: and there were yet sons and daughters born to David” (II Sam. 5:13). Only later was Solomon born, and his mother had been an adulteress. Yet David selected Solomon to rule. Solomon was by far the best of David’s sons for the kingship.

Jehoshaphat ignored these precedents. He chose a covenantal rebel to be the king of Judah. This led to the murder of his other sons. Jehoram was covenantally a man of Israel, not Judah.

The author describes disaster after disaster that fell on Judah under Jehoram. Edom successfully revolted (vv. 8–10). Libnah revolted (v. 10). Elijah wrote to him and placed him under a series of curses. “Behold, with a great plague will the LORD smite thy people, and thy children, and thy wives, and all thy goods: And thou shalt have great sickness by disease of thy bowels, until thy bowels fall out by reason of the sickness day by day” (vv. 14–15).

Moreover the LORD stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistines, and of the Arabians, that were near the Ethiopians: And they came up into Judah, and brake into it, and carried away all the substance that was found in the king’s house, and his sons also, and his wives; so that there was never a son left him, save Jehoahaz, the youngest of his sons (vv. 16–17).

He was disinherited by God. He died just as Elijah had prophesied (v. 19). "Thirty and two years old was he when he began to reign, and he reigned in Jerusalem eight years, and departed without being desired. Howbeit they buried him in the city of David, but not in the sepulchres of the kings" (v. 20). He died despised by the nation.

C. Youngest Sons, Oldest Sons

In reaction against Jehoram, the eldest son of Jehoshaphat, the nation of Judah chose Jehoram's youngest son, Ahaziah, to be king. His mother was Athaliah, the daughter of Omri and therefore the sister of Ahab. He was the youngest son, but the oldest surviving son.

And the inhabitants of Jerusalem made Ahaziah his youngest son king in his stead: for the band of men that came with the Arabians to the camp had slain all the eldest. So Ahaziah the son of Jehoram king of Judah reigned. Forty and two years old was Ahaziah when he began to reign, and he reigned one year in Jerusalem. His mother's name also was Athaliah the daughter of Omri. He also walked in the ways of the house of Ahab: for his mother was his counsellor to do wickedly. Wherefore he did evil in the sight of the LORD like the house of Ahab: for they were his counsellors after the death of his father to his destruction. He walked also after their counsel, and went with Jehoram the son of Ahab king of Israel to war against Hazael king of Syria at Ramoth-gilead: and the Syrians smote Joram (II Chron. 22:1-5).

After he was killed in battle, his mother killed all but one of the surviving sons of Jehoram. "But when Athaliah the mother of Ahaziah saw that her son was dead, she arose and destroyed all the seed royal of the house of Judah" (v. 10). This included her own grandsons. One infant son of Ahaziah survived, but only because he was concealed by the wife of a priest: Jehoiada. She was a daughter of Ahab and the sister of King Ahaziah, but she was covenantally faithful to God (II Chron. 22:1). The murderous queen reigned until Jehoiada anointed Ahaziah's surviving son at age seven. He then had the usurping queen executed. "And she looked, and, behold, the king stood at his pillar at the entering in, and the princes and the trumpets by the king: and all the people of the land rejoiced, and sounded with trumpets, also the singers with instruments of musick, and such as taught to sing praise. Then Athaliah rent her clothes, and said, Treason, Treason" (II Chron. 23:13). This was treason against her, but obedience to God. "Then all the people went to the house of Baal, and brake it down, and brake his altars and his images in pieces, and slew Mattan the priest of Baal before the altars” (II Chron. 23:17). This was treason against Baal, but obedience to God. God rewarded Jehoiada by giving him a long lifespan: 130 years (II Chron. 24:15).

“Joash was seven years old when he began to reign, and he reigned forty years in Jerusalem. His mother’s name also was Zibiah of Beersheba. And Joash did that which was right in the sight of the LORD all the days of Jehoiada the priest” (II Chron. 24:1–2). He had been the youngest son of Ahaziah, and the oldest surviving son.

Birth order did not matter. Covenantal commitment mattered.

Conclusion

Jehoshaphat unwisely used the principle of the firstborn son as his standard for judicial inheritance. He did honor the principle of the double portion with respect to economic inheritance. He did not cut off his younger sons. But Jehoram did. He used the power of the sword to defend his inheritance. God then brought negative sanctions against him that cut off his inheritance. God also undermined Judah’s empire by allowing the Edomites to escape from Judah’s rule.

The people had not complained when he allowed the high places of rebellious sacrifice to continue (v. 11). They shared in his guilt. They came under God’s negative sanctions.

33

SUNK COSTS AND FUTURE COSTS

Moreover Amaziah gathered Judah together, and made them captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, according to the houses of their fathers, throughout all Judah and Benjamin: and he numbered them from twenty years old and above, and found them three hundred thousand choice men, able to go forth to war, that could handle spear and shield. He hired also an hundred thousand mighty men of valour out of Israel for an hundred talents of silver (II Chron. 25:5–6).

And Amaziah said to the man of God, But what shall we do for the hundred talents which I have given to the army of Israel? And the man of God answered, The LORD is able to give thee much more than this. Then Amaziah separated them, to wit, the army that was come to him out of Ephraim, to go home again: wherefore their anger was greatly kindled against Judah, and they returned home in great anger (II Chron. 25:9–10).

The theocentric principle here is God as the source of blessings.

A. The Spoils of War

Amaziah, the son of Joash, was planning for a battle with the city state of Seir (II Chron. 25:11). He numbered the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. Because this was in preparation for a holy war, it was legal. He also hired 100,000 troops from the northern kingdom's tribe of Ephraim. He paid them 100 talents of silver.

How much silver was a talent? The common estimation of scholars is 50 shekels to a talent.¹ Let us consider the economic implications of this. What was the military purchasing power of a shekel of silver? Not much. "And a chariot came up and went out of Egypt for six hundred shekels of silver, and an horse for an hundred and fifty: and so for all the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, did they bring them out by their means” (I Kings 10:29).

1. "Weights and Measures," Eerdmans Dictionary of the Bible (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 2000), p. 1375.

Amaziah paid 100,000 warriors 5,000 shekels of silver. That is one-20th of a shekel per warrior. Each man accepted one-20th of a shekel to march off to war: pay for food, risk his life, and come home in one piece. This does not compute.

Here is another biblical example.

And when the children of Ammon saw that they had made themselves odious to David, Hanun and the children of Ammon sent a thousand talents of silver to hire them chariots and horsemen out of Mesopotamia, and out of Syria-maachah, and out of Zobah. So they hired thirty and two thousand chariots, and the king of Maachah and his people; who came and pitched before Medeba. And the children of Ammon gathered themselves together from their cities, and came to battle (I Chron. 19:6–7).

The Ammonites rented a skilled charioteer, a chariot, and at least one horse for a little over one-and-a-half shekels per warrior ($1,000 \times 50 = 50,000/32,000$). A campaign could take weeks. Who fed these men? Who fed the horses? Who paid for repairs? This also does not compute.

What is missing from the story of Amaziah and the rented Ephraimites? The same thing that is missing from the story of the rented Mesopotamian chariots. This: the promise of spoils. To the victor belong the spoils. Warriors risked their lives for spoils. The Bible does not say that in these two cases, there was a promise of sharing in the booty, but the pricing tells us that this had to be the case. When men's lives are on the line, they demand payment.

Amaziah made a small down payment to the men of Ephraim. This was merely a token of his good faith. There was an assumption: they would share in the booty. The text makes no sense on any other assumption.

Then a man of God said not to use them. “But there came a man of God to him, saying, O king, let not the army of Israel go with thee; for the LORD is not with Israel, to wit, with all the children of Ephraim. But if thou wilt go, do it, be strong for the battle: God shall make thee fall before the enemy: for God hath power to help, and to cast down” (II Chron. 25:7–8). This led to Amaziah's question: “And Amaziah said to the man of God, But what shall we do for the hundred talents which I have given to the army of Israel?" (v. 8). The man of God answered: "The LORD is able to give thee much more than this." Amaziah sent the 100,000 troops home with no further payment.

B. He Should Have Paid Them

This enraged the troops. They were being publicly humiliated as unworthy to participate. They were also being denied a share of the booty. They exacted vengeance. "But the soldiers of the army which Amaziah sent back, that they should not go with him to battle, fell upon the cities of Judah, from Samaria even unto Beth-horon, and smote three thousand of them, and took much spoil" (v. 13). This refers to 3,000 people. Beth-horon had been a city inside Ephraim (Josh. 16:5). It bordered on Benjamin. It had been a Levitical city, where the family of Kohath had lived (I Chron. 6:66–68). At some point, Benjamin had taken control of the city. It went into the southern kingdom, referred here collectively as Judah. The Ephraimites got revenge on what they regarded as stolen property.

C. Sunk Costs

Amaziah worried about that expenditure. That was silly. The money was gone. There was no way he could get it back from an army of 100,000 armed men. Yet he worried about it.

This is a common mistake in analysis. If the asset is permanently gone, it should play no role in anyone's calculations. Costs are opportunities foregone. Once the money is gone, it is no longer an opportunity. It is therefore no longer a cost. But people usually do not think of past costs as no longer relevant. They want to get even with their past mistakes. They want to be able to tell themselves, "I did not make a mistake. I did not lose that money." But they did, the moment it was legally transferred to new owners. Economists call such costs "sunk costs." They are not really costs. They are past expenditures.

The man of God said not to worry about the money already paid. God could provide another 100 talents of silver. Amaziah had not accurately calculated the cost of sending them home. He did not calculate his true costs, based on the risk of damage that an invading army could do to a defenseless population while Judah's army was fighting Seir. He was worried about a sunk cost. He was not worried about future costs.

The king had not consulted with any man of God before he hired the Ephraimites. He had hired them rashly. When he was told by a man of God that he had made a mistake, he immediately made four more. First, he worried about a sunk cost, which was not in fact a cost. It was a past action that was irreversible. We cannot allocate lost assets. We can only allocate present assets. Second, he failed to consider the effects of his snub of their military honor. Third, he ignored the implicit assumption of the warriors that they would share in the booty. Fourth, he underestimated the risk of retaliatory action on the part of the armed Ephraimites.

Conclusion

Amaziah was foolish. He worried about something that he could not regain: money already paid. He also ignored the reality of the warriors' assumption of sharing in the booty. He ignored their sense of honor. Finally, he ignored a real cost: the threat from an angry army inside Judah's borders. He did not think he was breaking a contract. He did not explain that he was acting on orders from a man of God. The army imposed damages on civilians.

Warfare is a risky endeavor. When you hire mercenaries, you cannot be sure on whose side they will fight. When you bring an armed force inside your borders, you are creating an opportunity for plunder. Amaziah did not consider this when he agreed to hire the Ephraimites.

CONCLUSION TO KINGS AND CHRONICLES

Moreover all the chief of the priests, and the people, transgressed very much after all the abominations of the heathen; and polluted the house of the LORD which he had hallowed in Jerusalem. And the LORD God of their fathers sent to them by his messengers, rising up betimes, and sending; because he had compassion on his people, and on his dwelling place: But they mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, and misused his prophets, until the wrath of the LORD arose against his people, till there was no remedy. Therefore he brought upon them the king of the Chaldees, who slew their young men with the sword in the house of their sanctuary, and had no compassion upon young man or maiden, old man, or him that stooped for age: he gave them all into his hand (II Chron. 36:14–17).

The theocentric principle here is God as sanctions-bringer.

Solomon built the temple. Almost four centuries later, Nebuchadnezzar sacked it (Ezek. 4:5). He killed men indiscriminately. This was the remedy. This was the final negative sanction that Moses had prophesied. “Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them; for they shall go into captivity” (Deut. 28:41).

Moses had also prophesied about a return from captivity.

And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee, And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul; That then the LORD thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the LORD thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: And the LORD thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers (Deut. 30:1–5).

This was fulfilled under Cyrus, the conqueror of Babylon.

Now in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia, that the word of the LORD spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah might be accomplished, the LORD stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying, Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, All the kingdoms of the earth hath the LORD God of heaven given me; and he hath charged me to build him an house in Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Who is there among you of all his people? The LORD his God be with him, and let him go up (II Chron. 36:22-23).

Isaiah had prophesied this almost two centuries earlier.

“That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid” (Isa. 44:28).

The books of Kings and Chronicles reveal that God did not gain the attention of the Israelites through the imposition of sanctions, either positive or negative. The positive sanctions reinforced them in their self-confidence, just as they reinforced Solomon in his.¹ The negative sanctions were only rarely attributed by the people to their own rebellion. They believed they deserved the positive sanctions, no matter what. They believed they did not deserve the negative sanctions, no matter what. God escalated the negative sanctions. This did no good. Then he brought Nebuchadnezzar to the gates of Jerusalem. No change. Then Nebuchadnezzar broke down the gates.

And in the fifth month, on the seventh day of the month, which is the nineteenth year of king Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, came Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard, a servant of the king of Babylon, unto Jerusalem: And he burnt the house of the LORD, and the king's house, and all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great man's house burnt he with fire. And all the army of the Chaldees, that were with the captain of the guard, brake down the walls of Jerusalem round about (II Kings 25:8–10).

That got their attention. But it took 70 more years of reminders.

1. Chapter 19.

INTRODUCTION TO EZRA

In the Masoretic text of the Hebrew Bible, Ezra and Nehemiah are one book. We know this because at the end of each book, the scribes provided a count of the verses. They also provided an identification of the middle verse of the book. This was so that future copyists would know how many verses there were. This practice reduced the possibility of error-filled copies. Copyists burned or cut up their copies if these copies did not conform to these notations. These notations are lacking at the end of Ezra. At the end of Nehemiah, these numbers refer for both books.¹ This fact is not widely known by Christians.

James Jordan says that Ezra was concerned with the holiness of the sanctuary, while Nehemiah was concerned with the holiness of society. Ezra focused on the temple. Nehemiah focused on the city and its wall.²

The books have the same outline. First, a foreign king authorizes the reestablishment of the God's kingdom (Ezra 1–3; Neh. 1:1–2:16). Second, there is local opposition. Third, the covenant-keepers are successful in completing the building project (Ezra 4:1–6:15; Neh. 2:17–6:19). Fourth, the completion is marked by an act of covenant renewal. Fifth, there is an immediate fall into sin: marriage with foreigners (Ezra 9–10; Neh. 13:4–31).³

Jordan makes the case that Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther deal with the same historical period. He argues that the presence of the name Mordecai in the list of returnees under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2) and again in the list in Nehemiah 7:7 indicates that the time period for these two books was within the lifetime of one man. It was not just Mordecai's name that appears in both lists. Three other names do, too. This was the Mordecai of Esther 10:3.⁴ Furthermore, the names of the priests and Levites who signed the covenant renewal document in Ne-

1. James B. Jordan, Darius, Artaxerxes, and Ahasuerus in the Bible, Studies in Biblical Chronology No. 5 (2001), p. 16.

2. Idem.

3. Ibid., p. 17.

4. Ibid., p. 18.

hemiah's 20th year (Neh. 10:1–8) are similar to the list of names of those who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:1–7) in the first year of Cyrus' decree (Neh. 12:12–21).⁵

In Nehemiah, we read the following:

These are the children of the province, that went up out of the captivity, of those that had been carried away, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away, and came again to Jerusalem and to Judah, every one unto his city (Neh. 7:6).

The comparative handful of returnees⁶ went back at first to Judah and Jerusalem: the southern kingdom. Those whose forebears had come from cities in the southern kingdom returned there. The others returned to their cities. "So the priests, and the Levites, and some of the people, and the singers, and the porters, and the Nethinims, dwelt in their cities, and all Israel in their cities" (Ezra 2:70).

They did not occupy their families' rural plots. They could not. The Persian king had to deal with immigrants from other nations: Samaritans. They had been brought in by the Babylonians to occupy the nearly empty land. The original land distribution of the conquest generation was not restored. This changed the pattern of rural inheritance. The jubilee law had probably not been enforced. After the return, it could not be enforced. The Jews did not possess the legal authority to dispossess the strangers. Ezekiel had announced this at the time of the captivity.

So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 47:21–23).⁷

That was the legal requirement, according to the revised Mosaic

5. Ibid., pp. 19–23.

6. "The whole congregation together was forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore, Beside their servants and their maids, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred thirty and seven: and there were among them two hundred singing men and singing women" (Ezra 2:64–65; cf. Neh. 7:66–67).

7. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 23.

law. The returnees did not possess the authority to do this. Most probably dwelt in their home cities. In walled cities, the jubilee inheritance laws never applied.

And if a man sell a dwelling house in a walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold; within a full year may he redeem it. And if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house that is in the walled city shall be established for ever to him that bought it throughout his generations: it shall not go out in the jubile (Lev. 25:29–30).

The returnees would intermix geographically with Samaritans, who now lived where their forefathers had lived. They headed initially into cities.

TO REBUILD THE TEMPLE

Now in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia, that the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled, the LORD stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying, Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, The LORD God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and he hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Who is there among you of all his people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of the LORD God of Israel, (he is the God,) which is in Jerusalem. And whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts, beside the freewill offering for the house of God that is in Jerusalem (Ezra 1:1–4).

The theocentric principle here is the centrality of the temple in the life of Israel. It was the residence of God in history. This was understood by a Medo-Persian king.

A. Cyrus

Two centuries earlier, Isaiah had prophesied of Cyrus.

Thus saith the LORD, thy redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I am the LORD that maketh all things; that stretcheth forth the heavens alone; that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself; That frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad; that turneth wise men backward, and maketh their knowledge foolish; That confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messengers; that saith to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be inhabited; and to the cities of Judah, Ye shall be built, and I will raise up the decayed places thereof: That saith to the deep, Be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid (Isa. 44:24–28).

This prophecy was about to come true. This prophecy, more than anything else, is why the higher critics of the Bible invented a theory of a second Isaiah, called Deutero-Isaiah, who supposedly wrote the second half of the book after the exile ended. Rationalists and humanists cannot accept the possibility that anyone can know the future with such precision. Such a possibility undermines their concept of cause (before) and effect (after). The central idea of prophecy is foreign to them, namely, that God controls the future.

B. The Funding of the Temple

Cyrus understood that the temple should become the center of worship for Israel. The Jews should pay for the rebuilding of the temple, which Nebuchadnezzar had torn down. It was not the economic responsibility of other nations within the Medo-Persian empire, the empire that had replaced Babylon's.

He understood that he had a crucial role to play in this. He said that God "hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem." As God's designated and long-propheesied agent, he had the authority to identify who should fund the rebuilding: those who followed the God whose temple it had been and would be once again.

He recognized that not all Jews would return to Israel. "And whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts, beside the freewill offering for the house of God that is in Jerusalem." The Jews who stayed behind had an obligation to fund those who would return and do the work of rebuilding. They all had the same confession of faith:

Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD: And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates (Deut. 6:4–9).

They also all relied on the same repretative sacrificial system, which required the temple.

Cyrus recognized that the Jews were different. They had been removed from their land, yet their God was still at the center of their lives. This was not a local god, unlike other gods of the ancient Near East. This God made claims on the lives of His people, even though most of them would not return to Israel. Those who remained behind were no less Jews. The sacrifices would be offered on their behalf.

This recognition was crucial to the future of the Jews. No matter where they resided, for as long as the temple was in Jerusalem, they would remain a separate nation. They were bound by covenant oath, covenant sign (circumcision), and covenant renewal (Passover). This solidarity survived the destruction of the second temple in 70 A.D.

Cyrus restored the treasures that had been removed from the temple. “Also Cyrus the king brought forth the vessels of the house of the LORD, which Nebuchadnezzar had brought forth out of Jerusalem, and had put them in the house of his gods; Even those did Cyrus king of Persia bring forth by the hand of Mithredath the treasurer, and numbered them unto Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah” (Ezra 1:7–8). There had been an accounting under Nebuchadzezzar. These account books had been retained by Cyrus. The transition of empires involved the transition of accounting records.

C. The Returnees

The leader was Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2). A total of 42,360 members of the congregation—citizens of the nation—returned to Israel. In addition, there were 7,337 servants, plus 200 singers (vv. 64–65). This was a small group. Some of them were rich.

And some of the chief of the fathers, when they came to the house of the LORD which is at Jerusalem, offered freely for the house of God to set it up in his place: They gave after their ability unto the treasure of the work threescore and one thousand drams of gold, and five thousand pound of silver, and one hundred priests’ garments (vv. 68–69).

This indicates that those who returned were not economic failures in Babylon. Some had been highly successful. They were willing to pioneer the return to a holy land whose population had been brought in from outside the region. They were not going back for business opportunities. They were going back for the temple’s sake.

Conclusion

Cyrus was God's representative civil agent in history. Through his actions, a representative group of Jews returned to Israel and constructed the temple. The temple would serve the dispersed Jews as their representative place of sacrifice. Most of them remained outside Israel.

Cyrus required the Jews to fund the building of the temple. This was not the responsibility of the Medo-Persian state. He returned the stolen treasures of the temple. That was the limit of the state's contribution to the project.

SYNCRETISM'S ENVY

Now when the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin heard that the children of the captivity builded the temple unto the LORD God of Israel; Then they came to Zerubbabel, and to the chief of the fathers, and said unto them, Let us build with you: for we seek your God, as ye do; and we do sacrifice unto him since the days of Esar-haddon king of Assur, which brought us up hither. But Zerubbabel, and Jeshua, and the rest of the chief of the fathers of Israel, said unto them, Ye have nothing to do with us to build an house unto our God; but we ourselves together will build unto the LORD God of Israel, as king Cyrus the king of Persia hath commanded us (Ezra 4:1–4).

The theocentric principle here is the covenantal oath as the basis of membership in God's church.

A. Syncretism and Rebellion

Syncretism is the mixing of rival religious systems. As we shall see in this passage, syncretism is not acceptable to God.

Those residents of the land of Israel who were not bound by covenant oath to the God of Israel would not be allowed to fund the rebuilding of the temple. They would not share in the costs. They would gain the benefits associated with common grace: partial healing but without redemption.¹ They would not share in the benefits associated with special grace: redemption. It was not possible to obtain a portion of God's covenant special grace apart from covenantal subordination to God. This subordination was marked by an oath-sign: circumcision.

These residents were Samaritans. They had been brought into the Promised Land to replace the kidnapped Israelites. They had gained some knowledge of God from their time in the land. So, their representatives insisted, "We seek your God, as ye do; and we do sacrifice unto him since the days of Esar-haddon king of Assur, which brought us up hither."

1. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

Their offer to co-fund the temple's construction was rejected by the leaders of Israel. It was clear to the Israel's leaders that the commitment of these foreigners was not grounded in God's covenant with Abraham. They could become members of the nation through confession and circumcision. They were not requesting membership in the covenant. They were requesting co-participation apart from binding covenant oath. Their request was rejected forcefully.

B. Envy in Action

Envy is a highly destructive sin. The envious person seeks to tear down others, despite the fact that tearing down others does not benefit him. The envious person is obsessed with the idea that someone else possesses an advantage that he cannot attain. This difference is an affront to him. He refuses to accept it. He seeks to remove it—not by attaining something else of value for himself but by destroying the advantage possessed by the other person.²

1. The Samaritans

The Samaritans' leaders did not accept rejection by the leaders of Israel. They sought to remove the advantage that the Jews would possess through the temple. Even though the Samaritans did not have to finance any part of the temple, they wanted to prevent its construction.

Then the people of the land weakened the hands of the people of Judah, and troubled them in building, And hired counsellors against them, to frustrate their purpose, all the days of Cyrus king of Persia, even until the reign of Darius king of Persia (vv. 4–5).

Cyrus sent the Jews to Israel in 538 B.C. The reign of Darius the Great began around 522 B.C., 16 years later. He ruled until 486 B.C. He was the king who invaded Greece. He lost the Battle of Marathon in 490 B.C.

2. Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, [1966] 1970). Reprinted by the Liberty Fund, 1987.

2. Ahasuerus

“And in the reign of Ahasuerus, in the beginning of his reign, wrote they unto him an accusation against the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem” (v. 6). Who was Ahasuerus? The Apocryphal book, I Esdras, identifies him as Darius. It cites the parallel account of a great banquet (Esther 1:1–3), but instead of naming the king Ahasuerus, as the Book of Esther does, it identifies him as Darius (I Esdras 3:1–3). James Jordan presented a strong case that Ahasuerus was another name for Darius the Great.³ So did Floyd Nolen Jones.⁴ Jordan argued that the names were throne names that expressed the greatness of the king.⁵ Furthermore, the list of people who returned with Zerubbabel in Cyrus’ first year (Neh. 12:1–9) is similar to the list of covenanting Levites and priests who signed the covenant with Nehemiah after the building of the wall (Neh. 10:1–12). The list of names of the returnees under Ezra includes Mordecai (Ezra 2:2). So does the list in Nehemiah 7:7. Nehemiah’s list refers to the era after the wall of Jerusalem had been rebuilt (Neh. 7:1).⁶

In the early days of Ahasuerus, the prophets Haggai and Zechariah preached against the Jews for not finishing the construction of the temple (Ezra 5:1).

In the second year of Darius the king, in the sixth month, in the first day of the month, came the word of the LORD by Haggai the prophet unto Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and to Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, saying, Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, saying, This people say, The time is not come, the time that the LORD’S house should be built (Hag. 1:1–2).

In the eighth month, in the second year of Darius, came the word of the LORD unto Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo the prophet, saying, The LORD hath been sore displeased with your fathers (Zech. 1:1–2).

3. Rebuilding

The Jews began rebuilding both the temple (Ezra 4:2) and the

3. James B. Jordan, Darius, Artaxerxes, and Ahasuerus in the Bible, Studies in Biblical Chronology No. 5 (2001); “Esther: Historical & Chronological Comments (III), Biblical Chronology Newsletter (May 1996).

4. Floyd Nolen Jones, The Chronology of the Old Testament, 15th ed. (Green Forest, Arkansas: New Leaf Press, 2005), pp. 201–5.

5. Jordan, Darius, ch. 2.

6. Ibid., ch. 3.

broken wall of the city (Neh. 4:6–11). The local governor then demanded to know who had authorized this.

At the same time came to them Tatnai, governor on this side the river, and Shethar-boznai, and their companions, and said thus unto them, Who hath commanded you to build this house, and to make up this wall? Then said we unto them after this manner, What are the names of the men that make this building? (Ezra 5:3–4).

This is the universal initial challenge by every official: “Where is your written authorization?” If there is no official piece of paper, there is no authorization. Here is the bureaucrat’s assumption: “That which has not been officially authorized is not permitted.” This is the opposite of the rule governing God’s kingdom, beginning in the garden of Eden: “That which has not been officially prohibited is authorized.”

And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die (Gen. 2:16–17).

Furthermore, the governor asked, who authorized this project locally? Who claimed such authority? He wanted names. This procedure usually terrifies the targeted victims. Not in this case. “But the eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, that they could not cause them to cease, till the matter came to Darius: and then they returned answer by letter concerning this matter” (Ezra 5:5).

C. Letters from Lawyers

Local Samaritans then wrote Darius a letter. This letter is a fine example of the lawyer’s deliberately deceptive special pleading.

1. Making the Case

It raised questions of legality. It asked whether this construction project had been officially authorized. This would create doubt in the minds of senior officials under Darius. Doubt regarding authorization might pressure high officials to halt work on the project until the paperwork was in order.

Be it known unto the king, that the Jews which came up from thee to us are come unto Jerusalem, building the rebellious and the bad city, and have set up the walls thereof, and joined the foundations. Be it known now unto the king, that, if this city be builded, and the walls set up again, then will they not pay toll, tribute, and custom, and so thou shalt endamage the revenue of the kings (vv. 12–13).

This was guilt by association: the Jews were the heirs of the former residents of the land who had unsuccessfully resisted Nebuchadnezzar. Yet this letter was sent to officials of an empire that had overthrown Babylon. Why would they care if Jews had given trouble to Babylon? The Medo-Persian empire had given Babylon far more trouble. Nevertheless, bureaucrats have the same mentality everywhere and in all eras. They do not like resistance to official orders. They also do not like to see creativity that has not been officially approved.

The letter did not mention the temple. It mentioned only the city's wall. Walls were a mark of sovereignty: a technical means for local residents to increase the cost of law-enforcement by the empire. Walls are defensive. Who could the walls be designed to resist, if not the empire? The letter planted seeds of doubt.

Next, the letter asserted that the inquiry was motivated solely out of loyalty to the king. The Samaritans were loyal members of the imperial system: recipients of the king's money. There was no hidden agenda here. No, indeed; the king's well-being was all that mattered to them.

Now because we have maintenance from the king's palace, and it was not meet for us to see the king's dishonour, therefore have we sent and certified the king; That search may be made in the book of the records of thy fathers: so shalt thou find in the book of the records, and know that this city is a rebellious city, and hurtful unto kings and provinces, and that they have moved sedition within the same of old time: for which cause was this city destroyed. We certify the king that, if this city be builded again, and the walls thereof set up, by this means thou shalt have no portion on this side the river (vv. 14–16).

They referred the recipient to old records: records of Israel's rebellion against an earlier empire. These are rebellious people, the letter said. The city's wall could have only one goal: resistance to lawful authority.

The strategy worked. Darius ordered his subordinates to examine the pre-exilic records of the Israelites. These written records had been transferred to the archives of the new empire. They showed that the accusation was accurate. These people had once been powerful, collecting tribute from other nations. They had resisted imperial authority. Darius sent a letter back to the critics.

And I commanded, and search hath been made, and it is found that this city of old time hath made insurrection against kings, and that rebellion and sedition have been made therein. There have been mighty kings also over Jerusalem, which have ruled over all countries beyond the river; and toll, tribute, and custom, was paid unto them. Give ye now commandment to cause these men to cease, and that this city be not builded, until another commandment shall be given from me. Take heed now that ye fail not to do this: why should damage grow to the hurt of the kings? (vv. 19–22).

That was what the Samaritans wanted to hear. The reconstruction of Jerusalem was halted, by order of the king. “Then ceased the work of the house of God which is at Jerusalem. So it ceased unto the second year of the reign of Darius king of Persia” (v. 24). This had been the goal of the Samaritans from the beginning. They were after a universal cessation of construction because this would stop work on the temple.

2. A Counter-Letter

The Jews also knew how to play the lawyer’s game. They gave an answer to the governor. The governor summarized their answer in his subsequent letter to Darius. The Jews got right to the point at hand: the issue was the construction of the temple, not the building of the wall. The local officials summarized the Jews’ argument in a letter to the king.

They sent a letter unto him, wherein was written thus; Unto Darius the king, all peace. Be it known unto the king, that we went into the province of Judea, to the house of the great God, which is builded with great stones, and timber is laid in the walls, and this work goeth fast on, and prospereth in their hands. Then asked we those elders, and said unto them thus, Who commanded you to build this house, and to make up these walls?

The local governor assured the king that he and his colleagues had followed to the letter the king’s instructions in his letter. They had gone beyond the king’s instructions in their quest to enforce his letter—a common practice by bureaucrats down through the ages: going beyond what was mandated from on high. They had asked for the names of the leaders.

The Jewish leaders responded to this inquiry by admitting that they had indeed been a rebellious people, thereby undermining to the Samaritans' tactic. The God of Israel had also been upset with the Jews, so He let them be carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar. This shifted the terms of the dispute away from political rebellion to theology. That in turn brought the main topic to the forefront: the construction of the temple. The local officials summarized this verbal exchange.

We asked their names also, to certify thee, that we might write the names of the men that were the chief of them. And thus they returned us answer, saying, We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth, and build the house that was builded these many years ago, which a great king of Israel builded and set up. But after that our fathers had provoked the God of heaven unto wrath, he gave them into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, the Chaldean, who destroyed this house, and carried the people away into Babylon (7–12).

The Jewish leaders went beyond the distant history of Babylon, where the Samaritans wanted to confine it, to the more recent history of Medo-Persia. They responded in kind to the governor. "You want names. Have we got names!"

But in the first year of Cyrus the king of Babylon the same king Cyrus made a decree to build this house of God. And the vessels also of gold and silver of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezzar took out of the temple that was in Jerusalem, and brought them into the temple of Babylon, those did Cyrus the king take out of the temple of Babylon, and they were delivered unto one, whose name was Sheshbazzar, whom he had made governor; And said unto him, Take these vessels, go, carry them into the temple that is in Jerusalem, and let the house of God be builded in his place. Then came the same Sheshbazzar, and laid the foundation of the house of God which is in Jerusalem: and since that time even until now hath it been in building, and yet it is not finished (13–16).

The Jews had the biggest name of all: Cyrus. He had issued a decree regarding the construction of the temple. They had another name, the name of Cyrus's enforcer, Sheshbazzar. This man came 600 miles with the people to lay the foundation of the temple. Laying the foundation was a covenantal act. In this case, it was an act of state. As an agent of the king, this man had participated in the construction of the temple.

The Jews by now knew how to deal with bureaucrats. They hinted ever so obliquely to the problem now facing the local bureaucrats. The local bureaucrats had halted work on the temple. This was risky. This was thwarting the decree of Cyrus: “Even until now hath it been in building, and yet it is not finished.” The bureaucrats took the hint.

D. Two Men Called Darius

1. Darius the Mede (Cyrus)

In Medo-Persia, thwarting a decree of the king was a dangerous thing to do. By this time in Darius the Great’s reign, the story of Daniel and the lions’ den would have been widely known by bureaucrats. The envious religious and political leaders of Medo-Persia had sought to entrap Daniel, who had been a Jew of authority in Babylon’s empire. They persuaded the earlier Darius, Darius the Mede (Cyrus),⁷ to decree that no one should petition his god for 30 days. “Establish the decree, and sign the writing, that it be not changed, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not. Wherefore king Darius signed the writing and the decree” (Dan. 6:8b-9). It was a stupid law, but Darius signed it anyway. Daniel had then refused to obey, as the officials knew he would. They brought evidence that he had worshipped the God of Israel. But they laid the verbal groundwork before they presented their evidence. “Then they came near, and spake before the king concerning the king’s decree; Hast thou not signed a decree, that every man that shall ask a petition of any God or man within thirty days, save of thee, O king, shall be cast into the den of lions? The king answered and said, The thing is true, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not” (Dan. 6:12). They then brought charges against Daniel. The king was trapped.

Then the king, when he heard these words, was sore displeased with himself, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him: and he laboured till the going down of the sun to deliver him. Then these men assembled unto the king, and said unto the king, Know, O king, that the law of the Medes and Persians is, That no decree nor statute which the king establisheth may be changed (Dan. 6:14–15).

When Daniel survived the ordeal in the lions’ den, Darius the Mede (Cyrus) placed the scheming officials and their families in the lions' den. The officials had fully understood the law of the Medes and Persians, but they had not understood the risk.

7. James B. Jordan, The Handwriting on the Wall: A Commentary on The Book of Daniel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009), ch. 12.

2. Darius the Great

The local governors of Israel understood the risk. They also understood the way out of their dilemma. They asked the king to look it up. Check the records. Perhaps there is evidence to support the Jews' claim.

Now therefore, if it seem good to the king, let there be search made in the king's treasure house, which is there at Babylon, whether it be so, that a decree was made of Cyrus the king to build this house of God at Jerusalem, and let the king send his pleasure to us concerning this matter. Then Darius the king made a decree, and search was made in the house of the rolls, where the treasures were laid up in Babylon (Ezra 5:17–6:1).

Lo and behold, there was an official record. And was it detailed!

And there was found at Achmetha, in the palace that is in the province of the Medes, a roll, and therein was a record thus written: In the first year of Cyrus the king the same Cyrus the king made a decree concerning the house of God at Jerusalem, Let the house be builded, the place where they offered sacrifices, and let the foundations thereof be strongly laid; the height thereof threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof threescore cubits; With three rows of great stones, and a row of new timber: and let the expences be given out of the king's house: And also let the golden and silver vessels of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezzar took forth out of the temple which is at Jerusalem, and brought unto Babylon, be restored, and brought again unto the temple which is at Jerusalem, every one to his place, and place them in the house of God (Ezra 6:2–5).

That ended the dispute. The Samaritans' legal strategy blew up in their faces. In the lawyers' game of looking it up, the Jews had compelling evidence. The king then compensated for his officials' not having looked things up more carefully. He instructed the local officials in no uncertain terms.

Now therefore, Tatnai, governor beyond the river, Shethar-boznai, and your companions the Apharsachites, which are beyond the river, be ye far from thence: Let the work of this house of God alone; let the governor of the Jews and the elders of the Jews build this house of God in his place. Moreover I make a decree what ye shall do to the elders of these Jews for the building of this house of God: that of the king's goods, even of the tribute beyond the river, forthwith expences be given unto these men, that they be not hindered. And that which they have need of, both young bullocks, and rams, and lambs, for the burnt offerings of the God of heaven, wheat, salt, wine, and oil, according to the appointment of the priests which are at Jerusalem, let it be given them day by day without fail: That they may offer sacrifices of sweet savours unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king, and of his sons. Also I have made a decree, that whosoever shall alter this word, let timber be pulled down from his house, and being set up, let him be hanged thereon; and let his house be made a dunghill for this. And the God that hath caused his name to dwell there destroy all kings and people, that shall put to their hand to alter and to destroy this house of God which is at Jerusalem. I Darius have made a decree; let it be done with speed (6–12).

The recipients of this letter had no doubt about their next steps. "Then Tatnai, governor on this side the river, Shethar-boznai, and their companions, according to that which Darius the king had sent, so they did speedily" (v. 13).

And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet and Zechariah the son of Iddo. And they builded, and finished it, according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to the commandment of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes king of Persia. And this house was finished on the third day of the month Adar, which was in the sixth year of the reign of Darius the king (14–15).

D. Syncretism vs. Subordination

The Samaritans had asked to be a part of the building of the temple. They wanted co-participation covenantally. They claimed to worship the God of Israel. But they were uncircumcised. They were not willing to come under the Mosaic law. So, their offer was rejected.

In contrast, Cyrus and Darius recognized that the God of Israel possessed enormous power. They respected power. Darius knew that he had unwittingly hindered the building of the temple. He was making restitution. He wrote, "of the king's goods, even of the tribute beyond the river, forthwith expences be given unto these men, that they be not hindered." He wanted to speed up the construction process. He also formally brought sacrifices to the God of Israel: "young bullocks, and rams, and lambs, for the burnt offerings of the God of heaven, wheat, salt, wine, and oil, according to the appointment of the priests which are at Jerusalem, let it be given them day by day without fail: That they may offer sacrifices of sweet savours unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king, and of his sons.” He was subordinating himself and his sons—his inheritance—under the God of Israel. He did not do so as a circumcised Israelite, but as a man who wanted the prayers of Israelites. He was not petitioning as a would-be equal, but as a humble servant of Israel’s God. The Jews had no objection.

Publicly, neither did the Samaritans.

Conclusion

This incident illustrates a fundamental biblical principle: the rejection of syncretism. He who is not under the covenant’s laws by oath is not to become a joint participant. He may kneel before God as a suppliant. He may not be kneeled to as a covenantal representative of God’s ecclesiastical covenant.

The Samaritan leaders said that “we seek your God, as ye do; and we do sacrifice unto him.” They were like a person who is trying to get into a military base’s strategic planning center, but without either a uniform or papers. The person may insist that he is a big supporter of the military. The guard must not let him into the secured area. He is not under official authority, so he is not allowed to make official decisions. He is allowed to attend a parade. He is not entitled to plan one.

36

FREEWILL OFFERINGS BY PERSIAN RULERS

Forasmuch as thou art sent of the king, and of his seven counsellors, to enquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem, according to the law of thy God which is in thine hand; And to carry the silver and gold, which the king and his counsellors have freely offered unto the God of Israel, whose habitation is in Jerusalem, And all the silver and gold that thou canst find in all the province of Babylon, with the freewill offering of the people, and of the priests, offering willingly for the house of their God which is in Jerusalem: That thou mayest buy speedily with this money bullocks, rams, lambs, with their meat offerings and their drink offerings, and offer them upon the altar of the house of your God which is in Jerusalem. And whatsoever shall seem good to thee, and to thy brethren, to do with the rest of the silver and the gold, that do after the will of your God (Ezra 7:14–18).

The theocentric principle is subordination to God through voluntary sacrifice.

A. Religious Liberty

In the seventh year of his reign (v. 7), Darius/Artaxerxes sent Ezra the scribe, Levites, and priests to Jerusalem. They went of their own accord (v. 13). This was at least six years after the exchange of letters regarding the rebuilding of the temple. That dispute had begun in his first year (4:6).

Cyrus conquered Babylon around 538 B.C. He immediately authorized the Jews' return to Jerusalem (Ezra 1:1). He died in 530 B.C. Darius the Great came to power in 522. So, the dispute began about 16 years after Cyrus authorized the return to Jerusalem. Then it was at least another six years until Ezra returned to Jerusalem (7:7).

The king and his advisors sent silver and gold with Ezra. They trusted him to use it for the purpose of sacrifice. The king and his counselors were submitting to the authority of Israel's God as non-members of the covenant. They were subordinating themselves to God, but not by means of a covenant oath. They were not placing themselves under the Mosaic law, but they were promoting that law-order for the Israelites. The king's decree identified Ezra as "a scribe of the law of the God of heaven" (v. 12). He even exempted them from taxation. "Also we certify you, that touching any of the priests and Levites, singers, porters, Nethinims, or ministers of this house of God, it shall not be lawful to impose toll, tribute, or custom, upon them" (v. 24).

He placed Ezra over the people as a civil ruler—an agent of the king. "And thou, Ezra, after the wisdom of thy God, that is in thine hand, set magistrates and judges, which may judge all the people that are beyond the river, all such as know the laws of thy God; and teach ye them that know them not" (v. 25). That is, he authorized the Mosaic law as the civil law of this province. He placed civil sanctions in Ezra's hand. "And whosoever will not do the law of thy God, and the law of the king, let judgment be executed speedily upon him, whether it be unto death, or to banishment, or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment" (v. 26).

This was extraordinary. Persia allowed the Jews to govern themselves by means of God's law. Jews possessed religious liberty. In contrast, the Greeks at this time were divided into city-states, each with its own gods and its own laws. These cities were at war with each other constantly. There was no freedom of religion there for citizens as Greeks. Every citizen had to be a member of the city's religious cult. There was no religious pluralism in Greece: freedom of religion under a single legal order. There was no central government.

Western historians cheer the Greeks in the Persian wars (498–444 B.C.). The Persians are seen as the evil, tyrannical invaders. Yet it was the Persians, not the classical Greeks, who established religious freedom.

B. Covenant-Breakers' Donations

The rulers of Persia were covenant-breakers. They were outside the kingdom of God. They had no inheritance in this kingdom. But they possessed great power. The people of God were under their jurisdiction.

The rulers had three covenantal options: (1) formally covenant with the God of the Bible through circumcision and obedience to God's revealed laws; (2) remain outside the covenant, but publicly support the work of God's kingdom; (3) remain outside the covenant and persecute the people of God. Initially, Nebuchadnezzar did the third. Then he repented (Dan. 4). He did the first. Darius the Mede (Cyrus) and Darius the Great did the second. They made freewill offerings to the kingdom of God by supporting the building of the temple and offering animal sacrifices. The cost of building the temple was reduced because of this.

The question arises: Was there a hidden cost of these offerings? Did the kings exercise greater authority over the church/priesthood because of these gifts? The texts do not indicate that this was the case. The temple cost the Jews less to build than would otherwise have been the case. But the sacrifices were part of a system of sacrifice that did not benefit the nation directly. The priests had more meat to eat, but they also had more work to perform. There was an occasional advantage for the priests, but the only advantage for the public would have been if the priests sold this post-sacrificial meat to the general public. There was no authorization for this in the Mosaic law. "And that which is left of the meat offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the LORD made by fire" (Lev. 2:10). "And all the meat offering that is baken in the oven, and all that is dressed in the fryingpan, and in the pan, shall be the priest's that offereth it" (Lev. 7:9).

Covenant-breakers could give to God through gifts to the temple or the priesthood. This gained them no permanent advantage institutionally. It did reveal publicly that the covenant-breakers did acknowledge some degree of sovereignty for God. God was at least entitled to be part of the pantheon of civic gods in the empire.

Conclusion

Darius and his top advisors donated gold and silver to the temple. They also provided animals to sacrifice on their behalf. This was not an attempt to gain civil power over the Jews. The king already possessed such power. The gifts were formal acts of personal subordination to God. This subordination was not covenantal. It was personal. They were not placing themselves under the laws of God. They were funding the ecclesiastical order that placed the Jews under the Mosaic law.

Ezra rejoiced:

Blessed be the LORD God of our fathers, which hath put such a thing as this in the king's heart, to beautify the house of the LORD which is in Jerusalem: And hath extended mercy unto me before the king, and his counsellors, and before all the king's mighty princes. And I was strengthened as the hand of the LORD my God was upon me, and I gathered together out of Israel chief men to go up with me (Ezra 7:27–28).

As it turned out, the Jews delayed rebuilding the city's wall for another 13 years (Neh. 2:1–5). It was the temple, not the wall, that had been foremost in their thinking.

CONCLUSION TO EZRA

And Shechaniah the son of Jehiel, one of the sons of Elam, answered and said unto Ezra, We have trespassed against our God, and have taken strange wives of the people of the land: yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing. Now therefore let us make a covenant with our God to put away all the wives, and such as are born of them, according to the counsel of my lord, and of those that tremble at the commandment of our God; and let it be done according to the law (Ezra 10:2–3).

Separation of covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers was mandatory to avoid syncretism, defined as a mixture of confessions about God within a single oath-bound covenantal institution. The Jewish leaders had rejected the Samaritans' request that they be allowed to participate in the building of the temple. But what about the syncretism of their families? Could that lawfully continue?

This passage indicates that the men of Israel also ended their mixed marriages through permanent separation. This included the children of these marriages. They did this for the sake of God's covenant. They cast out these covenant-breakers from their midst, just as Abraham had cast out Hagar and Ishmael. The temple was now finished. They would not bring their covenant-breaking family members into the temple's grounds. This is the background for Jesus' warning: "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me" (Matt. 10:37). One implication of this declaration is the refutation of one of secular conservatism's most widely believed assertions, namely, that the family is the most important human institution. It is not. The institutional church is the most important human institution. The family will not extend into eternity.¹ The church will.

Ezra oversaw the construction of the temple. The animal sacrifices

1. "Jesus answered and said unto them, Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. 22:29–30).

could now be restored. The separation between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers ecclesiastically now had a physical representation: the temple's walls. The Ark of the Covenant was gone, but the symbolic separation of the holy of holies still stood: the veil of the temple.² This representation then led to the separation of family members from heads of households. At this point, both church and family manifested the division established by covenant. What now needed to be separated representatively was the civil government. This separation could not be accomplished until the wall of Jerusalem was rebuilt, including the gates. That was the next step in the restoration process. That is the subject of the Book of Nehemiah.

2. "And Jesus cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost. And the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom" (Mark 15:37–38).

INTRODUCTION TO NEHEMIAH

These are the children of the province, that went up out of the captivity, of those that had been carried away, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away, and came again to Jerusalem and to Judah, every one unto his city (Neh. 7:6).

The comparative handful of returnees¹ went back at first to Judah and Jerusalem: the southern kingdom. Those whose forebears had come from cities in the southern kingdom returned there. The others returned to their cities. “So the priests, and the Levites, and some of the people, and the singers, and the porters, and the Nethinims, dwelt in their cities, and all Israel in their cities” (Ezra 2:70).

They did not occupy their families’ rural plots. They could not. The Persian king had to deal with immigrants from other nations: Samaritans. They had been brought in by the Babylonians to occupy the nearly empty land. The original land distribution of the conquest generation was not restored. This changed the pattern of rural inheritance. The jubilee law had probably not been enforced. After the return, it could not be enforced. The Jews did not possess the legal authority to dispossess the strangers. Ezekiel had announced this at the time of the captivity.

So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 47:21–23).²

1. “The whole congregation together was forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore, Beside their servants and their maids, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred thirty and seven: and there were among them two hundred singing men and singing women” (Ezra 2:64–65; cf. Neh. 7:66–67).

2. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the

That was the legal requirement, according to the revised Mosaic law. The returnees did not possess the authority to enforce this. Most probably dwelt in their home cities. In walled cities, the jubilee inheritance laws never applied.

And if a man sell a dwelling house in a walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold; within a full year may he redeem it. And if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house that is in the walled city shall be established for ever to him that bought it throughout his generations: it shall not go out in the jubile (Lev. 25:29–30).

The returnees would intermix geographically with Samaritans, who now lived where their forefathers had lived. They headed initially into cities.

Jerusalem was the central city because it was where the temple was. Nehemiah recognized that this city required a wall of separation between the temple and the covenant-breaking residents of the land. He devoted himself to seeing to it that the wall surrounding Jerusalem was rebuilt and maintained. This was 36 years after the Jews had returned to Jerusalem from the former Babylonian empire. They returned from the region of the Euphrates River.

The Book of Nehemiah is about rebuilding Jerusalem's wall.

A WALL OF COVENANTAL SEPARATION

And they said unto me, The remnant that are left of the captivity there in the province are in great affliction and reproach: the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire (Neh. 1:3).

The theocentric focus of this passage is the residence of God in Israel. He resided inside the temple, which was His house. There were physical barriers around the sacrifices of the temple: the temple's walls. Another barrier was civil as well as ecclesiastical: the city's wall.

A. The Covenant's Sanctions

Nehemiah says that he was the cupbearer to the king (Neh. 1:11). His task was be sure that no one poisoned the king's drink. Generally, a cupbearer drank from the same source of wine that the king would be served. If it was poisoned, he would die. He then made sure that there was no intermediary between him and king. His was a life-and-death office. It mandated daily contact with the king.

When he learned that the wall was still in ruins, he prayed to God. He prayed as a representative of the people, confessing their sins on their behalf (Neh. 1:5–9). He reminded God of His covenant. "And said, I beseech thee, O LORD God of heaven, the great and terrible God, that keepeth covenant and mercy for them that love him and observe his commandments" (v. 5). Nehemiah's prayer was representative.

Let thine ear now be attentive, and thine eyes open, that thou mayest hear the prayer of thy servant, which I pray before thee now, day and night, for the children of Israel thy servants, and confess the sins of the children of Israel, which we have sinned against thee: both I and my father's house have sinned (v. 6).

He was not a Levite or a priest. He was not a prophet. He was an official in the king's service. The king was in authority over the Jews. He therefore was in a position to help the Jews who resided in Jerusalem. As an agent in a position to help, Nehemiah prayed on their behalf.

First, he reminded God that he knew that the Mosaic law had warned the people that they would be scattered if they refused to obey the law.

And it shall come to pass, that as the LORD rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the LORD will rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to nought; and ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it. And the LORD shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind (Deut. 28:63–65).

Nehemiah was aware that the people of Israel were still under covenantal sanctions. They were under judgment.

Second, He reminded God of His promise of deliverance. He cited Deuteronomy 30:1–3: “But if ye turn unto me, and keep my commandments, and do them; though there were of you cast out unto the uttermost part of the heaven, yet will I gather them from thence, and will bring them unto the place that I have chosen to set my name there” (Neh. 1:9).

Third, he prayed to God to be able to use his position to complete the work of reconciliation between Israel and God. “O Lord, I beseech thee, let now thine ear be attentive to the prayer of thy servant, and to the prayer of thy servants, who desire to fear thy name: and prosper, I pray thee, thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man. For I was the king's cupbearer” (v. 11). That work of reconciliation was incomplete because the wall of Jerusalem was incomplete.

His judicial position was analogous to what Esther's had been when the Jews were threatened by Haman. She could intercede on their behalf. That had taken place approximately eight years earlier, in the twelfth year of Darius' reign (Est. 3:7). It was now year 20 (Neh. 1:1; 2:1).

B. The Authority to Exclude

The king perceived that something troubled Nehemiah (Neh. 2:2). Nehemiah explained. “And said unto the king, Let the king live for ever: why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my fathers’ sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire?” (v. 3). The king granted him authority to return to Jerusalem and repair the wall. Then Nehemiah asked for more.

Moreover I said unto the king, If it please the king, let letters be given me to the governors beyond the river, that they may convey me over till I come into Judah; And a letter unto Asaph the keeper of the king’s forest, that he may give me timber to make beams for the gates of the palace which appertained to the house, and for the wall of the city, and for the house that I shall enter into. And the king granted me, according to the good hand of my God upon me (Neh. 2:7–8).

When you are acting on behalf of God’s people, ask for more if you think you can get more.

The king possessed capital. Nehemiah asked for a portion of this capital. On what grounds? Because a city that had no wall in the ancient Near East was not a place of honor. It was an insecure place that could not defend itself.

Nehemiah was not asking for a wall so as to resist the king. Such resistance would have been suicidal. A king who could build up a wall could surely break down the wall. The wall was to secure the city against other enemies. Those enemies were also under the authority of the king.

Shortly after Nehemiah handed the king’s official papers to local officials, those enemies were alerted to the threat to their authority. “Then I came to the governors beyond the river, and gave them the king’s letters. Now the king had sent captains of the army and horsemen with me. When Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, heard of it, it grieved them exceedingly that there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel” (Neh. 2:9–10). This was envy: the desire to tear down someone else. The same sin in the enemies of the Jews had hampered Zerubbabel in the construction of the temple 36 years earlier.¹

1. Cyrus conquered Babylon around 538 B.C. Jews returned to Jerusalem the next year. Local resistance began immediately (Ezra 4). Darius the Great became king in 522: 16 years after Cyrus conquered Babylon. Now it was 20 years after Darius became king.

Nehemiah inspected the wall at night (vv. 12–13). He found the wall in ruins (v. 13). He did not initially tell the local Jews of his plan to rebuild the wall (v. 16). Then he did tell them. He cited the king's words and commands. Word spread fast. "But when Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arabian, heard it, they laughed us to scorn, and despised us, and said, What is this thing that ye do? will ye rebel against the king?" (v. 19) They accused him of what they would have done, if they had possessed a secure wall: treason. Nehemiah understood what they feared losing: easy access into the city. "Then answered I them, and said unto them, The God of heaven, he will prosper us; therefore we his servants will arise and build: but ye have no portion, nor right, nor memorial, in Jerusalem" (v. 20). This was the same answer that Zerubbabel had given the non-Jews of his day. "But Zerubbabel, and Jeshua, and the rest of the chief of the fathers of Israel, said unto them, Ye have nothing to do with us to build an house unto our God; but we ourselves together will build unto the LORD God of Israel, as king Cyrus the king of Persia hath commanded us" (Ezra 4:3).² Nehemiah extended the boundary of covenantal exclusion from the temple to the city itself. Both boundaries were to be marked by walls in good repair.

The wall began to be repaired, family by family, section by section. It was a joint effort (Neh. 3).

Their enemies saw what this meant: exclusion. They resented this.

But it came to pass, that when Sanballat heard that we builded the wall, he was wroth, and took great indignation, and mocked the Jews. And he spake before his brethren and the army of Samaria, and said, What do these feeble Jews? will they fortify themselves? will they sacrifice? will they make an end in a day? will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the rubbish which are burned? (Neh. 4:1–2)

They began making preparations to take the city by force (v. 8). This, despite the fact that Nehemiah had been authorized by the king to re-build the wall. It was clear who was in rebellion to the king. They would rebel against him by destroying those whom the king had authorized to exclude them (v. 11). In response, Nehemiah told the Jews to arm themselves and be ready to fight. This meant that they would resist rebellion against the king. He did not appeal to the masses alone. He appealed to the rulers. "And I looked, and rose up, and said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, Be not ye afraid of them: remember the Lord, which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters, your wives, and your houses” (Neh. 4:14). This was not revolution. It was counter-revolution. They became an armed camp. The men did not take off their clothes except to wash (v. 23).

2. Chapter 35.

Conclusion

Nehemiah understood the covenantal implications of a city without a wall. It could not defend itself from infiltration by covenant-breakers. In the ancient world, it took a wall to establish a city’s civil covenant. The wall could be defended.

The Book of Nehemiah is about the defense of the city. The defense was covenantal, not military. The city would be a place where God’s laws would be enforced. Those excluded from the city would be covenant-breakers residing in the land and unwilling to submit to the city’s laws.

The city’s wall would add an extra boundary around the temple. These Samaritans were inside the original national boundary. They would no longer have 24-hour access to the city where the temple resided, except on terms established by Jews.

DEBT SERVITUDE

Some also there were that said, We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards, and houses, that we might buy corn, because of the dearth. There were also that said, We have borrowed money for the king's tribute, and that upon our lands and vineyards. Yet now our flesh is as the flesh of our brethren, our children as their children: and, lo, we bring into bondage our sons and our daughters to be servants, and some of our daughters are brought unto bondage already: neither is it in our power to redeem them; for other men have our lands and vineyards (Neh. 5:3–5).

The theocentric principle here is God's forgiveness. The sin here was usury.

And I was very angry when I heard their cry and these words. Then I consulted with myself, and I rebuked the nobles, and the rulers, and said unto them, Ye exact usury, every one of his brother. And I set a great assembly against them. And I said unto them, We after our ability have redeemed our brethren the Jews, which were sold unto the heathen; and will ye even sell your brethren? or shall they be sold unto us? Then held they their peace, and found nothing to answer (Neh. 5:6–8).

A. The Charity Loan

The Hebrew word translated here as “usury” does not mean a high rate of interest. It means any rate of interest charged to a poor Hebrew seeking a charity loan. All three defining features had to be present in order for a loan to be usurious.

First, the person had to be poor. “If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury” (Ex. 22:25).¹ Second, he had to be a covenant-keeper. That meant a fellow Hebrew. It was lawful to lend to a stranger. "Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury: Unto a stranger [nokree]² thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it" (Deut. 23:19–20).³

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus

The charity loan was under the law that governed the sabbatical year. "At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD'S release" (Deut. 15:1–2).⁴ This was specifically a zero-interest loan. This law did not apply to a foreigner. "Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release; Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it" (Deut. 15:3–4).

This law went beyond merely not charging interest. It was a moral obligation to make the loan.

If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in thy land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother: But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth. Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto. For the poor shall never cease out of the land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land. And if thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee. And when thou (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49.

2. An uncircumcised temporary resident.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 57.

4. Ibid., ch. 36.

sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy winepress: of that wherewith the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee: therefore I command thee this thing to day (Deut. 15:7–15).

This was a unique law in the ancient Near East. It was a morally mandatory form of charity. The man who had money to lend was morally required to lend it at zero interest for up to seven years. If a debtor could not repay, he could lawfully be enslaved by the creditor. That was why there were rules regarding the end of the term of service. The creditor also owed him capital to get started again.

What about collateral? The assumption was that he had little of value. “When thou dost lend thy brother any thing, thou shalt not go into his house to fetch his pledge. Thou shalt stand abroad, and the man to whom thou dost lend shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee. And if the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge: In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee: and it shall be righteousness unto thee before the LORD thy God” (Deut. 24:10–13).⁵

The lender had a right to this collateral, but not if it kept the person warm at night. “If thou at all take thy neighbour’s raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious” (Ex. 22:26–27). Then of what use was the collateral to the lender? It was a lot of extra trouble: delivering it back at night. This was a restriction on borrowing. The borrower got the use of the item when he needed it, but he could use it to secure only one loan. This prohibited multiple indebtedness.⁶

B. The Sin of the Nation

Nehemiah was angry because the rich in the land had used their wealth to oppress poor brethren. These were not people who had borrowed money for a business venture that had failed. Some had bor-

5. Ibid., ch. 60.

6. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49.

rowed because of a food shortage. "Some also there were that said, We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards, and houses, that we might buy corn, because of the dearth" (Neh. 5:3). Others had borrowed to pay tribute to the king (v. 4). They had to offer their children's services as collateral. "Yet now our flesh is as the flesh of our brethren, our children as their children: and, lo, we bring into bondage our sons and our daughters to be servants, and some of our daughters are brought unto bondage already: neither is it in our power to redeem them; for other men have our lands and vineyards" (v. 5). These were emergency loans. They were not modern consumer loans, which enable people to live in comfort beyond their means.

The rich had used their wealth to bring Hebrews under bondage. They did this through debt bondage. This had been prohibited by the Mosaic law. Why? Because it promoted the kind of bondage that the Egyptians had imposed on them. "And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee: therefore I command thee this thing to day" (Deut. 15:15). Nehemiah challenged the rich.

Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their oliveyards, and their houses, also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and the oil, that ye exact of them. Then said they, We will restore them, and will require nothing of them; so will we do as thou sayest. Then I called the priests, and took an oath of them, that they should do according to this promise. Also I shook my lap, and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labour, that performeth not this promise, even thus be he shaken out, and emptied. And all the congregation said, Amen, and praised the LORD. And the people did according to this promise (Neh. 5:11–13).

This repentance indicated that they had learned their lesson during the captivity. God had told Jeremiah that the city would be captured and burned by Nebuchadnezzar. But King Zedekiah would not have to die (Jer. 34:1–3). There was a way out. The king took it.

This is the word that came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, after that the king Zedekiah had made a covenant with all the people which were at Jerusalem, to proclaim liberty unto them; That every man should let his manservant, and every man his maidservant, being an Hebrew or an Hebrewess, go free; that none should serve himself of them, to wit, of a Jew his brother.

Now when all the princes, and all the people, which had entered into the covenant, heard that every one should let his manservant, and every one his maidservant, go free, that none should serve themselves of them any more, then they obeyed, and let them go. But afterward they turned, and caused the servants and the handmaids, whom they had let go free, to return, and brought them into subjection for servants and for handmaids.

Therefore the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; I made a covenant with your fathers in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondmen, saying, At the end of seven years let ye go every man his brother an Hebrew, which hath been sold unto thee; and when he hath served thee six years, thou shalt let him go free from thee: but your fathers hearkened not unto me, neither inclined their ear. And ye were now turned, and had done right in my sight, in proclaiming liberty every man to his neighbour; and ye had made a covenant before me in the house which is called by my name: But ye turned and polluted my name, and caused every man his servant, and every man his handmaid, whom ye had set at liberty at their pleasure, to return, and brought them into subjection, to be unto you for servants and for handmaids.

The rulers then reversed themselves. They refused to suffer the loss of bondservants. This doomed them.

Therefore thus saith the LORD; Ye have not hearkened unto me, in proclaiming liberty, every one to his brother, and every man to his neighbour: behold, I proclaim a liberty for you, saith the LORD, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and I will make you to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth. And I will give the men that have transgressed my covenant, which have not performed the words of the covenant which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof, The princes of Judah, and the princes of Jerusalem, the eunuchs, and the priests, and all the people of the land, which passed between the parts of the calf; I will even give them into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life: and their dead bodies shall be for meat unto the fowls of the heaven, and to the beasts of the earth (Jer. 34:8–20).⁷

The Jews of Nehemiah's day had repeated this sin. Upon hearing from him that it was a sin, they repented. They let their Hebrew servants go free. This marked a change of heart. They listened to a voice of authority. Nehemiah was that voice of authority—civil authority. He followed his own advice.

7. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

Moreover from the time that I was appointed to be their governor in the land of Judah, from the twentieth year even unto the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that is, twelve years, I and my brethren have not eaten the bread of the governor. But the former governors that had been before me were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, beside forty shekels of silver; yea, even their servants bare rule over the people: but so did not I, because of the fear of God (Neh. 5:14–15).

The text does not say how he financed this enormous expense. He must have been a rich man who owned productive assets. If this was not the case, then the king paid for his services out of his own funds. Nehemiah did not abuse his authority. He did not enslave his people during his dozen years in high office. “Now that which was prepared for me daily was one ox and six choice sheep; also fowls were prepared for me, and once in ten days store of all sorts of wine: yet for all this required not I the bread of the governor, because the bondage was heavy upon this people” (v. 18). He did not add to their bondage.

Conclusion

Nehemiah governed by lawful delegated authority. He governed in terms of the Mosaic law. The people conformed to the Mosaic law because of his moral authority. He practiced what he preached.

Covenant-keepers are not to use their wealth as a means of enslaving their covenantal brethren. They are to have an open hand. They are not to subsidize sloth or riotous living, but they are to lend a helping hand to those in need. The people of Jerusalem had violated this law, as their forefathers had. But when called to account, they repented. They did not go back on their righteous action.

39

THE FINAL STAGE OF A PROJECT

Now it came to pass, when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and Geshem the Arabian, and the rest of our enemies, heard that I had builded the wall, and that there was no breach left therein; (though at that time I had not set up the doors upon the gates;) That Sanballat and Geshem sent unto me, saying, Come, let us meet together in some one of the villages in the plain of Ono. But they thought to do me mischief (Neh. 6:1–2).

The theocentric principle here is the supreme importance of finishing a project. An uncompleted project testifies to a false task or a false God.

And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God (Luke 9:62).¹

Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope (I Cor. 9:10).²

A. Finishing the Wall

When he heard about the wall of Jerusalem being in ruins, Nehemiah decided that his task in life was to see to it that the wall was rebuilt. He forfeited his job as the king's cupbearer. He forfeited his position at court. He journeyed far to Jerusalem. He oversaw the project. He was determined not to be thwarted.

He had opponents. The heathen (goyim) were only part of this opposition, as he would soon learn. There were nobles who did not want the work completed. They were in league with the covenant-breakers.

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 20.

2. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 11.

Putting up the gates was the final stage of the project. As soon as it became clear that the final stage of the project was imminent, the opponents redoubled their efforts to stop it. They offered to meet with Nehemiah in private. He refused. They repeated their offer four times (vv. 2–4). He refused all four times. Then they sent a messenger.

Then sent Sanballat his servant unto me in like manner the fifth time with an open letter in his hand; Wherein was written, It is reported among the heathen, and Gashmu saith it, that thou and the Jews think to rebel: for which cause thou buildest the wall, that thou mayest be their king, according to these words. And thou hast also appointed prophets to preach of thee at Jerusalem, saying, There is a king in Judah: and now shall it be reported to the king according to these words. Come now therefore, and let us take counsel together (Neh. 6:5–7).

This was blackmail. They were warning him that they would go public with this accusatory letter if he did not cooperate. This was futile on their part. He had the trust of the king. But they were desperate. He replied that they were liars. “Then I sent unto him, saying, There are no such things done as thou sayest, but thou feignest them out of thine own heart” (Neh. 6:8).

The enemies of God wrote the open letter as if Nehemiah were plotting rebellion. This had been the strategy of the critics of the temple almost four decades earlier (Ezra 4:5–6).³ They had imputed evil political motives to those who wanted to establish physical boundaries around the sacrifices. Their spiritual heirs repeated the strategy.

The next step was a threat of violence. It was delivered by a seeming ally: a false prophet.

Afterward I came unto the house of Shemaiah the son of Delaiah the son of Mehetabeel, who was shut up; and he said, Let us meet together in the house of God, within the temple, and let us shut the doors of the temple: for they will come to slay thee; yea, in the night will they come to slay thee. And I said, Should such a man as I flee? and who is there, that, being as I am, would go into the temple to save his life? I will not go in. And, lo, I perceived that God had not sent him; but that he pronounced this prophecy against me: for Tobiah and Sanballat had hired him. Therefore was he hired, that I should be afraid, and do so, and sin, and that they might have matter for an evil report, that they might reproach me (Neh. 6:10–13).

3. Chapter 34.

Nehemiah prayed to God. “My God, think thou upon Tobiah and Sanballat according to these their works, and on the prophetess Noadiah, and the rest of the prophets, that would have put me in fear” (v. 14).

His opponents were escalating their resistance. Why? Because the closer the day of reckoning approached—the installation of the gates—the closer they were to a loss of influence.

The wall was a sieve without the gates. It could not serve as a way to lock out covenant-breakers. Freedom of entry was normal, but when the rulers inside the city decided to close the gates, they could control who entered and departed. The gates were the means of control. Without the gates, the rulers inside the city would have far less influence. The gates were the means of imposing negative sanctions: blocked entry. The wall was the means of judicial control. This was why the elders of a walled city sat at the gates. The gates were the symbol of judicial sanctions, because they really were the means of final control. The wall funneled traffic to the gates. The gates were the final step in the process of screening a city.

B. The Finished Work

“So the wall was finished in the twenty and fifth day of the month Elul, in fifty and two days” (Neh. 6:15). This was rapid work. By placing families in charge of specific sections of the wall, Nehemiah took advantage of the division of labor. He and his staff could assess the daily progress of each team. They could also compare their progress with that of other families.

The wall had been in ruins since the Jews’ return from Babylon under Cyrus 36 years earlier. After the people had begun work on the temple, they stopped. They had started again under Darius. They had not completed the second boundary: the wall. This boundary was not a physical boundary to protect the temple from physical attack. The Persian kings were the protectors of the temple. The wall provided a boundary of judicial protection. Covenant-breakers would not gain easy and automatic access to residents of the city who shared their commitment theologically and culturally. This included some of the rulers of the city.

Moreover in those days the nobles of Judah sent many letters unto Tobiah, and the letters of Tobiah came unto them. For there were many in Judah sworn unto him, because he was the son in law of Shechaniah the son of Arah; and his son Johanan had taken the daughter of Meshullam the son of Berechiah. Also they reported his good deeds before me, and uttered my words to him. And Tobiah sent letters to put me in fear (Neh. 6:17–19).

The gates could now be closed. This would take place later, when Nehemiah saw that covenant-breaking merchants were buying and selling on the sabbath. He closed the gates. He threatened them with civil action if they continued this practice (Neh. 13:15–22).⁴

The wall of the city reinforced the enforcement of the Mosaic law inside the nation's central city. This increased the influence of the Mosaic law outside the city, but inside the national boundaries.

C. The Unequal Value of Parts of a Project

The completion of the wall of the city required the completion of the gates. This was the crucial final step. The project's goal would be incomplete if the gates were not completed.

This reveals an economic principle. As a project nears completion, the final step becomes more valuable. The previous costs of an incomplete project are of zero value, or close to it, if the project is not completed. For example, if the estimated payoff of a project is 2,000 ounces of gold, and the cost of the project is 1,000 ounces of gold, and 900 ounces have been spent, the value of the final step is 2,000 ounces of gold. What has already been spent is irrelevant as far as the final value is concerned. It is gone. This is called a sunk cost.

Consider the cost of building a highway between two cities. The contract to buy the land to build the highway must include all owners of land between the two cities. If the highway builders bought all of the land except one parcel, the owner of that parcel could continue to increase the price of his land as the highway neared completion. The economic value of that final parcel would approach the value cost of building a bypass.

Eminent domain is the legal power of a civil government to buy a piece of property, despite the owner's refusal to sell. The reason why civil governments assert the right of eminent domain is because of this phenomenon of the final parcel. By using compulsion, the planners can overcome the ability of one holdout to increase the value of his parcel, knowing that the value of his parcel approaches the value of the entire project, if all the others agree to sell. Because numerous participants understand this, the costs of negotiating the sale of all parcels increases. They are not looking at the value of their properties today. Each of them is looking at his parcel in terms of what it would be worth if the project were close to completion. The cost of negotiation can get so high that the project cannot be arranged. The benefits that it might have provided are lost. The government lowers this cost by declaring the right of eminent domain. But this involves the surrender of ownership. There are costs associated with such a surrender. They are impossible to calculate.

4. Chapter 41.

So, the goal of reducing the more measurable costs of an immediate project tends to take precedence over the costs imposed by a loss of property rights. The cost that gains attention is more immediate and direct. The cost of the loss of ownership is distant in time, as well as a matter of economic theory rather than immediate practice. The value of the thing unseen does not register with most people.

If economic value is strictly individual and subjective, as modern economics teaches, then there is no economic value for unperceived benefits. If today's decision-makers ignore the cost of lost freedoms, then there are no costs of lost freedoms, if individual subjective value is all the value there is. People's present-orientation will generally triumph over long-term principles of economics.

To overcome this tendency, the Bible lays down basic laws of ownership. God is the supreme individual imputer of value. He has written His laws accordingly. In Mosaic Israel, the king could not lawfully confiscate the family property of a common man. This was basic to the inheritance laws. The family inheritance laws of the jubilee year did not apply inside walled cities.⁵ Nevertheless, David paid the owner of land in Jerusalem on which David planned to build an altar, even though the owner offered to give it away. "And king David said to Ornan, Nay; but I will verily buy it for the full price: for I will not take that which is thine for the LORD, nor offer burnt offerings without cost" (I Chron. 21:24).

Conclusion

As the completion of the wall approached, the opponents increased their efforts to sabotage the project. When the installation of the gates was all that remained, the opponents became frantic. They escalated their efforts in order to stop the final step.

5. "And if a man sell a dwelling house in a walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold; within a full year may he redeem it. And if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house that is in the walled city shall be established for ever to him that bought it throughout his generations: it shall not go out in the jubilee" (Lev. 25:29–30).

There was economic logic to their opposition. The value of the wall was dependent on the gates. The value of establishing a covenantal defence of the city, meaning the enforcement of God's civil laws, was dependent on the gates. The opponents of the Mosaic law understood this. They resorted to tricks, then threats, then slander in order to stop the installation of the gates.

Gates in the West disappeared during the Renaissance because gunpowder made walls obsolete as military defenses. Cultural gates were partially overcome in the same era by the printing press and movable type. Finally, the Internet breached the last of the cultural gates. Individual self-government is the only defense today.

ECONOMIC INEQUALITY

And some of the chief of the fathers gave to the treasure of the work twenty thousand drams of gold, and two thousand and two hundred pounds of silver. And that which the rest of the people gave was twenty thousand drams of gold, and two thousand pounds of silver, and threescore and seven priests' garments (Neh. 7:71–72).

The theocentric principle here is economic inequality. Inequality is inherent in God's creation. This includes mankind. It also includes a society's distribution of wealth.

A. Rich Men's Donations

The richest men in Israel gave a large sum of money to pay for the work. The text does not identify this work. Presumably, it was related to the temple. The wall had already been rebuilt.

In Ezra, we read of the donations by wealthy Jews to the building of the temple. "And some of the chief of the fathers, when they came to the house of the LORD which is at Jerusalem, offered freely for the house of God to set it up in his place: They gave after their ability unto the treasure of the work threescore and one thousand drams of gold, and five thousand pound of silver, and one hundred priests' garments" (Ezra 2:68–69).

Nehemiah also records an offering. The amount of gold is different from the amount mentioned by Ezra. This had to be a different offering in Nehemiah's day. In this case, the donations of the common people as a whole were about equal to the donations by the wealthy few. The two groups of donations were very close: 200 pounds of silver less from the commoners, but offset by one hundred garments for priests. The numbers are too close to be random. I suspect that there was open bidding, or some sort of feedback through an intermediary. "Will you match this? You don't want them to donate more, do you?"

B. Pareto's Law

In 1897, the Italy-born Swiss professor of economics Vilfredo Pareto published his discovery that in every European nation he studied, about 20% of the population owned about 80% of the wealth.¹ This insight has subsequently been found to apply to a wide range of operations, even including earthquake damage. About 20% of a firm's customers provides 80% of the firm's profit. About 20% of the bugs in Microsoft's software produces 80% of the crashes and major failures.² About 20% of public-access facilities contribute about 80% of the crime.³ It could be said that 80% of the hand's functions are the result of 20% of the digits: the thumb.

There is no known cause of this phenomenon. So, there is no known cure, if a cure is needed. In every known society, irrespective of its economic structure or its operating legal principles, something close to a 20-80 wealth distribution occurs. No political reform or other reform has changed this distribution. This frustrates socialists, who believe that the state can and should equalize wealth. It also frustrates free market economists, who believe that market competition can and should equalize wealth. So, both groups refuse to discuss the Pareto law in detail. It is easier to ignore it.

This passage indicates that an inequality of wealth existed in Nehemiah's day. A small number of Jews provided half of the donations. We know that the 20-80 distribution occurs all the way up the pyramid of wealth. If we take 20% of 20%, we get 4%. If we take 80% of 80%, we get 64%. About 4% of the population owns 64% of the wealth. So, using a Pareto distribution, we can guess that the families that contributed half of the donations constituted approximately 3% of the population.

Conclusion

The richest members of the Israelite community donated half of the gold and silver used for this work, whatever the work was. It is likely that they constituted about 3% of the population. A fundamental inequality of wealth existed in post-exilic Israel some 36 years after

1. Vilfredo Pareto, Cours d'economie politique (1897), vol. 2.

2. Paula Rooney, "Microsoft's CEO: 80-20 Rule Applied to Bugs, Not Just Features," Channel Web (Oct. 3, 2002). (<http://bit.ly/ParetoBugs>)

3. Ronald V. Clarke and John E. Eck, Understanding Risky Facilities (Center for Problem-Oriented Policing, 2007), pp. 4–8. (<http://bit.ly/ParetoCrime>) their return from Babylon.

The Bible nowhere indicates that there will ever be or should ever be equality of wealth in society. Paul used the word equality in his fund-raising letter to the Corinth church. “But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be equality” (II Cor. 8:14).⁴ But he used the same term in his advice to slave owners: “Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven” (Col. 4:1). He did not say to free the slaves. He told them to be just. A fundamental inequality would remain: master and servant. He was not talking about equal wealth or status. He was talking about justice: to render unto all according to their productivity and also their need in temporary hard times.

4. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

41

A BUSINESS-FREE SABBATH

And the rest of the people, the priests, the Levites, the porters, the singers, the Nethinims, and all they that had separated themselves from the people of the lands unto the law of God, their wives, their sons, and their daughters, every one having knowledge, and having understanding; They clave to their brethren, their nobles, and entered into a curse, and into an oath, to walk in God's law, which was given by Moses the servant of God, and to observe and do all the commandments of the LORD our Lord, and his judgments and his statutes; And that we would not give our daughters unto the people of the land, nor take their daughters for our sons: And if the people of the land bring ware or any victuals on the sabbath day to sell, that we would not buy it of them on the sabbath, or on the holy day: and that we would leave the seventh year, and the exaction of every debt (Neh. 10:28–31).

The theocentric principle here is the fourth commandment.

Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: But the seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy manservant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: For in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the LORD blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it (Ex 20:9–11).¹

This included the principle of the sabbatical year.

At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD'S release. Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

thine hand shall release; Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it: Only if thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day (Deut 15:1–5).²

The nation took a corporate oath regarding the sabbath. This was an act of covenant renewal.

A. Profaning the Sabbath

The final section of the Book of Nehemiah provides an account of a violation of the sabbath and the response of Nehemiah, the governor.

In those days saw I in Judah some treading winepresses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses; as also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the sabbath day: and I testified against them in the day wherein they sold victuals. There dwelt men of Tyre also therein, which brought fish, and all manner of ware, and sold on the sabbath unto the children of Judah, and in Jerusalem. Then I contended with the nobles of Judah, and said unto them, What evil thing is this that ye do, and profane the sabbath day? Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city? yet ye bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the sabbath (Neh. 13:15–18).

Nehemiah, in his office as governor (Tirshatha), brought the first stage of a covenant lawsuit against the rulers of the nation. He did not go to the people. He did not go to the Samaritans. Yet these were the people who were violating the sabbath law: buyers and sellers. Instead, he went to the nobles, who represented the people.

Having brought this lawsuit against them, he took action.

And it came to pass, that when the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark before the sabbath, I commanded that the gates should be shut, and charged that they should not be opened till after the sabbath: and some of my servants set I at the gates, that there should no burden be brought in on the sabbath day. So the merchants and sellers of all kind of ware lodged without Jerusalem once or twice. Then I testified against them, and said unto them, Why lodge ye about the wall? if ye do so again, I will lay hands on you. From that time forth came they no more on the sabbath (Neh. 13:19–21).

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

He was the governor. This was a civil action against voluntary economic transactions. On what legal grounds did he do this? First, on the basis of the Mosaic law. Second, on the basis of the Mosaic law's promised negative sanctions: captivity. "Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city? yet ye bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the sabbath" (v. 18). Trade on the sabbath was not a victimless crime. The state had to intercede in order to keep God's negative sanctions at bay. Third, because of the nation's act of corporate covenant renewal. "And if the people of the land bring ware or any victuals on the sabbath day to sell, that we would not buy it of them on the sabbath, or on the holy day: and that we would leave the seventh year, and the exaction of every debt (Neh. 10:31).

He then replaced his servants with Levites. It was their job to police the sabbath, with the civil government backing them up. "And I commanded the Levites that they should cleanse themselves, and that they should come and keep the gates, to sanctify the sabbath day. Remember me, O my God, concerning this also, and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy" (v. 22).

This involved mixing church and state. This mixture had always existed under the Mosaic law. The priests and Levites had always served as counsellors to civil judges.

If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, between blood and blood, between plea and plea, and between stroke and stroke, being matters of controversy within thy gates: then shalt thou arise, and get thee up into the place which the LORD thy God shall choose; And thou shalt come unto the priests the Levites, and unto the judge that shall be in those days, and enquire; and they shall shew thee the sentence of judgment: And thou shalt do according to the sentence, which they of that place which the LORD shall choose shall shew thee; and thou shalt observe to do according to all that they inform thee: According to the sentence of the law which they shall teach thee, and according to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do: thou shalt not decline from the sentence which they shall shew thee, to the right hand, nor to the left. And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest that standeth to minister there before the LORD thy God, or unto the judge, even that man shall die: and thou shalt put away the evil from Israel. And all the people shall hear, and fear, and do no more presumptuously (Deut 17:8–13).

One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sinneth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established. If a false witness rise up against any man to testify against him that which is wrong; Then both the men, between whom the controversy is, shall stand before the LORD, before the priests and the judges, which shall be in those days; And the judges shall make diligent inquisition: and, behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother; Then shall ye do unto him, as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you. And those which remain shall hear, and fear, and shall henceforth commit no more any such evil among you (Deut. 19:15–20).³

Conclusion

The civil government, in association with the Levites, policed the gates on the sabbath. The wall and the gates served as barriers to entry. They served as a means of separation between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers.

The decision of Nehemiah to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem culminated in his act as governor to separate buyers from sellers on the sabbath. Without the wall, this would have been far more expensive to enforce. The wall was not to separate Israel from Persia. That judicial connection was maintained in the person of Nehemiah. It was Persian authority, under the Mosaic law, that made possible the separation of buyers and sellers.

The fears of the Samaritans and other opponents of God's law had been justified. They feared that the enforcement of the Mosaic law would undermine their local authority and wealth. The temple and the wall were threats to them.

3. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 45.

CONCLUSION TO NEHEMIAH

In those days also saw I Jews that had married wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab: And their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language, but according to the language of each people. And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves. Did not Solomon king of Israel sin by these things? yet among many nations was there no king like him, who was beloved of his God, and God made him king over all Israel: nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin. Shall we then hearken unto you to do all this great evil, to transgress against our God in marrying strange wives? (Neh. 13:23–27).

The Jews were at it again. Ezra had ended his book with an account of the national oath to put away covenant-breaking wives and children (Ezra 10:10–19).¹ This commitment had not lasted more than a few years. The covenantal separation within the families no longer existed.

Nehemiah was not in a position to break up the families of the common people. But, for the sake of the integrity of the sacrificial system, he broke up the families of the Levites and priests.

And one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib the high priest, was son in law to Sanballat the Horonite: therefore I chased him from me. Remember them, O my God, because they have defiled the priesthood, and the covenant of the priesthood, and of the Levites. Thus cleansed I them from all strangers, and appointed the wards of the priests and the Levites, every one in his business (Neh. 13:28–30).

There is no question that, in the Persian empire, he possessed the authority to do this as governor. There is also no doubt that he possessed God-authorized authority over the priesthood. He exercised this authority in the name of God. He would not allow syncretism inside the families of those who offered sacrifice on behalf of the Jews and also on behalf of the rulers of Persia, who had funded the rebuilding of the wall. Maintaining the confessional and covenantal integrity of the priesthood was more important than any theoretical separation of church and state. It was also more important than maintaining the marriage covenants in question. There had to be walls of separation between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. Syncretism was not an option for the Levites. There is no indication anywhere in the Bible that Nehemiah did the wrong thing.

1. Conclusion to Ezra.

CONCLUSION

The LORD our God spake unto us in Horeb, saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: Turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the sea side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river Euphrates. Behold, I have set the land before you: go in and possess the land which the LORD sware unto your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give unto them and to their seed after them (Deut. 1:6–8).

The books that make up the historical books of the Old Testament tell the story of Israel's unwillingness to conquer the land of Canaan and the land all the way to the Euphrates. They tell of Israel's adoption of the gods of the land. They tell of God's repeated deliverance of the nation into bondage to enemy nations surrounding them. Then came captivity: Assyria, Babylon, and Persia. The people were carried off to the Euphrates as captives, not conquerors.

Their economic lessons were many, but they all boiled down to this: the fulfillment of the promises of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28, meaning the predictability of corporate sanctions. When they obeyed the Mosaic law, they prospered. When they disobeyed, they did not. Mostly, they disobeyed.

The historical books from Isaiah's day to Malachi's should be read in association with the prophetic books. The prophets came to the people with warnings. The historical books provide information regarding the fulfillment of these warnings.

A. Basic Themes

The Book of Joshua begins with the story of God's recapitulation of what He had told Moses.

Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I sware unto their fathers to give them. Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success. Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the LORD thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest (Josh. 1:6–9).

Joshua was strong and courageous; the Israelites were not. He had confidence in God's sanctions; the Israelites did not.¹ They did not conquer all of Canaan. They allowed some of the Canaanites to remain in the land.

The conquest was preceded by covenant renewal: national circumcision. The daily manna ended when they crossed the Jordan River. From that time on, they had to live by conquest and then by productivity.² The supernatural subsidies from God ended.

Jericho was the first city to fall. Only Rahab and her family survived. This conquest was to be total: God alone would collect the spoils. This meant the disinheritance of Jericho.³ But Achan stole valuable things: a representative sin for which 36 Israelite warriors paid with their lives at Ai.⁴ For this, Achan's family came under the same total ban that God had applied to Jericho.⁵

Israel did not collect its promised inheritance. It did not extend its conquest all the way to the Euphrates.⁶

The issue of inheritance is the central issue of the story of Jephthah's daughter. She was not sacrificed as a literal burnt offering. She was put up for adoption into the tribe of Levi, cut off from any inheritance in her father's household.⁷

Adoption and inheritance are the central themes of the Book of Ruth. Ruth was adopted by marriage into the family of Elimelech. After her husband died, she was adopted into Boaz's family line by mar-

1. Chapter 1.

2. Chapter 2.

3. Chapter 3.

4. Chapter 4.

5. Chapter 5.

6. Chapter 6.

7. Chapter 7.

riage, for he became her kinsman redeemer. Through Boaz's commitment to her and to Elimelech's family name, he extended the promised covenant line. His branch of the family had originated through another adoption by marriage, when Salmon married Rahab (Ruth 4:21–22).⁸

The ministry of Samuel, who was both prophet and judge, was based on God's intervention into history. His birth was an answer to his mother's prayer and a priest's blessing. She sang a song in response: God intervenes in history, overturning the prevailing social order.⁹ God later brought sanctions against the nation for the sake of Eli's evil sons. He next brought sanctions against the cities of Philistia for the sake of the Ark of the Covenant. God, not chance, was the source of the sanctions.¹⁰

Samuel warned Israel against the tax tyranny to come under kings, but the people did not care. They wanted to go to war behind a king.¹¹ They got their wish, again and again until the captivity. There was a brief time of peace and prosperity under Solomon, whose wisdom led to increased national wealth. He had good judgment regarding the disputes of others.¹² He had poor judgment in his personal life. The nation gained wealth through trade. The kingdom of God profited through this increase in wealth.¹³ Solomon built the temple, where God resided.¹⁴ But Solomon broke the Mosaic laws of kingship (Deut. 17). He centralized political power. His son Rehoboam lost the kingdom. This break-up decentralized political power.¹⁵ Rehoboam had threatened to impose high taxes. The resulting tax revolt divided the nation.¹⁶ It never came together again under Israelite kings.

Ahab was a wicked king who centralized power. Elijah challenged him and his pagan religion. Ahab later stole Naboth's inheritance. For this, he and his heirs lost their inheritance.¹⁷ This remained the pattern for the kings of Israel and Judah. The evil done by a king brought negative sanctions on the nation. The kings represented the people. The people were contented with this arrangement, which their forefathers

8. Chapters 8–11.

9. Chapter 12.

10. Chapter 13.

11. Chapter 14.

12. Chapter 15.

13. Chapter 16.

14. Chapter 18.

15. Chapter 19.

16. Chapter 20.

17. Chapter 22.

had demanded under Samuel. When the kings were evil, the people suffered from negative sanctions. The sanctions of God were predictable.¹⁸ The people never really believed this. Neither did most of the kings.

They learned during the captivity that they had to trust God for deliverance. Deliverance came, but only a handful of Jews took advantage of it initially: under 50,000. This time, they were more careful about not sharing authority with strangers. They paid for the rebuilding of the temple. Outsiders were not allowed to participate.¹⁹ They had to battle against these rejected outsiders to finish both the temple and Jerusalem's wall. When the gates of the city were finally completed after 36 years,²⁰ the governor could enforce the law against business activities on the sabbath.²¹

The book of Esther does not mention God. It also does not offer any economic information. But it offers this message: the Jews as a people were protected. An individual Jew or a family line was not.

Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther, Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews. For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this? (Esth. 4:13–14).

B. Economic Insights

The historical books present a number of insights governing economic theory. The fundamental insight is that inheritance assumes disinheritance.²² The Promised Land was the Surrendered Land for the Canaanites. In addition,

A welfare economy is a slaves' economy.²³

Gleaning was a good way to bring hard-working poor people to the attention of productive people with land.²⁴

18. Chapter 31.

19. Chapter 35.

20. Chapter 39.

21. Chapter 41.

22. Chapter 1.

23. Chapter 2.

24. Chapter 9.

Circumstances change, and there can be great reversals of wealth.²⁵

High taxes can lead to political resistance.²⁶

A creditor in Israel had a right to the labor of a defaulting debtor's sons until they reached age 20.²⁷ If you have a lot of wealth, it is a good idea not to show off to those who would like to take it away from you.²⁸

If you hire independent contractors, you do not need to get an account from them about how they spent the money you paid to them. On the other hand, if they are hired servants on your payroll, you need to get an account.²⁹

Bureaucrats have self-interested agendas that can offset their official agenda of public service.³⁰

Sunk costs—money that has been spent and is gone—are not true costs. Money still owed is a real cost.³¹

Debt is a form of servitude.³²

Economic inequality is as basic to life as all other forms of inequality.³³

Conclusion

The people of Israel did not obey the Mosaic law. They suffered setbacks as a result. They had been told by Moses that this would happen. They did not act in terms of this warning. For Israel, it was one step forward and two steps back until the captivity. After their remnant's return to the land, it was one step forward and one step back. The final word in the Old Testament is "curse."

Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the LORD. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse (Mal. 4:5–6).

25. Chapter 12.

26. Chapter 20.

27. Chapter 24.

28. Chapter 28.

29. Chapter 29.

30. Chapter 27.

31. Chapter 33.

32. Chapter 38.

33. Chapter 40.

PREDICTABILITY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON JOB

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
 Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
 An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
 Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
 None Dare Call It Witchcraft (1976)
 Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
 Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
 Government by Emergency (1983)
 Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
 Coined Freedom (1984)
 Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
 Honest Money (1986)
 Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
 Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
 Inherit the Earth (1987)
 Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
 Healer of the Nations (1987)
 The Pirate Economy (1987)
 Is the World Running Down? (1988)
 When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
 Political Polytheism (1989)
 Judeo-Christian Tradition (1990)
 The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
 Victim's Rights (1990)
 Millennialism and Social Theory (1990)
 Westminster's Confession (1991)
 Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
 The Coase Theorem (1992)
 Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
 Rapture Fever (1993)
 Tithing and the Church (1994)
 Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)
 Crossed Fingers (1996)
 The Covenantal Tithe (2011)
 Mises on Money (2012)

PREDICTABILITY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON JOB

GARY NORTH

Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|---|----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Sanctions and Predictability (Job 1:1) | 5 |
| 2. From Womb to Tomb (Job 1:21) | 12 |
| 3. Poor Me, Poor System (Job 3:1) | 16 |
| 4. Job On Justice and Sanctions (Job 26:6–7) | 33 |
| 5. Elihu on God’s Sovereignty (Job 32:1–3) | 38 |
| 6. God Asks Rhetorical Questions (Job 38:1–3) | 45 |
| Conclusion | 49 |

PREFACE

Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan came also among them. And the LORD said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the LORD, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? (Job 1:6–8).

A. A Strange Book

First, the format of the book is like no other in the Bible. It is a series of debates. The characters are like stage figures in a play. We hear one, then another. Most of the book is dialogue. It is not poetry, as the Psalms are. It is not aphorisms, as the Book of Proverbs is.

Because of this, I use the present tense to analyze it. In the other commentaries, I use the past tense. But the dialogue in this book forces us to think of the book as a stage play being performed in front of us.

Second, the book is also strange in terms of content. It begins with two strange chapters. I regard Job 1 and 2 as the strangest chapters theologically in the Bible. The story they tell challenges what most Christians believe about God, man, law, causation, and time. If everything that people knew about God were based on the first two chapters of Job, they would have a strange religion. On the other hand, if everything they knew about God were based on the Bible, but without the first two chapters of Job, people would have a seriously incomplete religion. Because so few Christians take seriously the Book of Job, most of them have a seriously incomplete religion.

Consider the following. “Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan came also among them” (v. 6). What was Satan doing in the presence of the sons of God? For that matter, who were these sons of God? Was this an assembly of all deceased redeemed males? Were angels present? What was the meeting about?

God spoke to Satan. There is no other passage in Scripture in which God speaks to Satan. In the garden, He spoke to the representative agent of Satan: the serpent. Jesus spoke to Satan in the wilderness in His office as perfect man: the second Adam.¹ Jesus quoted the Old Testament to answer Satan, as a righteous person should. He did not use power against him. Satan's religion is the power religion.

In Job 1, God cross-examines Satan. What does Satan think about Job? Job is blameless, God taunts Satan. Satan responds by saying that Job is perfect only for the sake of the benefits that he receives from God. Take away the benefits, and Job will curse God. God then lets Satan take away Job's benefits.

Then comes the description of a very bad day. Job loses almost everything. In losing almost everything, those around him do lose everything. The herds of cattle were stolen, and all the herdsmen put to death, except the messenger. The sheep were killed by fire out of heaven. So were the shepherds, save one: a messenger. The camels were stolen, and the drivers put to death, save one: a messenger.

B. Dead Servants and Children

Have you ever heard a sermon on these dead servants? No. The first chapter of Job reveals an unpleasant fact: these faithful servants died in a single day, through no fault of their own, to settle a verbal contest between God and Satan. God placed all of these men at the mercy of Satan. Did they say their prayers that morning? If so, the prayers did them no good. Did they have big dreams about the future? Of course. These dreams were snuffed out in one day. Did they trust in God because they trusted Job? Yes. That was what doomed them.

What of Job's 10 children? Satan killed them all. That would have ended Job's inheritance, had he owned anything to leave behind. He didn't. It was all gone: inheritance and heirs.

Why? To settle a verbal wager between God and Satan. "Job is good." "No, he's not." "Yes, he is." "No, he's not. I can prove it. I dare you to let me prove it." "OK, you're on." This was more like a contest between two pre-teen boys in a schoolyard than the solemn court of the most high God. But it was the solemn court of the most high God.

1. "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit" (I Cor. 15:45).

This is where life-and-death matters get settled, once and for all.

C. God Did Not Explain

The Book of Job indicates that God never explained Himself to Job. Job never heard about the cosmic wager that led to the deaths of everyone close to him except four messengers and his embittered wife.

You have never heard a sermon on this. There is a reason for this. Pastors are unable to come to grips with the God of Job and retain their theology. This God is not the God of uplifting sermons. Uplifting sermons are what people want to hear. A preacher who ceases preaching uplifting sermons will wind up carrying front-and-back “Repent!” placards on street corners, or else selling life insurance.

D. What God Is This?

What kind of God do we deal with—really deal with? The God of Job.

I contend that until a person comes to grips with the God of Job, he does not understand the God of the Bible. That was also Rushdoony’s contention. In his first book, he said that the Book of Job plagued him in his undergraduate days. He had been raised in a Christian household by a Presbyterian minister, yet he suffered from “a lack of theology and theological direction that made me helpless in the face of the contemporary scene. In the course of my thinking, it was the book of Job that gave direction to my theology.”²

I recommend that it give direction to yours.

2. R. J. Rushdoony, By What Standard? An Analysis of the Philosophy of Cornelius Van Til (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1959] 1995), p. 189.

INTRODUCTION

And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? and still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause (Job 2:3).

A. Cursings Without Cause

This is a perplexing ethical passage. It says that Satan persuaded God to bring negative sanctions against a perfect man. God admitted that he did this without cause.

God did the same thing to Jesus.

What did God mean, “without cause”? He meant that the negative sanctions that had been imposed on Job were not in response to anything evil that Job had done.

The same was true of Jesus.

Job’s children died as a result of this judgment. So did all but four messengers. Those who had perished had done nothing wrong—nothing to deserve this. Good servants perished.¹

The same was true of Stephen and James, who were disciples of Jesus.

Job ritually sacrificed animals on behalf of his children in order to placate God’s wrath. Jesus ritually sacrificed Himself on behalf of God’s adopted children in order to placate God’s wrath.

God allowed Satan to persecute a perfect man in order to test that man’s integrity. God allowed Satan to tempt Jesus in the wilderness in order to test His integrity (Matt. 4;² Luke 4³).

1. Those who survived had not done anything different from those who perished. They survived only because they had bad news to convey to Job.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

Job suffered catastrophic negative sanctions, only to be raised even higher at the end. Jesus suffered catastrophic negative sanctions, only to be raised even higher at the end.

There are important lessons here for those who recognize them.

B. The Book's Underlying Assumption

The Book of Job rests on an assumption: God blesses the righteous in history, and He curses the unrighteous in history. The book makes no sense on any other assumption. The book rests on the truth of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28: the sections of the Mosaic law that deal with historical sanctions.

The Book of Job is to negative sanctions what Psalm 73 is to positive sanctions. Both books offer an initial anomaly. Job offers this one: negative sanctions for the righteous. "For he breaketh me with a tempest, and multiplieth my wounds without cause" (Job 9:17). Psalm 73 offers this one: positive sanctions for the unrighteous. "But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped. For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked" (Ps. 73:2–3). The Book of Job resolves this in the final chapter: the restoration of prosperity to the righteous. "And the LORD turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends: also the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before" (Job 42:10). Psalm 73 also resolves this: the restoration of adversity to the unrighteous. "Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors" (Ps. 73:18–19).⁴

Again, none of this makes sense if the covenantal sanctions of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 do not prevail in history. If historical sanctions are not predictable in terms of a person's conformity to the Bible-revealed laws of God, then the Book of Job makes no sense. Neither does Psalm 73.

It was the contention of amillennial theologian Meredith G. Kline that the covenantal sanctions of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 no longer apply in New Covenant. He insisted that any New Testament connection between visible blessings and covenant-keeping is, humanly speaking, a random coincidence. "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways.”⁵ Kline was attacking Greg L. Bahnsen’s book, Theonomy in Christian Ethics (1977).⁶ He correctly saw that the heart of theonomy, as defended by Rushdoony, Bahnsen, and the other theonomists, rests on the assumption of the predictability of God’s sanctions in history. As Ray Sutton made clear in That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant (1987), point four of the biblical covenant is sanctions. These sanctions are related to point three: biblical law.⁷ These, in turn, are related to point five: inheritance.⁸

4. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 19.

C. Predictability and Social Science

Predictability is basic to all science and all social theory. Predictability is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of predictability vs. no predictability. It is a question of what insures predictability, what kind of predictability, the degree of predictability, and in what time frame? As the priests of Philistia said,

Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them: And take the ark of the LORD, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold, which ye return him for a trespass offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go. And see, if it goeth up by the way of his own coast to Beth-shemesh, then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us (I Sam. 6:7–9).⁹

It was not chance.

For almost two millennia, Christian theologians and social thinkers have debated the issue of historical predictability. This issue is

5. Meredith G. Kline, “Comments on an Old-New Error,” Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

6. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 3rd ed. (Nacogdoches, Texas: Covenant Media Press, 2002).

7. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), chaps. 3, 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), chaps. 4, 5.

8. Sutton, ch. 5. North, ch. 5.

9. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 13.

closely associated with ethics. They have come to no agreement.

The most familiar Christian theories of social causation have rested on a schizophrenic foundation: biblical law coupled with one of two schizophrenic and irreconcilable concepts of classical Greek natural law, either Platonic (Eastern Christianity) or Aristotelian (Western Christianity). With the triumph of Darwinism in the West, natural law theory was uprooted and cast aside by the intelligentsia. To the extent that natural law theory persists, it is a pre-Darwinian anachronism, one that is not well understood by its defenders. Any appeal to natural law is futile today within academia. It is as unpopular as the concept of intelligent design in nature, and for the same reason: Darwinism's commitment to cosmic impersonalism. But what can take its place? This is the crucial epistemological question facing Christian social theorists today. They avoid this question like the plague—except for the theonomists.

Conclusion

The Book of Job is about cosmic personalism. It is about predictable historical sanctions in a world of cosmic personalism.¹⁰ Job did not argue for random historical sanctions. Neither did his three comforters-turned-critics. Neither did Elihu, who spoke for God. Neither did God, who also spoke for God. But Meredith G. Kline did.

10. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

1

SANCTIONS AND PREDICTABILITY

There was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job; and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil (Job 1:1).

The theocentric principle here is the fear of God.

A. A Perfect Man

Job was perfect, the text says. This does not mean that he had been born without original sin. Later in the book, Job refers to the sins of his youth. “For thou writest bitter things against me, and makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth” (Job. 13:26). In his maturity, however, Job is said to be perfect. God later testified to the righteousness of Job. Ezekiel announced this testimony.

The word of the LORD came again to me, saying, Son of man, when the land sinneth against me by trespassing grievously, then will I stretch out mine hand upon it, and will break the staff of the bread thereof, and will send famine upon it, and will cut off man and beast from it: Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 14:12–14).

Daniel was no longer in the land by this time. He had been carried off to Babylon (Dan. 1). Noah had escaped the Flood with his life and the lives of seven others. Job would have escaped, but not his wife. What would they have escaped? Negative sanctions. Why were these sanctions imposed by God? Because of widespread disobedience to the Bible-revealed laws of God.

Job was perfect. This creates a problem for interpreters. Isaiah announced: “But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away" (Isa. 64:6). Jeremiah said: "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?" (Jer. 17:9). Did these observations not apply to Job? They did not. Why not? Because Job was judicially covered. "And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually" (Job 1:5). Job followed the laws of sacrifice. There was no sin left uncovered. He had right standing with God. How? Because of his faith.

Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law (Rom. 3:28).

For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins. Wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me: In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure (Heb. 10:4–6).

What distinguished Job from all the other men and women of faith was the comprehensive nature of his faith. He avoided evil, and he sacrificed on behalf of himself and his children. He was beyond reproach. This was the basis of God's challenge to Satan.

B. God's Challenge to Satan

"And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?" (Job 1:8). He was the archetype of the righteous man. He was therefore representative of Jesus: the center of God's cosmic challenge to Satan. Here was a man whom Satan had not corrupted.

Satan replied in terms of the Mosaic law's system of predictable sanctions. "Then Satan answered the LORD, and said, Doth Job fear God for nought? Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land" (Job. 1:9–10). Job did not serve God for free. He was being paid by God. God was buying Job's allegiance: quid pro quo. Satan offered a challenge: "But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face" (v. 11). God took up this challenge. "And the LORD said unto Satan, Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only upon himself put not forth thine hand. So Satan went forth from the presence of the LORD" (v. 12).

Satan was denying that there can be true righteousness if there is any personal benefit accruing to the righteous person. This was the argument of Immanuel Kant, the premier philosopher of the modern West.¹ God accepted this challenge on behalf of Job. He chose to let Job prove that he would meet this challenge. Job met the challenge. "Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped, And said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD. In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly" (Job 1:20–22).

Satan had been publicly humiliated. Job proved him wrong. Having goaded Satan into the first challenge to His representative agent, God did it again.

Again there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan came also among them to present himself before the LORD. And the LORD said unto Satan, From whence comest thou? And Satan answered the LORD, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? and still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause (Job 2:1–3).

God here admits that Satan had moved God to move against Job. God did not blame Satan as an independent agent, for God had authorized Satan to destroy Job's environment. God admitted that He had ruined Job without cause. Job had not violated God's law.

Satan took the bait. "And Satan answered the LORD, and said, Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face" (Job 2:4–5). That was what God had been waiting for. "And the LORD said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life" (v. 6).

1. Immanuel Kant, "The Lawgiver," Lectures on Ethics (New York: Harper, [1780?] 1963), p. 52. Cf. "Reward and Punishment," p. 57.

So went Satan forth from the presence of the LORD, and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown. And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal; and he sat down among the ashes. Then said his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? curse God, and die. But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips (Job 2:7–10).

Job's wife did not pass the test. Job did.

Satan then disappears from the story. He is replaced by Job's three comforters. "Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite: for they had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him and to comfort him" (Job 2:11). The debate over ethics and sanctions fills the remainder of the book.

C. From Effect to Cause

The three comforters rapidly became cross-examiners. Their shift of opinion came in response to Job's questioning of the nature of ethical cause and effect. Job raised a series of questions. They all boiled down to this: "Why me?" He offered a list of reasons why he cursed his birth. But it was not these things, in and of themselves, that called forth his wailing. Rather, it was the underlying system of causation.

Why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? For my sighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like the waters. For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me, and that which I was afraid of is come unto me. I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came (Job 3:23–26).

1. A System of Ethical Causation

Here, he admits that he had relied on a system of ethical causation. He had obeyed God and had offered sacrifices as coverings, yet negative sanctions had come. He is admitting that Satan had been right about his motivation. He does not curse God, but he curses the day he was born. "Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, There is a man child conceived" (Job 3:3). He does not curse God, but he curses his own history, a history over which God was sovereign. He does not deny the sovereignty of God. He questions its outcome.

His compatriots immediately recognize the underlying theology of his complaint. Job is saying that God is not fair. They rush to defend God's honor. They challenge Job to search his soul. They challenge him to identify the sin that had resulted in the loss of his goods and his children. Given the magnitude of the negative sanctions, this must have been a very large sin.

Eliphaz leads off.

Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off? Even as I have seen, they that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same. By the blast of God they perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed (Job 4:7–9).

He affirms the predictability of God's historical sanctions. Effects have causes. Great effects have great causes. The causes are ethical.

Eliphaz is not content to draw conclusions from the facts. He claims special revelation.

Now a thing was secretly brought to me, and mine ear received a little thereof. In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, Fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake. Then a spirit passed before my face; the hair of my flesh stood up: It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof: an image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a voice, saying, Shall mortal man be more just than God? shall a man be more pure than his maker? (vv. 12–17).

Who is Job to call God's system of historical sanctions into question? Job's children had all died. This was not random. Effects have causes. Eliphaz says that he has seen all this before.

I have seen the foolish taking root: but suddenly I cursed his habitation. His children are far from safety, and they are crushed in the gate, neither is there any to deliver them. Whose harvest the hungry eateth up, and taketh it even out of the thorns, and the robber swalloweth up their substance (Job 5:3–5).

Eliphaz knows what he would do if he were in Job's sandals.

I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause: Which doeth great things and unsearchable; marvellous things without number: Who giveth rain upon the earth, and sendeth waters upon the fields: To set up on high those that be low; that those which mourn may be exalted to safety. He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise (Job 5:8–12).

God is sovereign. Look to God.

2. Unpredictable Sanctions

Job knows that God is sovereign. This is what baffles him. God is sovereign over history. He brings sanctions. But these sanctions are not always predictable, Job had learned. They are not always responses to a man's ethical conformity or his sacrifices. He knows he is righteous, yet negative sanctions had come. Job is correct. God had already admitted as much to Satan. "Thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause" (Job 2:3).

Job is baffled. This is because he knows nothing of God's challenge to Satan and Satan's challenge to God. But Eliphaz is not baffled in the slightest. He makes a prediction. "Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth: therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty: For he maketh sore, and bindeth up: he woundeth, and his hands make whole. He shall deliver thee in six troubles: yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee" (Job 5:17–19). In the final chapter, this prediction came true.

Yet Eliphaz is profoundly wrong. So are his two companions, who extend his argument. We know they were wrong because of what God told them at the end of their verbal exchanges.

And it was so, that after the LORD had spoken these words unto Job, the LORD said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath. Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering; and my servant Job shall pray for you: for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job (Job 42:7–8).

Eliphaz affirms the covenantal predictability of God in history. Job denies it. Eliphaz predicts that Job will overcome adversity. Job has no faith in this outcome. Then why is Eliphaz wrong? Most of the book of Job is a detailed recitation of the arguments on both sides. The reader must pay close attention to these arguments if he is to sort out the wheat from the chaff.

Conclusion

Job was not at fault for the negative sanctions that came upon him. These sanctions were a test. They were a test of his faith.

The test involved cursing. Satan argued that Job blessed God verbally and ritually because God had blessed Job economically and biologically. If God cursed Job economically and biologically, Job would curse God verbally. This was the heart of Satan's challenge. Satan lost the argument, twice.

Job's sin was to curse the historical cursings in the name of an inherent covenantal unpredictability in history. Eliphaz's sin was to affirm covenantal predictability in history as a way to challenge Job's prior righteousness. But Job's prior righteousness was unquestionable. It, and it alone, had been the basis of God's challenge to Satan.

Satan moved logically from effect to cause: from Job's external blessings to his covenantal obedience. Eliphaz moved logically from effect to cause: from Job's external cursings to his covenantal disobedience. Both were wrong.

2

FROM WOMB TO TOMB

And said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD (Job 1:21).

The theocentric principle here is God's absolute sovereignty in history.

A. Historical Sanctions

The Book of Job is about historical sanctions. It is also about inheritance in history. We know this because the book ends with the story of Job's second set of 10 children.

He had also seven sons and three daughters. And he called the name of the first, Jemima; and the name of the second, Kezia; and the name of the third, Keren-happuch. And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job: and their father gave them inheritance among their brethren. After this lived Job an hundred and forty years, and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations. So Job died, being old and full of days (Job 42:13–17).

His inheritance had been cut off by Satan, acting as God's agent. God restored it at the end. The first 10 children remained dead. The second 10 prospered. Even the daughters received an inheritance. The first inheritance was cut off. The second inheritance was not. This was the Bible's consummate story of disinheritance and inheritance until the incarnation: the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ.

B. "Why Me?"

Job affirms here that nakedness marks man's entrance into this world, and nakedness marks his exit. "How much did he leave behind?" "All of it!"

In between are blessings and cursings. These come from God. If we praise God as the giver, we should praise Him as the taker. He is no less sovereign as giver or taker.

When men win, they rarely ask, “Why me?” They assume that they deserve this. When men lose, they are tempted to ask, “Why me?” They assume that they do not deserve this. At this stage in the temptation process, Job did not ask, “Why me?” He verbally affirmed the sovereignty of God.

The question, “Why me?” assumes the existence of cause and effect. If there were no system of cause and effect, “Why?” would have no meaning because it would have no answer. The question, “Why me?” implies a search for cause and effect. It also implies a search for another answer: “How can I avoid another round in the future?”

Job affirms that he was as content with blessing as with cursing. This is a statement of great faith. Paul wrote: “In every thing give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you” (I Thes. 5:18). To do this requires faith in both the sovereignty of God and the righteousness of God.

In the third phase of his trials, Job did begin to ask, “Why me?” He sought an answer based on his understanding of covenantal causation. Without such understanding, he recognized, life is meaningless. He did not want to live in a meaningless universe.

C. Corporate Progress

If we enter naked and depart naked, does blessing have any advantage over cursing, other than for hedonism’s sake? When pleasure ends at death, what does life matter, one way or the other, to the departed? There has been no relevant economic progress, one way or the other.

If what applies to the individual also applies to society, there is no meaningful corporate progress, one way or the other. This is the outlook of cosmic evolution: from the big bang to the heat death of the frozen universe.¹ Nakedness swallows meaning.

Job declares his equal acceptance of wealth or poverty, because poverty—nakedness—marks the beginning and the end of each person’s life. Yet, if taken literally, blessings are equal to cursings. But God has promised blessings for obedience and cursings for disobedience

1. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

(Lev. 26; Deut. 28). If they are equal, then are obedience and disobedience equal? Obviously not.

Then what was Job's point? This: God is sovereign over both blessings and cursings. Pleasure is better than pain. It is better to be rich and healthy than it is to be poor and sick. In God's system of covenantal causation, we enter into an inheritance when we are born, and we leave an inheritance behind when we die. The inheritance is supposed to be greater at the end than at the beginning. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).²

If the accumulation of wealth in one lifetime is the only thing under consideration, then Job's words apply. There is no progress. This was Job's point with respect to praising God. Having nothing or having a great deal makes no difference in the grand scheme of one lifetime. We depart just as we arrived: naked. But this ignores two factors: (1) inheritance beyond the grave, where accumulation is not only possible but ethically mandatory;³ (2) generational inheritance in history.

From womb to tomb is too short a time perspective. That is because covenantal inheritance is always a factor in history. This inheritance is to be the focus of our efforts in history.

If there is no covenantal economic predictability in history, then economic progress has no ethical relevance. Economic effects are then unrelated to ethical causes. Economic effects that are not connected ethically have no relevance covenantally. They are just random events. Nakedness triumphs.

The same criticism applies to intergenerational inheritance. Economic growth then has no economic relevance. Neither does any other area that is marked by the expansion of alternatives: science, technology, education, medicine. Nakedness triumphs.

The Book of Job rejects this outlook. It reasserts the message of the Book of Deuteronomy: corporate inheritance matters, because it is part of a process of covenantal expansion in history. This process is at bottom ethical-judicial.

2. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

3] . "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal" (Matt. 6:19–20). Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

Conclusion

Job affirmed the sovereignty of God over history. We are to acknowledge this sovereignty, in good times and bad, in sickness and health, for better or worse, till death's nakedness arrives. But the message of the Book of Job is steadfastly opposed to any view of life that begins with the womb and ends with the tomb.

History displays progress. This progress is covenantal. History displays the sovereignty of God, the authority of man over creation, the Bible-revealed law of God, historical sanctions, and inheritance.

3

POOR ME, POOR SYSTEM

After this opened Job his mouth, and cursed his day (Job 3:1).

The theocentric principle here is the consistency between ethical cause and outward effect.

A. Job's Lament

Job here begins a lament. He curses his birth. "Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, There is a man child conceived" (v. 3). He sees the devastation around him. He had been singled out for cursings. One day destroyed everything he had of value. Yet this had not initially produced this response. It had taken a week of silence to produce this outburst (Job 2:13). The more he thought about it, the more he lost confidence in the positive historical sanctions of God. "Why died I not from the womb? why did I not give up the ghost when I came out of the belly?" (v. 11).

Time has become his enemy. He has no confidence that time would produce a reversal of fortune. He no longer sees time as governed by ethical cause and effect. Better the rest of death. "For now should I have lain still and been quiet, I should have slept: then had I been at rest, With kings and counsellors of the earth, which built desolate places for themselves" (vv. 13–14). "There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest" (v. 17). He sees the nakedness of death as superior to the negative sanctions of life. Life is a curse. It is no longer an opportunity. Why not? Because there is no predictability of historical sanctions. He had thought there was safety in righteousness. "I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came" (v. 26).

This is nihilism. This is a self-conscious abandonment of the concept of covenantal inheritance in history.

B. Eliphaz Invokes Predictability

In response, Eliphaz invokes covenantal predictability. “Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off?” (Job 4:7). He recognizes that Job has abandoned covenant theology at this point. Job has broken from his past.

Behold, thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands. Thy words have upholden him that was falling, and thou hast strengthened the feeble knees. But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled. Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways? (vv. 3–6).

There is nothing new going on, Eliphaz argues. This is the same old cause-and-effect system that Job had invoked when teaching others to overcome the limitations of history. Now, Job has abandoned confidence in that system.

Eliphaz invokes a vision. “Now a thing was secretly brought to me, and mine ear received a little thereof. In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men” (vv. 12–13). A spirit had approached him (v. 15). It asked a rhetorical question. “Shall mortal man be more just than God? shall a man be more pure than his maker?” (v. 17). Eliphaz implies that Job had become such a man. Job is criticizing his environment, which he had previously attributed to God’s sovereignty. Who is Job to call God’s providence into question?

God’s sanctions are still operative. “For wrath killeth the foolish man, and envy slayeth the silly one” (Job 5:2). Nothing has changed.

I have seen the foolish taking root: but suddenly I cursed his habitation. His children are far from safety, and they are crushed in the gate, neither is there any to deliver them. Whose harvest the hungry eateth up, and taketh it even out of the thorns, and the robber swalloweth up their substance (vv. 3–5).

There will come judgment. “He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness: and the counsel of the froward is carried headlong (vv. 12–13). There is still hope, as there was before. “So the poor hath hope, and iniquity stoppeth her mouth” (v. 16). God will deliver Job (vv. 19–20). But there is a catch. “Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth: therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty” (v. 17). He reminds Job that the afflictions were not random. They were part of a chastening process. God is calling Job to mend his ways—his secret ways. Then God’s positive sanctions will return.

C. A Man Without Hope

Job launches into a long passage in which he describes his afflictions. His calamity is heavy (Job 6:2). God is against him. “For the arrows of the Almighty are within me, the poison whereof drinketh up my spirit: the terrors of God do set themselves in array against me” (v. 4). He still prefers death (v. 9). There is no hope. “What is my strength, that I should hope? and what is mine end, that I should prolong my life?” (v. 11).

Job’s lament presumes that the cause-and-affect system that was announced in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 does not apply in his case. Hopelessness is the result. History is no place for a righteous man, he implies. That is what he had learned from events in his life. “What is my strength, that I should hope? and what is mine end, that I should prolong my life?” (v. 11).

Job wants a reward for his righteousness. “As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow, and as an hireling looketh for the reward of his work, So am I made to possess months of vanity, and wearisome nights are appointed to me” (Job 7:2). There is no deliverance. “My days are swifter than a weaver’s shuttle, and are spent without hope. O remember that my life is wind: mine eye shall no more see good” (vv. 6–7). Death is preferable (v. 15).

Job cries out to God. Man is so insignificant. Why should God care about man, one way or the other? “What is man, that thou shouldest magnify him? and that thou shouldest set thine heart upon him? And that thou shouldest visit him every morning, and try him every moment?” (vv. 17–18). He recognizes that God is still sovereign. He does not blame an impersonal cosmos or chance. But he sees no reason for his affliction. It is meaningless. Why? Because it does not conform to the system of sanctions in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

D. Bildad Invokes Predictability

Bildad asks a related pair of rhetorical questions. “Doth God pervert judgment? or doth the Almighty pervert justice?” (Job 8:3). Effects have causes. These judgments are not the product of God’s perversity, he insists. As for Job’s dead children, “If thy children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away for their transgression” (v. 4). This comforter’s first words are vicious, but he thinks he is defending God.

Job’s problem, says Bildad, is that he has cut himself off from God, who predictably rewards righteousness.

If thou wouldest seek unto God betimes, and make thy supplication to the Almighty; If thou wert pure and upright; surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous. Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase. For enquire, I pray thee, of the former age, and prepare thyself to the search of their fathers (vv. 5–8).

If Job has no hope, he should examine his ways. It is the hypocrite who is without hope.

Whilst it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb. So are the paths of all that forget God; and the hypocrite’s hope shall perish: Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be a spider’s web (vv. 12–14).

Job has no hope because he is not a perfect man, and never was. “Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evil doers” (v. 20).

E. Job’s Critique of the System

Job has no illusions that the system is random. God is sovereign.

He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength: who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered? Which removeth the mountains, and they know not: which overturneth them in his anger. Which shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble. Which commandeth the sun, and it riseth not; and sealeth up the stars. Which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea (Job 9:3–8).

Point one of the biblical covenant is two-fold: God as transcendent and God as present.¹ Job has no problem with the first. He has problems with the second. “Lo, he goeth by me, and I see him not: he passeth on also, but I perceive him not” (v. 11). “If I had called, and he had answered me; yet would I not believe that he had hearkened unto my voice" (v. 16). Why not? Because of the lack of correlation between the negative sanctions and his own righteousness. Job announces to his hearers what God had announced to Satan. "For he breaketh me with a tempest, and multiplieth my wounds without cause" (v. 17). The system is morally perverse.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>).

This is one thing, therefore I said it, He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked. If the scourge slay suddenly, he will laugh at the trial of the innocent. The earth is given into the hand of the wicked: he covereth the faces of the judges thereof; if not, where, and who is he? (vv. 22–24).

This is the heart of the matter, Job insists. The system is not random. It is perverse. It is the reverse of what Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 declare. In operation, Job's world is upside-down ethically. Yet God is in total control. So, there is no hope.

Bildad wants Job to inquire of God. This is not realistic, Job says. "For he is not a man, as I am, that I should answer him, and we should come together in judgment" (v. 32). If only there were a higher court, a higher authority. "Neither is there any daysman betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both. Let him take his rod away from me, and let not his fear terrify me: Then would I speak, and not fear him; but it is not so with me" (vv. 33–35).

This self-deprecating announcement does not last for even one more sentence. "My soul is weary of my life; I will leave my complaint upon myself; I will speak in the bitterness of my soul. I will say unto God, Do not condemn me; shew me wherefore thou contendest with me" (Job 10:1–2). He demands that God give an account of Himself and His corrupt system. He asks God a rhetorical question. "Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress, that thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands, and shine upon the counsel of the wicked?" (v. 3).

Job is sure that his actions were not to blame for his afflictions. "Thou knowest that I am not wicked; and there is none that can deliver out of thine hand" (v. 7). Then what is going on here? "Thine hands have made me and fashioned me together round about; yet thou dost destroy me" (v. 8). He then offers a pair of analogies for his condition: poured like milk, curdled like cheese (v. 10). "If I be wicked, woe unto me; and if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head. I am full of confusion; therefore see thou mine affliction" (v. 15). But it just keeps getting worse. "Thou renewest thy witnesses against me, and increasest thine indignation upon me; changes and war are against me" (v. 17).

He wants God's neutrality: to be left alone. "Are not my days few? cease then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little" (v. 20). Better to be dead (v. 21).

F. Zophar Escalates the Accusation

Job talks too much, Zophar says (Job 11:2). Job is a liar.

"Should thy lies make men hold their peace? and when thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed? For thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes" (vv. 3–4). If only God would speak and silence Job. "But oh that God would speak, and open his lips against thee" (v. 5). Not only is Job not innocent, he has been given a light sentence for his iniquity. "And that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to that which is! Know therefore that God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth" (v. 6).

Zophar is in the know. Job isn't. "Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know? The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea" (vv. 7–9). Job is to blame for his troubles. It is time for a change. "If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away, and let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles" (v. 14). If Job would just follow Zophar's advice, and the advice of his colleagues, things would improve. "And thou shalt be secure, because there is hope; yea, thou shalt dig about thee, and thou shalt take thy rest in safety" (v. 18).

G. Job Is Not Impressed

Job has had enough. It is time for sarcasm. "No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you. But I have understanding as well as you; I am not inferior to you: yea, who knoweth not such things as these?" (Job 12:2–3). He understands the truth, he says.

1. A Perverse System of Causality

The system of causation is perverse. "The tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure; into whose hand God bringeth abundantly" (v. 6). Everyone knows this. The beasts of the field know this (v. 7) The fishes know this (v. 8). "Who knoweth not in all these that the hand of the LORD hath wrought this?" (v. 9). He is sovereign. "In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind" (v. 10).

With him is wisdom and strength, he hath counsel and understanding. Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again: he shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening. Behold, he withholdeth the waters, and they dry up: also he sendeth them out, and they overturn the earth (vv. 13–15).

Job then offers a list of events in which God is sovereign (vv. 17–23). "He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way. They grope in the dark without light, and he maketh them to stagger like a drunken man" (vv. 24–25). He is describing himself.

He now gains enough confidence to speak with God. "Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to reason with God" (Job 13:3). In contrast, his accusers are liars. "But ye are forgers of lies, ye are all physicians of no value" (v. 4). They say that they speak on behalf of God, but they do not know what they are talking about. "Will ye speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him? Will ye accept his person? will ye contend for God?" (vv. 7–8). They should fear God (vv. 9–11).

2. A Declaration of Trust

Job insists that he trusts in God, no matter what. "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him: but I will maintain mine own ways before him" (v. 15). He declares confidently, "Behold now, I have ordered my cause; I know that I shall be justified" (v. 18). He implores God to cease persecuting him. Then the two of them can talk.

Withdraw thine hand far from me: and let not thy dread make me afraid. Then call thou, and I will answer: or let me speak, and answer thou me. How many are mine iniquities and sins? make me to know my transgression and my sin. Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdest me for thine enemy? (vv. 21–24).

Once again, he criticizes the system of causation. Something is deeply wrong. He has done nothing wrong, yet he is under God's negative sanctions. "Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks, and lookest narrowly unto all my paths; thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet" (v. 27). Job insists that he deserves an explanation. This becomes Job's theme until the final chapter.

Man's time is determined by God. "Seeing his days are determined, the number of his months are with thee, thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass" (Job 14:5). The system of sanctions should be withdrawn from mankind, Job says. Death should constitute the only negative sanction. Anything more than this is too difficult to bear. A man under negative sanctions cannot accomplish his work. "Turn from him, that he may rest, till he shall accomplish, as an hireling, his day" (v. 6). The grave will swallow all men. "So man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep" (v. 12). He has no hope in the resurrection. "If a man die, shall he live again? all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come" (v. 14). What change? Death. "Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee: thou wilt have a desire to the work of thine hands" (v. 15). Man has no hope. God washes away mankind's works. "The waters wear the stones: thou wastest away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth; and thou destroyest the hope of man. Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth: thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away" (vv. 19–20).

For Job, history offers no hope. Neither does the grave. A dead man sees no inheritance. "His sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them" (v. 21). Life offers no hope. "But his flesh upon him shall have pain, and his soul within him shall mourn" (v. 22). Everything is hopeless. Therefore, he prays to God to give him rest and death.

H. Eliphaz Defends Predictable Negative Sanctions

Eliphaz replies. Job speaks folly. "For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou choosest the tongue of the crafty" (Job 15:5). Where is Job wrong? By not understanding that God's negative sanctions come on the wicked. "The wicked man travaileth with pain all his days, and the number of years is hidden to the oppressor. A dreadful sound is in his ears: in prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him" (vv. 20–21). He implies that this had been Job's situation. Job had been prosperous. Then poverty came in one day. Such a man loses faith in the future. "He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness, and he is waited for of the sword" (v. 22). This is Job's situation. Well should Job lose faith. The man who challenges God is asking for trouble. "For he stretcheth out his hand against God, and strengtheneth himself against the Almighty" (v. 25). Is there hope for him? No. "He shall not be rich, neither shall his substance continue, neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth” (v. 29).

The problem for Job was that he had come under negative sanctions, yet he had been a faithful man. There is therefore no predictable relationship between righteousness and positive sanctions. Eliphaz and the other two visitors do not believe Job, because they believe in the predictability of God’s historical sanctions. Job had been rich. Then he lost his wealth. This testified against his claim of righteousness. The fact that Job called on God to explain Himself was another sign of Job’s rebellion. No explanation is necessary, Eliphaz is saying. The negative sanctions testify against Job.

I. Job Insists on His Innocence

Job dismisses their words. “I have heard many such things: miserable comforters are ye all” (Job 16:2). He has had enough. “Shall vain words have an end? or what emboldeneth thee that thou answerest?” (v. 3). “God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and turned me over into the hands of the wicked” (v. 11).

Job says that God has broken him (v. 12). But he insists that this was through no fault on his part. “Not for any injustice in mine hands: also my prayer is pure” (v. 16). This is not just his opinion, he says. “Also now, behold, my witness is in heaven, and my record is on high” (v. 19). The negative sanctions came, but they were not imposed as a punishment for Job’s supposed evil. There was no evil. This means that historical sanctions are not always predictable in terms of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. They are predictable for most righteous people. “The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger” (Job 17:9). But they are not for him. “If I wait, the grave is mine house: I have made my bed in the darkness” (v. 13). He has no hope. “I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the dust” (v. 15).

J. Bildad Judges Job on God’s Behalf

Bildad returns to the theme of the three comforters: Job committed sin, and by defending himself verbally, he is digging himself into a hole. His light will be put out by God. “Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine” (Job. 18:5). Job’s self-defense will not stand. “The light shall be dark in his tabernacle, and his candle shall be put out with him. The steps of his strength shall be straitened, and his own counsel shall cast him down.

For he is cast into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a snare” (vv. 6–8).

Bildad waxes eloquent for verse after verse, warning Job that Job has cast his lot with the doomed. The very creation will move against him. “The snare is laid for him in the ground, and a trap for him in the way” (v. 10). The list is comparable to the list of negative sanctions in Deuteronomy 28. Job will have no name. “His remembrance shall perish from the earth, and he shall have no name in the street” v. 17). There will be no heirs. “He shall neither have son nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings” (v. 19).

All of this rests on a presupposition, namely, that God’s negative historical sanctions are imposed only on those who deserve them.

K. Job Identifies God as the Sanctions-Bringer

Job does not blame fate or chance for his condition. He blames God. “Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with his net” (Job 19:6). Job did nothing wrong. God does not hear his cry. “Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard: I cry aloud, but there is no judgment” (v. 7). He is speaking of a verbal accusation by God, an explanation. He has no hope. “He hath destroyed me on every side, and I am gone: and mine hope hath he removed like a tree” (v. 10).

He recognizes that his critics are not acting autonomously. They are part of God’s system of sanctions. All those who once were his friends are his enemies (vv. 11–19). He then utters a phrase that has come down through the ages: “My bone cleaveth to my skin and to my flesh, and I am escaped with the skin of my teeth” (v. 20). Teeth have no skin.

Yet, in the midst of this lament, Job still refuses to abandon God. “For I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth” (v. 25). This is a declaration of resurrection: the strongest in the Old Testament. “And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God” (v. 26).

Yet his condition is not his fault. It is the critics’ fault. “But ye should say, Why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in me?” (v. 28). He warns them of the wrath to come. “Be ye afraid of the sword: for wrath bringeth the punishments of the sword, that ye may know there is a judgment” (v. 29). There is judgment in history. It can come at any time, just as it has come upon him.

L. Zophar Affirms Deuteronomy 28

Zophar returns to the theme of the visitors. These sanctions are not random. They are deserved. The bigger men are, the harder they fall.

That the triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment? Though his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the clouds; Yet he shall perish for ever like his own dung: they which have seen him shall say, Where is he? He shall fly away as a dream, and shall not be found: yea, he shall be chased away as a vision of the night. The eye also which saw him shall see him no more; neither shall his place any more behold him (Job 20:5–9).

He continues on in this vein, providing a litany of sanctions to come. “He hath swallowed down riches, and he shall vomit them up again: God shall cast them out of his belly” (v. 15). He accuses Job of serious moral infractions.

That which he laboured for shall he restore, and shall not swallow it down: according to his substance shall the restitution be, and he shall not rejoice therein. Because he hath oppressed and hath forsaken the poor; because he hath violently taken away an house which he builded not (vv. 18–19).

Job’s future, should he remain intransigent in his profession of innocence, will be ruinous. “The heaven shall reveal his iniquity; and the earth shall rise up against him” (v. 27). There is no escape. “This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God” (v. 29).

M. Job’s Faith in Eventual Predictability

His critics have brought warnings and accusations to him, based on his condition as a man under comprehensive negative sanctions. But sanctions are not predictable in the short term, he insists. This is true of positive sanctions, too. The wicked prosper for a time.

Wherefore do the wicked live, become old, yea, are mighty in power? Their seed is established in their sight with them, and their offspring before their eyes. Their houses are safe from fear, neither is the rod of God upon them. Their bull gendereth, and faileth not; their cow calveth, and casteth not her calf. They send forth their little ones like a flock, and their children dance. They take the timbrel and harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ. They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave (Job 21:7–13).

These people grow confident as a result of their outward prosperity. “Therefore they say unto God, Depart from us; for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways. What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? and what profit should we have, if we pray unto him?” (vv. 14–15). They view their success as independent from God and His sanctions.

This is a mistake. “How oft is the candle of the wicked put out! and how oft cometh their destruction upon them! God distributeth sorrows in his anger. That which he laboured for shall he restore, and shall not swallow it down: according to his substance shall the restitution be, and he shall not rejoice therein” (vv. 17–18). In any case, no one escapes death (vv. 30–33).

N. Eliphaz Adds More Lies

Eliphaz asks what he thinks are two rhetorical questions. They are anything but rhetorical.

Can a man be profitable unto God, as he that is wise may be profitable unto himself? Is it any pleasure to the Almighty, that thou art righteous? or is it gain to him that thou makest thy ways perfect? (Job 22:2–3).

This is a profound pair of questions. They reflect what Cornelius Van Til called the full-bucket paradox. God’s glory is like a full bucket of water. How can adding anything to this full bucket fill it even more? God is infinite, yet the creation is something extra. It is not part of God’s being. It is different from His being: subordinate, yet real. Furthermore, God is infinite in His glory, yet we are to glorify Him. How do we add anything to a full bucket? Yet we do. History has meaning. We have meaning.

Eliphaz is trying to prove that Job is nothing compared to God. Eliphaz is incorrect. Man is something compared to God. He is the image of God. It was very important to God that Job was righteous. It was so important that God twice goaded Satan about Job’s righteousness. Job’s refusal to curse God was the whole point. This proved God’s point. The debate between God and Satan from the garden of Eden until the final judgment is about the righteousness of covenant-keepers in relation to covenant-breakers. The outcome of this debate is so important to God that God has imposed a system of covenantal historical sanctions that structures the historical inheritance of both groups. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).² By denigrating the importance of a man's ethics in God's outlook, Eliphaz calls this system of sanctions into question, yet he has rested his case against Job on the basis of the predictability of these sanctions.

Job has denied his sin. This denial has lured Eliphaz and his compatriots into making ever-more preposterous accusations. "Is not thy wickedness great? and thine iniquities infinite? For thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought, and stripped the naked of their clothing" (vv. 5–6). Job has withheld bread to the hungry (v. 7). "Thou hast sent widows away empty, and the arms of the fatherless have been broken" (v. 9). Therefore, Job is under God's sanctions. "Therefore snares are round about thee, and sudden fear troubleth thee; Or darkness, that thou canst not see; and abundance of waters cover thee" (vv. 10–11).

Job has admitted repeatedly that God is the sole source of His afflictions. Eliphaz has not listened. He accuses Job of spiritual blindness. Job refuses to confess his sin, as if God cannot see this sin. "And thou sayest, How doth God know? can he judge through the dark cloud? Thick clouds are a covering to him, that he seeth not; and he walketh in the circuit of heaven" vv. 13–14). Job is blind to the predictability of God's negative sanctions. "Hast thou marked the old way which wicked men have trodden? Which were cut down out of time, whose foundation was overflowed with a flood: Which said unto God, Depart from us: and what can the Almighty do for them?" (vv. 15–17). Eliphaz calls Job to repentance. "If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up, thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles" (v. 23). If Job will do this, he will be rich once again. "Then shalt thou lay up gold as dust, and the gold of Ophir as the stones of the brooks" (v. 24). The sanctions are predictable.

O. Job Wants a Judicial Hearing

Job remains confident that he has done nothing wrong. He cries out for a judicial hearing. "Oh that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat! I would order my cause before him, and fill my mouth with arguments" (Job 23:3–4). Job is confident in his own righteousness. "I would know the words which he would answer me, and understand what he would say unto me. Will he plead against me with his great power? No; but he would put strength in me. There the righteous might dispute with him; so should I be delivered for ever from my judge" (vv. 5–7). The problem is, God will not give him a hearing. "Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him: On the left hand, where he doth work, but I cannot behold him: he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him" (vv. 8–9). But if he ever gets his hearing, God will declare him innocent. "But he knoweth the way that I take: when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold" (v. 10). Why? "My foot hath held his steps, his way have I kept, and not declined" (v. 11).

2. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

The problem is, God is sovereign. He cannot be moved. "But he is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth" (v. 13). He is in control. "For he performeth the thing that is appointed for me: and many such things are with him" (v. 14). Conclusion: "Therefore am I troubled at his presence: when I consider, I am afraid of him" (v. 15).

Eliphaz has accused Job of being blind to God's ability to see into Job's heart. Job counters by affirming God's omniscience. Covenant-breakers do not perceive this. "Why, seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty, do they that know him not see his days?" (Job 24:1). Some steal by moving landmarks (v. 2), contrary to Deuteronomy 27:17. "Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's landmark. And all the people shall say, Amen." Others steal animals from orphans. They take the widow's pledge (v. 3), contrary to Deuteronomy 24:17. "Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless; nor take a widow's raiment to pledge." They sin in many ways (vv. 7–11). But there is a problem: they get away with it. "Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out: yet God layeth not folly to them" (v. 12). Eventually, they die. "Drought and heat consume the snow waters: so doth the grave those which have sinned" (v. 19). The sinner is forgotten (v. 20).

The sinner does not know when God's wrath will come upon him. "Though it be given him to be in safety, whereon he resteth; yet his eyes are upon their ways" (v. 23). Their end draweth nigh. "They are exalted for a little while, but are gone and brought low; they are taken out of the way as all other, and cut off as the tops of the ears of corn" (v. 24).

Job does not deny negative sanctions. He only denies that they are readily predictable. Bad things happen to bad people, but bad things also happen to good people. Job is one of these.

P. Bildad Invokes Worms

This is the final response of the three comforters. It is short. He invokes God's dominion. "Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said, Dominion and fear are with him, he maketh peace in his high places" (Job 25:1–2). Job has affirmed this point repeatedly. Bildad does not undercut Job's affirmations with this affirmation.

He then asks a rhetorical question. "How then can man be justified with God? or how can he be clean that is born of a woman?" (v. 4). The answer is simple: redemption. God has provided a way of redemption, in which God justifies a man. Job has argued that such had been his case prior to the negative sanctions. He had not sinned before God. The sanctions are not consistent with his new condition. To counter this, Bildad invokes finitude rather than ethics. The heavenly spheres are nothing, compared to God. "Behold even to the moon, and it shineth not; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight" (v. 5). Then comes what he regards as the coup de grace. "How much less man, that is a worm? and the son of man, which is a worm?" (v. 6).

This misses the point. Worms are not ethically responsible to God. Men are. God's system of historical sanctions applies to earth's creatures only insofar as they are under men's jurisdiction. As covenantal subordinates to man's dominion, they suffer. Paul later wrote:

For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body (Rom. 8:19–23).³

Man is a creature. In this sense, he shares the condition of a worm. He is not God. But he is made in God's image. He is far more than a worm. Bildad's response is irrelevant to the issue of Job's condition.

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

Conclusion

Job began his defense with a curse on his condition. It would have been better if he had not been born. He did not criticize God directly. He criticized Him indirectly. He criticized the results of God's providence. Here is his argument. God is in charge. He is therefore responsible. Job's condition was inconsistent with the system of sanctions God had announced to Moses. That system is not rigorously predictable. It does not provide a sure pathway to everyone's success.

On hearing this lament, his three comforters immediately became critics. They affirmed that the system of sanctions is predictable. The fault is not in the system, they insisted. It is in Job's behavior. Causes have predictable effects. Negative sanctions point back clearly to some sin in Job's life that warrants his condition. Because his condition is disastrous, the hidden sin must be substantial.

Job denied their argument by denying the universality of God's system of ethical cause and effect. It is not legitimate to draw conclusions about causes from the visible effects—not in his case, anyway. The three critics regarded this argument as additional evidence of Job's lack of accurate self-judgment. God's judgment is always warranted, they argue. Trust it.

This is an argument about predictability in history. How can there be an increase in ethical self-discipline if external effects are not consistent with ethical causes? How can men learn what pleases God and what angers Him if His system of sanctions does not provide motivation for covenant-keeping? Job was calling into question God's covenant governing each individual. The system produces perverse results. Nice guys finish last—not always, but often enough to call into question the covenant. The critics recognized this line of reasoning, and they challenged his conclusion.

The reason why these exchanges are difficult to understand is that both sides appealed to what the Bible teaches. First, there is a system of sanctions. Second, we know what Job did not know, namely, that God ignored this system of sanctions because of Satan's response to God's challenge to Satan. The violation of the sanctions was necessary for God to prove to Satan that Job was not righteous for the sake of the positive sanctions. He was righteous for the sake of God. Satan was silenced by Job's initial responses: acceptance.

This was not true of the visitors. They were not silent. There was a reason for this. In response to the initial challenges from Satan, Job did not demand an explanation from God. He held his peace. But, after thinking for a week in silence about what had happened, he reversed course. He did not curse God. Instead, he cursed God's providential gift of life to Job. The gift was not a gift, Job said. It was a curse. The three visitors answered by laying blame at Job's doorstep. Do not blame God, they said; blame yourself.

Job then justified himself in a long soliloquy: Job 26 through 31.

4

JOB ON JUSTICE AND SANCTIONS

Hell is naked before him, and destruction hath no covering. He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing (Job 26:6–7).

A. The Sovereignty of God

Thus begins Job's lengthy affirmation of the sovereignty of God. He is no less committed to this doctrine than his three critics are. He affirms God's mastery over creation. "He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds; and the cloud is not rent under them. He holdeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth his cloud upon it. He hath compassed the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end" (vv. 8–10). The debate between Job and his critics is not over point one of the biblical covenant: sovereignty. It is a debate over point four: sanctions.

He declares his commitment to predictable negative sanctions. "This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage of oppressors, which they shall receive of the Almighty. If his children be multiplied, it is for the sword: and his offspring shall not be satisfied with bread" (vv. 13–14). God had warned Israel through Moses, "Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them; for they shall go into captivity" (Deut. 28:41). God had also warned Israel, "Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her: thou shalt build an house, and thou shalt not dwell therein: thou shalt plant a vineyard, and shalt not gather the grapes thereof" (Deut. 28:30). Rebellious men's inheritance will be cut off. God was speaking of conquerors inheriting. Job affirms something similar. "Though he heap up silver as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay; He may prepare it, but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver" (vv. 16–17). This corresponds to Solomon's dictum, "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).¹ The rich man will lose his wealth in a night. Job declares:

The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered: he openeth his eyes, and he is not. Terrors take hold on him as waters, a tempest stealeth him away in the night. The east wind carrieth him away, and he departeth: and as a storm hurleth him out of his place. For God shall cast upon him, and not spare: he would fain flee out of his hand. Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place (vv. 19–23).

His critics have defended God's predictable negative sanctions. He in no way disagrees. They have concluded that he is under negative sanctions because of a hidden sin. He denies this. He is correct in his self-defense, as Job 1–2 reveals. He is the victim of a debate between supernatural beings. He does not know this, but he knows the outcome: negative sanctions without an ethical cause. He is innocent.

Job then moves to the identification of God as all-powerful and all-knowing. "He putteth forth his hand upon the rock; he overturneth the mountains by the roots. He cutteth out rivers among the rocks; and his eye seeth every precious thing" (Job 28:9–10).

Men seek wisdom. Where is it found? (v. 12). Men do not know the price of wisdom (v. 13). Gold will not buy it (v. 15). "It cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, with the precious onyx, or the sapphire. The gold and the crystal cannot equal it: and the exchange of it shall not be for jewels of fine gold" (vv. 16–17). This reaffirms what Solomon taught. "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her" (Prov. 3:13–15). Job is affirming his commitment to the covenant's scale of economic values. From whence comes wisdom (v. 20)? From God. "God understandeth the way thereof, and he knoweth the place thereof" (v. 23). Job affirms God as the source of original assessment: point four of the biblical covenant.

For he looketh to the ends of the earth, and seeth under the whole heaven; To make the weight for the winds; and he weigheth the waters by measure. When he made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder: Then did he see it, and declare it; he prepared it, yea, and searched it out (vv. 24–27).

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

Having confessed his commitment to points one and four of the biblical covenant, Job then declares his innocence.

B. A Declaration of Innocence

1. Positive Sanctions

God had been with him, he declares. “Oh that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; When his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness” (Job 29:2–3). He had been the recipient of God’s positive sanctions. God had been with him; so had his children (v. 5). He had been honored by the community (vv. 8–11). Why? “Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me: and I caused the widow’s heart to sing for joy” (vv. 12–13). He had been generous, not an oppressor, contrary to what his critics had claimed. “Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me: and I caused the widow’s heart to sing for joy. I put on righteousness, and it clothed me: my judgment was as a robe and a diadem” (vv. 12–14). In short, he had been a source of positive sanctions. This gave him confidence in the future. “Then I said, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand” (v. 18). There was covenantal correlation: point three (ethics), point four (judgment), and point five (the future).

2. The Great Reversal

Then came the great reversal. “But now they that are younger than I have me in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock” (Job 30:1). They had been his social inferiors. Now they deride him. They had been paupers and refugees (vv. 3–7). “They were children of fools, yea, children of base men: they were viler than the earth. And now am I their song, yea, I am their byword (vv. 8–9). They now do what they can to make his life miserable (vv. 10–14).

Job does not say that his three critics are ethically base men. He merely describes what ethically base men have done to him. He lets them draw the logical conclusion. They are allied with ethically base men.

How did this happen? God did it.

He hath cast me into the mire, and I am become like dust and ashes. I cry unto thee, and thou dost not hear me: I stand up, and thou regardest me not. Thou art become cruel to me: with thy strong hand thou opposest thyself against me. Thou liftest me up to the wind; thou causest me to ride upon it, and dissolvest my substance (vv. 19–22).

All this was true. Job is not inventing stories. God, by unleashing Satan, brought Job low. But why? Job had empathised for the poor, as God requires. “Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? was not my soul grieved for the poor? (v. 25). Yet reversal has come. “When I looked for good, then evil came unto me: and when I waited for light, there came darkness” (v. 26).

3. Inheritance

He raises the issue of inheritance. “For what portion of God is there from above? and what inheritance of the Almighty from on high? Is not destruction to the wicked? and a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity?” (Job 31:2–3). This does not threaten him. “Doth not he see my ways, and count all my steps?” (v. 4). He wants God’s formal judgment.

Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity. If my step hath turned out of the way, and mine heart walked after mine eyes, and if any blot hath cleaved to mine hands; Then let me sow, and let another eat; yea, let my offspring be rooted out (vv. 6–8).

4. Charity

Job does not defend himself merely in terms of his not having actively done evil. He defends himself in his not neglecting to do good: showing charity.

If I have withheld the poor from their desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail; Or have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof; (For from my youth he was brought up with me, as with a father, and I have guided her from my mother’s womb;) If I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering; If his loins have not blessed me, and if he were not warmed with the fleece of my sheep; If I have lifted up my hand against the fatherless, when I saw my help in the gate: Then let mine arm fall from my shoulder blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone (vv. 16–22).

He had always been afraid of God. “For destruction from God was a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I could not endure” (v. 23).

5. Trust in God

He insists that he has not trusted his wealth. “If I have made gold my hope, or have said to the fine gold, Thou art my confidence; If I rejoiced because my wealth was great, and because mine hand had gotten much” (vv. 24–25). The positive sanctions have not been the heart of his religion. In this, he denies Satan’s original accusation. “Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land. But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face” (Job 1:10–11).

He challenges God to bring a charge against him.

Oh that one would hear me! behold, my desire is, that the Almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book. Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me. I would declare unto him the number of my steps; as a prince would I go near unto him (vv. 35–37).

Conclusion

Job did not deny that God brings negative historical against covenant-breakers. He affirmed this. What he denied was that the negative sanctions that God had brought against him were justified in terms of God’s law. He had not committed sin. He also had done positive good. He had been rich. He never trusted his riches. He always feared God.

He ended his defense with a call for negative sanctions in response to any evil he had done. “Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley. The words of Job are ended” (v. 40).

5

ELIHU ON GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY

So these three men ceased to answer Job, because he was righteous in his own eyes. Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram: against Job was his wrath kindled, because he justified himself rather than God. Also against his three friends was his wrath kindled, because they had found no answer, and yet had condemned Job (32:1–3).

We are three-quarters of the way through the Book of Job. This is the first mention of Elihu, whose name means “his God.” He had restrained himself, for he was young. “Now Elihu had waited till Job had spoken, because they were elder than he. When Elihu saw that there was no answer in the mouth of these three men, then his wrath was kindled” (vv. 4–5).

A. Elihu's Challenge

He lays down a challenge. “Great men are not always wise: neither do the aged understand judgment” (v. 9). They are older; he is younger; nevertheless, they should still listen to him.

He says that the three had not answered Job (v. 12). Obviously, they had answered him verbally. But they had not answered him theologically. Why had Elihu said nothing? Because Job's words had not been directed at him. “Now he hath not directed his words against me: neither will I answer him with your speeches” (v. 14). He recognizes that they had responded to Job without coming to grips with Job's reasoning.

He does not attempt to win over his opponents by softening his preliminary words. “For I know not to give flattering titles; in so doing my maker would soon take me away” (v. 22).

Having identified himself as the opponent of Job's critics, he then turns to Job. “Wherefore, Job, I pray thee, hear my speeches, and hearken to all my words” (Job 33:1). He insists that he speaks on behalf of God. “Behold, I am according to thy wish in God’s stead: I also am formed out of the clay” (v. 6). He summarizes Job’s argument to his critics.

Surely thou hast spoken in mine hearing, and I have heard the voice of thy words, saying, I am clean without transgression, I am innocent; neither is there iniquity in me. Behold, he findeth occasions against me, he counteth me for his enemy, He putteth my feet in the stocks, he marketh all my paths (vv. 8–11).

This is a good summary of Job’s self-defense. Job did not commit an offense, yet God imposed negative sanctions on him. Elihu’s response: “Behold, in this thou art not just: I will answer thee, that God is greater than man” (v. 12). Job has repeatedly called on God to explain Himself. “Why dost thou strive against him? for he giveth not account of any of his matters” (v. 13). He identifies the theology of God’s declaration: I am God; you are not. This declaration is supreme in history.

Furthermore, God is not silent. “For God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not. In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumberings upon the bed; Then he openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction” (vv. 14–16). God’s goal is to keep every man from following his autonomous purpose. “That he may withdraw man from his purpose, and hide pride from man” (v. 17). Why? Because man is self-destructive. “He keepeth back his soul from the pit, and his life from perishing by the sword” (v. 18). But men do not listen to God apart from negative sanctions.

He is chastened also with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain: So that his life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat. His flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen; and his bones that were not seen stick out. Yea, his soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers (vv. 19–22).

This had also been Eliphaz’s initial response to Job. “Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth: therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty: For he maketh sore, and bindeth up: he woundeth, and his hands make whole” (Job 5:17–18).

Elihu affirms that God will respond to anyone who repents.

He shall pray unto God, and he will be favourable unto him: and he shall see his face with joy: for he will render unto man his righteousness. He looketh upon men, and if any say, I have sinned, and perverted that which was right, and it profited me not; He will deliver his soul from going into the pit, and his life shall see the light (vv. 26–28).

This had also been the message of Eliphaz in his first response to Job. “Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue: neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh. At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh: neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth” (Job 5:21–22). Eliphaz repeated this message in his final response to Job. “If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up, thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles. Then shalt thou lay up gold as dust, and the gold of Ophir as the stones of the brooks. Yea, the Almighty shall be thy defence, and thou shalt have plenty of silver” (Job. 22:23–25). So far, Elihu has said nothing new.

He repeats Job’s argument. “For Job hath said, I am righteous: and God hath taken away my judgment” (Job 34:5). Job has rejected the relevance of sanctions. “For he hath said, It profiteth a man nothing that he should delight himself with God” (Job 34:9). This was indeed the implication of Job’s self-defense. This means that God is not a reliable judge. His law promises positive sanctions for obedience (Deut. 28:1–14). Elihu responds: “Therefore hearken unto me, ye men of understanding: far be it from God, that he should do wickedness; and from the Almighty, that he should commit iniquity” (v. 10). “Yea, surely God will not do wickedly, neither will the Almighty pervert judgment” (v. 12).

B. Has God Made a Mistake? Is He Unfair?

Elihu reminds Job of the sovereignty of God and the non-sovereignty of men in general and Job in particular.

Who hath given him a charge over the earth? or who hath disposed the whole world? If he set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath; All flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again unto dust. If now thou hast understanding, hear this: hearken to the voice of my words. Shall even he that hateth right govern? and wilt thou condemn him that is most just? Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked? and to princes, Ye are ungodly? How much less to him that accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor? for they all are the work of his hands (vv. 13–19).

Job has called God’s judgment into question. He has said that he is under negative sanctions, yet he did nothing to deserve these sanctions. The reader knows that this is true. In fact, it was Job's righteousness that was the original source of the confrontation between God and Satan. If Job had not been perfect, God would not have initiated this confrontation.

Elihu does not know about this. He would not change his line of reasoning if he did. Job is not in a position as a creature to call God's decisions into question. "For he will not lay upon man more than right; that he should enter into judgment with God" (v. 23). God has not explained Himself to Job. So what? "When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when he hideth his face, who then can behold him? whether it be done against a nation, or against a man only" (Job 34:29).

He offers advice to Job. It is all right to ask why God has brought sanctions, but only so that he does not pursue evil. "Surely it is meet [fit] to be said unto God, I have borne chastisement, I will not offend any more: That which I see not teach thou me: if I have done iniquity, I will do no more" (vv. 31–32). Why is this legitimate? Because a man should not follow his own judgment autonomously. "Should it be according to thy mind? he will recompense it, whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose; and not I: therefore speak what thou knowest" (v. 33). But Job had not asked for correction. He had insisted that he was not in need of correction. Fine. Then the correct response would have been to sit there and shut up. "Job hath spoken without knowledge, and his words were without wisdom" (Job 34:35).

Job has transgressed. "My desire is that Job may be tried unto the end because of his answers for wicked men. For he addeth rebellion unto his sin, he clappeth his hands among us, and multiplieth his words against God" (vv. 36–37). Job had answered the three critics, all wicked men. He should have just sat there and remained silent, just as he had done initially.

C. Does God Owe Job an Explanation?

Job had insisted that God answer him. Who is Job to demand this? Does God owe Job anything? "Thinkest thou this to be right, that thou saidst, My righteousness is more than God's?" (Job 35:2). God has the right to sit there and shut up. Job should do the same. As for the absence of positive sanctions, "For thou saidst, What advantage will it be unto thee? and, What profit shall I have, if I be cleansed from my sin? I will answer thee, and thy companions with thee” (vv. 3–4). He asks a rhetorical question. “If thou be righteous, what givest thou him? or what receiveth he of thine hand? (v. 7).

Elihu then notes a familiar pattern of behavior. Men cry out when things go wrong, but they do not praise God when things go right. “By reason of the multitude of oppressions they make the oppressed to cry: they cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty. But none saith, Where is God my maker, who giveth songs in the night; Who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven?” (vv. 9–11). So, God does not reply when they call out for deliverance in bad times. “There they cry, but none giveth answer, because of the pride of evil men. Surely God will not hear vanity, neither will the Almighty regard it” (vv. 12–13).

Job is impatient. God has His own timetable. God brings sanctions in His own good time.

Although thou sayest thou shalt not see him, yet judgment is before him; therefore trust thou in him. But now, because it is not so, he hath visited in his anger; yet he knoweth it not in great extremity: Therefore doth Job open his mouth in vain; he multiplieth words without knowledge (vv. 14–16).

D. On Behalf of God

Elihu says that he speaks on God’s behalf. “Suffer me a little, and I will shew thee that I have yet to speak on God’s behalf. I will fetch my knowledge from afar, and will ascribe righteousness to my Maker” (Job 36:2–3). He asserts that he is correct. “For truly my words shall not be false: he that is perfect in knowledge is with thee” (v. 4).

God does bring judgment in history, he insists.

Behold, God is mighty, and despiseth not any: he is mighty in strength and wisdom. He preserveth not the life of the wicked: but giveth right to the poor. He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous: but with kings are they on the throne; yea, he doth establish them for ever, and they are exalted. And if they be bound in fetters, and be holden in cords of affliction” (vv. 5–8).

God warns rulers. If they turn from evil, they are rewarded. If not, they come under negative sanctions.

Then he sheweth them their work, and their transgressions that they have exceeded. He openeth also their ear to discipline, and com-mandeth that they return from iniquity. If they obey and serve him, they shall spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasures. But if they obey not, they shall perish by the sword, and they shall die without knowledge (vv. 9–12).

So far, Elihu has said nothing about God's historical sanctions that Job has not said and his critics have not said.¹

Elihu asks a rhetorical question. "Will he esteem thy riches? no, not gold, nor all the forces of strength" (v. 19). But Job has already affirmed this: "For destruction from God was a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I could not endure. If I have made gold my hope, or have said to the fine gold, Thou art my confidence; If I rejoiced because my wealth was great, and because mine hand had gotten much" (Job 31:23–25). Elihu warns: "Desire not the night, when people are cut off in their place" (v. 20). But Job had gone on at considerable length in describing the night as the preferred time for evil-doers.² Elihu is telling Job nothing new.

Elihu describes God as the source of changes in nature (Job 36:27–37:13). He then says, "Hearken unto this, O Job: stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God" (v. 37). But Job already knows this. "Behold, he withholdeth the waters, and they dry up: also he sendeth them out, and they overturn the earth" (Job 12:15). He has described God as sovereign over nature (Job 26). Elihu has yet to add anything to Job's knowledge.

Elihu asks Job rhetorically, "Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds, the wondrous works of him which is perfect in knowledge?" (v. 16). He continues in this vein until his speech ends (vv. 17–22). He ends with this: "Touching the Almighty, we cannot find him out: he is excellent in power, and in judgment, and in plenty of justice: he will not afflict. Men do therefore fear him: he respecteth not any that are wise of heart" (vv. 23–24).

1. Job (Job 27:13–23); Eliphaz (Job 7–9; 5:16–20; 15:20–35); Bildad (Job 18:5–19; 36:1–20); Zophar (Job 20:5–29).

2. "Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out: yet God layeth not folly to them. They are of those that rebel against the light; they know not the ways thereof, nor abide in the paths thereof. The murderer rising with the light killeth the poor and needy, and in the night is as a thief. The eye also of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, saying, No eye shall see me: and disguiseth his face. In the dark they dig through houses, which they had marked for themselves in the daytime: they know not the light. For the morning is to them even as the shadow of death: if one know them, they are in the terrors of the shadow of death" (Job 24:12–17).

Conclusion

Elihu began by criticizing the three critics, but then spent his time attacking Job. He used numerous arguments against Job that Job had already affirmed. Elihu affirmed the reliability of God's sanctions. Job did, too, but added that this was not true in his case. Elihu wanted Job not to call into question God's reliability. Elihu also called on Job to refrain from insisting that God should answer him. God owes no one an explanation, Elihu said. Elihu affirmed God's control over nature. Job did, too.

There was not much new in Elihu's speech. He insisted that he represented God, but the only new ideas that he added to the discussion were these: (1) Job should not cast aspersions on God's judgment; (2) Job's time frame is too short; (3) God owes Job no answer.

6

GOD ASKS RHETORICAL QUESTIONS

Then the LORD answered Job out of the whirlwind, and said, Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? Gird up now thy loins like a man; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me (Job 38:1–3).

Here begins the longest passage in the Bible that is attributed to God. God elsewhere speaks directly to men on occasion, but never with this degree of detail.

A. I'm God, and You're Not

His speech is a long series of rhetorical questions. They all have the same theme: God's sovereignty over the operations of nature. The section is one long announcement of "I'm God; you're not." This section is addressed to no one in particular.

Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding (v. 4).

Here, He announces His creation of the earth. He begins with the earth, not the heavens.

He is sovereign over the seas (vv. 8, 11). He rules night and day (vv. 12–13). He controls death (v. 17). He controls the rain (v. 28). He controls the seasons (v. 29). He controls the pathways of the stars (v. 31). He controls the animal world (Job 39).

Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings toward the south? Doth the eagle mount up at thy command, and make her nest on high? (vv. 26–27)

B. Job Gets His Interview

Chapter 40 begins with these words:

Moreover the LORD answered Job, and said, Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him? he that reproveth God, let him answer it (vv. 1–2).

Job immediately recognizes his sin. It was the sin that Elihu had identified: challenging God's judgment.

Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth. Once have I spoken; but I will not answer: yea, twice; but I will proceed no further (vv. 4–5).

Job had demanded that God explain Himself. God now explains Himself. “Gird up thy loins now like a man: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me” (v. 7). Elihu had asked rhetorically: “Thinkest thou this to be right, that thou saidst, My righteousness is more than God’s?” (Job 35:2). God extends Elihu’s insight. “Wilt thou also disdain my judgment? wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous?” (v. 8). If so, do the following.

Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency; and array thyself with glory and beauty. Cast abroad the rage of thy wrath: and behold every one that is proud, and abase him. Look on every one that is proud, and bring him low; and tread down the wicked in their place. Hide them in the dust together; and bind their faces in secret. Then will I also confess unto thee that thine own right hand can save thee (vv. 10–14).

This has to do with ethical judgment, not control over nature. God began with His absolute sovereignty over nature. He now gets to the point: His power to evaluate right and wrong and then impose justice. Is Job ready to do this? If he is, then he can save himself.

C. Job Sees the Light

This was sufficient for Job.

Then Job answered the LORD, and said, I know that thou canst do every thing, and that no thought can be withholden from thee. Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? therefore have I uttered that I understood not; things too wonderful for me, which I knew not (Job 42:1–3).

He then says he will speak. “Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me” (v. 4). His speech was brief: “I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear: but now mine eye seeth thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes” (vv. 5–6).

That was what God had been waiting for. He now turns his attention to the three critics.

And it was so, that after the LORD had spoken these words unto Job, the LORD said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath. Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering; and my servant Job shall pray for you: for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job. So Eliphaz the Temanite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite went, and did according as the LORD commanded them: the LORD also accepted Job (vv. 7–9).

Negative sanctions came on them. Had it not been for Job, who served as their priest, greater negative sanctions would have been imposed by God.

God said nothing to Elihu. This indicates that He regarded Elihu as well-meaning, a spokesman for God who understood the sins of Job: (1) demanding an explanation from God; (2) calling God’s judgment into question; (3) a short time perspective and impatience.

D. Restoration

“And the LORD turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends: also the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before” (v. 10). As soon as it was clear that Job was in God’s favor and on top of the economic pile, everyone wanted to be his friend.

Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his sisters, and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house: and they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the LORD had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an earring of gold (v. 11).

The world is filled with sycophants. Job now knew the degree of loyalty to him and what it would take to retain this loyalty. To this degree, he was better off than before. They, unlike him, conformed to Satan's description of Job. They were loyal for the benefits' sake.

"He had also seven sons and three daughters" (v. 13).

"After this lived Job an hundred and forty years, and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations" (v. 16). Job was the oldest person in the Bible after Moses' declaration of mankind's new, shortened life span (Ps. 90:10).

Conclusion

God is absolutely sovereign over the creation. He is absolutely sovereign over judgment in history. He is God, and man is not. He owes men no explanations. His dispenses sanctions as He sees fit, according to His will.

Job became again the great beneficiary of God's grace. He had gone through a great trial. This trial was necessary to put Satan in his place, which was never revealed to Job. It was also necessary for putting Job's three critics in their places. It was necessary finally to put Job in his place.

Then there were his first 10 children and all but four of his former servants. Their deaths were necessary to convey a theological truth to mankind, a truth encapsulated by a layman, Otto Scott. "God is no buttercup."

CONCLUSION

This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage of oppressors, which they shall receive of the Almighty. If his children be multiplied, it is for the sword: and his offspring shall not be satisfied with bread. Those that remain of him shall be buried in death: and his widows shall not weep. Though he heap up silver as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay; He may prepare it, but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver (Job 27:13–17).

At no time did Job believe that God does not impose negative historical sanctions on the wicked. He believed that the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just. He doubted that this system of sanctions was being applied fairly to him, but he was incorrect. “And the LORD turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends: also the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before” (Job 42:10).

A. Job’s Children

What is clear in the Book of Job is that this system of historical sanctions did not apply to Job’s servants and his first 10 children. There is no escape from this conclusion. They were under Job’s covenantal authority, and they perished because of this. His righteousness doomed them. God turned Satan loose on them in order to prove a point. There was no protection for them. There was no covenantal predictability at the end of their lives. Their time ran out before the experiment ended.

They did not die by chance. They died by design. Their deaths have come down through history as a great anomaly. But if this is an anomaly, it is an anomaly based on a predictable pattern. The deviation from the pattern of historical sanctions is what makes their deaths covenantally relevant. A day like that is not statistically likely. Its abnormality points to the providence of God. This providence includes God’s right to kill you for His own amusement. He was playing with Satan, goading him. Part of God’s playfulness resulted in a lot of deaths. This is the God of the Bible.

Christians do not want to think of God in this way. Such a God is an affront to their concept of God. It was an affront to Job's concept of God, too. Job made this plain to his visitors. This is why God finally presented Himself to Job and asked him pages of rhetorical questions about His power compared to Job's. God is not capricious. God is sovereign. He does not answer to creatures. Creatures answer to God. As Paul wrote to the church at Rome,

And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; (For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth;) It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated.

What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.

Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour? (Rom. 9:10–21).

This passage is an affront to most Christians. It does not conform to their concept of God.

B. God's Sovereignty and Predictability

We learn two fundamental principles in the story of Job.

1. God is absolutely sovereign.
2. God is not absolutely predictable by men.

The second principle is implied by the first. God used unpredictable historical sanctions as a way to persuade Job of the first principle.

Satan understood the first principle. He knew that he could not interfere with Job apart from God's permission. He believed that Job was predictable. Anyway, he spoke as if he did. He did not suggest that God was predictable. He believed that God was upholding Job. That alone made Job predictable. God called Satan's bluff. Twice.

The three critics believed that God is absolutely predictable. They also attributed to covenantal law an absolute quality that belongs only to God. By means of their observation of the negative sanctions, they drew conclusions about why those sanctions had been applied by God. There was only one possible explanation, they believed: sin in Job's life. Job denied this. The critics then escalated their accusations.

They believed that men can gain knowledge of God's motivations as well as other men's spiritual condition merely by observing the sanctions. To this extent, they believed that they gained authority over Job. They would assess his degree of sin, on behalf of God. They believed in the fixed relationship between law and sanctions.

Satan believed the same thing. He believed that God's positive sanctions were the sole basis of Job's obedience. The critics believed that God's negative sanctions were sole proof of Job's disobedience. Both Satan and the critics allowed their judgment to be governed exclusively by God's historical sanctions. Satan was wrong. The critics were wrong.

God's demonstration that Satan was wrong became the basis of the critics' conclusion that Job was sinful. They did not know that God's imposition of negative sanctions served a higher purpose: the public humiliation of Satan. God had goaded him into making a challenge. He then allowed Satan to impose extreme negative sanctions. Satan was ruthless; he was determined to prove his point regarding Job's sole motivation. Satan's degree of ruthlessness led the three critics to draw an inaccurate conclusion: Job had been in sin.

C. The Limits of Predictability

Both Satan and the critics had a theory of probability that turned out to be incorrect. Satan thought Job was predictable. The critics thought God is predictable. Satan drew conclusions about what Job would do. The critics drew conclusions about what Job must have done. The conclusions were wrong.

God retained His sovereignty in all of this. He did not regard His positive sanctions as the basis of Job's obedience. He knew that Job's motivation was ethical rather than economic. God also retained His sovereignty by the imposition of negative sanctions on Job. His system of historical causation reflected His commitment to His own agenda, which included a public challenge to Satan. His agenda here was of greater importance than the predictability of His sanctions. In short, because God is sovereign, His historical sanctions are not. He does not transfer His sovereignty to a system of written law and supernatural sanctions that is capable of being understood comprehensively by man. The legal order is not a tool by which men can gain control over God.

There was a cartoon in the late 1960s. It showed two rats in a cage. There was a large lever and also a slot extending into the cage. One rat said to the other, "I have this psychologist trained. Every time I press this lever, he sends food pellets down the slot." This is legalistic man's view of God, authority, law, sanctions, and time.

God's covenantal law-order is sufficiently predictable to produce respect for both the law and for the God who enforces it. Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 are the primary passages in the Pentateuch that describe the structure of the sanctions. These results apply to the society at large. That is, the sanctions apply to a large number of people. They are predictable within a society in much the same way as statistics applies to large numbers of people. The predictability of the sanctions is sufficient for people to assess the community's degree of conformity to the law. But, even here, there is a delay of time. In the interim, the law-order does not seem predictable. Asaph commented on this in Psalm 73.

For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish. They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily. They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth. Therefore his people return hither: and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them. And they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the most High? Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches (Ps. 73:3–12).

The sanctions were not random, Asaph said. They were perverse. Bad guys finished first. But the positive sanctions were part of a long-term pattern. Solomon later announced this pattern. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22).¹ Asaph noted this. “Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors” (Ps. 73:18–19).²

Americans have a saying: “He gave them enough rope to hang themselves.” It applies to the system of sanctions described in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. It does not apply to Meredith G. Kline’s concept of ethical causation. “And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways.”³

D. Economic Sanctions

Deuteronomy’s sanctions include economics in the narrow sense, such as money, but also in the broad sense: people’s goals in life. Goals are ends for which we sacrifice consumption in the present. We buy them, in other words. The Mosaic law specified a law-order in which the sanctions rewarded ethical behavior and penalized unethical behavior. The goal of the Mosaic civil law was a decrease in unethical behavior. “And all Israel shall hear, and fear, and shall do no more any such wickedness as this is among you” (Deut. 13:11).

The predictability of sanctions furthers the commitment of righteous people to conform themselves to God’s Bible-revealed standards. Positive economic sanctions increase their authority in society. These sanctions provide capital, which is a tool of dominion. But there is an ethical threat in all systems of positive sanctions. The sanctions can become ends in themselves. This was Satan’s accusation against Job. Satan was unimpressed with Job’s ethical behavior. He told God, “Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land. But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face" (Job 1:10–11). God removed the hedge as a way to demonstrate that Job was not in it for the positive sanctions. Satan was thwarted by this demonstration.

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

2. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 18.

3. Meredith G. Kline, “Comments on an Old-New Error,” Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

Thwarting Satan was more important to God than maintaining the hedge. This is why the Book of Job is so disturbing to covenant-keepers. It shows, beyond a shadow of doubt, that God has an agenda that is much broader than providing benefits to covenant-keepers. Readers can rejoice retroactively with Job in the birth of children 11 through 20, but this does not resurrect children one through 10. As for the deceased faithful herdsmen, nothing is said of them in Chapter 42. They were grist for God's mill. They were pawns in God's game of cosmic chess with Satan. If they were pawns, then what about you?

Job's critics were very concerned about their own status. If Job was not in misery as a result of some hidden sin, then they were in much greater jeopardy than he was. They could not match him in the perfection contest, yet here he was in the pit. If God would do this to a perfect man, what was He willing to do to run-of-the mill covenant-keepers? They had to defend the predictability of the sanctions, because, if the sanctions are not predictable, covenant-keepers are at risk. Bad things could overtake them at any time.

This is why the Book of Job has always been a puzzle for covenant-keepers. Most covenant-keepers want to believe in the efficacy of their works. They want to believe that bad guys finish last. They want to believe that honesty is the best policy—not simply for ethics' sake, but also for personal prosperity's sake.

Conclusion

The arguments back and forth produced no reconciliation. The intervention of God did.

The participants were not told about the interaction between God and Satan which began this book. The reader knows; the participants didn't. The reader sees what God's hidden agenda was; the participants didn't.

The theological issue dividing the participants was the doctrine of predictable historical sanctions. Are they predictable? Job said they are, but not in his case. The three critics said they were, and this included Job's case. Elihu said they are, but not in Job's case. God did not address this issue. He affirmed His own sovereignty, which all of the participants had affirmed.

The sovereignty of God could be exercised to make the sanctions predictable within a specific time frame. This is not the case, as the Book of Job makes clear. The Book of Job illustrates a neglected passage in Deuteronomy.

The secret things belong unto the LORD our God: but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law. And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee, And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul (Deut. 29:29–30:2).

Meredith G. Kline taught that all this has been put aside under the New Covenant. He never came close to proving this exegetically. He never suggested what the implications are for social theory. But he knew that the annulment of systematic historical sanctions would undermine the case for postmillennialism. There is no biblical case for the triumph of God's comprehensive kingdom in history if God's historical sanctions are not tied to biblical law. Without the connection between biblical law and predictable historical sanctions, there is no biblical case for distinguishing the performance of God's kingdom from autonomous man's kingdom. History would be covenantally random. This is Kline's theological position. It is not mine. It was not Job's in Chapter 42.

The story of Job is the precursor of the story of Jesus. To thwart Satan, God the Father placed Jesus under negative sanctions that He did not deserve. He cut Himself off from Jesus, just as God had cut Himself off from Job. "And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46). All this was preparatory for a great reversal.

And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen (Matt. 28:18–20).

The judicial basis of dominion in the New Covenant era—the Great Commission⁴—was the temporary unpredictability of the sanctions. But the system of sanctions is in fact predictable. Had Satan seen this, he might not have inspired the enemies of Christ to bring Him under historical sanctions. Satan was as wrong about Christ's response as he had been about Job's response. The historical sanctions prevailed. Jesus died, not because of His sins, but because of the sins of man. The negative sanction did not last long: three days.

4. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

CONFIDENCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON PSALMS

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
 Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
 Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
 None Dare Call It Witchcraft (1976)
 Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
 Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
 Government by Emergency (1983)
 Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
 Coined Freedom (1984)
 Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
 Honest Money (1986)
 Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
 Inherit the Earth (1987)
 Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
 Healer of the Nations (1987)
 The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
 When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
 Political Polytheism (1989)
 Judeo-Christian Tradition (1990)
 The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
 Victim's Rights (1990)
Millennialism and Social Theory (1990)
 Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
 The Coase Theorem (1992)
Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
 Rapture Fever (1993)
 Tithing and the Church (1994)
Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)
 Crossed Fingers (1996)
 The Covenantal Tithe (2011)
 Mises on Money (2012)

CONFIDENCE AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON PSALMS

GARY NORTH

Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to Robert Thoburn whose optimism has been constant

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Individual Ethical Cause and Effect (Psalm 1:1–4) | 8 |
| 2. A Comprehensive Inheritance (Psalm 2:7–8) | 4 |
| 3. Ethics, Not Power (Psalm 8:4–5) | 12 |
| 4. Deliverance of the Poor (Psalm 9:18) | 15 |
| 5. Ownership: Original and Delegated (Psalm 24:1) | 19 |
| 6. A Trustworthy Inheritance (Psalm 37:21–26) | 24 |
| 7. An Uncertain Inheritance (Psalm 39:6) | 28 |
| 8. Below-Market Pricing (Psalm 44:12) | 33 |
| 9. The Futility of Riches (Psalm 49:5–7) | 38 |
| 10. Original Ownership (Psalm 50:10) | 43 |
| 11. The Irrelevance of Status (Psalm 62:9) | 48 |
| 12. God is the Source of Rain (Psalm 65:9–11) | 52 |
| 13. Tried as Silver (Psalm 66:10–12) | 57 |
| 14. Silver and Submission (Psalm 68:29–30) | 61 |
| 15. Deliverance From Poverty (Psalm 70:5) | 65 |
| 16. Godly Rule (Psalm 72:2–4) | 70 |
| 17. The Slippery Slope (Psalm 73:2–4) | 73 |
| 18. Protecting the Weak (Psalm 74:20–21) | 78 |
| 19. Miracles and Discontentment (Psalm 78:16–20) | 81 |
| 20. Closed Mouths, Closed Ears (Psalm 81:10–11) | 86 |
| 21. Exploitation and Deliverance (Psalm 82:1–3) | 90 |
| 22. A Land for God’s Law (Psalm 105:44–45) | 93 |
| 23. Lean-Souled People (Psalm 106:15) | 98 |
| 24. Overcoming Fear (Psalm 107:23–24) | 102 |
| 25. Buy Low, Sell High (Psalm 107:33–34) | 105 |
| 26. Judicial Oppression (Psalm 109:30–31) | 108 |
| 27. The Inheritance of the Heathen (Psalm 111:4–6) | 112 |
| 28. Obedience and Wealth (Psalm 112:1–3) | 122 |
| 29. Charitable Lending (112:5) | 127 |
| 30. The Wicked Will Melt Away (Psalm 112:9–10) | 131 |
| 31. Upward Social Mobility (Psalm 113:7–8) | 134 |

32. A Prayer for Widespread Wealth (Psalm 144:13–15) 136

33. The Foundation of Confidence (Psalm 145:14–16) 139

34. Sanctions and Stipulations (Psalm 146:5–9) 143

35. Specially Revealed Statutes (Psalm 147:19–20) 146

Conclusion 149

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Psalms is the premier book on optimism in the Bible. As such, it is the premier book of optimism in the ancient world. Nothing else comes close.

While many psalms are anguished cries regarding the psalmist's sinful condition, the book presents a picture of the irreversible kingdom of God in history. There is nothing in Psalms that even hints at the possibility that God's kingdom will not transform the whole world.

The basis of this optimism is God's covenant with Israel. This covenant has a structure. This structure rests on five principles: the absolute sovereignty of God; His delegation of authority to redeemed representatives of His kingdom; the Bible-revealed laws of God; the sanctions—positive and negative—that are inescapably bound to God's law; and the comprehensive inheritance in history of His people.¹

This optimism has implications. God expects covenant-keepers to maintain confidence that their lives will positively transform the world to the extent that they conform themselves to God's Bible-revealed laws. The future is not booby trapped by God to threaten covenant-keepers. It is booby trapped by God to threaten covenant-breakers. History is not a level playing field. The contest between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan is rigged against Satan. From Genesis 3:5 to Revelation 22, this is the message of the Bible. Until you accept this, you will never understand the Bible.

Entrepreneurship is an economic term that applies to people's (1) forecasting of the economic future and (2) designing plans to meet that future with a minimal expenditure of scarce resources. In four words, it is this: buy low, sell high. But entrepreneurship applies to all areas of life, not just the money economy. Everyone must deal with the future. The covenant-keeper is to buy low in the broadest sense, and also sell high in this sense. He is supposed to use the resources that God has granted to him as tools of kingdom-extension. The greater his confidence in the success of his efforts, the more likely he is to commit to a program of investing. He must invest time, money, and emotional commitment to the Great Commission.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), chaps. 1–5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), chaps. 1–5.

And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen (Matt. 28:18–20).²

This commission involves far more than bringing the message of personal salvation through Christ's redemption (repurchase). It involves the redemption of the world.³ It involves the replacement of sin with righteousness in every area where sin now reigns. Sin is not given an eschatological King's X until the final judgment. Satan is not given a free ride. The Christian gospel, when it preaches the Bible, is a comprehensive gospel.⁴

A person who is convinced that this task is impossible, according to the Bible, is not going to make the same degree of commitment as a person who sees his efforts as part of a program ordained by God for success. This is why confidence is crucial for success. This is not self-confidence. It is confidence in a foreordained plan of God. Psalms presents the broad scope of this comprehensive program of cultural victory. No other book in the Bible rivals it in this regard.

Psalms is a didactic literary work, not primarily an historical work. It is intended to persuade. It is not an historical work in which there are literary activities mentioned, unlike the Old Testament's historical books or the Book of Acts. It is also not a prophetic work, set in specific times with an accompanying historical narrative. I therefore use the present tense when describing what the psalmists wrote. They wrote in the past, but their message was directed at covenant-keepers

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

3. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

4. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis on the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gn-world>)

throughout history. A didactic literary work is written for a particular era, but it is also expected to convey its message down through the ages. The psalmists spoke to their contemporaries, yet they also speak to us as contemporaries. Their words should be treated as contemporary.

1

INDIVIDUAL ETHICAL CAUSE AND EFFECT

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. But his delight is in the law of the LORD; and in his law doth he meditate day and night. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper. The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away (Psalm 1:1–4).

A. Theonomy and Causation

The theocentric issue here is God's law. The Book of Psalms begins with an affirmation: the righteous individual who avoids contact with evil individuals is blessed. The psalm says that an individual must not sit in the seat of the scornful or scoffers. These people are contemptuous. Contemptuous of what? God's law. In contrast, the righteous individual delights in the law of God. He meditates on the law day and night. He studies the law of God and thinks about how it should be applied in specific circumstances. He does not simply study the law as an academic exercise. He studies God's law in order to become an expert in rendering judgment.

This psalm describes such an individual as being like a tree planted by the rivers of water. A tree planted by water produces fruit according to the proper season. It does not wither prematurely. It has access to water. The tree does not dry up. The analogy of a tree planted by the water applies to a life that is productive because it does not lack an important resource. Therefore, the psalmist says, the righteous individual will prosper in whatever he does.

This affirmation is designed to increase men's faith in the predictability of their environment. There is a cause-and-effect relationship between ethics and productivity. There is a positive sanction for righteousness: prosperity. An individual who is ethically righteous has an advantage over an evildoer. The righteous individual finds that he is blessed by God with greater wealth. This gives him a competitive advantage.

This is in contrast to the ungodly individual. Such an individual is like the chaff which the wind blows away. The symbolism here is that of winnowing or separating wheat from chaff. In a windy environment, a harvester tosses wheat and chaff into the air. The chaff weighs less than the wheat, so the wind blows the chaff away. This leaves wheat, which is a valuable resource. Chaff is not.

The psalmist says that the ungodly individual is like the chaff. He will not prosper. So, to the extent that individuals conform themselves to the law of God, they become the owners of greater resources than those people who disobey God's law. The psalmist specifically says that "the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish" (v. 6).

This is a short psalm. The psalmist is making a major covenantal point. He applies to the individual the same cause-and-effect system of ethics that Moses said applies to a nation. In Deuteronomy 28, Moses set forth a list of the sanctions that apply to nations. Righteous nations prosper; unrighteous nations do not. Leviticus 26 affirms the same cause-and-effect relationship. The Mosaic law rested upon a particular view of causation. It affirmed faith that righteousness is blessed, and unrighteousness is cursed. The world around us is predictable in terms of the ethics and historical sanctions of the Mosaic law.

The psalmist here affirms that biblical law is the correct standard of ethics. He also affirms that this ethical standard produces predictable effects for individual behavior. If an individual seeks prosperity, he should conform himself to the comprehensive, Bible-revealed law of God. If he wishes to avoid the negative sanction of poverty, he should avoid violating the laws of God. Covenant-keepers who conform themselves to biblical law have a competitive advantage over covenant-breakers who violate it. Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 affirm this with respect to corporate groups. This psalm affirms it with respect to individuals.

B. Individual Self-Interest

Psalm 1 teaches that covenant-keeping produces blessings in history. In contrast, covenant-breaking produces losses in history. An individual who is self-interested should therefore conform himself to the Bible-revealed laws of God.

This psalm does not affirm righteousness solely as an end in itself. It affirms righteousness in terms of individual self-interest. It begins with the phrase, “blessed is.” It assumes that individuals prefer blessings to curses. They prefer positive sanctions to negative sanctions. To the extent that an individual prefers blessings over curses, he should study the Bible-revealed laws of God and then seek to apply them consistently to the environment around him. This is not to say that the comprehensive law of God should not be appreciated for its inherent qualities. An individual is to delight in the law of the Lord, the psalmist says. There is a delightful element about the consistency of God’s law. But such delight is not limited to aesthetic enjoyment or intellectual satisfaction. It is preliminary to action. An individual is not simply to be a hearer of the law; he is to be a doer of the law (James 1:22).¹ When he is a doer of the law, he positions himself to be a recipient of positive sanctions.

The existence of positive sanctions points to the fact that individuals want to be practical. They do not wish to act against their own self-interest. God has created an environment for mankind that rewards covenant-keeping. This provides an added incentive for an individual to study the laws of God. It is not sufficient that the laws of God are consistent with each other, and that they present a comprehensive system of government, beginning with self-government. Obedience to these laws must also produce positive sanctions. These sanctions reinforce man’s confidence in the legitimacy of the laws of God. As Moses put it, “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).²

The unrighteous individual does not believe this. To the extent that he believes in an ethical cause-and-effect universe, he believes that unethical behavior produces greater blessings than righteous behavior does. He adopts the words of baseball coach Leo Durocher: “Nice guys finish last.” This psalm teaches otherwise.

1. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. ??

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

Conclusion

Psalm 1 introduces a comprehensive body of wisdom which rests on this presupposition: personal righteousness produces positive sanctions, while personal unrighteousness produces negative sanctions. This psalm rests on a view of the universe in which ethics is primary. This is taught throughout the Bible. It is taught repeatedly in Psalms. Unfortunately, it is not taught by the modern church.

2

A COMPREHENSIVE INHERITANCE

I will declare the decree: the LORD hath said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession (Psalm 2:7–8).

This is a messianic psalm. We could even say that it is the messianic psalm. Here we read: “this day have I begotten thee.” This passage is quoted twice in the epistle to the Hebrews as applying to Jesus Christ.¹

God speaks to the Messiah in this psalm. He says for Messiah to ask Him to give Him the heathen for His inheritance. He also promises Him the uttermost parts of the earth for His possession. This does not refer to the world beyond the grave. The psalmist speaks of the heathen as being present in the world. The theocentric issue here is inheritance.

A. Eschatological Views

There are three main approaches to eschatology: the doctrine of last things. Each has its distinctive features. Each has a specific social theory.²

This passage makes things exegetically difficult for amillennialists. It is possible for both premillennialists and postmillennialists to take this passage literally. The postmillennialist applies it to the final phase of the kingdom of God in history, in which the gospel of Jesus Christ spreads across the whole face of the earth. The premillennialist interprets it as an aspect of the millennial reign of Christ on earth prior to the final judgment.

1. “For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son?” (Heb. 1:5). “So also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest; but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, to day have I begotten thee” (Heb. 5:5).

2. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

The amillennialist cannot interpret this passage literally. This passage makes no sense in the context of the amillennialist hermeneutic. There can be no question that this psalm is talking about the worldwide dominion of Jesus Christ in history. This language does not refer to some kind of spiritual or emotional state of mind, in which Christians, who have little influence in history, and who may be under the oppression of heathen, somehow reinterpret their situation to mean that they are in a position of authority. The only way for the amillennialist to interpret this passage literally is for him to say that Jesus Christ never does bother to ask God for the heathen as His inheritance or ask for the uttermost parts of the earth as His possession. Somehow, Jesus is not interested in extending His kingdom to include dominion over the heathen and possession of the uttermost parts of the earth. This makes even less sense than the amillennialist tradition of interpreting all biblical prophetic language of cultural victory as applying only to the psychological feelings of oppressed and culturally impotent Christians.

B. Inheritance

In Psalms, we have promises of inheritance. Covenant-keepers are told that they will inherit the earth in history.³ The psalms do not refer to the world beyond the grave. The Old Testament does not speak of exercising dominion after the resurrection. There are only a few Old Testament passages relating to the bodily resurrection,⁴ and they do not speak of dominion.

This psalm goes on to say that the Messiah will break His enemies with a rod of iron. He will break them in pieces like a potter's vessel. I know of no hermeneutic that does not interpret these words as symbolic. When the Bible speaks of a rod of iron, it does not mean a literal rod of iron. When it speaks of bashing people to pieces, it does not mean literal pieces of people scattered around the ground. It does not mean frozen corpses hacked into solid pieces by a literal rod of iron. It refers to political and judicial dominion. It refers to the dominion exercised by a king over his realm. This is why the psalm goes on to say: "Be wise now therefore, all ye kings: be instructed, the judges of the earth" (v. 10). This is judicial language. It has to do with the civil covenant in history. The psalmist is not instructing the kings of the earth

3. Psalms 37:9, 11, 22, 29, 34; 82:11.

4. Job 14:14–15; Psalm 49:15; Isaiah 26:19; Daniel 12:1–2, 13; Hosea 13:14.

to join the church and thereby place themselves under the rule of elders. The Scriptures do not speak of elders as people who exercise dominion with a rod of iron. This language refers to the civil covenant.

The inheritance is economic. It encompasses the uttermost parts of the earth. It is a comprehensive inheritance. It is not simply a political inheritance; this inheritance is much wider than mere politics. The Messiah will inherit more than political office. The Bible teaches comprehensive redemption.⁵ This redemption is the action of covenant-keepers who, as stewards of the Messiah, buy back (redeem) the whole world on behalf of the Messiah. It is the action of reclaiming every area of life in the name of Jesus Christ, by means of the Bible-revealed law of God, and by means of personal productivity. This redemption encompasses all three of the institutional covenants: church, family, and state.

C. Representation

A king rules through subordinates. They represent him judicially in the civil courts. In economic affairs, the stewards of the king act as agents of the king, who build up the equity value of the king's domains. They report to the king, and the king evaluates the efficiency of their service. When this text speaks of the outermost parts of the earth as the possession of the Messiah, it is speaking of a system of representative government. This is not limited to civil government. It is government in the most comprehensive sense. It means to exercise dominion over the earth. This is what God requires of all mankind, as He revealed in Genesis 1:26–28. This is what I call the dominion covenant.⁶ This covenant defines mankind. It preceded the four covenants: individual, church, family, and civil.

The psalmist says that when the Messiah asks God for His inheritance, He will be granted the outermost parts of the earth. Jesus declared after His resurrection that this messianic promise had been fulfilled definitively in history. He said that all power had been given to Him, and that the disciples were to preach the gospel to all the earth

5. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

(Matt. 28:18–20).⁷ This is the Great Commission. It is comprehensive.⁸ Jesus ratified His position as the Messiah by His affirmation of the fulfillment of this messianic promise. Through progressive sanctification and through evangelism, this psalm will be fulfilled in history.

The psalm closes with a promise: “Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.” This is a positive sanction.

Conclusion

This psalm announces the comprehensive rulership of the future Messiah. His inheritance is the uttermost parts of the earth. This means the whole world. The language is literal.

As with any monarch or estate owner, the Messiah rules through a system of hierarchy. His stewards represent Him judicially. They manage His estate on His behalf and for His benefit.

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

8. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/GentryGGC>)

3

ETHICS, NOT POWER

What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him? For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour (Psalm 8:4–5).

A. Creation and Dominion

The theocentric issue here is hierarchy. This psalm begins with an affirmation of God's excellence. "O LORD our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! who hast set thy glory above the heavens" (v. 1). This places God high above the creation. His name is authoritative. He possesses authority over the enemy and the avenger (v. 2).

He possesses this authority because He is the Creator. The psalmist speaks of the heavens as the work of God's fingers (v. 3). This is obviously poetic language. It points to God as sovereign over the creation. God has ordained the moon and the stars (v. 3).

The psalmist then speaks of God as the creator of mankind. There was a purpose in His creation of mankind. God made man to have dominion over the works of His hands. God has put all things under mankind's feet. This is an aspect of the hierarchy of creation. While God is sovereign over the creation, He has delegated authority to that aspect of the creation made in His image: mankind. Mankind exercises God's authority over the creation. This is both judicial and economic authority.

The psalmist says that man exercises authority over sheep and oxen and beasts of the field (v. 7). He also exercises authority over the fowl of the air and the fish of the sea. This psalm reaffirms what I have called the dominion covenant.¹ It was first revealed in Genesis 1:26–28. God specifically created mankind to exercise authority over the creation. The passage explicitly speaks about fish and the birds (v. 28).

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

Men do not directly exercise control over wild birds and fish in the sea. Men do not tell birds to fly this way or that. The authority that men exercise over birds and fish relates to the authority of consumption. Men have the right to kill birds and fish. Generally, this is done for food. Man's authority over these species is rarely done for training purposes. It is possible to train certain kinds of birds to perform tricks, and it is equally possible to train some large fish in the same way. But this is not what the psalmist is speaking about. He is talking about a general dominion, which is an affirmation of man's authority to use the birds of the air and the fish of the sea for his own purposes.

B. Angels

The passage also speaks of angels. It says that God has placed mankind a little lower than the angels. He has crowned mankind with glory and honor.

This is a peculiar passage. It indicates that the angels are in some way superior to man. In what way? They are superior in terms of power, but this does not refer to dominion. God has not placed the birds of the air and the fish of the sea under the jurisdiction of angels. This is man's responsibility. So, if men are under angels, and they are also over the fish of the sea, do men represent angels? There is nothing in the Scriptures that indicates that this is the case. Men represent God to the creation, and they represent the creation to God. Man is the intermediary between God and the creation. Yet the text is explicit: man is a little lower than the angels.

Paul says in First Corinthians 6 that covenant-keepers will someday judge the angels. "Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life" (I Cor. 6:3)?² This indicates that, in terms of the final judgment, mankind will possess authority over the angels. But the psalmist indicates that men are under the angels. So, which is it? Does mankind possess authority over the angels, or do the angels possess authority over mankind?

If we consider the issue of power, the angels exercise authority over mankind. In the first chapter of the book of Job, we read of a debate between God and the fallen angel, Satan. God tells Satan that he has authority to inflict sickness or pain on Job. God restricts Satan from killing Job, but He does not restrict Satan from killing Job's children. All of them are then killed (vv. 18, 19).³ Angels possess superior power to man.

2. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

This indicates that the fundamental issue that divides mankind from the angels is ethics rather than power. If it were a question simply of power, the angels would always win the confrontation. Yet there is no indication in the Bible that angels are at war with men physically. They occasionally exercise power, as we see in the New Testament's account of the demon that attacked the seven sons of Sceva (Acts 19:14–16). But the fundamental issues of life are ethical. They are not primarily matters of power. If the great debate between God and Satan were based simply on power, Satan would lose the conflict in every instance. So, the issues of life are primarily ethical. This is why God gave an ethical command to Adam regarding the forbidden fruit. It was not that Adam did not possess sufficient power to pick the fruit and eat it. It was that Adam was ethically prohibited from taking the fruit and eating it.

Conclusion

The psalmist asks a question: Who is man? He answers this by reaffirming the account of God's creation week (Gen. 1). He presents man as lower than the angels, yet crowned with glory and honor. Man has authority over the birds and fishes. He is also ruler over "all things under his feet." This is comprehensive authority: earth, air, and water.

This authority is not based on man's power, for he possesses less power than the angels. Man's hierarchical authority is not based on power but on judicial authority. This is a matter of law, not power. It is a matter of the covenant: God's sovereignty, man's delegated authority, God's law, historical sanctions, and final judgment, in which covenant-keeping men will judge the angels.

3. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 1:B.

4

DELIVERANCE OF THE POOR

For the needy shall not always be forgotten: the expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever (Psalm 9:18).

A. A Great Reversal

The theocentric issue here is God as the judge. This passage appears within the context of a psalm that deals with God's judgment against the wicked. In verse 9, we are told that the Lord "will be a refuge for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble." In verse 15, we read that "the heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made: in the net which they hid is their own foot taken." This is another way of saying that the evil which they had planned to impose on others snares them. This is a reversal of fortune. In verse 16, we read: "The Lord is known by the judgment which he executed: the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands." Again, the theme is a great reversal: the evil that men plan against others is the source of their own destruction. It is within this context that we read this verse: "For the needy shall not always be forgotten: the expectation of the poor shall not perish forever." The psalmist then declares: "Arise, O Lord; let not man prevail: let the heathen be judged in thy sight" (v. 19).

These passages deal with God's judgment. They are not primarily economic passages; they are judicial passages. The psalmist says that God rules over history. God rules in terms of the covenant, and every covenant has law and sanctions.¹ The psalmist says that those who are oppressed will be delivered at some point. There are limits to oppression. It is within the context of the theme of deliverance from oppression that he declares that the needy will not always be forgotten. He says that the expectation of a poor man will not perish forever. This does not mean that every needy person will eventually achieve middle-class status. The expectation of the poor man that someday he will escape his poverty may not be fulfilled. But the general expectation of deliverance for those people who are poor as a result of oppression by evildoers will at some point come to pass. There will be a reversal of fortune. Those who are oppressors will find that their oppression has turned upon them, and they will be destroyed.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), chaps. 3, 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), chaps. 3, 4.

B. Oppression

The text does not say that people who were formerly poor will oppress their former oppressors. It says that God will destroy these oppressors. God does not authorize those who have been delivered from oppression to impose a new system of oppression. *The biblical concept of oppression is the misuse of civil law to deprive others of what should be lawfully theirs.*² God upholds legitimacy of His law. The psalmist is saying that those who oppress others will be snared by their own system and destroyed.

People in this passage are poor because of oppression. Someone has misused the civil law in order to oppress them. They are not poor as a result of their own incompetence. They are not poor because they lacked productivity. They are poor because they are the victims of evildoers.

The Bible does not teach that every poor individual will gain middle-class wealth or riches. It says only that at some point, there will be widespread deliverance from judicial oppression. If men are poor because they are oppressed by a corrupt legal order, they will at some point no longer be poor.

Nowhere in the Bible do we see a call for the civil government to impose a system of wealth redistribution from rich people in general to poor people in general. That would be a form of oppression: the use of the ballot box by the majority to extract wealth from a minority. This is exactly what the Bible prohibits. People are not to oppress the poor by means of illegitimate legislation. No group is to misuse the civil law in order to extract wealth from another group.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012). Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

C. Psalm 10

Psalm 10 extends the message of Psalm 9. We read that wicked people persecute the poor. In Psalm 9, the psalmist writes that there will be a great reversal. The oppressor will find that his actions have led to his own destruction. This is a familiar theme throughout the Bible.³ In Psalm 10, the psalmist says that the oppressors will be taken by their own devices. “The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor: let them be taken in the devices that they have imagined” (v. 2). They have planned to oppress victims, but their schemes and dreams will blow up in their faces.

The wicked person is confident about his goals. He has great plans, the psalmist says. He boasts of his heart’s desire (10:3). He blesses covetous people, yet covetous people are abhorred by God (10:3). In other words, he sees the world as a perverse mirror image of God’s reality. What God criticizes, the wicked person praises. What God prohibits, the wicked person pursues.

In verse 10, the psalmist describes the evildoer. “In secret places, he murders innocent people. His eyes are set against the poor.” This is a person who systematically violates biblical law. In verse 9, we read: “He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den: he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net.” This is a description of an individual who self-consciously breaks the Mosaic law. This is a classic oppressor.

The psalmist then calls on God to break the arm of the wicked person (10:15). This is a call for God to intervene in history and impose direct negative sanctions on men who systematically violate God’s law in order to oppress the innocent. In Psalm 12, he writes: “For the oppression of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the LORD; I will set him in safety from him that puffeth at him” (v. 5). There are historical sanctions. “The LORD shall cut off all flattering lips, and the tongue that speaketh proud things: Who have said, With our tongue will we prevail; our lips are our own: who is lord over us” (Psalm 12:3–4)?

Conclusion

The psalmist announces that the oppressed poor will be delivered by God. The world is neither ethically random nor ethically perverse.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 1.

It is governed by ethical cause and effect. The poor have legitimate hope that the oppressive judicial system will be removed by God at some point.

5

OWNERSHIP: ORIGINAL AND DELEGATED

The earth is the LORD'S, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein (Psalm 24:1).

This verse is the single most important verse in Christian economics. It is theocentric to the core. God owns the world.

A. Original Ownership

Every economic theory has a concept of ownership. This is rarely stated at the beginning of an economics textbook. It is almost as if economists were deliberately concealing the fact that the most fundamental principle of economic theory is the doctrine of ownership.

Adam Smith began The Wealth of Nations (1776) with a discussion of the division of labor. He did not begin with the concept of private ownership. This left economic theory vulnerable to socialists and communists in the nineteenth century.¹ Because Smith did not begin his analysis with a theoretical defense of private property, socialists and communists had no difficulty in dealing with the concept of the division of labor from the point of view of state ownership of the means of production. There is nothing inherent in socialist production that is opposed to the concept of the division of labor. So, from a theoretical standpoint, Adam Smith left modern free market theory vulnerable, because he refused to deal systematically with the concept of ownership. It was not until the 1960s that free market economists began to develop a detailed theory of private ownership, despite the fact that their predecessors had built economic theory in terms of this concept.²

1. Tom Bethel, The Noblest Triumph: Property and Prosperity Through the Ages (New York: St. Martins, 1998), ch. 7.

2. Ibid., ch. 20.

B. Self-Ownership and Autonomy

Almost all free market economists begin with some variation of the theory of self-ownership. This concept rests on a doctrine of human autonomy. There is no academic discipline that is more self-conscious in its affirmation of human autonomy than economics.

Some economists believe that the economy is best established by means of the political order. We call these people socialists. Free market economists emphasize the importance of personal responsibility, and therefore they emphasize the benefits of the private ownership of the means of production. They argue that people are far more responsible over the administration of assets that they own, when compared to their administration of assets that they do not own.

1. Christian Economics

No system of humanist economics begins with the concept of God's ownership of all assets, including the means of production. Only Christian economics begins with this presupposition, and I know of no other economist other than myself who has begun his economic theory with this presupposition.³

This means that the reconstruction of economic theory to conform to biblical principles requires, above all, that economic theory begin with the presupposition, declared in Psalm 24:1, that God is the owner of all things. God owns all things because He created all things. He owns all things because He is sovereign over all things. He is responsible only to Himself. He answers to nobody, except when He wants to, as the book of Job affirms. This is the central message of the book of Job.⁴

The psalmist declares that God owns everything. When we combine this insight with the declaration of God in the first chapter of Genesis that man will exercise dominion over the creation (Gen. 1:27–28),⁵ we encounter the biblical theory of delegated ownership. God is the primary owner; man is the secondary owner. God owns everything absolutely and comprehensively; man owns subordinately: point two of the biblical covenant model.⁶ God establishes the terms of ownership. Man is required to adhere to these terms of ownership: point three of the biblical covenant model.⁷

3. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

4. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012).

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

This principle is most clearly displayed in the Bible's discussion of the Fall of man. God established boundaries around the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. He forbade man from eating from it. Any violation of this law was a violation of God's absolute property rights. So supreme were these property rights that God threatened to kill Adam if he transgressed this boundary. As it has turned out, God has sent the vast majority of individuals to hell, and will resurrect them only to deposit them in the lake of fire (Rev. 20:15), because Adam and Eve violated God's property rights. The Fall of man is presented in the Bible as a violation of property rights: eating from a forbidden tree that belonged exclusively to God.⁸ This is how important the concept of property rights ought to be in theology. Yet theologians rarely discuss the Fall of man in terms of property rights.

God establishes a boundary around specific pieces of property, and He expects the boundary to be honored by non-owners. Man's ownership is delegated ownership, not original ownership. A man owns property only as a steward of God. He is responsible to God for the administration of this property. This is affirmed clearly in Jesus' parable of the property owner who delegates the administration of his property to three stewards, and then leaves on a long journey. He returns and requires an accounting of their administration of the property which he delegated to them (Matt. 25:14–30).⁹

2. Property Rights

Property rights are absolute with respect to God. They are not absolute with respect to anyone else. Therefore, the familiar defense of the free market by non-economists, namely, that private property rights are absolute, is erroneous. With the exception only of the followers of Murray Rothbard, modern economists do not speak of prop-

6. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

7. Sutton, ch. 3. North, ch. 3.

8. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 9.

9. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

erty rights as being absolute. They are defenders of the legitimacy of intervention by the state to establish the terms of ownership, exchange, and judicial arbitration. With the exception of anarchist economists, modern economists affirm the necessity of some intervention by an institution that is not established on the basis of the free market principle of high bid wins.

If Christian economists were consistent with what they say they believe about the authority of the Bible, they would go to Psalm 24:1 in search of the most fundamental of all economic principles: original ownership. If we do not know who is the owner of a piece of property, we are not in a position to enforce the law governing the administration of that piece of property. Property that is not owned is wasted. If owners do not purposefully administer their property, then the property will be wasted.

3. God's Autonomy

The crucial biblical concept of ownership is that the only autonomous agent in the universe is God. He sets His own law. He answers to no one. Therefore, autonomy is an incommunicable attribute of God. The common incommunicable attributes that are listed in systematic theologies are these: omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence. These are indeed incommunicable attributes. But from the point of view of social theory, the most important incommunicable attribute of God is autonomy. Once we understand this fundamental principle of theology, we are less likely to make the fundamental error of humanist economics and humanist social theory, namely, that mankind, either collectively or through individual ownership, possesses autonomy. This means that man does not establish the rules of ownership or anything else. Man is subordinate to God, and God lays down the rules. God has established the covenant with man, and the covenant takes precedence over voluntary contracts, or any other social arrangements, that individuals establish with each other.

4. Man's Ownership Is Hierarchical

The doctrine of God's sovereignty and absolute ownership leads to the doctrine of delegated ownership and stewardship. This means that man's ownership is hierarchical. It is fundamentally hierarchical. It is also horizontal, in the sense that individuals own specific pieces of property, and they make voluntary exchanges among each other. Property ownership is not exclusively hierarchical, but it is fundamentally and originally hierarchical. This is why there has to be a chain of command, established by the civil government, in which the principle of the free market, namely, high bid wins, does not operate. The Bible makes it clear that the principle of high bid wins is not only illegitimate in the civil government, it is immoral. Any importation of the principle of high bid wins into civil government means that corruption is being substituted for justice. Bribery triumphs.

The concept of ownership is therefore grounded in the judicial category of the covenant. It is not grounded in the economic principle of efficiency. Efficiency is maximized in terms of a hierarchical judicial system that enforces property rights. The civil judicial system is outside the system of private property rights. The civil judicial system is a monopoly. It is not the outcome of competitive bidding in an open market. God has established a hierarchical system of property, meaning delegated ownership, which is enforced by a hierarchical system of sovereign civil courts. This was established in Exodus 18.¹⁰

There can be no exclusively horizontal ownership of property. Ownership is not a system in which autonomous individuals own pieces of property and exchange property with each other. There must always be an enforcement system, and the civil enforcement system relies on violence. A system of exclusively horizontal ownership always leads towards a system of warlordism. Those individuals who amass greater wealth then purchase armies, and they use these armies to gather even greater wealth. There is no escape from judicial hierarchy. There is no autonomous ownership for mankind.

Conclusion

Psalm 24:1 announces the fundamental principle of Christian economics: God owns everything. Any attempt to build economic theory on any other concept of ownership leads to error. As Cornelius Van Til used to say, it does not matter how much you sharpen a crooked buzz saw, it will not cut straight. The precision of modern economic analysis does not cut straight.

10. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 19.

6

A TRUSTWORTHY INHERITANCE

The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again: but the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth. For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off. The steps of a good man are ordered by the LORD: and he delighteth in his way. Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down: for the LORD upholdeth him with his hand. I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread. He is ever merciful, and lendeth; and his seed is blessed (Psalm 37:21–26).

A. Rival Views of Property

The theocentric issue here is the connection between ethics and inheritance. David contrasts the righteous and the wicked in terms of their attitude toward property. He says that the wicked person borrows but then refuses to repay. The righteous individual shows mercy by giving away resources. The wicked person is grasping. The righteous person is openhanded. The wicked person promises to repay as a way of gaining access to someone else's wealth. He then refuses to repay his debt, thereby becoming a thief. The righteous person not only does not ask to be repaid, he actually gives away wealth on the assumption that he will not be repaid.

The difference in attitude has to do with trust. The wicked person gains the trust of someone who lends him assets. He then refuses to repay the debt. He has violated the trust. He has used the other person's trust as a means of extracting wealth from him. In contrast, the generous person trusts God not to let him sink into poverty. Because he trusts God to repay, he feels confident that he can safely give away assets. The wicked person misuses the trust of the other person. The righteous person trusts God, knowing that God will not abandon him.

David says in the next verse that the blessed individual will inherit the earth. In contrast, the people whom God curses will be cut off. We see a parallel contrast. The wicked person misuses the trust of a generous person, or at least a person who has wealth to lend, and he attempts to cut off the generous person. He cuts off the person who trusted in him; God will in turn cut off this wicked borrower who refuses to repay. David contrasts this person with the righteous person, who trusts in God rather than the word of the person to whom he gives an asset. He trusts that God will repay him in history. He trusts in God, and therefore he has the courage to give away a portion of his wealth. Such a person, David says, will inherit the earth. In other words, he gives away a minimal amount of wealth, and he eventually inherits the earth. This is not about inheriting heaven—pie in the sky by and by. It is about inheriting wealth in this world.

David wrote these words a thousand years before the birth of Christ. People in his era who were generous did not inherit the earth. Then what is the meaning of the phrase? It means that the covenantal heirs of the righteous will, in the advanced phase of the millennial kingdom, inherit the earth. There is a progressive transfer of wealth in history from covenant-breakers to covenant-keepers. Over time, covenant-keepers prosper, and covenant-breakers do not. This is the cause-and-effect process that is described in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

B. Righteousness and Risks

In the next passage, David says that the steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord (v. 23). The Lord delights in the way of a good man (v. 23). If a good man falls, he will not be cast down by God (v. 24). The Lord upholds him with his hand. This teaches that the righteous individual has special protection from God. It means that he can do righteously, including give away wealth, without risking destruction. God intervenes in history to take care of the righteous individual. God orders his steps.

David then makes a remarkable announcement. “I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread” (v. 25) David testifies that righteous people he has seen have never been reduced to such poverty that they had to beg bread. David lived in a time in which righteousness was more common than it was two centuries later in Israel and Judah. This was an era of prosperity for the nation, and it was an era of general righteousness. David, as the king, was representative of civil government generally. It was a righteous society, comparatively speaking, and so the righteous individual was in a position to be confident that God would protect him. He would not have to beg bread. Because of this, David says, the righteous person is ever merciful, and he lends money or assets to the poor. His seed is blessed by God. Notice that the positive sanctions are part of an inheritance.

David is testifying to the existence of an ethical cause-and-effect process that governed the social order of Israel. God upholds a righteous man. This gives confidence to the righteous man that he can safely give away his wealth. David says that he will inherit the earth. This means that in the covenant line, over time, the heirs of covenant-keepers will inherit the earth. This is a uniquely postmillennial concept. It is repeated often in this psalm.¹ It testifies to the existence of positive sanctions for covenant-keeping in history. It testifies also to negative sanctions for covenant-breaking in history.

This passage reinforces what Moses had told the Israelites just before the conquest of Canaan. Moses told them that covenant-keeping produces positive sanctions in history (Deut. 28:1–14). Covenant-breaking produces negative sanctions in history (Deut. 28:15–68). David reiterates this, not by appealing back to the words of Moses, but by testifying to what he has seen with his own eyes. God upholds the generous person. This serves as a down payment on the long-term system of inheritance which Moses taught to Israel, and which David reaffirms here. Covenant-keepers will inherit the earth.

C. Cutting Off the Wicked

The disinheritance of the wicked is as sure as the inheritance of the righteous. “For the LORD loveth judgment, and forsaketh not his saints; they are preserved for ever: but the seed of the wicked shall be cut off” (v. 28). It is not just that the biological seed will be cut off. The inheritance will be cut off. The inheritance of evildoers is transferred to covenant-keepers. “The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever” (v. 29). The link between seed and land under the Mosaic law was tight. This had to do with the messianic promise given by Jacob. “The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be” (Gen. 49:10). The basis of this inheritance is covenant-keeping—ultimately, the representative covenant-keeping of

1. Verses 9, 11, 22, 29, and 34.

Jesus Christ.

Wait on the LORD, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land: when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it. I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree. Yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found (vv. 34–36).

For a time, wickedness prospers. It grows in influence. It appears to be dominant. This does not last. “But the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off” (v. 38).

This is consistent with Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

Conclusion

David distinguishes wicked men from righteous men by means of their attitude toward wealth. The wicked man trusts wealth so much that he betrays his own trust. He borrows but does not repay. He undermines his reputation. In contrast is the righteous man who trusts God to uphold him. His trust is so great that he gives away wealth.

David testifies that he has personally seen the outcome of righteousness. He has not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his children begging bread. The generous inherit the earth. The wicked are cut off.

AN UNCERTAIN INHERITANCE

Surely every man walketh in a vain shew: surely they are disquieted in vain: he heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them (Psalm 39:6).

This is a universal condemnation. Everyone is subject to this. Men live their lives in a vain show. The translators used this phrase rather than image, which is how it usually is translated.¹ He is saying that we live our lives as images. Of course, we live as images of God, but we try to create our own public images. This is a form of public relations.

A. Who Will Inherit?

The theocentric issue here is inheritance. David is concerned about the long-term effects of the wealth that he accumulates. He attributes to others the problem that he faces personally. He speaks of other people as building up riches, but without knowledge regarding who will inherit these riches. This same theme can be found in the Book of Ecclesiastes.

Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun: because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me. And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity. Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun (Eccl. 2:18–20).²

This is always a major problem with accumulated wealth. This wealth may survive the death of the person who accumulated it. A rich

1. Genesis 1:26; 5:3; I Samuel 6:5, 11; II Kings 11:18.

2. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

person wants to believe that the influence he establishes in history will be continued through his accumulated wealth. The problem he faces is this: he will not be in a position to administer this wealth. Wealth is a tool of production, but the producer will eventually lose control over it. At that point, his influence may be continued by others, or it may be re-directed. The tool of great wealth can be put to many uses. It can be put to many ends. A dead man has no control over the uses or ends to which his wealth will be put.

This problem is related to the fifth point of the biblical covenant: inheritance. It is the problem of succession.³ An individual builds wealth in terms of a particular set of values (point three)⁴ and a particular set of skills. He builds this wealth in terms of the prevailing opinions and standards that exist during his lifetime. But these standards can and do change over time. Those who inherit his wealth will face decisions of how to put this wealth to some use. They will have to decide which values should govern the administration of this accumulated wealth. This is the issue of rendering judgment: point four.⁵

The problem of succession faces every successful individual and organization. It is built into the creation. This is why the biblical covenant addresses the problem. From the moment that death entered the world, the problem of succession became one of the central problems of everyone's existence.

Wealth involves personal responsibility. We build up wealth in many forms during our lifetime. We are commanded by God to subdue the earth on His behalf (Gen. 1:27–28).⁶ This requires that we accumulate wealth in one form or another. This wealth may be in terms of books written, organizations launched, students trained, and all the other aspects of what we call a legacy. The same problem faces every person who leaves behind a legacy. He does not know who will inherit this legacy.

A father may believe that his sons will administer his wealth in a particular way, according to a particular set of values. But he has no guarantee that he has not been deceived by one or all of his sons. Also,

3. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program For Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1987] 2010), ch. 5.

4. Sutton, ch. 5. North, ch. 3.

5. Sutton, ch. 4. North, ch. 4.

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

as we know from the parable of the prodigal son, a son may rebel against his father.⁷ This can take place during a father's lifetime, but it can also take place after the father has died. The heirs may be skilled deceivers.

Alternatively, once they receive the inheritance, they may go through a fundamental change in their thinking. Great wealth transfers great opportunities, and great opportunities always involve great responsibilities. Some people do not want the responsibilities, but they thoroughly enjoy the opportunities. This is why inheritances can get squandered by the heirs within a few years. The stories of such squandering are common. They are certainly more common than the stories of families that have maintained enormous wealth through several generations.

The supreme goal of history is the extension of the kingdom of God in history. This requires compound growth. The biblical concept of kingdom expansion is one of conquest through service. One kingdom grows at the expense of the other. This is why Jesus spoke of the kingdom of heaven as being like a mustard seed or leaven (Matt. 13:31–33).⁸ It grows in influence.

B. Confession of Faith

Maintaining the same confession, meaning the same view of life, is very difficult inter-generationally. One child who rebels against the confession of the founder of the legacy can deflect succeeding generations' commitment to those principles. It is easy to break the chain. It is not easy to re-establish the chain. This is why Jesus established His church. The institutional church maintains the original confession down through the generations. The institutional church is more committed to the transmission of the legacy than the family is or the civil government is. The church historically has been more successful in maintaining the original confession of the Founder than either the family or the state.

This is why maintaining the confession of faith is more important than maintaining the accumulated wealth. A man's first responsibility is to train up his children in the way they should go, so that they will not depart from it in their old age (Prov. 22:6). This is another way of saying that they will not depart from it after the death of their father. They will put whatever inheritance they received from him to effective use in terms of his confession.

7. The parable was about two sons who rebelled. One of them repented: the prodigal (Luke 15:11–32). Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 37.

8. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 30.

A man rarely lives long enough to see his great-grandchildren grow to young adults. They are toddlers who have not embraced a confession of faith. A good man leaves a legacy to his children's children, but he is incapable of leaving the confession that enables him to extend his legacy when it comes to the lives of his great-grandchildren. He may keep a journal for them to read. Journals are written on paper that can last physically, but they are easily lost and easily ignored. He may record his ideas on digital media, but there is no way that an image on a screen or waves on a digital audio file can assure the founder of a dynasty that his legacy will be maintained by his children's grandchildren.

Time replaces the dead. It covers them up the way that dirt covers up a casket in a grave. Western Christendom once had a ceremony at the graveside.⁹ Someone—maybe several people—would shovel dirt onto the casket. The symbol of this covering up is a good one. It reminds us that most of what we do in life is covered up. We are not much responsible for the distant consequences of our legacy, because we have virtually no authority over those consequences. Responsibility is associated with authority. When authority declines, responsibility declines.

This is why accumulated wealth in any form is such an enormous responsibility for the person who accumulates it. If he is successful in maintaining his wealth, he must transfer it to others, who will put it to use after he has departed from the scene. The responsibility of entrusting such a legacy is very great. The stories of rich men who establish charitable foundations, which are then captured by their ideological enemies, are common.

This psalm reminds men of their mortality. It reminds them that, no matter how much they achieve during their lifetimes, they will exercise no direct postmortem authority over the outcome of their efforts. It reminds them that if they see themselves as solely responsible for accumulating their wealth and transmitting their wealth, they are flying blind. They should retain confidence in God to administer the wealth left behind. They should have confidence in point two of the biblical covenant: hierarchy.¹⁰ In economic terms, they must have confidence in God as the owner of all wealth, and the Person in charge of transferring this wealth to stewards who will act on His behalf. If a man has no confidence in the sovereignty of God and the commitment of God to the kingdom of God by means of the system of stewardship established by the dominion covenant, he places too much responsibility on his own shoulders. He thereby asserts autonomous responsibility for the administration of his wealth long after his death.

9. The early New England Puritans did not have formal funerals, except a call to the cemetery, where the corpse was interred without ceremony. This began to change in the mid-seventeenth century. A funeral was held at the church, not at the graveside. Bruce Collin Daniels, Puritans at Play: Leisure and Recreation in Puritan New England (New York: Macmillan, 1995), p. 87.

Conclusion

This psalm reminds a man that he has little responsibility beyond his death, because he has almost no information about how or what the heirs will do with his legacy. So, a person who wants to extend his legacy through history in a way that benefits people in the future must come to grips with the fact that he is incapable of doing this alone with any degree of success. Presumed autonomy ends with death. He must face the limitations of his own mortality, and he must then strive to place his wealth in the hands of stewards who will administer this wealth on behalf of the confession of faith which enabled him to build this wealth. This is delegation. This is what God does with men. Men should do the same.

This psalm also reminds us that we are not very good stewards in our own lifetimes. We are nearly helpless in establishing the purposes to which our legacies will be put. The proper use of our legacies forces us to consider the sovereignty of God in the hierarchy of all covenants. It forces us to come to grips with the covenantal nature of reality. If we are unwilling to conform ourselves to God and His covenants, we will live under the curse of our inability to exercise control over the wealth which we accumulate. Presumed autonomy is self-destructive.

10. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 2.

8

BELOW-MARKET PRICING

Thou sellest thy people for nought, and dost not increase thy wealth by their price (Psalm 44:12).

One of the fundamental assumptions of free market economic theory is that individuals enter into voluntary transactions only when each of the parties believes that he will better himself by completing the transaction. If either party does not believe that the exchange will benefit him, he will not enter into the exchange.

A. God's Negative Sanctions

The theocentric issue here is God as judge. In this verse, the psalmist tells God what God has been doing. This psalm contains a long list of negative sanctions that God has been imposing on the nation of Israel. It begins with a list of benefits that God had granted to Israel during the era of the conquest under Joshua. The psalmist sees God as the source of positive corporate sanctions as well as negative.

One of the negative sanctions that the psalmist lists is that God has sold His people without seeking a profit. This means that God has acted against the interests of those who are sold into servitude, yet He does not make a profit on the transaction.

From the point of view of free market economic theory, such a transaction is economically irrational. No one knowingly enters into a transaction in which he sells an asset for less than the asset is worth in a competitive market. To sell an asset for less than the asset is worth is to indulge in a form of charity. The seller of the asset is transferring wealth to the buyer, yet the seller does not insist on compensation comparable to the value of the asset being transferred.

From an economic standpoint, such a transaction makes no sense. The psalmist nevertheless announces that this is what God has done.

He does not say exactly how that God has sold His people. The implication is that God owns them, and that He has sold them to a high-bidding purchaser. Someone has purchased all of the servants whom God has put up for exchange. The psalmist does not say who this individual is. The implication is that Israel has been suffering from various forms of tyranny. God has arranged for Israel to suffer this tyranny. The meaning of being sold into servitude is that an individual loses authority over himself and his household. This authority is transferred to the purchaser of a servant.

The psalmist indicates that this is a form of judgment on the nation of Israel. The fact that God would sell His people without seeking to make a profit is indicative of the anger of God against the actions of Israelites. This is not a strictly economic transaction. As a strictly economic transaction, the sale of servants at no profit to the seller makes no sense. So, the psalmist is making a covenantal point. He is arguing that point four of the biblical covenant, sanctions,¹ is being upheld by God. God upholds the fourth point of the biblical covenant by selling His people into servitude. He refuses to intervene in order to deliver his people from bondage. He could have intervened, but He has not.

This psalm indicates that God is bringing covenantal judgment against the nation of Israel. It acknowledges that God is completely in control. It is an affirmation of God's sovereign action in history. This psalm therefore constitutes a covenant lawsuit. It is a warning, not to God, but to the hearers and readers of the psalm: the events that had taken place in Israel are not random. They were the outcome of God's enforcement of His covenantal law by means of covenantal sanctions. In this case, the sanctions are negative, because the sin of the nation is overt. The psalmist is not issuing some kind of covenant lawsuit against God. We must therefore view his complaints against God as a covenant lawsuit against the nation of Israel. He acknowledges that bad times have come, but he attributes these bad times to the systematic intervention of God into the society. He understands that it is God who has intervened on behalf of His law. The events are not random.

The psalm is indirectly a call for national repentance. It is presented in the form of a complaint against God, but it was written in order to persuade covenant-keepers that they should abandon their covenant-breaking practices and go back to the Mosaic law. The psalmist insists that Israel has not apostatized. The nation is still full of covenant-keepers.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

All this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant. Our heart is not turned back, neither have our steps declined from thy way; Though thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons, and covered us with the shadow of death. If we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god; Shall not God search this out? for he knoweth the secrets of the heart. Yea, for thy sake are we killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter. Awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord? arise, cast us not off for ever (vv. 17–23).

The psalmist is presenting a legal case for Israel. He calls on God to relent. The people have learned their lesson. God can conscientiously remove His curses. “For our soul is bowed down to the dust: our belly cleaveth unto the earth. Arise for our help, and redeem us for thy mercies’ sake” (vv. 25–26). The nation has not earned God’s favor through righteousness, but instead relies on God’s grace.

B. Amos’ Covenant Lawsuit

Over three centuries later, Amos indirectly invoked the psalmist’s words. He applied them to covenant-breakers. “Thus saith the LORD; For three transgressions of Israel, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they sold the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes” (Amos 2:6). The Hebrew word indicates that the shoes in this case were sandals. Silver was worth having, but a pair of sandals were surely not worth what a human being was worth. Why would anyone who owned a Hebrew servant sell him for a pair of sandals? This makes no sense economically.

The next verse throws additional light on the practice. Example: “That pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor, and turn aside the way of the meek” (Amos 2:7a). The Hebrew word translated here as “pant” is elsewhere translated as “swallow.” “Whose harvest the hungry eateth up, and taketh it even out of the thorns, and the robber swalloweth up their substance” (Job 5:5). It is also translated as “devour.” “I have long time holden my peace; I have been still, and refrained myself: now will I cry like a travailing woman; I will destroy and devour at once” (Isa. 42:14). The sellers were driven by perversity: the enjoyment of destruction. They wanted to destroy poor people, heaping dust on the heads of the poor. So, they sold them cheap, out of spite. So corrupt had men become that they did not care what price they received. They sold their victims because they enjoyed demonstrating their ability to oppress others. To oppress those who were poor and meek had become a great source of social status for people with wealth and political influence.

We say that “price is no consideration.” We mean that a high price is not a major barrier to a purchase. Amos was saying that human freedom was held in such low esteem by the sellers that any price was acceptable. They were walking away from money. They could get silver, but some of them sold their brethren for sandals. This was what the leftist American economist Thorstein Veblen called conspicuous consumption.² As in imperial Rome, when rich men—and Cleopatra—would publicly drop a ground-up pearl into a cup of wine and then drink the wine, so were the Israelite oppressors.

This must have been very profitable for those entrepreneurs who were engaged in the domestic slave trade, buying for sandals and selling for silver. But these sales could not have been easily predictable by slave traders. The sales must have been random. Two organized markets cannot have significant price differences for essentially the same product if free trade is allowed by the civil magistrates. Entrepreneurs will buy in one market, raising prices, and sell in the other, lowering prices. Prices will tend to equalize.

If we take Amos’ words literally, the sale of Hebrew slaves in Israel and Judah was not a quest for financial profit. It was a quest for status: conspicuous consumption. It was status through oppression. This indicated the extent of the moral decline and judicial corruption.

Amos accused lawless Israelites of doing what the psalmist says here that God has been doing. Amos condemned rich Israelites who sold slaves for a pittance. The implication of this prophetic message is that the sellers were acting in terms of rebellious attitudes. They were not trying to seek a profit; they were simply showing their authority over the lives of other men and women. They sold property, not to the highest bidder, but to anyone who wanted to buy the services of slaves. It was an assertion of wealth. It was a way to show other people that money does not matter.³ Yet this is the implication of what the psalmist asserts regarding the practice of God. God has sold His servants without seeking a profit. This is not because God is evil; it is because God upholds the terms of His covenant with Israel. He demonstrates that He is beyond the need to make a profit. He is sovereign. This is the same sort of statement that was made by covenant-breakers in Israel centuries later. They were also asserting that they were sovereign. They were also showing that money did not matter to them. But this attitude on the part of covenant-breakers is illegitimate. This was the message of Amos.

2. Thorstein Veblen, The Theory of the Leisure Class: An Economic Study of Institutions (New York: Macmillan, [1899] 1902), ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 28.

Conclusion

The psalmist acts as Israel's defense attorney in God's court. God has begun to apply the negative sanctions of His national covenant. The psalmist acknowledges God's actions. He then argues that the nation has not departed from God entirely. There are still covenant-keepers who honor God. He calls on God to show grace.

He argues that God is losing money from the imposition of negative sanctions. "Thou sellest thy people for nought, and dost not increase thy wealth by their price." Why keep doing this? He is asking: "What is in it for you?" Why not remove these sanctions? "All this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant" (v. 17). Economically, this makes no sense. Covenantally, it does. But the national covenant has not been completely broken. So, please withhold correction, the psalmist asks God.

9

THE FUTILITY OF RICHES

Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil, when the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about? They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches; None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him (Psalm 49:5–7).

The theocentric issue here is God’s sanctions. These words introduce the most detailed discussion of economics that is found in the Book of Psalms. It begins with a description of negative sanctions, “when the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about.” This is a strange passage. What is the meaning of “heel”? It appears to be from the same root as the word for someone who lies in wait to capture a person. “And when they had set the people, even all the host that was on the north of the city, and their liers in wait on the west of the city, Joshua went that night into the midst of the valley” (Josh. 8:13).

A. Fear and Trust

The psalmist asks a rhetorical question: “Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil?” He is under attack, yet he says that he should not fear this. Why not? To answer this, he moves to a consideration of someone who trusts in riches, who boasts in the multitude of his riches. In the time of crisis, riches will not help those who possess them.

He says that rich men will not be able to redeem a brother, meaning a close relative. A rich man will not be able to give God a ransom for this relative. In such a time as this, the psalmist says, earthly riches count for nothing. An individual who boasts of his wealth in good times will find that his wealth does him no good in a time of extreme crisis.

The language of the two verses that follow indicates that the psalmist is talking about redemption from physical death. “(For the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever:) That he should still live for ever, and not see corruption” (vv. 8–9). When he speaks of “the redemption of their soul,” he is not talking about eternal life in the sense of deliverance from the final judgment. He is talking about deliverance from the threat of imminent physical death. No one can escape physical death. No one lives forever, physically speaking, never to see corruption. That promise—not seeing corruption—is a messianic promise. “For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption” (Psalm 16:10). Peter cited this passage in Acts 2, preaching to the Jews. He said that it was fulfilled by Jesus.¹ Even in this case, Jesus Christ, the Messiah, did taste physical death. He escaped bodily corruption, because of the resurrection and the ascension, but he did not escape death. He paid God’s ransom to God.

B. Physical Death

Here, the psalmist begins a description of the effects of physical death. This raises the issue of inheritance. He says that wise men die, and so do fools and brutish people (v. 10). Wise men leave their wealth to others. Every man hopes that his house, meaning the legacy of the household he established, will continue forever. He hopes that his influence and memory will extend to all generations. Men of great wealth or power even name their estates after themselves. The psalmist is making the point that no one escapes death, no house survives forever, no family name survives forever, and land is eventually renamed after someone else. All land will eventually fall into a conqueror’s hand. So, men who put their faith in the long-term impact of whatever it is that they leave behind are placing their trust in a vapor. Such trust is hopeless.

He goes so far as to say that a man who dies is like an animal that dies. There is no legacy of the animal, and there is no legacy of the individual. This does not mean that there is in fact no legacy whatsoever. A man is not an animal. The psalmist is making a comparison. Man is more like an animal with respect to the survival of his legacy than he is to an immortal creature whose reign extends down through history.

1. “Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption” (Acts 2:27). “He seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption. This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses” (Acts 2:31–32).

The common burden of physical death strikes the wise man and the fool, the rich man and the brute. This common legacy of all men undermines the differences between the legacies between a rich man and a poor man, between a wise man and a fool. Most legacies eventually are severed from people's memory about the founders. Through many sons and daughters, through many generations, the heirs' memories of the founders fade. Those people who trust in wealth to sustain their memory in history ignore what should be obvious: future generations forget.²

He says that an individual's body is laid in a grave. This is the equivalent of an animal that is laid in the grave. He has a memorable phrase: "The upright will have dominion over them in the morning" (v. 14). This is an affirmation of the covenantal basis of dominion. The upright individual will exercise dominion on the day after the death of the person who puts trust in riches. The indication here is that the inheritance is covenantal. It is based on covenantal conformity to the Bible-revealed laws of God. The individual who trusts in God, and who obeys the laws of God, is a righteous person. This person will have dominion over the legacy of those who trusted in riches. The Book of Proverbs reasserts this emphatically. "The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22b).³

The psalmist says that God will redeem his soul from the power of the grave. When death threatens, God will intervene and deliver him from the calamity that faces him. This is what he said at the beginning of this passage. He is not saying that he will somehow live forever, never tasting physical death. He is saying only that the individual who trusts in God is in a position to have confidence that God will deliver him. The individual who trusts in riches to deliver him is resting on a broken reed (Isa. 36:6).

The psalmist then tells the listener not to be afraid when someone else is made rich. The glory of that person's house is increased. This is a short-term phenomenon, for when he dies, "he shall carry nothing away: his glory shall not descend after him" (v. 17). This theme is found throughout the Bible. Every individual dies physically. He is not capable of taking any of his earthly possessions to a world beyond the

2. Even with the Word Wide Web, with its seemingly permanent digital communications technologies, memories will fade. There will be too many forefathers for the descendants to study. Any short YouTube videos will not convey much information.

3. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

grave. His glorious achievements in history will in no way benefit him. During his lifetime, the psalmist says, he blessed his own soul. Men praised him. But he will go to the generation of his fathers. He will go into the grave. An individual who does not understand this in the days of his own glory, in the days when other men praise him, is like the beasts that perish (v. 20). Such an individual is as ignorant as a beast. He does not understand the temporary nature of his riches, his power, and his fame.

C. Mammon

The psalmist is talking about a major disaster that overtakes a man. His point is that men who trust in riches under such circumstances will find that they have put their trust in a false god. In contrast, he says that the individual who trusts in God will be delivered.

This is an early declaration of the truth that Jesus announced: a man cannot serve two gods, meaning God and Mammon (Matt. 6:24).⁴ He must choose one of these to serve faithfully. It is impossible to serve them both faithfully. Mammon is the immanent god who promises more in history for his followers. The God of the Bible promises to deliver those who are committed to Him covenantally, meaning those who work to extend His kingdom in history. Mammon tells believers that they can accumulate wealth, power, fame, and honor mostly by their own efforts.

God tells His followers that history has limits, and that only to the extent that people are committed to God and the extension of His kingdom will they achieve their goal: a memorable legacy. The psalmist does not say that God guarantees that an individual will be remembered by future generations. On the contrary, he says precisely the opposite. The implication is that God will remember, and this is the only memory that counts.

Conclusion

Here is the psalmist's message: everything that an individual accumulates for himself and his family in history will dissipate in history. Everything that an individual on his own authority attempts to do to guarantee his memory down through the generations will fail. Anyone who believes that he can achieve such immortality through future memories is like a beast. The beast has no comprehension of the way the world works. Neither does the individual who trusts in the work of his own hands to achieve for himself a legacy of honor and fame in history.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

10

ORIGINAL OWNERSHIP

For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills (Psalm 50:10).

Here, in a memorable phrase, is the biblical concept of God's original ownership. There is no more fundamental doctrine for Christian economic theory. This verse is reinforced by Psalm 89:11: "The heavens are thine, the earth also is thine: as for the world and the fulness thereof, thou hast founded them." This verse ties the doctrine of God's original ownership to God's creation of the world. Christian economic theory must begin here: creation and ownership. Any attempt to begin with any other presupposition will inevitably lead into humanism or idolatry. It will place sovereignty somewhere other than in God.

A Theocentric Universe

God is the center of the universe. God is primary; the universe is secondary. God is the Creator; the universe is created. This leads to a conclusion: the universe is theocentric. The Bible's account of God's relationship to the universe begins with God: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. 1:1).¹ The entire story of God's relationship with the universe is therefore theocentric. Biblical law is theocentric. Everything is theocentric.

Christian economic theory is theocentric. The Christian economist should therefore begin with the biblical doctrine of creation. The biblical doctrine of creation leads to an inevitable economic conclusion: God owns the world. This is not simply a logical conclusion; it is the explicit statement in this passage. Man does not own the cattle on a thousand hills: God owns them. God also owns the thousand hills.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

This is why a Christian economist who is serious about defending economics as it really operates has a moral and intellectual obligation to begin his discussion of the way the world works economically with the Bible's doctrine of creation and the Bible's doctrine of God's primary ownership. Primary ownership is exclusively God's ownership. All other ownership is delegated. God delegates control over scarce economic resources to individuals and to individuals acting in collective associations. This is the economic application of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:27–28).² This is the economic application of point two of the biblical covenant: hierarchy.³

B. Adam Smith's Secondary Starting Points

Adam Smith is widely regarded as the founder of modern economics. This is not because he was the best economist of his day, or because he was the original thinker who created modern economic thought. Neither was the case.⁴ He was the great popularizer, despite the fact that his economics book is over eight hundred pages.

The Wealth of Nations has two main ideas, which are introduced early in the book. The first idea is the division of labor (Chapter 1). Smith offers a discussion of a pin factory. He shows that by breaking down the tasks of creating a pin in such a way that a common laborer can master a particular task, a pin factory produces a much higher output of pins. This is a good insight, but it has almost no analytical application in the rest of the book. Also, a socialist economist can invoke the same doctrine of increased productivity through specialization of production and the division of labor. So, there is nothing uniquely free market in Adam Smith's use of the division of labor.

The second major concept of Smith's is that in order to persuade people to cooperate with you, you must offer them benefits. Smith begins with self-interest, but he extends the concept of self-interest to include service to others. In order to get what you want, you must give someone else what he wants (Chapter 3). This is the most important concept in The Wealth of Nations. It is the methodological starting

2. Ibid., ch. 4.

3. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

4. Murray Rothbard, Economic Thought Before Adam Smith: An Austrian Perspective on the History of Economic Thought, 2 vols. (Auburn Alabama: Mises Institute, [1995] 2006), I, ch. 16. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardET1>) point for free market economics.

Smith devoted very little space in his book to the concept of private ownership. He did not discuss private ownership from a theoretical standpoint. He assumed private ownership, but he did not explain it. This set back free market economics by almost two centuries. It was not until the 1960s that free market economists began studying the concept of private property in terms of the analytical tools provided by economic logic. For 185 years, socialist economists had what amounted to a free ride.⁵

C. No Self-Ownership

The psalmist does not begin with the doctrine of human autonomy. He does not begin with the doctrine of the autonomous human logic. He does not begin with a series of logically irrefutable axioms. He does not begin with a detailed historical study of cattle on hills. He begins with a declaration: God owns the cattle on a thousand hills. This does not mean that God does not own the cattle on hill number 1001. It means that God owns everything.

God alone possesses absolute rights of ownership. This means that all subordinate rights of ownership are limited. There is no absolute right of private ownership. There is no absolute right of anything when we are speaking of man's rights. Man's rights are derived from God's extension of rights to him. Man's rights are not attained on his own autonomy.

This means that man has no absolute right of self-ownership. The most prominent forms of libertarian economics begin with the assumption of the absolute right of self-ownership. There is no such absolute right. It is merely an assertion of the self-proclaimed autonomous man regarding his own autonomy. There is also no absolute right of state ownership. The great intellectual battle that has gone on between free market economists and socialist economists has been framed in terms of a falsehood: the autonomy of man and the autonomous rights of man. There is no such autonomy, and there are no such absolute rights.

The sovereignty of God is point one of the biblical covenant.⁶ Its application in the field of economic theory is the absolute sovereignty of God over the creation. This means God's absolute rights of ownership over everything in the universe.

5. Tom Bethel, The Noblest Triumph: Property and Prosperity Through the Ages (New York: St. Martins, 1998), ch. 20.

6. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 1. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 1.

D. Professional Isolation

Because a Christian economist should begin with the biblical doctrine of creation, which leads to the biblical doctrine of primary ownership by God, he should not begin with common-confession principles that are shared by most other economists, let alone the general public. A Christian economist should start with the Bible. By starting with the Bible, he cuts himself off from the vast majority of those people who call themselves economists. As he will discover soon enough, he also cuts himself off from the vast majority of people who call themselves Christians.

Most Christians have been trained in tax-funded government schools. They are deliberately trained to reason on this assumption: the God of the Bible is irrelevant to logic, history, science, politics, economics, and everything else that is part of the curriculum of the modern secular university. It is illegal in the United States for a teacher in a tax-supported educational institution to argue that the Bible is authoritative in any area of the curriculum. A Christian teacher in such an institution must spend his career teaching what he knows is a lie: that the God of the Bible and the revelation of the Bible are irrelevant to academic endeavors. If he does not believe that it is a lie, then he is self-deceived. He has been taken in by the deceivers who certified him academically.

Christian economists today refuse to begin with the doctrine of creation as stated in the first chapter of Genesis. They therefore refuse to begin with the concept of God's absolute ownership of everything. They refuse to discuss human ownership as God-delegated ownership: stewardship for the original Owner. They adopt the presuppositions of the humanist worldview. They begin with autonomous man. Free market economists begin with autonomous individual man. Socialist economists begin with autonomous collective man. Christian economists should not begin with the methodology offered by either tradition, but they do. They do not do this self-consciously. They do it after years of training. They can think no other way.

Conclusion

The psalmist declares that God owns the cattle on a thousand hills.

This is the first corollary of Christian economic theory. The first axiom is that God created the heaven and the earth.

The biblical doctrine of creation should be the starting point of Christian social theory. It has been my starting for all volumes in my Economic Commentary on the Bible.

11

THE IRRELEVANCE OF STATUS

Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie: to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity (Psalm 62:9).

A. Social Position

The theocentric issue here is God as the imputer of status. God is the judge. The psalmist tells us that men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are vanity. Weighed in the balance, they are all found to be lighter than vanity. The point he is making is This: your social position is irrelevant if your confession of faith is false. It is vanity. The low man on the totem pole is no better off than the high man on the totem pole.¹ Every position in the social hierarchy is equally irrelevant.

He then tells the would-be criminal not to trust in oppression or wealth. “Trust not in oppression, and become not vain in robbery: if riches increase, set not your heart upon them” (v. 10). Criminal behavior is hopeless.

The biblical meaning of oppression is narrowly defined. It refers to the misuse of civil government to extract wealth or other assets from someone who does not possess judicial authority.² Anyone who trusts in oppression trusts in something that is inherently untrustworthy. Oppression is a form of state-approved robbery. The psalmist also says that robbery in general should not be relied on. What is the typical goal for someone who relies on robbery? The accumulation of riches.

1. A totem pole is a carved pole produced by American Indians in the Pacific Northwest of North America. The poles are associated with specific clans or families. The best-known style of totem poles has carved faces of demons, each face above the other.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

The psalmist then says not to trust in riches, either.

In verse 11, we read the following: “God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this; that power belongeth unto God” (v. 11). God is in a position to bring judgment against those who misuse power in order to steal from others. The psalmist praises God as the source of mercy. “For thou render rest to every man according to his work” (v. 12). This is a warning to anyone who misuses power in order to steal from others. God is a judge, and He possesses the power to bring judgment against those who violate His law. Anyone who is familiar with the Bible understands that God has laws against theft. The commandment is: “Thou shalt not steal” (Ex. 20:15).³

B. Status: Beyond Mere Money

What is unique about this psalm is its forthright dismissal of social status. Most people spend their lives accumulating wealth in order to rise in the eyes of their neighbors. They do not wish to be known merely as having the ability to make money. They want to receive the acceptance of people who are honored for something other than money. Usually, the something other than money means membership in a self-policed, closed group to which they alone belong. Usually, access to high social status is based on the possession of old money. Old money is money that is inherited through several generations.

It is a well-known fact of life that the sons and grandsons of rich people tend to dissipate the inheritance. In medieval times, the way that families kept this from happening, in order to preserve the family name, was to give the family’s land to the oldest son. He was not allowed to sell this land, except to pay off debts. The younger sons received relatively little of the inheritance. This is opposed to the biblical principle of the double portion for the eldest son (Deut. 21:15–17).⁴ In contrast, the eldest son under the system of primogeniture received virtually the whole of the inheritance. This preserved the family name, but only by disinheriting younger sons who also possessed the family name.

Such a system of inheritance is expressly unbiblical. The eldest son under the Mosaic covenant received a double portion. Why? Because he had double responsibilities for the care of his aged parents. The other sons were not cut off from the family inheritance. They were part of the inheritance because they bore the family's name. So, the effect of inheritance in a large Hebrew family was to dissipate the ownership of land especially, but also any other assets possessed by the family. The larger the family, the more the economic legacy was dissipated. This is the correct procedure. God does not want people to trust in an economic inheritance. The primary inheritance is confessional and ethical. This inheritance is the legacy of raising of children according to the word of God. It means passing down to them the same vision of the extension of the kingdom of God in history that the founder of the family fortune believed in. The family's primary legacy is therefore confessional and ethical.

3. Ibid., ch. 28.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 50.

Jesus warned against faith in Mammon (Matt. 6:24).⁵ Mammon's confession of faith is this: "More for me in history." It is a popular confession. When men believe in Mammon more than they believe in God, they want to preserve a legacy that will be remembered. They want to be famous for having established a legacy in the first place. They seek a kind of immortality through the memory of future generations. The Psalms say elsewhere that this goal is an illusion (Psalm 39:6).⁶ But men who believe in Mammon do not have a concept of history in which inheritance is the commitment to extend the kingdom of God, not to extend the kingdom of man. This is why Mammon offers a lie to his followers.

C. Social Climbing

The person who seeks to escape from the social status of low degree desires to enter the social status of a higher degree. The psalmist says that both positions are equally irrelevant. They are equally lightweight. They are lightweight because they rest, not on the sovereignty of God, but on the supposed sovereignty of man.

A person who seeks high status by accumulated wealth may be tempted to oppress people or rob people. What matters to him is rising in social status, not the means by which he rises. Yet social status is always concerned with means as well as ends. If anything, the means are more important than the ends. It is not sufficient to possess great wealth in the quest to rise in social status. The heirs of those who

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

6. Chapter 7.

long ago achieved great wealth do not want competition from newcomers who achieve great wealth. They do not want to be displaced by productive people who get rich by serving consumers. They want to maintain their high social status on the basis of characteristics other than making money. So, it is almost hopeless for a person to seek to become someone of high degree to do so by accumulating great wealth.

Social status is always imputed status. Someone who possesses high social status imputes to another person those characteristics which he says, and those among his peers say, make a person eligible to enter the company of those who possess high social status. People lower on the totem pole also impute high status to those whom they perceive to be members of a closed elite far above them. But, in either case, it is men who make the imputation of status, and the psalmist has no faith in men. God alone renders relevant judgment, not man. God renders to every man according to his works (v. 12). His imputation of status is what matters, not the imputation made by those within a closed circle, an elite, or by those who are excluded from the closed circle. The judgment of man cannot be safely trusted. Only the judgment of God can be safely trusted.

Conclusion

This psalm warns against concern over one's social status. It also warns against robbery and oppression. It reminds us that God is the sovereign Judge. He judges in terms of what we do, not where we are on society's totem pole.

12

GOD IS THE SOURCE OF RAIN

Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it: thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God, which is full of water: thou preparest them corn, when thou hast so provided for it. Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly: thou settlest the furrows thereof: thou makest it soft with showers: thou blessest the springing thereof. Thou crownest the year with thy goodness; and thy paths drop fatness (Psalm 65:9–11).

When we search for the god of a particular society, we should first examine the society's concept of covenant. The five-point biblical covenant exists in an altered form in every society.

It is sometimes said that the source of law is the god of a society.¹ Law is point three of the biblical covenant.² It can equally be said that the source of the sanctions of the legal order is the god of a society.³ So intertwined are society's ethical standards and its sanctions that the two should be considered as a unit. Therefore, we can say that the source of law and sanctions in a society is the god of a society. What people believe about the source of law and law's sanctions in history is important as a means of identifying what kind of god that members of a particular society believe in. The theocentric issue here is sanctions.

A. The Source of Water

In this psalm, we learn that God visits the earth and waters it. He enriches it with what the psalmist calls the river of God. This river is full of water. God also prepares grain. God is the source of both water and food. The psalmist speaks of God as actively intervening in history to provide water. God is said to water the ridges abundantly. He makes the land soft with showers. Then the psalmist declares with finality that God is the source of the goodness of the entire year. He describes the paths of society as marked by fatness.

1. T. Robert Ingram, The World Under God's Law (Houston, Texas: St. Thomas Press, 1962), p. 3; R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 4.

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

3. Ibid., ch. 4.

1. Water, Life, and Prosperity

The psalmist says that God is the source of water. God supplies water, which in turn sustains prosperity and ultimately sustains life. God is therefore the source of life, for God is the ultimate agent in the universe. He, not autonomous nature, is the source of life. There is no such thing as autonomous nature. The psalmist, by proclaiming God is the source of water, is declaring that nature has no existence apart from God.

God is the source of sanctions in society, meaning the positive sanctions of life and agricultural prosperity. As the source of the positive sanctions of life and agricultural prosperity, God is therefore the God of society. To the extent that men retain faith in this psalm, they cannot maintain faith in autonomous nature. God is the source of the blessings and society, and nature is only a secondary cause.

The psalmist also declares that God waters the pastures of the wilderness. Men do not till the fields of the wilderness. He says that the little hills rejoice on every side. Obviously, this is not to be taken literally. Hills do not rejoice. The psalmist's point is that nature is subordinate to God, dependent on God, and produces nothing apart from God. If this is true of nature, then it is true of society in general.

2. Water on Mars

The psalmist extols God as the direct source of water. Without water, there is no life. Humanists understand the centrality of this claim. In the final decades of the twentieth century and the first decade of the twenty-first, the United States government spent billions of dollars to fund unmanned probes to Mars. The goal of this program was never stated publicly, but almost every press release related to the Mars probes indicate what the goal was. The goal was to discover water on Mars. Constantly, the reports have said that there are indications that long in the past, there was water on Mars. The evidence is extremely thin—almost as thin as the atmosphere on Mars.⁴

There is no question what the underlying purpose of the probes is: the discovery of the basis of life. Without the water, biological scientists do not believe that there can be life. So, if there are traces of water on Mars, there is supposedly the possibility of life on Mars at some time in the distant past.⁵ If there was ever life on Mars, then life on the earth is not unique. If life on the earth is not unique, then God's covenants with mankind in history that relate to the unique creation of the universe, which was the background to the creation of the earth, which is the background of the creation of Adam and Eve, are not unique. This would undermine man's faith in the covenant established by God with man. It would undermine faith in the biblical story of the transition from grace to wrath (Gen. 1–3). This in turn undermines the main story of the Bible, from Genesis 3 to Revelation 20: the transition from wrath to grace. The humanists who run the United States government are determined to use the tax money of Christians to fund probes to Mars that will be used to undermine Christianity.

This psalm is an affirmation of the sovereignty of God over all creation, including society. The entire psalm is an affirmation of God as the source of the central economic blessings in history. It is therefore an affirmation of the absolute sovereignty of God.

B. Modern Economic Theory

Such a view of economic causation is foreign to all modern economic theory. Economists trace all productivity to two sources: land and labor.⁶ The universe is assumed to be autonomous, and therefore man's world is autonomous. Man is believed to be the product of the world, and therefore man is autonomous from God. He is not autonomous from nature, nor is nature autonomous from man. The interrelationship between man and nature is an autonomous process, virtually all economic theory asserts. In any textbook in any university in any department of economics, there is no reference to God as being

4. A typical example: Kenneth Chang, "Scientists Find Signs Water Is Flowing on Mars," New York Times (Aug. 4, 2011). (<http://bit.ly/MarsWater2011>) On January 30, 2012, I searched Google for "Mars Probe" and "water." I got this result: about 500,000 hits.

5. "Mars Probe Confirms Water on Ancient Mars—Is Proof of Life Next?" Daily Galaxy (Dec. 9, 2011). (<http://bit.ly/MarsWaterLife2011>)

6. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 5:4. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

the source of the productivity of both land and labor. God is considered to be a hypothesis that cannot be verified by scientific methodology. Because economists regard economics as a science, they self-consciously strip all references to God out of the curriculum.

William Letwin argued that economics was the first social science to be self-conscious in its rejection of any concept of God or morality. He argued that early economic theory was a self-conscious reaction against the English Civil War, which was fought on the basis of rival views of Christianity. Late seventeenth-century economics was an attempt to create a science of society which did not invoke either Christianity or the Bible. Economists believed that there could be no reconciliation between rival theories of Christianity and the Bible. So, they self-consciously attempted to separate economic theory from morality in the Bible.⁷

This psalm categorically denies the foundation of modern economic theory. There is no possibility of reconciling this psalm with modern economic theory. No matter how hard those few Christians who happen to be certified academic economists attempt to segregate economic theory from the Bible, this psalm makes it clear that God alone is the source of economic productivity associated with nature. Whatever man does is subordinate to what God does. If God withholds the rain, it does not matter what men do. There will be drought.

Conclusion

This psalm extends its affirmation of God as the source of agricultural blessings to multiple blessings. In Psalm 68, we read: “Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits, even the God of our salvation. Selah” (v. 19). In Psalm 85, we read: “Yea, the LORD shall give that which is good; and our land shall yield her increase” (v. 12). This confession was the basis of James’ affirmation a millennium later: “Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning” (James 1:17).⁸

This psalm undermines the operational presupposition of modern economic theory: the autonomy of nature and man. Economic theory must therefore be reconstructed in terms of a view of God which pro-

7. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1963).

8. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 32.

claims that He, and He alone, is the source of the rain. There can be no autonomy for nature or mankind. All economic theory, if it is to be accurate, must begin with the concept of God as the source of the productivity of land. This will require the rewriting of all texts and monographs related to nature as one of the two sources of productivity. Man is dependent on nature, and nature is dependent on God. Through the covenant, man gains control over nature. Therefore, man is dependent on God. This has to be the operating starting point of all economic theory, if economic theory is to be accurate. Modern economic theory implicitly begins with the assumption that this psalm cannot possibly be true literally. There is therefore an inescapable confrontation between humanistic economic theory and biblical economic theory.

13

TRIED AS SILVER

For thou, O God, hast proved us: thou hast tried us, as silver is tried. Thou broughtest us into the net; thou laidst affliction upon our loins. Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads; we went through fire and through water: but thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place (Psalm 66:10–12).

A. Affliction and Restoration

The psalmist presents the biblical procedure for extending the kingdom of God. There is a period of testing. It leads to a period of defeat. Then there is restoration. Restoration is a time for the visible blessings of God. This is in contrast to the time for the visible cursings of God. The theocentric issue here is sanctions.

The pre-exilic prophets came before Israel and Judah to warn the people of a time of corporate negative sanctions. The nation would be defeated militarily and carried into captivity. The prophets did not say that there was anything that the people could do to avoid this period of persecution. They promised Israel and Judah that there would be a time of restoration after the period of captivity. There was hope in the future, but not in the immediate future. There would be a time of sabbath rest for the land (Jer. 50:34), but first there would be a time of persecution and pain.

Isaiah used the imagery of silver smelting to describe what was coming. The nation had rebelled. “How is the faithful city become an harlot! it was full of judgment; righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers. Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water” (Isa. 1:21–22).¹ Rebellion is the equivalent of debased silver—silver in need of purification. God promised to provide this purification. “And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin: And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, the faithful city. Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness” (Isa. 1:25–27). To regain purity, the nation needed smelting. It needed negative sanctions.

1. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

The prophets warned of captivity to come. This had been Moses’ message six or seven centuries earlier.

Then my anger shall be kindled against them in that day, and I will forsake them, and I will hide my face from them, and they shall be devoured, and many evils and troubles shall befall them; so that they will say in that day. Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us? And I will surely hide my face in that day for all the evils which they shall have wrought, in that they are turned unto other gods. Now therefore write ye this song for you, and teach it the children of Israel: put it in their mouths, that this song may be a witness for me against the children of Israel. For when I shall have brought them into the land which I swear unto their fathers, that floweth with milk and honey; and they shall have eaten and filled themselves, and waxen fat; then will they turn unto other gods, and serve them, and provoke me, and break my covenant. And it shall come to pass, when many evils and troubles are befallen them, that this song shall testify against them as a witness; for it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed: for I know their imagination which they go about, even now, before I have brought them into the land which I swear (Deut. 31:17–21).²

B. A Biblical Pattern

This pattern is found throughout the Bible. It is a consequence of the Fall of man. Prior to the Fall of man, there was to be a period of testing in the form of work. Adam was required to name the animals (Gen. 2:19–20) before he was given a wife (Gen. 2:21–22). There is performance before there is reward. There are requirements to which are attached sanctions. The sanctions, positive or negative, are consistent with the performance. God warned Adam that he would die if he ate from the forbidden tree. There was a command and a sanction.

Once Adam fell, mankind was placed under a system of sanctions that substituted persecution and defeat for work. In the garden, Adam was required to work. He was not required to suffer. The requirement that he would suffer did not come until after the Fall, when God specifically punished Adam's body and his environment (Gen. 3:17–19).³ From that time forward, mankind has worked under a curse.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 76.

When God substituted cursing for unimpeded labor, He made life more difficult for mankind. The psalmist reminds us of the message of Moses to the generation of the conquest. Corporate ethical rebellion produces negative corporate sanctions. The nation would therefore go into captivity.

The psalmist understood this Mosaic legal framework. He understood that Israel had suffered in the wilderness. The Amalekites had defeated them (Num. 14:45). He understood that the time of wandering had been a time of testing. God did not bring the people into the wilderness in order to destroy them, as they had repeatedly accused Him. He brought them into the wilderness in order to protect the exodus generation from enemies and also to strengthen the generation of the conquest. This was a successful venture. That generation did conquer Canaan.

The psalmist speaks of God's deliverance of the people into a wealthy land. This is another way of saying that the land possessed valuable resources. The Promised Land that had belonged to the Canaanites was set aside by God for the inheritance of His people. It took 40 years of wandering, plus a six-year war, for Israel to inherit this land. This was a time of testing. The psalmist dismisses the period of testing as irrelevant when compared to the blessings of inheriting the land of Canaan. The ends were worth the means.

The psalmist reminds his listeners that they should not pay much attention to the difficulties of life. These difficulties are part of the payment that is required for men to extend the kingdom of God in a cursed environment. Men should not give up hope that their efforts will be successful. They should be confident. This is an important message of this psalm.

Conclusion

The process of dominion is one of testing. Things get difficult. God's goal is not judgment unto oblivion but judgment unto restoration. First, negative sanctions; then, positive sanctions. God delivers His people into the hands of the enemy. Then He delivers them out.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

This pattern extends into the New Covenant. The bodily death-resurrection-ascension-enthronement of Jesus Christ is the model. It is the church's model for history, not eternity. The church does not pass from history into eternity on the basis of its cultural failure in history. There is continuity. The Book of Psalms, more than any other book in the Bible, affirms the historical basis of this continuity.

14

SILVER AND SUBMISSION

Because of thy temple at Jerusalem shall kings bring presents unto thee. Rebuke the company of spearmen, the multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people, till every one submit himself with pieces of silver: scatter thou the people that delight in war (Psalm 68:29–30).

A. Symbols: Temple, Jerusalem, and Kings

There was never a time in which the kings of the earth came to Jerusalem to bring presents to God, which were presented at, or on behalf of, the temple. The original temple was destroyed by the invading Babylonians early in the sixth century B.C., and the rebuilt temple was destroyed by the invading Romans in 70 A.D. With the exception of a few dispensationalists, Christian expositors have argued that there is no building that serves the same purposes as the temple. So, Old Testament prophecies regarding the temple are fulfilled by the church international. These prophecies have nothing to do with Palestine. With respect to this prophecy, why will kings, whose Old Covenant office no longer exists, bring presents to Jerusalem? There is no temple today.

Jerusalem remains a city. It is not a city where kings will come to offer sacrifices. The theocentric issue here is hierarchy, yet also sacrifice.

There are also no kings. King Farouk, the puppet king of Egypt who was installed by the British in the mid-1930s, once commented, "There are only five kings in the world: the king of England, and the kings of clubs, diamonds, spades, and hearts." The last of the European kings departed immediately after World War I. The Czar of Russia was removed from office by the Bolsheviks in 1917. Royalty is no longer a factor in world affairs, except for occasional celebrations. Kings and queens today are at most minor celebrities, except in Great Britain.

With the exception of a variety of dispensationalism which teaches that there will be a reconstructed temple in the era of Jesus' millennial reign on earth, every Christian principle of interpretation (hermeneutic) insists that this passage has to be interpreted in a symbolic way. The debate is over the correct symbols.

B. The Great Reversal

The psalmist calls on God to rebuke the company of spearmen and the multitude of the bulls. He calls on God to do this by means of the calves of the people. This is poetic language. The "company of spearmen" refers to an army. These are people who do battle for a civil government or for a warlord. The phrase, "the multitude of the bulls," could refer to invading kings. These bulls command the army of spearmen. The psalmist specifically says that he wants God to use "the calves of the people" to overcome the invading military forces. Who are they? Powerless Israelites who suffer invasion. He wants the weak to overcome the strong. Why should he want this? Because it is a testimony to the sovereignty of God whenever David defeats Goliath.

How long should the victory of the little people persist? The psalmist says that it will persist, or should persist, until everyone submits himself with pieces of silver. Who is "everyone"? The invading kings. This refers to a payment to the authorities of Israel. The payment of silver would be a token of subordination by those whom God had conquered.

When the psalmist speaks of everyone, he is referring to the company of spearmen and the multitude of the bulls. He is referring, in other words, to pagan invaders who will seek to conquer the nation of Israel. They will believe that the power of the sword is so great that they can conquer God's holy people. The psalmist rejects this outlook. He wants God to use the common people, whom he refers to as the calves of the people, to overturn publicly the spearmen and the bulls. He wants the powerful to submit to the weak, who represent God.

This theme is found throughout the Bible. I call it the great reversal. The reason why the great reversal is the preferred means of deliverance for the psalmist is because he wants God to get all of the credit. He wants the defeat of a strong invader to be so great that no one could cogently attribute this victory to any other force in history besides the God of the Bible.

C. Submission

To present silver to a conqueror is an act of submission. A conqueror here submits to little people, who act on behalf of the God of the temple. This is a public manifestation of the defeated conqueror's admission that God had conquered him. This is what the psalmist wants to see.

Whenever something valuable, such as silver, is handed over to a conqueror, the person handing over the asset is publicly acknowledging his own defeat at the hands of a victor. The psalmist wants a public manifestation of the kings' representative submission to God. He wants this to take place in full public view.

D. Anti-War

The spearmen and the secular powers behind them are warriors. The psalmist wants to see them scattered. He says specifically that he wants God to scatter the people who delight in war. This is an emphatic statement that war is to be avoided whenever possible. God does not delight in war. Elsewhere, we read that David was not allowed to build the temple, because he was a man of blood. He liked warfare. Such a man was not fit for building the temple of God.

Then David the king stood up upon his feet, and said, Hear me, my brethren, and my people: As for me, I had in mine heart to build an house of rest for the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and for the footstool of our God, and had made ready for the building: But God said unto me, Thou shalt not build an house for my name, because thou hast been a man of war, and hast shed blood (I Chron. 28:2–3).

We must not say that offensive warfare in every instance is illegitimate. The conquest of Canaan was by military action. But Israel was not again called on by God to extend its borders by an act of war.

In this passage, the psalmist says that he wants people scattered who delight in war. He does not want to see them extend their influence. He wants the weak to defeat the mighty. This need not mean that the scattering process has to be military. It is quite possible that the scattering can be economic, or it can be caused by plague. The main thing the psalmist is concerned with is the message that a nation that relies on military power to extend its kingdom is violating a fundamental biblical principle. The psalmist calls for the overthrow of war-mongers.

This passage extols nonviolence. The psalmist is hostile to people who delight in war. So is God. While war is sometimes necessary to defend a particular territory, the use of military violence to extend the kingdom of God was limited under the Old Covenant, and it is never recommended in the New Covenant. The covenant of Jesus Christ is a covenant based on hearing. Paul tells us that faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God (Rom. 10:17). Preaching and discipling are to be Christendom's tools of dominion. Men are to preach the gospel of deliverance from sin and discipline their subordinates in terms of the principles of biblical law.

The psalmist is saying that the power of God is sufficient to scatter violent invaders. God honors the nation of Israel by raising up common people to expel the invaders. War is not to become a means for extending the kingdom of God in history.

Conclusion

The rulers of the nations will someday confess their subordination to the God of the Bible. They will do so by presenting their tithes to the church. This will be in history, when sin still exists and civil governments that restrict it still exist. It therefore cannot refer to the world beyond the grave.

Amillennialists interpret this passage as referring to the final judgment. The difficulty with this passage from an amillennial standpoint is this: during the era of the final judgment, there will be no kings. Kings were an aspect of civil government under the Old Covenant. Civil government deals with the suppression of covenant-breaking acts. There will be no covenant-breaking acts during or after the final judgment. The next verse refers to people who delight in war. There will be no war at the final judgment, although there may be one just before. This passage is one of the most difficult of all passages in the Bible for the amillennialist.

15

DELIVERANCE FROM POVERTY

But I am poor and needy; make haste unto me, O God: thou art my help and my deliverer; O LORD, make no tarrying (Psalm 70:5).

A. Avoiding Poverty

The theocentric issue here is sanctions. Sanctions are the basis of inheritance or disinheritance. This passage makes it clear that poverty is something to be avoided. Poverty is a restriction on a person's ability to extend the kingdom of God in history. It also makes it difficult to enjoy the blessings that God promises to His covenant people. Poverty is not something to be attained through some form of spiritual exercise. The correct goal for a covenant-keeping person is not to master the condition of poverty; it is to master the techniques for escaping poverty legally.

In Proverbs, we read a prayer against poverty.

Two things have I required of thee; deny me them not before I die: Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain (Prov. 30:7–9).¹

The author fears that if he is reduced to a condition of poverty, he may be tempted to steal. On the other hand, the same passage dismisses the quest for riches. The author fears that if he attains great riches, he will be tempted to forget God. So, on the one hand, poverty is a good motivation for overcoming poverty. It is a condition to be overcome. On the other hand, the goal of the overcomer should not be the amassing of great wealth. The goal of poverty is to escape poverty by means of God's grace and by means of those principles of covenant-keeping discipleship that produce wealth. The goal is not to produce wealth for its own sake, but rather to enable the victim of poverty to escape, and then give God the credit for the escape.

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 84.

B. God's Covenantal Authority

This passage explicitly calls on God to deliver the poor person from his condition of poverty. The psalmist declares that God has the power to do this, so it would be foolish for a poor person not to call upon God to deliver him from a condition that is associated with Adam's curse. It is a curse when God removes the tools of dominion from a covenant-keeping person. One of the tools of dominion is capital. If a person cannot afford capital, he is restricted in his use of physical and conceptual tools of dominion.

The primary tools of deliverance out of poverty are not purchased in an open market. They include confidence regarding the future by means of the sovereignty of God and biblical law. There is also confidence that God brings positive sanctions to those who conform themselves to the standards of biblical law. These are matters of verbal confession and internal faith, not matters of competitive bidding in an open market. These are matters of faith, not matters of commerce. At the same time, these matters of faith can, do, and should affect the world of commerce.

Deuteronomy 28:1–14 assures us that covenant-keeping produces blessings in history. One of these blessings is increased wealth. "The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow" (v. 12). Deuteronomy 28:15–68 stands in contrast to the first section. This section lists the curses of God, and among these curses is poverty.

Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof: thine ass shall be violently taken away from before thy face, and shall not be restored to thee: thy sheep shall be given unto thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue them (v. 31).

Thou shalt plant vineyards, and dress them, but shalt neither drink of the wine, nor gather the grapes; for the worms shall eat them (v. 39).

All thy trees and fruit of thy land shall the locust consume (v. 42).

For a covenant-keeper to find himself in a condition of poverty is to find a reason to call upon God to deliver him. Poverty becomes a test of a covenant-keeper's commitment to the covenant. The covenant declares that a sovereign God rules the universe, and He governs the universe in terms of biblical law. When we call on God to deliver us from poverty, we implicitly call upon God to uphold His law. We call on Him to impose positive sanctions on acts of covenant-keeping. It is a call based on confidence that the universe is not impersonal, that it operates in terms of the biblical covenant, and that God, as absolutely sovereign, is capable of eradicating poverty in the life of anyone who conforms himself to the stipulations of the covenant.

The psalmist is declaring his faith that God does intervene in history to deliver His people from the curse of poverty. This is not a program of “think and grow rich.” On the contrary, it is a program that denies the legitimacy of thinking to grow rich. This program relies on a concept of a sovereign God who intervenes in history on behalf of His people. The psalmist finds himself in dire straits. He does not curse the dire straits; he praises God and calls upon God to deliver him from dire straits. He sees dire straits as an opportunity to call upon the God of the covenant to uphold the terms of His covenant and deliver him from the burden of poverty.

The passage calls upon God to intervene directly. This is not a call for national repentance. It is not a call for revolution. It is not a call for political action. It is simply a call for God to intervene and deliver the psalmist from the affliction of poverty. This is not pie in the sky by and by. This is an affirmation of the sovereignty of God. It is an affirmation that says that God is capable of intervening into the affairs of men to deliver covenant-keepers from the affliction of poverty.

C. Humanist Economics

Here we see a profound difference between biblical economics and humanist economics. Humanist economists call on men, not on God. Humanist economists see poverty as something to be avoided. They see it as something that should be overcome in history. They believe that specific programs will enable the bulk of people who are trapped in poverty to escape poverty over time. They do not call on God to deliver an individual poor person from dire straits. They believe that there are predictable patterns of behavior and specific social and political arrangements that will, over time, enable the vast majority of individuals to escape from poverty. So, they do not call upon God to intervene directly into the lives of the poor. They may call upon the state to intervene in specific areas, such as the enforcement of contracts, so that the innate creativity of individuals should be allowed to flourish.

Their goal is to reform individuals through the reform of civil institutions. Economists offer specific and competing programs of reform that are said to reduce the level of poverty per capita wherever these reforms are implemented. The Bible does not speak about such reforms. It speaks about the defense of property by means of laws against theft and violence. But the Bible does not make widespread deliverance from poverty one of its primary themes. The modern world does. The modern world therefore stands in contrast to the Bible's call for divine intervention. It calls for individuals to conform themselves to the standards of the marketplace or, in the case of socialism, to the standards of the central planners.

Humanist economics is impersonal economics. It does not affirm a sovereign God who has established specific laws and who threatens to impose specific negative sanctions for violations of these laws. Humanism's sovereign agent is man, either individual man in the case of free market economists, or else collective man in the case of socialist economists. In both cases, man is sovereign; God is not only not sovereign, He is rarely mentioned. He is analytically useless. He is to be dismissed by means of Occam's razor. He is not necessary to the hypothesis. He is extra baggage.

The psalmist says that God is the deliverer. This includes deliverance from poverty. He calls upon God to intervene in history to deliver him from the burden of poverty. This is a legitimate prayer. An individual wants to be delivered from poverty for multiple reasons, but the biblical reason, according to Jesus, is to seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness. All the other things, meaning the trappings of wealth, will be added by God in response to covenant-keeping and prayer (Matt 6:33).²

The goal is not "more for me in history." That is the confession of Mammon, not the confession of God. Man's goal should be to escape poverty for the sake of God's kingdom, not man's kingdom. His goal should also be to escape riches, for exactly the same reason. Biblical economics is theocentric, not anthropocentric. The universe revolves around God, not around man. He who forgets this risks poverty.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Pres, [2000] 2012), ch. 15.

Conclusion

A covenant-keeper should have confidence that poverty can be overcome. The conquest of poverty begins with an affirmation of the covenant. Specifically, it begins with a prayer to God for deliverance. It does not begin with a program of corporate reform—social, economic, or political.

16

GODLY RULE

He shall judge thy people with righteousness, and thy poor with judgment. The mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills, by righteousness. He shall judge the poor of the people, he shall save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor (Psalm 72:2–4).

The theocentric issue here is God as the judge. Psalm 72 is a messianic psalm. It begins with a description of the messianic ruler. This ruler exercises civil authority. He is not a priest. Or, if he is a priest, he is a priest who bears civil authority. The priesthood under the Mosaic law was associated with the tribe of Levi. The civil magistrate was associated with the tribe of Judah. Jacob prophesied: “The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be” (Gen. 49:10). Under the Mosaic law, the two offices were separate. In the New Covenant, the two offices belong to Jesus Christ. He is the fulfillment of Jacob’s prophecy. He is the Messiah; therefore, He is the head of both church and state.

A. Protector of the Poor

The ruler described in this passage is a righteous man. The psalmist specifically identifies the poor as the beneficiaries of his rulership. “He shall judge the poor of the people, he shall save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor” (v. 4). This is powerful language. Here is a judge who smashes to pieces all oppressors. Obviously, this is not to be taken literally. The messianic ruler does not put all oppressors into a deep freeze storage unit, and then use a hammer to smash them in pieces. The imagery is that of conquest. Another example of it in the Mosaic law is the term “rod of iron.” The rod of iron breaks to pieces all those who break covenant with the God of the Bible.

This may sound like a program of political reform. The passage could be used to promote state intervention to confiscate the wealth of anyone, merely because he is wealthy, to give to the poor. This interpretation does not do justice to the passage. The evil person described here is not said to be rich; he is said to be an oppressor. An oppressor, biblically speaking, is a person who misuses the civil government in order to achieve his own ends. He uses violence or the threat of violence by the government in order to benefit himself.¹ This is the mark of injustice. The individual described in this passage is a just ruler, and so he will smash oppressors.

One of the benefits of living under the rule of the Messiah will be peace. This is a condition of permanent peace. It will last as long as the moon endures (v. 5). This is a mark of a peaceful kingdom. It has never come to this earth so far. This is clearly a messianic psalm. It applies to some future era of kingdom righteousness.

Verse eight says that he shall have dominion. He will rule from sea to sea and from the river to the end of the earth. This is an affirmation of his universal dominion. This is dominion that expands across all of humanity. This is not a ruler who operates in one nation or one tribe. This ruler is king over all the earth. He exercises dominion across the whole face of the earth.²

The psalmist says that his enemies will lick the dust. This is a symbolic reference to their complete subordination. The language applies to a condition of universal justice and universal peace. This is not necessarily a one-world civil government, but it is clearly a one-world kingdom. It is government in the sense of jurisdiction from on high. The premillennialist argues that Jesus Christ will reappear bodily and exercise such judgment over an international bureaucratic system of law. The postmillennialist argues that this judgment comes through Christ's earthly representatives, in time and on earth. It is representative rule, not direct rule. The amillennialist says that God's judgment of covenant-breakers comes only at the end of time.

The other kings will bring him presents. This indicates universal dominion. There are other civil governments operating, but they are under the jurisdiction of the Messiah. The kings of the earth show that they are subordinate to the Messiah because they bring tokens of this subordination: presents. This is a form of political tribute, but it is a symbolic token of subordination. The amillennialist spiritualizes the passage, i.e., denies that it will ever come true in history.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

2. Kenneth Gentry, He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

The psalmist once again invokes the plight of the needy. This ruler will deliver the needy when the needy cry out for justice. The same is true of the poor, to the extent that a poor man economically is different from a needy person, whose need may be different from a lack of money. He delivers the poor person who has no helper. This indicates that the mark of a rich man is his employment of servants. This ruler will spare the poor and the needy. This means that he will deliver them from evildoers, men who had previously occupied positions of civil authority. He will redeem the souls of the poor from deceit and violence. This does not mean spiritual redemption. A civil ruler is not in a position to grant salvation as part of his office. He is in a position to protect them from deceit and violence; this is the mark of civil authority.

He will receive the gold of Sheba (v. 10). This was fulfilled specifically by Solomon (I Kings 10:10). Sheba is no more. Solomon was a righteous judge, but he did not rule across the face of the earth. He did not rule from sea to sea. What he did was representative of what the messianic ruler will do when he exercises universal authority.

This was the final prayer of David the son of Jesse (v. 20). He had been a king, so he knew the responsibilities of exercising civil authority. He knew the pitfalls. He was asserting his confidence that there will be a king greater than he in the future.

Conclusion

Godly rule involves enforcing biblical law on all violators. The poor, when victims, are entitled to justice in the courts. A godly ruler will impose God's laws without consideration of the wealth of the citizens. The courts will be predictable. This is the rule of law.³

3. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 50.

THE SLIPPERY SLOPE

For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men (Psalm 73:2–4).

A. Why Evil Men Prosper

Psalm 73 speaks to the issue of why evil men prosper. Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 present a different picture. They begin with a relatively short list of blessings that come to covenant-keepers. Both spend most of the chapter dealing with curses that come to covenant-breakers. What bothers the psalmist here is that covenant-breakers seem to prosper, while covenant-keepers do not.

The importance of this psalm is that it returns at the end to the framework described in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. The psalmist concludes that he had been foolish for paying attention to the success of covenant-breakers. He says that their success is in fact a trap set by God to ensnare them. He uses the phrase “slippery places” (v. 18). He sees the prosperity of the wicked as a trap established by God in order to confirm His covenant.

The psalmist says that foolish and wicked people do not experience trouble as other men do (v. 5). They are not plagued with the same sorts of crises. He is speaking here about rich people. But most people in history are not rich. In every society ever studied, a relatively small percentage of the population owns most of the capital goods. This is called the Pareto 20/80 rule. It was discovered by sociologist-economist Vilfredo Pareto in the late nineteenth century. He published his findings in 1897. There have been no exceptions to his description of the distribution of capital in every Western, industrial society.

The majority of foolish and wicked people remain poor. They do not get rich. The ones who do get rich become the focus of concern for people who are distressed by the fact that covenant-breaking seems to prosper. Covenant-keepers want to believe that our world is governed by a sovereign God who rewards covenant-keeping and punishes covenant-breaking. This is taught explicitly in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

The psalmist says in verse 12 that the ungodly prosper in this world. They increase in riches. In verse 13, he says that he cleanses his heart in vain. He has washed his hands in innocency. In verse 14, he says that he has been plagued and chastened every morning. In verse 16, he says that the knowledge of this was painful to him. This led him into the sanctuary of God, and there he understood the end of covenant-breakers (v. 17).

In the language of the King James Version, God has set these people in slippery places. He casts them down into destruction (v. 18). God actively intervenes to destroy them. Ours is not a universe governed by cosmic impersonalism. It is a universe governed by a sovereign God who upholds His law by bringing sanctions against those who break it. In verse 19, the psalmist says that these people are brought to desolation in a moment. They become consumed with terror. The picture here is of a person who is flying high and then crashes. There is almost no interval between the high flying and the crashing.

B. Out of Darkness

In verse 21, he says that his heart had been grieved. The reason his heart had been grieved was that he was foolish. He admits this in verse 22. He says that he was as a beast before God. In other words, he was completely ignorant. He did not understand the full operations of covenantal cause and effect. He implies that he was deceived by the same deception with which God deceives the covenant-breakers.

The psalmist was upset initially because he accepted the description of ethical cause and effect that Moses presented in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. He did not understand that God actively intervenes in history to deceive covenant-breakers. God is willing to allow them to prosper for season, only to bring them down without warning in a moment. Their productivity and their success keep them from acknowledging that their blessings come only from the hand of God. God takes this arrogance and uses it against them. They make a mistake. They do not see a disaster coming. They are blind to what is about to overtake them, because they are blind to the ethical cause-and-effect nature of human affairs.

The psalmist is warning covenant-keepers not to make the same mistake that covenant-breakers are deliberately led to believe by God. It is not that God merely allows them to make these mistakes. The psalmist says, “Surely thou didst set them in slippery places.” This is a deliberate policy of God to keep people from understanding the truth of their own situation. It is deliberate on God’s part that these people not see that they have been placed in slippery places.

The psalmist then praises God. He says that God has held him by his right hand. He affirms that God will guide him with counsel and afterward receive him to glory. In other words, he affirms what Moses declares in the early sections of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. What had confused him for a time no longer confuses him. It seemed as though the covenantal cause-and-effect structure of human affairs was being violated by the success of covenant-breakers. No longer is the psalmist confused. He sees now that it is all a part of God’s plan. God specifically sets up covenant-breakers in positions of authority and wealth, only to tear them down later.

God does tell people about the nature of His cause-and-effect system of governing. But when people suppress the truth in unrighteousness, which the apostle Paul says that they do (Rom. 1:18), this suppression leads to their destruction. God sees that these people will not accept the truth, and so He uses positive sanctions in order to lower them into decisions that will produce negative sanctions. He raises them up in order to tear them down.

Few Christians view God in this way. They view Him as laying down the law and then standing aside to see what people will do. The psalmist asserts the opposite. He says that God sets people up—people who do not deserve to be raised to positions of wealth and influence. God does this deliberately to trick them, so that they will not see the disaster that is heading for them.

Isaiah said the same thing about presenting the prophetic message to the Israelites.

Also I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I; send me. And he said, Go, and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed (Isa. 6:8–10).

Jesus quoted this in Matthew 13 in answer to the question from the apostles about why He spoke in parables. He told them that He spoke in parables so that the Israelites would not understand what He was saying and therefore repent.

Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. But blessed are your eyes, for they see: and your ears, for they hear (Matt. 13:13–16).

The Apostle Paul cited Isaiah when he spoke to the Jews for the last time, at the end of the Book of Acts. Some believed his message; some did not.

And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word, Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers, Saying, Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive: For the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it. And when he had said these words, the Jews departed, and had great reasoning among themselves (Acts 28:25–29).

Again, this is not how most people, especially Christians, view the way that God deals with covenant-breakers. Yet it is how God has said He deals with them. It is how the psalmist said God deals with them. I think a wise conclusion is that this is the way He deals with them.

This is why we should not be concerned by the fact that covenant-breakers prosper more than covenant-keepers. The success of covenant-breakers is not only temporary, it is a trap. The positive sanctions that they receive from God are in fact disguised negative sanctions.

These accumulate over time, and they produce failure.

We can therefore have confidence that the world is governed by a system of ethical cause and effect. This is not an impersonal system of causation; it is a system actively governed by God. So actively is it governed by God, that God sometimes allows what appears to be a violation of His system of ethical cause and effect. Yet, in the end, it is not a violation of the system; it is an affirmation of the system.

Conclusion

Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 were the background for the psalmist's concern over the economic success of the wicked. He learned in the sanctuary that God had not abandoned the covenantal system described in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. Not only does God still enforce it, He uses it against covenant-breakers. He sets them up by abandoning this structure of causation for a time, only to spring the covenantal trap on them without warning. Causation is not ethically random. It is not covenantally random. It is covenantally structured. He who argues otherwise must reject this psalm, either as it applied in the Old Covenant or in the New Covenant. He must reject its relevance in the New Covenant era. I ask: On what basis? I also ask: Are all the psalms equally irrelevant in terms of historical causation? If not, why not? I suggest that you also ask anyone who rejects this psalm's conclusions regarding historical causation. See if the answer is better than this: "Because I just don't like the idea of historical causation being both providential and covenantal. That would make me responsible for lots of things that I prefer to ignore. I don't want any extra responsibilities. I would prefer even fewer."

18

PROTECTING THE WEAK

Have respect unto the covenant: for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. O let not the oppressed return ashamed: let the poor and needy praise thy name (Psalm 74:20–21).

A. A Call for Sanctions

The theocentric issue here is God as a judge. Psalm 74 is in the form of a lamentation. The psalmist declares that evildoers have been oppressing the entire society. They have gotten into power, and they are ruthless in tearing down all traces of God's covenant. They have broken up the carved work of skilled craftsmen (v. 6). They have cast fire into the sanctuary (v. 7), presumably meaning that they have burned down local synagogues (v. 8). They have defiled sanctuaries and synagogues wherever the name of God was being honored. They are systematic in this. They work together to burn down all traces of worship.

At the same time, God has removed all prophets from the land. No one is present who can forecast how long these evil actions will go on.

The psalmist asks God how long the adversaries of God will be able to reproach God (v. 10). Shall the enemy blaspheme God's name forever (v. 10)? It is clear the psalmist does not believe this is possible. These are rhetorical questions that are designed to persuade God to take action to defend His name.

The psalmist is concerned that God's sanctions are being withheld. The evildoers are getting more powerful, and righteous people are being ever-more oppressed. So, he asks God rhetorically: "Why withdrawest thou thy hand, even thy right hand? pluck it out of thy bosom" (v. 11). He declares that God is his king of old, who works salvation in the midst of the earth (v. 12).

He then describes God's deliverances in the past. God divided the sea by His strength (v. 13). This refers to the parting of the Red Sea. He says that He broke the heads of dragons in the waters. In other words, God is all-powerful. He controls nature. He controls the flood and the rain (v. 15). Everything belongs to God, night and day (v. 16).

Foolish people have blasphemed God's name, he reminds God. The enemy has reproached God (v. 18). By recounting these sins, the psalmist expects to persuade God to take action on His own behalf.

B. Invoking the Poor

He then invokes the poor. He speaks of the congregation of the poor. Then he reminds God to have respect for His covenant. Why? Because "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty" (20). This means that evil deeds are being practiced on a widespread basis.

Then he calls on God not to let the oppressed return ashamed. He says to let the poor and needy praise God's name (v. 21). Why should the poor and needy praise God's name? Because of the intervention of God in history on their behalf. Again, the psalmist is attempting to persuade God to enter the affairs of men and impose the sanctions of His covenant on evildoers. The psalm has no relevance if there is no covenant or if the covenant does not promise that God will impose positive sanctions on covenant-keepers and negative sanctions on covenant-breakers. If the covenant has no historical sanctions, the arguments used by the psalmist are irrelevant.

He calls on God to arise and plead His own cause (v. 22). This is an appeal to the sovereignty of God: point one of the biblical covenant.¹ Foolish people are reproaching Him every day. This should be sufficient cause for God to enforce the terms of His covenant.

The psalm ends with a request: "Forget not the voice of mine enemies: the tumult of those that rise up against the increase is continually" (v. 23). There seems to be nothing that can stop these people from continually challenging God. The only thing that can stop them is God. The psalmist therefore uses rhetoric and logic to persuade God to invoke the sanctions that His covenant promises.

Then the psalmist invokes the poor and the needy. He believes that God will defend the poor and the needy. God has respect for the weak people in His covenants. The covenants are filled with people of all income levels and wealth. The psalmist knows that God is especially concerned about the welfare of the poor and the needy. God recognizes that they are defenseless. They are easily oppressed. The psalmist reminds God that oppression is going on, and that in order to defend the poor and the needy, God will have to intervene into the affairs of men.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

Conclusion

This psalm places the oppressed, the poor, and the needy at the forefront. The psalmist believes that God is especially concerned about these defenseless people. By appealing to God's sense of justice to act on their behalf, the psalmist seeks to reverse the power of oppressors, blasphemers, and scoffers.

MIRACLES AND DISCONTENTMENT

He brought streams also out of the rock, and caused waters to run down like rivers. And they sinned yet more against him by provoking the most High in the wilderness. And they tempted God in their heart by asking meat for their lust. Yea, they spake against God; they said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? Behold, he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed; can he give bread also? can he provide flesh for his people (Psalm 78:16–20)?

The theocentric issue here is God as the sanctions-bringer. The psalmist's account of the manna in the wilderness provides a good summary of events that seem difficult to explain. Liberal theologians have difficulties explaining the existence of the manna. What the psalmist refers to as angels' food (v. 25), at least one liberal theologian has described as insect excrement of two species: one in the mountains and the other in the lowlands.¹ This surely is a major difference of interpretation.

A. Ungrateful Israel

What seems difficult to believe in retrospect is the lack of gratitude on the part of the Israelites. Moses told the generation of the inheritance that they and their parents had wandered through the wilderness by means of a series of miracles. Their feet did not swell. Their clothing did not wear out. They were given manna to eat (Deut. 8:3–4). Yet, during the early phase of the wandering, Israel complained about the lack of meat.

And the mixt multitude that was among them fell a lusting; and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat? We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlic: But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes (Num. 11:4–6).

1. F. S. Bodenheimer, "The Manna of Sinai," The Biblical Archeologist, X (Feb. 1947); reprinted in G. Ernest Wright and David Noel Freedman (eds.), The Biblical Archeological Reader (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, 1961), pp. 76–79.

The Israelites had highly selective memories regarding their life in Egypt. They had been slaves. These complaints indicated that life was really rather good in Egypt by comparison. Forgotten were their pleas to God to be delivered (Ex. 3:7–8).

And the LORD said, I have surely seen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their taskmasters; for I know their sorrows; And I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land unto a good land and a large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey; unto the place of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites (Ex. 3:7–8).

God gave them meat: the flesh of birds. They ate to their fill. “And while the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed, the wrath of the LORD was kindled against the people, and the LORD smote the people with a very great plague” (Num. 11:33). God set them up. Then He tore them down.

B. Discontented Israel

In this passage, the psalmist describes their mental attitude. They were not content with water from a rock. They asked whether or not God could provide bread by means of the manna. God provided bread. The people then asked rhetorically, “Can He provide flesh for His people?” Whatever God provided by means of an astounding miracle, the Israelites dismissed as barely worth talking about. They wanted more. They were not going to be content with less. “Therefore the Lord heard this, and was wroth: so a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came against Israel” (v. 21).

1. Unbelief

Why was God so angry with them? “Because they believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation” (v. 22). But who did they imagine had performed miracles of deliverance and miracles of maintenance? They had already revealed what they believed in: the gods represented by the golden calf.

They saw that a series of miracles were sustaining them. Nevertheless, they judged God as being tight-fisted, because they could not get all of what they wanted exactly when they wanted it. They were dissatisfied with whatever it was that God had provided.

This outlook is common to mankind in most societies. Men grow accustomed to whatever it is that they possess, and they are discontented about all that they do not possess. They are not satisfied with what they own; they are dissatisfied because of what they do not own. Man becomes accustomed to whatever he possesses, and he seeks even more. Man cannot be satiated. His wants are unbounded.

2. Economic Theory

The fact that a man's wants are infinite is one of the foundational principles of free market economics. This infinitude of wants is compared with the finitude of supply. At zero price, there is greater demand than supply. This is a fundamental law of economics. The discrepancy between men's wants and their possessions is at the heart of the economists' concept of scarcity.

God understood that this attitude of the Israelites pointed to rebellion against Him. They tempted Him verbally, implying that He was incapable of producing that which they did not yet possess. They rated God's performance, not by His miracles and the plenitude of what they possessed in a barren wilderness, but rather by what they did not yet possess. They did not see God as being great in providing them with abundance in the midst of a barren wilderness. They saw God as being half a god because He had not yet provided them with more than they remembered as having possessed in Egypt. They looked back to Egypt, and they invented a mental picture of a world of abundance which, as slaves, they had not enjoyed. This also made them discontented.

It was not just that the Israelites were insatiable. It was the fact that they dismissed God's provisioning of them as evidence of a god who is less than omnipotent. The Israelites were trapped by the religion of Mammon (Matt. 6:24–25).² The confession of faith of a dedicated Mammonite is this: more for me in history. Despite the fact that they were wandering in the wilderness, the Israelites were convinced that God owed them far more than He had provided. They looked at the manna, they tasted the manna, and they concluded that it was just too plain to meet their standards. "But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes" (Num. 11:6). They wanted meat. God gave them meat, in the form of birds. Then He brought a plague on them (Num. 11:33).

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

The religion of Mammon produces discontented people. This discontentment can be a powerful motivating force in the quest for greater wealth. This, in turn, leads to entrepreneurship. The way to profit in a free market economy is to provide goods and services to people who have the right to search elsewhere. Ludwig von Mises put discontentment at the heart of his theory of economics. It is because men are discontented, Mises argued, that they strive to better themselves, and in so doing, create wealth.³ The Israelites were not interested in entrepreneurship; they were interested in complaining. They believed that complaining against God's lack of provision for them was an efficient means of humiliating God, thereby persuading Him to provide more goods and services free of charge. They implied that God did not measure up to their expectations. God may have been doing the best He could, but it was clear to the Israelites that they had committed themselves to a God with limited power.

3. Ethical Rebellion

God understood what was in their hearts. He understood that this was a rejection of Him. "Because they believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation" (v. 22), He brought negative sanctions against them.

The psalmist is warning his readers and listeners not to imagine that God is any less than the God of the creation just because He has not yet answered their prayers. He praises God early in this psalm. He says that God did mighty things in the sight of their fathers (v. 12). He divided the sea to let them pass through (v. 13). He led them with a cloud during the day and fire during the night (v. 14). He gave them water out of rocks (v. 15). There was no justification for discontentment regarding God's provision of His people. Complaints against God are a form of rebellion (v. 17).

The psalmist is not just saying that rebellion was common in Israel because of the supposed discrepancy between what the Israelites wanted and what God provided for them. The psalmist is saying that God is capable of providing every need and every want of everyone. He is the Creator and therefore the Owner of all the earth. Discontentment regarding whatever God has provided is a form of rebellion, and it leads to God's negative sanctions in history. Discontentment against God is not productive. It brings people under judgment; it does not lead to their enrichment.

3. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 1, Sec. 2. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

Complaining was a continuing mistake of the Israelites in the wilderness. They acknowledged that God had provided for them, but they also implied that God had not fulfilled His end of the bargain. He had not sustained them in luxury in the wilderness. So, they kept raising rhetorical questions about God's ability to improve His performance on the job.

The psalmist knew that this attitude is basic to mankind. He wrote this psalm in order to warn men not to indulge in the sins of the forefathers.

Conclusion

The Israelites in the wilderness provoked God by calling into question His level of commitment to them and His ability to deliver the goods. They believed that God could be manipulated through guilt. They were incorrect. They paid a heavy price for this error. "They were not estranged from their lust. But while their meat was yet in their mouths, The wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them, and smote down the chosen men of Israel" (vv. 30–31). Even then, they did not learn. "For all this they sinned still, and believed not for his wondrous works" (v. 32).

20

CLOSED MOUTHS, CLOSED EARS

I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt: open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it. But my people would not hearken to my voice; and Israel would none of me (Psalm 81:10–11).

The theocentric issue here is God as the sanctions-bringer. The psalmist uses a peculiar set of contrasting images: mouth and ears. He says that God would have filled the open mouths of the Israelites if they had listened to Him. Open mouths are filled with food. The text says that God would have actively filled the mouths of His people, had His people listened to him, but they did not listen to Him. The contrast is between the negative sanctions of God and ethical rebellion against the law of God. This is the contrast that Moses revealed in the later sections of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

A. Honey in the Rock

When the Israelites refused to listen to God, meaning that they refused to obey biblical law, God gave them over to their own lust (v. 12). He refused to intervene to drag them back to ethical conformity to the Mosaic law. So, they walked in their own counsels. They decided which laws to obey or not obey. If they had obeyed God, he says, He would have subdued their enemies and turned His hand against their adversaries (v. 14). He would have given them victory. But, rather than choosing victory, they chose to walk in their own counsels. They preferred to exercise what they perceived as their autonomy.

Then comes a strangely worded revelation. “He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat: and with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee” (v. 16). What is peculiar about this verse is that the psalmist speaks of God in the first clause, and then God speaks as God in the second. The message is consistent. Had they obeyed God, God would have fed them with the finest wheat. To sweeten that wheat, He would have given them honey out of the rock. The phrase, “honey out of the rock,” refers back to Deuteronomy. Moses described God’s deliverance of Canaan into their hands. He spoke (sang) of Israel in the past tense. This was prophecy, not history. Israel had not yet captured Canaan.

He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and he made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock; Butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat; and thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape. But Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked: thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness; then he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation. They provoked him to jealousy with strange gods, with abominations provoked they him to anger. They sacrificed unto devils, not to God; to gods whom they knew not, to new gods that came newly up, whom your fathers feared not (Deut. 32:13–17).

Israel would turn its back on God, Moses said. The psalmist verifies that this had already happened.

B. Predictable Outcomes

This psalm rests on the ethical cause-and-effect system that is presented in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. The psalmist reminds listeners that God is predictable. He is a predictable because He honors the terms of His covenants. His covenants are governed by laws that He has revealed to His covenant people. He enforces these laws by external sanctions. Because He conforms Himself to His covenants, it is possible for covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers to make sense of the world around them (Deut. 4:5–8).¹

Because God’s covenants provide predictability in the social order, people can pursue their goals with confidence that they can attain their goals, just so long as their goals are consistent with God’s covenants. If they obey His laws, He will bless their efforts. This makes it possible for them to comprehend social cause and effect. They can achieve their goals because they understand social cause and effect.

The economic goal that is mentioned by the psalmist is related to food. God would have filled their mouths if they had obeyed His law.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

He would have fed them the best wheat and sweetened it with honey if they had obeyed His laws. Because they were disobedient, they did not enjoy low-cost, high-quality food. They walked away from wealth. The means of wealth, according to the psalmist, is to hearken to the word of God. If men will listen to God and obey what they hear, they will prosper.

There are still traces of this worldview in folk wisdom. Benjamin Franklin is famous for the phrase, “honesty is the best policy.” Honesty is the best policy because we live in a world governed by biblical law. God’s law repeatedly calls men to honesty. It also says that those who obey biblical law will prosper. This is the unstated theological foundation of Franklin’s confident assertion that honesty is the best policy. There is ethical causation in this world.

The covenantal goal of obedience is the extension of the kingdom of God in history. This is why God says that if the Israelites had hearkened to His word, He would have suppressed their enemies. This is another way of saying that He would have extended His kingdom in history. That would have been advantageous to Him, and it would have been advantageous to the Israelites. They would have been the head, and their enemies would have been the tail. This is promised in Deuteronomy 28. “And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them” (Deut. 28:13).²

Covenant-keepers can have confidence in the promise of God that He will uphold His people when they are obedient to Him. This is the way to wealth. *We do not live in a world governed by impersonal forces. We live in a world governed by an absolutely sovereign God.*³ This God covenants with His people, promising them to uphold their cause if they uphold His laws. There is positive feedback between obedience and prosperity. There is also negative feedback between disobedience and poverty. This is why the enemies of God can become the head, and covenant-keepers become the tail. This also is taught in Deuteronomy 28. “He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail” (Deut. 28:44).⁴

2. Ibid., ch. 70.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

4. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 70.

The psalmist upholds the ethical cause-and-effect system that was presented in the Mosaic law. This psalm makes no sense apart from the Mosaic law. Anyone in the New Testament era who quotes this psalm, believing that it applies to him and his household, has imported the covenantal structure of the Mosaic law, whether or not he believes that the Mosaic law is still in force. This psalm and the system of sanctions in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 are inseparable. To attempt to separate them is futile. It would mean invoking this psalm without invoking the system of ethical cause and effect that is presented in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. To import this psalm into the New Covenant era, while denying the legitimacy and continuing authority of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28, is an act of theological schizophrenia.

Conclusion

The psalmist says that God was ready to feed His people with the best food. They rebelled against Him, so He did not treat them with the degree of favor that He would have shown to them. Moses in his song had prophesied that this would happen. This psalm rests on the presupposition that the corporate sanctions in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28 are still in force. There is continuity of biblical law and its corporate sanctions. This psalm makes no sense if the sanctions are no longer in force.

21

EXPLOITATION AND DELIVERANCE

A Psalm of Asaph. God standeth in the congregation of the mighty; he judgeth among the gods. How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked? Selah. Defend the poor and fatherless: do justice to the afflicted and needy. Deliver the poor and needy: rid them out of the hand of the wicked (Psalm 82:1–3).

Psalm 82 is a psalm of judgment. The psalmist calls upon God to intervene in the affairs of men and bring justice to the nation.

A. Civil Magistrates

The psalm begins with a description of God, who stands in the midst of the congregation of the mighty. “He judgeth among the gods.” The meaning of gods here is civil magistrates. The Hebrew word, elo-him, is usually translated God or gods. Not in this passage. “I have said, Ye are gods; and all of you are children of the most High. But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes” (Psalm 82:6–7).

God stands in the midst of the judges, and He calls them to account: “How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked” (v. 2)? What does it mean “to accept the persons of the wicked”? It means to show partiality to the wicked.

Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God’s: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it (Deut. 1:17).¹

For the LORD your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward (Deut. 10:17).

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 4.

Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous (Deut. 16:19).²

B. Defend the Poor

Then God issues a command: “Defend the poor and the fatherless: do justice to the afflicted and needy” (v. 3). This was a requirement of the Mosaic law. The Mosaic law recognized that judges sometimes favor one group against another. The Mosaic law forbade judges from rendering judgment that is based on someone’s group membership. Each individual case is to be judged in terms of what the law says regarding the accusation. “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour” (Lev. 19:15).³

Then God says, “Deliver the poor and needy: rid them out of the hand of the wicked” (v. 4). This describes a poor person as being subjected to someone who is breaking the Mosaic law. The hand of the wicked has captured righteous people. The task of civil government is to see to it that justice is done by the rich and the poor to the rich and the poor. These wicked people walk in darkness (v. 3).

The psalmist says, “the foundations of the earth are out of course.” This is not to be taken as a statement regarding astrophysics. It is a statement regarding the foundations of morality in Israel. It has to do with the exercise of judgment by covenantal institutions. When judges render false judgment, the earth is ready to be shaken. Of the king of Babylon, Isaiah prophesied:

They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms; That made the world as a wilderness, and destroyed the cities thereof; that opened not the house of his prisoners? (Isa. 14:16–17).

The foundations are not literal, any more than God’s nose is literal.

Then the earth shook and trembled; the foundations of heaven moved and shook, because he was wroth. There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured: coals were kindled

2. Ibid., ch. 40.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 14.

by it. He bowed the heavens also, and came down; and darkness was under his feet. And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly: and he was seen upon the wings of the wind (II Sam. 22:8–11).

The psalmist says, “Arise, O God, judge the earth: for thou shalt inherit all nations” (v. 8). This is a call for God to exercise His sovereignty in history. The justification of this exercise of sovereignty is that He is the inheritor of the nations. The nations belong to God. He is their creator, and so He has the right of inheritance.

The psalmist speaks in the name of God. God calls the judges to render judgment righteously. The complaint is against the judges. This psalm is about civil judgment. This is why the references to the need for defense of the poor and fatherless are in the context of civil unrighteousness. The civil government has been misusing the power of the state to render judgments that are opposed to basic morality. These judgments have the force of law. God, who brings covenant lawsuits against covenant-breakers, calls the judges of Israel to render judgment righteously, without respect to persons.

Conclusion

This is not a psalm that favors wealth redistribution from the poor to the rich. It favors wealth redistribution from those who have misused the civil government to exploit the poor. Their victims are to be compensated. It is a call on civil judges to deliver the victims of oppression. Oppression in the Mosaic law involved the misuse of civil law to afflict people.⁴

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

A LAND FOR GOD'S LAW

And gave them the lands of the heathen: and they inherited the labour of the people; That they might observe his statutes, and keep his laws. Praise ye the LORD (Psalm 105:44–45).

A. Canaan as Israel's Inheritance

The psalmist calls Canaan an inheritance. It was an inheritance through disinheritance. This is the theocentric issue.

The psalmist refers to the inheritance of the labor of the people. He did not mean that they would inherit labor in the form of slaves. On the contrary, they were not supposed to take any slaves of the people of the land. Only because the Gibeonites deceived them, and only because Israel's civil rulers made a covenant with the Gibeonites in the name of God, did God allow the Gibeonites to remain in the land (Josh. 9). So, the psalmist was speaking of capital goods: vineyards, orchards, buildings, and tools. This indicates that he understood what modern economists have insisted on, namely, that capital is the product of land plus labor over time.¹

The labor which the Canaanites had invested in the land produced capital. This capital became the property of the Israelites. This was their inheritance. It was an inheritance transferred by violence. It was the lawful and ethically mandatory transfer of what the Canaanites had intended to be their inheritance. God disinherited the Canaanites by means of extermination. Everything they had built in the name of their gods was to be transferred to the Israelites in the name of their God.

This is the model for the final judgment. The final transfer of the inheritance is by violence. This is the ultimate violence. "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. 20:14–15).

1. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 5:4. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

B. Confiscation in the Name of God

The psalmist says that God gave them the lands of the heathen. Yet we also know that they confiscated the lands of the heathen. This confiscation by military violence was authorized by God. He gave them the land, but the means by which they extended their dominion over the land was military. The conquest generation was told to exterminate every heathen in the land.

When the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and mightier than thou; And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them: Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son. For they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods: so will the anger of the LORD be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly. But thus shall ye deal with them; ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire. For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God: the LORD thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth (Deut. 7:1–6).

Anyone else remaining in the land was there only because the Israelites failed to do the job of confessional cleansing. It is clear in the Old Testament that God required this. Confessional cleansing was not an option; it was a command directly from God. They were to make no covenants of any kind with them, including a peace treaty. Only by deception did the Gibeonites successfully arrange a treaty with the Israelites. The price of that treaty was permanent servitude of the entire nation of the Gibeonites. They served as temple servants, cutting wood and carrying water (Josh. 9:3–17). Joshua announced to them,

Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall none of you be freed from being bondmen, and hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God. And they answered Joshua, and said, Because it was certainly told thy servants, how that the LORD thy God commanded his servant Moses to give you all the land, and to destroy all the inhabitants of the land from before you, therefore we were sore afraid of our lives because of you, and have done this thing (Josh. 9:23–24).

This indicates that the Gibeonites fully understood what God planned for all of Canaan. They decided to avoid the looming genocide. They were successful.

C. Headquarters

The psalmist tells us one reason for giving the Promised Land to the heirs of Abraham. He was establishing a land in which there could be no excuse for anyone who failed to worship the God of the Bible in public places. He was establishing headquarters for the extension of His worldwide kingdom. He was establishing a place where all the people in the land who were covenanted to Him would be allowed to observe His statutes. They would fall under negative civil sanctions for not observing His statutes. God was setting up a theocratic, exclusivist, geographically identifiable region on earth in which He, and He alone, would be worshiped publicly. He was establishing a place in which the heathen would play no covenantal role whatsoever.

There was to be no rival God inside the geographical boundaries of the Promised Land. The inheritance was to be established covenantally under the God of the Bible. He was unwilling to tolerate any rival inheritance in the Promised Land. Only within the households of resident aliens could another god be worshiped. This is never stated in the Mosaic law, but it is clear that certain resident aliens, called in Hebrew nokree, were not covenant-keepers. They were not allowed to proselytize. But there is no indication that God authorized the civil government to bring sanctions inside the households of resident aliens regarding their worship. This worship had to stay inside their households. Even here, I am making the supposition only on the basis of silence. There is no law found in the Mosaic law that would give the state the right to enter the homes of covenant-breakers and execute them for worshiping a God that they had not been publicly forced to renounce when moving into the Promised Land.

The modern world, including modern Christianity, finds this story of genocide an embarrassment—a stain on the covenantal inheritance.

But there was a reason for genocide. The reason is given in verse 45. “The land was given to them by God that they might observe his statutes and keep his laws.” So important was it to God that the Israelites keep His laws that He commanded them to exterminate everybody in Canaan, without mercy, in order to clear the judicial decks. This command, if obeyed, would reduce the likelihood that the Israelites would be lured into worshipping foreign gods inside what had been the land of Canaan.

God wanted an absolute monopoly over the legal system of Israel. To gain this monopoly, He told the Israelites that they had to exterminate all of the Canaanites, tear down all of the idols, and not worship the gods of the land. God was so jealous about Himself that He tolerated no other legal order inside the boundaries of the Promised Land.

By adhering to the Mosaic law inside Israel, the Israelites were supposed to develop mastery of God’s tool of dominion: biblical law. They were to master the biblical art of casuistry: the application of the Ten Commandments and the case laws of Exodus² to specific situations. Under the Old Covenant order, this required a monopoly over the civil law. The land of Israel was to become a kind of judicial laboratory for biblical law. The experiment failed because of the Israelites’ lack of faith. This began at the time of the conquest.

Yet the children of Manasseh could not drive out the inhabitants of those cities; but the Canaanites would dwell in that land. Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute; but did not utterly drive them out (Josh. 17:12–13).

After Israel’s return from captivity, they never again were called by God to extend His kingdom through military conquest. They never again had control over civil law as an independent nation.

Conclusion

The issue here is inheritance. Biblical inheritance is to be comprehensive, universal, and exclusive. This refers to the final judgment in the final inheritance/disinheritance. But, over time, progressive sanctification is will lead to the extension of the kingdom of God in history. This kingdom will extend God’s influence in history into every area of life. Wherever sin reigns, the gospel will invade. There are no sanctuaries for covenant-breaking in the New Testament.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

There is no exclusive geographical kingdom of God in the New Testament. There is no place of refuge, no sanctuary, that is exclusively governed by God and His people. The inheritance is supposed to be gained by means of evangelism. The goal is to bring covenant-keepers to saving faith in Jesus Christ, thereby appropriating their inheritance in the name of the God of the Bible. Inheritance and this inheritance are confessional issues. There is no comparable inheritance given by means of military action in the New Covenant.

23

LEAN-SOULED PEOPLE

And he gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul (Psalm 106:15).

God is the judge. These words are among the most powerful in the Bible. The psalmist describes the spiritual condition of the Israelites immediately following their deliverance from the Egyptians at the Red Sea. For a brief time, they saw what God had done, and they trusted in His words. “And the waters covered their enemies: there was not one of them left. Then believed they His words; they sang his praise” (vv. 11–12). In the next verse, the psalmist says that they lost all recollection of His works. As a result, they ceased to wait on His counsel (v. 13).

A. The Demand for More

They departed from faith and adopted rebellion. They “lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God in the desert” (v. 14). These were discontented people. They continually asked God for more. They had adopted the religion described by Jesus as the religion of Mammon (Matt. 6:24–25).¹ The confession of faith of the followers of Mammon is this: “More for me in history.” With this as background, we can better understand the words of the psalmist: “He gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul.”

This description of the followers of Mammon is applicable in every culture in history. The followers of Mammon are concerned about what they have and what they do not have. What they have never satisfies them. What they do not have always agitates them. They are obsessed with more. By its very nature, more cannot be satisfied. It is open-ended. It is a treadmill of discontent leading to greater discontent.

1. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

B. The Price of More

The psalmist describes a contrast. On the one hand, God gave them their request. He gave them more because they asked for more. But He did not give them more at zero price. He sent leanness into their souls. This is another way of saying that, as they became richer in terms of goods, they became poorer in terms of life. The meaning of soul in this passage is not confined to that portion of man that survives the death of the body. It is broader than this. It has to do with life itself. The soul in this sense defines the individual. The soul identifies the person's dreams, hopes, priorities, and sense of well-being.

When a person asks himself "How am I doing?" there are two ways of answering this question. First, he can look at what he has accumulated. He can assess how well he is doing by means of success indicators. He can look at the size of his house, the size of his income, the size of his bank account, or the size of his company. In modern America, the single greatest manifestation of great wealth is invisibility from the highway. A person who owns so much urban land that his house is not visible from the street is an extremely wealthy person. Ironically, it is the inability of his neighbors to see how much he possesses that is the mark of a man who possesses great wealth. His servants recognize his wealth; his peers recognize wealth; but the general public does not. The fact that he has servants is also indicative of great wealth. The average person has labor-saving machinery. The wealthy man has labor-saving machinery and a full-time staff to use this machinery in his service.

There is another way of answering the question. When he wants to know how well he is doing, a person focuses on his own soul. He focuses on his sense of accomplishment. He goes to the inner core of his being, and then he assesses the relationship between what he has dreamed about, what he has planned for, what he has worked for, and what he has actually achieved. The psalmist recognizes that an individual can accumulate possessions and nevertheless have a sense of leanness in his soul. Even worse, a person can be so lean in his soul that he does not perceive that his life is a failure. This was Jesus' point in his parable of the rich man who tore down his barns and built new barns to hold all of the grain he expected to accumulate. He died that night. Jesus referred to him as a fool (Luke 12:15–21).²

The psalmist says that while the Israelites were granted what they wanted from God, God extracted payment from them by sending leanness into their souls. The psalmist is clear about God as the source of this leanness. It was not that God removed fullness; it was that He sent leanness. God imposed a negative sanction on them. This negative sanction affected the core of their being. Their lives were worth less in direct proportion to their possessions, which were worth more. What they gained in marketable wealth they paid for in a loss of contentment. As they accumulated wealth, they found themselves increasingly dissatisfied. This was the problem of the exodus generation. It began at the time that Moses and Aaron announced God's deliverance. At first, they rejoiced. But as soon as Pharaoh imposed negative sanctions on them for disobedience, the elders of Israel criticized Moses because they believed the Pharaoh would impose additional negative sanctions on them (Ex. 5:21). They did not want deliverance on these terms.

They did not want deliverance on any available terms. They continually complained to Moses that God had brought them into the wilderness to kill them. No matter what God did to demonstrate His care for them, they insisted that He had not done enough. They repeatedly asked: "What have you done for us lately?" They were obsessed by what they perceived as a discrepancy. They overestimated their own importance, and they underestimated the value of their deliverance. Their ability to assess value was crippled.

They were former slaves who were being called on by God to conquer Canaan and build a civilization. This was more than they were prepared to do. So, they wandered for 40 years until they all died off. Only after all of them were dead did God deliver Canaan into the hands of His people. The conquest generation was not the exodus generation.

From the beginning, these people were lean-souled people. Their spiritual condition grew worse as their economic conditions improved. They got what they wanted, but it did them no good. This was what Moses had warned them about. "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:17–18).³

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 25.

Conclusion

There is a price for pursuing and then attaining foolish goals: a lean soul. This comes to someone who confuses success indicators with actual success. He pursues and accumulates the trappings of success, unaware of the fact that these can lure him away from those things that matter most in retrospect at the end of his life. The lean-souled person does not perceive that he is paying for success by accumulating success indicators.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), chaps. 21–22.

24

OVERCOMING FEAR

*They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters;
These see the works of the LORD, and his wonders in the deep (Psalm 107:23–24).*

The theocentric issue here is the sovereignty of God. The psalmist's words introduce a passage dealing with the risks of sailing in the open sea, and God's intervention into the affairs of men to provide protection for them. He singles out seafaring men as people who face the manifestations of God's power regularly.

The King James translators translated the Hebrew word as business. More often, the word is translated work, works, or workmanship. It refers to a group of activities broader than just the conduct of business. Nevertheless, the common work of men who sail the seas is business. Water provides a way for individuals to ship large, bulky, and heavy goods at a relatively low cost per distance traveled. The shipping lanes are filled with ships whose owners seek a profit.

The text says that men who live on the sea or ocean see the works of God. The psalmist speaks of wonders in the deep. He says that God commands the sea, raising the stormy wind. This creates waves (v. 25). The waves are immense, the psalmist says; they rise like mountains and go down again into the depths. Men who sail the sea are fearful whenever storms like this occur. "They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wit's end" (v. 27). At that point, they cry to the Lord in their trouble. God does not ignore their cry. He brings them out of their distresses (v. 28). Then He calms the sea. This was done by Jesus during His ministry as a way to demonstrate His office of Messiah (Matt. 8:23–27).

The psalmist says that the men are glad because the waves are quiet. God brings them to their desired haven. Then the psalmist draws a conclusion: "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men” (v. 31).¹ This is altogether proper. Their praise of God should be public in the congregation (v. 32).

“He turneth the rivers into a wilderness, and the water springs into the dry ground; a fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein” (vv. 33–34). Here we see the twofold system of sanctions: positive and negative. It is not that God rewards covenant-keepers, and lets it go at that. It is that he also curses covenant-breakers. Water provides life in the wilderness, and God provides water. Then men sow the fields and plant vineyards. God is the source of the conditions of production. Men then add labor over time.

The psalmist affirms that God is the source of deliverance, because He is also the source of the crisis. He is the source of the gigantic waves that threaten those who go down to the sea in ships. They understand that God is in control of the sea, and therefore they pray to Him. He then intervenes in the affairs of the sea, thereby confirming the faith of those who prayed to Him. Cause and effect are governed by God.

The sovereignty of God is the basis of His control over nature. God is in complete control over nature, and therefore He can be trusted in the affairs of men. He has sufficient power to bring to pass whatever He chooses. The verbal picture here is of the power of the waves to smash ships. God has power over the waves, so the implication is that God is also in control of the ships. Those who believe that God is in control of the waves are in a much better position to have faith in God and to trust the fact that He can deliver them out of their crisis. By giving them confidence in their own efforts, as agents of an absolutely sovereign God, the psalmist raises the standard of performance. Just as God turned the fruitful land into barrenness, so He also turns the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into wellsprings. There is a great reversal.

The psalmist says that those who go down to the sea in ships are aware that God is behind the affairs of nature. This gives them an advantage. They can call upon the God who rules over nature to act on their behalf.

Conclusion

The covenant-keeper knows that he does not live in a random, im-

1. The psalmist repeats this four times in this psalm.

personal universe. He is supposed to believe that God is on the side of covenant-keepers. He prays accordingly.

Where this faith is widespread, men take greater chances. They are willing to commit more to their endeavors. They become entrepreneurs because they overcome the supreme barrier to entry: fear. Men who go down to the sea in ships should trust God. This is supposed to keep them doing business.

BUY LOW, SELL HIGH

He turneth rivers into a wilderness, and the watersprings into dry ground; A fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein (Psalm 107:33–34).

A. Negative Sanctions

The theocentric issue here is God as the sanctions-bringer. There is a famous saying which encapsulates the secret of economic success: buy low, sell high. In this passage, the psalmist describes the scenario known as “buy high, sell low.” This is the scenario of negative sanctions. But he also describes another scenario: buy low, sell high. This is the mark of positive sanctions. The psalmist indicates that both patterns are the result of God’s intervention into history.

In the first case, the psalmist describes the transformation of plenty into poverty. He says that God turns rivers into a wilderness, and the water springs into dry ground. Without water, land becomes barren. This is how the psalmist describes the results of God’s intervention. The fruitful land becomes barren. Why? “For the wickedness of them that dwell therein” (v. 34). Here we see the outworking of the covenantal system of cause and effect that Moses announced to the conquest generation. In Deuteronomy 28:15–68, we find a long list of negative sanctions. These sanctions are imposed by God against covenant-breaking societies. There is a predictable relationship between covenant-breaking and impoverished land. The psalmist appropriates this description, and he applies it to the condition of agricultural land. Water or the absence of water is the determining factor in the productivity of the land. He says that God supplies the water or removes it, according to the owners’ ethics.

B. Positive Sanctions

In contrast to God's transformation of productive, well-watered land into wilderness, the psalmist says that God turns the wilderness into standing water, and dry ground into water springs (v. 35). Once the land is improved by the addition of water, God supplies this newly productive land to hungry people (v. 36). Why does He do this? "That they may prepare a city for habitation" (v. 36). To build a city, they need agricultural productivity; therefore, they sow the fields and plant vineyards, which may yield fruits of increase (v. 37). In other words, out of agricultural productivity will come cities.

As agriculture becomes more productive, competitive farms reduce the price of the food which they bring to market. They are able to sell all of their output by lowering their prices. City people, who specialize in tasks other than agriculture, can increase their consumption of food simply by paying farmers to sell them their crops. Agricultural surpluses make cities possible. The psalmist understands this principle.

The psalmist says that God multiplies the people. God also protects their cattle. "He blesseth them also, so that they are multiplied greatly; and suffereth not their cattle to decrease" (v. 38). This is the fulfillment of two promises given to Israel in the Mosaic law. "And ye shall serve the LORD your God, and he shall bless thy bread, and thy water; and I will take sickness away from the midst of thee. There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil" (Ex. 23:25–26).¹

In the New Covenant, God does not deal with geographical Israel on the basis of direct intervention. What differentiates agricultural productivity today is scientific agriculture, water conservation, and other capital investments. The land's productivity is an outcome of science, technology, and capital. God's historical sanctions have moved from land to the social order. Different confessions of faith produce different productivity. Confession, not water, is the central issue.

This conclusion is rejected by humanistic economic theory. Few economists seek to relate theological confession and economic development. It is a blind spot that extends back to the origins of scientific economics, which was born in Great Britain as a reaction to the bloodshed of the Puritan revolt and the Civil War (1642–49), the Interregnum (1649–59), and the restoration of Charles II to the throne (1660). The economists sought to create a science of wealth that did not rely on a confession of faith, either theological or moral.²

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 55.

C. The Great Reversal

We see here another example of what I call the great reversal. People who live on productive land see their wealth diminish when God withholds water. He does this to uphold His covenant. He imposes negative sanctions on covenant-breakers. Paralleling this development, God brings water to unprofitable barren land. He does this so that He can plant His people on the land, so that they, in turn, can build cities. God sees agricultural productivity as providing the basis of a growing urban population. “And there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation” (v. 36).

The next phase of the great reversal relates to politics. God pours contempt on princes. He causes them to walk in the wilderness (v. 40). Wilderness is the curse, and princes find themselves in the wilderness. There is no productivity in the wilderness. The mark of their downfall is the fact that God leads them into the wilderness. But this is only half the story. God raises up the poor on high from affliction (v. 41). He who is exalted is pulled down; he who is afflicted is raised up. There is no equality in this process; people go from riches to rags, and rags to riches. This is a process of reversal, not a process of egalitarianism. Nothing in the Bible points to the equalization of conditions between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. They have different destinies.

Conclusion

God actively intervenes to pull down covenant-breakers and raise up covenant-keepers. He imposes losses on covenant-breakers. Their high-priced land becomes low-priced land. He does the opposite with covenant-keepers. This pattern of ethical cause and effect is presented in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. The psalmist relies on these two passages to draw a conclusion: God is the source of agricultural productivity.

2. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts, MIT Press, 1963).

JUDICIAL OPPRESSION

I will greatly praise the LORD with my mouth; yea, I will praise him among the multitude. For he shall stand at the right hand of the poor, to save him from those that condemn his soul (Psalm 109:30–31).

A. Corrupt Judges

The theocentric issue of this passage is God as the judge. The context of this verse is a courtroom. The language of the passage indicates that the person is on trial. The Hebrew word, shafat, means “to judge.” This is how it is translated in most instances in the King James Bible. In this case, it is translated as “condemn.” To condemn a person’s soul refers here to a courtroom. The Hebrew word for “soul,” nephesh, means “life” or “breath.” It does not refer to the New Testament’s concept of a soul that survives physical death (Luke 16:19–31). The judges are not planning to sentence his eternal soul to hell. No Mosaic court had any conception of the court as an agency for imposing eternal sanctions. That prerogative belongs exclusively to God.

God stands beside the defendant, who is poor. He stands at his right hand. In the Old Testament, the right hand was associated with power. “Thy right hand, O LORD, is become glorious in power: thy right hand, O LORD, hath dashed in pieces the enemy” (Ex. 15:6). The right hand was also the hand of man’s dependence. “So foolish was I, and ignorant: I was as a beast before thee. Nevertheless I am continually with thee: thou hast holden me by my right hand. Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory” (Psalm 73:22–24).

The judges are corrupt. They intend to condemn the poor man, who is unable to defend himself, because he is poor. What are the judges planning to do with the poor person? The language indicates that he is going to be sentenced to death.

This passage does not refer to economic oppression. Social Gospel expositors and their theological allies within evangelical churches tend to focus on the word “poor,” and then conclude that the passages relating to poverty and oppression are exclusively dealing with economic oppression. The text does not mention economic oppression. It mentions only that the poor person is on trial for his life. The court is not planning to sentence this person to servitude. It is planning to sentence this person to death.

B. No Respect for Persons

The person is poor. This puts him at a disadvantage in a courtroom. A corrupt courtroom is marked by the practice of respecting persons. This is condemned by the Mosaic law.

Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it (Deut. 1:17).¹

Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous (Deut. 16:19).²

It is also condemned by the New Testament.

For there is no respect of persons with God (Rom. 2:11).

And, ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him (Eph. 6:9).

But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons (Col. 3:25).

But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors (James 2:9).

Whenever any court shows respect for persons, meaning their social standing, or their importance in the community, or their celebrity status, or their wealth, the court is oppressive. The court is misusing the God-given monopoly of coercion in order to favor certain members of the community. This means that other members of the community are out of favor. This psalm refers to the poor person. This person is about to become a victim of the court.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 4.

2. Ibid., ch. 40.

The poor man suffers from a lack of social standing. He is no one of any great importance. He is not in a position to receive favorable treatment by a corrupt court. He cannot afford to pay a bribe.

C. God Intervenes in History

The psalmist says that God intervenes in the proceedings of the court. In some way, God will defend a poor person who is being unjustly accused of a capital crime. This person has his life at stake. The court does not respect God as a person, and therefore it respects important people in the community. The poor man is not an important person. His interests will be sacrificed by the court on behalf of those members of the community who do possess social status.

The psalmist believes that God intervenes in history in such a way that the outcomes of specific court decisions will not conform to the expectations of a corrupt court. The court believes that it is in a position of sovereignty. It does not believe that anything can impede its decisions. It also believes that the outcome of its decision is predictable. It will favor certain members of the community at the expense of other members of the community.

The psalmist says that God intervenes in history in order to thwart the evil intentions of the court. The people who believe that God is blind, or that God is impotent, or that God does not exist will find that things do not turn out as they had planned. This is because God intervenes in history on behalf of the oppressed. In this case, He intervenes on behalf of a poor person.

The text does not say that this person is a covenant-keeper. It says that this person is poor, and there are those who seek his life. God will see to it that the evildoers are thwarted in their attempt to take this person's life. God is a defender of those who are unjustly accused. He can be trusted to uphold His word by enforcing decisions counter to the plans and expectations of covenant-breakers who misuse the courts in order to oppress people without social standing in the community.

This psalm presents God as a just judge. This is a familiar theme in the Bible. God, as the supreme Judge, is supremely just. When earthly judges take a stand against the Bible-revealed law of God in their attempt to thwart the kingdom of God, God intervenes on behalf of those who would otherwise have been destroyed by evildoers. God, as the supreme Judge, upholds justice. He does not forget. He does not ignore evildoing. He does not let courts get away with murder indefinitely.

Conclusion

The psalmist praises God as a defender of the poor. The psalmist does not indicate that God defends them merely because they are poor. He defends them because they are targets of judicial oppression. Someone seeks the life of the poor man, and God stands as a defense attorney who will uphold the targeted victim.

This verse has nothing to do with the idea of economic oppression. It has to do with judicial oppression.

THE INHERITANCE OF THE HEATHEN

He hath made his wonderful works to be remembered: the LORD is gracious and full of compassion. He hath given meat unto them that fear him: he will ever be mindful of his covenant. He hath shewed his people the power of his works, that he may give them the heritage of the heathen (Psalm 111:4–6).

The theocentric issue here is inheritance. The psalmist praises God because God has given meat to the people who fear Him. The psalmist immediately adds that God will ever be mindful of his covenant.

Here we have in one sentence the promise that God upholds His covenant by consistently providing positive sanctions to covenant-keepers. The person who fears God receives meat from God. This proves to the recipient that God is mindful of His covenant. The psalmist then says that God has showed His people the power of His works. God has intervened in history in a predictable manner, and therefore all those who call themselves covenant-keepers should have confidence in the future. Not to have confidence in the future is to deny the relevance of this passage.

A. Who Will Inherit What?

The psalmist says that God will give to His people the heritage of the heathen (v. 6). Inheritance is inherent in the structure of the biblical covenant. So is disinheritance.¹ Both are inherent in the progress of history from the Fall of Adam to the final judgment: the transition from wrath to grace. God intervenes in history in such a way that those who profess faith in Him, and who obey His laws, will inherit a legacy: the heritage of the heathen. This passage rests on this assumption: there is ethical cause and effect in history. It states clearly that the future belongs to covenant-keepers.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1987] 2010), ch. 5.

Psalm 136 records God's deliverance of the Israelites out of Egypt (v. 11). He led them through the wilderness (v. 16). He slew famous kings: Sihon and Og (vv. 19–20). "And gave their land for an heritage: for his mercy endureth for ever: Even an heritage unto Israel his servant: for his mercy endureth for ever" (vv. 21–22). Inheritance involved disinheritance: first Egypt's firstborn, then Pharaoh, then the kings outside Canaan. This is the process of progress. God's kingdom replaces Satan's. It will involve comprehensive disinheritance at the last judgment.

The only way for this progress in history to be thwarted is that, for a time, covenant-keepers refuse to acknowledge the power of God's works in history. Because they refuse to acknowledge the power of God's works in history, they delay the comprehensive transfer of the heritage of the heathen to themselves and their confessional heirs. They do not trust God to do what God says He will do. They do not trust the power of God. In theory, they know that God possesses the power to intervene in history and move the world in a particular direction. At the same time, they deny that God has done this yet in the New Testament era, and they also deny that God will do so in the church's era. In other words, hypothetically speaking, God is all-powerful, but in history, God is self-limited. He is so self-limited with respect to the power of the gospel in history that He will transfer the inheritance of covenant-keepers to covenant-breakers.

Cornelius Van Til specifically taught this view of the future. He said that covenant-breakers will increase their power over the affairs of this world, and will also increase their persecution of covenant-keepers. This process will be brought to an end only when Christ returns in final judgment. He believed that covenant-keeping produces weakness, and covenant-breaking produces power.

But when all the reprobate are epistemologically self-conscious, the crack of doom has come. The fully self-conscious reprobate will do all he can in every dimension to destroy the people of God. So while we seek with all our power to hasten the process of differentiation in every dimension we are yet thankful, on the other hand, for "the day of grace," the day of undeveloped differentiation. Such tolerance as we receive on the part of the world is due to this fact that we live in the earlier, rather than in the later, stage of history. And such influence on the public situation as we can effect, whether in society or in state, presupposes this undifferentiated stage of development.²

B. Van Til's Vision

To summarize: as men become more consistent, covenant-breakers will exercise increasing control over society. They will seek out the increasingly defenseless covenant-keepers in order to destroy them. Van Til declared, in effect, "Thank God for inconsistent covenant-breakers today!" In short, he not only rejected what this psalm explicitly teaches, he argued that the opposite is in store for God's people.

While most amillennialists hesitate to declare publicly their acceptance of Van Til's view of the culmination of New Testament history, this is what they really believe. Some of them are more consistent than others in stating the comprehensive pessimism, culturally and historically, of amillennialism.

C. Covenantal Sanctions

These verses in Psalm 111 assert that God is mindful of His covenant. God brings positive sanctions to those who fear Him. God has visibly demonstrated to His people the power of His works in history. He demonstrates this in order to give them confidence that, in the long run, covenant-keepers will inherit the heritage of the heathen.

This is not an inheritance of earthly capital beyond the final judgment. The heritage of the heathen beyond the final judgment is irrelevant. The only heritage that covenant-keepers will receive in the era after the final judgment is that which they have stored up in history. Jesus was quite clear about this. The way to build capital in eternity is to give away capital in history. The way we transfer wealth in history to the world beyond the final judgment is to sacrifice for the kingdom of God in history.

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also (Matt. 6:19–21).³

2. Cornelius Van Til, Common Grace (1947), reprinted in Common Grace and the Gospel (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1972), p. 85.

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew,

This post-final judgment inheritance has nothing to do with the heritage of the heathen. The heritage of the heathen is inherited only in history. The psalmist affirms that covenant-keepers will inherit the heritage of the heathen. This could not be any more clear. Because of their eschatological system, amillennialists deny the truth of this verse. They either ignore this verse or they reinterpret it to apply only to some kind of internal feel-good inheritance of the heritage of the heathen. While the heathens' heirs retain ownership of their visible heritage, somehow Christians are supposed to think of themselves as heirs of the heritage of the heathen. This makes no sense.

An alternative approach is to argue that God favored covenant-keepers under the Old Covenant, but the New Covenant church is not an heir to such support by God. In the New Testament era, amillennialists believe, there is neutrality or else randomness with respect to society-wide outcomes, or even actual opposition. Meredith G. Kline argued for randomness.

And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways.⁴

This is a defense of covenantal unpredictability in history. He and the theologians who share his view of social causation in history—the overwhelming majority today—do not believe that God's kingdom will expand in history into every area of life, transforming the entire civilization as leaven transforms dough, i.e., the transformation described by Jesus. "Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened" (Matt. 13:33).⁵

Here is the amillennialist's view. "The New Covenant church is more self-conscious and consistent than the Old Covenant church; therefore, God has removed positive sanctions for covenantal obedience." The amillennialist has reversed the system of sanctions affirmed by the psalmist.

2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

4. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184. This essay is a critique of Greg L. Bahnsen's view of theonomy.

5. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 30.

Amillennialism teaches explicitly that covenant-keepers will not inherit the heritage of the heathen. The more consistent amillennialists teach something even more debilitating: the heritage of covenant-keepers will be transferred to covenant-breakers sometime in the future. This will take place either at the Great Tribulation, which supposedly is still in the future, or it will take place after the Great Tribulation. Covenant-keepers are cultural losers in history, while covenant-breakers are cultural winners in history: this is the amillennial position.

If amillennialist pastors were more open about this, preaching it several times a year from their pulpits, they would progressively empty their churches. Only masochists enjoy a steady diet of affirmations that they will fail in history, and if they do not fail personally, then their spiritual heirs will fail. I have called this a ghetto mentality.⁶ I have also called this the mentality of a prisoner in a concentration camp. I have referred to a denomination that preaches this consistently as the Barbed Wire Reformed Church.

It is not considered good form among Bible commentators to state things so blatantly, but I prefer the truth to good form. There comes a time when expositors have to lay things on the table. Ideas do have consequences. Eschatology does have implications.⁷ Amillennialism cannot be conformed to these verses. Amillennialism should therefore either be scrapped, or else our confidence in the reliability of God's word should be scrapped. You cannot logically hold to the plain teaching of these verses and simultaneously hold the view of Christianity's future that is maintained by amillennialism. You must say that the inheritance of the heathen never was transferred to covenant-keepers under the Old Covenant, and it will never be transferred in the New Covenant, either. In short, the psalmist either made a mistake historically or else adopted language that was sure to be misinterpreted as referring to history rather than eternity.

D. Social Pessimism

Both amillennialism and premillennialism are pessimistic with respect to social transformation.

6. Gary North, "Ghetto Eschatologies," Biblical Economics Today (April/May 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gnghetto>)

7. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990).

1. Amillennialism

Amillennialists declare a radical discontinuity of covenantal administration, Old Covenant vs. New Covenant. They teach that God's promises to covenant-keepers regarding their future inheritance have been completely overthrown by Jesus. We are on our own in the New Covenant. This is why all contributions to social theory by amillennialists invoke natural law. Amillennialists do not believe in the continuing authority of biblical laws and their sanctions. This leaves them at the mercy of covenant-breakers and their competing theories of covenants and sanctions.

For the amillennialist, there is no biblically sanctioned cultural progress in history—no civil or cultural progressive sanctification to match individual progressive sanctification, family progressive sanctification, and ecclesiastical progressive sanctification. Amillennialists are forced to admit that the church progresses, Christian family government progresses, and Christian personal self-government progresses. But civil, social, and cultural life supposedly progresses only in terms of non-biblical standards and sanctions.

Herman Hanko, who was the senior theologian of the tiny Dutch-American denomination, the Protestant Reformed Church, held this view of social progress. Only Satan can grant widespread economic success in history, he taught.

I was compelled to warn God's people against the spiritual dangers involved in postmillennialism. It is my fervent hope and prayer that those who hold to postmillennialism do not actually promote the kingdom of Antichrist; but Herman Hoeksema was right when somewhere he warned God's people of the spiritual danger involved. It is not inconceivable that, if the saints are looking for a glorious kingdom on earth, they will be tempted to identify the kingdom which Antichrist establishes with the kingdom of Christ. It will be hard enough in that dreadful day to stand for the cause of Christ without putting other spiritual temptations in the way.⁸

I do not doubt that a kingdom of peace, of great plenty, of enormous prosperity and uncounted riches, of beauty and splendor such as the world has never seen, will some day be established. Scripture points us to that. What makes one cringe, however, is that this kingdom is described by Scripture as the kingdom of the beast (read Revelation 13). This makes postmillennial thinking of considerable spiritual dangers.⁹

8. Herman Hanko, "Response to 'The Other Side' of Postmillennialism," Standard Bearer (April 1, 1990), p. 295. Cited by Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997), p. 506. (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

Equally adamant that long-term economic prosperity is of the devil is the accountant and popular writer of paperback dispensational eschatology books, Dave Hunt. He wrote two books on this: Peace, Prosperity, and the Coming Holocaust (1983) and Whatever Happened to Heaven? (1988). I reviewed them in 1992.¹⁰

This outlook implies that social success on a broad base is the result of the creative work of Satan. Satan has overcome the inherent tendency of the social world of the Mosaic law, in which covenant-keepers experience success, while covenant-breakers experience failure. While this was built into the Old Covenant, Van Til, Hanks, and Hunt have insisted that not only has this system of ethical causation been annulled, it has been reversed in the New Testament. In our era, covenant-keeping produces widespread poverty, while covenant-breaking produces widespread prosperity. This prosperity lures unsuspecting and naive covenant-keepers into accepting as legitimate the social goal of long-term economic growth, these authors have argued.

2. Premillennialism

Premillennialists are as pessimistic as amillennialists with respect to the premillennial age. Premillennialists believe that history will include a millennial victory for Christ, but only because Christ is physically present to give directions to an international bureaucracy of His covenant-keeping people, who will be in charge all over the world.

Premillennialists do not say whether they believe that a centralized hierarchy is the proper form of government for the millennial era. For the most part, they teach that local churches should be sovereign and independent. Presbyterian premillennialists teach that any hierarchical Court of appeals within ecclesiastical circles should be limited. In other words, with respect to the premillennial era, they believe in bottom-up civil government and ecclesiastical government. On the other hand, from the point of view of their view of the millennial era, they are silent.

9. Herman Hanko, "The Illusory Hope of Postmillennialism," Standard Bearer (Jan. 1, 1990), p. 159. Cited in ibid., pp. 506–7.

10. North, "Ghetto Eschatologies," op. cit.

Premillennialists do not write books on social theory. They do not describe civil and church government after the return of Christ. This has been true for two millennia, so this is not absent-mindedness. They have nothing to say about church and state in the millennial era. Premillennial Baptists who believe in local church autonomy do not deal with these two questions:

How will local churches get Jesus to intervene personally, dispute by dispute, if there are no hierarchical church courts?

How will Jesus avoid long lines, as described in Exodus 18: the lines in front of Moses' tent?

There are only so many hours in the day, and there will be millions of disputes per year.

Silence in the face of the simplest institutional questions reveals a lack of curiosity on a stupendous scale. Premillennialists do not discuss whether there will be judicial and institutional continuity between the church age and the millennial age. They have no suggestions with respect to the reform of social institutions or the economy in the church age, precisely because they think that the church age favors covenant-breakers and penalizes covenant-keepers.

They are pessimistic with respect to the church age. Their pessimism is matched by the amillennialists' pessimism. Both groups compete with one another on the basis of saying how bad the Great Tribulation is going to be.

The post-tribulation dispensationalist and the historic premillennialist share the view with amillennialism that the church will go through the Great Tribulation. This is one reason why pre-tribulation dispensationalism is popular. It teaches that the church will not go to the tribulation; only the Jews will go through the tribulation. The Jews will be almost completely annihilated: two-thirds.¹¹

11. Gary DeMar, "Dispensationalism's Predicted Jewish Holocaust" (2008). Pre-tribulation dispensationalists often work hard to bring Jews back to Palestine. Why? They believe that Israel will be surrounded during the Great Tribulation and be almost annihilated. Why bring Jews back to Palestine, where it will be more convenient for Satan and his evil rulers on earth to get revenge on the Jews during the Great Tribulation? This is a much more efficient system for destroying the Jews than to warn Jews not to come back Palestine, but remain wherever they are. See Gary North, "Fundamentalism's Bloody Homeland for the Jews" (Nov. 1, 2003): www.LewRockwell.com/north/north222.html.

E. Risk-Taking

Whenever Christians believe that God brings negative sanctions against them for covenant-keeping—obeying biblical law—they are far less willing to launch high-risk ventures in any area of life. People who take great risks believe there is a possibility of great rewards. When a person is told, from his youth to his deathbed, that the efforts of Christians to extend the kingdom of God in history will come to naught, culturally speaking, they are less willing to commit exceptional time and money to dead-end projects that cannot succeed. It is not just that there are supposedly heavy odds against the success of their projects. There are consistent, highly developed eschatologies that teach that there is absolutely no possibility in history that these projects will come to cultural fruition. There will only be the survival of a besieged little remnant of faithful believers, who will face the combined power of Satan and his dominion, until at the last day, Jesus comes to rescue them, either at the final judgment (amillennialism) or just before the Rapture (pre-tribulational dispensationalism), or just before the millennium (non-dispensational premillennialism and post-tribulational dispensationalism).

This outlook is the theological foundation of cultural despair. There are some theologians who revel in this cultural despair. They proclaim it as the highest form of theological wisdom.¹² The only amillennial churches that successfully grow in these circumstances are those in which the pastors ignore or avoid the inescapable implications of their theological position. They do not preach it. They are careful not to remind their listeners of what amillennialism teaches concerning the future.

This can also be said of premillennialists. The same pessimism applies to the era prior to the second coming of Christ to set up an earthly millennium. The church is seen as utterly impotent to change culture, to affect the transformation of civilization, or to reverse the march into Satanic nihilism. Only Jesus can do this, and He will do it only in person. This is the teaching of all premillennialism, not just dispensationalism.

¹² 12. In my day, David J. Engelsma is a good example. He is a theologian of the Protestant Reformed Church. See his editorial, "Jewish Dreams," The Standard Bearer (Jan. 15, 1995). (<http://bit.ly/JewishDreams>) Cf. Engelsma, "A Defense of Reformed Amillennialism (I): An Introduction," Reformed Witness, IX (July 2001). (<http://bit.ly/EngelsmaDefense>)

Conclusion

The psalmist says that there is a covenantal system of inheritance in history. The process of inheritance in history leads to the transfer of the inheritance of the heathen to the sons of God. God upholds His covenant. He gives meat to those who fear Him. The psalmist believed this. Premillennialists and amillennialists do not believe it.

The Great Tribulation is behind us.¹³ The inheritance of the heathen's inheritance is in front of us. Let us work accordingly.

13. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, [1987] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

OBEDIENCE AND WEALTH

Praise ye the LORD. Blessed is the man that feareth the LORD, that delighteth greatly in his commandments. His seed shall be mighty upon earth: the generation of the upright shall be blessed. Wealth and riches shall be in his house: and his righteousness endureth for ever (Psalm 112:1–3).

A. Biblical Law and Personal Blessing

The theocentric issue here is the relationship between law and sanctions. I regard this passage as the most clear-cut statement in the Bible regarding the ethical cause-and-effect relationship between personal covenant-keeping and personal riches. The mark of covenant-keeping is explicitly stated here: delight in the commandments of God.

The passage begins with point one of the biblical covenant: the fear of the Lord. We are to fear God because He is absolutely sovereign. God's sovereignty is point one.¹ The text moves to point four: sanctions.² Blessed is the man who fears God. How does the psalmist define fear? By means of a biblical law: point three.³ The man who fears God is a person who delights greatly in God's commandments. The text does not say "blessed is the man who fears the Lord and who delights in natural law." It does not say that he delights in positive law: state-made law. It surely does not say that he delights in postmodernism: law for himself alone. It says that he delights greatly in God's commandments. Where do we find these commandments? In Psalm

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Ibid., ch. 4. North, ch. 4.

3. Ibid., ch. 3. North, ch. 4.

119, they are identified: biblical law.

The previous psalm had ended with this affirmation: “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments: his praise endureth for ever” (Psalm 111:10). The Book of Proverbs affirm that wisdom is the supreme asset to pursue.

Get wisdom, get understanding; forget it not; neither decline from the words of my mouth (Prov. 4:5).

Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding (Prov. 4:7).

How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver (Prov. 16:16)!

The psalmist indicates here that the starting point of wisdom, the fear of the Lord, is manifested through conformity to His law. Then comes wealth.

B. Blessings Galore

In what does the blessing consist? “His seed shall be mighty upon the earth: the generation of the upright shall be blessed” (v. 2). The blessing comes in the form of familistic blessings. A man’s seed, meaning his heir, is mighty upon the earth. This is a person whose family has influence.

It goes beyond his family’s influence. The individual who has great fear of the Lord and who delights in His commandments will be a rich man. When the text says “wealth and riches,” it does not mean spiritual wealth and spiritual riches. The language of the Psalms is concrete. This text is adamant: the covenant-keeper who fears God will possess riches. Furthermore, his righteousness endures forever. Whatever he does to benefit the kingdom of God extends through history. It has influence down through the ages.

Obviously, this passage did not apply to the earthly ministry of Jesus Christ. The Messiah was not a rich man. The Messiah was promised to be a man who suffered persecution (Isa. 53). But the Messiah’s life is not the model that covenant-keepers are supposed to use. Their model is the man in Psalm 112:3. This is a man who possesses wealth and riches. His influence will expand down through history. What more can someone ask for? Men seek wealth, influence, and fame. This man, who fears the Lord and who delights in God's law, possesses all three.

The tendency towards wealth is inherent in obeying God's law. This psalm makes this point as clearly as any text in the Bible. It is not random that this individual possesses wealth and riches. He possesses wealth and riches, the text says, because he fears God. The mark of his fear of God is his delight in God's law.

Modern Christians sing a familiar hymn with this chorus: "O how love I thy law. It is my meditation all the day." I cannot think of any hymn as widely sung and less believed. To the extent that modern Christians ever hear a sermon on biblical law, they are told in no uncertain terms that they are not under biblical law. They do not hear sermon after sermon, week after week, on what the Mosaic law requires in every area of life. They are not encouraged to read the Mosaic law. They are not encouraged to obey the Mosaic law. They may get an occasional sermon on the Ten Commandments, but they do not get sermons on the case laws of Exodus,⁴ the laws of Leviticus,⁵ and the laws of Deuteronomy.⁶ They are completely ignorant of these books in Scripture. Why is this the case? Because pastors refuse to preach on biblical law. They do not believe in biblical law. They believe in natural law theory, or they believe in some sort of humanistic government-mandated law, but they do not believe in the authority of Bible-revealed law.

Because they do not believe in biblical law, they do not preach obedience to it. Yet they read in texts such as this one that obedience to biblical law brings personal success. If pastors preached regularly on the basis of personal success, including wealth, they would have to confront the issue of obedience to biblical law. They do not choose to confront this issue, so they do not preach about wealth and success.

C. Positive Confession Christianity

There is a group of fundamentalist Christians, sometimes called positive confession, sometimes called "name it and claim it," who do preach about God's standard: wealth. This text and other Old Covenant passages make it clear that wealth really is God's standard. It is supposed to be a positive sanction for obedience to biblical law. But positive confession pastors do not preach biblical law. They are as hostile to the Mosaic law as their fellow pastors in other branches of the church. So, they preach wealth in the name of personal spiritual intensity in believing what is not yet visibly true. They tell poor people to believe that they can be rich and that they should be rich. They do not preach that it is their listeners' requirement to restructure their lives in terms of biblical law. They do not preach the necessity of a complete transformation of one's habits as the foundation of wealth. Instead, they preach that people merely need to believe that they will become wealthy, and they really will become wealthy.

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

5. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012).

This is a baptized version of what is sometimes called "think and grow rich." It is promoted by science-of-mind advocates and other representatives of non-Christian faiths. In the mid-1950s, there was a best-selling American book titled The Power of Positive Thinking. It was written by Rev. Norman Vincent Peale. Rev. Peale was a member of an officially Calvinist denomination, the Reformed Church of America, but his doctrines had nothing to do with Calvinism or the Bible.

D. Positive Judicial Sanctions

Wealth is supposed to be a confirmation of conformity to God's covenant (Deut. 8:18).⁷ Wealth is a positive sanction that God brings on people who delight in His law and who obey it. Wealth is not a blessing whenever it comes on the basis of anything other than covenantal conformity to God's law. Otherwise, it can be a deadly deception. It persuades individuals to believe that they are blessed of God when in fact they are on a slippery slope to perdition. This is taught specifically in Psalm 73.⁸

Because modern Christians are antinomian in their view of the Mosaic law, and because they do not believe in the New Covenant predictability of the specific sanctions attached to the supposedly defunct Mosaic law, they do not believe in an ethical cause-and-effect universe. They do not believe that if they conform to biblical law, they will receive positive blessings, including greater wealth. They have been told that this cause-and-effect relationship is no longer operational, although it was operational in theory under the Mosaic Covenant.

7. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

8. Chapter 17.

Without positive sanctions to confirm their confession of faith and their success in conforming to the laws of God, Christians search for other forms of verification or confirmation. They want to know that they are on the right track. So, they search for internal blessings. They are told that any search for visible, external blessings is somehow illegitimate. Spiritual feelings of joy replace specifics of God's law and visible wealth. But there is nothing in Psalms about spiritual feelings as valid substitutes for biblical law and wealth.

Conclusion

The psalmist announces that the man who fears God has an advantage: he is wealthy. His family has influence. What he does for God's kingdom will have effects down through history. All of these are highly respected positive sanctions in most cultures.

The psalmist's announcement rests on faith in the existence of a cosmos governed by ethical cause and effect. This universe is ruled by a sovereign God who enforces the ethical terms of His covenant. He enforces them by imposing visible sanctions. One of these is wealth.

CHARITABLE LENDING

A good man sheweth favour, and lendeth: he will guide his affairs with discretion (Psalm 112:5).

The theocentric issue here is grace. This is an aspect of sanctions. The psalmist says that a good man shows favor to someone who is in a temporary crisis. He lends to such a person. The psalmist adds that the person will guide his affairs with discretion. The good man is willing to lend. He also shows good judgment in the management of his affairs. This man is unique. He knows how to make money, and he also knows how to give it away. His good management has led to sufficient wealth, so he is in a position to lend money at no interest to people who have fallen on hard times.

A. A Unique Ability

The ability to manage your affairs so that you gain wealth, when coupled with the ability to perceive when another person is in need through no fault of his own, is a unique ability. There are some people who have a gift for making a great deal of money. There are other people who have a gift for giving away money without causing harm. Rarely are these abilities found in the same person. There is specialization of labor in life, and these two specializations seem opposed to each other. If a person is good at making money, he does not want to surrender any of his money, because his chief ability is to multiply what he already owns. If he gives away a portion of his wealth, that portion will not multiply under his administration.

The psalmist insists that the ability to manage your affairs well involves the ability to make accurate judgments about giving away a portion of your wealth. The different skills of making money and the skills of giving away money, when combined in one person, are the model of Christian stewardship. A person who is a good manager of his affairs is confident that, when it comes to wealth, there is more where that came from. He therefore does not fear the loss of revenue that he could otherwise have made by lending money in a commercial loan. He does not mind giving up the forfeited interest in a charitable loan. That income would have been minimal anyway. Compared to the blessings of God on a well-managed household, the forfeited interest on a charitable loan is next to nothing.

The psalmist affirms that a good man shows favor by lending money. He is speaking of a charitable loan.

B. A Zero-Interest Loan

In the Mosaic Covenant, a charitable loan paid no interest. “Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury. Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it” (Deut. 23:19–20).¹ It was morally mandatory for a man with money to lend to a poor brother.

If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in thy land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother: But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth. Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto (Deut. 15:7–10).

The psalmist adds this promise of a positive sanction: “He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor; his righteousness endureth for ever; his horn shall be exalted with honour” (v. 9). Gaining honor is a way to annoy the wicked. “The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away: the desire of the wicked shall perish" (v. 10).²

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 57.

The psalmist is not speaking of an economic decision to lend money at interest in a commercial venture. Lending money at interest for a commercial venture was legitimate under the Mosaic law. We know this because a person who fell into debt or poverty could be sold into slavery to a stranger in the land. He could be forced to serve for up to 49 years (Lev. 25:47–48).³ A failure to repay a commercial loan was a reason for servitude. In contrast, the failure to repay a charitable loan was up to six years of slavery (Lev. 25:1–2).

Lending money at interest to covenant-breakers was not only legitimate, it was a mark of God's favor on the lender. God encouraged His people to lend to covenant-breakers. "For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee" (Deut. 15:6). This was a way of exercising dominion over them.⁴ "The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow" (Deut. 28:12).⁵ This kind of loan is not what the psalmist is talking about in this verse. He is talking about a morally mandatory charitable loan which paid no interest.

To lend at no rate of interest is a form of charity.⁶ Surrendering use over a present good in exchange for a promise to return that good or a comparable good in the future is an exchange of a better condition for a worse condition. Present goods are worth more to us than the promise of future goods is. We have the present goods; we do not have the future goods. We enjoy the use of present goods; we do not enjoy the use of future goods. This is why borrowers must promise to pay more in return than they receive as a loan. This is the origin of interest.⁷

2. Chapter 30.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 31.

4. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 37.

5. Ibid., ch. 70.

6. An exception took place in the United States in December 2008. The interest rate on 90-day United States Treasury bills fell to zero on three different days. This sacrifice of interest was a payment for perceived security: the guaranteed return of the money. Fear over bank failures had increased the public's perception that large deposits might not be returned.

7. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Con-

In the case of a charitable loan, the lender is prohibited from accepting interest in any form from a poor fellow covenant member. He therefore surrenders a present good for the promise of a return of a comparable future good. He forfeits the use of the good in the interim. This is a form of charity. This is required by God. Covenant-keepers are told to lend money to covenant-keepers who are in a crisis through no fault of their own. This is a form of social insurance in a covenant community. People who get into temporary trouble know that they can receive zero-interest loans to help them recover.

Conclusion

The psalmist equates an open hand with wise stewardship. It is not a question of one or the other. The biblical model involves both skills.

THE WICKED WILL MELT AWAY

He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor; his righteousness endureth for ever; his horn shall be exalted with honour. The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away: the desire of the wicked shall perish (Psalm 112:9–10).

The theocentric issue here is God's judgment in history, as reflected in the common judgment of men. This is a mark of success. The psalmist describes the activities of the righteous person. This person has dispersed, meaning he has given away wealth. The same Hebrew word is used by the author of Proverbs: "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty" (Prov. 11:24).¹ He has given this wealth to poorer people. The psalmist identifies charity as a mark of a righteous person. He then goes on to say that the righteousness of this person endures forever. "His horn shall be exalted with honor." The reference to horn is not specific. "Horn" can sometimes represent power, as with an animal with horns. At other times, it represents the source of blessings, as in a horn full of oil. At other times, it means proclamation. The sound of horns mobilized the nation (Lev. 23:24).

The psalmist says that the wicked man will see this, and it will grieve him. He is not grieving over the fact that the righteous man gave money to the poor. This may have been done in private. What grieves the wicked person is that the righteous man is regarded as honorable. He receives public recognition for his honorable life. This causes the wicked man to gnash his teeth and melt away. He disappears from the scene. He goes away annoyed, but he goes away.

The contrast is between the righteous person and a wicked person. The righteous person gives away a portion of his wealth. While the psalmist does not say that giving away assets is the immediate source of public honor for the righteous man, he does make the connection between charitable giving and widespread personal recognition. This recognition is visible to the wicked person. This is not something that was done in private. The giving was done in private, but the recognition is public. This indicates that his righteousness is comprehensive. He is not being recognized for his charitable activities. He is being recognized for his way of life, which is visible.

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 32.

The righteous individual gains the advantage of public acceptance. This disturbs the wicked person. He does not want to think that a righteous man is publicly regarded as righteous. The contrast between the honor which the righteous man receives and the dishonor which the wicked man receives is too great for the wicked man to tolerate. He is annoyed, but his annoyance does him no good.

The psalmist paints a picture of a righteous individual who has dispersed a portion of his wealth to the poor. His righteousness endures forever, the psalmist says. This means that his reputation endures. The psalmist specifically says this: "his horn shall be exalted with honor." This is a public matter. It is so public that the wicked man is grieved by it. This is not some form of success that was achieved in secret. This is public success.

The psalmist says the desire of the wicked shall perish. His hopes and dreams will be cut off, in contrast to the reputation of righteousness and honor which are possessed by a righteous and honorable covenant-keeper. The covenant-breaker's future is cut off; the covenant-keeper's future is forever.

The contrast between the public condition of the righteous and the public condition of the wicked is sharp. It is so sharp that the wicked man is offended by it. He seeks to escape the testimony of his own eyes. He then melts away. This means that he disappears from the public scene. He loses influence.

This is an important passage because it affirms the relationship between covenant-keeping and visible success. One of the goals that most men have is recognition. Another goal is to be remembered. The psalmist says that the righteous man will not only receive recognition, he will receive it on a perpetual basis. Theologically, the reason for this is the imputation of righteousness by God. God does not forget. When God imputes righteousness to an individual, this imputation cannot be rescinded. It is perpetual. According to this passage, the righteous individual is the recipient of perpetual imputation, and this imputation is one of honor. This is not a strictly subjective condition of the righteous person's mind. It is a matter of public confirmation. It is so public that the wicked man resents it.

The psalmist says that the desire of the wicked will perish. That which the wicked man upholds and desires will be overcome by righteousness in history. The process of historical development is covenantal. This is why righteousness produces external blessings, while unrighteousness produces external cursings. This is why the wicked man is said to be offended by the visible success of the righteous person.

According to the psalmist, there is predictable consistency between covenant-breaking and the failure to influence culture. This is not true in every era, but it is true with respect to the influence of the righteous, which is forever. There is a compounding effect in history: righteousness increases, while wickedness melts away. The wicked person will perish. He will melt away. This is in contrast to the reputation of the righteous person. The psalmist's declaration rests on a system of covenantal cause and effect. Righteousness produces benefits; unrighteousness produces impotence. The unrighteous person melts away. So does his legacy. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22).²

Conclusion

The psalmist affirms that righteousness is rewarded in history. He also affirms that unrighteousness is rewarded with impotence in history. This worldview is in stark contrast to the worldview of both amillennialism and premillennialism. Amillennialism teaches that covenant-keeping produces persecution and visible failure. It also teaches that covenant-breaking produces power and influence. This perspective is categorically denied by these two verses of Scripture. Similarly, premillennialists believe that the gospel's long-term failure in changing culture for the better will be reversed only when Jesus comes again physically in absolute power to run a worldwide kingdom of God.

The psalmist is not affirming that the outcome of righteousness and the outcome of wickedness are random. The outcomes are not random. They are favorable to covenant-keepers and unfavorable to covenant-breakers.

2. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 41.

31

UPWARD SOCIAL MOBILITY

He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill; That he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people (Psalm 113:7–8).

The psalmist insists that God is sovereign over the economic affairs of men. God exercises power to raise up poor people. He is their deliverer. Their poverty need not be permanent. People can be born into poverty, but they can be raised out of it. The idea that poverty is necessarily inter-generational is incorrect. The psalmist says that God breaks the cycle of poverty. So completely does God break the cycle of poverty that a man who had been poor can find himself in the presence of the judicial equivalent of an Old Covenant king. He becomes a trusted counselor. Because the adviser has been raised out of poverty, the ruler trusts his wisdom and advice. This, at least, is the implication of the psalmist's assertion that the poor person will be in the presence of kings.

The story of Saul is a story of obscure man lifted up to the kingship. The story of David is much the same. God used Samuel to anoint both Saul and David on His behalf. God picked these men to serve as kings over Israel. Saul was a tall man, and looked like a king should look (I Sam. 9:2), but he had no particular leadership abilities to be king. God nevertheless raised him up out of obscurity to lead the nation of Israel.

The psalmist says that God does not place a social ceiling on the poor man. God has endowed the poor man to perform well enough to impress kings. God overcomes all of the barriers that would otherwise keep a person from entering the court of a king. An individual's talents are the limits on his success. Limits of social tradition, personal connections, formal education, and all of the other barriers to entry mean nothing to God, and should mean nothing to those whom God has picked to represent His position in the courts of kings.

The picture here is a society with open entry to markets. Men of talent who gain information of how markets work are authorized by God to continue to improve their skills, master the markets, and gain all the money they can in a voluntary society. The productivity of an individual is not limited by barriers to social entry. God raises up the individual for His own glory, and the individual is put in charge of decision-making. This is the picture in Jesus' parable of the stewards. When the owner of the property returns and demands an accounting, some of the servants turn out to be very productive, but one servant does not. God brings that person under judgment (Matt. 25:14–31).¹

This is the familiar story of rags to riches. It was not always familiar. The suggestion that God raises up poor men to sit with kings was not familiar in the ancient world. It was a revolutionary suggestion. Even today, this degree of mobility is rare, although it is considered possible in theory. The West's acceptance of this degree of social mobility took centuries to achieve, but from the mid-seventeenth century until today, the ideal of upward social mobility has been basic to the democratic West. This outlook first became common during Cromwell's revolt against King Charles I. His New Model Army contained thousands of men who held such views, most notably the Levelers. These were democrats, not communists. The communists were the Diggers, and they had few representatives in Cromwell's army.

Conclusion

A society that allows individuals to rise economically, which does not put legal barriers against successful individuals to enter into social contact with others, is a free society. A free society is an economically productive society. The psalmist insists that Israel is to be a free society. In this way, the society is committed to the idea that God can raise up a poor person and place him in the company of kings. Productivity is the distinguishing factor of a humanistic free society. According to the psalmist, the sovereignty of God is the distinguishing feature of a biblical society.

1. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

A PRAYER FOR WIDESPREAD WEALTH

That our garners may be full, affording all manner of store: that our sheep may bring forth thousands and ten thousands in our streets: That our oxen may be strong to labour; that there be no breaking in, nor going out; that there be no complaining in our streets. Happy is that people, that is in such a case: yea, happy is that people, whose God is the LORD (Psalm 144:13–15).

This passage appears as part of a prayer to a sovereign God. The psalmist asks God to deliver him from evil people—specifically, strange children (v. 11). Then he asks that Israel's sons will be as plants grown up in their youth, and that daughters will be as cornerstones. This prayer has to do with inheritance. He seeks liberation from rule by strangers. He calls for an inheritance for the children of Israel.

Then comes a prayer regarding agricultural blessings. The psalmist asks that Israel's granaries be full (v. 12). The granaries should contain all manner of stores. This means that they should contain many kinds of grain. The psalmist wants a variety of grains in his diet. He also asks that their sheep would multiply. He wants not merely thousands of sheep but tens of thousands in the streets (v. 13). He wants visible overflowing. He also wants strong oxen to do work. He wants no breaking in or going out. In other words, he wants the oxen penned in and safe. He asks that there will be no complaining in the streets, meaning in the community.

He closes the psalm with a declaration: "Happy is that people, that is in such a case: yea, happy is that people, whose God is the Lord" (v. 15). He equates happiness with national wealth. He is saying, in no uncertain terms, that having overflowing granaries, tens of thousands of sheep in the streets, and strong oxen are all aspects of a society in which there should be no complaining, due to happiness.

A. The Pursuit of Happiness

Today, this psalm may appear to run counter to the New Testament's principle that men should not pursue great riches. This principle is also declared in the Proverbs. "Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain" (Prov. 30:8–9).¹ Yet it sounds from this psalm as though great wealth per capita is an advantage worth praying for. It is an advantage that will produce happiness among the people. Why should increased wealth produce happiness? We are told that money cannot buy happiness, but it appears from these verses that grain, sheep, and oxen can buy happiness.

The psalmist is describing a free society. There are no foreign oppressors. There are no domestic oppressors. Sons and daughters inherit. Per capita wealth increases. The marks of liberty involve economic growth. Elsewhere in the psalms, we read that the pursuit of knowledge regarding the law of God is the basis of liberty. "And I will walk at liberty: for I seek thy precepts" (Psalm 119:45). This being the case, liberty under God should prove to be productive. Covenant-keeping leads to greater per capita wealth. This is the message of the early sections of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. There is a cause-and-effect system in which conformity to biblical law produces increased per capita wealth. The psalmist understands this, and so he prays that God will bring to pass that which He had promised in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. The psalmist is calling on God to defend His covenant. He is calling on God to do what He said he would do in Deuteronomy 8: bless His covenant people with great economic blessings so as to confirm the covenant (vv. 17–18).²

Any attempt to separate covenant-keeping from predictable prosperity runs against the words of this psalm. Any attempt to say that obedience to God's law produces poverty is an affront to what God has revealed regarding His covenant. Any attempt to say that the economic outcome of widespread covenant-keeping is random also flies in the face of Deuteronomy 26, Deuteronomy 28, and Psalm 144. Yet Bible commentators and especially theologians have argued that there is no relationship between covenant-keeping and economic success in the

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 85.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), chaps. 21, 22.

New Covenant. They have argued that covenant-keeping produces either random results in terms of the specific blessings set forth in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28,³ or else it produces the opposite results that are set forth in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.⁴

The Christian church has labored for almost 2000 years under the instruction of theologians who have been hostile to economic growth as a mark of God's covenant blessings to those who obey His law. There has also been great hostility to biblical law. There has even been hostility to economic growth. There has been open hostility to the pursuit of profit. There has been hostility to merchants and businessmen. This hostility to ethical cause and effect in the realm of economic production restricted economic growth until the late eighteenth century. Christianity was not forthright in its advocacy of the kind of prayer that we find in Psalm 144. There has also been a disconnect between the covenantal framework of the Mosaic Covenant and what is presumed to be the covenantal framework of the New Covenant. It is widely assumed that there is been a total discontinuity between the two covenants. This means that Christians have rejected the testimony of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. They have therefore also rejected the testimony of Psalm 144. Theologians for over a millennium praised poverty as a goal for the spiritual elite, which includes religious orders bound together by vows of poverty. Theologians within the Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic traditions have praised these religious orders as being superior to the common realm of business. This attitude has negatively affected economic theory within Christian circles.

Conclusion

Psalm 144 is a declaration of independence from strange children (v. 11). It is also a declaration of independence from spiritual children, who do not recognize, accept, and proclaim the continuing authority of the Mosaic law regarding God's promised blessings for covenant-keeping.

3. This is Meredith G. Kline's position. See Chapter 27.

4. This is Cornelius Van Til's position. Ibid.

THE FOUNDATION OF CONFIDENCE

The LORD upholdeth all that fall, and raiseth up all those that be bowed down. The eyes of all wait upon thee; and thou givest them their meat in due season. Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing (Psalm 145:14–16).

A. The Source of Strength

This passage affirms the comprehensive sovereignty of God over the affairs of this world: point one of the biblical covenant.¹ God imposes predictable sanctions: point four.²

The psalmist begins with an affirmation that God upholds all things that fall, and He also raises up all things that are bowed down. This is an affirmation of faith in a God who protects covenant-keepers from disaster. When covenant-keepers fall, God raises them up. Therefore, they should not lose faith in the efficacy of their efforts. The psalmist is speaking of covenant-keepers, not covenant-breakers. God does not raise up all those covenant-breakers who are bowed down. On the contrary, He structures the world so that covenant-breakers are subjected to negative sanctions.

Verse 15 is widely recited in formal church liturgies. “The eyes of all wait upon thee; and thou givest of them of their meat in due season.” God provides sustenance for all the living creatures of the world. “Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing” (v. 16). This does not mean that every living thing lives until a ripe old age. The desire of one creature may involve the loss of life of another creature. Verse 16 must therefore be interpreted in terms of the provision of life for every living thing, while it lives. Every species survives only when it finds sustenance in its environmental niche. Not all species survive. Millions of them have perished.³ There is no guarantee of survival for every species under the authority of mankind. Only man is guaranteed survival by God.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Sutton, ch. 4, North, ch. 4.

The psalmist knew that members of a particular species survive through consuming members of a different species. This insight is not limited to modern man. What, then, is the psalmist attempting to convey? He is affirming the comprehensive authority of God over all living creatures. He is saying that no creature receives a benefit that God has not provided. God is the source of all life. God sustains all living creatures. No creature is autonomous. Every creature is dependent on God. "He giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry" (Psalm 147:9). If every living creature is dependent on God, then this includes mankind. The psalmist is making a point: men should acknowledge that God is the source of all their benefits. God is the source of their protection. This is the God who upholds the covenant-keeper who falls. This is the God who protects those who were covenanted to Him.

The psalmist then says that "the Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth" (v. 18). This is not an indiscriminate promise to mankind in general. This is a promise to covenant-keepers who call upon God in truth. "He will fulfill the desire of them that fear him: he also will hear their cry, and will save them" (v. 19). Again, this is not an indiscriminate promise of benefits in history. These are covenantal promises. "The LORD preserveth all them that love him: but all the wicked will he destroy" (v. 20). There are covenantal curses to match covenantal blessings. This psalm affirms the system of ethical causation that is found in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. The psalmist affirms God's sovereignty and therefore His ability to fulfill His promises. The promises that matter most, the psalmist implies, are the promises given to covenant-keepers. God also promises to undermine covenant-breakers. This system of sanctions favors those who confess faith in the God described by the psalmist.

B. A Covenantal World

The psalmist moves from the general to the particular. He moves from God's upholding of all creatures to His upholding of covenant-keepers. God not only sustains the universe, He sustains covenant-keepers who seek to extend the kingdom of God in history. His general sovereignty is invoked by the psalmist in order to increase people's faith in His specific sovereignty. He favors covenant-keepers, and He disfavors covenant-breakers.

3. Kenneth J. Hsu, The Great Dying (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1986).

The psalmist affirms that the world is structured in terms of God's covenant. The creation is not ethically neutral. God structures it so that covenant-keepers prosper, while covenant-breakers do not. The world is not cosmically impersonal. It is entirely personal.⁴ God sovereignly controls all of it.

This outlook is antithetical to modern economic theory. It asserts that the universe is not ethically impersonal. It affirms ethical principles, which are embodied in biblical law. The world is not neutral. It is not a level playing field. It is a tilted playing field. It is tilted in favor of covenant-keepers.

The psalmist is encouraging covenant-keepers to be confident in the face of adversity. Their God will lift them up if they should fall. Their God provides meat in due season for the entire creation. He is certainly capable of providing it for covenant-keepers. God opens His hand and satisfies the desire of every living thing. He will surely satisfy the desire of covenant-keepers who faithfully work to extend the kingdom of God in history. Those who oppose them will face negative sanctions from God.

This is an outlook that favors a vision of victory. God has not stacked the deck against covenant-keepers. On the contrary, God has stacked the deck against covenant-breakers. This is why the long run belongs to representatives of this God.

This mental outlook favors entrepreneurship. It favors the individual who is confident about his ability to satisfy consumer demand. He expects to make a profit. He expects to use this profit to fund further business ventures. He believes that even if he loses his fortune, God will nevertheless intervene again and uphold him in his attempt to make a new fortune. This is not a matter of luck; it is a matter of covenantal obedience.

Conclusion

This psalm affirms God's comprehensive oversight of history. He sustains all living things. There is nothing outside His control. This outlook is supposed to produce confidence. Covenant-keepers are to have confidence that their efforts will offset and overcome the efforts of covenant-breakers.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

SANCTIONS AND STIPULATIONS

Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the LORD his God: Which made heaven, and earth, the sea, and all that therein is: which keepeth truth for ever: Which executeth judgment for the oppressed: which giveth food to the hungry. The LORD looseth the prisoners: The LORD openeth the eyes of the blind: the LORD raiseth them that are bowed down: the LORD loveth the righteous: The LORD preserveth the strangers; he relieveth the fatherless and widow: but the way of the wicked he turneth upside down (Psalm 146:5–9).

The psalmist praises God as the creator who made heaven and earth. He is also the God who keeps truth forever. With this as background, the psalmist goes on to say that God executes judgment for the oppressed, gives food to the hungry, and releases the prisoners (v. 7). He says that the Lord preserves strangers and relieves orphans and widows (v. 9). God also turns the way of the wicked upside down (v. 9). The psalmist ends the psalm with an affirmation that God will reign forever (v. 10).

A. Creator and Judge

The psalmist identifies God as the Creator and Judge. God is sovereign, and God imposes historical sanctions. God is a covenantal ruler. He intervenes in history to provide judgment for the oppressed and give food to the hungry.

The psalmist does not believe in a neutral universe. He believes in a universe which is totally under the sovereignty of God. This God operates in terms of ethical standards. He intervenes in history to execute judgment for the oppressed. Civil rulers who use civil law to oppress people can be sure that they will not escape the judgment of God.

The psalmist indicates that God intervenes to defend victims of oppression in the same way that He intervenes to help the hungry. In verse eight, he says that the Lord loves righteousness. God therefore intervenes to help the poor, the powerless, the orphan, and the widow. These categories are familiar to anyone who is familiar with the Mosaic law. Strangers, orphans, and widows, along with the poor, are models of the powerless in the Mosaic law. These people are easily victimized. Throughout the Mosaic law, God tells his people that He intervenes in history on behalf of victimized individuals.

The focus of this psalm is civil government. There can be unjust civil government. The Mosaic law promises that God will intervene to defend victims of unrighteous civil government. “Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child. If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; And my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless” (Ex. 22:22–24).¹ The psalmist affirms this teaching in this psalm. It serves as a warning to magistrates who use the civil law to harm the innocent. It also offers hope to the innocent that God will intervene in history on their behalf.

This passage is favorable to judicial reform. But what kind of reform? The psalmist echoes the Mosaic law. The Mosaic law said that the civil government should not be used to oppress the innocent.² They may be weak, but they have a strong defender: God. Moses wrote down the laws that should govern civil government. It is the task of civil magistrates to enforce this law-order. When a society’s legal order conforms to the standards of the Mosaic law, there is justice. The psalmist warns covenant-breakers that God intervenes on behalf of victims of the legal order which does not conform to biblical law.

B. No Welfare State

This passage says nothing about taxation to raise funds to be distributed to the poor. It says nothing about tax policy. It does say that people can be oppressed. It says that there are hungry people, and God feeds them. It does not call on the civil government to feed them. To use passages that are favorable to the oppressed and the poor is legitimate when the critic of the prevailing social order has identified laws and practices that break the laws of the Mosaic covenant. But this is not what Social Gospel interpreters conclude about passages such as this one. They ignore the Mosaic law, and they emphasize the language of God's judgment. They see that God threatens negative sanctions against evildoers, but they do not go to the Mosaic law in order to find what God has said constitutes evildoing. They invoke the language of social justice, but they do not cite the Mosaic law in order to discover what social justice is. They use the language of outrage by the psalmists or by the prophets, but they do not invoke the standards that the psalmists and the prophets said were being violated. They call on civil magistrates to impose sanctions against evildoers, but they do not rely on the Mosaic law to identify the stipulations that the sanctions are supposed to enforce.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 48.

2. Idem.

The Mosaic law does not lay down rules that would lead to a welfare state. There is no indication in the Mosaic law that the civil government is to be an agency for the redistribution of wealth from rich people to poor people, or from middle-class people to poor people. The only redistribution that the state calls for is restitution to victims of crime by the criminals who committed the crimes.³ This is not the same as a welfare state. This is not taxation of the rich simply because they are rich, nor is it the transfer of state funds to the poor simply because they are poor. No such system of civil government appears in the Old Testament. Yet the psalmists and the prophets invoked the language of God's judgment. It is deceptive to invoke the psalms or the prophetic books in a civil reform leading to a legal order that is opposed to Mosaic law.

Conclusion

The psalmist identifies God as both Creator and Judge. God defends the victims of oppression. The psalmist warns that God brings negative sanctions against evildoers and positive sanctions for victims of oppression. He echoes the Mosaic law on this point. To appropriate the psalmist's praise of God for His support of the oppressed without also invoking the Mosaic law, which served to define oppression, is deceptive. It promotes civil oppression by promoting a legal order in opposition to the stipulations of the Mosaic law.

3. Ibid., ch. 33. Cf. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

SPECIALLY REVEALED STATUTES

He sheweth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for his judgments, they have not known them. Praise ye the LORD (Psalm 147:19–20).

The theocentric issue here is God as the law-giver. The psalmist affirms that God showed his word to Jacob and His statutes and his judgments to Israel. This is poetic language, since Jacob and Israel are two names for the same person. The psalmist makes this statement in the context of listing God's gifts to Israel. Psalm 147 is a song of praise. It lists things that God has done for His people. He makes peace on Israel's borders (v. 14). He provides snow (v. 16). He melts the ice (v. 18).

With this as background, the psalmist describes God's gift of His law. Not only has He showed his word to Jacob and His statutes to Israel, He has shown them to no one else. "He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for his judgments, they have not known them. Praise ye the Lord" (v. 20). God has dealt in a special way with the nation of Israel, and the mark of this special dealing with Israel is the Mosaic law. This is how the psalmist ends psalm 147. The Israelites are to praise the Lord because of two things: He has shown His statutes to Israel, and He has not shown them to any other nation. Israel possesses a monopoly of justice.

When the prophets came before the nations of Israel and Judah, they called the people and the rulers back to the Mosaic law. The nation had violated this law, and the prophets came to the entire nation to warn them that judgment was coming. Centuries before, psalmists had proclaimed the way of the Lord by proclaiming the way of the Mosaic law. The psalmists and the prophets warned the rulers of Israel not to oppress the people. The way to oppress the people, as the psalmists and the prophets said repeatedly, was to ignore the Mosaic law. Because the nation had ignored the Mosaic law, God promised to send the nation into captivity, the prophets warned.

To discuss the message of the psalmists and the prophets without relating this message to the stipulations of the Mosaic covenant is to practice deception. Such an analysis leads to the conclusion that the Mosaic law was not basic to the psalmists and the prophets. It implies that there can be social reform and political reform that is pleasing to God, but which has no relation to the Mosaic law. Such a proclamation is an attempt to mobilize covenant-keepers behind a political agenda whose details are not in conformity with the Mosaic law. It is an attempt to encourage Christians to work toward legal reform, but without going to the Bible in search of the legal categories and stipulations that constitute civic justice, according to the psalmists and the prophets. It is an attempt to invoke the authority of Psalms and the prophetic books in the name of God the Creator and God the Judge, but to abandon the specific laws by which He distinguished the nation of Israel from all the other nations.

The attempt by defenders of the Social Gospel to invoke the authority of Psalms and the prophetic books in the name of some version of socialist wealth redistribution reveals their hidden agenda. Their hidden agenda is to use the monopolistic power of the civil government to force their political opponents to pay for tax-funded programs that benefit their political constituents. It is an attempt to use the power of civil government to transfer wealth from one group to another group. This is done in the name of Christian charity, Christian justice, and Christian reform. Yet if the reforms do not conform to the stipulations of the Mosaic law, there is no biblical judicial basis for invoking the authority of Psalms and the prophetic books to support the political agenda of the Social Gospel.

I have surveyed those passages in Psalms that relate to economics. None of these passages has anything to do with the Social Gospel. On the contrary, the Social Gospel is antithetical to the system of private property which the Mosaic law established and which Psalms defends.¹

Conclusion

God's Bible-revealed laws are the tools of dominion.² The psalmist announces that God's gift of this law-order to Jacob constitute the basis for praise. This affirms that the laws of God offer a great benefit to the society that adopts them. They also provide a great benefit to any individual who follows them. This benefit is dominion. God blesses covenant-keepers.

1. Joel McDurmon, God Versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009).

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

Faith in this ethical system of cause and effect offers hope to covenant-keepers. They can extend God's kingdom in history by obeying God's Bible-revealed laws. God will reward obedience with blessings, including economic blessings. Covenant-keepers therefore possess a sure basis of confidence, just so long as they take the attitude of the author of Psalm 119.

I will meditate in thy precepts, and have respect unto thy ways. I will delight myself in thy statutes: I will not forget thy word. Deal bountifully with thy servant, that I may live, and keep thy word (Psalm 119:15–17).

CONCLUSION

Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession (Psalm 2:8).

A. Legitimate Confidence

Much of the Book of Psalms is devoted to the theme of confidence-building. The psalmists call on covenant-keepers to accept biblical law and obey it. If God's people do this, they will be upheld supernaturally by God.¹

This form of confidence is not self-confidence. It rests on faith in the predictability of God's sanctions in history: the fourth point of the biblical covenant.² These sanctions are in turn governed by the laws of the covenant: the third point.³ The Mosaic laws and the Mosaic sanctions were a unit under the Old Covenant. God promised in His law to intervene on behalf of the victims of evil practices, especially civil court practices, that ignored the Mosaic law.

Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt. Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child. If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; And my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless (Ex. 22:21–24).

The Book of Psalms reinforces this declaration.

Covenant-keepers have a legitimate reason for their confidence regarding the positive outcome of their labors: the covenant itself. The psalmist says that individuals are blessed when they walk in God's

1. Chapters 6, 33.

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

3. Ibid., ch. 3. North, ch. 4.

counsel. This is not limited to corporate blessings. These are individual blessings. Obedience to biblical laws produces wealth.⁴ Cause and effect are ethical.⁵ This system of ethical causation is the foundation of predictability in history. It is the basis of Christian confidence regarding the future of God's kingdom in history.⁶

B. Inheritance and Disinheritance

The psalms describe history as a dual process of inheritance and disinheritance: the fifth point of the biblical covenant.⁷ This inheritance is comprehensive. It includes culture. The Messiah is the lawful heir in history. His representatives will inherit on His behalf.⁸ God directs the inheritance. Covenant-keepers are told by the psalmist that this inheritance in history is as reliable as God's word. Poverty is not the inheritance of covenant-keepers. The wicked shall be cut off in history.⁹ Their heaping up of riches is in vain. Their legacy will be dissipated.¹⁰ He who trusts in riches has misplaced his confidence.¹¹

The historical model for the disinheritance of the wicked is the defeat of the Canaanites by Israel. The lands of the heathen were inherited by Israel. This inheritance was comprehensive. Israel inherited everything.¹² Covenant-keepers will inherit the inheritance of the heathen in history. This is inheritance through disinheritance.¹³

This is why the psalmist prays for wealth.¹⁴ This is an aspect of the inheritance.

C. Success and Failure

Covenant-breakers have a rival view of the foundation of success in history: power. God's covenant establishes a different principle: ethics over power. God rules on the basis of His office as Creator. He rules by means of His law.¹⁵ He is the sovereign Owner. This is point one of

4. Chapter 28.

5. Chapter 1.

6. Chapter 20.

7. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 5. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 5.

8. Chapter 2.

9. Chapter 6.

10. Chapter 7.

11. Chapter 9.

12. Chapter 22.

13. Chapter 22.

14. Chapter 32.

15. Chapter 3.

the biblical covenant.¹⁶ He is autonomous. He alone possesses this attribute. Autonomy is an incommunicable attribute. All ownership is therefore theocentric. Men do not own themselves; God does.¹⁷ God delegates to stewards the responsibility of managing His property on earth and in time.¹⁸ This is point two of the biblical covenant: representation.¹⁹

God is the source of water, which sustains life. This fact denies the autonomy of nature.²⁰ God brings water or removes it. This is an aspect of the great reversal.²¹

The psalmist insists that foreign kings will bring their offerings to the temple. This is also an aspect of the great reversal. The weak will triumph over the strong.²² God protects the weak and defenseless.²³ God defends the poor defendant.²⁴ Corrupt judges should understand this. It should frighten them.²⁵

This warning indicates that covenant-breakers can triumph for a time. The wicked prosper. The psalmist admits that this bothered him. But he came to his senses. God is merely placing them in slippery places. Their downfall is assured.²⁶

The comprehensive triumph in history by covenant-keepers will be visible. This victory will grieve the wicked. They will melt away. They will lose influence.²⁷

The entrepreneur must conquer his fear of failure. Psalm 107 describes men who face waves on the sea. Covenant-keepers learn that God delivers them.²⁸

D. Optimism and Pessimism

Confidence is basic to entrepreneurship. Entrepreneurship involves predicting the economic future and then acting in the present to meet future consumer demand at a competitive price. The goal is to

16. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 1.

17. Chapter 10.

18. Chapter 5.

19. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

20. Chapter 12.

21. Chapter 25.

22. Chapter 14.

23. Chapters 18, 34.

24. Chapter 26.

25. Chapter 21.

26. Chapter 17.

27. Chapter 30.

28. Chapter 24.

buy low and sell high. This mental and emotional outlook requires confidence: in the future, in cause and effect, in one's abilities. Psalms insists that this confidence is mandatory for covenant-keepers.²⁹

Pessimism about the future stifles entrepreneurship. When this pessimism is applied to culture in general, it leads to withdrawal and paralysis. Normal people do not commit to projects to transform a culture if they believe that they and those who share their views cannot win.

The psalms bring a message of confidence. They are filled with hope. They prophesy comprehensive victory for covenant-keepers.

The Book of Psalms is more openly optimistic than any other book in the Bible. It affirms that covenant-keepers will inherit civilization as surely as Israel inherited Canaan, which is the model of biblical inheritance in terms of its comprehensive character. There is therefore no book in the Bible more opposed to amillennialism. While premillennialists can consistently appropriate the Psalms' message of comprehensive inheritance, applying it to a discontinuous future millennial era, amillennialists must interpret the psalms of inheritance and victory as applying to the world beyond the final judgment. Until that day, covenant-breakers inherit, because they are in charge today and will be in charge tomorrow. How can such a view of eschatology be reconciled with the Psalms?

He hath given meat unto them that fear him: he will ever be mindful of his covenant. He hath shewed his people the power of his works, that he may give them the heritage of the heathen (Psalm 111:5–6).

Let the saints be joyful in glory: let them sing aloud upon their beds. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand; To execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people; To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron; To execute upon them the judgment written: this honour have all his saints. Praise ye the LORD (Psalm 149:5–9)

E. Inequality Forever

There is no equality in hell.³⁰ There is no equality in heaven. There

29. Chapter 27.

30. "And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have commitis no equality in history.³¹

This system of ethical cause and effect is affirmed in the Mosaic law. It appears in a concise form in Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28. The psalmists invoked this system of causation. So did the prophets.³²

The Book of Psalms does not advocate a system of economic equality. It predicts a series of reversals. Dry land will become watered; productive land will become barren.³³ A great reversal is coming: the powerful will bring tribute to the weak.³⁴ Evildoers will be trapped by their own devices.³⁵ This, too, was set forth in the Mosaic law as the ideal.

The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them: And thou shalt not go aside from any of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand, or to the left, to go after other gods to serve them (Deut. 28:12–14).

There is nothing in the Book of Psalms that supports the statist theology known as the Social Gospel, let alone Marxist-tinged Liberation Theology. There is not one word about the state as an agency of wealth redistribution. There are invocations for justice, but justice is always defined in terms of the Mosaic law.

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect ted much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:47–48). Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

31. "Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (1 Cor. 3:12–15). Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd. ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

32. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012).

33. Chapter 25.

34. Chapter 14.

35. Chapter 4.

the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour (Lev. 19:15).

Conclusion

The Book of Psalms proclaims victory in history for covenant-keepers. It announces the process of inheritance in history. Inheritance is ethical. This is affirmed in the Book of Deuteronomy, but it is affirmed far more eloquently and far more decisively in the Book of Psalms.

This should give covenant-keepers confidence. Their efforts in history will bear fruit in history. The efforts of covenant-breakers will be overwhelmed in history. There is not one word in the Book of Psalms about the final judgment and the world that will follow. The psalms are entirely earth-bound and history-bound. They do not talk about pie in the sky by and by. They talk about life on earth in history. They talk about pie on earth for covenant-keepers, and dregs for covenant-breakers. They talk about continuity for those who are meek before God, who will inherit the earth.

WISDOM AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON PROVERBS

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
 Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
 Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
 None Dare Call It Witchcraft (1976)
 Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
 Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
 Government by Emergency (1983)
 Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
 Coined Freedom (1984)
 Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
 Honest Money (1986)
 Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
 Inherit the Earth (1987)
 Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
 Healer of the Nations (1987)
 The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
 When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
 Political Polytheism (1989)
 Judeo-Christian Tradition (1990)
 The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
 Victim's Rights (1990)
Millennialism and Social Theory (1990)
 Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
 The Coase Theorem (1992)
Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
 Rapture Fever (1993)
 Tithing and the Church (1994)
Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)
 Crossed Fingers (1996)
 The Covenantal Tithe (2011)
 Mises on Money (2012)

WISDOM AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON PROVERBS

GARY NORTH

Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs
Formerly: God's Success Manual (2007)

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|--|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Personal Motivation for Holiness (Prov. 1:1–4) | 4 |
| 2. The Fear of the Lord (Prov. 1:7) | 12 |
| 3. Rival Programs of Inheritance (Prov. 1:8–10) | 17 |
| 4. Wisdom and Wealth (Prov. 1:20–22) | 24 |
| 5. Paths of Righteous Judgment (Prov. 2:6–9) | 33 |
| 6. Visible Success (Prov. 3:1–4, NEB) | 36 |
| 7. Theocentric Decision-Making (Prov. 3:5–7) | 41 |
| 8. God’s Rigged Economy (Prov. 3:9–10) | 45 |
| 9. The Value of Wisdom (Prov. 3:13–18) | 50 |
| 10. Paying Debts Promptly (Prov. 3:27–29) | 53 |
| 11. Suretyship: Transferring Liability (Prov. 6:1–2) | 57 |
| 12. Ants and Sluggards (Prov. 6:6–8) | 61 |
| 13. False Signals and Unreliability (Prov. 6:12–15) | 66 |
| 14. The Light of God’s Law (Prov. 6:20–23) | 70 |
| 15. Restitution and Impartiality (Prov. 6:30–31) | 74 |
| 16. Law: Natural vs. Creational (Prov. 8:14–16) | 78 |
| 17. The Possible Dream (Prov. 8:17–19) | 82 |
| 18. Public Paths or Private Corners (Prov. 8:20–21) | 85 |
| 19. Treasures of Wickedness (Prov. 10:2) | 89 |
| 20. Famished Souls and Empty Purses (Prov. 10:3) | 93 |
| 21. Slack Hands and Empty Purses (Prov. 10:4) | 96 |
| 22. Harvesting in Due Season (Prov. 10:5) | 101 |
| 23. Visible Blessings (Prov. 10:6) | 106 |
| 24. The Strength of Capital (Prov. 10:15) | 111 |
| 25. Just Wages (Prov. 10:16) | 114 |
| 26. Legitimate Riches (Prov. 10:22) | 117 |
| 27. A Matter of Inheritance (Prov. 10:24–25) | 121 |
| 28. Unreliable Subordinates (Prov. 10:26) | 125 |
| 29. Measuring Out Justice (Prov. 11:1) | 128 |
| 30. Defensive Walls (Prov. 11:4) | 131 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 31. A Multitude of Counselors (Prov. 11:14) | 134 |
| 32. Turn Loose to Gather In (Prov. 11:24–26) | 138 |
| 33. Two Kinds of Expansion (Prov. 11:28) | 143 |
| 34. Confidence in the Future (Prov. 12:7) | 147 |
| 35. More is Better (Prov. 12:9) | 150 |
| 36. The Object of Our Labor (Prov. 12:11) | 155 |
| 37. Diligence and Dominion (Prov. 12:24) | 161 |
| 38. Character and Capital (Prov. 13:4) | 164 |
| 39. Wealth and Poverty (Prov. 13:7) | 169 |
| 40. Wealth Accumulation (Prov. 13:11) | 172 |
| 41. Ethics and Inheritance (Prov. 13:22) | 175 |
| 42. Destructive Injustice (Prov. 13:23) | 180 |
| 43. Costs of Production (Prov. 14:4) | 184 |
| 44. Buying Friendship (Prov. 14:20) | 187 |
| 45. Dealing with the Poor (Prov. 14:21) | 191 |
| 46. Expensive Talk (Prov. 14:23) | 195 |
| 47. Oppression and Mercy (Prov. 14:31) | 198 |
| 48. The Fear of the Lord (Prov. 15:16) | 202 |
| 49. Love is Not for Sale (Prov. 15:17) | 206 |
| 50. Moving Forward (Prov. 15:19) | 210 |
| 51. Lawful ownership (Prov. 16:8) | 213 |
| 52. Weights and Measures (Prov. 16:11) | 216 |
| 53. Value and Price (Prov. 16:16) | 219 |
| 54. The High Wall of Wealth (Prov. 18:11) | 223 |
| 55. Rival Inheritance Programs (Prov. 19:14) | 226 |
| 56. Lending to God (Prov. 19:17) | 229 |
| 57. Diverse Weights (Prov. 20:10) | 234 |
| 58. The High Price of Slumber (Prov. 20:13) | 237 |
| 59. Deceptive Bargaining (Prov. 20:14) | 239 |
| 60. Demand Collateral from Fools (Prov. 20:16) | 243 |
| 61. Easy Come, Easy Go (Prov. 20:21) | 246 |
| 62. Pay Attention to Details (21:5) | 249 |
| 63. Nothing for Something (Prov. 21:6) | 252 |
| 64. Moral Causation (Prov. 21:7) | 255 |
| 65. The Cry of the Poor (Prov. 21:13) | 258 |
| 66. Biblical Bribery (Prov. 21:14) | 260 |
| 67. Economic Hierarchies (Prov. 22:7) | 265 |
| 68. A Lion in the Streets (Prov. 22:13) | 268 |
| 69. Poverty Prevention (Prov. 22:27) | 272 |
| 70. Landmarks (Prov. 22:28) | 275 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 71. In the Presence of Kings (Prov. 22:29) | 277 |
| 72. Unreliable Riches (Prov. 23:4–5) | 280 |
| 73. Supernatural Sanction (Prov. 23:10–11) | 284 |
| 74. Undisciplined Living (Prov. 23:20–21) | 288 |
| 75. The Price of Prosperity (Prov. 24:30–34) | 291 |
| 76. Rewarding our Enemies (Prov. 25:21–22) | 294 |
| 77. The Laborer's Reward (Prov. 27:18) | 297 |
| 78. Redemption and Prices (Prov. 27:20) | 300 |
| 79. Entropy and Capital (Prov. 27:23) | 306 |
| 80. The Myth of Value-Free Economic Theory (Prov. 28:6) .. | 308 |
| 81. The Disinheritance of Covenant-breakers (Prov. 28:8) ... | 311 |
| 82. Pathway to Success (Prov. 28:19) | 315 |
| 83. No Shortcuts to Success (Prov. 28:20, 22) | 318 |
| 84. The Poor Man's Judicial Cause (Prov. 29:7) | 321 |
| 85. A Middle-class Lifestyle (Prov. 30:7–9) | 324 |
| 86. Virtue and Productivity (Prov. 31:10) | 330 |
| Conclusion | 336 |

PREFACE

This book is part of a series, An Economic Commentary on the Bible. There has never before been an economic commentary on the Bible. This series is preliminary to what I hope will be a comprehensive volume on Christian economics. I decided in 1973 that I should not write such a book until I had completed the exegetical work. I wrote monographs on Christian economics, most notably An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973), Honest Money (1986), Inherit the Earth (1987), and The Coase Theorem (1991) before I completed my exegetical work in 2010.

In working with the texts of the Pentateuch, I discovered a hermeneutic¹ for assessing which Mosaic economic laws apply in the New Covenant and which do not. I summarized these in the Conclusion of my 1994 commentaries on Leviticus: the shorter Leviticus: An Economic Commentary and Boundaries and Dominion. These are:

1. Seed laws (annulled)
2. Land laws (annulled)
2. Priestly/holiness laws (annulled)
3. Cross-boundary laws (permanent)

The rules in the Book of Proverbs rest on cross-boundary laws. They are still in force.

As you will see when you read this book, I refer back to the Mosaic law when I discuss many of the economic proverbs. I sometimes also refer forward to the teachings of Jesus and Paul. I do this in order to establish my general point, namely, that these are permanent rules of action that rest on cross-boundary laws.

The proverbs are brief aphorisms that summarize or apply either a specific Mosaic law or else a principle undergirding the Mosaic law as a whole. They repeatedly call people to exercise wisdom, but a specific kind of wisdom: prudence.

This commentary can be read from start to finish as a unit. It can also be read one proverb at a time. Most commentaries survive because they are read one verse at a time. Pastors read commentaries because they want help writing a sermon, and a sermon can cover only a few verses in detail. But a commentary that focuses on a particular academic discipline is more likely than most commentaries to be read from start to finish, because readers other than pastors are likely to attempt this. The readers want insight into a particular field, not just insight into the meaning of a few verses. This series is the first such commentary in 1900 years on a specific academic discipline.

1. Principle of interpretation.

Each chapter in this commentary can stand alone. Someone who seeks information about a single proverb or a related group of proverbs will find an exposition that deals with the passage. There is repetition in the book as a whole, because each chapter was written to stand alone. I will post each chapter separately on the Web: at GaryNorth.com and at biblicaleconomics.wordpress.com. As I have said, I do not expect everyone to read this commentary from start to finish. I expect a few people to do this—those who are ready to learn the Bible's comprehensive plan for personal success. This, we find in Proverbs.

INTRODUCTION

The Book of Proverbs can legitimately be regarded as the original self-help manual. It is a handbook for personal success. No comparable handbook has come down to us from the ancient world.

The section from chapter 10 through chapter 30 offers aphorisms. An aphorism can encapsulate great wisdom in a short, memorable, and memorizable phrase. The Book of Proverbs has lots of them.

There are three major problems with any compilation of aphorisms. First, it is not easy to keep them all in the back of your mind, ready to apply in a specific situation. The decision-maker must select the applicable aphorism and then apply it to a specific set of circumstances. This is not easy. This is why a young man who memorizes Sun Tzu's Art of War probably will not wind up as a successful general. A few may; most will not. Second, the collected aphorisms may not be consistent with each other. This will lead to inconsistencies in any comprehensive program of applied wisdom. Third, it is not always clear what the overall collection's integrating conceptual framework is, if there is one.

A. The Integrating Framework

There is an integrating conceptual framework for the Book of Proverbs: the contrast between the righteous man and the unrighteous man, meaning between the wise man and the fool, between the covenant-keeper and covenant-breaker. This theme is applied to economic issues in well over a hundred proverbs. Some of these proverbs are repeated. In this book, I discuss how the basic theme applies to more than 80 separate proverbs.

There are numerous sub-themes in those proverbs that are devoted to economics. Among these are:

1. The steps to personal success
2. The standards of personal success
3. Success indicators

4. Failure indicators
5. The function of riches
6. The basis of riches
7. The concept of ownership
8. The nature of economic causation
9. The marks of a biblical economy
10. The purposes of inheritance

Each of these themes has several proverbs associated with it. All of these themes are important for devising and implementing a lifelong plan of personal success.

As with all of the books of the Bible, the Book of Proverbs is theocentric. God is central; man is not. “The king’s heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will” (Prov. 21:1) The proverbs focus on what God demands from men—holiness—not what men want from God. Yet numerous proverbs appeal openly to personal self-interest. So, the book reflects a fundamental theme in the entire Bible: the consistency between what God wants from men and what men want in this life. “But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you” (Matt. 6:33).¹

B. Economic Theory

The covenantal laws of society are found in the Mosaic covenant. These are the basis of the Proverbs. The Book of Proverbs encapsulates these laws in a way that we can more easily recall them.

This book makes clear that the society we live in is governed by ethical cause and effect. It is not governed by impersonal natural law. It is not governed by an evolving system of impersonal social laws. It is not governed by impersonal fate or impersonal chance. It is not governed by luck, either personal or impersonal. It is governed by God’s covenants. It is therefore governed by a comprehensive system of biblical law and the sanctions associated with this law.

This leads to a conclusion: there is no value-free economic theory. God is not neutral. His universe is not neutral. Any attempt to interpret the universe, including economic theory, in terms of the doctrine of value-neutrality is an assertion of man’s autonomy—collective mankind as well as the individual. Such an assertion is an act of covenant-breaking.

1. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2102), ch. 15.

Conclusion

The Book of Proverbs presents a view of economic causation that is in opposition to all modern academic economic theory, which was a self-conscious attempt to strip God and morality out of economic science.² This view insists that God, not man, imputes final economic value to everything. Men impute economic value as image-bearers of God. They do not do this autonomously.

The free market social order first appeared in Western Europe because Western Europe and colonial America were more consistently biblical in their related concepts of law and causation than other societies were in the eighteenth century. Their legal order reflected biblical law's dual affirmation of private property and personal responsibility.

The Bible is hostile to all forms of socialism and the welfare state. I have spent over three decades proving this, verse by verse. So far, Christian socialists refuse to present detailed exegetical support for their case. They do not respond to me. Meanwhile, socialism has visibly died. Communism is defunct. There was never an intellectually coherent theoretical defense of socialism, and now it has failed visibly. It impoverished those nations that adopted it. Socialism is a dead mule. It was always sterile. It is time to bury the carcass.

2. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1963).

1

PERSONAL MOTIVATION FOR HOLINESS

The proverbs of Solomon the son of David, king of Israel; To know wisdom and instruction; to perceive the words of understanding; To receive the instruction of wisdom, justice, and judgment, and equity; To give subtilty to the simple, to the young man knowledge and discretion (Prov. 1:1–4).

A. A Holy Kingdom

God wants His covenant people to be holy, for He is holy. “Speak unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, and say unto them, Ye shall be holy: for I the LORD your God am holy” (Lev. 19:2). This requirement extends into the New Covenant era. Peter affirmed this principle. “Because it is written, Be ye holy; for I am holy” (I Peter 1:16).

Holiness is made visible by obeying God’s Bible-revealed laws.

This day the LORD thy God hath commanded thee to do these statutes and judgments: thou shalt therefore keep and do them with all thine heart, and with all thy soul. Thou hast avouched the LORD this day to be thy God, and to walk in his ways, and to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and to hearken unto his voice: And the LORD hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people, as he hath promised thee, and that thou shouldest keep all his commandments; And to make thee high above all nations which he hath made, in praise, and in name, and in honour; and that thou mayest be an holy people unto the LORD thy God, as he hath spoken (Deut. 26:16–19).

God wants all those who do obey His laws to become visibly successful as members of a uniquely holy people in a social order that has been established by means of a public, corporate, oath-bound coven- ant. Visible blessings are basic (Deut. 28:1–14).¹ He wants people to use their success in this life to extend His kingdom in history. “But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you” (Matt. 6:33).²

God has gone to extreme lengths to enable people to do this, even to the extent of sending His Son into this world to live the life required of all people, then to die on behalf of mankind in general (common grace)³ and for His covenant people in particular (special grace). God is highly motivated. “For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life” (John 3:16).

B. Personal Motivation

In order to persuade His covenant people to become highly motivated to discover, develop, and implement their individual talents in a program of kingdom extension, God offers a comprehensive program of personal self-improvement. This program is presented in the Book of Proverbs. This book is God’s handbook for self-improvement. There is none like it in the literature of the ancient world.

Because the Book of Proverbs is deliberately motivational, we should expect to find in the book examples of highly motivational communications. Perhaps the book could even become a model for motivational communications, yet suitable for kingdom use. This is exactly what we find.

There is a rule governing direct-response advertising, which is a highly specific form of motivational literature: “Lead with the benefits. Follow with the proof.” Benefits motivate people to read your advertisement. If they are not motivated early, they will not read it. There is second rule: “Be explicit regarding the benefits unless the benefits are obvious to virtually everyone in your targeted audience.” The more obvious the benefits, the better. You then do not have to devote space to persuade people to read your advertisement. People are already highly motivated with respect to these benefits. There is a third rule: “Offer people hope.” If they have no hope, they will not act. If they will not act, they will not change.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 15

3. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

The introductory words of the Book of Proverbs adhere to all three rules. This passage identifies the author, who has a reputation for possessing two major benefits that are widely desired: wisdom and wealth. These benefits need no explanation. Because the reader knows who Solomon was, these two benefits are implicit rather than explicit. This also saves space. Finally, the passage motivates the reader by appealing to his hope that he, too, can become successful.

Only after doing this does the book present a long list of specific motivations: gaining specific benefits and avoiding specific liabilities. This motivational strategy conforms to direct-response advertising's fourth rule: "People respond to their immediate concerns. The more specific these concerns are addressed in the ad, the more likely people will take action." This is sometimes referred to as the hot-button rule.

So, there must be a combination of universally recognized benefits and highly specific benefits. The Book of Proverbs offers this combination as no other surviving document from the ancient world does.

C. Implied Benefits

The opening words of the book list the benefits.

The proverbs of Solomon the son of David, king of Israel; To know wisdom and instruction; to perceive the words of understanding; To receive the instruction of wisdom, justice, and judgment, and equity; To give subtilty to the simple, to the young man knowledge and discretion.

Solomon does not spell out these benefits. He merely lists them. He assumes that they are well known by his targeted audience. This saves space.

1. Wisdom

The first benefit for reading this book is implied: to discover how Solomon, the son of David and the king of Israel, made his decisions. This is why the book begins with the identification of its source: Solomon. The text does not say that Solomon wrote the book, only that these are his proverbs. Beginning with chapter 25 and continuing through chapter 30, the proverbs are said to be Solomon's, but they were copied by scribes in King Hezekiah's reign. "These are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out” (Prov. 25:1). Hezekiah’s reign lasted from about 716 B.C. to 687.⁴ This was over two centuries after Solomon’s reign. Either the proverbs had been memorized and passed down orally, or else they had been written down, passed down, and compiled at the later date. The author of the book’s opening words was intimately familiar with these proverbs—so intimate that he risked attributing them to the king. The presumption is that the compiler was Solomon or someone very close to him.

This identification of the source of the proverbs brings great authority to this collection within a targeted audience: covenant-keepers. They know who Solomon is. Not everyone does. Those who have read the Bible know. In his day, his reputation extended beyond the borders of Israel. He was internationally known for his wisdom, especially his good judgment as a ruler. Other rulers from the region came to see him execute judgment, and they marveled. The queen of Sheba came and witnessed his abilities as a judge. “And she said to the king, It was a true report that I heard in mine own land of thy acts and of thy wisdom. Howbeit I believed not the words, until I came, and mine eyes had seen it: and, behold, the half was not told me: thy wisdom and prosperity exceedeth the fame which I heard” (I Kings 10:6–7).

2. Wealth

The queen of Sheba was so impressed that she gave a large gift to him, “an hundred and twenty talents of gold, and of spices great abundance, and precious stones: neither was there any such spice as the queen of Sheba gave king Solomon” (II Chron. 9:9).

His career testified visibly to a close relationship between judgment and wealth. Great wealth came to him because of his wisdom, as the queen’s visit exemplifies. His life was a living testimony to the entire region that wisdom in judgment produces benefits for all, including the ruler who possesses such wisdom.

So, the second benefit is also implied: how to attain great wealth, just as Solomon did. This is a universally recognized benefit. These proverbs were compiled by a very rich man. No book in the Bible provides more information regarding the way to wealth. Yet what is striking about the Book of Proverbs is the centrality of its ethical framework. It initially focuses on ethics. Only when this issue is settled early in the book does Solomon move on to the practical implementation of his strategy of success, which is at bottom ethical.

4. This is the estimate of E. R. Thiele. W. F. Albright dated this from 715 to 687. “Hezekiah,” Wikipedia Encyclopedia. (<http://bit.ly/HezekiahWiki>)

So, the introduction is both universal and specific. It offers wisdom and wealth on the authority of a man renowned as possessing both, a man whose name is recognized by members of a targeted audience. This combination of universal and specific is essential for a direct-response motivational communication.

3. Hope

Simple people recognize that they are simple. From long experience, they have learned that others are quicker to perceive the decisive conditions of social relationships. Others can make self-seeking decisions through this perception and their wits. How can a simple person compete in such a competitive world? This proverb says that the solution is instruction in wisdom, justice, judgment, and equity. These topics seem to be aspects of a realm of high-level decision-making. But this proverb says that simple people can be elevated into this realm as successful practitioners.

Jesus recognized this aspect of success in God's kingdom.

And Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, And said, Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 18:2–4).

The simple person is not to be childish but rather childlike. He is to be humble before God and His law, as a child is humble before his parents and their rules. He receives instruction in the basics of government. This instruction provides him with practical wisdom: the ability to make morally straight plans in a morally crooked world. Jesus said: "Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves: be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves" (Matt. 10:16).

Similarly, instruction provides a young person with knowledge and discretion. Solomon presumes that these gifts are not normally associated with young people, who tend to be impetuous. The reader also presumes this. The fact that instruction according to wisdom can overcome the impetuosity of youth testifies to its transformational power.

So, the third implied benefit is that simple people, young people, and common people can master the rules of wisdom, which in turn produce success in life. This is an open book. It is available to all people. It is a manual of success that is available to mentally average people. Its implied promise: success for the wise. The wise need not be of above-average intelligence. They must be of above-average ethics.

The opening passage appeals to a person's positive self-image. Then it extends this appeal by asserting that this is not a matter of superior intelligence, but rather something open to all: ethics. It says, "You can do this."

D. The Power of Wise Instruction

Man is pictured in the opening words of Proverbs as being in need of instruction. A wise man receives instruction in wisdom, justice, judgment, and equity (fairness). The Hebrew words are revealing. The word for wisdom, sakal, means circumspect. It also means intelligent. There is the sense of prudence about the term. The word for justice, tsedeq, means rightness. It can also mean prosperity, which is worth noting. The word for judgment, mishpat, has the sense of rendering a verdict based on law. Finally, the word for equity, meysar, refers to straightness. This reminds us of the Hebrews' instruction to Joshua before they entered the land of Canaan. "Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest" (Josh. 1:7). The Hebrew word for "prosper" here is sakal—wisdom. We see in this passage a relationship between faithful law-keeping and prosperity.

The text also says that such instruction provides subtlety for the simple and discretion to the young. The Hebrew word for subtlety can have the sense of guile: trickery. "But if a man come presumptuously upon his neighbour, to slay him with guile; thou shalt take him from mine altar, that he may die" (Ex. 21:14). The Gibeonites were subtle, tricking the Israelites into making a binding covenant with them to remain in the land as servants. They were wily. "They did work wily, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors, and took old sacks upon their asses, and wine bottles, old, and rent, and bound up" (Josh. 9:4). In most instances, this word has the sense of devious plans, but not always. It can mean wisdom. Solomon says in this book, "O ye simple, understand wisdom: and, ye fools, be ye of an understanding heart" (8:5). It can mean prudence. "I wisdom dwell with prudence, and find out knowledge of witty inventions" (8:12).

The simple-minded person cannot rely on cleverness to achieve his ends. He lacks subtlety. Yet instruction can provide this missing ability. How is this possible? By providing the awareness of social causation, an awareness made possible by the lifelong experience of hearing the law of God in the context of real-world decision-making. This is what the Old Testament provided, in a way that no other ancient document did. It set forth the legal order of Moses in the context of the story of God's covenant people. That story was grounded in law. It was the manifestation of God's covenantal, law-bound dealings with a rebellious nation.

Conclusion

The Book of Proverbs begins by identifying the source of these proverbs: an internationally known ruler who possessed great wealth compiled them. This identification is sufficient to attract attention.

For those readers and listeners who recognize who Solomon was, the introduction offers three benefits: good judgment, personal success, and access for all. Through the information contained in this entire collection of proverbs, simple people can be made clever, and young people can be made discreet. Had these claims not come from a man of known integrity and widely known success, they would not be readily believed.

Early in this collection, Solomon sets forth the value of wisdom. He says that the kind of wisdom his instruction offers is something of great value. If it can make the simpleton subtle and the youth discreet, what can it do for the common man, who is neither simple nor young? What can it do for the clever person? Clearly, "A wise man will hear, and will increase learning; and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels" (v. 5). This man is prudent.

Solomon invites the reader to consider the material in this collection. He says that wise people will do this. This implies that people who lack wisdom will not. He says, in effect, "If you are neither wise nor a person of understanding, you need not continue to read what I have to say." This is a form of screening: "Wise people only." This is a form of motivation. A reader presumably thinks he is wise, although not necessarily clever. He thinks: "This book is aimed at me." This is motivation to continue reading.

This promise of open access also implies that wisdom is not a matter of innate intelligence. If a simple person can be made subtle through a mastery of these proverbs, this is a great motivation for everyone to read and commit these proverbs to memory. It means that there is something beneficial here for everyone. Wisdom is presented here as a matter of ethics rather than a matter of innate intelligence. A simple person can learn what is right. This information, when coupled with a willingness to apply biblical ethics in day-to-day decisions, leads to success. People want success. They want to believe that they can attain success. So, there is great motivation presented here for mastering and applying these proverbs: to become like Solomon.

For approximately three thousand years, millions of people have considered carefully what he had to say.

2

THE FEAR OF THE LORD

The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction (Prov. 1:7).

Here is one of the fundamental verses in the Old Testament, on a par with “Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD” (Deut. 6:4). This proverb establishes the fundamental principle of epistemology, which asks: “What can a man reliably know, and how can he know it?”

A. God the Judge

The proverb does not say that knowledge of the Lord in general precedes knowledge in general. It says that the fear of the Lord is the starting point for all accurate knowledge. We do not learn about the God of the Bible from a careful study of His incommunicable attributes—omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence—let alone from any of medieval scholasticism’s five proofs of God. Instead, we learn of God as the supreme cosmic judge who brings negative sanctions in both time and eternity. This is the God of the covenant: God, the sanctions-bringer.¹ Ignore this aspect of God’s character, and you cannot possess accurate knowledge of either God or the cosmos. All such sanctions-denying knowledge, while potentially accurate in its observational details of specific cause and effect—drop the rock on your foot, and your foot hurts—keeps men ignorant of the cosmic drama: God vs. Satan, covenant-keeper vs. covenant-breaker.

The wise man accepts God as He says in the Bible that He is: the supreme agent of judgment. The fool does not. The wise man begins with the fear of God. The fool does not. The mark of the fool is that he despises wisdom and instruction.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

This does not mean that he despises all instruction. Everyone learns about cause and effect in history. Everyone has a concept of the way the world works. But in the context of this passage, wisdom and instruction refer to applications of the principle that the God of the Bible should be feared. Wisdom and instruction refer to the Bible's theory of causation. Isaiah announced:

I am the LORD, and there is none else, there is no God beside me: I girded thee, though thou hast not known me: That they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west, that there is none beside me. I am the LORD, and there is none else. I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the LORD do all these things. Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness: let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together; I the LORD have created it. Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands? (Isa. 45:5–9).

The fool denies this. He believes that he operates in a world independent of the God of the Bible who brings judgment in history. The prophet Isaiah identified such a fool: the nation of Israel.

Therefore hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly, that sayest in thine heart, I am, and none else beside me; I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children: But these two things shall come to thee in a moment in one day, the loss of children, and widowhood: they shall come upon thee in their perfection for the multitude of thy sorceries, and for the great abundance of thine enchantments. For thou hast trusted in thy wickedness: thou hast said, None seeth me. Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, it hath perverted thee; and thou hast said in thine heart, I am, and none else beside me. Therefore shall evil come upon thee; thou shalt not know from whence it riseth: and mischief shall fall upon thee; thou shalt not be able to put it off: and desolation shall come upon thee suddenly, which thou shalt not know (Isaiah 47:8–11).

Isaiah brought a covenant lawsuit. Every covenant lawsuit threatens the listener with God's negative sanctions.

B. Avoiding Losses

Negative sanctions, not positive sanctions, are the focus of this proverb. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge. We do not fear His positive sanctions. We fear His negative sanctions. So, the beginning of knowledge points to the threat of loss. Jesus said to His disciples: “And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell” (Matt. 10:28).

A familiar theme in Western literature is the corrupt bargain with the devil. Someone seeks positive sanctions in history. In order to gain them, he makes a bargain—a contract—with Satan regarding the afterlife. He trades his soul in eternity for blessings in history. This theme is a variation of Satan’s temptation of Jesus in the wilderness. “Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me” (Matt. 4:8–9).² Here, Satan offered positive sanctions. He did not mention negative sanctions. Neither did the serpent mention negative sanctions to Eve. He did not have to. Eve knew. “And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden: But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die” (Gen. 3:2–3).

The fool denies that God brings negative sanctions in history. To turn to God as the source of positive sanctions in history would imply faith in God as the source of negative sanctions. So, the fool seeks positive sanctions elsewhere: from nature, from the strength of his own hands, or from a corrupt bargain with others. This is what Solomon warns against in the early section of the book.

Proverbs, along with the entire Bible, teaches that the positive sanctions offered by Satan or his covenant-breaking subordinates are not worth the price: the negative sanctions imposed by God. Proverbs affirms a value scale and a theory of causation that stand in opposition to Satan’s. The wise man imputes great value to God’s positive sanctions, but this is not the starting point for biblical wisdom. The starting point is man’s imputation of negative value to covenant-breaking. Covenant-keeping begins with the fear of God. It is the avoidance of

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

God's negative sanctions, not the promise of positive sanctions, that initially motivates the covenant-keeper. This fear of God is the first step to covenantal maturity.

Men trust something to provide positive sanctions. They also fear negative sanctions. If men fear God as the sanctions-bringer in history and eternity, they are less likely to fear any aspect of the creation, whose sanctions are both temporal and subordinate to God's sanctions. By trusting God and by obeying God, covenant-keepers have a sure way to deal with the negative sanctions threatened by the creation. They can exercise dominion over the creation precisely because they fear God more than they fear any aspect of the creation. In every social philosophy, the source of negative sanctions occupies the peak of the hierarchy. This proverb is clear: God occupies this place of supremacy.

We must seek to avoid the negative sanction of loss. The New Covenant affirms that the supreme positive sanction is God's removal of the threat of negative sanctions in eternity.

Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire (I Cor. 3:13–15).³

The forfeiture of eternal salvation is the ultimate loss. In contrast, the loss of God's positive sanctions in eternity is tolerable. The imposition of God's negative eternal sanctions is not. They must be tolerated for eternity (Luke 16:19–31).⁴

Conclusion

The Book of Proverbs affirms God as the source of all sanctions, positive and negative. God has laid down His law in the Bible. This law is confirmed by sanctions, both positive and negative. Godly instruction affirms causality as governed by a sovereign God. The fool rejects such instruction.

The implication of this proverb is not intuitive, but it is crucial: if you can avoid negative sanctions, positive sanctions will compound over time. Success begins with a systematic program to avoid losses. The Book of Proverbs supplies this program.

3. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40.

This implies that positive sanctions are more fundamental than negative sanctions. This in turn implies that dominion is more fundamental than linear history. It is not simply that time moves forward to final judgment. It is that there is progress in history, which is not limited to doctrinal precision. Covenant-keepers have legitimate hope for history. This begins with the fear of God.

3

RIVAL PROGRAMS OF INHERITANCE

My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother: For they shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck. My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not (Prov. 1:8–10).

A. Inheritance and Disinheritance

This passage deals with inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant.¹ A father tells his son that parental instruction and law are the equivalents of an ornament of grace—a crown—and a necklace. These are positive sanctions, clearly part of an inheritance: parents to son. The imagery here is of visible representations of power and wealth.

In contrast is disinheritance. The way of sinners is the way of death. Death comes in the form of temptation: to depart from the paths of righteousness. The father lists the enticements that sinners offer to righteous people in their effort to corrupt them. The list focuses on illegitimate ways to extract wealth from judicially innocent victims. These are crimes, for they involve either fraud or violence.

If they say, Come with us, let us lay wait for blood, let us lurk privily for the innocent without cause: Let us swallow them up alive as the grave; and whole, as those that go down into the pit: We shall find all precious substance, we shall fill our houses with spoil (1:11–13).

This is an exceptionally clear framing of the crime of theft. The language invokes the image of the grave. The victims are to be murdered. To “wait for blood” is to plot to commit murder. Life is in the blood.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5, (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat. And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man (Gen. 9:4–5).

For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul (Lev. 17:11).

The goal is economic gain. “We shall find all precious substance, we shall fill our houses with spoil.” This is disinheritance. The victims' heirs will someday deserve this wealth, but murderers plan to obtain it.

Then comes the proposed benefit. “Cast in thy lot among us; let us all have one purse” (1:14). The gang of murderers shares a common purse. The wealth of the innocent victims will fill this purse. Then the criminals will share the proceeds of the crime. Nothing is said regarding the proportional shares that will be eventually handed out to the participants. Nothing is said of the structure of organizational authority that decides who gets what and when. The target of this enticement is expected to trust the intent and judgment of those criminals who possess institutional authority. This assumption is known by the phrase, “honor among thieves.”

B. A Criminal Conspiracy

The sinners entice a man into crime by offering him a share in the proceeds. But who is to police the thieves? Who is to monitor the purse? If it pays to spill innocent blood, why shouldn't it pay to spill the blood of one's partners in crime? The restraint of God's law is not part of the psychological makeup of criminals. There is not the same degree of self-government that we find in families that bring up their children to fear God and respect His law. Therefore, coercion within conspiracies must be far greater. Fear governs them.

Solomon is contrasting two ways of life: God-fearing and God-hating. He is contrasting the economic results of the two ways of life: prosperity and destruction. The righteous bring good judgment to their daily lives; the unrighteous bring bad judgment, violence, and destruction. The evil that men practice against the innocent becomes part of the psychological make-up of the evildoers. They cannot escape their habitual patterns of existence. They seek gain at the expense of those who possess wealth. Their colleagues in crime share the spoils. In so doing, they become each other's targets.

Solomon understood this. "For their feet run to evil, and make haste to shed blood. Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird, And they lay wait for their own blood; they lurk privily for their own lives. So are the ways of every one that is greedy of gain; which taketh away the life of the owners thereof" (1:16–19). What bird is he speaking about? Each member of the gang. They lay nets for each other, but not in plain sight. In the criminal conspiracy, the secret society, and the brotherhood of blood, the members are threatened by the inescapable results of their own ethics. They believe that non-members are fit for the slaughter. But this attitude cannot be restricted easily to the world outside the "household" of the brotherhood. It spreads into the inner circle.

C. Common Purse, Common Curse

The common purse guarantees their downfall. It becomes the supreme prize in an organization that imitates a family, but without the bond of love. As with a family's common purse, the gang's common purse is filled with money. What is the basis of the allocation of this money? In a family, the father allocates the family's wealth. In a criminal conspiracy, a pseudo-father does, or a council of would-be patriarchs. This raises the central organizational question: Allocation by what standard? Who imputes value to the individual efforts of the conspiracy's members?

Here is the central issue of all economic theory: imputation. Imputation is subjective. Value is therefore subjective. The epistemological question is this: How can men accurately impute economic value to the world around them? Specifically, how can they accurately assess the economic value of the contributions of other men?

The free market provides a constant assessment of each man's contribution to the production process. There is a gigantic competitive auction for labor, for capital goods, for raw materials, and for all other scarce economic resources. This auction process produces prices by which we can evaluate what we are worth to others in the market, as well as what they are worth to us. This competitive bidding process is based on a legal principle: open entry to a market, i.e., competition without coercion. Free pricing, the accountant's profit-and-loss report, and the legal right to transfer ownership are all essential to our knowledge of what different things really cost.² Economic freedom brings us accurate knowledge, and therefore more wealth.

In contrast to a free market, the criminal conspiracy is coercive. It is a collective. As in a socialist economy, it cannot permit open competition for men's services. Criminals cannot openly advertise their services to other "customers." Also, oath-bound brotherhoods are closed societies. Members cannot leave in response to higher bids from other criminal conspiracies. Thus, it becomes difficult—in fact, almost impossible—for the members of a criminal band to assess the economic contribution of each member.

Here is the curse of the common purse. The way that criminals decide who is to receive what portion is by coercion. The strongest get the largest portions. But this places a premium on ruthlessness. The bloodthirstiness of criminals is enhanced by the very nature of collective ownership. They all share one purse. The source of the capital in the purse is not economic production, but rather economic pillage and destruction. This is why criminal conspiracies and socialist governments are often allies. The concept of a common purse to be filled by stealing the wealth of productive people is common to both criminal conspiracies and socialist and communist political conspiracies. In both cases, to cite Hayek's famous tenth chapter in The Road to Serfdom (1944), the worst get on top.

Secrecy is basic to such societies. But this secrecy is not limited to those outside the brotherhood. "Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird" (1:17). Those who are intent on snaring unsuspecting birds become masters of concealing nets. Traps are sprung on those who least suspect them. For this reason, every member knows that he is a potential bird, and he must live a life of continual wariness. To escape traps and to set traps: this is on the minds of members of a criminal band. They snare the helpless as a way of life. These skills are not abandoned within the conspiracy.

Satanism exhibits certain recurring features: secret oaths, signs, and communications; death threats to any who would break the vow of secrecy; malicious intent against those outside the secret order; the quest for wealth and power by means of coercion against the productive members of society; and the common purse. It was not an accident that Judas was a thief, that he secretly conspired against Christ, that he was possessed by Satan, and that he controlled the disciples' common purse (John 12:6). The temptations associated with the common purse are so great that the New Testament specifies that those who control church finances—deacons—must live otherwise blameless, public lives (I Tim. 3:8–13).³ What goes into the common purse in a godly society is limited: the tithe for the church, and minimal revenues for the civil government. The society of Satan is the society of the universal common purse.

2. The classic statement of this principle is Ludwig von Mises, "Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth" (1920), reprinted in F. A. Hayek (ed.), Collectivist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1935), ch. 3. (<http://mises.org/pdf/econcalc.pdf>) The academic community either ignored or actively denied the truth of Mises' insight until 1991, when the Soviet Union's socialist economy collapsed, and that enormous nation-empire ceased to exist.

D. Faith in Violence

The intended targets of the conspiracy are judicially innocent. They also possess wealth. The conspirators devise a plan to reallocate this wealth into the common purse. They seek to substitute their goals for those of the innocent but economically successful victims. They seek to thwart the allocation of wealth that has been produced by society in a non-violent way. They propose to substitute violence for peace.

The teacher advises the listener to reject the offer and avoid the enticer. "My son, walk not thou in the way with them; refrain thy foot from their path: For their feet run to evil, and make haste to shed blood" (1:15–16). The mental image is of men moving in haste. They are not shuffling toward evil, nor walking at a brisk clip. They are running. This points to their self-conscious embrace of evil. There is no hesitation here. These conspirators are not ready to hear counsel from the righteous.

They know exactly what they are doing in the sense of self-conscious preparation. They do not know what they are doing in the sense of awareness of God's covenantal system of ethical cause and effect. Their understanding of causality is defective. They regard violence against the innocent as the basis of success in this life. They are power religionists.⁴ This assessment undergirds the following passage.

Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird. And they lay wait for their own blood; they lurk privily for their own lives. So are

3. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 4.

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012) , Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985).

the ways of every one that is greedy of gain; which taketh away the life of the owners thereof (1:17–19)

If a bird can see the net, it will not venture into the trap. Success in the hunt rests on successful deception of the victim. The conspirators understand this, which is why their plan involves lurking. Thus, the innocent will fall into their trap. This passage points to the larger picture. God has set a trap for the conspirators.

This trap has a trigger: the conspirators' trap. In setting a trap for the innocent, they will be snared themselves. God's covenantal system of cause and effect governs men's plans. But covenant-breakers do not acknowledge that they operate in a larger system of causation. They do not understand that, in setting a trap for the innocent, they set a trap for themselves. "And they lay wait for their own blood; they lurk privily for their own lives."

The passage ends with a summation: "So are the ways of every one that is greedy of gain; which taketh away the life of the owners thereof" (1:19). The father warns his son that there is a pattern of criminality. The criminal seeks to gain at the expense of a proposed victim. The example of a band of murderous thieves serves as the model. The group seeks to get rich at someone else's expense. This involves murder. It is at bottom a transfer of inheritance.

The conspirators do not operate in a universe in which power is supreme. They operate in a universe in which ethics is supreme, for God is absolutely sovereign. He is a God of law and justice. There is power, but this power does not rest on the principle that might makes right. It rests on the principle that supreme right is enforced by supreme might. As the Creator, God possesses supreme right and supreme power. He delegates power and wealth in terms of His decree and the legal order He has established to govern mankind. The laws of inheritance, not the exercise of power, are to govern the transfer of property, generation to generation. All attempts to interfere with these Bible-revealed laws of inheritance are a form of theft.

Conclusion

The Book of Proverbs presents the story of competition for inheritance in history. Rival organizations compete for the allegiance of men. Each offers a program of inheritance.

The father's offer of inheritance is based on ethics: covenant-keeping. The first nine chapters of Proverbs present the father's testament to his son: godly wisdom. The father's inheritance correlates righteousness and success.

In contrast is a rival program of inheritance. It leads to death. It is based on an illegal attempt to steal the godly inheritance. Seduction is basic to this program of disinheritance. So are deception, theft, and murder. The archetype is the Fall of man in the garden. Its historical extension is described here in the Book of Proverbs: a challenge to the laws of righteousness by a conspiracy that promotes ethical rebellion.

4

WISDOM AND WEALTH

Wisdom crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets: She crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the openings of the gates: in the city she uttereth her words, saying, How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and the scornors delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge? (Prov. 1:20–22).

A. The Lure of Two Women

Wisdom is personified as female in the Book of Proverbs. The first instance of this practice is here. There is no explanation for this in the proverb. My explanation is this: because covenant-breaking is pictured throughout the Old Testament as the equivalent of harlotry, and because the theme of the first nine chapters of Proverbs is the conflict between wisdom and foolishness, the personification of wisdom as female makes sense. Wisdom is the faithful wife.

Wisdom is pictured here as standing in the public square and calling men to return to her. There are three categories of listeners: simpletons, scornors, and fools. She goes into the streets, where people can be found. She goes into the concourse—the public square—which is where the streets come together: the center of the city. She also goes to the gates of the city, where civic judgment is rendered.

Biblical religion is a public faith for the public square. It is not a religion confined to the hearth and home. It is therefore not the religion of classical Greece, where a wife tended the household's fire as a family priestess,¹ but had no influence in the courts.² In classical religion—Greece and Rome—women had no public role to play in the religion of the city. A woman served as a priestess at the Oracle of Delphi: the Py-

1. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Book II, Chapter IX.

2. Ibid., I:VIII:2, III.

thia. Women served in Rome as vestal virgins who kept the city's fire burning. This was the only official religious role for Roman women. Women played no role in politics, since civic religion was the basis of politics.³ The women who exercised influence in the corridors of power in classical Greece were courtesans—adulterous mistresses of powerful married men. In Israel, Deborah served as a judge. This would have been inconceivable in classical Greece.

Wisdom in this passage serves the same role as a prophet did in Mosaic Israel: someone who brings a covenant lawsuit against the nation. She publicly identifies the sources of Israel's covenant-breaking: simpletons, scorners, and fools. The people have gone astray. This is not a conspiracy against the people by covenant-breaking rulers. This is a conspiracy against God by the whole nation. Wisdom cries out: "Turn you at my reproof: behold, I will pour out my spirit unto you, I will make known my words unto you" (1:23).

Wisdom is personified. She offers to pour out her spirit on men. Wisdom here is presented as the personification of God. Wisdom is not pictured as impersonal, but rather as highly personal.

Wisdom is not the only woman in the public square. The harlot is there, too. She also seeks for those who will listen to her, and then follow her imprecations.

For at the window of my house I looked through my casement, And beheld among the simple ones, I discerned among the youths, a young man void of understanding, Passing through the street near her corner; and he went the way to her house, In the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night: And, behold, there met him a woman with the attire of an harlot, and subtil of heart. (She is loud and stubborn; her feet abide not in her house: Now is she without, now in the streets, and lieth in wait at every corner.) So she caught him, and kissed him, and with an impudent face said unto him, I have peace offerings with me; this day have I payed my vows. Therefore came I forth to meet thee, diligently to seek thy face, and I have found thee (7:6–15).

B. The Correct Response

What is the correct response to these conflicting calls? "To know wisdom and instruction; to perceive the words of understanding; to receive the instruction of wisdom, justice, and judgment, and equity; to give subtilty to the simple, to the young man knowledge and discretion” (1:2–4).

3. Ibid., III:VII:3, XII.

The early chapters of Proverbs are concerned with biblical wisdom: how to obtain it, cultivate it, and apply it. Proverbs also contrasts biblical wisdom with the false wisdom of this world, which lures the unsuspecting into the lusts of the flesh. It is stated repeatedly that wisdom is a valuable asset.

Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her. Length of days is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and honour. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace (3:13–17).⁴

Of all capital assets, biblical wisdom has the highest rate of return.

The comparisons here are revealing. Gold, silver, precious gems, long life: wisdom is greater than all of these. Throughout the book, long life, riches, and honor are closely associated with biblical wisdom, indicating that wisdom leads to these external blessings. We are reminded of the words of Jesus concerning the kingdom of God: “But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you” (Matt. 6:33).⁵ The old hymn, “I’d rather have Jesus than silver and gold” really misses the point. Better to sing, “I’d rather have Jesus and silver and gold.” There is a relationship between (1) the exercise of biblical wisdom, biblical justice, and biblical judgment and (2) outward signs of prosperity.

Solomon was noted both for his wisdom (I Kings 4:29–34) and his wealth (I Kings 10). In fact, the queen of Sheba’s words linked the two. “And she said to the king, It was a true report that I heard in mine own land of thy acts and of thy wisdom. Howbeit I believed not the words, until I came, and mine eyes had seen it: and, behold, the half was not told me thy wisdom and prosperity exceedeth the fame which I heard” (I Kings 10:6–7).

C. What Is Wisdom?

The emphasis in Proverbs is not on the possession of knowledge as a mass of facts, including economic facts. Proverbs encourages the

4. Chapter 9.

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 15.

quest for wisdom, which is associated with honest judgment, justice, and fairness (equity). It is also important to have the ability to impart this wisdom to the naive (“simple”) and the young, who are impressionable.⁶ This indicates that knowledge of God’s principles is not to be a monopoly of a priestly elite. “To understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark [puzzling] saying” (1:6). The translation of the mental puzzles of the wise into the language of the people is deemed by the public to be a sign of true wisdom.

Wisdom is not simply right knowledge, but also right action. Wisdom is applied ethics. There are cause-and-effect relationships in this world that must be respected if men are to prosper. The fundamental principle is this one: “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction” (1:7).⁷ It is the awful (awe-full) fear of God that should begin a man’s education. This is the first principle of cause and effect. The wise man is a competent judge of people, as well as situations. He relates God’s principles of ethics to the concrete events of the day. Solomon’s wisdom was demonstrated in the case of the two women who argued over whose baby was whose. He threatened to cut the child in half. He then saw which woman agreed to give up the child to the other (I Kings 31:28). This case is the biblical archetype of wise judgment by a civil ruler. Relating God’s laws to men’s lives is the essence of biblical wisdom. This is biblical casuistry in action.

The Book of Proverbs is an eminently practical book. The introductory section creates interest by the reader in what is to follow, thereby increasing the likelihood that he will take the proverbs seriously. The first nine chapters are devoted to a presentation of the importance of wisdom. Then 21 chapters follow, which give us the proverbs of Solomon (who had 3,000 of them, along with 1,005 songs: I Kings 4:32). Then the final chapter gives us the insights of King Lemuel’s mother, whoever she was. These proverbs are supposed to be considered carefully and then acted upon.

These proverbs represent a form of capital. Adhering to the proverbs produces an increase in personal wealth. But an increase in personal wealth is not sufficient to guarantee success. This is one of the themes of the early section. What is needed to guarantee success is the wisdom to serve as a faithful steward of the wealth that is to come. To present to men a handbook for increasing wealth is not enough; they need moral capital to make proper use of the forthcoming income.

6. Chapter 1.

7. Chapter 2.

Capital, in the Bible's perspective, comes from conformity to the laws of God (Deut. 28:1–14).⁸ Increasing per capita wealth is part of God's program of "positive feedback," wherein conformity to God's law increases a man's wealth (and a society's wealth), which in turn is to serve as a confirmation of the reliability of the covenant. "But thou shalt remember the Lord thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).⁹ To establish His covenant, He gives faithful men their wealth. The progression is supposed to conform to this pattern: obedience . . . increase . . . greater obedience . . . greater increase . . . dominion.

In order to integrate the laws of economics with the facts of economic life, men need a guide. This guide is the Bible. The special revelation of God gives men the interpretive framework for understanding economic cause and effect. Men are not to misuse their knowledge of economic cause and effect. This is why we are given the introductory chapters of Proverbs, to convince us that the ultimate goal of personal wealth is the increase of capital necessary to implement biblical wisdom in a corporate public form: the kingdom of God. To use the knowledge found in Proverbs for any purpose other than the extension of God's kingdom is a form of rebellion.

8. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

9. Ibid., ch. 21.

D. The Market for Wisdom

It was perhaps the greatest of Greek myths—a myth held mainly by Socrates, Plato, and their followers—that if men understand the truth and the good, they will believe the truth and do the morally upright thing. In the Greek philosophical tradition, knowledge is the pathway to salvation. Knowledge saves. In contrast, the Bible affirms that wisdom is the pathway to salvation. But it teaches that wisdom is not a matter of precise logic or intuitive insight. Wisdom is the product of God's grace. The natural man receives not the things of the Spirit (I Cor. 2:14).¹⁰ Therefore, when wisdom is proclaimed in the streets, there may be few who respond favorably. The simpletons—moral simpletons, not people with low intelligence—do not come and sit at the feet of the wise teacher. “But ye have set at nought all My counsel, and would [have] none of My reproof” (1:25). Simpletons do not take seriously the sin-restraining wisdom of God’s law.

Solomon here equates wisdom with God. “Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me: For that they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the LORD: They would [have] none of my counsel: they despised all my reproof” (1:28–30). The simpletons had refused the counsel of God, whose word had been proclaimed in the streets. Now they face calamity all alone. Fear, desolation, and destruction are therefore inevitable (1:27).

1. No Market for Wisdom

The market for wisdom in Israel was nonexistent. Yet this was the era of Solomon, the wisest and richest of Israel’s kings, at the peak of Israel’s influence. Even at zero price, there was far more supply of wisdom than demand for wisdom. In short, wisdom was a glut on the market—not on the supply side, but on the demand side. So vast was this glut in relation to demand that the supply would eventually be removed by God. Wisdom would someday be sought, but none would be found. The father taught his son that God hides Himself from those who do not regard His word as valid and valuable in good times as well as bad. When bad times come, men seek answers, but wise answers are not to be found by those who are in rebellion against God. They seek, but they cannot find. God reserves the right to restrict the easy availability of wisdom in times of crisis whenever men have failed to take Him seriously during prosperous times.

10. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd. ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

Built into the creation is a cause-and-effect system based on adherence to, or rejection of, God's Bible-revealed law. Over and over, we are told that the response of a man to the law of God determines his external circumstances. Prosperity is the product of men's outward adherence to biblical law. Poverty is the result of outward adherence to another legal order, or an anti-legal order. "Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices. For the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them. But whoso hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil" (1:31–33). All societies that reject God's wisdom have self-destructive aspects.

When the Assyrians came to take Israel away, there was no mass repentance. When the Babylonians came to carry Judah away, there was no mass repentance. Men may have called upon some sort of god—a god of their own creation—but the God of the Bible did not hear them, judicially speaking. When the ways of the wicked finally result in the destruction of their prosperity, men are left without moral guidelines. The moral order that they had trusted now collapses before their eyes, and they do not know or understand the biblical alternative.

2. The Twentieth Century

After the First World War (1914–18), a wave of debauchery and "high living" swept the West. Weimar Germany's cabaret society, America's speakeasies, France's dada art movement, and the British elite's open rejection of Victorian morality were all aspects of men's rejection of pre-War morality, which had been at least Christian on the surface. In America, historians call this period "the Roaring Twenties." The roaring twenties turned into the disastrous thirties. Economic depression broke the public's confidence in the West's economic order. Socialists, redistributionists, and populists of all varieties came into power, or close to power. Germany and Italy went fascist-socialist. Britain and the United States went Keynesian, which was basically a form of statism, as Keynes admitted in his long-neglected introduction to the German language edition of his General Theory in 1936. The corporate state is still with us, struggling wildly in its death throes, desperately trying to find a way to achieve rapid economic growth without price inflation and massive indebtedness.

The crises of the 1930s and 1940s did not lead to widespread repentance in any Western nation. People chased after a number of superficially different economic and political solutions, but these all were variations of the Moloch state. The public's theology did not change, so their solutions were no better than the problems they were intended to solve. The debauchery of Weimar Germany—the pornography, homosexuality, occultism, and nihilism—has become today's universal subculture, and is increasingly being absorbed into the common culture of the day. So has Weimar Germany's policy of monetary inflation, though not nearly that severe. So has despair, though not nearly that severe. Weimar ended in the tyranny and war launched by the National Socialist Democratic Workers' Party (Nazis). The West must change direction if it is to avoid a similar outcome.

3. Reform Without Biblical Wisdom

There is a tendency on the part of deeply ideological groups to work for the destruction of the present world order, which is run by an Establishment. Anti-Establishment ideologues work for social revolution on the assumption that their group will pick up the pieces. Without the destruction of the present order, they say, there is no hope. Simultaneously, the current Establishment is desperate to consolidate its much-heralded new world order. It does so by means of its traditional strategies: political manipulation, control over money, control over education, international treaties, government-regulated trade agreements, government subsidies to big business and large voting blocs, and elitist initiation.

Christians should recognize that the market for wisdom is almost always minimal, except in historically rare periods, such as the late Roman Empire, Europe in the Middle Ages, the Protestant Reformation, and America's two religious revivals.¹¹ A revival of interest in God's wisdom is abnormal. When societies self-destruct, they are not often replaced by a Christian social order. Christians should work toward the reconstruction of the existing social order, but they had better recognize that the market for wisdom is limited today. Their message has not been taken seriously, any more than it was taken seriously in Solomon's day. The distressed masses run toward new, radical variations of today's Moloch state. There is nothing new under the sun.

11. The First Great Awakening (1730–50) and the Second Great Awakening (1801–50).

They would none of my counsel: they despised all my reproof. Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices. For the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them (1:30–32).

Occasionally the market for wisdom increases. “But whoso hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil” (v. 33). That is our hope today—our realistic but currently utopian hope.

Conclusion

The introductory remarks in Proverbs are an expansion of the closing remarks of Ecclesiastes: “Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil” (Eccl. 12:13–14).¹² Wealth has a purpose. Wisdom tells us what this purpose is: a means of dominion. We are to think God’s thoughts after Him, bringing all things into judgment, according to His standards of righteousness.

This is not an exclusively private faith with exclusively private consequences. It is a public faith with public consequences. It is covenantal faith. It involves the whole of society. This is why wisdom must be in the streets, calling covenant-breakers to turn back from their poverty-producing ways.

12. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 45.

5

PATHS OF RIGHTEOUS JUDGMENT

For the LORD giveth wisdom: out of his mouth cometh knowledge and understanding. He layeth up sound wisdom for the righteous: he is a buckler [shield] to them that walk uprightly. He keepeth the paths of judgment, and preserveth the way of his saints. Then shalt thou understand righteousness, and judgment, and equity; yea, every good path (Prov. 2:6–9).

The early sections of the Book of Proverbs deal with man's gaining wisdom from God: "To know wisdom and instruction; to perceive the words of understanding" (1:2). Wisdom is seen as the most valuable asset a person can possess. "If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures; then thou shalt understand the fear of the LORD, and find the knowledge of God" (2:4–5). "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction" (1:7).¹

The process begins with the word of God, this proverb says. "For the LORD giveth wisdom: out of his mouth cometh knowledge and understanding." This is special revelation. This is given uniquely to covenant-keepers. "He is a buckler [shield] to them that walk uprightly." That is, God defends His people in their walk before Him.

Here, as elsewhere in the Bible, wisdom is described as a pathway. Men walk down paths. A man walks on one path at a time. A pathway can head for destruction. This is the path of the unrighteous. In contrast is the path of righteousness. This proverb says that God preserves the way of the saints.

This preservation of their pathway is a gift of God. God grants to some people the wisdom to pursue judgment. The meaning here is judicial, but judgment is a broader concept than civil law. It means the ability to assess the events of life in terms of God's holy law. Judgment is ethical.

1. Chapter 2.

"Then shalt thou understand righteousness, and judgment, and equity; yea, every good path." This proverb indicates that God directs men's steps down a particular path. Over time, the day-by-day obligation to make personal decisions creates understanding in the minds of the decision-makers. The indication here is that the exercise of good judgment is cumulative.

There are multiple paths of righteousness, according to Proverbs. These paths are revealed in the Bible. It is basic for long-term success that people walk in these paths. Those who leave these paths of righteousness thereby choose the ways of darkness (2:13), the paths to death (2:18). God calls the paths of righteousness, "the paths of life" (2:19).

To follow these righteous paths is to acknowledge and observe as morally and economically binding the biblically revealed foundations of long-term economic success: "For the upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it. But the wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressors shall be rooted out of it" (2:21–22). The message here is this: in their respective pursuit of righteousness and unrighteousness, covenant-keepers will displace covenant-breakers in history. This comes as a result of the widespread exercise of righteous judgment. The positive sanctions of God's covenantal legal order overwhelm whatever positive benefits that are reaped by covenant-breakers through their adherence to the externals of biblical law. Over time, good gets better and bad gets worse, both ethically and culturally. Covenant-keeping builds a permanent civilization. Covenant-breaking does not.

As more people in society develop the skills associated with judging events and people's actions, the social order becomes more consistently biblical. Wisdom is not merely personal. It is corporate. This proverb says that God provides such wisdom. It is a form of grace, i.e., a favor unmerited by the person or society receiving the gift from God. This can be described accurately as a subsidy from God. He subsidizes His people. They in turn extend His dominion visibly in history.

This proverb provides insight into the process of dominion. This process is above all ethical. It is part of God's covenant with His people. Through the special revelation of biblical law, covenant-keepers extend the visible jurisdiction of God's kingdom. God then rewards them visibly, as members of His kingdom. The goal is the fulfillment of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:27–28).² This is to take place in time and on earth.

Conclusion

The Book of Proverbs makes it clear that the search for wisdom is the most important of all of men's investments. We need a more complete wisdom than that which is innate to us (Rom. 2:14–15),³ for sin has distorted our judgment and our ability to follow what we know to be morally binding (Rom. 1:18–22).⁴ This wisdom must be paid for: search costs and self-discipline. This was Christ's point in His parable of the pearl of great price (Matt. 13:44–46).⁵ While men are given some wisdom through common grace⁶—sufficient to keep them alive for a time on earth, and also sufficient to condemn them on judgment day (Rom. 1:18–22)—this unmerited gift (the meaning of the word “grace”) is nevertheless incomplete. Men must search for wisdom. Men's knowledge of the paths of righteous judgment, and their subsequent willingness to walk in them—to become doers of the word and not hearers only (Rom. 2:13; James 1:22)—is the source of their long-term prosperity.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

4. Ibid., ch. 2.

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 31.

6. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

6

VISIBLE SUCCESS

My son, do not forget my teaching, but guard my commands in your heart; for long life and years in plenty will they bring you, and prosperity as well. Let your good faith and loyalty never fail, but bind them about your neck. Thus will you win favour and success in the sight of God and man (Prov. 3:1–4, NEB).

Normally, I use the King James Version to introduce each chapter, but in this case, the New English Bible brings out the substance of the passage far more graphically. The translation has a weakness, however: the translation of the Hebrew word, torah, as “teaching,” rather than “law.” It should read, “do not forget my law.” The link between biblical law and visible prosperity is made clear by Solomon. It is the same link that is established by Deuteronomy 28:1–14.¹ Adherence to God’s laws brings visible, external benefits. These benefits are long life and plenty.

A. Long Life

We have seen this before. The promise of long life is found in Exodus 20:12: “Honor thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee.”² Paul wrote that this is the first commandment with a promise (Eph. 6:2). Long life is a universally recognized benefit. When a culture adheres to the tenets of biblical law, this proverb informs us, its inhabitants will be blessed by longer life spans. A biblical law-abiding civilization will be able to be differentiated from biblical law-transgressing civilizations by means of statistically measurable life expectancies.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

One economically relevant effect of this would be inexpensive life insurance policies. The risks associated with insuring the life of a person within a given age group will be lower than the risks of insuring the life of a person within the same age group in a law-transgressing culture. In other words, a company that attempted to charge the same annual premium (fee) for both societies would experience financial losses. In the law-abiding society, the attempt to charge a premium schedule appropriate in a law-transgressing society would result in loss-producing price competition from companies that charge lower fees. Similarly, any attempt to charge the lower premiums of the law-abiding society in a law-transgressing society would also produce losses. The premiums would not cover losses from the payment of death benefits to the heirs. There would be too many deaths per thousand, compared with the number of deaths per thousand within the same age group in the biblical law-abiding culture. This is what I mean by the phrase “statistically measurable.” The differences would be statistically relevant, meaning financially relevant in this example.

Long life is a very specific promise. It is not something that can be relegated to the hypothetical realm of the exclusively spiritual. The Bible is not speaking merely of a “better outlook on life,” or a “deeper spiritual life,” but statistically longer life expectancy for members of any given age group. While good people can and do die young, more of them will survive into old age than in biblical law-transgressing societies. If the Bible is true, then certain predictions concerning life expectancy will be verifiable, and verifiable in economically relevant ways, namely, life insurance premium schedules. (I am speaking here of annual renewable term insurance—death-benefit insurance—rather than insurance policies that provide some sort of savings program.)

The life expectancy of those living in the West, and in nations that have adopted Western attitudes toward ethics, is higher than that which prevails in Third World cultures that are openly demonic or animistic, and also higher than in Third World cultures that have adopted Eastern monism as their philosophical foundation, which always includes mysticism as a way to escape the burdens of material existence. We have seen a steady increase in life expectancy in the West, especially since the Protestant Reformation. Western industrialism and Western agriculture combined with Western medical techniques to create a culture in which men have a legitimate hope for longer life. This culture was the product—though not exclusively—of the Protestant religion.³

B. Plenty

If the benefits of adhering to biblical law are visible in the area of life expectancy, as promised, then the economic benefits described in verse 2 should also be visible. The promise of “plenty” and “prosperity” is not to be understood as applying exclusively to the inner realm of the converted man’s spirit. This promise must also apply to the external, measurable realm.

This is crucially important for a proper understanding of economic growth in the West, especially since about 1780, but also during the Middle Ages, as described by Prof. Lynn White, Jr. in his book, Medieval Technology and Social Change (1962). Biblical attitudes toward thrift, diligence in one’s occupation, the legitimacy of wealth (anti-envy), and faith in progress—in time and on earth (eschatological optimism/postmillennialism)—all combined to produce rapid economic growth, especially in the two societies most influenced by Puritanism, England and New England, and also in the Netherlands and Switzerland, which had been heavily influenced by Continental Calvinism. In Japan, an essentially Protestant attitude toward the future and toward the possibility of long-term progress has prevailed since the late nineteenth century.

Men will win favor in the eyes of other men and God if they show mercy and loyalty. They will be acknowledged as successful. This testifies to the existence of almost universally recognized signs of personal and national prosperity. There is sufficient revelation to men through nature and through their own minds to convince most men of the benefits of economic growth. Without this revelation, and without men’s ability to respond to it, we could devise no statistically measurable indexes of wealth. We could not even define wealth. Men are made in the image of God; so, they recognize the external tokens of His favor when they see it. The economic success of a society governed by biblical law is, in fact, a means of international evangelism. “Keep therefore and do them [my commandments]: for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all the things that we call upon him for?" (Deut. 4:6–7).⁴ If men did not see before them the tokens of God's favor and success, and if there were no universally recognized standards of success, including economic success, then the testimony of God to pagan cultures would be drastically weakened. The common ground among men—the image of God—brings a degree of agreement concerning the general benefits of life that are worth pursuing. Such agreement is not perfect, for the image of God is twisted by sin, but there is at least a working agreement.

3. Max Weber was closer to the truth than his critics were. His Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1905–6) presented the case. For my assessment, see Gary North, “The ‘Protestant Ethic’ Hypothesis,” The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Summer 1976).

Conclusion

There should be no guilt associated with wealth gained through adherence to biblical law. Such wealth is, in fact, a legitimate reward for honoring God and a testimony of the faithfulness of God to His covenant promises, as the words of Proverbs explicitly state. Wealth earned in this fashion is a means of evangelism: not just money to finance missions, but wealth to display before pagans whose covenant-breaking economic philosophies—socialism, Marxism, Keynesianism—have produced either widespread poverty or slow economic growth.

The hostile attitude toward private, personal wealth—but not wealth controlled by state bureaucrats—that was displayed by Ronald Sider in his book, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (1977), was in flagrant opposition to these verses. David Chilton was correct in his 1981 critique of Sider: we were Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators.⁵

With Red China's abandonment of Communism after Deng Xiao Ping's reform of 1978, soon making China the fastest growing large economy in history, and with the collapse and then disappearance of the Soviet Union in 1991, the antipathy toward capitalism has grown muted, both within the humanist intelligentsia and Christian aca-

4. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

5. In the year Chilton died, 1997, Sider's 4th edition of Rich Christians was published. Here, he backed away from the hard-line anti-capitalist stance of the book's earlier editions. He even adopted several of Chilton's recommended anti-interventionist reforms of Keynesianism's state-regulated market, although without mentioning Chilton. The fifth edition appeared in 2005. In the four editions published after Chilton's book appeared, Sider never mentioned Chilton's book, which Chilton revised twice to deal with later editions of Rich Christians. For my review of Sider's 4th edition, see North, Inheritance and Dominion, Appendix F: "The Economic Re-Education of Ronald J. Sider."

demia. In short, visible economic results eventually do persuade critics of the free market that the free market produces more rapid economic growth than any alternative system of ownership. Their criticisms then turn to other issues, which usually involve a critique of the tastes of the common man, who can buy more of what he wants under the free market social order.

THEOCENTRIC DECISION-MAKING

Trust in the LORD with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths. Be not wise in thine own eyes: fear the LORD, and depart from evil (Prov. 3:5–7).

A. God's Thoughts and Man's Thoughts

Solomon contrasts God with man's understanding. It should be clear that the words, "thine own understanding," refer to man's thoughts when they oppose God's thoughts—the failure of self-proclaimed autonomous man to think God's thoughts after Him. Solomon calls men to conform their thoughts to God's thoughts in any given historical situation. The alternative? "Thou hast trusted in thy wickedness: thou hast said, None seeth me. Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, it hath perverted thee; and thou hast said in thine heart, I am, and none else beside me. Therefore shall evil come upon thee; thou shalt not know from whence it riseth: and mischief shall fall upon thee, and thou shalt not be able to put it off: and desolation shall come upon thee suddenly, which thou shalt not know" (Isa. 47:10–11).

The whole of man's confidence should be in God, the sovereign Creator of the universe. None of man's confidence should be placed in any aspect of the creation. The authority of the Creator over the creation is thereby affirmed. God is trustworthy; the creation, including man, is not.

The Creator-creature distinction underlies Solomon's exhortation. Man must put his trust either in God or in some aspect of the universe. There is no third option. When he makes a decision, it must be in terms of information, personal evaluation of that information, and a concept of cause and effect. What undergirds cause and effect? What is the reliable source of knowledge regarding cause and effect? This is the great debate over epistemology: “What can man reliably know, and how can he know it?” The Bible’s answer is clear: “Trust in the LORD, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed” (Ps. 37:3). Again, “Commit thy way unto the LORD; trust also in him; and he shall bring it to pass” (Ps. 37:5). “O, LORD, know that the way of man is not in himself; it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps” (Jer. 10:23). If a man humbles himself before God, acknowledging his position as a wholly dependent creature, then God will favor him and see to it that he does not pursue an evil, self-defeating course of action.

God directs the steps of all men, sinners and faithful. “The king’s heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will” (Prov. 21:1). The path a man walks is laid out by God beforehand. “For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them” (Eph. 2:10). The question is: Will a man admit his total dependence on God, seek God’s will, and then follow it?

How can a man seek God’s guidance? Does God whisper strategies in a man’s ear? The Bible says that men must turn to the Bible-revealed law of God to gain access to His guidance. To find God’s law is to find Him. “With my whole heart have I sought thee: O let me not wander from thy commandments. Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee” (Ps. 119:10–11). The mastery of God’s commandments gives to men the access to the wisdom required to achieve success.

B. Efficient Sinning

The modern economist assumes a universe devoid of cosmic personalism. He speaks about economic efficiency without any consideration of God’s law or the relationship between covenantal conformity to God’s law and external economic successes. Only men and men’s desires are relevant to him. If men want to gamble, or read pornography, or consort with prostitutes, or pursue homosexual experiences, then the free market will provide supplies to equal demand at market-clearing prices. Any civil law prohibiting such activities is discussed by free market economists in terms of such concepts as the resulting black markets, the increased costs of obtaining these consumer services and goods (including information costs), the misallocation of resources, and the structural inefficiencies created by the threat of coercion.

Methodological individualism offers no justification for such civil laws—or any civil laws, for that matter.¹

Without criminal charges from an injured party, economist and legal theorist F. A. Hayek argued, society cannot formulate rules against “victimless crimes,” if rules regarding “actions toward other persons” arise only from court disputes, which Hayek favored. He assumed atheism, yet did not offer any evidence. “At least where it is not believed that the whole group may be punished by a supernatural power for the sins of individuals, there can arise no such rules from the limitation of conduct against others, and therefore from the settlement of disputes.”² In short: no God—no victimless crimes, since there is no heavenly judgment against “innocent bystanders”—bystanders who refuse to press the claims of God’s law in the legislatures and the courts.

Contrary to modern philosophy, ours is a world of cosmic personalism.³ God is totally sovereign over all things. Therefore, when men ignore Him, even when pursuing their goals “efficiently,” they find in the end that they have achieved damnation at a cut-rate price. In fact, it is a sign of God’s grace to them and also to godly people that He intervenes and restrains men in their quest for efficient sinning. If nuclear and biological weapons become available at discount prices for quantity purchases, then men will better understand the grace involved in the limits that God puts on certain free-market quests.

Does God require that every decision we make throughout the day be prayed about? Do we need to pray each time we decide to cross a street? No. The psychology of total dependence is to lead to responsible decision-making, not to endless self-doubts and hesitation about our familiar daily activities. We should hide God’s word in our hearts, so that godly, careful behavior takes place instinctively, analogous to the way that a trained athlete does not think about each response, each move of his body. The athlete trains in advance; the Christian should do the same.

Conclusion

Eastern religions call for men to “empty” themselves and let un-

1. Murray N. Rothbard, The Ethics of Liberty (New York University Press, [1982] 1998). (<http://www.mises.org/rothbard/ethics.pdf>)

2. F. A. Hayek, Law, Legislation, and Liberty, vol. 1, Rules and Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), p. 101.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

known forces take possession of their thoughts and actions. The Zen Buddhist trains for years in irrational “koans” (“What is the sound of one hand clapping?”) and in physical deprivation, including unpredictable punishments from the master for seemingly harmless acts. God’s way is different: a life of intellectual and moral discipline in terms of God’s Bible-revealed word, which is the foundation of rationality, predictability, and control over internal human nature and external nature. God’s chastisement is not irrational, nor is it to be despised (Prov. 3:11–12). It is the pathway to life and dominion, for it teaches us to master His Bible-revealed law and to rely on His grace in Jesus Christ, which is our way of acknowledging His sovereignty over our lives and His creation.

8

GOD'S RIGGED ECONOMY

Honour the LORD with thy substance; and with the firstfruits of all thine increase: So shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine (Prov. 3:9–10).

A. Firstfruits and Blessings

This is a very brief recapitulation of Exodus 22:29 and 23:19, regarding the requirement of the firstfruits offering, and Deuteronomy 28:8: “The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and He shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee.” The Lord commands His blessing upon those faithful to His law.

First, this was not a suggestion under the Mosaic covenant. The passages in Exodus are very clear: giving God the firstfruits is not optional. Exodus 22:29 reads: “Thou shalt not delay to offer first of thy ripe fruits, and of thy liquors: the firstborn of thy sons shalt thou give to Me.” The people of Israel had seen what happened to the firstborn sons of Egypt. They understood just how serious God is about collecting what is rightfully His. The Levites had been established as the representative firstborn sons of Israel (Num. 3:12–13). They were wholly God’s, dedicated to full-time service in the tabernacle (Num. 3:7).¹

Second, the firstfruits were a token offering. By far the greater expense was the lost time and long walk involved in journeying to the city where the tabernacle and then the temple were located. The firstfruits were part of Israel’s system of annual festivals. These festivals are no longer operational, for they had to do with Israel as a sanctuary: a uniquely holy nation, which meant a nation set apart by God for His purposes.² The firstfruits were part of the Mosaic land laws and the priestly laws. These are annulled. This is not true of the tithe (Matt. 23:23).

1. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 3.

Third, the command offers a profitable result: external blessings. Specifically, honoring God with the fruits of one's labor results in economic growth. Furthermore, the words "barns" and "presses" are plural. The covenantally faithful person should expect overwhelming economic success. The writer has directed his injunctions to his son (Prov. 3:1, 11), meaning a single individual. He is not speaking to a group. Thus, when the plural is used for barns and presses, it indicates wealth for an individual.

The relationship between blessing and firstfruits offerings is obvious. The firstfruits were grain and wine (Ex. 22:29). The blessings referred to in this proverb are full barns and full wine presses. In other words, that with which men honor God is that with which God will honor men. God says "them that honour me I will honour, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed" (1 Sam. 2:30). God establishes with men a reciprocal relationship with respect to honor. Give God honor, and He will give you honor. Give God of your substance, and He will return the offering.

B. A Gambler's Delight

A gambler would be happy to play a game of chance that is rigged by "the house" to pay him more than he put "into the pot." If he could deduct one coin to pay to "the house" each time he won, in order to get the management to continue to rig the game in his favor, he would be happy to make this pay-off. Gambling casinos are well aware of this possibility. "Pit bosses" roam the floor, looking for signs that the casino's card dealers are favoring a particular player. If a player continues to receive winnings above what is statistically normal—that is, if a player continues to win at all—then management takes a close look at the dealer. The management assumes that the dealer could be being paid off by the winner.

God tells us that He, as the owner of the "house," has rigged "the game" in favor of those who honor Him. This proverb deals with the firstfruits offering, which is no longer operational under the New Covenant, since the firstfruits offering was tied to the holy land and the holy place of the tabernacle-temple. It was paid to the Levites. The tithe remains binding, even though the Levites are no more. Jesus said, “Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone” (Matt. 23:23).³ We are not to leave the other—tithing—undone.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 54.

The general principle of honoring God, as the owner of creation in general and each individual in particular, by paying a tithe on our increase comes under the terms of this proverb. A person who pays a mere 10% of his increase above the capital he put into the investment will be permitted to “stay in the game” and collect his winnings. Just as surely as there are statistical regularities wherever the law of large numbers operates, God honors those who honor Him by giving their firstfruits to Him.

Why is it that gamblers continue to play a game that they know is rigged against them by the house, yet they refuse to work for a living in a universe that is rigged in favor of those who pay a mere 10% of their increase to the Management? Why is it that even God’s people refuse to acknowledge the relationship between tithing and economic success? *Because they believe in a world of cosmic impersonalism.*⁴ The gambler believes in a world of chance, fate, and luck, which are irreconcilable concepts. The serious gamblers also believe in statistical patterns, which is why they devote time to studying which cards have been dealt earlier in the game. They try to “beat the odds” scientifically, yet they know that the odds are against them from the moment they sit down at the table. They prefer to believe in impersonal “runs of luck” to overcome the impersonal “stacked deck” of statistical probability. In short, their faith is in cosmic impersonalism, not God. They prefer playing a supposedly impersonal game to working in a God-controlled personal universe.

These verses inform us of a universe that is totally personal. Its laws are established in terms of persons: God and men. Those who honor the person of God by paying a tithe on their increase will find that their works prosper in the sight of men. This cause-and-effect relationship is supposed to reinforce the faith of the faithful in the reliability of this covenant (Deut. 8:18).⁵ It is also supposed to challenge the false religions of foreigners to the faith (Deut. 4:6).⁶

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: [2000] 2012), ch. 46.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

Such a universe warns men of their ultimate destiny. They are headed for judgment. The visible things of this world testify clearly to the invisible things (Rom. 1:20).⁷ Thus, the predictable relationship between faithful giving and God's faithful returning challenges men's faith in the impersonal laws of probability. In an impersonal universe, there should be no predictable relationship of the kind proclaimed by Solomon. Between hard work and output, yes; between future-oriented thrift and income, yes; between bribing an official and rewards, yes; but not between giving money to God's earthly agency of tithe-collecting—the local church⁸—and subsequent prosperity. Should such a relationship exist, the whole foundation of rebellious man's epistemology would be shattered. This is why rebels prefer gambling to tithing. Better to lose to a man-rigged, probability-governed wheel or a deck of cards than to prosper in terms of a God-rigged universe. Better to honor with all of one's substance the corporations that control the gambling tables than to honor God with 10 percent of one's increase. The ethical rebel is a statistically predictable loser; he knows it, the "house" knows it, and God knows it.

Conclusion

By honoring God through the payment of a tithe, we place ourselves under the principle of reciprocal honor: ". . . them that honour me I will honour, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed" (I Sam. 2:30). This proverb, following the passages in Exodus governing the firstfruits offering, proclaims that a token economic honoring upward results in considerable economic honoring downward. This system of mutual honoring rested on a concept of cosmic personalism.

Gambling rests on incompatible concepts: impersonal chance, impersonal fate, impersonal luck, and impersonal laws of probability. Men seek what is statistically improbable: prosperity by betting against the odds. They believe they are somehow personally special in a world

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

6. Ibid., ch. 8.

7. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

8. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>) of cosmic impersonalism. Lady luck may smile on them, assuming there is a lady who smiles, which they do not believe. So, they place at risk the goods that God has given to them. They honor the turn of a card or the spin of a wheel by giving back their wealth.

Sadly, those Christians who decry gambling but who do not believe in tithing have not understood the relationship between tithing and prosperity nearly so well as they have understood the relationship between gambling and poverty. They live in an epistemological no-man's land, caught between the impersonal laws of large numbers and the cosmic personalism of God's law. They cannot make up their minds about which kind of law really governs the day-to-day operations of the universe. They fail to believe in God's law as a tool of dominion. Until they make up their minds, they will remain neither big winners nor big losers.

Life is not a game. It is not governed by the law of large numbers. It is a brief period of testing in which men declare their faith publicly, both verbally and in terms of their actions, i.e., in word and deed. The firstfruits offering was a token public declaration of the Israelites' faith, both individually and corporately. God promised to reward those who made this token payment. While this annual festival is no longer required, the tithe is. The same principle applies: a token payment to God yields a large reward. The cause-and-effect system that governs investing reflects God's covenantal structure of sanctions. Economic law is rigged in favor of covenant-keepers who really do keep the terms of the covenant. This system of causation is neither impersonal nor random.

9

THE VALUE OF WISDOM

Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her. Length of days is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and honour. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace. She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her: and happy is every one that retaineth her (Prov. 3:13–18).

Here, Solomon praises wisdom. Wisdom is the source of the two greatest measurable positive sanctions: wealth and long life. So, he insists that “the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies.” These things can be used to purchase anything offered in the marketplace. But wisdom brings these things. You cannot buy wisdom with silver, gold, and rubies. You can obtain silver, gold, and rubies through wisdom. He repeats this advice:

For wisdom is better than rubies; and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to it (8:11).

How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver! (16:16).

Speaking in the name of wisdom, he writes:

Riches and honour are with me; yea, durable riches and righteousness. My fruit is better than gold, yea, than fine gold; and my revenue than choice silver. I lead in the way of righteousness, in the midst of the paths of judgment: That I may cause those that love me to inherit substance; and I will fill their treasures (8:18–21).

Wisdom is the source of the goods that money can buy. Wisdom therefore ought to be higher than these goods on a wise man's scale of values. The fact that so few people place wisdom above silver, gold, and rubies indicates that wisdom is in even shorter supply than silver, gold, and rubies.

A. What Is Wisdom?

When God asked Solomon what he wanted in life, Solomon asked for wisdom.

Give me now wisdom and knowledge, that I may go out and come in before this people: for who can judge this thy people, that is so great? And God said to Solomon, Because this was in thine heart, and thou hast not asked riches, wealth, or honour, nor the life of thine enemies, neither yet hast asked long life; but hast asked wisdom and knowledge for thyself, that thou mayest judge my people, over whom I have made thee king (II Chron. 1:10–11).

His reason for asking for wisdom? Wisdom would enable him to judge the nation. So, God granted him his request. Solomon gained this ability, which the people recognized. “And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king: for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment” (I Kings 3:28).

Wisdom is the ability to make accurate judgments. How? By applying fixed ethical principles to specific situations. What are these fixed principles? Elsewhere, Solomon answered this question. “Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil” (Eccl. 12:13–14).¹ Covenant-keepers should think representatively, on behalf of God.² They should think ethically, applying biblical law to circumstances.³ They should think judicially, applying His Bible-mandated sanctions.⁴ They should think about the con-

1. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 45.

2. Point two of the biblical covenant model. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

3. Point three: ibid., ch. 3. North, ch. 3.

4. Point four: ibid., ch. 4. North, ch. 4.

sequences of their decisions and also people's actions in the future.⁵

B. The Productivity of Wisdom

Wisdom brings to wise people the benefits that other people seek to purchase with gold and silver. Wisdom is the source of gold and silver, which in turn provide access to whatever is offered for sale. When a person can accurately assess the specifics of a situation, and then apply God's law to this situation, his decision will produce profit rather than loss. This world is governed by covenantal cause and effect. The wise person recognizes this and adheres to biblical law: the commandments of God.

It is possible to obtain gold and silver by defying God's law. The Psalmist recognized this (Ps. 73). But covenant-breakers face a world in which the system of inheritance is structured to transfer the wealth of the unjust to the just. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (13:22).⁶ The economy is rigged in favor of the covenant-keeper. "Honour the LORD with thy substance; and with the firstfruits of all thine increase: So shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine" (3:9–10).⁷

Conclusion

Biblical wisdom is a biblical law-based ability to make judgments, which in turn produce positive real-world results. This proverb's assertion of a connection between wisdom and wealth is based on God's covenant. So, it is wise to pursue wisdom rather than wealth. Wisdom can and does produce wealth. Wealth rarely produces wisdom.

5. Point five: ibid., ch. 5. North, ch. 5.

6. Chapter 41.

7. Chapter 8.

10

PAYING DEBTS PROMPTLY

Withhold not good from them to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thine hand to do it. Say not unto thy neighbor, Go, and come again, and tomorrow I will give; when thou hast it by thee. Devise not evil against thy neighbor, seeing he dwelleth securely by thee (Prov. 3:27–29).

A. Protecting the Weaker Party

The Mosaic law specified that wages must be paid at the end of the working day. “Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning” (Lev. 19:13). The worker is in a weak position. He expects prompt payment because the law mandates this. An employer who delays payment upsets the plans of his employees. They have made decisions based on the legitimate expectation of payment at the end of the work day. To force them to scramble for money, or to delay payment to others, is to disrupt the chain of payments. It increases the level of uncertainty.¹

The prompt payment of one’s debts is a moral obligation. The neighbor who comes and requests whatever is owed to him deserves full consideration. The person who owes his neighbor anything is supposed to pay him upon request.

In a world of debt, it pays the debtor to delay repayment as long as possible if he is not paying any interest. Interest is an inescapable factor in human action. It is not a phenomenon limited to modern industrial economies. It stems from the time-preference factor of all human decision-making. Men prefer the present use of a scarce economic resource to the use of the same asset in the future, other things being equal. Thus, there is a discount of future goods against present goods. This discount is called the rate of interest.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 13. See also Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 61.

We normally say that the debtor “has the use of the money.” By this we mean that he has possession of scarce economic resources. These may be in the form of financial instruments, such as bank accounts, bonds, or other interest-producing assets. They may also be in the form of capital assets, such as tools. The point is, it is the debtor rather than the creditor who is able to use these assets in the present for his own personal benefit. He has control of the assets he borrowed.

B. Borrowed Gold

Consider the case of a monetary debt. A man owes his neighbor 20 ounces of gold. He has the gold on hand, but he believes that the paper money-denominated price of gold is likely to drop. He plans to sell the gold for a few days, take payment in paper money, and then repurchase the 20 ounces later at a lower price. He then pockets the difference between the original sales price in paper money and the later, lower repurchase price. This is what is known as “selling short.” It involves economic uncertainty, since no one can be certain of the economic future.

During the time in which the debtor uses the gold for this purpose, the creditor cannot collect his property. He could make the same transaction. He could pocket the extra paper money that a successful “short” strategy would produce. Or he might want to loan the gold to someone else for an interest payment. Or he might want to buy a capital asset of some sort with the gold, especially at today’s higher price for gold. If he cannot gain access to his gold, he loses the interest he might otherwise have received, or the opportunity to sell short, or the opportunity to buy the capital asset. Because the debtor has possession of the gold, he has an instrument of personal gain at his disposal.

The debtor wants the present use of the asset if he can avoid paying interest to the creditor. The creditor, on the other hand, has an economic incentive to repossess it on the agreed-upon date. Each man wants it in the present. There is a discount of future goods against identical present goods. Clearly, if you can retain possession of a more valuable asset (the asset in the present) and pay for its use by means of a less valuable asset (the discounted future value that you presently impute to the asset), you have an economic incentive to do so.

C. A Lying Debtor

Who should receive this asset? The Bible is clear: the owner, the one to whom it is due at a particular time. The existence of such a moral prohibition on retaining another man's property for an extra period of time is the result of God's awareness of a fundamental aspect of human action: time-preference, the foundation of the rate of interest.²

To keep possession of it when it is in one's hand is an "evil" (v. 29). It is a form of theft. The debtor, for whatever particular investment possibility, keeps it from the person who lawfully owns the asset. The rightful owner therefore forfeits whatever investment opportunities are available to him for the duration of the period of delay. This loss has been forced upon him by the debtor, who is profiting at the owner's expense.

The modern version of this evil is the familiar refrain, "Your check is in the mail." The creditor asks for prompt payment, and the debtor lies to him. Instead of saying "tomorrow I will give," the debtor says, "in a few days, you'll receive your money." This lie is even worse: it implies that the debtor has, in fact, already fulfilled his commitment. The creditor is not patiently foregoing payment, as in the case of the neighbor in Proverbs 3:28, who accepts the word of the debtor that he does not have the money, but will have it the next day. The creditor is led in this case to believe that the obligation has been met.

In the late medieval era, when all interest payments from loans to fellow Christians were prohibited, moneylenders developed a way to get around the prohibition by means of the ethics of this passage. Lenders would lend money, but only because the debtor made a verbal, unrecorded commitment to delay payment on the loan. Then the borrower would make a penalty payment—not technically an interest payment—to the lender because of the delay. The lender could go into a court of law or a church court, if necessary, and defend his acceptance of this extra money as a legitimate return for late payment (more debitoris). This was one of several legal technicalities (ethical subterfuges) by means of which a market for loanable funds was maintained in spite of an official prohibition on all interest payments.³

The reason why men resorted to such subterfuges is that the eccle-

2. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

3. Joseph A. Schumpeter, History of Economic Analysis (New York: Oxford University Press, 1954), p. 103.

siastical authorities had misinterpreted the Old Testament passages that prohibited interest from a charitable loan to an impoverished fellow believer. They had interpreted these passages as universal condemnations of all interest, which they called “usury.” Thus, they established a price control—a price ceiling of zero—on “the price of money,” meaning a price control on the inescapable discount of future goods against present goods. The result, predictably, was a shortage of funds—at the artificially low price—on the legal loan markets.

Conclusion

Delaying payment is described here as an act of theft. Solomon reminds his listeners of what the Mosaic law requires. Prompt payment is mandatory.

The division of labor enables the vast majority to enjoy greater productivity and therefore greater wealth. The fulfillment of contractual and traditional obligations extends the realm in which the division of labor operates. Men cooperate with each other based on their expectation of mutual benefit. The employee expects prompt payment.

When men cannot trust each other to fulfill their obligations, they search for more reliable partners in production. The range of contacts is reduced. Output is reduced. Wealth is reduced.

11

SURETYSHIP: TRANSFERRING LIABILITY

My son, if thou be surety for thy friend, if thou hast stricken thy hand with a stranger, thou art snared with the words of thy mouth, thou art taken with the words of thy mouth (Prov. 6:1–2).

Solomon is adamant about the necessity of avoiding surety. “Surety” is another word for co-signing for a loan. One man agrees to become responsible for the debts of another person, should that person default on his debt. The man who “strikes his hand” is obligated to honor the terms of the other man’s contract. He has accepted personal liability for another man’s economic performance.

Avoid such obligations, Proverbs teaches. “He that is surety for a stranger shall smart [know no peace, NEB] for it: and he that hateth suretyship is sure” (11:15). “A man void of understanding striketh his hands, and becometh surety in the presence of his friend” (17:18). “Be not thou one of them that strike hands, or of them that are sureties for debts” (22:26).

A. Collateralized Loans

There are rules for dealing with people who ignore this advice. A stranger is a person in the community who is not of the faith, and who therefore has no covenantal obligations either to the church or the wider covenanted community. If you lend to a stranger, be sure to take collateral from the person who has become the co-signer. The co-signer is now the “lender of last resort” for the stranger. The stranger may default. He may depart to a foreign land in the middle of the night. The person who has co-signed is therefore the most important individual in the transaction, as far as the creditor is concerned. Twice in Proverbs we find the following advice: “Take the garment that is surety for a stranger: and take a pledge [collateral] of him for a strange woman" (20:16; 27:13).

The "strange woman" is synonymous with religious apostasy, which Proverbs contrasts with wisdom, meaning the fear of the Lord (Prov. 2). The strange woman represents the culture of Babylon (Rev. 17:3–6), a Jezebel culture. Anyone who would co-sign for such a person lacks good judgment. He is all too likely to be cheated by the predictably faithless debtor for whom he has co-signed. Collect collateral in advance from such a person.

The motives for co-signing are varied. The obvious one is friendship. A person is approached by a friend, who asks him to "strike hands," or in modern terminology, to "put his name on the dotted line."¹ Why is this necessary? Why doesn't the friend simply put his own name on the dotted line? The fact is, he does, but the creditor is doubtful about the ability of the first debtor to make good on the debt. The creditor may not be willing to transfer assets to this person, or at least not at the prevailing rate of interest. The creditor may want to extract a higher rate of interest in order to compensate himself for the extra risk involved in loaning to a high-risk debtor.

B. A Co-Signer

If this higher rate of interest is so high that the debtor is even less likely to repay the loan, the creditor simply refuses to make the loan. In order to decrease the risk of loss on the loan, the creditor imposes a new restriction. He tells the debtor to locate a more solvent person who will agree to repay the loan, should the original debtor default. This lowers the risk premium involved in the market rate of interest. Because the risk of loss is lower, the risk premium is lower, and therefore the rate of interest can be set lower. The creditor is protected. By spreading the risk of default, the creditor believes that his loaned funds are more likely to be repaid.

The co-signer therefore increases his own financial exposure. He is being asked to co-sign because a lender is doubtful about the character of the debtor, or about his competence, or whatever. The co-signer is saying that friendship, or his own personal evaluation of the debtor's ability and willingness to repay, counts for more than the evaluation of the potential creditor. He takes on the liability of repayment. He says, in effect, "the evaluation of my friend by the creditor is incorrect, and I will demonstrate my confidence in my own superior judgment by co-signing.”

1. Contracts no longer have dotted lines. Perhaps they once did.

There is another possible motivation: charity. The co-signer expects his friend to default, but he co-signs anyway, in order to enable the first man to achieve his life’s goals. Co-signing such a loan is an act of grace—an unmerited gift. This was Christ’s motivation in laying down His life for His friends (John 15:13). He became surety for them (Heb. 7:22).

Insurance contracts were developed in the late Middle Ages that involved co-signing by risk-takers. Insurers would guarantee investors in a trading venture. If a merchant’s ship sank, they would repay the investors. For this, the insurers were guaranteed an insurance “premium”: a fixed percentage of the original investment. This was called “bottomry.” Because they bore the risk of failure, insurers made the venture possible, for investors would then put money into the project. But insurers (“co-signers”) were paid for taking this risk. They spread their risk by insuring numerous ventures.

Modern civil governments have taken on many responsibilities that private, voluntary co-signers might otherwise be asked to bear—and which they would decline to accept. But, unlike private insurers, the state does not enter the loan market in quest of financial profit. The state is buying political support and expanding state power by means of its ability to “sign the taxpayers’ names on the dotted line.” For example, the state creates guarantees for the repayment to lenders of private, profit-seeking loans to private companies or foreign nations, should the debtors default, thereby subsidizing both the lenders and the recipient companies or foreign governments. These state-subsidized debtors therefore obtain loans at below-market interest rates, since the risk premium in the private loans’ interest rates falls sharply.

The state also creates guarantees for depositors who put their money into government-insured banks and other lending agencies. This subsidizes these lending institutions and all those who borrow from them, since they can do business at lower interest rates. Higher-risk debtors can now obtain loans, because taxpayers are implicitly compelled by their rulers to co-sign for the government-insured lending institutions. Farmers receive guarantees for crop prices; they also gain access to below-market interest rates for home loans. The housing market especially has been subsidized ever since the 1930s in the United States by various loan-guarantee programs. An important political goal for any special-interest group is to become eligible for the subsidy of government co-signed loans.

Because all loan markets are now linked directly to currency systems, domestic and international, the whole fabric of Western trade is threatened by default. The world has loaned to “strange women”; in fact, the whole system of modern political economy is operated by “strangers” to the faith. And because the co-signing is political and compulsory, few of the faithful can escape.

Modern interventionist civil governments have produced compulsory co-signing on a scale never dreamed of by Solomon. In effect, all tax-financed welfare programs are a form of surety. Citizens have become financially liable for each other’s mistakes, tragedies, and incompetence. The results are becoming clear: the threat of massive bankruptcies, either openly or through the concealed bankruptcy that is produced by monetary inflation.

When Jesus Christ died on the cross for the sins of His people, He became surety for them (Heb. 7:22). The enormous cost involved in His becoming personally liable for His people’s eternal debts to God provides the most graphic example in all of history of the potential costs of one’s voluntary assumption of other men’s personal disabilities. Christ bore unlimited liability. Only a man fully willing to bear a great deal of risk—and who has the capital to repay the debt completely—should contemplate becoming surety for a friend. He must limit his liability.

Conclusion

Debt is always risky. The debtor can lose whatever collateral he possesses. Debt is more risky when a co-signing debtor does not know the economic position of someone he has co-signed for. Such debt places the preservation his wealth into the hands of someone who could not qualify for a loan, based on his own signature and assets. A co-signer’s plans can be disrupted by the failure of the primary debtor to pay his debt on time.

It is unwise to co-sign a note for anyone. It places your assets on the line. A person who does not have sufficient capital, including a good credit rating, to be granted a loan is a high-risk debtor. Creditors seek to protect their loans. They demand that a poor credit risk find someone else to put his name on the debt, meaning his wealth.

12

ANTS AND SLUGGARDS

Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise: which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest (Prov. 6:6–8).

In Western folklore, the story of the grasshopper and the ant has been a familiar one for millennia. Aesop's Fables includes it. The diligent ant works through the summer, gathering food for the winter, while the carefree and careless grasshopper ignores the threat of winter. The grasshopper takes advantage of the summer weather to dance and sing, as if the good weather would last forever. He assumes that there are no future crises to prepare for by sacrificing today. When winter comes, he faces starvation. He then comes to the ant and begs for food. The ant refuses; there is insufficient food for both of them.

A. Survival and Success

This passage in Proverbs forces us to consider the requirements of survival and success. The New English Bible translates the passage as follows: “. . . but in the summer she prepares her store of food and lays in her supplies at harvest.” To imitate the ant, we must become future-oriented. We must begin to count the costs of our activities (Luke 14:28–30).¹ If we are unwilling to work hard today, we will come to poverty. “How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? When wilt thou arise out of thy sleep? Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: so shall thy poverty come as one that travaileth [as a robber, NEB], and thy want as an armed man” (vv. 9–11).

Sluggards resent the lifestyle of ants. The activities of ants testify to a world-and-life view different from that held by sluggards. The sluggard is content to sleep. He allows the events of life to pass him by. He assumes that the peacefulness of sleep and the enjoyment of leisure can be purchased at zero cost or minimal cost. There is no crisis ahead, or if there is, nothing can be done to prepare for it successfully. There is no need to prepare for the future.

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

B. Class and Time Perspective

Edward Banfield, the Harvard political scientist, described this outlook as lower class. He said that class divisions in society are not based on the size of individual bank accounts or occupational status; they are based on a person's time perspective. Upper-class people are future-oriented. Lower-class people are present-oriented.² What characterizes the upper-class person is his diligence in sacrificing present pleasures for future productivity and achievement.³ Ludwig von Mises would say that upper-class people, as described by Banfield, have very low time-preference; they save for the future in response to very low interest rates. The upper-class society therefore enjoys relatively low rates of interest. Upper-class investors respond to low rates of interest, whereas the lower-class investor demands very high rates of interest in order to persuade him to forfeit the present use of his economic resources.⁴

Upper-class societies—future-oriented, high-thrift societies—tend to experience higher rates of economic growth. People buy what they want: future consumption rather than present consumption. In contrast, lower-class societies put a high premium on present consumption. They sacrifice future consumption in order to achieve this goal. Ants and sluggards have different goals and different time perspectives.

C. Pietism and Poverty

Pietism (e.g., certain types of fundamentalism and monasticism) and quietism (e.g., mysticism) focus their interest on “spiritual” goals, which are contrasted with material or “earthly” goals. Members of both groups believe that the proper perspective of New Testament believers is passivity toward the earthly future. They misinterpret Paul's

2. Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 53–54.

3. Ibid., pp. 48–53.

4. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 18. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

words, “Be careful for nothing” (Phil. 4:6a), which can also be translated “be full of care for nothing,” or better yet, “have no anxiety” (NEB). They argue that Paul meant that we should not devote lots of resources to planning for the future and investing in terms of our plans. Christ’s warning in the Sermon on the Mount, “Take therefore no thought for tomorrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof” (Matt. 6:34), is interpreted to mean that all planning is unwise. Yet what Christ taught was the illegitimacy of a paralyzing worry about the future—a paralysis that leads to little planning, or planning to meet crises that never come. Such worry is wasteful. “But Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you” (Matt. 6:33).⁵ The material blessings will follow when men concern themselves with establishing God’s kingdom.

The pietist interprets “kingdom of God” to mean the kingdom of the internal. He insists: “When men concern themselves with the details of prayer, church worship, and personal piety, then God will take care of them.” This belief is basic to the faith of the pietist. He believes that the practical, down-to-earth future-orientation represented by the behavior of the ant is a now-superseded Old Testament standard. With respect to material things, the pietist claims to be as unconcerned as the sluggard is. The pietist folds his hands for hours in prayer; the sluggard folds his hands for hours in slumber. In both cases, the approach is outwardly the same: folded hands. So is the outward result: poverty.

The biblical view is expressed by the actions of the ant: diligence concerning that which sustains life. “He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand: but the hand of the diligent maketh rich” (10:4).⁶ Slack hands, folded hands: the result is poverty. “The soul of the sluggard desireth, and hath nothing: but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat” (13:4).⁷ A fat soul and wealth can be compatible, although they can sometimes be incompatible (Ps. 106:15). Hard work, future orientation, thrift, attention to details, high income, and contentment under God: here is the Bible’s “wealth formula.”

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 15.

6. Chapter 21.

7. Chapter 38.

D. Word and Bread

Man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God (Deut. 8:3b; Matt. 4:4⁸). Yet man does not live by the word of God alone, either, if by “word of God,” we mean an “internalized” word—reading only, prayer only, handing out tracts only, or preaching only. What is forbidden is the concept of separation of word and bread. We see this in 40 years of manna in the wilderness (Deut. 8:3a), and in Christ’s resumption of eating after the completion of His 40-day wilderness experience (Matt. 4:2). We also see it in the celebration of the Passover and the Lord’s Supper. What produced bread in the promised land of Canaan, when the manna ceased (Josh. 5:12), was not a program of strictly internal religious exercises, but attention to the whole of God’s word, including biblical law, and also including a thoughtful consideration of the ant, not to mention the sluggard.

Some American fundamentalists react in self-righteous outrage to Christians who spend money on dehydrated food storage programs, gold and silver coins—the economic equivalent of the construction of a tornado shelter. They say that such preparations for the future are a sign of a lack of faith in God, a humanistic concern with earthly cares of the world. Their shibboleth of shibboleths: “God will take care of me!” This really means that when a crisis comes, they will wind up on the doorsteps of those who did prepare, calling on them to show charity to them, which supposedly is their Christian duty. “God will take care of me” really boils down to “You ants will take care of me.” This is also the sluggard’s cry.

Jesus’ answer to these hand-folding critics is found in the parable of the 10 virgins, who awaited the return of the bridegroom. Five were wise and took oil in their lamps. Five were foolish and took no oil. “And all the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, Not so, lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves” (Matt. 25:8–9). The result: “And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut” (v. 10). Such is the fate of foolish virgins, sluggards, and pietists. God takes care of them, for sure, but not in the way they had hoped for.

8. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 1.

Conclusion

The ant is pictured here as future-oriented. She stores up food in summer. She sacrifices present consumption for the sake of future consumption.

The ant takes steps in summer to solve the problem of winter, when nature will produce no crops. The annual cycle of feast and famine is overcome by the actions of ants in laying up food in advance for the winter season.

No one tells the ant what to do. The ant does it naturally. Solomon tells the lazy person to imitate the ant, i.e., to become self-motivated. This is a feature of the free market. No government agency issues orders concerning what should be produced, yet self-motivated producers systematically provide goods and services that customers desire. This requires future-orientation and careful planning by producers.

13

FALSE SIGNALS AND UNRELIABILITY

A naughty [worthless] person, a wicked man, walketh with a froward [false] mouth. He winketh with his eyes, he speaketh with his feet, he teacheth with his fingers. Frowardness [perversity] is in his heart, he deviseth mischief continually; he soweth discord. Therefore shall his calamity come suddenly; suddenly shall he be broken without remedy (Prov. 6:12–15).

Moral worthlessness eventually translates into economic poverty. The person described here is someone who continually deals falsely with others. The wink, the crossed fingers, the special signals to partners in deceit: all are part of a pattern of unreliability. The person says one thing, but he communicates a different message to others who are part of the “inner circle” who understand the secret signs.

A. Deception and Discoordination

Secret signs and communications establish a psychological distinction between “them”—the suckers—and “us,” meaning those “in the know.” The deceiver is in fellowship with others who understand the meaning of the special signs. They see themselves as adversaries of those who do business with them. Others may adhere to their words and contracts, but the insiders do not feel bound by their own words. A promise is not seen as binding, and a contract is not to be fulfilled, unless it is immediately beneficial to the one who has made the promise.

The spread of such an outlook is disastrous for any society. Men must make decisions in life concerning the future. They are inescapably interdependent with other people. They attempt to achieve their goals through the voluntary cooperation of others, who are simultaneously pursuing their own goals. This dovetailing of personal plans is made possible by voluntary contracts. One man relies on another to assist him in completing his plans.

Deception increases the costs for everyone who is relying on the deceiver to fulfill the terms of his contract. The man is unreliable, yet other people have made plans in terms of his word. Even if they are not being defrauded deliberately, their plans will go awry. It will take extra time or capital to complete those plans because of the nonperformance of the deceiver.

This person actively spreads strife. He divides people from each other. Again, this increases other people's costs of cooperation. They find it more difficult to deal with each other because of mutual suspicions. One evil person is capable of disrupting the plans of many others. The dominion covenant is thwarted because the strife undermines the productivity that is the product of the division of labor. It takes longer and becomes more expensive to subdue the earth.

What is significant is the suddenness of his downfall. Normally, men receive warnings. They see other people grow wary of them. Their business revenues decline. They find it difficult to gain cooperation with other individuals, who fear they will go bankrupt and not perform their contractual obligations. In other words, as men conduct their daily affairs unwisely, other men call attention to their shortcomings, directly or indirectly. Unreliable people either learn from experience or else they see their income declining steadily.

There is another important factor to consider. The free market economy creates incentives to correct antisocial behavior. A man may learn directly from his profit-and-loss statements that he must restructure his business dealings. If he fails to repent (turn around), then some other person may be able to step in and offer to help the faltering business—for a fee, of course. Finally, competitors may step in and offer to buy up the business. Step by step, the free market economy allows other men to confront an inefficient man with the reality of his failures.

In contrast, this deceiver falls overnight. Whatever negative signals he receives are either ignored by him—he trusts no signals, being a misuser of signals—or else misinterpreted. Perhaps his partners in deception are now setting him up. They are doing to him what he did to others. Because he trusts the signals of his accomplices, he becomes vulnerable to them. Because he thinks fraud can overcome the pressures of the free market, he ignores signals from honest men. After all, they are the suckers. A cunning man never gives a sucker an even break.

B. Price Controls

Government-enforced price controls are a form of false signals. The government tells the voters that they will be able to buy goods and services at below-market prices. But the bureaucrats are winking: at economic law, or at black market operators, or at insiders. Price controls misinform the public about the supposed availability of goods and services at prices that are artificially low (price ceilings). Those “on the inside” know better. They can arrange their economic affairs accordingly. Those who are not in the know—the majority of voters—become the suckers. The result: economic shortages (from price ceilings) or gluts (from price floors),¹ and the eventual disruption of the whole economy.

Price ceilings are especially insidious. The voters are deceived into believing that they can count on other citizens (sellers) when working out their respective plans. But sellers resist selling at a loss; they want unrecorded payoffs, or special barter deals, or other inducements to trade. This creates resentment and strife. It subsidizes envy. The controls generate improper responses to the true conditions of supply and demand. Eventually, the whole economy collapses or becomes stagnant. The more the false signals, the more devastating the collapse.

Calamity comes swiftly and without remedy. Nobody trusts the deceiver. He cannot gain cooperation of others because of the pattern of deception he has established. His “capital reserve”—a good reputation—is depleted. Without it, he finds it difficult to rebound from disaster. He needs cooperation, but he cannot find people who will sell it to him. He has priced himself out of the market. Dealing with him is too risky. Until the very end, he believes himself to be immune to false signals. This is his undoing: he fails to respond to accurate signals—signals that tell him to change his ways or else be judged.

Conclusion

Deception can be indulged in by individuals and civil governments. Individual deception has limited consequences, both to the deceiver and those deceived. Word gets out regarding a person’s lack of trustworthiness. Government deception is more insidious, for it relies on people's trust in authority.

1. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 12:5.

Price controls are forms of institutionalized deception. Government officials announce that an item must not be sold above a specific price. If free market conditions would produce a higher price, the item begins to go off the official, visible markets. Sellers refuse to sell for less than what the item is really worth, according to buyers' bids.

Deception increases the cost of doing business. It therefore reduces the amount of cooperation in the market. This reduces the division of labor and therefore productivity. A society's wealth is reduced from what it otherwise might have been.

In a free market, the penalties against deception reduce the quantity of deception at the margin: little by little. Negative feedback steadily pressures the deceiver to change his ways or else suffer more losses. In contrast, deception by governments continues, because the public's negative feedback rarely falls on the faceless officials who are enforcing the programs that rely on deception. There is not comparable pressure to change course.

THE LIGHT OF GOD'S LAW

My son, keep thy father's commandment, and forsake not the law of thy mother. Bind them continually upon thine heart, and tie them about thy neck. When thou goest, it shall lead thee; and when thou awakest, it shall talk with thee. For the commandment is a lamp; and the law is light; and reproofs of instruction are the way of life (Prov. 6:20–23).

A. Parents Represent God Judicially

Solomon identifies his own judgment with wisdom and the law. The early sections of Proverbs are focused on this theme: the importance of biblical wisdom, which is personified as female (Prov. 8) and equated with God, the source of life: “But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death” (8:36).

By making this identification, and also by including a mother's advice, Solomon asserts that it is possible for men to act as the legal representatives of God to their children. Parents come in the name of God, imparting His wisdom to their children. They bear lawful authority, and they have access to God's standards of righteous living.

It is a constant complaint against Christianity in our age that “No one knows the will of God.” This is used by relativists as a justification of opposing all civil law (anarchism), especially in sexual matters, or as a justification of the rejection of all Bible-based opposition to a particular civil law (statism). There is supposedly no law of God to infringe on man, either as an autonomous individual (anarchism) or as an autonomous collective species (statism). Because God is “wholly other,”¹ He cannot communicate with man; therefore, no man is mor-

1. The phrase is Karl Barth's, the most influential heretical Protestant theologian of the twentieth century. For critiques of Barth's theology, see Cornelius Van Til, The New Modernism (1947) and Christianity and Barthianism (1962), both published by P&R. Barth tried to shove God out of history and into Kant's unknowable noumenal ally or legally bound to impose the terms of God's law on anyone else. God is so high that He cannot lift man up from sin. God is so pure that men need not strive to match the standards set by God. In short, the relativistic rebel asks, "Hath God said, 'Be ye holy, for I am holy' (Lev. 11:44)?" Then he answers his own question: "No; God says, 'Be ye unholy, for I alone am holy.'"

Solomon categorically rejects such argumentation. A parent who has personally mastered biblical law does have access to part of the mind of God. Paul wrote: "For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. 2:16).² This law is a revelation that is not the special wisdom of a closed priesthood. It is to be proclaimed to every citizen. In Israel, it was to be read every seventh year to the assembly of the people (Deut. 31:10–13).³ Because God holds men responsible for the performance of the terms of this law, He has revealed this aspect of Himself to men. Man is made in the image of God and can therefore receive God's law. The argument that God's mind is too far removed from man's mind is an attempt to deny man's nature as God's image-bearer. It is an assertion of man's autonomy.

B. Internalizing Biblical Law

Solomon tells his son that the law is to be mastered to such an extent that it is always with him. Its terms are to be indelibly etched into his heart, meaning the deepest recesses of his mind. The law is personified as a constant companion. "When thou goest, it shall go with thee; when thou sleepest, it shall keep thee; and when thou awakest, it shall talk with thee" (v. 22). When men ask mental questions, their answers should be structured by the very words of God. The mind is to encounter the law of God at all times. God's law is to guide men's thoughts.

When biblical guides men's thoughts, it should also guide their steps. Without biblical law, men walk in darkness. Like a blind man is he who departs from biblical law. He wanders aimlessly. Worse, he wanders into the pit of death. The reproofs of the law are "the way of life" (v. 23b). In other words, to be without biblical law's correction is realm.

2. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 75.

to be in the pathway of death.

C. Alive With God's Law

Is this different from New Testament teaching? Paul wrote: "For I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died. And the commandment, which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death" (Rom. 7:9–10). What does this mean? It means exactly what Proverbs teaches. Sin deceives men; the law allows us to see what we are and where we are headed. The law points to our need for regeneration; without it, we perish. The law serves as our guide. If we did not have its testimony, we would not understand our fallen ethical condition.

To be "alive without the law" means to be ignorantly dead in our sins. It means that we do not understand our true spiritual condition. Paul was not saying that he was ethically pure, and therefore the possessor of eternal life, before he read the Mosaic law, for "death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude [likeness] of Adam's transgression" (Rom. 5:14). The Mosaic law "killed" him in the sense that it showed him that he was already spiritually dead, as a son of Adam. Thus, the law pointed him toward the pathway of life, Jesus Christ.

Biblical law should be as basic to our decision-making as a flashlight's beam is on a dark night. A man who shines a light on the ground "naturally" steps only into the circle of light. He "naturally" avoids stepping into the darkness. He does not know what dangers lurk in the darkness, so in order to avoid possible dangers, he steps only on the lighted portion of the path.

We know that the very essence of the sin of man is to prefer spiritual darkness to light. "And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil" (John 3:19). What is really "natural" to fallen man is to avoid the Bible's lighted ethical pathway. Solomon therefore counsels his son to regard the ethical light cast by the law as he would regard the visible light cast by a lamp. The law is a "lamp unto our feet." But it takes training to learn to trust the light of the law. This trust is not instinctive in fallen man, which is why Solomon has given his son the Proverbs.

Conclusion

To keep from getting “tripped up” in life, men must adhere to the terms of biblical law. To have God’s law as your companion is to have a counselor who is looking out for your best interests. To act in terms of this law’s counsel is to walk in the pathway of life. Conforming instinctively to the law’s directing counsel should be like walking instinctively in the circle of light. It is our ethical responsibility to become instinctive conformers to the law.

15

RESTITUTION AND IMPARTIALITY

Men do not despise a thief, if he steals to satisfy his soul when he is hungry. But if he be found, he shall restore seven fold; he shall give all the substance of his house (Prov. 6:30–31).

A. Crime Against God and Man

Theft is a crime against God, the victim, and society. We should not argue that a “crime against property” is ethically subordinate to a “crime against mankind,” for property is simply “a bundle of rights of ownership,” and these rights are possessed by men under God. A crime against property is therefore a crime against mankind. Theft transfers wealth to law-breakers and away from those who have not broken a civil law. It transfers wealth from those who have served customers efficiently in a competitive market. It reduces the capital of those who have demonstrated their ability to meet the needs and wants of customers at prices the customers have been willing and able to pay. Theft therefore reduces the present wealth of individual victims, and it may reduce the future wealth of customers, who will not be equally well-served by those who had benefited them before—the productive victims of theft who have been decapitalized by the thieves. Theft also increases everyone’s uncertainty about his economic future, which in turn tends to raise the costs of protecting property, thereby lowering per capita wealth.

Another proverb announces: “Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? Or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain” (30:8–9).¹ Middle-class comfort is normally preferable to both poverty and great wealth, for both extremes involve temptations for sinning against God.

1. Chapter 85.

Neither grinding poverty nor great wealth is generally beneficial to the majority of men.

The poor man in this example has succumbed to the temptation. He has stolen bread, a staple of life. He is not a professional thief. He was hungry, and he took bread to satisfy his hunger. Who can blame him? God blames him. The law enforcement system blames him. He must pay “sevenfold” to the victim. Restitution is legally inescapable. Because he is poor, the extent of the restitution payment will hurt him greatly. He has so little that he stole bread. Any extra expense will disrupt his household. Nevertheless, he must pay up to “all the substance of his house.”

If he has no economic reserves at all, he will be sold into slavery to raise the money to pay his victim. This is great incentive for him to find the restitution payment money somewhere.

B. Restitution in the Mosaic Law

We should understand that the details of this incident are not to be taken literally. The law of God requires double restitution for all theft (Ex. 22:4),² except the theft and subsequent slaughter or sale of sheep (four-fold) and oxen (five-fold) (Ex. 22:1).³ Anyone familiar with biblical law knows that seven-fold restitution is a figurative term, like the seven-fold judgment of God on anyone who persecuted Cain (Gen. 4:15), and Lamech’s prideful boast of his ability to revenge himself 77-fold (Gen. 4:24), meaning eleven times greater than the God’s metaphorical restitution payment. Sometimes a number in the Bible is to be interpreted figuratively, not literally. Solomon knew that his audience would know the details of biblical law. What was his point in exaggerating? To make a point.

Few poor men would really be bankrupted by double restitution for a loaf of bread. The point is, the economic burden of the restitution payment would be proportionately greater for him than for a rich man who stole a loaf of bread. The required restitution payment has nothing to do with the criminal’s ability to pay. The law does not play favorites. God is not a respecter of persons (II Sam. 14:14). Both rich and poor must make restitution, which is based on the market price of the item stolen. Income, whether of the thief or his victim, has nothing to do with the extent of restitution. “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour” (Lev. 19:15).⁴ Restitution also has nothing to do with the victim’s feelings about the criminal. The criminal’s motivation is equally irrelevant. Rich or poor, hungry or fat, thieves must make restitution in terms of the value of the stolen property. The Bible condemns both deeper-pocket jurisprudence (deciding against the rich because they can afford the loss) and shallow-pocket jurisprudence (deciding in favor of the poor only because they are poor).

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43.

3. Idem.

Solomon is warning us that if the Bible specifies punishment for a “trivial crime against property,” how much more is the punishment against adulterers, which is anything but trivial (vv. 32–35)? If a victim demands repayment from one whom he does not despise, will he allow his wife’s seducer to go free? If he refuses to show mercy to his wife, when biblical law is enforced, then the punishment must involve the death of both of adulterers (Lev. 20:10). The judicial issue here is victim’s rights.⁵

The predictability and impartiality of biblical law are to undergird the social order. All those who break the law are subject to its penalties. This points to the final judgment. God does not “grade on a curve.” Paul wrote: “All have sinned and come short of the glory of God” (Rom. 3:23). It may cost a convicted impoverished thief all that he owns to pay his debt to the victim. The debt must be paid. It will cost every ethical rebel an eternity in hell. The debt must be paid. The point is clear: the debt must be paid. There is no escape, no appeal to “circumstances,” no plea bargaining, and no suspended sentences. The law is rigorous, for the law’s Author is rigorous.

Conclusion

All men are equally protected when biblical law is enforced. Rich men are defended from poverty-stricken thieves; poverty-stricken owners are defended from rich thieves. Economic uncertainty is reduced by the very certainty of the law’s penalties. This benefits customers and producers, who can meet together and make exchanges, con-

4. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 14.

5. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 33. Cf. Gary North, Victim’s Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>) fidest that all parties will be protected by law from fraud and theft. It leads to greater output through a more extensive division of labor—a division of labor based on voluntary exchange and the protection of private property.

LAW: NATURAL VS. CREATIONAL

Counsel is mine, and sound wisdom: I am understanding; I have strength. By me kings reign, and princes decree justice. By me princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth (Prov. 8:14–16).

A. Biblical law: A Tool of Dominion

God speaks in this chapter anthropomorphically as wisdom, a female source of power and blessings. “She crieth at the gates” (v. 3). Wisdom contrasts her ethics with Satan’s, also feminine (7:10–23). (This feminine identification is found only in Proverbs.) The conclusion: all those who hate me, says wisdom, love death (8:36b).

The link between understanding and strength is made explicit (v. 14). Wisdom is a tool of dominion. By following the counsel of wisdom, men attain power over external events. It is in terms of wisdom that kings reign, judges rule, and the nobility retains power. All the judges of the earth hold office by means of wisdom.

By identifying wisdom with God, the Bible proclaims the cosmic personalism of existence.¹ God is sovereign over all kings and rulers. He is not a manipulator behind the thrones of men. He is sovereign (Isa. 45). They are not.

Does this mean that all powerful rulers are God-fearing, or at least biblical law-abiding? No; Canaanite kings were reprobate and had to be destroyed. Does it mean that kings consciously understand that God is sovereign over them? Again, no; only after seven years of madness did Nebuchadnezzar acknowledge his dependence on God (Dan. 4). The Pharaoh of the exodus never did. Does it mean that there are universally understandable principles of natural law to which all rational men have access through human reason? No.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

B. Rival Legal Theories

The Bible teaches a creational version of natural law theory. This stands in contrast to humanism's natural law theories. Humanistic natural law theory asserts that there are universally valid governing principles in the world that can be discovered through the use of reason, meaning a neutral reasoning process unaided by God's special revelation in the Bible. Sometimes this reasoning capacity is called "right reason"—"wrong reason" being the process by which other natural law advocates reach conclusions that the defender of "right reason" disagrees with. The natural man studies logic and facts, and if he reasons correctly, the natural law theorist believes, this natural man can come to understand the governing principles of the universe. This reasoning process is inductive. A gathering of facts, when coupled with a study of logic, can result in the attainment of wisdom.

In contrast, the Bible teaches that all of creation is revelational. Ethically rebellious men hold down (or hold back) the truth in their unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18–22).² Because all creation reveals God, it testifies to the existence of governing principles. Men choose to worship other gods and other principles. Whatever is creational, and therefore revelational, has been twisted by the natural man, who refuses to receive the things of the spirit (I Cor. 2:14).³ Whatever is creational is regarded by the natural man as unnatural—unnatural to his ethics and goals.

Nevertheless, this proverb insists that all kings and judges rule by means of biblical wisdom. This is what God testifies about Himself. There can be no rule by the authorities apart from wisdom. What can this mean? Clearly, rulers do evil things, and evil rulers do evil things continually. How can they be said to rule in terms of wisdom?

C. Obedience and Power

It means that, insofar as rulers wish to maintain their power, they must honor certain fundamental aspects of the creation. Satan does this. When he sought to curse Job, he came before God for permission to exercise power (Job 1:6–12; 2:1–7). He possesses no power apart from his understanding of God. When he tempted Eve, he cited God's instructions to Adam (Gen. 3:1). When he tempted Christ, he cited God's words in the law (Luke 4:3–12).⁴ Christ, unlike Eve, cited the applicable passages of the Mosaic law to answer Satan, and then abided by them in order to overcome him. Eve cited the relevant law to Satan (Gen. 3:3), but then failed to act in terms of its requirements. Specially revealed law offered her guidance to overcome Satan, just as it offered to Christ, but she spurned the law and its guidance, and therefore she went into bondage to her adversary.

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), pp. 20–21. Cf. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965) II, p. 37.

3. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

Power therefore is a product of ethical actions that are in conformity to biblical law. Weakness therefore is the product of ethical action not in conformity to biblical law. As men seek power, they discover regularities: by following the terms of biblical law, they increase their power. *Biblical law is a tool of dominion.*⁵ Inductively, power-seeking men learn to honor those regularities of creation that bring them power.

The revelation of God's law in the Bible speeds up the process of discovery. Without biblical revelation and special grace, men eventually refuse to follow the logic of creational law. Because men are perverse, and because God's mercy delays His wrath, rulers fail to discern the comprehensive legal-order that undergirds human power. They abandon biblical law. They are not immediately destroyed. They teach themselves a false lesson, namely, that ethical rebellion pays high dividends. They misinterpret the creational law-order.

The "trial and error" method of discovery leads men to an understanding of some of the principles of power, and so they rule in terms of them. But men's willful rebellion, when coupled with God's temporal mercy to His people, eventually brings weakness and external defeat, as in the case of Egypt in Moses' day. Without the restraint of special grace—personal regeneration and the Bible's revelation of God's law—rulers cannot perpetually maintain their control over external reality. Wisdom is ultimately presuppositional: men are to begin with wisdom; they cannot come to understand all of its rules and then conform themselves to these rules by means of inductive, trial-and-error reasoning. Therefore, natural law theory leads to natural weakness and defeat. It elevates the powers of unaided human reason, which is at war with wisdom's understanding.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990).

Conclusion

The two forms of natural law theory—creational and natural—are applications of the two forms of knowledge: covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking, saved and lost. The mind of man was distorted by Adam's Fall. Only through God's special grace, which includes knowledge of the Bible, is the covenant-breaker able to escape the burden imposed by original sin.

The natural man does not receive the things of the spirit. Among these things not received is a correct understanding of the covenantal structure of the universe. Cause and effect in the universe are ethical. Obedience to biblical law produces outward success, including the attainment of power over the creation. This power includes authority over other people. There are regularities in society. These regularities are covenantal.

To attain success and then to keep it, the covenant-breaker must obey biblical law. He can do this in a preliminary sense by adhering to basic moral rules of behavior that have their origin in God's covenants. But he holds back the truth because of his anti-covenantal heart. Eventually, he breaks away from God's law. The more consistent he is with his anti-covenantal presuppositions, the sooner and the more radical this break will be. Without special grace, no society can indefinitely adhere to the principles underlying biblical law, even the legal order corrupted by the Fall.

All natural law theories that do not begin with the covenants of God and the Fall of man will produce a covenant-breaking legal order. They cannot produce a covenant-keeping legal order. They therefore cannot produce justice. All of them are unwise.

THE POSSIBLE DREAM

*I love them that love me; and those that seek me early shall find me.
Riches are honourable with me; yea, durable riches and righteousness.
My fruit is better than gold, yea, than fine gold; and my revenue than choice silver (Prov. 8:17–19).*

The Bible does not promise all men riches, fame, or power. It does not promise health or wealth to all men. But it does promise wisdom to all those who will seek it. This is one quest that will always be rewarded, and rewarded with treasures greater than gold or silver.

Wisdom in Proverbs is an anthropomorphic representation of God. We do not discover wisdom, meaning God, by means of some trial-and-error inductive reasoning process. We must therefore begin with God (wisdom) as our operating first principle. The New Testament proclaims: “But without faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him” (Heb. 11:6). To get wisdom, we must first have wisdom. We must believe in order to exercise faith. We must be regenerate in order to seek salvation, for the natural man does not receive the things of the spirit; they are foolishness (anti-wisdom) to him (I Cor. 2:14).¹

Solomon is famous for his request of God. Like the pagan stories of the man who is offered a wish by a genie who lives in a metal lamp, Solomon asked in a dream for a gift from God: the greatest of all gifts, wisdom. Because he asked for wisdom rather than long life, riches, or victory in war, God granted him his request (I Kings 3:6–14). But the lure of idol-worshipping women—wisdom’s feminine antithesis, described in Proverbs 7—finally overcame his wisdom (I Kings 11). Which feminine principle of life will men worship: the harlot’s invitation or God's wisdom?

1. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2.

Men pursue economic long-shots. They gamble rather than work. They pan for gold rather than set up stores to sell miners the pans. They hope for the miracle and neglect the productive. They seek out the big deal and forfeit numerous little deals that would equal the payoff of the big one, given enough time. They chase rainbows and ignore the sunshine. They "bet against the house" and pass by a sure thing.

God's wisdom is personified as a woman who loves those who seek her. The pagan's "lady luck" is also female, but she loves no one. She "smiles" on some men, but she is as capricious as her name implies. She cannot be safely trusted. God is not an impersonal, capricious force in the universe; His words can be trusted. Seeking after Him is not an exercise in futility. The universe is not impersonal or "rigged" against mankind. It is rigged against ethical rebels, but it is simultaneously rigged in favor of those who seek God.²

Proverbs 7 and 8 personify the two masters, God and Satan, by means of anthropomorphic language: the two women. The great harlot of Babylon—the antichrist's world order—is female (Rev. 18). The universe is not impersonal, but radically personal.³ Men serve one of two masters, not impersonal forces, whether inevitable (fate) or random (luck). Men inescapably seek after one woman or the other, the harlot or wisdom. Both call to men: the harlot from the twilight (7:9), and wisdom from the high places and the gates of the city (8:2–3).

How soon should men seek wisdom? Early. By seeking wisdom early, men are guaranteed success. The harlot calls to men in the twilight, to spend the night illicitly. Wisdom calls early, as at daybreak. The day is to be given over to seeking wisdom. He who is diligent in the quest will be rewarded.

By comparing the treasures of wisdom with the precious metals, Proverbs drives the point into the minds of men: the most valuable asset of all is wisdom. Solomon was already wise when he asked for wisdom; he recognized that he was asking for the most valuable of all assets. Wealth subsequently flowed to his kingdom (I Kings 10:14–21). The fame of this rule spread everywhere (I Kings 4:3–11). The powerful and wealthy came to him for counsel (I Kings 10:11–13). In short, he achieved indirectly, through wisdom, the goals that other men seek directly through intrigue, magic, and violence.

2. Chapter 8.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

God speaks clearly to men. They can understand His words because they are made in His image. He communicates to them by means of analogies and metaphors. When He compares the value of wisdom with gold, He speaks a universal language. Like the pocket-book parables of Jesus, the economic language of wisdom personified can be grasped by anyone, in the day of Solomon or in the twenty-first century.

The universality of gold and silver as desirable assets to lay up in one's treasury reinforces the words of wisdom. When men think about the universal forms of wealth, they think of gold and silver. Across the globe, men understand the value of the precious metals. Abraham's wealth was counted in these metals (Gen. 13:2). When men speak out against the economic importance of gold and silver, they speak nonsense. When John Maynard Keynes spoke of gold in 1923 as a barbarous relic,⁴ and when Lenin suggested in 1921 that the victorious Bolsheviks would someday use gold for public lavatories,⁵ they proclaimed utopianism ("utopia": no place). These two spokesmen of their era spoke for both sides of the Iron Curtain. Both men had contempt for Christian society. Keynes the atheistic homosexual and Lenin the atheistic revolutionary knew enough about Christianity to prefer the harlot of the twilight.

Conclusion

The quest for wisdom is man's only sure thing. Gaining wisdom is better than gaining gold and silver. Thus, the pay-off is very high, and the risk of failure is zero, if men continue to seek wisdom's face. Solomon ceased the quest and went to the harlot in his later years. He died, and his son—the son to whom the Proverbs were presumably addressed—rebelled and lost the northern kingdom. The quest must be begun early, and it must not end as twilight approaches.

4. John Maynard Keynes, "A Tract on Monetary Reform" (1923), in Keynes, Essays in Persuasion (London: Macmillan, 1931), p. 208.

5. V. I. Lenin, "The Importance of Gold Now and After the Complete Victory of Socialism" (1921). (<http://bit.ly/LeninGold>). Reprinted in The Lenin Anthology, ed. Robert C. Tucker (New York: Norton, 1975), p. 515.

18

PUBLIC PATHS OR PRIVATE CORNERS

I lead in the way of righteousness in the midst of the paths of judgment: That I may cause those that love me to inherit substance; and I will fill their treasures (Prov. 8:20–21).

A. Rival Paths

The first nine chapters of the Book of Proverbs serve as an introduction to the practical, concrete applications of God's proverbial wisdom to the affairs of life. These introductory remarks cover the fundamental principles of life. They lay the foundation. The main theme is this: attaining and applying biblical wisdom are the chief end of life (4:5–7). Everything that follows in Proverbs rests on this basic presupposition.

There are practical aspects of these early remarks. The themes of power, wealth, fame, and long life are not absent. The overriding themes are not these, however. Things that matter most are righteous judgment, covenantal faithfulness, avoiding the harlot, honest dealing, and the commandments of God. Above all, the commandments of God.

Wisdom is a guide for the way of righteousness—not an impersonal guide, but a living guide. Wisdom in Proverbs is an anthropomorphic representation of God. God guides men along the way of righteousness, as an experienced traveller guides a newcomer. Step by step, the traveler advances behind wisdom, who in this case is the original path-breaker. There is no possibility that the guide will lose her way.

The imagery of the pathway is explicit in Proverbs 8:20. This same imagery is used to describe the requirement of the people of Israel to follow strictly all rulings imposed by the priestly judges. “According to the sentence of the law which they shall teach thee, and according to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do: thou shalt not decline from the sentence which they shall show thee, to the right hand, nor to the left" (Deut. 17:11). The path is obviously narrow; no deviation is permitted.¹ Christ reaffirmed this in His Sermon on the Mount: "Enter ye at the strait [narrow] gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it" (Matt. 7:13–14).²

The concept of the path of righteousness refers to personal righteousness. The focus of concern for the father is the moral righteousness of his son. Nevertheless, this path also refers to public righteousness, including law enforcement. Self-government first; then comes the application of biblical law to areas of life under the jurisdiction of the righteous man. How could it be otherwise? Because self-government under biblical law produces wealth and influence, the extension of the rule of biblical law proceeds outward, from self-governed individuals to others under their lawful jurisdiction.

B. Obedience and Wealth

Does self-government under biblical law produce wealth and influence? Proverbs 8:21 affirms that it does. More than this: wisdom leads men along the path of judgment in order to cause those behind her to become prosperous. Those who love wisdom will inherit substance; those who love wisdom will have their treasuries filled.

This does not mean that all wise men will get rich. The true wealth is wisdom herself (God Himself): durable riches, fruit that is more valuable than gold (vv. 18–19). But because men who follow wisdom are promised better forms of wealth, one testimony of God to the reliability of His word is that covenant-keeping men will inherit inferior forms of wealth: earthly wealth. This is an affirmation of God's ability and willingness to deliver even greater riches in eternity.

We see an analogous example of this principle—God's delivery of lesser earthly riches, which testifies to God's ability to deliver greater, heavenly riches—in Jesus' healing of the palsied man. First, He said to the man, "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee" (Matt. 9:2b). Certain scribes murmured within themselves, "This man blas-

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: [1999] 2012), ch. 41.

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: [2000] 2012), ch. 17.

phemeth” (v. 3). “And Jesus knowing their thoughts said, Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts? For whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins (then saith he to the sick of the palsy), Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thy house. And he arose, and departed to his house” (vv. 5–7).

Men can see the results of righteousness. Christ healed the palsied man. “But when the multitudes saw it, they marvelled, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men” (v. 8). Visible success strengthens the public authority of the righteous man. In Christ’s case, it led to even greater resentment on the part of the religious leaders of His day, who saw the transfer of political power involved in Jesus’ demonstration of His lawful authority under God.

God wants to honor publicly those who honor Him publicly: “. . . for them that honour me I will honour. . .” (1 Sam. 2:20). One way is to grant them riches and honor (Prov. 8:18).³ To internalize these references to external economic success is to minimize the power of God to manifest His reliability and sovereignty, in time and on earth. Such a “spiritualizing” interpretation is too often governed by an impulse that is related to the hostility displayed by the religious leaders of Israel against Jesus. They deeply resented Jesus’ ability to heal men before the gaze of the multitudes. He was manifesting His power in public. They would have preferred Him to work His miracles privately, or not at all. They would have preferred to face a religion of strictly “internal” blessings. Such a religion would not have resulted in a public confrontation—the kind of confrontation that the Pharaoh of Moses’ day so deeply resented.

Paul understood the impact of a religion of publicly manifested power. He announced to a civil magistrate, “I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak forth the words of truth and soberness. For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner” (Acts 26:25–26).

Pietists, like atheists and Satanists, prefer a version of Christianity that sits in a corner, not drawing attention to itself or to the God of might and power who controls all of life in terms of His decree. They prefer durable riches alone to durable riches with wealth and public honor. They sing, “I’d rather have Jesus than silver and gold,” while we sing, "I'd rather have Jesus and silver and gold." They prefer a world of reduced public confrontation and minimal dominion. They prefer to pray in a corner and avoid the paths of civic judgment. They prefer cultural impotence to cultural responsibility.

3. Chapter 17.

Men generally achieve their goals in the long run when they are willing to pay the price; pietists are no exception. They have already achieved their goal of public irrelevance. While they continue to specialize in cultural irrelevance, dominion-oriented Christians can begin to specialize in occupying the paths of righteous public judgment. Pietists get what they want; they should stop complaining because dominionists expect to get what they want.

Conclusion

The Book of Proverbs teaches that wisdom is the chief goal of life. External, visible success is a mark of this wisdom. Obedience to God's laws produces blessings. These blessings are both external and internal.

Wisdom produces righteousness. This indicates that wisdom is an outworking of redemption, for the Bible is clear: fallen man does not work his way into salvation, either with the works of his hands or the works of his mind. Wisdom is a gift of God. Solomon understood this.

Wisdom so defined produces prosperity. This is an aspect of covenantal inheritance. God visibly honors the righteous. This visible honor testifies to the holiness of God and His law. He is not a failure in history. This message is rejected by the vast majority of Christians in my day, who are pietists: internal salvation (spiritual healing) only. The world at large is not seen as being affected by this internal transformation. The local church, yes. The family, yes. But not civil government. Not the civilization. Covenant-keepers with a pietistic outlook believe they have no responsibilities for the social order. This is not what Solomon's proverbs taught.

19

TREASURES OF WICKEDNESS

Treasures of wickedness profit nothing: but righteousness delivereth from death (Prov. 10:2).

There are two truths taught by this proverb: (1) there are measurable treasures that are the result of wickedness; (2) righteousness delivers men from death. Both of these truths demand an explanation derived from the texts of the Bible.

A. Choose Wealth

1. Wealthy wicked: The problem of the covenant-breaking wealthy plagued Asaph. “For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men” (Ps. 73:3–5). But Asaph then asserted that their success is the basis of their subsequent downfall: “Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than their heart could wish. They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily” (Ps. 73:6–8). They do not believe that God sees their deeds: “And they say, How doth God know? And, Is there knowledge in the most high? Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches” (Ps. 73:11–12). The message is clear: ungodly men prosper. The exegetical challenge is to make sense of this principle in light of the outline of Deuteronomy 28, which proclaims that godly societies prosper, and rebellious societies are destroyed by the judgment of God. Does this principle not also apply to individuals? Is there a disconnect between economic causation for individuals and society?

The outline in Deuteronomy 8 provides the key. It presents a stage theory of development. First, God gives covenant-keepers His Bible-revealed law, so that they might preserve and expand their wealth. Then He gives them a capital base to work with (8:1).¹ Second, they begin to prosper. This prosperity is supposed to confirm their faith in the reliability of God's covenant: "... for it is he that giveth thee the power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (8:18).² The external blessings are to serve as spiritual reinforcement. Third, people are tempted to forget God, and to assert their autonomy. God warns men against this sin: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (8:17).³ Fourth, there is a period of judgment against those who rebel against God in this fashion (8:19–20).⁴

There is a fifth possible stage: restoration (Isa. 2). There are two kinds of negative judgment: judgment unto restoration and judgment unto oblivion. Whether a society experiences restoration depends upon the ethical response of the society to God's judgment.

The Bible is clear: there are covenantal blessings and cursings that involve the whole society. The Bible is equally clear about the possibility of wealthy wicked people. They may be wealthy in any of the five stages, but wealth in the hands of wicked people as a class is characteristic of the third stage: autonomy and rebellion, which is the prelude to stage four, i.e., the comprehensive judgment of God.

The point made by this proverb is that the treasure held by the ungodly person profits him nothing. In other words, he has made an entrepreneurial error by thinking that the pay-off was worth the corruption necessary to obtain it. The wicked man's efforts produce a personal loss.

Does this mean that wealth as such is unprofitable? No; it means that wealth is unprofitable for the wicked individual. There is objective value in a treasure—objective in the sense that God imputes value to it—but the wicked man does not appropriate this value without also gaining the vengeance of God. He sees only the value of the treasure and the ethical cost of attaining it; he does not see the hidden costs of rebellion. Thus, the subjective value of this treasure to the wicked is ultimately negative, what Proverbs 25:22 describes as "coals of fire" on

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 17.

2. Ibid., ch. 22.

3. Ibid., ch. 21.

4. Ibid., ch. 23.

the heads of the unrighteous.⁵

B. Choose Life

2. Mortality tables: Long life is characteristic of covenant-keeping men. Men who honor their parents have long lives (Ex. 20:12).⁶ Long life is a universally agreed-upon blessing. Thus, all people can see this beneficial biological result of godliness in society as a whole (Deut. 4:6–8),⁷ and they are thereby encouraged to enter into a covenant with God.

Righteous men, in the aggregate, are delivered from death for a longer period of time than unrighteous men are. Individual righteous men may die young, and individual wicked men may die old, but in the aggregate, long life goes to the righteous. Because all have sinned and come short of the glory of God (Rom. 3:23), all men eventually die, in time and on earth.⁸ Nevertheless, long life points to eternal life. Men to whom the righteousness of Christ is imputed by God's grace can expect eternal life and therefore long lives on earth. The gift of eternal life, which is publicly manifested at the final judgment, is preceded by an earthly parallel—not for every righteous man, but for men in general who adhere in general to the provisions of biblical law.

People in Third World nations have shorter life expectancies than people in Western, industrial countries. Why? Because Third World nations are characterized by such afflictions as animism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Islam, and imported Western socialism. Socialism came early to these nations during their period of Westernization, not a century after free market economics created a massive capital base, as was the case in the industrial West. The oil-rich Muslim nations are exceptions to the rule regarding paganism, but their wealth is dependent upon the productivity of the West, which has discovered valuable uses for oil. Japan also has escaped the economic curses of paganism by imitating Western law and western technology. The Japanese have also adopted a Western, linear view of time, as well as Western doctrines of thrift and hard, smart work. Japan has adopted a Protestant ethic

5. Chapter 76.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

7. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

8. The only exceptions: those alive at the time of the Second Coming (I Thess. 4:17).

without adopting Protestant theology. The result has been rising per capita wealth. China after 1978 imitated Japan, with similar economic results.

Humanism is steadily eroding the capital base of the West, and if state regulation of the economy continues to be enforced by Western civil governments, then the West will eventually become poor by comparison to Asia. But, in terms of external law, the legal codes of Western nations are still closer to biblical law than the law codes of Third World nations are. So is Western humanism's view of linear time. The difference can be seen by comparing mortality tables of various societies.

Conclusion

Why do we see the wicked prosper? This question bothered Asaph. It bothers most covenant-keeping people at some point in their lives. There has to be an explanation that is consistent with what the Bible teaches about historical cause and effect.

Deuteronomy 8 presents a five-stage theory of history: from poverty to wealth to either poverty or greater wealth. Some wicked people prosper in every stage, but the third stage—wealth unto autonomy—offers the great threat to the continued success of society. Autonomy brings the historical wrath of God.

There are visible signs of a society that adheres to the principles of biblical law. One example is longer life. The West has enjoyed this since the at least mid-nineteenth century, when the social order more fully adopted biblical principles of private ownership and independence from the state. This longer life span is seen in lower life insurance rates.

20

FAMISHED SOULS AND EMPTY PURSES

The LORD will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish: but he casteth away the substance [cravings] of the wicked (Prov. 10:3).

The tenth chapter of Proverbs begins with a series of contrasts: wise sons vs. foolish sons (v. 1), ill-gotten wealth vs. righteousness (v. 2), righteous people vs. wicked people (v. 3), lazy people vs. industrious people (v. 4). These are not contrasts between people's capacities for work, or obtaining capital, or their basic intelligence. These contrasts are ethical.

This proverb is difficult to translate. Older versions (King James, American Standard) refer to the soul of the righteous; later versions (Revised Standard, New American Standard, New English Bible) refer to hunger. "The LORD does not let the righteous go hungry" (NEB). Is the focus of the passage primarily spiritual or primarily physical?

Psalms 106 offers parallel ideas and parallel problems of translation. Speaking of the Israelites in the wilderness, the psalmist says, "They soon forgot his works; they waited not for his counsel: But lusted exceedingly in the wilderness and tempted God in the desert And he gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul" (vv. 13–15). The contrast in the language of the King James is between physical or biological lusts (probably their demand for meat: Num. 11) and spiritual maturity. Problem: the New English Bible translates verse 15 as follows: "He gave them what they asked, but sent a wasting sickness among them" [margin reading: "in their throats"].

A. A Lack of Meat

The Israelites had complained in the wilderness about their lack of meat. The King James Version reads as though their request was spiritual: “. . . but now our soul is dried away.” The New English Bible translates it as: “Now our throats are parched” (Num. 11:6). In other words, the Hebrew language so closely links the human soul and physical attributes (e.g., throat) that the translators are not agreed concerning the proper focus of concern of the writers.

What presents a difficulty in translation also presents a lesson in biblical theology. The language of Old Testament so intertwined the spiritual and the physical that we are not always certain which aspect an author had in mind, or even if he clearly distinguished the two. But we do know this much: there was a close link in the authors’ minds between spiritual conditions and external conditions. The Israelites in the wilderness were given the physical meat that they had requested, yet they remained spiritually blind. They received meat in the form of the birds (Num. 11). They continued to grumble against God. Only Joshua and Caleb were allowed to enter the promised land (Num. 14). The contrast is clearly between righteousness and unrighteousness, between trusting in God and complaining to God. Yet the language of the original request, which was unquestionably a demand for physical meat, can be translated so as to make the request appear to be a spiritual quest, “our soul is dried away” (King James).

Once we understand how closely they linked body and soul, we begin to understand the contrasts in Proverbs. Righteousness is linked with prosperity, while unrighteousness is linked with poverty. A man’s spiritual condition is understood as having predictable (statistically significant) consequences for his external economic situation. Few biblical doctrines are more resented by humanists and socialists than this one. It means that men are responsible before God and other men for their overall success or failure.

God will not starve a man who is ethically subordinate to Him. The hunger that godly men experience, both spiritual and physical, will be satisfied by God. Covenant-keepers can be confident in God. They can go about their daily tasks knowing that God will sustain them. This confidence encourages them to organize their lives according to biblical law, since they need not fear that temporary setbacks will bury them or destroy the long-term effects of their work.

B. Wealth Transfer

In contrast, the unrighteous are told that God will thwart their desires and plans. Either they will fail, in time and on earth, or else the capital they accumulate will eventually be transferred to the righteous (Prov. 13:22).¹ They may work hard, build a capital base, and attempt to extend their dominion across the face of the earth, but they and their heirs will not achieve their covenant-breaking goals.

It is not that God casts away their substance—their capital base—as implied by the translation of the King James. He transfers it, putting it to uses different from those planned by the original developers. What is cast away is their desires. They may well achieve their goals in terms of building up a capital base; what is promised here is that their desires will not be achieved.

The Bible affirms the temporal efficacy of hard work, thrift, and the other personal disciplines that we associate with the phrase, “the Protestant ethic.” But these virtues are not sufficient to produce the results hoped for by the wicked. In the language of the economist, the Protestant ethic is “necessary but not sufficient” for long-term economic growth. This ethic must be sustained by the theology that created it. It is not an autonomous ethic that can be effectively adopted, long term, by any and all cultures, because covenant-breaking cultures cannot sustain this ethic indefinitely. They will either abandon it or else adopt the confession of faith that undergirds it.²

This proverb therefore gives confidence to the righteous and hopelessness for the wicked. By affirming hope for the righteous, God provides His people with the attitude of victory that is so necessary in any long-term program of dominion. By affirming despair for the unrighteous, God also strengthens His people. There is both a positive and a negative aspect to the dominion covenant: “we win; they lose.” We are “programmed” for victory. God’s enemies are “programmed” for defeat.

Conclusion

The righteous man receives a two-fold feeding: spiritual and physical. The Hebrews did not separate the two realms. The wicked man also is dealt with in a two-fold manner. Both his soul and his purse become lean (Hag. 1:6). Two-fold feeding and two-fold starving: this is the underlying theory of economic development in the Proverbs.

1. Chapter 41.

2. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

21

SLACK HANDS AND EMPTY PURSES

He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand: but the hand of the diligent maketh rich (Prov. 10:4).

A. Work and Wealth

The Bible is quite clear about a major cause of personal poverty: a person's unwillingness to work. Proverbs returns to this theme repeatedly. The cause-and-effect relationship between slack hands¹ or folded hands and poverty is real, the Bible says. He who would avoid poverty must work diligently.

The Bible does not teach that poor people are always lazy. The Book of Ruth makes it plain that Ruth was a righteous woman, but she was poor. She had to glean for a living, indicating that she was extremely poor (Ruth 2).² Gleaning was hard, low-paying work. No one did it who had a regular job. Gleaning was a form of welfare, but it required hard work (Lev. 19:10; Deut. 24:21).³ She was faithful—so committed to her mother-in-law that she was willing to leave her nation and journey to Israel to live. But it should be noted that Ruth did not remain poor. God delivered her into wealth through marriage to a generous wealthy man, Boaz (Ruth 4).⁴

Similarly, the Book of Job teaches that poverty can come upon a

1. Sometimes the Hebrew word is translated as “deceit” (Job 13:7; Job 27:4; Psalms 32:2; 52:2).

2. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 9.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 62; cf. North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 11.

4. North, Disobedience and Defeat, ch. 11.

man despite his high moral character. The mistake of the first three of Job's four "comforters" was in concluding that God must have been visiting judgment upon him because of some sin on his part (Job 4:7–9). They understood the usual relationship between immorality and personal poverty; they failed to understand the sovereignty of God in His departure from this normal pattern in unusual circumstances. Again, it must be borne in mind that Job was subsequently delivered by God and elevated to an even higher position of wealth and status (42:12).⁵ He was not called upon to remain in poverty, although God made it clear to Job that it was well within God's sovereign right to cast Job down and keep him down, had it suited Him.

The slack hand reflects a moral weakness on the part of the lazy person. God calls men to work hard in order to exercise dominion. Man's work has been cursed ever since Adam's Fall, but it is still man's moral responsibility to labor, to attempt to overcome progressively the external effects of the curse. How? Through moral behavior, which includes hard work. A man's character is reflected in his attitude toward work. A man who is unwilling to work long and hard is not to be regarded as a paragon of biblical virtue.

Slack hands produce poverty. The cause-and-effect relationship between slack hands and poverty mirrors the relationship between diligence and riches. This proverb appeals directly to men's economic self-interest. The moral virtue of hard work is an underlying theme in the Bible, but the appeal here (and in most other passages) is not to morality as such, but rather to the economic fruits of morality. It is the universal (or nearly universal) desire of men to improve their economic circumstances. This is the underlying presupposition of this proverb. Only because there are God-created cause-and-effect relationships between morality and hard work, and between hard work and wealth, are large numbers of otherwise unconcerned and immoral men motivated to discipline themselves by means of hard labor. Their production blesses themselves and their families, and it also blesses

5. He lost his 10 children (Job 1:2, 19). The text in Job 42 does not mention this, but it hints at it. "He had also seven sons and three daughters. And he called the name of the first, Jemima; and the name of the second, Kezia; and the name of the third, Keren-happuch. And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job: and their father gave them inheritance among their brethren" (Job 42:13–15). Numerically, there was no difference. These daughters were special. But the other 10 children were dead. He did not have 20 children. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6:D.

those who benefit through peaceful trade with them. Per capita wealth of many people is thereby increased.

In sharp contrast to the thesis of socialistic “liberation theology,” God is not on the side of the poor as such. He is on the side of the righteous, including the righteous poor. Most of all, He is on the side of His own word, which sets forth the moral and occupational criteria for escaping poverty. Poverty is to be shunned, just as immorality is to be shunned. Wealth is a legitimate goal and a reward for shunning immorality in one’s occupation. More than any other specified cause of poverty, the Bible singles out morally dissipated living, whose chief occupational manifestation is slack hands.

B. Manual Labor

The contrast between lazy and diligent is not a contrast between manual labor and intellectual labor. Solomon, who compiled these proverbs (10:1), and who spoke 3,000 proverbs altogether (I Kings 10:32), was obviously not a manual laborer, nor did God or men expect him to be. His reputation as a wise judge was world renowned, even among kings (I Kings 4:34). This brought glory to God, for by upholding the law of God, a nation builds a foundation of long-term prosperity, and this in turn elevates God’s reputation throughout the world (Deut. 4:5–8).⁶ Rendering godly judgment in any occupation is as important a job as manual labor.

Nevertheless, God has called most men throughout history to be manual laborers. Not until the advent of the later phases of the Industrial Revolution, in the mid-twentieth century, was the capital base of northern Europe and the United States able to sustain a majority of working people in occupations that did not require hard physical labor. Until this period, the social division of labor between manual labor and intellectual labor had always been weighted heavily on the side of manual labor.

Output had always been low for most manual laborers because of the lack of capital, including intellectual and entrepreneurial capital. Per capita productivity did not permit the average family to store up a large quantity of surplus products beyond basic survival needs. So, there was little to offer in trade. Pre-industrial society was not sufficiently productive to permit large numbers of intellectual workers and professional tradesmen to exercise their callings. Low output per capita kept supplies of surplus goods low, so the division of labor was retarded.

6. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

C. Tools in Hand

Of course, we can also look at per capita productivity from the demand side. Until the laws and ethics of the West sanctioned non-manual, non-agricultural labor as a legitimate calling for the masses, and until the West's favorable outlook toward trade, money-lending, and entrepreneurship encouraged the development of a large number of non-manual laborers, the per capita productivity of the masses remained low. Because most workers could afford to buy only simple tools, and could sell into only minimally developed markets, only a few of them could increase their per capita productivity over the long haul. Until they had an opportunity to buy the mass-produced, price-competitive consumer and capital goods and services of urban, industrial civilization, they had only mere survival as their primary incentive to sacrifice present income for the sake of increasing their capital base of tools and education. Tools and education are the primary means of increasing productivity in a society already marked by long hours of hard work. In non-industrialized societies, once agricultural laborers have produced a sufficient number of goods to insure their survival for one more season, they generally reduce their work hours and their rate of savings, thereby reducing their ability to trade with non-agricultural workers. They prefer leisure to greater wealth. They count leisure as wealth, which it is. But it does not compound.

It was the so-called "Protestant ethic" of the West that enabled society to build up its capital base and simultaneously encourage the development of an extensive division of labor. The effects of this new world-and-life view were comprehensive. The entire civilization of Protestantism was transformed. This is what the Bible teaches men to expect. A shift in a civilization's theology has implications far beyond the confines of the sanctuary and the study.

Several of the medieval monastic orders displayed this same work ethic. The Cistercians and Benedictines are good examples. Monks took individual vows of poverty, worked long hours, consumed very little, invented new agricultural tools, increased output, and sold at low prices. The monasteries made great profits, which they re-invested. These orders grew rich. Then, every few centuries, they had to be re-formed to restore them to their original spirituality, which rested on vows of poverty and celibacy.

Under Protestantism, especially Calvinism, but also Methodism, a new ethical outlook spread to the general population of Northern Europe. It affirmed that what the medieval sacerdotal orders had experienced—economic growth—is legitimate for all God-fearing, God-obeying people and societies.

Conclusion

Laziness produces poverty. This is a continuing theme in the Book of Proverbs. Laziness is a manifestation of moral weakness.

This proverb appeals to personal self-interest: visible success. This is a positive sanction. But more fundamental is the means of success: righteousness. God is on the side of the righteous. He shows this by blessing them for obedience.

Manual labor is rigorous. Mental labor can be rigorous. The contrast is not between categories of labor but rather qualities of labor.

What we call the Protestant ethic was basic to the coming of the Industrial Revolution and its high output. Max Weber was correct in 1905.⁷ This view has been denied by many scholars. Their bias against covenant-breaking religion as a cause of poverty is balanced only by their hostility to the idea of covenant-keeping religion as a cause of wealth. Either result indicates that religion has consequences economically. This thought is offensive to modern scholars, who begin with the assumption of the irrelevance of God except as a social delusion.

7. Gary North, "The 'Protestant Ethic' Hypothesis," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Summer 1976).

HARVESTING IN DUE SEASON

He that gathereth in summer is a wise son: but he that sleepeth in harvest is a son that causeth shame (Prov. 10:5).

A. A Time for Everything

Timing is practically everything. This is a continuing message in the Bible. “To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven” (Eccl. 3:1).¹ An overriding concern of the godly man should be his lack of time. The strength of youth is not to be wasted. “Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them; while the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened, nor the clouds return after the rain” (Eccl. 12:1–2). Jesus’ words reflect this same concern: “I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work” (John 9:4).

Solomon does not say that sleeping is wrong. What he says is that sleeping late during the days of harvest is wrong. The sleeper has failed to understand the relationship between timing and success. He has assumed that he can rest at his discretion. The Bible says no. People are to work for six days; they are to rest on the seventh (Ex. 20:10).² The sabbath rest comes at the end of time, when the ethical battles of life are over. We celebrate the sabbath before the final day of judgment because we honor ritually what God has promised definitively. But Paul’s image of the athletic event, especially the race, points to the necessity of running fast and hard while the race is in progress (I Cor. 9:24;³ Phil. 3:14;⁴ see also Heb. 12:1).

1. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 7.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24.

The image of the harvest was used by Jesus to motivate His disciples. “Thus saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into the harvest” (Matt. 9:37–38). The wealth potential of the harvest is enormous. It is so great that the few harvesters available to do the work are insufficient, compared to the extent of the crop. In other words, the value of the laborer’s output is high because of the extensive crop. But time is short. The burden on the existing harvesters is very heavy, not because there is an insufficient potential return on their labor, but the opposite: there is a huge potential return, but also huge potential waste if the crop is not gathered in due season.

B. Pacing Ourselves

This proverb testifies to the existence of rhythms in life. A man must pace himself according to the conditions of the market. No successful distance runner runs equally fast throughout a long race, irrespective of the conditions of the course, the distance remaining, his energy reserves, and the speed of his competitors. Similarly, the farmer must pace himself in terms of the seasons. There are times during the year when the pay-off for hard labor is relatively low. There are times to sit and sharpen scythes, and there are times for working intensely from dawn to dusk, in order to take advantage of the brief period of the harvest. A dull scythe will wait another day in the dead of winter; in due season, the harvest will not. Whatever is not harvested on time will rot.

The imagery of the harvest points to an all-or-nothing situation. It comes once a year. All the work and capital that has been invested in order to produce a crop is “on the line” during the harvest season. The labor theory of value is incorrect. So is every other cost-of-production theory. Just because the labor or capital inputs were valuable at the time of planting in no way guarantees a profitable return on the investment. The unharvested crop is worth only what mulch is worth, no matter how much capital and labor was invested at the planting. The person who indulges himself and rests during the harvest throws away the potential value of the crop. If he sleeps, then he has placed a very high price tag on his slumber—not the value of the capital and labor over time that he invested, which is gone whether he sleeps or not, but the value of the crop. He has calculated foolishly, and he brings shame on his father, who is expected to have instructed him in wisdom.

3. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 12.

4. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 21.

Maximum production is achieved by proper pacing. The person who treats the whole year as if it were the harvest will deplete his resources without gaining a continually high return on his investment. He will waste his emotional and physical reserves, as well as his stock of capital. Life does not offer equally high rates of return every day. What is important is performance over an entire life span. There is a sort of “average rate of return” for an entire life. This is what men are responsible for.

C. Neglecting the Harvest

The man who neglects the harvest is a fool. His investment’s rate of return is totally dependent on his ability and willingness to harvest his crop in due season. The higher the value of the harvested crop, the higher his average rate of return on his investments over the whole year. If he fails to gather the crop during the harvest season, his total rate of return drops to zero, and so does his average rate of return. If the value of the harvest is zero, then the value of the investment is also zero. This is an agricultural application of the universally applicable economic doctrine of “sunk costs.”⁵ In the ground, the present value of the seeds, the fertilizer, and the worn-out equipment is utterly dependent on the expected future value of the crop. If the crop cannot be harvested, then the invested resources are of zero value. This investment is required if there is to be a harvest, but once in the ground, it is gone forever.

An analogy is the college student who works hard throughout the year, but who sleeps through the final exam. He has just lost a semester’s tuition payments for that course, and he may have lost his opportunity to return again for the next semester if this pulls down his grade point average. The failing grade is awarded irrespective of the amount of effort that the student put into his preparation for the exam, however important his preparation might have been, had he not slept through the exam. But the analogy of the harvest is even more stark, for the sleeping student at least retains some of the information he learned, even if he fails the final exam. The sleeping harvester has nothing left except perhaps some tax-reducing written receipts for labor and capital expended in a missed opportunity.

5. Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 26. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

Once the harvest season is over, the formerly sleepy harvester can do nothing to reap his return. This, of course, is analogous to the sleep of death. There is an irreversible aspect of time: “. . . it is appointed unto men once to die but after this the judgment” (Heb. 9:27). Eastern religions often teach the doctrine of reincarnation, a theology of nearly infinite opportunities over nearly eternal cyclical time. But the Bible teaches the doctrine of linear time. A lost harvest is forever lost. A lost life is forever lost. There is “only one life per customer,” just as there is only one harvest per crop.

This explicitly biblical perspective concerning time has made the West industrious and hard-working. The concept of linear time made possible the concept of economic development. Prior to the Protestant Reformation, and especially the seventeenth-century Puritans, neither theologians nor social philosophers, East or West, believed that long-term economic growth is possible. Long-term economic growth was not characteristic of Western culture before Christianity. The rapid economic growth of modern times began in Protestant Britain and spread to Protestant America. It has become an imported phenomenon in pagan Third World nations, made possible initially by an alien imported worldview and imported capital.

Conclusion

Work requires a sense of timing. There is a time to work hard. There is a time to work at a more leisurely pace. In times of harvest, long, hard work is required. He who ignores this will not have success. Each person needs to pace himself according to the season.

Time is linear. This outlook is uniquely biblical in origin. The ideas of creation, Fall, and redemption are presented in a linear fashion. This outlook made possible the concept of compound economic growth, but only when coupled with the eschatological optimism of postmillennialism, the view of some seventeenth-century Dutchmen and many seventeenth-century Puritans. Prior to the Puritans, the concept of linear history did not include the concept of permanent expansion.

The harvest is an all-or-nothing period. The investments made during the planting season come to fruition or failure in the harvest. This indicates that the value of the inputs at the time they are put to use depends on the expected final value of their output. The harvest is the output. Thus, to slumber during the harvest is economically suicidal. The labor theory of value, like every cost-of-production theory, is refuted by this proverb. The result of slumber at harvest time is poverty, no matter what expenses were borne during planting.

23

VISIBLE BLESSINGS

Blessings are upon the head of the just: but violence covereth the mouth of the wicked (Prov. 10:6).

A. Two Sets of Sanctions

When we see the word “blessing” or “blessed,” we are often dealing with a beatitude. There are numerous beatitudes in the Book of Proverbs.¹

The second half of this proverb is obscure. The King James translators contrast violence and blessings: both are visible. Violence “covers” the mouth of the wicked, while blessings “cover” the head of the righteous. But the New American Standard Bible translates the Hebrew word translated “cover” as “conceals.” The New English Bible translates it as “choked.”

The meaning of the verb is debated, but there can be no doubt that violence is associated with the mouth of the wicked, whether his mouth conceals it, is choked by it, or is covered by it. The mouth is the place where violence lurks. The schemes of the wicked man are set forth verbally. Eventually, his plans become plain. The tongue is compared to an untamed beast that requires a bridle to control it (Ps. 39:1; James 1:26; 3:2).

The righteous man controls his tongue; the unrighteous man does not. It eventually reveals what he is. The righteous man can be identified, this proverb tells us. He is known by the blessings on his head. Obviously, there is some literary reference here. Unless someone goes around wearing a crown of jurisdiction—and only kings, bishops, military officers, and police officers are identified in this way—blessings are not literally worn on a person's head. What is the frame of reference? Most likely, it is the oil of anointing. The words of Psalm 23 come to mind: "Thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over" (5b). It was God who anointed David. The effects of this anointing become ever-more visible to his enemies.

1. They are: 3:13, 18, 33; 5:18; 8:32, 34; 11:26; 14:21; 16:20; 20:7; 22:9; 24:25; 28:14, 20; 29:18. Gary Brady, Heavenly Wisdom: Proverbs simply explained (Webster, New York: Evangelical Press, 2003), p. 252.

The contrast between the righteous man and the unrighteous man, between the wise man and the fool, is the underlying theme of Proverbs. There is a way of wisdom and a way of destruction. Those who travel down each path are eventually distinguishable, in time and on earth, according to Proverbs. Whatever dwells in the heart of a man eventually manifests itself. But this does not answer these questions: (1) Why should there be visible blessings and visible cursings? (2) Why are the differences not limited to visible differences in people's personal behavior? This is the question of covenantal sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.²

B. The Dominion Covenant

The garden of Eden was to have served as a training ground for man. It was a place where Adam could have developed competent judgment. His skills as a keeper (protector) and dresser (gardener) of the garden were to have become visible. Eventually, he was supposed to have taken these judgmental skills into the world outside the garden, in order to subdue it to the glory of God.

The dominion covenant involves visible blessings. The beauty of the garden was to have been aesthetically more pleasing to man and God than the natural beauty of the untamed earth. A man's success in exercising dominion was originally planned by God to have outward manifestations. The very process of developing godly judgment was a process of understanding and applying God's standards to every area of life. When applied, these standards were to have been visible, analogous to the visible goodness of the creation in response to God's perfect application of His own standards of performance. This is why He could evaluate his own workmanship and pronounce it very good (Gen. 1:31).³

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas; Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5.

There are principles of cause and effect in the creation. Righteousness leads to blessings in history, both spiritual (inward) and dominical (outward). The works of the righteous man's hands are intended to shine before men, just as his personal behavior is to shine. The works of a righteous nation (Deut. 4:5–8)⁴ and the church (Matt. 5:14–16)⁵ are also to shine before men, calling attention to the superiority of the Bible's principles of administration (garden keeping) to all other principles. God did not do sloppy work in His own name when He created all things. Neither individuals nor nations are to do sloppy work in the name of God.

How are we to judge performance? By the stated principles of the worker, and also by the results. The righteous plant bears good fruit. By their fruits ye shall know them, Christ said (Matt. 7:20).⁶ But the analogy of the garden should point to the need for visible blessings: successful performance of the gardening assignment was itself a reward, namely, a more beautiful environment.

The cause-and-effect universe created by God enables us to judge the quality of a person's performance by the results he achieves. God sees to it that righteousness receives blessings. These blessings are to serve as visible signs of the covenant, which call forth even more faithful adherence to that covenant: “. . . for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18).⁷ Blessings are given by God to reinforce men's good behavior. Visible blessings are to remind men of the reality of the covenantal foundation of society. Good behavior is visible; so are God's blessings for good behavior.

C. Ethical Consistency

It may take time for these visible blessings to appear. If the mouth of the unrighteous eventually reveals the kind of character that lies behind it, why shouldn't the blessings of the righteous reveal the character of both the individual and the God who sovereignly controls the universe? Why should the power of God not be made manifest to all, just as the weakness of the unrighteous should be manifested? Why

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

6. Ibid., ch. 18.

7. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

should we regard it as odd that the rival cause-and-effect principles, righteousness vs. unrighteousness, should produce visibly different results?

In the short run, evil men can be blessed externally, as a prelude to their destruction (Deut. 8:11–20).⁸ In the short run, righteous men can experience poverty and external cursings (Job). In the long run, and in the aggregate (society as such), unrighteousness produces destruction (Deut. 28:15–68) and righteousness produces visible blessings (Deut. 28:1–14).⁹

There is a tendency for Christian pietists to recoil in horror to the idea that righteous behavior produces visible blessings. Pietists resent the biblical teaching that righteousness produces long-term affluence and power, and that ethical rebellion produces long-term poverty and weakness. They see widespread visible blessings of God as either random or else as a prelude to God's coming judgment.

The biblical doctrine of visible blessings teaches that redeemed men are given external blessings in order to confirm them in their faith, so that they may take on additional responsibilities. Pietists resent the whole idea of the dominion covenant, of which the doctrine of visible blessings is a part. They prefer to believe that faithful Christians will be burdened by internal responsibilities only, and therefore any blessings that God pours out on His people will be limited to the internal, psychological realm of man's spirit. They reject the idea that righteous behavior produces external blessings. They are even further away from an understanding of God's dominion covenant than a reprobate like Ben Franklin was, for he was still influenced by the Puritan thought, as he admitted in his autobiography.¹⁰ He could write that "honesty is the best policy," not because he believed in the God of the Bible, but because he had seen the external results of such a God-ordained principle. Modern pietists look at the wealth that the Protestant ethic has produced, and they hide their eyes in disbelief, hoping to find another explanation. So do humanists.

Conclusion

The undisciplined tongue tends toward violence. A righteous per-

8. Ibid., chaps. 21–23.

9. Ibid., ch. 69.

10. He read Cotton Mather's Essay to Do Good at the age of 11, he said in his autobiography. In a letter to Samuel Mather, 1773, he recounted a meeting he had with Mather's forebear when Franklin was 23.

son must exercise discipline over what he says. This is another application of the general theme in Proverbs: wisdom vs. foolishness.

There are two covenantal paths. One is righteous. The other is not. One leads toward dominion. The other leads toward death. Each path is visible. Each has visible consequences.

This proverb opposes sloppy work. A man's work should reflect his confession. A covenant-keeper's work should testify to the reliability of the God of the covenant. This means that there are visible results of confessions, and these results must reflect the lords of the rival covenants. If they do not, then one or both of the representatives are not acting consistently with his professed covenant's standards.

THE STRENGTH OF CAPITAL

The rich man's wealth is his strong city: the destruction of the poor is their poverty (Prov. 10:15).

The structure of each proverb in the tenth chapter presents a positive-negative contrast. First, a benefit or desirable goal is presented. This benefit is linked to wisdom and righteousness. Then a negative is presented. This undesirable outcome is said to be the product of foolishness or wickedness.

When Solomon speaks here of the rich man, there is no suggestion that the rich man is in any way morally compromised. The reference to him is in the first half of this proverb. Thus, it would be misleading to conclude that there is anything innately objectionable either to riches or to the idea that the rich man's wealth does serve as a means of safety for him.

Conversely, there is nothing said in favor of poverty. The poor man's condition is not desirable. His poverty constitutes his destruction. He is unable to place much confidence in his external condition. He has no high wall.

The question then arises: Why are riches referred to elsewhere in the Bible as a snare, a temptation? And why are poor people singled out repeatedly as being blessed by God? If this proverb is true, then what information are we missing in order to make sense out of all the other verses that seem to teach the opposite?

Man's premier temptation is to be as God (Gen. 3:5). Successful men look at their condition in life, and they make a false conclusion, namely, that the work of their hands is responsible for all that they possess. This temptation clearly is greater in the life and experience of a rich man. The poor man may prefer not to take credit for his impoverished condition. The rich man is proud of what his efforts supposedly have produced (Deut. 8:17).¹

The danger for the successful person is that he begins to regard his “wall” as an autonomous source of protection for him. Like the walls that surrounded ancient cities, the rich man’s wall may appear to be nearly impervious to attack. His enemies are outside the gates; they cannot bring him down.

In contrast, the poor man sees his poverty and recognizes that he is already destroyed. What the rich man fears, the poor man is experiencing. He is less tempted to place his trust in his environment. His environment has already proven to be a weak source of defense. He is unlikely to place much confidence in it.

Is it an advantage to have a protecting wall? Most certainly. The fact that Jericho’s wall did not withstand the blast of God did not mean that Israel was to build cities without walls or to tear down the walls that existed when the Canaanites were destroyed. The people of Jerusalem were supposed to keep the walls in repair. Under Nehemiah, the people of Jerusalem began the reconstruction of the wall, which had been broken by Babylon (Neh. 2:17–18).

What good does a wall do? It forces an enemy to think twice about the cost of attacking a stronghold. The defenders have time to prepare a defense against the onslaught of enemy forces. The capital investment in the wall serves as a source of security later on, when troubles and dangers appear. A wall is a standing testimony to the future-orientation of the builders. They cared enough to sacrifice present consumption expenditures in order to defend themselves and their heirs from attack.

A wall is an admission that an unexpected event can overturn a city’s plans. It is a testimony to the power of the unexpected. The same is true of riches. Capital in the form of cash or other readily negotiable assets can be used to defend a business during hard times, or to buy legal advice, or to establish a new business when conditions change. The “high wall” of wealth is a barricade against hard times. It protects the rich man from disasters that would bankrupt a poor man, causing him to sell himself into slavery or to go deeply into debt.

The truly rich man is a man with net assets. He has little or no debt. His capital is his own. It is not a wall with a hole in it, as heavily indebted capital is. He is not on the verge of poverty. The market normally cannot bring him to his knees, making him destitute.

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 21.

Walls can be breached. Destruction can come to all men, including the rich. But the rich man has a barrier that the poor man does not possess. The higher the wall, the more difficult it is for enemies to scale it. The rich man has a high wall. He is not easily overrun by his enemies.

Conclusion

This is the description of a desirable condition. All men want safety. All men fear the coming of destruction—the defenseless condition of the poor man. Thus, one of the blessings of covenantal faithfulness is wealth: capital resources that reflect economically the spiritually protected status of the redeemed man. The outward condition of the man who is blessed by God ideally reflects his inward, eternal condition.

25

JUST WAGES

The labour of the righteous tendeth to life: the fruit of the wicked to sin [punishment] (Prov. 10:16).

The contrast between righteousness and wickedness continues. This proverb informs us of two types of wages: life and punishment. The righteous man sells his labor services for a wage: life. This proverb confirms the teaching of the commandment to honor parents in order to attain long life (Ex. 20:12).¹ Long life is a universally pursued earthly goal. In contrast, the wicked man's income is punishment ("sin" in the KJV). There is a predictable correspondence between each type of behavior and its appropriate reward.

The relationship between ethics and economics is obvious. God declares certain actions righteous and others wicked. There is life for those who act righteously, but people who defy God and pursue wickedness are punished. The context of this proverb does not suggest an exclusively heavenly reward. The preliminary manifestation of eternal wages is temporal.

Paul's words parallel this proverb: "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 6:23). His focus was more clearly that of the final judgment. But numerous proverbs make it plain that earthly affairs are indicative of the eternal condition that each person can expect. There is a preliminary reward system that reveals, however imperfectly, the spiritual status of society's members.

This contrast between the two forms of wages refutes what was once known as the labor theory of value. The classical economists from Adam Smith through John Stuart Mill, including Karl Marx, relied on some version of this theory of value. They assumed that human labor expended in production is the basis of market value. The more labor that is used to manufacture a product, the higher its market price.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012, Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

Many unsolvable problems were produced by the intellectual labor of those who held this theory. Why is it more profitable to invest in capital in a leisure-oriented industrial nation than in sub-Sahara Africa, where there is so much human labor available at cheap wages to add to the production process? Why is a randomly discovered diamond mine or gold mine so valuable, compared to years of labor devoted to the development of a perpetual motion machine? Eventually, no matter how much time and effort its defenders spent on it—and Marx's second and third volumes of Das Kapital (published posthumously) are lasting monuments to just how much labor they expended—the market value of this idea continued to fall.

Beginning in the early 1870s, there appeared an unconnected trio of economists, subsequently called neoclassical economists,² who argued that the market value of labor is dependent upon the market value of labor's output. The production of a heavily demanded product or service that requires a highly specialized type of labor (e.g., brain surgery) will highly reward those who possess the particular skill or resources involved. The high price that customers are willing and able to pay will tend to lure other laborers into the labor market for this particular service. It is therefore not labor that gives value to the product, neoclassical economists argued, but market demand by customers. In other words, customers' subjective preferences and objective purchases are economically authoritative in the marketplace. Their preferences, revealed through market competition, create an objectively determined market value (price) for products and therefore for both labor and land (resource) inputs that produce these products.

Two forms of labor may be expended on a particular task by two different people. Their physically measurable labor may be close to identical. The righteous man in some instances may receive the same money wage as the wicked man, yet God rewards them differently in eternity. But can their earthly wages differ? The Bible says yes. So does economic theory.

How can this be? Doesn't the free market pay equal wages for equal work? No. It pays equal wages for equal net value, after costs, produced by the workers. A lawless man is a higher-risk employee. The employer wants hard-working people who are honest and predictable on the job. He wants people with good reputations in the community. He wants people who will stay with the company for many years. The physically measurable daily labor output of two workers may be the same, but the net value of each man's output to the employer (and therefore to the consumer) may be very different in the long run. Their wages today may reflect this difference.

2. Carl Menger (Austria), Léon Walras (Switzerland), and William Stanley Jevons (England).

The Bible's perspective is even more subtle. There is more to economic rewards than the market's rewards. There is also the sovereignty of God. Ours is a personal universe created and sustained by a personal God. He brings glory to Himself by rewarding those who abide by His commandments and who thereby bring honor to Him. In the aggregate, righteous men buy themselves longer life spans (Prov. 10:2).³ It is God, not the market, who enables them to exercise dominion, on average, longer than the wicked can.

Conclusion

Earthly rewards reflect the spiritual kingdom for which a person labors: two different kingdoms, two types of reward. Thus, there are limits to the market as an institutional source of rewards for productive service. God sees men's hearts, and He rewards them accordingly, although the market is one factor in the distribution of these rewards, since God does not bless or punish men in an historical or institutional vacuum.

Men who work hard for the kingdom of God, honoring God's laws and proclaiming His righteousness, receive more valuable rewards than drunkards who rob, pillage, and die young. The external earthly rewards of most citizens will reflect, in the long run, their ethical condition, because their ethical condition regulates their economic performance. The more closely the social institutions of a society conform to those specified in the Bible, the more predictable the visible relationship will be between ethics and income.

3. Chapter 19.

26

LEGITIMATE RICHES

The blessing of the LORD, it maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it (Prov. 10:22).

A. Riches and Stewardship

To begin, the Hebrew word translated here as “rich” means exactly what it means in English: accumulation. The context in earlier passages where the word appears is clear: wealth.

That I will not take from a thread even to a shoelatchet, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich (Gen. 14:23).

The LORD maketh poor, and maketh rich: he bringeth low, and lifteth up (I Sam. 2:7).

Be not thou afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house is increased; For when he dieth he shall carry nothing away: his glory shall not descend after him (Ps. 49:16–17).

He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand: but the hand of the diligent maketh rich (Prov. 10:4).¹

It would be incorrect to interpret this proverb as dealing with spiritual riches in contrast to assets easily exchanged in a market. The kinds of riches here are marketable riches. A person could put a “for sale” sign on them.

The tip-off is the second part of the promise: “. . . he addeth no sorrow with it.” Why should Solomon have added this? Because in many passages in the Bible, riches are associated with negative sanctions and sorrow. Solomon here distinguishes riches as blessings from riches as cursings. This is an important passage. It makes clear that riches as covenantal blessings are not to be regarded as a liability. They are not Trojan horses with sorrow hidden inside.

1. Chapter 21.

The spiritually wise man understands that riches increase one's personal responsibility. Jesus taught this clearly.

And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more (Luke 12:47–48).²

There is an inescapable burden associated with riches: stewardship. Every asset's owner is legally God's agent and is therefore responsible to God for its administration (Luke 19:12–15).³

Solomon says that when riches come from God in the form of a blessing—a positive covenantal sanction—there is no negative sanction attached to it, i.e., sorrow, but there is added responsibility. This is an inescapable aspect of stewardship. This responsibility is not a threat to the covenant-keeper. The covenant-keeper sees an increase in his responsibility as a motivation to extend God's dominion in history. This is an honor, not a curse. It is a reason to rejoice, not shed tears. To use a military example, it is the equivalent of a promotion. The threat to a military career is a reduction of rank due to incompetence or disobedience to lawful authority. Yet a reduction in rank is a reduction in responsibility.

B. Covenant Sanctions

The Mosaic law affirmed the existence of a predictable relationship between covenantal faithfulness and external blessings.

And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth: And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God (Deut. 28:1–2).⁴

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

3. Ibid., ch. 46.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

These are covenantal blessings. They are evidence of God's faithfulness to His covenant people. He extends their dominion through blessings of various kinds, which are listed in the passage. These are visible blessings. The Hebrew word translated as "blessings" in Deuteronomy 28:2 is the same Hebrew word in Proverbs 10:22.

This passage makes it inescapably clear that wealth is a covenantal blessing of God. This does not mean that it cannot be used by God as a lure into personal disaster. In Proverbs, there are numerous passages that say specifically that God uses wealth as a snare to trap covenant-breakers.

So, the presence of wealth in a person's possession is not, in and of itself, a sign that God looks favorably on the owner's efforts. When wealth is accompanied with a public profession of faith in the God of the Bible and also by outward conformity to God's Bible-revealed law, wealth can safely be presumed by the owner and those around him to be a legitimate blessing from God.

C. Hostility to Wealth

Within every civilization, there are people who pursue wealth fanatically. There are other people who scorn wealth universally. Both outlooks are marks of covenant-breaking. This proverb tells us that wealth is not random. God directs the flow of wealth. He does so within the context of binding covenant oaths under His authority. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).⁵ He does so outside His covenant.

Thus saith the LORD to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him; and I will loose the loins of kings, to open before him the two leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut; I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight: I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron: And I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know that I, the LORD, which call thee by thy name, am the God of Israel. For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me (Isa. 45:1-4).

5. Ibid., ch. 22.

Solomon also warns: “Riches profit not in the day of wrath: but righteousness delivereth from death” (11:4).⁶ “The rich man’s wealth is his strong city, and as an high wall in his own conceit” (18:11).⁷

So, wealth must be seen within the context of the biblical covenant: confession and obedience. When it is the product of covenantal obedience, it is legitimate.

Conclusion

Riches can come without sorrow. They are tools of dominion. They enable the steward-owner to accomplish more for God’s kingdom, which is why he is held responsible for exercising greater responsibility (Luke 12:47–48). To imagine that wealth necessarily produces sorrow and should therefore be avoided is the equivalent of arguing that responsibility produces sorrow and should therefore be avoided. This is the belief of pietists everywhere. They resent any suggestion that the domain of responsibility is as broad and deep as the domain of Satan, the squatter. They seek to limit their responsibility. One manifestation of this attempt is to decry wealth as universally unholy. Solomon thought otherwise.

6. Chapter 30.

7. Chapter 54.

A MATTER OF INHERITANCE

The fear of the wicked, it shall come upon him: but the desire of the righteous shall be granted. As the whirlwind passeth, so is the wicked no more: but the righteous is an everlasting foundation (Prov. 10:24–25).

Here is the familiar contrast between the covenant-breaker and the covenant-keeper. Here also is a discussion of sanctions. Each covenantal agent has his appropriate sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant.¹

A. A Matter of Vulnerability

We begin with the main fear that burdens the wicked. The wicked person has a dominant fear. Of course, he has more than one, but this proverb speaks of fear in the singular. This fear is a constant concern in his life. This proverb says that this dominant fear will come upon him. That which he has feared most will arrive in his life. That with which he has been obsessed will overtake him. He has hoped to avoid it somehow, but he will fail. God will thwart his plans to escape his fear.

This proverb does not mention the fact that most fears of most people never materialize. They worry, yet this emotional drain is wasted. Jesus said: “But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof” (Matt. 6:33–

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

34).²

It is with this fact of life as a backdrop that this proverb's warning gains its sharpness. The covenant-breaker is not living in an impersonal universe operating in terms of a dialectical conflict between statistical randomness and unbreakable natural law. He is living in a universe governed by cosmic personalism.³

I am the LORD, and there is none else, there is no God beside me: I girded thee, though thou hast not known me: That they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west, that there is none beside me. I am the LORD, and there is none else. I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the LORD do all these things. Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness: let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together; I the LORD have created it (Isa. 45:5–8).

The sinner is known by God and identified accurately as an enemy of God. God has structured His universe to operate in terms of a covenantal, ethics-based system of causation. The sinner will be found out. His constant fear will eventually come upon him.

This condition of vulnerability is contrasted with the condition of the covenant-keeper. The covenant-keeper also lives in a world of cosmic personalism. The covenantal structure of cause and effect imposes sanctions in history. The sanctions for covenant-keeping are positive. So, the desire of the righteous shall be granted. Again, this proverb identifies a single concern: desire, in contrast to fear. This is the defining desire of the covenant-keeper, in contrast to the defining fear of the covenant-breaker. Jesus identified what should be the defining desire of the covenant-keeper: to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you" (Matt. 7:7).⁴ This had been Solomon's experience. He had a desire. He asked God to fulfill it. "Give me now wisdom and knowledge, that I may go out and come in before this people: for who can judge this thy people, that is so great?" (II Chron. 1:10).

2. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 15.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

4. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 16.

And God said to Solomon, Because this was in thine heart, and thou hast not asked riches, wealth, or honour, nor the life of thine enemies, neither yet hast asked long life; but hast asked wisdom and knowledge for thyself, that thou mayest judge my people, over whom I have made thee king: Wisdom and knowledge is granted unto thee; and I will give thee riches, and wealth, and honour, such as none of the kings have had that have been before thee, neither shall there any after thee have the like (II Chron. 1:11–12).

B. Time and Eternity

The second, connected, proverb contrasts the respective conditions of the covenant-breaker and covenant-keeper. “As the whirlwind passeth, so is the wicked no more: but the righteous is an everlasting foundation.”

The image of the whirlwind is graphic. A tornado or its equivalent rolls through a community, leaving devastation in its wake. A few minutes before, there were homes, orchards, and storage buildings. In a brief period, these are all gone. The labor of many people’s hands over long periods was invested for the sake of future gains. They invested time and raw materials. They sacrificed. Then, in a few minutes, the whirlwind levels all of these dreams. The investments are now of greatly reduced value. They may be negative: the cost of hauling away the debris. This is the condition of the covenant-breaker. His future is little more than a pile of rubble. Whatever he built will be blown away. His efforts will leave no trace.

In contrast is the covenant-keeper. He is said to be a foundation. This foundation is anchored in eternity. The word can be translated “bottom.” It means what it does in English. “So will I break down the wall that ye have daubed with untempered mortar, and bring it down to the ground, so that the foundation thereof shall be discovered, and it shall fall, and ye shall be consumed in the midst thereof: and ye shall know that I am the LORD” (Ezek. 13:14). In God’s wrath, nothing remains of a structure, but a covenant-keeper’s foundation is eternal. The image here is of a collapsed wall. So, the passage is pointing, not to a person, but to a person’s efforts in history. The covenant-keeper’s efforts are secure. He will leave more than a trace. His work will serve as the starting point for successors.

This work will be everlasting. This is the same word that is used in a passage describing God’s covenant with mankind through Noah. “And the bow shall be in the cloud; and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth" (Gen. 9:16). It will extend down through the ages.

Conclusion

The sanctions are imposed by God in history. These sanctions are positive and negative. Positive sanctions are the fulfillment of a person's desire and the guaranteed extension of his legacy through time. Negative sanctions are the advent of a person's greatest fear in life and the obliteration of his work down through time. It is the difference between establishing and cutting off.

Ultimately, the distinction is a matter of inheritance, the fifth point of the biblical covenant.⁵ The sanctions have opposite effects: the destruction of a person's inheritance and the extension of inheritance through time.

5. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 5. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 5.

UNRELIABLE SUBORDINATES

As vinegar to the teeth, and as smoke to the eyes, so is the sluggard to them that send him (Prov. 10:26).

This proverb deals with the issue of the delegation of authority. There is hierarchy in human institutions. Hierarchy is part of the structure of God's covenant.¹

The division of labor is mandatory for the extension of God's kingdom in history. "Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour" (Eccl. 4:9). This division of labor is both horizontal and vertical. We rely on those around us to provide what we want when we want it at a price we are able to pay. These people are outside our control. We must persuade them because we cannot command them. We also rely on people who are under us if we work in a hierarchical organization. These people to some degree are under our control. Economic progress is accompanied by the growth in the number of such organizations.

A. Neither Omniscience Nor Omnipotence

Men are not omniscient. We cannot see what is going on beyond a very limited view. We must trust others to provide them with accurate information. We can buy information from outside the organization. We can also obtain information from within the organization. This involves the classifying, identifying, collecting, selecting, evaluating, and packaging of information, so that those above and below in the chain of command can make effective decisions that enable the organization to fulfill its goals.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1980] 2012), ch. 2.

Beyond the assembling of information there is execution. Men are not omnipotent. They cannot force people to do exactly what they say. In every organization, there are tasks assigned to specific people by those who are higher in the chain of command. In a government bureaucracy, the funding is collected by legal force at the top of the pyramid. The money and authority are allocated downward. It is a top-down system. In contrast is the profit-seeking privately owned organization. Here, top decision-making is confined to budgeting, developing general guidelines, and establishing success indicators, i.e., standards of performance. Initiative in executing the plan lies at the bottom. It is a bottom-up system with respect to execution of the plan.²

B. Relying on Subordinates

Those higher in the chain of command become dependent on individuals at lower levels. Everyone in the middle has two sets of dependents: those higher and those lower. Those high in the operation rely on subordinates to execute plans: applying general plans to specific situations, i.e., a reconciliation of the one and the many. This in turn requires a degree of initiative by the plan's implementers. It involves personal responsibility. Others in the organization are dependent in the organization of the smooth, integrated, predictable fulfillment of assignments.

Those who are lower in the chain of command require guidance from those above them. Those above them are in charge of explaining the general rules to those below. Lower-level employees also require budgeted assets in order to fulfill their assignments. This demands attention to details and also leadership abilities. It is not enough to give orders. There must be follow-up.

In every organization there are go-getters and sluggards. The goal of the organization's directors is to hire more of the former and fewer of the latter. The sluggards require nagging in order to persuade them to do three things: (1) do what they said they would do; (2) do it with the assets allocated; (3) do it on time. They may also require other forms of negative sanctions.

Sluggards reduce the efficiency of the organization that employs them. Too much time and energy must be expended to get sluggards

2. On the differences between these two organizational models, see Ludwig von Mises, Bureaucracy (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1944). (<http://bit.ly/MisesBur>) to perform at minimal standards. Those high in the chain of command who become dependent on sluggards must constantly intervene to get the sluggards to do their jobs well. Those higher up have their own operations at risk at all times. Sluggards increase this risk. They are like fools. “He that sendeth a message by the hand of a fool cutteth off the feet, and drinketh damage” (Prov. 26:6).

Conclusion

The sluggard is an annoyance both to those above and below him. This proverb mentions only those above him. They are in charge. They will take the blame if the sluggard fails to deliver the specified goods or services on time and within his budget. Those below him will also suffer from his lack of attention to his assignment. They are dependent on the hierarchy to deliver the guidelines, interpretations, and assets necessary to complete their assignments. A sluggard threatens them, too.

29

MEASURING OUT JUSTICE

A false balance is abomination to the LORD: but a just weight is his delight (Prov. 11:1).

A. Weights and Measures

This is a comment on the Mosaic law: “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt” (Lev. 19:35–36).¹

Here, we are told how God responds to dishonest weights and measures, as well as to honest ones. The former angers Him; the latter delights Him. This message is repeated in Proverbs.

A just weight and balance are the LORD’S: all the weights of the bag are his work (16:11).²

Divers weights, and divers measures, both of them are alike abomination to the LORD (20:10).³

Just weights are identified as God’s work (16:11). The same Hebrew word is found in the commandment to honor the sabbath, which is contrasted with work. “Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest: that thine ox and thine ass may rest, and the son of thy handmaid, and the stranger, may be refreshed” (Ex. 23:12). By identifying just weights as God’s work, this proverb implies that God took an active role in creating standards. They were not an afterthought, let alone the product of would-be autonomous men’s

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 19.

2. Chapter 52.

3. Chapter 57.

would-be autonomous minds.

In Deuteronomy, this point is driven home.

Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the LORD thy God (Deut. 25:13–16).⁴

Notice that there is a blessing attached to this law: long life. This same blessing is associated with the commandment to love one's parents (Ex. 20:12).⁵ While this proverb does not specifically say that the use of unjust weights will shorten men's lives, the idea is implied by the contrast.

Why should just weights have such importance that God would promise long life to those who honor this law? This is a major positive sanction—indeed, it is a universally sought-after sanction. Wherever this sanction is invoked by a text—and it is invoked only twice in connection with a Mosaic law—we should take the law seriously. The law is a life-and-death matter.

B. Representative Infractions

Weights and measures are representative of justice in general, as Leviticus 19:35 indicates: “unrighteousness in judgment.” Leviticus 19:37 brings the reader back to the chapter's overall topic. “Therefore shall ye observe all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: I am the LORD.”

Tampering with weights is a form of deception. It is a form of theft. The seller, who is a specialist in his field, uses his specialized knowledge to defraud a buyer, who presumably is less well informed. The social division of labor, which is a blessing to society as a whole because of specialized production, is being misused by a person who possesses specialized knowledge. This kind of fraud is easy to perpetrate because so few people will recognize it. The seller makes a small profit on every transaction—so small that few people will ever notice it. The fraud is widespread in the sense of multiple victims.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 65.

5. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 25.

