(I need to add something at this point. I believe that it really was a serpent who tempted Eve. He acted as a conscious, covenantal agent of Satan. He communicated in words. He brought God's curse on his posterity. Satan did not use him as a sort of hand puppet.)

If Satan was successful, he would inherit in history. Adam and Eve would die, as he well knew. He was a liar. He knew who is sovereign, whose word is law, and who will bring negative sanctions in history: God. Satan knew that he might inherit as a subordinate steward if

26. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on the Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

27. Appendix O.

Adam and Eve disobeyed God, or at the very least, this would keep Adam and his heirs from inheriting. He would thwart God's plan. This prospect was enough to please Satan.

But Satan's hopes were shattered by the second Adam, Jesus Christ, who bore the law's negative sanctions so that God's adopted children (John 1:12) might inherit the earth and gain eternal life as well. Rather than seeing Satan inherit the earth through his earthly representatives, God has created an inheritance system governing history: positive feedback for covenant-keepers and negative feedback for covenant-breakers. Notice that the question of the inheritance was clearly historical: Satan never had any possibility of inheriting heaven.

Antinomians deny the existence of this inheritance system in history. This antinomian viewpoint regarding the systematic long-term outworking of God's visible covenantal judgments in the Christian era leads directly to what F. N. Lee has termed pessimillennialism, referring to both premillennialism and amillennialism. Covenant-keeping people will not progressively inherit the earth before Christ comes again physically, we are told. In contrast, Christian Reconstructionists affirm God's visible sanctions in history. If there is predictable long-term positive feedback (external blessings) in history for covenant-keeping, which Deuteronomy 28:1–14 insists that there is, and if there is long-term negative feedback (external cursings) in history for covenant-breaking, which Deuteronomy 28:15–68 insists that there is, then those who obey God must inevitably extend their external dominion over time, while those who disobey God must inevitably have external dominion removed from them.

God's sanctions in history still exist. This was John Calvin's view,²⁸ but modern Calvinists have abandoned it. God's covenantal law-order inevitably leads to the external cultural triumph of God's covenantally faithful people. This, of course, is postmillennialism.²⁹ This combination of covenant sanctions in history and postmillennial eschatology is what distinguishes the Christian Reconstructionist worldview from all 28. John Calvin, The Covenant Enforced: Sermons on Deuteronomy 27 and 28, ed. James B. Jordan (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989).

29. While Calvin did not see this as clearly as modern Reconstructionists do, there were still elements of postmillennialism in his theology. On this point, see Greg L. Bahnsen, "The Prima Facie Acceptance of Postmillennialism," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Winter 1976–77), pp. 69–76. I argue that there were both amillennial and postmillennial arguments in Calvin's writings: "The Economic Thought of Luther and Calvin," ibid., II (Summer 1975), pp. 102–6.

others today.³⁰

Those who deny postmillennialism usually also deny the New Testament reality of God's law-governed historical sanctions. To this extent, premillennialists and amillennialists have generally been social antinomians. They have erred in the development of their view of God's law and its sanctions in history. They have allowed their eschatologies of historical defeat to shape their doctrine of law, i.e., making it impotent in its historical effects. This triumph of pessimistic eschatological views over biblical ethics is one of the most devastating theological problems that the modern church faces.

Thus, antinomianism is defined as that view of life which rejects one or more of the five points of the biblical covenant as they apply to God's revealed law in history. They deny that God, the sovereign, predestinating Creator, has delegated to mankind the responsibility of obeying His Bible-revealed law-order, Old and New Testaments, and promises to bless or curse men in history, both individually and corporately, in terms of this law-order. This law-order and its historically applied sanctions are the basis of the progressive sanctification of covenant-keeping individuals and also covenantal institutions—family, church, and State—over time, and they are also the basis of the progressive disinheritance of covenant-breakers.

D. Definitions and Paradigms

Some readers may not accept my definition of antinomian, but every reader should at least understand how and why I am using the term. The biblical definition of God's law must include all five of the points of the biblical covenant model. Deny anyone of these five doctrines, and you have thereby adopted an antinomian theology. Deny them, and you necessarily must also deny the continuing authority of Deuteronomy 28 in the New Testament era. Yet an implicit and even explicit denial of these doctrines (and the relevance of Deuteronomy 28) has been a basic tactic of the vast majority of Christian theologians for over a millennium.³¹ Thus, they have attempted to define away the case laws and historical sanctions. What I am saying is that it is theologically invalid to attempt to define away the continuing authority of Deuteronomy 28. I therefore see the inescapable theological necessity

30. Postmillennial Puritans generally shared this view, which is why Reconstructionists regard themselves as neo-Puritans.

31. The major exceptions were the Puritans: Journal of Christian Reconstruction, V (Winter 1978–79): "Symposium on Puritanism and Law."

of restoring the biblical definition of biblical law and therefore anti-law.

I fully realize that my definition of antinomian is not the accepted usage. This common usage exists primarily because theological antinomians who have rejected one or more of the covenant model's five points have previously defined the word so that it conforms to their pessimistic historical outlook: the long-term cultural impotence of God's redeemed people in history. They argue that antinomianism is merely the denial of one's personal responsibility to obey God's moral law (undefined).³² This deliberately restricted definition implicitly surrenders history to the devil. What I am saying is this: anyone who denies that there are cause-and-effect relationships in history between the application of biblical case laws and the success or failure of social institutions has also inevitably and in principle adopted the idea that the devil controls and will continue to control this world. Why? Because the devil's representatives are said to be able to maintain control over the social institutions of this world throughout history (point two of the covenant: representation). It does no good for a person to answer that he is not an antinomian just because he respects God's law in his personal life, family life, and church life. He is still saying that God's law is historically impotent in social affairs, that covenant-keeping or covenant-breaking offers rewards and curses only to individuals and only after the final judgment.

Yes, I am offering a more comprehensive definition of "antinomian." My major goal in life is to lay additional foundations for a major theological paradigm shift that has already begun. I am self-conscious about this task. Readers deserve to know this. One inescapable aspect of a new movement or new way of viewing the world is the creation of new terms (e. g., "theonomy"), and the redefining of old terms. Einstein, for example, redefined several of the terms used by Newton.³³ Clearly, this is what the Barthians did with the vocabulary of trinitari-

32. "It refers to the doctrine that the moral law is not binding upon Christians as a way of life." Alexander M. Renwick, "Antinomianism," in Baker's Dictionary of Theology, eds. Everett F. Harrison, Geoffrey W. Bromiley, and Carl F. H. Henry (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, 1960), p. 48.

33. Thomas Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970), pp. 101–2, 149. Kuhn wrote: "Since new paradigms are born of old ones, they ordinarily incorporate much of the vocabulary and apparatus, both conceptual and manipulative, that the traditional paradigm had previously employed. But they seldom employ these borrowed elements in quite the traditional way." Ibid., p. 149.

an orthodoxy, or as Van Til remarked, they did it “under cover of an orthodox-sounding theology.”³⁴ (Rushdoony has correctly identified Barth as an implicit polytheist.)³⁵ It is not wrong to redefine terms; it is wrong to define words or use them in any way other than the Bible defines and uses them.

Those who pioneer a new worldview must break the near-monopoly strangle hold over useful terms that existing intellectual guilds have gained for themselves. An objection to my definition of the word “antinomian” simply because it does not conform precisely to past usage is also to a large extent also an objection to the alternative worldview that I am proposing.³⁶ This implicit theological hostility is masked by an explicit appeal to supposedly neutral grammar. But Van Til has taught us well: nothing is neutral. “Every bit of supposedly impersonal and neutral investigation, even in the field of science, is the product of an attitude of spiritual hostility to the Christ through whom alone there is truth in any dimension.”³⁷ This surely includes language. As I wrote in 1973, “Neutrality does not exist. Everything must be interpreted in terms of what God has revealed. The humanistic goal of neutral language (and therefore neutral law) was overturned at the Tower of Babel. Our definitions must be in terms of biblical revelation.”³⁸

I am doing my best to help establish effective theological terminology for future use by those who have adopted a theonomic worldview. Christian Reconstructionists need not be limited in our critical analysis by the inherited vocabulary of our theological opponents. Besides, the winners in history get to write the dictionaries as well as the textbooks. More to the point, dictionaries always reflect common usage

34. Van Til, The New Modernism (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1947), p. 27. He later wrote: “It is at this point that the question of ‘traditional phraseology’ has its significance. The ‘simple believer’ is all too often given new wine in old bottles. It is our solemn duty to point out this fact to him. The matter is of basic importance and of the utmost urgency.” Van Til, Christianity and Barthianism (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1962), p. 2.

35. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, p. 20.

36. By a new worldview, I mean a new packaging of theological doctrines that have always been accepted by representative segments of the orthodox church. But by adopting the five-point biblical covenant model to present these doctrines, I have been forced to reject existing theological systems which unsystematically and unself-consciously reject this model by substituting other interpretations of one or more of the five points.

37. Van Til, The Case for Calvinism (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1964), p. 145.

38. Gary North, “In Defense of Biblical Bribery,” in Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, p. 843.

after the paradigm shift. We are preparing for this shift well in advance.

Antinomianism as I define it has been the ethical preference of much of the church almost from its beginning. A philosophical compromise with Greek categories of hypothetically neutral natural law began in the second century,³⁹ and it still continues.⁴⁰ In politics, this compromise is known in our day as pluralism. Just about every Christian accepts the idea of pluralism, either implicitly or explicitly. By defining antinomianism in terms of opposition to the Old Testament case laws, Christian Reconstructionists (theonomists) have alienated Christians in all camps, for almost all Christian groups oppose the enforcement of Old Testament laws. No Christian likes to be called an antinomian. Christians generally retaliate against such an accusation with the counter-accusation, "Legalist!"

This book is designed to help answer the question: Who is an antinomian and who is a legalist, biblically defined?

Conclusion

I have offered a comprehensive view of what the pro-nomian position teaches that biblical law is. We see biblical law as an integrated, unbreakable whole, an explicitly covenantal system of biblically revealed law. Antinomianism is a denial of this integrated system, yet in many cases, it offers as an alternative a perverse mirror image of this system. Satan had to use the biblical covenant model in order to refute it. He thereby honored the old political principle: "You can't beat something with nothing."

The older definitions of "antinomian" were devised by those who, if my version of God's law is correct, were themselves antinomians. They did not adhere to all five points of the biblical covenant model. They may or may not have denied all five points, but they refused to affirm all five points, and then derive their definition of law and anti-law in terms of all five points.

So, for the sake of clarity, let me repeat my compact definition of pro-nomianism:

The belief that God, the sovereign, predestinating Creator, has deleg-

39. Cornelius Van Til, Christianity in Conflict (mimeographed; Philadelphia: Westminster Theological Seminary, 1962).

40. Rex Downie, "Natural Law and God's Law: An Antithesis," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, V (Summer 1978), pp. 79–87.

ated to mankind the responsibility of obeying His Bible-revealed law-order, Old and New Testaments, and promises to bless or curse men in history, both individually and corporately, in terms of this law-order. This law-order and its historically applied sanctions are the basis of the progressive sanctification of covenant-keeping individuals and covenantal institutions—family, church, and State—over time, and they are also the basis of the progressive disinheritance of covenant-breakers.

Deny this, and you are an antinomian.

APPENDIX S

WHAT ARE THE CASE LAWS?

For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope. (I Cor. 9:9–10).

Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine. For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward (I Tim. 5:17–18).

This book is designed to press the case for biblical ethics, for it deals with a much-neglected portion of Scripture, the case laws of Exodus. These are the specific applications of the “lively oracles” that God gave to Moses (Acts 7:38). The case laws of Exodus appear in the chapters following the Ten Commandments of Exodus 20, especially in chapters 21–23. They are generally ignored today by Christian commentators, as surely as they were ignored in Moses’ day. James Jordan’s Law of the Covenant (1984)¹ is one of the rare exceptions to this established tradition of neglecting the case laws by Bible-believing scholars as well as liberal higher critics.

Christians are supposed to take the Old Testament’s case laws seriously. As Paul’s use of them indicates, they set forth in an encapsulated form fundamental principles of justice. They provide guidelines for the specific decisions of day-to-day life, and from them we are supposed to become skilled in discovering and then developing their underlying moral and judicial principles. The early church understood this, although the church’s compromises with the pagan concept of natural law disguised the importance of biblical case laws in the compiling of early medieval law codes. These case law principles have long served as a major component of the judicial foundation of Western civilization. As Western civilization steadily departs from the legal principles that the case laws set forth, we walk closer toward the precipice of God's judgment, oblivious to the mortal danger that faces us. Men have forgotten that God judges nations and cultures in history. Biblical law warns them of this reality (Deut. 28:15–68), but Christians generally, not to mention the pagans who dominate this civilization, pay no attention to biblical law, especially its sanctions.

1. Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

A. Case Laws and the Resurrection

It is with the case laws of Exodus that the Christian Reconstructionists' hermeneutical rubber inescapably meets the historical road. It is here that the Old Testament first presents detailed social applications of the fundamental principles of the Mosaic law and, equally important, the Mosaic law's required civil sanctions. Theonomists argue that Christians cannot legitimately proclaim the continuing moral validity of the Ten Commandments without also proclaiming the continuing judicial validity of the Mosaic case laws. Furthermore, Christians cannot legitimately affirm the binding nature of the Mosaic case laws apart from these laws' specified sanctions, unless the New Testament has annulled these sanctions individually.²

What must be understood from the very beginning is the following theonomic principle of biblical interpretation: it was with the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ to the right hand of God in heaven that the entire world was placed historically under the full requirements of biblical law. From the creation, God placed the work of the law in the hearts of all men (Rom. 2:14–15). God later made a covenant with Noah, and this covenant necessarily involved law as a tool of dominion (Gen. 9:1–17). He made a covenant with Israel, and He gave laws to Israel that all nations would recognize as being holy and just (Deut. 4:5–8). But it was with the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ that biblical law burst the Old Covenant wineskin of national Israel and flowed judicially across all nations. It was not the ministry of Moses that accomplished this; it was the ministry of Jesus Christ.

This being our position, any attempt to refute the theonomic position by arguing that the Old Testament case laws were intended by God to apply only to Old Testament Israel misses a key theological point: God's revealed law was resurrected to newness of life with Jesus. Old Testament law, mediated and restored through Jesus Christ and preached by His church, has in New Testament times become judicially obligatory nationally on a worldwide basis. All nations will be judged finally in terms of God's law, as Jesus warned: "And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats" (Matt. 25:32). This means that the biblical case laws are now judicially obligatory for the nations, for where there is no binding law, there can be no valid sanctions.

2. This has been the case with the death penalty for sabbath-breaking: chapter 24, Appendix E.

B. Biblical Law and Civilization

Though it may seem strange to introduce the problems dealt with in this chapter with an extended citation from an Orthodox Jewish scholar, I have decided to do so anyway. Rarely has any commentator better understood the importance of biblical law for the full flowering of society than I. Grunfeld, the translator of Samson Raphael Hirsch's remarkable study, Horeb (1837). Grunfeld wrote in 1962:

Indeed, the leaders of Christian opinion in Europe, and their Jewish imitators, conscious or unconscious, have often 'hit the law of Moses with their fists'; but it seems that in doing so they have done more harm to European civilization than to the law of Moses.

The separation of law and religion has proved to be one of the greatest disasters in the history of human civilization. It has done untold harm to law and religion alike. It has robbed law of its sacred character and thereby of its strongest moral incentive; it has deprived religion of its legal element and, with that, of its influence over the greatest social movements of our time. Law alone can be the regulator of organized human life. The rejection of law as a religious discipline means, therefore, of necessity, the flight of religion from the world and its realities, a denial of the value of life and a state of detachment and capitulation on the part of religion. Hence originates the deplorably small influence which organized religion has wielded in the daily affairs of life, especially in its social and economic spheres, where religious activity should be at least as predominant as in the sphere of faith and morals. This aloofness of organized religion from the problems and difficulties of social life has alienated the best and noblest spirits among the social reformers and has paralysed the influence which organized religion could and should have had in the social and political advancement of the world.³

A study of the case laws of Exodus gives us legitimate grounds of belief in the intensely practical nature of biblical law in social and economic life. The asserted dualism between biblical law and society cannot be maintained without denying the continuing validity of the case laws of Exodus. It should not surprise anyone that these three chapters of the Book of Exodus have been ignored by biblical commentators for two centuries, because this era has been the age of philosophical dualism: the estrangement of religion from the “real world” of scientific cause and effect. The triumph of biblical “higher criticism,”⁴ the triumph of the dualistic humanist philosophy of Immanuel Kant,⁵ and the triumph of inward-looking, world-rejecting pietistic Christianity have been closely related events.

C. The Case Laws and Slavery

The case laws of Exodus begin with rules governing slavery (actually, temporary indentured servitude). This is appropriate, for two reasons. First, as I have written in my general introduction to this series,⁶ the Pentateuch is structured in terms of the five-point biblical covenant model: transcendence, hierarchy, ethics, judgment, and inheritance.⁷ Exodus, the second book, is concerned with the question of hierarchy. It asks this crucial question: Which God should man serve? The Book of Exodus presents God as the God of history who delivers

3. I. Grunfeld, “Religion, Law and Life: An Historical Vindication of the Horeb,” in Samson Raphael Hirsch, Horeb: A Philosophy of Jewish Laws and Observances (New York: Soncino Press, 1962), pp. cxxxii–cxxxiii.

4. See Appendix P: “The Hoax of Higher Criticism.”

5. Richard Kroner, Kant’s Weltanschauung, trans. John E. Smith (University of Chicago Press, [1914] 1956). Kroner was correct when he wrote that “No one before Kant had ever exalted man so much; no one had ever accorded him such a degree of metaphysical independence and self-dependence. Within himself man creates and preserves the supersensible as that excellence which distinguishes him from all other beings. The supersensible is precisely that trait which makes man what he is or rather what he ought to be. The idea of mankind and the idea of God are indeed so near to each other here that they almost coincide. Even God is dependent upon the moral law instead of the law being dependent upon him” (pp. 36–37).

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012), General Introduction, Section H.

7. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). This five-point structure can be remembered by the mnemonic device, THEOS: transcendence, hierarchy, ethics, oath, and succession.

His people from oppression. In this sense, Meredith G. Kline's identification of the second point of the covenant is appropriate: historical prologue.⁸ The breakdown of an older order inaugurates a new order. The breakdown of Egyptian political and military sovereignty led to the rise of Israel. But once God has identified Himself historically, along the lines of an ancient suzerain's covenant treaty, men's response becomes the central issue. They must then ask themselves this question: Under whose hierarchical institutions should we operate? This is the vassal's appropriate response after he hears of what the suzerain has done for him in the past. Ray Sutton's identification of the second point of the covenant as hierarchy correlates closely to man's response to God's historical prologue.⁹

The second reason why the case laws begin with laws governing bondservice is that the Israelites had just been delivered out of permanent slavery. They were ready to hear about laws governing servitude. We should recognize the obvious: civil laws making slavery as oppressive as the system that had governed them in Egypt would not have been laws imposed by the God of liberation on a nation that had suffered years of unjust oppression. Thus, we should recognize that these laws were a loosening of the bonds of servitude, not a tightening. Furthermore, as I argue later on, any attempt by antinomians, either Christian or anti-Christian, to ridicule the case laws of Exodus that govern bondservice is in effect a call for a return to Egyptian bondage, namely, bondage to the autonomous State. Bondage is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of "bondage vs. no bondage." It is a question of "bondage to whom."

1. Hierarchy

Let us begin with the first reason why the case laws begin with the laws of servitude: the biblical covenant model. The Book of Exodus occupies the second position in the Pentateuch, and is therefore best understood in terms of hierarchy, meaning the structure of covenantal authority. Exodus opens with the account of the subjection of the Israelites to a king who did not acknowledge the covenant that his royal predecessor had made with Joseph and his brothers (Ex. 1:8). He

8. Meredith G. Kline, The Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963), pp. 52–61; cf. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 53–57.

9. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

placed the Hebrews in permanent slavery. He attempted to replace the God of the Bible as the sovereign lord of the Hebrews. As a self-proclaimed divinity, Pharaoh asserted the right to rule over them without answering to the God of Abraham. Thus, the early chapters of Exodus are devoted to the story of God's subordination of Egypt to Himself through the judgment of cursing—plagues, death, and military defeat—and the subordination of Israel to Himself through the judgment of blessing: their deliverance from bondage.¹⁰ The old order was marked by the Hebrews' enslavement by Pharaoh; the new order was to be marked by their service to God.

Exodus is the Bible's premier "book of the covenant" (Ex. 24:7). The Book of Exodus is itself structured in terms of the five-point covenant model. First, transcendence: Who is the sovereign God over nature and history, God or Pharaoh? Answer: the Creator God who delivered His people from Egypt (chapters 1–17). Second, hierarchy: What is the proper mode of judicial organization that reflects God's hierarchical chain of command over His people? Answer: a bottom-up appeals court structure (Ex. 18). Third, what are the laws by which God governs mankind and God's authorized representatives govern the covenantal institutions of family and civil government? Answer: the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20) and the case laws (Ex. 21–23:13). Fourth, how is the covenantal oath between God and His people manifested? Through a covenant meal (Ex. 23:14–19). What is the judgment that God brings on those who rebel against Him? National destruction: deliverance into the hands of the enemy (Ex. 23:20–3). Exodus 24 records the covenantal oath that Israel made with God. "And Moses came and told the people all the words of the LORD, and all the judgments: and all the people answered with one voice, and said, All the words which the LORD hath said will we do" (v. 3). Fifth, what is the sign of inheritance or continuity? Answer: the tabernacle that will go with them through the wilderness, and then into the promised land. Its blueprint appears in Exodus 25–31; its actual construction is described in Exodus 35–40.

Exodus 32–33 deals with Israel's rebellion with the golden calf and God's judgment of them, a recapitulation of Adam's Fall. In Exodus 34, God re-establishes Israel's covenant with Him, with Moses acting as the representative or intermediary in this hierarchy. Exodus 34 is therefore a section on covenant renewal, an aspect of historical continuity.

10. Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985).

The second reason why slavery becomes the initial focus of concern in the case laws is that the Israelites had just been delivered out of bondage. The whole book deals with the theme of deliverance from bondage into sabbath rest.¹¹ Thus, having just been delivered from slavery, God caught their attention by beginning the case law section with laws governing servitude. He confronts people “right where they are” in life. Where the Israelites were was in the wilderness, in transition spiritually and culturally from Pharaoh’s slavery to God’s servitude. Biblical servitude is one of God’s authorized modes of transition from wrath to grace (blessing), both personally and culturally. Pagan slavery, in contrast, is one of God’s ethically unauthorized but historically imposed modes of transition from grace to wrath (cursing) for His people: bondage in Egypt, Assyria, and Babylon. Becoming a slave-master over God’s people is prohibited, yet God raises up such tyrants as a form of judgment against His people and the tyrants themselves (Jer. 25). What the New Testament says of Judas applies to slave-masters generally: “And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!” (Luke 22:22).

2. Liberals Protest

Because the case law section begins with bondservice, liberal scholars are immediately repulsed by it. In general, they react negatively to biblical law as a whole. It is not that they ignore the law. Liberal theologians have produced a large number of detailed studies of Old Testament law. What is notable about these academic studies is their almost self-conscious uselessness. Specialized scholarly journals in the field of Old Testament studies have been created by the dozens to serve as outlets for essays so narrow in focus, so irrelevant in conclusions, and so boring in style that not even publishers of scholarly books are willing to print them. The extent of the uselessness of these highly rarified, heavily footnoted studies cannot readily be appreciated by the average Christian, who reads his Bible, and then does his best to take its teachings seriously. Even in the world of formal academic scholarship, which specializes in the production of painstakingly documented irrelevance, Old Testament scholars are regarded by their colleagues as highly specialized, multi-lingual masters of useless historical details and even more useless literary speculation. (If Old Testament higher criticism were pornographic, it could not be published in the United States, for in order to publish pornography legally, the publishers of such material must be capable of demonstrating in court that it has at least some socially redeeming value.)

11. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, p. 75.

Modern Bible scholarship has been governed by one overriding concern: to make the Old Testament seem archaic, irrelevant to the modern world, and in no way connected to man's final judgment by the God whose word the Old Testament is. Indeed, the bulk of all modern scholarship in every academic discipline has this as the primary goal: to deny the biblical doctrine of final judgment. This was the theological reason why Darwinism flourished so rapidly after its introduction in 1859,¹² and it is why it still flourishes today. People know that their deeds are evil, so they adopt an eschatology that conforms to their preferred eternal state, an eschatology without final judgment by a personal Creator God. Secular humanists therefore insist that mankind must be viewed as a randomly evolved being who is headed nowhere in particular, but especially not toward God's final judgment. Covenant-breakers seek substitutes for God's final judgment: either the heat death of the universe or the endless oscillating cycles of creative explosion, expansion, contraction, and cosmic crushing.¹³ Either is deemed preferable to the eternal lake of fire, which is undoubtedly the place of residence for covenant-breakers.

A much better alternative is a return to covenant-keeping. This involves knowing what the ethical terms of the covenant are.

D. The Book of the Covenant

It has been my self-appointed task to study the "Book of the Covenant," Exodus 21–23, with the operating presupposition that these few pages of legal texts are consistent, coherent, sensible, and authorit-

12. Wrote liberal cleric Rev. James Maurice Wilson in 1925: "The evolution of man from lower forms of life was in itself a new and startling fact, and one that broke up the old theology. I and my contemporaries, however, accepted it as fact. The first and obvious result of this acceptance was that we were compelled to regard the Biblical story of the Fall as not historic, as it had long been believed to be. We were compelled to regard that story as a primitive attempt to account for the presence of sin and evil in the world. . . . But now, in the light of the fact of evolution, the Fall, as a historic event, already questioned on other grounds, was excluded and denied by science." Wilson, "The Religious Effect of the Idea of Evolution," in Evolution in the Light of Modern Knowledge: A Collective Work (London: Blackie & Son, 1925), pp. 497, 498.

13. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

ative; and that they are judicially applicable as case laws to every culture in every era of history. These case laws deserve careful attention, not in order to discover why they are supposedly inapplicable today, but rather to discover how they are applicable today. These laws represent a significant portion of mankind's God-given and God-required tools of dominion. They are essential to a unique law-order that alone enables God's people to subdue the whole earth to His glory.

The case laws of Exodus constitute the second-longest passage in the Bible that deals with the specific laws of the civil government, the longest being Deuteronomy 13–27. (A considerable portion of Leviticus 18–21 is concerned with permanent judicial regulations, and not just the temporary laws of cleanliness.) Yet Exodus 21–23 is a brief section of the Bible. As the reader can see from the thickness of this book, a great deal of economic material can be gleaned from these three chapters; nevertheless, they fill only a few pages of the Bible. The implications of these case laws are wide-ranging; they constitute a major substantive foundation of Western law.¹⁴ Thus, we must view them as part of an all-encompassing system of law.

James Jordan has made an incisive observation concerning the use of biblical law in Protestant theology: "Protestant theology has traditionally held to three uses of the Law of God. The use of the Law in justification is that it provides a legal indictment against fallen man, and drives him to Christ. The use of the Law in sanctification is that it provides a moral standard for the life of renewed man. The use of the Law in dominion is that it delineates the rule which is to be implemented by the adopted sons of God over His creation. In the past, theology has tended to neglect the dominical use of God's Law. . . ." ¹⁵ Such neglect has been debilitating for the church and also for civilization. It is the dominical aspect of biblical law that this commentary series, and specifically this volume, is intended to examine.

1. The Case Laws

What are case laws? How are we to understand them? Are Christians to work politically to get them enacted into civil law today? Even

14. In terms of a formal foundation of Western law—case laws taken verbatim from the Old Testament—this statement would be more difficult to prove. An academic series of historical studies on these explicit references would be of great importance.

15. James B. Jordan, Slavery in Biblical Perspective, unpublished master's thesis, Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia (April 1980), p. 4.

those scholars who believe in the Bible as the infallible word of God disagree over the answers to these questions. Greg L. Bahnsen devotes only two sentences to the case laws in a study of biblical law that is over 600 pages long: "The ten commandments cannot be understood and properly applied without the explanation given them throughout the case laws of the Older Testament. The case law illustrates the application or qualification of the principle laid down in the general commandment."¹⁶ This is not what you would call a detailed study of the case laws. Rushdoony's two-volume Institutes of Biblical Law does not even have an entry in the index to "case laws" or "law, case," yet the combined work is over 1,600 pages. This does not mean that Institutes totally ignores the case laws, although a more detailed discussion would have been helpful. It means that the people who compiled the two indexes either did not notice the topic or else did not perceive its importance. The volumes' incomplete indexes makes it difficult for the reader to trace down this important aspect of biblical law.

Rushdoony breaks biblical law into three aspects: general law, case law, and prophetic commentary on the law. "First, certain broad premises or principles are declared. These are declarations of basic law. The Ten Commandments give us such declarations. The Ten Commandments are not therefore laws among laws, but are the basic laws, of which the various laws are specific examples."¹⁷ Then there is "a second characteristic of Biblical law, namely, that the major portion of the law is case law, i.e., the illustration of the basic principle in terms of specific cases. These specific cases are often illustrations of the extent of the application of the law; that is, by citing a minimal type of case, the necessary jurisdictions of the law are revealed."¹⁸

The case laws are necessary in order to focus our concern on specific violations. The specific nature of the case laws is what keeps the Ten Commandments relevant in history. "Without case law, God's law would soon be reduced to an extremely limited area of meaning. This, of course, is precisely what has happened. Those who deny the present validity of the law apart from the Ten Commandments have as a consequence a very limited definition of theft. Their definition usually follows the civil law of their country, is humanistic, and is not radically 16. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 2nd ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1984), p. 313. His other brief references to the case laws only assert that they are still in force.

17. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 10.

18. Ibid., p. 11.

different from the definitions given by Moslems, Buddhists, and humanists.”¹⁹

James Jordan speaks of four manifestations of biblical law. First, there is “the Greatest Commandment,” as he calls it: “And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might” (Deut. 6:5; cf. Matt. 22:37). On this point, Rushdoony is in agreement, and he begins Chapter 1 of the Institutes with a discussion of Deuteronomy 6:5.²⁰ The command is: love God. Jordan says that this covenant has two sides: structural (submit to the law) and personal (willing acceptance). “This Greatest Commandment comprehends (includes) every other commandment.”²¹

Second, there is the commandment to love our fellow man as we love ourselves (Lev. 19:18; Matt. 22:39). This commandment divides the Greatest Commandment into two parts: duty to God and duty to men. “We should notice that these two Great Commandments are not found in any special place in the Bible, but are placed among the ‘small’ particular laws of Leviticus and Deuteronomy.”²²

Third, there are the Ten Commandments, the Decalogue. “The Ten Commandments break the Greatest Commandment into ten parts. Each of the Ten Commandments relates to God, and each relates to our fellow men, but some relate more specifically to God and others relate more specifically to man.”²³

“Fourth, there are the case laws. The case laws of the Old and New Testaments break the Greatest Commandment into many parts. As we have seen, any given case law may be related to more than one of the Ten Commandments, and so it would be an error to try to pigeon-hole the case laws under one Commandment each. In reality the case law as a whole comes under the Ten Commandments as a whole. Some laws fit rather nicely under one or another of the Commandments, but most case laws seem to combine principles from several of the basic Ten.”²⁴ This is a very important point. It would be a mistake for us to seek to categorize each case law as being an application of one and only one of the Ten Commandments. The theologically innovative insight by Rushdoony that each of the case laws can be subsumed under a particular commandment in the Decalogue must not blind us to the

19. Ibid., p. 12.

20. Ibid., p. 16.

21. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, p. 21.

22. Ibid., p. 22.

23. Idem.

24. Ibid., pp. 22–23.

fact that a case law may also be able to be subsumed under several of them.

E. Casuistry: The One and The Many

The case laws allow us to understand the scope of other fundamental laws in the Bible. They enable us to see how these fundamental principles are to be interpreted and applied in concrete cases. The case laws enable us to combine the one of general law with the many of historic circumstances. Every system of law possesses both features—general and specific, one and many²⁵—but the Bible gives us reliable revelation concerning the proper balancing.

The case laws are specific applications of more general biblical legal principles. We are to use case laws as the Apostle Paul used the case law that prohibits the muzzling of an ox while it treads the grain in the field (Deut. 25:4). Paul derived two ecclesiastical applications from this case law: 1) that the Christian minister is worthy of his hire (I Cor. 9:9–14); and 2) that he is worthy of a double honor (I Tim. 5:17–18). These are both examples of the general principle to avoid stealing.²⁶ The case law, the general law, and the New Testament application of the law are all equally valid today, no less so than in the days of Moses. If this case law were no longer judicially binding today, then why would Paul cite it? If it is judicially binding, then on what basis can all other case laws be dismissed as inapplicable in New Testament times?

Any principle of biblical interpretation (hermeneutic) is dangerous which argues that unless an Old Testament case law is specifically repeated in the New Testament, it is automatically annulled in New Testament times. Anyone who argues this way is going to run into major problems. For example, bestiality is not specifically mentioned in the New Testament. In the Old Testament, it is listed as a capital crime (Lev. 18:23). How are we to regard bestiality in the New Testament? As a “victimless crime”? As an example of cruelty to animals? As creative humanism’s version of animal husbandry? Or as a capital crime? If the act is still a moral crime in the New Testament (derived from, say, the law regarding adultery—unless the interpreter has also abandoned John 8:1–11), is it also a matter for the civil courts? If it is, is the death penalty still in force? Can you carry over the Old Testament’s definition of the act as criminal and yet not carry over the Old Testament’s penal sanction? On what hermeneutical basis?²⁷

25. Wrote legal scholar Max Rheinstein: “Even less irrational is judicial case law in the sense of judge-made law, as occurring particularly, but by no means solely, in the Common Law. Consistency, which indeed is the essence of rationality, is required by the very principle of stare decisis [legal precedent—G. N.]. As no case is ever completely identical with any other, we can never follow precedent in any way other than by trying to follow its ratio decidendi, i.e., the principle, broad or narrow, upon which we find, or believe, it to be based.” Rheinstein, Introduction, Max Weber, On Law in Economy and Society, edited by Rheinstein (New York: Clarion, 1967), p. xlviii. He then added this obiter dictum: “With much justification the judicial process of the Common Law has been characterized as reasoning by example in the Aristotelian sense.” The judicial process in the pre-modern Common Law should rather be described as reasoning by example in the Mosaic sense.

26. Rushdoony, Institutes, pp. 11–12.

1. Which General Law?

The problem for biblical casuistry is that the case laws do not always reveal to us which one (or more) of the fundamental ten laws is directly involved. This is Jordan’s point.²⁸ There is no simplistic way to place every case law under one (and only one) of the Ten Commandments. The search for a specific and primary principle that undergirds any given case law can sometimes be frustrating. No such principle may initially call attention to itself. This is why human intuition, trained by long periods of Bible study and the discipline of casuistry (the application of general laws to specific cases), coupled with regeneration by the Holy Spirit, is necessary for a proper understanding of biblical law.

The art of Protestant biblical casuistry faded in the late seventeenth century, with the deaths of men like Jeremy Taylor, Richard Baxter, and especially after the death of Samuel Willard in 1707. After them, the secular vision of natural law once again overwhelmed Christian thinkers, as it had in the late Scholastic era, only this time, the vision became more and more self-consciously autonomous from the Bible and religion. It has only been since 1973, with the publication of Volume I of Rushdoony’s Institutes,²⁹ that a handful of younger Protestant scholars began to publish preliminary exercises in the ancient discipline of casuistry, but without any reliance on the quicksand of natural law theory. My specifically economic commentary on the Bible, which I began in 1973 in the Chalcedon Report, is an obvious example. This self-conscious break with natural law theory was Cornelius Van Til’s crucially important intellectual legacy to the Christian

27. Gary North, 75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won’t Ask, (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), Question 26. (<http://bit.ly/gn75bible>)

28. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, pp. 22–23.

29. And also with the audio tapes that preceded the Institutes from about 1968.

Reconstructionists.³⁰

2. By What Other Standard?

Are these case laws still in force? Bahnsen says yes: "Since the case law's principles define the Decalogue, the case law's principles (in their full scope: personal and social, ecclesiastical and civil) are as perpetual as the Decalogue itself."³¹ Others in the Christian Reconstruction "movement" agree: unless specifically abrogated through Christ's fulfillment of a specific case law in the New Testament (extremely rare), they are still morally and judicially binding.

There are many Christians who categorically deny this. They reject the judicially binding character of Old Testament laws. In response, Reconstructionists ask the question that served as the title of Rushdoony's first book: By what standard? What judicial standard is sovereign in New Testament times? More specifically, by what other standard than the word of God are men required by God to select and enforce civil laws? By some hypothetically universal natural law (which almost nobody believes in, including theoretical physicists, now that Darwinism is the reigning philosophy)?³² By process philosophy, the shifting standard bequeathed by scientific Darwinism?³³ By existentialism's shifting standards?³⁴ By the shifting ethical standard of humanistic positive law (whatever the legislature this week says is law, is law)? By what other standard? Be specific. Prove your case. And prove it in terms of the Bible, if you please. Please cite chapter and verse.

Chapter and verse: no words anger the compromised Christian intellectual more than these. Chapter and verse: he is thrown back on the Bible as the ultimate judge of his speculations. Chapter and verse: this allows no autonomy for the mind of man. Chapter and verse: his humanistic colleagues will laugh at him. Worse than facing Almighty God on judgment day, the Christian antinomian intellectual fears ridicule 'by his humanistic peers. Chapter and verse: he has no chapters

30. For example, Cornelius Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969), ch. 8: "Natural Theology and Scripture."

31. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), p. 318. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

32. North, Is the World Running Down?, ch. 1.

33. Delwin Brown, Ralph E. James, Jr., and Gene Reeves (eds.), Process Philosophy and Christian Thought (Indianapolis, Indiana: Bobbs-Merrill, 1971); Ewert H. Cousins (ed.), Process Theology: Basic Writings (New York: Newman Press, 1971).

34. William Barrett, Irrational Man: A Study in Existential Philosophy (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1958] 1962).

and verses. So he shouts his defiance of the laws of the Bible. He ridicules the laws of the Bible by ridiculing specific biblical law-based recommendations of the Christian Reconstruction movement. He sets himself up as the standard of interpretation. He clings to his 1968 (or 1948) classroom notes from the State University that granted him his advanced degree. "Here lies all truth, at least for the moment, and momentary truth is all we can hope to discover," he proclaims.

Not the Old Testament! Never, ever the Old Testament! After all, Christ has annulled the Old Testament. And even if He hasn't, State University has. This is the morally corrosive process that has been labeled so perceptively by Herbert Schlossberg, using a metaphor derived from the world of ruptured nuclear reactors: the evangelical meltdown.³⁵

F. The Lack of Procedural Details

There is one problem that Christians need to recognize as a major problem to be solved in each society that attempts to rewrite civil legislation and jurisprudence in terms of the Old Testament case laws. This is the problem of legal procedure. The Bible is almost silent concerning civil and ecclesiastical judicial procedure.

J. J. Finkelstein made this observation in his fascinating monograph, The Ox That Gored (1981). (This is the single liberal source that proved really indispensable for this book—the fix that got me hooked again,³⁶ vainly hoping that some other liberal document would prove as useful. None ever did.) He spent many years of his life in a careful study of ancient Near Eastern legal texts. He found a crucial contrast between biblical texts and the compilations of law in rival Near Eastern societies: the biblical texts reveal almost nothing about legal procedure. "The contrast between the biblical and the Mesopotamian legal corpora is underscored even further by the almost total absence in the former of normative rules, that is, formulations of the proper procedures governing commerce and economic life in general. The legal sections of the Pentateuch betray what amounts to complete indifference to the formalities without which the most elementary social institutions could hardly be said to function. This silence applies not only to contracts and obligations, but also to the normative forms by which 35. Herbert Schlossberg, Review of David Chilton's Paradise Restored, in American Spectator (March 1987), p. 42.

36. See below: Section H.

family life is ordered, such as marriage, family property rights, and inheritance. The Mesopotamian legal corpora dwell on these themes at great length; biblical law touches upon them only in the most cursory way, and then often within the framework of a narrative where it typically is a question of the unusual rather than the normative procedure. This is clearly illustrated by the petition of the daughters of Zelophehad for inheritance rights in the absence of male heirs."³⁷

He gives some good reasons for this contrast. 'One is that the climate of Palestine is inhospitable to the survival of parchment and papyrus. In contrast, Mesopotamian collections of tablets and sealed rolls have been found in profusion during archeological digs. "The bulk of the written remains from ancient Mesopotamia is accidental in the sense that all of it has been recovered by legitimate or illicit excavation."³⁸ It may be that attempts to impose coherence on the "incoherent assemblage of data of widely disparate dates" may be misleading. In the late 1970s, I heard a lecture by the editor of the Biblical Archaeology Review, David N. Freedman, who informed us that only about 10 percent of the tablets for any culture or archeological site are ever translated. There is always another discovery to catch the fancy of the archaeologists, and they eventually grow bored with the translation of seemingly similar commercial records and tax records. Furthermore, there are not that many specialists in the ancient languages, and fewer still who are social or legal theorists. They go on to new tablets instead of spending a lifetime interpreting the tablets they have already translated.

Finkelstein does not emphasize these more technical aspects of the differences between biblical and Near Eastern texts. The really important difference in the rate of survival, he says, was theological. "The Israelite nation was bound by an ancient and sacred pact with its deity to organize and conduct its life, both personally and institutionally, in accordance with the divinely ordained prescriptions. Directly or indirectly, whatever is included in the Old Testament by way of 'historical' information is meant to reinforce that central thesis; the vicissitudes of the people through the millennium embraced by the biblical time span serve as hardly more than a barometer of the nation's fidelity to, or perfidy against, its pact with Yahweh. Everything is subordinated to this overriding purpose, and whatever did not contribute to this 'transcendent' end was not considered for inclusion, no matter how fundamental it was to the pursuit of daily life. As a consequence norms and regulations governing trade, property, the crafts, family law, and the like—the institutions that constitute the very fabric of daily life—were of little concern to the biblical authors and redactors."³⁹

37. J. J. Finkelstein, The Ox That Gored (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1981), p. 42. Boecker writes: "There are no OT 'rules of court.' We must remember above all that in its basic message the OT is not interested in conveying a picture of legal processes in Ancient Israel. Its concern lies elsewhere. Its purpose is to report God's activity in and with Israel and to demonstrate Israel's answer to this activity." Hans Jochen Boecker, Law and the Administration of Justice in the Old Testament and Ancient East, trans. Jeremy Moiser (Minneapolis, Minnesota: Augsburg, [1976] 1980), p. 28.

38. Finkelstein, ibid., p. 44.

I would add a third aspect of this structure of biblical revelation: the intention of God to provide a covenant document for all of human history rather than a temporary law code for professional use by Hebrew lawyers. The whole of God's revealed law had to be read every seventh year to all the residents of Israel (Deut. 31:10–13). Law had to be understandable by them. God's law was (and is) to be enforced primarily by self-government under God, not by formal agencies of government, whether civil or ecclesiastical. The law was (and is) to be lived, not broken into minute technical parts and rolled up in scrolls on lawyers' shelves. The inescapable technical and professional disputes of lawyers were peripheral to the fundamental point: the restoration of the broken covenant of Adam. God's revealed law was given to serve as a guide for the restoration of God's mandated kingdom, meaning the earthly, historical manifestation of God's cosmic civilization—"in earth, as it is in heaven." This meant (and still means) the restoration of God's law-order.⁴⁰ It was this law-order, not the technical terms of professional disputation within an elite guild of lawyers, that was the focus of concern in the Old Testament's texts relating to biblical law.

G. Formal Law and Ethics

Biblical law gives us God's fixed ethical standards. It also gives us warning: there will be a final judgment, eternal in its effects, awesome in its magnitude, and perfect in its casuistry. All the facts will be judged by all the law. Yet there is little said about how this final courtroom drama will be conducted. Any discussion of the technical details of God's formal legal procedure is irrelevant. We know only

39. Ibid., p. 42.

40. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 12.

that there will be at least three witnesses against us, violation by violation: Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.⁴¹

The quest for perfect earthly justice is socially debilitating. It is a demonic quest. Whenever lawyers dominate a society—usually during the society's final years—they steadily substitute formal procedure for ethics. (This is also true of many other academic guilds.) They adopt a theology of salvation by law, or at least continued employment by law. The practice of law replaces the law itself; "law" becomes case laws, precedents, and procedures, but without any thought or hope concerning an integrated law-order that provides meaning to the law in general. Law becomes what men say it is, and men do not agree. Humanism's implicit judicial polytheism then leads to the disintegration of civil law: jammed courts, endless litigation, plea bargaining, and all the other aspects of twentieth-century judicial tyranny that we have become numbed into accepting as normative.⁴²

The Bible is concerned with ethics, not formal courtroom procedure. The New Testament's few rules for church courts (Matt. 18:15–18) are representative of the entire Bible's view of legal procedure. Without reliable ethical standards, formal procedure is the judicial equivalent of wood, hay, and stubble. Paul chastised the church at Corinth for having allowed its members to seek justice in the Roman courts of his day. Better, he said, to seek justice from the least esteemed member of the local church (I Cor. 6:4).

It is the mark of a culture in the process of disintegration that it substitutes procedure for ethics, the letter of its law for the spirit of its law. Even more important than the letter of the law is the bureaucratic machinery that defines the letter of the law. This is where the West is in the latter decades of the twentieth century. Techniques of judicial interpretation are considered more fundamental than the substance of the law. Such an attitude invariably transfers authority from the people to a self-certified elite, the interpreters. It creates a secular priesthood. This is the basis of modern education, where formal examinations and formal academic degrees have been substituted as standards of performance in place of performance on the job as evaluated by a master craftsman in a free market setting. Such bureaucratic formalism is the antithesis of the Reformation doctrine: every man a priest.

41. Gary North, "Witnesses and Judges," Biblical Economics Today, VI (Aug./Sept. 1983). Reprinted as Appendix E in North, Sovereignty and Dominion (1987).

42. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974); Carrol D. Kilgore, Judicial Tyranny (Nashville, Tennessee: Thomas Nelson, 1977).

H. A Lifelong Affliction

This book suffers from a deliberately imposed defect: the footnoting of utterly irrelevant and/or utterly erroneous scholarly material. I attended seminary and graduate school, and I picked up some burdensome habits. One of the great weaknesses of modern Christianity is that prospective ministers are often required to attend seminary, and seminary students are often required by seminary professors to spend an inordinate amount of time reading the theological drivel produced by higher critics. In fact, this general rule governs seminary curricula: the better the seminary's academic reputation, the greater the quantity of assigned drivel. Higher criticism confuses students in conservative seminaries, forcing them to waste precious time that could otherwise be used in studying the Bible. It leads students into apostasy in liberal seminaries. Professors in conservative seminaries frequently structure their classes as if an important pastoral task is to keep up with the latest theories of liberal theologians, so they train their students to become familiar with the defunct theories of long-forgotten German theologians. In the spring semester of 1964, I put this sign on my door at Westminster Seminary: "Help stamp out dead German theologians: Attend classes regularly."⁴³

Conservative Bible scholars spend their lives shadow boxing with liberals, despite the fact that the liberals pay little or no attention to them, and are barely aware of their existence. (An exception was Cornelius Van Til's published criticisms of Karl Barth. "That man hates me!" Barth was once overheard to say when Van Til's name was mentioned. But Barth never responded to Van Til in print, any more than Ron Sider responded in print to David Chilton.⁴⁴ Liberals prefer not to expose their intellectual wounds in public, especially when these wounds are mortal.) In any case, liberals revise their theses so often that by the time the conservative has painstakingly refuted what had been the latest liberal fad, the fad is regarded by the liberals as ancient history.⁴⁵

43. The problem with the theological seminary is that it is an institution that is supported by donors primarily because they expect it to train ministers, when it is all too often a graduate school in theology staffed by men whose real interest is technical theology, and who have never themselves pastored churches. It is another example of procedure (formal academic certification) triumphing over substance (producing pastors).

44. Ron Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger, 2nd ed. (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1984).

45. A good example of such a fad was the "death of God" movement, which lasted

Nevertheless, this practice of citing liberal scholars, even if confined to footnotes only, is like a nasty habit picked up in one's youth; it is very difficult to overcome once you are afflicted. It usually becomes a lifelong addiction. You can spot the addict easily: as he reads the final manuscript version of his book, just before he sends it to the typesetter, he scans the footnotes, making sure that there are a sufficient number of German works cited, even if only in translation. If there are none, the author's hands begin to shake uncontrollably, like a heroin addict suffering withdrawal symptoms. He rushes back to make one more set of revisions, frantically scanning the latest theological journals in search of a handful of citations—any citations—just to make his book appear academically respectable. "One more fix; just one more fix! Then I'll quit forever!" But the pathetic addict knows he can't quit. Even when he is ashamed by his habit, he returns to the sins of his youth. He pretends that the drivel he reads in scholarly theological journals is significant. In time, he risks being remade in their image.

The works of modern theologians are overwhelmingly useless, yet occasionally one of them will randomly offer some vaguely useful insight, so the addicted scholar keeps plowing through their books, hoping for a footnote or two. Tools of Dominion displays occasional evidence of being the product of this bad habit picked up in my youth. But at least you will find no trace of ethical relativism in this book's thesis.

Conclusion

The case laws of Exodus provide us with fundamental legal principles that God has established in order to provide His people with a means of gaining His external, historical blessings. These case laws are mankind's God-given tools of dominion. Without them, and without faith in the God who gave them, rebellious mankind cannot long sustain the external blessings of God.⁴⁶ from 1966 until (maybe) 1969. The "hot" theologians who promoted this short-lived fad were Gabriel Vahanian and Thomas J. J. Altizer. This is an affliction I call Altizer's disease: two years after people get it, they forget all about you. See Altizer, The Gospel of Christian Atheism (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1966). Altizer was teaching at Emory University, a Methodist school in Atlanta, Georgia; Westminster Press is mainline Presbyterian. See also Altizer and Hamilton, Radical Theology and the Death of God (New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1966). Vahanian's book had been published half a decade earlier, but did not immediately catch on: The Death of God: The Culture of Our Post-Christian Era (New York: George Braziller, 1961).

46. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcgr>)

The modern world, including the Christian world, does not believe this. People think that they can have freedom without Christ, and prosperity without adherence to the external requirements of biblical law. They really do believe in the autonomy of man. They really do believe that “my power and the might of my hand hath gotten me this wealth” (Deut. 8:17). The problem is, God has warned us that when we say this, judgment is near (Deut. 8:18–20).

We find Christians who argue vehemently that “Christians can live under any economic or political system!” True, so we reply: “Even the Old Testament legal system?” And we are told emphatically, “No! Christians can live under any economic and political system except the Old Testament legal system.” Anything is acceptable, therefore, except what God requires. So they reply, as Satan replied to Eve, “Hath God said?” Yes, God hath said!

Cornelius Van Til once wrote that if a covenant-breaking man could tune in his radio to only one station that did not testify of God to him, he would listen only to that station. No such station exists, Van Til says.⁴⁷ The whole creation testifies to the Creator (Rom. 1:18–23). We can extend this insight to social theory: if antinomian Christians could live under any system of politics and economics that did not testify to them of what God really requires, they would choose to live only under that system. They have said so repeatedly. But they cannot escape the voice of God. They cannot escape the requirements of Old Testament law. In short, they cannot escape the Bible. They are inevitably under the covenant’s blessings and cursings.

It is time for Christians to place themselves consistently and forthrightly under the ethical terms of the covenant, and affirm the continuing judicial validity for all societies of the case laws. They can begin with the case laws of Exodus.

End of Volume 6

47. A variation of this analogy appears in Common Grace and the Gospel (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1954] 1974). pp. 53–54.

BOUNDARIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON LEVITICUS

VOLUME 1

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

BOUNDARIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON LEVITICUS

VOLUME 1

GARY NORTH

Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Second Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to

R. C. Sproul

who was never one to rest on his a posteriori.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1

| | |
|---|-------|
| Foreword | xi |
| Preface | xxxii |
| Introduction to Boundaries and Dominion | 1 |
| Introduction to Part I: Sacrifices (Lev. 1–7) | 30 |
| 1. Sacrifice, Stewardship, and Debt (Lev. 1:1–4) | 36 |
| 2. Priestly Representation (Lev. 2:1–3) | 61 |
| 3. Leaven and Progressive Sanctification (Lev. 3:1, 17) | 70 |
| 4. Corporate Responsibility (Lev. 4:1–3, 22–24) | 103 |
| 5. Proportional Payments to God (Lev. 5:6–7, 11–12) | 159 |
| 6. Sacred, Profane, and Common (Lev. 5:14–19) | 178 |
| 7. Guardian of the Civil Oath (Lev. 6:1–7) | 228 |
| Introduction to Part II: Cleansing (Lev. 8–16) | 262 |
| 8. Wine as a Boundary Marker (Lev. 10:8–11) | 264 |
| 9. Biblical Quarantine (Lev. 13:45–46) | 282 |
| Introduction to Part III: Separation (Lev. 17–22) | 300 |
| 10. The Promised Land (Lev. 18:24–29) | 302 |

Volume 2

| | |
|--|-----|
| 11. Gleaning: Charity Without Entitlement (Lev. 19:9–10) . . . | 323 |
| 12. Verbal Bonds (Lev. 19:11–12) | 363 |
| 13. Protecting the Weakest Party (Lev. 19:13–14) | 381 |
| 14. Impartial Justice vs. Socialist Economics (Lev. 19:15) | 407 |
| 15. Local Justice vs. Centralized Government (Lev. 19:15) . . . | 444 |
| 16. The State’s Monopoly of Vengeance (Lev. 19:18) | 472 |
| 17. The Preservation of the Seed (Lev. 19:19) | 493 |
| 18. Covenantal Fruit (Lev. 19:23–25) | 527 |
| 19. Measuring Out Justice (Lev. 19:33–37) | 549 |
| 20. Inheritance by Fire (Lev. 20:2–5) | 589 |
| 21. Inheritance Through Separation (Lev. 20:22–26) | 619 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| Introduction to Part IV: Covenantal Acts (Lev. 23–24) | 634 |
| 22. Mutual Self Interest: Priests and Gleaners (Lev. 23:22) . . . | 636 |

Volume 3

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduction to Part V: Inheritance (Lev. 25–27) | 647 |
| 23. The Sabbatical Year (Lev. 25:1–7) | 653 |
| 24. Boundaries of The Jubilee Land Laws (Lev. 25:8–13) | 673 |
| 25. Economic Oppression (Lev. 25:14–17) | 712 |
| 26. Food Miracles (Lev. 25:18–22) | 736 |
| 27. The Right of Redemption (Lev. 25:23–24) | 748 |
| 28. Poverty and Usury (Lev. 25:35–38) | 764 |
| 29. Promise, Adoption, and Liberty (Lev. 25:39–43) | 786 |
| 30. Slaves and Freeman (Lev. 25:44–46) | 808 |
| 31. Mandatory Redemption upon Payment (Lev. 25:47–55) . . | 834 |
| 32. Nature as a Sanctioning Agent (Lev. 26:3–6) | 847 |
| 33. Limits to Growth (Lev. 26:9–10) | 865 |
| 34. God’s Escalating Wrath (Lev. 26:13–17) | 884 |
| 35. The Priesthood: Barriers to Entry (Lev. 27:2–8) | 892 |
| 36. The Redemption-Price System (Lev. 27:9–15) | 911 |
| 37. Tithing: The Benefit of Doubt (Lev. 27:30–33) | 930 |
| Conclusion | 935 |

Volume 4

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–Sacrilege and Sanctions | 957 |
| APPENDIX B–Rushdoony on the Tithe: A Critique | 970 |
| APPENDIX C–Leaven as Exclusively Evil | 1025 |
| APPENDIX D–Greek Mythology: The Myth of Classical Politics | 1044 |
| APPENDIX E–The Covenantal Structure of Judgment | 1064 |
| APPENDIX F–Rushdoony on “Hybridization” | 1085 |
| APPENDIX G–Malthusiansim vs. Covenantalism | 1108 |
| APPENDIX H–Conspiracy, Forgery, and Higher Criticism | 1145 |
| APPENDIX I–Critics of the Five Point Covenant Model | 1159 |

FOREWORD

In the fall of 1991 I began a series of sermons on the first several chapters of Leviticus. My decision to preach on an obscure and difficult book (in the morning service, no less!) runs against the grain of contemporary pastoral theory. . . . Early on in my series, in fact, I spent most of one sermon explaining why a study of Leviticus is valuable for Christians. I am convinced that Leviticus is not only valuable but essential to a proper understanding of the New Testament. But anyone who preaches on Leviticus to an American congregation at the end of the twentieth century owes somebody an explanation.

Peter J. Leithart¹

The Book of Leviticus, more than any other biblical book, has kept readers from getting to the biblical books that follow it. Leviticus calls to mind the old Negro spiritual: “So high, you can’t get over it; so low, you can’t get under it; so wide you can’t get around it.” But we should recall the conclusion: “So, hear the word of the Lord.” The problem is, Leviticus has to be taken as a unit. It is a very difficult book. Therefore, lots of people quit reading. Some make it through the five types of sacrifice. Others actually get through the consanguinity laws. But not many people finish the book. Many are called, but few are chosen.

Boundaries and Dominion is the full-length version of Leviticus: An Economic Commentary, which was published in hardback in 1994.² The digital version of this book initially served as a back-up for Leviticus, with more detailed arguments. It has now replaced it.

A. Why an Economic Commentary?

You may be thinking: “Why should anyone write an economic commentary on the Bible?” My answer: “Because there is no neutrality.” This is another way of saying that all knowledge is based on some view of morality, which in turn provides a concept of historical cause and effect. The Bible teaches that God brings positive sanctions in history to those who obey His law (Lev. 26:3–13). Our knowledge advances, individually and corporately, as we increase both our understanding of His law and our covenantal obedience to His law: word and deed. This is also the basis of our success in history, long term. But the modern church only rarely preaches this message.

1. Peter J. Leithart, The Kingdom and the Power: Rediscovering the Centrality of the Church (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: P&R Publishing, 1993), p. ix.

2. Gary North, Leviticus: An Economic Commentary (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gnlevit>)

The Bible speaks authoritatively in every area of life. This means that every area of life must be explored and then disciplined in terms of revelation in the Bible. We need specialized commentaries that apply biblical law to specific tasks: our occupations (jobs) and our callings (unique services) before God. As we study the Bible from the perspective of modern academic disciplines, we will increase our knowledge of the Bible and also these academic disciplines. We will gain insights that were unavailable to commentators in earlier eras. That is to say, there is supposed to be intellectual and moral progress in history. (Any widely heralded “biblical world-and-life view” that is not supported by detailed Bible commentaries on applied theology is either a sham or is in the very early development stage: a slogan rather than a reality.)

The church’s knowledge of the Bible is not static. This is why we should expect biblical exegesis to improve as time moves forward. The church will become progressively more alert to the interaction of biblical texts with specialized knowledge in all fields of study, but especially those dealing with man and his institutions. As history advances, our knowledge regarding our personal and corporate responsibilities will increase. With greater knowledge comes greater responsibility (Luke 12:47–48).³

This means that the church’s knowledge of the Bible cannot remain static. Only by sealing off culture from biblical ethics could the church’s knowledge of the Bible remain static. This is an impossible goal, for the ethics of the world that surrounds an ethically isolated, culturally defensive church eventually makes inroads into the thinking of its members. Ecclesiastical isolation is therefore an illegitimate goal. Nevertheless, a sealed-off church and a sealed-off external culture are the twin cultural goals of pietism.⁴ Pietists seek to place an exegetical

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

4. J. Gresham Machen, “Christianity and Culture,” Princeton Theological Review, boundary around the arena of Christian responsibility. The narrower this boundary is, the pietist believes, the better.

This commentary is designed to show that the church as an institution and Christians as individuals have far more responsibility than Protestant pietistic churches have taught for over four centuries. More to the point, these responsibilities will grow over time. But God's grace in history will also grow over time. This is the meaning of progressive sanctification, both personally and corporately.

There are a lot of laws in Leviticus. As in the case of my previous commentaries, I ask two questions of each law that I consider: (1) How was this law applied in ancient Israel? (2) How should it be applied today, if at all? A few commentators ask the first question about a few Mosaic laws. Hardly anyone since the year 1700 has bothered to ask the second, let alone answer it clearly. The art of Christian casuistry faded: applying God's law to specific cases.

B. This Book Called Leviticus

In a humorous book about psychologically afflicted people who cannot resist buying books, especially used books—I am one of these people—the author provides a brief history of what book reviewing might have been like before the invention of the printing press. Here is how he imagines an early book industry report on the sales of Leviticus:

Highly publicized diet book published under the title Leviticus. Sales flop. "Too many rules, too depressing, not enough variety, not enough attention to cholesterol," cry the critics. "And for crying out loud, give it a decent title."⁵

This parody is not too far from the opinion of the average reader who has started but not finished Leviticus. He sees it as a kind of "healthy living" diet book. It isn't.

Then what is Leviticus all about? It is a book about limits: boundaries. There are a lot of boundaries laid down in the Book of Leviticus. Some of these limits are liturgical. Others are familial. Some are tribal. Some are dietary. There are also limits that have to do with the status of the Promised Land as God's holy place of residence. Finally, a lot of these laws establish economic limits. I discuss these applications at considerable length, especially the economic ones. That is why this commentary is even longer than volume 3 of my Exodus commentary, Tools of Dominion.

XI (1913), pp. 4–5. (<http://bit.ly/MachenCaC>)

5. Tom Raabe, Biblioholism: The Literary Addiction (Golden, Colorado: Fulcrum, 1991), p. 39.

I offered several pages of reasons to justify the length of Tools of Dominion in its Introduction. I have adopted what I call a “fat book” strategy. A movement that seeks to change the world cannot make its claims believable with only short books. The world is much too large and much too complex to be capable of being restructured in terms of large-print, thin paperback books—the only kind of books that most Christians read these days. The best that any movement can expect to achieve if it publishes only short books is to persuade readers that the world cannot be changed.

C. Applying the Bible’s Texts Today

I am writing for an audience that is not yet in existence. This nonexistent audience is the future leadership of Christianity. At some point, there will be an unprecedented Christian revival. The Holy Spirit will make His worldwide move.⁶ Many will be called, and many will be chosen.⁷ One of the results of this worldwide revival will be the revival of the ideal of Christendom: the civilization (kingdom) of God in history. Christianity will eventually possess sufficient judicial authority, by means of Christian candidates’ popular election to political office or their appointment to judicial office, to begin to apply God’s Bible-revealed laws to civil government. That victorious generation and the generations that will follow it will need a great deal more than a 200-page commentary. Those future generations will need many commentaries like this one: comprehensive within a specialized field of study. I want this commentary to become a model for those future commentaries in such fields as education, social theory, and political theory. Until such studies exist, and exist in profusion, Christianity will not be taken seriously as a religion with answers to the world’s problems. Christianity will continue to be dismissed as simply one more experiment in mystical personal escape and well-organized fund-raising.

6. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1992] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

7. Few have been chosen so far over the history of mankind’s time on earth; this does not prove that few will be chosen in every generation. On the meaning of “few are chosen,” see Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40:D.

A short commentary that offers only conclusions is not going to be taken seriously as a book for restructuring economic theory and practice. Two hundred or so pages of brief conclusions can be dismissed as a list of unsubstantiated speculations. I wrote this large book in order to substantiate my opinions. A commentator should include reasons for his exclusions: why he rejected other possible interpretations and applications. He must show what he believes to be true, but he must also show clearly what he is not saying, so as to avoid confusion after he is dead and gone. This requires large commentaries. Those who are serious about understanding the Bible and then applying it to this world require books as large as this one. Those who are not equally serious are not my targeted audience. Besides, such people will not read a book this large.

Boundaries and Dominion does things that normal Bible commentaries seldom do. First, it applies biblical texts to the modern world—specifically, to economics and law. Second, it cites the opinions of non-Christians who have reached either similar or rival conclusions regarding the judicial issues that Leviticus deals with. Third, it offers examples from history about how societies have enforced or failed to enforce these laws, and what the results were. Fourth, it offers the logic and evidence that led to practical conclusions. The reader can evaluate for himself my reasoning process, law by law.

The Book of Leviticus is not understood by Christians, not obeyed by Jews, and not taken seriously by anyone else. For example, Christians do not understand the five Levitical sacrifices, Jews do not offer them, and everyone else thinks of them as archaic, barbaric, or both. Then there is the factor of the higher criticism of the Bible, which first began getting a hearing by a handful of New England scholars in the United States in the first half of the 1800s. But interest in higher criticism faded in New England during the Civil War (1861–65).⁸ Then, independent of the moribund New England critical tradition, it revived in the mid-1870s and spread rapidly among German-educated American theologians.⁹ Today, most of the very few scholars who pay attention to Leviticus adhere to the interpretive principles of higher criticism. They assume that the Old Testament is the product of several centuries of highly successful forgers.¹⁰ I do not.

8. Jerry Wayne Brown, The Rise of Biblical Criticism in America, 1800–1870: The New England Scholars (Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1969), p. 8.

9. Thomas H. Olbricht, "Rhetoric in the Higher Criticism Controversy," in Paul H. Boase (ed.), The Rhetoric of Protest and Reform, 1878–1898 (Athens, Ohio: Ohio University Press, 1980), p. 285; Walter F. Petersen, "American Protestantism and the Higher Criticism," Wisconsin Academy of Sciences, Arts and Letters, L (1961), p. 321.

But the question remains: How should we interpret this difficult book? Are there principles of interpretation—a hermeneutic—that enable us to understand it correctly and apply it to our social problems?

1. Five Examples

There is more to the texts of Leviticus than meets the eye on first reading, or even second reading. The size of this commentary indicates just how much more. Let me offer the five Levitical sacrifices as examples. Here are a few one-sentence conclusions stemming from the five Levitical sacrifices. As you will see from these summaries, conclusions are not sufficient. Exegesis is required.

Whole Burnt Offering. There are limits on man's sacrifice, yet a perfect sacrifice is required. There is no autonomy of possessions. God imposed an economic loss: a sacrifice. God's mercy requires sacrifice on the part of the recipient. There is a hierarchy of debt in life: I owe God; someone owes me; therefore, he owes God. These debt laws remain in force in the New Covenant. Economic theory must begin with the Bible if the—is to be restrained.

Meal Offering. Being a priest adds to a man's responsibility. Authority is hierarchical. Leaven was prohibited on the altar: a symbol of completion in history. Salt was mandatory on the altar: a symbol of permanent destruction.

Peace Offering. The peace offering was the premier boundary offering. Leaven was required. Eating fat was a blessing. Leaven, law, and dominion are linked. The peace offering was not the predecessor of the Lord's Supper. The peace offering was voluntary. The New Covenant is more rigorous than the Old Covenant. Offerings above the tithe are peace offerings.

Sin (Purification) Offering. This sacrifice points to corporate responsibility. Priestly sins are the greatest threat to a biblically covenanted society. Biblical authority is through the people. This sacrifice mandated a theocratic republic. Modern political theory dismisses adultery as politically irrelevant. The church is more important than the state.

Guilt (Reparation) Offering. The tithe is the equivalent of share-cropping. God favors private ownership. The free market pressures producers to count costs. God's economic sanctions are proportional to personal wealth.

10. See Appendix I: "Conspiracy, Forgery, and Higher Criticism."

I consider many other applications in chapters 1–7. Thirty chapters plus 9 appendixes follow these initial seven chapters. This is not the place to summarize all of them, but, as in the case of the five Levitical sacrifices, there are many practical applications that follow from these case laws. These applications are not intuitive. People who want to understand ancient Israel must become familiar with these case laws and their applications. So do people who want to be faithful to God today.

2. A Question of Trust

Because I really do expect some parts of Leviticus to be applied to modern life some day, I could not adopt the standard commentator's implicit assurance to his readers: "Trust me." The stakes are too high. A serious reader of a serious subject should not be asked to take the author's word for anything. This rule applies to Bible commentaries. The author should be expected to spell out in detail both his reasoning and his evidence; conclusions alone are not sufficient. Only if a commentator expects nothing in a biblical text to be applicable in the real world should he expect his readers to trust him.

The problem is not simply that the reader has been asked previously to trust the commentators. He has also been told to distrust the Mosaic law. First, dispensational commentators have argued that the Mosaic law is in a kind of suspended animation until Jesus returns in person to establish His earthly millennial kingdom. This exclusion includes even the Ten Commandments.¹¹ Second, higher critics of the Bible for over two centuries have argued that the Pentateuch is unreliable judicially because Moses did not really write it; instead, lots of anonymous authors wrote it. Third, Protestant theologians for almost five centuries have denied that the Old Covenant provides moral and judicial standards for personal and corporate sanctification. Fourth, Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox theologians for a millennium and a half have substituted the legal categories of Greek philosophy, either Platonic (before the eleventh century) or Aristotelian (after the eleventh century in the West), for Old Testament law. Thus, Christians have been told for almost two millennia: “Don’t trust the Mosaic law!” So, most Christians do not trust it. Most Christian leaders not only do not trust it; they hate it. They are outraged by it. The Mosaic law is an insult to their sense of justice. They are relieved to learn that Jesus supposedly had nothing to do with it. So, it would be silly for me to say, “Trust me; the theologians are all wrong about the Mosaic law,” and then offer a 200-page commentary as evidence. Who would believe me? (Not many of them will believe this fat commentary, but at least it will be more difficult for honest critics to dismiss it as obviously incomplete.)

11. S. Lewis Johnson, "The Paralysis of Legalism," Bibliotheca Sacra, Vol. 116 (April/ June 1963).

D. Short Commentaries and Judicial Relativism

There are at least three reasons why we have short Bible commentaries today: (1) modern Christian readers do not read very much, and certainly not long books filled with detailed arguments, let alone footnotes; (2) modern Christian scholars do not expect their conclusions to be applied to society, so they announce their conclusions rather than defend them in detail; and (3) nobody wants the responsibility of applying biblical texts to the contemporary world.

In a time of widespread apostasy and imminent judgment, silence is the preferred stance of God’s people: “And Elijah came unto all the people, and said, How long halt ye between two opinions? if the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word” (I Kings 18:21). Why such silence? Because God’s covenant people see themselves as outnumbered: “Then said Elijah unto the people, I, even I only, remain a prophet of the LORD; but Baal’s prophets are four hundred and fifty men” (I Kings 18:22). God’s people do not like the visible odds, nor did prophets. Judicial silence seems safer, though not for prophets. The covenant-keeper asks himself: “Why bring a covenant lawsuit against a majority of voters? It is better to remain silent, even if this means booking passage on a summer cruise to Tarshish.”

One result of this outlook is short Bible commentaries. I did not write this commentary to meet the needs of those readers who prefer short commentaries. If Christians are ever to become doers of the word and not hearers only, they need someone to tell them exactly what the word requires them to do, and why. Leviticus tells Christians what they should still be doing.

“That’s just your opinion,” some critic may respond. Yes, sir, it is indeed my opinion. The far more relevant question readers need to answer is this: Is it also God's opinion? If every controversial statement in this commentary is automatically dismissed as “just one person's opinion,” this implies that all controversial opinions in this life are judicially irrelevant. How about this controversial opinion? “Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled” (Matt. 5:17–19). Or this one? “He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him” (John 3:36). But, as the Pharisees said in effect to Jesus: “That's just your opinion. Who are you to say?” This persuaded them that God's judgment was not coming. But in A.D. 70, judgment finally did come.¹²

E. Homosexuality and Hermeneutics

There can be no doubt that the Bible is absolutely hostile to homosexuality. Jewish author Dennis Prager has minced no words: “. . . my religion not only prohibits homosexuality, it unequivocally, unambiguously, and in the strongest language at its disposal, condemns it.”¹³ He correctly pointed to the Bible's absolute break with any conception—literal or figurative—of God as a sexual being. “The first thing the Hebrew Bible did was to desexualize God: ‘In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth’—by His will, not through any sexual behavior. This was an utterly radical break with all religion, and it alone changed human history. The gods of virtually all civilizations engaged in sexual activity. The gods of Babylon, Canaan, Egypt, Greece, and Rome were, in fact, extremely promiscuous, both with other gods and with mortals.”¹⁴ In the case of Egypt, he said, homosexuality with a god was the mark of a man's lack of fear of that god. One Egyptian coffin text reads: “Atum has no power over me, for I copulate between his buttocks.”¹⁵ This attitude of defiance—the professed lack of any fear of God—is basic to all homosexuality.

12. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>); The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

13. Dennis Prager, “Homosexuality, the Bible, and us—a Jewish Perspective,” The Public Interest (Summer 1993), p. 61.

14. Ibid., p. 63.

15. David Greenberg, The Construction of Homosexuality (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988), cited in ibid., p. 64.

1. Gomes vs. Moses

The New York Times remains the most prestigious newspaper in the United States. It is sometimes referred to as America's newspaper of record. This identification is accurate. It is a thick, politically liberal,¹⁶ rhetorically bland,¹⁷ well-indexed newspaper. Its published index may be its primary strength, even more important than its widespread availability on microfilm. Historians become dependent on indexes, and the Times has always provided the best index of any American newspaper. Therefore, historians quote the Times. Therefore, it has become the nation's newspaper of record.

On the page opposite the editorial page—the famous Op-Ed page—appear essays by famous and not so famous people, usually liberals. On August 17, 1992, an article by Peter J. Gomes appeared: “Homophobic? Re-Read Your Bible.” Gomes, who died in 2011, was an ordained Baptist minister and a professor of Christian morals at Harvard University, the most prestigious university in the Western hemisphere. He is also minister of the university's Memorial Church.

Within a year of the appearance of his Op-Ed essay, the publishing firm of William Morrow/Avon paid Rev. Gomes a $350,000 advance on royalties to write a book on conservative Christianity's distortions of the Bible. Nine of the largest publishers in the United States had bid in a competitive auction for the rights to acquire this as-yet unwritten book.¹⁸ Consider the economics of such a payment. If the book sells for $20, and if Gomes received the standard author's contract of 10% of the book's retail price, the publisher will have to sell 175,000 copies—an unheard of number of copies for an unheard-of academic theologian—just to get back its advance on royalties, not counting forfeited interest income. To achieve this many sales—best-seller status—the publisher will probably have to spend far more on advertising than the author's advance, and even then the book is unlikely to sell 175,000 copies unless the media deliberately subsidize it by giving the author

16. Herman Dinsmore, All the News That Fits (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1969). Dinsmore was the editor of the international edition of the Times, 1951–60. His book's title comes from the words on the masthead of the Times: “All the News That's Fit to Print.” The word “liberal” in the United States has meant “statist” since the late nineteenth century. It meant the opposite prior to the 1890s. The transition can be dated: the 1896 Presidential campaign of Presbyterian fundamentalist and populist William Jennings Bryan.

17. Sometimes referred to as “The good, gray lady.”

18. Don Feder, “Literary limits on the right side,” Washington Times (Sept. 6, 1993), p. F4.

free television time and laudatory book reviews in prominent journals. Either Morrow/Avon was rewarding Rev. Gomes for his opinions, or else, like the other publishing houses, the firm expected substantial support from those inside the media who share Rev. Gomes' view of homosexuality, the Bible, and conservative Christianity. The Good Book: Reading the Bible with Mind and Heart did become a best-seller. The media gave it lots of coverage, especially after Prof. Gomes revealed in the book that he was a homosexual. The book sold 250,000 copies within 10 months.¹⁹

Professor Gomes referred in his Op-Ed essay to various anti-homosexual initiatives on state ballots in 1992. He said that such initiatives are defended by Christians, who appeal to the supposedly clear texts of the Bible that condemn homosexuality. But these Christians have moral blind spots, he implied. "They do not, however, necessarily see quite as clear a meaning in biblical passages on economic conduct, the burdens of wealth and the sin of greed." An intelligent reader knows by now what is coming, and it does.

Gomes said that four biblical passages are customarily cited: Deuteronomy 23:17, I Kings 14:24, I Kings 22:46, and II Kings 23:7. He said that these passages refer to prostitution, not homosexuality. Quite true; this is why these passages are not customarily cited, contrary to Professor Gomes. The passages that are customarily cited are these: "Thou shalt not lie with mankind, as with womankind: it is abomination" (Lev. 18:22). "If a man also lie with mankind, as he lieth with a woman, both of them have committed an abomination: they shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them" (Lev. 20:13).

2. Leviticus: Automatically Dismissed

These two passages presented a problem for Professor Gomes. He referred to them in his next paragraph. But he had an answer: they are both in Leviticus, and you know what Ph.D.-holding Harvard theologians think about Leviticus! These two passages "are part of what biblical scholars call the Holiness Code. The code explicitly bans homosexual acts. But it also prohibits eating raw meat, planting two different kinds of seed in the same field and wearing garments with two different kinds of yarn. Tattoos, adultery and sexual intercourse during a woman's menstrual period are similarly outlawed." He assumed that this list somehow ended the argument. He then went to the New Testament. Such is the state of theological scholarship today in America's most honored university, founded in 1636 by Calvinist Puritans.

19. Gomes gave this statistic in an interview on the C-SPAN television network's show, "Booknotes." Booknote Transcripts (Sept. 21, 1997).

The holiness code was not taken seriously by Professor Gomes as a guide to modern behavior. I think it is safe to say that it is not taken seriously by Harvard University. What is very likely true is that it is not taken seriously by well over nine-tenths of the evangelical Christian community. This is the one of the problems that Boundaries and Dominion seeks to overcome.

Chapters 18 to 20 of Leviticus present the most detailed list of laws in the book. This section forbids sexual contacts between close relatives (18:6–20). Are these laws annulled today? Leviticus prohibits child sacrifice: passing through Molech's fire (18:21). Has this law been annulled because Molech is no longer worshipped? Leviticus prohibits theft and lying (19:11), defrauding a neighbor (19:13), and rendering unjust judgment (19:15). Are these laws also annulled? It prohibits making a prostitute of one's daughter (19:29). It prohibits the mistreatment of resident aliens (19:33–34). It prohibits false weights and measures (19:35–36). It prohibits children from cursing parents (20:9). It prohibits bestiality (20:15–16). Are these, too, merely "holiness code" artifacts?

On what biblical basis can a Christian speak of legitimate civil sanctions against homosexuality if the Book of Leviticus is automatically dismissed? Natural law? But the ancient Greeks accepted the legitimacy of homosexuality with only a few restrictions, something that is not yet taught in history textbooks,²⁰ yet they (the Hellenistic-era

20. Socrates, in the Symposium, praised the love between adult males and adolescent boys as the highest form of love, i.e., the love extended not toward very young boys "but intelligent beings whose reason is beginning to be developed, much about the time at which their beards begin to grow." This true love is demonstrated by older men's faithfulness to their adolescent lovers as the young men mature into adulthood. Socrates insisted that "the love of young boys should be forbidden by law, because their future is uncertain; they may turn out good or bad, either in body or soul, and much noble enthusiasm may be thrown away upon them; . . ." That is, adult male lovers may waste their emotions on such youths; this should be prohibited by law. Nevertheless, there should be no laws against pederasty between older men and adolescents, "for surely nothing that is decorously and lawfully done can justly be censured." He praised the laws of Elis and Boetia that governed relations among post-pubescent males, where "the law is simply in favour of these connexions, and no one, whether young or old, has anything to say to their discredit; . . ." He disparaged the laws in Ionia "and other places, and generally in countries which are subject to the barbarians, [where] the custom is held to be dishonourable. . . ." Hostility to man-adolescent homosexuality is regarded in such barbarous societies—Israel was one such society—as Stoics) invented natural law theory. So, the Christian world has a problem. The average evangelical suspects—though he is really not quite sure—that the Bible authorizes civil sanctions against homosexuality. The sanction required by Leviticus is public execution. Already, the evangelical is growing nervous. But if he repudiates the civil sanction established by Leviticus, on what biblical basis can he assert that some other civil penalty should be imposed? *By what other standard?*²¹ If he can lawfully play “pick and choose” from the texts of Leviticus, not to mention the whole of the Mosaic law, then why should he be upset with Professor Gomes? But he is.

3. Antinomianism: Liberal and Pietist

The evangelical knows there is something wrong with Gomes’ arguments. He recognizes Gomes’ rhetoric as theologically liberal: “To recover a liberating and inclusive Christ is to be freed from the semantic bondage that makes us curators of a dead culture rather than creatures of a new creation.” He knows that he and his beliefs are Gomes’ target: “Religious fundamentalism is dangerous because it cannot accept ambiguity and diversity and is therefore inherently intolerant.” Such intolerance is “dangerous” and “anti-democratic.” Anti-democratic? This begins to sound bad. The evangelical begins to shift in his chair nervously. His discomfort increases when he reads: “The same Bible that the advocates of slavery used to protect their wicked self-interests is the Bible that inspired slaves to revolt and their liberators to action.” This is a true statement regarding the history of slavery. How can a Bible-believing Christian explain what seems to be moral blindness on the question of slavery (Lev. 25:44–46)? Yet he knows there is something wrong with this statement:

threatening to political tyranny. Pederasty fosters close attachments, Socrates said, that are inimical to tyranny. “And, therefore, the ill-repute into which these attachments have fallen is to be ascribed to the evil condition of those who make them to be ill-reputed; that is to say, to the self-seeking of the governors and the cowardice of the governed; . . .” Plato, Symposium, sections 181–82, in The Dialogues of Plato, translated by Benjamin Jowett, 2 vols. (New York: Random House, [1892] 1937), I, pp. 309–10. Aristotle was somewhat less tolerant: he objected to homosexuality between older and younger men, though not between adult males generally, so long as they were not related by kinship ties. These limited objections, Barker argues, depended on “contemporary Greek notions and practices. . . .” Ernest Barker (ed.), The Politics of Aristotle (New York: Oxford University Press, [1946] 1958), p. 46n. Comment on 1262a.

21. Greg L. Bahnsen, No Other Standard: Theonomy and Its Critics (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991). (<http://bit.ly/gbnos>)

And the same Bible that on the basis of an archaic social code of ancient Israel and a tortured reading of Paul is used to condemn all homosexuals and homosexual behavior includes metaphors of redemption, renewal, inclusion and love—principles that invite homosexuals to accept their freedom and responsibility in Christ and demands that their fellow Christians accept them as well.

What can the typical evangelical say in response? He, too, believes that Leviticus promoted “an archaic social code.” It also established laws that seem to have been annulled, such as the laws of separating seeds in the same field or avoiding clothing made of both wool and linen. Is the social code of Leviticus inextricably tied to such laws of separation? If so, how can this social code be honored today? If not, how can we separate the still-valid social code from the annulled laws? Gomes put it well: “The questions are, By what principle of interpretation do we proceed, and by what means do we reconcile ‘what it meant then’ to ‘what it means now?’” Here he was on target. These are the two absolutely fundamental questions of biblical interpretation (hermeneutics) that I have sought to answer in this commentary and in my previous commentaries. These are the two questions that deliberately have been left unanswered by Protestant commentators on the Old Testament ever since the Reformation. It is time to begin answering both of them.

4. Michener vs. Moses

On March 30, 1993, best-selling American novelist James Michener followed up on Gomes’ essay with a similar one: “God Is Not a Homophobe,” which also appeared on the Op-Ed page. This article was published two months after newly inaugurated President Bill Clinton announced his intention, as Commander-in-Chief, to remove all restrictions against homosexuals serving in the military. Michener, like Gomes, cited Leviticus 20:13. He, too, dismissed this law as no longer relevant. He invoked the same line of reasoning: changing times. The Hebrews “lived in a rude, brutal, almost uncivilized place where abominations abounded. To read the list of the things the Jews were enjoined to stop doing is to realize that God had to be unusually strict with such an undisciplined mob.” Their society was in “deplorable disarray.” He continued: “As order was installed, the extreme penalties advocated in Leviticus were relaxed in the civilized nations that followed. . . . Western society, reacting in its own way, has advanced far beyond the primitive days of Leviticus.” Pity the primitive Israelites!

It was the residents of the city-states of Canaan who practiced such abominations, just as the Athenian Greeks did in Plato’s era, over a millennium later. It was not because Israel was “primitive” that God declared His law and its morally appropriate civil sanction. Israel was not primitive. Israel was God’s agent to establish a new civilization in Canaan. God announced this law because He despises homosexuality and homosexuals. He hates the sin and also the unrepentant sinner. He does not hate the sin and love the sinner. He hates the sin and hates the sinner. This is why there is a hell: God hates unrepentant sinners. God is indeed a homophobe. He hates the practice and those who practice it, which is why He destroyed Sodom. God warned Israel: practice such an abomination, and the land will vomit you out, just as it vomited out its former inhabitants (Lev. 18:24–29).²² But modern God-haters pay no attention to the written text of God’s revelation, except to ridicule it or reinterpret it to confirm their immoral ways. God’s revealed law is irrelevant in modern times, they insist. Christians answer that AIDS is not irrelevant.

Michener went on: “So when zealots remind us that the Bible said male homosexuals should be put to death rather than be admitted to the armed forces, it is proper to reply: ‘You are correct that Leviticus says that. But it also has an enormous number of edicts, which have had to be modified as we became civilized.’” Here we see cultural relativism applied to ethics: a form of social evolutionism. But is Michener’s line of reasoning different in principle from the arguments of Christian antinomians who dismiss the laws of Leviticus with an almost equally intense hatred? Is his hermeneutic fundamentally different from theirs? More to the point, is his hermeneutic fundamentally different from yours?

F. Dispensationalism’s Dilemma: Bahnsen or Gomes?

Modern fundamentalists are generally dispensationalists. They argue that Old Testament laws are no longer in force, unless the New Testament reaffirms them. This has led to numerous problems for dispensational theologians in the field of ethics.

22. Chapter 10.

1. The Feinbergs

Dispensational scholars John and Paul Feinberg issued a hermeneutical challenge in 1993: “The evangelical must decide which rules as stated in Scripture apply to our own day, and he must know how to decide which apply.”²³ They were correct; the evangelical is morally bound to do this. He will resist doing this as long as he can, however. Evangelicals sense where such questions lead: toward self-conscious antinomianism, or self-conscious compromise with humanism, or self-conscious theonomy. The more socially relevant they want to be, the more the first choice is closed to them. They did not want to join dispensational author Dave Hunt in a spiritual and intellectual campground for Protestant pietists and mystics.²⁴

As dispensationalists, the Feinbergs denied any mandatory judicial continuity between the Old Testament’s civil law and today, since New Testament life “is not life under a theocracy.”²⁵ This is the most important statement for social ethics that any anti-theonomic Christian can assert. But until it is proven exegetically, it remains only an assertion. I ask: Would any Christian assert the same anti-theocratic²⁶ thesis with respect to the family covenant under God and the church covenant under God? If not, then on what judicial basis is such a statement correct regarding the civil covenant under God? An appeal to Western history since, say, 1788 (United States) or 1789 (France), begs the judicial question. What must be proven is their assertion that the New Testament “assumes that believers will be under the political rule of non-believing rulers. . . .”²⁷ That the New Testament makes provision for such a calamity there can be no doubt; but what is the evidence that Jesus and the New Testament authors assumed that this is an eschatologically permanent condition throughout history? Where is it implied in Scripture that Nero’s Rome—or Julian the Apostate’s—is inevitable eschatologically and therefore binding judicially (or vice versa), whereas Constantine’s Rome—or Theodosius’—is a departure from New Testament judicial standards? Why should John Calvin’s

23. John S. Feinberg and Paul D. Feinberg, Ethics for a Brave New World (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1993), p. 33.

24. On Hunt’s pietism, see Gary DeMar and Peter Leithart, The Reduction of Christianity: A Biblical Response to Dave Hunt (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gdmplreduction>)

25. Feinbergs, Ethics, p. 36.

26. Theocracy is defined as “God rules.”

27. Ibid., p. 37.

Geneva be dismissed as a covenantal deviation in civil government? Is Stalin's Russia to be accepted on principle as having conformed far closer than Calvin's Geneva to the covenantally binding New Testament standard with respect to its official source of civil law? These are not merely rhetorical questions. They deserve straightforward answers, but I do not think I will see any straightforward answers in the books and journals of Christian political pluralists.²⁸

The Feinbergs argued: "It is inconsistent to say the Church is governed by the New Covenant when it comes to salvation, but by the Mosaic Code (and Covenant) when it comes to law."²⁹ This is quite true—as true as it is irrelevant to the theological point they are trying to make. I ask: What orthodox Christian theologian has ever argued that the Old Covenant had a way of salvation different from the New Covenant? Paul cited Habakkuk 2:4: "The just shall live by faith" (Gal. 3:11b). Lutheran scholar and theologian Robert G. Hoerber put the issue well: "... there is no evidence in the Old Testament or in Judaism that Jews believed that good works merit salvation. . . . The Jews observed the ceremonial laws of the Old Testament in order to belong to God's people, not to earn salvation."³⁰ The Feinbergs continued: "A discontinuity position avoids this problem"—a non-existent, utterly bizarre theological problem of their own invention—"by claiming that the Church is governed by the New Covenant as to salvation and by the Law of Christ as to law."³¹

2. Judicial Content

The three-fold ethical problem that a "discontinuity theologian" has to answer (and steadfastly refuses to) is this: (1) show exegetically why, where, and how "the Law of Christ" is different in content from the law of Moses; (2) discuss the biblically binding judicial content of this new law-order; (3) do this without abandoning the very concept of a unique biblical ethics, i.e., without surrendering civil law to covenant-breakers. The Christian world has been waiting patiently since 1830 for a dispensational theologian to write a book on New Testament social ethics—a book based exclusively on "the Law of Christ." This is a long time to wait. Frankly, I do not think the book is ever go-

28. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

29. Feinbergs, Ethics, p. 37.

30. Robert G. Hoerber, "Minors and Majors," Christian News (Oct. 4, 1993), p. 19.

31. Feinbergs, Ethics, p. 37.

ing to appear.

The Feinbergs understood their problem: identifying the biblical source of judicial content. Is it in the Old Testament, the New Testament, or both? They asserted: “Where the content of the Mosaic Law, for example, and the Law of Christ overlap, appeal to the OT is proper.”³² This appeal to overlapping content is judicially and theologically irrelevant on dispensational terms. There is no reason, given their view of the law, to appeal to Moses if Christ has affirmed a particular law. The Mosaic law is superfluous, dispensationally speaking. It is either annulled or else merely supplemental and non-binding. I ask: Exactly where are these New Testament principles of civil law affirmed and developed in detail comparable to the Mosaic case laws? The Feinbergs knew: nowhere.

They repeatedly tried to escape this embarrassing problem. For example, they tried to identify a New Testament passage that forthrightly affirms capital punishment. They appealed to Romans 13:1–7 (which does not mention capital punishment) and also appeal back to Noah (Gen. 9:5–6).³³ But what, on their presupposition, has Moses got to do with either passage? Dispensationalists House and Ice rejected all appeals to the Mosaic law in search of capital crimes; they appeal solely to the Noachic Covenant. The nations are (they used the present tense) under the Noachic Covenant, not the Mosaic.³⁴ But the only crime mentioned to Noah was the shedding of human blood. Try to build a civilization on just one civil law. It cannot be done.

3. Hermeneutics and Abortion

In their desire to become socially relevant dispensationalists—a self-conscious break with American dispensationalism, 1925 to 1975—the Feinbergs could let the matter rest here. They wanted to say something biblically relevant against abortion. They therefore broke with Dallas Seminary and Talbot Seminary, both of which had remained deathly silent on this topic. They turned to a case law of Exodus to affirm their commitment to the anti-abortion movement. They had a problem: the only place in all the Bible that clearly sets forth a law against abortion is Exodus 21:22–25. So, rather than declare their hostility to abortion based on an unswerving commitment to a Mosaic

32. Ibid., p. 39.

33. Idem.

34. H. Wayne House and Thomas D. Ice, Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse? (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah Press, 1988), p. 130.

law, they declared their willingness to accept a Mosaic law because of their hostility to abortion.

For example, nowhere in the NT does one find the specific regulations of Exod 21:22–25 that protect pregnant women and their unborn children. Those ordinances are part of the Mosaic Code but are not part of the NT Law of Christ. On the other hand, as we shall argue when discussing abortion, proper understanding of that passage shows it to be one of the strongest passages of Scripture defending the rights of pregnant women and unborn children. Given that fact, it seems proper to appeal to it as indicating God's attitude toward any kind of harm to the unborn, including abortion. Since nothing in the NT suggests that God's attitude toward the unborn has changed, the OT passage is relevant for determining God's attitude toward the unborn and for demanding protection of them.³⁵

This surrendered their hermeneutic. They began this section of their book by rejecting Bahnsen's statement of the theonomic position, namely, "that unless Scripture shows change with respect to OT law, NT era believers should assume it is still in force."³⁶ Bahnsen did indeed teach this; this is his theonomic hermeneutic: the presumption of judicial continuity. Yet they defended their appeal to a Mosaic case law on this same basis: "Since nothing in the NT suggests that God's attitude toward the unborn has changed, the OT passage is relevant for determining God's attitude toward the unborn and for demanding protection of them." That is to say, they adopted Bahnsen's hermeneutic as the only one that could deliver them, in the name of the Bible, into the camp of the pro-life movement.

In July, 1970, over two years before the United States Supreme Court handed down the Roe v. Wade decision, which legalized abortions on demand, Rushdoony challenged the church to return to Exodus 21:22–25 as the basis of its opposition to abortion. Anything less, he warned, has led in the past to compromises with paganism on this question. He wrote:

Among the earliest battle-lines between the early Christians and the Roman Empire was the matter of abortion, Greek and Roman laws had at times forbidden abortion, even as they had also permitted it. The matter was regarded by these pagan cultures as a question of state policy: if the state wanted births, abortion was a crime against the state; if the state had no desire for the birth of certain children, abortion was either permissible or even required. Because the state represented ultimate order, morality was what the state decreed. To abort or not to abort was thus a question of politics, not of God's law. Plato, for example, held that the state could compel abortion where unapproved parents proceeded without the approval of the state.

35. Feinbergs, Ethics, p. 39.

36. Ibid., p. 34.

Very early, the Christians accused the heathen of murder, holding that abortion is a violation of God's law, "Thou shalt not murder." It was also a violation of the law of Exodus 21:22–25, which held that even accidental abortion was a criminal offense. If a woman with child were accidentally aborted, but no harm followed to either mother or child, even then a fine was mandatory. If the foetus died, then the death penalty was mandatory.

Because the law of the Roman Empire did not regard abortion as a crime, the early church imposed a life sentence as a substitute: penance for life, to indicate that it was a capital offence. The Council of Ancrya, 314 A.D., while making note of this earlier practice, limited the penance to ten years. There were often reversions to the earlier severity, and for a time, in later years, the administration of any draught for purposes of causing an abortion were punishable by death. The Greek and Roman influence tended to weaken the Christian stand by sophisticating the question, by trying to establish when the child or foetus could be considered a living soul. The Biblical law does not raise such questions: at any point, abortion requires the death penalty.³⁷

The leaders of conservative Protestant churches in the United States remained prophetically silent when Roe v. Wade was handed down on January 22, 1973. The conservative seminaries also remained silent. (They still remain silent.) When, half a decade later, a few fundamentalist leaders began, very tentatively, to get involved in the pro-life movement, they sought a biblical justification for this move into social activism. This raised a major theological problem, one which none of them is ever forthright enough to admit in public. By acknowledging that Exodus 21:22–25 is the only biblical law prohibiting abortion, they would have had to admit that Rushdoony had already pre-empted the position because of his view of the continuity of the Mosaic law. They understood that to appeal to Exodus 21:22–25 is to invoke the theonomic hermeneutic. They have generally feared to do this. The Feinbergs were an exception, and the results were intellectually embarrassing. They offered no explanation for their abandonment of dispensationalism's hermeneutic: the presumption of judicial discontinuity.

37. Chalcedon Report (July 1, 1970). Reprinted in R. J. Rushdoony, The Roots of Reconstruction (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1991), p. 710.

Today, many Christian anti-abortionists blithely assert that "abortion is murder." We theonomists ask them a question: What is the biblically mandatory civil penalty for murder? They see a terrifying chasm opening up before them. They refuse to combine their pro-capital punishment stance with respect to murder—a biblically correct connection—with their rhetoric about abortion's being murder. If they did, they would have to call for legislation demanding the future execution of physicians, nurses, and former mothers who have been lawfully convicted of having participated in an abortion. So, they either remain silent or judicially schizophrenic on this issue. They do not take the Bible's mandated sanctions seriously. They do not even take their own rhetoric seriously. Not surprisingly, the politicians see no need to take them seriously. Abortion continues to be legal.

The self-contradictory hermeneutic of the two Feinbergs is a visible result of the fundamentalists' long-term judicial dilemma. They want judicial continuity when convenient (e.g., anti-abortion), while rejecting judicial continuity when inconvenient (e.g., anti-Bahnsen). They cannot have it both ways. Step by step, fundamentalists and evangelicals are being forced to choose between Bahnsen's hermeneutic and Gomes' hermeneutic. They are willing to do almost anything, such as write theologically befuddled books, to defer this decision.

Conclusion

In 1993, Simon & Schuster, a major publishing firm, released an updated version of Ernest Sutherland Bates' 1936 expurgated version of the King James Bible. The text is 1,248 pages long. Approximately two and a quarter pages comprise Leviticus. It is the shortest book in Bates' text until he reaches the minor prophets.

Boundaries and Dominion is longer than Bates' text for the entire Bible. Why should anyone struggle through a book as large as this one? It is not easy reading. It surely was not easy writing. What possible benefits are likely to offset the large investment cost of forfeited time: mine (past) and the reader's (future)? For most readers, the costs are far higher than the prospective gains. They will not even begin.

Few people are sufficiently interested in the Bible to read it cover to cover. Of those who are this interested in the Bible, few are interested in the Old Testament. Of those interested in the Old Testament, few (including pastors) are interested in theology.³⁸ Of those who are interested in theology, few are interested in biblical law. Of those who are interested in biblical law, few are interested in Mosaic laws that are no longer in force. In this commentary, I show why most of the economic laws in Leviticus are no longer in force.

Then why spend so much time, space, and money to prove my point in a period of history in which hardly any Christian assumes that any of these laws are still in force? Answer: because Christians need a principle of biblical interpretation to sift through the laws of the Bible. Without such a sifting principle—a hermeneutic—Christians risk falling into one of two disastrous errors: legalism-Phariseeism or antinomianism. A careful study of no other biblical book is better calculated to force Christian interpreters to discover and then apply a principle of biblical judicial interpretation. Leviticus is the hard case, judicially speaking. Get through Leviticus intact, and the other 65 books of the Bible become comparatively smooth sailing.

There is another issue to consider. Some of the laws of Leviticus are still binding. Which ones? This is a difficult question to answer, but Christians need to find the correct answer. This, too, requires a hermeneutic: a consistent, coherent principle of biblical judicial interpretation that enables us to study other books of the Bible and other case laws. A serious Bible commentary on the Mosaic law should instruct the reader on how to do this work of interpretation. Very few commentaries on the Old Testament do this.

There is an old saying: “Give a man a fish, and you have fed him for a day. Teach him to fish, and you have fed him for a lifetime.” This principle of feeding always holds true, at least until the fish give out. In biblical interpretation, the fish will never give out. Finite minds will never succeed in exhausting the potential of infinite projects. The work of interpretation and application must go on. It is therefore not sufficient for me to present a series of conclusions. The reader deserves to know how a commentator reached his or her conclusions. This is why Boundaries and Dominion is so large. I show you how I came to my conclusions. Go, and do thou likewise.

Let me state the obvious: this is a Bible commentary. It is not a treatise on economics. It was written one chapter at a time; it should be read the same way. A commentary is supposed to throw light on specific verses or passages. Because the Book of Leviticus is structured in terms of a unifying concept—boundaries—this commentary can be read cover to cover, but most readers will probably confine themselves to specific chapters.³⁹ In any case, the reader should recall what I wrote about my original commentary on Exodus 21–23, Tools of Dominion: you eat an elephant one bite at a time.

38. David F. Wells, No Place for Truth; or Whatever Happened to Evangelical Theology? (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1993).

This commentary is aimed at economists, who in my day are unlikely to pay any attention. It is aimed at pastors, who rarely read long books, especially on economics. Most of all, it is aimed at intellectually serious Bible students who have not yet decided what their callings in life should be.⁴⁰ I hope this book will give them a larger picture of what full-time Christian service really is. They, too, can devote their lives to discovering what God requires from His people, and then try to persuade Christians to believe a word of it—a seemingly foolish task, indeed, if there were not covenantal sanctions in history. But there are: positive and negative. The positive sanctions are wonderful, but seeking to avoid the negative sanctions is imperative.

I know, I know: that's just my opinion.

39. This is why there is occasional repetition in subsequent chapters. Few commentaries ever get read cover to cover. This one, being digital, does not even have covers.

40. They may have occupations. These jobs are rarely their callings. I define a person's calling as follows: "The most important lifetime service that he can render to God in which he would be most difficult to replace."

PREFACE

And further, by these, my son, be admonished: of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh (Eccl. 12:12).

When I began writing my economic commentary on the Bible in the spring of 1973,¹ I did not imagine that it would take me over two decades just to begin Numbers. When I escalated my time commitment to the project in the fall of 1977 to 10 hours per week, 50 weeks per year, I also did not imagine that it would take this long. I did not imagine that I would write such lengthy appendixes as Dominion and Common Grace, Is the World Running Down?, Political Polytheism, and Millennialism and Social Theory. But most remarkable of all, I did not imagine that a 27-year task to complete the Pentateuch turned out to be the world's longest footnote to another man's thesis: Ray Sutton's 1987 elaboration of the Bible's five-point covenant structure.² The five points of the biblical covenant model are:

1. Transcendence/immanence/sovereignty
2. Hierarchy/representation/authority
3. Ethics/boundaries/dominion
4. Oath/judgment/sanctions
5. Succession/inheritance/continuity

The acronym in English is THEOS, the Greek word for God.

I am not alone in my surprise. When I hired David Chilton to write a commentary on the Book of Revelation, neither of us imagined that his Days of Vengeance (1987) would also wind up as an eloquent footnote to Sutton's That You May Prosper (1987), but it did.³ Prior to Sut-

1. The first chapter was published in the Chalcedon Report in May, 1973.

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

3. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

ton's application, Chilton had been totally bogged down for over a year, unable to complete the book's manuscript. After he heard Sutton present his discovery at a Wednesday evening Bible study that he and I attended in 1985, Chilton re-structured the manuscript, added some new material, and completed it within a few months. Today, a quarter century after its publication, critics have not yet attempted to refute Chilton's book, let alone Sutton's. (Note: a brief negative book review is not a refutation. Rather, it is a public notice of the need for one.)

While I have never been bogged down with any volume in this set of economic commentaries, there is no doubt that Tools of Dominion, Boundaries and Dominion, and Inheritance and Dominion would have looked very different if Sutton had not made his discovery, and I had not grasped its importance for my work. The five points of the biblical covenant are crucial for understanding Leviticus.

A. The Pentateuch's Five-Point Covenant Structure

As far as I am aware, what no one had seen—or at least no one had published—when I began this commentary project in 1973 is this: the Pentateuch is structured in terms of the Bible's five-point covenant model. I recognized this structure of the five books of Moses only after I had finished reading (as I recall) the third draft of Sutton's manuscript. My discovery forced me to think through my strategy for the entire commentary. I wrote a Preface at the last minute for The Sinai Strategy (1986),⁴ introducing the five-point model. Then I wrote a General Introduction to the entire economic commentary series in the second edition of The Dominion Covenant: Genesis (1987).⁵

Honest critics who reject Sutton's thesis will eventually have to take into account my commentaries and the support volumes I have published. (Dishonest critics will, as usual, murmur in private to their students that nothing has been proven, that this model is all smoke and mirrors. But I am confident that they will not go into print on this, also as usual.)⁶ Here is the five-point outline of the Pentateuch:

1. Genesis

Genesis clearly is a book dealing with God's transcendence. Tran-

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2: Decalogue and Dominion (1990).

5. Now titled Sovereignty and Dominion (2012).

6. See Appendix I: "Critics of the Five-Point Covenant Model."

scendence is point one of the biblical covenant model. The opening words of Genesis affirm God as Creator, testifying to God's absolute transcendence, the foundation of the Creator-creature distinction: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. 1:1). God established a hierarchy through His covenant: mankind over nature (Gen. 1:26–28), each man ruling over his wife (Gen. 2:18). He gave them a law: no eating from the prohibited tree (Gen. 2:17a). He promised to bring judgment against them if they disobeyed (Gen. 2:17b). They violated His law, but out of His grace, God promised them an heir (Gen. 3:15). Here are the five points of the biblical covenant model.

What is the story of Abraham all about? It is the story of a promise that was sealed by a covenant act and sign (circumcision). Tribal Israel's story is one of covenant-breaking, God's negative sanctions, and the renewal of Abraham's covenant. Genesis ends with Jacob's verbal blessings and cursings on his sons. Jacob transferred the inheritance, tribe by tribe. Then he died. But, above all, Genesis is the story of God the absolutely sovereign Creator and providential Sustainer of history, the transcendent God who has revealed Himself to His people.

2. Exodus

Exodus is clearly the book of the covenant itself. "And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the LORD hath said will we do, and be obedient" (Ex. 24:7). "And the king commanded all the people, saying, Keep the passover unto the LORD your God, as it is written in the book of this covenant" (II Kings 23:21). God established His authority over the Israelites by delivering them out of Egypt. This is what Kline calls historical prologue: point two of the covenant.⁷ But what did the historical prologue of an ancient covenant treaty affirm? Hierarchy: the power of the king over all of his rivals. Exodus was written to prove that God was above Pharaoh in history. Hierarchy, not historical prologue, is the heart of point two of the biblical covenant model.

God brought visible historical sanctions against Egypt. This was evidence of His covenantal authority in history. Deny God's predictable covenantal corporate sanctions in New Covenant history, and you necessarily deny the historical prologue aspect of the New Covenant. You reduce the rule of the God of the New Testament to the status of a supreme ruler of a priestly hierarchy. You deny His kingly authority. This is what Kline did with his theory of the Mosaic Covenant as an intrusion—an ethical discontinuity—that pointed to God’s final judgment, therefore (???) having no judicial relevance in the New Covenant era. Specifically, the covenant’s negative sanctions, revealed in the imprecatory psalms, led to Kline’s neo-dispensational ethical theory.⁸ This leaves Christians at the mercy of a divine State—the divine rule of politics. It leaves them without any possibility of constructing either a systematically biblical political theory or a broader Christian social theory.⁹

7. Meredith G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy: Studies and Commentary (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963), pp. 52–61: "Historical Prologue: Covenant History, 1:6–4:49."

One important implication of point two is that God has established the hierarchical principle of judicial representation. The principle of representation began in Exodus with God’s call to Moses out of the burning bush, telling him to go before Pharaoh as His representative. God delivered the Israelites from Egypt, and then He met with Moses, their representative, at Sinai. In Exodus 18, Moses established a hierarchical civil appeals court system, whereupon God met with Moses as Israel’s representative and delivered His covenant law. The Book of Exodus is a book about rival kings and rival kingdoms, God vs. Pharaoh.¹⁰ Men must subordinate themselves either to God or Satan through their covenantal representatives.

The Book of Exodus is easily divided into five sections: (1) the intervention of God into history to deliver His people; (2) the establishment of Israel’s civil judicial hierarchy; (3) the giving of the law; (4) the judgment of Israel after the golden calf incident; and (5) the building of the tabernacle, which they would carry with them into Canaan. Also,

8. Meredith G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 161–67. Kline argues that God’s sanctions in history today are covenantally unpredictable. Kline, “Comments on an Old-New Error,” Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

9. This is why pietists and dispensationalists of all kinds, including Kline’s followers, are so hostile to theonomy. It is not just because of theonomy’s theology of the covenant but also because of its necessary application: the construction a revelational social theory based on God’s corporate sanctions in history and theonomy’s demand that the state impose the Mosaic civil sanctions. This is an affront to the modern state and modern politics, and Protestant pietists have had an operational alliance with modern politics for over three centuries based on Roger Williams’ theory of pluralism and the secular state. On this alliance, see Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gn-polpol>)

10. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 1: Representation and Dominion (1985).

the Ten Commandments are divided into two sets of five points, each set paralleling Sutton's five-point model.¹¹ The first commandment, honoring God, is paralleled by the sixth commandment, the prohibition against murdering man. Man is made in God's image. The fifth commandment, honoring father and mother (household priests), has to do with succession: that we may live long lives in God's land. The tenth commandment, the prohibition against covetousness, also has to do with succession: not desiring to appropriate another person's inheritance.

3. Leviticus

Leviticus is the book that established Israel's ritual and moral boundaries. It is therefore a book about dominion, for boundaries in the Bible are always associated with dominion. The third point of the biblical covenant model deals with boundaries. Similarly, the third commandment deals with the proper use of God's name in our dealings with each other, thereby affirming an ownership boundary surrounding God's name, implying dominion through ethics,¹² and the eighth commandment parallels the third, for it is law three in the second list of five. "Thou shalt not steal" is a command regarding legal boundaries.¹³ The eighth commandment indicates that the concept of boundaries is basic to economic ethics, the third point of the covenant.¹⁴ The fifth commandment is "Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee." This is a law of inheritance: point five.¹⁵

Gordon Wenham commented on Leviticus' place in the Old Testament's covenant-treaty structure: "(3) The centerpiece of every treaty was the stipulations section. In collections of law, such as Hammurabi's, the laws formed the central section. The same holds for the biblical collections of law. In the treaties a basic stipulation of total fidelity to the suzerain may be distinguished from the more detailed stipulations covering specific problems. In this terminology 'Be holy' could be

11. Ibid., Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion, Preface.

12. Ibid., ch. 23.

13. Ibid., ch. 28.

14. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>) described as the basic stipulation of Leviticus. The other laws explain what this means in different situations.”¹⁶ Leviticus is literally the center of the Pentateuch: two books precede it; two books follow it.

15. I conclude that the Catholic and Lutheran structuring of the Ten Commandments is incorrect. Calvin was correct: "honor thy father and mother" is the fifth commandment.

God sets apart His people and their worship. He makes them holy—set apart. He places ritual boundaries around them. “Leviticus centers around the concept of the holiness of God, and how an unholy people can acceptably approach Him and then remain in continued fellowship. The way to God is only through blood sacrifice, and the walk with God is only through obedience to His laws.”¹⁷ The issue is sanctification, and this requires boundaries: “The Israelites serve a holy God who requires them to be holy as well. To be holy means to be ‘set apart’ or ‘separated.’ They are to be separated from other nations unto God. In Leviticus the idea of holiness appears eighty-seven times, sometimes indicating ceremonial holiness (ritual requirements), and at other times moral holiness (purity of life).”¹⁸ R. K. Harrison wrote that the first 15 chapters deal with sacrificial principles and procedures relating to the removal of sin. “The last eleven chapters emphasize ethics, morality and holiness. The unifying theme of the book is the insistent emphasis upon God’s holiness, coupled with the demand that the Israelites shall exemplify this spiritual attribute in their own lives.”¹⁹ Holiness means separation from the heathen.²⁰ It means boundaries.

4. Numbers

Numbers is the book of God’s judgment against Israel in the wilderness. Judgment is point four of the biblical covenant model: God’s response to oath-keeping or oath-breaking. God judged them when they refused to accept the testimony of Joshua and Caleb regarding the vulnerability of Canaan to invasion (Num. 14). They rebelled against Him, and He punished the nation by delaying their entry into Canaan until they were all dead, except Joshua and Caleb. “Numbers records the failure of Israel to believe in the promise of God and the resulting

16. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 30.

17. The Open Bible: Expanded Edition (Nashville, Tennessee: Thomas Nelson, 1983), p. 95.

18. Ibid., p. 96.

19. R. K. Harrison, Leviticus: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1980), p. 14.

20. Jacob Milgrom, “The Biblical Diet Laws as an Ethical System: Food and Faith,” Interpretation, XVII (1963), p. 295.

judgment of wandering in the wilderness for forty years.”²¹ Furthermore, “Israel as a nation is in its infancy at the outset of this book, only thirteen months after the exodus from Egypt. In Numbers, the book of divine discipline, it becomes necessary for the nation to go through the painful process of testing and maturation. God must teach His people the consequences of irresponsible decisions. The forty years of wilderness experience transforms them from a rabble of ex-slaves into a nation ready to take the Promised Land. Numbers begins with the old generation (1:1–10:10), moves through a tragic transitional period (10:11–25:18), and ends with the new generation (26–36) at the doorway to the land of Canaan.”²² I titled my commentary on Numbers, Sanctions and Dominion (1997).

5. Deuteronomy

Deuteronomy is the book of Israel’s inheritance, point five of the biblical covenant model. “It is addressed to the new generation destined to possess the land of promise—those who survived the forty years of wilderness wandering.”²³ The children of the generation of the exodus renewed their covenant with God and inherited Canaan on this basis. Moses blessed the tribes (Deut. 33), a traditional sign of inheritance in the Old Testament (Gen. 27; 49). Moses died outside the land, but before he died, God allowed him to look from Mt. Nebo into the promised land (Deut. 34:4). He saw the inheritance. The book closes with the elevation of Joshua to leadership, the transitional event of inheritance or succession (Deut. 34:9–12). I titled my commentary on Deuteronomy, Inheritance and Dominion (1999).

Those who reject Sutton’s thesis need to present an alternative model of the Pentateuch, one which fits it better, and one which also fits the Ten Commandments better, since they are also structured in terms of the five-point model: 1–5 and 6–10. Critics need to pay attention that old political aphorism: “You can’t beat something with nothing.” It is not enough to mumble that “Sutton’s book tries to prove too much,” or “There are lots of different models in the Bible.” There are indeed lots of proposed biblical models, among them the Trinity, the seven-day week, and the biblical covenant model.²⁴ But when we come

21. Open Bible, p. 127.

22. Ibid., p. 128.

23. Ibid., p. 171.

24. In my Publisher’s Preface to Sutton’s 1987 first edition, I wrote: “. . . the author has discovered the key above all other keys to interpreting the Bible, from Genesis to to the question of God's formal judicial relationships with men, we always come to the covenant. It is a five-point structure. Accept no substitutes!

B. The Five Levitical Sacrifices

Most Christians have trouble remembering the required sacrifices of Leviticus. When people have difficulty remembering something, it is usually because they have no handle, no model by which to classify what appear to be unconnected facts.²⁵ This has been the problem with the five Levitical sacrifices.

Five sacrifices. "Oh, no," moan the critics. "Here it comes. He's going to argue that they conform to Sutton's five-point covenant model." Exactly!

1. The Whole Burnt Offering (Lev. 1)

This offering had to be completely consumed on God's altar, except for the hide, which belonged to the officiating priest (Lev. 7: 8). None of the food portion could be retained, either by the priest or the donor. The animal had to be perfect: without blemish. The Hebrew word olaw, "burning," means "going up," as in smoke. It was a holocaust. Hartley called this the main sacrifice under the Mosaic sacrificial system.²⁶ "As an atoning sacrifice the whole offering was offered not so much for specific sins but for the basic sinfulness of each person and the society as a whole."²⁷ The entire offering went to God, a sym-

Revelation. . . " (xi). But what about the doctrine of God? It is included in the first point of the biblical covenant model. The covenant model is more comprehensive than the doctrine of God. It includes hierarchy—God > man > creation—law, sanctions, and eschatology. What about the doctrine of the Trinity? What about creation? The Trinity and the doctrine of the Creator-creature distinction (creation) are guiding presuppositions of orthodoxy, as reflected in the creeds. Nevertheless, the Trinitarian doctrine of God, like the doctrine of creation, appears in very few texts in the Bible. The Trinity is a doctrine derived from a comparative handful of texts in the New Testament. In contrast, the covenant structure is found in hundreds of texts and even whole books of the Bible, including Leviticus. The traditional Christian exegetical exercise called "find the implied but camouflaged Trinity in the Old Testament," is far more difficult and far less persuasive than "find the implied or explicit covenant model in the Old Testament."

25. This is why military history is so demanding, and why so few academic historians work in the field.

26. John E. Hartley, Leviticus, vol. 4 of the Word Bible Commentary (Dallas, Texas: Word Books, 1992), p. 17.

27. Ibid., p. 18.

bol of the total sacrifice required by God of every man.²⁸

There was a strict law for the priests: "And the fire upon the altar shall be burning in it; it shall not be put out: and the priest shall burn wood on it every morning, and lay the burnt offering in order upon it; and he shall burn thereon the fat of the peace offerings. The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out" (Lev. 6:12–13). Why so strict? Because this fire testified to the nature of God. The Book of Hebrews calls God a consuming fire (Heb. 12:29). This is the God who must be feared above all other gods, all other fears. This is the God who consumes sacrifices on His altar.

This transcendent God is an immanent God. He meets men at His altar. If men fail to offer an appropriate sacrifice, God will consume them with fire. This is the presence of God in fiery judgment. "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there" (Ps. 139:7–8). This is a sovereign God: transcendent and immanent.

2. The Grain Offering (Lev. 2)

The King James Version has this as a meat offering. This is incorrect. It was a grain offering. There are two keys to understanding this offering. First, it had to be of unleavened grain (Lev. 2:4, 11). Second, it was required when Aaron was anointed high priest (Lev. 6:20). Commentators presume that this sacrifice was required also at the anointings of subsequent high priests.

First, the requirement of unleavened grain points back to the exodus. The Passover mandated unleavened bread, too. This was God's memorial of His deliverance of His people out of bondage. They were to bring none of Egypt's leaven out of Egypt or into the Promised Land. This sacrifice pointed back to what Kline identifies as the historical prologue of the exodus: God's sovereign acts in history to deliver His people.²⁹ This means that this grain sacrifice is linked to point two of the covenant: historical prologue.

Second, the requirement that the sons of Aaron offer this sacrifice at the anointing of the high priest points to ecclesiastical hierarchy. The high priest was the most important officer in Israel. He met God in the holy of holies once a year. He was the primary mediator between

28. Ibid., p. 24.

29. Kline, Structure of Biblical Authority, p. 53.

God and Israel. This also points to point two: hierarchy/ representation.

3. The Peace Offering (Lev. 3)

This offering was voluntary. It was not part of the system of atonement. Hartley translated it the offering of well-being. So did Milgrom.³⁰ There were three types of peace offerings: praise offering (Lev. 2:15), vow (votive) offering (Lev. 7:16), and freewill offering (Lev. 7:16). Hartley wrote: "A primary aim of this sacrifice is for the offerer and his family or class, including invited guests, to eat the meat returned to them in a festive meal."³¹

The significant judicial fact of this offering was its openness. The offerer joined in a meal with his family and God. This indicates that the judicial barriers that always exist between God and sinful man were reduced. The participants' sins had already been dealt with judicially by another sacrifice. The sacrifice of well-being was a communion meal. The meal's participants were visibly identified as holy before God, set apart to praise Him and rejoice in His grace. The boundaries separating the offerer and this sacrifice were minimal compared to the boundaries around the other offerings. The offerer received back most of the offering. This points to point three of the covenant: ethics/boundaries.

4. The Purification Offering (Lev. 4–5:13)

This is called the sin offering in the King James Version. This was the sacrifice governing unintentional sins committed by the high priest, the civil ruler, the congregation as a whole, or individuals. "It describes behavior that violates the community's standards."³² Without the purification offering, the whole community was endangered. These sacrifices were required to avoid God's negative sanctions in history. They were offered to escape "a religious judgment on deviant behavior."³³ Hartley cited a 1989 article by A. Marx, who argued that this sacrifice was required on three formal occasions: the investiture of Levites (Num. 8:1–36), the ordination of Aaron (Lev. 8:1–36; Ex. 29:1–

30. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 217.

31. Hartley, Leviticus, p. 38.

32. Ibid., p. 55.

33. Idem.

37), and the consecration of the altar (Lev. 8:11, 15; Ex. 29:36–37). The Nazarite had to make a purification offering at the termination of his vow (Num. 6:13–20).³⁴

David's concern is illustrative: "Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults. Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression" (Ps. 19:12–13). In other words, if we are careful about the small sins, we will not fall into the great ones. If the high priest, the civil ruler, the whole congregation, and the individual all took such precautions, then God's wrath would not fall on Israel.

One sin that had to be dealt with by means of the purification offering was the false oath. "And if a soul sin, and hear the voice of swearing, and is a witness, whether he hath seen or known of it; if he do not utter it, then he shall bear his iniquity" (Lev. 5:1). Also, "if a soul swear, pronouncing with his lips to do evil, or to do good, whatsoever it be that a man shall pronounce with an oath, and it be hid from him; when he knoweth of it, then he shall be guilty in one of these" (Lev. 5:4). Here is the penalty: "And he shall bring his trespass offering unto the LORD for his sin which he hath sinned, a female from the flock, a lamb or a kid of the goats, for a sin offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for him concerning his sin" (Lev. 5:6). This is a trespass offering, or reparation offering (point five), but in the case of false oaths heard in secret or pronounced in ignorance, it is the judicial equivalent of the purification offering: "a sin offering." Point four of the biblical covenant model deals with oaths: the formal invoking of God's negative sanctions, the self-maledictory oath. Such an oath calls down upon the oath-taker God's curses, should the oath-taker break the law of the covenant.

The law of purification stated that the vessels in which the animal's remains were cooked had to be broken (clay pots) or thoroughly scourged (metal utensils) (Lev. 6:28). Again, the ritual concern is judgment. The concern, therefore, is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.

5. *The Reparation Offering (Lev. 5:14–6:7)*³⁵

This is called the trespass offering in the King James Version. This

34. Ibid., p. 56.

35. Ibid., pp. 72–86.

sacrifice was required in cases of theft: an illegal appropriation of another man's inheritance, a violation of the tenth commandment (point five). A man uses deception to gain ownership of another man's goods. Then he lies to the victim and the civil authorities. To restore the legal relationship after the criminal voluntarily confesses the crime and the two false oaths, he must pay the victim the value of the item stolen plus a 20% penalty (Lev. 6:5).³⁶ He also has to offer a ram as a trespass offering to make atonement (Lev. 6:6–7).

There should be no confusion about what is involved in the sacrifice. First, the lost inheritance is restored to the victim, plus an extra one-fifth. The judicial relationship between the victim and the criminal is thereby restored, making it possible to gain the advantages of social cooperation. Second, God is repaid because of the criminal's false oath in civil court. The criminal avoids being cut off by God: disinheritance. The goal is continuity: survival and covenantal prosperity in history. This is point five of the biblical covenant model: succession.

Conclusion

The requirement that God's people be holy is still in force. There will never be an escape from this requirement. It is eternal. To understand at least some of the implications of this ethical requirement—point three of the biblical covenant model—Christians need to understand the Book of Leviticus. They need to understand that it is a very practical book, many of whose laws still have valid applications in modern society. We ignore this book at our peril.

The Pentateuch is itself revelatory of the five-point structure of God's covenant. My economic commentary on the Pentateuch is therefore a commentary on a covenant. I call it the dominion covenant, for it is the God-given, God-required assignment to mankind to exercise dominion and subdue the earth that defines mankind's task as the only creature who images God the Creator (Gen. 1:26).³⁷

36. Had he not confessed, and had he been convicted, the penalty was at least two-fold restitution.

37. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

INTRODUCTION

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, and say unto them, Ye shall be holy: for I the LORD your God am holy. Ye shall fear every man his mother, and his father, and keep my sabbaths: I am the LORD your God. Turn ye not unto idols, nor make to yourselves molten gods: I am the LORD your God (Lev. 19:1–4).

The book of Leviticus is the Bible's premier book of holiness. The biblical meaning of "holy" is "set apart by God." It is related conceptually to "sanctify," "sanction," and "saint." It refers to any person, place, or thing with a God-ordained covenantal boundary around it. Everything inside such a boundary is sacrosanct. For example, we correctly speak of holy matrimony. This does not mean that every marriage is Christian. It means that God has placed a special judicial boundary around every marriage.

The book of Leviticus is the Bible's premier book of boundaries. There is an element of separation in every boundary, just as there is in holiness: separation by sanctions.¹ The Book of Numbers is the Pentateuchal book of sanctions, but the civil sanctions of Leviticus have alienated Christians and have outraged pagans. That certain sexual acts are forbidden in Leviticus is generally acceptable to most Christians, but the specified civil sanctions are a terrible mental burden for them. They will do almost anything, including dismissing the continuing validity of all the laws in Leviticus, in order to escape any personal or corporate responsibility for pressuring civil rulers to enforce the Levitical civil sanctions. Christians would rather deny all of the Levitical separations than affirm any of the Levitical civil sanctions. In short, they would rather deny the ethical terms of the Levitical system of holiness than affirm the judicial terms of Levitical civil justice.

1. See "Holiness," A Dictionary of the Bible, ed. James Hastings, 5 vols. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1900), II, p. 395.

A. Escaping Cultural Relevance

Here is a major dilemma for the modern church. Christians confidently affirm that “the Bible has answers for all questions.” But one question is this: What relevance should Christianity have in culture? Modern antinomian Christians emphatically deny the judicial foundation of Christianity’s cultural relevance in history: biblical law and its biblically mandated sanctions. Most Christians prefer pietism to cultural relevance, since civil responsibility accompanies cultural relevance. So, they seek holiness through withdrawal from the prevailing general culture.

This withdrawal has forced them to create alternative cultures—ghetto cultures—since there can be no existence for man without culture of some kind. The Amish have achieved a remarkable separation from the general culture, though not so radical as tourists in Amish country like to imagine, by abandoning such modern benefits as electricity in their homes and the automobile. But they travel in their buggies on paved highways, and they use electricity in their barns. They are always dependent on the peace-keeping forces of the nation. Pietistic Christians have longed for a similar separation, but without the degree of commitment shown by the Amish. They send their children into the public schools, and they still watch television. The result has been catastrophic: the widespread erosion of pietism’s intellectual standards by the surrounding humanist culture, and the creation of woefully third-rate Christian alternatives. I offer as evidence the quality of American Christian radio broadcasting, especially contemporary Christian popular music. It is better than hard rock “music” and rap “music,” no doubt, but compare it to classical music. Compare it to Bach, Mozart, or Beethoven. Compare hymns written after 1920 to those written by Isaac Watts and Charles Wesley.

The ultimate form of personal Christian withdrawal from culture is mysticism: placing an emotional and epistemological boundary between the Christian and the world around him. But there is a major theological risk with all forms of theistic mysticism. The proponents of theistic mysticism again and again in history have defined mysticism as union with God. By defining mysticism as metaphysical rather than ethical, mystics have frequently come to a terribly heretical conclusion: their hoped-for union with God is defined as metaphysical rather than ethical. They seek a union of their being with God. Meister Eckhart, the heretic of the early fourteenth century, concluded in his 28th

Sermon that “God and I are One.”² This is a representative expression of the pantheism found in most forms of mysticism.³ The mystic’s quest for unity with God denies the Bible’s definition of holiness: the separation of God from the creation.

B. The Creator/Creature Distinction

The ultimate boundary is the one separating God from man: the Creator/creature distinction. While man is made in God’s image (Gen. 1:26), he is not God, nor does he participate in God’s being. Man is commanded to be holy, for God is holy (Lev. 11:44–45; 19:2), but man is also warned not to seek divinity for himself (Gen. 11:6; Deut. 29:29; Job 38–41). Man is commanded to seek ethical unity with the perfect humanity of Jesus Christ, God incarnate, but man cannot attain ontological unity with God. A permanent boundary is placed between God’s being and man’s being. The unity between God and man is to be ethical, never ontological or metaphysical.

The doctrine of the Creator/creature distinction has enormous consequences for social theory and practice. A contemporary Jewish political scientist has correctly observed: “The boundary between God and man is His supreme safeguard against social chaos. For what would men not do to one another if they were to claim ultimate authority?”⁴ When covenant-breaking men have sought to erase this divine-human boundary, they have reaped their appropriate reward: social chaos followed by tyranny. Twentieth-century Europe is a monument to this reality: World War I, Communism, Nazism, Italian Fascism, World War II, the Cold War, and the break-up of Yugoslavia in civil war after 1990. In addition to the politics of despair have come existentialism, nihilism, the self-conscious meaningless of modern art, pornography, the drug culture, and the mindlessness of hard rock music. The laws of Leviticus were designed to remind men not to erase

2. Meister Eckhart: A Modern Translation, trans. Raymond Bernard Blakney (New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1941), p. 232.

3. R. M. Bucke provided extracts of dozens of passages to this effect in the teachings and writings of numerous religious thinkers, from Buddha to Plotinus to the homosexual, nineteenth-century American poet, Walt Whitman. R. M. Bucke, Cosmic Consciousness: A Study in the Evolution of the Human Mind (New York: Dutton, [1901] 1969), Part 4.

4. Aaron Wildavsky, The Nursing Father: Moses as a Political Leader (University, Alabama: University of Alabama, 1984), p. 97. Professor Wildavsky died before I completed this manuscript. I had hoped to send him a copy of the book. He was one of the great conservative academic scholars in the second half of the twentieth century.

the divine-human boundary. The Mosaic law was designed to avoid social chaos and tyranny. It established laws—boundaries—governing the relationships between men in order to remind men of the ultimate boundary between God and man.

This leads me to a very important point: any attempt to define Christian “relationships” apart from biblical law is a form of rebellion. Relationships apart from God’s revealed law and its mandated judicial sanctions are inherently antinomian. It is common for modern Protestant evangelicals to blather on and on about “relationships” while denying the continuing validity of biblical law. This way lies tyranny. And adultery.

The fundamental boundary in history is the one between God and His creation. A subordinate boundary in history is the one between the state and the individual. Modern conservatism ignores the first boundary and therefore finds itself incapable of maintaining the second, either theoretically or institutionally. Rushdoony described the importance of biblical boundaries for biblical political theory: “Man’s realm is on earth, and, since every man’s heart is alien ground to every other man, he must rule by force in order to gain total dominion. God’s realm and sovereignty is [sic] universal as Creator. He is on home ground everywhere in the universe, as much in command in the heart of every man as in heaven. For God, there is no alien ground, and hence no compulsion: He simply exercises His will over His own domain and creation in every crevice of the universe, and in every man’s heart. Wherever the state moves beyond its God-appointed grounds, it is on alien ground, as indeed all men and institutions are wherever and whenever they transgress their appointed bounds.”⁵

C. Israel’s Boundaries

As we shall see in this commentary, most of Israel’s economic boundaries were based on geography (land laws), tribal membership (seed laws), and ritual requirements (laws of sacrifice). These economic rules constituted a covenantal unity. As Americans say, they were a “package deal.” These rules were temporary boundaries designed to shape the nation of Israel in very special ways. These judicial boundaries maintained the land and the people as a special province of God. The land of Israel became like the garden of Eden: a temporary residence uniquely under God's revealed law and uniquely under His historical sanctions. The land of Israel, like the garden of Eden, was to serve as a training area for covenant-keeping men. It was also to serve as an example for covenant-breaking men (Deut. 4: 4–8).⁶ It was to serve both as God's boot camp and as His general headquarters for worldwide evangelism and cultural conquest.

5. R. J. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House [1970] 1995), p. 42. (<http://bit.ly/rjrpopag>)

The laws of Leviticus were designed to keep the leaven of evil outside of the land of Israel, but they were also designed to push the leaven of righteousness into the world around Israel. Levitical law was both defensive and offensive. One problem with virtually all commentaries on Leviticus is that they emphasize the defensive aspects of the Levitical laws: separation and exclusion. In this book, I do my best to point out the inclusive aspects of some of these laws. There were laws of inclusion, at least to the extent of placing the gentile world under the Ten Commandments and therefore inside the zone of predictable external blessings: positive sanctions in history. This was Jonah's message to Nineveh: God's covenant lawsuit. Had all of God's revealed laws been solely exclusionary, Jonah would not have been sent by God on his missionary journey. As I argue in this commentary, some of the Mosaic laws were cross-boundary laws that governed other nations, and are still valid today.

D. The Book of Priestly Holiness

Behind Jonah's prophetic ministry was a nation of priests. As Jacob Milgrom pointed out in the introduction to the first volume of his extraordinarily learned, extraordinarily large, and extraordinarily unreadable commentary on Leviticus, Leviticus is not about the tribe of Levi. It is about the priesthood. The Book of Numbers rather than Leviticus deals in detail with the laws governing the Levites. The reason why the book is called Leviticus is because in Hellenic times, when the Greek version of the Hebrew Old Testament appeared (the Septuagint), the term "Levites" meant priests.⁷

Milgrom wrote: "Theology is what Leviticus is all about. It pervades every chapter and almost every verse. It is not expressed in pronouncements but embedded in rituals."⁸ But what is the focus of the book's theology? Holiness. Leviticus is pre-eminently the Old Covenant's book of holiness. To be holy is to be set apart by God: judicially, ethically, culturally, and in the case of the Old Covenant people of God, geographically. God establishes boundaries. Leviticus is the Pentateuch's book of boundaries.

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

7. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 1.

8. Ibid., p. 42.

Leviticus also is the book of life. "Because impurity and holiness are antonyms," Milgrom wrote, "the identification of impurity with death must mean that holiness stands for life."⁹ The book's rituals and ethical injunctions point to separation from evil, which is the sole basis of life in God's world. Adam's wilful violation of a verbally identified boundary in the garden brought universal death into history. Man's continuing imperfections also point to death. But the perfect honoring God's boundaries therefore brings life. Thus, the ritual and judicial rigors of Leviticus point to man's need of redemption by means of a perfect substitute whose death brings life to the boundary violator. God's law kills those who are already under the sentence of death; on the other hand, it provides a better life for those who are alive. The pre-eminent example of this truth is Jesus Christ, who contrasted His own ministry with that of a thief: "The thief cometh not, but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy: I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly" (John 10:10).

Israel's boundaries were established in terms of God's unique presence among His people: "And I will set my tabernacle among you: and my soul shall not abhor you. And I will walk among you, and will be your God, and ye shall be my people" (Lev. 26:11–12). The Book of Leviticus rests on the assumption that God's unique covenantal presence among His set-apart people had geographical implications. The Mosaic Covenant was a geographical covenant. God's covenant with Abram (renamed Abraham: "father of nations") involved land because it involved seed: "In the same day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates" (Gen. 15:18).

God's goal in all of His laws is to place men under certain moral and judicial boundaries. Men are to acknowledge God's absolute sovereignty over them by accepting the authority of His covenant's hierarchy. The stipulations enforced by His hierarchical institutions serve as the legal boundaries of covenant-keeping man's existence. Men are to learn to live within these boundaries. There is both inclusion and exclusion in establishing and enforcing all boundaries. God in effect puts a “no trespassing” sign around something, and man is required to honor the stipulations of that sign. If he refuses, God threatens to impose negative sanctions on him in history and perhaps even eternity. God is not mocked at zero cost.

9. Ibid., p. 46.

E. The Book of the Kingdom

Leviticus is also the book of the kingdom. God delivered His people from bondage in Egypt, a false kingdom. In doing so, He gave them an opportunity to gain land for a new kingdom. The next generation did inherit this land. The generation of the exodus did not. They died in the wilderness. Because of their rebellion and lack of faith, their boundary was the wilderness. They could not return to Egypt, nor could they enter the Promised Land. The kingdom grant of land could be claimed only by their children, and only after their covenant renewal at Gilgal (Josh. 5).

Leviticus presents the rules governing this kingdom grant from God. This land grant preceded the giving of these rules. Grace precedes law in God's dealings with His subordinates. We are in debt to God even before He speaks to us. The land grant was based on the original promise given to Abraham. That promise came prior to the giving of the Mosaic law.¹⁰ This is why James Jordan said that the laws of Leviticus are more than legislation; the focus of the laws is not simply obedience to God, but rather on maintaining the grant.¹¹ The basis of maintaining the grant was ethics, not the sacrifices. Man cannot maintain the kingdom in sin.¹² The fundamental issue was sin, not sacrifice; ethics, not ritual. God told them this repeatedly through His prophets:

For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices: But this thing commanded I them, saying, Obey my voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people: and walk ye in all the ways that I have commanded you, that it may be well unto you. But they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear, but walked in the counsels and in the imagination of their evil heart, and went backward, and not forward (Jer. 7:22–24).

10. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 8. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

11. Ibid., p. 9.

12. Ibid., p. 11.

To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the LORD: I am full of the burnt offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he goats. When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts? Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting. Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth: they are a trouble unto me; I am weary to bear them. And when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you: yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear: your hands are full of blood. Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; Learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow (Isa. 1:11–17).

F. The Book of Property Rights

The Book of Leviticus is also the book of property rights in the Pentateuch. The grant of the kingdom was in the form of a land grant. The land itself was the visible manifestation of the historical reality of the kingdom. So was the promised economic prosperity. Leviticus is the book that presents the ethical foundations of prosperity (Lev. 26: 3–10). It also presents the legal foundations of judicial peace with God, the only long-term basis of prosperity. God begins with a gift to His people, and then He sets forth the ritual and legal foundations for maintaining this gift. He promises to uphold this grant if they obey Him. God's promise cannot be separated from their requirement of obedience. Jordan wrote:

God's covenant Word is always first and foremost promise, and then command based on promise. Point three has to do with God's grant of the Kingdom, His gift and promise, and then our duties consequent thereto. God's Word is always both promise and command, and in Reformed theology, promise comes first. (In Lutheran law/gospel theology, law comes first to drive us to Christ; but in Reformed theology, grace comes first to put us in the Kingdom, and then the law is given as guidance for our Kingdom duties.)¹³

Respect for the property of others clearly connects largely with the third zone of the five-fold covenant structure, because the third area is that of the distributed grant. We have to respect what God has granted to others. Also, disobedience to any part of God's law is regarded as a trespass or more literally a “debt,” as we see it in the Lord’s Prayer. Thus, any lawbreaking is a form of theft, creating indebtedness, which must be covered by a Trespass or Compensation Sacrifice. Theft has to do with boundaries, which is why it is equivalent to trespass. Leviticus is the book of boundaries, of who is allowed to go where, and of how to become cleansed once you have trespassed.¹⁴

13. Ibid., p. 8.

The Book of Leviticus is book three of the Pentateuch. It is the book of property. The eighth commandment, “Thou shalt not steal,” is the third law of the so-called second table of the law, i.e., the third law in the second group of five covenantally structured laws. The third commandment, “Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain,” establishes a boundary around God’s name. God’s name is His property, and He in effect licenses the use of His name only for specific uses. The parallels should be obvious. Point three of the biblical covenant model establishes boundaries. Leviticus is the book of property because it is the book of boundaries.

G. A Holy Walk Before the Lord

We now come to a topic that is never discussed by the commentators. I have never seen any commentator devote as much as one page to it, yet it is more important for understanding the unique nature of the economic life of ancient Israel than any other topic. I am not trying to exaggerate; I really mean this. Here is the question that demands an answer: How did they have time to earn a living? The mandatory sacrifices ate up time as well as crops. Whatever answers to this question that Israel came up with were fundamental to the life of the nation for almost 14 centuries, yet we honestly do not know how Israel answered it. As far as I know, nobody has discussed in detail the economics of the festival journeys. The rabbis who compiled the Mishna and Talmud in the four centuries after the fall of Jerusalem forgot their ancestors’ answers, and Christians have never thought to ask the question.

In Exodus 23, we read: “Three times thou shalt keep a feast unto me in the year. Thou shalt keep the feast of unleavened bread: (thou shalt eat unleavened bread seven days, as I commanded thee, in the time appointed of the month Abib; for in it thou camest out from Egypt: and none shall appear before me empty:) And the feast of harvest, the firstfruits of thy labours, which thou hast sown in the field: and the feast of ingathering, which is in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field. Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord GOD" (Ex. 23:14–17). Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles: three feasts a year were required of every adult circumcised male if he was inside the land's boundaries. Every adult male had to journey to a central location and participate in a festival (ritual feast) three times a year. A parallel passage promised that during their absence from their homes, no invaders would disturb them: "Thrice in the year shall all your men children [males] appear before the Lord GOD, the God of Israel. For I will cast out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders: neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the LORD thy God thrice in the year" (Ex. 34:23–24). God promised to bless the land when they honored these requirements. The nation's circumcised adults were on the march three times each year.

14. Ibid., pp. 12–13.

1. Centralization

This geographically centralized system of ritual sacrifice was what motivated Jeroboam to create a pair of false worship centers at Bethel and Dan in his newly created northern kingdom (I Kings 12:25–29). He did not want the people of Israel journeying to Judah to worship, for fear that this would divide their loyalty politically (v. 27). He set up a rival altar and a rival Passover celebration at Bethel (v. 32).

We need to understand just how central, and how centralizing, these mandatory sacrifices were. We need to remember this: there was only one lawful altar in Israel. Unless there was a way for local religious and civil leaders in a community to represent the entire community at these feasts, which the Bible's texts do not indicate there was, this meant that the entire adult male population—or at least those eligible for numbering for military service—came to Jerusalem a minimum of three times a year, not including their participation in any of the five special sacrifices discussed in Leviticus 1–7.

Most of them had to walk. A few may have had donkeys. Horses cost too much feed and do too little work for small farms to support. There are few references to horses in Israel. They are always spoken of in a military context: the possession of foreign armies. Perhaps some people had donkeys, but riding two hundred miles on a donkey is no picnic. Think about it. Despite rain, mud, dust, and bad weather, three times each year every adult male had to walk or ride a donkey to the tabernacle-temple. In David's day, this meant Jerusalem. Some sections of the nation were located over a hundred miles from Jerusalem "as the crow flies." Winding highways would have added to this estimate. At an average speed of three miles per hour, this would have required up to four or five eight-hour days of walking, each way, plus whatever time was spent in Jerusalem, three times a year. Not every Israelite had to spend this much time on the road, but members of some tribes did.

2. The Walk: Physical and Spiritual

When God spoke of a holy walk before Him, He really meant it. It was an judicial walk, but it was also a literal walk. The difficulty of the physical walk was to reflect the difficulty of the spiritual walk. Life in Israel was to be a kind of boot camp experience—a temporary period of preliminary training for worldwide dominion. In Eden, Adam had been told to keep away from a tree: a physically easy task. In Israel, they were told to journey to a central location: a physically difficult task. If they walked faithfully, He promised, the land of Israel would make them rich.

If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them; Then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit. And your threshing shall reach unto the vintage, and the vintage shall reach unto the sowing time: and ye shall eat your bread to the full, and dwell in your land safely. And I will give peace in the land, and ye shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid: and I will rid evil beasts out of the land, neither shall the sword go through your land (Lev. 26:3–6;¹⁵ cf. Deut. 28:8–13).

God promised to intervene in the operations of nature in order to make good on His promise. The heavens would deliver rain in due season. But to obtain these blessings, Israelites had to sacrifice—not just offer sacrifices, but sacrifice a large portion of their lives to the boredom of walking. This nation, more than any other non-nomadic nation in history, was to be on the move. Like a literal army, they were to march a minimum of three times a year. Marching was to keep them in good shape, both physical and spiritual, as God's holy army.

At Passover, entire families journeyed to the tabernacle city and later to Jerusalem. Families were required to celebrate the Passover (Ex. 12). They could not celebrate the feast at home, for they were required to slay the Passover lamb on the night Passover began (Ex. 12:6). This had to be done at the appointed national place of worship after they entered the Promised Land (Deut. 16:2–6). There were about 625,000 adult males when they entered the Promised Land (Num. 26:51, 62). This means that about two million people would have arrived in one city at the same time, to spend a week.¹⁶ Imagine four million people arriving. Or perhaps 10 million if the population grew. This did not happen, for God withheld the blessing of population growth, but until the sacrificial system changed, this long walk was required. Then they all walked home.

15. Chapter 33.

Mothers today complain about the trouble involved in planning a day's drive or a plane ride, plus a week's visit in a motel. Think about organizing a family for a week's walk, a week's stay, probably camping out in a tent. Bear in mind, there was no running water, no indoor plumbing, no toilet paper, no disposable diapers, and no fast food restaurants. This was no picnic. Then, after a week of jammed masses of humanity and assembly-line sacrifices, they walked home. Less than two months after arriving home, all the men walked back to celebrate another feast, which we call Pentecost: the firstfruits offering. This was Israel's celebration the anniversary of God's giving of the Ten Commandments.¹⁷

During Pentecost ("weeks") and Tabernacles ("booths"—the feast of ingathering), those eligible to serve in God's holy army arrived in the central place of sacrifice in order to offer their individual sacrifices. The feasts' celebrations were family-centered, with each family inviting in Levites and strangers to share in the festivities (Deut. 16:13–17). During Tabernacles, the altar was used the whole week during the day-time for mandatory national sacrifices (Num. 29:13–34). Pentecost (pentekoste is Greek for fiftieth) was different; the festival's formal sacrifices were completed on one day—day 50 after Passover (Lev. 23:16). So, the special five sacrifices of Leviticus 1–7 could have been conducted after Pentecost ended. The costs of making the journey were high; the time in Jerusalem was brief; perhaps many people stayed behind to offer these special sacrifices. But Pentecost was a summer festival, when agricultural time is most valuable. For as long as Israel remained predominately agricultural, there would have been economic pressure to return home immediately after Pentecost. Also, the pressure of so many visitors at any festival would have raised food and housing costs. Less busy periods were less expensive, but to take advantage of this, the sacrificer would have been required to make another journey to the temple. In short, the costs of sacrifice were very high. Conclusion: faithful people would have been very careful to obey the details of God's law, just to avoid an extra journey to the tabernacle-temple to make a sacrifice for having violated some detail. In the phrase of modern political theory regarding men's exodus from tyranny, Israelites voted with their feet. They marched for liberty. In their case, however, they voted for God's covenant order with their feet, not against it.

16. The average Israelite family had approximately two children at this stage in the nation's history. The number of adult males had been almost the same when they left Egypt (Num. 1:46; 3:43), which meant they had experienced zero population growth. Stable population growth requires a little over two children per family: 2.1 children—one male, one female on average (in monogamous societies). This means that Israel had a national population of about 2.4 million people at the time of the conquest. See Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1: Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 1.

17. Alfred Edersheim, The Temple: Its Ministry and Services As They Were in the Time of Jesus Christ (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1874] 1983), p. 261.

3. The Challenge to Tribalism

There is another aspect of the three marches, but especially Passover, that must be considered: the mitigating effects on tribalism. The three feasts were national celebrations. Clans and tribes from across the nation were required to meet together in one city: the earthly dwelling place of God where the sacrifices had to be conducted. Loyalty is ultimately to God and His law. This cross-tribal loyalty was to be demonstrated at the national feasts.¹⁸

When all the families of Israel journeyed to Jerusalem, young adults of marriageable age could meet each other: those of the opposite sex who were members of different tribes.¹⁹ Marriage was not limited to members of the same tribe; it was limited only confessionally. The one judicial pressure to marry inside a tribe was the unique case law that applied only to a family of daughters. They could inherit their father's land, but only if they married within the tribe. This was for the sake of the preservation of land ownership within the tribe, not for theological or spiritual reasons (Num. 36:7).²⁰ (The existence of the bride price/dowry system was another factor loosening the power of the tribe and the clan. Daughters did not carry title to land with them when they left their fathers' households; instead, they carried transportable capital: gold, silver, jewels, etc. Because this capital was transportable, marriage could cut across clan and tribal boundaries.)²¹

18. The feast still promotes unity across judicial boundaries, acknowledged or not: at the communion table.

19. The denominational college or Bible college has long served a similar function: a place for people of the same accent (in the broadest sense: confession and culture) to send their children to meet and marry others who are outside the local church community.

In a tribally based society, the power of the clan is very great. Ethics tends to be associated with the tribe. "My brother and I against our cousin; my cousin and I against the world." The tribal outlook is "brotherhood over otherhood," insiders over outsiders. Justice is owed only to insiders. The universalism of fixed moral law is denied by such tribal brotherhoods. This is why Mosaic Israel was not primarily tribal; it was confessional-judicial. It was a society based on the historical acts and the revealed laws of a universal God. The tribes had a temporary role to play because of the tribal identification (Judah) of the prophesied Seed-Messiah, Shiloh (Gen. 49:10). The structure of landed inheritance kept citizenship loosely associated with the tribes inside the Promised Land, as we shall see,²² but the absence of judicial restrictions on marriage outside the tribe, the bride price/dowry system, and the central feasts mitigated the effects of tribalism-clannism.

H. Who Paid? Who Benefitted?

The costs of travel, lodging, food, and forfeited time required to participate in the three festivals were very high. We can only guess at the rents charged in Jerusalem when the city experienced a massive influx of participants. Even upper rooms would have come at a premium price. The farther away from Jerusalem a man lived, the higher these festival expenses were. The festivals took place in the months of agricultural labor, not in the dead of winter. That is, they occurred during periods of very valuable time for agricultural laborers. The value of the alternative uses of a farmer's time was high; thus, the costs of the festivals were high. As we shall see, it is reasonable to estimate that the total costs associated with making sacrifice in Israel were five percent (near Jerusalem) to 15% (distant) of a family's annual income. To this must be added the costs of the sacrifices themselves, plus tithing, gleaning, and giving to the poor. This does not count morally mandatory, zero-interest charitable loans (Deut. 15: 7–11).²³

20. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 22.

21. The Mosaic law did not specify who would inherit the wife's dowry upon her death. It is easy to imagine that such funds would go to unmarried sons (bride price assets), daughters (dowries), or unmarried grandchildren.

22. Chapters 15, 17, 25, 30.

Edersheim said that the rabbis of the post-Old Covenant era estimated the expenses associated with the required sacrifices and payments, not counting forfeited travel time and personal expenses, at one-quarter of gross income.²⁴ This does not count the farmer's reduced income when the land rested during the sabbatical year. While this estimate of 25% may be too high, there is no doubt that 15% is a reasonable estimate, not counting travel and lodging costs, and not counting forfeited labor time. All of this was required before civil taxes, and not counting the sabbatical year. It is likely that the combined costs of the sacrificial system, plus the system of morally compulsory charity, plus civil taxes at 10% (I Sam. 8:15, 17) would have been in the range of one-third to one-half of an agricultural family's income. This is comparable to the middle-class member's tax burden in the early twenty-first century—a very high-tax era. In the modern world, most of this money goes to various levels of the state. In ancient Israel, most of it went to the priestly tribe and the poor. Theirs was a far better system, but it was expensive. I know of no society in the ancient world with anything like these external costs on the average farmer-citizen.

An Israelite could have chosen to live in a city located closer to Jerusalem, but this would have led to higher real estate prices in those cities. What a man saved in travel costs he paid for in housing costs. The costs of sacrifice had to be borne. There should be no question about it: Old Covenant Israel was an expensive place to live, especially for Israelites.

I. The Farming Subsidy to Resident Aliens

This brings us to a controversial but inescapable conclusion: non-Israelites, who did not have to pay these temple-based costs, had a tremendous economic advantage as farmers in Israel. Except for one year in seven (Deut. 31:10–12), they were not required to attend the feasts. They could invest their time and money into farming while the Israelites were on the march. They were allowed to lease agricultural property from Israelites for up to 49 years (Lev. 25:47–52). This means that there was an indirect economic subsidy in ancient Israel for foreigners and covenant-breakers to occupy the agricultural areas, with the Israelites occupying the cities. Covenant-breakers would have paid rent for rural land to the Israelites who moved to the cities.

23. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

24. Edersheim, Temple, p. 379.

The larger that Israelite families became, the smaller and less economically efficient each generation's share of the original family plot. If the jubilee laws were enforced, this must have led to the creation of professionally managed farms along the lines of modern corporate farming. It is likely that non-Israelites eventually would have managed most of these farms, especially in regions remote from Jerusalem, where the implicit subsidy to aliens was greatest, i.e., relief from the costs of the most expensive journeys.

Consider the Jew who lived on one of Israel's distant borders. If he leased his land to a foreigner across the border, he may have been able to afford to move to a city closer to Jerusalem. As a city dweller, he could become a craftsman or trader. His thrice-yearly trips to Jerusalem could have become business-related. He could seek out new goods, new markets, and new business contacts. The division of labor would have been extended. So would the transfer of information. For an urban producer, the festivals could have become economically productive. Economically speaking, there is little doubt that the sacrificial system and the gleaning system (which was strictly agricultural)²⁵ subsidized the transfer of land stewardship to covenant-breakers, especially near the borders of the nation.

I am not arguing that foreigners actually did occupy most of the rural land in pre-Jeroboam Israel. I do not think they did. I am arguing that if this did not happen, it was because the Israelites ignored biblical laws, especially the jubilee land law. We know they did not obey the sabbatical-year law to rest the land (II Chron. 36:21). Perhaps they did not pay all of the temple fees, or perhaps they paid corporate representatives to attend some of the festivals. Maybe they did not pay their tithes, or else refused to participate in any of the five Levitical sacrifices.

Whatever the case, the ceremonial laws were designed to move most Israelites off the land and into cities. If the Israelites as a nation remained on the land, it was because they broke some of these laws, or else they were willing to suffer very high worship-related costs—a very doubtful proposition, given their subsequent behavior.

25. Chapter 11.

As far as I know, I am the first commentator to discuss the land ownership aspect of Israel's sacrificial system, and I discovered it only after I had completed two-thirds of the manuscript pages of this book. Having spent almost two decades writing an economic commentary on the first three books of the Bible, at age 51, I finally noticed what should have been obvious all along to any thoughtful investigator: the festival system subsidized gentiles in the nation. I say this, not in a self-congratulatory tone, but in shocked humility. What else haven't I figured out? How much don't we know about the actual operations of biblical law in Old Covenant Israel? A very great deal, I suspect. I ask myself: Why don't Bible commentators think economically? Why did it take two thousand years for someone to observe what should have been obvious? Am I completely off the mark about the costs of sacrifice and its economic implications? If so, what am I overlooking? If not, why did it take two thousand years for someone to write about it? If someone else has written about it, why haven't his observations found their way into any standard Bible commentary or history of Israel?

J. The Import-Export Business

For a farmer in a tribe on the fringes of the nation, the festivals brought immediate costs rather than immediate economic benefits. Only if he became a part-time specialist could he have made these journeys pay at least part of their cost. The obvious means of making the festivals pay would have been to become a middleman in foreign trade. If he purchased high-value, low-volume items from gentiles living across the border, he could sell these in the festival city. High-volume, low-value agricultural goods would have been much less profitable because of transportation costs. He probably would not have been able to sell his own agricultural products to nearby foreign nations in exchange for manufactured goods. They had the same climate. Those nations that were close to Israel's borders would have been "free riders" on the good weather God promised to bring on the land when the nation obeyed Him. The very high ecclesiastical costs of living in Israel would have placed the Israelites at a competitive disadvantage in relation to those foreign farms located close to Israel's border. If anything, Israelites living on the borders of the nation would have had to become manufacturers, trading their goods for imported food and other manufactured goods. Conclusion: inside Israel, journeying Israelites would have been encouraged to exchange manufactured goods or services for other manufactured goods. This would have made Jerusalem a center of trade and information: goods and information brought from the edges of the nation's borders.

In summary, the required feasts created economic incentives for Israelites who were located close to foreign borders to import goods from abroad in exchange for goods produced in Israel, and then use these imports to pay for their mandatory journeys. But they would not have exported any crop that was not unique to Israel: no comparative advantage. Israel must have imported goods from abroad in cases where transportation costs were low, especially in regions close to the Mediterranean Sea or close to foreign borders. Why? Because of specialization and the division of labor. Foreign traders could find a ready market for their goods because of the Israelites' costs of attending the festivals. They would have been looking for goods to trade at the festivals. Foreigners who lived close to roads into Israel or the sea had an economic advantage over other nations that were farther from Israel's borders. It should be clear that the Mosaic law was designed to move economic activity away from farming toward trade, especially international trade. The Israelites were then to move out of the land as traders and evangelists across the entire globe.

There would have been an economic incentive for those living near highways to go into the tavern and lodging business. They would therefore have been in the barter business, selling prepared food and lodging for whatever goods the travellers had to offer in exchange. These highway businessmen would have become the local region's middlemen for imported goods.

Those who know anything about late-nineteenth century United States history think of the early immigrant Jews as peddlers, which some were. Jews in medieval Europe were also traders and peddlers. But, given the costs of sacrifice in Israel, a lot of them must have become at least part-time peddlers in ancient Israel. Men try to decrease the net loss from mandatory tasks. Trade would have been one way to achieve this.

K. The International Division of Labor

If a majority of Israelites were not supposed to remain strictly agricultural producers and rural residents, then what were they to do for a living? Where would they live? As population grew, they would have become urban manufacturers, international traders, and specialists in finance: exactly what Jews became when the second diaspora began in A.D. 135, after Bar Kochba's failed rebellion. Rome forced the Jews to move out of Palestine. But from the beginning, Israelites were supposed to become involved in international commerce, both as a national center of trade for visitors and as men sailing across oceans. The economics of centralized sacrifice made this economically likely: cross-border importing and exporting. The laws of Passover allowed those on journeys to celebrate Passover a month later (Num. 9:10–11). This would have been during the harvest season but after winter storms on the Mediterranean. This exception to Passover's laws was a sign of what God wanted for them. They were to take the message of Jehovah's sovereignty and grace to every land, just as Jonah took it to Nineveh. They were to trade and preach. They were to do well while doing good.

Passover alone among the three mandatory festivals had a second date so that travelers could attend. Someone returning to Israel might have been caught in a winter storm. The Mosaic law acknowledged this possibility. This indicates that the other two festivals were not mandatory for Israelites who were outside the nation's geographical boundaries. For those who lived far from the central place of worship but inside the land, and for those living close to the Mediterranean, there was a lawful way to avoid the economic burden of these two festivals' time and travel expenses: become involved in international commerce. The traveler could arrange his affairs to be on a business trip when the two festival dates occurred. The festivals were held in the spring and the fall, when the Mediterranean was suitable for travel.

The extension of God's message of salvation to the rest of the world was inherent in the original covenant. Foreign nations were supposed to learn of God's grace in granting Israel His law (Deut. 4: 4–8)?²⁶ Foreign commerce of one kind or other would have facilitated the spread of the word of God. This was God's conditional promise to them: "[T]hou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow" (Deut. 28:12b)²⁷—a blessing better understood by modern Japan than modern America.

Did God really expect the Jews to evangelize the whole world? Yes.

26. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

27. Ibid., ch. 69.

But how? What about the Americas? Hadn't God condemned the Western hemisphere to spiritual darkness merely by placing its residents across the Atlantic Ocean? No. Here I must break with the textbook accounts of exploration. On this point, we have been misled.

L. World Trade Before Jerusalem Fell

Rome was a trading nation in the era of the fall of Jerusalem. An important trade existed between Rome and China, based on the exchange of silk for raw materials. Frederick Teggart's extraordinary book, Rome and China (1939), discussed this international trade connection,²⁸ but the topic still receives scant or no attention whatever in the textbooks. In any case, this trade is presumed to have been exclusively overland trade. What the textbooks never discuss is cross-Atlantic trade prior to Columbus. This is a mistake that has only begun to be rectified, most notably by Barry Fell and the diligent members of his Epigraphic Society.

Jews were probably trading in North America as early as Jesus' time, and perhaps centuries earlier. There were traders from Europe in North America in the early second millennium B.C., so this should not be surprising.²⁹ There is evidence—automatically dismissed as fraudulent (“forgeries”) by establishment scholars³⁰—that someone brought the message of God's Ten Commandments to the American southwest before the time of Jesus, possibly centuries before. I refer to the inscription, written in a Hebrew “stick” script,³¹ which records the decalogue. It was written on a boulder weighing 80 tons, located 30 miles southwest of Albuquerque, New Mexico, near the town of Los Lunas.³² (This is the correct spelling. The masculine los does not match the feminine lunas.) The script (alphabet) dates from the twelfth century B.C.³³ Professor Robert Pfeiffer of Harvard University's Semitic Mu-

28. Frederick J. Teggart, Rome and China: A Study of Correlations in Historical Events (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, [1939] 1983). Teggart traced the tight correlation between barbarian invasions in Northern Europe, 58 B.C. to 107 A.D., and (1) Rome's wars on its eastern frontiers and (2) China's wars on its western frontiers. When wars disrupted the silk trade, barbarian invasions soon followed.

29. Barry Fell, Bronze Age America (Boston: Little, Brown, 1982).

30. See “Los Lunas Attracts Epigraphers,” Epigraphic Society Occasional Papers, XII (Aug. 1985), p. 34.

31. Donald Cline, “The Los Lunas Stone,” ibid., X:1 (Oct. 1982), p. 69.

32. David Allen Deal, Discovery of Ancient America (Irvine, California: Kherem La Yah, 1984), ch. 1.

33. Barry Fell, “Ancient Punctuation and the Los Lunas Text,” Epigraphic Society Occasional Papers, XIII (Aug. 1985), p. 35.

seum first translated the inscription in 1948.³⁴ A more recent translation than Pfeiffer's is as follows:

I [am] Yahve your God who brought you out of the land of the two Egypts out of the house of bondages. You shall not have other [foreign] gods in place of [me]. You shall not make for yourself molded or carved idols. You shall not lift up your voice to connect the name of Yahve in hate. Remember you [the] day Sabbath to make it holy. Honor your father and your mother to make long your existence upon the land which Yahve your God gave to you. You shall not murder. You shall not commit adultery or idolatry. You shall not steal or deceive. You shall not bear witness against your neighbor testimony for a bribe. You shall not covet [the] wife of your neighbor and all which belongs to your neighbor.³⁵

It mentions two Egypts, an obvious reference to the two regions of Egypt, upper (close to the head of the Nile) and lower (close to the Mediterranean).³⁶ As to when the inscription was made, George Morehouse, a mining engineer, has estimated that this could have taken place as recently as 500 years ago and as far back as two millennia.³⁷ A "revisionist" who has studied the inscription in detail believes that the text may be from the era of the Septuagint, i.e., over a century before the birth of Jesus—surely no comfort for conventional textbook authors. The stone's tenth commandment prohibiting covetousness mentions the wife before property, a feature of the Septuagint text.³⁸

Evidence of the ancient world's advanced tools, maps,³⁹ international trade, and highly sophisticated astronomical and observational science⁴⁰ never gets into college-level world history textbooks. The 34. A photocopy of Pfeiffer's translation appears in Deal, Discovery, p. 10.

35. L. Lyle Underwood, "The Los Lunas Inscription," Epigraphic Society Occasional Papers, X:1 (Oct. 1982), p. 58.

36. New Bible Dictionary, 2nd ed. (Wheaton, Illinois: Tyndale House, 1982), p. 302.

37. George E. Morehouse, "The Los Lunas Inscriptions[:] A Geological Study," Epigraphic Society Occasional Papers, XIII (Aug. 1985), p. 49.

38. Michael Skupin, "The Los Lunas Errata," ibid., XVIII (1989), p. 251.

39. Charles Hapgood, Maps of the Ancient Sea Kings (Philadelphia: Chilton, 1966).

40. O. Neugebauer and A. Sachs (eds.), Mathematical Cuneiform Texts (New Haven, Connecticut: American Oriental Society, 1945); Neugebauer and Richard A. Parker, Egyptian Astronomical Texts, 3 vols. (Providence, Rhode Island: Brown University Press, 1960); Neugebauer, The Exact Sciences in Antiquity, 2nd ed. (Providence, Rhode Island: Brown University Press, 1957); Livio C. Stecchini, "Astronomical Theory and Historical Data," in The Velikovsky Affair: The Warfare of Science and Scientism, ed. Alfred de Grazia (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, 1966), pp. 127–70. See also Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill: An essay on myth and the frame of time (Boston: Gambit, 1969).

evidence is automatically rejected or downplayed by conventional—and woefully uninformed—historians because it breaks with the familiar tenets of cultural evolution. Time is supposed to bring science, technology, and cultural advance. Cultural evolution, not cultural devolution, is supposed to be mankind's legacy to future generations. The thought that international trade across the oceans existed five centuries before Columbus, let alone five centuries before David,⁴¹ is an affront to cultural evolutionists. This is probably why a book like Patrick Huyghe's Columbus was Last (1992) had to be published by an obscure New York company, Hyperion. It also explains why there is so little awareness regarding amateur archeologist Emilio Estrada's 1957 discovery of buried Japanese pottery on the coast of Ecuador: Japan's Jomon-era stone-age pottery.⁴² Scholars do not want to face the obvious question: How did it get there? And why are there artistic similarities between the China's Shang dynasty and the Mesoamerica Olmec culture—large cats (sometimes without their lower jaws), the dragon, and the use of jade—which overlapped each other from the fifteenth to the twelfth centuries, B.C.?⁴³ Why were the implements and techniques used by the Mayans to make bark paper five centuries before Christ so similar to the implements and techniques used by the Chou dynasty in the same era? Of 121 individual traits, the two systems shared 91, half of which were non-essential, and the other half, while essential, had alternative approaches available.⁴⁴ Why didn't the Mesoamerican techniques match papermaking techniques used by cultures in other parts of America?⁴⁵ Why do Mayan stone art works after 500 B.C. shift from earlier forms to match Asian art forms of the same era?⁴⁶

Meanwhile, at the other end of the hemisphere, slate technologies have been discovered in burial sites of the ancient Red Paint (red ochre) People in Maine and Labrador. These artifacts match slate technologies in Scandinavia. The era of conjunction was some 4,000 years ago.⁴⁷ Huyghe wrote: "The principal deterrent to the notion of 41. Fell, Bronze Age America.

42. Patrick Huyghe Columbus was Last (New York: Hyperion, 1992), ch. 2.

43. Ibid., p. 84.

44. Ibid., pp. 86–87. See Paul Tolstoy, "Paper Route," Natural History (June 1991).

45. Ibid., p. 87.

46. Ibid., pp. 87–91. See Gunnar Thompson, Nu Sun (Fresno, California: Pioneer, 1989). Thompson is director of the American Discovery Project at California State University, Fresno.

47. Ibid., pp. 52–54.

historical contact is the widespread belief that ancient man was incapable of making ocean voyages in primitive boats. But there is no doubt that Europeans had oceangoing watercraft quite early. Bronze Age rock carvings in Europe show plank-built ships were sailing Atlantic coastal waters more than 4,000 years ago."⁴⁸

How many people know that the Carthaginians were sending trading ships to North America in the late fourth century B.C.? Throughout the eastern United States, Carthaginian coins that date from the era of 325 B.C. have been discovered near navigable rivers and off the Atlantic coast.⁴⁹ Beginning in the late eighteenth century, farmers in New England started digging up hoards of Roman coins⁵⁰. When did these coins arrive? Conventional historians do not bother to ask.

Few people know that numerous commercial bronze replicas of Assyrian deities have been discovered in Cuenca, Ecuador. The Phoenicians were producing these replicas on Cyprus as early as 600 B.C. Carthage, an offshoot of Phoenecia, exported them to barbarian peoples.⁵¹ We know that after 300 B.C., Carthage began to mint electrum coins: mostly gold, but with some silver. Where did Carthage get the gold? These fake deities in South America are evidence that Carthage imported gold from South America through the sale of these replicas.⁵² These trips would also explain where Carthage got the pine lumber for building huge warships⁵³ until the end of the First Punic War with Rome in 241 B.C.⁵⁴ (In that war, 264–41 B.C., Carthage lost 334 of these giant ships.)⁵⁵ Barry Fell speculated that before the defeat, they had brought trees as ballast from North America, which is why we discover bronze coins here. They bought lumber from the Indians.⁵⁶ After 241 B.C., Carthage concentrated on building her army, not her navy. Carthaginian trade with the Americas ceased. So do late-era coins discovered here.

Roman trade replaced Carthaginian trade in North America.⁵⁷ Paintings of Roman-Iberian coins appear on cave walls in Arkansas

48. Ibid., p. 54.

49. Barry Fell, Saga America (New York: Times Books, 1980), pp. 25–26, 62, 64.

50. Ibid., p. 27. Cf. Huyghe, Columbus Was Last, pp. 97–98.

51. Ibid., p. 82.

52. Ibid., p. 85.

53. Quinquiremes: five rowers per oar, 250 rowers, 120 marines plus officers: 400 men per ship. Ibid., p. 75.

54. Ibid., p. 76.

55. Ibid., p. 75.

56. Ibid., p. 86.

57. Ibid., chaps. 6, 7.

and as far west as Castle Gardens, near Moneta ("money"), Wyoming.⁵⁸ There were Iberian-based banks all across North America in the time of Jesus. These contacts continued, and they left traces. "In 1933, an astonished Mexican archeologist excavated a terra-cotta head of a Roman figurine of the third century A.D. from an undisturbed ancient grave sealed under the Calixtlahuaca pyramid, thirty-five miles southwest of Mexico City."⁵⁹

The Carthaginians and Romans were late-comers. The Scandinavians were trading in North America during the Bronze Age, possibly as early as 1700 B.C.⁶⁰—the era of Joseph in Egypt. A visiting Norwegian sailor-king left an account of one of these visits in what is now called Petroglyph Park in Peterborough, Ontario, in Canada. He had an inscription chiseled into rock, written in a nearly universal alphabet of the ancient world, ogam consaine,⁶¹ and another alphabet, equally universal, Tifnag, an alphabet still employed by the Tuaregs, a Berber tribe in North Africa. The Norse inscription was accompanied by a comment written by an Algonquin Indian scribe in a script common among the pre-Roman Basques, but using a form of the Algonquin language still understood.⁶² The inscription was discovered in 1954.⁶³

This same Basque script was also employed by the Cree Indians well into the nineteenth century. It was not known to be related to Basque until Fell transliterated into Latin consonants a document written in this "Indian" script. The document had been sent to him by a Basque etymologist who had been unable to decipher it. When it was transliterated, the Basque scholar recognized it as a pre-Roman dialect of the Basque tongue, one which was still in use in the medieval period.⁶⁴ Some of the words are virtually the same in both the Algonquin and ancient Basque tongues.⁶⁵ (Fell also read Greek, Latin, German, French, Danish, and Gaelic; he had a working knowledge of Sanskrit, Kufic Arabic, and several Asian and African languages.)⁶⁶

58. Ibid., pp. 134–35, 144, 148–49, 159–60.

59. Huyghe, Columbus Was Last, p. 98.

60. Fell, Bronze Age America, ch. 1. The dating is calculated by the zodiac data in the inscription: ch. 5, especially pp. 127, 130.

61. Said to be a gift to man from the Gaulish god Ogimos, god of the occult sciences. Ibid., p. 165.

62. Ibid., p. 36. For additional information, see Huyghe, Columbus Was Last, ch. 5.

63. Ibid., p. 39.

64. Ibid., p. 146. Comparisons of the North American Indian script and the ancient Basque script appear on pages 148–49.

65. Ibid., p. 151.

66. Huyghe, Columbus Was Last, p. 59.

A thousand years before the birth of Jesus, Celtic traders⁶⁷ were serving as missionaries in North America, bringing the stories of their gods across the continent: central and Western Canada, and as far south as Nevada and California. The petroglyphs of this era reproduce Norse gods whose names are in ogam.⁶⁸

Needless to say, none of this information has moved into college history textbooks. Textbooks include only certain kinds of texts. Textbook authors dismiss all such petroglyph evidence as “forgeries”—the same way they dismiss the texts of the Bible that challenge their concept of chronology. But this is beginning to change. A few academic specialists are beginning to admit that there is something of value in Fell’s work.⁶⁹ We can therefore predict the traditional three stages of academic surrender: (1) “It isn’t true.” (2) “It’s true, but so what?” (3) “We always knew it was true.” As of the first decade of the twenty-first century, we are still in stage one.

If Celtic traders were able bring their gods to North America, so were Jewish traders. God expected them to do this. To some extent, they did, as the Los Lunas stone indicates. But they did not do it on a scale that matched the Celts. The requirement that they return for Passover each year must have inhibited their journeys. This was a barrier to world evangelism. It was a temporary barrier. Israel’s old wineskins would inevitably be broken because the geographical boundaries of the Mosaic law would eventually be broken if God’s law was obeyed. Population growth would have seen to that. So would the cost of journeying to Jerusalem, especially for international Jewish traders. But even if the Mosaic law was disobeyed, those wineskins would be broken. This is what took place definitively with Jesus’ ministry, progressively with the establishment of the church, and finally in A.D. 70.⁷⁰ The fire on God’s earthly altar was extinguished forever.

When, 60 years later, Bar Kochba revolted, the Romans crushed the revolt in 135. There is a continuing stream of archeological discoveries indicating that some of the survivors fled to Tennessee and Kentucky. An early find in Bat Creek, Tennessee by Smithsonian field assistant John Emmert in 1889 is a five-inch stone inscribed with eight Hebrew characters. The significance of this was denied by the Smith-

67. Fell, Bronze Age America, ch. 14.

68. Ibid., chaps. 7–13.

69. Cf. David H. Kelley, “Proto-Tifinagh and Proto-Ogham in the Americas,” Review of Archeology, XI (Spring 1990).

70. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987).

sonian's curator, who claimed this was Cherokee syllabic script. As the saying goes, "Nice try, but no cigar"—he had read it upside-down. Over half a century later, Hebrew scholars turned it right-side up and discovered these consonants: LYHWD. In the early 1970s, Brandeis University's Hebraicist Cyrus H. Gordon identified the era of the style of these letters: Bar Kochba's. He translated the phrase: "A comet for the Jews," which was a standard phrase during the revolt. Similar coin finds from this era had been made in Kentucky, which Gordon believed had not been faked.⁷¹

None of this is in the textbooks. Neither is any reference to the massive 1,375-page two-volume bibliography, Pre-Columbian Contacts with the Americas Across the Oceans, which contains over 5,500 entries.⁷² For those of you who want to spend a lifetime following the trails into and out of America, here is the place to start.

M. Jesus' Liberation Theology: More Net Income

Commentators should not ignore the economic burdens for Israelite covenant-keepers prior to Jesus Christ's liberation of His people. When Jesus substituted the mandatory tithe and voluntary offerings for all of the economic burdens of Israel's sacrificial system, He liberated His people. That the vast majority of Christians have always resented paying the tithe shows that they are rebellious at heart. They regard the liberation of the tithe as a threat to their economic autonomy. Their hoped-for economic autonomy is an extension of their hoped-for moral autonomy. The theology undergirding the familiar slogan, "we're under grace, not law," has delivered them into the hands of the tax collectors. The rapacity of today's tax collectors is on a scale undreamed of by the tyrants of the ancient world. Yet Christians continue to re-elect their masters. They cannot discern the difference between tyranny and liberty. They have rejected the authoritative standard by which to judge the difference: God's Bible-revealed law.

I have never seen these economic aspects of Israel's sacrificial system and tithe system discussed by any Bible scholar. This may be because I have not read enough commentaries and academic journals written by higher critics and liberals. I suspect it is because Bible commentators are not trained to think economically.

71. Huyghe, Columbus Came Last, pp. 98–99. See Cyrus H. Gordon, Before Columbus: Links Between the Old World and Ancient America (New York: Crown, 1971).

72. Provo, Utah: Research Press, 1989. Compiled by John L. Sorenson and Martin H. Raish.

Contrary to the great Edersheim, who wrote that “the Law seems to regard Israel as intended to be only an agricultural people,”⁷³ the Mosaic law pressured Israelite families off their farms and into the cities. The eschatological task of filling of the earth is for mankind to bring all of nature under man’s dominion: the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:27–28). So was the economic pressure of Mosaic Israel. Mosaic laws that dealt with the land, the tribes, and the sacrifices were designed to be temporary. As the population of Israel grew as a result of God’s covenantal blessings,⁷⁴ the Israelites would have had to move out of the land into the cities, and then out of Israel into the world: away from Jerusalem. The centralized structure of temple sacrifice and worship would have become impossible to maintain. The Mosaic laws governing worship and sacrifice pointed to their annulment: the sooner, the better for a growing, prospering, urbanized population.

Conclusion

The Book of Leviticus is the book of holiness. It is the book of boundaries: ethical, familial, tribal, liturgical, cultural, and geographical. It is the book of ownership, property, and sacrifice. It probably is the most difficult book in the Bible to explain, verse by verse. That a commentary devoted only to the economics of Leviticus should be this large testifies to the problem. That my commentary is the first one ever written on this aspect of Leviticus also testifies to the problem. The commentators have ignored Leviticus for too long. Their prudence has come at a very high price.

Israel was to be a nation of priests (Ex. 19:6). The priests lived and worked in the holy city, just as the Levites lived in walled cities (Lev. 25:32–33). The earth is to be filled by city-dwellers. Nature is to be subdued by the nearby presence of myriads of men: the domestication of nature. To reverse a popular slogan of the ecology movement: “In wildness is the damnation of the world.” The people of God are to dwell in the city of God. This does not mean that there should be no gardens in cities. The tree of life is in the midst of the perfect city (Rev. 22:2). But it does mean that the city is fundamental; the garden is sup-

73. Edersheim, Temple, p. 379.

74. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 1: “Population Growth: Tool of Dominion”; ch. 55: “The Curse of Zero Growth”; Appendix B: “The Demographics of Decline.”

plemental.⁷⁵

The economic pressure on Israelites to move from the farm to the city was basic to Levitical law. The closer that a man lived to Israel's holy city, the less time he had to spend on the road. If he had to spend time on the road, he might as well become a traveling salesman. The Israelites were pressured economically by the laws of the festivals and the sacrifices to become a nation of traders. The economic laws of Leviticus also pressured the farmers of Israel to move into the cities. The residents of cities were in turn pressured to become international traders. This does not mean that there were to be no Israelite farmers in Israel, but there can be no doubt that the general thrust of the economic incentives under the Mosaic law's system of costs and benefits was to move God's covenant people off the farms and into the cities. They were to become a nation of manufacturers, shopkeepers, traders, and bankers—an early version of what England became in the nineteenth century. They were also to become a nation of foreign missionaries. If there is a unique thesis found in this commentary, this is it. I break definitively with the standard interpretation of the Hebrews as a rural people, which implies that their laws were not designed for an urban society.

In this book, I refer to laws, case laws, and statutes. Following Rushdoony's lead in Institutes of Biblical Law, I define a biblical case law as a Bible-revealed statute that applies a general principle of biblical law to a specific case. Rushdoony wrote that "the law, first, lays down broad and basic principles," but there is also "a second characteristic of Biblical law, namely, that the major portion of the law is case law, i.e., the illustration of the basic principle in terms of specific cases. These specific cases are often illustrations of the extent of the application of the law; that is, by citing a minimal type of case, the necessary jurisdictions of the law are revealed."⁷⁶ God has provided us with case laws in advance in the form of legally binding statutes. A case law illustrates a general legal principle, making this principle clearer by making it specific. God, as the sovereign Legislator, is also the sovereign Judge.

75. Christianity is at war with paganism. "Pagan" means "rustic, villager." Christianity triumphed in the cities of Rome; rural villages resisted. "Pagan," Oxford English Dictionary (Oxford University Press, 1971). Rural people clung to belief in animistic local gods. The public resurrection of occultism in the West after 1965 has been accompanied by the resurrection of earth worship, animism, and a self-consciously pagan environmentalist movement.

76. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 11.

Thus, biblical laws are simultaneously statute laws and case laws.

This usage does not conform to legal terminology in the United States. The modern humanist legal theorist defines a case law as a judge-made law that serves as a legal precedent. He regards case laws as the products of specific legal disputes, in contrast to statute laws enacted by legislatures. The modern dichotomy between case laws and statute law reflects the dichotomy between humanistic English common law, which floats on legal precedents announced by self-proclaimed autonomous judges, and Continental Europe's humanistic Napoleonic code, which floats on legal enactments announced by self-proclaimed autonomous legislatures.⁷⁷ Ultimately, this dichotomy reflects the autonomy in all humanist thought between historical flux and fixed principles of logic: Heraclitus ("all is in flux") vs. Parmenides ("logic is constant"). Neither approach solves the problem of discovering binding fixed principles of law that can be applied to a changing world. The Bible provides this; humanistic law schools do not.

77. Cf. A. V. Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 8th ed. (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty/Classics, [1915] 1982), esp. Chapter 12.

I. Sacrifices (Lev. 1–7)

INTRODUCTION TO PART I

And they shall no more offer their sacrifices unto devils, after whom they have gone a whoring. This shall be a statute for ever unto them throughout their generations. And thou shalt say unto them, Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers which sojourn among you, that offereth a burnt offering of sacrifice, And bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer it unto the LORD; even that man shall be cut off from among his people. And whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood; I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people. For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul. Therefore I said unto the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood, neither shall any stranger that sojourneth among you eat blood (Lev. 17:7–12).

Sacrifice is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of “sacrifice vs. no sacrifice.” It is always this question: Sacrifice to whom? And also this subordinate question: Which kind of sacrifice?

The Bible makes it clear that fallen man owes his sacrifices to the God of creation. This is the absolutely sovereign God who rules in heaven and on earth, in eternity and time. The five sacrifices of Leviticus 1–7 were required because of the absolute holiness of an absolutely sovereign God. Men have broken God’s law. As unholy covenant-breakers, they are in need of means of covenant renewal. The first point of the biblical covenant model, transcendence/immanence, appears in Leviticus in the section that presents laws establishing the five types of common sacrifice. These five sacrifices were not the mandatory corporate sacrifices associated with the national covenant renewal festivals of Passover, Pentecost (firstfruits), and Tabernacles, but rather the sacrifices of personal and familial covenant renewal that were available to the faithful.

Because the judicial foundation of covenant renewal between God and man is ethics rather than ritual precision, the prophets made it clear that God would pay no attention to the sacrifices of covenant-breakers who persisted in their rebellion. “Behold, ye trust in lying words, that cannot profit. Will ye steal, murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsely, and burn incense unto Baal, and walk after other gods whom ye know not; And come and stand before me in this house, which is called by my name, and say, We are delivered to do all these abominations?” (Jer. 7:8–10). Micah added rhetorically, “Wherewith shall I come before the LORD, and bow myself before the high God? shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?” (Mic. 6:6–8). Ethics is primary; this is why the laws governing the sacrifices are found in book three of the Pentateuch: Leviticus, the book of holiness. They are not found in book four: Numbers, the Pentateuch’s book of sanctions.¹

A. Holiness and Sacrifice

Before we begin an analysis of the meaning of the five sacrifices of Leviticus 1–7, we must have an understanding of the role of the tribe of Levi in Mosaic Israel. The Levites were the guardians of the sacramental boundaries (Num. 18). The family of Aaron within the tribe of Levi served as the priests, i.e., those who actually performed the sacrifices. They had legal access to the inner area of the temple that was closed even to the Levites. The high priest once a year had access to the holy of holies (Ex. 30:10). Thus, the ultimate boundaries in Mosaic Israel were judicial-spatial.² The temple, the place where the Ark of the Covenant resided—the royal residence of the God on earth—was supremely holy, geographically speaking.³ Inside the Ark were the two

1. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point five Press, [1997] 2012).

2. These boundaries ended forever with the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

3. Meredith G. Kline, Images of the Spirit (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, 1980), tables of the law: the Ten Commandments (Deut. 31:9, 26). The holiest place on earth was where the original records of God's covenantal law rested. The judicial links among God's written law, Israel's national and cultural boundaries, Israel's holiness, and the priestly tribe of Levi constitute the central message of the Book of Leviticus.

What about the economics of Leviticus? We begin with this observation: based on God's ownership of both the land (Lev. 25:23) and the Israelites (Lev. 20:26), He established a unique set of property rights over Israel and inside Israel. As is true in all cases of property rights, these rights were marked by a series of legal boundaries. The Book of Leviticus, the third book in the Pentateuch, is most closely associated with these boundaries.⁴

B. The Five Year-Round Sacrifices

There are five year-round sacrifices in Leviticus. Like the three mandated festival-feasts (Lev. 23),⁵ all five sacrifices had to be offered to God at a central location. To get to this central location, most of the Israelites had to walk.

All five of these Levitical sacrifices had to be cut into pieces or divided before they were placed on the altar. Only the Passover lamb was placed on the altar whole. Its flesh was first penetrated, allowing the blood to flow out (Ex. 12:7), but there is no mention that it was to be cut into pieces before roasting.⁶ This is consistent with the New Testament's identification of Jesus Christ as the Passover lamb (I Cor. 5:7): His body was not broken by the Roman guards, although one of them pierced His flesh with a spear (John 19:32–37).

The first section of Leviticus, chapters 1–7, deals with ritual offerings and the labor of the priests. James Jordan has divided Leviticus into five sections: (1) the sacrifices, five in number⁷ (Lev. 1–7); (2) the cleansing of God's house (Lev. 8–16); (3) holy living before the Lord pp. 39–42.

4. The third commandment establishes a boundary around God's name: "Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain" (Ex. 20:7a). The eighth commandment (the third in the second table of the law) establishes property rights: "Thou shalt not steal" (Ex. 20:15).

5. Introduction, pp. 12–19.

6. "And they roasted the passover with fire according to the ordinance: but the other holy offerings sod they in pots, and in caldrons, and in pans, and divided them speedily among all the people" (II Chron. 35:13).

7. Burnt offerings (Lev. 1), cereal offerings (Lev. 2), peace offerings (Lev. 3), purification offerings (Lev. 4:1), and compensation offerings (Lev. 5:14, 6:1).

(Lev. 17–22); (4) holy times or feasts (Lev. 23); and (5) the historical perspective (Lev. 24–27).⁸ I divide Leviticus differently:

1. The five sacrifices (Lev. 1–7)
2. The priestly, hierarchical cleansing of God's house and man's house, including the land—a means of deliverance (Lev. 8–16)
3. Laws of separation (Lev. 17–22)
4. Covenant-renewal festivals and covenant-breaking acts (Lev. 23–24)
5. Inheritance (Lev. 25–27)

The five-fold system of sacrifices parallels the five-point covenant model that Ray Sutton has elaborated.⁹ Wrote Jordan: “The sacrifices that occupy the first seven chapters are themselves arranged by this pattern. The first section, chapters 1–3, concerns the relationship between God and man directly: The Burnt Offering affirmed God's transcendence, the Cereal or Tribute Offering affirmed the Israelite's fealty to God, and the Peace Offering affirmed God's fellowship with man. The Purification Offering had to do not with cleansing the individual sinner, but with cleansing God's house, society at large, which was symbolically defiled by the presence of sinners. The house of God was the place of mediation, so appropriately the Purification Offering is discussed next. The Compensation Offering had two purposes: to deal with theft (point three) and with perjury (point four). finally, the last point of the covenant/re-creation sequence has to do with succession, the appointment of servants to continue the work begun by the master.”¹⁰

By structuring the five offerings in terms of the five points of the

8. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. 15–17. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>). It is interesting that John E. Hartley has found a five-part message in Leviticus: God's holiness, presence, covenant, sacrifice, and continuity with the New Testament. Hartley, Leviticus, vol. 4 of Word Bible Commentary (Dallas, Texas: Word Books, 1992), pp. lvi–lxiii. Using Sutton's five-point covenant model, I would rearrange the list: God's presence (as in transcendence/presence), covenant (which Hartley identifies with God's deliverance of Israel from bondage, i.e., historical prologue), holiness (boundaries), sacrifice (sanctions), and continuity with the New Testament. Hartley sees a six-part division in Leviticus: ibid., p. xxxiv. He also refers to rival theories: two sections, four sections, and nine sections. Ibid., p. xxxii. He does not mention five sections.

9. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1995). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) biblical covenant model, God reminded the Israelites of their covenantal obligations. Let us review this structure.

10. Jordan, Covenant Sequence, p. 22.

First, except for the hide, which was retained by the priest (Lev. 7:8), the whole burnt offering was completely consumed; none of the edible portion remained in the possession of men, either the priests or the offerer. This pointed to God's complete transcendence. The hide, like the hides in which God wrapped Adam and Eve (Gen. 3:21), testified to God's presence with them in history.

Second, the grain offering represented point two of the covenant. This offering pointed back to the historical prologue (associated with point two)¹¹ of the nation: the exodus events. As with the Passover meal of the exodus, this offering could not be leaven (Lev. 2:4). Point two is also associated with the covenant itself, just as Exodus, the second book of the Pentateuch, is called the book of the covenant (Ex. 24:7). The grain offering was the unique offering of the covenant, for it was associated with salt, a mineral used to flavor or preserve something or else destroy it, e.g., salting the land (Jud. 9:45): the salt of the covenant. Salt was specifically associated with the grain offering. "And every oblation of thy meat [meal] offering shalt thou season with salt; neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat [meal] offering; with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt" (Lev. 2:13).

Third, the peace (well-being) offering, dealt with boundaries: how covenant-keeping man can lawfully cross the boundaries and come into God's presence in a shared meal. The priests—guardians of the boundaries of holy places and things—ate part of it (Lev. 7:14–15, 32–34). The offerer ate part of it, so long as he or she was ritually clean (Lev. 7:19). To violate this rule was to create a new judicial boundary: "But the soul that eateth of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, that pertain unto the LORD, having his uncleanness upon him, even that soul shall be cut off from his people" (Lev. 7:20).

Fourth was the sin (purification) offering. It was offered in order to avoid God's sanctions. The vessel in which it was prepared was either smashed or scoured afterward (Lev. 6:28).

Fifth, there was the trespass or reparations offering. The priest kept the skin of the animal (Lev. 7:9). Animal skins were also God's gift to Adam and Eve just before they were cast out of the garden (Gen. 3:21). These skins were the coverings that would preserve them: a testimony to God's grace to them by providing a future.

11. Meredith G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy: Studies and Commentary (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963), pp. 52–61. See also Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 53–57.

C. Atonement for Sin, Not Food for God

Milgrom points out that all the food sacrifices were to be performed where laymen could view them: on the outer altar in the open courtyard.¹² This courtyard was open to all Israelites.¹³ These sacrifices were public acts. Speaking of the altar of incense, which was inside the tent or tabernacle, God said: "Ye shall offer no strange incense thereon, nor burnt sacrifice, nor meat offering; neither shall ye pour drink offering thereon" (Ex. 30:9). The sacrifices were for the benefit of the nation. They were not for "the care and feeding of God"—a fundamental error of Mesopotamian religion generally.¹⁴

The sacrifices atoned for men's sins. This also meant cleansing. "For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the LORD" (Lev. 16:30). By appeasing God through sacrifice, the nation was enabled to escape God's wrath in history. But the fundamental sacrifice is always ethical: avoiding sin after payment to God has been made. That is to say, the essence of acceptable sacrifice is ethical holiness, just as the judicial foundation of holiness is sacrifice.

12. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 59.

13. Ibid., p. 148. He provided a suggested sketch of the outer court, which was separate from, but contiguous to, the tent and the inner court: p. 135.

14. Idem.

1

SACRIFICE, STEWARDSHIP, AND DEBT

And the LORD called unto Moses, and spake unto him out of the tabernacle of the congregation, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, If any man of you bring an offering unto the LORD, ye shall bring your offering of the cattle, even of the herd, and of the flock. If his offering be a burnt sacrifice of the herd, let him offer a male without blemish: he shall offer it of his own voluntary will at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the LORD. And he shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt offering; and it shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him (Lev. 1:1–4).

To understand any biblical law, we should first seek to discover its theocentric meaning. The theocentric meaning of every law governing sacrifice is God as the sanctions-bringer: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. The Law of the Sacrifices

What does this law have to do with God and His relation to man? James Jordan argued that the whole burnt sacrifice symbolized the death of the sacrificer. This death was imputed judicially to the animal.

What actually happens is that the animal becomes dead. It is death, the penal judgment for sin, that is put on the animal. The man is given life, a new beginning, because the animal takes the death he deserves. The effect of the sacrifice of the animal is that the believer's guilt and sin are removed, but what is transferred to the animal is the sinner's liability to death.

Death is both primordial and eschatological. Adam rejected the

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Tree of Life in order to commit sin, so he chose death before he sinned. Death is also the eschatological punishment for sin—those who choose death are given death. Man's death-nature is the well-spring of his sin, so death must be dealt with before sin is. To put this in systematic-theological language: justification comes before sanctification. Justification is initial, juridical life, which leads to a life of holiness, and culminates in glorification: eschatological life.

What the sacrifice removes is not sin but death, the judgment for sin. Death having been removed, it is now possible to live a righteous life.²

Leviticus begins with the law governing the burnt offering. "A male without blemish" was required, which was also the requirement for the Passover lamb: "Your lamb shall be without blemish, a male of the first year: ye shall take it out from the sheep, or from the goats" (Ex. 12:5). The phrase, "without blemish," is repeated throughout Leviticus.³ The blemish-free sacrificial animal symbolized God's requirement of a final sacrifice that alone serves as a legal ransom payment (atonement)⁴ to God for man's sin. Peter wrote:

Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot: Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you, Who by him do believe in God, that raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory; that your faith and hope might be in God (I Peter 1:18–21).

The requirement of a blemish-free sacrifice meant that the individual who was seeking a legal eradication of the legal effects of sin could not expect to attain it at a discount. He had to forfeit something of obvious value. He could not offer an imperfect, less valuable animal

2. James Jordan, "The Whole Burnt Sacrifice: Its Liturgy and Meaning," Biblical Horizons Occasional Paper, No. 11, p. 4.

3. Leviticus 1:10; 3:1,6; 4:23,28,32; 5:11,18; 6:6; 9:2-3; 14:10; 22:19; 23:12,18. It also appears repeatedly in Numbers.

4. Wenham said that the Hebrew word kippur, "to make atonement," may be derived from one of two words. One means "ransom price," and the other means "to wipe away." The ransom price was the money a legally condemned man could pay to escape the death penalty (Ex. 21:30; Prov. 6:35). In some passages, the former seems more appropriate (Ex. 30:15; Num. 31:50). The latter seems more appropriate in passages that deal with the altar (Lev. 15:33). Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 28.

and still expect to please God. The offering had to cost him something: an animal with higher market value than a blemished animal. David later declared: "Nay; but I will surely buy it of thee at a price: neither will I offer burnt offerings unto the LORD my God of that which doth cost me nothing. So David bought the threshing floor and the oxen for fifty shekels of silver" (II Sam. 24:24).⁵ A later generation of Israelites broke this law by offering blind, lame, and sick animals (Mal. 1:8).

The same principle of costly sacrifice applied to the grain offerings: "And when any will offer a meat [meal] offering unto the LORD, his offering shall be of fine flour; and he shall pour oil upon it, and put frankincense thereon" (Lev. 2:1). (This rule did not apply to sacrifices involving birds, presumably for the sake of the poor.)⁶

B. A Blemish-Free Sacrifice

I begin with the question: In what way does this law reflect the character of God? Second, in what way does this law reflect God's relationship with man, especially fallen man?

The whole burnt offering was the first of five Levitical sacrifices. This sacrifice established two legal principles. First, God deserves the best we have to offer: a blemish-free male sacrifice. Second, God places limits on our mandated sacrifices: men owed God only one animal. So, while the blemish-free male sacrifice testified to the Israelites' total indebtedness to God, the requirement of only one animal placed limits on the sense of guilt and obligation. We are not supposed to become paralyzed by the thought of our total depravity. We are not asked by God to burn up everything we own in a hopeless quest to placate Him with acts of personal sacrifice. We owe Him far too much for such futile acts of self-sacrifice to repay our massive debts.

When we offer a blemish-free male sacrifice to God, God acknowledges this as a representative act of our total submission to Him as absolutely sovereign. A blemish-free male sacrifice publicly symbolizes our acknowledgment of our total dependence on His absolutely sovereign mercy. In Leviticus 1, this blemish-free male sacrifice was a bull. In the New Covenant, this male sacrifice was Jesus Christ (Heb. 9).

As we shall see in this chapter, any attempt to offer a blemished sacrifice is a judicially representative assertion of man's own partial autonomy: a denial of man's total depravity and also God's absolute sovereignty. On the other hand, any attempt to offer more than what is required is also an assertion of man's partial autonomy: a declaration that men are capable of paying God everything they owe Him out of their own assets.⁷

5. David paid 600 shekels of gold for the land (I Chron. 21:25). The 50 shekels were the price of the oxen.

6. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 167.

Whenever men seek to evade either principle of the law governing the first Levitical sacrifice, they will soon find themselves in bondage to a god of their own making. This god will always establish boundaries. Those who dwell inside these boundaries will receive the god's mercy; those outside these boundaries will receive the god's wrath. This god will become progressively merciless toward some and indulgent toward others. In our day, this god is the state. The modern state is progressively merciless toward covenant-keepers and progressively indulgent toward covenant-breakers.

C. Substitute Sacrifices

We are incapable of buying our own salvation. We are therefore required to acknowledge ritually the purchase of our salvation by the Son of God. This ritual sacrifice is not economically empty, however; it involves suffering a loss. Biblically, it involves the whole of our lives: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (Rom. 12:1).⁸ The required animal sacrifices of the Old Covenant were merely token payments—judicial and economic representations—of man's required sacrifice of his whole life.⁹

The Israelite was told that he had to bring a blemish-free animal to God's altar. He was not permitted to substitute a less valuable animal. God would not tolerate anything but the best of the flock. Wenham wrote: "Only the best is good enough for God."¹⁰ This pointed to the magnitude of God's own sacrifice: the best of His "flock," the very Lamb of God.

From the day that Cain offered an agricultural sacrifice rather than

7. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3: Tools of Dominion (1990) ch. 56.

8. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

9. The Communists in their formative years fully understood this biblical principal of sacrifice, a fact reflected by the title of Communist defector Benjamin Gitlow's study of American Communism, The Whole of Their Lives (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1948).

10. Wenham, Leviticus, p. 51.

an animal sacrifice, men have attempted to substitute unacceptable sacrifices of their own choosing. This substitution symbolically asserts man's sovereignty in the transaction. Man also sometimes offers "discount" sacrifices. God rejects them. "Ye said also, Behold, what a weariness is it! and ye have snuffed at it, saith the LORD of hosts; and ye brought that which was torn, and the lame, and the sick; thus ye brought an offering: should I accept this of your hand? saith the LORD. But cursed be the deceiver, which hath in his flock a male, and voweth, and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing: for I am a great King, saith the LORD of hosts, and my name is dreadful among the heathen" (Mal. 1:13–14).

A prohibited sacrifice might also be an expensive sacrifice. Cain did in fact bring something to God's altar; for all we know, it was the best of his crop. But it is not simply the value of the sacrifice that God has in mind; it is the specific character of the sacrifice. In Cain's case, God required a blood offering. When a blood offering was required, there could be no lawful substitution of a less valuable animal, let alone a forbidden animal or a grain offering.

God did eventually accept a physically blemished sacrifice, a sacrifice with stripes or welts. It was an ethically clean sacrifice but a physically blemished one. As Isaiah said, "he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed" (Isa. 53: 5). This unique sacrifice was born blemish-free, lived blemish-free, but died visibly blemished. This sacrifice alone in history was lawfully brought to God's altar in a blemished condition: lawfully for God, but unlawfully for the courts that tried Him.¹¹ These blemishes represented the results of man's sin—negative sanctions imposed by a court (Matt. 27:26)—and Jesus Christ on Calvary became sin for us representatively. "For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him" (II Cor. 5:21).

By offering anything except the best of his flock, the Israelite was declaring ritually that his sin was really not so great in God's eyes, and therefore the price that God would ask the Messiah to pay in man's stead would not be excessive. This was another way of saying that the negative sanctions that God imposes on sin are not really absolute. In short, this was an assertion of man's ability to pay for his own sins. By offering a substandard, prohibited sacrifice, the atonement-seeker was saying that the magnitude of his own sin was not so great that the leftovers of his flock could not serve as a lawful payment in God's court.

11. That which was evil for men to do—offering a blemished sacrifice—resulted in that which was not only acceptable before God but actually predestined by God from the beginning. This two-fold character of the atonement process was also present in Judas' betrayal: "And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!" (Luke 22:22).

Except in the case of birds, the texts required that the sacrificed animals be unblemished, meaning valuable. Nevertheless, the whole burnt offering was a limited sacrifice: only one animal was required, not the whole flock. Mosaic man was reminded that he dare not try to cheat God by offering a blemished sacrifice, for he owed God everything; nevertheless, he was not to deceive himself by offering everything he owned in a vain attempt to buy his salvation.

D. Public Sacrifice and Implicit Stewardship

Because a covenant-keeping man in Israel offered the best of his flock as a token of God's absolute ownership of both him and his flock, he thereby retained lawful title in God's court to everything that remained in his possession. His life and his possessions were no longer tainted, for his representative sacrificial act removed God's curse in history. By sacrificing the best of his flock, he re-established his claim of legitimate ownership in God's court. Because he personally bore the economic loss, he established lawful title to future benefits from his property. Only someone who has the legal authority to disown a piece of property can accurately be said to own it.¹² An Israelite disowned his representative animal—the best of his flock—by sacrificing it. He publicly acknowledged in principle that he owed God everything he owned, and that whatever he retained, he retained by God's grace as a steward in history. His sins were judicially covered in God's historical court, and therefore his remaining property was to be retained under his lawful control as God's steward.

Had he sacrificed a low-value animal, he would have been symbolically asserting that God had lawful title to only the dregs of his capital assets, the leftovers. This would have constituted a rebellion on his part: the theft of God's property, meaning the public repudiation of his delegated position as God's steward. But this stewardship cannot legally be repudiated. Man is still held responsible by God for the faithful administration of God's property. Stewardship is therefore an inescapable concept. It is never a question of "stewardship vs. no stewardship"; it is always a question of stewardship for whom. This is why Jesus warned, "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Matt. 6:24).¹³ But we cannot serve no master, either. We have to serve someone or something: point two of the biblical covenant model.

12. F. A. Harper, Liberty: A Path to Its Recovery (Auburn, Alabama, Mises Institute, [1949] 2007), p. 106. (<http://bit.ly/HarperLiberty>)

When we identify the sovereign agent for which men work as economic stewards, we have identified the god of that particular society. Beginning in the mid-eighteenth century, the right wing of the Enlightenment¹⁴ proclaimed the free market as the institutional master, which in the twentieth century was labeled consumers' sovereignty,¹⁵ but which is more accurately described as customers' authority. Sovereignty is an aspect of the judicial order (legal ownership), not the economy (asset allocation). Producers are property owners and therefore equally sovereign. But they possess far less economic authority than customers, who own the most marketable commodity: money. Also beginning in the eighteenth century, the left wing of the Enlightenment proclaimed the state as the institutional master (citizens' sovereignty). In each case, the Enlightenment proclaimed autonomous man as the judicial sovereign: the ultimate owner.¹⁶ The question then became: Which institution best represents this new sovereign: the free

13. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14: "Rival Masters, Rival Kingdoms."

14. The Scottish Enlightenment: Adam Ferguson, David Hume, Adam Smith, etc. See Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix C: "Adam Smith's Theory of Economic Sanctions."

15. The man who coined the phrase was the British-born South African economist William H. Hutt. See Hutt, "The Nature of Aggressive Selling," Economica (1935); reprinted in Individual Freedom: Selected Works of William H. Hutt, eds. Svetozar Pejovich and David Klingaman (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1975), p. 185. Ludwig von Mises adopted it: "The economic foundation of this bourgeois system is the market economy in which the consumer is sovereign." Mises, "The Economic Foundations of Freedom," The Freeman (April 1960); reprinted in Mises, Economic Freedom and Interventionism, ed. Bettina Bien Greaves (Irvington-on-Hudson, New York: Foundation for Economic Education, 1990), p. 4. The idea is consumer supremacy. "What matters is not the behavior of the entrepreneurs but the supremacy of the consumers." Mises, "Inequality of Wealth and Incomes," Ideas on Liberty (May 1955); reprinted in ibid., p. 46.

16. Chapter 4:O.

market or the state?¹⁷ Christians ever since have chosen sides between these rival humanist viewpoints. They have not gone to the Bible in search of another approach. This is why my economic commentary represents a radical break with the past.

Consider the comparative political appeal of these rival doctrines of final earthly sovereignty. The state rules by the monopolistic sword, while the market is dependent on this sword to adjudicate and then enforce disputed contracts.¹⁸ The state concentrates power; the market diffuses power. The state's representation of sovereign power is publicly visible;¹⁹ the market's representation of subordinate power is confined to such emblems as profit-and-loss statements, balance sheets, and share prices on a stock market. The state's manifestation of power is easily understood by the average man; the market's manifestation of power is understood only through complex chains of highly specialized economic reasoning. In the struggle to gain public allegiance, and therefore moral legitimacy, the state has most of the advantages most of the time. If the state is not restrained by a theology of God's primary sovereignty, it will threaten man with servitude in history. What man grants to the state theologically he will pay for economically.

17. A parallel argument took place after Darwin's Origin of Species (1859). Social Darwinism was divided between the defenders of the free market social order and the statist. The former—most notably Herbert Spencer and William Graham Sumner—based their defense on the competitive nature of free market capitalism, which, they argued, is analogous to a ruthless, unplanned, directionless, evolving nature. Autonomous nature is to be the model for society, they believed. The statist—most notably Lester Frank Ward—counter-argued that human society has now superseded the rule of once-planless nature, just as the brain of man has superseded all other brains in nature, and therefore a scientific elite can successfully direct the social evolutionary process through the application of state power. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A.

18. Bruce L. Benson presents a case for a society without civil courts: The Enterprise of Law: Justice Without the State (San Francisco, California: Pacific Research Institute for Public Policy, 1990). The judicial problem is that some disputes can be resolved only through the imposition of sanctions or the threat thereof. Who has the authority to impose such sanctions within a geographical area? Which laws are legitimate? Which sanctions are legitimate? What is to prevent the development of a warlord society if the principle of civil sanctions is not honored?

19. There is a link between totalitarianism and military symbols. The two major totalitarian societies of the mid-twentieth century, Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union, had annual parades where tanks rolled and soldiers marched. Sociologist Robert Nisbet wrote: "The final attribute of totalitarianism that tends to be emphasized in conservative analyses since Burke is the militarization of culture and society. . . . Once Trotsky took on the responsibility of transmuting the Czarist into the Red Army, military symbols began to burgeon. The military tunic received a value in society it had never held before; so did military rank in all councils of government. . . . Far more important than actual war in mobilizing a population is war-society, irrespective of outbreaks of war." Robert Nisbet, The Making of Modern Society (Brighton, Sussex: Wheatsheaf, 1986), pp. 202–3.

The whole burnt offering symbolized God's primary ownership and man's stewardship under God. Whatever man owns has been granted to him by God. Whenever the doctrine of sovereignty is transferred from God to the state, so is the concept of primary ownership. The state is then regarded as the absolute owner. Individuals become stewards of the state. They own only what the state allows them to retain. A grant of tax exemption by the state is regarded as revocable at any time. This is why a successful defense of freedom must begin with the doctrine of God's sovereignty and permanent restraints on those covenantal agencies that represent God in history. The permanent economic limit on the church is the tithe: 10% of a person's net output (= net income).²⁰ The permanent economic restraint on civil government is also the tithe: all combined levels of the state may not lawfully claim so much as a tithe (I Sam. 8:15–17).²¹

Whenever men deny God's absolute sovereignty, they also deny His right to place economic and judicial limits on those institutions that represent Him judicially. This leads inevitably to an attempt by men to transfer final sovereignty in history: from God to some human agency, usually the state. The state then seeks to place boundaries around God's revealed word, the Bible. The alternative is to admit that God's revealed word has placed boundaries around the state. Boundaries are an inescapable concept. The questions are: Who creates them? Who lawfully announces them? What are they? How are they enforced? How are they modified over time? The one who successfully commands sacrifice is the god of the society, the law-giver.

E. Debt Relief

This law made it plain to all that there is a price to be paid for sin. Man must pay this price. There is no escape. God imposes it and then collects it. The question is: How high is this price? If it is higher than any sin-corrupted man can pay in history, must all men pay the penalty throughout eternity? If not, who can and will pay it?

20. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

21. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

1. Buying God's Favor

This passage could easily be misinterpreted apart from a clear understanding of its theocentric foundation. It would be easy to conclude that fallen man can purchase the favor of God, or at least temporary legal standing before God, through the payment of a price. By forfeiting the ownership of a valuable asset, fallen man might conclude that he can buy God's blessing or avoid God's wrath. Salvation would then be understood as a period of healing in between sacrifices: the outcome of a payment by fallen man to a powerful God. He might conclude: "My offer of a sacrifice buys time from God." This has been the view of religions throughout history, at least those that acknowledge the reality of time.²²

The Bible teaches that fallen man is incapable of offering anything to God that is sufficiently valuable to placate His wrath for man's sin. Fallen man has nothing of value to offer God. Isaiah 64:6 informs us: "But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags;²³ and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away." The moral corruption of man has tainted the whole creation; it, too, is under the curse of death.²⁴ All of our offerings are inescapably tainted. Therefore, it is impossible for the blood of animals, in and of itself, to placate the God of the Bible. "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins" (Heb. 10:4). Shed blood did defer God's wrath in history. How? Because the animal's death was judicially representative: part of a hierarchical system of authority. The shedding of the blood of certain

22. Biblical religion also requires a redeeming sacrifice. Were it not for the sacrifice of Jesus Christ in history, to which God looked forward in time, Adam would have been executed on the day he sinned (Gen. 2:17). The difference between biblical religion and pagan religion with respect to sacrifice is that Christianity teaches that the sole acceptable sacrifice before God is the single, representative, judicial act of the life of an ethically perfect man, Jesus Christ. Covenant-keeping man is to redeem the time—buy it back—through a Holy Spirit-empowered, progressive ethical conformity to God's law. The biblical concept of salvation is therefore both judicial and ethical. Paul's injunction to redeem the time appears in the middle of an intensely ethical passage. "Wherefore he saith, Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, Redeeming the time, because the days are evil" (Eph. 5:14–16).

23. Literally: menstruous rags. Hebrew root word meaning woman's period: ayd. See Strong's Hebrew #5708: James Strong, The Exhaustive Concordance of the Bible.

24. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 12: "Scarcity: Curse and Blessing"; North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), pp. 8–11. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>) specified animals was covenant-keeping man's public acknowledgment of his subordination to God and his legal debt to God.

Hierarchy and representation—point two of the biblical covenant model—lead us to the issue of ownership: point three. The necessity of representative sacrifice involves the necessity of economic loss. Adam violated God's boundary; God therefore imposed a cost on Adam and his heirs. Adam stole what was God's; God therefore imposed restitution payments on Adam and his heirs. Adam denied God's absolute sovereignty (#1) and revolted against God's authority (#2) by violating God's property (#3). God's sanctions (#4) are mandatory. Who pays? Under the Mosaic law, the owners of sacrificial animals paid with their valuable animals, and the animals paid with their lives. This chain of events raises some fundamental questions.

2. Substantial Losses

Why was there a Levitical requirement of blemish-free sacrifices? Why did God impose a system of sacrifice on fallen man, whether blood sacrifice or economic, if the specific sacrifice is insufficient to cover sin? Why require a high-value, blemish-free animal? Because man is made in the image of God, and his acts are supposed to reflect God's acts. This raises the question of God's acts.

God has offered a sacrifice to Himself: a high-value, ethically blemish-free sacrifice. To meet His own judicial standards, God forfeited in history the most valuable Lamb of His flock, His own Son. It is not what fallen man pays to God that repays God for sin (a trespass or boundary violation); it is what God pays to Himself. The blemish-free animal in the Mosaic sacrificial system symbolized (i.e., judicially represented) this perfectionist aspect of lawful atonement. Even closer symbolically than slain animals was God's announcement to Abraham that he would have to sacrifice Isaac, a payment for which God later mandated a substitute: the ram (Gen. 22:13). The faithful Israelite of the Old Covenant acknowledged ritually and economically that such a sacrifice by God would be substituted by God in the future; until then, he would have to bear earthly economic losses in order to regain lawful standing before God. Isaiah made it clear that the coming Messiah would be the one to pay God's full price (Isa. 53:2–12).

It was not that the faithful Israelite could legitimately expect to pay for his sin through the forfeiture of a blemish-free animal. It was only that God required him to suffer a large loss. God's negative sanctions against sin impose inescapable costs on man and beast (Gen. 3:17–19;²⁵ Rom. 8:19–22²⁶). Man is required to acknowledge the existence of these costs, as well as the judicial necessity of his bearing such costs, either personally or through his representative legal agent.

3. The Hierarchy of Debt

These costs, however, are greater than mankind's total wealth. "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Matthew 16:26).²⁷ This lack of sufficient funds was the message of Jesus' kingdom parable in Matthew 18: a servant who owed a gigantic amount to his master was conditionally forgiven of this debt by his master. Then the servant demanded the immediate repayment of a comparatively tiny amount from a poor debtor, and when the poor man could not pay, the steward had him thrown into debtors' prison. Then the master revoked his mercy and delivered the servant to debtors' prison. "Then his lord, after that he had called him, said unto him, O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me: Shouldest not thou also have had compassion on thy fellowservant, even as I had pity on thee? And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him. So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses" (Matt. 18:32–35).²⁸

If we are to take this parable as a representation of God's judicial relationship with fallen man, we must conclude that God's forgiveness of a man's debts is conditional.²⁹ The former debtor must forgive the debts owed to him by his neighbor. The neighbor, according to the parable of the good Samaritan, is that person who walks the same road we do who has been harmed along the way through no fault of his own (Luke 10:30–37).³⁰ When we help him, we should not insist on repay-

25. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 12.

26. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

27. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 35.

28. Ibid., ch. 37: "A Hierarchy of Indebtedness."

29. Ray R. Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?" Theonomy: An Informed Response, ed. Gary North (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gntheon>)

30. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 21: "The Good Samaritan and ment. Similarly, when I lend to him for commercial purposes, I should not expect him to repay me if I have had my debts forgiven. My continuing legal status as a forgiven debtor is conditional on my granting the same status to those who owe me anything.

Why should this be true? Because the debt-credit relationship is inescapably hierarchical. The borrower is servant to the lender (Prov. 22:7).³¹ When God grants me credit, and I in turn grant someone else credit, that person has become God's servant through me. This is why biblical law recommends that God's people become creditors to covenant-breakers, but not become debtors to them (Deut. 28:12).³²

What commentators rarely (if ever) mention is that the poor debtor owed the money to the rich master. The steward had merely served as an economic and legal middleman. The steward had advanced the poor person money that did not belong to the steward; it had been borrowed from the master. The steward had legal control over the money temporarily; he did not own it. This is the definition of all stewardship: temporary legal control over the use of another person's asset. This leads to an important conclusion: the master's legal annulment of the debt owed to him by the steward was therefore also a legal annulment of the debts of all debtors under the steward's economic authority. In other words, the debt structure was hierarchical: from the poor man to the master through the steward.³³

Why was the steward unjust? His sin was more than ethical injustice to a poor person; it was judicial rebellion against the master. By trying to collect payment from the poor man, the steward was saying: "I am no longer a middleman, now that my debt has been forgiven. I am now the owner of assets. The credit I extended with borrowed money is still owed to me irrespective of my previous obligations. I am therefore no longer a steward. I am no longer under hierarchy. I can now collect what is lawfully mine from those who are under me." His refusal to cancel the debt that had been owed to the master through the steward's lending was a rebellious declaration of independence. He became a thief and a usurper, for he was trying to collect for his own account assets that, economically speaking, had belonged to the master. He was trying to profit from the master's mercy. He refused to ac-

the Concept of Neighbor."

31. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 67.

32. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 37.

33. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 37.

knowledge the economics of forgiveness. The master had implicitly released the poor man from his debt, which had been owed to the master by way of the servant, the day the master released his steward from his obligation. The unjust steward refused to acknowledge the legality of this indirect (representative) release. He held to the letter of the law—the terms of the original debt contract—rather than to the underlying economics of the transaction: hierarchical representation and lawful subordination. So, the master reimposed the debt in order to remind the steward that he was still nothing but a steward, that he was still under the master's lawful authority.

However, by consigning the unjust steward to prison, the master was implicitly reimposing the debt on the poor man. The master in the parable did not order the release of the poor man. Why not? Because such a unilateral act of debt release would have been theft: stealing from the steward, i.e., taking away an asset that the steward could use to repay his debt. The master could forgive the poor debtor only by forgiving the steward's debt by the same amount. The steward's wife or heirs were legally empowered to collect everything owed to him in a vain attempt to pay off the master.

The day of reckoning—an accounting concept—had come for both the steward and the poor debtor. Time had run out for both of them. Their debt pyramid had toppled. The hierarchy of debt repayment would now be felt up and down the chain of obligations. Those foolish enough to have indebted themselves would now be reminded of the hierarchical nature of debt. The master had at last pressed his lawful claims. By indebting himself to an unjust steward, the poor man brought the master's judgment on his own head.³⁴ Covenant-keepers should learn this lesson well: do not become indebted to covenant-breakers. "The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail" (Deut. 28:43–44).³⁵ When God periodically collects His debts from covenant-breakers in history, all those obligated to them or dependent on them feel the economic pain, including covenant-keepers.³⁶

34. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 37.

35. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 37.

36. Anyone who doubts this should consider carefully what happens to debtors and everyone who sells goods and services to debtors during a deflationary economic depression.

4. Representative Forgiveness

There was one reasonable hope for the unjust steward: his kinsman-redeemer. Legally, the steward was still the head of his household, but economically, his kinsman-redeemer was in authority. Only if someone possessing legitimate authority would show mercy in his name could he escape. There were only three ways for the kinsman-redeemer to help: (1) pay off the debt; (2) offer to replace the steward in prison; (3) pay off the poor man's debt and then plead for mercy from the master on the basis of this representative act of mercy. If the steward publicly consented to this third action on the part of his kinsman-redeemer, he might receive mercy from the master. But if the steward remained adamant against the poor man, he himself would remain in debtors' prison. This much is sure: the poor debtor's fate was not in his own hands. He required mercy to escape: from the master or from his kinsman-redeemer.

When God granted the grace of additional time to fallen mankind, He thereby also granted the grace of time to the creation that was (and is) under man's lawful authority. The covenant's hierarchical authority structure remained (and remains) in place. Fallen man still owes the restitution payment to God. Nature is still under God's authority through man, and therefore is under God's curse on man. Fallen man is told to treat those under his authority with mercy analogous to the mercy shown by God to fallen man. What is the evidence of God's mercy? A system of representative blood sacrifice.

Why did God require animal sacrifices? What had the animals done to deserve this? Biblically, the answer is simple: they fell with their commander, Adam. Their representative fell, and they came under a curse. This is why certain animals could serve as sacrificial offerings acceptable to God. The animal had to be slain before it was placed on the altar. This symbolized the death of a cursed being, fallen man. After death comes fire with salt.³⁷ The sacrifice announced symbolically: “Either the dead animal roasts in history or else the dead sinner roasts in eternity.” In order to preserve man’s relationship with God, man must offer sacrifice. Old Covenant man had to offer animal sacrifices. These sacrifices also preserved the animal world’s relationship with God. The sacrificed animals represented both the animal world and fallen man’s world.

37. "And every oblation of thy meat offering shalt thou season with salt; neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat offering: with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt" (Lev. 2:13). "All the heave offerings of the holy things, which the children of Israel offer unto the LORD, have I given thee, and thy sons and thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: it is a covenant of salt for ever before the LORD unto thee and to thy seed with thee" (Num. 18:19). "And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt" (Mark 9:47-49).

The animals came under God’s judgment when Adam did. When God annulled the debts of all those who will ever come representatively under the debt protection of His Son Jesus Christ, He also annulled the sacrificial system that had previously governed His set-apart covenant people. Animals today need no representative sacrifices by other animals, since their debts, like the debts of God’s covenant people, have been paid representatively by Jesus Christ. When covenant-keeping men’s debts were forgiven, so were the debts of the animal world, debts that had been paid representatively from Abel’s day by the sacrifice of certain animals. This debt cancellation took place definitively with the crucifixion of Christ and finally with the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70.

There can be no mercy without a sacrifice. God’s mercy to mankind as a whole is demonstrated in his willingness to sacrifice His Son, a perfect man.³⁸ Men’s mercy to the animal kingdom as a whole under the Mosaic system was demonstrated by the Israelites’ willingness to sacrifice their own blemish-free animals. The fact that God was willing to sacrifice His Son testifies to His protection of mankind. Similarly, covenant-keeping men’s willingness to sacrifice their most valuable animals testified to their hierarchical obligation to protect the creation. God’s required sacrifices are testimonies to His mercy. When men refuse to offer God’s mandatory sacrifices, they become progressively merciless³⁹. In the New Covenant, the blood sacrifices are no more. There is only one sacrifice: the death of Jesus Christ (Heb. 9:12). But all men are required by God to acknowledge this sacrifice: verbally,

38. Jesus did not die to save all men from hell, but His death provided the legal basis of the gift of life in history: common grace. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

39. The animism and the pantheism of the modern ecology movement are denials of the God of the Bible and His required system of sacrifice. If this movement’s stipulations are enforced by international civil law, we can expect tyranny on an international scale. Men will seek to overturn the Bible’s hierarchical system: God > man > nature. Mankind will be sacrificed to nature. For a defense of just this sort of sacrifice, see Bill McKibben, The End of Nature (New York: Random House, 1989).

ritually, ethically, and financially, i.e., the tithe.

Man's debt to God was not forgiven under the Old Covenant economy; its repayment was only deferred. In a sense, the sacrifices could at most meet the required "interest payments" to God; they did not repay the principal. Analogously, whenever Israel quit paying because of her rebellion, these missed payments were added to the principal owed. Israel's debt to God grew ever-larger.⁴⁰ Finally, in A.D. 70, God called in the debt.⁴¹ Israel went bankrupt publicly. "Forgive us our debts" (Matt. 6:12) is no idle phrase.⁴² The presence of the required sacrifices in the Mosaic economy testified to the continuing presence of the debt in God's account books, and also to each man's need to repay God in the future. The cosmic Creditor will eventually demand repayment of everything owed to Him. On that final day of reckoning, every person will have to produce one of two things: sufficient funds to repay his debt (impossible) or evidence that he had already accepted the generosity of the Kinsman-Redeemer who had repaid his debt. At the final judgment, the books are forever closed. So is the exit from the ultimate debtor's prison.

By forgiving a sin against us, we symbolically and legally forgive a debt owed to God through us. This is why one version of the Lord's prayer says "forgive us our sins" (Luke 11:4), while the parallel in Matthew says "forgive us our debts" (Matt. 6:12).⁴³ By extending forgiveness as God's representative agents, we are showing God's mercy to God's debtors in God's name. Offering up a scarce economic resource to God as a sacrificial offering is economically the same as forgiving a debt legally owed to us.

Consider the words of Jesus, the long-awaited representative who offered up Himself to God as a holy sacrifice: the ultimate Kinsman-Redeemer. He prayed to God from the cross: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And they parted his raiment, and cast lots" (Luke 23:34). He legally annulled this horrendous sin for those who had truly acted out of ignorance—most obviously, the Ro-

40. In real estate, this is called a backward-walking mortgage: the missed monthly mortgage payment is added to the principal owed, so the subsequent payments must be larger.

41. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

42. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 12.

43. Protestant churches that place heavy emphasis on liturgy (i.e., sacrifice-oriented) often pray "forgive us our trespasses." This is closest to the covenantal focus of Leviticus: boundaries and their violation.

man guards who gambled for His clothing. His death and His words annulled these specific debts to God the Father. These men had sinned against God the Father by sinning against Jesus. When He forgave them, He did so as the victim. The principle of victim's rights allows such forgiveness.⁴⁴ He thereby also forgave them on His Father's account, as God's legal heir and representative agent.

The loss of the value of a sacrifice made to God symbolizes two things: (1) God's payment of His own Son, the Messiah, and (2) the patience that we have shown to those who had sinned against us. We are stewards, not owners. When we forgive others, we offer up a sacrifice to God: extending grace to sinners by forfeiting whatever they legally owed to us. Of course, we are gaining heavenly resources by doing this. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal" (Matt. 6:19–20).⁴⁵

5. New Covenant Burdens

Because Jesus' perfect sacrifice is behind us, we are no longer required by God to offer periodic animal or vegetable sacrifices. This removes from us an economic burden that the Old Covenant saint owed to God. Does this mean that we are not under comparable economic burdens? In some sense, yes. The costs of offering sacrifices have been eliminated. We no longer walk three times a year to Jerusalem. But, in another sense, analogous economic obligations do remain in the New Covenant era. We still owe to God-fearing men what Old Covenant saints owed to God-fearing men. In some cases, we owe more.

Consider the morally mandatory charitable loan.⁴⁶ In the Mosaic economy, a person who had been extended a zero-interest charity loan was under the threat of involuntary servitude that would last until the next national sabbatical year (Deut. 15:1–7).⁴⁷ Bankruptcy was expensive in those days. One did not just declare oneself bankrupt and escape the obligation of restitution through indentured servitude. Not so today. "But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for

44. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 33.

45. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 13.

46. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 36.

47. This did not apply to a non-compulsory, interest-bearing loan: North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49.

nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil" (Luke 6:35).⁴⁸ Understand: the loan in this commandment is not a business loan; it is a charity loan. Jesus did not tell us that we have a moral obligation to make business loans to our rich enemies whenever they ask, and then suffer meekly when these debtors refuse to repay. That would deliver us economically into the hands of covenant-breaking masters. Jesus was talking about acts of mercy: charitable loans. We are to offer zero-interest loans, not for our gain, but in order to help the deserving poor escape from circumstances that afflict them.⁴⁹ We are not to loan money to drunks on the street to finance their drunkenness. We are not to subsidize evil.⁵⁰ We are to show intelligent mercy.⁵¹ When a truly impoverished debtor cannot repay, due to forces beyond his control, then we are to forgive the debt. In doing so, we make a sacrificial offer of forgiveness.

God will not collect what we owe to Him if we acknowledge publicly that Jesus has paid our gigantic debt.⁵² Because of the shift in covenants, people no longer are required by God to spend money for, or forfeit income from, animals or grains offered as sacrifices. We nonetheless are required to suffer losses when God extends financial mercy through us to impoverished debtors: the legal right of a poor man to declare bankruptcy, thereby escaping his obligation to repay beyond the market value of his assets, which he forfeits. This is why bankruptcy laws are a legitimate aspect of a Christian society. That a person in the United States is allowed this God-granted privilege once every seven years is a dim reflection of the Mosaic Covenant's law of sabbatical release (Deut. 15:1–7). Since the late nineteenth century, there have been no debtors' prisons in the West. In the United States, if a debtor is willing to forfeit all his assets except the clothes on his back and the tools of his trade, he has identified himself as an impoverished person. He therefore is allowed to escape the demands of his creditors by declaring bankruptcy. If he is wise, however, he will later

48. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 10.

49. On the idea of the deserving poor, see Gertrude Himmelfarb, The Idea of Poverty: England in the Early Industrial Age (New York: Knopf, 1984; London: Faber & Faber, 1984).

50. R. J. Rushdoony, Bread Upon the Waters (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig, 1969), ch. 3: "Subsidizing Evil." (<http://bit.ly/rjrbread>)

51. Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?"

52. "For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation" (Rom. 10:10).

repay his creditors if he can. Because he owes so much to God, he should not seek to profit from the sacrifices borne by those who willingly extended credit to him.⁵³

F. Mandatory Sacrifices and Free Markets

Covenant-breaking man instinctively looks to the works of his own hands as the basis of his redemption. He believes that the work of his hands will placate God. He exhibits this faith in two ways. First, he seeks to offer a public sacrifice of reduced value. Cain's offer of agricultural produce rather than a slain animal is representative of man's search for an alternate sacrifice. He proclaimed ritually that he believed that his blood (life)⁵⁴ was not on the line. Second, man repeatedly places himself under the covenantal jurisdiction of false divinities that time and again claim total sacrifice. This is why the quest for autonomy from the God of the Bible has led politically to the divinization of the state, no matter how strong the technical case against the omniscient state may be. Autonomous man returns to the theology of the messianic state like a dog to its vomit. That which can command unlimited sacrifice is seen as the savior of man and society.

1. A Just-So God

Covenant-breaking man is schizophrenic. He seeks a divinity in history powerful enough to bless the works of his hands, yet not so powerful as to constitute a threat to his autonomy. This is why,

53. I am not speaking here of civil governments. Anyone so unwise as to extend civil governments credit should not complain when these debtors declare bankruptcy, either directly or through mass inflation. Also, any Bible-affirming new administration in a civil government should feel no moral compunction against declaring the government's bankruptcy if previous administrations unwisely pledged the government's obligation to repay. Defaults on loans made to governments by foreign governments or foreign commercial banks are especially productive in this regard. Periodic bond defaults by civil governments are healthy for capital markets: they remind creditors not to loan money to institutions that are as wasteful and corrupt as modern civil governments. Investors should loan their money to productive enterprises, not governments, except in emergency situations such as wartime (maybe). The only other justification for lending to civil governments is in cases where private debtors are even less reliable.

54. Blood and life are linked biblically: "For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul" (Lev. 17:11). "For it is the life of all flesh; the blood of it is for the life thereof: therefore I said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall eat the blood of no manner of flesh: for the life of all flesh is the blood thereof: whosoever eateth it shall be cut off" (Lev. 17:14).

whenever and wherever God's required public sacrifices⁵⁵ are either ignored or denied by society, we can expect to see increasingly successful attacks on the legitimacy of private property. Put differently, whenever and wherever the limits (boundaries) placed by God on man's required sacrifices are ignored, we can expect to see the state substitute itself as a new god which in principle requires unlimited sacrifice. Whatever property that the state allows men to retain under their personal control will be understood as due to the present grace of the state, or due to the state's present political inability to confiscate everything, or due to the state's present perception that individuals acting as taxpaying stewards can more efficiently expand the state's capital base. What God has delegated to the family in history, the Molo State will eventually attempt to confiscate.⁵⁶

This is the reason why an intellectual defense of economic freedom, if it is to be culturally successful over the long run, must be paralleled by the church's successful proclamation of the gospel of redemption—the buying back of individuals and institutions—through Christ's once-only sacrifice. The professed universalism of modern economic theory is no more valid than the professed universalism of Unitarianism. No matter how brilliant the technical intellectual defenses of specific aspects of the free market may be, and no matter how visible the failures of socialist economic planning may become,⁵⁷ the

55. The Lord's Supper is public. It is not mandated by the state; it is mandated by God.

56. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 25.

57. In 1989, these failures at last began to be acknowledged by intellectuals in the West because of the public admission by Communist officials of the economic breakdown in Communist nations. The intellectuals of the West once again took their cues from public statements by the tyrants who were running the Soviet Union. The West's economists had long been much better informed in this regard, yet even they continually overestimated the productivity of the Soviet economy. One of the few mainstream economists who recognized the magnitude of the USSR's weakness earlier than his peers was Harvard's Marshall I. Goldman, USSR in Crisis: The Failure of the Soviet Economic System (New York: Norton, 1983). As an outsider, I had concluded this by 1968. After surveying the critical analyses of Western economists through 1967, I concluded my appendix, "Soviet Economic Planning," with these words: "... it seems clear that without decentralization economically and the advent of a consumer society based on private ownership and profit, the basic issues will remain unsolved. The economy will shift back and forth between planning at the top and localism, growing more and more irrational as the complexity of the planning task grows ever greater. The system, in good Marxian terminology, contains the seeds of its own destruction." Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1968), pp. 225–26. Reprinted by the Institute for Christian Economics, 1989, p. 231. (<http://bit.ly/gnmr>) judicial foundation of the free market society and the epistemological foundation of economic science both must begin with the public proclamation of the covenantal reality of God's curse in Eden and the covenantal reality of God's redeeming sacrifice at Calvary. Economic theory is no more autonomous than society is. If a believable theological justification of economic theory and policy is not produced, the power-seeking state will revive and flourish once again. The theological appeal of statism will eventually overcome technical criticisms of economists. Men want to worship something more powerful than the textbooks' supply and demand curves. The visible sanctions of the state are more easily understood and more readily feared than the complex sanctions of the free market. The visible hand of the state, however spastic or grabbing it may be, is more readily believed in and feared than the invisible hand of the free market.

2. The Moral High Ground

Politicians and judges are the ministers of the civil order (Rom. 13:4); they alone can lawfully impose physical sanctions outside a family. The scribes known as economists⁵⁸ can offer nothing that can permanently thwart the expansion of the state, for the economists' sanctions are intellectual, not physical. The economists' worldview is overtly technical, not moral. (In fact, their covert worldview is intensely theological: the religion of autonomous man in an autonomous universe.) Economists naively deny the legitimacy of morality in their formal pronouncements.⁵⁹ They have been doing so ever since the late seventeenth century.⁶⁰ The politicians affirm morality in their judgments. What is incorrectly perceived as the moral high ground eventually triumphs. The state enforces its power-based sovereignty over the free market.

58. On economists as priests of the modern world, see Robert H. Nelson, Reaching for Heaven on Earth: The Theological Meaning of Economics (Savage, Maryland: Rowman and Littlefield, 1991). This book is a brilliant exposition of a conceptually flawed thesis: "Roman" (Stoic, Catholic, rationalistic, corporate) economics vs. "Protestant" (individualist, non-rational) economics. The proper classification is realist economics vs. nominalist economics—in permanent dialectical tension—with covenantal economics as the biblical alternative.

59. This is the myth of value-free economics. For a critique, see North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix H: "The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost." A shortened version is North, The Coase Theorem: A Study in Epistemology (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992). See also North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

60. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1963).

If the illusion of occupying the moral high ground becomes widespread among the defenders of the statist order of self-proclaimed autonomous man, then only an economic cataclysm born of inherently irrational socialist economic planning can place anything like a permanent boundary on the state's expansion. The free market may triumph temporarily, as it did in England from 1845 to 1875, but eventually the moralists will once again invoke their god, the state, and the people will worship at its temples. The state possesses monopolistic power (negative physical sanctions). Infuse it with the messianic morality of the modern welfare state (positive sanctions), and it will either buy control of the free market (Keynesianism) or else suppress it (socialism).

Without explicitly biblical foundations, free market economic thought will remain merely a technical application of right-wing Enlightenment philosophy: knowledge without power. Free market social theory will remain the intellectual plaything of a minority of professional economists, most of whom are employed by the state in tax-funded universities. Without its epistemological grounding in sacrifice and sanctions, economic analysis will begin, at best, with an acknowledgment of the visible effects of God's curses in Genesis:

And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return (Gen. 3:17–19).⁶¹

What must become central to economic analysis is the underlying theology of the five-point covenant that preceded God's imposition of negative sanctions against the creation.

1. The integrated doctrines of the special creation, the sovereignty of God as Creator, and therefore His absolute ownership of the creation (Gen. 1:1);
2. The doctrine of God's delegation of secondary ownership of the creation to man (Gen. 1:26–28);

61. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 12.

3. The doctrine of the law of God, which appears in the form of an exclusive (and therefore exclusionary) property boundary (Gen. 2:17a);
4. The doctrine of God's negative sanctions against the person who violates His law and His property (Gen. 2:17b);
5. The doctrine of the promised negative historical sanctions against Satan through God's promised Seed (Gen. 3:15).

The acknowledgment of the reality of God-cursed economic scarcity is necessary but not sufficient for the reconstruction of economic analysis. We must also discover in God's word and apply covenantally the judicial foundations of economic reconstruction: the progressive removal in history of the effects of God's curse.⁶²

Conclusion

By sacrificing to something sovereign over him (point 1), man acknowledges his debt to this higher authority (point 2). He seeks to draw a boundary of safety or immunity around himself, his works, and his property (point 3). He believes that his sacrifice will enable him to avert the wrath and/or gain the blessings of this higher authority (point 4), enabling him to leave a valuable legacy to his heirs (point 5). Offering sacrifice is a ritual acknowledgment of someone else's sovereignty and one's own economic subordination: stewardship.

Covenant-keeping man in the Mosaic Covenant era was told by God to sacrifice animals from his flock. The animal had to be the best of his flock: blemish-free. This pointed symbolically (representatively), as had Abraham's sacrifice of the ram in place of Isaac, to the ultimate sacrifice: God's ethically blemish-free Son. At the same time, God did not require total sacrifice from His holy people. That which would constitute total sacrifice from fallen man is insufficient to pay the required bill to God. Thus, the person who presented the sacrifice to the priest was proclaiming ritually and publicly that he in principle owed everything to God (i.e., the best of his flock), but at the same time, all that he owned would not suffice to repay God (i.e., one animal only). The individual sacrifice was to be of high value but not total.

God placed specific limits—boundaries—on the required sacrifices.⁶³ These sacrificial boundaries put man in his proper place. They also allowed him to retain the majority portion of the wealth under his jurisdiction. In order lawfully to keep what he owned, he had to acknowledge ritually that it was all a gift from God. He acknowledged that his property was a residual: things left over for his use after God had taken His fair share. This same theology of residual ownership undergirds the tithe.

62. North, Is the World Running Down?, chaps. 8, 9.

63. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 56.

Mosaic sacrifices were representative. They represented the death of man and the death of nature. Both man and nature are under the curse of death because of Adam's rebellion. When God extended grace to man through Jesus Christ, He also extended grace to nature. No longer does God require animal sacrifices. Men may lawfully keep their blemish-free animals, and the blemish-free animals now keep their lives. Because God the Father has definitively extended grace to man and nature in history through the perfect sacrifice of Jesus Christ, there is no further need for man to shed blood in order to placate God.

Economically, bankruptcy laws acknowledge the Bible's view of debt forgiveness. When a man declares bankruptcy, he hands over all his assets to his creditors, including all debts owed to him. Henceforth, he can no longer demand payment of debts owed to him. Whatever had been owed to him is now owed to his creditors. This acknowledges the hierarchical nature of stewardship and forgiveness.

The Bible's definitive limitation on blood sacrifice has placed a definitive limit on mandatory economic sacrifice. Neither the state nor the church possesses an unlimited claim to our wealth. The tithe sets the maximum limits of both institutions in New Covenant times. This is a great blessing from God; under the Mosaic law, the combined burden was far greater—at least twice as great.⁶⁴ But when men refuse to sacrifice to God, they eventually wind up sacrificing far more to the state. God graciously limits His economic demands on us. The state, representing the collective god, autonomous man, is not equally gracious. This is why widespread moral rebellion always brings high taxes and inflation. The state demands to be placated. It claims the moral high ground by proclaiming the economics of confiscation. It robs the productive and gives to the unproductive. This is Satan's political economy: the disinheritance of the righteous. To thwart this satanic system of wealth redistribution, men must place God's boundaries around the state, but this means that they must pay their tithes to their local institutional churches.

64. See the Introduction, Section H.

2

PRIESTLY REPRESENTATION

And when any will offer a meat [meal] offering unto the LORD, his offering shall be of fine flour; and he shall pour oil upon it, and put frankincense thereon: And he shall bring it to Aaron's sons the priests: and he shall take thereout his handful of the flour thereof, and of the oil thereof, with all the frankincense thereof; and the priest shall burn the memorial of it upon the altar, to be an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD: And the remnant of the meat [meal] offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the LORD made by fire (Lev. 2:1–3).

The theocentric principle governing the interpretation of this passage is the need for representation before God: point two of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. The Priesthood

Fallen man does not have direct access to God. He must have an ecclesiastical mediator: a priest. This priest represents God before man and man before God. In the New Covenant, the ultimate and final high priest is revealed: Jesus Christ, the messiah.²

This sacrifice was the second of the five Levitical sacrifices, and was associated with point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchical authority. This sacrifice is called the allegiance gift by the rabbis.³ As we shall see, it was uniquely associated with the doctrine of the

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. The Epistle to the Hebrews is the central book for the development of the New Covenant priesthood.

3. See the comments of S. R. Hirsch, the mid-nineteenth-century founder of what is today called Orthodox Judaism. He refers to this sacrifice as “a gift by which the giver recognises the receiver as the arbiter of his fate, and by the gift acknowledges and covenant, for it was the hierarchical (hieros: Greek for priest) sacrifice.

Of the five Levitical sacrifices, this one had the least to do with economics. Yet in other contexts, the actual Hebrew word had much to do with economics. The Hebrew word translated as meat offering by the King James translators, minkhaw (Lev. 2:4–11), is the word for tribute offering. This is what Jacob gave to Esau when he passed through Esau's territory (Gen. 32:13, 18); it was the "present" that Ehud promised to deliver to the tyrant Eglon (Jud. 3:15); it was what the Moabites brought to David (II Sam. 8:2) and the Syrians brought to David (II Sam. 8:6). This tribute payment was used by those under another's authority to purchase the favor of those ruling over them.

Significantly, it was this minkhaw or tribute offering which was brought to a priest by a husband in cases where the husband accused his wife of adultery: the offering of jealousy (Num. 5:15). When the wife had falsely sworn that she was innocent, her eating of this offering would cause her thigh to rot and her belly to swell (v. 22). More than any other Mosaic priestly ritual, this one produced a predictable, immediate, judicially binding result: a physiologically revealed falsehood—the closest thing to traditional magic in the Mosaic law. The priest could gain access to knowledge that was normally closed to judges. God responded immediately to this jealousy offering, intervening in history to identify a guilty wife, but only in cases of adultery: the supreme representative act of spiritual rebellion (Hosea 2). God's refusal to intervene visibly was legal evidence of the wife's innocence (Num. 5:28).

In Leviticus, the meal or tribute offering was closely associated with the priesthood, although common Israelites could bring this offering. This offering accompanied the inauguration of the Aaronic priesthood. The day Aaron was anointed, he and his sons had to offer a meal offering (Lev. 6:20). This had to be done with every anointing of a new priest, for it was a permanent statute (Lev. 6:22). At these Aaronic anointings, the meal offering could not be eaten; it had to be burned on the altar (Lev. 6:23). This fully consumed sacrifice represented the death of the priest for whom it was offered. As the administrator of the consuming fire of the altar, he had to be reminded that he, too, was under the threat of God's eternal fire.

The meal offering established the principle of priestly sacrifice at expresses his dependence on, and bondage and subjection to, the receiver of the gift." Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch, 5 vols. (Gateshead, London: Judaica Press, [1867–70] 1989), III:1, p. 51.

the time of each priest's anointing. When the authority of the priestly office was transferred to any male heir of Aaron, he and his sons had to offer this sacrifice. This sacrifice reminded them of their unique position of representation. They represented the nation before God. Those under them were at risk. The priests' moral conduct had to be exemplary because of their representative function. Also, their official conduct in offering the various sacrifices had to conform to the requirements of the covenant. Both moral purity and ritual precision were required of them, but the greater requirement was moral purity. One sign of this greater priestly responsibility was the law's requirement a priest's daughter who became a prostitute had to be burned alive (Lev. 21:9). This sanction did not apply to any other prostitute. The daughter of a priest represented her father's household; she was therefore under greater condemnation. Whoredom was representative (symbolic) of false worship: whoring after other gods.

When an Israelite brought a meal offering to the priest, the major part of this offering belonged to the priests: "And the remnant of the meat [meal] offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the LORD made by fire" (Lev. 2:3). The priests burned a handful of the meal on the altar as their portion of the offering and then ate the remainder (Lev. 6:15–16). This had to be eaten in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation (v. 16). No females could participate in this common meal (v. 18). This is because priestly activities are uniquely representative of God, and God is exclusively male.

B. Leaven and Fire

This offering could not include leaven (Lev. 2:4–5). The reason for this is that part of it had to go on the altar. Leaven was not allowed on the altar (Lev. 2:11). Unleavened bread was required during Passover (Ex. 12:15). Unleavened bread symbolized Israel's radical break with Egypt, the symbol of pagan religion and tyranny. It was not that unleavened meal represented righteousness as such; rather, it represented Israel's discontinuous break in history from evil. Unleaven represented historical discontinuity—the transition from wrath to grace—prior to the oath-bound establishment of a covenantal nation.

The meal offering served as the priests' acknowledgment of their subordination to God and their break with the religion of Egypt. Thus, "It shall not be baked with leaven. I have given it unto them for their portion of my offerings made by fire; it is most holy, as is the sin offering, and as the trespass offering" (Lev. 6:17). Leaven was not allowed on the altar, but not because it somehow represented evil as such. It represented a fully risen or completed product, as did honey, so it could not be burned on the altar. Leaven symbolized historical continuity. But men are still in history; their work is not yet completed. Thus, leaven was not symbolically proper on the fiery altar.

Part of this meal offering had to be burned on the altar:

And thou shalt bring the meat [meal] offering that is made of these things unto the LORD: and when it is presented unto the priest, he shall bring it unto the altar. And the priest shall take from the meat offering a memorial thereof, and shall burn it upon the altar: it is an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD. And that which is left of the meat offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the LORD made by fire (Lev. 2:8–10).

The fire on the altar was God's permanent, day-and-night testimony of His wrath. The animal and agricultural sacrifices placed on this fire produced a sweet savor for God (Lev. 1:9; 2:2; 3:5; 4:31). God delighted in the ritual burning of representative animals and meal. This symbolized (represented) God's delight in the eternal burning of His enemies, angelic and human (Rev. 20:14–15). This particular delight of God ought to be the terror of man. The smoke ascending day and night from God's altar was to serve as a reminder to man of what awaits covenant-breakers in eternity. This was God's testimony in history to the wrath that awaits covenant-breakers beyond history.

C. The Salt of the Covenant

The meal offering, more than the other sacrifices, was the sacrifice of the covenant. It was the one sacrifice in which salt was specifically mentioned: "And every oblation of thy meat [meal] offering shalt thou season with salt; neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat offering; with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt" (Lev. 2:13). This phrase, the salt of the covenant, ties this sacrifice to the Bible's system of covenantal subordination.

Why salt? First, it is an agency of incorruption, keeping things from spoiling.⁴ Second, salt imparts flavor. Third, and most important with respect to sacrifices, it is an agent of permanent destruction. It was used by armies to destroy permanently the fertility of their defeated enemies' land (Jud. 9:45). Salt is therefore associated with God's wrath in eternity: "And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt" (Mark 9:47–49).⁵ It is also associated with God's covenantal wrath in history. God warned Israel at the time of the nation's act of covenant renewal, just before they entered the promised land, regarding Sodom's burning and Sodom's salt. Sodom had so thoroughly broken the terms of God's covenant that it was doomed to be salted over: final judgment.

4. Alfred Edersheim, The Temple: Its Ministry and Services As They Were in the Time of Jesus Christ (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1874] 1983), p. 109.

So that the generation to come of your children that shall rise up after you, and the stranger that shall come from a far land, shall say, when they see the plagues of that land, and the sicknesses which the LORD hath laid upon it; And that the whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom, and Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, which the LORD overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath: Even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the LORD done thus unto this land? what meaneth the heat of this great anger? Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the LORD God of their fathers, which he made with them when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt: For they went and served other gods, and worshipped them, gods whom they knew not, and whom he had not given unto them: And the anger of the LORD was kindled against this land, to bring upon it all the curses that are written in this book (Deut. 29:22–27).

The conclusion: "Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them, that ye may prosper in all that ye do" (Deut. 29:9).

The threat of God's covenant sanctions was not limited to the nation; it also included the individual. God warned what would happen to the covenant-breaking individual. Notice the language of smoke, which accompanies burning. "And it come to pass, when he heareth the words of this curse, that he bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of mine heart, to add drunkenness to thirst: The LORD will not spare him, but then the anger of the LORD and his jealousy shall smoke against that man, and all the curses that are written in this book shall lie upon him, and the LORD shall blot out his name from under heaven. And the LORD shall separate him unto evil out of all the tribes of Israel, according to all the curses of the covenant that are written in this book of the law" (Deut. 29:19–21).

5. For a discussion of this passage in the light of the New Testament's doctrine of eternal punishment, and the background of the Old Testament's sacrifices, see Gary North, "Publisher's Epilogue," in David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), pp. 171–95. (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

D. Firstfruits (Pentecost)

The meal offering is associated in the text with the firstfruits offering, another meal offering (Lev. 2:12, 14). Firstfruits was a mandatory annual offering (Ex. 23:16, 19). This offering was a man's public acknowledgment that God must be paid "off the top." That is, the farmer owed God the best of his field and the first portion of his crop. He was not to pay God last; he was required to pay God first. Firstfruits was one rare case in the Bible where God taxed capital rather than the net increase. The farmer did not deduct the replacement seed before offering the firstfruits; whatever came up was God's. But it was a small offering—a token offering.

The firstfruits payment was mandatory. This was his public acknowledgment of his subordination to God through the Aaronic priesthood. When the blessings of God's bounty appeared in his field, the owner was required to acknowledge the source of this bounty by bringing a meal offering to God.

According to rabbinic tradition, the tithe was paid on what remained after the firstfruits offerings and after gleaning had taken place.⁶ This interpretation of the tithe is consistent with the idea that the tithe is paid only on that which is at the lawful disposal of the owner. We do not owe the church a tithe on that which has been lawfully appropriated by others. Counting all the required tithes (including the tithe of celebration: Deuteronomy 14:23),⁷ the sacrifices, and the gleaning laws, the rabbis estimated that about one-quarter of the agricultural productivity of the land would have been transferred to others, not including civil taxes.⁸ Many of these offerings beyond the tithe

6. Edersheim, Temple, p. 379.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 35.

8. Edersheim, Temple, p. 379. The rabbis assumed that the third-year and sixth-year festival tithes of Deuteronomy 14:26–29 were additional tithes.

did not burden non-agricultural occupations.⁹ This is additional evidence that biblical law indirectly subsidized urban employment by penalizing farming. Contrary to Edersheim, who wrote that “the Law seems to regard Israel as intended to be only an agricultural people,”¹⁰ the Mosaic law did a great deal to move Israelite families off the farm and into the city, as I explained in this book’s Introduction.

Exodus 23:17 indicates that the public offering of the firstfruits, like the feast of ingathering (Tabernacles), was mandatory for all the men of Israel: “Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord GOD.” Because the firstfruits offerings were explicitly agricultural, the products of other occupations were exempt. Still, in a predominantly agricultural society, the crowds entering Jerusalem would have been immense. Edersheim said that the later rabbinical estimate of the size of the original temple indicated that 210,000 people could worship there.¹¹ We ask ourselves: How did the priests handle the immense flow of individual sacrifices? Where did the people stay? How long did these round-trip journeys take? What expenses along the road did the travelers incur? This traveling expense would have been considerable, in contrast to the value of the firstfruits’ representative grain offering.

These festivals were acts of covenant renewal. They were expensive and time-consuming. They would have required a great deal of patience, such as standing in long lines for many hours. God required the men of the nation to go through these ceremonies, despite the costs involved. Why? Because they were a nation of priests (Ex. 19: 6).

Of all the festivals, firstfruits was the one least likely to have been attended by women. It was held 50 days after Passover (Lev. 23:15). Passover was a family celebration (Ex. 12). Women who had just walked home from the central location would have been tired of travelling with children. The men were required to attend; the women were not. Firstfruits would have tended to be a more male-oriented festival, analogous to the meal offering, which was exclusively masculine (Lev. 2:18).

Conclusion

This sacrifice was an aspect of point two of the biblical covenant

9. Idem.

10. Idem.

11. Ibid., p. 138.

model. Bear in mind that Exodus is the second book in the Pentateuch. First, the phrase “salt of the covenant” (Lev. 2:13) parallels the Book of Exodus’ identification as the book of the covenant (Ex. 24:7). Second, the prohibition of leaven points back to the exodus: the definitive break in Israelite history from bondage to false gods. All of Egypt’s leaven had to be left behind. None could be brought into the Promised Land. This sharp break with the evil of Egypt was celebrated at the Passover meal, which also excluded leaven (Ex. 12: 15). Third, the meal sacrifice was the second of the five sacrifices of Leviticus. Fourth, this sacrifice had to do with the priesthood: hierarchy.

The meal offering pointed to Israel as a nation under a covenant. It was under hierarchical authority, both civil and ecclesiastical. The meal offering more than the other four pointed to this hierarchical system of representation. The priests were required to make a meal offering at the time of their anointing. The common Israelite, when he had committed an unnamed infraction, brought a meal offering to the priest for sacrifice.

What was the nature of this transgression? We are not told, but we can deduce the answer. The transgression had no victim, or else the fifth sacrifice would have been appropriate: the trespass or reparation offering. It was not an unintentional sin, since the fourth sacrifice was not involved: the sin offering or purification offering. It was not a peace offering, which was voluntary and was not part of the atoning sacrifices. The whole burnt offering was associated with man’s total submission to God. Thus, I conclude that the meal offering had something to do with a known infraction of a priestly law—what we call today ceremonial law.

The Israelite was a member of a nation of priests. As a household priest, he was under rigorous requirements regarding washing, bodily discharges, bodily contact, and so forth. To maintain his purity, he had to follow certain rules. A violation of these priestly rules brought him under the threat of sanctions. The meal offerings pointed to his position as a subordinate officer in a national priesthood.

For a man outside the temple’s priesthood, the cost of bringing this sacrifice to Jerusalem was far greater than the value of the food sacrificed. This was true of all of the national festivals. These transportation and participation costs testified to God’s sovereignty over Israel. They also imposed special economic burdens on agricultural production. This is evidence that God intended the Israelites to be urban people, with most farms in the land being managed in the name of original owners by specialists. The management of agriculture would have been representative, much as modern agriculture is.

The meal offering was priestly. It was associated with Israel's status as priest of the nations. The common Israelite was held responsible by God for honoring the priestly laws of separation from the nations. This sacrifice atoned for violations of the laws of separation.

3

LEAVEN AND PROGRESSIVE SANCTIFICATION

And if his oblation be a sacrifice of peace offering, if he offer it of the herd; whether it be a male or female, he shall offer it without blemish before the LORD. . . . It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood (Lev. 3:1, 17).

And this is the law of the sacrifice of peace offerings, which he shall offer unto the LORD. If he offer it for a thanksgiving, then he shall offer with the sacrifice of thanksgiving unleavened cakes mingled with oil, and unleavened wafers anointed with oil, and cakes mingled with oil, of fine flour, fried. Besides the cakes, he shall offer for his offering leavened bread with the sacrifice of thanksgiving of his peace offerings. And of it he shall offer one out of the whole oblation for an heave offering unto the LORD, and it shall be the priest's that sprinkleth the blood of the peace offerings. And the flesh of the sacrifice of his peace offerings for thanksgiving shall be eaten the same day that it is offered; he shall not leave any of it until the morning (Lev. 7:11–15).

The theocentric focus of these judicially unified passages is the possibility of bringing to an end a state of war between God and fallen man.

A. The Terms of Surrender

Man must seek peace on God's terms, not on his own terms. God does not seek peace on man's terms. Here are the terms of peace: unconditional surrender.¹ The question is: Must man surrender unconditionally to God, or must God surrender unconditionally to man? The irreconcilable conflicting answers to this question constitute the essence of the war between Christianity and humanism.

1. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010).

The Mosaic sacrificial system testified to the possibility of peace. The peace offering was the third of the five Levitical sacrifices. It corresponded to point three of the biblical covenant model because it dealt with boundaries: the boundary separating God from man.² In Mosaic Israel, this boundary principle applied above all to the temple-tabernacle.

The goal of this sacrifice was peace with God: a goal for all seasons. When an Israelite sought to establish special peace with God, he brought a sacrificial animal to the priest. This offering had to be blemish-free, as was the case in the other offerings. The blemish-free animal was the mark of the best a man could offer God. As we shall see, this is also why leaven had to accompany the peace offering. But the offering had to include unleavened bread as well. This mixture of leaven and unleaven creates a problem for the commentator. What did each of these offerings symbolize? They seem contradictory, yet both were required in the same offering.

B. The Peace Offering

The peace offering was not tied to a vow or an oath. We know this because the Israelite was not allowed to eat this sacrifice over a period of two days (Lev. 7:15), unlike a votive (vow) offering, which could lawfully be eaten the second day (Lev. 7:16). An unclean person who ate the peace offering had to be excommunicated: cut off from the people (Lev. 7:20), i.e., the creation of a new boundary. This sacrifice, more than the other four, involved boundaries (point three): lawful and unlawful crossing into God's presence.

The peace offering was the third of the five Levitical sacrifices. It corresponded to point three of the biblical covenant model because it dealt with boundaries: the boundary separating God from man. In Mosaic Israel, this boundary principle applied above all to the temple-tabernacle.

This sacrifice is designated by the Hebrew word transliterated ze-hbakh. Milgrom said that this word always means "slain offering whose meat is eaten by the worshipper." He cites as particularly revealing Jeremiah 7:21: "Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 3.

Put your burnt offerings unto your sacrifices [zehbakh], and eat flesh.”³ I conclude that the common person could eat part of this offering because of the laws governing uncleanness. The law stated that an unclean person could not lawfully eat this sacrifice (Lev. 7:20–21). But this law of uncleanness always applied to priests. If this law applied only to priests, there was no need to mention this requirement. By singling out the possibility that a clean person could enter the sacrifice (priestly) area, this law identified this sacrifice as a shared meal in which the common offerer could participate. This sacrifice was unique among the five in that it allowed a common Israelite or circumcised resident alien to eat a ritual meal in the presence of God.

The view that this sacrifice was a shared meal is conventional.⁴ This sacrifice was, in the words of Rabbi Hirsch, “a meal to be eaten in company with others; . . .”⁵ He referred to the sacrificer’s desire of “getting nearer to God on account of the necessity to raise the standard of the holiness of one’s activities. . . . [T]o enjoy this life on earth in the Presence of God is the highest service of God.”⁶ The basis of this access to God, this “eternal bridge up to God,” as Hirsch put it, is joy, not trouble.⁷ This is a profound insight.

The priest collected part of this offering for his own use (Lev. 7:14). This indicates, though does not prove, that the priest ate the meal with the sacrificer and his family and friends.

Where was it eaten? Milgrom argued that it was eaten inside the sanctuary’s boundaries. He refers to the sacrifice of the sanctuary in Shiloh: “And the priest’s custom with the people was, that, when any man offered sacrifice [zehbakh], the priest’s servant came, while the flesh was in seething, with a fleshhook of three teeth in his hand; And he struck it into the pan, or kettle, or caldron, or pot; all that the fleshhook brought up the priest took for himself. So they did in Shiloh unto all the Israelites that came thither” (II Sam. 2:13–14).⁸ This sacrifice was a zehbakh: a shared meal. The offerer’s sacrifice was boiled on the sanctuary premises. There were probably special halls for eating the

3. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 218.

4. John E. Hartley, Leviticus, vol. 4 of Word Bible Commentary (Dallas, Texas: Word Books, 1992), p. 42.

5. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch, 5 vols. (Gateshead, London: Judaica Press, [1867–78] 1989), III, pp. 73–74.

6. Ibid., III, p. 75.

7. Idem.

8. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, p. 223.

sacrificial meal, he concluded (I Sam. 9:22; Jer. 35:2). This is why there were rules governing the offerer's uncleanness, he said.

C. Neither Blood Nor Fat

One boundary involved the sacrificed animals. The Israelites were not allowed to eat fat or blood during this sacrifice. Unlike the prohibition against fat, the prohibition against drinking blood was universal: "Moreover ye shall eat no manner of blood, whether it be of fowl or of beast, in any of your dwellings. Whatsoever soul it be that eateth any manner of blood, even that soul shall be cut off from his people" (Lev. 7:27). Life is associated with blood (Gen. 9:4). "Only be sure that thou eat not the blood: for the blood is the life; and thou mayest not eat the life with the flesh" (Deut. 12:23). In many pagan religions, drinking blood ritually is an affirmation of the continuity associated with a blood covenant.⁹ The drinker signifies his faith that the life, spirit, and power of the slain person or beast is transferred to him through the blood. Quite frequently, blood-drinking is associated with demonic possession.¹⁰ This Old Covenant prohibition exists in the New Covenant (Acts 15:29). Another ritual of covenantal blood-drinking is required, however: the drinking of symbolic blood (wine) in the communion meal.¹¹

The prohibition against eating fat was not universal; it applied only during ritual sacrifices. In this shared ritual meal, fat was reserved to God because it was the most desirable portion. In their private feasting, Israelites were allowed to eat fat. Fat, including bulk carried on men's bodies, in the Bible is viewed as a sign of God's blessing. Rushdoony wrote: "Fat in Scripture both literally and symbolically usually represented wealth. . . . In Scripture, fat is the sign of healthiness and vigor, of prosperity."¹² Of course, in pre-modern societies, hard physical labor was the rule. People burned off excessive fat. Their diets were heavy on grains and vegetables rather than meat, a luxury, or refined 9. Article on "Blood," Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. James Hastings (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1909), II, p. 716. The author cited Trumbull, The Blood Covenant, pp. 126–34.

10. Idem.

11. "Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (John 6:53–54).

12. R. J. Rushdoony, "Fat," Encyclopedia of Christianity, ed. Philip E. Hughes (Marshallton, Delaware: National Foundation for Christian Education, 1972), IV, p. 179.

sugar, which was non-existent. In modern times, excessive weight is regarded (often incorrectly) as a sign of a person's insufficient self-discipline, not his prosperity. In fact, obesity today is a combination of genetic inheritance, nearly unbreakable eating habits begun in childhood, and historically unprecedented food supplies, especially wheat and grain products. Such "inputs" were not easily affordable for most people prior to the late nineteenth century. Isaiah prophesied regarding the coming millennial era: "And in this mountain shall the LORD of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined" (Isa. 25:6). Moses sang of God's covenantal blessings to Israel:

So the LORD alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him. He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and he made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock; Butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat; and thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape (Deut. 32:12–14).

When the Israelites returned to the land in Nehemiah's day, the priests read the law to them. Then they told the people that this was a time for rejoicing, a time to eat fat.

So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading. And Nehemiah, which is the Tirshatha, and Ezra the priest the scribe, and the Levites that taught the people, said unto all the people, This day is holy unto the LORD your God; mourn not, nor weep. For all the people wept, when they heard the words of the law. Then he said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared: for this day is holy unto our Lord: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the LORD is your strength. So the Levites stilled all the people, saying, Hold your peace, for the day is holy; neither be ye grieved (Neh. 8:8–11).

The prohibition against the ritual eating of fat was a way of separating the sacrificer's portion from God's portion during all the sacrifices. God placed a "no trespassing" sign around the fat during the peace offering, when He came close to the sacrificer during this shared meal. Man was reminded once again that God's holiness is always marked off by a boundary. In Old Covenant Israel, the tabernacle-temple was the primary boundary. Crossing this boundary under the Mosaic Covenant was lawful for an Israelite during the peace offering, but another boundary immediately appeared, one that did not exist outside the boundary of the temple: the prohibition against eating fat. God refused to share fat with His holy people within His special dwelling place, but He gave fat to them as a blessing outside that boundary.

D. Offerings from the Field

The Israelite brought more than an animal to the priest for the peace offering; he brought the fruit of the field, too. He brought baked cakes, both leavened and unleavened. The peace offering testified publicly that God had blessed him in his fields and his barns; he was bringing to God representative samples of the best of his produce. This is why leaven had to be part of the sacrifice of the peace offering. Leaven is the symbol of expansion in history: God's blessings compounded over time. Leaven was the best that an Israelite was able to offer God from his field.

We discover here a very important theological principle: the close association between law and dominion. Leaven is a physical agent of expansion. The issue of boundaries, of holiness, in Leviticus is associated with the leaven of the peace offering, the third sacrifice. The message conveyed by this symbol is that God's leaven progressively replaces Satan's leaven in history. This cultural replacement process—the dominion covenant's process—is associated more closely with holiness (moral set-apartness) than it is with transcendence, hierarchy, sanctions, or inheritance. Point three of the biblical covenant model is law.¹³ Leaven, dominion, and biblical law were linked.

Because of the importance of this covenantal principle of growth, and because a common theological error in twentieth-century evangelicalism was the association of leaven with evil, I focus on the principle of leaven in this chapter. I need to explain why leaven is not a principle of evil; rather, it is the principle of compound growth in history. It is associated with progressive sanctification, both personal and corporate.

What of unleaven? It always symbolizes a discontinuity. In the context of the Passover meal, unleavened bread was mandatory. Unleavened bread marked the historical discontinuity between Egypt and the Promised Land. None of Egypt's leaven was to be carried out of Egypt. This discontinuity was specifically religious and cultural: the break with Egypt's religion and civilization. The Passover meal was to symbolize a covenantal break with Egyptian thought and culture, not a break from the establishment of culture as an outworking of God's covenant. This is why the peace offering required leaven. It reminded the Israelites of their kingdom requirements.

13. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 3. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 3.

E. The Two Rival Leavens¹⁴

We can better understand the biblical meaning of leaven when we recognize that leavened bread was also offered as the firstfruits of the Lord, meaning the best of a family's productivity: "Ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave loaves of two tenth deals: they shall be of fine flour; they shall be baked with leaven; they are the first-fruits unto the LORD" (Lev. 23:17). Leaven is the best that man has to offer, the bread he eats with pleasure. It is man's offering to God. (The festival of firstfruits in the New Testament is associated with Pentecost: Acts 2.)

This has not been a common interpretation. A far more familiar interpretation teaches that leaven represents man's corruption. The rabbinical tradition has long associated leaven with man's evil propensities.¹⁵ Also, the high priest in Rome in Plutarch's day was forbidden to touch leaven.¹⁶ Milgrom referred to "an older and universal regard of leaven as the arch-symbol of fermentation, deterioration, and death and, hence, taboo on the altar of blessing and life."¹⁷

This traditional interpretation is incorrect, as I hope to show. The reason why leaven was prohibited is that it would have been a mature burnt offering, like honey, which was also prohibited (Lev. 2:11). Leaven symbolizes progressive sanctification through history. It does not symbolize definitive sanctification at a point in time, i.e., historical discontinuity. Leaven also does not symbolize final sanctification at the end of time, i.e., history's completion. As a symbol of growth through time with continuity, leaven was kept from the fiery altar because God will not bring His all-consuming fire until the end of time. Leaven was not burned on the altar because it was a symbol of growth moving toward completion. Leaven has no ethical connotation; it does not represent any taboo.

14. This section is a modification of my book, Unconditional Surrender, pp. 282–84, 289–92

15. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, p. 189.

16. Idem.

17. Idem.

1. Passover

The Passover feast prohibited leaven. During the Passover, people ate bitter herbs with their unleavened bread (Ex. 12:8). This bread and the bitter herbs symbolized the hard times of captivity in Egypt, the world out of which God had delivered them. Baking unleavened bread on that first Passover night avoided the need for the additional time required for yeast to rise. Unleavened bread was therefore a symbol of a major historical discontinuity: God's overnight deliverance of His people from Egypt. Unleavened bread symbolized God's overnight deliverance, since it was not the best of what man can offer God under the best of circumstances. Leaven was. God broke into the daily affairs of His people and delivered them from Egypt's bitter herbs. God delivered them out of bondage overnight. He led them to a land flowing with milk and honey, a land in which men have the wealth and time to bake and eat leavened bread. Once in the promised land, they were to offer this bread to God in thankfulness. Unleavened bread was a symbol of discontinuity: from wrath to grace. Leaven was a symbol of continual growth through time: dominion.

Why were the Israelites required to get rid of all leavened bread in Israel for a week before the feast (Ex. 12:15)? Because the original Passover had been celebrated in Egypt. Again, it was Egypt's leaven that had to be purged out of their midst before they left the land. Leaven in the context of Passover was a symbol of Egypt's culture and therefore of Egypt's religion. Leavened bread was representative of the good life in Egypt: all the benefits in Egypt that might tempt them to return. So, God required them to celebrate a discontinuous event: their overnight deliverance from bondage. They were to take no leaven with them—none of Egypt's gods, or religious practices, or diabolical culture—to serve as “starter” in the Promised Land.

Once they entered the land of Canaan as conquerors, they were required to eat leavened bread and offer it as a peace offering to God. This was the reason for the leavened bread of the peace offering (Lev. 7:13) and the Firstfruits offering (Lev. 23:7). This is also why Christians are supposed to eat leavened bread when they celebrate Holy Communion. It is a symbol of conquest. We are now on the offensive, carrying the leaven of holiness back into Egypt, back into Babylon. We are the leaven of the world, not corrupting the unleavened dough, but “incorrupting” it—bringing the message of salvation to Satan's troops, tearing down the idols in men's hearts. God's holy leaven is to replace Satan's unholy leaven in the dough of history.

Leaven is therefore not a symbol of sin and corruption, but a symbol of growth and dominion. It is not a question of an "unleavened" kingdom vs. a "leavened" kingdom; it is a question of which (whose) leaven. It is not a question of "dominion vs. no dominion"; it is a question of whose dominion. The dough (history) is here. Whose leaven will complete it, God's or Satan's?

2. *The Kingdom as Righteous Leaven*¹⁸

The kingdom of God is like leaven. Christianity is the yeast, and it has a leavening effect on the pagan, satanic culture around it. It is designed to permeate the whole of this culture, causing it to rise. The bread produced by this leaven is the preferred bread. In ancient times—indeed, right up until the nineteenth century—bread was considered the staff of life, the symbol of life. It was the source of men's nutrition. "Give us this day our daily bread," we are to ask God (Matt. 6: 11). The kingdom of God is the force that produces the fine quality bread that men seek. The symbolism should be obvious: Christianity makes life a joy for man. It offers the cultural benefits that most men acknowledge as the best (Deut. 4:5–8).¹⁹

Leaven takes time to produce its positive effect. Leaven requires historical continuity. Men can wait for their leavened bread, for God gives them time sufficient for the working of His spiritual leaven. They may not understand how it works, how its spiritual effects spread through their culture and make it a delight, any more than they understand how yeast works to produce leavened bread, but they can see the bread rising, and they can see the progressive effects of the leaven of the kingdom. They can look into the oven and see risen bread.

If we really push the analogy—pound it, even—we can point to the fact that the dough is pounded down several times before the final baking, almost as the world pounds the kingdom; but the yeast does its work, just so long as the fires of the oven are not lit prematurely. If the full heat of the oven is applied to the dough before the yeast has done its work, both the yeast and the dough are burnt, and the burnt mass must be thrown out. But given sufficient time, the yeast does its work, and the result is the bread that men prefer.

18. For a more detailed exegesis, see Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 12:F–H.

19. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

What a marvelous description of God's kingdom! Christians work with the cultural material available, seeking to refine it, to permeate it, to make it into something fine. They know that they will be successful, just as yeast is successful in the dough, if it is given enough time to do its work. That is what God implicitly promises us in the analogy of the leaven: enough time to accomplish our individual and our corporate tasks. He tells us that His kingdom will produce the desirable bread. This will take time. It may take several poundings, as God, through the hostility of the world, kneads the yeast-filled dough of man's cultures, but the end result is guaranteed.

F. Free-Will Offering and Covenant Renewal

The peace offering in Leviticus 7 was what in modern English phraseology would be called a free-will offering.²⁰ This language is found in Psalm 119:108: "Accept, I beseech thee, the freewill offerings of my mouth, O LORD, and teach me thy judgments." The peace offering was brought by the individual of his own free will; that is, he was not required by law to do this because of a particular sin. It was not a legal payment for sin. It was a token of his appreciation for the grace that God had shown to him. It was this Mosaic Covenant sacrifice that Paul had in mind when he wrote this injunction to Christians: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God" (Rom. 12:1–2). Paul was not calling men to offer their lives as payments for their sins.²¹ This had been done by Jesus Christ at Calvary once and forever (Heb. 9). He was instead calling men to a life of peace with God through sacrificial service.

The peace offering was a public act. It renewed the special friendship between God and a particular individual. It was an acknowledgment on the part of the sacrificer that he was completely dependent on God for everything he had been given. It was a ritual confession that God is the sustainer of the covenant. As the covenant sovereign, God deserves tokens of subordination beyond the tithe and ransom payments for sin, yet He does not demand them. He places men under the terms of the covenant, and these requirements are light (Matt. 11:30).²² He lawfully could demand much more. He could demand more than everything a man possesses. “For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?” (Mark 8:36). In His grace, however, He restricts His demands. God possesses the authority to compel men; therefore, we are warned, we should go the extra mile voluntarily. “And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain” (Matt. 5:41).²³ The person who “goes the extra mile” with God is publicly announcing his acceptance of God as the sovereign Lord of the covenant and himself as a covenant vassal.

20. Andrew A. Bonar, A Commentary on Leviticus (London: Banner of Truth Trust, [1846] 1966), p. 131.

21. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

One form of the peace offering involved a formal vow of some kind (Lev. 7:16). The other form did not (v. 15). Both involved a meal shared in the presence of God. Both required that the sacrificer be ritually clean (v. 20). Both involved boundaries: inclusive (a meal eaten in God’s presence) and exclusive (no ritually unclean people). Both therefore were aspects of point three of the biblical covenant model—holiness—more than point four: oath/sanctions.

G. New Testament Applications

At this point, I shift from Old Covenant applications to New Covenant applications. The primary Old Covenant applications were these: the lawful crossing of a boundary (the temple sacrificial area), the shared meal (God, family, and [probably] priest), the prohibition of fat (a prohibition unique to this feast: God’s assertion of primary ownership), the principle of unleaven (discontinuity from sin), the principle of the leaven (progressive sanctification), and the mark of the faithful vassal (performing service beyond what is required). I devote the remainder of this chapter to New Testament applications.

Conservative Protestants who have bothered to comment on economic and political theory have for over two centuries been adherents of right-wing Enlightenment thought, mainly Scottish rationalism. This was especially true of the Princeton theologians, from Archibald Alexander to Charles Hodge to J. Gresham Machen. They were Scottish common sense rationalists in their apologetic methodology.²⁴

22. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 25.

23. Ibid., ch. 9.

24. Mark A. Noll, “Introduction,” Noll (ed.), The Princeton Theology, 1812–1921

They began their social theory with the presupposition of methodological individualism.²⁵ They made no exegetical effort to show how their methodological individualism conformed to the Mosaic law's account of man's corporate responsibility. They rarely appealed to any Mosaic law when presenting their economic ideas.

In contrast, promoters of the liberal Social Gospel after 1890 did acknowledge corporate responsibility, but decade by decade, they interpreted this increasingly as state responsibility. They made no effort to show how their presupposition of collective responsibility conforms to the biblical account of exclusively individual responsibility on judgment day. They made no reference to the Mosaic law's defense of private property and Samuel's definition of a tyrant as a king who would collect 10% of men's income (I Sam. 8:15, 17).²⁶ The two groups could not communicate with each other or persuade each other, for there was hermeneutical no point of contact between them. Neither side considered the third alternative: covenantalism.

The dualism between methodological individualism and methodological collectivism still persists in today's Protestant world. Meanwhile, nobody in the muddled middle offers exegetical solutions as to how either extreme can be avoided. Only the theonomists avoid both positions as well as the muddled middle because they appeal systematically to the texts of the Bible in order to derive their social and economic theories.

Any appeal to the Mosaic law makes all of the other factions very nervous. Every member of every faction knows that if he were applying for a teaching position, and those with the authority to hire him knew that he not only defends the Mosaic law and its civil sanctions, he is ready to teach this in the classroom, he would never be hired. The employment factor has shaped the economic worldview that economists adopt. (Reward and response!) It did in my case, too. I decided to retain my theonomic worldview and earn my living outside of academia. That was the price I knew I had to pay. The problem is, collegiate academics who write summaries of contemporary views of economics have been shaped by their choice of worldviews. Their worldviews determine who gets discussed in their essays and who gets conveniently blacked out. This is why my economic commentary on the Bible receives very few footnotes from the rival economic factions within the Protestant community. It is tied too closely to the Mosaic law. An academic blackout is operating.²⁷

(Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, 1983), pp. 30–33.

25. See, for example, William Brenton Greene, Jr., "The Bible as the Text-Book in Sociology," Princeton Theological Review, XII (Jan. 1914). (Greene was Professor of Apologetics from 1893 until 1928, when Cornelius Van Til replaced him for one year before leaving to join the faculty of Westminster Seminary.)

26. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

My New Testament applications of the principle of the leaven are fundamental to an understanding of the dominion covenant. I dare not pass over them in silence on the assumption that most Christians will automatically make the theological connections between the principle of the leaven and the concept of Christendom's tasks in history. Most Christians have never even thought about such matters.²⁸

H. The Lord's Supper

Because the peace offering was a covenant act requiring the services of a priest, we need to ask this question: Is there a connection

27. For example, Calvin College economist John Tiemstra, whose self-announced comprehensive 1993 review of recent literature in Christian economics, referred to only one of my works, An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973). John P. Tiemstra, "Christianity and Economics: A Review of the Recent Literature," Christian Scholar's Review, XXII (1993), pp. 227, 228. This essay purported to be a survey of the literature from 1978 to 1993. Tiemstra was well aware of my later exegetical works, since he cited Craig M. Gay's 1992 essay in the same journal, which unfavorably cited The Sinai Strategy (1985) and Inherit the Earth, (1987) as well as David Chilton's Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators (1981), and then dismissed them all as right-wing liberation theology in which "human existence has been reduced to the material and economic and the gospel has been thoroughly immanentized." Craig M. Gay, "When Evangelicals Take Capitalism Seriously," ibid., XXI (1992), p. 358. Gay offered no support for his rhetorical outburst: no Bible texts and no books that have offered biblical refutations. Tiemstra referred repeatedly to Sider's Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger, but he never mentioned Chilton's detailed refutation. Blackout! He criticized Ronald Nash's defense of Austrian economics as not being exegetically based, which is quite correct; it wasn't, and self-consciously so. Nash denied that there can be an explicitly Christian economics, so why should he appeal to the Bible? I have criticized Nash for many years for just this epistemological weakness. Having dismissed Nash as the Austrian School's only cited representative, Tiemstra then announced: "The Christian writers who have opted for the Austrian approach have so far failed to connect their work very firmly with the basic biblical principles . . ." (p. 241). He did not mention my name in this context or in any other epistemological context. Blackout! This does the serious Christian reader a great disservice. It keeps him away from sources of biblical exegesis. Tiemstra's blackout strategy is representative of conservative Protestant scholarship generally, from Dallas Seminary to Calvin College, from fundamentalism to neo-evangelicalism. Refusing to take the Old Testament seriously, these men pretend that nobody else should, either. They refuse to interact with the Pentateuch or anyone who does. The Mosaic law appalls them. They will not try to learn from it, let alone agree to submit to it.

28. Note to any Jews who are still with me: neither have most Jews.

between this sacrifice and the sacrament of the Lord's Supper? The Lord's Supper involves participants in a formal act of covenant renewal. It cannot be an offering for sin, since the taking of communion must be preceded by inner confession of personal sins of omission and commission, and also by formal acts of restitution for crimes involving a victim.²⁹ The emphasis is on self-examination: "But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body" (I Cor. 11: 28–29). The peace offering was a meal eaten by the donor, the only shared meal in the Levitical system's five sacrifices.³⁰ The Lord's Supper is also a shared meal. But is the Lord's Supper an act of covenant renewal analogous to the freewill offering of Leviticus 7? I think not. The Lord's Supper is judicial. It is an aspect of the covenant oath (point four).³¹ Regular participation in the Lord's Supper is required from God's covenant vassals, just as the Passover feast was. It is not optional. It is a regularly scheduled public event. Any church member who refuses to take this sacrament, or who has been excluded from the table by the church, receives a formal declaration from God: "Guilty!" This public declaration takes place every time the Lord's Supper is served by the church. This is one reason why it should be offered weekly: to bring under God's judicial condemnation all those who are not participating, whether inside the church or outside. Calvin believed that the Lord's Supper should be offered at least weekly.³²

In contrast to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which is analogous to the Mosaic Covenant's sacrament of Passover, the peace offering was optional. It was a self-conscious additional act of sacrifice, "beyond the call of duty."

I. Living Sacrifices

Extra sacrifice in the New Covenant is not morally optional. Paul called men to present their bodies as living sacrifices (Rom. 12:1).³³

29. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 33; see also Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

30. R. K. Harrison, Leviticus: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1980), p. 79.

31. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

32. John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), IV:XVII:43.

33. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

This is his concept of minimal service, not service beyond the call of duty. This is another piece of evidence that the New Testament's moral and legal requirements are more rigorous than the Old Testament's requirements. To those who have been given more by God, more is required by God (Luke 12:47–48).³⁴

It is a serious (but common) mistake today to imagine that Jesus somehow reduced the degree of responsibility of His followers in the New Covenant era. On the contrary, He increased it. Anyone who argues to the contrary had better have a good explanation for the fact that modern Christians are not supposed to become polygamists, which was permitted in the Old Covenant era.³⁵ He had also better be ready to explain why the legal grounds for divorce are more rigorous in the New Covenant era. “They say unto him, Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? He saith unto them, Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so” (Matt. 19:7–8).³⁶ What was exceptional for the Mosaic Covenant saint—the peace offering—becomes the required way of life for the New Covenant saint. When the temple’s barriers came down, the covenant-keeper’s degree of responsibility went up. Symbolically, this took place when the veil of the temple was torn at Christ’s death.

The emphasis in Romans 12:1 is on the Christian way of life. It refers to the moral realm rather than to the judicial. Presenting one’s body as a living sacrifice is fundamental to a life of progressive sanctification, not a discrete formal act of legal justification. In contrast to progressive sanctification, the Lord’s Supper is specifically and uniquely judicial, a legal status shared only with the sacrament of baptism. The Western church has always regarded the sacraments as uniquely judicial.³⁷ The Lord’s Supper is a formal announcement of

34. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

35. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

36. Ibid., Appendix A: “Divorce and Remarriage.”

37. Notice, I did not write “solely judicial.” There is an element of mystery in the sacraments, and no single attribute suffices to encompass their meaning. See Ronald S. Wallace, Calvin’s Doctrine of the Word and Sacrament (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Divinity School Press, [1953] 1982). But the Western church has always called these rituals sacraments, not mysteries, which is what Eastern Orthodoxy calls them. The word sacrament was adopted by the church from the Latin word sacramentum, a military oath of enlistment. The judicial and covenantal aspect of these rites is emphasized by the Western church. The New Testament does not use the word sacrament, nor is the “guilty” or “not guilty” in the name of God by God’s representative agents, church elders. This is why personal confession of sin must be made in advance of the sacrament, a fact testified to by the churches’ historic use of congregational prayers of public confession. People are required to confess “the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth” to God prior to taking communion.

Paul compares progressive sanctification to running a race: “Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible” (I Cor. 9:24–25). He said: “I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 3:14). The Epistle to the Hebrews says: “Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us” (Heb. 12:1). The imagery is that of a step-by-step lifetime race against runners who are not equally committed to obeying God. We beat them by persevering in the race.

The goal of progressive sanctification is to reduce one’s level of sinfulness over time. This is the meaning of progressive sanctification: a progressive reduction of sinful thought and behavior. We are to conform ourselves progressively to Christ’s example of perfect humanity (though of course not His divinity). “For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren” (Rom. 8:29). Paul introduced his discussion of communion with this imperative: “Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ” (I Cor. 11: 1).³⁸ By doing so,

Greek word mysterion applied to either rite or any outward observance. See “Sacrament,” Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, 12 vols., eds. John McClintock and James Strong (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), IX, p. 212.

Calvin rejected as irrelevant of this Roman military view of the meaning of the word “sacrament.” Calvin, Institutes, IV:XIV:13. He stressed the mystery aspect instead. But by ignoring the self-maledictory covenantal oath aspect of both sacraments, he was led to identify several Old Covenant manifestations of God’s promises as sacraments: Noah’s rainbow (a non-maledictory oath: no universal destruction by flood), Abraham’s light in a smoking pot (Gen. 15:17), the watery fleece on dry ground and dry fleece on damp ground (Jud. 6:37–38), and the backward-moving shadow on Hezekiah’s sundial (II Kings 20:9–11). Institutes, IV:XIV:18. His interpretation of these events as sacraments has not been followed by Calvinists or other Protestants.

38. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 14.

we are to reduce the number of evil thoughts and acts that we must confess prior to communion. The increase in progressive sanctification is therefore related to communion (legal justification), but the two are not the same.

One manifestation of our personal quest for peace with God is the presentation of gifts and offerings above the mandatory tithe. These constitute the New Covenant's version of the animal sacrifice of the peace offering. When the pastor calls publicly for "tithes and offerings," meaning money for the church, he is calling for the peace of God. Tithes are obligatory payments.³⁹ Offerings in this context are peace offerings that are analogous to the sacrificial peace offering of Leviticus 7.

J. Progressive Corporate Sanctification

Sanctification in the modern pietistic church is understood as an exclusively personal spiritual transformation. When pressed, however, the defenders of this view will probably admit that there has been progressive sanctification of the church. They will assert that their favorite theological system is far superior to anything understood by the early church. It may or may not be superior, but at least they regard it as such. Except for those in the Eastern Orthodox tradition, most will admit freely that the church's confessions are more detailed and rigorous than the early creeds. Most Christians will also admit that science and technology have made the world a better place to live in, except for the threat of modern war, terrorism, and pollution.⁴⁰

Therein lies their theological problem. First, if the world is inevitably heading toward accelerating moral corruption—the explicit view of most premillennialists and amillennialists⁴¹—then why should there have been so much progress in Western history? Are we to conclude that accelerating theological apostasy and moral rebellion produce economic, social, and political progress? Where is this taught in the Bible? Or, second, should we begin to look more closely at the relationship between the progress in Christian theology and church creeds and progress in society? Could these two seemingly independent developments be related positively rather than inversely?⁴² This is a topic that is almost never discussed by Christians, including seminary professors. Why not? Because it raises major questions regarding Christians' corporate responsibility for external progress or retrogression in the wider community.

39. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

40. On pollution, see Appendix G:I, and North, Authority and Dominion, Appendixes J, K.

41. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

Pietistic Christians do not want to consider the practical implications in their lives of either of these possibilities, so they do their best to avoid thinking about the cultural aspects of the churches' progressive corporate sanctification. They define away the problem by limiting to the human heart the Holy Spirit's process of sanctification over time. This is the heart of pietism. If this process of progressive sanctification should ever escape this arbitrary boundary, there is no telling where it would stop. It might end up by encompassing everything.⁴³ If it did, Christians as a corporate community would become responsible for every area of life.⁴⁴ This would mean that God's dominion covenant is still in force.⁴⁵ This is precisely what pietists are trying to avoid.

The problem is, the Spirit's process of corporate sanctification keeps breaking pietism's arbitrary barriers. First, it spills over into the church and family. We baptize our children.⁴⁶ We catechize them. We are supposed to send them to Christian schools.⁴⁷ In doing these things, we admit that we have institutional responsibilities. But if we have these responsibilities before God, then He must be willing to im-

42. R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1968] 2007). (<http://bit.ly/rjrfs0>)

43. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C: "Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action." (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

44. This thought is too horrifying for modern schools of Protestant social thought to consider, with these exceptions: the Social Gospel, Christian Reconstruction, and liberation theology. The Social Gospel has been fading in popularity throughout the post-World War II era, although many of its tenets have been adopted by academic neo-evangelicals: the Sojourners, Evangelicals for Social Action, Wheaton College, Calvin College, Christianity Today axis. With the spectacular collapse of the ideology of Marxism, 1989–91, liberation theology has now had its ideological props knocked out from under it. See Joel McDurmon, God versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009).

45. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps 3–4.

46. David Chilton, "Infant Baptism and Covenantal Responsibility," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, IV (Winter 1977–78), pp. 79–86.

47. Robert L. Thoburn, The Children Trap: The Biblical Blueprint for Education (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986), co-published by Thomas Nelson Sons, Nashville, Tennessee. (<http://bit.ly/ThoburnCT>) pose sanctions in terms of our obedience to His laws. Second, we must seek to change the world by imposing God's Bible-specified sanctions as His legal representatives in history. Few Christians today are willing to affirm that all of God's directly imposed sanctions are exclusively limited to heaven and the day of final judgment. They want sanctions exercised in the Christian family, for example. Nevertheless, the vast majority of contemporary Bible-believing Christians draw a defensive boundary against God's negative sanctions around the state and the external, "common grace" society.⁴⁸ The state and society generally, they insist, are to be protected from an invasion by the biblical covenant, with its revealed laws and negative civil sanctions.⁴⁹ "This far, but no farther!" they proclaim. But they cannot say exactly why, biblically speaking.

1. Restricting the State: Biblical Casuistry

If people believe that the political order is immune from God's negative sanctions in history, they will tolerate or even encourage the state's officers to impose the state's autonomous sanctions over all other institutions. The state will then seek to impose legal boundaries on every other institution.⁵⁰ It is never a question of "sanctions vs. no sanctions" in history. It is always a question of whose sanctions and which sanctions in terms of whose law.⁵¹ There is no neutrality. There are no political vacuums.⁵²

The state, like every other institution, must be captured for God. It is to be restricted to its judicially proper boundaries by God's law and by other Christian institutions. The state is not to place its autonomous limits on the institutions of the world; the world's institutions are to place God's Bible-revealed limits on the state. This means that in order for political liberty to flourish, the whole world must be reformed by

48. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 7.

49. Michael Novak, The Spirit of Democratic Capitalism (New York: Touchstone-Simon & Schuster/American Enterprise Institute, 1982); Richard John Neuhaus, The Naked Public Square: Religion and Democracy in America (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1984). For a critique of this position, see Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

50. It is worth noting that the United States Congress long exempted itself from many of its laws, such as quotas (sexual or racial) on staff hiring and firing, and the United States Postal Service monopoly. Congress has its own post office system.

51. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 8.

52. North, Political Polytheism, p. xi.

means of the preaching of the gospel and by the working out and application of the principles of God's law in history—the ancient moral discipline of casuistry.⁵³ This time, however, casuistry must be Bible-based, not Greek philosophy-based by way of Thomas Aquinas.

Modern Christian pietists reject such a notion of an explicitly biblical casuistry, just as modern humanists do. They say that the reform of this world is impossible, and therefore a waste of time even to try. They announce to the Christian world, as dispensational theologian John Walvoord announced: “We know that our efforts to make society Christianized is [sic] futile because the Bible doesn't teach it.”⁵⁴ They announce, as amillennial theologian Herman Hanko announced, “In the first place, many who strongly advocate Christian social involvement almost always fall into the error of post-millennialism. That is the error of teaching that the Kingdom of Jesus Christ is realized here in this present world by a slow but steady process of social, economic and political evolution.”⁵⁵ All that we can hope to accomplish, they insist, is to create pockets of resistance (Christian ghettos): defensive efforts that will inevitably be almost completely overcome by Satan's earthly kingdom, unless the Rapture takes place (pre-tribulational dispensationalism) or the final judgment does (amillennialism).⁵⁶ Legions of non-predestinarian Christians argue that Bible-based reform efforts are inevitably doomed to failure.⁵⁷ God has decreed this, we are assured—just about the only decree that Arminians acknowledge. They are content to achieve a stalemate with humanism, Islam, and the other alternatives to Christianity. They have adopted the stalemate men-

53. Thomas Wood, English Casuistical Divinity in the Seventeenth Century (London: S.P.C.K., 1952); Albert R. Jonsen and Stephen Toulmin, The Abuse of Casuistry: A History of Moral Reasoning (Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1988); Kenneth E. Kirk, Conscience and Its Problems: An Introduction to Casuistry, rev. ed. (London: Longmans, Green, [1936] 1948).

54. John Walvoord, symposium on “Our Future Hope: Eschatology and Its Role in the Church,” Christianity Today (Feb. 6, 1987), p. 5–I. See my comments in North, Rapture Fever: Why Dispensationalism is Paralyzed (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1993), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnrapture>)

55. Herman Hanko, The Christian's Social Calling and the Second Coming of Christ (South Holland, Michigan: South Holland Protestant Reformed Church, 1970), pp. 1–2. For a critique of Hanko's position, see Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1997), Appendix A: “Cultural Antinomianism.” (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

56. Gary North, “Ghetto Eschatologies,” Biblical Economics Today, XIV (April/May 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gnghetto>)

57. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 8.

tality.⁵⁸ They cannot successfully defend this culturally retreatist position in terms of the Bible—especially by any literal reading of the confrontational lives and reform message of the Old Testament prophets—but they still refuse to accept the idea that this world can significantly be reformed by Christians acting as Christians in society. All they can say is what Dallas Theological Seminary professor Harold Hoehner said in 1990: “I just can’t buy their [the Coalition on Revival’s] basic presupposition that we can do anything significant to change the world. And you can sure waste time trying.”⁵⁹ It never occurs to them that they are wasting a significant part of their lives by not trying, and also by openly discouraging others from trying. Having identified New Testament history as a sinking ship, they refuse to polish any brass. They huddle next to the lifeboats, praying that the Captain will issue the “abandon ship” order in time. There are two common forms of this affliction: Rapture fever (dispensational)⁶⁰ and pre-parousia paralysis (amillennial).⁶¹

K. Covenant Sanctions and Social Progress

It is clear from the Old Covenant that there was a predictable relationship between (1) corporate obedience to the civil stipulations of the national covenant and (2) visible corporate progress—so visible that even covenant-breaking nations would recognize it:

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5-8).⁶²

58. Gary North, Backward, Christian Soldiers? A Manual for Christian Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), ch. 11. (<http://bit.ly/gnsoldiers>)

59. “Is Christ or Satan Ruler of This World?” Christianity Today (March 5, 1990), p. 43.

60. North, Rapture Fever.

61. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, chaps. 4, 5, and 9.

62. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8: “Evangelism

What was the basis of this predictable relationship? God's covenantal promise. But what was its temporal judicial mechanism? It was the civil magistrate's enforcement of God's negative sanctions against public evil-doing. When civil rulers enforced God's law in Mosaic Israel, they removed the judicial basis of God's corporate wrath against the nation. Then the positive acts of obedience to God's Bible-revealed law by millions of individuals could be blessed by God directly.

Thus, a system of positive feedback over time was designed by God to overcome the negative effects of sin. The ultimate manifestation of this overcoming of the effects of sin was the bodily resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. This is why Christ's literal resurrection is supposed to be the model for all Christian social thought,⁶³ just as His bodily ascension to the throne of judgment at the right hand of God is supposed to be the model for all Christian political thought. The fact that neither of these doctrines is applied to modern social and political thought by Protestants is one major theological reason why there is no body of explicitly Protestant social and political thought.⁶⁴ (The other major theological reason is Protestantism's rejection of the judicially binding character of biblical law.)

Modern conservative Christian thought, both Protestant and Catholic, rests on the presupposition that God does not bring His negative sanctions against evil nations in New Testament history, at least not after 70 A.D.⁶⁵ In wartime, predictably, this belief is conveniently forgotten by church members and even occasional attendees, but with the coming of peace, it invariably revives.⁶⁶ But if God does bring sanctions in history in terms of His revealed law, then there must be greater progress in those societies that uphold His social laws than in those that reject them. This would make progress in history a function of societies' adherence to the legal terms of God's covenant. The foundation of social progress would have to be understood in terms of a biblical covenantal standard. This would require a radical break with pluralism, the dominant political ideology of the West.⁶⁷ So far, the West has not considered such a possibility.⁶⁸

Through Law."

63. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

64. Catholic social and political thought has disintegrated as a result of the rise of liberation theology in the Church since 1965. Catholic social theory was primarily a product of Thomism's natural law categories; it survived well into the twentieth century. It went through a slow transition after 1900, with liberalism making constant inroads. The traditional American hostility to Catholicism in political life was voiced by a liberal Catholic, Paul Blanshard, in two best-selling books: American Freedom and Catholic Power, 2nd ed. (1958) and Communism, Democracy, and Catholic Power (1951), both published by the Unitarian publishing firm, Beacon Press, located in Boston. With the election to the Presidency in 1960 of John F. Kennedy, a charming secular humanist (and an almost daily adulterer, the public learned two decades later), the old hostility to Catholics in American politics faded rapidly. So did the old Catholicism. On the American Church's transformation see Garry Wills, Bare Ruined Choirs: Doubt, Prophecy, and Radical Religion (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1972). Wills was himself transformed from traditional Catholicism to political radicalism, 1965–69. Wills' statement on page one regarding the election of 1960 is to the point: "The Catholics' hour had come, though they did not seem to know it; had come, too late, just as their church was disintegrating." On the international Church's transformation, 1965–1970, see Malachi Martin, The Jesuits: The Society of Jesus and the Betrayal of the Roman Catholic Church (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987).

Economist and legal theorist F. A. Hayek (d. 1992) made an exceedingly important admission in his multi-volume study, Law, Legislation and Liberty. As a classical liberal and a dedicated evolutionist,⁶⁹ he rejected the legitimacy of specific civil laws that interfere with personal liberty. He proclaimed the need for a system of civil courts in which only general rules that apply to everyone equally could receive the sanction of civil law. The very generality of abstract law would protect the rights of individuals, he insisted, and civil courts in such a world would protect our liberties. This means that there should not be laws against private, immoral behavior that does not physically harm others, i.e., "victimless crimes." But he added this proviso: "At least

65. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 7.

66. That the unprecedented and rapid visible retreat of Soviet Communism from Eastern Europe in the second half of 1989 came in large part as a result of prayer by Christians and resistance by a handful of churches was not considered a serious possibility by the vast majority of political commentators. It was only Communism's incomparable economic failure—itsself a very late discovery for liberals, though widely accepted by them astonishingly quickly—that supposedly made this retreat inevitable.

67. North, Political Polytheism.

68. When Islam was literally at the gates of Europe in 732 (Arabs) and again in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (Turks), Christians would have understood the inescapable implication of political pluralism: the opening of the gates to those who would then make Christianity illegal, as their heirs do in every Islamic country today. Now that the disciples of Islam are well inside the gates of Europe, and reproducing at high rates, the future of political pluralism is clear: the conquest of Western Europe by its most ancient foe, i.e., the overcoming of Charles Martel's successful defense of Europe in 732. The demographic war against Western civilization is being conducted in the bedrooms of Europe and those Islamic nations bordering Europe, and the physical heirs of Martel are losing. In Western Europe, only Ireland has a birthrate high enough to maintain a stable population: 2.1 children per family. Population growth will be restored in Western Europe if present trends continue within the Islamic ghettos, however; but then these nations will no longer be either Western or pluralist.

69. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Appendix B.

where it is not believed that the whole group may be punished by a supernatural power for the sins of individuals, there can arise no such rules from the limitation of conduct towards others, and therefore from the settlements of disputes.”⁷⁰ He assumed, as all humanists must assume, that a sanctions-bringing supernatural power does not exist. This assumption is incorrect. If it were correct, an explicitly Christian social theory would be impossible to develop. Christian social theory in a world without God's predictable corporate sanctions would be merely some variety of baptized secularism. Unfortunately, for over three centuries, Christian theologians have assumed precisely this. They have accepted Hayek's presupposition: God brings no corporate covenantal sanctions in history. They have therefore rejected the whole of the Old Covenant's description of God's sanctions, from the garden of Eden to the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. They have agreed to an implicit alliance with the humanists based on a mutual rejection of God's sanctions in history.

Here is another reason why Christianity has lost so much influence. Its defenders—and the very concept of “defenders” points to the problem—cannot legitimately expect to beat something with nothing, yet they keep trying. They proclaim God's total sanctions at the end of time after having denied the existence of His sanctions in our own time. They have denied God's “earnest” (Eph. 1:14) in history. The humanist correctly assumes that any God who refuses to bring sanctions in history can hardly be taken seriously as the cosmic imposer of sanctions outside of history. Jesus understood this perspective. He offered proof to His contemporaries that He could pardon sin eternally by healing bodies historically: “And Jesus knowing their thoughts said, Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts? For whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith he to the sick of the palsy), Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house. And he arose, and departed to his house” (Matt. 9:4–7). What contemporary evidence of the coming final sanctions does today's church offer? Only its own self-proclaimed inevitable cultural defeat on this side of Jesus' Second Coming. In short, it seeks to prove God's eternal negative sanctions against covenant-breakers by proclaiming God's historic negative sanctions against covenant-keepers.⁷¹

70. F. A. Hayek, Rules and Order, vol. 1 of Law, Legislation and Liberty, 3 vols. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), p. 101.

71. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 9. See also Gentry, He Shall Have

Some gospel! Some good news!

L. Total Victory: Final Judgment

Does God expect Christians to be culturally victorious? Yes. Does He expect to achieve perfect victory in time and on earth? No. He does not offer total victory in history to definitively redeemed mankind. Their progressive redemption will not become final in history. Only by transcending the historical process will God's great discontinuous event bring final redemption. Paul's first letter to the Corinthian church spells this out in considerable detail. Those living at Jesus Christ's final return will be changed, in the twinkling of an eye (I Cor. 15:52). The final discontinuous event—the ascension of the saints (sometimes called the “Rapture” by those who do not regard its timing as final) and their instant transformation into perfect humanity—brings the final judgment and the presentation of a cleansed and fully redeemed New Heaven and New Earth. (The New Heaven and New Earth definitively arrived in an imperfect, historical form with the kingdom of Christ.)⁷² The final judgment is that final oven in which the heaven-filled, risen kingdom is baked. Peter wrote:

But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up. Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, Looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat? (II Peter 3:10–12).

The whole earth is going to be consumed eschatologically, thereby producing a new loaf. The whole earth is subject to that final, cataclysmic, discontinuous transformation. This implies that the whole earth will at that point have been filled with the leaven of the gospel—not perfect, but ready for the oven. Then our bodies will be transformed, glorified, for “flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption” (I Cor. 15:50). The continuity of history is finally interrupted. This will mark the end of this world. But this is my point: it will be at the end of the whole world. Ask yourself: What area of life will avoid this final conflagration? None. Which part of the leavened dough will be untouched by the blinding heat of the oven? None. Which part of the loaf will be left unbaked? None of it. Time will end at the final judgment. There will be nothing left for the gospel to accomplish in history. Christ's redemption is comprehensive. This does not minimize either the gospel or its effects in history. On the contrary, it affirms both.

Dominion, Appendix B.

72. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 96–106. On the historical reality of the New Heaven and New Earth, see Isaiah 65:17–20.

M. Boundaries After Calvary

Who owns this world? God does (Ps. 24:1). But because of Adam's fall, Satan became Adam's legal heir: a rebellious, cheating leaseholder under God. From Joshua to Jesus, Satan controlled all parts of the earth that were not controlled by the Israelites. Ever since the defeat of Satan at Calvary, however, the legal boundaries of God's kingdom have been the boundaries of the whole earth. The second Adam, Jesus Christ (I Cor. 15:45), has inherited the worldwide inheritance that had been appropriated by Satan after the rebellion of the first Adam. Christ has delegated management responsibilities over this kingdom to His redeemed people. Their historical task is to buy back—i.e., redeem—the whole world. They are not to take it by physical force, except in historically unique cases (e.g., settling a nearly empty land when local tribes resist by force).⁷³ Extending these legal boundaries in history is a

73. The biblical concept of private land ownership was steadily imposed on land that had been controlled by tribes whose concept of property was either nomadic or tribal-communal. North American Indians fought as tribes and lost as tribes, before and after the "white tribes" arrived. The whites understood this. The English and Dutch used the Iroquois as a buffer against the French, who had a treaty with the Algonquins, the implacable foes of the Iroquois. Individual Indians did not hold title to land; they did not buy and sell land to each other, certainly not irrespective of tribal loyalty. There were sometimes sales of land to whites by tribal chiefs, who may not have understood that the white settlers believed they were buying perpetual rights to the land, but surely the chiefs did not concern themselves about the non-existing property rights to land held by tribe members. The famous purchase by Dutch settlers in 1626 of the land that later became New York City was representative of the Dutch settlement strategy: purchase whenever possible. The settlers had received instructions from home stating this explicitly; the Indians "must not be expelled with violence or threats. . . ." Cited by Oscar Theodore Barck, Jr. and Hugh Talmage Leffler, Colonial America (New York: Macmillan, 1958), p. 176.

The English (except Roger Williams) were less scrupulous about existing tribal property rights to the land than the Dutch were. They simply imposed the Indians' view of the land on them: "The rules regarding land are lawfully made by those tribes that can successfully hold it by force." Idem. This military conquest of Indian land does not, of course, affirm the legitimacy of the United States government's subsequent breaking of peace treaties with them. The other major judicial failure of the task that cannot legitimately be avoided. We cannot legitimately point to whole portions of the unleavened cultural dough and say: "Well, that's not the responsibility of Christians. The dominion covenant doesn't cover that zone. The law of God doesn't apply there. Neither do His sanctions. Satan owns that section: lock, stock, and barrel. His disciples will have to leaven it."

What does Satan own? Nothing. The very gates of hell cannot prevail against the church (Matt. 16:18). Satan does not hold legal title to anything. Adam had been disinherited by God. Satan occupied territory through Adam's default. Satan visibly lost legal title to this world at the cross. Jesus announced in the vision given to John: "I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death" (Rev. 1:18). Satan is today a lawless squatter. The world belongs to God, and He has designated it as the inheritance of Christians. But Christians are told to subdue it, to lease it back from God, by demonstrating our commitment to the judicial terms of His peace treaty with us. We are to conquer the world progressively by the preaching of the gospel of salvation and either the purchase of the world from our opponents or their conversion to God's kingdom as fellow heirs. Our sword is the sword of the gospel.⁷⁴ It is still our assignment to subdue the earth, and by the sword of the gospel we can and will conquer in history. This is the dominion covenant. It is mankind's inescapable legacy and obligation. It cannot be evaded. God holds men responsible, both individually and corporately, for its fulfillment.

N. The Question of Continuity

What is the meaning of leaven? The imagery is obvious: growth and expansion. But the obviousness of this imagery has become a problem for theologians because of the debate over eschatology. The premillennialist affirms that leaven means growth, but then says that this applies only to Satan's kingdom. He also denies that leaven refers to the historical continuity of the visible kingdom of God in history. The amillennialist, in contrast, affirms historical continuity, but then he denies growth, if by growth we mean a visible expansion of the gospel's cultural effects outside of the narrow confines of the institutional church. Both hermeneutical schools are united with each other against the postmillennialists' interpretation that leaven symbolizes both visible growth and historical continuity, a position which only the postmillennialist can defend exegetically with respect to the visible kingdom of God in history.

North American whites was that they acquiesced to the Indians' concept of collective property on the Federal reservations. They did so as white chiefs, and so was born the longest experiment in compulsory socialism in United States history. That this has been the most notoriously corrupt bureaucratic failure in United States government history should surprise no one.

74. The following description is not to be taken literally: "And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God (Rev. 19:15).

Jesus spoke forthrightly of His kingdom in terms of leaven. "Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened" (Matt. 13:33). What does leaven do in dough? It raises it. Then the risen dough is baked. But before it is baked, it must rise. There must be no premature removal of the yeast before the hour of baking. History is to be transformed in every area of life by the gospel before the final conflagration.

The dispensationalist, because of the requirements of his premillennial theological system, cannot accept the parable of the leaven at face value. If he did, he would have to abandon premillennialism. He cannot allow the leavening process in history to apply to the kingdom of God. On the contrary, the only leavening process in history that he affirms is the kingdom of Satan. Leaven in the older dispensational system is exclusively evil. This is why Leviticus 7:13 and Matthew 13:33 are such painful thorns in the dispensationalist's side.⁷⁵

Jesus in Matthew 13 gave a series of parables regarding the kingdom of God. They are parables that describe historical continuity. The parable of the leaven appears shortly after Jesus' parable of the wheat and tares.

Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field: But while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. So the servants of the householder came and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares? He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn (Matt. 13:24–30).⁷⁶

75. Appendix C: "Leaven as Exclusively Evil."

The disciples questioned Him about the meaning of this parable. He provided a literal explanation—one so clear that anyone could understand it, except someone using dispensationalism’s “literal” hermeneutic:

He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one; The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; And shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear (Matt. 13:37–43).

But for dispensationalists to hear, they would have to abandon dispensationalism. They prefer not to hear.

When did the kingdom begin? According to this parable, it began with Jesus Christ’s first advent: “He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man.” What is the field? Not the church, surely: “The field is the world.” The institutional church is not even mentioned here. When does the co-mingling of wheat and tares end? At the end of history, Christ’s second advent: “The harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world.” There is no third advent. The events of the so-called Rapture must therefore correspond to the Second Coming of Jesus Christ in final judgment. This is God’s promise: the visible Kingdom of God will enjoy historical continuity. God’s kingdom will expand over time.

There are two competing leavens: righteous and unrighteous. There are two competing kingdoms: God’s and Satan’s. Satan does not have to be physically present in history in order for his kingdom to be real in history. Neither does Jesus Christ. The expansion of one kingdom in history necessitates the contraction of the other. The question is: Whose kingdom expands in history? The dispensational premillennialists say “Satan’s,” at least in the so-called Church Age (pre-Rapture). While this is incorrect, it is at least consistent. Amillennialists have not been equally consistent.⁷⁷ Members of the Dutch-American tradition have sometimes adopted the language of expansion and victory for Christ’s kingdom while denying both with respect to history. They internalize and spiritualize the victory.⁷⁸ This abandons culture and law to the devil in the name of spiritual victory.

76. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

O. Settling Accounts With God: Definitively and Progressively

Men are supposed to seek peace with God. This peace comes only after they have settled their legal accounts with God by publicly proclaiming their faith in the death of His Son at Calvary as their representative wrath-bearer. In the Mosaic Covenant, there was a special tabernacle-temple sacrifice that expressed this quest for peace. In the New Covenant, this quest is expressed by one’s lifelong service to God. We are supposed to become living sacrifices.

The distinction between legal justification and moral sanctification is seen here. Men cannot legitimately expect to pay a ransom to God by means of their own works. This payment is available only through faith in Jesus Christ’s substitutionary atonement: an act of judicial restitution to God. This personal acceptance of Christ’s substitutionary atonement must be manifested publicly: first, by a profession of faith in the saving judicial work of Christ; second, by his subsequent baptism;⁷⁹ and third, by his participation in the Lord’s Supper. Justification is not earned; it is imputed judicially by God—His declaration, “Not guilty.” God declares a person legally justified in His sight on the basis of Christ’s atoning work, and He then makes this transformation a reality. “Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new” (II Cor. 5:17). Sanctification, while also a gift of God, is not exclusively a product of God’s imputation. Definitive sanctification is exclusively an act of God: the imputation of Christ's moral righteousness to an individual. Progressive sanctification in history is not imputed; it is the product of the individual's moral acts of righteousness.⁸⁰

77. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, chaps. 4, 7, 9.

78. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), pp. 123–26. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

79. This includes the legally representative act by his parents in the case of a baptized infant.

The Bible makes it clear that this process of progressive sanctification overflows the boundary of the human heart. What a man is in his heart he will become externally.

Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them (Matt. 7:17–20).⁸¹

Thus, everything he does is supposed to mark him as a redeemed person. This means that institutions owned, controlled, and operated by redeemed people are supposed to be reformed as surely as individuals are. These institutions are to be visibly transformed over time. God promises to bless these institutions compared to institutions run by non-redeemed people by anti-biblical principles.⁸²

Conclusion

The peace offering involved the lawful crossing of a boundary. Man and God could eat a meal together. This meal required the eating of leaven. Leaven is the biblical symbol of growth. It represents the expansion of a kingdom in history. God calls His people to extent His kingdom, thereby replacing Satan's.

How is this to be done? First, by preaching the gospel. Second, by conforming ourselves to God's ethical standards: biblical law. The close association among biblical law, cultural dominion, and holiness is visible in the peace offering's requirement of leaven. Third, by imposing the civil law's required negative sanctions on law-breakers before God imposes negative sanctions on society.

This is why any consideration of God's law cannot legitimately avoid a consideration of the law's mandated sanctions. God brings His sanctions, positive and negative, in history. These sanctions are not limited to individual human beings. They affect every institution. Greg Bahnsen's assessment is correct:

80. North, Unconditional Surrender, pp. 50–52.

81. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 18: "By Their Fruits Ye Shall Know Them."

82. The problem of analysis comes when non-redeemed people run their institutions more closely to the external standards of the covenant, while Christians run their institutions by non-biblical standards. The work ethic of the Japanese compared with that of people in the United States is a case in point. God blesses Japan.

The reign of Christ—His Messianic kingdom—is meant to subdue every enemy of righteousness, as Paradise is regained for fallen men by the Savior. As Isaac Watts poetically expressed it: “He comes to make His blessings flow, Far as the curse is found.” Everything touched by the guilt and pollution of sin is the object of the Messiah's kingly triumph—everything. The kingdom of Christ not only brings forgiveness and new heart-love for God; it also brings concrete obedience to God in all walks of life. Those things which stand in opposition to God and His purposes and His character are to be overthrown by the dynamic reign of the Messianic King. The effects of Christ's dominion are to be evident on earth, among all nations, and throughout the range of human activity.⁸³

God progressively brings His kingdom to fruition over time in terms of His covenant's standards. He makes His kingdom visible in history as surely as He makes His people visible in history: through (1) their public professions of faith and subsequent actions and (2) His visible responses to them. The visible boundaries of Christ's earthly kingdom are progressively extended in history by means of the preaching of the gospel, by men's responses to this preaching, and by their subsequent external and internal obedience to the ethical boundaries of God's Bible-revealed law. This is all grace: “For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them” (Eph. 2:8–10).

The leaven of the Mosaic Testament's sacrifices symbolized this process of progressive sanctification in history. Men brought the best of their fields to God in leavened form. This leavened offering symbolized the full development in history of the best gifts they had received from God. Today, we do the same with our lives. Representationally, this process of moral sanctification in history has an ecclesiastical manifestation in men's gifts and offerings above the ecclesiastically mandatory tithe. We no longer bring an animal to be sacrificed; we bring the fruits of our labor, embodied in the form of money. We bring our voluntary offerings.

83. Greg L. Bahnsen, “This World and the Kingdom of God” (1982), in Gary DeMar and Peter J. Leithart, The Reduction of Christianity: A Biblical Response to Dave Hunt (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988), p. 355. (<http://bit.ly/gdmplreduction>)

God rewards this faithfulness in history. He brings positive sanctions to His covenant people in history. This is the basis of the expansion of His kingdom progressively over time. Any attempt to deny the covenantal relationship between faithfulness and blessing in history is necessarily an attack on the idea that God's kingdom steadily replaces Satan's in history. It does not deny the leavening process in history; it asserts instead that Satan's leaven triumphs in history. Any denial of the success of the leaven of the gospel in history is necessarily and inescapably also an assertion of the success of the leaven of satanic rebellion in history. There is no neutrality. Beware the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, but beware also the hypothetical unleaven of pessimillennial eschatologies.⁸⁴

84. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, chaps. 4, 7.

4

CORPORATE RESPONSIBILITY

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a soul shall sin through ignorance against any of the commandments of the LORD concerning things which ought not to be done, and shall do against any of them: If the priest that is anointed do sin according to the sin of the people; then let him bring for his sin, which he hath sinned, a young bullock without blemish unto the LORD for a sin offering (Lev. 4:1–3).

When a ruler hath sinned, and done somewhat through ignorance against any of the commandments of the LORD his God concerning things which should not be done, and is guilty; Or if his sin, wherein he hath sinned, come to his knowledge; he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a male without blemish: And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the goat, and kill it in the place where they kill the burnt offering before the LORD: it is a sin offering (Lev. 4:22–24).

The theocentric message of these two judicially unified passages is God as the sanctions-bringer. Sanctions refer to point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Placating a Holy God

God must be placated for sin. When He is not placated by sinners under His authority, He threatens negative corporate sanctions against them. Those people who are innocent of open rebellion will nevertheless suffer the consequences merely by assenting to the transgression through inaction. To avoid negative corporate sanctions, societies must conform to God's mandatory means of placating Him publicly through formal repentance.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2010), ch. 4.

In the Mosaic Covenant, the sin offerings were the mandatory means of placating God.² They are also known as the purification offerings. These offerings, more than any other offering in Leviticus—and perhaps more than any other passage in Scripture—established the judicial principle of corporate responsibility. They raised the issue of hierarchical representation (point two), but in the context of corporate sanctions (point four). The judicial issue is oath-breaking.

The purpose of the purification offerings (“sin offerings”: KJV), the fourth sacrifice, was the restoration of sinful people to the presence of God after a covenantal oath had been broken through sin. Without these offerings, the Israelites could not lawfully cross the boundaries associated with God’s sanctuary: local (tabernacle) and regional (nation). The people needed double protection: from their own sins and from the sins of their covenantal representatives, the priests and princes. Rulers had to offer sacrifices for their own sins in order purify the boundaries in which God resided: the temple-tabernacle and the nation.

The sins in question were unintentional. C. Van Dam argued that this unintentionality has a specific meaning: to wander or go astray.³ Van Dam cited Leviticus 4:13: “And if the whole congregation of Israel sin through ignorance, and the thing be hid from the eyes of the assembly, and they have done somewhat against any of the commandments of the LORD concerning things which should not be done, and are guilty.”

The context of these verses is the legal relationship between the people and a ruler. To speak of going astray within a context of judicial hierarchy has the implication that someone in authority has taken the lead: the biblical shepherd and sheep relationship. It is never said anywhere in the text precisely what these sins were. Presumably, they were not major, self-conscious sins on the part of the congregation, since the atoning rituals listed in this passage applied to unintentional sins. Yet even a minor sin committed by a priest threatened the whole community.

The required offerings in Leviticus 4:1–3 were called purification offerings.⁴ They had to do with the tabernacle and temple, God’s

2. In the case of Nineveh, fasting and sackcloth were the required means (Jonah 3:5).

3. C. Van Dam, “The Meaning of Shegagah,” in Unity in Diversity, ed. Riemer Faber (Hamilton, Ontario: Senate of the Theological College of the Canadian Reformed Churches, 1989), pp. 13–23.

4. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, dwelling place, the geographical location around which He had drawn a boundary. Wenham wrote: “Under the Levitical laws the blood of the purification offering was used to cleanse the tabernacle from the pollution of sin. . . . [T]he primary purpose of this purification was to make possible the continuing presence of God among his people.”⁵ Sin, if it was not judicially dealt with according to God’s holy standards, would drive God away from His place of residence among His covenant people. This in turn would open the nation to invaders, for God would no longer defend the nation’s boundaries. Israel would be invaded and oppressed by foreigners dwelling in the land, or worse, invaded and then dragged into captivity. This was the threat that made mandatory a series of acts of ritual cleansing.

The house of God was a place of mediation.⁶ The purification offering was therefore also associated with God’s hierarchical authority over man.⁷ The priest, as the representative of the nation, was required to make atonement in order to protect society. He was the person who had legal access to the place of hierarchical mediation between God and His people.

B. Broken Oaths

Leviticus 4 is entirely devoted to the various atoning rituals for unintentional sins: by priest, congregation, civil ruler, and common citizen. It begins, significantly, with the sin of the priest. The New American Standard Version translates the introductory clause of verse three as follows: “if the anointed priest sins so as to bring guilt on the people. . . .” The New English Bible translates it exactly the same way. The Revised Standard Version reads: “if it is the anointed priest who sins, thus bringing guilt on the people. . . .” There is no doubt that the priest could commit a sin which in some way brought into jeopardy all those who were under his authority. It was not just that he sinned on his own behalf; he sinned representatively. In contrast, this high degree of corporate responsibility for unintentional sins did not rest upon the civil ruler, as we shall see.⁸

1979), p. 84.

5. Ibid., p. 101.

6. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 22. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

7. Ibid., p. 25.

8. I am not speaking here of intentional sins of a civil ruler, such as in the case of David, who intentionally numbered the people in peacetime, against the advice of Joab

How could the priest's unintentional sin bring the people under visible judgment? Because of the structure of the biblical covenant. Responsibility is covenantal, which means that it is imposed hierarchically. Human accountability is simultaneously upward and downward. God is at the top of the hierarchy; nature is at the bottom. In between, God gives men and women varying degrees of accountability, depending on their ordained offices, their economic positions, and their social roles.

Because the idea of the covenant is foreign to the thinking of modern Christians, they have tended to become supporters of a spurious humanist individualism, both philosophically (nominalism)⁹ and politically (right-wing Enlightenment thought),¹⁰ though frequently in the name of Christianity. It is therefore necessary to explore the concepts of corporate responsibility and judicial representation at considerable length in this chapter. There is no way to understand Leviticus 4 correctly if we rely on individualism as either our ethical presupposition or our epistemological presupposition.

Unfortunately, because of the influence the anti-covenantal individualism of modern fundamentalism, evangelical Christians are not accustomed to thinking in terms of biblical covenantal corporatism, either ecclesiastically or politically. This is why Leviticus 4 is so important for the establishment of a systematically biblical social theory: it establishes beyond question the representative character of covenantal office-holding. The dual covenantal oaths of allegiance, civil and ecclesiastical, can be broken through sin, and there must be a means of restoring covenant loyalty. This must be done through acts of sacrifice: covenant renewal. These dual covenants are not strictly personal, as modern individualism would have it. As Milgrom said, Leviticus presents a picture of corporate responsibility. If sin is not checked, people risk coming under God's negative sanctions in history when God brings His wrath against the evildoers: ". . . when the evildoers are punished they bring down the righteous with them. Those who perish with the wicked are not entirely blameless, however. They are inadvertent sinners who, by having allowed the wicked to flourish, have also contributed to the pollution of the sanctuary."¹¹

(II Sam. 24).

9. See the definitions of nominalism and realism in Chapter 6, footnotes 19 and 20.

10. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix C: "Adam Smith's Theory of Economic Sanctions."

11. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York:

This indicates that those who are judicially subordinate to a lawful office-holder have a moral responsibility before God to call a halt publicly to the evil committed by that office-holder—a prophetic responsibility. If they fail to exercise this responsibility, the nation will be brought under God’s negative sanctions. It is crucial for any biblical theory of institutional government to understand this point: if God did not back up His prophets with predictable negative corporate sanctions in history, the prophetic office would have very little power. Modern pietists, whose name is Legion, and modern political pluralists, whose name is vox populi, insist that God no longer imposes predictable sanctions in history in terms of His covenant law and its specified sanctions. They have therefore implicitly denied the legitimacy of the prophetic function, and have therefore also denied the legitimacy of the judicial principle of biblical republicanism: bringing rulers to account for their actions. This leaves them with some version of humanism as the basis of their self-professed republicanism: natural law theory. But natural law theory does not provide statutes (case laws): authoritative guidelines for the application of its supposedly universal judicial principles.

This passage has ramifications far beyond the Mosaic Covenant’s sacrificial system. We need to explore some of these ramifications.¹² We need to understand how the representative priest-nation relationship was archetypal for other covenantal relationships in the Old Covenant. To understand this judicial relationship more readily, let us begin with that most crucial of all representatives in Old Covenant history, Adam.

Doubleday, 1991), p. 49; cf. p. 261.

12. The problem with conventional Bible commentaries that are written by Bible-believing scholars is that they focus almost exclusively on the narrowly theological implications of a passage, while ignoring its implications outside the seven loci of seventeenth-century Protestant scholastic theology: God, man, sin, salvation, Christology, the church, and the last things. At best, there may be some attempt to identify the events chronologically. In contrast, Bible commentaries written by liberals devote extraordinary amounts of space on determining which anonymous (mythical) writer—J, E, D, or P—wrote the verse, and for what purposes. But at least they sometimes do attempt to discuss the political, social, economic, or judicial aspects of the verse. The conservatives write as if these passages did not raise major questions for social theory and practice. Because of this long tradition of circumscribed commentating, it sometimes may appear to readers that I am using Bible verses to spin whole systems of speculative applications. Speculative they may be at times. Relevant to the text? Yes—just not familiar or intuitive to those who have been conditioned to think scholastically and pietistically rather than covenantally.

C. Original Sin and Covenantal Hierarchy

Adam broke covenant with God. He committed sacrilege (church), treason (state), and attempted parricide (family).¹³ Adam in his rebellion was seeking three offices: high priest, king, and founding father—not as a creature under God but as the Creator. He sought original control of the apex of power over all three covenantal hierarchies, a position occupied exclusively by God. This act of judicial rebellion led to his formal disinheritance by God. This was an appropriate response by a father to a son who had attempted to gain the inheritance early by bringing formal accusations of criminal behavior against the father.

By disinheriting Adam, God also disinherited Adam's biological descendants. Thus, the sin of Adam had judicial repercussions on his children and children's children. It also had repercussions in the creation. The world was brought under a curse (Gen. 3:18). "For the creation was subjected to futility, not of its own will" (Rom. 8:20a, NASB). The effects of Adam's sin spread downward: down through time and down through the creation. Adam, as the delegated covenantal head of church, state, and family, brought the negative sanctions of God against him and all those under his covenantal authority.

1. Inherited Sin

Covenant-breaking man resists such a hierarchical concept of responsibility. He wants to believe that he sins only on his own behalf. The doctrine of inherited (original) sin—his legal status as God's disinherited heir—thwarts man's doctrine of human autonomy. Self-proclaimed autonomous man sees himself as the sole source of his own broken covenant, assuming that he even admits the existence of any covenant. This view of sin asserts that each person implicitly possesses

13. Attempted parricide—executing a parent—was inherent in Adam's decision to listen to Satan's accusation against God: that God was a liar, that Adam would not surely die by eating the forbidden fruit (Gen. 3:4). If true, then God was not who He said He was: God the enforcer, the sanctions-bringer. This would mean that God had lied about the nature of Deity; He was asking men to worship a false god. Such a request was a capital crime under the Old Covenant (Deut. 13:6–11). This was the one execution in which a family member could lawfully participate in the stoning; he had to cast the first stone (Deut. 13:9). Satan needed two witnesses to bring this accusation against God, for two witnesses are required to press a capital crime in a biblical court (Num. 35:30). The two witnesses committed perjury, so they became subject to the punishment that would have applied to the victim: death (Deut. 19:16–19). See Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012), Appendix E: "Witnesses and Judges."

the power of sin-free living. A person may sin, but this sinning is supposedly of his own free will. Each person repeats the fall of Adam, it is asserted; without this morally contingent, case-by-case repetition of Adam's sin, all individuals would automatically gain heaven as God's lawful heirs. Such a view of sin rejects the biblical doctrine of corporate disinheritance. Mankind as a whole has been lawfully disinherited by God. All men are brothers in the flesh apart from regeneration: disinherited sons.¹⁴

This doctrine of uninherited sin was first formulated by the British monk Pelagius in the early fifth century, A.D. Calvinist theologian B. B. Warfield summarized the core of Pelagianism: "It lies in the assumption of the plenary ability of man; his ability to do all that righteousness can demand,—to work out not only his own salvation, but also his own perfection. This is the core of the whole theory; and all the other postulates not only depend upon it, but arise out of it."¹⁵ This meant a denial by the Pelagians of God's grace in salvation. Of the theology of the Pelagians, Warfield wrote on the next page: "It was in order that they might deny that man needed help, that they denied that Adam's sin had any further effect on his posterity than might arise from his bad example."

2. Hierarchical Responsibility

Because of the existence of covenant sanctions, the doctrine of covenantal hierarchy leads us to conclude that responsibility is both upward and downward. Those who are under the legal authority of a covenantal officer are under the historical sanctions of God, both positive and negative, which God applies to them through this ordained agent and also sometimes because of him. Authority is always hier-

14. The liberals' refrain about "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man" is superficially biblical. The phrase means the opposite of what they think it means. The fatherhood of God is based theologically on the literal creation of man by God, a doctrine that liberals reject. "God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things; And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation" (Acts 17:24–26).

15. B. B. Warfield, "Introductory Essay on Augustin and the Pelagian Controversy," in Philip Schaff (ed.), A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church, vol. V, Saint Augustin: Anti-Pelagian Writings (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1887] 1971), p. xiv.

*archical. It is therefore necessarily representative.*¹⁶ No one can legitimately claim judicial innocence based merely on his claim of autonomy. Participation in any covenantal institution is inevitably a form of assent to representative authority, though always limited by God's law in the degree of required obedience.¹⁷

The example of an army under the authority of a military commander is an easily understood example (i.e., "representative") of the principle of collective sanctions. If he makes a serious mistake, the army is defeated, with negative consequences for civilians back home. If he does well, the army is victorious. In the first instance, the defeat of the troops and the subsequent subjection of the civilians may have no immediate connection to the specific nature of their own personal sins, but there is surely a mediate connection. They are brought under judgment because of the representative character of military authority. Similarly with the positive sanction of military victory: it is mediated through the commander.

We readily understand this principle with regard to military commanders. Few people today understand it with respect to New covenant priests (clerics),¹⁸ yet Mosaic law emphasized the representative sins of priests far more than the representative sins of military commanders.

D. Covenantal Allegiance

To participate in a specifically covenantal institution—church, state, or family—the individual must agree to obey those holding lawful office above him. This agreement is either explicit, as in the case of a naturalized citizen, or implicit, as in the case of minor children within a family, or the case of resident aliens living within the borders of a civil jurisdiction. There are sanctions, positive and negative, attached to such covenant membership. These sanctions are inherent in the very nature of the covenant; they cannot lawfully be evaded. What are sanctions? They are blessings and cursings legally applied by representative authorities to a special, set-apart people, i.e., a sanctified group.¹⁹

16. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

17. Gary North, When Justice Is Aborted: Biblical Standards for Non-Violent Resistance (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnjustice>); cf. Christianity and Civilization, Nos. 2 and 3 (1983): The Theology of Christian Resistance, (<http://bit.ly/CRtheology>) and Tactics of Christian Resistance. (<http://bit.ly/CRtactics>)

18. A cleric does not offer atoning sacrifice, unlike an Old Covenant priest.

19. In the New Testament, saints are God's sanctified people: holy (set apart) and under His unique covenant sanctions.

1. Definitive Allegiance

Covenantal allegiance is definitive: it begins at a particular point in time. A person swears an oath in the presence of other men—God’s officially sanctioned, representative, covenantal officers in history—that he will abide by the terms of a particular covenant. Even in the case of family and civil covenants that are officially secular, the person administering the oath still administers it as God’s designated agent in history, whether the particular society recognizes this subordinate legal status or not. Judicially speaking, the most important aspect of government is the content of the oath. The oath is central. The oath invokes the covenant: sovereignty, authority, law, sanctions, and inheritance. This is why, in seeking to understand the actual operations of any covenantal organization, the researcher must always do two things: follow the money and examine the oath.

In the church covenant, baptism is the definitive oath-sign that establishes the covenant. In the Old Covenant era, this visible covenantal act was circumcision.²⁰ This was normally a representative act, though there were sometimes voluntary conversions by adults. Circumcision also was applied representatively to household foreign slaves (Gen. 17:12–13). In the New Covenant, this act of definitive covenantal bonding is established directly through adult baptism, but also representatively in the case of infant baptism or the baptism of mentally incompetent children who are under the judicial authority of a baptized parent.²¹ God places a legal claim on those who are baptized. He places them under the threat of covenant sanctions, both positive and negat-

20. Meredith G. Kline, By Oath Consigned: A Reinterpretation of the Covenant Signs of Circumcision and Baptism (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1968), ch. 3.

21. Only one baptized parent is necessary to establish the legal ground for baptizing a child. One baptized parent establishes the legal status of holiness for the child. This is the legal basis for household baptisms (Acts 16:14–15, 33): not the conversion (saving faith as such) of all those family members being baptized, but their special legal status in history as members of a God-sanctified household. The presence of one converted spouse brings God’s special blessings to that household. This is the biblical doctrine of household sanctification. “For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband: else were your children unclean; but now are they holy” (I Cor. 7:14). Neither the unbelieving spouse nor the child is automatically regenerated on the basis of the saving faith of the saved spouse, but they are made beneficiaries of the covenant in history. God places his legal claim on the baptized person as the beneficiary of His blessings, whether or not the person knows of his subordinate legal status. Ray Sutton, “Household Baptisms,” Covenant Renewal, II (Aug. 1988).

ive.²²

In the civil covenant, citizenship may be gained either by birth or by legal naturalization. Those who possess citizenship are beneficiaries of certain blessings, but they are also placed under unique obligations. There is usually a public oath of allegiance administered to naturalized citizens, but the same oath-covenant is representatively binding on all citizens. They may be required to take a public oath at certain times, such as when they join the armed forces or when they are elected to public office, but the terms of the civil covenant (e.g., a constitution) are still binding on them, whether or not they verbally and publicly profess allegiance to it.

In the family covenant, the definitive covenantal act takes place when the officer of either church or state declares a couple legally married.²³ Family allegiance by children to parents takes place representatively and definitively at conception. God deals providentially with individuals before their birth: Paul wrote: “And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; (For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth;) It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated” (Rom. 9:10–13). This is why parents become legally responsible for the protection of their children at conception, not at birth.²⁴

22. Kline, By Oath Consigned, ch. 5.

23. In Western law, a single act of sexual bonding—consummation—must subsequently affirm the public declaration of marriage in order for the marriage to be legally binding.

24. This makes abortion an act of covenant-breaking: rebellion upward against God and downward against the murdered infant. God holds the parents responsible, and also their medical accomplices. If the mother has the abortion against the father's wishes, then God holds her, the physician, and his assistants responsible. This is why abortion, being murder, is a capital crime in God's eyes. Any society that refuses to legislate and enforce capital punishment against every convicted abortionist and every convicted ex-mother will eventually fall under God's negative corporate sanctions. Because most Christians who are anti-abortionists today are also theological pietists, they refuse to call for the execution of convicted abortionists, let alone the murderous parents. By rejecting God's law and its required civil sanctions, they have renounced the prophetic function. They have therefore reduced themselves to the status of just one more special interest political pressure group, where fund-raising and political coalitions with covenant-breakers count for more than integrity before God. Their intense hatred of biblical law makes them lovers of political compromise. They write “Abortion is Murder” on posters, but they do not really believe it, for they do not affirm the Bible's civil penalty for murder. They have sent misleading signals to the abortionists and to the civil authorities. God is not mocked. Judgment is coming.

2. Progressive Allegiance

Covenantal allegiance is also progressive in church and state: covenant renewal continues as time passes. First, in the church: the Mosaic Covenant's mandatory acts of ecclesiastical covenant renewal were Israel's annual assemblies—above all, participation in the Passover meal. In the church, taking Holy Communion is the act of formal covenant renewal. This publicly places the church member under the sanctions of the covenant, which is why Paul warned members of the church at Corinth that they must examine themselves—exercise self-judgment—prior to taking the communion meal (I Cor. 11:28).

Second, in the state: various acts of citizenship mark state covenant renewal, most notably the act of voting. Under Mosaic law, the public assembled to ratify the anointing of a new king (I Kings 1:39–40; II Chron. 23). In short, individuals in their legal office as citizens ratify or sanction a leader or group of leaders. The civil covenant extends through history by means of these public acts of re-ratification. Citizens reaffirm their allegiance to the original civil covenant by formally sanctioning their leaders from time to time.²⁵ In many countries today, the adult male citizen's appearance in response to military conscription constitutes covenant renewal.²⁶

In contrast to church and state, there is no biblically sanctioned judicial act of covenant renewal for the family; only death, either covenantal or physical, breaks the marital bond.²⁷ Covenant renewal within the family is exclusively moral rather than judicial.²⁸ This is an important distinguishing feature of the family covenant from both church

25. In many modern tyrannies, it is legally mandatory for citizens to vote. Negative sanctions are imposed on those who refuse. The tyrants know that the national covenant needs periodic ratification by the people. These public acts of ratification create temporary legitimacy for the rulers; they reinforce the obligation of the people to obey.

26. This may appear to have been the case in ancient Israel (Ex. 30:13–14). It was not, however. This census-taking was allowed only in preparation for holy war. The adult males had to pay blood money to the priests. See Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58. Thus, it appears that this was not an act of civil covenant renewal but rather priestly renewal.

27. Ray R. Sutton, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Divorce and Remarriage (Ft. Worth: Dominion Press, 1987), chaps. 2, 4. (<http://bit.ly/rssecond>)

28. There is no judicial equivalent of Holy Communion for the family. This is why any attempt to equate the legal status of the family with the legal status of the church is mistaken. They are separate jurisdictions, covenants, and institutions. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), chaps. 1, 6. (<http://bit.ly/tithing>). See also Appendix B, below: "Rushdoony on the Tithe: A Critique."

and state covenants. It points to different structures of authority, as we shall see.²⁹

E. Responsibility: Collective and Hierarchical

The biblical doctrine of collective responsibility is an aspect of the biblical doctrine of hierarchical responsibility. We need to ask: In what way?

We know that God brought judgments against nations under the Old Covenant; the testimony of the prophets is clear about this.³⁰ He also showed mercy to Nineveh because the entire city repented when Jonah preached. This raises an important question: Did God ever punish a collective group solely because of the sins of the group's rulers? The plagues of Egypt indicate that God did do this. The rigorous theocratic bureaucracy of Egypt brought the entire nation under the wrath of God. But at least with respect to the tenth plague, the death of the firstborn, God offered a way of escape to every Egyptian household: blood on the doorposts. That no Egyptian household took this path to life (Ex. 12:30) indicates that they all agreed with their supposedly divine political ruler. They did consent in principle to what the Pharaoh was doing.

There is another issue that we need to consider: limiting the state. Consider the biblical law governing the state's imposition of the capital sanction: "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin" (Deut. 24:16). This is a restriction on civil government. Were there any exceptions to this under the Mosaic Covenant? Yes: the military action known as hormah—the destruction of an especially evil enemy society during wartime. Hormah was the representative example, and named accordingly: a place set

29. It is nothing short of heresy to equate the family with the institutional church. They are separate jurisdictions, separate covenants. The church does not develop from the family. The church survives the final judgment; the family does not: no marriage or giving of marriage (Matt. 22:30). The church is therefore the central institution in a covenant-keeping society, not the family. Any attempt to fuse the two institutions by viewing the church as an aspect of the family is at bottom a return to clannism. Jesus warned about elevating the family above the church: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me" (Matt. 10:34–38).

30. I am not yet raising the question of New Covenant history.

aside by God for total destruction.

And Israel vowed a vow unto the LORD, and said, If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand, then I will utterly destroy their cities. And the LORD hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah³¹ (Num. 21:2–3).

1. A Priestly Army

James Jordan concluded that this activity of total destruction was “a priestly act, issuing from the flaming swords of the cherubic (priestly) guardians of the land, a revelation of God’s direct fiery judgment against the wicked. Not every city was to be destroyed in this fashion, but certain ones were, as types of the wrath of God.”³²

Speaking of the city of Bashan, Moses said: “And we utterly destroyed them, as we did unto Sihon king of Heshbon, utterly destroying the men, women, and children, of every city” (Deut. 3:6). The same curse of death was placed on Jericho and on anyone who would rebuild its walls: “And Joshua adjured them at that time, saying, Cursed be the man before the LORD, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his firstborn, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it” (Josh. 6:26)—a prophecy fulfilled by Hiel: “In his days did Hiel the Beth-elite build Jericho: he laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his firstborn, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the LORD, which he spake by Joshua the son of Nun” (I Kings 16:34).³³ While this was not the normal rule of warfare (Deut. 20:14), it did apply in certain cases. The children of the enemy perished with their parents.

31. There was a second Canaanitic Hormah in Zerephath, the one destroyed by Judah and Simeon (Jud. 1:17). The Hebrew root word for Hormah (charam) meant a thing dedicated—set aside—by God for total destruction: “Hebrew and Chaldee Dictionary,” James Strong, Exhaustive Concordance, p. 43, #2767, #2763; Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible, ed. H. B. Hackett, 4 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, [1869] 1981), II, p. 1089. Wrote Jordan: “Hormah means ‘placed under the ban, totally destroyed.’ To be placed under the ban is to be devoted to death.” James B. Jordan, Judges: God’s War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985), p. 10. (<http://bit.ly/jjudges>)

32. Jordan, Judges, p. 11.

33. Presumably, this meant that the walls of the city had not been rebuilt. The city was apparently occupied in David’s day: “When they told it unto David, he sent to meet them, because the men were greatly ashamed: and the king said, Tarry at Jericho until your beards be grown, and then return” (II Sam. 10:5). Perhaps this was a name given to the immediate vicinity of Jericho, but not to an actual city.

Israel became God's sanctioning agent against societies that had corrupted worship and morality. Israel in a sense became the military equivalent of the angel of death. When assembled for battle, they became a holy army engaged in holy warfare, meaning a war to impose God's negative sanctions in history.³⁴ So outraged was God against the Canaanites that He hardened their hearts, just as He had hardened Pharaoh's heart against doing good,³⁵ so that they would not seek peace with Israel. He wanted to judge them.³⁶

Joshua made war a long time with all those kings. There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel, save the Hivites the inhabitants of Gibeon: all other they took in battle. For it was of the LORD to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour, but that he might destroy them, as the LORD commanded Moses (Josh. 11:18–20).

2. A Judicial Restraint on Civil Government

We return to Deuteronomy 24:16: "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin." This law was judicially binding within the land of Israel. Yet we know that in the case of Leviticus 4, the sin of the priest could bring God's sanctions against the whole people. Does this mean that the judicial restraint of Deuteronomy 24:16 applies to the civil government but not to God? I think this is the proper explanation.

Why does God refuse to bind Himself in history by this same judi-

34. On Israel as a holy army, see Judges, p. 93. Jordan pointed out that Deborah's (and Barak's) song includes a verse (Jud. 5:2) that refers to the fact that "long locks of hair hung loose in Israel," a reference to one aspect of the Nazarite vow (Num. 6:5). He is using the alternative (margin) translation of the New American Standard Bible.

35. "And he hardened Pharaoh's heart, that he hearkened not unto them; as the LORD had said" (Ex. 7:13). "And the LORD hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and he hearkened not unto them; as the LORD had spoken unto Moses" (Ex. 9:12). "And the LORD said unto Moses, Go in unto Pharaoh: for I have hardened his heart, and the heart of his servants, that I might shew these my signs before him" (Ex. 10:1) "But the LORD hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go" (Ex. 10:20). "And Moses and Aaron did all these wonders before Pharaoh: and the LORD hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go out of his land" (Ex. 11:10).

36. Jesus said that God deliberately hardens people's hearts so that they will not believe on Him and be saved: "He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them" (John 12:40).

cial principle? Why does He reserve the right to enforce collective judgment against the publicly non-participating sons of law-breaking priests? First, because of the doctrine of original sin: in His eyes, all men stand judicially condemned from conception forward. Only His special grace saves some people from eternal wrath. Thus, what protects mankind in general from God's wrath in history is His grace, i.e., His merciful self-restraint. This common grace is manifested by God in His extension of physical life to men in history.³⁷ He therefore distinguishes between judicial guilt in His eyes and judicial guilt in the eyes of sinful civil rulers. As a testimony to God's common grace to all men, and also as a testimony to their own guiltiness before God, sinful rulers are to be restrained from executing civil judgment against those who are judicially innocent of public crimes. God, however, is not under a similar judicial restraint. Second, God knows that the sins of the civil and ecclesiastical rulers reflect the preferences of the people. In this sense, all citizens stand condemned, at least with respect to their private thoughts and acts. Public toleration of the rulers' particular sins is the result of the people's willingness to tolerate sin in the camp, in order to avoid similar public sanctions against their own sins. In short, they are not judicially innocent in God's eyes. He knows their hearts. Third, sinful civil magistrates need judicial restraints if righteousness, peace, and freedom are to be protected; God does not need similar restraints.

It is not that sons do not die for the sins of their fathers; they do. We all do. The doctrine of original sin teaches that all people die because of the representative sin of their father, Adam. Romans 5:14 declares: "Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come." Biblical law teaches only that the state is not to execute sons for the sins of their fathers. Yet, even in this case, there was an exception in ancient Israel: sacrilege.³⁸

F. Ritual Cleansings

Was the sin of Leviticus 4 unintentional sacrilege? This does not appear to be the case, for it is difficult to imagine what unintentional sacrilege might be. Sacrilege is the crime in history; those who commit it do so with a high hand against God. Adam sinned wilfully (I Tim. 2:14). So did the people who told Aaron to build the golden calf (Ex. 32). So did Saul when he sacrificed the animal in Samuel's absence (I Sam. 13:9). So did Uzziah when he entered the temple to burn incense (II Chron. 26:19).

37. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

38. Appendix A: "Sacrilege and Sanctions."

The atoning ritual requirements for the priest were specific: a bullock (young bull)³⁹ had to be slain and its blood used to wipe away the sin.

And he shall bring the bullock unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the LORD; and shall lay his hand upon the bullock's head, and kill the bullock before the LORD. And the priest that is anointed shall take of the bullock's blood, and bring it to the tabernacle of the congregation: And the priest shall dip his finger in the blood, and sprinkle of the blood seven times before the LORD, before the veil of the sanctuary. And the priest shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar of sweet incense before the LORD, which is in the tabernacle of the congregation; and shall pour all the blood of the bullock at the bottom of the altar of the burnt offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. And he shall take off from it all the fat of the bullock for the sin offering; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards (Lev. 4:4–8).

The atoning ritual requirements of the congregation were similar, and the sacrificial animal was the same.

And if the whole congregation [Hebrew word: 'edah] of Israel sin through ignorance, and the thing be hid from the eyes of the assembly [Hebrew word: qahal], and they have done somewhat against any of the commandments of the LORD concerning things which should not be done, and are guilty; When the sin, which they have sinned against it, is known, then the congregation [assembly—Hebrew word: qahal] shall offer a young bullock for the sin, and bring him before the tabernacle of the congregation. And the elders of the congregation shall lay their hands upon the head of the bullock before the LORD: and the bullock shall be killed before the LORD. And the priest that is anointed shall bring of the bullock's blood to the tabernacle of the congregation: And the priest shall dip his finger in some of the blood, and sprinkle it seven times before the LORD,

39. A young bull is not vicious. Its temperament is still sweet. Its character changes when it becomes mature. See Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 122. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

even before the veil. And he shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar which is before the LORD, that is in the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall pour out all the blood at the bottom of the altar of the burnt offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. And he shall take all his fat from him, and burn it upon the altar. And he shall do with the bullock as he did with the bullock for a sin offering, so shall he do with this: and the priest shall make an atonement for them, and it shall be forgiven them. And he shall carry forth the bullock without the camp, and burn him as he burned the first bullock: it is a sin offering for the congregation (Lev. 4:13–21).

1. Congregation and Assembly

The question arises: What was the “whole congregation,” and what was “the assembly”? Here, Gordon Wenham and James Jordan disagreed on the definitions. Wenham argued that the congregation was a smaller body within the worshipping assembly. This smaller group possessed representational and legal functions. Thus, when the congregation had committed an unintentional sin, and the leaders of the assembly later learned of this, the assembly brought the bullocks an offering.⁴⁰ If this thesis is correct, then there was an added degree of hierarchy in the relationship: priest, congregation, assembly. The assembly, the larger body, brought the offering for the sake of its representative body. Jordan saw it the other way around: the congregation [edah] was the nation as such; the assembly [qahal] was the formal gathering.⁴¹ He saw this gathering as primarily sabbatical.⁴² I think he makes the stronger case. On this point, he has agreed with Rushdoony’s conclusion: “Congregation has reference to the whole nation in its governmental function as God’s covenant people. G. Ernest Wright defined it as ‘the whole organized commonwealth as it assembled officially for various purposes, particularly worship.’”⁴³

In either case, there was a unique covenantal link between the priest and the people, a link identified by the identical nature of the appropriate atoning sacrifices: a bullock. This covenantal link was judicially grounded in the designation of Israel as a kingdom of priests (Ex.

40. Wenham, Leviticus, pp. 98–99.

41. James B. Jordan, The Sociology of the Church (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1986), Appendix A. (<http://bit.ly/jjchurch>)

42. Ibid., p. 298.

43. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 85. Wright’s statement appears in The Interpreter’s Bible, II, p. 468.

19:6). The high priest was a priest to the other priests; they in turn were priests to the priestly nation of Israel; and the nation of Israel served as priests for the entire pagan world.⁴⁴ Thus, as Milgrom said, "The high priest assumes responsibility for all Israel."⁴⁵

2. Civil and Ecclesiastical Representation

In contrast to the priest, who had to sacrifice a bullock, the tribal leader⁴⁶ who sinned unintentionally had to bring a male goat without defect for his offering (Lev. 4:23). The common man who sinned unintentionally had to bring a female goat without defect (Lev. 4:28). He could also bring a female lamb without defect (Lev. 4:32). The symbolism is obvious: masculinity under the Mosaic Covenant was associated in the civil covenant with rule, femininity with subordination.⁴⁷ In neither case—civil ruler or citizen—was a bullock an appropriate sacrificial animal, for the bullock was associated with priestly authority.

The sin of the priest and the sin of the whole congregation were of similar consequence in God's eyes: major (bullock). Likewise, the sins of the ruler and the lone individual were comparable: minor (goat). The sacrificial link between priest and people indicates that the priest had sufficient representative authority for his unintentional sin to bring the people under God's negative sanctions. The civil ruler did not possess comparable representative authority.

What is indicated in Leviticus 4:1–3 is that there was a much closer judicial link between the priesthood and the covenanted society than there was between the civil ruler and the covenanted society. This is why we must conclude that the church was covenantally more important in Israel than the state was. The unintentional sin of the priest was treated by God as comparable to the unintentional sin of the whole congregation. The unintentional sin of the ruler was treated on a par

44. This is why 70 bullocks had to be sacrificed each year at the feast of ingathering (booths or tabernacles) during the first eight days (Num. 29:13–36). These were representative atoning sacrifices for the whole gentile world, symbolized by the 70 nations. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, p. 190.

45. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, p. 54.

46. Wenham, Leviticus, p. 99.

47. The abolition of all required ritual sacrifices in the New Covenant (Heb. 9) has removed the male-female distinction in the civil covenant. Without civil sacrifices, there is no legitimate judicial restriction on women participating in civil rulership. The male-female distinction is maintained in matters of the church's ordained elders only because a male must represent a male God in the administration of the sacraments and the covenantally authoritative declaration of God's word (I Cor. 14:34–35). This exclusion of females has nothing to do with sacrifices.

with the unintentional sin of the average citizen.⁴⁸ Conclusion: the laxity of the priesthood regarding their personal sins threatened greater direct negative consequences for the citizens of Old Covenant Israel than the moral or judicial laxity of the civil authorities.⁴⁹

G. Corporate Sanctions and Authority: The People

This raises the question of the locus of authority for the initiation of corporate sins. Temporally and functionally, this infraction was initiated by the priests, who were in repeated contact with the holy implements of the tabernacle-temple. But the corporate nature of God's negative sanctions indicates that primary institutional responsibility lay elsewhere. The priests were legal representatives placed by God between Himself and His people. As representatives, they did in fact represent. A representative, judicially speaking, is legally the initiating agent, but his acts must be sanctioned by those represented. His actions are to reflect the wishes of those whom he represents.⁵⁰ Their continuing consent is the basis of his authority. Thus, the priest was required by God to offer a sacrifice because of this representative infraction that he unknowingly had initiated.

The representative represents both God and society. If society does not bring negative sanctions against evil representatives, then God will. God delegates authority to the people to serve as His covenantally sovereign agents, meaning those who bring lawful sanctions in His name. If the people refuse to act as God's representatives, then He acts on His own behalf against both the rulers and the people. This covenantal threat is to serve as their motivation for imposing positive and negative sanctions against their rulers. This is the theological foundation of what has become known in Protestant political theory as the doctrine of interposition.⁵¹

48. Economically speaking, the king's sacrifice was less burdensome than the commoner's, for a female goat can produce offspring and milk. The male animal was symbolically more important in the ancient world, but not economically.

49. Cf. Jordan, Judges, on Judges 17–21.

50. This is not true, short-term, in tyrannies, but tyrannies do not indefinitely survive a change in heart in their subjects.

51. On this political-judicial concept in Western history, see John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), IV:XX:XXXI. Cf. Michael Gilstrap, "John Calvin's Theology of Resistance," Christianity and Civilization, No. 2 (1983), pp. 180–217. (<http://bit.ly/CRtheology>); Tom Rose, "On Reconstruction and the American Republic," ibid., pp. 285–310.

We see an example of this when Saul announced sanctions against his son Jonathan. The people intervened to prevent him from carrying them out. "And the people said unto Saul, Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid: as the LORD liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he hath wrought with God this day. So the people rescued Jonathan, that he died not" (I Sam. 14:45). The word translated as "people" refers to a collective unit, such as a tribe. The army was in battle. This was not mob action; it was organized with the co-operation of the military commanders. They interposed themselves between Saul and Jonathan. The biblical text is clear: they rescued him.⁵²

Was this an act of rebellion? No, it was an act against rebellion. Saul was the rebel; the people interposed themselves in order to prevent an unrighteous act on the part of the king, their representative. It was the people who had called for a king (I Sam. 8); it was they who could lawfully interpose themselves between the king and his victim. On this occasion, Saul heeded their judgment.

The fact is, kingship in Israel was a product of the people's lawfully delegated authority under God. John Frame wrote: "The kingship comes as God's response to a demand from the people. The people's motives in making their request were largely sinful (I Sam 8; cf. Deut 17:14; Judges 9), but God had planned to raise up kings for his people (Deut 17:14–20) and had given them in the law a proper method of choosing one. It is important to note that in Deuteronomy 17, the king is to be chosen by the people (v 15). As with the appointment of Moses and that of at least some of the judges, there is a human choice to be made. This choice certainly does not prevent God from playing a direct role in the selection process, but it does necessitate a human choice in addition to whatever role God may himself choose to play."⁵³ Again, "The kingship is both a charismatic office and a popular one: that is, both God and the people play roles in its establishment and continuance."⁵⁴ The people have the legal authority to reject the leadership of

52. If there is an example in the Bible of the lawful rescue by citizens of an innocent person from the unlawful act of a senior civil magistrate, this is it. Such organized resistance must have the blessing of church officers or local magistrates; otherwise, it would not be biblically lawful. But with that support, people have a right to challenge even a king who is about to execute his child. See North, When Justice Is Aborted.

53. John Frame, "Toward a Theology of the State," Westminster Theological Journal, LI (Fall 1989), p. 211.

54. Ibid., p. 212.

a king (Rehoboam) “who will not rule according to their desires.”⁵⁵ This places enormous authority into the hands of the ruled. Here is the judicial basis of Israel’s existence as a theocratic republic, despite the presence of kings, beginning during Samuel’s prophetic ministry.

H. The Priestly Office

It is clear from Leviticus 4 and from many other texts in the Bible that those who are at greatest risk in relation to the imposition of God’s covenantal sanctions in history are those who are the primary sanctioning agents of the specific covenant: the people rather than their covenantal representatives. We discover in this principle a fundamental rule of all biblical social authority: those who are threatened as the primary recipients of God’s national covenantal sanctions are the society’s primary sovereign agents. From him to whom much is given, much is expected (Luke 12:48). Again and again in the Old Testament,

55. Idem. A similar view of the sovereignty of the people under God appeared in the Vindiciae Contra Tyrannos, published in Latin anonymously in 1579, which became a touchstone for Protestant political theory almost from the day it first appeared. It was the Huguenot tract of that century, published seven years after the St. Bartholomew’s massacre of the Protestants by the French monarch. These ideas had been discussed before the massacre, but this book put them in final form. The book asserted the duty of the people to rise up and overthrow a king who was flagrantly disobeying God.

These ideas on the right of rebellion can be traced back to the School of Salamanca, the sixteenth-century political economists who are without doubt the most important neglected political theorists in the post-medieval West: free market economists, subjective value theorists, and defenders of republican liberties. Samuel Rutherford cited Luis de Molina, Francisco Suarez, and Fernando Vasquez in four of the first seven footnotes in Lex, Rex, or the Law and the Prince (Harrisonburg, Virginia: Sprinkle, [1644] 1980), pp. 1, 2. He cited Francisco de Vitoria (he referred to him as Victoria) and Domingo de Soto on page 3. On their economic theories, see Marjorie Grice-Hutchison, The School of Salamanca: Readings in Spanish Monetary Theory, 1544–1605 (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1952). (<http://bit.ly/mghschool>); Murray N. Rothbard, “Late Medieval Origins of Free Market Economic Thought,” Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Summer 1975); Rothbard, Economic Thought Before Adam Smith (Brookfield, Vermont: Edward Elgar, 1995), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/mrecon1>); Alejandro Antonio Chafuen, Christians for Freedom: Late-Scholastic Economics (San Francisco: Ignatius, 1986). Chafuen preferred to call them Hispanic Scholastics (p. 23). There is very little historical scholarship in English that traces the origins of republican political theory to the School of Salamanca; the relationship is better known in European scholarship, especially German. See Bernice Hamilton, Political Thought in Sixteenth-Century Spain (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1963). Quentin Skinner devoted a chapter to them in The Foundations of Modern Political Thought, 2 vols. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978), II, ch. 5: “The Revival of Thomism.” Their work was a great deal more than just the revival of Thomism. It reshaped political theory in the Protestant West.

God's capital sanctions fell on the people rather than the kings and the priests.⁵⁶ This indicates that it was the people who possessed primary institutional authority, not their representatives. This is why Israel was a theocratic republic. The Bible's holy commonwealth ideal necessarily involves the establishment of an oath-bound civil covenant. In this ideal civil covenant, the corporate people possess primary responsibility and therefore primary authority. In this sense, the republican ideal is biblical. Authority extends downward from God to the people and upward from them to their representatives. God validates civil rulers in the name of the people.

Modern democratic theory (popular sovereignty) is a secularization of this biblical holy covenant ideal (delegated sovereignty), in which the people exercised judicial authority under God because of the covenant they had made with God. The evils of democracy, familiar from Aristotle's era to today, are no worse than the evils of any other political system. The evils stem from an attempted divinization of the state, not from democracy as a political arrangement. Whenever the political order is viewed as beyond earthly appeal—the divine right of politics—politics will become progressively tyrannical, no matter which authority structure the state adopts: oligarchic, democratic, bureaucratic, or monarchical (today a defunct ideal).

The priest had to sacrifice a young bullock in order to turn back the negative sanctions of God against those who were under the priest's authority. These sanctions threatened not only the priest; they threatened that segment of the covenanted community under his lawful jurisdiction. The atoning sacrifice had to take place at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. "And he shall bring the bullock unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the LORD; and shall lay his hand upon the bullock's head, and kill the bullock before the LORD" (Lev. 4:4). The very place of sacrifice is designated by God as the congregation's tabernacle, i.e., a dwelling place. This was the place where God met the congregation. "This shall be a continual burnt offering throughout your generations at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the LORD: where I will meet you, to speak there unto thee" (Ex. 29:42). This was the dwelling place of God, but it was also the dwelling place of the congregation. Although the people were not allowed bodily into the presence of God, the furniture

56. The Levites killed 3,000 after the golden calf incident (Ex. 32:28). Aaron was not executed. Numbers 25:8 records the death of 24,000 by plague. In II Samuel 24:15, we read of 70,000 who died in a plague.

of the tabernacle symbolically represented them. The tabernacle was the place where the dual citizenship—heaven and earth—of both man and God was publicly revealed. Covenant-keepers in history are not citizens merely of earth (Phil. 3:20), and God in history is King not merely in heaven. The whole creation is His kingdom, and to prove this, He brings His sanctions in history, both directly and representatively.⁵⁷

Sacrilege is the theft of God's property. Adam's sin involved such theft. This sin is essentially priestly: a sacramental boundary violation. Adam's priestly sin extended downward to his heirs, bringing death. In a similar sense judicially, a priest under the Mosaic Covenant possessed delegated authority, thereby enabling him to place the covenanted community under God's condemnation. An unintentional sin committed by the priest was a greater threat than an unintentional sin committed by the king. Conclusion: the judicial link between the priest and the people was more binding covenantally in Israel than the link between the king and the people.

This is evidence that the church is more fundamental than the

57. The most obvious theological link joining premillennialism with amillennialism is their joint denial of God's visible, earthly, sanctions-bringing kingdom in history prior to the second coming of Christ. In both systems, Jesus Christ must be bodily present in order for Him to impose public sanctions. In short, pessimillennialism insists there are no representative civil sanctions in the New Covenant era. Pessimillennialism argues that prior to Jesus' bodily appearance in judgment, His kingdom is sharply circumscribed to: (1) redeemed hearts, (2) orthodox churches, and (3) families in which at least one of the parents is a Christian. See Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), chaps. 7, 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>). Given this view of God's historic sanctions, the state is understood as lawfully imposing only humanist or pagan sanctions in history. In fact, many of these theologians insist, God intends that the state should impose sanctions based exclusively on humanist ("neutral") civil law; it would be morally wrong for the civil magistrate to enforce Bible-revealed law. Cf. Norman L. Geisler, "A Premillennial View of Law and Government," The Best in Theology, ed. J. I. Packer (Carol Stream, Illinois: Christianity Today/Word, 1986), vol. I. Politics must therefore be pluralist rather than Christian: Mark A. Noll, Nathan O. Hatch, and George M. Marsden, The Search for Christian America (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1983), p. 134; cf. essays by Gary Scott Smith, Paul G. Schrottenboer, Gordon J. Spykman, and James W. Skillen, in Gary Scott Smith (ed.), God and Politics: Four Views on the Reformation of Civil Government (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1989). For a refutation of this view of God's kingdom in history, see Greg L. Bahnsen, "This World and the Kingdom of God," in Gary DeMar and Peter J. Leithart, The Reduction of Christianity: A Biblical Response to Dave Hunt (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988), Appendix D. (<http://bit.ly/gdmpreduction>). For a refutation of this view of politics, see Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnppolpol>) state in the political economy of the Bible. The church is central to society: not the state and not the family.⁵⁸ The family and the state have been more universal in time and place; neither has been central in history. It is the ancient error of natural law theory that has led pagan and Christian social theorists to assume that the geographical universality of family and state implies the social centrality of one or the other. On the contrary, the formal preaching of the gospel and the administration of the sacraments—inclusion and exclusion—are central in history because they are central in eternity. (Note: the word sacrament is derived from the Latin word sacramentum, a military oath of enlistment.⁵⁹ Sacraments are an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant model: oath-sanctions.⁶⁰) This does not imply that the institutional church is at the top of a single institutional hierarchy in society; no such single hierarchy exists. It does imply the institutional church is the most important institution in history, for the Bible calls it called the Bride of Christ. The Christian family and the Christian state are not so designated.

The atoning sacrificial bullock of both priest and congregation had to be slain at the door of the congregation, i.e., next to the altar itself, on the north side. It was not slain on the altar. It had to be dead before it was placed on the altar. The altar was the symbolic door to heaven. This door marked a fundamental boundary in Israel. To contain God's wrath and keep it from flowing from the holy of holies through the tabernacle's door to the people, the priest had to make atonement for his sin at the door of the tabernacle. Conversely, in order for the sin of the people to be contained outside the tabernacle, so that it would not invade the holy of holies, thereby forcing God to depart from the dwelling place,⁶¹ the priest had to make an identical sacrifice for the

58. The church perseveres institutionally in the resurrected world beyond the final judgment (Rev. 21, 22). The family surely does not: "For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. 22:30). The state apparently does not, since its judicial function is to bring negative sanctions against public evil. Public evil will end at the final judgment.

59. "Sacrament," in Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, eds. John M'Clintock and James Strong, 12 volumes (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), IX, p. 212.

60. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

61. Wenham wrote: "Lev. 4 makes explicit that sin defiles the sanctuary: it makes it impossible for God to dwell among his people." Wenham, Leviticus, p. 102. James Jordan calls attention to Ezekiel 8–11 as an example when God departed from the temple because of the people's abominable sacrifices. "The Jews had treated the Temple and the Ark as idols, and so God would destroy them, as He had the golden calf. Ezekiel sees God pack up and move out of the Temple, leaving it empty or 'desol-congregation at the door of the tabernacle. The blood of the bullock was representational in both cases. It defended the integrity of the boundary between God and His people.

I. The Priestly Function

Church officers lawfully control access to the public signs of eternal life: the sacraments.⁶² The three priestly functions are these: (1) the formal, weekly, public proclamation of the message of eternal life; (2) the administration of the institutional monopoly of the sacraments; and (3) the imposition of church discipline, with the authority to deny a person access to the sacraments as its ultimate negative sanction. All three are representative judicial acts. What is formally announced by the church on earth, Jesus said, should be assumed by men to be judicially binding in heaven. “Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven” (Matt.18:18). The institutional church’s power of excommunication is declarative—as declarative as baptism and the Lord’s Supper are.⁶³ That is, formal excommunication represents God in history. This was Calvin’s view of church authority; it ate.’ The abominations have caused the Temple to become desolate. Once God had left, the armies of Nebuchadnezzar swept in and destroyed the empty Temple.” James B. Jordan, “The Abomination of Desolation: An Alternative Hypothesis,” in Gary DeMar, The Debate Over Christian Reconstruction (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988), p. 240. (<http://bit.ly/gdmdebate>)

62. Therefore, any attempt by the civil authorities to interfere with public excommunications is a form of sacrilege. This is not to say that a person who is slandered by a church official should not have legal recourse in a civil court, but in a biblical social order, the church itself could not lawfully be sued; only the officer could be sued, and only as a private individual. This immunity from suits by its own members and ex-members is a manifestation of church sovereignty. To allow the state to prosecute the church would be to place the church under the general sovereignty of the state.

A similar immunity from suits is implicitly granted by the United States Constitution to the Federal government. The Federal government may not be sued except by its own permission. Wrote the Library of Congress’ Congressional Research Office: “Immunity of the United States From Suit.—In pursuance of the general rule that a sovereign cannot be sued in his own courts, it follows that the judicial power does not extend to suits against the United States unless Congress by general or special enactment consents to suits against the Government. This rule first emanated in embryo form in an obiter dictum by Chief Justice Jay in Chislm v. Georgia, where he indicated that a suit would not lie against the United States because ‘there is no power which the courts can call to their aid.’” The Constitution of The United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1972), p. 716.

63. Sutton, That You May Prosper, p. 163.

was not some peculiar invention of Roman Catholicism.⁶⁴

This view of church discipline is denied by those who adopt a nominalist definition of the Lord's Supper: a memorial rather than a judicially binding declaration in God's name that the participants are allowed in God's holy, judicial presence. This memorial view of the Lord's Supper leads to the transfer of primary social sovereignty either to the family or the state. It reduces excommunication to the status of a mere memorial—a sanction without much judicial clout.

The difference between the authority of a cleric and the authority of the head of a non-covenantal organization can be seen in the differing methods of financing. The income of non-covenantal institutions is not mandated by God's law. The income of the church is: the tithe.⁶⁵ This difference in financing is based on the presence of the sacraments in the church. The cleric represents—mediates judicially—God and His people. He administers the sacraments in an organization that possesses the God-given authority to compel its voting members to tithe.⁶⁶ The fact that modern churches are antinomian and pay no attention to the judicial theology that undergirds the tithe does not disprove the theology. It merely starves these churches financially.⁶⁷

The specified financial support of the priest in Israel was the tithe. The people tithed a tenth of their *net increase*⁶⁸ to the Levites; the Levites in turn tithed a tenth of their increase to the Aaronic priests (Num. 18:21–27). The Levites were entitled to the tithe because the

64. Here is Calvin's view of church discipline: ". . . Whoever, after committing a crime, humbly confesses his fault, and entreats the Church to forgive him, is absolved not only by men, but by God himself; and, on the other hand, whoever treats with ridicule the reproofs and threatening of the Church, if he is condemned by her, the decision which men have given will be ratified in heaven." John Calvin, Commentary on a Harmony of the Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, 3 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, [1558] 1979), II, p. 358 (Matthew 18:18). Calvin argued that the fear of God must be added to the fear of church discipline in order to terrify "obstinate and haughty men [who] are strongly inclined to despise the decision of the Church on this pretence, that they refuse to be subject to men—as wicked profligates often make bold appeals to the heavenly tribunal. . . ." Therefore, "Christ, in order to subdue this obstinacy by terror, threatens that the condemnation, which is now despised by them, will be ratified in heaven." Ibid., II, p. 359.

65. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

66. Non-voting members should not be compelled to tithe. To compel them to tithe as a condition of receiving the sacraments would be equivalent to selling the sacraments.

67. North, Covenantal Tithe, ch. 5.

68. God does not normally tax capital (property). He taxes income. Rushdoony, Institutes, pp. 56–57. For a list of the handful of Mosaic exceptions, see Chapter 5:B.

people were not allowed to come near the tabernacle of meeting where the Levites labored (Num. 18:21–22). The existence of this temple boundary separated the Levites from any inheritance in rural land (v. 24).⁶⁹ Presumably, this same principle of sacramental separation governed the Levites' tithe to the priests. The even more rigorous barrier in between the two areas of sacramental service—the tabernacle of meeting vs. the holy of holies—was the basis of the Levites' mandatory tithe to the priests. The Levites could legally not draw near to the holy of holies; they were required to tithe to those who could. The tithe is therefore grounded in a judicial principle: representation before the heavenly throne of God.

The tithe also proclaims an economic principle. The economic principle of the tithe is simple to state and readily understood: eternal life and access to the sacraments are not to be offered for sale to the highest bidder. Neither are church offices.⁷⁰ The monopoly position of the church with respect to the sacraments is manifested by the legitimate monopoly claim of the church to 10% of the net increase that God grants to individual church members. The judicial principle of the tithe is less readily understood: the existence of sacramental boundaries. The first boundary separates church members from non-members: only the former have lawful access to the sacraments. The second boundary separates the officers who administer the sacraments from unordained members. The mandatory tithe identifies the church as possessing a unique covenantal monopoly.⁷¹ This is as true under the New Covenant as it was under the Old Covenant.

God's grant of monopoly sacramental authority to His church places the cleric in a special intermediary position in between God and men. The sacraments are a means of bringing God's judgment into the 69. There were two rare exceptions (Lev. 27:20–21). See Chapter 36.

70. Simon the magician tried to purchase the Apostles' ability to lay hands on people so that they could receive the Holy Spirit. Peter condemned him: "But Peter said unto him, Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money" (Acts 8:20). The term "simony" is applied to someone who buys a church office for money in order to lay legal claim on future income from tithes and offerings. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

71. This implies that no one who refuses to pay a tithe to the local church is entitled to hold ecclesiastical office or exercise ecclesiastical sanctions. There has to be a distinction between communicant voting members and communicant non-voting members (children, imbeciles, and non-tithers.) See Gary North, "Two-Tiered Church Membership," Christianity and Civilization, No. 4 (1985), pp. 120–31. (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>). A modified version of this essay appears as Chapter 3 of Tithing and the Church.

midst of the assembly. The saints are sanctified—set apart judicially—and therefore they are subject to the ecclesiastical sanctions. The Old Covenant priest administered these sanction-producing sacraments. In ancient Israel, the whole nation was sanctified as a collective political and geographical unit; therefore, the sins of the priests threatened to bring the whole nation under God's negative sanctions. It was the Old Covenant church's sacramental function that entitled it to the tithe, beginning with Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18, 20). It was not, contrary to Rushdoony, the Levites' cultural services that were the basis of their support by the tithe. It was their sacramental office.⁷²

In the humanists' world of cosmic impersonalism, there is no priestly function except by, and in relation to, autonomous man. The priest is regarded as an intermediary between: (1) autonomous individual man and autonomous collective man; or (2) autonomous collective man and the autonomous cosmos. The priest may officially minister to mankind in the name of a god, however man or the cosmos is defined, but only in the name of the authority of the evolving species, mankind. Collective Man is the one true God.⁷³

J. The Quasi-Priestly Function

The biblical state, as a provider of life-sustaining services—defense and protection against domestic violence and fraud—is also to be supported (and restrained) by the tithe principle: a publicly announced percentage (less than 10%)⁷⁴ of one's net income after tithes and offer-

72. Appendix B.

73. This is not true of libertarian anarchism, where only individuals are gods: a theology of pure polytheism.

74. For the state to take as much as 10%, Samuel warned, is a mark of tyranny (1 Sam. 8:15, 17). The principle of the "graduated tithe" or "progressive" income tax is morally monstrous. It compels individuals with higher incomes to pay a greater proportion of their incomes than poorer people pay in order to receive state protection. If the Mafia required this, it would be designated as a "protection racket," yet most economists and moralists, not to mention the voters, applaud the graduated income tax. The graduated income tax is inherently socialistic, for it encourages the majority of men to accept an ever-increasing state authority over the economy by voting for programs that richer people, always a political minority, will supposedly pay for. Yet even the great free market economist Ludwig von Mises refused to call the progressive income tax socialistic. See Mises, Nation, State, and Economy: Contributions to the Politics and History of Our Time (New York: New York University Press, [1919] 1983), pp. 201–2. (<http://bit.ly/MisesNSE>). Marx and Engels knew that it was socialistic; it was the second step in their ten-point program to establish Communist rule, right after "Abolition of all property in land and application of all rents of land to public purposes." Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party (1848), ings is to be taken by the entire state apparatus, bottom to top, in order to support its operations. The state must be limited in its claims because it, too, possesses a God-granted monopoly: the monopoly of violence. Such sovereign power is always placed by God within judicial and other boundaries. The state is not merely one additional institution among many, with its departments competing against other organizations on a free market governed by what economists call consumer sovereignty.⁷⁵ The free market offers open bidding for scarce resources. Most people perceive clearly that the courtroom decisions of a civil judge must not be governed by the free market's principle of "high bid wins."⁷⁶ They recognize that this principle of pricing in a courtroom is a form of bribery.

Those who control access to the means of temporal life take on a quasi-priestly role. Society acknowledges this by placing judicial restraints on those who are in a monopoly position to sell the implements of life to the highest bidder, e.g., physicians. People somehow sense that biological life, like eternal life, should not be sold to the highest bidder by monopolists.⁷⁷ They perceive that the free market principle of "high bid wins" is sometimes a morally inappropriate pricing method.⁷⁸

For example, consider the case of a physician who stops to examine a critically injured victim of an accident. The victim is still conscious. The physician persuades the victim to pay him the monetary value of the victim's whole estate in exchange for emergency treatin Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Collected Works (New York: International Publishers, 1976), VI, p. 505.

75. Biblically speaking, we should speak of customer authority rather than consumer sovereignty, since the free market is not an oath-bound covenantal agency, and does not possess sovereignty in the biblical sense.

76. A rare intellectual defense of a competitive, non-legislative, exclusively free market legal system, written by a legal theorist, is Bruno Leoni, Freedom and the Law (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1961). Three decades later came Bruce L. Benson's The Enterprise of Law: Justice Without the State (San Francisco: Pacific Research Institute for Public Policy, 1990). The problem is this: identifying which court has jurisdiction in a specific territory. Who possesses the superior jurisdiction?

77. Actually, physicians are more like oligopolists: semi-competing groups of monopoly rent-seekers.

78. It is the quasi-priestly function, and not merely the monopoly grant of power by state and local governments, that leads to the phenomenon of price discrimination, i.e., different prices being charged for the same service to different buyers. On the role of government coercion against unlicensed health providers as a factor in medical pricing, see Reuben A. Kessel, "Price Discrimination in Medicine," Journal of Law and Economics, I (1958), pp. 20–53. (<http://bit.ly/KesselMed>)

ment. He even writes up a contract to this effect. The victim signs it. This conceptually voluntary transaction will not be upheld, either by a civil court or a jury of the physician's peers, nor should it. The physician could even be stripped of his legal right to practice medicine. The fact that this exchange of medical treatment for money was technically and legally a voluntary transaction between consenting adults is not given credence in the civil courts, nor should it be. The role of the physician as a healer has always militated against a purely free market, "high bid wins" approach to the provision of life-saving service, at least in emergency circumstances where only one supplier of healing services is immediately available to the patient. The grant of semi-monopoly status by the state to state-licensed physicians in the twentieth century was given on condition that the economic beneficiaries would not use this authority to strip patients of all of their wealth (just a lot of it on certain occasions).

That the buyers of medical services are called patients rather than consumers is indicative of the distinction between medicine and other occupations. A patient is someone who waits patiently, a characteristic feature of buyers of medical services. It is understood by all participants that buyers of medical services will be forced to wait—to "line up"—which is a universal feature of pricing systems that are not based on the free market's "high bid wins" principle. But socialism makes lines much longer by mandating fees that are too low to encourage a large supply of services.⁷⁹ This is why the imposition of medical price restraints retroactively by juries should be limited to life-threatening situations in which the victim had no opportunity to shop for a lower price. This ought to be a power rarely invoked; otherwise, the supply of conventional medical services will become artificially restricted by law.

The office of quasi-priest became a growth industry in the twentieth century. There are today numerous candidates for the office of social redeemer, each with its own priesthood. The state is frequently regarded as the only legitimate candidate for savior of society, and therefore it is honored as an agency possessing a priestly function. Politicians and bureaucrats are its priests, and public school teachers are the Levites.

Psychology is often regarded as possessing redemptive (healing) power. The needs of the unconscious, either individual (Freud) or collective (Jung), have called forth a quasi-priestly response. Psychiatrists (M.D.'s) are the priests; psychologists (Ph.D.'s) are the Levites.

79. Gary North, "Step to the Rear, Please," The Freeman (March 1975).

Trade unions for several decades were regarded by the public as agencies of social salvation. They are supported by a compulsory dues system that is in part governed by the tithe principle. Union leaders were long seen the priests; local organizers were the Levites.⁸⁰

Sports have been regarded by the public as a means of social redemption: in ancient Greece, in the Mayan culture, in England beginning in the early nineteenth century, and in the United States beginning in the late nineteenth century. Fans of soccer (football) in Europe become religious in intense loyalty. So do sports fans in other nations. Behavior that in ancient Rome was called Saturnalian—lawless, irrational, sometimes violent—is tolerated before, during, and after major games.⁸¹ Athletes are the priests; today, television announcers are the Levites. Amateur sports are not supposed to be promoted in terms of free market pricing.⁸² Professional athletics, however, are price-competitive, which means that they are not economically priestly. But because they compete with churches for attendance on Sunday, they do take on a priestly aspect.⁸³ It is revealing that professional basketball

80. Philip D. Bradley (ed.), The Public Stake in Union Power (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1959); Sylvester Petro, Power Unlimited: The Corruption of Union Leadership (New York: Ronald Press, 1959). (<http://bit.ly/PetroPower>)

81. After the Chicago Bulls basketball team, led by international sports idol Michael Jordan, won the National Basketball Association championship in 1992, fans began a two-day riot in Chicago. The rioting was worse a year later when the Bulls won again. In England, gangs exist only to follow their local soccer teams from city to city, drinking and rioting during and after the games. These gangs are not youthful; members' ages range into their thirties. See Bill Buford, Among the Thugs (New York: Norton, 1992).

82. The National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) and its rival associations penalize colleges that pay too much money in order to recruit superior athletes, i.e., money or bonuses above scholarship aid and minimal funds for room and board expenses. As economist Benjamin Rogge [ROEguee] once pointed out, this is a form of monopoly behavior designed to reduce price competition from the most successful teams. Professional sports leagues in the United States have been granted similar price restraints, such as rules against a player's selling his services to a new team ("jumping") without the first team's permission, for which the original team's owners must be compensated by the second team's owners. The first team's owners are therefore given property rights to future increases in the value of their players' assets, i.e., the players' marketable skills. Some modifications have been made in the older rules, but these are marginal, applying only to players whose contracts have expired.

83. Televised sports programs in the United States are frequently viewed at home by groups of men who get together to eat pizza and drink beer. This social fellowship is modern man's Sunday substitute for church and the Lord's Supper. Pastor Joseph Welch pointed this out to me.

and football leagues in the United States try not to compete directly with the scheduling of those particular college sports from which they recruit their players.⁸⁴ This is especially true of American football, where collegiate games take place on Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons. Professional football games are usually held on Sunday. Professional football leagues care a great deal about infringing on amateur collegiate football games; they care nothing about infringing on public church worship. Neither do their fans.

There is generally only one international high priest in modern sports: the world heavyweight boxing champion, and only if he becomes a celebrity.⁸⁵ He engages in an activity that is designed to inflict physical injury. A boxer is allowed by law to kill his opponent in the ring with his fists. The heavyweight champion is the boxer who is most physically capable of killing someone in the ring. Professional boxers in some states in the United States are required to register their fists as lethal weapons. Outside the ring, they are not allowed to inflict physical damage on others, i.e., outside a sanctified boundary.⁸⁶

There are other would-be claimants to quasi-priestly authority, but they are price competitive, and therefore they cannot be regarded as priestly.

In the opinion of modern man, a priest possesses far less authority than a political ruler does. The priest does not exercise comparable visible power, and modern humanism is overwhelmingly a power religion. The state is visibly the most powerful single institution in modern society. Because of this concentration of visible power, the indispensable sacraments for modern man are political, the most basic of which is the exercise of the franchise: to provide legitimacy to the state. The church, in contrast, has little visible power. The suggestion that an ecclesiastical priest could somehow commit a private sin that might in some way bring those under his authority into danger, assuming this sin remains exclusively private, would be regarded as preposterous. It would not be a topic fit for serious public discussion.

84. This is not true of American baseball, which operates its own profit-seeking "farm" clubs to train its players. High school and college baseball is a minor sport, attended by few and rarely televised.

85. The most famous athlete on earth for over a decade (1963–80) was Muhammad Ali, in large part because he converted to a peculiar American variant of Islam, but also because on religious grounds he refused to register for the draft during the Vietnam War.

86. That this activity takes place in a circumscribed area—a ring—is indicative of its supposedly sacred character. Outside the sacred ring, the same activity would be illegal. A boundary rope transforms the common into the sacred. Biblically speaking, the ring possesses no sacred status; boxing to the death is a biblically illegal act. Boxing is the last remaining legal equivalent of the duel, and therefore a decidedly anti-Christian activity. On dueling, see North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 35:D.

K. The Authority of the People

The people as a collective unit exercised greater judicial authority in Mosaic Israel than the priesthood, who merely represented the people before God. It was the people who were derivatively sovereign under God, in both church and state, not their representatives. This should be obvious: the judicial function of representatives is, after all, to represent. The representative's judicial authority is based solely on his occupying a mid-way position between God and the covenanted assembly that he represents. God therefore held the people of Israel corporately responsible for the official actions of the priests.

This leads to an important covenantal conclusion: it is the moral character of the people that determines the public character and historical fate of society. The collective nation is represented in church and state by ordained individuals whose acts necessarily have covenantal consequences in history because of God's sanctions; nevertheless, it is the people who will receive the brunt of God's judgment, for it is they who possess greater authority under God.

If my thesis on the primary connection between priest and people is correct, then the fundamental political thrust of Old Testament covenant theology was toward theocratic republicanism: the political authority of formally covenanted citizens. In both church and state, the locus of institutional authority in Old Covenant Israel flowed upward: from the people to their legal representatives. The moral integrity of the ecclesiastical hierarchy was of greater importance for the survival of a biblically covenanted society than the political hierarchy's integrity was.

In church and state, those people who possess initiatory earthly authority—church members and citizens—are those who are under the formal jurisdiction of superiors who possess derivative authority: officers. The officers' authority is derived from above—God—but also from below, i.e., those who are under their oath-bound authority. Those people who are under the visible sanctions of these two covenantal institutions are those who are required by God to exercise institutional sanctions: positive and negative. Formal acts of covenant renewal periodically manifest this God-derived sanctioning authority of the people.⁸⁷ This is why there are no acts of covenant renewal for the family: there are no formal sanctioning powers held by those who are under the authority of the head of the household.⁸⁸ Authority is delegated downward by God to the head of the household, not upward from his wife or children.

It is important to note at this point that this system of republican representation was not (and is not) true of the family. The father was (and still is) the source of initiatory authority in the family. The reason for the difference between family authority and authority in both church and state is that the household unit of parents and children is temporary: adult sons leave the household of the parents in order to set up their own households (Gen. 2:24). Prior to their departure, the children are not held by God to be legally responsible agents. Thus, the representative character of covenantal authority must flow from the father, as the head of the household, to minor children, who are not legally independent agents. Sons in Israel became legally independent at age 20, when they became subject to the draft, i.e., military numbering (Ex. 30:13–14).⁸⁹ Wives and those unmarried daughters who remained in their fathers' households did not obtain legal independence, as testified by the fact that their vows had to be sanctioned within 24 hours by the male head of the household in order to become legally binding before God; only widows could take a vow independently as heads of their household (Num. 30:9).⁹⁰

87. The negative sanction may be imposed by leaving the jurisdiction of the particular institutional authority. This is called "voting with your feet."

88. Minor children are not legally allowed to flee the jurisdiction of the head of the household. Civil governments are required to return runaway children to their parents unless the civil authorities can prove in civil court that the parents have broken the family covenant by child abuse, either moral or physical. On the other hand, adult children cannot legally be compelled to return to their parents' household. This is why the parent-authorized, forcible "de-programming" of adult cult members is biblically illegal; it is a form of kidnapping.

89. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 58.

90. I disagree strongly with John Frame's assertion that "state authority is essentially family authority, developed and extended somewhat by the demands of number and geography." Frame, "Theology of the State," op. cit., p. 216. He made this family-state connection the basis of his call for Christian civil government, even going so far as to call this institution a "family-state" (p. 218). Such a position is incipient political patriarchalism, a denial that state and family are established by separate covenants.

The democratic state is marked by acts of covenant renewal, e.g., voting; what can be called political anointing. The family has no formal acts of covenant renewal. Those under the authority of the head of the household do not vote on the continuing authority of this God-designated agent. There is no institutional means for subordinates

L. The Authority of the Priest

The priest who committed an unintentional sin brought the covenanted nation of Israel under the threat of God's negative sanctions. He had to sacrifice a bullock to atone judicially for this sin. Similarly, if the people as a covenanted nation committed an unintentional sin, the priest had to sacrifice a bullock to atone for their sin. Because the people could not know of a priest's sin, he had to guard himself carefully. Their ignorance was no automatic safeguard to them, any more than the ignorance of the 36 victims of the first battle of Ai regarding Achan's sin safeguarded them (Josh. 7:5).

The atoning sacrifice was killed at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. This ritual barrier was a two-way barrier: keeping the polluting effects of the priest's sins contained inside the tabernacle until he could offer a sacrifice, and containing the pollution of the people's sin outside the tabernacle, so that God would not depart from the holy of holies. The doorway was the place of judgment, just as it had been on the night of the first Passover. It was the barrier against God's sanctions, just as it had been on the night of the first Passover.⁹¹ This threat of God's departure accentuated the importance of boundaries. These boundaries could not be violated with impunity.

The Mosaic Covenant's sacrificial system announced that the integrity of the priests and the people regarding unintentional sins was of greater consequence in relation to God's negative covenant sanctions than was the integrity of the civil authorities. It is incumbent upon theologians, whether liberal or fundamentalist, who assert that there is no comparable relationship in the New Covenant era, to prove their case from Scripture.

M. The Social Atomism of Christian Individualism

Wenham's comment on the purification offerings is typical of the modern Christian mindset: an implicit denial of God's sanctions against the community as a result of an individual's sins. Wenham individualized the New Testament meaning of the purification offerings. "For the NT writers it is the blood of Christ which cleanses from in the family to bring lawful sanctions against the head of the household without an appeal to officers in either church or state, except in cases where their lives are immediately threatened.

91. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, Appendix F.

the defilement of sin. . . . Thus the cleansing from sin that was secured under the old covenant through the purification offering is effected under the new covenant by the death of Christ. Whereas in the Levitical laws it was the place of worship that was purified, under the new dispensation it is the worshipper himself."⁹² Wenham makes his position inescapably clear: the threat of God's negative sanctions today is aimed solely at the individual Christian.

Lev. 4 makes explicit that sin defiles the sanctuary: it makes it impossible for God to dwell among his people. Though Israel was still the chosen people, when it sinned it no longer enjoyed the benefits of God's presence (cf. Exod. 32; Lev. 10; Num. 14, etc.). In a similar way the Christian is warned not to "grieve the Spirit" (Eph. 4:30) by sin. God's presence is now mediated by the Holy Spirit indwelling the believer (Eph. 2:22); that is why Christ's death has to purify our "conscience" or "heart." There is the continued threat in the NT that sin can drive the Spirit from the believer just as under the law God could be driven from the tabernacle. The Christian is told to walk in the Spirit and be filled with the Spirit (Gal. 5:25; Eph. 5: 18).⁹³

There is no suggestion in his comments on this passage regarding the threat of corporate sanctions. He clearly did not believe that there is any such threat, despite Revelation 2 and 3. This is a shared assumption of modern Christianity and modern humanism.

The problem with this internalizing of the New Covenant's ethical concern is that it assumes that the national covenantalism of the Old Testament is no longer judicially binding or relevant. The national sanctions supposedly no longer apply. God does not threaten to depart from a nation, since He supposedly never establishes any unique judicial presence in a nation.⁹⁴ God apparently establishes covenants only with individuals.⁹⁵ This individualistic view of God's covenants is basic to the pietist-humanist alliance. This alliance asserts that there is no role for biblical law in the political order. There is supposedly no relationship between adherence to biblical law and national blessings.⁹⁶

Wenham rested his case for the New Testament's internalization

92. Wenham, Leviticus, p. 101.

93. Ibid., pp. 102–3.

94. See fundamentalist theologian Albert J. Dager, Vengeance Is Ours: The Church In Dominion (Redmond, Washington: Sword, 1990), pp. 205–34.

95. What about families? What about churches? Wenham does not raise either question.

96. For a detailed study of the intellectual foundations of this alliance, see North, Millennialism and Social Theory.

of ethical concern with a two-step argument: (1) in the Mosaic era, the polluting effects of sin were geographical rather than personal; (2) in the New Covenant era, the situation is reversed. He was incorrect on both points. First, in Old Covenant Israel, both the individual and the place of worship were polluted by sin, which is why God threatened to leave the sanctuary. This threat was made not merely because of the pollution effects of sin geographically; it was the pollution of individuals within the geographical boundaries of His national covenant (Deut. 8:19–20).⁹⁷ Both the individual and the place of worship were cleansed by the offering.

Second, on what New Testament basis can we say that this two-fold effect of sin and purification is not equally true today? Surely within the church the same effects of moral pollution continue, which is why God threatens negative sanctions. “And unto the angel of the church of the Laodiceans write; These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God; I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth” (Rev. 3:14–16). This is the New Testament era’s equivalent of the land’s spewing-out process in the Mosaic Covenant: “Ye shall therefore keep all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: that the land, whither I bring you to dwell therein, spue you not out” (Lev. 20:22). The land was said figuratively to serve as God’s sanctioning agent.⁹⁸ “That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you” (Lev. 18:28). This warning regarding the previous inhabitants of the land was a variation of Deuteronomy 8:19–20: “And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God.”⁹⁹ There was a close relationship between individual sins and corporate judgment: if the community did not collectively offer ritual atonement, God promised to act against the family, city, tribe, or nation as a whole.

It could be argued that this relationship between minister and

97. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

98. Chapter 10.

99. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 23.

people holds only for the institutional church, but this line of argumentation refuses to deal with the question of national covenants under God, which are to be the result of the Great Commission: "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen" (Matt. 28:19–20). Nations are to be baptized. They are to be brought formally and publicly under God's covenant sanctions.¹⁰⁰ The Great Commission is opposed to Christian individualism. It is also in direct opposition to the modern humanist concept of political pluralism.¹⁰¹

N. The Moral Atomism of the Enlightenment

We now come to the application of all this to the field of political economy. The following material is too important to consign to an appendix, yet it is complex. For those unfamiliar with Western political theory, it will be difficult. It will seem out of place in a chapter on the purification sacrifices. Nevertheless, what I have argued so far has been preparatory for this delayed exercise in applied theology. The biblical concept of corporate responsibility, imbedded in the purification sacrifices, has extensive implications for political theory, which in turn affect economic theory. Later in this commentary I will begin to draw out the positive implications of Leviticus for biblical political economy.

100 . Hal Lindsey, the "pop dispensationalist" author, clearly saw the threat to dispensational theology of this clear teaching of Scripture; therefore, he argued that the Greek word for nations means only individuals, not nations. "You don't disciple nations, you disciple individuals, so the Greek word translated nations should be understood in its most frequently used sense—gentiles." Lindsey, The Road to Holocaust (New York: Bantam, 1989), p. 49. He assumes—but does not attempt to prove and cannot possibly prove—that the use of the word "gentiles" throughout the Bible (including the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Old Testament) means individual gentiles rather than covenantal nations of gentiles. I challenge any professionally trained theologian to defend such a view of the Greek word ethnos. The entry in Kittel's Theological Dictionary states that "In most cases ethnos is used of men in the sense of a 'people.' Synon. are: phulei (people as a national unity of common descent), laos (people as a political unity with a common history and constitution) and glossa (people as a linguistic unity)." Entry for "Ethnos in the NT," Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. Gerhard Kittel, 10 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1964), II, p. 369. The same is true of the Septuagint's use of ethnos: ibid., II, pp. 364–69. While Lindsey is an easy target, intellectually speaking, virtually all of modern fundamentalism and pietism implicitly assumes the truth of what Lindsey has written about the meaning of ethnos.

101. North, Political Polytheism.

1. Bible vs. Enlightenment

Before we get to these passages, however, we must recognize a crucial fact: the Bible is at war with the Enlightenment. For developing a systematically biblical political theory and biblical economics, a full understanding of this statement is crucial. The problem is, Protestantism, especially Anglo-American Protestantism, has been heavily influenced by the Enlightenment. What I call the right wing of the Enlightenment, also known as the Whig tradition, has been unhesitatingly absorbed into Protestant political theory, beginning in the late seventeenth century. Thus, very few Protestant evangelicals are aware of the degree that they have been compromised by the presuppositions of the Enlightenment. They have repeatedly used the formative ideas of the Enlightenment's right wing to challenge the Enlightenment's left wing. This dependence on the categories of the right wing has undermined their commitment to biblical judicial categories. This has weakened the case for Christianity. For example, Christians rarely understand that Darwinism is a product of the Enlightenment's right wing, not the left wing. The doctrine of evolution through natural selection is an extension into biology of the Scottish Enlightenment's concept of social evolution: society as the product of individual human action but not of human design.¹⁰² They do not understand the terms of surrender to the Enlightenment, terms which they have virtually all implicitly signed in their legal capacity as voters: the substitution of Enlightenment contractualism—agreement among equals—for biblical covenantalism, which is an agreement among men under God's authority, law, and sanctions.¹⁰³ It was this shift from covenantalism to contractualism that transformed New England Puritanism into Unitarianism, beginning in the late eighteenth century.¹⁰⁴

Western social philosophy for over three centuries has been a systematic attempt to replace a covenantal interpretation of all three institutional governments: church, state, and family. Yet this biblical model is inescapable; it is built into the creation (Gen. 1:26–28).¹⁰⁵ Furthermore, because Western civilization was self-consciously Christian

102. F. A. Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), ch. 6. Cf. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Appendix B: "The Evolutionists' Defense of the Market."

103. North, Political Polytheism, Part 3.

104. Leonard J. Trinterud, "The Origins of Puritanism," Church History, XX (1951), pp. 41–42, 49–55.

105. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, chaps. 3, 4.

until the late eighteenth century, its political theory has always been colored by the categories of Christian theology. Thus, in order to maintain intellectual continuity between the past and contemporary culture, the opponents of covenant theology have had to substitute a series of theoretical alternatives to the categories of the biblical covenant—sovereignty, hierarchy, law, sanctions, and continuity—but with autonomous man as the new source of political order.

In the second half of the seventeenth century, secularism outside of political philosophy made its initial appearance: in science,¹⁰⁶ ethics,¹⁰⁷ and economics.¹⁰⁸ (Machiavelli a century earlier had already performed this service for political philosophy.) The heart of this new worldview was its rejection of teleology. Teleology views whatever exists as the result of design. It sees the world as being pulled toward something. Modern humanist man asserts that the ultimate “something” toward which the world must not be moving is the day of final judgment. This anti-teleological outlook is comprehensive in its denial of final causation: not a trace of such causation can be admitted to exist anywhere in the universe prior to the advent of man.

2. Science Without Teleology

The new science of the West after Galileo systematically rejected both the medieval and classical Greek doctrines of final causation.¹⁰⁹ Scientific causation denied temporal “pull” and affirmed temporal “push” as the exclusive form of physical causation. Physicist Fred Wolf summarizes the Newtonian outlook: “For every effect, there had to be a known cause. For every cause, there had to be accountable effects. The future, therefore, became a consequence of the past. It seemed there was little anyone could do to alter the world. Even our thoughts were to be explained somehow by Newton’s machine.”¹¹⁰ All of modern science has been premised on this anti-teleological faith, but this did not become self-conscious in the biological sciences until Darwin’s

106. The Royal Society, created by charter by King Charles II in 1661, was the archetype.

107. Louis I. Bredvold, The Brave New World of the Enlightenment (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1961), ch. 2: “The New Promise of Science.”

108. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1963).

109. E. A. Burtt, The Metaphysical Foundations of Modern Physical Science (Garden City, New York: Anchor, [1931] 1954), pp. 98–104.

110. Fred Alan Wolf, Taking the Quantum Leap (New York: Harper & Row, [1981] 1989), p. 42.

Origin of Species (1859).¹¹¹

Science today “modestly” and agnostically affirms its procedures as being so narrowly circumscribed that the scientific disciplines are incapable of leading men to any legitimate conclusion regarding the inherently unscientific thesis that history is moving toward God’s final judgment. This is another way of saying that God’s final sanctions are scientifically irrelevant—unverifiable, transcendent, and transhistorical—because they are beyond measurement by scientific techniques of investigation. The scientific discussion of cosmic origins and eschatology (i.e., the Big Bang and the heat death of the universe) is conducted in terms of discussions of processes and rates of change that either exist today or else can be inferred by means of evidence interpreted in terms of today’s rates of change (i.e., uniformitarianism). This is how modern science attempts to transform the transhistorical and personal into the historical and impersonal. Modern scientists conclude that there can be no final causes in nature, only prior causes. This viewpoint regarding final causation has in fact defined modern science for over three centuries. Quantum physics has gone a step further, however: to begin to deny causation altogether.¹¹² God is not mocked!

This modern scientific model has greatly influenced Western historical thinking. Cause and effect in history are said to be exclusively historical: events in the past have alone made the present possible. Some event must happen in the present in order to make possible something specific in the future. Nothing happens in the future that makes the present possible, nor does any force in nature propel nature toward a predestined future. There can be no predestined future until such time as man is capable of predestinating it. Man subdues nature (including himself)¹¹³ in a supposedly contingent, chance-dominated universe that is somehow governed by scientifically absolute laws.¹¹⁴

3. Ethical Effects

This “push, not pull” view of causation has had a revolutionary

111. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

112. Norwood Russell Hanson, Observation and Explanation: A Guide to the Philosophy of Science (New York: Harper & Row, 1971), pp. 34–35.

113. That is, some men subdue others.

114. The dialecticism between chance and law is the essence of all nonbiblical thought. See Herman Dooyeweerd, In the Twilight of Western Thought (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1960), pp. 36–52.

effect on ethics. Because the new science rejected the scientific legitimacy of final causation in nature, it also repudiated as scientifically useless any concept of a God who intervenes historically in the cosmos in terms of positive and negative sanctions based on ethical standards. Ethics is understood to be grounded on the doctrine of the autonomy (self-law) of man; therefore, science officially has nothing to say about ethics. Thus, the more authority that the scientific worldview has gained in men's thinking, the less that ethics has been said to be relevant to the affairs of man. The denial of final causation was the cause; ethical relativism was the effect. Wrote A. D. Lindsay in 1943: "The new sciences which came into being in the seventeenth century and have gone on growing in prestige ever since began with a repudiation of final causes. That repudiation is the denial of the authority of ethics in science. The new sciences were as energetic as the new politics in denying the supremacy of morality."¹¹⁵

The rejection of final causation and all ethical authority based on final causation was only part of the new science's paradigm. Lindsay continued: "The scientific revival of the seventeenth century not only repudiated final purposes. It revived atomism."¹¹⁶ This scientific atomism, with physics as the model, then reshaped political theory. "When men are regarded as objects of scientific inquiry so conceived, they are regarded as atomistic individuals, not as personalities. Society is regarded as analysable into a collection of independent, isolable, alike atoms."¹¹⁷ This is the humanistic philosophy of cosmic impersonalism. It leads to the adoption of the perverse definition of the individual that Arthur Koestler attributed to Communism in his novel on Stalin's purge trials of the late 1930s, Darkness at Noon: one million men, divided by one million.¹¹⁸

If carried to its logical conclusion, which few scientists have been willing to do in public, this seemingly neutral assertion regarding the nature of cause and effect denies the possibility of either personal responsibility or human freedom, except insofar as philosophy adopts dialecticism or irrationalism in place of strict materialistic causation when dealing with man and nature.¹¹⁹ The ethical implications of a de-

115. A. D. Lindsay, The Modern Democratic State (New York: Oxford University Press, [1943] 1959), p. 78.

116. Ibid., p. 79.

117. Idem.

118. Arthur Koestler, Darkness at Noon (New York: Macmillan, 1941), p. 257.

119. Lindsey, pp. 42–46; cf. Sidney Hook (ed.), Determinism and Freedom in the Age of Modern Science (Washington Square, New York: New York University Press, terministic cosmology have not been universally perceived, but over the last three centuries there has been a steady erosion of confidence in the decision-making ability of individuals and a steady increase in the denial of personal responsibility.

O. The Enlightenment's Two Wings

The Western tradition of political and moral philosophy since the late seventeenth century has been divided between two rival wings: left-wing Enlightenment thought and right-wing Enlightenment thought. The second tradition is more self-consciously individualistic and contractual. The defenders of both Enlightenment traditions base their speculations on a hypothetical contract among men that created the political community in the past. The right-wing Enlightenment saw this compact as requiring voluntary acts of renewal from time to time, or at least implicit formal acceptance, in order to provide legitimacy to the civil order. Standard histories of modern political philosophy usually begin with either Thomas Hobbes' Leviathan (1651) or John Locke's Second Treatise of Government (1690). The origin of this worldview is at least two centuries earlier: the humanism of the Renaissance. Nisbet's summary of Renaissance individualism goes right to the heart of the matter: the rejection of Christianity.

What the humanists did wish to serve, as their lives and writings make plain enough, were the power and wealth of the princes around them and a conception of religion that is highly subjective and individualistic. The individualism that is to be seen in the flamboyance, cultivated eccentricity, bravado, and diverse color of the Italian Renaissance can be seen in different but related form in the preoccupation with self and the innumerable states of consciousness of self. Rarely in history has there been an age comparable to the Renaissance—not only in Italy but in France and other parts of the West—in its dedication to the individual and the most individualistic types of thought and conduct. . . .

We must not overlook what is central here: the erosion of the sense of religious community. It does not matter that the Renaissance may be associated in our minds with some of the most vital and creative qualities of mankind, not to mention literary and artistic works of boundless importance. We are concerned with the fate of the Christian community during this early-modern period. And we can hardly escape the conclusion that everything serving the interests of the secular and the subjective, no matter how brilliant and lasting in the history of Western culture, was bound to militate against that communal and corporate conception of Christianity born of Augustine which became the very cornerstone of medieval civilization.¹²⁰

1958). In the twentieth century, more social scientists were willing to argue in this fashion. Behavioral psychologists were the most vocal examples. See the works of John B. Watson and B. F. Skinner, especially Skinner's Beyond Freedom and Dignity (New York: Knopf, 1971). For a libertarian, "free will" critique, see Tibor R. Machan, The Pseudo-Science of B. F. Skinner (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1974). See also R. J. Rushdoony, The Messianic Character of American Education: Studies in the History of the Philosophy of Education (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1963), ch. 16: "J. B. Watson: Science and Utopia."

Both Hobbes and Locke began their speculations with the assumption of the autonomy of the individual. Each author created a self-consciously hypothetical history¹²¹ in which autonomous men in a hypothetical state of nature met together and voluntarily transferred a portion of their authority to the king, as representative of the body politic. In this Enlightenment political tradition, authority moves upward, from the citizen to the representative. An individual in the pre-political state of nature was supposedly originally sovereign: possessing the autonomous power to establish the civil covenant. He voluntarily delegated political authority to those above him. Statecraft in this view is ultimately grounded in the sovereign will of individuals, who in turn maintain the political order through obedience to their representatives. These representatives do not in theory need to be elected, although ever since Locke, democratic theory has predominated in the West. The people are regarded as sovereign—possessing power to originate the civil covenant—and not just bearers of primary authority within the civil covenant.

Left-wing Enlightenment thought, which is self-consciously collectivist, is conventionally dated with the publication of Rousseau's Social Contract in 1762. Contrary to textbook accounts of the French Revolution, Rousseau and his now-famous book had very little influence in France or anywhere else during his lifetime and for at least two decades thereafter¹²². Rousseau, like Hobbes and Locke, began with a hy-

120. Robert A. Nisbet, The Social Philosophers: Community and Conflict in Western Thought (New York: Crowell, 1973), pp. 194–95.

121. On hypothetical history, see Robert A. Nisbet, Social Change and History: Aspects of the Western Theory of Development (New York: Oxford University Press, 1969), ch. 4.

122. Only one reprint appeared after 1762: in 1791. Joan Macdonald examined 1,114 pamphlets published in 1789–91; she found only a dozen references to it. She concluded: "It is necessary to distinguish between the cult of Rousseau and the influpothetical history that grounded politics in the acts of autonomous men. In his Essay on Inequality (1755), he stated clearly that all previous political philosophers had felt it necessary to offer a theory of the state of nature, yet not one of them, he insisted, had discovered it. Rousseau recognized the cause of their difficulty: the Genesis account of the origin of society. “[I]t is clear from the Holy Scriptures that the first man, having received his understanding and commandments immediately from God, was not himself in such a state; and that, if we give such credit to the writings of Moses as every Christian philosopher ought to give, we must deny that, even before the deluge, men were ever in the pure state of nature; . . .”¹²³ He then chose to ignore Moses by adding the classic foundational statement of the hermeneutics of hypothetical history: “Let us begin by laying facts aside, as they do not affect the question.”¹²⁴ Western political man has been laying the Mosaic facts aside ever since.

Rousseau, in distinction from Locke, equated the general will of the post-“state of nature” society with the decisions of enlightened national rulers of a post-revolutionary era, not necessarily with a temporary political majority. Modern totalitarianism is an outworking of Rousseau’s theory of the general will: the collective, unified will of all men in society as it would be able to manifest itself if there were no intermediary institutions and loyalties between the citizen and the central political order.¹²⁵ If men were allowed institutionally to be the social atoms that they are in principle, Rousseau taught, their general will would manifest itself exactly as it does in the will of the rulers. Nisbet was correct: Rousseau “saw goodness in popular will only to the extent that it had become liberated from all possible influences of traditional society. For Rousseau, the general will could exist, and could be invariably right in its judgments, only when its wielders, the people, had become purged of all social and cultural influences stemming from family, local community, guild, church, or other social elements. It was in-ence of his political thought.” Macdonald, Rousseau and the French Revolution (1965), cited in Paul Johnson, Intellectuals (New York: Harper & Row, 1988), p. 7.

123. Jean Jacques Rousseau, “A Dissertation on the Origin and Foundation of the Inequality of Mankind” (1755), in The Social Contract and Discourses, ed. G. D. H. Cole, Everyman’s Library (New York: Dutton, [1913] 1966), p. 161.

124. Idem.

125. Robert A. Nisbet, Tradition and Revolt: Historical and Sociological Essays (New York: Random House, 1968), ch. 1: “Rousseau and Political Community.” Cf. Nisbet, The Making of Modern Society (Brighton, Sussex: Wheatsheaf, 1986), chaps. 5, 6.

deed this aspect of the matter that rendered Rousseau's doctrine of the general will the single most revolutionary doctrine in the history of political thought. Popular sovereignty was, as we observed, for Rousseau a means of permanent revolution in the social order."¹²⁶ Few ideas have been more productive of evil in the modern world.¹²⁷

P. Enlightenment Thought and Corporate Responsibility

It is easier for those in the left-wing Enlightenment tradition to acknowledge some concept of corporate responsibility than for those in the right wing. By adopting some version of Rousseau's general will as manifested in the decisions of the civil rulers, they have been able to equate civil government with the collective will of the people, meaning people bound together only in their capacity as citizens—the only legitimate form of corporate bonding in the view of the left-wing Enlightenment.¹²⁸ The decisions of the rulers are said to be in fact the decisions of the collective people.

Those in the right-wing Enlightenment political tradition have historically been more ready to deny the possibility of corporate responsibility, for such a concept seems to be at odds with the individualistic tradition. This was especially true of political philosophy prior to the transformation of political thought by the American Progressives in the late nineteenth-century. The Progressives adopted a form of Darwinism which offered as its ideal a centrally planned state run by scientists.¹²⁹ Atomism in right-wing Enlightenment thought allows for 126. Nisbet, Social Philosophers, p. 400.

127. The doctrine of the collective, tradition-free will of the sovereign people has only begun to lose its appeal among Western intellectuals with the breakdown of the Communist economies in the late 1980s, and with the slaughter of the Chinese students by China's 27th Army in June of 1989, an event visible internationally by satellite.

128. Communist theory simply internationalized the French Revolution's concept of citizen: "Workers of the world, unite!" This internationalism had already been made explicit in the Masonic ideal of fraternity.

129. I refer here to the writings of Lester Frank Ward and the whole Progressive movement in the United States, 1890–1920. The earlier Social Darwinism of Herbert Spencer and William Graham Sumner was radically individualistic. See Richard Hofstadter, Social Darwinism in American Thought, rev. ed. (Boston: Beacon, 1955); Sidney Fine, Laissez Faire and the General Welfare State: A Study of Conflict in American Thought, 1865–1901 (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1956); Henry Steele Commager, The American Mind: An Interpretation of American Thought and Character Since the 1880s (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1950), ch. 10.

legitimate multiple bondings based on criteria other than political order as such. It therefore allows pluralism; indeed, it requires it.¹³⁰ Atomistic individuals must not be prohibited by the state from making contracts among themselves even if these contracts are not inherently political, although contracting individuals are necessarily under an overall political jurisdiction.¹³¹ Unless a contract explicitly says otherwise, contracts are regarded as enforceable by the state. So, even in the right-wing Enlightenment tradition—except for the anarchist tradition—politics remains the common bond among the various secondary bonds.¹³² Political power is honored as the final court of appeal, the social order's ultimate sanctioning mechanism.

Both wings of the Enlightenment therefore acknowledge some version of corporate responsibility. This responsibility is interpreted in terms of a worldview that assumes that the political universe is self-contained, meaning that mankind is politically autonomous. Both wings see contractualism as the ultimate foundation of social order: an original political contract (Hobbes and Rousseau), multiple economic contracts (Adam Smith), or implicit social contracts (Edmund Burke). In Enlightenment political theory, contractualism replaced covenantalism. The Enlightenment rejected biblical covenantalism's doctrine of responsibility: individual and corporate moral responsibility under a sovereign personal God who establishes fixed moral standards (boundaries) and who also brings sanctions in history—blessings and cursings—in terms of these standards.¹³³ In short, the Enlightenment rejected Moses, both as historian and law-giver. Modern evangelical Christian social theory rejects the continuing authority of Mosaic civil law. Evangelicals have adopted Enlightenment social theory, in effect baptizing it. This has been going on for three centuries.

Q. Adultery in High Places

Mosaic law specifies that unintentional sins of ecclesiastical officers can have consequences for the life of the collective nation. In contrast, the Renaissance-Enlightenment tradition denies the idea that

130. Nisbet, Social Philosophers, pp. 418–29.

131. The left-wing Enlightenment model does not admit the existence of any zone of life that is not inherently political. Contracts are therefore political.

132. There are no legitimate secondary bonds in the left-wing Enlightenment model. To the extent that such bonds do exist in practice, they exist only at the discretion of the state.

133. Smith and Burke acknowledged that God will bring sanctions in eternity.

the exclusively private sins of rulers can have any visible effect on society in general. Of course, all branches of this tradition would freely acknowledge that there can be national repercussions if a ruler has a mistress who happens to be a spy or the carrier of a venereal disease. However, few, if any, would acknowledge that there will be corporate repercussions if a ruler has a disease-free secret mistress who is never discovered, or whose relationship with the ruler is suppressed by the press,¹³⁴ assuming that he is not paralyzed by sexual guilt (which modern rulers never seem to be). The discussion of the public effects of a representative's private immorality would be limited, in the Renaissance-Enlightenment tradition, to considerations of such things as psychology, politics, medicine, and the military.¹³⁵

The issue here is private intentional sins, not unintentional sins. If the public dismisses such obviously intentional sins as if they were the equivalent of unintentional minor infractions, God's corporate negative sanctions will come in history. Modern humanism's social ethics relegates private ethics, especially sexual ethics, to the realm of adiaphora: things irrelevant to the public good. The fornicators and adulterers who formulate social ethics prefer to dismiss such matters. The public has begun to think of sexual sins as irrelevant, i.e., of less concern than even unintentional sins. The old disdain for adultery attributed to the British upper classes has become nearly universal: "Do anything you wish in private, but don't disturb the horses."

Earlier in this chapter I wrote that "even a minor sin committed by a priest (though not the civil magistrate) threatened the whole community." A major private sin—a high-handed sin—by a civil ruler does threaten the whole community. The covenantal question is this: Does the community acknowledge the known sin as major, taking steps to place negative sanctions on the ruler, or at least pray that he depart from his wicked ways? If not, the community is threatened. It has treated a major sin by a civil ruler as if it were an unintentional sin by a priest. In fact, this is the very conclusion of rebellious clerics, who say nothing in public against the known sins of the ruler. The clerics thereby become the civil ruler's accomplices. God then applies negative corporate sanctions.

134. This was in the era before the Watergate affair (1972–74) declared "open season" for reporters on the other sorts of affairs by United States Presidents.

135. This tradition of dismissing sexual sins as the least important of all sins can be seen in Edward Gibbon's masterpiece of Enlightenment historiography, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (1776–82). This study was a defense of the grandeur of that tyrannical empire. Gibbon argued that adultery committed by rulers, so long as it was a private affair, was no threat to the civil order. Effeminacy was dangerous only because it created softness in rulers—a potential military weakness. For citations, see Jaroslav Pelikan, The Excellent Empire: The Fall of Rome And the Triumph of the Church (New York: Harper & Row, 1987), pp. 58–60.

R. Transmission Belts

Combining half of the dualistic epistemology of Kant (the phenomenal realm only)¹³⁶ with the organizational theory of Lenin,¹³⁷ modern social thought assumes that there must be institutional transmission belts in order for the private sins of rulers to have social consequences. These transmission belts must in principle be traceable by means of systematic techniques of investigation. That is, if video recordings or other records of the particular chain of events were available to investigators, these investigators could explain the historical results in terms of specific historical records. God, of course, cannot be recorded. He is "outside the loop." The very concept of a "chain of events" is indicative of this humanist mindset.¹³⁸ Any aspect of the sinful life of a ruler that could not in theory be traced through such historical records is not regarded as historically relevant to society. Put another way, the only historically significant events are those that can conceivably leave historical records, even if actual participants do not leave them in particular situations.

In short, no modern discussion of politics would begin with the suggestion that there can be negative sanctions brought against the nation as a whole as a result of the private sins of national rulers, assuming that these sins have no physical, informational, or judicial connection to the society. To discuss such a possibility necessarily would involve the consideration of a supernatural sanctioning agency that is above and outside the society. This supernaturalism means that a covenantal organization's representative is responsible upward to God and not just downward to the people. Such discussions would be considered improper, not just intellectually but even aesthetically. They would involve a breach of social etiquette. The modern world has thoroughly internalized the Enlightenment's worldview. American church historian Sydney Ahlstrom announced this universal principle of interpretation: "Providence cannot be invoked as an explanatory principle. Supernatural sources of insight or knowledge can not be claimed; . . ." ¹³⁹

136. Richard Kroner, Kant's Weltanschauung (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1916] 1956), ch. 4.

137. John P. Roche, The History and Impact of Marxist-Leninist Organizational Theory: "Useful Idiots," "Innocents' Clubs," and "Transmission Belts" (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Institute for Foreign Policy Analysis, 1984).

138. This mindset is being challenged in our day by the rise of chaos theory, which asserts that even in the most rigorous of natural sciences, such cause-and-effect relationships are not completely knowable, even in principle. Causes and effects are no longer seen as part of an unbreakable chain. See James Gleick, Chaos: Making a New Science (New York: Viking, 1987). Irrationalism is once again challenging the assertions of rationalism.

Modern social thought has nevertheless transferred judicial sovereignty to numerous representative agencies, just as the ancient world did and the medieval world did. There is no escape from the covenantal doctrine of representation and hierarchy. The primary difference between the modern world and the preceding worlds is the doctrine of the autonomy of man. Mankind is now regarded as independent of any personal forces in history other than those created by other men. Apart from mankind's own efforts, the only historically significant influences in man's environment supposedly are impersonal biological and environmental forces. This is modern man's doctrine of cosmic impersonalism. ¹⁴⁰

S. Sacramental Priesthood and Civil Congregation

The Old Covenant's system of sacrifices was based on man's need to atone for his sin. Adam broke his covenant with God. He violated his implicit oath of allegiance to God by disobeying the covenant's stipulations. Adam acted as a representative judicial agent for all mankind. Co-responsibility for Adam's sin is inherited from Adam; therefore, every person begins life at conception disinherited by God. Only adoption by God can overcome this automatic legal condition. The mark of adoption in the Abrahamic Covenant was circumcision; in the New Covenant, it is baptism.

1. Corporate Sins, Corporate Sanctions

Adam's rebellion made mandatory a system of blood sacrifices in order to reconcile God and man. The fourth category of Israel's sacrifices, purification offerings, involved unintentional corporate sins, 139. Sydney E. Ahlstrom, "The Problem of the History of Religion in America," Church History, XXXIX (1970), p. 233.

140. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012).

either representatively or collectively (assembly and congregation), and therefore the threat of negative corporate sanctions.

The Bible places primary institutional authority on those who are primarily threatened by God's negative sanctions in history. In civil government, primary authority is lodged in the congregation: the corporate, judicially sanctified people who publicly covenant under God (Ex. 19). The people delegate authority to civil officers. This is why the Bible establishes a theocratic republic as the ultimate model for civil government. Kings came later (I Sam. 8).

If we follow Kline and assume that God no longer imposes predictable corporate sanctions in history,¹⁴¹ then we will find it very difficult—I would say impossible—to identify authoritatively the God-ordained locus of primary authority in civil government: king, legislature, judges, or people. Such a view of God's historical sanctions—the triumph of operational indeterminacy—makes impossible the development of an exclusively biblical standard for Christian social theory,¹⁴² Christian economics, and Christian political theory. It is because God threatens predictable negative corporate sanctions in history that He delegates to individuals, churches, families and civil governments the judicial sovereignty to impose sanctions in his name, so as to avoid having to impose them more directly. On Kline's basis, it is not possible to identify who is at greatest risk of God's negative sanctions in history. Without a concept of God's predictable sanctions in history, it becomes impossible for Christians to use the Bible to correctly identify covenantal sovereignty and the loci of authority within this sovereignty. This is why Kline's doctrine of God's humanly indeterminate sanctions in history becomes the theological foundation for pluralism, both intellectual and political. It transforms the ideal of Christendom into a heresy.¹⁴³ Kline understood this; so do his published disciples.

While the Levitical sacrifices have been annulled (Heb. 9), the principle or representational authority revealed by the reparation offering has been in force since Adam's covenant. Through Adam death entered the world (Rom. 5:12). The obedience of the Pharaoh of Joseph's day brought God's corporate blessings on the Egyptians. Similarly, the rebellion of the Pharaoh of the exodus brought God's corporate cursings on the Egyptians. While the Israelite sacrificial system has been annulled, the principle of corporate responsibility and representation has not been annulled. Such corporate responsibility was manifested by the law of the purification sacrifice, not inaugurated by it.

141. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

142. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, chaps. 7, 8.

143. Gary North, Westminster's Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til's Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991). (<http://bit.ly/gnwc>)

2. Priesthood and People

The required sacrifices of Leviticus 4 reveal a tighter judicial link between priest and people than between king and people. The priest sacrificed a bullock for his sin. A bullock also atoned for the sin of the congregation (vv. 14–15). Civil rulers and private citizens brought lesser sacrifices. The civil ruler brought a male goat (vv. 22–26). The individual brought a female goat or lamb (vv. 27–35). This indicates that the congregation was sacrificially closer to the priesthood than it was to the civil ruler. The congregation possessed primary authority in civil government because the threat against them was great; hence, the more holy the required sacrificial animal. The king operated by the authority delegated to him by the congregation (I Sam. 8). His required sacrificial animal was less holy—less associated with priestly sacrifice.

This tight covenantal relationship between sacramental priesthood and civil congregation still exists. God expects men to honor it. Nothing in the New Covenant has changed it. Without specific New Testament revelation to the contrary, there is judicial continuity from the Mosaic covenant to the New covenant: the Ten Commandments, the statutes, and their required civil sanctions. This is both the testimony and the offense of Christian Reconstruction. The New Testament's standard for civil government has to be the same as in Old Covenant law: a theocratic republic. The biblical concept of civil authority mandates republicanism: public consent by representatives of the nation to certain laws and forms of rulership (Ex. 19). A theocratic republic preceded kingship in Israel. Theocracy—i.e., rule by God—is established today through a biblically mandatory Trinitarian civil oath. The alternative is either another god's theocracy (e.g., Islamic nations and the State of Israel) or political polytheism, i.e., religious pluralism.¹⁴⁴ All liberals and most fundamentalists agree: political polytheism is morally mandatory for every nation. The fundamentalists except only the State of Israel. Orthodox Jewish Israelis agree with them, but most Jews do not.¹⁴⁵ The worldview of religious and political pluralism is governed by a self-conscious rejection of the ideal of Christendom.

144. North, Political Polytheism, ch. 7.

The theocratic status of a civil government is also manifested by the presence of a priesthood. The congregation is a nation of priests (Ex. 19:6); so is the New Covenant church (I Peter 2:9). This broad Melchizedekan priesthood is represented before God in the church by a sacramental priesthood, one which is responsible for administering baptism and the Lord's Supper. The covenantal faithfulness of this sacramental priesthood—though not a sacrificing priesthood—is more important for the preservation of continuity and peace in society than the faithfulness of the politicians. (If God's blessings on society hinged primarily on the covenantal faithfulness of politicians, all would have been lost by Nimrod's day.)

3. *The Centrality of the Church*¹⁴⁶

Christians are required by God to affirm the social centrality of the church. This presupposition must govern Christian social theory. The New Covenant church is the fulfillment of the promise of God to establish a kingdom of priests. Peter wrote: "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light" (I Peter 2:9). In this sense, God regards the church as a nation. Jesus prophesied to the leaders of Israel: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). Like the priests of Israel, the ordained priests of the new temple must protect the assembled saints by not committing unintentional sins. Similarly, the assembled saints must not commit unintentional sins, in order to protect the society around them.

I conclude: what is central to biblical social order is the preservation of Bible-based judicial sanctions inside the church. The church is more important than the state. A society's creeds are more important than its civil constitution.¹⁴⁷ The sacraments are more important than the franchise. The tithe is more important than taxes. This is why combined taxes should not equal the tithe (I Sam. 8:15, 17). Until the twentieth century, with its messianic humanistic state and its endless, power-centralizing wars,¹⁴⁸ taxes in the West were below 10% of net capital increases plus income. The evidence of God's civil judgments on the once-Trinitarian West is the historically unprecedented escalation of wars and taxes in the twentieth century. There are predictable sanctions in history. (You have a choice: believe Meredith Kline¹⁴⁹ or believe your tax bills.)

145. Jacob Neusner (b. 1932) is a Jewish conservative and the author, translator, or editor of about 950 books. (<http://bit.ly/Neusner950>) (This is two books a month for 40 years.) He reminded his readers: "We cannot build a decent society on secular foundations. Islam knows that; Judaism knows that; why should Christians say any less?" Jacob Neusner, "Who's Afraid of the Religious Right?" National Review (Dec. 27, 1993), p. 37. Yet he, too, called for a political alliance among Christians, Jews, and Muslims: political pluralism.

146. Peter J. Leithart, The Kingdom and the Power: Rediscovering the Centrality of the Church (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: P&R Publishing, 1993).

What goes on inside the church sets the standard for the world. If the church refuses to enforce biblical law, then the state will surely also refuse. If moral corruption is the standard in the church, then moral corruption will be the standard in the state. Why is there this sociological pre-eminence of the church? Because the priest-people relationship is far more vital for social order than the civil ruler-people relationship. God has established His institutional church as the primary ethical model, not the family or the state. Neither the family nor the state—the bringer of exclusively negative sanctions—enters the post-resurrection New Heaven and New Earth; the church does (Rev. 21). But whenever the church refuses to preach and enforce God's revealed law on its own members, the ethical and judicial standards of the political realm will become dominant in the church and family. This is the underlying motivation behind humanism's war against the authority of the church. This is why the state insists that the church does not possess an equal jurisdiction and therefore equal immunity from lawsuits. This is why the enemies of the church promote lawsuits against churches that excommunicate members for such public sins as adultery. (Another reason is income for lawyers.)¹⁵⁰ The humanists have a better grasp of the sociological implications of biblic-

147. R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1968] 1998). (<http://bit.ly/rjrfs0>)

148. Robert Higgs, Crisis and Leviathan: Critical Episodes in the Growth of American Government (New York: Oxford University Press, 1991); Robert Nisbet, The Present Age: Progress and Anarchy in Modern America (New York: Harper & Row, 1988), ch. 1; Jonathan Kwitny, Endless Enemies: The Making of an Unfriendly World (New York: Congdon & Weed, 1984).

149. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," p. 184.

150. J. Shelby Sharpe, "The Nuclear Attack on Christianity in America Has Begun in Earnest," Chalcedon Report (Nov. 1990), pp. 2–9.

al covenantalism than the Christians do.¹⁵¹

Conclusion

The purification offerings linked ordained rulers to God's covenant people. The representatives of the people in both church and state were bound to the people through the details of God's law. There are no unacknowledged private sins on the part of ordained rulers that do not threaten the safety of the holy commonwealth. The corporate implications of private sins were the reason why rulers had to offer public sacrifice for their unintentional private transgressions of God's law.

The institutional church in the Mosaic social order was basic to the survival of that order. The church was also crucial for the successful defense of liberty. The state possesses concentrated power; without the church's unique power of the gospel, the sacraments, and the threat of excommunication from the Lord's Supper, neither the family nor the institutional church can successfully resist the concentrated power of the modern state. Men's only reasonable hope in such a sanctions-free ecclesiastical world is in the collapse of the existing civil order because of its own incompetence—again, a kind of self-inflicted (autonomous) judgment: the bureaucratic suicide of the existing state.¹⁵² But the problem still remains for reconstruction during the post-collapse era: By what standard? Whose sanctions will be enforced, God's or self-proclaimed autonomous man's?

The political theorists of the Enlightenment's right wing, most notably John Locke, lodged ultimate sovereignty in the individual. The right wing of the Enlightenment was therefore morally atomistic. This is the legacy of the Whig tradition. This philosophical individualism has greatly influenced Protestantism, especially Anglo-American Protestantism. Protestants do not feel comfortable with doctrines of corporate responsibility. The biblical doctrine of the covenant, especially the civil covenant, disturbs them. But without comprehensive biblical covenantalism, the state is freed from the restraints of biblical law and biblical sanctions. The church is then left to create a tenuous alliance with the family against the state. But the state, with its promise of endless money for education, health, and retirement, eventually lures away the support of families until the state finally goes bankrupt. In nations where the churches are funded by taxation, the allegiance of the churches to God is also compromised. This is why we need a doctrine of the covenant, with God's law at the center, and the church as the primary counselor and therefore the primary institution. But this does not alter the primary locus of God-delegated authority in both church and state: the people, who are at greatest risk of God's historical sanctions. The purification offerings testified to this fact.

151. The leaders in Jerusalem felt compelled to set up a guard in front of Jesus' tomb in order to keep the disciples from stealing His body and claiming that He had risen from the dead (Matt. 27:62–66). Meanwhile, the disciples had scattered. The covenant-breakers understood the specifics of Jesus' prophecy; the disciples did not. This has been a continuing curse on the church from the beginning.

152. In Eastern (now Central) Europe in the final quarter of 1989, the collapse of Communist rule was in part an act of either treachery against Communism on the part of the ruler or else a highly risky deception of the West—Gorbachev, for whatever reasons, refused to send in the tanks—and in part the prayerful work of the national churches. In this revolt, the churches were recognized as the friends of the people, not the allies of the rulers and the targets of the revolution's rulers, as had been the case in the French and Russian revolutions.

5

PROPORTIONAL PAYMENTS TO GOD

And he shall bring his trespass offering unto the LORD for his sin which he hath sinned, a female from the flock, a lamb or a kid of the goats, for a sin offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for him concerning his sin. And if he be not able to bring a lamb, then he shall bring for his trespass, which he hath committed, two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, unto the LORD; one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering (Lev. 5:6–7).

But if he be not able to bring two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, then he that sinned shall bring for his offering the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a sin offering; he shall put no oil upon it, neither shall he put any frankincense thereon: for it is a sin offering. Then shall he bring it to the priest, and the priest shall take his handful of it, even a memorial thereof, and burn it on the altar, according to the offerings made by fire unto the LORD: it is a sin offering (Lev. 5:11–12).

The theocentric principle that undergirds this law is God as a law-giver and a sanctions-bringer. The offering covers the sin of a previous boundary transgression.

A. Purification Offerings

This passage extends the law of purification offerings. This was a special form of purification offering that applied to a specific kind of sin: a sin of omission (vv. 2–4). A sin of omission is a hidden sin. God sees it and judges it. Wenham wrote: “When the man starts to see the curse coming true, he feels guilty and then brings his offering.”¹ A purification offering was required to purify the tabernacle or the temple, so that the worshipper could enter into the presence of God. A burnt offering was the means of reconciling God and man through the sinner's re-dedication.² In the case of the turtledoves, one was for the purification offering, while the other was for the burnt offering.³ Both the sinner and God's sanctified environment had to be cleansed.

1. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 100.

Why was a female animal required? James Jordan argued that this was because "The animals represented Israelites in terms of their social or symbolic order." Laymen were regarded as the social brides of God, so their representative sacrifices had to be female.⁴ This was a sign of their subordination.

The law granted to the one bringing a sacrifice the right to make a substitution: a less expensive animal for a more expensive animal, or meal for the less expensive animal. The word of the individual regarding his ability to pay was acceptable to the priest unless there was evidence to the contrary. This means that self-government under God was the operational assumption of the laws of sacrifice. God delegated considerable authority to the individual to decide how much he could afford to pay, even in the case of a violation of God's law by the individual, although a minor violation.

To understand why this substitution was allowed by God, despite its low price to the sacrificer, we must first recognize the principle of proportional payment to God. This means that we must first understand the tithe, for it is through the tithe that God announces the principle of proportional payment. We shall then move from a discussion of the tithe to a discussion of civil taxation. Then we shall return to the economics of this sacrifice. This is a roundabout excursion, but it is necessary if we are to grasp the underlying coherence of God's mandated economy. Modern man violated this economy throughout the twentieth century, and even conservative theologians have accepted—sometimes quite enthusiastically—the legitimacy of some of these violations.

B. The Taxation of Capital

What is important for purposes of economic analysis is the fact that this sacrifice to God was proportional to the wealth of the trans-

2. Ibid., p. 101.

3. Ibid., p. 100. Birds were not used as guilt (reparation) offerings; the second passage therefore must be dealing with purification: ibid., p. 104.

4. James Jordan, "The Whole Burnt Sacrifice: Its Liturgy and Meaning," Biblical Horizons Occasional Paper, No. 11, p. 2.

gressor. Milgrom called this a graduated purification offering.⁵ Because of the deliberately non-proportional nature of the modern income tax—those in higher income brackets pay a higher percentage of their income than those in lower brackets—the use of the term “graduated” is misleading. The required payment was proportional. This element of proportionality was analogous to God’s required system of ecclesiastical financing: the tithe. The tithe to God is a fixed percentage—10%—of a person’s net income from his labor or his net increase from investing. This percentage payment to the local church—and only to the local church⁶—was made under the Mosaic law on the basis of the increase that God gives to a rural land owner: “Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year” (Deut. 14:22).

There were cases in which God did require payment on gross income, irrespective of costs of production. One case was the firstfruits offering. Firstfruits was a tiny representative payment, small enough to be carried by a man who walked to Jerusalem. The cost of delivering this payment to the temple was vastly higher than the value of the firstfruits offering itself. Second, the poor were paid out of gross production when they gleaned. Third, a payment was required for the firstborn (Num. 18:15–17). Fourth, when the nation was numbered, all men over age 20 who were eligible to serve in the armed forces paid half a shekel to the priests (Ex. 30:12).⁷ But these were either very small payments or infrequent. The major ecclesiastical tax, the tithe, was paid out of net income. In the New Covenant, only the tithe remains as a mandatory payment, so God no longer taxes capital, except in the sense that the sabbath principle must still be honored: forfeited income one day in seven.

Let us consider the case of a modern farmer. When a farmer begins his career, he has a stock of “after-tithe” seed corn. From this point on, when he saves the same quantity of seed corn from a harvest and plants his next crop with it, there is no tithe required on the land's fruitful replacement of that original capital investment. Whatever quantity of seed and other inputs that it took to plant this season's crop is not subject to the tithe. So, if a farmer had to pay wages to his workers through the year, the tithe begins only after he has replaced the equivalent of the wages paid. God taxes only the increase on capital invested. Except for the previously listed payments, there was to be no taxation of gross income in Israel's economy; there should be none today.

5. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1-16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 312.

6. The institutional church is a monopoly institution which alone can lawfully offer the sacraments and which alone collects the tithe on the basis of this sacramental monopoly. See Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58. Cf. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), ch. 3. (http:// bit.ly/gntithing). See Appendix B, below.

7. For a summary of these payments, see Alfred Edersheim, The Temple: Its Ministry and Services As They Were in the Time of Jesus Christ (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1874] 1983), p. 379.

This is true for the church's tithe; it is also true for the state.⁸ Both church and state must be supported by proportional levies based on income rather than property. A farmer who makes no income in a bad year, but is instead forced to consume capital and borrow, is not to face the threat of the confiscation of his inheritance by either church officers or tax collectors merely because he holds legal title to land and equipment. The same objection applies to a head tax or a poll (voting) tax.⁹ God's monopolistic ministries of church and state are to prosper economically only to the extent that their members do. God authorizes both church and state to tax success at a low, common, fixed rate, with the combined taxes of all branches of the state at less than the tithe (I Sam. 8:15, 17). Neither institution is authorized to tax the capital that makes success possible.

1. Off the Top

God is entitled a tithe on our net productivity. His share comes "off the top." But the modern state in many cases demands this initial payment, leaving the church with a tithe on whatever remains. This is wicked but common. In the United States, the taxpayer is allowed to deduct payments to charitable organizations before the United States government assesses an income tax on whatever remains. But this is not the case with the Social Security (old age pension) payroll tax, which is euphemistically called a contribution. The United States government collects its tax on total wage income—no deductions allowed. Most nations fail to grant tax deductions for donations.

8. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 283.

9. God did not impose a head tax. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 58. In the fall of 1990, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of England was forced to resign from her position by her own political party. The Conservative Party had suffered a serious decline in popularity as a result of decision to add a kind of head tax to the existing property tax. (Had she not strongly opposed England's entry into the European Community, she might have retained her office.)

The question arises: Does the Christian owe God a tithe on his pre-tax net income? He does if the state does not collect the tax first. But if the state collects the money “off the top” and does not allow the taxpayer to deduct his tithe payments from his gross income before estimating his income tax obligation, the answer is clear: the tithe is 10% of whatever remains after the tax collector has collected the state’s immorally extracted tax. The state has stolen from God: sacrilege. This is not the tithe-payer’s responsibility. He is a victim. If the tithe-payer had to pay a tithe on his pre-tax income, God would be taxing what the tithe-payer never received. This would constitute a tax on capital. Put another way, God does not tax us on that portion of our net crop that the locusts eat. Tax collectors are the economic equivalent of locusts.

On the other hand, if the state allows us to deduct our tithe payments before it computes our taxable income, we owe the tithe on our pre-tax income. God should always get paid first. If a man takes in a hundred ounces of gold a year, net, and he pays his tithe, the state should tax him on the remaining 90 ounces. If it collects a tax equal to the tithe—immoral (I Sam. 8:17)—it receives 9 ounces. An even more immoral state will collect 10 ounces, leaving the tithe-payer with 90 ounces of gold after taxes. He then pays 9 ounces to the church. In both examples, he retains 81 ounces. In the first example, the church collects 10 ounces and the state collects 9; in the second example, it is the reverse. The first example is closer to God’s standards than the second.

2. Sharecropping

We can understand this better if we think of the pre-twentieth-century agricultural practice of sharecropping. Land owners owned land and capital. (Capital is the product of land and labor over time).¹⁰ After slavery was abolished, they no longer owned people. Instead, they hired people.¹¹ Rather than paying them wages, land own-

10. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 5:4.

11. In the American South, 1865–80, sharecropping became a way of life for ex-slaves and ex-slave owners. It was a cost-effective system for a defeated post-war society with minimal financial capital. Roger Ransom and Richard Sutch, One Kind of Freedom: The economic consequences of emancipation (New York: Cambridge Univer-

ers leased to sharecroppers tools and land. Owners concluded that it was less expensive to monitor economic results—a local crop—than it was to monitor the productivity of their employees' labor inputs to the production process, requiring them to specify a wage for these labor inputs.¹² What mattered to land owners was results, not labor inputs. They understood: "Activity is no substitute for production."

Hourly wages are based on the average productivity of a particular class of workers. An above-average producer in any given class is usually much better off to become a sharecropper, a piece-rate worker, or a commissioned salesman. He is paid in terms of his measurable net productivity, not in terms of his membership in a class of laborers. The lower the percentage of the crop owed contractually to the owner, the better this arrangement is for the efficient producer. To gain the services of such workers, owners are willing to take a lower percentage of the crop: a smaller percentage of a much larger pie.

God is the owner; covenant-keepers are His sharecroppers as household priests. He does not tax capital today for the same reason that the land owner does not tax his own land and tools. They are being used by the sharecroppers to produce a crop. The land owner collects a fixed percentage of the crop after the replacement of seed and tools. So does God. God demands a low percentage of our net output—10% to the church;¹³ less than 10% to the state (I Sam. 8:14–18)¹⁴—in order to encourage us to work efficiently. He does not have to monitor our inputs except for prohibiting our labor one day a week. He authorizes His agents, meaning ordained ministers (church and state), to monitor our net output and collect God's mandated share.

This system of taxation is appropriate to a decentralized economic order. It is consistent with God's system of representative government. God's kingdom, unlike Satan's, is not a top-down commonwealth. God delegates tremendous authority and responsibility to the individual. He treats us as sharecroppers: people who are responsible for final results, not bureaucratic wage-earners. This structure of ownership and sity Press, 1977).

12. The cost of monitoring people's behavior is fundamental in the evolution of economic and political institutions. Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980), pp. 55–56, 65–66, 111–12, 215–26. See Sowell's index for more entries: "Monitoring."

13. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

14. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

taxation is why a Christian social order rewards economic growth rather than time-serving. God as the owner is paid in terms of our net productivity, not a fixed tax. We sharecroppers keep the lion's share of our crop: above 80% in a society that honors God's law. The twentieth century did not honor it. It suffered wars, taxation, inflation, regulation, and socialist impoverization as its appropriate reward. God is not mocked.

C. Costs of Ownership

What this means is that God has assigned the ownership of most property to individuals, families, business partnerships, and corporations. These profit-seeking economic agents act in God's behalf as stewards. Their God-assigned, market-driven task is to increase the productivity, and therefore the market value, of the property under their lawful management. This is the economic process of adding value. God allows men to retain 90% of the pre-tax increase that their efforts produce.¹⁵ He requires a tithe as a means of sustaining the work of His institutional church, but also as a token (representative) sacrifice to Him by His stewards: the public mark of their subordination to Him. As in the case of the first sacrifice listed in Leviticus, God must be paid first—men's public acknowledgment of His absolute sovereignty—but not paid very much: the sign of our inability to buy His favor with our own wealth.¹⁶ Paying the tithe is man's public denial of his own autonomy.

God's long-term economic goal is to use the tithe-financed expansion of His church to bring the whole earth under His public authority through the extension of private, tithe-paying ownership. He is redeeming (buying back) the earth in history. The extension of private, tithe-paying ownership is God's authorized and required means of enabling His people's reclaiming title to the land—land that was previously appropriated in history by Satan through Satan's successful cov-

15. A godly civil government does not impose income taxes on money given to charity. It taxes income only after tithe payments have been made to a church. But some civil governments are perverse. They tax gross income before the individual or the business gives away money. In such societies, men are not required to tithe on what the tax collector has already appropriated. If this were not the case, then God would be taxing capital. For example, if the state collects 100% of a person's income, for God to extract an additional 10% would involve the taxation of capital. God does not tax capital; He taxes only the increase. He does not tax what the "locusts" eat before the harvest.

16. Chapter 1.

enantal subordination of Adam and Eve.¹⁷ Each self-proclaimed sovereign master of the universe, God and Satan, exercises ownership representatively. Each claims ownership of the earth. Each establishes ownership boundaries that are to be defended by his covenantal subordinates.

1. Private Ownership

Why does God assign ownership primarily to profit-seeking private owners? Because it is only through the private ownership of the means of production, especially capital assets, that it becomes possible to count the costs of operation. Without private ownership, there cannot be competitive pricing. Without market-established prices, especially prices for capital goods, there cannot be rational accounting. All economic allocations made under socialist ownership are inherently irrational, a fact proven theoretically by Ludwig von Mises as early as 1920¹⁸ and revealed to the world publicly in 1989 with the public acknowledgment by Soviet Premier Gorbachev of the utter collapse of the Communist economies.¹⁹ Mises for decades was not believed by Western intellectuals, including economists.²⁰ They much preferred to believe the utopian promises of socialist dictators. They still generally

17. Amillennialists categorically deny that God's redemption of the earth will take place historically. This is the heart of their position. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), chaps. 4, 9. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>). In fact, they even say that Satan's subordinates will reclaim most of what pathetically little Christ has transferred to His people since His ascension. Nevertheless, amillennialists should be willing to acknowledge that this process of redeeming the earth is God's economic goal for His people, even if Christians fail to achieve it in history.

18. Ludwig von Mises, "Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth" (1920); in F. A. Hayek (ed.), Collectivist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1935] 1953), ch. 3; the essay was reprinted by the Mises Institute, Auburn, Alabama, in 1990. (<http://mises.org/econcalc.asp>) Cf. Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1948] 1949), chaps 7–9. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>); T. J. B. Hoff, Economic Calculation on the Socialist Society (London: Hodge, 1949). (<http://bit.ly/HoffCalc>); Don Lavoie, National Economic Planning: What Is Left? (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Ballinger, 1985).

19. I know of no equally monumental and rapid shift in public opinion, including academic opinion, in the history of Western thought. Virtually overnight—1988–89—Communism as an economic system lost its defenders except those with academic tenure in American universities. Only when the chief Soviet Communist admitted publicly that Communist economic planning had totally failed did the West's intellectuals at last accept the proposition that Communism does not work.

20. Oscar Lange and Fred M. Taylor, On the Economic Theory of Socialism (New York: McGraw-Hill, [1938] 1965).

refuse to acknowledge the accuracy of Mises' theoretical case.²¹ Robert Heilbroner, a socialist who made millions of dollars from his best-selling book on the great economists, did admit in 1990 that Mises had been correct after all, that his generation had been completely wrong on this point, and socialism as an ideal is dead unless it can come to power through the ecology movement, which he still hoped will happen.²² This admission came late and under extreme duress: the collapse of Soviet Communism. Mises was not mentioned once in Heilbroner's book, but there was room for chapters on the utopian socialists, on Karl Marx, and on Thorstein Veblen.²³ It was only when the tyrants who ruled the Communist slave state known as the Soviet Union publicly admitted the total economic failure of Soviet Communism²⁴ that Western intellectuals began to parrot these critical views, although without understanding the theoretical case behind the reality. Prior to this overnight shift in the Communist Party line, Western intellectuals had steadfastly defended both socialism and Communism as valid economic systems. This included the vast majority of academic economists.²⁵ Intellectuals are like sheep; they move in herds, with a

21. Mises was equally hostile to "middle of the road" socialism, which the intellectuals have yet to abandon. See Mises, "Middle-of-the-Road Policy Leads to Socialism," in Ludwig von Mises, Planning for Freedom, 3rd ed. (South Holland, Illinois, [1950] 1974. (<http://bit.ly/MisesPFF>))

22. Robert Heilbroner, "Reflections: After Communism," New Yorker (Sept. 10, 1990), pp. 92, 100. This is not an academic journal; it is a magazine aimed at intellectuals.

23. Robert Heilbroner, The Worldly Philosophers (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1953).

24. "Gorbachev Calls for a Strike Ban, Saying Economy Is Near Collapse," New York Times (Oct. 3, 1989).

25. The best example is Paul Samuelson, the first American to win the Nobel Prize in economics (1970). In the 13th edition of his best-selling textbook, published in 1989, he wrote: "The Soviet economy is proof that, contrary to what many skeptics had earlier believed, a socialist command economy can function and even thrive." Paul A. Samuelson and William D. Nordhaus, Economics (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1989), p. 837. Mark Skousen's study of the ten major American economics textbooks in the late 1980s reports that several of them "are surprisingly sympathetic toward Karl Marx, the ideological founder of modern socialism." Mark Skousen, Economics on Trial: Lies, Myths, and Realities (Homewood, Illinois: Business One Irwin, 1991), p. 208. He said also that "Most of the top 10 textbook writers accept the conventional view that the Soviet Union and other countries with command economies have achieved a highly developed stage based on accepted GNP statistics." Ibid., p. 213. Textbooks rapidly become almost worthless because publishers require authors to update them every three years to destroy competition from used textbooks, which are rarely kept by students after final exams. But late-1980s economics textbooks may become collector items, for they document the incomparable foolishness of their authors regarding so-handful of skilled sheep dogs keeping them moving. From time to time these sheep get sheared by reality; in totalitarian societies, they get slaughtered by tyrants.

To be successful in a free market, resource owners must steadily increase the economic value of their assets' customer-satisfying output. They must also keep down the costs of operation. This forces owners to count the cost of their actions—a biblical injunction (Luke 14:28–30).²⁶ Through private ownership of the means of production, those who make mistakes in allocating producer goods to meet expected consumer demand are the people who bear the cost of their own actions. The dominion covenant is therefore accomplished progressively over time through this process of profit-driven economic growth. Through private ownership of the means of production, more and more of this world's abundant resources are brought under the control of mankind.²⁷ Entrepreneurs continually seek out ways to satisfy consumer demand without proportionately increasing the consumption of capital and therefore the proportionate destruction of capital value. The whole world becomes a potential capital asset. By discovering new ways to satisfy buyers, producers raise the value of God's creation. This is exactly what God requires from His stewards (Matt. 25:14–30).²⁸ Again, this is the process known as value-added production. Man's efforts add value to the resources that God has provided for him. It is human creativity, therefore, not raw materials, that is the creation's most important scarce resource.²⁹ But this is derived by God's grace (Deut. 8:16–18). Economic growth is the dominion covenant in action, the fulfilling of Adam's original task to dress the garden and guard it.

2. Voluntarism vs. Compulsion

For the church or the state to interfere with this value-adding expansionist economic program by confiscating privately owned capital—as distinguished from taxing the net economic fruits of capital at low rates—is to interfere with the God-assigned task of dominion.

cialism and Communism.

26. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

27. Julian L. Simon and Herman Kahn (eds.), The Resourceful Earth: A Response Global 2000 (London: Basil Blackwell, 1984).

28. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49:M.

29. Julian L. Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981).

Neither the church nor the state is a profit-seeking institution; both are God-ordained monopolies that are supposed to be financed by a fixed percentage of the net economic increase that God gives to His people, i.e., the principle of the tithe.

The tithe principle's restriction—no consumption of existing capital—applies only to compulsory wealth transfers. To consume voluntarily one's existing capital assets at any rate above zero is to reduce future economic growth; it is to consume one's tools of dominion. It is legal in God's eyes to do this, but it does impose costs: reduced opportunities to increase future wealth through profitable investing. The owner-consumer will pay the price in the forfeited future income that the capital might have produced. There is therefore an element of negative feedback in this private property system. The present beneficiary knows that he or his heirs risk suffering a reduced level of future income if he consumes capital today. He has an incentive to refrain from consuming his capital base.

To consume other people's capital assets by moral or legal compulsion is also to impede the fulfillment of the dominion covenant. Worse, it encourages private owners to consume them before the tax collectors arrive.³⁰ The threat of confiscation changes the private owner's view of the future, including his personal responsibility for the future. The taxation of capital transfers assets from those agents who are production-oriented to political institutions that are inherently present-oriented and consumption-oriented, and which, because they are monopolies, are insulated from the free market pressures of consumer choice. Those people who act as capital confiscators are immediately enriched; they increase their control over scarce economic resources. Those who are God's assigned stewards of capital suffer immediate economic losses—the reduction of their present wealth—as well as any forfeited future productivity that the confiscated capital might have provided, if it had been put to consumer-satisfying uses. Those who bear the costs—capital owners—are not those who benefit from the wealth transfer. Thus, there is very little visible negative economic feedback on the state's consumption of capital. There is only political negative feedback.

Any monopolistic institution that compels the transfer of capital is a seed-corn-eating institution. It is inherently present-oriented. It is a lower-class institution.³¹ It is an institution that fosters a short-run view of time and human decision-making (high time preference, high interest rates) rather than a long-run view of time and decision-making (low time preference, low interest rates).³²

30. This is what happened in the Soviet Union in the early 1930s during Stalin's forced collectivization of agriculture. Peasants slaughtered their animals and ate them rather than turn them over to the new collective farms and state farms.

D. The Ability to Pay

All sin is an affront to God. The rich man's sin as well as the poor man's sin enrages God. But there is this distinction: the rich man has sinned in the face of greater blessings from God. He therefore owes more to God than the poor man does in absolute terms. Making restitution to God is supposed to hurt, but one man's economic pain is another man's economic destruction. Thus, sinners are to make restitution to God in terms of the proportional benefits they expected to gain from their sin.

1. Wealth and Responsibility

A fundamental biblical principle is invoked at this point: from him to whom much is given, much is expected. The context of this rule is the imposition of God's eternal sanctions.

And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward, whom his lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing. Of a truth I say unto you, that he will make him ruler over all that he hath. But and if that servant say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to beat the menservants and maidens, and to eat and drink, and to be drunken; The lord of that servant will come in a day when he looketh not for him, and at an hour when he is not aware, and will cut him in sunder, and will appoint him his portion with the unbelievers. And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more (Luke 12:42–48).³³

31. Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), ch. 3.

32. T. Alexander Smith, Time and Public Policy (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1988), chaps. 4–6.

33. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

If this system of proportional sanctions is true throughout eternity, then it surely must be true in terms of the restitution payments in history owed to God by men. Marx's principle of expectation and economic remuneration is therefore wrong: "From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs!"³⁴ The first half of the statement is correct; the second half is true only in the case of the physically or mentally incompetent, or those who in the England were for centuries called "the deserving poor."³⁵ The general rule is this: "To each according to market value of his actual production." We know this from the parable: "And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward, whom his lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing. Of a truth I say unto you, that he will make him ruler over all that he hath" (Luke 12:42–44).

2. Misused Slogans

The slogan, "the ability to pay," throughout the twentieth century was used by politicians to justify taxation policies that extract widely differing percentages of men's income as taxes. Sales taxes, "sin" taxes (cigarettes and liquor), luxury taxes, and property taxes were imposed by means of a fixed percentage of the sales price or estimated value. Income, in contrast, is taxed at varying rates the rates escalate as the income level rises.³⁶ The graduated or "progressive" income tax is not a proportional system of taxation but rather a system of disproportional taxation. "Paying one's fair share" is a slogan used mainly by those policy-makers who plan to use state coercion to see to it that they themselves—or at least their political constituents³⁷—pay a lower per-

34. Karl Marx, The Critique of the Gotha Program (1875); in Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, 1969), III, p. 19. Marx stole this phrase from Morelly's Code de la Nature (1755–60).

35. Peter Mathias, The First Industrial Nation: An Economic History of Britain, 1700–1914 (New York: Scribner's, 1969), p. 26.

36. This also applies to "death duties," meaning inheritance taxes.

37. A rich politician may very well promote a high progressive income tax if he has his money invested in nontaxable wealth, or if he derives more pleasure from being re-elected by envious voters than from spending his income. This is why the very rich are so often socialists or dedicated Keynesians their wealth is in real estate, trusts, or tax-exempt bonds, and they have so much money already—especially inherited wealth—that they find it more gratifying to wield political power than to retain another million in after-tax income. Show me a multi-millionaire who inherited all of his money from Daddy or Grandpa, and I will show you a politician dangerous to both political and economic freedom.

centage of their income to the state than others do, especially their main political opponents. The word fair is never defined. The politicians and their ideological apologists appeal to the envy of those who believe they are poorer. Envy justifies the extraction of a higher proportion of income from those they perceive as richer.³⁸ This policy is a consistent application of the socialist's version of the eighth commandment: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote."

The ludicrousness of such a view—that a graduated income tax is consistent with the biblical principle of the ability to pay—can be seen in the recommendation of Protestant liberation theologian Ronald Sider. Sider called for a graduated tithe. But the biblical tithe is 10%. The term "graduated tithe" leads to both terminological and conceptual confusion between the mandatory tithe, which is owed to the institutional church, and voluntary offerings above the tithe. His recommended system is this: the more income a person makes, the higher the incremental percentage of his giving should be. But, he hastens to add, "Obviously it is not the only useful model. Certainly it is not a biblical norm to be prescribed legalistically for others."³⁹ So, what Sider recommended is not really a tithe; it is a recommended but not compulsory system of offerings.

There is a hidden problem here, however. Sider repeatedly called on the church to become the model for the world.⁴⁰ This means the political world. But the political world is governed by compulsory taxation, not by the church's system of morally mandatory tithes and voluntary offerings, let alone the "give whatever the Spirit leads" system of antinomian giving.⁴¹ When, in our 1981 debate, I challenged Sider twice to name the percentage of one's income above which the state cannot morally extract, he twice refused to suggest a figure.⁴² The an-

38. Gary North, "The Politics of the Fair Share," The Freeman (Nov. 1993). (<http://bit.ly/gnfairshare>)

39. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1977), p. 175. Sider abandoned this concept in the twentieth-year anniversary version of this book. Cf. Gary North, "The Economic Re-Education of Ronald J. Sider," Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, [1999] 2012), Appendix F.

40. Ibid., pp. 98, 111, 170.

41. If you give under 10% to your local church, you are breaking God's law. On the other hand, if you do not know what God's maximum required percentage is, you may feel guilty when giving 30%.

42. This debate took place at Gordon-Conwell School of Theology. Audiotape cassettes of this debate are available from Covenant Media Foundation: www.cmfnow.com.

swer, Samuel tells us, is something under 10%, i.e., the tithe; anything as high as the tithe is political tyranny (I Sam. 8:15, 17). Even this level of taxation would drastically shrink the modern state,⁴³ but men like Sider have no intention of shrinking the modern state. On the contrary, their demands for social justice can be met only by a vast expansion of the state and taxes.⁴⁴ Sider's views shifted dramatically in his 1997 edition, half a decade after the collapse of the Soviet Union. He became more moderate and guarded in his critique of capitalism. He even adopted some of Chilton's arguments. But nowhere in the book is any reference to Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators. He blacked out Chilton.

E. Discontinuities of Sacrifice

When men were required by God to sacrifice animals as substitutes, the priests faced a problem: How were the required restitution payments to correspond with the sinner's ability to pay? When the tithe was owed, this payment could be estimated easily: so many pieces of silver or so many units of grain. It could also be done in terms of so many animals. "And concerning the tithe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the LORD. He shall not search whether it be good or bad, neither shall he change it and if he change it at all, then both it and the change thereof shall be holy; it shall not be redeemed" (Lev. 27:32–33). The animals would be lined up randomly and passed under a rod; every tenth animal was culled out of the flock to be given to the Lord. If a man saw that a favorite animal was lost to this procedure, he could redeem it by paying its market value plus 20% (Lev. 27:31). If he in any way tampered with the lining-up process, he could not subsequently redeem the animal. Thus, God created risks for tampering with the flock; if the herdsman miscalculated in his prohibited calculations, he could lose a cherished animal.⁴⁵

The animal sacrifice system created a problem that did not exist to the same degree in the case of the tithe. A tithe was proportional to net

43. The average rate of overall taxation in most modern nations is about 40% from 33% in the U. S. to 50% in Sweden. Joseph A. Pechman (ed.), Comparative Tax Systems Europe, Canada, and Japan (Arlington, Virginia: Tax Analysts, 1987), p. 1.

44. David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas Institute for Christian Economics, [1986] 1990). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>) increase. A net increase could be measured or at least estimated fairly well. But offering an animal sacrifice was not the same as paying God a fixed proportion of net income. A specific kind of sin required a specific sacrifice. The nature of the sin determined the nature of the sacrifice. Then how could God maintain the principle of proportional pain? Had the sacrifice been a specified amount of money, either the rich man would have paid too little proportional to his economic benefits in life or the poor man would have paid too much. The penalty would not have been proportional.

45. Chapter 38.

There is no way to sacrifice one-third of an animal without killing it. This is the problem of sacrificial discontinuity. Thus, proportional restitution to God is not possible in a world that requires a single type of animal sacrifice. If killing a lamb or goat is the only legitimate way to placate God, then both the rich man and the poor man have to pay it. But this would violate the biblical principle of greater responsibility on the part of those possessing greater wealth.

The problem of sacrificial discontinuity is reflected in the specified sacrificial animals in Leviticus 5: lambs or goats, a pair of birds,⁴⁶ or fine flour and oil. The payment for sin to God (as distinguished from an earthly victim) was not to be made in terms of money, except by someone who was willing to pay an extra 20% to buy back (redeem) the animal. The wealth (capital) of the sinner was to determine which animal he was to sacrifice, or even if he was to sacrifice an animal. The poor man could legitimately sacrifice fine flour and still meet the judicial requirement, but the sacrifice had to impose pain on the sinner. The sacrifice was to reflect or represent the intensity of the negative sanction he was avoiding, on earth and in eternity.

F. Rich Man, Average Man, Poor Man

The tripartite division that we commonly make in class analysis—upper, middle, and lower—is reflected in this passage. The idea that each wealth group was bound by differing ritual obligations pointed to the biblical principle of present obligations in terms of prior benefits. If the rich man imagined that he could escape God's condemnation by the payment of a trifle, he did not understand God's analysis of the nature of the specific infraction. The earthly restitution payment to God was to be a token of the required eternal payment, what Paul called an earnest (Eph. 1:14), meaning a down payment. God promises to inflict great pain for sin in eternity; the pain endured by sinners in history is to reflect this coming pain. The sanctions of Israel's sacrificial system were designed to teach this lesson before it was too late for repentance.

46. One for a purification offering and the other for a burnt offering: Wenham, Leviticus, p. 100.

On the other hand, had the poor man been expected to pay a rich man's obligation, he would have lost sight of the reality of differing sins: any sin would bankrupt him. Such a restitution system would economically subsidize the worst sins by poor people. Why not commit really serious infractions if the end result in history is the same for great and minor infractions, i.e., bankruptcy and enslavement? To impose an impossibly high penalty on all crimes or sins is to make it equally expensive to commit all crimes or all sins. Man being what he is—totally depraved apart from God's grace—this system of sanctions would be a subsidy to his depraved nature. It would be comparable to imposing the death penalty for murdering a policeman and also for stealing a bicycle. It would result in extreme danger for any policeman attempting to arrest a bicycle thief. The thief would know that killing the policeman would not result in any greater earthly penalty. This assessment of comparative risk would eventually lead to very high expenses for the arrest of suspected bicycle thieves. Squads of police would have to be allocated to the arrest every suspected bicycle thief. Meanwhile, someone calling the police department's emergency phone number in order to stop a murder might find that there were very few police left to respond; too many of them would be assigned to arresting some armed and dangerous bicycle thief.

G. Interpersonal Comparisons of Subjective Utility

My interpretation of this law returns to an issue raised by economist A. C. Pigou in the early years of the twentieth century. In his book, The Economics of Welfare (1912), Pigou offered a scientific justification of the graduated income tax. He argued that one additional monetary unit of income for a rich man meant little to him compared to what that same monetary unit of income would mean to a very poor man. Therefore, a net increase in aggregate social utility could be attained by taxing the income of rich men at rates higher than those imposed on poor men. This argument has persuaded many economists. But in 1932, Lionel Robbins challenged it in his book, The Nature and Significance of Economic Science. He insisted that we cannot, as scientists, make interpersonal comparisons of other men's subjective utility. Scientifically, no one can say what value a rich man places on an additional unit of income compared to a poor man's valuation. There is no common scale of psychic valuation. Scientifically, he was correct. No economist has ever refuted this objection.

I have surveyed this theoretical problem elsewhere.⁴⁷ We are not dealing here with scientific economic policy. We are dealing with a law established by an omniscient God who is fully capable of making interpersonal comparisons of every person's subjective utility. Second, the right to substitute a less expensive animal applied only to the purification offering. The principle of the tithe is simple to state: a fixed percentage paid by all income recipients. Proportional payment—the judicial principle of the tithe—also underlies this sacrifice. But one animal, unlike grain or money income, cannot be precisely divided proportionately without killing it. Nevertheless, this law does honor the proportional principle. Thus, it would be analytically perverse to use the law governing this sacrifice to defend a graduated income tax.

Conclusion

The Bible teaches the principle of proportional tithing and proportional restitution to God. The problem with animal sacrifices in the Old Covenant was that they could not be precisely proportional: men cannot slay just half an animal. Thus, God imposed a system of different sacrifices for people of varying wealth.

The priests collected the sacrifices, and they could lawfully use them personally: "And the priest shall make an atonement for him as touching his sin that he hath sinned in one of these, and it shall be forgiven him: and the remnant shall be the priest's, as a meat offering" (Lev. 5:13). But these sacrifices were not part of a predictable stream of income. These payments were the result of specific sins. These penalties were not based on income but on the sinner's total wealth; they were specific restitution payments. They were the economic equivalent of sin taxes—literal sin taxes to God through His church. This system enabled men to reduce these sin taxes by sinning less frequently.

The market value of these sacrifices was limited by the wealth of the sinner. This was to make certain that every sinner felt the appropriate pain of economic loss; it would remind him of the eternal loss to come. There were “different strokes for different folks” only to make sure that all the folks felt an appropriate degree of economic pain. Had the sacrificial system been strictly a system of fines, the proportionality of the sanctions would have been easy to maintain. Because a living animal is not divisible on the same basis as monetary fines, God established a system of differing sacrifices for the same transgression, so that all transgressors were to feel a similar psychological burden for their transgressions irrespective of their net worth.

47. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5; North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix J:E–F; North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 50.

6

SACRED, PROFANE, AND COMMON

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, If a soul commit a trespass, and sin through ignorance, in the holy things of the LORD; then he shall bring for his trespass unto the LORD a ram without blemish out of the flocks, with thy estimation by shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary, for a trespass offering: And he shall make amends for the harm that he hath done in the holy thing, and shall add the fifth part thereto, and give it unto the priest: and the priest shall make an atonement for him with the ram of the trespass offering, and it shall be forgiven him. And if a soul sin, and commit any of these things which are forbidden to be done by the commandments of the LORD; though he wist it not [unaware], yet is he guilty, and shall bear his iniquity. And he shall bring a ram without blemish out of the flock, with thy estimation, for a trespass offering, unto the priest: and the priest shall make an atonement for him concerning his ignorance wherein he erred and wist it not, and it shall be forgiven him. It is a trespass offering: he hath certainly trespassed against the LORD (Lev. 5:14–19).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is that there are varying degrees of sin in trespassing God's boundaries. This law governs the transgression of a sacred boundary, which profanes sacred space.

A. A Trespass Offering

Some sins are committed in ignorance. The two greatest sins in history were committed by some of the participants in ignorance: the Fall of man—Eve was ignorant (I Tim. 2:13b)—and the crucifixion of Christ: the Roman soldiers were ignorant (Luke 23:34). Nevertheless, ignorance is no defense. Reparation for transgression is still necessary.

This is the fifth sacrifice: a guilt (reparation) offering.¹ As the fifth offering, it was associated with point five of the biblical covenant model: succession or inheritance. It had to do with continuity. To be restored to the legal status that he had enjoyed before the transgression, the trespasser had to offer a sacrifice. The transgression had been individual. The judicial implication of the passage is this: the sanctions God would apply to the transgressor would be personal, not corporate. His sin was not representational. He had transgressed a holy thing or a holy commandment. Thus, the appropriate institutional sanction was ecclesiastical: excommunication. This would cause him to lose his inheritance in Israel: his land, but more important, his citizenship.² To continue as a free man in Israel—to leave an inheritance to his children—he had to offer a sacrifice.

1. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 319.

A 20% penalty was applied to a transgression of a holy thing. Not so with a transgression of one of God's commandments. Here is the theological question: Why the difference?

The King James translators translated the Hebrew word 'asham as trespass. The English word "trespass" is readily associated with a boundary violation, as in "No Trespassing." The New American Standard Bible translates 'asham as guilt. So did the medieval Jewish commentator Nachmanides.³ Grammatically, this is the more precise translation. What is described here is a guilt offering. A person in ignorance commits a transgression of God's law, later recognizes this infraction, and then offers sacrifice to pay for his transgression. He recognizes his own guilt, and he then offers a sacrifice as his acknowledgment. Nevertheless, the King James Version comes closer to the theological meaning of the type of transgression involved: a trespass—a boundary violation—in the same sense that Adam's sin involved a transgression of the judicial boundary which God had placed around the forbidden fruit. Adam and Eve were indeed guilty, but their guilt was based on a literal trespass.

Adam's trespass remains the archetype of all sin. Eve's transgression, however, was closer to the sin covered by this passage: one committed in ignorance. Paul wrote: "And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression" (I Tim. 2: 14). Representatively, she was under Adam's jurisdiction, so she came under Adam's more comprehensive judgment: death. But God distinguished between the two degrees of sin, so He imposed separate sanctions.

2. Chapter 31.

3. Ramban [Rabbi Moshe ben Nachman], Commentary on the Torah: Leviticus (New York: Shilo, [1267?] 1974), p. 55.

Eve's punishment was pain in childbearing (Gen. 3:16): an occasional event. Adam's punishment was to sweat daily as he worked to subdue a world now filled with resisting thorns and weeds (Gen. 3:17–19).⁴ Mankind as a species is defined by the work of dominion (Gen. 1:26–28), but the male's labor is more closely associated with this task; the woman's is more closely associated with assisting her husband and extending the human race.⁵ She comes under the general curse primarily through her judicially subordinate position.

B. Holy Things and Holy Commandments

This passage rests on a distinction between holy things of the Lord and holy commandments. A transgression of holy things in ignorance required a 20% penalty plus the offering of a ram (vv. 15–16). In contrast, a transgression of a commandment in ignorance required only the sacrifice of the animal (v. 18). This seemingly minor distinction becomes the basis of the analysis of the present long and highly detailed chapter—specifically, acknowledging the biblical distinction between the sacred and the common, but denying the legitimacy of a far more widely accepted distinction: sacred vs. profane. As we shall see, one of

4. The technological progress of man in history has begun to overcome God's curses. Air conditioning is one such example. Today, air conditioning in most of the industrial world has overcome the literal application of this negative sanction. (The cultural substitute has been stress, a kind of internalized sweating.) This progress can be seen as a blessing: greater rewards in response to progressive obedience to the external principles of responsible private ownership and the social and intellectual division of labor. It can also be seen as a prelude to widespread cursing following a collapse of the social division of labor as a result of war, terrorism, or mass inflation.

5. Judicially, the New Testament's sanction of baptism has broken down the middle wall of partition between male and female. "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3:27–28). Thus, Paul wrote immediately following his discussion of Eve's transgression, "Notwithstanding she shall be saved in childbearing, if they continue in faith and charity and holiness with sobriety" (I Tim. 2:15). The progressive removal of Eve's Genesis sanction indicates that under the New Covenant, women will progressively work more closely with men in the broader tasks of dominion, thereby breaking down the occupational division of labor. We find that as the division of labor has been extended since the Industrial Revolution of the 1780s, women have found employment in salary-earning occupations—tasks other than household services—although they still tend to fill those jobs that are traditionally male-support jobs. There are very few male secretaries, especially serving female executives. Women still leave the work force to rear children in greater numbers than men do. Felice N. Schwartz, Breaking With Tradition: Women and Work, The New Facts of Life (New York: Warner, 1992), ch. 3.

the most serious errors that has resulted from a misunderstanding of the biblical categories of sacred, common, and profane is the false distinction between what is sometimes called full-time Christian service and secular employment. Full-time Christian service is regarded as sacred; secular employment is seen as common when not actually profane. This theological confusion has led to the retreat of Christians from leadership in the arts, industry, and most other fields. I consider this subject in greater detail later in this chapter.

Protestant Christians have generally been far more concerned about violations of God's ethical commands than His ritual boundaries. They rarely concern themselves with the crime of sacrilege, which was the ultimate sin of Adam.⁶ Part of their lack of concern is legitimate: the sacred spaces of the Mosaic covenant ended definitively with the death of Jesus and finally with the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. But part of their lack of concern is illegitimate, such as their denial of any national covenant in the New Covenant era and their downplaying (or outright denial) of the judicial aspect of the sacraments.

Under the Mosaic Covenant, however, things were very different. An inadvertent violation of God's commands was settled by paying the victim whatever he had lost as a result of the transgression. The ethical transgression covered by this law must have been a transgression of one of God's verbal boundaries; no human victim is identified here. God did not impose a 20% payment in addition to the sacrifice of a ram for the violation of a commandment (Lev. 5:17–18). But when someone violated a sacred space or sacred object, he violated God's word (the law) as well as the actual thing or space (Lev. 5:15–16). The transgression was a double boundary violation: word and place. The penalty was therefore greater.

C. Sacred Boundaries

There is so much confusion over the relationship between the sacred and the common that interpreters have tended to misrepresent the relationship. They have confused the common with the profane. This false interpretation has undermined Christian social and ethical theory whenever it has appeared. It makes the common appear as if it were a realm "naturally" opposed to grace and ultimately beyond grace—legitimately so in history. This places a boundary around grace. The interpreters have not understood that every created thing begins as common and remains common unless judicially sanctified: actively set apart by God or His law. Nothing begins as profane; it must become profane, just as something becomes sanctified. This may seem like a minor point, but it is not, as we shall see.

6. Chapter 4:C.

The sacred here refers to the sacramental, i.e., having to do with the twin covenantal signs of ecclesiastical subordination: in the Mosaic Covenant, circumcision and Passover; in the New Covenant, baptism and the Lord's Supper. The word sacrament comes from the Latin word sacramentum, a military oath of enlistment.⁷

Anything that violates these holy things of the Lord is considered profane. In contrast, anything that violates a non-holy thing is not considered profane. Such a violation is illegal, but it is not profane. This is the heart of my thesis in this chapter: the association of the biblical concept of profane with unique acts of violation, namely, violations of a boundary surrounding a judicially holy place or holy object. Profanity in the broadest sense is a breach of a judicial wall of separation between the holy and the common.

Leviticus 5:14–19 offers evidence of a judicial distinction between the sacred and the common, but this difference is minimal in the case of unintentional transgressions: a 20% penalty for violating either a sacred object or sacred space (vv. 15–16). What kind of boundary had been transgressed? Was it geographical? This seems unlikely. We know that the common Israelite was not permitted to enter the inner core of the temple, on threat of death (Ex. 28:43). He would never have been in a position to commit a tabernacle or temple trespass in ignorance. Furthermore, no common priest in his right mind would have tried to enter the holy of holies. He could not have committed such a transgression ignorantly. So, the element of the sacred here must refer to something broader in scope than the performance of temple rituals.

James Jordan wrote that the trespass offering “desanctified Israelites who contacted a holy thing and thereby came under the specially strict laws of the priesthood—a dangerous position to be in unless you had been consecrated as a priest. Since its purpose was to remove this ‘priestly’ danger, it was always a male sheep (ram).”⁸ Judicially, this was Eve's problem. Adam was the priest, yet she approached the tree and ate first, whether or not he was present, whether or not he was an accomplice (as Jordan believes he was). When a judicially non-sanctified agent comes into contact with something explicitly set apart by God, he has committed a trespass. For this trespass, a special offering is required by God. Under the Mosaic law, this was a ram.

7. “Sacrament,” in Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, eds. John M'Clintock and James Strong, 12 vols. (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), IX, p. 212.

8. James Jordan, “The Whole Burnt Sacrifice: Its Liturgy and Meaning,” Biblical Horizons Occasional Paper, No. 11, p. 2.

If we are properly to understand the nature of each type of transgression in Leviticus 5:14–19—each type of boundary violation—we must first understand what the idea of the sacred meant under the Old Covenant. Then, and only then, can we begin to understand the meaning of the Bible’s concept of the profane.

D. Profane Violations of the Sacred

What “the sacred” refers to is something pertaining to the ecclesiastical activity of the priesthood in its broadest sense. Something that belongs to God must not be misused or appropriated unlawfully. Something delegated for exclusive use by God’s priesthood must not be used by an unauthorized agent, or used in an unauthorized way by an authorized agent.

1. False Interpretations

To understand what this improper (profane) usage might have been, we need first to consider what it could not have been. To do this, we must consider false interpretations—some ancient, some modern—of the biblical distinction between sacred and common. But before we consider these false interpretations, it is imperative that we recognize that in the Bible, the contrast between sacred and profane is never a contrast between a sacred object or place and a geographically separate object or place. The biblical contrast of sacred vs. profane is between a sacramental object or place and something common, i.e., something non-sacramental, that is unlawfully inside a sacred boundary.

Both realms on each side of the boundary are judicially legitimate: the sacred realm and the common realm. The contrast in Leviticus 5:14–16 is not between the sacred and the common; it is the contrast between sacred and profane. Christians can better understand the biblical distinctions between “sacred vs. common” and “sacred vs. profane” by considering the difference between a communion meal held during a worship service in church and a family meal eaten at home by a Christian family. Both meals are equally religious. Both meals are legitimately introduced by prayer. But only one meal is sacramental: the church's communion meal. What must be understood from the beginning of our discussion is this: the family meal is not profane. It is common, but it is not profane. Also, it is religious despite its legal status as common.

Gordon Wenham offered this useful pair of contrasts: common vs. holy (adjectives); profane vs. sanctify (verbs). "'Common' (hol) is likewise the reverse of 'holy' (qadosh), just as to 'profane' (hillel) is the converse of to 'sanctify' (qiddesh)."⁹ To profane and to sanctify: these are acts. This accurate pair of contrasts must itself be contrasted with a common error. The sacred is generally understood as a special thing or place (correct), while the profane is also said to be a thing or place (only partially correct and too often misleading).

Why is a thing or place identified as either sacred or profane? For example, a Mosaic priest could become profane by marrying a prostitute or a divorced woman (Lev. 21:7, 14). This was because he was judicially sanctified (set apart) by ordination. A prohibited marriage violated a sacred boundary: his office as a priest. Yet even skilled translators have been confused about the biblical meaning of profane. This grammatical confusion is a product of theological confusion: a failure to recognize "the profane" as a violated boundary of "the sacred," not a common place or thing.

It is incorrect to contrast an inherently sacred place with an inherently profane place. A sacred place has been made sacred by the judicial declaration of God or by a priest acting in God's name. It has been sanctified: set apart judicially. It is neither naturally nor metaphysically sacred. Similarly, there can be no naturally or metaphysically profane place in the way that there can be a naturally common place. A profane place is a violated sacred place. It has been the victim of an illegal trespass. The Hebrew word translated most frequently as "profane" (khaw-lawl) is usually translated as "slain."¹⁰ It is sometimes translated as "wounded" (I Sam. 17:52). This Hebrew word means pierced. It conveys the sense of some-one's having violated a boundary. The word is not used in the sense of a common place that just sits there being common. A common place cannot become profane, for it possesses no sacred boundary to trespass; only a sacred place can become profane.

9. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 19.

10. Num. 19:16; 19:18; 23:24; and dozens of other verses.

There is considerable confusion over the proper English translation of a Hebrew word related to khaw-lawl: khole. This word is defined by Strong as “common, profane (place), unholy.” It does not appear frequently in Scripture, unlike khaw-lawl. It was translated by the King James translators as “unholy” (Lev. 10:10),¹¹ “common” (I Sam. 21:4–5),¹² and “profane” (Ezek. 22:26¹³ 42:20,¹⁴ 44:23;¹⁵ 48:15¹⁶). Modern translators translate khole almost randomly as “common,” “ordinary,” “profane,” and “unholy.” There seems to be no clear pattern of Hebrew usage in the texts. Ezekiel 42:20 and 48:15 are the only Old Testament passages in which khole is used with respect to space. The word should not be translated in these verses as “profane,” but rather as “unholy” or “common.” The biblical usage of “profane” points to a boundary violation. This usage does not apply in the two Ezekiel passages.

11. The King James reads: “And that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean” (Lev. 10:10). The Revised Standard Version agrees. The New American Standard translates it as “profane.”

12. The King James reads: “And the priest answered David, and said, There is no common bread under mine hand, but there is hallowed bread; if the young men have kept themselves at least from women. And David answered the priest, and said unto him, Of a truth women have been kept from us about these three days, since I came out, and the vessels of the young men are holy [kodesh], and the bread is in a manner common, yea, though it were sanctified [kodesh] this day in the vessel” (I Sam. 21:4–5). The Revised Standard Version agrees. The New American Standard translates khole in verse 4 as “consecrated”; in verse 5 as “ordinary.” The historical context was the shew-bread.

13. The King James reads: “Her priests have violated my law, and have profaned mine holy things: they have put no difference between the holy and profane, neither have they shewed difference between the unclean and the clean, and have hid their eyes from my sabbaths, and I am profaned among them” (Ezek. 22:26). The Revised Standard Version translates it as “common”; the New American Standard Version as “profane.”

14. The King James reads: “He measured it by the four sides: it had a wall round about, five hundred reeds long, and five hundred broad, to make a separation between the sanctuary and the profane place” (Ezek. 42:20). The Revised Standard Version translates it as “common”; the New American Standard Version as “profane.”

15. The King James reads: “And they shall teach my people the difference between the holy and profane, and cause them to discern between the unclean and the clean” (Ezek. 44:23). The Revised Standard Version translates it as “common.” The New American Standard Version translates it as “profane.”

16. The King James reads: “And the five thousand, that are left in the breadth over against the five and twenty thousand, shall be a profane place for the city, for dwelling, and for suburbs: and the city shall be in the midst thereof” (Ezek. 48:15). The Revised Standard Version translates it as “ordinary.” The New American Standard Version translates it as “common.”

2. The Sacramental

What is “the sacred,” biblically speaking? It is not merely the religious sensibility in man, a need analogous to the need for food or sex, as modern academic usage would have it.¹⁷ Rather, it has to do with the church’s sacraments. In its narrowest sense, the sacred refers to formal ecclesiastical acts of covenantal subordination: applying the covenant mark (circumcision, baptism) and partaking of the covenant meal (Passover, Lord’s Supper). That which pertains to the sacred is formally under the authority of an ordained church officer. This officer’s task is to restrict certain people’s access beyond certain specified judicial boundaries. These boundaries are always legal and are sometimes spatial.

There is a biblical distinction between the sacred and the profane, yet they are always linked. A sacred act involves the lawful crossing of a sacred boundary, meaning a boundary guarded by ordained priests. A profane act is the unlawful crossing of a priestly boundary, meaning a judicially segregated area of atonement. The transgressor has either invaded sacred space or has misused a sacred object that has been set aside by God for a particular use. The essence of the distinction between sacred and profane, biblically speaking, is judicial rather than metaphysical. The profane act is ritually unauthorized, either because of the legal status of the transgressor (a non-priest) or because of restrictions placed by God against specific acts by even a priest. It is the crossing of the boundary that constitutes the profane act.

The key theological questions regarding the Old Covenant’s liturgically sacred spaces or objects are these: Was the specified ritual a means of (1) imparting independent metaphysical power to the participants; or (2) symbolically identifying members of an ecclesiastically separate community; or (3) publicly identifying the legal status of those who were covenantally bound together? Put another way, was “the sacred” metaphysical, symbolic, or covenantal? We can ask the same question about New Covenant rituals, too.

17. Philosopher Allan Bloom argued that modern American thought, under the influence of German sociology, has replaced the ideas of God and religion with the all-embracing idea of “the sacred.” Wrote Bloom: “This entire language, as I have tried to show, implies that the religious is the source of everything political, social and personal; and it still conveys something like that. But it has done nothing to reestablish religion—which puts us in a pretty pickle. . . . As the religious essence has gradually become a thin, putrid gas spread out through our whole atmosphere, it has gradually become respectable to speak of it under the marvelously portentous name the sacred.” Allan Bloom, The Closing of the American Mind (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987), pp. 214–15. He was on target: “These sociologists who talk so facetiously about the sacred are like a man who keeps a toothless old circus lion around the house in order to experience the thrills of the jungle.” Ibid., p. 216; cf. 230. The popularity of this theme, according to Mircea Eliade, began with the publication in 1917 of Rudolph Otto’s Das Heilige (The Sacred): Eliade, The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion, trans. Willard Trask (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1957] 1961), p. 8.

There are three (and only three) internally consistent answers. A person’s answer, if followed consistently, will strongly influence his social theory.¹⁸ First, the sacred ritual act or the sacred space is autonomously, metaphysically powerful; to violate it unleashes cosmic or supernatural forces (realism).¹⁹ Second, the sacred ritual act or sacred space is merely symbolic: it serves only to manifest the ethical condition of the participants (nominalism).²⁰ Third, the sacred ritual act or sacred space is judicially protected by God: a boundary that invokes (calls forth) God’s sanctions, both historical and eternal, in terms of His Bible-revealed law (covenantalism).²¹

E. Adam’s Transgression

The best way biblically to answer this debate over the nature of the sacred is to consider Adam’s transgression. When God announced a judicial boundary around the forbidden tree, did He invest the tree and its fruit with special properties that would automatically produce certain results if touched or eaten? Or was the tree merely symbolic, hav-

18. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 34–39. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>). I want to write a book called Sanctions and Social Theory, which will consider in detail these three perspectives. I probably won’t.

19. Realism asserts that there is a fundamental unity of being throughout the universe. Everything is inherently connected. In other words, “as above, so below”: the reigning view of all magical systems. Plato was the great philosopher of realism, as were the neoplatonists after him.

20. Nominalism asserts that everything is inherently unconnected in the universe. The connections that appear to exist are merely conventional, i.e., thinking makes them so. David Hume was the great modern philosopher of nominalism, and before him, William of Occam.

21. Covenantalism asserts a fundamental distinction between the being of God and the being of creation: the Creator-creature distinction. God literally spoke creation into existence: a fiat act (Gen. 1). He holds creation together by a continuing act of will. All of the connections within the creation are based ultimately on the judicial decrees of God. Because these connections are ultimately judicial, all of nature was cursed when Adam rebelled (Gen. 3:17), and looks forward to redemption (Rom. 8:22). John Calvin was the great theologian of covenantalism; Cornelius Van Til was his most philosophically consistent heir. Johannus Althusius (c. 1600) was the only major—in my opinion, the only—modern political philosopher of covenantalism until Rushdoony appeared.

ing no express judicial relationship with God, but only giving Adam an opportunity to prove himself faithful or not? Or was the tree set apart as a unique place of communion, a place declared by God as off-limits to Adam? We need to consider the three views of the sacred and their respective analyses. The first two answers conform to the philosophical categories of realism and nominalism. Both are incorrect. The third position conforms to the biblical category, covenantalism.

1. Metaphysical Boundary

We know that their eyes were immediately opened after they ate. They recognized their own nakedness and guilt. Was the fruit itself the source of their discontinuous change of perception? Was the tree a gateway to cosmic forces of illumination, a “cosmic tree,” to use the language of pagan mythology?²² Did it mark “the center of the world,” the supreme sacred space?²³ Could Adam and Eve somehow manipulate these cosmic forces to gain further knowledge or power? Was the forbidden tree a microcosm that offered man power over the macrocosm, analogous to the voodoo doll’s supposed power to produce analogous effects in the thing represented by the doll? Could Adam and Eve achieve “unity of being” with the universe through subsequent forbidden feasts? Could they achieve self-transcendence? In short, could they become mini-gods, as Satan had promised Eve (Gen. 3:5)?

The Genesis account of their transgression informs us that immediately after their eyes were opened, the forbidden tree was no longer the focus of their interest. They did not seek additional fruit. They did not invoke cosmic forces to protect them or do their bidding. They paid no further attention to the tree. They did not act as though they believed the tree possessed any special properties other than its fruit, which was admittedly good to view and good to eat. Even the serpent said nothing further to them. There was no need for him to say anything. His words and work were over. Adam and Eve had performed the profane act. It was an act of judicial transgression: a trespass.

22. The cosmic tree was related to the idea of the cosmic mountain: the axis mundi or axis of the world—the line drawn through the earth which points to the pole star. It was the link between heaven and earth. See Mircea Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1958), p. 111; cf. 266–67, 271, 273–74. On the axis mundi, see the extraordinary, complex, and cryptic book on ancient mathematics, myth, and cosmology, Hamlet’s Mill: An essay on myth and the frame of time, by Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend (Boston: Gambit, 1969). It should be obvious what the source of these cosmic tree and cosmic mountain myths was: the garden of Eden, itself located on a mountain or raised area, for the river flowing through it became four rivers (Gen. 2:10).

23. Eliade wrote: “The tree came to express the cosmos fully in itself, by embodying, in apparently static form, its ‘force’, its life and its quality of periodic regeneration.” Patterns, p. 271.

It is clear that their new-found self-awareness was the product of self-judgment: they had evaluated their act of rebellion in the light of their new interpretation of God's word.²⁴ They did not rush to discover a chemical formula for an antidote to poison fruit. They also did not rush to discover a magical formula to protect themselves from the cosmic forces that the fruit had unleashed. They correctly understood that the fruit was not their problem; God's promised judgment was. The tree had meaning to them only in terms of God's legal boundary around it, which they had transgressed. The fruit was of no further interest or use to them. They referred to it again only under God's subsequent cross-examination. Any assessment of the fruit as a metaphysical object is erroneous. This brings us to the next possibility: the fruit as a symbolic boundary between God and man.

2. Symbolic Boundary

What about the tree's unique symbolic status? Was the response of Adam and Eve merely the product of an increase in their self-awareness, a perception induced solely by their act of transgression? In other words, was the tree merely a symbolic agency in the transformation of their own self-awareness, something like an ethical mirror? Was the transformational power of the tree merely psychological? In short, had the transformational power of the tree merely been imputed to it by Adam and Eve?

If the tree served solely as a symbol of man's ethical condition, then on what basis did the radical and discontinuous increase of their mutual self-awareness take place? What was it about eating forbidden fruit that produced their perception of nakedness? Their immediate concern was not that they feared that God would bring judgment against them sometime in the future; it was that they were immediately discomforted by their own nakedness. It was not that the now-partially denuded tree pointed symbolically to their completely denuded judicial condition in the eyes of God; it was that they experienced shame in their own eyes as judges. God had assigned a necessarily judicial task to them when He told Adam to guard the garden.²⁵ Adam's task was to announce preliminary judgment against Satan, for Satan had testified falsely regarding the character of God. "Hath God said?" the serpent had asked. But Adam and Eve had served instead as false judges, rendering judgment implicitly against God and explicitly against God's word.²⁶ Immediately, they recognized that they were wearing no "robes"—the mark of lawful judicial authority. They were judicially uncovered before each other. Their perceived dilemma had nothing further to do with the tree. Now the primary symbol of their spiritual condition was their own naked flesh. They sought to cover this revelation with fig leaves.

24. That it was a new interpretation is seen in their response: sewing fig leaf aprons rather than confessing their sin in prayer and seeking God's forgiveness.

God was not physically present in the garden immediately after their sin. He did not shout out a warning to them: "I said not to touch that!" He gave them time to respond, either as covenant-breakers or covenant-keepers. They responded as covenant-breakers. They knew that His negative sanctions were coming, but their immediate concern was not their nakedness in His eyes; it was nakedness in their own eyes. Later, they hid themselves from God when they heard Him coming; in the meantime, they felt a compulsive need to hide their flesh from each other.

They reacted as though the psychological effects of eating from a merely symbolic tree—their sense of shame regarding their own personal nakedness—could be successfully covered by the leaves of another fruit-bearing tree. A representative of the plant kingdom had been a crucial aspect of this crisis of perception, so they covered themselves with leaves. They did not slay the serpent or some other animal in their quest for a covering. They dealt with their sin symbolically: the tree had become to them a symbol of their transgression, and so their required coverings should be of a similar kind. They were wrong. Their problem was judicial, not symbolic. They had not transgressed a symbol; they had transgressed the boundary surrounding God's only restricted property. They had been involved in a boundary violation. It is not that some sacred object serves as man's ethical mirror; it is instead God's law that serves as the mirror.²⁷

25. "And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep [shaw-mar: guard] it" (Gen. 2:15).

26. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: [1987] 2012), Appendix E.

27. "For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass [mirror]: For he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was. But whoso looketh into

3. Judicial Boundary

“And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked” (Gen. 3:7a). The use of the passive voice here is significant. By whom were their eyes opened? Either by God directly or by their own consciences as God’s image-bearers. We are not told. What we are told is that prior to their act of transgression, their eyes were not open; afterwards, they were. This must mean that “open eyes” in this sense was judicial. They saw what they had done. They evaluated their new condition in the light of God’s warning. They understood at least some of the consequences. But, being in sin, they misjudged what would be required to cover the effects of their sin. They twisted their own self-judgment. They made it seem less important than it was, as if it were a sin suitable for self-atonement.

The tree served as a symbol only to the degree that it was set apart (sanctified) by God as His exclusive property. The tree did not reflect man or man’s psyche; it represented God as sovereign owner of the cosmos. Its status as a visible symbol (i.e., judicial evidence) of man’s covenant status was relevant only in terms of its own designated status as a sanctified object. It had been judicially and verbally set apart by God. The tree was therefore sacred. It was not to be touched or eaten by man until God removed the restriction. To violate this sacred object was to profane it. To eat from it meant death, not in the sense of a poison apple, nor in the sense of a prohibited metaphysical doorway to overwhelming cosmic forces, nor in the sense of a means of man’s self-realization of his own inherent evil, but in the sense of inevitable historical and eternal sanctions imposed by an absolute personal God. Eating from the tree changed man’s judicial status. This was a profane act. Adam became profane: entering the judicial status of God’s declaration, “Guilty as charged.” He became sacrilegious.²⁸

F. Sacred Objects, Sacred Space

Sacred objects and sacred space are familiar themes in the Old Testament. The Ark of the Covenant is an example of a sacred object: it was not to be touched. It had rings on its sides through which poles were to be inserted, so that no one would need touch it when moving it (Ex. 25:14). Furthermore, only the Levites were permitted to carry it the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed” (James 1:23–25).

28. Appendix A.

(Deut. 10:8). When one man dared to reach out to steady it as it was being moved, God struck him dead (I Chron. 13:9–10). When the Philistines brought the Ark into their territory, God struck down the image of their god, Dagon, and struck them with boils (I Sam. 5). They sent the Ark back to Israel on a cart pulled by oxen. They also placed gold objects into the cart as a trespass offering (I Sam. 6:8).²⁹ God dealt even more harshly with the Israelites at Beth-Shemesh, who dared to look into it. For this act of sacrilege, God struck over 50,000 of them (I Sam 6:19).³⁰

The interior of the Ark itself was sacred space. No one was allowed to look inside it. It was housed in the holy of holies, a sacred room inside the tabernacle and temple. Only the high priest was allowed to enter this space, and only once each year (Lev. 16:2). He had to sprinkle the interior with blood as a ransom payment for himself and the people (Lev. 16:14–15). In short, this most sacred of objects was surrounded by sacred space—in fact, layers of sacred space, beginning at the national borders of Israel.

What is easily misunderstood is the judicial character of these sacred objects and spaces. It is easy to misinterpret sacred objects and sacred spaces as metaphysical-magical, i.e., power-bearing and power-granting. This was the theme of the enormously popular movie, Raiders of the Lost Ark and its second sequel, Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade, which was another in a long Western heritage of fantasies regarding the holy grail.³¹ Through techniques of ritual manipulation—a variant of environmental determinism—the bearer of such objects supposedly achieves not only supernatural power but also self-transcendence. At the very least, he achieves mystical illumination.³² Crossing the bridge or gateway between heaven and earth is supposed-

29. That the profanation of the Ark of the Covenant was unintentional on their part is proven by the fact that they called their priests and divines to explain the cause of the visible judgments (I Sam. 6:3). They also placed the Ark on a cart drawn by oxen; the animals' selection of the path would tell them whether the Ark belonged back in Israel. By the terms of their test, if the oxen did not return to Israel, the Philistines could safely conclude that the simultaneous presence of the Ark and their boils was a coincidence (I Sam. 6:9).

30. It is not clear that He killed them.

31. The holy grail is popularly imagined as the chalice from which Christ and the disciples drank at the Last Supper. Occultists view it as the equivalent of the philosopher's stone: a means of self-transcendence, the escape from creaturehood. See, for example, Trevor Ravenscroft, The Spear of Destiny (New York: Bantam, [1973] 1974), p. 49.

32. The word used by Indiana Jones' archeologist father in The Last Crusade describing his experience with the grail was "illuminating."

ly achieved through possession of such objects and the ritually precise manipulation of them. The hypothetical chain of being between man and God is manifested through the possession of sacred objects or entry into sacred space. The primary concern of the manipulator is with precise ritual rather than ethics. His thinking is governed by the magical formula, “As above, so below.” E. M. Butler described the goal of magic; it is also the goal of modern social engineering: “The fundamental aim of all magic is to impose the human will on nature, on man or on the supersensual world in order to master them.”³³

This metaphysical interpretation of the sacred misses the point. The identifying feature of any sacred object is its unique judicial character. The sacred object brings man into the judicial presence of the covenant God who judges in time and eternity.

Inside the Ark of the Covenant were the two tablets of the law (Deut. 31:26). The Ark served as the earthly throne of God, the place where the high priest annually placated His wrath. This is why the holy of holies in which the Ark was housed was so holy. The biblical formula from which the magical formula is derived is overwhelmingly ethical and judicial: “On earth, as it is in heaven.” This phrase appears in the Lord’s Prayer as part of the identification of God’s name as holy—hallowed—and a call for kingdom justice in history: “After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven” (Matt. 6:9–10).³⁴

Sacred space is not magical space; it is judicially sanctified space. It has been hallowed—made holy, meaning set apart—by God. When a man enters it, he draws close to God judicially. God’s place of residence is His place of judgment. He sits on a throne of judgment. Sacred space is holy space: space which is legally marked off by God as the place of required covenantal ritual, where man meets God judicially on a regular basis. Without such lawful access, sacred space becomes a threat to man.³⁵ It is a place of judgment. Entering sacred space requires special acts of judicial separation by man. We read in Exodus: "And when the LORD saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses. And he said, Here am I. And he said, Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground" (Ex. 3:4–5). The soil within the boundary lines of God's place of residence was not ritually polluted for Old Covenant man; hence, wearing shoes was not ritually (judicially) appropriate. You removed them as your public acknowledgment that you were entering God's place of special judicial presence.³⁶ You had crossed a judicial boundary, so your normal behavior had to change.

33. E. M. Butler, Ritual Magic (San Bernardino, California: Borgo Press, [1949] 1980), p. 1.

34. It is significant that the call for the coming of the kingdom appears early in the Lord’s Prayer, prior to “give us this day our daily bread.” What we need to recognize is that this prayer is a covenant document structured in terms of the familiar five points: (1) transcendence (Father who is in heaven, holy name); (2) hierarchy (kingdom come: king rules); (3) law/dominion (God’s will—law—be done on earth as it is in heaven); (4) sanctions (daily bread, forgiveness of sins); (5) continuity/eschatology (deliverance from evil; hence, kingdom, power, and glory forever). Notice that the call for the kingdom to come on earth (#2), manifested by obedience to His law (#3), precedes the request for daily bread (#4). God’s kingdom on earth is therefore not to be regarded as exclusively eschatological; it is identified as historical and progressive, just as God’s provision of our daily bread is.

If God moves His place of earthly residence—the place of legal communion with man—sacred space necessarily moves with Him. Sacred space can move from place to place, just as the tabernacle was moved by the priests in response to God's glory cloud.³⁷ Sacred space may also be a fixed geographical area, as the temple was in ancient Israel. In the New Covenant order, sacred space moves with the sacraments; the place where the sacraments are lawfully offered is sacred space. Judicially to transgress this space or misuse the objects of the sacramental meal is to commit sacrilege. The threat of profanity was always judicial. Under the Mosaic covenant, this judicial threat was

35. The garden of Eden was such a sacred space. Because the tree of life was within its boundaries, God sealed off its boundaries with a flaming sword and angels. This meant that man was not permitted to come into God's presence there, for it was a place of absolute judgment. To eat sacramentally of the tree of life in an unlawful manner would have meant the attainment of perpetual temporal existence apart from covenantal obedience, i.e., hell.

36. This is still required in Islamic mosques.

37. Meredith G. Kline wrote: "God's theophanic glory is the glory of royal majesty. At the center of the heavens within the veil of the Glory-cloud is found a throne; the Glory is preeminently the place of God's enthronement. It is, therefore, a royal palace, site of the divine council and court of judgment. As royal house of a divine King, the dwelling of deity, it is a holy house, a temple. Yet the Glory is a not static structure, but mobile, for the throne is a chariot-throne, Spirit directed and propelled through the winged beings, a vehicle of divine judgment, moving with the swiftness of light to execute the sentence of the King." Kline, Images of the Spirit (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, 1980), pp. 17–18. Kline's concept of God's judgments in New Covenant history abandons all traces of the chariot-throne imagery and power. See Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978). For my response, see North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 7.

primarily manifested geographically, i.e., an invasion of protected space. The judicial aspect of sacred space was understood far less clearly during the Old Covenant era.

G. Sacred Space in the New Covenant Era

The primary boundaries of life are legal-covenantal. This is more evident today. The New Covenant has drastically reduced the element of the sacred in geographical boundaries, except insofar as there is legal ownership of property by a church. Sacrilege today does not mean the physical invasion of sacred space; it means the transgression of the church's rights of ownership, i.e., the legal immunities associated with ownership, most importantly, the church's legal right to exclude. This may include the right to exclude certain people from a church building under certain conditions,³⁸ but it means primarily the rights associated with the exclusion of people from the sacraments. For example, any attempt by the state to infringe on the right of a Trinitarian church to declare someone excommunicate is an act of sacrilege: a challenge to the lawful authority of the church. It is a profane act: a boundary violation.

A profound change came to the gentile world through the New Covenant. The covenantally unique judicial-geographical boundary system of ancient Israel's theocratic kingdom was extended to embrace all the nations through the church. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). Other nations—judicial collectives—are now told to establish a formal covenant with God. Jesus' Great Commission says: "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen" (Matt. 28:19–20). This is a comprehensive, world-transforming commission.³⁹ The invocation of these national covenants involve boundaries (nations), a covenant sign (baptism), covenant law ("observe all things"), a covenant promise (God's judicial presence), 38. An example would be the invasion of the Faith Baptist Church of Lewisville, Nebraska, by the local sheriff and his men in 1982. See H. Edward Rowe, The Day They Padlocked the Church (Shreveport, Louisiana: Huntington House, 1983).

39. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

and a time frame (to the end of the world).

1. Removing Boundaries

Other changes have taken place. In the New Covenant era, the ground is no longer cursed. The whole earth has been definitively cleansed by the historical death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ. Today we wear shoes in order to protect our feet, not because the ground is ritually cursed and therefore a threat to judicially holy people, as was the case in the Old Covenant. Unlike Muslims in mosques and worshippers in pagan temples, we do not take off our shoes when we come into the presence of God at church. During the Old Covenant era, from at least Abraham's time (Gen. 18:4), dirty feet meant defilement (Song of Solomon 5:3). Before entering the tabernacle, every person had to wash his feet (Ex. 30:20–21). Jesus told the apostles at the Last Supper that because He had washed their feet, they should wash each other's feet (John 13:14). Yet very few churches continue to practice the foot-washing ceremony of Christ's day, and none has substituted a shoe-shining ceremony. Why not? Because the ground is no longer cursed. Shaking the dust off one's feet is no longer a symbol of God's wrath, as it was in Jesus' day. There is no special dwelling place of God outside of the place of His special judicial presence during formal church worship: ceremonies bounded by time, space, and law, but not bounded by ritual standards of clean and unclean objects or clean and unclean people.

In the Mosaic Covenant, pork was prohibited. So were other kinds of flesh. (There were never any "clean-unclean" distinctions within the vegetable realm.) The Israelites were required to eat lamb at the Passover. Blood had to be shed, but not the blood of unclean animals. In the New Covenant, no meat is eaten at the communion meal. Products of the vegetable realm—bread and wine—are required. Why no meat? Because the shedding of judicially atoning blood is behind us. That any Christian could even hint at the possibility of the future re-establishment of the ritual slaying of lambs for a re-enacted Passover meal testifies to the failure of the modern church to preach the progressive conquest of nature by grace in history. The church is failing to preach the progressive restoration of all things through the judicial power delivered to Christians by means of Christ's ascension and the coming of the Holy Spirit.⁴⁰ Judicial peace between God and grace-redeemed man has definitively come, though not finally. We still await the day when lambs will sit down with lions (Isa. 65:25a); we do not await the restoration of temple sacrifices.

40. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview

2. Nature and Grace

The removal of sacred boundaries in the New Covenant does not imply that nature (the common) is somehow swallowing up grace (the sacred). It is not that nature is pushing grace into ever-smaller corners of man's existence. The Bible teaches that all of nature is sustained by God's grace, i.e., God's unearned gifts to men, beasts, and even demons. He gives us life, time, knowledge, and power, none of which is in any way autonomously deserved by the recipients. Ours is a providentially sustained world. In the New Covenant, as in the Old, nature does not swallow up grace. Both the sacred and the common are under grace.

God's special grace to His people—and only to His people—is the foundation, judicially (justification) and ethically (sanctification), of comprehensive transformation, both personal and cultural. Special grace is marked publicly by the presence of church sacraments. After baptism, grace is empowered spiritually by the Lord's Supper, but it is not restricted to (bounded by) the Lord's Supper. Special grace also operates in the realm outside the institutional church: in family and state covenants, and in all the other social institutions that are under the lawful jurisdictions (plural) of family and state.

Not only does nature not swallow up grace in history, the realm of common grace is steadily transformed by special grace, either through widespread conversions or by example and imitation by the unconverted for the sake of the external positive sanctions associated with external covenant-keeping.⁴¹ To deny that common grace is affected by what takes place in the realm of special grace is necessarily to deny the covenantal basis of New Covenant history: progress or decline in terms of covenant-keeping. The directionality of history then loses its character as biblically progressive; its events becomes random, covenantally speaking. *History is then seen as linear but not progressive.*⁴² This is the theological error of amillennialism. It is seen in its most consistent form in the theology of the tiny Protestant Reformed Church, a Dutch-American denomination, which denies the existence of common grace and aggressively rejects postmillennialism.⁴³ It also remains silent on biblical law and its sanctions.

(Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

41. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

42. This is Meredith G. Kline's view of New Covenant history: "Comments on an Old-New Error," op. cit.

H. Profanity, Priesthoods, and Pagans

I have argued that the fundamental distinction between sacred and common has to do with the judicial status of the object or space in question. The distinction between sacred and common is not “magic vs. convention” or “religious vs. secular.” It is rather the distinction between sacramental and non-sacramental. The separation between sacred and profane is a very different kind of distinction from the distinction between sacred and common. The distinction between sacred and profane is the distinction between that which is authorized sacramentally and that which is unauthorized sacramentally. Adam became profane in his act of rebellion. He violated a sacred boundary.

Because we enter into the judgmental presence of God during the worship service, Christians do enter sacred space. But this space is sacred because of the judicial presence of God, not because any special attribute attaches to a geographical area. Sacred space and sacred time lose their sacred character when formal corporate worship ends. These acts of worship are sacred only because they are performed in the judicial presence of the ultimate sacred space, the throne of God. The discontinuity—the boundary—between sacred and common is judicial. This discontinuity is radical. This is why Paul warns potential participants in the Lord’s Supper to judge themselves before partaking. “But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord’s body. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep” (I Cor. 11:28–30). No other meal kills people judicially.

This emphasis on the radical discontinuity between sacred and common raises an important question: Why was there only a 20% additional penalty for unpremeditated profane transgressions of the sacred in Leviticus 5:16? This relatively minimal penalty does not seem to reflect the magnitude of the judicial distinction between sacred and common. On the other hand, if the 20% penalty is the judicial standard of this differentiation, is there a more fundamental distinction than “sacred vs. common”? To answer these questions, we need to understand the biblical meaning of profanity.

43. David J. Engelsma, Christ’s Spiritual Kingdom: A Defense of Reformed Amillennialism (Redlands, California: Reformed Witness, 2001).

1. Profanity

The use of “profane” in the Bible occurs most frequently with respect to the misuse of God’s name. Verbal profanity, as distinguished from verbal obscenity, is sometimes an unauthorized invocation of a judicial oath: the curse of God. Ultimately, it is a self-maledictory oath: “May God destroy me if I do not fulfill the terms of His covenant.” This is the verbal transgression of a judicial boundary: he who is common is using a sacred means of bringing sanctions—a verbal act that is judicially sanctioned by God only for the ordained holder of a covenantal office. Profanity involves either the misuse of God’s name for one’s own purposes or the performance of ritual acts that misrepresent God. It always involves a boundary violation. This is why the third commandment—“Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain; for the LORD will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain” (Ex. 20:7)—is third: it prohibits the transgression of a boundary (point three of the biblical covenant model). Transgressing a covenantal boundary produces a new judicial status in the transgressor: guilty.

What kind of boundary is this? It is a verbal or ritual boundary that publicly manifests the covenant. This is an act of formal covenant-breaking—not just the transgression of one of the stipulations of the covenant, but the covenant itself.

And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Molech, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD (Lev. 18:21).

And ye shall not swear by my name falsely, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD (Lev. 19:12).

And I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people; because he hath given of his seed unto Molech, to defile my sanctuary, and to profane my holy name (Lev. 20:3).

They shall be holy unto their God, and not profane the name of their God: for the offerings of the LORD made by fire, and the bread of their God, they do offer: therefore they shall be holy (Lev. 21:6).

Speak unto Aaron and to his sons, that they separate themselves from the holy things of the children of Israel, and that they profane not my holy name in those things which they hallow unto me: I am the LORD (Lev. 22:2).

Something has been set apart by God for His own use. It is therefore holy. It is sanctified or hallowed. God places special boundaries around these objects, and these boundaries can lawfully be penetrated only on God's publicly specified terms. The name of God is one of these holy objects. Since only the priest—a man who has been set apart judicially by God so that he can draw close to God's place of judgment—is authorized to pass through these boundaries, any violation of these boundaries is inherently a priestly act. Violators become profane.

2. Priesthoods

Profanity in the Old Covenant era, and also in the New Covenant era, was primarily a priestly misrepresentation of God, either in sacramental word or sacramental deed, such as offering one's child to another god in an act of formal covenant-breaking with Israel's God. In short, profanity is a covenant-breaking or covenant-denying priestly act. Profanity is distinguished judicially from non-sacramental violations of God's moral law. It is a violation of God's priestly law.

Those under the jurisdiction of God's ecclesiastical covenant—i.e., under His spoken legal word—are uniquely authorized by God to speak and act in particular ways. This means that they are bound—i.e., under judicial boundaries—to speak and act in these specified ways. They have been granted a covenantal monopoly. It is a monopoly—special legal status—in both the positive and negative sense: special duties, special penalties. Certain acts must be done in certain ways by certain people. These acts are representative acts. They are hierarchical, as in priestly (hierus).⁴⁴ At the same time, being legally representative, only representatives are allowed to perform them. These acts must be done by someone (inclusive), and they must not be done by someone else (exclusive). These acts are therefore mediatorial.

As God's designated legal representative on earth and in history, the Mosaic Covenant priest's language and conduct had to represent God faithfully. His special legal status carried greater legal liability. Ignorantly speaking or acting in an illegitimate but non-sacramental fashion necessarily invoked (“called forth”) a particular penalty. Ignorantly speaking or acting illegitimately in a sacramental fashion invoked a marginally greater penalty: one-fifth. Why only marginal? Because the marginal difference between the sanctions that distinguished the sacred from the common pointed judicially to the near-sacred character of everything in Israel. It testified to the special judicial status of the promised land as a nation of priests (Ex. 19:6). Legal access to sacred judicial space is the key to a correct understanding of the sacred-common distinction and the sacred-profane distinction.

44. Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. Gerhard Kittel, trans. Geoffrey W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965), III, pp. 257–65.

(a) Distinctions Within Perfection

Let us return to the archetype example: the heaven-hell distinction. Better yet, consider this: the post-resurrection new heavens, new earth (Rev. 21) vs. the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15). Dwelling in the post-resurrection new heavens and new earth, there will be nothing but perfect humans. This includes Jesus Christ. The perfect humanity of Jesus Christ will possess greater holiness than the perfect humanity of everyone else. By the intervention of the Holy Spirit, Jesus was conceived in perfection, unlike all other post-Adamic humans, and then sustained His salvation through His perfect obedience to God’s law. Nobody else can do this in history. He now lawfully sits beside God the Father on the throne; no one else does. But the difference in the degree of holiness (set-apartness) between Jesus Christ’s perfect humanity—not His divinity—and the resurrected saint’s perfect humanity will be of far less magnitude than the disparity between the resurrected covenant-keeper’s perfect humanity and the resurrected covenant-breaker’s morally perverse humanity. The resurrected saint will have eternal legal access to God’s throne of grace; the resurrected covenant-breaker will not.

Similarly, the priest’s judicial holiness in ancient Israel was greater than the common Israelite’s holiness, but the magnitude of judicial separation between an ordained priest and an Israelite was far less than the difference between an Israelite and an uncircumcised person living outside the land. Priests and Israelites participated in Passover. Uncircumcised men and the women under the authority of uncircumcised men did not.

(b) Degrees of Holiness

Leviticus 5:14–19 deals with transgressions committed in ignorance. Thus, the distinction here between sacred and common was not intended to focus on the radical difference between heaven and hell. It was intended to distinguish priestly activities in Israel from routine activities in Israel. Because so much of Israel's daily life was judicially closer to God than the same activities performed outside the land, i.e., acts performed by those who were not under the Mosaic covenant, it was easier to commit a boundary violation inadvertently within Israel. The Israelites were all far closer to God judicially than were uncircumcised pagans who lived outside the boundaries of the land. The Israelites served as priests to the whole world: representative agents between God and pagan mankind.⁴⁵ They were guardians of a boundary. The priests served as God's representative agents mediating between Israel and God. They, too, were guardians of a boundary. The magnitude of the covenantal separation of the second boundary was not nearly so great as the magnitude of the first.

There were degrees of culpability and responsibility under the Mosaic Covenant. This fact was reflected in the degrees of official holiness—holiness of office and holiness of behavior—that were required as one approached the holy of holies, the place where God dwelt judicially. The high priest could go into the holy of holies to offer sacrifice only once a year. He was under tight restrictions; if he performed his task in an unauthorized fashion, he would be struck dead (Ex. 28:33–35). The closer someone came to God's geographical place of judgment, the more vulnerable to God's sanctions he became (Num. 3).⁴⁶ A series of judicial boundaries marked one's movement away from the holy of holies and out of the land.⁴⁷ These boundaries marked a reduction in monopoly legal status as men moved away from the temple and toward the world of paganism.

3. Pagans

It is common to speak of the religious condition of the pagan as profane. Everything he does supposedly is profane. But this raises a theological problem: How can his legal status be profane if he is so far from God judicially? If it is true that profanity, biblically speaking, is 45. This is why they sacrificed 70 bullocks at the feast of trumpets (Num. 29): to offer atonement for the 70 nations (the world).

46. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 3.

47. James Jordan, Through New Eyes: Developing a Biblical View of the World (Brentwood, Tennessee: Wolgemuth & Hyatt, 1988), ch. 15. (<http://bit.ly/jjneweyes>) legally a violation of some priestly aspect of covenant law, how can the pagan accurately be said to be a profane person? In the Mosaic Covenant era, sacred objects and sacred space were exclusively inside the geographical boundaries of Israel. The pagan could violate no priestly boundaries if he was outside the land of Israel. How could the pagan have committed a profane act? To answer this question, we need to discuss the legal status of the pagan.

The pagan in the Mosaic-era Covenant was an uncircumcised male, or a female not under the lawful jurisdiction of a circumcised male,⁴⁸ who lived outside the covenant: no legal access to Passover. Most pagans lived outside the geographical and cultural boundaries that God had drawn around His people as their protected area of dominion. Within these judicial boundaries, a unique system of law prevailed.⁴⁹ The question then arises: How unique? This raises the fundamental issue of theonomy.

The pagan was under a temporal and eternal obligation to obey all of God's civil laws except those that applied explicitly to the administration of the land of Israel, which means primarily the jubilee land laws (Lev. 25)⁵⁰ and the laws of ritual defilement and cleansing: the laws marking the holiness—i.e., set-apartness—of the Israelite nation of priests. God did not give to the pagan nations a judicial revelation of His holiness comparable to that which He gave to those inside the land. The Israelites were unique: greater revelation, greater responsibility.

This does not mean that pagan nations of the Mosaic era were legitimately under different moral standards, i.e., not under the moral requirements and civil sanctions of the Ten Commandments. Bahrensen's comments are appropriate: "The fact that God was dealing with Israel in a redemptive and covenantal fashion, and not setting His electing love upon any other nation (cf. Amos 3:2),⁵¹ did not introduce a disparity or difference in moral standards between Israel and the nations. All those who wander from God's statutes—indeed, all the wicked of the earth—are condemned by God, according to Psalm

48. An exception was a widow or divorced wife of an Israelite. She had the authority to take a vow without confirmation by husband or father (Num. 30:9).

49. The link between law, boundaries, and dominion is basic to the biblical covenant model: point three.

50. These laws were an aspect of the original conquest of the land, i.e., the military spoils of a one-time event.

51. "You only have I known of all the families of the earth: therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities."

119:118–119.”⁵² This passage in Psalms reads: “Thou hast trodden down all them that err from thy statutes: for their deceit is falsehood. Thou puttest away all the wicked of the earth like dross: therefore I love thy testimonies.”

The Mosaic-era pagan was always under the non-geographical and un-priestly stipulations of God’s covenant law. This means that he was not under the rules that applied to the ecclesiastical priests of Israel. He did not possess their priestly status. He did not come close to Israel’s sacred spaces. Then how could he have been profane? Only as a son of Adam. What Adam imparted to his heirs was his judicial status as a covenant-breaker, that is, a sacred boundary violator. Adam served as a legal representative for all mankind. He was mankind’s high priest. He administered lawful access to the two sacred trees. These two trees were the only sacred objects in the garden. They grew in the sacred places where man could eat a sacred meal of communion with his God. Only one tree was prohibited to him: the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Adam violated the boundaries—physical and temporal—of this prohibited tree, i.e., profaned it. By eating of it prematurely and in direct violation of God’s law, Adam ate in communion with his god, Satan. He thereby became a profane man—the most profane man in history.⁵³

Every pagan son of Adam is profane in a general sense: as God’s image-bearer who broke the covenant. As a covenant-breaker on his own, he is not testifying accurately in word and deed to the moral character of the Creator. He begins life as a covenant-breaker: an heir of Adam, the high priest who committed sacrilege representatively for all mankind. Because he is born with this judicial status, he does not become a profane person by his self-consciously profane acts. He merely identifies himself as a judicially profane person in history. He progressively works out in history the legal status he was born with—a kind of perverse form of progressive sanctification. He sets himself apart from God both judicially and morally as time goes on: negative progressive sanctification. (Perhaps we should call this process regressive sanctification.) Nevertheless, the Old Covenant era pagan was not profane in a Mosaic priestly sense. He was not a designated priest of

52. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God’s Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), pp. 237–38. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

53. Some might argue that Judas Iscariot’s profanity exceeded Adam’s. His act of rebellion against the person of Jesus Christ was committed in defiance of greater revelation than Adam had been given.

God.⁵⁴ He was outside the formal boundaries of God's covenant with national Israel. So, in a general Adamic sense he was a profane person; in a specific Mosaic sense, he was not.

I. What Constituted “Ignorant Profanity”?

It has taken me considerable space—none of it sacred—to get to the question of what, exactly, the law of Leviticus 5:14–19 referred to. A profane act under the Old Covenant necessarily involved the church, for it involved some aspect of the sacraments, i.e., the priesthood. To violate the office of priest, either as a priest or as a layman, was considered profane. If done in ignorance, there was an added penalty of one-fifth.

There was an ownership principle involved. God had established legal boundaries around the sacraments: spatial boundaries and liturgical boundaries. These were ultimately ownership boundaries, analogous to the boundary He placed around the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. That which belongs exclusively to God is specially protected by law. Jesus' distinction between God and Caesar would apply here: render to each what is lawfully claimed by each (Matt. 22:21).⁵⁵ God is sacred; Caesar is common. (It was this confession that later became the legal basis of the Roman Empire's persecution of Christians.) Jesus' distinction between God and mammon would not apply here: no one should ever serve mammon. No one should ever be profane (Mammon: false worship). What was established in Leviticus 5:14–19 was a legal distinction between sacred and common, not between sacred and profane. That which is common cannot be profaned.

What did the church in the Mosaic Covenant require? The sacrifice of unblemished animals, for one thing. What if a man had ignorantly offered an animal with a defect—a disease, for example? He had

54. Prior to the Mosaic law, there were such priests: e.g., Melchizedek, Jethro, and Balaam. Balaam was the last of them, a transitional figure who apostatized in his confrontation with Moses, yet who still possessed powers and insights given to him by God. These priests, who were outside the ethnic boundaries of the people of Israel, had been granted their legal status by God prior to the establishment of the geographical boundaries of national Israel.

55. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 44. Because God places Caesars on the throne who unlawfully claim far more than a tithe, we are usually to obey even the unlawful claims. God brings such men to power in order to judge us. However, God allowed Jeroboam to revolt against Rehoboam in protest against Rehoboam's taxes (I Kings 12).

mistakenly brought the wrong animal to the altar. He owed another animal, plus a penalty payment of one-fifth. Since he could not kill one-fifth of an animal, a monetary equivalent according to the shekels of the temple was allowed. To offer a blemished animal was the equivalent of stealing from God—profaning His table-altar (Mal. 1:8–12). God’s warning was clear: “But ye have profaned it, in that ye say, The table of the LORD is polluted; and the fruit thereof, even his meat, is contemptible” (Mal. 1:12).

What else would have come under the law against profanity? Tithes. The tithes were to be set aside to God. They were His property, collected and administered solely by the Levites. To refuse to pay a tithe to the local Levite was the legal equivalent of stealing from God (Mal. 3:8–9). If a person discovered in retrospect that he had earned more net income than he had originally calculated, he owed more to God. This would have been an unintentional transgression. He now owed the tithe, plus an animal sacrifice, plus an extra 20% on that portion of the tithe that he had neglected to pay. If he had earned an additional ten ounces of silver, he owed, first, an additional ounce to the Levite. He would also have been required to offer an animal sacrifice, plus pay an additional one-fifth of an ounce to the Levite.

A person might also have made a complicated vow to God. If he neglected to fulfill all of its terms, he would have owed the extra payment.

J. New Covenant Sanctions

In the New Covenant era, as in the Mosaic era, the general status of priest, which is inherited by all men from Adam through physical birth, must be distinguished from (1) the special status of priest, which is inherited from Jesus Christ, the second Adam (I Cor. 15:45), through legal adoption (Eph. 1:3–6), and also from (2) the judicial office of priest, which is obtained only through ecclesiastical ordination. The first distinction between the priesthoods—special priest vs. general priest—reflects the fundamental difference between heaven and hell: saved and lost. The general priesthood is profane (heirs of Adam’s transgression); the special priesthood is not profane (heirs of God’s redemptive grace). This is not a marginal distinction. It marks a radical judicial distinction that far exceeds the distinction between the ordained church officer and the layman. The eternal sanctions are very different, so the degree of violation is different.

The second distinction is marginal: ordained special priest (guardian of the sacraments) vs. non-ordained special priest (guardian of the kingdom). The differing sanctions of Leviticus 5:14–19 reflect this marginal difference. In the Mosaic era, a profane act of transgression of the holy things committed in ignorance was of marginally greater magnitude than a violation of the commandments committed in ignorance. The first required a ram plus a 20% penalty (Lev. 5:16); the second did not: ram only (v. 18).

Today, pagans and priests are mixed together geographically. How could a covenant-breaker (“Adamic priest”) commit an unintentional act of sacrilege? There are no animal sacrifices today. He is not covenantally under the church. He does not pay tithes. He does not make vows to the church. There seems to be no easy way for him to commit an unintentional profane act. One example would be the case of a person who takes communion without being a church member, not understanding that to do so lawfully, he needs to be under church authority as a member. (Churches that practice open communion lure ignorant people into profanity.) But what would be the penalty? An additional one-fifth of what? Another example would be verbal profanity: calling down God’s negative sanctions against another person. Only ordained priests may do this publicly. In a culture in which such language has become common, this practice can become habitual, i.e., unintentional. It can go on only where biblical law is not enforced.

The civil government of every nation should impose sanctions against public verbal profanity, which is a form of assault. The third commandment is binding on all nations. No one is allowed by God to transgress the boundary placed around His name. No civil government ought to tolerate such transgressions. The inherited general status of priest to which all men are born as sons of Adam brings all men under God’s civil laws regarding profanity. It is on this legal basis, among others, that the civil government of a formally covenanted Christian nation could and should bring sanctions against certain practices of cults and rival religions: their public transgression of God’s sacramental boundaries. Sacrilege is a civil offense.

This fact is denied by defenders of religious pluralism, who regard pluralism as the civil manifestation of the sacred in history. This is why pluralism is in principle a violation of the third commandment. A refusal to defend God’s sacred boundaries places the civil magistrate, who acts as an ordained representative of both God⁵⁶ and society, in the legal position of an accomplice of those who do transgress them. Pluralism is a civil order that is established judicially by taking God's name in vain: the invocation of an oath to a false god who threatens to impose non-biblical sanctions.⁵⁷

Unintentional sacrilege seems far less likely in a modern nation that is not formally covenanted to God. That it could take place in Old Covenant Israel is clear. It is far less clear how laws against unintentional violations of priestly boundaries would apply today.

With this understanding of the sacred, we are now ready to investigate a series of false distinctions: ancient and modern, sectarian and academic, and fundamentalist-pietist. They must all be avoided if we are to do justice to the biblical distinction between sacred and common.

K. False Distinctions: Ancient and Modern Religion

There is no doubt that the realm of the sacred in ancient Israel was located inside specified geographical boundaries. The Bible does not even remotely suggest, however, that the larger realm outside these special geographical boundaries was an inferior place in terms of its inherent "being." If anything, the closer a man dwelt to sacred space in the Mosaic Covenant era, the more vulnerable he became to God's judgments. This is why an unpremeditated and unintentional violation of God's holy things bore an additional penalty of 20% – not overwhelming, but nonetheless a penalty. The sacred was a zone or object of greater ritual precision and deeper foreboding. It was something surrounded by a judicial boundary. What was to be feared here was the possibility of committing a profane act.

This biblical distinction between the judicially sacred and the judicially common has been subtly transformed by those affirming very different theological categories. Those who promote counterfeit covenants have attempted to shift the sacred-common distinction to

56. On the ministerial office of the civil magistrate: "For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil" (Rom. 13:3–4). Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

57. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/polpol>)

either a magical-metaphysical view (realism/organicism) or a symbolic-psychological view (nominalism/mechanism). Both approaches are theologically incorrect.

1. Realism: Sacred vs. Profane (Re-defined)

The Bible's judicial distinction—ritually and representatively—between the sacred and the non-sacramental (i.e., common) has almost universally been redefined as a contrast between the sacred and the profane, with anything that is not sacred defined as inherently profane. This is a very serious misunderstanding of the Bible's distinctions: sacred vs. common and sacred vs. profane. Adopting the familiar but erroneous distinction of sacred vs. profane, Hastings' Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics comments:

The etymology of the word "profane" (lit. "before or in front of the shrine") may give us a certain amount of guidance because of its spatial suggestiveness. There immediately arises in our minds the idea of a walled or fenced enclosure within which only peculiarly precious objects and specially privileged persons may remain, and outside of which there is a world of rigorously excluded persons and things having lesser assigned worth than those within. . . . Another idea, related to the foregoing and also suggested by the spatial etymology of the word 'profane,' is that of absolute, abrupt, and rigorous separation between the sacred and the profane. The sacred enclosure is definitely separated by [a] wall or some other effective protection from the profane world, and access from the one world to the other is only through a rigorously-guarded portal.⁵⁸

According to this view, the barrier marking off sacred space from profane space may be verbal, spatial, temporal, ritual, or a combination. A taboo marks the dividing line—line in this case may be metaphorical—between the two realms. The priesthood becomes a separate class of people based on their God-given access to the holy or set-apart objects. "Everywhere also elaborate ritual is accompanied by the most zealous care for the separation of the priestly class from the ordinary community."⁵⁹ The priests dwell in sacred space. Everyone else dwells in profane space.

The space outside of sacred space is seen as "the profane world." It is therefore unclean, cursed, or in other ways a second-class place of residence. Those who live there are themselves second-class citizens. There is supposedly a chain of being linking the higher realm of the sacred to the lower realm of the profane. Those dwelling in the “upper story” of the sacred possess more power and authority than those in the “lower story” of the profane. The sacred realm of “grace” is contrasted with the profane realm of “nature.” Grace is seen as metaphysically superior to nature, but it is the dwelling place of the few: the priesthood. Nature is seen as the dwelling place for the masses, where popular culture prevails.

58. "Profanity," in Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. James Hastings, 12 vols. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1918), X, pp. 378, 379.

59. Ibid., X, p. 380.

The Bible denies all this. It presents the entire world as under the grace of God, from the day that God clothed Adam in animal skins and sent him out of the garden. The garden was too holy for Adam and his heirs because it contained the tree of life, but the realm beyond the garden’s boundaries was in no way profane. It was common when compared to the garden; it was not profane. Both the garden and the world outside were equally part of nature: the created realm. The garden, however, was off-limits judicially because the tree of life was off-limits, just as the tree of the knowledge of good and evil had been off-limits. Adam had defied the earlier verbal boundary; this time, God placed angels and a flaming sword at the gate of entry (Gen. 3:24). The garden was holy; the world outside was common; but the world outside was not in any way profane.

(a) Nature and Grace

Given a false, metaphysical view of the sacred and the profane, men erroneously believe that nature swallows up grace in the realm of popular culture. Because nature is supposedly the larger realm outside the narrowly circumscribed sacred boundaries, it then becomes the dominant force in culture. Its laws are less rigorous, which means that its standards—ethical or ritual—are lower. Nevertheless, the realm of nature is inevitably dominant in culture, for its domain is far larger geographically and encompasses most people. In short, that which is inferior metaphysically becomes dominant culturally.

This false distinction between the sacred as a realm of existence for a religious elite and the profane as a separate realm of existence for the masses is an important key to a proper understanding of all non-Christian religions. In them, nature always swallows up grace. There is no hope for the masses of men. Nature controls them, even though they may seek to control nature. The historical power of the historical resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ is denied by such religions. That which is identified as the realm of grace—assuming such a realm is even admitted to exist—is believed to have authority and power only within the necessarily narrow boundaries of the sacred. Covenant-breaking man's goal is to restrict the influence of the sacred. Why? Because of its supernatural power and because of its superior moral authority. The sacred implies transcendent law, and transcendent law implies transcendent judgment. Covenant-breaking man's primary goal in life is to avoid transcendent judgment. He re-invents physical reality in order to further this goal.⁶⁰ In order to remove the sacred from his presence, he is also willing to redefine the biblical categories of sacred and profane, making the sacred a superior but completely separate realm which is closed to most people.

(b) Escaping Grace

Covenant-breaking man frequently seeks to deny the existence of grace. Men deny the relevance of God's grace in history because they deny the relevance of God's wrath in eternity. One cosmological approach denies the existence of the permanent judicial boundary separating history from heaven. The other approach denies the existence of eternity. The best example of the first is Hinduism. The best example of the second is humanism.

Hinduism is normally viewed as a deeply spiritual religion. It is deeply spiritual; it is nevertheless anti-grace. For the Hindu, nature is the realm of the masses; it is also the realm of illusion (maya). The true spiritual master is self-consciously involved in a lifetime pilgrimage—indeed, several thousand lifetime pilgrimages—to escape from the illusion of nature by becoming one with the non-historical Ultimate, in which all spatial and temporal distinctions disappear. But there is no grace in the system; the process is rigorously governed by karma—the impersonal ethical law of reincarnation. The spiritual goal is total escape from history.

The other representative way of denying grace is modern humanism. Men are told that there is no escape from history, meaning no grace that transcends it. The humanist's universe is a closed system: closed to God. There is only death, both individual and cosmic (the heat death of the universe).⁶¹ In both systems—spiritual Hinduism and materialist humanism—grace is not seen as a culture-transforming power in history. In the first system, God pays no attention to history, not having any conscious attention to pay. In the second system, there is no God to pay attention.

60. North, Is the World Running Down?, pp. 63–64.

61. Ibid., ch. 2.

The gods of ancient paganism were either animistic or civic. They were either gods of the household, including the fields within the household's boundaries, or else they were gods of the polis. They were not universal gods, except to the extent that a king might extend his personal power across geographical boundaries. The great chain of being encompassed warring gods and warring men. The gods manifested their power through specific men or cities. When a city lost a war, its gods also lost the war.⁶² Thus, the realm of the sacred was reflected in the affairs of the supposedly profane. It was believed by all except the Hebrews that mankind could call upon no god that is simultaneously personal and absolute.⁶³ Nature alone was seen as absolute, but impersonal. Nature eventually would swallow up grace. Stoicism and Epicureanism are examples of later classical ethical-philosophical systems in which grace disappeared.

2. Nominalism: Religious vs. Secular

Biblically speaking, everything is at bottom religious, for the whole creation is under God, both metaphysically (being) and covenantally (judicially). God created the cosmos, which is forever distinct from the unique being of God. There is a Creator-creature distinction.⁶⁴ Everything is therefore supposed to be formally and publicly acknowledged as being under God covenantally. But covenant-breaking man refuses to acknowledge that he lives under such a covenantal requirement. He seeks other gods to serve—gods that will respond to his authority and his ritual manipulations.

62. Numa Denis Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), III:XV.

63. Wrote theologian John Frame: "The non-Christian, of course, can accept an absolute only if that absolute is impersonal and therefore makes no demands and has no power to bless or curse. There are personal gods in paganism, but none of them is absolute; there are absolutes in paganism, but none is personal. Only in Christianity (and in other religions influenced by the Bible) is there such a concept as a 'personal absolute.'" John M. Frame, The Doctrine of the Knowledge of God (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1987), p. 17.

64. Cornelius Van Til, An Introduction to Systematic Theology, vol. V of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1961] 1978), pp. 11–12.

Covenantal subordination is built into the creation.⁶⁵ There is an inescapable hierarchy in all existence. There is no escape from some form of covenantal subordination, meaning religious subordination; men serve either God or mammon (Matt. 6:24).⁶⁶ Men see themselves and the world around them through religiously tinted spectacles. They view the world as covenantal subordinates of God or Satan.⁶⁷

In contrast, very few of life's activities are sacred. That which is sacramental is narrowly defined by God; it refers exclusively to the church of Jesus Christ in its unique, monopolistic capacity as the guardian and administrator of the sacraments. The church's administration of the sacraments corresponds to the priestly activities of circumcision and Passover in the Mosaic Covenant. While the head of the household was involved in both rituals, he administered the rites only in his judicial capacity as a household priest. He was always under formal ecclesiastical sanctions.

(a) Kant's Dialectic: Phenomenal/Noumenal

In modern thought, including modern fundamentalism, there is a familiar theme of "religious vs. secular."⁶⁸ That which is secular is defined as non-religious. The term "secular" is used as a substitute for man's autonomy. Secularism is inherently atheistic. Secular man assumes that atheism is the antithesis of religion, when it in fact is a deeply religious worldview.⁶⁹ This usage is colored by the presupposition of modern man that religion is the way of the subordinate person, who labors under non-scientific, non-physical restrictions, while the secular is the equivalent of autonomous. This dualism is basically a development of Kant's dialectic between the phenomenal and the noumenal.⁷⁰ The phenomenal realm is non-religious, autonomous, and secular: the deterministic realm of impersonal scientific cause and effect. The noumenal is the realm of the spiritual, the ethical, the irra-

65. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

66. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 14.

67. Jordan, Through New Eyes.

68. Gary North, "Publisher's Foreword," House Divided: The Break-Up of Dispensational Theology, by Greg L. Bahnsen and Kenneth L. Gentry (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), pp. xii–xix. (<http://bit.ly/gbkghouse>)

69. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American Society (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993).

70. Richard Kroner, Kant's Weltanschauung (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1914] 1956).

tional, the “uncaused,” i.e., human freedom.⁷¹

In both realms, noumenal and phenomenal, man is understood to be spiritually autonomous. Insofar as he dwells in the noumenal, Kantian man is responsible only to himself. Insofar as he dwells in the phenomenal, he is not responsible at all. He is the impersonally determined, cosmically irresponsible product of this world’s cause-and-effect forces. In neither case is he responsible to a Creator God. The “religious” realm is just another side of autonomous man: the nonrational side. It is to this extent inherently secular. Thus, modern usage misleads us: the “religious” in Kant’s world is as autonomous as the secular. The noumenal and the phenomenal represent two different, dialectical sides of man’s autonomy.⁷²

(b) The Denial of Hierarchy

What modern man denies with all his heart is the existence of a realm of judicial subordination to a God who judges men both in time and eternity. It is this condition of judicial subordination that Jesus warned His disciples to consider: “And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell” (Matt. 10:28). Modern man rejects such a hierarchical view of man’s place in the cosmos. This rejection of God’s sanctions has colored modern thought so completely that even Christians are doubtful that God brings predictable sanctions in history, and some Christian scholars actually deny that He does.⁷³

Nevertheless, there is no escape from hierarchy. It is a chain of command, not a chain of being. Man is under God; nature is under man; but God is not part of the “being” of man or nature. The God of the Bible is in no sense the god of pantheism. He is a covenantal God who issues commands through judicial representatives. Man will never become God, issuing orders as an ultimate sovereign, for man cannot evolve into God or replace God through revolution. The Mormons have a slogan: “What God is, man will become; what man is, God once was.” This is incorrect. What God is, man can never become. But here Christianity breaks with both Judaism and Islam, for Christianity teaches that what man is, the Son of God once was in history, and more than what man is: perfectly human, yet also divine, without intermixture. So announced the Athanasian creed (c. 430 A.D.).⁷⁴

71. Quantum physics represents the invasion of the phenomenal by the noumenal. See North, Is the World Running Down?, ch. 1; Fred Alan Wolfe, Taking the Quantum Leap: The New Physics for Non-Scientists (New York: Harper & Row, 1989). So does the newly developing chaos theory, pioneered by mathematician Benoit Mandelbrot. James Gleick, Chaos: Making a New Science (New York: Viking, 1987).

72. Cornelius Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969), pp. 63–64.

73. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 7.

Covenant-breaking man denies this chain of command, preferring instead the idea of a chain of being.⁷⁵ The chain-of-being philosophy of ancient paganism is reincarnated in modern humanism. Modern man simply inverts the chain-of-being hierarchy that prevails in pagan religions. Unlike the older pagan view, where the sacred was viewed as superior to the profane, for Enlightenment man the religious is subordinate to the secular. The “real world” is the realm of science and mathematics, of stock market profits and physical fitness exercises—what Sorokin called sensate culture.⁷⁶ The not-so-real world is said to be the realm of religion: prayers, rituals, dreams of heaven to come, and “pie in the sky by and by”—contemptuously dismissed as the realm of children and old women (of both sexes). It is the realm of symbols: meaningful only to those who believe in them, unlike the supposedly universal authority of reason and mathematics.⁷⁷ Those who dwell in the religious realm are generally thought of as failures: people who could not compete successfully in the real world, and who fled to the symbolic in search of “higher” meaning—a meaning that cannot be expressed in real-world categories, but which is invented by the very participants.

The great German sociologist Max Weber was caught on the horns of this dilemma—this inherent philosophical dualism—of modern humanism. He contrasted the sublime with the rational, yet he regarded the sublime as the realm of the weak. First, the sublime: “The fate of our times is characterized by rationalization and intellectualiza-

74. R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1968] 1998), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/rjrfs0>)

75. Arthur Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1936] 1960).

76. Pitirim A. Sorokin, The Crisis of Our Age (New York: Dutton, [1941] 1957), ch. 3.

77. As to why mathematics, which is a construct of the human mind, should have any relationship to the physical world, let alone govern any aspect of the cosmos, humanists cannot say. Nobel Prize-winning physicist Eugene Wigner has pointed this out: Wigner, “The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences,” Communications in Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>) tion and, above all, by the ‘disenchantment of the world.’ Precisely the ultimate and most sublime values have retreated from public life either into the transcendental realm of mystic life or into the brotherliness of direct and personal human relations.” Then, a few lines later, the weak: “To the person who cannot bear the fate of the times like a man, one must say: may he rather return silently, without the usual publicity build-up of renegades, but simply and plainly. The arms of the old churches are opened widely and compassionately for him. After all, they do not make it hard for him. One way or another he has to bring his ‘intellectual sacrifice’—that is inevitable. If he can really do it, we shall not rebuke him.”⁷⁸ On the contrary, from the rationalists of the Enlightenment to Humanist Manifesto II,⁷⁹ those who do return to Christianity’s supernaturalism are severely rebuked. Being dismissed as a weakling and a coward is a form of rebuke.

(c) Sacred and Secular

The humanist insists that there is no essential (metaphysical) distinction between the secular and the religious. The realm of religion is regarded as a realm of man’s invention. It is “merely” a realm of symbol and myth, of mystery and imagination. The many distinctions between the religious and the secular realms are explained as strictly nominal: named by men rather than real. Modern man believes that the noumenal is merely nominal. Modern man is usually a nominalist, not a realist. The realm of grace is understood as being no different at bottom (metaphysically) from the realm of nature, and therefore the realm of grace is an illusion: secularizing the sacred. If the reality of the bizarre intrudes on the boundaries of science so that a few scientists on the fringes of science can no longer ignore the evidence, they can stretch the definition of nature so as to include the attributes of the oc-

78. Max Weber, “Science as a Vocation” (1918), From Max Weber: Essays on Sociology, eds. H. H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills (New York: Oxford University Press, 1946), p. 155. (<http://bit.ly/mwscience>). Within two decades of Weber’s call for the emotionally weak to return to the traditional churches, the Protestant churches had been completely corrupted morally by their compromises with Hitler, who required all Germans to greet each other with a public salutation, “heil Hitler”—salvation Hitler. After World War II, the German Protestant state church became completely liberal theologically.

79. “Humanist Manifesto II,” The Humanist, XXXIII (Oct. 1973); reprinted in Humanist Manifestos I and II (Buffalo, New York: Prometheus Books, [1973] 1985), pp. 13–23.

cult and abnormal.⁸⁰

But there has long been an underground humanist alternative to this strategy: sacralizing the secular.⁸¹ The believer in magic sees a link between man and the cosmos that is based on ritual formulas rather than scientific formulas. This view of man is called realism. What man does on earth mirrors the realm above man and invokes the powers thereof. But there is a metaphysical continuum: the chain of being. Man is not fundamentally different from nature and the supernatural. He is seen as the supreme link between nature and the supernatural. He does not name nature (nominalism)—does not define it through the power of his reason—but he commands both nature and the supernatural through the power open to him through special knowledge possessed by the adept. The goal of the magician, like the goal of the scientist, is control over nature. This is why the two realms of ritual magic and of scientific humanism are not inherently separate realms.⁸²

One's choice between these two options makes little difference for the Bible's theology of redemption. Both views—nominalism and realism—are anti-covenantal. They both rebel against the idea of an absolute judicial hierarchy: God over man. The Bible teaches that nature cannot swallow up grace in history, for God is over nature and sustains it by grace. In contrast, whether occult forces invade nature by cloaking themselves in the garb of the Kantian noumenal realm,⁸³ or whether the Kantian phenomenal realm of rationally defined and constructed impersonal nature pushes back the mysterious to the edges of man's existence, nature always swallows up grace.

The god of deism is too far away to transform man or nature. The god of pantheism is too immersed in nature to transform man or nature. The gods of animism are at best local forces, too weak to guarantee man's salvation. In the world of atheism, God does not exist, nor does the realm of grace. There is only the realm of nature. Therefore,

80. Thelma Moss, The Probability of the Impossible: Scientific Discoveries and Explorations in the Psychic World (Los Angeles: Tarcher, 1974); Lyall Watson, Supernature (Garden City, New York: Anchor/Doubleday, 1973). Louis Pauwels and Jacques Bergier, Impossible Probabilities (New York: Stein & Day, [1968] 1971) seems more occult than scientific, but the book is structured as a popular scientific work.

81. Stephen A. McKnight, Sacralizing the Secular: The Renaissance Origins of Modernity (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989).

82. Gary North, Unholy Spirits: Occultism and New Age Humanism (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/gnoccultism>)

83. An example of this is Freudian psychology and especially Jungian. Man's subconscious or unconscious—personal (Freud) or collective (Jung)—becomes the doorway of the occult, both in theory and practice.

in all covenant-breaking thought, nature inevitably swallows up grace.⁸⁴

This view of history is not limited to humanism. A similar view exists in modern Christianity. It begins with the same false nature/ grace distinction. It confuses the Bible's common/sacred distinction with nature and grace. It equates common with nature, sacred with grace.

L. False Distinctions Within Modern Academia

A strictly spatial or cultural distinction between the sacred and the profane is too "primitive" a distinction to suit modern humanist man. Modern humanist man has abandoned the concept of the profane, except for certain acts that are seen as politically profane. Nazism, for example, is regarded today as politically profane, when it in fact was biblically profane: a pagan religion.⁸⁵ Modern man has invented another distinction to satisfy his need to distinguish between the sacred and the common. He contrasts the sacred with the secular. In this, he shares the belief of modern fundamentalism. In this section, I survey an example of modern humanistic scholarship's re-definition of biblical categories: sacred and profane.

I need to repeat myself: the realm of the sacred should not be contrasted with a [hypothetical] realm called the profane. The sacred or sacramental realm is properly contrasted to the common or non-sacramental realm. Anything that is profane is the result of a boundary violation of the sacred by something that is common.

A great deal of confusion about this point has been generated by two separate sources within modern academia. First, standard historical and anthropological accounts of religion have been written from the point of view of a false dualism between sacred and profane: the magical realm of the priest, the shaman, or the possessed vs. the secu-

84. Even in animist systems, the gods are part of nature, affected by what goes on in history, using nature as their means of imposing sanctions. The idea of a sovereign Mother Nature generally lies behind the local gods of animism.

85. On the anti-Christian aspects of Nazi theology, see Thomas Schirrmacher, "National Socialism As Religion," Chalcedon Report (Nov. 1992). He pointed out that the "heil" of "Heil Hitler!" meant salvation. It was required by law as a public greeting. Small children at school were told before each meal: "Fold your hands, bow your heads and think about Adolph Hitler. He gives us our daily bread and helps us out of every misery." Schirrmacher offers many other examples of Nazi theology. Modern scholarship has produced a huge quantity of studies on Nazi politics; it has produced almost nothing on Nazi religion.

lar realm of the non-initiated.⁸⁶ Second, a similar distinction is basic to modern sociological theory: sacred vs. secular.⁸⁷ This distinction in twentieth-century sociological thought was pioneered by Émile Durkheim, who was Numa Fustel de Coulanges' most famous disciple.⁸⁸ His influence on this point has been enormous, a fact rarely recognized by the international academic community, which still lives under his spell and the spell of his many disciples in many fields.⁸⁹ Nisbet wrote: "Of all concepts and perspectives in Durkheim the sacred is the most striking and, given the age in which he lived, the most radical."⁹⁰

1. Durkheim's False Dualism: Sacred/Profane

Durkheim established the terms of sociological discourse on the sacred-profane dichotomy in 1912, in Book I, Chapter I of his book on Australian aboriginal religion, The Elementary Forms of Religious Life: "All known religious beliefs, whether simple or complex, present one common characteristic: they presuppose a classification of all the things, real and ideal, of which men think, into two classes or opposed groups, generally designated by two distinct terms which are translated well enough by the words profane and sacred. This division of the world into two domains, the one containing all that is sacred, the other all that is profane, is the distinctive trait of religious thought; . . ."⁹¹ Durkheim did not qualify or tone down this dichotomy in any way, writing that "it is absolute. In all the history of human thought there exists no other example of two categories of things so profoundly differentiated or so radically opposed to one another. The traditional

86. Mircea Eliade, Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, trans. Willard Trask (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1964).

87. Robert A. Nisbet, The Sociological Tradition (New York: Basic Books, 1966), p. 222.

88. Ibid., pp. 226, 243–51.

89. Nisbet wrote: "More than any other figure in the history of sociology, Émile Durkheim seems to embody what has proved to be conceptually most distinctive in the field and most fertile in its contribution to other modern disciplines. Durkheim, it might be said, is the complete sociologist." Nisbet, "Introduction," Émile Durkheim (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1965), p. 1. He continued: "That he was a masterful teacher is witnessed by the long list of important works in almost every field of scholarship—history, economics, psychology, law, government—written by men who acknowledged him as their teacher." Idem.

90. Nisbet, Sociological Tradition, p. 243.

91. Émile Durkheim, The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, trans. Joseph Ward Swain (New York: Free Press, [1915] 1965), p. 52.

opposition of good and bad is nothing beside this; for the good and the bad are only two opposed species of the same class, namely morals, just as sickness and health are two different aspects of the same order of facts, life, while the sacred and the profane have always and everywhere been conceived by the human mind as two distinct classes, as two worlds between which there is nothing in common."⁹²

The problem for the sociologist or anthropologist who accepts Durkheim's classification of sacred and profane is to identify the operational and theoretical boundaries between the two realms. What is the nature of such boundaries? How can anyone pass between them without becoming ritually polluted? How can anyone ever escape living in the realm of the profane? Durkheim understood the problem: "This is not equivalent to saying that a being can never pass from one of these worlds into the other: but the manner in which this passage is effected, when it does take place, puts into relief the essential duality of the two kingdoms."⁹³ Authorizing a person's move from the profane realm into the sacred realm is the basis of ritual initiation, he argued. The individual is metaphysically transformed by means of ritual: from a profane being into a religious being. "Does this not prove that between the profane being which he was and the religious being which he becomes, there is a break of continuity?"⁹⁴

Durkheim had the biblical categories of sacred and profane almost exactly backwards. What he described is the metaphysical dualism hypothesized by theories of ritual magic. In the Bible, it is nowhere asserted that a person is profane prior to his ritual transformation, becoming sacred—a "religious being"—by means of the ritual. On the contrary, in biblical religion, an inescapably religious being—man—becomes profane but remains religious when he violates a boundary separating the judicially sacred from the judicially common. In the Old Covenant, he profaned "sacred space" when he crossed such a boundary, and in doing so, became profane himself. There was and is nothing profane about the realm outside the boundary of the sacred. Whatever is inside the boundary can become profane—ritually polluted—when someone who is not authorized to enter the sacred space crosses the boundary. That which is sacred, meaning that which is associated with the sacraments, can become profane only through a ritually prohibited act of trespass. What must be understood from the beginning of soci-ological analysis is this: in biblical religion, everything outside and inside the boundary is equally religious. Everything is under covenantal subordination to the Creator God.

92. Ibid., pp. 53–54.

93. Ibid., p. 54.

94. Idem.

2. Religious vs. Secular

One result of Durkheim's false classification of sacred and profane has been the reinforcement of that other false dualism: the religious vs. the secular. We can see the connection between these two false dualisms in this statement from Durkheim: "The two worlds are not only conceived of as separate, but as even hostile and jealous rivals of each other. Since men cannot fully belong to one except on condition of leaving the other completely, they are exhorted to withdraw themselves completely from the profane world in order to lead an exclusively religious life."⁹⁵ He identified monasticism and mystical asceticism as examples of this withdrawal.⁹⁶

This "religious-secular" dualism, like the "sacred-profane" dualism, also falls into contradictions. Again and again, the supposedly autonomous secular realm is found to be infused with religion or even undergirded by it.⁹⁷ This mixing of the two realms points back to Durkheim's original theoretical error: a false dualism between the sacred as a realm vs. the profane as a separate realm. Biblically, the sacred is one judicial realm; the common is another. The sacred is distinguished from the common by the unique judicial presence of God. The profane is not a separate realm. It is violated sacred space.

Some recent scholars have recognized that Durkheim's sharp antithesis between the sacred and the profane cannot be maintained, either conceptually or historically.⁹⁸ Nevertheless, this false dualism is sometimes imported into Christians' discussions of society. It reinforces the other dualism: religious vs. secular. This false dualism has undermined Christian social theory for almost a millennium. I refer to the common view of ecclesiastical service to God as the only truly full-time Christian service. It goes back to the medieval church's view of the ordained ministry as superior morally and not just institutionally.

95. Ibid., p. 55.

96. Idem.

97. Nisbet, Sociological Tradition, pp. 229–31.

98. Cf. W. E. H. Stanmer, "Reflections on Durkheim and Aboriginal Religion" (1967); reprinted in Durkheim on religion: A selection of readings and bibliographies, ed. S. F. Pickering (Boston: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1975), pp. 291–96.

M. “Full-Time Christian Service”

One of the most debilitating errors of modern fundamentalism is its specific misinterpretation of the distinction between sacred and common. There is a legitimate distinction between them, as we have seen: a distinction relating to the office of priest. In the New Covenant order, the ordained church elder is worthy of double honor (I Tim. 5:17).⁹⁹ He is a minister. He does not offer sacrifice, but he still maintains the Mosaic Covenant’s priestly function: guarding access to the sacraments.¹⁰⁰ The distinction between priest and non-priest in the New Covenant era is based on election to office. It is an explicitly judicial distinction.

Because of modern fundamentalism’s acceptance of humanism’s false metaphysical dualism—religious (grace/sacred) vs. secular (common/nature), i.e., noumenal vs. phenomenal—the fundamentalist speaks of a unique specialized calling: full-time Christian service. Only an elite minority can be involved in such service: the realm of grace. This minority is to that extent regarded as sacred, even though the fundamentalist definition includes non-ministerial callings in its classification of full-time Christian service. The Protestant doctrine of “every redeemed man a priest” is abandoned. This dualism implies that full-time work outside of the ministry is not full-time Christian service. It implies that all occupations besides that of the ordained priest-minister are somehow not expressly Christian, or at best, less deeply Christian. This creates a major theoretical problem: how to explain women as being lawfully eligible to become involved in full-time Christian service, since most theologically conservative denominations refuse to ordain women as ministers.

Biblically speaking, these are unquestionably common occupations, i.e., they are not sacramental.¹⁰¹ But almost nothing in life has ever

99. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

100. This is why the office of chaplain can become biblically perverse if the civil covenant is elevated over the church covenant. If the chaplain is required by the armed forces to baptize the child of any serviceman who presents the child for baptism, irrespective of the serviceman’s church membership or outward conduct, then the chaplain is being told to break the church’s covenantal boundary. The same criticism can be applied to any pastor in a state-established church who is required to baptize any child merely because of its parents’ political citizenship. To do so would be a profane act.

101. Writing this commentary is not sacramental. Neither is editing it, proofreading it, typesetting it, printing it, or writing advertising copy for it.

been sacramental. Even in the garden of Eden, only two trees were sacramental. Everything else in the garden and the world was common. All of the creation was religious, however. Administering the creation lawfully mandated full-time, covenant-keeping service. All of life was under God's covenant. In this sense, nothing fundamental has changed; only the boundaries have shifted.

The fundamentalist's distinction between full-time Christian service and, presumably, part-time Christian service implies that everything outside the institutional church is secular. A person is said to be in full-time Christian service only when he withdraws from this secular world. Such an outlook results in a drastic narrowing of the definition of the kingdom of God: a kingdom that supposedly operates only in the realms of the internal and the ecclesiastical. Only within the individual Christian heart and the four walls of some church building does the kingdom of God supposedly manifest itself. The definition of full-time Christian is usually widened to include non-profit activities in parachurch ministries, though no explanation is ever offered about how such a widened definition is theologically legitimate. The family may be included, but the state is always excluded. The state is seen as the realm of the natural, the common: natural law. The state is therefore exempted from the revealed law of God and removed from the realm of grace. There can be no redemption of the state. "Politics is dirty" pietists insist—inherently dirty. Problem: because the state is thereby granted judicial autonomy, it steadily swallows up grace by applying its common sanctions: against personal religious freedom, the independent church, and the Christian family.

That such a dualistic view of life can easily lead to mysticism should not be surprising. While the average fundamentalist might understand that covenantally faithful kings, soldiers, and even farmers under the Mosaic covenant were all involved in full-time service to God, he finds it difficult to grasp the fact that these same occupations today, plus all others not explicitly identified as immoral, require full-time Christian service. Fundamentalism's dualistic view of man's labors militates against the idea of any explicitly Christian concept of culture until after the second coming of Christ.¹⁰² In practice, it always means a withdrawal from culture.¹⁰³ This is pietism's theological leg-

102. The best-selling 1980s fundamentalist defender of this dualistic view of culture was Dave Hunt, e.g., Whatever Happened to Heaven? (Eugene, Oregon: Harvest House, 1988).

103. The willingness of modern American fundamentalists after about 1975 to get

acy.¹⁰⁴

Conclusion

A non-deliberate trespass of a holy thing required a 20% penalty payment plus a slain ram. A non-deliberate trespass of God's commandment required only a slain ram. The trespass of a holy thing was the greater (i.e., worse) trespass. The importance today of these two Levitical laws governing these two guilt offerings lies in their distinctions and varying penalties. The Levitical distinctions between "the holy things of the Lord" and "the commandments of the Lord" enable us to discern a fundamental distinction between the sacred and the non-sacramental (i.e., the common or conventional). The common is obviously not profane, for this realm includes God's commandments. There is surely nothing inherently profane about "the commandments of the Lord" or the comprehensive realms of life governed by them. What is profane is any transgression of "the holy things of the Lord." These Levitical laws therefore reveal the error of the standard textbook distinctions drawn between "sacred and profane" and "religious and secular."

The biblically valid distinction between the sacred and the non-sacramental reminds us that all of nature is under grace, either special or common. Without the unearned gifts (grace) of life, law, time, and knowledge, and power, there could be no history.¹⁰⁵ The processes of nature have been definitively redeemed by Jesus Christ by His death, resurrection, and ascension.¹⁰⁶ This is equally true of culture. The Bible is clear: nature is sustained by God's common grace and is progressively sanctified in history in response to His extension of special grace to the church. Grace progressively redeems nature in history because Jesus Christ definitively redeemed nature at Calvary. Nature is therefore sanctified in history: definitively, progressively, and finally. This is the biblical concept of corporate sanctification. It is essential for developing biblical social theory.

It is the task of Christians to work out progressively in history the involved in cultural and political activities explicitly as Christians indicates a breakdown of the older theological viewpoint. If this continues, it will produce a major restructuring of fundamentalist theology, especially pretribulationist dispensationalism. See North, "Publisher's Foreword," House Divided, pp. xviii–xix.

104. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 4.

105. North, Dominion and Common Grace.

106. North, Is the World Running Down?

implications of what these definitive transformations have already accomplished judicially. Whatever God has declared judicially, He requires to be manifested progressively. This dominion assignment to His people involves extensive personal responsibility, which is why dominion theology is resisted so adamantly by pietists. But the church has been given a written Bible, the Holy Spirit, and the division of labor (I Cor. 12)¹⁰⁷ to enable Christians to extend God's dominion covenant. This historical task is huge, but our tools are more than adequate. There is also plenty of time.¹⁰⁸

Sadly, most Christians in my generation prefer intellectual slumber and life in a cultural ghetto, living on "hand-me-downs" from the world of humanism. They, too, have adopted the false dualisms of humanism: sacred vs. profane, religious vs. secular, nature vs. grace. They, too, have adopted the view that without Jesus' bodily presence in history, nature swallows up grace. They are also pessimillennialists.

Nature should not be contrasted with grace, for it is part of God's common grace and can be renewed (healed) over time through comprehensive covenantal faithfulness. Nature should be contrasted with the sacramental: a judicially segregated realm. Both realms are equally under grace. Therefore, nature (the common)—families, businesses, civil government, etc.—can be healed progressively in history by special grace. This is one application of the doctrine of the bodily ascension of Christ: overcoming death in history.

In contrast to the biblical view of nature and grace stand all forms of anti-Christianity. In all non-Christian systems, nature swallows up grace in history. Tragically for the history of the church, both amillennialism and premillennialism necessarily adopt this non-Christian view of nature and grace in history (i.e., the period prior to Jesus Christ's bodily return). The world supposedly remains under the accelerating curses of God, deteriorating both ethically and physically (the entropy process). The common blessings of God in history are progressively overwhelmed by the common curses¹⁰⁹.

107. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

108. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

109. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 4. How there can be both economic growth and population growth over several centuries, including increasing per capita wealth, in a world of declining special grace and therefore (presumably) declining common grace, is a theoretical problem which amillennialists and premillennialists

Nature does not swallow up grace. Nature is not separate from grace; nature is under grace. For example, all Christian service is under God's special grace. All Christian service is in this sense redemptive. When a Christian engages in any honest labor, he is engaged in full-time Christian service. But he is not engaged in full-time sacred service. Sacred service is limited to the performance of the formal duties of an ecclesiastical ministry: preaching the gospel in worship services, serving the sacraments, anointing the sick with oil (James 5:14), etc. Formal church worship involves an added layer of holiness, i.e., judicial separation. This is why the sacred can be profaned.

There is remarkably little discussion of the ascension of Christ in modern orthodox theology.¹¹⁰ This topic inevitably raises fundamental historical, cosmological, and cultural implications that modern premillennial and especially amillennial theologians find difficult to accept, such as the progressive manifestation of Christ's rule in history through His representatives: Christians.¹¹¹ In a world in which grace is believed to be progressively devoured by nature, there is little room for historical applications of the doctrine of the historical ascension. Covenantal postmillennialism alone can confidently discuss the doctrine of Christ's ascension, for postmillennialism does not seek to confine the effects of Christ's ascension to the realms of the internal and the trans-historical.¹¹² That is to say, postmillennialism does not assert the prudently ignore, given their view of history, wherein nature steadily swallows grace. The theonomic postmillennialist can point to the spread of social attitudes and civil laws in the West—right-wing Enlightenment thought: constitutionalism, contractualism, and capitalism ("common grace principles")—that are consistent with biblical law. External cultural obedience has brought external blessings, even in the face of a compromised and weakened church. In contrast, the systematic refusal of premillennialists and amillennialists to comment on this ethical-cultural relationship has left them incapable of affirming the details, or even the possibility, of an explicitly biblical social theory. This has been their dilemma for over three centuries. On the decline of Protestant casuistry—the application of general principles to concrete judicial cases in history—since the late seventeenth century, see Thomas Wood, English Casuistical Divinity During the Seventeenth Century (London: S.P.C.K., 1952), pp. 32–36. Roman Catholic casuistry began to fall into disfavor in the same era: Albert R. Johnson and Stephen Toulmin, The Abuse of Casuistry: A History of Moral Reasoning (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988), Pt. V.

110. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 227–29.

111. No theological or eschatological school denies that there can be prolonged set-backs in this manifestation of Christ's rule. Conversely, none would totally deny progress. I know of no one who would argue, for example, that the creeds of the church prior to the fourth century were more rigorous or more accurate theologically than those that came later.

112. This is why amillennialism drifts so easily into Barthianism: the history of existence of supposedly inevitable boundaries around the effects of grace in history. On the contrary, it asserts that all such boundaries will be progressively overcome in history, until on judgment day the very gates (boundaries) of hell will not be able to stand against the church (Matt. 16:18).¹¹³ mankind for the amillennialist has no visible connection with the ascension of Jesus Christ. Progressive sanctification in this view is limited to the personal and ecclesiastical; it is never cultural or civic. The ascension of Christ has no transforming implications for society in amillennial theology. The ascension was both historical and publicly visible; its implications supposedly are not. The Barthian is simply more consistent than the amillennialist: he denies the historicity of both Jesus' ascension and His subsequent grace to society. Christ's ascension, like His grace, is relegated to the trans-historical. See North, Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 111–13.

113. Gentry, He Shall Have Dominion, chaps. 12, 13.

GUARDIAN OF THE CIVIL OATH

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, If a soul sin, and commit a trespass against the LORD, and lie unto his neighbour in that which was delivered him to keep, or in fellowship, or in a thing taken away by violence, or hath deceived his neighbour; Or have found that which was lost, and lieth concerning it, and sweareth falsely; in any of all these that a man doeth, sinning therein: Then it shall be, because he hath sinned, and is guilty, that he shall restore that which he took violently away, or the thing which he hath deceitfully gotten, or that which was delivered him to keep, or the lost thing which he found, Or all that about which he hath sworn falsely; he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto, and give it unto him to whom it appertaineth, in the day of his trespass offering. And he shall bring his trespass offering unto the LORD, a ram without blemish out of the flock, with thy estimation, for a trespass offering, unto the priest: And the priest shall make an atonement for him before the LORD: and it shall be forgiven him for any thing of all that he hath done in trespassing therein (Lev. 6:1–7).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is that theft is a transgression against God.

A. God as the Victim of Crime

God is here identified as the primary victim of crime: “If a soul sin, and commit a trespass against the LORD. . . .” This principle of jurisprudence is fundamental to biblical law. Therefore, it is not sufficient for a thief to make restitution to his earthly victim; he must also make restitution to God.

This passage continues the laws governing trespasses and guilt (reparations) offerings. The sin in this instance is high-handed, unlike the sin of Leviticus 5:15.¹ It is said to be a sin against the Lord, yet what is

1. “If a soul commit a trespass, and sin through ignorance, in the holy things of the described is a sin against a neighbor. God mandated a 20% penalty plus the sacrifice of a blemish-free animal.

The text identifies the presence of a false oath in conjunction with crimes against property. The question is: Was the false oath the basis of the 20% penalty payment? I argue in this chapter that it was not. The false oath made mandatory the animal sacrifice, but the theft itself, confessed prior to the trial, was what invoked the 20% penalty. My line of reasoning rests on what I have previously identified as God's economic subsidy for early confession of crime, i.e., reduced restitution penalties.²

Deception is here singled out as a sin against the Lord. This includes deception regarding: (1) keeping an item entrusted for safe-keeping or keeping a pledged item (collateral for a loan), (2) robbery, (3) extortion, and (4) keeping someone's lost item.³ Theologically speaking, every sin is a sin against the Lord, to be judged in God's final court. The victim of every crime becomes God's legal representative, for he is an earthly target of man's rebellion against God's standards.⁴ He is the victim, therefore, of a boundary violation. But this passage specifically identifies four transgressions as trespasses against God, whereas other trespasses listed in the Bible are not specifically identified as such. Why not? No ram offering was required for those other sins. Why not, if every sin is judicially a trespass against God? Why single out deception?

B. The Presence of a False Oath

The answer lies elsewhere than in the enumerated sins themselves. It is the transgressor's false verbal testimony to the victim regarding these crimes against property that serves as the differentiating factor: either lying to the neighbor directly or swearing falsely to a civil court. Writes Wenham: "By abusing the oath, a person took God's holy name in vain, and trespassed against his holiness. Therefore a reparation offering was required to make amends."⁵ The sin is two-fold: a violation

LORD; then he shall bring for his trespass unto the LORD a ram without blemish out of the flocks, with thy estimation by shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary, for a trespass offering" (Lev. 5:15).

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3: Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 43:C.

3. The New American Standard Version makes these crimes clearer than the King James Version does.

4. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 33:A.

5. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, of a neighbor's property rights (point three of the covenant: boundaries), coupled with a violation of either personal verbal assurances to the victim or the violation of a formal judicial oath (point four: oath).

Because a crime against property is involved, the lie or deception becomes a judicial oath. The victim becomes God's covenant agent, the one who initiates a lawsuit against the thief.⁶ The oath violation takes a specific form: the implicit (though not legally explicit)⁷ misuse of God's name. This is a boundary violation: the third commandment (Ex. 20:7). This oath implicitly and inescapably invokes God's negative sanctions, as all unlawful oaths must.⁸

In a court, there must be interrogation of the suspects. God in the garden publicly interrogated Adam and Eve regarding the facts of the case. It is a crime to testify falsely in God's court or in man's. False testimony is intended to deflect God's justice. Offering it implies that God can be deceived, or at the very least, He can be deterred from bringing His negative sanctions in history. False testimony rests on a man's self-confidence in his ability to deceive God's representative agents in history. He believes that he can deflect or delay God's judgment in history by means of misleading information. This faith in false testimony rests on a theology that assumes that God is non-existent, or not omniscient, or not omnipotent, or does not bring significant negative sanctions in history. It assumes that heaven's court is non-existent, or that God is forgetful, or that time, apart from restitution, pays for all sins (universal salvation), i.e., that God does not bring negative sanctions in eternity. It assumes, at the very least, that God's negative sanctions outside the earthly court (in history and eternity) are minimal compared to the negative sanctions that can be imposed by the court, i.e., double restitution to the victim (Ex. 22:4). This law denies all of these assumptions.

C. Restitution and Atonement

Two separate sins were involved: one formal-covenantal (false 1979), p. 108.

6. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 43.

7. Jesus warned men not to make oaths to each other: "But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil" (Matt. 5:37). He was not speaking of civil or ecclesiastical trials, in which an oath was legitimate because both state and church have been entrusted with the authority to bring God's negative sanctions in history.

8. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) oath), one conventional-economic (theft or fraud). Therefore, there had to be two separate acts of restitution. The first form of restitution—sacrificing a ram—was paid to God to compensate Him for the oath-taker's attempt to thwart God's civil court. This was necessary to satisfy God in His capacity as both High Priest and King of the heavenly court. The second—return of the stolen item, plus a 20% payment—was required by God's law to satisfy the earthly victim in his legal capacity as a victim. Both the victim and the priest served as covenantal agents of God: the first civil, the second ecclesiastical.

The penalty for unconfessed theft is double restitution (Ex. 22:4). This is reduced to the restoration of the stolen property plus a 20% penalty if the thief confesses his crime before either its discovery or his conviction, as we shall see. *The 20% penalty payment constituted a double tithe.*⁹

Why impose a 20% penalty, the equivalent of a double tithe? What did the tithe have to do with restitution to the victim? James Jordan suggests that it was because guardianship is associated with Levitical office, and so is the tithe. Numbers 18 established the Levites as the guardians of sacred space and sacred things. “And thy brethren also of the tribe of Levi, the tribe of thy father, bring thou with thee, that they may be joined unto thee, and minister unto thee: but thou and thy sons with thee shall minister before the tabernacle of witness. And they shall keep thy charge, and the charge of all the tabernacle: only they shall not come nigh the vessels of the sanctuary and the altar, that neither they, nor ye also, die” (Num. 18:2–3). They were required to keep the common Israelites away from the sacred spaces of the tabernacle. This entitled them to a tithe as their lawful inheritance.¹⁰ Conclusion: the tithe and the Levitical protection of sacred space were linked judicially.

And, behold, I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. Neither must the children of Israel henceforth come nigh the tabernacle of the congregation, lest they bear sin, and die. But the Levites shall do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they shall bear their iniquity: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations, that among the children of Israel they have no inheritance. But the tithes of the children of Israel, which they offer as an heave offering unto the LORD, I have given to the Levites to inherit: therefore I have said unto them, Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance (Num. 18:21–24).

9. Andrew A. Bonar, A Commentary on Leviticus (London: Banner of Truth Trust, [1846] 1966), p. 109.

10. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 10.

Death was the civil penalty for invading the temple's sacred space, which was protected by the Levites (Num. 18:7), just as an invasion of the Aaronic priests' sacred space by the Levites would bring God's death sentence (Num. 18:3). The penalty for other invasions of sacred areas was the 20% penalty: a double tithe. A vow to a priest was redeemed by paying a 20% commission (Lev. 27:19). Refusal to pay this redemption price resulted in the permanent loss of the property, even rural land (Lev. 27:20–21).¹¹ Unintentional boundary violations of sacred things also required a double tithe penalty: "And if a man eat of the holy thing unwittingly, then he shall put the fifth part thereof unto it, and shall give it unto the priest with the holy thing" (Lev. 22:14). "Speak unto the children of Israel, When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the LORD, and that person be guilty; Then they shall confess their sin which they have done: and he shall recompense his trespass with the principal thereof, and add unto it the fifth part thereof, and give it unto him against whom he hath trespassed" (Num. 5:6–7).

In the same sense that every man is a priest through Adam, every man is a Levite through Adam. He is a designated guardian of God's property: a Levitical function. The property owner is inescapably God's steward because God owns everything: "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills" (Ps. 50:10).¹² All ownership is necessarily representative. It is therefore stewardship. This judicially bounded sphere of economic responsibility is not to be invaded unlawfully: the eighth commandment (Ex. 20:15).¹³ Adam is the archetype. He was established as a guardian of God's property—a Levitical function—even before he acted as a priest. He was told to serve as a guardian on the day of his creation (Gen. 2:15). His profane, sacrilegious act of priestly defiance—eating a prohibited communion meal in the presence of an invading serpent—took place later (Gen. 3:6).

11. Chapter 37.

12. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

13. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 28.

D. Thwarting Civil Justice

The lie or false oath had been intended to deflect either the economic victim or the court from discovering the truth. In this sense, it was an affront to God's kingly justice. It was an attack on the integrity of both His heavenly court and His representative earthly civil court. The false testimony may or may not have put someone else under suspicion; we are not told. What we are told is that there were two separate forms of restitution: (1) the return to the victim of the full value of whatever had been stolen, plus a penalty payment of 20% (a double tithe); (2) a ram to be sacrificed by a priest.

The connection between the false oath and the civil court is easy to understand. The court enforces justice in the name of God and on behalf of the victim. It sets things straight judicially and economically by declaring guilt or innocence. That is, the civil court practices judicial orthodoxy: straight speaking. It defends its own integrity. Why, then, is the court not authorized by God to collect for itself the extra 20%, or allowed to impose some additional penalty? Why does the entire restitution payment appear to go to the victim,¹⁴ since the false oath was made to impede the proper functioning of the court?

1. The Victim Becomes a Judicial Agent

We can find the answer to this question by first observing that the initial lie was made to the neighbor, not to the court: "If a soul sin, and commit a trespass against the LORD, and lie unto his neighbour in that which was delivered him to keep, or in fellowship, or in a thing taken away by violence, or hath deceived his neighbour; . . ." This preliminary section of the passage does not mention any formal court proceeding, yet the criminal still owed a ram to God. This indicates that the victim, to whom the criminal lied, was in fact an agent of the civil court, even though the court had not been called into session. It was the victim who possessed lawful authority to call the court into session. He was gathering preliminary facts regarding the violation. The victim was acting therefore not only on his own behalf but also as an agent of society's primary institution of civil justice, the court. The lie to the neighbor was therefore judicially an oath to a covenantal institution. It had a unique binding character that conventional falsehoods do not possess.

14. See below: Section I.

The victim, in seeking justice, does not represent only himself. Biblical jurisprudence recognizes the earthly victim as a representative of God. A sin against him is always in his legal capacity as God's representative; the ultimate target of the sin is God. The sinner in history attacks various aspects of the creation in his attempt to defy God, since God cannot be attacked directly. The sinner violates God-established earthly boundaries in his judicial rebellion against God. The archetype act of rebellion was Adam's. Adam could not attack God directly, for God was absent from the garden; instead, Adam violated the boundary that God had placed around the forbidden tree.

This leads us to a significant conclusion: the very existence of an earthly victim calls God's heavenly court of justice into session. If the existence of a boundary violation becomes known to the victim, this discovery automatically invokes an earthly civil court of justice.¹⁵ This invocation may not be a formal public act, but God, as the sovereign king of the commonwealth, calls it into session historically. Whenever the victim learns of the violation, he is supposed to begin a search for incriminating evidence. This is because crimes are not supposed to go unpunished in God's social order, for all crimes are inherently attacks on God. Crimes are to be solved in history whenever the costs of conviction are not prohibitive, i.e., whenever too many resources are not drained from the victim or the court in solving a particular crime.

2. Scarcity and Justice

The world is under a curse: a cursed form of scarcity (Gen. 3:17–19).¹⁶ There are limits to anti-crime budgets. In a world of scarcity, including scarcity of accurate knowledge, there cannot be perfect justice. Justice in history is purchased at a price.¹⁷ The price of perfect justice institutionally is too high; any attempt by a court to achieve it will bankrupt the institution that finances the court. This quest for exhaustive knowledge and perfect justice paralyzes the institutions that pursue them. Therefore, if the victim thinks it will take too many of his own resources to identify and convict the criminal, or if he thinks his accusation could be turned against him later for lack of evidence gathered by the court, he has the option of refusing to pursue the matter. He can let God settle it in eternity. He can rest confident in God's perfect justice. Rushdoony said it well: "History culminates in Christ's triumph, and eternity settles all scores."¹⁸

15. If someone other than the victim first discovers the violation, he is to inform the victim or the person most likely to be the victim. To fail to do this is judicially to become an accomplice of the criminal.

16. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

17. The ultimate price of perfect justice was paid by Jesus Christ's act of comprehensive redemption at Calvary. Without this representative payment, God's perfect justice would have demanded the end of the Adamic race at the conclusion of Adam's trial.

God nevertheless wants criminals brought to justice in history. The Bible places the responsibility of pursuing justice on the individual who is most likely to want to see the criminal brought to justice: the victim.¹⁹ Because the crime was ultimately against God and His mandated social order, the victim becomes God's primary representative agent in pursuing justice. The victim is also uniquely motivated to begin this search for incriminating evidence, since he is the loser, and he will receive a restitution payment upon confession by, or conviction of, the criminal. As I have argued elsewhere, if he refuses to pursue the criminal or bring charges against him, the civil court is not to intrude on the case, unless he is a minor or legally incompetent.²⁰ Unless the criminal has threatened the victim with reprisals, thereby making the court his victim, the court is to abide by the decision of the victim. Thus, when the victim begins his investigation of the crime, he is serving as God's primary covenantal agent. His task is to gather information to be used in a lawsuit against the criminal. He is acting as an agent of two courts: God's heavenly court and His earthly civil court. In a sense this does not do full justice to the victim's unique legal position. The civil court is to some degree the economic agent of the victim. The victim, in his legal capacity as a victim, is a representative of God. The problem is, the court does not know who the victim is, plaintiff or defendant, until after the presentation of the evidence and cross examination.

E. Allocating the Costs of Civil Justice

Court costs and legal fees are very high in modern American society because of its demonic quest for perfect earthly justice.²¹ Thus, one

18. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 123.

19. In this sense, this singling out of a prosecutor parallels the Mosaic Covenant's authorization of the blood avenger (kinsman-redeemer) to pursue and execute a person suspected of murder of the blood avenger's nearest of kin (Num. 35:19–27).

20. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 33:G.

21. For examples of this growing paralysis in the American legal system, see Mack-legitimate way for society to reduce the number of cases placed before its civil courts is to require the prosecutor—either the plaintiff or the prosecuting attorney’s office—to pay for all court and legal expenses if the defendant is declared innocent. The risk of a “not guilty” verdict should be borne by the prosecutor: the cost of an unsuccessful prosecution. Today, this risk is entirely born by the defendants in societies, such as the United States, where those declared innocent are not reimbursed for their defense costs. The risk of bearing these costs should be shifted from the defendant to the one bringing the accusation.

It is true that poor people could not afford to prosecute if they had to bear all of the risk of paying for all court costs and legal fees. But there is another side to this problem. It is equally true that poor people cannot afford to defend themselves. This is why, in the United States, the civil government must by law provide poor people with a defense lawyer when the state brings a poor person to trial.²² The only thing that protects a poor person from a private plaintiff is his poverty: there is nothing to collect. But if the state still enforced slavery for economic offenses by those who have no assets, the poor man would again be a target.²³

What of the middle-class defendant? He can be destroyed financially by a wealthy plaintiff, such as a large corporation, or by an agency of civil government. This is unjust: bankrupting the innocent person by means of the trial process. The rule of law should provide that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant be given an economic advantage in a civil court. I shall explain the implications of this later in this chapter.

1. Civil Law and Criminal Law

When I say civil court, I mean criminal court. Modern humanist law distinguishes between criminal law and civil law. Civil law cases lin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974).

22. The case was Gideon v. Wainwright (1963). A movie was made about this case, Gideon's Trumpet.

23. The United States Constitution does allow enslavement for criminal convictions: “Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place under their jurisdiction” (Amendment 13 [1865], emphasis added.) Early in the twentieth century, three Supreme Court cases negated state laws authorizing peonage for default on private debts: Peonage Cases (1903), Bailey v. Alabama (1911), and United States v. Reynolds (1953). The Court has never voided peonage for criminal convictions, but local governments never enact such statutes.

are formal debates between two private parties that are decided by a court. Somebody owes something to another private individual; the court decides who owes what. Criminal law is between the state and an accused person. Criminal law refers to cases tried in a court because of the criminal's transgression of a statute. In modern terminology, the criminal owes a debt to society.

The Bible does not distinguish between civil law and criminal law. All cases are criminal cases, since all are argued in a civil court. (The language here is confusing because of the humanists: the criminal law vs. civil law distinction.) So-called civil cases, when brought before a civil magistrate—the minister of the sword—are brought because one party (the defendant) has defrauded another (the plaintiff) or because one party (the plaintiff) is trying to defraud the other (the defendant). A self-proclaimed victim brings his accusations against someone by means of the state. That another person has refused to pay him what is owed necessarily makes the dispute a criminal case, biblically speaking. Someone is defrauding the other. Someone therefore must be threatened by the sword: civil government. The refusal to pay what is owed is a criminal act, biblically speaking. The serpent's seduction of Adam and Eve was not merely a civil matter between him and them. It was a criminal matter. There are no cases in the Bible of private disputes that go before the King or an Israelite court that do not become criminal matters, i.e., matters decided by the monopoly of violence, the state.

Once a public accusation is made by one party against another, the issue of criminality—false witness—cannot be evaded. Someone may be lying. That person, biblically speaking, is a criminal. All civil court cases are inescapably criminal cases, biblically speaking. All call for restitution by a false accuser (Deut. 19:14–19). In such cases, the person who brought the accusation and then loses the case, if he can be shown to have lied, must pay all court costs and make restitution to the victim equal to the value of whatever he sought to extract from him (Deut. 19:19).²⁴

If neither party is proven a false witness, then the loser should pay the court costs of the winner, as in the British common law system. This upholds the principle of victim's rights, the fundamental principle of biblical justice. The innocent party should experience no penalty, including his defense costs. Once a society acknowledges this principle, it must seek ways to structure its court procedures to see to it that victims are protected. In all modern societies, this would require a major restructuring.

24. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 18.

2. Who Is the Accuser?

The plaintiff alone determines whether or not to initiate the prosecution of a lawsuit; the court is to support his decision. The question is: Must the court press charges solely on the testimony of the victim? If the victim is poor, for example, and cannot afford to hire a lawyer, or if he fears the economic consequences of having brought charges that a jury refuses to support, should the court intervene and prosecute on behalf of the victim? In other words, if the court believes that there is sufficient evidence of criminal wrongdoing to warrant a trial, can it lawfully begin proceedings if the victim fears to do so on his own behalf?

The legal issue here is victim's rights. The officers of the state are not sure who is telling the truth. The rights of the victim must be upheld, but who is the victim? Only a trial can determine this. The question is: Should there be a trial? If, as in the British legal system, the one who loses the case pays for all court costs, the victim may be afraid to seek justice in the courts. The victim could be either the accuser or the accused. How can the court see to it that God's justice is maintained if either party is afraid to go to trial even though he believes himself to be the innocent victim?

If the plaintiff agrees to press charges, the court has no decision to make. The officers open the court to the rival parties. The jury decides. The loser pays the winner's legal costs. But there is a limit on what he owes to the winner, as we shall see: whatever he spent for his own defense. If the plaintiff is unwilling to take this risk, but the court decides that prosecution is warranted in the name of justice, should the plaintiff be allowed to transfer the risk of loss to the court? That is, should the court be allowed to act as the agent of the plaintiff, pressing charges on the basis of the evidence, but relieving the plaintiff of all risk of loss if the jury decides otherwise? If so, and the court does press charges, who should pay whom if the accused is declared innocent by the jury? Second, who should be paid if the jury finds the accused guilty?

3. Who Pays?

Let us consider the first case: the plaintiff decides to accept the risk. He decides to press charges. The civil court should not have the option of refusing to prosecute. The trial takes place. The loser pays his own lawyer (if any) and the defendant's lawyer. The state provides the service for free. This is what the state is supposed to do: provide justice for all.

Without limiting what the loser pays, there is a problem: the potential threat of a defendant who tells the plaintiff that he intends to hire a very expensive lawyer. "If I win," the defendant says, "you will be sold into slavery to pay my legal expenses. And with this lawyer, I will probably win. You can't afford to hire anyone equally good." This weighs the scales of justice against the plaintiff. He may be too fearful of bringing legitimate charges. Of course, it could be the reverse: a wealthy plaintiff threatens the defendant with the post-trial cost of paying a high-priced lawyer. The solution is to require the guilty party to pay the victorious party only as much money as he himself paid his own lawyer. This way, there is pressure on the two parties to come to an agreement in advance regarding total legal expenses, but neither party can use the threat of post-trial legal expenses to scare the other into a settlement.

In a case between a rich man and a poor man, the poor man would probably argue his own case. That would reduce his legal expenses to zero. This is what takes place in local small claims courts in the United States. He would owe nothing to the defendant if he loses but is not convicted of false witness. But the defendant does not have to bear major legal expenses if the two go before the judge as individuals. If the initiator decides to forego the use of a lawyer, the case can be settled rapidly. This reduces the society's cost of justice. It also reduces income for lawyers, therefor reducing the supply of lawyers.

The second case is more difficult case. The plaintiff believes he is a victim, but he refuses to bear the responsibility of losing. Perhaps he is poor. Should the state be allowed to grant him immunity from post-trial expenses? Yes. Justice should not be available only to individuals who can afford to lose. The state can afford to lose. Nevertheless, the state may choose not to prosecute if it thinks the plaintiff's case is weak. If the legal system provides an option that the accused automatically has all of his defense expenses paid by the court, then the civil court's officers may lawfully refuse to press charges if they believe that the plaintiff is likely to lose and the plaintiff is unwilling to bear the risk of loss. Like the United States Supreme Court, which is not compelled by law to review every case sent to it by lower courts, so is the local court. It can refuse to prosecute.

If the court grants immunity to the plaintiff for court expenses, it must do the same for the accused. The court must not tip the burden of loss in favor of either party. If the court decides to prosecute, and the defendant loses, the defendant is required to pay the victim, but he is not required to pay the court. The state provides its services to the disputants for free. Taxes pay for the court.

In a biblical civil order, the state acts as the agent of a victim. It cannot be sure in advance who the victim is. I have argued in Tools of Dominion and Victim's Rights that the state may not prosecute anyone in its own name unless a state agency has been defrauded or unless the injured party is incompetent: a child, a moron, or some other person with no one to speak on his behalf. The most important of these silent victims is a murder victim. The state is God's agent of vengeance by way of a victim, although the state can sometimes be the victim.²⁵

I argue here that the state is also authorized to act as the plaintiff's agent when the plaintiff seeks post-trial economic immunity. In seeking such immunity, the plaintiff transfers the decision to prosecute to the court. In modern American society, a grand jury serves as the decision-maker. So does a district attorney. There is no question that fewer cases would be brought before grand juries by district attorneys if the district attorney's office had to bear the costs of both the defense and the prosecution.

If the plaintiff, having received post-trial immunity, is subsequently convicted of being a false witness, does he owe the state anything? Not if justice is to be provided by the state for free, which the Bible says it should. He owes his victim whatever the victim would have owed him, had the victim been convicted (Deut. 19:14–19). He does not owe the court anything beyond the sacrifice required in Leviticus 6:1–7.

4. The State Should Pay Basic Legal Fees

In order to protect the innocent accused person, the state should

25. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 33:G; North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 35–41. (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>) pay all court costs when it prosecutes. The modern United States court does this in the case of poor defendants only. This discriminates against the non-poor defendant. Even the poor are cheated: they must pick from court-appointed attorneys who are not paid very much. The defendant is not provided with funds equal to the funds made available to the prosecution. The state should offer a defendant the same amount of money that the state's prosecuting attorney pays to prosecute the case. The state's prosecuting attorney would then have to estimate the total costs of prosecution in advance and pay himself and his staff no more than his half. In effect, he would be required to contract with the court for services rendered.

In such a system of justice, there would be no independent salaries or free rental space for the prosecutor and his staff. This way, the court can estimate in advance what it will cost to prosecute a case. Far more important, so can the defendant. A case's prosecution costs are not hidden in a collective annual budget for the prosecutor's office. The defendant would receive the same amount of money to hire his defense. This would mean that a defendant would have to accept this amount as his limit, too, unless he were willing to forego reimbursement by the state for expenses above this amount if he should win. In a sense, this is a recommendation for state-funded defense payments: each side receives from the local court a minimum amount of money to conduct its case before the court. The defendant can pay more if he wants to, but the state would not reimburse him.

This system would place limits on the state's risk of losing a case. It would also place limits on the state's economic ability to prosecute a case. A prosecutor would hesitate before launching a case. There would be no financially open-ended cases. Prosecutors could not afford to pursue perfect justice. They would have to count the costs (Luke 14:28–30).²⁶

5. Spending Caps

Without a pre-paid system with mutual spending caps and also with state liability to pay all of the innocent defendant's legal expenses (victim's rights), a wealthy defendant could hire a very expensive law firm, and the state would have pay all of his fees if the accused is declared innocent. The state might not be willing to prosecute: too much risk—the more expensive the defense team, the more the state’s risk. But biblical civil justice demands that both plaintiff and accused should “have his day in court” irrespective of their personal wealth. Men should not be allowed to buy their way out of court, since they will not be allowed to buy their way out of God’s court on judgment day.²⁷ This is why a pre-paid legal expenses system is needed with a spending cap on both the prosecution’s total expenses and the defense’s reimbursable legal expenses. The prosecution decides how much it is willing to spend to achieve justice, but not irrespective of the defense’s expenses. It provides the same amount of money to the defendant for paying his lawyer. The case would be more likely to be decided in terms of its merits rather than the comparative economic resources available to attorneys.

26. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 34.

This system would retard the demonic, bankrupting quest for perfect justice. A prosecuting attorney whose cases repeatedly result in major losses for the court would find himself in trouble at the next election. There would be negative political sanctions for high expenses because of negative economic sanctions.

This payments system does not subsidize the prosecution. In this sense, it acts as an economic restraint on the state. The state must prove its cases, not gain men’s consent through imposing the threat of bankruptcy on innocent people who may be able to win in court. The growth of the messianic state in the twentieth century was heavily subsidized by the courts’ payments system. The growth of administrative law, which legal historian Harold Berman regards as the greatest single threat to human freedom,²⁸ was funded by the present payments system.

6. Intercession as a Model

Is there biblical evidence for state-funding of lawyers on both sides? Direct evidence, no; indirect evidence, yes: the biblical doctrine of intercession. Intercession is always judicial in Scripture, though not always exclusively judicial. It is formal pleading before the throne of God. God prophesied of the coming Messiah: “Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was

27. They should be allowed to buy the best defense lawyer they can afford after a trial has begun. They should not be given the ability to buy their way out, pre-trial.

28. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), Introduction.

numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors” (Isa. 53:12). Because God knew that Judah was guilty, Jeremiah was warned: “Therefore pray not thou for this people, neither lift up cry nor prayer for them, neither make intercession to me: for I will not hear thee” (Jer. 7:16).

In the New Testament, God the Father has established a model for justice: providing His people with a free defense attorney, the Holy Spirit. “Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. And he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God” (Rom. 8:26–27). The Holy Spirit acts in the name of Jesus, who serves as the supreme defense attorney. “Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us” (Rom. 8:34). “Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them” (Heb. 7:25). Jesus Christ has paid the legal defense costs for His people.

God does not provide an attorney for the guilty. But because God is omniscient, there is no function for a defense lawyer on judgment day,²⁹ just as there was no need for defense counsel for Judah in Jeremiah’s day. However, because men are not God, they are not omniscient. Men do not know in advance who is innocent or guilty. Thus, the state, as the earthly representative of God’s heavenly court, should provide every defendant it prosecutes with money to hire a defense lawyer whenever it provides state-financed prosecuting attorneys.

F. Priestly Agents of God’s Heavenly Court

When the plaintiff brings a lawsuit in his own name, he inevitably also brings it in God’s name, for God is the primary victim of crime. If he was a victim, he is acting as God’s agent. The civil court is required to examine the evidence and announce judgment, but this judgment is made in the name of the two victims: God and the earthly victim, either the plaintiff or the defendant. The civil court is an agent of the victim in a way that the ecclesiastical court is not. The civil court acts to defend the victim’s rights, whereas the priest acts to defend the civil court’s authority in the case of a false oath.

29. Seen on a Tee-shirt: “There will be no plea-bargaining on Judgment Day.”

The required animal sacrifice served as an atonement for a crime against God's civil court. This sacrifice wiped away the sin ritually. It was a public acknowledgment of a transgression against God's civil court. What is significant here is that an ecclesiastical act was required to atone for a civil transgression. The verbal cover-up (false witness) required a ritual payment.

This raises a key question: Why was there a ritual connection between a civil court and the priesthood? Because of the two-fold character of God's judgment. The civil court always represents God's heavenly court in a subordinate fashion, analogous to the victim, who in his legal capacity as a victim also represents God subordinately. The civil court acts on behalf of the victim, but only in its judicial capacity as the minister of kingly justice (Rom. 13:4), as the institution that lawfully bears the monopolistic sword of vengeance.³⁰ But God requires more than civil sanctions to placate His wrath against the criminal. He sits on His throne as both High Priest and King; on earth, these offices are divided except in two unique cases: Melchizedek (Gen. 14:18) and Jesus Christ. God must be placated in both of His offices. This is why no single earthly court can lawfully offer two-fold atonement to a criminal. God therefore requires a priestly sacrifice.

1. New Testament Sacrifice

In the New Testament, this priestly sacrifice was made by Jesus Christ at Calvary. The various animal sacrifices in the Old Testament representationally prefigured this ultimate sacrifice (Heb. 9). A question legitimately can be raised: Is any post-Calvary public mark of contrition lawfully imposed by the church on the perjurer? If so, on what legal basis?

If the perjurer is a church member, he has partaken of the Lord's Supper throughout the period following his false testimony to the court. This placed him in jeopardy of God's negative sanctions (I Cor. 11:30). He ignored this threat, thereby implicitly adopting the same false theology of God's minimal sanctions, previously described. The church's officers deserve to know of the transgression, and can lawfully assign a penalty. This penalty should not exceed the value of a ram in the Mosaic economy.

If the perjurer is not a church member, he is still dependent on continuing judgments by the church to preserve God's common grace in history. The state can lawfully function in non-Christian environments, but only because of the common grace of God mediated through His church and its sacraments. Offering these representative sacrifices is the permanent responsibility of God's church. This is why Israel had to offer 70 bullocks annually (Num. 29:12–32) as sacrifices for the symbolic 70 pagan nations of the world (Jud. 1:7), plus a single bullock for herself on the eighth day (Num. 29:36).³¹

30. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

2. The Church: Guardian of the Civil Oath

What this means is that the church is the guardian of the covenantal civil oath. This is an inescapable conclusion from the fact that only the church has the authority to accept the perjurer's sacrifice in atonement for the false oath. The state cannot offer this release from guilt. The oath involves the formal calling down of God's negative covenant sanctions on the oath-taker. He who uses God's name in vain in a formal judicial conflict must then seek judicial cleansing from the church. The reason why the oath is guarded by the church is that the church alone can lawfully invoke the eternal negative sanctions of God against an individual (Matt. 18:18). Thus, by invoking the oath in a civil court, the criminal necessarily brings himself under the judicial authority of the church.

The modern practice of allowing atheists to "affirm" to tell the truth in court, but not to swear on the Bible or in God's name, is a direct affront against God and against the church as the guardian of the oath. It is also inevitably an act of divinizing the state by default. The state becomes the sole enforcer of the public affirmation. In such a worldview, there is no appeal in history beyond the state and its sanctions. The atheist's affirmation is therefore a judicial act demanding the removal of God from the courtroom. Thus, it requires the creation of a new oath system, with the state as the sole guardian of the oath. The state acts not in God's name but in its own. Rushdoony's comments are on target: "If a witness is asked to swear to tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth without any reference to God, truth then can be and is commonly redefined in terms of himself. The oath

31. When Israel fell in A.D. 70, she had become like all the other pagan nations. She could no longer offer efficacious sacrifices for them or for herself. From that point on, only the sacrifice of Jesus Christ at Calvary could serve as any nation's atonement—covering or ransom—before God.

in God's name is the 'legal recognition of God'³² as the source of all things and the only true ground of all being. It establishes the state under God and under His law. The removal of God from oaths, and the light and dishonest use of oaths, is a declaration of independence from Him, and it is warfare against God in the name of the new gods, apostate man and his totalitarian state."³³

The biblical state can lawfully impose negative sanctions against a perjurer, but only on behalf of the victim. The state cannot lawfully pronounce the permanent negative sanctions of the oath against anyone. The state lawfully requires an oath, but it is not the institutional enforcer of this oath. The presence of the oath to God is a public acknowledgment of the non-autonomy of the state. God is above the state, and the church stands next to it as the guardian of the oath.³⁴

This means that theocracy is required by God's civil law. Without the God-given authority to require an oath, the state would lose its covenantal status as a lawful monopolistic institution with the authority to enforce physical sanctions against evil-doers. It would lose its status as a covenantal institution. Yet by imposing an oath, the state inescapably places itself under the protection of the church, for the church is the defender of the oath. As the great seventeenth-century jurist Sir Edward Coke put it, "protection draws allegiance, and allegiance draws protection."³⁵

A lawful covenantal oath is always self-maledictory: it calls down God's negative sanctions on the oath-taker if he lies. This includes eternal negative sanctions. The state acts only on behalf of victims: God's primary representatives in criminal cases. It cannot act on its own behalf in a priestly capacity in God's heavenly court. The state cannot lawfully act as an autonomous priestly intermediary between God and man. To argue that the state imposes the oath as a lawful agency under God but apart from the church is to anoint the state as a priestly intermediary between God and man, an institution possessing the power to declare God's negative eternal sanctions. Such an assertion by a state identifies the state as messianic.

The church alone is empowered by God to act as the guardian of 32. T. Robert Ingram, The World Under God's Law (Houston, Texas: St. Thomas Press, 1962), p. 46.

33. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, p. 115.

34. The state, in turn, is responsible for the preservation of the legal environment that protects the church. The church is not institutionally autonomous, either.

35. Cited by Rebecca West, The New Meaning of Treason (New York: Viking Press, 1964), p. 12; in Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 118.

the civil oath. The presence of a required payment to the priest is proof of this conclusion. Those political pluralists who today call for an absolute separation between church and state are implicitly calling for the elevation of the state into the office of lawful priestly mediator between man and God, or else they are denying God and His sanctions altogether, thereby deifying the state by default. In either case, they are abandoning biblical covenant theology. Political pluralism inescapably defends the establishment of a messianic state, but in the name of dis-establishment: the separation of church and state.³⁶

G. Confession and Restitution³⁷

Once a person commits a theft, he automatically owes the victim at least a 20% payment in addition to the return of the stolen item or its present monetary equivalent. The case does not have to come to trial for this penalty payment to be owed by the thief. I derive this conclusion from the Exodus 22's case laws regarding theft, but also from the example of the archetypal theft: Adam and Eve's stealing of God's forbidden fruit. The moment they touched it, they were guilty. They owed God at least a ritual apology. In the Mosaic Covenant, anyone who touched a forbidden (unclean) thing was himself unclean until evening (Lev. 11:24–25). I think this is because God had originally returned in judgment to the garden "in the cool of the day" (Gen. 3:8), meaning at evening. It did not reduce God's net asset value for them to have merely touched the fruit, but it was a violation of His law, His ethical boundary.

They went beyond mere touching; they stole the fruit and ate it. This was theft. It was corrupt caretaking. It was also the equivalent of eating a forbidden sacrifice, for it was a ritual meal eaten in the presence of the serpent. The penalty for this in ancient Israel was separation from God's people: "But the soul that eateth of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, that pertain unto the LORD, having his uncleanness upon him, even that soul shall be cut off from his people. Moreover the soul that shall touch any unclean thing, as the unclean-

36. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

37. This section, with minor modifications, is an extract from Authority and Dominion, ch. 45:E. I reprint it because not all readers will have access to Tools. Also, the problem of determining the proper application of the 20% penalty is so complex that I decided that a footnote to Tools would be insufficient. The exegesis of this passage was the most difficult single exegetical task I encountered in Tools of Dominion.

ness of man, or any unclean beast, or any abominable unclean thing, and eat of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, which pertain unto the LORD, even that soul shall be cut off from his people” (Lev. 7:20–21). This penalty pointed back to the garden, where God separated Adam and Eve from Himself by casting them out of the garden.

God, however, is merciful to sinners. Why else would He have created the sacrificial system? Thus, had Adam and Eve come to God as He entered the garden, admitting their sin and pleading for mercy, He would have spared mankind the ultimate penalty of eternal separation from Him. In fact, had they prayed a prayer of confession rather than spending their time sewing fig leaves for themselves, they would have escaped the death penalty—full restitution payment to God. This very act would have constituted a pre-trial confession of guilt. It would have been an act of symbolic communion with God—a judicial, sanctions-governed act of repentance. But instead, they tried to cover the visible effects of their guilt through their own efforts: sewing fig leaves. God therefore announced His sentence of death against them: dust to dust. Those who wait until the end of the trial must make full (multiple) restitution.

My conclusion is that a pre-trial confession of guilt by the criminal is punished less rigorously than a crime in which the criminal is convicted on the basis of the judge’s inquiry. A person is always encouraged by God to confess his sins. If these sins are public sins, then his confession must also be public, if not to a court, then at least to the victim. For example, if a worker steals cash from his employer, but later replaces it before the theft is discovered, he still must confess his crime to the owner. The fact that no human being detected the crime does not affect the question of guilt and sanctions in God’s eyes. The thief did impose the risk of permanent loss on the victim, even though the victim suffered no known loss; the victim therefore deserves compensation. This upholds the biblical principle of victim’s rights. The victim, like God, should strive to be merciful, but biblical law teaches that he is entitled to be informed that mercy is now in order.

H. A Subsidy for Early Confession

The Bible subsidizes early public confession. If a man confesses, he can escape the multiple restitution requirement: he is required only to repay the stolen principal, plus 20%, as this passage teaches.

There appears to be an inconsistency in the law at this point. The penalty for theft is here stated to be 20%, yet in other verses, restitution for theft in general is two-fold, and sometimes four-fold or five-fold (Ex. 22:1–4). Why the apparent discrepancy? We know that Leviticus 6 is dealing with cases in which the guilty person has sworn falsely to the victim or to the authorities. Later, however, he voluntarily confesses the crime and his false oath. I conclude that the double restitution penalty is imposed only in cases where a formal trial has begun. The provision in Leviticus 6 of a reduced penalty is an economic incentive for a guilty person to confess his crime before the trial has begun, or at least before the court hands down its decision.³⁸

The thief has testified falsely to the authorities, either before the trial or during it. This is why he owes a trespass offering to the priest (Lev. 5:1–13; 6:6). I argue here that he can lawfully escape the obligation to pay double restitution if he confesses after his initial denial but before the trial begins. He cannot lawfully escape paying double restitution and making the trespass offering if he swears falsely during the trial. He has to confess before the oath is imposed and the trial begins. At the very least, he must confess before it ends.³⁹

As always, we should search for a theocentric principle lying behind the law. There is one in this case: the correlation between this reduced criminal penalty for voluntary, public confession of sin, when accompanied by economic restitution, and God's offer of a reduced (eliminated) eternal penalty for people who make public Christian confession of sin prior to their physical death, if this confession is also accompanied by economic or other kinds of restitution.⁴⁰ If we wait for

38. I believe the confession had to come prior to testimony from any witness or the presentation of physical evidence. In American jurisprudence, testimony of the suspected criminal before a grand jury, which has the authority to indict a person, is the judicial equivalent of the Old Testament court's preliminary inquiry. Once the trial begins, it is too late to escape double restitution. This reflects the principles of God's court of permanent justice: once the accused is standing before the throne of judgment, there is no possibility of escaping the maximum sentence. The counter-argument is that prior to the decision of the jury, the confession would reduce the costs of the trial and reduce the risk of handing down a "not guilty" decision to a criminal.

39. Achan confessed to his theft of the forbidden items after the trial had begun, and he was then executed (Josh. 7:20). However, this case may not be a relevant example; he confessed only after Israel had suffered a military defeat, with the loss of 36 men (Josh. 7:5). His trespass required life for life at that point, confession or no confession. Thus, I do not appeal to this test case to defend my thesis. Still, I could be wrong about this. It may be that even after the trial begins and the oath is imposed, but prior to the decision of the jury or the judges, he has an opportunity to repent. But once the court hands down its verdict, he is trapped.

40. I am not arguing that salvation is by works. It is by grace (Eph. 2:8–9). But let God's formal trial at the throne of judgment, we are assured of being forced to pay a far higher restitution penalty.

Why do I believe that Leviticus 6 refers to a pre-trial voluntary confession? Because of the context of Leviticus 6. Leviticus 5 deals with sins against God that must be voluntarily confessed: "And it shall be, when he shall be guilty in one of these things, that he shall confess that he hath sinned in that thing" (Lev. 5:5). The sinner in Israel then brought a trespass offering to the priest (Lev. 5:8). This made atonement for the trespass: "And he shall offer the second for a burnt offering, according to the manner: and the priest shall make an atonement for him for his sin which he hath sinned, and it shall be forgiven him" (Lev. 5:10). Why would he make such a public confession? Because of his fear of the ultimate penalty that God will impose on those who offer false testimony in His courts.

We then note that Leviticus 6 also deals with trespasses against God. It is specifically stated in Leviticus 6:2 that the 20% penalty payment applies to "a trespass against the LORD" in which the sinning individual has lied to his neighbor about anything that was delivered to him by the neighbor for safekeeping. The context indicates that the sinner has voluntarily confessed his crime against God and his neighbor, just as he voluntarily confessed his trespass against God in Leviticus 5.

I. Restitution Plus a Trespass Offering

Here is the problem the commentator faces. The text in Exodus 22 states that the court is to require double restitution from the neighbor who has "put his hands to" his neighbor's goods. He is therefore to be treated as a common thief. But if double restitution is the required penalty, then what is the 20% penalty of Leviticus 6:5 all about?

1. A Rabbinical Court?

It has been argued by some Jewish commentators that the 20% penalty in Leviticus 6:5 is to be imposed only in cases where there has us not forget Ephesians 2:10: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." I am arguing that without obedience, our faith is dead. James 2:18 says: "Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works." And in James 2:20, we read: "But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?" The outward obedience of the criminal is supposed to be demonstrated by his willingness to make restitution to his victim.

been a public oath before a rabbinical court. They argue that the penalty payment does not apply to cases of voluntarily confessed theft as such, meaning secret or even undetected thefts, but only to cases of forcible robbery in which the thief is identified, arrested, and brought before an ecclesiastical (i.e., synagogue) court, where he gives a false oath of denial, and later admits this lie. Writes Jacob Milgrom: "Since the point of this law is to list only those cases that culminate in the possessor's false oath, it would therefore be pointless to include the term 'theft' which assumes that the possessor-thief is unknown."⁴¹ He goes so far as to argue that the Leviticus passage deals only with religious law, not civil law. "All that matters to the priestly legislator is to enumerate those situations whereby the defrauding of man leads, by a false oath, to the 'defrauding' of God. The general category of theft in which the thief remains unidentifiable is therefore irrelevant to his purpose."⁴² Eight centuries earlier, Maimonides wrote that the thief who confesses of his own accord owes only the value of the asset he stole, not double restitution. He did not mention the 20% penalty.⁴³

If Milgrom's view were correct, this would mean that there would be no court-imposed restitution penalty payment from criminals to victims in (oathless) cases of pre-trial, self-confessed theft. Why wouldn't there be such compensation? Because the one-fifth penalty is assumed by Milgrom to be applicable only in cases where there has been a false oath to a rabbinical court. This interpretation therefore eliminates the 20% penalty payment for pre-trial, self-confessed crimes.

2. Victim's Rights

While this judicial implication follows the premise, it is not in accord with the biblical principle of victim's rights. The victim has been deprived of his property, and he has suffered a sense of loss, assuming that he had actually discovered that the stolen item was missing, yet the Bible supposedly makes no provision to compensate him for these obvious burdens. On the face of it, this conclusion seems highly unlikely, yet it follows inevitably from the initial claim that the 20% penalty only applies to cases where there has been a false oath to an ecclesiastical court.

41. Jacob Milgrom, Cult and Conscience: The "Asham" and the Priestly Doctrine of Repentance (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1976), p. 100.

42. Ibid., pp. 100–1.

43. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1954), "Laws Concerning Theft," II:I:5, pp. 60–61.

Why do I believe that this rabbinical court interpretation is unlikely? Because the Bible is emphatic that victims are to be protected, and that criminals are to suffer losses in proportion to their crimes. The thief who confesses before a trial is not on a par judicially with a neighbor who has, through negligence, lost or inadvertently ruined an item placed in his safekeeping. The negligent neighbor pays only for what he lost; the self-confessed thief has to pay more. The principle of lex talionis applies here as elsewhere: the penalty must fit the crime.⁴⁴ To argue that the penalty is the same for theft and negligence—merely the return of the stolen item or its equivalent value—is to deny lex talionis.

If thieves were granted the legal option of returning stolen goods whenever it appeared to them that they might be discovered, but before they are put under formal oath, then it would be far less risky to steal. If there is a 20% penalty only after a false oath is given but before a trial, then a theft that is confessed before the oath is administered would become virtually risk-free for the thief. He could escape any penalty simply by confessing his crime and by returning the stolen property. The option of self-confession would remain as an escape device whenever the authorities began to close in. If God's law did not impose penalties on theft, it would implicitly be subsidizing criminal behavior. God does not subsidize rebellion.

The express language of the passage militates against Milgrom's interpretation of Leviticus 6. After listing all sorts of theft and deception, the text says, "he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto" (v. 5). To whom must this penalty payment be paid? To the victim: "Or all that about which he hath sworn falsely; he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto, and give it unto him to whom it appertaineth, in the day of his trespass offering" (v. 5; emphasis added).

At this point, I depart slightly from the original text in Tools of Dominion.⁴⁵ When I wrote that book, I had not yet perceived that the thief's violation of another person's property is judicially analogous to a trespass of a holy place or thing, thereby mandating the economic equivalent of a double tithe. The tithe was paid to a Levite. Thus, the trespass made the stolen property judicially holy, and thereby made its owner, a guardian of God's property, the economic equivalent of a Levite.

44. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 37.

45. Idem.

I had originally linked the 20% payment penalty to the false oath. The problem with this interpretation is that it disregards the biblical reward for confession prior to a trial. If a false oath automatically invokes the penalty, then what would be the penalty for the crime if the thief voluntarily confesses before lying to the owner? Nothing besides the return of the object stolen? This would subsidize theft. God does not subsidize theft. But if double restitution were automatically imposed, then where would be the economic subsidy for a voluntary pre-trial confession? Thus, the 20% penalty must be the minimal restitution payment for theft, not a payment for the false oath. The payment goes to the victim as a Levitical guardian agent.

Each of the victims of these crimes is to be compensated by a 20% penalty payment. The crimes are separate acts; thus, translators used the English word "or" in listing them, indicating that any one of these criminal infractions automatically invokes the 20% penalty. But what of the false oath? Consider the context of this passage: the five major sacrifices. The false oath is covenantal and therefore self-maledictory. It invokes its own independent penalty payment: the trespass offering, a ram without blemish (Lev. 6:6). So, the criminal must pay the victim 20% even if he confesses before he is convicted, with or without the presence of a false oath. This law's economic penalty applies only to a specific time frame: pre-trial confession. The false oath to the court adds an additional requirement: a sacrifice administered by a priest. In the New Covenant, the thief owes payment to a church. The payment is equal in value to a blemish-free ram.

J. Calculating the Required Restitution

Leviticus 6 is not in opposition to Exodus 22:9. Exodus 22:9 requires double restitution either from the false accuser who perjured himself (Deut. 19:16–19) or from the criminal neighbor (thief).

1. Payment to the Victim

Assume that the criminal neighbor swears falsely before the judges in order to avoid having to pay double restitution to his victim; if successful in his deception, he then collects double restitution from the victim.

If a man shall deliver unto his neighbour money or stuff to keep, and it be stolen out of the man's house; if the thief be found, let him pay double. If the thief be not found, then the master of the house shall be brought unto the judges, to see whether he have put his hand unto his neighbour's goods. For all manner of trespass, whether it be for ox, for ass, for sheep, for raiment, or for any manner of lost thing, which another challengeth to be his, the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbour (Ex. 22:7–9).⁴⁶

What if he then repents of his false oath before it is discovered? He still owes the original double restitution, plus the return of the falsely collected double penalty, plus a 20% penalty payment on everything. Thus, if the stolen object is worth one ounce of gold, the restitution payment owed to the victim by a now-confessed perjured thief would be 4.8 ounces of gold: 2 ounces (the original double restitution payment),⁴⁷ plus 2 ounces (the falsely extracted penalty) plus .2 times 4 ounces, meaning .8 ounces = 4.8 ounces.

What about the perjured thief who refuses to admit his guilt and who is later convicted of this perjury? Because he had been paid double restitution by his victim, he now owes him six-fold restitution: double whatever he had stolen (2×1) plus double whatever he had unlawfully collected (2×2). This threat of six-fold restitution serves as an economic incentive for the perjured thief to confess to the court that he had offered false testimony earlier. We see once again that biblical law rewards timely confession.

Exodus 22:9 establishes double restitution for stolen sheep and oxen, not four-fold or five-fold.⁴⁸ This is because the stolen animals had not been slaughtered or sold. What if the court does not have proof that the accuser testified falsely against his neighbor, yet also does not have sufficient proof to convict the neighbor? The thieving neighbor escapes paying two-fold restitution. What if he then repents and confesses? He owes his neighbor a 2.4 restitution penalty (2×1 , plus $2 \times .2$). What if his crime is discovered later? He owes four-fold restitution for perjury: double what he would have owed if he had been convicted originally.

46. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 45.

47. This assumes that the criminal cannot return the original item to the victim.

48. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 45.

2. Payment to the Temple

What would he have owed to the temple in the case of unconfessed perjury? If the trespass offering was one animal if he had confessed after having made a false oath or oaths, presumably the penalty was double this.⁴⁹ This follows from my thesis that there is an escalation of penalties. At each step of the legal proceedings, he can confess and bear a reduced penalty. For each level of deception, there are increased sanctions. God is honored by the very act of self-confession, when such confession has a penalty attached to it. Oath or no oath, the two primary goals of laws governing theft are the protection of property (boundary rights) and the compensation to the victim (victim's rights). Earthly civil courts are to safeguard the property rights of the victims, making sure that the appropriate penalty is extracted from the criminal and transferred to the victim. There is no requirement of an additional money penalty payment to the civil court because of a false oath regarding theft. A trespass or guilt offering must be paid to the church.

The false oath before God invokes the threat of the ultimate penalty: the eternal wrath of God, preceded by the physical death of the criminal. Unless a person confesses his false oath in this life, makes appropriate restitution to his victim, and brings a transgression offering, God will collect His own restitution payment, and it is far greater than 20%. Ananias and Sapphira lied to church authorities concerning the percentage of their economic gains that they had voluntarily donated to the church. When asked individually by Peter if what they had told the authorities was true, they lied, and God struck each of them dead on the spot, one by one (Acts 5:1–10).⁵⁰ This served as a very effective warning to the church in general (v. 11). Presumably, they could have confessed their crime at that point, paying all the money from the sale into the church's treasury, since God was the intended victim of their lies (Acts 5:4). They chose instead to lie. So, God imposed His more rigorous penalty.

K. After the Accusation, but Before the Trial

What if the thief stole an animal, especially a sheep or an ox, and

49. It could be argued that the penalty was death: a high-handed false oath that was not confessed.

50. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

then sold it? If the civil authorities have brought the thief to trial, but the trial has not been held, would he be given the opportunity to confess to the victim, and then go to the buyer, confess his crime, buy it back at the purchase price plus 20%, and return it to the true owner, plus 20 percent? This would seem to be a reasonable conclusion. His confession would reduce the cost of prosecuting him and convicting him. Understand, however, that the thief has committed two crimes: the original theft and the defrauding of the buyer. The buyer was led to believe that the thief possessed the legal right of ownership, which was being passed to the new buyer.⁵¹ Thus, the defrauded buyer is also entitled to a 20% penalty payment, as well as the return of his purchase price. This would make the total penalty 40%, since he had defrauded two people: the first by means of the theft and the second by means of his lie.

The thief's confession reduces the possibility that a guilty man will go free and his innocent victim will remain defrauded. Apart from his admission, the judges might make a mistake, especially if the thief commits perjury during the trial. His confession eliminates this judicial problem.

The modern judicial system has adopted an analogous solution: plea bargaining. A criminal confesses falsely to having committed a lesser crime, and the judge accepts this admission and hands down a reduced penalty. This is the way that prosecuting attorneys unclog the court system. The Bible rejects this approach. Plea bargaining leaves the main crime officially unsolved, and it allows the guilty person to appear less of a threat to society than his behavior indicates that he is. The Bible does recognize the institutional problem, however: the risks and costs of gaining a conviction. Instead of having the criminal plead guilty to a lesser crime, it encourages him to plead guilty to the actual crime before the trial, and thereby receive a reduced penalty.

L. Civil Identification of a True Church

The question arises: To which church does he owe the payment? I suggest the following. If he belongs to a local church, he owes the payment to that congregation, for he has disgraced it. If he does not belong to a church but the victim does, then he pays the penalty payment to the victim's church: the congregation of God's prosecuting agent. If neither of them belongs to a church, then it would be sensible to allocate the money to the congregation nearest geographically to the residence of the criminal, for he is living inside that church's jurisdiction: the regional boundary in which its prayers are regularly offered.

51. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 43:C:3.

There is no question about the unbreakable legal relationship between this law and civil theocracy. This law mandates a trespass offering, which means that the law mandates that the civil government enforce an economic payment to a local congregation: either the criminal's, the victim's, or the one closest to where the crime was committed. This raises an inescapable legal question: What is a true church? Answer: one that confesses the Trinity. This law therefore mandates some form of Trinitarian oath-bound civil order, with confessional churches serving as the guardians of the civil oath: the oath required by the civil government in a trial. To put it in terms of traditional United States court practice, when a person swears on a Bible in a court of law, there must be a guardian of this oath. The courtroom Bible is not limited to the Old Testament. Because this law was not annulled by Christ's resurrection, it indicates that the church, not the state, is the lawful guardian of the civil oath, and therefore is entitled to a trespass offering when this oath is violated. The payment goes to a church, not to the civil government.

This law requires that the local civil government identify the local ecclesiastical guardians of the oath. It must identify those congregations that are confessionally orthodox and therefore eligible to receive the trespass offering. This authority to identify confessionally orthodox churches implies that members of associations not so identified as orthodox cannot legally be granted the legal status of citizens. In short, the state is a confessional, oath-bound, covenantal institution. It is required to establish what constitutes a valid civil oath, but only after consultation with churches. Churches are confessional, covenantal institutions, separate from the state. They may lawfully impose added confessional requirements beyond the civil oath for their members and officers, but if they do not confess the Trinity, they are not to be recognized as guardians of the civil oath.

1. Religious Pluralists Object

To escape the Bible's requirement of a civil theocracy—a confessional civil government—Christian political pluralists must deny the New Covenant validity of this law. They must also give up the idea that there is a guardian of the oath other than the state. They must deny that the church has the authority lawfully to call down God's negative sanctions against those civil orders that refuse to repent by refusing to re-constitute themselves judicially under a Trinitarian oath. But they fail to specify by what New Testament legal principle this Levitical law has been annulled.

If the state identifies which churches are orthodox, doesn't this make the state the ultimate guardian of the oath? No; God has identified His church as the guardian—the agency that alone has a lawful claim on the trespass offering. Any state that identifies a guardian other than Trinitarian churches within its jurisdiction will come under God's historical sanctions. Nevertheless, the state is not under the church. It is a legally separate jurisdiction. The Bible does not teach ecclesiocracy: the civil empowerment of the church. The state is bound by its own Trinitarian oath.

If God did not impose His sanctions in history, then either the church or the state would eventually exercise final sovereignty in history, imposing its confession on rival institutions. Because the state possesses greater temporal power than the church does, assuming the absence of God's sanctions in history, this denial of God's sanctions in history necessarily leads to the establishment of a rival theocratic order: Islamic theocracy, Israeli theocracy, tribal theocracy, Shinto theocracy, humanist theocracy (Communism,⁵² Nazism,⁵³ political pluralism⁵⁴), or whatever. The guardians of the civil oath become the new priesthood. There is no escape from theocracy. Theocracy is an inescapable concept. In every society, some god must rule. Some priesthood must represent this god.

52. Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnmrro>); F. N. Lee, Communist Eschatology (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1974).

53. Let us remember that the phrase "Heil Hitler" is literally translated "Salvation Hitler." See Thomas Schirrmacher, "National Socialism as Religion," Chalcedon Report (Dec. 1992), pp. 8–11. The most forthright declaration of this religion that I have come across is by James Larratt Battersby, The Holy Book of Adolph Hitler (Southport, England: German World Church of Europe, 1952). Battersby announced: "Nordic man, with whom walks eternally the Spirit of Adolph Hitler, stands on the Rock of the Redeeming Blood of his Race" (p. 15). On the suppression of the German churches, see J. S. Conway, The Nazi Persecution of the Churches, 1933–45 (New York: Basic Books, 1968). On Lutheranism's roots and theological liberalism's roots of the surrender by the German churches, see Paul B. Means, Things That Are Caesar's: The Genesis of the German Church Conflict (New York: Round Table Press, 1935), Part I.

54. North, Political Polytheism.

2. Denial and Consequences

Churches today do not teach this view of the civil oath. If they ever heard of the church's God-given legal status as the guardian of the civil oath, they would deny it. The church has sought to abdicate its responsibility in this area. This illegitimate abdication of authority does not eliminate binding theocratic civil oaths in history; it merely allows representatives of some other god to establish a rival theocratic civil order. There is no neutrality.

Churches today find themselves persecuted by fee-seeking lawyers and the state.⁵⁵ What else did they expect? Did they really believe in the myth of neutrality, that highly convenient judicial immunity for humanist power-seekers, that boundary of deception? The non-revolutionary branches of the Mennonites (post-1535), Baptists, and Lutherans have always believed in it, of course, but why did Calvinists ever take the bait? Did they really believe in the existence of some permanently neutral civil arena between covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers? The myth of neutrality should not appeal to the most judicial of theologians in the religion second only to Judaism in its concern for judicial details. Yet for four centuries, Calvinists have adopted natural law theory and its corollary, the myth of neutrality.

Bible-believing churches publicly proclaim, "We're under grace, not law." This proclamation is utter nonsense; Christians today are in fact under humanist lawyers: a judgment of God that should be obvious to all Christians but which is acknowledged by very few. Because God's church is unwilling to serve as the guardian of the civil oath, the state imposes a rival law-order in terms of a rival oath. The state's goal is clear: to disinherit the church.

Conclusion

We see in this law an application of the Bible's fundamental principle of civil justice: victim's rights. The twin issues in this case involve the defense of a pair of judicial boundaries: private property and the civil oath. The ecclesiastical issue is this: What is the meaning of the trespass offering? I argue that the trespass offering is tied judicially to the defense of the civil oath against the criminal who falsely declares his innocence. That is, there is more to a legitimate defense of the civil oath than the imposition of civil sanctions.

55. J. Shelby Sharpe, "The Nuclear Attack on Christianity in America Has Begun in Earnest," Chalcedon Report (Nov. 1990), pp. 2–9.

The primary victim of the theft is God, against whose majesty the theft is committed. The secondary victim is the earthly victim. He then becomes the primary agent of God in this legal dispute between God and the criminal. God brings a lawsuit against the criminal in His heavenly court; He authorizes the victim to bring a lawsuit in a civil court. This is the biblical principle of victim's rights.

An important goal of the criminal justice system is to gain a confession from the criminal before a trial is held or a verdict is handed down. This reflects the desire of God to gain a public confession from the sinner before his death, and therefore before his heavenly trial begins.⁵⁶ To gain early confessions, God's law imposes escalating penalties for each formal judicial stage transgressed by the criminal's deceptive activities. Put another way, each time the criminal transgresses one of these legal barriers—these judicial opportunities for public confession—the penalties increase.

The court defends the rights of the victim. The church defends the integrity of the court, i.e., its right to be told the truth by the criminal. The criminal's transgression of ownership boundaries sanctified—set apart judicially—the stolen property. The lying criminal owes the victim double restitution because of the theft if the court convicts him. He owes him full restoration if he admits his guilt before the court tries him. He also owes the victim a double tithe (20 percent) because the act of theft sanctified the stolen goods. Finally, he owes God a sacrifice through the mediating institution of the priesthood because of his false oath in civil court.

The 20% penalty payment to the victim is still in force in New Testament times. It was not tied uniquely to the Promised Land or the Mosaic Covenant priesthood. There has to be a double-tithe (priestly) penalty payment in order to de-sanctify the stolen property. He pays this penalty to the victim, not to the church.

If the criminal confesses his sin to the victim before the trial begins, he escapes the threat of double restitution. A 20% penalty payment to the victim is sufficient, plus the return of the asset or its present market value. In Mosaic Israel, if he had also lied to the court regarding his theft, he had to offer the sacrifice of a ram. Today, he would confess to church authorities and make whatever sacrifice they impose on him, not to exceed the comparable value of a ram in the Mosaic economy.

56. "That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation" (Rom. 10:9–10).

II. Cleansing (Lev. 8–16)

INTRODUCTION TO PART II

For I am the LORD your God: ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy; for I am holy: neither shall ye defile yourselves with any manner of creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. For I am the LORD that bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy (Lev. 11:44–45).

God here identifies Himself as a holy God. He also identifies Himself as the God who had delivered the Israelites from the bondage of Egypt. This self-identification as the God who delivered His people in history is the identifying aspect of point two of the Mosaic Covenant: historical prologue.¹ In Leviticus 11:45, God identifies Himself as possessing lawful authority over His people: hierarchy.

Leviticus 8–16 is concerned with the priesthood in general,² but with cleansing in particular. The priesthood was in charge of identifying and attending to the marks of ritual and physical uncleanness in society: food laws, childbirth laws, leprosy, discharges of the flesh, and the day of atonement.³ This section begins with the ritual washing of the priests: Aaron and his sons (Lev. 8:6). It ends with the day of atonement, which is specifically identified as a means of cleansing: “For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the LORD” (Lev. 16:30).

Ritual cleanliness was mandatory for a nation of priests (Ex. 19:6) that had been set apart (sanctified, made holy) by God as His special people. This national separation was the heart of the Mosaic Coven-

1. Meredith G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 53–57.

2. The Greek word for priest is hierus, as in hierarchy.

3. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), p. 16. (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

ant. Cleanliness laws were temporal boundary devices that had a covenantal function for as long as the Mosaic Covenant was valid. To enforce them, there had to be a priesthood for the nation of priests. Like the nation of priests, these ordained priests had boundaries placed around them as a separate family (Aaron) in a separate tribe (Levi). It was their task to identify holiness and unholiness, cleanliness and uncleanness (Lev. 10:10). As we find in the laws governing leprosy, their very physical presence inside the boundary of a house made unclean a house infected with the disease. It was not legally unclean until a priest crossed its boundary. This was analogous to the moral uncleanness of Canaan, which became judicially unclean—and subject to God's corporate negative sanctions—only after the Israelites had crossed the Jordan river and entered the land.

8

WINE AS A BOUNDARY MARKER

And the LORD spake unto Aaron, saying, Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations: And that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean; And that ye may teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the LORD hath spoken unto them by the hand of Moses (Lev. 10:8–11).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is that God has the authority to establish boundaries that temporarily separate a holy person from a blessing.

A. Wine as God's Property

The wine in this passage is analogous to the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. This prohibition applied to the priests only while they were inside the tabernacle or temple. There is no reference to the Levites. For a priest to drink wine inside the tabernacle constituted a boundary violation. The tabernacle-temple was God's place of residence in Israel. It was there that He manifested His judicial presence. This law had something to do with the special presence of God and the holiness of God. It also had something to do with the office of priest. It had nothing to do with a general prohibition against wine.

There can be no doubt that the average Israelite was allowed to drink wine. He was specifically authorized by God to drink it at the third-year feast. "And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth: and thou shalt eat there before the LORD thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household" (Deut. 14:26).¹ Wine is described in the Bible as a blessing from

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deutero-

God:

And he will love thee, and bless thee, and multiply thee: he will also bless the fruit of thy womb, and the fruit of thy land, thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep, in the land which he sware unto thy fathers to give thee (Deut. 7:13).

That I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil (Deut. 11:14).²

And as soon as the commandment came abroad, the children of Israel brought in abundance the firstfruits of corn, wine, and oil, and honey, and of all the increase of the field; and the tithe of all things brought they in abundantly (II Chron. 31:5).

God even goes so far as to say that the absence of wine is a sign of His covenantal curse against a covenanted nation: “And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land, until thou be destroyed: which also shall not leave thee either corn, wine, or oil, or the increase of thy kine, or flocks of thy sheep, until he have destroyed thee” (Deut. 28:51). In the New Testament, we read of the spirit of prohibitionism—the prohibition of God’s gifts.

Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; Speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving: For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer (I Tim. 4:1–5).

This raises a theological question: Why this unique Mosaic covenantal prohibition for the priests? Wenham understood that there is a problem here. “The commands given to Aaron, however, are strange. Why should a ban on drinking alcohol be introduced here, and then be coupled with instructions about teaching the Israelites?”³ He correctly nomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 35.

2. Ibid., ch. 28.

3. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 158.

identified both aspects of the prohibition: (1) clear-headed officiating over the administration of the sacrifices, and (2) the teaching function of the priests. But he avoids discussing a very difficult and all-too-obvious problem: teaching by the priests that took place outside the boundaries of the tabernacle and the temple.

Why did the prohibition against wine cease when the priest left the tabernacle? Wasn't clear instruction in the word of God just as important outside the temple's boundaries as inside? The ban did not apply to the Levites, yet they also had a teaching function. Their office was lower than the priestly office. They did not speak with comparable authority. Was this additional authority of the priesthood an aspect of the ban?

The solution is found in what should be the central presupposition of biblical economics: God's ownership of the world, which is an implication of His creation of the world.

The boundary of the tabernacle involved a prohibition regarding their personal use of wine. Wine was required in the sacrifices. The wine of Mosaic sacrifice was to be poured out exclusively to God and never consumed by the priest. It was not burned on the altar because, like leaven, it was a fermented product.⁴ Wine accompanied the offerings. "And the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink offering shalt thou prepare with the burnt offering or sacrifice, for one lamb" (Num. 15:5). "And the drink offering thereof shall be the fourth part of an hin for the one lamb: in the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the LORD for a drink offering" (Num. 28:7). Like the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, wine was specially reserved for God in the Mosaic sacrifices. The wine of sacrifice was exclusively His property. Also like the boundary in the garden, this was not intended to be a permanent boundary, but it was a requirement of that dispensation. Contrary to the anti-alcohol heresy,⁵ it was not that God despised wine; it was that He regarded it as exclusively His possession in formal worship ceremonies. He saved the best for Himself.

B. Sobriety and Sanctuary

The priest was the person who offered sacrifices, but he was also

4. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 189.

5. For a critique of this heresy, see Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., God Gave Us Wine: What the Bible Says About Alcohol (Lincoln, California: Oakdown, 2001). See also North, Inheritance and Dominion, Appendix G: "Strong Drink."

the person who authoritatively interpreted and applied the law of God in formal judgment. This authority to pronounce judgment was also a possession of the king, who was also prohibited from drinking wine. “It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes strong drink: Lest they drink, and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted” (Prov. 31:4–5). This advice—it was not a Mosaic law—governed the highest civil magistrates: kings and princes. The identifying issue for the king was the enforcement of justice. The king was the final civil court of appeal. Was this high-court status also the issue for the priests within the tabernacle? In some cases it was, when the priest declared the law and then imposed sanctions on someone who had come to bring a sacrifice or during one of the required feasts. Some legal counseling may have gone on. But the imposition of sanctions was not what the text refers to. The two stated reasons for this priestly prohibition were related to two priestly tasks: distinguishing clean from unclean and teaching the people God’s law.

1. Boundary Marker

The priest knew the details of the sacrificial system. He acted as a representative agent: a boundary (mediator) between God and the people of Israel, but also between Israel and the world. Wine might disorient him. Such self-inflicted disorientation was not permitted. Therefore, if the priests failed to officiate correctly at the sacrifices, God would bring sanctions against both priesthood and people. These boundaries had to be respected. This required sobriety, but it also required the priests to respect God as the sole owner of the drink offerings. More was involved here than the mere sobriety of the priests. This law rested on the distinction between holy and unholy. In this case, the priest, as a fallen man and fallen mankind’s agent, was unholy or unclean. He could not touch wine within the confines of the tabernacle. God is holy; wine was His exclusive property inside the tabernacle. This did not change during the period of the Mosaic Covenant. Only in the New Covenant era, after the resurrection and ascension of Christ, did wine again become lawful for laymen in worship, as it had been for Abram (Gen. 14:18).

Within the tabernacle, there could be discussion and study, just as there was later in the temple (Luke 2:46). When discussing God’s law, men are to be alert. It is their proper service before God, their calling.

But the prohibition applied only to the tabernacle. Why not outside? Because the focus of concern was not the teaching of the law as such; it was the teaching of the law in a holy place. A holy place is a sanctuary: a place sanctified by God. The declaration of the law from within the tabernacle had far greater authority than the declaration of God's law outside the tabernacle. God dwelt with Israel inside the tabernacle. His presence was judicial: throne-related (the mercy seat: Ex. 25:17–22). Any declaration of His law from within His own house had the force of supreme law. The law declared here was not mere advice. It could not be appealed. This was Israel's highest ecclesiastical court of appeal. The priest was acting as a boundary guard on holy ground. This was the boundary. It was not simply that his office was holy; his environment was holy. Jesus did not apply a whip to the backsides of the moneychangers outside the temple, but only inside. It was here that God was most offended. The temple was a house of prayer, the place where men brought their cases before God and sought God's authoritative pronouncements.

2. The Third Book of the Pentateuch

This interpretation is consistent with the structure and role of the Book of Leviticus. It is the third book in the Pentateuch. It is associated with the third point of the biblical covenant model. That point refers to biblical law: moral and judicial boundaries. It also relates to geographical boundaries. Private property is the outworking of this principle of lawful boundaries. God marks off certain boundaries, and then He assigns these marked parcels to specific individuals as His lawful stewards. The eighth commandment, which prohibits theft, is the third in a series of five kingly commandments.⁶

The priest within the tabernacle was a student of biblical law. He was a boundary guard for the people in their role as God's dominion agents. As God's dwelling place, the tabernacle was the place of God's judgment. The tabernacle was therefore sanctified—set apart judicially by God. When in the geographical-judgmental presence of God in the Mosaic Covenant era, the priest had to avoid anything that would make him lightheaded, meaning artificially lighthearted. The priest was also the one who offered sacrifices as a boundary guard whose efforts placated the wrath of God. Offering sacrifices was the crucial official activity within the tabernacle. If the priest was not alert to the ritual requirements of the sacrifices, he risked bringing under judgment both himself and those represented by him.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2: Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 28.

There was a secondary consideration. If the priesthood as a whole failed to declare and observe God's law correctly, this would undermine all lawful judgment: self-judgment, family judgment, civil judgment, and ecclesiastical judgment. This would in turn undermine the dominion activities of the family, the primary agent of dominion in history (Gen. 1:26–28).⁷ The priest was therefore to listen to God's word carefully, for it is a word of judgment. This word included His liturgical word. He was required to adhere to it precisely, just as men are to adhere to His written word precisely. The priest's actions in the tabernacle were therefore representative, which is why Jesus was so outraged by what was going on in the temple (Matt. 21:13).⁸

The king was analogous to God. The king brought negative sanctions in history. He was required to study the law daily (Deut. 17:18–20), but he also had to execute judgment. His task was more closely associated with point four of the biblical covenant: sanctions. Thus, the king was under a sort of double prohibition. He was unwise ever to drink wine, whereas the priests could lawfully drink wine outside the boundaries of the tabernacle.⁹

3. Permanent Prohibitions?

The question arises: Are these prohibitions still in force? The fundamentalist insists that every redeemed person is now a priest. Because of the annulment of Israel's feasts, Christians supposedly are no longer authorized to drink strong drink. The prohibition against drinking wine inside the temple has now been extended to the whole world, the fundamentalist insists. The New Testament is therefore

7. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

8. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 42.

9. R. K. Harrison did not discuss the "inside-outside" aspect of the prohibition. He relates the prohibition to the teaching function of the priesthood, as well as the ritual function, ignoring the obvious: most of this priestly public teaching would have been conducted outside the tabernacle. But there the absolute prohibition did not apply. R. K. Harrison, Leviticus: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1980), pp. 114–18.

seen as far more hostile to wine than the Old Testament was.

The problem with this viewpoint is that wine was legitimate for the priest outside of tabernacle services, unless he had taken a Nazarite's vow (Num. 6:20; Jud. 13:7), which also prohibited grape juice and even raisins—an aged grape product not on the fundamentalists' list of innately evil products. Why should the extension of the priesthood to every Christian require the removal of wine from the tables of the land? It is the essence of Christianity's doctrine of the priesthood of all believers that all believers who are members in good standing are allowed to enter the temple and partake of the communion feast of God. God's full table is now open to us. He now shares with us by His grace the wine that had been ritually poured out exclusively to Him under the Mosaic Covenant. The entire priesthood can now lawfully partake of this wine inside the temple.

The Roman Catholic Church has reversed the Mosaic Covenant's prohibition in formal worship: only the priest may drink communion wine, since it supposedly becomes Christ's literal blood.¹⁰ The Catholic layman is denied access to the full table. Outside of worship, the Catholic Church teaches, wine is as legitimate today as it was in the Mosaic economy.

In contrast to both positions, fundamentalist and Roman Catholic, the Reformed or Lutheran Christian says that this Mosaic restriction on the priest was annulled by the establishment of the Lord's Supper, which commands all followers of Christ to take wine. Presumably, the New Covenant king is also allowed to drink wine, since the King of kings made wine at the wedding at Cana. Jesus made wine, not grape juice. The reason why it was customary to serve the less expensive wine later in a feast (John 2:10) was that people's sense of taste would have been impaired by the previous consumption of wine. A declining sense of discriminating taste is not a problem with the consumption of grape juice. (I have never heard of "discriminating taste" regarding grape juice. International grape juice competitions are quite rare. The product is seldom advertised.)

10. On what legal basis are Catholic layman allowed to eat Christ's body? What is so special about the blood?

C. The Boundary of the Heart¹¹

The Mosaic Covenant required that the tablets of the law be placed in the Ark of the Covenant. They were written on stone. The New Covenant is different. Now the law is written on the hearts of regenerate people. The old sanctuary is no more. The Epistle to the Hebrews announces with respect to the annulment of the Mosaic Covenant and the Mosaic sanctuary:

For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second. For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord. For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more. In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away. Then verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary. For there was a tabernacle made; the first, wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the shewbread; which is called the sanctuary. And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the Holiest of all; Which had the golden censer, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant (Heb. 8:7–9:4).

The contrast here is between the Old Covenant and the New, between the old tabernacle and the new. The main issue in this passage is the erasure of physical boundaries that had separated the Mosaic Covenant worshipper from the tablets of the law and the exclusive area of the high priest's annual sacrifice. After the invasion by Babylon, the Ark of the Covenant was lost forever. But the veil of the temple performed the same separating function. This ended with the death of Christ. "And the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom" (Mark 15:38). The Mosaic Covenant that God made with their fathers has been superseded. The boundary that had kept the vast majority of Israelites from exercising righteous covenantal judgment had been the barrier in their hearts. The Holy Spirit has now come and has circumcised the hearts of God's New Covenant people (Rom. 2:29). The Mosaic Covenant's laws of sacrifice also no longer apply. The preservation of justice is now based primarily on the presence of God's covenant law in the hearts of God's people. Covenant law moves outward from the heart to every human institution. In this sense, the New Covenant broke the institutional boundaries of the Mosaic Covenant. "For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him" (Rom. 10:12). That sovereign Lord rules in terms of His law.

11. "And the LORD thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live" (Deut. 30:6). "Circumcise yourselves to the LORD, and take away the foreskins of your heart, ye men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem: lest my fury come forth like fire, and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil of your doings" (Jer. 4:4).

One physical boundary between man and God in the Mosaic Covenant was wine. The priest could not drink it during worship. It was a ritual barrier. Wine in worship visibly represented a judicial boundary between God and man, just as the tree of knowledge did in the garden. Wine still does, but in a totally different way. The sacraments physically mark the boundary between God and man. This is the reason for the ritual use of wine in New Covenant times. Those who do not have legal access to this wine are warned by the very existence of the ceremony that they are judicially separated from God. The wine boundary keeps covenant-breakers outside the special protection of God—His positive sanctions—but God requires covenant-keepers to partake of it.¹² This includes covenant-keeping kings.

D. The Supreme Civil Ruler

Then what of the strong advice against the civil ruler's use of alcohol? "It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes strong drink: Lest they drink, and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted" (Prov. 31:4–5). Did this advice cease with the extension of the kingship to the New Covenant citizen? Or does the advice now extend to the New Covenant citizen because of his additional authority?

12. An exception is valid for former alcoholics: weaker brethren (I Cor. 8:9).

To discover the answer, let us first examine the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. All New Covenant citizens are required to partake. This includes all civil rulers. They may refuse to accept the terms of church membership, but, morally speaking, they are supposed to.¹³ The exclusion of the common people of God from the holy (legally separated) food of the sacrament is no longer valid. The priest is no longer given special access to the table and the shewbread; the wine is no longer to be poured out as an offering. The primary threat of wine in temple service was not that it can cause drunkenness; the primary threat was based on a ritual (judicially representational) boundary between man and God. The threat to the priest was his violation of a sanctuary boundary, not his drunkenness as such.

This was not the case with the supreme civil ruler during the Mosaic economy. Here, the threat was said to be drunkenness. That threat still exists. Drinking wine was advised against by Proverbs 31, but this had nothing to do with ritual participation in temple worship, to which kings did not have legal access. The warning of Proverbs 31 is therefore not annulled today. The question today is: What was the nature of the restriction? The answer is not found in the Mosaic law itself. The prohibition does not appear among the case laws. It appears in the wisdom literature. This does not mean that it may be safely ignored by civil rulers. It means only that there are no predictable, covenantal, negative civil or ecclesiastical sanctions attached to it.

In ancient kingship, the office was inseparable from the person. There was no boundary between his person and his office. In the modern world, this is no longer true. There are no modern kings who possess supreme judicial power by virtue of their persons, except in a few small, backward, tribal nations. In modern judicial theory, all supreme rulers can be deposed. They are not "to the office born." There is no doctrine of the divine right of kings, meaning an office beyond which there is no earthly legal appeal.

The drinking habits of the Mosaic Covenant era king had to be placed under tight control, and this control was mainly self-control. There was no higher earthly judicial authority for men to appeal to except the priesthood or a prophet when a king failed to exercise lawful judgment. Kingship was not an occupation; it was a lifetime position. There was often a public anointing of the king. So, his self-control had to be superior to that exercised by common men or even priests except when they were officiating inside the temple's boundaries. The senior civil ruler was not supposed to drink wine, because drunkenness in him was too great a threat to the whole commonwealth, not just to him. He was the final civil court of appeal. The alcohol issue for him was both judicial and representational. He held a monopoly judicial position, and he held it for life. Remove the equation of office and person, and you remove the judicial basis of the Proverbs prohibition. Life-time control over the highest judicial office in the land did bring with it a unique degree of personal responsibility, but kings are no more. Civil authority is deliberately divided in modern governments.

13. Judicially speaking, too. See Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

Today, we legally separate the office from the person who occupies it. A legal boundary is present that separates the civil office from its holder. No one has discussed this post-medieval development more profoundly than Max Weber. Writing after World War I, Weber observed: "It is decisive for the modern loyalty to an office that, in the pure type, it does not establish a relationship to a person, like the vassal's or disciple's faith under feudal or patrimonial authority, but rather is devoted to impersonal and functional purposes. . . . The political official—at least in the fully developed modern state—is not considered the personal servant of a ruler."¹⁴ The ruler's word is not law. His word is governed by law. He answers to courts and voters. They can bring judicial sanctions against him if he violates the law. They can remove him from office.

Thus, in a world without kingship, there is no longer any binding prohibition against alcohol. In any case, this law never did apply to civil rulers generally. It only applied to the king. The king was analogous to the high priest. Both were at the top of their respective judicial hierarchies. Today, there are neither high priests nor kings. European kingship formally disappeared at the end of the First World War, but in Great Britain, it disappeared judicially in the late seventeenth century when Parliament asserted final sovereignty during the Glorious Revolution of 1688–89.

Then who today is the king? To whom does the law apply? To no one specifically, but to everyone in his capacity as judge. Today, all citizens exercise civil rule when they vote. The Reformation's doctrine, "every (redeemed) man a priest," becomes the modern democratic principle of secular humanism, "every citizen a king." But of course no citizen is a true king. There are no true kings any longer. There is no supreme civil authority, except perhaps during wartime, when one man is designated commander-in-chief.¹⁵ Then on what basis today can a citizen-civil ruler boundary distinction based on alcohol be maintained? The threat of excessive alcohol consumption is now everyone's threat: "Wherefore be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is. And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit" (Eph. 5:17–18). The Holy Spirit fills each of God's covenant people, not just the civil rulers. To be drunk with wine threatens this supernatural filling. The biblical issue here is the righteous exercise of wisdom. It was in the Mosaic Covenant, too.

14. Max Weber, Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, eds. Guenther Roth and Claus Wittich (New York: Bedminster Press, [1924] 1968), p. 959.

Negative sanctions against civil magistrates who drink during their assigned hours for rendering judgment are not specified in the Bible. These sanctions could be political, although there are few indications that drunkenness has in any significant way reduced the electoral success of politicians. When Christian political activist Paul Weyrich in 1989 challenged the appointment of former United States Senator John Tower to the office of Secretary of Defense because of Tower's reputation as a heavy drinker and womanizer, Weyrich was initially challenged by the committee of United States Senators who were responsible for recommending to the entire Senate the vote to approve or disapprove the President's nomination. At first, it looked as though no one in high office would take Weyrich seriously. Only weeks later did public pressure build against Tower, officially because of his financial connections with the armaments industry. The Senate eventually refused to confirm the nomination. The President had to nominate someone else. But former Senator and former Presidential nominee Barry Goldwater ridiculed Weyrich's objections. Referring to the capitol city of Washington, D.C., he said: "If they had chased every man or woman out of this town who had shacked up with somebody else or gotten drunk, there'd be no government."¹⁶ From time to time, scandals will lead to a politician's demise, but seldom is drunkenness alone sufficient grounds of the public's wrath. This sin is too easily covered up by his colleagues.

15. Winston Churchill drank heavily throughout his tenure as Prime Minister of England during World War II. He began drinking in late afternoon and continued until late at night, yet this did not seem to impede his judgment. John Charmley, Churchill: The End of Glory—A Political Biography (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1993), p. 549.

16. John G. Tower, Consequences: A Personal and Political Memoir (Boston: Little, Brown, 1991), p. 330. Tower died in a plane crash a few months after this book was published.

E. Breaking Cultural Boundaries

Grape juice cannot expand until it begins to ferment. It then loses its character as grape juice. The kingdom of God broke the boundaries of the Old Covenant, just as new wine breaks old wineskins (Matt. 9:17). The imagery of broken wineskins testifies to a new, expanding kingdom that is no longer confined by old geographical and cultural boundaries. The new kingdom means a new mentality: dominion-oriented, expansionist, and comprehensive in its scope. This imagery was present in Old Covenant Israel, as the use of wine indicates: wine was not universally prohibited, and prior to the Mosaic economy, it was even allowed to the priesthood. "And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was the priest of the most high God" (Gen. 14:18). Isaac's blessing of Jacob demonstrates the link between wine and dominion:

Therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine: Let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee: be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee: cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blesseth thee (Gen. 27:28–29).

The boundary of wine for the priests testified that Israel was under temporary constraints geographically. The Mosaic element of world-wide dominion was not operable to the same extent as it is in the New Covenant.

The worldview of fundamentalism denies the reality of an expanding kingdom in history, meaning before Christ returns in person to set up an earthly kingdom. The kingdom of God is said to be limited to the family and the church. In some extreme formulations, the kingdom of God is equated only with the church; even the family is understood to be outside it. Wrote English Baptist pastor Peter Masters: "God is especially concerned with His people. He will not give His kingdom to the world, nor will He give the world to His kingdom. The kingdom of God is the church. . . ."¹⁷ In such a formulation, the state and society in general do not qualify even as aspects of the kingdom of God. The fundamentalist does not believe that there will ever be a time in church history when God's kingdom will transform social institutions. Masters went on in this vein: "Where Christians have previously attempted to construct even a very limited Christian society their efforts have been sadly frustrated."¹⁸ According to this view of history, a millennium of medieval society was either at bottom religiously neutral or else it was not really a society. This is the history of Western civilization according to Voltaire, Diderot, and the Enlightenment generally. It is fundamentalism's worldview, too, which is why there is a continuing operational alliance between pietism and humanism.¹⁹

17. Peter Masters, "World Dominion: The High Ambition of Reconstructionism," Sword & Trowel (May 1990), p. 18.

Grape juice is the pietist's preference: a sweet, red liquid that looks like wine but has no bite, bubble, or joy to it. Fundamentalists do not use wine in any form because wine can be misused by undisciplined people. (They are not equally wary about their diets and their weight. It is fermented sugar that arouses their wrath, not unfermented.)²⁰ The imagery of broken wineskins also does not appeal to pietistic fundamentalists. They want to keep those old wineskins intact. The thought of cultural wine that breaks the institutional structures of society is foreign to their thinking. Like wine, cultural and political power can be abused, so they reject it as a matter of morality. Thus, Christians are supposed to shun power, influence, and culture in the same way that they are to shun wine. Culture means dirty movies and perversion; people who even study cultural affairs are risking being engulfed by a morally polluting worldliness. Rev. Masters was emphatic about the relationship between "endless discussion of social, economic, educational and political theories" and the enjoyment of art, which is inescapably worldly. "In many cases it leads in a subtle way to worldliness. (After all, if Christians are commissioned to take dominion over the arts, and so on, they had better start by participating in them and enjoying them.)"²¹ Understand, this is Dr. Masters—theologically con-

18. Ibid., p. 19.

19. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 43–44, 135–36, 144, 147, 151, 179–80, 258, 277–78. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

20. Typical of the fundamentalist mindset is the concordance at the back of the Scofield Reference Bible (Oxford University Press, 1909). If you are trying to locate Deuteronomy 21:20, "And they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard," you can find it by looking up the word "drunkard," but not "glutton." Similarly with Proverbs 23:21: "For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty: and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags." There is no reference at all to "glutton" in the concordance.

21. Masters, "World Dominion," p. 19.

sistent Dr. Masters—not some raving backwoods preacher of the early nineteenth-century American frontier. As the institutional heir to Charles Spurgeon, Masters nevertheless abandoned the broad cultural learning of his Calvinistic predecessor, who had no college degree but did have a wide-ranging interest in society and culture.

Pietistic fundamentalists do not have confidence in those fellow Christians who would exercise public authority in the name of Christ and in terms of His law. They prefer to be ruled by pagans. Similarly, they have no faith in culture.

F. Boundaries of Work and Play

The biblical office of king no longer exists; therefore, neither does the judicial prohibition against alcohol. The subordinate civil offices do exist, but the prohibition never did apply to them (Deut. 14:26). What about any other basis of prohibition? The author of Proverbs tells us that “To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven” (Eccl. 3:1). There is also “A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace” (Eccl. 3:8). There are times to celebrate and times to exercise judgment. These times are not the same. Thus, when the subordinate ruler exercised judgment under the Mosaic Covenant, he was presumably not supposed to drink, just as the priest was not to drink wine when officiating. The key factor here is officiating—to exercise the office. Why should we imagine that this has changed? It hasn’t.

It is clear why liquor and justice do not mix. The ruler is required by God to render judgment in His name. This judgment must apply the general principles of biblical justice to specific infractions. This work takes considerable skill. A person who is under the influence of alcohol in this task is to that degree not under the influence of God’s law. But why should this not be true in every other instance? Why is the decision-making of civil law crucial? The answer: because the civil magistrate renders judgment in God’s name.

Whenever good judgment is required for the safety of others, equally rigorous standards are required. Pilots of airplanes are not allowed to drink liquor for hours prior to flights. Were it not so common for automobile drivers to drink before driving, thereby making it difficult for prosecutors to get juries to convict drunk drivers, harsh economic sanctions would be applied to those driving while intoxicated. Other people are at risk; thus, the person under the influence of alcohol or drugs is a threat to society.

But what about after work? Why should alcohol be prohibited, if the person does not subsequently drive? What about relaxation? There is no biblical prohibition. The enjoyment of conviviality is sometimes enhanced by the loosening of inhibitions that alcohol produces. This is the “merry heart” phenomenon: the reduction of worldly cares that interfere with interpersonal relationships. The merry heart is a legitimate goal when one’s work is completed. “Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works” (Eccl. 9:7). Anyone who would translate the Hebrew word for wine as “grape juice” in this passage is personally unfamiliar with the merrying effects of wine—and proud of it!

Modern fundamentalism views the God of the Old Testament as horribly harsh. For example, God’s law requires witnesses to stone those convicted of a capital crime. “The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hands of all the people. So thou shalt put the evil away from among you” (Deut. 17:7). Such judicial barbarism is not required today, they tell us. “We’re under grace, not law.” (In fact, Christians are today universally under covenant-breakers and their laws.) Yet at the same time, they view the God of Israel as far too morally lax, allowing people to drink alcohol. In both cases, Mosaic law is a great embarrassment to them. They do not consider an alternative viewpoint, namely, that pietistic fundamentalism is a great embarrassment to God.²²

Conclusion

Is the prohibition against wine judicially relevant in New Testament times? No. The offices to which the prohibition applied—priest and king—no longer exist. The average citizen has legal access to the offices of minister and senior civil ruler, if he meets certain specified judicial criteria. Neither office is attained through inheritance in modern society. The Mosaic priesthood has not been inherited since its demise at the fall of Jerusalem.

The prohibition against wine for priests was limited by the boundary of formal worship before God’s throne. The issue here was the ritual monopoly over wine possessed by God. He refused to share this wine with the people or their representatives. Holy Communion changed this: ministers and members can and must partake of God's blessing. The prohibition applied to kings because of the unique judicial boundary of their own persons. The issue here was the proper rendering of judgment, not ritual exclusion.

22. Reformed pietism is also equally embarrassed by the Old Testament. Its defenders are repulsed by the thought of the capital sanction of stoning, but some of them do enjoy drinking.

The warning to the king is still with us: when rendering formal judgment or performing actions that place others under risk, wine and strong drink are still prohibited. Wine is for celebration after daily work is over. A mild alteration of the senses in this case is legitimate, for the responsibility of rendering daily judgment is past. This points to a view of life that renounces the stress of perpetual, inherited responsibility—the kind of responsibility appropriate only to Old Covenant kings. The pressures of New Covenant responsibility ebb and flow; they are not to become continual. The internally stressful lives of modern men point to their violation of the biblical rhythm of responsibility and celebration. Instead of hard work followed by relaxation, men today adopt killing stress and worry alternating with mindless, addictive escapism: distilled liquor, drugs, and television.

We are not to become either alcoholics or workaholics. We are also not to become either abstainers or slothful. Alcoholism is a denial of personal responsibility. Abstaining from all liquor is also a denial of personal responsibility: "If I take one drink, I'll become an alcoholic."²³ Both are wrong. Workaholism is a denial of God's sovereignty. It is the attitude of autonomy: "My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17b).²⁴ Slothfulness is a denial of man's responsibility.

The New Testament prohibition against drunkenness is a boundary against alcoholism (Eph. 5:17–18). But God also mandates fermented wine for His Supper, a judicial rejection of the mentality of the absolute prohibition against liquor, which in turn leads to the withdrawal from culture and its responsibilities. Similarly, the law of the sabbath is an affront to workaholics: a judicial barrier. It is also an affront to the slothful: six days we are to work.

Responsibility involves the recognition and honoring of the boundary between hard work and addiction to work. It also involves recognizing and honoring the boundary between feasting and gluttony, between making merry and getting drunk. Jesus' enemies accused Him

23. This may be true for recovered alcoholics. They are under a God's physiological curse because of their former rebellion.

24. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 21.

of having transgressed both of these boundaries: “The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. But wisdom is justified of her children” (Matt. 11:19).

Modern man thinks of himself as wise, but he is foolish. He refuses to recognize God’s boundaries. He ignores them and then risks falling into personal addiction, or else he creates absolute but artificial boundaries where none exist in God’s word, and he then falls into a cramped personal legalism that frequently produces cultural irrelevance. Man finds many ways to deny God’s boundaries. These ways are all illegitimate.

9

BIBLICAL QUARANTINE

And the leper in whom the plague is, his clothes shall be rent, and his head bare, and he shall put a covering upon his upper lip, and shall cry, Unclean, unclean. All the days wherein the plague shall be in him he shall be defiled; he is unclean: he shall dwell alone; without the camp shall his habitation be (Lev. 13:45–46).

The theocentric principle here is a boundary that is imposed by God as a means of judgment: biblical leprosy.

A. Leprosy as a Curse

We come now to the longest passage in the Bible that deals with a specific law. This is the law of plague or leprosy. It fills two very long chapters in the Bible, Leviticus 13 and 14. Leviticus 13 presents the law as it applied to the priest: examining whether or not a person had been afflicted with plague or leprosy. Leviticus 14 deals with the specified sacrifices that enabled a person who had been healed from the plague or leprosy to be cleansed judicially and then re-enter the congregation of the Lord. Leviticus 14 also deals with the extremely peculiar phenomenon, namely, plague of garments and houses.

The theocentric meaning of this law is that Mosaic-era leprosy was a sign of God's curses in history and eternity. God's curses separate some men from others. Mosaic-era leprosy testified to the ultimate separation of heaven from hell, of the New Heaven and New Earth from the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15). Community is therefore evidence of God's grace. Autonomy, as a theory of separation, is a demonic social theory. God's final curse against self-professed autonomous man is eternal separation.

This law was given by God directly to Moses and Aaron (v. 1). The priesthood enforced this law, not the Levites (v. 2). This means, first of all, that there was a civil function for the priesthood. The civil magistrate had to enforce the declaration of the priest. Second, while the text does not say so, this law indicates that a priest had to reside in every city. He did not offer sacrifice there. Jerusalem was the exclusive place of official sacrifice after David captured the city. The priesthood performed a civil function: declaring people and things unclean within the boundaries of a city.

I argue in this chapter that the leprosy of Leviticus was not a communicable biological disease but rather a judicial affliction. It was not what is known today as Hansen's disease. The quarantine law governing this affliction applied only within a city. Thus, it was a very peculiar disease.

B. The Plague on a House

Instead of going into great detail about the nature of either plague or leprosy as it affected the individual human being, I want to discuss the plague on a house. The plague was not simply inside the confines of the house; it was literally on it. By beginning here, I focus on what I believe is the crucial point: this plague was judicial in its frame of reference, not biological.¹ We can recognize this more clearly in the case of inanimate objects. The house law, which was given in the wilderness period, specified that when the people came into the land of Canaan, and built houses or inherited houses, those houses would sometimes be subjected to the curse of plague. It began: "When ye be come into the land of Canaan, which I give to you for a possession, and I put the plague of leprosy in a house of the land of your possession. . . ." (Lev. 14:34). This law was restricted to Canaan, as we shall see.

God said that He would put the plague of leprosy on a house. When the owner of the house discovered an outbreak of mold in the house's walls, he was required to go to the priest and inform him of the fact:

And he that owneth the house shall come and tell the priest, saying,
It seemeth to me there is as it were a plague in the house: Then the

1. The rabbis interpreted this law as applying only to Israelites and proselytes, not to resident aliens. Jacob Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, vol. 3 of The Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 1991), p. 772. This view is called into question because Naaman, a Syrian military leader, contracted the disease (II Kings 5). He was not an Israelite or a proselyte. The Syrians had invaded Israel (v. 2); this boundary violation may have been the basis of his leprosy, despite his honor before God (v. 1). Naaman's cure was to dip himself seven times in the Jordan River, the boundary that separated Israel from the world (v. 14).

priest shall command that they empty the house, before the priest go into it to see the plague, that all that is in the house be not made unclean: and afterward the priest shall go in to see the house: And he shall look on the plague, and, behold, if the plague be in the walls of the house with hollow strakes, greenish or reddish, which in sight [are] lower than the wall; Then the priest shall go out of the house to the door of the house, and shut up the house seven days (Lev. 14: 35–38).

1. The Sanctity of the Priest

It is important to understand that before entering the house, the priest saw to it that everything movable inside the house was first removed. It is specifically said that this would keep everything inside the house from becoming unclean. “Then the priest shall command that they empty the house, before the priest go into it to see the plague, that all that is in the house be not made unclean: and afterward the priest shall go in to see the house” (Lev. 14:35). After the house was emptied, the priest would go into the house. This indicates very clearly that the problem was not the spread of disease inside the house, but rather the judicial sanctity of the priest. If this sanctified agent were to enter the house when the house was under suspicion, this would make all of the implements and furniture of the house unclean if the house was found to be unclean. The boundary here was primarily judicial rather than biological. The house was not judicially unclean until the priest crossed its doorway boundary. He himself would not become unclean. When he did cross it, if he then corroborated the symptoms, everything inside the house at the time of his entrance would become unclean: walls, floors, ceilings.

The text does not say that the things inside the house would become unclean after the priest entered the house only if the house itself was biologically unclean. The text says that everything in the house would become legally unclean merely by the priest’s entering into the house in order to inspect it. This indicates that it was the priest’s legal status, as an agent of God, that produced the unclean judicial status of the things inside the house. The house itself was only under suspicion. Everything in the house therefore came under suspicion. It was the entrance of the priest into the house that transformed suspicion into the actual legal status of being unclean.

When the priest crossed the boundary of the house—that is to say, when he crossed the door or threshold—his legal status as a holy agent of God created the unclean status of everything inside. Conclusion: these two chapters are primarily concerned with legal status rather than biological condition. If this was not the case, then why wasn't it mandatory to burn the furniture that had been moved outside the house? Why wasn't the furniture contagious? Because this plague was not biologically transmitted. It was judicially transmitted.

2. A Week of Testing

The priest, upon finding signs of the plague in the interior stones of the house, would then shut the house up for seven days. At the end of this period, he would return and look again. If the plague had spread in the walls of the house, then the priest had the afflicted stones removed and cast into an unclean place. This meant outside the city. Then the stones in the house near the now-missing stones would be scraped, and the dust scraped from these stones would also be cast outside the city into the specified unclean place. Then the owner would replace the missing stones. If the plague returned after the first stones had been removed, the priest would come again to see if the plague had spread into the walls of the house. If it had, the priest would then break down the walls of the house, the stones, the timber, the mortar, and everything that constituted the house, and all these materials would then be carried outside the city and cast into the unclean place (14:39–45).

The person living in the house during its time of testing became unclean every time he entered the house. He was required to wash his clothes daily. Anyone eating inside the house also became unclean, and was required to wash his clothes daily (14:47). This indicates that the problem of the house was not biological; it was judicial. Washing one's clothing was not a biological defense; it was a ritual defense. People in ancient Israel did not contract biologically transmitted diseases to which houses were equally vulnerable.

Even the thought of a house's being vulnerable to a disease indicates the judicial nature of these chapters. Houses today do not get diseases. Clothing does not get diseases. We are not required to burn clothing because some kind of visible mold or disease has broken out in the clothing. We may wash it or boil it or dispose of it, but we are not required by law to burn it. "Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances, (Touch not; taste not; handle not; Which all are to perish with the using;) after the commandments and doctrines of men?" (Col. 2:20–22). Similarly, we do not find instances where houses come under attack by such dangerous spores or microbes that it becomes necessary to tear down the house and throw the remains outside the city. Yet it is obvious that such external afflictions were, if not common, at least possible in Old Covenant Israel. This indicates that these afflictions were part of the burden of being covenanted to God—in close proximity to the house of God, or to the covenanted people of God—and therefore greater responsibility was inescapable for the person residing inside the cities of Israel.

It was the priest's declaration of a suspected house that would make ritually unclean everything inside the house at the time that he entered it. It was not a biological organism that would make everything inside the house unclean. Individuals who entered the house would become ritually unclean, which is why they had to wash their clothes (14:46–47). It was legal status that was in question, not biological status. The proof of this is the requirement that a house that had been pronounced unclean and re-plastered, when found to be healed, had to have a ritual cleansing. The priest cleansed the house with two birds, cedar wood, scarlet, and hyssop (14:49–53). He killed one of the birds in an earthen vessel over running water. He took the cedar wood and the hyssop and the scarlet and the living bird and dipped them into the blood of the slain bird and in the running water then he would sprinkle the house seven times. The text actually says that the house was cleansed by the blood of the dead bird, the running water, the living bird, the cedar wood, the hyssop, and the scarlet (14:52). The legal status of unclean went from the house to the dead bird, and from there to the live bird. The priest then was to let the living bird out of the city into the open fields, thereby making an atonement for the house, in order to make it clean (14:53). An unclean thing could not legally remain inside the city. The bird flew away, carrying the unclean legal status of the house. Conclusion: the threat was judicial; so was the cure. Thus, all attempts to turn this law into a law of physical cleanliness are misguided.

C. The Diseased Individual: Separation or Inclusion

Walls, clothing, skin: they are all boundaries. They separate the inside from the outside. Mold that was visible from the outside marked the house, clothing, or person as legally unclean. If the problem was not dealt with ritually, it altered the legal status of whatever was inside the boundary.

With this background in mind, let us turn now to the diseased individual. It is very easy for the commentator to spend a lot of space describing the details of the physical afflictions. R. K. Harrison spends several pages on such details.² It is easy for a person to believe that these physical details are in some way related to the details of diseases in our day—easy, but incorrect. The leprosy spoken of in these chapters was not what we call leprosy today, or Hansen's disease.³ It was something entirely different. The treatment required by the text applies to no known skin disease, which would not disappear in a few weeks; the Bible's quarantine test period would have been medically ineffectual⁴. Therefore, Milgrom concludes, "these rules are grounded not in medicine but in ritual."⁵ It was an aspect of the impurity system; it was associated with death, as we see in the case of Miriam: "Let her not be as one dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed when he cometh out of his mother's womb" (Num. 12:12).⁶

Milgrom concludes that this skin disease was inflicted because of rebellion against God: religious rather than civil crimes.⁷ The problem is, the text does not say this explicitly, although the sins of Miriam (Num. 12:14–15), Gehazi (II Kings 5:27), and Uzziah (II Chron. 26:17–21) did result in their affliction.

One of the most remarkable aspects of this plague was the law governing the degree of affliction. "Then the priest shall consider: and, behold, if the leprosy have covered all his flesh, he shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague: it is all turned white: he is clean" (Lev. 13:13). What this says is that if an individual was completely covered with leprosy, turning his flesh entirely white, he was then pronounced clean. This means that he had legal access to the tabernacle or to any other element of corporate worship in Israel. He posed no threat to his

2. R. K. Harrison, Leviticus: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity, 1980), pp. 140–47.

3. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16, p. 816. Harrison, rare among modern commentators, denied this: Leviticus, p. 138. Milgrom traced this confusion to the ninth-century Arab physician, John of Damascus: Leviticus 1–16, p. 816.

4. Milgrom cited Marvin Engel, a dermatologist: Leviticus 1–16, p. 817.

5. Ibid., p. 818.

6. Ibid., p. 819.

7. Ibid., p. 821.

neighbors, either ritually or biologically.⁸ He was not contagious. We would normally think of the leprosy as being an affliction that required him to be totally separate, permanently. This is not the case. A partial affliction of leprosy did require his separation. So did all of the other sores and discolorations of the flesh that are described in Leviticus 13. Nevertheless, the individual who was completely afflicted became legally clean.

This fact is additional evidence of my thesis that the fundamental issue was not biological, but rather judicial. Rabbi S. R. Hirsch believed that this disease was sent directly by God.⁹ Surely this was true in the case of a plague-infested house. "When ye be come into the land of Canaan, which I give to you for a possession, and I put the plague of leprosy in a house of the land of your possession" (Lev. 14: 34). The legal issue was not biological contagion; it was obedience. "Take heed in the plague of leprosy, that thou observe diligently, and do according to all that the priests the Levites shall teach you: as I commanded them, so ye shall observe to do. Remember what the LORD thy God did unto Miriam by the way, after that ye were come forth out of Egypt" (Deut. 24:8–9). She had sinned by challenging the prophetic office of Moses (Num. 12:1–2). She was shut out of the camp for seven days (Num. 12:15)—not because of the leprosy, which had been total, but because of her rebellion (Num. 12:14).

When an individual was so completely afflicted by the whitening of his skin, he became like God: pure white (Dan. 7:9; Rev. 1:14). This is why God discusses man's sins as scarlet, and promises that they will be white as snow: "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the LORD: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool" (Isa. 1:18). The red splotchy marks on the body made the individual legally unclean. If the white leprosy replaced those marks, he became legally clean.

This means that the individual could be restored to his status as clean in one of two ways: either by becoming totally afflicted by the leprosy or by becoming totally unafflicted by any of the diseases of the skin. What would otherwise have been regarded as total affliction became a means of judicial liberation.

In my opinion, this points directly to Christ's suffering on the cross. He became totally afflicted, yet this led to his death, resurrection, and ascension, and it also led to the liberation of His people. Bearing the comprehensive judgment of God in his flesh, He liberated mankind. In a much more limited sense, the Israelite who bore the total affliction of leprosy in his own flesh liberated himself judicially from the penalty of exclusion from the city.

8. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 203.

9. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch, trans. by Isaac Levy, 5 vols., 2nd ed. (Gateshead, London: Judaica Press, [1867–78] 1989), III, p. 331: Leviticus 13:2.

D. Mandatory Atonement

What must be stressed here is that this law was not based on considerations of public biological health; it was based on public judicial health. For the individual to be restored to full communion within the congregation, he had to make four of the five sacrifices of Leviticus: the burnt offering (14:13), the cereal offering (14:10), the sin offering (14:19), and the guilt offering (14:13). Only the voluntary peace offering was absent.¹⁰

1. Reparation and Adoption

The main problem here is to explain the guilt offering. The guilt offering was a reparation offering: the settling of a debt. Why did leprosy involve a debt to God? The commentators have trouble with this question.¹¹ I see the answer in the way in which this offering was to be administered: anointing the right ear lobe, the right thumb, and the right big toe with oil (v. 17). The boring of the man's ear to the doorpost was the bondservant's mark of his voluntary adoption as a permanent household servant in another man's family (Ex. 21:6; Deut. 15: 17). The amputation of the right thumb and right big toe was a mark of a defeated warrior (Jud. 1:7), leaving him with reduced balance and with the greatly reduced ability to draw a bowstring. The person anointed with oil had his ear, thumb, and toe symbolically restored. He re-entered the army of the Lord and could lawfully remain inside the camp of God's holy army. Because he had been outside the camp, and therefore outside the priestly army of the Lord, he had to demonstrate that he was willing to pay a kind of priestly re-entrance fee—a fee analogous to the payments required of those who sought adoption into the family of Levi (Lev. 27:2–8).¹² The reparation offering constituted this payment. The alien seeking adoption had to be circumcised.

10. Wenham, Leviticus, pp. 209–10.

11. Ibid., p. 210.

12. Chapter 36.

Because this barrier did not exist for a formerly leprous Israelite, he was required to cross a different barrier.

2. Disinheritance

This indicates that these specified diseases were primarily regarded as judicial afflictions rather than biological afflictions. They marked covenantal death: disinheritance. Furthermore, the requirement that the individual be cast out of the congregation means that he would have to be forced outside the boundaries of any city. On the other hand, a diseased person who lived in a rural area (as did most of the inhabitants of Israel at the beginning) would not have to leave his home or his family. He was not eligible for the army, however, being excluded from Passover in Jerusalem and also from the holy camp during wartime, but he could remain in his home. He became the judicial equivalent of an uncircumcised resident alien: a stranger in his own land.

This law was a major threat to those residents who owned no land in Israel, or whose land had been leased to another family until the jubilee year. Such individuals had no legal claim to any place of residence. They could not enter a city during a time of a foreign invasion. Without lawful access to Passover, held in a holy place (the tabernacle or temple), they lost their citizenship. They became charity cases in need of mercy.

There was another resident of the city who, above all, would have been threatened by the laws governing plague and leprosy. This was the individual who had fled to a city refuge in order to escape the judgment of the blood avenger (kinsman redeemer) (Num. 35).¹³ Only with the death of the high priest could he safely venture outside the city (Num. 35:28). Thus, for an individual who was residing in a city of refuge in order to escape death at the hands of a blood-avenger, exile from the city was the equivalent of a death sentence. Partial leprosy was one way that God could bring judgment to a man who had committed premeditated murder, but who had persuaded the judges in the city of refuge that the death of the other individual was an accident. God would merely have to bring the plague of partial leprosy on him, and the priest would require him to leave the protection of the city of refuge.

13. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 21.

E. Legal Status, Not Medical Status

The text does not tell us that an individual afflicted by any of these diseases was inherently evil. There is no indication that he must have committed any kind of sin in order to be afflicted in such a way. The disease would come upon him at the discretion of God. The priest was not to inquire regarding a potential trespass on the individual's part. Nevertheless, in order for the individual to be restored after the disappearing of the disease, he did have to make a trespass offering (sacrifice four) along with three other sacrifices. The priest in his capacity as a leprosy inspector was therefore neither a religious counselor nor a public health official in the modern sense, i.e., biological defense. He was the individual who declared a person legally clean or legally unclean. He declared a person's judicial status in the eyes of God. The individual who was declared unclean was then sent outside the city. He was required to tear his clothes, to leave his head bare, and to put a covering on his upper lip. He also had to cry "Unclean, unclean" (Lev. 13:45). The rending of one's garments was an indication of mourning (II Sam. 1:11).¹⁴ Job's three friends came to mourn with him; they tore their garments in his presence (Job 2:12). When the person afflicted with leprosy tore his garment, he was testifying to his legal status, not his biological status. His legal status was reflected in his biological status, not the other way around. Leprosy was a sign, therefore, of covenantal death: the judicial status of a dead man, which authorized his legal and physical separation by an official, in this case a priest. "To live outside the camp was to be cut off from the blessings of the covenant."¹⁵

F. Economic Costs

From an economic standpoint, the most significant aspect of all of these laws is that neither the state nor the church was required by God to support the afflicted person financially. An individual could lose his house. Nevertheless, the state was not required to rebuild a new house for him. Similarly, an individual would lose his job, his place of residence, his access to the fellowship of the saints in corporate worship, and almost everything else that an urban resident would enjoy. Nevertheless, neither the state nor the ecclesiastical hierarchy was required to provide any kind of relief or other aid to this individual. This does not mean that voluntary charity was not appropriate. Obviously, it was very appropriate. Nevertheless, the state was not enjoined to compensate the individual for the losses that the individual would sustain. He sustained the losses, not because he was a biological threat to society, but because he was a judicial threat to society. He was a person whose legal status before God had changed. This change had manifested itself as a biological affliction: the mark of covenantal death.

14. Wenham, Leviticus, p. 200. He cites Ezekiel 24:17, 22: covering the moustache while mourning for the dead.

15. Ibid., p. 201.

1. Judicial Containment

No other diseases in the Bible came under the same exclusion rules. This indicates that these diseases were to be regarded as the direct hand of God against an individual. It was not assumed that an individual had caught the disease from another individual. It was not assumed that this individual could pass on the disease to another individual. It was assumed that if the priest, acting as a judicial agent of God, did not declare the individual unclean, and if the community did not take steps to remove the individual from the protection of the city, then God might allow the plague to spread. This spreading, again, was fundamentally judicial, not biological. This was true of plague in general in the Mosaic community. Plague was seen as a direct judgment of God against the people for their sins. That is to say, these public health measures were judicial measures.

The reason why we know this to be the case is that the individual who lived in the countryside was not under the same restraints. Because the individual's presence in the countryside was not a threat to his neighbors, there is reason to believe that the curse of God had something to do with the presence of the city. We may not be able to understand all of these ramifications. The point is, the individual was not quarantined inside the city; he was quarantined by removing him from within the city. The one exception to this was King Uzziah (II Chron. 26:21). He was forced to dwell in a separate house, and he was cut off for the rest of his life from the house of God. This judgment had come upon him immediately after his presumptuous sin of offering sacrifice in the temple. It was clear from this incident that the judgment was regarded as judicial—coming directly from the hand of God—and not biological. As the king, he was granted immunity from exclusion from David's city, but only by means of a boundary separating him from the city.

There is no question that quarantine was legal for those dwelling inside the cities of Israel. Men were cut off from their homes, their families, their livelihood, and especially from the household of faith. They could not participate in the covenant rituals and feasts of Israel. This was the ultimate civil quarantine in ancient Israel, other than execution. It meant excommunication from Passover and the loss of citizenship.

2. Quarantines Today

The question then arises: Is priestly quarantining biblically legitimate today? There is no indication that any of these named diseases survived the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. There is also no indication that the laws of quarantine by a priest continue into the New Covenant. On the contrary, they could not have survived the demise of the priesthood. The quarantine laws were part of the Levitical laws of the Mosaic Covenant, and, I think, to some degree were connected to jubilee land laws of Leviticus 25. These laws all perished with the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. With the collapse of the judicial boundaries of the nation of Israel, there was a collapse of those ritual boundary laws that had governed the people of Israel even before they entered into the land of Canaan. There was no longer any tabernacle to be excluded from, and there was no unclean place outside either the camp or the city to which anyone could be banished. In other words, these laws related to plague, and plague in Mosaic Israel was judicial rather than biological.

In New Testament times, we can study biological afflictions as a separate class of phenomena, and we can also see them as the judgments of God. We do not have the ability to identify the specific sin, either corporate or personal, that leads to most sicknesses, with the exception of venereal diseases. Neither did the priest of the Mosaic Covenant in most cases. The priest was not asked to identify the sin that had led to the individual's affliction. The priest was required only to identify the affliction and deal with it judicially. We can therefore say that in New Testament times, afflictions of a biological nature can be dealt with either through medical techniques or by public health techniques. Contagious people can either be cured or they can be quarantined. The quarantining process, however, is based on considerations of the contagious nature of the disease, not the judicial status of the individual. Public health laws in the modern world are to be governed by statutes, and statutes must be predictable. Individuals must know in advance the penalties or sanctions that will be imposed for specific kinds of behavior. Thus, an individual who comes down with a disease cannot be said to be a threat to the community merely because he has come down with a disease. The judicial diseases of the Mosaic Covenant are no longer with us. Therefore, the diseases that afflict us today are like the common diseases that afflicted people inside and outside of Mosaic Israel. They are to be dealt with in similar ways: by medical care, by quarantine, by prayer, or by anointing by the elders (James 5:14).

3. To Protect the Public

The idea of quarantine in the 13th chapter of Leviticus is based on the need to protect the public. The spread of the disease, or other forms of God's judgment, was to be halted by removing the afflicted individual from within the city. The concern was public health, but it was not a concern about biological contagion. It was concern about the willingness of God to afflict other individuals with the disease or other afflictions because of their unwillingness to enforce His law. Thus, the quarantining process of Leviticus 13 was primarily judicial. In fact, it would probably be safe to say that it was entirely judicial. Only by the extension of the principle of the protection of others within the city is it legitimate to classify today's diseases as being subject legally to the Bible's quarantining process.

Does this qualification alter the legal status of the civil government? For example, does this mean that in modern times the civil government is required to finance an individual who has been quarantined? The state has brought sanctions against him in the name of the health of the community. This was also the case in Mosaic Israel. The state has put him under quarantine because he is biologically contagious. This was not the case in the Mosaic Israel. Does the shift from judicial affliction to biological affliction change the legal requirements of the civil government? Does the change from the contagious legal status of the individual to his contagious biological status change the requirements of the civil government? In other words, do the quarantine laws of the civil government go through a fundamental transformation between the Old Covenant and the New Covenant?

It is part of English common law that when a city is on fire, the authorities have the right to knock down an individual's house in order to stop the spread of that fire. It is also part of common law that the city and the community do not owe anything to the individual who has had his house knocked down in this way. It is presumed that the fire would have destroyed the house anyway. It is also assumed that by destroying the individual's house, other houses within the community will be protected. This law was for generations basic to the protection of cities. If the fire-fighters had to worry about the cost of repayment each time they knocked down a house, it is unlikely that they would have had the same kind of incentive to knock down the houses. Obviously, if the price of an action goes up, less of it will be demanded. In this case, it means that the city would have been less likely to be protected from the "plague" of fire because of legal obligations to repay those people who were unfortunate enough to be caught in the line of fire, and whose houses, if knocked down, would have allowed the creation of a fire break. It was assumed that the safety of the city was of greater importance than the loss to the individual. Because the house probably would have burned down anyway, it really was not a net loss to the owner.

Consider a contemporary individual who has contracted a contagious disease. He has become a threat to the community. If the community is required by law to finance this individual until such time as he recovers biologically from the disease, it is less likely that the community will take the necessary steps to isolate him. Common law therefore does not require the civil government to compensate the quarantined individual. Neither does biblical law. This is why quarantine is a devastating event in the life of the individual. Historically, quarantined people have not been permitted to leave their homes. Others have not been able to come into those homes without falling under the ban. While it is assumed that charity will be forthcoming to help the quarantined individual in his time of need, it has been assumed until very recently that the state has no legal obligation to support that person during the period of his confinement. To do so would raise the cost of confining individuals, and it would therefore lead to an unwillingness on the part of public health officials to confine them. This would increase the risk of contagion and disease in the community.

The contagious nature of the disease, in effect, is a form of violence. It is violence conducted by a third party, namely, the biological organisms that transmit the disease, but it is still a form of violence. The carrier places other people at risk. Thus, common law determined that an individual who becomes a threat to the community must be removed from the community so as to reduce the likelihood of this indirect form of violence. Public health measures are directed against the disease primarily and against its carriers secondarily.

G. Civil Authority

There can be little doubt that the priest in this instance did possess civil authority. He could declare a person judicially unclean. Because God threatened the whole community with judgment, the state was required to enforce the decision of the priest. Because he was entrusted with the legal authority to act as God's agent in this case, his word had to be obeyed. There are few other cases of similar priestly power in the Old Covenant. This indicates that there was something other than public health considerations involved in this form of leprosy. There was a special judicial condition that the word of a public health official could not deal with successfully. Yet a transgression of these boundaries was a real threat to the community, which is why the civil power of the city was invoked.

That no similar provision exists in the New Covenant era indicates that this plague was not biological but judicial. The special boundary condition of the nation of Israel ended with the fall of Jerusalem. When the walls of the temple were torn down, the judicial boundaries of the cities of Israel lost their special status. With the end of the Mosaic priesthood, the urban quarantine laws of the Mosaic Covenant ceased. Had the laws been directed against an essentially biological threat to the health of the community, there is no reason why the local civil magistrate could not have assumed the priest's policing function. But with the rending of the curtain of the temple at the death of Christ (Matt. 27:51), the need for a physical barrier between God and man ceased except insofar as the elements of the sacraments are physical. The judicial barrier still exists, but legal access to the presence of God is now exclusively sacramental. The priesthood of all believers is a judicial reality. The state no longer has any valid legal authority to enforce any aspect of the now-annulled distinction between clean and unclean—a distinction that was judicial rather than biological. The Levitical quarantine laws were finally annulled at the same time, and for the same reason, that the Mosaic dietary laws were annulled: A.D. 70.

The boundary laws of clean and unclean were based on the physical holiness of God's dwelling place. The Ark of the Covenant was physically set apart in the holy of holies, His place of residence. He was unwilling to remain with His people if they transgressed certain physical boundaries, since these boundaries were representative of His covenantal authority over them. The concentric boundary rings around the Ark represented God's hierarchy of authority: the closer that a person was allowed to come to the Ark of the Covenant, the higher his judicial authority. This is why the high priest possessed greater authority than the king, and therefore also greater responsibility.¹⁶ These concentric geographical boundaries ceased to exist at the crucifixion of Christ when the veil of the temple was torn. God departed from Israel definitively (judicially) at the crucifixion; He departed progressively (culturally and politically) over the next generation (the Book of Acts); He departed finally in A.D. 70. God would no longer dwell in the temple. All other holiness boundaries in Israel therefore ceased. They no longer served any judicial purpose. This included the judicial boundaries of clean and unclean (Acts 10).

The plagues of the New Covenant era are communicated biologically, not judicially. Plagues can no longer be stopped by a priest who takes immediate defensive action and skewers a pair of mixed-covenant fornicators with his spear (Num. 25:6–8).¹⁷

Conclusion

Wenham summarized the Levitical laws of quarantine. He correctly related them to the Levitical holiness laws.

It seems likely that even in OT times "skin diseases" and their treatment were regarded as symbolic of sin and its consequences. When a man was afflicted with a disfiguring skin disease he did visibly "fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23), the glory that he had been given in his creation (Ps. 8:6 [Eng. 5]). His banishment from human society and God's sanctuary was a reenactment of the fall, when Adam and Eve were expelled from Eden (Gen. 3). The infection of garments and houses with "skin disease" served as a reminder of the interaction of man and his environment. . . . The laws of Leviticus were not abrogated by Jesus; in fact he tells the healed "lepers" to observe them (Matt. 8:4; Luke 17:14). But the new era of salvation made obsolete the idea that the diseased should be banished from human and divine society. Jesus' ministry and that of his disciples (Matt.

16. Chapter 4.

17. This act had been authorized by Moses, as the supreme civil ruler (Num. 25:5).

10:8) was one which brought reconciliation between God and man. Therefore the old laws isolating men because of their unsightly appearance had become inappropriate and out of date. Like the rules about unclean animals, they did not fit in with the new program, which was to climax in the creation of a new heaven and a new earth, in which men of every class and nation would be redeemed (Rev. 7:9).¹⁸

The quarantine laws of Leviticus had more to do with quarantining the people from the presence of God than they did with quarantining sick people from healthy people. The blemished person had to be kept away from God's presence in the temple. The laws of leprosy were related to the temple's laws of purity far more than they were to modern public health laws. This is why any conclusions that we attempt to draw from these laws must be done by analogy, not directly.

What can we say with confidence? First, the civil government did possess lawful authority to enforce a priest's decision to remove people from their homes in order to protect others in the community from the judgment of God. This judgment came in the form of plague. The contagion was judicial, but the threat did exist.

Second, the priest possessed the civil authority to remove houses and people from a city. His judicial declaration as an ecclesiastical agent had to be enforced by the civil magistrate.

Third, the victim of the plague had to bear the expenses associated with the results of the quarantine. Because there was no command in the Old Testament that the state support quarantined individuals, it is not possible to derive from this law any biblical injunction for state welfare programs. The only legitimate conclusion to draw from this law by analogy is that there is no state welfare function. The job of the civil government is to protect people from violence, not support people who have been afflicted, either naturally or judicially. To argue any other way is to make the state into an agency of healing rather than an agency of protection. The state is an agency that is supposed to bring negative sanctions against evil-doers. There is no biblical warrant for the concept of the state as a healer. The job of the state is to prohibit behavior that threatens other individuals physically. If this threatening behavior is breathing upon others, then the state must see to it that the individuals who are a threat to others are not put into close contact with those who might be injured as a result.

If the state in the Mosaic Covenant was not told by God to support those who fell victim to diseases that mandated quarantine, then there is no biblical case for the state as an agency of tax-financed healing today. If the victim of leprosy in the Mosaic Covenant was forced out of his home by the state, and made to wander outside the city, and still the state was not responsible for his financial support, then the case for modern socialized medicine cannot be based on any biblical text.¹⁹ It must be based on the argument from silence. It must be based on the conclusion that there has been a fundamental change in the function of civil government in the New Testament: from protector (Old Covenant) to healer. We have yet to see the exegetical case for such a change. While the presuppositions of the modern political order favor such a view of the state—as did the presuppositions of the ancient pagan world—humanist presuppositions are not a valid substitute for biblical exegesis.

18. Wenham, Leviticus, pp. 213, 214.

19. When I raised this argument in my debate with Ron Sider in the spring of 1981 at Gordon-Conwell Seminary, his rhetorical response was clever. He cried, “Unclean, unclean!” He then admitted that he had never heard anything like this before. But he made no attempt to answer my argument exegetically.

III. Separation (Lev. 17–22)

INTRODUCTION TO PART III

Therefore shall ye keep my commandments, and do them: I am the LORD. Neither shall ye profane my holy name; but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel: I am the LORD which hallow you, That brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the LORD (Lev. 22:31–33).

Separation: this is the heart of the Book of Leviticus, the third book of the Pentateuch. The biblical meaning of holiness is to be set apart by God, i.e., hallowed. Separation and holiness are inescapably linked; or, we might say, inescapably bound. Leviticus 17–22 presents the laws of separation.

Leviticus 22:31 speaks of profaning God's name in relation to obeying the commandments. This points back to the third commandment, which prohibits the taking of God's name in vain (Ex. 20:7). God places a boundary around His name; to violate this boundary is to profane it. That this law is recapitulated in a passage mandating obedience to God's commandments should not be surprising. Point three of the biblical covenant model, ethics, is related to the third commandment. It is also related to the eighth commandment, "thou shalt not steal" (Ex. 20:15), the Bible's supreme affirmation of the rights of private property, i.e., the right of individuals to own, use, and sell (disown) property.¹

The separation described in Leviticus is multifaceted. Separation was judicial: sacred, common, and profane. It was geographical: the holy of holies in relation to the temple; the temple area in relation to the rest of the nation; each tribe of Israel in relation to the other tribes; walled cities in relation to the countryside; the very land of Israel in relation to the land outside the boundaries. Tribal separation was in turn prophetic, relating to the promised Seed (Gen. 3:15; 49:10). Separation was priestly: Aaron and Levi; Levi and the other tribes; Israel and the nations. Separation was chronological: the three mandatory yearly feasts, the sabbatical year, and the jubilee year. It was biological: breed vs. breed. It was dietary: clean and unclean. It was physical: clean and unclean. It was ritual: clean and unclean. It was economic: rich and poor. It was political: citizen and non-citizen. It was above all ethical: good and evil.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 28.

It is in these chapters that the hermeneutical problem with Leviticus—and with the Mosaic covenant generally—presses the commentator. Which of these laws were cross-boundary laws? Which ones applied both inside and outside the nation of Israel? The geographically cross-boundary laws were universal moral laws, and as such, their binding character has crossed over into the New Covenant. To use a New Covenant metaphor, these laws were resurrected with Jesus.

10

THE PROMISED LAND AS A COVENANTAL AGENT

Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things: for in all these the nations are defiled which I cast out before you: And the land is defiled: therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you: (For all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, and the land is defiled;) That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you. For whosoever shall commit any of these abominations, even the souls that commit them shall be cut off from among their people (Lev. 18:24–29).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is that God is the Lord of history. He brings judgments in terms of His covenantal law. History is theocentric. It is therefore to be understood in terms of the covenant.

God, the supreme authority of the covenant (point one), possesses the power to impose sanctions directly (point four), but He usually chooses to use agents in this task (point two). In this passage, He uses an agent to separate covenant-breakers from the society of covenant-keepers (point three).

A. Geography and Obedience

Leviticus 18, more than any other chapter in the Bible, connects a society's obedience to biblical law and its geography. This chapter describes the land as vomiting out those who disobey God's laws: separation. This graphic metaphor is that of a geographic area that literally forces out of its presence all those who disobey these laws.

The vomiting land of Canaan is one of the most peculiar metaphors in the Bible. Bible commentators do not go into detail on just why it was that the land should be described here as vomiting people from its midst. The reason for the commentators' silence is that they have not recognized that this language is more than metaphorical; it is covenantal. It has to do with a system of boundaries and oaths. The land of Canaan was a covenantal subordinate in a hierarchical system of authority, just as the whole earth has been since the creation of Adam. This language is therefore judgmental. It describes a unique hierarchical-judicial relation among God, the land of Israel, and those who lived inside the land's boundaries. The pre-Fall hierarchical relationship—God > covenant-keeping man > nature—has been distorted because of sin, although the hierarchical requirement remains the same. The earth brings forth thorns and weeds to thwart mankind; the land of Israel vomited out its inhabitants.

B. The Promised Land as the Enforcer

Israelites were warned to obey God's laws, "That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you." The land is described as serving as God's sanctioning agent. Like the hornets that went before the Israelites as they removed the Canaanites (Ex. 23:28), so would the land spew them out if they committed the same sorts of sins that the Canaanites had committed. Historically, the Assyrians and Babylonians spewed them out of the land under the Mosaic Covenant. Yet the land was spoken of as the covenantal agent in the Mosaic Covenant, while the ascended Jesus is spoken of as the agent of spewing in the New Covenant: "So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth" (Rev. 3:16). The language is both covenantal and symbolic in each case. The land did not have a literal stomach and a literal gullet. Jesus does not literally spew out churches. Yet the language of vomiting is used in both cases. The imagery of vomiting is appropriately disgusting, and it is used throughout the Scriptures to describe sin and its consequences.

He hath swallowed down riches, and he shall vomit them up again:
God shall cast them out of his belly (Job 20:15).

The morsel which thou hast eaten shalt thou vomit up, and lose thy sweet words (Prov. 23:8).

As a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly (Prov.

26:11).

The LORD hath mingled a perverse spirit in the midst thereof: and they have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof, as a drunken man staggereth in his vomit (Isa. 19:14).

For all tables are full of vomit and filthiness, so that there is no place clean (Isa. 28:8).

Make ye him drunken: for he magnified himself against the LORD: Moab also shall wallow in his vomit, and he also shall be in derision (Jer. 48:26).

But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire (II Peter 2:22).

This imagery is that of a man who has eaten something that he should have avoided, and his stomach rebels. This unpleasant event is supposed to remind him: don't eat this again. The metaphor's message: "Go and sin no more." Israel never learned this lesson. Israel went and sinned a lot more.

The imagery of the land's vomiting is closely connected to the Mosaic dietary laws, as we shall see. When those dietary laws ceased to have any covenantal relevance—definitively in Acts 10; finally in A.D. 70—the Promised Land ceased to perform this covenantal task. No other land replaced the Promised Land.

1. Special Promise, Special Claim

The strategic reality of the symbolism (rhetoric)¹ of the land's spewing out the Canaanites was that Israel possessed a unique legal claim on the land as a result of God's promise to Abraham. Israel was authorized by God to commit genocide, or mandate total expulsion, against the land's existing inhabitants. God brings negative sanctions in history. He did so with the firstborn of Egypt, and again when Egypt's army perished in the Red Sea. He had shown no mercy to those who rebelled against Him. He would tolerate no mercy on the part of the Israelites against the inhabitants of Canaan. "And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee” (Deut. 7:16). Why no pity? Because of the abomination of their gods. God’s warning: similar worship inside the land will bring similar military sanctions (Deut. 8:19–20).² God subsequently raised up Assyria and Babylon to perform an analogous service for Him, which is why this passage warned of a future spewing forth.

1. Rhetoric is used as a means of persuasion. It is the third biblical interpretive principle: grammar (grammatico-historical), (theo)logic, and rhetoric (symbolism). The medieval educational Trivium was a manifestation of this three-fold system of biblical hermeneutics.

The land specified as God’s agent was the Promised Land, not Egypt or any other plot of ground. Only the land inside God’s covenantal boundary of separation served as His agent of negative military sanctions. This leads us to a conclusion: because the Promised Land could serve as a prosecuting witness against Israel, it was unique. The witness for the prosecution is required to cast the first stone (Deut. 17:7). The earthquake is the obvious example of stone-casting by the land (Isa. 29:6; Zech. 14:5). “The earth shall quake before them; the heavens shall tremble: the sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining” (Joel 2:10). “The mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, and the earth is burned at his presence, yea, the world, and all that dwell therein” (Nahum 1:5). This quaking is the language of covenantal judgment. Israel’s covenantal agent, Moses, had already experienced this. “And mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the LORD descended upon it in fire: and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly” (Ex. 19:18). It took place again at the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. “And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent” (Matt. 27:51). Conclusion: If the land’s office as witness for the prosecution still exists, then its office as stone-caster still exists. Because the resurrected Christ appears as the vomiter in New Covenant imagery, I conclude that He is the witness who brings judgment against societies. His agency of sanctions today is social and biological rather than geological.

What about this prophecy in the Book of Revelation? “And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every free man, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; And said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

Lamb" (Rev. 6:15–16). The reason such language applied to that event is because the prophecy was intended to be fulfilled a few years after it was written. This prophecy of looming covenantal judgment was fulfilled in A.D. 70: the fall of Jerusalem.³

2. Military Sanctions

The Mosaic Covenant's symbolic use of the land as God's agent of negative sanctions represented military conquest: Israel vs. the Canaanites, Moab vs. Israel (Jud. 3), Canaan vs. Israel (Jud. 4), Midian vs. Israel (Jud. 6), Phoenicia and Ammon vs. Israel (Jud. 10; 13), Syria vs. Israel (II Kings 5:2). In the cases of Assyria vs. Israel and Babylon vs. Judah, the Israelites were actually removed from the land. If someone should argue that the New Covenant has transferred to the earth in general the symbolic authority to serve as an agent bringing negative sanctions, meaning that God still raises up nations to bring military sanctions against His people, he must also insist that genocide is still authorized by God as the mandatory strategy of covenantal conquest by His people. But genocide is not the way of the gospel; persuasion, not military conquest, is its means of evangelism. Conclusion: the land no longer serves as a covenantal agent under the New Covenant except in the general Adamic sense (Gen. 3:17–19).⁴ That is, the symbolism of the land as God's covenantal agent is no longer valid; the arena of covenantal conflict is no longer the military battlefield.

Similarly, if land marked off by a New Covenant-bound nation still possesses this Mosaic judicial authority, then the Abrahamic promise regarding the land must somehow extend into the New Covenant. If so, then so do the dietary laws. Contemporary British Israelites may choose to believe this regarding the dietary laws, but the church historically has emphatically dismissed all such suggestions. Conclusion: the land no longer serves as a covenantal agent under the New Covenant. One sign of this alteration is the New Testament's annulment of the Levitical dietary laws and its substitution of a new form of dietary law: the Lord's Supper.⁵

3. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), pp. 196–97. (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

5. I suggest that there will be a tendency for those who hold that the Mosaic dietary laws still are judicially binding to search for evidence that there was an increase in the frequency of earthquakes in the morally rebellious modern world. Rushdoony, for example, regarded as judicially significant the escalation of reported earthquakes,

With the abolition of the unique covenantal status of Old Covenant Israel, God ceased to speak of the Promised Land as His covenantal agent. Remember, it did not act as a covenantal agent until the Israelites crossed into the land from the wilderness. Egypt had not spewed out God's enemies. The idea that the land is in some way the bringer of God's military sanctions against covenant-breakers was valid only under the Mosaic Covenant, and only within the boundaries of national Israel.

C. Law and Life in the Promised Land

The issue was ethics, point three of the biblical covenant model. The focus was geography: the Promised Land.

Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, I am the LORD your God. After the doings of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwelt, shall ye not do: and after the doings of the land of Canaan, whither I bring you, shall ye not do: neither shall ye walk in their ordinances. Ye shall do my judgments, and keep mine ordinances, to walk therein: I am the LORD your God. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes, and my judgments: which if a man do, he shall live in them: I am the LORD (Lev. 18:2–5).

The laws that God's people must follow should not be the laws of either Egypt or Canaan. While the text does not specifically mention it, it is clear that God's historical sanctions were involved. The Israelites had already seen the sanctions that God had brought against Egypt. First, there were plagues inside the land. Second, the Egyptians had given precious gems and precious metals to the fleeing Israelites. Third, the Israelites had been expelled from Egypt as God's means for providing deliverance and liberation. The Egyptians lost their slave labor force. Similarly, God tells them in this chapter that there will be comprehensive negative sanctions imposed against those who presently dwell in the land of Canaan. The Canaanites will someday be vomited out by the land, i.e., by the invading Israelites. The imagery of vomiting out symbolized a military phenomenon—invasion of the land—and the cultural phenomenon of replacement by a new nation. The operational factor here was ethics. God promised them that when they entered the land and established residence, the plagues of Egypt would be removed from the land, if they remained covenantally faithful (Deut. 7:15). The God of liberation they understood as the God who brings positive and negative sanctions in history. What is unique about this chapter is that the land itself is described as imposing negative sanctions against law-breakers. The Promised Land would become God's covenantal agent after they invaded Canaan.

1950–1963: ten instances, compared to eight, 1900–49. R. J. Rushdoony, The Biblical Philosophy of History (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1969] 2000), p. 60. (<http://bit.ly/rjrbph>). This was in the late 1960s, while he was writing The Institutes of Biblical Law, that he first decided that the Mosaic dietary laws are still binding.

In verse five, long life and the law are linked. The text does not specifically use the word abundant, but this is the implication of the passage. The individual who obeys God's law is the individual who receives life, meaning abundant life. This does not refer to eternal life; it refers to life in history. The passage does not teach eternal salvation by man's own works, but it does teach that God brings positive sanctions in history to those who consistently obey His revealed word. The issue raised by this passage is this: how to preserve abundant life in the abundant new land (see also Deuteronomy 8). The Canaanites had not obeyed God; therefore, they were no longer going to be allowed to live in the land. Their abundant inheritance would be transferred to the invaders, as had been promised to Abraham. But the Israelites were warned that if they disobeyed God's law in the future, they would also be removed from residence in the land.

The Promised Land was going to become the arena of covenantal conflict when the Israelites entered the land. It was not yet such an arena when Moses delivered the law to Israel. It had not yet vomited the residents out of its presence. In this sense, the Canaanites were analogous to the furniture inside a house that had been infected with biblical leprosy. The furniture and everything inside did not become judicially unclean until the priest entered it (Lev. 14:36).⁶ The people of Israel were the priests of the ancient world.⁷ When they entered the land of Canaan, their presence would bring everything inside the land into a condition of legal uncleanness.⁸ The land was defiled because of the sins of the Canaanites, but the priests had not yet entered it. When the conquest began, the invasion would judicially identify the land as polluted. When the people of Israel penetrated the boundary of the land, they brought both it and the Canaanites under the judicial sanctions of God. These sanctions would remain as a judicial threat to the land and its inhabitants for as long as the Israelites retained their priestly relationship with God. Do not commit such sins, they were warned, “That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you” (Lev. 18:28).

6. Chapter 9.

7. James B. Jordan, The Sociology of the Church: Essays in Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1986), pp. 101–2. (<http://bit.ly/jjchurch>)

8. This could take place only after they were circumcised (Josh. 5): a mark of Israel's priestly judicial status.

D. The Land as a Surrogate for Man

The land of Canaan was analogous to both God and man in two senses. First, the land was omniscient within its boundaries. It saw every act of rebellion, even inside the family. Second, for everyone inside the land, the land was omnipresent. There was nowhere that someone could go within the land in which he would not be under the threat of the sanctions imposed by the land. Obviously, God is the viewing agent, but the language of the text drives home the point: no more could the nation of Israel escape being seen and judged by God in history than a man can escape standing on the ground beneath his feet.

Because the land of Canaan is described here as being under God’s sanctions, it was also analogous to man. The land had refused to obey God. It had not yet brought a covenant lawsuit against transgressors within its boundaries. The land therefore was about to come under judgment. “And the land is defiled: therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants” (Lev. 18:25). When the land comes under judgment, the text says, it will then act under this pressure to enforce the law of God. It will vomit evildoers out of its presence.

The sanctions of God would be directed against the defilement of the land. First, the resident nations would be cast out by God (v. 24). This would be a corporate sanction against them. Second, the land itself would be punished (v. 25). This also was a collective sanction. When the people of Israel entered the land, these same collective sanctions would be imposed by God and by the land in order to avoid the defilement of the land.

The text does not say that the sanctions would be imposed to prevent the defilement of the people who live in the land; they would be imposed in order to avoid the defilement of the land itself. This indicates that the land was legally represented in some way by those who dwelt in the land. When they acted in an evil manner, the land itself was legally defiled. This is an extension of the principle which we find in Genesis 3:17–19. Adam sinned, and the land came under a curse. Adam represented the land in God's court, and by violating God's law, he brought the land under a curse.

We therefore need to understand the biblical doctrine of representation. There is a hierarchical relationship that links God to man and man's environment. When Adam rebelled against God, he disrupted this cosmic hierarchy. Adam defiled the land because he himself became judicially unclean. Sin inverts the hierarchy between God and man. Originally, man was given dominion over nature. When Satan rebelled against God by using the creation (the serpent and Adam and Eve), he brought God's curse against the serpent and Adam and Eve. When man rebelled against God by using nature as his instrument (the forbidden tree), he brought God's curse against nature, and therefore against him, for nature was his resource. Nature therefore became God's implement of cursing against mankind. God did to man what man had attempted to do to Him: use nature as a weapon. Nature in this sense was used as a rod of wrath.

E. Theocratic Order in the Promised Land

All the residents in the land were under God's laws (v. 26). The civil covenant required that the state bring sanctions against the violators: cutting them off (v. 29). This was a form of covenantal death. God issued a divorce decree against the persons who committed the prohibited act. There had to be a public announcement of this divorce by church, state, and family.

1. Judicial Separation

The individual lost his membership in the fellowship of the saints. In modern terms, he was excommunicated. He lost his civil citizenship as well. Finally, he lost his position as a family member, which means he would lose his legal inheritance in the land. Under the old covenant, the jubilee land laws required that he be cut out of the right of reversion of his father's land during the jubilee year.⁹ (Under the New Testament, this would no longer be the case, since the jubilee land laws no longer apply.) The head of the household was required by God to disinherit the individual who had transgressed any of these laws.

What about the foreigner? The foreigner was not officially married to God. He could not be excommunicated from the fellowship of the saints, since he did not belong to the fellowship of the saints. Yet negative sanctions warned him not to violate the laws governing marriage and sexual contact (Lev. 18:6–23). Violators would be expelled physically from the nation. There can be no other meaning of the phrase, “cut off.”

9. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012) Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 54:E:2.

What about the resident alien? At the first infraction, he would have had his status shifted to that of foreigner. He would no longer have been under the same degree of protection by civil law that other resident aliens enjoyed. What were these protections? They were treated as Israelites except in two respects: (1) they could not hold the office of civil magistrate; (2) they could not inherit rural land. They were not allowed to bring negative civil sanctions against Israelites, since a resident alien was not formally covenanted to the Old Covenant church. The resident alien was not under God’s ecclesiastical sanctions, so he was not legally entitled to bring God’s negative civil sanctions in the holy commonwealth.¹⁰ Because he could not inherit rural land, he could not become a freeman. The threat of permanent slavery would always face him (Lev. 25:44–45).¹¹

In all other respects, the resident alien was entitled to the same benefits that an Israelite was. When an Israelite fell into poverty, and approached one of his brothers for a zero-interest loan, the brother was not to be hard-hearted against him (Deut. 15:7–10). When the resident alien fell into poverty and sought a charitable loan from an Israelite, the resident alien also had a moral claim on the loan (Lev. 25:35–37).¹² The foreigner who had no stake in the land did not possess such a claim. Second, the Israelite lender could extract usury from the foreigner (Deut. 23:20),¹³ which he was not allowed to collect from a poverty-stricken fellow member of the covenant or from a resident alien (Lev. 25:35b–36).¹⁴ The foreigner did not benefit from the year of release for charity debts (Deut. 15:3).¹⁵ The resident alien did. His permanent presence in the land gave him special immunities and benefits. He was not of the covenant judicially, but he was inside the boundaries of the land of the covenant as a permanent resident.

10. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

11. Chapter 31.

12. Chapter 29.

13. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 55. ??

14. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49:C.

15. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 36.

2. The Land and Sanctions

Because the threat of God's divorce stood against the transgressors, the text speaks of the land as divorcing them. The Promised Land is described here as a covenantal agent of God. The land would cast out the nations of Canaan. In contrast, the land of Egypt had not cast out the Egyptians. This points to the unique judicial position of the Promised Land: first, because of the promise to Abraham; second, as the homeland of the Israelites. Only those residents who lived in the Promised Land would come under the sanctions of the land.¹⁶ The land was a place of sanctions. It therefore was a sanctuary—a sanctified place, a judicially set-apart place. It had been established by God as a special dwelling place for His people. It had specific boundaries. It was holy (set-apart) ground because it was the special dwelling place of God. It was the dwelling place of the saints (those sanctified by God) because they dwelt spiritually with God. The land was uniquely guarded by God, so that during the three annual festivals when the men journeyed to Jerusalem, God removed covetousness from the enemies of Israel (Ex. 34:24).

The land is said here to be under God's sanctions. This means that the Promised Land was a represented agent. The archetype here is the curse of the ground in Genesis 3:17–19. The creation still groans in expectation of the final judgment and full restoration (Rom. 8:22).¹⁷ Furthermore, the land of Canaan was entitled to a sabbath rest every seventh year (Lev. 25:1–7).¹⁸ When the people of Israel came into the land, they failed to give the land its rest (II Chr. 36:21). When it was represented unrighteously, it suffered.

The land was also to be punished by God as a representing agent. Earlier, the dual witness of the land and the shed blood of the innocent had brought a covenant lawsuit against the guilty party. Cain was punished by the ground (Gen. 4:9–12). We are told that he was driven from the face of God and also from the face of the ground (Gen 4:14). The “face of the ground” must have referred to the land in the immediate proximity of the garden: holy ground. (Obviously, we can never escape the face of the physical ground unless we reside off the planet.) The closer that Cain came to the garden, the closer he came to the place of God's judgment. Thus, he was driven from the place of God's earthly residence and judgment—in one sense a curse (not being close to God), but in another sense a blessing (not being subject to immediate execution, thereby giving him time to repent).

16. Those Israelites who journeyed outside the land had to return annually to Israel, so they were brought under dual sanctions: Passover and land.

17. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

18. Chapter 24.

This equating of the face of God and the face of the land is important for understanding the covenant nature of the Promised Land. The land was punished for its failure to bring this covenant lawsuit against the Canaanites. This is peculiar language, but it is basic to understanding the nature of the threat against those who would subsequently violate God's law within the confines of the land. God regarded the Promised Land as His agent. The land therefore responds as the Israelites approach it in judgment. The Canaanites are driven out when the Israelites cross its boundaries. The text says, first, that God expels them (v. 24); it also says that the land expels them (vv. 25, 28). This language is reminiscent of the prophecy in Exodus 23:28: "And I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee." God and nature cooperate in the expulsion of the Canaanites. As in the case of the face of God and the face of the land, the expulsion of the Canaanites is discussed both as an act of God and as an act of the land.

The Egyptians had not been driven out of Egypt. Why not? Because Egypt was not holy ground. It was not a permanent sanctuary, although it was repeatedly to play the role of a temporary sanctuary for Israel, culminating in its service as a sanctuary for Jesus and His family in Herod's day (Matt. 2:13–15). Because the land of Canaan had been set apart by God's promise to Abraham, it drove out those who violated the judicial terms of the covenant, once the time came for God to fulfill His promise. The Canaanites as a civilization were driven out of the land during the conquest. When Israel came into the land, the vomiting process began: conquest = spewing. Centuries later, both Israel and Judah were driven out by God during the exile.

F. Strangers in the Land

During the post-exilic era, the same degree of civic evil in the land did not defile the land in equal measure as it had before the exile. There are several reasons for this. Most important, the exile marked the end of the Davidic theocracy. Kingship was never again restored politically inside the boundaries of Israel. The highest civil appeals court lay outside the boundaries of the land. The post-exilic period was the era of the empires: Medo-Persia, Macedonia, and Rome. Cyrus of Persia was God's designated anointed agent (Isa. 45:1). This transfer of kingship beyond the land's boundaries led to a fundamental judicial change inside the land. Resident aliens could now inherit rural land permanently (Ezek. 47:23). Also, Greek and then Roman military forces remained in the land. The Samaritans, brought in by the Assyrians after the Northern Kingdom fell, remained as permanent residents within the original geographical boundaries of Israel, accepting a deviant theology that was loosely related to authorized worship (John 4:19–25).

1. The Temple's Centrality

The central judicial manifestation of the sanctuary status of the Promised Land was the temple. There was a judicial centrality of worship in the post-exilic era that was even greater than during the pre-exilic era. The Israelites never again indulged themselves in the worship of the gods of Canaan. The purity of the temple, the sacrificial system, and the national synagogue system was primary. The land is no longer said to be a covenantal agent after the exile. It did become a covenantal threat one last time in A.D. 70, but this was after the establishment of the New Covenant. The fall of Jerusalem marked the transfer of the kingdom of God to the church (Matt. 21:43): the final annulment of the Promised Land's covenantal status. There were strangers in the land after the Babylonian exile, and these strangers exercised lawful civil authority, but this no longer threatened the sanctuary status of the nation. What would threaten it was the presence of strangers in the temple.

The metaphor of vomiting symbolized a successful military invasion of the land and its subsequent conquest. After the exile, God's people were no longer sovereign over civil affairs in the land. The threat of invasion by a strange nation was no longer a covenantal threat to Israel's civil order, which was not governed by God's covenantal hierarchy. In this sense, a boundary violation of Israel's borders was no longer a major theological problem. Being vomited out of the land was no longer a covenantal threat, except in response to their unsuccessful rebellion against pagan civil authorities who were already in the land.

When Antiochus began to persecute the Jews in the second century B.C., he did so by God's sovereignty as the agent who imposed negative sanctions. There had been covenantal rebellion in the land. This rebellion was initiated by Jews who broke the covenant with God and attempted to covenant the nation with Hellenism and the Greeks. A foreign athletic hall was built in Jerusalem. Circumcision ceased (I Macc. 1:11–15). It was only then that the persecution by Antiochus began. First, he subdued Egypt; then he returned to conquer Israel. He established false worship in the temple (I Macc. 1: 54–55). Again, the threat was to the temple, not to Israel's civil order. Their repeated rebellions had broken the terms of the Mosaic civil covenant so thoroughly that God no longer trusted them to administer the civil covenant inside the boundaries of the land. This was a curse against them, as it is in every biblically covenanted social order.

2. The Church as the New Temple

In the New Testament, the church replaced the old temple order. Local churches also replaced the local synagogue order. There is a new Bride for God. There must therefore be a new form of covenantal divorce. Christ is said to spew lukewarm churches out of His mouth (Rev. 3:16). There must be no mixing of God's old and new brides. We know this because we know that God is not a polygamist. The Jews understood this, which is why they persecuted the church in Jerusalem, Israel, and in all the cities in which the synagogues had been built outside of Israel. The church left Jerusalem in 69 A.D., just prior to the invasion of the land and the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus.¹⁹ This was the exodus event of the New Covenant order.

The rebellion against Rome by the Jews led to the scattering of the Jews: the diaspora. First, it led to the 70 A.D. invasion of the temple by gentiles, followed immediately by its destruction. This led to the triumph of the Pharisees over the Sadducees, who had been the dominant influence in the temple.²⁰ Second, six decades later, another revolt led by Bar Kochba resulted in the second wave out of the land. After the defeat of this rebellion in 135, the Romans forced most of the Jews out of the land of Palestine, but by this late date, the land possessed no covenantal status.

The Jews did not believe this regarding the land. After they were expelled from the land by the Romans, they believed that they had to restructure Judaic law. They could lawfully receive the laying on of hands (semikah) only inside the land. Because this was no longer possible, they believed that they could no longer impose the Mosaic law's sanctions to settle their disputes. They believed that they had lost the judicial anointing that had allowed them to impose such sanctions. Jewish legal scholar George Horowitz wrote: "This chain of traditional ordination broke down completely after the rebellion of Bar Kokeba and the consequent persecutions by the Roman emperor Hadrian (c. 135 A.D.). The Rabbis were compelled, therefore, in order to preserve the Torah and to maintain law and order, to enlarge the authority of Rabbinical tribunals. This they accomplished by emphasizing the distinction between Biblical penalties and Rabbinical penalties. Rabbinical courts after the second century had no authority to impose Biblical punishments since they lacked semikah; but as regards penalties created by Rabbinical legislation, the Rabbis had of necessity, the widest powers of enforcement. They instituted, accordingly, a whole series of sanctions and penalties: excommunication, fines, physical punishment, use of the 'secular arm' in imitation of the Church, etc."²¹ This led to a restructuring of sanctions within the Jewish community, and it also led to the creation of a ghetto culture. They needed to separate themselves from the gentile culture in order to have the authority to impose the sanctions of what later became known as Talmudic law.²² They became strangers in other lands.

19. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, III:V.

20. Herbert Danby, "Introduction," The Mishnah (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. xiii.

G. The Replacement of the Promised Land

The kingdom of God cannot be confined geographically in New Testament times. Any nation can lawfully covenant with God today.²³ Israel was the single covenanted nation of Old Testament, which alone acknowledged the sanctions of God and the revealed law of God, and which alone required circumcision of all its male citizens. Only one other nation briefly covenanted under God, Assyria (under Jonah's preaching), but this covenant was soon broken.²⁴ Today, however, 21. George Horowitz, The Spirit of Jewish Law (New York: Central Book Co., [1953] 1973), p. 93.

22. On the Talmud, see North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix H.

23. Gary DeMar, Ruler of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for Government (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gdmruler>)

24. This seems to have been a common grace covenanting process—formal public obedience to the outward civil laws of the Bible—since there were no covenantal heirs remaining at the time of Assyria's conquest of Israel. Also, there is no indication that they were circumcised as part of their national repentance.

there is no monopoly of the Promised Land. All nations are required by God to covenant with Him.²⁵ Their law structures are supposed to be biblical. They are to turn to the whole Bible in search of civil laws and civil sanctions.

In today's world, the various covenanted lands replace the Old Testament's land of promise. The Promised Land's covenanted status has come to the nations. It becomes a sanctuary by means of the national covenant. Covenant Land legal status becomes a universal promise to all nations rather than a restricted promise to one nation. Where the preaching of the gospel is, there we find a nation being asked to become judicially holy ground. The gospel has universalized the promises of God.

The whole earth has been judicially cleansed by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The geographical boundaries between sacred and common have moved from national boundaries to ecclesiastical boundaries: the New Testament equivalent of the covenantally sacred space of the temple after the exile. There are sacred (i.e., sacramental) ecclesiastical acts—holy baptism and holy communion—but no sacred civil space. We no longer reside in sacred space. We no longer measure men's distance from God's kingdom by means of geography. We measure it by their church membership: personal confession, ethical behavior, and judicial subordination. The land of a covenanted nation is no longer God's covenantal agent, except in the sense that it is the place to which men's bodies return after death. The land has always been a covenantal agent in this general sense in the post-Fall era (Gen. 3:19). But in the sense of an agent with a jurisdictional boundary, land is no longer a covenantal agent.

The land of Israel ceased to be an agent of vomiting when the Old Covenant ended in A.D. 70. After A.D. 70, earthquakes and other geographical phenomena ceased to be relevant covenantally within Palestine, i.e., ceased to be predictable in terms of corporate ethics. This is not to say that earthquakes, like any other kind of disaster, are not signs of God's wrath in general against mankind in general, but there is very little biblical evidence that earthquakes are still part of God's predictable covenantal sanctions in history. Jesus is now the agent of judgment, seated on the throne beside God. The geological land of Israel is no longer an instrument for separating covenant-breakers from covenant-keepers. While nations can lawfully covenant with God in the New Testament order, the lands so constituted judicially are not part of the Abrahamic promise, a promise geographically limited to what Abraham could see and walk through (Gen. 13:15–17). Thus, it is fruitless to search the historical records of earthquakes in covenant-keeping nations and covenant-breaking nations in the expectation that a predictable pattern will be discovered.²⁶

25. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

If I am incorrect about this, then the land still mediates between God and man. We do have such a case in the Old Testament: Cain's curse. "When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth" (Gen. 4:12). This was a sanction against Cain, whose brother's blood had penetrated the land and testified against Cain (Gen. 4:10). The promised sanction was not active but rather negative: the absence of positive sanctions. The curse in Genesis 4 was agricultural: the land would no longer yield its fruit to Cain. So, Cain built a city (Gen. 4:17). He had been a tiller of the soil; he became a resident of a city. He was not threatened with an earthquake; he was threatened with personal famine. He avoided personal famine by building a city and becoming a trader or other non-agricultural producer. He escaped the curse of the ground by switching occupations and residency: rural to urban.

Cain's curse did not speak of earthquakes: the active stone-casting that the land later brought against Israel at the close of the Old Covenant order in A.D. 70. While I believe that God will reveal to covenant-keeping societies techniques that minimize the effects of earthquakes, I do not believe that He will predictably alter their number and intensity in relation to the degree of the societies' obedience to His law.

The last great wave of such covenantal speculation took place in the aftermath of the Lisbon earthquake of 1755.²⁷ When rational men concluded that they could make no ethical sense of that momentous event, they ceased searching for such covenantal connections in history. Their initial error in expecting to find specific ethical relevance in the 1755 earthquake led to a rejection of a covenantal worldview in general, a rejection that enhanced the universal triumph of Newtonian rationalism in the late eighteenth century.²⁸ If earthquakes are irrelevant covenantally, rational men concluded, then so are all the other natural disasters of life, which is why we call them natural disasters. This was also Solomon's conclusion in the midst of his existential period: "All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath" (Eccl. 9:2). What we should affirm is this: the arena of God's predictable historical sanctions has moved from geography to society.

26. One earthquake that struck a sin center was the 1994 southern California earthquake, which centered in the Canoga Park-Chatsworth area. This was the center for pornographic movie production in the United States. Models who appear in such movies temporarily became less enthusiastic about their work, according to one agent for these performers. "It's put the fear of God into them." Christianity Today (March 7, 1994), p. 57.

27. T. D. Kendrick, The Lisbon Earthquake (Philadelphia: Lippencott, 1956).

Let me give an example of this move from geography to society. Jesus announced that God does not send more or less rain on a society in terms of its theology or its ethical standards. On the contrary, God "maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust" (Matt. 5:45b).²⁹ The positive effects and negative effects of sun and rain fall indiscriminately on the righteous and the wicked. The positive effects of sun and rain are accentuated economically by societies that pursue God's law. Similarly, the negative effects of too much sun and too much rain are minimized in societies that pursue God's law. I believe that Matthew 5:45 is a statement regarding God's general laws of covenantal cause and effect; the statement applies to earthquakes as well as to sun and rain. In other words, people who build homes in flood plains or on top of major seismic faults will not see their property protected from the effects of flooding or earthquakes merely because they pray a lot or give money to the poor. The best they can legitimately expect from God is better information about controlling floods or better construction methods that resist Richter-7 quakes. Increased percentages of adultery will not produce increased percentages of Richter-9 quakes.³⁰

28. Voltaire included a section on the Lisbon earthquake in Candide.

29. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000], 2012), ch. 10.

30. The Gutenberg-Richter law of earthquakes informs us that, worldwide, in any time period, as the magnitude of earthquakes increases, their probability decreases by a constant factor. This law is a member of a class of laws called power (exponent) laws. This law is good news for Westminster Seminary (West), which is located on an earthquake fault in a region of the world noted for its adultery.

Conclusion

Under the Mosaic Covenant, God dwelt in Israel in a unique way. As men approached God's earthly throne room, they approached holy ground. The extreme edges of this series of concentric holy boundaries were the nation's geographical boundaries. The land of Israel therefore acted as God's covenantal agent. In the New Covenant era, there is no holy ground separate from common ground. We do not take our shoes off when we enter a church, as God required of Moses when he stood on holy ground (Ex. 3:5), and as some Eastern religions and Islam require. We do not have ritual foot washings. The land of the New Covenant no longer serves as a covenantal agent. It no longer brings predictable sanctions in history. It is no longer tied covenantally to military affairs.

Leviticus 18 establishes the family as a unique covenantal institution, and protects it by civil law. The sanction associated with the violation of these requirements was to be cut off from the people. This means a cutting off from the covenant, which in turn means excommunication. This excommunication was not merely ecclesiastical but also civil and familial. A person moved from being either a covenanted Israelite or a resident alien, and he became the legal equivalent of a foreigner who was in the land for purposes of trade. Covenant-breaking foreigners were permanently expelled from the nation.

Prior to the exile period, the land was spoken of in terms of its covenantal position as God's representing and represented agent. The land was represented by man, but it also represented God when it came time for God to bring His negative sanctions against covenantally rebellious residents inside the land's boundaries. The Promised Land was analogous to God in the sense that it is said to vomit the nations out of the land, just as God is also said to be the one who drives the nations out of the land.

In the New Testament, we no longer legitimately speak of the land's vomiting out its inhabitants. Instead, we read of the kingdom and its worldwide expansion. Because the self-consciousness and consistency of the individual is supposed to be greater under the New Covenant than under the Old, the New Testament does not speak of the land as analogous to both God and man. We read instead of the sword of the Lord, meaning the word of God that proceeds out of the mouth of God. "And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron:

and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God” (Rev. 19:15).

One reason why the land is no longer spoken of as vomiting out its inhabitants is that the progress of the gospel is no longer conducted by means of military conquest. There is no longer a God-sanctioned system for covenant-keeping people to replace covenant-breaking people by means of expulsion. Today, they replace covenant-breakers through performance and productivity. They are to replace them in positions of cultural and political leadership—not by force but by performance.

Covenant-keepers are also to conquer covenant-breakers by means of preaching. Men are to be brought into the “Promised Land” today by bringing them into the church, and then by bringing the whole nation under the biblical civil covenant through a democratic vote. This does not equate the visible church with the Promised Land, but it acknowledges that the kingdom of God is primarily manifested in history by the church, and all those who profess to be Christians are supposed to be members of the church. Thus, the land is not the primary agent of enforcement; Jesus Christ is. By purifying the church, He enables His people to purify themselves and to begin the conquest of the earth by means of the preaching of the gospel. He draws men to Himself rather than casting them out of the land. He does not need to remove covenant-breakers from the land in order to make room for His people. Instead, the kingdom of God is the Promised Land, in history and eternity, and by preaching the gospel, we invite all men to enter into that Promised Land. Ultimately, it is the goal of Christianity to bring the whole earth under the dominion of Christ.³¹ This means that it would do no good for the land to vomit the inhabitants out because, ultimately, there is no contiguous land to vomit them into. The New Covenant’s strategy is conquest by conversion rather than conquest by destruction and expulsion.

End of Volume 1

31. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., He Shall Have Dominion: A Postmillennial Eschatology, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1997). (<http://bit.ly/klghshd>)

BOUNDARIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON LEVITICUS

VOLUME 2

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

BOUNDARIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON LEVITICUS

VOLUME 2

GARY NORTH

Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus
Volume 2

Copyright © Gary North, 2012
Second Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1

| | |
|---|-------|
| Foreword | xi |
| Preface | xxxii |
| Introduction to Boundaries and Dominion | 1 |
| Introduction to Part I: Sacrifices (Lev. 1–7) | 30 |
| 1. Sacrifice, Stewardship, and Debt (Lev. 1:1–4) | 36 |
| 2. Priestly Representation (Lev. 2:1–3) | 61 |
| 3. Leaven and Progressive Sanctification (Lev. 3:1, 17) | 70 |
| 4. Corporate Responsibility (Lev. 4:1–3, 22–24) | 103 |
| 5. Proportional Payments to God (Lev. 5:6–7, 11–12) | 159 |
| 6. Sacred, Profane, and Common (Lev. 5:14–19) | 178 |
| 7. Guardian of the Civil Oath (Lev. 6:1–7) | 228 |
| Introduction to Part II: Cleansing (Lev. 8–16) | 262 |
| 8. Wine as a Boundary Marker (Lev. 10:8–11) | 264 |
| 9. Biblical Quarantine (Lev. 13:45–46) | 282 |
| Introduction to Part III: Separation (Lev. 17–22) | 300 |
| 10. The Promised Land (Lev. 18:24–29) | 302 |

Volume 2

| | |
|--|-----|
| 11. Gleaning: Charity Without Entitlement (Lev. 19:9–10) . . . | 323 |
| 12. Verbal Bonds (Lev. 19:11–12) | 363 |
| 13. Protecting the Weakest Party (Lev. 19:13–14) | 381 |
| 14. Impartial Justice vs. Socialist Economics (Lev. 19:15) | 407 |
| 15. Local Justice vs. Centralized Government (Lev. 19:15) | 444 |
| 16. The State’s Monopoly of Vengeance (Lev. 19:18) | 472 |
| 17. The Preservation of the Seed (Lev. 19:19) | 493 |
| 18. Covenantal Fruit (Lev. 19:23–25) | 527 |
| 19. Measuring Out Justice (Lev. 19:33–37) | 549 |
| 20. Inheritance by Fire (Lev. 20:2–5) | 589 |
| 21. Inheritance Through Separation (Lev. 20:22–26) | 619 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| Introduction to Part IV: Covenantal Acts (Lev. 23–24) | 634 |
| 22. Mutual Self Interest: Priests and Gleaners (Lev. 23:22) . . . | 636 |

Volume 3

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduction to Part V: Inheritance (Lev. 25–27) | 647 |
| 23. The Sabbatical Year (Lev. 25:1–7) | 653 |
| 24. Boundaries of The Jubilee Land Laws (Lev. 25:8–13) | 673 |
| 25. Economic Oppression (Lev. 25:14–17) | 712 |
| 26. Food Miracles (Lev. 25:18–22) | 736 |
| 27. The Right of Redemption (Lev. 25:23–24) | 748 |
| 28. Poverty and Usury (Lev. 25:35–38) | 764 |
| 29. Promise, Adoption, and Liberty (Lev. 25:39–43) | 786 |
| 30. Slaves and Freeman (Lev. 25:44–46) | 808 |
| 31. Mandatory Redemption upon Payment (Lev. 25:47–55) . . | 834 |
| 32. Nature as a Sanctioning Agent (Lev. 26:3–6) | 847 |
| 33. Limits to Growth (Lev. 26:9–10) | 865 |
| 34. God’s Escalating Wrath (Lev. 26:13–17) | 884 |
| 35. The Priesthood: Barriers to Entry (Lev. 27:2–8) | 892 |
| 36. The Redemption-Price System (Lev. 27:9–15) | 911 |
| 37. Tithing: The Benefit of Doubt (Lev. 27:30–33) | 930 |
| Conclusion | 935 |

Volume 4

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–Sacrilege and Sanctions | 957 |
| APPENDIX B–Rushdoony on the Tithe: A Critique | 970 |
| APPENDIX C–Leaven as Exclusively Evil | 1025 |
| APPENDIX D–Greek Mythology: The Myth of Classical Politics | 1044 |
| APPENDIX E–The Covenantal Structure of Judgment | 1064 |
| APPENDIX F–Rushdoony on “Hybridization” | 1085 |
| APPENDIX G–Malthusiansim vs. Covenantalism | 1108 |
| APPENDIX H–Conspiracy, Forgery, and Higher Criticism | 1145 |
| APPENDIX I–Critics of the Five Point Covenant Model | 1159 |

11

GLEANING: CHARITY WITHOUT ENTITLEMENT

And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field, neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy harvest. And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger: I am the LORD your God (Lev. 19:9–10).

I covered certain aspects of gleaning in Tools of Dominion (1990).¹ I think it is appropriate to reprint the bulk of that material in this chapter (though not in the same order), since readers may not have easy access to Tools of Dominion or the replacement volume, Part 3 of Authority and Dominion (2012).

The theocentric principle that undergirds this law is this: God shows grace to man in history by allowing mankind access to the fruit of God's field, His creation. Put another way, God allows mankind inside the boundaries of His field. Fallen man is in the position of the poverty-stricken, landless Israelite or stranger. God does not exclude externally cursed mankind from access to the means of life in history. Neither were land owners in post-conquest Mosaic Israel to exclude the economically poor and judicially excluded residents of the land.

A. Gleaning: A Moral Model

Gleaning was a form of morally compulsory charity. It remains the primary moral model for biblical charity, but, as I hope to show, it is not a literal model for modern charity. Most men today live in a non-agricultural society. Perhaps this may change someday, perhaps during a temporary economic or military apocalypse, but life is primarily urban today. In a non-agricultural society, gleaning cannot become a literal model for charity. Morally, however, gleaning is to be our guideline for charity: those in the community who have been called in the West “the deserving poor” are to be allowed to do hard work in order to support themselves and improve their condition. God expects the more successful members of a community to provide economic opportunities for such willing laborers—opportunities for service.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 53:D–E.

As with every biblical law, this law is ultimately theocentric. The beneficiaries of this law were God’s representatives in history, just as victims of crimes are representatives of God. *Crime is primarily an assault on God by means of a crime against man, who is made in God’s image.*² Crime is man’s attempt to bring unlawful negative sanctions against God by bringing them against one of His representatives. Charity is analogous to crime in this respect, but with this difference: the sanctions are both lawful and positive. Jesus warned of the words of God at the final judgment:

And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me (Matt. 25:32–40).

B. A Lawful Claim: Moral or Legal?

God announced that the poor people and resident aliens in Israel were to be invited in by the land owner so that they could harvest the corners of the field and the fallen grain. This meant that, as a class, they had a moral claim on the “droppings” of production. This also meant that they had no legal claim on the primary sources of income of an agricultural community. They were invited in. There was no state-financed welfare in Israel.

2. Ibid., Appendix M:A.

It would have been difficult for a judge or a jury to identify which individuals in the community had the legal right to bring charges against the land owner as the legal victims of his refusal to honor the gleaning laws. The text specifies no negative institutional sanction that had to be imposed on a land owner who refused to honor the gleaning laws. God is indirectly revealed as the agent who would bring negative sanctions against a land owner who refused to honor the gleaning laws. The state was not authorized by the text to bring these sanctions. This implies that the sanctions were individual rather than corporate. God did not threaten the community with negative sanctions. But without the threat of God's negative sanctions against the whole covenanted community, there was no justification for civil sanctions. Civil sanctions were imposed in Israel in order to substitute the state's subordinate wrath for God's more direct wrath against the community. Furthermore, in case of a violation of the gleaning law, there would have been no easy way to determine legitimate restitution. Where there are no civil sanctions, there is no crime.

Were the sanctions implied by the general legal precept of victim's rights?³ It is difficult to imagine the basis by which appropriate sanctions could be devised by the civil judges. Lex talionis ("eye for eye")? The land owner had inflicted no damage on the poor person. Double restitution? Double what? How much could the potential gleaner have gleaned from the field? How many local potential gleaners could sue? All of them? Did each of them have a lawful claim against the land owner, no matter how small his fields? There was no way predictably to assess restitution.

Without predictable negative sanctions, there is no legitimate biblical role for civil government. The state's monopoly of violence is too great a threat to freedom, too great a temptation for those who would play God. The civil government had no jurisdiction over gleaning in the Mosaic economy.

God instructed owners to allow poor people to glean. This land was His (Lev. 25:23); the whole earth is His (Ex. 19:5; Ps. 24:1⁴). As the permanent owner, God can tell His stewards how to administer His property. But God is the disciplining agent. He acts either as Kinsman-

3. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix M.

4. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, 2012), ch. 5.

Redeemer or as Blood Avenger, depending on the legal status of the land owner. The law is in the form of a positive injunction, and biblical civil law is negative in scope: forbidding public evil. The priests, not the civil magistrate, would have had the responsibility of enforcing this law.⁵

Because God is the ultimate sanctions-bringer, and because it is difficult to specify the precise nature of the harm and the precise size of the restitution payment owed, the implication is that God would bring a curse against the owner, but the text does not say this. The further implication is that God would bring the curse of poverty against the harvester who attempted to cheat the poor by taking from the corner of the field or by picking up whatever had fallen to the ground. God would see what was being done, and He would assess an appropriate penalty.

So, the gleaning law was morally compulsory, but it was not clearly part of the Israelite civil code. Without a specified negative civil sanction or without a way for the judges to assess damages, no law could be part of the nation's civil code. But this law was part of God's law code. He would bring negative sanctions against the individual land owner. The civil code of Israel assumed that God is the sanctions-bringer in history and eternity, and therefore it was not regarded as foundational to civil society that the civil code legislate against every evil in history. The state was therefore not seen as messianic. This is no longer the case in the modern humanist world, where belief in the God of the Bible is not regarded as the public foundation of social order. The state today is seen by most people as the only relevant sanctions-bringer in history; thus, evil is defined as anything the state prohibits. On the other hand, all crimes are regarded as crimes against society. Criminals are expected to "pay their debt to society," meaning the state. They supposedly owe nothing to the individual victims.⁶

C. Bread and Wine

This law applied specifically to the field and the vineyard. It did not apply to any occupation except agriculture. It specifically speaks of the harvest, which indicates grain, and it also identifies grapes. This should alert us immediately to the symbolic point of reference, namely, the main products of grain and grapes: bread and wine. The sources of the two foods that God invites us to eat with Him in the holy meal of the church are identified here as being under the authority of the gleaning law. This law pointed forward in time to the grace of the New Covenant. It had eschatological implications. It established as holy—judicially set apart—the ground that produces the two holy foods of the communion meal of the New Testament.

5. Chapter 22.

6. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

The communion meal is holy in the New Covenant era. The land of Canaan was holy in the Mosaic Covenant. That is to say, a holy meal is judicially set apart by God today, just as a holy land was judicially set apart in the Mosaic Covenant. This is why there were judicial limits placed on the applicability of the gleaning law. The gleaning law identified the special boundaries of God. These boundaries were historically unique. This is why we must be careful to avoid extending the gleaning law to areas that it did not cover in the Mosaic Covenant.

There is another consideration. In the Bible, there is an eschatological movement from the garden to the city. Genesis 2 begins in a garden. The tree of life is in the garden. Revelation 20 and 21 end in a city. This city has the tree of life in its midst (Rev. 22:2). We see a fusion of the city and the garden in the final chapters of the Book of Revelation.⁷ In the Mosaic Covenant, we see a greater emphasis on rural life than we see in the New Covenant, but the New Covenant does not exclude the imagery of the garden.⁸ The law of gleaning was an aspect of this earlier social order.

The question is: Do the terms of this law still apply in the New Covenant? To answer this, we first need to know the extent of gleaning in the Mosaic Covenant era.

7. Presumably, as time goes on, we shall see a fusion of the two images in society. This process may be about to begin in the United States. The suburban culture in the late twentieth century was being threatened by the economic and moral breakdown of the large inner cities that spawned suburbia. The next great migration may be out of suburbia toward more rural areas, but with imported technology as the basis of the new economy. See Jack Lessinger, Penturbia (Seattle, Washington: SocioEconomics, 1991).

8. In 1975, Patrick Boorman, who studied under Wilhelm Röpke and who translated his Economics of the Free Society into English (Chicago: Regnery, 1963), told me of an exchange between Röpke and an unnamed humanistic, free market economist. The economist was visiting Röpke's home outside of Geneva. Röpke had a garden. "That is not an efficient way to produce food," his visitor said. Röpke's reply was classic: "It is an efficient way to produce men." A variation of this story is repeated by Russell Kirk, who says that the visitor was Ludwig von Mises. I do not recall hearing this from Boorman. Russell Kirk, "Foreword" (1992), Wilhelm Roepke, The Social Crisis of Our Time (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction, [1942] 1992), p. ix.

D. The Economics of Gleaning: Who Paid, Who Benefitted?

What was the economics of the gleaning law? In a sense, the requirement that the land owner and professional harvesters leave a small portion of the crop for the gleaners made this portion analogous to the manna that God had supplied to the Israelites during the wilderness wandering. That miraculous though predictable food was a pure gift of God. Similarly, both the produce of the land and God's grace in establishing the requirement that the land owners and harvesters share with the gleaners were signs of God's continuing grace to the poor. The gleaners were visibly dependent on God's grace for their survival. This had also been the case for the whole nation in the wilderness.

Gleaning laws were exclusively agricultural laws. God commanded the harvesters of the field and the vineyard to be wasteful—wasteful in terms of their personal goals, but efficient in terms of God's goals. They were to leave part of the produce of both the vineyard and the grain field for gathering by the poor.

This law indicates that the leftovers of the Promised Land belonged to God. God transferred the ownership of these high harvesting cost economic assets from the land owner and the harvester to the poor and the stranger. The owner in one sense did benefit, at least those owners who paid their field hands wages rather than by the supply harvested, i.e., piece-rate payment. The obedient owner did not have to pay salaried harvesters to collect marginal pickings. This lowered his labor cost per harvested unit of crop. But the net income loss as a result of gleaning did lower his return from his land and planting expenses. There is no doubt that this economic loss of net revenue constituted a form of compulsory charity. It was a mandated positive sanction. This should alert us to the fact that this law was not a civil law. It was rather a church-enforced law. The church, not the state, is to bring positive sanctions in history. The church offers Holy Communion, not the state.

The gleaning law was also to some extent an advantage to the piece-rate harvester because he was able to achieve greater output per unit of time invested. He was not expected to spend time gathering the marginal leftovers of the crop. Marginal returns on his labor invested were higher than they would have been had it not been for this law. Nevertheless, both the owner of the land and the piece-rate harvesters did suffer a loss of total income because of this law. The harvesters saved time but gathered less. They did suffer a loss of income compared to what they would have earned apart from this law.

How did piece-rate harvesters suffer a loss of total income? Because they could not lawfully gather the total crop of the field or the vineyard. Each worker had to leave some produce behind, which means that his income suffered. This also means that the poor of the community were in part funded by the slightly less poor: the piece-rate harvesters. The harvesters were reminded of the burdens of poverty. This in effect became an unemployment insurance program for the harvesters. They knew that if they later fell into poverty, they would probably be allowed to participate as gleaners sometime in the future. They forfeited some income in the present, but they did so in the knowledge that in a future crisis, they would be able to gain income from gleaning. Both the land owner and the piece-rate worker financed a portion of this compulsory insurance program.

The law placed a burden on the landowner. Yet this burden was in fact a form of liberation if he acknowledged the covenantal nature of the expenditure. It was analogous to the tithe. By honoring it, he was acknowledging God's sovereign ownership of his land. This act of sharing placed him visibly in the service of the great King. That King was his protector, for he was a vassal. As with rest on the sabbath, the owner could rest confidently in the knowledge that the King would defend his interests as a vassal if he abided by the terms of the King's treaty.

There was another benefit to the faithful owner, according to Aaron Wildavsky, one of the most informed experts in the world on the history of taxation.⁹ He was also a student of the Mosaic law. He wrote of the gleaning law that "Compulsiveness easily converts to fanaticism. The farmer who harvests not 99% of his crop but every last little bit becomes consumed by his compulsion. Soon enough excess—getting it all—becomes an overwhelming passion."¹⁰ He quite properly identifies fanaticism as idolatry.¹¹ The gleaning law restrained the idolatry of greed. It reminded rich men that they did not need to keep everything they managed as God's stewards in order to remain successful. It restrained them from the passion of autonomous man:

9. Carolyn Webb and Aaron Wildavsky, A History of Taxation and Expenditure in the Western World (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1986).

10. Aaron Wildavsky, The Nursing Father: Moses as a Political Leader (University, Alabama: University of Alabama Press, 1984), p. 30.

11. Idem.

defining themselves in terms of their wealth rather than their obedience to God.

E. Hard Work

The gleaner had to work harder than the average worker did in order to gain the same quantity of crops. The “easy pickings” were gone by the time the gleaner was allowed into the fields. This means that he had high marginal labor costs. That is, he had to invest more labor per unit of crop harvested than the piece-rate harvester did. Assuming that the harvester’s goal was a higher return on labor invested, it was preferable to be a piece-rate worker than to be a gleaner. To be a gleaner was to be in a nearly desperate condition.

In the case of both piece-rate work and gleaning, most of the labor costs of harvesting were borne by the poor. The rich man did not work in the fields. But there were degrees of poverty. By far, the greater cost per unit harvested was borne by the gleaners. In modern terminology, this might be called a workfare program instead of a welfare program. The gleaner was not a passive recipient of someone else’s money. He had to work. Furthermore, marketing costs may actually have been borne by the poor. It would have been legal for the poor individual to take whatever pickings he gained from the field and go to a store owner or other purchaser of the crop. The owner of the land did not have the right to compel the gleaner to sell the gleanings to him. This means that the gleaner was enabled to obtain a competitive market price for the output of his labor. Of course, this would have been extra work and risk for the gleaner, and it involved specialized knowledge of markets. Nevertheless, it was a right that the gleaner possessed.

The poor were invited into the unharvested fields only in the sabbatical year (Lev. 25:4–7).¹² They had to earn every bit of the produce they collected. It was not a chosen profession for sluggards. But for those who were willing to work, they would not perish at the hands of men who systematically used their competitive advantage to create a permanent class of the poor.

There was another great advantage to this form of morally enforced charity: it brings hard-working, efficient poor people to the attention of potential employers. There is always a market for hard-working, efficient, diligent workers. Such abilities are the product of a righteous worldview and a healthy body, both of which are gifts of

12. Chapter 24.

God. It always pays employers to locate such people and hire them. In effect, employers in Mosaic Israel could “glean” future workers from society’s economic “leftovers.” Gleaning appears initially to be a high-risk system of recruiting, for it required land owners to forfeit the corners of their fields and one year’s productivity in seven. Nevertheless, God promises to bless those who obey Him. Gleaning really was not a high-risk system. Israel’s gleaning system made charity local, work-oriented, and a source of profitable information regarding potential employees. Thus, the system offered hope to those trapped in poverty. They could escape this burden through demonstrated productivity. This is how Ruth, a stranger in the land, began her escape: she caught the attention of Boaz (Ruth 2:5).

F. More Food for Everyone

Under this system of charity, more of the crop got harvested than would otherwise have been the case. Professional harvesters entered the field first and got the easy pickings. The labor time of the professional harvester was devoted to the high-yield sections of the field or vineyard. This was economically efficient. Skilled harvesters devoted a greater portion of their time to the high-yield sections of the land, leaving the low-return portions of the field for the lower-skilled gleaners.

Furthermore, it was difficult for the owner to police this charity law as it applied to the harvesters. How could he watch every harvester to see that he really did leave the fallen grain on the ground? This is why the harvesters were required by God to exercise self-restraint in the amount of the crop that they harvested. They had to leave behind some leftovers. But there was an economic incentive for them to do this. Their time would be spent more productively by gathering the easy pickings. This means that a greater percentage of the crop would have been harvested under the gleaning law, for two reasons. First, the harvesters would have tended to harvest a larger percentage of the crop, hour for hour, than the gleaners did. Second, the gleaners were highly dependent on this food. This means that they would have exercised great diligence and care to strip the field of any remaining grain after the professional harvesters had done their work.¹³ This was a benefit for the community as a whole, since the community gained access to a larger quantity of food. There was less waste of the crop in the aggregate because of the marginal waste that was imposed by God's law on the land owners and the piece-rate harvesters.

13. It is true that humanistic economic science cannot legitimately draw such a conclusion from economic theory alone. To do so would involve making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, a practice which Lionel Robbins exposed as non-scientific as early as 1932: The Nature and Significance of Economic Science, 2nd ed.

There were also higher costs with this system. The extra labor expended by the inefficient gleaners was a true cost. The labor time of the gleaners could have been used to produce other products. The net economic return of the products and services that gleaners would otherwise have produced was the cost to consumers of the greater supply of food. The gleaning system did subsidize food production at the expense of other products. We shall consider the reasons for this later in this chapter. Suffice it to say here that one reason for this subsidy was connected with the accent on decentralization and localism that the land ownership system of Old Covenant Israel fostered.

Why weren't these poor people hired to harvest the crop in the first place? What was wrong with them? Answer: they were not the most efficient harvesters in the community. They were high-cost employees. But God wanted these people to learn how to work. He wanted them to become better servants. So, He set up a system that subsidized them as field laborers. This was the simplest work skill to learn, though not the most productive. They had to start at the bottom of the scale, since their skills had put them so far at the bottom that they were outside of the labor force. They had to become the lowest-paid field hands in the community.

We must be careful to distinguish total benefits from net benefits. If this system of compulsory charity was productive of net benefits on its own, then we should expect to see gleaning preached in New Testament times. We do not find this, however. So, are we to conclude that this system was economically productive then but not today? Do economic laws change? Do we find that by ignoring this law today, and allowing land owners to harvest all of their crops, the community is richer, yet by obeying this law, Israel was richer than it would have been if it had not obeyed? This is a dilemma for the Christian economist.

(London: Macmillan, 1935), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>) I am assuming, contrary to what humanist economics officially allows, that very poor people will work harder and more thoroughly to harvest the crop's leftovers than comparatively well-fed harvesters will work to harvest leftovers. The motivation of the poor man to harvest leftovers is normally greater than the motivation of the professional harvester to harvest leftovers. On the question of interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, see Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5; North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix H: "The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost."

Part of the answer is found in Leviticus 26, where God's positive sanctions are promised to the nation if the people obey Him. The economic order was not autonomous. The economist would say that the system was not endogenous. It was exogenous. Something from outside the economy added wealth to it: God's grace. The required charity in the Mosaic Covenant that was tied to the land itself was based on the special relation that God had with both the land and the people. This relation to the land was changed at the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. There had been preliminary alterations centuries before this, such as the post-exilic law that strangers in the land could inherit as part of the jubilee law (Ezek. 47:22–23).¹⁴

When God ceases to require obedience to a particular law, the grace (net benefit) attached to that law disappears. Thus, the land owner today can harvest all of his crop and not suffer God's negative sanctions (net losses) in history. He need not adhere to the gleaning law. The community is not harmed. As techniques of modern agricultural production change and net output increases, the increase of food production more than compensates for the loss of the older system and its net benefits. Costs per harvested plot of ground drop, and output per harvested plot increases. The free market in agriculture does not harm the community.

In the Promised Land, however, the special relation between God and the land led to higher output of food when this law of gleaning was honored. There were net benefits to the community based on obedience to this law. But this law was not intended to be permanent. It was also not intended to be universal. This law applied only in the land of Israel because it applied only to the land of Israel and those who owned and worked it. As we shall see in the next two sections, this restriction was due to two factors: (1) the tribal basis of land ownership in Old Covenant Israel; (2) the judicial designation of the land as God's agent of judgment.

G. The Two-Fold Basis of the Law of Gleaning

Is becoming a low-paid field hand God's universally required on-the-job training system? No. God no longer expects poor people to learn how to become field laborers. In Old Covenant Israel, however, it was important that men learn to serve Him locally. He wanted to preserve localism and tribalism.

14. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

1. Subsidizing Localism

The tribal system was important for the preservation of freedom in Israel. Tribalism and localism broke down attempts to centralize the nation politically. Thus, the gleaning law was part of the social order associated with Old Covenant Israel. It reinforced the tribal system. It also reinforced rural life at the expense of urban life—one of the few Mosaic laws to do so. The land owner was required by God to subsidize the rural way of life. Local poor people were offered subsidized employment on the farms. Had it not been for the gleaning system, the only alternatives would have been starvation or beggary in the country. They would have moved to the cities, as starving people all over the world do today.

The jubilee land inheritance laws kept rural land within the Israelite family. This land inheritance was the mark of civil freemanship for every tribe except the Levites. If a daughter inherited land because there was no brother, she could not marry outside her tribe if she wanted to keep the land. “Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another tribe; but every one of the tribes of the children of Israel shall keep himself to his own inheritance” (Num. 36:9).¹⁵ While a rich man might move permanently to a city, the poor person was encouraged by the gleaning law to stay closer to home.

Cities would inevitably have become the primary dwelling places for most Israelites if they had obeyed God as a nation. Population growth would have forced most people into the cities. The size of family farms would have shrunk as each generation inherited its portion of the land. But until Israel’s corporate covenantal faithfulness led to population growth and increased per capita wealth, each tribe’s poor members were to be subsidized by the gleaning law to remain close to the tribe’s food supplies. This law was a means of retarding the growth of an unemployed urban proletariat. The countryside was to be the place where the poor man received his daily bread. He would have to do simple agricultural labor to receive his food.

15. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 22.

(a) Localism vs. Bureaucracy

The locus of both the enforcement and the concern of the gleaning law was local and tribal. Local people were the ones who gleaned the fields. This showed God's concern for tribal brethren in the local community. It also showed His concern for the strangers in the land who were willing to live under His laws. They, too, were local residents.

Why this concern with localism? Because biblical social order is supposed to reflect the cosmic personalism of the creation.¹⁶ Personalism is the antithesis of bureaucracy. So is localism. Biblical law works against the creation of large bureaucracies. So does localism. Biblical law establishes primary responsibility at the local level. It is based on an appeals court system that begins at the local level (Ex. 18).¹⁷ Bureaucracies lodge initiatory authority at the top, where the common rule book sets forth what is to be done, how, when, and under which conditions. Social coordination is supposed to be achieved through a detailed coordinated rule book. Local initiative thwarts the coordinated application of the rule book's rules.

Charity is not a profit-seeking activity. It is not governed by the market's system of matching supply with demand through the entrepreneur's profit motive. Charity is not restrained by the requirements of a profit-and-loss statement, although it is restrained by the supply of available funds. Without the restraining factor of the profit-and-loss statement, the administration of charity needs other formal guidelines for appropriate action. It needs a book of order. Charities are inherently bureaucratic: governed by the book, not by the free market; by the donor, not the consumer.¹⁸

All bureaucracies have to be managed "by the book," and the book's standards are inherently impersonal. The larger the bureaucracy is, and the more distant its headquarters are, the more general and therefore the more impersonal the book. Bureaucracies tend to become more impersonal as they grow. Localism is necessary to overcome at least partially the inherent move toward bureaucracy in all non-profit management systems.¹⁹ Mosaic localism was designed to be

16. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 1.

17. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 19.

18. Except insofar as we consider donors as consumers: buyers of good feelings, self-worth, and future economic benefits should they fall on hard times.

19. There are in principle only two management systems, profit management and bureaucratic management. The difference between them is the financing. Bureaucratic management does not depend on the voluntary market responses of consumers to highly personalistic.

Because biblical civil law places negative sanctions on specific public actions, it allows freedom to do anything else. Men know in advance what is prohibited. This legal code is the only lawful, formal civil restraint on the public actions of men. Everything else is allowed by the civil government. We see this principle in operation most clearly in the garden of Eden. Adam was permitted to do anything except eat from one tree. In contrast, a perfectly bureaucratic social order allows only what the ever-growing law book permits. This requirement strangles individual initiative. People are forever having to ask permission from a bureaucrat—a person who is motivated above all by the fear of making a mistake, a person governed by a book of human laws, many of them conflicting. Thus, his instinctive answer to all requests is no. He can always retreat from no, and everyone will be happy. He cannot retreat from yes and make the requester happy. This system is the antithesis of personal responsibility under God, who says yes unless there is a good reason to say no. The steady extension of civil bureaucracy into market affairs is therefore the antithesis of biblical dominion.

(b) No Subsidy for Evil

Another important reason for localism was the concern of God that His resources not be used for evil purposes. Either the provider of this agricultural charity had to reside locally or else his specified agent had to. Local residents in rural Mosaic Israel were more likely to be well known to the land owners. Presumably, the cause of their poverty was also well known to the land owners, or at least this could be discovered without much difficulty. The gleaning system reduced the subsidy of evil. The poor person who was poor as a result of his own bad habits did not have to be subsidized by the land owner and the professional harvesters who worked his fields. The land owner had the right to exclude some poor people from access to his fields. Gleaning was therefore a highly personal form of charity, since the person who was required to give this charity was also the person who screened access to the fruit of the land.

This means that the gleaning law was a form of conditional charity in each individual recipient's case, although the loss was compulsory from the point of view of the land owner. Biblical charity is always offers made by entrepreneurs. Ludwig von Mises, Bureaucracy (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1944). (<http://bit.ly/MisesBUR>)

conditional.²⁰ Charity is not to subsidize evil. Rushdoony's comments on this point are striking:

In the name of Christian charity, we are being asked nowadays to subsidize evil. Every time we give in charity to anyone, we are extending a private and personal subsidy to that person. If through our church we help an elderly and needy couple, or if we help a neighboring farmer with his tractor work while he is in the hospital, we are giving them a subsidy because we consider them to be deserving persons. We are helping righteous people to survive, and we are fulfilling our Christian duty of brotherly love and charity.

On the other hand, if we help a burglar buy the tools of his trade, and give him a boost through a neighbor's window, we are criminal accomplices and are guilty before the law. If we buy a murderer a gun, hand it to him and watch him kill, we are again accessories to the fact and are ourselves murderers also.

Whenever as individuals in our charity, or as a nation in that false charity known as foreign aid and welfare, we give a subsidy to any kind of evil, we are guilty before God of that evil, unless we separate ourselves from the subsidy by our protest.²¹

The local member of the land owner's tribe was the primary recipient of charity, but he was not the only one. The other recipient of the grace of gleaning was the stranger. These strangers were presumably resident aliens who had fallen on hard times. They might have been hired servants who could not find employment. They were people who did not want to go back to their home country. They were therefore people who wanted to live under the civil law of God in the Promised Land. These people were entitled to the same consideration that the poor Israelite was entitled to. It is clear that this arrangement would have increased the emotional commitment of the resident alien to the welfare of the community. He was treated justly.

20. Ray R. Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?" in Theonomy: An Informed Response, ed. Gary North (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gntheon>)

21. R. J. Rushdoony, Bread Upon the Waters (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1969), p. 5. A good example of this sort of government charity is the case of the United States State Department's public insistence, a week before Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait on August 2, 1990, that the Congress should not cut off the American government's subsidies to the government of Iraq. The State Department had been taking this line from May onward, despite Hussein's public statement in late February that the United States was an imperialist power. The economic aid, State Department spokesman John Kelly insisted, would enable the United States to exercise a stabilizing influence on Hussein. See "Kuwait: How the West Blundered: The signals that were sent—and the one that wasn't," Economist (Sept. 29, 1991), pp. 20, 22. The United States attacked Iraq on Jan. 16, 1991. The war lasted one month.

2. The Land as God's Covenantal Agent

When Israel invaded the land under Joshua, this priestly act invoked the land's status as God's agent.²² This special judicial office of the land was unique to the Mosaic era. The land was described as being under God and over man in a unique way in Israel. This was because of God's special presence in the temple. When this special presence of God ended in A.D. 70, the land of Israel lost this special judicial status. The land laws ended, including gleaning. This included the jubilee land laws and their applications.

Those few Christian social theorists who have taken gleaning seriously have tended not to acknowledge the close relationship between gleaning laws of the Old Testament and the presence of the people of Israel in the Promised Land. The original distribution of property in Old Testament Israel was based on a concept of a legitimate war of conquest. So was the land's status as God's covenantal agent. The land that families received after the Canaanites were defeated by Joshua's generation was part of a one-time-only national spoils system. The transfer of wealth was from the Canaanites to the Israelites. (Note: this involved the transfer of wealth from previously poor Canaanites to newly rich Israelites. God is not on the side of the poor, contrary to liberation theologians. He is on the side of the righteous. His covenantal goal is not that His people remain poor, let alone become poor. His goal is that His people become rich through covenantal faithfulness.)²³ God commanded and directed the execution of the various Canaanite societies. This is why God is again and again identified as the owner of the Promised Land. It was God who had given them their military victory, so He also had the legal right to specify how the land would be divided, inherited, and used. God established the terms of their leaseholds. As the owner, He had this right.

22. Chapter 10.

23. Gary North, "Free Market Capitalism," in Robert G. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984). (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>). Reprinted in Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), Appendix E.

H. A Law of the Land, Not the Workshop

The gleaning law did not apply to non-agricultural businesses or professions. It originated from the fact that God declared Himself as the owner of the land—not land in general, but the Promised Land. He did not verbally claim an equally special ownership of businesses. The land, not business, was identified as God's covenant agent that brought God's covenant lawsuits in Old Covenant Israel.²⁴ God's legal relationship to the land was special. The land of Canaan, not existing Canaanite businesses, was divided up through the casting of lots after the conquest (Num. 34:13).²⁵ This allowed God to enter directly into the land-distribution process by controlling the lots. This was not an auction system of "high bid wins," as a free market is. This division of the land was an aspect of the spoils of military conquest. The gleaning law was therefore closely related to the jubilee land laws of Leviticus 25, which were also based on the spoils of the original military conquest of the land. The Promised Land occupied a unique place in the legal structure of Old Testament Israel. Business did not.

1. Urbanization and Specialization

In both agricultural and non-agricultural societies, non-agricultural occupations tend to be more specialized than agriculture. In the city, it is common to have many competing businesses and opportunities, each with its own talents, requirements, training, and traditions. Urban life enables society to achieve a greater division of labor and hence greater specialization in both production and consumption. This means that the urban economy achieves greater per capita wealth than a rural economy does.²⁶ But this high specialization requires more capital per worker.

A greater variety of occupations is available to potential workers in the city, which means that there is a far greater number of occupations available for an apprentice to master. He has to choose. He cannot do everything. This reminds him that he is not God. He has to find a teacher to train him in some specialized occupation. Parents in a pre-

24. Chapter 10.

25. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 14.

26. The development of nanotechnology, fiber optics, and other technological breakthroughs may in the future bring urban productivity to rural communities, at least until population growth makes such communities more urban. But there is still the question of corporate worship. The division of labor in a local church cannot be divorced from the size of the local church and the number of nearby churches.

industrial era agricultural society could train their own children on the farm. Non-agricultural workers must be trained by specialists. But there were not many masters to train other men's children in specialized urban occupations. Most people had to stay on the farm. Until the twentieth century, the apprenticeship system generally was much more common for urban businesses than for agriculture.²⁷ Only with the rise of the modern university and the spread of public education, both funded primarily by taxes, has bureaucratic education replaced apprenticeship.

2. Management Costs

There were higher management costs for the owner of land during the gleaning operation. Gleaners had to be screened by the owner or by his representative or operations manager. This increase in management costs would have been especially true in urban occupations, had the requirements of gleaning applied to them. It would have been much more difficult for a non-agricultural business owner to monitor all the operations of a team of gleaners than would have been the case on a farm. The gleaner on the farm simply went into the field and picked up a recognizable agricultural product. He put it into a container and either took it to the owner for sale or took it home for personal use or resale. It is much riskier for the owner of a specialized occupation to bring untrained workers into his shop and have them gain something of value through gleaning. There is greater risk that a thief could steal a valuable product or tool from the shop. There is little of value to steal in the middle of a field except the crop, and that was the gleaner's property.

The gleaning law applied only to agricultural land. Any attempt to derive a modern system of charity, public or private, from the gleaning law faces this crucial limitation. It was not intended to apply outside a farm. About the most that we can hope for is to discover principles of giving that do not violate the principles underlying gleaning. The principles of gleaning show modern man what should not be done generally, not what should be done specifically. They are universal principles of voluntary giving, not laws that God imposes on a specific class. God does not threaten to bring negative sanctions against a giver who ignores the principles of gleaning and chooses other ways to give. A man who gives cash to a deserving poor man is not in trouble with God. He does not have to make the poor man work in the giver's corn field. But if he thinks that the poor man may not be reliable with money, he has the right to require the man to submit to various tests, including setting up a budget. The basic principle is this: biblical charity is conditional.

27. It was a practice of the New England Puritans to send their children no later than age 14 into other homes in order to get their occupational training. Historian Edmund Morgan suggested that one reason for this custom is that the Puritans did not trust their own commitment to discipline their children sufficiently to make them reliable workers. Morgan, The Puritan Family: Religion and Domestic Relations in Seventeenth-Century New England, rev. ed. (New York: Harper & Row, 1966), p. 77.

I. Conditional Charity: Moral Boundaries

The owner of the farm had to acknowledge the sovereignty of God by obeying the gleaning laws. These laws were a reminder to him that biblical authority always has costs attached to it. The owner of the land had been given capital that other people lack. He therefore had an obligation to the local poor as God's agent, for the land itself was pictured as God's agent. His obligation was to supply the land's leftovers to the poor.

In making this demand, the gleaning law placed decisive limits (boundaries) on both the poor rural resident and the state. It limited the moral demands that the poor could make on economically successful people in the community. The poor had no comparable moral claim against the successful non-agricultural businessman. This law also limited the demands that the state could make on the community in the name of the poor. Biblical law specified that the man with landed wealth should share his wealth with the deserving poor, but not the poor in general. The deserving poor were those who were willing to work hard, but who could not find work in the normal labor markets. In short, the gleaning law had conditions attached to it. The idea of morally compulsory, non-conditional charity was foreign to the laws of the Mosaic Covenant.²⁸ The gleaner had to work very hard, for he reaped only the leftovers. This means his income was lower than would have been the case if he had been a professional harvester. Gleaning provides a lesson to the poor: there are no free lunches in life. Someone always has to pay. The economic terms of the gleaning system established that only destitute members of the community would have become gleaners. If there had been any other source of income besides begging, they would have taken it. The hard work and low pay of gleaning was an incentive for the individual to get out of poverty.

28. It is equally foreign to the law of the New Covenant. This assertion appalled Timothy Keller. See Keller, "Theonomy and the Poor: Some Reflections," in William S. Barker and W. Robert Godfrey (eds.), Theonomy: A Reformed Critique (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1990), pp. 273–79. He called for initially unconditional charity to all poor people. He argues that anyone in need anywhere on earth is my neighbor, thereby universalizing the moral claims of all poor people on the wealth of anyone who is slightly less poor. He wrote: "Anyone in need is my neighbor—that is the teaching of the Good Samaritan parable." Ibid., p. 275. He rejected the traditional Christian concept of the deserving poor (pp. 276–77). He concluded: "I am proposing that the reconstructionist approach to biblical charity is too conditional and restrictive." Ibid.,

Gleaning provided the poor person with an opportunity to demonstrate publicly his capacity for hard work under difficult personal conditions. First and foremost, he had to admit that he was in a tight financial condition. Pride would work against him. He had to humble himself before God and other men. He had to ask for help. Without this, there can be no salvation, either spiritual or economic. Pride goes before the fall; it often continues after the fall. Second, the gleaner was not asking for a form of charity that involved no work on his part. He was not claiming charity as either an unconditional legal right or an unconditional moral right. He was not claiming an entitlement.²⁹

Gleaning was conditional. All charity is conditional. There is always more demand for aid than there is supply. Resources are scarce; they must be allocated in terms of conditions. The question is: Which conditions are biblically appropriate for charity? The state-mandated welfare system imposes bureaucratic conditions: forms, income tests, and placating local welfare bureaucrats. Gleaning was conditional in terms of the standards of the person who actually provided the opportunity with his own assets, the land owner. The gleaner was asking for an opportunity to do a lot of hard work at a low rate of return. The owner could exclude lazy or immoral workers from his field. We are once again back to the issue of boundaries: inclusion and exclusion. This authority of the land owner meant that not only did the gleaner

p. 278. For my response, see North, Westminster's Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til's Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), pp. 271–73. (<http://bit.ly/gnwc>). See also Sutton, "Whose Conditions for Charity?" in North (ed.), Theonomy, ch. 9.

29. The word "entitlement" refers to a legal claim on government money or services, or on money or services from private sources mandated by the government. It means "legal right to," as distinguished from "legal immunity from." The word seems first to have appeared in a United States government document in 1974. It has become a widely used substitute term for "public welfare" ever since the first year of Ronald Reagan's Presidency: 1981. Norman Ornstein, "Roots of 'Entitlements,' and Budget Woes," Wall Street Journal (Dec. 14, 1993), p. A16. See Thomas L. Friedman, "Clinton Wary of Cutting Entitlements," New York Times (Dec. 14, 1993), p. A12.

have an opportunity to demonstrate his capacity for hard work, he almost had to demonstrate it in order to gain continued access to the field. The owner of the field was not required to subsidize lazy people.

The gleaning system provided a labor recruiting opportunity for land owners. Boaz is the best example of this in the Bible (Ruth 2). He saw in Ruth a dedicated worker and a loyal daughter-in-law. He saw that she was ethically upright. She distinguished herself first in the fields. The opportunity to locate good workers is a valuable asset. The gleaning system was ideal in this regard. The owner was in close proximity to the gleaners. They were given a way to please the owner by working hard and efficiently. The owners of these fields could see which gleaners performed well under adverse conditions. This was an important aspect of the labor market. Owners who honored the gleaning laws were given access to very important information. This information enabled them to determine who among the poor would have been best qualified to be hired as regular field harvesters. This means that gleaners could move up to a higher income level if they were successful in being hired as full-time workers. This provided the gleaner with greater incentive to arrive early and work hard and efficiently.

This institutional escape hatch out of poverty was also a great incentive for the gleaner to take orders from the person who was over him in the fields. Gleaning was part of a system of subordination. Hierarchy is basic to all institutions, and those individuals who acknowledged this and made good use of it were enabled to get out of poverty in Old Covenant Israel. The way out of poverty for the agricultural worker was to be hired full-time. Work was the way of escape. This included obedience.

One of the important rules of management is that the best way to become a good manager is to be trained by a good manager. We could also say that the best way to become rich is to be trained by someone who has become rich. The land owner was successful. This was the best person to supervise the system that taught the poor man how to become successful. Furthermore, gleaning was a system that created incentive for the owner to provide a system to teach the poor man. The owner wanted skilled, effective workers to do the harvesting. The gleaning system was a specially designed means of locating and training hard-working people. To this extent, therefore, the gleaning system was really a system of local education in personal self-management by the poor, and also a system for the economically successful to locate productive employees. This system of relief for the poor rested on a system of hierarchy.

We must always remember that the gleaning laws operated within the framework of the jubilee land laws. The poorest Israelite in the community at some point would inherit from his father or grandfather a portion of the original family inheritance. The size of that portion of land depended on the number of male heirs. Its value depended on the economic productivity of local residents who could legally bid to lease it. The more productive the heir, the more likely that he would be able to retain control over it.³⁰ Gleaning gave the poor Israelite an opportunity to gain management and other skills as a land owner prior to the time that he or his children would be given back the original family land grant through the jubilee land law. The gleaning law provided training that could in the future be converted into family capital. The gleaning law was designed to keep poor people in the local agricultural community.

J. Unconditional Charity: Political Boundaries

The law governing gleaning was not a civil law. This means that it was not compulsory. No individual gleaner had an enforceable legal claim on any land owner. The gleaning system was therefore not part of a civil government entitlements program.

1. Entitlements

An entitlement is a legal claim, enforceable in a civil court. A welfare entitlement program is backed by the threat of civil sanctions. It will eventually transform the character of any welfare program: from a scheme established to help humble people climb out of poverty into a program that keeps pride-filled people and people without initiative in lifelong poverty. An entitlement is neither charity nor temporary; it is a permanent legal claim based on coercive law. It is a state-mandated system of permanent subsidies to people who refuse to work and who resent every suggestion that this refusal is either unwise or immoral. The government pays people if they remain poor. Legally and economically, this cannot be distinguished analytically from paying people to remain poor.

The market responds to rising demand by increasing the supply of 30. This legal right to inherit the family's land did not extend to the stranger until after the exile (Ezek. 47:22–23). North, Restoration and Dominion, ch. 22.

the item demanded: in this case, poverty. The more money the state pays to keep people poor, the larger the number of poor people produced by the system. This law of the market has not been violated in the field of entitlements: growing numbers of poor people appear on the scene in response to increases in entitlements.³¹ There are moral repercussions that are associated with these increases. Professional welfare administrators advance their careers only if the demand for their services increases. In the wonderfully descriptive phrase of Shirley Scheibla, poverty is where the money is.³² Thus, welfare administrators have an economic incentive to locate poor people and get them into the programs. A professionally managed entitlement system steadily removes the stigma of poverty from the thinking of the later generations of recipients and substitutes arrogance. The recipient knows that if he conforms to the welfare rule book, or appears to, the power of the state will extract his monthly income from taxpayers. He will get his money irrespective of any change in his behavior. In fact, evil behavior gets rewarded. Illegitimate children are added to the Aid to Dependent Children welfare rolls. Or: a riot—looting, arson—in which over four dozen people are killed leads to huge payments from the government.³³

31. When the United States government's War on Poverty program began in 1965, the emphasis was on eliminating poor people's dependence on public assistance. Problem: the official poverty statistic does not measure progress toward this goal. To get around this limitation, Charles Murray defines the "latent poor" as those who show up below the officially defined poverty level, plus those who are above the poverty line only because they receive government assistance. Thus defined, latent poverty went from one-third of the United States population in 1950 to 21% in 1965. Under President Lyndon Johnson's "War on Poverty" programs, this figure dropped to 18.2% by 1968. Then it started back up under President Nixon. It reached 22% in 1980—higher than where it had been when the War on Poverty began. Charles Murray, Losing Ground: American Social Policy, 1950–1980 (New York: Basic Books, 1984), pp. 64–65. This poverty statistic counts only money transfers. If we count in-kind transfers (e.g., food stamps), we get a "net poverty" figure. In 1972, the net poverty figure was 6.2% of the United States population. Over the next seven years government welfare expenditures for in-kind assistance doubled. In 1979, the net poverty figure was 6.1%: no progress. Ibid., p. 63.

32. Shirley Scheibla, Poverty Is Where the Money Is (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1968).

33. The riot in south central Los Angeles in early May, 1992—a Presidential election year—lasted almost a week. The population of this section of the city is almost entirely black. Over 50 people died during the riot, killed by rioters, not the police or National Guard troops. By the end of the week, President George H. W. Bush, who was campaigning for re-election, joined with Congress to promise over $600 million in tax money to the area. (Gold was around $350 per ounce.) A national poll conducted during the riot revealed that some 61% of those polled said the nation was spending Resentment is created on both sides of these coercive transactions: the recipient thinks he should get more as a matter of right, both legal and moral, while the taxpayer thinks he should get less. The welfare recipient is not required to learn the skills and adopt the mentality of hope that are basic to any permanent escape from poverty. A permanent welfare class is created, thereby justifying the maintenance of a permanent welfare administration. Entitlements for the poor create employment entitlements for the Civil Service-protected bureaucrats who administer the system until the economy collapses, leaving many of the former taxpayers poor. Entitlements are the closest thing to economic entropy that a political order can legislate: a one-way street to chaos.

2. Effects on the Family

The erosion of the two-parent family in the United States has paralleled the rise of welfare entitlements. In 1970, 87% of all United States families were two-parent families. In 1980, this was down to 79%. In 1990, it was 72%. Mothers were usually the heads of these one-parent families: 12% out of 13% in 1970; 19% out of 22% in 1980; 24% out of 28% in 1990. Among black families, the erosion has been most serious. The percentage of two-parent families fell from 64% (1970) to 48% (1980) to 39% (1990). Mothers have been heads of household in the 96% to 97% range throughout this period.³⁴ Nicholas Davidson has called the rise of the single-parent, mother-headed family America's greatest social catastrophe.³⁵

A breakdown in morality has also paralleled the rise of the post-World War II welfare state. This can be seen most clearly in the rise of illegitimacy, which constitutes a social revolution. This revolution has taken only one 40-year generation. Among American teenagers, the increase has been horrendous. In 1960–64, the premarital birth rate among young teens of all races, 15 to 17, was about 33%; in 1984–89, it was over 80%. Among 18 to 19 year olds, the figure was under 17% in too little on improving the conditions of black Americans, up from 35% in 1988. Some 63% said the Federal government was not paying enough attention to the needs and problems of minorities, up from 34% in 1988. "Los Angeles Riots Are a Warning, Americans Fear," New York Times (May 11, 1992). In 1965, a riot that began in Watts, also in south central Los Angeles, led to the deaths of over 30 people. This took place at the beginning of the War on Poverty. The Federal government then spent about $2.4 trillion on welfare programs nationally, 1965–1992.

34. "Family Demographics," American Enterprise (March/April 1991), p. 93.

35. Nicholas Davidson, "Life Without Father," Policy Review (Winter 1990).

1960–64; 59% in 1984–89. Illegitimate births among women age 15 to 34 were under 13% in 1960–64; they were above 28% in 1984–89.³⁶ This annual report ceased covering this statistic by 2010. Other statistics were available. For women of all ages, in 1980 the rate of births to unmarried women was 18%. In 1990, it was 28%. In 2000, it was 33%. In 2008, it was 40%.³⁷

There were significant differences among races. Those racial groups that were less likely to be on state-funded welfare programs had lower illegitimacy rates. Of all births to black women, 57% were not married at the survey date in 1990; among whites, 17%.³⁸ Taking the 15 to 34 age group, we find regarding first births: Blacks: 70% (1984–89) vs. 42% (1960–64); Hispanics: 37.5% (1985–89) vs. 19.2% (1960–64); Whites: 21% (1985–89) vs. 8.5% (1960–64); Asians or Pacific Islanders: 15.5% (1984–89) vs. 13.3% (1960–64), i.e., almost no change.³⁹ By 2000, the rate for whites was 38%. By 2007, it was 48%. For blacks, the rate in 2000 was 70%. In 2007, it was 73%. For Asian or Pacific Islanders, in 2000 it was 21%. In 2007, it was 27%.⁴⁰ These figures indicate a social revolution, 1960 to 2007.

The moral reality is much worse: these figures do not include aborted babies after 1973: about 1.5 million per year. Taking the figures back to 1950, under two percent of white babies were born illegitimate; it was almost 17% for blacks.⁴¹ By 1990, the white illegitimacy rate was at the black rate of 1950.

This was not a uniquely American phenomenon. Similar rates of increase in crime, illegitimacy, and family breakdown took place at the same time in Western Europe. Francis Fukuyama called this the Great Disruption.⁴² Comparing 1980 with 2006–8, the illegitimacy figures indicate a social revolution. France: 11% to 52%; United Kingdom: 11% to 44%; Italy: 4% to 17%; Spain: 4% to 32%; Netherlands: 4% to 41%;

36. Amara Bachu, Fertility of American Women: June 1990, Current Population Reports, Population Characteristics, Series P-20, No. 454 (Washington, D.C.: Bureau of the Census, U. S. Department of Commerce, 1991), p. 7.

37. Statistical Abstract of the United States, 2011 (Washington, D.C.: Bureau of the Census, 2011), p. 840, Table 1334. (<http://bit.ly/BirthStats>)

38. Fertility of American Women, p. 3.

39. Ibid., pp. 7–8.

40. Statistical Abstract, 2011, p. 68, Table 85. (<http://bit.ly/BirthStats2>)

41. Andrew Hacker, "Review of Rickie Solinger, Wake Up Little Susie: Single Pregnancy and Race Before Roe v. Wade (New York: Routledge, 1992)," New York Times Book Review (March 29, 1992).

42. Francis Fukuyama, The Great Disruption: Human Nature and the Reconstitution of Social Order (New York: Free Press, 1999), chaps 1–3.

Ireland: 6% to 33%. Scandinavian countries did not experience this, only because they were high in 1980: from about 33% to 50%. It was worse than it looks. The rates for Muslims were much lower. So, for the old European stock, the rates were higher. Only one major nation avoided this, Japan. It went from 0.8% to 2.1%.⁴³

Despite trillions of entitlement program dollars spent by the national government of the United States in the quarter of a century after the War on Poverty began, plus hundreds of billions spent by state and local governments, there has been no solution to the poverty problem of the inner cities. There is a small but seemingly permanent underclass of people who will not act to escape their poverty. Crime in these districts continues to rise, educational levels continue to fall, and the family continues to disintegrate within this underclass.⁴⁴ Their behavior is properly described as pathological. The decisive issue is not race.⁴⁵ The issue is morality and worldview.⁴⁶ Entitlement programs, coupled with the secular humanism of the local public school systems and the demise of the traditional churches, has accelerated this pathology. The government has financed the severing of the moral links between generations by rewarding bastardy. It has subsidized evil.

K. Few Modern Applications of the Gleaning Law

How could the gleaning law apply in the modern world? As we shall see in a subsequent chapter, the jubilee land laws were fulfilled judicially by Christ's earthly ministry (Luke 4:16–21),⁴⁷ and they were historically annulled at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The jubilee land laws had reference only to the conquered land of Canaan, which was held by Israelite families only on the basis of their ancestors' original military conquest of the land. Nevertheless, even if we did not argue that the gleaning law was lawfully annulled with the annulment of the jubilee land laws, we would still have to say that the law applies exclusively to agricultural pursuits. Therefore, in the twentieth century, the worldwide mass movement of population from the farm to the city

43. Statistical Abstract, 2011, p. 840, Table 1334.

44. William Julius Wilson, The Truly Disadvantaged: The Inner City, the Underclass, and Public Policy (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987).

45. William Julius Wilson, The Declining Significance of Race: Blacks and Changing American Institutions, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980).

46. Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Failure of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970).

47. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

would effectively have abolished the widespread economic relevance of this law. The law was never intended to apply to urban occupations.

1. Urban Life

Today, we find that in urban, industrialized nations, there are very few desperately poor people without jobs who live in rural communities. This is especially true in capitalistic countries. Human harvesters of the fields are mostly migrant workers or people who work part-time in the rural communities. Usually they have other jobs during the year, but they gain extra income during the harvest season. The main exceptions to this generalization are teenage children of migrants who go to school in the off-season.

The gleaning law could still be applied where hand-picking of crops is still common. This would mean primarily on farms producing vegetables and in fruit orchards (Deut. 24:20). But even here, machines are steadily replacing human labor, although this switch has been forced on employers by government-mandated minimum-wage laws, migrant labor unions, immigration laws, and other restrictions on hiring agricultural labor.

There is some question about the gleaning law's relevance to gardens. A garden in ancient Israel would probably have been planted for use by the family, not commercial farming: small plots harvested by family members, not professional harvesters.

Most of the value of modern farming in the United States is produced by grain farming. Machines harvest grain crops; workers don't. This limits the relevance of the gleaning law mainly to small farms. There are very few of these small farms left in the modern world, since they are too inefficient to compete. The cost of labor is too high in a modern economy.⁴⁸ This is why so many of the fruits and vegetables eaten in the United States are imported from Mexico.⁴⁹ In areas where the primary source of income is agriculture, this means that there are very few local residents who could participate as gleaners.

48. One way to make these small truck farms pay is for the owners to invite the public in to pick the crop and pay for the privilege. This is economically feasible in areas within a few miles of a city. This arrangement would make it very difficult for the owner to police the gleaning requirement. The owner who required the paying customers to leave part of the crop would find himself with fewer paying customers.

49. In early 1991, the United States government sought to lower tariffs on imported crops from Mexico, and United States farmers protested. The idea of consumer choice was not challenged directly, but the law's opponents found ways to attack this reduction of government taxation and interference with consumer sovereignty. See the anti-free trade article by United States Senator Ernest Hollings of South Carolina, "No More Uncle Sucker," New York Times (March 26, 1991), Op Ed page.

Furthermore, there is too little productivity today in grain-gleaning by hand. The price of the grain is too low. This also is a result of the enormous efficiency of mechanized grain farming. There are so few people who live close to farms today that gleaning under the best of circumstances could not provide a way out of poverty for the masses of poor individuals. Most people live in cities, not in the country. There are better economic opportunities for people in cities than in rural areas. The poor migrate into the cities to take advantage of these opportunities. This has been going on in the West since at least the eleventh century, A.D. It has accelerated since the early eighteenth century.

There is waste in commercial agriculture, as there is in every business. A 1993 United States Department of Agriculture estimate of the value of food wasted in the United States was $31 billion,⁵⁰ with the figures broken down as follows. Consumers wasted $16 billion (over 50%); harvesting loss: $5 billion; storage: $2.2 billion; transport $400 million; processing: $400 million; wholesaling and retailing: $6.2 billion.⁵¹ The total loss was about 20% of the $150 billion worth of food produced in the United States. This means that the value of food lost in the fields was about 3% of the value of agricultural output—not a high percentage. Even if all of this $5 billion in harvesting waste could have been recovered by gleaning, this would not significantly have relieved poverty in what was at the time a $6 trillion national economy.

2. Agricultural Productivity and Urbanization

We have to understand that it is the vast productivity of modern agriculture that has enabled the growth of urban areas. Without the low cost of food, not many people could afford to move to the cities. What we have seen since the early eighteenth century, beginning in Great Britain, is the steady urbanization of civilization. After 1700, the proportion of Englishmen living on farms dropped for sixty years, stabilized until 1800, and then started dropping again.⁵² This was made possible because of the steady increase in the output of agricultural labor per unit of invested capital. At some point, this increase will stop, or else there will eventually be no human laborers on the farms at all—an unlikely prospect. But for almost three centuries, this increase in the marginal efficiency of invested capital in agriculture has not been halted by the law of diminishing returns: it pays land owners to buy more equipment rather than hire more workers. This increase is also the result of greater productivity in the city. The tools of agricultural production keep getting more efficient. The division of labor is greater in urban areas, and the minds of many resourceful people have been applied to the problems of agriculture.

50. With gold at about $350/oz.

51. Jonathan Eig, "Waste Not, Want Not," Dallas Morning News (Sept. 27, 1993).

52. N. F. R. Crafts, "Income Elasticities of Demand and the Release of Labor by Agriculture During the British Industrial Revolution: A Further Appraisal," in Joel Bokyr (ed.) The Economics of the Industrial Revolution (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1985), pp. 159–61.

The increased output of the cities has also increased the living standards of the rural resident. Nothing was more effective in producing this increase in rural living standards than the coming of electricity.⁵³ This made possible an increase in rural productivity, but also an increase in the availability of consumer goods comparable to those enjoyed by urban residents. Yet the movement of population into the city and the suburb has continued nonetheless. Modern man has preferred to live in the city or town. All of this militates against the idea that a system of agricultural gleanings could be a major factor in reducing poverty in the modern industrial world. Any attempt to decrease rural poverty by anything except more investment (especially in education), transferrable urban production techniques, high-technology agriculture, advanced telecommunications, and better care of the soil, is doomed to failure.

Farming has never been more successful than today in producing economic value. The public wailing over the supposed “demise of agriculture” is a political ploy of an ever-shrinking number of inefficient

53. This does not mean that the United States Federal government was economically justified in having provided cheap electricity to rural areas. It means only that this was an economically beneficial subsidy, as government subsidies go, from the point of view of the recipients. Private power companies would eventually have provided this service to those farmers whose output would have justified the cost, but it would have taken decades longer. Urban taxpayers in the late 1930s and early 1940s funded most of the rural electrification projects in the United States east of the Mississippi. This subsidy did not halt the outflow of people from the farms, nor did it “save” the small family farm. It did make large corporate farms possible in regions where the lack of electrical power had kept them out. It launched today’s large corporate agriculture. Cheap power made heavily capitalized farming productive in rural areas. Cheap electricity was the missing link—the missing complementary factor of production—in the triumph of mechanized agriculture. It made possible the economies of scale of large-scale agriculture. Small farmers moved to the cities. So did their children.

producers. The cries of distress by “farmers” are in fact cries of outrage by less efficient farmers against successful, heavily capitalized agricultural producers. The demand for parity prices⁵⁴—government-mandated price floors for agricultural products—is in fact a cry for prohibitions against voluntary exchange. These critics of free-market pricing want the Federal government to pass laws against allowing the more efficient, price-competitive farmers to get together with consumers and their agents in order to make exchanges at low monetary prices. In the United States, this cry for government interference is always made in the name of free enterprise.⁵⁵ The fact is, there has been no “crisis in agriculture” in capitalist countries: no famines in over two centuries.⁵⁶ The so-called “crisis in agriculture” is a crisis only for the less efficient producers. The consumers of agricultural products have been the winners. They define what constitutes a crisis in agriculture, not inefficient producers. On this basis, there has been no agricultural crisis. There has been a cornucopia.⁵⁷ It has been produced by an ever-shrinking number of agricultural laborers.⁵⁸ This has been a worldwide phenomenon. Economist D. Gale Johnson wrote in 1984: “In the past three decades a world food system has been created. This system is now capable of making food available to almost every person in the world. This was impossible just a few years ago.”⁵⁹ He predicted that “the prospects for the long run are in the direction of continuing gradual declines in the real prices of the primary sources of calories for poor people.”⁶⁰ The next two decades proved him correct.

There are very few human harvesters of crops today, especially grain crops. Fruit pickers do still exist, but they tend to be at the bottom of the barrel economically. There are few workers poorer than the migrant fruit and vegetable pickers. People who are willing to work for 54. Charles Walters, Jr., Unforgiven: The Biography of an Idea (Kansas City, Missouri: Economics Library, 1971).

55. Walters' Unforgiven was co-published by the Citizens Congress for Private Enterprise.

56. Ireland in the 1840s was the one exception, but Ireland was not an industrial, capitalist economy in the 1840s.

57. John A. Prestbo (ed.), This Abundant Land (Princeton, New Jersey: Dow Jones & Co., 1975).

58. Wayne C. Rohrer and Louis H. Douglas, The Agrarian Transition in America: Dualism and Change (Indianapolis, Indiana: Bobbs-Merrill, 1969).

59. D. Gale Johnson, “World Food and Agriculture,” in The Resourceful Earth: A Response to Global 2000, eds. Julian L. Simon and Herman Kahn (London: Basil Blackwell, 1984), p. 67.

60. Ibid., p. 68.

even less money than the migrant workers are very unlikely to stay in rural areas in the modern world. If gleaning were a permanent requirement for charity, this would raise the question of the legitimacy of modern commercial agriculture. After all, its efficiency has destroyed the applicability of the gleaning law. Is modern agriculture illegitimate because it is so efficient? This would be an odd way to argue: the illegitimacy of a vastly increased supply of bread—the very thing that we are instructed to pray for in the Lord’s prayer. Is modern agriculture illegitimate because it has freed people from life on the farm? Is there something inherently preferable about life on the farm? If so, then it is odd that the post-resurrection world is described as a city (Rev. 21:2).

There is another problem associated with the application of the gleaning law in modern times, one which is technical in nature. Mechanical harvesters are so efficient in the gathering of crops that they cannot easily leave gleanings. It is more difficult for harvesting machine operators to leave the corners of the fields bare because the machines are difficult to maneuver. There is no easy way to leave part of the crop in the main portion of the field unless the driver deliberately avoids harvesting a section of the field. The gleaning law told the harvesters not to pick up fallen grain; it did not tell them to avoid harvesting the crop, except at the corners of the fields.

The modern world quite properly ignores the gleaning laws of the Old Testament. It does so in more ways than one. Some of these reasons are legitimate, but others are quite illegitimate, such as the many attempts by the welfare state to create entitlements to government handouts as a substitute for “workfare” systems analogous to gleaning. The main reason why gleaning is no longer required is that the gleaning laws were part of the jubilee laws, which are no longer in force.

L. The Modern Welfare State

The modern world, including the academic Christian world, has reversed the Old Testament criteria of wealth and poverty. There is today a latent suspicion among tenured academics that anyone who is wealthy has achieved his status by unethical means. At the same time, the poor individual is almost universally assumed to be poor by reasons other than his own incompetence or moral rebellion.⁶¹ This means that in the modern world, the welfare state and its apologists (of all faiths) have created a system in which the subsidizing of evil is required by law. Negative civil sanctions are threatened against all tax-paying citizens who refuse to subsidize evil.

61. A widely popular statement of this position is Ronald Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study, co-published by InterVarsity Press and the Paulist Press in 1977. For a reply, see David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute

In the modern system, the whole society is taxed in order to benefit the poor. Additional centralized power is created by the state in order to impose negative sanctions against those who will not pay taxes. The rules of wealth redistribution also become centralized, and they become impersonal. The administration of these rules is exclusively bureaucratic. Unlike the Mosaic Covenant land owner, who had the right to exclude the undeserving poor from access to the fields, it is almost impossible for the modern welfare agent to exclude people from the welfare roles. If the welfare recipient gives at least surface indication that he is looking for work, he is legally entitled to the benefits. The very phrase entitlements is indicative of the judicial shift.

In every system there must be a hierarchy. In the Mosaic economy, the land owner was at the top of the hierarchy of the welfare redistribution system. Today, a new class of paid administrators has been created. This class, because it is paid to administer the programs, has no direct economic interest in overcoming the problem of poverty on a permanent basis. Unlike the land owner, who personally financed the gleaning operation, the salaried administrator of the welfare system does not spend his own money in order to benefit the poor. Furthermore, this bureaucratic class absorbs the bulk of the funds that are raised in order to help the poor. In this system, the poor are penalized for seeking to escape poverty through work because they are penalized economically when they get a job. They lose the tax-free income they could have received by not working. The welfare state pays people not to work. It also pays farmers not to farm. This was not true under the gleaning system, since gleaning was very hard work.

In contrast to the Old Testament's system of gleaning, the modern welfare system penalizes work and subsidizes unemployment. The poor can continue to receive money only through obedience to the new class of bureaucrats. This class of bureaucrats does not operate personally but impersonally, so the poor must meet endless criteria that are established through bureaucratic channels and in terms of the needs and preferences of those who occupy the offices. The poor find it difficult to escape the inevitable hierarchy: being poor and cared for by others. Unlike the poor person under the Old Testament's system of gleaning, which rewarded him for escaping poverty, the modern poor person grows to resent the whole system that keeps him in poverty.

The poor are well aware of this aspect of the welfare state. In the Old Testament, the gleaning system was seen by a poor person as a benefit because it was his means to support himself and possibly escape his poverty by becoming part of the agricultural work force. Today, however, there is neither the appreciation of the welfare system on the part of the poor, nor are there structured avenues of escape that are presented by the administrators of the system to the poor. It is a self-reinforcing system of permanent poverty. The system as a whole responds predictably to the system of financing that sustains it. We are paying poor people not to work, and we are paying bureaucrats to keep themselves employed by paying these people not to work. The welfare system is not irrational; its participants respond quite rationally to the rewards and punishments that the politicians have imposed on the system. In today's welfare systems, all over the industrialized world, poverty is where the money is. The market responds with ever-growing numbers of self-declared and government-certified poor people.

M. We Are All Gleaners

Because each person is in bondage to sin, God has made gleaners of everyone. He cursed the ground, making it to bring forth thorns and thistles. This in effect put us all in the position of people who are not entitled to the best of the field. God removed the "easy pickings" from mankind as a result of mankind's rebellion. But at least he did not destroy the field (the world). He promises not to interfere directly with it until the final judgment (Matt. 13:29–30, 49).⁶² We must work harder than before the curse, but God graciously grants us access to the field. Those who are not content with second-best are given an opportunity to escape their economic bondage through faith in the great Gleaner, Jesus Christ, who served God faithfully unto death, buying our way out of spiritual bondage. God observes us, to see who is efficient and who is a sluggard. He uses history as a giant gleaning operation for recruiting servants for eternity. Those who do not demonstrate faithfulness under adversity are not given access to the fields of the post-judgment world, but instead are cast out into the fire.

62. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

In a very real sense, biblical evangelism prior to the great millennial outpouring of the Holy Spirit is a form of gleaning. We reap small harvests. We get the spiritual and cultural leftovers, after the local tyrants, the humanist school system, the cults, and the drug dealers have passed through the field and have picked off "the best and the brightest." Visible successes on foreign mission fields seem minor; meanwhile, the biological reproduction of God's enemies is now becoming exponential. We seem to be falling behind. We have few reliable models to imitate. Evangelism seems futile. But, like gleaning, this condition is supposed to be temporary. Unfortunately, whole theologies are built in terms of "gleaning as a way of life."

To become a gleaner may tempt a person to accept second-best as a way of life. The gleaner may not recognize or appreciate his God-given opportunity. He may not see that he is being called into the Master's field in order to demonstrate his competence in the face of adversity. He may view his plight as something he does not deserve, not recognizing that after Adam, all that any man deserves is death and eternal wrath. He does not recognize the stripped field as a garden of opportunity. He imagines that all that he can hope for is a sack of leftover grain. His time horizon is too short. His future-orientation suffers from a lack of vision, and also a lack of faith in God's grace. He forgets how few and far between faithful workers are, and how the opportunity to glean the leftover harvest is a God-given way to demonstrate his character as a man with a future precisely because he has confidence in the future.

Because the church has seen so few examples of successful evangelism, and because even the successful examples seem to fall back into paganism within a few centuries, Christians have come to adopt eschatologies that deny liberation for gleaners.⁶³ They see themselves and their spiritual colleagues as people who are locked in a vicious "cycle of impotence," to borrow the language of paganism's modern welfare economics.⁶⁴ They see no hope beyond the stripped field. Life only offers minimal opportunities for harvesting souls, they believe. "What we have today as gleaners is all that we or our heirs can expect in history." They lose faith in the jubilee principle, when the land of their fathers reverts to them. They lose faith in the ability of the heav-

63. Gary North, "Ghetto Eschatologies," Biblical Economics Today, XIV (April/May 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gnghetto>)

64. The so-called "cycle of poverty."

only Observer to identify and hire good workers and to place them in new positions of responsibility. So, Christians have invented eschatologies that conform to their rejection of any vision of temporal liberation: eschatologies of the stripped field. Men with battered spirits preach that nothing Christians can do as spiritual gleaners will ever fill the sacks to overflowing. They see no covenantal cause-and-effect relationship between gleaning and liberation. They preach a new gospel of God's kingdom in history: the kingdom of perpetual leftovers. They do not recognize that there is a purpose for our evangelical gleaning: the public identification of those bondservants who actively seek liberation and who pursue every legitimate avenue of escape from bondage, especially by hard work.

Conclusion

The gleaning law was part of an overall system of political economy. Many of the details of this political economy were tied to the Promised Land and the sacrificial system of that land. The economic laws of Leviticus were more closely attached to the Promised Land and the sacrifices than the laws of Exodus and Deuteronomy were. The Levitical land laws were part of a temporary system of landed familism, tribalism, and localism.

Localism and tribalism were both basic to the application of the gleaning law in Mosaic Israel. The authority of the local land owner to chose who would glean and who would not from among various candidates—the boundary principle of inclusion and exclusion—transferred great responsibility and authority into his hand. This kind of personalized charity is no longer taken seriously by those who legislate politically grounded welfare state policies in the modern world. Such a view of charity transfers too much authority to property owners, in the eyes of the politicians, and not enough to the state and its functionaries. But it is not the principle of localism that changes in the New Testament era; it is only the landed tribalism that changes. When the kingdom of God was transferred to a new nation (Matt. 21:43), meaning the church, the Levitical land laws were abolished.

Gleaning no longer applies in the New Covenant era. The jubilee land law was annulled by Jesus through: (1) His ministry's fulfillment of the law (Luke 4:16–27); (2) the transfer of the kingdom to the church at Pentecost (Matt. 21:43; Acts 2); and (3) the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Can we learn anything from the gleaning law? I think we can, but these lessons are essentially negative. They show us what should not be done, not what must be done, to avoid God's negative sanctions.

The first lesson that we learn from gleaning is positive, however: all charity is based legally on the fundamental principle that God owns the earth. "The earth is the LORD'S, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein" (Ps. 24:1). Primary ownership belongs to God. He can do what He pleases with that which He owns. He lawfully can establish requirements of property management that His legal subordinates must follow. This is the theocentric aspect of all ownership. God delegates to His subordinates the legal and economic responsibility of managing His property in His name. God is the primary owner. All other ownership is secondary and derivative.

All charity involves the transfer of this secondary ownership (the individual's) to a third party. This leads to the second principle of biblical charity. *A third party has no legal civil claim on any asset that he does not own.*⁶⁵ The one exception is restitution: a case in which the recipient has been positively harmed by a previous action of a judicially convicted person. The third party has no comparable legal claim in a civil court if he is asking for aid. The gleaning law is therefore crucially important for what it tells us about what is not involved in charity: a legal claim enforceable in a civil court. The poor person had a claim before God in God's court under the Mosaic Covenant's land management system, assuming that he could demonstrate that he was part of the deserving poor. But it was the land owner who was the lawful enforcer of this claim in history, not the state. This means that the land owner had to obey God apart from civil sanctions. He had to honor God's law. God would hold him accountable in His court.

If the strongest claim that anyone in the Mosaic Covenant had on the property of another was limited to this extent, then it is not biblically legitimate for any society to legislate state-enforced wealth redistribution in the name of charity. *The Mosaic Covenant did not establish state sanctions against those people who refused to show mercy.*⁶⁶

65. In Old Covenant Israel, a second party had the right to pluck grapes and corn from a neighbor's fields, though only what he could carry in his hands (Deut. 23:24–25; Luke 6:1). North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 59; North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 8. This law increased the likelihood of travel and communications, since visitors would not have to return home to eat or carry food with them everywhere. The economic benefit of being located close to a road—cheap transportation of farm commodities—was partially offset by this open access law.

66. The other comparable claim was the poor borrower's access to a non-interest-

God was the poor man's defender, not some state bureaucrat. No modern principle of charity should violate this fundamental principle. Charity should be voluntary, i.e., not subject to civil penalties for non-compliance. It should strengthen the recipient's will to seek a way out of poverty.

Third, charity should not create a permanent dependence on the part of the recipient. Fourth, charity should not subsidize evil. Fifth, it should involve hard work except in cases where the recipient is medically incapacitated. Sixth, it should not provide living standards that are higher than the poorest workers in society are able to earn. Charity should not be a system of positive sanctions that pays people not to work. At best, it should persuade its recipients that work is preferable to charity. Charity should make an escape available.

The fundamental principle learned from the gleaning laws is this: charity in a biblical social order must not be based on the idea that the state is a legitimate institution of salvation. The state is not a biblically legitimate agency of social healing. It is an agency of public vengeance (Rom. 13:1–7). It possesses a lawful monopoly of violence. It therefore cannot be entrusted with the authority to take the wealth of successful people in order to reward the poor. If it is allowed to do this, its agents become the primary beneficiaries of the confiscated wealth. Its political and bureaucratic agents will gain power over both the poor and the economically successful. These agents will become permanent spokesmen for the official beneficiaries of the wealth, namely, the poor. They will have no incentive to get poor people as a class permanently out of poverty. A system of legal entitlements for the poor becomes a system of legal entitlements to full-time jobs for those who administer the system. This is the antithesis of the gleaning system of the Mosaic Covenant. In that system, participants had an economic incentive to get the poor back to work: the land owners, the piece-rate harvesters, and the poor themselves.

bearing loan. As the year of release approached, the prospective lender was warned by God not to harden his heart against his poor brother (Deut. 15:9–10). There is no indication that anyone could be prosecuted in a civil court for his refusal to lend on these terms.

12

VERBAL BONDS AND ECONOMIC COORDINATION

Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another. And ye shall not swear by my name falsely, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD (Lev. 19:11–12).

The theocentric principle supporting this law is the protection of the name of God. This passage of Scripture is clearly an application of the third commandment. The third commandment prohibits the profaning of the name of God.¹ That is, it places a sacred judicial boundary around the name of God, a boundary that must not be transgressed without permission. The name of God is the protected asset. Like a brand name in advertising, the name of God is strictly licensed by its Owner.

A. False Swearing

Men are not to swear falsely by the name of God. Swearing in this case is an illegal imitation of a formal act of oath-taking. This form of the violation—swearing falsely—is an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant model: oath/sanctions.²

Stealing, false dealing, and lying are prohibited. So is swearing falsely by God's name. The latter is worse because it invokes God's name and authority to defend fraud. It compounds the infraction. The passage begins with a judicial boundary that facilitates interpersonal relations: the boundary around private property.

1. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 23.

2. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Nevertheless, the primary focus of this text is the profanation of God's name: a verbal boundary transgression. This places the law under point three of the biblical covenant model, just as the third commandment is under point three.³ Additional evidence is the fact that this passage tells us not to defraud a neighbor or rob him. This is a prohibition against theft. The eighth commandment parallels the third commandment.⁴ They are both aspects of point three of the biblical covenant model. The theocentric basis of this law is the absolute integrity and inviolability of God's name.

This commandment's focus of concern is theft, which includes false dealings. The theocentric reference point of this law is the name of God and the prohibition against profaning that name. A profane act is an act that transgresses a sacred boundary, either judicial or geographical.⁵ Therefore, in the Bible, the laws against theft are part of the general law of God that protects His name and His property from any unauthorized invasion.

This commandment has implications that extend beyond the courtroom. Men are not to lie to each other in order to further their own ends at the expense of others. Even when not under oath, their words are to be reliable; other people will plan their own activities in terms of what is said. For example, a physician is not supposed to tell his patients that they are sick when they are healthy, nor is he to tell them they are healthy when they are not. The same rule applies to economic transactions.

B. Bonds and Promises

"A man's word is his bond." This maxim is a familiar one in Western history. The word "bond" points to a legal transaction. In the Bible, a covenantal bond establishes a formal legal relationship under God. While a promise does not possess the judicial authority of a covenantal bond, since it lacks a lawfully imposed self-maledictory oath, a promise is nevertheless analogous to a covenant bond. It is a verbal contract.

In modern finance, a bond is a promise to pay. A person gives up money in the present in exchange for a specified stream of money in the future, with the return of the principal at a stated date, which will complete the transaction, thus ending the legal relationship.

3. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 23.

4. Ibid., ch. 28.

5. Chapter 6.

Promises are a form of inventory. They serve as substitutes for physically stored assets. Instead of accumulating assets, a producer relies on another person to deliver the goods, literally or figuratively.⁶ A broken promise here is the economic equivalent of an empty storage facility that was thought to be full. Worse; someone had guaranteed that it would be full. The missing good or service creates a kind of falling domino effect: delayed production all down the line. The person who fails to deliver on time produces losses for the person who became dependent on him.

The person who promises to deliver goods or services puts his reputation on the line. The better his reputation, the more business he will generate, other things (such as price) being equal. It pays a person to gain a reputation as one who keeps his word. He tells the truth, and when other people plan their actions in terms of what he says, they are not disappointed. "LORD, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour. In whose eyes a vile person is contemned; but he honoureth them that fear the LORD. He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not" (Ps. 15:1–4). This person lowers the cost of doing business with him. By lowering the price of anything, the seller increases the quantity demanded. This is why a person who keeps his word has increased his market value.⁷

The fraudulent person is like a thief who steals the assets stored in a warehouse, and who then swears that the warehouse is full. He posts a verbal bond. Like a bonded warehouse illegally emptied by its manager, the violation of this verbal bond is regarded by God as theft. The promise-giver owes double restitution to his victim.

In this case, the promise-giver has used God's name in his false bonding. This involves an additional infraction. The bond-giver has invoked God as his personal bonding agent. This is a major violation of God's law. "And ye shall not swear by my name falsely, neither shalt

6. In the 1980s, the advent of inexpensive computers and the spread of overnight air cargo delivery companies made possible the development of "just in time" manufacturing. Manufacturers can time the delivery of raw materials and parts so that they do not have to invest in large inventories. This has made manufacturing far more efficient.

7. The market value is an asset's present price. This price is the asset's expected stream of future income, discounted by the prevailing rate of interest.

thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD” (Lev. 19: 12). By doing this, the false swearer has placed himself under the sanctions of God.

What is said here of individuals is equally true for nations and societies. False swearing invokes God’s negative sanctions. A nation that cannot be trusted to adhere to its public commitments will gain few allies in a crisis unless those who represent the nations around it are equally corrupt and unreliable.

C. The Illegal Transfer of Private Property

What this law prohibits is the illegal transfer of private property. It prohibits a direct transfer in the form of robbery. The law says that we must not steal. There is also an indirect form of theft that is prohibited: fraud. Fraud is false dealing. It involves giving a false report to a buyer. First, fraud means a refusal to abide by one’s previous word to another individual. Second, it means the deliberate camouflaging of one’s word: to appear to say one thing but in fact mean something else. This is done in order to gain legal control of something that is not lawfully one’s own. The other person transfers ownership voluntarily but in confusion. The classic example in the Bible is Satan’s deception of Eve: the promise that she would become as God (Gen. 3:5). Third, false dealing is the outright defrauding of the individual. An example of this form of fraud is simple lying. A person says that he is going to do something, but he never intends to do it, and if all the facts were available, it could be proven that he never intended to do it. The deliberate writing of a check drawn against insufficient funds would be such an act of fraud.⁸ So would posting as collateral for a loan an asset known by the holder to be worth less than what he insists it is worth. So would gaining multiple loans on the basis of one piece of collateral: fractional reserves.⁹

This indirect transfer of wealth can be achieved through false swearing. It is a false form of fraudulent dealing in which God’s name is misused. It would be difficult to get away with such an act in a biblical covenant society because of the prohibition against taking God’s name in vain. In a society in which the third commandment is not enforced, it is much easier for an individual to swear falsely in God’s

8. In most states in the United States, this act constitutes a felony.

9. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 49:J; North, Honest Money: The Biblical Blueprint for Money and Banking (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press; Nashville: Thomas Nelson Sons, 1986), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnmoney>)

name. The obvious case in modern society in which this is done would be in a court of law. The person taking the false oath might be swearing in God's name in a formal sense, but his intention is to lie and to use that lie to gain an economic or other advantage from the victim. False swearing is mentioned in this passage, and therefore false swearing is considered to be an act of theft. It is first and foremost the public misappropriation of the name of God. This is an attempt by an individual to transfer the authority of God to himself for his own illicit purposes. He swears by the name of God in order to impress his listeners. This act can also be a formal oath that is taken in front of a court, which will accomplish the same thing.

D. The Problem of Economic Coordination

The economic issue that must be explained is the problem of the coordination of individual plans. How is this best accomplished: By state compulsion or market coordination? It is clear from both the eighth commandment and the tenth commandment that private property must be honored. Men must neither steal nor covet their neighbor's property. This means that biblical economics rests on the ideal of the legitimacy of private property. "Christian socialism" is an oxymoron.

In a market economy, individuals make plans about the future, and then they act in terms of these plans. They buy or sell or hold in terms of their individual plans. The question then is: How are the millions of individual decisions integrated with each other so that men can participate together in the division of labor? This is the problem of the revision of economic plans. How do people change their plans and expectations in response to the decisions of other individuals? This is the problem of feedback: information coupled with sanctions. In what form does information come to an individual that other participants in the market approve or disapprove of what he is doing or not doing? This is the problem of economic sanctions.¹⁰

1. Promise and Dependence

The importance of the division of labor has been emphasized in modern economics ever since Adam Smith wrote his famous first chapter on the production of pins.¹¹ A highly skilled individual craftsman cannot produce a great number of pins in one day, Smith observed. On the other hand, a small group of relatively unskilled workers can produce thousands of pins if they are given the proper capital equipment. He pointed to the division of labor as the explanation—a fundamental biblical concept (Rom. 12; I Cor. 12).¹² The division of labor allows the increase of output per unit of scarce resource input. Cooperation produces greater wealth than economic autarky can. It is the division of labor which enables us to pool our talents in order to gain much greater output together than we could possibly have achieved as individuals acting in isolation. Because increased cooperation increases individual productivity, it also increases per capita wealth. This increase—a positive sanction—is the incentive for men to cooperate economically with each other. It is a very important aspect of the preservation of society. It allows the pooling of individual talents, and it allows the pooling of capital. This capital can be of three kinds: economic, intellectual, and moral.

10. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

Cooperation requires a degree of predictability. First, it requires the predictability of timing. Let us consider a business that manufactures a particular product. To do so, it requires resource inputs. Because people's knowledge of markets is limited, and because it is expensive to go out and buy exactly what you want exactly when you want it, businesses carry inventories of raw materials and spare parts. These inventories compensate for men's imperfect knowledge of the future. An inventory of raw materials and spare parts enables the business to expand production without a great deal of warning. An inventory of finished products enables the business to meet the demand without increasing the price of the product. It allows the business to continue operating if there is an interruption of the delivery of materials. In other words, inventories create a production system in which there are fewer bottlenecks. Bottlenecks create "ripple effects," both in the company and in some cases in the economy as a whole. Inventories smooth production. But they must be paid for. They must be "carried." They tie up resources.

Second, the producer seeks predictability in the pricing of his resource inputs as a means of gaining predictability of production. If an individual agrees to sell you an item, and you then make plans in terms of the price of that item, you have become dependent on him. Similarly, you have agreed to pay him a money price at a particular time. He has therefore become dependent on you. The free market economy produces a system of independence legally (individualism) and mutual dependence economically (coordination of plans). We are legally free to make our voluntary decisions; therefore, we are judicially independent. At the same time, because of these voluntary agreements, we become mutually interdependent in our economic activities. This is why pricing is so important. It enables us to make decisions rationally in terms of existing conditions of supply and demand.

11. Adam Smith, The Wealth of Nations (1776).

12. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 9; North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

Third, predictability of quality is also important. This one is more difficult to police. What level of quality is good enough at a particular price? This is difficult for the buyer or the seller to specify in a written contract. We seek ways of gaining this information inexpensively, both as buyers and sellers. The existence of brand names is important in lowering the costs of people's estimates of quality. Pricing also plays an important role. We are used to the idea that an item which costs five times more than another item is probably of higher quality. We believe that the product will not break readily, and therefore our time won't have to be spent taking the thing in to be repaired. Brand names enable us to make better predictions about the performance of both services and goods.

This is an aspect of the third point of the biblical covenant. God protects His name from profanation. In a similar way, we protect our own names from misuse. We have a property right to our names: other people are not allowed to use our names to promote their ends without our agreement. This is why the existence of brand names and the legal right to property established in a brand name are so important in a society, in order to reduce the uncertainty of the future. People can make decisions based on price and name with respect to the quality of the good or the service.

2. Contracts

Contracts are a crucial part of this system of economic interdependence. God's goal is greater cooperation among men and a reduction of coercion in economic affairs: peaceful exchange. Peace on earth is a biblical goal. Contracts enable people to specify their own performance more precisely. At least when all parties understand the terms of the contract, contracts reduce the cost of cooperation, and hence increase the quantity of cooperation demanded.

There are always inherent limitations on contracts. One limitation is the difficulty of specifying the conditions of performance. This is why, as societies become more complex, contracts tend to grow longer and in ever-smaller print. Lawyers are the ones today who speak to each other about the nature of the conditions; the actual participants in the contract are rarely able to understand. This has created a new priesthood of lawyers. They speak to each other, and their supposed employers—clients—have to accept on faith what it is that they have just signed.

Language has limitations. Every possible condition cannot be included in a contract; hence, mutual trust is mandatory. This trust can be abused by one party. So can the contract's language. God serves as the final arbitrator in all contracts. He knows each person's intentions.

Another limit on contracts is the existence of clogged civil courts. A contract may specify exactly what the other individual is supposed to do, but if you cannot get that person into court, the contract does you very little good. This is why mutual trust is important. Nevertheless, people who trust each other should still write contracts in order to settle differences later. Even if the two parties presently agreeing to act together do not get involved in a dispute, their heirs may later get involved in a dispute. Still, we cannot expect contractualism to substitute for trust and moral responsibility. We should not expect words apart from intentions to protect us in all situations. We should not trust the letter of the law to protect us from evil intentions and the skilled misuse of language.

3. Mutual Trust

The society in which mutual trust is increasing is more likely to be a productive society. Men seek others who will deal honestly with them.¹³ The cost of policing contracts is reduced as mutual trust increases. This is a form of self-government instead of civil government which becomes dominant. We have appeals courts in a society: both church and state. Less pressure is placed on these courts when mutual trust is increasing. This enables a society to achieve its goals with less expenditure than a society in which there is very little mutual trust.

13. "And it came to pass at that time, that Abimelech and Phichol the chief captain of his host spake unto Abraham, saying, God is with thee in all that thou doest: Now therefore swear unto me here by God that thou wilt not deal falsely with me, nor with my son, nor with my son's son: but according to the kindness that I have done unto thee, thou shalt do unto me, and to the land wherein thou hast sojourned" (Gen. 21:22–23).

There is another aspect of mutual trust that is important: historical experience. When, over a period of time, we have gained the trust of another person, this becomes an asset to us and to him. He has created a mutually beneficial asset. As the record of the participants' past performance becomes available, it makes it less expensive for other individuals to enter into agreements with these individuals.¹⁴ Therefore, a society which has a good record of performance has increased other societies' trust in doing business with it. This is an important aspect of increasing the international division of labor.

E. Trinitarian Social Theory

From an economic standpoint, the problem of the coordination of the economy is an aspect of the more general problem known as the one and the many.¹⁵ Let us first consider the theological origins of this philosophical and organizational problem. The doctrine of the Trinity tells us that there are three persons in the Godhead, yet there is only one God. Theologically, there are two concepts of the Trinity, both of which are true. The first is the doctrine of the ontological Trinity. This doctrine states that there is an equality of being and glory among all the persons of the Trinity. An implication of this is that there is an equality of knowledge, meaning that each of the persons of the Trinity has exhaustive knowledge of the other two, as well as of the universe.

There is also the doctrine of the economical Trinity. This doctrine deals with the relationships established among the three persons of the Trinity. The relationship of God the Father to God the Son is clearly hierarchical. "And he said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" (Luke 2:49). Nevertheless, "I and my Father are one" (John 10:30). Both statements are true. The first relates to the economical Trinity; the second to the ontological Trinity. Each person of the Trinity has separate functions in relationship to each other and to the creation. There is voluntary coordination of the activities of three persons of the Trinity in order to produce any effect in history. This is why we speak of one God and three persons. So perfect is the coordination process among the three persons of the Trinity that the actions of God are the actions of a single being. With this theological context in mind, let us consider two applications of the doctrine of the Trinity: social theory and economic theory.

14. A word that increases advertising response is "proven."

15. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007). (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

There are three (and only three) types of social theory: collectivism, individualism, and covenantalism.¹⁶ These parallel the three types of philosophy: realism, nominalism, and biblical creationism. Trinitarianism proclaims the equal ultimacy of the one and the many. This is not true of either individualism or collectivism.

Individualism. Corresponding to the idea of God as three equal persons rather than as one being is a society based on philosophical individualism. Individualism emphasizes the plans and decisions—economic and political—of responsible moral agents. What individuals do and think in relationship to each other is the starting point of all individualistic or atomistic social thought. The key social idea of individualism is the concept of atomism. The individual is the irreducible social unit. Society is said to have no existence apart from the social atoms that compose it. The social whole cannot be of greater consequence than the sum of its parts. Society is seen as the result of human action but not of human design (Adam Ferguson).¹⁷ The key political doctrine of individualism is the right of voluntary contract, both constitutional and economic. The participating many are sovereign, not the social one.

Collectivism. In contrast to individualism is collectivism. It is an extension of the idea of a purely monotheistic God. Collectivism asserts that the social whole is primary, not the individuals who compose it. The collective entity and its organizational needs are viewed as if the collective entity were a single being, a being represented judicially by specific agents. The key social idea of collectivism is that the social whole is of greater consequence than the sum of its parts. The key political doctrine of collectivism is the subordination of voluntary contracts to the decision of political representatives. The social one is sov-

16. On the three kinds of social theory, see Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), pp. 34–37. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

17. F. A. Hayek, “The Results of Human Action but not of Human Design” (1967), reprinted in Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics, and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), ch. 6.

ereign, not the participating many.¹⁸

Covenantalism. In contrast to both individualism and collectivism is covenantalism. Covenantalism sees society as a collection of individual judicial agents. They have judicial relationships under God. These relationships establish the corporate nature of society. Individualism emphasizes contracts. Collectivism emphasizes organic or biological unity. Covenantalism emphasizes judicial covenants that are established among individuals publicly under God. The difference between covenantalism and its rivals is its emphasis on the Triune God as the initiator of the covenant. It is God who is sovereign, not the individual and not the collective society. God is the ultimate resolution of the one and the many, and therefore society can accurately reflect this resolution only when it is obedient to God and formally covenanted under God.

F. Trinitarian Economic Theory

The problem of the one and the many also manifests itself in economic theory. As in the case of social theory, there are three types of economic theory: individualist, collectivist, and covenantal. The theoretical issues are similar: explaining how the economic decisions of individuals are coordinated with each other. How are economic plans devised and revised?

Individualism. The individual decisions facing men are seen as the foundation of economic theory. This is called microeconomics. The microeconomist begins with the decisions of the individual in a world bounded by economic limits: scarcity. The individual seeks his own benefits. In his economic interaction with others, his motivation is self-interest. He wishes to achieve his ends with a minimal forfeiture of scarce economic resources. He wants to buy low and sell high.

The emphasis of individualistic economic analysis is on the productivity made possible by means of the voluntary agreement or contract. The division of labor increases the wealth of the participants if they are allowed to “truck and barter” with each other. There is no “social welfare” in such a view; there is only the welfare of each individual. Economic individualism’s most consistent school of thought is the Austrian school, whose principles were first articulated by Carl Menger in 1871.¹⁹ The Austrian School’s most comprehensive theorist was Ludwig von Mises (1881–1973). Its most famous modern defender was Mises’ disciple, F. A. Hayek (1899–1992).²⁰

18. This strict monotheism is the reason why Unitarianism has become politically statist. Thomas Jefferson and John Adams did not follow the logic of their unitarian theology. The political and intellectual influence of Trinitarianism was still too great in their day. This influence began to wane after 1825. Unitarianism proclaims an undifferentiated God who is represented by men who are not totally depraved by nature. It is the religion of humanity. R. J. Rushdoony, The Nature of the American System (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1965] 2001), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/rjrns>)

Collectivism. In contrast to microeconomic theory is macroeconomic theory. This approach to economic theory argues that the overall operation of the aggregate economy is primary, not the decisions of individuals or firms. These macroeconomic processes have a life of their own beyond the individual decisions of acting men. Not only is the market a force separate from the individuals whose voluntary decisions shape it, the state is a force separate from individuals who provide the state with its legal sovereignty. Both the market and the state are viewed as forces with lives and laws of their own. Scientifically trained state bureaucrats are regarded as competent to give indirect orders to producers by means of monopolistic fiscal and monetary policies. Economic coordination is understood as a top-down process based on coercion: taxation, monetary manipulation, debt (fiscal policy), and regulation.

Covenantalism. This view of economics rests on a concept of God’s absolute sovereignty over creation. It begins with the doctrine of the Trinity and the doctrine of creation. God has established a system of subordinate authority for individuals and institutions. Three institutions are established by covenantal oath, meaning a verbal bond invoking God’s negative sanctions: church, family, and state. The individual and the family are seen as the agents of production. Both church and state must be supported by a small portion of the net productivity of profit-seeking individuals, families, and derivative associations: partnerships, corporations, etc. This places primary earthly authority into the hands of individuals, not institutions. Because of the doctrine of the final judgment, the individual is regarded as the locus of primary earthly authority. Because of the doctrine of God’s absolute sovereignty—omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence—the results of 19. Carl Menger, Principles of Economics (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1871] 2007). (<http://bit.ly/Menger>).

20. Gerald P. O’Driscoll, Jr., Economics As a Coordination Problem: The Contributions of Friedrich A. Hayek (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed & Ward, 1977), reprinted by the Liberty Fund. (<http://bit.ly/Odriscoll>). Cf. Eamonn Butler, Hayek: His Contribution to the Political and Economic Thought of Our Time (London: Temple Smith, 1983); John Gray, Hayek on Liberty (London: Basil Blackwell, 1984).

men's decisions are understood as being under the control of God and subject to his predictable covenantal sanctions in history.

G. Economic Coordination: State or Market?

The fundamental question for humanist economists is this: Which of these two institutions possesses primary sovereignty in the process of economic coordination, the state or the free market?

The microeconomist identifies the free market as the sovereign agency possessing the final say over what gets produced and sold. His faith is in the self-interested individual, who knows his own desires and productive capacities better than any outside observer or enforcer can. Microeconomic analysis lodges responsibility with the individual because he has better knowledge of local (individual) conditions. The profit-seeking entrepreneur is best able to match supply and demand. The impersonal free market is seen as the only morally and politically neutral coordinator, and therefore the only institution worth trusting in man's war to overcome the boundaries imposed by scarcity. The "invisible hand" of the market²¹ is not attached to any self-interested individual. The market is autonomous and therefore far more trustworthy than the state, a monopoly always dominated by special interests.

The macroeconomist insists that the state is the final court of economic appeal. Only if endowed with civil power can an elite planning corps gain access to coercively extracted information: statistics. Only through the use of statistics can central economic planners even pretend to see "the big picture." But given the repeated failure of socialist and Keynesian systems to "deliver the goods"—to match supply with demand—this faith in the state is based on a religious faith that is far more than pragmatism. The collectivist's faith rests on a humanistic version of cosmic personalism, with man—elitist, scientific man—as the sovereign agent. The macroeconomist's commitment to a concept of collective representation that is personal rather than impersonal.²²

The macroeconomist's concept of sovereignty is ultimately judicial rather than pragmatic. The voters have voted for the state's representatives, and therefore these representatives supposedly possess greater legal authority than anyone in the free market. These political representatives can then hire scientific economists who somehow can see “the whole picture,” as well as respond to it, apart from self-interest. The free market can often fail as a system, the collectivist says, despite the desires and plans of acting individuals. The state must rectify these failures. In short, the market process is seen as unable to harmonize the conflicting plans of acting men. The market’s process of coordination is imperfect, according to the macroeconomist. The underlying premise of the macroeconomist is that the state—i.e., politicians and tenured bureaucrats—must intervene to take coercive actions that will offset the evils and inefficiencies of contractualism. Without state intervention, the collectivist assures us, the free market economy will eventually collapse. Marxism and socialism emphasize macroeconomics. So does Keynesianism.

21. Smith, Wealth of Nations, p. 423.

22. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A: "From Cosmic Personalism to Humanistic Sovereignty."

What the macroeconomist says is that officials of the state can see “the big picture” better than individual market participants can. These state officials supposedly represent the true needs of the political majority better than the market does. These representatives are supposedly capable of rising above their own self-interest. They are also capable of designing and implementing positive and negative sanctions that can motivate producers to meet the true needs of a majority of the population—“true needs” being defined by the politicians and the bureaucrats. There is little awareness of the self-interest of the state’s employees in pursuing their goals through the application of state power.²³

H. Economic Coordination: Covenantal

The individualist says that the best economy is the result of human action but not of human design. The collectivist says that any economy that is the exclusive result of human action but not of human design is an imperfect economy. It needs the coercive power of the state to right wrongs, correct imbalances, and achieve high employment and sustained economic growth without inflation.

The covenantalist insists that the economy is the result of God’s absolute sovereignty through delegated authority. The economy is designed by God. When the human actions of large numbers of the members of society conform to His law, the general economic results will be good, conforming to God's promises (Lev. 26:4–5, 9–10). When men's actions are rebellious, the economic results will be bad (Lev. 25:20, 22, 26). The collective results are determined by God's responses to widespread covenantal faithfulness or rebellion.

23. On personal self-interest in the decisions of politicians and bureaucrats, see the literature produced by the “public choice” school of economists, most notably James Buchanan and Gordon Tullock (who is not a degree-holding economist). Buchanan and Tullock, The Calculus of Consent (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1962); Buchanan, The Limits of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975). Buchanan won the Nobel Prize in economics in 1986; Tullock, never having taken a course in economics, did not.

This means that there is an all-seeing, omnipotent agent who oversees the “big picture.” He does not require or even permit men to usurp His role as overseer. He delegates to individuals the responsibility of planning for the future. He delegates to individuals the authority to bring evil-doers to the attention of civil magistrates. He relies on the individual's self-interest in both cases: the entrepreneur's quest for profit²⁴ and the victim's quest for restitution.²⁵

This system rests on the concept of the honest word: the producer's promise to buy, the seller's promise to sell, and the oath-bound witness' promise to tell the truth to the court. It also rests on the idea of God's predictable corporate sanctions in history: economic, military, and biological-medical.²⁶ God takes care of the “big picture”; He delegates to individuals and voluntary associations the responsibility of administering the “local picture.” This is the biblical doctrine of responsible (hierarchical) stewardship, which is always accompanied by the covenantal doctrines of law, judgment, and inheritance. This worldview is utterly foreign to the economists, whether individualistic or collectivist. It is far too cosmically personal for them.

I. Economic Representation

This debate is inescapably a debate over the nature of legitimate representation. The humanistic microeconomist says that the market process is generally the most reliable representative of the people—an impersonal force that is the product of millions of individual economic decisions. The Keynesian macroeconomist says that the state is needed to complement the market by offsetting the market process in selected

24. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>); Israel M. Kirzner, Competition and Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973).

25. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 33. See also Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>) cases. The state is supposedly a personal, caring force that protects the weak while simultaneously increasing the wealth of the vast majority of people.²⁷ Both systems recognize the inescapability of economic representation.

26. In Old Covenant Israel, there was another sanctioning agency: the land itself, i.e., the environment. See Chapter 10.

So does covenantal economics. The representative of the people is God Himself: Jesus Christ, the Incarnate God. This cosmic agent of both God and man has announced His laws in the Bible. He has also designated earthly representatives of His three covenantal law courts: church, family, and state. The covenantal alternative to both individualism and collectivism is a system of economics that begins with the stipulations of biblical law. There was no covenantal “school of economic thought” in the twentieth century. The triumph of secular humanism in economics is total. It has been ever since the seventeenth century. In fact, the very origins of the modern science of economics was grounded in a self-conscious attempt to replace all theological and even moral opinion by the categories of neutral reason.²⁸ Covenantal economics asserts the existence of an original natural harmony of economic interests, but only in the garden of Eden. Since the fall of man, there has not been a harmony of interests. There can be no permanent harmony of interests between covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers. There can, however, be temporary cooperation in history based on mutual self-interest. The tares are not uprooted in history; neither is the wheat (Matt. 13:18–23, 36–43).²⁹ Their cooperation is based either on the willingness of the wheat to abide by the stipulations that are established by the tares or on the willingness of the tares to abide by the stipulations established by the wheat: biblical law. It cannot be based on neutral civil law, since there is no neutral law. There is no neutrality. There is only covenant-breaking and covenant-keeping.

Conclusion

The prohibition against theft and false dealing is here linked to the prohibition against profaning God’s name. This points to the parallel

27. This assertion regarding socialism is no longer taken seriously except by college professors in the West. The Keynesian version—meaning its rhetoric of state aid and legitimate representation—is still believed by a majority of voters.

28. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1963).

29. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

between the eighth commandment against theft and the third commandment against taking God's name in vain. The issue in the third commandment is misusing God's name in a formal oath. The issue here is lying. Swearing by God's holy name is prohibited; therefore, so is false dealing and lying.

Men must not deal falsely with each other. In economics, such a law increases the possibilities for cooperation. The division of labor and the specialization of production make possible greater output per unit of resource input. Honest dealing enables men to increase their productivity and their wealth.

"A man's word is his bond." This phrase points to the covenantal grounding of society: a legal bond between God and man, and among God and men, based on a self-maledictory oath. A contract is analogous to a covenant. Men may not use God's name in vain, so they may not swear by God in a contract. But there is an element of self-malediction: the contracting parties agree to submit themselves to an arbitrator or a civil magistrate when signing the contract.

Because of promises, men can cooperate with each other over time. The future becomes less uncertain because of the existence of promises. Thus, if we wish to overcome the economic uncertainties of life, we can enter into agreements with others. But each party to the agreement must deal honestly with the others; otherwise, men's plans regarding the future are undermined by the non-performance of others. The coordination of men's plans then becomes disrupted.

The West has generally been faithful to this law. The result has been the proliferation of contracts, culminating in the highly organized securities markets. These markets have led to a vast increase of wealth in the West. Men have been able to pool their assets, making possible the capitalization of present goods. Capitalization involves placing a present price on an expected future stream of income. If all men were liars all of the time, such capital formation would be impossible.

Because God has delegated authority and responsibility to men, they can cooperate. His system of hierarchical authority is a bottom-up system: men are free to do anything not specifically prohibited. Court systems settle disputes between individuals. This is the structural foundation of a free market economy: local responsibility, voluntary cooperation, and hierarchical judgments after the fact. This is the opposite of bureaucracy: a top-down system of controls in which a central planning agency announces goals and standards, modifies them repeatedly, and then evaluates the performance of subordinates in terms of the previous announcements. If all men were liars most of the time, bureaucracy is the system mankind would be stuck with. It is Satan's system, for he deals with liars. Therefore, when society is marked by widespread lying and fraud, it will either move toward autarky or toward bureaucratic centralization. Productivity suffers.

13

PROTECTING THE WEAKEST PARTY

Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning. Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumblingblock before the blind, but shalt fear thy God: I am the LORD (Lev. 19:13–14).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is two-fold. First, God pays us what He has agreed to pay us, and He pays us on time; therefore, so should His people. Second, God protects those who cannot protect themselves; therefore, so should His people. This has to do with sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

This is a single law, yet it has two parts. The two parts condemn three crimes: fraud, robbery, and the withholding of wages. The two parts are judicially and economically linked. The links between them are two-fold: (1) God's desire to protect the weakest members of society; (2) God's establishment of rules to overcome the inherent limits on men's knowledge, especially limits on judges' knowledge.

This raises an important judicial question. If we are to defend the deaf and the blind because they cannot defend themselves, isn't this a violation of the fundamental judicial principle of Leviticus 19:15, namely, that God does not respect persons? On the contrary, this case law affirms that the deaf and the blind are entitled to the same protection from cursing and tripping that anyone is. But because they cannot bring a lawsuit on their own behalf, a righteous person must do it for them. This upholds the universal authority of God's law.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Part 1: Withholding Wages

The previous section of Leviticus 19 deals with theft through fraud: the deliberately deceptive use of words (vv. 11–12).² The first half of verse 13 repeats this warning. The second half adds another form of fraudulent wealth transfer: the withholding of a worker's wages overnight. This act is specified as fraud, and it is also specified as robbery. The question is: Why? If the worker agrees in advance to wait longer than a day for his pay, why should the law of God prohibit the arrangement? Or does it?

It is always helpful in understanding a case law if we can first identify the theocentric principle that undergirds it. Verse 13 deals with paying a debt. The employer-employee relationship reflects God's relationship to man. God provides us with an arena: life and capital. Similarly, the employer supplies an employee with capital that makes the employee more productive. Man is dependent on God. Similarly, the laborer has worked for a full day; the employer is required to pay to him at the end of the work day. The context is clear: rapid payment for services received. God employs us as His stewards. He gives us the tools that we need to serve Him and thereby serve ourselves. He always pays us on time. So should the employer.

The employer who withholds wages from his employees is making a symbolic statement about God's relationship to man: God supposedly delays paying man what is rightfully owed to him. This symbolism is incorrect. It testifies falsely about God's character. This case law makes it plain that the employer owes payment before the sun goes down, a reference back to the creation: the division of day and night (Gen. 1:3–5; cf. Matt. 20:8).

God delays settling all accounts with mankind until the end of man's week in history, the final Day of the Lord.³ Man is definitively in debt to God, for God did not slay Adam on the day of transgression. Man is progressively in debt to God, for God has given to man far more than man has given God.

God's refusal to settle accounts with men in this life is testimony of His grace to each man—an undeserved extension of credit—and also of a final judgment to come. Man is finally in debt to God. God graciously gives gifts to all men until the day of judgment: common grace to all and special grace to His elect.⁴ So, by implication, it is legitimate for an employer to pay his workers in advance, for this testifies to the true debt relationship of man to God. Man, the employee, owes much to God, the employer, who has advanced wages to man so that man may work out his salvation or damnation in fear and trembling. This grace on God's part places mankind increasingly in God's debt—a debt that is growing ever larger as time extends and God's common grace compounds. If men do not repent, there will be hell to pay, i.e., there will be God to pay in the ultimate debtor's prison (Matt. 18:34).⁵

2. Chapter 12.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five press, [1982] 2012), ch. 6.

A. A Position of Weakness

The wage earner in verse 13 is in a position of comparative weakness. He is assumed by God to be in a weaker economic position than the individual who is paying his wages. This employer-employee relationship reflects God's supremacy as the sovereign employer and man's subordination as a dependent employee.

If the wage earner is not paid immediately, then he is being asked by the employer to extend credit to the employer. The employer gains a benefit—the value of the labor services performed—without having to pay for this benefit at the end of the work day. The Bible allows this extension of such credit during daylight hours, but not overnight⁶ This law teaches that the weaker party should not be forced as part of his terms of employment to extend credit to the stronger party. God acknowledges that there are differences in bargaining power and bargaining skills, and He intervenes here to protect the weaker party. This is one of the rare cases in Scripture where God does prohibit a voluntary economic contract.

What if the worker says that he is willing to wait for his pay if he is given an extra payment at the end of the period to compensate him for the time value of his money (i.e., interest)? This would be an unusual transaction. The extra money earned from two weeks of interest would be minimal in comparison to the amount of the wage. In any case, to abide by the terms of this law, such a voluntary agreement would have to be a legal transaction publicly separate from wage earning as such.

4. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

5. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 37.

6. By implication, the night laborer is under the same protection: he must be paid before the sun rises. The idea is that he must be paid by the end of the work day.

There would have to be a public record of its conditions. It would constitute an investment by the worker. But the worker would have to pay his tithe and taxes on this money before he could legally lend it to the employer. There is no biblical law that prohibits a poor man from earning interest on his money. Usury is defined as the taking of interest from a poor man who has requested a zero-interest charitable loan.⁷ Usury is not the same as an interest-paying loan to a rich man from a poor man who wants to make some extra money.

The law here specifies that an employer who hires an individual to work for a period of time has to have the money available to pay that individual on a daily basis at the end of each work day. This is the employer's standard requirement. There would be no confusion about this in a Christian covenanted society. There is no doubt that in the modern world, such an arrangement is not economically efficient. Checks must be written, checks must be delivered to individuals, account books must be kept, and so forth. If this had to be done daily, it would add to the expense of running a firm.⁸ The larger the firm, the more difficult such an arrangement would be. Nevertheless, the employer is required by God to abide by this law. The question is: Can he lawfully substitute a more convenient payment scheme and still meet the requirements of this law?

B. Debt and Credit: Inescapable Concepts

If the employer decides that it is too much trouble to pay each worker at the end of each work day, he must advance the funds for the period of employment prior to the next payday. Thus, if the average period of employment between paydays is two weeks, the employer must bear the risk of paying an individual for work not yet received. The employer must extend credit to the worker. This is another way of saying that the worker must assume a debt obligation: two weeks of agreed-upon labor services.

Payments for a stream of continuous services cannot be simultan-

7. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012) Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 49.

8. In the final stages of the German inflation in 1923, workers were sometimes paid cash in the morning. Wives would accompany them to work, take the cash, and rush to spend it on anything tangible before it depreciated during the day. This inflation devastated workers and employers alike. On the daily payment of wages in the second half of 1923, see Adam Fergusson, When Money Dies: The Nightmare of the Weimar Collapse (London: William Kimber, 1975), pp. 149, 191. (<http://bit.ly/WhenMoneyDies>) eous, although this limitation will change when the use of electronic cash becomes widespread.⁹ Therefore, one of the two parties in this transaction must go into debt in this system, while the other must extend credit. There is no escape from debt and credit without the technology of continuous payments. What this law authorizes is an extension of credit by the worker to the employer for a maximum of one work day. At the end of the work day, the account must be settled; credit is no longer extended by the worker, so he receives his day's wage.

What if the transaction is different? What if the worker is paid in advance for a week or two of labor? He then necessarily becomes a debtor to the employer. He is required to deliver the work that he has been paid to perform. This places the worker in a debt position, but it is not a long-term debt. It is not considered a form of slavery, but there is no doubt that the worker has voluntarily accepted payment in advance, and this creates an obligation on his part. This debt position is limited, however. The law's presumption is that the employer is not going to pay a person in advance for months of work except in very rare circumstances.¹⁰

It is clear that debt and credit are inevitable in an economy that is based on the division of labor. One party must extend credit to the other for some period of time. The other party therefore must become a debtor. The period of the debt in a labor contract may be brief, but it does exist. The inescapable questions are: (1) who will be the creditor, (2) who will be the debtor, and (3) for how long a period of time? The idea of a debt-free economy is utterly utopian. It is not economically possible to establish such an economy unless payments are simultaneous, moment by moment.¹¹ Such a payment system is too expensive

9. It is technically possible to deposit money electronically into a worker's account on a moment-by-moment basis, just as it is possible for him to spend it on the same basis, but the cost of doing so is too high to make it feasible. This cost constraint will probably change in the near future as computer technology and the cost of using computer networks both decrease. Kevin Kelly, "Cypherpunks, E-money, and the Techniques of Disconnection," Whole Earth Review (Summer 1993).

10. One of these circumstances is found in the book publishing industry. An individual is sometimes paid in advance to write a book manuscript. This is one of the highest-risk transactions in the business world. The best way to keep an author from finishing a manuscript is to pay him in advance. As a publisher, I learned this lesson after much experience.

11. I am reminded of the scene in the film America, America, where the suspicious Greek buys passage on a ship to the United States. He holds out his money to the ticket salesman behind the counter, but he refuses to release his grip until the salesman places the ticket in his other hand. They let go simultaneously.

for any organization to establish today. It would destroy the labor market if it were required by law.

The Bible teaches that we are not to become indebted to others: “Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law” (Rom. 13:8).¹² This must not be interpreted in an absolutist fashion. We know this because every person is in debt to God, and also to the perfect man, Jesus Christ, as a result of Christ’s atoning work at Calvary.¹³ This rule of debt-free living should be interpreted in a non-utopian sense. It means that we are to avoid debt contracts that threaten our continuing legal status as free men. It does not mean that we are to become hermits who separate ourselves from a division-of-labor economy. (It surely does not mean that we are required to become household slaves.)¹⁴ Free men in Mosaic Israel were those who had not been sold into slavery to repay a debt. Free men had an inheritance in the land. This means that large debts today should be collateralized, e.g., a mortgage. A man can lose his home if he defaults on the mortgage, but he does not lose his freedom. The creditor reclaims the collateral rather than placing the debtor in bondage or selling him into bondage.

The restraining factor against the extension of too much credit by the stronger party is the employer’s fear that the worker will either quit before his term of service ends or else not produce competent work. It is too expensive for the employer to sue the average worker for damages; court expenses plus his own time in court exceed the money owed.¹⁵ The economic judgment of the employer is the re-

12. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 12.

13. This debt always involves common grace; sometimes it also involves special grace. North, Dominion and Common Grace, op. cit.

14. A Christian perfectionist, as a result of reading tracts against fractional reserve banking, once offered me the opportunity to hire him as a permanent indentured servant if I would agree to feed, clothe, and house him on a zero-cash basis. He recognized that Federal Reserve Notes and checking accounts are both money and debt instruments, and he wanted to be totally separated from any contact with either cash or checks. He felt too guilty to continue as a free man. He was willing to become a household slave to someone who was not equally concerned morally about using Federal Reserve Notes or checking accounts, and who would pay him in kind (i.e., goods). In short, he was willing to subordinate himself for life to someone whom he perceived as not being equally moral, so that he himself could live in technical moral purity. He wanted a protective boundary around him, and he was willing to give up his freedom to attain this. But this brought him into conflict with Paul’s injunction to indentured servants to take freedom whenever it is offered (I Cor. 7:21).

15. God does sue workers who default on His advance payments. Some are sued in straining factor. He suspects that he will not be repaid if he extends too much credit. Nevertheless, there is no biblical law that says that the employer must not extend credit in the form of wages paid in advance. He has to make the decision whether it is worth the risk to do this, given the organizational difficulties of making payments at the end of every work day.

What this text does specify is that the worker must not be asked to work for a week or two in order to receive his wage. There is always a risk of default on the part of the debtor, whether he is the employer or the worker. This law specifies that the risk of default for this form of debt beyond one work day must be born by the employer, not by the worker.

The employer must not become a thief by withholding anyone's wages. By forcing the employer to make restitution to his employed workers who had seen their wages withheld, the law reduces the amount of oppression of those unseen by the judges: future workers who are too weak even to compete for the delayed-payment job.

C. Worker vs. Worker

There are some workers who might be willing to work for a period longer than a day before receiving their pay. In a modern capitalist economy, this procedure is accepted by all concerned, since it is the policy of most employers to offer severance pay to dismissed workers.¹⁶ The worker who plans to quit usually informs his employer of the fact that he will soon be leaving. The employer knows that the worker may become somewhat distracted in the final days of employment. The employer may decide to allow the worker to take his paid vacation at the end of his term of employment. So, the modern worker is paid by the employer for services not rendered when he leaves the job, not at the beginning of the term of employment. At the beginning of the contractual relationship, the modern worker renders services to the employer for which he is not paid at the end of the work day. This practice is what the Bible prohibits.

history; all are sued on the day of judgment. Court costs are irrelevant to God.

16. There are also state-run compulsory programs of workers' compensation; any worker who is fired can receive payments from the state. Employers are required to pay taxes into these insurance funds. This is a morally corrupt system that penalizes employers who want to fire inefficient workers in order to improve customer service and/or increase profits that can be used to reward its investors. It also subsidizes unemployed workers to stay out of work until the benefits run out.

In a poor nation, which the whole world was until the nineteenth century, an offer to accept delayed payment would have given these capital-owning workers a competitive advantage over destitute workers who needed payment immediately. This law establishes that competition among workers must not involve the employer's acceptance of such an offer by any worker. The biblical standard of payment is specified: payment at the end of the day. There may be payment in advance but not delayed payment, unless there is an interest-paying savings plan involved, as mentioned earlier.

Where this law is enforced, destitute workers in the community are not replaced in the labor force by less destitute workers who can afford to forego immediate payment. All workers are to be allowed to compete for jobs, irrespective of any worker's possession of reserves sufficient to tide him over until the next payday. So, one idea behind this law is to make job opportunities available to the destitute workers in the community. Everyone who is physically able to work is to be allowed to compete for a job on a basis independent of his asset reserves. The destitute man's poverty is not to become the basis of his exclusion from the labor market. His competitors are not allowed to use their ability to extend credit to an employer as a way to offset his only assets: his willingness and ability to work.

It should be clear that this law is far more applicable to a poor society than to a modern capitalist one. Very few people in a modern capitalist society are so poor that they cannot wait for a paycheck in two weeks. But the principle should still be honored. It is unfair for an employer to force workers to extend him credit as the price of getting that first job assignment. To do so is to offer the robber's option: "Your money or the job!"

This law prohibits robbery: by the employer and also by the employer's accomplice, i.e., the worker who can afford to accept a delayed-payment contract, thereby excluding the poorest workers from the labor market.

D. A Case of Theft and Indirect, Non-Criminal Oppression

Whenever we analyze a voluntary contract from the point of view of the ethical question of "oppressor and oppressed," we need to ask the economic question: Who wins and who loses? Few moral analysts have had training in economic analysis. This is why they often miss the point. They incorrectly identify the oppressors and the oppressed.

This law prohibits two parties from profiting from delayed payment: the employer and the worker who possesses sufficient assets to survive a delay in payment. Why does the employer delay payment? One reason is that he seeks to avoid risk. He wants to be able to fire the worker without losing the value of the labor that the worker still owes him because of the money that he paid the worker in advance. God grants the employer the legal right to avoid this risk of default, but only if he pays wages daily. The employer may lawfully assess the worker's net productivity, day by day. If the worker is producing unacceptably low output, the employer does not have to hire him the next day. The worker's contract is good for only one day or less, depending on what he agreed to in advance. But when the employer seeks to retain the worker for a longer period than one work day, he must pay the worker in advance. This is what God's law teaches.

1. The Weaker Party

The worker needs protection. An employer might hire him for a period and then dismiss him without pay. Jacob's complaint against Laban was that Laban had changed his wages repeatedly, meaning retroactively (Gen. 31:7). To protect the worker from this sort of robbery, the Bible requires the employer to bear the risk of longer-term default. He bears the risk that the worker may turn out to be inefficient and will have to be fired before he has fulfilled his contract. The worker may even cheat the employer by walking off the job before his term of employment is over. That is the employer's problem. He can minimize this risk by paying workers at the end of each day. In doing so, he does not allow them to become indebted to him. If he chooses to have more infrequent pay periods, then he must bear the risk of paying people in advance who turn out to be inefficient or corrupt workers.

There are workers who are willing and able to bear the risk that they will be cheated by an employer. They will accept delayed wage payments. If there were not such workers, this law would not be necessary. The employer could not rationally expect to be able to pass on this risk of hiring people to the people being hired unless he believed that there were workers who were willing to accept a delayed payment work contract. We know that such workers exist by the millions today. They have always existed.

This case law prohibits such an arrangement, whether initiated by an employer or a worker. The law specifies in advance exactly what each worker should expect: payment at the end of the work day. This law discriminates against all those workers who are willing and able to compete against other workers by accepting delayed wages. It is not simply a law against the robbery of destitute workers by employers; it is also a law against the indirect, non-criminal oppression of destitute workers by other workers.

2. The Weakest Party

It is not immediately apparent that this law deals with the robbery of the poor by the somewhat less poor. This law seems to have only the employer in mind as the agent of theft. But the employer cannot act alone in this act of theft. He needs accomplices, even if they are unaware of their economic status as accomplices. An employer who wants to discriminate against destitute workers in this way cannot do so without the voluntary cooperation of other workers. He cannot hire people to work without daily wage payments unless some workers are willing to work on these terms.

The text identifies this practice as illegal, but it is not merely the robbery of those workers who voluntarily agree to accept the terms of the contract; it is also the oppression of those workers who cannot afford to offer their labor services on these terms. It is above all the oppression of those who are excluded from the employer's work force, not those who are included. But it requires some knowledge of basic economics to discover this fact. This law's protection of the destitute worker's ability to bid for jobs is implicit in the text, not explicit.

On what legal basis does this law apply to the free market? Why should a voluntary contract—delayed payment—be prohibited by civil law? What makes the practice of delaying payment judicially unique, and therefore legitimately subject to interference by the civil government?

3. The Priestly Factor

It is the vulnerability of the weakest seller of labor that makes this law necessary. God imposes this law because of what I call the priestly factor in free market pricing. This factor is seldom if ever discussed by free market economists. When human life is at stake—beyond the modern economic principle of marginalism—unrestricted free market competition is in some instances not morally valid. All real-world societies recognize this fact, but free market economists rarely do, since they are committed to a hypothetically value-free (ethically neutral) analysis.

Here is an example of priestly pricing: a physician who bargains sharply with a seriously injured man at the scene of an accident. He cannot lawfully charge “all the traffic will bear” under such conditions. He is not allowed to charge significantly more than what is customary for treating that kind of injury in cases where the patient can be taken to any of several emergency treatment facilities. If he does drastically overcharge the victim, a civil court will not enforce the contract. The medical profession has ethical rules against such uninhibited pricing practices. Most people, unlike trained economists, have at least a vague understanding that human life, like eternal salvation, is not to be sold to a dying man on the basis of the free market’s familiar auction principle of “high bid wins” unless there is sufficient time for the injured person to seek a second opinion and negotiate a second price quote.¹⁷

The law against delaying the payment of wages is an application of the ethics of priestly pricing. A destitute worker is not to be excluded from any labor market by an employer’s policy of delaying payment. Delayed payment is a policy of excluding workers.

Why would an employer want to exclude workers from bidding for a job, i.e., lowering his labor costs? Normally, he would not want to exclude them, but it takes considerable familiarity with economics to understand why this policy discriminates against destitute workers. This law prohibits such a practice. God expects men to obey His law even when they do not understand all of its ramifications. Obedience is primary, not intellectual understanding. Men are to show good faith to

17. Priestly pricing is based on ability to pay, e.g., the tithe. Economists call this practice price discrimination: one monetary price charged to members of one group; another price charged to members of a different group. The economist’s standard explanation for this phenomenon is that there are government-imposed barriers to entry, e.g., licensing. The classic presentation of this view is Reuben A. Kessel, “Price Discrimination in Medicine,” Journal of Law and Economics, I (Oct. 1958). I wrote to Kessel in the mid-1970s and suggested the priestly role of physicians as another factor in price discrimination. He wrote back politely and said this had never occurred to him. He did not say that he thought I had discovered anything significant.

A legitimate question is this one: Why do civil governments create such barriers to entry? The political self-interest of the legislators is not the only possible explanation. Legislators and judges seem to recognize the priestly role of physicians. Some kinds of voluntary but life-and-death contracts are not enforceable in the courts, and should not be.

God by obeying God's law as best they can, so that He will reward them. One of these rewards is greater understanding, thereby enabling men to obey God even better.

E. Competition: Discrimination = Exclusion

This law does not prohibit other forms of competition among workers. It prohibits only this one, which reflects the character of God in his gracious dealings with men in history. There is no law in the Bible against one worker's willingness and ability to offer to work for less per day or less per hour than another worker presently does. Any offer to serve another person on terms that are better for him than the terms presently being offered is an offer to discriminate: an act of exclusion. The offer discriminates against the person who has previously benefitted from the arrangement under the existing terms. The right¹⁸ to make a better offer is inherent in the biblical requirement that we become more profitable servants. This right is basic to human freedom. It is also basic to economic growth and advancement.

1. The Economics of Persuasion

We never know all of the available alternatives in life. We learn about better ways of achieving our goals through better offers that are made to us. We frequently need to be persuaded to do the wise thing. Wisdom is not automatic. Neither is accurate knowledge automatically acted upon.¹⁹ This is an epistemological application of Paul's ethical principle that knowing the good is not the same as doing it: "For the good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do" (Rom. 7:19). This is why advertising must be persuasive; in fact, persuasiveness is more important for successful advertising than conveying technically accurate information.²⁰ People seek persuasion. They are willing to pay for it.

There is market competition for accurate information and for effective persuasion (i.e., motivation). Neither information nor persuasion is a free good. Both parties to a voluntary transaction are buyers of both information and persuasion. While we do not normally think of persuasion as something that buyers purchase, it must be purchased. We reward those who provide it by buying whatever it is they are selling. Advertisers pay for specialized courses on how to become more persuasive.²¹ Consumers act when they are persuaded to act. This indicates that they want to be persuaded to take action. Their spending patterns reflect this desire on their part. Advertisers therefore respond accordingly: they adopt techniques of persuasion—what scholars have for millennia called rhetoric. Persuasion is not a free good. It must be paid for by those consumers who want it.

18. By "right," I mean "immunity from legal challenge."

19. Israel M. Kirzner, Perception, Opportunity, and Profit: Studies in the Theory of Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), ch. 9.

20. Israel M. Kirzner, Competition and Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), pp. 159–63.

The structure of competition for information and persuasion is no different from any other form of market competition: buyers vs. buyers and sellers vs. sellers. A person who thinks he can sell me an alternative approach to solving my problem comes to me and says, in effect: “Include me in your production process. Exclude someone else. I have discovered a better way.” The offer to include him is inevitably an offer to exclude his competitors. There can be no possibility of inclusion inside a boundary without the possibility of exclusion; otherwise, there would be no boundary.

2. Competition Without Oppression

This should alert us to a biblical fact of economic life: economic oppression is in fact a form of discrimination. Economic oppression can also be used as a means of competition. Most forms of discrimination are morally valid and legal.²² Therefore, so are most forms of competition.

This case is an exception. Why does God prohibit this form of competition among workers? I think it must be the all-or-nothing aspect of this form of competition. An excluded worker may be too destitute to survive easily without pay. He is at the bottom of the barrel

21. The components of a direct-marketing advertisement are the same as the components of biblical hermeneutics and the medieval trivium: grammar, logic, and rhetoric. The ad must have a promise (grammar), proof (logic), and persuasion (rhetoric). In 1992, I presented this thesis before two conferences on direct-marketing techniques, and the professionals in attendance told me that they agree with my analysis. Biblical hermeneutics employs the same methodology: grammatico-historical (grammar), theology (logic), and symbol (rhetoric). I presented this thesis at the Colleyville Presbyterian Church, Colleyville, Texas, on June 29, 1992. On the medieval trivium, see Dorothy Sayers, “The Lost Tools of Learning” (1947): <http://bit.ly/SayersTools>.

22. Economist Walter Williams said that when he married his wife, he discriminated against all other single women. He was not so naïve as to say that he thereby oppressed all other single women.

financially. He might be able to work for a bit less money per day, but he cannot afford to work for nothing for several days or weeks. He is in a desperate situation, so God intervenes and gives him what he needs to compete: time. His skills are not to be removed permanently from the marketplace just because he is too destitute to accept a job that delays payment for work completed beyond one work day.

The Bible correctly assumes that the employer is in a stronger bargaining position than the destitute employee in the community. God's law therefore places limits on the time that the employer can withhold the wages of the employee. It says specifically that withholding wages beyond the end of the work day constitutes oppression. God establishes this formal standard, and Christians should acknowledge its existence and obey it. There are biblical judicial limits on voluntarism. This fact does not constitute a legitimizing of an open-ended socialism, including some modernized version of medieval guild socialism. Biblical law, not socialist slogans, is the source of our knowledge of such limits on voluntary exchange. No employment contract contrary to this law is legal in God's eyes. The civil laws of every nation should prohibit such delays in the payment of wages.

F. Bargainers: Strong, Weak, and Weakest

Because so few people are trained to think economically, they do not perceive the “things hidden”: in this case, the identification of the primary victim and the primary beneficiary of this prohibited labor contract. We need to think through the effects of such a contract by means of “Levitical” reasoning, meaning boundary reasoning: inclusion and exclusion. The traditional pair of questions posed by economists —“Who wins?” and “Who loses?”—becomes: “Who is included?” and “Who is excluded?”

In the absence of this law, there is an implied threat to the potential worker who is unwilling or unable to extend this credit. If he refuses to extend credit to the employer, he will not get the job. This is a major threat. By contrast, the employer suffers very little by paying wages in advance. He loses a small interest return on his money. This interest presumably is not worth a great deal to him, especially if he is a small-scale employer, which most employers in history are.

Why only presumably? Because of an inescapable epistemological limit on economic science. Technically, the economist cannot make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, so he cannot say scientifically that the employer's gain is psychologically smaller than the worker's loss. The psychological loss or gain of the two individuals cannot be computed. There is no scientific way to measure the psychological loss to the worker of forfeiting the interest by extending credit, nor is there a way to compute the psychological loss to the employer if he is required by law to forfeit the interest by extending credit.²³ It is not necessary for us to make such a numerical computation; we can still identify the primary victim and the primary beneficiary whenever this law is violated.

We need to consider three parties in our economic analysis: the employer, the employed worker, and the excluded worker. The text does not speak of the excluded worker, nor is the average Bible commentator likely to consider him, but he is crucial to the analysis. A less destitute worker may decide to accept the terms of employment: delayed payment. A destitute worker cannot afford to accept it. The excluded worker becomes the primary victim of a delayed-wages contract. He cannot afford to take the job. The less destitute worker takes the job. He would of course rather be paid early, but his willingness to accept delayed payment is a form of competition on his part that gives him an advantage over very poor people in the community. The Bible calls this form of competition oppression.

The primary economic beneficiary of this form of oppression is not the employer, for whom the interest gained by delaying payment is minimal, but rather the worker who can afford to have his wages delayed, and who therefore gets the job. He excludes his competition through oppression. The employer here acts as the economic agent of the employed worker. This representational relationship is not readily understood. No one without economic training will blame the employed worker for the unemployment of the destitute worker. If anyone is blamed, it will be the employer. The employer is to blame, judicially speaking, for he imposes the illegal terms of employment, which this law identifies as robbery. God's law designates the employer as the initiator of an evil contract, and hence judicially liable, as we shall see. The fact remains, however, that the worker who takes the job on these terms becomes the agent of economic oppression, while the excluded worker is the primary economic victim. The employer gains a small interest return and a small risk-avoidance return. The worker gains the promise of a wage, bears some risk of not being paid, and forfeits a small interest payment. The excluded worker, too poor to accept the contract, gains nothing. The person who appears to be the victim—the worker who takes the job—is in fact the primary economic beneficiary of this labor contract. He obtains what both of the competing workers had wanted: the job.

23. On the question of interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, see North, Dominion Covenant, ch. 4. Cf. Gary North, The Coase Theorem: A Study in Epistemology (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992).

G. What Did the Employer Steal?

The appropriate civil sanction is not specified, as is also the case in other laws governing oppression. But in most other cases, the absence of any civil sanction points to the absence of civil jurisdiction because of excessive limits on the judges' knowledge. Not so in this instance. Restitution in this case is technically possible to compute. If victims prosecute and the courts convict, the practice will disappear from public view.

The primary judicial question is: How much does the convicted employer owe the victim? Answer: the victim's costs of prosecution plus the restitution penalty.²⁴ There are two approaches to establishing what restitution payment is owed by the employer: (1) by considering the forfeited interest; (2) by considering the forfeited daily wage. I believe the second approach is valid. We must examine the first approach in detail in order to see why it is not valid. The key question that we need to answer is this: What constitutes the thing stolen? Is it the interest or the wage?

1. Interest

A withheld wage requires a worker to extend credit to his employer. For a week or two, or perhaps even a month, the worker has extended credit, day by day, to the person employing him. The employee has therefore forfeited the interest that he might have earned day by day, had he been able to put this money in the bank rather than spending it on necessities. It is obvious that the interest payments foregone would not be very much money; nevertheless, it is possible to compute what double restitution of that forfeited interest would be. However, only a very skilled person could have made this computation prior to the widespread knowledge of mathematics.²⁵ The average employer

24. If the victim's court costs are not paid by the convicted criminal, very few victims will be able to sue, so the practice of discrimination will not be reduced.

25. Consider how difficult this would be apart from the use of the zero (a decimal could not have computed this payment easily in Moses' time, let alone the average employee.

The cost to the worker of this forfeited interest would be higher to him than the cost to the employer. I am speaking here of the actual rate of interest, not psychological cost. The worker has to forfeit goods that the wages would have bought in the interim. There is no doubt that a modern worker can borrow the money to buy these goods, repaying the loan at the end of the working period. (Prior to World War I, small consumer loans from banks were unavailable to workers.) The difficulty is, a worker is not in a position to borrow money at the same low rate of interest that the employer can obtain. The poverty-stricken worker is a high-risk borrower. He can easily be trapped in a cycle of debt. When this law is honored, an employer has greater difficulty in forcing the employee into debt servitude.

Computing the forfeited interest would be difficult even today. In Moses' day, it would have been very difficult. How many judges would have been able to establish this implied forfeited payment? Not many. So, we must look for a better solution. We must turn from the technical economic concept of forfeited interest to the concept of forfeited wages.

2. Wages

It is not implied in the text that double restitution of the forfeited interest should be paid, since this is not what is specified as the thing stolen. In fact, the text does not specify the thing stolen. What is identified in the text as an act of theft is the refusal of the employer to pay the agreed-upon wages in a timely manner. We conclude that the withheld wage is the thing stolen. Thus, a civil judge can rightfully impose a much higher penalty on the employer than double the employer's forfeited interest. The thief would not simply pay double restitution on the forfeited interest; he would pay double restitution on any wages unpaid at the end of each work day.

Why so high a penalty? After all, the worker forfeited only the interest that his money might have earned. Why impose double restitution based on the entire daily wage multiplied by the number of days point followed by a zero is needed to compute percentages under 10%), which came to the medieval West only through contact with Islam. The Arabs in turn learned of it in India. There is no evidence that the zero was known to any culture prior to the ninth century, A.D.—the West's era of Charlemagne. The Mayans and the Indians discovered it independently or else were in contact with each other.

of delayed payment? Because God's law defines the act as theft.

The act is also a form of oppression, but the oppressor here is the worker who accepts the contract. He is not identified as a thief. He is not subject to criminal charges by the invisible excluded workers who cannot afford to wait to be paid.

We need to examine the employer's motivation. If his primary goal is not to earn a little extra interest by delaying wages, then what is it? Most employers adopt a policy of delaying wages today because their rivals do. This policy is almost universal in modern advanced economies. Employers give little or no thought to the practice. But what if they did give thought to it? What would their primary motivation likely be?

H. The Limits of Economic Knowledge

The Marxist would probably argue that the employer's goal is to place local workers in a totally dependent position. The poorer they are, the more desperate their economic condition. The more desperate their economic condition, the cheaper they are willing to work. If the employer can maintain what Karl Marx once called the industrial reserve army,²⁶ i.e., the unemployed, he can force down local wages. His theft is therefore deliberate. One problem with this line of reasoning is that it assumes that the employer understands a complex chain of economic reasoning. He probably doesn't. Another problem is that employers like to have qualified workers competing against each other.

The key word here is qualified. As a former employer, I believe that the typical employer is trying to minimize his risk when he hires competent workers rather than substandard workers. He delays payment because he wants to see each new worker prove himself before getting paid. This delay in payment pressures workers with little capital to quit early or never even apply for the job. The practice of delaying wages is therefore primarily a screening device. It favors workers who have capital in reserve. These capital reserves serve the employer as a substitute for other screening techniques. The employer's economic problem is his lack of knowledge about the competence of the new worker. The employer uses a delayed payment scheme in order to minimize his search costs in estimating the competence of new workers. Accurate knowledge is not a zero-price resource. Employers try to obtain such knowledge as cheaply as possible. They use the new worker's willingness to accept delayed payments as a cost-effective substitute for more detailed information regarding the worker's abilities and his willingness to work.

26. Karl Marx, Capital: A Critique of Political Economy (1867), XXV:3 (New York: Modern Library, [1906] n.d.), pp. 689–703.

I. The Limits of Judicial Knowledge

Here we have a situation where the law seems unjust. I have argued that the primary economic beneficiary of delayed payments is the worker who can afford to extend the credit and therefore gets the job. I have identified the primary economic victim as the excluded destitute worker. Yet the law identifies the employer as the robber, and the only way for a judge to impose negative sanctions is for him to require the employer to pay the employee. In other words, the judicial victim is not the primary economic victim. Why does God give the employee a lawful claim against the employer? Because this worker is the only judicially visible victim. He is a weak bargainer when compared to the employer. He is stronger than the destitute excluded workers, but he is still weak compared to the employer. This law is meant to protect the weak from the strong. It protects the weakest party only indirectly: by threatening the employer with penalties for robbing the weaker. Judges are not omniscient; they cannot identify the weakest workers, i.e., those who never even bothered to apply for the job because of their lack of capital. Judges provide protection to the weakest only indirectly.

The judicial problem is this: How can the judges identify the actual victims of this form of discrimination? The primary economic victim of a delayed-wage contract was the excluded worker who could not afford to take the job. He has been oppressed by the worker who took the job on the illegal terms. Exactly which workers were the excluded ones? That is to say, which workers would have gained employment had the delayed-payment system not been in force? This is virtually impossible for civil judges to determine. Knowing the harsh terms of employment, some destitute workers may not have bothered to apply. Any seemingly destitute worker might later complain to the civil authorities that he had never bothered to apply for the job because of the delayed payment feature. So, by what means can such a law be enforced? How can legitimate, predictable sanctions be imposed? What, if anything, should be done to indemnify the primary victim? This is why economic oppression is rarely a crime. The civil magistrate cannot specify the illegal criteria, the victims, or the appropriate restitution.

How can a restitution payment to the employed worker help a destitute worker who was too poor to accept the terms of employment in the first place? The judge does not restore anything to him. Nevertheless, the penalty does help the excluded worker: not as a payment to compensate him for past oppression but as a threat against future oppression. This law reduces future injustice to the weakest members of the work force by forcing the oppressing employer to pay the visible victim—the worker whose wages were withheld—instead of paying the invisible victims whose claims cannot be precisely identified or resolved judicially. The agent of oppression, namely, the worker who took the job, is rewarded by the court, not for being an oppressor (which he was) but because he was the victim of a criminal act.

Part II. The Deaf and the Blind

Verse 14 deals with the deaf man and the blind man: “Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumblingblock before the blind, but shalt fear thy God: I am the LORD” (v. 14). Neither one of them can defend himself against the specified evil. The deaf man cannot hear the curse; the blind man cannot see the stumbling block. The person who takes advantage of their condition of weakness has broken the law of God. These are case laws. They are specific applications of more general principles. We are supposed to deduce the general law from the specific conditions described in the case law. What are these conditions? Let us consider the easiest case first.

A. Tripping the Blind

The blind man must not be tripped, since there is no way that he can adjust for the obstacle. It is not his fault that he cannot see. There is nothing that he can do about his condition. It is not a moral weakness on his part that he is blind (John 9:1–3).

The context of this law is the payment of wages (v. 13). The case law of verse 14 means that the stronger party must not use another person’s inherent weakness in order to pay him less than a market wage. By implication, he must not cheat the illiterate man or the mentally retarded person. He must acknowledge the existence of the other person’s weakness and not use it to take advantage of him. Where the other person is biologically unable to compensate for his weakness, the employer is not to profit from the other person’s incapacity.

Why would anyone deliberately trip a blind man? Children do such things to the handicapped outsiders among them, but why? Why is it that handicapped children—even blind children²⁷—seem to draw persecution from other children? Why do we expect our children to stop doing such things as they grow older? Why do adults regard such acts as immoral?

Or do they? The mental image of a small group taunting the village idiot is not so very foreign to us. We can imagine a group of lower-class people laughing at the distress of some poor handicapped wretch. Someone in the group might gain a few laughs by tripping a blind man. The motivation is not clear, but God's law does acknowledge the existence of the temptation. The person who trips a blind person has broken God's law.

B. Cursing the Deaf

A curse under the terms of the Mosaic law was an act of assault.²⁸ It still is. Modern societies still have laws on the books identifying curses as illegal, although these laws are rarely prosecuted by victims in our day. The Bible regards a verbal curse as a judicial act with consequences in history, just as it regards a verbal blessing.

This outlook is foreign to modern man, both humanist and pietist. Modern man does not believe that God's blessings or curses are called down on others in history because a representative covenantal agent pronounces blessings or curses. The third commandment is clear: God's name must not be taken in vain. The frame of reference is the misuse of God's holy name—a boundary violation—by someone who is not authorized to invoke that name judicially.

Cursing a deaf man is a double violation: calling down God's curses illegitimately, and cursing someone who cannot respond judicially. The deaf man is unaware of the boundary violation. Because God's name has been misused, or at least the violator has judicially misused language, society is at risk. The agent who has been authorized by God to press charges in God's name in an earthly court—the victim—is unaware of the violation. This transfers responsibility for 27. Robert V. Hine, Second Sight (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993), p. 84.

28. The curse in this case means "make light," which connotes deliberate humiliation or abuse. Herbert C. Brichto, The Problem of "Curse" in the Hebrew Bible (Philadelphia: Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis, 1963), pp. 120–22. James Jordan provided me with this reference.

invoking a lawsuit from the victim to the witness.

The deaf victim must be informed of the infraction, and the blind person must be informed of the identity of the person who tripped him. The blind person cannot press charges. He did not see who tripped him. Similarly, a deaf person cannot respond to a curse against him, since he did not hear it. Through no fault of their own, these victims cannot bring a lawsuit against the evil-doers who have broken God's law.

But God can. So can His lawfully appointed courts if a representative of the victim either informs the victim or, if the victim cannot press charges himself (e.g., a mental defective), the representative presses charges in the name of the victim.

Victims in these cases need spokesmen to act in their behalf. As in the case of a crime, God is the primary victim.²⁹ The witness serves as a spokesman for both God and the victim. This law makes it plain that God expects others in the community to take action and serve as covenant agents in the name of the victims. How else could such public infractions of this law be prosecuted? A verbal curse is a public act in defiance of God's law. Such public acts must be prosecuted, not just because they are morally wrong—many immoral acts cannot legitimately be prosecuted under biblical law—but because they are public. The public character of this form of cursing places the integrity of the society on trial, for the victim cannot hear and respond as God's designated agent. If no witness intervenes to bring formal charges, then God will take action against the evil-doer and the society that has failed to protect the handicapped victim from his persecutor.

C. The General Legal Principle: Protecting the Weakest Party

I argue that verses 13 and 14 are linked. This link is not grammatical. Then what is the link? It is two-fold. First, God wishes to protect the weakest parties in society. Second, there are limits on men's knowledge. Courts are not omniscient. Both of these laws implicitly call for agents to bring civil lawsuits against law-breakers who harm the weakest members of society. The private prosecutors must have incentives to bring their lawsuits if the evil practices are to be minimized. Because the nature of the crimes is different, the incentives are different: positive in the case of weak but employed workers, negative in the case of fearful witnesses.

29. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix M:A.

To trip a blind person or curse a deaf person is to commit an active assault, either physically or verbally. The law-breaker has actively assaulted a victim who cannot prosecute. This was a public act. Thus, the crime is relatively easy to prove if two witnesses testify that someone committed the crime. The weakest victim is easy to identify.

Not so in the case of an employer who withholds wages beyond one day. First, there is no active assault. There is only a refusal to pay. Second, the weakest worker is the unemployed person who cannot afford to live without wages. He is being oppressed by both the employer and his employee. Judicially, it is not possible for a court to identify the specific worker who would have taken the job had the employer paid in advance. Therefore, in order to remove this form of indirect oppression from society, God grants to the weaker worker—the employed worker, who himself is an oppressor (though probably unknowingly)—the authority to press a covenant lawsuit in the courts on his own behalf. A small portion of the wealth of the weak worker had been transferred to the employer. This wealth transfer can be calculated for purposes of judicial restitution. Because the defrauded worker presses charges, the weakest worker is indirectly protected. The weaker worker, acting on his own behalf judicially and economically, acts as an economic agent for the weakest workers. He probably does not perceive that he is in fact acting as the economic agent of his competition. A more economically sophisticated worker would probably not press charges against his employer, since the delayed payment system excludes his competition, but there are never very many economically sophisticated workers (or anyone else, for that matter). Some workers will press charges, so the oppressive practice will be reduced.

Like the weakest excluded worker, the blind or deaf victim needs a legal agent to press charges. No one benefits economically for serving as this agent. Therefore, God warns the potential agents to press charges. How? By announcing His name: “I am the LORD” (14b). Their fear of God and their desire to uphold His law provide the motivation to press charges, not their personal economic gain. They desire to avoid God’s wrath. The threatened sanction is negative.

The reason why these two passages are linked is this: the inability of the courts to protect the weakest victims. The courts can take action only when someone brings a lawsuit against a perceived law-breaker. The weakest victims cannot act on their own behalf in these two types of cases. The excluded worker cannot prove that he was a victim. Similarly, the victimized blind or deaf person cannot prove that the crime took place. A biblical court system requires an agent to bring a lawsuit against the law-breaker. These case laws provide the necessary incentives for agents to bring these lawsuits.

Conclusion

Grammatically, verses 13 and 14 are not linked; ethically and judicially, they are. The links are: (1) God's protection of the weakest members in society; (2) ways to overcome the limits on men's knowledge, especially the limits on the judges' knowledge. So, the judicial cases are different—theft vs. public assault—but the general prohibition is the same: do not harm the weakest parties.

These case laws prohibit the victimization of the poorest and weakest members of the community. The case law in verse 13 deals with theft from economically weak workers and also indirect economic oppression of the most impoverished workers in the community. The most impoverished workers are those who cannot afford to extend credit to their employer. They need to be paid at the end of the work day. The employer is required to do this or else pay them in advance for a longer term of service.

This law proves that Mosaic Israel was not a debt-free society. There were creditors and debtors. A legitimate biblical goal is to reduce long-term debt, but God's civil law does not mandate absolutely debt-free living. Debt is basic to society, for society implies a division of labor. Debt will exist in a division of labor economy until such time as an economically efficient means of making moment-by-moment wage payments becomes universal.

The employer who delays payment to his workers is defrauding them. Verse 13 says this. But to do this, he is inescapably providing an opportunity for some workers to oppress their competitors. The worker who can afford to work without pay for a period is given an opportunity by the employer to steal a job away from a worker so poverty-stricken that he cannot survive without payment at the end of the day. This form of competition is illegitimate, this passage says ("fraud, robbery"). It is unfair competition. God's civil law makes it illegal for an employer to act as the economic agent of any employee against a destitute competitor. There are very few cases of unfair competition specified in the Bible, but this is one of them.

Verse 14 prohibits the active assault on the deaf and blind. We are not to attack defenseless people. The text specifies this. This case law also implicitly condemns all those who sit idly by when others publicly assault these defenseless people. We are required by God to become covenantal agents of those victimized people in our presence who are inherently incapable of defending themselves judicially: the deaf and the blind. We are to act as the ears of the deaf and the eyes of the blind whenever we hear or see others assault them. In short, we are to accept our role as covenantal witnesses. God reminds us of who He is: "I am the LORD" (14b).

The state has no means of imposing sanctions against those who see but do not report the crime, unless it can establish that the silent witnesses were accomplices or conspirators. God's civil law cannot legitimately compel men to do good things. Its role is exclusively to keep people from doing evil things. But God is not bound by the laws that bind the state. He can bring His sanctions against silent witnesses. He can act as an agent of the victims. He will act as their agent on judgment day, and perhaps in the lives of those who refuse to act as His agents in history.

Leviticus 9:14 is not a biblical injunction for the state to become a welfare agent: a dispenser of positive sanctions. The state is not to provide free hearing aids for the deaf or free seeing-eye dogs for the blind. This law legislates against assault (cursing the deaf) and battery (tripping the blind). It implicitly commands witnesses to become legal agents of the defenseless person when someone actively, verbally assaults or physically batters him. Cursing a man is an act of assault; tripping a man is an act of battery. These acts are unquestionably illegal. It is every person's task to defend in court those who are inherently incapable of prosecuting their assailants.

The delay of payment overnight is described in the text as robbery: a crime. A judge can impose a restitution penalty on the perpetrator. There is also a hidden element of oppression: the excluded workers. To become subject to civil law, oppression must be identifiable as a criminal offense. There must be definable criteria that make the act a crime. The indirectly oppressed, excluded worker is not the victim of a crime. Ironically, the one who has oppressed him, the employed worker, is the victim of a crime: delayed payment. Even more ironically, if the oppressor brings a lawsuit against his assailant, the employer, he thereby makes it less likely that he and his employer will be able to oppress the weakest party: the excluded worker. This is why I think the excluded worker or the state acting on his behalf can bring a lawsuit against the employer to have the practice stopped.

The oppressive character of the contract should be recognized, and no legislation should ever be passed that imitates the “delayed payment” contract, with its exclusionary side effects.

IMPARTIAL JUSTICE VS. SOCIALIST ECONOMICS

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour (Lev. 19:15).

The theocentric meaning of this law is that the state is to imitate God by doing what God does: judge all people without respect to their persons, i.e., their class, status, or power. This is an aspect of rendering judgment, part four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. The Rule of Law

This law is one of the two most important laws in the Bible that deal with civil government. The other verse is Exodus 12:49, which insists that civil judgment in the land of the covenant must apply to all men equally, whether strangers or Israelites: “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you.” Exodus 12:49 confirms the judicially binding nature of the civil law of God: biblical civil laws are to be applied equally to all people residing within the geographical boundaries of a biblically covenanted society. The same civil laws are to be applied to everyone residing in the land, regardless of race, color, creed, or national origin.² These binding civil laws have been revealed by God directly to mankind in the Bible, and only in the Bible.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 14.

All those who reside within modern geographical boundaries are under a particular state's sanctions,³ but not all of these people are citizens. This means that they are not being represented judicially as members of an earthly court. They are not part of the civil hierarchy even though they are under the law. If they were part of it, they could apply judicial sanctions for or against these representatives by voting. What God's law requires is that civil magistrates, as agents of God's heavenly court, represent these people. The judges represent God in man's courts, and they represent men under their jurisdiction in God's court. This is why civil authorities are called ministers by Paul (Rom. 13:4, 6). They possess ministerial authority. Judges must therefore apply the Bible's civil laws impartially to residents who are inside the geographical boundaries of a covenanted society but who are outside the judicial hierarchy. The publicly visible evidence of the judges' representative authority in God's heavenly court is their faithfulness in applying God's law impartially.

Almost every legal theorist in Western society accepts the principle of equality before the law. This ideal is one of the bedrock foundations of Western civilization. It comes from the Bible, not from Greek and Roman law, both of which explicitly denied the concept of equality before the civil law. Classical law protected only citizens: males who had lawful access to the religious rites of the city. Women (half the adult population), slaves (one-third of all males), and foreign-born residents were excluded. The ultimate manifestation of the biblical principle of equality before the law in history was God the Father's willingness to place His incarnate son, Jesus Christ, under the negative sanction that had threatened Adam. Paul writes: "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?" (Rom. 8:32). Among these things that God gives is liberty. It is a product, along with other judicial factors, of the ideal of equality before God's law. (It is not, contrary to the textbooks, a product of Classical Greek political theory or practice.)⁴

B. Natural Law Theory: Ethical Dualism

The issue of the absolute authority of God's specially revealed civil law challenges the competing theoretical structure of natural law, nat-

3. The modern exceptions are people who reside in foreign embassies and the ambassadors themselves, even when outside their embassies. They are under their own nations' legal orders inside the boundaries of their embassy buildings.

4. Appendix D: "Greek Mythology: The Myth of Classical Politics."

ural reason, and natural revelation. We need to ask: Can these three theoretical ideals serve as sufficient guides for establishing God's legal requirements? Or is direct revelation from the God of the Bible mandatory covenantally in the civil realm?

Let us take the easiest case to analyze. God told Adam that he was not to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. If natural law, natural reason, and natural revelation were sufficient to inform mankind of the judicial boundaries established by God, then why did God reveal to Adam this single binding law and its single negative sanction? Adam was morally perfect. His eyes were not yet blinded by sin. The creation was without blemish in Genesis 2. It did not yet provide misleading information to mankind. But God nevertheless revealed His law verbally to Adam. Why? Because natural law, natural reason, and natural revelation alone are not sufficient to enable men to know God's binding covenant law in its entirety. If this was true for Adam, then it is surely true today, since men possess only fallen reason, and the creation itself is under a curse.

Had God's civil laws been revealed in some way other than through direct verbal revelation to Moses by God, such as through the universal reason of mankind, there would have been no need for God to require that the whole law be read publicly in Israel every seventh year (Deut. 31:9–13).⁵ Men would already have known this requirement “rationally.” But they did not know.⁶ Then what do men know? They are responsible before God, so they must know something about God's law. Men always know enough about God's covenant law to get themselves condemned by God eternally—the work of the law (not the law itself) written in their hearts (Rom. 2:14–15)⁷—but not enough to enable them to build the kingdom of God in history. This is why those Christians who affirm natural law rather than biblical law as the sole authoritative moral standard for society almost always also explicitly deny that it is either possible or required by God that Christians build

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 75.

6. If this analysis is true, then the ideal of political pluralism is anti-biblical. See Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

7. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1959), I, pp. 72–76. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 4.

the kingdom of God in history as God's designated judicial agents.⁸

The inherent ethical dualism of natural law theology has had catastrophic effects in history. The dualism between Bible-revealed personal Christian ethics and religiously neutral, universally perceivable civil law inescapably demobilizes Christians in society and simultaneously anoints pagans as the lawful interpreters of natural law. Ethical dualism inevitably places God's designated judicial agents—Christians—under the civil and cultural authority of Satan's designated judicial agents. Why? Because it places natural law, natural revelation, and natural reason above God's revealed law, His progressively restored creation,⁹ and the mind of Christ (I Cor. 2:16).¹⁰ There is no neutrality; there is always judicial hierarchy. Some law-order must be on top. Some transgressors of this law-order must be on the bottom. Christian natural law theorists in principle place a hypothetically neutral natural law on top and Christians on the bottom.

8. I have in mind all Protestant ethical dualists, from Martin Luther to Norman Geisler. Luther was amillennial; Geisler was premillennial-dispensational; both denied that God's kingdom can triumph in history through the Spirit-backed efforts of Christians. On Luther's ethical dualism between Christian ethics and civil ethics, see Charles Trinkaus, "The Religious Foundation of Luther's Social Views," in John H. Mundy, et al., Essays in Medieval Life (Cheshire, Connecticut: Biblo & Tannen, 1955); Gary North, "The Economics of Luther and Calvin," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Summer 1975), pp. 76–89. See also Harold Berman, Law and Revolution, II: The Impact of the Protestant Reformations on the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Belknap Press of Harvard University, 2003), pp. 73–77. On Geisler's equally dualistic ethics, see Norman L. Geisler, "Natural Law and Business Ethics," in Richard C. Chewning (ed.), Biblical Principles and Business: The Foundations (Colorado Springs: NavPress, 1989), pp. 157–74. Geisler explicitly identified the work of the law (Rom. 2:14) with natural law: ibid., p. 158. God holds all men responsible for their acts; hence, Geisler concluded, if some men do not know about God's revealed law, God cannot lawfully condemn them. "If there is no natural law," Geisler said, "God is unjust." Ibid., p. 160. Geisler misunderstood biblical justice. Natural law, natural reason, and natural revelation are sufficient to condemn every sinful person to hell and the lake of fire, but they are insufficient to enable people to build the kingdom of God. God's system of sanctions for the reprobate is simple and clear: "Heads, I win; tails, you lose." For proof, see Romans 9:10–21.

9. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

10. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 2. The mind of Christ is imputed to His people at the time of their conversion, and it is progressively revealed in history, both individually and corporately, through their covenantal faithfulness. Anyone who denies this progressive, corporate, intellectual sanctification must also deny the progress of the church's various theological confessions. I know of no Christian who is willing publicly to deny the progress of the confessions at least through 1647 or 1788.

In the early stages of this cultural conquest by covenant-breakers, natural law theory is a highly useful tool for covenant-breakers in their epistemological and political disarming of Christians. The infiltrators applaud ethical dualism: separate ethical standards for believers and skeptics, but a common civil law-order for all. This common law-order must not be based on some “narrow” appeal to standards uniquely revealed in the Bible, an ethical handbook for covenant-keepers only. Dualism keeps Christians happily subservient to politically successful pagans in the name of Jesus. That is to say, dualism keeps Jesus covenantally subordinate to Satan on earth and in history. When Norman Geisler asks, “Whose ethical standard shall we use?” and immediately answers, “a moral law common to all men”¹¹—natural law for the natural man—he has in principle delivered society into the hands of Satan’s designated judicial agents in history. The natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit (I Cor. 2:14).¹² Therefore, the ethical dualist is logically compelled to affirm, the Holy Spirit has nothing judicially binding to say or do with society and politics. If He did, then the natural man, not being able to receive the things of the Spirit, would be spiritually unreliable to exercise civil authority. Political pluralism rests philosophically on ethical dualism, for it asserts the legitimacy of common citizenship based on religiously neutral civil law. Ethical dualism necessarily asserts the judicial irrelevance of the Holy Spirit to both social theory and political theory. For almost two millennia, ethical dualism has been the dominant outlook of the church’s main spokesmen. The main exceptions historically were the New England Puritans of the first generation, 1630–60. They were self-consciously theocratic in their outlook.¹³

There is no neutrality. The ethical dualist denies this with respect to civil law. By elevating natural law, natural reason, and natural revelation above God’s inspired word for the purpose of establishing social and political theory, the Christian ethical dualist has anointed the covenant-breaker as the lawful master of the covenant-keeper in every area of life outside the four walls of the Christian church and the Christian family. But the consistent covenant-breaker is not about to honor these two fragile, judicially unprotected institutional boundaries, any more than Pontius Pilate honored the innocence of Jesus Christ against the Pharisees' court.

11. Geisler, “Natural Law and Business Ethics,” p. 157.

12. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 2.

13. On their theocratic legal theory, see Charles Lee Haskins, Law and Authority in Early Massachusetts: A Study in Tradition and Design (New York: University Press of America, [1960] 1985).

Here is the problem: Christian ethical dualists keep insisting, century after century, that the Pilates of this world are judicially reliable. The Pilates of this world are supposedly not in need of personal regeneration and the revelation of the Bible in order to carry out their lawful and judicially neutral cultural mandate in history. On the contrary, we are assured, they need only be faithful to "ancient Hindu, Chinese, and Greek writings," to cite Dr. Geisler's recommended primary sources.¹⁴ This is why Christian ethical dualists are at war with biblical civil law, biblical civil sanctions, and covenantal postmillennialism.¹⁵ Christian natural law theorists implicitly offer this daily prayer to God: "Thy kingdom not come, thy will not be done in earth as it is in heaven." (Unless, of course, they become really consistent and argue that natural law in principle should rule in heaven, too. Then their prayer becomes: "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in heaven as it is on earth." We do not find such consistent ethical dualists.)

C. Sanctions: Evaluation and Imposition

Biblical civil justice must seek to apply written laws to public acts. Neither the social status nor the economic class of either the victim or the accused is to be considered in judicial proceedings. The pronouncement by the judge or the jury regarding the fit between the law and the public act of the accused is to be based solely on the law and the evidence. Justice is never impersonal; it is wholly personal: the law, the act, the evidence, and the court's judgment.

Judgments should involve the imposition of sanctions: blessings (on the victim) and cursings (on the criminal). There is no neutrality. Any failure to impose biblical sanctions, apart from the permission of the victim, is necessarily the imposition of unbiblical sanctions. Biblical sanctions are limited. There must be the application of sanctions, but the victim always has the right to reduce the sanctions. Biblical sanctions are always based on the principle of restitution: to God and the victim.¹⁶ The victim is to gain back what he lost plus a penalty payment. But biblical sanctions must not exceed what is legally appropriate to the crime. This places limits on the judges. The judges are not to declare greater sanctions than God's law allows. The judges therefore are under a legal boundary.

14. Geisler, "Natural Law and Business Ethics," p. 158.

15. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 12. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

16. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix M.

The imposition of the sanctions restores the judicial status quo ante. Judicially, at the end of the trial and after the sanctions have been imposed, both the victim and the criminal are restored to their original judicial status. Their economic status has changed. This is because of the restitution payment. The victim is richer than before the commission of the crime. The convicted criminal is poorer than before the commission of the crime. This fact categorically denies the ideal of economic equality. The economic positions of the two individuals are not equal after the sanctions have been enforced. On the other hand, the judicial positions of the individuals are equal after the sanctions have been imposed. Therefore, judicial equality before the law has to mean economic inequality after the sanctions have been imposed. The civil law determines the maximum extent of the change in economic positions. The victim is entitled to reduce the penalty.¹⁷ Also, under the Mosaic Covenant, the kinsmen-redeemer was entitled to pay the victim in the name of the convicted criminal. If this was not the case, then Jesus Christ, the archetypical Kinsman-Redeemer, cannot lawfully pay for our sins against God. The Mosaic kinsman-redeemer became poorer than he would have been had the crime not been committed. Once the restitution payment was made by anyone, the judicial status of each party was restored to what it had been prior to the commission of the crime. Both the victim and the criminal could return to honest work. Their legal status was restored to what each had been prior to the commission of the crime.

D. No Respect for Persons

Leviticus 19:15 is an application of Exodus 12:49. Exodus 12:49 insists that the same laws must apply to everyone. Leviticus 19:15 specifically identifies two groups that must be treated equally in civil courts: the poor and the mighty. While Exodus 12:49 refers to covenantal rivals—the stranger in the land and the Israelite—Leviticus 19:15 refers to the legitimate differentiation of wealth and power. This verse formally legitimizes the simultaneous existence of degrees of power and degrees of wealth within the holy commonwealth. The poor man is to be judged by the same law as the rich man.

The focus here is not simply on the law itself, but on the person who is actually bringing formal judgment as a member of the court. This is the judicial agent who determines the validity of a particular lawsuit. Men are not to respect persons in rendering judgment.

17. Ibid., Appendix M:G, J.

Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it (Deut. 1:17).

Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous (Deut. 16:19).

Wherefore now let the fear of the LORD be upon you; take heed and do it: for there is no iniquity with the LORD our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts (II Chron. 19:7).

These things also belong to the wise. It is not good to have respect of persons in judgment (Prov. 24:23).

For there is no respect of persons with God (Rom. 2:11).

But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons (Col. 3:25).

But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors (James 2:9).

And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear (I Peter 1:17).

E. The Theology of the Poor; or, Poor Theology

From the late 1960s through the late 1980s, a movement known as liberation theology had considerable influence on the thinking of highly educated—i.e., humanist-certified—North American evangelical Christians and Latin American Roman Catholic priests.¹⁸ This movement developed out of a self-conscious attempt by Communists and far-Left heretical Christian groups to fuse Marxist social diagnoses and solutions with biblical rhetoric.¹⁹ This phrase became the rallying

18. The major English-language publishing house for liberation theology is Orbis Books. The major ecclesiastical organization is the Roman Catholic Maryknoll order.

19. Introductory books, critical of the movement, are Michael Novak (ed.), Liberation North, Liberation South (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute, 1980); Gerard Berghoef and Lester DeKoster, Liberation Theology: The Church's Future point of the liberationists: "God is on the side of the poor." Is this phrase true? No, and Leviticus 19:15 is the most obvious passage in the Bible demonstrating the phrase's falsehood. Hardly less powerful in this regard is Psalm 62:9: "Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie: to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity." Conclusion: "Trust not in oppression, and become not vain in robbery: if riches increase, set not your heart upon them" (Ps. 62:10). In short, judge righteously.

The Bible says specifically that God is on the side of the righteous. Occasionally, the Bible does say that God identifies with certain members of the poor. The poor who are poor, not by their own fault, and especially those who are poor because of oppression by others, become identified with God by God's grace. God does care for the righteous. But the Bible makes it clear that God is not on the side of the poor in general. This is why liberation theology is heretical when it is not actually apostate.²⁰

In his book, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (1977), Ronald J. Sider devoted a chapter to the topic "God and the Poor." This book established Sider as the primary "theologian of the poor" in the American evangelical Protestant community.²¹ The peculiar fact about Sider is that he understands the meaning judicially of Leviticus 19:15. He understands that the Bible insists that no one should be partial to a poor man in his law suit. Sider said, "God instructs His people to be impartial because He Himself is not biased." He even cited Exodus 23:3: "Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause." But then he went on to deny the meaning of the texts he had just cited. In the extension of his remarks, he transforms biblical theology into a form of liberation theology. "The most crucial point for us, however, is not God's impartiality, but rather the result of His freedom from bias."²²

Shock (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Christian Library Press, 1984); James V. Schall, S.J., Liberation Theology in Latin America (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1982); and Ronald Nash (ed.), Liberation Theology (Milford, Michigan: Mott Media, 1984) A neo-orthodox critique is J. Andrew Kirk, Liberation Theology: An Evangelical View from the Third World (Atlanta, Georgia: John Knox Press, 1979).

20. Most of the time it is apostate. It is too often merely baptized Marxism. Its adherents now face a spiritual crisis: since 1989, Marxism has become terribly passé. For them, this is a far greater psychological blow than mere apostasy.

21. In England, John R. Stott held this position after 1970.

22. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1977), p. 83. This book was co-published by the liberal Roman Catholic publishing house, The Paulist Press. I cite his 1977 edition rather than his updated, 1984 edition. The later edition was his attempt to escape the devast-

Note the phrase: “not God’s impartiality,” meaning not God’s judicial impartiality. Sider focused instead on what he says are the economic results of this impartiality—the economic results of God’s “freedom from bias.” He did not explore the implications of the impartial application of biblical law; instead, he invokes God’s care for the poor. “The text declares Yahweh’s impartiality and then immediately portrays God’s tender care for the weak and disadvantaged.”²³ Immediately? Tender care for the poor? Nothing like this appears immediately after Exodus 23:3, Leviticus 19:15, or Deuteronomy 1:17, the only texts he cites on impartial justice. The text he then cites is Deuteronomy 10:17–18.²⁴ His concept of “immediately” is textually unique.

Having referred in passing to Leviticus 19:15 and two confirming texts, he then rejects their message. His exposition makes clear what the nature of his objection to Leviticus 19:15 really is: he wanted specific economic results rather than impartial civil justice. This is the judicial heart of the dispute between free market capitalism and socialism. This has always been the judicial heart of the dispute. The civil courts can judge impartially, case by case, or else they can hand down decisions that consistently reward the poor. They cannot do both. Sider was correct: we must choose which kind of civil justice we want, impartial justice or class justice. He wanted the latter. Unfortunately for his theological position, the Bible demands the former.

ating critique of his book offered by David Chilton in Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1985] 1990). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>). Sider never mentioned Chilton’s work (and about a dozen other free market critics) in his 1984 edition, despite its promise on the cover that it responded to his critics. The 1984 edition disappeared from Christian bookstores in short order, indicating that the Sider fad was over. The first edition of Chilton’s book in 1981 completely destroyed the credibility of Sider’s economic views among conservatives, and the Left later moved to “excommunicate” Sider when he publicly identified homosexuality as a major sin. Caught in the ideological crossfire, he then disappeared from public view except for an occasional interview published in some small-circulation magazine. The 1990 edition of his book was rarely seen in bookstores. In 1997, the fourth edition appeared, in which he abandoned most of the anti-capitalistic rhetoric of the earlier editions. He even adopted some of David Chilton’s views. Still, he failed to mention Chilton’s book, which indicates just how badly it had injured him. By 1997, the Sider fad was over, even for Sider. See North, Inheritance and Dominion, Appendix F: “The Re-Education of Ronald J. Sider.”

23. Sider, Rich Christians, (1977), p. 83.

24. Ibid., p. 84.

F. Two Kinds of Equality

The same inescapable choice confronts all those who proclaim the moral and judicial legitimacy of the goal of equality. Which kind of equality do we want? Free market economist and legal theorist F. A. Hayek made it very clear that we can choose between two kinds of equality, but we cannot gain them both simultaneously. We can pursue equality under the law, or we can pursue equality of economic results, but we cannot rationally pursue both simultaneously. He wrote in 1960: "From the fact that people are very different it follows that, if we treat them equally, the result must be inequality in their actual position, and that the only way to place them in an equal position would be to treat them differently. Equality before the law and material equality are therefore not only different but are in conflict with each other; and we can achieve either the one or the other, but not both at the same time. The equality before the law which freedom requires leads to material inequality."²⁵

The Bible requires equality before the law. The inescapable result of impartial civil justice is economic inequality. This fact is an affront to all socialists and semi-socialists (i.e., defenders of the corporate State).²⁶ They want to redistribute wealth by state compulsion, either through state ownership of the means of production (socialism) or through adjusting the incentives of the economy, even though legal ownership remains with private individuals or organizations (fascism, Nazism, and Keynesianism).²⁷ Always, the socialists focus on the supposed need for specific economic results rather than the need for an impartial declaration of impartial law and the impartial application of predictable sanctions. Therefore, Sider concludes, "the God of the

25. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), p. 87.

26. George Reisman, The Government Against the Economy (Ottawa, Illinois: Caroline House, 1979).

27. The two systems were linked from the beginning. Keynes admitted in his Preface to the 1936 German language edition of his General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money: "The theory of aggregate production, which is the point of the following book, nevertheless can be much easier adapted to the conditions of a totalitarian state than the theory of production and distribution of a given production put forth under the conditions of free competition and a large degree of laissez-faire. This is one of the reasons that justifies the fact that I call my book a general theory." A side-by-side translation of the Preface in the original German edition is found in James J. Martin, Revisionist Viewpoints (Colorado Springs: Ralph Myles Press, 1971), pp. 203, 205. The citation appears in The Collected Writings of John Maynard Keynes (New York: St. Martin's, 1973), VII, p. xxvi.

Bible is on the side of the poor just because he is not biased, for he is a God of impartial justice.”²⁸

Notice what Sider did. He said that God is uniquely on the side of the poor because He is not biased. In other words, God is on the side of the poor because He is a God of impartial justice. Logically, this has to mean that the poor are poor in history because of other people’s unrighteousness. If his statement does not mean this, then the impartial application of biblical law would not consistently reward the poor as a class. But Sider called for judicial impartiality and therefore the redistribution of wealth from the rich to the poor. This means that, in Sider’s universe, the poor are necessarily victims of unjust oppression. This oppression is what makes them poor. Therefore, “Salvation for the rich will include liberation from their injustice.”²⁹ He equates “the rich” with “injustice.”³⁰

This perspective on poverty is basic to all socialist thought. The socialist blames poverty on the capitalist system, not on scarcity and not on immoral behavior on the part of the poor. The phrases that Sider and his colleagues used again and again are “structural injustice”³¹ and “structural evil,”³² meaning unjust institutions. It is therefore not cursed mankind (Gen. 3:16–17) and cursed nature (Gen. 3: 18–19) that bring poverty, the socialist insists.³³ Widespread poverty as a social phenomenon is always explained by capitalism’s critics as the result of unjust institutions that are in turn the product of politically powerful rich men who successfully exploit others. This is a vision of a universe not under a curse, not populated by sinners, and not under God’s judgments in history—factors that would frequently bring

28. Sider, Rich Christians, p. 84.

29. Idem.

30. With no explanation, later in the book he identifies poverty as a “curse” and wealth as “good and desirable.” Ibid., p. 127. Never defining justice as impartial application of biblical law, he then says: “The crucial test is whether the prosperous are obeying God’s command to bring justice to the oppressed.” Ibid., p. 128. This is formally correct, but it is meaningless unless there are standards of civil justice and economic oppression independent of mere wealth or poverty.

31. Ibid., p. 87.

32. Ibid., ch. 6: “Structural Evil & World Hunger.”

33. Mises wrote: “Most social reformers, foremost among them Fourier and Marx, pass over in silence the fact that the nature-given means of removing human uneasiness are scarce. As they see it, the fact that there is not abundance of all useful things is merely caused by the inadequacy of the capitalist mode of production and will therefore disappear in the ‘higher phase’ of communism.” Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 644n. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>) people under the negative sanction of poverty. Proverbs 19:15—another 19:15 verse that is despised by the socialists—tells us: “Slothfulness casteth into a deep sleep; and an idle soul shall suffer hunger.” The socialist discounts this message almost to zero.³⁴

G. Which Poor?

The biblical question is not whether God is on the side of the poor. The question is this: Why is God on the side of some of the poor? The liberation theologians never ask this question. They ought to ask another one, too: Was God on the side of poor people in Egypt when he killed the firstborn sons in all of the Egyptian families? Was God on the side of the Canaanites when He told the Israelites to destroy all of them (Deut. 7:16)? Was God on the side of the poor in Assyria and Babylon when he brought judgment against them: Assyria being destroyed by Babylon, and Babylon being destroyed by the Medo-Persian empire? What about all the poverty-stricken people who came under God’s wrath under the Old Covenant? Above all, what about all the poor who perished in the Noachic Flood? Why was God not on their side? Why didn’t God defend them against His own vengeful hand? Why did God pull down the very waters of the heavens and raise up the oceans against the whole population of mankind if it is true that God is on the side of the poor?

The answer is quite simple: God is not on the side of the poor. God is on the side of the righteous.

Time and again, God brought the poor of Old Covenant Israel under judgment. He brought them under foreign domination by a whole series of invaders, from Phoenicia to Rome. He had no mercy whatsoever for them just because they were poor. Rich and poor alike in Israel were repeatedly brought under judgment: this is the crucial judicial point. It was not that God was on the side of the poor; it was that God was totally opposed to the population of Israel, and later the population of Judah. God was on the side of God. God was on the side of His law and His righteousness. All those who opposed His law and His righteousness by disobedience to His covenant came under His righteous indignation. He did not respect persons. He did not respect classes. He did not respect the social status of anyone. He brought them all under judgment because all but the remnant had rebelled against Him. This included the exploited poor in Israel. When Israel was in rebellion, there is no doubt that rich men exploited poor men, but exploiters and exploited alike went into captivity.

34. So, by the way, did fundamentalist C. I. Scofield, of the Scofield Reference Bible fame. Sider quoted him at the beginning of Chapter 9: “The present social order is the most abject failure the world has ever seen. . . . Governments have never learned yet to so legislate as to distribute the fruits of the industry of their people. The countries of the earth produce enough to support all, and if the earnings of each was fairly distributed it would make all men toil some, but no man toil too much.” Scofield, Our Hope, X (August 1903), pp. 76–77. Scofield, a dedicated defender of the dispensational escape religion, is found to support Sider, a defender of the statist power religion. This should surprise no one; pietism and authoritarianism are usually in an operational alliance against dominion religion. Cf. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 1.

When God speaks of being on the side of the poor, it means that He is on the side of the poor in spirit. Blessed are the poor, Christ promised. Blessed are the meek. But this means poor in spirit and meek before God. It does not mean that poverty-stricken people who are poor because of their own economic or moral mismanagement are going to inherit the kingdom of God. It does not mean that people who are professionally meek are going to inherit the kingdom of God. The text does not say that the wimps shall inherit the kingdom of God; it says that the meek shall inherit, and it always means meek before God and therefore active before men. Wrote radical theologian John C. Raines of Calvin's view of man: "Calvin understood the Christian life not as 'a vessel filled with God' but as an active 'tool and instrument' of the Divine initiative. But this is precisely our point. Active toward the world, the Christian knows himself as utterly passive and obedient toward God, whose Will it is his sole task to discover and obey."³⁵

Covenant-breakers, refusing to become meek before God, cannot indefinitely sustain an active attitude toward the external world. Many Western intellectuals since 1965 have been ready to accept the passivity of pantheism, if not its theological presuppositions. If the Creator God of the Bible is not above the creation, with mankind beneath Him and over the creation, then mankind becomes merely part of the creation, without a meaningful appeal beyond it. This leads to passivity in the face of the creation. The "deep ecology" movement is evidence of this trend from humanistic activism to passivity. Deep ecology theory places man under the dominion of nature.³⁶ For example, forest fires caused by non-human events are supposed to be left alone and allowed to burn themselves out, since they are natural phenomena. Fire fighting is not natural. The long-popular American government cartoon figure, Smokey Bear, is not appreciated by deep ecologists. Smokey's slogan, "Only you can prevent forest fires," is the essence of ecological activism, which deep ecologists reject except insofar as it can be used as a justification for mandatory human population control by the state: fewer people to start unnatural forest fires. The United States National Park Service adopted a let-burn policy in 1987. It led in 1988 to the disastrous million-acre fire at Yellowstone National Park: almost half the park. Yellowstone was the world's first national park (1872). From 1972 to 1987, only 34,000 acres had burned. By the time the National Park Service reversed its let-burn policy, after one month of fires (late June through late July), it was too late. The Park Service's prediction of August rains did not come true. The fires raged out of control until September 10, when it rained. They cost $120 million to fight. But the Park Service seems to have persuaded the American press that its let-burn policy is sound ecological science.³⁷

35. John C. Raines, "From Passive to Active Man: Reflections on the Revolution in Consciousness of Modern Man," in Marxism and Radical Religion: Essays Toward a Revolutionary Humanism, eds. John C. Raines and Thomas Dean (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1970), p. 114.

36. For a non-scientist's defense of "deep ecology," see Bill McKibben, The End of Nature (New York: Random House, 1989).

H. The Rich

Is God on the side of the rich? Consider this: God promises great blessings of wealth and prosperity to those who are covenantally faithful, but warns them not to forget Him, "Lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein; And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied; Then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the LORD thy God, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage" (Deut. 8:12–14).³⁸ God does the same in Proverbs 11:28: "He that trusteth in his riches shall fall: but the righteous shall flourish as a branch."

The Bible's picture of God's blessings in history to those who are covenantally faithful is a picture of widespread prosperity. The idea of being covenantally faithful is connected covenantally to the idea of getting rich. This does not mean that every covenantally faithful person does get rich in history, because there are covenantally unfaithful people who from time to time are allowed by God to become oppressors: "All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that prolongeth his life in his wickedness" (Eccl. 7:15). This is true when covenantally faithful people are a tiny minority in a society that is overwhelmingly perverse. The best example of that in Scripture is the family of Lot. Lot was vexed (II Peter 2:7) because he was living in a society that was covenantally rebellious. God removed him from that society and immediately brought total historic judgment against that society. But God favors wealth; He does not favor poverty. God favors the wealthy if they are wealthy because of their previous righteousness—righteousness being defined as living in conformity to God's Bible-revealed law. God favors the triumph of the righteous in history, and part of this triumph is their accumulation of wealth. The Bible says specifically that the wealth of the wicked is laid up for the just (Prov. 13:22b).³⁹ Wealth is not laid up for the poor; it is laid up for the just. The wealth of the wicked is going to be removed from them because of their wickedness, and transferred to the just. The poor in spirit and the meek before God will inherit the earth.

37. Micah Morrison, Fire in Paradise: The Yellowstone Fires and the Politics of Environmentalism (New York: Morrow, 1993). The United States Forest Service, a rival bureaucracy, wanted to fight the fires.

38. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 21.

I. The Middle Class

Is God on the side of the middle class? That is to say: Is middle class income God's economic goal for most people throughout history? Yes. Most people should pray Solomon's recommended prayer: "Remove far from me vanity and lies: give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain" (Prov. 30:8–9). Most individuals are supposed to strive for conventional comforts, but not for great wealth. Individuals are also to do what they can to stay out of poverty. This indicates that there will always be conventional standards of wealth and poverty. This also indicates that there will always be the rich and the poor. Normal Christians are supposed to strive to be in the middle so as to become defenders of righteousness, and not be tempted to do evil either as rich men or poor men. Like any other quest for special blessings from God, the quest for wealth is not to be attempted for its own sake. We are to seek first God's kingdom, and all these things will be added unto us (Matt. 6:33). This refers primarily to covenantal blessings corporately experienced.

39. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 41.

1. Corporate Blessings

This doctrine of progressive corporate sanctification and its resultant corporate blessings is why Christians should strive mightily to live in the midst of an increasingly wealthy society that is enjoying the compound external blessings of God because of the progressive economic sanctification of the vast majority of at least its employed members—a sanctification forced on them by intense worldwide competition. A stock market investment proverb says, “A rising tide raises all ships,” i.e., an individual stock will go up in value when all stocks do. Middle-class people get richer over time in an era of collective blessings. They do not need the best things in life in order to regard themselves as blessed. Economic growth is a valid biblical goal. We should not forget that prior to the rise of Puritanism in late sixteenth-century England, with its defense of biblical law and covenantal postmillennial eschatology, no civilization had ever adopted a doctrine of long-term economic growth. Long-term economic growth was not believed to be possible.

The middle-class orientation of the Bible therefore does not mean that there should not be rising wealth for most or even all members of society. Certainly in the late twentieth century, poor people in the West were far richer in goods than the vast majority of kings ever were in the history of man. This is especially true if the king contracted a disease like cholera.⁴⁰ The advancement of twentieth-century public health programs is the best testimony to the wealth of the poorest man in a rich, blessed, formerly covenantally faithful nation.⁴¹ Falling infant

40. Peru, which experienced an outbreak of cholera in 1991, was also the victim of the Shining Path Marxist guerrillas, massive socialist intervention, bureaucratic corruption, and widespread addiction to the coca leaf. It is a poor nation because its people are committed to ethical rebellion. Only after 1991 was there a reversal in Peru. Fujimori, a candidate supported by Christian evangelicals, won the presidential election and began freeing up the economy.

41. Public health programs are part of the state's lawful authority to resist invaders: bacteria, germs, and so forth. The state is a defensive agency authorized by God to bring negative sanctions against invaders. The bacteria do not honor household boundaries. They must be placed under quarantine—if necessary, by placing their carriers under quarantine: a biblically legitimate action of the civil magistrate (Lev. 13, 14). The invaders must be thwarted by collective action. Man's war against the mosquito is a representative example. It takes a co-ordinated campaign analogous to a military campaign to reduce the threat of mosquito-borne diseases. Gordon Harrison, Mosquitos, Malaria, and Man: A History of the Hostilities Since 1880 (New York: Dutton, 1978), chaps. 15–27. The only absolute victory over a disease of man has been the eradication of smallpox in the 1970s, whose microscopic agents now exist only in a few laboratories. Public health programs are not the same as socialized medicine, which involves the mortality rates are the single best sign of God's blessing today. Most newborn babies are expected to live long enough to become adults; two centuries ago, they were not. Similarly, kings before 1846 did not have anesthetics during surgery. Who today would trade places with one of them when the surgeon wields his scalpel? Kings did have treasuries of gold and silver, meaning shiny pieces of metal that might buy them some extra time in a crisis or extra food in a famine. But very wealthy people were always at risk. There could be famine, plague, fire, flooding, and the general burdens of life prior to the industrial revolution. Kings and oligarchs did not have television to entertain them, inexpensive books to inform them, video disks or other digital technologies to record images of their children to view in their old age, or any of the myriad of benefits that the poor can buy today. Consider what this would have been worth to almost anyone on the face of the earth as recently as the late nineteenth century. What a king's ransom would have been available to the person who could go into a household for just one day to record the activities of that household: a permanent electronic memory for the wealthy. Gold? Silver? Lots of it. Shiny pieces of metal in exchange for permanent electronic memories? What rich person wouldn't have traded?

The biblical economic ideal is middle-class prosperity for individuals and a rising standard of living for all. This ideal is always limited to individuals who are actively seeking the will of God and obeying it. As they become more competent, as they become better judges, as they become more economically productive, they are expected by God to get richer. The Bible tells us that through corporate covenantal faithfulness, society's technical knowledge and therefore its wealth can and should produce a rising tide of per capita prosperity. By breaking God's covenant, society smashes the cornucopia. But this may not be visible overnight: "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil" (Eccl. 8:11).

2. Avoiding Spiritually Unnecessary Temptations

The Bible is clear: there are great temptations associated with both wealth and poverty, and the righteous man should strive to remain in the middle of these two conditions, so that he does not subject himself to extensive temptation. The Bible affirms middle-class morality, state's distributing of positive sanctions to some individuals at the expense of others.

middle-class values, and middle-class income. These standards have long been openly ridiculed by humanist intellectuals. This is ironic, given the middle-class origins of most intellectuals. Liberation theologians were especially contemptuous of the middle-class morality of most evangelical Christians. That was one of the anomalies of late twentieth-century “Christian” thought.

The average Christian is to pray for middle-class status precisely because he is average. He is average in terms of productivity; he is average in terms of his ethical conformity to God’s law; and he is average in terms of his earthly expectations. He probably does not want to pay the price of great wealth, either an ethical payment or a payment in terms of great wealth’s high costs of added responsibility. He does not want to become an over-achiever precisely because he does not want to pay the price of becoming an over-achiever. He recognizes the truth Jesus proclaimed: “For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more” (Luke 12:48b).⁴²

What is true of wealth is equally true of every other area of performance and reward. For example, the classroom instructor should not encourage all of his students to earn a straight-A average. Few students can achieve this, few should achieve this, and few will achieve this.⁴³ There is no reason to encourage frustration by calling all students to strive for comparative perfection. All students are nevertheless required by God to strive to raise their individual performance at the margin. If obeyed, this command will raise the average level of the group’s performance, even though fewer than half of them can beat the class average. Like runners in a race, only one person can come in first, but all of them may be capable of beating the previous record.⁴⁴

The general principle is this: we are to strive to become profitable servants, even though sinful men can never become profitable (net)

42. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

43. It is possible, however. If the test is graded numerically so that the student with the highest score (say, 100 points) gets an A, and an arbitrary percentage of this score is defined as failure (say, 60% or below, i.e., 60 points), and the difference (40 points) is divided up in equal portions (10 points per grade, A through D), every student could receive an A if each scores higher than 90 points. This is the grading system I adopted when I taught. I learned it from my high school civics teacher, Wayne Roy.

44. A few weeks after I wrote the original draft of this chapter, this happened at the 1991 world track and field championships in Tokyo. At age 30, Carl Lewis broke the world record in the 100-meter dash, and the runner-up also broke the old record, which he had set three months earlier. (<http://bit.ly/LewisBurrell>) servants in history. The principle of the division of labor determines that some people will be better at some things than most other people (Rom. 12:4–8;⁴⁵ I Cor. 12⁴⁶). There will be winners and losers in every competition. Nevertheless, as individuals and also as a covenantal corporate unit, Christians are to strive for mastery over sin and mediocrity.

J. The Righteous

God is on the side of the righteous. There are few principles in the Bible that are of greater judicial and economic importance. In verse after verse, book after book, the Bible testifies to the fact that God is on the side of the righteous. I reproduce a long list of supporting verses in the hope that readers will acknowledge the extent of God's commitment to the righteous. Both amillennialism and premillennialism deny the relevance of these verses as they apply to history.⁴⁷ But these verses do apply to history: "Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth: much more the wicked and the sinner" (Prov. 11:31). There are dozens of these verses, all ignored by liberation theologians. I have decided to cite many of them in order to make my point and also to maintain Ronald Sider's silence. (My favorite is Psalm 58:10, although I do not interpret it literally. It is the thought that counts.) Read them all, so as to drill the basic point into your ethical decision-making: there are predictable covenantal sanctions in history.

And Abraham drew near, and said, Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city: wilt thou also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein? That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked: and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from thee: Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? And the LORD said, If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then I will spare all the place for their sakes (Gen. 18:23–26).

Keep thee far from a false matter; and the innocent and righteous slay thou not: for I will not justify the wicked. And thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the

45. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 9.

46. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of First Corinthians (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

47. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 6.

righteous (Ex. 23:7–8).

If there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgment, that the judges may judge them; then they shall justify the righteous, and condemn the wicked (Deut. 25:1).

Then hear thou in heaven, and do, and judge thy servants, condemning the wicked, to bring his way upon his head; and justifying the righteous, to give him according to his righteousness (I Kings 8:32).

Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous. For the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish (Ps. 1:5–6).

For thou, LORD, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield (Ps. 5:12).

The eyes of the LORD are upon the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry (Ps. 34:15).

The righteous cry, and the LORD heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles (Ps. 34:17).

Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the LORD delivereth him out of them all (Ps. 34:19).

For the arms of the wicked shall be broken: but the LORD upholdeth the righteous (Ps. 37:17).

I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread (Ps. 37:25).

The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever (Ps. 37:29).

But the salvation of the righteous is of the LORD: he is their strength in the time of trouble (Ps. 37:39).

Cast thy burden upon the LORD, and he shall sustain thee: he shall never suffer the righteous to be moved (Ps. 55:22).

The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance: he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked (Ps. 58:10).

So that a man shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous: verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth (Ps. 58:11).

The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree: he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon (Ps. 92:12).

Surely he shall not be moved for ever: the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance (Ps. 112:6).

The LORD openeth the eyes of the blind: the LORD raiseth them that are bowed down: the LORD loveth the righteous (Ps. 146:8).

He layeth up sound wisdom for the righteous: he is a buckler to them that walk uprightly (Prov. 2:7).

The LORD will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish: but he casteth away the substance of the wicked (Prov. 10:3).

The hope of the righteous shall be gladness: but the expectation of the wicked shall perish (Prov. 10:28).

The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead (Prov. 11:8).

When it goeth well with the righteous, the city rejoiceth: and when the wicked perish, there is shouting (Prov. 11:10).

Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished: but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered (Prov. 11:21).

He that trusteth in his riches shall fall: but the righteous shall flourish as a branch (Prov. 11:28).

The wicked are overthrown, and are not: but the house of the righteous shall stand (Prov. 12:7).

The light of the righteous rejoiceth: but the lamp of the wicked shall be put out (Prov. 13:9).

Evil pursueth sinners: but to the righteous good shall be repayed (Prov. 13:21).

The righteous eateth to the satisfying of his soul: but the belly of the wicked shall want (Prov. 13:25).

The evil bow before the good; and the wicked at the gates of the righteous (Prov. 14:19).

In the house of the righteous is much treasure: but in the revenues of the wicked is trouble (Prov. 15:6).

The LORD is far from the wicked: but he heareth the prayer of the righteous (Prov. 15:29).

The wicked flee when no man pursueth: but the righteous are bold as a lion (Prov. 28:1).

When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice: but when the wicked beareth rule, the people mourn (Prov. 29:2).

When the wicked are multiplied, transgression increaseth: but the righteous shall see their fall (Prov. 29:16).

There is no escape from this conclusion; the texts are clear: God is on the side of the righteous as such, not the poor as such. Why should God be on the side of the righteous? Because He announced to His people: "For I am the LORD that bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy" (Lev. 11:45). Holiness is the same as righteousness. God is righteous; so, His people should be righteous. God is righteous; so, He brings blessings in history to His people who are righteous. God is righteous; so, He brings negative sanctions against those who are not righteous. God is righteous; so, some people are deservedly poor. This is what the social-ist does not want to consider.

For centuries in the West, Christian theology was manifested in civic poor laws that distinguished between what was known as the deserving poor and the undeserving poor.⁴⁸ There were some people who were poor, not through their own fault, but through external circumstances. For example, one of the great economic threats to man has been fire. Without fire insurance, an eighteenth-century invention, a fire could reduce a rich man to absolute poverty in an evening. Such a victim would have been regarded, other things being equal, as a member of the deserving poor. Such people deserved better, and society was required by God to treat them better, but for the moment they were poor.

The deserving poor who deserved aid were always contrasted with the undeserving poor. It was well understood by Christians throughout history that some people deserve to be poor. In fact, some people deserve death. God, however, in his mercy sometimes allows people who are deserving of death to suffer poverty instead. He gives them more time, but He does not give them extensive positive blessings. Every society understands this. Every theologian when pressed would probably admit this, but there is a question of emphasis. The liberation theologians almost never talk about the undeserving poor, i.e., those who do not deserve open-ended assistance because to give them assistance would be to subsidize evil. The liberationists almost never talk about the fact that a righteous society must bring economic sanctions against its unproductive members. They do not talk about the fact that a society that is totally equal economically would be the most unrighteous possible society. Such a society could only be established by means of coercive wealth distribution from the productive rich to the deservedly poor.

48. Brian Tierney, "The Decretists and the 'Deserving Poor,'" Comparative Studies in Society and History, I (1959), pp. 360–73. Cf. Tierney, Medieval Poor Law: A Sketch of Canonical Authority and Its Application in England (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959), p. 52. This view also was basic to Puritanism. Michael Walzer, The Revolution of the Saints (New York: Atheneum [1965] 1968), p. 217.

Then what of the poor? In a godly society, there should not be a vast horde of poor people. As a society progresses in its covenantal faithfulness to God, the total wealth of a society is expected to increase. God brings His covenantal judgments in a positive fashion in history: the blessings outnumber the curses most of the time. History moves forward. Mankind is given ever-increasing supplies of capital in order to subdue the earth. As this capital growth process takes place, per capita wealth increases. Nevertheless, there will always be people who fall into the lowest third of national income. The only way that we could escape from this in history would be if hell were a society based on equality. If hell brought equal negative sanctions to everyone inside its boundaries, it might be theoretically possible to speak of an egalitarian society in history. If all sins were equal in God's eyes, and if sanctions were equally applied, then equality in hell would be a reality. Yet, even in hell, there is no equality (Luke 12:47–48).⁴⁹ Clearly, there is no equality in heaven (I Cor. 3:8–15).⁵⁰ So, the ideal of the equality of results is entirely mythical. It is a lie of the devil, who understandably wishes it were true.

K. Sanctions and Inequality

Because God does not respect persons, He rewards and punishes people in terms of their actions and thoughts in history. He rewards individuals in time and eternity in terms of their conformity to His law. He rewards societies in terms of their outward conformity to His law. He brings positive and negative sanctions in history. Therefore,

49. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

50. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

there is no aspect of God's creation that displays equality of results. There is no area of God's final judgment that displays inequality of judgment before the law.

1. Impartiality and Inequality

The impartiality of God leads to disparities of rewards. Those who achieve a great deal are given great rewards. Those who achieve average results are given average rewards. Those who achieve below-average results receive below-average rewards. Those who are out of covenantal favor with God are said to have nothing, and what they have is taken away from them (Matt. 13:12).⁵¹ That is to say, they are cast out of the presence of God and tortured eternally without mercy.⁵² But they are not tortured equally (Luke 12: 47–48).⁵³

Inequality of results is an inescapable outcome of the inequality of men's productivity, given the existence of impartial justice. Put another way, impartial justice—justice that does not bring sanctions or evaluate public actions in terms of a person's economic status or legal status—inevitably produces inequality of economic results. When the judge imposes double restitution on the criminal, he inescapably creates inequality of economic results. This is exactly what God does in history. When God brings His judgment into history, there will be unequal economic results.

It is basic to the socialist perspective of all liberation theologians to deny this principle. They seek equality of results, and therefore they inescapably recommend policies that are a flat denial of the biblical principle of impartiality of justice. Liberation theology is a self-conscious rebellion against Leviticus 19:15. Its defenders seek to confuse their followers and their readers on this point. Impartial justice that is applied in a world made up of people with differing capacities and differing degrees of righteousness will inevitably produce inequality of economic results. It is this outcome of biblical law which enrages and outrages almost all modern Christian theologians, especially those who are either neo-evangelical college professors (outside of the natural sciences) or liberation theologians. They call for the state to use the threat of violence to steal the wealth of the successful and transfer it to the unsuccessful. They call for socialism: the state's control over resources through bureaucracy. They prefer the political sanctions of bureaucrats to the economic sanctions of consumers.

51. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 27.

52. Those Christians who are squeamish about the word "torture" may prefer to substitute the word "torment." See Matthew 18:34 and Luke 16:24.

53. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

2. Politically Correct Thought

There is a socialist-approved exception to this socialist ideology of equality of results, however: the classroom. Marxists, feminists, and assorted Left-wing ideologues teach in colleges and seminaries. They are lawfully sanctioned classroom tyrants who hand out sanctions: grades. Any student who challenges their heretical or apostate theology is risking a D, an F, or even dismissal from the campus.

Imitating their secular peers, theological liberals have hired and fired faculty members for generations in terms of this principle: no professor is to suggest that biblical law should be enforced. They have screened the entire Christian academic community in terms of this principle. They impose vengeance: sanctions without mercy. They have sought to establish entire faculties that do not deviate from humanism's party line. To achieve this, they have imposed inequality of standards and have produced unequal results: students who are coerced for ideological reasons and fellow faculty members who are humiliated into silence. This same policy went on without an institutionally significant challenge in secular institutions until 1990.⁵⁴ It is today difficult to find an American institution of higher education that mandates that the Bible be used to judge the both the content and structure of every academic discipline. Some would say it is impossible. It was impossible yesterday, too—all the way back to the University of Paris in the twelfth century.

The law of God testifies against the legitimacy of any society that seeks the equality of results. God's law testifies against any society that uses the power of the civil government to redistribute wealth on any basis except one: the proportional restitution payment from a criminal to his victim.

54. Charles J. Sykes, Profscam: Professors and the Higher Education Game (Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1988). Regnery, a small conservative publishing firm, had no influence, nor did Sykes' brilliant book. After the collapse of Communism in 1989 came Roger Kimball, Tenured Radicals: How Politics Has Corrupted Our Higher Education (New York: Harper & Row, 1990); Page Smith, Killing the Spirit: Higher Education in America (New York: Viking, 1990); Dinesh D'Souza, Illiberal Education: The Politics of Race and Sex on Campus (New York: Free Press, 1991). These books were published by major publishers.

The Bible is quite clear. There must be no respect of persons. Because individuals have different abilities, there must be inequality of economic results if God's law is enforced without respect of persons. The only justification for the state to intervene to take wealth from one individual and give it to another individual is that the first individual has been convicted in a civil court due process of law for having committed a crime against the second individual. The quest for restitution for a specific crime or broken contract is the only legitimate way for an individual to seek the economic intervention of the state against another individual.

In contrast to this principle of civil justice is the socialist ideal: the equality of economic results. This equality is pursued by using civil power to take wealth from those who have legally gained it through competition in a market with open entry, and to redistribute it to those who have done nothing to receive it other than being statistically classified as poor. Nevertheless, the poor are still with us. So is a growing horde of middle-class bureaucrats who administer the government-mandated anti-poverty programs. The United States' Federal bureaucracy extracts as administration expenses at least half of the Federal government's total expenditures on welfare programs.⁵⁵ This is why there is an entrenched high-income voting bloc in support of these programs, despite the taxes required to pay for them.

Formally educated, state-certified members of the middle class staff the state's wealth-redistribution system, which vastly increases their wealth and status at the expense of both the rich and the poor. The welfare state has been the great rewarder of middle-class and upper-middle-class people who have gained access to those government positions involved in the welfare distribution process. In a perverse way, these people have sought the middle-class position that the Bible says that the average person should pray for, but these people have not prayed; they have preyed. They have preyed on the rich; they have preyed on the poor. They have kept the rich in a position of permanent anxiety about taxation, and they have kept the poor in permanent status as poor, with almost no hope of escaping the clutches of the welfare system.⁵⁶ Yet this system is defended (with the obligatory "it is admittedly unfortunate that. . .") by the vast majority of Christian academics in the late twentieth century, all in the name of biblical theology. Sometimes, as in the case of Ronald Sider, it is even defended in the name of Leviticus 19:15.

55. James L. Payne, The Culture of Spending: Why Congress Lives Beyond Our Means (San Francisco: ICS Press, 1991), p. 51.

56. Charles Murray, Losing Ground: American Social Policy, 1950-1980 (New York: Basic Books, 1984).

L. The Rejection of Biblical Economic Blueprints

The biblical standard of civil justice is simple to state: one law-order for all men, with judges acting impartially to apply God's revealed laws to specific cases. The judicial principle is this: "No respect for persons."

1. The Bible vs. Socialism

With this as the judicial standard, it is impossible to obey God's law and simultaneously promote the idea of socialism. The socialist ideal is a society that manifests economic equality apart from market performance: the satisfaction of consumers. The socialist state's ideal is to enforce a wealth transfer from the rich to the poor, with the poor formally represented by the state. The owners of capital are to be forced by the state to give up either ownership (socialism) or control (fascism) of the tools of production: land, labor, and capital.

The socialist aims at equality of economic results. The Bible insists on equality before God's law. The two standards cannot be reconciled. To enforce the law impartially in a world filled with people who possess different goals, talents, and capital is to make impossible the equality of economic results. The socialists' economic ideal and the Bible's judicial ideal are irreconcilable. This is why Christian socialists and economic interventionists categorically reject biblical law. They deny that the Bible offers blueprints for economics. They deny that it offers permanent economic or political models. They insist that the Bible is open-ended with respect to economics, making the Bible useless as a guide to political economy. They do this because the Bible very clearly establishes principles of legal order that outlaw all forms of socialism, and the critics hate free market capitalism. So, they make statements such as these:

[Keynesian:] The fact that our Scriptures can be used to support or condemn any economic philosophy suggests that the Bible is not intended to lay out an economic plan which will apply for all times and places. If we are to examine economic structures in the light of

Christian teachings, we will have to do it in another way.⁵⁷

[Communal socialist:] Since koinonia includes the participation of everyone involved, there is no blueprint for what this would look like on a global scale. . . . We are talking about a process, not final answers.⁵⁸

[Socialist:] There is in Scripture no blueprint of the ideal state or the ideal economy. We cannot turn to chapters of the Bible and find in them a model to copy or a plan for building the ideal biblical state and national economy.⁵⁹

The goal is equality of economic results: “Championing the cause of the poor will lead us to labor for justice and a greater degree of equality for all people.”⁶⁰ Notice his language: “all people”—righteous and unrighteous, workers and drones, wise and foolish, Christians and atheists, and above all, covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. This is Satan’s initial lure: equality for all. And then, when his covenantal disciples gain control, Christians discover the truth: the systematic oppression of covenant-keepers by covenant-breakers. It is a replay of the creation of government-funded day schools that were promoted in the United States by Unitarian radicals from the 1830s onward. These schools initially were defended on the principle of “equal time for all views.”⁶¹ What we subsequently found was the institutional triumph of the religion of autonomous man: no time for Jesus.

It is always the same with the advocates of “no biblical blueprints.” First, they tell us: “The Bible does not require free enterprise.” We then ask these anti-blueprint Christian socialists: “Then does the Bible at least allow free enterprise?” Their answer is immediate: “No; never the free market. Something else; anything else; but never the free market.” So, the Bible apparently does provide an anti-blueprint: no free market.

The problem is, the handful of Christian scholars who write against socialism generally refuse to defend their opposition in terms

57. William E. Diehl, “The Guided-Market System,” in Robert G. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: Intervarsity Press, 1984), p. 87. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

58. Art Gish, “Decentralist Economics,” ibid., p. 154.

59. John Gladwin, “Centralist Economics,” ibid., p. 183.

60. Robert G. Clouse, “Postscript,” ibid., p. 224.

61. R. J. Rushdoony, The Messianic Character of American Education: Studies in the History and Philosophy of Education (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1963]).

of the Bible. They rely on atheistic and agnostic free market economists to carry their water in their refutations of the writings of atheistic and agnostic socialist economists, whose works the Christian socialists have cited (if any) in search of academic support. Thus, we find Reformed Theological Seminary professor Ronald Nash (a follower of Calvinist philosopher Gordon Clark) defending the familiar academic party line of epistemological neutrality:

This book is not an attempt to produce a system of Christian economics. There is no such thing as revealed economics. There is no such thing as positive Christian economics.⁶²

Attempts to deduce any political or economic doctrine from the Bible should be viewed, initially at least, with skepticism. After all, the Bible is no more a textbook on economics than it is on astrology or geology. There is no such thing as revealed economics.⁶³

If the Bible really is not a textbook for economics and politics, and if there really is no such thing as Bible-revealed economics, then all attempts to deduce political and economic doctrines from the Bible must be met with something more than mere initial skepticism. Such attempts should be met automatically with a full-scale frontal assault, i.e., total rejection, not to mention outrage. After all, such deductions are inescapably heretical if it is true that the Bible does not reveal morally and academically binding principles of economics. Dr. Nash was altogether too wishy-washy. It was not sufficient for him to dismiss The Other Side, Sojourners, InterVarsity Press, and William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company in a chapter called "The Christian War Against Economics."⁶⁴ He should also forthrightly have led his assembled academic troops in a second campaign: "The War Against Christian Economics." He should have faced the fact that he was conducting a two-front war: the Evangelicals for Social Action on his left; the Institute for Christian Economics on his right. It was time for him to prove, argument by argument and verse by verse, why the works of the Institute for Christian Economics are at best misguided and at worst heretical. He has to show why Bahnsen's Theonomy in Christian Ethics is wrong and Volume 1 of Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law is worse.

62. Ronald Nash, Poverty and Wealth (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1986), p. 12. Reprinted by Probe Books, Richardson, Texas.

63. Ibid., p. 59.

64. Ibid., ch. 1.

Here is a secondary question: How are Christians to defend the six-day creation from the evolutionists if the Bible does not provide the authoritative revelational foundation for textbooks on geology and biology? Also, what about sociology, education, and every other social science? Is the Bible's revelation regarding God, man, law, causation, and time not authoritative? This self-conscious denial of the existence of biblical blueprints is inescapably a surrender to the covenant-breaker in every area of academic life. But those Christians who wish to teach in tax-funded state universities, as Nash did through most of his career as a professor of philosophy and religion at Western Kentucky University, or in private secular humanist universities face a painful choice: (1) reject the suggestion that the Bible provides authoritative blueprints as well as content for their chosen academic discipline; (2) devote their lives to teaching in class what they do not believe is true: officially neutral, and therefore anti-biblical, courses; (3) get fired for teaching religious dogma. Needless to say, the first decision is the path of least resistance. Those who take it can retain their academic respectability as well as their paychecks. This is exactly what the secularists pay them to do, and they do it remarkably well. Even when they leave the employment of the state, they rarely recant their earlier academic presuppositions.

2. Blueprints: An Inescapable Concept

Blueprints are an inescapable concept. It is never a question of "blueprints vs. no blueprints." It is always a question of whose blueprints. Blueprints establish boundaries. They include and therefore must also exclude. Rival systems of law and economics are excluded by blueprints. There has to be a blueprint. This is why there is a biblical economic blueprint.⁶⁵ Either this blueprint excludes the various forms of socialism or else it includes socialism and excludes the free market. There is no halfway house in between, no permanently mixed economy. There are biblical economics and biblical civil justice, and there are all the other covenant-breaking rival positions.

3. Christian Professors vs. the Bible

This assertion is rejected almost automatically by the vast majority of Christians who hold teaching positions as economists in secular institutions. Typical are the arguments of Ian Smith, a lecturer in economics at St. Salvator's College in St. Andrews University in Scotland. In a Festschrift to Carl F. H. Henry, America's leading neo-evangelical social theologian after 1945, Smith surveyed various attempts by non-theonomic Christian economists to present a Christian alternative to secular economics. He found all such attempts "rather limited" and "pedestrian." He continued: "Perhaps this is inevitable. The Bible does not furnish us with specific and authoritative economic models that can be directly applied to contemporary society. Some authors have disputed this observation and sought to devise a biblical economics based on the Old Testament law. However, a reliance on the Mosaic legislation to provide a blueprint for reconstructing the modern economy is theologically dubious and culturally anachronistic."⁶⁶ The idea of a biblical blueprint was anathema to him. ("Anathema," of course, is far too judicial a word for such men to employ. It implies permanent negative sanctions.)

65. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

Without so much as a footnote to even one book by a theonomist, he dismissed "Rushdooney" (misspelled), North, and Bahnsen.⁶⁷ He admitted that "The Pentateuch is also the richest biblical resource in terms of economic content. . . ." He also admitted that "Much more detailed and precise analyses and proposals have been forthcoming from the theonomists than from other Christian camps."⁶⁸ But he nevertheless dismisses theonomy as misguided. He spoke representatively for the whole of the modern Christian academic world: "The corollary of this position that I am affirming is that none of the Mosaic legislation per se is binding as independent lex. New covenant believers are not obliged to obey it, not one jot or tittle; on the other hand, they do fulfill it by living in conformity with the new covenant to which the old covenant points. In short, Christians live under the stipulations of the New Testament and interpret the Old christologically."⁶⁹

Having dismissed the entire Old Testament as judicially non-binding, he then concluded that Christian economics is "perhaps" inevitably pedestrian. In short, having stripped Christianity of its binding legal content, he then found Christian economics pedestrian. He was like a man who first removes all the black marbles from an urn filled 66. Ian Smith, "God and Economics," in God and Culture: Essays in Honor of Carl F. H. Henry, eds. D. A. Carson and John D. Woodbridge (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1993), p. 178.

67. Ibid., p. 176.

68. Idem.

69. Ibid., p. 177.

with black and white marbles, and then discovers that all the marbles are boringly white. Christian academics prefer pedestrian academic alternatives to contemporary humanism. This way, they can continue in good conscience to receive their above-market, taxpayer-subsidized paychecks from state universities. They can continue to be members in good standing of covenant-breaking secular faculties. They can continue to sell their birthrights for a mess of tenure.

Nevertheless, in order also to maintain their good standing in evangelical local congregations, they rush to affirm their verbal commitment—a highly deceptive commitment—to the Old Testament. Smith wrote: “However, this does not preclude studying the Old Testament social system as a rich ethical resource, so long as it is not appealed to as normative—that is, divinely ordained as authoritative for today.”⁷⁰ He could as easily have appealed to the Koran or the Talmud as a “rich ethical resource.” This is cafeteria ethics: you select whatever you like and leave the rest behind. Smith’s verbally gushing praise for God’s supposedly non-binding revealed word was a polite way of saying, “If I were unmarried, I could commit bestiality if I felt like it, since there’s no New Testament law prohibiting it.” Such Christian scholars are quite willing to defend the economics of perversion in the name of Jesus. Their name is legion.

4. The Economics of Perversion

The existence of biblical economic blueprints is loudly denied by Douglas Vickers, a Keynesian economist and defender of the “mixed economy” who has presented his case against Christian economics in the name of the Bible and Cornelius Van Til’s presuppositional apologetics. In his secular calling, Vickers wrote a post-Keynesian money and banking textbook.⁷¹ His two Christian economics books are open in their rejection of the continuing validity of Mosaic law, including the Bible’s economic laws. He is consistent when he rejects: (1) the ideal of a judicial theocracy,⁷² (2) the ideal of the possibility of reconstructing society along biblical lines,⁷³ (3) the ideal of a free market

70. Ibid., p. 178.

71. Douglas Vickers, Money, Banking, and the Macroeconomy (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1985).

72. “. . . Christian economics cannot proceed as though it was in some sense legislating for the economic structure of a theocracy.” Douglas Vickers, Economics and Man: Prelude to a Christian Critique (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1976), p. 73.

73. “It is accordingly improper to speak of the fact or the possibility of a Christian society. For society at large is apostate, inherently and structurally pagan.” Ibid., p. 363.

economic order,⁷⁴ and then proclaims as the Christian economic standard an even greater extension of the range of state economic intervention than is promoted by the twentieth century's principle of the mixed economy.⁷⁵ Vickers acknowledged that the Mosaic economy stands against the graduated income tax system of the modern world. His response was to reject the ideal of the Mosaic economy. "If, of course, we were legislating for an ideal society, or, again, for a theocratic order of an earlier kind, then a strictly proportional tax, such as the tithe, would probably be all that would be required."⁷⁶ He regarded John Maynard Keynes, the homosexual Cambridge economist (B.A., mathematics; no Ph.D.), whose General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money (1936) established the overwhelmingly dominant economic outlook of the modern era, as having "brought something of morality back into economics."⁷⁷ Dr. Vickers was a believer in the economics of perversion.⁷⁸ So are most of his fellow Christian academics in the social sciences. This is why they are adamant: no biblical law! Biblical law precludes socialism, fascism, and the Keynesian mixed economy.

M. Legislating Morality

Are Christians required by God to oppose socialism in all forms? Yes. Are they then required to pressure the state to pass civil laws that sanction private property? Yes. Are they morally required to elect political representatives who then repeal all laws that restrict the use of private property except in cases that the Bible prohibits specific uses

74. "But there has been, nevertheless, throughout the nineteenth century and down to the present time, notwithstanding the historical testimony of the debacles of slump and inflation and depression and boom, a yearning for the intellectual simplicities of the laissez-faire theory, and for an espousal of the economic proposition that that government governs best which governs least." Ibid., pp. 349–50.

75. "In the outcome, we have seen that a Christian perspective on the economic problem will necessarily fragment into a number of operational objectives in the kind of mixed capitalist economies with which we are familiar in the Western democracies. And we have seen, without recapitulating any detail at all at this point, that it is possible to set against these operational objectives a range, a wider range than might initially have been imagined, of legitimate economic policy instruments and options." Ibid., p. 352.

76. Ibid., p. 319.

77. Ibid., p. 350.

78. Ian Hodge, Baptized Inflation: A Critique of "Christian" Keynesianism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/HodgeBap>). This is a detailed critique of Vickers by a non-economist who, unlike Vickers, understands free market economics.

(e.g., homosexual prostitution and pedophilia)? Yes. Does this mean that Christians are required to legislate morality?⁷⁹ In the sense that they are to legislate against certain forms of public immorality, yes. There is only one alternative to legislating morality: legislating immorality. But doesn't this mean the establishment of religion? Yes. All civil legislation is the establishment of some religion. Thus, the Bible requires this legislation to be explicitly biblical: Old and New Testaments. Every nation is required by God to become formally, judicially Trinitarian. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. 28:18–19). Civil government is not exempted from the Great Commission.⁸⁰

On the contrary, we are assured by those who reject biblical blueprints, the Bible also does not provide a blueprint for establishing a theocracy, i.e., the rule of God over civil government. Then does the Bible at least allow theocracy as one option among many? "No; theocracy must be avoided, although all other political systems are conformable to the Bible's non-blueprints." So, the Bible supposedly provides an anti-blueprint: no theocracy. And so it goes. What the Bible categorically requires, these critics "inside the camp" deny as illegitimate even as an option in a supposedly open-ended world. Why? Because if the Bible really does provide judicial blueprints, there is no biblically legitimate possibility of a judicially or institutionally open-ended world. There is no morally legitimate "process" outside the limits of the Bible's judicial blueprints. This conclusion appalls them. They would rather surrender three-fourths of the Bible than accept such a conclusion. And so they have done, generation after generation. They believe that the Old Testament is "God's word, emeritus."

Conclusion

Leviticus 19:15 establishes a fundamental principle of justice: the impartial application of God's legal standards to all men, irrespective of their wealth or status. It proclaims the judicial principle of equality before the law. This biblical principle of civil justice is the antithesis of 79. George Grant, Legislating Immorality: The Homosexual Movement Comes Out of the Closet (Chicago: Moody Press, 1993).

80. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

all socialism. The socialist proclaims the need for the equality of economic results, not equality before the law. There is no way to achieve the former without abandoning the latter, and vice versa. Logically, the socialist has to deny the legitimacy of Leviticus 19:15; logically, the defender of Leviticus 19:15 has to deny socialism. People are not always logical, however. What we find is that defenders of Christian socialism either ignore the existence of Leviticus 19:15 or else reinterpret it to mean the opposite of what it says. They interpret it, as Sider interprets it, to mean that the judge must uphold the poor man in his cause. But upholding the poor man in his cause is as great a sin as upholding the mighty in his cause. The text says so.

The response of Christian socialists and welfare statisticians has been to deny that the Bible offers biblical blueprints for economics. Any appeal by a Christian economist to the Mosaic law is rejected as illegitimate. This has to be their response, since the legal order of the Mosaic Covenant, if obeyed, would inevitably produce a free market social order. Without the Mosaic law, however, it is not possible to say what kind of social and economic order would have to develop from Christianity. Thus, in order to leave the social order biblically open-ended, the Christian defenders of the welfare state are forced to deny that the Bible offers any blueprints at all. Then they tell us what kind of economic order they would like to see established in God's name (by way of Keynes, Marx, or no economist at all).⁸¹

The issue of wealth redistribution through taxation is never discussed by Christian defenders of the welfare state in terms of Samuel's warning in I Samuel 8: a tyrannical king is marked by his willingness to extract as much as 10% of his subjects' net income. To return to such a "tyrannical" tax rate, every modern industrial nation would have to cut its average level of taxation by 75%. Yet Christian defenders of the welfare state insist that far too much money is left in the hands of today's citizens. We need more "economic justice" in the name of Jesus, they say. We need greater taxation of the wealthy—and the not-so-wealthy. We need a "graduated tithe."

The biblical solution is to restrict total personal and corporate taxation—national, regional, and local taxation combined—to less than 10% of net income, just as the tithe lawfully collected by the combined levels of a national church's hierarchy is limited to 10%. But this Old Covenant limit on taxation is too confining for welfare statisticians.

81. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: the absence of economists.

The state today asserts an implicit claim to be the primary judicial agent of God in history. The mark of this presumed primary sovereignty is the lack of biblically revealed limits (boundaries) on the wealth that it is authorized by God to extract from those under its jurisdiction. This is the political doctrine of the divine right of the people—an assertion of the voters' God-granted moral authority to steal from each other by means of the ballot box. "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote."

The doctrine of equality before the law was one of the reasons why the West grew rich. This legal inheritance came from the Old Testament, not from democratic Athens or non-democratic Rome. Modern Christians have imbibed deeply on the socialist legacy of equality of results rather than equality before the civil law. The result has been the creation of enormous civil governments that are ruthless in their pursuit of money, power, and control. In the modern era, this began with the confiscation of church properties by Renaissance monarchs of the sixteenth century, most notably Henry VIII.⁸² The Protestants supported this, and some of them participated in the distribution of the loot.

The use of civil government as an agency of political plunder has made thieves of us all. It is bad enough that we participate as recipients of stolen goods. It is worse that we call for more. Christian defenders of the welfare state never cease to call for more taxation, more confiscation, more social justice, by which they mean more government agents' guns in the bellies of everyone with wealth that exceeds the per capita wealth of the special interest voting bloc in whose name the activists generate the donations that support them in upper-middle-class comfort. Their worldview, when legislated and enforced, undermines the rule of law and thereby undermines economic growth, which alone can raise the poor out of their poverty.

82. Martin van Creveld, The Rise and Decline of the State (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999), ch. 2.

15

LOCAL JUSTICE VS. CENTRALIZED GOVERNMENT

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour (Lev. 19:15).

Leviticus 19:15 deals with more than just the principle of impartial civil justice.¹ It also deals with the locus of civil judicial sovereignty: “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour.” This law established the requirement that the citizens of Israel from time to time be required to serve as civil judges in their communities. Jethro had told Moses: “Moreover thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness; and place such over them, to be rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens: And let them judge the people at all seasons: and it shall be, that every great matter they shall bring unto thee, but every small matter they shall judge: so shall it be easier for thyself, and they shall bear the burden with thee” (Ex. 18:21–22).² The focus of Leviticus 19:15 is on civil courts within the local community, although the principle of equality before the law also applies to ecclesiastical courts. The verse specifically says, “in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbor.” There is a very strong emphasis on ethics: righteousness. There is also a very strong emphasis on localism in this verse: judging a neighbor.

Two issues are fundamental in this verse: equality before the law

1. Chapter 14.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 19.

and judicial participation. First, equality before the law: this points back to Exodus 12:49, where the law of God is identified as the binding judicial standard for all civil judgment, irrespective of the national and covenantal origins of residents within the land.³ Second, local judicial participation: the law is given to people in a particular community. Law enforcement is always to begin with self-judgment. The formal exercise of covenantal judgment then extends to local covenantal institutions: church, family, and state. This indicates that jurors and judges in the first stage of civil court proceedings must be recruited from the local community. Their attitudes will inescapably be shaped by that community. Acknowledging both the reality and the legitimacy of this institutional arrangement, Leviticus 19:15 emphasizes the necessity of righteousness. It is this fusion of God's universal standards with honest and impartial judgment according to local customs and circumstances—the one and the many—that is the basis of the development of the godly civil order.⁴

A. Judicial Localism

Thomas P. “Tip” O’Neill, who served as the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives in the 1980s,⁵ once described the nature of American politics: “All politics is local.” This undoubtedly reflects the bias of a member of the United States House of Representatives (435 members, each elected to represent a single geographical district), but his observation is correct regarding biblical civil government. In a political order that is structured in terms of biblical standards, politics is inherently local. The reason why this is true is that politics is an aspect of the civil judicial order. Politics is an aspect of civil judicial sanctions. It is the means by which those who are lawfully represented in the civil realm are given an opportunity periodically to sanction their judicial representatives: legislators, judges, and governors. This is the Bible’s authorized means of allocating lawful civil authority. This is why all politics is inherently a form of the judiciary. Politics is an outworking of the civil office of judge.

In the area of civil justice, however, it is clear that the average citizen still possesses more authority on a jury than he does in any other civil office. Unless he holds elective office or is a judge, his office as jur-

3. See Chapter 14.

4. Ibid., ch. 14.

5. This office is sometimes regarded by political analysts as the second most powerful in the United States after the Presidency.

or is the most influential civil office that he will hold. The jury is the local institution that has the authority to declare a person innocent. Its judgment is final in the case of a declaration of innocence. So, judicial sovereignty is overwhelmingly local with respect to the declaration, "Not guilty."

Biblical politics is at bottom local because biblical courts are at bottom local. Judicial authority moves from the bottom to the top (local jurisdiction to the more distant center) in a biblical civil order (Ex. 18). Biblical civil justice is exclusively negative: bringing negative sanctions against those who initiate or commit acts that violate fundamental law and its appropriate legislation. An individual defies the legislation by committing a prohibited act. The biblical judicial model places primary responsibility for applying the law within the community in which the prohibited act took place, since the victim was injured while residing under the jurisdiction of a local court. The judicial process of bringing negative sanctions therefore must begin with an investigation of the facts of the case in a particular place and at a certain time. It is least expensive in most judicial conflicts to obtain accurate information about local events in the local jurisdiction. It is also least expensive to obtain accurate information about the local community's interpretation of the law in the local jurisdiction. The legal issue is jurisdiction: speaking (diction) the law (juris). Who possesses the initial right and responsibility for speaking the law in society and then enforcing it? The words of Exodus 18 are clear: local civil magistrates.

The preservation of freedom in Israel's civil order relied on local jurisdiction. Local tribal units helped to maintain this localism. There had to be permanent legal boundaries between each tribe. These boundaries protected Israel from political centralization. Political scientist Aaron Wildavsky wrote: "Moses' strategy was to divide the Israelites to keep them whole. Treating the people as a collective unit exposed them to collective punishment."⁶ He gave the example of the Levites' slaying of 3,000 members of other tribes who had participated in the idolatry of the golden calf (Ex. 32:27–28). "If Moses had not shown that he would punish at least some of the people, the Lord, in whose eyes all were equally guilty, would have done them all in. So Moses had to separate some to save others."⁷ Wildavsky could also have offered the example of the tribe of Benjamin, whose rebellion led to the military destruction of almost the entire tribe by the other tribes (Jud. 20). Sin was contained. Israel's tribal boundaries served as restraints against the spread of covenantal rebellion. In this sense, tribal boundaries had a primary defensive judicial aspect: preserving the authority of local jurisdictions and outlooks.

6. Aaron Wildavsky, The Nursing Father: Moses as a Political Leader (University, Alabama: University of Alabama, 1984), p. 112.

7. Idem.

These boundaries also had a secondary expansive judicial aspect. A local jurisdiction could begin to apply God's law in a new way, and this new application might prove beneficial to the local community. Localism leads to experimentation. A tribal unit could become a kind of judicial laboratory. The rest of the nation could see if God blessed this experiment. (This presumes that God did bring predictable, visible, positive corporate sanctions in history in response to corporate covenantal faithfulness.) At the discretion of the local community, the new judicial practices of another tribe could be imported. But the importing initiative was local, unless the nation's supreme civil authorities mandated the change in the name of God's law. If the nation's appeals court used the local guideline as a judicial standard, it would become a national standard.

Localism in Mosaic Israel was offset in part by the presence of Levites: local advisors who rarely had an inheritance in rural land.⁸ Instead, they had income from the tithe (Num. 18:20–21)⁹ and urban property (Lev. 25:32–34). They served as specialized judicial agents of God. The tribe of Levi was the only cross-boundary national tribe: the tribe that publicly spoke God's law. So, there was both localism and universalism, the many and the one, in the judicial structure of Mosaic Israel.

B. The Division of Judicial Labor

The organizational problem that Moses faced in applying God's revealed law to specific cases was that there were too many disputes to settle.

1. The Final Voice of Earthly Authority

Moses was God's only authorized voice of civil authority within

8. There were two exceptions: (1) land that had been vowed for use by a priest but then was leased by the vow-taker to someone else; (2) land that had been vowed for a priest which was then voluntarily forfeited by the heirs at the time of the jubilee (Lev. 27:20–21). Chapter 36.

9. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 10.

the nation, as Korah and Dathan learned the hard way (Num. 16).¹⁰ His word was the final earthly court of appeal in Israel. He therefore became the central civil judicial institution, which is another way of saying that he became the pinnacle.

And it came to pass on the morrow, that Moses sat to judge the people: and the people stood by Moses from the morning unto the evening. And when Moses' father in law saw all that he did to the people, he said, What is this thing that thou doest to the people? why sittest thou thyself alone, and all the people stand by thee from morning unto even? And Moses said unto his father in law, Because the people come unto me to inquire of God: When they have a matter, they come unto me; and I judge between one and another, and I do make them know the is not statutes of God, and his laws. And Moses' father in law said unto him, The thing that thou doest good. Thou wilt surely wear away, both thou, and this people that is with thee: for this thing is too heavy for thee; thou art not able to perform it thyself alone (Ex. 18:13–18).

The problem was this: Moses, despite his ability to declare the most reliable civil judgments in the land (or in the world, for that matter), had become an impediment to obtaining widespread justice. The reliability and predictability of civil judgment in Israel was no better than the ability of the disputants to get to the front of the line. This allocation system for civil justice rewarded those who were willing and able to stand in line. But standing in line is expensive. It uses up the only truly irreplaceable economic resource: time. Jethro saw the problem and recommended a solution.

Hearken now unto my voice, I will give thee counsel, and God shall be with thee: Be thou for the people to God-ward, that thou mayest bring the causes unto God: And thou shalt teach them ordinances and laws, and shalt shew them the way wherein they must walk, and the work that they must do. Moreover thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness; and place such over them, to be rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens: And let them judge the people at all seasons: and it shall be, that every great matter they shall bring unto thee, but every small matter they shall judge: so shall it be easier for thyself, and they shall bear the burden with thee. If thou shalt do this thing, and God command thee so, then thou shalt be able to endure, and all this people shall also go to their place in peace. So Moses hearkened to the voice of his father in law, and did all that he had said. And Moses chose able men out of all Israel, and made them heads over the people, rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens. And they judged the people at all seasons: the hard causes they brought unto Moses, but every small matter they judged themselves (Ex. 18:19–26).

10. Ibid., ch. 9.

This solution was based on the economic principle of the division of labor. It necessarily relied on the judicial principle of localism. The authority to impose civil and ecclesiastical sanctions moved upward judicially (i.e., inward geographically, toward the tabernacle, and later, once they were in the Promised Land, toward Jerusalem) from the local jurisdiction to a more distant jurisdiction.¹¹ This means that the broadest judicial authority in Israel was local. This was where the resident of Israel first encountered God's civil law. Jethro reserved the judicial system's scarcest economic resources—those people who possess progressively better-informed judgment—for the progressively more difficult cases.

Judicial resources, being scarce, had to be allocated by means of some principle. This was not the free market principle of "highest bid wins." Civil and ecclesiastical justice may not lawfully be purchased. But without price allocation, there was only one other alternative means of rationing civil justice: standing in line. Jethro's system transformed the single long line in front of Moses' tent into tens of thousands of shorter lines. Rashi,¹² the late eleventh-century French rabbinic commentator, estimated that in Moses' day, there would have been 78,600 judges in four levels.¹³

11. The "inner circle" of influence or power is therefore at the top of the organizational pyramid, if not formally, then at least informally. See Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Covenant, [2002] 2012), Introduction.

12. Rabbi Solomon (Shlomo) Yizchaki.

13. His reasoning: 600 at the top—judges of thousands (600,000 men divided by 1,000); 6,000 in the upper middle—judges of hundreds (600,000 men divided by 100); 12,000 in the lower middle—judges of fifties (600,000 men divided by 50); and 60,000 lower court judges—judges of tens (600,000 men divided by 10). Chumash with Targum Onkelos, Haphtaroth and Rashi's Commentary, A. M. Silbermann and M. Rosenbaum, translators, 5 vols. (Jerusalem: Silbermann Family, [1934] 1985 [Jewish year: 5745]), II, p. 95. Rashi served as a rabbinic judge, and difficult cases were continually sent to him from Germany and France. Heinrich Graetz, History of the Jews, 5 vols. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, [1894] 1945), III, p. 287.

2. The Intellectual Division of Labor

Localism is extremely important for the advancement of what I call the division of judicial labor. The concept of the division of labor is basic to the Bible. We see it in a primarily negative sense in the scattering of families at the Tower of Babel.¹⁴ We see it in a positive sense in Paul's injunction that the simple man or the man of one primary skill not feel bad because he does not possess a skill that a more prestigious individual has. In both I Corinthians 12¹⁵ and Romans 12,¹⁶ Paul was speaking of the church as a body. No individual member of the body should feel that he is less important than any other member of the body. The body is governed by its head, Jesus Christ. Therefore, so long as the entire body is honoring its head, no member of the body should feel as though he is less important than any other (I Cor. 12:4–27).

The idea of scarcity is the most fundamental idea of modern economics: "There is no such thing as a free lunch." Scarcity is defined as follows: at zero price, there is greater demand for a scarce resource than there is supply. Modern economics asks the question: How can men reduce the level of scarcity? This is the question of wealth or economic development. Modern economics began with the observation that the division of labor is society's most important means of reducing scarcity. We date the advent of modern economics with the publication of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations in 1776. Smith began Book I, Chapter I, which is titled "Of the Division of Labour," with these words: "The greatest improvement in the productive powers of labour, and the greater part of the skill, dexterity, and judgment with which it is anywhere directed, or applied, seem to have been the effects of the division of labour." His statement refers to the productivity of labor, but it applies to every area of human endeavor in which cooperative service is beneficial. He was saying that there is a greater output of goods and services for any single input of labor resource when individuals cooperate voluntarily in a division of labor economy.

The application of a biblical truth—the division of labor within the 14. Not entirely a negative sanction. See my comments in Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 19.

15. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

16. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10.

institutional church—is not limited to the church or to economics. It also has important ramifications for politics, social institutions, and all other aspects of life in which men and women cooperate for personal gain, and whose cooperative efforts lead to greater social benefits. The principle is this: through cooperation, the specialized knowledge of individuals can be applied more effectively to those areas of life in which this knowledge is most appropriate. Thus, it is possible for individuals to achieve greater output because their unique skills and unique knowledge are most effectively applied to the specific and narrow tasks at hand. This means that through the division of labor, there is a greater output of socially valuable wisdom from a given input of individual knowledge. It is the free market economic order alone that permits the widespread co-ordination of individual plans.¹⁷ By bringing together many minds to deal with particular problems, society gains the benefit of obtaining greater wisdom at any given expenditure—in this context, judicial cases. It also means that there will be a greater number of cases settled by courts when this division of labor is operating. Many courts and many cases mean greater justice within the community (Ex. 18).

3. Committees and Representation

A committee is a means of pooling knowledge: division of intellectual labor. The ultimate committee—the Trinity—is an economical Trinity as well as an ontological Trinity. There is a hierarchy of tasks and responsibilities despite the three Persons' equality of Being. It is not sufficient to say that the three Persons of the Trinity are equal in substance and glory (the ontological Trinity). We must also distinguish their interrelationships and their specific tasks (the economical Trinity). The Holy Spirit is sent by both the Father (John 14:26) and the Son (John 16:7). The Spirit goes where He is sent. There is no escape from hierarchy, not even in the Trinity. But this subordination is functional and relational, not in terms of God's being or substance.¹⁸ God is the ultimate committee: unified yet plural. There is a division of labor within the Godhead.

17. Friedrich A. Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), chaps. 2, 4. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>). Cf. Gerald P. O'Driscoll, Jr., Economics as a Coordination Problem: The Contributions of Friederich A. Hayek (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, 1977). (<http://bit.ly/Odriscoll>)

18. Augustine, On the Trinity (A.D. 400), Bk. V; in Philip Schaff (ed.), A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, vol. 3 (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1887] 1978).

Human committees do not possess omniscience or perfect unity. There are institutional limits on men's division of intellectual labor. We see this most notably in the operations of committees. After leaving a committee meeting, Nobel Prize-winning economist George Stigler remarked that Charles Lindburgh's 1927 feat of flying across the Atlantic alone from New York to Paris seems less impressive when we consider the difficulty he would have faced had he made the same flight under the direction of a committee.¹⁹ There is a familiar saying: "A camel is a horse designed by a committee." This saying recognizes a fundamental problem with committees: they are seldom creative, despite the division of intellectual labor.

Why is this the case? Because of the difficulty of establishing individual responsibility and therefore of applying appropriate sanctions, either positive or negative. It becomes more expensive to monitor individual performance and reward it appropriately as the size of any organization increases.²⁰ A committee's productivity stems primarily from its collective knowledge in judging plans submitted by responsible individuals. A committee pools individual judgments. A committee is far better able to determine why something has not worked properly in the past than what will work best in the future. It is an institution far more suitable for imposing negative sanctions against the managers of poorly functioning operations than for producing original institutional designs leading to productive future operations.²¹ In short, a committee is most productive when it delegates authority to a representative. It then brings either positive or negative sanctions against its representative in terms of specific performance criteria.

A committee sets general policy. More to the point, it elects a representative agent who devises and then proposes general policy. He 19. Cited by Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 24. The remark is sometimes attributed to Charles F. Kettering, the inventive genius at General Motors in the 1920s. When informed that Lindburgh had flown the Atlantic alone, he supposedly replied: "Let me know when a committee does it." Kettering was an extreme individualist who did not fit into Alfred Sloan's brilliantly conceived organizational structure. His enormous productivity bought him independence from Sloan's task-based system of management. Peter F. Drucker, Management: Tasks, Responsibilities, Practices (New York: Harper & Row, 1974), p. 411.

20. Sowell, ibid., p. 56.

21. The creativity of the United States Constitutional Convention of 1787 was unique. It was closed to the public, and its attendees were oath-bound not to discuss its deliberations during their lifetimes, which none of them did, including the anti-Federalists who had attended. Far more representative of the productivity of political committees were the results of the various constitutional conventions of France, 1789–92.

submits his plan to the committee, which then accepts, modifies, or rejects the plan of action or policy. Having set (approved) general policy, a committee retains a veto over decisions made by its representative agent. A committee that attempts to do more than veto decisions made by innovators will strangle the host organization. A committee loses efficiency when it seeks to impose its general policies at the local level. We readily understand this in the case of military operations: one person is in command over his troops, but he answers to a senior officer, all the way up to the Joint Chiefs of Staff or its equivalent. We also understand that the greater the distance from the central command, the greater the local commander's knowledge of the battlefield. The military command's problem is to fuse the one and the many: the overall plan of battle with battlefield tactics.²² We could call this military casuistry: local application of the general's laws.

The organizational problem that a human committee faces is the task of establishing clear-cut boundaries of individual authority and responsibility. Each division must possess its own appropriate tasks, regulations, and sanctions, both positive and negative. As economist Thomas Sowell writes, "the most basic decision is who makes the decision, under what constraints, and subject to what feedback mechanisms."²³ The success of any committee is almost always a direct result of the committee's ability to assign institutional responsibilities: representative authority. The committee's decisions therefore tend to become the decisions of the committee chairman, subject to a veto by the committee. The alternative is impersonal decision-making by less easily identified individuals who are more interested in escaping individual responsibility than in creating positive programs in the name of the committee.

4. The Worldwide Extension of God's Law

Adam Smith made an extremely important observation in Chapter 3 of the Wealth of Nations. Chapter 3 is titled, "That the Division of Labour is Limited by the Extent of the Market." This statement is one of the most important insights in the history of economic analysis. It presents the case for a wide market in which individuals offer for sale

22. The development of a small, unpiloted drone plane equipped with a television camera, a technology deployed first in the 1982 Israeli war in Lebanon, in a war primarily fought between Syrian and Israeli tanks, was a milestone. Central headquarters could see the entire battlefield on screen.

23. Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions, p. 17.

the output of their labor: goods and services. The wider the market, the greater the specialization of production and therefore the greater the output per unit of input. Per capita wealth increases.

The same principle applies to the market for civil justice. The division of judicial labor is also limited by the extent of the market. This leads to three very important implications. First, the law of God was always intended to extend beyond the geographical boundaries of ancient Israel, i.e., geographical extension. The goal was always to obtain greater knowledge of God's principles of civil justice, so that all men would be able to better understand those principles as applied in specific situations. This is why Jonah's missionary venture into Assyria was an important aspect of achieving greater justice within national Israel. The idea behind missionary ventures is to bring more and more people under the authority of God's law, and therefore to gain greater and greater wisdom about the legitimate and necessary applications of God's law to concrete situations in history. Christendom in this way brings more and better minds to bear on the specific cases in the courts, not just nationally, but internationally.

Second, biblical law still applies in the New Testament era. Not only was God's revealed law always intended to spread geographically across the face of the earth, it was also expected to extend chronologically throughout history. This chronological extension means that judicial precedents set by courts over long periods of time are supposed to accumulate. We are supposed to gain ever-accumulating wisdom about the applicability of God's law to specific disputes in history by means of our knowledge of these precedents. This is the judicial application of the biblical principle of progressive sanctification. A definitively revealed legal structure is to be applied with ever-increasing precision in men's judicial decisions in history.

We see this development clearly in the history of rabbinic law, specifically with respect to that body of law called the Responsa.²⁴ In the State of Israel today, something in the range of 300,000 decisions²⁵ by earlier Jewish courts have been entered into computers.²⁶ These precedents have come as a result of some 1,500 years of decisions. They are regarded as legal precedents in the state of Israel. This is a tremendous advantage that the Jews have, compared to the Christians. They have a larger and older body of judicial precedents, and this body of law is focused by means of an agreed-upon set of principles of judicial interpretation.²⁷ In short, there is a far greater division of intellectual labor in rabbinic law than in any other legal system in the world.

24. Irving A. Agus, Urban-Civilization in Pre-Crusade Europe, 2 vols. (New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1965), is a study of these cases in the medieval period.

25. Introduction, The Principles of Jewish Law, ed. Menachem Elon (Jerusalem: Keter, [1975?]), col. 13.

26. "Computer Digests the Talmud to Help Rabbis," New York Times (Nov. 24, 1984).

Third, this principle of the judicial division of labor implies that Christendom as an ideal is binding in New Testament times. The rule of God is supposed to be acknowledged by men as universally binding. A self-conscious application of God's universally binding law in history is to be extended in every area of life. This is the meaning of the concept of Christendom: a universal civilization based on a single, definitive legal order, but applied locally, regionally, nationally, and internationally in a series of hierarchical civil courts.²⁸ This common law-order is the judicial equivalent of a common language with regional accents. Without a common grammar and common vocabulary, there can be little communication across linguistic barriers.²⁹ Biblical law is the "common grammar" that God has given His church in order to bring cultural unity: Christendom. Historically, the philosophers of the church have appealed to natural law concepts, either Greek or Newtonian, in their quest for a common judicial order and therefore common civilization. This has been an importation of an alien judicial grammar, one which is at bottom cacophonous. The presence of similar words—the "vocabulary" of justice—has masked the existence of rival "grammatical" structures: covenant-keeping vs. covenant-breaking. Van Til wrote:

As part of the saving plan of God the law was absolutely other than the code of Hammurabi or any other law that expressed "tribal experience" up to that time. We will not seek to debate about the similarities and dissimilarities between the law that Moses gave and the laws of other nations. We expect a great deal of similarity. We could hold again that even if there had been existing somewhere a code identical in form to the code of Moses, the two would still have been entirely different as to their meaning and interpretation. As a matter of fact, there is no law formulated among the nations outside the pale of Israel that demands absolute obedience of man, just as there is nowhere a story that tells man simply that he is the creature of God and wholly responsible to God. Thus the absolute otherness of Moses and Christ's interpretation of the past and of the present can only be cast aside by those who are bound to do so by virtue of their adherence to a metaphysical relativism.³⁰

27. This inheritance broke down in the twentieth century, as Reform Judaism and even Conservative Judaism departed from Talmudic law.

28. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

29. The sign language of the plains Indians of North America was such a cross-boundary social institution. Members of widely dispersed tribes could communicate with each other by means of the limited grammar and vocabulary of hand signs. This language was still in use in the early twentieth century. The United States Army's master sign linguist in the World War I era was Col. Tim McCoy, who in the 1930s went to Hollywood and became a "star" in B-grade Westerns.

C. Judges and Jurors

Localism is the foundation of the biblical judicial system. The primary authority to declare judgment under biblical law is the local court. The fundamental agency of corporate judgment is the local court, whether civil or ecclesiastical. This is an extremely important principle for any system of law designed to resist the centralization of power.

The civil judge in the Mosaic Covenant declared the sentence: negative sanctions. Capital sanctions were carried out by the people, beginning with the witnesses (Deut. 17:6). Case by case, the civil court was to declare judgment. As the cases grew more difficult, they would work their way up the appeals court system.

1. The King

The most difficult civil cases ended up in Jerusalem in the king's courtroom. The king was the Supreme Court of the Israelite civil order. This is why he was commanded to read the law daily (Deut. 17:18–19).³¹ Yet even the king could not lawfully declare absolutely final earthly judgment, imposing final earthly sanctions, for there is no final, institutionalized, earthly court of appeal in a biblical civil order. Only one person can lawfully declare the final judicial word of the Lord: Jesus Christ. Therefore, the people as a whole could lawfully intervene to restrain the king, as they did when Saul attempted to carry out his judgment against his son Jonathan (I Sam. 14:45). The people placed a judicial boundary around the king, and they were willing to place a physical boundary around him. He relented. On what basis could they overturn the king's sentence? Only as authorized jurors who refused to convict Jonathan because the king's verbal legislation on the battlefield had been foolish and therefore unconstitutional. Their declaration of "not guilty" was final, and Saul accepted it.

30. Cornelius Van Til, Psychology of Religion, vol. IV of In Defense of the Faith (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1971), p. 149.

31. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 42:G.

Nevertheless, the king did lawfully serve as the highest civil judge in Israel. This was the great authority of kingship: exercising the power of speaking in God's name as the single individual who could declare God's final earthly judgment, unless the people lawfully revolted under the direction of the lower magistrates.³² David's rebellious son Absalom began his revolt by serving as a lower judge in the gates (II Sam. 15:2–6). But his was a messianic impulse: "Absalom said moreover, Oh that I were made judge in the land, that every man which hath any suit or cause might come unto me, and I would do him justice!" (II Sam. 15:4). He promised justice to all.

To restrain this messianic impulse, the king was not allowed by vGod to multiply horses (offensive weapons), wives (alliances), or precious metals (Deut. 17:16–17). He was required to study biblical law daily (Deut. 17:18–19). He had to be placed under judicial and institutional restraints in order to restrict the development of a messianic impulse based on concentrated civil authority.³³ Legitimate authority was not to become illegitimate power. It is this move from multiple authorities to a single authority—from legitimate, decentralized social authority to centralized state power—that is the essence of the move from freedom to totalitarianism.³⁴ Biblical law places boundaries around centralized political authority in order to prevent this development.

When thou art come unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me; Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the LORD thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee: thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother. But he shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses: forasmuch as the LORD hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way. Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away: neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold. And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites: And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the LORD his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them: That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left: to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel (Deut. 17:14–20).

32. See John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, IV:xx:31.

33. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 41.

34. Robert A. Nisbet, The Quest for Community (New York: Oxford University Press, 1953), ch. 5.

2. The Civil Priests

What, then, was the basis of a judge's authority? We can answer this best by asking: "Biblically, who declared the law in ancient Israel?" The priests did. Yet this office was not limited to ecclesiastical affairs. Israel was a kingdom of priests. "And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel" (Ex. 19:6). This was an office held by all adult circumcised males (age 20+)³⁵ and all adult women under the authority of a circumcised male.³⁶

There were both civil and ecclesiastical priests. The elders in the gates in ancient Israel were empowered by God to make the civil judicial system function. The elders in the gates imposed the negative sanctions of God's civil law. The priests were advisors to the elders.

If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, between blood and blood, between plea and plea, and between stroke and stroke, being matters of controversy within thy gates: then shalt thou arise, and get thee up into the place which the LORD thy God shall choose; And thou shalt come unto the priests the Levites, and unto the judge that shall be in those days, and inquire; and they shall show thee the sentence of judgment: And thou shalt do according to the sentence, which they of that place which the LORD shall choose shall shew thee; and thou shalt observe to do according to all that they inform thee: According to the sentence of the law which they shall teach thee, and according to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do: thou shalt not decline from the sentence which they shall shew thee, to the right hand, nor to the left. And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest that standeth to minister there before the LORD thy God, or unto the judge, even that man shall die: and thou shalt put away the evil from Israel. And all the people shall hear, and fear, and do no more presumptuously (Deut. 17:8–13).

35. Exodus 30:14.

36. The best example is Deborah (Jud. 4).

The point is, civil rulership was plural because priestly rulership was plural. This has not changed. Who are the civil priests—citizens who exercise lawful civil sanctions—in New Testament times? Biblically speaking, in a formally covenanted nation—which all nations are required by God to become³⁷—only those adults who are church members and are therefore under church authority.³⁸

3. The Jury

The fundamental agency of the local court—both civil and ecclesiastical—is the jury. It is the jury that announces guilt or innocence after having heard the arguments of conflicting parties in the courtroom. Its members evaluate the cogency of the arguments and the “fit” between the law and the evidence. The jury places limits on the judge’s authority to decide the case. This is especially true in the United States. Writes legal historian Lawrence M. Friedman: “The modern European law of evidence is fairly simple and rational; the law lets most everything in and trusts the judge to separate good evidence from bad. But American law distrusts the judge; it gives the jury full fact-finding power, and in criminal cases, the final word on innocence or guilt. Yet the law has distrusted the jury almost as much as it has distrusted the judge, and the rules of evidence grew up as a counter-vailing force. The jury hears only part of the story; that part which the law of evidence allows. The judge is bound too. If he lets in improper evidence, the case may be reversed on appeal. Hence the rules control both judge and jury.”³⁹

In modern American law, the formal presentation of the evidence is under the direction of the judge, and this authority has been used increasingly to restrict the jury’s access to evidence. The familiar words of the lawyer, “Objection, your honor,” is the heart of this control. The judge can sustain or overrule the lawyer’s request to withhold evidence in the court. This seemingly arbitrary power was not always the case, but it has become such since the early 1800s through the development of rules of evidence and courtroom order.⁴⁰ The judges have done their best to extend their authority over all aspects of courtroom procedure. The jury system is the last major resistance point.

37. Gary DeMar, Ruler of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for Government (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gdmruler>)

38. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

39. Lawrence M. Friedman, A History of American Law (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1973), p. 135.

The jury system is a necessary outworking of a biblical legal order. It did not appear overnight in the early church, even as slavery was not condemned overnight. But it had to develop in a Christian legal order, even as slavery had to be abolished.⁴¹ *The jury's legal basis is the priesthood of all believers.*⁴² The jury is a Christian institution. This is not to say that it is exclusively a Christian institution. Ancient Athens and Rome both had trial by jury.

4. Popular Sovereignty in Athenian Democracy

Athens' judicial system was inaugurated by Solon in the sixth century, B.C. Aristotle said that, by this act, Solon introduced the principle of democracy into Athens. His successors attempted to flatter the people by expanding the power of the courts, and thereby "transformed the constitution into its present form of extreme democracy."⁴³ Originally, Aristotle speculated, Solon had not intended to transfer this much power to the people. "He gave them simply the rights of electing the magistrates and calling them to account; and if the people do not enjoy these elementary rights, they must be a people of slaves, and thus enemies to the government."⁴⁴ Aristotle implied that Solon understood the connection between the jury, the election of magistrates, the ability to call them to account, and political freedom. The covenantal issue is the same in all cases: sanctions.

The Athenian judicial system failed because of its doctrine of popular sovereignty. By the mid-fifth century, Athens relied on huge 40. Friedman wrote: "There is good reason to believe that the law of evidence tightened considerably between 1776 and the 1830s. Judging from surviving transcripts of criminal trials, courts had rather loose attitudes toward evidence around 1800. . . . Opposing counsel did not meekly wait their turn to cross-examine. Rather, they broke in with questions whenever they wished." Ibid., pp. 134–35.

41. Gary North, Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gntools>)

42. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 232. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

43. Aristotle, Politics, 1274a. The Politics of Aristotle, translated by Sir Ernest Barker (New York: Oxford University Press, [1946] 1958), p. 88. Cf. John P. Dawson, The History of Lay Judges (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1960), p. 13. Cited by Daniel C. Murphy, "The Effect of Recent Developments Upon the Political Function of Trial by Jury," M.A. Thesis, University of Virginia, 1981, p. 5.

44. Politics, 1274a; ibid., p. 89.

courts (dikasteria) with hundreds of juror-judges: 201, 301, 401, or 501 per court. Each court heard hundreds of cases per year, with each case taking no more than one day to decide.⁴⁵ Based as they were on the theology of the omnipotence of the people, the jurors were subject to very few laws or restrictions. Glotz, an admirer of the system, summarized it: "Armed with an arbitrary power the people, the sovereign justiciary, admitted of no restriction either upon its severity or upon its mercy; but it placed its omnipotence more often at the service of its constant humanity than of its sudden and short-lived passions. Above all it freed itself from the tyranny of forms and fixed rules in order that individual rights might prevail and equity be discovered."⁴⁶ Glotz praised the Athenian judicial system, for it did not remain "superstitiously attached to ancient customs and ancient laws. . . ."⁴⁷ This was jury-made law, not the enforcement of predictable laws. As with any system of final earthly authority, when one institution achieves monopolistic power, it abuses this power.

This faith in the sovereignty of the autonomous Athenian people was paralleled by the rise of the Athenian empire and continual warfare.⁴⁸ Within a century, the Athenians were downplaying marriage as a mere convention and had adopted infanticide.⁴⁹ These views were widely shared throughout Greece; the region began to suffer depopulation.⁵⁰ Alexander the Great's conquests destroyed the ideal of the polis, the autonomous city-state. The ideal of the sovereignty of the people died in the classical world where it began. This took only two and a half centuries: from the mid-sixth to the late fourth. The glory that was Greece was short-lived.

5. The Biblical Jury

The goal of the biblical jury system is not to create new laws but

45. Gustave Glotz, The Greek City and Its Institutions (New York: Barnes & Noble, [1929] 1969), p. 246.

46. Ibid., p. 256. The jurors had to swear in advance not to cancel any private debts, redistribute lands and houses of Athenians. They also swore not to readmit anyone sent into exile, vote for a tyrant or an oligarch, or accept a bribe. Ibid., p. 239.

47. Ibid., p. 255.

48. Ibid., p. 263. Aristotle wrote: "The people, who had been the cause of the acquisition of a maritime empire during the course of the Persian wars, acquired a conceit of themselves; and in spite of the opposition of the better citizens they found worthless demagogues to support their cause." Politics, 1274a.

49. Ibid., pp. 296–98.

50. Ibid., pp. 299–301.

rather to apply fixed biblical laws to specific cases. The function of the jury is to bring a small number of individuals into court so they can hear the disputes between individuals who have not been able to settle their disputes outside of the civil court. This is the principle of the division of labor. Many minds are focused on the details of a single case. After hearing both sides, the American jury is sequestered into a private room where members can discuss the case secure from interference or the threat of subsequent retaliation against any individual jury member. Neither the judge nor the agents of the disputants are allowed to enter this room when the jury is in session. This is a sign of its sovereignty. When the common law rule against double jeopardy is honored, the American jury becomes the final court of appeal when it issues a “not guilty” verdict.

The jury publicly announces civil judgment: guilty or innocent. This is the same judicial principle that operates in democratic balloting. It is a manifestation of point four of the biblical covenant model: the imposition of sanctions. The Anglo-American institution of the secret jury rests on the legal principle that no outside agent is authorized to bring pressure of any kind against the decision-makers who sit on that jury. No kind of public pressure, no kind of economic pressure, and no kind of threat is legal to be brought against a jury. Tampering with a jury is a criminal offense. By sequestering the jury—by placing a judicial and physical boundary around the members in their collective capacity as jurors—the judge pressures the members of the jury to focus all of their attention on the details of the particular case, rather than worrying about what their opinions or decisions will produce in response within the community.

This is indirect evidence that the modern political practice of the secret ballot is analogous to the sequestered jury.⁵¹ When individual citizens bring formal political sanctions against their rulers in a democracy, they are to be left free from subsequent retaliation by politicians. The secret jury and the secret ballot are both basic to the preservation of the institutional independence of the sanctioning agents, and therefore to the preservation of the impartiality of the decision.

51. The practice first began in Great Britain in 1662, when the Scottish Parliament voted secretly (in disguised hand) on the Billeting Act. This act was repudiated by Charles II. The Secret ballot was not used again by the Scottish Parliament until 1705. In the United States, the use of the secret ballot was introduced in the New England colonies, and in Pennsylvania, Delaware, and the two Carolinas at the time of the American Revolution, beginning in 1775. See “Ballot,” Encyclopedia Britannica, 11th edition (New York: Encyclopedia Britannica, Inc., 1910), III, pp. 279–81.

D. Double Jeopardy

Another fundamental principle of biblical civil order is that when the jury declares an individual “not guilty,” this individual may not lawfully be tried by any other jury for the same offense. This is known in western jurisprudence as the prohibition against double jeopardy. The jury’s decision is final whenever it declares an individual not guilty. This is analogous judicially to God’s definitive declaration of an individual as being not guilty. When that declaration is made, no one can ever lawfully bring the same charge against the individual whom God has declared not guilty. “For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Rom. 8:38–39).

1. The Innocence of Jesus

Obviously, the definitive example that we have in all of history is God’s declaration of Jesus Christ’s innocence, declared publicly by means of the resurrection. When God declared Jesus Christ “not guilty” and raised Him from the dead, this testified to all mankind that no judicially valid accusation could ever be brought again against Jesus Christ. The same is true of all people whom God has declared not guilty. Unlike his power in the Old Covenant era (Job 1:6–12), Satan can no longer bring formal accusations in heaven against those to whom God has transferred Jesus Christ’s judicial innocence. “And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him. And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ: for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night” (Rev. 12:9–10).

Yet this protection from a second trial works both ways. The condemned person is only required to pay once: either economic restitution to the victim or final earthly restitution to God directly (execution). He is not to be brought before the court for the same crime, once he has made restitution. This principle is grounded in the judicial principle of the substitutionary atonement. Bahnsen wrote:

It is uniformly recognized that Scripture prohibits a double infliction of punishment (e.g., the substitutionary atonement of Christ rests on this cardinal point with respect to eternal judgment). Therefore, double trial (i.e., double jeopardy) is ruled out; a man once tried and sentenced is not to be subjected to further trial for the same offense. Otherwise the biblical restriction of forty stripes (Deut. 25: 3) would be senseless; through retrial for the same crime a man could repeatedly be given sets of forty stripes. Thus double trial is forbidden. Now, if this protection is extended even to the guilty, to those convicted of offense, how much more should the protection be afforded to those who are acquitted as innocent? To grant this security to the convicted and withhold it from the innocent would indirectly constitute showing respect unto the wicked and a double standard of treatment (cf. Deut. 25:13–16). Therefore, to violate the prohibition of double jeopardy is to run counter to underlying principles of biblical justice.⁵²

He cited II Samuel 14:4–11, where David was tricked by Joab (vv. 2–3) into granting protection from further legal action to a man (mythical) who had supposedly slain his brother in a fight. David's honoring of the principle of double jeopardy was the judicial basis of his decision.

The principle of protection against double jeopardy is to bring a solution in history to a formal dispute that could not be otherwise solved. The accused, brought before the court and then declared not guilty by the jury, knows that he will not have to worry in the future about defending himself against that particular accusation. Because the jury's declaration of innocence is final, it leads to a reduced number of appeals to higher courts. Only those cases in which a jury has declared an individual guilty do we see a stream of appeals to higher courts.

This protection against double jeopardy does not apply to church courts. First, church membership is voluntary. Second, court costs are minimal. Third, and most important, unlike American civil government, local church government is not divided into judicial, legislative, and executive branches. A church court is unitary. There must be a way to overturn the decisions of such a unitary local power. A local congregation's declaration of "not guilty" can be overturned by a higher court. If this were not true, no liberal clergyman could be removed from office when declared innocent by his liberal congregation, presbytery, or synod. The protection of biblical preaching and the sacraments is more important than the preservation of double jeopardy protection.

52. Greg L. Bahnsen, "Double Jeopardy: A Case Study in the Influence of Christian Legislation," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Winter, 1975–76), pp. 44–45.

2. Justice and Scarcity

If this protection were not available, then agents of the state, funded by compulsory taxation, could bring the same accusation against someone until a jury would convict. This would bankrupt the accused. The negative sanction of bankruptcy would replace the negative sanction of a declared penalty.⁵³ The jury system places a legal boundary around the state. The state cannot lawfully bring further economic sanctions against a person who has been declared innocent by a jury of his peers.

We live in a world of limited resources. We have only so much time, so much money, and so many lawyers to defend us. By making the jury's declaration of "not guilty" a final declaration, we announce that we cannot spend unlimited resources to convict an individual. This acknowledges that we must live with imperfect justice.⁵⁴ It acknowledges that we must live with cheaper justice. Finally, it acknowledges that one of our goals is swift justice. We can get these cases settled, though not perfectly. This also means that the local jury's power of the veto in civil justice always remains at the local level. This is recognized in Anglo-American civil jurisprudence. No court, no king, no civil magistrate can overcome this veto under common law.⁵⁵ This makes the jury the most important single Anglo-American civil institution for the preservation of liberty against unwarranted exten-

53. When a grand jury decides to indict someone, it is in effect declaring him guilty. It will cost him a small fortune to defend himself. Only if the prosecuting agency of civil government were compelled by law to reimburse him for his expenses if he is subsequently declared innocent, including the value of his lost time, would the present legal order be just.

54. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice: The Adverse Consequences of Current Legal Doctrine on the American Courtroom (New York: Basic Books, 1974).

55. Anglo-American admiralty law is different. The British in the eighteenth century used admiralty law in their attempt to avoid local colonial juries that refused to convict smugglers—a problem that the central government had encountered as early as the reign of Henry VIII. Charles M. Andrews, The Colonial Period of American History, 4 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1938] 1964), IV, England's Commercial and Colonial Policy, pp. 223–24. This battle began in earnest in the colonies in 1696 with Parliament's passage of "An Act for preventing Frauds and regulating Abuses in the Plantation Trade," which extended the jurisdiction of the vice-admiralty courts in the colonies. Ibid., IV, p. 160.

sions of power by a central government.

By placing fundamental power in the hands of local juries and local courts, biblical law increases the likelihood that the principles of the law will be best known and best applied at the local level, where they will be applied first. It also means that local citizens have a great responsibility to understand and master the application of biblical legal principles to historical circumstances. The local citizen who applies the universal principles of biblical law to his local circumstances is the linchpin of the whole biblical justice system.

The presence of judicially well-informed local jurors leads to a greater predictability of the outcome of disputes. It also leads to greater self-government as a necessary consequence of this law. It means that these individuals in a local community will have much greater knowledge—accurate knowledge—of how a particular court case will result. What it means is that individuals who are unwilling to settle their disputes out of court, because of their lack of knowledge of the likely decision of that court, will be pressured to settle their disputes before coming into the court if each of them is fairly confident that he knows what that outcome will be. The individual who suspects that the outcome will be against him has a much greater incentive to settle the dispute out of court for that reason. Again, this reduces the case load in the court, and it also reduces the cost of achieving justice in the community.

We have seen that the civil jury is a fundamental agency—perhaps the fundamental agency—of political freedom.⁵⁶ We have seen why it keeps tyrannical bureaucracies at a distance. We have also seen why the presence of the jury reduces the cost of civil government. It also reduces the cost of settling disputes outside of courts. The jury system is central to the preservation of liberty, and it accomplishes this task on a cost-effective basis.

For this system to function properly in history, judges and jurors must be bound by a single set of universal standards. These standards are the foundation of civic righteousness. The Old Testament affirmed these standards and presented them in a form which the average citizen could understand merely by listening carefully (Deut. 31:10–13).⁵⁷

56. Magna Carta's principle of trial by a jury of one's peers (1215) antedated by over six centuries the principle of universal suffrage by secret ballot. The American territory of Wyoming gave the vote to women in 1869. Wyoming became a state in 1890.

57. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 74.

This was crucial if the average citizen was to exercise self-government under law, and it was also crucial if the average citizen was to serve either as a juror or a judge. The New Testament affirms universal legal standards. The New Testament also affirms that all Christians in the community are to be ready to serve as judges in the community.

E. “Judge Not!”

One of the most famous New Testament verses, in one of the most misunderstood passages, is Matthew 7:1: “Judge not, that ye be not judged.” What antinomians fail to recognize is that Matthew 7:1 is followed by Matthew 7:2: “For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.” We must raise this crucial question: What if we do want to receive righteous judgment? Then we must judge righteously, not abstain from judging. Matthew 7:2 establishes the legitimacy of the quest for righteous judgment. So do Matthew 7:3 and 7:4. “And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother’s eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye?” Then comes Matthew 7:5: “Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother’s eye.”

The idea behind Matthew 7:1–5 should be very clear: it is legitimate and even mandatory that we seek righteous judgment if we do not want to be brought under civil judges who exercise unrighteous judgment. First, we are to exercise self-judgment: identifying the beam in our own eye and then removing it. Second, we are to exercise legitimate and righteous judgment of our brother: warning him of the mote in his eye. In both cases, clear vision is mandatory. But the popular interpretation by Christian antinomians is that this passage prohibits making judgments. On the contrary, it make mandatory righteous judging by the saints. It also makes trial by jury mandatory: first in the church (Christian vs. Christian: I Cor. 6); then in civil government.

Can you imagine a society that would attempt to run its army or police forces in terms of the antinomians’ interpretation of “judge not”? This would produce social chaos for the righteous and a free ride for lawbreakers. Nevertheless, pious Christians insist that Christians should never criticize others. If this were accepted as a valid judicial principle, it would turn over all civil government to covenant-breakers.

Christians would not even be allowed to vote, for voting is a formal means of judging: the bringing of negative sanctions against poor performers in the political realm.

We should also ask: Why the metaphor of the eye in this passage? The eye in the Bible is used time and again as the metaphor of exercising judgment: evaluation and execution. "And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (Gen. 1:31a). "And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee" (Deut. 7:16). The eye perceives the facts around us. The eye is the metaphorical agency by which we sort the reality around us. The eye is the metaphorical agency of righteousness judgment. This is why we are told if we are lured into some sin by the eye, we are to rip the eye out (Matt. 18:9). This is not to be taken literally, but it is to show us how important it is not to misuse God's gift of vision to man.

We are no more to say "Judge not, in order that you be not judged!" than we are to say "See not, in order that you be not lured into sin!" These verses teach the very opposite: "Judge righteously, in order that you may be judged righteously," and "sin not, in order that you may see clearly." It is by means of the metaphorical eye that we are to exercise judgment in history. Yes, the Scripture says to rip our eyes out, but this instruction is given in order to persuade us to exercise incorruptible vision. Sin is worse than blindness; hence, we are told by implication, "sin not," not "see not." Yes, the verse says "judge not that ye be not judged," but the goal is not to persuade us either to close our eyes or to stop judging. The goal is to persuade us of the importance of always exercising righteous judgment in terms of God's Bible-revealed law. What the passage really says is this: when we seek righteous judgment we must do so by always exercising righteous judgment. This refers to our individual circumstances, meaning self-judgment. It also refers to our civil actions as either jurors or judges in the community.

F. Confession and Plea-Bargaining

There is always the possibility of self-confession. Such a confession must be based on a frank and true admission of the facts. The individual must not be a mental deficient. He must also not be a known seeker of publicity. There are individuals who testify again and again to the police that they committed a particular crime, when in fact the police know that it would be impossible for this person to have committed the crime. More important, there must be no torture of an individual in order to gain a confession or information regarding criminal behavior.

Torture in the West was introduced by the Greeks and passed into Roman law.⁵⁸ It was not common in the Medieval era. It reappeared in Europe during the early Renaissance—specifically, during the Inquisition of the thirteenth century. This had been preceded by the legal revolution of the twelfth century, when Roman civil law was reintroduced into Europe.⁵⁹ This was part of a four-fold Renaissance rediscovery process: the reintroduction of Roman civil law, torture, widespread chattel slavery,⁶⁰ and occultism.⁶¹ The use of torture is exclusively an attribute of God. It is confined to the life hereafter. The individual is to testify to the truth. An individual who is being tortured has a tremendous incentive to admit to anything in order to stop the pain. Thus, torture is inherently against the law of God. It encourages people to testify to falsehoods: bearing false witness.

Second, there must be no promise by the civil authorities of leniency as a result of the criminal's confession. The victim of a crime may lawfully specify a reduced penalty in his quest for a conviction, but not the state. The victim may promise to reduce the penalty, but only if the criminal confesses to the actual crime, not a lesser crime. The practice of confessing to a lesser crime in order to escape prosecution for a greater one is known in the modern world as plea bargaining. An individual should not be not allowed to testify to a lesser crime in order to save the state the cost of prosecuting him in order to convict him of a greater crime. An individual is to be brought to justice, not injustice. The state is the victim's agent, who is in turn God's agent. The victim is assigned the responsibility of bringing a covenant lawsuit into court against the suspected criminal. The state must therefore prosecute to 58. Edward Peters, Torture (New York: Basil Blackwell, 1985), ch. 1.

59. Ibid., ch. 2. Peters wrote: "The legal revolution took more than a century to be accomplished. It appears that its new procedure was generally in place before torture became a part of it." Ibid., p. 45.

60. This began on the Atlantic islands in the mid-1400s: sugar production. William D. Phillips, Jr., "The Old World background of slavery in the Americas," in Slavery and the Rise of the Atlantic System, ed. Barbara L. Solow (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991), ch. 2.

61. Edgar Wind, Pagan Mysteries in the Renaissance (London: Faber & Faber, 1958); D. P. Walker, Spiritual and Demonic Magic from Ficino to Campanella (London: Warburg Institute, 1958); Francis A. Yates, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (New York: Vintage, [1964] 1969).

the limit of the law.⁶²

When someone plea bargains by confessing to a lesser crime, the state then announces publicly that it is satisfied. The public is not informed regarding the true degree of the individual's guilt. The degree of danger to the public is underestimated by such a public announcement by the state. Thus, the state is offering false witness. While it is true that those who commit greater crimes may escape judgment because the state does not have sufficient evidence to convict them of those crimes, it is also true that the state is not to bear false witness against a suspected criminal. The state is not to imply that the criminal committed a greater crime than he did, nor is the state entitled to insinuate that the criminal committed a lesser crime than he did. In the prosecution of the law, there is not to be a move either to excessive leniency or excessive severity: "Ye shall observe to do therefore as the LORD your God hath commanded you: ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left" (Deut. 5:32). The law is to be prosecuted in terms of the suspected acts of the individual.

G. Rendering Judgment: A Voice of Authority

Someone must pronounce judgment after the trial ends. Only a lawful authority may do this. This is the second point of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy/authority.⁶³ A voice of authority is inescapable in the judgments of men. The creation was spoken into existence: "Let there be. . . ." God's law was spoken into existence. We know this because the Bible says repeatedly that "God commanded Moses to say"—i.e., announce God's laws. God spoke His sovereign word—the ultimate and primary word—and Moses repeated it as a secondary witness. The lawmaker acts re-creatively: discovering and announcing God's word or else denying it. He is inescapably a witness: either to the truth of God's word or against it.

God is identified in the Bible as the word (John 1:1). There is no escape from the speaking of God's word in history. Men are representative agents, so they cannot escape this obligation. There must be a voice of authority that does pronounce judgment: guilty or not guilty. It is never a question of pronouncing judgment vs. not pronouncing judgment.

62. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

63. Rendering authoritative covenantal judgment is a covenantal act, and therefore civil judgment conforms to the five points of the biblical covenant model. See Appendix E: "The Covenantal Structure of Judgment."

It is always a question of who pronounces judgment and the judgment pronounced. Silence on the part of the authority is nevertheless a judgment. The authority cannot escape responsibility by remaining silent.

Conclusion

The Bible specifies the locus of primary judicial sovereignty: the local court. This court has the benefit of better knowledge of the facts and circumstances of any alleged crime. It has a tradition of judicial decisions (precedents) that is familiar to jurors. It is made up of people who speak God's law—jurisdiction—with a familiar local "accent." This enables local residents to forecast more accurately what is expected of them. This reduces forecasting costs.

The jury is the culmination of a long tradition of Christian history. The jury makes possible a greater division of judicial labor. A jury is less likely to be arbitrary than a lone judge. Men can obtain justice less expensively because of the greater efficiency of a jury's collective judgment. The authority of the jury at the local level provides a counter to the decisions of professional bureaucrats.

By lodging in local courts the final authority to declare an accused person "not guilty," God's law provides a check to the centralization of political power. A distant civil government cannot impose its will on local residents without a considerable expenditure of time and money, possibly risking the public's rejection of the central government's legitimacy, the crucial resource of any government.

16

THE STATE'S MONOPOLY OF VENGEANCE

Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; I am the LORD (Lev. 19:18).

The theocentric focus of this law is this: only God can know a person's heart (Jer. 17:9–10). Therefore, only God is entitled to judge a person's heart. Because a civil judge is not God, he cannot legitimately claim to be able to search another person's heart in his quest for civil justice. The affairs of the heart and mind are off-limits to the state. There can be no lawful civil sanctions against thoughts or attitudes. We must conclude that the prohibition against holding grudges (Lev. 19:18) cannot be an aspect of the Mosaic civil law.¹ Such a civil law is inherently unenforceable.

A. Love Is Unenforceable

Civil law also cannot enforce an attitude of love; hence, civil law is not the focus of the command to love one's neighbor, except insofar as love is defined judicially: treating the neighbor legally, i.e., love as the fulfilling of God's law (Rom. 13:10). But even in this case, there would have to be an infraction of a specific civil law or an act against another person's rights—lawful immunities (protected boundaries)—in order to enforce this law of compulsory love. Hence, this law, too, is inherently unenforceable by the state.

Nevertheless, this verse begins with a prohibition against individu-

1. This is why all polygraph or "lie detector" exams must be submitted to voluntarily. A civil court cannot lawfully use the results of a compulsory lie detector examination as evidence against an individual, nor may any civil court use a person's refusal to submit to such a test as evidence against him. The same principle applies to the use of hypnotism.

al acts of vengeance. This is clearly an aspect of civil law; the relevant Mosaic case law is the requirement that any man who injures another man in a fight must pay restitution to him (Ex. 21:18–19): no private vengeance.² But why is this verse’s negative injunction attached to two other injunctions that are clearly individual moral injunctions—aspects of self-government rather than civil government? By prohibiting personal grudges and requiring personal love, this verse makes it clear that the concern of the civil portion of this civil law is the elimination of privately imposed vengeance. The civil prohibition against taking vengeance applies only to individual actions. This prohibition does not apply to the state. Civil law applies negative sanctions to individuals who commit specified prohibited acts; hence, it applies to individual acts of vengeance. Vengeance is legitimate when imposed by the state.

The parallel verse in Deuteronomy is used by Paul in his epistle to the Romans to introduce his discussion of the civil magistrate. “Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord” (Rom. 12:19; cf. Deut. 32:35a). Paul’s message is not that there should be no vengeance in history. On the contrary, he immediately launches into a discussion of the civil magistrate’s lawful administration of vengeance: “. . . for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil” (Rom. 13:4b). It is a mistake to see Paul’s prohibition of vengeance in these verses as applying to the institution of the state, any more than “thou shalt not kill” applies to the state.³ What Leviticus 19:18 does is to establish the state as the lawful monopolist of covenantal vengeance in history.⁴ The Bible is neither pacifistic nor anarchistic; it affirms the legitimacy of the state in seeking public law and order. But both the law and the order must be God’s—a covenantal, oath-bound law-order.⁵

B. Monopoly Control Over the Sword

The Bible makes it clear that the judicial role of the state is derived directly from God. The civil government is a covenantal institution,

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3: Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 35.

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

4. The family is not an agency of vengeance. It is an agency of justice only within the boundaries of a covenanted household.

5. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 12. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) along with the family and the church. The state is an agency that applies negative physical sanctions in addition to enforcing restitution. This authority to bring negative physical sanctions is granted by God to fathers (the “rod”) and to the state (the “sword”). The family lawfully brings positive sanctions; the state does not. The family creates wealth; the state protects wealth, but does not create it.⁶

1. The Sword

The Bible establishes the civil government as God’s monopoly of vengeance. Individuals must be protected from vengeance by anyone except a civil magistrate. A trial is required by God before vengeance is imposed. There are two archetypes of such a trial: the historical trial of Adam, Eve, and the serpent (Gen. 3), and the final judgment (Matt. 25). There must be a public declaration of the court’s decision before there can be a lawful imposition of vengeance. Vengeance, being judicial, must be preceded by a public declaration of guilt. The imputation of guilt is always a covenantal act. It is never lawfully an individual act, nor is the subsequent imposition of negative penal sanctions.⁷

This covenantal aspect of penal sanctions places judicial and institutional boundaries on the spread of violence. God delegates to officers of the state the sole authority to declare guilt and impose vengeance. The investiture of such judicial authority is the civil equivalent of the church’s anointing or laying on of hands. In modern democracies, an implicit priestly authority of individual voters is the humanistic covenantal basis of this political anointing.

Civil sanctions must be exclusively negative. They are penal sanctions. They punish those who have violated the protected legal boundaries. Any attempt to transform the state into an agency that lawfully

6. The major exception seems to be highways. In the Mosaic Covenant, a few highways were compulsory as physical avenues to justice for those guilty of accidental manslaughter (Deut. 19:3). There were no doubt positive economic side-effects of these roads, but their function was judicial, not economic. With the New Covenant’s annulment of the law of the kinsman-redeemer, state-financed highways can be defended biblically only by implication: the provision of less expensive access to legal centers.

State-funded roadways have negative effects as well as positive. What is virtually never discussed publicly is the major economic reason why there is such pollution-creating urbanization today: the existence of huge, taxpayer-financed highway systems leading into cities and criss-crossing through cities. The largest of these highways are called “freeways” in California. They are not free.

7. This is why the office of kinsman-redeemer must have been a civil office. See subsection 5: “The Kinsman-Redeemer.”

dispenses positive sanctions is an aspect of political messianism. A messianic state is regarded as a healer, meaning an agency that is a legitimate source of wealth rather than the absorber of the wealth of the citizen-priests who constitute it judicially.

One politician who saw the implications of such a view of the state was Frédéric Bastiat. In 1848, the year of the European revolutions,⁸ Bastiat, a free trade polemicist and member of the French Legislative Assembly, had his essay, "The State," printed in the Journal des débats. A master of analogies, he compared the state with a pair of hands:

The fact is, the state does not and cannot have one hand only. It has two hands, one to take and the other to give—in other words, the rough hand and the gentle hand. The activity of the second is necessarily subordinated to the activity of the first. Strictly speaking, the state can take and not give. We have seen this happen, and it is to be explained by the porous and absorbent nature of its hands, which always retain a part, and sometimes the whole, of what they touch. But what has never been seen, what will never be seen and cannot even be conceived, is the state giving the public more than it has taken from it. It is therefore foolish for us to take the humble attitude of beggars when we ask anything of the state. It is fundamentally impossible for it to confer a particular advantage on some of the individuals who constitute the community without inflicting a greater damage on the entire community.⁹

What one hand giveth, the other hand taketh away . . . plus an extra percentage for administration. (In the United States in the late 1980s, this extra fee amounted to 100%: half went to the beneficiaries, half to government bureaucrats.)¹⁰

2. Judicial Conditions of Wealth-Creation

The state makes wealth-creation possible for individuals by protecting private property, i.e., by protecting individuals who own property. The state is required by God to enforce the decisions of property owners to exclude others from using their property. The state is therefore to enforce legal boundaries that are established by private contract. Property owners are given legal immunities—rights—by God in history, and these immunities are to be defended by the state whenever the victim of an unauthorized invasion appeals to the civil magistrate. The state is to defend the rights of stewards over the property that God has assigned to them by covenant (lawful inheritance) or by contract. As Rushdoony wrote, “All property is held in trust under and in stewardship to God the King. No institution can exercise any prerogative of God unless specifically delegated to do so, within the specified area of God’s law. The state thus is the ministry of justice, not the original property owner or the sovereign lord over the land.”¹¹

8. Jean Sigmann, 1848: The Romantic and Democratic Revolutions in Europe (New York: Harper & Row, 1979); Frank Eyck (ed.), The Revolutions of 1848–49 (New York: Barnes & Noble, 1972).

9. Frédéric Bastiat, "The State" (Sept. 25, 1848), in Bastiat, Selected Essays on Political Economy, ed. George B. de Huszar (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1964), p. 146. (<http://bit.ly/BastiatState>)

10. James L. Payne, The Culture of Spending: Why Congress Lives Beyond Our Means (San Francisco: ICS Press, 1991), p. 51.

This means that property rights are human rights. With one exception, any attempt to distinguish property rights judicially from human rights is inherently statist and anti-biblical. That exception is the subset of rights that can be called priestly rights: worship and life. Sacrilege and murder are to be defended against, even at the expense of violations of other legal immunities. Where an individual is threatening one of these priestly rights, the state must intervene to protect the victim. In some cases, God authorizes another individual to intervene if the state refuses. Apart from these two priestly exceptions, however, the distinction between human rights and property rights is a subversive attempt to legitimize state power in its interference with a person’s stewardship over the property assigned to him by God and for which he is held responsible by God. Property rights are inescapably an aspect of human rights. It is true that property rights are not absolute—nothing since the closing of the canon of Scripture is absolute—but they are on the same judicial level as any other human rights except those associated with worship and life. Property rights are not impersonal and therefore are not judicially subordinate to personal rights; property rights are both personal and judicial. The familiar dualism between human rights and property rights should always be resolved in terms of stewardship under God. The key question is this: To whom has God delegated the authority to exercise representative control His property? A discussion of the rights of property should begin with a consideration of God’s rights to property.

11. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 504.

3. Positive Benefits Through Negative Sanctions

By remaining exclusively negative judicially, a biblically restricted state serves as a beneficial agency of government within society. This is the only way that it can remain an exclusively positive force in society, given its source of funds. The state is financed by the collection of taxes.¹² Taxes, like the church's tithe, apply legitimately only to individual income and net increases in an individual's wealth (capital gains). This means that neither the church nor the state can lawfully tax capital, meaning property. This also means that the state cannot lawfully tax church property. Property, biblically speaking, is tax-immune—not just the church's, but all wealth-producing assets. The fruit may be taxed, not the tree. The state is an economically dependent institution, not an economically creative institution.

The state has a God-given right to collect taxes by threat of violence. It is therefore not authorized by God to become an agency of positive sanctions, for that would involve asserting its authority as a compulsory agency of healing.¹³ There is no compulsory, earthly, covenantal agency of healing in history. Churches and families, while covenantal agencies of healing, are voluntary institutions.¹⁴ The state is compulsory. It can reward one group only by imposing penalties on some other group. God has therefore placed it under strict judicial boundaries. It is not to be regarded by anyone as a creative institution. It is instead exclusively protective. It is a monopolistic agency of vengeance against wrongdoers (Rom. 13:1–7).¹⁵ Its task is not to make men good; rather, it is to penalize biblically identified evil acts. To this end, God has given it the sword.

12. It can print fiat money, which is a form of taxation: compulsory wealth redistribution from those who gain access to the fiat money before prices rise, from those who gain access to money later in the process. The state can also borrow, but this only transfers wealth from lenders to the state. The state can gain access to credit only by promising to repay the lenders. This means that it must impose taxes (including the inflation tax) later.

13. This is not a denial of the state's legitimate role in public health: defense against contagious diseases. See chapter 14.

14. How can the church be an agency of healing if its only God-mandated income is the tithe? Isn't its dependent condition analogous to the state's dependence on taxes? Doesn't the church also have only two hands: a gentle one and a rough one? This analysis overlooks the positive aspect of the church's covenantal sanctions: the sacraments. Only the church can lawfully confer the sacraments on its members. In contrast, the state is not a means of special grace. It is an agency that administers common grace only to the extent that it confines itself to punishing evil acts.

15. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

God is the original source of lawful violence—negative sanctions—in both history and eternity. The state is God's designated monopolistic agent of lawful violence against convicted criminals. God brings negative sanctions; so does the state. God's negative sanctions are physical, in time and eternity. The state's ultimate negative physical sanction is the right of execution: excluding people from continuing access to the blessings of God in history. By executing a person, the state transfers the person's soul into God's heavenly court for final judgment. The state's court thereby becomes the agency of next-to-the-last judgment. God's court brings the final judgment.

4. Self-Defense

This does not mean that only the state can lawfully possess and use deadly weapons. The person who kills another in self-defense is acting as a lawful agent of God. There are civil laws governing this God-granted authority to kill another person. The case law of Exodus 22:2 allows a householder to kill a burglar if the owner catches him while the intruder is breaking in. The intruder has no legitimate reason to be inside the house. The resident has a legitimate role as a defender of his household's boundaries. God has delegated this authority to him. The occupant cannot know for sure why the invader has entered his home without permission, so he is allowed by God's law to assume the worst: the invader is a potential murderer. He can lawfully be killed by the person who resides there. The mere transgression of the home's boundary is sufficient to remove the protection of God's civil law from the invader. If caught by the homeowner and threatened with a weapon to prevent his flight before the police arrive, the invader is not protected by God's law from execution should he attack the homeowner. Those lawfully inside the house are protected by God's law; therefore, the invader is not. The thief may be struck while breaking in. If he attempts to flee, the resident is not supposed to kill him, for he is no longer breaking in. But the benefit of the doubt is always with the defender. This execution of an illegal invader is not an act of personal vengeance; rather, it is an act that defends a lawful boundary. The defender acts in the name of the state and is authorized by the state because no policeman is available to enforce the law.

By implication, this case law establishes the judicial plea of self-defense. The person who is given cause to believe that an assailant is ready to kill him is entitled to kill the assailant. The civil government is required by God to investigate the reasons for any killing of a human being.¹⁶ The judges must examine the evidence in order to determine whether a murder trial should be held.¹⁷ The person who faces a life-threatening assault must decide which risk is greatest: (1) death from the assailant if no action is taken; (2) death from the assailant in a failed self-defense; (3) death from the state for murder of the assailant. There is a slogan used by American defenders of their Constitutional right to own and use guns.¹⁸ "I would rather be tried by twelve than carried by six." When a person is faced with a life-threatening attack, a jury in his future is preferable to pallbearers.

The plea of self-defense is in fact a plea of the right to defend oneself as an authorized agent of the state. Self-defense is not an autonomous act of violence. It is not an act of vengeance. It is a boundary defense.

What is clearly prohibited is vengeance by the victim after the suspect has fled from the scene of the crime. In such a case, there can be no claim of self-defense if the suspect dies as a result of the attack. The victim faces no life-threatening attack. His response is therefore limited to bringing a lawsuit. He may lawfully seek out the civil magistrate as a public avenger, but he is not allowed to impose vengeance unilaterally.¹⁹

16. The passage that establishes this requirement is Deuteronomy 21:1–9, which requires a special sacrifice when a body is found outside a city, and the elders cannot discover who committed the crime.

17. In common law, this authority to decide to hold a trial belongs to the grand jury, which hands down an indictment. Then the trial is held.

18. This is the Second Amendment of the Constitution: part of the original Bill of Rights. More than any other Constitutional guarantee, this one is under political assault. It was imposed on the Federal government in the 1790s because citizens had achieved parity of weaponry with the state. They were determined to keep this parity, which they recognized as the means of enforcing boundaries on the state. Parity in eapony was the technical basis of the advent of modern democracy. Carroll Quigley, Tragedy and Hope: A History of the World in Our Time (New York: Macmillan, 1966), pp. 34–35. Quigley was an expert in the history of warfare and weaponry and their relation to politics.

19. Some legal codes authorize people to pursue a criminal who is fleeing from the scene of a crime. This is the doctrine of citizen's arrest. Civil government may lawfully authorize such a practice. This law in effect makes the citizen a deputy of the state. If the suspect is injured by the citizen-arrester under such circumstances, the citizen would be at legal risk if the suspect is not subsequently convicted for the crime in question.

5. The Kinsman-Redeemer

This restriction did not apply in the Mosaic economy to a family's blood-avenger (kinsman-redeemer). The nearest male relative was empowered by law to execute anyone suspected of having murdered his relative, even if the death was an accident (Deut. 19). In this unique instance, the kinsman-redeemer became a lawful agent of the tribal civil government. On the one hand, Deuteronomy 19 delegated to the nearest male kinsman the state's authority to impose vengeance, i.e., to the person most likely to have the emotional incentive to impose it. On the other hand, it placed judicial boundaries around the spread of clan vengeance in the following ways. First, only one person could lawfully perform this act of vengeance. Second, he could not pursue his target into a city of refuge. Third, if cleared by the judges of such a city of refuge, the suspect could return home in safety at the death of the high priest. Fourth, if the suspect was caught and executed by the blood-avenger before he reached the city, the dead man's family could not lawfully seek vengeance against the blood-avenger. By implication, it was not legal for the fleeing person to kill the blood-avenger in self-defense, any more than he was authorized to kill a civil magistrate. Of course, the fleeing person might prefer to be "tried by twelve rather than carried by six." He might subsequently claim that he did not know the pursuer was in fact the dead person's blood-avenger. But in a small, face-to-face community, this excuse would not have carried much weight.

The New Covenant has annulled the office of earthly high priest (Heb. 7), which was central to the office of kinsman-redeemer (Num. 35:28). The New Testament therefore has annulled the family as an agency empowered by the state to bring this negative physical sanction. It also annulled the geographical monopoly of certain tribes over specified regions in Israel. The laws governing the blood-avenger/kinsman-redeemer are no longer in force. This includes the laws of the levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5–10).²⁰

God's law places boundaries around men's lives. The state may lawfully deprive a person of his life if the person is convicted of a capital crime, but otherwise he is to be protected. The law is an innocent person's defensive shield because the law is the state's offensive weapon against boundary violators.

20. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 64.

C. The Warlord Society

The state possesses a monopoly of vengeance and violence, although in some instances the individual acts as an agent of the state in defending himself and those under his authority. What is the rationale for the creation of such a monopoly? To limit the number of people seeking violent vengeance, i.e., boundary violators.

These state-“anointed” agents can be identified. The agent has the authority to announce himself as an agent of the state. He is usually marked in some way: uniform, badge, or credentials.²¹ It is illegal for anyone not so authorized (oath-bound) to wear or bear such marks of authority. The authority to act in an official capacity as God’s minister of vengeance is circumscribed by God’s law. This limits the number of instances in which violence becomes likely. The goal of any monopoly is to reduce the quantity supplied of some scarce economic resource. In this case, the item to be limited is violence.

By limiting the amount of lawful violence in a society, the law of God channels violence. Residents in a covenanted nation know what to expect from the state. They can identify the lawful uses and applications of violence, and therefore they can identify the unlawful uses. There are far fewer lawful uses than unlawful uses. Biblical law specifies the boundaries of lawful violence and thereby identifies unlawful violence. It includes some violent acts and therefore excludes all other violent acts.

It is less costly to specify the legitimate agents of violence than to identify every possible illegitimate agent. By identifying the primary agency of coercion, i.e., the state, biblical law places this institution under greater public scrutiny. By lowering the number of legal public acts, biblical law lowers the cost of publicly scrutinizing the state. More limits are placed around the state as a result of these lower costs of scrutiny. As the agency of violence, the state is feared; a feared agency is likely to be scrutinized more closely by its potential victims. Citizens covenant under God to establish state authority; they monitor the state’s activities because of their fear that the state’s officers will exceed their lawful boundaries. This is especially true in societies where the state has not become a functional agent of healing. The more acceptable the messianic claims of the state, the less incentive there is for citizens to scrutinize it and limit it. The power to tax is the power to destroy, and the costs of healing must be paid for by higher taxes. The healer state becomes the destroyer state.

21. His vehicle may be similarly marked. Drivers of state-authorized vehicles alone have the right to use flashing red lights and sirens.

The state is required by God to operate under God-revealed biblical law. This biblical law-order is quite specific. The state must apply sanctions specified by the victims. These sanctions are specific. The state is under judicial limits.²² It is also governed by written law. These laws are supposed to be understood by citizens, which is why the whole law had to be read to the assembled nation every seventh year (Deut. 31:10–13).²³ Citizens are expected by God to know the boundaries that God has placed around them as individuals and also around the state.

This means that the state's sword is to be used sparingly. It is governed by God's civil law. The state is not authorized by God to impose negative sanctions outside the limits of the law. The law circumscribes the application of the sword. Put another way, the magistrate's use of violence cannot lawfully be extended to areas that have not been authorized by the law, either explicitly or as extensions of a case law or a judicial principle. In short, whatever is not prohibited by law is allowed. This legal principle is derived from God's original command to Adam regarding judicial boundaries placed around a particular tree. Everything else was permitted to Adam; hence, no negative sanctions were threatened in these areas.

D. Trinitarianism, Unitarianism, Individualism

There are three general judicial ideals: Trinitarianism, unitarianism, and individualism. The first is covenantal, the second is holistic, and the third is atomistic. Their representative philosophical views are covenantalism, realism, and nominalism. Their representative civil views are theocracy, statism, and anarchism. Their representative economic views are morally bounded capitalism,²⁴ socialism, and anarcho-capitalism.

Trinitarianism establishes the legitimacy of four judicially circum-

22. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix M.

23. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 75.

24. Free exchange and free pricing of anything except morally prohibited acts or commodities, e.g., prostitution, pornography, and the use of addictive drugs in quantities that distort perception enough to produce actions that endanger the individual's life or the lives of those around him.

scribed, oath-bound covenants under God: individual, ecclesiastical, familistic, and civil. Trinitarianism affirms the equal ultimacy of the one and the many: in the Godhead, in history, and in eternity. God is absolutely sovereign; therefore, no single institution is granted final earthly sovereignty.

By establishing limits on the authority of all levels of civil government to tax individuals at a rate equal to or greater than 10% (the tithe), biblical law prohibits socialism. The state is placed under extreme limits. Socialism—the government’s ownership of, or control over, the means of production—is an explicitly anti-biblical ideal.

By establishing the civil government as a monopoly institution for imposing vengeance, biblical law prohibits anarchism. The judicial ideal of modern libertarianism is: (1) the lawful imposition of negative sanctions handed down solely by private law courts; (2) the abolition of all compulsory taxation. Anarchism is an explicitly anti-biblical ideal.

1. Unitarianism and a One-State World

Unitarianism is more than a theology; it is a covenantal system. It has political implications. It is possible to identify unitarian thinking as a separate judicial tradition, as a rival of federalism, which is a judicial development of Trinitarianism: the equal ultimacy of the one and the many. In the eighth edition of his famous study, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (1915), the English jurist A. V. Dicey wrote of unitarianism as a legal ideal: “Unitarianism, in short, means the concentration of the strength of the state in the hands of one visible sovereign power, be that power Parliament or Czar. Federalism means the distribution of the force of the state among a number of co-ordinate bodies each originating in and controlled by the constitution.”²⁵ He was also correct when he observed: “Federal government means weak government.”²⁶

Federalism, Dicey concluded, also means the free market economy. “Federalism, as it defines, and therefore limits, the powers of each department of the administration, is unfavourable to the interference or to the activity of government. Hence a federal government can hardly render services to the nation by undertaking for the national

25. A. V. Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 8th ed. (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, [1915] 1982), p. 87.

26. Ibid., p. 97.

benefit functions which may be performed by individuals. This may be a merit of the federal system; it is, however, a merit which does not commend itself to modern democrats, and no more curious instance can be found of the inconsistent currents of popular opinion which may at the same time pervade a nation or a generation than the coincidence in England of a vague admiration for federalism alongside with a far more decided feeling against the doctrines of so-called laissez faire.²⁷

Were we to develop unitarianism to its logical conclusion, we would arrive at the modern (and also very ancient) ideal of the one-State world. A unitary, centralized civil government possessing all political authority would replace local, regional, and national civil governments. Between the citizen and the central government no intervening civil authority would be allowed to intrude. This is not simply the ideal of a one-world state, meaning a central civil government serving as a supreme appeals court and arbiter between rival nations. It is the ideal of a single unitary state that governs all men: a one-State world. It is the judicial ideal that motivated the builders of the tower of Babel (Gen. 11).²⁸

2. Anarcho-Capitalism as Regional Warlordism

There have been very few intellectual defenses of this libertarian judicial position.²⁹ The practical issues associated with the theoretical ideal of private law courts and private police forces are almost as difficult to resolve as the organizational problems of national defense in a society without a national government—a nation surrounded by hostile national governments, most of which must be presumed to be capable of a military invasion. These issues are, in fact, the very same covenantal issue. The issue is the identification and limitation of the institutional authority to impose negative sanctions against all those who have transgressed certain publicly identifiable boundaries, i.e., invaders.

If no single agency has the monopolistic authority to impose neg-

27. Ibid., pp. 98–99.

28. R. J. Rushdoony, "The Society of Satan," Christian Economics (July 7, Aug. 4, 1964), reprinted in Biblical Economics Today, II (Oct./Nov. 1979). (<http://bit.ly/rjrsos>). Cf. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 19.

29. The most detailed exposition is Bruce L. Benson, The Enterprise of Law: Justice Without the State (San Francisco: Pacific Research Institute for Public Policy, 1990).

ative sanctions, then society must face this crucial question: How can peace be maintained? The free market is voluntaristic. Its negative sanctions are not physical. They involve such actions as refusing to buy a product or complaining publicly about a poor product. But if there is no agency whatsoever that is authorized by the community as a whole to specify and then identify certain acts as violent or fraudulent, then the violence of mankind is removed from publicly agreed-upon, legally sanctioned boundaries. Acts of aggression by sinful men are thereby removed from all civil restraints through the abolition of civil government.

To defend themselves, individuals must then become defensive warriors and avengers. They will voluntarily contract with other men in defensive alliances. If these contractual alliances are not to become civil governments—monopolies of violence—they must not exercise territorial sovereignty. This is another way of saying that they cannot mark out areas of territorial sovereignty: the monopoly authority to include and exclude. They are alliances within a territory, competing with other alliances within the same territory. They lose all covenantal status. There is no means of anointing these alliances or their rulers. There is no civil equivalent of the laying on of hands. There is no way to gain non-coercive agreement from non-participants in the contractual alliance regarding which court or system of courts has lawful jurisdiction over non-participants.

These contractual alliances could take on the character of insurance companies. They might become arbitration societies. They might become gangs. Whatever their legal structure or market positioning, attached to some of these companies will be police forces. Competitive companies in a world without civil sanctions would have to employ appropriate means to enforce sanctions in order to enforce their decisions. The issue of negative physical sanctions cannot be avoided. All people are not peaceful all of the time. Some people will impose negative physical sanctions on others. Negative physical sanctions are therefore an inescapable concept. The decision is not: “negative physical sanctions or no negative physical sanctions.” The question is: Whose negative physical sanctions?

3. Conservatism as International Warlordism

Warlordism is the ideal for international relations for both the right-wing Enlightenment and right-wing Anabaptism. It assumes that there can never be a way to settle international disputes other than by delay, war, or surrender. The Trinitarian ideal of Christendom—clearly, an internationalist ideal—is categorically rejected by both the Enlightenment and Anabaptism. The eighteenth-century's right-wing Enlightenment thinkers denied that there should be a supreme civil court internationally. President Washington's 1796 Farewell Address—a newspaper article, not a speech—is the best example of this view of international affairs. Nations are expected to avoid all legal involvement with each other except when they need military help from each other, as in the case of the crucial 1777 French treaty with the English North American colonies. There is no positive ideal of international relations; only a negative one. This outlook is consistent with the right-wing Enlightenment's ideal of autonomous man.

To the extent that the right-wing Anabaptist tradition has become dominant in Protestant Christianity, there has been an equally strong rejection of the ideal of Christendom, which would include an international system of appeals courts, both civil and ecclesiastical. This outlook parallels the Anabaptists' ideal of the judicially autonomous local congregation.

Internationally, warlordism is today's world system: the strongest military power gains judicial legitimacy wherever it can extend its will. The territorial warlordism of pre-Communist China, where warlords' domains were separated by dialects, or great rivers, or high mountains, is today replicated internationally. Judicial Trinitarianism is opposed to warlordism, both national and international. But the warlord standard dominates international law.

Because statism is the heresy of this age, men assume that politics is primary. It isn't. Church order is primary. Because Jesus set forth the covenantal ideal of a single worldwide church, there is no escape from the covenantal ideal of a one-world state. Jesus made the ideal of ecclesiastical unity inescapably clear in His prayer of intercession: "That they may all be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are one" (John 17:21–22). Ecclesiastical unity—a single confession of faith in the Trinitarian God—is the ideal for eternity; it is also the ideal of history. It is basic to evangelism, Jesus said: "that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." But a one-world state is not the same as a one-state world. There are separate denominations. So are there separate states. But there is a biblical ideal of an appeals court in both church and civil government. Disputes are to be settled apart from war.

The world has become a warlord society because the church is not institutionally unified by a common legal confession. But it is unified in the sense that the whole church participates in the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. This covenantal unity cannot be denied in principle; it can only be delayed in history. But if all men are required by God to have a unified confession of faith in order to gain lawful access to God's judicially unified sacraments, then the ideal of a one-world legal order, and therefore also a one-world state, is a corollary. The civil magistrate is also a minister of God (Rom. 13: 4).³⁰

Because the modern church has rejected postmillennial eschatology, its spokesmen cannot conceive of a confessionally unified international church. They are therefore unable to imagine a confessionally unified international world government. They cannot imagine unity and diversity in one international social order. They have rejected social Trinitarianism.

E. Covenantalism vs. Contractualism

No single agency of law enforcement or defense can gain universal legal authority in any territory by means of private contract exclusively. It must have the authority to impose its standards on those who are unwilling to sign the contract. Social order cannot be attained when individuals do not adhere to the same legal standards. Without a monopoly agency to impose justice, the differing concepts of justice, coupled with unjust, violent people, would produce a warlord society. Fallen man's war of all against all would develop into a series of shifting alliances and conflicts among those individuals who command the most powerful private police forces. No single legal order would dominate a territory.

This is why the Bible is incompatible with all forms of anarchism. The Bible specifies a single legal order as the ideal standard for the whole world. This means that there must be an agency that lawfully possesses a monopoly of violence, biblically speaking. The alternative is the warlord society in which a voluntary alliance may gain temporary power to impose its legal order in a particular territory. It cannot attain legitimacy as the enforcing agent of a single, unified legal order without becoming a civil government.

30. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 11.

This does not mean that there is no right of rebellion against tyrants. Biblical law demands a hierarchy of judges (Ex. 18).³¹ Lower magistrates have legitimate authority, and they can lawfully lead a rebellion against tyranny, as the case of Jeroboam's God-authorized revolt against Rehoboam's high taxes indicates (I Kings 12). Jeroboam served as God's anointed agent of bringing negative sanctions against the central government's tyranny. What the Bible sets forth as an ideal is a one-world state, but not a one-state world. A one-State world is an illegitimate unitarian ideal and an eschatologically impossible goal. The fifth and final kingdom (Dan. 2:35) is Christ's; no other will ever appear.³² The Bible requires civil governments at the local, regional, and international level. It specifies a chain of civil appeals courts, each operating in terms of biblical law, and each subject to reversal by a higher civil court. But a supreme civil court indicates a single state: a civil chain of command under a single legal standard, the Bible.

The movement of history is toward a one-world civil government, either humanist or Christian. This parallels the movement of culture either toward humanism's "global village" or Christendom. It moves toward either a top-down command system or a bottom-up appeals court system. But one thing is sure: it is not moving toward a system of justice based on competing legal orders, despite the flare-ups of tribalism and regionalism as humanism breaks down and messianic religions gain new authority. As the gospel spreads, these rival religions will be replaced. There will be winners and losers in the competition for men's covenantal allegiance, but there will not be any illusion or assertion of judicial neutrality as time goes on. Neutrality is a humanist myth, not a biblical principle. There is no neutrality; hence, a one-world state (but not a one-State world) is a biblical ideal.³³ There can be no authority apart from hierarchy.³⁴ But Exodus 18 makes it clear that this civil government has layers, each with legitimate authority.

31. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 19.

32. This is why any prophecy of a future one-State world, or a future one-world humanist state, is a false prophecy.

33. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

34. Even the equality of being within the three persons of the Trinity is qualified by the theological doctrine of the economical Trinity: hierarchy with respect to function.

F. All Nations Formally Under God

There are several layers of civil government, and in modern Western jurisprudence, several branches within each layer: legislative, executive, and judicial. The delegation of God's unified judicial authority to mankind is always marked by a division of powers, sometimes described as a system of checks and balances.

The existence of a civil covenant, marked by a self-maledictory oath of allegiance, is proof that anarchism is not a biblical ideal. Civil government is a separate jurisdiction from the free market, which is an extension of family government. The state has the God-given authority to settle disputes by force of arms. The free market does not. To argue that it does is to adopt judicial warlordism. But to argue that no one has the right to impose physical sanctions is to adopt utopian pacifism. It is to reject the idea of God's negative sanctions in history through representative agents. If actually legislated, pacifism would lead to tyranny by Satan's representatives in history: evildoers (Rom. 13:1–7). While there can be lawful private arbitration organizations, they do not possess the covenantal authority to impose the sword, that is, the right to declare guilt and impose mandatory penal sanctions. On the other hand, the existence of multiple levels of civil authority (Ex. 18) is proof that judicial centralism is not a biblical ideal. The biblical system of civil government is Trinitarian, not unitarian or atomistic.

There are two theoretical alternatives to social Trinitarianism: political unitarianism and judicial warlordism. The confessional unitarians—which include Orthodox Jews and orthodox Muslims—deny the doctrine of the Trinity. Unitarianism does not affirm the equal ultimacy of the one and the many. It affirms the ultimacy of the one. A consistent application of this view of God leads to the ideal of a top-down centralized state.³⁵ God mandated the tribal land ownership system for Mosaic Israel in order to restrain the development of a unitary state, for Israel's confession was, on the surface, unitarian: "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD" (Deut. 6:4).³⁶ Of course, it was ultimately Trinitarian, for God spoke of Himself as plural: "Let us go down. . ." (Gen. 11:7). Social unitarianism rejects the ideal of a decent-

35. This may be why Jews continually embrace the state, to their long-term disadvantage. On this political tradition, see Benjamin Ginsberg, The Fatal Embrace: Jews and the State (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993). While there are a few free market economists who are also Orthodox Jews, they generally do their technical economic analyses as secular economists, not as Orthodox Jews.

36. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 15.

ralized theocratic order that is unified by a common confession, where the power to tax the individual directly is exclusively local, and the jury system is also local.

Judicial warlordism, in contrast, rejects the ideal of a central civil government. It offers a theory of truncated courts: no lawful court of appeal above the person of the warlord unless the warlord consents to it. In judicial warlordism, there is only temporary power for imposing order in the case of disputes; there is no legitimate central authority. One form of theoretical warlordism (anarcho-capitalism) ends the appeals system with the most militarily powerful individual or with the court of the most powerful private police force in a system of private, competing courts. In the version of truncated courts known as nationalism, appeals end with a national civil court. Both of these truncated judicial systems are associated with the right-wing Enlightenment model. These are polytheistic judicial models: many laws, many gods. Rushdoony wrote: "The premise of polytheism is that we live in a multiverse, not a universe, that a variety of law-orders and hence lords exist, and that man cannot therefore be under one law except by virtue of imperialism."³⁷

Biblical law, being universal in scope, is not polytheistic. It is also not imperialistic. The top-down judicial order of imperialism is Satan's perverse imitation of God's kingdom. Both systems are comprehensive in their claims, but they are structured differently. God's kingdom is a bottom-up system of appeals courts based on binding covenantal oaths. But the biblical system of appeals courts cannot be limited, for the universalism of God's mandatory covenantal oaths cannot be limited. There is no zone of neutrality, no place of refuge outside the jurisdiction of God.

Judicial Trinitarianism proposes the ideal of Christendom. Why? Because it envisions the extension of God's universal kingdom in history, it affirms a confessionally unified pair of appeals systems—ecclesiastical and civil—that transcends national borders. Judicial Trinitarianism is necessarily internationalist because the kingdom of God transcends political borders.³⁸ Modern Christianity, being antinomian, rejects the ideal of this international kingdom. The churches deny the possibility of internationalism because they deny the universality of God's law. Modern Christianity is politically polytheistic.³⁹ Rushdoony

37. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 17.

38. North, Healer of the Nations.

39. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Instiis correct: "To hold, as the churches do, Roman Catholic, Greek Orthodox, Lutheran, Calvinist, and all others virtually, that the law was good for Israel, but that Christians and the church are under grace without law, or under some higher, newer law, is implicit polytheism."⁴⁰ This antinomian outlook turns over judicial authority to polytheistic humanist kingdoms as surely as the pacifism of the Menonite sects causes them to turn over the law-making power, police power, and military authority to others. Thus, modern Christians hail as biblically valid the truncated court systems of modern nationalism. They reject the ideal of Christendom on two accounts: its commitment to universal Christian legal standards and its denial of humanistic nationalism as anything more than a temporary stopgap measure analogous to the scattering at the Tower of Babel. They do not regard Babel's scattering as God's curse on covenant-breakers' confession of autonomy: to make themselves a name. Rather, they see judicial Babel as inherent in the human condition, even if all men were to covenant with God.

Nevertheless, the creation of such a supreme judicial civil court must not precede the creation of a supreme ecclesiastical court. The church is the model for the state, not the state for the church. The church continues into eternity; the state does not (Rev. 21; 22). No agency will then be needed to impose civil sanctions: no sin! Conclusion: to begin to create a supreme civil world court before creating the covenantal foundation of a free world society—Christendom—is to attempt the creation of a secular one-world order. It represents a return to Babel.

The inherently international ideal of Christendom is denied by right-wing judicial Anabaptists, but they cannot escape the theoretical problem of social order. Traditionally, they have appealed to civil judicial neutrality—the ideal of either Stoic or Newtonian natural law—in their attempts to deny the ideal of Christendom. They become like the Amish, the archetypal right-wing Anabaptists: trapped in the humanists' judicial order as it moves toward either the one-State world or judicial warlordism. To put it in familiar terms, we find ourselves moving toward either the humanists' New World Order or Balkanization.

tute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

40. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 18.

Conclusion

Vengeance is God's, but He delegates limited authority to the civil government to impose negative sanctions against law-breakers. The Bible establishes a judicial ideal: the supply of vengeance must be placed under the restraint of Bible-revealed law. This is accomplished biblically by making the state the sole lawful supplier.⁴¹ In the case of negative physical sanctions, except for parental punishing of children, the state is to be the sole supplier of the service.⁴²

Biblical law establishes a monopoly of vengeance. The economic function of a monopoly is to reduce the quantity of output of some good or service. The "service" in this case is potentially negative for society: vengeance. There is some socially optimum quantity of this service, but because of the tendency toward autonomy and lawlessness among men, the unrestrained free market would create an oversupply.

The state is required by God to protect private property. The state must honor God-established property rights, i.e., legal immunities—boundaries—against invasion. Stewards over property are to have their rights protected by threat of violence by the state against invaders. Property rights are human rights. By limiting the number of authorized agents of vengeance, society limits the spread of violence. This also places the state under public scrutiny. The more limited the state, the less it has to be scrutinized. The state establishes a hierarchical system of appeals courts (Ex. 18). This system parallels the ecclesiastical court of appeals. The church, not the state, is the model for society. When the church rejects the covenantal ideal of an international, hierarchical system of appeals courts, both ecclesiastical and civil, it necessarily adopts a rival judicial model: tribalism, regionalism, or nationalism. The biblical goal is world government under God's law, for both church and state. But until the church establishes this in practice, the quest for world civil government under common world law is messianic and a threat to freedom. There must be a common confession among men before there can be a lawful appeals court, and only one confession is valid: Trinitarianism.

41. In the Old Testament, the kinsman-redeemer was lawfully authorized to act as the state's agent.

42. Personal self-defense should be interpreted as an act of state. The state delegates to the individual the authority to impose this sanction in unique circumstances. It is analogous to "citizen's arrest."

THE PRESERVATION OF THE SEED

Ye shall keep my statutes. Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind: thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed; neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee (Lev. 19:19).

The theocentric meaning of this passage is the meaning of the entire Book of Leviticus: God's boundaries must be respected.

A. The Test Case

Vern S. Poythress, a professor at Westminster Theological Seminary, stated that this passage is exegetically "the test case" or case law for theonomists.¹ He wished to know what theonomic principles of interpretation govern the New Testament's understanding of this Mosaic case law. As I shall argue, the primary hermeneutical principle that applies to this case law is the principle of the seed. This case law applied only in Mosaic Israel. It was an aspect of Jacob's messianic prophecy regarding Judah (Gen. 49:9–10). This law is indeed a test case for theonomy—and also for every other system of biblical interpretation.

This case law establishes three boundaries, each referring to a specific economic activity: animal husbandry, agriculture, and textiles. Except for the products of mining and metalworking, these were the primary categories of economic goods in the ancient world. Leviticus 19:19 established rules for all three areas. That world is long gone. Beginning no later than the fifteenth century, A.D., and accelerating rapidly in the late eighteenth century, a series of improvements in all three areas transformed the traditional economy of Europe. The modern capitalist system—with its emphasis on private ownership, the specialization of production, and the division of labor—steadily replaced the older medieval world of the common fields. This comprehensive economic transformation was accompanied by the violation of at least the first two, and seemingly all three, of the statutes of Leviticus 19:19.

1. Vern Sheridan Poythress, "Effects of Interpretive Frameworks on the Application of Old Testament Law," Theonomy: A Reformed Critique, eds. William S. Barker and W. Robert Godfrey (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1990), p. 110.

This raises an important covenantal issue: the predictability of the external corporate blessings of God in history. A civilization-wide violation of these Levitical laws has produced (or at least has been accompanied by) an historically unprecedented increase in wealth: the West's agricultural revolution. We must therefore conclude one of three things: (1) the laws of Leviticus 19:19 are no longer binding because of a change in covenantal administration (my view); (2) these laws are still morally binding, but the covenantal link between corporate obedience and corporate blessings no longer holds in New Testament times (Kline's view);² or (3) these laws and God's corporate sanctions are still judicially binding (Rushdoony's view).³ If Rushdoony's view is correct, then the modern world must be headed for a horrendous covenantal judgment of God because of systematic violations of this three-part Mosaic law.

B. The Industrial Revolution

We come now to the most important unanswered question in all of human history: How did it come about that, beginning around 1800 in Great Britain, economic growth of about 2% per annum extended for the next two centuries? This has changed the world in ways inconceivable in 1800. It had done so by 1880. The rate of economic growth did not decrease after 1880. All this has taken place within the span of three generations, although long generations.⁴

The industrial revolution of the late eighteenth century visibly began to transform the traditional European economy. This is not to say that industrialism appeared overnight. It did not.⁵ But to character-

2. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

3. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 255.

4. In December 2010, I interviewed Dr. Lyon Tyler, the grandson of John Tyler, who was President of the United States from 1841 to 1845, who was born in 1790, the first full year of George Washington's Presidency. Dr. Tyler's younger brother often utters this show-stopping one-liner: "As my grandfather said to Thomas Jefferson. . ."

5. John U. Nef, The Conquest of the Material World: Essays on the Coming of In- ize England as the first industrial society would not have been accurate much before 1780. After 1820,⁶ it was an appropriate designation, widely acknowledged. European observers recognized that something fundamentally new was taking place in England.

1. No Persuasive Explanation

The industrial revolution in England was not initially industrial. It was initiated by a series of transformations in the traditional sectors of agriculture,⁷ animal husbandry,⁸ textiles,⁹ and metallurgy.¹⁰ Improvements in metallurgy were made possible by improved coal mining.¹¹ Commerce and industry accelerated as economic output increased.¹² The revolution in steam power that was a characteristic feature of the industrial revolution was made possible by the improvements in metallurgy and coal, and the steam engine in turn made mining less expensive by pumping water out of the mines, which was essential for deep mining technology.¹³ Machines were also applied to textile production.¹⁴ But the reality was this: the industrial revolution took place after 1760 in England and after 1800 elsewhere because of prior transformations in agriculture, animal husbandry, textiles, and to a lesser extent, metallurgy and mining.¹⁵

The changes that first became visible in Britain were not confined to that island empire. The fundamental change—a change in property rights—had taken place throughout Western Europe for several centuries preceding the industrial revolution. The growth of towns, the growth of markets, and the growth of commerce had begun in Western Europe at least by the eleventh century, and this growth continued.

dustrialism (New York: Meridian, 1964).

6. This date of origin was defended by economic historian Angus Maddison (<http://bit.ly/Maddison>).

7. Herbert Heaton, Economic History of Europe, rev. ed. (New York: Harper & Row, 1948), pp. 310–14, 407–13. Heaton was one of my instructors.

8. Ibid., pp. 404–7, 413–16.

9. Ibid., pp. 314–16.

10. Ibid., pp. 316–17.

11. Ibid., pp. 317–19. In England, the wood supply began to shrink in the second half of the eighteenth century. The English had to rely more and more on coal, which it had in abundance. Brinley Thomas, "Toward an Energy Interpretation of the Industrial Revolution," Atlantic Economic Journal, VIII (March 1980).

12. Ibid., pp. 319–28.

13. Ibid., pp. 494–97.

14. Ibid., pp. 489–93.

15. After 1750 in England, coal mining became significant.

After the fifteenth century, the gunpowder revolution made defense, and therefore civil government, progressively the responsibility of the king and the nation rather than the local lord of the manor. Loyalties shifted accordingly, especially in the cities. Lampard writes: "The result was a new social division of labor in which property rights played a more decisive role than personal obligations in determining the division of the social product. Property rights as a claim on the material means of existence provided the institutional foundation, if not the psychological mainspring, for a commercial, acquisitive society."¹⁶ This institutional transformation was not confined to Great Britain. Because of this long-term judicial extension of the concept of private ownership, once England had shown the way, the industrial revolution spread within two generations throughout Northern and Western Europe, and also to North America. By 1830, it was a common Northern European and North American phenomenon.

2. Population Growth

The most statistically relevant aspect of the era of the industrial revolution in England was the growth of population. In the year 1700, there were about five and a half million people in England and Wales. By 1750, it was six and a half million. By 1801, it was about nine million, an unprecedented increase of over 38% in half a century. By 1831, population had reached fourteen million. This was not due to an increase in the birth rate.¹⁷ It was also not due to immigration. On the contrary, during the eighteenth century, as many as a million people left Great Britain for the colonies.¹⁸ The cause of the increase in population, 1750–1800, was an unprecedented reduction in the death rate.¹⁹

The question is: Was it the industrial revolution that produced this increase? This seems not to have been the case. A growth of population was also taking place in other European nations and in North America—nations that had not yet experienced an industrial revolution.²⁰ This points to the possibility that the slow but steady increase in

16. Eric E. Lampard, The Industrial Revolution: Interpretations and Perspectives (Washington, D.C.: Service Center for Teachers of History, American Historical Association, 1957), p. 12.

17. T. S. Ashton, The Industrial Revolution, 1760–1830 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1948), p. 4.

18. Ibid., p. 5.

19. Peter Razzell, Essays in English Population History (London: Caliban, 1993).

20. Ibid., p. 6. Cf. Shepard B. Clough, The Economic Development of Western Civilization (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1959), pp. 241–42.

agricultural productivity outside of England had been more important in increasing Europe's population than England's industrial revolution. Agricultural productivity did not rise in England after 1750. England became an importer of food, selling its industrial products abroad to pay for these imports.²¹ This means that other areas in Europe and the colonies were producing agricultural surpluses.²² Successful agricultural techniques discovered in one region were imitated throughout Western Europe. This leads us back to the problem of Leviticus 19:19 and the corporate blessings of God.

3. Innovation

The fundamental change in the West's traditional economy was the appearance of widespread innovation. As never before in man's history, innovation began to reshape economic production. Entrepreneurs gained access to capital, and this capital allowed them to test their visions of the future in the competitive marketplace. Either they met consumer demand more efficiently than their competitors, thereby gaining short-term profits until other producers imitated their techniques, or else they failed. The winners were the consumers, whose economic decisions steadily became sovereign in the economy. Rosenberg and Birdzell have described the process as well as anyone has: "The immediate sources of Western growth were innovations in trade, technology, and organization, in combination with accumulation of more and more capital, labor, and applied natural resources. Innovation emerged as a significant factor in Western growth as early as the mid-fifteenth century, and, from the mid-eighteenth century on, has been pervasive and dominant. Innovation occurred in trading, production, products, services, institutions, and organizations. The main characteristics of innovation—uncertainty, search, exploration, financial risk, experiment, and discovery—have so permeated the West's expansion of trade and the West's development of natural resources as to make it virtually an additional factor of production."²³

Entrepreneurship was the key to the West's economic growth. En-

21. Brinley Thomas, "Food Supply in the United Kingdom During the Industrial Revolution," in Joel Mokyr (ed.), The Economics of the Industrial Revolution (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1985), p. 142.

22. A surplus does not necessarily mean abundance, and surely did not mean this in the eighteenth century. A surplus is merely an asset that its producer regards as less valuable to him than the item he receives in exchange.

23. Nathan Rosenberg and L. E. Birdzell, Jr., How the West Grew Rich: The Economic Transformation of the Industrial World (New York: Basic Books, 1986), p. 20.

trepreneurship is defined as the act of forecasting an inherently uncertain economic future, and then purchasing the services of men and capital over time in order to meet future consumer demand with the least expenditure of money or resources. Profits are an economic residual: whatever remains after all factors of production have been paid for. Profit stems from an entrepreneur's ability to forecast the future and meet its demands with less expenditure than his competitors. He can "buy low" today only because his competitors have not accurately forecasted future consumer demand; hence, they fail to bid up the price of today's scarce resources. The lure of profit is the motivating factor in the capitalist's decision to bear the uncertainty of producing future consumer goods.²⁴

Innovation was the key to Europe's economic growth and social change, yet Leviticus 19:19 seems opposed to innovation, especially with respect to animal husbandry. There is to be no scientific interbreeding of animals, the law declares. The same restriction appears to hold true for the seeds of the field. If the key to Western prosperity has been economic and scientific innovation, then why did God establish laws for agriculture that restrict innovation in two major areas of modern agricultural output?²⁵ Are any of God's laws opposed to economic development? If so, which ones? And why?

C. Leviticus 19:19 and Economic Development

The transformation of the first three sectors of the European economy involved what appear to be explicit violations of Leviticus 19: 19. Men developed new strains of plants, new breeds within species, and new combinations of textiles.²⁶ Agricultural productivity as a whole went through something like a revolution, 1600–1750. It accelerated vastly after 1800. By 1900, modern agriculture had become capital intensive and scientific. Hybrid seeds would soon become the foundation of this revolution in agricultural output. Gregor Mendel, a monk living in what became Czechoslovakia after World War I, discovered

24. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921), Part 3. (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>); Israel M. Kirzner, Competition and Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973).

25. The third law, prohibiting the wearing of mixed cloth, was a restriction on domestic use, not on output as such.

26. As early as the fifteenth century, Europe was benefiting from fustian: various cloths that were a combination of linen and cotton. Heaton, Economic History, pp. 215, 232–33.

the laws of genetics in 1865 and published his findings in 1866, "Experiments With Plant Hybrids," in an obscure local journal. This article attracted no attention. It was rediscovered in 1900, and his discovery began to reshape the modern world—a transformation that is now accelerating through genetic engineering.

Animal breeding was the least important factor in this agricultural transformation.²⁷ Wrote economic historian Peter Mathias: "The first main innovations were mainly in improving rotations and crops, seed-yields and strains in plants. Advances in animal breeding and the widespread substitution of the horse for the ox on the farm followed mainly in the wake of these improvements. This also was not accidental. The new animals demanded more efficient, better feeding. The old styles of unimproved stock remained a natural and appropriate response to poor pasture, waterlogged fields in the winter and scanty winter feed. Neither sheep nor draught-animals could serve a specialized function: the ox was eaten when it could no longer draw."²⁸

The question must be asked: If the modern world had remained faithful to Leviticus 19:19, would we have escaped the narrow economic boundaries of the pre-modern world? Would we still be facing famines, starvation, poverty, high infant mortality rates, and all the other curses of poverty in the world prior to 1800? The answer is obvious: yes. So, the question arises: Was Leviticus 19:19 itself an economic curse? Second, is it still in force? If it is, then isn't our high per capita wealth today—seemingly a great blessing from God—judicially illegitimate?

More specifically, is the defender of free market capitalism forced into an untenable ideological position if he also defends the continuing authority of biblical law? Is the modern world's wealth an example of God's perverse blessing on antinomian Christianity and humanism, generation after generation? Or is the modern world's abandonment of Leviticus 19:19 legitimate because this case law was annulled by the New Covenant? If abandoning Leviticus 19:19 is legitimate, then does this fact itself constitute a theological justification for announcing the annulment of all of the Old Testament's case laws? This is a hermeneutical question. These questions deserve a serious response from theologians.

Before we seek answers to these questions, another historical factor must be considered: the enclosure movement. There is no doubt that the genetic specialization of herds and crops was made possible economically by the steady enclosure of the medieval common fields, i.e., commonly tilled soil. When an owner could identify and legally defend his crops and herds on his land, he could better afford to experiment. He would be allowed to claim as his property any increased output. Common fields restricted such innovation. Only mutually agreed-upon innovations were permitted in common fields. Risks had to be low; any increased output had to be shared. Radical innovations were unlikely.

27. Peter Mathias, The First Industrial Nation: An Economic History of Britain, 1700–1914 (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1969), pp. 78–80.

28. Ibid., pp. 77–78.

The enclosure movement began early in England, certainly by the thirteenth century.²⁹ It accelerated in the sixteenth century.³⁰ After 1760, Parliament authorized specific enclosure by private acts.³¹ It was the steady partitioning of the common fields into private plots that made possible the so-called agricultural revolution in England. (A revolution that takes well over a century is evolutionary by modern standards, though not by pre-modern standards.) Professor Ashton wrote: "Progress in agriculture was bound up with the creation of new units of administration in which the individual had more scope for experiment; and this meant the parceling out and enclosure of the common fields, or the breaking up of the rough pasture and waste which had previously contributed little to the output of the village."³² What was required, in short, was the establishment of new boundaries.

These legal boundaries established the private ownership of, and therefore personal responsibility over, the crucial means of production in an agricultural society: specific units of land. Because of these judicial boundaries, the fruits of one's capital and labor inputs could be more easily identified and claimed. This created economic incentives to improve the land and to introduce new crops, including the bleating crop known as sheep. Specialization of agricultural production and the resulting increase in output per unit of resource input increased both wealth and population in early modern England. This in turn led to the industrial revolution. My point is that the increasing precision of the legal claims of private owners of land, enforceable in civil courts, was the crucial change that made possible the agricultural revolution. The development of new crops and new breeds was the result, not the 29. W. E. Tate, The Enclosure Movement (New York: Walker, 1967), pp. 60–61.

30. Ibid., ch. 6.

31. Ibid., p. 48.

32. Ashton, Industrial Revolution, p. 18.

cause, of a social and legal revolution. In short, the new boundaries—geographical but especially legal—led to greater dominion.

D. Poythress' Challenge

As I mentioned earlier, Dr. Poythress challenged the defenders of theonomy to deal with the hermeneutical (interpretational) problems associated with Leviticus 19:19. He knew that theonomists are defenders of free market economics and modern capitalism. How, then, can theonomists escape the dilemma of Leviticus 19:19? He began his analysis-criticism of theonomy with a consideration of this verse. He regarded the exegetical problem of Leviticus 19:19 as exemplary of the theonomists' larger hermeneutical problem of distinguishing judicial continuity from discontinuity in the two testaments. This is why he calls it "the test case."

1. Bahnsen vs. Rushdoony

Poythress' challenge is legitimate. He did raise important issues regarding the principles of biblical interpretation as they apply to the case laws of the Old Covenant. The command not to mix seeds is an expression of God's will, he correctly observes. It is therefore relevant to us as expositors. Does this particular case law express a universal standard, or is it uniquely a law of a distinct kingdom of priests (Ex. 19:6)? Was it part of Israel's laws of unclean foods? If it was part of Israel's priestly laws, how does it apply to the church as a royal priesthood (I Peter 2:9)? The Mosaic food laws are abolished, he correctly observes. Yet we are still not to mix good and evil. "How do we decide how Leviticus 19:19 applies to us?"³³ This is indeed the question.

Poythress said that Greg Bahnsen thought this law no longer needs to be observed literally.³⁴ Bahnsen was correct on this point, but Poythress was not persuaded by Bahnsen's general explanation. He cited Bahnsen: "We should presume that Old Testament standing laws continue to be morally binding in the New Testament, unless they are rescinded or modified by further revelation."³⁵ Poythress added: "Strict, wooden application of this principle would appear to imply the continuation of Leviticus 19:19 in force.”³⁶ He noted in a footnote that Rushdoony argues that Leviticus 19:19 still applies, making all hybrids immoral.³⁷ Therefore, Poythress implied (correctly), those theonomists who reject Rushdoony’s interpretation of Leviticus 19:19 need to produce specific evidence of a judicial discontinuity between the testaments that has annulled the literal application of this law. Poythress said that this law can be regarded as part of the Mosaic food laws and hence abolished.

33. Poythress, "Interpretive Frameworks," Theonomy: A Reformed Critique, p. 104.

34. Poythress does not cite a source for this assertion: ibid., p. 106.

35. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), pp. 345–46. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

The Mosaic laws of separation no longer apply, Bahnsen said.³⁸ Poythress asked: “But how do we tell in practice what counts as a ‘separation’ principle? How do we tell what elements in Mosaic statutes are shadows and in what way are they shadows? How do we tell what is ceremonial and what is moral?”³⁹ We know that all the laws in Leviticus 19 are moral, he said. They functioned in some way to separate Israel from the nations around her. Second, he said, it is easy to argue that “keeping the types of seed distinct is a principle of separation based on creation and therefore of permanent validity. Third, the immediate context of Leviticus does not provide decisive information about the permanence of this statute.”⁴⁰

The more that Poythress looked at the specifics of this case law, the more its New Testament meaning seemed to get lost in the Mosaic law’s shadows. This is true of almost every civil law in the Mosaic Covenant that he examined in detail, as he repeatedly demonstrated in his book, The Shadow of Christ in the Law of Moses (1991).

How can we faithfully solve these exegetical problems? He offered this exegetical imperative: “We are supposed to determine the classification of any statute by first understanding its primary function. Understanding its function reveals whether it primarily defines sin in a universally binding way or whether it primarily articulates the way of salvation in a way conditioned by the redemptive-historical context. We therefore determine in what respects it is permanently relevant to our redemptive-historical situation. The primary remaining difficulty is that it is not always easy to determine the primary function, particularly because several functions may sometimes be interwoven.”⁴¹

I agree with this statement regarding the requirements of exegesis.

36. Poythress, p. 106.

37. Ibid., p. 106n. He cited Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, p. 255.

38. Bahnsen, By This Standard, p. 346.

39. Poythress, p. 106.

40. Ibid., pp. 106–7.

41. Ibid., pp. 108–9.

It is therefore mandatory on me or on another defender of theonomy's hermeneutic to do what Poythress said must be done: (1) identify the primary function of an Old Covenant law; (2) discover whether it is universal in a redemptive (healing) sense, or whether (3) it was conditioned by its redemptive-historical context (i.e., annulled by the New Covenant). In short: What did the law mean, how did it apply inside and outside Mosaic Israel, and how should it apply today? This exegetical task is not always easy, but it is mandatory. It is a task that has been ignored or denied by the vast majority of Christian theologians for almost two millennia.

The question Poythress raised is the hermeneutical problem of identifying covenantal continuity and covenantal discontinuity. First, in questions of covenantal continuity, we need to ask: What is the underlying ethical principle? God does not change ethically. The moral law is still binding, but its application may not be. Second, this raises the question of covenantal discontinuity. What has changed as a result of the New Testament era's fulfillment of Old Covenant prophecy and the inauguration of the New Covenant? A continuity—prophetic-judicial fulfillment—has in some cases produced a judicial discontinuity: the annulment of a case law's application. A very good example of this is Leviticus 19:19.

2. Hermeneutical Questions

I begin any investigation of any suspected judicial discontinuity with the following questions. First, is the case law related to the priesthood, which has changed (Heb. 7:11–12)? Second, is it related to the sacraments, which have changed? Third, is it related to the jubilee land laws (e.g., inheritance), which Christ fulfilled (Luke 4:18–21)?⁴² Fourth, is it related to the tribes (e.g., the seed laws), which Christ fulfilled in His office as Shiloh, the promised Seed (Gal. 3:16)? Fifth, is it related to the “middle wall of partition” between Jew and gentile, which Jesus Christ's gospel has broken down (Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:14–20)?⁴³ These five principles prove fruitful in analyzing Leviticus 19:19.⁴⁴

42. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

43. This application is especially important in dealing with Rushdoony's theory of “hybridization.” See Appendix G.

44. There are several other hermeneutical questions that we can ask that relate to covenantal discontinuity. Sixth, is it an aspect of the weakness of the Israelites, which Christ's ministry has overcome, thereby intensifying the rigors of an Old Covenant law (Matt. 5:21–48)? Seventh, is it an aspect of the Old Covenant's cursed six day-one day

Let us ask another question: Is a change in the priesthood also accompanied by a change in the laws governing the family covenant? Yes. Jesus tightened the laws of divorce by removing the Mosaic law's exception, the bill of divorcement (Matt. 5:31–32).⁴⁵ Similarly, the church from the beginning has denied the legality of polygamy even though there is no explicit rejection of polygamy in the New Testament except for church officers: husbands of one wife (I Tim. 3:2, 12). Polygamy is implicitly rejected by the church because of the rule of law: an equal burden of divorce, husband vs. wife.⁴⁶ Did other changes in the family accompany the New Covenant's change in the priesthood? Specifically, have changes in inheritance taken place? Have these changes resulted in the annulment of the jubilee land laws of the Mosaic economy? Finally, has an annulment of the jubilee land laws annulled the laws of tribal administration?

E. The Traditional Three-fold Division

The Westminster Confession (1646) offers a tripartite division of biblical law: moral, ceremonial, and judicial. The moral law is said to be permanently binding (XIX:2). The ceremonial law is said to have been abrogated by the New Covenant (XIX:3). The judicial law is said to have applied only to national Israel and not to the New Covenant era, except insofar as a law was (is) part of something called the "general equity" (XIX:4). This formulation assumes that the judicial law applied only to Israel's "body politic."

This assumption raises a fundamental question: What about the family? The family is a separate covenantal administration, bound by a lawful oath under God. Which civil laws in Israel protected the family? To what extent have these laws been annulled or modified (perhaps tightened) by the New Covenant? And why?

I am here suggesting the need for the addition of another tripartite division: civil, ecclesiastical, and familial. James Jordan believed that work week rather than the one day-six day pattern of the New Covenant's now-redeemed week (Heb. 4:1–11)? Eighth, is it part of legal order of the once ritually polluted earth, which has now been cleansed by Christ (Acts 10; I Cor. 8)?

45. Here, I disagree with Bahnsen, who dismissed the relevance of the bill of divorcement, which he said "the Mosaic law mentioned only in passing. . . ." Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 3rd ed. (Nacodoches, Texas: Covenant Media Foundation, [1977] 2002), p. 101. The bill of divorcement was God's law for Mosaic Israel. Jesus annulled it.

46. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

the Confession's three-fold division applies across the boards to the three covenantal institutions. The moral law applies to all three: civil law, canon law, and family law. The ceremonial law applied to all three: oaths, sacraments, and marriage. The judicial law applies to all three: execution and restitution, excommunication, and divorce-disinheritance. He also noted that the Confession's tripartite division conforms to the five points of the biblical covenant model.⁴⁷ The ceremonial category is derived from points one and two: transcendence and hierarchy. The moral category is derived from point three: law. The judicial category is derived from points four and five: sanctions and succession.⁴⁸

In short, the Westminster Confession's divisions can and should be applied to the Bible's tripartite covenantal-institutional divisions. There are continuities (fixed principles) and discontinuities (redemptive-historical applications) in all three covenantal law-orders. It is the task of the interpreter to make clear these distinctions and interrelationships. The church has been avoiding this crucial task (exegetical and applicational) since A.D. 70. The result has been the dominance of ethical dualism in Christian social theory: natural law theory coupled with pietism and/or mysticism.

F. Case Laws and Underlying Principles

Leviticus is the Bible's book of holiness. Boundaries are basic to biblical holiness. So, it is wise to approach passages that make little sense to the modern reader in expectation that in many of them, the issues can be clarified by discovering the underlying principle of holiness, which is a principle of separation.

A law governing agriculture, animal husbandry, and textile production had to be taken very seriously under the Mosaic Covenant. The expositor's initial presumption should be that these three laws constitute a judicial unit. If they are a unit, there has to be some underlying judicial principle common to all three. All three prohibitions deal with mixing. The first question we need to ask is the crucial one: What was the covenantal meaning of these laws? The second question is: What was their economic effect?

The fundamental judicial principle undergirding the passage is the

47. On the five points, see Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) requirement of separation. Two kinds of separation were involved: tribal and covenantal. The first two clauses were agricultural applications of the mandatory segregation of the tribes inside Israel until a unique prophesied Seed would appear in history: the Messiah. We know who the Seed is: Jesus Christ. Paul wrote: "Now unto Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. 3:16). The context of Paul's discussion is inheritance. Inheritance is by promise, he said (Gal. 3:18). The Mosaic law was given, Paul said, "till the seed should come to whom the promise was made" (Gal. 3: 18). Two-thirds of Leviticus 19:19 relates to the inheritance laws of national Israel, as we shall see. When the Levitical land inheritance laws (Lev. 25) ended with the establishment of a new priesthood, so did the authority of Leviticus 19:19.

48. Jordan's comments to author: Sept. 1992.

What was Paul attempting to prove? This: eternal life (the ultimate inheritance) is obtained by God's promise, not by God's law. God's law cannot impart life.⁴⁹ That is to say, the means of the recipient's eternal life is not obedience to God's revealed law. Paul was not, contrary to the argument of the Judaizers, attempting to set biblical law in opposition to the principle of inheritance by promise.⁵⁰ He was arguing that there is only one pathway to eternal life: by God's promise. It is this promise of new life, which is a new inheritance, that is central to Leviticus 19:19.

The second form of separation is more familiar: covenantal separation. The final clause of Leviticus 19:19 deals with prohibited clothing. This prohibition related not to separation among the tribes of Israel—separation within a covenant—but rather the separation of national Israel from other nations.

Because their frame of reference is not intuitively recognized, the first two clauses must occupy our initial attention.

49. Moises Silva, "Is the Law Against the Promises? The Significance of Galatians 3:21 for Covenant Continuity," Theonomy: A Reformed Critique, p. 158.

50. Meredith G. Kline argued that this was Paul's contention: By Oath Consigned: A Reinterpretation of the Covenant Signs of Circumcision and Baptism (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1968), p. 23. Moises Silva said that Kline was incorrect on this point. Theonomy: A Reformed Critique, p. 160. In fact, Silva said, Kline's interpretation—the radical contrast between law and promise—is the same as the Judaizers' argument. Ibid., p. 163.

G. Boundary of Blood: Seed and Land

The preservation of Israel's unique covenantal status was required by biblical law. The physical manifestation of this separation was circumcision. A boundary of blood was imposed on the male organ of reproduction. It was a sign that covenantal life is not obtained by either physical birth or through one's male heirs. Rushdoony wrote: "Circumcision witnesses to the fact that man's hope is not in generation but in regeneration. . . ." ⁵¹ Unlike the ancient Greeks, who believed that a decent life after death could be obtained only through an unbroken series of rites performed by one's male heirs, ⁵² the Israelites knew that physical generation within the family unit has nothing to do with one's life after physical death. They had a doctrine of creation; the Greeks did not. This made a tremendous difference, as Fustel remarked so long ago: "[I]f we reflect that the ancients had no idea of creation, we shall see that the mystery of generation was for them what the mystery of creation is for us. The generator appeared to them to be a divine being; and they adored their ancestor." ⁵³ Ancestor worship is not the message of the Old Covenant. The theology of the Old Covenant is creationist: the Creator-creature distinction. The Creator placed the generator, Adam, under a covenant. Adam served as the judicial representative of all his heirs. The generator then broke the terms of the covenant. Mankind is therefore under a curse, both in history and eternity. Ancestor worship has never been a temptation in Christian cultures. To escape Adam's legal status as a covenant-breaker, a man must re-covenant with God, a human response made possible by God's absolutely sovereign act of regeneration. The mark of this covenant in ancient Israel was circumcision. Ultimately, this separation was confessional. It involved an affirmation of the sovereignty of Israel's God.

1. Tribal and Family Boundaries

The nation of Israel was separated from non-covenanted nations by geographical and covenantal boundaries. Furthermore, tribal and family units separated the covenant people within Israel. This separation was always to be geographical, usually familial, ⁵⁴ but never confes-

51. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 43.

52. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Book I.

53. Ibid., I:IV, p. 36.

54. There could be inter-tribal marriages. Daughters received dowries rather than sional. Every tribe confessed the same confession: "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD: And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deut. 6:4–5).⁵⁵ Israelites were not divided tribally because they had different ancestors, which was the case in ancient Greece. They were divided tribally because they would have different heirs. Only one tribe would bring forth the promised Seed. Tribal separation was based on differences in inheritance.

Here I need to make something very clear. Unless stated otherwise, when I speak of seed laws and seed sanctions, I have in mind those laws and sanctions that applied exclusively to Mosaic Israel because of Jacob's prophecy of a tribal boundary around the coming Seed, the Messiah. There are broader aspects of God's covenantal seed laws: applications of God's covenantal promises to Abraham, such as population growth for faithfulness. These broad covenantal promises apply to the New Covenant sons of Abraham: the church, the Israel of God (Gal. 6:16). Because they apply across the two covenants, they were not exclusive to Mosaic Israel.

Israel's tribal divisions had political implications. They guaranteed localism. This localism of tribal inheritance was the judicial complement of the unity of national covenantal confession. Speaking of the case laws (Ex. 21–23) that follow God's delivery of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20), political scientist Aaron Wildavsky remarks: "The social legislation that follows—laws protecting property, strangers, widows, the poor, on and on—is also predicated on acceptance of an authority that cannot be disobeyed. These boundaries, which emphasize keeping relationships whole, each partaking only of what properly belongs to its class, are of special social significance in a tribal society. Each tribe is to be kept whole. No tribe is to transgress against another. What better guarantee that tribal borders (so carefully demarcated before entry to Israel) will be sacrosanct is there than a system of classification—from food to clothing to marriage—that stresses wholeness and separation from top to bottom?"⁵⁶ Tribal boundaries were part of an overall structure of covenantal unity.

Family membership and rural land ownership in Israel were tied together by the laws of inheritance. A rural Israelite—and most Israel-landed inheritance. Dowries could cross tribal boundaries; land could not.

55. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 15.

56. Aaron Wildavsky, The Nursing Father: Moses as a Political Leader (University, Alabama: University of Alabama, 1984), p. 97.

ites were rural⁵⁷—was the heir of a specific plot of ground because of his family membership. There was no rural landed inheritance apart from family membership. Unlike the laws of ancient Greece, Mosaic law allowed a daughter to inherit the family's land if there was no son. But there was a condition: she had to marry within the tribal unit (Num. 36:8).⁵⁸ The landed inheritance could not lawfully move from one tribe to another (Num. 36:9).⁵⁹ A man's primary inheritance in Israel was his legal status: freemanship and congregation membership. This was part of his family name.

2. Family Land and Family Name

Land was tied to name. The land of Israel was God's; His name was on it. The family's land was tied to the family's name. So important was this principle of inheritance that a brother who lived on the family's land with a married brother who died without children had to obey the levirate marriage law and procreate children through the brother's widow (Deut. 25:5–10).⁶⁰ Their children would inherit the family's name (Deut. 25:6). To refuse to perform this requirement was to be disgraced publicly. The wife could challenge the brother publicly, announcing before the elders, "My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel. . ." (Deut. 25:7).

Tamar became a childless widow when Er, her evil husband, was killed by God (Gen. 38:7). Judah sent Onan, now his oldest son, to become her levir husband. Onan refused to procreate a child with her. He deliberately spilled his seed (zarah) on the ground, "lest that he should give his seed to his brother." This was not just an act of defiance against Tamar; it was a ritual act of defiance against God. God killed him for this ritual act (v. 10).

When Tamar bore twins to Judah, she named the second-born son Zarah. He was the child who had the scarlet thread around his wrist, who had almost been the firstborn (v. 30). He disappears after Genesis 46:12. He was not Judah's seed of the promise. His brother Pharez be-

57. This is not to say that God intended them to remain rural. On the contrary, the covenantal blessing of God in the form of population growth was to move most Israelites into the cities as time went on. See Chapter 24, section on "The Demographics of the Jubilee Inheritance Law."

58. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 22.

59. The exception was when rural land that had been pledged to a priest went to him in the jubilee year if the pledge was violated (Lev. 27:20–21). Chapter 36.

60. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 64.

came the line of Judah into which Ruth the Moabite married (Ruth 4:12). So, the covenant line of Judah led to the kingly line of David through Ruth, for Boaz performed the office of the levir when Naomi's nearest of kin refused for fear of losing his inheritance (Ruth 4:6). David is listed as the tenth generation after Pharez (Ruth 4:18–22), making David's generation the first generation of Judah's line that could become citizens (Deut. 23:2) and lawfully become judges, for Pharez had been a bastard born illegally of Judah.⁶¹

The name Pharez comes from the Hebrew word for breach. God placed him as the head of the family line. Pharez was born abnormally, but he nevertheless inherited: sovereign grace.

3. Till Shiloh Come

Jacob had promised Judah that his blood line would rule until the promised heir (Shiloh) should come (Gen. 49:10). Thus, the integrity of each of the seed lines in Israel—family by family, tribe by tribe—was maintained by the Mosaic law until this promise was fulfilled. The mandatory separation among the tribes was symbolized by the prohibition against mixing seeds. The prohibition applied to the mixing of seeds in one field. The field did not represent the whole world under the Mosaic Covenant; the field represented the Promised Land. The husbandman or farmer had to create boundaries between his specialized breeds and between his crops.

The boundaries separating animals had to be there because of the normal sexual bonding that takes place among pairs within a species. So, too, was it normal for members of the same covenantal confession to marry. But Mosaic law established an artificial barrier between the tribes. This artificial barrier was both legal and economic: landed inheritance. Tribal separation decentralized Israel's economy and politics. The Levites were scattered across the land, living in walled cities or in Levitical cities in which the jubilee land laws did not apply (Lev. 25:29–30, 32–34). Levites provided religious leadership, including judicial advice, for every tribe. But the Levites had no inheritance in the land, so they could not buy up rural landed property or gain it through intermarriage, thereby centralizing the economy. Neither could the king, as the conflict between Ahab and Naboth indicates (I Kings 21).

61. On the incomplete genealogy of the Davidic line, see Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 11:G.

There was to be continuity of theological and judicial principles, one tribe to another. Plots of land could not be merged beyond the jubilee. Kings and Levites—the national enforcers of God’s law—could not pursue judicial centralization through either land purchase or inter-marriage. This prevented what Pharaoh and the priests had done under Joseph (Gen. 47:20–22)—a curse on Egypt consistent with Egypt’s theology of the divine Pharaoh.⁶²

Thus, the prohibition against the interbreeding of animals and the mixing of seeds had to do with keeping separate artificially what is normally mixed. Fenced family fields inside Israel reflected the nation’s tribal boundaries. Such tribal separation was abnormal, not normal. What is abnormal is the separation of breeds within a species and the separation of crops within a single fenced field. What is also abnormal is the tribal separation of a biblically covenanted people. It was this abnormality that was essential to the maintenance of the tribal structure in Israel. Inheritance in the land was by tribal separation, but only until Shiloh at last arrived. The internal boundaries would disappear once Shiloh came.

4. Inheritance: Generation vs. Adoption

Another application of the seed laws was the prohibition of a foreign eunuch’s access to citizenship (Deut. 23:1). If a man was cut off in the stones, he was genetically cut off from the possibility of lawful inheritance in the land. He had no genetic future; he could therefore not become a citizen of Israel. Not even the laws of adoption could overcome this ecclesiastical and civil law.

Under the New Covenant, the laws of adoption have annulled this Mosaic law. The obvious New Testament example of its annulment is the encounter of Philip with the Ethiopian eunuch. As soon as the eunuch professed faith in Jesus Christ, Philip baptized him (Acts 8: 37–38). Covenantal inheritance in the New Testament is by public profession of faith, public baptism, and public obedience; it is not by genetics. Inheritance is by adoption, not by biological reproduction. This is a testimony to the fact that covenantal faithfulness is more fundamental in history than biology. It always has been, as God’s adoption of Israel as a nation testified (Ezek. 16). But because of the historic importance of the prophesied Seed of Israel, the seed laws predominated over the adoption laws in the Mosaic economy.

62. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 32:C.

The advent of Jesus Christ restored adoption to visible primacy. "But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become sons of God, even to them that believe on his name" (John 1:12). With the death of Jesus Christ and the annulment of the Old Covenant, the Levitical seed laws ceased. They were not resurrected with Christ. There was no further need to separate seeds within Israel; the prophecy had been covenantally and historically fulfilled. So had the Levitical land laws (Lev. 25). The mandatory judicial link between physical seed and land ceased for all time. Those family and tribal boundaries within the land, like the boundaries establishing the judicial holiness (separateness) of national Israel from the world, were covenantally annulled by the New Covenant. The new wine of the gospel broke the old wineskins of Israel's seed laws.

Nowhere is this clearer than in the letter to the Hebrews. It begins with an affirmation of Christ's inheritance: God the Father "Hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds" (Heb. 1:2). Christ's inheritance is expressly tied to His name: "Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they" (Heb. 1:4). Jesus is the high priest of an unchangeable priesthood (Heb. 7:24). His priesthood, because it is after the order of Melchizedek, is superior to the Levitical priesthood (Heb. 7:9–11). This has changed the Levitical laws: "For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law" (Heb. 7:12). This includes the laws of tribal separation. Jesus, as high priest, has transcended the Mosaic Covenant's laws separating the tribes of Israel: "For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood" (Heb. 7:14). Because He transcended the tribal boundary laws, He also transcended the land laws and seed laws. A new priesthood now inherits the earth.

H. Sacrifice: Seed vs. Land

The connection between land and seed in the ancient world was very close, not only judicially but also ritually. When the Israelites came into the land of Canaan, they were told by God that they must not sacrifice their children to the gods of the land. They were not permitted to pass their children through any ritual fire. "And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through [the fire] to Molech, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I [am] the LORD" (Lev. 18:21). Molech was the god of the Ammonites; it was identified as an abomination (I Kings 11:7). Notice that God called such a practice a profanation of His name (Lev. 20:3). The nation's name, the family's name, and God's name were all interlinked ritually.

Why would anyone have done such a thing? In a civilization such as the West's, which was originally built on judicial theology rather than magic, such a ritual act seems irrational. But sacrifices must be made in this life. Men understand this principle, which is why they speak of sacrificing the present for the future. The ancient Canaanites sent their children through the ritual fires in order to identify the survivors as the heirs. Also, by placating Molech, they hoped to gain external blessings, which meant primarily agricultural blessings. By literally sacrificing their children, they hoped for increased agricultural fertility. This is why we refer to Canaanitic religions as fertility cults.

Only specialists in ancient religion and mythology are aware of origins of the this theology of child sacrifice. Children were regarded as innocent and therefore suitable to placate Molech, identified as Kronos,⁶³ and therefore Saturn, the god of the original golden age and regenerative chaos, cannibal of his own children and father of Jupiter/Zeus.⁶⁴ The Phoenicians carried this fiery worship throughout the Mediterranean coasts. It became institutionalized in Carthage.⁶⁵ Acton wrote that such worship flourished where astrology was supreme, "and where the sun was worshipped as the life-giver and the life-destroyer—the god who renewed the earth in spring, burnt it up in summer, and himself suffered in winter, to be restored and to restore the world in spring. These two powers of production and destruction were gathered up in Astarte, the goddess of fertility, and Kronos, the devourer of his own offspring."

What was the origin of this theology of human sacrifice? Acton knew what only a handful of academic specialists today have ever heard of: the magical link between bloody ritual and cosmic regeneration. Acton wrote: "The union of bloodshed and licentiousness had one of its roots in the physical philosophy of the old world, which considered generation and destruction, like night and day, to be necessary

63. John Emerich Edward Dalberg-Acton, "Human Sacrifice" (1863), Essays in Religion, Politics, and Morality, in Selected Writings of Lord Acton, 3 vols. (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, 1988), III, p. 405.

64. Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill: An essay on myth and the frame of time (Boston: Gambit, 1969), pp. 146–48.

65. Acton, "Human Sacrifice," p. 407.

and mutually-produced successions of being, caused by the eccentric motion of the primum mobile in the ecliptic.”⁶⁶ The slow “wobble” of the axis of the rotating earth is the reason why the pole stars change every few thousand years during the what the ancients called the Great Year: about 26,000 solar years. This wobbling axis is the source of the legend of Hamlet’s cosmic mill: the wobbling universe of stars and constellations, i.e., the precession of the equinoxes.⁶⁷ This cosmology explained the fall of man and the loss of Eden as the result of the disruption of the heavens. It made personal regeneration and social regeneration the effects of ritual rather than ethical transformation. Fertility, sexual license, and human sacrifice were linked together cosmically. The religious practices of classical and Hellenic Greece, as well as Rome’s Republic and Empire, relied on human sacrifice.⁶⁸ The origin of Rome’s gladiatorial battles to the death lay in this theology of sacrifice.⁶⁹

The religion of Israel was in open conflict with all fertility cult religion. God warned Israelites against putting their hope in the land or the gods of the land. The seed laws of Leviticus 19:19 were an aspect of this prohibition. These laws restricted genetic experimentation in Israel. There would be no specialized animal breeding; there would be no mixing of seeds in any field. Why not? For the sake of the inheritance, i.e., for the promise. This promise was more important than any hoped-for productivity gained through genetic experiments. Families were required to forfeit some degree of potential wealth for the sake of faithfulness to the promise. The preservation of each family’s seed (i.e., name) was more important than increased agricultural output. The religion of Israel was thus in complete opposition to the fertility cults of Canaan. This opposition imposed economic costs on the Israelites.

Leviticus 19:19’s prohibition of genetic experimentation was an aspect of the preservation of the national covenant, which included the tribal boundaries. In the economic trade-off between the land’s seed (increased wealth from genetic experimentation) and the promised Seed (which required the maintenance of tribal boundaries), the promised Seed had priority. Jacob’s prophecy was more important than agricultural production. We must interpret the seed laws as ritual laws. Israel had to sacrifice some degree of wealth in order to honor ritually

66. Ibid., p. 408.

67. Santillana, Hamlet’s Mill, pp. 58–59.

68. Acton, “Human Sacrifice,” pp. 412–18.

69. Ibid., p. 417.

the principle of the promised Seed. Far better this sacrifice than passing one's children through the fire: ritually honoring the family's land more than the family's seed.⁷⁰

In one particular, there was still the sacrifice of a son. Levi served as the firstborn son in Israel (Num. 3:12).⁷¹ This means that Israelite families were not required to set apart (sanctify) their firstborn sons for service to God at that first numbering of the nation, as would otherwise have been required (Ex. 13:2). The other tribes did not have to make a payment to the priests except for money in place of the 273 firstborn in excess of the Levites' 22,000 members (Num. 3:39, 46–47). The tribe of Levi became a lawful substitute.⁷² God claimed the Levites as His special possession (Num. 3:45). They could not usually inherit rural land in the Promised Land. They were disinherited because they were like dead men (sacrifices). They were judicially holy (set apart). A boundary was placed around them in the Levitical cities, where the jubilee laws did not apply (Lev. 25:32–34). Levi was separated until Shiloh came.

Leviticus 19:19 is part of the Mosaic Covenant's laws governing the preservation of the family's seed (name) during a particular period of history. It was an aspect of the necessary preservation of genetic Israel. The preservation of the separate seeds of Israel's families was basic to the preservation of the nation's legal status as a set-apart, separated, holy covenantal entity. This principle of separation applied to domesticated animals, crops, and clothing.

I. Animals

Let us begin with the law prohibiting the mixing of cattle. Did this refer to bovines only? The Hebrew word is transliterated behemah, the same word that we find transliterated as behemoth in Job 40:15. In every reference to cattle in Leviticus, this Hebrew word is used. Did this law apply only to cattle? What about other domesticated species? A case can be made both ways. Nevertheless, I believe that cattle in this case refers to all domesticated animals. The parallel prohibition against mixing crops was genetic. Also, the Hebrew word behemah is used generically for all domesticated animals in the laws against bestiality (Lev. 18:23; 20:15). This prohibited activity was less likely to be performed with bovines than other, smaller beasts.

70. Chapter 20.

71. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 4:A.

72. Ibid., ch. 4:D.

Another reason for translating behemah broadly as domestic animals in general is found in the law identifying the Levites as a special tribe, God's firstborn. In setting aside the Levites as a separate, holy tribe in the midst of a holy nation of priests, God also designated their animals as representatives of all the animals in Israel. At that first census of Israel, the people did not have to make a payment for the firstborn animals as part of the required sacrifice of the firstborn males (Num. 3:41, 45). The Hebrew root word for cattle in this verse is behemah. The payment to the temple in Numbers 3:49–51 does not mention a payment for the animals. This absence of payment indicates that the "cattle" of the Levites represented all the domesticated animals, not just bovines, so no payment was owed.⁷³

The case law governing the interbreeding of animals is analogous to the case law prohibiting owners from muzzling oxen as they worked the fields (Deut. 25:4). The prohibition against muzzling an ox while it treads out the corn applies in principle to paying appropriate wages to people (I Cor. 9:9–12)⁷⁴ and honoring church officers (I Tim. 5:17–18).⁷⁵ In these case laws, animals are representative of human beings. In short, the animals of Leviticus 19:19 were representatives of the nation of Israel as a holy people. Identifiable breeds were to be kept separate from each other, just as Israel's tribes were.

The plain teaching of the passage indicates that the breeds of animals that were common in the Promised Land at the time of the conquest were to be allowed to reproduce. The breeds had to be kept separate, however. There was to be no active breeding of new specialized breeds in order to produce animals that had different characteristics from the land's original breeds. There was to be no man-directed genetic manipulation of animals in Mosaic Israel.

The Mosaic law prohibiting the interbreeding of animals was never part of the creation mandate. It was a temporary law that illustrated an eschatological principle: the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham regarding the world's deliverance through the Seed. This event had not yet come to pass in Mosaic Israel. The Mosaic seed laws did not in any way reduce the authority of the promise to Abraham; they merely governed the administration of rural families' landed inheritance until that promised Seed should come. The authority of God's promise established the authority of the promised Seed. The Seed was the promise in Old Covenant Israel. Jesus Christ fulfilled that promise. In doing so, He annulled the Levitical seed laws. These laws no longer had any eschatological purpose. Their only purpose in Mosaic Israel was eschatological.

73. This argument is an argument from silence: the absence of any reference to a payment for the firstborn animals. The text specifically mentions payment for 273 firstborn sons. It does not mention another payment.

74. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 11.

75. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 7.

The technical possibility of mixing breeds always exists. Mixing will happen without active interference from man. If members of a species are not deliberately kept separate, they will breed together. Thus, to preserve an existing breed genetically, a husbandman must take active steps to keep the breeds separated. He must either build fences or hire drovers to keep them apart.

A law prohibiting random intermixing of breeds really was superfluous. No profit-seeking owner would allow a pair of specialized breeds to intermix randomly. Such progeny would rarely command the same price or produce the same level of output as the progeny of the separate breeds. Even if a more productive offspring would occasionally be produced, this would do the owner no long-term economic good, for he was prohibited from interbreeding the resulting pairs. So, this law was really a prohibition against scientific breeding aimed at producing a new breed with unique characteristics. It meant that whatever common animals existed when they entered the land—"mongrels"—could mix freely with other similarly undistinguished animals.

What if the free market began to register demand for a particular kind of animal? This demand would have applied to: (1) a breed that they had brought with them into the Promised Land, (2) a breed already within the land when they invaded, or (3) an imported breed from outside the land after they conquered it. These breeds would have been the modern equivalent of registered animals.

The husbandman would have kept these animals separate from other existing breeds. Obviously, he would have had an economic incentive to do this. To sell into a specialized market, his animals would have had to be kept away from others not of the same type. So, this law commanded what the economy would have required anyway: separation. It would have applied only to owners who had begun programs of experimental breeding to produce a separate breed. The preservation of an existing breed was lawful.

The seed of each breed had to be separated. To obey this law as it applied to “non-mongrels,” an Israelite would have had to construct a holding area or pen for each specialized breed. This means that a specific seed or line was associated with a specific place at any point in time. Owners could lawfully move animals to new locations, but there was always to be a geographical boundary associated with each breed (seed). This boundary established a connection between land and seed. This connection was mandatory for both man and beast.

J. Crops

The law stipulated, “thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed.” This means that a specific field had to be devoted to a specific crop at any given point in the growing season. Like the pens for animals, the seeds of the crop had to reside in a particular place. Seed and land had to be linked.

Policing this law would have been easy. The person who planted two crops in an organized way within the confines of a specific field (boundary) would soon face the visible evidence of his violation: rows of mixed crops. a priest or a Levite could easily identify a violation.

Modern grain farming tends to be mono-crop agriculture: one crop in a field at a time. This specialization of agriculture has been economically efficient in terms of reducing the cost of harvesting the crop and also by maximizing output per unit of land. Still, there are unique costs associated with mono-crop agriculture. These crops are more vulnerable to blight and insects. We have learned through experience that the mixing of seeds in a field can be beneficial, especially in terms of resistance to pests and disease.⁷⁶ It takes less insecticide to produce a large crop by relying on a mixture of plants to defend a particular field. So, it may be that for less specialized economies, mixed-crop agriculture is more productive. Yet this practice was prohibited in Mosaic Israel.

What about genetic experimentation? The same judicial prohibition applied. There could be no lawful, systematic mixing of seeds. An Israelite was not to apply his ingenuity to the creation of new species of plants. Hybrid animals and seeds were illegal to develop. They could be purchased from abroad, but since most hybrids are either sterile (e.g., mules) or else they produce weak offspring, there was little eco-conomic incentive to import hybrids except as a one-generation consumer good. Such imports were legal: with no “inheritance” possible, there was no symbolic threat from hybrids. A hybrid was not prohibited because of its status as a hybrid. It was illegal to produce them deliberately because of the prohibition against mixing seeds, which was fundamental. The practice of seed-mixing was illegal, not hybrids as such.

76. Roger B. Yepsen, Jr. (ed.), Organic Plant Protection (Emmaus, Pennsylvania: Rodale, 1976), ch. 5: “Protecting Plants with Other Plants.”

This law did not apply to the familiar practice of grafting the branches of one species of fruit tree into the trunk of another.⁷⁷ Leviticus 19:19 was specific: it dealt with seeds planted in a field, not with branches grafted into an adult tree. The tree’s trunk is the primary agent, symbolic of the covenant itself. The branch would become part of the older tree. It was not a competing seed. The removed branch was “adopted” by the older tree. This was always a legal option in Israel, as the marriages of Rahab and Ruth indicate. The technique of grafting was symbolic of conversion, which was why Paul used this imagery as the archetype in discussing the fate of the old branch of Israel and the grafting in of the gentiles (Rom. 11:17–21).⁷⁸ So, tree grafting symbolized covenantal inclusion—adoption by conversion and confession—not tribal mixing.

Some crops do better when mixed, such as fodder. In the modern-day State of Israel, Jewish farmers deal with this problem in a Rabbinically approved way. One man makes a pile of seeds in a public place and covers it with a board. A second person piles up a second seed crop on top of the board. A third person comes along and announces, in front of witnesses, “I need this board.” He removes it. Finally, a fourth man comes along and is instructed to sow the field with the now-mixed crop.⁷⁹

K. Clothing

Mixed clothing made of linen and wool was under a different kind of prohibition. It was illegal to wear clothing produced by mixing these two fibers. There was no law against producing mixed cloth for export, however. Why was wearing it wrong but exporting it allowed? In biblical law, if something is not prohibited, it is allowed.

77. Rabbinic opinion on this verse forbade grafting. See Nachmanides (Rabbi Moshe ben Nachman, the Ramban), Commentary on the Torah: Leviticus (New York: Shiloh, [1267?] 1974), p. 295. He cited the Talmud: Kiddushin 39a.

78. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

79. Israel Shahak, Jewish History, Jewish Religion: The Weight of Three Thousand Years (Boulder, Colorado: Pluto Press, 1994), p. 45.

1. Mixed Fibers

No other form of mixed-fiber clothing was prohibited by the Mosaic law. Did this case law by implication or extension prohibit all mixed fibers? This seems doubtful. It would have been easy to specify the more general prohibition rather than single out these two fibers. Deuteronomy's parallel passage also specifies this type of mixed fabric (Deut. 22:11). Then what was the nature of the offense? Answer: to wear clothing of this mixture was to proclaim symbolically the equality of Israel with all other nations. This could not be done lawfully inside Israel. But, as we shall see, it could be done by non-Israelites outside Israel.

Linen was the priestly cloth. The priests were required to wear linen on the day of atonement (Lev. 16:30–34). Linen was to be worn by the priest in the sacrifice of the burnt offering (Lev. 6:10). During and after the Babylonian captivity, because of their rebellion in Israel, the Levites and priests were placed under a new requirement that kept them separate from the people: they had to wear linen whenever they served before the table of the Lord. They had to put on linen garments when they entered God's presence in the inner court, and remove them when they returned to the outer court. No wool was to come upon them (Ezek. 44:15–19). The text says, "they shall not sanctify the people with their garments" (Ezek. 44:19). Priestly holiness was associated with linen.⁸⁰

Additionally, the laws of leprosy were associated with linen and wool. The test to see whether leprosy was present was to examine wool

80. On this point I disagree with James Jordan and all of the authorities he cited, both gentiles and Jews. Their argument is this: because the high priest's clothing was colored, it had to be a mixture of wool and linen because linen is difficult to dye. Jordan cited Exodus 28:5–6. But this passage says that even the thread had to be linen (v. 6). I can find no passage that indicates that the priests wore anything but linen when they brought sacrifices before God. This includes Exodus 39:29, which Jordan also cited. This is unquestionably the case in the post-exilic period. I think it is safer to go with the language of the texts than with a theory of ancient dyeing techniques. Jordan and several of the authorities he cited claim that the mixture of fabrics was itself holy, so non-priests could not lawfully wear such mixed clothing. I argue the opposite: pure linen was holy, so the wool-linen mixture was forbidden. See James Jordan, "The Law of Forbidden Mixtures," Biblical Horizons Occasional Paper No. 6, pp. 3, 6. In any case, the issue was holiness. It had to do with the separation of priests from non-priests: within the land of Israel and between the priestly nation of Israel and the non-priestly nations.

or linen garments (Lev. 13:47–48, 52, 59). The question arises: Why linen and wool? Why were they singled out?

2. No Sweat

Wool is produced by sheep, while linen is a product of the field: flax. Linen was used by the high priest in the sacrifice of the burnt offering (Lev. 6:10). Why? It probably had something to do with sweat as man's curse (Gen. 3:19). Linen absorbs moisture. The priest was required to wear a garment of pure linen. He was therefore to wear a garment that absorbed sweat. His judicial covering was to reduce the amount of sweat on his body. Wool, in contrast, is produced by the same follicle that produces sweat in a sheep.⁸¹ Wool tends to retain human sweat on the wearer's body.

Clothing covers a person. This is symbolic of God's judicial covering of Adam and Eve. They wanted a covering of the field (fig leaves); God required a covering from a slain animal. This means that to mix wool and linen was to mix ritual opposites. The wearing of such a mixture was symbolic of the mixing of priests and non-priests. It was all right for a nation of non-priests to wear such a mixture; it was prohibited to a nation of priests. This is why the export of this cloth was not prohibited. The recipient nations had no priestly status in God's covenant, and hence the mixture would have had no ritual meaning.⁸² God did not threaten non-priestly nations with negative sanctions if they violated some ritual requirement for priests in Israel. Their sacraments had no power to invoke God's sanctions, positive or negative. Had some group or nation been circumcised under God, then these clothing restrictions would have applied.

Inside a priestly nation, such a mixture was a threat to the holiness of the priests when they brought sacrifices before God. As between a priestly nation and a non-priestly nation, this section of Leviticus 19:19 symbolized the national separation of believers from unbelievers. Deuteronomy 22:11 is the parallel passage: "Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts: [as] of wool and linen together." Its immediate context is another case law, one which we know from Paul's epistle to the Corinthians refers to people, not just animals: "Thou shalt not plow an ox and an ass together" (Deut. 22:10). Paul wrote: "Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?" (II Cor. 6:14). It is legitimate to apply the principle of "unequal covenantal yoking" to Leviticus 19:19c, but only insofar as it applied to national separation.

81. "Wool," Software Toolworks Illustrated Encyclopedia (Grolier Encyclopedia) (1990).

82. That is to say, the sacramental sanctions were absent.

Inside the boundaries of Israel, however, the law symbolized sacrificial separation: the tribe of Levi was set apart as a legal representative before God. In this intra-national sense, this law did have a role to play in the separation of the tribes. This is why it was connected to the two seed laws in Leviticus 19:19.

3. A Change in the Priesthood

It is still prohibited to mix covenantal opposites in a single covenant: in church, state, and family. Is the wearing of this mixture of these two fabrics still prohibited? No. Why not? Because of the change in the priesthood. We must return to Galatians 3.

Our new covering is Jesus Christ. Paul wrote: "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3: 27–29). Here it is again: inheritance is by God's promise to Abraham. The sign of this inheritance is no longer circumcision; it is baptism. This is our new clothing. The old prohibition against wearing a mixed cloth of wool and linen is annulled. The new priesthood is under a new covering: Jesus Christ.

Because of Jesus' death, resurrection, and ascension, the curse of the ground no longer threatens us ritually, only economically. Thus, man's sweat is no longer a matter of ritual purity. The prohibition against wearing a mixed cloth of wool and linen is no longer nationally relevant: priestly vs. non-priestly nations. There are no longer any negative sanctions attached to this unique mixture of fabrics.

The ritual curse of the ground was finally removed at Jesus Christ's resurrection. The land is no longer under ritual sanctions, nor does it act as an agent of God, vomiting out covenant-breaking inhabitants, as the Promised Land did with the Canaanites (Lev. 18:28). The vomiting land no longer threatens us as it threatened the Israelites (Lev. 20:

22).⁸³ Jesus Christ vomits out lukewarm churches (Rev. 3:16).⁸⁴

The physical and economic curse is being progressively removed in history, including the curse of sweat. Men increasingly do not work by the sweat of their brows. The air conditioner is one of the wonders of modern life, enabling men to escape from the oppression of heat and humidity. This enables them to work more efficiently. Workers who work indoors—the primary place of work in modern economies—in tropical climates can now compete with workers in temperate climates.

L. The Question of Jurisdiction

Was this a civil law or an ecclesiastical law? To identify it as a civil law, we should be able to specify appropriate civil sanctions. The text mentions none. The civil magistrate might have confiscated the progeny of the interbreeding activities, but then what? Sell the animals? Export them? Kill them and sell the meat? These were possible sanctions, but the text is silent. What about mingled seed? Was the entire crop to be confiscated by the state? Could it lawfully be sold? Was it unclean? The text is silent. This silence establishes a prima facie case for the law as ecclesiastical.

The mixed clothing law refers to a fact of covenantal separation: a nation of priests. The Israelites were not to wear clothing made of linen and wool. This symbolic mixing testified to the legitimacy of mixing a nation of priests and a common nation. This is why wearing such mixed cloth was prohibited. This aspect of the case law's meaning was primarily priestly. Again, the prima facie case is that this was an ecclesiastical law and therefore enforced by the priesthood.

The maximum ecclesiastical sanction was excommunication. This would have marked the law-breaker as being outside the civil covenant. He faced the loss of his citizenship as well as the disinheritance of his sons unless they broke with him publicly. Instead of a mere economic loss, he faced a far greater penalty. This penalty was consistent with the status of this law as a seed law. The prohibition of mixed seeds was an affirmation of tribal separation until Shiloh came. An attack on tribal separation was an attack on Jacob's messianic prophecy. The appropriate penalty was ecclesiastical: removal from both inheritance and citizenship within the tribe.

83. Chapter 10.

84. For this reason, I believe that the predictable relationship between covenantal cursings and blessings is no longer applicable to floods and earthquakes. God's covenantal blessings and cursings are imposed by men as God's covenantal agents in New Covenant history. Men now exercise dominion over a creation that no longer acts as a covenantal agent. This is another reason why I am a preterist: the earthquakes described in the Book of Revelation completed God's judgment against national Israel. These land-applied, covenantally predictable curses are no longer an aspect of the New Testament judicial order. They ceased being covenantally predictable in A.D. 70.

Conclusion

In this chapter I have attempted to answer three questions: What did Leviticus 19:19 mean? How was it applied? How should it be applied today? This is the challenge of biblical hermeneutics.

1. What Did the Verse Mean?

Specialized breeds of animals could be imported and used by the Israelites. These breeds could not be lawfully produced by design or neglect (unrepaired fences) in Israel. Their use was legal; their production was not. In contrast, the mixed fiber cloth could be produced in Israel but not worn within Israel's boundaries. It could lawfully be exported or used for purposes other than clothing. The language of the clothing law was specific: "neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woolen come upon thee."

These differences in the laws point to different symbolic meanings. Leviticus 19:19 is a case law that illustrated a single principle: the necessity of separation. First, the separation of the tribes of Israel: the prohibition against (1) genetic mixing of animals and (2) the simultaneous planting (mixing) of more than one crop in a single field. Second, section three illustrated the holy (separated) condition of Israel as a nation of priests: mandating the separation of wool and linen in an Israelite's garment. These two fibers are at cross purposes with respect to man's curse: sweat. They were at cross purposes ritually with respect to priestly sacrifices. Therefore, they could not be cross-woven into clothing intended for use by residents of Israel. The cloth could be exported to members of non-priestly nations. It did not matter what they did with it. No lawful sacrifices could be offered in their lands.

The first two laws governed what was done in a man's fields. The fields were under his control. Thus, whatever separation the breeding laws required had to be achieved by establishing boundaries within a man's property. If there was a functional distinction within a species, these breeds had to be physically separated from each other, presumably by fences. Similarly, the seeds of several crops had to be kept separated. Each crop needed its own field at any point in time. This is why the first two laws symbolized the situation inside the national boundaries of Israel. Whatever was outside a family's landed property—its inheritance—was not under its authority. These laws applied inside the boundaries of the inheritance.

This is evidence that the seed laws did not symbolize the covenantal separation between Israel and the world. Israelites had no covenantal authority over the world outside of Israel. They did have authority inside Israel's boundaries, just as they had control over their own fields. So, the separation of their fields symbolized the separation among the tribes. This tribal separation was not genetic but rather prophetic. It had to do with inheritance and the promised Seed. The tribes had the same confession (unity maintained); except by forfeiting their landed inheritance, they could not mix maritally (diversity maintained). To keep their names in the land, families had to be separated tribally.

In contrast to the mixed-seed prohibition, the prohibition of mixed-fiber clothing did symbolize the separation between Israel and its neighbors. The judicial issue here was what was lawful for priests to wear. In relation to the world, Israel was a nation of priests. This law was an aspect of Israel's unique covenantal status. This law did not apply to non-priestly nations. Thus, the cloth could be exported. It was not its production that was prohibited, merely its use as clothing within Israel.

This three-fold law was temporary. It ended with the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, or, at the latest, at Pentecost. Spiritual adoption has overcome tribalism as the basis of inheritance in the kingdom of God. The gift of the Spirit is the basis of Christians' inheritance, not physical reproduction. National Israel was disinherited in A.D. 70.⁸⁵ The kingdom of God was taken from national Israel and given to a new nation, the church (Matt. 21:43). The jubilee land laws (Lev. 25) have ended forever. So have the prohibitions against genetic mixing and mixed crops. When people are baptized into Christ through the Spirit, this new priesthood puts on Christ. The older requirements or prohibitions regarding certain types of garments have ended forever. What remains is the judicial boundary between covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers. This separation is eternal (Rev. 20:14–15).

85. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

2. How Were These Laws Applied?

Earlier, I asked the question: Was Leviticus 19:19 itself an economic curse? In some respects, yes. It restricted the development of newer, specialized herds and crops. But these could have been imported. The law did reduce innovations in animal breeding inside national Israel. On the other hand, this law may have encouraged crop rotation. Since one crop had to be planted in one field, it was likely that after the harvest, a different crop would have been planted in that field. Crop rotation benefits agricultural productivity by replenishing the soil. As for wool-linen clothing, it has never gained popularity. Fustian was a mixture of wool and cotton. This was not prohibited. In any case, linen in the summer and wool in the winter would have been the choice fibers for those who could afford both of them.

This law imposed few costs, although it imposed some costs. That was the whole point: there was a trade-off between the seed of the land and the seed of the name, between landed wealth and tribal promise. Bearing these minor costs was an easy test of Israel's obedience. It symbolized the separation of the tribes in the land until the promised Seed arrived, transferring His inheritance to His people, a new nation of priests.

3. How Should These Laws Be Applied Today?

The biblical principle of not mixing seeds, whether of animals or crops in a single field, applies to us only indirectly. The basic judicial application is that we must be faithful to Jesus Christ, the promised Seed, who has come in history. In Him alone is true inheritance. But there is no application with respect to tribal boundaries. The tribes of Israel are gone forever. Thus, there is no application of this verse genetically. We are allowed to breed animals and plant various crops in the same field at the same time.

The other application of the principle of separation in this verse prohibited the wearing of mixed fiber garments. This applies to us today through baptism, for by baptism we have received our new clothing in Christ. This principle of separation still holds nationally, for it is covenantal, not tribal. It refers to the distinctions between priests and non-priests, between priestly nations and non-priestly nations. It refers to the distinction between Christendom and every other world system. But it has nothing to do with fabrics any longer.

18

COVENANTAL FRUIT

And when ye shall come into the land, and shall have planted all manner of trees for food, then ye shall count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised: three years shall it be as uncircumcised unto you: it shall not be eaten of. But in the fourth year all the fruit thereof shall be holy to praise the LORD withal. And in the fifth year shall ye eat of the fruit thereof, that it may yield unto you the increase thereof: I am the LORD your God (Lev. 19:23–25).

When we consider a biblical case law, it is best to begin theocentrically. God established this prohibition, so it must have had something to do with His relation to the land through His agents, men. The problem that the commentator faces is to specify three things: (1) what this relationship involved; (2) which men it applied to, men in general or the Israelites of the Mosaic covenant; (3) its proper application today. Was it a universal prohibition, or did it apply only to the Promised Land under the Mosaic economy?

A. Seed Laws and Separation

This is a seed law. The seed laws were laws of separation. That is, they placed judicial boundaries around living organisms. We need to determine what this law meant. Because this statute invokes the language of circumcision, it has to refer symbolically (i.e., representatively) to the covenantal separation between circumcised and uncircumcised people. Tribal or family separation within Israel is therefore not in question here. What kind of separation was involved? Did this law refer to the legal boundary separating circumcised and uncircumcised men dwelling in Israel? Did it refer to the separation between circumcised and uncircumcised nations? Or was there some other separation involved?

I argue that it referred to a unique form of covenantal separation, one which is represented by no other law in Scripture: a separation whose origins were in Israel's past. This separation was the 40-year period of wandering in the wilderness in which the Israelites of the exodus generation refused to circumcise their sons. I need a whole chapter to prove my point.

This law applied to orchards. God marked off the fruit of newly planted trees for His own purposes. He set this fruit outside of covenant-keeping man's lawful access. That is, He placed a "no trespassing" boundary around the fruit of newly planted trees for three years after they began to bear fruit. Then he announced that the fruit of the fourth year was holy: set aside for him. This was analogous to what He had done in the garden with the tree of the knowledge of good and evil: setting it aside for a period, keeping men away from it.

The question is: Why?

B. Temporarily Forbidden Fruit

Two facts need to be noted. First, this prohibition applied to the first four years of fruit borne by a tree that was planted in the Promised Land after the land had come under the control of the Israelites. As we shall see, the prohibition did not apply to fruit from trees that had been planted by the Canaanites just prior to the invasion of Canaan by Israel. It was not "trees as such" whose fruit came under this ban; it was trees that had been planted after the conquest.

The seeds or cuttings that would serve as the parents of Israel's first crop would have come from the existing trees of Canaan. The new trees' fruit was to be set aside for three seasons and offered to God in the fourth. This indicates that there had to be a discontinuity between the trees and seeds of the old Canaan and the trees and seeds of the new Canaan. Like the leaven of Egypt that had to be purged out during the first Passover, so were the firstfruits of Canaan. The leaven (yeast) of Egypt could not be used as "starter" for the leaven of the conquered Canaan. It was different in the case of Canaan's trees. They had to be used as "starter" for Israel's new orchards. Thus, God prohibited access to their fruit for a period, thereby emphasizing the covenantal discontinuity between the old Canaan and the new Canaan.

Second, God called "uncircumcised" the forbidden fruit of the first three seasons. This is a peculiar way to speak of fruit. Circumcision was the visible mark of the Abrahamic Covenant: the visible legal boundary separating the heirs of the promise from non-heirs. That is, circumcision determined inheritance (point five of the biblical covenant model: succession/inheritance). In Mosaic Israel, circumcision separated those who had lawful access to the Passover meal from those who did not (point four: oath/sanctions). The legal basis of separation was inclusion vs. exclusion inside the formally covenanted people of God (point three: boundaries). Incorporation into the covenanted nation was by covenantal oath-sign (point four). The uncircumcised individual was institutionally outside God's covenantal boundary. He was therefore judicially unholy, i.e., not set apart legally. He would profane a ritually holy place by crossing its legal boundary. But who was this uncircumcised person? Was he a resident alien? If so, what did the mandatory three years of separation have to do with him?

A judicial separation of this kind implied a threat—negative sanctions—to the violator of the boundary. Whom did the forbidden fruit threaten? Not the birds or other beasts of the land. They had lawful access to the fruit during the first three years. The fruit was not poisonous, obviously. Then why was it prohibited to an Israelite? Why was there a legal boundary placed around it? What did this boundary symbolize?

It could be argued that mankind poses a threat to young trees or to the orchard itself. Perhaps the law was ecological in intent rather than ritual. But then why was the new fruit of young trees that had already been planted in Canaan at the time of the conquest not placed under the ban? And why was the covenantal-legal language of circumcision invoked?

C. Uncircumcised Fruit

The language of the law is clear: "And when ye shall come into the land, and shall have planted all manner of trees for food, then ye shall count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised." The trees of Canaan that were already bearing fruit at the time of Israel's conquest of Canaan were not under any prohibition. They were to be considered by the invading Israelites as part of the spoils of war. "And I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and oliveyards which ye planted not do ye eat" (Josh. 24:13). This verse does not say that young trees were excluded; it does imply that the whole land was God's gift to Israel. Where a prohibition was placed around spoils, which was uniquely the case with the city of Jericho, God warned them in no uncertain terms through Joshua (Josh. 6:17–19).

1. A Legal Issue, Not Ritual

Uncircumcised fruit was analogous to an uncircumcised male or a woman who was under the family jurisdiction of an uncircumcised male: outside the covenant. This was a legal issue, not ritual: incorporation. The fruit of the Canaanites' existing orchards was not identified as judicially uncircumcised. It could immediately be consumed or sold by the land's new owners. So, the prohibition had nothing to do with any supposedly ritually polluting effects of the land of Canaan. In fact, the reverse was the case: the land was holy, but the Canaanites were not. The land was part of Abraham's legacy to his heirs (Gen. 15:16). It was judicially holy land. God's promise had made the land definitively holy. Subsequently, the land had been progressively polluted by the Canaanites:

Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things: for in all these the nations are defiled which I cast out before you: And the land is defiled: therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you: (For all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, and the land is defiled;) That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you (Lev. 18:24–28).¹

The Canaanites' ethically perverse behavior had defiled the holy land, i.e., profaned it. They were unholy men dwelling inside a holy boundary. Finally, the land purged itself of those who had defiled it. It was a holy land, so it vomited out those who were unholy. But why didn't the land do this long before Joshua's generation? Because the cup of iniquity of Canaan ("Amorites") had not been filled up (Gen. 15:16b). A progressive process of profanation had to take place first, just as a progressive process of holiness had to take place among the Israelites. By Joshua's day, this progressive profanation by the Canaanites had reached its fullness (final profanation), as had the progressive sanctification of Israel. It was time for the land to begin vomiting, i.e., time for Israel to invade. The land became finally holy at the time of the invasion by a judicially holy nation. It was circumcised Israel's presence in the land that made the land a finally holy place. The judicially mandatory cleansing process began. The separation was to be total: the annihilation of the Canaanites (Deut. 7:16).

1. Chapter 10.

When the land attained its status as finally holy, it gained its status as ritually holy. The finalization of the land's holy status in history came only with the circumcision of Israel inside the land (Josh. 5). The Israelites had been ritually unholy until they were circumcised at Gilgal. Their circumcision anointed them as a nation of priests, and they could then lawfully offer sacrifice: Jericho, Israel's firstfruits offering to God (Josh. 6:24). The battle of Jericho marked the beginning of the land's vomiting process. The land began serving as God's covenantal agent: "And I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee" (Ex. 23:28). It was the presence of the circumcised nation of Israel in the land that made the land and its existing fruits holy. Except for Jericho, which served as the firstfruits for the Lord, none of the land and its fruit was declared off-limits to covenant-keepers. The land had become totally off-limits to the covenant-breaking Canaanites who were residing in it.² When the Israelites inherited the land, the land gained a unique judicial and ritual status as God's dwelling place. It became the land of the tabernacle and, later, the temple. It was the only place on earth where lawful sacrifices to God were offered by God's corporately covenanted people.

2. Who Planted Which Trees?

Why, then, was the early fruit of newly planted trees identified as uncircumcised? Uncircumcised means unholy: not set apart by God, i.e., not incorporated. How could the land, which had been made finally holy by the invasion of the Israelites, produce unholy or uncircumcised fruit? Clearly, the new fruit was declared uncircumcised, but the land could not have been at fault. Conclusion: if it was not the land that was the source of the new fruit's unholy status, then it must have been the Israelites. But why?

To find the answer, we need first to ask: What was judicially or ritually different about fruit trees that had been planted by the Israelites in the Promised Land, as distinguished from young trees that had been planted by Canaanites immediately prior to Israel's invasion of the land? When an Israelite was the agent who planted seeds in the land, the judicial status of the fruit of the trees changed. The fruit was placed inside a legal boundary for four years. It was declared off-limits. Normally, we would expect any set-apart status to be called holy by God, but in this case the fruit was called uncircumcised. This is peculiar. What was special about the fruit of young trees planted by Israelites? What was the point, ritually and judicially?

2. The exceptions, of course, were the Gibeonites (Josh. 9), who lost their land and citizenship, becoming slaves to the Levites (Josh. 9:23, 27), who also owned no land outside cities.

Trees and edible fruit pointed back to the initial test of mankind in the garden. Adam was prohibited from eating the fruit of a specified tree. It was off-limits to him. This is not to say that it was to be kept away from him forever. What Adam should have done was to eat from the tree of life before he went to the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. His spiritual maturity was supposed to be based on his participation in a meal from the tree of life, not on his access to instant knowledge. The tree of the knowledge of good and evil served as a reminder to Adam that God is sovereign, for He places lawful boundaries around anything He chooses. He does whatever He chooses with everything that belongs to Him, and no one can call Him to account.³ He calls His creatures to account, not the other way around.

What was God's reason for calling the fruit of the first three years uncircumcised? What did circumcision have to do with fruit? Biologically, nothing at all; symbolically, everything. In Israel, not to be circumcised was to be judicially unholy, i.e., common or "gentile." Those people who were holy had been set apart judicially by God: incorporated into the covenant people. The new fruit was identified by God as judicially unholy—not ritually unclean, but judicially unholy, meaning common. The unholy or gentile judicial status of the fruit was not produced by the land, which was itself holy; it therefore had to be produced by the Israelites who did the planting. Conclusion: the judicial status of being uncircumcised came from men who were circumcised. Why was this the case?

D. History and Eschatology

Obviously, there was nothing unholy about the judicial status of the circumcised Israelite at the time that he planted an orchard. What was it about judicially holy men that produced an opposite judicial status in the fruit of young trees? Here is the dilemma: the Israelites' present judicial status at the time of planting was holy; the land's present judicial status was also holy; yet the fruit would be judicially unholy for three years. The judicial question has to be turned away from the Israelites' present judicial status in Mosaic Israel to their past, their future, or both.

3. This is the primary message of the Book of Job.

The frame of reference surely was not eschatological in the way that the seed laws of Leviticus 19:19 were. The orchard statute had nothing to do with tribal separation, the way Leviticus 19:19 did.⁴ The law of uncircumcised fruit did not refer Jacob's promise to a specific tribe of Israel, nor did it mandate the permanent separation of tribal inheritance until the Promised Seed appeared. I therefore conclude that this statute's primary frame of reference was historical. The anomaly of two holy things—land and circumcised planter—producing something temporarily unholy points back to the generation of the conquest of the land: the fourth generation after Abraham's covenant (Gen. 15:16). Why do I conclude this? First, because that generation was temporarily unholy. Second, because of the representative numerical relationship between 40 days (the time the twelve tribal spies spent in the Promised Land: Numbers 13), 40 years (the time of the wilderness wandering), and four years (the period of the two-fold boundary around the fruit).

1. 40 Years

For four decades, the Israelites of the exodus generation had wandered in the wilderness without circumcising their sons. Why 40 years? Because the spies had been in the land for 40 days:

Say unto them, As truly as I live, saith the LORD, as ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do to you: Your carcases shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which have murmured against me, Doubtless ye shall not come into the land, concerning which I sware to make you dwell therein, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun. But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised. But as for you, your carcases, they shall fall in this wilderness. And your children shall wander in the wilderness 40 years, and bear your whoredoms, until your carcases be wasted in the wilderness. After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years, and ye shall know my breach of promise. I the LORD have said, I will surely do it unto all this evil congregation, that are gathered together against me: in this wilderness they shall be consumed, and there they shall die (Num. 14:28–35).

4. Chapter 17.

Except for Joshua and Caleb, the men of the exodus generation had been designated by God as unholy because of their disbelief and rebellion. They could not enter the land, which would become finally holy at the time of their sons' mass circumcision at Gilgal. They could not lawfully cross this boundary; to have done so would have been a profane act. Thus, that first generation had to be kept outside the land by God. They were not allowed to profane the holy land by violating its boundaries.

When they were all dead, as prophesied, their sons were allowed to cross that boundary. But they, too, were unholy. They had never been circumcised. So, Joshua had them circumcised at Gilgal after they came into the land (Josh. 5:6–12).

The male children in the wilderness should have been circumcised on the eighth day after each was born. Their parents had refused to do this. The text does not say why. I think the most likely economic explanation is that the parents thought they might return to Egypt at some point. They were “keeping their options open” covenantally with respect to their children. The children were not formally placed under the covenantal protection and obligations that God requires of His people. That is, their parents did not incorporate them into the nation.

The parents had been told by God that they would not enter the land (Num. 14:23). They regarded their possession of the land of Canaan as the only meaningful public validation of God's covenant; their deliverance from bondage in Egypt was not sufficient in their eyes. They were basically announcing: “No immediate payoff in real estate; so, no mark of covenantal subordination in our sons.” They wanted an immediate payoff, just as Adam had desired in the garden; they were unwilling to trust God with respect to the inheritance of the land by their children. So, God kept that uncircumcised younger generation in the wilderness until the exodus generation died, except for Joshua and Caleb.

There may also have been a judicial reason for their refusal. The nation had rebelled against Joshua and Caleb, and then against God when they attacked the Amalekites and Canaanites against God's specific command (Num. 14:39–44). The 10 cowardly spies had been killed by God through a plague (Num. 14:37). The nation had become unholy: separated from the definitively holy Promised Land for one generation. The fathers may have concluded that they had lost their status as household priests. So, they refused to circumcise their sons, or have the Levites circumcise them. Whether this was at God's command is not revealed in the text. But these people were cowards, and they had seen what happened to the 10 cowardly spies. They may have decided that discretion was the better part of valor with respect to circumcising their sons.

After entering the land, the sons who had been born in the wilderness were immediately circumcised. At that point, they celebrated the Passover with the existing fruit of the land (Josh. 5:11). Immediately, the miraculous manna ceased. The people lived off the fruit of the land from that time on (Josh. 5:12). They had moved from miraculous food to miraculous warfare (Jericho). After the conquest of the land, they moved to non-miraculous planting.⁵

To recapitulate: Canaan's conquerors had been uncircumcised for up to 40 years. The close of the wilderness period came with their celebration of the Passover as household priests: heads of their own households. Then the conquest began. The firstfruits of the conquest was the city of Jericho, which had to be burnt as a whole offering to God. None of its treasure was to be taken by the Israelites personally; everything was either to be burned or used to make the treasures of the tabernacle (Josh. 6:19). Jericho was to be cut off completely: a fore-skin.

2. Four Years

We return to Leviticus 19:23–25. The fruit of newly planted trees was off-limits to them until the fourth year. “But in the fourth year all the fruit thereof shall be holy to praise the LORD withal.” The question is: What were they required to do with the fruit in year four? Were they to take it to the priest, as they were required to with the firstfruits offering (Lev. 23:10–11)? Or was it analogous to the required third-year tithe feast in Jerusalem (Deut. 14:22–23)?⁶

Because the forbidden fruit is called uncircumcised, it is best to treat the fourth-year harvest as analogous to the Passover feast. Only

5. There would still be one remaining miracle: the triple harvest just before the seventh sabbatical year (Lev. 25:21).

6. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 35.

after circumcision was Passover legal. This fourth-year feast provided each family with the first lawful occasion for enjoying the fruits of their own labor—the trees they had planted and nurtured—in the Promised Land. What had been uncircumcised fruit and therefore forbidden to them became circumcised in the fourth year, and therefore eligible to serve as food for a mandatory holy feast. They would have had to invite the Levites to the feast, and presumably also widows and orphans, just as they were required to do in the third-year festival: “And the Levite that is within thy gates; thou shalt not forsake him; for he hath no part nor inheritance with thee. At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates: And the Levite, (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee,) and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied; that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest” (Deut. 14:27–29).⁷

3. Historical References

It is time to make some connections. We have to ask ourselves: What did this prohibition represent?⁸ First, young fruit trees are immature. So were the children born in the wilderness. Such fruit was designated as uncircumcised. The children in the wilderness era had been uncircumcised.

Second, the “harvesting” of Canaan militarily began after 40 years. The unrestricted harvesting of fruit trees began lawfully after four years of fruitfulness.

Third, there is the question of inheritance. Caleb said that he had been 40 years old in the year that he had been sent in to spy out the land (Josh. 14:7). This was one year after the exodus (Num. 10:11–12; 13:17–20). Israel wandered for 39 years after the spying incident before entering Canaan. Caleb was 79 (40 + 39) when the invasion began, and 85 when it ended (Josh. 14:10).⁹ So, it took Israel six years to conquer Canaan. The text says that the land then had rest from war (Josh. 14:15). This means that there was rest from war in the seventh year—a

7. Idem.

8. The issue of symbolism in the Bible is judicial representation, point two of the biblical covenant model. We seek to learn what a particular symbol represented judicially.

9. James B. Jordan, “The Chronology of the Pentateuch (Part 6),” Biblical Chronology, VI (Aug. 1994), pp. 3–4.

sabbatical symbol. Therefore, during the fifth decade after the exodus, Israel took possession of the whole land as its inheritance. Similarly, the fifth year of fruit was the first year in which the fruit of the trees belonged to the individual.

There is a parallel between the wilderness years the uncircumcised generation of the conquest and the ban on eating the fruit of new trees planted in Canaan. The fruit did not belong to the owner until after the holy feast of year four. That is, he took possession of the fruit in year five. This parallels Israel's taking possession of Canaan during decade five. This four-year prohibition pointed symbolically back to Israel's rebellion in the wilderness: four decades of deferred possession. This seed law for orchards referred back to the unique historical experience of the conquest generation: Israel's seed.

4. Eschatological References

Yet in several ways, this law also typified the ministry of Jesus Christ. In this sense it was eschatological. Jesus did not begin His public ministry until He was 30 years old: "And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age" (Luke 3:23a). Thus, for three decades—the years of Jesus' youth—the nation of Israel did not have access to His ministry. In the beginning of His fourth decade, then, Jesus began to preach.

His ministry seems to have lasted three years.¹⁰ Then, in the fourth year, He was tried and crucified. This took place immediately after the Pharisees' and Galileans' Passover ("Thursday" evening: Nissan 14) and just before the Sadducees' and Judeans' Passover ("Friday" evening: Nissan 15).¹¹ This tree of life never again bore fruit for Old Covenant Israel. Jesus was the Passover lamb. If I am correct in suggesting an analogy between the fourth year's holy fruit and the Passover, then it can be said that the Jews symbolically took the Passover fruit and had the Romans nail it back on a tree. The Jews, given a choice, chose unholy fruit (Barabbas) in place of the holy fruit:

And Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests and the rulers and the people, Said unto them, Ye have brought this man

10. Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, eds. John M'Clintock and James Strong, 12 vols. (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), IV, p. 881; The International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia, ed. James Orr, 5 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1939] 1943), III, p. 1629.

11. Harold W. Hoehner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1977), p. 89.

unto me, as one that perverteth the people: and, behold, I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse him: No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him. I will therefore chastise him, and release him. (For of necessity he must release one unto them at the feast.) And they cried out all at once, saying, Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas: (Who for a certain sedition made in the city, and for murder, was cast into prison.) Pilate therefore, willing to release Jesus, spake again to them. But they cried, saying, Crucify him, crucify him (Luke 23:13–21).

The theme of three years and a fourth year is clear in Jesus' parable of the fig tree:

He spake also this parable; A certain man had a fig tree planted in his vineyard; and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground? And he answering said unto him, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it: And if it bear fruit, well: and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down (Luke 13:6–9).¹²

If the tree failed to bear fruit in the fourth year, it was fit for burning. That was Old Covenant Israel in Christ's day. God publicly burned this barren fig tree in A.D. 70.¹³

E. Initially Confusing Economics

Gordon Wenham has very little to say about this law. He sees it as part of the laws imposing personal economic sacrifice: giving one day in seven to God, tithing, and the dedication of the firstfruits. This makes sense both economically and theologically with respect to the fourth year's crop, but it makes no sense with respect to the first three years. Why should God want men to offer Him the less valuable fruit of a tree's life cycle? Wenham's confusion escalates when he begins to discuss the economics of the prohibition. "In the case of fruit trees, however, little fruit is borne in the early years, and this law specifies that it is the fourth year's crop that counts as the firstfruits and must be dedicated to God. Old Babylonian law (LH 60) also reckons it takes

12. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 30.

13. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

four years for an orchard to develop its potential. Similarly sacrificial animals may not be offered till they are at least eight days old (Exod. 22:29 [Eng. 30]) and boys are not circumcised till the eighth day (Gen. 17:12)."¹⁴ His assumption is this: youth = less value; hence, the Israelites had to wait for a time before offering such reduced-value sacrifices, including circumcision.

Wenham refers to the Hammurabi Code, but this passage presents formidable problems to anyone who would identify this law with the law of uncircumcised fruit. The law reads: "If, when a seignior gave a field to a gardener to set out an orchard, the gardener set out the orchard, he shall develop the orchard for four years; in the fifth year the owner of the orchard and the gardener shall divide equally, with the owner of the orchard receiving his preferential share."¹⁵ First, this referred to the time of growth for the trees, not the first four years of actual fruit-bearing. Second, the gardener was not prohibited from appropriating fruit in years one through four; he could. Only in the fifth year did he have to divide the crop with the owner. In other words, the gardener, as the subordinate, kept whatever the trees produced in years one through four; beginning in the fifth year, the owner was entitled to half. That is, in the trees' lean years, the gardener kept it all. But the Levitical law established the opposite system: the gardener kept nothing in years one through three of actual production. Only in year four did the firstfruits principle go into effect: a joint feast. God received it all ritually in that year. Afterward, He took only the tithe.

There is clearly an economic element in all this. The owner of the land (God's "gardener") did without for at three years. In this sense, he did make an economic sacrifice. But why did God impose this economic sacrifice? Why did He declare the less valuable fruit off-limits? He did this in no other formal sacrifice in the Old Covenant. To offer a less valuable asset to God as a lawful sacrifice seems to testify falsely to the value of the ultimate sacrifice for sin: the death of His Son. So, what we have to conclude is that leaving the young fruit to drop and rot on the ground was not an aspect of the laws of formal sacrifice. As we have seen, this prohibition was a symbolic negative sanction against them for their uncircumcised status in the wilderness. The three-year delay was not a ritual sacrifice, although the fourth-year

14. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 271.

15. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), p. 169.

feast probably was.

F. Rabbinical Interpretations

Rabbinical commentators have pointed to the obvious fact that this case law imposed a cost on the owner, namely, forfeited fruit. They have not traced the origin of this law back to a specific Israelite rebellion: Israel's refusal to challenge the Canaanites for control over the land and the refusal to circumcise their sons. They have not seen the law as God's subsequent imposition on that generation's heirs of a restitution payment to both the land itself (the environment) and God. Instead, they argue that there is something instructive in this law regarding man's general moral condition. Rashi,¹⁶ the late eleventh-century commentator, cited Rabbi Akiba, who had lived over nine centuries earlier.¹⁷ "The Torah says this because it has man's evil inclination in mind: that one should not say, 'Behold, for four years I must take trouble with it for nothing!' Scripture therefore states that the result of your obedience will be that it will give you its produce in larger quantities."¹⁸ Rashi identified mankind's universal time-preference—discounting the future value of scarce economic resources compared to their present value—as "man's evil inclination."

S. R. Hirsch, the mid-nineteenth-century defender of what has become known as Orthodox Judaism, also placed the meaning of this law within the boundaries of man's evil (animal-like) preference for present gratification. He, too, transformed the prohibition into a general moral issue: "The Jew waits three years before he enjoys the fruit for which he has planted the tree. And in refraining from using the fruit at God's command, he strips himself of the rights of property before God, and so for three years he practices by this restraint the self control which is so necessary for keeping enjoyment within the limits of morality. . . . [H]e learns to bring even the enjoyment of his senses out of the chains of animal greed into the sphere of self-controlled, God-remembering and God-serving happiness, and so remains worthy of being a human being and near to God also in the enjoyment of his

16. Rabbi Solomon (Shlomo) Yizchaki.

17. Akiba is sometimes suggested as the successor to Gamaliel. He participated in the disastrous Bar Kokhba rebellion against Rome in the early 130s, A.D. He was the first compiler of the Mishna, or Jewish oral tradition.

18. Chumash with Targum Onkelos, Haphtaroth and Rashi's Commentary, A. M. Silbermann and M. Rosenbaum, translators, 5 vols. (Jerusalem: Silbermann Family, [1934] 1985 [Jewish year: 5745]), III, p. 89a.

senses.”¹⁹

What the rabbis have criticized is the phenomenon of time-preference: the preference of all acting men for immediate gratification compared to deferred gratification, other things being equal. Time-preference is an inescapable aspect of man’s existence. If I offer you, free of charge (including any storage or insurance costs you may have to pay), the choice between a gift received today or a year in the future, you will take it today, assuming that you expect other things to remain equal. You prefer to begin receiving the psychic income stream from the gift immediately rather than a year from now. Besides, you have no assurance that you will even be alive a year from now.

The rabbis have argued that this universal preference for goods in the present vs. the same goods in the future is somehow evil. They are wrong. Time-preference is not something evil; it is a rational response to man’s inescapable judicial status as an agent who lives in the present and who is responsible for taking action in the present. A person’s present decision counts for more ethically and judicially than some future decision. He is responsible for actions taken now. To live is to act. To act is to make choices.²⁰ No one can evade this responsibility except through death. Man’s judicial status imposes economic costs on him. One of these costs is the reduced present value of expected future assets compared with the same assets possessed now.

This inescapable fact of life does not imply that the future is economically irrelevant. It also does not mean that the present value of expected future goods is zero. The covenantally faithful man looks to the future, especially his resurrection and the world beyond the resurrection (Dan. 12:1–4). But to equate man’s time-preference with evil or animal-like behavior is a very serious mistake, both exegetically and economically.²¹ Time-preference is a fact of life, not a moral factor. It is what a person does in terms of his time-preference that makes a covenantal difference.

19. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch, translated by Isaac Levi, 5 vols. (Gateshead, London: Judaica Press, [1867–78] 1989), III, p. 546.

20. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven: Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949). (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

21. For a consideration of mistakes that can follow, see Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), Appendix J: “Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney.”

G. Forfeited Income and Class Position

There is no doubt that one economic effect of this law was to force the orchard's owner to forego three years' worth of the orchard's output before he could celebrate before the Lord in year four. No doubt this law did pressure obedient men to count the costs of their decision: planting an orchard vs. planting something else (or planting nothing). But being required to count the costs of our actions is not in and of itself an incentive to become more future-oriented. No law can force men to become more future-oriented. The function of biblical civil law is not to make men positively good; it is to reduce the level of public evil. This law merely sorted out those who were more future-oriented (less present-oriented) from those who were less future-oriented (more present-oriented). Those residents of the holy commonwealth who were more future-oriented were more likely to plant orchards. Those who were less future-oriented were more likely to plant a crop that was not under a temporary harvesting restriction. Each man made his choice. So, there was no necessary connection between this case law and a general increase in men's future-orientation. But there was a necessary connection between future-orientation and the kinds of crops individual decision-makers planted.

Edward Banfield has linked time perspective with class position. An upper-class person is someone with low time-preference, i.e., a future-oriented person.²² A society that views an increase in future-orientation as a virtue—and the Bible indicates that it is a virtue²³—does pressure individuals to become more future-oriented. But civil law cannot accomplish this.²⁴ Then what does? Such psychological factors as fear, education, and moral persuasion. At best, widespread obedience to the uncircumcised fruit law would have enabled local residents to identify families whose heads of household were (or had been) future-oriented. The presence of an orchard on a person's land so identified such an individual, or at least such a family.

22. Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 48–50. On the middle class, see pp. 50–53. On the lower class, see pp. 53–59. On the importance of Banfield's book, see Thomas Sowell, "The Unheavenly City Revisited," American Spectator (Feb. 1994).

23. At the margin, of course. An increase to total future-orientation is not possible, for we must eat, drink, and be clothed in the present.

24. This includes tax policy. Lowering capital gains tax rates, for example, does not make someone more future-oriented. It merely raises the after-tax return of future profits. The fact that a person can legally keep more in the future than less in the future will affect his present investment decisions, but this change has nothing to do with a change in his time-preference: the discount of future value in relation to present value.

In the moral environment of covenantally faithful Israel, the presence of an orchard became a kind of status symbol. The orchard took on the characteristic of a consumer good. Like a very expensive automobile in today's world, the orchard testified to someone who had "made it" because of his (or his father's) diligence and willingness to defer gratification by planting the orchard. In this sense, the uncircumcised fruit law may have indirectly promoted future-orientation, but only because this outlook on deferred gratification was already widely acknowledged to be positive—a sign of character in a person or family. The presence of an orchard became a visible manifestation of a desirable character trait. In short, "if you've got it, flaunt it!"

There is a secondary aspect of transgression associated with time-preference. When God says "Wait!" men are supposed to wait. This imposes a cost on man and therefore requires faith, for there is no escape from time-preference, meaning a discount of future vs. present economic value. There is, however, a very high present value on waiting when God commands us to wait (Ps. 27:14; 37:34; Prov. 20:22). Avoiding God's wrath is a fundamental component of rational cost-benefit analysis. So, the benefits of waiting are in such cases greater than the costs. Men are supposed to believe this and then act (i.e., do something else besides the prohibited act) in terms of this fact.

The fruit of trees planted in the Promised Land by the priestly people of Israel was completely off-limits to the covenant-keeping Israelite for three years. The fruit of a young tree was protected. That is to say, this young fruit was reserved by God for Himself, just as the forbidden fruit in the garden had been. He allowed the birds and animals of the field to eat it, but not His human covenantal agents. Each tree planted after the conquest was to receive care from the husbandman without having to produce income for him in the short term. The gardener had to wait.²⁵ At the very least, this was a reminder to covenant-keeping man that he should not plan for a rapid return on his investment. The lure of legal short-term profits was removed from this aspect of agriculture. The person who planted trees had to have a longer-term outlook on the economic fruits of investing than the person who planted only a grain field.

25. This requirement to wait was imposed even on Jesus. It is significant that Mary first identified the resurrected Jesus as a gardener (John 20:15). As the Second Adam, He was God's new designated gardener of the world. He had to wait until His resurrection before He was allowed to celebrate the firstfruits of His ministry. This shared meal took place on the fourth day after He had celebrated Passover (Luke 24:41–43). He now shares this firstfruits feast only with His designated priesthood: the church, His true bride.

When Adam ate the forbidden fruit, he was announcing by his action that he was unwilling to wait for God's decision to allow him lawful access to such judicial knowledge. Adam's act was a premature grab for the robes of judicial authority. It was not primarily his present-orientation as such that was his fault; it was his unwillingness to celebrate with God in a communion meal at the tree of life. Adam's act was an assertion that the terms of life and death are based on man's autonomous knowledge of good and evil: a false assertion. It was the other way around for Adam. He could not attain eternal life through specialized knowledge of the law. He could gain an indeterminate extension of his life on earth only through obedience to the one law that he had been given. He could gain the blessing of eternal life only by eating from the tree of life, avoiding the forbidden fruit.²⁶ Adam violated God's "no trespassing" sign and became a sacrilegious thief. It was not simply that he was unwilling to wait on God in order to receive lawful access to the tree of knowledge; it was that he was unwilling to subordinate himself to God and accept first the grace of lawful access to the tree of life. The primary judicial issue was not Adam's degree of time-preference; the issue was his willingness to submit to God.

H. Which Decalogue Commandment?

Rushdoony wrote that this law was an aspect of the sabbath laws of the land. He discusses it in a chapter on the fourth commandment. "This law clearly is linked with laws previously discussed which bear on soil conservation, the fertility of the trees, and respect for the life of all creation."²⁷ If he was correct, then this law also governed the non-priestly nations besides Israel: a cross-boundary law. It is therefore universal and still in force. As part of the laws of the sabbath, it refers to the legitimate rest that the land deserves, all over the world.

26. It is worth noting that Adam and Eve were kept outside the garden after their rebellion in order to keep them from eating from the tree of life (Gen. 3:22–23). What had been not only legal for them but expected of them before their rebellion became illegal afterward. Similarly, the Israelites were expected to conquer the land immediately after the giving of the law, but when they rebelled against the testimony of Joshua and Caleb, they were kept outside the land until they died.

27. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 147.

1. Unique to Israel

I argue that this law was unique to the history of Israel. It was imposed by God on the whole nation because of the restitution that was owed to the land of Canaan by all of Israel, including the heirs of the exodus generation. The land had to be compensated for the extra generation of living under the authority of the Canaanites: an extra generation of slavery. This law imposed costs on the heirs of that rebellious generation.²⁸ This law was not a cross-boundary law. It was exclusively a Mosaic seed law: the uncircumcised sons of the exodus generation and their heirs' uncircumcised fruit. It was tied exclusively to the Promised Land, and even more narrowly: to the Promised Land after the circumcision of Israel (Josh. 5). Rushdoony subsumed this law under the wrong commandment. It had nothing to do with the sabbath.

The land of Palestine no longer enjoys a unique covenantal status before God. That status finally ended with the land's purging of the Israelites in A.D. 70. What God warned in his law came true: the land vomited them out. Just as the Israelites had been the agents by which the Promised Land spewed out the Canaanites, so the Romans became the agents by which the land spewed out covenant-breaking Israel. The Israelites had used Roman law and Roman power to crucify Jesus; Roman law and power were then used to crucify tens of thousands of Jews in A.D. 70. Josephus' contemporary account records that five hundred a day were crucified.²⁹ He said that over a million people died in the siege, with 97,000 taken captive.³⁰ Michael Grant said that this figure is probably an exaggeration, but the losses were "appallingly high."³¹ Some 30,000 captives were sold at auction.³² At Caesarea Philippi, 2,500 Jews were slaughtered in gladiatorial games in honor of the birthday of Titus' younger brother Domitian. Later, at Berytus, to celebrate the birthday of their father Vespasian, his sons burned to death even more than this.³³ These doomed Jews became living sacrifices—burnt offerings, in fact—to the military hero of Rome who had just become emperor. Four decades earlier, we read, "they cried out, Away with him, away with him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Shall I

28. This included resident aliens in the land. It applied to every resident, not just Israelites.

29. Flavius Josephus, Wars of the Jews, Book V, Chapter XI, Section 3.

30. Ibid., VI:ix:3.

31. Michael Grant, The Jews in the Roman World (New York: Dorset, [1973] 1984), p. 202.

32. Ibid., p. 203.

33. Idem.

crucify your King? The chief priests answered, We have no king but Caesar” (John 19:15). Power religion giveth, and power religion taketh away.³⁴

2. Annulment

When the temple’s sacrifices ended, and God no longer dwelt in the Promised Land, Leviticus 19:23–25 was annulled by God. The land of Palestine today is no longer owed any restitution payment. It no longer spews people out of its boundaries. Its unique covenantal status ended in A.D. 70.

This law was never part of the sabbath rest laws. It was part of the restitution laws. It therefore came under the general category of theft laws: the eighth commandment. But the Promised Land’s owner was God; thus, this law relates also to the third commandment: the boundary around God’s name. God placed a “no trespassing” boundary around the fruit of young trees, just as He had placed such a boundary around the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. He had originally placed no such boundary around the tree of life. It was not trees in general or fruit in general that came under the original ban in Eden; it was only one tree. This Edenic prohibition had nothing to do with soil conservation. It was not universal. It was in fact a temporary ban. So was the Mosaic law’s ban on uncircumcised fruit. At the very least, that law ceased to have any judicial authority when circumcision ceased being a covenantally relevant mark (I Cor. 7:19).

The church has lawful access to the tree of life through baptism and holy communion. “Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie” (Rev. 22:14–15). There is no need to delay in partaking of the holy meal of communion. There is no temporal barrier today. But there is a judicial barrier: only those who have been baptized have legal access to God’s holy meal.

The rite of circumcision is annulled. Therefore, there is no longer any legal status of fruit known as “uncircumcised.” What had been forbidden to Israelites in the Mosaic Covenant on the basis of the circumcision laws is today ritually and judicially irrelevant:

34. Cursed be the name of power religion.

Is any man called being circumcised? let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? let him not be circumcised. Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God (I Cor. 7:18–19).

Conclusion

The law governing the harvesting of fruit from a young tree was a law unique to ancient Israel. It was not intended for the nations around Israel, for it was part of the seed laws and land laws that applied only to Israel as a holy nation. This law was a negative sanction imposed on Israel by God because of the wilderness rebellion. God imposed this law as a negative sanction because of the failure of the exodus generation to invade the land of Canaan after hearing reports and military analysis from Joshua and Caleb. The land of Canaan had deserved deliverance from the Canaanite rule 40 years before the children of the exodus generation invaded the land. It therefore was owed restitution by the heirs of the exodus generation. This law had nothing to do with biological health, contrary to Rushdoony.³⁵

This law was also an aspect of the parents' failure to circumcise their sons in the wilderness. This is why the new fruit was called uncircumcised. This was to remind them of the sons' own temporary status as unholy—culturally unfruitful—during the 40 years of wilderness wandering. This law was never designed as a universal statute; it was a specific negative sanction on the people of Israel and a positive sanction on the Promised Land itself. It was not a cross-boundary law.

This law's underlying judicial foundation is still in force, however. That foundation is God's declaration regarding legal access to particular trees. In the garden of Eden, only one tree was prohibited: the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. After Adam's rebellion, a "no trespassing" boundary was placed by God around the tree of life (Gen. 3:24). Because of the New Covenant in Jesus Christ, the fruit of the tree of life is now available to covenant-keeping men. Because of this, God has removed the "no trespassing" sign from every tree.

What had been a prohibition under the Old Covenant has become a positive injunction under the New Covenant. God's covenant people are commanded to come to the communion table; this is not an option on their part. Like the tree of life, which was open to covenant-keeping man before Adam ate from the forbidden fruit, so is the communion table open today. Baptized people can lawfully celebrate the modern Passover feast without having to wait.

35. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 87.

A proper understanding of the judicial connection between the food laws and seed laws of the Mosaic Covenant and the communion table in the New Covenant leads to an acknowledgment of the New Covenant's annulment of the Mosaic Covenant's seed laws and food laws. God places only one boundary around food: the communion table. It is open only to Christians. There are no other food restrictions (Acts 10).³⁶ It is therefore wrong to continue to honor the specific terms of Leviticus 19:23, a law that applied only to national Israel. When a young tree bears fruit, we are to enjoy it. But we must also pay our tithe to the local church on whatever we harvest.³⁷

36. James B. Jordan, Pig Out? 25 Reasons Why Christians May Eat Pork (Niceville, Florida: Transfiguration Press, 1992).

37. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

MEASURING OUT JUSTICE

And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him. But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt: I am the LORD your God. Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt. Therefore shall ye observe all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: I am the LORD (Lev. 19:33–37).

The theocentric meaning of this law is equality before God's law. This includes strangers. The general principle is the familiar guideline known as the golden rule: do unto others as you would have them do unto you.¹

A. Theocracy = Sanctuary

God reminded the Israelites in this passage that He had delivered them from Egyptian bondage, where they had been strangers. This deliverance had been an application of the fundamental theme of the Bible: the transition from wrath to grace.² The God who delivered His people in history (point two of the biblical covenant model: historical prologue) is also the God who lays down the law (point three).

One judicial application of God's historical deliverance of His people is the creation of a civil sanctuary: a place set apart judicially by

1. Jesus said: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets" (Matt. 7:12). Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 16.

2. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), p. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

God for those who seek liberty under God.³ The establishment of a boundary is an aspect of point three. In this case, the boundary was geographical. It was to serve as a judicial model for the whole world (Deut. 4:4–8).⁴ Strangers in the land were expected to tell “the folks back home” of the benefits of dwelling in God’s sanctuary. God prepared a place for strangers to live in peace through justice. This system of justice did not give strangers political authority, for they were outside the ecclesiastical covenant. But the system provided liberty. Conclusion: political pluralism is not biblically necessary for civil liberty.

There is no valid biblical reason to believe that God’s ideal of sanctuary for strangers in a holy commonwealth has been annulled by the New Covenant. On the contrary, the sanctuary principle has been extended across the globe through Christ’s universal gospel of deliverance (Matt. 28:18–20).⁵ Nation by nation, the whole world is to become such a sanctuary.⁶ But a biblical sanctuary is a theocratic commonwealth. That is to say, the extension of God’s theocratic commonwealth means the extension of God’s civil sanctuary: the transition from civil wrath to civil grace. The judicial evidence of this biblical civil grace is equality before the civil law. To maintain the blessings of liberty, all residents of a holy commonwealth are required to obey the Bible-revealed law of God. God made it quite clear: without corporate obedience to God’s Bible-revealed law, no nation can maintain the blessings of civil liberty.⁷

B. Judicial Love

There are three commands in this passage: to avoid vexing a stranger, to love the stranger, and to use honest weights and measures.

3. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

5. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

6. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

7. Those people who seek to defend the ideal of civil liberty—sometimes called “civil liberties”—apart from an appeal to God’s Bible-revealed law-order are indulging their preference for humanism: Stoic natural law theology or Newtonian natural law theology. In either case, they have abandoned the Bible’s explicit method of retaining the blessings of liberty: Trinitarian, covenantal, oath-bound constitutionalism.

1. Three Laws

We begin with the first. Leviticus 19:33 is a recapitulation of Exodus 22:21: "Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." This is followed by the law commanding Israelites to love the resident alien (v. 34). One command is negative: do not vex. The other command is positive, or seems to be: exercise love. This positive injunction is followed by the phrase, "I am the LORD your God." This was a reminder to Israel of the sovereignty of the ultimate Enforcer.

The third law governs weights and measures. The question is: Are the vexation law (negative) and the weights and measures law (negative) two separate laws? Presumably, they are one law, for they are found in the same section. There is at least one link: the text's stated justification for each of these laws is historical, namely, the Israelites' experience in Egypt and their deliverance by God from Egypt. But these laws seem to be dealing with different issues: (1) the general public's vexing of strangers; (2) sellers' cheating of the general public.

The second law initially appears not to be a civil law, for it commands civility: "Thou shalt love him as thyself." That is, it seems to command a certain attitude toward someone. But biblical civil law does not command righteous behavior; it is limited to forbidding certain kinds of unrighteous behavior. It does not seek to compel goodness; it imposes negative sanctions against certain evil acts. That is to say, biblical civil law is not messianic. It establishes no positive civil sanctions for showing love to resident aliens. But without positive civil sanctions for righteous behavior, there is no civil law promoting righteous behavior: no sanctions = no law. Thus, if we interpret the command to love someone as meaning the inculcation of a positive attitude toward someone, this command is not a civil law. Also, no civil sanctions are attached to this law.

In apparent contrast, the third law is at the very heart of civil law: the enforcement of universal public standards of weights and measures. It forbids a public evil: "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment." This is a restatement of Leviticus 19:15: "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour." The principle of the rule of law is publicly displayed in the enforcement of just weights and measures.

2. The Example of Egypt

The text's historical references to Egypt are two-fold: residence in Egypt and deliverance out of Egypt. The Israelites had not been loved in Egypt. The mark of that lack of love was their enslavement. They had been vexed by their one-time hosts, whose fathers' lives Joseph had saved. They had not been treated fairly. So perverse were the Egyptians—so unloving—that God intervened to deliver His people. In doing so, He imposed negative historical sanctions against the Egyptians. The warning in this case law is clear: those who refuse to honor God by loving their neighbors will be placed under God's negative historical sanctions.

But this raises a question: If the sin of the Egyptians in not loving the Israelites was their act of enslaving the Israelites, rather than a mere negative attitude toward the Israelites, was the focus of the anti-vexation law judicial rather than psychological? This is my interpretation of the law. Love in this case can legitimately be understood as treating people lawfully—as Bahnsen put it, “showing love to our fellow men (by protecting them from theft, rape, slander, abortion, sexual deviance, etc.). . . .”⁸ If so, then the two laws are doubly linked: both prohibit evil public actions; both are justified in terms of the Israelites' experience in Egypt.

C. Negative Sanctions: The State as Intermediary

What about the state's negative civil sanctions? What does God's law establish as the proper negative sanction for refusing to love a stranger, in the sense of love as a positive attitude toward him? None is listed. This is to be expected, for civil government is authorized by God only to enforce laws prohibiting public evils. God does not authorize the state to enforce laws promoting the welfare of specific groups or individuals. An example of the distinction between positive and negative sanctions is the distinction between public health programs and socialized medicine. Tax-funded public health programs repel “invasions” of the entire community by specific germs, bacteria, or whatever. Socialized medicine transfers money from one person to pay for the medical treatment of someone else. It imposes a negative monetary sanction against one person in order to grant a positive monetary sanction—minus about 50% for handling—to another person (actually, two people: the patient and his physician). Frédéric Bastiat wrote in 1850 that civil law is “the collective organization of the individual’s right to legitimate self-defense.”⁹ “Thus, as an individual cannot legitimately use force against the person, liberty, or property of another individual, for the same reason collective force cannot legitimately be applied to destroy the person, liberty, and property of individuals or classes.”¹⁰ The state is a defensive institution. The exercise of state power must be restrained by law and custom. Why? There are two reasons.

8. Greg L. Bahnsen, No Other Standard: Theonomy and Its Critics (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), p. 205. (<http://bit.ly/gbnos>)

1. Savior State, Plundering State

The state is not to become messianic: a Savior State. The monopolistic authority of violence which the state lawfully possesses must be limited to preserving the peace. A judicial boundary must be placed on the exercise of such monopolistic power. If this is not done, then the state inevitably becomes an agency of political plunder. It is this development which threatens the judicial foundation of civil liberty. It creates the politics of revenge: getting even. This means either the politics of jealousy (wealth redistribution) or the politics of envy (wealth destruction).¹¹ Bastiat described the nature of the political problem:

It is in the nature of men to react against the iniquity of which they are the victims. When, therefore, plunder is organized by the law for the profit of the classes who make it, all the plundered classes seek, by peaceful or revolutionary means, to enter into the making of the laws. These classes, according to the degree of enlightenment they have achieved, can propose two different ends to themselves when they thus seek to attain their political rights: either they may wish to bring legal plunder to an end, or they may aim at getting their share of it.

Woe to the nations in which the masses are dominated by this last thought when they, in their turn, seize the power to make the law!

Until that time, legal plunder is exercised by the few against the many, as it is among nations in which the right to legislate is concentrated in a few hands. But now it becomes universal, and an effort is made to redress the balance by means of universal plunder. Instead of being abolished, social injustice is made general. As soon as the disinherited classes have obtained their political rights, the first idea they seize upon is not to abolish plunder (this would suppose in them more wisdom than they can have), but to organize a system of reprisals against the other classes that is also injurious to themselves; as if, before justice reigns, a harsh retribution must strike all, some because of their iniquity, others because of their ignorance.

9. Frédéric Bastiat, “The Law” (1850), in Bastiat, Selected Essays on Political Economy, translated by Seymour Cain; ed. George B. de Huszar (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1964), p. 51. (<http://bit.ly/BastiatState>)

10. Ibid., p. 52.

11. Gonzalo Fernández de la Mora, Egalitarian Envy: The Political Foundations of Social Justice (New York: Paragon House, 1987).

No greater change nor any greater evil could be introduced into society than this: to convert the law into an instrument of plunder.¹²

Within three decades after Bastiat warned his fellow Frenchmen against the politics of plunder, itself a legacy of the French Revolution (1789–94), political plunder had spread to the English-speaking world. The free trade era in Great Britain, which had begun with the repeal of the corn laws in the mid-1840s, was steadily undermined after 1870 by a return to the older vision: empire.¹³ This was paralleled by the political triumph of Bismarck and his conservative welfare state policies in the new nation of Germany after 1871, and by the political dominance of the Republican Party in the United States after 1861: high-tariff and (after 1890) pro-regulation.¹⁴ The visible sign of this ideological transformation was the race for naval dominance. The First World War destroyed classical liberalism's policies of low taxes, low national debt, the international gold standard, free trade, and the free movement of peoples. The national passport became a way of life internationally. Under Nazism and Communism, so did the internal passport.

2. The Primacy of Grace

The exercise of state power must be restrained by law and custom. The state must not be allowed to become messianic: the Savior-Healer

12. Bastiat, "The Law," p. 55.

13. This new vision was promoted in word and deed by Cecil Rhodes and his successor, Alfred Milner. The Round Table group, begun in England and exported to other English-speaking nations, was the spearhead. John Marlowe, Milner: Apostle of Empire (London: Hamish Hamilton, 1976); Carroll Quigley, The Anglo-American Establishment: From Rhodes to Clivedon (New York: Books In Focus, 1981).

14. The Democratic Party, under President Grover Cleveland (1885–89; 1893–97), continued to defend classical liberalism, but then, under the influence of fundamentalist Presbyterian William Jennings Bryan after 1896, who failed three times to be elected President, it became even more interventionist than the Republican Party, and has remained so ever since.

State. There is no need to use the threat of negative state sanctions to promote individual welfare, for God's grace is greater than man's depravity, total though this depravity may be in principle.¹⁵ All that is needed for righteousness to triumph culturally is for public evil to be suppressed by the state, including the public evil of messianic statism. Grace is primary; sin is secondary. This was true under the Old Covenant, but it is even more true today. Satan was definitively defeated at Calvary. The Holy Spirit has come. God extends His worldwide dominion representatively through His people, the church. Satan suffers progressive territorial and cultural losses representatively as the gospel, empowered in history by the Holy Spirit,¹⁶ is extended by the church in history.¹⁷ Yet even under the Old Covenant, grace was primary. God is greater than Satan; God's covenants are more blessed than Satan's. There was never any need for a savior state.

Because of the primacy of grace, God does not use the threat of negative civil sanctions against any corporate body in order to promote good deeds by individual members. He therefore does not use civil law to pressure men to do good. He uses civil law only to repress designated forms of evil. God in the garden did not threaten to impose negative sanctions for men's failure to dress the garden; He threatened to impose negative sanctions only for a violation of the judicial boundary around one tree. Similarly, biblical civil law imposes negative sanctions on those who commit prohibited acts. It does not offer positive sanctions to those who obey.

The list of biblical civil prohibitions is relatively short. A list of positive dominion acts is inherently limitless. Again, this is because grace is primary and sin is secondary. Grace is judicially unbounded; sin is judicially bounded. Example: Adam could lawfully eat from any

15. The totality of man's depravity is judicial rather than historical. If man's total depravity were historical, society would be impossible. Total depravity refers to man's judicial condition before God as a covenant-breaker. James described it well: "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all" (James 2:10). Guilty of all: total depravity.

16. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), pp. 195–97. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

17. Grace is primary in eternity, too. The final resurrection leads to either the sin-free New Heaven and New Earth (Rev. 21, 22) or the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15). While both are eternal in duration, the New Heaven and New Earth allow expansion and development, as covenant-keepers work out their salvation with neither fear nor trembling. They will increase their knowledge of God and thereby increase their glorifying of His greatness. There is no ethical development for those in the lake of fire. They begin their existence here with impotence, which never ends.

tree of the garden (unbounded) except one (bounded). Biblical civil justice cannot be established through an attempt to create a limitless positive law code; the list of representative crimes (case laws) must be kept short enough to be publicly read to the people on special occasions (Deut. 31:10–13).¹⁸ Thus, the state's job is not to threaten men for not doing good works, which would make the state as unbounded in its jurisdiction as good works are. Its task is to threaten men for committing a finite number of illegal acts, which places a boundary around the state.

This means that the failure of individuals to take active steps to love their neighbors attitudinally is not a threat to the social order. God does not threaten His covenant organizations with negative sanctions for the failure of individual members to perform positive acts of kindness. God may not bless those individuals who refuse to perform positive acts of charity, but He does not threaten the other members of covenant organizations. Thus, the state has no role as an intermediary between God and man in cases concerning men's failure to act positively. God does not authorize, let alone require, the civil magistrate to step in and compel such acts of charity in the name of God, in order to avoid God's negative covenant sanctions.

D. Corporate Sanctions

The state imposes negative physical sanctions as God's delegated agent in history. If Israelite magistrates failed in this task with respect to individual law-breakers, God would raise up other agents of His justice to impose negative sanctions on the whole society. For example, when Judah refused to honor the sabbatical year of rest for the land, God raised up Babylon—strangers—to carry His people into captivity, so that the land would receive its long-awaited lawful rest. God's law had specified this as the appropriate negative sanction:

And I will bring the land into desolation: and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it. And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste. Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her sabbaths. As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it (Lev. 26:32–35).

18. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 75.

Therefore he brought upon them the king of the Chaldees, who slew their young men with the sword in the house of their sanctuary, and had no compassion upon young man or maiden, old man, or him that stooped for age: he gave them all into his hand. . . . To fulfil the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years (II Chron. 36:17, 21).

The biblical justification for the state's imposition of negative sanctions against individual law-breakers is God's threat to impose negative corporate sanctions against the entire society if His Bible-revealed civil law is not enforced by civil magistrates. This is the distinctive principle of biblical civil government. I keep returning to this theme because it is central to biblical political economy. God's negative historical sanctions will be applied. The question is: By God or by the civil magistrates? Those in society who are innocent of a particular crime deserve protection from God's corporate sanctions.¹⁹ The state is therefore authorized to impose negative sanctions on convicted law-breakers.

Biblical civil law is supposed to settle disputes between conflicting parties. The state intervenes and acts as God's representative agent for one or more parties—the victims—and against others.²⁰ But what about a case in which there is no victim to press charges? What about the so-called "victimless crimes"—the sale of hard drugs, pornography, and homosexual "favors"? If the state were not acting to deflect God's greater judgments on the entire society, there would be no justification for civil laws against victimless crimes, for there are no disputing private individuals who come before the civil court in such cases. As libertarian economist and legal theorist F. A. Hayek reminds us: "At least where it is not believed that the whole group may be punished by a supernatural power for the sins of individuals, there can arise no such rules from the limitation of conduct against others, and therefore from the settlement of disputes."²¹ Covenantally, however, there will

19. This is why, in the case of an unsolved murder in a field, civil magistrates from the nearest city were required to kill a heifer and have the priests sacrifice it in a nearby valley (Deut. 21:1–9). The blood covering had to be made, either by the shed blood of the convicted murderer or by the heifer.

20. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix M; North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

21. F. A. Hayek, Rules and Order, vol. I of Law, Legislation and Liberty, 3 vols. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), p. 101. It is interesting that the politically be future victims of unprosecuted crimes of this type: judicially innocent members of society who will become recipients of God's corporate negative sanctions in history. Like the righteous prophets who went into the Babylonian captivity of Israel, so will the innocent be in God's day of corporate wrath in history.²²

E. To Love the Imperfect Stranger

"Thou shalt love him as thyself." Why does this positive injunction to love the stranger appear in a list of civil laws? There are no non-judicial criteria listed that indicate how the covenant-keeping individual can show love to the stranger. There are no negative civil sanctions for a refusal to perform positive acts of charity, let alone for not displaying a positive mental attitude toward strangers. Therefore, love in this case law must be interpreted judicially: treating the stranger lawfully, as if he were a full citizen of the holy commonwealth. It is the same meaning that Paul attributed to love: "Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. 13:10). Fulfilling the terms of the law is the public manifestation of love. This is what the civil law requires of the covenant-keeper.

What was the representative illegal act of not showing love in Israel? The oppression of strangers, widows, and orphans. How men treated the least powerful members of society served as a representation of their covenantal status before God,²³ just as Jesus warned regarding the final judgment:

Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in liberal Anabaptist theologian, Ronald Sider, took the line promoted by libertarians regarding victimless crimes: "... persons should be free to harm themselves and consenting associates ... as long as they do not harm others or infringe on their rights." Sider, "An Evangelical View of Public Policy," Transformation, II (July/Sept. 1985), p. 6; cited by Bahnsen, No Other Standard, p. 214.

22. Meredith G. Kline and his disciples have denied the existence of predictable corporate sanctions of God in New Covenant history. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184. Cf. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory, ch. 8. Kline and his disciples have thereby implicitly denied the biblical justification for civil laws against "victimless crimes."

23. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 48.

prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me (Matt. 25:34–40).

But was there a specific representative public act in Israel that defined a prosecutable oppression? Yes. The next case law identifies it: using rigged weights and measures. A seller of goods was not allowed to use one set of weights for buying goods and another set for selling these goods. He was not allowed to use one set of weights for some customers and another set for other customers. To do so would have testified to the existence of a God who imposes His law's standards in a partial manner. That is, it would have pointed to a God who shows favor to certain persons: one law for one group, another law for a different group. Again and again in Scripture, this is denied emphatically.²⁴ The essence of God's moral character, and therefore of His character as a judge, is the consistent application of His law.

Accompanying this law was an affirmation of God's character as a consistent judge, which also served as an implicit warning to the nation of Israel: "I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt." God had brought negative sanctions against the Egyptians for their unrighteous behavior; He would do the same to Israel. He said this explicitly just before the next generation entered the land of Canaan: "And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God" (Deut. 8:19–20).²⁵

F. Open Access and Impartial Justice

When God delivered the laws governing the Passover to Moses in Egypt, He made it plain that the essence of biblical law is impartiality: "And when a stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the passover to the LORD, let all his males be circumcised, and then let him

24. See the citations in Chapter 14:D.

25. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 23.

come near and keep it; and he shall be as one that is born in the land: for no uncircumcised person shall eat thereof. One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you” (Ex. 12:48–49).²⁶ There would be one law governing access to the Passover; thus, there would be the rule of law in the nation. Access to the Passover was the archetype; predictable civil law was the manifestation of the more general judicial principle. That is to say, equal legal access to the means of grace is the standard of all biblical law: open to all men in history, and on the same terms. Therefore, all men within a society that is in covenant with the God of the Bible should have equal access to civil justice.

The Mosaic law’s definition of what it meant to be an Israelite was this: lawful access to the Passover. But any adult male who consented to circumcision in Israel could gain lawful access to Passover.²⁷ This made illegal any racial definition of “Israelite”; the definition was covenantal-legal, not racial. The establishment of the judicial category of a covenanted people was followed by a command to enforce the same legal order law on all residents of the nation. If anyone could become an Israelite, then there could be no permanently closed caste of citizens (Deut. 23:2–3). This also meant that there could be no permanently closed caste of civil rulers. Anyone under the jurisdiction of that law was a potential Israelite. Today’s victim of injustice could become tomorrow’s civil magistrate.²⁸ There was to be open access upward politically; the rulers were warned to impose God’s civil law impartially. This was designed to prevent the politics of revenge.

G. Just Measures and a Just Society

The familiar Western symbol of justice is the blindfolded woman holding a balance scale. The blindfold symbolizes the court’s unwillingness to recognize persons. The scale symbolizes fixed standards of justice: a fixed law applied to the facts of the case. Justice is symbolically linked to weights.

26. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 14.

27. The Mosaic law did not specify how a woman could gain access apart from a circumcised male head of household.

28. “Tomorrow” is here meant in a figurative sense: it took 10 generations for Moabites and Ammonites to become full citizens (Deut. 23:3), i.e., men entrusted with the authority to impose civil sanctions.

1. Quantification

Justice cannot be quantified,²⁹ yet symbolically it is represented by the ultimate determinant of quantity: a scale. An honest scale registers very tiny changes in the weight of the things being weighed. A scale can be balanced only by adding or removing a quantity of the thing being measured until the weights on each side are equal, meaning as close to equal as the scale can register.³⁰ Even here, the establishment of a precise balance may take several attempts. An average of the attempts then becomes the acceptable measure.

The ability of men to make comparisons is best exemplified in the implements of physical measurement. The language of physical measurement is adopted by men when they speak of making historical or judicial comparisons. For example, the consumer balances his checkbook. This does not mean that he places it on a scale. Or he weighs the expected advantages and disadvantages of some decision.

The economist constructs an index number to compare “prices”—meaning prices of specific goods and services—in one period with those in another period. He assigns “weights” to certain factors in the mathematical construct known as an index number. He says, for example, that a change in the price of automobiles—Hondas rather than Rolls-Royces, of course—is more important to the average consumer than a change in the price of tea. This was not true, however, in Boston in 1773. So, the economist-as-historian has to keep re-examining his “basket of goods” from time to time: Which goods and services are more important to the average person’s economic well-being? But there is no literal real-world basket of goods; there is no literal real-world average consumer; there is no means of literally weighing the importance of anything. Yet we can barely think about making comparisons without importing the symbolism of weights and measures.

The language of politics also cannot avoid the metaphor of measurement. The political scientist speaks of checks and balances in the constitutional order of a federalist system. These are supposed to reduce the likelihood of the centralization of power into the hands of a clique or one man. That is, there are checks and balances on the exercise of power. These are institutional, not literal.

29. See below: “Intuition and Measurement.”

30. There are physical limits on the accuracy of scales. The best balance scales today can measure changes as small as one-tenth of a microgram. Grolier Encyclopedia (1990): “Weights and Measures.” God’s civil law calls for equal justice, not perfect justice. Cf. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 19.

The language of measurement is inescapable. This is an implication of point three of the biblical covenant model: standards.³¹ As surely as societies create bureaus that establish standards of measurement, so God has established permanent judicial standards. Both kinds of standards must be observed by law-abiding people.

2. The Representative Case

The preservation of just weights and measures in the Mosaic Covenant was important for symbolic reasons as well as economic reasons. As a case law, it represented a wider class of crimes. It was important in itself: prohibiting theft through fraud. But there was something unique about the case law governing weights and measures: it was representative of injustice in general. “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure.” The language of unrighteousness and judgment has a wider application than merely economic transactions. “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour” (Lev. 19:15). This states the fundamental principle of all biblical justice.

To understand why weights and measures were representative of civil justice in general, we need to understand what was involved in the specific violation. The seller could better afford the specialized weighing equipment of his trade than the individual buyer could. He was therefore in a position to cheat the buyer by rigging the equipment. But the narrowly defined crime of using rigged measures was representative of the whole character of the civil order: a violation of justice at the most fundamental level. Analogous to the businessman, the judge was not to use his specialized skills or his authority to rig any case against one of the disputants. The legal structure was regarded as a specialized piece of equipment, analogous to a scale. No one in charge of its operations was allowed to tamper with this system in order to benefit any individual or class of individuals. To do so would constitute theft. Injustice is seen in the Bible as a form of theft. This was Samuel’s message to Israel.

And Samuel said unto all Israel, Behold, I have hearkened unto your voice in all that ye said unto me, and have made a king over you. And now, behold, the king walketh before you: and I am old and gray-headed; and, behold, my sons are with you: and I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day. Behold, here I am: witness against me before the LORD, and before his anointed: whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith? and I will restore it you. And they said, Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken ought of any man's hand. And he said unto them, The LORD is witness against you, and his anointed is witness this day, that ye have not found ought in my hand. And they answered, He is witness (I Sam. 12:1–5).

31. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

Injustice is also linked with false weights and measures. Isaiah made all these connections clear in his initial accusation against the rulers of Israel: “Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water: Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves: every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards: they judge not the fatherless, neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them” (Isa. 1:22–23). False measures in silver and wine; princes in rebellion against God but companions of thieves; universal bribe-seeking; oppression of widows and orphans: all are linked in God’s covenant lawsuit brought by the prophet. It was all part of a great spiritual apostasy—an apostasy that would be reversed by the direct intervention of God: “Therefore saith the Lord, the LORD of hosts, the mighty One of Israel, Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries, and avenge me of mine enemies: And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin: And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, the faithful city” (Isa. 1:24–26). When the rulers of Israel’s northern kingdom remained unwilling to enforce God’s law representatively, generation after generation, God raised up Assyria to bring corporate negative sanctions for Him (Isa. 10:5–6).

Because weights and measurements are representative of the moral condition of society in general, the prophets used the metaphor of weights and measures in bringing their covenant lawsuits against individuals and nations. The Psalmist had set the example: “Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie: to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity” (Ps. 62:9). Micah castigated the whole society, warning of judgment to come, for they honored “the statutes of Omri” and did the works of his son Ahab (Mic. 6:16).

The LORD'S voice crieth unto the city, and the man of wisdom shall see thy name: hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it. Are there yet the treasures of wickedness in the house of the wicked, and the scant measure that is abominable? Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances, and with the bag of deceitful weights? For the rich men thereof are full of violence, and the inhabitants thereof have spoken lies, and their tongue is deceitful in their mouth (Mic. 6:9–12).

The essence of their rebellion, Micah said, was the injustice of the civil magistrates: “The good man is perished out of the earth: and there is none upright among men: they all lie in wait for blood; they hunt every man his brother with a net. That they may do evil with both hands earnestly, the prince asketh, and the judge asketh for a reward; and the great man, he uttereth his mischievous desire: so they wrap it up” (Mic. 7:2–3).

Daniel's announcement to the rulers of Babylon regarding the meaning of the message of the handwriting on the wall is perhaps the most famous use in Scripture of the imagery of the balance. “And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. TEKEL; Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. PERES; Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians” (Dan. 5:25–28). Corrupt measures are a token—representative—of moral corruption. To be out of balance judicially is to be out of covenantal favor. The representative civil transgression in society is the adoption of false weights and measures.

H. Intuition and Measurement

“Add a pinch of salt.” How many cooks through the centuries have recommended this unspecific quantity? There are cooks who cannot cook with a recipe book, but who are master chefs without one. Their skills are intuitive, not numerical. This is true in every field.

1. Analogical Reasoning

There are limits to measurement because there are limits to our perception. There are also limits on our ability to verbalize or quantify the measurements that we perceive well enough to act upon. Oskar Morgenstern addressed this problem in the early paragraphs of his classic book, On the Accuracy of Economic Observations.³² Our economic knowledge is inescapably a mixture of objective and subjective knowledge.³³ That is to say, we think as persons; we are not computers. We do not think digitally. We think analogically, as persons made in God's image. We are required to think God's thoughts after Him. To do this, we need standards provided by God that are perceptible to man. God has given us such standards (point three of the biblical covenant model). We also need to exercise judgment in understanding and applying them (point four). This judgment is not digital; it is analogical: thinking God's thoughts after Him. We are required by God to assess the performance of others in terms of God's fixed ethical and judicial standards.

In order to achieve a "fit" between God's standards and the behavior of others, we must interpret God's objective law (a subjective task), assemble the relevant objective facts (a subjective task), discard the irrelevant objective facts (a subjective task), and apply this law to those facts (a subjective task). The result is a judicially objective decision. At every stage of the decision-making or judgment-rendering process,

32. Oskar Morgenstern, On the Accuracy of Economic Observations, 2nd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1963). Morgenstern wrote a book on game theory with John von Neumann, one of the most gifted mathematicians of the twentieth century. Morgenstern was aware of the limits of mathematics as a tool of economic analysis. A more recent treatment of the problem is Andrew M. Kamarck's Economics and the Real World (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1983). See also Thomas Mayer, Truth versus Precision in Economics (Hampshire, England: Elgar, 1993).

33. Morgenstern wrote: "All economic decisions, whether private or business, as well as those involving economic policy, have the characteristic that quantitative and non-quantitative information must be combined into one act of decision. It would be desirable to understand how these two classes of information can best be combined. Obviously, there must exist a point at which it is no longer meaningful to sharpen the numerically available information when the other, wholly qualitative, part is important, though a notion of its 'accuracy' or 'reliability' has not been developed. . . . There are many reasons why one should be deeply concerned with the 'accuracy' of quantitative economic data and observations. Clearly, anyone making use of measurements and data wishes them to be accurate and significant in a sense still to be defined specifically. For that reason a level of accuracy has to be established. It will depend first of all on the particular purpose for which the measurement is made. . . . The very notion of accuracy and the acceptability of a measurement, observation, description, count—whatever the concrete case might be—is inseparably tied to the use to which it is to be put. In other words, there is always a theory or model, however roughly formulated it may be, a purpose or use to which the statistic has to refer, in order to talk meaningfully about accuracy. In this manner the topic soon stops being primitive; on the contrary, very deep-lying problems are encountered, some of which have only recently been recognized." Morgenstern, Accuracy, pp. 3–4.

there is an inescapably personal element, for which we are held personally responsible by God.³⁴

2. Objective Facts Interpreted Subjectively

When we speak of objective facts, we often invoke the language of physical measurement. This is because we think analogically. Making subjective judgments is analogous to measuring things objectively. Yet we never measure things objectively, meaning exclusively objectively. It is men who do the measuring, and men are not machines—and even machines have limits of perception. We ask: “Is the balance even?” “Is the bubble in the level equidistant between two points?” At some point, we say: “It’s a judgment call.” Analogously, we ask of other men’s offers: “Is this on the level?” Discovering the answer is a judgment call: an evaluation based on one’s observation of something that is beyond the limits of one’s ability to perceive distinctions.

Consider the task of an umpire or referee in any sport. He is a person. He makes judgment calls. In modern philosophy, we find that the major schools of thought are analogous to the umpire’s standard explanations of his decision. In baseball, the umpire “calls a strike.” He announces that the pitched baseball passed within the strike zone of the batter’s body (a variable in terms of his height) and above home plate. The batter protests. It was a “ball,” he insists: either outside his strike zone or not above home plate. The umpire offers one of three answers. These three answers are expressions of the three dominant views of Western epistemology.

“I call ’em as they are.” (Newton)

“I call ’em as I see ’em.” (Hume)

“They are what I call ’em.” (Kant)³⁵

To make a biblically valid judgment regarding the public record of the event under scrutiny, judges must perceive the limits of the law and the limits of the records. The public record of the event must reveal (represent) an act that took place within the “strike zone” of God’s law. The actor must clearly have violated that zone—that boundary—of God’s law. In the language of the common law courts, it must have violated that boundary “beyond reasonable doubt.” The language of

34. See Appendix E.

35. There is a fourth possible reply: “Shut up. You’re only a figment of my imagination.” (Berkeley) the law is imprecise here because the act of rendering judgment is imprecise. Yet juries decide, judges hand down punishments, and society goes on.

3. Intuition and Creation

Intuition cannot be verbalized, catalogued, or quantified, for by definition it possesses no rational structure, but it exists nevertheless. Every philosophical system ultimately must appeal to intuition to bridge the chasm between mind and events.³⁶ Without such a bridge, according to humanists, human choice and therefore personal responsibility disappear into one of three kinds of universe: a chaotic cosmos, a deterministic cosmos of mechanical-mathematical cause and effect, or a dialectical cosmos: mechanism infused by randomness, and vice versa.³⁷ (All three are said to be governed by the second law of thermodynamics and are headed for the heat death of the universe.)³⁸

There is a fourth possibility: a covenantal, providential, created cosmos. Here is the biblical solution to the problem of human knowledge: the doctrine of creation. The world was created by God so that men, made in God's image, may exercise dominion over it. This theory of knowledge also relies on intuition: biblically informed intuition. Intuition is an inescapable concept. It is never a case of "intuition vs. no intuition." It is always a case of whose intuition according to whose standards.

Spiritual maturity is the ability to make biblically well-informed judgments. Christians must presume that intuitive judgments that come after years of studying God's Bible-revealed laws and making decisions in terms of them will be more reliable—i.e., more pleasing to God—than intuitive judgments that come from other traditions or that are the products of unsystematic approaches. There is no way to test the accuracy of this presumption except by observing God's sanctions in history on those groups that are under the authority of specifically covenanted judges.³⁹

36. For case studies of this assertion in the field of economics, see Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976), ch. 5.

37. James Gleick, Chaos: Making a New Science (New York: Viking, 1987).

38. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

39. If God's sanctions in history are random in the New Covenant era, as Meredith G. Kline insists that they are, then there is no way to test this presumption. Intu-

I. Objective Standards

God has decreed everything that happens. History happens exactly as He decreed it. He evaluates it, moment by moment, in terms of His permanent standards. This judgment is objective because God makes it, and it is subjective because God makes it.

1. Subordination

Man is responsible for thinking God's thoughts after Him. Man must obey God by conforming his thoughts and actions to God's law. Men do not have the ability to read God's mind (Deut. 29:29), but they do have the ability to obey. Men do not issue valid autonomous decrees, nor does history follow such decrees. God proposes, and then God disposes.⁴⁰

The same is true of weights and measures. There are objective standards, and these are known perfectly by God. This knowledge is a mark of His sovereignty. "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?" (Isa. 40:12). Man must seek to conform his actions and judgments to these objective standards. He does so by discovering and adopting fixed standards. Physical standards are the most readily enforced. The archetypal standards are weight and measure. Even the passage of time is assessed by means of a measure. In earlier centuries, these measures were frequently governed by weight, such as water clocks or hourglasses filled with sand.⁴¹ Measures have been perfected over time, most notably measurements of time itself.⁴² As measures improve, buyers and sellers benefit: reduced un-tion-based decisions would become as random in their effects as God's historical sanctions supposedly are.

40. The radical humanism of Marx's partner Frederick Engels can be seen in his statement that "when therefore man no longer merely proposes, but also disposes—only then will the last alien force which is still reflected in religion vanish; and with it will also vanish the religious reflection itself, for the simple reason that then there will be nothing left to reflect." Engels, Herr Eugen Dühring's Revolution in Science (Anti-Dühring) (1878), in Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Collected Works (New York: International Publishers, 1987), vol. 25, p. 302.

41. The sun dial was an exception, but it could not be used at night or on cloudy days.

42. It can be persuasively argued that improvements in the measurement of time in the late medieval and early modern eras were the most important physical advances in the history of Western Civilization, without which few of the other advances would have been likely. See David S. Landes, Revolution in Time: Clocks and the Making of certainty.

Occult man sees ritual as a means of gaining supernatural power for himself. Christian man sees ritual as a means of worshiping God and gaining dominion over himself and his environment, to the glory of God. Similarly, occult man sees measurement as a means of obtaining supernatural power.⁴³ Christian man sees measurement as a tool of dominion, beginning with self-dominion. The West is the product of such a view of measurement. A man wearing a wristwatch is someone under the influence of the Christian view of time. In the ancient pagan world, priests were the monopolists of calendars; this control was a major factor in maintaining their power.⁴⁴ In the West, very few educated people understand the details of the astronomical basis of calculating time, let alone modern cesium atom clocks, but virtually everyone has ready access to a calendar and a clock with an alarm. No longer does an elite priesthood exercise power through its monopolistic knowledge of the astronomical calendar. The advent of cheap printed calendars transferred enormous power to the individual.⁴⁵ Cheap calendars and clocks decentralized power, but thereby made individuals more responsible for the use of time, man's only irreplaceable resource.

The universality of personal time pieces makes it impossible for employers or sellers to cheat large numbers of people regarding time. Because access to information is cheap, time-cheating becomes more difficult. In fact, the employee is far more able to cheat the employer.⁴⁶

the Modern World (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Belknap/Harvard University Press, 1983).

43. The design and construction of the Cheops pyramid stands as the most stupendous surviving manifestation of this faith in weight and measure. See (with reservations) Peter Tompkins, Secrets of the Great Pyramid (New York: Harper Colophon, [1971] 1978); Piazzzi Smyth, The Great Pyramid: Its Secrets and Mysteries Revealed, 4th ed. (New York: Bell, [1880] 1978).

44. This was especially true of ancient agricultural dynasties that were dependent on rivers. Karl Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism: A Comparative Study of Total Power (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1957] 1964), pp. 29–30. For an extraordinary examination of ancient man's priestly mastery of both astronomy and time, see Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet's Mill: An essay on myth and the frame of time (Boston: Gambit, [1969] 1977).

45. Benjamin Franklin made himself famous throughout the American colonies with Poor Richard's Almanack.

46. The most graphic recent examples of such cheating in the modern office are computer games that allow a player to tap a key on the keyboard so that a fake spreadsheet appears on the screen. When a supervisor approaches the player, he taps the key, and it then appears as though he has been studying some intricate aspect of the business: above all, a numerical aspect.

The employee is the seller of services. If he is paid by the hour, he is tempted to find ways to collect his pay without delivering the work expected from him. The salaried employee cheats more easily on his time account; the commissioned salesman cheats more easily on his expense account.

2. Specialized Knowledge

The biblical law of weights and measures teaches that the seller—the receiver of money—is identified as legally responsible. This requires an explanation. The buyer (consumer) has legal control over the distribution of the most marketable commodity: money. He possesses greater flexibility and therefore greater economic authority in the overall economy. We speak of consumer's sovereignty in a free market.⁴⁷ Then why is the seller singled out by biblical law as the potential violator? Doesn't greater responsibility accompany greater authority (Luke 12:47–48)?⁴⁸

The legal question must be decided in terms of comparative authority in specific transactions, not comparative authority in the economy generally. A seller of goods and services possesses highly specialized knowledge regarding his market. Cheating by a seller of goods and services is therefore more likely than cheating by a buyer, because the seller has an advantage in information. This is why biblical law singles out weights and measures as the representative implements of justice. Physical implements of measurement can be created more easily than other kinds of evaluation devices. The existence of a precise (though never absolute) physical standard makes it relatively easy to create close approximations for commercial use.⁴⁹ The availability of devices

47. See below, "Competition and the Margins of Cheating."

48. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

49. The United States National Bureau of Standards (founded in 1901, but in principle authorized by the United States Constitution of 1787) establishes key lengths by using a platinum-iridium bar stored at a specific temperature. This, in turn, is based on a not quite identical bar stored by the International Bureau of Weights and Measurements in Sèvres, France. These bars do not match. Also, when cleaned, a few molecules are shaved away. Scientists now prefer to measure distance in terms of time and the speed of light. A meter is defined today as the distance a light particle travels in one 299,792,458th of a second. Time is measured in terms of the number of microwave-excited vibrations of a cesium atom particle when excited by a hydrogen maser. One second is defined as the time that passes during 9,192,631,770 cesium atomic vibrations. Malcolm W. Browne, "Yardsticks Almost Vanish As Science Seeks Precision," New York Times (Aug. 23, 1993).

and techniques to specialists employed as agents of the civil government, in the name of the buyers, allows the operation of checks and balances on the checks and balances. The state therefore has a greater ability to police the sellers in this area than in most other areas.

On what biblical basis can magistrates police weights and measures? Where is the victim? Where is the court case? The problem here is analogous to the problem of measuring pollution or noise. The victims are not easy to identify, for they may not know that they have been cheated. The extent of the cheating cannot easily be ascertained by the victims in retrospect. The cost of gathering this information is too high. As a cost-saving measure (the language of measurement is inescapable) for past victims and potential victims, the state imposes public standards, and sellers are required to conform. As in the case of protecting potential victims of speeding automobiles, the state establishes boundaries in advance. The police impose negative sanctions for violations of speed limits, even though the speeder's victims have not publicly complained against this particular speeder. The speeding driver did increase the statistical risks of having an accident, so there were victims.⁵⁰ They are represented by the police officer who catches the speeder.⁵¹

J. Competition and the Margins of Cheating

The International Bureau of Standards was established by the General Conference on Weights and Measures in 1875. National governments covenanted with each other by the Treaty of the Meter. The nations' governments are pledged to honor the standards agreed upon. These standards did not originate in 1875, however, nor did they originate with civil government. It does not require a treaty to establish such standards. There can be official standards, but unofficial standards are far more widespread. The free market can and does establish such standards. In fact, the more technologically innovative a society is, the less likely that a civil government will be the primary creator or enforcer of the bulk of the prevailing standards. When it comes to establishing standards, the state's salaried bureaucrats are usually playing catch-up with profit-seeking innovators. The market establishes initial standards. Bureaucrats then ratify them by committee.

50. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 41:B.

51. Fines should be used to set up a restitution fund to pay victims of drivers who are not subsequently arrested and convicted. Idem. The history of civil law in the West since the Norman Conquest of England in 1066 has been the substitution of fines for restitution: Bruce L. Benson, The Enterprise of Law: Justice Without the State (San Francisco: Pacific Research Institute for Public Policy, 1990), ch. 3.

1. Standards and Boundaries

All standards have boundary ranges. Market standards are likely to be less precise technically than civil standards, for participants in markets understand that the development, selection, and enforcement of standards are not cost-free activities. The degree of variance from a precise model or standard depends upon the costs and benefits of enforcement. It also depends on the locus of sovereignty of such enforcement: the consumers. In a free market, it is the buyer of goods and services (i.e., the seller of money) who is sovereign, not the seller of goods and not the state. The consumer has greater economic flexibility to take his money elsewhere than the entrepreneur or politician does. That is to say, the cost to him of seeking and obtaining an alternative offer for what he wants to sell (money) is normally far lower than the cost to the seller of specialized goods or services to seek and obtain an alternative offer. The seller of money has maximum liquidity. Money has been accurately defined by Mises as the most marketable commodity;⁵² hence, the consumer, as the seller of money, is sovereign economically.

The seller uses implements to make measurements. No seller can do without such implements, even if he is selling services. At the very least, he will use a clock. The seller is warned by God to make sure that he uses these implements consistently as he goes about his business. Yet this is not quite true. The seller is not to supply less than the standard determines; he may lawfully give more. If he gives any buyer less than he has said he is giving, he steals from him. If he gives a buyer more than he says, he is not stealing. He is offering charity, or giving a gift, or being extra careful, or building good will to increase repeat sales. So, the business owner is allowed to give more than he has indicated to the buyer that the buyer will receive; he is not allowed to give less. The seller need not tell the buyer that he is giving an extra amount, but he is required to tell him if he is giving less.⁵³ The boundary, therefore, is a seller's floor rather than a ceiling.

Sellers compete against sellers; buyers compete against buyers.

52. Ludwig von Mises, The Theory of Money and Credit (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1912] 1953), pp. 32–33. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTMC>)

53. A manager or employee must be precise: to give more is to steal from the owner; to give less is to steal from the buyer.

This is the fundamental principle of free market competition, one which is not widely understood. The buyer is playing off one seller against another when he bargains, even if the second seller is a phantom;⁵⁴ the seller is playing off buyer against buyer. Buyers compete directly against sellers only when both of them have imperfect information regarding the alternatives. No one knowingly pays one ounce of silver for something that is selling next door for half an ounce. The seller will not sell something to a buyer at a low price if he knows that another buyer is waiting in line to buy at a higher price. Neither will a buyer buy at a high price if he knows that another seller waits across the hallway to sell the same item at a lower price.

This being the case, it should be obvious why sellers who use false scales find themselves pressured by market forces to re-set their scales closer to the prevailing market standard. Their competitors provide a greater quantity of goods and services for the same price. It may take time for word to spread, but it does spread. Buyers like to brag about the bargains they have bought. Even though their tales of bargains increase the number of competing buyers at bargain shops, and therefore could lead to higher prices in the future, they do like to brag. This bragging gets the word out.⁵⁵ A seller who consistently sets his scales below the prevailing competitive standard risks losing customers. This pressure does not mean that all or even most scales will be set identically, but it does lead to a market standard of cheating: competitive boundaries. The better the information available to buyers, the narrower the range of cheating. None of this assumes the existence of a standard enforced by civil government.

2. The Scales of Justice

Much the same is true of the scales of civil justice. Word spreads about the availability of righteous civil justice. If there is open immigration, as there was supposed to be in Mosaic Israel, it is possible for those suffering injustice to seek justice elsewhere. (This is a major advantage of federalism: those living in one state can move to another if they disapprove of the prevailing local situation. This allows the testing of ideas regarding the proper role of civil government.) The Bible assumes that word about national justice does spread:

54. The phantom buyer may walk in this afternoon. The seller is not sure. Neither is the buyer.

55. There are limits to this. If the buyer has found an exceptionally inexpensive seller, especially a small, local seller who may be ill-informed about market demand, and if he expects to return to make additional purchases, he may not say anything to potential competitors. He does not want to let the seller know that there are many buyers available who are willing to pay more. There is a "bragging range." That is, there are boundaries on the spread of accurate information. Accurate information is not a free good.

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).⁵⁶

The existence of a righteous nation in the midst of a fallen world of nations can lead to a competitive uplifting of civil justice in those nations that experience a net migration out. Emigration pressures unjust nations to revise their judicial standards. This is why totalitarian regimes place barriers at their borders. The threat of the loss of “the best and the brightest,” also known as the brain drain, is too great. The barbed wire goes up to place a boundary around the “ideological paradises.”

The tearing down of the Berlin Wall in late 1989 was a symbolic event that shook Europe. It was the visible beginning of the rapid end of the legacy of the French Revolution of 1789: left-wing Enlightenment humanism. We can date the end of that tradition in the West: August 21, 1991, when the Soviet Communist coup begun on August 19 failed. Boris Yeltsin and his associates sat in the Russian Parliament building for three days, telephoning leaders in the West, sending and receiving FAX messages, sending and receiving short wave radio messages, and ordering deliveries of Pizza Hut pizza. So died the French Revolutionary tradition. Sliced pizza replaced the guillotine’s sliced necks. It was a sign that the economically devastating effects of Marxist socialism were the inevitable product of injustice.⁵⁷ People in Marx-

56. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

57. This was the message of F. A. Hayek in his book, The Road to Serfdom (1944), which became an international best-seller. Western intellectuals scoffed at its thesis for over four decades, though in diminished tones after 1974, when he won the Nobel Prize in economics. The scoffing stopped in 1989 with the fall of the Berlin Wall and the collapse of the Soviet Union’s economy. A few months before he died in 1992, ist paradises wanted to escape. Given the opportunity, they would "vote with their feet." With the Berlin Wall down, there was an immediate exodus from East Germany. Simultaneously, Western justice began to be imported by East Germany. This leavening effect was positive. Within months, East and West Germany were legally reunited.

For this emigration process to serve as a national leaven of righteousness, there must be sanctuaries of righteousness. There must be just societies that open their borders to victims of injustice, including economic oppression. This is what Mosaic Israel offered the whole ancient world: sanctuary. This was God's means of pressuring unrighteous nations to become more just. He imposed a cost on evil empires: the loss of productive people to Israel.

On the other hand, widespread immigration can pressure a just society to become less just if the newcomers gain political authority. If they are allowed to vote, they will seek to change some aspects of the sanctuary nation's legal structure. For example, they may seek to legislate compulsory welfare payments: politically coerced subsidies paid to immigrants by the original residents.⁵⁸ It is not God's intention to pay for a rising standard of justice in evil empires by means of falling standards of justice in covenanted sanctuary nations. His goal is to raise standards of justice everywhere. So, political pluralism is prohibited by God's law. Suffrage (the vote) is by covenantal affirmation and church membership, not mere geographical residence. This is why the biblical concept of sanctuary requires a biblical judicial boundary: covenantal citizenship.⁵⁹

If justice produced indeterminate economic effects, and if injustice

Hayek was awarded the United States medal of freedom. He had outlived the Soviet Union. He also had outlived most of the original scoffers. As he told me and Mark Skousen in an interview in 1985, he had never believed that he would live to see the acclaim that came to him after 1974. (Few men who move against the intellectual currents of their eras live long enough to see such vindication. He died in March, 1992, at the age of 92, receiving international acclaim: "In praise of Hayek," The Economist (March 28, 1992); John Gray, "The Road From Serfdom," National Review (April 27, 1992). As The Economist noted, "In the 1960s and 1970s he was a hate-figure for the left, derided by many as wicked, loony, or both." By 1992, no one remembered such scurrilous attacks as Herman Finer's The Road to Reaction (1948). Milton Friedman, who was on the same University of Chicago faculty as Hayek and Finer, wrote that Hayek "unquestionably became the most important intellectual leader of the movement that has produced a major change in the climate of opinion." National Review, op. cit., p. 35.

58. Gary North, "The Sanctuary Society and Its Enemies," Journal of Libertarian Studies, 13 (Summer 1998), pp. 205–19. (<http://bit.ly/SanctuarySociety>) produced indeterminate economic effects, there would be no economic pressure on totalitarian regimes to tear down the boundary barriers. But justice does not produce indeterminate economic effects. Similarly, if the social world were what Meredith G. Kline insists that it is—a world in which God's visible sanctions in history are indeterminate for both covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking—then there could be no historical resolution of the competition between civil righteousness and civil perversity. This quasi-Manichean conclusion is the implicit and sometimes explicit assumption of amillennialism.⁶⁰ The leaven of justice in such a world would have no advantage over the leaven of injustice. But there is no neutrality in life; in a world of totally depraved men, such cultural neutrality could not be maintained for long. The leaven of evil would triumph. Yet it does not triumph, long term. Pharaonic tyrannies have all collapsed or become culturally impotent over the centuries. This fact testifies to mankind that God's sanctions in history are not indeterminate. Honesty really is the best policy, as Ben Franklin long ago insisted. In the competition between good and evil, the leaven of righteousness spreads as time goes on. Its visible results are so much better (Lev. 26:1–13; Deut. 28:1–14).

59. North, Political Polytheism, ch. 2.

3. The Forces of Competition

The tremendous pressure of international economic competition cannot be withstood for long. It brought down Soviet Communism. Marxist tyrannies could not gain the economic fruits of righteousness without the moral roots.⁶¹ They could not permit a modern economy based on computers, data bases, FAX machines, and rationally allocated capital in their rigged, corrupt, fantasy world of central economic planning and fiat money.⁶² The reality of the Russian workers' saying under Communism could not be suppressed forever: "We pretend to work, and they pretend to pay us." That inescapable reality led to a falling standard of living and the eventual collapse of European Communism.

The international free market has no universally enforceable standards of weights and measures, yet it operates more successfully

60. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, pp. 76–92; ch. 5.

61. Konstantin Simis, USSR: The Corrupt Society: The Secret World of Soviet Capitalism (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982).

62. On the truly fantastic nature of the Soviet economy, see Leopold Tyrmand, The Rosa Luxemburg Contraceptives Cooperative: A Primer on Communist Civilization (New York: Macmillan, 1972).

than any other economic system in history. Private arbitration sometimes is invoked. Usually, national standards are closely observed by market participants. There are great and continuing debates over which standards should be adopted internationally, especially as international trade increases. But even without formal political resolutions to these debates, the international market continues to flourish. In the medieval world, there was an internationally recognized "law merchant," and it has been revived in modern times.⁶³

4. Gresham's Law

But what about Gresham's Law? "Bad money drives out good."⁶⁴ This is the pessimillennial view of history as applied to monetary theory. But Gresham's Law is misleading. It has an implied condition, but only people who understand economics recognize the unique nature of this condition. The law only applies when a civil government establishes and enforces a price control between two kinds of money. Then the artificially overvalued money remains in circulation, while the artificially undervalued money goes into hoards, into the black market, or is exported. Bad money drives out good money only when governments pass laws that attempt to override the free market's assessment of relative monetary values. This is not to say that there should not be civil laws against counterfeiting, but it does mean that counterfeiters must be very skilled to compete in a free market order.

The same is true of religion. Christians contend with cults, but cults are imitations of Christianity. Today, we see no fertility cults that self-consciously imitate the older Canaanite religions. Bacchanalia festivals are no longer with us, at least not in a self-consciously cultic form.⁶⁵ New Age advocates may seem numerous, especially in Hollywood and New York City, but there are very few openly New Age congregations of the faithful. Religious counterfeits must take on the characteristic features of Christianity in order to extend their influence 63. Benson, Enterprise of Law, pp. 30–35, 62, 224–27. See also Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), ch. 11. The Jews who dominate the international diamond trade make bargains without public contracts, and they never appeal to the state to settle disputes. These merchants have their own courts that settle disputes. It seems likely that they do not pay income taxes on every profitable trade.

64. "Bad money drives out good money," the law really states. Yet in a very real sense, the familiar formulation is correct: bad money does drive out good. It creates black markets, cheating, and many other evils.

65. Mardi Gras and Carnival are holdovers of chaos festivals.

beyond traditional borders. The rites of Christianity have many imitations around the globe, but the rites of Santeria do not.⁶⁶

A wise counterfeiter will not try to pass a bill that has a picture of Marilyn Monroe on it. Successful counterfeits in a competitive market must resemble the original. This is why there is, over time, a tendency for covenant-breakers to conform themselves to the external requirements of God's law until they cannot stand the contradiction in their lives any longer.⁶⁷ Then they rebel, and God imposes negative sanctions, either through His ordained covenant representatives or through the creation.⁶⁸

K. A Final Sovereign

The Bible identifies judges as covenantal agents of God. Unlike the free market, where consumers are sovereign, the state requires a voice of final earthly authority. This does not mean that one person or one institution has final authority. Biblically, no institution or person possesses such authority in history; only the Bible does. But there must be someone who announces "guilty" or "not guilty." Someone must impose the required sanctions. Civil sanctions are imposed by the state.

This means that legal standards must not fluctuate so widely that men cannot make reasonable predictions about the outcome of trials. If there is no predictability of the outcome, then there will be endless trials. Conflicting parties will not settle their disputes before they enter the courtroom. A society should encourage predictable outcomes; otherwise, individuals cannot be confident about receiving what the law says they deserve.⁶⁹ It is because the outcomes of trials are reasonably predictable that conflicts are settled before they come to trial.

Hayek's comments in this regard are extremely relevant. He announced a conclusion, one based on decades of study of both economic theory and legal history: "There is probably no single factor which

66. Bill Strube, "Possessed with Old Fervor: Santeria in Cuba," The World & I (Sept. 1993). This African-Cuban voodoo cult is closely associated with homosexuality. Ibid., p. 254.

67. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

68. Ibid., ch. 8.

69. "Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison" (Matt. 5:25). Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

has contributed more to the prosperity of the West than the relative certainty of the law which has prevailed here. This is not altered by the fact that complete certainty of the law is an ideal which we must try to approach but which we can never perfectly attain." He then went on to make this observation, one that relies on the concept of the thing not seen: "But the degree of the certainty of the law must be judged by the disputes which do not lead to litigation because the outcome is practically certain as soon as the legal position is examined. It is the cases that never come before the courts, not those that do, that are the measure of the certainty of the law."⁷⁰ In other words, self-government is basic to all government, but predictable law, predictable enforcement, and predictable sanctions must reinforce self-government if a society is to remain productive. The clogged courts of the United States in the final third of the twentieth century were testimonies to the breakdown of the certainty of civil law, as well as to the effects of tax-financed law schools that had produced over 700,000 lawyers.⁷¹

1. Justice in Flux

There is little doubt that the proliferation of lawyers in the United States in the latter years of the twentieth century was a sign of a major breakdown of its moral and legal order. In 1990, there were 18 million civil cases in the United States: one case per 10 adult Americans. The United States in 1990 had some 730,000 lawyers—70% of the world's total. In 1990, Japan had 11 lawyers per 100,000 in population; the United Kingdom, 82; Germany, 111; the United States, 281. Japan had 115 scientists and engineers per lawyer; United Kingdom, 14.5; Germany, 9.1; United States, 4.8. Economic output per hour, 1973–90: Japan, 4.4%; United Kingdom, 3.3% Germany, 2.8%; United States, 2.3%.⁷² The idea that the state can provide perfect justice is a costly myth.⁷³

After 1870, throughout the West, the view of the state as an agency of compulsory salvation spread. It escalated rapidly after 1900, when Social Darwinism moved from its "dog-eat-dog" phase to its

70. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), p. 208.

71. In the case of lawyers, Say's famous law holds true: production creates its own demand. The old story is illustrative: when only one lawyer lives in town, he has little work. When another lawyer arrives, they both have lots of work from then on.

72. "Punitive Damages," National Review (Nov. 4, 1991).

73. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974).

state-planned evolution phase.⁷⁴ Wheaton College economics professor P. J. Hill described the process: the decline of predictable law and the rise of the transfer society. “The idea of the transfer society is a society where property rights are up for grabs.” So many people start grabbing.

We’ve become a society in which the rules are in flux, thereby prodding people to spend a large amount of their time and resources trying to change the rules to their benefit. Our book⁷⁵ argues that in the beginning the Constitution was a set of rules for a few areas that pretty much encouraged the entrepreneurial type of person to go out and make better mousetraps, to create wealth. Somewhere around the 1870s the constitutional climate started changing dramatically, not by call amendment but by interpretation. The Constitution became interpreted in a more casual way. There was a rise in what we “reasonable regulations;” the Supreme Court said the state legislatures could pass any sort of regulations they wanted about economic affairs so long as they were “reasonable.”

That meant, of course, that people spent a lot of time trying to get regulations written to their advantage or to the disadvantage of their competitors, because there was no clear-cut standard. And today almost nothing in the economic arena is unconstitutional. . . .

Today, much of the economic game is in the political arena. It is played by getting rules on your side, or making sure that somebody else doesn’t get the rules on their side against you. The action is in Washington, D.C.

It’s interesting to look at the statistics of many large companies and see how much of their time goes into lobbying, where their business headquarters are, who the big players are, etc. It turns out that it’s just as important to try to make sure that the rules favor you as it is to produce better products. Any society in which the rules are not clearly defined, whatever they are, is at risk. You need a society of stable, legitimate and just rules in order to have people productively engaged.

I would put it this way: Theft is expensive. In a society where theft is prevalent people will put a lot of their efforts into protecting themselves—into locks and police guards, etc.

74. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A.

75. Peter J. Hill and Terry Anderson, The Birth of a Transfer Society (Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1989).

Government can prevent theft, but can also be an agency of theft. If this is the case, then people will look to government to use its coercive arm to take from other citizens. In such a world of "legal theft" people will devote resources to protecting themselves and to getting government on their side.⁷⁶

2. Open Entry vs. Open Access

Open entry to economic competitors on a free market is not the same thing as open access to political competitors in a civil government. The free market is not a covenantal institution possessing a lawful monopoly as an ordained representative of God. Civil government is. Allowing open access for office-seekers within a single governmental structure is not the same as allowing rival governmental structures within the same sphere of political authority. There has to be a hierarchy of authority, meaning a chain of command, in all three covenantal governments: church, family, and state. There is no such hierarchy in a free market. The consumer's decision is sovereign on a free market: to buy or not to buy. He is not comparably sovereign in a covenantal institution: to obey or not to obey apart from the threat of lawful sanctions. He is under external authority.

Civil government must enforce certain physical standards of measurement, if only for purposes of tax collection. The idea that a free market can provide profit-seeking courts as a complete substitute for the final earthly sovereignty of a civil court (assuming its widespread acceptance by family and church courts) is a myth of libertarianism. The essence of a free market system is that it does not and cannot make final declarations. Why? Because the essence of the free market is that anyone can step in at any time and announce a higher bid. The market, if it is truly free, cannot legally keep out those who offer higher bids.⁷⁷ Therefore, there can be no final, covenantally binding bid in a free market, since the market system allows no appeal to a superior, covenantally binding institution. If voluntary agreements are subsequently broken, there must be an agent economically outside of the free market and judicially above the free market who can sovereignly enforce the terms of the agreement. The free market is open-ended because it offers open entry; open entry is the heart of a free market. The resolution of disputes requires the presence of a representative covenantal agent who can dispense justice in God's name. Disputes are usually resolved before they reach this final declaration, but only because of the presence of this agency of final declaration. This final court of appeal must be able to appeal to a higher court: God's. This means that it must declare God's law.

76. Hill, "The Transfer Society," pp. 1–2. See also Gary North, "The Politics of the Fair Share," The Freeman (Nov. 1993). (<http://bit.ly/FairSharePolitics>)

77. Biblically, if some offer is inherently immoral, price is irrelevant. Prostitution services aimed at married people can lawfully be suppressed by the state, but not in terms of price. No offer is allowed. There is no open entry, for there is no legal market. Any discussion of whether prostitution is lawful or unlawful between unmarried individuals must begin with the specific case law: "And the daughter of any priest, if she profane herself by playing the whore, she profaneth her father: she shall be burnt with fire" (Lev. 21:9).

L. Victim's Rights and Restitution

The fundamental principle of biblical civil jurisprudence is victim's rights. The state is to act as the agent of injured parties. If the injured party is unwilling to prosecute, the state is not to prosecute.⁷⁸ Does this mean that the state may not prosecute the seller who is discovered cheating by means of false weights and measures? If not, why not?

There are criminal cases in which there is no identifiable victim. The classic example is the case of a driver who exceeds the speed limit and does not injure anyone, but who thereby imposes risks on other drivers and pedestrians. The state in this case is allowed to impose fines on the convicted speeder. The money should be used to provide restitution for those who are injured by a hit-and-run driver who cannot subsequently be located or convicted.⁷⁹

What about the seller who uses rigged scales? The state cannot prove when this practice began; it can only prove when the practice was discovered. It probably cannot identify who was defrauded. This means that many of the victims cannot sue for damages. Should the seller not suffer negative sanctions?

One possible way to resolve this dilemma is for the state to require the seller to provide discounts for a period of time to all of his past customers. The discount would be determined by the degree of scale-tampering: double restitution. If the scales were 10% off, then he must offer 20% discounts. To make sure he does not simply raise his retail prices before he starts offering the discounts, the state would fix his retail prices as of the day the infraction was discovered. Any customer who could show a receipt from the store would have access to the discounts.

78. North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix M.

79. Ibid., chaps. 37:D, 41:C.

Because of modern packaging and mass production, not many stores would come under this threat. The butcher in the meat section of a supermarket would be one seller whose scales would be basic to the business. But, on the whole, modern technology transfers responsibility back to the companies that sell the packaged products to retail outlets. How, then, could the law be enforced on them? To require them to offer a discount to a retailer does not benefit the consumer; it provides a profit to the retailer. One way would be for those who have receipts for a product to be able to buy that firm's products for a period at a discount. The firm would then be forced to reimburse the retailer for the difference. This is a sales technique used by manufacturers in gaining market share in supermarkets: discount coupons. It could be imposed by the state as a penalty.

This would reward those consumers who save their receipts. If this procedure is too complicated for the victims to be fairly compensated, because of the nature of the product—a "small-ticket item"—then the firm could be required to offer discounts across the board to all future buyers of that specific product for a period of time. The firm would also be required to identify on the packaging of that product an admission of guilt, so that the discounts would not be regarded as an advertising strategy. Finally, the discount reimbursements to retailers would not be tax-deductible as a business expense to the seller.

M. Evangelical Antinomianism and Humanism's Myth of Neutrality

For a scale to operate, it must have fixed standards. If it is a balance scale like the one the famous lady of justice holds, it must have fixed weights in one of its two trays. There is no escape from the covenantal concept of judicial weights. This is the issue of ethical and judicial standards: point three of the biblical covenant model. Mosaic law stated that within the boundaries of Israel, honest (predictable) weights were mandatory. It did not matter whether the buyer was rich or poor, circumcised or not circumcised: the same weights had to be used by the seller. Israel was to become a sanctuary for strangers seeking justice. The symbol of this justice was the honest scale.

Which judicial standards were mandatory? The Bible is clear: God's revealed law. National Israel was not some neutral sanctuary in which rationally perceived natural law categories were enforced. That unique sanctuary was where biblical law was enforced. Those seeking sanctuary in Israel had to conform to biblical civil law. The metaphorical weights in the tray of civil justice's scale were the Mosaic statutes and case laws.

1. Antinomianism

Because the modern Christian evangelical world is self-consciously and defiantly antinomian—"We're under grace, not law!"—Christians emphatically deny the New Covenant legitimacy of the concept of biblically revealed laws. They assume that men can develop universal, religiously non-specific moral standards in the same way that the world has developed universal physical weights and measurements. They prefer to ignore what the Bible reveals about covenant-breakers: those who hate God love death (Prov. 8:36b). The closer that covenant-breakers get to the doctrine of God, the more perverse they are in rejecting the testimony of the Bible. They interpret God, man, law, sanctions, and time differently from what the Bible specifies as the standard. They affirm rival covenantal standards.

A holy commonwealth would establish the law of God as the civil standard, but modern evangelical Christians hate the revealed law of God above every other system of law. First, they affirm as the binding standard the myth of neutrality: religiously neutral natural law. Second, they affirm their willingness to submit themselves to any system of law except biblical law. They announce: "A Christian can live peacefully under any legal or political system," with only one exception: biblical law. Modern Christians see themselves as perpetual strangers in the perpetual unholy commonwealths of covenant-breaking man. They deny that liberty can be attained under God's Bible-revealed law. God's revealed law, they insist, is the essence of tyranny. They seek liberty through religious neutrality: the rule of anti-Christian civil law. They seek, at most, "equal time for Jesus" in the satanic kingdoms of this world. They forget: the "equal time" doctrine is the lie that Satan's servants use while dwelling in holy commonwealths. When Satan's disciples gain civil power, they adopt a new rule: "As little time for Jesus as the tate can impose through force."

2. Geisler's Norm

Norman Geisler, a fundamentalist philosopher with a Ph.D. issued by a Roman Catholic university, and a devout follower of Thomas

Aquinas,⁸⁰ insisted that all civil law must be religiously neutral. We must legislate morality, he said, but not religion. This means that civil morality can be religiously neutral. "The cry to return to our Christian roots is seriously misguided if it means that government should favor Christian teachings. . . . First, to establish such a Bible-based civil government would be a violation of the First Amendment. Even mandating the Ten Commandments would favor certain religions. . . . Furthermore, the reinstitution of the Old Testament legal system is contrary to New Testament teaching. Paul says clearly that Christians 'are not under the law, but under grace' (Rom. 6:14). . . . The Bible may be informative, but it is not normative for civil law."⁸¹ The suggestion by those whom he calls "the biblionomists" [biblionomy: Bible law] that God's law still applies today is, in Geisler's words, a "chilling legalism."⁸²

We need legal reform, he insisted. "What kind of laws should be used to accomplish this: Christian laws or Humanistic laws? Neither. Rather, they should simply be just laws. Laws should not be either Christian or anti-Christian; they should be merely fair ones."⁸³ There is supposedly a realm of neutral civil law in between God and humanism: the realm of "fairness." This means that Mosaic civil law was never fair. Those who believe that the Mosaic civil law was unfair refuse to say explicitly that this is what they believe. It sounds ethically rebellious against the unchanging God of the Bible, which it in fact is. Nevertheless, this rebellious outlook was universal within Protestantism in the twentieth century; it had been since at least the late seventeenth century.

This theory of neutral civil law denies Christ's words concerning the impossibility of neutrality: "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Matt. 6:24).⁸⁴ "He that is not with me is against me; and he that

80. Aquinas, he said in 1988, "was the most brilliant, most comprehensive, and most systematic of all Christian thinkers and perhaps all thinkers of all time." Angela Elwell Hunt, "Norm Geisler: The World Is His Classroom," Fundamentalist Journal (Sept. 1988), p. 21. This magazine was published by Rev. Jerry Falwell's Liberty University. Geisler was at the time a professor there. The magazine has ceased publication. Geisler resigned from the school in 1991.

81. Norman L. Geisler, "Should We Legislate Morality?" ibid. (July/Aug. 1988), p. 17.

82. Idem.

83. Ibid., p. 64.

84. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 14.

gathereth not with me scattereth abroad” (Matt. 12:30). The neutralists insist that Christ’s denial of neutrality does not apply to the civil covenant. Geisler wrote: “God ordained Divine Law for the church, but He gave Natural Law for civil government.”⁸⁵ They insist, as Geisler insists, that true civil justice can be obtained only by removing all visible traces of Christianity from civil government. This is not humanism, he insists; this is merely neutral civil justice.

But there is no neutrality. There has never been a neutral kingdom of civil law, and there never will be. Facing the reality of this historical fact, this question inevitably arises: Which is worse, secular humanism or God’s law? When push comes to shove, Geisler identified the greater evil: biblical law. “Thoughtful reflection reveals that this ‘cure’ of reconstructionism is worse than the disease of secularism.”⁸⁶ Christians supposedly must content themselves with living as strangers in a strange land until Jesus personally returns in power. A question for premillennialists: Will Jesus enforce the Mosaic law or a system of neutral natural law during His premillennial kingdom? Premillennial defenders of natural law theory refuse to address this question in print. If they answer “Mosaic law,” they have admitted that it is intrinsically morally superior to natural law. If they answer “natural law,” they sever the God who declared the Mosaic law from that law. They prefer to remain silent.

The Christian antinomians’ view of civil law has implications for their doctrine of eschatology. This is why virtually all amillennialists and premillennialists defend natural law theory and political pluralism, while attacking theonomy. They see themselves as God’s people as losers in church history.⁸⁷ The most they hope for is a cultural stalemate.⁸⁸ They prefer to live meekly and impotently inside cultural ghettos rather than fight a cultural war in the name of Christ.⁸⁹ They do not believe they can win; therefore, they deny the basis of fighting in such a war, namely, a uniquely biblical judicial alternative to human-

85. Geisler, p. 17.

86. Norman L. Geisler, “Human Life,” in William Bentley Ball (ed.), In Search of a National Morality (Baker Book House [conservative Protestant] and Ignatius Press [conservative Roman Catholic], 1992), p. 115.

87. North, Millennialism and Social Theory, chaps. 7–9.

88. Gary North, Backward, Christian Soldiers? An Action Manual for Christian Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1984] 1988), ch. 11. (<http://bit.ly/gnsoldiers>)

89. Gary North, “Ghetto Eschatologies,” Biblical Economics Today, XIV (April/May 1992). (<http://bit.ly/gnghetto>)

istic law. They deny the legitimacy of Bible-revealed judicial standards that would make possible an explicitly Christian social order during the era of the church. Their antinomian social ethics is a corollary to their pessimistic view of the church's future. God has granted them their desire: they live at the mercy of their enemies, who control the various social orders of our day. But the walls of their ghettos have holes in them: public schools, television, movies, rock music, the internet, and all the rest of humanism's lures.

Unlike the Israelites in Egypt who cried out to God for deliverance (Ex. 3:7), today's Christians prefer life in Egypt to life in the Promised Land. God cursed the exodus generation: death in the wilderness. But He did not allow them to return to Egyptian bondage. Today's Christians may grumble about certain peripheral aspects of their bondage, but they do not yet seek deliverance from their primary bonds, most notably their enthusiastic acceptance of religious and political pluralism, natural law theory, and the first-stage humanist promise of "equal time for the ethics of Jesus." They hate the very thought of their responsibility before God to establish covenanted national sanctuaries.

Conclusion

"Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity" (Job 31:6). The imagery of the balance scale is basic to understanding each person's relation to God, either as a covenant-keeper or a covenant-breaker. Weights and measures are also representative biblically of the degree of civil justice available in a society. If those who own the measuring instruments of commerce tamper with them in order to defraud consumers, either specific groups of consumers—especially resident aliens—or consumers in general, they have sinned against God. They have stolen. If the civil government does not prosecute such thieves, then the society is corrupt. The continued existence of false weights and measures testifies against the whole society.

There are limits to our perception; there are limits to the accuracy of scales. This applies both to physical measurement and civil justice. Society cannot attain perfect justice. There must always be an appeal to the judge's intuition in judicial conflicts where contested public acts were not clearly inside or outside the law. This does not mean that there are limits to God's perception and God's justice. Thus, there will be a day of perfect reckoning. Over time, covenantally faithful individuals and institutions approach as a limit, but never reach, the perfect justice of that final judgment. This process brings God's positive sanctions to covenant-keeping individuals and institutions, making them more responsible by making them more powerful. Progressive sanctification, both personal and corporate, necessarily involves an increase in God's blessings and also personal responsibility.

The state is required by God to enforce His standards. The free market social order—a development that has its origins in the twin doctrines of personal responsibility and self-government—requires civil government as a legitimate court of appeal. But the bulk of law enforcement has to be individual: “Every man his own policeman.” No other concept of law enforcement will suffice if a society is not to become a society of informants and secret police. Secondarily, law enforcement must be associative: market competition. Buyers and sellers determine the degree of acceptable fluctuation around agreed-upon standards. Only in the third level is law enforcement to become civil. Here, the standards are to be much more precise, much more rigid, and much more predictable. Representative cases—legal precedents—are to become guidelines for self-government and voluntary associative government.

INHERITANCE BY FIRE

Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Molech; he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall stone him with stones. And I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people; because he hath given of his seed unto Molech, to defile my sanctuary, and to profane my holy name. And if the people of the land do any ways hide their eyes from the man, when he giveth of his seed unto Molech, and kill him not: Then I will set my face against that man, and against his family, and will cut him off, and all that go a whoring after him, to commit whoredom with Molech, from among their people (Lev. 20:2–5).

The theocentric principle governing this statute is God's jealousy against all rival gods. More specifically, God in the Old Covenant era held the office of "Father of the sons of Israel." The nation of Israel was His son (Ex. 4:23), adopted by His grace. So, God as Father demanded that the sons of Israel acknowledge this fact ritually by circumcising their sons.

A. Fatherhood and Sonship

The practice of sending children through a ritual fire was a denial of God's fatherhood and therefore also Israel's sonship. This two-fold ritual denial called forth the threat of disinheritance by God. The required means of this disinheritance was public execution by stoning, a penalty that outrages modern Christians, who regard it (and, by implication, the God who required it) as barbaric. The penalty was not execution by fire—or, for that matter, by drinking hemlock.

Godly inheritance in history is always by fire. This fire is covenantal: placing God's people in trials and tribulations—historical sanctions—in order to purge them of their sins (Isa. 1:25–26). The imagery is that of metal-working (Isa. 1:22a). One pagan version of this imagery of metal-working was alchemy.¹ Another was the practice of passing children through a fire.

The sanction of execution makes it clear that this was a civil law. As a civil law, it applied to all those residing within the jurisdiction of the state. It applied equally to covenanted Israelites and “strangers that sojourn in Israel” (v. 2). If the civil magistrate refused to prosecute, or if the civil judges refused to convict, or if the capital sanction was not imposed, God threatened the practitioner with excommunication: cutting off (v. 5). Since this would be God’s act rather than the priests’ act, the implication is that God would intervene directly to kill him.

Here is another seed law, or so the language indicates: “any of his seed.” This seed law applied to a parent’s dedication of a son or daughter to a specific foreign god, Molech.² First, the seed laws were part of the laws governing inheritance and disinheritance. Second, as a seed law, it was part of the laws governing the land. These land laws were necessary because of the presence of God’s temple within the land. The temple had to be protected from defilement. Third, this statute was part of the laws prohibiting blasphemy: prohibiting the profanation of God’s holy name. The judicial boundary around God’s name was as important as the physical boundaries around the temple and its environs. This boundary extends into the New Covenant, unlike the land-based boundaries of the Mosaic Covenant.

B. The Nature of the Prohibited Rite

Molech was the god of Ammon, the incest-conceived, bastard cousin of Israel (Gen. 19:38). “Then did Solomon build an high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem, and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon” (I Kings 11:7). His name came from the Hebrew word for king, Melek. This deity was also known as Milcom and Milcham. He was a fire god, essentially the same as the Moabites’ deity, Chemosh (I Kings 11:5; cf. v. 7).³ Stephen referred to Molech as a god worshipped by the Israelites

1. Mircea Eliade, The Forge and the Crucible: The Origins and Structures of Alchemy (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1956] 1971).

2. Kronos (Greece), Saturn (Rome): John Emerich Edward Dalberg-Acton, “Human Sacrifice” (1863), Essays in Religion, Politics, and Morality, in Selected Writings of Lord Acton, 3 vols. (Indianapolis, Indiana: LibertyClassics, 1988), III, p. 405.

3. “Molech,” in Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, eds. John M’Clintock and James Strong, 12 vols. (New York: Harper Bros., 1894), IV, p.

in the wilderness: "Then God turned, and gave them up to worship the host of heaven; as it is written in the book of the prophets, O ye house of Israel, have ye offered to me slain beasts and sacrifices by the space of forty years in the wilderness? Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Molech, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them: and I will carry you away beyond Babylon" (Acts 7:42–43). Molech was a major rival god in the history of Israel.

Molech required a specific form of dedication: passing children through a fire. "And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Molech, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD" (Lev. 18:21). Israel ignored this law, among many others, and God cited this in His covenant lawsuit against Jerusalem. Jerusalem would pass through the Chaldeans' fire: fire for fire (Jer. 32:29, 35). This indicates that God's negative sanctions against this crime were not limited to the family that practiced it. As with all ritual abominations, if the civil authorities allowed the practice to continue unopposed, God would bring His corporate sanctions against the nation as a whole. But it was this ritual abomination that was identified by God through Jeremiah as the representative evil in the land. Their crimes were comprehensive: "Because of all the evil of the children of Israel and of the children of Judah, which they have done to provoke me to anger, they, their kings, their princes, their priests, and their prophets, and the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem" (Jer. 32:32). Their worship of Molech was representative: "And they built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind, that they should do this abomination, to cause Judah to sin" (Jer. 32:35).

Molech required the shedding of innocent blood. The Israelites worshipped Molech as he required: "Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils, And shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan: and the land was polluted with blood" (Ps. 106: 37–38). "Moreover thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters, whom thou hast borne unto me, and these hast thou sacrificed unto them to be devoured. Is this of thy whoredoms a small matter, That thou hast slain my children, and delivered them to cause them to pass through the fire for them?” (Ezek.16:20–21). “That they have committed adultery, and blood is in their hands, and with their idols have they committed adultery, and have also caused their sons, whom they bare unto me, to pass for them through the fire, to devour them” (Ezek. 23:37). “Moreover he [King Ahaz] burnt incense in the valley of the son of Hinnom, and burnt his children in the fire, after the abominations of the heathen whom the LORD had cast out before the children of Israel” (II Chron. 28:3). This was not an occasional practice in Israel; it became a way of life through death.

This law raises at least five questions. First, exactly what did “giving one’s seed to Molech” involve? Was it a formal dedication service comparable to circumcision? Second, why did the ritual offering of a child defile the sanctuary of God? Why was this a uniquely profane act? Third, why was this forbidden to resident aliens? The specified negative sanction, death by stoning, if ignored by the judges, would be followed by God’s intervention against that family and all those who joined with that family. The law here says nothing about a threat to the Israelite community at large. Why, then, should resident aliens be prohibited from performing such a rite? Fourth, was this law a law governing false worship in general, or was it confined to Molech worship only? Fifth, does it still apply in New Covenant times? Was it a cross-boundary law? Let us consider each of these questions in greater detail, one by one.

I. Rites of Dedication

There is no question that some sort of cultic rite was involved in this crime. It was a formal, covenantal transgression of the first commandment: “Thou shalt have no other gods before me” (Ex. 20:3). The legal question is: Did this act become a crime only when committed outside of a household? No; it was a crime for an Israelite no matter where it took place. False worship within an Israelite household was a capital crime in Mosaic Israel.

If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers; Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee, or far off from thee, from the one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth; Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him: But thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people. And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die; because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. And all Israel shall hear, and fear, and shall do no more any such wickedness as this is among you (Deut. 13:6–11).

1. Proselytizing

This law against intra-family proselytizing did not apply to resident aliens, who were assumed by the law to worship in private the gods of their families or their nations. Proselytizing was not a crime within a household that had not formally covenanted to Jehovah. This anti-proselytizing law applied only to Israel's citizens and those eligible to become citizens.⁴ It was understood that anyone who was not formally covenanted through circumcision was probably not a worshipper of Jehovah. The resident alien was not allowed to seek converts to his god in Israel, but he was also not expected to enforce the worship of Jehovah within his own household.

A Israelite father might decide to allow such idolatrous proselytizing, but the state was required by God to step in and prosecute. The father's authority in his household had limits; it was not absolute. The family member who was subjected to the lure of false worship by another family member deserved protection. The terms of God's covenant had to be enforced. If they were not, the state stepped in to protect the victim or victims. The law governing false worship within an Israelite family reveals an important principle of the Mosaic law: the state was superior to the head of an Israelite household when it came to protecting the members of his family from the lure of false worship. In matters of correct worship, the citizen of Israel was under the protection of the State in Israel. The resident alien was not. What went on ritually inside the home of an Israelite was a matter of civil law. This was not true of the resident alien's home, unless the ritual threatened the life of the child. In short, an Israelite's home may have been his castle; it was not his private sanctuary.

4. This includes families that would not be eligible until the tenth generation (Deut. 23:2–3).

2. False Worship Generally

The law governing family worship was a defining law: it represented all false worship by those formally covenanted to God. This can be seen in the application of another law governing false worship:

If there be found among you, within any of thy gates which the LORD thy God giveth thee, man or woman, that hath wrought wickedness in the sight of the LORD thy God, in transgressing his covenant, And hath gone and served other gods, and worshipped them, either the sun, or moon, or any of the host of heaven, which I have not commanded; And it be told thee, and thou hast heard of it, and enquired diligently, and, behold, it be true, and the thing certain, that such abomination is wrought in Israel: Then shalt thou bring forth that man or that woman, which have committed that wicked thing, unto thy gates, even that man or that woman, and shalt stone them with stones, till they die. At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall he that is worthy of death be put to death; but at the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death. The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hands of all the people. So thou shalt put the evil away from among you (Deut. 17:2–7).

The phrase, “hath gone and served other gods, and worshipped them, either the sun, or moon, or any of the host of heaven,” indicates that the transgressor was an Israelite. The stranger within the gate was assumed to be a worshipper of false gods within his own household. He did not go to serve them; he came serving them. What was explicitly forbidden was the breaking of God’s covenant through false worship by an Israelite.

3. The Theology of Circumcision

In all worship, man must make a sacrifice. In biblical worship, the sacrifice is total: the whole of one’s life. “And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might” (Deut. 6:5).⁵ This comprehensive sacrifice is personal, not institutional. Ritual sacrifices are limited by God's law.⁶ The demand for total sacrifice is based on fear. Men must fear this God: "And now, Israel, what doth the LORD thy God require of thee, but to fear the LORD thy God, to walk in all his ways, and to love him, and to serve the LORD thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul" (Deut. 10: 12). Men must also obey Him: "Therefore thou shalt love the LORD thy God, and keep his charge, and his statutes, and his judgments, and his commandments, alway" (Deut. 11:1).

5. Any commitment other than the commitment to God is the demand of a false religion. This is why Communism was a messianic false religion. It was a school of darkness, to cite the title of ex-Communist Bella V. Dodd’s 1954 autobiography. It demanded the whole of their lives, to cite the title of ex-Communist Benjamin Gitlow’s 1948 autobiography. It was ultimately the God that failed, to cite the title of Richard Crossman’s 1949 collection of autobiographies by ex-Communists.

How is the mandatory fear of God connected to this law? Because obedience brings descendants: "In that I command thee this day to love the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments and his statutes and his judgments, that thou mayest live and multiply: and the LORD thy God shall bless thee in the land whither thou goest to possess it" (Deut. 30:16). The covenantal blessings of God extend to the thousandth generation: "Know therefore that the LORD thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations" (Deut. 7:9). Here was the spiritual meaning of covenantal rite of circumcision: "And the LORD thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live" (Deut. 30:6).

As a sign of the parents' obedience to God, they marred their male heirs physically. The mark of circumcision was placed on the male heir's organ of reproduction. It was a symbol of covenantal death: anti-generation. Circumcision announced ritually that there can be no legitimate covenantal hope in the future based on mere physical generation.⁷ What is needed is spiritual regeneration: the circumcision of the 6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, [1990] 2012), ch. 56. See Exodus 25:3–8; 36:5–7.

7. The Greeks and Romans placed their personal hope for their future beyond death in the maintenance of family rituals down through time. The eldest son was the priest of these family rituals. He had to administer them properly in order to sustain peace for his departed ancestors. The family was therefore central to religious life in the classical world. Private family law existed prior to the city and its laws. This is why fathers had the legal authority to kill their sons. See Numa Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Book I, chaps. IV, VIII. Fustel wrote: "For when these ancient generations began to picture a future life to themselves, they had not dreamed of rewards and punishments; they imagined that the happiness of the dead depended not upon the life led in this state of existence, but upon the way in which their descendants treated them. Every father, therefore, expected of his posterity that series of funeral repasts which was to assure to his manes [sur-heart. The organ of generation was physically cut as a testimony to the need for the heart to be cut by God Himself:

Behold, the days come, saith the LORD, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah: Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which my covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the LORD: But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; After those days, saith the LORD, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people (Jer. 31:31–33).

Just as God had written the Ten Commandments on tablets of stone, so would He write His law in the hearts of His people. This is the meaning of the circumcision of the heart. Such circumcision is intended to produce obedience.

4. The Theology of Testing by Fire

Molech's required ritual was a perverse imitation of Jehovah's. Instead of physically marring the organ of generation as a symbol of physical death but also covenantal life, the child was actually passed through a literal fire. The child who survived this ordeal was therefore assumed to be blessed covenantally by Molech. He had passed the deadly initiation rite by means of supernatural intervention. This ritual was covenantal, but rather than being ethical in its focus, it was magical. Its mark of supernatural power was the survival of the child.⁸ If the child died, the parents had to regard this as the god's required sacrifice. Thus, the idea of covenantal inheritance in Molech worship was magical rather than ethical. Molech religion was the archetype of power religion.

In both dominion religion and power religion, the seed is central to the rites of initiation. The seed represents the future. The seed is the means of expansion. If there is no growth, there can be no expansion. If the seed does not grow, or does not reproduce itself, the covenantal viving spirit] repose and happiness" (I:3; p. 49).

8. In modern times, the peculiar practice of fire-walking has again become a popular initiatory rite, this time among business executives. Certain management training programs end with the participants' walking over hot coals as a sign of their confidence in themselves and their new-found ability to manage other people through techniques of power. The fire-walkers never attempt to walk on sheet metal placed on top of the hot coals; metal is a very efficient heat transmitter.

future is cut off. In biblical religion, children are seen as children of God ethically. He who obeys God's law is the true son of God. In power religion, children are seen as children of god ritually. He who observes the details of the rites is the true son of the god. Such a view is antithetical to biblical religion:

Wherewith shall I come before the LORD, and bow myself before the high God? shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God? (Micah 6:6–8).

To remove the child from the covenantal authority of Molech-worshipping parents, the state was required by God to execute the parents. A child who survived this rite of fire would become an orphan when the mandatory civil sanction attached to this law was applied by the civil magistrate. God's law made it clear: better to become an orphan and live under the authority of covenantally faithful foster parents than to live under the authority of Molech-worshipping parents. The family's inheritance was immediately transferred to the child or children (if there were older siblings) for this sin by the parents. This transfer was a positive side-effect of this statute; it was not a specified goal of the law. This means that the covenantal authority of the parents was never absolute in the Mosaic economy. The parents were to be disinherited by execution because of their false theology of inheritance, ritually manifested in strange fire. The Israelite family was not autonomous. The father's authority was bounded.

II. Strange Fire: Defiling the Sanctuary

A murder in Israel defiled the land, which is why God required certain rites of purification in cases where the murderer could not be located (Deut. 21:1–9). But a murder committed outside God's sanctuary did not defile the sanctuary. The question arises: Why did this ritual offering of a child defile God's sanctuary? The act took place away from the sanctuary. Why was this a uniquely profane act?

There are at least two reasons. First, because this form of ritual murder, or potential ritual murder, involved the use of a fiery altar, meaning a rival to God's altar. Second, because it was an assault on the Seed, meaning the prophesied future Messiah.

1. The Altar

From Adam's transgression onward, sin threatened mankind's survival. The very survival of Adam in history testified to God's grace to Adam, and it also testified to a future sacrifice that would atone for what Adam had done. Without such lawful sacrifice, there is only death for the transgressor.

The altar is an instrument of sacrifice. Men bring their sacrifices to the altar. It need not be an animal sacrifice. Jesus warned: "Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee; Leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift" (Matt. 5:23–24).⁹

The worshipper offers something to God that he does not expect to get back. This act of forfeiture is a testimony that God is sovereign. The worshipper may expect some sort of return in the future, but not the actual item he brings to the altar. He acts in faith: the God of the altar is sovereign and will reward him, in time and/or eternity, or will not bring negative sanctions against him.

On God's Old Covenant altars was fire. This fire was a consuming fire. It testified to God's sanctions. A slain animal sacrificed to God on that fire became a substitute for the giver. The man who offered this sacrifice acknowledged that he deserved such fire. God's fire is ethical: it is deserved because of the individual's transgression of covenant law. If there is no substitutionary sacrifice, the transgressing individual faces God's fire. To survive, the individual must bring a sacrifice.

The fire on the temple's altar was to be perpetual, i.e., as perpetual as the Mosaic Covenant itself: "The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out" (Lev. 6:13). Day and night, God's flame was to burn. Day and night, God offers men a way to burn away their sins ritually. The perpetual nature of the flame pointed to the permanence of both God's grace and His final negative sanctions. Those who refuse to submit to God in history become in death the sentient sacrifices on God's perpetual altar: "For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt" (Mark 9:49). The judicial alternatives are clear: either sacrifice lawfully in history or be lawfully sacrificed in eternity. Put more bluntly: roast or be roasted. When Israel rebelled for the last time, God brought the Roman army as His agent of judgment, which set fire to the temple.¹⁰ This ended the Old Covenant order forever. (This is why Judaism, which was developed by the Pharisees after the destruction of the temple,¹¹ is not and never was the religion of the Old Covenant.¹²)

9. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 7.

The law warned the priests: "They shall be holy unto their God, and not profane the name of their God: for the offerings of the LORD made by fire, and the bread of their God, they do offer: therefore they shall be holy" (Lev. 21:6). When the sons of Aaron deviated from the prescribed ritual, God set them on fire (Lev. 9:24–10:3). There could be no deviation from the required procedure without God's express permission. The reason for this was not magical. It was not the procedure that was sacrosanct. Holiness was sacrosanct: God's and the priest's. God had placed a series of boundaries around His presence in the holy of holies because to be in His presence required that the sacrifice-offerer be holy. To offer sacrifices in any way different from what

10. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

11. Jacob Z. Lauterbach, "The Sadducees and Pharisees" (1913); reprinted in Lauterbach, Rabbinic Essays (Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1951); J. H. Hertz, "Foreword," The Babylonian Talmud, Seder Nezikin (London: Soncino Press, 1935), p. xiv. The standard Jewish work on the Pharisees is Rabbi Louis Finkelstein's study, The Pharisees: The Sociological Background of Their Faith, 2 vols., 3rd ed. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1962).

12. This was openly acknowledged by Jewish scholar Jacob Neusner, the author of 43 volumes of commentaries on the Mishnah, the Pharisees' post-temple text regarded as sacred by Orthodox Jews. Neusner wrote: "While the world at large treats Judaism as 'the religion of the Old Testament,' the fact is otherwise. Judaism inherits and makes the Hebrew Scriptures its own, just as does Christianity. But just as Christianity rereads the entire heritage of ancient Israel in light of 'the resurrection of Jesus Christ,' so Judaism understands the Hebrew Scriptures as only one part, the written one, of 'the one whole Torah of Moses, our rabbi.' Ancient Israel no more testified to the oral Torah, now written down in the Mishnah and later rabbinic writings, than it did to Jesus as the Christ. In both cases, religious circles within Israel of later antiquity reread the entire past in light of their own conscience and convictions. Accordingly, while the framers of Judaism as we know it received as divinely revealed ancient Israel's literary heritage, they picked and chose as they wished whatever would serve the purposes of the larger system they undertook to build. Since the Judaism at hand first reached literary expression in the Mishnah, a document in which Scripture plays a subordinate role, the founders of that Judaism clearly made no pretense at tying up to scriptural proof texts or at expressing in the form of scriptural commentary the main ideas they wished to set out. Accordingly, Judaism only asymmetrically rests upon the foundations of the Hebrew Scriptures, and Judaism is not alone or mainly 'the religion of the Old Testament.'" Jacob Neusner, Judaism and Scripture: The Evidence of Leviticus Rabbah (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986), p. xi.

God required was an assertion of man's autonomy. It was a public denial of both the absolute sovereignty of God and the absolute holiness of God.

The fire of the altar was a means of both purification and destruction. Fire was representative of the final judgment. A living being was not allowed on the altar. The sacrificial animals had to be slain away from the altar before they were placed on the altar. Biblical worship is always representative. Redeemed man does not die for his own sins; someone else must die for his sins. Biblical worship in the Old Covenant era made it clear that the sacrifice is representative: the altar's fire consumed that which was already dead. This is the spiritual condition of fallen man as he approaches the altar: living death. To place a living thing on the altar is an illegitimate sacrifice. It testifies to a different condition of man. Only one living sacrifice ever possessed true life: Jesus Christ. His perfect sacrifice was legitimate for the symbolic altar of the cross, for only He did not approach the altar as a spiritually dead man.

The offer of one's child to any god was an act of moral rebellion. To make a child pass through a literal fire as a rite of initiation was the non-priest's equivalent of offering strange fire: an unauthorized sacrifice. Thus, it was a profane act.¹³ It violated God's judicial boundary around His name. It violated the exclusiveness of God's sanctuary by establishing a rival sanctuary within the land. This was the worst possible boundary violation for any non-priest under the Mosaic Covenant. (The worst for the priest was offering strange fire on the altar.) God threatened to intervene directly with His fire in response. The non-priest had no access to the temple's altar; thus, he offered his sacrifices with strange fire away from the temple. The civil penalty was death by stoning.

2. Cutting Off the Future

The second reason why this crime was so perverse an act was that it placed the future of the seed in the hands of demonic forces. The child would either die in the flames or be initiated into the service of a false god. This was a perverse imitation of the biblical covenantal process of inheritance/disinheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.¹⁴ Those who would inherit were those who had been protected from the flames by occult forces: a protective boundary.

13. Acts are profane: sacred boundary violations. Things or places can be profaned by profane acts; they are never inherently profane. Only sacramental places can be profaned. Common places cannot be profaned. See Chapter 6.

If the death penalty had been confined to Israelites, this seed law could be subsumed under the laws governing the coming of the promised seed. But this law prohibited resident aliens from participating in Molech's initiatory rites. Why? First, because of the degree of violation of God's sanctuary. Second, because human life was protected in Israel. Third, because of the possibility of adoption. Through adoption, a resident alien could become part of the covenant line, as both Rahab and Ruth did (Matt. 1:5). This offer to the resident alien of full participation through adoption into the three institutional covenants—ecclesiastical, familial, and civil—was unique to Israel in the ancient Near East. This was a sign of God's grace. The lives of alien children had to be preserved for the sake of the opportunity of conversion and adoption.

Residents from Ammon and Moab had the most rigorous restriction placed on this participation: 10 generations (Deut. 23:3). Technically, this was probably because of their origins: born of incestuous unions between Lot and his daughters (Gen. 19:37–38). The bastard could not enter the congregation (i.e., attain citizenship) until the tenth generation (Deut. 23:2). But another reason for the prohibition may have been that Molech and Chemosh were the gods, respectively, of Ammon and Moab. This fire god was the great rival to God and His altar. The resident alien from Ammon or Moab was more unwelcome in Israel than any other nationality, and the mark of this alienation was the mandatory waiting period of nine generations. To break covenant with Molech and Chemosh took nine consecutive generations, plus a formal break, presumably no younger than age 20 (Ex. 30:14), of the tenth-generation heir.

III. Resident Aliens and Biblical Pluralism

This law specified that a stranger in the land was to be executed by the citizens of Israel if he was caught performing a specific rite of Molech worship: giving his seed to Molech. The reason why strangers were under this law is stated clearly in the statute: such an act defiles God's sanctuary and profanes His holy name. No one inside the boundaries of Israel was allowed to do this. But God regarded household false worship by resident aliens as peripheral to the national covenant. Only when the stranger ritually threatened the survival of his own child did he defile God's sanctuary. The judicial foundation of the rights of resident aliens—their immunity from state sanctions—was the possibility that they or their children might covenant with God. Justice in Israel was a major form of evangelism, both inside and outside the land (Deut. 4:4–8).¹⁵ Allowing aliens to see God's law in action was a way to persuade them of the righteousness of God. Israel's system of civil justice was unique in the ancient world: a single legal order for all residents.¹⁶

14. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

Today, we call such a judicial system pluralistic, but biblical pluralism has limits. All pluralism has limits. Pluralism can never be unbounded; someone's religious principles or practices will always be threatened by one or another aspect of any society's legal order. The resident of Israel could not lawfully claim religious freedom as authorization for exposing his children to the risk of death, even though his god required such a rite. The ideal of biblical pluralism extended to the resident alien the right to worship family gods in peace within the boundaries of their homes, but it did not authorize heads of households the right of literally sacrificing their children. The seal of a household's religion could not lawfully be death or the risk of death. The household in Israel was a limited sanctuary: a place set aside, protected judicially from outside interference from the state. There was a boundary on state power. But passing a child through Molech's fire was regarded by God as strange fire: a transgression of His sanctuary's monopoly. There was no right—no legal immunity from the sanctions of civil government—for anyone to light a strange fire in Israel: a ritual fire that literally invoked death as a means of sanctioning a covenant.

IV. The Limits of Biblical Pluralism

The state was required to intervene and execute any Israelite who could be proven to have attempted to lure one of his family members into a rival covenant (Deut. 13:6–11). “And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die; because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage” (v. 10). The general crime was false worship, but the specific reason given was God's deliverance of the Israelites out of Egypt. This clearly had nothing to do with resident aliens. False household worship was not generally a crime for resident aliens, who were not expected to adopt true religion.

15. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

16. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 14.

Specifically, false worship was a crime if they participated in a ritual offering of a child to Molech. Even if the child survived the ordeal, the parent or parents were to be executed. The crime was not murder or attempted murder; it was the profanation of God's boundary: the altar of sacrifice. The attempted sacrifice of a child on such an altar was a capital crime. It was this crime that God specified through Jeremiah as the crime of Israel and Judah, leading to their captivity in Babylon. This was the abomination that God would not tolerate when His covenant people did tolerate it (Jer. 32:35).

1. Negative Sanctions

The modern Christian defender of religious pluralism would recommend civil sanctions against such a practice on some legal basis other than the profanation of God's sanctuary. If the child died, the law of murder can be invoked. If the child survived, the law of attempted murder can be invoked. But in no Western society is the penalty for attempted murder execution.¹⁷ This creates a problem for the Christian pluralist. If he defends the imposition of a civil sanction in cases where the child survives, he cannot do so explicitly on the basis of biblical law. In any case, he cannot do so explicitly on the basis of this law.

A defender of biblical law could argue that this law is annulled under the New Covenant because the seed laws have been annulled. Or he could argue that the unique status of God's temple sanctuary ended when the land lost its status as judicially holy at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. But there remains this problem: the holiness of God's name. The justification for this law was not merely that this Molech initiation rite defiled God's sanctuary; it also profaned His holy name (Lev. 20:3). Nothing in the New Covenant has removed the boundary of holiness from God's name. The question is: How serious is God in the New

17. As a high-handed sin, it should be a capital crime, if the prosecution can prove that the accused did attempt it. But because the victim is still alive, he has the right to declare mercy or demand a lesser penalty, such as the payment of a fine. The reason why murder is always a capital crime is that the victim is not alive, and hence cannot extend mercy to the criminal. The state must impose the maximum penalty. North, Tools of Dominion, pp. 306, 308.

Covenant about defending His name? This leads to another question: Is the defense of God's name legitimately part of a Christian civil government's code? Finally, what would be a New Testament justification for God's lack of interest in defending His name?

2. The First Table of the Law

There are Christian pluralists who deny that the so-called First Table of the Law is to be enforced by the civil government in the New Covenant era.¹⁸ If taken literally, this assertion would include the law to honor parents: the fifth commandment (part of the so-called First Table). Children could not be compelled by the civil government to care for their aged and infirm parents. This conclusion has been taken seriously by defenders of the modern welfare state. In the United States, compulsory, tax-financed Social Security and Medicare payments have replaced children as the sources of mandatory support of the elderly. Children in my era have welcomed this economic and judicial release from personal responsibility, despite the ever-increasing tax burden involved.¹⁹ But I have never seen any Christian social theorist proclaim the legitimacy of compulsory Social Security as a complete substitute for the responsibility of children. I conclude that what Christian pluralists probably mean by their denial of civil sanctions to enforce the First Table is this: the first four commandments of the Decalogue are no longer legitimately enforceable by the state. The term "First Table of the Law" is shorthand for "the first four commandments" (or first three for Lutherans).

For a Christian to argue this position—the negation of civil sanctions for commandments one through four—he must appeal to natural law and natural revelation, meaning revelation neither secured by nor interpreted by God's Bible-revealed law. Bahnsen challenged this interpretation of natural revelation:

... natural revelation includes the moral obligations contained in the first table of the decalogue (our duty toward God), just as much as it contains those of the second table. Paul taught that natural revelation condemned the pagan world for failing to glorify God properly and for idolatrously worshiping and serving the creature instead (Rom. 1:21, 23, 25). . . . The fact is that all of the Mosaic laws (in their moral demands) are reflected in general revelation; to put it another way, the moral obligations communicated through both means of divine communication are identical (Rom. 1:18–21, 25, 32; 2:14–15; 3:9, 19–20, 23). Scripture never suggests that God has two sets of ethical standards or two moral codes, the one (for Gentiles) being an abridgement of the other (for Jews). Rather, He has one set of commandments which are communicated to men in two ways: through Scripture and through nature (Ps. 19; cf. vv. 2–3 with 8–9).²⁰

18. For a refutation, see Greg L. Bahnsen, No Other Standard: Theonomy and Its Critics (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), pp. 202–5. (<http://bit.ly/gbnos>)

19. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 25.

The two forms of God's revelation, special (written) and general (natural), are not in conflict with each other. When the Bible specifies a penalty, this is not in conflict with natural revelation. Written revelation makes clear today what was originally clear in natural revelation. This lack of clarity in natural revelation today is the product of two factors: the noetic effects of man's rebellion and the physical effects of God's curse on nature. Written revelation is superior to natural revelation because it is clearer and more precise. The biblical principle of textual interpretation is this: the clear passage is to interpret the less clear. This is also the biblical principle of judicial interpretation. Written revelation is authoritative.

The theonomist insists that the Bible's revelation is authoritative over general revelation. The Christian pluralist insists that general revelation, as interpreted by the covenant-breaker, is authoritative over special revelation. There is no way to reconcile these rival principles of interpretation. Unlike general and special revelation, these two hermeneutic approaches are mutually exclusive.

3. Christian Pluralism's Hermeneutic

Hermeneutics is an inescapable concept. Everyone must have a principle of interpretation. The Christian pluralist insists, implicitly if not explicitly, that whatever is more generally believed or understood possesses authority over that which is less universally believed or understood. That is to say, the Christian pluralist is a defender of the methodology of democracy in hermeneutics as well as politics. The Christian pluralist, siding with covenant-breakers, who in my era vastly outnumber covenant-keepers, refuses to acknowledge that natural revelation conveys the moral principles of the first five commandments of the Decalogue. He argues instead that these commandments are unclear in, or even absent from, natural revelation. Thus, he concludes, special revelation is less universal than general revelation, and hence subordinate and secondary to general revelation. The Christian pluralist regards the Bible's judicial principles of interpretation as subordinate to the judicial interpretations of covenant-breaking natural men. For purposes of public relations within the Christian community, he does not state his position in this way, but this is his position nonetheless.

20. Bahnsen, No Other Standard, p. 206.

The Christian pluralist is inescapably an ethical dualist. He believes in the existence of two sets of valid moral standards, as well as two sets of valid civil laws. He says that the biblical set of laws was valid only for the nation of Israel during the Mosaic economy, while natural law is valid for every other society and every other time period. He always favors the adoption of the covenant-breaker's interpretation of the supposedly religiously neutral, "natural" civil law-order. Whatever the covenant-breaker claims to have intuited from natural revelation is what the Christian pluralist says the content of natural revelation must be: natural revelation as seen with covenant-breaking eyes. The pluralist refuses to allow Spirit-renewed Christians to use the Bible to modify the judicial content of natural revelation as understood by pagans; only other pagans are allowed to make these modifications. Aristotle is allowed to challenge Plato's communism, but Moses is not.²¹ Aristotle's word carries weight for the Christian pluralist; the Mosaic law does not. In short, natural revelation regarding the so-called First Table of the Law is understood by the Christian pluralist as having been provided by God in order to enable the New Testament-era covenant-breaker to move the covenant-keeper away from the Bible in matters judicial.²²

21. I have noticed that whenever scholars discuss the communism of the Socratic dialogues, Plato gets the blame. Western scholars prefer not to consider the possibility that the "divine Socrates" was a communist. But it matters little whether we begin with Socrates, Plato, or Aristotle; we wind up with statism: salvation through political participation. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>). On the tyrannical implications of both Platonic philosophy and Aristotelian philosophy—culminating in Hegelianism—see Karl R. Popper, The Open Society and Its Enemies, 2 vols., 4th ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1963).

22. Fundamentalist Christians who see the threat in the area of geology and biology, or even psychology, nevertheless give away the case when it comes to civil law. They reject Darwin and Freud, but they accept John Locke and James Madison. In this, they agree with Leonard Levy, who begins his book Blasphemy with a citation from Madison. Levy, Blasphemy: Verbal Offense Against the Sacred, from Moses to Salman Rushdie (New York: Knopf, 1993), p. ix. The same citation appears on page xii of his earlier book, Treason Against God: A History of the Offense of Blasphemy (New York:

4. Blasphemy

This law is part of the laws against blasphemy. But there is no operational concept of biblical blasphemy in the worldview of the Christian pluralist. The distinguished historian of law, Leonard W. Levy, has titled his study of the history of blasphemy laws in the West, Treason Against God. This is exactly what blasphemy is. As Rushdoony wrote in his discussion of the Moloch State: "Because for Biblical law the foundation is the one true God, the central offense is therefore treason to that God by idolatry. Every law-order has its concept of treason. No law-order can permit an attack on its foundations without committing suicide. Those states which claim to abolish the death penalty still retain it on the whole for crimes against the state. The foundations of a law-order must be protected."²³

The Christian pluralist is embarrassed by these biblical concepts of civil law and blasphemy. There can be no public treason against the God of the Bible in the theoretical world of the Christian pluralist, for treason implies the necessity of negative civil sanctions, and the pluralist denies the legitimacy of such sanctions in questions of religion. The Christian pluralist allows the protection of God's name only as a by-product of civil laws that protect the names of all other gods: religion in general. This definition of blasphemy is inherently humanistic: public protection for every man's concept of god. The most dangerous form of blasphemy in the mind of the Christian pluralist is biblical theocracy: the denial of the public sovereignty of any God other than the biblical God. There are as many gods to be politically protected as men choose to defend, the pluralist insists.

Consider the argument against public blasphemy presented by Christian pluralist Gordon Spykman: "I would not allow public blasphemy because it offends other people."²⁴ That blasphemy offends God is politically irrelevant to such an outlook; its offense in Spykman's view is that it offends other people. This places fallen man at the center of judicial analysis. Harold O. J. Brown echoed Spykman: "Public blasphemy as well as false swearing should also be punishable by law. It would be logical to accord protection from insults to all religious Schocken, 1981).

23. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 38.

24. Spykman, "Questions and Answers," in God and Politics: Four Views on the Reformation of Government, ed. Gary Scott Smith (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1989), p. 274.

groups, forbidding the mockery of things that people hold sacred.”²⁵ Then what would Brown say about Elijah’s comments at Mt. Carmel concerning the god of the court priests? “And they took the bullock which was given them, and they dressed it, and called on the name of Baal from morning even until noon, saying, O Baal, hear us. But there was no voice, nor any that answered. And they leaped upon the altar which was made. And it came to pass at noon, that Elijah mocked them, and said, Cry aloud: for he is a god; either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked” (I Kings 18:26–27). Could Elijah legitimately have been arrested by King Ahab at that point for having committed a verbal assault on the religious sensibilities of the priests? Was Elijah a blasphemer? Was he deserving of death? By whose standard?

What of Elijah’s subsequent actions? “And Elijah said unto them, Take the prophets of Baal; let not one of them escape. And they took them: and Elijah brought them down to the brook Kishon, and slew them there” (I Kings 18:40). Was Elijah the organizer of a mob? A conspirator in mass murder? A revolutionary? At the very least, was he an ecologically insensitive polluter? By whose standard?

What of King Josiah? “And he did that which was right in the sight of the LORD, and walked in all the way of David his father, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left” (II Kings 22:2). He was the most faithful king in Israel’s history. “And like unto him was there no king before him, that turned to the LORD with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his might, according to all the law of Moses; neither after him arose there any like him” (II Kings 23:25). What did he do? “And all the houses also of the high places that were in the cities of Samaria, which the kings of Israel had made to provoke the LORD to anger, Josiah took away, and did to them according to all the acts that he had done in Bethel. And he slew all the priests of the high places that were there upon the altars, and burned men’s bones upon them, and returned to Jerusalem” (II Kings 23:19–20).²⁶ Another polluter, this time of air!

Elijah, the great prophet of direct confrontation, and Josiah, the most faithful king, provide serious problems for Christian pluralists, who need a biblical principle of judicial discontinuity to defend their

25. Harold O. J. Brown, “The Christian America Position,” ibid., p. 141.

26. Also worth noting: “And he brake down the houses of the sodomites, that were by the house of the LORD, where the women wove hangings for the grove” (II Kings 23:7).

pluralism. Pluralists assume what they need to prove, namely, a biblical basis of this judicial discontinuity. Their failure to provide a biblically derived justification for this presumed judicial discontinuity has led them to redefine blasphemy in such a way that Elijah and Josiah have become blasphemers in retrospect. They have failed to understand that a common-ground definition of blasphemy—"a public assault on any god"—has placed them in the camp of the Roman emperors, who had a similar view of the sacrosanct position of the politically correct gods of the Roman pantheon. Their problem should be obvious: blasphemy is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of "blasphemy vs. no blasphemy." It is always a question of "blasphemy against which god?"

The text is clear: offering one's child to the fire god Molech was a capital crime. The justification for the law is equally clear: to uphold the sanctity of God's sanctuary and His name. Here was a crime: subjecting a child to an initiatory rite that was life-threatening. By participating in a system of inheritance and disinheritance that relied upon demonic powers to determine the survivors of the ordeal, the covenant-breaker committed a boundary violation so heinous that God required his execution by public stoning. The resident alien was subject to this law. In short, the God of Mosaic Israel was not a pluralist. This is why the Mosaic law is a profound embarrassment for the Christian pluralist.

V. Is This Law Still in Force?

What principle of interpretation would lead us to conclude that this law is not still in force? The Bible-affirming expositor who claims that there is a total judicial discontinuity between the two covenants with respect to this law needs to identify the biblical basis of this alleged discontinuity.

The covenantal principle of inheritance teaches that the heirs of covenant-keepers will inherit the earth progressively over time. "His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth" (Ps. 25: 13). This is clearly one aspect of the seed laws, which were all fulfilled in Christ. Covenant-breakers are progressively disinherited. "For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth" (Ps. 37:9). The practice of Molech initiation reverses this principle of inheritance: infanticide, either physical or covenantal. It is therefore an abomination before God.

To the extent that the initiatory practice relies on demonic intervention to protect the child, this ritual will kill off more and more children as the demonic realm becomes weaker. When demons can protect no child from the fire, the participants will disinherit themselves. Presumably, this will reduce the number of participants over time. Also, the death of a child would subject the parent(s) and any cooperating priests to the civil law against murder. So, we would not expect to find large numbers of participants in such a religion. But the question still remains: What is the valid civil sanction against a participant whose child survives intact? If the rite really did threaten the survival of the child, what is the appropriate civil sanction?

Biblically, the answer is obvious: public execution by stoning. How much clearer could God's law be? But God's word is not taken seriously in this matter. Its very clarity constitutes an embarrassment for those who call themselves Christians. They would much prefer a bit of vagueness. Despite these preferences, the profaning of God's holy name is still the judicial issue: a special profaning far worse than mere verbal profanity. The issue is blasphemy and its appropriate civil sanction.

C. Citizenship and Separation

Then what of religious toleration? This raises the question of the existence of civil laws that are in no way religiously intolerant—religiously neutral laws. Such laws are not even conceptually possible, let alone practical. But if this is the case, then what happens to the concept of citizenship?

Citizenship is inherently covenantal.²⁷ The citizen acknowledges the legitimacy of a sovereign, subordinates himself to the agents of that sovereign, agrees to obey the laws of that sovereign, swears allegiance to that sovereign, and inherits in terms of that sovereign. The Israelites were told by God that the Canaanites could not lawfully occupy the land even as resident aliens. There could be no lawful toleration of Canaanites within the land, for this would have meant toleration of the previous regional gods of the land. Only aliens from outside the land were to be allowed to dwell in the land. They could not become citizens except by becoming Israelites: through circumcision.

27. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 12.

1. The Gods of the Land

This was a prohibition against Canaanitic gods, not the gods of immigrants. Why the distinction? Because of pagan theology in the ancient world. Except in Israel, a god in the ancient world was regarded either as a household god or the god of a particular nation.²⁸ There was always a danger that the Israelites would succumb to this false theology; thus, the gods of Canaan were to be destroyed, along with their representatives (once). Immigrants' gods were clearly regarded by their adherents as household gods, not gods of the land. Immigrants had left their respective homelands. They had to view their idols as possessing power only within the boundaries of the household. Immigrants were welcome in Israel, but the price of immigration was the forfeiture of the right to proselytize among the Israelites. The household gods of immigrants could not lawfully leave their households. They could not become public gods in Israel. That is, they could not lawfully take on the status of national gods. There was to be no public polytheism in Israel, political or otherwise.

2. The God Who Imposes Boundaries

Rushdoony's discussion of laws of separation is correct: "God identifies Himself as the God who separates His people from other peoples: this is a basic part of salvation. The religious and moral separation of the believer is thus a basic aspect of Biblical law."²⁹ Separation can be achieved in several ways, however. First, the believer can join other believers in a religious ghetto. This ghetto can be geographical, as in the case of certain Amish and Mennonite sects. It can be cultural, as in the case of much of modern fundamentalism and immigrant religious groups. It is always psychological, what Rushdoony has called the permanent remnant psychology.³⁰ Second, the believer can seek the physical removal of unbelievers from the community, either through execution or expulsion. This physical removal of covenant-breakers was God's required method with respect to the Canaanites.

28. We can see this false theology of local divinities in the disastrous analysis of Ben-hadad's advisors: "And the servants of the king of Syria said unto him, Their gods are gods of the hills; therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they" (I Kings 20:23). "And there came a man of God, and spake unto the king of Israel, and said, Thus saith the LORD, Because the Syrians have said, The LORD is God of the hills, but he is not God of the valleys, therefore will I deliver all this great multitude into thine hand, and ye shall know that I am the LORD" (I Kings 20:28).

29. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 294.

30. R. J. Rushdoony, Van Til (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1960), p.

The problem here is honoring the biblical judicial concept of "the stranger within the gates": preserving liberty of conscience without opening the social order to a new law-order, which means a new god. The radical Anabaptists in Münster in 1533–35 and the Puritans in New England, 1630–65,³¹ made the mistake of exiling residents for their failure to adhere to the community's religious and ecclesiastical confession. This practice denied the biblical legal status of the resident alien. Third, separation can be achieved covenantally: the removal of unbelievers from citizenship. This is what the New Testament mandates for covenant-keeping nations.

D. Intolerance: An Inescapable Concept

Political pluralism suggests a fourth path: ecclesiastical separation, partial cultural and intellectual separation,³² and civil cooperation. This requires a concept of a legitimate civil law-order that is formally independent from the revealed civil law-order in the Bible. Political pluralism requires the adoption of some version of natural law theory, either explicitly or implicitly.³³ This is a form of philosophical dualism: one law for God's covenant people as isolated (segregated) from the general culture, and another system of civil law for the judicially integrated community.

1. Rushdoony on Pluralism

Rushdoony in 1973 denied the biblical legitimacy of pluralism's de-

31. A 1662 letter from Charles II to Massachusetts established liberty of conscience. It was not read in the Massachusetts General Court until 1665. In that year, the General Court repealed all laws that limited the vote to Congregational church members. The Court determined that citizens in the colony henceforth did have to be "orthodox in religion" and "not vicious in conversation," but they could be "of different persuasions concerning church government. . . ." Cited in Kai T. Erikson, Wayward Puritans: A Study in the Sociology of Deviance (New York: Wiley, 1966), p. 135.

32. Though not much: consider, for example, that virtually all American neo-evangelical colleges and seminaries willingly subordinate themselves to humanistic accreditation associations, humanistic professional associations, and so forth. There is no question who is in charge and who is subordinate in these relationships. On the lack of separation, see James Davison Hunter, Evangelicalism: The Coming Generation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987).

33. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

fense of toleration; a decade later, he reversed his position.³⁴ He wrote in the Institutes: “Segregation or separation is thus a basic principle to religion and morality. Every attempt to destroy this principle is an effort to reduce society to its lowest common denominator. Toleration is the excuse under which this levelling is undertaken, but the concept of toleration conceals a radical intolerance. In the name of toleration, the believer is asked to associate on a common level of total acceptance with the atheist, the pervert, the criminal, and the adherents of other religions as though no differences existed.”³⁵

His statement is accurate, but it misses the main point. It is not separation with respect to private associations that is central to biblical covenantalism; rather, it is the segregation of the franchise. The non-Christian wants access to the franchise, i.e., to citizenship: the authority to participate in the defining and enforcing of civil law through the application of sanctions. Once he gains this, he moves to the state enforcement of integration of private associations. Having gained for himself legal toleration in the sharing of citizenship, he moves on to compulsory integration. He makes toleration mandatory: the denial of others’ right to separate themselves from the humanist agenda. In short, there is no neutrality. The ideal of universal tolerance is a myth; it is always a question of whose views get tolerated, whose do not, and on what terms.

There can and must be mutual toleration in history, God has announced, but the rival definitions of what constitutes toleration are irreconcilable. Toleration always means: “Toleration of my system’s definition of toleration.” Rival definitions of sovereignty cannot be reconciled. God’s Bible-revealed law establishes that covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers cannot lawfully join in a covenantal civil bond;

34. Ibid., Appendix B: “Rushdoony on the Constitution.” It is worth noting that Rushdoony after 1973 progressively emphasized his view of the continuing New Testament authority of the Mosaic dietary laws, which was the same period in which he progressively abandoned his earlier views on the original, orthodox American ecclesiastical tradition as theocratic, anti-revivalist, anti-pluralist, and anti-independency. On the shift, 1964–1979, in his views on the American ecclesiastical tradition, see Gary North, Westminster’s Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til’s Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), p. 80n. (<http://bit.ly/gnwc>). A separate diet, rather than participation in the Lord’s Supper, became the basis of his personal segregation, not only from pagan culture but also from local church membership. In 1992, he declared the Chalcedon Foundation a church and began celebrating communion after a lapse of over 20 years.

35. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 294.

at best, they can honor a temporary cease-fire.³⁶ This is why those who defend Christian political pluralism invariably reject the continuing authority of biblical civil law.

Covenant-breakers eventually refuse to submit to God and His kingdom in history. This is why Satan's representatives rebel against God's people at the end of history (Rev. 20:7–9). Covenant-breakers cannot abide by the legitimate rule of covenant-keepers and the Bible's definition of civil toleration: the judicial concept of strangers within the gates. Biblical toleration is based on the necessity of biblical covenantal separation. Covenant-breakers must be separated from the civil franchise.

2. Intolerant Humanists

Biblical covenantal separation is not tolerated by covenant-breakers, who correctly perceive that God is going to separate them from the post-resurrection New Heaven and New Earth. They will receive the eternal second death in lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15). This ultimate separation is an affront to them. Separation in eternity is based judicially on the rival theological content of men's faiths and their public confessions in history. Saving faith divides men from each other in history because it divides men from God in history and eternity. Saving faith is therefore an affront to covenant-breakers, who deeply resent the Christian doctrine of separation based on God's ethical terms and by His eternal sanctions.

The nineteenth-century atheist, Ludwig Feuerbach, clearly understood this Christian doctrine of mankind's separation by God's covenant, and he assailed it. This doctrine, for the humanist, is the unforgivable sin: the Christian denies that man is God, and as a direct result of this blasphemy against man, the Christian begins to make distinctions between those who believe in God and those who do not. Feuerbach wrote: "To believe, is synonymous with goodness; not to believe, with wickedness. Faith, narrow and prejudiced refers all unbelief to the moral disposition. In its view the unbeliever is an enemy to Christ out of obduracy, out of wickedness. Hence faith has fellowship with believers only; unbelievers it rejects. It is well-disposed towards believers, but ill-disposed towards unbelievers. In faith there lies a malignant principle.”³⁷ Frederick Engels reported over four decades later that with this book, Feuerbach converted an entire generation of Hegelians to materialism, he and Karl Marx included.³⁸

36. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

3. Biblical Tolerance

Toleration is biblically mandatory, but our definition of toleration must be biblical. There is no neutrality in language; Christians’ definitions must be based on the Bible, not on some hypothetically neutral language. The Bible is intolerant of covenant-breakers’ definitions disguised as supposedly neutral definitions. A Christian civil order should tolerate non-Christians in the same way that Israel was required to tolerate resident aliens: strangers in the gates. In response, non-Christians are required by God to show toleration to Christians, who progressively extend their rule over non-Christians until judgment day. That is, covenant-breakers are required by God to remain tolerant of the kingdom (civilization) of God in history.

Furthermore, if covenant-breakers remain merely tolerant, God will send them into His eternal torture chamber forever. God does not tolerate them beyond the grave. They must remain content in history to be non-citizens, living under the civil sanctions of the holy commonwealth. For the sake of receiving the positive sanctions of a godly civil order, they are required by God to tolerate their subordinate position as strangers in God’s land. If covenant-breakers remain tolerant of God’s kingdom in history as it extends its rule over them in every area of life,³⁹ His people are supposed to remain tolerant of them. Christians will progressively rule in history; non-Christians must progressively obey God’s civil laws. This is the only toleration that God establishes for His kingdom. But this statement is an affront to every rival religion, as well as to Christian pluralists. They much prefer rule by secular humanists.

37. Ludwig Feuerbach, The Essence of Christianity, trans. George Eliot (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1841] 1957), p. 252.

38. Frederick Engels, Ludwig Feuerbach and the End of Classical German Philosophy (1888), in Marx and Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, 1969), III, p. 344.

39. Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

Conclusion

The law prohibiting the dedication of children to Molech through initiation was a seed law. It was a law that governed inheritance and disinheritance, for it dealt with a pagan rite governing inheritance and disinheritance. Because of the presence of the temple sanctuary in the holy land of Israel, this law was also a land law. It was required to restrain the creation of alternative centers of worship: specifically, it prohibited strange fire. Strange fire defiled the sanctuary, even at a distance. Next, this law reduced the likelihood of the profanation of God's name. It was therefore a blasphemy law. Finally, because the child's life was placed at risk, it was a law against attempted murder. As a seed law and a land law, it is no longer judicially binding in New Covenant times. As a law against blasphemy, it is still judicially binding. But if the law is still binding, so is the biblically specified sanction: death by stoning.⁴⁰ The blasphemy aspect of the law takes precedence over at-

40. God's mandated method of execution—public stoning by the witnesses whose words condemned the criminal—is regarded as perverse even by those few Christians who still defend the legitimacy of the death penalty. They do not believe that God requires the trial's hostile witnesses to cast the first stones. But He does: "The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hands of all the people. So thou shalt put the evil away from among you" (Deut. 17:7). Like twentieth-century humanists, Christians today regard God's mandated sanctions as barbaric; in this case, public execution by citizens. Why is this regarded as barbaric? The critics do not say. They do not think that have to say. "Everyone can see that such a thing is barbaric!" And so is God.

This law, if enforced, would place enormous responsibility into citizens' hands, both literally and figuratively. Christians today want to avoid such a fearful responsibility. They want the execution performed by some faceless bureaucrat behind closed doors, which is what God's law prohibits. Christians do not want the witnesses—those whose public words condemned the person to death—to suffer the psychological pressure of having to enforce their own words of condemnation. The witnesses' public judicial words are not to be enforced by their public judicial sanctions. Their words killed the person judicially, but the work of their hands is not supposed to kill the person biologically. The witnesses must not be burdened by the enormous emotional pressure of having to act out in public the judicial implications of their words. Word and deed are to be kept radically separate. The dirty work is to be done by a hireling, a professional executioner paid by the state.

God's law identifies the witnesses as God's agents, as well as the victim's agents. They are His agents both in their capacity as bringers of a lawsuit and as public executioners. They are to deliver the condemned person into God's heavenly court. In contrast, modern jurisprudence sees the witnesses as agents solely of the state. Then the state hires its own sanctions-bringer to execute judgment. The state consolidates its power by relieving the citizenry of their responsibilities. Not all of these responsibilities are economic.

Once the citizen is relieved of his judicial responsibility to cast stones against criminals, he can then take the next step: confiscate his weapons. Step by step, hu-tempted murder. God is the intended victim of blasphemy: treason against God. The victim of attempted murder can refuse to press charges. He can specify a lesser penalty than God's law allows. Not so with blasphemy. The mandatory penalty is clear.

The sanctions attached to this law were sufficiently severe to reduce the likelihood of its widespread practice, if the law was enforced. It was not enforced, so God delivered the nation into the hands of the Assyrians and the Babylonians. It is worth noting that the negative sanction that was imposed by the pagan Nebuchadnezzar on the three youths who refused to obey his blasphemous law was a fiery furnace.

Now if ye be ready that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of musick, ye fall down and worship the image which I have made; well: but if ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands? (Dan. 3:15).

The result was the opposite of what the king expected: the youths survived inside the fire, but their escorts perished when they drew near to the fire: "Therefore because the king's commandment was urgent, and the furnace exceeding hot, the flame of the fire slew those men that took up Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego" (Dan. 3:22). The king, seeing this, repented:

Then Nebuchadnezzar spake, and said, Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who hath sent his angel, and delivered his servants that trusted in him, and have changed the king's word, and yielded their bodies, that they might not serve nor worship any god, except their own God. Therefore I make a decree, That every people, nation, and language, which speak any thing amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill: because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort. Then the king promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in the province of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar the king, unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you. I thought it manism's civil authority lodges at the top of the hierarchy. First, stoning by witnesses is eliminated. This removes the mark of judicial sovereignty from the citizen-witness: God's mandated sanctions-bringer. Second, God is eliminated by removing self-maledictory oaths under God by the witnesses. This makes the state the new god: defender of the oath. Third, gun control laws are legislated: the visible monopolization of sovereignty in the state. The state is no longer confessionally in between God and the oath-bound citizen. It is over the citizen and under no one.

good to shew the signs and wonders that the high God hath wrought toward me. How great are his signs! and how mighty are his wonders! his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion is from generation to generation (Dan. 3:28–4:3).

Christian pluralists have yet to advance theologically as far as Nebuchadnezzar did. He saw who had inherited by fire, and then drew the proper conclusion: men should not defy the God of Israel. Christian pluralists do not believe that God's predictable historical sanctions are still in force. Therefore, they do not believe that the Bible's mandated civil sanctions are still in force. In short, they do not believe in inheritance through covenantal fire. The result of the triumph of Christian pluralism in religious thought and in the political theory of the West after 1700 has been the progressive disinheritance of Christians.⁴¹

41. North, Political Polytheism, Part 3.

21

INHERITANCE THROUGH SEPARATION

Ye shall therefore keep all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: that the land, whither I bring you to dwell therein, spue you not out. And ye shall not walk in the manners of the nation, which I cast out before you: for they committed all these things, and therefore I abhorred them. But I have said unto you, Ye shall inherit their land, and I will give it unto you to possess it, a land that floweth with milk and honey: I am the LORD your God, which have separated you from other people. Ye shall therefore put difference between clean beasts and unclean, and between unclean fowls and clean: and ye shall not make your souls abominable by beast, or by fowl, or by any manner of living thing that creepeth on the ground, which I have separated from you as unclean. And ye shall be holy unto me: for I the LORD am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine (Lev. 20:22–26).

The theocentric foundation of this law was God’s act of covenantal separation: “I am the LORD your God, which have separated you from other people” (v. 24b). The Creator God has separated His people from all other people. This separation is not only historical; it is eternal. It is above all covenantal. It has ethical and judicial implications. The fundamental issue is holiness: the set-apartness of God and also of His people. This law was one of these implications of holiness. Some of these implications are still in force judicially; others are not. It is the task of the expositor to sort out—separate—these implications in terms of the biblical principle of holiness.¹

A. A Separate Land for a Separate Nation

This law recapitulates the warning in Leviticus 18:28: if they commit the evil acts that the Canaanites committed in the land, the land

1. Rival principles of interpretation have divided me from Rushdoony at this point: the interpretation of the dietary laws.

will vomit them out. They were required to obey God's revealed law. I have argued that this threatened negative sanction was an aspect of the land laws of Israel, confined geographically to the Promised Land, and annulled in A.D. 70 with the final annulment of the Old Covenant.² The office of "covenantal vomiter" has been taken by the resurrected Christ (Rev. 3:16). The land no longer acts as a covenantal mediator between God and man, either in Palestine or elsewhere. It does not provide covenantally predictable sanctions in the New Covenant era. But the Promised Land did do this under the Mosaic Covenant.

1. National Boundaries

In this passage, we find four basic themes of the Book of Leviticus: obedience to God's revealed law, covenantal separation, national holiness, and the inheritance of the land. Actually, the third theme, national holiness, is another way of expressing the first two themes. God compares the religious boundary around the people of Israel with the geographical boundary around the land itself. The continuing covenantal separation of the nation of Israel could be secured only by obedience to God's law, not by a strictly military defense of the nation's geographical boundaries. Secure geographical boundaries for Israel would be the product of covenantal faithfulness, not military strength as such.

Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the LORD our God (Ps. 20:7).

Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help; and stay on horses, and trust in chariots, because they are many; and in horsemen, because they are very strong; but they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the LORD! (Isa. 31:1).

The Promised Land's geographical boundary had formerly surrounded the nation—singular—that had occupied the land. The Canaanite nations are spoken of here in the singular, as a single culture: "ye shall not walk in the manners of the nation." According to the definition in Strong's Concordance, the Hebrew word translated here as "nation," commonly transliterated as goy (more accurately, go'ee), is apparently derived from the same root as the Hebrew word for massing: "a foreign nation; hence a Gentile; also (fig.) a troop of animals, or a flight of locusts: Gentile, heathen, nation, people." It is the most commonly used Hebrew word for “nation” in the Old Testament.

2. Chapter 10.

2. Removing the Evil Stewards

For four generations, the Canaanites had been serving as stewards of the land in preparation for the conquest of the land by Israel. The land had been promised to the heirs of Abraham: “But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full” (Gen. 15:16). This inheritance was historically assured. Meanwhile, the Canaanites built houses, tilled fields, and planted orchards. This was useful labor for themselves and their heirs, but it was ultimately a process of building up an inheritance for the Israelites. “A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children’s children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just” (Prov. 13:22). The great-grandchildren of the Canaanites of Abraham’s day lost their inheritance to the Israelites. But in the meantime, the Canaanites had acted as God’s dominion agents, subduing the beasts of the field. It was better that covenant-breakers maintain authority over the animals than that the animals of the land roam free. God had made this promise to the Israelites in the wilderness:

And I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee. I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land. And I will set thy bounds from the Red sea even unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert unto the river: for I will deliver the inhabitants of the land into your hand; and thou shalt drive them out before thee. Thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor with their gods. They shall not dwell in thy land, lest they make thee sin against me: for if thou serve their gods, it will surely be a snare unto thee (Ex. 23:28–33).

In Leviticus 20:22–26, we find the same two themes: Israel’s inheritance of the land and their absolute covenantal separation from the existing inhabitants of the land.

B. Sustaining Grace

The Promised Land was already a land flowing with milk and honey when the Israelites arrived. This material wealth had been set aside by God in Abraham’s day as His gift to Abraham’s heirs. The land contained raw materials of great value: original capital. “For the LORD thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; A land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil olive, and honey; A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass” (Deut. 8:7–9).³

Furthermore, it contained secondary capital: marketable wealth, which was the product of other men’s thrift and vision over several generations. “And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full” (Deut. 6:10–11). This combined capital value—land plus labor—could be maintained intact long-term only by obeying God:

Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name. Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you; (For the LORD thy God is a jealous God among you) lest the anger of the LORD thy God be kindled against thee, and destroy thee from off the face of the earth (Deut. 6:12–15).

So, the capitalized value of the land was part of God’s promise to Abraham. It was therefore not earned by the Israelites. It was an unmerited gift: the biblical definition of grace.⁴ But, once delivered into the hands of Abraham’s heirs, possession of the land could be maintained only by national covenantal faithfulness, as manifested by the Israelites’ outward obedience to God’s statutes. Public obedience to the Mosaic law was to remain the mandatory manifestation of their service to Him and fear of Him.

The familiar Christian hymn, “Trust and Obey,” expresses the ethical nature of covenantal inheritance: “for there’s no other way” to maintain this inheritance. (This hymn is sung enthusiastically by Protestants whose churches officially deny its theology of sanctification.) Abraham was told to trust God. This meant trusting God's promises. His heirs were also to trust these promises. The outward manifestation of this trust was circumcision. Without this outward act of obedience, the Israelite ceased to be an Israelite, and therefore he removed himself and his heirs from the promised inheritance. So, the inheritance of the land was a pure gift from God, but to remain the beneficiary of this unmerited legacy, the recipients of the promise had to obey the terms of the covenant. It was not that their obedience was the legal foundation of the promise. The promise of God was its own legal foundation. But obedience was the legal basis of their remaining in the will of God, in both senses: the moral will and the testamentary will. A refusal to place the mark of the covenant—a symbolic boundary—on the flesh of all one's male heirs was an act of self-disinheritance. Excommunication became mandatory: a cutting off from the people, i.e., a kind of judicial circumcision of the nation. Covenant-keepers who broke this commandment were to be treated as foreskins.⁵

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), chaps. 19, 20.

4. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), p. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>). By unmerited, I mean unmerited by the recipient. It was merited by Jesus Christ.

The primacy of God's redemption does not nullify the mandatory nature of man's secondary response: obedience. After all, we do not sing, "Trust and Disobey," despite the fact that antinomian theologies implicitly affirm the theological legitimacy of such a view of the promises of God. God's promise initiates; man's obedience reciprocates. Both are equally aspects of grace. As Paul wrote: "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:8–10).⁶ The redeemed person's lifetime of positive ethical responses is as completely foreordained as his initial regeneration is, and therefore equally a gift from God. This was (and remains) true of national covenantal redemption and response. Redemption is primary; obedience is secondary; both are aspects of grace.

C. The Dietary Laws

The prohibition against eating certain foods was part of the land laws of Israel. This passage makes it clear that the reason why God im-

5. Saul's demand that David provide a bride price for Michal of a hundred Philistines' foreskins points to this judicial meaning of the foreskin (1 Sam. 18:25).

6 It is worth noting that twentieth-century American fundamentalists have committed Ephesians 2:8–9 to memory, but rarely if ever mention verse 10.

posed the food laws was to preserve the nation's separation. "Ye shall therefore put difference between clean beasts and unclean, and between unclean fowls and clean: and ye shall not make your souls abominable by beast, or by fowl, or by any manner of living thing that creepeth on the ground, which I have separated from you as unclean" (v. 25). These animals had not been prohibited before God led them out of Egypt. The distinction between clean and unclean had been present in Noah's day (Gen. 7:2, 8), but no prohibition against eating unclean beasts was announced at that time. In this sense, the clean-unclean distinction was prophetic for Noah. The distinction was established so that Noah would take seven times as many pairs of clean beasts into the ark (Gen. 7:2). The distinction had significance for the future of Israel—the increased likelihood of the survival of clean beasts—but not for Noah's day. Otherwise, the detailed food laws of Leviticus would have been given to Noah. But they weren't. "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things" (Gen. 9:3).⁷ Abraham was under no dietary restrictions; God's promise of the land did not involve dietary separation. Joseph was under no dietary restrictions in Egypt. Clearly, the dietary laws were not cross-boundary laws.

A society's diet separates it from other societies almost as completely as its language does. It is very difficult for overweight people to lose weight permanently because of people's almost unbreakable eating habits. To change a society's eating habits takes generations, even assuming extensive contact with foreigners (which Israel did experience because of her open borders). Immigrants, or the children of immigrants, slowly adopt the foods of their host nation. The Mosaic dietary laws forced a major cultural break with the home nation for all those who became circumcised resident aliens in Israel.

1. Covenantal Separation or Biological Health?

Covenantal separation inside the Promised Land was the goal of these laws, not dietary health as such. What about outside the Promised Land? The young Israelites in the court of Nebuchadnezzar refused to eat any food prepared by the Babylonians except vegetables and water. These self-imposed restrictions had not been mandated by the dietary laws of Leviticus. It was the king's choice food and wine that they refused to eat, not unclean or abominable animals. Wine had not been prohibited to them by the Mosaic law, but they refused to drink the king's wine (Dan. 1:8). Despite their diet of vegetables and water—no fat—the four Israelite youths looked fatter at the end of 10 days than those Babylonian youths who had been eating from the king's menu (Dan. 1:15). This was nothing short of miraculous. That, of course, was the whole point: a visible demonstration of the sovereignty of God in the lives of the four youths. The prescribed food of the supposedly divine king of Babylon produced a less healthy appearance in his servants than the uncharacteristically restricted diet produced in the four judicial representatives of Israel.

7. Given his insistence of the authority of the Mosaic food laws in the New Testament, Rushdoony should have commented on Genesis 9:3 in The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973). There is only one reference to this verse, in the middle of a block quotation from another author (p. 36). The verse is not even cited in the Scripture Texts index in volume 2, Law and Society (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1982).

There are vegetarian cultists today who point to this incident as proof of the superiority of vegetarianism. This is a misapplication of the text. What the Hebrew youths and their captors all knew was that the diet decreed by the king was superior fare by conventional Babylonian and Mosaic standards, yet it produced visibly inferior results. The fundamental issues in this unique case were separation (holiness) and the sovereignty of God, not the comparative caloric or nutritional content of the rival diets. The four youths demonstrated publicly that their God, not their diet, was the source of their physiological advantage.

The events of the next chapter in Daniel escalated the competition between rival covenants: the comparative ability of the representatives of each covenant to interpret dreams. In chapter three, the competition between covenants escalated again: the incident of the fiery furnace. Covenantal separation was the basis of their physical preservation: this was the lesson of both incidents involving the young men. The Babylonian king's ultimate negative sanction could not overcome God's deliverance of His representatives. For a while, at least, the king honored this covenantal reality. In chapter four, he relates his final confrontation with God—a unique chapter in the Bible, written in Aramaic by an uncircumcised author.

Why didn't the four youths insist on a conventional Levitical diet? Had the issue been comparative nutrition, this would have been the public test of the two diets. But they did not request such a test. They simply wanted their rulers to see that a minimal diet—not a uniquely Levitical diet—would produce visibly superior results in the lives of covenant-keeping people. Insisting on a Levitical diet would have been an act of religious and political rebellion: the preservation of a defeated nation's diet. That was not their point. It was not that the Israelites possessed a uniquely healthy diet that had to be preserved outside the land; rather, it was the preservation of their covenantal commitment to the God of Israel, whose sovereignty extended beyond the land. While the young men did not request food that was prohibited by Leviticus, they also did not request the blessings—"fat"—of the Levitical diet: the best of the land. This should warn us: the Levitical dietary laws were laws furthering covenantal separation inside the Promised Land, not universal laws of health. To misunderstand this is to misunderstand covenant theology. To deny this is to deny covenant theology and replace it with "taste not–touch not" religion (Col. 2:20–23).

If the captive Israelites were required to honor the Mosaic dietary laws outside the Promised Land, how did Esther conceal her identity from her husband and Haman? Or was she in rebellion? Did God deliver His people from their enemies by means of a woman who openly defied God's law? Or is there a theologically simpler answer, namely, that the Israelites lawfully ignored the dietary law's requirements when they were in captivity outside the land, i.e., under the God-ordained authority of a rival civilization?

2. A Temporarily Marked-Off Nation

The dietary laws were imposed by God before the nation came into the Promised Land, but after the Israelites had left Egypt. These laws were given early in the wilderness experience. Throughout the 40 years, the people ate mostly manna. They were forced to refrain from newly prohibited foods, whatever their dietary tastes had been in Egypt. Therefore, these food laws were preparatory for the invasion. Manna, coupled with the food laws, forced the younger generation to grow up completely unfamiliar with the taste of covenantally prohibited animals. The manna ceased when they entered the land. After they conquered the land, they would have no eating habits to overcome, and therefore no gastronomical temptation to mix with any of the remaining tribes of Canaan.

These laws marked off the Israelites gastronomically, just as circumcision marked them off physiologically. The Levitical dietary laws were no more permanent than the Passover law—and no less permanent. In captivity, they could not journey to Jerusalem to celebrate the mandatory feasts. Abraham had been instructed to circumcise those males under his household authority, but he received no instruction regarding his diet. Why not? Because he did not dwell in the land of Canaan as a permanent owner. He was still a stranger in a strange land. He was a pilgrim. A pilgrim has no geographical headquarters, no geographical home. Abraham's earthly home was eschatological. God told him that his family's inheritance of the land would not take place until the fourth generation after him (Gen. 15: 16). So, he did have to honor the law of circumcision, for circumcision identified who his heirs were: a law of covenantal separation. The Israelites in Joshua's day crossed the Jordan, camped at Gilgal, were circumcised, and celebrated the Passover in the land (Josh. 5:2–10). Then they ate the corn of the land: the spoils of conquest (v. 11). They thereby also claimed their inheritance. They thereby claimed their national headquarters. "And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more; but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year" (v. 12). At that point, they had the option of violating the dietary laws that Moses had announced four decades earlier. Their testing began at Gilgal.

The laws governing Passover had been given in Egypt before they crossed the boundary out of Egypt to enter the wilderness (Ex. 12). Passover's laws were primary in Mosaic Israel. They established the rite that would henceforth celebrate their deliverance from Egypt. Passover was celebrated inside Egypt. Passover announced symbolically points one and two of the biblical covenant: the sovereignty of God and His authority over the gods of Egypt. The dietary laws were secondary to the Passover laws, for they were given in the wilderness after the Israelites had crossed over Egypt's boundary. Like the laws of clean and unclean beasts for Noah, these laws were prophetic: tied to the fulfillment of Abraham's promise. These dietary laws had little immediate relevance in the wilderness; the nation survived on manna. Only when the Israelites crossed over the Promised Land's boundary, and were circumcised, did the manna cease. At that point, the dietary laws became relevant. This is why I argue that the dietary laws were tied to the land and the Levitical laws of inheritance. The dietary laws lost all covenantal relevance once the land of Canaan ceased to be an aspect of the Abrahamic promise: in A.D. 70.

The dietary laws reinforced point three of the covenant: covenantal boundaries. For as long as the boundaries of the Promised Land remained intact covenantally, Israelites were required to honor the dietary laws. The Levitical dietary laws were expressly historical: honoring the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham regarding the land. They were laws that reinforced the Levitical laws governing landed inheritance. When the Levitical inheritance laws ceased, meaning when the jubilee land laws definitively ceased, the dietary laws also ceased. This is why Jesus laid down a challenge to the Pharisees, who were the defenders of the dietary laws: "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man. Then came his disciples, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended, after they heard this saying? But he answered and said, Every plant, which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch" (Matt. 15:11–14). There would soon be a rooting up of the nation of Israel.⁸ The old nation of priests (Ex. 19:6) was about to be replaced by a new nation of priests (I Peter 2:5, 9). A change in covenantal law is accompanied by a change in the priesthood (Heb. 7:12). This is why Peter was told repeatedly by God in a vision to eat unclean foods (Acts 10:15). The covenantal separation between Jews and gentiles had ended forever (Eph. 2). A new covenantal separation had arrived: Christian vs. non-Christian. A new dietary law accompanied this new form of covenantal separation: the Lord's Supper—a new dietary boundary.

Covenant-keeping man's defilement by unclean or abominable meats ceased as soon as the Lord's Supper replaced Passover. Gentiles outside the land were never under its restrictions. There was nothing intrinsically evil or unclean in any food (I Cor. 8:4).⁹ There was only temporary uncleanness—as temporary as the covenantal status of the boundaries of the Promised Land. When Jesus announced that there has never been anything intrinsically unclean or defiling about any food, He was also announcing that there was nothing intrinsically sacrosanct about the boundaries of geographic Israel.

The Jews of Jesus' day thought that Israel's dietary laws, like Israel's geographical boundaries, would last forever. Today, Jews and Anglo-Israelites suppose that the Mosaic dietary laws are still binding. But the covenantal significance of Israel's geographical boundaries and the dietary laws ended together: the demise in A.D. 70 of national Israel and the temple sacrifices. As Paul wrote to a gentile church, “Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances, (Touch not; taste not; handle not; which all are to perish with the using;) after the commandments and doctrines of men? Which things have indeed a shew of wisdom in will worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh” (Col. 2:20–23). Apart from national Israel under the Mosaic law, such commandments regarding unclean food have always been “the commandments and doctrines of men.” When the temple’s veil was torn immediately after Christ’s death (Matt. 27:51), de-sanctifying the holy of holies, the Mosaic Covenant’s dietary laws became the commandments and doctrines of men. Honoring the dietary laws today is only “a shew of wisdom in will worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body.” This is false wisdom and false humility.

8. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

9. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10.

When the promised Seed arrived (Gal. 2:16), instituting His new covenant, the circumcision law was annulled, replaced by the rite of baptism. Similarly, when the Holy Spirit arrived, the Lord’s Supper replaced Passover and its ancillary dietary laws. Covenantal separation was not annulled; its Abrahamic Covenant ritual marks were annulled. Then God announced to Peter the annulment of the dietary laws (Acts 10:15). This marked the end of the Mosaic land laws and the end of Israel as national headquarters. Henceforth, there would be no national headquarters for God’s covenant people. The church replaced Israel as headquarters. Henceforth, the pursuit of the Great Commission would no longer be restricted by national headquarters or dietary restrictions.

D. Rushdoony on the Dietary Laws

Because of a theological division within the Christian Reconstruction movement, I need to devote a little space to Acts 10. In a vision, God announced to Peter His definitive annulment of the Mosaic dietary laws:

On the morrow, as they went on their journey, and drew nigh unto the city, Peter went up upon the housetop to pray about the sixth hour: And he became very hungry, and would have eaten: but while they made ready, he fell into a trance, And saw heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet knit at the four corners, and let down to the earth: Wherein were all manner of fourfooted beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill, and eat. But Peter said, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean. And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common. This was done thrice: and the vessel was received up again into heaven (Acts 10:9–16).

Rushdoony's comment on Acts 10 asserts, but does not prove, his opinion that the dietary laws are still in force. He writes: "Acts 10 is commonly cited as abolishing the old dietary restrictions. There is no reason for this opinion. . . . There is no evidence in the chapter that the vision had anything to do with diet; . . ." ¹⁰ Notice his rhetorical flourishes: "no reason," "no evidence" and "anything to do with diet." Rhetoric is not a valid substitute for theology and exegesis. I wrote a detailed essay challenging his theory in 1970; I reprinted it in 1984; Rushdoony never responded to it. ¹¹ If his position were theologically defensible, he should have replied.

Rushdoony insists that the Mosaic dietary laws are still mandatory as health laws. "The various dietary laws, laws of separation, and other laws no longer mandatory as covenantal signs, are still valid and mandatory as health requirements in terms of Deuteronomy 7:12– 16." ¹² Mandatory means required by God. That is, obedience to the dietary laws are tests of a Christian's covenantal faithfulness to God, whether or not Rushdoony was willing to include the food laws explicitly under the category of covenantal laws. They must be obeyed if they are mandatory.

He asserted that God's command to Peter to eat unclean foods (Acts 10:15) had nothing to do with food, but rather with the Great Commission. ¹³ This misses—i.e., evades—the covenantal point: the Mosaic food laws had never been health laws but had always been laws of national covenantal separation: part of the Levitical land laws. The dietary laws had been imposed by God in order to restrict the Israelites' intimate contacts with foreigners at meals. This restriction only applied during the period in which the Promised Land was God's holy sanctuary and covenantal agent; it had not been imposed on Noah or Abraham. The Great Commission of the New Covenant accompanied

10. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 301.

11. Gary North, "The Annulment of the Dietary Laws," ICE Position Paper No. 2 (Nov. 1984), a reprint of a 1970 paper, privately distributed.

12. Rushdoony, Law and Society, p. 702.

13. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 301.

the negation of this temporary judicial position of the land; hence, God commanded Peter to eat foods formerly banned. That is, God commanded Peter to break the Mosaic food laws. The text is quite clear: "And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common" (Acts 10:15). All food at that point in time became clean for all covenant-keepers. This vision was God's graphic revelation of His definitive annulment of Mosaic Israel's land laws: the end of its position as God's sanctuary. The final annulment came in A.D. 70.

It is worth noting that Rushdoony broke sharply with Calvin on this crucial covenantal point. Calvin stated emphatically in his comments on Acts 10 that anyone who today establishes distinctions among foods based on the Mosaic law has adopted a position of "sacriligious boldness. Of this stamp were the old heretics, Montanus, Priscillianus, the Donatists, the Tatians, and all the Encratites. . . . We must always ask the mouth of the Lord, that we may thereby be assured what we may lawfully do; forasmuch as it was not lawful even for Peter to make that profane which was lawful by the Word of God."¹⁴

Finally, it is worth mentioning that Rushdoony ceased taking the Lord's Supper in any local church around 1970. He only began taking it again in 1992, when he announced that Chalcedon, a non-profit educational institution chartered by the United States government, had somehow become a church, and he was its pastor. Thus, his theory of the dietary laws—something he did not honor in his own household prior to the late 1960s—paralleled his departure from membership in a local church.¹⁵

Conclusion

The inheritance of the land by the Israelites was part of God's promise to Abraham. To maintain this inheritance, the Israelites were required to obey God's laws. This was the basis of their inheritance. The covenantal mark of such obedience was circumcision. They also had to honor Passover and the dietary laws. These were laws of separation. A separate land required a separated people. But this Mosaic separation was temporary.

14. John Calvin, Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker, [1560] 1979), I, pp. 422–23.

15. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>)

God is holy—set apart—from all other gods (Ex. 20:2–3).¹⁶ The people of Israel were therefore set apart by God from all other nations on earth. Israel's national boundaries were sacred. That is, they were tied to the sacrificial system. A series of boundaries surrounded (marked off) the temple in which God's authorized sacraments were performed by His authorized agents.¹⁷ God established three separate covenantal jurisdictions—ecclesiastical, civil, familial—to be maintained within these national boundaries. The Israelites were given a sanctuary from the rest of the world: a place where God's judicial sanctions would be applied in terms of His law.

Their ethical, judicial, and geographical holiness was to be manifested by what they ate and did not eat: primarily at the Passover meal and secondarily by the dietary laws. This holiness or separation was ritually reinforced by the Passover meal and the special dietary restrictions. The Passover laws were both positive and negative. At the Passover, Israelites were required to eat certain foods and forbidden to eat leavened bread. The dietary laws were exclusively negative. Neither of these food laws was a civil requirement. The Passover laws and the dietary laws were to be enforced only by family and ecclesiastical governments.

With the abrogation of the Old Covenant order came the abrogation of the Mosaic food laws: Passover and the “pork” laws.¹⁸ This abrogation ended with the abrogation of the Promised Land's historically unique position as an agent of God's sanctions. That is to say, the positive and negative sanctions associated with the Abrahamic promise regarding the land ceased to be relevant in history. Prior to the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the Promised Land was said to spew out evil-doers: symbolically, disgorging something that should not have been eaten. This meant that the land was an arena of covenantal confrontation: sanctions that were primarily military in nature. The Israelites would drive out the Canaanites; if they subsequently rebelled, other nations would drive them out.

After A.D. 70, the land of Israel lost its special covenantal status.

16. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1: Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 1.

17. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 3.

18. James B. Jordan, Pig Out? 25 Reasons Why Christians May Eat Pork (Niceville, Florida: Transfiguration Press, 1992).

The Mosaic sacrificial system was cut off.¹⁹ In no sense—militarily or environmentally—is land to be regarded today as a covenantal agent. Under the New Covenant, common grace and common curses have completely replaced special grace and special curses with respect to the climate: sunshine and rain, drought and flooding. God the Father “maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust” (Matt. 5:45).²⁰ Only to the extent that climate is directly influenced by man’s science and practices does it manifest covenantally predictable sanctions: blessings and cursings.

19. One result of this was the appearance of a new religion, Judaism.

20. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

IV. Covenantal Acts (23–24)

INTRODUCTION TO PART IV

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, Concerning the feasts of the LORD, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts (Lev. 23:1–2).

And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Whosoever curseth his God shall bear his sin. And he that blasphemeth the name of the LORD, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the LORD, shall be put to death (Lev. 24:15–16).

Leviticus 23 and the first section of Leviticus 24 are concerned with corporate religious feasts. The second half of Leviticus 24 deals with blasphemy. The judicial link between these passages is point four of the biblical covenant: sanctions. The first section deals with covenant renewal through participation in corporate covenant-renewal celebrations. The second section deals with individual covenant-breaking by oath.

Leviticus 23 lists the three national covenant-renewal celebrations: Passover (vv. 4–8); Firstfruits (vv. 10–21); and Tabernacles or booths (vv. 23–44). Verse 22 is seemingly a textual anomaly: “And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest, neither shalt thou gather any gleanings of thy harvest: thou shalt leave them unto the poor, and to the stranger: I am the LORD your God.” I discuss in Chapter 22 the reason why the gleanings law of Leviticus 19:9 is recapitulated in the middle of the section on the three feasts.

Covenant is an inescapable concept. A man must affirm a covenant of some kind. He is, in Meredith G. Kline's words, by oath consigned. Covenantal affirmations in the modern world are usually implicit rather than explicit. Civil covenants are not normally established by explicit public oath except for political office-holders and members of the military. Marriage is today regarded as a contract rather than an oath-bound institution under God's sanctions in history. Baptism is also not regarded as an oath-sign, nor is the Lord's Supper regarded as an act of covenant-renewal. People make and break covenants without knowing what they are doing.

MUTUAL SELF-INTEREST: PRIESTS AND GLEANERS

And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest, neither shalt thou gather any gleanings of thy harvest: thou shalt leave them unto the poor, and to the stranger: I am the LORD your God (Lev. 23:22).

The gleaning statutes reflected the theocentric principle of God as the absolute owner of the land, who possessed the authority to set the terms of management for His “sharecroppers,” the Israelites.

A. The Festival of Pentecost

This passage comes in between sections on two required national feasts: Pentecost or “weeks” (vv. 15–21) and Tabernacles or “booths” (vv. 34–43). Pentecost was the celebration of the harvest. It took place 50 (pentekosté: fiftieth) days after Passover. As in all the other national festivals, sacrifices to God were required. What made this feast unique were two things: it was a one-day festival rather than a full week, and it mandated the use of leavened bread (v. 17).

Passover prohibited all leaven (Ex. 12:15). Leaven’s symbolism of growth is the reason for both the prohibition and the subsequent requirement at Pentecost. It was Egypt’s leaven that was prohibited at Passover: the covenantal necessity of ethical discontinuity with evil. It was Israel’s leaven—the product of the Promised Land—that was mandated at Pentecost: the covenantal necessity of ethical continuity with righteousness.

Pentecost was understood by the rabbis as the anniversary of the giving of the Ten Commandments.¹ It was a third-month feast. The law was given to Moses in the third month (Ex. 19:1) on the third day of the week (Ex. 19:16). Tabernacles was a seventh-month feast (Lev. 23:24). It completed the annual cycles of three feasts. This structure parallels the week of purifications for the person who had come in contact with a dead body: third-day purification and seventh-day release (Num. 19:11–12).²

1. Alfred Edersheim, The Temple: Its Ministry and Services As They Were in the Time of Jesus Christ (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1874] 1983), p. 261.

Pentecost was closely associated with the harvest.³ It was a grain-related feast. The festival required the following: “Ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave loaves of two tenth deals: they shall be of fine flour; they shall be baked with leaven; they are the firstfruits unto the LORD” (v. 17). These loaves were separate representative offerings made by the priests. All of Pentecost’s offerings had to take place on one day. To offer 1.2 million loaves of bread before (not on)⁴ the altar in one day was not possible. Also, in addition to the loaves were required seven lambs, two rams, and a young bullock (v. 18), plus a goat kid and two more lambs (v. 19).⁵ These animal sacrifices were corporate sacrifices. There is no way that these offerings were required from every family.

Edersheim says that the temple’s doors were opened at midnight. The offerings had to be made before sunrise: the time of the mandatory morning offering.⁶ He does not say how the rabbis determined the midnight hour, which makes his hypothesis less plausible. Men were required to bring free will offerings (Deut. 16:10). Presumably, during the period from midnight to sunrise, they brought these offerings into the tabernacle or temple.

A family’s main cost of the feast of Pentecost was not the value of the free will offering. It was the cost of the journey itself.

2. James Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 57. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

3. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 304.

4. Leaven was not allowed on the altar (Lev. 2:11).

5. The Jews doubled the number of sacrifices by offering separately those required in Numbers 28:26, 27, 30 and Leviticus 23:18. On this point, Josephus’ first-century observations and Maimonides’ evaluation of rabbinical texts agree. “Pentecost,” Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, 12 vols., eds. John M’Clintock and James Strong, 12 vols. (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), VIII, pp. 925–26.

6. Edersheim, Temple, p. 263.

B. Gleaning, Again

Leviticus 23:22 is a recapitulation of the gleaning law of Leviticus 19:9.⁷ The question is: Why did God here remind the Israelites of the land owners' responsibility to the landless poor, at the end of the passage that set forth the laws governing Pentecost ("weeks")? This question has baffled orthodox Bible commentators. S. H. Kellogg offers comments on Pentecost (vv. 15–21), but then skips verse 22 to begin commenting on the convocation of trumpets (vv. 23–25).⁸ Andrew Bonar referred back to Leviticus 19:9 and concludes: "In this manner, love to man was taught in these thanksgiving feasts, at the very time that love to God who so kindly gave them their plenty was called forth and increased." He then went on to offer an allegorical interpretation, with the gleaners as members of a remnant: gentiles in the Old Covenant, Jews in the New Covenant. "A feast is coming on that will unite Jew and Gentile in equal fulness."⁹ But this does not explain why the gleaning law for the fields was repeated here, or perhaps more to the point, why it first appears in Leviticus 19:9 rather than here. Gordon Wenham thought that the connection between Leviticus 19:9 and 23:22 may be the requirement to care for the poor: the Levites, the poor, and the stranger. There may be a link here: shared poverty.¹⁰ But why should the Levites and priests have been poor? They received the tithes and sacrifices of the tribes. They could also own real estate in the cities. The commentators are confused about the reason behind the recapitulation.

There is a reason for this recapitulation: a shared economic link. There is also a reason for the confusion of the commentators. The reason is their lack of knowledge about, or interest in, economic theory. This lack of knowledge has left gaps in our understanding of biblical law.

C. Laws of Inheritance

To begin to understand the relationship between the gleaning laws and the feasts, we first need to recognize that the land of Israel was an inheritance from God. Land ownership in Israel was part of the origin-

7. Chapter 11.

8. S. H. Kellogg, The Book of Leviticus (Minneapolis, Minnesota: Klock & Klock, [1899] 1978), pp. 459–61.

9. Andrew Bonar, A Commentary on Leviticus (London: Banner of Truth, [1846] 1966), p. 411.

10. Wenham, Leviticus, p. 305.

al spoils of war. Only those who fought the Canaanites could claim an inheritance in the land (Num. 32:16–23). Before the conquest began, God set forth the laws governing land ownership after Israel took possession. These laws were laws of landed inheritance. The Levitical priesthood possessed the authority to declare these laws and apply them to specific cases.

The special judicial status of the nation of Israel depended on the presence of an absolutely sovereign God (point one of the biblical covenant model).¹¹ The Levites and priests were God's primary representatives (point two)¹² because the priesthood had the primary responsibility of defending the moral purity of the land (point three).¹³ The priests possessed only one final sanction: excommunication (point four).¹⁴ They could disinherit covenant-breakers (point five).¹⁵ Inheritance is the key to a proper understanding of the economic link between the priesthood and the gleaners. The poor had been temporarily disinherited by economic events or some other reason: no income from their family land. The Levites and priests had no landed inheritance in rural Israel; their inheritance was the tithe. Between the two groups there was a shared economic goal: the maintenance of income from rural land. The gleaners were poor; the Levites and priests did not want to become poor. The gleaners wanted a share of the crop; the Levites and priests wanted a share of the crop. Because of the structure of the laws governing gleaning, each group helped the other to achieve its economic goal.

God mandated gleaning in Israel. A land owner's refusal to honor the gleaning law, like his refusal to honor the tithe, was an excommunicable offense. The threat of this shared negative sanction—reduced income—is what linked the Levitical priesthood to the gleaners.

D. Economic Motivation

The land owner sent his harvesting crew into the fields before the gleaners gained access. Gleaners got only the leftovers. Land owners were required by God's law to honor the laws of gleaning. They could

11. Transcendence/presence. See Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

12. Hierarchy/representation. Ibid., ch. 2.

13. Ethics/boundaries. Ibid., ch. 3.

14. Oath/sanctions. Ibid., ch. 4.

15. Succession/inheritance. Ibid., ch. 5.

not lawfully have their economic agents harvest the corners of the fields. That portion of the crop belonged by law to the gleaners. The poorest members of the able-bodied community had a legal right to this portion of the crop.

The question is: Which covenantal agency possessed lawful authority to enforce this law? Was it the state or the church? I have already announced my opinion: this legal right of the poor was not to be enforced by the state.¹⁶ The state was not an agency of charity under the Old Covenant. It was an agency of compulsion: negative sanctions. It was not an agency authorized by God to bring positive sanctions. To gain ownership of assets, or the power to allocate assets, which was necessary for bringing positive sanctions to one group, the state would have had to threaten negative sanctions against others. This was not allowed by God's law: the same laws had to apply equally to all residents of the nation (Ex. 12:49). Civil judges were not to discriminate between rich and poor (Lev. 19:15). The church, however, can lawfully bring positive sanctions as the agency of reconciliation—man and nature's reconciliation to God—and as an agency of healing: man and nature.

1. Self-Interest and Law Enforcement

My assertion of the designation of the priests as the enforcers of the gleaning law raises the question of economic motivation. While there may be individuals who at times place the interests of the community, or some segment of the community, above their own personal self-interest, no society can safely be constructed which relies exclusively on the widespread voluntary suppression of personal self-interest among those who are given monopolistic authority to impose negative sanctions on others. Liberty and justice require that the legal order acknowledge the fact that the personal self-interest of judges must be dealt with institutionally. Negative sanctions must be brought against those officials who make decisions that favor their interests at the expense of segments of the general public.

This institutional guideline is true for non-profit organizations, not just civil governments. I would not go so far as to say that it is equally true of priesthoods, since priesthoods formally are committed to a doctrine of sanctions beyond physical death, either a final judgment imposed by a divinity or the judgment of the impersonally applied moral laws of karma: an extension of the results of personal behavior through reincarnation. Thus, a priest may have a concept of personal self-interest that is longer or more apocalyptic than that adopted by a civil judge, or even more to the point, by a twentieth-century academic economist. But even non-profit organizations and priesthoods must acknowledge the potential conflict of interests between the power to impose negative sanctions and the public interest. Rewards and punishments must be built into the institutional system in order to reduce the profitable exploitation of such conflicts of interest, since the public interest will normally be sacrificed in these conflicts.

16. Chapter 11:B.

2. Public Choice Theory

In order to understand and then predict the decisions made by sanctioning agents, we need to consider the influence of self-interest. If we want to increase the likelihood that people will act in a particular way, we must see to it that they are rewarded for performing in the preferred way and punished for deviating. This includes government officials—those who possess the right to impose sanctions. This was the insight by economist James Buchanan that won him a Nobel Prize in economics in 1986. Buchanan and his associate, legal theorist Gordon Tullock, pioneered a specialty in economics called public choice theory.¹⁷ This economic approach to understanding institutions assumes that (1) all institutions, including political and judicial institutions, are the product of individual decisions, and (2) official decisions of organizations are based on the personal self-interest of those vested with the institutional authority to make them. In an introductory economics textbook committed to public choice theory, Gwartney and Stroup wrote: “The government is not a supraindividual that will always make decisions in the ‘public interest,’ however that nebulous term might be defined. It is merely an institution through which individuals make collective decisions and through which they carry out activities collectively.” They continued: “The basic postulate of all economics is that changes in expected costs and benefits will cause decision-makers to alter their actions in a predictable way. Specifically, as the personal costs of an event increase (and/or the benefits decline), decision-makers will be less likely to choose the event. As costs decline and benefits increase, the opposite tendency will be true. This postulate will be maintained throughout our analysis of market behavior. Similarly, it will be utilized to yield insight on the organization and functioning of the public sector.”¹⁸

17. James Buchanan and Gordon Tullock, The Calculus of Consent: Logical Foundations of Constitutional Democracy (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1962). Tullock did not win the Nobel Prize with Buchanan in 1986, he believes, because he had never taken an economics course. I discussed this with him in 1988 at an Eris Society meeting in Aspen, Colorado.

This insight on at least one set of human motivations governing institutional action—costs and benefits—must be respected by the social theorist. We must apply this insight to the behavior of those people who have been invested by God with covenantal authority. We therefore need to pursue the question of law-enforcement in Old Covenant Israel. If the Levites and priests were in fact the covenantal agents assigned by God to enforce the gleaning laws, then we should not expect God’s law to rest on the assumption that the Levites and priests would normally carry out this assignment against their personal self-interest. We should expect rather to find judicial safeguards that protected their interests as they went about their judicial assignments. This is exactly what we find in the case of the gleaning laws.

E. How to Pay Judges

Judges should not take bribes. “And thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous” (Ex. 23:8).¹⁹ “Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous” (Deut. 16:19).²⁰ Judges should declare God’s law and apply it to specific cases that come before them. This is a basic operating premise of biblical jurisprudence. The availability of personal gain is not to influence the judges’ decisions. Having said this, we should also acknowledge the bribery law’s economic corollary: judges should not suffer losses because of their decisions. Their decisions should not make them poorer. Thus, we conclude, judges’ income should not be affected positively or adversely by their decisions. This is why they should be paid agreed-upon salaries by the sanctioning institution irrespective of their decisions for as long as they are employed by that institution. This rule governs both church and state.²¹ This is also why they should not be allowed to judge cases in which they are uniquely in a position to gain or lose because of their decision.

18. James D. Gwartney and Richard Stroup, Economics: Private and Public Choice, 2nd ed. (New York: Academic Press, 1980), p. 75.

19. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3: Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 52.

20. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 40.

The question then arises: Were the Levites and priests threatened economically by their honest enforcing of the gleaning law? If they did enforce it, did they or the priesthood in general risk a loss of income? Even more to the point, would their income automatically have been reduced? Specifically, did the enforcement of “gleaner’s rights” reduce the priesthood’s portion of the crop collected from the land owners? If their income would have been automatically reduced by their commitment to upholding the gleaning laws, then we must conclude one of two things: (1) Mosaic Covenant law rested on the assumption that judges would consistently hand down impartial decisions that were against their economic self-interest, or (2) the Levites and priests were not the authorized covenantal agents to enforce the gleaning laws.

Leviticus 23:9–22 makes it clear that the Levites and priests were not threatened economically by the enforcement of the gleaning law. Their share of the crop during the two feasts was not reduced by whatever percentage was harvested by the gleaners. The land owner had to bring a specified quantity of the best of his crop as an offering to God, by way of the priesthood. This payment was owed to the Levites irrespective of the percentage of the crop harvested by the land owner’s crew.

This payment was not part of the tithe; it was a separate offering. To understand the implications of this fact, consider the collecting of the tithe. Enforcing the gleaning law would not have threatened the church's income from tithes, since gleaners also owed a tithe, just as land owners did. A Levite's insistence that the gleaners be given access to the fields would not have threatened that portion of the tithe paid by gleaners. The gleaners would have understood to whom they owed the enforcement of this law. Furthermore, the Levite's enforcement of the gleaning law would have tended to ensure the collection of the tithe from the land owners. The requirement of gleaners on a farm created a class of outside agents who had knowledge of the size of the land owner's crop. This would have helped solve a fundamental problem for all agricultural tax collecting: cheating. Gleaners would have been potential monitors for the church's interests. Any land owner would have known this. In short, there was a meshing of economic interests between the Levites and honest gleaners in the case of tithe-collecting. The more gleaners in the fields, the more likelihood that two or more of them would have told the truth to the church's officers about the size of the crop.

21. The idea that a church member can legitimately reduce his tithe in retaliation against church officers is one of the most pernicious ideas in the modern church. This idea is the product of either of two errors. Error number one: a Christian can legitimately pay less than a tithe to God. Error number two: a Christian can lawfully pay less than a tithe to his local church if he redirects all or part of his tithe to another non-profit Christian agency. The former error is common to antinomian Christianity. See Gary North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 52:C. 791–93; cf. North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), Pt. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>). The latter is most prominently defended by R. J. Rushdoony, who wrote: “The tithe does not belong to the church or to any Christian agency, although it may be given to them. In whosoever hands it is, it belongs to the Lord. . . . Since the tithe is ‘holy unto the Lord’, it is our duty as tithers to judge that church, mission group, or Christian agency which is most clearly ‘holy unto the Lord’.” Rushdoony, “To Whom Do We Tithe?” in Rousas John Rushdoony and Edward A. Powell, Tithing and Dominion (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1979), p. 30. For a critique of Rushdoony’s views, see Appendix B: “Rushdoony on the Tithe: A Critique.”

F. Reducing the Costs of Monitoring Cheaters

If a land owner did not allow any gleaners to glean, one or more of them could lawfully complain to the Levites. This would alert the Levites to the possibility of an infraction: if the land owner was willing to cheat God by cheating the gleaners, he was perhaps equally willing to cheat God by cheating the Levites of their tithe. The presence of gleaners meant the presence of monitoring agents whose self-interest coincided with the priesthood's self-interest.

These agents were not paid by the priesthood. This points to the priesthood as the authorized agency for enforcing the gleaning laws. Why not the local civil magistrate? Because the Levites received a greater percentage of the crop than a God-honoring civil magistrate would. The Levites lawfully received a full 10% of the increase in the crop; only a corrupt king would demand this much (I Sam. 8:15, 17).²² The Levites had to give only 10% to the priests, retaining 90% for themselves (Num. 18:26–28). There was no similar kingly guarantee for the percentage retained personally by local magistrates. Thus, local Levites had a far greater economic incentive under Mosaic law to monitor the output of the fields than the local civil magistrates did. The Levites had the greater economic incentive under biblical law to seek out zero-price agents to monitor the output of the farms. This incentive structure indicates that the church was where God lodged the judicial authority governing the gleaning law. The church could do very well—collect the full tithe owed to it—by doing good: defending the gleaners.

22. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

The recapitulation of the gleaning law in the section of Leviticus dealing with two fixed-payment grain offerings—the firstfruits—also points to the priesthood as the agency of enforcement for the gleaning law. The priests are identified in this passage as being guaranteed a fixed payment at the feasts, irrespective of the size of any farm's crop. As judges, their economic self-interest was in no way threatened by the gleaners. The Levites and priests could enforce the gleaning law without worrying that their very diligence would automatically reduce their income. The costs of the gleaning program would be borne by the land owners.

What we have here is a system of mutual self-interest between the priestly tribe and the gleaners. The Levites and priests gained allies among the gleaners during the season of the tithe—zero-price (to the priestly tribe) monitors in the fields—while being exposed to no economic threat from their allies during the seasons of the feasts. Simultaneously, the gleaners gained allies—a priesthood with the power to excommunicate uncooperative land owners—during the season of the tithe, while being exposed to no economic threat from their allies during the seasons of the feasts.

This mutually beneficial arrangement worked well in normal years. It broke down, however, during sabbatical years (Lev. 25:4–5, 20). In sabbatical years, the priesthood had a short-term financial interest in seeing a normal harvest rather than idle (resting) land. Priests and land owners did not acknowledge the long-term agricultural productivity benefits of resting the land one year in seven. Their shortened time perspective persuaded them not to honor the sabbatical year of rest for the land. This seems to me to be the most likely reason why the sabbatical year of rest for the land was not enforced in Israel for almost five centuries (II Chron. 36:21). The Levites defected. But it was the priesthood, not the state, that was to enforce the gleaning law.

G. Church or State?

The recapitulation of the gleaning law appears at the end of the passage that sets forth the laws governing a pair of mandatory agricultural payments to the Levites. This placement identifies the priesthood as the agency of enforcement of the gleaning law, not the state. The land owner was reminded by these laws that he owed God for his wealth. His payment to two groups was his public acknowledgment of his debt to God. These two groups were the priesthood (vv. 15–21) and the gleaners (v. 22).

Let us consider the other possibility: the state as the agency of enforcement. To argue this way is to argue that the state is an agency that lawfully imposes positive sanctions—an error, biblically speaking. But I will not begin with this presumption. Instead, let us consider economic incentives for long-term obedience to this law and cooperation among all parties.

If the state had been the enforcing agency, this arrangement would have created specific incentives for both the land owners and the gleaners to use politics to defend their interests. To give the rural poor any benefits, the state would first have had to extract wealth from the land owners. The threat of violence would have been involved. This would have made adversaries of land owners and poor gleaners. It would have reduced the gleaning law to politics. A political struggle would have ensued, with control over the state as the target. The land owners probably would have won this contest.

A political battle would have been far less likely to ensue with the priesthood as the enforcing agency. No one except a member of the tribe of Levi could become a Levite or a priest. Thus, it was far more difficult for either land owners or gleaners to pressure the priesthood one way or the other. There was no way for either side to “buy into” the agency of enforcement if the priesthood had this authority. This made the politics of compulsory wealth redistribution far less likely to emerge over the gleaning issue.

The gleaning law was more likely to be honored if the priesthood enforced it. First, both the poor and the priesthood had lawful claims on a small portion of the production produced by the land owners’ assets. This did not eliminate the state as a lawful claimant, and therefore as a potential enforcer, for the state could lawfully tax the net production of the land. But the church had a lawful claim to a larger portion than the state did: the tithe. It therefore had a greater economic incentive than the state did in serving as the defender of the gleaners. Why? Because the gleaners served as tithe-monitoring agents for the church. The church in turn served as the judicial defender of the gleaners. Both the church and the gleaners had mutual self-interest in the church's status as defender. Second, neither the priesthood nor the gleaners were threatened economically by each other. Positive benefits accrued to both groups through the arrangement, and there were no offsetting negative aspects. The likelihood of attaining honest judgment was therefore enhanced.

The civil magistrate might also have used gleaners as monitors. If the state taxed each group at the same rate, the gleaners had an incentive to report on the size of the crop to either enforcing agency, church or state. But which authority would the gleaners have trusted most: church or state? The state could more easily confiscate a person's inheritance, as Naboth learned (I Kings 21). The priesthood did not possess comparable power. Neither the land owner nor the gleaner had as much to fear from the priesthood as from the state. It was much more likely that each would cooperate with the Levite than turning such power over to the state.

This arrangement is additional evidence that the state was not an agency of compulsory charity under the Old Covenant. It was not authorized as an intermediary to collect taxes from one group in a program of wealth redistribution, nor was it to serve as an agency of enforcement for direct transfers of wealth from the rich to the poor. The poor in the community had a legal claim on a local land owner's left-over portion of a crop only as God's designated agents of collection; the agency of enforcement was the church. The appropriate negative sanction was therefore excommunication, not imprisonment or exile.

This is not to say that excommunication was the only negative sanction. Excommunication would necessarily have been followed by the civil disenfranchisement of the lawbreaker. Those outside the church covenant could not be citizens in Israel.²³ It would also have led to the loss of the family's landed inheritance for those heirs who refused to break publicly with the head of the household over the practice that had led to his excommunication. Covenantal death is both familial and civil.²⁴ Both state and family, as covenantal institutions, were required to support this decision by the Old Covenant church. The way that this support was demonstrated was for the state to remove all those under its jurisdiction and also the excommunicant's

23. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

24. On civil death, see North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 54:E:2. On familial death, see Ray R. Sutton, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Divorce and Remarriage (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/rssecond>) heirs from the threat of future negative judicial sanctions by the excommunicant. He could no longer serve as a civil judge or sit on a jury. His heirs could break with him publicly on the issue that led to his excommunication without suffering his negative sanction: disinheritance. Because excommunication was the church's announcement of his covenantal death, he no longer possessed an inheritance in the land to pass on.

Conclusion

The gleaning law was recapitulated in this section because it follows the laws of the feasts. It points to the priests and Levites as the agents of enforcement. There was a mutually beneficial relationship between the priesthood and the gleaners. The gleaners could serve the Levites as monitors of the size of the land owner's crop. This assured the priesthood of getting a more honest tithe. The gleaners had to pay the tithe, but they had allies in the Levitical priesthood. Their priestly beneficiaries possessed the power of declaring a person excommunicate, including a cheating land owner or a land owner who refused to honor the gleaning law.

The arrangement was mutually beneficial. The priestly tribe had an incentive to see to it that gleaners received access to the leftovers of the crop, and the gleaners had an incentive to see to it that the local Levites were appraised of the size of the crop if cheating was going on. This mutually beneficial economic arrangement placed information boundaries around cheaters.

This arrangement also kept the state under appropriate boundaries. The local agents of enforcement, the priests, could not normally inherit rural land.²⁵ This reduced the threat of confiscation for both land owners and gleaners. It also tended to keep the politics of plunder at bay. With the priesthood as the agents of enforcement, no one was tempted to seek political power in order to increase his group's share of the plunder.

End of Volume 2

25. For the two exceptions, see Leviticus 27:20–21. Chapter 36.

BOUNDARIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON LEVITICUS

VOLUME 3

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

BOUNDARIES AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON LEVITICUS

VOLUME 3

GARY NORTH

Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus

Volume 3

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1

| | |
|---|-------|
| Foreword | xi |
| Preface | xxxii |
| Introduction to Boundaries and Dominion | 1 |
| Introduction to Part I: Sacrifices (Lev. 1–7) | 30 |
| 1. Sacrifice, Stewardship, and Debt (Lev. 1:1–4) | 36 |
| 2. Priestly Representation (Lev. 2:1–3) | 61 |
| 3. Leaven and Progressive Sanctification (Lev. 3:1, 17) | 70 |
| 4. Corporate Responsibility (Lev. 4:1–3, 22–24) | 103 |
| 5. Proportional Payments to God (Lev. 5:6–7, 11–12) | 159 |
| 6. Sacred, Profane, and Common (Lev. 5:14–19) | 178 |
| 7. Guardian of the Civil Oath (Lev. 6:1–7) | 228 |
| Introduction to Part II: Cleansing (Lev. 8–16) | 262 |
| 8. Wine as a Boundary Marker (Lev. 10:8–11) | 264 |
| 9. Biblical Quarantine (Lev. 13:45–46) | 282 |
| Introduction to Part III: Separation (Lev. 17–22) | 300 |
| 10. The Promised Land (Lev. 18:24–29) | 302 |

Volume 2

| | |
|--|-----|
| 11. Gleaning: Charity Without Entitlement (Lev. 19:9–10) . . . | 323 |
| 12. Verbal Bonds (Lev. 19:11–12) | 363 |
| 13. Protecting the Weakest Party (Lev. 19:13–14) | 381 |
| 14. Impartial Justice vs. Socialist Economics (Lev. 19:15) | 407 |
| 15. Local Justice vs. Centralized Government (Lev. 19:15) . . . | 444 |
| 16. The State’s Monopoly of Vengeance (Lev. 19:18) | 472 |
| 17. The Preservation of the Seed (Lev. 19:19) | 493 |
| 18. Covenantal Fruit (Lev. 19:23–25) | 527 |
| 19. Measuring Out Justice (Lev. 19:33–37) | 549 |
| 20. Inheritance by Fire (Lev. 20:2–5) | 589 |
| 21. Inheritance Through Separation (Lev. 20:22–26) | 619 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| Introduction to Part IV: Covenantal Acts (Lev. 23–24) | 634 |
| 22. Mutual Self Interest: Priests and Gleaners (Lev. 23:22) . . . | 636 |

Volume 3

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduction to Part V: Inheritance (Lev. 25–27) | 647 |
| 23. The Sabbatical Year (Lev. 25:1–7) | 653 |
| 24. Boundaries of The Jubilee Land Laws (Lev. 25:8–13) | 673 |
| 25. Economic Oppression (Lev. 25:14–17) | 712 |
| 26. Food Miracles (Lev. 25:18–22) | 736 |
| 27. The Right of Redemption (Lev. 25:23–24) | 748 |
| 28. Poverty and Usury (Lev. 25:35–38) | 764 |
| 29. Promise, Adoption, and Liberty (Lev. 25:39–43) | 786 |
| 30. Slaves and Freeman (Lev. 25:44–46) | 808 |
| 31. Mandatory Redemption upon Payment (Lev. 25:47–55) . . | 834 |
| 32. Nature as a Sanctioning Agent (Lev. 26:3–6) | 847 |
| 33. Limits to Growth (Lev. 26:9–10) | 865 |
| 34. God’s Escalating Wrath (Lev. 26:13–17) | 884 |
| 35. The Priesthood: Barriers to Entry (Lev. 27:2–8) | 892 |
| 36. The Redemption-Price System (Lev. 27:9–15) | 911 |
| 37. Tithing: The Benefit of Doubt (Lev. 27:30–33) | 930 |
| Conclusion | 935 |

Volume 4

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–Sacrilege and Sanctions | 957 |
| APPENDIX B–Rushdoony on the Tithe: A Critique | 970 |
| APPENDIX C–Leaven as Exclusively Evil | 1025 |
| APPENDIX D–Greek Mythology: The Myth of Classical Politics | 1044 |
| APPENDIX E–The Covenantal Structure of Judgment | 1064 |
| APPENDIX F–Rushdoony on “Hybridization” | 1085 |
| APPENDIX G–Malthusiansim vs. Covenantalism | 1108 |
| APPENDIX H–Conspiracy, Forgery, and Higher Criticism | 1145 |
| APPENDIX I–Critics of the Five Point Covenant Model | 1159 |

V. Inheritance (25–27)

INTRODUCTION TO PART V

And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubile unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family (Lev. 25:10).

The fifth section of Leviticus begins with Chapter 25, which lists the laws governing the jubilee year: inheritance inside the land's boundaries. The remainder of Leviticus deals with inheritance.

Modern evangelical theologians remain totally hostile to the theonomists' principle of biblical interpretation: any Mosaic law not annulled by the New Covenant is still judicially binding on church, state, or family. Nevertheless, prominent evangelical social commentators—though not the theologians—of the far right and the far left remain fascinated with the jubilee laws of Leviticus 25.

This is a very curious phenomenon. The jubilee laws were explicitly tied to the Promised Land. They were laws governing the sale of real estate and people. They were not revealed by God prior to the exodus, and they applied to no region on earth prior to the conquest of Canaan. Why should evangelical Protestant social commentators who denounce theonomy's hermeneutic of judicial continuity also proclaim the benefits of the jubilee laws? Is there some hidden agenda at work here?

There are two approaches taken by the evangelical commentators. Right-wing evangelicals argue that the jubilee's 50-year cycle was related to inherent limits on debt. Thus, we should in some way honor the jubilee's principle of debt limits. If we fail to do this through some sort of national bankruptcy law, a built-in economic cycle of economic depression and bankruptcy will do it for us. Far-left evangelicals argue that the jubilee law governed ownership in the broadest sense, not just real estate. Mosaic civil law specified that every rural plot be returned to its original family every 50 years. They conclude from this that the modern state should legislate a massive, compulsory redistribution of capital from the wealthy to the poor.

Both groups are wrong. Neither group comes close to the specifics of the jubilee law. Neither group comes close to the meaning of this law. This is because neither group actually goes to the actual jubilee law with the assumption that every aspect of this law as well as its Mosaic judicial context is judicially binding in the New Covenant. Neither suggests a principle of judicial continuity. Each side has an economic agenda, and each misuses the texts of Scripture to promote this agenda.

First, with respect to the right-wing analysis, the jubilee year had very little to do with debt limitation except insofar as a 50-year lease for land is a form of debt. How relevant is it today? Hardly anyone today signs a 50-year lease. This law had nothing to do with consumer debt or business debt for capital equipment, or anything besides Israelite bondservants, land outside of walled cities, and Levites' houses.

Second, with respect to the left-wing analysis, the jubilee law rested legally on God's mandate that Israel invade Canaan and wipe out all of its inhabitants. That is to say, the jubilee law rested on genocide. It was an aspect of the original spoils of war. It had nothing to do with a government program of systematic wealth redistribution from the rich to the poor. The jubilee law established that the conquering families of Joshua's era would permanently retain title to their land. This law was announced four decades before the conquest began. The return of rural land to the heirs of these original families every 50 years was not statist wealth redistribution; rather, it was the judicial defense of original title. It was therefore a defense of private property. God set the original terms of ownership. The civil government was supposed to uphold this original contract.

A. The Meaning of the Jubilee

The Mosaic law guaranteed that the Israelites would multiply if they obeyed God's law: longer life spans (Ex. 20:12) and zero miscarriages (Ex. 23:26). But a multiplying population leads to ever-shrinking land holdings. As time passed and the population grew, each family plot in Israel would shrink to the point of near-invisibility. Given the fact that the average family allotment at the time of the conquest was under 11 acres, a population that doubled every quarter century (3% growth per annum) could not remain an agricultural society for very long. Every 24 years, the average family's share of the farm would shrink by half. The average allotment would have been down to a little over an acre within a century with a population growth rate of 3% a year.

The jubilee law had nothing to do with the equalization of property except in the peculiar sense of eventually producing plot sizes so tiny that the value of any given family's landed inheritance was so small that it really did not make any difference. In today's world, an inheritance worth two dollars is twice as large as an inheritance worth one dollar, but in terms of what either inheritance will buy, the percentage difference between them really does not matter.

Then what was the jubilee law all about? First, it was a law that decentralized politics: every heir of a family of the conquest could identify his citizenship in a particular tribe because every family had an inheritance in the land. Ownership stayed inside the tribes. Second, it restricted the accumulation of rural land holdings by the Levites, who could never buy up the land. This geographically dispersed urban tribe would remain dispersed. Third, it kept the state from extending its land holdings on a permanent basis. Fourth, it kept foreigners from buying permanent residences outside of walled cities where homes were not under the jubilee law. Fifth, it pressured the nation to move into walled cities or emigrate out of Israel when population growth had its effect on farm size.

There was an overall economic principle at work here: those outside the covenants—civil, familial, and ecclesiastical—should be kept economically and numerically subordinate to those inside the covenants. This is not discussed by commentators.

If Israel remained covenantally faithful as a nation, the life style of the typical Israelite would not remain agricultural. A few generations after the conquest, the nation would have become an urbanized center of commerce. More than this: the old wineskin of the original grant of territory to Joshua's generation could not long hold the new wine of population growth. The Promised Land's boundaries would be breached. The Israelites would spread beyond the nation's borders.

Having said all this, now I must prove it. But there really isn't very much to prove regarding the fundamental economic aspect of this law.

It is simple to comprehend. The economic value of each family's plot would have decreased over the generations, as covenant-keeping families multiplied. Yet for over two millennia, the commentators have ignored the obvious: a growing population will eventually fill up the land.

There is a reason for this error: those who write Bible commentaries rarely take the Mosaic law seriously. They pay little attention to the coherence of its details. They refuse to ask themselves the crucial question: How did each law actually work in relation to the other laws? The liberals assume that the judicial system could not have functioned coherently because multiple authors wrote the Pentateuch. A coherent system of law would undermine their presupposition of judicial incoherence. They discover what they assume: a patchwork of uncoordinated laws. They do not seek to discover the meaning of any law in terms of the whole. Meanwhile, the conservatives feel justified in ignoring the details of the law because they assume that the Mosaic law isn't relevant under the New Covenant. This almost contemptuous attitude toward the Mosaic law has hampered Christian scholarship. It is time for this contempt to end. It is time to search the law in depth to discover what God expects from us, just as David did (Ps. 119). The jubilee law is a better place than most to begin because it is clearly a coherent series of laws with many ramifications.

B. A Matter of Holiness

God required the nation of Israel to hallow—set apart—the fiftieth year. This identified the fiftieth year as uniquely holy. It was the jubilee year. It was to be inaugurated by the blowing of the trumpet on the day of atonement (Lev. 25:9). The jubilee year was to be the year for claiming one's inheritance: of land, but far more important, of legal status as a citizen. Those circumcised men who were heirs of the original holy army that had conquered Canaan could not legally be disenfranchised except through the loss of their landed inheritance outside a walled city, or, in the case of the Levites, of their homes in Levitical cities.

Citizenship (freemanship) in Mosaic Israel was based on three religious factors: confession, circumcision, and lawful participation in God's holy army. One mark of citizenship was ownership of a share of the land once possessed by a conquering family under Joshua. This was not the only proof of citizenship, but it was the most universal. A man who had been judicially severed from ecclesiastical participation in the congregation could not retain his family's landed inheritance beyond the next jubilee. He became disinherited. His property would go to his next-of-kin: his kinsman-redeemer. He could legally buy title to a residence in a walled city, since this property was not governed by the jubilee law, but he might have to sell it in a crisis. It was risky to be excommunicated.

As an excommunicate, he was no longer an Israelite. He was a resident alien. As such, he became subject to the threat of lifetime servitude. So did his minor heirs (Lev. 25:44–46). He was no longer a free man. In an economic crisis, he might also lose his status as a free man.

If Israel did not honor God's law, God threatened national disinheritance (Deut. 8:19–20). This placed every Israelite in jeopardy of becoming a slave. Slavery was a permanent sanction. A slave could not buy his way out of slavery. There were only three ways for a slave to escape his legal condition and still remain inside the land: (1) manumission, (2) liberation by an invading foreign army, or (3) adoption, either by his owner or some other Israelite.

The legal issue of inheritance is, in the final analysis, the theological issue of adoption by God (Ezek. 16). So is the legal issue of liberty. In this regard, consider the New Testament's doctrine of adoption through God's grace (John 1:12; Eph. 1:5): an act of the ultimate Kinsman-Redeemer, Jesus Christ.

C. Enforcement

Was the jubilee law actually enforced? It is not clear from the historical sections of the Bible whether or not Israel ever observed the jubilee year. The Bible's silence indicates that it may not have been enforced, but we cannot be certain about this. Consider Ahab's theft of Naboth's land (I Kings 21). On the one hand, Naboth refused to sell his land to King Ahab. This is evidence of one man's commitment to the Mosaic law's principle of jubilee inheritance. On the other hand, the fact that Ahab thought he could permanently steal the land from Naboth by having him executed indicates that the enforcement of the jubilee was sporadic or nonexistent in his day. Surely, Ahab was not Naboth's kinsman-redeemer. The incident reveals no clear-cut evidence with regard to the entire history of Israel.

The Mosaic law provided economic incentives for those who possessed the authority to declare the jubilee year to do so: the Levites. Because the homes of the Levites in Levitical cities were governed by the jubilee (Lev. 25:32–33), the Levites had an economic incentive to declare the jubilee on schedule twice per century—far stronger than the incentive for them to declare a sabbatical year. Did they nevertheless defect? If so, why?

Conclusion

The jubilee year was a year of liberty for all the inhabitants of Israel (v. 10). But there was an exclusionary clause in the jubilee law: the enslavement of heathens (vv. 44–46). The best way to avoid slavery was to become a citizen of the holy commonwealth. Unlike the other ancient nations, citizenship in Israel was open to any resident alien, or at least to his heirs (Deut. 23:2–8). The blessings of liberty could be secured through confession of faith in God, circumcision, and eligibility to serve in God’s holy army. This was the Mosaic law’s incomparable promise to all resident aliens. But to attain citizenship, a family would have to remain economically productive until the heirs of the promise could secure their claim. This promise was conditional: remaining productive and avoiding being sold into servitude.

The jubilee law pointed to the conditional nature of Israel’s very existence as a nation: God’s threat of disinheritance, which was a threat of servitude to foreigners. There were conditions attached to citizenship: covenantal stipulations. The jubilee law’s stipulations (Lev. 25)—point three of the biblical covenant—were immediately followed by a list of promised sanctions (Lev. 26): point four.

Every true prophet of Israel came before the nation to bring a covenant lawsuit. This reminded them of the ethical basis of liberty. Israel’s supreme prophet would bring Israel’s final covenant lawsuit. He would declare liberty for the enslaved and slavery for the rebellious slavemasters. He would serve as the final go’el: the kinsman-redeemer and the blood avenger. He would adopt many and disinherit others. He would bring sanctions. He would announce the final jubilee year: “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, To preach the acceptable year of the Lord” (Luke 4:18–19).¹ Fulfilled!

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Covenant, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

23

THE SABBATICAL YEAR

And the LORD spake unto Moses in mount Sinai, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land which I give you, then shall the land keep a sabbath unto the LORD. Six years thou shalt sow thy field, and six years thou shalt prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof; But in the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land, a sabbath for the LORD: thou shalt neither sow thy field, nor prune thy vineyard. That which groweth of its own accord of thy harvest thou shalt not reap, neither gather the grapes of thy vine undressed: for it is a year of rest unto the land. And the sabbath of the land shall be meat for you; for thee, and for thy servant, and for thy maid, and for thy hired servant, and for thy stranger that sojourneth with thee, And for thy cattle, and for the beast that are in thy land, shall all the increase thereof be meat (Lev. 25:1–7).

The theocentric meaning of the sabbatical year was God as the source of productivity. Land owners could rest for a year, yet they would prosper.

A. Sabbath and Capital Preservation

This law is a recapitulation and extension of the sabbath laws of Exodus 23:10–12. It was not in origin a law of the jubilee, although it was tied to it; it was a law of the sabbath. This leads us to an important implication: the law of the jubilee was an extension of the sabbatical principle of rest. The sabbatical year law was primary; the jubilee land laws were secondary. The sabbatical year law was more fundamental than the jubilee land laws.

We begin our study of the jubilee laws with a consideration of the meaning of the sabbath: rest for land as well as for man. We need to discover the meaning of “rest” in the context of the sabbatical year. We also need to recognize that this law was a Mosaic land law: an aspect of the land as God's covenantal agent (Lev. 18:25, 28).¹

The law of God is theocentric. Whatever secondary applications it may have, a law's primary application always relates to God. This law focused on the mandatory resting of the land of Israel, but its ultimate reference point was the sovereignty of the Creator God of the covenantal promise.

The Bible introduces the subject of the sabbath in relation to the story of the creation. God created the world in six days; then He rested (Ex. 20:11).² Whenever the Israelites observed this law, they were acknowledging the sovereignty of God as both the Creator and the original owner. Bonar comments: "It has been well said that by the weekly Sabbath they owned that they themselves belonged to Jehovah, and by this seventh-year Sabbath they professed that their land was His, and they His tenants."³

God deals with men as an absentee landlord deals with leaseholders who use his property. He gave Adam an assignment; then He left the garden. This is a continuing theme in the Bible. The Book of Job pictures God as normally distant from man. Jesus used the theme of the absentee landlord in several of His parables. While God dwells in the midst of men judicially, especially during ecclesiastical feasts, He does not dwell in their midst physically. The dominion covenant (Gen. 1:27–28)⁴ is supposed to be fulfilled by men acting as responsible managers, not as supervised coolies in a field. The managerial model in the Bible is that of a sharecropper or tenant farmer who pays 10% of his net income to the landowner.

1. The Terms of the Lease

Leasing land is a very difficult proposition for a landlord. For an absentee landlord, it is even more difficult. The problem is to establish leasing terms that preserve economic incentives that achieve three goals: (1) keeping a competent lessee on the property by allowing him to maximize his income; (2) maintaining or increasing the capitalized value of the land; (3) maximizing the landlord's lease income. The ab-

1. Chapter 10.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2: Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24.

3. Andrew Bonar, A Commentary on Leviticus (London: Banner of Truth Trust, [1846] 1966), p. 446.

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3–4.

sentee landlord must discover a way to achieve all three goals without a great expenditure on local monitors. Inexpensive monitors are valuable.

God established the laws governing the Promised Land because He delivered it into their hands. As its owner, He had the authority to establish the terms of the leasehold. If the people did not like the terms of the lease, they could live elsewhere. So, one foundation of this law is God's ownership. (The other foundation is the principle of sabbath rest.)

The terms of God's lease are generous to the lessee, who keeps nine-tenths of the net income of the operation. This is the principle of the tithe. The tithe must be paid to God's designated agency of collection, the institutional church. The church acts as God's accountant and crop-collector. The payment of the tithe is a public acknowledgment by the lessees of God's ultimate ownership of the original capital: land (rent) plus labor (wages) over time (interest). This original grant of capital is also accurately described by John Locke's three-fold classification: life, liberty, and property.⁵

2. God's Land Grant

Consider the grant of capital in the form of developed land. God gave His people the Promised Land as their inheritance. This was an aspect of the promise given to Abraham (Gen. 15:13–16). Also included were existing houses and fields. "And I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and oliveyards which ye planted not do ye eat" (Josh. 24:13). They inherited the capitalized value of the houses and planted fields of the Canaanites. The Canaanites had unknowingly served as stewards of the land, building up its value until the fourth generation after Israel's descent into Egypt (Gen. 15:16).

Having delivered a capital asset into their hands, God specified that they must, as a nation, rest the land every seventh year. This was to be a national year of rest. The law applied only to agricultural land.

5. He never used this phrase exactly as quoted. He wrote of property in general as "life, liberty, and estate." John Locke, Second Treatise on Government (1690), paragraph 87. He spoke of "life, liberty, or possession" in paragraph 137. Exactly one century later, Edmund Burke wrote of "property, liberty, and life." Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790), paragraph 324. The United States Constitution adopted "life, liberty, or property" in Article V of the Bill of Rights (1791), and also in Article XIV:1 (1868).

It did not restrict commerce, manufacturing, equipment repair, or anything except planting and harvesting by owners. Urban occupations were not under the terms of this law. This law granted a year of rest from field work to all those under the household authority of landowners, including hired servants.

The year of rest was an acknowledgment of the limits on man's knowledge. Man cannot know everything about the land. He therefore was not allowed to treat the land indefinitely as if it were a mine. The "mining" of the soil could go on for six years in seven, but not in the seventh year. He was not allowed to strip the soil of its productivity. The seventh year was a rest period for the land in the broadest sense, including worms, bugs, birds, weeds, and every other living creature that dwelled on or in the land. This would preserve the land's long-run value.

This limitation on the landowner's extraction of present income from the land was a means of preserving the capitalized value of the land over time. This placed a limit on both man's greed and ignorance. It forced the landowner to honor the future-orientation of God's covenant. It preserved the landed inheritance for future generations. God's sharecroppers in one generation were not allowed to undermine the future value of the land by overproduction in the present. God, as the land's ultimate owner, was thereby able to maintain a greater percentage of the land's original capitalized value.

The Israelites did not always enforce the provisions of the sabbath land law prior to the exile. In other words, they did not enforce the terms of the original lease. God allowed this infraction to continue for almost five centuries. Then He collected payment from a later generation. "And them that had escaped from the sword carried he away to Babylon; where they were servants to him and his sons until the reign of the kingdom of Persia: To fulfil the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years" (II Chron. 36:20-21).⁶ Two generations of sharecroppers then learned a

6. By the time of Jeremiah, the Israelites had been in the Promised Land for almost eight centuries. Of this period, 490 years (70 x 7) had been spent without a sabbatical year. Jeremiah did not say when this period of law-breaking began. I presume that it began 490 years before the Babylonian captivity, i.e., sometime late in Saul's kingship. I am using James Jordan's chronology: "The Babylonian Connection," Biblical Chronology, II (Nov. 1990), p. 1: 3426 Anno Mundi = 586 B.C. The accession of Saul was 2909 AM. Jordan, "Chronologies and Kings (II)," ibid., III (Aug. 1991), p. 2. Computation: 586 + 490 = 1076 B.C., i.e., 3426 AM - 490 AM = 2936 AM. David came to the throne judicial lesson in Babylon: God has a long memory for the details of His law. Those who violate it will eventually pay restitution to Him by paying restitution to their victims. In this case, they paid to the land, which rested.

B. A Year of Gleaning

There appears to be a problem with the translation in the King James Version. Actually, there is no problem, but there is a problem for interpreters who do not take the text literally. Verse 5 says: “That which groweth of its own accord of thy harvest thou shalt not reap, neither gather the grapes of thy vine undressed: for it is a year of rest unto the land.” Conclusion: someone was prohibited from reaping the fields. The next two verses are translated as follows: “And the sabbath of the land shall be meat for you; for thee, and for thy servant, and for thy maid, and for thy hired servant, and for thy stranger that sojourneth with thee, And for thy cattle, and for the beast that are in thy land, shall all the increase thereof be meat” (vv. 6–7). Conclusion: the produce of the field served as food for someone. But if the increase is identified as meat (i.e., food),⁷ then what about the prohibition? “That which groweth of its own accord of thy harvest thou shalt not reap, neither gather the grapes of thy vine undressed.” How could the increase serve as food if the crop could not lawfully be harvested?

To solve this problem, the New American Standard Version inserts a word in verse 6: products. “And all of you shall have the sabbath products of the land for food. . . .” The Revised Standard Version translates it as follows: “The sabbath of the land shall provide food for you. . . .” None of this is satisfactory. Why not? Because the text of verse 5 is too specific: “That which groweth of its own accord of thy harvest thou shalt not reap, neither gather the grapes of thy vine undressed.” Someone was prohibited from harvesting. The question is: Who?

The solution is found in the word thy. The law was addressed to landowners. It applied to those identified in verse 4: “Six years thou shalt sow thy field, and six years thou shalt prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof.” Those who owned the fields and vineyards were not allowed by God to reap them in the seventh year. This prohibition did not apply to their hired servants, strangers in the community, poor people, and the beasts of the field. "But the seventh year thou shalt let it rest and lie still; that the poor of thy people may eat: and what they leave the beasts of the field shall eat. In like manner thou shalt deal with thy vineyard, and with thy oliveyard" (Ex. 23:11). The prohibition did not apply to those who did not own the land.

in 2949 AM, i.e., 1063 B.C.

7. The Hebrew words translated as “meat” in verses 6 and 7 both can be translated as “food.”

What this law established was a year of unlimited gleaning. Hired harvesters were not allowed into the fields and vineyards as employees of the landowners. Instead, they were given free access as independent agents. On the one hand, landowners did not invest any money or time in seeding the fields, pruning the vineyards, or caring for the land. This cut their expenses in year six. On the other hand, they reaped no crops. The crops were reaped in year seven by non-owners. Like the leftovers that were collected by the gleaners annually, so were the crops that grew by themselves. The land's rest was specific: rest from the activities of its owners, not rest from harvesting by non-owners.

What was the point? Rushdoony argues that this law was not humanitarian, meaning (I give him the benefit of the doubt) uniquely humanitarian, because gleaners had access to the fields every year.⁸ This interpretation is incorrect. This law was obviously a humanitarian law, for it singled out the poor and strangers. They would receive something from the landowner that otherwise would have been kept by him. A transfer of wealth was involved. The sabbatical land law was as much a humanitarian law as the annual gleaning law was. It treated the beasts of the fields as if they were gleaners. It treated them as servants on the weekly sabbath. In other words, the sabbatical rest forced landowners to let the land alone and allow human and animal gleaners into the fields. The landowners were not allowed to use land, man, or beast for their purposes. Non-owners were allowed by God to do whatever they wanted: to glean or not to glean. It was not that they were required to rest from self-employment as harvesters. They were not to be compelled by economic circumstances to work for landowners. God provided them with a source of income to offset the absence of wages. This was a compulsory wealth-redistribution program: from landowners to non-owners. The question is: Who imposed the negative sanctions? Answer: the Levites.⁹

In the sabbatical year, all charitable, morally obligatory, zero-interest loans had to be canceled (Deut. 15:1–7).¹⁰ This means that the debtor who had been forced to labor for another landowner because he had gone into debt and then had defaulted on this charitable loan had to be released from bondage. But this release from bondage did not relieve him from the personal economic necessity of participating in the harvesting of the crop of his former creditor and perhaps harvesting part of his own land's crop, which was also to lie fallow. He achieved his release from debt in a year of heavy national dependence on God. There was not supposed to be any planting in the season prior to the sabbatical year. The land was to receive its rest. So, the released debtor faced a problem: how to get enough to eat.

8. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 140.

9. See below: Section E.

He would have faced high demand for food from the free market. If he could harvest anything, he could either consume it or sell it. He would possess a valuable asset—food—in a year of above-average scarcity. This was an advantage for him. But without the landowner to serve as his intermediary, the newly debt-free Israelite would begin to regain his confidence as a free man. He would be forced to learn marketing in the year that he would plant the eighth-year crop on his own land, except in jubilee “weeks,” when the law also prohibited planting in the year after the sabbatical year. The year of his release from debt or even servitude would also be a difficult year economically. It was a year in which Israelites were supposed to rely on God's grace and their own previous thrift. This was why the newly released Israelite had to be liberally provided with food (Deut. 15:13–14): to get him through the sabbatical year. The fruit of his own field would belong to non-owning harvesters and beasts.

The sabbatical year was a system for forcing men to become self-consciously dependent on God's grace. Dependent on Him, they were to become dominion-minded. Subordinate to God, they were to become active toward the creation. This is the mandated hierarchical pattern for the dominion covenant: those who are meek before God will inherit the earth. The year of debt release was to be the year of open access to the fields for non-owners. It was a year of hard work for harvesters, for they harvested on their own and for their own. A new master told them to do this: the market.

If independent harvesters were given free access to the land's unassisted production one year in seven, they would have had an incentive to recommend land management practices that would maximize output in the seventh year: crop rotation, fertilization, irrigation, etc. This does not mean that landowners were required to follow the suggestions of the full-time harvesters, but to the extent that owners deferred to harvesters in gathering information and assessing its value, the sabbatical year law encouraged agricultural practices that did not strip the land of its long-run productivity. This law, when enforced, created a class of preferred workers who had an incentive to act as economic agents of the land, and therefore as economic agents of the future.

10. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

We do not know for certain whether the gleaners would have received more income as secondary harvesters in a year following an investment of capital or as primary harvesters in a year following an investment of zero. As I hope to show, it is likely that the total output of the fields was greater in a normal harvest year than in a sabbatical year.¹¹ We know that when this law was enforced, the land received its rest, and the poor had access to the fields. God therefore placed self-interested monitors in the midst of the community. The question was: Would these monitors possess sufficient power or influence over landowners through the priesthood? The answer for 490 years: no.

C. The Pressure on Landowners to Save

When the law was enforced, landowners had considerable economic incentive to plan for a year of no agricultural income. They had to save enough food to get them through the seventh year. They also had to realize that the seed corn of the sixth year would be needed at the end of the seventh year in order to provide a crop for the eighth year. This would have to be put aside late in year six to plant late in year seven. Owners had to plan and organize for six years to prepare for the sabbatical year. If they did not save enough food to get them through the sabbatical year, they would be tempted to eat their seed corn during the sabbatical year. They had to overcome this temptation. In short, they had to save.

Saving requires future-orientation. Without future-orientation, we would consume everything today. Societies and communities that are characterized by what Ludwig von Mises called high time-preference¹² are marked by low amounts of capital and low production. People in such societies value present goods over future goods so highly that they consume almost everything today. No society that is completely present-oriented could survive except through charity from outside. The harsh reality of the cursed effects of scarcity (Gen. 3:17–19)¹³ forces members of every society to plan for the future, to save some percentage of today's goods for tomorrow's needs and wants.

11. See below, Section E.

12. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), pp. 485–90. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

The law of the sabbatical year added another incentive to become more future-oriented. Those landowners who neglected to store food for a coming year of zero agricultural income would find themselves in a bind in the sabbatical year. They might be forced to borrow enough food to feed themselves. They would therefore become debt slaves. They might even be forced by a lease agreement to leave their farms until the next jubilee year. They might have to become landless wage earners or even gleaners. Someone who was more thrifty would then become the land's administrator. That is, in what was designed by God to be a year of release for Israel, improvident, present-oriented landowners would fall into poverty and servitude. This sabbatical system kept control of the land in the hands of future-oriented, efficient people.

The landowner had to forfeit income in the sabbatical year. Resting the land was mandatory. Was this a civil law? The text does not say. If it was—and I presume that it was¹⁴—the state was required by God to act as the land's agent. Owners were not allowed to oppress the land. So, this civil law suppressed a specific evil action: the exploitation of the land. It brought unspecified negative sanctions against evil-doers.¹⁵ But there was another aspect of this law: mandatory gleaning. The landowner had to allow hired servants and poor people into his fields to glean in the sabbatical year. Was this a case of a civil law that imposed positive sanctions for one group at the expense of another? Was it a state-enforced welfare program?

To answer this question, we first need to determine if this law established a property right for the local poor. The fruit of the land was to become the property of the gleaners in the sabbatical year. Which local gleaners possessed an enforceable legal claim? The judicial problem—which gleaners would be allowed into which fields—still remained, as it did with everyday gleaning. The law did not give specific

13. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 12.

14. A civil law is justified biblically because God threatens a society with corporate negative sanctions for disobedience. These sanctions came: the Babylonian captivity.

15. One possible civil sanction: two years of rest for the land as the victim, i.e., double restitution.

legal claims to specific gleaners. This indicates that the state was not the enforcing agency with respect to the gleaners, even though it was the enforcing agency with respect to the protection of the land. This was not a state welfare program.

What agency was to defend the claims of the gleaners? The priesthood. Priests had the authority to excommunicate landowners who refused to allow gleaners into the fields. Priests could lawfully bar covenant-breakers from the Passover. They policed the sacramental boundaries. The priests could serve as wealth-transfer agents in this case—defenders of the poor. It was God's land, and He wanted His delegated owners to allow gleaners into His fields. Gleaners as a class had ecclesiastically enforceable legal claims to access to the unplanted, fallow land. But without local agents to enforce these legal claims, specific gleaners could not gain access to land owned by someone willing to break this law.

This law's effects were not entirely negative on landowners. First, the long-term productivity of the land was retained by the sabbatical year. Second, it did give landowners a year of rest. They could concentrate on other business ventures, perhaps even going on a missionary-trade journey. Third, it increased the economic pressure on landowners to exercise thrift in years one through six.

The discipline of thrift—future-orientation—is not natural to fallen man. It must be learned. Where it is learned, and where its requirements become habitual, the individual becomes the owner of a major capital asset. The psychology of thrift is a very valuable resource. In the category of “human resource” or “human capital,” the habit of thrift rivals the importance of the famous Protestant work ethic. In fact, thrift is basic to this ethic. Max Weber wrote in 1905 regarding the Protestant ethic that “Old Testament morality was able to give a powerful impetus to that spirit of self-righteous and sober legality which was so characteristic of the worldly asceticism of this form of Protestantism.”¹⁶ Thrift has been a crucial aspect of this worldly asceticism, he wrote: “When the limitation of consumption is combined with this release of acquisitive activity, the inevitable practical result is obvious: accumulation of capital through ascetic compulsion to save.”¹⁷ The sabbatical land law pressured Israelite landowners to master the discipline of thrift.

16. Max Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, trans. Talcott Parsons (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, [1905] 1958), p. 165.

17. Ibid., p. 172.

D. The Threat of Debt

In the seventh year, all charitable, zero-interest loans to poor Israelites became null and void (Deut. 15:1).¹⁸ Creditors could not legally collect from impoverished debtors. Meanwhile, the economy grew tight: reduced food production. Improvident landowners went looking for loans to get them through the year. There would have been greater-than-normal demand for interest-bearing loans, i.e., higher interest rates. This would have tended to squeeze the weakest borrowers out of the loan market. Lenders prefer to lend to those who are likely to repay. On the other hand, if an evil man wanted to trap a weak debtor in order to gain control over his labor if he defaulted, the year of national gleaning would have been an ideal time. The recently liberated debtors would have known this. Their memory of their previous bondage was to keep them from succumbing to this temptation. The poor had access to the untilled fields of the landowners. They were expected to take advantage of this unique situation and stay out of debt. They were not to “return to Egypt” by going into debt and risking another round of bondage.

Any landowner who had not planned carefully would face a crisis in year seven. Without sufficient thrift in the previous six years, he might have been forced to enter the debt market to save his business. But he would have come to a lender as a businessman, not as a poverty-stricken brother in the faith. There was no moral pressure on anyone to lend to him. Such moral compulsion to lend applied only to loans to the poor (Deut. 15:7–10). A land-secured loan threatened the borrower greatly: to default the loan meant the forced sale of his land until the loan was repaid or until the next jubilee year.

Lenders would have been more ready to lend to landowners than to most poor men: secure collateral. This gave landowners an advantage in the loan markets. But there was great risk for the debtor. There was also the embarrassment of having to mortgage the family’s property. The present-oriented landowner would then face the need to repay the loan, making preparation for the next sabbatical year even more burdensome. The debt trap loomed much larger to the person who fell behind. This is the grim reality of debt.

The sabbatical year was therefore a major burden on landowners. There is little doubt that they would have preferred to avoid this burden. If this law was going to be enforced, there had to be an agency of enforcement that had an economic incentive to do so. Which agency was it? And why did it fail to enforce the law prior to the Babylonian exile?

18. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 36.

E. The Defection of the Levites

We know that this law was not enforced for centuries prior to the exile. Jeremiah identified their failure to honor the year of release as the cause of the exile: "At the end of seven years let ye go every man his brother an Hebrew, which hath been sold unto thee; and when he hath served thee six years, thou shalt let him go free from thee: but your fathers hearkened not unto me, neither inclined their ear" (Jer. 34:14).

The enforcing agents, the Levites (gleaning law) and civil magistrates (land law), did not assert their authority. Why not? We do not know. This may be one of those cases in which they had a short-term incentive not to enforce the law. In a normal year, they were entitled to tithes and taxes from landowners and gleaners. In a sabbatical year, only the gleaners paid. The landowners harvested nothing for their own account. Perhaps the collectors of tithes and taxes did not consider the soil's long-term output, allowing landowners to plant and harvest.

I conclude that the total output of the land in a normal year was greater than during a sabbatical year. Levites and civil magistrates received a larger tithe in non-sabbatical years. Thus, they had less short-term economic incentive to see that the sabbatical year law was enforced. They had to enforce the law because God required them to do so, not because they were paid to do so. The tribe of Levi was to cooperate with the local monitors: hired hands, the poor, and strangers. Levites were required to see to it that the sabbath year's gleaning law was enforced. They refused. They forfeited their position as sanctioning agents on this issue. As a result, the nation went into captivity. After their return, Israel honored this law (I Macc. 6:49, 53). Ezekiel had prophesied that heathen residents in the land would participate in a new allocation of land (Ezek. 47:21–23), but we do not know if the jubilee laws were honored.

Which gleaners fared best? It is understandable that the hired harvesters were content with their arrangement during normal years. They were paid to work. They probably would have preferred to work for landowners in the sabbatical year had the owners planted the crops in year six. The poorer members of the community, however, probably fared better comparatively during the sabbatical years. Perhaps the total harvest going to them would have been larger in sabbatical years than with conventional gleaning in normal years, despite the fact that no one would have planted crops in year six. We cannot know for sure. What we do know is that this law was not enforced for half a millennium. The land was not given its rest.

There were no monitors in positions of authority with a clear-cut economic incentive to see that the law was enforced. Those who might have had this incentive would have been the poorest members of the community, or, in the case of strangers, non-citizens: men with little authority. So, the law went unenforced until after the return from Babylon. Only after God had demonstrated that He would bring negative sanctions through a foreign invasion did Israel obey the law. In the days of the Maccabees, they still honored it. It was their fear of God and His negative historical sanctions, not positive economic incentives, that changed their behavior.

F. In Search of an Explanation

We now come to a comment made by Robert North, a liberal Jesuit scholar, whose voluminous study of the jubilee law is as unreadable as it is theologically perverse. He cited Germanic sources throughout, and he imported their presuppositions. He even invokes the classic assertion shared with equal enthusiasm by theological liberals and neo-evangelicals: the Bible is not a textbook of []. “Though the Pentateuch was not meant as a textbook of economics, still if a universal fallow can be shown to have been economically impossible, then according to sound hermeneutic principles it is legitimate to seek some other explanation for the text.”¹⁹ He then cites a page and a half of Germans who have concluded that fallow land on a national basis could not have taken place in the same year. He adds that “a fallow without plowing would be useless and positively detrimental; . . .”²⁰ If this interpretation is correct, then God was clearly being a bit of a tyrant for having sent the heirs of these people into bondage for their having neglected to do what was not only economically impossible but agriculturally detrimental. This sounds like an unwise conclusion, even

19. Robert North, Sociology of the Biblical Jubilee (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1954), p. 115.

20. Ibid., p. 116.

for a theologically liberal Jesuit.

He cited another German—there are always plenty of German academics to cite in support of any argument—that perhaps there was sufficient agricultural productivity for the Israelites to save enough food to feed themselves in the seventh year.²¹ He then moved from a discussion of thrift to a discussion of the need for miraculous crop yields, either annually or in the sixth year, to produce this surplus.²² He never said which theory he prefers.

The real goal of the sabbatical year, he said, was care for the poor. This means that a policy of rotating one-seventh of the crop would have met this criterion.²³ (This highly practical suggestion comes from a rarity in his text, an American scholar.) Of course, this would not include the number-one criterion of the text: a national year of rest. He admits as much: “Obviously our interpretation runs counter to the surface-sense of certain expressions of the sacred text, though for many of these we have already defended an acceptable alternative.”²⁴ Conclusion: there was no true fallow; it was a rotating fallow.²⁵

The modern state of Israel pretends to honor this law, and has since the 1880s. Every seventh year, the farmland of the nation is transferred by the Minister of Internal Affairs to the Chief Rabbinate, which sells title to an anonymous gentile, usually an Arab, who retains formal ownership for one year. Then he sells it back. By Rabbinic law, he is outside the sabbatical year’s requirements, so he does not enforce this law. He sells back the land to the Chief Rabbinate at the end of the sabbatical year, which in turn returns formal ownership to the de facto owners. “If we were to stop marketing our products to Europe even for one year, we’d be finished,” according to the Director General of the Ministry of Agriculture.²⁶ Non-Zionist Orthodox Jewish rabbis refuse to go along, however, since by Jewish law, Jews are not allowed to sell land in Palestine to gentiles.²⁷ They organize special shops in sabbatical years that sell fruits and vegetables grown by Arabs on Arab land.²⁸

21. Ibid., p. 117.

22. Ibid., p. 118.

23. Ibid., p. 119.

24. Idem.

25. Ibid., p. 120.

26. Clyde Haberman, “The Rabbis’ Almanack of Seventh-Year Farming,” New York Times (Dec. 10, 1992). The year 1992 was the sixth year in the cycle.

27. Israel Shahak, Jewish History, Jewish Religion: The Weight of Three Thousand Years (Boulder, Colorado: Pluto Press, 1994), p. 43.

28. Ibid., p. 108, n. 17.

(A similar strategy is used during Passover week. The law requires all leaven to be removed from every Jewish household. This makes it difficult for grain merchants. Solution: observant Jews sell all of these prohibited substances to the local rabbi, who sells them to the Chief Rabbinate, which sells them to a gentile for a week. Then he sells them back. By a special dispensation, these multiple sales are presumed to include the leavened substances of non-practicing Jews, too.)²⁹

G. New Testament Applications

The jubilee laws are important for Christians because of Jesus' first public announcement concerning the nature of His ministry:

And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears (Luke 4: 17–21).

Jesus' application of Isaiah's language of liberation indicates that He saw His ministry as the fulfillment of the jubilee year.³⁰ This is consistent with the New Testament's judicial theology of rest. Jesus' work in history is the judicial foundation of man's sabbatical rest; His kingdom is the definitive basis in history for man's future rest (Heb. 4:1–11).

1. Abrogation

There is a great deal of confusion in modern Christian circles, both fundamentalist and liberationist, regarding the applicability of the jubilee laws in the New Covenant era. Furthermore, Christians can gain little from a study of the rabbinical sources dealing with the jubilee, since very few of these texts deal in detail with these post-temple applications of the jubilee laws. There is no treatise on the jubilee in

29. Ibid., p. 45.

30. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

either the Mishna or the Talmud, perhaps because the rabbis considered the jubilee laws abrogated from the era of the Babylonian exile until the coming of the Messiah.³¹ This is not to say that the Talmud does not mention the jubilee. It does. So did the Geonim, the principals of the Jewish academies in Babylonia in the medieval era. But the information they conveyed is not consistent.³²

The question arises: Is the sabbatical year law still in force? This is another way of asking: What in the New Testament may have annulled it?

First, the model for the sabbatical year was the weekly sabbath: a day of rest at the end of the week. In the New Covenant, the locus of authority of sabbath enforcement has shifted from the state and church to the individual. This is the judicial basis for the annulment of the death penalty for violating the weekly sabbath (Ex. 31:14–15).³³

Second, the law in Israel established a national sabbatical year governing both agriculture and charitable debt. This was possible to impose because the Israelites had entered the land as conquerors at a specific point in time. That historical starting point no longer exists.

The absence of a fixed sabbatical year could be changed today through civil legislation, but is there biblical justification for this? Only in the name of ecology. The individual is to enforce the weekly sabbath, not the state.³⁴ The same is true of any seventh-year sabbath. Is the individual still duty-bound by God to honor the sabbatical year? Does God threaten negative sanctions, corporate or individual, against those who refuse to honor its provisions? Or was the sabbatical year limited to the Mosaic Covenant?

Were the sabbatical year laws exclusively part of the jubilee system? No. The law was given first in Exodus 23:10–11. It was given primarily for the benefit of the poor in the land and secondarily for the beasts of the field (v. 11). The context was the sabbath in general (v. 12), not the jubilee system.

The identification of the beasts of the field as recipients of the benefit of rest leads to the broader question of just which beasts God has

31. This is the suggestion of Robert North, Sociology of the Biblical Jubilee, pp. 87–90.

32. A. Löwy, A Treatise on the Sabbatical Cycle and the Jubilee (New York: Hermon, [1866] 1974), pp. 3–4.

33. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24.

34. Ibid., Appendix E.

in mind. Did He mean domestic animals only? Or is the wildbeast also included? What about the worm and the insect?

2. Ecology

Man has creaturely limits on his knowledge. He is not omniscient, nor will he ever be. He can harm land through mono-crop agriculture and other techniques that can prove to be exploitative over time. Overuse of pesticides in modern times may prove to be a cause of major ecological damage. Scientists do not presently agree on this. Eventually, a majority of them may agree, although it may take a crisis to produce such agreement, or else generations of additional agricultural productivity. The question is: Is a compulsory year of rest for the sake of the land established by God's law? Should the state compel the owner of every farm, every garden, and every vineyard to cease cultivating his land one year in seven—not necessarily all enterprises in the same year, but each enterprise one year in seven? Alternatively, should land-use enforcers be sent out to police every farm, determining that one-seventh of each plot under cultivation be left fallow each year? The regulatory nightmare that would result from either interpretation suggests an answer: no. But is the potential cost of regulation a sufficient reason for abandoning this law? No. There has to be a judicial reason for ignoring any of God's Old Covenant laws, not mere pragmatism or presumed convenience. The familiar refrain is not sufficient: "God's Old Testament laws applied only to an ancient agricultural economy." That is an invalid objection covenantally; it is also weak in this instance. This happens to be an agricultural law. If the law's primary goal was ecological—rest for the creatures of the field and soil—then the New Covenant can be said to have changed this law's validity only if it established a new relationship among God, man, and the land. Did it? Yes. The land ceased to be a judicial agent of God.

3. Sanctions and Sanctification

First, we have already considered one major change in relation to the land's function as a judicial agent for God. The Promised Land vomited out the Canaanites (Lev. 18:28). This judicial act is now performed by Jesus Christ (Rev. 3:16).³⁵ The land no longer serves as the judicial agent of God. Second, the curse of the land was definitively overcome by the New Covenant. Men are no longer polluted ritually by the land. This is why foot-washing is no longer ritually mandatory in the post-resurrection, post-temple era. Progressive sanctification, individually and corporately, steadily removes the restraints of the land's scarcity. This has been happening rapidly for at least two centuries. The price of agricultural commodities compared to the price of labor has steadily dropped as the jurisdiction of the free market economy has advanced.³⁶

35. Chapter 17.

The exploitation of the land, net, may still be going on. We may be facing an agricultural calamity as a result of our techniques of agricultural production and land management. Or we may not. The ecological evidence is unclear; well-informed people can be found on both sides in this debate.³⁷ The price evidence, however, is clear: no agricultural calamity is foreseen by those whom we reward to forecast such possibilities. The industrial revolution has also been an agricultural revolution.³⁸

The covenantally significant question is: Can we legitimately attribute a supposedly looming agricultural calamity to our failure to rest the land? Had we required a year of national rest for the land, would this have offset all the other commercial farming practices that supposedly erode the land's long-term productivity? There is no way to know. We are comparing a conjectural future (famine) with a conjectural past (the rate of land erosion under the sabbatical year). So, in order to understand the sabbatical land law in the Mosaic economy, we have to decide in terms of biblical judicial issues, not ecology.

This is not to say that resting the land will not prove to be a means of increasing long-term agricultural output, and therefore income, but the test must be profit and loss under free market conditions. The general law of the New Covenant sabbath must prevail: the decision of each individual landowner operating under the sovereign jurisdiction of his conscience. We dare not move from the annulled jubilee year laws to the sabbatical land law in New Covenant times, nor dare we move from the New Covenant sabbath to a national year of rest. This leaves the landowner in charge. Paul wrote: “One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it” (Rom. 14:5–6a).³⁹ The same covenantal principle of individual jurisdiction also applies to the sabbatical year of rest.

36. Julian L. Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981), ch. 1; Simon and Herman Kahn (eds.), The Resourceful Earth: A Response to 'Global 2000' (New York: Basil Blackwell, 1984); E. Calvin Beisner, Prospects for Growth: A Biblical View of Population, Resources, and the Future (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1990), ch. 7.

37. The erosion school is best represented in the United States by the tabloid Acres, USA; the conventional view by the United States Department of Agriculture and university agricultural schools.

38. If the nanotechnology revolution ever becomes a reality, as I believe it will, mankind's food supply will be able to be produced by microscopic machines using molecular raw materials. K. Eric Drexler, Engines of Creation (Garden City, New York: Anchor/ Doubleday, 1986). The debate over a looming agricultural productivity crisis will probably shift from the misuse of the land to the misuse of "free" resources, mainly moving fluids that cannot easily be assigned to owners.

Conclusion

The judicial foundations of the sabbatical year of rest were twofold: (1) the sabbath rest principle; (2) God’s original ownership of the land. At the time of the conquest, God transferred control over the land to families that held legal title on a sharecropping basis, operating under specific terms of the original leasehold agreement. The lease provided a payment to God (the tithe), i.e., a high percentage return to God’s authorized sharecropper-owners (90% before taxes), and a provision for the maintenance of the long-term capital value of the land (the sabbatical year). Those residents in Israel who did not own the land had legal title to the output of the land: unrestricted harvest in sabbatical years. The legal title of the gleaners was to be enforced by the Levites and priests on land owners.

The judicial issue of the sabbatical year was rest: rest for the land, hired workers, and animals. This also included release from the requirement to repay charitable debts (Deut. 15). By “rest,” the law meant a respite for the landless from the requirement to work for the landed. This law governed agricultural land and those who worked it. There is nothing in the Bible to indicate that it governed any nonagricultural occupation.

This law pressured landowners to plan and save for the sabbatical year. They had to store up both food corn and seed corn. When this law was enforced, it forced them to develop the habit of thrift, i.e., future-orientation. The law also required landowners to forfeit the automatic (though not “natural”) productivity of the land in the seventh year. The poor, the stranger, the field animals, and the regular harvesters all had a legal claim on this production, if they were willing to do the work to glean it.

39. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

The Levites were the enforcers of this law as it applied to the gleaners' lawful access to the fruits of the land. The Levites refused. This indicates they had little or no short-term economic incentive to enforce it. This in turn indicates that their tithe income was greater when the land was planted and harvested. Finally, this indicates that there was less net agricultural output in the seventh year than in the other six.

This law was good for the land and all the creatures great and small that inhabited it. Owners were restrained in their use of God's land. Agricultural practices that overworked the land were restrained by this law. The land, as God's judicial agent, deserved its rest. This law mandated it. If this land-protecting aspect of the law was enforced by the state, as I believe it was, it rested on the legal status of the land as God's judicial agent, not on the state as an agency of wealth redistribution to the gleaners. This law is no longer in force in the New Testament era because the land ceased to be a covenantal agent in A.D. 71.

The sabbatical year law was enforced after the Babylonian exile. The fear of God is a great incentive. During the exile, God had substituted His negative sanctions in history for the failure of the priesthood and the state to enforce the sabbatical year law. Exile was God's partial disinheritance of Israel. It warned Israel of comprehensive disinheritance, should the nation continue to rebel. The exile altered land tenure: a new distribution replaced the original distribution under Joshua. The exile severed the judicial link between each family's plot and the conquest generation. The jubilee land laws had been established by genocide, but genocide was neither authorized by God nor possible after the exile. The jubilee's heathen-slave laws remained in force, but the residents who participated in any post-exilic distribution were to become immune to the threat of permanent servitude by Israelites.

The sabbatical land law was an extension of the law of the sabbath. It was not a subset of the jubilee land laws. On the contrary, the jubilee land laws were temporary applications of the sabbath law's principle of rest. If there are any New Testament applications of the sabbatical year of rest for the land, they are based on ecology or the general authority of sabbath rules, not on the jubilee's military conquest. This transfers the locus of authority to the landowner: individual, not corporate.

BOUNDARIES OF THE JUBILEE LAND LAWS

And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubile to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land. And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubile unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family. A jubile shall that fiftieth year be unto you: ye shall not sow, neither reap that which groweth of itself in it, nor gather the grapes in it of thy vine undressed. For it is the jubile; it shall be holy unto you: ye shall eat the increase thereof out of the field. In the year of this jubile ye shall return every man unto his possession (Lev. 25:8–13).

The theocentric meaning of the jubilee law was God's ownership of both the land and the people. He reserved the right to dictate the terms of inheritance to the Israelites. This inheritance included rural land, heathen slaves, and homes owned by Levites in Levitical cities. It also included citizenship.

A. The Jubilee Cycle

First, we begin with the problem of identifying the jubilee cycle. Rabbis from at least the completion of the Talmud (c. 500 A.D.) taught that the jubilee year was scheduled every fiftieth year.¹ Most Christians have agreed with this view through the centuries, but not all. A few have thought that the forty-ninth year was counted as the fiftieth.²

1. A. Löwy, A Treatise on the Sabbatical Cycle and the Jubilee (New York: Hermon, [1866] 1974), pp. 7–9. He cited numerous sources.

2 2. Ibid., pp. 9–10.

Among those commentators who accept the fiftieth year as the jubilee year, there has been debate over the first year in the next cycle. Most Jewish commentators have argued that the fifty-first year constituted the first year in the next cycle. This was the prevailing opinion of the contributors to the Talmud. Maimonides agreed.³ Other Talmudic Jews have believed that the jubilee year itself counted as the first year.⁴ There have been other theories held by a handful of scholars.⁵

The idea that the fiftieth year served as the first year in the next sabbath cycle suggests a parallel: the shift from the Old Covenant's seventh-day sabbath to the New Covenant's eighth-day sabbath, which itself served as the inauguration of a first-day sabbath, i.e., the shift from the Old Covenant's week (6–1) to the New Covenant's week (1–6).⁶ Jesus' resurrection took place on the eighth day, i.e., the day after the Jewish sabbath, a sabbath that took place on the Sadducees' Passover that year.⁷ Sunday is the first day of the week for most Christians: the symbolic equivalent of the eighth day. The theory of the fiftieth year as the first year in the next cycle is certainly appealing to the Christian (and also to the Talmud's Rabbi Jehudah),⁸ but we cannot appeal to historical records of the jubilee as empirical tests of this theory, because there is no biblical record or any other ancient contemporary record of Israel's ever having celebrated a jubilee year.⁹

B. The Timing of the Jubilee

Second, we need to consider the timing of the day of jubilee. It is not generally recognized that there were two calendars in ancient Israel: priestly and kingly, sanctuary and land. They corresponded to the

3. Ibid., pp. 10–11.

4. Ibid., p. 12.

5. Ibid., pp. 13–16.

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 6.

7. Jesus celebrated Passover on Thursday evening, Nissan 14, the Pharisees' Passover, and was tried and crucified the next day. The Judean dating, used by the Sadducees, was different. They celebrated Passover beginning on Nissan 15 (Nissan 14, as calculated by the Sadducees), a sabbath night, so they refused to enter the Praetorium when they took Jesus before Pilate, lest they be defiled for Passover (John 18:28b). They called for the Romans to remove the dead bodies because the sabbath that year corresponded to the Judean Passover (John 19:31). On the distinction between the Pharisees' and the Sadducees' respective Passover dates, see Harold W. Hohner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1977), ch. 4, especially the chart on page 89.

8. Löwy, Sabbatical Cycle, pp. 23–24.

9. Ibid., p. 19.

two shekels: sanctuary (Lev. 27:3, 25) and ordinary. James Jordan believes that the two calendars corresponded to two separate government systems.¹⁰ The religious year began in the spring: the first month, Nisan (Esth. 3:7), when Passover was celebrated (Ex. 12). The civil year began in the fall: on the first day the seventh month of the religious calendar (called Tishri in the Talmud).¹¹ This was marked by a day of sabbath rest (Lev. 23:24–25). Ten days later, the day of atonement took place (Lev. 23:27–28).¹² As we shall see, the jubilee was tied to the civil (land) year. This is why the jubilee was a predominantly civil event. It launched the next cycle of inheritance. This inheritance was predominately civil: a matter of citizenship. Those who were heirs of the generation of the conquest were citizens; the jubilee restored them to their judicial tokens of citizenship: their land. On the fifteenth day, the feast of booths or Tabernacles took place (Lev. 23:34–36, 39–43).

In the jubilee year, trumpets were to be blown throughout the land on the tenth day of the seventh month. This marked the great year of release. It was also a day of rest because it was the day of atonement (Lev. 23:28). The next day, men dwelling near the borders of Israel had to begin their walk to Jerusalem to celebrate the feast of Tabernacles (Booths). In no more than four days, they had to complete their journey. This time requirement restrained any major extension of the geographical boundaries of Israel. On the day above all other days in Israel's life that was tied to geographical boundaries—jubilee's day of landed inheritance—the timing of the jubilee and Tabernacles established tight limits on the size of the nation. Israel could never become an expansionist territorial empire and still honor the day of atonement (rest), the jubilee year (inheritance), and the feast of Tabernacles (celebration). When the Israelites walked to Jerusalem in the jubilee year, all but the Levites went as rural land owners and citizens, even urban dwellers who had leased out their land to others. But they could never lawfully walk from an inheritance located very far from Jerusalem. If Israel ever became an empire, Israelites living near the outer boundaries would forfeit their inheritance in the original land.¹³

10. James Jordan, "Jubilee, Part 2," Biblical Chronology, V (March 1993), p. 1.

11. Rosh. Hash., 1:3; cited in "Month," Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, eds. John M'Clintock and James Strong, 12 vols. (New York: Harper & Bros., 1876), IV, p. 547.

12. Jordan noted that the official first year of the reign of a king of Judah ran from the first day of the seventh month of the religious year to the last day of the sixth month of the next religious year.

13. The reader may think: "This is obvious. What is the big deal?" Try to find any

C. The Day of Atonement

The year of jubilee was to begin on the day of atonement (yom kippur). The theological significance of this timing is readily apparent: the day of atonement was the day on which the people of Israel made a formal public acknowledgment of their dependence on the grace of God in escaping from God's required punishment for sin. There had to be an animal sacrifice as part of this formal worship ceremony. It was a day of affliction: death for an animal and public humility for the participants. No work was allowed on that day. The day of atonement was a day of rest—the ultimate day of rest in ancient Israel, symbolizing covenant-keeping man's rest from the curse of sin. It was a day set apart for each person's examination of his legal state before God and the self-affliction of his soul.

For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the LORD. It shall be a sabbath of rest unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls, by a statute for ever. And the priest, whom he shall anoint, and whom he shall consecrate to minister in the priest's office in his father's stead, shall make the atonement, and shall put on the linen clothes, even the holy garments: And he shall make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, and he shall make an atonement for the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar, and he shall make an atonement for the priests, and for all the people of the congregation. And this shall be an everlasting statute unto you, to make an atonement for the children of Israel for all their sins once a year. And he did as the LORD commanded Moses (Lev. 16: 30–34).

Also on the tenth day of this seventh month there shall be a day of atonement: it shall be an holy convocation unto you; and ye shall afflict your souls, and offer an offering made by fire unto the LORD. And ye shall do no work in that same day: for it is a day of atonement, to make an atonement for you before the LORD your God. For whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people. And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy from among his people. Ye shall do no manner of work: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings (Lev. 23:27–31).

commentary on Leviticus that discusses the relationship between the timing of the day of atonement-jubilee and the growth of empire. The silence of the commentators is testimony to their unwillingness to take the Bible's literal texts seriously (theological liberalism) or to take political theory seriously (theological conservatism).

Once each half century, the day of affliction was to become the day of liberation. The meaning of the Hebrew verb for “afflict” is submission or humility. An example of submission is found in the incident in which Hagar had fled from Sarai, and the angel then confronted her. “And the angel of the LORD said unto her, Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands” (Gen. 16:9). An example of humility is where God brought low the children of Israel in the wilderness period for their failure to submit to Him: “And thou shalt remember all the way which the LORD thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live” (Deut. 8:2–3). In both instances, the covenantal issue was covenantal subordination: point two of the biblical covenant model.¹⁴

The day of national liberation and family inheritance took place on the day of formal subordination to God. The imagery is obvious. Only through submission to God can man experience liberation. Autonomy is not liberation. This is why modern humanism’s free market economic theory, which is both agnostic and individualistic, is not the source of the free society that its defenders proclaim. If we begin our economic analysis with the presupposition of the autonomous individual in an autonomous cosmos, we begin with a hypothesis that cannot lead to liberty and maintain it.

D. A Question of Subordination

The year of jubilee began with the blowing of a trumpet, a trumpet announcing the day of atonement. The ram’s horn, yobale (Josh. 6: 4–5), is the origin of the English transliteration, jubilee (Lev. 25:10– 13). The jubilee year followed a sabbatical year of rest for the land, a year in which the agricultural poor, the stranger, and the beasts of the field did not harvest the fields for the fields’ owners; they worked for their own direct benefit.

14. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

1. The Hierarchy of God's Grace

The sabbatical year temporarily broke the economic hierarchy linking the agricultural employer, his employees, and the land. The sabbatical year was to be a year of release for employees from direct and personal economic subordination to employers. It was also to be a release for the land, which was not to be planted in the sixth year. The owner of the land, God, for one year transferred the fruit of His land to non-owners, i.e., a different set of sharecroppers who could lawfully retain 90% of whatever the land, under God's direct administration, might produce. They became dependent on God's grace rather than the owners' sowing of the fields and care of the land. Like the wilderness that had brought forth manna six days out of seven, so was the land of Israel to become in the sabbatical year: the visible arena of God's grace. God promised to bless Israel with an added measure of grace: the miraculous sixth-year crop, the "manna" preceding the jubilee year.¹⁵

2. The Hierarchy of Market Competition

Hierarchy is an inescapable concept. There is no escape from subordination. There can be movement from one form of subordination to another, but not its abolition. The market that governed the agricultural employee indirectly through the decisions of his employer six years out of seven would, in a sabbatical year, bring its pressures on him directly. His six years as a subordinate to land-owning masters were intended to prepare him for a year of service to an impersonal master: the competitive market. Consumers bring their judgment upon producers through the dual sanctions of profit and loss. The employee, when he became the master of his own production unit in the jubilee year, would have to learn to meet the demands of both nature (food for his family) and the market. He would find that he was still under authority. The system of sabbatical years was designed to give every landless field hand the opportunity to become familiar with this economic pressure. For one year in seven, he was to learn about subordination to the market.

Then, in the year following the seventh cycle of the sabbatical weeks of years, the landless employee was to receive his reward: the return of his landed inheritance in the jubilee. The day of atonement that began the jubilee year brought Israelites as individuals under the afflic-tion of God: voluntary submission. It simultaneously released them from direct economic subordination. In that year, members of poor Israelite families repossessed their portion of the larger family unit's land. Having submitted to God, they would no longer have to submit to landed administrators. They would become landed administrators. They would then have to submit to consumers directly, without a land owner above them telling them what to do.

15. Chapter 27.

3. Dominion Through Subordination

The covenantal basis of dominion is formal, oath-bound subordination to God. The jubilee year began with the sound of a trumpet: the audible symbol of the final judgment. "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed" (I Cor. 15:52). The day of atonement was to remind the Israelite nation of its unique corporate subordination to God. This ritual subordination was to serve as the foundation, both judicially and psychologically, of each Israelite's tasks of leadership. Humble before God, they were to be aggressive toward the world. This is the meaning of the New Testament's statement, "Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. 5:5). They are meek before God, not meek before covenant-breaking men.¹⁶ To be compelled to be meek before covenant-breaking men is evidence of God's temporary chastisement of His covenant people. It is to be forced to adhere to an illegitimate civil oath.¹⁷

On the day above all other days of the year in which each Israelite publicly manifested his subordinate position before God, the day of atonement also served, twice per century, as the day of inheritance, the day on which a man's inheritance in rural land was returned to him. He would henceforth regain legal authority over a piece of land. He would then have an opportunity to discover whether he had the necessary skills and foresight as an entrepreneur—a future-predicting planner and executor of plans¹⁸—to retain economic authority over his inheritance as an economic representative of God, his own family, and the

16. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Appendix D:D–E.

17. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

18. Ludwig von Mises, "Profit and Loss" (1951), in Planning For Freedom, 3rd ed. (South Holland, Illinois: Libertarian Press, 1974), ch. 9; (<http://bit.ly/MisesPFF>) Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>) Cf. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 32.

consumers in the marketplace. He became a legal representative of God as owner, which required economic representation.

4. Rest and Subordination

The meaning of sabbath rest is subordination. Man, a creature, had the whole creation delivered to him by God on the sixth day of the first week. Man was to exercise dominion under God: a subordinate who was created explicitly to rule. To acknowledge his subordinate position under God, he was supposed to rest on the seventh day of God's week, which was the first full day of man's week.¹⁹ He rebelled instead. He illegitimately imitated God by prematurely grabbing for the robes of authority (Gen. 3:5). One aspect of Adam's curse was to have his day of rest postponed. This day of rest is definitively reached only through the New Covenant of Jesus Christ. "There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his" (Heb. 4:9–10). Progressively, rest is attained through covenantal obedience to God: "Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief" (Heb. 4:11). This rest from all labor in history is attained only at death: "Rest in Peace," we write on tombstones. Those who die disinherited by God in history do rest from their labors, but they have no peace forever.

Because of the nature of Adam's transgression, the Mosaic Covenant established its mandatory sabbath day as day seven. Old Covenant man was allowed to rest only after his labors were finished for the week. "Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work. But the seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates" (Ex. 20:9–10).²⁰ Even as he had to work for his dinner, Old Covenant man had to work for his rest. Having played the rebel in his quest to become as God, man was made to suffer the burden of cursed work before his day of rest. This had not been the original design for man's work week. The six-one pattern of work and rest was a curse, even though weekly rest was grace that man does not deserve. The one-six pattern was the original Edenic model. Man was designed to begin his

19. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 6.

20. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24.

week with celebration—a covenant renewal meal—and rest.

Adam rebelled against his assigned day of rest. The mark of covenant-breaking man is his assertion of primary sovereignty, meaning autonomy. God did not rest the first day. Imitating God, covenant-breaking man refused to rest on his first day. Instead, he participated in a satanic communion meal at the forbidden tree. Then he sewed fig leaves to cover himself. He became a tailor. Adam's denial of his need for a day of rest was a denial of his subordinate position, metaphysically and judicially, under God.

So it was in Mosaic Israel. To work on the day of atonement—the day of man's required public acknowledgment of his subordination—was suicidal. It called down the negative sanction of spiritual death, directly imposed by God. "And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy from among his people" (Lev. 23:30). It was therefore an excommunicable offense: the loss of inheritance in the land and therefore also citizenship.

This is the judicial background of the year of jubilee. It was required to be held in the year following the seventh sabbatical year, i.e., year 50. The sabbatical year was a required year of rest for agricultural land. It came at the end of six years of harvesting. The year of jubilee followed the "sabbath" of a "week" of sabbath years. This constituted a second sabbath year: a double rest period. This was a double testimony to man's subordination to God.

E. The Spoils of War

"In the year of this jubile ye shall return every man unto his possession" (Lev. 25:13). This provision applied to rural land. It did not apply to property in walled cities (Lev. 25:29–30). It did not apply to non-agricultural property.

1. Winners Take All

What was the historical origin of this law? Judicially, it was an application of the Mosaic sabbath (Ex. 23:10–12).²¹ Historically, it was an aspect of the promised spoils of war. God offered land only to those families that would participate in the military conquest of Canaan. Families that refused to join the battle could not participate in the post-conquest distribution of land. This was never stated explicitly, but we can safely conclude that this was the case because of Joshua's dealing with the Reubenites, the Gadites, and half the tribe of Manasseh. These tribes had already inherited property outside the Promised Land, across the Jordan River. This inheritance was an aspect of the spoils of war. Moses had announced: "And when ye came unto this place, Sihon the king of Heshbon, and Og the king of Bashan, came out against us unto battle, and we smote them: And we took their land, and gave it for an inheritance unto the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to the half tribe of Manasseh" (Deut. 29:7–8). However, for them to inherit this recently promised land, Joshua insisted, they would have to fight the Canaanites alongside the other tribes, despite the fact that they had already fought Sihon and Og for their land, and Moses had passed title to them. In short, there would be no transfer of lawful title prior to the final battle. That is to say, there would be no rest for any until after the labor of war was over for all. What had been given to these tribes definitively could not be claimed by them finally until after the conquest was over.

21. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 53.

Then Joshua commanded the officers of the people, saying, Pass through the host, and command the people, saying, Prepare you victuals; for within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan, to go in to possess the land, which the LORD your God giveth you to possess it. And to the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to half the tribe of Manasseh, spake Joshua, saying, Remember the word which Moses the servant of the LORD commanded you, saying, The LORD your God hath given you rest, and hath given you this land. Your wives, your little ones, and your cattle, shall remain in the land which Moses gave you on this side Jordan; but ye shall pass before your brethren armed, all the mighty men of valour, and help them; Until the LORD have given your brethren rest, as he hath given you, and they also have possessed the land which the LORD your God giveth them: then ye shall return unto the land of your possession, and enjoy it, which Moses the LORD'S servant gave you on this side Jordan toward the sunrising. And they answered Joshua, saying, All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us, we will go. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee: only the LORD thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses (Josh. 1:10–17).

If militarily victorious tribes had to wait for the transfer of title to land already verbally promised—land located across the Jordan and therefore not part of God's promise to Abraham—then what of lawful title to land within the boundaries of the Jordan? Surely the basis of landed inheritance inside the Promised Land would also be based on military conquest. Yet it is unheard of for any commentator to discuss the jubilee year in terms of its historical basis: the distribution of spoils after the military conquest of Canaan.²² This is why the jubilee inheritance laws are so frequently misinterpreted, including their various applications to areas completely outside of the jubilee land law's agricultural frame of reference.

2. Genocide and Burnt Offerings

For the Israelites to inherit the land, they were required to kill everyone who had previously occupied the land. "And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee" (Deut. 7:16a). Note that the key issue was theology: the gods of the land's previous owners. The people of Israel were to be kept away from these alien gods.

God required a bloody burnt sacrifice as the covenantal foundation of the national inheritance: the genocide of the residents of Jericho and the city's subsequent burning. This mandatory ritual sacrifice²³ was to be followed by the total annihilation of all other residents of the Promised Land. To the degree that the Israelites in any way pitied the existing inhabitants, they would thereby compromise their inheritance. They would have to share the land with others.

Recent commentators have attempted to apply the jubilee laws to the modern world as if these laws had not been grounded in genocide. The original promise had been given to Abraham, but it was conditional on the heirs' continuation of the ritual of circumcision: a bloody rite symbolizing the cutting off of a man's biological heirs.

Consider a rate of population growth of 3% per annum, which was sustained by many agricultural nations in the twentieth century. This rate of increase would have doubled the size of the population in a quarter of a century. By the first jubilee, the average farm would have been down to just under three acres (11 divided by 4). By the second jubilee, the average farm would have been under .7 acre. And so on.

22. Robert North's seemingly exhaustive and mentally exhausting study, Sociology of the Biblical Jubilee (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1954), is a good example of modern scholarship. Based on higher critical assumptions and methodology, it never mentions the jubilee in relation to the conquest of the land.

23. Achan and his entire family, including their animals, were executed for his having thwarted this required burnt offering. See Appendix A: "Sacrilege and Sanctions."

This is why the generation of the conquest had to be circumcised before the conquest could begin (Josh. 5). Commentators who do not trace the origin of the jubilee to the Israelites' genocidal conquest of the land also refuse to discuss the jubilee in terms of the unique, one-time nature of the conquest and the subsequent distribution of military spoils. To discuss the jubilee laws without also discussing the God-mandated genocide that implemented these laws is the equivalent of discussing the Christian ideal of heaven without discussing the cross, hell, and the lake of fire. The legal issue is the same: eternal genocide and eternal burnt offerings—not by covenant-breakers; rather, of covenant-breakers.²⁴

F. Dominion, Ownership, and Rest

Notice the phrase, "The LORD your God hath given you rest, and hath given you this land" (Josh. 1:13b). Rest was associated with lawful inheritance. These two and a half tribes had fought and won their land outside of the Promised Land, but they would now have to fight and win again in order to seal their lawful inheritance: "Until the LORD have given your brethren rest, as he hath given you" (Josh. 1:15a). To seal the tribal promise, there had to be a national victory. Only a comprehensive military victory would bring the nation the rest that would become the basis of tribal inheritance. Only on the basis of military peace can private property be secured. This is an eschatological reality: when the implements of war disappear, God's covenant people will then possess lawful title to their property in peace. This can come only when nations universally conform themselves to the terms of God's covenant law.

But in the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the house of the LORD shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and people shall flow unto it. And many nations shall come, and say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the LORD of hosts hath spoken it (Mic. 4:1–4).

24. Gary North, "Publisher's Epilogue," in David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

There are three primary goals of war: victory (dominion), spoils (inheritance), and peace (rest). The greatest of these is peace, if the peace is secured on God's terms. Permanent peace can be attained only when the law-order of the victors replaces the law-order of the losers. Victor's justice is the only form of justice after the war ends. But without a change in law, there has been no victory. There has only been assimilation by the defeated culture. The classic examples of this in Western European history were the military victories by the Goths over Rome. The Goths were steadily assimilated both theologically and judicially by the Christian order that had prevailed in Rome. Legal scholar Harold Berman put it well: without a change in the legal system, there is no revolution, only a successful coup or rebellion.²⁵ It takes more than one generation to produce a genuine revolution, he said.²⁶ In Israel, it took two generations: the generation of the exodus, all but two of whom died in the wilderness, and the generation of the heirs, 40 years spent growing up in the wilderness. Because God ordered the total annihilation of the Canaanites, this revolution in law was not supposed to take another generation. Canaan could not be persuaded by the law, so it was to be destroyed by the law's designated sanctioning agent: the land itself, operating through the nation of Israel. God's grace to the Israelites mandated His wrath to the Canaanites.

All three goals—victory, spoils, and peace—were encapsulated in the conquest of Canaan. The conquest of Canaan did not rival the exodus as the archetype of God's dealings with His people, but it did govern that most crucial aspect of a rural civilization: the inheritance of land. The specific terms of land ownership and inheritance in Israel, which in turn established the judicial basis of citizenship, did not derive from the Old Covenant era prior to the exodus, but were announced after the exodus and were ratified in history by the conquest.

Berman quoted Goethe: a tradition cannot be inherited; it must be earned.²⁷ This was surely the case with Mosaic Israel. But before the promised Abrahamic inheritance could be delivered to the heirs—the fourth generation—there had to be an act of covenant renewal. The conquest was closely associated with point four: covenant renewal. The conquest began with the crossing of the Jordan (Josh. 4): a boundary violation. As had been true of Moses' crossing out of the wilderness into Egypt with his uncircumcised son (Ex. 4:24–26), this boundary violation required an act of covenant renewal. Like Moses' son, the sons of Israel had not been circumcised in the wilderness. There followed the mass circumcision at Gilgal (Josh. 5:2–8) and a Passover meal of the corn of Canaan (Josh. 5:11). The manna then ceased; the fruit of the land replaced it (Josh. 5:12).

25. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), pp. 19–20.

26. Ibid., p. 20.

27. Ibid., p. 6.

James Jordan speculates that the entire period constituted a five-point covenantal sequence: (1) the sovereign call out of Egypt by God; (2) the establishment of a judicial hierarchy (Ex. 18), which constituted a judicial sanctuary; (3) the moral development of the inheriting generation for 40 years; (4) the conquest itself, which brought mass sanctions against the Canaanites; (5) the occupation of the land. Evidence for this is the close association of the conquest with the oath-signs of circumcision and Passover.

G. The Demographics of the Jubilee Inheritance Law

The year of jubilee nullified all existing rural land lease contracts. On what legal basis? Assertion of original title. God, as the primary owner, transferred the leaseholds back to the heirs of the original conquering families. God announced in advance of the conquest the terms of His leasehold contracts. These leases were to be periodically re-established with members of the families of the original invasion and conquest. There could be no other lawful basis of inheritance in the Promised Land. Eventually, a future generation of those families whose members were unwise enough not to honor these terms would find itself dispossessed through captivity (Lev. 26:33–35).

The terms of the leases created a monopoly of family ownership. No foreigner prior to the exile could ever hope to establish a landed inheritance outside of a walled city except by adoption into an Israelite family. This law tended to keep foreigners inside cities. They would have been restricted to such occupations as merchants, craftsmen, and bankers. They could become landed heirs outside the cities only through adoption by an existing Israelite family.²⁸ On the other hand,

28. This included adoption through marriage for women, as the cases of Rahab and Ruth indicate.

they themselves could become the inherited property of Israelites, for the jubilee land law established permanent, inter-generational chattel slavery for foreigners (Lev. 25:44–46).²⁹ The jubilee laws therefore made it difficult for foreigners to achieve a permanent cultural presence in the land. It kept them as outsiders, except as temporary leaseholders, hired workers, slaves, and residents of walled cities.

1. Population Growth

Simultaneously, the jubilee inheritance law created demographic pressure for expansion beyond the boundaries of the Promised Land. No commentator ever discusses this obvious aspect of the jubilee. First, Mosaic law established the possibility of zero miscarriages: “There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil” (Ex. 23:26). It therefore established the possibility of high birth rates. Second, it established the possibility of longer life spans: “Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (Ex. 20:12).³⁰ Third, the law allowed the adoption by Israelites of circumcised foreigners, a practice that had taken place widely in Egypt before the persecutions began.³¹ This was a covenantal formula for blessings that would produce “explosively” high population growth.³² The rapid population growth they had experienced in Egypt, which had so terrified the Pharaoh of the oppression (Ex. 1:7–10), was the model.

When a high population growth rate is combined with a fixed supply of land, societies become progressively urbanized and progressively engaged in foreign trade. The model in the early modern period of Europe is the tiny nation of the Netherlands. The twentieth-century model was the even tinier nation of Hong Kong.³³ If residents of a small, formerly rural nation are unwilling to become urbanized, they must emigrate to less densely populated nations. The homeland fills up.

2. Small Farms and Large Families

In ancient Israel, the land was to be transferred back to the original

29. Chapter 31.

30. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 25.

31. Ibid., ch. 1:D.

32. Populations do not explode except when bombed. The language of modern growth theory has attached the metaphor of explosives to the metaphor of growth.

33. Alvin Rabushka, Hong Kong: A Study in Economic Freedom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979).

families. The geographically bounded nation was small when they invaded, yet they came in with at least two million people. There were 601,730 adult males at the time of the conquest (Num. 26:51), plus 23,000 Levites (Num. 26:62). Since this was approximately the same number that had come out of Egypt (Ex. 12:37), there had been no population growth for 40 years. This meant that they were reproducing at the replacement rate level: 2.1 children per family. (Some children do not marry, which is why the replacement rate is not 2.0 children.) So, there must have been about 2.4 million people at the time of the exodus: two adult parents and about two children per family.³⁴

They entered a land of about six and a half million acres.³⁵ This meant that the average family, had there been no cities, would have owned about 11 acres.³⁶ Not all of this land was arable. Some of it was taken up by cities, where the Levites lived. Over time, the number of acres per “nuclear” family unit³⁷ would have declined as population rose. If Israel had remained faithful to God’s law, miscarriages would have ceased. The early Egypt-era rate of growth of Israelite nuclear families would have resumed. No nuclear family could have inherited more than a declining number of acres as time went on. Eventually, no farm would have been large enough to support all the heirs. This would have forced the creation of extended family agricultural corporations, with one or two nuclear families (or even foreign sharecroppers) running the farm in the name of the extended family’s members, most of whom would have moved to cities or abroad. There would be no mass exodus back to the original family plots of the conquest era. Only moral rebellion could have kept the land of Israel sufficiently empty of residents to have allowed each family’s return to the family plot.

Any discussion of this law as if it were a way to maintain small family farms must discuss in detail how very small these farms would have been within a century or two of rapid population growth. The point is, this law did not guarantee the continuation of agricultural life for a significant percentage of the population. There was no way for any law to

34. North, Authority and Dominion., ch. 1.

35. The land was no more than 10,330 square miles. Barry J. Beitzel, The Moody Atlas of Bible Lands (Chicago: Moody Press, 1985), p. 25. There are 640 acres per square mile. This means 6,661,200 acres.

36. 6,661,200 acres divided by 601,730 families = 10.98 acres per family. This was comparable to the 4 to 15 acres owned by the average Roman farmer around 200 B.C. “Agriculture, history of,” Software Toolworks Illustrated Encyclopedia (1990). This is Grolier’s Encyclopedia on a CD-ROM disk.

37. Contrasted with the extended family.

assure such a way of life to a growing population in a very small nation. What the jubilee inheritance law did was to cut off all reasonable hope that a family had any economic future in farming, except in those periods in which the nation was in rebellion, when God would respond by sending plagues, famines, miscarriages, and other negative demographic sanctions. But in such deplorable ethical conditions, it would have been highly unlikely that the jubilee inheritance law would have been honored anyway. The system of covenantal law and covenantal sanctions in Mosaic Israel points to a conclusion that the commentators never mention: the anti-rural implications of the Mosaic law. It did not despise farming; it simply made clear that hardly anyone in a God-honoring society is expected to be a full-time farmer. The urban family garden, not the family farm, is the biblical ideal.

3. Declining Per Capita Farm Income

The jubilee inheritance law was a way to guarantee every head of household a small and declining share of income from a family farm. Most heirs would have become urban residents in Israel or emigrants to other nations. The promise of God regarding population growth—being fruitful and multiplying—was a guarantee that covenantal faithfulness would lower the proportion of per capita family income derived from farming. The law made it plain to everyone except modern Bible commentators that if the nation's numbers grew as a result of God's blessing, Israelites could place little hope in the possibility of supporting themselves financially as farmers. Far from being a guarantor of egalitarianism, the jubilee inheritance law was a law forcing covenant-keeping people into the cities or out of the nation. This is rarely or never mentioned by commentators. Instead, they talk about rural Israel and its annulled rural laws, which were cultural.

Real estate located inside walled cities did not come under this law. Neither did property owned or leased outside the boundaries of Israel. This law warned them that a covenantally faithful nation would become an urbanized nation and/or a nation of emigrants. The law made it plain that their lives as farmers could continue only if they were not faithful to God's law. If the nation remained primarily agricultural, this was God's visible curse against them.

The jubilee land inheritance law was designed to force the Israelites to plan for a very different future. They were to become city dwellers as a people within the Promised Land, and traders, bankers, and skilled manufacturers outside the land. There could be no legitimate hope in remaining farmers in the Promised Land. The boundaries of the land were fixed; their population size was not. There would eventually have to be expansion beyond the boundaries of Israel, and there would have to be a concentration of population in Israel's cities. Like the garden east of Eden, the family-owned farms of Israel would be temporary dwelling places of preliminary training for worldwide dominion. The faster the population grew, the faster their life as farmers and animal herders would disappear. What the West has experienced since the late eighteenth century is what God had in mind for Israel from the time of the conquest, namely, rapid growth—of population, cities, specialization, manufacturing, trade, emigration, and per capita wealth. To the extent that they did not experience this, they would know that they were under God's national curse.

The jubilee inheritance law was designed to promote emigration out of Israel and into urban occupations inside the land that relied on foreign trade. The rural land inheritance law promoted contact with foreigners. This was an aspect of the dominion covenant. It was to serve as a means of evangelism. The story of Israel, her laws, and her God was to spread abroad:

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).³⁸

4. The Blindness of the Commentators

R. K. Harrison's comment on the jubilee inheritance law indicates his concern with what he supposes are its economic effects. He paid no attention to demographics and its effects, which is a common characteristic of virtually all commentators on this law. "An emphasis on humanitarianism and social justice is a pronounced feature of the legislation in this chapter, and it should be noted that the tenor of the laws pursued a middle course between the extremes of unrestricted capitalism and rampant communism.”³⁹ A middle course between communism and capitalism? This misreading of the text is so total that it is difficult to understand how anyone who has read the Pentateuch could write it. So powerful has been the Fabian socialist ideal⁴⁰ of the so-called Keynesian “mixed economy”—halfway between capitalism and communism, but with limits always set by the state—that modern Bible commentators have read Fabianism’s worldview into biblical texts. The condition of most intellectuals prior to the astounding overnight collapse of both Soviet Communism and socialist ideology in 1991 was well described in 1979 by historian Clarence Carson: the world in the grip of an idea.⁴¹ That idea was either a variation of Keynesian economics or outright socialism. This outlook has colored even conservative biblical exegesis.

38. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

There was no possibility whatsoever of communism under the Mosaic Covenant. The jubilee laws were aimed at preserving private ownership, even including the private ownership of foreign-born slaves. There was no “middle course” between communism and capitalism, since communism was never an option. The ownership system was entirely capitalistic. God, the land’s owner, from the beginning established leasehold arrangements with those who would occupy His land after the conquest. This is the essence of capitalism: a voluntary contract between owners and managers or tenants.

What Harrison might have written is that the law promoted a variety of rural familism. Yet even this minimal statement would have been true only when there was no population growth, i.e., only when the nation was under God’s curse. Otherwise, the jubilee inheritance law

39. R. K. Harrison, Leviticus: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1980), p. 229.

40. The most famous popular presentation of this ideal was made by British playwright George Bernard Shaw: The Intelligent Woman’s Guide to Socialism and Capitalism (New York: Brentano’s, 1928). The best critical histories of the movement are Margaret Patricia McCarren, Fabianism in the Political Life of Britain, 1919–1931 (Chicago: Heritage Foundation, 1954) (<http://bit.ly/mpmfabians>) and Rose L. Martin, Fabian Freeway: The High Road to Socialism in the U.S.A., 1884–1966 (Chicago: Heritage Foundation, 1966). (<http://bit.ly/rmfabians>) This is a condensation of Sister McCarren’s privately circulated manuscript, The Fabian Transmission Belt, which her ecclesiastical superiors ordered her to withdraw in the early 1960s. She was the daughter of U.S. Senator Pat McCarren, who headed the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee in the early 1950s.

41. Clarence Carson, The World in the Grip of an Idea (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1979). His book was based on articles he wrote for The Freeman (Dec. 1968–July 1969; Jan. 1977–Sept. 1979).

made it clear that the only way for families to derive any meaningful economic benefit from their landed inheritance was to create some sort of corporate family ownership with delegated management—something like the modern corporate farm. Farm income would have been in the form of dividend payments: a declining percentage of family income as the families grew in number and their income from non-farming sources increased. The terms of the jubilee rural land inheritance law destroyed any hope in rural landed wealth in a society marked by a growing population. Wealth would have to become increasingly urban in origin, derived from manufacturing, services, foreign trade, and all the other occupations of the modern, distinctly urban, distinctly capitalist world.

What is astounding to me is that I have yet to read another Bible commentator or historian of ancient Israel who mentions any of this. I am aware of no commentator who has gone to the passage that promises the elimination of miscarriages and then to the passages that promise long life spans in his attempt to calculate the demographic effects of a growing population on rural land tenure. The commentators have systematically ignored those biblical texts that relate to God's historical sanctions—in this case the positive sanction of population growth. Only with anti-covenantal blinders firmly attached do they begin making observations on the meaning and implications of the jubilee laws. This approach to Leviticus 25 is as common among conservative Bible commentators as among the liberals. The result has been the utter failure of the commentators to make sense of the jubilee.

H. The Myth of Jubilee Egalitarianism

In the mid-1970s, Jeremy Rifkin and other humanist radicals organized the People's Bicentennial Commission. This organization was set up to take advantage of the national bicentennial celebration in the United States of the Declaration of Independence (1776). William Peltz, the Midwest regional coordinator of the Peoples Bicentennial Commission, at a meeting in Ann Arbor, Michigan, argued that conservative Christians could be turned into promoters of revolutionary politics if radicals would just show them that the Bible teaches revolution. Peltz cited Leviticus 25 as a key passage in promoting compulsory wealth redistribution.⁴² This theme subsequently became popular

42. The Attempt to Steal the Bicentennial, The People's Bicentennial Commission, Hearings Before the Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal among numerous radical Christian groups. It was promoted heavily in Ronald Sider's 1977 book, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger, and also in Sojourners magazine. It has even become a familiar theme in certain fundamentalist groups.

Those who defend this interpretation have not understood that the jubilee was an aspect of military conquest, an economic incentive to fight that was given to each Hebrew family before Israel invaded Canaan. They also have not recognized that the jubilee was fulfilled in principle by Jesus (Luke 4)⁴³ and abolished historically when Israel as a nation ceased to exist. But, most of all, they have not bothered to tell their followers that if Leviticus 25 is still morally and legally binding, then lifetime slavery is still morally and legally valid, for it is only in Leviticus 25 that the Hebrews were told that they could buy and enslave foreigners for life, and then enslave their heirs forever (Lev. 25:44–46).⁴⁴

Ron Sider wrote in 1977: "Leviticus 25 is one of the most radical texts in all of Scripture. At least it seems that way for people born in countries committed to laissez-faire economics. Every fifty years, God said, all land was to return to the original owners—without compensation! . . . God therefore gave his people a law which would equalize land ownership every fifty years (Lev. 25:10–24)."⁴⁵ First, the law could not possibly have equalized land holdings; families are not all the same size. The larger the family was, the smaller the individual inheritance was. That Sider ignored this obvious implication of the jubilee law indicates how little attention he paid to the context or the text of this law. Second, like Harrison, Sider ignored the fact that this law did not equalize urban land ownership in walled cities, which is where most people would have been living in Israel after a few generations of population growth. Sider went on to note that landed wealth is basic to an

Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, 94th Congress, Second Session (March 17 and 18, 1976), p. 36.

43. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

44. Chapter 30.

45. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Wheaton, Illinois: Inter-Varsity, 1977), p. 88. This book was co-published by the liberal Paulist Press (Roman Catholic). A second edition was published in 1984, one which promised on the cover to respond to Sider's critics. Inside, there was no reference to David Chilton's refutation, or to a dozen other published critics. Sider simply stonewalled; his influence began to disappear almost immediately. A third edition came out in 1990, a fourth in 1997, a fifth in 2005. In that edition, he reversed himself on many issues, and abandoned his socialist rhetoric. See North, Inheritance and Dominion, Appendix F.

agricultural economy. True, but covenantally irrelevant; Israel was not supposed to remain an agricultural economy. It was to become intensely urban. Sider wrote: "But the means of producing wealth were to be equalized regularly."⁴⁶ There were two exceptions to this law of equalization, however: in rural areas and in urban areas. He never mentioned either of these exceptions.

Then Sider got to the point: an attack on private, voluntary charity, and a defense of state-mandated wealth redistribution, which he called justice: "That this passage prescribes justice rather than haphazard handouts by wealthy philanthropists is extremely significant. The year of Jubilee envisages an institutionalized structure that affects everyone automatically. It is to be the poor person's right to receive back his inheritance at the time of the Jubilee. Returning the land is not a charitable courtesy that the wealthy may extend if they please."⁴⁷ He moved without a missing a beat from the jubilee law's narrow judicial category—heirs of the families that had originally received the land as part of the military spoils system—to the broad economic category of "the poor." He conveniently neglected to mention three groups—permanent chattel slaves (Lev. 25:44–46), the urban poor, and poor strangers in the rural communities—none of whom participated in the jubilee law's inheritance. If the goal was, as he has insisted, the care of the poor, then why not all of the poor? This question points to Sider's problem: the jubilee's goal was not wealth-redistribution to the poor. Any explanation of the jubilee law in terms of care of the poor leads to a dead end. We can partially explain the sabbatical year in terms of care of the non-urban poor, but not the jubilee year.

Sider then moved from the historical and geographical boundaries of the Promised Land to the modern world. "Actually, it might not be a bad idea to try the Jubilee itself at least once. . . . We could select 1980 as the Jubilee year in order to give us a little time for the preliminary preparations. In 1980 all Christians worldwide would pool all their stocks, bonds, and income producing property and businesses and redistribute them equally."⁴⁸ This recommendation, understand, did not come from someone who owned any stocks, bonds, or income-producing property. It came from a tenured (no risk of being fired), salaried college professor with a pension plan. At worst, he would have had to forfeit his pension under his recommended plan to honor the jubilee year principle. At least he admitted: “There would undoubtedly be a certain amount of confusion and disruption.” Such confusion of results would be the product of Sider’s confusion of exegesis.

46. Idem.

47. Ibid., p. 89.

48. Ibid., p. 93.

What he was advocating was the transfer of ownership of non-agricultural productive capital to pagans. Christians, he concluded, should surrender their legally valid claims over the productive economic resources of capitalism and become servants without claims: strangers in the land. This program of economic surrender to paganism, Sider argued, is an extension of the jubilee principle. But what was the jubilee principle, as described a few pages earlier by Sider? It was a legal prohibition against the permanent sale of a family’s long-term capital to someone else, especially strangers (pagans) in the land. In other words, Sider’s recommended modern application of the jubilee year principle would produce results exactly opposite of what he had described as the original jubilee year’s goal. Yet Sider’s book sold very well, and was widely acclaimed in academic Christian and neo-evangelical circles as a model of relevant Christian scholarship.

Sider’s book initially appeared to be based on Mosaic law. This was an illusion. On the page following his suggested program of economic surrender to paganism, he wrote: “Still, I certainly do not think that the specific provisions of the year of Jubilee are binding today. Modern technological society is vastly different from rural Palestine. . . . We need methods appropriate to our own civilization. It is the basic principles, not the specific details, which are important and normative for Christians today.”⁴⁹ This is the standard antinomian argument: the details of God’s revealed law are irrelevant today; let us therefore glean and apply only the principles. But there is a major problem with this approach: Without our obedience to the specified details, how can we be confident that our application of the underlying principle is valid? How can we discover the underlying principle if we automatically toss out the specified applications? In short, what good are Bible’s case laws without the actual cases? Paul argued that the case law prohibiting the muzzling of oxen while they labored in the field (Deut. 25:4)⁵⁰ can be applied two ways: (1) the Christian has legitimate confidence in the positive outcome of his labors (I Cor. 9:9–10);⁵¹ (2) elders are deserving of double honor (I Tim. 5:17–18).⁵² He did not add, however, that since we now live under the New Covenant, we can lawfully muzzle our working oxen because we are bound only by the principles of the case laws, not the details thereof.

49. Ibid., p. 94.

50. Chapter 23.

51. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 11.

I. Aliens and Inalienable Land

We can discover the fundamental jubilee principle by beginning with God's own statement regarding the reason for the jubilee law: "The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. 25:23). Problem: God owns all the earth, then and now. "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills" (Ps. 50:10).⁵³ Yet this very ownership of the world is what led to the special position of the land of Canaan and its conquerors: "Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel" (Ex. 19:5–6). It was the Israelites, and only the Israelites, who were to be owners of rural land in Israel—not the immigrant stranger, and surely not the Canaanite.

Only the Israelites were strangers and sojourners with God. Therefore, for as long as God dwelled uniquely in the land, only His covenant people were allowed to remain agricultural owners. They would police the land's boundaries, keeping strangers out except on God's terms: inside walled cities, inside Israelite households as slaves, as leaseholders, and as free agricultural laborers. Far from being sojourners in the sense of "wanderers in the land," Israelites were to become the only permanent owners of rural land. They might be strangers and wanderers outside the Promised Land, but permanent owners inside. The Promised Land was to serve as "home base" in a worldwide program of trade and evangelism. To be a perfect stranger to the covenant-breaking world outside the geographical boundaries of Israel, one had to be: (1) a covenanted member of an Israelite family that had participated in the conquest, or (2) an adopted member of a walled city's tribe. This was the meaning of "strangers and sojourners with me": strangers to the world but perpetual land owners inside rural Israel. Then as now, the concept of stranger was an inescapable concept. A person was either a stranger with God or a stranger from God. The physical mark of circumcision and lawful inheritance inside Israel identified a man as being a stranger with God.

52. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 7.

53. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

So, God set apart the Promised Land as His holy dwelling place. He sanctified it. He placed boundaries around it. Thus, the fundamental covenantal principle of the jubilee law was holiness: the separation of covenantally unequal people from each other.

God established His people as owners of the land through an historically and judicially unique program of genocide. The covenantal principle of the jubilee is simple: those who worshipped false gods within the geographical boundaries of Israel could not own agricultural land. The original Canaanites had to be killed, God insisted, while future immigrants from pagan nations would have to be confined geographically. For as long as they dwelt within the land's geographical boundaries under the terms of the original distribution, Israelites had to keep strangers from inheriting agricultural land.⁵⁴ Strangers could inherit houses only inside walled cities. The walls were symbols of the covenantal restraints on them. They could also lawfully be enslaved on a permanent basis if they ever sold themselves to an Israelite family. This means that the primary economic concern of the jubilee laws was not the equalization of property, or even equality of opportunity; it was, on the contrary, the establishment of the principle of inequality of opportunity for those outside the covenant.

The economic principle is clear: those who did not worship the God of the Bible, as well as the heirs of those who had not proven their devotion to God by participating in national genocide, had to be restricted economically (no landed inheritance) or geographically (inside walls). There was a corollary: the vast majority of the covenantally faithful nation would eventually move into walled cities, which would have made it less likely that strangers would become economically influential there. *The fundamental economic principle of the jubilee laws was that those outside the covenants—civil, familial, and ecclesiastical—should be kept economically and numerically subordinate to those inside the covenants.*⁵⁵ Does Sider regard these principles as morally binding today? I think not. (I also wonder if he believes that they were morally valid during the Mosaic era. I would like to see him write an article defending these principles as they applied in Mosaic Israel.) But this raises a fundamental question: How can we apply these jubilee principles in New Covenant times?

54. This restriction ended after their return from exile (Ezek. 47:21–23). See below, Section N.

55. They were always subordinate politically: North, Political Polytheism, ch. 2: "Sanctuary and Suffrage."

J. Citizenship

Let me re-write Sider. "Leviticus 25 is one of the most radical texts in all of Scripture. At least it seems this way for people born in countries committed to pluralist democratic politics." In ancient Israel, citizenship was by formal covenant.⁵⁶ It was not by property ownership. The stranger could be circumcised, but he could not inherit rural land. He could therefore not become a judge in the Promised Land as a member of the congregation unless he was adopted into an Israelite tribe (walled city) or family. Only if adopted could he become eligible to serve in God's holy army, which was the mark of citizenship.

The strangers' economic and cultural influence was to be offset by a growing concentration of Israelites living in walled cities. The walled cities were places of refuge for immigrants (as cities become in nations that open their borders to immigrants), but walled cities were not to become strongholds of foreign influence, either political or economic. Any city in Israel that covenanted with a foreign god was to be totally destroyed (Deut. 13:12–17).

The interactions between foreign cultures (plural) and domestic culture (singular) would take place mainly in the walled cities of Israel and in the commercial cities of other societies. The kingdom (civilization) of God was to overwhelm the kingdoms of all other gods. Cities would be the places where the confrontation between God's kingdom and all others would take place. The jubilee inheritance law, when coupled with a rising Israelite population, insured that there would be a strong and growing presence of covenant-keepers in the walled cities of Israel.

K. Geographical Holiness

Jesus spoke of a coming transfer of His kingdom: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). He spoke of new wine in old wineskins: "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles [askos: leather bag]: else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved” (Matt. 9:17). The New Covenant would soon break the limits of the Old Covenant. The church would soon replace national Israel. This is why Paul speaks of the church as “the Israel of God” (Gal. 6:16).

56. Idem.

With the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the Promised Land lost the final remnants of its judicial holiness.⁵⁷ The land of Israel was no longer uniquely the place of God’s residence. This change in covenantal administration had been made visible when the veil separating the holy of holies from the holy place was torn at the time of Christ’s death. This destruction of the temple’s physical barrier between man and God was immediately verified by the destruction of that most fundamental of all boundaries in history, the boundary of the grave. “Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghost. And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent; And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, And came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many” (Matt. 27:50–53).

This destruction of the key geographical boundary in Israel—God’s set-apart dwelling place in the temple—led to the judicial destruction of the other geographical boundaries: Levitical cities vs. walled cities, walled cities vs. fields, Israel vs. the world. With the end of national Israel’s covenantal holiness came the end of geographical Israel’s holiness. This annulled the jubilee land laws.

L. The Promise of Sanctuary

The law required that “ye shall return every man to his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family” (Lev. 25:10b). This was why it was illegal to enslave an Israelite permanently. The family plots served as legal sanctuaries. An Israelite’s legal claim to eventual freedom and his legal claim to landed inheritance were both aspects of the same covenantal grant. An Israelite could not legally alienate his freedom, his heirs’ freedom, or his share in the land.⁵⁸ Civil freedom and rural land ownership were linked. Any unwillingness on the part of the civil magistrates to enforce the jubilee land laws was implicitly a denial of sanctuary to the heirs of the Abrahamic promise and also a denial of the original terms of the conquest.

57. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

58. The one exception involved the transfer of ownership to a priest (Lev. 27:20–21). See chapter 36.

The legal justification for the right of the Israelites to buy resident aliens on a permanent basis (Lev. 25:44–46) was the fact that resident aliens were not citizens of the commonwealth. They could not serve as civil judges or as warriors in God's holy army. They were outside the civil covenant. They were guaranteed sanctuary from pagan lands, but not sanctuary within the land. They could be sold into slavery to pay their debts, including especially debts to victims of their crimes.⁵⁹ Their heirs—the fruit of their loins—were sold with them.⁶⁰

A family's original grant of land at the time of the conquest established a legal claim to sanctuary from permanent enslavement for its heirs. The land was holy, sanctified by God's presence. The Israelites were holy, sanctified by God's promise to Abraham and also by their obedience to the requirement of the covenant: circumcision.⁶¹ The family plots were sanctuaries, sanctified by God's original ownership of the land and by the terms of his leasehold with Israel at the time of the conquest.

When Jesus declared the jubilee fulfilled by Him (Luke 4:18–21), He granted universal sanctuary. The land of Israel would no longer serve as a place of sanctuary in history, sanctified by the special presence of God. The kingdom of God has become the New Covenant's place of sanctuary—not merely the institutional church, but the civilization of God. The whole world of paganism is required by God to seek sanctuary in Christ's church. This substitution of a new sanctuary annulled the jubilee land laws, and thereby also annulled the jubilee's permanent slave law.

The alternative to this interpretation of the New Covenant is the long-held defense of slavery made by Christian commentators. Their interpretation—never explicit but necessarily implicit—is that the annulment of the jubilee land laws did not also annul the slave law. This leads to the conclusion that God's law no longer makes provision for those seeking geographical sanctuary. In other words, when national Israel ceased to offer sanctuary to the lost or the righteous foreigner, geographical sanctuary ceased in history. The argument runs as follows: “The Israelites no longer possessed a guarantee of jubilee liberty; therefore, the liberty announced by Christ must have constituted the annulment of Mosaic liberty. God has annulled the land-sanctuary-liberty connection, but nothing has taken its place. Thus, slavery is validated as a universal institution.”

59. It was therefore very risky for foreigners to commit major crimes in Israel. Making restitution could lead to his children's permanent enslavement if the criminal could not buy his way out before he died.

60. Adult male children of pagans presumably were not sold into slavery with their parents. Neither were married daughters and aged parents. Adults had already established separate family jurisdictions. But those children who were still under the covenantal jurisdiction of alien parents went into bondage with them.

61. The promise was obviously conditional.

The only New Testament-based alternative to this unpleasant interpretation is to conclude that liberty has been validated by the work of Jesus Christ, and the mark of this validation is the abolition of slavery in Christian nations. The church has never publicly acknowledged the abolitionist implications of Jesus’ fulfillment of the jubilee law. His announcement was not, to my knowledge, ever cited by any abolitionist of the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. But after 1780, pressure to abolish slavery increased within many Anglo-Saxon Protestant churches that were located outside of the slave-owning regions. By the end of the 1880s, chattel slavery had been abolished in the West.⁶²

Meanwhile, national sanctuaries for the oppressed and poor were opened: free emigration and immigration. But, after World War I, this open access was steadily closed by legislation. Immigration barriers were erected everywhere. The modern passport is one of humanism’s important covenantal marks: a progressive contraction of international sanctuaries. Political liberals as well as political conservatives have affirmed the legitimacy of these immigration barriers.⁶³ When nations are no longer covenantally Christian, i.e., when they adopt religious pluralism and other marks of citizenship besides church membership, and when they replace voluntary charity with welfare state entitlements, the Christian evangelist’s call to the lost in the name of Christ steadily fades. “Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest” is replaced by “Keep out those welfare-seeking bums!” Finally, when mandatory identification cards are issued by the state to every resident in order to “reduce welfare fraud,” all of the remaining sanctuaries tend to disappear: in churches, regions, and families.⁶⁴

62. David Brion Davis, Slavery and Human Progress (New York: Oxford University Press, 1984).

63. The ultimate immigration barrier is abortion.

64. Gary North, “The Sanctuary Society,” Journal of Libertarian Studies, 13 (Sum-

M. Citizenship and Land Ownership

Under the initial distribution of the land under Joshua, no non-citizen could own rural land. Not every citizen had to own rural land—most notably, a circumcised immigrant or his heir who was eligible to serve in the army—but every rural land owner had to be a citizen. This law ended with the exile (Ezek. 47:21–23),⁶⁵ when the land vomited out the Israelites.

1. Rural Land Was Special

Why should land ownership in any nation be limited to its citizens? If the uses of the land are under civil law—and land can hardly be moved outside this jurisdiction—then what does it matter who owns it? The rent will be the same, no matter who owns the property, since owners cannot unilaterally establish rent in a free market. Rent payments are established in terms of competition: owners vs. owners, renters vs. renters. I ask: What is the covenantal justification for civil restraints on real estate sales to foreigners? Land ownership confers no right to vote—citizenship—to owners. It therefore has nothing to do with the civil covenant. Restrictions on land sales to foreign residents constitute restrictions against the maximization of an existing land owner's wealth. Why should the civil government be given such control over the sale of land? It is not sufficient to cite the jubilee agricultural land laws; these laws applied only to land that had been transferred by God to the families that participated in the conquest of Canaan.

The idea that a person can somehow disinherit his heirs merely by exchanging land ownership for the ownership of money is a peculiar notion. It may be a valid concern in a statist society that places legal restrictions on the purchase of real estate—"once sold, always sold"—but in a free market social order, the idea is ridiculous. Such a view is culturally derived, not economically or judicially derived. Disinheritance is surely not limited to land ownership. Neither is inheritance. To imagine that the sale of land to another family or to a business, foreign or not, is somehow a means of disinheritance is to adopt a magical view of land. Such a view is not a New Covenant view, for the Mosaic covenant has been abrogated by the New Covenant.

There is nothing either covenantal or magical about land. The mer 1998). (<http://bit.ly/NorthSanctuary>)

65. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

once-powerful myths of “blood and soil”—pagan family myths and pagan agricultural myths, both of which are pagan fertility myths—have long served as rival religions to Christianity. The Latin root word for pagan means villager. Rural areas were where the gospel met its greatest resistance from the beginning of the church. The most recent national revival of these dual myths took place in industrial Germany under Nazism: the work of a dictator who had self-consciously adopted the symbolism of soil and the occult as a tools of public mobilization.⁶⁶ One of the great benefits of free market capitalism and its consequent urbanization has been the cultural undermining of these fertility myths. In response, the defenders of the old pagan order openly reject the idea of progress as a rival and erroneous myth. This is consistent with ancient paganism’s cyclical theory of time.

While there can be legitimate traditional or sentimental feelings about the land in some societies, these feelings possess no unique judicial authority in a private property-based social order.⁶⁷ As with any scarce economic resource, the land owner must meet the demands of the highest-bidding consumers or else suffer net economic losses (e.g., forfeited rent). Land ownership is unique only in land’s physical immobility. Its uses are easier to control by law. Real estate is also less liquid economically than other assets, since extensive knowledge of a particular property’s location and condition is required to assess its value.

2. Inheritance and Mobility

In a nation such as the United States, in which almost one-fifth of the population moves to new residences every year,⁶⁸ an attempt to de-

66. Leni Riefenstahl’s Nazi propaganda film, Triumph of the Will (1935), records the Nazi Party conference of 1933. The film has scenes of organized rural residents, spades used as symbols of the soil, and happy peasant types. On the occult, see Dusty Sklar, The Nazis and the Occult (New York: Dorset, 1977).

67. The agrarian worldview expressed in I’ll Take My Stand, the 1930 manifesto written by a dozen American Southern literary figures, remains personal sentiment or personal aesthetic taste unless backed up by civil law. If backed up by civil law, the manifesto means I’ll Take My Stand Against Economic Freedom—not just “yankee industrial capitalism,” but the free market a social order. The paganism of the modern “deep ecology” movement is another extension of the myth of the soil. It is deeply hostile to science, progress, and economic freedom. Man’s problem is not his environment, urban or rural; man’s problem is sin. Delivery from sin is not through a change in the environment.

68. About 18% of the population moved residences, 1987–88: Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1990 (Washington, D.C.: Department of Commerce, Bureau of the fend restricted land ownership in terms of the Bible is most peculiar. Primogeniture (eldest son inherits the family's land) and entail (prohibition on sale of the family's land) were never major aspects of New England Puritanism, and both faded rapidly in the late eighteenth century in Virginia. While laws authorizing both practices were on the books in most of the American colonies up until the American Revolution (1776–83), there are few court records indicating that such laws were ever seriously enforced.⁶⁹ When enforced, these laws reduced the authority of parents to control their children, especially with respect to marriage.⁷⁰ Without the covenantal authority of tribal organizations to direct the line of inheritance, laws restricting the sale of land restrict both parental authority and social mobility. This restriction on social mobility was also present in Mosaic Israel, although population growth and urbanization would have overcome much of this restricted mobility. God placed these restrictions on landed inheritance for the sake of the promised messianic seed; in A.D. 70, God destroyed the tribes and abrogated the tribal land laws.

The dominion covenant requires mobility: the conquest of society by the gospel. The ownership of the world was transferred definitively to Jesus at Calvary, and from Him to His people in history. The spread of the gospel is God's authorized means of progressive conquest—inheritance—by His people. The idea of covenantally restricted land ownership is foreign to the idea of mobility (dominion) in New Testament times. The covenantal threat of land ownership by a foreigner no longer exists under biblical law. Only those nations, such as the United States, that perversely sanction citizenship based on residence or birth in the land are threatened by foreign-born owners of land. There is no covenantal or political threat whatsoever from ownership by foreign corporations.

The tremendous social and economic mobility offered by modern capitalism cannot be separated from the freedom to buy and sell land. A cry to legislate a policy of limiting land ownership to a nation's citizens, especially in a large country, indicates the degree to which voters are uninformed about (1) economic theory (rent), (2) economic facts Census, 1990), Table 25.

69. Robert A. Nisbet, "The Social Impact of the Revolution," in America's Continuing Revolution: An Act of Conservation (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, 1975), p. 80. Nisbet regarded the post-Revolution abolition of primogeniture and entail as symbolically important, not judicially important.

70. Edmund S. Morgan, Virginians at Home: Family Life in the Eighteenth Century (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1952), pp. 34–35.

(freedom of contract), and (3) social theory (social mobility). A cry to limit land ownership to citizens in the name of the Mosaic jubilee land laws adds ignorance about the Bible to the three other forms of ignorance. This raises the question of land ownership by foreigners.

N. Land Ownership by Foreigners: Then and Now

One misguided idea that began to circulate in conservative American Christian circles in the late 1980s was the suggestion that citizens and corporations of a foreign nation should not be permitted to buy land in the United States. The theological defense of this suggestion has been an appeal to the jubilee land laws. The purchase of American land by foreigners has not been a problem, nor has it been much of a phenomenon, except possibly in Hawaii, where Japanese companies have bought land to build golf courses to be used only by Japanese players. Because a single golf course membership in the best club in Tokyo cost over $3 million in late 1989 (up from $769,000 in 1986),⁷¹ plus $4,000 for a member to play one 18-hole game, it became cheaper for Japanese golfers to pool their funds, buy a Hawaiian golf course or build it, charter a jet over the weekend, fly to Hawaii, play two rounds, and fly home. But this “golfing invasion” hardly constituted a threat to American national interests. Tight money and a falling stock market in Japan ended speculative golf course investments after 1989.

The most prominent American theologian to articulate this view of restricted land ownership is Rushdoony, who in most cases is a firm defender of property rights. But in the case of land ownership, he appeals back to the land laws of Mosaic Israel. He wrote that “Scripture is very clear about the alien within the country; he must be treated the same as a covenant man, even if an unbeliever. As a believer, he is free to intermarry with covenant families. The alien outside the covenant country has no property rights within the land. Ownership is a form of responsibility, and responsibility within the covenant land is to the covenant of God; hence, he cannot buy into the land. The first fruits of the earth, and the tithes on agricultural and commercial increase, belong to the Lord.”⁷² This was indeed true of agricultural land in Mosaic Israel, but the land laws of Mosaic Israel died with the transfer of God’s kingdom to the church in A.D. 70. They were not resurrected. To argue otherwise is to allow the redistributionist jubilee theology of Ronald Sider to enter in through the back door, as well as Simon Legree: the re-introduction of inter-generational slavery (Lev. 25:44–46).

71. The Strait Times (Singapore) (Nov. 23, 1991). The price later fell to $2 million in 1991 as a result of the drop in Japanese real estate prices.

72. R. J. Rushdoony, “Ownership,” Position Paper, Chalcedon Report (April 1990), p. 17.

The primary legal issue for rural land ownership in Mosaic Israel was adoption, not confession. Both the confessing resident alien [geyr] and the non-confessing resident alien [nok-ree] could buy inheritable residential real estate inside walled cities. Confession had nothing to do with urban residential ownership. On the other hand, covenant-keeping converts to the faith had no access to rural land ownership apart from their adoption into a family of the conquest generation. The resident alien's orthodox confession had nothing to do with inalienable rural ownership except insofar as such confession was likely for adoption into an Israelite family.

Rushdoony's comment on the lawfulness of land ownership by immigrants is even less accurate with respect to the post-exilic period. He did not mention the relevant passage, Ezekiel's prophecy of a new law that would prevail after their return to the land: "So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD" (Ezek. 47:21–23). The prohibition against permanent rural land ownership by the circumcised resident alien ended after the exile. This had nothing to do with marriage to an Israelite. The circumcised stranger was the covenantally faithful resident alien [geyr], from whom it was illegal to take interest (Lev. 25:35–37), not the resident who was not part of the covenant [nok-ree], from whom it was legal to take interest (Deut. 23:20).⁷³

The civil enforcement of property rights to land in the New Covenant era has nothing to do with either theological confession or bodily residence. The jubilee land laws of Israel have all been annulled. They were never cross-boundary laws; they applied only to the land and heirs of the conquest. No judicial appeal to any of those laws is valid today. Those who appeal to them risk placing us in bondage: the revival of permanent chattel slavery or the imposition of permanent slavery to the messianic welfare state.

73. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 57.

Conclusion

The jubilee year began with the day of atonement. This was a day of public submission to God, invoking His grace: a positive sanction. The judicial issue of the day of atonement was man's subordination to God. There could be no profit-seeking work on that day. Men had to rest contentedly in God's grace.

The jubilee year was the culmination of the cycle of sabbatical years. Sabbatical years were mandated by God in order to train landless Israelites and poor strangers how to produce for a market. The Mosaic law identified harvesters as landless or impoverished people who worked as harvesters or gleaners in six years out of seven. In sabbatical years, they became dependent on whatever it was that God would allow the fields to produce apart from cultivation. In those years, harvesters learned to make decisions without a land owner or his supervisor ruling over them.

The jubilee inheritance law applied to rural land inside the boundaries of Israel. It did not apply to houses within the walled cities of the nation except Levitical cities (Lev. 25:32–33). It also did not apply to property outside the Promised Land. This law had been given to the people by God because He was the owner of the land (Lev. 25:23). It was part of the terms of God's lease under which they held rights of administration as sharecropping tenants, with 10% of any increase owed to God through the Levites and priests. It was also part of the spoils of war.

God is owner of all the earth, not just the Promised Land. Why did the jubilee laws not apply to all other nations? Because these laws applied only to His special dwelling place. They were an aspect of God's holiness, which is why the jubilee laws appear in Leviticus, the book of holiness. The Promised Land was to be kept holy: set apart judicially from all other nations. How? Initially, this separation began with God's promise to Abraham: definitive holiness, i.e., definitive sanctification.

The second phase of the process of separation began with the conquest: progressive holiness, i.e., progressive sanctification. God cleansed the land of His enemies by means of total war: the annihilation of His enemies. He required the extermination of the gods of Canaan by means of an original program of genocide. He promised to dwell in the land that contained the tabernacle and temple; He would not permit any other god to be worshipped publicly in Israel. Thus, the gods of the land had to be removed from public view. To achieve this initially, the Israelites were told by God to exterminate or drive out every person dwelling in the land. Only Rahab and her family would be allowed by God to escape this judgment, for she had established a pre-invasion covenant with God.⁷⁴

Third, His holiness was to be defended by enforcing a law that kept post-conquest immigrants from ever owning property in Israel except inside Israel's walled cities. The families of the conquest received an in-heritable lease that could not be alienated beyond 49 years. Later immigrants could sublease rural property if they were sufficiently productive, but they could not leave an inheritance beyond the jubilee year.

Fourth, God established a law that removed from the majority of the population any legitimate hope of remaining farmers in Israel if His blessings were forthcoming in response to their covenantal faithfulness as a nation. They surely knew that, as Israel's population expanded, no branch of any extended family could retain economic control over of a particular plot of rural land apart from the compliance of all the other members of the family, except perhaps as a small recreational property (a consumer good). If they wanted income from the land, they could attain it only through its productivity. Small, isolated plots are not very productive. If they wanted to maximize their passive income from their portion of the extended family's land, they would have to cooperate with other members of the extended family in selecting representative managers, either from within the extended family or from outside its legal boundaries. If any nuclear family unit wanted to farm all of the original "eleven acres" for the others, it would have to meet the competition of any other members of the extended family who might offer to serve as the family's representatives on the farm.

Fifth, wealthy immigrants and strangers in the land would have tended to dwell in walled cities, where they could own homes. This is where the population of the Israelites was intended by God to be channeled over time. This process was intended to keep strangers and foreigners from gaining too much influence in their 48 cities. They would have been outnumbered by immigrants from rural areas.

74. It is worth noting that members of Rahab's family never formally voiced their individual support of this covenant, but by remaining silent before she made it, when the civil authorities had questioned her regarding the spies (Josh. 2:3), they became lawful residents of Israel through their adherence to the external demands of Rahab's covenant. If they remained inside their section of the wall, despite the collapse of the remainder of the wall, they could remain in the Promised Land (2:19).

Sixth, God kept the geographically dispersed Levites from gaining political control through land purchases. Their cross-tribal boundary judicial influence was advisory. The jubilee land law made it impossible for Levites to centralize land ownership. They could only rarely inherit rural land (Lev. 27:20–21).⁷⁵ But to make sure that they would not abandon their support of the jubilee year because of their desire to inherit rural land, they were given jubilee privileges in the cities: reversion in the jubilee year (Lev. 25: 32–33). When enforced, this aspect of the jubilee land laws would have tended to confine their political power to cities, but it also balanced the jubilee law's economic costs and benefits for them. Over time, their influence would grow with the population, as more people congregated in cities, assuming that they could find ways of maintaining the people's theological allegiance in a progressively urbanized culture. Ultimately, cities would have become economically dominant, and therefore politically dominant, just as they have become all over the world in modern times. But the Levites were not supposed to centralize political and economic power during the rural phase of the Israelite kingdom.

The primary covenantal issue of the jubilee laws was holiness. The jubilee inheritance law had little or nothing to do with assuring economic equality, except in times of national covenantal cursing: stagnant population. The law had everything to do with the mandating of political and cultural inequality: giving a permanent head start to heirs of the conquest over immigrants, even those immigrants who became members of the covenant through circumcision, but not members of land-inheriting families. Only through adoption, either directly or through marriage (for females), could immigrants gain this advantage.

75. Chapter 37.

ECONOMIC OPPRESSION BY MEANS OF THE STATE

And if thou sell ought unto thy neighbour, or buyest ought of thy neighbour's hand, ye shall not oppress one another: According to the number of years after the jubile thou shalt buy of thy neighbour, and according unto the number of years of the fruits he shall sell unto thee: According to the multitude of years thou shalt increase the price thereof, and according to the fewness of years thou shalt diminish the price of it: for according to the number of the years of the fruits doth he sell unto thee. Ye shall not therefore oppress one another; but thou shalt fear thy God: for I am the LORD your God (Lev. 25:14–17).

The theocentric message of this passage is that God is not an oppressor. Though He is the author of the law, as well as the final judge, He does not use His authority to do injustice. He does not seek unfair advantage. Neither should those who act in His name as His stewards.

A. Terms of the Lease

God was the owner of the land of Israel: special ownership as distinguished from general ownership of the earth. He established the terms of ownership and leasing within Israel's boundaries. His permanent sharecropping tenants were required to honor these terms. More specifically, they were required to imitate God: no oppression. The terms governing leaseholds in some unique way reflected God's dealings with His people. As an aspect of the jubilee land law, this law was a specific application of the general law prohibiting oppression.

In buying and selling, both parties were required to honor the limiting factor of the jubilee year. This raises important questions. First, what is oppression, biblically speaking? Second, is oppression here merely the failure to write contracts whose provisions ended with the advent of the jubilee year? Third, did this warning refer only to rural land sales?

The context indicates that rural land was the thing being bought and sold. But the legal restriction on the leasing of land would also have applied to the leasing of men. If, for example, an Israelite was sold into bondage because of his failure to repay a business debt, his term of servitude could not extend beyond the jubilee year.¹ The law required that “ye shall return every man to his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family” (Lev. 25:10b). Business debt could not be collateralized by land beyond the jubilee.

The first question is more difficult to answer. What is oppression in this context? Has it anything to do with pricing? The text indicates that it has everything to do with the period of time in which the terms of the contract will apply. Time has something to do with pricing, but what? “According to the multitude of years thou shalt increase the price thereof.” The question arises: Increase the price from what? What were the price floor and price ceiling that governed the pricing of additional years? How were they established? To answer this question in the absence of historical records, we need to understand something about modern capital theory.

We need to think very carefully about how prices are formed in a free market society if we are to discuss the meaning of economic oppression. If we do not understand how prices are established in a free market society, we may be tempted to accuse sellers of goods and services (i.e., buyers of money) of having oppressed buyers (i.e., sellers of money). Warning: he who brings a lawsuit against another should first determine if an infraction of God’s law has taken place. The Bible is clear: he who testifies falsely against another and is subsequently convicted of having made a false accusation must suffer the same penalty that his intended victim would have suffered (Deut. 19:15–21).² Historically, there have been a great number of would-be economic theorists who have made such accusations against an entire class of people. There have been politicians and bureaucrats who have imposed socialistic programs onto society in the name of such conscience-driven economic analyses. They have shown zeal without knowledge. The result has been economic exploitation through state coercion on a massive scale, always in the name of economic justice and frequently

1. If he was being sold to repay a zero-interest charitable loan, his term of servitude could not extend beyond the sabbatical year (Deut. 15:12).

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

in the name of social salvation.³ Where such policies have been widely enforced, God has brought His curse: low productivity and low income.

B. Pricing a Factor of Production

The text speaks of the years of the fruits. “According to the number of years after the jubile thou shalt buy of thy neighbour, and according unto the number of years of the fruits he shall sell unto thee” (v. 15). This is a very important economic concept. Capital theory is dependent on it. Land and labor produce fruit over time. This is what makes land and labor valuable. Modern economic theory, beginning with the marginalist (subjectivist) revolution of the early 1870s,⁴ attempts to explain the relationship between the market value of the fruits of production and the market value of the economic inputs that produce these fruits.

What does modern economic theory teach? First and foremost, it teaches that all economic value is subjective value. Economic value is imputed, i.e., it is subjectively determined.⁵ Economic value is not the product of labor; on the contrary, labor is valuable because of the value of labor’s output.⁶ Economic value is also not the product of objective costs of production. The classical economists, from Adam Smith to Karl Marx and John Stuart Mill, argued for objective value theory—labor theory of value or cost-of-production theory of value—but the marginalist or subjectivist revolution rejected this approach to value theory.⁷ The classical economists did not trace market exchange, production, and the formation of prices solely to the actions of con-

3. Jack Douglas, The Myth of the Welfare State (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Transaction Books, 1989).

4. The simultaneous and independent work of William Stanley Jevons, Leon Walras, and Carl Menger. See The Marginalist Revolution in Economics: Interpretation and Evaluation, eds. R. D. Collison Black, et al. (Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1973).

5. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix B.

6. Any scarce economic resource with a market price is in part the product of labor. If it is not yet the product of labor, such as a waterfall, it will have to have labor (including intellectual labor) added to it before its fruits can be appropriated. Before any asset can be appropriated and used by an owner, he must perform some kind of labor.

7. Mark Skousen, The Structure of Production (New York: New York University Press, 1990), ch. 2.

sumers. They did not construct a general theory of value.⁸

1. Customer Authority

The subjectivists concluded that economic inputs possess value only in relation to the value of their output. The question immediately arises: Value to whom? Concluded the subjectivists: value is imputed subjectively by an imputing agent—the customer—to the fruits of production. In his Theory of Money and Credit (1912), Ludwig von Mises wrote that “in the last resort it is still the subjective use-value of things that determines the esteem in which they are held.”⁹ In short, “the only valuations that are of final importance in the determination of prices and objective exchange-value are those based on the subjective use-value that the products have for those persons who are the last to acquire them through the channels of commerce and who acquire them for their own consumption.”¹⁰ The persons who are the last to acquire anything are called consumers. They do not act as intermediaries for other buyers. If all potential consumers were to refuse to pay for some asset’s fruits of production, these fruits would have no economic value.¹¹ Neither would the specific factor of production, assuming that all producers recognized that no future consumer will ever pay for this output. Thus, “The consumers determine ultimately not only the prices of the consumers’ goods, but no less the prices of all factors of production.”¹² Regarding capital goods, Mises wrote: “The prices of the goods of higher orders are ultimately determined by the prices of the goods of the first or lowest order, that is, the consumers’ goods. As a consequence of this dependence they are ultimately determined by the subjective valuations of all members of the market society.”¹³ This is why he concluded: “The pricing process is a social process.”¹⁴

But don’t producers have more money than final consumers? Can’t

8. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 63. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

9. Ludwig von Mises, The Theory of Money and Credit, 2nd ed. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1953), pp. 102–3. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTMC>)

10. Ibid., p. 103.

11. In another place, I have discussed why value theory in economics requires the doctrine of an imputing sovereign God in order to avoid the incoherence produced by pure subjectivism’s theory of autonomous man. See Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5.

12. Mises, Human Action, p. 271.

13. Ibid., p. 330.

14. Ibid., p. 335.

they impose their will on final consumers? On the contrary, producers have far less money than final consumers do, which is why producers are vulnerable to shifts in consumer demand. Producers own inventories of highly specialized consumer goods and even more specialized producer goods (capital equipment). Final consumers own the most marketable commodity, money. They have the competitive advantage. Think of a producer of shoes. If consumers decide they do not like the style of these shoes, what can the producer do with these shoes? Spend a fortune on advertising to change consumers' minds? I am in the advertising business; let me assure you, most producers do not have sufficient funds to change the minds of many consumers.¹⁵ All the shoe manufacturer can do is lower the price of his inventory, even if he does not regain his costs of production. After all, some income is better than no income. Some money is better than a pile of unsold shoes that must be stored somewhere.

Final consumers can buy many things with their inventory of unspecialized money; producers cannot buy many things with their inventory of specialized goods. This is why final consumers are economically sovereign over producers, even though customers and producers are equally sovereign legally. The hierarchy of control under capitalism is economic. Final consumers "hold the hammer": money (the most marketable commodity) plus the legal authority to buy or not to buy from any producer.

Market theory rests on the insight that the final consumer is economically sovereign,¹⁶ even though the owner of a tool of production is legally sovereign. The owner lawfully can do whatever he pleases with his property, so long as he does not physically injure someone else, but he cannot thwart the final consumer at zero cost. If he thwarts the demand of the highest-bidding final consumer by not selling the capital good's final output to him, he thereby forfeits the extra amount of money which that consumer would have paid him. The owner's inventory cost is not just the cost of storage and insurance, but also the 15. The classic example is Ford Motor Company's introduction of the Edsel automobile, 1958–60. Ford could not sell enough cars to make a profit.

16. The phrase "consumer sovereignty" is generally attributed to W. H. Hutt. Hutt, "The Nature of Aggressive Selling" (1935), in Individual Freedom: Selected Works of William H. Hutt, eds. Svetozar Pejovich and David Klingaman (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1975), p. 185. Biblically speaking, this sovereignty is delegated from God: hierarchical authority. Humanistic economists do not believe in either God or delegated sovereignty. So, they refer to the final consumer as sovereign. I prefer to speak of customer authority.

forfeited income.¹⁷

The free market, with its lure of profit, encourages the specializing of risk-bearing (insurance) and uncertainty-bearing (entrepreneurship).¹⁸ Capitalism allows final consumers safely to transfer to producers both the risk and the uncertainty of deciding what to produce and when, since the legal system places in the hands of consumers the authority to say “no” to those products and services that they do not wish to buy at the prices offered. The final consumers therefore hold the hammer over producers, despite the fact that the producers appear sovereign because they decide what gets produced. What they cannot control is what gets sold at what price.

2. Economic Imputation

So far, there is something missing from this explanation of the structure of capitalist production and distribution. (Note: this is an integrated system; production is not separate from distribution.)¹⁹ What is missing is imputation. We have seen that production takes place over time. So, a question arises regarding the valuation of capital goods, raw materials, labor inputs, and land. How does the present value of any scarce economic resource relate to the value of its final output? That is to say, how do present prices relate to future prices?

To answer this, we need to apply Mises’ theory of entrepreneurship to capital goods theory. Producers act as the economic agents of future consumers. Producers forecast future market demand as well as they can. They study historical records of previous market demand (perhaps only a few minutes old), and then they guess what future demand (consumers) and future supply (their competition) will be. That is, they guess what the market price will be for a particular product.²⁰ As Mises wrote in 1922 in his monumental refutation of socialism, the capitalist “must exercise foresight. If he does not do so then he suffers losses—losses that bring it about that his disposition [control] over the factors of production is transferred to the hands of others who know

17. The cost of production is not an aspect of economic cost. What is spent is sunk costs. Once spent, the producer’s past costs are irrelevant to the crucial question: What can I get for my stock of goods?

18. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921), p. 244. (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>)

19. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 7:2:C, ch. 9:5.

20. Mises, Human Action, p. 333.

better how to weigh the risks and the prospects of business speculation.”²¹

University of Chicago economist Frank Knight²² agreed with Mises on the role of entrepreneurship, although he rejected Mises’ theory of interest and capital. Knight understood that the consumer is sovereign under capitalism, and the entrepreneur-producer is his servant. He noted the amazing fact that today’s consumer does not know exactly what he will want to buy in the future or what he will be willing to pay. Therefore, “he leaves it to producers to create goods and hold them ready for his decision when the time comes. The clue to the apparent paradox is, of course, in the ‘law of large numbers,’ the consolidation of risks (or uncertainties). The consumer is, to himself, only one; to the producer he is a mere multitude in which individuality is lost. It turns out that an outsider can foresee the wants of a multitude with more ease and accuracy than an individual can attain with respect to his own. This phenomenon gives us the most fundamental feature of the economic system, production for a market. . . .”²³

In the expectation that a particular piece of capital equipment will produce something of value to future consumers—something they will pay for—producers today impute value to capital equipment. They do the same with land, labor, and raw materials. They do this as present economic agents of future consumers. (I keep repeating this because non-economists simply do not grasp it, including thousands of non-economists who hold Ph.D.’s in economics.) Mises described land ownership by a farmer in a market economy: “He does not control production as the self-supporting peasant does. He does not decide the purposes of his production; those for whom he works decide it—the consumers. They, not the producer, determine the goal of economic activity. The producer only directs production towards the goal set by the consumers.”²⁴

Understand, however, that these consumers are not present consumers, for production is always aimed at the future. The consumers who control production are in the minds of the producers. A particular 21. Ludwig von Mises, Socialism: An Economic and Sociological Analysis, trans. by J. Kahane, 2nd ed. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1932] 1951), pp. 140–41. (<http://bit.ly/MisesSOC>) First German edition: 1922.

22. He taught the more famous student, Milton Friedman. He studied under the more famous teacher, Max Weber, and translated Weber’s 1919–20 lectures: General Economic History.

23. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit, p. 241.

24. Mises, Socialism, p. 41.

producer—the capitalist entrepreneur—may discover later that the actual consumers do not act in the way that his mental consumers did. He will then suffer losses, either because he has to sell his output for less per unit than he planned, in order to unload his inventory, or else he sells it at the expected price per unit, but then discovers that he could have charged more.²⁵ In either case, he experiences a loss.

The producer can consult present prices, meaning the most recent historical record of publicly published prices. This does not tell him anything secure regarding the future. Mises wrote in Human Action that “the prices of the factors of production are determined exclusively by the anticipation of future prices of the products. The fact that yesterday people valued and appraised commodities in a different way is irrelevant. The consumers do not care about the investments made with regard to past market conditions and do not bother about the vested interests of entrepreneurs, capitalists, land-owners, and workers, who may be hurt by changes in the structure of prices. Such sentiments play no role in the formation of prices. . . . The prices of the past are for the entrepreneur, the shaper of future production, merely a mental tool.”²⁶ A good’s present price is only a starting point for the producer’s inquiry into the possible range of a similar good’s future prices. These prices are set by competition: producers vs. producers, consumers vs. consumers.

3. Factors of Production

Land and labor are original factors of production.²⁷ Capital is not an original factor of production; it is the product of land (raw materials) and human labor over time.²⁸ Thus, the producers of capital equipment (producers’ goods) act as present economic agents of future buyers and renters of producers’ goods, i.e., future consumers of producers’ goods. The producers of capital goods impute value to present

25. An interesting epistemological question can be asked at this point: If the producer and his competitors never discover that he could have charged more, has he suffered an economic loss? If pure subjectivism is true, and if God’s omniscience is not part of the theoretical explanation of value, then on what basis can the economist say that the producer has suffered a loss? If there is no objective value, then there cannot be an objective loss. But if there is no subjective perception on the part of the producer or his competitors that he has sustained a loss, has he in fact sustained it? This is an unsolved theoretical dilemma of modern humanistic economics.

26. Mises, Human Action, p. 334.

27. Ibid., p. 634.

28. Ibid., p. 635.

raw materials and labor. They enter the markets for raw materials and labor and bid against each other to buy legal control over these scarce economic resources. That producer whose imputations of the present value of these resources are the highest, and who then bids up the price until no bidders remain to bid against him, wins legal control of specific resources. Producers give up the ownership of present goods (money) in order to buy future goods—the output of whatever resources they have bought—that can later be sold for more money than they paid for them, they hope. A present purchase of original factors of production costs a producer the ownership of presently owned consumer goods (i.e., money that could buy consumer goods) over time. What it costs him, in other words, is interest.

What about owners of land? The same process of imputation takes place. Land contains raw materials. Coupled with labor, these raw materials can be fashioned to produce goods. The present value of land is therefore imputed to it by men who are acting as economic agents for future consumers. If the net value of a piece of land's output is zero or less, and is expected to remain zero or less, then the value of the land is zero or less.²⁹ It can rise above zero only when the expectations of imputing agents change.

C. An Expected Stream of Net Income

When a person purchases a piece of property, he is buying legal ownership over what the text in Leviticus calls the years of its fruitfulness. The buyer is buying an expected stream of production when he buys a piece of land, but he cannot know for sure that this stream of income will persist in the future. As Knight wrote in 1933, "The basic economic magnitude (value or utility) is service, not good. It is inherently a stream or flow in time. . . ."³⁰ To put it bluntly, streams can dry up. This is what happened to Israel in the three years of drought when Elijah fled the nation (I Kings 17).

29. An example of a piece of land that is worth less than zero would be a toxic waste site whose present owner is told by the government to clean it up at his expense.

30. Knight, "Preface to the Re-issue," Risk, Uncertainty and Profit, p. xxvi. Mises rejected the whole concept of a stream of income: "There is in nature no such thing as a stream of income. Income is a category of action; it is the outcome of careful economizing of scarce factors." Mises, Human Action, p. 390. The stream of income concept has nevertheless proven useful in discussing the discounting process of time-preference or interest: a discount applied to expected income over time. We speak of time as flowing; the same language of continuity applies equally well to the arrival of income over time.

The jubilee law limited its discussion of fruits to agricultural land located in Israel, but the same principle of ownership always governs the purchase of any scarce economic resource: the owner has purchased legal control over an expected stream of net productivity (a capital good) or over an expected stream of passive income (a bond).

If a person buys a capital good for a cash payment, he becomes its permanent owner. If he rents it for a specified period of time, he becomes a lessee. Because the capital good is physical, people without training in economics tend to think of it differently from the way they think of a promissory note. But the present value of the note is not derived from the physical piece of paper or a blip in a computer memory device; rather, it is derived from the estimated value of the money it promises to repay in the future, discounted by the prevailing rate of interest.³¹ Similarly, the present value of a capital good is not derived from its physical make-up; rather, its present value is the estimated value of what it is expected to produce, discounted by the prevailing rate of interest. The economic issue is value, not physical make-up. The economic issue is the market's present imputation of future value, discounted by the prevailing rate of interest. Thus, the same process of imputation (valuation) applies equally to promissory notes, land, and capital equipment.³² Prior to the abolition of slavery in the nineteenth century, it also applied to human labor. We call this imputation process capitalization.

Consider the case of a person who leases a piece of equipment. His lease contract permits him to sublease it to someone else. A second person agrees to make a cash payment or else a periodic payment to the person who leased the equipment first. The person who leased the asset first has now become a recipient of money income. It is now the same as if he had purchased a bond in the first place instead of leasing a piece of equipment from someone else. He now owns a piece of paper issued by a third party who promises to pay him in the future. So, there is no economic difference between buying a stream of net future income in the form of a piece of capital equipment or a written promise to pay (IOU).

31. On the interest rate (time-preference), see Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, ch. 6:2.

32. On the discounting process, see ibid., ch. 7.

D. Economic Oppression

