

An Economic Commentary on the Bible

Gary North

*An Economic Commentary
on the Bible*

A multi-volume exposition

GARY NORTH

CONTENTS

- Volume 01 - Genesis, Vol. 1 - Sovereignty And Dominion*
Volume 02 - Genesis, Vol. 2 - Sovereignty And Dominion - Appendixes
Volume 03 - Exodus, Vol. 1 - Authority And Dominion
Volume 04 - Exodus, Vol. 2 - Authority And Dominion
Volume 05 - Exodus, Vol. 3 - Authority And Dominion
Volume 06 - Exodus, Vol. 4 - Authority And Dominion
Volume 07 - Exodus, Vol. 5 - Authority And Dominion - Appendixes
Volume 08 - Exodus, Vol. 6 - Authority And Dominion - Appendixes
Volume 09 - Leviticus, Vol. 1 - Boundaries And Dominion
Volume 10 - Leviticus, Vol. 2 - Boundaries And Dominion
Volume 11 - Leviticus, Vol. 3 - Boundaries And Dominion
Volume 12 - Leviticus, Vol. 4 - Boundaries And Dominion - Appendixes
Volume 13 - Numbers - Sanctions And Dominion
Volume 14 - Deuteronomy, Vol. 1 - Inheritance And Dominion
Volume 15 - Deuteronomy, Vol. 2 - Inheritance And Dominion
Volume 16 - Deuteronomy, Vol. 3 - Inheritance And Dominion
Volume 17 - Deuteronomy, Vol. 4 - Inheritance And Dominion - Appendixes
Volume 18 - Historical Books - Disobedience And Defeat
Volume 19 - Job - Predictability And Dominion
Volume 20 - Psalms - Confidence And Dominion
Volume 21 - Proverbs - Wisdom And Dominion
Volume 22 - Ecclesiastes - Autonomy And Stagnation
Volume 23 - Prophets - Restoration And Dominion
Volume 24 - Matthew - Priorities And Dominion
Volume 25 - Mark - Trust And Dominion
Volume 26 - Luke - Treasure And Dominion
Volume 27 - Acts - Sacrifice And Dominion
Volume 28 - Romans - Cooperation And Dominion
Volume 29 - 1 Corinthians - Judgment And Dominion
Volume 30 - 1 Timothy - Hierarchy And Dominion
Volume 31 - The Epistles & Revelation - Ethics And Dominion

SOVEREIGNTY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON GENESIS

VOLUME 1

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
Government by Emergency (1983)
Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
Coined Freedom (1984)
Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
Honest Money (1986)
Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
Inherit the Earth (1987)
Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
Healer of the Nations (1987)
The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
Political Polytheism (1989)
The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
Victim's Rights (1990)
Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
The Coase Theorem (1992)
Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
Rapture Fever (1993)
Tithing and the Church (1994)
Crossed Fingers (1996)
The Covenantal Tithe (2011)

SOVEREIGNTY AND DOMINION

An Economic Commentary on Genesis

Volume 1

Gary North

Sovereignty and Dominion

An Economic Commentary on Genesis

Formerly: The Dominion Covenant: Genesis

Copyright © Gary North, 1982, 1987, 2012

Third Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to Ken Ham who is extending the work of Henry Morris and John Whitcomb.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1: Sovereignty and Dominion

| | |
|--|-----|
| Preface | ix |
| General Introduction | xiv |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Cosmic Personalism (Gen. 1:1) | 8 |
| 2. Purpose, Order, and Sovereignty (Gen. 1:14–16) | 21 |
| 3. The Stewardship Principle (Gen. 1:26) | 38 |
| 4. Grace Precedes Law, but Includes Law (Gen. 1:27–28) | 46 |
| 5. Economic Value: Objective and Subjective (Gen. 1:31) | 56 |
| 6. God’s Week and Man’s Week (Gen. 2:1–3) | 87 |
| 7. The Value of Gold (Gen. 2:12) | 101 |
| 8. Subordination and Fulfillment (Gen. 2:15) | 107 |
| 9. The Meaning of Ownership (Gen. 2:15–18) | 114 |
| 10. The God-Designed Harmony of Interests (Gen. 2:18–23) | 121 |
| 11. Costs, Choices, and Tests (Gen. 3:6) | 135 |
| 12. Scarcity: Curse and Blessing (Gen. 3:17–19) | 149 |
| 13. The Burden of Time (Gen. 3:22–24) | 157 |
| 14. Primitive Nomads (Gen. 4:2) | 172 |
| 15. The Sin of Envy (Gen. 4:3–8) | 179 |
| 16. To Keep a Brother (Gen. 4:9) | 184 |
| 17. Calling and Occupation (Gen. 6:12–14) | 190 |
| 18. The Ecological Covenant (Gen. 9:1–2) | 197 |
| 19. The World Trade Incentive (Gen. 11:7–8) | 203 |
| 20. Investment and Character (Gen. 12:1–2) | 210 |
| 21. The Covenantal Tithe (Gen. 14:18–20) | 216 |
| 22. The Growth of Human Capital (Gen. 15:5–6) | 222 |
| 23. A Guaranteed Inheritance (Gen. 15:16) | 238 |
| 24. Hospitality (Gen. 18:6–8) | 241 |
| 25. Escape from the Wilderness (Gen. 21:14–19) | 246 |
| 26. Competitive Bargaining (Gen. 25:31–33) | 249 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| 27. Envy and Destruction (Gen. 26:18–20) | 258 |
| 28. The Uses of Deception (Gen. 27:19) | 261 |
| 29. Jacob's Tithe (Gen 28:20–22) | 276 |
| 30. Contingency Planning (Gen. 32:7–8) | 282 |
| 31. The Law of Diminishing Returns (Gen. 36:6–7) | 289 |
| 32. The Blessing of Responsibility (Gen. 39:2–4) | 298 |
| 33. The Entrepreneurial Function (Gen. 41:25, 28) | 305 |
| 34. The Misapplication of Intrinsic Value (Gen. 47:15–16) . . | 318 |
| Conclusion | 325 |

Volume 2: APPENDIXES

| | |
|---|-----|
| APPENDIX A—From Cosmic Purposelessness to Humanistic Sovereignty | 335 |
| APPENDIX B—The Evolutionists' Defense of the Market | 421 |
| APPENDIX C—Cosmologies in Conflict: Creation vs. Evolution | 458 |
| APPENDIX D—Basic Implications of the Six-Day Creation . . . | 530 |
| APPENDIX E—Witnesses and Judges | 563 |
| BIBLIOGRAPHY | 581 |

PREFACE

You hold in your hand, or see on your screen, the first volume of a ?? volume set—?? volumes, if I complete the summary volume. This set, An Economic Commentary on the Bible, is one long book. I would call it a fat book. Add another four volumes of appendixes. It took me 37 years to write it.

A. Fat Books and Social Change

I hold to what I call the fat book theory of social transformation. Most of the major turning points in Western history have had fat books at their center. The Bible is certainly a fat book. Augustine's City of God is a fat book, and by adhering to the biblical worldview, it restructured Western civilization's concept of history.¹ Thomas Aquinas' Summa Theologica is a fat book, and it gave the medieval West the crucial synthesis of scholastic philosophy, an intellectual tradition still defended by a handful of Roman Catholic conservatives and (implicitly, at least) by most contemporary Protestant fundamentalist philosophers. John Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion is a fat book, and it structured a large segment of Reformation theology.

Christians have not been the only social transformationists who have written fat books that have changed Western civilization. Immanuel Kant's Critique of Pure Reason is a fat book, and you just about have to take his Critique of Practical Reason as its companion volume. This set restructured modern philosophy, and in the twentieth century, theology (by way of Karl Barth and Emil Brunner).² William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England is a four-volume fat book, yet it was read by just about every lawyer in the British colonies after 1765. The Federalist is fat. (Of course, it had its greatest initial effect as a series of newspaper articles, 1787–88, during the debate over the ratification of the U.S. Constitution, which gives us some comparative indication of the recent effects of humanist public school programs to achieve universal literacy in the United States. Try to get the average American newspaper reader to read, digest, and comment on The Federalist.)

1. Karl Löwith, Meaning in History (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1949), ch. 9.

2. Cornelius Van Til, The New Modernism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1947).

A decade after Blackstone's Commentaries came Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, a fat book. Karl Marx's Das Kapital is a fat book; if you include the two posthumous volumes, it is a very fat book. If you include his posthumous multi-volume Theories of Surplus Value, it is positively obese.

All these fat books have sat on library shelves and have intimidated people, generation after generation. A handful of influential people actually went to the effort to read them, subsequently believed them, and then wrote more books in terms of them.

B. Exceptions to the Rule

There are exceptions to my fat book theory. Machiavelli's The Prince is a thin book. So is his Discourses. John Locke's Second Treatise of Government is a thin book. Jean Jacques Rousseau's Social Contract is thin. So is Edmund Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France. Marx and Engels' Communist Manifesto is a short book. So is F. A. Hayek's Road to Serfdom.

Then there are medium-sized books. Thomas Hobbes' Leviathan is a medium-size book, and it launched the long tradition of social contract political theory. The first edition of Charles Darwin's Origin of Species was a medium-sized book. John Maynard Keynes' General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money is a medium-sized book.

Thin and medium-sized books have their rightful place in initiating social transformations. But to maintain such a transformation, there had better be some fat back-up books on the shelf. "What should we do now?" the initially victorious revolutionaries inescapably ask. Fat books provide answers. More than this: if fat books with believable answers are not already on the shelf, there will not be a successful social transformation. Men will not draw others into their revolutionary cause unless the potential recruits become persuaded that the promoters have answers to specific real-world problems—problems that contemporary society is not dealing with successfully.

Producing a true revolution requires the support of many kinds of printed materials, from pamphlets to thick, technical volumes. These days, it also requires online videos. Those activists who are in the midst of a revolution seldom have time to think through every aspect of the changes which their slogans and actions are producing, but the revolution's leaders need to know that the basic theoretical work has been done, that workable, principled, and consistent answers to specific historical problems are in reserve, and that after the dust settles, the heirs of the revolution will be able steadily to restructure society in ways that are consistent with the ideals of the revolution. This faith has been misplaced on many past occasions, the obvious example being Communists' faith in Marx's Das Kapital. Its economic theory was wrong. It could not be applied successfully in any Communist nation without destroying the productivity of that economy. But it was necessary that at least the first volume of Das Kapital was on the shelves of the revolutionaries (the three subsequent volumes were not published in the lifetime of either Marx or Engels). Its very presence gave confidence to those who were launching the Communist revolution. The book was fat and unreadable, but that was an advantage: men's faith in Marx's solutions was not shattered by ever having read it.

The wise social strategist writes fat books and thin books and books in between, not knowing which will work. Augustine and Aquinas wrote all sorts of books. So did Kant, whose brief Universal Natural History and Theory of the Heavens first proposed the idea of galactic evolution. Darwin kept fattening up Origin, and then added The Descent of Man. Marx co-authored the Communist Manifesto, plus endless journalism pieces, some of which constituted books. He also was in partnership with Frederick Engels, who was smart enough to extract and separately publish Socialism: Utopian and Scientific from the still-born Herr Eugen Dühring's Revolution in Science. Lenin wrote materials of all sizes, decade after decade. I, too, have written my share of thin and medium-sized books. (Well, mostly the latter.)

C. Why So Fat?

This series is fat, but not unreadable. The volumes may reside in many hard disk drives for many years, but those who use them will be able to find specific answers to real-world economic problems—answers that are self-consciously structured in terms of the revealed word of God. If my answers were not detailed, if my logic were not spelled out, and if my sources were not cited in full, then this book could no more serve as a reliable guide to economic reconstruction than some fat polemical tract published by the Maryknoll Order or written by a sociology professor at Wheaton College.

This is a reference work, not a catechism. It tries to accomplish a great deal: exegete verses, describe how they applied in the Old Testament era, explain why some should be applied today, and offer examples of how they might be applied in practice. It is large because I want it to serve for many years (preferably centuries) as one of the key reference works on specific applications of biblical law in economics and jurisprudence.

In some ways, I wish I could imitate Moses Maimonides, the late-twelfth-century Jewish scholar. In defending the style of the enormous output of his life's literary work (he was also a full-time physician to the Sultan in Cairo), including his monumental 14-volume Code (the Mishneh Torah), he wrote: "All our works are concise and to the point. We have no intention of writing bulky books nor of spending time on that which is useless. Hence when we explain anything, we explain only what is necessary and only in the measure required to understand it, and whatever we write is in summary form. . . . Were I able to condense the entire Talmud into a single chapter, I would not do so in two."³ The problem with his concise style is this: when we go to his Code (which is not a detailed commentary, despite its huge length), time and again we cannot follow his reasoning. It is not simply because we are gentiles living many centuries later; learned contemporary rabbinical correspondents expressed this same dissatisfaction to him.⁴ It takes considerable explanation, plus running debates in footnotes, to clarify scholarly points. Better to write a long book that can be digested in a series of bite-sized portions than a highly condensed book that takes enormous intellectual energy and vast background knowledge in order to decipher.

I had to make the books long in order to make them coherent. Highly condensed writing is too difficult to read, too easy to skip over key parts in some argument, and therefore too easy to misinterpret.

3. Cited in Isadore Twersky, Introduction to the Code of Maimonides (Mishneh Torah) (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1980), p. 45.

4. See, for example, his lengthy reply to Rabbi Phinehas ben Meshullam, judge in Alexandria: ibid., pp. 30–37. Twersky cited Rabbi Joseph Karo, the sixteenth-century scholar and Kabbalist: "The generations that followed him could not understand his works well . . . for the source of every decision is concealed from them. . . ." Twersky then remarked: "To this day [1980], the quest for Mishneh Torah sources in unknown Midrashim and Geonic responsa, variant readings, etc., continues unabated as one of the main forms of Rabbinic scholarship." Ibid., p. 106.

On the other hand, long, involved arguments are difficult to follow and remember. Therefore, I have broken up long arguments into manageable portions by adopting a liberal use of subsections and sub-subsections, plus summaries at the end of each chapter. I strongly recommend that whenever you see a bold-faced subhead, you should pay attention to it; the same goes for the italicized sub-subheads. They are there to help you get through each argument, as well as for convenient reviewing.

Conclusion

This set is supposed to be consumed in bite-sized portions; I have therefore done my best to make every mouthful both tasty and nourishing. To keep readers in their chairs and turning the pages of this book, I have done my best to put useful information on every page. There is no fluff. The extended footnotes are also filled with all sorts of choice tidbits that would otherwise be quite difficult to locate. I also use footnotes for running debates that do not belong in the main text, or to settle scores with my critics. Footnotes can be fun!

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY

ON THE BIBLE

... of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh (Eccl. 12:12b).

The same thing is true of making many online videos.—Gary North

This is the first volume in a multi-volume economic commentary on the Bible. The Bible is filled with material that relates to economics in the broad sense, meaning political economy, as it was called in the nineteenth century, or moral philosophy, as it was called in the eighteenth century. My intention for this commentary is to lay the intellectual foundations for a comprehensive restructuring of all of social sciences in terms of biblical revelation.

I wrote this commentary as the exegetically mandatory preliminary exercise in my attempt to answer this question: Is there a uniquely biblical economic theory? I knew that until I did this exegetical groundwork, I could not legitimately expect to be able to answer this question accurately. I wrote it mainly for myself. I needed to know.

There are ?? other volumes in this series. Why should you read this one, let alone the other ???

If you are a pastor in search of material to write a sermon on a passage in this commentary, you have come to the right place. Commentaries survive longer than other Christian books. There is always a pastor in need of sermon material. Pastors will read individual chapters.

What if you are not a pastor? Why should you read one or more volumes? Do you want to know correct answers for one or more of the following questions?

What does the Bible teach about economics?

Why is biblical economic theory necessary to understand the world correctly?

Why is biblical economic theory necessary to understand the Bible correctly?

Why does the Bible spend so much space on economics?

How should a Christian society operate economically?

What does God want you to do with your wealth?

Why do you think you do not have much wealth when you really do?

What do you owe God?

What can you legitimately expect from God?

How should you decide what to do with your life?

Is learning answers to one or more of these questions worth the time and money it will take you to read ?? volumes? That depends on your priorities.

If your answer is “no,” what about the time it will take you to view several hundred online 3-minute videos: conclusions only? In other words, you will take my word for all of it—no proof required. No?

I suggest another compromise: view the 3-minute videos, plus an equal number of 15-minute videos. No?

What about MP3 audio files instead of videos? Fill in drive time with my commentaries.

I am doing whatever I can to make the effort pay for you. It will take a lot of work for me to produce the audio/video presentations. It has already taken a lot of work to produce the books.

A. Judicial Continuity and Discontinuity

In studying the laws of Moses, the Christian commentator needs a hermeneutic: a principle of biblical interpretation. He needs this above all: a way to determine which laws were annulled by Christ’s death, resurrection, and ascension, and which were not. When I completed my four-volume commentary on Leviticus, I came to this conclusion (in the Conclusion). There were four separate categories of law in the Mosaic code.

1. Land laws (Israel)
2. Seed laws (families/tribes)
3. Priestly laws

4. Cross-boundary laws

Only the fourth category extends into the New Covenant. I have done my best to classify every economic law in terms of this four-fold system.

So, I have asked these two questions:

1. How was a law supposed to apply under the Old Testament?
2. How is it supposed to be applied under the New Testament, if at all?

I begin each exegetical chapter with this: identifying the theocentric focus of the passage. God is central. Man is not. We should begin with what God expects and why—not with what man expects and why.

To build an exegetically based alternative to my commentaries and my final presentation of Christian economics, my critics will have to do a great deal of work. I do not expect any of them to do this. They will have to suggest an alternative. As the old saying goes, “you can’t beat something with nothing.” But what is their “something” likely to be? So far, there is none.

Does this mean that I regard all previous attempts to make a case for Christian economics as incomplete? Yes. As more hopeful than exegetical? Yes. As premature? Yes. As misguided? No.

B. The Background of This Project

I became a Christian in July of 1959 at the age of 17. By the end of my freshman year in college a year later, I had decided that the academic field of economics should be studied in terms of the Bible. I was becoming aware of the fact that there was no explicitly Bible-based body of material available on the topic of Christian economics. I did not imagine then that I would have to write the intellectual foundations of this required body of material. I kept looking. By the age of 20, I knew that I would have to write it. I did not know that I would also have to raise the funds to publish it, except for what I paid for out of my own pocket. My adult life has been devoted to this task.

Almost from the day that I announced this project in the early 1970s, I have been asked the same question: “Are you saying that there is a uniquely Christian economics, different from secular economics?” My answer has been simple, “yes.” Yet my answer goes beyond even a simple “yes.” Following the presuppositional methodology of Cornelius Van Til, I am saying that there is no economics except Christian economics. I am not simply arguing that Christian economists should develop a better approach to economics, both theoretical and practical. Rather, I am saying that Christian economists are required to work out the biblical principles of the only reliable economics there can ever be, revelational economics.

If Christians in any academic field say merely that we have a better approach, an approach that is superior to others, but nevertheless one among many, then we have misunderstood the comprehensive claims of God on our thinking. Every thought, every action, every conceivable aspect of human life must be subdued by biblical principles. There are no neutral zones outside of God's providence and God's law-order. There are no testing areas for God's word. There is only His truth and man's error.

This is not to say that secular economists have discovered nothing that is true. What they claim to have discovered may very well be true, but when such a conclusion is true, then the secular economists have come to that conclusion by using borrowed (stolen) premises. Whatever the economist says that is fully consistent with his methodological presupposition of intellectual neutrality, or cosmic impersonalism, or any other form of God-denying humanism, cannot possibly be true. Conversely, anything that he says that is true cannot be fully consistent with his self-proclaimed neutrality, cosmic impersonalism, or other God-denying or God-limiting presuppositions.

I have been told repeatedly that there is no such thing as a uniquely Christian economics. I have been told this by atheists with Ph.D.s in economics. I have been told this by Christians with Ph.D.s in economics. I have been told this by pietistic, emotionalistic, antinomian Christians without the foggiest notion of economics. After a while, I grew tired of being told this, so I decided that what needed to be written is a comprehensive book on Christian economics. That book had never been written. There are books, including my Introduction to Christian Economics (1973), that have begun to explore a few aspects of Christian economics, but there is no comprehensive treatise along the lines of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations (1776) or Ludwig von Mises' Human Action (1949). There are smaller books that claim to be defending Christian economics, but which actually defend free market economics or Keynesian economics by means of a few biblical quotations.

Before someone writes a comprehensive treatise on Christian economics, he needs a systematic commentary on the Bible that deals with the Bible as a guide for economic reasoning and practice. But why bother? Because if we do not know what the Bible has to say about economics, then we are “flying blind” when we begin to construct elaborate economic theories in the name of the Bible. In 1973 I decided to devote myself to the production of an economic commentary on the Bible as a preliminary study which, I hoped, would lead to the writing of a treatise on Christian economics.

I hope that readers will begin to grasp the magnitude of the task I set for myself after they have finished my commentary on Genesis. There should be no question in anyone’s mind that the Bible has a lot to say about economics. They still may not be convinced that there is a uniquely Christian economics, but there should be no question of the large quantity of data for economics which the Bible presents to us.

I began this commentary in the spring of 1973: Genesis 1:1. It took until the latter part of 1999 for me to finish the first draft of my economic commentary on the Pentateuch: the first five books.

My first published book was Marx’s Religion of Revolution (1968), a critical analysis of Marx’s thought, including his economics. I understood early that the war for the minds of men in the twentieth century was primarily between Communism and Christianity, and that this war involved every area of life. It is a war no longer in progress. Communism lost—indeed, lost in the most spectacular collapse in intellectual and institutional history. I have said before that the evidence of this collapse could be seen in the discount book bins in used book stores. Books on Marx, Marxism, and Communism were sold in the early 1990s for $1. There was no more market. When the Berlin Wall was torn down in 1989 by Germans on both sides of the wall, the handwriting was on the wall for Communism. On December 31, 1991, the Soviet Union’s leaders killed it in the collapse of the largest empire in history. Not a shot was fired. Nothing like this had ever been seen in recorded history. The bad guys lost, and lost spectacularly in full public view. It was magnificent—by far the greatest event of my lifetime.

Marx’s Religion of Revolution appeared four years before I was awarded my doctorate in 1972. My second book, An Introduction to Christian Economics, was published in the spring of 1973. It was a collection of essays, many of which were rewritten versions of essays that had appeared in The Freeman from 1967 onward. I knew it was insufficient at the time. So, at about the time that Introduction to Christian Economics was published, I decided to begin a detailed exegetical commentary of the economic teachings of the Bible. This was my wife's suggestion. It seemed foolish to attempt to write a textbook in Christian economics, let alone a treatise along the lines of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, without first laying exegetical foundations that clearly establish exactly what the Bible says about economics. Otherwise, the project would be a form of baptized humanism, because economic theory is methodologically atheistic, and has been ever since the late seventeenth century.¹

The world does not need another half-baked defense of capitalism that is supported by a handful of disconnected Bible verses. Such books are far too easy for Christian political liberals to dismiss. I argue that capitalism necessarily results when the whole counsel of God is preached, believed, and obeyed by any society. The standard rhetorical response of humanist-educated Christian political liberals to my assertion is this: "Proof-texting! Proof-texting!" This is their code word for "this is getting too close for comfort ethically and politically." I therefore realized by age 31 that writing an economic commentary on the Bible would become my lifetime project, and that I would probably never write the Christian version of Wealth of Nations. Today, I think I may complete that task. I have completed the preliminary exegesis: ?? volumes of exegesis and appendixes.

I completed a preliminary outline of my economic commentary on the Pentateuch in 1980, when I finished the last of my monthly columns on the Pentateuch in the Chalcedon Foundation's Chalcedon Report. I did not realize that the final version of Exodus would require the publication of six volumes. I did not realize that the necessary appendixes would become as long and as involved as they became. These include the visible appendixes at the end of each volume, but there were others. Dominion and Common Grace (1987) is a study of the relationship between biblical law and historical progress. Is the World Running Down? (1988) is a study of the physical science concept of entropy and its supposed importance in social theory. Then there were Political Polytheism (1989) and Millennialism and Social Theory (1990). These four books started out as appendixes to Tools of Dominion, my commentary on Exodus 21–35, which was published in 1990. I have decided to publish Tools of Dominion in this set in three separate volumes.²

1. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics: English Economic Thought, 1660–1776 (London: Routledge, [1963] 2003). This book was first published by M.I.T. Press and, two years later, by Anchor, in an inexpensive paperback edition.

In 1977, I decided to devote ten hours per week, 50 weeks per year, until I reached age 70, to writing and publishing this commentary. I completed the first draft in 2009 at the age of 67. I did not originally believe that I would complete the project by age 70. With respect to the final draft, which will include video presentations of every chapter, I may finish by age 73. To meet this deadline, I must hustle.

C. Theological Schizophrenia

Most Bible-believing fundamentalists generally agree with the bulk of the economic conclusions in my writings. They may object to my theonomic, postmillennial theology, but not my economics. Instinctively, they are favorable to economic freedom. They are philosophical nominalists and methodological individualists, so they tend to agree with a social philosophy that emphasizes decentralized institutional arrangements rather than state-imposed solutions to economic problems.

On the other hand, my economic conclusions receive considerable criticism from neo-evangelical and even Calvinistic theologians, whose secular graduate school training has left many of them with unmistakable socialistic scars. These tenured scholars believe in state-supported higher education and state-supported everything else (except churches). They are not socialists or collectivists, they insist repeatedly, but somehow they can always be found recommending additional government welfare spending.³ Ronald Sider's Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (1977) was a best-selling example of this sort of thinking.⁴ Douglas Vickers' Economics and Man (1976) was a worst-selling example. The more academically respectable the college or seminary, the more politically liberal (statist) its faculty tends to be.⁵

The neo-evangelicals therefore disagree with both my theology

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus, 6 vols. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Pt. 3.

3. Joel McDurmon, God versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009), Pt. 2.

4. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1977). For a line-by-line refutation, see David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1981] 1996). (<http://bit.ly/dcproductive>)

5. James Davidson Hunter, Evangelicalism: The Coming Generation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), pp. 165–80. Cf. "What Theologians Believe," This World, I (Summer 1980).

and my economic conclusions. At least these neo-evangelical defenders of the state clearly perceive that my free market economic conclusions flow directly and inescapably from my theonomic theology; they reject both my theology and my conclusions.⁶

Fundamentalists are far less likely to acknowledge the consistency of my theology and my economics, since they want to avoid having to follow my economic conclusions back to my theology. They imply (though never quite state) that my economic conclusions somehow are not an integral aspect of my theonomic theology, that there is some unstated and unexplained discontinuity between what I believe about biblical law and what I conclude about economics. Fundamentalists find nothing objectionable in this supposed dualism between my theology and my economics, because they also insist on maintaining a similar dualism, namely, a radical distinction between politics and theology. They maintain this dualism—intellectual schizophrenia—because of their insistence on a radical discontinuity between Old Testament law and New Testament ethics.⁷

This commentary series is a direct assault against two religions: the power religion and the escape religion.⁸ We can find both varieties of these rival yet cooperating religions in every religion, including the religion of humanism. I am coming in the name of dominion religion, the religion presented first in Genesis 1:26–28.

I am coming in the name of an idea: comprehensive redemption.⁹ In every area of life that has been affected by the Fall of man and by original sin, the gospel of Christ liberates people from sin. Wherever sin reigns, there the gospel calls people to repent: to turn around. By liberating individuals from sin, the gospel liberates institutions and cultures from sin. To deny this—as Christian escape religionists do—you must

6. See the three essays by my critics in Robert G. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984). This $5.95 book was selling well when it was mysteriously pulled off the market by InterVarsity in 1985. It sold all copies to the Institute for Christian economics for 25 cents each, plus postage. The editor wrote to me in amazement; the book had been selling well. I like to think that my article and my three responses to the other authors were the cause of InterVarsity's decision to kill the book. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

7. Gary North, "The Intellectual Schizophrenia of the New Christian Right," Christianity and Civilization, I (1982). (<http://bit.ly/TheologyCR>)

8. Gary North, Authority and Dominion, Part 1: Representation and Dominion (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1985] 2012).

9. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C; "The Theology of Comprehensive Redemption." (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>) assume that drunks will remain drunks after conversion, that wife-beaters will remain wife-beaters, and that God does not care one way or the other. The Apostle Paul rejected this view of Christianity (I Tim. 1:9–10).¹⁰ So do I.

D. A Christian Worldview

In this, the second decade of the twenty-first century, we have seen many attempts to label this or that perspective as Christian. What we have yet to see is detailed exegetical work proving the case. We hear about “the Christian worldview.” What we do not see is specific biblical content that identifies such a worldview as uniquely Christian, meaning uniquely based on the Bible. Saying that a worldview is Christian does not make it so.

Once we claim to have such a worldview, it is time to begin applying it to the world around us. He who says that there is such a worldview, one which Christians have no obligation before God and man to implement, is like a man who sees himself in a mirror and then goes away, forgetting what he has just seen (James 1:24). Such a person is the hearer of the word, not a doer (James 1:22–23).

To say there is a Christian view of anything is to call for Christian reconstruction. The only model adequate for such a restructuring, both intellectually and objectively, is the biblical covenant model. Christian scholars must self-consciously adopt methodological covenantalism as their epistemological foundation. Neither philosophical nominalism (individualist and subjectivist) nor realism (collectivist and objectivist¹¹) can serve as consistent, reliable foundations of human thought, including economics.

My economic commentary can serve as a model for how other academic disciplines can and should be restructured. We need similar commentaries in many other fields.

E. Biblical Covenantalism

The doctrine of the covenant is basic to a proper understanding of the Bible. I accept R. J. Rushdoony’s assertion: “Infallibility is an incapable concept and fact; it is the locale of infallibility which is in question. The canon or rule of life and faith is either from God or from

10. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 1.

11. I do not mean objectivist in the sense that the novelist Ayn Rand meant it.

man. It is either the canon of covenant law, or it is the canon of man's word as law."¹² It is either biblical law or humanistic law. It is either the biblical covenant or a humanistic covenant.

By identifying the covenant as the heart of the battle between humanism and Christianity, Rushdoony challenged the modern church to deal with the biblical covenant and adopt it as the key to understanding. The Bible itself, he correctly argued, is a covenant document. Either we adopt the canon of covenant law as our guiding principle of interpretation, or the canon of man's word as law. There is no third option, no neutral ground of confidence. He wrote:

The Bible, in fact, is divided into two sections, the Old Testament and the New (or renewed) Testament, witnessing to the two great stages of covenant history. The Bible as a whole is God's covenant word or law, His declaration of the history and nature of His covenant.

A covenant book is thus a canonical book: it is the rule of faith, its law. The books of the Bible are canonical because they are covenantal: they are law because they are covenantal. If our view of the covenant is antinomian, then we have neither a covenant nor a canon, only a book for vaguely spiritual and moral counsel. It is then not in essence an infallible word.

While Scripture has many words, it is in essence one word, and is so spoken of in Deuteronomy 4:2. With the close of the canon, the words now stop (Rev. 22:18–19), and the one, unified word remains. Judgment is promised in Revelation 22:18–19 to all who add or detract from the one word, because an altered covenant law is no longer the law itself but a human substitute for law.¹³

F. "Covenant" Defined

What is the biblical covenant? In 1982, when the first edition of my commentary on Genesis, The Dominion Covenant: Genesis, was published, I could not have answered this question clearly. While Calvinists have long proclaimed their devotion to covenant theology, the covenant had never been defined clearly in Calvinist literature.

12. R. J. Rushdoony, Infallibility: An Inescapable Concept (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1978), p. 26. Reprinted in Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, 2 vols. (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1994), I, p. 23.

13. Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, I, pp. 22–23. See Ray Sutton, "The Inescapability of a Master Principle," Covenant Renewal, I (June 1987). (<http://bit.ly/SuttonMP>)

There had been a preliminary attempt by Meredith G. Kline of Westminster Seminary to apply to the Mosaic covenant the insights of George Mendenhall regarding the treaty structure of ancient Near Eastern kingdoms. Kline's book did not apply the Mosaic covenant to the New Covenant.¹⁴ On the contrary, his book and his theology were hostile to any such attempt.¹⁵ It was not until the fall of 1985 that Pastor Ray Sutton discovered the specific five-point model of the biblical covenant as it applies throughout all of the Bible. He developed this thesis while recovering from a serious burn. He presented it in final form in That You May Prosper (1987). I helped him edit That You May Prosper. My Institute for Christian Economics published it.¹⁶ I regard this insight as the most important theological breakthrough in Protestant history.

This sounds excessive, I know. Here is why I say it. Protestantism's revolt against Roman Catholicism has always rested on judicial theology. It began when Luther publicly rejected the legal authority of the Pope to sell indulgences that would free sinners from God's final negative sanctions. He later denied the legitimacy of the Pope's act of excommunication against him. He and his followers had a rival concept of biblical sanctions: ecclesiastical oaths and sacraments. The Protestant Reformation was, above all, a revolt against the existing system of institutional sanctions. Sutton identified sanctions as point four of the biblical covenant model. The Reformation was grounded judicially on a specific covenant theology—one whose adherents believed was worth the risk of going to the stake to uphold.

Because of the then-undeveloped nature of Protestant covenant theology, the Reformers did not offer a unified, well-developed covenantal-judicial case for their separation from Rome. Rome understood the fundamental judicial issue far better than the Protestants did: the judicial limits of personal submission to oath-bound ecclesiastical and civil authorities.¹⁷ It was a debate over the legitimacy of the institution-

14. Meredith G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963).

15. Meredith G. Kline, "The Intrusion and the Decalogue," The Structure of Biblical Authority (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 152–71.

16. I started the ICE in 1975. I shut it down in December 2001. With the advent of the World Wide Web and print on demand technology, it was no longer necessary for me to raise funds to publish this commentary series and other materials.

17. Roman Catholic leaders from the beginning pointed to Luther's marriage to an ex-nun as the mark of his broken vow of celibacy, which they regarded as representative of his movement. E. Michael Jones, a Roman Catholic historian and social analyst, blamed Luther for modernism. The origin of Protestant Reformation was mostly al sanctions that had been inherent in the original oaths. This issue has never been settled to the satisfaction of the rival groups.

The Bible presents a unique covenant theology that is comprehensively judicial. Without covenant theology, there is no biblical way to extend Christianity into the realms outside the Christian family and the church. The kingdom of God would then become judicially indistinguishable from any other organized attempt by men to exercise dominion apart from God and His Bible-revealed laws.

The doctrine of God's absolutely sovereign grace that Luther¹⁸ and Calvin preached can be found in Augustine and other medieval theologians. Such is not the case with Sutton's discovery of the five-point covenant model. Others had seen that there is a five-point structure, but nobody had identified accurately what all of the five points are, or how they relate to the New Testament. Sutton's discussion and defense of his covenant model can be found in his book, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant (1987). Here is Sutton's model.

1. Transcendence/immanence (presence)
2. Hierarchy/authority/representation
3. Ethics/dominion/kingdom
4. Oath/judgment/sanctions
5. Succession/inheritance/continuity

The acronym in English is THEOS, the Greek word for God.

This is a simple model. First, God announces His holy name. He is the absolute sovereign over the universe as its Creator. He is transcendent over, meaning distinct from, His creation, yet He is also immanent in, meaning present with, this creation. He is neither a deistic God that is so distant from the creation that He cannot sustain it and judge it continually, nor is He a pantheistic God that is so immersed in the creation that He cannot sustain it and judge it continually. He is the Creator; therefore He is the Sustainer and Judge of the universe.

Second, God delegates to men authority over the creation. Men are His stewards. They report to Him. He controls the universe, yet He also delegates authority to men to exercise dominion over the creation. Each of God's covenants is marked by a hierarchical chain of command: a bottom-up appeals court structure, not a top-down bureaucracy.

Third, God calls men to exercise dominion. The tool of dominion about sex, he argued. The leaders wanted to get married. Jones, Degenerate Moderns: Sex and Misbehavior (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1993), pp. 243–51.

18. Luther, The Bondage of the Will (1525).

is God's Bible-revealed law. He judges men in terms of their conformity to the terms of the covenant, biblical law. Without law, there can be no covenant.

Fourth, God judges the performance of men. He executes judgment. This judgment is two-fold: blessing and cursing. There is always equal ultimacy chronologically of both blessing and cursing, extending beyond the resurrection: the resurrected New Heaven and New Earth and the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14). The sign of this judgment is the oath, technically called a self-maledictory oath. The oath-taker calls down the curses of God if he breaks the terms of the covenant. In His grace, God has called down mankind's well-deserved curses on His son, which is why Christ had to die on the cross.

Fifth, there is an inheritance. This is the basis of historic continuity. In His grace, God did not destroy Adam and Eve in history on the day that they sinned. He executed judgment, but they did not die physically. He graciously granted physical life to them on the judicial basis of Christ's future sacrificial offering at Calvary. To inherit God's blessings, men must be adopted by grace back into God's family (John 1:12). To refuse the offer of ethical adoption is to remain in the family of God's disinherited son, Adam, and to be cut out of God's inheritance in eternity (Acts 17:26).

To make this easier for people to understand, I revamped these five points in my Publisher's Preface to Sutton's book. I asked five questions.

1. Who's in charge here?
2. To whom do I report?
3. What are the rules?
4. What do I get if for obeying or disobeying?
5. Does this outfit have a future?

This entire commentary series is an extension of Sutton's presentation of the five points of the biblical covenant model. Without the integrating principle of the biblical covenant model, this commentary would be seriously deficient.

For any scholar who intends to reconstruct his academic discipline in terms of the Bible, I suggest beginning with That You May Prosper and the 2010 edition of my 1980 book, Unconditional Surrender. Of course, it would not hurt to read all 31 volumes in this series, but the investment of time would be considerable. Better to start on your reconstruction project and read these after your first draft is complete, assuming you have sufficient time. If my experience is typical, you won't, unless you are young.

G. Five Covenants

There are five, and only five covenants in the Bible: the general dominion covenant, plus personal, family, church, and civil covenants. Each of the covenants two through five corresponds to an agency of government. Each has an oath attached to it, either implicit or explicit. Each has all five points of the biblical covenant.

First, there is the dominion covenant. Mankind's very definition is in terms of the dominion covenant of Genesis 1:26–28. Man is made in God's image, and he is to exercise dominion in God's name. There is no escape from this aspect of man's being. It extends beyond the resurrection in the resurrected New Heaven and New Earth, and it thwarts covenant-breakers in the lake of fire eternally (Rev. 20:14–15).

This covenant was first revealed to man in the garden. There is transcendence: God is the Creator, and He assigned the dominion task to mankind. God was present in the garden to teach man the basics (naming the animals). There was hierarchy, for God placed Adam under Him and over the creation. There was law, and it was manifested in the garden by a forbidden tree. There was an implicit oath: violate it, God promised, and the curse is inevitable; obey it, and blessings are assured. There was continuity—the promise of eternal life—alongside of discontinuity: the promise of death the day that man rebels. The dominion covenant is the most fundamental covenant. The dominion covenant governs the other four: personal, family, church, and civil. Mankind is defined in terms of the dominion covenant—not in terms of family, church, or state.

Second, there is the individual covenant. God made His covenant with Adam as an individual, not only as the representative of mankind. God brings judgment on individuals (Luke 16). Individuals suffer the consequences of their actions, both in history and eternity.

Third, there is the family covenant. It, too, has all five points of the covenant.¹⁹ God is sovereign over it. There is hierarchy: husbands over wives, parents over children. It has specific laws governing it. It is sealed with a public oath (marriage vow). It involves inheritance and continuity. Personal oaths are called vows. They are referred to in

19. Ray R. Sutton, Who Owns the Family? God or the State? (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/rswotf>)

Numbers 30. Women are allowed to take them, and are required by God to adhere to them, but only if the male head of household, the father or the husband, approves within 24 hours (v. 3–8). Widows and divorced women, as heads of their households, may take vows without permission of a man (v. 9). Even though this is a personal oath, we see hierarchy illustrated by this requirement. The individual is under God, and is held accountable directly by God. Most women have to get permission, but are then held directly accountable by God.

Fourth, there is the church covenant. God is sovereign over it, and specially present in the sacraments. It has a system of hierarchical authority. Specific laws govern it. There is a baptismal oath, either explicit (adults) or representative (parents in the name of infants). There is continuity: membership and ordination of officers.

Fifth, there is the civil covenant. God ordains it and governs it. There is hierarchy: a court system. There are civil laws revealed by God. There are oaths: implicit (citizenship) and explicit (magistrates). There is continuity: elections, constitutional amending process, judicial precedents, etc.

God's five covenants establish the judicial basis of the personal relationship between God and man. There can be no relationship between God and man apart from a covenant. This is the overarching definitional covenant, the dominion covenant. Genesis 1:26–28 is truly a covenant: it establishes the judicial basis of the relationship between God and man. God the sovereign Creator (point one) created mankind to serve as His representatives over the creation (point two), commanding mankind to be fruitful and multiply (point five) and exercise dominion (point three). Mankind as a species is defined by God in terms of this dominion covenant, or what is sometimes called the cultural mandate. This covenant governs all four God-mandated governments: individual, family, church, and civil.

The five books of Moses (the Pentateuch) are themselves presented in the same order as the biblical covenant model. This is a very important piece of evidence in favor of the five-point biblical covenant model. Those scholars who reject Sutton's thesis need to present an alternative model, one that fits the Pentateuch better, and one that also fits the Ten Commandments better, since they are also structured in terms of the five-point model: 1–5 and 6–10.²⁰

Critics of this model need to understand an old political aphorism:

20. North, Authority and Dominion: Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion, Preface.

“You can’t beat something with nothing.” It is not enough to mumble that “Sutton’s book tries to prove too much” or “There are lots of different models in the Bible.” There are indeed lots of biblical models, and all of them are to be understood in terms of the Trinity, the doctrine of creation out of nothing, and the biblical covenant model. We begin and end all biblical studies with God and with the God-man relationship: Trinity, creation, and covenant.

H. The Pentateuch’s Five-Point Covenant Structure

Genesis clearly is a book dealing with God’s transcendence. Transcendence is point one of the biblical covenant model.²¹ The opening words of Genesis affirm God as Creator, testifying to God’s absolute transcendence, the foundation of the Creator-creature distinction: “In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth” (Gen. 1:1). But biblical transcendence also involves immanence: the presence of God with His people. God speaks with Adam, and judges Adam and Eve when He returns to the garden. He speaks to Cain, Noah, and Abraham. He establishes a covenant with Abraham and promises to be with Abraham and Abraham’s heirs forever (Gen. 17:7).

Exodus calls the Ten Commandments “the book of the covenant” (Ex. 24:7). God establishes His authority over the Israelites by delivering them out of Egypt. He also establishes the hierarchical principle of representation. Hierarchy is point two of the biblical covenant model.²² The principle of representation is manifested with God’s call to Moses out of the burning bush, telling him to go before Pharaoh as His representative. God delivers the Israelites from Egypt, and then He meets with Moses, their representative, at Sinai. In Exodus 18, Moses establishes a hierarchical civil appeals court system, whereupon God meets with Moses as Israel’s representative and delivers His covenant law. The Book of Exodus is a book about rival kings and rival kingdoms, God vs. Pharaoh. Men had to subordinate themselves either to God or Satan through their covenantal representatives.

The Book of Exodus is divided into five sections: the intervention of God into history to deliver His people (Ex. 1–7); the establishment of Israel's judicial hierarchy (Ex. 18); the giving of the law (Ex. 20–31); the judgment of Israel after the golden calf incident (Ex. 32); and the building of the tabernacle, which they carried with them into Canaan (Ex. 35–40).

21. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

22. Ibid., ch. 2. North, ch. 1.

Leviticus is the book that records the establishing of Israel's ritual and moral boundaries.²³ It is therefore about dominion, for boundaries in the Bible are always associated with dominion. The third point of the biblical covenant deals with boundaries. The third commandment deals with the prohibition of the misuse of God's name—a boundary²⁴—and its implications: obscenity, false oaths, and incantations (magical power), thereby affirming dominion through ethics,²⁵ and the eighth commandment parallels the third.²⁶ “Thou shalt not steal” is a command regarding ownership boundaries. The eighth commandment indicates that the concept of boundaries is basic to economic ethics, the third point of the covenant. Gordon Wenham commented on Leviticus' place in the Old Testament's covenant treaty structure: “(3) The centerpiece of every treaty was the stipulations section. In collections of law, such as Hammurabi's, the laws formed the central section. The same holds for the biblical collections of law. In the treaties a basic stipulation of total fidelity to the suzerain may be distinguished from the more detailed stipulations covering specific problems. In this terminology ‘Be holy’ could be described as the basic stipulation of Leviticus. The other laws explain what this means in different situations.”²⁷

God sets apart His people and their worship. He makes them holy—set apart. He places ritual boundaries around them. The Open Bible commented: “Leviticus centers around the concept of the holiness of God, and how an unholy people can acceptably approach Him and then remain in continued fellowship. The way to God is only through blood sacrifice, and the walk with God is only through obedience to His laws.”²⁸ The issue is sanctification, and this requires boundaries: “The Israelites serve a holy God who requires them to be holy as well. To be holy means to be ‘set apart’ or ‘separated.’ They are to be separ-

23. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

24. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 3.

25. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 3. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 3.

26. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 8.

27. Gordon J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1979), p. 30.

28. The Open Bible, Expanded Edition (Nashville, Tennessee: Thomas Nelson, 1983), p. 95.

ated from other nations unto God. In Leviticus, the idea of holiness appears eighty seven times, sometimes indicating ceremonial holiness (ritual requirements), and at other times moral holiness (purity of life)."²⁹ As R. K. Harrison wrote, the first 15 chapters deal with sacrificial principles and procedures relating to the removal of sin. "The last eleven chapters emphasize ethics, morality and holiness. The unifying theme of the book is the insistent emphasis upon God's holiness, coupled with the demand that the Israelites shall exemplify this spiritual attribute in their own lives."³⁰ Holiness means separation from the heathen.³¹ It means boundaries.

Leviticus is divided into five sections: the five sacrifices, which follow the five-point model (Lev. 1–7); the priestly, hierarchical cleansing of God's house (Lev. 8–16); laws of separation (Lev. 17–22); covenant renewal festivals (Lev. 23–24); inheritance (Lev. 25–27).

Numbers is the book of God's judgment against Israel in the wilderness.³² Judgment is point four of the biblical covenant model.³³ God judged them when they refused to accept the testimony of Joshua and Caleb regarding the vulnerability of Canaan to invasion (Num. 14). They rebelled against Him, and He punished them all by delaying their entry into Canaan until they were all dead, except Joshua and Caleb. "Numbers records the failure of Israel to believe in the promise of God and the resulting judgment of wandering in the wilderness for forty years."³⁴

Israel as a nation is in its infancy at the outset of this book, only thirteen months after the exodus from Egypt. In Numbers, the book of divine discipline, it becomes necessary for the nation to go through the painful process of testing and maturation. God must teach His people the consequences of irresponsible decisions. The forty years of wilderness experience transforms them from a rabble of ex-slaves into a nation ready to take the Promised Land. Numbers begins with the old generation (1:1–10:10), moves through a tragic transitional period (10:11–25:18), and ends with the new generation (26:36) at the

29. Ibid., p. 96.

30. R. K. Harrison, Leviticus: An Introduction and Commentary (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity, Press, 1980), p. 14.

31. Jacob Milgrom, "The Biblical Diet Laws As an Ethical System: Food and Faith," Interpretation, XVII (1963), p. 295.

32. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012).

33. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 4.

34. Open Bible, p. 127.

doorway to the land of Canaan.³⁵

Deuteronomy is the book of the inheritance, point five of the biblical covenant model.³⁶ “It is addressed to the new generation destined to possess the land of promise—those who survived the forty years of wilderness wandering.”³⁷ The children of the generation of the exodus renew their covenant with God and inherit Canaan on this basis. Moses blesses the tribes (Deut. 33), a traditional sign of inheritance in the Old Testament (Gen. 27; 49). Moses dies outside the land, but before he dies, God allows him to look from Mt. Nebo into the promised land (Deut. 34:4). He sees the inheritance. The book closes with the elevation of Joshua to leadership, the transitional event (Deut. 34:9–12).

Deuteronomy is divided into five sections: God’s transcendence (Deut. 1:1–5); hierarchy (Deut. 1:6–4:49); ethics (Deut. 5–16); sanctions (Deut. 27–30); continuity (Deut. 31–34).

Thus, the Pentateuch is itself revelatory of the structure of God’s covenant. My economic commentary on the Pentateuch is therefore a commentary on a covenant. I call it the dominion covenant, for it is the God-given, God-required assignment to mankind to exercise dominion and subdue the earth that defines mankind’s task as the only creature who images God the Creator.

I. The Decline of Christian Casuistry

It is a sad social commentary on Christian intellectual life that no Bible commentary like this has ever been attempted (as far as I have been able to determine). In fact, it is sad that key men in every academic discipline have not long been writing commentaries in their fields. These should have been begun at least 400 years ago, and certainly 300 years ago. Ironically, it was in the late-seventeenth century that Christian casuistry—the application of biblical principles to daily life—began to decline. That was also the century in which hypothetically neutral economics began to be promulgated, an intellectual innovation described by William Letwin in his book, Origins of Scientific Economics. The fact that it took until 1982 to get into print an economic commentary on just one book of the Bible is a testimony to the systematic, conscious retreat from the world of scholarship and practical wisdom on the part of those who call themselves Christians.

35. Ibid., p. 128.

36. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 5.

37. Open Bible, p. 171.

Why haven't Christian economists written numerous economic commentaries on the Bible, at least one each century, and preferably one each generation? Has it been that Christian scholars have been suffering from an intellectual illusion, namely, that there is a zone of neutral scholarship that provides Christians with all the data and logic they need, even though the work is being produced by men who believe that there is no God, and if there were, it could not be the God which the Bible presents?

Consider the implications of the statement, "There is no such thing as a distinctly Christian economics [psychology, political theory, education, etc.]." First, God has not spoken to His people with respect to how they should think and live. He remains silent, providing them with no ethical guidelines. He does not answer His people when they ask Him, "How shall we then live?"

Second, the Bible is not a comprehensive book. The "whole counsel of God" is simply the call to repentance. But, in specific terms, the Bible does not tell us, "Repentance from what?" The Bible is a book aimed at the heart of man, but the heart has no communication with the mind in areas outside of church policy, evangelism, and family life.

Third, the Bible gives the world over to Satan and his rebellious hordes. Not only have they stolen something from God, but God has given this world to them. At the least, they possess it by default, since God has not established guidelines. He does not really own the world, even though He says that He does (Ps. 50:10–12). God has not established rules for lawful stewardship and administration of His property. Satan and his followers have broken no laws of economics, for there are no laws of economics. Or, if there really are such laws, they are common to every culture, and we do not need the Bible to tell us what they are. Again, we are back to the premise of neutrality.

Fourth, there are no specifically biblical standards that we can use in constructing the kingdom of God. Those Christians who argue that there is no such thing as Christian economics also have a tendency to deny that there is now, or ever will be, a visible kingdom of God on earth, unless Jesus Christ rules it directly by means of standards that He never revealed in His ministry, but which He will reveal to Christians after He returns. Until He returns, we are off the hook; we have no kingdom-building guidelines or responsibilities. So, the rules of the kingdom are indeterminate today.

Fifth, the tradition established by the prophets when they confronted the rulers of their age in the name of God, telling them that they had violated specific biblical laws, is abrogated today. What, then, are we to say about the social message of the prophets today? Why, nothing, obviously. There is nothing to say, because they never really spoke to concrete social sins themselves, or, if they did, we are under grace, not law, socially speaking.

This means, socially speaking, that we are under Moloch, Mammon, or one of the other gods of rebellion, but the critics never mention this. When it comes to topics social, they are sociable: unwilling to “make waves” for the rulers of our day. Undoubtedly, they are not prophets.

If you do not like any or all of these implications, then you must do one of two things. First, prove to yourself that the implications do not follow from the statement, “There is no such thing as a distinctly Christian economics [psychology, political theory, education, etc.]” Second, if you find that these implications do follow from the premise, then you must abandon the premise. If you abandon the premise, then you owe it to yourself, before God, to start learning more about a distinctly Christian economics, psychology, or whatever. Then, once you learn you must begin to apply what you have learned to your spheres of influence.

J. Sola Scriptura: Yes or No?

A comprehensive gospel challenges the kingdom of autonomous man in every area of life. It challenges the idea of ethical neutrality. It affirms that neutrality is a myth.

A comprehensive biblical re-structuring of every academic discipline and every social order is therefore mandatory for those who say they believe the Protestant affirmation, sola Scriptura: Bible only. A lot of Protestants have proclaimed sola Scriptura. The claim is not believable until they also put the affirmation into practice by a comprehensive exegetical and methodological reconstruction of the academic disciplines.

In the past, those who have affirmed sola Scriptura have defended their lack of such a reconstruction by affirming another doctrine: the doctrine of the two historical kingdoms. They say that there is a kingdom of regenerate souls, and there is also a kingdom of civilization: politics, economics, science, technology, and culture—all theologically neutral, at least in theory. These kingdoms are legitimately separate, we are assured, yet Christians must live in both kingdoms. More than this: Christians have a moral obligation before God to submit to the prevailing kingdom of man, under which jurisdiction they live, refraining from any attempt to reform this kingdom in order to make conform to the standards of biblical law. To seek such a reform would be theocratic, they say. It would be triumphalist, they say. Both are bad, they say. So, they affirm the legitimacy of the opposite of biblical theocracy: humanist theocracy. Yet they resent having anyone point out this inescapable logical conclusion of their position. They reply: "Humanism need not be theocratic. It can be ethically neutral." (Do you believe this?) They also affirm the opposite of triumphalism: defeatism. But they resent being called defeatist. They seek a stalemate for Jesus in history.³⁸ Problem: neither Christ nor Satan will settle for a stalemate in history. Each seeks victory.

And Jesus knew their thoughts, and said unto them, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand: And if Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself; how shall then his kingdom stand? (Matt. 12:25–26).

But if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you. Or else how can one enter into a strong man's house, and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man? and then he will spoil his house. He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad (Matt. 12:28–30).

Clear, isn't it? But defenders of the two-kingdoms theology refuse to admit the obvious. There is no neutrality. (Do you believe this?)

Liberal theologians can and do accept this idea of the two kingdoms. Scriptura for the liberal becomes whatever an individual thinks it is. The individual is sovereign. The most famous theologian who affirmed this dualism was Karl Barth.³⁹ I reject Barthianism. But, in rejecting Barthianism, I also reject the two-kingdoms view that undergirds Barthianism. I suggest that you do, too.

This commentary will undermine my future critics' public declarations that my economic theories are not biblical. Why? Because the critic will not spend the enormous amount of time necessary to read all of this series. He will therefore not be able to say honestly that he has read the entire set and can therefore explain why my conclusions are incorrect. Furthermore, no other Christian economist will have produced anything comparable to this series. So, the critics will have to justify their not bothering to read my commentaries, and also justify the absence of any comparable series by someone holding a rival viewpoint. But how? They will have to settle for arguing that my hermeneutic—my principle of biblical interpretation—is wrong, so that they do not have to read my series nor point to an alternative series of commentaries. This argument will pressure them to affirm their own hermeneutic, namely, that the Old Testament has been completely replaced judicially by the New Testament. Given such a view, there is no judicial continuity for society, Old to New.

38. Gary North, "The Stalemate Mentality," in Gary North, Backward, Christian Soldiers? An Action Manual for Christian Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), ch. 11. (<http://bit.ly/gnsoldiers>)

39. Cornelius Van Til, Christianity and Barthianism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1962).

If this hermeneutic of judicial discontinuity is true, then there is no New Testament biblical law against bestiality by single men or women. Why not? Because there is no New Testament injunction against bestiality. The theologians of the two-kingdoms do not want to deal with this inescapable implication of a comprehensive rejection of the Mosaic law. I do not let them forget it.⁴⁰ Neither should you. Ask the person who affirms the two-kingdoms view how he would justify a civil law against bestiality in a society in which it is legally acceptable. Remember: he cannot legitimately cite the Mosaic law and its required civil sanction.

I suggest that you think “legalized bestiality” whenever you hear the phrase “two kingdoms.”

K. No Visible Market . . . Yet

As an author, I advise an aspiring author to decide before he writes one word exactly what his intended market is. He should mentally imagine a representative individual of this market. He should write for this person. He must not write for a committee.

This economic commentary series appears on the surface to be a product without a market. There are three potential groups that might read one or more volumes: economists, pastors, and laymen.

Economists are generally atheists or agnostics, and have been ever since the early nineteenth century. They have overwhelmingly been epistemological atheists, meaning that when it comes to questions of human knowledge, God and His revelation are irrelevant by definition. This goes back to the late seventeenth century. Therefore, it is unlikely that they will buy any of these books, read one, believe it, or assign it to their students.

40. Gary North, 75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), ch. 26. (<http://bit.ly/gn75bq>)

Pastors are not likely to read a commentary that is explicitly economic in focus. They might read a chapter on a verse they intend to preach from, but not the entire series. They barely have enough time to read their denominational magazines, let alone serious books on economics. They are not geared to this sort of commentary, especially since this sort of commentary has not been published in the past. In any case, a series like this will force them to rethink much of what they learned in seminary, and few professional people well-established in their field will rethink that field's premises and implications.

Laymen may be interested, but if they believe what this series tells them, they will probably find that what their pastors and friends say about the foundations of economics does not correspond to what they have learned here. That means trouble for them, since pastors and professional businessmen will always be able to challenge their academic competence. The alternative is to remain silent in the face of blatant errors announced by the experts.

Where, then, is the market? This series will be too religious for economists, and too economic for pastors. It will be too difficult for laymen who are not used to reading carefully. Then who are the likely readers? A remnant. I mean those Christians who are convinced that there are serious problems with the modern economies of the world. I also mean those who are convinced that there are biblical alternatives to the collapsing secular humanism of our era. I write for those who are convinced that there had better be a distinctly Christian economics, and not baptized Marxism, baptized Keynesianism, or baptized Friedmanism, let alone the unbaptized varieties. This is not a large audience, but as economic conditions get worse as the present economy hits a mountain of debt in the form of political promises, the audience will grow. I will use brief online videos as the hooks.

Conclusion

Biblical covenant theology is inescapably dominion theology. God has placed on His people the moral requirement of transforming the world through the preaching of the gospel. He has also given mankind the tools of dominion, His laws.⁴¹

One of my goals for this multi-volume commentary to make it crystal clear that my theology and my economic conclusions are an unbreakable unit. If Christians are to make a consistent biblical case for economic freedom, they must make it in terms of the Pentateuch. There is no other way to make a Christian case for economic freedom.

It does no good to appeal exclusively to the writings of humanists to establish the epistemological and ethical foundation for economic freedom, because all humanist thought is inherently self-contradictory. Humanism's dualisms—between subject and object, unity and plurality, determinism and freedom, reason and intuition, phenomenal and noumenal, thought and action—confound the humanists in their impossible goal of bringing coherent explanations to the world. If Christ and the Bible are not acceptable to humanists as the foundations of social institutions, then so much the worse for humanists.

This series is a commentary. It should be useful for those biblical scholars who are simply trying to exegete a passage for its inherent meaning, and not just for those who are seeking strictly economic information. I discovered early in my research on this topic that conventional commentaries are almost devoid of economic insight, and for some verses, the economic ignorance of the writers has proved a stumbling block. They have missed the point entirely in a few cases—not simply the economic aspects of a particular verse, but the major point of the verse (when the point happens to be primarily economic).

Note to the reader

Throughout this commentary series, I have avoided emphasizing any material in direct citations. If an italicized word or phrase appears inside the quotation marks, then the original author made this decision. The only changes I have made are the very occasional use of brackets to define an author's use of an obscure word.

Additional note: In earlier printings of this commentary, I capitalized the word "State"—civil government in general—in order to distinguish it from those regional entities in the United States, "states." I have not done so in this edition of these books.

—January 2012

41. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 3, Tools of Dominion.

INTRODUCTION

SOVEREIGNTY AND DOMINION

The first edition of this book appeared in 1982. It was titled, The Dominion Covenant: Genesis. A second edition appeared in 1987. In between, my thinking had been clarified by Ray Sutton's book on the five-point biblical covenant model, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, which I helped him edit, beginning in 1985, and which my Institute for Christian Economics published in 1987.¹

I have decided to re-title this volume to reflect point one of the biblical covenant model: sovereignty. God created the world out of nothing and sustains it providentially. He is therefore sovereign over His creation. I have also decided to re-issue the three original volumes on Exodus as a five-volume set with one title: Authority and Dominion.

A. Covenantal Economics in Genesis 1–2

The Book of Genesis is the first book in the Pentateuch. It corresponds to point one of the biblical covenant model. What is the biblical covenant model, and how does it manifest itself in the Book of Genesis? We see this relationship best in the first two chapters of Genesis.

1. Transcendence/Immanence (Presence)/Sovereignty

Chapter 1 of Genesis deals with cosmic personalism. This is based on the Creator-creature distinction. God is wholly distinct from His creation. It shares no common being. There is no "chain of being" between God and man. This is the continuing theme of Sutton's That You May Prosper, and it is crucial. The Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation (the bread and wine become the literal body and blood of Christ) is based on a chain-of-being doctrine. So is natural law theory. In contrast to this view is that of the Reformed faith: the covenantal connections between man and God, God and the sacraments, man's law and God's law. God is transcendent to the sacraments, yet present in them covenantally, meaning judicially. The covenant is basic to the proper understanding of creation, and the doctrine of creation is basic to the covenant. Any downplaying of the doctrine of God's creation of the universe out of nothing in six literal 24-hour days is an implicit attack on the covenant. It is not a coincidence that Darwinism denied the creation and also denied any covenantal system of personal responsibility of man under God. This is why Darwinism swept the world: nineteenth-century men wanted to escape their sense of covenantal responsibility before God.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

2. Hierarchy/Covenant/Authority/Representation

God established a covenant with Adam, who judicially represented all mankind. Neither Adam nor Eve existed when God announced this covenant (Gen. 1:26). God therefore made this covenant representatively. He did so in plural voice: "let us make man." This was the beginning of the dominion covenant. In every biblical covenant, there is a hierarchy: God over man. In this covenant, this hierarchy is announced in verse 26. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." Man is made in the image of God. Man is representative of God in history.

I agree entirely with Rushdoony on this point: "The second characteristic of Biblical law is that it is a treaty or covenant."² Man has been placed by God over the creation. In Chapter 2 of this book, we see that the sun, moon, and stars were created after the earth and the plants were. They were created to serve the needs of man, primarily as chronological devices. This hierarchy is basic to the covenant structure: under God and over the creation. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that crawleth upon the earth" (Gen. 1:26).³ This was repeated to Noah after the flood (Gen. 9:1–3).

Representatives of modern, pietistic, Protestant fundamentalism have denied that this covenant involves hierarchy over the world. They have done so in a self-conscious attempt to justify their retreat from personal responsibility for the general culture. They have made an implicit alliance with power-seeking humanists who seek to exercise dominion.⁴ They argue that, while men do get to exercise dominion over nature, there is no element of social hierarchy in these verses. This is theological nonsense. God placed Adam over his wife, and the two parents over their children. He places church officers over congregation members, and civil magistrates over citizens and local residents. There can be no dominion over nature without human hierarchies. The question, then, is: Whose covenant law will rule these hierarchies, man's or God's?

2. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 7.

3. Chapter 3.

Throughout European history, we have seen similar doctrines of a world without hierarchy. In the early radical religious revolutionary movements that swept over late-medieval and early modern Europe, the sects' leaders initially preached total equality. Then, step by inevitable step, they imposed radical totalitarian hierarchy, usually with plurality of wives, but only for the leaders.⁵ They began in the name of radical individualism, and ended in radical hierarchy.

There is no escape from hierarchy. Hierarchy is a covenantal reality. It is never a question of "hierarchy vs. no hierarchy." It is always a question of whose hierarchy. Those who preach a world without hierarchy, meaning a world without dominion by covenant, are either seeking to confuse their victims, or else they are incredibly naive accomplices of the power-seekers who do not want God's covenantal hierarchy. Follow their doctrine of "no hierarchy" at your own risk.

3. Ethics/Law

Every covenant has a law. The dominion covenant's law relates to the exercise of dominion over the creation. It appears in Genesis 1:26b. "Let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth."

Rushdoony was correct when he wrote: "The third characteristic of the Biblical law or covenant is that it constitutes a plan for dominion under God. God called Adam to exercise dominion in terms of

4. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1, Representation and Dominion (1985), pp. 2–5.

5. Norman Cohn, The Pursuit of the Millennium: Revolutionary messianism in medieval and Reformation Europe and its bearing on modern totalitarian movements, 2nd ed. (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1957] 1961).

God's revelation, God's law (Gen. 1:26ff.; 2:15–17). This same calling, after the fall, was required of the godly line, and in Noah it was formally renewed (Gen. 9:1–17).⁶

Chapter 4 of Sovereignty and Dominion outlines the basics of God's command to mankind, "subdue the earth." This is not some afterthought on God's part. It is basic to man's very being. Men are commanded by God to subdue the earth. Thus, obedience requires dominion. Dominion also requires obedience: God's work done in God's way. Whenever man rebels against God, he becomes a destroyer rather than a subduer. The difference between subduing nature and exploiting nature is ethics: conformity to God's law. Thus, I write in the middle of the chapter: "... man's fundamental tool of dominion is the moral law of God." The connection between ethics and dominion cannot be broken.

4. Oath/Judgment/Sanctions/Causation

Genesis 1 says that God evaluated His work at the end of each day. Chapter 5 of this book deals with rendering judgment. It discusses value theory in economics. Is value objective or subjective? This is the question that has baffled economists for two centuries. The biblical answer is that value is both objective and subjective in God. God declares what is good and bad. Men are to think God's thoughts after Him as creatures. They are to render godly judgment as His delegated agents. Thus, rendering judgment in history is basic to man's calling before God.⁷

Genesis 2:2–3 speaks of God as having rested after the week of creation. Chapter 6 of this book deals with the sabbath rest idea. Rest for man is a positive sanction. In the Ten Commandments, this comes as the fourth commandment. In Part 2 of Authority and Dominion,⁸ I discuss this commandment under point four of the biblical covenant: "Sabbath and Dominion." By resting in God's sovereignty, man can achieve rest. He acknowledges his position as God's subordinate agent. God will honor His covenant, and bring blessings to those who obey Him. Therefore, resting one day in seven is a covenantal acknowledgment that God is sovereign, not man.

6. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, p. 8.

7. See Appendix E: "Witnesses and Judges."

8. Titled The Sinai Strategy originally (1986).

5. Succession/Inheritance/Continuity/Kingdom

Genesis 2:11–12 refers to gold. Gold has been used as money down through the ages. Chapter 7 of this book deals with the concept of money. There is no more fundamental aspect of money than continuity over time. Any commodity that is perceived to be valuable over long periods in the past can become a candidate for an economy's money. People will be willing to consider the use of such a commodity as a means of exchange and "storehouse of value," meaning a valuable thing to store. As I wrote in my study of the biblical basis of money: "In short, money is the most marketable commodity. It is marketable because people expect it to be valuable in the future."⁹

The covenant is the judicial ordering principle in the Bible, even reflected in the names Old Covenant and New Covenant (Heb. 8:13). We take communion under the authority of God's covenant (I Cor. 11). Sinners take communion under Satan's covenant (I Cor. 10:20–21). We eat the tree of life or the forbidden tree. Covenant is an inescapable concept. There is no escape from covenants. The question is: Which covenant?

B. Another Ordering Principle?

It has been argued that it is illegitimate to search for a single ordering principle in the Bible. This is a predictable comment from someone who has a rival ordering principle that he is quietly importing to his work. Anyone who hears such a critical remark against the use of the covenant as an interpretive model should consider the words of Rushdoony: "The canon or rule of life and faith is either from God or from man. It is either the canon of covenant law, or it is the canon of man's word as law."¹⁰ There are other ordering principles, often related to numbers: three, seven, ten, twelve. There are ordering principles of relationships: father and child, creation-Fall-redemption, and so forth. But the fundamental principle is the covenant. This was how God announced the advent of man (Gen. 1:26–28). All other ordering principles are subordinate to the covenant.

There are also many ordering principles in philosophy, but only one is crucial in the discussion of the relationship between God and man: the covenant. The only other alternatives are philosophical realism (Aquinas) or philosophical nominalism (Ockham), and they have proven to be dead ends from the day they were offered as valid alternatives to covenantalism. Anyone who argues that there is some other system of interpretation besides the covenant is either a realist or a nominalist. The Christian should not accept either alternative. Rushdoony told us why not: “Nominalism ends by dissolving the world into an endless sea of unrelated and meaningless facts or particulars, whereas Realism progressively denies the validity of particulars, of the many, and absorbs them into an undifferentiated and shoreless ocean of being. At either end, definition, meaning, and truth disappear; at one end total relativism and anarchy, and, at the other, total authoritarianism.”¹¹

9. Gary North, Honest Money: The Biblical Blueprint for Money and Banking (Ft. Worth: Dominion Press, 1986), p. 20. (<http://bit.ly/gnmoney>)

10. R. J. Rushdoony, Infallibility: An Inescapable Concept (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1978), p. 26. Reprinted in Rushdoony, Systematic Theology (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1994), p. 23.

C. Epistemology

There are four chapters in this book that may prove difficult going for the average reader. These four chapters are the most important ones in the field of epistemology, meaning “What do we know, and how can we know it?” These are: Chapter 2, Chapter 5, Appendix A, and Appendix B. Chapter 5 deals with the crucial question of objective value theory vs. subjective value theory. This makes for difficult reading, but what I demonstrate in this chapter is that there can be no such thing as applied secular economics. The secular economists cannot, given their own presuppositions, handle the problems of economic value, nor can modern, subjectivist economists legitimately assert that economic statistics have any meaning. The modern economist ignores the implications of his own value theory, going on about his intellectual or financial business as if everything were all right. Everything is not all right. Humanist economics is bankrupt.

There is only Christian economics. If you ask the members of any school of economics—Marxist, Keynesian, inductivist-empirical, deductivist-logical—to show you why members of a rival school have no sound basis for what they are writing, the critics can prove it. I argued in a 1976 essay that modern economics, given its own philosophical starting points, cannot deal with the mind-universe gap, the a priori vs. a posteriori dilemma, the logic-intuition contradiction, and the law-freedom problem.¹² There, I was dealing with economic theory. What I demonstrate—or, better yet, what I allow modern economists to demonstrate for me—in Chapter 5, is this: applied secular economics is as epistemologically barren as theoretical secular economics. This may not prove the existence of a uniquely Christian economics, but it does prove that modern secular economics cannot possibly be valid, given the explicit presuppositions of modern economics.

11. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1971] 2007), p. 15.

Conclusion

In this book, I begin with God's covenant, not humanism's covenant. I argue for methodological covenantalism, as opposed to humanism's methodological individualism (anarchism)—nominalism—or methodological holism (socialism)—realism. I begin with God's revelation, not human speculation. I begin with Genesis, not Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations (1776) or John Maynard Keynes' General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money (1936) or Ludwig von Mises' Human Action (1949) or Milton Friedman's Capitalism and Freedom (1961). This may bother economists, but so what? I do not expect economists to read an economic commentary on the Book of Genesis.

12. Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition" in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976).

1

COSMIC PERSONALISM

In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth (Gen. 1:1).

The theocentric principle here is God as the Creator. From the point of view of economics, this is God as the cosmic Owner. It corresponds to point one of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Creation and Personalism

The opening words of the Bible present us with the most important principle of human knowledge: God created the universe. He created it out of nothing, by the power of His word: “Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear” (Heb. 11:3). Again, “By the word of the LORD were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth” (Ps. 33:6). God created the universe by fiat, meaning by the power of His command. Speaking of the Second Person of the Trinity, Paul wrote:

Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature: For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist (Col. 1:15–17).

The Revised Standard Version (RSV) translates this latter phrase, “all things are held together in him,” and the Berkeley Version concurs: “. . . and in him all things hold together.” Through God, the Creator, all things are sustained. The doctrine of creation is directly linked to the doctrine of providence.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1 (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

From beginning to end, the created world bears the mark of God's handiwork. "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handiwork" (Ps. 19:1). God did not create a self-sustaining universe that is now left to operate in terms of autonomous laws of nature. The universe is not a giant mechanism, like a clock, which God created and wound up at the beginning of time. Ours is not a mechanistic world, nor is it an autonomous biological entity, growing according to some genetic code of the cosmos. Ours is a world which is actively sustained by God on a full-time basis (Job 38–41). All creation is inescapably personal and theocentric. "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead. . ." (Rom. 1:20).

If the universe is inescapably personal, then there can be no phenomenon or event in the creation that is independent from God. No phenomenon can be said to exist apart from God's all-inclusive plan for the ages. There is no uninterpreted "brute factuality." Nothing in the universe is autonomous, an English word derived from two Greek words that are transliterated autos (self) and nomos (law). Nothing in the creation generates its own conditions of existence, including the law structure under which something operates or is operated upon. Every fact in the universe, from beginning to end, is exhaustively interpreted by God in terms of His being, plan, and power.²

B. God Is the Cosmic Owner

The starting point of Christian economics—and every other field of thought—is the doctrine of creation. This doctrine establishes that God is the only creator. Because God is the only creator, He is the original owner. We read in the Psalms that the cattle on a thousand hills belong to God. "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills" (Psalm 50:10). This does not mean that the cattle on the hill 1,001 belong to somebody else. God owns the cattle,

2. Cornelius Van Til, A Christian Theory of Knowledge (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1969), p. 28. "All facts of history are what they are ultimately because of what God intends and makes them to be. Even that which is accomplished in human history through the instrumentality of men still happens by virtue of the plan of God. God tells the stars by their names. He identifies by complete description. He knows exhaustively. He knows exhaustively because he controls completely."

and God owns the hills.³

Because God is the original owner of all things, He has a legal claim on the output of all creation. Because God owns the raw materials and the capital, He owns the output of this capital. The entire universe provides the raw materials of productivity.

The theological justification for an economic commentary on the Bible is based on the opening lines of Genesis. God created the world. It is now governed, and has always been governed, by His personal power and purpose. The world is sustained by God. Our world is providential. It reflects His orderly being. Our world is therefore coherent, and it is man's responsibility, as a species, to discover the providential regularities of the universe, including man's own being, and then use this knowledge in the tasks of subduing the earth to the glory of God.

After Adam rebelled representatively on behalf of mankind, both he and nature were cursed by God. Neither man nor nature was ever normative, but after the Fall and the curses, it is even more erroneous to claim that man or nature is normative. God's word alone is normative. It alone can provide the necessary correction to man's rebellious mind and supply the necessary presuppositions of intelligent, God-honoring understanding. This is why we need to study the Bible if we are to discover the truths of economics, or any other academic or professional discipline. The Bible informs us of the limits of man's speculative fancies concerning economics (or anything else). Man has great power under God. He also has definite limits. The Bible reveals both the potential of man and the limits placed on man by his creaturehood, as well as by man's rebellious Fall into sin and the curses placed on the human race by God as a result of this rebellion.

C. Biblical Personalism

Cornelius Van Til, the twentieth-century Christian philosopher and theologian, put the issue forcefully:

According to Scripture, God has created the "universe." God has created time and space. God has created all the "facts" of science. God has created the human mind. In this human mind God has laid the laws of thought according to which it is to operate. In the facts of science God has laid the laws of being according to which they function. In other words, the impress of God's plan is upon his whole creation. We may characterize this whole situation by saying that the creation of God is a revelation of God. God revealed himself in nature, and God also revealed himself in the mind of man. Thus it is impossible for the mind of man to function except in an atmosphere of revelation. And every thought of man when it functioned normally in this atmosphere of revelation would express the truth as laid in the creation of God.⁴

3. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

Man's mind has not functioned properly, as originally designed and intended by God, ever since the day of his ethical rebellion against God in Eden. Nevertheless, man still knows some things, despite the twistings and misinterpretations provided by his own rebellious imagination. He knows enough to condemn himself before God on the day of judgment (Rom. 1:18–20). He knows enough to work and progress in his labors. He knows enough to make some sense of his environment. Men have amassed remarkable quantities of information; nevertheless, man's mind is not determinative, nor was it determinative before Adam's rebellion. God's mind is determinative. Neither man nor nature is normative.

God's exhaustive knowledge of Himself and the creation is normative. Because man is made in the image of God, and because man is fully responsible before God, man's mind is capable of apprehending an underlying bedrock of truth. It is man's responsibility to seek out this truth, to the extent appropriate to a creature serving as God's subordinate. We cannot attain perfect, exhaustive knowledge, because such comprehensive knowledge belongs to God alone, but we can attain true knowledge. Therefore, concluded Van Til:

For the Christian system, knowledge consists in understanding the relation of any fact to God as revealed in Scripture. I know a fact truly to the extent that I understand the exact relation such a fact sustains to the plan of God. It is the plan of God that gives any fact meaning in terms of the plan of God. The whole meaning of any fact is exhausted by its position in and relation to the plan of God. This implies that every fact is related to every other fact. God's plan is a unit. And it is this unity of the plan of God, founded as it is in the very being of God, that gives the unity that we look for between all the finite facts. If one should maintain that one fact can be fully understood without reference to all other facts, he is as much antithetic as when he should maintain that one fact can be understood

4. Cornelius Van Til, A Survey of Christian Epistemology, Vol. II of the series, In Defense of the Faith (Den Dulk Foundation, 1969), p. 1.

without reference to God.⁵

No fact (datum) of the universe is independent of God and His plan. No man can assert his own autonomy and then legitimately claim to know anything exhaustively, for to know anything exhaustively requires that the knower understand everything exhaustively. Any fact (datum) in the universe may conceivably have some influence on any other fact. This is why Christians must assert that all truth is exhaustively interrelated in God's single system of interpretation. It is God, and God alone, who possesses this exhaustive system of interpretation.

The quest for exhaustive knowledge is demonic. It tempts man to surpass the limits of his creaturely status. It is the lure of Satan, namely, to become "as God." This is why we need God's revelation of Himself in the Bible to achieve accurate, though not exhaustive, knowledge of His creation. The Bible provides the necessary corrective information, an interpretative context for studying and understanding the creation. The Bible's revelation keeps us from "going off the deep end" in endless speculation about the inconceivable—inconceivable for man, that is.

Modern man may choose to believe in some version of cosmic impersonalism in preference to a belief in God's cosmic personalism. Nevertheless, the Bible tells that this is an impossible choice to make. The warfare in the Bible is not between God's personalism and the creation's impersonalism, but between God and Satan. This supernatural conflict is inescapably personal. Men worship a true God or a false god, but they worship personal beings. There is no escape from the personalism of every choice, however much men seek to impersonalize the universe (generally as a stepping stone to re-personalizing it by asserting the sovereignty of man).⁶ We find modern psychologists, especially those in the behaviorist camp, grimly and fanatically depersonalizing even man, the chooser, making him just another product in a strictly impersonal, cause-and-effect universe. But the effort is in vain. Men will spend eternity with Satan or God, either in the lake of fire—specifically prepared for Satan and his angels (Matt. 25:41)—or in the new heavens and new earth (Rev. 21).

Cosmic impersonalism is a myth. We never choose between cosmic personalism and cosmic impersonalism; it is merely a question of whose cosmic personalism: God's or Satan's. Eve was tempted by a person who was represented by a serpent. Jesus was tempted in the wilderness by a person (Matt. 4).⁷ Cosmic impersonalism is a satanic delusion, a convenient way to mystify men. Men choose to believe in something other than God, and from Satan's viewpoint, anything else will do just fine. The result is the same: man's destruction, the alienation of man from God, in whose image he was created. Satan is content to stay in the background, when necessary. He is content to be devilish; publicity for publicity's sake is not his style. The darkness suits him fine.

5. Ibid., p. 6.

6. See Appendix A.

Perhaps the most perceptive analysis of this aspect of Satan's temptation is found in C. S. Lewis' fictional account of a senior devil's advice to a junior devil. Screwtape, the senior devil, gives this advice in The Screwtape Letters, Chapter 7 (written during World War II).

Our policy, for the moment, is to conceal ourselves. Of course this has not always been so. We are really faced with a cruel dilemma. When the humans disbelieve in our existence we lose all the pleasing results of direct terrorism, and we make no magicians. On the other hand, when they believe in us, we cannot make them materialists and skeptics. At least, not yet. I have great hopes that we shall learn in due time how to emotionalise and mythologise their science to such an extent that what is, in effect, a belief in us (though not under that name) will creep in while the human mind remains closed to belief in the Enemy. The "Life Force," the worship of sex, and some aspects of Psychoanalysis may here prove useful. If once we can produce our perfect work—the Materialist Magician, the man, not using, but veritably worshipping, what he vaguely calls 'Forces' while denying the existence of "spirits"—then the end of the war will be in sight.

The Bible's doctrine of cosmic purpose is in opposition to all forms of Darwinism. Darwin's theory of evolution through natural selection was self-consciously opposed to all varieties of cosmic purpose prior to the appearance of man. There is purpose in the universe. God is in charge of this purpose, and He directed this purpose toward mankind, who is made in His image (v. 26).

This may sound like needless theoretical speculation, but it applies to our daily affairs. The Bible tells us that man, as the image of God, is placed in authority over the earth. I will discuss this in greater detail in my comments on Genesis 1:26.⁸ For now, the important thing to understand is that man is so important that the entire universe centers around him. When I say that it centers around him, I refer to cosmic purpose. Of that which was created, man is the center. He is the center because he is the image of God. He is responsible to God, and the universe is responsible to mankind.

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), chaps. 1–3.

8. Chapter 3.

D. Modern Science's Impersonalism

The doctrine of creation in its biblical form therefore denies one of the most cherished doctrines of the modern world, namely, the doctrine of cosmic impersonalism. This doctrine asserts that all life is the product of impersonal, self-generated, random forces of nature. Cosmic impersonalism is the heart and soul of the modern doctrine of evolution, which asserts that evolution operates through the process of natural selection. Undergirding the concept of natural selection is the idea of randomness.

1. Mutations

The idea of evolution is not new; in fact, it was the universal belief of ancient societies, with the exception of the Hebrews. Ancient paganism held a concept of a deity or deities that struggled with the primeval chaos (randomness) in order to produce a somewhat orderly, partially controlled universe—one that is constantly threatened by either too much law or a breakdown of order.⁹ It was Darwin's contribution to the modern world to have convinced men that evolution occurs through random changes in living creatures. The interaction between a deterministic external environment governed by strict cause and effect, and species that survive or perish on the basis of random mutations in their genes is the mechanism of evolutionary progress. This is natural selection. The deterministic universe, itself the product of random materialistic forces, brought forth life, and living creatures developed through the uncontrollable random mutations of their genes and the interaction of the biological results of these mutations with the environmental changes external to each species. In its original formulation, Darwinism presented a world that is governed by random variation; randomness begetting randomness in a sea of randomness, yet governed entirely by the universally valid and totally unbreakable iron law of natural selection.

9. Cf. Mircea Eliade, A History of Religious Ideas (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), pp. 60, 72–73, 91–93; Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1958), ch. 12; Eliade (ed.), From Primitives to Zen (New York: Harper & Row, 1967), ch. 2. Eliade demonstrated that creation myths other than the Hebrew version were marked by a belief that God either struggled with an existing matter to form the world, or the world stemmed from some aspect of the god's being, usually from his anatomy. Only the Hebrews proclaimed an absolute distinction between creature and Creator, i.e., two separate types of being, as Van Til pointed out: "All forms of heresy, those of the early church and those of modern times, spring from this confusion of God with the world. All of them, in some manner and to some extent substitute the idea of man's participation in God for that of his creation by God." Van Til, The Theology of James Daane (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1959), p. 122. On the Mesopotamian evolutionary creation myths, see Thorkild Jacobsen, "Mesopotamia," in Henri Frankfort, et al., Before Philosophy: The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man (Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin Books, [1951] 1964), pp. 187–89, 214–16. See also R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1971] 2007), ch. 3.

Peter Medawar and his wife Jean, two prominent biological scientists, stated the case very plainly in their book, The Life Science (1977), and in the intellectual magazine, Harper's. The opening words of the Harper's extract from the book are illuminating: "Not so very many years ago people talked about 'God and the physi-cists,' but today the geneticists have elbowed their way to the footlights, and a great change has come about in relations between science and religion: the physi-cists were in the main very well disposed towards God, but the geneti-cists are not. It is upon the notion of randomness that geneticists have based their case against a benevolent or malevolent deity and against there being any overall purpose or design in nature."¹⁰ The "god of the physicists," however, had also been a god of randomness, lurking in the shadows of the "as yet-unknown," moving instantly away from any "light" thrown on events by rationalism's laws of physical science. This god was Kant's god of the hypothetical "noumenal" realm—a mental construct who cannot influence the external events of nature. So, Medawar and his wife abandoned such a god as being unnecessary, which indeed such a god is. They forthrightly accepted the new god of creation, randomness, giving him all due respect, honor, and glory. Purpose and design, the intolerable evils of Christian theology, must be banished from the kingdom of randomness, at least until man appears on the scene.

2. A Purposeless Universe

Cosmic impersonalism is a way of banishing personal responsibility from the universe. It enables men to ignore the possibility of final judgment in terms of a fixed set of ethical standards. It allows men to ignore the possibility of eternal punishment. It allows man to reinterpret all facts according to his purposes and ideals, both intellectual and moral. Man becomes the determiner and interpreter of the universe. Understandably, secular man prefers not to interpret the universe in terms of God's categories. He much prefers to live in the hypothetically random universe posited by modern humanism—a universe that is slowly grinding to inevitable extinction (the second law of thermodynamics, entropy).¹¹ Perhaps the most eloquent statement of what this means was written by Bertrand Russell, the influential British philosopher-mathematician. The world of modern science, he wrote, is “more purposeless, more void of meaning” than the world outlined by Mephistopheles to Dr. Faustus. The modern world has no meaning.

10. Peter and Jean Medawar, "Revising the Facts of Life," Harper's (Feb. 1977), p. 41.

Amid such a world, if anywhere, our ideals henceforward must find a home. That Man is the product of causes which had no prevision of the end they were achieving; that his origin, his growth, his hopes and fears, his loves and beliefs, are but the outcome of accidental collocations of atoms; that no fire, no heroism, no intensity of thought and feeling, can preserve an individual life beyond the grave; that all the labours of the ages, all the devotion, all the inspiration, all the noonday brightness of human genius, are destined to extinction in the vast death of the solar system, and that the whole temple of Man's achievement must inevitably be buried beneath the debris of a universe in ruins—all these things, if not quite beyond dispute, are yet so nearly certain, that no philosophy which rejects them can hope to stand. Only within the scaffolding of these truths, only on the firm foundation of unyielding despair, can the soul's habitation henceforth be safely built.¹²

As Russell grew older, he became even more pessimistic, more thoroughly consistent with his presuppositions concerning man and the universe. He saw through the glib theologians who had adopted some version of evolution and had then attempted to integrate it into their religious framework. What foolishness, Russell concluded. “Why the Creator should have preferred to reach His goal by a process, instead of going straight to it, these modern theologians do not tell us.” But this is only part of their problem.

11. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

12. Bertrand Russell, “A Free Man's Worship” (1903). (<http://bit.ly/brfreeman>)

There is another and a graver objection to any theology based on evolution. In the 'sixties and 'seventies, when the vogue of the doctrine was new, progress was accepted as a law of the world. Were we not growing richer year by year, and enjoying budget surpluses in spite of diminished taxation? Was not our machinery the wonder of the world, and our parliamentary government a model for the imitation of enlightened foreigners? And could anyone doubt that progress would go on indefinitely? Science and mechanical ingenuity, which had produced it, could surely be trusted to go on producing it ever more abundantly. In such a world, evolution seemed only a generalization of everyday life. But even then, to the more reflective, another side was apparent. The same laws which produce growth also produce decay. Some day, the sun will grow cold, and life on the earth will cease. The whole epoch of animals and plants is only an interlude between ages that were too hot and ages that will be too cold. There is no law of cosmic progress, but only an oscillation upward and downward, with a slow trend downward on the balance owing to the diffusion of energy. This, at least, is what science at present regards as most probable, and in our disillusioned generation it is easy to believe. From evolution, so far as our present knowledge shows, no ultimately optimistic philosophy can be validly inferred.¹³

Humanism is pessimistic. It offers no cosmic hope.

E. The “Impersonal” Free Market

It is quite common for economists to speak of the impersonalism of the market process. By this, the academic economist means that the free market's processes are virtually independent of the will or plans of any single market participant. One man's influence is normally infinitesimal from the point of view of the overall free market system. The market is understood as an impersonal mechanism in the sense that it is the product of millions of human decisions and actions at any point in time. People enter into voluntary exchanges with one another, and the results of their activities have far-reaching implications when considered as a whole. F. A. Hayek went so far as to describe this attitude toward the market—an attitude that he shared, and which he defended more eloquently than any other social philosopher of the twentieth century—as “an attitude of humility toward the impersonal and anonymous social processes by which individuals help to create things greater than they know. . . .”¹⁴ This “impersonal and anonymous” social process is supposed to be a reliable source of continuing economic benefits and continuing personal freedom.

13. Bertrand Russell, “Evolution,” in Religion and Science (New York: Oxford University Press, [1935] 1972), pp. 80–81.

Biblically speaking, this view of the free market is incorrect. While the free market’s processes may appear to be impersonal from the point of view of the individual observer, the market is not impersonal from the point of view of God, the omniscient observer. The Christian economist must assert from the beginning that this supposed impersonalism of the market process must never be understood to be a process autonomous from God. The operations of the market, like the operations of the atom, are ultimately guided by and upheld by God. In fact, the strongest philosophical and theological argument in favor of the free market is that it thwarts the attempt of power-seeking men to attempt to imitate God by centralizing the economic planning system through the civil government, thereby directing the lives of other citizens in terms of the goals of some elite central planning board. The free market decentralizes economic power, thereby limiting the quest for personal power. It has as one of its most important functions a definite religious purpose: to restrict men in their attempt to play God.

No one has been more eloquent in the presentation of the free market as an institution that decentralizes power than Hayek. His best-selling book, The Road to Serfdom (1944), which was condensed and published in the mass-circulation magazine, Reader’s Digest, in 1945, stated the case for the free market in terms of the limitation of political power.¹⁵ What Hayek and other secular defenders of the free market have failed to understand is this: it is precisely because the market is not impersonal with respect to God and His law-order that it can be said to be impersonal with respect to the plans and actions of any single participant.

The market as a human institution has a definite role to play in limiting the illegitimate quest for total power, which is an inescapable aspect of all centrally planned economies, because central economic planning requires the use of political coercion in order to allocate goods and services in a world of scarce resources. It is not a coincidence that the free market serves this purpose, for it has not evolved as the exclusive product of human action—action that did not have the creation of a free market economy and free market institutions as a goal. The market is not the product of human choices that, with respect to the advent of the free market and the numerous social requirements of a free market order, were utterly random historically. Just because no human planning agency ever designed the free market does not prove the free market was undesigned.¹⁶ Men did not design a free market to fit their needs for social, economic, and political order, but this in no way implies (as the socialists, Marxists, and central planners in general assert) that the market does not fit men's needs for social, economic, and political order. The free market social order has a whole series of purposes for man because it is a direct outgrowth of the application of fundamental moral and economic principles that were established by God to meet the needs of responsible human agents. The free market is a part of God's comprehensive social law-order.

14. F. A. Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948; London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1949), p. 8. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIEO>)

15. Hayek, The Road to Serfdom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1944). The April 1945 reprint from Reader’s Digest is here: <http://bit.ly/HayekRoadRD>.

Conclusion

The Creator-creature distinction is the beginning of wisdom. It is the first point of the biblical covenant: the transcendence of God. This doctrine must undergird the science of economics, and also every other science. God is absolutely sovereign over the creation. The creation is therefore personal. Any discussion of the free market as an impersonal process or institution must always be qualified by the doctrine of cos-

16. The continuing theme in the writings of Hayek is the concept promoted by the eighteenth-century Scottish rationalists, especially Adam Ferguson, that society is the product of human action—the multiple actions of individuals—but not of human design. As in the case of Charles Darwin, the Scottish rationalists were seeking an explanation of the operations of the world apart from continual appeals to the thoughts, plans, and miracles of a transcendent designing God. Hayek argued for this position in numerous works: “The Use of Knowledge in Society,” American Economic Review, XXXV (Sept. 1945); reprinted in Individualism and Economic Order, ch. 4; Law, Legislation and Liberty, Vol. I: Rules of Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), chaps. 1, 2; Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), chaps. 5, 6, 11; “The Three Sources of Human Values: A Postscript to Law, Legislation and Liberty,” the Hobhouse Lecture given at the London School of Economics (May 17, 1978), reprinted in Literature of Liberty, II (April–June 1979), pp. 63–64. For an extremely perceptive critique of Hayek's evolutionistic epistemology, see Eugene F. Miller, “Hayek's Critique of Reason,” Modern Age (Fall 1976), <http://bit.ly/emhcr>. See also John N. Gray, “F. A. Hayek on Liberty and Tradition,” Journal of Libertarian Studies, IV (Spring 1980), <http://bit.ly/jgholat>. Arthur M. Diamond, Jr., “F. A. Hayek on Constructivism and Ethics,” Journal of Libertarian Studies, IV (Fall 1980), <http://bit.ly/adhocae>. The best critical discussion of Hayek is John Gray, Hayek on Liberty (London: Basil Blackwell, 1984). Finally, see Appendix B, “The Evolutionists' Defense of the Market.”

mic personalism. God, not man, is sovereign. Man is fully responsible to God.

2

PURPOSE, ORDER, AND SOVEREIGNTY

And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years: And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so. And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also (Gen. 1:14–16).

The theocentric principle here is God as the Creator. This corresponds to point one of the biblical covenant model.¹ But this passage establishes a cosmic hierarchy: God > man > the cosmos. The stars, the sun, and the moon were made for man to be able to judge the seasons. The cosmic hierarchy of majesty—stars to sun, sun to moon, moon to earth—is a purposeful order in which man is the beneficiary. His purposes are the reason for the cosmos. This places God at the center and man—God’s image—just below Him. This corresponds to point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy/authority/representation.² It raises the issue of responsibility.

A. The Irreconcilable War Over Sequence

These verses do not seem to be related to the topic of economics in any way. Yet, in terms of their importance for human thought in general, and economic science in particular, they cannot be overestimated. They are second in importance only to Genesis 1:1 in the field of cosmology. Because of this, modern secular science is at war with the plain teaching of these verses. These verses are far more difficult to allegorize than Genesis 1:1. Their sequence is too specific. Their perspective is too concrete. Scientists who might be willing to shrug their shoulders at Genesis 1:1, as if the words were harmless poetic relics of the past, would groan in horror if someone suggested that these verses must be taken literally.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstypm>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Ibid., ch. 2; North, ch. 2.

1. Cosmic Chronology

The chronological sequence of God's creation of the heavenly bodies is an affront to all forms of cosmic evolution. We are told that the stars, sun, and moon were created on the fourth day, which was the day following the creation of living plants. There is no possible way that this chronological sequence can be integrated into an evolutionary time frame's sequence of historical events.

It is unfortunate that respectable Bible commentators have compromised the explicit language of Scripture by arguing that the stars, moon, and sun were created on the same day that the earth was, but that they did not have any specific function with respect to the earth prior to the fourth (possibly non-literal) day. Nevertheless, the Bible affirms that God created light by the power of his word. This supernatural light separated day from night. Only on the fourth day were specific bodies created to provide light and to separate day from night. One commentator has argued that the sun existed on the first day, but God concealed it by means of some sort of veil, which He then removed on day four.³ That a Christian scholar seeking acceptance by the humanist academic elite should invent such a fantasy to explain the plain words of Genesis 1 is indicative of just how far from the text modern Christians have wandered, especially university-certified, university-screened, and university-employed Christian scholars. Why should we tamper with the plain teaching of the Bible in this fashion? Are we naive enough to believe that if Christians push back the creation of the stars to the first day, making them co-temporal with the earth, modern evolutionists in the fields of astronomy and cosmology are going to think Christianity might just be plausible after all? Are we supposed to buy a little academic respectability by means of this sort of exegesis?

Modern science holds that the earth is a relatively late development, possibly only five billion years old, in a universe at least 13 billion years old.⁴ What good do we think we will accomplish by ignoring the words of Genesis 1 and arguing for the creation of the sun and stars on the first day, inventing a hypothetical veil or cloud cover to provide an explanation of why the Bible speaks of the sun, moon, and stars as being created on the fourth day? If we are inevitably going to be looked at as fools for holding to biblical revelation, which is unquestionably the case (I Cor. 1:19–21), then why not at least be consistent, straightforward, more offensive fools—fools thoroughly committed to this foolish revelational faith, fools untarnished by the pseudo-wisdom of the world?

3. Derek Kidner, Genesis: An Introduction and Commentary, in the Tyndale Old Testament Commentaries (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1967), pp. 48–49. Kidner did not explain what this “veil” may have been.

Would anyone have bothered to invent a veil or cloud cover for the sun, moon, and stars on days one through three, had he not been confronted with some version of evolution, which he then decided to conform to, at least partially, in order not to appear unrespectable?⁵ Let us side with biblical language and cease our pathetic, unrealizable quest for academic respectability within the world of secular humanistic scholarship.

It does no good whatsoever to create such exegetical diversions in an attempt to make the Bible's account sound more reasonable, meaning more scientific, meaning more evolutionary. There are several reasons for this. First, modern astronomers argue that the solar system and the earth are relatively recent phenomena when compared to the age of the universe. Astronomers generally have come to some agreement about the limits of chronology, given the fact that many of them adopted the "big bang" theory of cosmology. Sometime in the distant past, between 10 billion and 15 billion years ago, an original hypercondensed matter-energy exploded, thereby creating the universe.⁶ The

4. The estimate on Wikipedia, as of 2010, was in the range of 13.7 billion years. See "Universe."

5. As an example of just such a naive compromise, see the quotation from Edwyn Bevan's essay, "The Religious Value of Myths in the Old Testament," cited favorably by Kidner (p. 55): "The stages of which the earth comes to be what it is cannot indeed be precisely fitted to the account which modern science would give of the process, but in principle they seem to anticipate the modern scientific account by a remarkable flash of imagination, which a Christian may also call inspiration." For a detailed account of the depressing history of such Christian misreadings of (and compromises with) evolutionary chronologies, see Appendix C, "Cosmologies in Conflict: Creation vs. Evolution."

6. Gerald J. Whitrow, "The Role of Time in Chronology," in Wolfgang Yourgrau and Allen D. Breck (eds.), Cosmology, History, and Theology (New York: Plenum Press, 1977), pp. 175–76. He accepted the 10 billion to 15 billion estimate: p. 176. Carl Sagan, the best-selling astronomer from Cornell University, where he was Director of Planetary Studies, accepted the "big bang" theory and the 15 billion years figure: The solar system and the earth came much later, approximately 4.6 billion years ago.⁷ Modern secular science would have to reject any suggestion that the sun, moon, and stars were created on the same day that the earth was created.

2. Cosmic Evolution

Second, when it comes to questions of ultimate origins, the scientists are not agreed among themselves anyway. Toulmin and Goodfield wrote:

... over these cosmological theories there is nothing like the same kind of agreement among astronomers that exists over theories of stellar evolution. In cosmology, the chief protagonists take up standpoints which are sharply opposed, and even—as at present formulated—irreconcilable. Some see the astronomical evidence as supporting a belief that the entire universe began at an initial moment in time about 10,000 million years ago, through a cataclysmic Creation, by which time and matter came into existence together, once and for all. Others believe that the cosmos has had an unlimited existence in time, and its average state and appearance have always been similar to what they are today. This uniformity-throughout-eternity is even presented at times as a necessary axiom of all scientific thought about cosmology—a rational presupposition, to which any acceptable account of the universe must conform. A third party has adopted yet another point of view. The cosmos has neither had an initial Creation, nor displayed an eternal changelessness: instead, it has passed through a recurring cycle of similar changes, oscillating between two extremes, with an overall period of perhaps 100,000 million years.⁸

This last viewpoint is analogous to the pagan concept of recurring historical cycles, and modern Hinduism still holds to it.⁹ In fact, as Dragons of Eden (New York: Ballantine Books, 1977), p. 13. For a 10 billion estimate, see also Clive Kilminster, The Nature of the Universe (New York: Dutton, 1971), p. 151. George B. Field holds to the 10 billion figure, in William C. Saslaw and Kenneth C. Jacobs (eds.), The Emerging Universe (Charlottesville, Virginia: University Press of Virginia, 1972), p. 146. The citations could be multiplied.

7. The 4.6 billion years figure is cited by Field, in Saslaw and Jacobs (eds.), Emerging Universe, p. 145, and by Harvard astronomer, Fred Whipple, Earth, Moon, and Planets (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1970), p. 244. The 4 billion to 5 billion years estimate is quite conventional.

8. Stephen Toulmin and June Goodfield, The Discovery of Time (New York: Harper Torchbook, 1966), p. 255.

9. Cf. Swami Nikhilananda, "Hinduism and the Idea of Evolution," in A Book that Shook the World (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1958), pp. 48–60. The Toulmin and Goodfield argued, all three cosmologies go back to Greek speculation. “Details apart, the general resemblances between twentieth-century cosmology and its ancestors are no mere coincidence. Rather, they prompt one to look for an equally general motive. Is it, for instance, the case that, when evidence about the remote past is too slender for an empirical reconstruction of earlier history, the human intellect for want of anything better falls back naturally on these a priori patterns of theory?”¹⁰ In other words, the cosmologists simply are uncertain about the origin of the cosmos.

Hannes Alfven, the 1970 Nobel Prize winner in physics, stated the case even more bluntly. Alfven was an opponent of the “big bang” theory of cosmology.

Since the Big-Bang hypothesis is unacceptable, the question arises of what other hypothesis we should place in its stead. The answer is simple and straightforward: none! The Big-Bang conjecture is a myth, a wonderful myth maybe, which deserves a place of honor in the columbarium which already contains the Indian myth of a cyclic Universe, the Chinese cosmic egg, the Biblical myth of creation in six days, the Ptolemaic cosmological myth, and many others. It will always be admired for its beauty and it will always have a number of believers, just as the millennia-old myths. But nothing is gained if we try to place another myth in the place which the Big-Bang myth occupies now, not even if this new myth is adorned with still more beautiful mathematical formulas.¹¹

The best that a scientist can do is to guess about the state of the universe a billion years ago, and “the chance that this guess is realistic is negligible. If he takes this guess as the starting point for a theory, this is unlikely to be a scientific theory but very likely will be a myth. . . . To try to write a grand cosmic drama leads necessarily to myth.”¹² If he was correct—and I think he was correct—then why should orthodox Christians try to rewrite the story of the six-day creation in order to make it seem a bit more respectable, slightly more in conformity to the latest secular version of the three archetypal cosmic myths concerning origins that happens to be popular at the time?

book in question was Charles Darwin's Origin of Species (1859).

10. Toulmin and Goodfield, Discovery of Time, p. 258.

11. Hannes Alfven, “Cosmology: Myth or Science?” in Yourgrau and Breck (eds.), Cosmology, History, and Theology, pp. 12–13.

12. Ibid., p. 13.

B. Teleology

The third, and by far the most important reason why it is useless and counterproductive to modify the plain teaching of Genesis 1 concerning the sequence of creation, is that the heart of modern science's opposition to this account is not the chronology as such. The reason why modern science has adopted the ancient Greek accounts of cosmology—not the details, of course, but the basic outlines—is that modern scientists, like the ancient Greeks, are attempting to escape from the concept of God-ordained purpose. What is most offensive to modern science is the idea of cosmological purpose prior to the evolutionary advent of man.

The heart of the Bible's account of the creation is God and His purposeful word, while the heart of modern evolution is the denial of purpose, whichever of the secular cosmologies a man decides to accept. Apparently this fact has not been understood by those conservative Bible expositors who have chosen to rewrite Genesis 1. We must bear in mind that it was Darwin's insistence on the unplanned, purposeless nature of geological and biological change that won him instant success in the world of secular humanism. Darwin denied all the old arguments for divine purpose as a cause of the orderliness of nature. Natural order proves no such thing, he insisted; natural selection of randomly produced biological changes, not supernatural design, accounts for nature's orderliness. Evolutionary scientists accepted Darwin's denial of cosmic purpose long before there was any idea that the universe might be 13 billion years old. The heart of the Darwinian intellectual revolution was not evolution. The heart of the Darwinian intellectual revolution was Darwin's explanation of un-designed order. It was his denial of final purpose, of the universe's ends-orientation, of teleology.

Teleology has served Christian apologists ever since the days of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) as a major pillar of the five supposedly irrefutable proofs of God. Teleological arguments assert that the order of the universe reflects the orderly God who created it. Not only does this order reflect God, as Paul had argued (Rom. 1:18–20), it supposedly also demonstrates logically that such a God must exist. The universe can only be explained in terms of supernatural design. William Paley, writing in the late eighteenth century and early nineteenth century, convinced the majority of his English and American audiences of the logic of the argument from design.¹³

Consider the perspective of a book produced by faculty members of Princeton University in 1945 for students enrolled in a course on American civilization. This was published five years later by Yale University Press. It is indicative of the outlook of the best universities in the United States, then and today. It is a description of pre-Darwin explanations of nature's regularities, which Christian theologians and social thinkers accepted in the name of the Bible.

In the early years of the nineteenth century, orthodox Protestant Christian thinkers, both in England and in America, absorbed the Deist argument in its rationalistic aspects by harmonizing natural religion with revelation. The one was found to strengthen and confirm the other. . . . Out of this fusion of natural and revealed religion came one of the great arguments for the support of the orthodox faith. This was the doctrine of design. Just as Paley's famous watch bore its own testimony to the activity of the watch-maker, so the universe in all of its marvelous detail sang the praises of its Creator. In an age in which theories of natural law came to permeate social thought, and in which the achievements of applied science were already lending prestige to a rationalistic and materialistic view of things, the argument from design became one of the most useful and widely used defenses for Christianity. Natural religion must of course be supplemented by revealed religion, for each plumbed distinctly incommensurable dimensions. Nevertheless, natural law, as then conceived, was, like the revealed word of God, fixed, absolute, and immutable. The one was clearly apprehended by the intelligence, and the other by the study of Holy Writ.¹⁴

The concept of a mechanistic, self-sufficient system of natural law had not been recognized as a threat to Christian orthodoxy—a denial of cosmic personalism. Nineteenth-century Christians did not recognize the danger of constructing a systematic theology that rested simultaneously on a biblical pillar and a pillar of secular autonomy. The logic of design seemed so sure, so unanswerable. How else could men explain the extraordinary “fit” among all the parts of creation? Does not such an integrated, coherent environment demand men's faith in a cosmic Designer? And is not this Designer the God of the Bible? If the universe was designed, then it has a purpose assigned to it by God.

13. See Appendix A: “From Cosmic Purposelessness to Humanistic Sovereignty.”

14. Stow Persons, “Evolution and Theology in America,” in Persons (ed.), Evolutionary Thought in America (New York: George Braziller, 1956), pp. 422–23. This was first published in 1950 by Yale University Press.

Even the ungodly must acknowledge the logic from design, Christian defenders of the faith insisted. The logic seemed inescapable: order implies design; design implies a Designer; a Designer implies purpose. What could be more logical? Christian apologists gave little or no thought to the intellectual vulnerability of this two-pillar defense. What if the secular pillar collapsed?

1. Darwin's Challenge

Darwin destroyed the claim of teleologists that no other secular explanation can suffice to explain the orderliness of nature. Not all of his early followers fully understood this point. One who did was Karl Marx, who hailed Darwin's achievement: "Darwin's book is very important and serves me as a basis in natural science for the class struggle in history. . . . Despite all its deficiencies, not only is the deathblow dealt here for the first time to 'teleology' in the natural sciences but their rational meaning is empirically explained." Marx wrote these words in 1861, a little over one year after the publication of Darwin's Origin of Species.¹⁵ (Marx knew little about biology; he praised the crackpot racist Pierre Tremaux.)¹⁶

Darwin's correspondence over the years reveals a few sentences in which some degree of unspecified and impersonal final causation might be admitted, but he never openly embraced a full-fledged teleology, nor is there any primary source evidence documenting his supposed death-bed conversion to Christianity.¹⁷ (These stories of death-bed conversions of famous skeptics have plagued both orthodox Christian historians and the outraged families of skeptics for well over a century. So common were these unsubstantiated rumors of death-bed conversions in the late nineteenth century, that the atheistic National Secular Society in Britain felt compelled to publish extensive obituaries of its members in order to forestall these predictable rumors.¹⁸)

15. Karl Marx to Friedrich Engels (Jan. 16, 1861), in Marx-Engels Selected Correspondence, ed. Dona Torr (New York: International Publishers, 1935), p. 125.

16. Nathaniel Weyl, Karl Marx: Racist (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1979), p. 72.

17. For an example of a repetition of the myth of Darwin's late conversion to Christianity, see Francis Nigel Lee, The Central Significance of Culture (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed Publishing Co., 1976), p. 44. Lee cited as his source a book by H. Enoch, Evolution or Creation? (London: Evangelical Press, 1968), pp. 166–67. Enoch, in turn, cited a 1916 article in the Bombay Guardian (March 25, 1916). In 1916, Darwin had been dead for 34 years.

18. On late-nineteenth-century "death-bed conversions," see Susan Budd, "The

There is no question that Genesis 1:14–16 states clearly that the stars, sun, and moon have a specific purpose. They were created on the fourth day to replace the supernatural light that had governed night and day for the first three days. They were created to give light and to separate day from night, as well as to serve as means of identifying the seasons. This is the heart of the conflict between secular science and biblical revelation. The Bible clearly states that the universe is theocentric, for God created it. This means, in turn, that the earth, as the home of man, the image of God, is the center of the universe, for it is the center of God's concern, the place where His Son was to live and die and rise again. This does not necessarily mean that the earth is the spatial center of the universe, if indeed it is possible to conceive of the spatial center of the universe. There are some indications that identifying a spatial center is not mentally possible for man.¹⁹ It does mean that the earth is the center of God's interest and plan, and the fact that it was created prior to the heavenly bodies should be sufficient to prove the point. The heavenly orbs were designed by God to serve man and the other living creatures. This is the purpose of the heavenly bodies.

Modern secular science, from Darwin to the present, has as its operating presupposition this premise: all causation is autonomous in nature, and no causation is purposive—until the advent of man. The origin of order must be sought in purposeless randomness—the basis of unbreakable scientific law in the nineteenth century, and the acknowledged sovereign in the twentieth—and not in God's purpose and design. To quote the Medawars' statement once again: "It is upon the notion of randomness that geneticists have based their case against a benevolent or malevolent deity and against there being any overall Loss of Faith in England: Reasons for Unbelief among Members of the Secular Movement in England, 1850–1950," Past and Present, No. 36 (April 1967), pp. 107, 116ff. Wrote Budd: "It was so widely believed that an Atheist would not die without having repented, that less than thirty hours after [Charles] Bradlaugh's death his daughter began to receive inquiries asking if it were true that he had recanted" (p. 118). Bradlaugh was the founder of the National Secular Society. Rushdoony called attention to this phenomenon of rumors of death-bed conversions in the Chalcedon Newsletter 34 (June 17, 1968). He cited such stories regarding Horace Greeley, the newspaper publisher in America's Civil War period, Charles Darwin, and Martin Luther King, Jr., the American Negro leader of the 1950s and 1960s. Reprinted in R. J. Rushdoony, The Roots of Reconstruction (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1991), pp. 638–40.

19. See Alexander Koyré, From the Closed World to the Infinite Universe (Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, [1957] 1976).

purpose or design in nature.”²⁰ The Medawars have spoken not simply for geneticists, but for the whole of modern science.

2. Randomness and Sovereignty

To overcome the logic of Paley, late-nineteenth-century scientists took the first crucial step: to ascribe the origin of perceived order to random change. This hypothesis was the major intellectual revolution of the nineteenth century. The importance of this scientific presupposition cannot be overestimated: it served to free secular science from critics, potential and actual, who might have succeeded in redirecting the work of scientists along biblical lines. But there was a more fundamental aspect of this affirmation of randomness: to shove God out of the universe, once and for all. Man wanted to escape the threat of control by a supernatural Creator.

Once that step had been taken, scientists took a second step: to assert the sovereignty of man. Since there is no cosmic purpose in the universe, secularists concluded, man is left free to make his autonomous decisions in terms of his own autonomous plans. Man becomes the source of cosmic purpose. The purposeless forces of random evolutionary change have at long last produced a new, purposeful sovereign—man—and man now asserts his sovereignty over creation. He takes control, by means of science, over the formerly purposeless laws of evolutionary development. The universe needs a god, and man is now this god.

The concept of an order that developed, but which was not transcendently designed, appeared first in the social sciences, especially in the writings of the Scottish rationalists, most notably the two Adams, Ferguson and Smith. These two mid-eighteenth-century social theorists were attempting to explain the rationality of the market economy in terms of human actions that had never been intended to produce the market order. The market was explained as the product of human action, but not of human design. The evolutionary nature of this explanation should be clear: society is the product of spontaneous forces that are not controlled by any overall purpose of a personal authority. F. A. Hayek, the twentieth-century economist and social philosopher, devoted the bulk of his later academic career to a comprehensive consideration of the implications of this explanation of social development.²¹ Social evolutionary theory preceded biological evolutionary theory by a century. Darwin and Wallace invented the idea of evolution through natural selection after reading Thomas Malthus, the parson economist who pessimistically predicted that population growth would continually outrun man's ability to increase agricultural production.²² Even the concept of "the survival of the fittest" was coined originally by a social philosopher, Herbert Spencer, a Smithian defender of the unhampered free market.²³

20. Peter and Jane Medawar, “Revising the Facts of Life,” Harper’s (Feb. 1977), p. 41.

The question arose early in post-Darwinian science: Now that man has appeared, can the random processes of nature be left alone to work out their endless non-destiny? Or should man begin to redirect the forces of evolution? Darwin's cousin, Francis Galton, became the founder of eugenics, the idea of genetic planning.²⁴ In the United States, an early founder of sociology, Lester F. Ward, concluded that the unhampered free market cannot be trusted to produce humane ends, any more than the unhampered forces of nature can be relied upon to promote the purposes of humanity. He began to publish his opinions in the early 1880s, and he was ignored; by the early 1900s, his ideas had overthrown the arguments of the free market Social Darwinists (primarily Herbert Spencer and William Graham Sumner).²⁵ The formerly autonomous and spontaneous forces of the free market must now be redirected by social and economic planners. Predictably, the

21. F. A. Hayek, "The Use of Knowledge in Society," American Economic Review, XXXV (Sept. 1945); reprinted in Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIEO>)

22. Gertrude Himmelfarb, Darwin and the Darwinian Revolution (Gloucester, Massachusetts: Peter Smith [1959] 1967), p. 66; Loren Eiseley, Darwin's Century (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1958] 1961), pp. 181–82, 331–32. Cf. R. M. Young, "Malthus and the Evolutionists," Past and Present, No. 43 (1969), pp. 109–45.

23. Darwin attributed the phrase to Herbert Spencer in the 5th edition of Origin of Species (1868), chap. III (Modern Library edition: p. 52). This was the first time Darwin used the phrase. Spencer first used it in his 1852 essay, "A Theory of Population, deduced from the General Law of Fertility." Cf. J. D. Y. Peel, Herbert Spencer: The Evolution of a Sociologist (New York: Basic Books, 1971), pp. 137–38.

24. Galton's most influential book was Hereditary Genius (1869). Cf. D. W. Forrest, Francis Galton: The Life and Work of a Victorian Genius (New York: Taplinger, 1974). For a highly critical assessment of Galton and eugenics, see Allan Chase, The Legacy of Malthus: The Social Costs of the New Scientific Racism (New York: Knopf, 1977), pp. 100–4.

25. Lester Frank Ward, Dynamic Sociology (New York: D. Appleton, 1883), 2 vols. (<http://bit.ly/WardDS1>, <http://bit.ly/WardDS2>). For a discussion of Ward's importance, see Richard Hofstadter, Social Darwinism in American Thought (New York: George Braziller, 1959), ch. 4. See below, Appendix A:N.

biologists picked up the lead of the new social scientists; they also wanted to be sure that evolution would henceforth be purposeful.

C. Purpose

The importance of Genesis 1:14–16 for economic theory, as with all other theories about man and the universe, is the assertion of design and purpose. All of the creation has its purpose in terms of the plan of God. That plan sets man at the pinnacle of the cosmos. Thus, the order of the universe is not the product of an unexplainable cosmic explosion of an original matter-energy. Life is not the random product of random inanimate forces. The development of the market order also is not the product of purely and exclusively random human forces. The universe is infused with purpose because of the cosmic personalism of the entire creation. Man's attempt to shove God out of the universe leads inevitably to the assertion of man's sovereignty over the processes of evolution. Similarly, man's attempt to explain the orderliness of human institutional arrangements—the development of language, the development of the family, the development of the state (“social contract”), the development of orderly markets, etc.—also leads to the assertion that man, meaning an elite, must take control of the spontaneous forces of economic development. In both instances—human biological evolution and human social development—those humanists who have argued for the continuing viability of random, unplanned, undirected, and undesigned processes have encountered increasingly successful academic opposition from the more consistent humanists.

Covenant-breakers refuse to live under the dominion of randomness. Yet they also refuse to live with the idea of a sovereign personal God. Therefore, they have adopted the only intellectual alternative: dominion by elite planners. We have seen that men who are determined (meaning self-willed) to escape the dominion of both a caring but sovereign personal God and an uncaring but hypothetically sovereign impersonal random process have chosen to accept the slavery of elitist planning, at least in theory. In practice, they generally try to thwart the plans of the planners in cases where those plans are inconvenient for them.

Purpose is inescapably linked to personal sovereignty. Men of the second half of the nineteenth century who prided themselves in their defense of autonomous natural science's autonomous natural universe were attempting to banish God's sovereignty by banishing the concept of transcendent cosmic purpose. The result was the creation of an intellectual monstrosity which almost no one has been willing to accept. Men usually desire purpose, which means that they desire a purposeful, personal sovereign. A new sovereign was brought forth: planning mankind, which meant, in the twentieth century, a planning elite. Humanism created a philosophy of sovereign purpose, and it thereby helped to bring us the necessary concomitant of such a philosophy: the bureaucratic cage.²⁶

A few traditional humanists, whose intellectual roots are still in the nineteenth century, attempted to revive the fading faith in the acceptability and even beneficial nature of decentralized purposefulness. They continued to quote favorably Adam Ferguson's eighteenth-century observation that human institutions are the products of human action—decentralized, individualistic planning—but not of human design. The economic theories of virtually all defenders of free market economics, but especially the theoretical framework of the so-called Austrian School—Ludwig von Mises, F. A. Hayek, Israel Kirzner, Murray Rothbard—have been constructed in terms of this eighteenth-century cosmology.

Despite the cogent economic arguments of these men, the modern world has systematically refused to take these arguments seriously. Men want to believe in a concept of immanent cosmic purpose, and this means a concept of a coherent, competent, order-producing planner. Men refuse to believe that successful social and economic coordination that is beneficial for all or most of the members of society can be the product of uncoordinated human actions that are somehow coordinated through a system of private property and freely fluctuating prices. They cling religiously to the concept of personal design. Most men want to live in a universe with meaning and purpose, but this requires the concept of predestination. As Rushdoony wrote: "The only alternative to the doctrine of predestination is the assertion of the reign of total chance, of meaningless and brute factuality. The real issue is what kind of predestination we shall have, predestination by God or predestination by man?"²⁷ In other words, it is never a question of predestination or no predestination. It is always a question of whose predestination.

26. Gary North, "Max Weber: Rationalism, Irrationalism, and the Bureaucratic Cage," in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976).

27. R. J. Rushdoony, The Biblical Philosophy of History (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1969] 2000), p. 6.

Modern men have rejected the concept of predestination by God. They have been forced to locate some other predestinator: random evolutionary development, market forces, environmental determinism, the forces of production, the cunning of history, sexual sublimation, the will to power, hidden conspiracies, or the central planning agency. In all cases, the predestinating power is seen as part of the creation. Men become subservient to some aspect of the creation. Human responsibility is therefore not the opposite of predestination, but rather the obverse of it. Again, the real question is the source of the predestination. To whom will man become responsible?

D. Biblical Responsibility

The doctrine of biblical responsibility is very important to biblical economics. Paul's injunction to "work out your own salvation [salvation which is yours] with fear and trembling" (Phil. 2:12b)²⁸ is crucially important. It points to the locus of responsibility in the individual. The biblical methodology is methodological covenantalism, not methodological holism or methodological individualism. All social, political, and economic analyses must begin with the assumption that the basis of order in society is a personal relationship between God and individual men, and between God and responsible collective groups. Cosmic personalism is the basis of social order—the observed regularities in the affairs of men.²⁹ These regularities are not exclusively the product of acting men, nor are they exclusively the product of collective action. They are in no way the product of purely random forces or purely deterministic impersonal forces (holism). But there is no question that individual responses to God's commands are central to the understanding of the various covenants of God, including the dominion covenant. So, the individualistic approach of the classical economists and the neo-classical economists (pre-Keynesian) is not without merit. But classical economics could not survive the onslaught of Darwinism. Rushdoony's analysis is correct.

Classical liberalism is based on this Enlightenment faith, as is modern libertarianism and conservatism. Nature has, inherent within itself, its own processes and laws which govern reality. Hence, man's

28. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 19.

29. R. J. Rushdoony, The Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1968] 1998).

attitude is one of laissez-faire; there must be no interference with nature's laws and controls. Planning was thus transferred from God to nature. Darwinism destroyed this faith in nature. The process of nature was now portrayed, not as a perfect working of law, but as a blind, unconscious energy working profligately to express itself. In the struggle for survival, the fittest survive by virtue of their own adaptations, not because of natural law. Nature produces many "mistakes" which fail to survive and become extinct species and fossils. The destiny of the universe is extinction as its energy runs down. All of this served to shatter the older faith in nature. Nature as an agency of predestination was gone. It became increasingly evident to naturalistic thinkers that man must control his own evolution and also control the evolution of plant and animal life. Moreover, man must create and control his own social order, so that total statism, total socialism, is "scientific socialism," that is, socialism which recognizes that man cannot exist without predestination and therefore provides for the control of process, for total planning and predestination, by the elite men.³⁰

The modern heirs of classical liberalism, being Darwinians, have been unable to counter successfully this drift into central planning, despite their cogent arguments in favor of individual responsibility and the free market as an agency of coordination. Men want cosmic personalism, and if the God of the Bible is excluded, by definition, by modern humanism, then the god of the planning state will have to suffice. The god of the market is too impersonal, too devoid of cosmic purpose, too theoretical, and unable to guarantee its man-benefiting sovereign power, to impress most Darwinian and post-Darwinian seekers after coherence.

E. Providence and Government

Biblical economics acknowledges the existence of coordinating institutions in human society other than the civil government. The family, the church, the voluntary association, the profit-seeking business, and other local, decentralized structures all provide social order. Government is not simply civil government. Self-government is far more crucial than civil government.

Within society, the institution of the free market—private property rights, legitimate profits and losses, open entry to the market, and freely fluctuating prices—can provide a remarkable system of social cooperation. The impressive defense of the market as an agency of coordination of individual plans—notably, the defense produced by the Austrian School of economists—has to be accepted. But the process is not autonomous. There are constants that the consistent Darwinian cannot admit, such as the constancy of human nature, the constancy of biblical law, and the constancy of God's personal judgment. The intellectual defense of the market must be made in terms of the laws of cause and effect. Cause-and-effect relationships are the product of God's providence—His sustaining hand, in direct government, planning the secondary causes of men's actions, and judging men according to His law. The free market must not be defended by means of Darwinian logic.

30. Rushdoony, Biblical Philosophy of History, p. 7.

This intellectual defense has proven ineffectual in thwarting the far more consistent arguments of those Darwinians who assert the necessity of gaining direct control, through centralized planning, of a supposedly random, meaningless, purposeless, directionless, and above all, mindless process of natural selection—a process that in no way guarantees the survival of humanity, let alone its prosperity. Such a random process of development cannot guarantee humanism's goal: man's place in the universe as the source of cosmic personalism. The proper way to defend the validity of market processes is therefore not by means of the assertion of the sovereign autonomy of market forces, but by means of the opposite assertion: the non-autonomy of market processes, under God. Market processes require an ethical defense, not simply a pragmatic defense based on economic efficiency or the absolute sovereignty of individual men over their voluntary exchanges.³¹

Conclusion

The triumph of Darwinism cannot be understood without an awareness of the fundamental premise of Darwin: the absence of any cosmic purpose in the universe prior to the evolution of man. Darwinian evolution is the religion of modern humanism: the denial of cosmic purpose apart from mankind. The Darwinist maintains that all historical events apart from man and man's influence must be understood as products of impersonal forces: a combination of random chance and unbreakable natural law. There was no future-orientation in the development of the universe. Thus, Darwinism is at war with Christianity, for the Bible teaches that God is sovereign, that the universe was created by God, that its meaning and purpose are understood only in relation to God's decree, and that man is God's delegated covenantal agent on earth.

31. See Appendix B, "The Evolutionists' Defense of the Market."

This is the second point of the biblical covenant: the doctrine of hierarchy. Man serves God, and the universe serves God through serving man. The cause-and-effect relationships in the original creation were future-oriented, earth-oriented, and man-oriented. God created the stars, sun, and moon for man. The earth is older than the heavens. This is what the Bible teaches, and it is an offense against anti-biblical religion.

3

THE STEWARDSHIP PRINCIPLE

And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth (Gen. 1:26).

The theocentric issue here is hierarchy, point two of the biblical covenant model.¹ Man was created specifically as God's representative agent on earth. God established His dominion covenant with mankind in Genesis 1:26. This established a cosmic hierarchy: God > man > nature. Every covenant is hierarchical. This dominion covenant corresponds to point two of the biblical covenant model.² God established this covenant before the creation of Adam and Eve (v. 27). God therefore established this covenant authoritatively and representatively. He did not ask Adam for permission. He did not ask Adam if the terms of the covenant were satisfactory to him (vv. 27–28).

A. A System of Representation

Man cannot be properly understood apart from the two facts revealed by Genesis 1:26. First, man is made in God's image. He is therefore the capstone of all creation. Though for the present, he is made "a little lower than the angels" (Ps. 8:5) in terms of knowledge and power, man will ultimately judge the angels (I Cor. 6:3). The lawfulness of capital punishment (execution) is based on the fact that a murderer has struck out against this image of God (Gen. 9:6).³ Second, mankind

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Sutton, ch. 2; North, ch. 2.

3. A discussion of capital punishment is found in Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five is to seek dominion over all the creation. Presumably, the fact of man as God's image-bearer gives him this right and responsibility of dominion. The two statements are placed together in Genesis 1:26. It is man's position as God's image-bearer that is fundamental, not the fact of his lawful dominion over nature.⁴

It is improper to elevate "man, the supervisor over nature" above "man, the image-bearer of God." This is the enormous heresy of numerous humanistic thinkers, including traditional magicians, Enlightenment philosophers, post-Darwinian scientists and social planners, and Marxists. It is only because man is under God as God's image-bearer that he possesses limited sovereignty over nature. On the other hand, it is also illegitimate to ignore or deny the dominion covenant when you accept the principle of man, the image-bearer. God has specified that the purpose of man is to honor God by exercising dominion as His image-bearer over the creation.

Genesis 1:26 reveals that God established the dominion covenant representatively: point two of the biblical covenant model.⁵ Genesis 1:27 reveals that Adam was created after God had established His covenant with mankind. We know from Genesis 2 that Eve was created only after Adam had completed his first assignment: naming the animals. So, Genesis 1:27 has to refer to God's declaration of the terms of the dominion covenant to Adam, who acted judicially as the representative of his not-yet-created wife, just as God had acted representatively for the not-yet-created Adam. Adam and Eve then served as the representative judicial agents of their not-yet-born heirs. This is why there is original sin. Paul wrote:

Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: For until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come (Rom. 5:12–14).

There is a chronological aspect of representation, just as there is a hierarchical aspect. God was superior to Adam and Eve, and He was also earlier than they were. He spoke judicially on behalf of Adam and Press, [1986] 2012), ch. 26.

4. Francis Nigel Lee, The Origin and Destiny of Man (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1974), p. 41.

5. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 2.

Eve. Adam was superior to Eve, and he was also earlier than she was. He spoke judicially on behalf of God to Eve. This is why Eve knew that it was illegal for her to eat the forbidden fruit (Gen. 3:3). Adam had told her. Adam and Eve were superior to their children, and they were also earlier than they were. They acted judicially on behalf of their heirs. That which was earlier in time was authoritative. It was representative.

The law of the covenant was revealed to them after they had been granted life. “And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth” (Gen. 1:28). Here is the pattern: first life, then blessing. Life is a gift from God. So is capital. “And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat” (Gen. 1:29). This leads to a conclusion: grace precedes law. It also leads to another conclusion: there is no grace without law. The law in question was the law of stewardship.

B. Stewards Under God

Stewardship is hierarchical. A steward manages the property of an owner. He owes an honest account of his stewardship. This relationship is one of indebtedness. The owner deserves a return on his investment.

God is the cosmic Owner because He is the Creator. He sustains the universe. Christian economics affirms Jesus Christ as the heir of God the Father. He is the heir because God delegated to Him the sovereignty over the acts of creation. The Apostle Paul identified the Son as the Creator.

Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light: Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son: In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins: Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature: For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist (Col. 1:12–17).

The Epistle to the Hebrews identified the incarnate Son as the Creator and the Sustainer.

God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, Hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds; Who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high; Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they (Heb. 1:1–4).

He who sits at the right hand of God is Jesus Christ. “If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God” (Col. 3:1). This identification of a second Person involved in the original creation goes back to the words of God: “And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness (Gen. 1:26a).

C. A Positive Rate of Return

The owner expects a positive rate of return on his investment. The steward’s task is to provide this. He does this by means of the productivity of the assets transferred to him by the owner. There is to be a surplus out of which the owner is paid. In the case of Adam, this initial asset base included Adam’s mental abilities. God required him to name the animals of the garden as his first assignment (Gen. 2:19–20). This was an intellectual task: classification and assessment. It did not involve the use of physical assets.

Grace is commonly defined as an unearned and unmerited gift from God. Then was the creation of Adam an act of grace? If God required Adam to work as His representative agent, producing a positive rate of return for God, how can we legitimately speak of life as a gift? Only by affirming service to God as a gift. Adam was a servant. We could just as accurately call him a slave. He was not his own man. This is another way of saying that he was not autonomous. He was under God’s authority in a covenant that didn’t need his assent to be valid. Although God did not inform him of this, God required him to assent to this covenant sacramentally by eating from the tree of life. We know this because the tree of life will be in the midst of the final revelation of the New Heaven and the New Earth.

In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations (Rev. 22:2).

Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city (Rev. 22:14).

By saying that Adam was not his own man, we affirm that God did not serve Adam. There is an inescapable covenantal hierarchy, and man is not on top. Neither is Satan. Neither is any aspect of the creation. So, Adam had to serve God. The creation also serves God by serving man.

God did not need Adam. There is no indication in the Bible that God is in any way dependent on His creation. He is transcendent over it. He created it out of nothing. He spoke it into existence. He sustains it providentially. There is nothing that He gets from mankind that He did not provide to mankind. The creation does not make Him more God than He was before the creation. The creation does not fill a void in God's being.⁶

This leads to one of the riddles of biblical theology. God blessed Adam. Yet Adam is to bless God. God needed nothing. He was glorious before the creation. Yet the creation testifies to God's majesty. Paul wrote: "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse: Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened" (Rom. 1:20–21). He who was infinitely glorious before the creation receives honor in return. Where does this extra honor come from? Cornelius Van Til called this the full-bucket paradox. If a bucket is full, how can anyone pour in more water? Does the additional water add to the bucket's supply? No. Yet the water is poured in. This is one of the fundamental paradoxes of the Bible. Van Til went so far as to say this: "This point lies at the bottom of every paradox of antinomy."⁷ What is the nature of this paradox? This: his-

6. The medieval mystic and heretic Meister Eckhart (1260–1327) argued that God needed man. Eckhart was a pantheist. For an English language bibliography relating to Eckhart, go here: <http://bit.ly/EckhartBibliography>.

7. Cornelius Van Til, The Defense of the Faith (Nutley, New Jersey: P & R, [1955] 2008), p. 68.

tory has meaning. It adds something that was not there before. Yet God is infinite.

In terms of economic theory, we say that Adam was required to add value to the creation. Nevertheless, the creation was perfect. It had no flaws. God pronounced it good (Gen. 1:31).⁸ How can anyone add value to perfection? This is the full-bucket paradox in economic theory.⁹

Jesus' parable of the talents indicates that God will demand a final accounting of His servants, and that men are required to show a positive rate of return. They will receive their eternal rewards or punishments in terms of their net return in history (Matt 25:14–30).¹⁰ Yet all of whatever people produce of benefit is the result of God's gifts. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (James 1:17).¹¹ So, whatever man offers up to God has come down to him from God.

D. Grace and Law

Grace precedes law. Life and raw materials were gifts to Adam and Eve as individuals and as founders of humanity, so they are gifts also to us. As with Adam, we also come into this world in debt to God. We leave this world and enter the next in permanent debt to God. The Bible teaches that we remain in debt all of our lives . . . to infinity and beyond. We are required by God to increase our net worth, thereby increasing His net worth. Yet He owns everything. How does man increase the net worth of a God who owns everything? This is the full-bucket paradox as it applies to economics, both in theory and practice.

We are required by God to add value to His creation, just as Adam was required to dress the garden. We never can repay God. We remain unprofitable servants. "So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable ser-

8. Chapter 5.

9. The same antinomies are found in all areas of life. Consider cosmology. Modern big bang cosmology insists that the universe is expanding. Yet we also say that the universe is infinite. Best put, Toy Story's Buzz Lightyear declares, "To infinity and beyond!" Buzz is a first-rate modern cosmologist.

10. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

11. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 32.

vants: we have done that which was our duty to do" (Luke 17:10).¹²

Grace is not deserved. It also is not cost-free. Christianity rests on the concept of a representative judicial atonement. This atonement had a high price: the perfect life, undeserved death, bodily resurrection, and bodily ascension of Jesus Christ to the right hand of God in heaven.

Even before the Fall, grace was not free. There was a price to be paid: stewardship. Adam served God. God did not serve Adam. God gave Adam raw materials, but these materials had a purpose: to enable Adam to exercise dominion representatively for God. God required Adam's service. He also imposed a system of accounting. God would evaluate Adam's performance. Adam's performance went deeply negative at the Fall. Added to the normal rate of return that God expected from His sin-free stewards was a payment for sin. That payment could be made only representatively by someone who possessed sufficient standing with God: His Son.

Grace is free in the sense of undeserved by the recipient. It was never free in the sense of cost-free. This is because Adam served God. God did not serve Adam. Adam answered to God. God did not answer to Adam.

At least one small American Presbyterian denomination has explicitly denied the post-Fall legitimacy of the dominion covenant (also referred to as the cultural mandate), thereby ignoring the explicit reconfirmation of this covenant by God with Noah (Gen. 9:1–2).¹³ Prior to 1980, virtually all twentieth-century fundamentalism and pietism by implication and practice denied the existence of such a covenant. The idea that men are responsible, as faithful servants of God, to bring the whole world under the rule of God's law, is repulsive to the vast majority of professing Christians. Rushdoony accurately identified two philosophical justifications for this retreat from responsibility: manicheanism and neoplatonism. Manicheanism is the idea that the creation is somehow innately sinful, and that the attributes of the flesh, especially power, are evil.¹⁴ Neoplatonism holds that "matter" is some-

12. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 41.

13. I refer to the Bible Presbyterian Church. Cf. R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 723–24.

14. R. J. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1970] 1995), p. 175. Cf. Rushdoony, Thy Kingdom Come: Studies in Daniel and Revelation (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1968] 2001), pp. 134, 250.

how inferior to “spirit,” and thus unimportant.¹⁵

Conclusion

God made man in terms of a covenant: the dominion covenant. The third point of the biblical covenant is ethics: obedience to God as the means of man’s dominion over the earth. Ethics and dominion are inescapably related in the biblical covenant structure.

Because man rebelled against God, his dominion assignment has become more twisted. Man apart from God is a rebel, a murderer, a destroyer. Only God’s grace can begin to restore mankind to obedience to God. God’s grace is therefore the basis of mankind’s dominion and power.¹⁶

Mankind cannot escape the dominion covenant. He can pervert it, fight it, and publicly abandon it, but he cannot escape it. Man is defined in terms of it in history. Only in hell and the lake of fire does man’s ability to fulfill it disappear—a sense of eternal loss for covenant-breakers. People are either under God ethically, or else under the creation, Satan, other men, or the supposedly impersonal forces of nature. Those who are passive toward God can exercise long-term dominion over nature. Those who are active rebels against God become the slaves of nature. But there is no escape from the terms of the dominion covenant.

15. R. J. Rushdoony, The Flight from Humanity: A Study of the Effect of Neoplatonism on Christianity (Vallecito, California: Chalcedon, [1973] 2008).

16. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

4

GRACE PRECEDES LAW, BUT INCLUDES LAW

So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth (Gen. 1:27–28).

The theocentric principle here is God as the Law-giver. This corresponds to point three of the biblical covenant model: ethics/ law.¹ Man is made in God's image. He is under God in the same way that a field grade officer is under his commanding general. He is to abide by his Commander's instructions, and he is to "do it by the book," which in this case is the law-order revealed to man verbally and through the creation ordinances.

God gave Adam an assignment: to subdue the earth. This is the positive injunction of the dominion covenant. *Every biblical covenant has at least one positive injunction.*² There was a ritual manifestation of this law in the dominion covenant: eating from the tree of life. *Every covenant also has at least one negative injunction.*³ In this case, it was avoiding a specific tree. That tree was off-limits. There was a legal boundary around it. There was a fearful negative sanction attached to

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. Personal covenant: believe in the redemptive work of Christ. Marriage covenant: be fruitful and multiply. Church covenant: disciple the nations. Civil covenant: enforce justice.

3. Individual covenant: do not blaspheme the Holy Ghost (Matt. 12:31). Marriage covenant: do not commit adultery. Church covenant: do not preach a false gospel (Gal. 1:6–7). Civil covenant: do not accept bribes.

it: death. Adam could not serve as a faithful steward if he violated this boundary. By violating it, he would ritually declare his independence from God. He would renounce his stewardship for God. The tree of the knowledge of good and evil was a representative manifestation of God's original ownership.

The first chapter of Genesis proclaims the absolute sovereignty of God the Creator. As the Creator, God must be honored by all the creation, for He is Lord over all (Isa. 45:23; Phil. 2:10). For man to honor God, he must have respect for God's law-order. Man was created specifically as God's representative on earth. Man is made in God's image. He is under God in the same way that a military man is under his commanding officer.

A. Subduing the Earth

Christianity is a religion of self-conscious activity. This is true because it is a religion demanding ethical passivity. With respect to God, the source of all ethical standards, man is to be wholly passive. The sin of Adam and Eve was their attempt to become ethically determinative. They sought a zone of pure autonomy, where they could test the word of God. They accepted the devil's idea that they might not surely die on the day they ate of the forbidden fruit. They had been assigned a passive role in relation to God; they were to think His thoughts after Him, in a creaturely fashion. Then they were to extend God's authority over all the earth. Passivity before God was to lead directly to active dominion. They were assigned the task of subduing the earth.

God assigned a task to the first humans. They were to subdue the earth, an indication that the natural world, while unquestionably good in itself (Gen. 1:10, 12, 18, 21, 25), is incomplete. It requires active administration. The natural world was not to be considered normative even before the curse of the ground (Gen. 3:17–19).⁴ God's law is normative, and man, as the image-bearer of God, is to exercise dominion in terms of God's law.

This is not to say that there is no such thing as natural law. There is a fundamental orderliness to the processes of the universe. The sun, moon, and stars possess a regularity that serves the purposes of man and, in a subordinate fashion, the living creatures of the earth (Gen. 1:14–18).⁵ The animals reproduce according to the laws imposed by

4. Chapter 12.

5. Chapter 2.

God (Gen. 1:21, 24–25). Natural law can never mean autonomous law. It can never mean law that is a product of an autonomously existing natural order (or disorder). All “laws of nature” (regularities) are inescapably personalistic. This is simply one application of the doctrine of cosmic personalism.

Adam was to honor the created laws of God that governed the natural realm. He was also to respect the laws revealed directly to him by God, or perceived by Adam because of his position as God’s image-bearer. The point is this: his knowledge of God’s law was his tool of dominion. As a creature, he was under law, but as God’s image-bearer, he was able to use his knowledge of law to become subordinately active under God and subdue the earth.

There is no question that rebellious man, who has asserted his independence from God as a self-proclaimed active and autonomous agent, has frequently become a destroyer. Nature has suffered at his hands. Unrestrained by biblical law or a sense of responsibility, rebellious men have subdued the earth for their own glory and profit, and the result has been the disruption of the earth. We are told, for example, that the reason why the Israelites had to be carried off into captivity for 70 years was that they had refused to honor the law of God by giving the land its sabbath rest every seventh year. In their absence for seven decades, the land would have its lawful rest (II Chron. 36:21; Jer. 50:34). This rest allowed the land’s natural restorative processes to replenish its fertility. Nevertheless, the land was not to be wholly free from man’s dominion. The leaders and mighty men of valor, the craftsmen and smiths—in short, those worth carrying off—were forced out of the land. “None remained,” the Bible says, “save the poorest sort of the people of the land” (II Kings 24:14b). Those who could barely exercise dominion stayed; the land was not deserted entirely. Only in the rare case of the total and irreversible judgment of God against a city was the land to be left to the rule of nature (Jer. 50:39). This was understood as the ultimate social curse.

Yet there is another possibility for rebellious man: an attempted retreat from the responsibilities of ecological dominion. The idea of ecological romantics, Eastern mystics, and numerous primitive cultures is that man must live “in harmony with nature.” Man must conform himself to the laws of nature. Of course, it is difficult to determine which laws apply in specific instances, but the idea of the overall sovereignty or normativity of the natural order is paramount in these cosmological systems. Man is nothing more than one small part of an autonomous natural process, but a force for evil when he allows his powers to take control of nature. Rather than seeing man as the agent of dominion over nature, these systems place man under the dominion of nature. Rebellious man, in short, actively defied God by abandoning his responsibilities under the dominion covenant, and, in doing so, he eventually becomes essentially passive before nature or passive before the state.

The Christian acknowledges that man has become a rebellious destroyer. We know that the whole creation groans to be delivered from “the bondage of corruption” (Rom. 8:21).⁶ The earth is under a curse because of man. But Christians are “saved by hope” (Rom. 8:24), a hope in God’s redemption, not in hope of some hypothetical return to a natural paradise. Man is indeed a destroyer, an ethical rebel who seeks release from the comprehensive requirements of God’s law-order. Nevertheless, “man the destroyer” is not the result of “man the controller,” he is the product of “man the ethical rebel.” It is not man’s dominion over the earth that is illegitimate, but rather man’s attempt to dominate the earth apart from God’s control over man. The only foundation of man’s right to dominion is his conformity to the requirements of God. Captains who rebel against generals can expect their corporals to be insubordinate. Our polluted regions of the earth are rebelling against man’s rebellious, lawless rulership, not against rulership as such.

In a widely quoted and reprinted 1967 essay, “The Historical Roots of Our Ecological Crises,” medieval historian Lynn White, Jr., argued that the Christian concept of man’s dominion over nature brought the pollution crisis to the West. White’s remarkable familiarity with the history of medieval technology in the West restrained him to the extent that he had to admit that certain key advances in technology were due primarily to differing environmental and geographical circumstances. But his underlying view was the heart of the essay’s popularity with the ecological romantics of the 1960s and 1970s: “By destroying pagan animism, Christianity made it possible to exploit nature in a mood of indifference to the feelings of natural objects.”⁷ The fact that paganism, even in its radically animistic forms, can result in societies that pollute the earth, was not mentioned by White. His conclusion: "Hence we shall continue to have a worsening ecologic crisis until we reject the Christian axiom that nature has no reason for existence save to serve man."⁸ On the contrary, the Christian axiom is rather that all creation is to serve God, the Creator. Yet he admitted that it was primarily in the mid-nineteenth century that the fusion of science (theory) and technology (practice) finally created the industrial society that is now polluting and destroying nature. In short, this process can be dated from the period in which Darwinian speculation, radical atheism, and unbounded confidence in the autonomous forces of secular progress came into ascendancy in Western Europe and, a generation later, in the United States.

6. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

7. Lynn T. White, Jr., “The Historical Roots of Our Ecologic Crisis,” Science (10 March 1967); reprinted in Garrett de Bell (ed.), The Environmental Handbook (New York: Ballentine, 1970), p. 21.

A fine but neglected answer to White appeared in the conservative magazine, National Review in late 1974. The author, R. V. Young, Jr., dissected his arguments, showing how it was not Christianity but the materialists who were the designers and engineers of the modern industrial system. His conclusion is significant.

In every instance the pattern is the same: secularization leads to the apotheosis of material "progress," and old traditions of piety and reverence—the sense of man's limitations and obligations—crumble. In Christianity, as in most religions of the world, pride—the attempt to transcend the conditions of mortal life and become as a god—is the fundamental sin, and the corresponding virtue is humility. What is usually called the "environmental" or ecologic crisis is really only one aspect of the pervasive moral and cultural crisis of our time, and the cause of this crisis is pride. For too long we have believed that no bounds need be placed on human ambition and desire, but now it has been discovered that even scientific technology, the instrument of modern man's intended self-deification, must bow to the finitude of reality.⁹

In short, it is the arrogance of autonomous man, who has inherited the products of a Christian vision of dominion through adherence to law, but who no longer acknowledges the sovereignty of the God who establishes the law-order which transfers power to man, that has created the pollution crisis. It was not the fault of Christianity, which always regarded the earth as capital wealth entrusted to man as something to be treated with deference. Man is a steward in the Christian view, not an owner of the earth (Ps. 24:1).¹⁰ The secularists denied God and transferred God's sovereignty to man. "Man the steward" became "man the autonomous owner," and modern ecological devastation began in earnest.

8. Ibid., p. 25.

9. R. V. Young, Jr., "Christianity and Ecology," National Review (Dec. 20, 1974), p. 1479.

Man is to subdue the earth, not destroy it. Man is to replenish it, care for it, use it to God's glory. This permits him to benefit from the fruits of the land, for he is made in God's image. When man tries to appropriate the fruits of the earth apart from the restraining law of God, then he can expect results that are costly to him. We live in a universe of personalistic law, and the moral law of God is more fundamental than the natural regularities of the created realm. Moral law is primary, and God has built into His world a kind of "negative feedback." When men consistently and systematically violate the moral law of God in a certain area of life, external events—seemingly unrelated to the moral realm—begin to place restraints on the rebels.

The best example in Scripture is the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Men rebelled against God through their father, Adam (Rom. 5). Adam ate of the tree. The whole creation was cursed as a result. God's word predicted the penalty of death, but the serpent implied that God's word could not be trusted. How could any "neutral" scientist have predicted any cause-and-effect relationship between the eating of a particular fruit and the cursing of the universe? But that supernaturally controlled cause-and-effect relationship was there. Ours is a universe of cosmic personalism. God respects His word more than He respects the external regularities of the creation (II Peter 3:4–7).

Because of this, man's fundamental tool of dominion is the moral law of God. Secondly, natural law—nature's external regularities—can be discovered by man, and serves as a tool of dominion—a dominion assignment that is subordinate to the moral law. Without the tool of God's moral law, which restrains man (for he is a creature under law), his power-granting knowledge of natural law makes him a destroyer. He is granted his knowledge of the external world because he is made in the image of God, and because he is under the terms of God's dominion covenant. He is required by God to use his knowledge of nature's external regularities to subdue the earth, not to destroy it. Without the restraining effects of moral law, man becomes suicidal. "All they that hate me love death" (Prov. 8:36b). The earth and its man-serving resources are ravaged by self-proclaimed autonomous man. The intellectual inheritance of the idea of progress and natural law as a tool of dominion—both of which are explicitly and uniquely biblical ideas—becomes a loaded gun, or something worse, in the hands of rebellious man.

10. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

B. The Inescapable Covenant

We should understand that this covenant is not simply ethical in its form. The command to exercise dominion is not simply a “take it or leave it” variety of command. The covenant is announced to man in the 28th verse, but in verse 26, God’s own self-counsel establishes dominion as the very function of human nature. Man must exercise dominion. It is part of his nature to do so. The suppression of this aspect of human personality is part of an overall attempt to suppress the image of God. It is an act of ethical rebellion. Ultimately, suicide is the only means of escape from this covenant. Man must exercise dominion as he goes about his daily tasks. Even the hermit, who is not part of the economy’s division of labor—the ultimate social means of dominion used by man—must plant, or hunt, or search for berries. He displaces other life. The animals fear him and give him deference, a feature of life that was part of God’s reaffirmation of the renewed dominion covenant with Noah (Gen. 9:2). For man to live is to exercise dominion. Only in hell, or afterward, in the lake of fire, can man at last escape the responsibilities of the dominion covenant. He can never escape their consequences.

Sin, however, is not limited to the attempted rejections of the dominion covenant. It is also very much in evidence in the attempts of self-proclaimed autonomous men to exercise humanistic dominion apart from God or God’s law-order. As Rushdoony commented: “As a result of the fall, however, man’s urge to dominion is now a perverted one, no longer an exercise of power under God and to His glory, but a desire to be God. This was precisely the temptation of Satan, that every man should be his own god, deciding for himself what constitutes right and wrong (Gen. 3:5). The ultimacy of man in both law and power was asserted.”¹¹

C. The Twentieth Century

The twentieth century was the most thoroughly secularized and 11. R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 448.

humanistic one in the history of the post-Roman Empire West. It was also the century of totalitarian tyranny and total warfare, where over 100 million people had violently perished by 1970.¹²

Fundamentalists in the twentieth century repeatedly accused dominion-oriented Christians of being in the same camp as the theological and political liberals. The so-called Social Gospel movement, which arose in the late nineteenth century, was strongly in favor of social action, economic redistribution, and the elevation of the powers of the civil government, especially the national government. Social action, meaning political action, was subsequently equated by fundamentalists with the Social Gospel movement. Historically, the argument is inaccurate; if anything, the liberal theologians of, say, 1870–1970, were imitating an older tradition of theological orthodoxy, especially the tradition of early New England Puritanism and early nineteenth-century Presbyterianism, both northern and southern.¹³ The Social Gospel was a secularized reconstruction of the optimistic, activist, decentralist, conservative Protestant tradition in the United States. The defenders of the Social Gospel, in effect if not in theory, removed the sovereignty of God and the validity of God's revealed law-order, and then substituted a new god, the state, with its relativistic law-order.

The twentieth century witnessed the steady erosion of social and cultural confidence among both American fundamentalists and Western liberal theologians. The First World War transformed liberal theo-

12. Gil Elliot, Twentieth Century Book of the Dead (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1972), p. 1. Elliot's figures vastly underestimate the murders by Communist China, 1948–70: two million as opposed to as many as 60 million. Also, he did not count abortions, which by the late 1970s were running in the 35 to 55 million range, per year, world-wide. As Elliot said, "To set such a figure [100 million man-made deaths] against a scale of violence in previous times involves the difficulties of comparing like periods and of allowing for population increase. However, every attempt to do so shows the twentieth century to be incomparably the more violent period" (p. 1). His estimate of 100 million was too low. At least that many died under Communism: see Stephane Courtois (ed.), The Black Book of Communism: Crimes, Terror, Repression (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, [1997] 1999).

13. On the optimism of pre-Civil War Southern Presbyterians, see Jack P. Maddex, "From Theocracy to Spirituality: The Southern Presbyterian Reversal on Church and State," Journal of Presbyterian History, LIV (1976), pp. 438–57. See also James B. Jordan, "A Survey of Southern Presbyterian Millennial Views Before 1930," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Winter 1976–77), pp. 106–21. In the North, the faculty of Princeton Theological Seminary, the most influential of the orthodox Presbyterian seminaries, was noted for its postmillennial optimism: Archibald Alexander, A. A. Hodge, Charles Hodge, and Benjamin B. Warfield.

logy. Optimism began to go out of the movement.¹⁴ It revived again during the Second World War, flickered on through the brief tenure (1961–63) of President John F. Kennedy, and then steadily died out during the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Kennedy's assassination in November 1963 had a great deal to do with this, for he had been a symbol. Around the world, he had been perceived as the representative of can-do moderate political liberalism. His successor, Lyndon Johnson, was the very incarnation of political liberalism, but he left the office in 1969 a political failure because of his escalation of Kennedy's legacy—no bigger than a man's hand—of the Vietnam War. A growing number of liberal theologians came to accept Protestant fundamentalism's pessimism concerning the possibility of successful efforts to reconstruct society in terms of Christian presuppositions. Rushdoony was correct when he stated, "Liberals, neo-orthodox, existentialists and others have renounced the idea of power as an illusion or a temptation, and the possession of power as an evil. The result has been to accentuate the drift to totalitarian power."¹⁵ Pessimism undermines resistance to power and evil.

Power renounced is not power diminished; it is merely power transferred. What is needed to resist centralized political power—the kingdom of man incarnate—is a reassertion of the total sovereignty of God. Then, as a direct consequence, power must be redistributed widely, away from central governments and into the hands of local political bodies, churches, voluntary institutions of all kinds. The Bible affirms the legitimacy of power. It places all power in the hands of Jesus Christ: (Matt. 28:18). Then it directs Christians to go forth, preaching the gospel and discipling nations, teaching them to observe "all things whatsoever" Christ has commanded (Matt. 28:20).¹⁶ "All things," as Greg Bahnsen's study, Theonomy in Christian Ethics (1977), demonstrates forcefully, includes the whole of biblical law.¹⁷ What we call the Great Commission of Christ to His church (Matt. 28:18–20)¹⁸ is a reaffirmation of the dominion covenant, taking into account the progress of redemptive history.

14. A classic statement of the pessimism of the theological liberals is Walter Marshall Horton, Realistic Theology (New York: Harper & Bros., 1934). An extract of this book appears in William R. Hutchison (ed.), American Protestant Thought: The Liberal Era (New York: Harper Torchbook, 1968), pp. 190–96. Reinhold Niebuhr is the archetype of the shift from optimism to pessimism, and he is the focus of the book by Donald Meyer, The Protestant Search for Political Realism, 1919–1941 (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, [1960] 1973). [I took his course in American social history in 1962.] See also Robert T. Handy, "American Religious Depression, 1925–1935," Church History, XXIX (1960), pp. 3–16.

15. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, p. 448.

16. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

Conclusion

Adam entered this world in debt to God. God had provided him with raw materials and a mind that was able to understand the regularities of nature. Adam was the recipient of God's grace. This was not lawless grace. Adam was under a covenant that demanded performance. He was to subdue the earth.

The idea that an individual is autonomous is preposterous. Every person is under the dominion covenant. Every person is the genetic heir of his parents. Every person is the recipient of benefits from the social institutions that sustain life. There is no benefit received apart from final judgment. Every person will give an account of his life. Grace precedes law, but it is never without law.

17. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 2nd ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1984), p. 448.

18. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/kggreatcom>)

5

ECONOMIC VALUE: OBJECTIVE AND SUBJECTIVE

And God saw everything that he had made, and behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day (Gen. 1:31).

The theocentric principle here is God as the cosmic Judge. This corresponds to point four of the biblical covenant model: judgment.¹

The first chapter of Genesis repeats the phrase “and God saw that it was good” five times (vv. 10, 12, 18, 21, 25), in addition to the final summation in verse 31. God’s creative acts were evaluated by God and found to be good. They reflected His own goodness and the absolute correspondence between His plan, His standards of judgment, His fiat word, and the results of His word: the creation. The creation was good because it was the product of God’s sovereign plan. God therefore imputed positive value to His creation, for He created it perfect. It was completely in conformity to His decree. The doctrine of imputation lies at the heart of the doctrine of creation. The creation was good because God created it good and because God said it was good. It was good objectively, because of its inherent conformity to God’s decree. It was good subjectively, because God announced its perfection, indicating its conformity to His standards. The Creator is also the Imputer. God’s original subjective standards—meaning personal, not relative—served as the sole standard of the creation itself. Once created, God—the infallible, subjective Evaluator—announced that in no way did the creation deviate from His standards.

Prior to his ethical rebellion, man was consistently able to think God’s thoughts after Him in a creaturely, human fashion. Man had language from the beginning. He had the power to relate mental constructs to the external realm of creation. He was assigned the task of naming (classifying) the animals (Gen. 2:19) and dressing the garden (Gen. 2:15), indicating his ability to fulfill God's requirement that he establish dominion over the creation. In both tasks, human judgment was crucial. This judgment was to be in conformity to the standards set forth by God, both verbally (Luke 4:4)² and indirectly through the creation itself (Rom. 1:19). In short, man had the power of evaluating or imputing value to aspects of the creation, because he had been created in the image of God. He had the power to impute value accurately because he was not yet in rebellion against the standards of God. He was assigned the task of exercising dominion over the earth according to God's command and in terms of God's law. This meant that man must use judgment in designing plans of action. He must act purposefully in terms of God's standards.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

A. The Great Debate

The problem of value is central to the science of economics. Is value determined objectively or subjectively? Is the value of some scarce economic resource inherent in that resource, or is it derived from the evaluations of acting men? In short, is value intrinsic or imputed? This debate has raged within the economics profession for several centuries.

It is generally regarded as the essence of the "marginalist" intellectual revolution of the early 1870s that value must be understood as strictly subjectively determined. Acting men impute value to scarce economic resources that have no inherent or intrinsic value. All value is subjective; no value is objective, meaning intrinsic. F. A. Hayek argued that "it is probably no exaggeration to say that every important advance in economic theory during the last hundred years was a further step in the consistent application of subjectivism."³

Classical economics began with Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations in 1776 and extended to the work of John Stuart Mill, just prior to simultaneous and independent discoveries of "marginalism" by Jevons (England), Menger (Austria), and Walras (Switzerland) in the early

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

3. F. A. Hayek, The Counter-Revolution of Science: Studies on the Abuse of Reason (New York: Free Press of Glencoe, [1952] 1955), p. 31. Reprinted by Liberty Press, 1979.

1870s. Classical economics defended competing explanations concerning the source of all value. Smith held both the labor theory of value and a cost-of-production theory of price. He also believed that supply and demand determine prices, and that the “natural price” of any scarce resource is based on the labor that it takes to make it, or the cost of all resource inputs. The competition of supply and demand will produce a price which fluctuates around the “natural price.” The labor theory of value and the cost-of-production theory of price are incompatible. This is explained in most of the standard histories of economic thought. Gide and Rist put it bluntly: “They remain juxtaposed in the Wealth of Nations because he never made up his mind which to adopt. As a result his work is full of contradictions which it would be futile to try to reconcile.”⁴ How supply and demand are related either to the labor theory or cost-of-production theory was also impossible to demonstrate. Almost a century later, Karl Marx and John Stuart Mill brought the classical period to a close; neither of them was able to reconcile the formation of prices on a market with either the labor theory of value or a cost-of-production theory.⁵

The heart of the debate over intrinsic (fixed) value can be seen in the problem that bothered all of the classical economists, the so-called diamond-water paradox. Why is it that something so essential to life, water, is so cheap, while diamonds, things merely ornamental, are so very expensive? If intrinsic value has any meaning, shouldn't water be more valuable than diamonds? Furthermore, why do the prices of diamonds change? How do diamonds conform to the labor theory of value? If human effort is the source of all value, why is it that a diamond, which is discovered accidentally, is so valuable? Smith, in his lectures of 1762–63, noted the problem and answered by means of the logic of supply and demand: “It is only an account of the plenty of water that it is so cheap as to be got for the lifting; and on account of the scarcity of diamonds (for their real use seems not yet to be discovered) that they are so dear.”⁶ Smith did not include these lines in the Wealth

4. Charles Gide and Charles Rist, A History of Economic Doctrines (Boston: D. C. Heath & Co. 1948), p. 95.

5. For the classic critique of Marx's economics, see Eugen von Böhm-Bawerk, “The Unresolved Contradiction in the Marxian Economic System” (1896), in The Shorter Classics of Böhm-Bawerk (South Holland, Illinois: Libertarian Press, 1962). This is a modern version of the book, Karl Marx and the Close of His System. See also my section in Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gnmr0r>)

6. Cited by H. M. Robertson and W. L. Taylor, “Adam Smith's Approach to the

of Nations; instead, he turned to other explanations of price which misled economists for a century.

The marginalists, or subjectivists, had an answer to this age-old problem. The question is not the total utility of "water in general" versus "diamonds in general." The question is rather what a given quantity of water will exchange for on the open market versus one diamond. What we find is this: men do not trade indeterminate aggregates. They trade discrete units or quantities. If a particular quantity of water is interchangeable with an equal quantity of water anywhere else in an economy, and the same is true of diamonds, then the "last drop" of water will be worth just slightly—"marginally"—less than the "next to the last drop." Similarly, the last diamond will be worth only slightly less than the next to the last diamond. But since there are so few diamonds available and such a strong demand for them, that last diamond—the one being exchanged in any given transaction—will command considerable quantities of other scarce resources. On the other hand, that final unit of water, given the huge quantities of water available for sale, will not command a high price. Thus, it is the value of the marginal unit—the one given up by the seller and bought by the buyer—that determines the exchange value of all other similar units being offered for sale in the market. It is not "general value" that determines the price of a specific unit of any commodity or service, but the marginal value of the least valuable unit offered for sale.

It should also be noted that a glass of fresh water on Lake Michigan (or an unpolluted fresh-water lake) will not command a high price, while a glass of water in the desert may. The transportation costs of getting fresh water to a man in a desert are high. He must bid a high price to induce someone to make the effort. We must not speak of "water in general." Supply and demand explain market prices; they determine what people will actually pay for a particular resource. An abundant resource will result in low prices for each specific unit of that resource, since the final use (least heavily demanded use) which will be served by that resource will be well down on the scale of men's values. The higher uses (more strongly demanded uses) will already have been served by other available units of the resource in question. Therefore, the price of every unit offered for sale can be no higher than the highest price offered for the final unit.⁷ When you buy an alarm clock at the supermarket, you will find that each one costs $6.98, or whatever. They are interchangeable, and if one unit were to cost $17.50, while another was selling for $6.98, no one would spend $17.50 to get an identical clock (assuming everyone really believes the clocks are identical). The value of the final good, or marginal good, determines the value of each of them being offered for sale (disregarding transportation costs and information costs).

Theory of Value," Economic Journal, LXVII (1957); reprinted in Joseph J. Spengler and William R. Allen (eds.), Essays in Economic Thought (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1960), p. 292.

This explanation of market pricing created an intellectual revolution in the field of economics. The late nineteenth century saw the advent of this explanation and its triumph among academic economists by 1900. Menger, Jevons, and Walras buried the arguments for intrinsic value as the basis of market value. As one observer has put it: "If people value it, it has value; if people don't value it, it doesn't have value; and there is no 'intrinsic' about it."⁸ Value is therefore imputed by acting men. This act of imputation is the foundation of the subjective theory of value.

Men wish to achieve their goals with the minimum expenditure of scarce resources possible. They prefer giving up less to buy a good than giving up more. They want to buy cheap and sell dear. This goal has led to the development of the free market. The market permits people to impute their own personal value to a multitude of scarce resources, depending upon their knowledge, goals, and available resources. The market enables them to make judgments through a system of competitive bidding. Men compete for specific quantities of specific goods and services. They offer specific prices. This competition leads to the establishment of market prices for specific units of scarce resources. The market price of a resource is therefore the product of a multitude of subjective imputations of value; it is established through competitive bidding. Market prices are therefore the products of a grand auction process, in which buyers and potential buyers compete against each other for specific quantities of a particular resource, while sellers compete against potential sellers in order to sell to the highest bidding buyers. A market price is therefore an objective result of competitive subjective valuations.

7. This assumes that buyers have knowledge of all the sellers' prices, which is not a realistic assumption, but which comes close to the operations of a mass-production economy in which advertising and other forms of price information are available.

8. The statement was made in a speech I heard in 1967. It was delivered by the then-Member of Parliament, Enoch Powell.

Let us consider an example that illustrates some of the implications of this view. We might call it the Bible-pornography paradox. The Bible is the very word of God and infinitely precious to mankind. Yet, in a perverse culture, it is quite likely that a capitalist could earn far more income by selling pornographic literature than by selling Bibles. The market does not evaluate the Bible in general versus pornography in general. The market only informs us about the comparative price of a specific Bible and a specific pornographic item. Furthermore, the culture may be made up of rebellious people who are determined to work out their own damnations without fear or trembling. They impute value to pornographic materials, and little or no value to Bibles. The market will reflect this phenomenon in an objective manner. It will reflect it in the profit-and-loss statements of publishers. Those who meet market demand will prosper, while those who do not meet it will falter or go bankrupt. The profits and losses will be a result of the subjective valuations of acting men, who make decisions in terms of their values. Christian literature must be subsidized, while pornography produces income.

The humanistic, relativistic economist looks at these facts and can conclude that in a specific market, pornography is more valuable at the margin than Bibles are. He says that he is making no ethical value judgment when he says this; he is only reporting the objective results of multiple subjective valuations on the market. But, because he allows no concept of objective value to enter his economic analysis—not consciously, at least—he is unable to take a stand against the market except by means of stating his personal opinion that Bibles are better than pornographic materials. However, the market supposedly must be left alone to have its way, since one man's opinion must not be allowed to thwart the operations of the market process. His relativism leads to an objective result: the spread of pornography through price competition, thereby lowering the costs of achieving damnation and cultural disintegration.

The biblical explanation is different. The Bible affirms that men do have the power to impute economic value. It also affirms that there are absolute, objective standards of value. In fact, it is because of these standards that all coherence in the universe can be said to exist. The creation reflects these standards, revealing the God who created all things (Rom. 1:19). The Bible reveals these standards verbally. Therefore, all human imputation goes on within a framework of God's absolute, objective standards. God imputes good and evil in terms of His own standards, and this imputation provides the only reliable standard of evaluation. The facts are what God determines and imputes, not what the market determines and imputes, or some socialist planning board determines and imputes. The accuracy of each man's individual act of imputation stands or falls in terms of its correspondence to God's act of imputation. We live in a universe of cosmic personalism.⁹

B. Economic Value: Objective and Subjective

What we must say is this: a Bible has no intrinsic (fixed) market value, but the Bible has intrinsic (ultimate) value. Everything has intrinsic value or intrinsic evil or some mixture, depending upon God's sovereign act of imputation in terms of His absolute standards and His plan for history. But the free market need not reflect this intrinsic value or intrinsic evil. The free market is the arena of competing human imputations, an arena in which men work out their salvation or damnation (Phil. 2:12).¹⁰ The fact that an economist, as a self-proclaimed neutral scientist, denies that there can be such a thing as intrinsic economic value, means only that he is using the free market as the sole source of explanation. There is no intrinsic value concept in contemporary non-Marxist economic thought, because prices change, men's evaluations change, and no hypothesis of God has any scientific meaning for the humanistic economist. As Ludwig von Mises once put it: "We may leave aside the genuine dogmas such as Creation, Incarnation, the Trinity, as they have no direct bearing on the problems of interhuman relations."¹¹

It would seem, then, that modern economics, by focusing exclusively on pragmatic goals and thus proximate utility, has erased all traces of the pre-modern idea of intrinsic value or objective value. Yet this is wholly a delusion. In terms of the actual practice of economists, objective value theory has never been stronger. The reason for this is the increasing reliance of economists on statistical aggregates, both for the purposes of economic forecasting and planning and for the purposes of formulating theory itself. Macroeconomics, econometrics, and modern input-output analysis rely heavily on the premise that economic value and statistical aggregates are intertwined. In other words, when we say that “the economy” has “grown” at three percent per annum for several years, we think we are saying something significant about human welfare, meaning individual well-being. We think we are saying something more than the mere cataloguing of numbers. We think, in other words, that subjective valuation and objective historical-statistical data are linked. We think we have somehow captured subjective value in statistical aggregates. But if we cling fervently to the theory of subjective value, we will have to give up completely the idea that economic statistics are in any real sense meaningful indicators of the human condition. In other words, the old doctrine of objective value theory is being smuggled into the world of modern economic thought through the back door of statistical aggregation.

9. Chapter 1.

10. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

11. Ludwig von Mises, Theory and History: An Interpretation. of Social and Economic Evolution (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, 1985), p. 46. The book was first published by Yale University Press in 1957. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTAH>)

C. The Failure of Utilitarian Economics

Let us consider for a moment the famous “law of diminishing utility.” In the post-classical form, the economists have argued along the following lines. As an individual receives more and more units of monetary income (other things being equal, such as the purchasing power of the monetary unit), he allocates the additional money to uses that are progressively lower on his value scale (scale of priorities). He may buy food with his first dollar, shelter with his second dollar, clothing with his third, entertainment with his fourth, and so on. Each new dollar is less valuable to him than the previous one, for he has already satisfied his more crucial needs. So far, so good. But a group of English economists, generally called welfare economists, began around 1900 to use this economic law in a unique way. They argued that because each additional dollar (or pound sterling) in a rich man’s income is worth less to him than an additional dollar in a poor man’s income, the civil government can increase total social utility by taking the rich man’s dollar and giving it to the poor man, assuming basic productivity is not reduced because of this transfer. The rich man puts little value on his final dollar, while the poor man puts great value on his, since he has so few. With the new program of wealth redistribution, these welfare economists concluded, the growth of total social welfare has been increased.

The conceptual problem in welfare economics is related to the familiar problem faced by philosophers: the human pin cushion. Perhaps some sadist enjoys sticking pins into people. He receives exquisite pleasure from seeing people jump in response to the pin-sticking. In most instances, those who have been stuck with the pins resent it. The experience is painful. Question: Does the pleasure received by the sadist offset the pain experienced by the victims? If there were a means of measuring pleasure and pain, and we discovered that the pleasure received in a particular instance of pin-sticking really was greater than the pain received by the victim, could we devise a social policy in terms of "aggregate pleasure"? Will all instances of pin-sticking by this sadist offset the pain experienced by the victims? Will all instances of all pin-sticking sadists offset the pain experienced by all future victims? Even if "aggregate social pleasure" were thus always made positive, should lawmakers enact legislation permitting universal pin-sticking? Should the rights of the victims be sacrificed for the pleasure of the sadists?

I assume that most people recognize the hypothetical nature of the problem. We have no such measure of pleasure. We cannot "weigh" the pleasure received by sadists against the pain received by their victims. This is also the theoretical problem for economists. In this case, the problem is far from hypothetical. Evaluating corporate costs and benefits is the basis of all state planning.

We might state the problem in a different way. What about the pleasure of the sadists? If the civil government intervenes, making pin-sticking illegal, haven't the interests of the sadists been sacrificed to the interests of the potential victims? By prohibiting pin-sticking, hasn't the civil government infringed on the rights of the pin-stickers? The legislators are trapped. Someone's interests must be infringed upon. If the civil government does nothing, the victims' interests are sacrificed. If the authorities ratify this set of conditions by legalizing pin-sticking, the victims' interests are sacrificed. On the other hand, if the civil government makes pin-sticking illegal, this will sacrifice the interests of the pin-stickers. The law cannot be neutral. Somebody wins and somebody else loses, whatever the civil government does, even if it does nothing.

The welfare economists were working with a similar problem. The Western legal tradition has long respected the rights of private property. Private individuals have not been permitted to steal from others, even if the thief is poorer than the victim. But what if the politicians act as agents of the poor? What if they do the stealing? Have we not drawn perilously close to a social order that is based on legal pin-sticking? Hasn't the state become the agent of the sadists? The analogy is strained, since rich people may voluntarily give to the poor, whereas only masochists are likely to give pin-sticking sadists the opportunity to amuse themselves by acts of violence. But the philosophical problem is the same: Do we have a means of measuring pleasure and pain, utility and disutility? Can we make valid conclusions concerning “aggregate social utility”? This was the conceptual problem which faced (and still faces) economists and policy-makers.

The welfare economists tackled the problem in the name of science. They were been content to rely on “common sense” arguments concerning equity or fair play. They did not call for state intervention simply in the name of morality, or traditional charity, or some other non-scientific standard. They had called for the politicians to pass legislation taking money from the rich and giving it to the poor, but in the name of science. The law of diminishing utility supposedly proved the case—a fully scientific case—for statist wealth redistribution.

1. Robbins vs. Harrod

It took over three decades for any economist to come up with a definitive answer—theoretical answer—to this argument. Lionel Robbins, who had been greatly influenced as a young man by Mises, was equal to the task. In his now-classic book, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science (1932), Robbins shattered the scientific validity of the older welfare economics scheme. The law of diminishing marginal utility holds up quite well for a particular individual, Robbins argued, but it cannot be applied to two or more individuals. The fact that one person prefers choice A to choice B is economically significant, but this does not tell us how much more he prefers A to B. We cannot measure the difference; we have no yardstick to measure subjective utility. Similarly, as economic scientists, we cannot say that the satisfaction (marginal utility) gained by the rich man is less (or more, or the same) than the satisfaction gained by the poor man when each of them receives one more dollar of income. We cannot measure the subjective loss of satisfaction when the rich man has his dollar removed by the state’s authorities, and we cannot measure the increase in satisfaction accruing to the poor man who receives the confiscated dollar. As Robbins wrote: “Introspection does not enable A to measure what is going on in B’s mind, nor B to measure what is going on in A’s. There is no way of comparing the satisfactions of different people.”¹²

12. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science, 2nd ed. (New York: St. Martins, 1935), p. 140. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

The politician may think he knows, or voters may think they can make such estimations, but the economist must assert that, from a scientific point of view, no such comparison is possible.

Robbins' book remains one of the classics in the methodology of economics. Yet its implications are devastating for modern economics. It was attacked by R. F. Harrod in his presidential address before Section F of the British Association, the economics organization, and reprinted in the Economic Journal in September of 1938. Harrod was concerned about the implications of Robbins' book for applied economics, specifically the formulation of economic policy. On what grounds could an economist who follows Robbins' epistemology ever be able to give advice to anyone concerning the appropriateness of any given economic action? Harrod wrote:

It may be urged that the economist hereby goes outside his proper "scientific" field. This point is strongly urged by Professor Robbins. Whether the n th unit of X has greater or less utility than the m th of Y to a given individual may be made the subject of a test. He can be given the choice. But there are no scientific means of deciding whether the n th of X has greater utility to individual P than the m th of Y has to another individual Q . The choice can never be put. This implies that we cannot in fact decide whether two pence have more utility to a millionaire than a beggar. We may have a shrewd suspicion. But this, we are told, is "unscientific," for lack of a test.¹³

But what answer could Harrod provide? Only that economics really isn't very much of a science after all. "This objection would be very weighty if economics itself were a mature and exact science. Yet in fact its achievements outside a limited field are so beset on every side by matters which only admit of conjecture that it is possibly rather ridiculous for an economist to take such a high line."¹⁴ Harrod then abandoned the whole idea of scientific logic and epistemology. He appealed to "common sense" in order to justify the scientific economist in making value judgments and policy decisions in the name of scientific rigor. "Can we afford to reject this very clear finding of common sense? Of course, great caution must be exercised in not pushing the matter too far. Since the evidence is vague, we must not go farther than a very clear mandate from common sense allows."¹⁵ This, however, does not answer the problem. Whose common sense is he talking about? The socialist's? The Keynesian's? (Keynes was the editor of the Economic Journal when Harrod's article was published, and Harrod was Keynes' biographer after Keynes died in 1946.) Harrod's "common sense" is simply an admission of intellectual and epistemological bankruptcy.

13. R. F. Harrod, "Scope and Method of Economics," Economic Journal, XLVIII (1938), p. 396.

14. Idem.

15. Idem.

Harrod understood the threat that Robbins' book posed and would continue to pose to applied economics. "If the incomparability of utility to different individuals is strictly pressed, not only are the prescriptions of the welfare school ruled out, but all prescriptions whatever. The economist as an adviser is completely stultified, and, unless his speculations be regarded as of paramount aesthetic value, he had better be suppressed completely. No; some sort of postulate of equality has to be assumed."¹⁶ This postulate of psychological equality asserts that men are sufficiently alike, so that the final dollar of income to the millionaire is worth so little on his value scale, and it would be worth so much to the poor man, that the state can increase social welfare by confiscating at least a percentage of that final dollar of income to the millionaire and transferring it to the poor man. Also implied, of course, is that the millionaire's moral outrage at the state is either irrelevant or offset by the approval of the poor man. Nevertheless, we must be careful when we apply this postulate of psychological equality. "But it should be carefully framed and used with great caution, always subject to the proviso 'unless the contrary can be shown.'"¹⁷

The problem is, the contrary cannot be shown, precisely because the postulate of psychological equality is not itself capable of proof. Scientifically, we cannot prove either equality of psychic income or inequality. Robbins was correct; we simply cannot, as economic scientists, make such comparisons. Yet we must, if we are to make any kind of policy recommendation, or even add up a column of figures, if we assert that the total is meaningful from an economic point of view.

In the December, 1938 issue of the Economic Journal, Robbins capitulated to Harrod. He accepted the "postulate of equality," which supposedly allows us to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. He did not demonstrate how his acceptance of his postulate was conformable to his previous denial of the possibility of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. He simply wanted to retain the role of the economist-as-policy-advisor. As he wrote:

16. Ibid., p. 397.

17. Idem.

My own attitude toward problems of political action has always been one of what I might call provisional utilitarianism. I am far from thinking that thorough-going utilitarianism à la Bentham is an ultimate solution of any of the major problems of social philosophy. But I have always felt that, as a first approximation in handling questions relating to the lives and actions of large masses of people, the approach which counts each man as one, and, on that assumption, asks which way lies the greatest happiness, is less likely to lead one astray than any of the absolute systems. I do not believe, and I never have believed, that in fact men are necessarily equal or should always be judged as such. But I do believe that, in most cases, political calculations which do not treat them as if they were equal are morally revolting.¹⁸

He did not believe men are necessarily equal. He thought that “as a first approximation” the “provisional utilitarian” position of the greatest good for the greatest number is useful. But we must not accept “absolute systems.” Bentham’s utilitarianism—a consistent philosophy of applied economics, and one based on the universal acceptability of the postulate of psychological equality—is not “an ultimate solution of any of the major problems of social philosophy.” What Robbins admitted was that, in remaining a defender of applied economics, he had to abandon any claim of scientific rigor and epistemological consistency. He had to abandon economic science as he had defined it in his book.

Then how should the economic scientist make policy recommendations? By coming to the policy committee as a scientist, but then admitting, if pressed, that he can make no suggestions as a scientist. His scientific credentials get him invited to the meeting, but if he is honest, he really cannot use them in making policy recommendations. Robbins cited William S. Jevons, one of the founders of modern, subjectivist economics, in his own defense. Jevons abandoned any attempt to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility.

I see no means whereby such comparison can be accomplished. Every mind is inscrutable to every other mind and no common denominator of feeling is possible. Would it not be better, I asked myself, quite frankly to acknowledge that the postulate of equal capacity for satisfaction came from outside, that it rested upon ethical principle rather than upon scientific demonstration, that it was not a judgment of fact in the scientific sense, but rather a judgment of value—perhaps, even, in the last analysis, an act of will? Ought it not to be made clear, for instance, that theories of public finance which went beyond tracing the effects of given measures on prices, quantities produced and such-like measurable magnitudes, and which attempted to sum social gain or loss, were not, strictly speaking, economic science?¹⁹

18. Lionel Robbins, “Interpersonal Comparisons of Utility: A Comment,” Economic Journal, XLVIII (1938), p. 635.

Well put, Professor Jevons! Then what of the necessary intellectual conclusion, that the economic scientist can, on the basis of his secular methodology, say nothing concerning policy? “But I confess that at first I found the implications very hard to swallow. For it meant, as Mr. Harrod has rightly insisted, that economics as a science could say nothing by way of prescription. It could say whether a certain course of action could lead to a desired end. It could judge the consistency of different policies. But, in itself, it passed no verdict of good or bad. It was not possible to say that economic science showed that free trade was justifiable, that inequality should be mitigated, that the income tax should be graduated, and so forth.”²⁰ But Robbins could not bear this logically necessary conclusion. “Further thought, however, convinced me that this was irrational.”²¹ Why was it irrational? Because economists have always known that their prescriptions “were conditional upon the acceptance of norms lying outside economics. . . . Why should one be frightened, I asked, of taking a stand on judgments which are not scientific, if they relate to matters outside the world of science?”²²

In other words, because economists have always known they were not really being scientific when they made policy recommendations, it is therefore irrational to worry about making policy recommendations. Because economists have never been able to make scientific policy recommendations, economists should not stop making policy recommendations now. “In the past, it seemed to me, a failure to recognize the arbitrary element in certain of the findings of traditional Political Economy had been conducive to too facile a use of these findings in framing prescriptions for action.”²³ However, he made his position clear: “I was not at all desirous of preventing economists from giving prescriptions.”²⁴ We must still make the assumption of the postulate of psychological equality among men. “I think that the assumption of

19. Ibid., p. 637.

20. Idem.

21. Idem.

22. Ibid., p. 638.

23. Ibid., p. 639.

24. Idem.

equality comes from the outside, and that its justification is more ethical than scientific. But we all agree that it is fitting that such assumptions should be made and their implications explored with the aid of the economist's technique."²⁵

2. *Taking in Each Other's Washing*²⁶

The responsibility for formulating the postulate of psychological equality is therefore pushed into the camp of the philosophers: specifically, the ethicists. Then, once we assume that they have proven the validity of the postulate, it can be imported and used as the epistemological foundation of applied economics.

The problem with this strategy is that the specialists in ethics are faced with precisely the same philosophical paradoxes, and they have not come to any agreement about the resolution of the problem of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. This is the incommensurability problem in hedonism and utilitarianism. Pleasures and pains cannot be quantified, even by the individual. There is an ordinal scale (this is more pleasurable than that), but no cardinal scale (this is exactly this much more pleasurable than that). McIntyre's comment on John Stuart Mill's utilitarianism applies equally well to Robbins: "Mill's whole tenor of thought is that of a utilitarian who cannot avoid any of the difficulties which this doctrine raises, but who cannot conceive of abandoning his doctrine either."²⁷ What was Mill's philosophical difficulty? Wrote McIntyre: "... trying to bring all the objects and goals of human desire under a single concept, that of pleasure, and trying to show them as all commensurable with each other in a single scale of evaluation."²⁸ Modern economists do not solve this commensurability problem by substituting the word "utility" for "pleasure."

Robbins was not some amateur philosopher who could legitimately call upon the ethical theorists to solve his problem. His problem was the same one that had baffled ethical theorists for many years. Richard Brendt's article in the Encyclopedia of Philosophy on "Hedonism" even turns to the economists as examples of the continuing de-

25. Ibid., p. 641.

26. The phrase is Cornelius Van Til's. It refers to rival philosophers who rely on each other's logic in order to maintain their own positions. Cornelius Van Til, Who Do You Say That I Am? (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1975), "Platonic Idealism."

27. Alasdair McIntyre, A Short History of Ethics (New York: Macmillan, 1966), p. 235.

28. Ibid., p. 236.

bate over whether “we can know nothing about the mental states of other persons, since there is no way of observing them directly. . . .”²⁹ Professor Smart put the matter quite well:

The fact that the ordinary man thinks that he can weigh up probabilities in making prudential decisions does not mean that there is really no sense in what he is doing. What utilitarianism badly needs, in order to make its theoretical foundations secure, is some method according to which numerical probabilities, even approximate ones, could in theory, though not necessarily always in practice, be assigned to any imagined future event. . . . But until we have an adequate theory of objective probability, utilitarianism is not on a secure theoretical basis.³⁰

Keynes’ teacher and fellow homosexual, the philosopher G. E. Moore, put it more graphically when he wrote concerning the summing up of individual pleasures in a social aggregate:

It involves our saying that, for instance, the state of mind of a drunkard, when he is intensely pleased with breaking crockery, is just as valuable in itself—just as well worth having—as that of a man who is fully realizing all that is exquisite in the tragedy of King Lear, provided only the mere quantity of pleasure in both cases is the same. Such instances might be multiplied indefinitely, and it seems to me that they constitute a reductio ad absurdum of the view that intrinsic value is always in proportion to quantity of pleasure. Of course, here again, the question is quite incapable of proof either way.³¹

But if it is quite incapable of proof for the ethicists, then there is nothing for the economists to import from this source that can serve as the foundation for the necessary assumption of the postulate of psychological equality among men. The economics of secular humanism must make unprovable assumptions about mankind in order to operate—assumptions that cannot legitimately be made, according to the logic of secular humanism, but must and will be made by policymakers.

29. Richard B. Brandt, “Hedonism,” in Paul Edwards (ed.), The Encyclopedia of Philosophy (New York: Macmillan, 1967), III, p. 434.

30. J. J. C. Smart and Bernard Williams (eds.), Utilitarianism: for and against (Cambridge University Press, 1973), pp. 40–41.

31. G. E. Moore, “Multiple Intrinsic Goods,” (editor’s title) in Wilfrid Sellars and John Hospers (eds.), Readings in Ethical Theory, 2nd ed. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1970), p. 387. The selection is taken from Moore’s book, Ethics (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1912).

Mark A. Lutz, an economist, and Kenneth Lux, a psychologist, attacked methodological individualism and laissez-faire economics by challenging the presuppositions of the individualists in the field of epistemology. They were methodological collectivists, and they believed that the state can and should reorder economic priorities in terms of collective needs. They grasped the fact that it is illegitimate to use Robbins' arguments against welfare economics to criticize only collectivists' policies, if Robbins' arguments are not simultaneously used to criticize all policy decisions, and indeed, all economic aggregates. They wrote:

In the absence of any way to measure utility directly, the most reasonable thing to do is to assume equal utility scales across people, which in effect means equal capacity for satisfaction. In fact, it is hard to see how any other assumption makes sense. And this assumption is precisely what economics adopted in order to be able to add up different individuals' incomes, and assume it was adding up utility or value. Within the confines of marginal utility theory, this is the assumption that allows us to use aggregate statistics, such as GNP. Without the assumption of additivity of utility, by adding income, there would be no basis for comparing GNP figures from one country to another, or even within the same country from year to year. This is the kind of assumption neoclassicals had to invoke whenever they made a case for the social benefits of any kind of economic policy, such as free trade or laissez-faire. Proceeding from the same basis, the conclusion that equalizing the distribution of income and wealth was beneficial appeared to be inescapable.³²

The authors were correct about the necessity of the assumption of comparability of subjective utilities for making policy decisions and comparing economic aggregates. This, however, does not answer Robbins' original point: economists cannot possibly make such an assumption as economists. Therefore, we must abandon scientific logic, they concluded, just as both Harrod and Robbins concluded. We must appeal to that most priceless of all rare commodities, common sense. They did not accept Robbins' original logic. They, like Harrod, did not find it convincing. Why not? Not because they can fault its coherence, but because they do not like its policy implications. "Once the economist accepts that there is an ordering of importance of needs, the question of differences in needs between people is relatively unessential, and we feel that the economist must accept that there is an ordering of needs among people. To do otherwise is to, once again, fly in the face of common sense.”³³ But what is this ordering principle? It is human life. “The more necessary for life, or life supporting a particular good, service, or experience is, the more important it is. It is as simple as that. An economics that has no theoretical way of making a distinction between the importance of supplying water and the importance of supplying tobacco hardly seems relevant to a living organism, let alone a human development.”³⁴ If we find that Americans have sufficient income to smoke (or that some Americans do), and we find that nomads in the North African Sahel area need water, what must be our conclusion? Obviously, the state should take away income from the tobacco-smoking (or chewing or snuffing) Americans, and drill water wells for African nomads.³⁵ Another conclusion defies the economics of egalitarian redistribution. Any other system of economic analysis defies “common sense.” While the authors were not quite this radical in their conclusions—almost, but not quite—the direction in which their logic would carry international society is clear enough. To quote them, “It is as simple as that.”

32. Mark A. Lutz and Kenneth Lux, The Challenge of Humanistic Economics (Menlo Park, Calif.: Benjamin/Cummings, 1979), pp. 83–84.

Once the secular humanistic economist acknowledges the fact—and for finite minds, it is a fact—that he cannot, as a scientist, measure subjective utility, and that he therefore cannot make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, most of what we know as modern economics disintegrates. Like an acid, the argument systematically and relentlessly erodes the philosophical, intellectual, and moral foundations of every economic doctrine that it touches, and it touches virtually every aspect of applied economics. It is the inescapable conclusion of all subjective value theory, yet it undermines the economics based—supposedly based—exclusively on the idea of subjective utility.

If there is only subjective value, then these values, unlike objective prices, cannot be compared. This is the thrust of Robbins’ argument. It is as impossible to measure subjective utility as it is to measure hate, love, or any other human emotion. A person can order his preferences, but he cannot measure them. No yardstick is available.

33. Ibid., p. 18.

34. Idem.

35. This was done. The policy led to an ecological catastrophe in the Sahel region of Africa. Claire Sterling, “The Making of a Sub-Saharan Wasteland,” The Atlantic (May 1974).

D. Comparing Statistical Aggregates

This being the case, the logic of subjective utility leads to some very unorthodox conclusions. For example, consider the possibility of nuclear war. Assume that war breaks out in Europe. All of France is destroyed, except for one man, who happens to love French wine more than anything on earth, and one enormous vat of his most loved wine. So large is this supply that he will be able to spend the remainder of his days consuming all he wants of this wine—the attainment of his lifelong dream. On the other hand, the United States is untouched by the war. All of its cities are intact; all of its capital structure is intact. Using the law of subjective value, with its corollary prohibiting the interpersonal comparison of subjective utilities, the fully consistent economist cannot say whether the Frenchman's capital is greater or less than the capital structure of the entire United States. Who is richer? We cannot say. We cannot legitimately, scientifically, economically compare the subjective utilities of over 300 million U. S. citizens and that single ecstatic Frenchman. Subjective utilities, being subjective, cannot be added up like a column of figures. The economist may intuitively know that the United States has more capital and wealth than "France," meaning that one happy Frenchman, but he cannot prove it using the laws of modern subjective economics.

Readers may think that this a frivolous example. It is anything but frivolous. A debate over its implications took place at a 1974 conference of Austrian School economists held at South Royalton, Vermont. Israel Kirzner, who took his Ph.D. under Mises, defended the idea that economists, as scientists, cannot state whether or not "France" has more capital and wealth than "the United States," because all such aggregates are fictions, and we cannot make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. Murray Rothbard, on the other hand, challenged this view as nonsensical. Of course the United States would be richer under such conditions. In short, Rothbard took the "common sense" position, while Kirzner remained true to the logic of subjective value theory.

It should be clear that Rothbard is correct. The United States would unquestionably be richer than France in the example. Yet our knowledge of this obvious truth cannot be proven, or even consistently defended, in terms of the subjectivist axiology (value theory) of modern economics. Kirzner's position is the systematic one.

We have to conclude that the problems associated with the interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility are presently unsolvable in some instances. The logic of the subjectivist position leads directly to intellectual dead-ends, or “nonsense.” As with purely objective explanations of value, the purely subjective explanations are equally contradictory in certain instances. The antinomies (contradictions) in the reasoning of self-proclaimed autonomous man are inescapable. No one can make intelligent, consistent, systematic judgments in every area of life by means of some hypothetically logical, hypothetically rational, hypothetically consistent version of pure autonomous thought and value. Each philosophical system disintegrates because of the contradictions of its own presuppositions and applications.

Kirzner discussed the theory of capital at some length in his book, An Essay on Capital (1966). He asked very pointed questions concerning capital per head in various nations. He also provided some unique answers. He wrote: “Is it really without meaning to say that the capital per head in country A is greater than in country B? Is it meaningless to attempt to explain the higher productivity of labor in country A by reference to the larger quantity of capital combined with each man-hour of labor? It is indeed difficult to deny that we, in fact, use aggregate concepts of capital in this manner; what is the meaning to be attached to such concepts, and how do they relate to the ‘individualistic’ concept of capital that has been adopted for the purpose of this essay?”³⁶ The consistency with which Kirzner answered his questions is unprecedented.

Careful reflection on the matter will, it is believed, reveal that the aggregate concept of capital, the “quantity of capital available to an economy as a whole,” is, for a market economy, a wholly artificial construct useful for making certain judgments concerning the progress and performance of the economy. When using this construct one is in fact viewing the economy in its entirety [entirety] as if it were not a market economy but instead a completely centralized economy over which the observer himself has absolute control and responsibility. . . . One is thus not merging the plans of all the individual capital owners who participate in the market economy, one is conceptually replacing these plans by a single master plan that one imagines to be relevant to the economy as a whole, and against which one gauges the performance of the economy as a whole.³⁷

We must ask Kirzner, how is it that such a “wholly artificial construct” that imagines that the economy is one vast outworking of a single economic plan—in contrast to the operations of the free market, with its multiple plans—should be “useful for making certain judgments concerning the progress and performance of the economy”? Why should such an artificial construct be deemed intellectually defensible? Why should it be useful? Why should defenders of the logic of the free market be forced to rely on a wholly artificial construct in order to make judgments in the area of applied economics? Is applied economics really applied economics? Is it not rather applied common sense? But must common sense be our only source of such judgments, when common sense apparently relies on the holism or collectivism of such a mental construct? Isn’t this artificial construct wholly in opposition to the presuppositions of free market economics, and in conflict with the methodological individualism of subjective value theory?

36. Israel Kirzner, An Essay on Capital (New York: Augustus Kelley, 1966), p. 120.

37. Ibid., pp. 120–21.

Kirzner actually identified this as a “holistic capital concept.” He spelled out the assumptions of such a holistic capital concept:

The truth is that the aggregate concept of capital has meaning only on assumptions according to which all parts of the capital stock are completely integrated with one another. Each piece of capital equipment in the stock is assumed to have been constructed as part of the same central plan which led to the rest of the stock. Each capital good has its part to play; no two capital goods have a function which precludes the full utilization as planned, of the other. But these conditions can exist in a market economy (in which planning is decentralized) only in the state of equilibrium [a technical concept which hypothesizes perfect foreknowledge on the part of everyone in the economy, a concept which Kirzner himself denies can ever be applied to the real world—G.N.]. The essential function of the market is, after all, to bring individual plans which do not mesh, into greater mutual coordination. So that it turns out that the aggregate concept of capital presupposes conditions that are not only violated in the real world, but which assume away some of the major problems which it is the task of a market theory of capital to elucidate.³⁸

Kirzner understood the implications of radical subjectivism in economics far better than the majority of his professional peers. He saw that in order to make accurate, meaningful comparisons of capital stocks, we must assume the existence of a comprehensive, omniscient, integrated plan that is made in advance and then executed perfectly by an omniscient planning agent. Yet this is precisely what the logic of the free market denies to man or any group of men. What, then, are we supposed to give up? Are we supposed to abandon our wholly common practice of comparing the value of capital stocks in different nations, or under different economic systems? Are we therefore supposed to cease comparing the output-per-unit-of-resource-input under socialism with output under capitalism? Are we supposed to abandon the impressive argument—impressive to common sense, anyway—that the high output of laborers who live in capitalist nations is due to the far higher investment in capital per capita in capitalist nations, compared to the low output and low per capita investment in socialist countries? These arguments rest on the “wholly artificial construct” of aggregate capital value, which is quite obviously based on a concept of objective economic value. On the other hand, must we abandon the key presupposition of modern free-market economics, namely, the concept of methodological individualism, which has as a corollary the idea of subjective economic value? Must we abandon the arguments of free market economists against the Marxists, who still cling to one version of objective value, namely, the labor theory of value—the very heart of classical economics’ value theory, against which modern economists, from Menger, Jevons, and Walras to the present, have reacted?

38. Ibid., pp. 121–22.

Modern economics thus faces a true intellectual dilemma. Economists may choose not to recognize it, but it is there nonetheless. The subjectivists have all accepted the use of statistical aggregates to one extent or another, even the supposedly “pure subjectivists” in the Austrian camp.³⁹ Yet their epistemology of methodological individualism categorically denies the possibility of meaning for such aggregates. There can be no interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, so the aggregates are economically meaningless.

Free market economists deny the logic of the single, unified economic plan. Yet all of them (except Kirzner) eventually point to the statistical results of socialism—the economy of the hypothetically unified economic plan—and the statistical results of capitalism—the economy built on the presupposition that there can be no coherent, systematic, unified economic plan—and conclude that the statistical results demonstrate the superiority in practice of capitalism. But the whole concept of “statistical results” requires the existence of objective, measurable economic value, and methodological individualism categorically denies the existence of objective, measurable economic value.

39. See, for example, the statement by Gerald P. O'Driscoll, Jr. and Sudha R. Shenoy: “However, after 1945, the problem turned around completely and became that of gently (and later, more rapidly) rising prices. In eleven major developed countries, prices declined hardly at all, and when they did, it was only for a couple of years during the early fifties. Prices remained stable for some years in several of these countries, but these periods of relative price stability were outnumbered by years of rising prices, so that in effect prices have been rising more or less steadily ever since the end of World War II.” O'Driscoll and Shenoy, “Inflation, Recession, and Stagflation,” in Edwin G. Dolan (ed.), The Foundations of Modern Austrian Economics (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed & Ward, 1976), pp. 186–87. Any discussion of rising prices involves the use of statistical aggregates, specifically, index numbers.

Equally ironic is the fact that defenders of socialist and Marxist economies, who affirm the validity of central economic planning, who deny methodological individualism, and who thereby affirm the existence of objective economic value and meaningful economic statistics, constantly deny the meaningfulness of their economies’ inferior economic performance, as measured by statistics. Such statistical measurements, they tend to argue, do not measure the “real” welfare provided to citizens of a particular socialist commonwealth. In other words, the aggregate statistical data are not “true” indicators of individual economic welfare inside socialist economies. There is something “extra” received daily by socialist citizens that is intensely valuable to them, but which somehow does not appear in the statistical data. The data therefore are insufficient to reveal the full benefits to the “whole man” under socialism.

What we find, then, is that the methodological individualists, whose intellectual presupposition denies the possibility of statistical aggregation, enjoy using statistics to criticize their socialistic opponents. The socialists, who are methodological collectivists (holists), are constantly seeking to deny the meaningfulness of embarrassing economic statistics, despite the fact that the very possibility of socialist planning requires the planning authorities to collect, interpret, and efficiently use economic statistics in the central planning process.

Then what is the solution to these intellectual dilemmas? How can we affirm man’s ability to make use of statistical aggregates, and at the same time keep our economics from drifting into the paradoxes of objective value theory, where “water” is supposed to be more valuable than “diamonds”? And how can we reconcile the fact that something objectively good, like the Bible, is worth less in a particular market than pornographic materials? Are there biblical answers to these apparently unanswerable intellectual problems?

E. A Biblical Solution

The Bible affirms man's ability to impute value, for man is made in the image of God, and God imputes value to His creation. The Bible affirms that there are absolute standards, meaning objective standards. Man is to think God's thoughts after Him. God created the universe in terms of His eternal, comprehensive plan. He sustains it, moment by moment. He is absolutely sovereign over it. No aspect of creation is outside His comprehensive knowledge and absolute control. Therefore, the mind of God integrates all facts and judges all facts in terms of His perfect plan.

Men cannot make absolute, comprehensive value imputations, since men are creatures. But as limited creatures they can make value imputations that are valid in God's eyes, and before the rebellion of man in the garden, this is what man did. Each man still makes these value imputations, and man, as a creature responsible to God, cannot escape the revelation and restraint of God. Men do make value imputations. They live and act in terms of God's laws, either as rebels or faithful men. As living creatures, they must deal with the universe as it objectively exists, if they wish to succeed. They must interpret the information they receive from the universe through their senses, and they must interpret correctly—meaning objectively, meaning in terms of God's law-order for His universe—if they are to remain successful. Thus, their subjective interpretations are supposed to conform to the objective standards that God requires for man, who is made in His image.

There is an overall economic plan in God's mind. This forces men, to some degree, to conform themselves to this plan and to adjust their plans in terms of it. We can therefore say along with Kirzner that in order to make assessments of comparative wealth, there must be a single, integrated plan. Furthermore, unlike Kirzner, we can say that such a plan exists. As creatures made in God's image, we can make at least reasonable, useful estimations of the value of capital or other goods, even though we could not do so legitimately if all value were exclusively subjective, as if there were no overall plan of God.

Economists are generally self-consciously atheistic in their presuppositions. Man, and man alone, supposedly does the imputing of value. Yet, at the same time, economists use such mental aggregate constructs as "capital," "income," "national income," and "productivity." None of these mental constructs is valid, given the logic of modern subjectivism, yet the economists use them constantly. Professor Mises, an important figure in the development of modern subjectivism, and perhaps the most important figure if we are to believe the assessment of his more famous disciple, F. A. Hayek,⁴⁰ argued throughout his career against the validity of all aggregates in economics, yet when he attempted to explain the productivity of workers under capitalism, he used the concept of per capita capital investment: “What constitutes the greater wealth of a capitalistic society as against the smaller wealth of a noncapitalistic society is the fact that the available supply of capital goods is greater in the former than in the latter. What has improved the wage earners’ standard of living is the fact that the capital equipment per head of the men eager to earn wages increased.”⁴¹

If one adheres to a subjective theory of value, how is it possible to divide actual machines by actual workers? Kirzner explicitly denied that such a procedure is legitimate, unless it is confined to a single worker and his equipment.⁴² Can we measure capital in terms of money? Mises seemed to think so, but how could he? The purchasing power of money is constantly changing, as Mises’ book The Theory of Money and Credit (1912) explains so brilliantly. You can construct a price index, of course, to measure the rise and fall of prices, but we are then back to a statistical aggregate, which Mises explicitly rejected.⁴³ Furthermore, money invested in capital may well be malinvested, such as in the years preceding a depression, another insight developed by Mises.⁴⁴ The capital value really may be zero or less—a looming loss—under such conditions.

Given the logic of subjective value theory, how can one speak of increasing per capita wealth, increasing per capita output, or per capita anything else? How can we legitimately compare the economic output of a socialist nation with a capitalist one? What is a “nation”? How can 40. Hayek, Counter-Revolution of Science, p. 210, footnote 25.

41. Ludwig von Mises, The Anti-Capitalist Mentality (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1956), p. 89. (<http://bit.ly/MisesAnti>) Cf. Mises, Socialism: An Economic and Sociological Analysis (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1922] 1951), p. 459. (<http://bit.ly/MisesSoc>)

42. Kirzner, Essay on Capital, pp. 105–7. (<http://bit.ly/Mises1922>)

43. Mises did admit some minor validity to a price index as an historical tool, although it is not clear why such an index should be valid in retrospect: The Theory of Money and Credit (Irvington, New York: Foundation for Economic Education, [1912] 1971), pp. 187–90. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTMC>) For his general critique of statistical aggregates, see Human Action (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. XVI, sec. 5. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

44. Mises, Human Action, ch. XX, sec. 6.

we accurately individuate the units being compared? How can we measure any change over time? How can we measure anything without a fixed measuring device, something which is explicitly denied by the logic of subjective value theory? In short, how can the defenders of capitalism legitimately use any aggregate statistics to prove their case? As economists, they must remain as silent as a Zen Buddhist master. They never do, of course.

Kirzner, however, came close to the ideal of silence. He said that capital estimates are valid only when made by individual entrepreneurs concerning the estimated present and future values of their own capital stock. Presumably, an entrepreneur could make estimates of his rivals' stocks, but only in terms of the effects of their stocks on the value of his. Kirzner was forthright: "Individual forward-looking measurement is both possible and feasible, because the problem of possibly inconsistent plans does not arise. An individual evaluates each component of his capital stock in terms of the plans he has in mind; he may have to take care to avoid possible inconsistencies, but in appraising his measurement of his capital we may assume that he has successfully integrated his own plans."⁴⁵ Yet this assumption cannot possibly be made by an outsider. How can we know anything about whether or not he has integrated his plans? He may be a madman. He may be misforecasting the state of the free market and the value of his capital. The free market may make hash of his plans. He is not omniscient, even in his own limited sphere of influence. Where is the standard of measurement? Where is the objective reference point? The market? But the market is supposedly purely the product of multiple plans, many of them mutually contradictory (one man bets that wheat prices will rise, while another plans in terms of a fall in wheat prices). As Kirzner has shown, we cannot make assessments of capital value by aggregating market prices for capital goods.⁴⁶ So how does the individual evaluate the value of his capital? By use of the market, Mises has stated so clearly: without a market, no such evaluation is possible, a fact argued by Mises as early as 1920,⁴⁷ and one which he once immodestly claimed "is certainly the most important discovery made by economic theory.”⁴⁸ Mises clearly stated that in human affairs, “The truth is that there are only variables and no constants.”⁴⁹

45. Kirzner, "The Theory of Capital," in Dolan (ed.), Foundations of Modern Austrian Economics, p. 142. (<http://bit.ly/KirznerToC>)

46. Kirzner, Essay on Capital, pp. 120ff.

47. Ludwig von Mises, "Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth," (1920), in F. A. Hayek (ed.), Collectivist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1935] 1963). (<http://mises.org/econcalc.asp>)

Is it surprising, then, that his disciple Kirzner should throw out Mises’ inconsistently held idea that there is some meaning to the words “per capita capital”? As Kirzner concluded: “Underlying statements that compare the quantity of capital in one country with that in another is a convenient and relatively harmless fiction.”⁵⁰ He politely dismissed Mises’ argument by means of Mises’ other arguments. Yet he was too polite; such a comparison is more than a harmless fiction. In terms of the logic of subjective economics, it is nothing short of a subterfuge, a sleight-of-hand deception to be used by capitalism’s defenders to dismiss the arguments of their socialist opponents. Most capitalists point to capitalism’s productivity as a major defense of capitalism, yet the logic of modern economics denies that such a conclusion can be reached using the logic of subjective value theory. Consistent subjectivism denies the validity of all such comparisons.

Hayek stated that “every important advance in economic theory during the last hundred years was a further step in the consistent application of subjectivism.”⁵¹ He wrote those words in 1952. It would seem that we have reached the end of the road, or at least a major fork in the road, for subjectivism. It, too, has run directly into the implications of its own presuppositions. Pure subjectivism makes lonely solipsists of us all, with no way for us to test our generalizations or compare the products of our hands, let alone the products of billions of other human beings. When Mises wrote that “the macroeconomic concept of national income is a mere political slogan devoid of any cognitive value,”⁵² he simultaneously denied the validity of all statistical comparisons of the productivity of nations, including his own comparisons.

All of this may seem like academic hair-splitting, as indeed it is. All scholarship, all intelligent pursuit of truth, eventually gets involved in hair-splitting. But the point I am trying to make is not merely technical; it is fundamental. Purely “objective” theories of value produce incongruous conclusions, so the promoters of such theories have always

48. Mises, Epistemological Problems in Economics, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1933] 2003), p. 166. (<http://bit.ly/MisesEPE>)

49. Mises, Theory and History, p. 12.

50. Kirzner, “Theory of Capital,” p. 142.

51. Hayek, Counter-Revolution of Science, p. 31.

52. Mises, The Ultimate Foundation of Economic Science (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1962), p. 87. (<http://bit.ly/MisesUFES>) returned to the market forces of supply and demand to explain prices. But the market's evaluation of price and value is not stable, since conditions change. It is therefore not an objective source of value. On the other hand, subjective value theory's success in explaining the way in which the market operates has not overcome the inherent contradictions of radical subjectivism. Economic theory in a purely subjectivist mold cannot legitimately say anything about aggregates. It cannot make comparisons about wealth over time, or wealth across borders. Neither system of value theory can survive by itself, and the proponents of each theory borrow liberally from the methodology and conclusions of the other.

Conclusion

Point four of God's covenant structure is judgment, or sanctions. God evaluates His creation continually in terms of His purposes, decree, and covenant requirements. Men are made in God's image, so we necessarily must judge in history. The Bible says that redeemed mankind will judge the angels (I Cor. 6:3). Life for the covenant-keeper is a training ground for rendering better judgments.⁵³ In the field of economics, this means that men can and must impute value to scarce economic resources. As creatures made in the image of God, we can impute value to economic goods. We can trade with others at discrete prices. These prices are the product of competitive bargaining among acting men. We can record such prices. We can also make rough estimates of aggregates of these prices, and make rough estimates of the meaning attached to such aggregates by other acting men.

The constant factor in market imputations over time is therefore the image of God in men, as far as our assessment of other people's imputation of meaning is concerned. The ultimate constant is God's evaluation of worth and His plan. There is objective value in the universe, and men, to one degree or another, must conform themselves to, or react against, this standard of value. Mises was correct in his attempt to compare the wealth and output of socialist and capitalist nations, just as Rothbard was correct in concluding that the capital of the United States would be worth more than one vat of French wine. But the accuracy of their conclusions is in sharp contrast to their presuppositions concerning subjective value theory.

The Bible invites us to make such comparisons. We are specifically told that the economic productivity of a godly society will be greater than the long-run productivity of rebellious societies (Deut. 8:11–18; Ezek. 36). We are able to make such estimates because there really is a single, consistent, comprehensive plan, and a single Planner who has made economic assessments in terms of an omniscient plan. All capital belongs to the ultimate Planner (Ps. 50:10).⁵⁴ The forward-looking plan is God's (Isa. 45:1–8). God knows all things, and some of these things are revealed to us, though not all of them (Deut. 29:29). We can make rough estimates of economic and statistical aggregates, because there is an integrated plan, and because we are made in the image of the Planner.

53. See Appendix E: "Witnesses and Judges."

Because there is an imputing, planning, creative, sovereign God, there can also be an imputing, planning, derivatively creative mankind. Because there is objective value based on the acts of creation and imputation by God, there can be a science of applied economics, and not just solipsistic, subjectivist economic theory that is divorced from all statistical aggregations. There is objective value, which is based on the Creator's value standards and the unity of God's comprehensive plan. There are subjective values believed and held among men because each man is a responsible person before God.

This leads to a uniquely biblical principle of economic science. The image of God in men is the metaphysical foundation of economic thought and action. Without this basis for our knowledge and valuation, there could be no consistent, rational science of economics.⁵⁵

The heart of man's problem is not metaphysics, meaning the reality of man's being and the underlying foundation of existence. Man's problem is ethics: obedience to God. The closer that men come to obeying the terms of God's covenant, the closer their judgments will conform to the God-created reality. Men are given the ability to make judgments. As rebels, they make poor, inaccurate judgments. They do not meet God's standards. These inaccurate judgments (preferences) are reflected in market pricing and profitability.

Ethical rebellion eventually produces intellectual chaos. Men reject the creation as it truly is because it reflects God (Rom. 1:18–22). Their eyes are then darkened. Marxist, socialist, and Keynesian economics are inaccurate precisely to the degree that they reject God's assessment of ethical cause and effect in man's environment. The breakdown of modern economic thought is the result of the covenant-denying pre-suppositions of the economists. Economies that are constructed in terms of these ethically rebellious theories suffer painful consequences. Mises called planned economies “planned chaos.” He was correct.

54. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

55. See Appendix B, "The Evolutionists' Defense of the Market."

6

GOD'S WEEK AND MAN'S WEEK

Thus the heavens and the earth were finished and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God had created and made (Gen. 2:1–3).

The theocentric principle here is the judgment of God. He assessed His work: completed. Then He rested: a positive sanction from Himself to Himself. This is point four of the biblical covenant model: sanctions.¹

This is an exceedingly controversial theological topic. It has important implications for modern business practices: the sabbath. A full consideration of its business implications must be deferred until the exegesis of Exodus 20:8–11.² At this point, it is more important to consider the sabbath in relation to Adam and his dominion responsibilities.

A. Judgment

We are told that, at the end of the sixth day, God saw everything that He had made, and that it was very good (Gen. 1:31). The whole creation was without a flaw. By “whole creation,” I mean the earth, the inhabitants of the earth, and the physical celestial bodies. We are not explicitly informed about the condition of the angelic host. We are not told that Satan had fallen, along with his followers, although some Christian expositors have assumed that this event had already taken place prior to the sixth day, perhaps even before the creation of the earth in Genesis 1:1.³ But we know that the physical creation was perfect and complete with respect to its component parts. It was not fully developed historically, but it was complete as far as God's original creative activity was concerned. Man, however, had not yet begun his full-scale dominion assignment.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus, 6 vols. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion (1986), ch. 24.

Adam had not participated in the acts of creation. He had been wholly passive in the creation of Eve, providing his rib. He had been active in a preliminary assignment, though dependent: the naming of the animals (Gen. 2:20). A recapitulation of his efforts on the sixth day is provided in Genesis 2. His wife was given to him only after he had fulfilled the original assignment, a subject which will be considered in greater detail in the exegesis of Genesis 2:20–23.⁴ He had to complete this one task before he was given his wife. He had become aware of his need for a helper especially designed by God to complement his efforts. He needed to recognize the economic potential of the division of labor. God announced that it is not good for a man to live alone (Gen. 2:18). He then brought the animals to Adam for naming (classification), which Adam did (2:20). Adam received empirical evidence of the incompleteness of the human species. The animals were in male-female pairs. Adam, at that stage, was alone. He worked alone. Something was missing. God had announced Adam's incompleteness be-

3. Because we are not told specifically about the creation of the angelic host, we can only speculate about the time, or pre-time, of their creation. But since the angels are often associated with the stars (Jud. 5:20; Dan. 8:10; Matt. 29:29; Jude 13; Rev. 1:20; 3:1; 6:13; 8:12, etc.), and the stars were created on the fourth day, it is reasonable to assume that this was the day of the creation of the angels, whose purposes include the worship of God and service to man. If this is the case, then the rebellion of the satanic host probably occurred on the morning of the first sabbath, just prior to man's rebellion. We are certainly not told in the Bible of any function of the angels that necessarily pre-dated the creation of the physical universe. Their close association with man's purposes points to their inclusion in the week of the creation. Satan believed that he could inherit Adam's lawful inheritance if he could successfully place Adam beneath him covenantally. If Adam would subordinate himself to Satan's covenant, then Satan could exercise control over everything that God had assigned to Adam as part of the dominion covenant. Satan was successful in his attempt. Only when Jesus came to reclaim the lost inheritance as the "second Adam" did Satan's title to the world require a second temptation. He tempted Jesus to worship him, and promised him the world (Matt. 4:9). Jesus rebuked the devil, died and rose again, and willed the reclaimed inheritance to His people. See Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>) forehand, and Adam could see it. He needed help. He needed a helper.

4. Chapter 10.

Adam and Eve rested on the seventh day of the creation. They had not worked as a team yet, but they were nevertheless the recipients of a day of rest. God's first week was complete. Adam and Eve saw the tail end of that original week. They knew that God's week involved a day of rest on the final day.

B. Life and Rest

This raises an important point. The first full day of life for mankind was a day of rest, a sabbath. The seventh day was God's day of rest, or cessation from His creation work. Man had seen part of the sixth day. Adam had worked briefly as a kind of apprentice under God's immediate supervision. God had brought the animals to Adam. But the seventh day for God's creation week was the first full day for mankind. It was a day of rest.

Man's week was therefore fundamentally different from God's week. God's week was wholly the product of God's creative acts. It ended with God's resting from His acts of creation. Man's week, on the other hand, began with rest. Man was wholly dependent on God. Man was not originally creative. Man could not legitimately claim to be the source of his environment, the source of meaning, the source of power, or the source of any aspect of the creation. Man began where God left off. Man was not originally creative; he was subordinate and re-creative.

How would man regard the day following the sabbath? Would he view it as the second day of man's week, a day of re-creative activity which followed a day of rest? Or would he view it as the first day of man's week, a day of man's original and autonomous creative activity? In other words, would man view his week as subordinate to God, beginning on God's seventh day, the day of rest? Or would he view his week as if he himself were God, launching a new program of creation, just as God had launched a week earlier?

The eighth day was to have been Adam's second day of the week, covenant man's week. By acknowledging his total dependence on God as a creature, and by acknowledging that his week began with a day of rest, Adam would have proclaimed his status as a covenant-keeper. The day following the seventh day of God's original week was to begin man's workweek.⁵ Man had to begin work on that eighth day.⁶ The question was: Would man begin as a covenant-keeper or a covenant-breaker? Man's ethical status before God would determine whether man would regard the eighth day (the day following God's sabbath) as his second day of the week or his first. Would he regard the day of rest as the foundation of man's week or the culmination? It had been the culmination of God's original week. Would Adam attempt to assert his own autonomy, as if he were God, and announce the inauguration of autonomous man's week by regarding the seventh day as man's first workday of the week?

C. Rebellion and Negative Sanctions

The question arises: How soon did man rebel? This is a speculative question. We have no explicit revelation. We can make intelligent guesses based on the testimony of the Bible, but we are not told for certain. What I am offering here as a possible answer, it must be understood, is only speculation on my part.

Adam and Eve probably sinned on the first sabbath day. There are

5. Adam's labor on the sixth day constituted a partial fulfillment of the dominion assignment. Eve was not present yet. Because the dominion covenant was made between God and mankind as a species—"and let them have dominion" (Gen. 1:26a)—Adam was working as the representative head of the family. The naming of the animals should not be considered as the equivalent of the full-scale dominion assignment, for man was still an apprentice. He was being taught a lesson concerning his incomplete status. God brought the animals to Adam (Gen. 2:19), indicating the preliminary status of his efforts. He was not yet fully on his own as a spatially (or ethically, or metaphysically) independent agent. God was still close to him in a way which was not the case when the serpent approached the pair. The apprenticeship stage was followed by his time in the garden as a training camp. This, in turn, was to have been followed by the spread of mankind across the face of the earth. Man did not remain in the garden long. If my thesis is correct, he was there less than one full working day. God came before them in the cool of the day (Gen. 3:8a), and this could have been the morning rather than the evening. I believe that it was more likely the evening than the morning. They were expelled from the garden as the day was ending—a day of judgment.

6. The concept of the eighth day goes back to the earliest writings of the church fathers. The Epistle of Barnabas, which may have been written as early as 100 A.D., summarized God's words regarding the sabbath: "Your present Sabbaths are not acceptable to me, but that is which I have made [namely this,] when, giving rest to all things, I shall make a beginning of the eighth day, that is, a beginning of another world." Epistle XV, in Rev. Alexander Roberts and James Donaldson (eds.), The Ante-Nicene Fathers (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1885] 1979), I, p. 147. Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho, written in the mid-second century, spoke of the Christian sabbath: "For the first day after the Sabbath, remaining the first of all the days, is called, however, the eighth, according to the number of all the days of the cycle, and [yet] remains the first." Dialogue, XLI, in Ante-Nicene Fathers, I, p. 215.

reasons for this conclusion. They were told that on the day that they sinned, they would surely die (Gen. 2:17). The tree of the knowledge of good and evil was prohibited. It was "off limits." They were to subdue the earth to God's glory, but they were initially to labor with this prohibition in front of them. It constituted a limit on what they were allowed to do.

Man is not a static being. He develops. He learns. That was why God put Adam and Eve in the garden. They were to learn about the tasks of dominion in a beautiful setting, so that they could eventually venture out into the world to subdue it. The longer that Adam and Eve continued as faithful stewards to God, the more ingrained the habits of obedience would become. That, of course, is what a training camp is supposed to teach new apprentices or recruits. The longer that they continued as obedient servants, the more difficult it would have been for them to break the pattern of obedience. Clearly, the sooner that Satan lured them into open rebellion, the easier it would be for him. It would be easier to tempt them successfully, and it would be easier to replace any habits of obedience with habits of disobedience. The biblical principle is stated in Proverbs: "Train up a child in the way he should go: and when he is old, he will not depart from it" (22:6). If this is a general rule for the fallen sons of fallen man, how much more true of sinless Adam and Eve?

Second, not only is man a developing being, but he is a mortal being. If sin must be visited with death, then they would need the mercy of God the moment they transgressed if they were not to die physically that very day. There could be no period of suspended judgment on God's part. They would either receive mercy that day, or they would die that day. In short, they would need a substitutionary sacrifice.

What do we know of God's sacrificial system? We know that all male children in Israel had to be circumcised. This ritual had to be performed on newborn male infants on the eighth day (Lev. 12:3). Furthermore, the sacrifice of the firstborn male animals of Israel also had to be made on the eighth day (Ex. 22:30). The mother of the animal could keep it for seven days; she lost it forever on the eighth. The mother of the Hebrew boy could cuddle him as he had been born for seven days; on the eighth day, he was taken from her and physically marred. There was sorrow for mothers in Israel. God reminded them of their sinfulness, and of the sin of their mother, Eve. They were reminded graphically of the blood that has to be shed for the remission of sins (Heb. 9:22).

The ultimate sacrifice, of course, was Jesus Christ, whose blood was shed for the remission of sins (Matt. 26:28). He rose on the first day of the week, the day after the Hebrew sabbath, the day of rest. He inaugurated the restored week, the new beginning. The Christian sabbath is the first day of the week, the new beginning. The Christian sabbath is the first day of the week, for our rest is in principle established. Christ has overcome the world. No longer do we proclaim autonomous man's week. Christ, the perfect human, has re-established redeemed man's week. The day of rest for man is the first day of the week, the eighth day. Man now has a covering for his original transgression.

Christians should understand that the eighth day is a day of rest for us because the seventh was the day of Adam's sin. Adam announced by his self-proclaimed autonomous action in eating the forbidden fruit that he would be as God, that he would inaugurate man's week: six days of labor followed by a day of rest. His week would imitate God's original week, for he was imitating God.

He thought he needed no rest as a creature; he could begin as an originally creative being. The seventh day ought to be his first day of the week, a day of original, autonomous work. He could then rest at the end of the week, as God had rested, when his work was finished. He would complete his own work, announce its perfection, and then rest, just as God had done. He did not begin with rest, nor did he begin with a perfect environment provided to him by God, Adam proclaimed. He began his week by means of his own labor, and to prove his full independence, he began with a violation of God's covenant.

God, in effect, "rubbed man's nose" in his own rebellion. God established the six-and-one pattern as a requirement for man, until the day of redemption came in history. Covenant-keeping man in the Old Testament era would begin work on the seventh day, and his rest could come only at the end of his labors. Man's life would be a life of labor, not beginning with a day of rest, but promising rest only at the end of man's days. Man's rest, even for a covenanted man, would come only at the end. The six days of labor symbolized man's rebellious week, a week begun autonomously, denying the reality of that first full day of rest which prepared man for his week of service. Man turned his back on that first sabbath; God then did the same for man. "Your rest will come at the end of your days, after death has cut you off in the midst of your days." The six-and-one framework was a blessing, for it promised covenant man eventual rest, but it was also a curse: it delayed man's day of rest. Man wanted to be as God, resting at the end of his week of labor. God allowed him to achieve his goal, but only through grace: rest at the end of man's week (life).

Man announced that he, autonomously, would begin his creation week on the seventh day. God's curse on Adam was that his work would henceforth be burdened. Man wanted to demonstrate his own creativity. God showed him how limited he was as a creature, making him struggle with the creation. Man had received a completed, perfect creation as God's gift. It awaited him for the eighth day of history, his second day of the week. Adam spurned the gift, choosing to regard himself as the creator. The cursed earth now serves as a testimony to man of the difficulties of creation, even in an environment that had been completed by God.

Adam's first full day of life was also his first day of sin and judgment. What he failed to see was that his life and his rest were linked. By denying the validity of his rest, he denied the foundation of his life. God cursed man. Every man who is not given life is also not given rest. He shall have no rest in eternity, for autonomous man is not the source of life, nor can he complete his work and take his own day of rest. Regenerate men will receive rest, and therefore eternal life, but only after their days of earthly life are over. The promised day of rest at the end of the week was a promised day of redemption at the end of time. Covenant men were to understand from the six-and-one framework that the day of redemption was in the future. It should have been clear to them that once the day of the Lord (the Lord's day) was revealed in history, the original standard for man's week would then be re-established: one and six.

God honors His plan of history. Man can never escape the testimony of his rebellion. He rebelled and died spiritually on the seventh day. He needs hope in a new life (resurrection) on the eighth day. Christ's resurrection on the eighth day gives covenantally faithful men this hope. They must regard this day as their new day of life. Because of Adam's sin in history, covenant man cannot ever return to the seventh day as his first day of the week (first full day of life). He fell. His day of life depends on Jesus Christ. Therefore, his day of rest is now the eighth day of the week, resurrection day, or the Lord's day. This begins redeemed man's week.

D. A New Day of Rest for a New Humanity

By establishing the first day of the week as the day of rest, Christ and the church assert the new humanity. Redeemed man begins on a new foundation. No longer is he autonomous. No longer does he claim to be able to create a new heaven and a new earth by means of his own autonomous labor. As long as men attempt to imitate God, beginning their week in terms of their own strength, they are doomed to failure. Men must rest on Christ's sacrifice, and in hope of the resurrection, Christ's firstfruits offering. On the day following the sabbath at the end of Passover week, the Israelites offered a firstfruits offering (Lev. 23:10–11). On that day, when the sheaf offering was waved, a lamb was sacrificed (Lev. 23:12). Paul refers to "Christ the firstfruits" (I Cor. 15:23). This firstfruits offering was therefore made on the eighth day. The hope in "Christ the firstfruits" is redeemed man's hope for the resurrection: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming" (I Cor. 15:22–23). Redeemed man's hope is focused on the meaning of the eighth day. Adam died on God's seventh day, the self-proclaimed first day of fallen man's week; Christ arose on the eighth day, the God-proclaimed first day of man's week.

1. The Temptation

Why the eighth day? The Bible points to the sin of man on Adam's proclaimed first day of his week of creation, or better put, on the first day of man's first week of fully responsible dominion. The first week had been God's week exclusively. He rested on the seventh day. He removed Himself from the physical presence of Adam and Eve. It was their first full day of life. Adam had served as an apprentice the previous day, but on the seventh day, he and his wife received their independence. God would see how they would handle temptation. They did not handle it well. They sinned. He returned to judge them in the evening. This is why the sabbath is "the day of the Lord," meaning judgment day. (The church recognizes this in the sacrament of the communion meal, which is preceded by self-judgment.)

Adam also should have rested and judged, just as God did. As God's delegated representative, Adam should have killed Satan's representative agent, the serpent, at the time of the temptation. He could then have waited for God to return to render judgment on this act.⁷ Having condemned the serpent, he and Eve could then have had a communion meal with God (as the church does covenantally: Lord's Supper) at the tree of life. Instead, they had communion at the forbidden tree—a satanic communion, like the one forbidden by Paul in I Corinthians 10:20–21.

Adam rebelled against God. The serpent had told Eve that on the day the two of them ate of the forbidden fruit, they would become as gods (Gen. 3:5). What had they both learned about God's activity? They knew that He had created the world in six days. They had not been present at the creation, but they had seen part of the sixth day of the week. They could begin their first week as subordinates to God or as imitation gods. They could rest, and the next day begin to work under the authority of God, or they could attempt to establish themselves as sovereign creators apart from God and in rebellion against God. By resting on that seventh day, waiting one day to begin work, they could begin the dominion assignment in the second week of the earth's history, clearly derivative in their authority. On the other hand, by rebelling they could declare a new creation, a new beginning, as autonomous creators. They could declare "man's week" as an alternative to, and a program superior to, God's week. Would man begin the full-scale tasks of dominion by acknowledging his secondary importance in the second week, or would he deny the relevance of the week that had preceded "man's week"?

If he chose to become the new god, he would have to act fast. In fact, his first act would have to be an act of rebellion, in order to establish man's first day of sovereign lordship over his new creation. For the serpent to make an effective case for rebellion, he would have had to approach Eve on the morning of the seventh day, the first day of man's week. To interrupt man's labors mid-week would have meant that man had labored for part of his first week under God's sovereign authority. Obviously, at least part of the week would have been visibly God's week, not man's. So, Satan probably began his temptation on the morning of the seventh day.

2. A Day of Rest

Totally sovereign over history, resting assured, God rested the seventh day. Autonomous man cannot rest in confidence that his labors will be successful. He dares not “waste” time. He cannot afford to waste any resource as precious as time. Covenant man can rest on God’s sabbath, for he knows that God is sovereign, and that he, as God’s obedient subordinate, possesses the grace of God. His work will persevere. He can enjoy the day of rest because he knows that every week is God’s week. The law of God is his tool of dominion, and he knows that the law of God is in conformity to the operations of the world. He does not have to labor seven days a week in order for God to bless his efforts as dominion man. He is subordinate to God, so he can be confident as a dominion man over God’s creation. Covenant man enjoys his rest.

7. See Appendix E, "Witnesses and Judges."

Autonomous man’s week never ends. The eighth day is like the sixth day, and the seventh day is like the second day. The week is never-ending, and the work is never-ending. Man’s week is not a week at all; it is a life of frantic labor, for man must establish his dominion over foreign territory—God’s creation—in terms of antinomian rebellion. Biblical law is man’s tool of dominion, so the task becomes an ever-greater burden as rebellious man departs more and more from God’s revealed law-order. There is no day of rest—psychological, confident rest—in man’s week. Covenant-breaking man cannot enjoy his rest as a zero-cost blessing.

Satan wanted to make man his slave. He wanted to drive his new slave unmercifully, just as the Pharaoh of the oppression wanted the Hebrews to serve as slaves, and the Pharaoh of the exodus did with his Hebrew slaves (Ex. 5:5–14). God wants servants; Satan wants slaves. God wants men to prosper and rest; Satan wants men to fail and bleed at their labors. God’s week gives covenant man confidence in his own labors, for it gives him a day of rest. Satan’s week—for man’s week apart from God is Satan’s week, ethically—is a week without confidence or rest.

Man sinned, and he sinned early. He did not taste the fruits of righteousness for eons before he rebelled. He went straight to the forbidden fruit, in a rebellious assertion of his own autonomy. He was not content with the glorious rest he had been offered. He had been offered a taste of the fruits of labor, a rest without a week of human labor preceding it. God had shown him what lay ahead, if only he would conform his heart and his labor to Him. Like a dessert before the meat and potatoes, God had offered Adam and Eve the blessing of godly rest. In the face of this, they turned their backs on God and declared man’s week. They converted man’s day of rest into a day of seeming economic loss, for man would henceforth be faced with alternative costs. For every hour he remained at rest, man would lose the income that an hour's labor might have produced.

Outside the covenant, man can no longer count on the fixed relationship between God's law and God's blessings. Outside the covenant, rebellious man can no longer rest assured that his rest will have its reward. In man's week, men are faced with a decision: steal time from God's sabbath rest, but increase their short-run income; or forfeit short-run income on the day of rest, but reap the rewards of faithfulness that God promises to His covenantally faithful people. Had Adam not rebelled, he would not have acknowledged the validity of this choice. He would have rested, confident that he was not stealing from God, and confident that he was not forfeiting any income that he might otherwise have earned. He would have known the fruits of righteousness. His day of rest would never have appeared to him as an expense, but as a blessing from God. In God's week, the day of rest is an unmitigated blessing, a cost-free blessing, not a day for agonizing over the costs of resting (the forfeited economic benefits of working). When Adam declared man's week, he robbed himself of a blessing he might have experienced: a day of rest that is free of charge.

E. Life, Sabbath, Dominion

While the one-six and six-one patterns are those that we associate with a week, we should also recognize the life-sabbath-dominion pattern of three days. Adam was created on the sixth day. He served briefly as an apprentice under God, getting a taste of the nature of God's dominion assignment. He should have rested the next day, his first full day of life. This can also be understood as the second of three days. The third day, he was to have begun his work. He was to have begun as a covenant-keeper. His dominion assignment would have brought fulfillment to him, for his work was to have been meaningful and blessed by God. The second day, given this three-day framework, he rebelled. But his life was to have been marked by the initial three-day pattern: preliminary labor as an immediate subordinate to God, rest the next day, and dominion labor as God's agent on the third day. In short, life, sabbath, dominion.

We see this same pattern in Christ's work of redemption. On the day before the Pharisees' sabbath, He was taken to the cross and executed, suffering for the sake of His people. He had served throughout

His life as a suffering servant of God, and this act of sacrifice on the final day of His pre-resurrection life was the essence of His redemptive work on earth. The next day, His body rested in the tomb. This was the sabbath day.

Christ's sabbath rest was spent in the presence of God. He told the thief on the cross, "To day shalt thou be with me in paradise" (Luke 23:43). His earthly body rested in the tomb, but His disembodied soul had fellowship with God for the entire sabbath. Perfect rest and perfect fellowship: here is the heart of the sabbath. Christ, because of His death, fulfilled perfectly the terms of the sabbath. The third day, he rose from the dead. He had been cut off in His prime; now He lived again, ready to inaugurate the dominion phase of His life through the church, His body (I Cor. 12:12–20). All power was given to Him (Matt. 28:18).⁸ The day after the sabbath, therefore, was the third day, yet it was also the eighth day, the first day of redeemed man's new week. So we see a fusion: third day, eighth day, and first day. Christ's resurrection re-established the pattern of Adam's life that had been God's original requirement: a day of life, a full day of rest, and a day of dominion under God. Our new life in Christ is celebrated now on the first day of the week.

Because Christ's new life is imparted to His people through regeneration, we can serve as dominion men, in time and on earth. Our sabbath is now (Heb. 4:1–11), so we can rest spiritually, but at the same time, we are exercising our dominion responsibilities. We are dominion-minded because we have the mind of Christ (I Cor. 2:16). He has conquered Satan, so we in principle have conquered. We have the down payment (earnest) of our inheritance in Christ (Eph. 1:14). This means that we have a down payment on our future era of sabbath rest, which is also an era of total dominion. We work now, yet we also rest now. Our rest is not perfect, nor is our dominion perfect, but as we work out our salvation with fear and trembling, we learn the meaning of both rest and dominion.

Conclusion

The foundation of dominion under Christ is rest in Christ. The basis of our new life in Christ is His resurrection. He rose on the third day after His life ended, thereby covering the sin of Adam, who rebelled the day after he had been given life, assuming my previous argumentation is correct concerning the day of Adam's Fall. Christ calls us to rest on the first day because God wants us to acknowledge ritually that the basis of dominion is our commitment to God, who provides everything for us, including life, before our dominion assignment even begins. We begin with rest, as Adam was supposed to have done. We view the day of true life as our sabbath day, our day of confident rest in Christ, which can be seen as the eighth day and also as our first day of the week, redeemed man's week.

8. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

Adam announced his autonomy when he inaugurated man's week. It began with work, but it was Adam's autonomous, rebellious work. Prior to the coming of Christ, God made His people adhere to a sabbath plan: rest on the seventh day. Their rest was always before them at the end of the week. God was telling them graphically that their ultimate rest in Him was also being delayed. Then came Jesus Christ. His resurrection on the first day of the week, the day after the Passover sabbath, the eighth day, brought God's promised rest to His adopted sons. Their rest is now assured. The proof of this rest is Jesus Christ. He came in history, so the promised rest is, in principle, manifested in the past. We celebrate our rest on the first day of the week now. Christians announce their reliance on Christ's work by resting on the first (eighth) day of the week. They no longer claim autonomy. They, as the former sons of the first Adam, no longer declare their creative independence by working the first day of the week, as Adam did. Redeemed man's week begins with rest, in full assurance that God's providence will sustain him and prosper him. Unredeemed man's week begins with labor. The Jews hope for the promised future rest, and they still celebrate the seventh day sabbath. The pagans, unless influenced by Jews or Christians, or unless influenced by the Islamic imitation of both "religions of the Book," which celebrates its rest on the sixth day (Friday), still cling to their autonomy, still drive themselves mercilessly. Autonomous man's week is a full seven days, and autonomous man will never achieve rest.

THE VALUE OF GOLD

And the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx stone (Gen. 2:12).

The theocentric principle here is the doctrine of God's imputation: rendering judgment. This is an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant model: judgment.¹

In describing the land of Havilah, Moses singles out its supplies of precious metal and stones. (Some think bdellium was a plant or plant byproduct.) This is the sole reference to inanimate objects prior to the rebellion of man that specifies their unique quality. Moses understood that the people of his day would comprehend the value of a land that possessed jewels and gold. Man's place of original responsibility was a splendid land, and the presence of fine gold was one of its marks of splendor. God's generosity to man was immediately apparent to anyone reading or hearing Moses' account of Adam's environment.

Precious metals and jewelry have been regarded as basic wealth objects for as long as man has left records. Gold has been a form of money for as far back as we can investigate. Its brilliance, durability, malleability, and universal respect as a metal of continuing value have made it a unique economic resource. Its scarcity in relation to the high value men place on the ownership of the metal (high marginal utility) has made gold a universal currency. Gold is something worth owning. Even Adam in the garden could be regarded in retrospect as blessed, Moses made it clear—all the more reason to condemn Adam's ethical rebellion. In a perfect creation, which God had announced as being good, gold and jewels were something special.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

A. Gold as Money

Gold is the universal money. Wherever men truck and barter, they respect gold as a means of exchange. Why? What is money, and why should gold serve as its universal archetype? Money is simply the most marketable commodity.² To one extent or another, money must have the following characteristics: divisibility, durability, transportability, easy recognizability, and scarcity in relation to its demand (high marginal utility). Many objects have functioned as money in the history of man. Cattle, precious metals, salt, shells, and even women have served as units of account. (Divisibility has always been a problem with women; half a woman is worse than none at all.) Money must serve as a unit of common account. It is often referred to as a “store of value,” although the terminology is misleading, since it has overtones of fixed objective value apart from value-imputing men operating in competitive markets. We might better say that money is a valuable thing to store. Most important, money has historic value. It was valuable yesterday, or perhaps centuries ago, and traders can assume that a particular form of money will therefore be valuable in the future. This continuity of value over time is paramount in establishing a particular commodity as an acceptable monetary unit.

There is a theoretical problem with this analysis. If money is valuable as money today because it was valuable as money yesterday, how can we explain the origin of money? This was a problem answered by Mises’ “regression theorem” in his 1912 book, The Theory of Money and Credit. At some point in the history of a particular monetary unit,

2. Ludwig von Mises, The Theory of Money and Credit (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1912] 1953), p. 32. (<http://Mises.org/books/tmc.pdf>) Mises wrote in 1949: “In the marketability of the various commodities and services there prevail considerable differences. . . . It is these differences in the marketability of the various commodities and services which created indirect exchange. A man who at the instant cannot acquire what he wants to get for the conduct of his own household or business, or who does not yet know what kind of goods he will need in the uncertain future, comes nearer to his ultimate goal if he exchanges a less marketable good for a more marketable one. It may also happen that the physical properties of the merchandise he wants to give away (as, for instance, its perishability or the costs incurred by its storage or similar circumstances) impel him to wait no longer. Sometimes he may be prompted to hurry in giving away the good concerned because he is afraid of a deterioration of its market value. In all such cases he improves his own situation in acquiring a more marketable good, even if this good is not suitable to satisfy directly any of his own needs. . . . Money is a medium of exchange. It is the most marketable good which people acquire because they want to offer it in later acts of interpersonal exchange.” Mises, Human Action (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press 1949), p. 398. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

it must have been valuable for its other properties. Perhaps its beauty was central. Possibly it was used as an ornament or as a sacred object. Acting men must have imputed value to the metal or other object for reasons other than its previous service as a means of exchange. Mises' argument is plausible, but it is still a form of "conjectural history." We can only speculate concerning the origins of money.

What we do know is that God calls attention to the special position of gold and the precious stones of Havilah. He expects men to recognize the special nature of His gift to mankind of assets that are almost universally recognized as valuable. Their beauty in men's eyes—an indication of universal standards of beauty among men—and their scarcity (high marginal utility) in relation to this universal demand for beautiful jewels or gold ornaments result in the creation of what appears to be an objective value for gold and jewels. This is the closest that we should come to attributing "objective" or "intrinsic" value to gold, silver, or some other universally recognized form of money. The almost universal acceptability of gold in voluntary exchanges between men has produced historic value of such long standing for the metal, that men speak of gold's intrinsic value. But this supposed "intrinsic value of gold" is better understood as an almost intrinsic desire to own gold among mankind. Even so, this desire is never a fixed emotion, irrespective of time and place. There is no fixed market value for gold, no "innate price" of gold. Gold is not a universal fixed economic reference point for all market exchanges. However, God provided high quality gold for Adam, and Adam and his heirs were (and are) expected to recognize God's generosity in this regard. The gift of gold was a fine one indeed. It still is.

The use of gold and silver as ornaments is a fact recorded by the Bible. Strong's Concordance lists three columns of fine-print entries of verses that refer to silver, and three and a half that refer to gold. Unquestionably, the Bible records the long history of both metals as primary forms of wealth. "And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold" (Gen. 13:2). Gold and silver were convenient units of account because they could be weighed in terms of a standard unit of weight, the shekel (Gen. 24:22). King Asa paid out the gold and silver of Judah's treasury to Benhadad as tribute money (I Kings 15:18). The fact that this payment was perfectly acceptable to Benhadad indicated how universal these metals were in exchange.

How valuable is gold? When making an estimation of the incomparable value of God's judgments, David use gold as a representative standard of comparison, albeit a dim approximation. But gold is the highest earthly standard by which we can compare God's judgments (Ps. 19:9–10). Gold is desirable; how much more desirable is the righteous judgment of God! This same comparison is used repeatedly by biblical writers (Ps. 119:72, 127; Prov. 3:14; 8:10, 19; 16:16; etc.). Even the New Jerusalem, God's final and most glorious physical gift to redeemed mankind, is referred to as pure gold (Rev. 21:18). From the garden of Eden to the New Jerusalem, gold is wealth.

B. Monopoly and Dross

It is when men as citizens or government officials tamper with the gold and silver content of the currency that disaster results. When men's hearts are dross, they risk the production of dross currency and dross consumer goods (Isa. 1:22).³ Kings have practiced this monetary deception for as long as there have been kings. They pour less expensive (base) metals into the silver or gold used to cast ingots or coins. They substitute paper notes or checks or computer entries on magnetic tapes for the precious metals, and then they multiply the notes, checks, or computer entries. Money multiplies, prices rise, and the redistribution of wealth through deception increases. The civil government fosters fraud, either directly (debasement, printing press money) or indirectly (central and commercial banking). When the authorities of the civil government stamp a coin or bill with a seal testifying that a particular quantity and fineness of a precious metal is contained in a coin (or a specific quantity of this metal is on reserve for immediate exchange of the paper note), and subsequently debase the coinage or print more bills than there is metal on reserve, they thereby act fraudulently. They first create a monopoly of money issue, and then they misuse this government monopoly. They spend the fiat money into circulation, buying the market's scarce economic resources. The state thereby increases its consumption by levying the "invisible tax" of monetary inflation.

The monopoly of money is fraught with danger for all but the most alert private citizens and the beneficiaries of state favors. The authorities cannot long resist the temptation of levying the invisible tax of price inflation. It is true that Byzantium was blessed with a stable gold coinage for over 700 years, but this was unique in man's history.⁴

3. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

This is why inflation of the money supply has been a feature of human history from the beginning of our records. Governments cheat. Honest civil governments are not the creators of money; they are, at most, the certifiers of money. This is why the Bible again and again warns about the sin of fraudulent weights and measures.⁵ This is linked to justice (Lev. 19:33–37;⁶ Deut. 25:13–16⁷). When Jeremiah bought the field from his kinsman, he “subscribed the evidence, and sealed it, and took witnesses, and weighed him the money in the balances” (Jer. 32:10). The money in this case was 17 shekels of silver (Jer. 32:9). The debasement of the currency is nothing less than tampering with the weights and measures, whether done by private coin clippers, counterfeiters, or state officials.

The abolition of the gold standard in the twentieth century during and after World War I led directly to universal inflation, revolution, and boom-bust trade cycles in the same historic period. There is no escape from the moral laws of God, whether or not hired professional economists recognize such a moral order's existence. The gold coin or silver coin standard, or multiple coin standard of freely exchangeable currencies, is the direct result of biblical law.

The abolition of honest weights and measures through the creation of fractional reserve banking, printing press money, coin debasement, or coin clipping, must inevitably result in unpleasant social and economic repercussions. When someone issues a receipt for metal of a certain fineness and weight, he must have just exactly that on reserve. To issue more warehouse receipts (bank notes) than there is metal on reserve is nothing less than tampering with the scales, for the results are identical to coin debasement. It is the same sin; it must result in the same judgment. We live in a universe that is personal and governed by moral law. Economic crises are the built-in self-regulating devices—built into man and the creation—that restrain men in the pursuit of evil. Dishonest weights, dishonest money, dishonest authorities, and dishonest cultures go together.

4. “Byzantine Coinage,” Wikipedia.

5. R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 468–72.

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 19.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 65.

Conclusion

Though the Roman Empire is dust today, its gold and silver coins still can be exchanged for scarce economic resources. The Caesars have been in their graves for millennia, their authority long defunct, but the coins bearing their likenesses can still buy goods and services. Men impute value to precious metals long after men have ceased imputing value to a political regime. Precious metal currencies outlast civil governments. Gold can be money. Silver can be money. So it has been since the beginning of recorded history, and so it shall be at the end.

The gold of Havilah was good. It was high quality gold. It was desirable gold. But, most of all, it was not easily counterfeitable gold, especially by lawless civil governments.⁸ This is more than we can say about banknotes, credit cards, and unbacked fiat currencies.

8. Gary North, Honest Money: The Biblical Blueprint for Money and Banking (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/gnmoney>)

8

SUBORDINATION AND FULFILLMENT

And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep [guard] it (Gen. 2:15).

The theocentric principle here is subordination, point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy.¹

A. No Autonomy

Cosmic personalism affirms that all things have their being and meaning in terms of the person and plan of God (Acts 17:28). It absolutely denies the possibility of autonomy—self-sufficiency—for any aspect of the universe. All the creation is subordinate to God. There is also a hierarchy within this created order. Man is under God; nature is under man.

The world was created good. God had already affirmed the goodness of the creation when He assigned the tasks of dominion to man. Despite its God-derived and God-proclaimed goodness, nature was not fully developed. The earth's surface was not yet under man's dominion. God created a garden eastward in Eden as a place of initial testing and training for man. Adam was not yet ready for the full task of worldwide dominion. He was ready to learn, however.

The earth was never designed to be autonomous. Neither was the garden. Though the creation was able to function without man's immediate presence, it could not achieve its full flowering apart from man. This is equally true in the post-Fall era. The natural world needs guidance and care from man, especially covenantally faithful man. For nature to flower, it must be subordinate. Nature is fundamentally passive, despite the active competition of the species within the framework of nature's law-order. Nature was designed; it has a goal; God has a purpose for it. Natural processes are not fully self-correcting, for without man's care, nature cannot independently achieve its purpose. The so-called balance of nature is insufficient to produce a developed, mature nature. Nature apart from man is God-sustained and God-restrained. Under covenantal dominion, cursed nature's restraints on mankind are progressively lifted.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

Nature was allowed to operate briefly without man for five days. Man was allowed to operate briefly without woman for less than one day. Neither could be fully comfortable without its complement. Nature needed subordination under man. Man needed subordination under God. Man was unable to achieve the fullness of dominion alone. Dominion requires a division of labor, so he received his helper fit for him. The familiar phrase "helpmeet" has distorted the meaning of the original words. Eve was a helper "meet" or fit for Adam. She was the product of design. Adam knew he could not perform his tasks efficiently without another person to assist him. Like nature, he had been created good but incomplete. He knew from the very beginning that he was not self-sufficient.

B. Man's Calling

God assigned Adam an initial task to be completed by himself. He was to name the animals of the field and the birds. This meant that he had to classify them, intellectually integrating their functions into an overall design. The "many" were to be arranged in terms of the "one," meaning the plan of God as perceived and interpreted by Adam, God's image. We are not told whether this classification involved all the beasts of the earth, or whether it was limited to the field of the garden. If it involved all animals, the task is barely conceivable in retrospect. We cannot imagine how such a task could have been completed by one individual in a few hours. Even if the assignment involved only the beasts and birds of the garden, it would have been an awesome task. Yet Adam completed it in a few hours. His mind, prior to the Fall, was efficient beyond anything we can imagine. Modern man, with the aid of enormous capital, the division of labor, and the modern computer, has only begun to match the skills of the first man in the garden.

Adam worked before he married. His definition of himself was set in reference to his subordination to God and the dominion covenant.

Man's work is fundamental to his very being. Eve was given to him within the framework of his calling or vocation before God. The family has its meaning in terms of the dominion covenant. The individual family is influenced overwhelmingly by the particular calling of the husband. Wives are to be selected in terms of the man's calling. They are to help their husbands fulfill their callings (Prov. 31:12, 23, 27).² By departing from this interpretation of the meaning of marriage, we find that religions, cultures, and individual families have neglected their callings before God, and the tasks of dominion have not been achieved in a systematically biblical manner. The family structure has been designed for a purpose, and by neglecting the husband's calling as the central feature of the family, rebellious men have compromised the family.

The tree of the knowledge of good and evil also testified to the impossibility of autonomy. It was a visible and constant reminder of man's subordination to God and his total dependence on God for his power and knowledge. Knowledge is a prerequisite of power. God set a tree before them that promised a special form of knowledge to man. Then He declared the tree "off limits." They could not enjoy its fruit. They had to acknowledge a zone of knowledge, and therefore power, which was ethically forbidden. They had to live in terms of a seeming imperfection in their very being. They were told that they and the creation were good, yet they were forbidden access to the tree. They had to work out their task of dominion in a cooperative effort, as man and wife, and as a family before God. Were they imperfect metaphysically? Was some fundamental aspect of their being, their humanity, lacking? God said no. They were perfect as beings, though they had a life-long task of dominion and celebration before them. They were perfect as creatures, but they were not autonomous. The tree reminded them of their necessary dependence on God, for there was knowledge which was closed to them as metaphysically complete, ethically perfect humans. Their authority would always be derivative.

They were not to eat of the tree. To do so meant that they were dissatisfied with their position as subordinate, dependent creatures. To do so meant that they believed they could capture forbidden knowledge and therefore forbidden power. The serpent recognized this in his tempting words, that they would become as gods (Gen. 3:5). In effect, they would be criticizing God for the imperfection of His creative acts. He had left them metaphysically incomplete, they would be asserting, devoid of a crucial aspect of "true humanity." Therefore, to eat of the tree, they had to proclaim that as autonomous beings they could decide for themselves to capture their "full humanity" by an act of ethical rebellion. They would determine for themselves whether or not they would die, although God had promised them that they would. As sovereign experimenters, they would test the word of God. But it would not really be a test, for by eating of the tree, they were already asserting that God's word could not possibly be what God said it was, namely, absolutely authoritative. To test God's word meant that the testing agents already had denied the absolutely authoritative nature of God's revelation. By assuming that God's word could be tested, they would be asserting that chance, not God's word, is authoritative. It might be that they would not die. Therefore, it had to be that God's word is not sovereign. Chance, not God, is therefore the sovereign of the universe, and man might overcome impersonal chance or impersonal fate by gaining sufficient knowledge. The first step towards total knowledge would be the quest for a specifically forbidden form of knowledge.

2. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 85.

Would God test man's capacities in the garden? Then man would test God's word in the garden. Who was dominant? Who was subordinate? Would man find his fulfillment in terms of his God, his wife, and the dominion covenant? Or would God find His fulfillment in terms of man, man's plans, man's tests? The tree was a symbol of the real test, which was ethical, not intellectual or metaphysical. Adam could learn the tasks of dominion as a subordinate. Or Adam could attempt to become autonomous, a self-directed sovereign who might achieve total dominion over the creation through the exercise of his own autonomous knowledge and power. He could find fulfillment in terms of subordination under God and dominion over nature, or else he could attempt to find fulfillment in terms of a struggle against God, nature, and chance, with chance as the present reigning sovereign, under which God also operates and tries to make His word authoritative. The tree stood as a symbol of man's ethical and metaphysical subordination as a created being. Ultimately, Adam could not test his metaphysical position, for God made him what he was. The tree was a test of his ethical position before God.

C. Training for Dominion

God gave Adam almost free rein in the garden. Only one pathway was forbidden. Adam was supposed to have learned the skills of dominion in the garden, and from there he and his family were to have gone out as dominion-exercising subordinates under God. He was not supposed to stay in the garden forever. The garden was a training ground, a place that God had declared good but incomplete (undeveloped). Adam's task was to bring the earth under control for the glory of God and in terms of God's law-order. His special task was to make nature fulfilled as well as good. In doing so, he would become complete, as a creature who had fulfilled his God-appointed purposes. ("Completion" refers to historical fulfillment, not an advance in "being.")

It is not generally understood by Christians that paradise, as represented by the garden or heaven, is impermanent. Adam was to use the beauty of the garden as a temporary resting place, a place of joy, almost in the same way that Western cultures regard the honeymoon. It was a place of learning and training. Like the honeymoon, the garden experience was to serve as a preliminary blessing which would lead to fulfillment in dominion. Marriage, not the honeymoon, is central to dominion, just as the world, not the garden, was to have been the focus of Adam's concern. But Adam wanted paradise on other terms. He wanted instant knowledge, not the progressive knowledge that is the fruit of dominion, first in the garden and subsequently in the whole earth. He wanted a "higher consciousness" apart from the labor of dominion. He wanted special knowledge, instant knowledge, not the knowledge of experience as a subordinate. His eyes turned to the tree in the midst of the garden, rather than outward toward the world, which would remain unfulfilled apart from his active dominion. He subsequently abandoned his calling under God. Rather than spread the zone of paradise from the garden to the world, turning the world into a paradise, he decided to choose instant illumination through a prohibited action in defiance of God.

As Adam discovered to his consternation, God would not allow him to abandon his calling, for this calling is central to all humanity. He was cast into the world prior to the completion of his training. He was still responsible before God. He still had to exercise dominion. Nature deserves its fulfillment. Adam would not be allowed to abandon nature. He could not remain in the garden, that most pleasant of training camps, seeking higher consciousness. He had to work. So do his heirs.

Conclusion

God will achieve His goals. Man will achieve dominion over nature. Nature will become fully fulfilled (Rom. 8:19–22).³ But the long process of dominion is now cursed. Having failed in our pain-free training, we are now forced to learn painfully “on the job.” This was not the case in the garden. Adam rejected pain-free training.

It is a mistake for Christians to focus their long-term hope on the joys of heaven. Heaven is paradise (Luke 23:43; II Cor. 12:4). It, too, serves as a training ground. It is a good place, but it is not our final resting place, any more than the garden was intended to be our final resting place. It is an “intermediate” state. We are still to exercise dominion over the earth. Like the garden was before the Fall, heaven is a place which, like the garden was before the Fall, is essentially unfulfilled. Men in heaven are separated from their eternal bodies (I Cor. 15:35–55). They cry out constantly: “How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?” (Rev. 6:10). The focus of their concern, even in heaven, is the earth. It is to be our concern as well. We are required to extend the paradise of heaven to the earth. Heaven has replaced the paradise of the garden. Each was designed to be temporary. Our goal is heaven on earth, to be completed after the final judgment; we are to dwell in the New Heavens and New Earth (Rev. 21:1). Revelation 22:2 describes a developed paradise: the fulfilled city. Ours should be the same concern which was supposed to have been Adam’s concern in the garden, the initial paradise. The dominion covenant is eternal.

Because of Adam’s transgression, we are receiving our training in time and on a cursed earth. We are supposed to be improving our skills of dominion. We are working out the terms of the dominion covenant, but we labor under a curse. Our work has meaning, both now and in eternity. We will receive our rewards in heaven (I Cor. 3),⁴ but these are not our sole and final rewards. Heaven’s rewards are like military medals or the prizes of the athletic field (I Cor. 9:24;⁵ Phil. 3:14⁶). They are things worth competing for, again and again, if long life permits. Heaven's rewards are a legitimate goal of human action. But these rewards are the starting point, like Adam's successful classifying of the animals. Heaven's rewards are given in response to a preliminary task well done. They are our graduation diplomas, which we will receive on judgment day (Rev. 20). Then we will go forth into the world to work. Men and the created realm will at last find completion, ethically speaking, under the sovereignty of God. The curses on man, man's labors, and nature will be permanently removed (Rev. 22:3). With ethical perfection as the foundation, the creation will be subdued and cared for, throughout eternity. The battle with nature will be over at last. The labor over nature will never end.

3. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

4. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

5. Ibid., ch. 12.

6. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 21.

9

THE MEANING OF OWNERSHIP

And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it. And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. And the LORD God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him (Gen. 2:15–18).

The theocentric issue here is God’s ownership of the creation. His ownership is an extension of His creation of the world. This, in turn, is an aspect of His absolute sovereignty: point one of the biblical covenant model.¹ He owns everything because He made everything. Nothing exists that He did not make. “For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist” (Col 1:16–17). He therefore possesses the legal authority and metaphysical power to exclude every created thing from access to any aspect of the creation: boundaries, point three of the biblical covenant model.² He has the right to enforce these boundaries by threat of violence: sanctions, point four.³

God had established original legal title to the creation by creating it. He altered the environment by adding to it, day by day. The proof of His legal claim of ownership was the very existence of the environment. He worked His claim for six days. Then he leased it to Adam and Adam's heirs. The lease agreement had specific stipulations. It also had an initial zone of testing: the garden.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Sutton, ch. 3; North, ch. 3.

3. Sutton, ch. 4; North, ch. 4.

A. Inclusion and Exclusion

God delegated subordinate ownership by this declaration to Adam. He told Adam that Adam possessed the right to use any tree of the garden for his own personal use. He included Adam in His own heritage. This heritage included the tree of life. But one tree was off limits: the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. If Adam ate of this tree, God warned, he would die. This is the ultimate negative sanction. The full extent of its negativity was not revealed until the ministry of Jesus, who announced the doctrine of hell (Luke 16) and the doctrine of the final bodily resurrection from the dead, followed by the eternal lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15).

God had the right of exclusion. By this, I mean the moral authority, the legal authority, and the physical ability to exclude others from the use of designated property. Put another way, there was no higher authority to appeal to who would or could intervene on behalf of the excluded person. The Owner had the right to lay down the law.

The law of exclusion accompanies the law of inclusion. The owner possesses the authority to use the property as he sees fit. God possesses this absolute authority because of His office as Creator. He therefore had the authority to transfer to Adam the right to eat from every tree of the garden. He created Adam and placed him inside the boundaries of the garden. He thereby included Adam. He did so as Adam's master. Adam had lawful access to the trees of the garden as God's representative agent: hierarchy, point two of the biblical covenant model.⁴

So, Adam was included in the garden, but only on the basis of his subordination to God. The mark of this subordination was God's declared boundary around the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Adam had lawful access to every tree but one. His lawful access to everything minus one was dependent on his non-access to that one exception.

Adam's obedience to God was defined in two ways. One was positive: to keep and dress the garden. The other was negative: his refusal to eat from the forbidden tree until instructed otherwise by God. To defend the garden meant that he possessed God-designated authority to exclude or include any other creature. God would support him in this task. In what way? As the final Judge. This is what God did with the serpent. When Eve refused to exclude the serpent, and Adam refused to intervene to exclude it, God returned and pronounced judgment on the serpent. The mark of their joint rebellion—Eve, Adam, and the serpent—was the violation of the boundary around the designated tree.

4. Sutton, ch. 2; North, ch. 2.

B. Inheritance

God did not inform Adam of the existence of God's grace. After the sin of man, God showed His grace to Adam and Eve by not executing them. He granted a promise to Eve. "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. 3:15–16). This was a promise of inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.⁵ This was not clear to Adam in God's original establishment of the boundary around the tree.

God also extended His boundary of exclusion. He set an angel with a flaming sword at the entry into the garden. This made the tree of life off-limits.

And the LORD God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil: and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever: Therefore the LORD God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken. So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubim, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life (Gen. 3:22–24).

The tree of life had not been excluded before man's Fall. Adam and Eve could have attained eternal life by going to the tree of life at any time and eating from it. They could have done this immediately. They refused. The lure of the forbidden tree was too great. To be as God: that was the thing! To gain access to forbidden knowledge: that was the thing! They did not believe that God really would impose the sanction of death on them.

Instead of going immediately to the tree of life, they sowed fig

5. Sutton, ch. 5; North, ch. 5.

leaves for themselves. God was temporarily absent. He was not present to defend the tree of life. It seemed as though they might be able to thwart God's threat of death. All they needed to do was make a run for the tree of life. But God knew them well. They would waste precious time sowing coverings for themselves. They would work to overcome their own shame.

After God covered them with animal skins and expelled them from the garden, He extended the boundary of exclusion. He knew that men would seek to attain eternal life on their own authority. They would return to the scene of the crime. They would attempt to gain access to the tree of life, eating their way out of the death sentence that God had announced: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. 3:19). God took away what He had granted in His grace on Adam's first partial day of life. The Lord gave, and the Lord took away. Blessed be the name of the Lord (Job 1:21).

There would be life extension: time to bear children. There was also a boundary placed on life extension: death. The symbol of this boundary was the angel's sword. There was grace in life extension, yet also curses: the woman's pain in childbirth, the man's burdened labor, and the expectation of death. There was also grace in their exclusion from the garden: no access to the tree of life, which would not have removed their sin, only their curse of physical death. They would henceforth not be able to imprison themselves in the bondage of sin forever. As God would reveal later, there is deliverance from the bondage of sin through a substitutionary atonement.

C. Property Management

What God did with the forbidden tree, Adam was to have done with the garden. God placed a barrier of ownership around it. Adam was to defend this boundary. He refused. He did not exclude the serpent or kill it. Because of Adam's sin, God placed a barrier around the garden. He sent Adam into the newly cursed wilderness. But, in sending Adam out into the world, God gave Adam a huge boundary: the entire world, except for the garden. God had limited Adam's initial assignment: to dress and defend the garden. After man's sin, God vastly extended Adam's area of responsibility: the whole world.

This had been God's plan from the beginning: to subdue the whole earth (Gen. 1:28). Adam was given a limited area of responsibility initially: the garden. He was given time to test his skills of management. Because of his premature grabbing of the robes of authority—eating from a tree to make him like God—God tossed him out of the garden. His zone of responsibility was extended in one day. He would henceforth gain on-the-job training in a world brought under the curse imposed on Adam.

Adam would now have to manage property. He had a model: his initial experience in the garden. God had limited Adam's initial zone of responsibility. This limited zone was marked by two boundaries: the garden and the tree. Adam was to protect this enclosed area from invaders. He was to improve it. Only after he had gained skills of administration was he to expend his zone of responsibility. God had thrust him out prematurely, because Adam had grabbed the robes of authority prematurely. He had stolen God's property. God removed him from God's other property as a punishment, but also as a blessing: greater responsibility. For covenant-keepers, extending one's zone of responsibility is a blessing. It is a mark of maturity.

The pattern of ownership is found the garden: responsibility, work, protection/defense, and expansion. We are to secure our legal claim to property by working the claim, in the language of mining in the American West during the gold rush era of the mid-nineteenth century. A miner proved his claim to the authorities by identifying the signs of the extraction of dirt or some other alteration of the land related to the extraction of ore. He could not lay claim—establish legal title—merely by saying that a large tract of land belonged to him. He had to be able to point to a changed environment that his labor or capital had effected.

By establishing an original legal claim, an environment-transforming laborer establishes his right to exclude others from the property inside specified legal boundaries. He establishes a right to future extraction. This legal claim extends through time. Adam possessed such a title in the garden. He forfeited this title when he violated the Owner's property line.

As a delegated owner, Adam was to extend his authority over an ever-wider area of responsibility. Through his children, he was to extend his authority. They would extend dominion under his fatherhood, just as he extended dominion under God's fatherhood. They would conquer in Adam's name, just as Adam was to have conquered in God's name. But the conquest was to be based on labor inside a bound- ary of responsibility. The marks of this boundary were the marks of land transformation. He was to alter the land. This meant that he was given authority by God to alter the land. The limits of his ownership were established by the limits of his ability to transform the land's value by altering the physical environment.

This is land management. The same principle of property management applies to the products of land and labor over time: capital. The individual establishes ownership by changing the environment in a physically measurable way. God had declared, "Let there be," and there was. Physical nature responded to God's word. Man is not God. His fiat word—"let there be"—does not change the environment. He does not establish ownership by mere declaration. He must alter the physical environment in order to establish an original property right.

D. Transfer of Ownership

God transferred ownership to Adam. In doing this, He transferred responsibility. Adam would henceforth have to manage the property on God's behalf.

This transfer of property became biologically mandatory for Adam after the Fall. God cursed mankind with death. Each person is eventually removed from the scene. This mandates the transfer of ownership. A dead man cannot exercise responsible authority over the property. So, he must establish the legal terms of this transfer before he dies. If he refuses to do this, then society does it through custom or civil law. The state enforces some terms of transfer. The boundaries of the property are marked by responsibility. There are no boundaries without responsibility. Stewardship under God's ultimate ownership is inescapable.

The owner can legally transfer the property before he dies. He can divest himself of the responsibilities associated with ownership. Attached to every piece of property are liabilities. Stewardship of God's property is inescapable. There is no way to separate stewardship from ownership. There is no way to make property autonomous. Property is inescapably accompanied by legal responsibility. God enforces this arrangement.

Conclusion

God put Adam in the garden. He included Adam. He placed the tree of the knowledge of good and evil in the garden. He excluded

Adam from this tree. God, as the cosmic Owner, includes and excludes all those under His authority. He has the original property right. The twin marks of this right are inclusion and exclusion.

Man is made in God's image. He possesses property rights as a steward under God. He represents God. He establishes a property right by altering previously unoccupied and unowned land. He adds labor to this land, altering it further. He maintains his property through labor. He becomes responsible for it. If he does not defend it and improve it, God transfers ownership to others. Man's mortality guarantees such a transfer.

10

THE GOD-DESIGNED HARMONY OF INTERESTS

And the LORD God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him. And out of the ground the LORD God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field; but for Adam there was not found an help meet for him. And the LORD God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; And the rib, which the LORD God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man. And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man (Gen. 2:18–23).

A. Marriage and Labor

The theocentric principle here is God's positive sanction of marriage. It followed the original assignment of work. First, men are supposed to work. Then they are to get married. God announced that Adam needed a helper fit for him. This is what the King James English means: help meet. Immediately after announcing that this is what Adam needed, God gave Adam a second assignment. Not only was Adam to dress and keep the garden, he had to name the animals of the garden.

God brought the animals to Adam for him to name. This was a huge task. We are not told how long it took. There are a lot of animals in a garden, especially if we consider insects. Adam was not simply to name them to make them pass. He was not to name one animal Joe and another animal Fred. By naming something, Adam was defining it.

He was assessing its role. In other words, he was classifying the animals.

The animals came in male-female pairs. In contrast, there was no woman for Adam. Adam was reminded, species by species, that he was alone. Each of the animals was a functioning male-female unit. Mankind was not. God used this exercise to teach Adam about the need for a male-female unit. This task was not peripheral to his life. It was part of a training program that would help him in leading a family.

First, God said that Adam needed a helper. Second, God assigned Adam the task of naming the animals. Third, God again announced that Adam was in need of a helper. There was a sequence to this revelation. Not until Adam had completed the task of naming the animals did God provide a helper for him. This means that Adam's work came before Adam's wife. The implications of this position are crucial for a proper understanding of mankind.

Even before Adam was created, God announced that male and female human beings would serve as his agents in history. They would serve as stewards of his property. They would exercise dominion over the entire earth (Gen. 1:26).¹ This was a family project. But in the sequence of establishing man's dominion, God did not initially give Adam a wife. The other creatures did have male-female pairs. The human race did not. There was no functioning division of labor for Adam in naming the animals. He had to do it by himself. He had no assistant. He saw that the animals were functioning male-female units, but the human race was not.

B. The Head of the Household

There has to be a head of the household. This person represents the family and its members before God. He represents God to members of his family. Adam was the head of the initial household, which is obvious when we consider that there was no other member of the household. Adam completed the initial task, which was an aspect of dressing and guarding the garden. He had his work cut out for him.

Adam knew from the beginning that the human race was different from the other animals. He completed his initial task by himself. The other animals were pairs from the beginning. He was going to be in a position of leadership in the family. His wife would be given to him in terms of his need for an assistant. He would be primary; she would be secondary. She would be functionally subordinate to him. This did not mean that she would be ethically inferior.

1. Chapter 3.

Paul says that Eve sinned through ignorance, while Adam sinned knowingly. “For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression” (1 Tim. 2:13–14). This was a fundamental sexual distinction in the Fall of mankind.

Eve was given to Adam as an assistant. She was part of the dominion process, but she had a subordinate role to play. Adam was primary, because Adam had primary responsibility before God. God spoke to Adam. He did not speak to Eve until after the Fall. Adam had already completed work before he was given a wife. The wife was to serve him as his helper.

When we recognize that the purpose of marriage is to extend the kingdom of God in history, we begin to understand the primary meaning of marriage. It was not simply procreation. The animals procreated; Adam named the animals before he was given a wife. The human race was different from the animals.

There is a hierarchy of decision-making in the human race that does not exist to a comparable degree among the animals. There is a division of labor among the animals, but the idea of a masculine-dominated division of labor, in which the wife supports the man and makes his work more efficient, is not universal among animals.

Even when the wife is the primary wage-earner, she remains functionally subordinate to her husband. He holds this office by a judicial grant from God. He does not hold on the basis of the amount of money he earns in relation to the amount of money she earns. He is the head of the household by God’s decree, not by his earning power.

In most situations, the husband is the primary wage-earner. He earns more money than his wife does, and he is in the labor force longer than his wife is. The wife must take time out to spend with the children. The husband, by the original task given to him, must concentrate on his work.

When a man marries for reasons other than to get support and assistance from a wife who will be committed to him and therefore to his work, he disrupts the marital pattern which began in Eden. Adam had to work in order to be ready for a wife. His wife was given to him only after he had completed his initial task. He had received his assignment from God. He was to dress and keep the garden. Then he had been given a secondary task: to classify the animals. He knew what he was supposed to do before he was given a wife who would help him achieve his goals. Her goals would be subordinate to his goals.

Eve had no say in the matter, because she was created specifically to serve her husband. But women in general are to follow her pattern. They must see their marital tasks as assisting their husbands.

C. Extending God's Kingdom in History

Adam had demonstrated his competence by naming the animals, his first completed assignment. He had begun to work out the commandments of God. By engaging in specific labor, he had begun to extend his control over the creation, thereby beginning the historical fulfillment of his own nature. He was asserting his legitimate, subordinate sovereignty over the creation. Only after he had demonstrated skills in his calling was he provided with a wife. The husband's calling is therefore basic to marriage. It is supposed to be antecedent to marriage.

This point cannot be overstressed. The animals were simultaneously created male and female from the beginning. Sexual reproduction and the multiplication of each kind's numbers were the product of the male-female division. But Adam was created before the woman. The assignment of cultural dominion was given to a representative head of the family of man, even before there was an historically existing family. The heart of man's being is not his sexuality; it is his calling before God. He is fundamentally different from the animals. Where sexuality is made the foundation of marriage, rather than calling, cultural development will be retarded. The male-female relationship, in the case of mankind, is not based on the fact of biological reproduction; it is not, in some evolutionary sense, the product of competitive biological pairings of previously existing species. Animals and humans are to multiply (Gen. 1:22, 28); man is uniquely assigned the tasks of dominion. The male-female relationship among human beings is based on the prior planning of God and His specific call to the first man, Adam. God called Adam to a series of tasks; only when he had completed one assignment did God present him with his wife and assistant, Eve. Marriage was originally intended to be grounded in the dominion covenant, not in the mutual attraction of men and women, and not even on the need of human beings to reproduce. Marriage is intended to be subordinate to the dominion covenant. Marriage finds its purpose within the dominion covenant. This is the distinguishing feature of human sexual pairings, in comparison to animal pairings.

Marriage has numerous subordinate purposes: the lawful extension of the race, mutual comfort, personal development of its members, the provision of cultural stability, social welfare functions (including education), sexual fulfillment, and capital accumulation. Nevertheless, the Genesis account gives us the central focus of marriage: the division of labor. Eve was provided as “an help meet” for Adam, meaning an assistant specially designed to complement his skills. God designed Eve to fit Adam’s needs in his tasks of dominion. This means that God assumed that the harmony of human interests is compatible with, and inescapable from, the hierarchy of the creation order (I Cor. 11).² God is sovereign over all things; man is under God and sovereign over his wife (and children); the family of man is sovereign over the creation. Prior to the Fall of man, this hierarchy was in no way contradictory to the ultimate harmony of interests in the creation. Adam’s very nature as a creature required the presence of a subordinate assistant; without her, his tasks, and therefore his very being, could not be fulfilled. As Paul put it: “For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man” (I Cor. 11:8–9). But there is unity as well as hierarchy: “Nevertheless neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord. For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman; but all things of God” (I Cor. 11:11–12). A mutuality of dependence biologically and especially in terms of the division of labor, is affirmed by Paul. It is significant that Paul’s comments appear within his discussion of the division of labor within the church (I Cor. 11–12).³

The hierarchy of authority in the creation cannot be evaded. There can never be anything approaching total equality. The ideology of equality is inevitably nothing more than the substitution of a different form of inequality for an existing one. Consider the lure of equality given to Eve by the serpent. “Ye shall be as gods, knowing [determining] good and evil” (Gen. 3:5b). Yet this was not what the serpent believed. By promising them equality before God, the serpent was asking them to worship him as superior to God. After all, whose word was truly authoritative? Was it not the serpent’s? They should disobey the explicit command of a sovereign God, confident that they would be protected from death by the sovereign word of the serpent. They would then become ethically subordinate to Satan.

2. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 14.

3. Ibid., ch. 15.

It is instructive to observe the response of Adam and Eve to God's questions. God came first to Adam, whom He had placed in authority over the woman. Adam immediately blamed his wife. He had deferred to her authority in the matter of deciding whether or not to eat the forbidden fruit. He had been commanded to exercise authority over her, and with her, over the creation. Clearly his sin was to reverse the order of God's designed hierarchy in the name of achieving equality with God. Then God came to the woman. Why had she done such a thing? Immediately, she blamed the serpent. She, who was supposed to be a co-servant with her husband over all creation, had instead worshipped a part of the creation. She had accepted as sovereign the word of a creature—a rebellious creature at that. She had inverted the hierarchy. She had worshipped the serpent and then had asserted dominion over her husband. And when caught in their rebellion, both she and Adam had blamed the environment for their condition: Adam blamed the woman God had given to him; Eve blamed the serpent. God's environment, they seemed to argue, was in some way to blame for their condition. Though He had declared it perfect, it had nevertheless brought them to this disaster.⁴ In the quest for equality, they had only affirmed an inverted pyramid of authority; seeking to be gods, they decided that they might safely test the word of the Creator.

A society that pursues equality as a goal will of necessity destroy the harmony of interests, for that harmony of interests was created within a framework of hierarchy. Women are designed to be functionally subordinate to men in marriage. This in no way implies that women are ethically inferior to men in marriage. It is the error of egalitarian humanism to equate functional subordination and ethical inferiority. Where there is a hierarchy of wealth, power, or knowledge, some humanist can be found who will call for the total reconstruction of society and the creation of an undefined social egalitarianism. The harmony of interests among men and women is assumed to be operable only where all signs of inequality are smashed. The Bible affirms the opposite. The harmony of interests throughout human society, and even the entire creation, can be attained only within a theocentric and hierarchical framework.

4. R. J. Rushdoony, "The Society of Satan," Christian Economics (1964), reprinted in Biblical Economics Today, II (Oct./Nov. 1979). (<http://bit.ly/rjrsos>)

D. The Division of Labor

The division of labor is required by God for the effective extension by man of the dominion covenant. The first human couple provide archetypes of the division of labor system. First, they were both fully human. As image-bearers of God, they had comparable goals and interests, compatible talents and responsibilities. This shared humanity made cooperation possible. Second, they were inherently different. These differences are by nature and design fully productive. Each had a different perspective, since each was a biologically separate creature with different tasks to fulfill within the hierarchy of responsibility. Eve was designed to fit Adam biologically and in terms of his tasks. The “biological fit” was less important than the “help fit for him,” and far less important than the “biological fit” of females to males in other species. Eve was like a missing piece in a cosmic puzzle: the final piece that brought the potential for harmony and a sense of wholeness to the creation. (The next-to-last piece was Adam’s naming of the animals.) Her innate difference complemented his gifts; together, they would more efficiently extend the dominion covenant. What he lacked, she provided, and vice versa.

The division of labor rests on two fundamental facts of nature. First, the innate differences among human beings. They have different desires, different skills, and different roles to play in the cosmic plan. Second, there are differences of geography. Different areas offer different raw materials, different weather patterns, and different problems to those who would extract wealth from the environment. Therefore, Adam and Eve were designed to be different. Cloning—the endless reproduction of identical members of a species through genetic manipulation—is hostile to the principle of the God-ordained division of labor. It limits the variety of a species within the created bounds placed on each “kind.” Each man or woman is supposed to contribute unique efforts to the historical process of dominion. The multiplicity of skills and contributions is to be ordered through competition and cooperation. Each person is therefore a “help fit” for others, given the harmony of interests; the archetype of this God-designed fitting process is the creation of Eve.

Each person has specific personal obligations before God and society. There is a day of judgment (Rev. 20). Nevertheless, all men are told to cooperate. They have collective responsibilities in various social organizations precisely because of the wholeness of God’s original design.

This design fitted Eve to Adam, yet it preceded her creation in time. Human beings are specifically designed to cooperate within the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26).⁵ This design is not the product of planning human beings, nor is it the product of a randomly evolving universe.

E. Free Market or Collectivist Monopoly

The biblical doctrine of the harmony of interests is not the same as the version that has been used in the past by humanists in their defense of the free market. Actually, modern defenders of the market do not use such an argument, although socialists and Marxists sometimes attribute such an argument to them. A few economists of the nineteenth century, most notably the pamphleteer Frédéric Bastiat, argued along these lines, but not many economists have since then.⁶ The willingness of free market economists to recognize the innate disharmony of interests has led them to extol the benefits of the market as a system of coordination.

Wilhelm Röpke responded to the intellectual attacks on free market economists by those who would discredit market competition. Market economists in the tradition of nineteenth-century liberalism are not naive about the disharmony of interests, Röpke argued.

Such attacks conveniently ignore the fact that it is the liberal economic philosophy which recognizes the latent disharmony between consumer and producer and which sees in competition the means of mitigating this disharmony and thus of safeguarding consumers' interests. Piquantly enough, the enemies of competition answer this argument by saying that it was liberalism, after all, which developed the doctrine of the harmony of economic interests. Thus we find the real advocates of disharmony engaging with high glee in the task of obstructing those who seek to mitigate the evil by ridiculing them as naive adherents of outworn doctrines of "harmony." *But our economic system can remain viable only if this disharmony is redressed by effective and continuous competition.*⁷

Röpke concerned himself with the problems of society, not just with the more narrow sphere of economics. He was convinced that it is naive and misleading to base one's defense of the market on the hy-

5. Chapter 3.

6. Cf. Joseph A. Schumpeter, A History of Economic Analysis (New York: Oxford University Press, 1954), p. 500. Most surveys of the history of economic thought, if they even mention the topic, devote most of their pages to a consideration of Bastiat.

7. Wilhelm Röpke, Economics of the Free Society (Chicago: Regnery, 1963), p. 69.

pothetical ability of the market to cleanse itself of all fraud, monopoly, and coercion. He did not believe that the market economy is, in his words, “a self-dependent cosmos” or a truly “natural order.”⁸ Producers want the highest prices possible for their goods or services, while the buyers want the lowest prices. There is a disharmony of interests apart from the mediating influence of the competitive free market, he concluded. Beware of those seeking monopolistic power. But the easiest way to achieve monopoly, he knew, is to gain the assistance of the civil government. If you wish to release the underlying disharmony of interests, he said, all you need to do is unleash the monopolistic powers of the civil government.

What he described as the enemy of the harmony of interests—the enemy of a market-produced, competition-produced harmony of interests—is precisely the statist system that has been constructed by those who ridicule the market’s form of competition and the idea of a competition-produced harmony of interests. They say that they want to produce true harmony by means of state intervention into the economy. What, in fact, does such intervention produce in the real world? The twentieth century witnessed such intervention firsthand.

An economic system where each group entrenches itself more and more in a monopolist stronghold, abusing the power of the state for its special purposes, where prices and wages lose their mobility except in an upward direction, where no one wants to adhere to the reliable rules of the market any more, and where consequently nobody knows any longer whether tomorrow a new whim of the legislation will not upset all calculations, an economic system in which everyone wants to live exclusively at the expense of the community and in which the state’s budget finally comes to devour half the national income: a system of this kind is not only bound to become unprofitable and thus bound to intensify the scramble for the reduced total profit, but it will moreover in the end suffer a complete breakdown. This is usually called the crisis of capitalism and is used as an occasion for new and revolutionary interventions which complete the ruin and corruption and finally present us with the inexorable choice of either returning to a reasonable and ethical market system or of plunging into the collectivist adventure.⁹

What happens to us if we make the wrong choice? Do we find that

8. Wilhelm Röpke, Civitas Humana (London: Hodge, 1948), p. 49.

9. Wilhelm Röpke, The Social Crisis of Our Time (London: Hodge, [1942] 1950), p. 130. (<http://bit.ly/wrscoot>) we have been successful in reducing the disharmony of interests under collectivism? Will we at last find our harmony of interests?

On the contrary, there they conflict even more violently than ever before, laboriously and for an uncertain period curbed by the authority of the state, within which the struggle for power and influence fluctuates by means of bribery, intrigues and executions. It is obvious that a question of ethics cannot be solved mechanically by a change of organization, and if society, the state, legislation, the courts and politics have so far been unable to make the competitive system work, why should we believe that they will be able to cope with the infinitely more difficult task of a collectivist system?¹⁰

Will we find the harmonization of interests under collectivism? F. A. Hayek provided some answers in "Why the Worst Get on Top," a chapter in his The Road to Serfdom (1944). One answer is that there will be few opportunities to harmonize human interests, precisely because control of the scarce economic resources available to members of the society must be lodged at the very top of the hierarchy. The least-common-denominator principle reigns, since it is impossible for a political organization to integrate the hopes and plans of large numbers of people, especially people whose educations have provided them with widely divergent tastes, plans, and goals.¹¹ The party must appeal to the primitive instincts held by the masses—especially negative instincts, such as vengeance against a hated minority.¹²

Once you admit that the individual is merely a means to serve the ends of the higher entity called society or the nation, most of these features of totalitarian regimes which horrify us follow of necessity. From the collectivist standpoint intolerance and brutal suppression of dissent, the complete disregard of the life and happiness of the individual, are essential and unavoidable consequences of the basic premise, and the collectivist can admit this and at the same time claim that his system is superior to the one in which the 'selfish' interests of the individual are allowed to obstruct the full realization of the ends the community pursues.¹³

What kind of person functions well in such a regime? Not the person who is best suited to production within a competitive free market.

10. Idem.

11. F. A. Hayek, The Road to Serfdom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1944), p. 138.

12. Ibid., p. 139.

13. Ibid., p. 149.

Or certainly not with the same outcome of his actions, even if the same person could perform well under both systems. The restraining hand of market competition—open entry for his rivals to meet the needs of customers—is now strictly political in nature. And in a centralized regime, this is not much restraint.

To be a useful assistant in the running of a totalitarian state, it is not enough that a man should be prepared to accept specious justification of vile deeds; he must himself be prepared actively to break every moral rule he has ever known if this seems necessary to achieve the end set for him. Since it is the supreme leader who alone determines the ends, his instruments must have no moral convictions of their own. They must, above all, be unreservedly committed to the person of the leader; but next to this most important thing is that they should be completely unprincipled and literally capable of anything. They must have no ideals of their own which they want to realize; no ideas about right and wrong which might interfere with the intentions of the leader.¹⁴

The more powerful the state, and the more concentrated the control of economic resources available to state administrators, the more opportunities there are for economic control through monopolistic economic manipulation. So, the more ruthless people will be those who satisfy their quest for power. The bigger the stakes, the more likely that least moral, most unscrupulous people will claw their way to the top. Why, then, should we expect to see the flourishing of the harmony of interests in a socialistic society in which central power is enormously strengthened by the fact that the administration of scarce economic resources is monopolized through public ownership of the means of production? Why should we expect to see the peacemakers succeed in attaining supremacy in a political order in which the quest for total power is the obvious inducement to enter the political process?

Conclusion

The harmony of interests is unquestionably a biblical standard. It is that social standard that existed in Eden, exists for the institutional church (I Cor. 12:12–17),¹⁵ exists now in heaven, and shall exist in the

14. Ibid., pp. 150–1.

15. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 15.

New Heavens and New Earth (Isa. 65:17–25).¹⁶ The entrance of sin into the world disrupted this world, but God has provided institutions that restrain such disharmony. The free market is one of these institutional arrangements that promote cooperation, even among those who do not agree on first principles. Class warfare, which is the ideological foundation of Marxism and the modern trade union movement, is foreign to biblical standards of morality. All things are reconciled in Christ (Col. 1:20; Eph. 2:11–16; James 2:1–9), including the supposed eternal struggle between classes.

The opening words of Marx's Communist Manifesto (1848) are familiar to most students of the history of socialism: "The history of all hitherto existing society is the history of the class struggles."¹⁷ Marx never did succeed in defining just what a class is. He never completed the third volume of Das Kapital, the last three paragraphs of which are devoted to the consideration of this crucial topic: "What constitutes a class?"¹⁸ But even if he had succeeded in accurately defining "class," within the framework of his own work, he would have been incorrect. The history of all societies is not class warfare, but ethical warfare against a sovereign God, and the working out of men's salvation and damnation over time. The history of mankind is the history of the extension of the dominion covenant. History is theocentric, not humanistic. Bloody warfare of man against man began with Cain and Abel; the origin of such warfare is man's ethical rebellion against God. As James put it: "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of the lusts that war in your members?" (James 4:1).

Redemption eventually will triumph over rebellion, and the harmony of interests shall be restored. It is man's task to extend the kingdom of God on earth, and to begin to reduce the effects of the sin-based disharmony of interests. This extension of God's kingdom serves as the down payment (earnest) of that future and final restoration of the full harmony of interests. Until then, all that we can hope to accomplish is to minimize the disharmony of interests by extending the rule of biblical law, which provides the social framework of the har-

16. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 16.

17. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party (1848), in Marx-Engels Selected Works (Moscow: Foreign Languages Publishing House, 1962), I, p.34.

18. Marx, Capital: A Critique of Political Economy (Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. Co-operative, 1909), III, The Process of Capitalist Production as a Whole, p. 1031.

mony of interests.¹⁹

The free market is, in the realm of economics, the most important institutional arrangement that has resulted from the application of biblical law to society. This is why we must affirm that free market economics is biblical economics, and why all forms of socialism or collectivism are the products of anti-biblical economics. This is why the free market order is an important institutional means of reducing the disharmony of interests by encouraging people voluntarily to mesh their individual plans by means of private property, freely fluctuating prices, and profit-and-loss statements.

19. It is important to understand that the division of labor within the family was designed to extend men's dominion over nature. The family unit was to be broken with each generation, even before the Fall of man. Speaking of marriage, Adam said: "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen. 2:24). The harmony of the family before the Fall was never to be intended to keep sons and daughters in the same immediate household. They were to leave, to bring the whole earth under dominion. After the Fall this pattern became even more important for the preservation of both harmony and dominion. In the mid-seventeenth century, the Massachusetts town of Sudbury was split between the older generation, which wanted to control access to common lands in the town, and younger men, who wanted freedom. Eventually, the younger men simply walked out of town, moved a few miles away, and established the town of Marlborough. This was the dominion aspect of the nuclear family in action. (See Sumner Chilton Powell, Puritan Village: The Formation of a New England Town [Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1963]). Isaac did not live with Abraham; Jacob did not live with Isaac. The so-called nuclear family of the Christian West is the biblical standard. The hierarchical patriarchy of Central European cultures, where sons remain under the immediate jurisdiction of the father, or grandfather, even to the point of dwelling under the same roof, is a non-biblical alternative to the nuclear family—an alternative that reduces harmony and geographical dominion. It is the nuclear family, not the clan order of classical civilization and other cultures, which is sociologically normative. It is also interesting to note that when immigrants from Central European cultures settle in Western Europe or North America, the patriarchal family orders are abandoned within a generation or two. They simply cannot compete with the biblical family pattern. Young men who are not compelled to put up with patriarchal authoritarianism choose the nuclear family. And on this point, their wives are in total agreement. They prefer to be subordinate to one man, not two, plus another woman. It is difficult to serve two (or more) masters. The nuclear family provides maximum harmony.

11

COSTS, CHOICES, AND TESTS

And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat (Gen. 3:6).

The theocentric principle here is ethics: point three of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Eve's Assumptions

Eve had already made a series of crucial assumptions about the nature of reality before she offered the fruit to her husband. She had already renounced the system of interpretation that God had given to her husband. God's revelation of Himself and the creation no longer impressed Adam and Eve. They decided to test the validity of God's word against the validity of the serpent's. In fact, they had already decided that God's revelation could not possibly be true, since He said that His word is true, and that they would be punished for sure if they ate of the tree. God had revealed an all-or-nothing universe, for it did not permit them the option of eating the fruit without punishment. They concluded that this all-or-nothing proposition could not possibly be true, for if it were true, they would surely perish. By affirming the hypothetical possibility that they might not perish, they were simultaneously affirming that God's denial of such a possibility had to be false. There was simply no possibility that they could eat of the fruit and retain the status quo ante. Everything would change. They hoped things would change for the better. They miscalculated. Eve was deceived. Adam was self-conscious. "And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression" (I Tim. 2:14).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

This was the sin of pretended autonomy. Van Til described the epistemological implications of this better than anyone else.

When Satan tempted Adam and Eve in paradise he sought to make them believe that man's self-consciousness was ultimate rather than derivative and God-dependent. He argued, as it were, that it was of the nature of self-consciousness to make itself the final reference point of all predication. He argued, as it were, that God had no control over all that might come forth in the process of time. That is to say, he argued, in effect, that as any form of self-consciousness must assume its own ultimacy, so it must also admit its own limitation in the fact that much that happens is under no control at all. Thus Satan argued, as it were, that man's consciousness of time and of time's products in history, is, if intelligible at all, intelligible in some measure independently of God.²

This is the essence of all modern humanism. It is basic to economic theory, and has been ever since the late seventeenth century.³ Van Til elaborated:

Adam and Eve were true theists at the first. They took God's interpretation of themselves and of the animals for granted as the true interpretation. Then came the tempter. He presented to Eve another, that is, an antitheistic theory of reality, and asked her to be the judge as to which was the more reasonable for her to accept. And the acceptance of this position of judge constituted the fall of man. That acceptance put the mind of man on an equality with the mind of God. That acceptance also put the mind of the devil on an equality with God. Before Eve could listen to the tempter she had to take for granted that the devil was perhaps a person who knew as much about reality as God knew about it. Before Eve could listen to the tempter, she had to take it for granted that she herself might be such an one as to make it reasonable for her to make a final decision between claims and counter-claims that involved the entire future of her existence. That is, Eve was obliged to postulate an ultimate epistemological pluralism and contingency before she could even proceed to consider the proposition made to her by the devil. Or, otherwise expressed, Eve was compelled to assume the equal ultimacy of the minds of God, of the devil, and of herself. And this surely excluded the exclusive ultimacy of God. This therefore was a denial of God's absolute-ness epistemologically. Thus neutrality was based upon negation. Neutrality is negation.

2. Cornelius Van Til, The Defense of the Faith, 4th ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: P & R, [1955] 2008), p. 115.

3. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1963).

This negation was bound to issue in a new affirmation of the supremacy of the human mind over the divine mind. Eve did not ask God, let alone her husband, to decide the issue placed before her. When there are claims and counter-claims someone must assume the role of absolute ultimacy. Eve was definitely placed before an "either or" alternative. Of course she would have denied this if you had told her so at the time. She would have resented being placed before any such alternative. She naturally thought that the issue was not irrevocable, but that she could experiment with the Satanic attitude for a while, and if it did not seem to work she could turn back to her old position of theism again. She thought that evil or sin was at the worst a stepping-stone to higher things, and that she could do all the stepping herself. In all this she was quite wrong. Whether she liked it or not she was, as a matter of fact, standing before an exclusive alternative. Only an action proceeding from the bosom of the eternal could place her on the right track again. It was God who had to reinterpret her deed and place it in its true setting in the universe. And this reinterpretation by God was a reversal of the interpretation given by man. Man had to be brought back to God. This in itself is proof sufficient that the decision on the part of man was antitheistic and not merely nontheistic.⁴

B. Subjective Value

All value is subjective, meaning personal. This does not mean that no value is ever objective. When we speak of subjective valuation, we simply mean "economic valuation made by a person." God is a personal being. He imputed value to His creation, calling it good, thereby confirming the goodness of His handiwork. The creation was not good in itself, meaning autonomously good or intrinsically good, irrespective of God's work and evaluation.⁵ God, not the creation, is sovereign. His word is determinative.

Man, as the image-bearer of God, also imputes value to the creation. He can impute value to the word of God itself. Man determines for himself the value of the choices he must make. This does not make his choices objectively correct. He can and does deviate from God's standards of value. God, being omniscient, knows exactly how much a person should give up in order to gain some item or achieve some goal. Men, being rebellious and unwilling to adhere to the law of God, frequently pay too much or try to pay too little for the things they pursue in life. They are unable to impute value according to the warning given by Jesus: "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36).⁶ If they cannot correctly value this key transaction in terms of its cost-effectiveness, how can they make accurate judgments concerning the true value of any other transaction? Yet they are required by God to do so.

4. Cornelius Van Til, A Survey of Christian Epistemology, vol. 2 of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: P & R, 1969), ch. 2, Pt. 1: "Neutrality."

5. Chapter 5.

Man imputes value to anything in terms of a hierarchy of values. He makes choices in terms of this set of priorities. Is it worth giving up this in order to attain that? It depends upon one's value scale. This value scale is constantly shifting, because tastes change, external conditions change, and men's first principles sometimes change. Every value scale is connected to some concept of authority. This is preferred to that because of the perceived correctness of one's value scale. The very idea of correctness implies the concept of authority. So, man makes his choices within the framework of some sort of authority structure. Choice requires basic standards of preference, and standards imply authority, meaning a source of ultimate sovereignty. Man never finds himself in a position of choosing in terms of one authority or no authority; it is always a question of which authority. Rushdoony stated this forcefully: "For a man to live successfully, he must have an ultimate standing ground; every philosophy is authoritarian, in that, while it may attack savagely all other doctrines of authority, it does so from the vantage point of a new authority. This new authority is a basic pretheoretical presupposition which is in totality religious and which rests on a particular concept of infallibility. Every man has his platform from which he speaks. To affirm that foundation without qualification is an inescapable requirement of human thought."⁷

Adam and Eve made a religious decision. For Adam, who was probably standing with Eve throughout the discussion as Genesis 3:6 makes clear, it involved the decision not to exercise marital leadership, not to step in and interrupt the proceedings; his wife made the initial decision, and he followed her lead.

6. Gary North, Trust and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Mark and John (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 11.

7. R. J. Rushdoony, Infallibility: An Inescapable Concept (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1978), p. 4. Reprinted in Rushdoony, Systematic Theology, 2 vols. (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1994), I, pp. 3–4.

Their decision was also an economic decision. It involved: a choice between two alternatives (eating vs. not eating); an assessment of expected future returns (tasty meal vs. numerous other possible tasty meals); an assessment of time requirements (instant special knowledge vs. conventional accumulated knowledge over time); and an evaluation of expected future costs (death vs. burdens of newly attained special knowledge). Obviously, they bore extremely heavy risks; in fact, they bore absolutely certain penalties. It was a no-win decision, unless God's grace might intervene to give them life. They did not accurately assess the true extent of these risks because they did not impute absolute infallibility to God's word. In fact, they valued God's word so little that they defied Him and ate. This indicates that they must have assumed that their risk was almost infinitesimal, for with the threatened penalty so awful, they must have radically discounted the possibility of that penalty's being imposed.

Eve valued the risk inversely to her valuation of the serpent's word: trusting his word, she discounted the risk while overestimating his promise that they would become as gods. In other words, she made a disastrous error in forecasting. She estimated the future cost of eating as being far lower than God had said, and she then made a terrible choice. She, Adam, and their heirs have paid the price ever since. Only because of God's common grace have men escaped the full penalty, in time and on earth, of their rebellion; and only because of special grace have some escaped the eternal penalty beyond the grave.⁸ The price was high.

C. Whose Communion Feast?

How little did Adam and Eve value God's word? We can get some idea by reflecting on what they could have done but neglected to do before they went to the forbidden fruit. God had placed two crucially important trees in the garden: the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 2:9). The tree of life was open to them prior to their rebellion. They could have gone to that tree, eaten its fruit, and then gone to the forbidden tree. Why did they ignore this seemingly obvious possibility? The tree of life would have protected them from death. Even in their fallen state, the tree of life would have given them eternal life, which is why God drove them out of the garden (Gen. 3:22–23).

8. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

To have taken God's word so seriously as to foresee the likelihood of their destruction as a result of their rebellion, they would have had to recognize the extremely high stakes in their gamble. If man needed the protection of God's tree of life in order to protect him from God's wrath, then man was indeed dependent on God's grace. If man can trust God's word regarding the basis of eternal life, then man can trust God's word concerning the basis of eternal death. In order for Adam to have truly reduced the risk of rebellion, namely, by eating from the tree of life, he would have been forced to acknowledge the sovereignty of God over life, and the absolute reliability of God's word regarding life. Had he taken God's word that seriously, Adam would not have rebelled. It was only because he regarded himself as the arbitrator between God's word and Satan's, and therefore the true source of judgment, that Adam discounted God's word. Adam had to assume that God's word could not possibly (or very, very improbably) be true in order to make the risk of rebellion worthwhile. To have gone first to the tree of life would have meant that man did take God's threat seriously, and that man needed the promised protection of God's tree of life. To have relied on the tree of life for protection would have meant the end of man's pretended claims of autonomy.

Adam had a choice: to choose life or to choose death. By the very nature of man's rebellion, he could not have deliberately chosen life first, since he would have been acknowledging ritually what his rebellion implicitly was denying: that the source of life is man's conformity to God's promises. His calculation of costs and benefits had to be made as covenant-keeping man or covenantbreaking man. As a covenant-keeping man, he would have reasoned as follows: "God's word is reliable, so I had better eat from the tree of life first, in order to protect myself. Protect myself from what? From the reliability of God's word concerning eating from the forbidden tree. But if His word is reliable regarding life, then His word is reliable concerning death. I had better not consider eating from the forbidden tree." Covenant-keeping man protects himself by adhering to God's word and taking God's word seriously! He does not make calculations (in his state of innocence, anyway) concerning the odds for or against God's word. To choose God's way to eternal life necessarily involves the rejection of God's way to eternal death.

Covenant-breaking man in the garden would have reasoned as follows: "God's word is not reliable, so I need not protect myself from any hypothetical effects of eating from the forbidden tree. His word is not reliable concerning death, so His word is not reliable concerning life. The odds against His word coming true are astronomically high, so it would be a denial of my own sovereignty, my own assessment of the low reliability of God's word, for me to eat from the tree of life as a calculated way of reducing the risk of disobedience. I have already determined that there is virtually no risk in disobedience. I had better not consider eating from the tree of life." Covenant-breaking man builds up his own self-confidence by adhering to his self-proclaimed autonomous word. To choose God's way to eternal death necessarily involves the rejection of God's way to eternal life.

After the judgment, of course, man knew experimentally how wrong his assessment had been. Then he would have been willing to eat from the tree of life. But the tree was closed to him. To eat of it now would have been theft. As a proven covenant-breaker, Adam would not be permitted to gain access to eternal life on his own terms. He had made his choice. His choice was the way to death. The presence of two special trees in the garden, one leading to life and the other leading to death, offers us a solution to an interesting question: "How long was Adam's period of probation to be?" Adam could essentially do three things. First, he could go straight to the forbidden fruit, thereby ending the period of testing in the garden. Second, he could go straight to the tree of life, thereby removing the threat of eternal death, but only by affirming God's word and by subordinating himself to God as a covenant-keeper. Third, he could postpone a choice between the two trees, concentrating his attention on other trees or other tasks in the garden.

There is no revelation concerning a specified period of testing. The Bible does not tell us that Adam had a day, a week, or a millennium to make up his mind. This should tell us that the period of testing involved the tree of life. If the test had been simply "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil" vs. "dressing the remainder of the garden," then the temptation would have been before him forever, or until God stepped in to tell him that it was over, that his refusal to eat the forbidden fruit for all this time proved that he was serious about obeying God. At that point, God would have granted him eternal life, and invited him to eat from the tree of life.

The Bible's words are more specific than this: "And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it" (Gen. 2:16–17a). The words are not only clear; they are inescapable: Adam had legal access to the tree of life. To conclude anything different is to deny the plain teaching of the text. To eat of the tree of life, however, required that Adam affirm God's word of promise concerning the way to eternal life. Indefinite temporal extension was what he had as a garden-dresser. Eternal life was more (and is more) than mere temporal extension, for it is definite, guaranteed eternal temporal extension, without the possibility of eternal death, without the presence of the forbidden tree before man. In other words, Adam's own assessment of the reliability of God's word determined the period of probation. When he had made up his mind to eat of one tree or the other in terms of how much he trusted God's word of promise, the period of probation would end. He would choose life or death, sacramentally, by eating from one of the two trees.

By viewing the test as a choice between eating or not eating from the forbidden tree, and nothing else, we implicitly deny man's ability in the garden to affirm ritually God's word of promise. Adam would then have had to say to himself, moment by moment, "I will not eat of that forbidden fruit because I believe in God's word. I will content myself to putter around in the garden doing other tasks. I shall wait on the Lord. Behold, today is not the day of the Lord. Behold, today apparently is not the day of salvation. But when that day comes, I will ritually affirm my commitment to Him. When God finally says to me that the period of probation is over, I will be found spotless. Then I will ritually affirm my commitment to His word by eating of the tree of life."

Yet throughout Scripture, the message is plain: ". . . behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation" (II Cor. 6:2b). God awaits man's affirmation of His word of promise. He encourages it. He does not tell man to delay in making such an affirmation. He does not ask man to remain in a condition of suspended judgment. He also does not ask us to affirm our faith in Him, and then leave us without a communion feast.

By placing the tree of life in the midst of the garden, God made available to Adam a sacrament of life. The forbidden fruit was Satan's sacrament of death. Both God and Satan call us to communion feasts. Paul warns us: "Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils" (I Cor. 10:21). Adam's period of probation would end in a communion feast: at the tree of life or at the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.

Adam was given time in the garden—all the time he chose to take—to make up his mind. The garden was a battlefield of faiths, a battlefield of ideas. Adam faced a decision, every moment of every day, the same decision that Elijah placed before the people of Israel on Mt. Carmel: “How long halt ye between two opinions: if the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word” (I Ki. 18:21). Every day that Adam spent in the garden torn between two views of God’s word, he would spend as the Israelites spent time: answering not a word.

The garden experience, of course, was to teach him. He was to learn about God’s reliable word, God’s eternal blessings, and God’s dominion covenant. But that learning experience was to bring him to the tree of life, to affirm his faith in God’s word sacramentally.

D. Revelation and Costs

The word of God is given to men for many reasons, but one of these is to enable them to reduce their costs of economic action. This enables them to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant with minimal expenditures of scarce economic resources. In other words, the word of God is given in order to prevent waste. Since God is the sovereign owner of the world (Ps. 50:10),⁹ it is understandable that He should expect us to work efficiently as honest, hard-working, and smart-working stewards of His property. God’s revelation of Himself and His law-order is our primary cost-cutting device. This revelation comes from a wholly omniscient God who controls all events, yet it is divinely designed to match the capacities of man, a creature. God’s revelation fits the mind of man, even as it fits the total creation. It offers us a tool of dominion. Men are offered a capital asset that reduces the cost of the most expensive and crucial of all scarce economic resources: information. Revelation reduces information costs, and in doing so, it thereby frees up other scarce capital assets—time, effort, money—that otherwise would have to be expended in testing. In fact, God’s revelation offers us a way of action without having to test certain aspects of reality that are, by design, beyond the ability of man to test accurately (Deut. 29:29). God’s revelation frees us from the demonic pursuit of exhaustive knowledge—a knowledge that must be totally perfect if it is to be reliable, since any aspect of creation could conceivably influence the operation of any other aspect of creation. The self-proclaimed autonomous man must therefore master all of the universe in order to be confident concerning his mastery of any small fragment of it. The covenantally faithful man does not have this burden over him; his God is omnipotent, and his God has provided him with the revelation of Himself and the rules of order necessary for prosperity and success in man's enterprise of dominion.

9. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

Eve, however, rejected this marvelous gift of revelation. She rejected this revelational tool of dominion. She decided that the conflicting interpretations of the rules concerning the forbidden fruit, the serpent's vs. God's, might be testable propositions. She believed herself capable of designing and executing a neutral empirical test between the word of God and the word of the serpent. As the arbitrator of truth, she could determine who was correct. Of course, she preferred to have her husband share in the responsibility of executing this cosmic test. But the risks seemed minimal, statistically remote, even insignificant. The odds against God's word were assumed from the beginning to be astronomically high, given the magnitude of the promised costs. They played a kind of cosmic lottery. The prize: "to be as God." The cost of the "ticket": the risk of eternal punishment. By imputing so little value to God's word, they imputed little cost to their rebellion. They would become instant gods.

There are costs associated with our choices. There are "real" costs, meaning objective costs, meaning costs imputed by God to each acting individual (Luke 12:48).¹⁰ God's subjective (personal) imputation of cost is the equivalent of a truly objective cost. Every act of man therefore has eternal implications; every idle word must be accounted for on the day of judgment (Matt. 12:36–37). There is no escape from the objective costs of our actions.

Nevertheless, there are also subjective costs imputed by acting men to their own and others' actions. Men make choices in terms of imputations and estimations, both concerning the present and the future. They are constantly searching for better, less costly, more accurate ways of imputing costs and benefits to the choices that confront them. They act in order to benefit themselves as they interpret benefits. Sometimes they make accurate ones in the face of universal opposition, as Caleb and Joshua did when they voted to spy on the people of Canaan (Num. 14). But they must make estimations and make decisions in terms of these estimations when confronted with choices over which they have the power of action.

10. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

There are many possible intellectual defenses of the free market economy, but none so strong, from a biblical point of view, as this one:

The free market economy provides men with an institutional and legal framework for making choices in terms of each man's expected benefits and each man's expected costs.

The free market economy closely links together choice, costs, and benefits. It makes each acting man responsible for his own actions in a direct fashion. It decentralizes the decision-making process, making possible the effective use of more and more specialized information—the division of intellectual labor. In other words, it allows each man to work out his own salvation (or damnation) with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12b).¹¹ It forces each man to bear the burdens of responsibility for his own actions. If he imputes accurately and plans successfully, then he reaps the rewards. If he fails in his task, then he bears the burden of failure. The “carrot and stick” both stand before him as motivation devices. The market provides a forum for testing the economic validity of his decisions, namely, price signals that can be used to estimate profit and loss. The subjective economic imputations of acting men, along with the registration of their actual decisions through a price system, combine to produce objective results. Men are taught to respect objective economic knowledge, even though that knowledge is the product of millions of subjective imputations. Their enterprises turn a profit or a loss. Their subjective imputations come face to face with hard, objective reality.

Another benefit of the free market is the rapid transmission of economic data. Men are taught to respond to the real world in an efficient manner, meaning rapidly. They are told whether or not they need to change their imputations and actions. They are told in a forceful manner: profits or losses. The faster they learn of their errors, the faster they are likely to alter their practices. The more forcefully the costs of their errors are registered, the faster they are likely to alter their practices.

Adam and Eve made the most expensive transaction in human history. We assess cost in terms of the most important or valuable use which we have to give up when we choose another economic (scarce) good or service. Cost is best defined as the most beneficial alternative which we must forego. Adam and Eve did receive instant special knowledge, but they paid a heavy price. They learned about good and evil, but from the standpoint of evil. They gave up ethical perfection, eternal life, and the opportunity to extend dominion only after they had received training in the curse-less garden. So horrendous was the price they had to pay, that Christ alone was capable of paying it in full (Isa. 53:5; Rom. 5:8). Christ became a ransom for many (Matt. 20:28). What Adam and Eve did was to make a decision that made them less than paupers, and Christ's actions restored wealth to the remnant: "Though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich" (II Cor. 8:9).¹² The costs were so high that Adam and Eve could not have calculated them successfully. They were not supposed to calculate the costs of rebellion to the last coin. They had God's command to guide them. They overestimated their estimating abilities.

11. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

Conclusion

The Bible affirms the reality and validity of God's Bible-revealed law. It is our standard of action. Therefore, it is our primary tool for cost-benefit analysis. It is a cost-cutting device because it provides us with universal guidelines that can be relied upon whether or not we have designed empirical tests to verify the benefits associated with a particular law, or the costs associated with disobedience. Men who reject the law of God are acting as Adam and Eve did. They are discounting the omniscience of God, the omnipotence of God, and the reliability of His word. The rejection of God's law is the first step of the would-be autonomous man in his quest to become as God, and ultimately to replace God. The rejection of God's law is the most expensive rejection of a capital resource that any man or any society can make. It substitutes for reliable knowledge the unreliability and astronomical costs of constant, universal, and eternal empirical testing—the testing of every fact in the universe.

Autonomous man first tests God's word, and then must test all other words and all other facts, constantly and eternally. He departs from the paradise of reliable law and enters the barren land of universal testing. The more autonomous he becomes, the more fascinated with tests, and the more despondent that the tests can ever produce reliable results. In the words of one 1960s critic of IQ (intelligence quotient) tests: "IQ tests test what IQ tests test." In short, that favorite screening test of 1930s humanistic educators was falling into disfavor, especially after certain racial minorities failed to perform well when taking them. The test was no longer assumed to test anything relevant.¹³ Yet humanists need screening devices, and quantitative tests have for centuries been the primary humanistic substitute for earlier screening devices, such as family name, moral character, or profit-and-loss performance. Losing faith in tests, modern man has no universally agreed-upon substitute for tests. The proliferation of testing, statistical surveys, data-gathering, sampling techniques, mathematical economic models, and similar supposed shortcuts for human decision-making has been the direct result of the philosophy of human autonomy and the systematic rejection of biblical revelation. Testing man has replaced covenantal man, yet it is man, not God, who has systematically failed the tests, even those devised by the experts in the field. We have imputed great value to our ability to test, and the costs of this error have been astronomical.

12. North, Ethics and Dominion, ch. 5.

13. Allan Chase, The Legacy of Malthus: The Social Costs of the New Scientific Racism (New York: Knopf, 1977), chaps. 10–13, 18–20.

12

SCARCITY: CURSE AND BLESSING

And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return (Gen. 3:17–19).

The theocentric principle undergirding this passage is God's sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

The starting point of all modern economics is here: the question of scarcity. The reason for this is the universality of scarcity. It is easy to gain a wide hearing for a system dedicated to overcoming scarcity, a widely perceived curse.² At zero price, there is greater demand for most things than there is supply to fill the demand. For some goods, such as air to breathe, there is normally no price, so air is not an object of purposeful human action. Of course, air in a submarine, or on top of a high mountain, or in a space ship will command a price; so will heated, filtered, or cooled air. But most resources are scarce most of the time, meaning simply that they command a price. We have to give up something in order to get something else. Even in the case of a free gift, the person who gives us the item had to give up something.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Biblical economics begins with the creation. This immediately raises the issue of ownership.

A. Scarcity and Eden

Was scarcity the product of rebellion? The explicit evidence of the Bible seems to favor this interpretation. We must speculate about conditions in the garden. Prior to the rebellion, the residents of the garden did not think that time would be a problem, or so their actions indicated. They did not immediately eat of the tree of life, so God banished them from the garden to keep them from attaining cheap eternal life (Gen. 3:22).³ They acted as though they thought they had endless life. If they could do as they pleased, thinking God's thoughts after him, naturally choosing exactly the food that was necessary or pleasing to them and refusing to worry about time, it is possible that they had no concept of scarcity. If a person knows exactly what he wants, and he has all the resources he needs to achieve his goals, and he is under no time constraints, and all "second-best" choices can be dismissed as irrelevant, then the cost of achieving his goals is zero. After all, whatever he gives up is worth nothing to him in comparison to the value of attaining his present goal. He is following God's will for him, and he is in perfect ethical communion with God. It may be possible to imagine that Adam operated in a zero-cost world. The day he rebelled, however, he paid the total price for something that seemed to be an inconsequential decision. He went from zero cost—acting in conformity with God's will in a totally abundant environment—to total cost. He lost his life and his zero-cost environment.

On the other hand, it is also possible to imagine that Adam did bear costs. He had choices to make. Perhaps he was not absolutely certain in each case just what he should do. Ethical perfection may not have implied such comprehensive knowledge of God's will that his every step in applying God's mandate to dominion was instinctively known to be exactly what God hoped for him at that instant. If he did have to give up the benefits of one course of action in order to achieve the benefits of some other course of action, then he faced scarcity. He paid a price for his actions. This seems more likely than a zero-cost world.

We do not know what kind of mental or instinctual relationship joined God and Adam in the garden, so we cannot say for certain whether his was an environment marked by scarcity. If a person wants one thing, and only one, at a particular instant, and has all that he wants at that instant, he does not face a scarce environment at that instant. It is a question of supply and human demand.

3. Chapter 13.

There is no question that God's curse of the ground created a new environment. From that point on, the earth has resisted man. Thistles that interfere with man's ability to extract what he wants from the ground have grown up to increase man's costs of attaining his goals. Man must sweat in order to eat. His labor is now unpleasant and burdened, or at the very least it is often frustrated and discouraging, unlike the labor in the garden. The labor in the garden was entirely pleasant. Man was simply fulfilling his purpose and exercising his God-given talents. "To labor is human," but in the garden, it was without a curse. God added vast new costs to labor, reducing its efficiency, while simultaneously reducing the psychological pleasure and incentive attached to labor. Man would now be compelled to labor by his environment; no longer would his mere humanity be relied on by God in order to encourage man to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant.

God had created an environment which allowed man the option of linear economic and personal development. Adam would receive basic training in the garden, and from there he was to have gone into the world with his heirs to subdue it, spreading paradise across the face of the earth. Adam's rebellion broke this linear development.

God's curse in response to Adam's rebellion brought death into the cycle: birth, growth, and death. Man was placed under the bondage of this cycle ("dust to dust"), as was the creation, which longs to find release (Rom. 8:19–22).⁴ In terms of the standards of the garden, this cycle was unnatural. There had not been death in the garden, at least not of animals; vegetarianism prevailed. Man and the animals ate the seeds of herbs and trees for meat (Gen. 1:29–30). Isaiah's language indicates that the blessings of restoration also involve an eventual return to vegetarianism, where the wolf and lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw (Isa. 65:25). This is not confined to the post-judgment world; it takes place in time and on earth, for the serpent is still cursed, still eating dust (Isa. 65:25).⁵ But the curse of the ground

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

5. It is possible that Isaiah's language is allegorical, and that he was referring to political tranquility rather than a world of vegetarianism. It is interesting, however, that so many religions of the East, and pseudo-religions of the West, have proclaimed the ethical requirement of vegetarianism. They want a return to vegetarianism prior to the total transformation of culture through regeneration and the extension of biblical law. Paul warned against these calls to a "premature" establishment of mandatory vegetarianism: "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall de-brought the animals under the rule of “tooth and claw.”

B. Linear History

The curse would of necessity slow down the fulfillment of the dominion covenant, simply because of the restraints placed on animal multiplication. The animals would now eat each other, and their numbers would be limited by the thorns and thistles that clogged up the formerly abundant productivity of the land. The fulfillment had to be linear, but the new law of nature was cyclical. To overcome this cyclical restraint, covenantally faithful men must apply the principles of biblical law. Linearity of economic growth, of the growth of both human and animal populations, is now a product of ethically faithful societies (Ex. 23:26).⁶ Linear development is not natural in the post-Fall world. Linear development is the product of a philosophy of life—a religious outlook—and few cultures in history have maintained anything like it. Paganism promotes a cyclical view of life, using the regularities of the cursed, post-Fall agricultural world as its standard of human development. Cursed cyclical nature has become normative for pagan social thought.⁷ part from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them who believe and know the truth” (I Tim. 4:1–3). The eating of flesh was basic to the ritual celebrations of Israel (Deut. 12:15, 20). Parts of certain offerings belonged to the priests, the right shoulder going to the priest as a heave offering, and the breast going to Aaron and his sons (Lev. 7:31–32). The idea that the Bible teaches vegetarianism as a mandatory way of life is unquestionably heretical. As an ideal for a period of external kingdom blessings, during a millennial reign, it appears to be valid, though voluntary.

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 58.

7. Stanley Jaki, the historian of science, contrasted the cyclical views held by the Chinese, Hindus, Greeks, Babylonians, Mayans, and Arabs with the linear view of orthodox Christianity. Why did science develop only within the intellectual framework of the Christian West? “Needless to say, many factors—geographical, social, economical, and political—played a part in the stillbirth of the scientific enterprise in the various ancient cultures. The only common factor in all cases seems, however, to be the commitment to the cyclic world view.” Jaki, “The History of Science and the Idea of an Oscillating Universe,” in Wolfgang Yourgrau and Allen D. Breck (eds.), Cosmology, History, and Theology (New York: Plenum Press, 1977), p. 140n. He developed this idea at considerable length in his book, Science and Creation: From Eternal Cycles to an Oscillating Universe (Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, [1974] 1980).

C. Common Curse, Common Grace⁸

We generally focus our attention on Adam's plight and the ground's curse. We see mostly wrath in both. Nevertheless, there was also grace in both curses, since we define grace as an unearned gift of God to man or the creation. As in all manifestations of God's common wrath, there was also common grace. This grace-curse produced special curses for the rebellious and special benefits for God's elect. By rebelling, Adam deformed the nature of man. Men would no longer naturally cooperate with each other in the tasks of dominion. Because of the murder in their hearts, they would search for ways of stealing from their fellow men and killing them. Man had rebelled against God; man's descendants would normally seek to destroy all those made in God's image. Mankind therefore needed external and internal restraints in order to survive. Men were now alienated from each other because they were alienated from God. Something was needed to heal this alienation. God provided a new incentive for men to be civil, cooperative, and helpful: self-interest.

Originally, the earth brought forth abundantly. Now it brings forth thorns and thistles. From the curse onward, men would have to cooperate in order to dig wealth out of the cursed ground. The division of labor is now imperative for successful, efficient, low-cost production. There are no free lunches in a cursed, scarce world. There are also no free murders. Every man's labor can be useful to others in the marketplace. Murder a man, and you remove a source of productivity from the marketplace. You remove someone who might have made your work easier or your wealth greater. Battling an uncooperative nature, men need the division of labor more now than they did prior to the rebellion. They need each other to enjoy the full potential of each person's productive capacities. The curse of the ground is a sign of God's grace: given the perverse nature of man, a less productive world is necessary to save him from his own self-destructive ends.

Having to work is also a way of draining energy that might have been put to perverse ends. Men have less free time to scheme and pillage. They have less strength. Part of the energy of nature was rechanneled by God into avenues that would thwart men's evil plans. Time, capital, and energy spent towards increasing the productivity of the land could not be used simultaneously to commit murder and mayhem. The curse of the ground helped to produce a zone of safety for men from their fellows. Man was made to sweat in order that he might not have to bleed.

8. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

Poverty for the ungodly is a special blessing for the godly, even when the godly share in the poverty. Why should this be? Precisely because hungry ungodly men are compelled to beat swords into ploughshares in order to survive. Wealth-provided leisure time will eventually be spent in perverse ways, most often in lust, warfare, arson, and rape. Rich rebellious nations can use a greater portion of their wealth to construct even more efficient weapons.

It must also be pointed out that the curse of the ground is also a blessing for the ground. Men in a scarce world must treat the creation with care if they wish to retain the productivity of the ground. This is one of the important reasons why private property has so often been a means of preserving the ground from pollution and soil erosion. Where private property is compromised or unenforceable—"free" air, "free" streams, "free" oceans, "free" land—we tend to find ecological disturbances.⁹ Men rush in to get "their" share of the "free" goods, with little thought of the future, simply because they have little or no control over the future use of public property. They can control the future use of private property, and the costs come out of their capital resources, which provides a great incentive to use the resources in a cost-effective manner—one which respects the future expected benefits of the resources.¹⁰ There is a strong tendency, though not an invariable law, for men to take better care of the creation when they are allowed to take possession of the fruits of their labor on their parcel of the creation.¹¹ Again, it is scarcity which pressures innately lawless men to observe God's laws concerning the creation.

The curse of the ground is a form of grace to the godly—an unearned gift—for it allows them to work out their faith with less fear and trembling concerning the actions of the ungodly. It is also a form of grace—an unearned gift—to the ungodly, for it allows them to work out the implications of their anti-Christian faith in ways that are less harmful to other ungodly men, godly men, and the creation: grace leading to destruction (Luke 12:47–48).¹² The ungodly are given life. They are given power. They participate in history—a kind of stay of execution. Their labors increase the wealth of the believers, since all share in the blessings of greater productivity. Common curse (sweat, death, and thistles), common grace (time and incentives to cooperate), special curse (final judgment), and special grace (salvation): all are involved in God's retaliation against evil.

9. Garrett Hardin, "The Tragedy of the Commons," Science (13 Dec. 1968). (<http://bit.ly/HardCom>)

10. C. R. Batten, "The Tragedy of the Commons," The Freeman (Oct. 1970). (<http://bit.ly/BatCom>)

11. Edwin G. Dolan, TANSTAAFL: The Economic Strategy for Environmental Crises (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1971); J. H. Dales, Pollution, Property and Prices (University of Toronto Press, 1970). T. D. Crocker and A. J. Rogers, Environmental Economics (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1971). On the disastrous state-enforced, state-subsidized pollution in the Soviet Union, see Marshall Goldman, The Spoils of Progress (Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1972).

Conclusion

The goal of a godly man is to overcome the curse of the ground and the curse of his own flesh. He is to accomplish this through applied faith. Biblical law is to serve as the tool of overcoming the curses. The cycles of nature are to be overcome through godly agriculture (greenhouses and hydroponics are examples), life is to be greatly extended (Isa. 65:20), thistles are to be minimized, and full production is to be achieved (Deut. 8:7–9).¹³ Linear growth is to overcome long-term cyclical stagnation.¹⁴ But it takes the covenantal faithfulness of entire cultures to begin achieving such goals over the long run. Without special (saving) grace, success becomes arrogance, and arrogance is visited with destruction (Deut. 8:19–20;¹⁵ 28:15–68).

Scarcity is therefore to be regarded as a curse, but not an unmitigated curse. It has its blessings in a world of corrupt, lawless, ethically rebellious men. It must be overcome through biblical law, not through revolution, humanistic social planning, communal living, or the abolition of private property. It is to be overcome by a systematic, universal, long-term application of biblical law to every area of human life. It is only in cultures made up of predominantly (though not exclusively) godly men that this kind of long-term reduction of grinding poverty, meaning excessive scarcity, can be expected.

12. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

13. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 20.

14. North, Dominion and Common Grace, ch. 5.

15. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 23.

13

THE BURDEN OF TIME

And the LORD God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil: and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever: Therefore the LORD God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken. So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life (Gen. 3:22–24).

The theocentric foundation of this passage is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Life and Death

God threw Adam out of the garden paradise. The garden was to have served as his training ground, the base of operations for the conquest of the world. His rebellion made it necessary to remove him from the garden. He was not to achieve eternal life simply by eating the fruit of a tree, for this would provide him with mere temporal extension. He had already abandoned life as a God-fearing subordinate under God. Life is not simply conscious existence, for if it were, we would have to conclude that there is life in hell. But the Bible says that life is to be contrasted with death, and eternal existence without God is the second death (Rev. 2:11; 20:6). Paul wrote that “to be carnally minded is death” (Rom. 8:6). Adam surrendered to the principle of death on the day he rebelled; his body survived for centuries thereafter, since he died at age 930 (Gen. 5:5). Physical death is a curse imposed by God to remind men of their rebellion and the fact that they are spiritually dead as a result of that rebellion. Therefore, paradise was closed to Adam. He could not escape the burden of physical death—the first death—by eating of the tree of life, since paradise was no longer accessible to him or his heirs. He had to look forward to the establishment of the New Jerusalem, beyond the grave and beyond the bondage of sin, where the tree of life once again is accessible (Rev. 22:2). Not by the works of man's hands, and not by swallowing a particular fruit, can man regain his ethical standing before God. The essence of life is right standing ethically before God, and Adam had forfeited life.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

The burden of time was placed on his physical body. His years would now be limited. He would be given a fixed amount of time to work out either his salvation or damnation with fear and trembling. Infinite time, apart from regeneration, was forbidden to him.

Time is therefore central to any philosophy of life and death. Men desperately wish to escape the burdens of time, yet they fear death's cessation of temporal existence. The meaning of time is an inescapable concomitant to any consideration of the meaning of life.

The ancient world apart from the Hebrews believed in some version of historical cycles. Nature's seasonal changes were regarded as normative. The world continues through endless cycles. Hesiod's poem, Works and Days, which was written at about the same time that Isaiah's ministry began, was one Greek's speculation about the rise and fall of civilizations and even the creation itself. This cycle began with the age of gold, degenerated to the age of silver, and continued through the age of brass.² Ours is the dead age of iron, he said. His language was similar to the visionary dream of King Nebuchadnezzar: the great image which was made of gold, silver, brass, and iron mixed with clay. But the end of that image was total destruction by the stone cut without hands, which smashed the image before growing into a great mountain which filled the earth (Dan. 2:31–35). The kingdoms of man will be replaced by the eternal kingdom of God (Dan. 2:36–45). History in the biblical outline is linear, not circular.

The ultimate uniformity in all pagan systems of thought, whether it is cyclical nature, commitment to evolutionary development, or belief in the static and fundamentally unchanging structure of "pure being," cannot be challenged successfully by any pagan deity. The central uniformity is the sovereign; gods and men must conform themselves to this fundamental sovereign. Both the gods and mankind are in bondage to it. Man must submit to its power. Time is the god of paganism, and chance is his enemy.

2. Hesiod, Works and Days, lines 109–201.

The Genesis account is hostile to the concept of uniformitarian temporal processes. Rates of change are not constant over time. In the garden of Eden, Adam did not bear the burden of time, just as he did not bear the burden of alienated, cursed labor. He worked and passed through time, but time was no threat to him. Rather, time meant opportunity. The curse was still in the future. The constraints of time did not weigh him down as they do his heirs. He named (classified) the animals of the garden (and perhaps all animals) in a portion of one day. His mind must have worked with the speed of a modern computer, but analogically (thinking God's thoughts after Him) rather than digitally, for he was a full personality under the sovereignty of God. His handling of the facts of nature was completely in terms of the categories given to him by God as God's image-bearer. He worked rapidly, just as God had worked rapidly to create the universe in six days.

This indicates that the processes within time prior to the Fall were explicitly unlike those of today. God is not bound in the straitjacket of fixed rates of change which now seem to bind fallen mankind. His fiat word determined the speed of creation, not the needs of random evolutionary processes. God did not need huge quantities of time to accomplish the creation. Therefore, it should not be difficult to imagine that Adam, as made in God's image, exhibited the capacity to deal mentally with the universe which God had created. Adam's mind was analogous to God's; it was precise, comprehensive, and rapid in its operations.

B. Prodigies

Every generation has numerous individuals who can perform prodigious feats of mental computation. These gifted individuals can solve various kinds of problems, frequently mathematical, with seemingly impossible speed. Consider the Dutch mathematician Willem Klein. He performed the following calculation in front of audiences. He was assigned a number of 499 digits by a computer. This number was the product of another number multiplied by itself 73 times. His task was to calculate this 73rd root in his head. In two minutes and 43 seconds, he solved it. The number was 6,789,235.³ Shakuntala Devi, an

3. People (Sept. 27, 1976).

Indian prodigy, was not quite so impressive, but she could find cube roots of six-digit numbers faster than students could find the answer on hand-held calculators, or she could find the cube of 777. She could instantly tell you what factorial 13 is, which is 13 times 12 times 11, and so forth, down to one: 6227020800. “Never use commas,” she said. “They’ll only confuse you.” She could tell you what day of the week it was on (say) Nov. 3, 1949. But she could not describe how she accomplished these feats.⁴ Eric Jablow taught himself how to read by the age of 20 months, or possibly sooner, and he taught himself calculus at age 6. He graduated from Brooklyn College with highest honors at age 15. He had attended graduate school lectures in mathematics as early as age 7.⁵ These people were obviously abnormal, yet people like them are common enough in every generation to remind us of what we have lost since the Fall.

A question could legitimately be raised concerning the source of these abnormal powers of mind. Is it possible that demonic, occult forces are behind them? In some cases, it is not only possible but probable. But no universal generalization can be made with complete confidence. A case of one occultist who developed extraordinary mathematical powers as a result of his family’s trafficking with demonic forces was the great Indian mathematician Ramanujan, who died at the age of 32 in 1920.⁶ His biographer, S. R. Ranganathan, devoted several pages to a discussion of Ramanujan’s occult background. He reported having a dream as a young man. The family goddess, Namagiri,

... wrote on his tongue. Thereafter his precocity developed suddenly. It has been stated by his mother that he was born after her parents had prayed to the Goddess to bless her with a son. There is another piece of information current in Ramanujan’s family. His maternal grandmother was a great devotee of Goddess Namagiri. She would often go into a trance and speak as Goddess Namagiri. In one such trance, before the birth of Ramanujan, she is said to have uttered that, after her own death, the Goddess would speak through the son of her daughter.⁷

His mother was an astrologer, and she predicted her son’s death a

4. Washington Post (Oct. 4, 1976).

5. Washington Star (May 22, 1977).

6. In the popular movie, Good Will Hunting, the university mathematician refers to him briefly in a discussion with Robin Williams’ character.

7. S. R. Ranganathan, Ramanujan: The Man and the Mathematician (Bombay: Asia Publishing House, 1967), p. 13.

month before it happened. She consulted another professional astrologer about her son's horoscope without revealing whose it was, and he confirmed her fears.⁸ He would narrate occult experiences to his friends in India. He possessed (or was possessed by) powers of precognition; he could foresee future events.⁹

Ramanujan and his family were ardent devotees of God Narashimha (the lion-faced incarnation [avasara] of God), the sign of whose grace consisted in drops of blood seen during dreams. Ramanujan stated that after seeing such drops, scrolls containing the most complicated mathematics used to unfold before him and that after waking, he could set down on paper only a fraction of what was shown to him.¹⁰

It must not be supposed that Ramanujan was some obscure, though talented, Indian mystic. He was brought to Cambridge University by Prof. G. H. Hardy, who long after regarded the young man as one of the most talented mathematicians of his era. He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, a major honor. Nor is his biographer an obscure mystic; he was the official biographer for Ramanujan's Collected Papers, and he included some of these details of Ramanujan's occult background in that biography.

Hardy himself provided an example of Ramanujan's remarkable abilities. He had visited the young man at a sanatorium.

- HARDY: I came in the taxi-cab 1729. It is rather a dull number. I hope it is not an unfavorable omen.
- RAMANUJAN: No, it is a very interesting number.
- HARDY: How?
- RAMANUJAN: It is the smallest number expressible as the sum of two cubes in two ways. ($1729 = 1^3 + 12^3 = 9^3 + 10^3$).¹¹

C. Time and Modern Science

The bondage of time came after the Fall. Like the curse of the ground, it was both a curse and a blessing. It set limits on men's ability to work out the implications of their rebellion from the beginning, and as men nevertheless tried to develop their capacities for further rebel-

8. Ibid., pp. 13–14.

9. Ibid., pp. 88–89.

10. Ibid., p. 87.

11. Ibid., p. 113. This incident is cited in several thousand Web pages about him.

lion, God placed additional limits on them, such as shorter life spans, death through the Noahic Flood, and the division of their language and the scattering of their habitations at the tower of Babel (Gen. 8–11). The curses restrained their evil, and therefore served as blessings for the godly. The ethical benefits outweighed the loss of longevity and the scattering abroad.

Also, like the curse of the ground, the bondage of time is to be lifted progressively. As men increasingly conform themselves to the laws of God, human society is to be restored to something approaching the garden paradise, and even beyond. After all, that paradise was a training ground for dominion. The preliminary manifestations of the new heavens and new earth that are described in Isaiah 65 serve as down payments on the final restoration beyond the day of judgment. But these days of external blessing are to be worldwide in scope, not confined to a tiny strip of land a little east of Eden. This earthly triumph will not be perfect, for sinners will still do their work (Isa. 65:20). Nevertheless, it will be a world more like paradise than hell.

The passage describes the end of conflict between carnivorous animals and their prey (Isa. 65:25). It also describes the lengthening of mankind's days on earth. These words do not refer to the post-judgment New Heavens and New Earth, for in that period there will be no sinners mingling with saints, and no death whatsoever. Isaiah announced: "There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed" (Isa. 65:20). God can permit longer lives, even of sinners, since their influence in this period will be minimal compared to the influence of the godly. This will be in time and on earth. The curses of time will be progressively diminished in response to the creation of godly institutions and the preaching of the gospel. Longevity, which is a gift of God for ethical obedience (Ex. 20:12), will be restored, indicating that time will have had its curse aspects minimized.

It might be possible to interpret Isaiah 65:20 in terms of modern rates of economic and cultural change. Rather than taking the words literally, we might argue that compound annual rates of economic growth of 2%, 4%, or even 6% have produced such extraordinary changes in the modern world in such a brief period of time—one average human lifetime—that the typical Western industrial nation's citizens live the equivalent of several lifetimes of those living in Isaiah's day. In effect, the modern West has developed an economy which permits people to “pack” several lives into one. Therefore, we might conclude, Isaiah 65:20 has been fulfilled allegorically or symbolically in today’s growth-oriented economies.

There are several problems with such an interpretation. First, the words of the passage speak of “an hundred years old” as a child’s age. Second, today’s high rates of economic growth have not been the product of spiritual renewal. What we have seen is an inverse relationship between Christian orthodoxy and economic growth: the worse their spiritual condition, the more material possessions modern men receive. We are viewing conditions analogous to those described in Deuteronomy 8:12–17, where men attribute their wealth to their own autonomous efforts.¹² Today’s wealth appears to be a prelude to God’s judgment. Per capita wealth is rising in the West, but population growth is declining. A major blessing of God is being withheld: children.

Today’s rates of economic growth cannot be sustained for centuries. The compounding process at 2% per annum, let alone 6%, creates astronomically high per capita wealth in a few centuries. We will run into the limits of growth eventually. Humanism may be nearing the end of its rapid economic growth rates, at least in terms of industrial growth. Most of the twentieth century was a radical historical aberration: large-scale mass production financed by monetary inflation, compounding annually, decade after decade. This is not the culmination of Christian orthodoxy but of arrogant secular humanism which is steadily consuming its moral foundation, namely, the cultural veneer of Christian orthodoxy. If anything, modern industrialism is a demonic imitation of Isaiah 65:20, the substitution of historically unprecedented economic and cultural change for long-term social progress and increased life expectancy through the application of biblical law to society. It is “eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we die.” A biblical social order offers longer life spans and slower, less radical social change which can be sustained by the environment—social, ecological, and psychological—over centuries.

The emergence of modern science and technology came in response to the establishment of godly rule on a far wider basis than ever before. Lynn White, Jr., chronicled the important technological developments of the Middle Ages.¹³ Medieval Catholic culture was far more

12. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 21.

13. Lynn White, Jr., Medieval Technology and Social Change (New York: Oxford productive than the pagan cultures that it replaced. But it was the Protestant Reformation which unleashed the forces of modern science.¹⁴ Loren Eiseley, the anthropologist-historian who was successful as a popularizer of Darwinian evolution in the mid-twentieth century, understood this more clearly than most of his fellow scientists: “The experimental method succeeded beyond men’s wildest dreams but the faith that brought it into being owes something to the Christian conception of the nature of God. It is surely one of the curious paradoxes of history that science, which professionally has little to do with faith, owes its origins to an act of faith that the universe can be rationally interpreted, and that science today is sustained by that assumption.”¹⁵

Christianity was instrumental in producing the beginnings of applied science. Applied science and technology stemmed from the understanding of the world which affirmed its orderliness and man’s access to knowledge of its processes. The fact that the mind’s logic, especially mathematical logic, conforms to the operations of the external world is nothing short of a miracle—an unexplainable coincidence from the standpoint of post-Darwinian science.¹⁶ Yet Christian writers have always provided an explanation: man is made in the image of God, the Creator. Applied science has now produced tools of dominion that enable man to approximate the lost skills of Adam in the garden. Even Willem Klein was finally replaced by a computer at the European Center for Nuclear Research (CERN). When the Center hired him in 1958, he was more efficient than their computer in many areas. Simple men with inexpensive calculators can perform mathematical computations faster than the early computers of the late 1940s, University Press, 1962).

14. For an introduction to this question, see the two articles that appeared in The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VI (Summer 1979): “Medieval Speculation, Puritanism, and Modern Science,” by Charles Dykes, and “The Role of Puritan Calvinism in the Rise of Modern Science,” by E. L. Hebden Taylor. See also Robert K. Merton, “Puritanism, Pietism, and Science,” in his book, Social Theory and Social Structure (Glencoe, Illinois: The Free Press, 1967), ch. 17; R. Hooykaas, Religion and the Rise of Modern Science (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972); and E. M. Klaaren, Religious Origins of Modern Science (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1977).

15. Loren Eiseley, Darwin’s Century (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1958] 1961), p. 62. See also Stanley Jaki, The Road of Science and the Ways to God (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978).

16. Eugene P. Wigner, “The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences,” Communications on Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>) Cf. Vern S. Poythress, “A Biblical View of Mathematics,” in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976), ch. 9.

and which no tools could perform rapidly prior to 1945. There is a problem with such devices, however: they have almost allowed rebellious man back into the “garden” without saving faith and biblical dominion. Men may wish to find an escape from the bondage of death, thereby allowing them access to infinite temporal extension for the purpose of indulging their lusts. Yet their tools of dominion now threaten all of civilization, for the tools of dominion can produce and have produced mighty weapons, allowing us to turn ploughshares into swords more efficiently.

D. Time and Economics

Unquestionably, technology has permitted us to make more efficient use of our time. Time is the resource, above all, which men seek to conserve, if only to waste it in unfulfilling leisure activities. Time is mankind's only absolutely irreplaceable environmental resource. It is the human resource which confounded the attempts of Solomon to deal with in terms of the logic of autonomous man (Eccl. 1–3). Time's limitations led the psalmist to declare: “My days are like a shadow that declineth; and I am withered like grass” (Ps. 102:11). Time is in short supply—only one earthly life per customer!

1. Time Orientation

Time is the fundamental component in all economic planning. It is the foundation of a proper explanation of the phenomenon of the rate of interest. The interest rate stems from the rational distinction in each person's mind between an economic good enjoyed in the present and the same good enjoyed in the future. Goods to be used in the future are less valuable than the same goods used in the present (other things being equal, as the economist always says). Some men value present consumption very highly. They will therefore sacrifice the use of a presently owned resource only for large quantities of scarce economic resources in the future. These people will loan their assets only at high rates of interest. The premium of present goods over future goods is very high; some economists call this “high time-preference.”¹⁷ This present-orientedness is a crucial factor in slum communities and in underdeveloped (backward, primitive) nations.¹⁸

17. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. XVIII, sec. 2, see also pp. 496–99. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

18. Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), argued

In contrast are those who are distinctly future-oriented. They have low time-preference, and consequently, they are willing to forego the present use of a scarce economic resource for relatively small increases in the future. These people will loan resources at low rates of interest. Compared with backward cultures, future-oriented cultures place a high premium on future income. The low interest rates make it possible for entrepreneurs to borrow resources (money) in order to expand the supply of future goods and services. Their profit margins can be lower because the rate of interest they have to pay is low. More projects can therefore be undertaken than would have been possible had interest rates been higher. These people do not feel the burden of time so heavily as those who are present-oriented. They see the future as a world to be overcome. They see time as a tool of dominion, not a means of escape. Time is seen as an opportunity for future dominion. The Puritan work ethic went (and goes) together with future-orientation. Both serve to increase economic productivity. When this faith erodes, economic growth is bound to slow down.

People buy in the market what they desire and can afford. High time-preference people want instant gratification, and they pay high interest rates for loans that enable them to buy today's consumer goods. Compared to future-oriented people, they want present goods more than they want future goods. So, investment opportunities dry up, since entrepreneurs cannot generally afford to pay the high interest rates that present-oriented people demand on their loaned funds. Therefore, output stagnates or declines. The supply of future goods drops. But this is exactly what the high time-preference people wanted. They discounted the value of future goods so much that potential producers of future goods decided not to produce them. They placed a low value on future goods, and the market responded accordingly. On the other hand, low time-preference societies have high rates of savings and investment. They place a high value on future goods. They are not nearly so present-oriented. Consequently, they lend money at low rates of interest, which stimulates the output of those future goods that they value so highly. People get what they pay for, and future-oriented societies demand far more future goods than present-oriented societies do. They want economic growth in the future, and this is exactly what they buy by giving up present goods. This is a major factor in economic development.

that one's class position is a function of one's attitude toward the future, with lower-class people being present-oriented. In Mises' terminology, they have high time-preference. See pp. 47ff., 62, 72, 163ff. The American ghetto suffers from massive present-orientedness. Sociologist Helmut Schoeck has pointed out that envy in primitive cultures prevents people from sharing their views of the economic possibilities of the future with those outside the immediate family unit. "No one can even begin to have rational aspirations for the future unless he has a realistic view of what that future may be; but no such prognosis can be made so long as each member of the group carefully keeps hidden his view of the future." Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1970), p. 46.

It is a familiar aspect of the human condition to desire a return to paradise. After all, paradise is what God originally intended for us. But the flaming sword was to remind Adam and his heirs that the return to paradise must be in terms of God's saving grace and His law-order, not in terms of man's autonomous labors. Godly men are to strive, through faith and labor, to conquer the burdens (curses) of time and scarcity. It is when men try to escape these burdens altogether, or to conquer by means of statist tyranny (the Moloch state), that their quest for paradise is illegitimate. There are numerous ways that men have devised to escape from time and its burdens, but all are illegitimate: drunkenness, drugs, nudity, primitive chaos festivals (Carnival, Mardi Gras), mystical union with a monistic god through asceticism, Marxian revolution, and so forth. The numerous books written by Mircea Eliade are accounts of these various attempts to escape time's bondage.¹⁹ The Christian answer is hard work in terms of biblical law, and low interest rates that are the product of a religiously based future-orientation. These are the fruits of personal and cultural maturity.

2. Low Interest Rates

It is important to understand, however, that low interest rates must be the products of voluntary exchange. They are not to be legislated by a civil government which is seeking to play God by increasing productivity through legislative fiat. When men are honest, ready to repay loans at any cost, the risk premium in any interest rate will drop. When governments refuse to inflate the currency, the price inflation premium disappears, or even becomes negative, also keeping interest rates down. When men are future-oriented, interest rates will be low. But when the state attempts to legislate the benefits of godly social order apart from these three features—low risks, low or no price inflation premium, and low time-preference—then bureaucrats merely succeed in drying up the supply of loanable funds on the free market. They impose a price ceiling on loans, and as always, the result is a shortage of the price-controlled good, which in this case is loanable money. A black market for loans springs up, with high interest rates compensating the lenders for the risks of breaking the law. Interest rate ceilings (usury laws) succeed merely in misallocating scarce economic resources.²⁰

19. On Eliade's works, see Guilford Dudley III, Religion on Trial: Mircea Eliade and His Critics (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1977), chaps. 2–4.

Economic growth is the product of covenant-conforming human action: thrift, honest dealing, hard work, future-orientation, care for one's calling (vocation), etc. The function of civil government is to enforce biblical law, including modern applications of Old Testament law (such as traffic laws). There are no long-term fruits apart from biblical roots. The cheap imitations of paradise that have been created by modern Marxism, socialism, and Keynesian interventionism-inflationism are leading not toward a New Heavens and New Earth, but toward a new hell on the old earth.

Modern man believes that time has been operating for at least 13 billion years. He sees the processes of time as essentially unchanging, or uniformitarian. For better or worse, what man is today has come as a result of slow, continual changes over time through the process of evolution through natural selection. Time is seen as a burden to be overcome through science, through economic manipulation, or through some sort of new evolutionary leap which will at last speed up the process of evolution.

The Bible tells us that the processes of time have changed radically in the past, as a result of man's Fall. Men in the post-Fall period lived long lives, but man's life span was steadily shortened after Noah. Yet as a result of ethical conformity to God, men's lifetimes will once again be lengthened. As far as we know, time is a constant, but the processes of time vary in terms of man's ethical relationship to God and His law-order.

Temporal extension is to man what eternity is to God. Temporal extension makes it possible for man to accumulate knowledge and power, for good or evil. Time also makes human freedom possible: as each man moves into the future, he makes choices among options, which is what freedom means. God's freedom, of course, is immediate, timeless, and eternal.

20. Murray N. Rothbard, Power and Market: Government and the Economy, 4th ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute. [1970] 2006), pp. 38–39 (<http://bit.ly/mrpam>); Armen A. Alchian and William R. Allen, University Economics, 3rd ed. (Belmont, California: Wadsworth, 1972), p. 471.

Time, therefore, is a true blessing and opportunity for regenerate men. It is not without burdens this side of the new creation, but it is not fundamentally a burden, as it is for the rebellious. Those who wish to escape time altogether are rebellious. They choose occult methods of achieving secret knowledge, mystical illumination, or some secret formula to give them perfect power or perfect protection. Work-in-time was an opportunity for Adam. Work-in-time-under-the-curse is a burden for sinful man. The unregenerate hope to escape work and time by becoming omniscient, omnipotent, and even eternal like God. The godly man hopes to escape the curse of time by overcoming sin and working in time, as directed by the guidelines provided in God's law.

Conclusion

Time, matter-energy, and space appear to be constants in the creation. Certainly, we do not delay the coming of God's day of judgment by manipulating the universe in some way. Time does not change, but the processes within time's fixed limits do change, and so do men's attitude toward those processes. Men may view time's processes as opportunities to be used to the glory of God, or as burdens to be overcome through autonomous scientific techniques, magic, or mystical illumination. But time remains man's theater of response to God.

It is therefore understandable that the modern state should attempt to seek control of the processes of time, as well as to seek to control those features of the economy that are the product of a particular religious perception of the meaning of time. The secular humanist state seeks to attain the benefits of low interest rates by imposing usury laws that force down the legal, visible rates of interest in the various loan markets. The bureaucrats try to promote economic growth by lowering short-term interest rates by increasing the money supply, in a vain attempt to increase long-term production. They attempt to stimulate economic growth in the ghetto, or in backward foreign nations through humanistic, tax-supported schools, or through tax-financed welfare programs of all kinds. They do not deal with the central problem of the ghetto and the underdeveloped nation, namely, the present-orientation of those who make up the bulk of the backward or poverty-stricken population. Indeed, "poverty-stricken" is a phrase indicating that poverty is an active force that suppresses the innate creativity of man—a hypothetical universal creativity. But men's time perspective can overcome all the foreign aid funds that any government agency might send into a high time-preference culture. What men believe has more relevance than the goods that men receive from messianic, humanistic civil governments.²¹ If time is seen as a burden, welfare funds can do little to lower the pressure of this perceived burden. And where time is seen as an opportunity for conquest, the funds for expansion will be generously provided by private loans from people who want to invest in productive cultures marked by future-oriented entrepreneurs. Capital flows toward those who believe in the future, who accept the burdens of time as an opportunity for personal growth and personal profit. To gain access to the capital assets of unwilling investors, the messianic state confiscates the funds of the productive in order to divert the normal flow of capital toward time-conquerors and away from the time-conquered. The state shifts capital toward the time-conquered in the hope that the mere possession of capital, apart from a new vision of time, will be an effective substitute for a change of time perspective—a sort of mechanical alternative to regeneration. The bureaucrats speak of inducing a “take off into self-sustained economic growth.”²² The results are almost uniformly negative.²³ Manipulation through coercive wealth redistribution is not an effective alternative to a culture-wide shift in people's perceptions of time and its burdens.

21. P. T. Bauer, Dissent on Development: Studies and Debates in Development Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1972), pp. 78ff., 87, 202ff. See also Bauer, Equality, The Third World and Economic Illusion (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1981).

22. Walt W. Rostow, The Stages of Economic Growth (Cambridge: At the University Press, [1960] 1971). For extended critiques of Rostow's “take off” hypothesis, see the published debates of the International Economic History Association, ed. Rostow: The Economics of Take off into Sustained Growth (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1963). Rostow was still clinging to his take off thesis in his extraordinarily detailed book, The World Economy: History and Prospect (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1978), where he still spoke of a “post-take-off stage, the drive to technological maturity,” p. 59. As a one-volume introduction to the known details of economic history in the West, and an introduction to the secondary sources of the discipline as of the mid-1970s, this book is very useful. It is marred, as are all of Rostow's books on economic history, by a lack of any integrating market theory, other than the “take off” hypothesis, which he tended to de-emphasize in his later years.

23. P. T. Bauer argued that Rostow's stages are simply another variation of the fallacy of historicism. See his critical essay reprinted as chapter 18 of his book, Dissent on Development. As Bauer wrote, “Growth can never be self-sustaining in the sense of continuing irrespective of the maintenance or evolution of appropriate attitudes and institutions and the pursuit of sensible policies,” p. 485.

PRIMITIVE NOMADS

And she again bare his brother Abel. And Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground (Gen. 4:2).

This passage has to do with dominion: point three of the biblical covenant model.¹

There was no myth cherished more in twentieth-century anthropological scholarship than the mid-nineteenth-century hypothesis concerning primitive man, the nomad. Anthropologists believed that human social groups were relatively recent, dating back about 60,000 years. However long ago it may have been, men supposedly roamed alone or in packs, eating wild berries or other plants that grew wild, hunting animals, and drifting with the productivity of nature. Then, about 10,000 years ago, men in the fertile crescent region of the Near East discovered the skills of animal husbandry and agriculture. Shepard Clough's evaluation is representative: "Here was one of the major technological revolutions of all time, for only in settled societies is man able fully to meet Western culture's criteria of civilization. At least no nomadic society has ever done so."² This narrative account assumes the validity of evolutionism's presuppositions concerning society and its origins: from animal to human being to social being. Nomadism supposedly evolved into civilization by means of certain technological discoveries.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

2. Shepard B. Clough, The Economic Development of Western Civilization (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1959), p. 22. It is interesting that this statement critical of nomadism was dropped from a later edition of this standard textbook: Clough and Richard T. Rapp, European Economic History: The Economic Development of Western Civilization (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1975), p. 18. The revised sentence ends where the clause critical of nomadism began: "Here was one of the major technological revolutions of all time."

A. No Agricultural Revolution

The Bible says that Adam knew about both agriculture (dressing the garden) and animal husbandry (naming or classifying the animals) from the very beginning. His two sons received sufficient training from their father to embark on their respective careers. One was a husbandman, and the other was a farmer. The division of labor had already manifested itself, with each man concentrating on his own specialty. Evolutionary anthropologists and social historians have assumed that the simpler tasks of hunting animals and picking wild berries necessarily preceded the more complex tasks of domestication, both of animals and plant life. Yet the dominion covenant explicitly states the reverse: covenantally obedient men are required to subdue the world—domesticate it—to the glory of God. It is only when men seek to abandon the requirements of this dominion covenant that nomadism becomes a factor in human history.

The division of labor that we see in the case of the two brothers had been an explicit part of human life from the beginning. Eve was given to Adam in order to assist him in his tasks (Gen. 2:18; I Cor. 11:8–9). The division of labor principle was acknowledged by their sons. Presumably, this specialization of their skills was mutually beneficial to each man, since each could concentrate his time, capital, and knowledge on one area of the economy while enjoying the fruits of the other man's calling through voluntary exchange. Each wound up with more agricultural produce and sheep products than would have been possible had each of them tried to produce both products. The costs of dominion were reduced.

The dominion covenant is also referred to as the cultural mandate. This phrase is appropriate, for apart from the combined efforts of individuals acting cooperatively through market competition, the subduing of the earth would become far more difficult to coordinate, and far more expensive to regulate. Culture, the product of cooperative human action, is vital to the tasks of domestication. Men are expected by God to set down roots, build for the future, establish permanent institutions, and increase in wisdom. From the beginning, men formed communities. Cain built a city (Gen. 4:17). Civilized men have always feared the life of nomadism. Cain pleaded with God that the life of a vagabond was more than he could bear as a punishment, and God graciously reversed this condemnation (Gen. 4:12–15). It was too great a curse.

The advent of nomadism, especially the individualistic form, is a sign of social devolution. Chronologically, nomadism came later than civilization in human history, contrary to the religion of evolutionism. Nomadic tribes are often fierce warriors, but they leave few records of their own and no culture. The Huns, for example, left almost no trace of their years of conquest. The major history of the Huns written in the twentieth century was a lifetime research project which was never fully completed by its author.³ He had to master many languages in order to reassemble the story of the Huns, since there were only fragments available, in many geographical regions, written by their victims and enemies across different geographical regions. Victorious on horseback, they were eventually swallowed up by the cultures they conquered, leaving no literature of their own to testify to their importance.

B. Rootless

A wandering tribe that operates in terms of the stripped earth policy or theft is clearly rebellious. Like the years of wandering in the wilderness by the Israelites, nomadism is a curse of God. Men who try to escape from the ethical burdens of laboring under the terms of the dominion covenant are often tempted to escape into this form of cultural rebellion. Hitchhiking in the United States has always been the practice of the poor, the hobos, the criminals, and the rootless young.⁴ Police departments and other crime-fighting organizations have long warned drivers not to pick up hitchhikers, since there are so many criminals or disturbed, dangerous people among their ranks. It was no coincidence that in the years of the counterculture, 1965–72, there were millions of teenaged youths on the roads of the Western nations, all looking for a free automobile ride to nowhere in particular. The nomad's life is a life of few responsibilities, which is why nomadism increased so rapidly when the counterculture appeared.

There is little question that the most universally recognized American figure is the cowboy. Celebrated in movies, books, and television shows, the romantic figure of the lone cowboy, the ultimate rugged individualist, has been a favorite since the actual era of the cowboy in the 1870s and 1880s. The bulk of the stories are fictional, as is the romantic framework within which the legend of the cowboy operates. They were men of little capital, no vision, and no future.⁵ Those who became successful generally ceased being cowboys and became entrepreneurs who hired cowboys at low wages. The American cowboy was a phenomenon of one generation of economic expansion. He survived mainly in legend and fantasy, but there he has survived tenaciously. It is revealing to consider the fact that the television show Gunsmoke was the longest running, primetime dramatic series on American television, surviving two decades from the mid-1950s to the mid-1970s. It is also revealing that the show lasted about as long as the actual era of the cowboy did, especially if we consider the extra years that the show ran on the radio, prior to the television series. If we consider reruns of the series, it has long outlasted the era of the cowboy.⁶

3. Otto Manchen-Helfen, The World of the Huns, ed. Max Wright (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973).

4. See the "classic" document of the so-called "beat generation," Jack Kerouac's On the Road (New York: Viking, [1957] 1974).

The popularity of the American television series of the early 1960s, Route 66, also testifies to the widespread acceptance of nomadism as a fantasy idea just prior to the advent of the counterculture. Two young men roamed the country in an expensive sports car, a Chevrolet Corvette, which was apparently traded in each year for the latest model (the show was sponsored by Chevrolet), despite the fact that neither man had any visible signs of employment. Then Came Bronson, a one-year series in the late 1960s, featured a nomad on a motorcycle. Each show was introduced by a scene where Bronson is stopped at a traffic light, and a man in a station wagon, the symbol of family responsibility in America, looks at him and says, "Where are you going?" "Nowhere special," Bronson answers. "Boy, I wish I were you," the man replies. "Well, hang in there," says Bronson, and zooms away as the light turns green. Here was the heart of the message of romantic nomadism: the lure of low-responsibility existence, the lure of the road. The cowboy no-mads of American fiction brought law and order with them, though they themselves may have been on the fringes of the Establishment's law. The modern fictional nomad lives on the fringes of culture

5. On the cowboy as nomad, see the autobiographical books by Will James: Lone Cowboy (Barrington, Illinois: Peter Wolfe, 1930), and Smokey (New York: Scribner, 1926). The title of a third James book is appropriate: The Drifting Cowboy (Barrington, Illinois: Peter Wolfe, 1925).

6. Sometime around 1983, I had an opportunity to tell this to the show's star, James Arness, at a conference where I spoke. I gave him a copy of the first edition of this book, where I referred to the series. Arness played Matt Dillon through five decades, 1950s–1990s (made-for-TV movies).

and brings existential alienation. The real nomads of the counterculture brought (and still bring) disease, such as venereal disease and lice. Shortly after its inception, the counterculture was literally all loused up.

There is no question that nomads are primitive. They are not future-oriented. They do not build for the future. Whether in the African veldt, the Australian outback, the pre-Columbus American plains, the post-Civil War American plains, the wastes of the Arabian desert, or on Route 66, the nomads cannot build a civilization. God paralyzed the people who attempted to build the tower of Babel by scattering them. The wanderer is culturally impotent. But what must be understood is that primitivism is primarily a religious and ethical outlook; it is not some hypothetical steppingstone in man's upward evolution. It is a religion opposed to civilization.

Rootless men are not long creative. It is not surprising that, by 1980, American corporations were finally questioning the practice of moving executives from city to city every few years. They encountered increasing opposition from their employees, who now better understood the strains that such nomadism creates for the family. In the long run, the large American corporations will find that stronger community and family ties will benefit the companies, since productivity will increase in higher management.

C. Autonomy vs. Community

The autonomy of modern urban life, with its atomized life styles, has built-in limits. Unstable neighborhoods in which few people know more than one or two families on the block are easier targets for burglars and other criminals. The requirements of self-defense have prompted some neighborhoods in large American cities to establish "neighborhood watches," where people will look out for the property and homes of others on the block, or even create "citizen's patrols," with a car full of residents who patrol the street nightly looking for suspicious signs and phoning the police on cell phones if they think the police should investigate. Invariably, crime drops in such neighborhoods; it is cheaper for the criminals to work in more atomized neighborhoods.

An advertisement appeared in the TV Times supplement to the Los Angeles Times on Sunday, July 22, 1971. Television guides were read primarily by women, as the advertising revealed. In this case, however, the appeal was made to the needs of the whole family. It was an advertisement for a Karate school, where students could learn the martial arts of the East. The headline reads: "My Sons and I. . . ." In smaller type, we read: "Morris Stapler of Torrance says, through our training in Karate, my sons and I have drawn closer. The few hours a week we spend together training does more for our father-son relationship than camping once a year." Here is an ad that would warm a mother's heart. At last, a way to get the boys together with their father! And while they are communicating together, they will be learning how to punch out the backbones of muggers and potential rapists. The advertising agency had sensed the multiple needs of the families of the notoriously rootless region of southern California.

The quest for community can become pathological, of course. Twentieth-century totalitarian regimes used the language of community to gain the commitment of the urban rootless, as well as the rural peasantry who had their religions and institutions shattered by the intrusions of the West. The conservative American sociologist, Robert A. Nisbet, wrote in 1953:

The greatest appeal of the totalitarian party, Marxist or other, lies in its capacity to produce a sense of moral coherence and communal membership to those who have become, to one degree or another, victims of the sense of exclusion from the ordinary channels of belonging in society. To consider the facts of poverty and economic distress as the causes of the growth of communism is deceptive. To say that the well-fed worker will never succumb to the lure of communism is as absurd as to say that the well-fed intellectual will never succumb. The presence or absence of three meals a day, or even the simple possession of a job, is not the decisive factor. What is decisive is the frame of reference. If, for one reason or another, the individual's immediate society comes to seem remote, purposeless, and hostile, if a people come to sense that, together, they are victims of discrimination and exclusion, not all the food and jobs in the world will prevent them from looking for the kind of surcease that comes with membership in a social and moral order seemingly directed toward their very souls.⁷

It is significant that the book in which this statement appears, The Quest for Community, went almost unnoticed when it was first published in 1953. A few conservative scholars knew its theme, but other intellectuals ignored it. Its tide was changed to Community and Power in the 1962 paperback version. But it was changed back after 1965; the counterculture explosion brought the theme of the quest for community before the eyes of the intellectuals. Nisbet's career made a quantum leap only after the counterculture's advent, when the book became very popular. Also, as he once admitted, it helped when Commentary, the Jewish intellectual monthly, began to shift rightward, using his articles to help buttress the case for less radical politics and more conservative traditions. Jews, he said, buy a lot of books and read them, especially serious books.⁸

7. Robert A. Nisbet, The Quest for Community (New York: Oxford University Press, [1953] 1965), p. 37.

Conclusion

Like Cain, who feared the vagabond's existence, men cannot long bear the burdens of total rootlessness. Nomads will always be in the minority. Still, modern culture, with its philosophical and moral rootlessness, can conceivably become a temporary blessing. It provides a zone of freedom for Christians to begin to rethink and rebuild the foundations of culture. But this reconstruction must always be in terms of an ideal of permanence. The intellectual and cultural nomadism of modern urban secularism is a temporary phenomenon. Christians have an obligation to gain skills now, in every field of life, so that they will be prepared to replace the world's leadership, at every level, when secularism's cultural nomads wander off into the wilderness of drugs, retreat, totalitarianism, or suicide. We must move forward culturally, not in a static, nomadic circle. The static cycles of nomadism are demonic.

8. Nisbet made this statement to me in the late 1960s, although I cannot remember exactly when. I studied social theory under his guidance during the late 1960s. He was on my Ph.D. dissertation committee.

15

THE SIN OF ENVY

And in process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the LORD. And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof. And the LORD had respect unto Abel and to his offering: But unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect. And Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell. And the LORD said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door. And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him. And Cain talked with Abel his brother: and it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him (Gen. 4:3–8).

The theocentric focus of this passage is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

The passage begins with an account of two men's offerings to God. These offerings revealed both men's commitment to God's hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant model.² God accepted one and rejected the other. The text does not say why. From later revelation, we know: God required a blood sacrifice. He required a representative substitute (point two) for man's sin. Abel imposed the ultimate sanction of an animal: death. Cain offered an agricultural sacrifice. It was rejected because there was no negative sanction involved, and also no legal representative. There was only an economic loss. Man cannot buy his way into favor with God.

Cain was angry. Why? Because he had believed that the best of his labor could buy favor with God. Wasn't his sacrifice just as great as Abel's? Economically, perhaps. Judicially, no.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstypm>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Sutton, ch. 2; North, ch. 2.

God condemned Cain. He told him that his anger was not justified. He warned him of sin lying at the door. Then, without warning, he added a benefit for righteousness: "And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him." Why? Because Cain was the older brother. He was the firstborn son. This was a position of honor even before the Mosaic law. The Mosaic law mandated a double portion of an inheritance for the firstborn son (Deut. 21:15–17).³ As the older brother, Cain deserved deference from Abel, even in their adulthood.

A. Envy and Self-Destruction

Cain did not benefit directly from the murder of Abel. His sacrifice would be no more acceptable to God than it had been before. In fact, it would be less acceptable. He was now a murderer. He did not kill Abel as a way to gain acceptance with God. He killed him because he resented the fact that Abel had experienced a success, whereas Cain had experienced a failure. Cain was so upset by discrepancy between Abel's success in his own failure that he believed that he could escape this sense of inferiority only by killing Abel.

Abel had not harmed Cain. They both could have brought acceptable sacrifices. There was nothing about Abel's sacrifice that kept Cain's sacrifice from being accepted by God. Abel's success was completely independent of Cain's failure. Abel did not cause Cain's failure.

There was nothing that Abel could have done or could do in the future that would make Cain's sacrifice acceptable to God. Cain deeply resented the success of Abel. He resented it so much that he killed him.

There was nothing that Abel could have done to buy off his brother. The very fact that he would have been in a position to buy off his brother would have constituted another reason for hating him. Cain resented the success of Abel. Any form of payment from Abel would have reminded Cain that Abel was in a better position than Cain was. There was no way that Abel could have escaped his brother's resentment by any payment to his brother.

This is why envy is so difficult to deal with. It cannot be placated by the victim. The fact that the victim is in a position to placate the envious person only makes the envious person more envious. He resents the fact that the other person is in a position to grant him any benefit whatsoever.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 50.

Cain did not kill Abel to gain anything that belonged to Abel. He did not kill Abel in order to gain favor with God. He killed Abel because he resented the fact that Abel had been successful, and he had failed.

B. Envy vs. Jealousy

Cain was not a herdsman, nor did he want to become one. Abel was going to be his subordinate. God had promised this. By killing Abel, Cain did not gain favor with God. He lost what little favor he possessed: the position of the first-born son. He did not gain acceptance with God for his agricultural offerings by destroying Abel's ability to make animal offerings. He lost his safety from negative sanctions. He was no richer. He was poorer. Yet none of this swayed him. He wanted his brother out of the way, no matter the consequences.

The sin of envy is different from the sin of jealousy. The jealous person sees that someone else possesses something that he wants. He seeks to gain ownership of it. If he cannot do so through voluntary action, he seeks to gain ownership through violence or the threat of violence. He may be willing to compromise. He may settle for less than owning all of whatever it is. He is open to negotiation. He is not offering an all-or-nothing deal. If he can gain partial ownership, he is satisfied. "You had all of it. Now I own some of it. I win."

Envy is different. The envious person resents the other person for whatever he possesses. The difference between them galls him. He is not content with being placated. The very fact that the other person is in a position to placate him galls him. He is motivated by the desire to destroy, not the desire to possess. "You own it. I cannot have it. I will destroy it."

The envious person does not seek to gain equality through redistribution. He seeks equality through wealth destruction. By bringing down the person to his level, he gains a sense of satisfaction. He sees a benefit from the destruction of the other person's advantage. It is not that the envious person achieves greater wealth through obtaining all or part of what the other person owns. He can be satisfied only when the other person has been pulled down from his pedestal. The victim cannot successfully negotiate.

Jealousy can be bought off. If somebody is jealous about another person's possessions, he wants the other person's possessions. If there is some way that he can gain ownership of some or all of these possessions, the jealous person will be satisfied. He does not resent them richer person because of the person's riches. He just wants some of those riches. He wants the rich person to share with him.

The envious person does not want the rich person to share with him. He resents the fact that the rich person is in a position to share anything with him. He does not wish to settle the matter by gaining access to the other person's possessions. He wants to tear the other person down, irrespective of whether this will benefit him.

The sin of envy is far more destructive than the sin of jealousy. It is all-encompassing, highly focused, and relentless. Only by destroying the other person's perceived advantage can he gain relief from the internal drive that moves him toward destruction.⁴

Envy is a destructive sin. It is internal. So, common measures to deal with it fail. The envy-driven person cannot easily overcome this sin, for the aggravating difference between him and his victim cannot be overcome. They stand as a testimony against him. He is inferior. The fact that Abel would remain his institutional subordinate did not placate Cain. Nothing placated him.

C. The Second-Born Son

The narrative of the Old Testament reveals a pattern: inheritance by the second-born son. Adam was the firstborn son. He sinned. He was punished. Cain was the firstborn son. He sinned. He was punished. His younger brother Seth became heir of the covenant line (Gen. 5:6–9). Ishmael was Abraham's first-born son. Isaac inherited. Esau was Isaac's first-born son. Jacob inherited. Manasseh was the first-born son. Ephraim inherited (Gen. 48). The New Covenant rests heavily on this Old Covenant pattern. Paul wrote: "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit" (I Cor. 15:45). Death came through Adam. Life comes through Christ.

Cain, the first-born son, murdered the second-born son, Abel. This cost Cain dearly. First, he would not rule over Abel. Second, he would spend his life under God's negative sanction. He had been a skilled farmer. He would henceforth be forced to learn to live in a city. "And Cain went out from the presence of the LORD, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east of Eden. And Cain knew his wife; and she conceived, and bare Enoch: and he builded a city, and called the name of the city, after the name of his son, Enoch” (Gen. 4:16–17). Third, his son inherited a city, but not the covenant line. Seth inherited that. Cain did not rule over Seth.

4. The best study of envy is Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Fund, [1966] 1987).

Cain was a loser. He knew he was a loser. Yet he offered no sign of repentance for his sins: offering an agricultural sacrifice to God, being angry with his brother, rejecting God’s gift of authority over his brother, slaying his brother, and seeking to conceal this from God (Gen. 4:9). He cared only about the threat of sanctions from his brothers. “Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me. And the LORD said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. And the LORD set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him” (Gen. 4:14–15).

Cain was an unrepentant sinner. His main sin was murder. But murder was the effect of a deeper sin: envy.

Conclusion

Cain was driven by envy against Abel. He killed Abel as a way to deal with his resentment of God’s favor toward Abel and His lack of favor toward Cain. He was willing to suffer the loss of his social position in order to remove Abel from his sight. He gained no wealth; on the contrary, he lost it. He had been a farmer. He lost his land. He had been an heir of God. He became a disinherited son. Only by understanding the nature of the sin of envy can we make sense out of Abel’s action.

16

TO KEEP A BROTHER

And the LORD said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not: Am I my brother's keeper? (Gen. 4:9).

The theocentric issue in this passage is God as the sanctions-bringer: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

The reason for my decision to include a chapter on this passage in an economic commentary on the Bible has nothing to do with the meaning of the passage, its implications, or its economic content. The context of the passage has very little to do with economics as such, except possibly the lawlessness of using coercion and violence against one's fellow man.

Unfortunately, the passage has become a familiar one in liberal political and theological circles. "My brother's keeper" has become a catch phrase. More to the point, "your brother's keeper" has become the shibboleth of shibboleths of the so-called Social Gospel movement,² second only to "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man."

The standard explanation of this passage—completely out of context—is that each man owes his neighbor a great deal. Specifically, we all collectively owe each other life, liberty, and property, especially property, and most importantly, property confiscated from the rich through political action. We are supposedly the legal guardians of the poor, the infirm, and the feeble-minded. We have this responsibility not as Christian individuals, members of churches, or contributors to voluntary charities, but as members of the body politic. We become

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Ronald C. White, Jr. and C. Howard Hopkins, The Social Gospel: Religion and Reform in Changing America (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1976).

our brother's legally responsible keeper for these two reasons: first, he is poor and we are not; second, both the poor and the rich are under the sovereignty of civil governments. We are all brothers because of our shared humanity under the universal Fatherhood of God, but more importantly, because of our shared humanity under the sovereignty of the state. It matters less to advocates of the Social Gospel what kind of God men believe they are sons of, than what kind of state men believe they are subordinate under. Their frame of reference is far more political than theological.³

A. The Prosecutor's Question

What was the context of Cain's response to God? First, he was a rebel whose sacrifice God had rejected (Gen. 4:5). Second, Cain had murdered his brother (Gen. 4:8). At this point, God approached Cain with a question concerning his brother's location. Cain answered with a lie: he did not know. Then he justified this lie to an omniscient God by asking a rhetorical question: "Am I my brother's keeper?"

What did this phrase mean? It should be obvious, but it is not obvious to the defenders of the socialistic Social Gospel. Cain sought to justify his supposed lack of knowledge concerning his brother's whereabouts. How was he supposed to know where Abel was? After all, was he Abel's keeper? We have to ask ourselves, what is the meaning of "keeper"? The Hebrew word used in Cain's rhetorical question is transliterated shawmar, meaning "guard, guardian." It is used specifically in I Samuel 17:20 to refer to guarding sheep. Strictly speaking, shawmar is not normally translated as "shepherd," but the nature of Cain's response indicates that "shepherd" was one meaning Cain had in mind. Cain was being very clever. Was he the guardian (shepherd) and Abel an incompetent, like some sheep? Of course not. Abel was in fact the shepherd (rawhaw, "keeper" or "shepherd"), not Cain. Abel was an independent, responsible man, not some helpless, stupid beast. Why, then, should God imagine that Cain had any knowledge about Abel's whereabouts? Did Abel report to Cain concerning his daily schedule, as a prisoner might report to a guard? Was Cain his brother's keeper? Of course not. Abel was the shepherd, not Cain; sheep are kept, not humans.

Cain asked this rhetorical question in a vain attempt to justify his

3. Joel McDurmon, God versus Socialism: A Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009).

supposed lack of knowledge concerning his brother's whereabouts. Yet it was precisely this knowledge that Cain possessed. He was unquestionably not his brother's keeper; he was his brother's murderer. He was not a protector of the helpless, but rather a murderer of the responsible. He was being interrogated by his own Creator. Somehow he deluded himself into believing that his questioner, God, would accept Cain's retort that there was no reason for Cain to have any knowledge concerning his brother's location. After all, both brothers were independent men and neither was his brother's keeper.

B. A Question of Control

The meaning of "keeper" here implies the relationship between a controlling shepherd and a flock of docile, stupid, incompetent, wandering, helpless, and very profitable sheep. The primary economic function of sheep is, after all, to be sheared. They are to serve the financial (and sometimes gastronomical) desires of their masters. Anyone who begins discussing the state's supposed function to serve as a "keeper," meaning either "shepherd" or "guard," had better understand that the word "shepherd" implies "sheep," and the word "guard" implies "inmates"—or at the very least—it implies "wards."

This fact was understood by Herbert Bird when he wrote: "For to be one's brother's keeper implies just what Cain insinuated that it does—to supervise, in greater or lesser measure, another's life; to take it upon oneself to determine what is good for someone else; to override his liberty, and even his personality, in the interests of a social theory. To be one's brother's keeper is to control him."⁴ Anyone who misinterprets Cain's words, using the phrase "my brother's keeper" or some similar phrase, is saying that others are not responsible for themselves and their own affairs, and that they have a moral and legal right to part of the property of their neighbors. Having a legal right to his property thereby brings the coercive state into the picture. "We," meaning the state, meaning those who control the state, meaning politicians and especially bureaucrats, are supposedly responsible for the welfare of others. The state therefore has the obligation to serve as the official keeper of the unfortunate, the ignorant, the infirm, the lazy, the rebellious, the intoxicated, the unemployed, the extravagant corporations inefficient enough to go bankrupt and large enough to create worries about the economic and political effects of their impending bankruptcy, and the banks that have made too many noncollectable loans to too many insolvent debtors, and everyone else who gets into economic trouble from time to time and begins to clamor for tax-supported government aid. “We” become full-time keepers, except when we are already full-time sheep. The tax burden of being full-time keepers increasingly convinces people that they are not much better off than sheep, who at least do not have to do anything in order to be fed, clothed, housed, and entertained. The state becomes the keeper, and productive citizens are sheared of their wealth, while the welfare recipients are sheared of their self-respect, independence, and incentive to work.⁵

4. Herbert Bird, "Am I My Brother's Keeper?" The Freeman (May 1966), p. 56. (<http://bit.ly/BirdBrother>). Rev. Bird was an Orthodox Presbyterian Church missionary to Eritrea for many years.

God’s answer to Cain’s lie and his rhetorical question: God knew where Abel was, Cain knew where Abel was, and judgment had now arrived. In short, He paid no attention at all to Cain’s rhetorical question. Cain was a murderer, not a keeper. Abel had not been a sheep. He had been a man. Judgment had arrived.

Some of those who parrot the “brother’s keeper” phrase may be nothing more than ignorant, misled, good-hearted people who know little about the Bible and less about responsible living apart from coercive wealth redistribution. But those who first made the phrase popular were not ignorant about the Bible. They knew very well what the Bible said, and they rejected its testimony. They were determined to rewrite the Bible, misinterpret the Bible, and create a new secular humanist religion in the name of the Bible.⁶ They knew the power of the pulpit in the United States, and they sought to capture the seminaries, religious publishing houses, and religious newspapers in every denomination.⁷ With few exceptions, they had achieved their goals by 1940 in the North, and by 1965 in the South. The seminaries had become liberal by the 1930s in most of the denominations, so it was just a matter of time. Commenting on the career of Walter Rauschenbusch, perhaps the most influential defender of the Social Gospel in his era (around 1910), historian C. Gregg Singer wrote:

Rauschenbusch was keenly aware of the necessity of a policy of deception in introducing his brand of Christian Socialism into the churches of this country. He thus gave it a name that was designed to make it seem evangelical in character and not revolutionary at the same time. Calling for the Christianization of the social order for the realization of the kingdom of God, Rauschenbusch avoided demanding the government ownership of the railroads and other public utilities. He simply called for governmental controls of various kinds, confident that such a program would eventually bring the kind of socialism he wanted. He was willing to uphold a policy of gradualism in his program of social and democratic revolution.⁸

5. Gary North, “The Hidden Costs of Free Lunches,” ibid. (April 1978).

6. Robert M. Crunden, Ministers of Reform: The Progressive Achievement in American Civilization, 1889–1920 (New York: Basic Books, 1982).

7. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996). (<http://bit.ly/northcf>)

The statist theology of “my brother’s keeper” is consistent, though its advocates are deeply involved in the deception of Christians and others who do not recognize it for what it is. It is a theology of substitution: the state for the God of the Bible. It was enormously successful in confusing twentieth-century American Christians. It helped to convince them to promote political actions that are diametrically opposed to those recommended in the Bible. At the minimum, Bible-believing Christians have been convinced that there is nothing in the Bible to counter the message of social improvement through state action. Some have even gone so far as to claim that there is no such thing as Christian economics, and therefore the dominant ideology of wealth redistribution through state coercion should not be challenged biblically. Yet the proponents of the Social Gospel have almost universally been advocates of a rival religion, the religion of secular humanism. Singer put it well when he concluded:

The development of liberalism in the twentieth century pushed the God of the Scriptures further into the background of human affairs and gave an increasingly important role to man himself so that God, to the extent to which he was considered at all, was benignly regarded as an ally of progress and democracy. He could cooperate with the human race should he desire to do so, but any refusal on his part would not be taken too seriously by those in control of the situation in this country. . . . For many leaders the very term “God” had ceased to symbolize much more than the vague yearning of humanity for a better life on earth and the realization of the “best that was in the human race.”⁹

8. C. Gregg Singer, The Unholy Alliance (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1975), p. 24. (<http://bit.ly/singerua>)

9. C. Gregg Singer, A Theological Interpretation of American History (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1964), p. 287.

Conclusion

“I am not my brother’s keeper, nor am I a sheep to be kept by my brother, my neighbor, or the political representatives of either my brother or my neighbor. I am my brother’s brother.” This is the proper answer to the misused phrase, “Aren’t you your brother’s keeper?” Rhetorical questions, whether used by murderers like Cain or socialists in the pulpit, are nonetheless rhetorical. They are supposed to silence the opposition. God answered Cain’s deliberately misleading rhetorical question with the truth, calling him a murderer and, by implication, a liar. This is the proper response to destroyers who misuse the words of men, let alone misuse the word of God. A rhetorical question should call forth a straightforward response. When men misuse the word of God, their judgment is at hand. Let us be on the side of the Judge, not at the side of the collectivist keepers.

All of this is not to deny in any way our moral responsibilities toward brothers in need. However, we must not expect to find guidelines for brotherly charity in this passage of Scripture. All that we learn about brotherhood in this passage is that we are not to murder our brothers. It has nothing to do with the hypothetical charity of tax-funded professional “keepers.”

CALLING AND OCCUPATION

And God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth. Make thee an ark of gopher wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch (Gen. 6:12–14).

The theocentric issue here is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

The story of Noah and the ark is one of the most famous passages in the Bible. It tells of the wrath of God against all humanity, with the exception of one family. It also tells the story of God's judgment on all the land-based animals of the earth, with the exception of those that were brought into the ark. We see here once again the biblical principle that creatures under the jurisdiction of people reaping God's negative sections suffer along with their guilty heads. There was no escape for the animals that did not make it into the ark.

This is the story of a man who had a crucial calling: to save the planet. He had to do this in his spare time. He also had to make a living. This task paid nothing up front. If "full-time Christian service" means "working for the church," Noah was not in full-time Christian service. We are not told what Noah and his sons did for a living. The usual assumption is that they were involved in agriculture. Whether or not Noah and his family were involved in agriculture, they did have to make a living, day by day, year by year, during the time of the construction of the ark. There was no market for the ark. Noah was not instructed by God to sell tickets.

Consider their occupations. Here was a family that was involved in the construction of a gigantic ship. They were building it on dry land. There was no way for them to transport this ship to a ocean. They must have been the laughing stock of the community. The ark was a laughing stock of the community for years and then decades. Here was a family that had clearly lost touch with reality. These people were building a boat the likes of which no one had ever seen. They were doing this on dry ground.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

God did not tell Noah to warn the people that a great flood was coming. God did not say anything about a flood. Noah must have drawn conclusions about the nature of the negative sanctions to come, but he was not specifically informed about the details, as far as the biblical text indicates.

The family had no assignment regarding evangelism. God did not tell Noah and his family to hand out tracts telling people to repent. He told Noah to build an ark, and He gave Noah a set of plans for it. Other than that, God had no instructions for Noah at all.

Noah was the central figure of humanity between Adam and Jesus Christ. Other biblical figures were important in the lines of covenantally faithful people, but Noah and his sons were crucial. All humanity traces its genetic inheritance back to Noah, and the entire animal kingdom had its genetic origins in the animals inside the ark. With the exception of Noah and his family, the entire history of man up until that time led to death and destruction. Noah was the turning point in all of human history, and also in the history of the animals.

We are not told what Noah did for a living. We are told what Noah did to live. He is not important historically for what he did for a living. He is important historically for what he did to live. Noah's occupation was so unimportant that the Bible does not even mention it. The Bible does tell us what he did to save his family and the animal kingdom from destruction. Until the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, Noah did more than any other human history to save humanity. No other figure in history comes close to the importance of Noah, with the exception of Adam. Noah is the central character from Adam to Christ.

This being the case, it is clear that the most important thing that Noah did was to build the ark. It was the most important thing that anyone did from Adam to Jesus Christ. In contrast, we are told nothing about what he did for a living.

In discussing the work of Noah and his family, I distinguish between their jobs and their calling. Their jobs were whatever tasks they did to support themselves while building the ark. In modern terminology, their jobs put food on the table. Their most important work appeared to be ludicrous for a long time. They must have suffered considerable ridicule. Yet this was the most important work that anyone had ever done, and it was the most important work that any family has ever done. Nothing that you do will ever match what Noah did. We can say this of everyone else in history, with the exception of Jesus Christ.

Noah's calling was to build the ark, and he was the only man who could do it. He was irreplaceable, because he was the only righteous patriarch in the world. God picked him especially for his righteousness. There was no one else on the face of the earth whom God could have picked. It was the most important task that anyone had on earth, and he was the only person who could fulfill it.

A. What Is a Calling?

The construction of the ark was Noah's calling. I define calling as follows: the most important thing that you can do in which you would be most difficult to replace. Noah's calling was not his occupation. We are told nothing of his occupation. Unless he was supported full-time by his sons, who in turn had occupations, Noah had a job, but we are told nothing about it. His job was irrelevant for the story of Noah. His job was relevant for putting food on the table, but it was not relevant for the salvation of the world.

In the story of Noah, we probably have the best example in history of the difference between an occupation and a calling. Whatever Noah did for a living, he was probably easily replaceable. He certainly was more easily replaceable in his job than he was in his calling. So replaceable was he in his job that the Bible does not bother to tell us what his job was. It was just a way to earn a living, which in turn enabled him to pursue his calling. Nobody paid him anything to pursue his calling. His calling was a negative as far as the general public was concerned: a joke. Yet it was the most important work that he could do for which he would have been most difficult to replace.

This distinction between occupation and calling is at the heart of civilization. Most people are forgotten within 50 or 60 years of their death. Their children remember them, and the older grandchildren remember them, but the great grandchildren do not. When two generations die off, the memory of their ancestors dies with them. What the ancestor did for a living is forgotten. Men's occupations leave no trace in almost all cases. The men are easily replaceable, and therefore the work that they do is not memorable.

There are a few people who achieve something memorable through their callings. For most of these famous people, their callings are their occupations. We think of famous political leaders, generals, or inventors. All of these people were paid to perform their callings.

Even in the case of philosophers, they are usually paid. Socrates had a job, but almost no one remembers what that job was. He was a stonemason. He left that occupation to pursue his calling. His self-assigned calling was to challenge men in their fundamental beliefs. It was also to train a younger generation of men to do the same. It cost him his life.

Jesus had a calling. His calling was to redeem the world. The initial means of His calling was the discipling of a small handful of people. For three years, He trained these men. He had been a carpenter, but He abandoned that job for the sake of His calling. Peter and his brother abandoned their callings as fishermen to become disciples. All of the disciples abandoned their lifetime occupations. Jesus called them to serve Him in a special way, but they did not make their livings serving as disciples.

The best New Testament example of someone who supported his calling by means of his job was the apostle Paul. We are told that he made tents for a living (Acts 18:3).² We are told nothing about the size of the tents, the price of the tents, or whether he sold the tents to a wholesaler or to the general public. We are only told that he made tents for a living.

His calling was to serve as an apostle. He did the most important work he could do for which he would have been most difficult to replace. No one thinks of the apostle Paul as one of the world's great tentmakers. No one thinks of him as a businessman. He became a tentmaker because he could no longer get paid by the Jews as a persecutor. His calling before his conversion was to be a persecutor. His tentmaking was an afterthought.

B. Two Kinds of Work

A man who finds his calling is blessed of God. A man who has an occupation that he enjoys is also blessed by God. But rare is the man who achieves his calling as an employee. Ministers of the gospel do this. Missionaries achieve this. Some teachers achieve this. But most men never achieve enough in their occupations that they could legitimately call their occupations their callings. They may do something important in their jobs, but in most cases they are easily replaceable. Even in those cases where they are not replaceable, such as professional athletes of the highest caliber, they know that their callings will soon be over, and they will have to find a job. They will no longer be able to compete successfully as professional athletes. Their callings are short-lived. They last for a few years, and then fade from almost everyone's memory.

2. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

For most men and women, no one will pay them a salary for their callings. They are paid for their occupations. One of the reasons why so few men have callings is because they are unwilling or unable to perform their callings in their spare time. They do not finance their callings by means of their occupations. They spend the bulk of their time on their occupations, and they allocate whatever remains among such activities as watching sports on television, drinking in taverns, and spending ten minutes a day with their children. Rare is the man who self-consciously accepts a lower paying job because this job provide sufficient free time that he can work on his calling. Very few men even understand what a calling is. They have not identified the most important thing they can do with their lives for which they would be most difficult to replace.

When a man devotes the bulk of his labor to an occupation that is not also his calling, he risks two things. First, he risks discovering late in life that he never had a calling. Second, he risks not discovering late in life that he never had a calling. Such men do not pay attention to the need for some service that they could provide. When that service is not paid for in a competitive market, those who possess the skills to perform that service tend to ignore it.

Consider a physician. He could be a low-paid physician on the foreign mission field. Some Christian physicians do this. They make very little money, and they have enormous impact in communities in which no other physician lives within a hundred miles. Most physicians practice their occupations throughout their whole lives, earning a decent living and knowing that they are essentially replaceable. The physician on the mission field knows that he is very close to being irreplaceable. He is irreplaceable because nobody in the community he serves has the money to pay a Western-trained physician. They can barely afford to pay the local witch doctor.

One solution for physicians who want to become missionaries is to save a large percentage of their income in their occupations. They budget carefully; they restrict their spending; and they save up enough money so that they can afford to go on the mission field when they are 50 or 55 years old. They understand that their callings are not their occupations. They understand that the only way they can support their callings is to earn enough money, and learn how to invest that money successfully, so that the income from their investments will fund their years on the foreign mission field.

What is true of a physician who wants to become a foreign missionary is equally true of any man who sees that he could be of enormous service in an area of life in which the people he will serve cannot afford to pay him what he could earn by serving the highest bidders. His employer sells the man's services or output to the highest bidders. The highest bidders are not the same people the worker could best serve if he was willing to quit his job and devote full-time service to poverty-stricken beneficiaries.

With respect to filling the needs of people who have few alternatives, a man has a calling if he can budget his time and money in such a way that he can devote time to serving those who could not otherwise afford his services. Here is his calling. It is supported by his occupation. In budgeting your money, you had better first decide what your calling is. If you do not know what your calling is, you will not allocate your time and money in such a way that you will maximize your contribution to the kingdom of God.

Most Christian men never discover their callings. They are tempted to see their callings in terms of their jobs. They define themselves in terms of their jobs, not in terms of their callings. They confuse their callings with their jobs, and in doing so, most of them neglect the most important thing that they could do for which they would be most difficult to replace.

What if Noah had spent all of his time at the office? Imagine him on his deathbed, with the water up to the mattress, telling his family, "I should have spent less time at the office." The response would have been: "You certainly should have."

Until a man finds his calling, he will not budget his time and his money efficiently. If he does not set aside time and money to pursue his calling, he will miss out on his calling. Most men miss out on their callings. They devote their lives to the most profitable thing they can do for which they would be fairly easy to replace.

Conclusion

Noah had a calling: to preserve life on earth. It was the most important thing he could do for which he was most difficult to replace. He also had an occupation. We do not know what that was. He earned his living through his occupation. He used this income to prepare the ark. His job was subordinate to his calling. Both were God-given tasks. They were not of equal importance.

Noah served God full-time: as the ark's builder and as a producer of goods or services to customers. Both tasks were religiously motivated. He had to give an account to God of his work. If he had had no job, he would not have been able to build the ark. No one was going to pay him to build the ark. To identify his day job as secular and the ark building job as religious would miss the point. Both tasks were religious. One task was non-profit in the short term and of ultimate profit in the long term: the ark. The other was profitable in the short term but doomed in the long term. All of his customers died.

18

THE ECOLOGICAL COVENANT

And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth. And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon the fishes of the sea; into your hand are they delivered (Gen. 9:1–2).

The theocentric focus of this passage is hierarchy, point two of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Covenant Renewal

The dominion covenant given to Adam and Eve by God (Gen. 1:28)² was reaffirmed between mankind and God after the great Flood. God made it clear to them that the dominion covenant was not limited to the garden of man's pre-Fall condition, but that it applies wherever men work out the implications of their faiths. There can be no lawful escape from the comprehensive responsibilities associated with the dominion covenant. Any attempt to deny its binding nature, or to eliminate any of its features, must be regarded as antinomian—a denial of the law of God. Man is unquestionably the legitimate dominant creature on earth, under the jurisdiction of God. Man is responsible for the enforcement of his Lord's covenants, even as he himself is bound by them.

The whole earth was placed under a curse as a result of man's rebellion (Gen. 3:17–19).³ The animals of the dry land perished as a result of man's sin and God's response in sending the great Flood. As subordinate to man, the creation necessarily shares in some of the blessings and curses brought upon man. This is basic to covenantal life: subordinates participate in the successes and defeats of their superiors, in much the same way that low-level military troops end up as victors, prisoners, or corpses, depending upon the decisions made by their superiors in the chain of command. The fact that nature suffers because of man's rebellion is evidence of nature's subordinate position under man, and therefore evidence of man's position of dominion over nature.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Chapter 4.

3. Chapter 12.

God showed grace to Noah's family. Through Noah, God also demonstrated His grace to the animals that were carried into the ark. A remnant of mankind preserved a remnant of the animals. God's covenant structure obviously extends beyond the mere salvation of individual souls: "And I, behold, I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you; And with every living creature that is with you, of the fowl, of the cattle, and of every beast of the earth with you; from all that go out of the ark, to every beast of the earth" (Gen. 9:9–10). The sign of this covenant of peace between God and man, and therefore between God and the animals under man's dominion, is the rainbow, which apparently was unknown prior to the great Flood. As long as the rainbow survives, God proclaimed, His covenant with the creation, both man and beast, will survive.

Noah's ark stands as the greatest single implement of ecology in the history of the creation. God had Noah select pairs of some animals, and seven pairs of the "clean" animals (Gen. 7:2). These would be preserved with food provided by Noah, and by the ark itself (Gen. 6). Man mediated God's common (preserving) grace to the animals. Christ also mediated between God and the animals, as well as between God and man, though not in the sense of mediating regeneration for the animals. His grace will eventually lead to the abolition of the curse on the animal world (Rom. 8:21).⁴ Man's role is therefore ministerial under Christ, who in turn mediates between God the Father and mankind.

Men have responsibilities beyond their own species. The covenant of Genesis 9:1–17 places man in covenantal authority over the animals. This is why God put the fear of man in them. Animals feared Noah and his family, making it easier for Noah and his heirs to subdue the earth, for the long life spans granted to earlier generations were about to be removed (Gen. 6:3b). The ability of men to master the laws of creation in a single lifetime was also going to be steadily removed. The degeneration of culture prior to the Flood unquestionably resulted in reduced knowledge of the biblical principles of law, presumably including the laws of nature. Noah and his sons would not have the same ability to dominate nature that previous long-lived and covenantally faithful generations possessed, and God acknowledged man's weakened condition by placing the fear of man in the animals.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

God holds back His final judgment in order to give men sufficient time to work out their salvation or damnation with fear and trembling (II Peter 3:9; Phil. 2:12). He will see all His plans fulfilled in time and on earth. He has guaranteed man that there will never again be a universal flood, and the rainbow is the token of His promise. But this sign also means that man is under the terms of the ecological covenant. The dread of man in the animals was put there in order to protect man, but also to provide him with additional authority over the animal kingdom. Authority is supposed to be used lawfully. Our lawful authority is supposed to call forth our covenantal service.

Men are supposed to serve the realm of nature analogously to the way that Noah served it. His own service in preserving the lives of the animals also benefited himself and his heirs. The clean animals that were preserved could then serve as a means of sacrifice before God (Gen. 8:20) and for food (Gen. 9:3). God's creation is therefore to be respected. Men have been given power over it; they therefore have a full responsibility to prune it and care for it. The earth is not supposed to run wild in terms of its own nature any more than mankind is supposed to run wild in terms of man's fallen nature. Nature, like man, is to be governed lawfully. Nature must not be allowed to remain autonomous and idle forever; neither is it to be destroyed by men in their pretended autonomy. Responsible pruning must not become irresponsible destroying. The rainbow reminds us: nature is under man, not over him, because God is over man, and His grace preserves both. We are to be husbandmen, loving and disciplining that which has been entrusted to us for our personal development and enjoyment, and also for the benefit of nature itself.

The ecological covenant of Genesis 9 is a recapitulation of the dominion covenant of Genesis 1:28. To fulfill the terms of the ecological covenant, men need all their intellectual and cultural skills, including the implements of science, just as Noah needed knowledge and his great implement of ecology, the ark. Subduing the Earth involves just that, the subduing of all the earth. It is not simply an agricultural covenant, for man's life is intertwined in a total division of labor. We cannot artificially separate "agriculture" from "business," "science," and "technology." Each man's efforts are supposed to complement the efforts of his neighbor.

B. Narrow Evangelism

This fact of economic life was ignored by the Bible Presbyterian Church, a small American denomination which in 1970 rejected the concept of the cultural mandate. The delegates to the 34th Synod un-animously capitulated to their ecclesiastical director, Rev. Carl McIntire, concluding that God's requirement that we subdue the earth in no way refers to the broader aspects of culture. All God had in mind was maximum biological reproduction and agriculture. Commenting on Genesis 1:28, the Synod declared:

This same command was renewed to Noah (Genesis 9) after the flood without any reference to the word "and subdue it." Furthermore, the verse has nothing to do with culture, in the present sense of the word. The so-called "cultural mandate" is based entirely on one word of the verse, the word that is translated "and subdue it." Like all words of Scripture, this word should be interpreted in context. Here the context is that of filling the empty earth with people. It says that the earth should be brought under cultivation, to enable these people to survive and multiply. That, and that alone, is what it means.⁵

So cut and dried! "That, and that alone, is what it means." But what does "that, and that alone" actually involve? How can we separate modern agriculture from the whole fabric of modern science, modern economics, and modern culture? How can any developing society segregate agriculture into some immediately post-flood context, telling farmers that they, and they alone, are responsible for the fulfillment of this mandate, and that the dominion covenant refers to nothing outside the borders of the farm? One word suffices to categorize such biblical exegesis: ludicrous.

The Synod did not stop there. Having accepted one preposterous conclusion, it could not resist asserting another: "We oppose the 'cultural mandate' also because it gives a false idea of the place of the Christian in this age of sin, and cuts the nerve of true missionary work and evangelism.” In the Synod’s framework, missionary work and evangelism are truncated operations. They would call men to repentance from their sins, but then leave them without concrete, specific guidelines for godly action in their day-to-day lives in the arts (why not pornography?), in business (why not false advertising?), in government (why not socialism?), in military affairs (why not a sneak attack?), and on and on. What are men to repent from? And once converted, what are they to do about the evils from which they have been converted? Should they go back “into the world” (as if conversion somehow removes us from this world) and practice the same things? Should newly converted pornographers continue reaping a fortune from selling pornography? Does a so-called conversion of the pornographer somehow baptize all future pornography published by “converted” publishers?

5. Cited in R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 724.

Why is the task of evangelism so narrowly defined? If the Synod had been consistent, at least the preaching of the dominion covenant would have been understood as valid for agricultural pursuits. But then the requirements for preaching the whole counsel of God would necessarily spread from agricultural pursuits to agricultural equipment manufacturing, and government land policy, and so forth, right back into the fearful world of reality, from which twentieth-century American fundamentalism fled for generations. Prior to the Presidential campaign of 1980, twentieth-century fundamentalists did not wish to be bothered with the hard discipline of providing guidelines—distinctly Christian guidelines—for every area of human life. So, they constructed a theology of zero or little social responsibility in order to justify their own laziness and lack of competence in the world outside the sanctuary.⁶

Conclusion

The ecological covenant of Genesis 9 cannot be separated theologically from the dominion covenant of Genesis 1. The ecological covenant is simply a corollary to the more comprehensive dominion covenant. Every man operates under the terms of this ecological covenant, whether he acknowledges the fact or not. No man can escape being judged in terms of his responsibilities before God to adhere to the terms of this covenant. A theology which in any way mitigates or denies the existence of this covenant is antinomian, meaning that it is in direct and flagrant opposition to the revealed will of God. Such a theology must be avoided.

6. See George Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth-Century Evangelicalism, 1870–1925 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1980), especially chapter 10. See also Douglas W. Frank, Less Than Conquerors: How Evangelicals Entered the Twentieth Century (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1986). On the legitimacy of Christian social action see The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VIII (Summer 1981): “Symposium on Social Action.”

THE WORLD TRADE INCENTIVE

Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech. So the LORD scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of the earth; and they left off to build the city (Gen. 11:7–8).

The theocentric issue here is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

The builders of the tower of Babel were attempting to construct a symbol of their unity—religious—cultural, linguistic, and political. Their symbol was to be a great tower, probably a Babylonian ziggurat, which was a multi-tiered structure that resembled stepping stones to heaven from whichever direction a person approached it. Men sought to “make us a name,” that is, to define themselves and their existence autonomously. Like Adam, who named—defined, classified—the animals in the garden, these men also had the power of naming. They wanted to build a symbol of their unity in order not to be scattered (Gen. 11:4). They needed political and religious unity in order to enforce the unitary power to define mankind. They feared disunity, which would compromise the ability of a unitary name-giver to enforce its names and definitions. As Rushdoony commented: “In all religious faiths one of the inevitable requirements for logical thought asserts itself in a demand for the unity of the godhead. Hence, since humanity is god, there can be no division in this godhead, humanity. Mankind must therefore be forced to unite.”² Humanism demands a unified god, namely, humanity, either through politics or free trade.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. R. J. Rushdoony, This Independent Republic: Studies in the Nature and Meaning of American History (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1964] 2002), p. 142.

A. The Politics of Unity

What was the agency of this unitary aspect of mankind? It was the political order. Again, citing Rushdoony:

The Tower of Babel was an attempt to force this apostate thesis of ultimate oneness and equality onto all mankind. There was to be no division among men, and no separation or discrimination, only an absolute unity. The religion and virtue or ethics of Babylon was to be the fact of humanity, and community was simply in the common fact of humanity. In the City of God, community is through the Redeemer in God; in the City of man, the Society of Satan, the ground of communion is a common humanity irrespective of any religious or moral differences. All differences must be suppressed in favor of the anonymity of union. The good life and the full life are in and through the State. The theological requirements for the unity of the godhead require this faith in the unity of humanity, its one true god. Hence, "Let us build us a city," a one-world order, and usher in paradise apart from God. . . . In terms of all this the meaning of the proclamation "Let us make us a name," becomes clear: let us be our own blessing, our own Messiah, saviour and god. Let us be our own creator, our own ultimate source of meaning and definition. Let there be no value above and beyond us; let man be the source of the definition, not the subject of it. Let man be beyond good and evil, and beyond meaning, since he is himself the source of all definition.³

The seemingly innocuous words, "Let us make us a name," are crucially important.

They had hoped to build a tower in order that they might not be scattered. Yet in attempting this project, they guaranteed their future scattering. They stood against God, and those who do not gather with God are scattered abroad (Matt. 12:20). God scattered them in order to restrain the outworking of their evil imaginations (Gen. 11:6). The quest for total unity in terms of principles other than those laid down in the Bible is a perverse quest. Unity is to be confessional and ethical, not egalitarian or humanistic. There are always distinctions in any community—different functions, different responsibilities, different skills (I Cor. 12).⁴ The attempt therefore to construct a one-world order was doomed from the start, for the nations survive throughout Bible history and will persist into the very city of God (Rev. 21:24–26).

3. R. J. Rushdoony, "The Society of Satan," Christian Economics (Aug. 4, 1964); reprinted in Biblical Economics Today, II (Oct./Nov. 1979). (<http://bit.ly/rjrsos>)

4. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

Such a one-state order has to involve extensive political centralization and therefore the loss of personal freedom and personal responsibility. By confounding their language, God removed the threat of totalitarian rule over the whole face of the earth. Secular totalitarian regimes are necessarily limited in geographical scope. The larger the geography of tyranny, the more resources must be wasted to maintain control. Productivity drops.

B. The Grace of Decentralization

As always, there was an element of grace within God's external judgment. While He stymied the pagans' centralized religious-political order with its pretensions of autonomy and absolute sovereignty, He simultaneously gave men conditions that were more favorable to political freedom. Localism, the criterion of a decentralized free order, could then be infused with another requirement of a free society, biblical faith.

Second, God tied this decentralization to the existence of separate languages. Apart from religion and direct family ties, there are few bonds, if any, that are more culturally binding than a shared language. When a language ceases to be spoken, it is because the society in which the language once flourished has been destroyed or scattered, or died out. God provided men with a key factor in the creation of a sense of community, without which human society cannot survive.

Third, God scattered them geographically. Economically, this was a very important aspect of God's judgment. Prior to the great flood, there seems to have been a common climate. Mammoths found in the Arctic still have semi-tropical foliage in their stomachs, indicating a rapid cooling. Otherwise, the contents of the animals' stomachs would have rotted inside the stomachs before the frozen outer bodies had time to pass the cold to the inner parts. One estimate has placed the necessary external temperature at minus 150 Fahrenheit—in the middle of the "arctic" tropics!⁵ The change was widespread and rapid.

5. The most sophisticated estimates of the temperatures required to quick-freeze a Siberian mammoth are found in Joseph C. Dillow, The Waters Above: Earth's Pre-Flood Vapor Canopy (Chicago: Moody Press, 1981), pp. 383–96. His book provides an extensive bibliography of the source material, including Henry H. Howorth's out-of-print classic, The Mammoth and the Flood (London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle & Rivington, 1887); Charles Hapgood, The Path of the Pole (Philadelphia: Chilton, 1970); Bassett Digby, The Mammoth: And Mammoth Hunting Grounds in Northeast Siberia (New York: Appleton, 1926). Dillow's is the best book to date on the universal climate before Noah's Flood, and the catastrophic climatic changes that the Flood produced.

After this cataclysmic alteration of the earth's tropical or semitropical climate, the mammoths no longer munched foliage in Siberia; a jungle no longer bloomed beneath the new ice of Antarctica. Men would now live in differing climates and on land with varying agricultural resources. They needed to specialize their economic production in order to increase output per unit of resource input.

Men desire more wealth. To attain their goals, they are forced to cooperate economically through voluntary exchange. Self-interest restrains the lust for blood, destruction, and rebellion in the hearts of men. God added the diversity of climates to the curse of the ground as an additional means of restraint on men's lawless activities. It was probably in Noah's time that the climates diversified with the breakup of the watery firmament above the earth. The linguistic separation came at Babel, perhaps a century later. So did the races of man. God was dividing and scattering men, yet He also saw to it that men had incentives to trade, for the curse of the ground still restrained men's productivity. It is likely that climatic differences, then as now, forced some nations into trade before others, but most eventually traded. Men would pursue increasingly specialized, and therefore increasingly productive and efficient, callings before God.

The scattering at Babel was therefore part of a two-fold process. First, it restrained the creation of a rebellious one-world political tyranny. God's response pointed to the illegitimacy of any political order based exclusively on the idea of monism, the ultimate One. Second, by providing teachable languages to the scattered populations, He restrained the creation of total anarchy and total nomadism. Family heads were divided from other family heads, but it was not a question of one language per person. God established a balance between individualistic anarchy and totalitarian monism in the politics and cultures of rebellious men. Families persevered.

Given the curse of the ground and the post-Flood diversity of climate, the scattering provided two important factors in an economic framework. First, it restrained the creation of a centralized socialistic bureaucracy. Second, it gave men an incentive to trade and thus gain access to the fruits of other cultures and other climates at low costs. Again, the one and the many were simultaneously recognized, this time in the economic realm: the unity of trade amid diversity: international, racial, and cultural.⁶

6. On the philosophical problem of unity and diversity in Western thought, see R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ul-

C. An Ancient New Idea

The relationship between Genesis 11 and world trade has been understood by scholars since at least the fourth century A.D. Libanius, the pagan instructor of Basil and John Chrysostom, held to the “scattering-trade” outline. Libanius was a defender of the legitimacy of international trade. In his Orationes, he wrote: “God did not bestow all products upon all parts of the earth, but distributed His gifts over different regions, to the end that men might cultivate a social relationship because one would have need of the help of the other. And so he called commerce into being, that all men might be able to have common enjoyment of the fruits of earth, no matter where produced.”⁷ Basil and Chrysostom picked up this idea and placed it within a Christian framework.⁸ Theodoret, the fifth-century Bishop of Cyrus, a town about a two days’ journey west of Antioch, held this view. We know he was influenced by the writings of Chrysostom.⁹ Finally, Ambrose took up the idea. His Hexameron was a Latin adaptation of Basil’s Greek title of the same name (“six days”).¹⁰ Not all the church fathers were equally favorable to trade, but at least a tradition was established, one which found adherents throughout the middle ages. As Jacob Viner stated in his 1966 lecture before the American Philosophical Society, which he did not live to put into final, fully documented form as a full-length book, as he had planned to do:

I have the impression that there are few ideas of comparable age, subtlety, and prevalence with the idea whose history I have been commenting on, which have so often been received by modern scholars who encounter them in a text as being both important and novel. The origin of the idea of the interest of providence in commerce has been attributed by scholars to Bodin, to Calvin, to an English scholastic of the fourteenth century, Richard of Middleton, to an Italian Renaissance writer, L. B. Alberti, to Grotius, and to any number of others.¹¹ timacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, [1971] 2007).

7. Cited by Jacob Viner, The Role of Providence in the Social Order: An Essay in Intellectual History (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1972), pp. 36–37.

8. Ibid., p. 37.

9. “Theodoret,” in John McClintock and James Strong (eds.), Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), X, p. 320.

10 Viner, Role of Providence, p. 37.

11. Ibid., pp. 37–38.

For all we know, it may be found in the writings of someone even earlier than Libanius, but Viner had not discovered it any earlier.

While it is not universally true that “where goods do not cross borders, armies will”—that old nineteenth-century slogan¹²—it is true that free trade will make more obvious the real economic costs of cutting off such exchange through military conquest, or attempts at conquest. It is built into post-Babel society that men, although scattered abroad, although divided by language and culture, although heirs of very different historic traditions, will always be faced with an economic lure to increase their productivity by trucking and bartering. Those who refuse to trade thereby reduce the size of their market, and as Adam Smith said so long ago, the division of labor is limited by the extent of the market.¹³ By reducing its own national division of labor, a society reduces its per capita income, for it has necessarily reduced its per capita output. No society can choose to trade less without bearing the costs of forfeited per capita income. Trade brings added wealth.

Conclusion

The dominion covenant impels men to extend their control over the earth. The curse of the ground limits the productivity of solitary, autonomous men. The scattering of Babel has reduced the ability of central planning bureaucracies to substitute socialist allocation for voluntary exchange. The unity of mankind can be expressed through trade, but the diversity of cultures and environments prevents this economic unity from becoming the foundation of a bureaucratic one-state world. Unity and diversity are held in balance, or at least not tipped so far as to allow either to become totally destructive of society. The subduing of the earth can continue, therefore, by the operation of all these factors: the dominion covenant, the curse of the ground, the scattering of mankind, and free trade. When Viner chose as the title for his lectures, “The Role of Providence in the Social Order,” he had the right idea.

12. “If men and commodities are prevented from crossing the borderlines, why should not armies try to pave the way for them?” Ludwig von Mises, Human Action (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 828. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

13. Adam Smith, The Wealth of Nations (1776), ch. 3.

INVESTMENT AND CHARACTER

Now the LORD had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee: And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing. . . (Gen. 12:1–2).

The theocentric focus of this passage is inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. The Growth of Capital

It was not to some poor man that God came with His command; it was to Abram, a wealthy man who was “very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold” (13:2). These three commodities were basic signs of wealth throughout Old Testament times, and all three served as money, especially the two precious metals. Abram’s wealth was mobile, which is understandable, given the fact that he had already been uprooted once before, when his father left Ur of the Chaldees, heading for the land of Canaan, stopping in Haran and settling there (11:31). Now he was being called upon to move again, to continue the journey begun by his father.

Abram’s nephew Lot, who was also wealthy, decided to accompany Abram. The two families held their wealth in the form of cattle, and so great were the herds that the land in any particular area of Canaan was not capable of sustaining all of them (13:6). The result was conflict between herdsmen of the two families (13:7). The original patriarchs—Abram of the Israelites and Lot of the Moabites and Ammonites (Gen.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

19:37)—were men possessing great capital resources. God in no way questioned the legitimacy of their wealth. He did not call them to redistribute it to the people of Ur of the Chaldees, or of Haran, or of Canaan.

Each man had a capital base to work with. The history of the two men illustrates a fundamental aspect of biblical economics, namely, the strong relationship in the long run between character and wealth (Prov. 13:22).² More precisely, there is a relationship between the preservation of capital (and even its great expansion) and investment decisions based on principle. Lot lost what he had, while Abram multiplied his capital.

By the standards of his day, the 75-year-old Abram was in the prime of his life. Sarah was ten years his junior (17:17), yet she was sufficiently attractive that Abram devised a scheme of deception and called himself her brother (he was, in fact, only her half brother [20:12]), implying that he was not her husband, on two different occasions (12:11–20; 20:1–18). In this later incident, Sarah must have been in her nineties, unless Genesis 20 is a recapitulation of a journey earlier than the period in which God established His covenant with Abraham (Gen. 17). So, Sarah was able to maintain her good looks well into her later years. Abram himself lived until age 175 (25:7), which the Bible describes as “a good old age” (25:8). He had over half his lifetime before him when he was called by God to leave Haran and enter the land of Canaan. He wandered for many years.

At first, he dwelt in a mountain along with Lot (12:8). He waited 24 years for God to establish His covenant with him. He was circumcised at age 99 (17:24). Thirty-seven years after his circumcision, Abram purchased a final resting place for his wife and family, the burial field for Sarah. Even then, he proclaimed to the children of Heth, “I am a stranger and sojourner with you” (23:4). Though he was no primitive nomad, he nevertheless wandered through Canaan for many decades. It was not the sort of life that would commend itself to a patriarch, or a long-term investor, or a man who had been promised the whole territory (12:7). He was a pilgrim—a wanderer with a destination.

B. Lot's Choice

In stark contrast to Abram, Lot was a man who seemed to possess

2. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

solid, reliable economic instincts. He understood the value of land. When strife between his shepherds and Abram's convinced them both that a geographical parting of the ways had become a necessity, Abram gave Lot his choice of settlement. Lot chose the land in the plain of Jordan, for "it was well watered every where, before the LORD destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the LORD, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest into Zoar" (13:10). He decided to dwell in the cities of the plain, pitching his tent toward Sodom. The Bible informs us that "the men of Sodom were wicked and sinners before the LORD exceedingly" (13:13). Lot chose good land and poor company. He assumed that the ultimate form of capital is productive land.

Abram gave Lot his choice. He therefore agreed to go into the land of Canaan, less desirable property in those days than the well-watered lands of the plains of Jordan. Lot found himself in economically desirable circumstances from the point of view of externally measurable capital resources. But the company he was to keep, however limited his contact with them, always constituted a threat to his integrity and even his safety. He surrounded himself with evil men, and in the final days of his residence among them, they surrounded him (19:4). When God's judgment finally came upon his former neighbors, Lot found that members of his own household had been polluted by the perverse environment. His sons, married daughters, and sons-in-law all refused to believe his dire warnings of imminent destruction, so they were left behind to perish. His wife defied God's command and looked back at the city, suffering a unique judgment herself, leaving him a widower (19:26).

Lot paid dearly for his decision to live among members of a rebellious, perverse pagan society just for the sake of some productive land, a place where not even ten righteous men could be found (18:13). He wound up dwelling in a mountain in his old age—exactly as he had when he had entered the land with Abram, but this time he had no cattle or other assets, and no future. All he had were his two unmarried daughters (19:8), who proved to be morally corrupt and totally pragmatic. They deceived him, causing him to commit incest in his drunkenness (19:32–35). His descendants from these two women became the Moabites and the Ammonites (19:37–38), and so vicious were those cultures that God stipulated that anyone from either tribe who chose to join the congregation of Israel would not see his descendants become full citizens until the tenth generation (Deut. 23:3–

4). They were an extension of the culture of Sodom, and in time, they partook of the same destruction as the cities of the plains (Zeph. 2:8–10). From great wealth to life in a cave: such was the fate of Lot’s “investment portfolio.”

Because of the ethical perversity of Sodom’s residents, the land itself was put under a curse. It was burned, covered with salt, and thereby destroyed for future agricultural use (Deut. 29:23). So great was the destruction that afterward, the surrounding land of Canaan, by comparison, became known as the land flowing with milk and honey.

Lot had ignored the lessons of Adam and Noah: prosperity, in the long run, is the blessing of God to those who are faithful to His laws. The investment of one’s capital should be made with this fact in mind. Lot invested in terms of visible wealth, the seeming permanence of the value of the land. At the end of his days, he saw his investment burned. What turned out to be a very impermanent store of value had lured Lot into a disastrous investment decision.

C. Freedom and Economic Growth

Character, human freedom, and long-term development of human capital are all more important than physical resources. Access to free markets is also very important. It has been a continuing error of modern scholars to focus on natural resources in their discussions of economic growth. Professor P. T. Bauer was one economist who did not make this mistake.

Physical natural resources, notably fertile soil or rich minerals, are not the only or even major determinants of material progress, though differences in the bounty of nature may well account for differences in levels and ease of living in different parts of the underdeveloped world. It has always been known that physical resources are useless without capital and skills to develop them, or without access to markets. And the diminishing importance of land and other natural resources in production are also familiar. But the recent rapid development of such underdeveloped countries poorly endowed with natural resources has come as a surprise, though perhaps it should not have done so, in view of the Japanese experience. A recent but already classic case is that of Hong Kong, which has practically no raw materials, very little fertile soil, no fuel, no hydroelectric power, and only a very restricted domestic market, but which in spite of these limitations has progressed phenomenally. . . .³

3. P. T. Bauer, Dissent on Development: Studies and Debates in Development Eco-

Throughout the western world severe barriers have had to be erected [Bauer was speaking of political necessity, not economic necessity, since he was an advocate of free trade—G.N.] to protect the domestic industries of the United States, Great Britain, Germany and France against imports from the unsubsidized competition of the industries of Hong Kong, an underdeveloped country, eight thousand or more miles away. This rapid progress has occurred in spite of the presence in Hong Kong of three features often said to reinforce the vicious circle of poverty, namely lack of natural resources, extremely severe population pressure, and a very restricted domestic market.⁴

Those accounts of economic growth which have focused so narrowly on natural resources have too frequently been undergirded by a philosophy bordering on environmental determinism, and in some cases this intellectual presupposition has been openly admitted.

On the other hand, Hong Kong is not an unquestioned case of superior morality. Its commitment to the free market and international free trade is too comprehensive. Since World War II, Hong Kong has become one of the major centers of the drug traffic. One of the reasons why Communist China allowed Hong Kong to exist was because Hong Kong served as a funnel for opium, heroin, and other illegal drugs that are produced in China and in Southeast Asia. This traffic served a dual purpose for Communist China: it provided much-needed foreign currency, and it was part of China's systematic war against the West in general and the United States in particular.

In 1965, at the beginning of the escalation of the war in Vietnam, China's prime minister and foreign affairs specialist Chou En-lai met with Egypt's leader, General Nasser. Speaking of the U. S. troops then stationed in Vietnam, Chou said: ". . . some of them are trying opium. And we are helping them. We are planting the best kinds of opium especially for the American soldiers in Vietnam. . . . Do you remember when the West imposed opium on us? They fought us with opium. And we are going to fight them with their own weapons. We are going to use their own methods against them. We want them to have a big army in Vietnam which will be hostage to us and we want to demoralize them. The effect this demoralization is going to have on the United States will be far greater than anyone realizes."⁵ Hong Kong was an important part of Communist China's war against the West.

nomics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1972), p. 297.

4. Ibid., p. 37.

5. Quoted by Mohammed Heikal, The Cairo Documents (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1973), pp. 306–7. Heikal heard Chou say this.

Conclusion

Godly men are instructed not to put their faith in earthly treasures (capital), where thieves break in and rust corrupts (Matt. 6:19–21).⁶ Men are to build in terms of Christian character and biblical law. Their decisions are not to be guided primarily by the land in front of them but by the human capital at hand. An investment in terms of character may not reap immediate rewards. After all, Lot settled down in temporary comfort, while Abram wandered. But Abram became Abraham —“father of nations”—and his children and grandchildren were buried with him (Gen. 49:28–31; 50:13), while the burial location for Lot and his daughters is not mentioned. Abraham’s commitment to character and his reliance upon the covenantal promises brought him visible blessings and rest in his old age. Lot, though a just man (II Peter 2:7), dwelt where his spirit was endlessly tormented (II Peter 2:8). He had left Haran with great wealth; he would leave Sodom with only the items he could carry away in an emergency retreat. He had traded internal peace for the seeming promise of external blessings, and he ended his life with neither internal peace nor external blessings.

God may, for a time, preserve the wealth of a rebellious culture for His own purposes. He may preserve it for the sake of a few godly men who dwell within the culture (Gen. 18:23–33). Nevertheless, when He brings down His wrath upon a culture, the faithful may have to make a grim and hasty retreat.⁷

6. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 13.

7. Forms of mobile capital, such as gold, silver, and precious stones, are sensible investments for Christians in times of social disintegration for this very reason. We should not look back, but it is wise to take something for the future along with us as we make our escape.

21

THE COVENANTAL TITHE

And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was the priest of the most high God. And he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth: And blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all (Gen. 14:18–20).

The theocentric focus of this passage is a sacramental system: bread and wine. This has to do with covenantal oaths: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹ This sacrament is administered by a hierarchy: the church. Hierarchy is point two of the biblical covenant model.²

This is the first reference to the tithe in the Bible. There is one other in Genesis: Jacob's promise to pay a tithe (Gen. 28:22).³

The story of this first tithe is peculiar. Abram was returning from a victory over an invading king, Chedorlaomer, who had kidnapped Abram's nephew Lot. The king had also defeated local kings and had taken spoils of war. Abram returned with these spoils. Then he came to meet with Melchizedek. Abram gave a tenth of the spoils of war to Melchizedek.

The reason for this payment was Melchizedek's position as a priest of God. As a priest, he was entitled to a tithe of all increases. Abram had not been living under his jurisdiction previously. This time, however, he was returning into the region where Melchizedek had lawful jurisdiction. Abram gave him a tenth of the spoils, which Chedorlaomer had removed from the region. This was wealth that was now under Abram's lawful control. Abram had added to his wealth by means of a military victory. He therefore paid a tithe on this increase.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Sutton, ch. 2; North, ch. 2.

3. Chapter 28.

A. A Priestly Payment

Paying a tithe is a mark of ecclesiastical subordination. Abram was directly under God. There was no intermediary structure of ecclesiastical authority. Abram was therefore a household priest. He was not under the authority of local priests in Canaan. He did not acknowledge the jurisdiction of these local priests. He had not paid tithes to them. He was a stranger in the land.

When Abram profited under the jurisdiction of a priest, he acknowledged his subordination by paying a tithe. This was his lawful obligation. The text says that Melchizedek was the priest of the most high God. There was therefore another priest in Canaan. This priest was superior to Abram, the household priest. Abram therefore owed him a tithe on whatever wealth he had gained while operating within the territory.

Melchizedek was a priest because he possessed the authority to announce blessings: positive sanctions. "Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth: And blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand." He then served Abram what became New Testament sacraments: bread and wine. Up until this time, there had been no reference to a meal shared with a priest. This was clearly a sacramental meal. Therefore, Abram paid him a tenth of his spoils after Melchizedek announced these blessings. Melchizedek's authority to offer such blessings to Abram on God's behalf, and also offer a confession of subordination was a mark of his priestly office.

Melchizedek was also a king. "And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was the priest of the most high God" (Gen. 14:18). Did Abram pay this tithe because Melchizedek was a king or a priest? Both. According to the New Testament, Melchizedek was a priest who set the pattern for Jesus Christ (Heb. 7). Jesus is both King of kings (Rev. 19:16) and the high priest. We read:

For this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him; To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace; Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually (Heb. 7:1–3).

The central argument of the Epistle to the Hebrews is that Melchizedek's priesthood was the forerunner of Christ's priesthood. Christ possesses kingly authority just as Melchizedek did. Christ changed the priesthood from Levitical to Melchizedekal.

For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law. For he of whom these things are spoken pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar. For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood. And it is yet far more evident: for that after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest, Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life. For he testifieth, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec (Heb. 7:12–17).

Melchizedek was a high priest. He was both a king and a priest. This was unique. This was not true under the Mosaic covenant, where the offices were separate. The kingly tribe was Judah. The priestly tribe was Levi. This separation ended with Christ. His forerunner was Melchizedek.

Abram, a household priest, paid a tithe to the high priest. This was a token of his subordination. Abram's subordination covenantally represented Levi's subordination.

Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils. And verily they that are of the sons of Levi, who receive the office of the priesthood, have a commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they come out of the loins of Abraham: But he whose descent is not counted from them received tithes of Abraham, and blessed him that had the promises. And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better. And here men that die receive tithes; but there he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed that he liveth. And as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, payed tithes in Abraham. For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchisedec met him (Heb. 7:4–10).

B. Surrendering the Leftovers

Abram paid the tithe to Melchizedek. That entitled him to the re-maintaining 90%. He kept none of this booty.

And the king of Sodom said unto Abram, Give me the persons, and take the goods to thyself. And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto the LORD, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth, That I will not take from a thread even to a shoelatchet, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich: Save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre; let them take their portion (Gen. 14:21–24).

Abram refused to take his legitimate share of the goods. Why? Because he wanted it clear to all concerned that he was God's agent, not the king of Sodom's agent. The victory had come because God had intervened. Why had God intervened? Because Abram was God's agent. He represented his nephew Lot. Lot was under his protection. Lot had been kidnapped by an invading king (Gen. 14:12).

Abram's success on the battlefield with a small military force testified to the sovereignty of God over history. Abram fully understood his situation. He was a stranger in Canaan. God would later remind him of this, as if he needed any reminding. "And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God" (Genesis 17:8). He was therefore under the authority of strangers. He was a pilgrim going from place to place, a man without a city of his own.

It was one thing to operate only with the consent of strangers. It was another to take anything of value from them, other than the right to wander with his flocks. He had demonstrated his power by defeating an invading enemy that had defeated local kings. He had shown that he, not local kings, was the regional force to be reckoned with. He had shown them all that his God, not theirs, was sovereign. In fact, they operated at the discretion of his God, as the king of Sodom discovered shortly thereafter (Gen. 19).

Abram was unwilling to give the king of Sodom any way to claim victory in this matter. So, he let the king of Sodom keep the remaining spoils. It was obvious to all who was in charge here: Abram. He granted wealth to the king of Sodom, not the other way around. By accepting this payment, the king of Sodom was symbolically acknowledging who was in charge here: Abram's God.

The king of Sodom did have an available alternative to this humiliating arrangement. He also could have walked away from the spoils. That would have been a costly act of public nonsubordination to Abram's God. He could have paid a tithe to Melchizedek. This would have been an admission that Abram's God was in charge: point one of the biblical covenant model.⁴ It would have merely changed the answer to point two: "To whom do I report?" That this king-priest represented Abram's God had already been affirmed by Abram, who tithed to him and accepted a sacramental meal from him. The king of Sodom could have given Melchizedek a tenth of the spoils left to him by Abram. By doing this, he would have publicly acknowledged his total subordination to Melchizedek. But he still would have had to acknowledge his military subordination to Abram. It was Abram who had walked away from the spoils. At best, the king of Sodom could have maintained autonomy only as a "me, too" ruler.

There is no indication in the text that he gave a tithe to Melchizedek. He was not given a communion meal either. He was outside the covenant. Melchizedek did not ask him for a tithe, nor did he offer to serve him a covenant meal. God is not dependent on covenant-breaking man for His support. He also does not give him access to a covenant meal.

Conclusion

By giving a tenth to Melchizedek, he was acknowledging two things. First, he was subordinate to Melchizedek. Second, he possessed lawful title to all of the spoils. He gave 10% of these spoils. This act was a legal claim to the other 90%. The king of Sodom did not offer a tithe, because he did not initially have control over this wealth. Abram was making it plain to all concerned: he was fully in control of the situation as God's steward, just so long as he acknowledged the superior authority of Melchizedek. By visibly subordinating himself to Melchizedek, the priest of the most high God, he visibly demonstrated his lawful authority over the spoils. Then, with a contemptuous dismissal of the king of Sodom, he walked away from the wealth. What was extra wealth to him, after all? It was a means of paying his tithe to Melchizedek—nothing more.

Abram tithed to Melchizedek because Melchizedek was a superior priest. The sign of his priestly office was his serving of bread and wine to Abram and his blessing of Abram. He delivered positive ecclesiastical sanctions: the sacraments and a blessing. In doing so, he brought the sons of Abraham under his ecclesiastical authority.⁵

4. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 1. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 1.

5. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

THE GROWTH OF HUMAN CAPITAL

And he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be. And he believed in the LORD; and he counted it to him for righteousness (Gen. 15:5–6).

The theocentric issue here is inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Sons of Abraham

The word of the Lord came to Abram in a vision, saying: “Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward” (Gen. 15:1). Abram’s response is illuminating. After learning of his covenantal protection (shield) by God and his reward from God, Abram immediately asked for more. What is significant is that he asked about his lack of children. “And Abram said, Lord GOD, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus? And Abram said, Behold, to me thou hast given no seed: and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir” (15:2–3).

1. Biblical Covenants

Abram’s candid response reveals that he knew a great deal about biblical covenants. He knew that the protection and favor of God accompany a calling before God. This meant that Abram’s capital assets would now be administered within an explicit covenantal framework. Who, then, would be the heir of these assets? Who would carry on the faithful administration of Abram’s capital? Abram clearly understood the long-term nature of property under a covenant. Capital is to be used faithfully, expanded, and directed into the hands of one who will continue the faithful administration of the assets. Prior to the nineteenth century and the development of the limited liability corporation, capital was primarily familistic capital. This transgenerational responsibility required that someone else in Abram's house would have to be trained for long-term capital management in terms of a theocratic covenant. Who should it be? Eliezer, the Damascan? Was this the person God had chosen to continue the faithful administration of Abram's capital? Abram was already a man of great wealth (Gen. 13:2) and leadership abilities (14:13–24). Nevertheless, he was not yet a patriarch in a culture that placed high esteem on family authority. For any future-oriented Old Testament saint, the office of father was a cherished one indeed. As far as Abram was concerned, his lack of an heir was cause for great concern. What was the meaning of God's covenant with his household if he had no son or daughter?

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

God answered his question with a promise: his seed would be as numerous as the stars visible in the heavens (15:5). Abram believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness (15:6). The promise also involved the future acquisition of land to serve as a home for his heirs (15:16). Both promises were fulfilled in Joshua's day. Seventy of his direct descendants, plus their servants, went into Egypt, and 600,000 men, plus their families, emerged at the exodus (Ex. 12:37). Moses was specifically told that this was the fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham concerning the expansion of his seed, for the Israelites were "this day as the stars of heaven for multitude" (Deut. 1:10; cf. 10:22).

The Promised Land was also significant in terms of the covenant. Abram's heirs would not always be strangers in another land as Abram was, nor would they forever live as pilgrims. Strangers seldom exercise long-term dominion over whole cultures, except in cases of military conquest, and empires inevitably fragment when the centralized political sovereignty can no longer enforce its decisions at the extremities of the empire, or even inside the capital city. Nomads do not build civilizations either, and God did not intend His people to remain pilgrims forever. They had a final destination, a land to subdue.

Children were important to Abram, not merely because of the cultural standards of the Canaanitic tribes that surrounded him, but because of several distinctly theological reasons. First, the gift of children was important for the preservation of the covenant line prophesied by God to Eve (Gen. 3:15). It seems quite probable that Abram knew about this prophecy to Eve (John. 8:56). Second, the task of cultural dominion was—and is—intimately linked with the expansion of human numbers (Gen. 1:28;² 9:1³). Third, a man's heirs—intellectual, spiritual, and biological—were part of his concern for linear history. This is not to say that other cultures besides the Hebrews did not hold children in high esteem, but the concern of these pagan cultures was not with linear history. The Greeks and Romans held male children in high esteem for a distinctly religious reason: the sons were family priests who alone could administer the family's rites, century after century. Should these rites be abandoned by any son, and not renewed by his son, then the family's long line of ancestors would be left to roam the shadows of the nether world in darkness. The concern of classical religion was therefore limited to future family rites, not long-term covenantal dominion. There was an inherent past-orientation and other-worldliness in classical religion, for it was to bring peace to one's ancestors, and to guarantee one's own peace in the afterlife, that one needed male heirs. Future generations were therefore important for the sake of long-dead ancestors.⁴

2. Future Orientation

In stark contrast to classical religion, Hebrew faith looked to the future. The covenants of the past were important, but not for the sake of the past. They demonstrated God's personal concern with, and commitment to, a special people selected by Him to perform important tasks in history. The covenants of the past were tokens of victory in the future. The psychology was altogether different from the dominant themes of classical religion. Eve was to look to the future, for her seed would battle the serpent's seed. Noah was given hope: no future deluge would destroy his heirs. Abram was promised a nation out of his loins; God changed his name to Abraham, "father of nations," when He announced the nature of the covenant (17:4–5). This covenant included the promise of the land (17:8). All of these features of the covenant related to God's original dominion covenant. The sure nature of God's word secured the future to Abraham's descendants. The dominion

2. Chapter 4.

3. Chapter 18.

4. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864]), Books I and II.

covenant would be extended by a new nation, as yet unborn. The faith of the Old Testament saints was to be in linear, irreversible historical development controlled by God. Men and women were to play an important role, in time and on earth, as parents. This work had meaning because of God's covenants and requirements.

Part of Job's testing was the loss of all his children (Job 1:18–19), as well as the loss of his material wealth (1:14–17). His blessings consisted of the restoration of his wealth beyond what he had possessed before (42:12), as well as the birth of ten children (42:13). As a final gift, he was granted a long life (42:16–17). In short, he was given the capital he needed to begin once again to exercise dominion over the earth as a godly family man: tools, children, and time.⁵

Children are basic to the covenant and a sign of God's unmerited favor to man: "Lo, children are an heritage of the LORD: and the fruit of the womb is his reward" (Ps. 127:3). Children are blessings—not blessings in disguise, but blessings—within the framework of the covenant of grace. The broader dominion covenant also implies that children are a blessing in time and on earth, since men and women are told to reproduce, and obedience involves blessings. The all-inclusive nature of the dominion covenant does not mean that the element of cursing on the day of judgment has been overcome merely by the willingness of people to have large families. But in time and on earth, children are a blessing.

The growth of his family, resulting in millions of descendants, was unquestionably basic to the Abrahamic covenant. As far as Abraham was concerned, the modern ideal of zero population growth would have been an acceptable one . . . for the Canaanites. The promise of ultimate victory in Canaan necessitated the extermination and expulsion of the enemies of God from the land (Gen. 15:16, 18–20; Ex. 23:31; Josh. 21:44). When the Israelites left Egypt, they were given a promise by God: their covenantal faithfulness would result in a society without miscarriages, either of animals or humans. In the same breath, God promised them long life: ". . . the number of thy days I will fulfill" (Ex. 23:26b).⁶ The "old folks" would be allowed to get even older. The earth would therefore be filled and subdued by covenantally faithful people far sooner. When you lower the death rate of infants by eliminating miscarriages, and you simultaneously lower the death rate of adults, you create ideal conditions for an historically unprecedented “population explosion.” Yet this was the promise of God to a people who had just undergone the most rapid expansion of population in recorded human history.⁷

5. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012).

6. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 3, Tools of Dominion (1990), ch. 59.

The fulfillment of the covenant was inescapably linked to the declining influence of the ungodly in Canaan. As the numbers of the faithful increase, the ungodly decrease. This was basic to the Abrahamic covenant, as well as to the revelation presented to Abraham’s descendants immediately prior to the military invasion of Canaan (Deut. 1:10). God preferred the expansion of man’s numbers and man’s dominion in comparison to the dominion over the land by the wild animals (Ex. 23:29–30), but He much preferred the expansion of His special people and their dominion over the land instead of continued dominion by the Canaanites.

B. The Demographics of Defeat

It was indicative of the widespread secularism and defeatism in late twentieth-century Western culture that population in the industrial states slowed down radically. French population growth has been slow ever since the middle of the nineteenth century, increasing by about 41% from 1861 to 1974 (37 million to 52 million).⁸ Ireland, after the devastating famines of the 1840s, became Europe’s only zero population growth state. In fact, Ireland’s population actually shrank from 8 million in 1841 to 6.5 million in 1851, and from there to about 4.5 million in the early 1970s (counting the population of Northern Ireland, which is part of Great Britain today).⁹ Ireland, however, remained an essentially agricultural nation, and France was far more agricultural after 1850 than the other Western European industrial nations, which did experience population growth in the same period. The Netherlands grew from 2 million in 1816 to 3 million by 1849, and by 1975 the population was well over 13 million.¹⁰ In 1871, Germany had some 41 million; by the mid-1960s, the combined populations of East and

7. Ibid., Part 1, ch. 1.

8. B. R. Mitchell, European Historical Statistics, 1750–1970 (New York: Columbia University Press, 1976), p. 20; The World Almanac & Book of Facts, 1976 (New York: Newspaper Enterprise Association, 1976), p. 615.

9. Mitchell, p. 21; World Almanac, pp. 627 (Ireland), 663 (Northern Ireland).

10. Mitchell, p. 22; World Almanac, p. 640.

West Germany were in the range of 73 million.¹¹ Where European industrialization flourished between 1850–1950, there was considerable population growth.

This shift has begun to catch the attention of the demographers, the specialists in population changes. After 1957, the birth rate in the United States began to plunge. The fertility rate in 1957 was 3,767 births per 1,000 women, meaning that the average woman was bearing almost four children in her years of fertility.¹² By 1975, the fertility rate had fallen to about 1,800 per 1,000 women, or 1.8 children per woman. Since the replacement level of population in the United States is 2.1 children per woman (because some children do not bear children), the United States was no longer reproducing sufficient children to replace the parents when they die. This was the lowest birth rate in United States history.¹³ This was a prosperity-induced slowdown, in contrast to the 1930s slowdown, the years of international economic depression. The percentage of women in the United States labor force has risen continuously, so that 45% of American workers were women by the mid-1970s.¹⁴ By 2008, this was 60%.¹⁵

West Germany was facing the same problem. The fertility rate was believed to have fallen to about 1.65 children per woman in 1978. The German birth rate fell by a startling 50% from the mid-1960s to the mid-1970s. At 1.65 children per woman, the 60 million West Germans in 1978 will produce losses in total population until their extinction is reached around 2500 A.D.¹⁶ But the reported statistics were incorrect. The fertility rate had fallen to 1.4 in 1977, where it remained in 2007.¹⁷

The Eastern European nations have experienced similar declines in births. In mid-1970s Hungary there were 150 abortions for every 100 births. By 2007, Hungary's fertility rate was below Germany's: 1.35.¹⁸ With the exception of Romania, where abortions were outlawed

11. Mitchell, p. 20; World Almanac, p. 618.

12. U. S. Department of Commerce, Social Indicators, 1976 (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1977), Table 1/6, p. 26.

13. Final Report, Select Committee on Population, U.S. House of Representatives, 95th Congress, Second Session, Serial F, House Report No. 95–1842 (Jan. 5, 1979), p. 5.

14. Social Indicators, 1976, Table 8/4, p. 371.

15. "Quick Stats on Women Workers, 2008," United States Department of Labor. (<http://dol.gov/wb/stats/main.htm>)

16. New York Times (April 28, 1978). See also "People Shortage: West European States See Economic Troubles As Birth Rates Decline," Wall Street Journal (Aug. 23, 1979).

17. Chart, "Fertility rate," Google. (<http://bit.ly/a1FL6p>)

18. Idem.

in 1966, all Soviet bloc nations experienced falling birth rates. Aside from Romania, only East Germany experienced a temporary increase as a result of a major shift in government policy in 1976, and the beginning of a program offering substantial maternity benefits. Before the program was implemented, in 1976 East Germany had the lowest birth rate of all Soviet bloc nations, and it was by far the most industrialized.¹⁹ With the merging of East and West Germany in 1990, the rate was reduced to West Germany's 1.4.

A Library of Congress Congressional Research Service report, which is periodically updated for use by Washington legislators, announced in 1976: "Responsibility for world population control rests with the whole world community."²⁰ What did this mean? That a world government should control people's decisions to have children? That some international committee should establish guidelines? Is such a goal feasible in the real world? Should it even be considered? What are the implications for the growth of the messianic state?

What we find, then, is that the optimistic future-orientation of Western industrial populations between 1850 and 1960 had important effects on the growth of population. Now, however, that confidence has faded along with birth rates. The present-orientation of young couples who delay having children for the sake of a higher present income is creating a demographic disaster for the state-created retirement and medical care programs, since not enough young workers will be able to fund them by the year 2030, unless birth rates increase, or unless the older generation is systematically exterminated by the young in a program of euthanasia.²¹ The welfare state faces bankruptcy.

The American Social Security system was statistically doomed, from the very beginning. Those who entered the system at its inception in 1937 paid in $30 per year (maximum bracket), and their employers paid in $30. Using the inflation calculator of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, we learn that prices were 15 times higher in 2010 than in 1937. That would make the co-payments worth $900 in 2010 dollars. By 2010, each worker paid 7.65% of his wages, and his employer matched this, up to $106,800. Total payment: $16,340. Then an additional 1.45% from both is paid on wages above $106,800. Of course, many families have two members in the work force, so the family tax payment may be more.

19. Associated Press story, Durham Morning Herald (Sept. 1, 1978).

20. Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, World Population Control, Issue Brief #IB74098 (June 25, 1976).

21. In 2010, taxes on wages generated less revenue than Social Security payments. The deficit was funded by general tax revenues and borrowing. The same was true of the Medicare system.

The very first lady to receive a Social Security check, Ida Fuller, retired in 1940, after having paid in $24.75. She died in 1975 at age 100. Her total benefits were just under $23,000.²² She was a winner. The taxpayers paid her winnings. Ironically, it was 1975 that marked the first year of a deficit in the Social Security program.²³

Government officials assure voters that all benefits will be paid. This is either a mistake or a lie, or else the economy will collapse under the tax burden. If the program is not officially abolished, it will mean the destruction of the American dollar. This was admitted by James Cardwell, then the director of Social Security, in response to a statement by Senator William Proxmire in 1976. This exchange took place:

PROXMIRE: . . . There are 37 million people, is that right, that get social security benefits.

CARDWELL: Today between 32 and 34 million.

PROXMIRE: I am a little high; 32 to 34 million people. Almost all of them, or many of them, are voters. In my State, I figure that there are 600,000 voters that receive social security. Can you imagine a Senator or Congressman under those circumstances saying, we are going to repudiate that high a proportion of the electorate? No.

Furthermore, we have the capacity under the Constitution, the Congress does, to coin money, as well as to regulate the value thereof. And therefore we have the power to provide that money. And we are going to do it. It may not be worth anything when the recipient gets it, but he is going to get his benefits paid.

CARDWELL: I tend to agree.²⁴

Underdeveloped nations have received Western medical aid, which has enabled far more infants to survive. They have pesticides. "But more important as causative factors in the sharp drop in infant mortality which set off the population explosion," wrote economist

22. Social Security Administration: <http://bit.ly/IdaFuller>

23. "Ida Mae Fuller," Wikipedia.

24. The Social Security System, Hearings Before the Joint Economic Committee, Congress of the United States, 94th Congress, Second Session (May 26–27, 1976), pp. 27–28. Printed by the Government Printing Office, 1977. The Social Security System's unfunded liabilities are dwarfed by the unfunded liabilities of Medicare.

Peter Drucker, “were two very old ‘technologies’ to which no one paid any attention. One was the elementary public-health measure of keeping latrine and well apart—known to the Macedonians before Alexander the Great. The other one was the wire-mesh screen for doors and windows invented by an unknown American around 1860. Both were suddenly adopted even by backward tropical villages after World War II. Together they were probably the main causes of the population explosion.”²⁵ Drucker had a tendency to focus on unique and previously ignored historical factors in offering explanations for historical change, but this argument is certainly plausible. The immediate benefits of not having flies and other bothersome insects buzzing around the house were deemed to be worth the financial sacrifice involved in buying screens. Tribesmen did it for themselves, but an immediate side effect was a reduction in infant mortality. A simple imported technology from the West reshaped the underdeveloped world, yet few of the consumers involved had any knowledge of the cause-and-effect relationships among certain insects, disease, death, and demographics.

The commitment to larger families has not been dislodged in these populations, yet far fewer children must be born in order to have several of them survive into adulthood. So, the underdeveloped societies have become the short-run beneficiaries of the West’s technology, yet without the attitudes that enabled the West to expand agricultural and industrial productivity to accommodate the increased number of surviving youths. The result is a large increase of population. The socialistic, envy-dominated, underdeveloped nations without Western freedom and without Western attitudes toward thrift and capital accumulation—the old Protestant ethic—now face a demographic crisis. Will famine eventually strike these societies?

C. The Demographics of Dominion

Biblical economics affirms that children are a blessing, since they are a form of personal capital. Men are to become effective stewards of God’s resources. They are to invest in their children by constantly training them in the precepts of biblical law (Deut. 6:7). They are to encourage them to take up a productive calling before God. But parents are entitled to a return on their investment. Children are supposed to provide for their parents in the latter’s old age. Parents are therefore to be honored (Ex. 20:12).²⁶ Honoring God involves giving of one's financial substance (Prov. 3:9).²⁷ Parents are also deserving of just this kind of honor. Jesus strongly criticized the Pharisees of His day for their denial of this law, in the name of tradition. They refused to support their parents by claiming that they were themselves without assets, having "given to God" all that they had (Mark 7:6–13).²⁸ Christ repudiated this "higher spirituality" in defiance of God's law. Children must support aged parents. The parents get the financial security they deserve; their investment in their children is returned to them in a direct fashion. This increases the likelihood that parents will honor their obligations while their children are young. The family becomes a trans-generational economic unit—one worth investing in.

25. Peter F. Drucker, Management: Tasks, Responsibilities, Practices (New York: Harper & Row, 1974), p. 330.

James A. Weber's book, Grow or Die! (1977), is a compelling, lucid antidote to the zero-growth advocates, such as E. J. Mishan and Garrett Hardin. It cited the remark of Alfred Sauvy, director of the Institut de Demographie at Paris University and the past president of the United Nations Commission on Population. Sauvy wrote that a "stationary or very slowly moving population does not benefit enough from the advantages of growth. There is no historical example of a stationary population having achieved appreciable economic progress. Theoretically, it is not impossible, but in practice, in our period especially, it does not happen."²⁹

Simon Kuznets, the distinguished economist and winner of the Nobel Prize in economics in 1971, devoted his career to a series of studies of national income: its formation, statistics, and consequences. In an important essay published in 1960, Kuznets made some pertinent observations. There is an important relationship between people's faith in the future and high birth rates. "Contrariwise, a constant or slowly growing population is implicit evidence of lack of faith in the future."³⁰ Kuznets warned against relying on what we can see—the limits of material resources—to the exclusion of those factors that we

26. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 24.

27. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 8.

28. Gary North, Trust and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Mark and John (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

29. James A. Weber, Grow or Die! (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1977), p. 21.

30. Ibid., p. 3. This quotation is taken from Simon Kuznets, "Population Change and Aggregate Output," in Demographic and Economic Change in Developed Countries (Princeton: Princeton University Press for the National Bureau of Economic Research, 1960).

cannot yet see, such as human creativity. As he wrote, “There is no excuse for the consistent bias in the literature in the field, in which the clearly observable limits of existing resources tend to overshadow completely the dimly discernable potentials of the new discoveries, inventions, and innovations that the future may bring. Perhaps only those who are alarmed rush into print whereas those who are less concerned with the would-be dangers are likely to be mute.”³¹ Thus, concluded Weber, we should not look at a zero population growth as beneficial.

This is not to say that there are not disadvantages to population growth. To increase population obviously requires that an “investment” be made in more children, more new people. And, as with any future-oriented investment, this means that a sacrifice involving more work or less consumption or both must be made today in the interests of achieving greater population growth tomorrow. Conversely, if all children below working age suddenly vanished today, we could all immediately enjoy the “advantage” of consuming more and working less tomorrow, although the achievement of such an “advantage” would obviously be short-sighted as well as short-lived.”³²

The modern Pied Pipers, our zero and negative population growth (i.e., contraction) advocates, seem to ignore the long-run implications of their policies. When they retire to live off their government subsidies (e.g., Social Security and Medicare payments), they will be grateful for all those younger workers and taxpayers who are still willing and able to support them. “Honor thy father and mother” is a meaningless phrase in a world without children. Why not produce more children to do the honoring?

There is a continuing relationship in the Bible between seed and subduing. Genesis 1:28 commanded mankind to be fruitful and multiply (seed) and to subdue the earth. After the Fall of man, God’s covenantal promise to Eve involved her seed: hers would bruise the head of the serpent (Gen. 3:15), and God’s curse on Adam involved the ground and his efforts to subdue it (Gen. 3:17–19).³³ The importance of genealogies in Hebrew culture was based on this promise to Eve: tracing the covenant line and the lines of those who had become the seed of Satan. The covenant with Noah repeated the command to be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth (Gen. 9:1),³⁴ and God told Noah that the animals would fear man from that time on: “into your hand they are delivered” (9:2b). Furthermore, “Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all these things” (9:3). Again, the earth’s fruits belong to mankind. Abraham received two promises—the promise of a land (12:1) that would be given to his seed (12:7). Here would be a land for Abraham’s seed to subdue to the glory of God. God promised David both seed and a permanent throne, the symbol of dominion. Speaking of Solomon, God said: “He shall build an house for my name, and he shall be my son, and I will be his father; and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever” (I Chron. 22:10). Psalm 89 is even more explicit: “I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant, Thy seed will I establish forever, and build up thy throne to all generations. Selah” (3–4). Again, “His seed also will I make to endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven” (29). The ultimate fulfillment of this promise came with Jesus Christ.

31. Ibid., p. 175.

32. Ibid., p. 38.

33. Chapter 12.

And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary: for thou hast found favor with God. And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name JESUS. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David: And he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end (Luke 1:30–33).

It is Jesus Christ, the “seed born of a woman,” who is the recipient of, and fulfillment of, the promises. It is Jesus who finally announces, “All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth” (Matt. 28:18).³⁵ Christ has total power today. He is steadily subduing His enemies. This is why Paul could write to the Roman church, “the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly” (16:20a). We believers are now the seed of Christ: “And if ye be Christ’s, then are ye Abraham’s seed, and heirs according to the promise” (Gal. 3:29). The church is the Israel of God: “And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God” (Gal. 6:16).

What does it mean to be heirs of the promise? Are we to receive everything apart from any conditions? In the area of justification, all is by grace (Eph. 2:8–9), but sanctification is equally by grace: “For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them” (Eph. 2:10).

34. Chapter 18.

35. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

Both sanctification and justification are unearned gifts of God, in the sense that both are freely bestowed by God. Nevertheless, the grace of God was operating in the Old Testament era; justification was by grace in that era, and so was sanctification. What, then, is the source of our external blessings? Sanctification: the progressive disciplining of ourselves and our institutions to conform to God’s criteria of righteousness. We are His seed; we are therefore to subdue the earth. The seed-subduing relationship still exists. As we exercise godly dominion in terms of the concrete standards of biblical law, we are given greater quantities of resources. We are to use these resources as a means of extending God’s visible kingdom even further. We are to subdue those institutions that are under our authority, even as we are to subdue the lusts of the flesh in our own personalities. We are heirs of the promise, and we must be heirs of the inheritance. We are the Israel of God, and we are under the same requirement to subdue the earth to the glory of God in terms of His revealed standards of righteousness. God’s work done in God’s way: here is our dominion covenant. Here are our marching orders. We are under a sovereign Commander in Chief. We have assignments, conditions to meet; as we meet those conditions as faithful subordinates, we will receive promotions individually, and the church will be victorious in time and on earth.

The external blessings of God are offered in response to society’s external, covenantal conformity to the standards of biblical law (Deut. 8; 28). These blessings include the expansion of inanimate capital goods (Deut. 8:7), wealth in livestock (Deut. 8:13), and food (Deut. 8:8–9a). The promised expansion also applies to human capital, namely, children. The clearest statement of this principle of growth is found in Deuteronomy 28: “Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep” (v. 4).³⁶ By calling into question the lawfulness and benefits of an expanding population within a godly culture, the advocates of zero population growth thereby challenge the whole concept of the dominion covenant. They simultaneously challenge the validity of the covenant of grace, which is the theological foundation of a society’s partial fulfillment of the dominion covenant.

36. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

It is not surprising that the intellectual leaders of the zero population growth movement in the late twentieth century inhabited the temples of secular humanism in all their tenured safety, namely, the universities. Ironically, zero population growth is the primary economic threat to those employed by the universities, because a reduced birth rate inevitably reduces the applications for admission to colleges two decades later. The only way to “stay even” is to lower the academic standards of the university and admit students who would never have qualified had there been an increasing number of available applicants. In other words, the success of the academic proponents of zero population growth in convincing educated members of the public to have fewer children leads to a deterioration of academic performance by future users of university services, not to mention the eventual dilution of quality in the faculties themselves. God will not be mocked at zero cost to the mockers.

Nothing can grow at a constant rate forever. The effect of “positive feedback,” meaning compound growth, is to push life against the incapable limits of the environment. If, for example, the population of the world in the 2010, some 6.8 billion people, were to increase at 1 per cent per annum for a thousand years, the world’s population in human beings alone—not to mention the supplies of beef or other animals to feed them—would be over 147 trillion. Either the rate of increase slows eventually to zero, or less, or else we run out of time. But this is precisely the point: exponential growth, meaning compound growth, points to a final judgment, the end of time. If the growth process is God-ordained in response to a society’s covenantal faithfulness, then the day of judgment should become the focus of men’s concern and hope. History is not unbounded. The zero-growth advocates assume that resources are finite, that history is indefinite, and therefore growth has to be called to a halt eventually. The Christian response is different: growth is legitimate and possible, resources are indeed limited, and therefore the end of history will arrive before the growth process is reversed, assuming society does not first return to its ethically rebellious ways, thereby bringing on temporal judgment (Deut. 8:19–20; 28:15–68).

Conclusion

Any attempt to challenge the ethical legitimacy and economic possibility of an epoch of long-term compound growth, which is the product of God's external blessings for covenantal faithfulness, is nothing less than paganism. Such an attack is based on a philosophy of history that is unquestionably pagan, either cyclical time or unbounded temporal extension. The goal of both views of history is the same: to deny the possibility of an impending final judgment. Compound growth points to final judgment. So, humanists are faced with a major problem: either the growth must stop or history must end, and most Western humanists in positions of academic, economic, or political responsibility are afraid or unwilling to admit the existence of this dilemma. They want endless progress and growth, and the "numbers"—compound growth rates matched against finite resources—testify to the impossibility of achieving both goals. A few have become zero-growth advocates; most simply prefer to ignore the problem.

Christians who have not been strongly influenced by contemporary humanism should answer: let us have ethical conformity to God's law, let us have the external blessings (including larger families)³⁷ that are promised by God in response to ethical conformity, let us extend regenerate mankind's dominion across the face of the earth, and let us pray for final judgment and the end of the curse of time. To pray for any other scenario is to pray for the social goals of paganism.³⁸

37. North, Authority and Dominion, ch. 1: "Population Explosion."

38. Ibid., Appendix B: "The Demographics of Decline."

23

A GUARANTEED INHERITANCE

But in the fourth generation, they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full (Gen. 15:16).

The theocentric focus here is inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.¹

Abram was concerned about his lack of a biological heir (v. 2). Here, God assured him that there would be a sufficient number of heirs to conquer the land in which he was wandering. God promised Abram that his heirs would inherit the Promised Land. Abram could rest assured that he was a pilgrim, not a nomad. He had a destination: right where he was. The future belonged to those who would bear his name, because God's name was on Abram. Abram was the patriarchal founder of a family covenant. He was not yet Abraham, the father of nations.

The promise was fulfilled four generations after the heirs of Abraham went down into Egypt, the nation not named by God (v. 13). The first generation that was born in Egypt was Kohath's. The second was Amram's. The third was Moses'. The fourth was Joshua's.

Why was there a need for a delay? Because inheritance is by ethics as well as by promise. So is disinheritance. The people of the land of Canaan in Abram's day were wicked. God designated them all as Amorites. Their wickedness was not yet full. In the fullness of time, the heirs of Abram would claim their inheritance. God's word is sure. This prophecy would be fulfilled.

God offers common grace to evil people. It is common because it does not offer redemption from sin and eternal death. It is grace because it is not merited or deserved by the recipients. The Amorites would continue to extend their dominion over the land. They would accumulate capital. This capital would become the inheritance of the sons of Abram. The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just (Prov. 13:22).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

The idea of compounded sin is taught clearly in this passage. Sin compounds over time if it is left unchecked. It is not static. The Amorites would continue to become ever more ethically consistent with their covenant-breaking religion. They would become more evil. As their sin compounded, they would move closer to their corporate and individual day of reckoning in history. They were already disinherited sons of God. Their condition as judicially disinherited sons would be revealed in history at some point. That point would be in the fourth generation of the sons of Abram who would be born in Egypt.

Abram was a powerful man. He commanded troops. These troops had defeated the invading king, Chedorlaomer. The invader had defeated the troops of five cities, yet Abram's comparatively small handful of servants had defeated the invader (Gen. 14). The local Amorites had good reason to fear Abram and Abram's God.

God told Abram that the day of inheritance was at least four centuries in the future (v. 13). It was clear that Abram would not live to see that day. Yet the promise meant everything to him, for it secured the inheritance of a childless man. The promise was tied to ethics: the rebellion of the Amorites. This delay was basic to God's covenant. The disinheritance would not come until the Amorites had been given sufficient time to condemn themselves. In the American phrase, God would give them enough rope to hang themselves. God's covenantal structure would become visible to the recipients of his common grace when this produced common wrath. The connection among ethics, sanctions, and inheritance would be visible to winners and losers alike.

The message of this passage should be clear: delayed gratification is basic to dominion. It would take generations to produce the conditions to make possible the transfer of the inheritance. Dominion is by covenant, not by power. Abram would have to wait on God for a son. His son would have to wait on the Amorites to fill up their corporate cup of wrath. This would take time.

The process of compounding takes time. For a time—many centuries—the kingdom of God and the kingdoms of covenant-breaking men grow side by side. The Amorites would extend their dominion, God promised. The sons of Abram would multiply. The land of Egypt would prosper. There would be success on all sides. Yet the successes of the Amorites and the successes of the Egyptians would prove to be short-lived. The sons of Abram extracted the inheritances of the recently deceased sons of Egypt at their departure from Egypt (Ex. 12:36). A generation later, the sons of the exodus generation inherited the Promised Land.

2. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41

God was telling Abram to be patient. The day of inheritance would surely come, but Abram would not see it. He would participate covenantally as the father. This should be sufficient. God's promise was sure. Abram did not need to consider war in his day as the way to inherit. War would be the means of the transfer centuries hence. God's promise was its judicial basis.

This promise should encourage covenant-keepers of every generation not to become discouraged at seeming defeats. God told Abram that his heirs would be under the domination of another nation (v. 13). But that nation would subsequently come under God's judgment (v. 14). The promised heirs had a promise to comfort them in times of affliction. This was the promise of a secure inheritance.

Conclusion

The promised inheritance required faith on Abram's part and on the part of his heirs. There would be a great victory. There would also be years of affliction. Both promises were basic to the family covenant God was about to renew with Abram. Genesis 15 is a chapter on covenant renewal. So is chapter 17. It reinforced the terms of the covenant. God would impose negative sanctions on the Amorites at the appropriate time. That event would constitute the fulfilling of the covenant's promise.

HOSPITALITY

And Abraham hastened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth. And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetcht a calf tender and good, and gave it unto a young man; and he hasted to dress it. And he took butter, and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them; and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat (Gen. 18:6–8).

The theocentric issue here is sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Food in Reserve

This is the story of a debt-free man who had food in reserve. This is always a good idea. In Abraham's day, having meat in reserve was not common. To share it with guests was for a special occasion. The West is so rich today that it no longer is.

When unexpected visitors arrived at Abraham's tent, he immediately responded by offering them hospitality. Hospitality is basic to biblical religion. This is one of the two most famous examples of hospitality in the Old Testament. (The other is Jael's "hospitality" to Sisera [Judges 4:17–22].) His guests were in fact angels. Abraham did not know this. There is a New Testament phrase which says, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares" (Heb. 13:2). That was what Abraham did.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

B. The Cost of Hospitality Then

So important is hospitality in the New Testament that the apostle Paul designated hospitality as one of the requirements for holding church office. “A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach” (I Tim. 3:2).²

The ideal of hospitality rests on the assumption that God has been hospitable to us. He has shown grace to us. We are like visitors who show up in front of God’s tent. We are traveling light. God rewards us with blessings that we do not deserve.

A person who shows up at your front door today is unlikely to expect hospitality. He certainly does not expect you to invite him in, so that he could spend the night and have several meals at your expense. We live in a different society from Abraham’s. In his day, there were no nearby motels. There were very few restaurants for travelers. Someone who shows up on your doorstep today is probably not in need of food and shelter.

Hospitality is a way of showing grace to others, a way of demonstrating care and concern for other people. It is also a way of demonstrating that you have economic reserves. You have food to share, and you are willing to share it. You are not in need of the basics of life. You have savings to draw on. You are not spending all of your reserves. You have a pantry full of food. You enjoy positive cash flow.

The assumption of traditional hospitality is that most people will not request it most of the time. There are limited resources at any family’s disposal. But someone who prepares to show hospitality recognizes that, under certain circumstances, frequently unpredictable, there will be somebody on your church’s doorstep who is in need of hospitality. So, he donates to the church’s hospitality fund.

In a society with limited wealth, showing hospitality is one of the ways that someone demonstrates his concern for people outside his own family. This is universally recognized as a mark of a good person. Word gets out. This softens resistance to the message of the gospel, which is surely a message of God’s hospitality to us. We act out in our lives what we say we believe about the relationship between God and His people. Hospitality is way to put faith in action.

2. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 4.

C. The Cost of Hospitality Today

It takes resources to show hospitality. A family has to be willing and able to save a portion of its income for hospitality. While the obligation to demonstrate hospitality is not on the same level as the obligation to help someone in a life-threatening emergency, it has the characteristics of an emergency. First, it requires prior thrift. Second, it requires a willingness to share. Third, the person in need of hospitality shows up unexpectedly. Fourth, the person showing hospitality should make it clear that this is not a quid pro quo. It is not sharing something in order to get something. It is sharing on something other than a self-serving basis. Jesus taught and when we invite people into our homes, they should be people from whom we expect no reciprocal offer. This is why He said we should invite in the poor.

Then said he also to him that bade him, When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbours; lest they also bid thee again, and a recompence be made thee. But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind: And thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee: for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just (Luke 14:12–14).³

In the modern industrial world, most people own a refrigerator. They have food in reserve. This is much easier to do today, because refrigeration is inexpensive. It makes a form of saving possible: food in reserve. The modern freezer is a popular appliance, because people can purchase food when it is on sale at a bargain price. Smart shopping involves purchasing in bulk when prices are attractively low. Also, bulk purchases usually are less expensive per ounce than smaller purchases.

A refrigerator and a freezer make hospitality possible on a moment's notice. In agricultural societies before the advent of electricity, people had to have beef on the hoof in order to offer anyone a dinner that served beef. It was an important sacrifice on the part of the hospitable person to kill an animal in order to feed a stranger. This degree of sacrifice required capital. The average family did not have a spare animal to sacrifice for a meal.

One of the marks of the wealth of the West is the fact that most families have food in reserve. It is not a major sacrifice when we show hospitality to a stranger. God has shown great hospitality to us as residents in a modern industrial society. This hospitality is unprecedented in human history. Yet residents of modern societies become used to the enormous wealth at their disposal. They do not think anything about having meat in a freezer that they can share when a guest arrives unexpectedly. The cost of being hospitable in today's world is much less than it was in Abraham's day.

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 34.

Nevertheless, it does cost money to buy a refrigerator and a freezer. These are capital investments. It also costs a lot of money to stock a freezer with meat. To do this effectively, a person should not use debt. He must be in a position of positive cash flow. He benefits because he can pay cash. He can take advantage of opportunities.

A credit card enables us to take advantage of opportunities, but it makes it much more expensive for us to pay for the opportunities we have already taken advantage of. Future payments reduce our ability to take advantage of new opportunities. Opportunities must be paid for. We can pay with money saved, or we can pay with borrowed money. The difference is profound. One of the means of payment is future-oriented. The other means of payment is present-oriented. The Bible recommends future-orientation. This is why the Bible, when believed, produces thrift. It produces people who accumulate capital. It produces people who can show hospitality without digging deeply into their savings.

There is less household hospitality in modern society than there was in Abraham's day. There is less need for household hospitality today. There are motels and restaurants, and transportation per mile is fast and cheap. People can journey to a destination without stopping off at a stranger's house. We do not expect strangers to expect hospitality. This is a mark of our wealth. It is a sign that we rely more on impersonal market forces to supply us with our needs. We are not dependent on hospitality. We do not want to become dependent.

There is a famous line in the play A Streetcar Named Desire, where a poverty-stricken distant relative, who has arrived unexpectedly to move in with a comparatively poor family, announces: "I have always relied on the kindness of strangers." In modern society, this is perceived as a defect of character. This is because the wealth of modern society has reduced most people's dependence on hospitality. The thrift that was once required to show hospitality can be used to invest or to fund organizations that offer hospitality. The result of this investment has been enormous productivity and enormous output per capita. We invest more, so society requires less hospitality.

The opportunities to show family hospitality today are limited. Hospitality is shown by churches and rescue missions. We donate money to them to act on our behalf.

Conclusion

Abraham had animals in reserve. He was ready to show hospitality to strangers. He demonstrated his wealth and his generosity by sharing meat with his guests. These guests brought him important news regarding Sodom, where his nephew Lot lived. The strangers brought news from the outside world. This was a common payment for hospitality in the world before the telegraph. The difference was, they brought news regarding what would happen, not what had happened.

ESCAPE FROM THE WILDERNESS

And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away: and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba. And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lift up her voice, and wept. And God heard the voice of the lad; and the angel of God called Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is. Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand; for I will make him a great nation. And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water; and she went, and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad drink (Gen. 21:14–19).

The theocentric issue here is inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.¹

Sarah had told Abraham to cast them out of the family. He had listened to his wife, as he usually did, but he was saddened by what he had done. He had thrown out his own son. Ishmael was about 14 years old at the time. What father wouldn't be depressed about having to send away his son, even though his son had not done anything terribly wrong? All he had done was laugh at Isaac, whose very name means laughter. But that was enough to enrage Sarah.

God told Abraham not to worry, that God would make of Ishmael a great nation. He told Abraham that Ishmael would not represent Abraham covenantally in history. That position of authority would be inherited by Isaac. But God was not going to destroy Ishmael or Hagar.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (http://bit.ly /rstymp); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

God did not bother to tell this to Hagar. So, as she and her son wandered in the wilderness, they found no water. They ran out of the water which Abraham had given to them. Eventually, Ishmael collapsed. The Bible says that Hagar put him under a bush. This was not an infant. He was about 14 years old, a year older than when he was circumcised at 13 (Gen. 17:25). It is obvious that they had been without food and water for a considerable period. God had stretched them to the limit.

Finally, Hagar cried out to God. She did not ask for deliverance. She simply told God she did not want to see her son die. She had given up all hope. She told God this as her final testimony. Only at this point did the angel of God reveal the truth to her. God had set apart Ishmael, meaning that He had sanctified him, so that he could be a founder of a nation.

At that point, Hagar saw that there was a well nearby. There was a source of water, which meant that there was a source of life.

The angel of God had told her that her son would grow to be a leader of men. Only then did God reveal the means by which Ishmael would be restored. Hagar took some water to him, and held him up with one hand (21:18). Presumably, she reached behind his back, lifted him up, and gave him something to drink. That restored him. He was then able to continue growing. He became a great archer (21:20).

We have a lesson here. Hagar did not have sufficient faith in God. She believed that her son would soon die, and she would die after him. She knew enough about the relationship between God and man to pray to God. She explained her situation. She did not ask for deliverance, but she did point out to God the serious situation in which she and her son found themselves. She had no confidence that God would deliver either of them. But, just to make certain that she departed from life in communication with God, she prayed to him, telling him of her concern.

It was not that Hagar had no confidence at all in God. She knew that God exists. She knew that God listens to the prayers of men and women. She wanted to explain herself before she died. She did not want to die while out of touch with God. So, she had some knowledge of the way God deals with mankind. But, in the final analysis, she did not have very much trust in God. She did not see God as a deliverer. She saw him as a judge. She wanted to explain herself to the judge, but she was not begging for mercy.

Only after she admitted that she could no longer handle her own affairs did God reveal to her that her son had a great future. Only then did He reveal to her that she was within walking distance of a well. She had not seen that well. There was her physical deliverance, right in front of her, and she had not seen it.

God deals with people in distress in the same way that He dealt with Hagar. He lets them wander aimlessly in the wilderness. He waits for them to call upon Him. There is no evidence from the text that Hagar had prayed to God prior to this. Even in dire straits, she did not pray for deliverance. We are not told why.

Here was how Hagar was delivered. First, she laid her son under a bush. This might give him some shade, but it would only delay death for a little time. Second, she walked away from him. She did not want to see him die. Third, she explained her situation to God. She did not ask for deliverance. Fourth, God revealed to her the fact that he had not withdrawn his blessing for her son. Her son would not die. Fifth, she looked around and saw a well.

Conclusion

Hagar was driven into the wilderness. She did not have much sense. She waited until she had completely run out of alternatives, meaning opportunities, before she finally sat down and told God about her problem. She should not have waited so long.

Hagar wanted to get out of the wilderness, but she did not see the way out. Hagar's deliverance was right in front of her. She did not see this. There was a well in the wilderness. There was an oasis. It was not free. The price of obtaining this water was self-discipline, obedience, and faith. This has not changed.

COMPETITIVE BARGAINING

And Jacob said, Sell me this day thy birthright. And Esau said, Behold, I am at the point to die: and what profit shall this birthright do to me? And Jacob said, Swear to me this day; and he sware unto him: and he sold his birthright unto Jacob (Gen. 25:31–33).

The theocentric issue here is inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Economic Oppression

Throughout the Bible, there are warnings against economic oppression. Men are not supposed to take advantage of weaker neighbors, widows, strangers, or those temporarily in need. Regarding food supplies, men are warned not to hold supplies off the market in order to obtain a higher price. “He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him: but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it” (Prov. 11:26).² It should be understood that this prohibition on “forestalling” does not involve the civil government. The state is not to set arbitrary prices for the sale of food (or any other scarce economic resource). The sanctions are social (cursing by the public) and the loss of a blessing from God. Food may be sold legitimately at a profit, but it is supposed to be sold, not hoarded for the sake of obtaining a higher price. The passage in Proverbs refers to large-scale commercial agriculture, since the forestalling involves sufficient quantities of corn to enrage the general public. It is unlikely that such an outcry would be aimed at someone who was hoarding only enough corn to feed his family, since a man is responsible for the welfare of his family (I Tim. 5:8), and since the withholding of such small quantities could hardly impose a major burden on the whole community. The frame of reference is the withholding of so much grain that local prices are affected, such that the sale of this grain represents a substantial benefit to the community.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

2. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 32.

Given this perspective on food sales, must we categorize Jacob as an oppressor? Or is it legitimate to classify him simply as a successful bargainer?

Bargaining in this family was an accepted tradition, after all. Jacob's grandfather had tried to negotiate with God Himself, who appeared to Abraham in a pre-Incarnation form of a man in the plains of Mamre. Abraham had tried to lower the price of preserving Sodom. Would God preserve the city for the sake of 50 righteous people? Yes? How about 45? Fair enough? How about 40? But that is a fairly considerable sum. What about 20? All right, here is my last offer: Will you spare the city for the sake of ten righteous people? And God, knowing that only Lot was righteous in the city, graciously agreed to each reduction of price offered by faithful Abraham (Gen. 18:22–32). In the language of the modern marketplace, Abraham was asking God to spare the city for a “wholesale” price. God in no way rebuffed this continual bargaining process as somehow immoral or in poor taste. Yet he was asking God to preserve a perverse society for the sake of only a handful of righteous men—a declining handful. He bargained.

B. Esau's Character

The New Testament's assessment of Esau is clear enough: he was a profane person, “who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright” (Heb. 12:16). He “despised his birthright” (Gen. 25:34b). In his heart, the man was a murderer (Gen. 27:41). Though he was entitled to the double portion of the inheritance because he was the firstborn (Deut. 21:15–17),³ in terms of his personal character, he was to be regarded as the second son. God loved Jacob (an astonishing miracle of grace) and hated Esau even before they were born (Rom. 9:10–13). God's promise had been with Jacob from the beginning (Gen. 25:23). God hated Esau from the beginning, and He laid waste to his heritage (Mal. 1:3).

Nevertheless, had not Esau come to his brother in time of great need? Didn't he deserve lawful consideration from Jacob? Didn't he announce that he was dying of starvation, making his birthright worthless in his own eyes (25:32)? Shouldn't Jacob have had compassion on his dying brother, comforting him in his hour of crisis? Didn't Jacob in fact owe food to Esau? Yet he actually bargained with him for the starving man's birthright. Can we regard Jacob's actions as ethical?

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 50.

Before commenting on the biblical account of the relationship between Jacob and Esau, we must first understand something about hunger, food deprivation, and actual starvation, which are not the same things. We are told in verse 29 that Esau was "faint." Yet the obvious reaction of Esau after his meal indicates that this faintness was anything but a faintness unto death.

Herbert Shelton, an advocate of supervised fasting as a means of attaining good health, documented numerous cases of individuals who have fasted well over a month. He cited a statement by Dr. Ragnar Berg, a Swedish biochemist: "One can fast for a long time, we know of fasts over a hundred days duration, so we have no need of fearing that we will die of hunger."⁴ In March of 1963, a couple was rescued in northern British Columbia. Victims of a plane crash, the pair had gone without food for over a month and a half. They had survived in their lean-to by drinking water and sitting by the fire. The lady, who had been somewhat overweight before the crash, had lost 30 pounds. The man, who had been more active during the fast, had lost 40 pounds. Physicians who examined them announced that they were in "remarkably good" condition.⁵ Shelton gave an account of one 70-year-old victim of asthma. The man was placed on a complete fast for 42 days under a physician's care. He experienced a major asthma attack the first night of the fast; subsequently, all symptoms disappeared, never to return.⁶ Fasts of similar lengths have been supervised by two physicians who specialize in treating overweight patients, Dr. Lyon Bloom of the Piedmont Hospital in Atlanta and Dr. Garfield Duncan of the University of Pennsylvania.⁷

The feelings of hunger that bother fasting individuals generally disappear within 36 hours, Shelton reported.⁸ The fast should end, he

4. Herbert Shelton, Fasting Can Save Your Life (Chicago: Natural Hygiene Press, 1978), p. 28.

5. Ibid., p. 26.

6. Ibid., pp. 17–19.

7. Ibid., p. 24.

8. Ibid., p. 23. I have personally fasted for six consecutive days without food or juices, and I experienced no problems. My hunger pains were minimal.

said, only when hunger returns, which can be a month later. This re-appearance of hunger is not accompanied with hunger pains. “The hungry person is conscious of a desire for food, not of pain or irritation. It is a false appetite that manifests itself by morbid irritation, gnawing in the stomach, pain, the feeling of weakness, and various emotionally rooted discomforts.”⁹ The fact, then, that Esau was “faint” does not prove that he was biologically desperate for food.

It is important to bear in mind the fact that God had promised Rebekah that two separate nations would arise from her sons (Gen. 25:23). This indicated that a separation based on ethical standing before God would eventually take place, since “two manner of people” would be born. The covenant line, the true heirs of God’s promises, would be extended through the younger son. God’s hostility to Esau and his descendants, the nation of Edom, was implacable (Mal. 1:2–3).

Therefore, when Esau came before Jacob to request a meal, Jacob was confronting an enemy of God. Moreover, this enemy possessed a very valuable capital asset, namely, legal title to the birthright that was due to the eldest son. If this birthright had remained with Esau, then an important transfer of capital would not have taken place. The Edomites would be the heirs of the blessing. Yet the Edomites were not to be the heirs of God’s promises, something God had revealed to Rebekah.

It is true that Esau was Jacob’s brother, biologically speaking. The question then arises: Did Jacob owe his biological brother a free meal? Was it immoral for Jacob to refuse to give his biological brother a free meal? If he did owe a free meal to Esau, morally though not legally, then he was clearly being selfish when he began to bargain for one.

C. Subsidizing Evil

Are we acting immorally and selfishly when we enter into a voluntary economic exchange with the enemies of God, instead of giving them everything they ask for, irrespective of who they are, what they plan to do with our assets, and what their present condition of strength happens to be? Is a voluntary exchange less preferable than an unconditional gift to an enemy of God? If the enemy of God is not actually destitute, and therefore not totally dependent upon our mercy, must we heed his every request for a free handout? If so, where does the Bible say so? Must we subsidize evil men?

9. Ibid., p. 33.

“In the name of Christian charity,” wrote Rushdoony,

we are being asked nowadays to subsidize evil. Every time we give in charity to anyone, we are extending a private and personal subsidy to that person. If through our church we help an elderly and needy couple, or if we help a neighboring farmer with his tractor work while he is in the hospital, we are giving them a subsidy because we consider them to be deserving persons. We are helping righteous people to survive, and we are fulfilling our Christian duty of brotherly love and charity. On the other hand, if we help a burglar buy the tools of his trade, and give him a boost through a neighbor’s window, we are criminal accomplices and are guilty before the law. If we buy a murderer a gun, hand it to him and watch him kill, we are again accessories to the fact and are ourselves murderers also. Whenever as individuals in our charity, or as a nation in that false charity known as foreign aid and welfare, we give a subsidy to any kind of evil, we are guilty before God of that evil, unless we separate ourselves from the subsidy by our protest.¹⁰

His conclusion is straightforward: “We need therefore to call most of which passes for charity today exactly what it is. First, it is a subsidy for evil. Second, it involves a penalizing and taxing of the righteous in order to subsidize evil, and this penalizing of the godly is an important part of this false charity. Third, basic to this kind of action is a love of evil, a preference for it and a demand that a new world be created in which evil will triumph and prevail.”¹¹

D. The Birthright

If you had been given the responsibility of offering counsel to Jacob, what would have been the proper advice? Would you have told him that he owed a meal to his lawless brother? If so, then your counsel would have meant the loss of the value associated with the birthright. If Esau was willing to trade his birthright for a meal, which was the case, then he was asking Jacob not simply to give him a free meal, but rather to give him permanent possession of the birthright. If Jacob was in a position to ask for and receive the birthright he cherished, which Esau despised, as the Bible says, then to fail to make the transaction meant giving up the birthright that was virtually in his hands. It was not simply the value of the food that Jacob would have had to forfeit, but the value of both the food and the birthright—the birthright that Esau valued less than food.

10. R. J. Rushdoony, Bread Upon the Waters (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1969), p. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rjrsb>). This book is a compilation of columns Rushdoony wrote for The California Farmer.

11. Ibid., p. 6.

To understand the nature of this exchange, consider verse 34: “Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentiles; and he did eat and drink, and rose up, and went his way: thus Esau despised his birthright.” What an astounding recovery from the brink of death! A few moments before he had announced that he was facing a life-and-death crisis. Yet after one hearty meal, he sauntered out undaunted. The New Testament does not say that he traded his birthright away for his life; he traded it away for “one morsel of meat.” One morsel of meat is not the dividing line between life and death. He wanted a handout. He did not deserve mercy.

What are we to make of Esau’s words? Did he really believe that he was facing death from imminent starvation? If so, he was present-oriented to a fault. His stomach was growling, and he simply could not bear the discomfort. Another possible interpretation is that he was lying to Jacob about his condition. He wanted a meal and thought he could play upon Jacob’s sympathy. This indicates that the two did not get along well to begin with—a reasonable assumption, given Jacob’s plain ways and Esau’s skills as a hunter (25:27). But, in all likelihood, Esau was present-oriented. How else could he justify his willingness to give up his birthright for a mess of pottage? Would any future-oriented man have traded so much for the sake of so little? He justified his willingness to enter into such a woefully ridiculous exchange by feigning near starvation. Once the transaction was consummated, he did not even bother to keep up the pretense. He got up and went his way, leaving his birthright behind. Then he despised his birthright, a phenomenon known among children by way of Aesop’s fables as “sour grapes.” Anything worth less than a single meal, yet valued so much in the eyes of the culture of that era, had to be despised by anyone so short-sighted as to sell it so cheaply. He wanted a handout. He feigned helplessness in order to receive mercy. His trick failed.

Why would anyone have entered into such a transaction? Esau’s present-orientedness was his downfall. He wanted immediate gratification. The benefits of the birthright seemed so far in the future to Esau, and the food was so tempting. Why cling to something so valueless in the present (the value of the birthright, discounted by his very high rate of interest, or time-preference), when one might get something quite valuable right now (a mess of pottage)?

Jacob knew his brother's character quite well. On the surface, His offer of some stew for his brother's birthright was nothing short of preposterous. He knew his brother's price because he understood Esau's preposterously high present-orientedness. Esau possessed a very high time-preference; he wanted instant gratification. He therefore made economic decisions in terms of a high rate of interest, so that he discounted the present value of future goods quite steeply, almost forcing their value to zero on his personal preference scale. Jacob understood the economic implications of his brother's preference for instant gratification, and he made him the offer: birthright for food. The food was worth a lot to Esau; the future value of the birthright meant practically nothing to him. The result was this remarkable exchange. Jacob purchased legal title to his promised birthright.

The birthright had been promised to Jacob. Yet Jacob bargained in a free market to obtain it. By God's law, later put into written form by Moses, it was Esau's right as the firstborn, as long as Esau remained faithful to the covenant. God knew in advance that he would not (Rom. 9:10–13). Jacob used this incident in Esau's life to purchase the birthright at a remarkably low price. Esau's character flaw, plus the presence of his temporary hunger, combined to present a unique economic opportunity to Jacob. Jacob was not one to let an opportunity like this escape. By despising the covenant, his birthright, Esau forfeited his rights as the firstborn son.

Conclusion

There is not the faintest hint in the Bible that Jacob's transaction with Esau was in any way immoral. Any attempt on the part of commentators to draw conclusions from this incident concerning the immorality of sharp economic bargaining is wholly unwarranted exegetically. It is in no way immoral to bargain competitively with anyone whose lack of vision, lack of foresight, lack of self-discipline, and lack of a strong future-orientation have combined to place him in a weak bargaining position. Such men are entitled to purchase their heart's desire, namely, instant gratification, at whatever price they are willing to pay. We should ask them to pay a lot.

This conclusion is not sufficient to justify overly sharp bargaining with righteous men who have been forced by unpredictable circumstances into a position of competitive weakness. Mercy is to be shown to victims of external crises. The moral rule against the forestalling (withholding) of grain is a case-law application of the biblical law against economic oppression. But this valid rule in no way inhibits men from getting the best return they can in exchanges with undisciplined, present-oriented men. There is no doubt that the present-oriented man is at a distinct competitive disadvantage when bargaining with a future-oriented person, and it is quite possible that he will forfeit something as valuable as his birthright for something as valueless as a single meal. The fact that assets tend to flow in the direction of future-oriented, thrifty, and self-disciplined economic actors is a testimony to the godly order of a free economy. To stand in judgment of Jacob's competitive bargaining with Esau is to stand in judgment of a moral and economic order which penalizes the present-oriented man, benefits the future-oriented man, and in no way imposes compulsion on either. Such a critical judgment certainly goes beyond the Bible's assessment of Jacob's actions.

ENVY AND DESTRUCTION

And Isaac digged again the wells of water, which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham: and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them. And Isaac's servants digged in the valley, and found there a well of springing water. And the herdmen of Gerar did strive with Isaac's herdmen, saying, The water is ours: and he called the name of the well Esek; because they strove with him (Gen. 26:18–20).

This encounter was based on a conflict over ownership. The herdsmen claimed that the water was theirs. Isaac removed his flocks from the region. This was not necessarily an acknowledgment of their claim of ownership. It was a way to avoid conflict.

What has escaped the observation of most commentators is the peculiar aspect of the herdsmen's claim. Isaac knew where to dig for water. He did it twice more (vv. 21–22). This indicates that Abraham had told him exactly where the wells had been located. When he arrived at the designated locations, he found that the wells had been filled in with dirt. But why?

Their water was a valuable resource. The herdsmen claimed that the water belonged to them. It was worth challenging Isaac. Yet they had not been using this water. Why not? Why allow a valuable resource be wasted for decades? Maybe they had forgotten. This seems unlikely. The wells had belonged to Abraham. He had departed. Why did their predecessors fill in the wells with dirt? What was the point? Here was a valuable asset. Abraham had discovered water. Now he had abandoned the wells. Why not take over the asset? Why fill in these wells?

The answer is envy. The Philistines knew that Abraham had dug the wells. He had a special relationship with the king of the Philistines (Gen. 21:23–24). Abraham had complained that some of the king's servants had forcibly taken possession of wells that Abraham had dug (v. 25). The king said that he knew nothing about this (v. 26). At that point, the two men made a covenant with each other. Abraham handed over seven ewe lambs as a testimony to the king that he had dug the well (v. 30). Then Abraham returned to that place and planted a grove (v. 33). Abraham had left the region after many years (22:1–2). So, these wells were clearly Abraham's. Even though he had departed, none of the locals decided to occupy Abraham's land.

They filled in the wells with dirt. This was a public testimony that the assets would not be used by anyone. Abraham might return. This guess was incorrect; he didn't. His heir might return. This happened. Isaac returned. There was always a possibility that the heir would not recall the location of the wells. Why would that be an advantage to the local economy? It wouldn't. If Isaac returned to the land and became productive, the local economy would benefit. There would be new sources of wealth. But the locals resented Isaac's presence.

The locals then claimed that the wells belonged to them. This was preposterous. Isaac knew where the wells had been, because his father had told him. His father had dug them. He had owned them. The locals knew this. This was the reason why their fathers had not taken possession of the wells as soon as Abraham departed. Instead of taking possession of the wells, they filled them in. They decided that, as long as they could not own the wells, no one would, especially Abraham's heir. They preferred nothing to something. They could have worked a leasing arrangement. They chose to destroy the wells instead.

This was envy in action. Envy is not the desire to take away part of another person's wealth. That sin is covetousness or jealousy.¹ Envy is the desire to see to it that no one has any advantage. If they could not own the wells, then no one would gain any benefit from them. It is better to waste an asset, they concluded, rather than see the owner benefit from it in any way from its use.

This is a destructive outlook. The envious person would rather see no one benefit, just because he cannot directly benefit. The locals could have leased rights from Abraham. They would have received the use of water. But to gain this benefit, they would have had to offer Abraham something in exchange. Abraham would have benefitted. Better that no one benefit, they concluded. Better that the dominion covenant not be extended than to let Abraham benefit.

1. Chapter 15:B.

Conclusion

The conflict over the newly dug wells took place because the heirs of the original thieves of Abraham's wells wanted to re-claim the stolen property which the king had taken away from the thieves. The thieves had accepted this decision, for they had no choice. They acknowledged Abraham's ownership of the wells by their act of destruction: filling in the wells. As soon as Isaac's men had dug the wells, the locals tested Isaac's willingness to defend his inheritance. He was not willing. He wanted to avoid trouble. The local Philistines became the heirs of Abraham. It was a stolen legacy.

THE USES OF DECEPTION

And Jacob said unto his father, I am Esau thy firstborn; I have done according as thou badest me: arise, I pray thee, sit and eat of my venison, that thy soul may bless me (Gen. 27:19).

The theocentric issue here is inheritance, point five of the biblical covenant model.¹

Commentators who are prone to criticize Jacob's sharp bargaining with Esau are equally prone to argue that Jacob's character flaw is inescapably visible in this incident. Here, Jacob resorted to lying to receive the coveted blessing from his father. He used a flagrant deception on his aged father, taking advantage of the old man's failing eyesight to gain the blessing. Jacob, it seems, would stop at nothing in order to secure an economic advantage for himself.

The commentator who comes to the Bible with the assumption that it is immoral to tell a falsehood in every conceivable case, must naturally conclude that Jacob's actions here were unlawful. However, such an a priori assumption concerning deception overlooks, or in some instances deliberately suppresses, the testimony of the Bible that God may bless deception for a godly cause.

A. Lying for God's Sake

The obvious example is Rahab, who deliberately lied to the representatives of Jericho's government who were searching for the Hebrew spies. Even John Calvin attacked the propriety of Rahab's lie, although he exonerated her completely in her act of treason against Jericho. Calvin was followed in this judgment by the Puritan commentator

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

Matthew Poole and the twentieth-century theologian John Murray.² Yet it should be patently obvious that a spy is, by definition, a full-time deceiver, as is the treasonous individual who remains inside the commonwealth as an agent of the enemy. Analytically speaking, the fact that a verbal lie was spoken by Rahab is incidental in comparison to the far greater deception of her treason, yet the commentators are all too often unwilling to accept the incidental lie, although they are forced to follow the New Testament's judgment concerning the righteousness of Rahab's treason (Heb. 11:31).

The closed-mouth traitor of Judges 1:24–26 and the obvious use of deception by Ehud the regicide (Judg. 3:15–25) are other examples of the successful use of deception by men who were covenanted to God. When Ehud announced the intention of his secret visit in the king's chambers, to deliver a “present” to the king, he was no less a liar than Rahab or Jacob; no king expects to receive in private a man carrying a dagger rather than a present from his defeated subjects (Judg. 3:15). So basic was deception in Ehud's case that his own biology was involved. He was a left-handed man, so he strapped his 18-inch dagger onto his right thigh, so that the lazy guards would examine only his left thigh, where any normal right-handed man would strap a dagger for rapid use.³

Another remarkable instance of wartime deception is the story of Jael and Sisera, the captain of the army of Hazor, the Canaanitic captor of Israel. In a successful uprising against their captors, the Israelites, commanded by Deborah, defeated Sisera's forces. Fleeing on foot, Sisera came to the home of Heber the Kenite, who had a peace treaty with Sisera's commander, Jabin (Judg. 4:17). He was welcomed by Heber's wife, Jael, who said, “Turn, my lord, in to me; fear not” (4:18). He told her to tell any man inquiring about some male visitor that there was no man present (4:20). Then he went to sleep, confident in the bond between him and the family and secure in the knowledge that Jael would lie for his sake and deceive his pursuers. What did she do? She unilaterally broke her husband's treaty with the defeated nation. She crushed his head by pounding a nail through his temples and literally nailed him to the ground (4:21). As a type of the Messiah who would crush the head of the serpent (Gen. 3:15), she effectively broke the word of her husband. What is the Bible's judgment concerning her disobedience to her husband, her active deception, her lies, and her murder? "Most blessed of women is Jael" (Judg. 5:24). Deborah's song of praise to Jael catalogues her deceptions and praises them (4:25–27). Jael's nail has provided exegetical headaches for legalistic commentators ever since.

2. John Calvin, Commentaries on the Book of Joshua (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1949), pp. 47–48; Matthew Poole, A Commentary on the Whole Bible (London: Banner of Truth, [1685] 1962), I, p. 411; John Murray, Principles of Conduct (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1957), pp. 138–39.

3. For an extended discussion of the treasonous nature of Rahab's lie, and a justification of her actions, see my essay, “In Defense of Biblical Bribery,” in R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 838–42.

But, exclaim the "no deceptions allowed" commentators, would God use deception to bring forth His will in history? The Bible's answer is categorically affirmative. Speaking of the false prophets of Israel, God instructed Ezekiel to announce:

Therefore speak unto them, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD: Every man of the house of Israel that setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumblingblock of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet; I the LORD will answer him that cometh according to the multitude of his idols; That I may take the house of Israel in their own heart, because they are estranged from me through their idols. . . . And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the LORD have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel. And they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity: the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh [unto him]; That the house of Israel may go no more astray from me, neither be polluted any more with all their transgressions; but that they may be my people, and I may be their God, saith the Lord GOD (Ezek. 14:4–5, 9–11).

The legalistic or humanistic commentator will have enormous problems with this passage of Scripture, and it can serve as a very useful "litmus test" of an implicit exegetical humanism on the part of a Bible expositor. Another passage in which deception is singled out as a valid part of God's plan for the ages is II Thessalonians 2:8–12:

And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming: [Even him] whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders. And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: That they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness.

It is difficult to understand why commentators criticize the actions of Rahab in lying to the representatives of a doomed, degenerate culture, and why Rahab's verbal deception should be accounted to her as unrighteousness, despite the clear testimony of the Bible concerning her faithfulness. It is as if the clear testimony of Scripture is too bright in the eyes of the commentators. They are as confused by the revelation of God in this area of applied faith as the early disciples were by the parables of Jesus. They simply cannot grasp the nature of God's total hostility toward humanistic rebellion.

B. Jacob's Lie

The problem in understanding Jacob's lie to his father should not be that he lied as such, but only that he lied to a fellow believer. Colossians 3:9 declares: "Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds." Was Jacob guilty of a violation of this commandment? There seems to be no escape: he disobeyed the law. The question is: Is this law absolutely universal, irrespective of historical circumstances? If it is, then Jacob sinned. If Jacob's action here was lawful, then the rule is not absolutely universal, but must be tempered by our knowledge of other biblical rules that modify or even suspend its binding nature in certain instances.

Several facts must be borne in mind when dealing with the context of Jacob's lie. First, God had spoken out in favor of Jacob as against Esau (Gen. 25:23). The elder son would serve the younger, God had declared. Second, God's reason for reversing the normal relationship between elder and younger brothers was His grace toward Jacob. He hated Esau and his heirs, while He loved Jacob and his heirs (Mal. 1:3; Rom. 9:10–13). Jacob was redeemed; Esau was not. Third, God had explicitly revealed His plans for the two nations prior to the birth of the twins. He had told Rebekah. Fourth, Isaac loved Esau because he enjoyed eating the venison Esau shot, but Rebekah loved Jacob (Gen. 25:28). Isaac was not concerned about the moral standing of the two sons before God, nor did he care about God's explicit revelation concerning their respective futures. What he was concerned about was meat. In this respect, he was a lot like Esau, who was more concerned with meat than his birthright (Heb. 12:16). This present-orientation of Isaac, who refused to consider God's word concerning the future position of the two families, blinded him to the character flaws in Esau, who was a murderer in his heart (Gen. 27:4). Fifth, Isaac was determined to use his power of giving the patriarchal blessing as a device to get one last round of venison out of Esau (Gen. 27:41). He was perfectly willing to challenge God's judgment concerning the respective merits of the two sons in order to get one final meat dinner. He ignored the fact that Esau had sold his birthright. He ignored the fact that God had promised Jacob the position of superiority. All that mattered was his own instant gratification. In other words, at this point Isaac went to war against God. He rebelled. Sixth, Rebekah instigated the deception, not Jacob. She was a lawful authority in the home, and she had been told directly by God about the future of the two sons and the future of their heirs. She sided with the son God favored. She sided with the covenant line. Thus, Jacob did not unilaterally decide to thwart the desires of his parents; he decided to follow the advice of one of them—the one who was conforming her actions to the prophecy of God. Rebekah was clearly more future-oriented than her husband, for she took seriously the promise of God concerning the future of Jacob's side of the family—the covenant line that would ultimately bring forth the Messiah. Though God normally rules through the husband rather than the wife, and though the elder son normally receives the double portion, in this instance the wife sided with God against her husband, and with the younger son against the elder.

Jacob was unquestionably following the orders of a lawful superior. At first, he worried about the deception involved; his father might discover his deception, "and I shall seem to him as a deceiver; and I shall bring a curse upon me, and not a blessing" (27:12). But his mother assured him that he had no need to worry: "Upon me be thy curse, my son: only obey my voice. . ." (27:13). Jacob obeyed.

C. Isaac's Rebellion

Isaac had decided to give Esau the whole blessing. It was not simply that he intended to give Esau the double portion, as first-born sons are entitled to under normal conditions. He intended to give Esau such a great blessing that he would put Jacob permanently under the dominion of the evil elder brother. His blessing had announced: "Let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee: be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee. . ." (Gen. 27:29a). He thought he was giving the blessing to Esau. Instead, Jacob received it. From the beginning, it was clear that Esau was hated by God, and would not be part of the covenant line. God had told Rebekah: “Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels; and the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger” (Gen. 25:23). Two nations meant that one nation was part of the covenant line and was chosen of God, while the other would be cast aside. God intended that Jacob would receive the total blessing, not just a double portion. Isaac, in contrast, decided that he could thwart God’s declared will by autonomously giving the blessing to the son and nation that God had decided to hate (Rom. 9:11–14; Mal. 1:3–4). It was through Jacob’s deception that Jacob received the promised comprehensive blessing, which left nothing for Esau except the promise of a dwelling place in “the fatness of the earth” (27:39). Isaac had tried to save the very best for rebellious Esau. So, he had nothing remaining within the framework of the covenant line to give to his hoped-for beneficiary, once Jacob’s deception had brought to pass God’s original promise to Rebekah. Isaac’s rebellious choice, coupled with Jacob’s effective deception, brought God’s promised conditions into the stream of covenant history.

Rebekah understood the motivation and character weakness of her husband. She had seen him favor Esau from the beginning. Now he was about to defy God, cheat Jacob, and bless the eldest son. Like Esau, Isaac was guilty of the sin of honoring his belly more than God’s promises, almost like the belly-worshipping sinners criticized by Paul (Phil. 3:18–19). There was no time to lose. Rebekah made an assessment concerning the likelihood that she and Jacob could convince Isaac to reverse his lifetime judgment concerning the respective merits of the two sons, and she decided that deception, rather than an appeal to God’s word, was more likely to be successful. After all, the two sons were 77 years old.⁴ Isaac had not yet seen the light. So she cooked up some meat, thereby appealing to Isaac’s desires, and dressed her son in camouflage.

When Esau returned to receive his blessing and found that Jacob

4. Joseph was 30 when he gave his prophecy to Pharaoh (Gen. 42:46). Nine years later (Gen. 45:6), Jacob came down to Egypt. He was 130 years old (Gen. 47:9). Joseph was 39. Thus, Jacob was 91 when Joseph was born (130 – 39). According to Gen. 29:20, 30 and 30:25, Joseph was born at the end of Jacob’s first 14 years of service. Thus, Jacob entered Padan-Aram at age 77 (91 – 14), and married at 84 (77 + 7). According to Gen. 27:41 to 28:1, Jacob fled to Padan-Aram immediately after his deception of Isaac, so that Jacob was 77 when he received the blessing. Esau was also 77, being Jacob’s twin.

had received it, he asked for an additional blessing from his father. Isaac's answer is significant: "Behold, I have made him thy lord, and all his brethren have I given to him for servants. . . ." (Gen. 27:37a). He announced that it was his blessing that had elevated Jacob over his brother. Yet God had announced this from the beginning. It is obvious that Isaac understood his blessing as having the power to convey this position of historical superiority—covenantal superiority—apart from God's word. Furthermore, he had unquestionably intended to give this favored position to the rebellious son who would trade him meat for the blessing.

What had Jacob accomplished? He had executed the preposterous exchange. Like Esau, who had traded his birthright for a mess of pottage—one morsel of meat (Heb. 12:16)—Isaac traded the blessing that was lawfully Jacob's for one meal of savory meat. Jacob was only purchasing that which was covenantally and legally his. God had promised it, and he had purchased the birthright from his brother. Isaac had recognized Jacob's voice, but the camouflaged hands that appeared to be hairy, coupled with the promise of an immediate meal, were sufficient to allay Isaac's suspicions (Gen. 27:2–25). The idea of trading a meal of meat for a blessing owed to God's chosen recipient was preposterous. Jacob, however, had learned that it was sometimes necessary to enter into preposterous exchanges with present-oriented men in order to purchase what was covenantally his in the first place.

Isaac had persisted in his defiance of God's revelation concerning the boys throughout their lives. He had shown no willingness to reverse his assessment of their respective character for 40 years or longer. The twins were born when Isaac was 60 years old (25:26), and Esau had married the Hittite women against his parents' wishes when he was 40 years old (26:34–35); but the blessing was given 37 years after Esau's marriage. Every visible action on Isaac's part indicated that he would bless Esau, despite the pain Esau's wives had caused him. What could an appeal to the original promise of God have accomplished?

There are those who would say in the face of Isaac's whole history that both Rebekah and Jacob were in error, that they should have appealed to the old man's theological judgment by reminding him of God's assessment of the two sons. They should have denied the effect of a lifetime of active, conscious rebellion on Isaac's part, and told him, in defiance of his life-long preference for Esau and his venison, to bless Jacob instead. There are those who would say this, but none of the New Testament writers ever did.

We are told in Hebrews 11:20 that “By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning the things to come,” but this refers only to the confidence Isaac had that his blessing, as a patriarch in the covenant line, would have historical impact in time and on earth. He had confidence in his own word. There is no doubt that he did have confidence in his own word. It was an important word. It was so important that Jacob and Rebekah had to use deception in order to be assured that his word would be applied in the way that God had prophesied. His word was so important that he could tell Esau that he had transferred long-term authority to Jacob (Gen. 27:37). The power of his word was nevertheless dependent on his faith in God, and it took a conspiracy against him to make certain that his verbal blessing actually conformed to the announced intention of God to bless Jacob. It took deception, in other words, to bring Isaac’s words into line with the God to whom Isaac was officially committed, but whose own words Isaac defied in practice.

One conjecture made by critics of Jacob’s deception is that he was repaid, like for like, when his uncle Laban deceived him into a marriage with Leah, and then was able to compel Jacob to work an additional seven years to pay for Rachel (Gen. 29:23–28). He, too, used a disguise to trap the victim. The Bible says nothing about any “like for like” retribution being involved in this incident. We are told that Jacob faithfully served Laban six additional years. So faithfully did he serve, in fact, that Laban begged him to remain an administrator of his flocks after the seven years were over (30:27–28). Furthermore, despite Laban’s continued deceptions, it was Jacob who prospered (31:1–13). It is true that Jacob had been deceived, but he wound up so wealthy that his own wives, Laban’s daughters, were viewed by Laban’s household as strangers (31:5). Laban had used up the capital of the family, leaving the daughters with no inheritance (31:5). God had transferred Laban’s wealth to Jacob’s household (31:16).

It should be clear enough for anyone who examines the record of Jacob’s sojourn in the household of Laban that Laban’s deceptions resulted in the opposite outcome from what he had intended. He knew that God was with Jacob, which is why he hired him after the second seven years were up (30:27). Yet he persisted in numerous deceptions, trying to gain economic advantage over Jacob (31:7). He lost his daughters, his wealth, and even his household idols (31:19). Yet, when he confronted Jacob, he had the audacity to assert that everything Jacob owned was his (31:43). (The idols were his, but he never found them [31:33–35].) Jacob told his uncle just how honestly and efficiently he had served him for two decades, sweltering during the day, freezing at night, and getting little sleep (31:38–42). Had God not been with him, Jacob charged Laban, surely Laban would have sent him away empty-handed (31:42). Yet it was Jacob who had the wealth, not Laban.

The results of Jacob's deception of Isaac were altogether beneficial to Jacob. The results of Laban's deceptions of Jacob were economically beneficial to Jacob. What are we to conclude? That deceptions as such always backfire? Obviously, Jacob's deception of his father did not backfire. It was Esau who wailed his despair, not Jacob. Are we to conclude that deception as such always wins? Hardly: Laban's losses testify to the opposite conclusion. What, then, are we to conclude?

D. The Holy Pretense

We are to conclude that it is better to conform ourselves to the explicit revelation of God, unlike Isaac and Esau, and to the visible signs of God's favor, unlike Laban and his sons, than to defy God. We have evidence that God blesses those who conform themselves to His covenantal law-order. We have evidence that a similar tactic to gain personal advantage, namely, the use of deception, can result in vastly different results, depending upon a person's place in the plan of God. God honored Isaac's blessing because He honored the deception by Rebekah and Jacob. The deception saved Isaac from a crucially important error of judgment. The deception enabled Jacob to gain that which was rightfully his, both by God's promise and Esau's voluntary sale. The deception in no way led to Jacob's impoverishment; indeed, the words of Isaac's blessing were fulfilled in Jacob's life over the next 20 years, as his heirs and capital grew rapidly.

If Jacob's action was categorically wrong, the Bible's testimony against him is inferential, not explicit. It would no doubt have been better if Isaac had never indulged his taste for meat at the expense of God's promises. It would no doubt have been better if Jacob had never had to use deception at Rebekah's insistence. But the deception was unquestionably preferable to Isaac's giving the blessing to Esau, and that was the situation Rebekah and Jacob faced. Jacob and Rebekah accepted their historical circumstances and acted in terms of them. Jacob prospered.

God deceives the unbelievers. Christ Himself spoke in parables deliberately, so that the people of His day would be confused, fail to repent, and perish in time and eternity. This was Christ's own response when the disciples asked Him why He spoke in parables: "For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them" (Matt. 13:15). How explicit must the Bible become to convince men of the valid role of deception and even verbal camouflage—Christ's chosen method of sending lawless men to eternal judgment—to convince His followers of the usefulness of deception? Are we to condemn the use of spies in cases when Christian nations confront their enemies? Was Moses wrong in sending the 12 spies into the land of Canaan? Puritans like William Perkins and William Ames had no doubt on this score; there are perfectly valid uses, they said, of the holy pretense.⁵

When we see a godly man headed for disaster, and we have proven on countless occasions in the past that directly confronting him with the truth of God has proven wholly incapable of turning him aside from a particular act of rebellion, and when we do not have any lawful authority over him in this particular instance, then the testimony of Rebekah and Jacob stands as a beacon to guide us: if he must be tricked to save him from a serious error, deception is valid. This rule of conduct is not to be used by men to exonerate the Labans of the world, but with His explicit praise and blessing of Jacob, God has implicitly acknowledged the validity of the occasional use of deception against brothers in the faith, or even fathers, at least in cases where other lawful authorities approve (in this case, Rebekah).

E. Confused Commentators

Unfortunately, conservative commentators have failed to deal adequately with the biblical doctrine of legitimate deception. They have tended to take a woefully unrealistic view of deception as such, irrespective of the context. All too typical of this approach is the analysis of Jacob's deception of his father that appeared in the standard late nineteenth-century work, the Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Knowledge (1894): "It cannot be denied that this is a most reprehensible transaction, and presents a truly painful picture, in which a mother conspires with one son in order to cheat her aged husband, with a view to deprive another son of his rightful inheritance. Justification is here impossible. . . ." Such an analysis is almost completely devoid of historical understanding. The circumstances are generally ignored, including God's promise concerning the two sons, the lawful exchange between Jacob and Esau, the short-run perspective of Isaac, and the murderous nature of Esau. The time limitation under which Rebekah and Jacob were operating is also ignored. Is it any wonder that such a blind spot toward history, combined with an a priori approach to deception as such, has led to the social and practical irrelevance of the vast bulk of Christian ethical analysis over the past three centuries? Can you imagine a military commander burdened by the limitations of this variety of Christianity? He could not camouflage his artillery or missiles. He could not send out spies. He could not manufacture false reports in order to deceive the enemy. Is it any wonder that secular leaders throughout the West have come to regard Christians as socially irrelevant and utterly impotent to deal with the realities of life?

5. Cf. George L. Masse, The Holy Pretence: A Study in Christianity and Reason of State from William Perkins to John Winthrop (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1957).

The commentators can always reply that since Jacob had been given the promise, he did not have to resort to deception. Somehow, God would have been able to bring His promise into history. Jacob never had to resort to competitive bargaining with his lawless brother, or to deception with his short-sighted (literally and figuratively) father. This same argument can be raised (and has been raised) with respect to Rahab,⁶ and it could be raised with Ehud and Jael. Somehow, God would have brought His will to pass without deception. How, we do not know. We cannot say. But God would have overcome the effects of truth-telling on the part of His servants. By implication, we tell the military commander he need not use camouflage.⁷

Rahab lied because she did not believe the rulers of Jericho had the right to know the whereabouts of God's servants, the spies. Rebekah decided that Isaac did not have the right to know about the costume—we might call it camouflage—Jacob wore. If we can dismiss the charge of immorality in the case of concealment by raising the question of “the right to know,” should we not dismiss the same accusation raised by critics, including Murray, against Rahab and Rebekah? He will win the war without it, without spies, and without any other sort of deception. How, we do not know. We cannot say. But we know. We know that the military commander, like Jacob and Rahab and Jael, is not truly under the constraints of historical circumstances. We assert that our commitment to unqualified truth-telling can overcome historical circumstances. But there is a problem with such logic: on occasion those praised by the Bible as great men and women have been exceedingly skillful liars, and the unquestioned success they have enjoyed as a direct and immediate result of their lies has been the very cause of the Bible's praise of them.

6. Murray, Principles of Conduct, pp. 138–39.

7. John Murray, a soldier who lost his eye in World War I, was aware of the military advantages of camouflage. When teaching a children's catechism class, Murray spoke critically of Rebekah's deception. But when he raised the question of camouflage to the class, he denied that camouflage is comparable to a verbal deception. Camouflage is concealment, not deception, and concealment is justified under certain conditions, namely, when we "conceal something from a person when that person has no right to know. . . ." In such a case, concealment "is not deception." This account is reprinted in John Murray, A Memorial with Tributes, ed. Iain Murray (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1975), p. 46. Sadly, Murray did not pursue this crucial line of reasoning. Isn't the question of "the right to know" central to the issue of lying?

Jacob faced historical constraints. His father had made up his mind long ago, and he was trying to get one more plate of stew out of the deal—an unrighteous deal at that, one in defiance of God's promise, as well as the lawful exchange made by the two brothers. He was going to override that exchange, intervene in the market and thwart the economic implications of Esau's sale of his birthright. Isaac was about to become an interventionist, a redistributor of wealth, taking away the blessing owed to Jacob, who had paid for his birthright in a voluntary transaction, and transferring it back to the present-oriented, rebellious brother who had given him and Rebekah so much pain when he married the Canaanite wives (Gen. 26:34–35). Jacob had only a brief period of time to overcome Isaac, the rebellious interventionist and present-oriented statist, who, in that very moment, was willing to turn his back on the promise and law of God concerning the protection of private property in the sanctity of voluntary exchange. Jacob looked at the historical constraints that had been placed on him, and he lied. That lie worked!

Why do the commentators refuse to acknowledge that Jacob's deception was the immediate historical cause of his receiving what was lawfully his—lawfully because of God's promise and lawfully because of the voluntary exchange? Why do they look down on Jacob? It is difficult to say. What can be said is that it is time to stop criticizing Jacob and, by implication, Rebekah, and to start criticizing Esau and his short-sighted father, Isaac. In taking this approach to the Scriptures, we may be able to restore a sense of reality and awareness of historical circumstances, to biblical exposition.

As I have already written, one of the arguments that commentators sometimes lodge against Jacob's deception of Isaac is this one: God repaid Jacob for his sin by having Laban deceive him in the same way when Laban put Leah under wraps and gave her to Jacob as if she had been Rachel. On the surface, this looks like an impressive argument, but, like Leah herself, it is disguised. Yes, Jacob was deceived. Jacob, however, was not acting sinfully against Laban, as Isaac had acted against Jacob with respect to the ownership of the birthright and the blessing that was attached to it. The sin was wholly on the part of Laban's family. At least three people were involved: Laban, Leah, and Rachel. Either of the daughters could have come to Jacob in advance and revealed what their father was planning. Leah had little incentive to reveal this secret, but Rachel did. The obvious threat Laban could have used against Rachel was this: without her cooperation in the deception, he would never permit her marriage to Jacob. Also, Rachel knew that she ordinarily owed her father obedience. But did she owe obedience to her father in the committing of sin? Could she not have eloped with Jacob? After all, she later deceived her father by stealing his household gods (Gen. 31:19). Her sorrow throughout her marriage came as a result of her unwillingness to disobey her father and reveal the planned deception in advance. Jacob loved her, and she betrayed him.

Rachel's sin was that she obeyed her father and went through with his evil plan. With this painful chain of events, God was not punishing of Jacob for his deception of, and disobedience to, his father Isaac; He was punishing Rachel for not having also disobeyed her father, just as Jacob disobeyed his. In short, the fundamental issue involved in Rachel's sinful deception of Jacob was not the deception as such. Instead, it was the issue of obedience to the ungodly command of her father. She obeyed her father, unlike Jacob, who refused to participate in his father's sin. She entered into a sinful deception of her future husband. But it was not her deception as such that constituted her sin, but rather her obedience to an unlawful command. Once again, we are faced with an important biblical truth: it is not deception as such that is sinful. We should not avoid asking the more important questions: Deception for what purpose? Deception under whose authority? Is the authority in question biblically valid? These questions must be answered before we take up the question of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of a particular deception.

Conclusion

This is not “situation ethics.” Situation ethics denies the existence of any permanent moral standards. Situation ethics denies the existence of a standard of action for which each man will be responsible on the day of judgment. Situation ethics argues that the existential moment determines the ethics of an action, that time is the god of man.

What the Bible says, in this particular and limited case of deception, is that deception can be warranted. It provides us cases in which deception was warranted, primarily cases of war or, in the instance of Jacob and Esau, conflict between the representative heads of two separate nations. Just because deception is valid in cases of war, as the Bible affirms, we should not be led to the conclusion that there is nothing wrong with deception in general. We know that we are not supposed to bear false witness against our neighbor, for example. But the Bible also informs us that righteous saints have sometimes been forced to deceive in cases where others were acting unrighteously in direct defiance of God and God’s law. And far from being criticized by a single word in the Bible, they have been praised openly (in the case of Deborah’s praise of Jael), or grafted into the covenant line (Rahab), or blessed with enormous wealth (Jacob). Jacob tricked his father into bestowing the blessing on the one to whom it belonged by law and promise, and sure enough, the blessings were poured out on him. We should take this lesson seriously. If we fail to do so, the world will (and should) conclude that our religion is simply not serious and is therefore unworthy of serious consideration. If Jacob and Rahab and Jael were serious actors in history, we should do our very best to emulate their seriousness, their understanding of the meaning of the covenant, and their understanding of the historical circumstances in which they performed their covenantal role.

JACOB'S TITHE

And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, So that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the LORD be my God: And this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house: and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee (Gen. 28:20–22).

The theocentric issue here is God's legal claim on 10% of the income of His priesthood. This is an aspect of the church's exclusive right to administer the sacraments, which is an aspect of hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant model.¹

This is the second reference to the tithe in Genesis. It is also the last. In the first case, Abram tithed to Melchizedek, the priest of Salem. In this latter case, no priest is named.

A. Household Priesthood

One reason for this silence is that, except for Melchizedek, who was still alive, “having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God” (Hebrews 7:3), there was no covenantal priesthood apart from the household priests of the family of Abraham.

The Scriptures do not indicate that Melchizedek tithed to anyone. He was the high priest. To whom would he have tithed? To what priest would he have publicly proclaimed His subordination? None.

A household priest prior to the Mosaic covenant had no one to tithe to, except on a special occasion, as when Abram came under

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion by Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 2.

Melchizedek's administration because of geography. Jacob had been under his father's authority as the household priest. He was part of this household. There was only one holy tribe in his day: the family of Isaac. There is no evidence that Isaac was still under Abraham's authority, for Abraham had moved away at the time of Isaac's marriage. He no longer played a role in the history of the covenant, except as the father of Midian (Gen. 25:2).² When Abraham left the region, the covenantal priesthood transferred to Isaac.

Jacob was no longer under the household authority of his father Isaac, who had been the household priest of the family. So, he had a problem. He had broken with his father through his deception. He had instead obeyed his mother, who had told him, "Now therefore, my son, obey my voice according to that which I command thee" (Gen. 27:8).³ He could not return home safely for a time because of Esau's wrath. He only had the clothes on his back. He had no known source of income. If he gained a source of income, there was no God-fearing priesthood to which he could pay his tithe as a subordinate.

If he paid a tithe to anyone except Melchizedek, who was not local, he would be visibly subordinating himself to the god whom the priest claimed to represent. This would not have been Jacob's God. It was covenantally better to pay no tithe at all while he was outside of the jurisdiction of his father's household. So, he made a confession before God. His refusal to pay a tithe while outside of his father's household should not be considered as an act of rebellion towards God. On the contrary, it was an act of obedience. He affirmed to God that as soon as he returned safely to his father's house, he would pay the tithe.

He did not say to whom he would pay this tithe. He did not have to. It was obvious to him and to God: to his father, if the old man was still alive at Jacob's return. His father was the household priest.

B. Jacob's Vow: Conditional or Covenantal?

Jacob's request for aid came in a form that we associate with conditionality: if . . . then. "If you will give me what I need to live—food and clothing—then I will pay a tithe." But such a request can also affirm a limitation: "If you do not give me what I need to live, then I cannot pay a tithe." It is a confession of impotence, of total depend-

2. An heir of Midian, Jethro, was Moses' father-in-law. He was a priest. He subordinated himself to Moses after the exodus, serving as an advisor (Ex. 18).

3. Chapter 27.

ence on the God who supplies all good things. As James wrote almost two millennia later, “Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning” (James 1:17).⁴

Was this vow a prayer of covenantal or conditional subordination? Conditional subordination says: “If you won’t, then I won’t,” while covenantal subordination says: “If you won’t, then I can’t.” Anyone who argues that this vow was conditional is necessarily arguing that Jacob had already broken covenant with God. He was threatening God with his withdrawal from the covenant. “Fork over the goods, God, or else I shall find another God to worship.” This would have been a preposterous confrontation. He would have been placing his inheritance at risk.

Jacob had inherited the birthright which God had told Rebekah he would inherit. God had told her that the older son would serve the younger (Gen. 25:23). This was covenantal language: hierarchy, which is point two of the biblical covenant model.⁵ Jacob had recently deceived his father at his mother’s demand and with her cooperation in order to secure his father’s blessing. This blessing belonged to him by promise (to Rebekah) and by contract (with Esau). Esau had sold his birthright to him (Gen. 25:31–34).⁶ Isaac had planned to overturn this lawful transaction, but he had failed (Gen. 27:37). The covenantal blessing was now part of Jacob’s inheritance. This blessing had been based on his father’s office as a household priest.

His inheritance was already conditional: continuing subordination to God. If he broke covenant with the God of Abraham, he could not inherit any of the promises that God had made to Abraham. He was on the run because he was defending his inheritance from the rebellious decision of his father to give it to Esau. To put God to the test on one’s own authority is always an act of covenantal rebellion. “Ye shall not tempt the LORD your God, as ye tempted him in Massah” (Deut. 6:16). “And Jesus answering said unto him, It is said, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God” (Luke 4:12).

Any suggestion that Jacob’s request was conditional rather than covenantal raises some crucial theological problems. The main one is this: Jacob’s lack of trust in God. This was affirmed by David Croteau: “Rather than being an act of reverent worship, the context appears to show that Jacob's vow reveals his lack of trust in God's promise."⁷ He insisted that "it is a conditional vow."⁸ He went so far as to argue that Jacob was not yet a covenant-keeper. "In fact, he does not appear to be converted yet in the present passage. . . . Jacob's reaction is not one of awe, but rather of terror or fear."⁹ When did Jacob finally subordinate himself to God covenantally? After his all-night wrestling match with God when he was returning home two decades later (Gen. 32:24–30).¹⁰ He therefore came to saving faith in the total sovereignty of God only after he had defeated God in a wrestling match, forcing God to give him a blessing. Had I been on Mr. Croteau's dissertation committee, I would have asked him to explain this line of reasoning in greater detail before voting to make him Dr. Crouteau. It is not self-explanatory.

4. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 32.

5. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2.

6. Chapter 26.

On the contrary, Jacob was coming before God at Bethel in the name of the biblical covenant: the sovereignty of God (point one: God's sovereignty),¹¹ his own sonship (point two: hierarchy),¹² the blessing from his father (point four: sanctions),¹³ and his inheritance (point five: inheritance).¹⁴ He was affirming point three: law.¹⁵ How? By affirming the law of the tithe.

He made this affirmation: "then shall the LORD be my God." This was not a threat to worship another god. This was a covenantal reminder to God that He had made promises to Abraham and Rebekah regarding the inheritance. His prayer was comparable to Moses' prayer to God when God offered to destroy all of the Israelites and raise up a new nation for Moses to lead. Moses reminded God of the dark implications of such an offer. Pagans would scoff at God's unreliable promises.

And Moses besought the LORD his God, and said, LORD, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people, which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt with great power, and with a mighty hand? Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them

7. David Croteau, "A Biblical and Theological Analysis of Tithing: Toward a Theology of Giving in the New Covenant Era," a Ph.D. dissertation submitted to the faculty of Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary (2005), p. 78.

8. Ibid., p. 79.

9. Ibid., p. 80.

10. Ibid., p. 81.

11. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 1.

12. Ibid., ch. 2.

13. Ibid., ch. 4.

14. Ibid., ch. 5.

15. Ibid., ch. 3.

from the face of the earth? Turn from thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against thy people. Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, thy servants, to whom thou swarest by thine own self, and saidst unto them, I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven, and all this land that I have spoken of will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever (Ex. 32:11–13).

Moses appealed to God's reputation as a promise-keeper. The prayer worked. "And the LORD repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people" (Ex. 32:14).

Jacob's prayer was a covenantal prayer. "If I die in the wilderness, then your ability to fulfill your promise will be suspect." How could God prove for all to see that His promises are reliable? By proving that He was Jacob's God. How could He do this? By arranging events "so that I come again to my father's house in peace." This is exactly what God did. Jacob and Esau later buried their father (Gen. 35:29), just as Isaac and Ishmael had buried theirs (Gen. 25:9). Isaac had received the greater inheritance as the son of the promise. So did Jacob.

C. The Holy Tenth

Jacob promised God that he would pay the tithe if he lived and later returned to his father's house. Why a tithe? Because that was what Abram had paid Melchizedek.¹⁶ This holy tenth is a token of subordination to the high priest. The high priest is an ecclesiastical representative of God. He administers the sacraments to members of the ecclesiastical covenant.

Jacob's promise had a geographical limitation: his father's house. This meant that he would not pay the tithe until his return to his father's house. That he would not pay the tithe during his sojourn outside the promised land should not be seen as an act of defiance on his part. Ten percent of whatever he earned during this sojourn would be returned to God when the sojourn was over. Jacob would not forget who had supplied him with his wealth and under what conditions.

This was an affirmation of covenantal faithfulness. "I will not pay the tithe to covenant-breakers in this strange land. I will pay it instead when I return to my father's house. I will not visibly subordinate myself to the strange gods of this strange land. I will pay what I owe when I return to my father's house, which is my lawful inheritance." Jacob never forgot his inheritance. Neither did God.

16. Chapter 21.

Conclusion

Jacob's promise to tithe should not be understood as a one-time offer to provide something extra to God in exchange for benefits received. The tithe was mandatory on those who were not household priests of God. Jacob had not previously paid a tithe. Why not? Because he had been a son in a priestly household. But this would not be true for as long as he lived outside of that household's jurisdiction.

He affirmed to God that, upon his return to his father's house, he would pay a tithe on whatever he had earned while living outside his father's priestly jurisdiction. This was not a promise to do something extra. It was a promise to do something required. It was an affirmation of his faith in the covenant. It was an affirmation of his adherence to the law of the tithe (point three), which acknowledged his subordination to a priest (point two) by acknowledging God as the source of the blessings (point four). By this, he would maintain his inheritance (point five). God honored this request.

To whom did he owe this tithe? The text does not say, but the obvious answer is Isaac. Isaac was the head of his household. For a time Jacob was living outside this household. Upon his return, he would pay his tithe to the household priest.

CONTINGENCY PLANNING

Then Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed: and he divided the people that was with him, and the flocks, and herds, and the camels, into two bands; And said, If Esau come to the one company, and smite it, then the other company which is left shall escape (Gen. 32:7–8).

The theocentric focus of this passage is inheritance, point five of the biblical covenant model.¹

Jacob had left his home at his mother's suggestion, in order to avoid the wrath of his brother (Gen. 27:42–45). He also wished to fulfill his parents' desire that he not marry a Canaanite (27:46; 28:1–5). He had left empty-handed; he returned with massive wealth. Now, as he travelled through the land inhabited by his brother, he feared for his life. He was afraid of Esau's vengeance. His messengers had informed him that Esau was coming, accompanied by 400 men (32:4). This did not appear to be a peaceful welcoming committee as far as Jacob was concerned. His mother had believed that Esau's fury would last only a few days (27:44), and Jacob had been absent for 20 years (31:38). Nevertheless, he was not so certain of his brother's present-orientedness. Perhaps Esau still bore a grudge against the brother who he believed had defrauded him of his blessing.

A. Capital Preservation

Jacob's immediate goal was to preserve at least a portion of his capital. He divided his flocks into two sections on the assumption that at least half of his goods would be saved from destruction or confiscation in case of a direct confrontation. This willingness to forfeit half his goods in order to save the other half, rather than risk everything in an “all or nothing” situation, testifies to Jacob’s economic realism. He intended to minimize his losses. There was too much at stake to invest all of his assets in terms of the present-orientedness of his unpredictable brother.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1988] 2010), ch. 5.

What is not generally understood is that Jacob was an old man by this time. Joseph is spoken of as “the son of his old age” (37:3), even though Benjamin was born after Joseph. No events are recorded between the death of Rachel at the birth of Benjamin (35:19), Jacob’s visit to his father (35:26), and his father’s death at age 180 (35:27). Jacob was then about 120 years old, since he was born 20 years after Isaac’s marriage when Isaac was 60 (25:26). Jacob was 97 when he met Esau’s forces.² Therefore, Jacob was taking great care to preserve half of his capital for the sake of his family, since there was no guarantee that at his advanced age he would be able to recoup his losses if Esau took everything Jacob owned. He was probably running short of economically productive years, so capital preservation was far more important than it would have been had he been younger. The economic strategy of an older man is understandably different from that which might appeal to a younger man who has time to recover from mistakes.

Only after he had taken what he regarded as an effective contingency plan did he go to God in forthright prayer (32:9–12). He then pleaded with God to uphold His promises to him, though freely admitting, “I am not worthy of the least of all these mercies, and of all the truth, which thou has shewed unto thy servant . . .” (32:10). He reminded God of God’s own covenant with him, to uphold and bless him, but he did not assume that God was in any way bound to honor Jacob’s temporary interpretation of the meaning of the terms of the covenant in that particular situation. He did not sit idly by, waiting for God’s automatic seal of approval on his own self-confident decisions. Jacob had already taken prudent steps to preserve a portion of his capital before coming to God. He acted sensibly, and he did so almost automatically, knowing from experience that God is in no way morally compelled to honor foolishness or lethargy.

Jacob did not leave off at this point. He adopted a further tactic to use against his brother. He decided to buy him off. In this case, however, he did not assume that Esau could be pacified with a mess of pottage. It would be very expensive, but well worth it if he could stay the hand of Esau without conflict. He separated numerous animals from the main flock and divided them into smaller groups. He then commanded his servants to go in small droves, one at a time, delivering multiple peace offerings to Esau (32:13–21). Esau would then be like a modern child on Christmas morning, gleefully unwrapping a dozen small presents, one by one, instead of unwrapping one big box, and then becoming bored or even resentful at having received “only one” present. If Esau would not be placated with only one present, he might be placated with several smaller ones distributed tactically. The tactic worked (33:9–11).

2. Jacob was 91 when Joseph was born: footnote #4 in chapter 27. He left Laban’s service six years later (Gen. 31:38).

B. Preparing for Confrontation

Jacob abandoned neither his common sense nor his total faith in God’s covenant promises. He knew that God had promised to bless him, but he could not be sure that in this instance God was automatically going to guarantee his safe passage through the land of Seir. Jacob knew God’s general promise was reliable; the specific application of that promise in this instance was unclear. Jacob did not presume that the long-run reliability of God’s promises necessarily applied to each historical situation in the way that he, Jacob, hoped the promises would apply. Thus, he took the most effective action that he could to preserve some of his assets, given his imperfect knowledge of the uncertain immediate future. Jacob knew that his blessings were unmerited by his own worthiness, for they were given through God’s grace, but he also understood that the Lord helps those who help themselves.³

First, Jacob divided his flocks into two camps. Second, he prayed to God for aid. Third, he selected animals from his flocks to serve as peace offerings to Esau. Finally, he was ready for the great confronta-

3. This phrase, so familiar to Americans as a result of Benjamin Franklin’s Poor Richard’s Almanack, was part of the Puritan heritage. Franklin was nine years old when Samuel Moodey delivered his sermon, The Debtors Monitor (1715), in which he offered the following advice: “It is the diligent hand that gathers in, because its works are blessed. Nor has the blessing of God [though his common providence may] ever enriched, either the folded hand, or the hand stretched out in deceit or oppression. And now, not any further, and more particularly to add, how it is most for God’s glory, and man’s good, that we should help ourselves, that God may help us” (p. 51). “The Lord helps those who help themselves” is little more than a reworking of Moodey’s words, and like so many of “Poor Richard’s” slogans, the phrase was probably quite common in Franklin’s day.

tion—not with Esau, but with God in the flesh. Jacob wrestled with the unnamed man throughout the night and demanded a blessing from Him (32:26). This man was a theophany of God, a pre-Incarnation revelation of God in human form. We know that God walked in the garden of Eden in the cool of the day (Gen. 3:8). We know that Abraham was visited by God in human form, and that Abraham spoke to Him face to face (Gen. 18). We know that “the LORD spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend” (Ex. 33:11a), yet Moses was told that he could not look on God’s face and live (Ex. 33:20). The face of God the Father must be mediated through a theophany, or through Jesus Christ (John 14:9). Jesus said: “Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God, he hath seen the Father” (John 6:46). Again, we read in John 1:18: “No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.” Thus, what Moses saw in the burning bush was not the very face of God the Father, but a theophany, in this case a dual theophany: the burning bush itself and the angel of the LORD in the midst of the burning bush (Ex. 3:2). When Joshua saw the man holding the sword and challenged Him, the man announced that he was in fact the captain of the Lord’s host. Joshua fell on his face, and the man said, “Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy” (Josh. 5:15). These were the same words God spoke to Moses out of the burning bush (Ex. 3:5). Thus, concluded the author of “Anger” in the conservative Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature (1894): “These appearances are evidently ‘foreshadowings of the incarnation.’ By these God the Son manifested himself from time to time in that human nature which he united to the Godhead forever in the virgin’s womb.” He lists the man who wrestled with Jacob as one of these angelic theophanies.

In Hosea 12:4, we read of Jacob: “Yea, he had power over the angel, and prevailed: he wept, and made supplication to him. . . .” Hosea equated the angel with the Lord God of hosts, since it was He who spoke with Jacob (Hos. 12:5). The defeated wrestler gave Jacob his new name, Israel, which can be translated “he will rule as God” or “prince,” and one commentator thinks it is best translated “successful wrestler with God.”⁴ The ability to rename a patriarch is clearly a prerogative of God (Gen. 17:1–5). The man announced: “Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel: for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and thou hast prevailed” (32:28). These words were spoken to an elderly man who had the strength to wrestle all night with a theophany. He was determined to have a blessing, whether it took wrestling or, in the case of his father, deception. In both cases, he received his blessing.

4. “Israel,” Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), IV, p. 693.

C. The Face of God

Jacob called the place of conflict Peniel, or “the face of God,” for as he said, “I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved” (32:30). What is most significant with respect to economics is that Jacob sought God’s face and blessing only after he had made all of his plans, but before he executed them. He planned, prayed, planned some more, and then sought his blessing from God with such confidence that he wrestled God Himself to obtain it. He had done all that he believed possible to protect his assets and his life, and then he asked for his blessing. Systematic planning and systematic prayer are complementary.

Peniel was the capstone of a life of common sense, hard work, shrewd planning, and remarkable economic acumen. Jacob had bargained for the birthright that God had promised his mother he would receive; collected his blessing under adverse circumstances; departed in poverty; and returned back to the land with great wealth, which had been amassed in the face of treachery by Laban, an economic oppressor and liar (Gen. 31:41). He saw no contradiction between his careful planning to preserve a portion of his capital and his humble prayers before God. He saw no contradiction in his advanced age and a night-long struggle with God in the flesh (not in the sense of full Incarnation, of course). He saw no contradiction between God’s unmerited favor toward him and his own personal responsibility to do all that he could to preserve what God had given to him. He saw no reason to be soft-headed on the one hand, and blindly self-confident on the other. Jacob-Israel was an eminently practical man of great wealth and skill in managing capital resources, a man willing to act in terms of a life of education in capital accumulation, even before he approached God in prayer. He assumed, quite correctly, that God honors the sensible instincts of law-governed and experience-disciplined stewards—instincts gained through years of self-discipline. At Peniel, Jacob became Israel, a prince, a man of power with men and God, one who prevailed over his shortsighted brother, his nearsighted father, his sin-blinded uncle, and God Himself.

He went from Peniel to his brother and the troops, and once again, he emerged with his life and capital intact. He was to walk with a limp (32:31), a sign of his non-autonomy before God, but he walked once again into victory. He played the servant's role in front of Esau his brother (33:14), and he did not tarry with him, probably because he was unwilling to risk another emotional shift by Esau, from friendship to rage. His wisdom and his knowledge of his opponent's psychological weaknesses allowed him to triumph one more time.

Conclusion

Jacob stands like a beacon of common sense and careful economic planning. His example is not one to be ashamed of; it is to be imitated. There is no shame in continual victory in the face of seemingly overwhelming opposition. The world needs more godly men who can successfully wrestle with God and circumstances, and still emerge victorious, although possibly limping.

It is Isaac, not Jacob, who tends to be favored by the modern pietistic commentators, the supposed victim of ungodly deception, rather than a shortsighted, nearsighted, present-oriented old man who refused to take seriously God's promise concerning the respective destinies of his two sons. Isaac was ready and willing to defy God and sell his blessing unlawfully for a plate of venison stew. The sympathy for Isaac and the criticism dumped on Jacob by modern commentators is indicative of the power of pietism—a systematic retreat from the hard decisions of daily life—to distort men's judgment of the Scriptures. Future-oriented Jacob, not present-oriented Isaac, should be our representative guide. When Isaac was old (though at least two decades away from death), he wanted a plate of stew as his final reward before joining his fathers in death (Gen. 27:4). When Jacob was old, he wrestled with God and asked for still another blessing, that he might pass through yet another danger to safety, and with at least half his family's capital intact. May godly old men live like Jacob rather than Isaac. May godly young men live like Jacob, too, in order to learn the successful way to grow old. Victory, as with any other skill, takes practice.

If we are to learn anything from the careers of Esau and Laban, it is this: defeat takes practice, too. Esau and Laban may have been successful men in their dealings with lesser men, but when they faced the likes of Jacob, they were conditioned to defeat. Jacob had courage, shrewdness, and a commitment to the future. Esau and Laban were not prepared to deal successfully with a godly man like Jacob. Neither is the unregenerate world today. Time and God are on the side of the Jacobs of the world. They shall become Israels.

31

THE LAW OF DIMINISHING RETURNS

And Esau took his wives, and his sons, and his daughters, and all the persons of his house, and his cattle, and all his beasts, and all his substance, which he had got in the land of Canaan; and went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob. For their riches were more than that they might dwell together; and the land wherein they were strangers could not bear them because of their cattle (Gen. 36:6–7).

The theocentric principle here is sanctions: point four of the biblical model.¹ It refers back to the curse of the land.²

This is the second great division of families recorded in the Book of Genesis. The first one was the division between Lot and Abraham. The same reason was given in both instances: “And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together” (Gen. 13:6).

We are not told why the land would no longer support the families and flocks of the two sons of Isaac. It may have been that the Canaanites were numerous, and that the families were able to occupy only a tiny fraction of the land of Canaan. Obviously, when the exodus from Egypt brought 600,000 men and their families (Ex. 12:37) back into the land, it was sufficiently productive to support them. Nevertheless, the Bible is clear: neither Abraham and Lot nor Esau and Jacob could raise their cattle on whatever land was available to them. The curse of the ground (Gen. 3:17–19) made itself felt. The families had more living wealth than the land could support.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Chapter 12.

A. Factors of Production

These men faced the law of diminishing returns, an economic doctrine made famous by the English economist David Ricardo in his important book, Principles of Political Economy and Taxation (1817). The basic idea had been discussed by economists of the late eighteenth century, when Sir James Steuart and the Baron de Turgot both published treatments of the topic in 1767. Steuart's formulation, later called the law of the "extensive margin," observed that as population increases, poorer and poorer lands are brought into cultivation in order to feed the newcomers, so that equal amounts of productive effort yield progressively smaller harvests. (Of course, this statement of the problem implicitly assumes that other factors remain equal, especially agricultural technology.) The second formulation, put forth by Turgot, is far more relevant, the so-called law of the "intensive margin." Schumpeter's summary of Turgot's position is a good one. As equal quantities of capital (or labor) are applied to a given piece of land, the quantities of the product that result from each application will at first increase, then decrease. If more applications of the same resource are added, given a fixed quantity of land and fixed technology, then output will eventually fall to zero. Schumpeter wrote: "This statement of what eventually came to be recognized as the genuine law of decreasing returns cannot be commended too highly."³ After 1900, American economists termed this observation by Turgot "the law of variable proportions." First there is an increase, then a decrease in output per unit of resource input.

It is easiest to understand in the case of agriculture. Assume that there is a single acre of land. One man works the land by himself. He has trouble lifting large rocks, and he cannot move boulders. Rolling logs is very difficult. Then he hires an assistant. Now certain jobs become manageable, and some, which were previously impossible, become possible. The total output produced by two men may be more than double the cost of each man's wages. So, the owner of the land hires another man, and another, and another. Eventually, the men begin to get in each other's way. Production sags. Costs increase. It no longer pays to hire more men. It may even pay to fire one or more of them. Marginal net returns—the profits from the addition of one resource factor to the "production mix"—eventually fall to zero, or even become negative. The costs of employing an additional laborer eventually exceed the benefits derived from that additional laborer.

3. Joseph A. Schumpeter, A History of Economic Analysis (New York: Oxford University Press, 1954), p. 260.

This is precisely the problem that Jacob and Esau faced. Within the confines of the available land, the two families could no longer remain productive. The land had “filled up.” This did not mean that cattle were standing side by side, or that the tents of Esau’s servants were right next door to those owned by Jacob’s servants. But the productivity of the land was falling noticeably. The output of cattle, whether in numbers, or weight, or however the two family leaders measured output, was falling because there were too many of them for the relatively fixed supply of land. Esau reached a major decision. He left in order to find a more profitable “mix” of cattle and land. He went searching for the “wide open spaces.”

This demonstrates the importance of the curse of the ground for the goal of geographical dominion. Because every single acre of ground has been cursed by God, productivity per acre has been restrained. Those wishing to multiply their flocks or crops are eventually forced to subdue more ground. They cannot remain on that original plot of ground and progressively expand the physical output of goods. If they want more wealth, they must seek out available land to bring under cultivation. Their desire for greater wealth impels them to bring more land under cultivation.

What must be understood from the beginning, however, is that the law of diminishing returns is not limited to agriculture. It is basic to all economic production. The limits of scarcity are everywhere. Schumpeter’s discussion of this point is extremely illuminating.

Both Steuart and Turgot spoke of agriculture only. Fifty years ago [i.e., about 1900] this would not have astonished anybody, since it was then established practice to restrict decreasing returns to agriculture. But we who take it for granted that neither increasing nor decreasing returns are restricted to any particular branch of economic activity but may prevail in any branch, provided certain general conditions are fulfilled, are in a position to realize how surprising that actually was. Explanation seems to lie in the fact that, to the unsophisticated mind, there is something particularly compelling in the limitations imposed upon human activity by an inexorably “given” physical environment. It takes prolonged effort to reduce the analytic importance of these limitations to their proper dimensions and divorce them from the soil and the industry that works the soil. Yet it should not have taken so long to see that there is really no logical difference between trying to expand output on a given farm and trying to expand output in a given factory, and that if farms cannot be indefinitely multiplied or enlarged, neither can factories. The additional explanation required is provided by the belief of practically all eighteenth-century authors—a belief that carries over to the “classics” of the nineteenth century—that while the factor land was given once for all, the other original factor, labor, would always increase to any amount required if allowed to do so. If we adopt this view, we shall at once sympathize with the reluctance of those authors to treat labor and land alike and to apply the laws of physical returns impartially to both.⁴

In other words, all resources are limited. Put another way, at zero price, there is greater demand for most goods than supply of those goods. This is what defines a scarce resource, meaning an economic good. No single good can provide us with all the output we could ever want. There is no magic formula, no genie in a bottle, that can provide us with an infinite supply of desirable goods and services. We cannot turn stones into bread—not at zero cost, anyway. The limited productivity of “land,” and the limited supply of land, force us to search out new supplies of land when our productivity presses against the limits of the land. But the same restraints apply to all resources. No asset is infinitely productive. If we want more steel, we must build more steel mills, unless we can develop a cost-effective technology that enables us to expand steel production in the same factory. The curse of the ground also implies a curse on man: technology is not infinitely expandable. Contrary to Schumpeter, there are decreasing returns to technology.⁵ Man is not originally creative, nor is he infinitely creative. He is a creature. In any case, even if we admit that men have enormous powers of technological creativity, there are still two further limits that can never be overcome: time and capital. It takes time to develop and install a new technology, and it takes capital resources. The day of judgment limits the first factor, and the curse on the creation limits the other. The rate of interest—a phenomenon of time-preference—also limits the application of technology. Men will not and cannot give up all present consumption.⁶ For this reason, there is an inescapable dis-

4. Ibid., p. 261.

5. Ibid., p. 263. Inventor and evolutionist Raymond Kurzweil believes that there is a law of accelerating returns. This has to do with the constant reduction of information costs, which has continued since at least 1890. Raymond Kurzweil, “The Law of Accelerating Returns” (2001). (<http://bit.ly/LawAccel>) This theory presumes that energy costs will continue to decline.

6. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University count rate applied to future income as against present income. Economists call this discount rate the rate of interest, or “originary interest,” or simply time-preference. Even if there were no limits on man’s intellectual capacity to devise new technologies, an assumption which cannot be made given the Bible’s doctrine of man, technological innovations require both time and capital, and there are limits on both.

Whatever man turns his hand to will eventually produce negative returns (losses) if the producer insists on adding ever-greater quantities of complementary resources to a fixed supply of any particular resource. He will have to search out new ways of combining these resources, or find quantities of the overextended factor of production that can be purchased or rented at prices that enable him to increase the value of his production’s final output. His desire for increased wealth impels him to devote energy, capital, and time to subduing his portion of the earth.

In the case of land, the law of diminishing returns tells us that there are limits on the soil’s ability to sustain life. If a land user refuses to acknowledge the existence of such limits, then his attempts to expand output by adding more and more complementary factors of production—more seed, more laborers, more water, etc.—will eventually deplete the soil. This is one technological reason why Israel was required to rest the soil one year in seven (Lev. 25:2–7).⁷ The land is entitled to its rest. Before the soil is completely exhausted, however, the law of diminishing returns will make itself felt. Output per unit of resource input will decline. The farmer will have to add fertilizers, use new technological devices, implement a system of soil-replenishing crop rotation, or allow the land to lie fallow if he is to save the value of his land. The law of diminishing returns therefore provides men with an economic incentive to care for the land and make it fruitful by acknowledging and honoring its limits.

B. The Tragedy of the Commons

Land that is not privately owned by the person using it is far more

Press, 1949), ch. XVIII. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>). See also the essays by the American economist Frank A. Fetter: Capital, Interest, and Rent: Essays in the Theory of Distribution, ed. Murray N. Rothbard (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed, Andrews and McMeel, 1977). (<http://bit.ly/fafcair>)

7. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24.

exposed to reckless soil depletion and ecological devastation. This is the so-called “tragedy of the commons,” in which the political authority owns the land and leases it out (or even temporarily gives it away free of charge) to private or public uses. The man who benefits immediately from its use—running animals on it, stripping it of its trees, camping on it, digging minerals out of it—has little direct incentive to conserve its productivity. If he had exclusive use of it for many years, he might, but that is almost the same as reintroducing private ownership. His personal benefits are directly and immediately realized; the costs associated with the depletion of the resource are borne by all tax-paying citizens—an infinitesimal additional cost to the actual user. Because it is not his land, he need not conserve its long-run productivity. A kind of “positive feedback” occurs. It generally pays to add one more cow or cut down one more tree, unless the variable costs—supervising the cow, sharpening the saw, spending the time—have risen so high that even the “free” land is not a sufficient subsidy to continue production. The “positive feedback” process can continue until the ecological crisis hits, and the productivity of the “free” resource plummets.⁸ The “negative feedback” of the law of diminishing returns is temporarily blunted, because the retarding factors—increased costs of maintaining the long-term productivity of the resource—are not forcefully registered in the mind of the user. Others also bear these costs, and his personal benefits far outweigh his share of them. Eventually, the law visibly reasserts itself, since it is simply a discovered regularity based on a real fact, namely, the curse of the ground. But the crisis may give few warnings, at least few that the user will recognize or respect. It comes all at once, not in smaller portions that an owner of private property would be more likely to recognize and take steps to alleviate or reverse. Without private ownership of the means of production, the law of diminishing returns does not produce those warnings concerning the impending advent of radically reduced output from an over-used resource.⁹ Or, more accurately, the warnings are not heeded so rapidly. (Economists call this the problem of “externalities.”)

It is extremely difficult and costly for bureaucracies to evaluate the full effects of the use of any publicly owned resource. The costs of upkeep in relation to the benefits of use are evaluated by different people.

8. Garrett Hardin, “The Tragedy of the Commons,” Science (Dec. 13, 1968). (<http://bit.ly/HardCom>)

9. C. R. Batten, “The Tragedy of the Commons,” The Freeman (Oct. 1970). (<http://bit.ly/BatCom>)

The reality of the subjective theory of value asserts itself. The bureaucrats in charge of managing or leasing the public property must estimate the value produced by the users of the resource, and this is inevitably impossible to estimate without prices. But even prices do not tell the administrators everything they wish to know. Is the subsidy to the public of “free” land, for example, really the best way to benefit the public? How can any bureaucrat determine the answer? Are the costs too high? Again, how can he put a price tag on the costs if the asset is publicly owned and therefore not subject to the subjective evaluation of costs by its legal owners, the voters? Who is to say whether the bureaucrats’ assessment of the “true” costs and benefits to the “public” are the same as the “public” would assess them? And how is the “public”—a collection of individuals—to register its collective judgment? Who pays the piper, whose ox will be gored, and who eats the cake? So, the management of publicly owned resources tends to swing between policies of overuse and no use, between the profligate squandering of resources through “free” leases that lead to erosion, and the mandated inactivity that leads valuable assets to sit inactive. First the bureaucrats allow erosion, then they require total conservation, which means that productive assets are rendered unproductive, or productive only for those few people who enjoy using the resource in a legally acceptable way (such as hikers who enjoy the wilderness and who do not enjoy the sound of chain saws or other tools of production).

The Puritans of New England learned these lessons early. After 1675, with half a century of mismanaged common lands behind them, they steadily sold off the communally owned property to private owners. The bickering about who was to pay for the cattle herders, how many trees were to be cut down yearly, whose fences were in disrepair, and the costs of policing the whole unmanageable scheme, finally ended. So ended the “tragedy of the commons.”¹⁰

C. Dominion and Diminishing Returns

When structured through the private ownership of scarce resources, the law of diminishing returns becomes an incentive for the fulfillment of the dominion covenant. Men reach the limits of productivity of a particular production process. They are forced to find better methods of production, or to find additional quantities of some overextended factor of production. They must either intensify production through better technology and more capital, or search for more of the resource that has reached its limits of productivity under the prevailing production "formula" or "recipe." The overextended resource may be land, a building, the labor supply, managerial talent, forecasting skill, or any other scarce economic resource. When its limits are reached, men have an economic incentive to find new ways of accomplishing their goals. They may have to re-think their goals because the costs have risen, or else they must find ways to reduce the costs of achieving their goals. Or they may have to settle for a combination: modified goals and reduced costs of production. But they must change. Along with many other factors, the law of diminishing returns makes change inevitable. The kind of culture that change produces in a profit-seeking society in which the private property system prevails is dominion-oriented. The earth is subdued, if not because men aim at subduing it for God's glory, then at least for individual profits. The general dominion covenant is furthered.

10. Gary North, “The Puritan Experiment in Common Ownership,” The Freeman (April 1974). (<http://bit.ly/gnpeico>)

By fostering conservation, the quest for long-term returns from the ownership of any productive resource also tends to preserve the productivity of the earth. The dominion covenant is not to serve man as an excuse to destroy the earth. Because men failed to give the land of Israel its rest, they went into captivity for 70 years (II Chron. 36:21). They were warned not to misuse the soil. Because the price we pay for a productive asset is the function of our expected future returns from that resource (a stream of income over time), discounted by the rate of interest, we have an incentive to maintain that resource's productivity. We are pressured to count the costs of ownership and use. The law of diminishing returns is inescapable. We must recognize the limits of scarcity. Having recognized these limits, we are to find ways to mitigate scarcity's burden in lawful ways by expanding output, improving our techniques of production, and buying more capital resources. We must count the costs and evaluate the benefits. We become winners or losers as individual decision-makers. If output falls when we add more inputs, we are pressured to discover why. We are told by the profit-and-loss accounting statements that we are now overusing a particular resource, and that we must stop doing so if we are to keep from wasting resources. The search begins for more of the overextended resource or for techniques of production that compensate for the falling productivity of the present production mix. The dominion covenant is extended.

Conclusion

In Esau's case, he decided to leave. His decision led to the establishment of Edom. It also allowed Jacob to increase his family's holdings, at least until the time of the great famine when they journeyed to Egypt. The Canaanites who dominated the land in the era of the famine were to enjoy their independence for only 255 years after that famine.¹¹ Both Jacob and Esau were to increase their dominion of the earth as a result of the law of diminishing returns. It forced them to seek new lands to conquer.

11. The Israelites were in Egypt for 215 years. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Part 1. Representation and Dominion (1985), ch. 1. Then they were in the wilderness for 40 years.

THE BLESSING OF RESPONSIBILITY

And the LORD was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man; and he was in the house of his master the Egyptian. And his master saw that the LORD was with him, and that the LORD made all that he did to prosper in his hand. And Joseph found grace in his sight, and he served him: and he made him overseer over his house, and all that he had he put into his hand (Gen. 39:2–4).

The theocentric issue here is hierarchy: point two of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. Selecting Subordinates

Like Jacob his father, who had served Laban for many years, Joseph was proving to be an efficient, highly profitable servant. Potiphar, like Laban, recognized that God had some special relationship with his servant, and he was determined to benefit from this fact. Both Laban and Potiphar sought to appropriate the fruits of their servants' productivity by delegating increased responsibility into their hands (Gen. 30:27–28). Furthermore, during the period when each master dealt justly with his servant, he saw his own economic affairs prosper.

We are not told what duties Potiphar had as captain of the guard. We are told that as far as his own household was concerned, he delegated all authority to Joseph, “and he knew not ought he had, save the bread which he did eat” (39:6). In one respect, Potiphar proved that he was a successful businessman, for one of the most important aspects of the entrepreneur's tasks is to locate and employ able subordinates. Frank H. Knight, whose pioneering work, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

(1921), presented the first systematic, accurate analysis of profit, put it even more emphatically:

... this capacity for forming correct judgments (in a more or less extended or restricted field) is the principal fact which makes a man serviceable in business; it is the characteristic human activity, the most important endowment for which wages are received. The stability and success of business enterprise in general is largely dependent upon the possibility of estimating the powers of men in this regard, both for assigning men to their positions and for fixing remunerations which they are to receive for filling positions.²

The essence of control over a business, he argued, is mainly the selection of the men who will do the controlling. “Business judgment is chiefly judgment of men.”³ Therefore, he concluded,

In the field of organization, the knowledge on which what we call responsible control depends is not knowledge of situations and problems and of means for effecting changes, but is knowledge of other men’s knowledge of these things. . . . so fundamental is it for understanding the control of organized activity, that the problem of judging men’s powers of judgment overshadows the problem of judging the facts of the situation to be dealt with.⁴

This analysis may be exaggerated, but it certainly holds true for very large-scale organizations. In the case of Potiphar and Laban, they initially exercised very good judgment concerning the judgment of their God-blessed subordinates.

Potiphar’s error was in relinquishing control of his family. In abdicating the management position in the family business, he went too far. He did not notice, or chose to ignore, his wife’s roving eye. In the time of crisis, when it was his wife’s word against Joseph’s, he chose to believe his wife rather than the man who had proven faithful and competent in the management of the family business. He thereby forfeited the benefits that Joseph’s abilities had brought him, just as Laban had forfeited the benefits of Jacob’s productivity.

2. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921), p. 229. (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>)

3. Ibid., p. 291.

4. Idem.

B. Demotion and Promotion

Joseph was cast into prison. Through no fault of his own, he had lost his position of authority. Potiphar's envy had brought him low, just as Joseph's brothers' envy had led to his exile in Egypt. But the keeper of the prison immediately recognized Joseph's unique talents, and like Potiphar, he was willing to entrust the administration of his organization to Joseph, and "whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it. The keeper of the prison looked not to any thing that was under his hand; because the LORD was with him, and that which he did, the LORD made it to prosper" (39:22b–23). Officially, he had been a slave; in reality, he had been master of Potiphar's household. Legally, he was now a prisoner; in reality, he was the director of the prison.

Slavery and prison: neither position is relished by any servant of God. But once forced into such a position, the godly man does his best with whatever resources are available to him. He accepts whatever lawful authority is offered to him, going about his daily affairs honestly and efficiently. He subdues that portion of the earth which God has allotted to him. If he can obtain his freedom lawfully, he does so, for freedom is a better condition in which to exercise one's calling before God (I Cor. 7:21–23).⁵ Nevertheless, a man is to be content with the status quo if that is where God has placed him (I Cor. 7:20; I Tim. 6:6–8).⁶

By serving well in the position that had been given to him, Joseph discovered that responsibility flowed his way. As with scarce economic resources that flow in the direction of those who serve the buying public most efficiently, so responsibility tends to flow in the direction of those willing and able to bear the burdens of responsible decision-making. In a present-oriented culture, this is doubly true, for men seek to escape the burdens of future-oriented decision-making. They want to be the recipients of the fruits of efficient labor, but they are not interested in personally bearing the direct costs of bearing risk (in the sense of a statistically calculable risk) or uncertainty (in the sense of an unknown future that cannot be dealt with by means of the laws of probability). The more present-oriented and risk-avoiding a culture is, the more responsibility and profit opportunities it will lose to those willing to risk failure.

5. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

6. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10.

Neither Joseph nor Jacob was favored because he shared the religious presuppositions of his employer. The opposite was true: they were selected to serve precisely because a very different God from those the employers worshipped was favoring the two servants. The servants were not beloved, but only respected. Later, they were resented. Initially, however, the masters were not overly concerned about the religious beliefs of their servants, but only with their productivity. A very similar feature of the free market is this lack of concern about the personal characteristics of producers. The buyer is normally unconcerned about the race or religion of the manufacturer of the product. On a personal basis, the buyer might be alienated by the producer. He might even despise him. Yet, as a customer, he is primarily concerned with the price and quality of the product. The more impersonal the market—the broader, more extensive, more mechanized the market—the more likely that productivity will count for more than the personal characteristics of the producer. The covenant of dominion is assigned to all people; hence, the person who comes closest to fulfilling the buyers' concept of efficient production under competitive market conditions (price competition, open entry, absence of state-imposed restrictions on selling), will receive the value of his output. He will have the greatest opportunity to demonstrate his talents for production.

The problem faced by Joseph and Jacob was the fact that their employers regarded them as magical talismans of some sort. They saw that God blessed the two men, but they themselves did not choose to humble themselves before God. They thought that they might manipulate God by hiring those favored by Him. In the case of both Potiphar and Laban, their own character defects destroyed their ability to appropriate the productivity of their servants. Laban was greedy (Gen. 31:7), and Potiphar was envious of Joseph, or at least embarrassed by his wife's actions, and too weak to take Joseph's side in the dispute. Because they were so close to their servants, they were in effect surrendering themselves to the authority of their subordinates, for their prosperity depended upon the continuing relationship between the God of their servants and their own households. Eventually, this became too great a price to pay. They drove out their honorable servants, even as generations of gentiles drove out productive Jews, or as French Roman Catholic kings drove out the Huguenots in the sixteenth century.

C. Pragmatism's Weakness

This is the weakness of pragmatic thought. Pragmatism is related to magic. Pragmatists and magicians share similar presuppositions. Both deny the sovereignty of God. Both elevate the desires of man to principles of social organization. Both say in effect, "If it works, I'll buy it; if it pays, I'll manipulate it." Is it surprising that the modern secular world, officially pragmatic and relativistic, should witness an outbreak of magic, witchcraft, and occultism?⁷ The same relationship was basic to the Renaissance and the Roman Empire. Is it surprising that the pragmatists, relativists, and occultists resent the religion of the Bible? The burdens associated with a godly calling are heavy for the pragmatist. Thrift, future-oriented investing, honest dealing, and risk-bearing are increasingly abandoned by hedonistic pragmatists. Pragmatism requires moral constraints that are the product of a non-pragmatic culture. Without these restraints, pragmatism degenerates into the lowest common denominator principle: theft, envy, and the abdication of personal responsibility—very often an abdication to the political authorities. Pragmatists like Potiphar will not pay the price. They will not humble themselves before the God they seek to manipulate. In the long run, they lose. They are not productive, and capital tends to flow in the direction of those who are. As the Proverbs say, "The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (13:22b).⁸

Responsibility is therefore a potential blessing. In the short run, good servants may be able to appropriate more of it indirectly from those willing to abdicate a position of full leadership. In time, their "masters" grow weaker economically and politically, as they delegate too much authority to their subordinates and become too dependent upon their subordinates' continuing productivity. If the masters refuse to submit themselves to God's law-order, the godly servants will eventually triumph, even as Joseph triumphed. Responsibility, like capital, eventually winds up in the hands of those who exercise it well. The burden of responsibility is ultimately a blessing, for it is the basis of external victory in time and on earth.

7. Gary North, Unholy Spirits: Occultism and New Age Humanism (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/northus>)

8. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 40.

D. Suffering Servant

Joseph and Jacob were suffering servants. They served their masters well, yet their masters failed to appreciate their moral character. The same role was played by Jesus Christ, who was also a suffering servant. Through His own perfection, He alienated the rulers of His day. He paid the highest price in order to serve His friends, for he laid down His life for them (John 15:13). Yet in doing so, He triumphed over all His enemies (Matt. 28:18). This relationship between service and victory is basic to biblical order. Christ said:

Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant: Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many (Matt. 20:25–28).

Nowhere can this principle be seen more clearly than in the free market. The producer who best meets the desires of customers will prosper. He must subject himself to the highest-bidding participants in the market. This need not mean the richest people in society. In fact, the highest bidders may be a mass market: millions of people bidding a few dollars each, rather than a handful bidding several thousands each. The producer seeks the highest rate of return on his capital and labor. He cannot compel buyers to pay his price, except in very rare instances. He has to clear his inventory of products at the price that the buyers are willing to pay. Of course, he seeks the highest available price where no additional bidders are willing to pay his price, and no products remain in stock to be sold. We can imagine the market's clearing process as a theater. When all the seats are filled, and no one is standing in line to get in, the seller of seats has forecasted his market perfectly. He has set his price in terms of market demand. He has served his customers well, as his filled seats demonstrate, but he has also served himself well. He has earned the highest return per seat. The richest, most successful, most famous entrepreneurs in the market are those who have consistently and accurately forecasted future market demand. The chief rulers of the free market are those who serve the buyers well.

The free market does not call us to be suffering servants. It calls us to meet the demands of the potential buyers better than our competing sellers. It calls us to be prospering servants. The better we serve, the higher our income. If we would be chief among businessmen, we must serve the buyers best. The entrepreneur who bears full responsibility for his forecasts, and who also forecasts accurately, will experience the financial blessings of responsibility.

Conclusion

The Bible repeats the theme of prison as a training ground for victory: Joseph in prison, Daniel in the lion's den, Paul in several prisons, and the archetypal image of Jesus in the prison of the grave. The "suffering servant" motif is similar: suffering brings victory. In the case of the church in history, suffering of earlier generations brings victory for later generations. Thus, the means to victory, suffering, is not our goal: victory is our goal. The emphasis on continued suffering is theologically invalid; sin is to be progressively conquered in history, and suffering thereby progressively reduced.

The free market reflects this overcoming of suffering, sin, and scarcity. Men are to be servants, but successful men are not to suffer throughout their lifetimes; they are instead to prosper. Customers are not to suffer either; they are to benefit from the productivity that freedom and personal responsibility produce.

THE ENTREPRENEURIAL FUNCTION

And Joseph said unto Pharaoh, The dream of Pharaoh is one: God hath shewed Pharaoh what he is about to do. . . . This is the thing which I have spoken unto Pharaoh: What God is about to do he sheweth unto Pharaoh (Gen. 41: 25, 28).

Joseph had demonstrated his administrative competence to Potiphar, captain of the guard, and to the Egyptian jailer. He had also shown his ability to interpret prophetic dreams to the Pharaoh's butler. The butler recommended Joseph to Pharaoh when Pharaoh confronted a dream which he could not understand. They brought him from the dungeon, and Pharaoh described his visions of the seven fat animals being devoured by the seven lean ones, and the seven fat ears of corn being devoured by the seven lean ones. Joseph informed Pharaoh that the dream revealed the coming of seven years of agricultural prosperity to be followed by seven years of famine. As for the two separate visions, "The dream was doubled unto Pharaoh twice; it is because the thing is established by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass" (41:32). Joseph entertained no doubts whatsoever. God had provided a double witness.

Pharaoh wisely listened to Joseph's interpretation. When Joseph then recommended that Pharaoh seek out a man "discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt" to direct the collection of one-fifth of the grain during the seven years of plenty, Pharaoh appointed Joseph (41:33–43). Not only did Joseph's prophecy come true, but he also once again proved himself to be a reliable and efficient administrator of men. Because of his unique combination of economic foresight (in this case, prophetic in nature) and efficient administration, Joseph stands out as the Bible's archetype of the entrepreneur.

A. The Future Is Uncertain

It is the task of the entrepreneur to forecast the future accurately, at least insofar as it affects his business, and then to plan effectively to meet the economic demands of customers in that expected future. Of all the economic functions of the free market, this is the pivotal one. The ability of men to estimate the demands of their fellow men in the future, and then to produce in terms of those demands without wasting scarce economic resources, makes it possible for society to advance beyond the most primitive methods of production.

The individual who does plan efficiently for the future, producing goods or services that satisfy the demand of customers at the prices he expected them to pay, reaps a reward: entrepreneurial profit or pure profit. It is an economic residual: funds remaining after payment has been made for raw materials, labor, capital equipment, interest, rent, and taxes.¹ The person who misforecasts the future, or who is unable to foresee the costs of delivering his goods and services to the waiting customers, eventually produces losses. He is forced to dip into his capital in order to stay in business. If the losses continue, he loses control of capital resources, and others who are able to meet future customer demand with less waste are able to buy these resources from him.

In the competitive auction market for scarce economic resources, profit-making individuals bid more effectively for resources, transferring them to their own companies in order to meet the demands of customers. The customer benefits, for he is able to purchase more resources at the end of the production process, precisely because there has been less waste of land, labor, and capital in delivering the goods to him. The customers therefore determine the success or failure of entrepreneurs. Those who waste resources by failing to meet customer demand at prices customers are willing to pay are penalized, while those who are successful are rewarded with entrepreneurial profit. A free market encourages customer satisfaction and efficiency of production.

Profit is therefore a residual accruing to those who deal on a day-to-day basis with the inescapable uncertainties of the future. Men are not omniscient. We cannot see the future perfectly. We are limited creatures. Even Jesus in His Incarnation as a perfect man admitted that He did not know—in terms of His human nature—when God’s judgment would arrive (Matt. 24:36). Creatures should respect their own limitations.

1. On profit as an economic residual which results from accurate forecasting, see Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty, and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921) (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>); Ludwig von Mises, Human Action (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. XV, sec. 8. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>); Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy and State, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

By encouraging specialists in economic forecasting to administer scarce economic resources, customers seek to mitigate the uncertainties of life. By permitting entrepreneurs the right to keep the economic residual, or profit, of their activities in meeting customer demand, customers ensure that their desires will be met with greater efficiency. The burden of bearing uncertainty is picked up by those willing to do it, and their incentive is the lure of profit. If they make mistakes, they produce losses.

1. Customer Authority

The customer is the beneficiary of the entrepreneurial function, Frank H. Knight concluded. Because others are willing to become entrepreneurs, or as they are also called, speculators, the customer can shift much of the responsibility for predicting the future to these specialists. In fact, the entrepreneurs make it their business to know what the customers will want in the future even before the customers know. We know, for example, that the customer seldom contracts in advance for the delivery of goods or services. Why not? (Note: Knight wrote of the consumers, not the customer.)

A part of the reason might be the consumer’s uncertainty as to his ability to pay at the end of the period, but this does not seem to be important in fact. The main reason is that he does not know what he will want, and how much, and how badly; consequently he leaves it to producers to create goods and hold them ready for his decision when the time comes. The clue to this apparent paradox is, of course, in the “law of large numbers,” the consolidation of risks (or uncertainties). The consumer is, himself, only one; to the producer he is a mere multitude in which individuality is lost. It turns out that an outsider can foresee the wants of a multitude with more ease and accuracy than an individual can attain with respect to his own. This phenomenon gives us the most fundamental feature of the economic system, production for a market, and hence also the general character of the environment in relation to which the effects of uncertainty are to be further investigated.²

2. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit, p. 421.

Does this mean that bureaucrats operating at the very top levels of government planning agencies are better able to foresee the needs of customers than the customers are? Not necessarily. What we are comparing is not “customers” vs. “government forecasters” in the realm of forecasting future customer demand, but rather “customers served by profit-seeking, competitive entrepreneurs” vs. “customers served by Civil Service-protected, guaranteed tenure, monopolistic government planners.” The fact that government planners have access to reams of data concerning past decisions of customers and producers means very little. The crucial ability is to make correct assessments about the uncertainties of the future, meaning those aspects of the economic future that are not subject to computerization or even statistical probabilities. It is the presence of incessant change in human affairs that calls forth the skilled and not-so-skilled entrepreneurs in the quest for profits. The market provides a system of economic competition that sorts out the successful from the unsuccessful entrepreneurs. There is no comparable system operating in government, for government has a monopoly of support (taxation) and very often a monopoly of supply operations, such as the delivery of first-class mail, which insulates it from the competitive framework of the open market.³ Knight’s warning is significant: “The real trouble with bureaucracies is not that they are rash, but the opposite. When not actually rotten with dishonesty and corruption they universally show a tendency to ‘play safe’ and become hopelessly conservative. The great danger to be feared from a political control of economic life under ordinary conditions is not a reckless dissipation of the social resources so much as the arrest of progress and the vegetation of life.”⁴ Bureaucracy favors present-oriented risk- (uncertainty-) averters.⁵

What service is it that the entrepreneur performs in order to receive his residual? He perceives a special opportunity in the future. He

3. Ludwig von Mises, Bureaucracy (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1944) (<http://bit.ly/MisesBur>). On the inability of governments to make accurate economic assessments of costs and benefits, see Mises’ essay, “Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth,” (1920), in F. A. Hayek, (ed.), Collectivist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1935] 1963), ch. III (<http://mises.org/pdf/econcalc.pdf>). He expanded his analysis of this topic in his book, Socialism: An Economic and Sociological Analysis (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1922] 1962), Book II, chaps. 1, 2 (<http://bit.ly/MisesSoc>).

4. Knight, op. cit., p. 361.

5. Gary North, “Statist Bureaucracy in the Modern Economy,” The Freeman (January 1970), reprinted in North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 20. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>) believes that customers will be willing and able in the future to pay more for a particular good or service than today's entrepreneurs think they will be willing and able to pay. Because of this lack of perception on the part of his competitors, the entrepreneur finds that the scarce economic resources that are used in the production of the good or service are underpriced in relation to what they would be if all entrepreneurs recognized the true state of future customer demand. The entrepreneurs are middlemen for customers, actual surrogates for them. They enter the markets for production goods and compete among each other in order to buy them, but always because they intend to sell the results of production to customers. If an entrepreneur sees that certain factors of production are presently underpriced in relation to what customers in the future really will be willing and able to pay for them in the form of final goods, then he has a profit opportunity. (Of course, he has to pay a rate of interest, because future goods are always discounted in comparison to what people will pay for present goods, and he has to tie up the use of the scarce resources until the time he can get the finished products to market.) The entrepreneur enters the market and begins to buy up production goods—land, labor, capital—in order to manufacture the customers' goods. Or he may simply rent these factors of production. In any case, he removes them from the marketplace for a specific period of time. When he brings the final products to market as finished goods, he raises their price to the level determined by the competitive auction bids of customers. In short, he makes his profit by estimating in advance what future customers, in bidding against each other, will be willing to pay in a free market for the output of his production process.

2. Entrepreneur vs. Entrepreneur competing customers. He is unable to set any price he wants to set, though of course he prefers to receive a high price. He sets his price in response to customers bids, so as to "clear the market." He wants to sell every item scheduled for sale in the particular time period. He cannot squeeze any more money out of the customers than they are willing and able to pay. Other sellers can also enter the market and offer goods or services for a lower price, and he has to consider this possibility, too. In short, sellers compete against sellers, while customers compete against customers.

The entrepreneur does not compete against customers, except in so far as there are zones of ignorance in the minds of both customers and other potential sellers, concerning the market price of the goods or services. In a highly competitive market, these zones of ignorance are drastically reduced. People know pretty well what items sell for in the marketplace. The entrepreneur is always competing against other entrepreneurs—the middlemen who act for the benefit of customers—who also produce in order to meet future customer demand. When the finished consumer goods or services are offered for sale, the “auctioneer”—the seller of goods—is guided by the competitive bids of

If the entrepreneur was correct in his original estimation of the extent of customer demand, and if no unforeseen contingencies have disrupted the expected cost of producing the final goods, and if no new sources of supply are brought to market that he had not been able to predict, then the entrepreneur gets his expected price per unit sold. He has "bought low" and has been able to "sell high." He sells to the highest bidders. He reaps his reward, entrepreneurial profit. It is the residual which remains after he has paid for all production inputs, including interest and his own management wage (the equivalent income that he had to forego because he could not sell his services to other entrepreneurs during the time he was working in his own company). If all has gone according to his original plan, then he has profited. But one fact must be understood: he has not profited at the expense of customers. Customers have not "lost" because of his presence in the market as a seller. He has profited at the expense of rival entrepreneurs who failed to see the opportunity for profit, and who failed to enter the resource markets for scarce factors of production. They stayed out, thereby allowing him to buy up those production factors less expensively. But the customers have unquestionably benefited. He has served the highest-bidding customers well. What if he had never bothered to buy up those producer goods, pay the interest, and bear the risks of production? What if he had never brought the goods or services to market? How would that have helped those customers who wanted the goods so much that they were willing to pay him top prices? He made more of these goods available to them than they would have otherwise been offered. He has been their benefactor—at a profit.

Professor Mises summarized the nature of profits in a straightforward manner:

If all entrepreneurs were to anticipate correctly the future state of the market, there would be neither profits nor losses. The prices of all factors of production would already today be fully adjusted to tomorrow's prices of the products. In buying the factors of production the entrepreneur would have to expend (with due allowance for the difference between the prices of present goods and future goods) no less an amount than the buyers will pay him later for the product. An entrepreneur can make a profit only if he anticipates future conditions more correctly than other entrepreneurs.⁶

While there is always considerable intellectual risk in discussing what anything would be like if man were not man—specifically, what profits would be if men were omniscient—nevertheless, the reader should grasp what Mises is saying. Profits and losses are part of the human condition, precisely because man is not God. The quest for a risk-free, uncertainty-free, profit-and-loss-free world is demonic. It is the demand that we remake man into God, that man become omniscient, that man transcend the limits of his creaturehood.

B. The Middleman

Every so often, some local businessman buys advertising time on television, usually on a non-network station, and tries to unload his merchandise by using a variation of this time-tested sales pitch: “Friends, we can offer these incredibly low prices because we sell directly to you, the consumer. That’s right, you buy directly from our factory warehouses at wholesale prices. You buy at factory prices because we’ve eliminated the middleman.” Isn’t that terrific? No middleman. All these years, profit-seeking businessmen have been paying middlemen to stand around in the middle doing nothing. For centuries, it seems, profit-seeking businessmen have been willing to buy nothing—the non-services of useless middlemen—for something. But now some enterprising businessman has found a way to eliminate the middleman, and he is willing to pass the savings on to us. As the old saying goes, “What a deal!”

Think about the logic of the offer. Where are we told about this fabulous opportunity? On television. Who is buying the time slot? The businessman. Who is stocking all of the inventory? The businessman. Who is paying the interest rate, space rental, night watchman, and utilities expenses to warehouse the merchandise? The businessman. Who is bearing the uncertainty of getting stuck with a warehouse full of unsalable merchandise? The businessman. Who pays the fire and theft insurance premiums? The businessman. Who, then, is the middleman?

6. Mises, Human Action, p. 291.

There will always be a middleman because there will always be uncertainty. The middleman is the entrepreneur. He exists because there is an entrepreneurial function. The producer may decide to become the middleman. The state, through some bureaucratic agency, may decide to become the middleman. Or an independent “jobber” may decide the payoff potential is worth the risk. But what is not conceivable in a world of uncertainty is a production system without a middleman, where buyers never have to pay for the services of economic forecasters. The producer may “sell direct to the consumer,” but as long as the consumer has the right to say no and shop elsewhere, the producer is not really selling direct to the consumer. He is a buyer of goods or services who hopes to become a seller. The only consumer he can really sell direct to is himself in his capacity as entrepreneurial middleman.

It is imperative that we understand the difference between profit seeking and gambling, though both aim at predicting the future. Murray Rothbard’s analysis is illuminating in this regard.

It is not accurate to apply terms like “gambling” or “betting” to situations either of risk or of uncertainty. These terms have unfavorable emotional implications, and for this reason: they refer to situations where new risks or uncertainties are created for the enjoyment of the uncertainties themselves. Gambling on the throw of the dice and betting on horse races are examples of the deliberate creation by the bettor or gambler of new uncertainties which otherwise would not have existed. The entrepreneur, on the other hand, is not creating uncertainties for the fun of it. On the contrary, he tries to reduce them as much as possible. The uncertainties he confronts are already inherent in the market situation, indeed in the nature of human action; someone must deal with them, and he is the most skilled or willing candidate.⁷

Market speculation may be indulged in by the very same men who, in their off hours, enjoy betting on horses or dice, but the economic effects are vastly different. The market speculator tries to reduce uncertainty for the sake of future customers (which, of course, may well include himself), while the gambler is a present consumer of the joy or masochism of a game. Assume, for the sake of illustration, that the same individual is a part-time entrepreneur and a part-time gambler. He is a public benefactor if he guesses correctly in his capacity as a market forecaster. He is simply a winner at a game—matched by losers in the same game—when he forecasts correctly as a gambler. He has put his capital at risk to serve future customers as a market speculator. He has put his capital at risk to serve himself as a believer in a chance-dominated universe when he enters a game of chance. As a market forecaster, he acknowledges his limits as a creature, and deals with the world of the future in which men can see only darkly. He cannot escape living in such a world without actually dying. He serves others by entering into market-forecasting activities. But, as a gambler, a man risks losing his God-given capital assets in a game of chance, probably in a game in which the laws of probability for winning are against him (and if they are for him, they are against his opponents in the game). He affirms a universe of luck, of chance, of “fortunate” benefits for those who take needless risks with their capital. In short, the market speculator affirms the universe God has created, while the gambler affirms a very different world. The speculator tries to conserve capital for his own profit and for the benefit of future customers. The gambler wastes capital in terms of a philosophy of impersonal chance or personal luck, neither of which is a valid assumption concerning a created universe which is governed by an omniscient, omnipotent, sovereign, personal God.

7. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy and State, p. 555.

It is no doubt true that it is impossible for anyone, including the entrepreneur, to sort out precisely what part of his income is a wage for management services, what part is an interest return for the money he puts into the business, and what part is pure profit. But what we must understand is that these are theoretically distinct aspects of the production process. If we try to pay an entrepreneur a fixed wage for managerial services, he will quit, or cease bearing the uncertainties of predicting the future, or cease making consistently accurate predictions. If we pay him a predictable interest return on his money, and no more, then we have made him an investor, not an entrepreneur. There is an entrepreneurial function which cannot be remunerated in advance, precisely because entrepreneurial profit is a residual which at best is estimated effectively only by futurepredicting entrepreneurs.

C. Joseph, the Forecaster

It might be argued that Joseph's experience in Egypt serves as a biblical justification of central planning by the civil government. Such an argument, while no doubt tempting, overlooks the key fact in this incident: Pharaoh had been given a direct revelation by God, and Joseph came to him as God's prophet with the ability to interpret Pharaoh's dream perfectly. Only on this assumption, namely, that we can expect truly prophetic omniscience from salaried or elected officials of the central government, can a biblical case be made for universal central economic planning. If this assumption is rejected, then central economic planning initially has no greater claim to biblical sanction than private economic forecasting does.

Is the assumption correct? Is there some feature about becoming a State official which in some way endows a person with a prophetic mantle? What biblical evidence do we have for such an assumption? Is any foreign prisoner who has served two years of an indeterminate jail sentence a predictably effective interpreter of visions given to national leaders? Would anyone wish to build a theory of political economy on such a premise? Could we create a governmental planning structure in terms of such an operating presupposition about the nature of civil government?

The consequence of Joseph's economic planning in Egypt must also be borne in mind. The entire nation, excluding only the priests, went into bondage to the Egyptian state (Gen. 47:13–22). All land, except that owned by the priests, became the possession of the Pharaoh. The people survived the famine, which they would not have been able to do had it not been for Joseph's entrepreneurship, but they and their heirs became servants of the Pharaoh and his heirs.

It was basic to the religions of antiquity that the state was in some fundamental way divine, or linked to the divine through the ruler. Egypt's theology was especially notable for its adherence to the theology of a divine ruler. The Pharaoh was supposedly the descendent of the sun god. Only the Hebrews, with their doctrine of the Creator-creature distinction, avoided the lure of a theology of immanent divinity. The outcome of such a theology, when coupled with a process of state economic planning, was enslavement. This was the curse of what Wittfogel called oriental despotism.⁸

The Hebrews, in stark contrast, were told to worship God, and only God, as divine. The state is clearly not divine, and any attempt to make it divine—the sole representative of God on earth—was understood to be demonic. Officials were constantly told to remain honest stewards of the great King. The office of prophet was decentralized, and prophets continually challenged kings, princes, priests, and average Hebrew citizens when they turned away from God and His law. God sent a shepherd like Amos to speak to the people; they were expected to heed this shepherd's word, not the king and his court priests. The civil government is no more trustworthy than any other human institution. All institutions are to be under the jurisdiction of God. There is no monopoly of sovereignty on earth, except God's written word, the Bible.

8. Karl A. Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism: A Comparative Study of Total Power (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1957).

By decentralizing the office of prophet, God ensured that His people would not be compelled to listen exclusively to false prophets who would rather cater to the civil government than serve God. When the people were stiff-necked, refusing to heed His word, He punished them by allowing them to believe the false reports that were provided by the court's false prophets (Ezek. 14:1–5). The curse on their ethical rebellion was quite specific: the imposition of centralized decision-making by corrupt kings and their officially sanctioned prophets.

We never face a choice of "planning" vs. "no planning." The only question is: "Whose plan?" When economic planning is decentralized, and decisions are made by owners of private property, society is shielded from the risks of massive, centralized error. An erroneous decision made by a particular privately owned firm may cost its shareholders dearly, and customers who would have purchased the goods that would have been made, had the firm not embarked on its error-filled course, are no doubt harmed. There has been waste. Nevertheless, the majority of customers are protected because competing firms and suppliers can step in and satisfy customer demand. The rival suppliers help to smooth out the disruptions caused by either the unforeseen external circumstances or the operations of the misallocating firm.

When a monopolistic central planning agency makes an error in forecasting the economic future, large segments of the population suffer. There are few legal alternatives open to potential buyers. For a high price, black market operators may step in and smooth out the disruptions in supply, but buyers bear greater uncertainty in dealing with these suppliers, and they pay higher prices than would have been necessary if private firms had been allowed to compete with State planners. Bureaucrats, controlled as they are by tenure, trade union restrictions, or Civil Service regulations, do not have the same incentives as private entrepreneurs to bear uncertainty successfully. Bureaucrats are not directly rewarded with profits, nor are they immediately fired for losses. The carrot and the stick are only indirectly related to any given decision made by a central planning agency. Blame for error is easily transferred in anything as complex as a national economy. The customers cannot weed out the inefficient planners in a direct, forceful manner when planners are paid functionaries of the political state. By monopolizing the entrepreneurial function, the state creates a planning structure that is far too rigid and far less sensitive to shifts in customer demand and resource supplies than the decentralized planning of profit-seeking entrepreneurs. This inflexibility in the face of ceaseless change drastically increases the risk of devastating, centralized, universal failure. And even when the state's bureaucrats turn out to be successful forecasters, as Joseph was in Egypt, the citizens who benefit from this accurate forecasting run the risk of becoming increasingly dependent on the state. As those in Egypt learned during the reign of the Pharaoh of Moses' day, successful state planning in one period in no way guarantees the continued success of central planners in subsequent periods. But successful state planning does increase the share of capital assets controlled by the state and its bureaucratic functionaries, thereby protecting their subsequent decisions from private competition in the total decision-making process. The Egyptians learned this lesson the hard way.

Conclusion

It must be recognized that Joseph was in Egypt. No system of centralized economic planning was created at Mt. Sinai. God did not tell His people to imitate the experience of Egypt. He told them to avoid all contact with the "leaven" of Egyptian culture. Joseph brought the theological slaves of Egypt under bondage to their false god, the Pharaoh. God does not want His people to turn to the legacy of Egypt's bureaucratic tyranny as a model for a godly social order.

This exegesis of Joseph in Egypt outrages the typical state-promoting evangelical, especially college professors. They have tied their classroom lecture notes to the state-worshipping worldview of the tax-supported, humanist-accredited universities that awarded them their Ph.D's. They are the Pharaoh-worshippers of this era. Had they been in Egypt in Moses' day, they would have been the Hebrew foremen working under the authority of Pharaoh's Egyptian taskmasters. They are the people who would have come to Moses and Aaron and told them to go away, because they were making Pharaoh angry (Ex. 5:20–21). Their high position in the slave system was dependent on the continuing bondage of their people. So it is with humanism's chaplains in the Christian college classroom and the pulpit today. Freedom would require them to revise their notes and begin promoting economic freedom in the name of Christ rather than bondage to the would-be savior state.

THE MISAPPLICATION OF INTRINSIC VALUE

And when money failed in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came unto Joseph, and said, Give us bread: for why should we die in thy presence? for the money faileth. And Joseph said, Give your cattle, if money fail (Gen. 47:15–16).

As with all of God's relationships with men, famine can be simultaneously a curse and a blessing. The curse aspect is far easier to understand. The threefold curse promised by God to the Israelites involved the sword, pestilence, and famine (Deut. 28:21–22). The famine promised by Isaiah was a witness to the "fury of the LORD, the rebuke of thy God" (Isa. 51:20b). The people of Egypt were being placed under a long-term curse in the form of perpetual servitude to a bureaucratic state. The famine was the means of producing this servitude. Egyptians would henceforth live externally in terms of the religious faith which they held: the religion of a divine ruler.

The blessing accrued not to the Egyptians, but to the family of the house of Jacob. During his journey from Canaan, where he was still a stranger in the land (Gen. 36:7; 37:1), Israel (Jacob) was specifically told by God: "Fear not to go down into Egypt: for I will there make of thee a great nation" (36:3). In Egypt, they multiplied greatly (Ex. 1:7), even in the face of affliction (Ex. 1:12). A single family and its covenanted servants (Gen. 36:6–7) became a nation of 600,000 men, plus women and children (Ex. 12:37), in a little over two centuries if Courville's estimate is correct.¹

1. Donovan A. Courville, The Exodus Problem and Its Ramifications (Loma Linda, California: Challenge Books, 1971), I, p. 151. Cf. North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix A.

A. Famine and Money

Famine can also be a means of enforcing the cultural mandate. In forcing the Israelites down into Egypt, God was assuring the ultimate conquest of Canaan. In setting up Joseph as master of Egypt, God was enforcing the dominion covenant. Famines act in much the same way as the law of diminishing returns acts, only far more rapidly and discontinuously; the migration of populations results. Men are forced into new lands in search of agricultural productivity. They are forced to trade with those in other regions whose lands have not been hit by famine. Egypt had grain. This meant that the world would have to come to Egypt to trade on whatever terms the Egyptians thought were advantageous to them. Egypt could become a center of world trade, assuming the Egyptians thought it worth the risk of bargaining away food (41:57).

Famine is an incentive for rapid cultural change. The great European famines of 1315–17 disrupted late-medieval life, and the outbreak of bubonic plague in 1348–50, which reappeared intermittently for over three centuries, helped to destroy people's faith in medieval institutions. Religion, philosophy, labor practices, interest rates, and attitudes toward art all shifted radically in the fourteenth century.² The rise of the Lollard movement, the influence of Wycliffe, and the spread of proto-Protestant ideas were all part of the cultural turmoil of the late fourteenth century. The combination of plague, famine, and the printing press made the Reformation possible. The famines and plague had put whole populations on the move. One result was the imposition of wage controls and restraints on the movement of laborers, in country after country, in the middle of the fourteenth century. This was the first great European experiment with wage controls. Predictably, they intensified the labor shortage created by the loss of population from the plague.³

The Bible tells us that the money failed. What is money? It is the most marketable commodity. Usually, a commodity that can function as money must have five characteristics: durability, divisibility, transportability, recognizability, and scarcity. Gold and silver have been the traditional monetary metals of mankind, but salt, sugar, beads, shells, and numerous other scarce economic commodities have served men in exchange transactions. By the second year of the famine, neither gold nor silver functioned as a means of exchange any longer. "The money faileth," cried the hungry Egyptians, and so it had. The Pharaoh had in his possession both the metal and the grain by the second year of the famine. If anything functioned as money in Egypt, it was grain.

2. Johan Huizinga, The Waning of the Middle Ages (Mineola, New York: Dover, [1924] 1999); Barbara Tuchman, A Distant Mirror: The Calamitous 14th Century (New York: Knopf, 1978).

3. Herbert Heaton, Economic History of Europe (New York: Harper & Bros., 1948), p. 208.

Gold and silver were no longer acceptable means of payment. The bulk of the population no longer had much desire to possess metals. This indicates a total breakdown of the economy. The reason why men accept gold and silver in voluntary exchange for other scarce resources is because they believe that other people will do the same later on. Because people expect others to give up scarce resources for the money metals sometime in the future, the metals have exchange value in the present. This is what is usually meant by the phrase "storehouse of value." Of course, value is not some physical aspect of the metal. Acting men impute value to the metals because of estimates they have made concerning the future willingness of men to continue imputing value to the metals. Money metals, like all forms of money, are valued because of the future orientation of acting men. They use money in exchange today because they expect to be in the market buying other goods and services with money tomorrow or next year. They expect the traditional estimations of others to prevail in the marketplace, and the familiar institutional arrangements to persist through time.

Yet we are told that the money failed. What also must have failed was men's commitment to long-term planning. They needed food. They could not expect to survive over the long run unless they had access to food in the present. The long run was discounted to practically zero. The famine made Egyptians intensely present-oriented. Thus, the value of traditional monetary units fell to zero—"failed." Men lost confidence in the marketplace to supply them with their needs. They looked to the state and its warehouses filled with grain for their salvation. This shift in faith, or rather in confidence, destroyed the monetary unit of account that had prevailed in the marketplace prior to the catastrophe. The state was able to collect the money metals until they no longer served as money (47:14–15).

What could then serve as a means of payment? Joseph set the terms of exchange because he controlled the one asset the whole world wanted (41:57). First he asked for their cattle, and they capitulated (47:16–17). At the end of the year, they were back empty-handed. All they had left were their bodies and their lands (47:18). Land and labor:

here are the two sources of production. (Capital is simply the combination of land and labor over time.) They believed that they faced death, so the discounted present market value of the expected future income from both their land and their labor—their freedom—had fallen to zero. Joseph bought their land in Pharaoh's name. He then removed all of them to the cities of Egypt, which he could do only because of the huge stores of food that the state had collected. He separated them from their ancestral lands, a graphic demonstration of the reality of the transaction he had just made with them. They were no longer independent peasants; they were now totally dependent urban dwellers who looked to the state for sustenance. Once Joseph had assembled the people in the cities, he gave them grain so that they could replant (47:23). He then announced the imposition of a permanent tax of 20% of their production. He exempted only the priests from this transaction (47:22). They alone maintained ownership of their lands. Pharaoh already assigned them a portion of what he collected in taxes, so they did not need to sell their lands to Pharaoh. They would remain close supporters of Pharaoh's kingdom, visibly exempt from the new political order in which the people of Egypt had become slaves to Pharaoh.

B. Change and Economic Value

The experience of the Egyptians should draw our attention to the reality of change in human affairs. The traditional monetary units failed. The confidence of the people in money and money's supporting institutions failed. What had been valuable before fell to zero value. There is therefore no ultimate, infallible, all-purpose "store of value" in the economic affairs of men. Money is simply a marketable good, and if faith in market institutions fails, and men give up hope in their earthly futures, then money is not immune to this transformation of men's outlook. Ours is a world of uncertainty. No single earthly commodity or institution can successfully deal with every conceivable possibility of the human condition. No commodity is equally useful or valuable in every possible human situation. This is what Christ pointed to when he cautioned men to lay up treasure in heaven, since there alone is a man's treasure safe from the flux of human events (Matt. 6:19–21).⁴

Money may function as a unit of account in exchanges, but it does not "measure" value, any more than the number of diamond carats in a girl's engagement ring's "measures" the love of her fiancé. Human value, like human love, is subjective. It is imputed by acting men to objects of their desire or revulsion. Men are told to impute value in terms of God's objective standards for men—to think God's thoughts after Him—even as God imputes value to His creation (Gen. 1:31).⁵ In their activities as acting agents responsible before God for their thoughts and actions, men assign value to objects, including money. Money does not measure value; on the contrary, acting men impute value to money. As external conditions change, or men's evaluations of external conditions change, men may well shift their value preferences away from money to something else, or from one form of money to another. In Egypt, men learned that they could not eat gold. They could not induce other men to exchange food for gold. The fact that they could not eat gold does not, of course, mean that they could have eaten paper money, credit cards, or certified checks from prestigious banks.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

What we must recognize is that money does not have intrinsic value. Only the word of God has intrinsic value—permanent, unchanging value imputed to those words by God Himself, who is the source of value. God is self-attesting, self-sustaining, and absolutely autonomous. No human device, including gold and silver, possesses intrinsic value. All human devices are transitory; all shall pass away except God's Word (Matt. 24:35). Gold and silver have demonstrated for millennia that men evaluate their value in relatively predictable, stable ways. This stability of purchasing power over time and geographical boundaries testifies to the historic value of these monetary metals, but historic value is not the same thing as the hypothetical intrinsic value ascribed to the metals. Some people may use the term "intrinsic" when they really have in mind only the concept of historic value, but other people are actually quite confused about the concept of intrinsic value. They assume, for example, that some sort of long-term relationship of "16 to one" exists between the exchange value of silver and gold; 16 units of silver being equal to one unit of gold. Except on a random basis, no such relationship exists in a free market. No permanent exchange value can exist between two or more economic objects. Human action is subject to change, and exchange values are no exception to this law of human life.

By "intrinsic value," we must limit our discussion to free market goods and services. We are speaking of market value. Of course, God imputes intrinsic value to this or that aspect of the creation. He imputes intrinsic value to the souls of His people. He evaluates the intrinsic evil of His enemies. But when we come to values imputed by acting men to market phenomena, there is nothing that possesses intrinsic value—nothing, in short, which remains a created constant within the framework of historical change. We might argue that the value of the word of God is greater than the value of gold and silver, but this does not mean that the value of God’s word is always precisely this much greater than gold and silver, since the value of gold and silver are not constants in time or eternity. The very existence of changing market exchange ratios (prices) between commodities testifies to the myth of intrinsic market value.

5. Chapter 5.

Conclusion

The value of money is determined by acting men in the marketplace. The value of God’s word is determined by God. Any appeal to a hypothetical intrinsic value—some supposed fixed exchange relationship between market goods—is simply an attempt to deify some aspect of the creation, to find one of the attributes of God in the creation, namely His unchangeableness. It is God, and only God, who can say, “I am the LORD, I change not” (Mal. 3:6a). The Egyptians of Joseph’s day learned this lesson when the money failed.

Well-meaning defenders of the traditional gold standard have confused the issue by proclaiming the intrinsic value of gold. They should instead proclaim the historic value of gold. Those who at least understand the basics of value theory can dismiss as naive all defenses of the gold standard that appeal to gold’s intrinsic value, and then go on to proclaim a fiat money standard in defiance of the historic value of gold over long periods of time.

We should not become defenders of the traditional gold standard anyway. We should instead become defenders of freedom of entry, honest weights and measures, and no state-created money.⁶ We should also not become defenders of “intrinsic value” theory. We should become consistent in our economic recommendations and theoretical defenses of biblical freedom.

6. Gary North, Honest Money: The Biblical Blueprint for Money and Banking (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/gnmoney>)

CONCLUSION

(2012)

The Book of Genesis is the first book of the Pentateuch. It is structured in terms of point one of the biblical covenant model: the transcendence of God, yet also the presence of God.¹ It is the book of origins.

The Book of Genesis establishes the fundamental principle of economics: original ownership. God created the universe. He therefore owns it. He delegates subordinate, temporary ownership to individuals and institutions. This delegation began with Adam. The concepts of original and delegated ownership must be the starting point of all valid economic reasoning—not the concept of scarcity. Yet humanist economists ever since Adam Smith have sought another starting point: scarcity. They want to begin where there is universal agreement. “We all agree that there is scarcity. We all believe we would like more at zero price. So, let us begin with this.” It is a false start. The war of economic ideas always gets back to ownership and its inescapably linked issues of legal sovereignty and moral legitimacy.

A. Fundamentals of Economics

The Book of Genesis provides the economist with the fundamentals of his academic discipline. Without the revelation of God to man concerning the origins of the world, man, and scarcity, there can be no systematic, accurate economic science. The fact that such a science exists, and that it has been developed predominately by men who reject the testimony of the Bible, testifies to the willingness of men to accept at least some of the Bible’s truths, without actually accepting the Bible itself. As I have argued in Chapter 5, Appendix B, and my essay on economics in Foundations of Christian Scholarship (1976), modern free market economists have used stolen intellectual capital in their attempt to build an autonomous science of economics. There is no science of economics that can logically stand the test of reason, except for Christian economics. The antinomies of value theory—objective vs. subjective—are obvious to the more inquisitive economists, but there is no way to reconcile these antinomies by means of autonomous human reason. The antinomies are therefore ignored or dismissed as irrelevant. The contradictions in both a priori, deductivist economics and a posteriori, inductivist economics—best represented by the epistemologies of Ludwig von Mises (an a priorist) and Milton Friedman (an a posteriorist or empiricist)—are also obvious. Both schools of thought wind up relying on nonrational intuition to explain the mind-matter relationship. A few economists, such as Frank H. Knight, openly admit that such contradictions exist, but most economists never even think about such matters.² In short, all humanistic economic systems rely on stolen goods, namely, God's revelation to man concerning Himself, man, and the world of scarcity.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>); Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

Without an understanding of the economics of the Book of Genesis, it is not possible to understand economics. Secularists or other anti-God writers may think they understand economics. They may well discover truths about men's economic relationships, but they will misinterpret whatever correct information they discover if they use their anti-Genesis presuppositions to analyze their discoveries. Because God does not allow men to think completely consistently with their anti-God presuppositions, He restrains their errors. They make beneficial contributions to human thought and culture. The common grace of God, meaning His unmerited gifts to men in general, allows secular economists to make valid contributions. But it is the Christians who will be the ultimate beneficiaries of these contributions, for they alone have the key to understanding, namely, the Bible. The Christians will make the best use of the secularists' discoveries in all fields of thought. The Christians will steadily integrate the valid findings of secular science into a biblically sanctioned framework. This is why we need to take the Book of Genesis seriously as a source of information concerning the foundations of economic analysis.

Admittedly, Christians have failed to understand the crucial position of Genesis as the foundation of economics, education, and social science in general. They have been paralyzed by the myth of neutrality, ever since the days of Justin Martyr (the second century, A.D.). They have tried to establish a common intellectual ground with Greeks of all nations. Greek philosophy and its spiritual legacies have misled Christians almost from the beginning. Only when Christians recognize Genesis for what it is—the foundation of all human thought—will they begin to make culture-reconstructing intellectual contributions. They must no longer be satisfied with the scraps of stolen wisdom that fall from the humanists' tables.

2. Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, Calif.: Ross House Books, 1976).

The irony is that, to the extent that humanistic economists have made any lasting, valid contributions, they have used biblical categories of thought. Most obviously, they have acknowledged the effects of scarcity. They have come to grips with the economic consequences of God's curse of the ground. To the extent that economists have departed from the reality of Genesis 3:17–19, as is the case with Marxism, socialism, and other forms of collectivism, they have become irrational. When they argue that institutional changes will produce a world of zero scarcity—a utopian world of universal abundance at zero price—they have adopted satanic principles of interpretation. They have ceased to be economists.

If you have struggled through hundreds of pages of exegesis and economic analysis in this book, you may be asking yourself:

Why hasn't anyone ever tried this sort of a commentary in the past?

Why haven't there been many such attempts, from the days of Constantine to the present?

Why aren't there hundreds of commentaries available that deal not only with economics, but also with politics, education, family relationships, psychology, sociology, and anthropology?

How can serious Christians take the position that there is no such thing as Christian economics? After all, if there is no such thing as Christian economics, then there is no such thing as economics, for to the extent that they are consistent with their own presuppositions, the secularists have to admit that their discipline faces unsolved and probably unsolvable intellectual contradictions.

Why have Christians deliberately ignored the economics of Genesis for so long?³

3. This commentary has been in print since 1982. No humanistic economist has

These are all good questions. It would take a scholar far more familiar with the history of Christian thought than I am to answer these questions. I can only speculate concerning the answers. I know this much, however: the acceptance by Christian thinkers of the myth of intellectual neutrality lies at the heart of the problem. The acceptance of this myth over generations has kept Christian scholars from making the systematic, thoroughly biblical contributions to social science and social philosophy that have been needed for so long. They have assumed for too long that the anti-God philosophers and social commentators have done the Christians' work for them.

B. The Christian College Curriculum

I remember an incident back in 1973. I went into the office of the president of tiny Northwest Christian College in Eugene, Oregon, to discuss the possibility of getting a job teaching economics. I had not made a formal appointment, so I was happy to have gained the opportunity to speak with him.

He said that the college did not need any economics courses, because the campus was next door to the University of Oregon. "If a student thinks he needs a course in economics, we just send him over to the University to take it." He told me that this was the college's policy in most of the social sciences, except for anthropology. He confirmed Rushdoony's observation: the closer we get to the doctrine of God, the clearer becomes the visible difference between Christianity and anti-Christianity. He and his faculty could not perceive this difference until they got to man and his cultures. There, they drew a line in the methodological sand. The humanists' attempt to equate primitive religions and Christianity was just too much to swallow.

Given his acceptance of the myth of neutrality, that college president was a fiscally prudent man. Today, most of his empirebuilding peers who raise funds for their struggling little Christian colleges are almost bankrupting their schools—to hire Ph.D.-holding intellectual humanists (who may attend church)—to teach the very same courses that the University of Oregon offered. Unlike them, this president drew the obvious conclusion:

No need to spend money on warmed-over, baptized humanism: go straight to the source. Go next door and take your economics courses from the Keynesians at the state university. Let the university paid any attention to it. No Christian economist has, either.

hire the faculty, buy the library books, and worry about budget deficits. Let the college concentrate on the courses that are exclusively Christian, such as missions, evangelism, and how to run a church. If our students think they need “secular” courses, let them get their secularism from the certified humanists at tax-subsidized tuition levels. Why drain the funds of God’s kingdom—the “Christian courses”—by importing third-rate humanists to teach our students?

He never said any of this, of course, but there is no doubt in my mind that he was operating in terms of a worldview similar to what I have described. So do Christian college presidents everywhere. The difference is only that he was geographically close enough to a state university, and smart enough financially, to make use of its humanistic opportunities.

The students who took the college’s advice and enrolled part-time at the University of Oregon probably did not corrupt themselves intellectually any more than the thousands of students in Christian colleges do five days a week when they take classes in baptized humanism. If anything, the Christian student at a state university may be more alert to humanist propaganda than the student in a “Christian’s” classroom. He knows he is getting his humanism straight. The student at the Christian college doesn’t.

Conclusion

Genesis gives us the foundations of Christian thought. It tells us of the Creator-creature distinction. It tells us of the dominion covenant. It tells us of the Fall of man and the curse of the ground. We learn that we are stewards of God’s property, fully responsible to Him for the proper administration of His goods. At the same time, we learn that we are also legitimate owners during the period of our stewardship. God entrusts His property to individuals and organizations, and they are called to increase the value of this property. Wealth is therefore not an innate evil, but a means of opportunity for godly service, as we learn in the case of Abraham. Wealth is preserved and expanded by means of character and lawful stewardship (Abraham, Jacob, Joseph), and it is lost by those with poor character and no respect for God’s law (Lot, Laban, Esau).

Genesis teaches us that there is a curse on the ground. This means that we must cooperate with other men to increase our per capita wealth. There is a division of labor principle, as well as the law of diminishing returns. The latter law pressures men to expand their area of responsibility, find new means of increasing production, and subdue new lands to the glory of God (or at least to the benefit of their own pocketbooks).

Perhaps more important than anything else for a proper understanding of science, Genesis teaches us the concept of cosmic personalism. There is purpose in the creation: God's purpose foundationally, but also men's purposes derivatively. Life has meaning in terms of God's plan for the ages. This means that our labor has meaning in time and on earth, and also in the post-judgment world to come (I Cor. 3). While some aspects of these truths are taught later in the Bible, Genesis provides us with the basics. The theocentric nature of all existence is the message of Genesis. This is assuredly not the operating presupposition of humanistic science, including economics.

The Bible lays the legal and social foundations for a society that extends human freedom. This legal and social order, when respected by the rulers and the subjects of a nation, produces the economic framework which is known today as the free enterprise system. Biblical economics is free enterprise economics. It is not anarchistic economics, but it is certainly not Keynesian economics or Marxist economics. When birthrights can be validly exchanged for a pot of stew, and God honors such an exchange, we are talking about free enterprise. When legal authorities try to intervene to reverse the consequences of such a voluntary exchange, as Isaac did, those about to lose what their exchange entitled them to can legitimately take steps, including the use of deception, to defend their lives, their property, and their sacred honor.

The example of Joseph in Egypt is just that: Joseph in Egypt. He brought all of Egypt into bondage to the state. This is not an example to be followed by Christian societies.

End of Volume 1

SOVEREIGNTY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON GENESIS

VOLUME 2

APPENDIXES

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
Government by Emergency (1983)
Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
Coined Freedom (1984)
Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
Honest Money (1986)
Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
Inherit the Earth (1987)
Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
Healer of the Nations (1987)
The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
Political Polytheism (1989)
The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
Victim's Rights (1990)
Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
The Coase Theorem (1992)
Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
Rapture Fever (1993)
Tithing and the Church (1994)
Baptized Patriarchalism (1995)
Crossed Fingers (1996)
The Covenantal Tithe (2011)

SOVEREIGNTY AND DOMINION

An Economic Commentary on Genesis

Volume 2
Appendixes

Gary North

Sovereignty and Dominion

An Economic Commentary on Genesis

Formerly: The Dominion Covenant: Genesis

Copyright © Gary North, 1982, 1987, 2012

Third Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1: Sovereignty and Dominion

| | |
|--|-----|
| Preface | ix |
| General Introduction | xiv |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Cosmic Personalism (Gen. 1:1) | 8 |
| 2. Purpose, Order, and Sovereignty (Gen. 1:14–16) | 21 |
| 3. The Dominion Covenant (Gen. 1:26) | 38 |
| 4. Grace Precedes Law, but Includes Law (Gen. 1:27–28) | 46 |
| 5. Economic Value: Objective and Subjective (Gen. 1:31) | 56 |
| 6. God’s Week and Man’s Week (Gen. 2:1–3) | 87 |
| 7. The Value of Gold (Gen. 2:12) | 101 |
| 8. Subordination and Fulfillment (Gen. 2:15) | 107 |
| 9. The Meaning of Ownership (Gen. 2:15–18) | 114 |
| 10. The God-Designed Harmony of Interests (Gen. 2:18–23) | 121 |
| 11. Costs, Choices, and Tests (Gen. 3:6) | 135 |
| 12. Scarcity: Curse and Blessing (Gen. 3:17–19) | 149 |
| 13. The Burden of Time (Gen. 3:22–24) | 157 |
| 14. Primitive Nomads (Gen. 4:2) | 172 |
| 15. The Sin of Envy (Gen. 4:3–8) | 179 |
| 16. To Keep a Brother (Gen. 4:9) | 184 |
| 17. Calling and Occupation (Gen. 6:12–14) | 192 |
| 18. The Ecological Covenant (Gen. 9:1–2) | 197 |
| 19. The World Trade Incentive (Gen. 11:7–8) | 203 |
| 20. Investment and Character (Gen. 12:1–2) | 210 |
| 21. Covenantal Tithe (Gen. 14:18–20) | 216 |
| 22. The Growth of Human Capital (Gen. 15:5–6) | 222 |
| 23. A Guaranteed Inheritance (Gen. 15:16) | 238 |
| 24. Hospitality (Gen. 18:6–8) | 241 |
| 25. Escape from the Wilderness (Gen. 21:14–19) | 246 |
| 26. Competitive Bargaining (Gen. 25:31–33) | 249 |

| | |
|---|-----|
| 27. Envy and Destruction (Gen. 26:18–20) | 258 |
| 28. The Uses of Deception (Gen. 27:19) | 261 |
| 29. Jacob's Tithe (Gen 28:20–22) | 276 |
| 30. Contingency Planning (Gen. 32:7–8) | 282 |
| 31. The Law of Diminishing Returns (Gen. 36:6–7) | 289 |
| 32. The Blessing of Responsibility (Gen. 39:2–4) | 298 |
| 33. The Entrepreneurial Function (Gen. 41:25, 28) | 305 |
| 34. The Misapplication of Intrinsic Value (Gen. 47:15–16) . . | 318 |
| Conclusion | 325 |

Volume 2: APPENDIXES

| | |
|---|-----|
| APPENDIX A—From Cosmic Purposelessness to Humanistic Sovereignty | 335 |
| APPENDIX B—The Evolutionists' Defense of the Market | 421 |
| APPENDIX C—Cosmologies in Conflict: Creation vs. Evolution | 458 |
| APPENDIX D—Basic Implications of the Six-Day Creation | 530 |
| APPENDIX E—Witnesses and Judges | 563 |
| BIBLIOGRAPHY | 581 |

Appendix A

FROM COSMIC PURPOSELESSNESS TO HUMANISTIC SOVEREIGNTY

Through billions of years of blind mutation, pressing against the shifting walls of their environment, microbes finally emerged as man. We are no longer blind; at least we are beginning to be conscious of what has happened and of what may happen. From now on, evolution is what we make it.

So wrote Hermann J. Muller, the 1946 Nobel Prize winner in physiology.¹ Muller stated his position quite clearly. His statement of faith is almost universally believed within scientific and intellectual circles today. The idea is commonplace, part of the “conventional wisdom” of the age. Man will henceforth direct the evolutionary process. But who will represent man in this cosmic endeavor? Who will direct the process? Answer: Darwinian scientists.

A. The Legacy of Hermann Muller

Muller’s thesis regarding a new, man-directed evolution is worth considering in detail. It provides insight into the underlying vision and motivation of modern evolutionary science. The goal is the creation of a new humanity. Man, meaning scientific man, becomes the creator.

Muller was a disciple of Francis Galton, Darwin’s cousin. Like Galton, he believed in eugenics: the scientific manipulation of human genetic inheritance. For decades, he was America's leading scientific theorist of eugenics. He won his Nobel Prize for his research on how radiation affects genes.

1. Hermann J. Muller, “One Hundred Years Without Darwinism Are Enough,” The Humanist, XIX (1959); reprinted in Philip Appleman (ed.), Darwin: A Norton Critical Edition (New York: Norton, 1970), p. 570. I first saw an incomplete version of this quotation in an article by Elisabeth Mann Borghese, “Human Nature Is Still Evolving,” in The Center Magazine (March/April 1973), a publication of the now defunct Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, a Santa Barbara humanist think-tank which was influential in the 1950s and 1960s. It was founded by Robert Maynard Hutchins. My point: this is a standard idea among liberals and humanists.

Unlike his peers, he was consistent in his proclamation of scientific planning of the species. He was also a dedicated Marxist. He fled the United States in 1932 because of his sponsorship of a college student Marxist group at the University of Texas. He went to work at the Rockefeller-funded eugenical Institute for Brain Research in Germany even after Hitler came to power in March of 1933. Muller was technically a Jew; his mother was Jewish, which, by Rabbinical law, made him a Jew. Still, he remained in Germany through 1933. In June of 1933, he wrote to the Rockefeller Foundation, which funded the Institute's work, asking it to pressure the Nazi government to keep the Institute's work going under its director, who was being threatened with dismissal. The Nazi government did decide to allow him remain in charge.² Muller continued to do research in Germany that advanced the cause of eugenics.

The Nazis soon passed eugenic laws mandating sterilization. Muller decided that it was no longer safe for him in Germany. He did not leave out of opposition to Nazi eugenics policies. He moved to the Soviet Union from 1934 until 1937, when Stalin found out that he did not follow Lysenko's theory of the inheritance of acquired characteristics.

1. A Genetic New World Order

His 1935 book, Out of the Night, detailed his vision of a new genetic world order.

The child on the average stands half-way, in its inherited constitution, between its father and the average of the general population, and so it would be theoretically possible even now—were it not for the shackles upon human wills in our society—so to order our reproduction that a considerable part of the very next generation might average, in its hereditary physical and mental constitution, half-way between the average of the present population and that of our greatest living men of mind, body, or “spirit” (as we choose). At the same time, it can be reckoned, the number of men and women of great though not supreme ability would thereby be increased several hundred fold. It is easy to show that in the course of a paltry century or two (paltry, considering the advance in question) it would be possible for the majority of the population to become of the innate quality of such men as Lenin, Newton, Leonardo, Pasteur, Beethoven, Omar Khayyam, Pushkin, Sun Yat Sen, Marx.³

2. Edwin Black, War on the Weak: Eugenics and the American Campaign to Create a Master Race (New York: Four Walls Eight Windows, 2003), pp. 302–3.

How can this be accomplished? By sperm banks. Through artificial insemination, "a vast number of children of the future generation should inherit the characteristics of some transcendently estimable man. . . ."⁴ Dare we say it? A superman will lead to the creation of a master race: the universal human race.

His view of eugenics was messianic. He announced that "we should be able to raise virtually all mankind to or beyond levels heretofore attained only by the most remarkably gifted."⁵ He assured his readers that this can be done voluntarily. This can be done, on the one hand, by furthering birth control, providing low-cost abortions on demand, and universal child care outside the home, "with more motherly mothers, and hence more brotherly brothers."⁶ This will require the end of capitalism: "the change from the profit system to socialization. . . ."⁷ There will be some, compulsion, of course. Science requires compulsion "in a negative role, as a potential force standing ready only to prevent exploitation of the enhanced possibilities of multiplication by unduly egoistic, aggressive, or paranoid individuals."⁸ He did not use the words "forced sterilization." In 1935, there was no need. Forced sterilization laws had been on the books ever since 1907, when Indiana passed the first one.

Muller believed in government planning of the economy and the scientific elite's planning of the races. He is the consummate model of the scientist who used Darwinism to promote the sovereignty of the state. He was among the most respected evolutionists of his generation.

It might be objected that he was a lone wolf who was not representative of Darwinian geneticists in his era. With respect to his overt Marxism, this is correct. It is not correct with respect to his view of both genetic planning and economic planning.

3. Hermann Muller, Out of the Night (New York: Vanguard, 1935), pp. 112–13.

4. Ibid., p. 111.

5. Ibid., p. 113.

6. Ibid., p. 106.

7. Ibid., p. 107.

8. Ibid., p. 118.

2. The Geneticists' Manifesto

In August 1939, in the week before World War II began, a meeting of geneticists was held in Edinburgh: the Seventh International Congress of Genetics. World-famous geneticists from around the world attended. In response to a question cabled by a non-attendee, "How can the world's population be improved most effectively genetically?" a group of the attendees produced a detailed report.⁹ It became known as the Geneticists' Manifesto. The paper announced six principles.

1. There is no valid way to assess the "intrinsic worth of different individuals without economic and social conditions which provide approximately equal opportunities for all members of society instead of stratifying them from birth into classes with widely different privileges."¹⁰ [This means: (1) there are valid, though unmentioned ways to do this; (2) civil governments must create the proper equal-opportunity society.—G.N.]

2. There must be no race prejudice. "This requires some effective sort of federation of the whole world, based on the common interests of all peoples."¹¹

3. Children must be raised by parents who have "a very considerable economic security," including education and medical funding. This means a world in which "dwellings, towns and communities are reshaped with the good of children as one of their main objectives."¹²

4. There must be birth control, which requires a society in which "the superstitious attitude toward sex and reproduction now prevalent has been replaced by a scientific and social attitude."¹³

5. People and the state must recognize biological principles. Heredity and environment are both major factors—factors that "are under the potential control of man and admit of unlimited but interdependent progress."¹⁴ This requires "some kind of conscious guidance of selec-

9. On this background, see Eugenical News (June 1946), pp. 33–34. The full document was republished. This was the post-War era. The pre-War eugenics movement was fading in popularity, due to Hitler's use of forced sterilization, which gave the practice a bad press. But the laws remained on the books for two more decades.

10. "The 'Geneticists' Manifesto,'" Studies in Genetics: The Selected Papers of H. J. Muller (Bloomington, Indiana: Indiana University Press, 1962), p. 545. He died in 1967.

11. Ibid., pp. 545–46.

12. Ibid., p. 546.

13. Idem.

14. Idem.

tion.”¹⁵

6. To guide selection, there must be “an agreed direction for selection to take. . . .” This cannot be accomplished “unless social motives predominate in society. This in turn implies its socialized organization.”¹⁶

This will produce a new world order and a new humanity. Within “a comparatively small number of generations,” we are assured, this new era could come into existence, a world in which “everyone might look upon ‘genius,’ combined of course with stability, as his birthright. And, as the course of evolution shows, this would represent no final stage at all, but only an earnest of still further progress in the future.”¹⁷

Who signed this manifesto? Muller, of course, and six others initially. More added their signatures later, for a total of 21, including Julian Huxley, J. B. S. Haldane, C. H. Waddington, and Theodosius Dobzhansky.¹⁸

B. Man Must Plan

Theodosius Dobzhansky’s influence matched Muller’s. He taught zoology at Columbia University and several other universities. He concluded his essay, “The Present Evolution of Man,” which appeared in the widely read Scientific American (September 1960), with these words:

Yet man is the only product of biological evolution who knows that he has evolved and is evolving farther. He should be able to replace the blind force of natural selection by conscious direction, based on his knowledge of his own nature and on his values. It is as certain that such direction will be needed as it is questionable whether man is ready to provide it. He is unready because his knowledge of his own nature and its evolution is insufficient; because a vast majority of people are unaware of the necessity of facing the problem; and because there is so wide a gap between the way people actually live and values and ideals to which they pay lip service.

Therefore, man must now direct the evolutionary process, but the majority of men will not face up to their responsibilities in this respect. He did not elaborate, but the implication is clear enough: a minority of

15. Ibid., p. 547.

16. Idem.

17. Idem.

18. Ibid., p. 548.

men, who will face up to their responsibilities for directing the evolutionary process, must step in and provide the scientifically required leadership.

In a 1967 book, Dobzhansky discussed the role of the masses. They exist only in order to provide the raw numbers of humans out of whom will arise the elite. "Are the multitudes supererogatory? They may seem so, in view of the fact that the intellectual and spiritual advances are chiefly the works of elites. To a large extent, they are due to an even smaller minority of individuals of genius. The destiny of a vast majority of humans is death and oblivion. Does this majority play any role in the evolutionary advancement of humanity?" He admitted that the elites need the majority if they themselves are to survive. And the masses provide more than mere "manure in the soil in which are to grow the gorgeous flowers of the elite culture. Only a small fraction of those who try to scale the heights of human achievement arrive anywhere close to the summit. It is imperative that there be a multitude of climbers. Otherwise the summit may not be reached by anybody. The individually lost and forgotten multitudes have not lived in vain, provided they, too, made the effort to climb."¹⁹ It is mankind, a collective whole, that was the focus of his concern, but it is obvious that the elite members are the directing geniuses of the progress of man, as mankind struggles to reach the summit, whatever that may be. "Man is able, or soon will be able, to control his environments successfully. Extinction of mankind could occur only through some suicidal madness, such as an atomic war, or through a cosmic catastrophe."²⁰ Man, the directing god of evolution, need fear only himself, the new cosmic sovereign, or else some totally impersonal event, such as a supernova. Insofar as personalism reigns, man is sovereign.

It should be clear by now that the evolutionist is not humble. He has never viewed man as a helpless, struggling product of chaos. A cosmic leap of being has taken place. Dobzhansky spoke of two events of transcendence in the history of natural processes: the origin of life and the origin of man. Man is the second great transcendence. "Only once before, when life originated out of inorganic matter, has there occurred a comparable event."²¹ As he wrote, "The origin of life and the origin of man are, understandably, among the most challenging and also the most difficult problems in evolutionary history.”²² The continuity of slow evolutionary change is clearly not an applicable law when these tremendous “leaps in being” occur. In fact, these two remarkable discontinuities are notable only for their magnitude; there have been others, such as the appearance of terrestrial vertebrates from fish-like ancestors.²³

19. Theodosius Dobzhansky, The Biology of Ultimate Concern (New York: New American Library, 1967), p. 132.

20. Ibid., p. 129.

21. Dobzhansky, Scientific American (Sept. 1960), p. 206.

Nevertheless, the appearance of man was a true revolution: “The biological evolution had transcended itself in the human ‘revolution.’ A new level of dimension has been reached. The light of the human spirit has begun to shine. The humanum is born.”²⁴ His language is unmistakably religious, as well it should be, given his presentation of a distinctly religious cosmology. The post-Darwin evolutionist is no less religious than the Christian creationist. Evolutionists reverse God’s order of creation. The Christian affirms that a sovereign, autonomous, omnipotent personal God created the universe. The evolutionist insists that a sovereign, autonomous, omnipotent impersonal universe led to the creation (development) of a now-sovereign personal god, mankind.

C. Making the Universe Bigger

Central to the task of eliminating God from the universe and time were two important intellectual developments. The first was the extension of space. The second was the extension of time, forward and backward.

1. The Copernican Revolution

The late-medieval and early modern world saw the shattering of the pre-modern world’s conception of the size of the universe. One of the standard arguments found in textbook accounts of the history of science is that when Copernicus broke the spell of the older Ptolemaic universe, which had hypothesized the sun and heavenly bodies circling the earth, he somehow diminished the significance of man. Astronomer William Saslaw repeated this standard analysis in a 1972 essay. He wrote, “by diminishing the earth, Copernicus also diminished our own importance to the Universe.”²⁵

22. Dobzhansky, Biology of Ultimate Concern, p. 45.

23. Ibid., p. 50.

24. Ibid., p. 58.

25. William C. Saslaw, “An Introduction to the Emerging Universe,” in Saslaw and

This kind of language goes back to the early years of the Darwinian controversy. Thomas H. Huxley, one of Darwin's earliest defenders, and the most influential promoter of Darwin's gospel in England in the nineteenth century, wrote these words:

For, as the astronomers discover in the earth no centre of the universe, but an eccentric speck, so the naturalists find man to be no centre of the living world, but one amidst endless modifications of life; and as the astronomer observes the mark of practically endless time set upon the arrangements of the solar system so the student of life finds the records of ancient forms of existence peopling the world for ages, which, in relation to human experience, are infinite. . . . Men have acquired the ideas of the practically infinite extent of the universe and of its practical eternity; they are familiar with the conception that our earth is but an infinitesimal fragment of that part of the universe which can be seen; and that, nevertheless, its duration is, as compared with our standards of time, infinite. . . . Whether these ideas are well or ill founded is not the question. No one can deny that they exist, and have been the inevitable outgrowth of the improvement of natural knowledge. And if so, it cannot be doubted that they are changing the form of men's most cherished and most important convictions.²⁶

This supposed diminishing of man was accompanied by the rise of humanism, and Copernicus' theory was in fact basic to humanism's growth. A diminished view of man has somehow led to an elevated view of man. How was this possible?

One lucid answer was provided by Arthur O. Lovejoy, the historian of ideas. He argued that the traditional account of the significance of Copernicus' theory has been erroneous. It has misunderstood the place of the earth in the medieval cosmology. For them, hell was the center of the universe.

It has often been said that the older picture of the world in space was peculiarly fitted to give man a high sense of his own importance and dignity; and some modern writers have made much of this supposed implication of pre-Copernican astronomy. Man occupied, we are told, the central place in the universe, and round the planet of his habitation all the vast, unpeopled spheres obsequiously revolved. But the actual tendency of the geocentric system was, for the medieval mind, precisely the opposite. For the centre of the world was not a position of honor; it was rather the place farthest removed from the Empyrean, the bottom of the creation, to which its dregs and baser elements sank. The actual centre, indeed, was Hell; in the spatial sense the medieval world was literally diabolocentric. And the whole sublunary region was, of course, incomparably inferior to the resplendent and incorruptible heavens above the moon. . . . It is sufficiently evident from such passages that the geocentric cosmography served rather for man's humiliation than for his exaltation, and that Copernicanism was opposed partly on the ground that it assigned too dignified and lofty a position to his dwelling-place.²⁷

Kenneth C. Jacobs, (eds.), The Emerging Universe (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1972), no page number, but introductory paragraph.

26. Huxley, "On Improving Knowledge" (1886), in Frederick Barry (ed.), Essays (New York: Macmillan, 1929), pp. 227-29.

To break the intellectual hold of the older medieval conception of the universe as well as man's place on a cursed earth, the humanists found it convenient to promote Copernicus' cosmography. The basic step in creating a new, autonomous universe did not reduce the cosmological significance of man, for it was a key to establishing the centuries-long intellectual process of shoving God out of the universe. It was necessary to reduce God's significance in order to give to mankind the monopoly of cosmological significance. The infinite universe could be substituted for the once-central earth as the arena of man's drama. There is a problem, however. An impersonal universe, however large, cannot provide meaning. Man, therefore, can now become the source of meaning in (and for) the universe, by virtue of his exclusive claim to cosmic personalism²⁸—the only source of personal purpose in this infinite universe. Even better from autonomous man's perspective, this modern universe does not relegate man to the pit of sin and spiritual warfare, as the medieval view of the universe had done.

2. The Darwinian Revolution

What the Copernican revolution did for man's sense of autonomy and monopoly of power within the spatial dimension, Darwin's revolution did for man's sense of temporal autonomy. An analogous error in the textbook accounts of the history of science and the history of modern thought is that Darwin made man the descendant of apes (or pre-apes).²⁹ This supposedly debased man's view of himself and his import-

27. Arthur O. Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being: A Study of the History of an Idea (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1936] 1965), pp. 101–2.

28. Chapter 1.

29. Predictably, some overly sensitive evolutionist, upon reading this reference to man's ancestors, the apes, will be horrified. "Darwin never said that man descended from apes!" On this point, let me quote George Gaylord Simpson, Harvard's prestigiance in history. The opposite is the case. What Darwin did was to rescue rebellious Western man from Christianity's theology of moral transgression and its doctrine of eternal doom.

A valuable analysis of the impact Darwinian thought had on late-nineteenth-century religious thought was presented by Rev. James Maurice Wilson, Canon of Worcester, in a 1925 essay, "The Religious Effect of the Idea of Evolution." Man became the focal point of religion, for "it is only in the study of man's nature that we can hope to find a clue to God's Purpose in Creation. Herein lies, as I think, the great service that the idea of evolution is rendering to theology."³⁰ Darwin freed man from the biblical God, concluded Rev. Wilson, and so did his contemporaries.

The evolution of man from lower forms of life was in itself a new and startling fact, and one that broke up the old theology. I and my contemporaries, however, accepted it as fact. The first and obvious result of this acceptance was that we were compelled to regard the Biblical story of the Fall as not historic, as it had long been believed to be. We were compelled to regard that story as a primitive attempt to account for the presence of sin and evil in the world. . . . But now, in the light of the fact of evolution, the Fall, as a historic event, already questioned on other grounds, was excluded and denied by science.³¹

Understandably, the rejection of the doctrine of the ethical rebellion of man against God, at a particular point in human history, necessarily transformed that generation's interpretation of Christianity.

The abandonment of the belief in a historic "Fall" of a primeval pair of human beings has removed one of the great obstacles to the ous paleontologist: "No one doubts that man is a member of the order Primates along with lemurs, tarsiers, monkeys and apes. Few doubt that his closest living relatives are apes. On this subject, by the way, there has been too much pussyfooting. Apologists emphasize that man cannot be a descendant of any living ape—a statement that is obvious to the verge of imbecility—and go on to state or imply that man is not really descended from an ape or monkey at all, but from an earlier common ancestor. In fact, that common ancestor would certainly be called an ape or monkey in popular speech by anyone who saw it. Since the terms ape and monkey are defined by popular usage, man's ancestors were apes or monkeys (or successively both). It is pusillanimous if not dishonest for an informed investigator to say otherwise." Simpson, This View of Life: The World of an Evolutionist (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1964), p. 12.

30. James Maurice Wilson, "The Religious Effect of the Idea of Evolution," in Evolution in the Light of Modern Knowledge: A Collective work (London: Blackie & Son, 1925), p. 492.

31. Ibid., pp. 497–98.

acceptance by our generation of the Christian Faith which had required that belief. Yet taken by itself it certainly tends to create, as well as to remove, a difficulty. For if there was no historic Fall, what becomes of the Redemption, the Salvation through Christ, which the universal experience of Christendom proves incontestably to be fact? How does Jesus save His people from their sins? *He makes men better.*³²

Man now becomes a co-worker with a vague, undefinable God who does not judge. "It is the sins of the world and our sins that He who died on the Cross is taking away, by making us better. Salvation is not then thought of as an escape from hell; but as a lifting us all out from living lives unworthy of us. Religion so conceived is not the art of winning heaven, but the effort to become better and to work with God."³³

Man now becomes part of God, who in turn is part of the universe. There is a continuity of life through evolution. There is therefore a continuity of being. Wilson concluded:

The idea of evolution affects Christology because it assumes and implies continuity along with advance in creation. And it is this idea and fact of continuity, impressed on us from all quarters, that is now determining what men are able to believe concerning Divine action in every sphere. The evidence for continuity everywhere is overwhelming. The implicit or explicit recognition of it among educated people, and a general sense of it, are becoming universal and axiomatic. . . . What a chain it is! Begin anywhere: with your own intelligence as you read, or mine as I write. First go down the chain. Intelligence is not confined to those who can read and write. It is shared by every human being. It is shared by animals. It is not limited to animals. Plants cannot be denied a share of it. It is found in roots and leaves and flowers. Go down farther still; and farther. You cannot find the end of the chain. And then go up. . . . To us intelligence, mind, spirit, is now seen as one long continuous chain, of which we see neither beginning nor end. We are perhaps at least as far from the top of it as we are from the bottom.³⁴

This is a modern version of the ancient religion known as pantheism. It is certainly one reasonable extension of Darwinism. This is another reason why a generation of public school graduates in the late 1960s could turn to pantheism and then to forms of animism. The best-selling book, The Secret Life of Plants (1974), was essentially a defense of the animist cosmology, where sprites and personal "forces" inhabit plants and special regions of the earth.

32. Ibid. pp. 498–99.

33. Ibid., p. 501.

34. Ibid., pp. 501–2.

This doctrine of the continuity of being was basic to ancient paganism, most notably in Egypt's theology of the divine Pharaoh and his divine state. It is the oldest heresy of all, tempting man "to be as god" (Gen. 3:5). Rev. Wilson was being too modest. Man is not only closer to the top of the chain than to the bottom, he actually is the top. Dobzhansky made this point inescapably clear. He knew how erroneous the textbook account is; he knew that Darwin elevated mankind by making him the product of ape-like beings, which in turn were products of impersonal random forces governed only by the law of natural selection. He wrote:

It has become almost a commonplace that Darwin's discovery of biological evolution completed the downgrading and estrangement of man begun by Copernicus and Galileo. I can scarcely imagine a judgment more mistaken. Perhaps the central point to be argued in this book is that the opposite is true. Evolution is a source of hope for man. To be sure, modern evolution has not restored the earth to the position of the center of the universe. However, while the universe is surely not geocentric, it may conceivably be anthropocentric. Man, this mysterious product of the world's evolution, may also be its protagonist, and eventually its pilot. In any case, the world is not fixed, not finished, and not unchangeable. Everything in it is engaged in evolutionary flow and development.³⁵

A changing, evolving world is at last free from the providence of God.

Since the world is evolving it may in time become different from what it is. And if so, man may help to channel the changes in a direction which he deems desirable and good. . . . In particular, it is not true that human nature does not change; this "nature" is not a status but a process. The potentialities of man's development are far from exhausted, either biologically or culturally. Man must develop as the bearer of spirit and of ultimate concern. Together with Nietzsche we must say: "Man is something that must be overcome."³⁶

Man, in short, must transcend himself. He must evolve into the pilot of the universe. He can do this because he alone is fully self-conscious, fully self-aware. "Self-awareness is, then, one of the fundamen-

35. Dobzhansky, Biology of Ultimate Concern, p. 7.

36. Ibid., pp. 8–9.

al, possibly the most fundamental, characteristic of the human species. This characteristic is an evolutionary novelty. . . . The evolutionary adaptive significance of self-awareness lies in that it serves to organize and to integrate man's physical and mental capacities by means of which man controls his environment."³⁷ Man must take control of man and the environment.

Understandably, Dobzhansky despised Protestant fundamentalism. Above all, he had to reject the idea of creationism. To accept such a creed would be to knock man from his pedestal, to drag him away from the pilot's wheel. In fact, scholarly fundamentalists enraged him.

There are still many people who are happy and comfortable adhering to fundamentalist creeds. This should cause no surprise, since a large majority of these believers are as unfamiliar with scientific findings as were people who lived centuries ago. The really extraordinary phenomenon is the continued existence of a small minority of scientifically educated fundamentalists who know that their beliefs are in utter, flagrant, glaring contradiction with firmly established scientific findings. . . . Discussions and debates with such persons is [sic] a waste of time; I suspect that they are unhappy people, envious of those who are helped to hold similar views by plain ignorance.³⁸

What is the heart of the evolutionist's religion? Dobzhansky made his humanism clear: "One can study facts without bothering to inquire about their meaning. But there is one stupendous fact with which people were confronted at all stages of their factual enlightenment, the meaning of which they have ceaselessly tried to discover. This fact is Man."³⁹ This is the link among all of man's religions, he said. Man with a capital "M" is the heart of man's religions; so, on these terms, evolutionism must certainly be the humanistic world's foremost religion. It is not surprising that Dobzhansky's book was published as one of a series, edited by Ruth Nanda Anshen: "Perspectives in Humanism."

You need to understand from the beginning that evolutionism's cosmology involves an intellectual sleight-of-hand operation. It appears initially to denigrate man's position in a universe of infinite (or almost infinite) space and time, only subsequently to place man on the pinnacle of this non-created realm. Man becomes content to be a child of the meaningless slime, in order that he might claim his rightful sovereignty in the place once occupied by God. By default—the disappearance of God the Creator—man achieves his evolving divinity.

37. Ibid., pp. 68–69.

38. Ibid., pp. 95–96.

39. Ibid. p. 96.

D. Uniformitarianism

Uniformitarianism is the deeply religious and inherently unprovable assumption that rates of astrophysical and geological change observed today have been the same since the beginning of time. Differently put, uniformitarianism teaches that the processes that acted in the evolution of the universe and the earth were the same as those that operate today. (Some evolutionary scientists have finally abandoned this straightforward version of uniformitarianism,⁴⁰ but it is the one which has long been acceptable to most scientists, especially geologists, astronomers, and life scientists.)

Science needs a constant, even the science of Einstein's theory of relativity. That constant is the speed of light. By striking at the validity of such a constant, the Bible necessarily denies the doctrine of uniformitarianism in relation to origins of the universe. Either the transmission of light from the most distant stars began on the same day as the transmission of light from the moon, with the rays of light from all sources striking the earth on the day the heavenly bodies were created, or else the Genesis account of the creation is false. The Bible's account of the chronology of creation points to an illusion, one created by the modern doctrine of uniformitarianism. The seeming age of the stars is an illusion. The events that we seem to be observing, such as novas (exploding stars), did not take place billions of years ago. If they did

40. See, for example, Simpson, This View of Life, p. 132. Simpson denied that rates of geological change observable today have always prevailed. "Some processes (those of vulcanism or glaciation, for example) have evidently acted in the past with scales and rates that cannot by any stretch be called 'the same' or even 'approximately the same' as those of today." However, he still clung to uniformitarianism as a principle, though unprovable, because it is scientifically necessary to assume its existence: "Gravity would be immanent (an inherent characteristic of matter now) even if the law of gravity had changed, and it is impossible to prove that it has not changed. Uniformity, in this sense, is an unprovable postulate justified, or indeed required, on two grounds. First, nothing in our incomplete but extensive knowledge of history disagrees with it. Second, only on this postulate is a rational interpretation of history possible, and we are justified in seeking—as scientists we must seek—such a rational interpretation" (p. 133). Cf. Stephen Jay Gould, "Evolution: Explosion, Not Ascent," New York Times (Jan. 22, 1978); Ever Since Darwin (1977), and The Panda's Thumb (1980), both published by Norton, New York. Gould was a Harvard professor of paleontology, just as Simpson was. See also Steven N. Stanley, The New Evolutionary Timetable (New York: Basic Books, 1982).

take place, they took place recently. If so, the speed of light is not a reliable constant. If the speed of light has been a constant since the creation of the earth, then the flashes of light which we explain as exploding stars are in no way related to actual historical events like explosions, unless the universe is relatively small. Either the constancy of the speed of light is an illusion, or the size of the universe is an illusion, or else the physical events that we hypothesize to explain the visible changes in light or radiation are false inferences. The speed of light should not be used to estimate the age and size of the universe.⁴¹

E. Cosmic Purpose

Genesis 1:14–16 has implications outside the discipline of astronomy. These verses are uniquely important for the biological and social sciences. First, they teach us that the origin of life was outside the cause-and-effect sequence of today's environment. Plant life appeared before the creation of the sun. If biological processes were the same then as now, then chlorophyll preceded the appearance of the sun. Light did not “call forth the plant”—not solar light, anyway. The biological processes of plant life were in operation before the existence of the star that today sustains all plant life. The sun, in this sense, was created for the present benefit of the plants. The Bible's account of creation reverses modern biological science's interpretation of cause and effect. Plants had capacities for reproduction and survival before the present basis of plant life was created. Nothing could be further removed from the hypothesis of modern biology. Such a creationist view of reality indicates the future-orientation of cause and effect, as if the plants called forth the sun. God, of course, called forth both plants and sun, but from the point of view of chronology, the biblical account denies the past-orientation of secular theories of cause and effect. Science declares that every event has some set of prior causes. At least with respect to the creation of the world, the Bible denies that such causes were in any way environmentally determined by existing matter-energy.

41. A story written by Walter Sullivan in the New York Times (Dec. 20, 1978) reported on four quasars that appeared to be moving through space at speeds far in excess of the speed of light. Scientists were frantically trying to find some sort of explanation for this phenomenon, since it challenged the modern world's only accepted constant, namely, the speed of light. Nevertheless, John Kolena, Assistant Professor of Astronomy at Duke University in Durham, North Carolina, could write in total confidence in a letter to the Editor: “The earth's age is thus based neither on ‘assumptions’ nor on ‘faith’ but on a law of nature, experimentally verified literally millions of times without exception.” He was referring to the radioactive decay of uranium atoms. He ended his letter with an appeal to the Deist's God of the eighteenth century: “Those of us who still need to believe in God should in fact, be even more impressed by his or her decision to make just a few natural laws and yet keep the universe running so well for so many billions of years without any necessity for active intervention.” Durham Morning Herald (Nov. 1, 1979). It is inspiring to know that such a God (male or female) should be so smart as to create the world and then conveniently disappear for 13 billion years, in order to demonstrate His (or Her) majestic sovereignty. Meanwhile, the quasars went merrily along, at eight times the speed of light. Maybe.

A second implication of Genesis 1:14–16, which is related to the first, is significant in the social sciences as well as in the biological sciences. The stars, sun, and moon were created in order to serve the needs of plants, animals, and men. Modern science does not permit the use of the words “in order to” except when a human being or thinking animal is seeking to achieve some goal. The concept of cosmic purpose is not allowed to exist in modern science except in relationship to man. The processes of hypothetically autonomous nature are explained by modern science strictly in terms of purposeless prior events. The universe’s origins were purely random and therefore completely without purpose. What all modern science denies absolutely is the old Christian doctrine of teleology.

“Teleology” is not a commonly used word any longer. It refers to final causation: ultimate ends. Modern science is concerned only with prior causation. Cosmic impersonalism necessarily has to exclude any concept of final causation, since there can be no personal, directing agent who has created our world in order to achieve certain ends. Without a directing agent—a conscious, powerful planner—the concept of purpose is meaningless. Modern science denies the doctrine of transcendent cosmic personalism, so it also has to deny teleology, except with reference to the goals of man or men. It is man, and only man, who has brought purpose into the rationalist’s universe. Causation had to be purposeless causation prior to man. Final causation implies a personal agent who is directing creation towards a goal which was chosen prior to the appearance of man. This is precisely what the Bible affirms (Eph. 1). This is precisely what modern, rationalist science denies.

Teleology, the doctrine of final causation, was used by Aquinas as one of the five proofs of God. It became a popular apologetic device used by Protestants to defend the faith “rationally,” especially after the appearance of William Paley’s books, A View of the Evidences of Christianity (1794) and Natural Theology (1802). The signs of design in creation point to God’s plan for the ages, Paley argued. He used the famous analogy of the clock and the universe: a designer must be postulated in both cases. (The radical Deist, whose universe is mechanistic, can use this analogy to prove God's neglect of man's affairs, thereby denying the doctrine of providence, which is why Paley also relied on the evidence of miracles—providential discontinuities—to state the case for Christianity.) Paley's Evidences was still assigned to Cambridge University students just prior to World War I, though it is doubtful that many of them took it seriously. Malcolm Muggeridge certainly was unimpressed.⁴² Is the universe orderly because God has specific ends for it, and has therefore directed its operations? If the universe is orderly, can some other explanation be given besides conscious design?

It has been the goal of the modern evolutionist, ever since the days of Darwin, to find a suitable alternate explanation. Darwin's answer was evolution through natural selection. George Bernard Shaw confidently stated that Darwin had thrown Paley's watch into the ocean. Marjorie Greene added:

It was not really, however, the watch he threw away, but the watchmaker. Darwinism is teleologically decapitated; everything in nature is explained in terms of its purpose, but an unplanned purpose in which the organism is tool, tool user, and beneficiary all in one. And the artifact analogy is as basic to Darwinism, both old and new, as it is to natural theology: not only is the concept of natural selection grounded on the analogy with the great livestock breeders, but the organisms themselves are conceived in Paleyan terms as contrivances, aggregates of characters and functions of good—for what? For survival, that is, for going on and being good for, going on and being good for—and so on ad infinitum.⁴³

Instead of eternity, the Darwinist substitutes infinite extension, at least until all energy is dissipated in the final cold of entropy. Instead of immortality, he substitutes the survival of the species. Anyway, the old-fashioned, less consistent Darwinist did these things. The new ones are growing less confident about man's survival as they grow more consistent concerning man's autonomous power, e.g., nuclear war or biological warfare that uses microbes that are genetically engineered to be racially specific.

42. Malcolm Muggeridge, Chronicles of Wasted Time: The Green Stick (New York: William Morrow, 1973), p. 75.

43. Marjorie Greene, "The Faith of Darwinism," Encounter (Nov. 1959), p. 53.

F. Whose Purposes?

The great enemy of modern science is purpose apart from man's purposes. As the Medawars stated so clearly, "It is upon the notion of randomness that geneticists have based their case against a benevolent or malevolent deity and against there being any overall purpose or design in nature."⁴⁴ The old-fashioned version of Darwinism did include an element of purposefulness, at least in its language. The so-called "survival of the fittest" indicated that there was upward progress inherent in the processes of evolution. This phrase was coined by Herbert Spencer, the nineteenth-century sociologist, in his 1852 essay, "A Theory of Population, deduced from the General Law of Animal Fertility," and Darwin inserted the phrase into the fifth edition of The Origin of Species. Spencer's language was ethical and teleological: "From the beginning, pressure of population has been the proximate cause of progress." Again, "those left behind to continue the race, are those in whom the power of self-preservation is the greatest—are the select of their generation."⁴⁵ The words "progress" and "select" are giveaways. Mere biological change is equated with progress, with all the nuances associated with "progress," and the best are "selected" by nature, converting a random, impersonal process into something resembling purposeful action.

One reason why Darwinism swept nineteenth-century thought was because of the seemingly teleological implications of the language of Darwinism. The public was not yet ready to abandon teleology as rapidly as the more consistent scientists were. Even today, the language of evolutionists is still clouded by the language of final causation and purpose. A. R. Manser wrote:

Darwin's theory is generally claimed to be non-teleological. But the very criterion of success in the "struggle for existence," survival and/or expansion, seems to put a teleological notion back into the center of evolutionary thought. This explains why it is generally assumed that evolution is in an "upward" direction, that new species are an improvement of the old. . . . I am not claiming that this anthropomorphism is necessarily involved in Darwin's theory itself, or that Darwin must have thought in these terms; all I claim is that this was one of the elements that made the theory acceptable both to scientists and to laymen. . . . From a historical point of view, it seems likely that many of the nonscientific supporters of Darwin would have been less willing to accept the theory if this prop had not been available.⁴⁶

44. Peter and Jean Medawar, "Revising the Facts of Life," Harper's (Feb. 1977), p. 41.

45. Cited by William Irvine, Apes, Angels, and Victorians: The Story of Darwin, Huxley, and Evolution (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1955), p. 30.

Furthermore, he pointed out, "even now it is clear that many biologists have to make a conscious effort to prevent themselves from lapsing into such a mode of thought or expression."

From the beginning, Darwin used the analogy of the professional breeder in defending the idea of natural selection, and this led to continuing confusion on the part of readers, both scientific and amateur, who had assimilated his explanation of the so-called mechanism of evolution. Again and again, popularizers (including Harvard's influential nineteenth-century biologist, Asa Gray) tried to combine some version of Paley's Natural Theology with an activist version of natural selection. Darwin over and over had to explain that his language was not to be taken literally, that Nature is not a planning, conscious entity that selects one or another species to survive. Yet, in the first edition of Origin of Species, he had written that "Natural Selection, as we shall hereafter see, is a power incessantly ready for action, and is as immeasurably superior to man's feeble efforts, as the works of Nature are to Art."⁴⁷ No wonder he had to keep revising each edition to eliminate such language! The sixth edition was so far removed from the first that something like 75% of the first was rewritten by the final edition—rewritten as many as five times each, in the case of some sentences. The sixth edition was one-third longer than the first.⁴⁸

As a result of constant criticism, he steadily abandoned natural selection as the sole cause of evolution. He adopted elements of the idea of Lamarck: the "inheritance of acquired characteristics," an idea that has been repudiated by modern Darwinians. He referred back to an earlier statement in the first edition, in the conclusion of the sixth edition: "I am convinced that natural selection has been the main but not the exclusive means of modification."⁴⁹ Those who have seen the triumph of Darwinism forget that for half a century after the publication of Origin of Species, the ideas of evolution and uniformitarianism came

46. A. R. Manser, "The Concept of Evolution," Philosophy, XL (1965), p. 22.

47. Cited by Robert M. Young, "Darwin's Metaphor: Does Nature Select?" Monist, LV (1971), p. 462.

48. Ibid., p. 496.

49. Charles Darwin, The Origin of Species, 6th ed. (New York: Modern Library, [1871]), p. 367.

to be accepted universally, but the idea of natural selection as the mechanism (explanation) went into decline. As Robert M. Young commented:

As a result of successive theoretical and experimental developments in biology which seemed inconsistent with Darwin's mechanism of natural selection, this aspect of his theory went into increasing decline, so much so that Nordenskiöld's standard History of Biology (written between 1920–24 and still in print [as of 1970—G.N.]) included long chapters chronicling the decline of Darwinism, in the same period as evolution was being increasingly accepted. "To raise the theory of selection, as had often been done, to the rank of a 'natural law' comparable in value with the law of gravity established by Newton is, of course, quite irrational, as time has already shown; Darwin's theory of the origin of the species was long ago abandoned." Within ten years, however, biologists were generally convinced that Darwin had been right in the first place. . . .⁵⁰

The phrase, "in the first place," refers to the first edition of Origin, before he had begun to compromise the theory of natural selection so severely. What Darwin had accomplished in 1859 was impressive: the presentation of a seeming mechanism which could explain evolution. But his book was tinged with teleological elements in its language, thereby making far easier the spread of the idea of evolution among people who still wanted to believe in a semi-providence-governed universe. The public did not understand the importance of natural selection, despite the fact that this was Darwin's hypothesis justifying belief in biological evolution. Even Darwin steadily abandoned the hypothesis as an all-encompassing explanation. He seems to have abandoned confidence in chance as a meaningful explanation of origins in his last years. In the last letter that he wrote to Alfred Russel Wallace, the co-discoverer of "evolution through natural selection," Darwin commended a book by William Graham, The Creed of Science, which was straightforwardly teleological in approach. Graham had written: "We are compelled to interpret the course of evolution as being under guidance; to believe that the final results were aimed at; that Nature did not stumble on her best works by sheer accident, . . . Chance, as an explanation—and if design be denied, chance must be offered as the explanation—is a word expressing nothing, a word which, under pretence of explanation, affirms nothing whatever. It is this; but it is also much more serious; for it is the express denial of God and it is thus genuine atheism.”⁵¹ Darwin wrote to Graham that “you have expressed my inward conviction, though far more vividly and clearly than I could have done, that ‘the universe is not the result of chance.’”⁵²

50. Young, Monist (1971), p. 497. Cf. Simpson, This View of Life, pp. 14ff.

But if not chance, then what? Modern science cannot accept explanations for events that are outside of nature itself. Modern science cannot accept final causation. Therefore, modern science had to abandon Darwin in the name of Darwinian presuppositions. Better the lawless laws of chance than God; better chaos than providence, says the secular scientist.

In biology, and especially genetics, the element of randomness enters at the very beginning of life. The scientist knows no way of predicting either chromosome combinations or genetic mutations. Furthermore, he does not know which environmental factors will prove conclusive in the development of the particular species in question. He may speak about the “survival of the fittest,” yet the only way to test the fittest is to see, in retrospect, which species actually do survive. The so-called survival of the fittest is a tautology; it means simply the survival of the survivors. There is no mechanism today that geneticists can use that enables them to predict, in advance, which species will survive or which species will not. Darwin’s theory is therefore a descriptive theory, not a theory useful in scientific prediction. The heart of the meaning of the “survival of the fittest,” therefore, is not scientific but rather historical.⁵³ More to the point, it is more religious than anything. It is a statement about God and His relationship with the creation. As one philosopher has written:

All that the statement “It is the fit that survive” can mean is that for any kind of organism in any circumstances there are some possible features whose possession is more conducive to survival than that of their alternatives. But the phrase “the survival of the fittest,” though it is something of a catchphrase, does indicate something of importance. It indicates that according to the theory there is nothing mysterious in the fact of the survival of some forms in preference to others; there is no need to postulate the unfathomable designs of a di-

51. Cited by Young, ibid., pp. 486–87.

52. Cited by Young, ibid., p. 486. One difficulty in attributing this passage as a late opinion of Darwin’s is that he had questioned the purely random universe in earlier correspondence, such as his Nov. 26, 1860, letter to Asa Gray: The Life and Letters of Charles Darwin, 2 vols., ed. Francis Darwin (New York: Appleton, 1887), II, p. 146. (<http://bit.ly/DarwinLife2>)

53. A. R. Manser, Philosophy (1965), pp. 24–25. Cf. Simpson, This View of Life, p. 96.

vine will.⁵⁴

God is eliminated from biological science. This is the very essence of all modern, anti-teleological science. This is why science must not be teleological, the secularist argues.

The secular scientist really does not want randomness all of the time. He wants predictable randomness. He wants the operation of the law of large numbers. He wants the laws of probability. He wants sufficient order to give him power, but he usually wants sufficient randomness to preserve him from the power of others, especially God. When the biologist speaks of randomness, he means man's limited ability to predict the future, yet no scientist clings to a theory of total randomness. As Barker wrote concerning randomness as it applies to Darwinism: "It is an essential presupposition of the theory that variation should occur at random with respect to any advantage or disadvantage it may confer on the organism, in its relations with factors in its internal or external environment."⁵⁵ As he emphatically stated, "any theory that did not postulate randomness of this kind, or at least which involved its denial, could not count as a scientific theory."⁵⁶ Here is the heart of the argument concerning teleology. Any trace of teleology must be scrapped by secular science. The secular scientists have defined science to exclude all forms of final, teleological causation. Darwin, however confused he may have been, or however attracted to the teleological arguments of William Graham he may have become at the end of his life, made it plain in the final edition of Origin of Species that he could not accept any trace of God-ordained benefits in the processes of nature. "The foregoing remarks lead me to say a few words on the protest lately made by some naturalists, against the utilitarian doctrine that every detail of structure has been produced for the good of its possessor. They believe that many structures have been created for the sake of beauty, to delight man or the Creator (but this latter point is beyond the scope of scientific discussion), or for the sake of mere variety, a view already discussed. Such doctrines, if true, would be absolutely fatal to my theory."⁵⁷ Indeed; they would be absolutely fatal for all forms of modern secular science. Or, should I say, would have been up until now fatal for modern secular science.

54. A. D. Barker, "An Approach to the Theory of Natural Selection," Philosophy, XLIV (Oct. 1969), p. 274.

55. Ibid., p. 278.

56. Ibid., p. 283.

57. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 146.

G. Man: The New Predestinator

There is an exception to the a priori denial of teleological causation in the universe. Man is this exception. The secularist has denied that there could be even a trace of final causation, meaning ends-dominated causation, anywhere in the origin of nature or in nature's products. But when we come to a consideration of man, now freed from God or any other form of conscious causation external to man, the position of the secularists changes. Man is the new sovereign over nature. Nature's otherwise mindless processes have now produced a thinking, acting creature, man. Man can learn the laws of nature, and he can then subdue nature to his ends. He can plan and execute his plans. Man proposes and man disposes, to quote Karl Marx's partner, Frederick Engels.⁵⁸ Nature has therefore transcended its own laws. A series of uncreated random developments has resulted in the creation of a planning being. Teleology has come into the world. Man, the new predestinator, can take over the directing of evolution, even as the selective breeders who so fascinated Darwin took over the breeding of animals and plants. What modern science has denied to God and nature, it now permits to man.

The Bible affirms that the stars were created by God for the benefit of His creatures on earth. The Bible absolutely denies the first principle of all secular natural science, namely, that there can be no teleology in nature prior to man. But the Bible also subordinates man and the creation to God, the Creator. Modern secular science comes to a new conclusion: there is teleology, but man—generic, collective man—kind—is the source of this final causation. The Bible denies this. The Bible affirms that God proposes and God disposes, and that man is responsible before God (Rom. 9). God's ends are sovereign over both man and nature.

58. Frederick Engels, Herr Eugen Dühring's Revolution in Science (Anti-Dühring) (London: Lawrence & Wishart, [1877] 1934), p. 348. Engels wrote: "We have already seen, more than once, that in existing bourgeois society men are dominated by the economic conditions created by themselves, by the means of production which they themselves have produced, as if by an extraneous force. The actual basis of religious reflex action therefore continues to exist, and with it the religious reflex itself. . . . It is still true that man proposes and God (that is, the extraneous force of the capitalist mode of production) disposes. Mere knowledge, even if it went much further and deeper than that of bourgeois economic science, is not enough to bring social forces under the control of society. What is above all necessary for this, is a social act. And when this act has been accomplished, when society, by taking possession of all means of production and using them on a planned basis, has freed itself and all its members from the bondage in which they are at present held by these means of production but which now confront them as an irresistible extraneous force; when therefore man no longer merely proposes, but also disposes—only then will the last extraneous force which is still reflected in religion vanish; and with it will also vanish the religious reflection itself, for the simple reason that then there will be nothing left to reflect" (pp. 347–48).

The war between the first principles of the Bible's account of creation and secular science is absolute. No compromise is possible. Christians who happen to hold advanced degrees in biology and geology may think that some sort of working compromise is possible, but the humanists deny it. George Gaylord Simpson called teleology "the higher superstition." He wrote: "Another subtler and even more deeply warping concept of the higher superstition was that the world was created for man. Other organisms had no separate purpose in the scheme of creation. Whether noxious or useful, they were to be seriously considered only in their relationship to the supreme creation, the image of God."⁵⁹ Simpson was adamant: "There is no fact in the history of life that requires a postulate of purpose external to the organisms themselves."⁶⁰ This is clearly a statement of religious faith. Simpson then asked: "Does this mean that religion is simply invalid from a scientific point of view, that the conflict is insoluble and one must choose one side or the other? I do not think so. Science can and does invalidate some views held to be religious. Whatever else God may be held to be, He is surely consistent with the world of observed phenomena in which we live. A god whose means of creation is not evolution is a false god."⁶¹ He thought that the world of observed phenomena—observed by us, today—automatically teaches historical evolution. It does, if you assume, a priori, that evolution is always true, and that every fact of the universe is in conformity with this dogma.

1. A Sleight-of-Hand Operation

Secular science has attempted a sleight-of-hand operation. Denying the existence of any transcendent conscious purpose, and denying even the scientific consideration of such a transcendent conscious purpose, secular scientists conclude that there is no authority above man to deflect man's conscious purposes. You cannot be a respectable scientist and assume transcendent purpose, since "postulating the transcendental always stultifies inquiry."⁶² Nature must first be depersonal-

59. Simpson, This View of Life, p. 7.

60. Ibid., p. 175.

61. Ibid., p. 232.

62. Ibid., p. 170.

ized.

As astronomy made the universe immense, physics itself and related physical sciences made it lawful. Physical effects have physical causes, and the relationship is such that when causes are adequately known effects can be reliably predicted. We no longer live in a capricious world. We may expect the universe to deal consistently, even if not fairly, with us. If the unusual happens, we need no longer blame kanaima (or a whimsical god or devil) but may look confidently for an unusual or hitherto unknown physical cause. That is, perhaps, an act of faith, but it is not superstition. Unlike recourse to the supernatural, it is validated by thousands of successful searches for verifiable causes. This view depersonalizes the universe and makes it more austere, but it also makes it dependable.⁶³

The depersonalization of nature was originally asserted in terms of a philosophy that proclaimed nature's autonomy. This autonomy for nature no longer will be permitted. Once man achieves his freedom from undesigned nature by means of his knowledge of nature's laws, he can then assert his autonomous sovereignty over nature (including, of course, other men). There are no conscious ends in the universe that can overcome the conscious purpose of the planning elite. There is no court of higher appeal. R. J. Rushdoony summarized this new cosmology very well:

Humanistic law, moreover, is inescapably totalitarian law. Humanism, as a logical development of evolutionary theory, holds fundamentally to a concept of an evolving universe. This is held to be an "open universe," whereas Biblical Christianity, because of its faith in the triune God and His eternal decree, is said to be a faith in a "closed universe." This terminology not only intends to prejudice the case; it reverses reality. The universe of evolutionism and humanism is a closed universe. There is no law, no appeal, no higher order, beyond and above the universe. Instead of an open window upwards, there is a closed cosmos. There is thus no ultimate law and decree beyond man and the universe. Man's law is therefore beyond criticism except by man. In practice, this means that the positive law of the state is absolute law. The state is the most powerful and most highly organized expression of humanistic man, and the state is the form and expression of humanistic law. Because there is no higher law of God as judge over the universe, over every human order, the law of the state is a closed system of law. There is no appeal beyond it. Man has no "right," no realm of justice, no source of law beyond the state, to which man can appeal against the state. Humanism therefore imprisons man within the closed world of the state and the closed universe of the evolutionary scheme.⁶⁴

63. Ibid., p. 5.

Simpson, one of the most prominent paleontologists of the mid-twentieth century, offered us this interpretation of man, the new sovereign: "Man is the highest animal. The fact that he alone is capable of making such a judgment is in itself part of the evidence that this decision is correct. . . . He is also a fundamentally new sort of animal and one in which, although organic evolution continues on its way, fundamentally a new sort of evolution has also appeared. The basis of this new sort of evolution is a new sort of heredity, the inheritance of learning."⁶⁵

2. The New Evolution

Simpson contrasted organic evolution, nature's non-teleological, random development of nonhuman species, with the new social evolution of mankind. "Organic evolution rejects acquired characters in inheritance and adaptively orients the essentially random, non-environmental interplay of genetical systems. The new evolution peculiar to man operates directly by the inheritance of acquired characters, of knowledge and learned activities which arise in and are continuously a part of an organismic-environmental system, that of social organization."⁶⁶ A new Lamarckianism, with its inheritance of acquired characteristics, has arisen; it has brought with it a legitimate teleology. Man, the product of nature, can at last provide what autonomous nature could not: conscious control. "Through this very basic distinction between the old evolution and the new, the new evolution becomes subject to conscious control. Man, alone among all organisms, knows that he evolves and he alone is capable of directing his own evolution. For him evolution is no longer something that happens to the organism regardless but something in which the organism may and must take an active hand."⁶⁷

64. Rushdoony, "Introduction" to E. L. Hebdon Taylor, The New Legality (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1967), pp. vi–vii. The text of this citation was incorrectly printed in Taylor's book and was later corrected by Mr. Rushdoony.

65. Simpson, The Meaning of Evolution: A Study of the History of Life and of Its Significance for Man (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1949] 1969), p. 286.

66. Ibid., p. 187.

67. Ibid., p. 291.

Man's control over future evolution is limited, of course. He cannot choose every direction of a new evolution, nor the rate of change. "In organic evolution he cannot decide what sort of mutation he would like to have,"⁶⁸ but he does have power, and therefore must make responsible decisions. "Conscious knowledge, purpose, choice, foresight, and values carry as an inevitable corollary responsibility."⁶⁹ Of course, we know that all ethics is relative, in fact, "highly relative."⁷⁰ "The search for an absolute ethic, either intuitive or naturalistic, has been a failure."⁷¹ There are no fixed ethical principles. "They become ethical principles only if man chooses to make them such."⁷² Man, the creative force behind today's evolution, becomes at the same time the creator and judge of his own ethics. "Man cannot evade the responsibility of choice."⁷³ Whatever the outcomes of our search for ethical principles, this much is certain: "The purposes and plans are ours, not those of the universe, which displays convincing evidence of their absence."⁷⁴ We are the new predestinators, the source of the universe's new teleology.

Man was certainly not the goal of evolution, which evidently had no goal. He was not planned, in an operation wholly planless. . . . His rise was neither insignificant nor inevitable. Man did originate after a tremendously long sequence of events in which chance and orientation played a part. Not all the chance favored his appearance, none might have, but enough did. Not all the orientation was in his direction, it did not lead unerringly human-ward, but some of it came this way. The result is the most highly endowed organization of matter that has yet appeared on the earth—and we certainly have no good reason to believe there is any higher in the universe.⁷⁵

Man proposes, and man, working with nature, also disposes.

H. Evolutionism's Sleight-of-Hand

The humanistic philosophy of Darwinism is an enormously successful sleight-of-hand operation. It has two primary steps. First, man

68. Idem.

69. Ibid., p. 310.

70. Ibid., p. 297.

71. Ibid., p. 311.

72. Idem.

73. Idem.

74. Ibid., p. 293.

75. Ibid., pp. 293–94.

must be defined as no more than an animal, the product of the same meaningless, impersonal, unplanned forces that produced all the forms of life. This axiom is necessary in order to free man completely from the concept of final judgment. Man must not be understood as a created being, made in God's image, and therefore fully responsible before God. Man is no more unique, and therefore no more responsible, than an amoeba. Second, man, once freed from the idea of a Creator, is immediately redefined as the unique life form in the universe. In short, he is and is not special, depending on which stage of the argument you consider.

1. Simpson on Teleology

Simpson provided the argumentation for both steps. First, man is just another life form.

This world into which Darwin led us is certainly very different from the world of the higher superstition. In the world of Darwin man has no special status other than his definition as a distinct species of animal. He is in the fullest sense a part of nature and not apart from it. He is akin, not figuratively but literally, to every living thing, be it an amoeba, a tapeworm, a flea, a seaweed, an oak tree, or a monkey—even though the degrees of relationship are different and we may feel less empathy for forty-second cousins like the tapeworms than for, comparatively speaking, brothers like the monkeys. This is togetherness and brotherhood with a vengeance, beyond the wildest dreams of copy writers or of theologians.⁷⁶

Man has not been favored in any way by the impersonal and directionless process of evolution through natural selection. "Moreover, since man is one of many millions of species all produced by the same grand process, it is in the highest degree improbable that anything in the world exists specifically for his benefit or ill. . . . The rational world is not teleological in the old sense."⁷⁷

Second, man is unquestionably teleological in the new sense—the post-Darwin sense. Nothing was designed by God to meet the needs of man, but because man is now the directing agent of evolution, he can take control over everything. Furthermore, he does not need to humble himself as a steward before God. All of the fruits of the meaningless universe are now man's, for he is the pinnacle, not of creation, ⁷⁶ Simpson, This View of Life, pp. 12–13.

⁷⁷ Ibid., p. 13.

but of evolution. Simpson moved to the second step of the argument a dozen pages later.

Man is one of the millions of results of this material process. He is another species of animal but not just another animal. He is unique in peculiar and extraordinarily significant ways. He is probably the most self-conscious of organisms, and quite surely the only one that is aware of his own origins, of his own biological nature. He has developed symbolization to a unique degree and is the only organism with true language. This makes him also the only animal who can store knowledge beyond individual capacity and pass it on beyond individual memory. He is by far the most adaptable of all organisms because he has developed culture as a biological adaptation. Now his culture evolves not distinct from and not in replacement of but in addition to biological evolution, which also continues.⁷⁸

He elaborated: "The evolutionary process is not moral—the word is simply irrelevant in that connection—but it has finally produced a moral animal. Conspicuous among his moral attributes is a sense of responsibility. . . . In the post-Darwinian world another answer seems fairly clear: man is responsible to himself and for himself. 'Himself' here means the whole human species, not only the individual and certainly not just those of a certain color of hair or cast of features."⁷⁹ Man, meaning collective man or species man, is sovereign. Individuals are responsible to this collective entity. Simpson made his position crystal clear.

Man is a glorious and unique species of animal. The species originated by evolution, it is still actively evolving, and it will continue to evolve. Future evolution could raise man to superb heights as yet hardly glimpsed, but it will not automatically do so. As far as can now be foreseen, evolutionary degeneration is at least as likely in our future as is further progress. The only way to ensure a progressive evolutionary future for mankind is for man himself to take a hand in the process. Although much further knowledge is needed, it is unquestionably possible for man to guide his own evolution (within limits) along desirable lines. But the great weight of the most widespread current beliefs and institutions is against even attempting such guidance. If there is any hope, it is this: that there may be an increasing number of people who face this dilemma squarely and honestly seek a way out.⁸⁰

78. Ibid., p. 24.

79. Ibid., p. 25.

80. Ibid., p. 285.

With these words, Simpson ended his book.

Are Simpson and Dobzhansky representative of post-Darwinian evolutionism? They are. It is difficult to find biologists who do not take this approach when they address themselves to these problems. Many, of course, remain silent, content to perform the most prosaic tasks of what Thomas Kuhn has called "normal science."⁸¹ When they speak out on the great questions of cosmology, however, their words are basically the same as Simpson's.

2. Thomas Huxley on Teleology

Thomas Huxley was one of those who began to make the case for step two. Darwin for the most part had been content to deal with step one, devoting himself to wrapping up the case for an anti-teleological universe, with its order-producing process of natural selection. Huxley, his contemporary and early defender, was ready to place man on the pinnacle of the evolutionary process. In his famous 1893 Romanes Lectures, "Evolution and Ethics," Huxley announced: "The history of civilization details the steps by which men have succeeded in building up an artificial world within the cosmos. Fragile reed as he may be, man, Pascal says, is a thinking reed: there lies within him a fund of energy, operating intelligently and so far akin to that which pervades the universe, that it is competent to influence and modify the cosmic process. In virtue of his intelligence, the dwarf bends the Titan to his will."⁸² Huxley was no optimist. He was convinced that eventually, the law of entropy would triumph.

If, for millions of years, our globe has taken the upward road, yet, some time, the summit will be reached and the downward route will be commenced. The most daring imagination will hardly venture upon the suggestion that the power and the intelligence of man can ever arrest the procession of the great year. . . . But, on the other hand, I see no limit to the extent to which intelligence and will, guided by sound principles of investigation and organized in common effort, may modify the conditions of existence, for a period longer than that now covered by history. And much may be done to change the nature of man himself.⁸³

81. Thomas Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1962] 1970), coined this phrase. For an extended discussion of Kuhn's important distinction between "normal science" and "revolutionary science," see Imre Lakatos [LakaTOSH] and A. E. Musgrave (eds.), Criticism and the Growth of Knowledge (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1970).

82. T. H. Huxley, "Evolution and Ethics," (1893), in Collected Essays, 9 vols. (London: Macmillan, 1893), IX, pp. 83–84.

When Huxley spoke of man, he meant collective man:

Further, the consummation is not reached in man, the mere animal; nor in man, the whole or half savage; but only in man, the member of an organized polity. And it is a necessary consequence of his attempt to live in this way; that is, under those conditions which are essential to the full development of his noblest powers. Man, the animal, in fact, has worked his way to the headship of the sentient world, and has become the superb animal which he is, in virtue of his success in the struggle for existence. The conditions having been of a certain order, man's organization has adjusted itself to them better than that of his competitors in the cosmic strife.⁸⁴

Huxley strongly opposed Social Darwinism, with its ethic of individualism and personal competition in a free market, which he referred to as "fanatical individualism."⁸⁵ He reminded his listeners of "the duties of the individual to the State. . . ."⁸⁶ We cannot look, he said, to the competitive processes of nature (meaning other species) as a guide for human social ethics and social organization, since "the ethical progress of society depends, not on imitating the cosmic process, still less in running away from it, but in combatting it."⁸⁷

I. The Theology of Self-Transcendence

Huxley's grandson, the biologist Sir Julian Huxley, delivered the Romanes lectures a half century after his grandfather had, in 1943. He attempted to reconcile the seeming dichotomy that his grandfather had presented, namely, the conflict between cosmic evolution and human ethics. He did so by focusing on the leap of being which man represents, a new evolutionary power that can direct the cosmic processes by means of his own science and values. In other words, he argued for continuity of evolutionary processes—a denial of any conflict between ethics and evolution—by stressing the radical discontinuity represented by man. The first great discontinuity was the appearance of life, which was Dobzhansky's assertion, too.⁸⁸ As life developed, "there in-

83. Ibid., p. 85.

84. Ibid., p. 92.

85. Ibid., p. 92.

86. Idem.

87. Idem.

88. Theodosius Dobzhansky, "The Present Evolution of Man," Scientific American (Sept. 1960), p. 206.

creased also the possibilities of control, of independence, of inner harmony and self-regulation, of experience.”⁸⁹ Animal brains made their advent. But then came nature’s crowning glory, man, meaning collective man. As he wrote, “during the last half-million years or so a new and more comprehensive type of order of organization has arisen; and on this new level, the world-stuff is once more introduced to altogether new possibilities, and has quite new methods of evolutionary operation at its disposal. Biological and organic evolution has at its upper end been merged into and largely succeeded by conscious social evolution.”⁹⁰ This, of course, is the second great discontinuity in the history of evolution.

1. The Order of Creation

Earlier, I argued that evolutionists have reversed the order of creation. Instead of affirming that a sovereign, autonomous, omnipotent personal God created the universe, they argue that a sovereign, autonomous, omnipotent, and impersonal universe has created a now-sovereign personal god, mankind. Julian Huxley took this argument one step further. He also abandoned uniformitarianism, the device by which God was supposedly shoved out of the universe. The slow time scale of cosmic evolution now speeds up, for it now has a planning agent directing it. The new god, mankind, has the power to speed up evolutionary processes, even as Christians have argued that God demonstrated His power over time in creating the world in six days.

With this, a new type of organization came into being—that of self-reproducing society. So long as man survives as a species (and there is no reason for thinking he will not) there seems to be no possibility for any other form of life to push up to this new organizational level. Indeed there are grounds for supposing that biological evolution has come to an end, so far as any sort of major advance is concerned. Thus further large-scale evolution has once again been immensely restricted in extent, being now it would seem confined to the single species man; but at the same time immensely accelerated in its speed, through the operation of the new mechanisms now available.⁹¹

89. Julian Huxley, “Evolutionary Ethics,” (1943), in T. H. Huxley and Julian Huxley, Touchstone for Ethics, 1893–1943 (New York: Harper & Bros., 1947), p. 13. Reprinted by Arno Press.

90. Ibid., pp. 133–34.

91. Ibid., p. 134.

Why should this be true? Because man has replaced genetic mutation (ordered by natural selection) with language, symbols, and writing. "The slow methods of variation and heredity are outstripped by the speedier processes of acquiring and transmitting experience."⁹² Therefore, "in so far as the mechanism of evolution ceases to be blind and automatic and becomes conscious, ethics can be injected into the evolutionary process."⁹³

2. Relativism and Statism

Huxley, predictably, argued for ethical relativism. There can be no "Absolute" ethics.⁹⁴ "The theologian and the moralist will be doing wrong so long as they cling to any absolute or unyielding certitude."⁹⁵ (We might ask the obvious questions: Would the "absolutizing" theologian or moralist always be wrong? Was Huxley absolutely certain of this?) In a later essay, Huxley criticized his grandfather's view of ethics as being too static.

We can now say that T. H. Huxley's antithesis between ethics and evolution was false, because based on a limited definition of evolution and a static view of ethics. . . . More than that, we perceive that ethics itself is an organ of evolution, and itself evolves. And finally, by adopting this dynamic or evolutionary point of view of ethics as something with a time-dimension, a process rather than a system, we obtain light on one of the most difficult but also most central problems of ethics—the relation between individual and social ethics, and perceive that the antithesis between the individual and society can also be reconciled.⁹⁶

Evolution means, above all, process—the ethics of historical relativism.

How can these two forms of ethics be reconciled? In his 1943 lecture, Huxley argued for the supremacy of individualistic ethics, since "it is clear on evolutionary grounds that the individual is in a real sense higher than the State or the social organism. . . . All claims that the State has an intrinsically higher value than the individual are false. They turn out, on closer scrutiny, to be rationalizations or myths aimed at securing greater power or privilege for a limited group which

92. Ibid., p. 135.

93. Idem.

94. Ibid., p. 129.

95. Ibid., p. 138.

96. Ibid., p. 217.

controls the machinery of the State.”⁹⁷ He delivered this speech during World War II, and he made certain that his audience knew where he stood. “Nazi ethics put the State above the individual.”⁹⁸ The Nazi method is against evolutionism “on the grounds of efficiency alone.”⁹⁹ All of a sudden, evolutionism’s ethics of relativism grew rock-hard: “Furthermore, its principles run counter to those guaranteed by universalist evolutionary ethics.”¹⁰⁰ The Nazis were doomed to fail, he concluded.

Four years later, in 1947, Huxley was calling for a one-world state. The atomic bomb had appeared, and civilization now had the possibility of destroying itself. (While the evolutionists never call thermonuclear holocaust “theocide,” this is what they mean: god can now commit suicide.) In short, “the separate regions of the world have, for the first time in history, shrunk politically into a single unit, though so far not an orderly but a chaotic one: and now the atomic bomb hangs with equal grimness over all parts of this infant commonwealth of man. . . . The threat of the atomic bomb is simple—unite or perish.”¹⁰¹ He went on:

So long as the human species is organized in a number of competing and sovereign nation-states, not only is it easy for a group to pick another group to serve as enemy, but it is in the group’s narrow and short-term interest that it should do so. . . . The specific steps which will have to be taken before we can reach this next stage of ethical evolution are somewhat various. There is first the practical step of discovering how to transfer some of the sovereign power of several nation-states of the world to a central organization. This has its counterpart in the moral world: for one thing, any practical success in this task will make it easier for men to abandon the tribalist ethics (for tribalist they still are, however magnified in scale) associated with the co-existence of competing social groups.¹⁰²

Even more strongly: “This is the major ethical problem of our time—to achieve global unity for man. . . . Present-day men and nations will

97. Ibid., pp. 138–39.

98. Ibid., p. 147.

99. Ibid., p. 148.

100. Idem. Huxley could resist taking a swing at the Old Testament for its exaltation of the idea of a special chosen people. “In this the Nazis merely translate into modern terms the ethics of tribes or peoples in an early barbarous phase of the world’s history, such as the ancient Hebrews before the prophetic period” (p. 147).

101. Ibid., p. 197.

102. Ibid., pp. 247–49.

be judged by history as moral or immoral according as to whether they have helped or hindered unification.”¹⁰³

3. A Unified God

Huxley provided documentation for Rushdoony’s assessment that “humanity is the true god of the Enlightenment and of French Revolutionary thought. In all religious faiths one of the inevitable requirements of logical thought asserts itself in the demand for the unity of the godhead. Hence, since humanity is a god, there can be no division in this godhead, humanity. Mankind must therefore be forced to unite.”¹⁰⁴ This is another reason why Rushdoony called the United Nations a religious dream.¹⁰⁵ Huxley confirmed this suspicion. Unity will advance mankind to the next stage of evolution. “I would suggest that the secondary critical point in human evolution will be marked by the union of all separate traditions in a single common pool, the orchestration of human diversity from competitive discord to harmonious symphony. Of what future possibilities beyond the human this may be the first foundation, who can say? But at least it will for the first time give full scope to man’s distinctive method of evolution, and open the door to many human potentialities that are as yet scarcely dreamed of.”¹⁰⁶ But who will lead the orchestra? He did not ask or say.

Huxley ended this book on evolutionary ethics with a statement quite similar to the one introducing this appendix: “Man the conscious microcosm has been thrown up by the blind and automatic forces of the unconscious macrocosm. But now his consciousness can begin to play an active part, and to influence the process of the macrocosm by guiding and acting as the growing-point of its evolution. Man’s ethics and his moral aspirations have now become an integral part of any fu-

103. Ibid., p. 255.

104. R. J. Rushdoony, This Independent Republic: Studies in the Nature and Meaning of American History (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1964] 2001), p. 130.

105. Rushdoony, “The United Nations: A Religious Dream,” in Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995), pp. 184–99. He wrote two other essays on the religious quest of the United Nations: “The United Nations,” in Rushdoony, The Nature of the American System (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1965] 2001), ch. 7, and “Has the U.N. Replaced Christ as a World Religion?” in Our Church: Their Target (Arlington, Virginia: Better Books, 1966), ch. 10.

106. Huxley, “Conclusion,” Touchstone for Ethics, p. 255. This is a quotation from an earlier book by Huxley, published by the United Nations’ Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO): The Prerequisites of Progress (Paris: Editions Fontaine, 1947).

ture evolutionary process.”¹⁰⁷

This theme became a familiar one in later books by Huxley. No statement is more forthright, however, than the opening chapter of his 1957 book, Knowledge, Morality, and Destiny, which he titled “Transhumanism.” “As a result of a thousand million years of evolution, the universe is becoming conscious of itself, able to understand something of its past history and possible future. This cosmic self-awareness is being realized in one tiny fragment of the universe—in a few of us human beings.”¹⁰⁸ Here is the combination of “Flyspeck Earth” and “man, the new predestinator.” There is nothing humble about residing on a tiny bit of dust in an immense universe, whether one is a Christian or an evolutionist. Huxley repeated the now-familiar theme: man as a leap of being. “For do not let us forget that the human species is as radically different from any of the microscopic single-celled animals that lived a thousand million years ago as they were from a fragment of stone or metal.”¹⁰⁹ He, too, affirmed that the two great discontinuities in the uniformitarian universe were the appearance of life and the appearance of man. Evolutionists use uniformitarianism to push God back to the pre-life past or into the post-life future, and to deny the six-day creation. They do not use uniformitarianism to refute these two great discontinuities.

4. A New Evolution

We are supposedly now at another great period of evolutionary discontinuity. A new era is about to dawn. “The new understanding of the universe has come about through the new knowledge amassed in the last hundred years—by psychologists, biologists, and other scientists, by archaeologists, anthropologists, and historians. It has defined man’s responsibility and destiny—to be an agent for the rest of the world in the job of realizing its inherent potentialities as fully as possible.”¹¹⁰ An amazing bit of luck for all of us, isn’t it? It took ten billion years to get from the “big bang” to the advent of life in the solar system. Then it took another 3.497 (or possibly 3.498) billion years to get from life’s origin (3.5 billion until about 300,000 years ago) to that second great cosmological discontinuity, man. And now, here we are,

107. Ibid., p. 257.

108. Julian Huxley, Knowledge, Morality, and Destiny (New York: Mentor Book, [1957] 1960), p. 13.

109. Idem.

110. Idem.

ready for stage three, the ascension of man to his position of universal power. If you had been born a Neanderthal man (let alone a brontosaurus), or even an eighteenth-century Philosophe, you would have missed it. Missed what? This:

It is as if man had been suddenly appointed managing director of the biggest business of all, the business of evolution—appointed without being asked if he wanted it, and without proper warning or preparation. What is more, he can't refuse the job. Whether he wants to or not, whether he is conscious of what he is doing or not, he is in point of fact determining the future direction of evolution on this earth. That is his inescapable destiny, and the sooner he realizes it and starts believing in it, the better for all concerned.¹¹¹

A new humanity is coming: "The human species can, if it wishes, transcend itself—not just sporadically, an individual here in one way, and an individual there in another way, but in its entirety, as humanity. We need a name for this new belief. Perhaps transhumanism will serve: man remaining man, but transcending himself, by realizing new possibilities of and for his human nature."¹¹²

In case readers fail to recognize this ancient heresy, it is called gnosticism. This, in turn, was simply a variation of the original sin, the desire of man to be as God, to transcend man's own creaturely limitations by seeking special knowledge. Adam sought the knowledge of good and evil. The gnostics, in the second and third centuries A.D. in Asia Minor and North Africa, sought mystical illumination. In the Middle Ages, alchemists sought self-transcendence through repetitive chemical rituals—the quest for the so-called "philosopher's stone," which was not simply a means of converting lead into gold, but a means of enabling the alchemist to transcend his own limits as a creature. It is not surprising, then, that with the rise of secular humanism—in the late-medieval and early modern periods, as well as today—has come occultism, sorcery, demonism, and the quest for mystical utopia, especially through the techniques of Eastern religion, which has always been evolutionary in philosophy.¹¹³ Humanism, whether Renaissance humanism or post-Darwinian humanism, is in league

111. Ibid., pp. 13–14.

112. Ibid., p. 17.

113. C. S. Lewis, The Abolition of Man (New York: Macmillan, [1947] 1967), pp. 87–89. Cf. Thomas Molnar, God and the Knowledge of Reality (New York: Basic Books, 1973); Frances Yates, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (New York: Vintage, [1964] 1969).

with occultism.¹¹⁴

5. Genetic Engineering

It would be unproductive to multiply citations of the evolutionists' sleight-of-hand operation. The Darwinists have used the dogma of cosmic purposelessness to free man from the constraints of biblical law and the threat of eternal judgment. Once freed from God, man is said to become the new predestinator. Dobzhansky, the Huxleys, Simpson, and others holding similar views have presented secular man with the humanists' version of the dominion covenant. Man is to conquer. With the discovery by Watson and Crick of the make-up of the DNA molecule, scientists are now in the process of creating new forms of life. The General Electric Company filed patents on one new life form, and an appeals court in 1979 upheld the firm's property right to this new species. The "gene splicers" are in our midst. Warnings are unlikely to stop the experimental mania of modern biological scientists. The technological imperative is too strong: "If it can be done, it must be done."¹¹⁵ The hope of profits also lures research firms into the field. Financial success, which is likely over the short run at least, will bring in the competition. Recombinant DNA, the tool of the "gene splicers," discovered in 1973, has opened a true Pandora's box of moral, intellectual, medical, and legal problems.¹¹⁶ As one popular book on the subject warned: "'Man the engineer' may soon become 'man the engineered.'"¹¹⁷ The authors went on to cite recent statements by biological scientists that are in line with everything that has been said since the days of Thomas Huxley.

Over these past three billion years, one hundred million species have existed on this planet. Of those, ninety-eight million are now extinct. Among the two million that remain today, only one, Homo sapiens ("wise man"), has evolved to the point of being able to harness and control its own evolutionary future. Many biologists welcome this possibility, seeing it as a great challenge that will ennoble and preserve our species. "Modern progress in microbiology and genetics suggests that man can outwit extinction through genetic en-

114. Gary North, Unholy Spirits: Occultism and New Age Humanism (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/gnoccultism>)

115. The idea of the technological imperative is the foundation of the critical book by Jacques Ellul, The Technological Society (New York: Vintage [1964] 1967).

116. John Lear, Recombinant DNA: The Untold Story (New York: Crown, 1978).

117. Jeremy Rifkin and Ted Howard, Who Should Play God? (New York: Dell, 1977), p. 14.

gineering,” argues Cal Tech biologist James Bonner. “Genetic change is not basically immoral. It takes place all the time, naturally. What man can do, however, is to make sure that these changes are no longer random in the gigantic lottery in nature. . . . Instead, he can control the changes to produce better individuals.” Bonner’s viewpoint is seconded by Dr. Joseph Fletcher, professor of Medical Ethics at the University of Virginia School of Medicine, who sees in genetic engineering the fulfillment of our cosmic role on earth. “To be men,” he believes, “we must be in control. That is the first and last ethical word.” Promises a third scientist, our newly developed eugenic potential will lead humanity to “a growth of social wisdom and glorious survival-toward the evolution of a kind of superman.”¹¹⁸

The book is well titled: Who Should Play God?

J. Darwin’s Intellectual Revolution

What a magnificent sleight-of-hand operation the defenders of evolution and humanism have accomplished! First, the universe was depersonalized. Darwin put it very forcefully: “It has been said that I speak of natural selection as an active power or Deity; but who objects to an author speaking of the attraction of gravity as ruling the movement of the planets? Everyone knows what is meant and implied by such metaphorical expressions; and they are almost necessary for brevity. So again it is difficult to avoid personifying the word Nature; but I mean by Nature, only the aggregate action and product of many natural laws, and bylaws the sequence of events as ascertained by us.”¹¹⁹ God was shoved out of the universe, leaving only humble man, whose power seems to be limited to “ascertaining laws,” which are the sequence of events observed by us.

Second, man was reduced to being a mere cog in a mighty machine, not the representative of an infinite God, governing the earth as a subordinate in terms of the dominion covenant. A few paragraphs later, Darwin wrote: “How fleeting are the wishes and efforts of man! how short his time! and consequently how poor will be his results, compared with those accumulated by Nature during the whole geological periods! Can we wonder, then, that Nature’s productions should be far 'truer' in character than man's productions; that they should be infinitely better adapted to the most complex conditions of life, and should plainly bear the stamp of higher workmanship?"¹²⁰ Not the higher workmanship of the God of the Bible or even the deistic god of Paley's Natural Theology, man is the "higher workmanship" of plan-less, meaningless, "random, yet cause-and-effect-governed" geological and biological process.

118. Ibid., p. 21. See also Michael Rogers, Biohazard (New York: Knopf, 1977); June Goodfield, Playing God: Genetic Engineering and the Manipulation of Life (New York: Random House, 1977); Nicholas Wade, The Ultimate Experiment: Man-Made Evolution (New York: Walker & Walker, 1977).

119. Charles Darwin, Origin of Species, ch. 4; in The Origin of Species and the Descent of Man (New York: Modern Library edition), p. 64.

Third, evolutionists added a purposeful, meaning-providing conscious agent to this "random, yet cause-and-effect-governed," previously impersonal process. Darwin gave the intellectual game away in the concluding paragraph of The Descent of Man (second edition, 1874): "Man may be excused for feeling some pride at having risen, though not through his own exertions, to the very summit of the organic scale; and the fact of his having thus risen, instead of having been aboriginally placed there, may give him hope for a still higher destiny in the distant future."¹²¹ But not so distant a future after all! In 1957, Sir Julian Huxley concluded: "Assuredly the concept of man as instrument and agent of the evolutionary process will become the dominant integrator of all ideas about human destiny, and will set the pattern of our general attitude to life. It will replace the idea of man as the Lord of Creation, as the puppet of blind fate, or as the willing or unwilling subject of a Divine Master."¹²²

Man had lowly origins, but man is now the source of direction and meaning for the evolutionary process. This is Darwin's intellectual legacy. As he concluded The Descent of Man, "We must, however, acknowledge, as it seems to me, that man with all his noble qualities, with sympathy which feels for the most debased, with benevolence which extends not only to other men but to the humblest living creature, with his god-like intellect which has penetrated into the movements and constitution of the solar system—with all these exalted powers—Man still bears in his bodily frame the indelible stamp of his lowly origin."¹²³ Notice that Darwin chose to capitalize the word "man" in his final reference to this exalted being, as befits the name of one's deity. Man is no longer the image of God, but the image of apes, pre-apes, amoebae, and meaningless cosmic process. Still, he has this "god-like intellect," which shows sympathy and benevolence. He is

120. Ibid., p. 66.

121. Ibid., p. 920.

122. Julian Huxley, Knowledge, Morality, and Destiny, p. 54.

123. Darwin, op. cit., p. 920.

therefore “exalted.” But lowly, always the product of humble origins. In fact, it is precisely man’s humble, impersonal origins that provide him with his credentials of being the sole source of cosmic meaning.

There is no one higher than man, for there is no one—no self-aware Creator—who preceded man. Anyone who is not familiar with this monumental sleight-of-hand operation may fail to grasp this, the single most important intellectual transformation in the heart and soul of the religion of humanism. Marxism was an important subordinate stream in this intellectual transformation, but by the late twentieth century, few people outside of a handful of Western intellectuals really believed in the tenets of original Marxism. They may well have believed in exercising power in the name of the Marxist intellectual heritage, but the priests, no less than the laymen, had lost faith in the old dogma. They had not abandoned faith in Darwin’s dogma.

In 1959, Hermann J. Muller could write that The Origin of Species “was undoubtedly the greatest scientific book of all time . . . The result has been that this revolutionary view of life now stands as one of the most firmly established generalizations of science. . . .”¹²⁴ It is a religion, as Muller’s words indicate: “We dare not leave it to the Soviets alone to offer to their rising generation the inspiration that is to be gained from the wonderful world view opened up by Darwin and other Western biologists.”¹²⁵ On both sides of the Iron Curtain, the priest-hoods were enlisting the faithful, offering them salvation by means of evolution. This is a religion that supposedly will provide meaning, and the objections of anti-evolutionists must be stifled for the sake of the masses: “The history of living things, and its interpretation, can be made a fascinating story that will give our young people a strong sense of the meaning of life, not only for plants and animals in general, but for mankind in particular, and for them themselves. . . . We have no more right to starve the masses of our youth intellectually and emotionally because of the objections of the uninformed than we have a right to allow people to keep their children from being vaccinated and thus endanger the whole community physically.”¹²⁶ Statement after statement like this one can be found in the extraordinarily revealing book, Darwin: A Norton Critical Edition (1970).

124. Hermann J. Muller, “One Hundred Years Without Darwinism Are Enough,” The Humanist, XIX (1959); reprinted in Philip Appleman (ed.), Darwin: A Norton Critical Edition, p. 545.

125. Idem.

126. Ibid., p. 547.

The humility of post-Darwin humanists is a myth—a myth fostered by them, and one which has its roots in Darwin's own sleight-of-hand operation. Anyone who thinks that man was anything but elevated by Darwinism has deluded himself. He has swallowed only the first bit of bait tossed to him by the Darwinians. There was more to come.

Thomas Huxley, Darwin's first great promoter and Sir Julian's grandfather, could write about earth, "the speck," or the supposed fact that man is not the "centre of the living world, but one amidst endless modifications of life,"¹²⁷ but this was (and is) part of an enormous deception. Consider the words of Philip Handler, who was the president of the National Academy of Sciences in 1976. He delivered this speech to the General Assembly of the International Council of Scientific Unions, so it was not intended to be too off-beat, too radical, or too embarrassing to its author. You will not find his view of man's role particularly long on humility.

How very privileged we are—we who have lived through the last half-century of science, that historic few decades in which the mind of man first came really to understand the nature of the atomic nucleus; first learned the history of our planet and identified the forces that continue to refigure its surface, the habitat of our species; the time when man's mind first engaged the immense sweep and grandeur of the cosmos in what we believe to be its true dimensions; the time when our species commenced upon the physical exploration of the solar system. Ours is the fortunate generation that, for the first time, came to understand the essential aspects of the marvelous phenomenon which is life, a phenomenon describable only in the language of chemistry; came to understand the mechanisms that have operated over the eons of biological evolution. In short, ours may well be the first generation that knows what we are and where we are. That knowledge permitted the acquisition of new capabilities whereby we utilize an extraordinary assemblage of synthetic materials, each created for a specific purpose, whereby we manipulate our environment, communicate, move about, protect our health, avoid pain and even extend the power of our own intellects. . . . In a historic sense, the scientific endeavor began only yesterday, yet we have come a wondrous distance from our primeval ignorance in so short a time. . . .¹²⁸

127. Thomas H. Huxley, "On Improving Natural Knowledge" (1866), Collected Works, I, p. 39.

128. Philip Handler, "Science and Hope," Science: A Resource for Mankind, Proceedings of the National Academy of Science, Bicentennial Symposium (Oct. 10–14,

This remarkable testimony of a prominent biologist's faith was published in The Washington Post (Dec. 22, 1976), the most widely read newspaper in the political capital of the United States.

Evolution is the religion of modern humanism. It was also the religion of ancient humanism. The explanation is different evolution by natural selection—but the religion's really important dogma has not been changed significantly since the primary version was presented to mankind by Satan: We shall be as gods (Gen. 3:5).

K. Fictional Science, Science Fiction

One of occultism's universal themes is the appearance of a new creation, some sort of positive human mutation.¹²⁹ But do serious scientists take this vision very seriously? Some do, as indicated by their explicit statements concerning recombinant DNA and genetic engineering. Another bit of evidence appeared in The Wall Street Journal (Sept. 10, 1979), on the back page. An expensive advertisement was run by Pertec Computer Corporation, apparently some sort of "public service" advertisement. It featured a photograph of America's most prolific author, Dr. Isaac Asimov, who had written over 200 books at the time the ad appeared.¹³⁰ He held a Ph.D. in biochemistry, but he was more famous for his science fiction stories and his popularizations of modern natural science. During one period of 100 months, Asimov turned out 100 books. He did all his own typing (90 words a minute), almost every day, for most of the day. He has at least one book in nine of the ten Dewey decimal classification categories. He did not write a book on philosophy. In short, he was no raving lunatic. The advertisement read: "Will computers take over?"

Asimov addressed the question of computer intelligence. Could computers ever become more intelligent than men? Asimov's answer: the knowledge stored by a computer is not the same as man's knowledge. They are two separate developments. "The human brain evolved by hit-and-miss, by random mutations, making use of subtle chemical changes, and with a forward drive powered by natural selection and by the need to survive in a particular world of given qualities and dangers. The computer brain is evolving by deliberate design as the result of careful human thought, making use of subtle electrical charges, and with a forward drive powered by technological advancement and the need to serve particular human requirements.” From the “hit-and-miss” random evolution of man’s brain, to man the battling and planning survivor, to the forward-driven computer (impersonal, purposeless mechanism, to purposeful organic agent, to personalized mechanism): here is the standard, post-Darwin account. But Asimov blazed new trails. The two forms of intelligence are too different to be compared on the same scale. We cannot make such comparisons. We must keep the systems distinct. Each should specialize. “This would be particularly true if genetic engineering was deliberately used to improve the human brain in precisely those directions in which the computer is weak.” We must avoid wasteful duplication he said.

1976), pp. 12–13. (<http://bit.ly/HandlerHope>)

129. Cf. Gary North, Unholy Spirits, ch. 10.

130. Time (Feb. 26, 1979).

Consequently the question of “taking over” need never arise. What we might see, instead, would be symbiosis or complementation, human brain and computer working together, each supplying what the other lacks, forming an intelligence pair that would be greater than either could be alone, an intelligence pair that would open new horizons, not now imaginable, and make it possible to achieve new heights, not now dreamed of. In fact, the union of brains, human and human-made, might serve as the doorway through which human beings could emerge from their isolated childhood into their combination adulthood.

The advertisement sold no product and did not instruct him to clip a coupon or take any sort of action. It simply offered a message—a message of a new evolution.

The same theme is found in the first Star Trek movie, released in December of 1979. The movie’s science advisor was Asimov. The movie is about a future space ship crew that confronts an unimaginably powerful intelligence. This intelligence turns out to be an enormous machine, one which had been built by a civilization run entirely by machines. It literally knows everything in the universe, yet it is traveling back to earth to seek the “Creator” and to join with the “Creator” in a metaphysical union (Eastern mysticism). The machine is perfectly rational, totally devoid of feeling, and is a “child” at the very beginning of its evolution. It turns out that the center of the machine’s guidance system is a centuries-old United States space probe, the Voyager, which had been sent into space to seek knowledge and send back that knowledge to earth. Hence, the “Creator” was man. The movie ends when an officer of the crew joins in metaphysical union with the machine, along with a mechanical robot built by the machine—a robot that duplicated his ex-lover. The officer, the female robot, and the enormous machine then disappear. Science officer Spock, a human-Vulcan genius—a mutant product of two races—announces that a new being has just evolved from the fusion of man, man-made machinery, machinery-made machinery, and a machine-made robot that is “almost human” (actually, Deltan, whatever the planet Delta produces; the lady had a shaved head to match her vow of chastity). Spock, a cult figure from the mid-1960s through the next 45 years, who had been seeking total rationalism (his Vulcan side) to the exclusion of feeling (his human side), now is content to remain with the humans on board the Starship Enterprise, apparently satisfied with his somewhat schizophrenic mind-emotion dualism. And why not? He had seen the perfectly rational (the huge machine), and it had been lonely, seeking its “Creator.” To make the next evolutionary step, it required fusion with mankind. Spock, with his pointed ears and his computer-like brain, is as close to that next evolution as any Vulcan-human could ever hope for. The movie, based on a popular television series of the late 1960s, immediately attracted ticket buyers among the millions of “trekkies,” their cult-like fans.

If Asimov’s vision does not border on the occult, what does? If the message of that computer company’s advertisement and the Star Trek movie does not represent a religious position, what else should we call such a message? Science? Science fiction? “Mere” entertainment? Or a combination of all three, which in addition is also a religion?

L. Christian Orthodoxy vs. Process Philosophy

Readers may think that I am belaboring a point, but this point is crucial for understanding the confessional foundation of modern humanism. Charles Darwin created an intellectual revolution. That intellectual revolution still affects us. He did not simply provide interesting new evidence concerning historical geology or biological reproduction; he created a new world-and-life view. It was this new perspective on man’s origins, not the factual data, that made Darwin’s Origin of Species an instant best-seller. The clergy in Darwin’s day recognized the threat to the biblical world-and-life view which was posed by the Origin. As Philip Appleman observed:

Theologians worried because they saw, perhaps more clearly than others, the philosophical implications of post-Darwinian thought. It was not just that Darwin had complicated the reading of Genesis, or even that he had furnished impressive scientific authority for the nineteenth-century habit of thinking in terms of wholes and continuities rather than in discrete parts and rigidities; or that the evolutionary orientation stressed context and complexity—though all of these influences could be bothersome when used by “materialists.” The worst threat of all was that Darwin’s universe operated not by Design but by natural selection, a self-regulating mechanism. . . . Natural selection pictured the world in a constant process of change, but without any prior intention of going anywhere in particular or of becoming anything in particular. This was a devastating proposition to the conventional theologian—more so, perhaps, than the Copernican theory had been, because it struck so close to home. Natural selection therefore seemed, to many, hopelessly negative, fraught with blasphemy and conducive of despair.¹³¹

This despair was initially covered over by optimism concerning the power of man to take over the direction of the evolutionary process, an optimism that still survives, though not without fear and foreboding on the part of some scientists and philosophers.

So it made a difference to philosophers and theologians that man not only evolved, but evolved by natural selection rather than by a vital force or cosmic urge of some sort. Darwinism seemed uncompromisingly non-teleological, non-vitalist, and non-finalist, and that basic fact could not help but affect the work of philosophers. “Once man was swept into the evolutionary orbit,” Bert James Lowenberg has written, “a revolution in Western thought was initiated. Man was seen to be a part of nature, and nature was seen to be a part of man. The Darwinian revolution was not a revolution in science alone; it was a revolution in man’s conception of himself and in man’s conception of all his works.”¹³²

Appleman chronicled the decline in the opposition to Darwinism on the part of Roman Catholics and other theologians. “The activities of science, relentlessly pushing back the margins of the unknown, have in effect been forcing the concept of ‘God’ into a perpetual retreat into the still-unknown, and it is in this condition that ‘God’ has frequently come to have meaning for modern man.”¹³³

The modern evolutionist is a defender of a concept of process that removes God and His control from the universe, so that man and

131. Philip Appleman, “Darwin: On Changing the Mind,” Epilogue in Appleman (ed.), Darwin, pp. 636–37.

132. Ibid., p. 637.

133. Ibid., pp. 638–39.

man's sovereignty can be substituted for the supposedly nonexistent God. Meaningless process is the evolutionist's god of origins. Only when a meaningful God who created the universe in terms of His eternal, unchanging decree is finally removed from our thought processes, can our thought processes take control of all other processes, the modern evolutionist argues. Evolutionary process is the humanist's god of origins, a god whose crucial purpose for man is to remove from the question of origins any concept of purpose. Man's monopoly of cosmic purpose is supposedly assured as a direct result of the non-purposeful origins of the universe. This is why Rushdoony took such pains to contrast process philosophy and creationism.¹³⁴

It is revealing to read the attempted refutation of Rushdoony written by a self-proclaimed orthodox Christian geologist (who argued for a 4.6 billion-year-old earth).¹³⁵ He had no understanding of what process philosophy is and how Darwinism promotes it. "Rushdoony's fears are unfounded. An affirmation of process in itself certainly does not constitute an attack on the sovereignty of God. Scripture reveals in [sic] the sovereignty of God in history, in day-to-day affairs, in the ordinary rising and setting of the sun. Process is going on all about us

134. R. J. Rushdoony, The Mythology of Science (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1967] 2001), pp. 53–54, 85. Process philosophy, which is basic to all evolutionary systems, leads inescapably into relativism. The implicit relativism of evolutionism cannot be reconciled with the implicit authoritarianism of the biblical doctrine of creation. Rushdoony's discussion of evolutionism is fundamental: "In this concept, being is evolving and is in process. Because being is in process, and being is seen as one and undivided, truth itself is tentative, evolving, and without finality. Since being has not yet assumed a final form, since the universe is in process and not yet a finished product, truth itself is in process and is continually changing. A new movement or 'leap of being' can give a man a new truth and render yesterday's truth a lie. But, in an order created by a perfect, omnipotent, and totally self-conscious Being, God, truth is both final, specific, and authoritative. God's word can then be, and is inevitably, infallible, because there is nothing tentative about God himself. Moreover, truth is ultimately personal, because the source, God, is personal, and truth becomes incarnate in the person of Jesus Christ and is communicated to those who believe in Him. Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior, as the way, the truth, and the life, is also the Christian principle of continuity. The Christian doctrine, therefore, involved a radical break with the pagan doctrine of continuity of being and with the doctrine of chaos. It also involved a break with the other aspect of the dialectic, the pagan, rationalistic concept of order. Order is not the work of autonomous and developing gods and men but rather the sovereign decree of the omnipotent God. This faith freed man from the sterile autonomy which made him the helpless prisoner of Fate, or the relentless workings of a blind order." Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), pp. 151–52.

135. Davis A. Young, Creation and the Flood: An Alternative to Flood Geology and Theistic Evolution (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1977), p. 87.

now, and God is every whit as sovereign as He was in the creation."¹³⁶

Exactly what kind of creation did Dr. Young have in mind? A creation in which the sun, moon, and stars were created after the earth? Not necessarily.¹³⁷ The six-day creation? No, because "we have no human interpretation of Genesis 1 that is infallible."¹³⁸ A view of Genesis 1 which says that Adam and Eve were created on the sixth day? No, because the genealogies in the Bible do not tell us enough to say that man is only a few thousand years old.¹³⁹ "On the basis of these considerations it is probably virtually impossible for the Christian to identify, from the fossil record, the time when special creation occurred."¹⁴⁰ In short, he asserted, everything the Bible says is indeterminate with respect to chronological time. Therefore, he continued to use the 4.6 billion-year-old date as his operating presupposition, thereby providing himself with full acceptability within the state university faculty of secular humanists where he was employed. If he believed otherwise, he would have had to give up that work which he has chosen as his profession, namely, providing explanations for the hypothetically one-billion-year-old rocks. He said as much: "If Scripture really does teach unequivocally that the universe was miraculously created in 144 hours a few thousands of years ago, then I, as a Christian geologist, will be willing to stop scientific interpretation of the supposedly one-billion-year-old rocks of northern New Jersey which I have been studying for the past several years. Obviously my only task now is to describe those rocks and to find valuable resources in them. If the mature creationist interpretation of Genesis 1 is correct, I am wasting my time talking about magmas and metamorphism inasmuch as these rocks were created instantaneously in place."¹⁴¹

Those of us who, like myself, believe in the Bible's narrative of a six-day creation, must conclude that Dr. Young did indeed waste his time by studying those rocks in terms of a uniformitarian presupposition. He also used money confiscated from me by the state of North Carolina, where Dr. Young taught when I lived there. The state used my money to hire Dr. Young to indoctrinate students with uniformitarianism. Dr. Young then wrote an intellectual defense of his uniformitarian faith, so that other Christians might be convinced! Confiscated

136. Ibid., p. 49.

137. Ibid., pp. 128–29.

138. Ibid., p. 133.

139. Ibid., p. 151.

140. Ibid., p. 155.

141. Ibid., p. 82.

tax dollars were promoting Dr. Young's professional religion, uniformitarianism. (His professed religion has been compromised by his professional, academic religion. He later taught at Calvin College.)

We must not be naive. The uniformitarian interpretation of geological processes is a religion. It has led to a more consistent religion, that of evolution through natural selection. The god of uniformitarian, meaningless, directionless process was created by nineteenth-century humanists and compromising Christian geologists—whose intellectual and spiritual heirs are still publishing books—in order to provide an explanation of this world which did not require full allegiance to the plain teaching of Genesis 1. The god of uniformitarian geology, whose high priest was Charles Lyell, metamorphosed (evolved?) into a far stronger deity, the god of evolution through natural selection. Charles Darwin became the founder and high priest of this new god, whose kingdom is the whole academic and scientific world. Finally, Darwin's god of meaningless process has developed into the modern god, mankind, who will take over the operations of evolutionary process.

Anyone who fails to recognize the satanic nature of uniformitarianism's process divinity is hopelessly naive, for it is this divinity who has torn the eternal decree of God from the presuppositions of modern man, leaving man with only random process, or man-directed tyrannical process, to comfort him. Christians cannot afford to be hopelessly naive, even if this self-imposed naiveté is their justification for remaining on the faculties of state university geology or biology departments. The price of such naiveté is still too high, for them and for their equally naive Christian readers, who do not recognize a theological battle when they see it.

M. Social Darwinism: Phase I

The social philosophers of the late nineteenth century grappled with the same fundamental intellectual problems that faced the biologists. What is the nature of evolution? Is the species Homo sapiens governed by the same laws as those governing other species? Is "survival of the fittest" a law applying to mankind? If so, in what ways? Is competition primarily individualistic—man vs. man, man vs. environment—or primarily collectivist, with mankind as a united species seeking to conquer all other opponents for the domination of the external world?

There is no question concerning the existence of purpose. The economists and sociologists of the late nineteenth century, no less than those of the twenty-first, accepted the reality of human purpose. Like today's professional social thinkers, the leading defenders of the "new evolutionism" were often atheists and agnostics, in their methodology certainly, and usually also in their private beliefs. They did not rely on grandiose concepts of cosmic purpose. Man's purpose was sufficient to explain human cause and effect. But the word "man" posed a major problem: Was collective man, meaning mankind, the proper focus of concern, or was the individual man the source of purpose? Are we to speak of some sort of overarching purpose of man the species, or should we be content to explain the workings of political economy in terms of multiple individualistic purposes? Is our methodology to be holistic or individualistic? Are we to proclaim the sovereignty of "man, the purposeful, planning individual" or "man, the purposeful, planning species"? Are we talking about the survival of the fittest species, or about the survival of the fittest individuals within a particular species? Can we speak of the survival of the fittest species without stating the conditions for the survival of the most fit individuals within the species? What, in other words, is meant by "fit"?

1. Right-Wing Social Darwinism

The Social Darwinists of the late nineteenth century, led by the British sociologist-philosopher Herbert Spencer and Yale University's sociologist William Graham Sumner, focused on the individual. Individual action is primary, they said. Individuals have purposes; collective wholes do not. Sumner stated the case for individual rights in his book, What Social Classes Owe to Each Other (1883):

The notion of civil liberty which we have inherited is that of a status created for the individual by laws and institutions, the effect of which is that each man is guaranteed the use of all his own powers exclusively for his own welfare. It is not at all a matter of elections, or universal suffrage, or democracy. All institutions are to be tested by the degree to which they guarantee liberty. It is not to be admitted for a moment that liberty is a means to social ends, and that it may be impaired for major considerations. Anyone who so argues has lost his bearing and relation of all the facts and factors in a free state. A human being has a life to live, a career to run. He is a centre of powers to work, and of capacities to suffer.¹⁴²

142. William Graham Sumner, What Social Classes Owe to Each Other (Caldwell, Idaho: Caxton, [1883] 1952), p. 30. (<http://bit.ly/SumnerSC>)

His conclusion was straightforward: "It is not at all the function of the state to make men happy. They must make themselves happy in their own way, and at their own risk."¹⁴³

As a Darwinist, Sumner believed in the survival of the fittest. (Spencer had coined the phrase in 1852.) Sumner criticized social reformers who believed that the civil government should intervene to help the weak and defenseless members of society. "They do not perceive, furthermore, that if we do not like the survival of the fittest, we have only one possible alternative, and that is the survival of the unfittest. The former is the law of civilization; the latter is the law of anti-civilization. We have our choice between the two, or we can go on, as in the past, vacillating between the two, but a third plan—the socialist desideratum—a plan for nourishing the unfittest and yet advancing in civilization, no man will ever find."¹⁴⁴

Spencer was so worried about the survival of the least fit that he questioned even private charity, although he accepted the legitimacy of such charity, because its alternative—allowing the poor to reproduce their kind without guidance from those giving the charity—frightened him. As he said, "the problem seems insoluble."¹⁴⁵ There is only one possible answer: suffering. We cannot alleviate the misery of the poor in general. "Each new effort to mitigate the penalties on improvidence, has the inevitable effect of adding to the number of the improvident."¹⁴⁶ Charity leads to more mouths to feed.

Having, by unwise institutions, brought into existence large numbers who are unadapted to the requirements of social life, and are consequently sources of misery to themselves and others, we cannot repress and gradually diminish this body of relatively worthless people without inflicting much pain. Evil has been done and the penalty must be paid. Cure can come only through affliction. The artificial assuaging of distress by state appliances, is a kind of social opium eating, yielding temporary mitigation at the eventual cost of intenser misery.¹⁴⁷

Ultimately, it would be best even to eliminate private charity. "If

143. Ibid., p. 31.

144. Sumner, cited by Richard Hofstadter, Social Darwinism in American Thought, rev. ed. (New York: George Braziller, 1959), p. 57.

145. Herbert Spencer, The Principles of Ethics (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Classics, [1897] 1978), II, p. 409.

146. Ibid., II, p. 408.

147. Ibid., II, p. 409.

left to operate in all its sternness, the principle of the survival of the fittest, which, as ethically considered, we have seen to imply that each individual shall be left to experience the effects of his own nature and consequent conduct, would quickly clear away the degraded."¹⁴⁸

Through the competition of individuals in a free market, the greatest possible output will be achieved, and this leads to greater wealth for those who survive, as well as greater strength for the species as a whole. Social Darwinism did not argue that there is not purpose in the universe, or that individuals do not belong to a species. Through voluntary cooperation in production, the division of labor increases each participant's wealth. Yet the higher a species, the more an individual member must live in terms of his own production and skills.¹⁴⁹ Man cannot escape this law of nature, Spencer wrote.

Of man, as of all inferior creatures, the law by conformity to which the species is preserved, is that among adults the individuals best adapted to the conditions of their existence shall prosper most, and that the individuals least adapted to the conditions of their existence shall prosper least—a law which, if uninterfered with, entails the survival of the fittest, and the spread of the most adapted varieties. And as before so here, we see that, ethically considered, this law implies that each individual ought to receive the benefits and the evils of his own nature and consequent conduct: neither being prevented from having whatever good his actions normally bring to him, nor allowed to shoulder off on to other persons whatever ill is brought to him by his actions.¹⁵⁰

This is the methodological individualism of right-wing Social Darwinism.

Right-wing Social Darwinists had to assume that there is a relationship between the prosperity of the productive individual and the prosperity of the species. In other words, the prosperity of the effective competitor leads to an increase of strength for the species. One obvious and troublesome exception seems to be success at offensive warfare, where the most courageous and dedicated men wind up killing each other, leaving the cowards and weaklings to return home to reproduce. Spencer realized this and specifically denied that offensive wars are a productive form of intra-species competition.¹⁵¹ On the

148. Ibid., II, p. 408.

149. Ibid., II, p. 278.

150. Ibid., II, p. 33.

151. Ibid., II, pp. 37–39.

whole, though, individuals who compete successfully will be able to take the society along with them. The human race therefore ensures its survival by permitting the full competition of all its members. The one (society) is strengthened by the continual competition of its parts (individuals). This is the message of Darwin, which the Social Darwinists asked late nineteenth-century readers to believe.

This faith involved confidence in the integrating capacity of the free market. The “cut-throat” competition of individuals leads to social progress. Men need capital to equip them for the battle against nature, Sumner said. Capital is man’s great tool of survival.

Undoubtedly the man who possesses capital has a great advantage over the man who has no capital, in the struggle for existence. . . . This does not mean that the one man has an advantage against the other, but that, when they are rivals in the effort to get the means of subsistence from Nature, the one who has capital has immeasurable advantages over the other. If it were not so, capital would not be formed. Capital is only formed by self-denial, and if the possession of it did not secure advantages and superiorities of a high order, men would never submit to what is necessary to get it.¹⁵²

This sounds plausible, until you realize that the disadvantaged man is, in fact, in direct competition for scarce resources, and if one man gets more of nature’s goods out of the earth, then in some circumstances, his neighbor may be harmed (e.g., in a drought, when only one man can buy water, or in a famine, when only one of them can buy food). Since the neighbor is also a part of impersonal nature, then one aspect of man’s struggle with nature is the defeat of his neighbor in the struggle for limited resources. Why, then, should we be so confident in the law of the survival of the fittest? Can we say for sure that the inheritors of the rich man’s capital will use it for the survival of the species, in the same way that evolutionists argue that the heirs of a successful mutant amoeba will have a better chance of surviving? Even here, is it really the original species that survives, or is the mutant a stepping stone in a new development which will not benefit the non-mutant original species? May not the mutant subspecies wipe out the original species in the competition for survival? Isn’t that precisely what the survival of the fittest is all about—not the survival of species, but survival of mutant or genetically better equipped members of a particular species?

152. Sumner, Social Classes, p. 66–67.

2. Deceiving the Victims

Let us consider an impossibility. What if the members of some lower species a billion years ago recognized the advent of a mutant member? The original members see that the newcomer possesses certain genetic advantages which will enable it to compete more successfully for the limited supply of food, shelter, and space. It will pick off the most desirable females (if it is male). Its progeny will survive, while the progeny of the original members of the older “about-to-be-superseded” population will be less likely to survive. The new tribe member, with its mutant genes, is the first representative of a somewhat different future species. After all, that is what evolution is all about.

The members of the older species recognize that whatever comes out of the “loins” of the mutant a million years or billion years down the evolutionary road, the heirs will not be the same species. In fact, if such an heir walked down the path right now, it would be regarded by everyone in the community as an enemy, dangerously different, and fit to be killed in the competition. In short, what would be the most rational response of the original members of the species? Wouldn’t the smart thing be the immediate execution of the mutant, that herald of a conquering alien race, that emissary of future foreign conquerors?

The modern evolutionist would say that such a hypothetical scenario is preposterous. Why? Because lower species are ignorant. They do not understand evolution. They do not recognize mutants. Quite true, but man does. Men do know these supposed laws of evolution. How, then, do we convince today’s species, Homo sapiens, not to kill off the mutants? If the primary form of evolution is now cultural and intellectual—a familiar theme among all evolutionists—then how does the average man protect himself against the “mutant” intellectual? How does the average man defend himself against the gene-splicing experts who proclaim themselves to be capable of altering the course of evolution, who say that some time in the future, they will be able to create a new race of supermen? How do the average members escape Aldous Huxley’s brave new world? And if the right-wing Social Darwinists are correct, how does the poor man without capital guarantee the survival of his progeny, if he sees that the success of his rich neighbor is a threat to his family’s success? If we recognize the mutants, will we kill them? If we do kill them, will the race survive without them? But if we don’t, will some mutant heirs win out?

The answer of modern social evolutionists and non-Social Darwin-ists is not all that clear. Generally, they have countered the right-wing Social Darwinists in the name of a higher reason, a collective human reason. Man is the capstone of an unplanned evolutionary process. He has transcended this undirected process, or at least may be about to transcend it. Through conscious planning, elite members of the race will be able to integrate the plans of all the members into an overarching whole, and this overarching whole will guarantee the survival of all, including the "least fit," who might otherwise be prepared to kill off the "mutants."

What other approach would be better? If you believed that you are a "mutant"—an expert, a rich man, the member of the planning elite—wouldn't you come to the "about-to-be-superseded" masses and tell them that you are "just one of the boys," and "we're all in this together," and that we all need to buckle down "for the sake of humanity"? In other words, wouldn't you devise a social philosophy which would promise to the masses sufficient benefits to guarantee their survival in the competition? Or would you continue to shout them down as members of an about-to-be-superseded species, telling them that it is their responsibility to play the game by your ferocious rules or else get off the playing field, when getting off the field means death?

If you were really a mutant, then the one thing you would not have is numerical superiority. The one thing you could not risk would be a head-on collision with the massive numbers of "about-to-be-superseded" voters, troops, or whatever. You would make your sales pitch in terms of the greatest good for the greatest number. You would tell the masses that the greatest good for the greatest number involves playing the game by your rules, which on the surface seem to be democratic, but which in fact are radically elitist. You would deny that blood lines count, or that the feudal principle is valid. You would offer them democracy, bureaucracy, universal free education, welfare redistribution, and so forth. Then you would select only those members of the masses who showed themselves willing and able to compete in terms of the elitist system. You would give a few of them scholarships to the best universities, and you would recruit them into what they believe (and you may even believe) is "the inner circle." You would expand the power of the government, and then you would open high-level positions in that government only to those specially chosen by the ruling power.

What you would do, in short, is to construct precisely the statist system which exists today in every major industrial nation—a system that in the 1930s was called fascism, but which can also be called socialism, communism, the corporate state, the business-industrial complex, the new federalism, the Programming, Planning and Budgeting System (PPBS), or just to make your real goals explicit, the New World Order. What you would construct, in the name of man-controlled evolution, is a new Tower of Babel.

3. American Progressivism

The logic of the right-wing Social Darwinists was bound to fail. The “robber barons” (an unfortunate term) of the late nineteenth century may have appreciated the ruthless logic of right-wing Social Darwinism during the period of their upward mobility, but once they were established as the dominant forces in the market, they abandoned the market’s competition in the name of “economic stability.” In short, they preferred monopoly to competition. By 1900, the large American conglomerates began to look to government intervention, all in the name of protecting the consumer, for protection against newer, innovative, “cut-throat” firms.¹⁵³

Almost at the same time, the Progressive movement in the United States began to make itself felt in politics. This political-intellectual movement was run by elitists for elitists, and it proclaimed a philosophy of economic interventionism. The state was now to replace the free market as the engine of evolution. The market was too free, too uncontrolled, too individualistic for the Progressives. They wanted to direct market forces for national, and later international, ends. They lost faith in the progress-producing automatic forces of market competition. The free market was too much like the hypothetical competition of evolutionary change. There was no way to guarantee the survival of humanity if humanity proved to be less fit. The external environment had to be manipulated to conform to the needs of mankind, thereby reversing the purposeless, anti-teleological processes of natural selection. Man, the new source of direction and meaning, must assert his dominance by means other than random competition. Random competition was fine for pre-human, pre-teleological evolution, but it will no longer suffice. The “survival of the fittest” henceforth would mean “the survival of the fitters.” Planning man (collective man) would fit the environment (including other men) to fit his needs, aspirations, and skills.

153. Gabriel Kolko, The Triumph of Conservatism: A Reinterpretation of American History (New York: Free Press, 1963); Frederic C. Howe, Confessions of a Monopolist (Dearborn, Michigan: Alpine, [1906] 1977).

With the Progressive movement came a new version of social Darwinism: left-wing social Darwinism. Within two decades, 1885–1905, it replaced right-wing social Darwinism. One intellectual, perhaps more than any other, was responsible for shifting American evolutionists' outlook from right-wing social Darwinism's free market competition to modern statism's central planning and interference with market forces. It was not Karl Marx. It was a long-forgotten government bureaucrat, one of the founders of American sociology, Lester Frank Ward.

N. Social Darwinism: Phase II

Lester Frank Ward wrote Dynamic Sociology (1883), the first comprehensive sociological treatise written in the United States.¹⁵⁴ He has been described as the father of the American concept of the planned society.¹⁵⁵ He was born in Illinois in 1841. His father was an itinerant mechanic and his mother the daughter of a clergyman. He was poor as a youth, but he still found time to teach himself Latin, French, German, biology, and physiology. He was self-disciplined. He joined the U. S. Treasury Department in 1865. He continued his studies at night school, and within five years he had earned degrees in medicine, law, and the arts. In the mid-1870s he worked for the Bureau of Statistics, and it was at this time that he concluded that a study of statistics could lead to the formulation of laws of society, which in turn could be used in a program of social planning. He continued his self-education in the field of paleontology, and in 1883, the year Dynamic Sociology appeared, he was appointed chief paleontologist of the U.S. Geological Survey. Finally, after publishing five books in sociology, he was appointed to the chair of sociology in 1906 at Brown University, the same year that he was elected the first president of the newly formed American Sociological Association.¹⁵⁶

Ward's Dynamic Sociology was ignored for a decade after its publication, selling only 500 copies.¹⁵⁷ In 1897, a second edition was issued, 154. Hofstadter, Social Darwinism, p. 69.

155. Clarence J. Karier, Shaping the American Educational State: 1900 to the Present (New York: Free Press, 1975), p. 139. Cf. Sidney Fine, Laissez-Faire and the General Welfare State (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1956), p. 253–64.

156. Ward's biography is supplied by Hofstadter, Social Darwinism, pp. 68–71.

157. Ibid., p. 70.

and within three years he was considered one of the leaders in the field. After his death in 1913, his reputation faded rapidly. He had laid the groundwork for American collectivism in the name of progressive evolution, but he was forgotten by the next and subsequent generations.

Ward broke radically with Spencer and Sumner. He had two great enemies, intellectually speaking: the social Darwinist movement and all supernatural religion. It is difficult to say which he hated more, although religion received the more vitriolic attacks. Dynamic Sociology stands as the first and perhaps the most comprehensive defense of government planning in American intellectual history. It was published about 15 years too early, but when his ideas caught on, they spread like wildfire. In fact, they became the “coin of the realm” in planning circles so rapidly that the source of these ideas was forgotten. Because the book is almost unknown today, and because Ward’s concepts and language are so graphic, I am providing an extended summary and analysis of his thought.

In Dynamic Sociology, we have the heart and soul of modern, post-Darwin social evolutionist philosophy. Ward did not pull any punches. He did not try to evade the full implications of his position. Modern thinkers may not be so blatant and forthright, but if they hold to the modern version of evolution—man-directed evolution—then they are unlikely to reject the basic ideas that Ward set forth. If you want to follow through the logic of man-directed evolution, you must start with Ward’s Dynamic Sociology.

1. Supernaturally Revealed Religion

Ward was forthright. He made it clear that the enemy is revealed religion, which in the United States in the early 1880s, meant Christianity. In the 82-page introduction to the book, in which he outlined his thesis, Ward announced that those people claiming to have received divine inspiration, and those who have founded religious systems, have been found by modern medicine to be not only “pathological” but to be burdened by “an actually deranged condition of their minds.”¹⁵⁸ Because of the power these religious leaders have wielded historically, “we can only deplore the vast waste of energy which their failure to accomplish their end shows them to have made."¹⁵⁹ (Waste, above all, was what Ward said his system of social planning would avoid.) There is no evidence, he wrote in volume II, that religion provides any moral sanctions whatever. As a matter of fact, we find in the advanced countries that individuals who avow no religion are the true moral leaders. "The greater part of them are found among the devotees of the exact sciences. Yet there is no more exemplary class of citizens in society than scientific men. . . ."¹⁶⁰ Furthermore, the "criminals and the dangerous classes of society are generally believers in the prevailing faith of the country which they infest. . . ."¹⁶¹ In any case, morals precede religion. "It is morality which has saved religion, and not religion which has saved morality."¹⁶² Prayer is a social evil, because it is "inconsistent with that independence and originality of mind which accompany all progressive movements."¹⁶³ It deters effective action. He then devoted several pages to a demonstration of the anti-progressive influences of all religion, but he provided examples primarily from paganism and animism.¹⁶⁴ He said religion leads to a retreat from this world and a divorce between man and nature.¹⁶⁵ There are two methods for modifying the external world to make it conform to man's needs: science and religion. There is a perpetual conflict between these two methods, and religion will lose this war.¹⁶⁶

158. Lester Frank Ward, Dynamic Sociology; or Applied Social Science, as Based Upon Statistical Sociology and the Less Complex Sciences, 2 vols. (New York: Appleton, 1883), I, p. 12. (These volumes are posted by Google Books: http://bit.ly/Ward_DS1 and DS2.)

2. Right-Wing Social Darwinism

Ward's second intellectual enemy was right-wing Social Darwinism. They misunderstood evolution, he argued. Nature's ways are not man's way. The progress of nature is too slow, and it is so inefficient that earth's resources will not be able to support such slow progress forever. What is needed is "something swifter and more certain than natural selection," and this means man.¹⁶⁷ We need a new teleology, he argued—the crucial argument of all post-Darwin social and even biological evolutionists. The evolutionary process needs a sure hand to guide it. We must adopt, he said at the end of the second volume, "the

159. Ibid., I, p. 17.

160. Ibid., II, pp. 281–82.

161. Ibid., II, p. 282.

162. Ibid., II, p. 283.

163. Ibid., II, p. 286.

164. Ibid., II, pp. 287ff.

165. Ibid., II, p. 298.

166. Ibid., II, p. 305.

167. Ibid., I, p. 16.

teleological method."¹⁶⁸ We must reject Social Darwinism (although he never used this phrase to designate his opponents). Here is the familiar and central argument of modern evolution, predictably formulated first by a social scientist rather than a natural scientist:

Again, it becomes necessary to combat the views of those scientists who, having probed deep enough to perceive how nature works, think they have found the key to the way man should work, thus ignoring the great distinguishing characteristic of intellectual labor. Having found the claims of those who believe that nature is a product of design and outside contrivance to be unsound, they conclude that there is no design or contrivance, and having seen that results in the organic world are produced through rhythmic differentiations, they infer that results in the superorganic world should be left to the same influences. Nothing could be more false or more pernicious. Scientists of this school, from the weight which their opinions must have, are really doing more to counteract the true tendencies of social progress than those who openly oppose them. All social progress is artificial. It is the consequence of teleological foresight, design, and intellectual labor, which are processes diametrically opposed in principle to the processes of nature. If in learning the law of evolution we must apply it to society, it would have been better to have remained ignorant of that law.¹⁶⁹

Because the chief opponents of Social Darwinism were orthodox Christians, this statement indicates that Ward hated the right-wing social Darwinists' ideas more than he hated Christian orthodoxy.

Who was he challenging? Spencer and Sumner. He was attacking Sumner's whole methodology of investigating the conflicts found in nature and then transferring this conflict principle to human society. After all, it was Sumner who wrote in What Social Classes Owe to Each Other that "We cannot get a revision of the laws of human life. We are absolutely shut up to the need and duty, if we would learn how to live happily, of investigating the laws of Nature, and deducing the rules of right living in the world as it is."¹⁷⁰ Not so, announced Ward. "Civilization consists in the wholesale and ruthless trampling down of natural laws, the complete subordination of the cosmical point of view to the human point of view. Man revolutionizes the universe. . . . The essential function of Knowledge is to aid him in accomplishing this revolution."¹⁷¹ Man must exercise dominion.

168. Ibid., II, p. 627.

169. Ibid., II, p. 627-8.

170. Sumner, Social Classes, p. 14.

Ward set forth the basic conflict between the two forms of evolutionary thought. It is a question of properly interpreting the concept of adaptation, the central idea in Darwinian evolution. No one has made the issues any clearer.

All progress is brought about by adaptation. Whatever view we may take of the cause of progress, it must be the result of correspondence between the organism and the changed environment. This, in its widest sense, is adaptation. But adaptation is of two kinds: One form of adaptation is passive or consensual, the other form is active or provisional. The former represents natural progress, the latter artificial progress. The former results in a growth, the latter in a manufacture. The one is the genetic process, the other a teleological process.¹⁷²

Ward was clearly a proponent of activism.

3. Reducing Waste by Central Planning

How did Ward refute the "passive" evolutionists (Social Darwinists) in the name of Darwin? Ward came up with this fundamental idea: *Nature's processes are wasteful.*¹⁷³ This is completely in accord with Darwin and Wallace. It was their recognition of the enormous pressure of multiplying populations—a multiplication which pressed upon the limits of the environment—which leads to the survival of certain genetically advantaged members of any given species. The failure to survive caught their attention: the millions of extinct species that did not gain the advantage of random genetic changes that would have enabled them to compete successfully in the slowly changing environment, as well as the enormous number of non-survivors in each generation. The idea began with Malthus: the assertion that populations multiply far more rapidly than the food supply necessary to ensure the survival of all members of the multiplying species. Darwin cited Malthus' observation in the first paragraph of Darwin's 1858 essay, which appeared in the Linnean Society's Journal.¹⁷⁴

Waste is nature's way, and waste was Ward's sworn enemy. "The prodigality of nature is now a well-understood truth in biology, and

171. Ward, Dynamic Sociology, II, p. 473.

172. Ibid., I, p. 72.

173. Ibid., II, p. 494.

174. Charles Darwin, "The Linnean Society Papers," in Appleman (ed.), Darwin, p. 83.

one that every sociologist and every statesman should not only understand but be able to apply to society, which is still under the complete dominion of these same wasteful laws. No true economy is ever attained until intellectual foresight is brought to bear upon social phenomena. Teleological adaptation is the only economical adaptation."¹⁷⁵ Here was Ward's battle cry against right-wing social Darwinism: The civil government alone is capable of stamping out unplanned, natural, non-teleological waste.

Where do we find waste? In natural processes and in the free market. Free trade is enormously wasteful. "Free trade is the impersonation of the genetic or developmental process in nature."¹⁷⁶ He also understood that free trade is the archetype of all free market processes, and that defenders of the free market, from David Hume and Adam Smith to Spencer and Sumner, had used free trade to defend the idea of market freedom. Therefore, Ward concluded, market freedom is a great social evil. Do people establish private schools to educate children? Stop this waste of educational resources; the state alone should educate children, for the state alone is teleological, truly teleological. Better no education than private education, because "no system of education not exclusively intrusted to the highest social authority is worthy of the name."¹⁷⁷ Here is a key phrase: the highest social authority. If true foresight, true design, and true planning are to be brought into the wasteful world of nature and free markets, then the state, as the highest social authority, must bring them. Therefore, "education must be exclusively intrusted to the state. . . ."¹⁷⁸ The state is the highest social authority in Ward's system.

There are other forms of economic waste. Take the example of the railroads. "That unrestricted private enterprise can not be trusted to conduct the railroad system of a rapidly growing country, may now be safely said to be demonstrated."¹⁷⁹ The state should operate them, as is done in Europe. Ward was America's first sociologist—though hardly the last—who called for the total sovereignty of the state in economic affairs. Here is his reasoning. His reasoning is shared, to one extent or another, by modern evolutionists. "While the railroad problem is just now the most prominent before the world, and best exemplifies both 175. Ward, Dynamic Sociology, I, pp. 74–75.

176. Ibid., I, p. 74; II, p. 398.

177. Ibid., II, p. 572.

178. Idem.

179. Ibid., II, p. 576.

the incapacity of private individuals to undertake vast enterprises like this, and the superior aggregate wisdom of the state in such matters, it is by no means the only one that could be held up in a similar manner and made to conform to the same truth."¹⁸⁰ Ward's next paragraph presents his basic conclusion: "Competition is to industry what 'free trade' is to commerce. They both represent the wasteful genetic method, destroying a large proportion of what is produced, and progressing only by rhythmic waves whose ebb is but just less extensive than their flow."¹⁸¹

The question arises: Is the state truly economical? Ward's answer: Unquestionably! "Now, of all the enterprises which the state has thus appropriated to itself, there is not one which it has not managed better and more wisely than it had been managed before by private parties."¹⁸² These include transportation, communications, and education. The greater the profitability of any private enterprise, the more need there is for state control, he concluded.¹⁸³ In fact, the legitimate purpose of state interference is to make business unprofitable! For instance, the state-operated railroads offer lower rates than private firms did, "which, from the standpoint of the public, is the kernel of the whole matter. The people should look with suspicion upon extremely lucrative industries, since their very sound financial condition proves that they are conducted too much in the interests of the directors and stockholders and too little in that of the public."¹⁸⁴ Ward then set forth the guiding principle of government bureaucrats and state-operated businesses, from his day to ours: Losses testify to efficiency. "The failure of the state to make them lucrative should also be construed as an evidence of the integrity and proper sense of duty of the officers of the state."¹⁸⁵ (Yes, he really wrote this. I am not quoting it out of context. It is the end of the paragraph, and he stated in the next paragraph that it is a fact "that whatever the state does is usually better, if not more economically, done than what is done by individuals." Then, to make sure his readers got the picture, he wrote on the same page: "It might similarly be shown that all the functions of government are usually performed with far greater thoroughness and fidelity than similar functions intrusted to private individuals.")

180. Ibid., II, p. 578.

181. Idem.

182. Ibid., II, p. 579.

183. Ibid., II, p. 580.

184. Ibid., II, pp. 581–82.

185. Ibid., II, p. 582.

Despite his praise of the state, he admitted that, in his day, the state had not advanced sufficiently to become truly scientific. In the introduction to his book, he freely admitted that governments have always avowed that they were working for the benefit of mankind, but government "has almost without exception failed to realize the results claimed. . . ." ¹⁸⁶ In fact, Ward went so far as to write this amazing paragraph: "Let us admit, however, as candor dictates, that almost everything that has been said by the advocates of laissez faire about the evils of government is true, and there is much more that has not been said which should be said on the same subject. Let us only take care not to admit the principle in its abstract essence, which is the only hope there is for the ultimate establishment of a teleological progress in society." ¹⁸⁷

Why this failure in practice (in volume I, anyway)? Answer: the failure of legislators to understand the laws of society, which are "so deep and occult that the present political rulers have only the vaguest conception of them. . . ." ¹⁸⁸ The practical answer is to train legislators in the laws of sociological science. "Before progressive legislation can become a success, every legislature must become, as it were, a polytechnic school, ¹⁸⁹ a laboratory of philosophical research into the laws of society and of human nature. ¹⁹⁰ (vol. II, p. 249). No legislator is qualified to propose or vote on measures designed to affect the destinies of millions of social units until he masters all that is known of the science of society. Every true legislator must be a sociologist, and have his knowledge of that most intricate of all sciences founded upon organic and inorganic science." ¹⁹¹ Not the philosopher-king, as Plato had hoped for, but the sociologist-legislator, will bring true teleology into the affairs of man.

4. The Elite vs. the Masses

This brings us to the question of elites. Ward's conception of teleology requires scientific planning and scientific legislation. There must be experts who provide the necessary teleological leadership. We find in Ward's book a characteristic dualism between the capacities of the

186. Ibid., I, p. 31.

187. Ibid., I, pp. 54–55.

188. Ibid., I, p. 55.

189. Ibid., II, p. 252.

190. Ibid., II, p. 249.

191. Ibid., I, p. 37.

elite and the capacities of the masses. The elite are unquestionably superior. Ward did not say that they are genetically superior, but they are nevertheless superior. Yet the masses outnumber the elite. What the elite must do, then, to gain the confidence of the masses, whose lives will be directed by the elite, is to proclaim their devotion to the needs of the masses. What statist of all shades of opinion have proclaimed as their ultimate goal, Ward set forth in Dynamic Sociology. Ward's commitment to the elite as a class is also their commitment.

The first step is to assert the beneficence of the elite. They are working for us all. They are the true altruists. "It is only within a few centuries that such [altruistic] sentiments can be said to have had an existence in the world. They now exist in the breasts of a comparatively few, but it is remarkable how much power these few have been able to wield."¹⁹² You see, "The normal condition of the great mass of mankind, even in the most enlightened states, is one of complete indifference to the sufferings of all beyond the circle of their own immediate experience. In moral progress, almost as much as in material progress, it is a relatively insignificant number of minds that must be credited with the accomplishment of all the results attained."¹⁹³ This is the grim reality: "A very few minds have furnished the world with all its knowledge, the general mass contributing nothing at all."¹⁹⁴ However, we need not worry about this problem today. Public education is overcoming this uneven distribution of knowledge.¹⁹⁵ In fact, public education is making this distribution of knowledge far easier, since this process is "a comparatively simple and easy one."¹⁹⁶ In other words, the elitist planners, best represented by scientists and teachers, are raising the level of knowledge and consciousness possessed by the masses. The elite planners are really working to produce a new evolution, and the masses will be allowed to participate in this elevation of humanity. They will not perish in a non-teleological, natural evolutionary leap. There are two ways of elevating man: (1) scientific propagation of human beings (artificial selection) and (2) rational change of environment, which means an increase of human knowledge.¹⁹⁷ "The amount of useful knowledge possessed by the average mind is far below its in-

192. Ibid., II, p. 448.

193. Idem.

194. Ibid., II, p. 485.

195. Ibid., II, pp. 597–98.

196. Ibid., II, p. 486.

197. Ibid., II, p. 487.

tellectual capacity. . . ."¹⁹⁸ This is a key to evolutionary advance: "That the actual amount of such knowledge originated by man, though doubtless still below his ability to utilize it, is sufficient, if equally distributed, to elevate him to a relatively high position, and to awaken society to complete consciousness."¹⁹⁹

5. State-Run Education

The public schools are therefore fundamental in the teleological evolutionary process. They are the change agents of the new evolution.

Competitive private schools are evil.²⁰⁰ The state must have an educational monopoly. "The system of private education, all things considered, is not only a very bad one, but, properly viewed, it is absolutely worse than none, since it tends still further to increase the inequality in the existing intelligence, which is a worse evil than a general state of intelligence would be."²⁰¹ Fortunately for society, he argued, private education has no academic standards, since parents control or at least heavily influence private education. Therefore, with respect to private education, "The less society has of it the better, and therefore its very inefficiency must be set down as a blessing."²⁰² The radical elitism here should be obvious, but Ward was kind enough to spell out the implications (something later elitist evolutionists have not always been willing to do).

Lastly, public education is immeasurably better for society. It is so because it accomplishes the object of education, which private education does not. What society most needs is the distribution of the knowledge in its possession. This is a work which can not be trusted to individuals. It can neither be left to the discretion of children, of parents, nor of teachers. It is not for any of these to say what knowledge is most useful to society. No tribunal short of that which society in its own sovereign capacity shall appoint is competent to decide this question.²⁰³

Are there to be teachers? Yes, but very special kinds of teachers, namely, teachers totally independent from "parents, guardians, and pupils. Of the latter he is happily independent. This independence

198. Idem.

199. Idem.

200. Ibid., II, p. 584.

201. Ibid., II, p. 588.

202. Idem.

203. Ibid., II, p. 591.

renders him practically free. His own ideas of method naturally harmonize more or less completely with those of the state."²⁰⁴ True freedom, true independence, is defined as being in harmony with the state. This, of course, is the definition of freedom that Christianity uses with respect to a man's relation to God.

Was Ward a true egalitarian, a true democrat? Did he really believe that the masses would at long last reach the pinnacle of knowledge, to become equal with the scientific elite? Of course not. Here is the perennial ambivalence of the modern evolutionists' social theory. Society needs planning and direction, and "society" is mostly made up of individuals, or "the masses." So, they need direction. They need guidance. They cannot effectively make their own plans and execute them on a free market. Teleology is too important to be left to the incompetent masses, acting as individuals on a free market. The masses simply are not intelligent enough. "Mediocrity is the normal state of the human intellect; brilliancy of genius and weight of talent are exceptional. . . . This mass can not be expected to reach the excessive standards of excellence which society sets up. The real need is to devise the means necessary to render mediocrity, such as it is, more comfortable."²⁰⁵ (Aldous Huxley, brother of Sir Julian Huxley, and grandson of Thomas Huxley, saw this clearly. He wrote Brave New World to describe the techniques usable by some future state to "render mediocrity, such as it is, more comfortable": drugs, orgiastic religion, and total central control.)

The goal of total educational equality is really a myth. Then why such emphasis on public education? Control! Teachers are to serve as the new predestinators. "One of the most important objects of education, thus systematically conducted, should be to determine the natural characteristics of individual minds. The real work of human progress should be doubled with the same outlay of energy if every member of society could be assigned with certainty to the duty for whose performance he is best adapted. . . . Most men are out of place because there has been no systematic direction to the inherent intellectual energies, and the force of circumstances arid time-honored custom have arbitrarily chalked out the field of labor for each."²⁰⁶ Ward's next paragraph tells us how we can overcome this lack of external directions.

204. Ibid., II, p. 590. Cf. Ward, "Education," (1871–73), in Karier (ed.), Shaping the American Educational State, pp. 145–59.

205. Ibid., II, p. 600.

206. Ibid., II, pp. 623–24.

"The system of education here described affords a means of regulating this important condition on strictly natural principles. . . . A school should be conducted on scientific principles." Teachers can discover "the true character of any particular mind," and then a safe conclusion can be drawn "as to what mode of life will be most successful, from the point of view of the interest both of the individual and of society."²⁰⁷

6. Education as Censorship

There is another important function of public education and all other tax-funded information services: the total control over information and its distribution. We cannot make progress compulsory, Ward said. "No law, no physical coercion, from whichever code or from whatever source, can compel the mind to discover principles or invent machines. . . . To influence such action, other means must be employed."²⁰⁸ Men act in terms of their opinions, "and without changing those opinions it is wholly impossible perceptibly to change such conduct."²⁰⁹ Here is the planner's task: "Instill progressive principles, no matter how, into the mind, and progressive actions will result."²¹⁰

There are political pitfalls to overcome. "The attempt to change opinions by direct efforts has frequently been made. No one will now deny that coercion applied to this end has been a signal failure."²¹¹ Is there some answer to this dilemma? Can the planner find a way to alter men's opinions without using coercion? Yes. The planner must restrict access to competing ideas—another form of evil competition. "There is one way, however, in which force may and does secure, not a change of existing opinion, but the acceptance of approved beliefs; but this, so far from weakening the position here taken, affords a capital defense of it. The forcible suppression of the utterance or publication in any form of unwelcome opinions is equivalent to withholding from all undetermined minds the evidence upon which such views rest; and, since opinions are rigidly the products of the data previously furnished the mind, such opinions cannot exist, because no data for them have ever been received."²¹² In short, another crucial key to social progress is systematic censorship. He called this the "method of exclusion." He

207. Ibid., II, p. 624.

208. Ibid., II, p. 547.

209. Idem.

210. Idem.

211. Idem.

212. Idem.

wrote:

It is simply that true views may as easily be created by this method of exclusion as false ones, which latter is the point of view from which the fact is usually regarded. The more or less arbitrary exclusion of error, i. e., of false data, is to a great degree justifiable, especially where the true data supplied consist of verified experiences, and all the means of reverifying them are left free. But the same end is practically attained by the intentional supply, on a large scale and systematically carried out, of true data without effort to exclude the false. This, however, is the essence of what is here meant by education, which may be regarded as a systematic process for the manufacture of correct opinions. As such, it is of course highly inventive in its character, and the same may be said of all modes of producing desired belief by the method of exclusion.²¹³

The government's schools guarantee that competing data are excluded. "Assume an adequate system of education to be in force, and the question of the quantity and quality of knowledge in society is no longer an open one."²¹⁴ What about the freedom of the teacher? Basically, there is none. "To the teacher duly trained for his work may be left certain questions of method, especially of detail; but even the method must be in its main features unified with a view to the greatest economy in its application. This must necessarily also be the duty of the supreme authority."²¹⁵ As Ward said, "The state education implied in the foregoing remarks is, of course, the ideal state education."²¹⁶ Of course it is, if you are a teleological evolutionist.

The elites who control the government's education system are the agents of social change and progress. "The knowledge which enables a very few to introduce all the progressive agencies into civilization tends not in the least to render the mass of mankind, though possessing equal average capacity for such service, capable of contributing anything to that result."²¹⁷ Then what are the masses, really?

In contrast to this small, earnest class, we behold the great swarming mass of thoughtless humanity, filled with highly derivative ideas vaguely and confusedly held together; eagerly devouring the light gossip, current rumor, and daily events of society which are in-

213. Ibid., II, p. 548.

214. Ibid., II, p. 549.

215. Ibid., II, p. 591.

216. Idem.

217. Ibid., II, p. 535.

tensely dwelt upon, each in itself, and wholly disconnected from all others; entertaining the most positive opinions on the most doubtful questions; never looking down upon a pebble, a flower, or a butterfly, or up at a star, a planet, or a cloud; wholly unacquainted with any of the direct manifestations of nature, . . . passing through a half-unconscious existence with which they keep no account, and leaving the world in all respects the same as they found it.²¹⁸

Ward understood quite well that the self-proclaimed scientist and change agent would anger the masses—at least the masses in 1883—and they would ridicule his pretensions. “The unscientific man looks upon the scientific man as a sort of anomaly or curiosity. . . . The man of science is deemed whimsical or eccentric. The advanced views which he always holds are apt to be imputed to internal depravity, though his conduct is generally confessed to be exemplary.”²¹⁹ How does the man of science, the elite determiner of the next evolutionary social advance, rid himself of guilt about his feelings? Perhaps even more important, how should he deflect the suspicion concerning his intentions among these masses of emotional incompetents? One very good way is to tell them that the elite is on their side! Ward did. “It will be a long time before the world will recognize the fundamental truth that it is not to apotheosize a few exceptional intellects, but to render the great proletariat comfortable, that true civilization should aim.”²²⁰ It was the self-imposed task of the believers in statist planning by elites to buy off the proletariat by making proletarians comfortable, or at least by promising to make them comfortable soon, just as soon as the evolutionary leap of social being takes place.

7. Salvation by Knowledge

Ward, as with all evolutionists, believed in the dominion covenant, or rather a dominion covenant. This covenant rests on elite knowledge. Man elevates himself through knowledge. Man is therefore saved by knowledge. This is Satan’s temptation: Ye shall be as gods, if ye eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Ward wrote: “We see in this brief sketch what a dominion man exercises over all departments of nature, and we may safely conclude that he has not yet reached the maximum limit of his power in this direction. But that power is wholly due to his intellectual faculty, which has guided his act

218. Ibid., II, p. 505.

219. Ibid., II, p. 503.

220. Ibid., II, p. 368.

in devising indirect means of accomplishing ends otherwise unattainable.”²²¹ Men are not innately evil. “Mankind, as a whole, are honest.”²²² Man’s problem is not sin; it is ignorance. “If all the people knew what course of action was for their best interest, they would certainly pursue that course.”²²³ It would be possible, through education, to eliminate crime. “The inmates of our prisons are but the victims of untoward circumstances. The murderer has but acted out his education. Would you change his conduct, change his education.”²²⁴

What we must do, then, is to raise society’s consciousness. Consciousness, not conscience, is the problem.

After dynamic opinions of the universe, of life, and of man have been formed, it is easy to rise to the position from which society can be contemplated as progressive and subject to a central control. The duties of society toward itself are manifest enough so soon as its true character can be understood. . . . The great problem remains how to bring society to consciousness. Assuming it to have been brought to consciousness, the dynamic truths with which it must deal are comparatively plain. The mouthpiece of a conscious society is the legislature.²²⁵

In short, the visible symbol of a fully conscious society is the self-conscious divinity of the state. Society must agree about any particular course of action, but once unanimity of opinion is reached—and it is the function of public education to promote it—then debate ends. “Let there be no excuse for anyone to debate a question which has at any time or place, or in any manner, been once definitively answered.”²²⁶ Like the laws of the Medes and the Persians, once the divine ruler has made a law, it must not be broken (Dan. 6:8,12).

Does this mean that democracy will allow all men to have a veto power over the decisions of the rulers? Of course not. The elite must continue to rule.

Deliberative bodies rarely enact any measures which involve the indirect method. If individual members who have worked such schemes out by themselves propose them in such bodies, the confusion of discordant minds, coupled with the usual preponderance of

221. Ibid., II, p. 385.

222. Ibid., II, p. 508.

223. Ibid., II, p. 238.

224. Ibid., II, p. 241.

225. Ibid., II, p. 467.

226. Ibid., II, p. 407.

inferior ones, almost always defeats their adoption. Such bodies, mis-called deliberative, afford the most ineffective means possible of reaching the maximum wisdom of their individual members. A radical change should be inaugurated in the entire method of legislation. By the present system, not even an average expression of the intelligence of the body is obtainable. The uniform product of such deliberations falls far below this average. True deliberation can never be reached until all partisanship is laid aside, and each member is enabled to work out every problem on strictly scientific principles and by scientific methods, and until the sum total of truth actually obtained is embodied in the enactment. The real work can not be done in open session. The confusion of such assemblies is fatal to all mental application. There need be no open sessions. The labor and thought should be performed in private seclusion, the results reached by others should in this way be calmly compared by each with those reached by himself, and in a general and voluntary acquiescence by at least a majority in that which really conforms with the truth in each case should be deliberately embodied as law. The nature of political bodies should be made to conform as nearly as possible with that of scientific bodies. . . .²²⁷

What, then, becomes of unanimity, of open covenants openly arrived at (to cite President Woodrow Wilson's unheeded principle of diplomacy)? It should be obvious. When Ward said that he wanted unanimity, he really meant scientific planning without opposition. "The legislature must, therefore, as before maintained, be compared with the workshop of the inventor."²²⁸ There is no opposition to the inventor in his workshop, it should be pointed out.

Scientists must lead the legislators. Men of informed opinion must tell them what needs to be done. Then the legislators can pass laws that will compel the masses to follow the lead of the scientists into a new realm of "comfort." Ward was quite explicit about this.

The problem is a difficult and complicated one. While legislators as a class are far behind the few progressive individuals by whose dynamic actions social progress is secured, it is also true that, as a general rule, they are somewhat in advance of the average constituent, sometimes considerably so. This is seen in many quasi-scientific enterprises that they quietly continue, which their constituents, could they know of them, would promptly condemn. The question, therefore, arises whether the legislators may not find means, as a work of supererogation, to place their constituents upon the highway to a condition of intelligence which, when attained, will in turn work out the problem of inaugurating a scientific legislature and a system of scientific legislation.²²⁹

227. Ibid., II, p. 395.

228. Ibid., II, p. 396.

With these words, he ended chapter XI, "Action." The Oxford English Dictionary defines "supererogation" as "The performance of good works beyond what God commands or requires, which are held to constitute a state of merit which the Church may dispense to others to make up for their deficiencies." Ward may have known what he was writing; the state, as the dispenser of salvation, needs saints to build up merit to pass along to the proletariat, who can do nothing by themselves. Scientists and legislators are the saints.

8. The State as Society

When Ward wrote "society," he meant the state. "When we speak of society, therefore, we must, for all practical purposes, confine the conception to some single automatic nation or state or, at the widest, to those few leading nations whose commercial relations have to a considerable extent cemented their material interests and unified their habits of thought and modes of life." Yet even this is too loose a definition, he wrote. "Only where actual legislation is conducted can there be said to exist a complete social organism. Wherever any such complete social organism exists, it is possible to conceive of true scientific legislation."²³⁰ Where there is no scientific legislation, therefore, there is no true society.

There was one, and only one, area of life where laissez faire was said to be legitimate. That was the area we call morality. Morality "is a code which enforces itself, and therefore requires no priesthood and no manual. And strangely enough, here, where alone laissez-faire is sound doctrine, we find the laissez faire school calling loudly for 'regulation.'"²³¹ For example (we could easily have predicted this example), "It is a remarkable fact that loose conduct between the sexes, which is commonly regarded as the worst form of immorality, seems to have no influence whatever upon the essential moral condition of those races among whom it prevails."²³² (When J. D. Unwin's studies showing the conflict between polygamy and cultural progress were published in the

229. Ibid., II, p. 399.

230. Ibid., II, p. 397.

231. Ibid., II, p. 373.

232. Ibid., II, p. 455.

1920s and 1930s, they were systematically ignored. The fornicators and adulterers who are the self-proclaimed scientific elite prefer not to have this dogma of the irrelevance of adultery shattered by historical research.²³³)

Ward rejected the non-teleological (personal and individual teleology) Darwinism of the right-wing Social Darwinists. He rejected entirely their thesis that social progress must involve personal misery and competition. That is the way of nature, not mankind, Ward argued. A proper society, meaning state, "aims to create conditions under which no suffering can exist." This may involve the coercive redistribution of wealth by the state, for a good social order "is ready even to sacrifice temporary enjoyment for greater future enjoyment—the pleasure of a few for that of the masses."²³⁴ Sumner was correct when he described this sort of social policy: "The agents who are to direct the State action are, of course, the reformers and philanthropists. Their schemes, therefore, may always be reduced to this type—that A and B decide what C shall do for D. . . . I call C the Forgotten Man, because I have never seen that any notice was taken of him in any of the discussions."²³⁵ Ward called citizen C "the rich," and let it go at that. His intellectual heirs have not improved much on this strategy, especially when they run for public office.

We must understand precisely what Ward was trying to create: a totalitarian state. As he wrote, "the present empirical, anti-progressive institution, miscalled the art of government, must be transformed into a central academy of social science, which shall stand in the same relation to the control of men in which a polytechnic institute stands to the control of nature."²³⁶ He was a defender of despotism.

9. Population Control

There is one final feature of his system which bears mentioning. The basis of Darwin's analysis of evolution through natural selection was Malthus' observation that species reproduce too fast for their environments. Then only a few will survive, concluded Darwin and Wallace. Ward accepted this as it pertained to nature. But man is a new 233. J. D. Unwin, "Monogamy as a Condition of Social Energy," The Hibbert Journal, XXV (Winter 1927); reprinted in The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, IV (1977–78); Unwin, Sex and Culture (Oxford University Press, 1934).

234. Ward, Dynamic Sociology, II, p. 468.

235. Sumner, Social Classes, p. 22.

236. Ward, Dynamic Sociology, II, pp. 251–52.

evolutionary life form, and man's ways are not nature's ways. Man's successful heirs are not supposed to be those individuals who by special genetic advantages or inherited wealth will be able to multiply their numbers. Man, unlike the animals, advances by means of state planning. If society is to prevent suffering, as Ward said is necessary, then the multiplication of those who receive charity must be prohibited. (This was the same problem that baffled Spencer.) "This fact points to the importance of all means which tend to prevent this result."²³⁷ Three children are probably the maximum allowable number. "In an ignorant community this could not be enforced, but in a sufficiently enlightened one it could and would be."²³⁸ In short, "What society needs is restriction of population, especially among the classes and at the points where it now increases most rapidly."²³⁹ But who are these classes? The masses, of course, since the present moral code (1883) of having large families "is tacitly violated by intelligent people, but enforced by the ignorant and the poor, a state of things which powerfully counteracts all efforts to enlighten the masses."²⁴⁰ The state needs to provide universal education to the masses to uplift them, but there are so many that the state's resources are strained to the limit. The answer: population control. In short, in Ward's version of the dominion covenant, "be fruitful and multiply" must be abolished, and the state, not individuals acting in voluntary cooperation, is to exercise dominion over nature. The rise of the family planning movement in Ward's era, and the appearance of zero population growth advocates in the mid-1960s, can be explained by means of the same arguments used in understanding Ward's humanistic version of the dominion covenant.

10. The Society of Satan

Ward proclaimed in the name of man-directed evolution that which Rushdoony described as the society of Satan. Rushdoony's four points apply quite well to the outline of the society sketched by Ward.

First, it is held that man is not guilty of his sin, not responsible for his lawlessness, for the sources of his guilt are not personal but social and natural. . . . Second, a society is demanded in which it is unneces-

237. Ibid., II, p. 307.

238. Ibid., II, p. 465.

239. Ibid., II, p. 466.

240. Ibid., II, p. 465.

sary for man to be good. Everything is to be provided so that man may attain true blessedness, a problem-free life. . . . Third, a society is demanded in which it is impossible for men to be bad. This is a logical concomitant of the second demand. It is a demand that there be no testing. . . . Fourth, a society is demanded in which it is impossible for men to fail. There must be no failure in heaven or on earth. All men must be saved, all students must pass, all men are employable, all men are entitled to rights. As Satan stated it baldly in the wilderness, giving in short form the program for the "good" State, "If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread." Make it unnecessary for man to work, unnecessary for man to be good, impossible for man to be bad. Provide man with such a cushion of social planning, the temptations asserted, that man might neither hunger nor thirst, work or suffer, believe or disbelieve, succeed or fail, be good or evil. Let his every need be met and his world ordered in terms of his wishes. Let it be a trouble-free world, cradle-to-grave security; let there be no failure. No failure is tolerable, and none recognized, save one, God's, for having dared to create a world in which we can suffer for our sins, in which we can be tried and tested, in which we can be good or evil, in which we can and must be men. Let us through communism, socialism or our welfare state construct a world better than God's, a world in which failure is impossible and man is beyond good and evil.²⁴¹

What are some of the basic themes of the society of Satan, the evolutionist's new paradise, as described by Ward? What are the principles—cosmological principles—by which such a society is deduced? Here is a brief summary:

No teleology (purpose) in the natural realm (I, 57; II, 32).

Human consciousness is teleological (II, 9).

Human teleology is opposed to laissez faire (I, 55).

Man now directs nature and evolution (I, 29; II, 89).

The state directs social evolution (I, 37).

The state is society (II, 397).

Science is the basis of progress (II, 497, 507).

A scientific elite directs progress (II, 504, 535).

The masses are thoughtless (II, 506, 600).

The masses can be taught (II, 598, 602).

241. R.J. Rushdoony, "The Society of Satan," Christian Economics (1964); reprinted in Biblical Economics Today, II (Oct./Nov. 1979), p. [2]. (<http://bit.ly/rjrsos>)

The state must monopolize education (II, 572, 589, 602).

Censorship is mandatory (II, 547).

Nature wastes; man should not (II, 494).

Competition is wasteful (I, 74; II, 576, 584).

Competition is laissez faire (I, 74).

Mankind is honest (II, 508).

Man's problem is lack of knowledge (II, 238).

Ignorance produces crime (II, 241).

Dominion is by means of the intellect (II, 385).

Government is to be founded on secrecy (II, 395).

Dissent can be illegitimate (II, 407).

Morality is strictly an individual matter (II, 373).

Scientists are selfless (II, 583).

Believers in God's teleology are immoral (II, 508).

State administration is almost always better (II, 579).

Profitless management is honest management (II, 582).

Population control is mandatory (II, 307, 465).

The masses must be made comfortable (II, 368).

The social goal is zero suffering (II, 468).

The society of Satan is the kingdom of autonomous man. This is the continuing theme of post-Darwin evolutionists. Again, let us see what Ward had to say.

In his pursuit of information with regard to the nature of the universe and his position in it, he must be deterred by no fears. If he can evade the action of natural laws, he has no other source of apprehension. Nature has neither feeling nor will, neither consciousness nor intelligence. He can lay open her bowels and study her most delicate tissues with entire impunity. Except as the great creative mother of all things, she is absolutely passive toward all sentient beings. Man's right to probe and penetrate the deepest secrets of the universe is absolute and unchallenged. It is only he himself who has ever ventured to question it. . . . He has been the servant of Nature too long. All true progress has been measured by his growing mastery over her, which has in turn been strictly proportional to his knowledge of her truths.²⁴²

242. Ward, Dynamic Sociology, II, pp. 12–13.

Man is autonomous, the rightful master over nature. Here is autonomous man's self-assigned dominion covenant: "This is why, in the second place, man should assume toward Nature the attitude of a master, or ruler."²⁴³ Man can seek exhaustive knowledge and therefore total power. He can claim the right to attain the attributes of God.

Here is evolutionist's creed. The universe was not created by God. It was not designed for man. Man must be thrown into the mud of insignificance only for a moment—to sever him from the idea of a personal God—and then he can become master of the earth. Satan also tempted Jesus along these same lines: Worship me, and all this world shall be yours (Luke 4:7).²⁴⁴ Ward allowed man only one brief paragraph to grovel in the mud of insignificance:

Anthropocentric ideas are essentially immoral. They puff their holders with conceit and arrogance, and lead to base, selfish abuses of power, warped by interest and passion. The old geocentric theory had the same tendency. All narrow views about nature not only contract in the mind, but dwarf and disfigure the moral nature of man. It is only when the eyes commence to open to the true vastness of the universe and the relative insignificance of human achievements, that it begins to be thought not worth while to boast, to oppress, or to persecute.²⁴⁵

Once freed of God and meaning—personal significance that is established in terms of the decree of God and man's status as God's image-bearer—then it is up, out of the mud, and on to the stars.²⁴⁶

O. Darwinian Economic Theory

Man cannot escape the dominion covenant. It is inherent to his being. He can only modify it. The evolutionists also operate in terms of Genesis 1:28.²⁴⁷ Let us reread the words: "And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth,

243. Ibid., II, p. 13.

244. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

245. Ward, Dynamic Sociology, II, p. 508.

246. It is a familiar theme in science fiction to speculate that man, through technology, will overcome the last remaining barrier of nature, the speed of light, to guarantee his dominion of the entire universe, and not just the solar system and those stars close enough to make sub-speed-of-light travel conceivable. Man will conquer the last remaining uniformitarian limit, since it has achieved its goal: shoving God out of the universe of time and space. Man will direct the processes of time.

247. Chapter 4.

and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." The entire scheme of modern post-Darwin evolution is built upon the premise that animals do, in fact, multiply to the limits of their environments.

Post-Darwin scientists also argue that by means of mastering the scientific laws of evolution, man can have dominion over the creation, including other men. When men start talking about "Man taking control of man," as the C. S. Lewis character warned in That Hideous Strength,²⁴⁸ watch out: some men are planning to take control of others. But now that man has achieved mastery, or is about to, he must stop reproducing so fast, stop multiplying, so that he can demonstrate to himself that he is no longer governed, as the animals are, by the Malthusian law of population growth. Man must not fulfill this part of the dominion covenant, for a process of compound population growth points inevitably to the limits of the environment, which is finite. It means that man will face either the limits to population growth—a sign of his own finitude—or else the limit of time, namely, the day of judgment. Both limits thwart autonomous, evolution-directing man. Man must thereby voluntarily limit his population, meaning that some men—the elite—will have to pass laws limiting the population growth of the stubborn, traditional, uneducated masses. Man must exercise dominion through genetic engineering, power politics, centralized economic planning, public education, and other techniques of control. He must act as God does, not multiplying but directing, not pressing against the limits of a finite environment, but mastering it for his own ends. And, to paraphrase Lewis, when you hear men speak about mastering the environment for the benefit of man, watch out: it will be the confiscation of the productivity of the environment for the uses of the elitist planners.

The overwhelming intellectual success of the philosophy of interventionism has been due, in large part, to the greater consistency the logic of interventionism has with post-Darwin evolutionism. Free market economists who cling to evolutionism have suffered an academic fate similar to that suffered by the right-wing Social Darwinists, namely, their case for the reliability of spontaneous market forces cannot compete with the case for man's directing hand through state power. Men want meaning, purpose, and confidence in their own survival. While Mises and Hayek rejected the old “dog eat dog, man eat man” philosophy of right-wing Social Darwinism, they did not succeed in convincing the modern evolutionists of the validity of the competitive, unhampered market. That sort of institutional arrangement does not seem to be in synchronization with the modern evolutionists’ vision of man-directed, elite-directed, teleological evolution.

248. C. S. Lewis, That Hideous Strength: A Modern Fairy-Tale for Grown-Ups (New York: Macmillan, 1946), p. 42.

Israel Kirzner, Mises’ disciple, wrote his theory of capital in terms of teleology. He said that “The principal point to be emphasized is that capital goods, thus defined, are distinguished in that they fall neatly into place in a teleological framework.”²⁴⁹ He was speaking of individuals’ teleological frameworks, however, not Man’s teleological framework.

Modern economists want the luxury of using statistical aggregates in their work. Kirzner demonstrated that the methodological presupposition undergirding all economic aggregates is the premise, stated or unstated, that there exists a single planning agent, with a single integrated plan. The quest for that single planning agent, with his single integrated plan, is enhanced when we operate in terms of the assumption, stated or unstated, that this planning mind does, in fact, have to exist. Couple this quest, whether implicit or explicit, with modern evolutionism’s longing for a new evolution—the emergence of a new personal sovereign who can offer this impersonal, meaningless universe a comprehensive plan with comprehensive meaning—and you have created serious problems for the defenders of the free market.

The case for the free market as an impersonal, spontaneous, unplanned institution that can nevertheless successfully integrate the multitudinous plans of acting men is generally at odds with the intellectual spirit of the twenty-first century. Men are seeking cosmic purpose, having been told that collective mankind is capable of imposing such purpose by means of scientific planning and even genetic engineering. They are less likely to abandon this quest in exchange for the free market’s decentralized planning mechanism, its freely fluctuating price system, and its system of economic calculation for private individuals. The price that post-Darwin evolutionists are asked to pay, religiously speaking, is simply too high. In short, the defenders of the free market have priced themselves out of secular humanism’s marketplace of ideas.

This is not to say that every modern economist is self-consciously a defender of the kind of planning outlined by Lester Frank Ward. Not very many economists are that confident about centralized economic planning. This is also not to say that the majority of men, or even a majority of trained social scientists, understand fully the sleight-of-hand operation of modern evolutionism, with its shift from purposeless origins to man-directed evolutionary process. Nevertheless, the climate of opinion in the twenty-first century is strongly influenced by this sleight-of-hand operation, and its conclusions regarding the sovereignty of planning over collective mankind have permeated the thinking of those who probably do not fully understand the epistemological and metaphysical presuppositions of these conclusions. The fact is, autonomous men want their godhead unified, and the hydra-headed, impersonal, spontaneous institution we call the free market is not sufficiently conscious and purposeful to satisfy the longings of modern men for cosmic personalism, meaning humanism's version of cosmic personalism, meaning deified Man.

249. Israel Kirzner, An Essay on Capital (New York: Augustus Kelley, 1966), p. 38.

Conclusion

We should not hope to succeed in making a successful case for the free market by using the logic of Kant, the logic of Darwin, or the logic of Mises, Hayek, Friedman, and other Kantian Darwinists. We should not hope to convert modern evolutionists to the free market ideology if we ground that defense in terms of a less consistent version of evolutionism. The older Darwinist heritage simply does not gain large numbers of adherents, precisely because modern evolutionists are involved in a religious quest for man-directed cosmic evolution, and this quest is at odds with the logic of decentralized markets.

If the case for the free market is to be successful in the long run, it must be made in terms of a fully consistent philosophy of creationism and theocentric cosmic personalism. The case for the free market must be made in terms of the doctrines of divine providence, biblical revelation, the image of God in man, and the dominion covenant. While this intellectual defense may not impress today's humanistic evolutionists, including Christian scholars whose methodology is still grounded in humanistic evolutionism, it will enable Christians to have a foundation that will survive the predictable disruptions of the economic, political, intellectual, and social universe of the modern evolutionists. We must not try to establish the intellectual foundations of the kingdom of God in terms of the presuppositions of a doomed evolutionist religion. We may be able to use the conclusions of selected secular economists, when these conclusions are in conformity with biblical premises, but it is we who must pick and choose in terms of the Bible, not they. We must abandon evolutionary presuppositions in every area of human thought, including economics.

Appendix B

THE EVOLUTIONISTS' DEFENSE OF THE MARKET

The Book of Genesis cannot be reconciled with the books of Darwin. This is the leading presupposition of this book. Those who prefer to compromise Christian orthodoxy for the sake of academic respectability, or for the sake of their own commitment to the claims of modern science, have made various attempts to mix the two systems. Without exception, Christian orthodoxy is sacrificed on the altar of Darwinism. The Darwinists will accept no compromises with the creationism of Genesis 1. Far too many Christians have been less adamant about the intellectual claims of their religion's premises.

Throughout this book, I have been arguing in terms of a framework that is radically opposed to modern economics' epistemology. Modern schools of economics rest on the presuppositions of Darwinism: Marxism, socialism, free enterprise, and the various mixtures. They begin with the mind of man. They assume that the laws of nature and the laws of thought have evolved over countless eons, with the mind of man being able where necessary to grasp and use the regularities of nature. Not that the human mind can grasp everything; but it can grasp enough to create a science of economics. All systems officially accept some version of process philosophy: as conditions change, and the process of evolution continues, the laws of thought could conceivably change. Ludwig von Mises put it quite well:

Human knowledge is conditioned by the power of the human mind and by the extent of the sphere in which objects evoke human sensations. Perhaps there are in the universe things that our senses cannot perceive and relations that our minds cannot comprehend. There may also exist outside of the orbit we call the universe other systems of things about which we cannot learn anything because, for the time being, no traces of their existence penetrate into our sphere in a way that can modify our sensations. It may also be that the regularity in the conjunction of natural phenomena we are observing is not eternal but only passing, that it prevails only in the present stage (which may last millions of years) of the history of the universe and may one day be replaced by another arrangement.¹

At least as an official position, the mind of man may become something different in the future. Mises wrote: “Man—up to now, at least—has always gone lamentably amiss in his attempts to bridge the gulf that he sees yawning between mind and matter, between the rider and the horse, between the mason and the stone. It would be preposterous to view this failure as a sufficient demonstration of the soundness of a dualistic philosophy. All that we can infer from it is that science—at least for the time being—must adopt a dualistic approach, less as a philosophical explanation than as a methodological device.”² This logical dualism is post-Kantian dualism: the split between thought and matter, and between the phenomena of science (scientific regularity) and the noumena of ethics (beyond rational categories). Somehow the two realms are connected (if man is to retain power), yet unconnected (if man is to retain freedom). This nature-freedom dualism is basic to all modern philosophy.³ Secular economics cannot escape this dualism.⁴

As I have begun to demonstrate in this book, and as I demonstrate more thoroughly in the commentaries that follow, the Bible establishes as a social norm a system of civil government and personal responsibility that leads to the formation of a free market economy. I have drawn heavily from the writings of economists who favor the free market in order to explain certain relationships and consequences of such a market system. Predictably, those who argue that the Bible does not establish moral and judicial foundations that lead to capitalism tend also to reject the logic of free market economics. They wind up citing secular economists who favor Keynesian intervention by the civil gov-

1. Ludwig von Mises, Theory and History: An Interpretation of Social and Economic Evolution (Auburn Alabama: Mises Institute, 2007), p. 8. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTAH>) This book was first published by Yale University Press in 1957.

2. Ibid., p. 1.

3. Herman Dooyeweerd, In the Twilight of Western Thought: Studies in the Pretended Autonomy of Philosophical Thought (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1960), pp. 46–52.

4. Gary North, “Economics: From Reason to Intuition,” in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1976).

ernment into economic affairs, or they cite even more radical secular economists. But both sides rely heavily on the conclusions of the warring camps of humanistic economists.

If I have rejected environmental determinism, evolutionism, and humanism in general, how can I legitimately use the arguments of environmental determinists, evolutionists, and humanists to support my case for a free market social order? Can I evade the accusation of the “Christian socialists” and “liberation theologians” that what I propose is simply a disguised version of secular capitalism, a baptized version of Adam Smith’s Wealth of Nations?

The best way that I can legitimately counter this criticism is to show that I do not accept Darwinian evolution as the scientific foundation of Christian economics, and then demonstrate that, to the extent that the defenders of the free market accept such a foundation, they wind up without a logical position to defend. I also have tried to show in Appendix A on Social Darwinism that the demise of nineteenth-century Classical liberal economics was assured from the start, precisely because Darwinism really does not believe in the “survival of the fittest” and “evolution through natural selection,” once man, the rational planner appears in history. In other words, to paraphrase Cornelius Van Til, the humanistic economists have borrowed their accurate conclusions from Christianity. They cannot tell us why human minds agree, or why such minds can interpret the universe, or why the universe is coherent (since it has its origins in randomness or chaos), or why there is human freedom in a deterministic universe, or why the noumenal realm of ethics (outside of the determined realm of scientific law) can determine affairs in the external, cause-determined world of matter. Yet they say they can make all kinds of statements about economic events. How can they do this? They do not say.

The Christian economist can say. He points to a sovereign God who is the Creator. He points to a record of the creation in Genesis, chapter 1. He points to man, who is made in the image of God. He points to God’s assignment to man in Genesis 1:28 to subdue the earth. He points to man’s ability to name the animals. All of these facts of the Genesis account provide the foundation of Christian thought in general and Christian economics in particular. The orderly creation reflects an orderly, sovereign God. Man is made in God’s image, so he can understand the external world, for which he is responsible before God as a steward. Nature and man are not chance-determined, for how can anything be determined in a chance universe? Nor are nature and man determined by a law-chained system of impersonal, freedom-denying cause and effect. God is sovereign, man is responsible, and nature is orderly. The Christian announces this in confidence. The humanistic economists deny the first assertion, so they have found no logical, universally acceptable arguments to affirm the second and third. They are intellectually defenseless.

A. Hayek's Evolutionism

F. A. Hayek won the Nobel Prize in economics in 1974, sharing the award with the Swedish socialist, Gunnar Myrdal. (It was widely rumored that Hayek never expected to win it, and Myrdal never expected to share it.) Hayek's award was made specifically for his early work in economics, which lent a degree of irony to the award, since so much of Hayek's early writings on trade cycles and capital theory was dependent upon the pioneering work of Ludwig von Mises.⁵ Mises had died in relative obscurity in 1973, ignored by the economics profession, an outcast who had never been given a full professorship in the United States, even at New York University, which was not one of the more prestigious universities in America. He had remained a pariah in his own department, subsidized by outside funds, and officially a "visiting professor"—whose visit lasted from the mid-1940s until his retirement in the late 1960s.⁶ Yet by 1912, Mises had established himself as one of the world's most eloquent defenders of free market economics.⁷ He was a neo-Kantian rationalist who was unwilling to adopt the modern Darwinian view of Man, the sovereign central planner.

Hayek devoted a decade of his academic career to the construction of monetary and capital theory based on Mises' "Austrian" premises. The second phase of Hayek's career was more deeply social and philosophical, and it began in the 1940s. He is far more famous for the books and essays that he produced during this later period, especially The Road to Serfdom (1944). Hayek offered the finest statement of

5. F. A. Hayek, Prices and Production (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1931] 1960); Monetary Theory and the Trade Cycle (New York: Augustus Kelley, [1933] 1966); Profits, Interest, and Investment (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1937); The Pure Theory of Capital (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1941] 1962). All are available as free downloads from the Mises Institute. (<http://bit.ly/miseslit>)

6. Margit von Mises, My Years with Ludwig von Mises (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1976), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/mvmyears>)

7. Ludwig von Mises, The Theory of Money and Credit (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Press, [1912] 1981). The first American edition was published in 1953 by Yale University Press. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTMC>) late-nineteenth-century classical social theory in his later books. They are erudite, heavily footnoted, eloquent defenses of Darwinian, Kantian social philosophy. They all rest on an explicit foundation of evolutionism.

1. The Two Rationalisms

One of the recurring themes in Hayek's writings is this one: There have been two forms of rationalism in the West. The first form is best represented by the writings of the Scottish social theorists of the eighteenth century, most notably Adam Ferguson, who wrote: "Nations stumble upon establishments, which are indeed the result of human action, but not the execution of any human design."⁸ Hayek used this phrase repeatedly, most notably in an essay "The Results of Human Action but not of Human Design" (1967). The second form of rationalism is the rationalism of the central planner. Human action is seen as being rational only when it is the result of human design, namely, the design of a sovereign, rational, scientific planning agency. The origin of this second position, as far as the history of the modern West is concerned, was the French Revolution. Hayek's book, The Counter-Revolution of Science (1952), is an historical study of the origin and development of "designing rationalism" in social theory.⁹ He called this "constructivist rationalism." Men rationally construct social institutions.

If we use Darwinian categories, we can better understand the two rationalisms. The first form, which Hayek favored, is that propounded by Adam Ferguson, Adam Smith, Edmund Burke, and other eighteenth-century mainly Scottish social theorists. Their view was that human institutions are the product of long years of unregulated development. Legal, economic, and other institutional arrangements were not consciously designed by any human planning agency. Nevertheless, they are coherent, rational, and productive.

This argument impressed the early evolutionists, who took the paradigm and transferred it to geology and biology. A process of undesigned competition produced the biological world in which man

8. Adam Ferguson, An Essay on the History of Civil Society (1797), p. 187; cited by Hayek, "The Results of Human Action but not of Human Design" (1967), in his book, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), p. 96n.

9. F. A. Hayek, The Counter-Revolution of Science: Studies on the Abuse of Reason (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Press, [1952] 1979).

finds himself, they argued. Eighteenth-century social theory influenced the development of nineteenth-century scientific evolutionary thought, not the other way around. Hayek made this explicit. The goal of the Scottish social theorists was to find the source of institutional regularity in man rather than God. The same motivation—eliminating God from theory—was basic to nineteenth-century scientific evolutionism. Hayek wrote:

From these conceptions gradually grew a body of social theory that showed how, in the relations among men complex and orderly and, in a very definite sense, purposive institutions might grow up which owed little to design, which were not invented but arose from the separate actions of many men who did not know what they were doing. This demonstration that something greater than man's individual mind may grow from men's fumbling efforts represented in some ways an even greater challenge to all design theories than even the later theory of biological evolution. For the first time it was shown that an evident order which was not the product of a designing human intelligence need not therefore be ascribed to the design of a higher, supernatural intelligence, but that there was a third possibility—the emergence of order as the result of adaptive evolution.

Since the emphasis we shall have to place on the role that selection plays in this process of social evolution today is likely to create the impression that we are borrowing the idea from biology, it is worth stressing that it was, in fact, the other way around: there can be little doubt that it was from the theories of social evolution that Darwin and his contemporaries derived the suggestion for their theories.¹⁰

Man becomes the sovereign acting and planning agent in such a framework, but not man, the central planner. The Scottish philosophers were seeking for the origins of purposeful institutions outside of purposeful and comprehensive designs, either by men or God. Few of them were willing to abandon the concept of God entirely, but they did want to eliminate a continuing series of miracles from the record of man's institutions. They did not want to eliminate the idea of providence, but they also did not want to base their historical accounts of man's progress on miracles or other kinds of divine intervention. They were headed in the direction of cosmic impersonalism, and the scientific evolutionists a century later finally arrived, briefly, at their destination, only to substitute man as the new source of cosmic per-sonalism.

10. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), pp. 58–59.

The second form of rationalism also can be seen in the writings of the scientific evolutionists. Darwin was impressed with the skills of horticulturalists and animal breeders in breeding new variations of plants and animals.¹¹ He recognized that there is a role for conscious planning. Natural selection's co-discoverer, Alfred Russel Wallace, was aware of the anomaly in the theory of natural selection, namely, the power of man's mind, which did not come from a slow, steady, continuous interaction with his environment, but which must have been the result of a discontinuous leap in being—a violation of the very heart of the theory of evolution through natural selection.¹² Man, the thinker, can begin to replace the purposeless, impersonal processes of nature. This same sort of transformation of the theory—from purposelessness to man's sovereignty—took place in biological theory as well as social theory. *This is the heart of modern humanism.*¹³

Hayek recognized the error of the late-nineteenth-century right-wing Social Darwinists.

It is unfortunate that at a later date the social sciences, instead of building on their beginnings in their own field, reimported some of these ideas from biology and with them brought in such conceptions as "natural selection," "struggle for existence," and "survival of the fittest," which are not appropriate in their field; for in social evolution, the decisive factor is not the selection of the physical and inheritable properties of the individuals but the selection by imitation of successful institutions and habits. Though this operates also through the success of individuals and groups, what emerges is not an inheritable attribute of individuals, but ideas and skills—in short, the whole cultural inheritance which is passed on by learning and imitation.¹⁴

It should be obvious what Hayek was trying to do. He was trying to return social theory to the Scottish evolutionism of the eighteenth

11. "We cannot suppose that all the breeds were suddenly produced as perfect and as useful as we now see them; indeed, in many cases, we know that this has not been their history. The key is man's power of accumulative selection: nature gives successive variations; man adds them up in certain directions useful to him. In this sense he may be said to have made for himself useful species." Darwin, The Origin of Species (New York: Modern Library edition), p. 29. This statement is taken from the first chapter of the book, "Variation Under Domestication."

12. Cf. Loren Eiseley, Darwin's Century: Evolution and the Men Who Discovered It (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1958] 1961), ch. 11: "Wallace and the Brain."

13. Appendix A.

14. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 59.

century. He was trying to get the model of impersonal, physical competition in biology out of economic theory. He wanted to return to eighteenth-century social evolutionism. But he was unsuccessful in his attempt. The modern version of evolutionistic social theory moves forward, not backward; its promoters want to bring to the forefront Man, the purposeful central planner—a source of coherence and design in an otherwise impersonal universe. Man, the decentralized actor is not sufficiently powerful to assure the species of survival, let alone domination and Godless dominion. Modern socialists want the dominion covenant, but they do not want God, except insofar as man as a species is God. Men want design: they just refuse to believe in a sovereign, supernatural Designer.

2. Decentralized Knowledge

Hayek's defense of the free market social order rests on his concept of human knowledge. He argued for the division of labor in knowledge.¹⁵ Men are not omniscient. Each individual knows his own talents and weaknesses, challenges and successes, better than anyone else. What is needed is an integrating system to call forth the most accurate and relevant knowledge that each man possesses to deal with the economic problems of a universe of scarce resources. This system needs a feedback process, so that erroneous information and inapplicable approaches are not funded endlessly, thereby wasting resources. Men need to learn from their mistakes. They also need to imitate successful strategies. Only by decentralizing the decision-making process, Hayek argued, can mankind call forth its greatest reserves in order to achieve . . . what? Each individual's highest personal goals. Hayek was an individualist. He believed that we must begin our social analysis with the individual decision-maker. By allowing each person to achieve his goals by whatever voluntary and non-coercive approach he decides is best-fitted to his skills and capital, we allow the spontaneous development of a social order that allows each of us to prosper. Conclusion: what is best for a majority of economic actors is best for the society as a whole. Out of individual competition comes collective prosperity. This is the essence of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, and it is still the essence of modern free market social theory. Hayek defended the whole idea.

15. F. A. Hayek, "The Use of Knowledge in Society" (1945); reprinted in Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), ch. 4. This was a seminal essay in economic theory. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>)

This social philosophy requires great faith to sustain it. Its system of social causation is not self-evident. Men must believe that the voluntaristic exchange system is, in fact, a system. They must believe that beneficial social results stem from individual decisions to truck and barter. Out of the voluntary, self-centered decisions of the many will come a social order beneficial to the one of human society. This is the religion which Hayek offers to us. Very few post-Darwin intellectuals believe in this eighteenth-century religion.

"It is through the mutually adjusted efforts of many people that more knowledge is utilized than anyone individual possesses," Hayek wrote, "or than it is possible to synthesize intellectually; and it is through such utilization of dispersed knowledge that achievements are made possible greater than any single mind can foresee. It is because freedom means the renunciation of direct control of individual efforts that a free society can make use of so much more knowledge than the mind of the wisest ruler can comprehend."¹⁶ This is the heart of Hayek's defense of human freedom: the better use of that most precious of scarce resources, knowledge. "It is therefore no argument against individual freedom that it is frequently abused. Freedom necessarily means that many things will be done which we do not like. Our faith in freedom does not rest on the foreseeable results in particular circumstances but on the belief that it will, on balance, release more forces for the good than for the bad."¹⁷

Here is an undefendable faith indeed. "Our faith in freedom" rests on our "belief" that freedom will "on balance" produce more good than bad. Yet, as I have surveyed at some length in Chapter 5, the secular economist cannot possibly assess either good or bad in a social order, since it is not possible to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility—assuming that we are speaking about what rational, autonomous, scientific economics can. The same problem faces the ethicist. It is the old problem of aggregates: Is the total pleasure I get from sticking pins into you greater than the total pain you receive? How can we add and subtract good and bad? Modern subjectivist economics cannot possibly permit such aggregation, yet it must make such judgments in order to defend the validity of the free market's social order. "The benefits of this system, on balance, are greater than the costs." On what balance? Evaluated by whom? Hayek appealed to something that he knew is irrational and inconsistent with the very foundations of modern subjectivist economics. He appealed to an aggregate that by definition cannot possibly exist, if we accept the logic of subjectivism. In short, he could not logically defend the free market's benefits.

16. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, pp. 30–31.

17. Ibid., p. 31.

3. A Balanced Social Order

Socialists and interventionists do not take Hayek's faith seriously. They see it as irrational. How can we possibly believe that an unplanned, undesigned, individualistic economic system is beneficial, when we know some participants get hurt, or lose money? Why not allow the greater vision of central planners to intervene and remove the evils, while leaving the benefits? Not possible, said Hayek: to call forth men's best knowledge and best efforts, they must know that the civil government will not intervene and redistribute the gains any man makes. Nonsense, say the interventionists. People want to live in a "fair" regime, in which nobody is faced with total disaster. We can "clean up" the market's failures. We can "balance" its inequities. If Hayek's unnamed and undefined balance undergirds his system, the concept of the equitable nature of the civil government undergirds the socialists' system. Each side appeals to logic in order to convince us that such a balance exists. Yet neither side can show how such a balance can be perceived and achieved in a world devoid of a method of adding and subtracting individual assessments of utility.

Hayek's system rests on the idea that undesigned human institutional arrangements are reliable. The socialist wants us to believe that man-designed, centrally administered human institutions are reliable. Hayek wanted species man, the purposeful planners. The socialists want scientific elites who plan for the benefit of species man. The implicit and even explicit humanism of both camps should be obvious. Neither side is willing to appeal to fixed standards of ethics, economics, or civil government in the Bible. Neither side wants to consider the balance as being in the hand of an omniscient God. Men or Man, individuals or planning elites, must be understood to possess the balance. Economists insist that they can see good or evil in the aggregate. God is an irrelevant hypothesis for both camps. They both agree: man is the starting point for economic and political analysis. But man is both individual and corporate. Which man is fundamental to economic analysis?

The socialist wants to pass laws against sticking pins into people, so to speak—laws against “excessive” or “obscene” profits, laws against price competition, and so forth. The free market defender says that such “pins” are a lot better than the “pins” of unemployment (minimum wage laws), gluts (price floors), shortages (price ceilings), weak competition (restricted profits), and so forth. Which are the real “pins”? The two sides cannot agree. They cannot appeal to a reliable, eternal definition of pins, coercion, and immoral activity. They cannot define pin-sticking, let alone tally up pleasure and pain from pin-sticking.

4. Hayek's Historicism

In a perceptive essay by one of Hayek's former students, Eugene Miller, he pointed to an important contradiction in Hayek's thought. He did not point out that this same contradiction is basic to every humanist system, but the point is nonetheless well taken. Hayek rejected historicism: the theory that the mind of man changes with the stages of history. Yet he also rejected the idea of fixed categories of thought or sensory perception in the human mind. Hayek used the idea of fixed ideas in order to refute those who went too far for him in this area of historical change and its effects on human perception, thought, and action. Yet he was dependent on some variation of “mild” historicism in order to defend himself against the charge of static idealism. Miller summarized Hayek's dualism:

On the one hand, Hayek wants to retain the idea that science can give a reliable explanation of regularities in the objective physical world. Indeed, his account of human cognition presupposes the validity of his physiological explanation of the principles that underlie the cognitive processes. On the other hand, his general conclusions about the character of human cognition seem to undermine the very possibility of objective knowledge and to concede the basic premises of extreme historicism. He argues that all perception and reasoning are predetermined by a classificatory system or “map” that varies from one individual and group to another and changes over time.¹⁸

Hayek's epistemology is therefore dualistic.

Hayek argued explicitly that all values are evolutionary. They are determined by the interaction of the changing environment and our civilization. He explicitly rejected radical historicism—the doctrine that each stage of history has its own values, laws, and perceptions—yet he implicitly adopted precisely this outlook. He wrote, “the basic conclusion that the whole of our civilization and all human values are the result of a long process of evolution in the course of which values, as the aims of human activity appeared, continue to change, seems inescapable in the light of our present knowledge. We are probably also entitled to conclude that our present values exist only as the elements of a particular cultural tradition and are significant only for some more or less long phase of evolution—whether this phase includes some of our pre-human ancestors or is confined to certain periods of human civilization. We have no more ground to ascribe to them eternal existence than to the human race itself.”¹⁹ Hayek believed in morals, since morality is the foundation of the free market order, but he wanted morals derived from tradition—the products of human action but not human design. In fact, he excoriated the “rationalism” of Descartes and the French Revolutionaries for having insisted that morality be subject to logical proof. He wrote:

18. Eugene F. Miller, “Hayek's Critique of Reason,” Modern Age (Fall 1976), p. 390. (<http://bit.ly/MillerHayek>)

This moral system on which the formation of a worldwide market rested increasingly lacked credence and was partly destroyed, with the assistance of a new philosophy. In the seventeenth century, Hobbes, and particularly Descartes, at first in the intellectual, and then in the moral, field stated that one must not believe anything which cannot be proved. This view gradually spread, especially in the eighteenth century, and in the nineteenth century this philosophical doubt about traditional morals suddenly became practically effective. The loss of the moral beliefs which had been essential for the maintenance of the existing market system was suddenly given a sort of intellectual foundation. It came to be believed that the ruling moral beliefs were unfounded, were pretenses contrary to instinct and reason, and were invented for the protection of those who would profit by them. The young decided that since nobody could explain why they should obey these morals rather than others, they were going to make their own morals. Only morals which had been deliberately designed for a recognized common good purpose could really be accepted as worthy of a fully adult human race. And the purpose would have to be the satisfaction of the innate natural instincts of man.²⁰

19. F. A. Hayek, “The Theory of Complex Phenomena” (1964); reprinted in Hayek, Studies, p. 38.

20. A Conversation with Friedrich A. von Hayek: Science and Socialism (Feb. 9, 1978) (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute, 1979), p. 11.

How could he defend himself against the accusation that his morality is irrational or relative? What if the socialist argues that we are entering into a new era? The old laws of capitalism, including bourgeois morality, are now being superseded by a new era of proletarian production, proletarian morality, and proletarian economics! This is precisely what Marx and his followers have been arguing since the 1840s. It is the argument of all historicist systems: eras change, and morals change with them. How could Hayek, as an evolutionist, deal with historicism? He stated his preference for the traditionalism of Ferguson and Burke, which “is based on an evolutionary interpretation of all phenomena of culture and mind and on an insight into the limits of the powers of the human reason.”²¹ Miller commented:

The fact is, however, that “tradition” is not a single, unified phenomenon. What we call “Western civilization” is but one of many traditions of mankind; and internal to it are many divergent and conflicting strands. Hayek himself acknowledges that the tradition of constructivist [designing] rationalism is as old and as strong within Western civilization as the tradition of critical [evolutionary] rationalism. What are we to do in the face of this conflict among and within traditions? Hayek leaves us only with the options of submitting humbly to the tradition which makes the most forceful claim upon us or else of choosing boldly but blindly among competing traditions. He eliminates the possibility that we can make a rational choice among traditions on the basis of what is true or good by nature. Reason cannot judge among traditions, because it can function only within such a matrix as tradition itself supplies; and this matrix is nonrational and devoid of meaning. Moreover, there are no permanent values by reference to which reason could make this judgment. All human values are the result of a long process of evolution, and they continue to change in the course of this process.²²

Hayek's system, like all other modern systems of economics, is epistemologically committed to process philosophy, better known as historicism. It leaves his defense of the market intellectually defenseless against those more self-consistent historicists who boldly proclaim a change in eras, the arrival of a new world order.

5. Moral Structure and Change

Hayek, for all his immense erudition, was caught in a familiar bind

21. Hayek, Studies, p. 161.

22. Miller, “Hayek's Critique,” op. cit., pp. 392–93.

of all humanistic scholarship: the problem of structure and change.²³ He wanted a moral order, but he did not want it imposed by a sovereign God who is outside the processes of history. He wanted a moral order that provides stability, so that the free market possesses widely recognized “rules of the game.” His later career was marked by a series of studies relating to the way in which such rules are established, and how a society can enforce them without changing them unrealistically, or tampering with them too much, or converting them into arbitrary pieces of legislation. Without structure, there can be no orderly social and economic progress. Without a moral standard, it is not possible to determine whether any given social change is progressive. If everything is flux, then whirl is king, and Hayek never argued for whirl. But he did argue that all morality is, ultimately, the product of an interaction between decentralized acting men and a changing environment.²⁴

What kind of foundation is this? What kind of stable moral and legal order can result from such a concept of morality? How can any variety of process philosophy (evolutionism) produce a reliable, universally recognized, widely accepted moral framework? Hayek wound up calling for men to believe in the morality of selfishness, the benefits of which “we cannot see.”

There is, ultimately, a moral justification for selfishness, if you care to call it that, for just obeying the commands of the market system. If we can make people understand this, we may revive the kinds of general rules of behavior which, a hundred years ago, governed the Western world and which have become largely discredited, but without which our capacity to benefit others will decline. We can tell people that the rules which we are rapidly discarding do serve the benefit of mankind, although we cannot see it; we must not imagine that we can choose what to do in order to serve the benefit of mankind. All we can do is to obey the rules which have established themselves and produce the worldwide division of labor and perhaps gradually try to improve these rules.²⁵

Why did Hayek expect to win the battle for men’s minds with this

23. This dualism goes back to the pre-Socratics: Parmenides (logical structure) vs. Heraclitus (historical change).

24. “Every change in conditions will make necessary some change in the use of resources, in the direction and kind of human activities, in habits and practices. And each change in the actions of those affected in the first instance will require further adjustments that will gradually extend throughout the whole of society.” Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 28.

25. Conversation, pp. 14–15.

kind of a defense of the market? It is initially repulsive morally (selfishness), until we consider the sophisticated arguments that undergird it. Yet even these arguments ultimately fail, for he could not demonstrate the benefits scientifically (no interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility),²⁶ and he could not demonstrate that the moral and legal rules of the game should not be changed in some future social order—or even in today's social order, which is no longer the environment of the late nineteenth century, let alone Scotland in the mid-eighteenth century.

Evolutionism is another variety of historicism, and historicism offers man no fixed, reliable, universal, and perpetually binding principles of law, legislation, and liberty (to use the title of Hayek's trilogy). How can any decentralist version of evolution win men's minds in an era in which the second stage of evolutionism, the infamous "sleight of hand"—elitist planners as the source of future evolution for the benefit of species man—has become the reigning faith?

Men must believe in some authority. They must obey that authority if they are to survive. It may be the market economy, or the civil government, or the Bible, but men need a source of reliable authority to commit themselves to. There can be no division of labor without such subordination. Men necessarily obey someone. Hayek fully understood this principle of human action. He called on men to obey the laws and conventions of the undesigned free market order. Men are to exercise faith in the benefits and reliability of this order. They are to believe that it is, in fact, a true order, and not a capricious, random, and destructive anti-system. Hayek did not minimize the individual's obligation to obey: ". . . the individual, in participating in the social processes, must be ready and willing to adjust himself to changes and to submit to conventions which are not the result of intelligent design, whose justification in the particular instance may not be recognizable, and which to him will often appear unintelligible and irrational."²⁷ Men must, in short, exercise blind faith. They must subordinate themselves faithfully to social processes that they do not understand, processes that even appear irrational to them. They must do this if the free market order is to survive.

If survival is the criterion of success, then the free market order in the twentieth century began to resemble a social dodo bird, headed for

26. Chapter 5.

27. F. A. Hayek, "Individualism: True and False" (1945); reprinted in Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order, p. 22.

extinction. If success in the open marketplace of ideas is the proper criterion, then the free market's undesigned structure has not produced the intellectual defenses that might insure its survival. Perhaps someday people will believe in the market as fervently as Hayek wanted men to believe—a blind faith in an undesigned order—but throughout the twentieth century, such faith shrank. Men are far more ready to believe in a designed social order as a way to secure man's place in the cosmos as the provider of cosmic personalism. This is a social order that in conformity to the second stage of the Darwinian sleight of hand, with scientific planners taking control of the impersonal forces of evolution. Hayek's decentralized rationalism runs against the grain of the dominant schools of post-Darwin social philosophy. Hayek's arguments, one could say, are not rationally designed to be successful in an era that wants to believe in rational designs.

6. Human Action

The great intellectual contribution of the Austrian School of economics is the focus on purposeful human action. Austrian School economists have again and again called attention to the individual decision-making of acting men. They have argued that a system of voluntary exchange enables men to call forth the productivity of others, as well as to evaluate the economic value of their own contributions. The free market order has produced more wealth and more freedom, as well as more personal responsibility in economic affairs, than any other economic system in man's history. But the Austrians, being humanists, evolutionists, and radical subjectivists, cannot logically prove any of this.

The "designing rationalists," who want the power of the civil government to direct human actions, can point to the obvious coherence of the idea of national economic planning. They seldom find people who understand that the imposed rationalism of socialism creates what Mises has called "planned chaos," while the seemingly uncoordinated efforts of men voluntarily exchanging goods and services on a free market produce an integrated, growth-oriented production system. The "top-down" rationalism produces just the opposite of what the intellectual defenders of central planning have promised. It produces an uncoordinated, fragmented system of disrupted production. The "bottom-up" system of decentralized planning is alone capable of producing social order, for it places greater responsibility for decision-making in the hands of the individual. But without a concept of a fixed moral order with its source outside of man, imposed as an ideal for man by a sovereign Creator, Hayek and the other humanist economists cannot prove that a decentralized economic order can produce a just, productive, and desirable social order. Without standards of performance, men cannot make wise decisions.

7. Shifting Standards

Mises argued eloquently that without a market economy, men cannot make accurate economic calculations.²⁸ A Christian social philosopher points out that, without a system of permanent, universal morality, there is also no way to make accurate economic calculations, for there is no constant that survives over time—from the beginning of acting man's plan to its conclusion—by which any man can evaluate the success of his efforts. As the Bible says, what does it profit a man if he gains the whole world and loses his soul (Mark 8:36)?²⁹ Here is the most crucial of all economic decisions—the question of profitable stewardship before God—and secular man cannot make this decision accurately. He has no fixed moral or aesthetic standards by which to evaluate his success. Process philosophy cannot provide permanent standards, for no man can be sure that he has not entered into a new world order between the time when he began to plan and the time he believes he has brought his plan to completion. Continuity over time—moral, epistemological, social, economic—cannot be logically affirmed by means of any evolutionary philosophy.

How do we know that the market order still works? How do we avoid Marx's argument that capitalism was far more productive than feudal production methods, but its day has come at last, now that proletarians are about to bring in a new world order? Hayek could not tell us. How do we know that our capitalist tools still are performing better than socialist tools? Hayek wrote:

. . . we command many tools—in the widest sense of that word—which the human race has evolved and which enable us to deal with our environment. These are the results of the experience of successive generations which are handed down. And, once a more efficient tool is available, it will be used without our knowing why it is better,

28. Ludwig von Mises, Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth (1920). (<http://mises.org/econcalc.asp>) or even what the alternatives are.

29. Gary North, Trust and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Mark and John (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 11.

These “tools” which man has evolved and which constitute such an important part of his adaptation to his environment include much more than material implements. They consist in a large measure of forms of conduct which he habitually follows without knowing why; they consist of what we call “traditions” and “institutions,” which he uses because they are available to him as a product of cumulative growth without ever having been designed by anyone mind. Man is generally ignorant not only of why he uses implements of one shape rather than of another but also of how much is dependent on his actions taking one form rather than another. . . . Every change in conditions will make necessary some change in the use of resources, in the direction and kind of human activities, in habits and practices. And each change in the actions of those affected in the first instance will require further adjustments that will gradually extend throughout the whole of society. Thus every change in a sense creates a “problem” for society, even though no single individual perceives it as such; and it is gradually “solved” by the establishment of a new overall adjustment. . . . Who will prove to possess the right combination of aptitudes and opportunities to find the better way is just as little predictable as by what manner or process different kinds of knowledge and skill will combine to bring about a solution of the problem.³⁰

To use the same kind of reasoning, what if we are today at one of those periods in which new intellectual tools are replacing the old ones? What if the Marxists are correct, that man is entering a new moral age? As Irving Kristol said in a speech in 1981, one of the important products in all capitalist systems is socialism. Joseph Schumpeter said the same thing in 1942.³¹ Why should we resist the obvious and universal transformation of capitalist social orders into socialist orders? We cannot, as methodological individualists, make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. People are adopting socialist ideas. Isn't that proof enough of the development of a “new tool,” the intellectual tool of socialism? Why fight it?

Darwin argued that species evolved into new species. Marx argued the same thing concerning societies, although he expected a discontinuous leap—revolution—to mark such transitions. Hayek argued that tools are evolved through imitation and competition to deal with environmental changes, or men's new perceptions of environmental possibilities. How could he legitimately argue that socialism is an invalid "tool" in today's Darwinian society, if the planners can predict the future better, arouse moral indignation more efficiently, and erase the flaws of the older, pre-modern capitalist order?

30. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, pp. 27–28.

31. Joseph Schumpeter, Capitalism, Socialism, and Democracy (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1942] 1965), especially chapters 12 and 13. See also Ben Rogge [ROWEguez], Can Capitalism Survive? (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Press, 1979).

If you cannot legitimately appeal to fixed human nature (evolutionism denies any such thing), and you cannot appeal to fixed moral standards (process philosophy denies any such standards), and you cannot appeal to the greater output of capitalism (no interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility are scientifically valid), then how are you able to defend the free market? Who is going to pay any attention? When mankind faces the possibility of extinction if we fail to compete successfully with other species, isn't it sensible to adopt social, economic, and genetic planning in order to guarantee man's triumph? Aren't we in a war against other species? Can any army be successful that has no chain of command, no centralized leadership? The social impulse of Darwinism is to establish man's position as the new sovereign over nature. Man as central planner is a powerful image. How can Hayek's version of evolutionism—analogue to the pre-human, purposeless, undesigned evolutionary process—compete with "the real thing," namely, elitist planning by scientific experts?

Hayek's reasoning has failed to convince men in the marketplace of ideas. What other standard can be used by Hayek or his followers to appeal to beyond the marketplace of ideas? Mises, Hayek's mentor, knew there was no such appeal for a true Austrian economist, which is why he was incapable of optimism regarding the future of man.

Whatever is to be said in favor of correct logical thinking does not prove that the coming generations of men will surpass their ancestors in intellectual effort and achievements. History shows that again and again periods of marvelous mental accomplishments were followed by periods of decay and retrogression. We do not know whether the next generation will beget people who are able to continue along the lines of the geniuses who made the last centuries so glorious. We do not know anything about the biological conditions that enable a man to take one step forward in the march of intellectual advancement. We cannot preclude the assumption that there may be limits to man's further intellectual ascent. And certainly we do not know whether in this ascent there is not a point beyond which the intellectual leaders can no longer succeed in convincing the masses and making them follow their lead.³²

Or, as he wrote in a manuscript as he was about to flee Switzerland in 1940: "Occasionally I entertained the hope that my writings would bear practical fruit and show the way for policy. Constantly I have been looking for evidence of a change in ideology. But I have never allowed myself to be deceived. I have come to realize that my theories explain the degeneration of a great civilization; they do not prevent it. I set out to be a reformer, but only became the historian of decline."³³ The historian of decline: a sad task for an economist. His Darwinian evolutionism was too old-fashioned; it did not honor Man, the central planner, or Man, the new predestinator. Hayek and Mises won few followers among economists.

B. Purposeless Evolutionism

Hayek's most notable contribution to the epistemology of economics is his continuing development of the concept of purposeful action within the legal framework of a free market. It is the market process that provides acting men with a maximum of information, especially information necessary to the dovetailing of competing plans by individuals. The focus on purposeful action marks the Austrian School of economists more than any other academic group of economists.

The most influential group of free market economists, generally referred to as the Chicago School (since so many of the members attended, or have taught at, the University of Chicago), is more forthrightly empiricist in its epistemology. They want to discuss economic facts. They want economic theory to prove itself by its performance in making verifiable predictions. They regard themselves as defenders of positivist economics: empirical, inductivist economics, as contrasted to logical, deductivist economics (the Austrian School's approach). Because they cling to a scientific idea that is much closer to the logic of the natural sciences, they are less concerned about unmeasurable, unverifiable concepts such as "human purpose." The Kantian dualism between the phenomenal realm of science and the noumenal realm of human personality has led to the formation of rival schools of free market economists. The Chicago School economists are attempting to be “hard” science advocates, so they are less concerned about the “noumenal.”

32. Ludwig von Mises, The Historical Setting of the Austrian School of Economics (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1969] 1984), pp. 17–18.

33. Mises, Notes and Recollections (South Holland, Illinois: Libertarian Press, 1978), p. 115.

1. Armen Alchian

Chicago School economist Milton Friedman wrote Free to Choose, but Armen Alchian was more consistent with the methodology of natural science. He tried to avoid a word like “choice,” since it is supposedly irrelevant to a discussion based on science.³⁴ It implies too much independence from the law of cause and effect. Human choice as an independent factor cannot be tested; all we can do is speak about demonstrated preference or actual actions made by men.

Because of his devotion to empirical science, Alchian was committed to a concept of economics that is based on results of human actions. He was a committed evolutionist. Nevertheless, Hayek’s brand of decentralized but purposeful evolutionism does not appear in Alchian’s version of evolutionistic economics. Hayek’s system involves heavy reliance on the idea of human purposefulness. Alchian’s essay relies heavily on the idea that the results of human action are what matter, not purposeful behavior. Alchian returned economics to Stage One of the Darwinian paradigm: the purposeless competitive process. This stage, for Darwin and his scientific disciples, was exclusively confined to pre-human evolution, meaning a world of cosmic purposelessness. Once man appeared on the scene, Darwin and his disciples concluded, the rules of evolution changed. Human purposeful choice became the new source of evolutionary change. Man the planning being, man the communicator, man the maker of recorded information, became the source of evolutionary directionality. Alchian’s approach, therefore, is an anachronism: a throwback to the methodology of pre-human evolution.

The classic statement of this methodology is found in his 1950 article, “Uncertainty, Evolution, and Economic Theory.” It should be pointed out from the beginning that few significant new approaches have been achieved through the use of this methodology. One essay by Gary Becker, which I will discuss a bit later, is just about all we have to show for Alchian’s pioneering work. But the original article is important, for it points to the all-pervasive nature of the evolutionary paradigm in modern economic thought. No school of economics has escaped from this paradigm. Alchian's article simply presses one phase of the evolutionary model—the pre-human purposeless phase—to a uniquely depersonalized conclusion.³⁵

34. In a seminar held at Claremont Men’s College in June of 1969, sponsored by the Institute for Humane Studies, Alchian lectured graduate students. He explicitly refused to use the word “choice.” He said that choice is not economically distinguished from impulsive, instinctively motivated action. There is no choice. I attended the conference and kept my notes. That was my choice.

The criterion for success is survival, Alchian concluded. This is original Darwinism. The economic system as a whole determines the survivors. "It does not matter through what process of reasoning or motivation such success was achieved. The fact of its accomplishment is sufficient. This is the criterion by which the economic system selects survivors: those who realize positive profits are the survivors; those who suffer losses disappear."³⁶ We are back to right-wing Social Darwinism. Yet Alchian's version is even more radical, for he was not in the least concerned about the motivation of the survivors. "The preceding interpretation suggests two ideas. First, success (survival) accompanies relative superiority; and, second, it does not require proper motivation but may rather be the result of fortuitous circumstances. Among all competitors, those whose peculiar conditions happen to be the most appropriate of those offered to the economic system for testing and adoption will be 'selected' as survivors."³⁷

Alchian's language, like Darwin's before him, personalizes an impersonal process. The impersonal economic system, like the equally impersonal pre-human process of evolution through natural selection, is described as adopting or selecting survivors. Yet this process cannot be personal. It surely cannot be purposeful. The cold impersonalism of such a process alienated Darwin, as it alienates his disciples, once man appears on the scene. Alchian was more coldly, rigorously logical in his commitment to cosmic impersonalism. The Kantian ideal of personality must be sacrificed to the Kantian ideal of science. "All individual rationality, motivation, and foresight will be temporarily abandoned in order to concentrate upon the ability of the environment to adopt 'appropriate' survivors even in the absence of any adaptive behavior. This is an apparently unrealistic, but never the less very useful, expository

35. I have read other materials written by Alchian, and they show little or no sign of influence from this pioneer essay. It is possible—I think it is likely—that Alchian wrote the 1950 essay as a kind of intellectual exercise, just to make a scientific and radically theoretical point.

36. Armen Alchian, "Uncertainty, Evolution and Economic Theory" (1950); reprinted in The Collected Works of Armen A. Alchian, 2 vols. (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Press, 2006), I, p. 6.

37. Ibid., I, pp. 6–7.

approach. . . ."³⁸

Survival may very well be chance-based. He spoke about the richness which is really inherent in chance. First, even if each and every individual acted in a haphazard and nonmotivated manner, it is possible that the variety of actions would be so great that the resulting collective set would contain actions that are best, in the sense of perfect foresight. For example, at a horse race with enough bettors wagering strictly at random, someone will win on all eight races. Thus individual random behavior does not eliminate the likelihood of observing "appropriate" decisions. Second, and conversely, individual behavior according to some foresight and motivation does not necessarily imply a collective pattern of behavior that is different from the collective variety of actions associated with a random selection of actions.³⁹

Is the market process really comparable to a large horse race? Is entrepreneurship and the market process that rewards or penalizes various degrees of entrepreneurship really comparable to a game of chance? A zero-sum game has rules: winners win at the expense of losers. It is illogical to assume that a game is the same as the uncertainty-reducing process of the free market. Games of chance are based on probability distributions. They involve risk. They rely on the law of large numbers. There is a class probability associated with individual flips of a coin or roll of the dice. But uncertainty is different.⁴⁰ The class probability aspect of games of chance does not apply to future events that are truly uncertain. They cannot be known in advance through the application of statistics.⁴¹ How could Alchian be sure that the analogy of the horse race applies to the competitive struggle of the market—a struggle that is the product of human action? We know that people plan; they also act in terms of plans. They have motivations. Does the logic of impersonal chance apply to the processes of personal decision-making, simply because the market process rewards and punishes? Alchian wrote that "it is possible," but is it probable? Is there any way of testing the probability of his theory? Is there an empirical method that can tell us whether or not the market process is statistically identical to a large game of chance? No empiricist from the

38. Ibid., I, p. 7.

39. Ibid., I, p. 9.

40. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty, and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>)

41. Mises, Human Action, ch. 6.

economics profession has offered such a test, although Alchian thought that such a test is possible.⁴²

The scientism of Alchian's position should be obvious. He was equating men with atoms, biological evolution with market selection. Alchian did not shrink back from his radical methodology.

It is not even necessary to suppose that each firm acts as if it possessed the conventional diagrams and knew the analytical principles employed by economists in deriving optimum and equilibrium conditions. The atoms and electrons do not know the laws of nature; the physicist does not impart to each atom a willful scheme of actions based on laws of conservation of energy, etc. The fact that an economist deals with human beings who have sense and ambitions does not automatically warrant imparting to these humans the great degree of foresight and motivations which the economist may require for his customary analysis as an outside observer or "oracle." The similarity between this argument and Gibbsian statistical mechanics, as well as biological evolution, is not mere coincidence.⁴³

The continuing reliance on the language of personalism to describe a hypothetically impersonal process is revealing. Alchian dismissed trial and error as a standard of economic success. This is too purposeful a process. It involves "conscious adaptive behavior."⁴⁴ This allows far too much importance for the decisions of acting men. Trial and error, he asserted, cannot serve as a success indicator in a changing environment. "As a consequence, the measure of goodness of actions in anything except a tolerable-intolerable sense is lost, and the possibility of an individual's converging to the optimum activity via a trial-and-error process disappears. Trial and error becomes survival or death. It cannot serve as a basis of the individual's method of convergence to a 'maximum' or optimum position. Success is discovered by the economic system through a blanketing shotgun process, not by the individual through a converging search."⁴⁵ Success is discovered—the language of personalism—by the economic system. Survival is the sole criterion. The aggregate process screens the survivors. There is nothing rational or purposeful about this process. It is altogether impersonal.

What is left as an explanation for economic causation? *Imitation.*⁴⁶

42. Alchian, Collected Works, I, p. 9.

43. Ibid., I, pp. 10n–11n.

44. Ibid., I, p. 14.

45. Idem.

46. Ibid., I, p. 13.

Men seek profits. The economic system screens out the successful imitators and innovators from the unsuccessful. "The economic counterparts of genetic heredity, mutations, and natural selection are imitation, innovation, and positive profits."⁴⁷ Alchian did not deny purposeful actions on the part of individuals, but he asserted that "the precise role and nature of purposive behavior in the presence of uncertainty and incomplete information have not been clearly understood or analyzed. It is straightforward, if not heuristic, to start with complete uncertainty and nonmotivation and then to add elements of foresight and motivation in the process of building an analytical model."⁴⁸

This sounds scientific, but it is not. To add elements of personalism to an impersonal system undermines the impersonalism of that system. Personalism is like an acid that brings purpose into a purposeless system. This is what Darwinism did to the evolutionary process. Man brings purpose. This completely transformed cosmic impersonalism. It also led to statism: the planning elite.

2. Becker vs. Kirzner

Gary Becker, who later won the Nobel Prize, acknowledged his intellectual debt to Alchian's article. He attempted to do what Alchian had imagined possible: explain economic success apart from human purpose. In a path-breaking essay—although nobody else has followed him down this path—Becker argued that it is not necessary to assume that men act purposefully or rationally in order to conclude that aggregate market demand curves are negatively inclined (that is, that at lower prices, people in the aggregate will purchase more of the scarce resource in question). We do not need to assume that either individuals or households are economically rational—that they, too, have negatively inclined demand curves—in order to demonstrate that market demand curves are negatively sloping. "Hence the market would act as if 'it' were rational not only when households were rational, but also when they were inert, impulsive, or otherwise irrational."⁴⁹ He compared his model to the physicist's model, as Alchian did before him.

47. Ibid., I, p. 15.

48. Ibid., I, pp. 16–17.

49. Gary Becker, "Irrational Behavior and Economic Theory," Journal of Political Economy, LXX (Feb. 1962), p. 7. This was the lead article for this issue. The JPE is published by the University of Chicago.

We can have a rational market even when we have irrational individualistic decisions. "If we may join the trend toward borrowing analogies from the currently glamorous field of physics, the theory of molecular motion does not simply reproduce the motion of large bodies; the smooth, 'rational' motion of a macrobody is assumed to result from the erratic, 'irrational' motions of a very large number of microbodies."⁵⁰ The post-Kantian ideal of science is here triumphant. Men are treated as atoms.

Israel Kirzner, the most academically respected member of the Austrian School, subjected Becker's analysis to a withering critique. As an Austrian, Kirzner focused on individuals who must make decisions concerning an uncertain future. The Austrian School begins with methodological individualism. When people go to buy a good or service, they make bids. If a man bids too low, he cannot buy all of the scarce resource that he wants. He is outbid by other customers. So, he must revise his plans. "The essence of this market process, it will be observed, is the systematic way in which plan revisions are made as a consequence of the disappointment of earlier plans."⁵¹ More important for economic theory, "Such a pattern of plan revision can be conceived of only for rational buyers. If buyers were afflicted with chronic inertia, they would presumably come to market each day with the same low bids as yesterday, and return home with the same disappointments. If buyers made bids in a purely random manner, there is again no assurance that 'the' market price would rise at all. Only by assuming that buyers purposefully seek to achieve given goals can we predict that their thwarted plans of yesterday will lead to their systematically offering more attractive choices to sellers today."⁵² Acting men are rational. They learn.

Becker relied heavily on the logic of equilibrium. Equilibrium assumes that all men are omniscient about the future, and therefore they are responders to the supply and demand conditions of the market. They are all price-takers. As Kirzner stated, "The essence of the market process is precisely what happens before equilibrium has been reached."⁵³ Uncertainty prevails in real life. Men are not simply price-takers. They offer new bids, both as buyers and sellers (since every

50. Ibid., p. 8.

51. Israel Kirzner, "Rational Action and Economic Theory," ibid., LXX (Aug. 1962), p. 381.

52. Ibid., p. 382.

53. Ibid., p. 384.

buyer is a seller of something else). "As soon, therefore, as one begins to analyze the consequences of the absence of the conditions for equilibrium, it becomes apparent that plan revisions must be the focus of attention. It is primarily upon the systematic revisions of disappointed plans that the market process depends."⁵⁴

If I understand what Becker was really saying (he never says this explicitly), he was arguing that the market process eliminates those economic decision-makers who waste resources, it rewards those who do not waste resources, and it does not matter why members of each group made their respective decisions. Maybe they were lucky. Maybe they were rational. It makes no difference, so we need not assume rationality. The market will produce the same results. In the aggregate, the market will buy more of a good if its price is lower; it makes no difference if individuals act rationally and seek out lower prices. They need not be assumed to be rational seekers of lower prices. The market process is conceivably totally impersonal, even including its randomly acting participants.

Kirzner, as an Austrian, wanted explanations for the rationality of the market process. He very carefully avoided speaking, as Becker did, of the rationality of the market itself, as if the market as a whole possessed a supply or demand curve. There were reasons for his unwillingness to speak of "the rationality of the market." He was a methodological individualist. This methodology categorically denies the validity of any aggregate constructs. There are only acting individuals; there are no "acting markets." But individual actions by acting men can be discussed, and Kirzner provides a clear description of the way in which market participants plan ahead, learn from market experiences, and reformulate their plans.

In one sense, the two men were talking at cross purposes. Becker wanted to discuss a hypothetical construct, the market as a whole. Kirzner did not explicitly say so here, but his methodology denies the existence of any such construct, let alone its rationality. Becker did not want to discuss the market process explicitly (how the hypothetically random actions of individuals are merged into an aggregate which is rational), and Kirzner wanted to discuss nothing else. Becker avoided discussing the market process, and Kirzner avoided discussing market (collective) rationality. Neither man really addressed the central feature of the other's position, namely, the implicit assumptions about the one (the aggregate market) and the many (acting men). What each scholar refused to come out and say explicitly is the heart of each man's analysis. Such is the fate of scholarly discussions in academic journals.

54. Idem.

Why the failure of each man to "go for the throat"? I contend that it stems from a sort of unwritten agreement among humanistic scholars: they will not "expose the nakedness" of their opponents, if their opponents politely reciprocate. Humanism cannot solve the problem of the one and the many; so, when discussions involving this fundamental issue arise, neither participant is immune from a devastating attack from the other.

Becker never said in his rebuttal: "Prof. Kirzner, you cannot logically discuss the rationality of the market as an aggregate. There are no aggregates in Austrian School economic theory. All that you can discuss is the individual. All that you can discuss is a market process. You are unable to say anything about whether the market as a whole responds to high or low prices in predictable ways. You have no right even to use a model of 'the market,' since your presuppositions deny the possibility of such a model. In fact, you cannot claim to be an economist at all, since you are far too consistent with your own presupposition about the scientific illegitimacy of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. Any model of the market as a system must abstract from reality, and human action in Austrian School economics is not conceivable in such abstract terms. Without a market model of human action, you ought to get out of the economics profession. Why not sell insurance for a living?"

If Becker had attacked him so forthrightly, Kirzner might have replied: "You cannot explain how a market works. Your system is totally static. You cannot integrate human actions by means of a theory of market process, because acting men are rational, they learn from the past, and they are low price-seekers. You draw a lot of charts that show indifference curves, but no such curves exist in reality; they are all mental constructs. All things never remain equal. Your static system is a sham. You must rely on some version of equilibrium, yet all equilibrium analysis necessarily involves timelessness, not to mention perfect human foresight—the elimination of all unforeseen uncertainty. So, you claim to be building a case for irrational individuals as the foundation for market rationality, but your graphs can only be constructed by means of a presupposition of total, perfect human foresight and rationality. You cannot explain how your inconceivable aggregate market with its hypothetical demand curves ever comes into existence—which it does not do, since it is all a mental construct. So, you ought to get out of the economics profession. But stay out of the insurance business; insurance salesman must deal with acting men, and you refuse to acknowledge that men act rationally anyway. You ought to become a mystic.”

In such an exchange, both men would have to deny that the other is a true economist, and in doing so, both men would deny the existence of a science of economics. They would show that neither the a priorists nor the empiricists can deal with the problem of the one and the many. Both sides need to deny the validity of their own presuppositions in order to practice their profession. As Van Til once quipped, each side stays in business by taking in each other’s washing. So, to this extent, these men were not talking at cross purposes. They were united in their willingness to let each other stay in the profession; otherwise, both of them would have to get out. And, for that matter, so would the editors of all the scholarly economics journals. There would be no economics profession to write for.

3. Equilibrium

What about equilibrium? Is the concept of equilibrium really crucial to modern free market economics? It has been an implicit aspect of economic reasoning from the beginning, and an explicit aspect since the 1800s. Free market economic models all assume the “tendency toward equilibrium” in the market process. Was Kirzner correct in challenging Becker for having used the concept in an essay that denied the necessity of assuming rational (low price-seeking) individuals? And, if he was correct, does that very equilibrium come back to haunt him?

Equilibrium is an impossibility, since it involves perfect foreknowledge—a world with no surprises, no profits, and no losses.⁵⁵ Everyone is a price-taker; everyone responds predictably to market conditions; no one has any independence from all other participants’ predictions. In short, human action is inconceivable in such a universe. Yet it is this inconceivable standard that undergirds all non-socialist economic thought, including Kirzner’s. He wrote: “It is generally recognized that the market process (whether within a given industry or for an entire economy) is a means of communicating knowledge. The knowledge that a market communicates is made up of precisely those elements of information necessary to bring about the systematic revisions of plans in the direction of equilibrium (whether partial or general). Each market decision is made in the light of market information. Where the decisions of all market participants dovetail completely, all of them can be implemented without disappointments and without subsequent alterations of plans; the market is in equilibrium."⁵⁶ So, Kirzner, as with all other market-oriented economists, judged the real world of human action in terms of a hypothetical, intellectually inconsistent world of equilibrium—a world in which forecasting is perfect, everyone's actions are fully known in advance, and men have no freedom of choice. In such a world, humans respond as automatons to stimuli. Cause and effect rule supreme: the triumph of Kant's phenomenal realm of science over Kant's noumenal realm of free human personality. In short, Kirzner had to rely on a limiting concept, equilibrium, in order to judge the success or failure of market institutions in dovetailing the varying plans of acting men. Yet this limiting concept is in total opposition to the methodological individualism (autonomous man) that Kirzner and the Austrian School economists constantly preach. To explain human action, economists use a model which denies human action.

55. Mises called this the evenly rotating economy.

Here is one of the important assumptions of Alchian: "Comparability of resulting situations is destroyed by the changing environment."⁵⁷ The changing environment in an evolving universe may have changed the rules of survival. This is also true for Hayek's evolving universe. This is the plight of all process philosophy. Hayek relied on the market to guide men in their quest to dovetail their plans, but how can he be sure that the laws of the market process are still supreme? After all, we live in a world of constant change. Where is his measuring rod that tells us whether or not we are progressing according to our individual plans? How could he or Kirzner use equilibrium as the standard, when equilibrium analysis is absolutely contrary to the concept of free, autonomous human action?

Alchian, as a consistent evolutionist, said that survival is the only criterion. This leads us back to the old debate: Who or what is to insure the survival of mankind? The intellectual appeal of Lester Frank Ward and all other advocates of central planning is that they argue that man is different from the animals around him or before him. Man has a mind. Scientific men, as an elite corps of specialists, can therefore do what no other animal can: change the environment according to a plan that ensures the survival of their own species. Man the planner overcomes through central planning the limits that have constrained all other life forms. Man the planner is a new being, a being that can adapt evolutionary processes to his own advantage as a species. No longer is man nothing more than a product of evolutionary, purposeless competition among all the species. Now man can take control of the processes of evolutionary change. Science has made this possible. This perspective is widely held. The religion of humanism teaches it.

56. Kirzner, "Rational Action and Economic Theory," op. cit., p. 384.

57. Alchian, Collected Works, I, p. 14.

Hayek and Kirzner affirmed that man the planning individual can best achieve control over nature by decentralized planning within the framework of a market order. But to claim this, they had to rely on some sort of standard. They asked: How can men, as individuals, be sure that their plans' are working to their advantage? By appealing to the hypothetical standard of equilibrium? But Hayek's reliance on the institutions of the free market was founded on his denial of omniscience. Equilibrium analysis affirms universal human omniscience, and it simultaneously denies autonomous human action.⁵⁸ Progress toward equilibrium is the Austrian School's equivalent to progress toward absolute zero: when we achieve it, we have denied all progress.⁵⁹

58. Mises wrote: "Action is change, and change is in the temporal sequence. But in the evenly rotating economy change and succession of events are eliminated. Action is to make choices and to cope with an uncertain future. But in the evenly rotating economy there is no choosing and the future is not uncertain as it does not differ from the present known state. Such a rigid system is not peopled with living men making choices and liable to error; it is a world of soulless unthinking automatons; it is not a human society, it is an ant hill." Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 249. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA1949>) In the third edition published by Regnery in 1966, this appears on page 248.

59. Mises wrote: "The only method of dealing with the problem of action is to conceive that action ultimately aims at bringing about a state of affairs in which there is no longer any action, whether because all uneasiness had been removed or because any further removal of felt uneasiness is out of the question. Action thus tends toward a state of rest, absence of action." Ibid., (1949), p. 245; (1966), p. 244. Mises, however, insists that the use of such imaginary and self-contradictory constructs is inescapable for the science of economics. He does not offer a theoretical defense of static theory; he uses pragmatism. "The method of imaginary constructions is justified by its success," (1949), p. 238; (1966), p. 236. Then how can we know whether an imaginary construct "works"? He has no answer: "The method of imaginary constructions is indispensable for praxeology [the science of human action-G.N.]; it is the only method of praxeological and economic inquiry. It is, to be sure, a method very difficult to handle because it can easily result in fallacious syllogisms. It leads along a sharp edge; on both sides yawns the chasm of absurdity and nonsense. Only merciless self-criticism can prevent a man from falling headlong into these abysmal depths," (1949), p. 238; (1966), p. 237.

It is progress toward man the omniscient being, meaning men as totally predictable, cause-and-effect dominated, price-taking non-actors. The world of equilibrium is a world without autonomous men. But autonomous man is the universally shared presupposition of all schools of humanistic economics.

Can the decentralized competition of the free market ensure the survival of man? There is no way that Hayek or Kirzner could affirm this scientifically. How can we even speak of species man, when we cannot legitimately make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility? How can “man, the collective” ever know anything? How can we even speak of such an intellectual abstraction, if we are methodological individualists and subjectivists? Only by denying our premises.

Chicago School rationalists want to avoid such questions, but they are also unable to escape the antinomies of Kantian thought. Their world of economic equilibrium analysis also assumes omniscience. Becker began with equilibrium analysis to prove that in the aggregate, the market is rational, even if individuals are not. Yet, as Kirzner asked, how could he assume the existence of equilibrium conditions? It is men as plan-makers and plan-revisers who create a tendency toward equilibrium. You cannot legitimately argue rationality in an equilibrium market and also deny that men are necessarily rational, since to achieve equilibrium, all men must be perfectly rational and totally omniscient.

Alchian began with the presumption of uncertainty: “The existence of uncertainty and incomplete information is the foundation of the suggested type of analysis; the importance of the concept of a class of ‘chance’ decisions rests upon it. . . .”⁶⁰ Yet Becker began with equilibrium charts to prove his case that a rational market can be the product of irrational decisions. There is something illogical here.

Conclusion

The dualisms of Kantian thought are inescapable. To evaluate change, you need a fixed standard. To evaluate the success of human action, you need a model that denies human action, whether you call it equilibrium or “the evenly rotating economy,” as Mises did. To measure the progress of mankind, you need a changeless standard which thwarts the progress of mankind. (How can we have progress in a static order?) To assert that personal irrationality is compatible with market rationality, you need an equilibrium model that rests on personal infallibility. By arguing that we need a decentralized market order to preserve and expand human knowledge, the evolutionist winds up affirming that no one can understand the market order. The laws of the market order are said to be the result of eons of development—the product of human action but not of human design—yet we are asked to believe that this order is as useful to mankind as a whole (when we can legitimately say nothing as methodological individualists about mankind as a whole) as if it had been designed specifically for mankind as a whole. We are asked to affirm cause and effect in a world that is the product of chance. We are asked to affirm that man the planning individual cannot effectively make decisions for other men, because no man has sufficient knowledge to integrate the knowledge of other acting men, yet we are also supposed to affirm that the market is a reliable institution for the progress of the species, when we do not know how the market ever developed, and we cannot speak of an aggregate like “man, the species.” We want the one (the market order) to conform to the needs of the many (acting individuals), yet we cannot, as methodological individualists, make any scientifically legitimate statements about the needs of the many. (One man “needs” to stick pins in others, while others insist that they “need” to avoid being stuck.) We make our case for the market in terms of imperfect knowledge (Alchian and Hayek), yet we are then forced to make judgments about evolution as a process, the best interests of mankind as a species, the reliability of the market in a world of evolutionary change, and so forth. From ignorance (we need the market to integrate and expand knowledge) to near-omniscience (we know that the market will provide us with this needed knowledge). From irrationality (Becker’s irrationality thesis) to rationality (Becker’s equilibrium analysis). The logic of humanistic economics is hopelessly self-contradictory.

But, we must ask, self-criticism according to what standards? How do we link our hypothetical and self-contradictory constructs (human action without human action) to the external realm of events? Mises does not say. No economist can say. The only way we can do this is through intuition, as Mises and Milton Friedman agree: North, “Economics: From Reason to Intuition,” Foundations of Christian Scholarship, op. cit.

60. Alchian, Collected Works, I, p. 17.

Christian economics is the only answer. We have a source of rationality. We have a guarantee of economic laws. We have confidence that the market order is fully conformable to the needs of individuals, and also to the needs of mankind as a whole. We know that we do not need perfect knowledge (omniscience) in order to have reliable knowledge. We know that the logic of our minds, despite its limitations when pushed, is a reliable device for interpreting and moulding external reality. We know that the market is historically the product of human action, precisely because it is transcendently the product of God's design.

The dominion covenant offers us all these needed intellectual requirements. It makes economic thought possible. Without the presupposition of the dominion covenant, and the revelation of God's design for economic institutions and relationships, there can be no logical, consistent, reliable, self-attesting science of economics, whether deductivist (logical) or inductivist (empirical). Any economic theory based on evolutionism must fail; its own internal contradictions cannot support it. Evolution is process philosophy, and process philosophy is relativism, lawlessness—the kingdom of whirl. All humanistic systems of economics are evolutionistic: Marxism, Austrianism, Chicagoism, and Keynesianism. If we are to have a reliable concept of economics, we need reliable concepts of God, man, law, causation, and progress. Humanism provides us with unreliable concepts of God, man, law, causation, and progress. It is time to abandon humanism as the foundation of economic analysis.

I have argued that the humanists must borrow heavily from Christianity in order to build their economic systems. They deny omniscience, yet they must affirm it as an ideal in order to create an equilibrium model which serves as a standard toward which human action moves. They affirm structure in the midst of change. They affirm progress for the species as a whole, despite the fact that they cannot speak of progress for the species as a whole if they are faithful to the principle of methodological individualism.

The free market's advocates are united in their belief that there is an inherent rationality in the market order, yet neither Hayek nor Alchian could explain why such rationality can exist in a world of flux and irrationality. They denied the epistemological necessity of the doctrine of providence, yet they spoke of market processes as if these processes were providential in nature: selecting survivors, adopting species, integrating conflicting plans of individuals, and so forth. The very features of their individualistic systems that demand aggregate coherence cannot be affirmed without abandoning the logical requirements of methodological individualism. They did not wish to speak of methodological covenantalism, yet they were forced to adopt the conclusions of covenantalism in order to escape the clutches of methodological collectivism. They wrote as though they were living in a world of cosmic personalism, yet they explicitly denied the existence of any such universe. They wanted the fruits of a Christian world-and-life view, but not the roots.

We cannot enjoy forever the fruits of Christian civilization, including the free market social order, without the roots: the biblical doctrines of God, creation, law, sanctions, inheritance. We must affirm the doctrine of man as the image of God. We must affirm the dominion covenant. We must abandon the evolutionists' various defenses of the free market if we are successfully to defend the market from the evolutionistic opponents of the free market.

Appendix C

COSMOLOGIES IN CONFLICT: CREATION VS. EVOLUTION

Gertrude Himmelfarb, in her superb study, Darwin and the Darwinian Revolution (1959), quoted an amusing and highly revealing section from Benjamin Disraeli's 1847 novel, Tancred. Disraeli, who later became England's Prime Minister, caught the new evolutionistic spirit of some of Britain's upper classes—pre-Darwinian evolution, and a perspective universally condemned by scientists everywhere prior to Darwin's On the Origin of Species (1859). A fashionable lady urges Tancred, the hero, to read a new book, Revelations of Chaos (actually, Robert Chambers' anonymously printed and enormously popular Vestiges of Creation): "You know, all is development. The principle is perpetually going on. First, there was nothing, then there was something; then—I forget the next—I think there were shells, then fishes; then we came—let me see—did we come next? Never mind that; we came at last. And at the next change there will be something very superior to us—something with wings. Ah! that's it: we were fishes, and I believe we shall be crows. But you must read it. [Tancred protests, mentioning that he had never been a fish. She goes on:] Oh! but it is all proved. . . . You understand, it is all science. . . . Everything is proved—by geology, you know."

It was people like this lady who bought 24,000 copies of Vestiges of Creation from its publication in 1844 until 1860—not the scientists, but good, upstanding Anglican Church members. When Darwin's Origin was published, the entire edition of 1,250 copies was sold out to booksellers in one day. The doctrine of evolution, rejected by scientists in 1850, was the universal orthodoxy in 1875. The idea of natural selection over millions of years had become the catch-all of the sciences. The entire universe is a chance operation in this perspective. Chance brought all things into existence (if in fact all things were not always in existence), and chance presently sustains the system. The utterly improbable laws of probability provide creation with whatever piecemeal direction it possesses. This cosmology was a return to the cosmologies of ancient paganism, though of course it is all dressed up in its scientific smock and footnotes.

The reigning cosmologies of the non-Christian world have always had one feature in common: they do not distinguish between the being of God and the being of the universe. In all these cosmogonies—stories of the original creation—a finite god created the world out of a pre-existing “stuff,” either spiritual or material. This god, only comparatively powerful, faced the contingent (chance) elements of the ultimately mysterious “stuff” in a way analogous to the way we now face a basically mysterious creation. Chance is therefore ultimate in most non-biblical systems. Some “primitive” cosmogonies affirm creation from an original cosmic egg (Polynesian, eighth-century Japan).¹ A large number of the creation stories were creation out of water (Maori, certain California Indian tribes, the Central Bantu Tribe of the Lunda Cluster, Mayan Indians in Central America, Babylon).² The Egyptian text, “The Book of Overthrowing Apophis,” provides an excellent example of a water cosmogony: “The Lord of All, after having come into being, says: I am he who came into being as Khepri (i.e., the Becoming One). When I came into being, the beings came into being, all the beings came into being after I became. Numerous are those who became, who came out of my mouth, before heaven ever existed, nor earth came into being, nor the worms, nor snakes, were created in this place. I being in weariness, was bound to them in the Watery Abyss. I found no place to stand.”³ After planning in his heart the various beings, he spat them out of his mouth. “It was my father the Watery Abyss who brought them up and my eye followed them (?) while they became far from me.” This god is not the sovereign God of the biblical creation story. The Bible’s God did not spring from a watery abyss, nor did He create the world from His own substance. He created it out of nothing.

A. Greek Speculation

Hesiod, who probably wrote his classic poems in the eighth century B.C., sketched a cosmogony that sought the source of creation in the infinite void (chaos), in much the same way as modern science searches for the origin of the universe. Chaos is the source of all that is.⁴ As was the case and is the case in most non-Christian cosmologies, he held to a theory of eternal cycles: the original Age of Gold is inevitably followed by a process of deterioration into new ages: Silver, Bronze, and finally Iron.⁵ (A similar outline is given by Daniel to King Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel 2; Daniel's exposition to the king's vision is not cyclical, however, for a fifth kingdom—God's eternal kingdom—finally replaces the fourth and final earthly kingdom.) Pagan cyclical theories held to a faith that the grim age of iron could be regenerated back into a new age of gold through the application of ritual acts of chaos. Our present age is characterized by law and order—the opposite of life—so that by violating established social and political laws, societies can be regenerated from below. Thus, the ancient pagan cultures had annual or seasonal chaos festivals. Metaphysical regeneration rather than ethical regeneration was basic to their cosmologies. Not a return to covenantal law, as in the Hebrew-Christian perspective, but an escape from law: here was the alternative to the biblical perspective.⁶ This dialectic between order and chaos was universal in the Near Eastern and classical civilizations. Ethics was therefore primarily political, for it was the state, as the supposed link between heaven and earth, that was the agency of social and personal salvation.⁷

1. Mircea Eliade (ed.), From Primitives to Zen (New York: Harper & Row, 1967), pp. 88, 94.

2. Ibid., pp. 86, 88, 90, 91, 93, 98.

3. Ibid., p. 98.

In examining the history of the universe, Greek scientists were not noticeably superior to their predecessors, the poets, or the cosmologists of other ancient cultures. In an extremely important study, The Discovery of Time (1965), the authors concluded: "For all the rationality of their concepts, they never put down firm intellectual roots into the temporal development of Nature, nor could they grasp the timescale of Creation with any more certainty than men had done before. In the History of Nature, therefore, the continuity between the ideas of the Greek philosophers and those of the preceding era is particularly striking: here, even more than elsewhere, one may justly speak of their theories as 'radical myths.'"⁸

4. Hesiod, "Theogony," ibid., p. 115.

5. Hesiod, Works and Days, lines 109-201.

6. Eliade, Cosmos and History (1958); The Sacred and the Profane (1957). See also Roger Caillois, Man and the Sacred (Glencoe, Illinois: Free Press, 1959).

7. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), chaps. 3, 4. Cf. Charles N. Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture (New York: Oxford University Press, [1944] 1957), p. 323. This has been reprinted by Liberty Press, Indianapolis.

8. Stephen Toulmin and Jane Goodfield, The Discovery of Time (New York: Harper

Hecateus of Miletos, an historian of the mid-sixth century, B.C., attempted to link human history with natural history. His conclusions were still being quoted by Diodorus of Sicily five centuries later, in the latter's Historical Library. "When in the beginning, as their account runs, the universe was being formed, both heaven and earth were indistinguishable in appearance, since their elements were intermingled: then, when their bodies separated from one another, the universe took on in all its parts the ordered form in which it is now seen. . . ."⁹ Life sprang from "the wet" by reason of the warmth from the sun; all the various forms were created at once. The creation of the elements was therefore impersonal. The creation of life was spontaneous, instantaneous, and fixed for all time. It was a purely autonomous development.

Plato was caught in the tension between order and chaos. Two of the pre-Socratic philosophers, Heraclitus and Parmenides, had set forth the case for each. Heraclitus had argued that all is flux, change, and process; Parmenides had argued that all is rational, static, and universal. This so-called dialectic between structure and change, order and chaos, was expressed in terms of the Form (Idea)-Matter dualism.¹⁰ Plato, in the Timaeus dialogue, began with a contrast between exact, eternal mathematical concepts and the temporal flux of history. As Toulmin and Goodfield commented: "The Creation of the cosmos was the process by which the eternal mathematical principles were given material embodiment, imposing an order on the formless raw materials of the world, and setting them working according to ideal specifications."¹¹ It is the vision of a Divine Craftsman. Plato was non-committal about the timing of this creation or the order of the creation; it was, at the minimum, 9,000 years earlier. In response to Aristotle's attack on this theory, Plato's pupils argued that it was only an intellectual construct, not something to be taken literally.¹² They were correct. Plato's god, as his other dialogues indicate, was an impersonal Idea of the Good, itself a fragmented universal.¹³ Torchbook, 1965), p. 33; cf. p. 37.

9. Ibid., p. 35.

10. Rushdoony, One and the Many, ch. 4; Herman Dooyeweerd, In the Twilight of Western Thought (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1960), pp. 39–42; Cornelius Van Til, A Survey of Christian Epistemology, Volume II of In Defense of the Faith (den Dulk Foundation, 1969), ch. 3.

11. Toulmin and Goodfield, Discovery of Time, p. 42.

12. Ibid., p. 43.

13. Arthur O. Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1936] 1965), pp. 38, 48–53; Van Til, Survey, pp. 37–38.

Aristotle's cosmology was different. His god was a totally impersonal, totally aloof being—thought contemplating itself—and therefore indifferent to the world. The affairs of the world are determined by autonomous processes. Both god and the world are eternal (Physics, VIII). His god was therefore “Unmoved Perfection,” totally independent. The creation was equally independent.¹⁴ God's existence does not explain why other beings exist, or why they exist in a particular way.¹⁵ There had never been a temporal beginning; time is unbounded. History operates in terms of cycles.¹⁶ Aristotle was intensely skeptical concerning questions about some hypothetical and unknowable original creation.

The later Greek philosophical schools known as the Stoics (deterministic) and Epicureans (skeptical, atheistic) also held to a cyclical view of history. Their curiosity about the universe's origins went unsatisfied. When Paul confronted members of both schools of thought on Mars' Hill in Athens, he was unable to convince them to believe in the Bible's Creator God—the God in whom we live and have our being (Acts 17:24–28, 32). Paul's concept of God was utterly foreign to their belief in an independent, autonomous universe. They preferred to believe that an impersonal world of pure chance (luck) battles eternally for supremacy over pure determinism (fate), equally impersonal.¹⁷

Christianity offered a solution to this eternal tension. The Creator of heaven and earth is a God of three Persons: eternal, omnipotent, exhaustive in self-revelation. The revelation of the Bible, not the logic of the self-proclaimed autonomous human mind, serves as the foundation of this belief.¹⁸ This belief overcame the dualism of classical thought by denying the impersonalism of the cosmos. It provided an alternative to the collapsing classical civilization, for it offered a wholly new cosmology. As Cochrane says, “The fall of Rome was the fall of an idea, or rather of a system of life based upon a complex of ideas which may be described broadly as those of Classicism; and the deficiencies

14. Toulmin and Goodfield, Discovery of Time, pp. 44–45. For Aristotle's arguments against the Greek “creationists,” see Meteorologica, Bk. II, ch. I, par. 1.

15. Lovejoy, Great Chain of Being, p. 55.

16. Aristotle, Meteorologica, II: XIV: 352a, 353a. Haber has concluded that Aristotle was essentially a uniformitarian: Francis C. Haber, “Fossils and Early Cosmology,” in Bentley Glass, et al. (eds.), Forerunners of Darwin: 1745–1859 (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1959), pp. 9–10. Cf. Toulmin and Goodfield, Discovery of Time, pp. 45–46.

17. Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture, p. 159.

18. Ibid., p. 237.

of Classicism, already exposed in the third century, were destined sooner or later to involve the system in ruin."¹⁹

B. Eastern Monism

The major philosophical religions of China and India are Buddhism and Hinduism. Both are ultimately monistic faiths. They hypothesize an ultimate oneness of being underlying all reality. This total oneness became plural at some point in the past, thus producing the creation out of itself; at some later point in history, it will overcome this dualism to become unified again. The change and multiplicity of life are therefore maya—illusions. Only unity can be said truly to exist. Somehow, the ultimate reality of one has included in itself the illusion of plurality. Swami Nikhilananda, a respected Hindu scholar whose article appears in a symposium of Darwinian evolutionists, tried to explain his system's cosmology.

According to the Upanishads, which form the conclusion and the essence of the Vedas and are also the basis of the Vedanta philosophy, Atman, or the unchanging spirit in the individual, and Brahman, or the unchanging spirit in the universe, are identical. This spirit of consciousness—eternal, homogeneous, attributeless, and self-existent is the ultimate cause of all things. . . . Vedanta Philosophy speaks of attributeless reality as beyond time, space, and causality. It is not said to be the cause of the Saguna Brahman [first individual] in the same way as the potter is the cause of the pot (dualism), or milk of curds (pantheism). The creation of Saguna Brahman is explained as an illusory superimposition such as one notices when the desert appears as a mirage, or a rope in semi-darkness as a snake. This superimposition does not change the nature of reality, as the apparent water of the mirage does not soak a single grain of sand in the desert. A name and a form are thus superimposed upon Brahman by maya, a power inherent in Brahman and inseparable from it, as the power to burn is inseparable from fire. . . . According to Vedanta, maya is the material basis of creation; it is something positive. It is called positive because it is capable of evolving the tangible material universe.²⁰

The one of Atman-Brahman produces something different, maya, which really is not different in reality from the one, and maya in turn

19. Ibid., p. 355.

20. Swami Nikhilananda, "Hinduism and the Idea of Evolution," in A Book that Shook the World (University of Pittsburgh, 1958), pp. 48–49. The position of philosophical Buddhism is similar: D. T. Suzuki, Outlines of Mahayana Buddhism (New York: Schocken Books, [1907] 1963), pp. 46–47.

evolves the material universe, although it is not itself material. It is an illusion. The universe is therefore an illusion. The process is cyclical:

Evolution or manifestation is periodical or cyclic; manifestation and non-manifestation alternate; there is not continuous progress in one direction only. The universe oscillates in both directions like a pendulum of a clock. The evolution of the universe is called the beginning of a cycle, and the involution, the termination of the cycle. The whole process is spontaneous, like a person's breathing out and breathing in. At the end of a cycle all the physical bodies resolve into maya, which is the undifferentiated substratum of matter, and all individualized energy into prana, which is the cosmic energy; and both energy and matter remain in an indistinguishable form. At the beginning of the new cycle, the physical bodies separate out again, and the prana animates them. Evolution and involution are postulated on the basis of the indestructibility of matter and the conservation of energy. [The swami seems to be throwing a sop to the evolutionists here, since matter really cannot exist, for all is one—spirit.—G.N.] From the relative standpoint, the creation is without beginning or end. A cycle is initiated by the power or intelligence of God. According to Hindu thinkers, the present cycle commenced about three billion years ago. It appears from some of the Upanishads that all beings—superhuman, human, and subhuman—appear simultaneously at the beginning of a cycle.²¹

There can be no true separation or distinction between the Creator and the creation. All is ultimately one substance: spirit. If matter is eternal, this means that illusion is eternal. Yet the attainment of Nirvana implies an escape from the process of time and change, so it would appear that not everything is matter eternally, i.e., illusion. Something—one's sou—escapes from this eternal illusion to return to the oneness. Thus, both Hindus and Buddhists developed systems of ascetic practices by which the souls of men, or at least the surviving deeds of men (Buddhism), could escape from creation. In this sense, the asceticism of the East was similar to the monistic (not necessarily monastic) asceticism of the West's gnostic sects, desert mystics, or other neoplatonic groups.²²

21. Ibid., p. 51.

22. R. J. Rushdoony, "Asceticism," in The Encyclopedia of Christianity (Wilmington, Delaware: National Foundation for Christian Education, 1964), 1, pp. 432–36; Rushdoony, One and the Many, pp. 164–70; Rushdoony, The Flight from Humanity: A Study of the Effect of Neoplatonism on Christianity, 2nd ed. (Vallecito, California: Chalcedon, [1973] 2008), chaps. 1–5. An example of heretical Christian monistic asceticism almost Eastern in its perspective was the medieval mystic, Meister Eckhart.

During the first half of the twentieth century, English language readers had to rely almost exclusively on the voluminous researches of Daisetz Teitaro Suzuki for their knowledge of Zen Buddhism. His studies of the more orthodox and scholarly Mahayana Buddhism were also influential. Both systems are ultimately monistic, as is Hinduism, from which Buddhism developed. Paralleling the almost scholastic Mahayana form of Buddhism is Hinayana, or ascetic-magical Buddhism, but Western readers are far less concerned with this less speculative offshoot, however important it may have been in practice. As might be expected, Suzuki tried to come to grips with the ultimate oneness—Absolute Suchness—but his explanation was by definition hopeless. “Absolute Suchness from its very nature thus defies all definitions.”²³ The ground of all existence is therefore nonrational, incommunicative, mysterious. As with Hinduism, diversity is viewed as a result of finite consciousness.²⁴ There can be no answer of the eternal one-many distinction; we can never know how the one became many.²⁵

Certain conclusions utterly foreign to Western, Christian thought result from this monism. For example, there can be no personal responsibility in such a system. Suzuki explained that “Buddhism does not condemn this life and universe for their wickedness as was done by some religious teachers and philosophers. The so-called wickedness is not radical in nature and life. It is merely superficial.”²⁶ All things are at bottom one; thus, there can be no murder. “It is true that Mahayanism perfectly agrees with Vedantism when the latter declares: ‘If the killer thinks that he kills, if the killed thinks that he is killed, they do not understand; for this one does not kill, nor is that one killed.’ (The Kato-panishad, II, 19.)”²⁷ Furthermore, according to Suzuki, there is no personal immortal soul in Mahayana Buddhism.²⁸ There is no personal God.²⁹ There is no grace; all merit is earned.³⁰ One’s deeds—not the person—are carried into eternity through karma, or reincarnation, as-

See Raymond Bernard Blakney, Meister Eckhart: A Modern Translation (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1941]).

23. D. T. Suzuki, Outlines of Mahayana Buddhism, pp. 101–2.

24. Ibid., p. 112.

25. Ibid., p. 114.

26. Ibid., p. 128.

27. Ibid., p. 135n.

28. Ibid., p. 164.

29. Ibid., p. 219.

30. Ibid., pp. 184–85.

ending or descending along the scale of being.³¹ The deeds survive, not an individual soul.³² Yet somehow it is possible to distinguish good deeds from bad deeds, in spite of the fact that at bottom all things are one, and all distinctions are illusions.³³ There is no Creator, no Fall, and no hell.³⁴ In the final analysis, there is no knowledge:

Human consciousness is so made that at the beginning there was utter not knowing. Then there was the eating of the fruit of the tree of knowledge—the knowledge that consists in making the knower different from what he knows. That is the origin of this world. The fruit separated us from not-knowing in the sense of not knowing subject and object. This awakening of knowledge resulted in our ejection from the Garden of Eden. But we have a persistent desire to return to the state of innocence prior, epistemologically speaking, to creation, to the state where there is no division, no knowledge—prior to the subject-object division, to the time when there was only God as He was before He created the world. The separation of God from the world is the source of all our troubles. We have an innate desire to be united with God.³⁵

He deliberately uses Western and Christian terms to describe a completely non-Western concept of God—impersonal, without attributes. But the thrust of Buddhist monism should be clear: the goal is universal, eternal unity. The Creator must be unified with the creature. We are to unite with God metaphysically, as equals, not ethically, as subordinates. We are to share God's attribute of divinity and oneness, rather than be united ethically to Christ in His perfect humanity.

The idea of creation out of nothing, and hence the Creator-creature distinction, is repugnant to Eastern thought. While the following quotation from Suzuki is chaotic, it is no worse than an extract from Hegel, Tillich, or Bonhoeffer, whose book, Creation and Fall, must rank as one of the truly perverse, contorted efforts in modernist biblical exegesis.

When God created the world outside Himself, He made a great mistake. He could not solve the problem of the world as long as He kept it outside of Himself. In Christian theological terminology, God, to

31. Ibid., pp. 187, 192.

32. Ibid., p. 193.

33. Ibid., p. 200. Capitalism, for example is evil: pp. 188–89.

34. Ibid., p. 253.

35. Suzuki, "The Buddha and Zen," (1953), in The Field of Zen (New York: Harper and Row Perennial Library, 1970), pp. 15–16.

say "I am," has to negate Himself. For God to know Himself He must negate Himself, and His negation comes in the form of the creation of the world of particulars. To be God is not to be God. We must negate ourselves to affirm ourselves. Our affirmation is negation, but as long as we remain in negation we shall have no rest; we must return to affirmation. We must go out into negation of ourselves and come back. We go out but that negation must come back into affirmation. Going out is coming back. But to realize that going out is coming back we have to go through all kinds of suffering and hardship, of trials and disciplines.³⁶

The use of intense mystical contemplation of total absurdities, sometimes followed by acts of asceticism, or physical beatings, is the Zen Buddhist means of achieving satori, the heart of Zen.³⁷ Nothing has meaning or purpose: this is the gateway to satori, or pure religious freedom. Total chaos rules supreme, and in chaos there is perfect peace.³⁸ All aspects of life must be accepted.³⁹ True existence is timeless.⁴⁰ By abandoning one's own individuality, man links himself to the infinite—infinite possibilities, infinite responsibilities, unlimited freedom.⁴¹ Total annihilation means total perfection.

Given such a philosophy, it is not surprising that the East should have produced a stagnant culture in which men seek escape in earthly routine and the timelessness of satori: "The only thing that makes Buddhists look rather idle or backward in so-called 'social service' work is the fact that Eastern people, among whom Buddhism flourished, are not very good at organization; they are just as charitably disposed as any religious people and ready to put their teachings into practice. But they are not accustomed to carry on their philanthropic undertakings in a systematic way. . . ."⁴² This stands in contrast to Puritans of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, who built charitable institutions that still exist today, and which transformed the character of English life.⁴³ Eastern people can organize successfully, as the Com-

36. Ibid., p. 15.

37. Zen Buddhism: Selected Writings of D. T. Suzuki (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, 1956), chaps. 3, 4.

38. Ibid., ch. 1.

39. Ibid., pp. 105, 256.

40. Ibid., pp. 250, 264.

41. Ibid., pp. 265–66.

42. Ibid., p. 274. For a critique of Zen, see Lit-sen Chang, Zen-Existentialism (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1967).

43. W. K. Jordan, Philanthropy in England, 1480–1660 (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1959; New York: Russell Sage Foundation).

munists have shown, but only under the influence of a Western philosophy of progress and triumph. Monism is a religion of stagnation and retreat.

C. Cosmological Evolution

God is not part of the creation, according to Christianity. He is the Creator. He existed before time began. The Bible offers a unique concept of time. There was a beginning; there is linear development; there will be a final judgment. The first philosopher to develop this concept of linear history was Augustine.

1. Augustine's Cosmology

The concluding chapter of Charles Norris Cochrane's superb study, Christianity and Classical Culture (1944), deals with the philosophy of St. Augustine and his concept of history.⁴⁴ Augustine marks the transition between the shattered world of classical civilization and the new Christian society. Augustine reshaped the historical vision of Western Civilization, a monumental intellectual feat. Augustine's twin vision of predestination and linear line—both explicitly Pauline concepts—gave Western culture the idea of history. All human history is directional. It began with the creation, and it shall end with the final judgment. Earthly kingdoms rise and fall, but God's kingdom (which Augustine saw, unfortunately, as exclusively spiritual and ecclesiastical in impact) is permanent. The doctrine of historical cycles is therefore false.⁴⁵ Furthermore, creation was not a process extending back into the mists of time; it was a fiat creation within the time span of human records:

In vain, then do some babble with most empty presumption, saying that Egypt has understood the reckoning of the stars for more than a hundred thousand years. For in what books have they collected that number who learned letters from Isis their mistress, not much more than two thousand years ago? . . . For as it is not yet six thousand years since the first man, who is called Adam, are not those to be ri-

44. On the importance of his philosophy of history, see Lynn White, Jr., "Christian Myth and Christian History," Journal of the History of Ideas, III (1942), p. 147; Theodore Mommsen, "St. Augustine and the Christian Idea of Progress," ibid., XII (1951), pp. 346–74; Robert A. Nisbet, Social Change and History (New York: Oxford University Press, 1969), ch. 2; Herbert A. Deane, The Political and Social Ideas of St. Augustine (New York: Columbia University Press, 1963), pp. 71–73.

45. Augustine, City of God, Bk. XII, chaps. 14–16.

diculed rather than refuted who try to persuade us of anything regarding a space of time so different from, and contrary to, the ascertained truth?⁴⁶

Sadly for the condition of the besieged Church in the first decade of the twenty-first century, Christian scholars must spend whole lifetimes in refuting that which is, in Augustine's term, ridiculous—worthy of ridicule rather than refutation.

Augustine's world was a universe of cosmic personalism. God's providence brings all things to pass. This was his answer to the cosmic impersonalism of the classical world. "By thus discarding characteristic prejudices of classical mentality, Augustine opens the way for a philosophy of history in terms of the logos of Christ; i.e. in terms of the Trinity, recognized as the creative and moving principle."⁴⁷ In short, wrote Cochrane, "For Augustine, therefore, the order of human life is not the order of 'matter,' blindly and aimlessly working out the 'logic' of its own process, nor yet is it any mere reproduction of a pattern or idea which may be apprehended a priori by the human mind."⁴⁸ Process is not the source of structure or meaning. "The logos of Christ thus serves to introduce a new principle of unity and division into human life and human history."⁴⁹

The world has a fixed order. The Greeks believed this with respect to the creation of the various species, as do the Hindus. They were not so rigorous in applying a theology of process to the world. They hesitated to follow the implications of their view of cycles. They refused to question fully the firmness of a fixed order of creation that is not the product of a sovereign Creator. But Christians do have a foundation for their trust in natural laws. From the time of Augustine in the early fifth century through the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the Christian West stood in confidence before a nature which is under the control of God.⁵⁰

2. Medieval Cosmology

The medieval view of the earth was still basic to Western men's understanding of the universe as late as 1600. Because of the centrality

46. Ibid., XVIII: 40.

47. Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture, p. 480; cf. p. 474.

48. Ibid., p. 484.

49. Ibid., p. 487.

50. Toulmin and Goodfield, Discovery of Time, p. 68. Cf. the works of the French historian, Pierre Duhem.

of the earth in the order of God's creation, and because of the drama of the Fall of man and the Incarnation of the Son of God in Jesus Christ, their view of the universe was understandably geocentric. But they took the Ptolomaic construction of the universe as physically geocentric as a valid representation of the covenantal geocentricity of earth in the creation. The earth was understood as round. (The incredible portolano maps of the Middle Ages rival the accuracy of modern maps; they were probably pre-Phoenician in origin.)⁵¹ But it was supposedly placed at the center of a huge system of translucent spheres, to which the sun, planets, and stars were attached, all rotating in perfect spherical harmony around the earth. While the existence of comets should have warned them against the translucent spheres, it did not. Galileo's telescopes, not comets, smashed these spheres.

Some commentators, such as J. B. Bury, have argued that this geocentricity gave men a sense of importance and power in the universe. This was supposedly destroyed by the advent of modern astronomical theories.⁵² Others, such as Arthur O. Lovejoy, have argued just the opposite: the earth, was seen as the garbage dump of the universe, with hell at its center. "It is sufficiently evident from such passages that the geocentric cosmography served rather for man's humiliation than for his exaltation, and that Copernicanism was opposed partly on the ground that it assigned too dignified and lofty a position to his dwelling-place."⁵³ The fact seems to be that man's escape from the geocentric universe could be viewed either as a contraction of man's physical (and therefore historical) place in creation, or as an elevation, ethically, because of one's escape from the wrath of the God of the formerly confined creation. On the other hand, men might view the universe as majestically huge, and therefore the God who created it must be infinite. This is metaphysically humbling, but for the regenerate it can be the promise of triumph. The key is not the size or shape of the universe, but the reliability of the revelation of the God of creation. The problem is not size, but ethics, not geographical position, but ethical position. The great danger, soon witnessed, of the expanded size of God's universe was the next step, wholly illegitimate: infinite time.⁵⁴

51. Charles H. Hapgood, Maps of the Ancient Sea Kings (Philadelphia: Chilton, 1966). This is one of the most startling books ever published. Ignored by professional historians and geographers, it produces evidence that accurate maps of the world, including Antarctica, were available to explorers in the sixteenth century, probably in the twelfth century, and very likely long before the Phoenicians. Antarctica was not re-discovered—discovered, given the standard textbook account—until the eighteenth century. The book is an eloquent rebuttal of cultural and historical evolutionists: if anything, it indicates cultural devolution. No wonder it is ignored by modern scholars!

52. J. B. Bury, The Idea of Progress (New York: Dover, [1932] 1955), p. 115. The book first appeared in 1920.

53. Lovejoy, Great Chain, p. 102; cf. Alexander Koyré, From the Closed World to the Infinite Universe (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, [1957] 1970), pp. 19, 43. This garbage-dump cosmology was an Aristotelian conception of the world: Great Chain, p. 104.

3. Renaissance Cosmology

Modern historians have often been remiss, lazy, or deliberately misleading in their unwillingness to comment on another aspect of the conflict between medieval Roman Catholic orthodox science and the Renaissance discoveries. Renaissance speculation was not the product of a group of armchair college professors. It was deeply involved in magic, demonism, and the occult arts. C. S. Lewis was correct when he observed that it was not the Middle Ages that encouraged grotesque superstitions; it was the "rational" Renaissance. These men were searching for power, like Faustus, not truth for its own sake.⁵⁵ For example, it is generally today accepted that the first late-medieval or early modern figure to advance the old Greek concept of an infinite universe was Giordano Bruno.⁵⁶ Yet it was Bruno's reputation, well-deserved, as a magician, a Kabbalist, and an astrologer that brought him to his disastrous end.⁵⁷ It was not simply that Copernicus, in the name of mathematical precision, placed the sun at the center of the universe. Ptolemy's system was as accurate in its predictions as Copernicus' system (for Copernicus erroneously favored circular planet orbits instead of ellipses).⁵⁸ Copernicus was involved in a neoplatonic, Pythagorean revival against the Aristotelian universe of the late-medieval period. Mathematics governs everything, this tradition teaches, contrary to Aristotle's teachings.⁵⁹ It was also a deeply mystical and

54. The crucial aspect of time in cosmological speculation will be discussed more fully in the section dealing with geological evolution.

55. C. S. Lewis, The Abolition of Man (New York: Macmillan, [1947] 1965), pp. 87–89. The attempt of modern science to fuse rational scientific technique and magical power is the theme of Lewis' magnificent novel, That Hideous Strength (1945).

56. Lovejoy, Great Chain, pp. 116–17; Koyré, Closed World, p. 39.

57. Frances Yates, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (New York: Vintage, [1964] 1969). This is required reading for anyone who still believes the myth of the "rational" Renaissance.

58. E. A. Burtt, The Metaphysical Foundations of Modern Physical Science (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor [1925] 1954), p. 36. This is a very fine study of the mind-matter dualism of modern scientific and philosophical thought.

59. Ibid., p. 52–56.

magical tradition. Kepler, the mathematical genius who discovered that planetoid motion is elliptical, was a sun-worshipper and an astrologer.⁶⁰ The leaders of the institutional church understandably were disturbed by these theologically and cosmologically heretical individuals.

The debate over whether or not the universe is infinite is still with us today. Einstein's curved (in relation to what?) and finite universe is obviously not in harmony with the absolute space of Newton's cosmology. Prior to the sixteenth century, however, European scholars had not raised the question. Aristotle's rejection of the idea was considered final. The problem is exceedingly intricate, as anyone understands who has attempted to struggle through Alexander Koyré's book, From the Closed World to the Infinite Universe (1957). Copernicus and Kepler rejected the idea, although their speculations vastly expanded men's vision of the creation. Galileo, whose telescopes shattered the translucent spheres as comets never had, was content to affirm an indeterminate universe. Descartes, who above all other men of his era believed in a totally mathematical universe, and whose vision in this regard was crucial for the development of modern science, said that space is indefinite. He was always cautious on theological or semi-theological topics. The limit, he thought, may well be in our minds; we should therefore avoid such disputes. In fact, Descartes' refusal to postulate limits (due to men's inability to conceive such limits) really served as an assertion of an infinite space.⁶¹ Descartes' god was simply pure mind, having nothing in common with the material world.⁶²

Henry More (not Sir Thomas More), in the latter part of the seventeenth century, was converted to a belief in an infinite void space, identifying this with God's omnipresence. The limited material universe is therefore contained in this infinite void. Space is eternal, uncreated, and the necessary presupposition of our thinking. He identified the spatiality of God and the divinity of space.⁶³ Space is an attribute of God in this perspective—a dangerous linking of Creator and creature. (This position, by the way, was also held by Jonathan Edwards in his youth.⁶⁴) More is not that crucial a figure in the history of 60. Ibid., pp. 56–58, 69. Kepler's Platonism was tempered by his Christian faith.

61. Ibid., p. 124.

62. Koyré, Closed World, p. 124.

63. Ibid., pp. 150–53.

64. R. J. Rushdoony, This Independent Republic (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1964] 2001), p. 6. Rushdoony cited Edwards' youthful notebooks: "Notes on Natural Science, Of Being."

Europe, but his opinion on the infinity of space was shared by Isaac Newton.⁶⁵ Newton's affirmation of Absolute Space and Absolute Time as postulates of all physics was to open the door to a conclusion which he personally opposed: an autonomous universe.

Leibniz identified Newton's Absolute Space with the material universe, a step Newton did not take, but one which few others seemed able to resist after 1700. It was the crucial step in severing God from His universe. Thus, concluded Koyré,

At the end of the [seventeenth] century Newton's victory was complete. The Newtonian God reigned supreme in the infinite void of absolute space in which the force of universal attraction linked together the atomically structured bodies of the immense universe and made them move around in accordance with strict mathematical laws. Yet it can be argued that this victory was a Pyrrhic one, and that the price paid for it was disastrously high. . . . Moreover, an infinite universe existing only for a limited duration seems illogical. Thus the created world became infinite both in Space and in Time. But an infinite and eternal world, as [Dr. Samuel] Clarke had so strongly objected to in Leibniz, can hardly admit creation. It does not need it; it exists by virtue of this very infinity.⁶⁶

From a closed world to an infinite universe means, therefore, a universe closed to God. There is nothing to which men can appeal beyond the creation itself. But without God there can be no meaning. Max Weber was correct: modern science removes meaning from the world.⁶⁷ Koyré ended his book with this statement: "The infinite Universe of the New Cosmology, infinite in Duration as well as Extension, in which eternal matter in accordance with eternal and necessary laws moves endlessly and aimlessly in eternal space, inherited all the ontological [being] attributes of Divinity. Yet only those—all the others the departed God took away with Him."⁶⁸ This is cosmic impersonalism. We are back to the ancient pagan cosmology, only now there is no doubt about the randomness of the universe; it is aimless.

This did not mean that those holding the new cosmology abandoned the idea of linear time. Now that God was officially removed, the linearity of time was secularized and thereby ostensibly human-

65. Koyré, p. 159; Burt, pp. 260–61.

66. Koyré, pp. 274–75.

67. Max Weber, "Science as a Vocation," (1919), in H. H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills (eds.), From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology (New York: Oxford University Press, 1946), pp. 139–42. (<http://bit.ly/WeberScience>)

68. Koyré, p. 276.

ized. The universe would now be cosmically personal in terms of man. The secular idea of progress was born in the seventeenth century, paralleling the advent of a resurgence of orthodox Protestant (especially Calvinistic and Puritan) optimism. Nothing has characterized this secularization of Christian providence any better than Nisbet's comment: "By the late 17th century, Western philosophers, noting that the earth's frame had still not been consumed by Augustinian holocaust, took a kind of politician's courage in the fact, and declared bravely that the world was never going to end (Descartes, it seems, had proved this) and that mankind was going to become ever more knowledgeable and, who knows, progressively happy. Now, of a sudden, the year 2000 became the object of philosophical speculation."⁶⁹ They had not yet become fully consistent with their own philosophy of randomness.

Bernard de Fontenelle's Conversations on the Plurality of Worlds (1686) became the great popular work announcing the new infinity of creation, as well as its new-found autonomy. In 1755, Immanuel Kant took these speculations and became the first systematic evolutionist. Process theology came into its own. Wrote Toulmin and Goodfield: "The fame of Immanuel Kant's three Critiques has obscured his striking contributions to cosmology. In fact, his earlier work on the General History of Nature and Theory of the Heavens (1755) was the first systematic attempt to give an evolutionary account of cosmic history. In it, he spoke of the whole Order of Nature, not as something completed at the time of the original Creation, but as something still coming into existence. The transition from Chaos to Order had not taken place all at once."⁷⁰ Creation, argued Kant, had taken millions of centuries. Time may somehow be linear and infinite, but the process of creation is cyclical. The world will run down, only to be reformed once again out of the climactic conflagration at the end. As he put it, "Worlds and systems perish and are swallowed up in the abyss of Eternity; but at the same time Creation is always busy constructing new formations in the Heavens, and advantageously making up for the loss." So, what we have here, in his words, is a "Phoenix of Nature, which burns itself only in order to revive again in restored youth from its ashes, through all infinity of times and spaces. . . ."⁷¹ Kant, on whose speculations modern philosophy is built, also set forth the presuppositions in terms of which supposedly neutral “eternal oscillation” astronomers have constructed their footnoted cosmologies. Religious presuppositions govern modern astronomical science and modern geological science.

69. Robert A. Nisbet, "The Year 2000 and All That," Commentary (June 1968), p. 61.

70. Toulmin and Goodfield, Discovery of Time, p. 130.

71. Quoted in ibid., p. 134.

Men have abandoned the revelation of God. In the name of science, they inform us that the belief in a creation by God a few thousand years ago is preposterous—reversing St. Augustine’s dictum. In place of this creation account, physicist George Gamow asked us to believe that the universe began its existence as a condensed droplet of matter at an extremely high density and temperature. This primordial egg—the “ylem”—generated fantastic internal pressures and exploded. As it expanded its temperature dropped. As Robert Jastrow summarized Gamow’s theory: “In the first few minutes of its existence the temperature was many millions of degrees, and all the matter within the droplet consisted of the basic particles—electrons, neutrons and protons. . . . According to the big-bang theory, all 92 elements were formed in this way in the first half-hour of the existence of the universe.”⁷² Jastrow offered this as a serious possibility. He was the Director of the Goddard Institute for Space Studies, and the lectures were originally viewed over CBS television in 1964 as a Summer Semester. The public is expected to believe this, but not expected to take seriously the biblical account of creation.

We are told that the laws of probability probably govern the universe. The universe evolved in terms of these laws. Prof. Charles-Eugene Guye once estimated the probability of evolving an imaginary (but given) random assortment of atoms into an equally imaginary protein molecule containing a minimum of four atoms: carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen. He did not assume the coming of all 92 elements or even life itself—just the components of a single protein molecule. The volume of original random atomic substance necessary to produce—randomly—the single protein molecule would be a sphere with a radius so large that light, traveling at 186,000 miles per second, would take 10^{82} years to cover the distance (10, followed by 81 zeros). The outermost limits of the known universe today, however, is about ten billion light-years, or 10^9 light-years. The probability that this imaginary molecule might be formed on a globe the size of the earth, assuming vibrations of the random electrons and protons on the mag-

72. Robert Jastrow, Red Giants and White Dwarfs (New York: New American Library, 1969), p. 69. This happened 10 billion years ago, wrote Jastrow. This figure has been revised to 13 billion. This remains the commonly accepted date, give or take a few hundred million years.

nitude of light frequencies, is next to nil. It would take—get this!— 10^{243} years. The universe is supposedly a minimum of 10 billion years old, or 10^9 years.⁷³ Obviously, modern scientists dismiss Guye's estimates as impossible, but if he is even remotely correct (within 50 or 60 zeroes), the laws of probability simply do not account for the existence of the universe. Yet scientists regard the creation story of the Bible as utterly fantastic, the cultic tale of a primitive Semitic tribe. Of course, what they fail to point out is that the theory that the universe sprang from the random impact of atoms in motion was first developed by Epicurus and Democritus; the theoretical presuppositions of the "new cosmology" are very ancient indeed. In the area of speculation concerning ultimate origins, the scientists of today have contributed very little improvement over Greek speculation twenty-three centuries ago. The fact that Kant propounded it in 1755 does not make it automatically modern.⁷⁴

D. Geological Evolution

Renaissance science broadened the conception of the universe that had been inherited from Aristotelian science. The physical boundaries of the universe seemed immeasurably gigantic, inconceivably large, and finally infinite. Enlightenment thinkers, most notably Kant, then hypothesized the infinity of time to match the hypothetical infinity of the spatial universe. From the Christian point of view, this constituted the "evolutionary wedge" by which the creation account of the Bible was steadily shoved into the realm of myth and fable. Mechanical laws replaced personal providence, thus seemingly negating the necessity of believing in "creation as sustaining." Next, the expansion of men's temporal horizon seemingly negated the necessity of believing in "creation as origin." Cosmological evolution provided the hypothetical framework for geological evolution; geological evolution was to make possible the hypothesis of biological evolution. But all three required vast quantities of time to make them plausible. Loren Eiseley, perhaps the most successful popularizer of biological evolutionary concepts within America's intellectual circles, made this point repeatedly: "No theory of evolution can exist without an allotment of time in generous quantities. Yet it is just this factor which was denied to the questioning scientist by the then current Christian cosmology. A change as vast as that existing between the Ptolemaic and Copernican systems of the heavens had to be effected in Western thinking upon the subject of time before one could even contemplate the possibility of extensive organic change; the one idea is an absolute prerequisite to the other."⁷⁵

73. Guye's figure of probability is 2.02×10^{321} ; cited in Lecomte du Nouy, Human Destiny (New York: Longmans, Green, 1947), p. 34. A "far less" impossible figure has been computed by Prof. Edward Blick: 10^{67} to one. Henry M. Morris, et al. (eds.), Creation: Acts, Facts, Impacts (San Diego: Creation Life Publishers, 1974), p. 175. For a lighthearted discussion of the mathematics of the evolution of life, see Fred Reed, "Fredwin on Evolution" (March 7, 2005). (<http://bit.ly/Fredwin>)

74. John C. Greene, The Death of Adam: Evolution and Its Impact on Western Thought (Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1959), pp. 8, 28–30.

In the year 1750, there were still very few scientists, let alone average citizens, who believed that the earth was much older than 6,000 years. By 1850, a majority of scientists were convinced that the earth was far older. The Origin of Species, which sold out in one day (1,250 copies) in 1859, would probably not have been published, and certainly would not have been popular, apart from a revolution in men's conception of the earth's chronology. How had this revolution come about?

1. Buffon's System

If any man deserves the distinction of having set forth the outlines of geological evolution in a scientific framework, it is probably the French scholar and literary figure, the Comte de Buffon. Named as a member of the Royal Academy at age 26 (1733), appointed keeper of the Royal Cabinet of Natural History in 1739, Buffon published the first volume of his Natural History in 1749. He published 35 more volumes before his death in 1788, one year before the outbreak of the French Revolution. His cosmological presupposition was straightforward: "Time is the great workman of Nature."⁷⁶ In the next sentences, he outlined the doctrine of uniformitarianism: "He [time] moves with regular and uniform steps. He performs no operation suddenly; but, by degrees, or successive impressions, nothing can resist his power. . . ." Buffon personalized the impersonal. His universe was the same as an American popular song's: "We run our race in an hourglass of space; but we're only the toys in time's great game: time gives and time takes away."⁷⁷ Only the French censors kept his language even remotely orthodox.

75. Loren Eiseley, Darwin's Century: Evolution and the Men Who Discovered It (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1958] 1961), p. 58.

76. Buffon, cited by Greene, Death of Adam, p. 148.

77. "Toys in Time," by Bob Kimmel and Ken Edwards, BMI.

Buffon also abandoned one of the fundamental beliefs of orthodox Christianity and non-Christian Aristotelian speculation (fused temporarily in one of Thomas Aquinas' proofs of God): the doctrine of final causes. The universe, Buffon believed, is not headed anywhere in particular. This is one of the crucial tenets of all modern science: teleology cannot be assumed by or proved by modern science. In fact, it was only by Charles Darwin's rejection of teleology—final cause, ultimate direction, etc.—that modern biological evolutionism became possible. As we shall see, the earlier systems of biological evolutionism assumed to some degree a teleological framework. Buffon set the standard over a century before the publication of Darwin's Origin.⁷⁸

Furthermore, Buffon rejected the idea that the present order of existence was set immutably by God in the original creation. As John C. Greene summarized Buffon's position, "it tried to conceive organic phenomena as the outcome of temporal process rather than a static expression of a pattern of creation."⁷⁹ Providence disappears, and with it, the idea that each kind reproduces after its own kind indefinitely (Gen. 1:24). He did not take this next step, Greene said, but he could not dismiss the idea of the mutability of species from his mind.

Thus, by removing God from the realm of science, Buffon thought he had transferred sovereignty to man. "There is no boundary to the human intellect. It extends in proportion as the universe is displayed. Hence man can and ought to attempt everything: He wants nothing but time to enable him to obtain universal knowledge."⁸⁰ Greene's comments are significant: "Buffon had come a long way from the Christian concept of the earth as a stage for the drama of man's redemption by divine grace. Burning with the thirst for knowledge and intoxicated with the sense of man's potential control over nature, he proclaimed man's power to be master of his own fate. Hitherto, he declared, man had pursued evil more energetically than good, amusement more diligently than knowledge, but there was reason to hope that he would at last discover peace to be his true happiness and sci-

78. Buffon was not a biological evolutionist, however: Lovejoy, "Buffon and the Problem of Species," in Glass, (ed.), Forerunners of Darwin, ch. 4. He did not believe in the mutability of the species. Writing as he did before the development of stratigraphy—an early nineteenth century science—he did not feel compelled to deal with the problem of fossils in some temporal succession. The question had not yet arisen. He could have both time and stable species.

79. Greene, Death of Adam, p. 145.

80. Quoted in ibid., p. 154.

ence his true glory.”⁸¹

Buffon offered a “scientific” conclusion that it had taken about 72,000 years for the globe to cool enough to allow the appearance of life.⁸² We have about 70,000 years ahead of us before the planet chills to lifelessness. This is neither far enough back in time to please modern geologists nor far enough ahead to please evolutionary humanists, but the break between 6,000 years and 72,000 was all that was necessary; ten billion more years was easy enough, once the 6,000-year barrier was breached.

He did not believe in organic evolution; instead, he offered a theory of repeated spontaneous, though naturalistic, appearances of new life-forms. He allowed God to be present only at the very beginning, far back in the mists of time, and far ahead in the final, unspecified, end.⁸³ By his prestige, Buffon offered man the apostate gift of Godless time. Time was the needed dwelling place of uniformitarian change, and the zone of safety from a personal God. Providence was removed from space by autonomous laws of nature and pushed back into antiquity by the newly discovered time machine.

2. Hutton's Uniformitarianism

Geology, as a specialized profession, came into being with mining and metallurgy. As men burrowed into the earth, a few of them began to notice the fact that the earth's crust often appears to be layered, like a multi-tiered cake without frosting. Prior to the uniformitarian geology, the two generally accepted explanations were: (1) Neptunism, that is, deposition by water (either at the flood of Noah or in some great sea of creation); (2) Vulcanism, that is, the deposits of volcanic action. An influential pioneering work was Johann G. Lehmann's In- vestigation into the History of Stratified Mountains (1756). The author believed that Noah's Deluge was the crucial event in the past that reshaped the earth's crust. Another German, Abraham Werner, was an influential teacher of stratigraphy. He was a Neptunist, but his focus was a great primeval sea, and he did not explicitly profess faith in a six-day creation. It was against Werner's theories that James Hutton reacted.⁸⁴

81. Ibid., p. 155.

82. Eiseley, Darwin's Century, p. 42. Haber pointed out that in the unpublished manuscript copy of Buffon's Epoques de la Nature, he admitted that his estimate of 72,000 years to cool the molten earth was conservative; it may have taken as much as a million years, possibly more: Francis C. Haber, “Fossils and the Idea of a Process of Time in Natural History,” in Glass (ed.), Forerunners of Darwin, p. 256. Buffon saw that the Newtonian view of infinite space could serve as an intellectual wedge for his concept of extended time: “And why does the mind seem to get lost in the space of duration rather than in that of extension, or in the consideration of measures, weights and numbers? Why are 100,000 years more difficult to conceive and to count than 100,000 pounds of money?” Ibid., p. 235. The obvious answer—obvious in the mid-eighteenth century—was that by no stretch of the language of Genesis 1 could a period of 100,000 years be obtained. In 1750, that was important. A century later it was not.

83. Greene, Death of Adam, p. 138.

In all of these theories—Neptunism, Vulcanism, and even Buffon's—there were elements of catastrophism. James Hutton set out to refute this presupposition. He accepted the earth at face value; all changes on earth have always occurred at the leisurely pace observable today. He first offered the results of his investigations in 1785; his two-volume Theory of the Earth appeared in 1795. He held defiantly to a totally mechanistic view of geological processes; all forces and changes produce counter-forces and compensating changes. In his famous sentence, Hutton announced to the world: "The result, therefore, of this physical inquiry is, that we find no vestige of a beginning,—no prospect of an end."⁸⁵

Eiseley stated categorically: "He discovered, in other words, time—time boundless and without end, the time of the ancient Easterners. . . ."⁸⁶ Indeed he did; as Eiseley also had to admit, Hutton's time bears traces of cyclicalism. There is no linear development in Hutton's self-compensating world machine. "Hutton was thus a total uniformitarian."⁸⁷ There have never been any catastrophic changes, Hutton believed, because there have never been any significant change at all. But there has been time—countless eons of time; the checkbook might even be large enough for biological evolutionists to draw the needed time reserves for their cosmologies. The cosmic judgment of God was pushed forward into the endless recesses of time's comforting womb.

Toulmin and Goodfield, in an otherwise excellent study, could not seem to grasp the threat to Christianity which Hutton's system represented. They said that "his fundamental aims were conservative and devout." He was just an honest observer of facts, letting them carry him to some cosmically neutral conclusion. They asked: Why did his contemporaries attack him? For one thing, it was not simply theology that 84. On Werner and Lehmann, see ibid., pp. 59–62, 70–72.

85. Ibid., p. 78.

86. Eiseley, Darwin's Century, p. 65.

87. Ibid., p. 74.

motivated his opponents; his position was undermining Vulcanism's catastrophism, while simultaneously undermining Neptunism, since Hutton laid great emphasis on the power of slowly acting subterranean heat.⁸⁸ He was stepping on everyone's methodological toes. But some of the opposition was theological. Naively, Toulmin and Goodfield remarked: "Yet there was, in fact, nothing in Hutton's system—apart from the unbounded chronology—that could legitimately give offense."⁸⁹ That, however, was precisely the point, as Eiseley understood so well:

The uniformitarians were, on the whole, disinclined to countenance the intrusion of strange or unknown forces into the universe. They eschewed final causes and all aspects of world creation, feeling like their master Hutton that such problems were confusing and beyond human reach. The uniformitarian school, in other words, is essentially a revolt against the Christian conception of time as limited and containing historic direction, with supernatural intervention constantly immanent [immanent—"inherent, operating within"—not imminent—"about to happen"—G.N.]. Rather, this philosophy involves the idea of the Newtonian machine, self-sustaining and forever operating on the same principles."⁹⁰

There should be no confusion on this point: the great theological debate centered around the question of time. All good men—Frenchmen excepted, naturally—believed in a personal God in the period 1750–1850. This God was allowed to be a creator in some sense or other. But, by pushing the time or order of God's creative acts back into a misty past, men were relegating this God into a mere intellectual construction—a kind of useful myth, rather like Plato's creator god. One's concept of time is fundamental in defining one's concept of God.

Prior to Lyell's hesitating conversion to Darwinism, his view of time was almost static. Some geological forces tend to raise portions of the earth's crust; there are forces elsewhere which tend to allow land to sink. If elevation is happening in one region, leveling or erosion is taking place somewhere else. It has been this way indefinitely. The forces are evenly balanced. "If we ask what of significance has happened in this expanse of time, the answer is, 'Nothing.' There have been no unique events. There have been no stages of growth. We have a system of indifference, of more or less meaningless fluctuations around an eternal mean.”⁹¹ As Walter Cannon pointed out, this is not developing time—the time of the modern historian. It is simply unlimited, meaningless time. We might say that his impersonal time is like an infinitely long geometrical line, composed of an indefinite number of identical points. Uniformitarian time does not, in or of itself, give us a theory of evolution, for evolution implies growth, and the eighteenth-century world machine could not grow. It was a gyroscope, not a seed. But it was an exceedingly old gyroscope, and that was to prove crucial.

88. Greene, Death of Adam, p. 84.

89. Toulmin and Goodfield, Discovery of Time, p. 156.

90. Eiseley, Darwin's Century, p. 114. Cf. Nisbet, Social Change and History, p. 184.

There is a distinctly religious impulse undergirding uniformitarianism. Eiseley was correct when he said that Hutton was proposing an anti-Christian concept of time. Charles C. Gillispie concluded that “The essence of Huttonianism lay not in specific details of weathering, denudation, or uplift, but in its attitude towards natural history.”⁹² Consider what Hutton was saying. On the basis of his own limited wanderings and observations around Edinburgh, Hutton announced a new theory of change to the world. In doing so, modern commentators have concluded, he created the first truly historical natural science, geology. Hutton challenged the biblical account of Noah’s Flood, the researches and conclusions of the Neptunists and the more cataclysmic Vulcanists, and concluded that what he had seen—slow, even imperceptible geological change—is all men now know. Furthermore, we can assume that such imperceptible change is all any man can know—past, present, and future. Because he had never seen the universal Flood, obviously no one has ever seen one. His operational presupposition was about as sophisticated as the opinion of the Soviet Union’s cosmonaut who announced, after returning from a few revolutions above the earth’s atmosphere, that he had not seen God up there! What Hutton imposed, all in the name of rational historical insight, was the most arrogant and blatant form of what historians call “the tyranny of the present.” What was true in Edinburgh in 1780 was true for the whole world throughout endless eons of time. If any other historical data refute such a claim—the Bible, the almost universal pagan myths concerning a universal Flood, the astoundingly precise calendars of the Babylonians and other ancient cultures, the equally astounding Babylonian astronomical records—then they must be disregarded as insufficiently historical. History is what we can observe here and now, not what primitive people used to think they were observing. Or, as Van Til summarized it, “what my net won’t catch aren’t fish.” Yet what Hutton and his endless troops of defenders have claimed is that he alone was truly empirical, truly concerned with the “facts.” But no fact is allowed which seems to come into direct conflict with Hutton’s deeply religious presupposition that rates of change today have always existed, or at the very least, that we have no evidence that indicates that the rates of change have ever been different.

91. Walter F. Cannon, “The Basis of Darwin’s Achievement: A Revaluation,” Victorian Studies, V (1961); reprinted in Philip Appleman (ed.), Darwin: A Norton Critical Edition (New York: Norton, 1970), p. 42.

92. Charles Coulston Gillispie, Genesis and Geology (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1951] 1959), p. 83.

The prolix, unreadable writing of James Hutton did not convince men to believe in the uniformitarian religion. It was not the testimony of the rocks near Edinburgh that converted the world to a theory of an ancient earth. It was rather the built-in desire of men to escape the revelation of a God who judges men and societies, in time and on earth, as well as on the final day of judgment. They prefer to believe in the tyranny of the present because the past indicates the existence of a God who brings immense, unstoppable judgments upon sinners. Men prefer the tyranny of the present to the sovereignty of God. Nothing less than a deeply religious impulse could lead men to accept a presupposition as narrow, parochial, and preposterous as the theory of uniformitarian change. Hutton announced, “today Edinburgh; tomorrow the world—past, present, and future,” and men rushed to join the new anti-millennial religion. Like the Soviet cosmonaut, Hutton just could not see any sign of God in the Edinburgh rocks, and those were the rocks men soon wanted.

3. Lyell’s Uniformitarianism

James Hutton is long forgotten, except by specialists in the history of geology. But his most famous follower, Sir Charles Lyell, cannot be ignored, for it is Lyell’s book, Principles of Geology (1830–33), which gave Charles Darwin his operating presuppositions. The son of a botanist, Lyell was by profession a lawyer. He studied geology on the weekends. He was in his early thirties when his multi-volume work was published, and it became an instant classic—indeed, the definitive book. He had been a catastrophist until 1827; three years later, he was the premier uniformitarian in the English-speaking world.

It is not easy to summarize Lyell’s work. He opposed the theory of biological evolution until the late 1860s, yet it was sometime around 1860 that the evangelical Christianity of his youth returned to him.⁹³ His commitment to uniformitarian principles of interpretation led him to view geological processes as if they were part of a huge mechanism. He was familiar with the young science of paleontology; he was aware of the fact that lower strata ("older") often contained species that did not appear in the higher ("younger") strata. This seemed to point to both extinct species and completely new ("recent") species, indicating biological development, given the "fact" of eons of time in between the geological strata. Yet Lyell resisted this conclusion until 1867—nine years after Darwin and Wallace had published their first essays on natural selection and biological evolution. Lyell's opposition to evolution had long vexed Darwin; he could not understand why Lyell resisted the obvious conclusion of the uniformitarian position. As recently as 1958, scholars were still as confused over this as Darwin had been. Lyell's correspondence indicates that he was committed to the idea of final causation—teleology—like most other scientists of his day. He spoke of a "Presiding Mind" in an 1836 letter to Sir John Herschel.⁹⁴ This divine intelligence directed any extinctions or new appearances of species that might have taken place in the past. He called these "intermediate causes," and let it go at that. But such interventions by God, direct or indirect, violated the principle of uniformitarian change, since no such intervention is visible today. Thus, concludes the meticulous scholar, A. O. Lovejoy, "once uniformitarianism was accepted, evolutionism became the most natural and most probable hypothesis concerning the origin of the species."⁹⁵ But Lyell insisted (in the 1830s through 1863) on the recent origin of man and the validity, respecting mankind, of the Mosaic record. "He simply did not see," wrote Lovejoy, "that a uniformitarian could not consistently accept special-creationism, and must therefore accept some form of evolutionism."⁹⁶ In the tenth edition of Principles (1867), Lyell finally capitulated, becoming a full Darwinian.

93. William Irvine, Apes, Angels, and Victorians: The Story of Darwin, Huxley, and Evolution (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1955), p. 139.

94. Quoted by Greene, Death of Adam, p. 373, note #6.

95. Lovejoy, "The Argument for Organic Evolution Before the Origin of the Species, 1830–1858," in Glass (ed.), Forerunners of Darwin, p. 367.

96. Ibid., p. 373. Gertrude Himmelfarb believed that Lyell was an evolutionist in private. But his private letters also indicate his belief in a "Presiding Mind." He was certainly ambivalent—or epistemologically schizophrenic—but I do not think he was dishonest. See Himmelfarb, Darwin and the Darwinian Revolution (Gloucester, Massachusetts: Peter Smith [1959] 1967), pp. 189–93.

Lyell's ultimate faith was in uniformitarianism: unlimited geological time and slow, continuous geological change. This was to override his commitment to special creation (or some unnamed nonevolutionary natural process of species transformation). It was an inescapable either/or situation. Nineteenth-century geological and biological scientists could not forever cling to a God who intervened to rewrite the book on living species, eon after eon, letting the "geological clock" tick for ages in between interventions. If creationism was not a one-time fiat act of God, it was ludicrous. The ridiculousness of such a God could not forever be avoided. Here was a God who created creatures, then let them perish; intervening, He created new creatures, and some of them perished. In order to keep the balance of nature going, He intervened over and over through countless ages, adding ever more complex creatures to the earth. Some of these became extinct, but cockroaches and ants survived. He behaved, in Lovejoy's words, like a very lazy and befuddled architect, intervening with endless ad hoc plans to reconstruct the jerry-built structure. As Lovejoy wryly commented, "no man outside of a madhouse ever behaved in such a manner as that in which, by this hypothesis, the Creator of the universe was supposed to have behaved."⁹⁷ Yet such a view was orthodox, both theologically and geologically, from 1820–30. Enlightenment rationalism had eroded the Christian foundation of knowledge; Christians had built on a foundation of sand. Darwinism destroyed the structure, but only because the "creationists" had long before gone bankrupt, leasing the grounds temporarily to Lyell until Darwin foreclosed, bringing in the demolition equipment.

What is both baffling and appalling is that so many Christians still cling to Lyell's temporary and hopeless compromise—a compromise he had to abandon in 1867. Geologists who profess orthodoxy still argue that we must accept the results of uniformitarian geology, yet assure us that we do not have to accept organic evolution. In a scholarly journal of a modern Calvinistic seminary we read:

We believe that Scripture does not permit the interpretation of the theistic evolutionist. We do believe that the data of Scripture permit, although they do not require, the view that the days of Genesis one were periods of time of indefinite length. Hence we believe that the products of creation of the various days one through six were not necessarily instantaneously produced in a mature state but were formed over a long period of time. This view does have the advantage of permitting the Christian geologist to interpret intelligibly the actual data of geology.⁹⁸

97. Ibid., p. 413.

This has the advantage of allowing a geologist who is a Christian to interpret the Bible in terms of the geology and theology of 1840, when some men could still believe in numerous special creations. The geology of 1859 or later, devoid of final causes, purpose, interventions by God, or the need of reconciliation with the Bible, has no space for God's activity in between the autonomous strata of the earth.

Galileo had begun the steady removal by autonomous men of God from His universe. By the 1840s, God's last place of refuge among scientists was in the realm of biology. Uniformitarianism after 1830 had finally removed Him from the rocks. He was allowed His various "special creations" from time to time among living beings. Lovejoy commented: "And while all these miraculous interpositions were taking place in order to keep the organic kingdom in a going condition, the Creator was not for a moment allowed, by most of these geologists (including, as we shall see, Lyell and his followers) to interfere in a similar manner in their own particular province of the inorganic processes. . . . So, in the opinion of most naturalists the only officially licensed area in which miracles might be performed by the Creator was the domain of organic phenomena."⁹⁹ Charles Darwin's On the Origin of Species repealed the license even here. Thus, it is a sign of the demoralization and naivete of modern uniformitarian geologists who claim to be Christian in their scholarship, that they expect the methodology of uniformitarianism to be easily restrained. It is supposedly fine for geologists to assume as valid this uniformitarian methodology (as it was in 1840), but biologists nevertheless have to be anti-evolutionists, denying therefore Darwin's overwhelmingly successful-pragmatically speaking-fusion of uniformitarianism and biology. But Darwinianism is not to be denied by compromising Christian biologists today, any more than he could be denied by uniformitarian scholarship in the

98. Davis A. Young, "Some Practical Geological Problems in the Application of the Mature Creation Doctrine," Westminster Theological Journal, XXXV (Spring 1973), p. 269. He was the son of Edward J. Young, author of Studies in Genesis One. A reply to Young's article appeared in the subsequent issue: John C. Whitcomb, Jr., "The Science of Historical Geology in the Light of the Biblical Doctrine of a Mature Creation," ibid., XXXVI (Fall 1973). Young's doctorate was in geology; Whitcomb's was in theology. Whitcomb was co-author of The Genesis Flood (1961), the most important book in the revival of the six-day creation view of Genesis, for it helped to develop the market for numerous additional studies along these lines in the 1960s.

99. Lovejoy, in Forerunners of Darwin, p. 365.

1870s. Uniformitarian concepts of time are far too potent for half-measures.

The important humanist study, Forerunners of Darwin (1959), published on the centenary of the publication of Origin of Species, opens with a crucial quotation from the uniformitarian geologist, George Scrope, who in 1858 wrote these memorable words: “The leading idea which is present in all our researches, and which accompanies every fresh observation, the sound which to the ear of the student of Nature seems continually echoed from every part of her works, is—Time! Time! Time!”¹⁰⁰

E. Biological Evolution: Pre-Darwin

The seventeenth century had seen the reappearance of postmillennial eschatology—out of favor ever since the fifth century—which offered Christians new hope. The preaching of the gospel and the establishment of Christian institutions would eventually transform the world ethically, and this ethical transformation would eventually be accompanied by external personal and cultural blessings. This had been the vision of many English Puritans and most of the American colonial Puritans until the pessimism of the 1660s, symbolized by the poetry of Michael Wigglesworth, set in. This vision was to have a revival, unfortunately in more antinomian, “spiritual” forms, through the influence of Jonathan Edwards in the eighteenth century.¹⁰¹

1. The Idea of Progress

Paralleling this biblical optimism was the secular idea of progress of Enlightenment thinkers, especially Frenchmen. By the 1750s, this perspective was becoming a part of the European climate of opinion.¹⁰²

100. Cited by Francis C. Haber, “Fossils and Early Cosmology,” ibid., p. 3.

101. On the Puritans’ postmillennial impulse, see the articles by James Payton, Aletha Gilsdorf, and Gary North in The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VI (Summer 1979); Iain Murray, The Puritan Hope (London: Banner of Truth, 1971); Ernest Lee Tuveson, Redeemer Nation: The Idea of America’s Millennial Role (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967); Alan Heimert, Religion and the American Mind (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1966). One of the representative documents of the colonial American period is Edward Johnson’s Wonder-Working Providence, ed. J. Franklin Jameson (New York: Barnes & Noble, 1952). Until quite recently, postmillennial thought was a neglected—indeed, completely misunderstood—factor in American history.

102. J. B. Bury, The Idea of Progress (1920), is a standard account of secular optimism.

The idea of stages of historical development fascinated the writers of the day. The cosmological evolutionary schemes of Kant and Laplace were discussed as serious contributions, and Maupertuis and Diderot, the French secularists, offered theories of biological development—"transformism."¹⁰³ Three important features were present in these new theories; without these theoretical axioms, there would have been no reason to assume the evolutionary perspective. First, change (not stability) is "natural"—one of the key words of the Enlightenment.¹⁰⁴ Second, the natural order is regular; nature makes no leaps. This is the doctrine of continuity (uniformitarianism). Finally, in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, the method of investigation selected by the progressivists was the comparative method. Classification preceded the demonstration of evolutionary change.¹⁰⁵

Classification: this was all-important. Because of the influence of the Greek concept of the chain of being, men had long regarded all life as a harmonious interdependence of every species, from God at the top of the chain (or ladder) to the lowest creature. (This presented problems in theory: Are Satan and his angels therefore metaphysically necessary for the operation of the cosmos? Is Satan at the bottom of the scale because of his ethical depravity, or just under God Himself because of his metaphysical power? In fact, if he is totally evil, can he be said to have true existence at all? Questions like these destroyed the jerry-built "medieval synthesis" of Greek philosophy—itsself self-contradictory—and biblical revelation. Even in the eighteenth century, much of the original potency of the concept of the "great chain of being" remained.) But this chain of being was made up of fixed species. There was progress possible within one's species, but not between the fixed categories. Part of the magical impulse of alchemy was the desire to change lead into gold, not primarily for the sake of wealth, but for the power involved. The magical "philosopher's stone" would enable

103. Bentley Glass, "Maupertuis, Pioneer of Genetics and Evolution," and Lester G. Crocker, "Diderot and Eighteenth Century Transformism," in Glass (ed.), Forerunners of Darwin.

104. On the importance of the word "nature" to the eighteenth century, see Carl Becker, The Heavenly City of the Eighteenth-Century Philosophers (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1932). On the way in which "natural history" was used, see Nisbet, Social Change and History, ch. 4. It meant, essentially, conjectural history, that is, how events would automatically develop "naturally" if there were no "artificial" restraints on them. Developmentalism became biological evolutionism in the nineteenth century.

105. Frederick J. Teggart, Theory of History (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1925), pp. 129–32.

the magician-scientist to transcend the limits of creation. Thus, the search for the magical talisman; thus, the quest for magical salvation: metaphysical manipulation rather than ethical repentance and regeneration was the magician's means of grace.¹⁰⁶ To break the limits of creaturehood!

Enlightenment progressivists now offered a new theory: there had been progress of species through time. There had been development, and to Enlightenment thinkers, it was easy to assume that biological modification implied ethical improvement. There had been progress! And there would continue to be progress, not just politically and economically, but in the very nature of mankind. The religious impulse was clear enough: there are no longer any fixed barriers in the creation, given sufficient time to transcend them. The great chain of being could now be temporalized. Heaven was no longer above men; it was in front of mankind chronologically. Genetics would serve as a substitute for the alchemical talisman.

Not many thinkers were convinced by the biological evidence in 1750, or even in 1850. But the comparative method which had always been implied in the concept of the great chain of being was now emphasized by a newly developed discipline, natural history. The crucial figure in this field in the eighteenth century was the Swedish naturalist, Linnaeus. He possessed an unparalleled reputation in 1750; indeed, after the publication of the first edition of his Sustema Natura in 1735, he became world-famous, "a phenomenon rather than a man," as Eiseley put it.¹⁰⁷ He had a mania for naming things, and he created the system of dual names which still exists today, generic and species (which H. L. Mencken used in classifying the boobus Americanus). He was not an evolutionist in any sense, but by popularizing comparative anatomy as the means of classification—a method to be applied to every living organism—he added the crucial third axiom of the developmental hypothesis.¹⁰⁸

Buffon's researches also added prestige to the taxonomic research of the mid-eighteenth-century naturalists. But the next major step was half a century away. An obscure mining engineer, William Smith, had created a system of classifying strata in terms of the placement of organic fossils in each layer. “Strata” Smith’s system would be popularized by Rev. William Townsend after 1800. (Ministers would have an important role in natural science for well over a century. Rev. John Ray was the first popular classifier, four decades before Linneaus published. Rev. John Playfair would be the popularizer of James Hutton’s uniformitarianism after 1800. Even Charles Darwin himself had once studied to be a minister.) Smith avoided any theoretical explanation of his system. He hated both speculating and publication. He was a convinced catastrophist. Nevertheless, he had provided the uniformitarians with their necessary yardstick. By fusing Hutton’s time scale and Smith’s progressive fossil beds (“older” fossils in the lower layers), uniformitarians could now argue that they could measure the slow, steady history of the earth.

106. Yates, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition, chaps. 2, 3.

107. Eiseley, Darwin's Century, p. 16.

108. Linnaeus did admit, in later years, that nature had a "sportiveness" about her, that is, surprising variations within species. But not even Eiseley or Greene concluded that he ever leaned toward biological developmentalism.

By 1820, there was hardly a single reputable scientist in the British Isles who was committed to a six-day creation. Both the Neptunists (flooders) and Vulcanists (heaters) believed in long ages preceding man’s appearance on the earth. The Hutton time scale was common property among all the groups. All geologists therefore faced a disturbing problem: the fossil record demonstrated clearly that animals and plants appearing in one layer of the earth often did not appear in lower or higher layers—dinosaurs, for example. This implied extinction. It also implied a series of special creations over eons of time. The “creationism” of the 1820s, by clinging to Hutton’s time scale, was involved in a whole series of difficult, self-imposed dilemmas. We have already discussed them in the previous section: God the lazy architect; uniformitarianism with too many supernatural interventions; catastrophism with too much time to explain and too little emphasis on the great Noahic Flood. (Not that it was ignored, but it was regarded as only one of many important crises; after 1830, the Flood had become a local disaster in Palestine, or the Near East, at most.)

2. Organic Evolution

The doctrine of organic evolution was advocated by two thinkers at the turn of the century, Jean Baptiste Lamarck and Erasmus Darwin. Their speculations never proved popular among scientists or laymen. Each came to the conclusion that members of the various species adapted themselves to changes in their environments. This process of adaptation was supposedly hereditary; thus, the doctrine of acquired characteristics was born. It was never to be taken seriously officially; unofficially, it became an escape hatch in the later editions of Charles Darwin's On the Origin of Species. But their major premise, namely, the unlimited possibility of species variation, did become the touchstone of Darwinian evolution. It was this premise that broke the spell of the great fixed chain of being.

One of the most important books of the early nineteenth century was Rev. William Paley's Natural Theology (1802). Paley's work synthesized many of the then-prominent arguments for God's providence on earth. He argued that Newton's clock-like universe offers us testimony to God's sustaining providence. We can see it if only we look at nature's intricate design; the harmonious interdependence of the infinite number of parts assures us that only an omnipotent Creator could have designed, created, and sustained it for all these years. The language of design had become universal by Paley's day, and his book only reinforced an established dogma. Darwin himself had been greatly influenced by Paley's providentialism in his college days, as he admitted much later: "I do not think I hardly ever admired a book more than Paley's 'Natural Theology.' I could almost formerly have said it by heart."¹⁰⁹ At the heart of all these schemes of God's mechanistic providence was the doctrine of final causation: the whole universe was designed to serve the needs of man. All things were planned in advance to further man's affairs; in every being created in the mists of time there were the materials available to deal with the survival of the species. (This posed a serious theoretical problem: how to explain extinct fossils.) The evolutionary form of this doctrine is obviously Lamarckianism: species have the power of adaptation, individual by individual, organ by organ. Unconscious adaptation is the mechanism of organic evolution. When Darwin finally broke with Rev. Paley, he therefore also had to break with Lamarckianism, a position which he had never held anyway. Only later, under criticism, did he return to partial Lamarckianism.

3. The Concept of Purpose

Providence implies control by God; control implies purpose. The doctrine of final causation had provided Western man with philosophical purpose since the days of Aristotle.¹¹⁰ For as long as scientists were able to cling to the concept of purpose, science would never become fully autonomous. It is safe to say that the struggle over Darwinian evolution was, above all, a struggle over the concept of purpose.

109. Darwin to John Lubbock (Nov. 15, 1859); in Francis Darwin (ed.), The Life and Letters of Charles Darwin, 2 vols. (New York: Appleton, 1887), II, p. 15. (<http://bit.ly/DarwinLife2>)

110. F. S. C. Northrop, "Evolution and Its Relation to the Philosophy of Nature," in

Darwin is regarded as the Newton of biological science. Why? Most of his arguments and data had been offered by others much earlier; the crucial arguments had been provided in the much maligned Vestiges of Creation (1844).¹¹¹ The answer would appear to be in the purposeless quality of the doctrine of natural selection; it is based on the philosophy of random variations. Biological processes, in theory, can now be subjected to the rigors of mathematical logic, just as Newton subjected all astronomical changes to mathematical law—or thought he had. It was no longer necessary, Darwin and his followers believed, to hypothesize the existence of creation, providence, or final causes. Therefore, God was seen as no longer a part of the operating hypothesis of biological science. From the observation that final causes are not necessary for the operations of modern science, it was easy—almost automatic—to conclude that there can be no final causes. “Whatever my net doesn’t catch aren’t fish,” and the net of modern science excludes final causes, both impersonal and personal, but especially personal. Final causation points to God; so does design; hence, let us abolish final causation from the domain of logic and science. If God is to confront us, He must do so only through the non-logical communication of mysticism, ecstasy, encounter, the tongues movement, or some other way which does not confront us in our external, intellectual apostasy. God, being unnecessary to science, was shaved away by the logic of Occam’s razor: needless propositions in any logical statement may be safely ignored.

Lamarck was a representative of the French Enlightenment. In England, after 1789 had brought the French Revolution, it was not popular to be identified with French revolutionaries. After the advent of Napoleon in 1799, it was not popular to be identified with the French, unless it was the “orthodox” comparative anatomist, Cuvier. Lamarck’s arguments were not compelling to conservative Christians or even vague Anglican scholars. He had broken with theological and biological orthodoxy by offering the theory of organic evolution (as had Erasmus Darwin), thus alienating conservatives. Yet he held to the idea of purpose, however remote, in arguing for the unconscious adaptation of species to the environment. He had not gone far enough to propose a true “scientific revolution.” Too heretical for the conservatives, too providential for any potential atheists and “total autonomy” investigators, the doctrine of the inheritance of acquired characteristics died for want of takers. It survived after 1859 only because Charles Darwin’s mechanism of natural selection had washed all traces of purpose from its exterior, and after 1900, the rediscovery of Mendelian genetics finally buried it.

Stow Persons (ed.), Evolutionary Thought in America (New York: George Braziller, 1956), pp. 48–54. This was first published in 1950 by Yale University Press. It is a compilation of lectures delivered to the American Civilization Program at Princeton University, 1945–46.

111. Lovejoy, “The Argument for Organic Evolution Before the Origin of Species, 1830–1858,” in Glass (ed.), Forerunners of Darwin, pp. 381–410.

There were other possibilities for an earlier conversion to biological evolution, but none took hold. Hegel’s thought was one of these, but the discontinuous “leaps” of nature that he proposed alienated uniformitarians.¹¹² In Germany, the close association of romanticism and evolutionary thought alienated the professional biologists, most of whom were increasingly mechanistic in outlook.¹¹³ Darwin’s theory was truly a scientific revolution.

4. A “Higher” View of God

The defeat of orthodox creationism was not an overnight event. One of the most interesting features of this steady retreat between 1750 and 1859 was the rallying cry of each successive capitulation: the “higher” view of God involved, or the “deeper” understanding of His providence. Six days just did not do justice to God; He must have showered His providence on His creation for millions of extra years. If only we accept the action of God’s primeval sea, the Neptunists said, plus a less comprehensive impact of the flood. If only we accept God’s activity in unleashing volcanoes and internal heat, said the Vulcanists. If only we will admit the effects of the flood and earthquakes, said the catastrophists of the 1820s. If only we allow God the right to create new species from eon to eon, the uniformitarians said. If only we do these things, then the introduction of vast geologic time will not harm us. At each step, the name of God was invoked. Men were not to be limited by the confines of God’s six-day creation; God is unlimited.

The “unlimited” God of geologic time steadily retreated from the scene. The “unlimited” God was steadily replaced by unlimited time.

112. Northrop, Evolutionary Thought, pp. 61–68.

113. Owsei Temkin, “The Idea of Descent in Post-Romantic German Biology: 1848–1858,” Forerunners of Darwin, ch. 12.

Time was not seen as personal; time was not seen as calling men to repentance. Time seemed holy and magnifying, but most of all, it seemed safe. This centrality of time is understood by today's evolutionists; "respectable" Christian geologists—geologists who may be regenerate—have never grasped the fact. Wrote Gillispie:

From both the empirical and the interpretative points of view, the progress of geological science in the first half of the nineteenth century was an essential prelude to the formulation of a successful theory of biological evolution. There had, of course, been a number of more or less fanciful evolutionary schemes suggested ever since the middle of the eighteenth century. In [Thomas H.] Huxley's opinion, however, these speculative proposals had little influence on scientific thinking, and it was rather Lyell's work which was primarily responsible for smoothing the road for Darwin, so that from this standpoint it is James Hutton and not Lamarck who ought to be considered Darwin's intellectual ancestor. . . . But uniformitarianism as an attitude toward the course of nature could not be carried to its logical conclusion in a theory of organic evolution until a formulation sufficiently scientific to be compelling could attack the idea of a governing Providence in its last refuge, the creation of new species, and drive it right out of the whole field of natural history.¹¹⁴

Men abandoned creationism step by step, not overnight.

Gillispie went on to argue that it was the commitment to providentialism that kept the idea of immutable species in the canons of biological orthodoxy: design implied fixed species. Step by step, uniformitarianism removed God from the earth's history. "And after each successive retreat, providential empiricists took up positions on new ground, which their own researches were simultaneously cutting out from under them."¹¹⁵ Not starting with God as the presupposition of their empirical researches, not starting with God's self-justifying revelation in the Bible, the supposedly neutral scientists—operating as they were in terms of non-Christian methodologies—found that their own logic drove them into the waiting arms of infinite time and random change. Not starting with God, they could not logically wind up with God—not the God of the Bible, at least.

No document can be found that better demonstrates this "higher view of God" than Robert Chambers' Vestiges of Creation. More than any other scientific work, though produced by an amateur scientist, this one prepared the public's mind for Darwin. Not even Herbert Spencer's evolutionism was more important. How did Chambers defend his researches? First, he defended the Mosaic record as being most in conformity with his views. Then he said that it was God's expressions of will, not His direct activities, that brought forth the creation. (He ignored, of course, the orthodox doctrine of the verbal creation, that is, the response out of nothing to the command of God.) God created all life; Chambers stated that he took this for granted. "In what way was the creation of animated beings effected? The ordinary notion [that is, the debased doctrine of successive creations over endless ages—G.N.] may, I think, be described as this,—that the Almighty Author produced the progenitors of all existing species by some sort of personal or immediate exertion." So, he allowed God to create life. But he then proceeded to ridicule the "orthodox" creationism of his day, that disastrous fusion of geologic time, uniformitarian change with successive creations:

114. Gillispie, Genesis and Geology, pp. 217–18. See also Francis C. Haber, The Age of the World: Moses to Darwin (Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins Press, 1959).

115. Ibid., p. 221.

How can we suppose an immediate exertion of this creative power at one time to produce zoophytes, another time to add a few marine mollusks, another to bring in one or two crustacea, again to produce crustaceous fishes, again perfect fishes, and so on to the end? This would surely be to take a very mean view of the Creative Power. . . . And yet this would be unavoidable; for that the organic creation was thus progressive through a long space of time, rests on evidence which nothing can overturn or gainsay. Some other idea must then be come to with regard to the mode in which the Divine Author proceeded in the organic creation.¹¹⁶

It should be obvious that the progression described by Chambers is correct: given the idea of vast geological time, fossils distributed in layers, and uniformitarian change—and it was, by 1840, a single idea—God's creative interventions do look foolish. So, he offered new mode of creation: organic evolution. In two sentences, Chambers took his readers from Newton's cosmic impersonalism for the heavens (not that Newton intended such a conclusion) into a hypothetically impersonal world of biological law: "We have seen powerful evidence, that the construction of this globe and its associates, and inferentially that of all the other globes of space, was the result, not of any immediate or personal exertion on the part of the Deity, but of natural laws which are expressions of his will. What is to hinder our supposing that the organic creation is also a result of natural laws, which are in like manner an expression of his will?¹¹⁷ Only one thing was to inhibit such a supposition: there was too much of God's will in the picture. When Darwin substituted natural selection through random variation, there would no longer be any hindrance to the supposition in the minds of "liberated" scientists—liberated from the doctrine of final causation or design. Chambers prepared the way for Darwin among the public even as John the Baptist prepared the way for Jesus. And, like John the Baptist, he did it in the name of God, he thought.

116.[Robert Chambers], Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation, 4th ed. (Soho, London: John Churchill, 1845), pp. 157–58. It sold 24,000 copies, 1844–60: Eiseley, Darwin's Century, p. 133.

To a reasonable mind the Divine attributes must appear, not diminished or reduced in any way, by supposing a creation by law, but infinitely exalted. It is the narrowest of all views of the Deity, and characteristic of a humble class of intellects, to suppose him constantly acting in particular ways for particular occasions. It, for one thing, greatly detracts from his foresight, the most undeniable of all the attributes of Omnipotence. It lowers him towards the level of our own humble intellects. . . . Those who would object to the hypothesis of a creation by the intervention of law, do not perhaps consider how powerful an argument in favour of the existence of God is lost by rejecting this doctrine.¹¹⁸

Men adopted heresy in the name of a "higher orthodoxy."

Odd, is it not? With every so-called strengthening of the idea of God, He became less and less important to the affairs of men. With each "elevated concept" of God's sovereign power, He became less and less relevant for the activities of empirical scientists. This "exalted" conception of God was to collapse into oblivion a decade and a half later, when Charles Darwin finally made biology autonomous.

F. Biological Evolution: Darwinism

Early in the year 1858, Alfred Russel Wallace lay on his bed on the island of Ternate in the Dutch East Indies, suffering from what he later described as "a sharp attack of intermittent fever." Because of hot and cold fits, he had to lie down, "during which time I had nothing to do but think over any subjects then particularly interesting to me." So, in the midst of some tropical fever, with nothing else to while away his time, Wallace discovered the principle of organic development through natural selection, the theory which shook the world. Somewhere in between 98.7 degrees Fahrenheit and delirium, modern secularism's most important theory of human autonomy was born. It was an auspicious beginning.¹¹⁹

117. Ibid., p. 158.

118. Ibid., pp. 160–61.

Wallace had been thinking about the problem for almost a decade. He had wondered why some men live and some men die. "And the answer was clearly, that on the whole the best fitted live." He might have said simply, those who survive do, in fact, survive. But that would never have satisfied a scientist like Wallace. "From the effects of disease the most healthy escaped"—you can't fault his logic here, certainly—"from enemies, the strongest, the swiftest, or the most cunning; from famine, the best hunters or those with the best digestion; and so on." A skeptic might not be very impressed so far, but you have to remember that the man was suffering from a fever. "Then it suddenly flashed upon me that this self-acting process would necessarily improve the race, because in every generation the inferior would inevitably be killed and the superior would remain—that is, the fittest would survive."¹²⁰ This is the Darwinian theory of evolution, without its footnotes, intricate arguments, flank-covering, and graphs.

There are two answers to this perspective. First, the absolute sovereignty of God: "So then it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy" (Rom. 9:16). The other is that of the philosophy of pure contingency, described so wonderfully in Ecclesiastes: "I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all. For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them" (Eccl. 9:11–12).¹²¹

Pure contingency or God's sovereignty: neither satisfied Alfred Russel Wallace, Charles Darwin, and the myriad of their monograph-writing followers. Somewhere in the randomness that overtakes the individual, the evolutionists believe, there has to be some stability: impersonal, laws-of-probability-obeying stability. Thomas Huxley, Dar-

119. Alfred Russel Wallace, My Life (New York: Dodd, Mead, 1905), I, p. 361.

120. Ibid., I, p. 362.

121. Gary North, Autonomy and Stagnation: An Economic Commentary on Ecclesiastes (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 35.

win's unofficial hatchet-man and progenitor of that remarkable family of professional skeptics—skeptics except where evolution was concerned—stated his faith quite eloquently: chance is really quite orderly, all things considered, and totally sovereign in any case. Here is the testament of modern evolutionary thought.

It is said that he [Darwin] supposes variation to come about “by chance,” and that the fittest survive the “chances” of the struggle for existence, and thus “chance” is substituted for providential design.

It is not a little wonderful that such an accusation as this should be brought against a writer who has, over and over again, warned his readers that when he uses the word “spontaneous,” he merely means that he is ignorant of the cause of that which is so termed; and whose whole theory crumbles to pieces if the uniformity and regularity of natural causation of illimitable past ages is denied. But probably the best answer to those who talk of Darwinism meaning the reign of “chance” is to ask them what they themselves understand by “chance”? Do they believe that anything in this universe happens without reason or without a cause? Do they really conceive that any event has no cause, and could not have been predicted by anyone who had a sufficient insight into the order of Nature? If they do, it is they who are the inheritors of antique superstition and ignorance, and whose minds have never been illuminated by a ray of scientific thought. The one act of faith in the convert to science, is the confession of the universality of order and of the absolute validity in all times and under all circumstances, of the law of causation. This confession is an act of faith, because, by the nature of the case, the truth of such propositions is not susceptible of proof. But such faith is not blind, but reasonable; because it is invariably confirmed by experience, and constitutes the sole trustworthy foundation for all action.¹²²

At least he called this view what it was: faith.

This is one of the endearing qualities about science, especially nineteenth-century, pre-Heisenberg science: its candid lack of modesty.¹²³ We know where Huxley stood—at the vanguard of irrefutable 122. T. H. Huxley, “On the Reception of ‘Origin of Species’” (1887), in Francis D. Darwin (ed.), Life & Letters of Charles Darwin, 2vols. (New York: Appleton, 1887), I, p. 553. (<http://bit.ly/DarwinLife1>).

123. Werner Heisenberg, an influential physicist of the early twentieth century, destroyed the Newtonian view of the universe. Instead of a mathematically regular, precise world, the modern conception is that of a world governed by the highly improbable laws of probability. Radical contingency was substituted for Newtonian order. Individual events are random; only aggregates can be dealt with statistically—order in the aggregate out of chaos in the individual. Huxley’s faith is, by twentieth-centruth—because he told us so.

Wallace was so confident in the truth of what he had discovered that he could hardly contain himself. “I waited anxiously for the termination of my fit so that I might at once make notes for a paper on the subject.” His fit-induced paper was completed post-haste and sent to his acquaintance, Charles Darwin, who was working on the same problem that had occupied Wallace’s mind for so long.

1. Darwin’s Response: Despair

When Darwin read the paper, he was crestfallen. He wrote despondently to Charles Lyell:

Your words have come true with a vengeance—that I should be forestalled. You said this, when I explained to you here very briefly my views of “Natural Selection” depending on the struggle for existence. I never saw a more striking coincidence; if Wallace had my MS. [manuscript] sketch written out in 1842, he could not have made a better short abstract! Even his terms now stand as heads of my chapters. . . . So all my originality, whatever it may amount to, will be smashed. . . .¹²⁴

Actually, Darwin should not have worried about Wallace’s paper and its possible effects on Darwin’s claim of originality. The theory had already been offered back in 1813 by William Wells, in a paper delivered before the Royal Society of London, and it immediately sank into oblivion. Furthermore, another obscure writer, Patrick Matthew, had outlined a very similar theory in an appendix to an 1831 book on timber.¹²⁵ But in 1858, few scientists remembered these papers.

He offered to have Wallace’s paper added to a summary of his own—carefully selected from a pre-1858 pile of notes, just to make certain that nobody would forget who had the idea first—and they were published in the Journal of the Linnean Society, Zoology, Vol. III (1858).¹²⁶ tury standards, hopelessly naive. For a superb study of modern physics, see the article by the Nobel prize winner, Eugene Wigner, “The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences,” Communications on Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>) Basically, the pessimism of Ecclesiastes 9:11–12 comes closer to modern temper than Huxley’s optimism.

124. Darwin to Lyell (June 18, 1858), Life & Letters, I, p. 473.

125. Darwin gave belated recognition to Wells and Matthew (among a long list of others, thereby downplaying their importance) in his “Historical Sketch,” added to the third (1861) edition of the Origin.

126. Reprinted in Appleman (ed.), Darwin, pp. 81–97. Arnold Brackman argued persuasively that Charles Lyell and Joseph Dalton Hooker, Darwin’s friends, set up the

The fate of these path-breaking, revolutionary papers was identical to those published by Wells and Matthew: they sank beneath the surface without a trace. No angry rebuttals, no outraged theologians, nothing. So much for the impact of scholarly journals on nineteenth-century society (and perhaps today).

The matter might have ended there, an obscure footnote in some obscure Ph.D. dissertation (which is the fate of most scholarly articles published in obscure academic journals), had it not been for Darwin's willingness to bring his Origin of Species to a conclusion. It was published on November 24, 1859, and it sold out the entire edition of 1,250 copies in one day.¹²⁷ This must have surprised the publisher, John Murray, who had begged Darwin to write a book on pigeons instead.¹²⁸ The reading public, which had purchased 24,000 copies of Vestiges of Creation, in marked contrast to the subscribers to the Journal of the Linnean Society, obviously was in tune to the times. (Or, in Darwinian terminology, was better adapted to the intellectual environment.)

2. Why Such Success?

There can be no question about the book's impact. It launched an intellectual revolution. Many historians and scientists have tried to grasp this instant success, and few can. It was an unpredictable fluke, by human standards. Thomas Huxley remarked years later that the principle of natural selection was so clear, so obvious, that he could not understand why he had not thought of it before. This was the reaction of most of the academic community. For about a year, the reviews in professional magazines were hostile. One exception—"by chance"—was the review in the Times, which had been assigned to a staff reviewer, and had in turn been referred to Huxley when he had decided that it was too technical for him to review. Thus, the December 26, 1859 review was very favorable.¹²⁹ Yet at first it had not appeared that Darwin's victory would prove so easy. Huxley wrote much later: "On the "delicate arrangement" whereby Darwin got the credit for discovering the principle of evolution through natural selection. They had the extracts from Darwin's notes read at the Linnean Society meeting, along with Wallace's paper. Brackman, A Delicate Arrangement: The Strange Case of Charles Darwin and Alfred Russel Wallace (New York: Times Books, 1980).

127. Life & Letters, II, p. 1. (<http://bit.ly/DarwinLife2>)

128. Himmelfarb, Darwin, p. 252.

129. Ibid., p. 264.

whole, then, the supporters of Mr. Darwin's views in 1860 were numerically extremely insignificant. There is not the slightest doubt that, if a general council of the Church scientific had been held at that time, we should have been condemned by an overwhelming majority."¹³⁰ By 1869, the Church scientific (except in France) was in Darwin's camp.¹³¹

Darwin knew in 1859 just what is needed to pull off an academic revolution: younger scientists and the support of laymen. He went after both, and he won. As he wrote to one correspondent within two weeks of the publication of the Origin, "we are now a good and compact body of really good men, and mostly not old men. In the long run we shall conquer."¹³² He was like a troop commander, sending copies with accompanying personal letters to most of the eminent scientific figures in Europe and America.¹³³ Laymen may not have converted the scientists, as Himmelfarb noted, but they helped to create the climate of opinion in which both laymen and professionals worked.¹³⁴

Good tactics will seldom win a world war. Why did Darwin and his book succeed so completely? Because the various geological theories had already undermined the traditional faith of Christians in the historical accuracy of the Bible. Huxley may have been correct in his complaint that nine-tenths of the civilized world was Christian in 1860; he was not correct when he also complained that the Bible was accepted "as the authoritative standard of fact and the criterion of the justice of scientific conclusions, in all that relates to the origin of things, and, among them, of species."¹³⁵ If it had been true, then Huxley's 1871 pronouncement would not have been very likely: ". . . this much is certain, that, in a dozen years, the 'Origin of Species' has worked as complete a revolution in biological science as the 'Principia' [of Isaac Newton] did in astronomy. . . ."¹³⁶ Himmelfarb's assessment is closer to the mark: "Thus the 1850s, which have been apotheosized as the most tranquil, prosperous, and assured of all decades in English history, were, in fact, a period of intense spiritual anxiety and intellectual restlessness."¹³⁷ The geology question had disturbed many thinking Christians. As a specialist in the history of Victorian England, her words have to be

130. Life & Letters, I, p. 540.

131. Himmelfarb, Darwin, pp. 304–9.

132. Darwin to Carpenter (Dec. 3, 1859), Life & Letters, II, p. 34.

133. Irvine, Apes, Angels & Victorians, p. 114.

134. Himmelfarb, Darwin, p. 296.

135. Huxley, Westminster Review (1860); in Appleman (ed.), Darwin, p. 435.

136. Huxley, Quarterly Review (1871); ibid., p. 438.

137. Himmelfarb, Darwin, p. 239.

taken seriously: "What the Origin did was to focus and stimulate the religious and nihilist passions of men. Dramatically and urgently, it confronted them with a situation that could no longer be evaded, a situation brought about not by anyone scientific discovery, nor even by science as a whole, but by an antecedent condition of religious and philosophical turmoil. The Origin was not so much the cause as the occasion of the upsurge of these passions."¹³⁸ With this kind of religious and spiritual assessment of Darwin's impact, it is not surprising to find, as late as 1969, a deservedly obscure evolutionary scientist warning his readers to "beware" of books like Himmelfarb's.¹³⁹ She points to the religious roots of Darwin's success.

3. A Slow Starter

Charles Darwin had not been a bright child; he had not been ambitious, either. His father had despaired of him for years. He had studied to be a physician, like his father, but had given it up. He had studied to be a minister, but had given that up, too. At the end of his university career, he had developed a fondness for natural science under the direction of Prof. J. S. Henslow, the Cambridge botanist. Henslow secured for Darwin a position as naturalist for the voyage of the H. M. S. Beagle, a five-year cruise which changed Darwin's life, as he freely admitted. Henslow also recommended that Darwin read Lyell's newly published first volume of Principles of Geology, although Henslow warned against its uniformitarian thesis. The warning went unheeded. At the first port of call for the ship, in early 1832, Darwin's observation of the St. Jago volcanic mountains and boulders, coupled with the uniformitarian vision of Lyell, converted him.

The voyage lasted from late 1831 through the fall of 1836. During that time Darwin collected, classified, made many notes, read books, speculated endlessly, and vomited (he was seasick throughout the trip). He sent reports back to England about his findings, and the ready market made by the geologizing mania saw to it that these essays were published and read. He returned to England a mildly prominent fellow. And, like other slow-starting sons, he undoubtedly could face his father—who had opposed the trip in the first place—with a good deal more confidence.

138. Ibid., p. 400.

139. Michael T. Ghiselin, The Triumph of the Darwinian Method (Berkeley & Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1969), p. 8, and footnote #19, p. 251.

Darwin always regarded himself as a truly empirical investigator, a man in the tradition of Francis Bacon, the philosopher of scientific empiricism. He wanted to be known as a “fact man.” He freely admitted in his autobiography that he had difficulty in following long, abstract arguments.¹⁴⁰ Commenting many years later on his early researches, he proclaimed: “My first note-book was opened in July 1837. I worked on true Baconian principles, and without any theory collected facts on a wholesale scale. . . .”¹⁴¹ Nevertheless, he wrote to Wallace in 1857 that “I am a firm believer that without speculation there is no good and original observation.”¹⁴² In 1860, he wrote to Lyell that “without the making of theories I am convinced there would be no observation.”¹⁴³ Thus, we can side safely with Himmelfarb’s judgment: “As the notebooks amply demonstrate, he was speculating boldly from the very beginning of this period [1837], and his speculations were all directed to a particular theory -that of mutability. What is impressive about these early notebooks is not the patient marshaling of the evidence, which in fact was conspicuously absent, but rather the bold and spirited character of his thought. What clearly urged him on was theory capable of the widest extension and a mind willing to entertain any idea, however extravagant.”¹⁴⁴

In the fall of 1838, Darwin read Rev. Thomas Malthus’ classic study in political economy, An Essay on the Principles of Population (1798). This, he later said, transformed him. Malthus’ hypothesis of a geometrically expanding population pressing against an arithmetically expanding food supply convinced him that the key to the species question is the struggle for existence. It is doubly interesting that Wallace admitted that it was his recollection of Malthus’ theory, during his fever, that triggered his formulation of the theory of natural selection. Once again, a minister had been crucial—indirectly, this time—in the steady progress of the theory of evolution. Darwin’s theory was basically complete as early as 1838. Lest we forget the circumstances of this intellectual breakthrough:

Darwin was only twenty-nine and barely out of his apprenticeship, so to speak, when, by this second leap of imagination, his theory took full shape. If this chance reading—or misreading—of Malthus, like

140. Life & Letters, I, p. 82.

141. Ibid., I, p. 68.

142. Ibid., I, p. 465.

143. Ibid., I, p. 108.

144. Himmelfarb, Darwin, p. 156.

his first general speculations about evolution, seems too fortuitous a mode of inspiration, the fault may lie not with Darwin but with the conventional notion of scientific discovery. The image of the passionless, painstaking scientist following his data blindly, and provoked to a new theory only when the facts can no longer accommodate the old, turns out to be, in the case of Darwin as of others, largely mythical.¹⁴⁵

There was another relevant coincidence during this period. Between 1836 and 1839, Darwin simultaneously lost his early faith in the accuracy of the Bible,¹⁴⁶ and he became afflicted with an unnamed physical sickness that remained with him for the remainder of his life, some 45 years. The sickness weakened him, so that he seldom left his home, could see few visitors, and could work only a few hours each day.¹⁴⁷ Thomas Huxley was also afflicted with a lifelong “internal pain” and “hypochondriacal dyspepsia,” and like Darwin’s burden, it had come upon him within a year or two after he had abandoned his faith (a loss which occurred when he was eleven or twelve years old).¹⁴⁸ Most of Darwin’s children suffered from this same affliction (one son, his namesake, was feeble-minded, and died very young—not a surprising event in the family life of a man who had married his first cousin). William, his eldest son, like his father, was never one to take needless chances with the weather. At his father’s funeral in Westminster Abbey, which was unfortunately conducted under cloudy skies, William sat with his gloves on top of his bald head, keeping out unnecessary drafts.¹⁴⁹

It took Darwin 20 years to piece together the evidence for the theory he had decided was true at age 29, including eight years in classifying barnacles. (Non-evolutionists may fault his biological theory, but one thing is certain: that man knew his barnacles!) He had published

145. Ibid., p. 66. See also Thomas Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1962] 1970) and James D. Watson, The Double Helix (New York: New American Library, 1969). This last book is an autobiographical account of one of the co-discoverers of the DNA molecule, the second major breakthrough of modern genetics (Mendel’s was the first). Watson shows how many unscientific factors, including (humanly speaking) pure luck, go into a major intellectual discovery.

146. Life & Letters, I, p. 227.

147. Irvine, Apes, pp. 53, 124, 162, 200, 229.

148. Ibid., pp. 11–12. Irvine thought that it was Huxley’s witnessing of an autopsy at age 14 that triggered his life-long physical disturbances, an odd feature in the life of a self-proclaimed expert in biology. I think Irvine was incorrect.

149. Ibid., p. 229; Himmelfarb, Darwin, p. 441.

an account of his voyage, plus numerous articles and monographs, but he told only close friends of his doubts concerning the fixity of the species. In the early stages of his labors, all he claimed to be asking was fair hearing for his theory as one among many.¹⁵⁰ He admitted the “many huge difficulties on this view” to Asa Grey, the noted American scientist.¹⁵¹ Cautious, patient, modest to a fault: this is the legend of Charles Darwin. And modesty was a wise tactic, given the paucity of his position. In 1863, four years after the publication of the Origin, he wrote to one correspondent: “When we descend to details, we can prove that no one species has changed [i.e. we cannot prove that a single species has changed]—[note: apparently added by Francis Darwin, the editor]; nor can we prove that the supposed changes are beneficial, which is the groundwork of the theory. Nor can we explain why some species have changed and others have not.”¹⁵² Therefore, he warned, we must “always remember our ignorance.” But in 1871, his Descent of Man carefully defined the “neutral” ground on which the discussion of species would henceforth be conducted: “But it is a hopeless endeavor to decide this point, until some definition of the term ‘species’ is generally accepted; and the definition must not include an indeterminate element such as an act of creation.”¹⁵³ His modesty had earlier overcome him in the Origin: “Thus, on the theory of descent with modification, the main facts with respect to the mutual affinities of the extinct forms of life to each other and to living forms, are explained in a satisfactory manner. And they are wholly inexplicable on any other view.”¹⁵⁴ However, he was quite willing to debate the details with all comers, so long as they were willing to be truly scientific. Therefore, let all good men join hands and march under the banner unfurled in 1969 by Michael Ghiselin, when he reminded us all that “Darwin was a master of scientific method.”¹⁵⁵ Let us all “beware” of Miss Himmelfarb’s book, taking care to read the one book Dr. Ghiselin thinks is an adequate biography of Darwin, in which we learn of the “extremes of hypocrisy and self-contradiction” of Darwin’s nineteenth-century critics, as well as the “venomous and confused counterattacks”

150. Darwin to Jenyns (1845?), Life & Letters, I, p. 394.

151. Darwin to Gray (July 20, 1856), ibid., I, p. 437.

152. Darwin to G. Bentham (May 22, 1863), ibid., II p. 210.

153. Darwin, The Origin of Species and the Descent of Man (Modern Library, 2 vols. in one): Descent, ch. 11, p. 268.

154. Darwin, Origin, ch. 11, p. 268.

155. Ghiselin, Triumph, p. 4.

these men used.¹⁵⁶ If we do all these things, we shall become truly adapted to our intellectual environment, and we shall prosper—for as long as that climate of opinion survives.

4. Indeterminacy

The technical details of Darwin's thought are best left to professional biologists. But we can consider the operating presuppositions and practical conclusions that Darwin set forth. Three of these are indeterminacy, continuity, and cosmic impersonalism.

The heart of the Darwinian system is indeterminacy. The universe is a chance event. Darwin was self-conscious in his commitment to randomness. Take, for example, his definition of species, the origin of which his book was intended to demonstrate. There is no definition of species.¹⁵⁷ This is Darwin's chief contribution to biological science. He denied that there are any limits on genetic variation within the arbitrarily defined group called species. "Slow though the process of selection may be, if feeble man can do much by artificial selection, I can see no limit to the amount of change. . . ."¹⁵⁸ The great chain of being, with its separate and permanent links, has become a multi-tiered escalator. The second chapter of the Origin reiterates this theme over and over: there are no reliable definitions (although, as we have already seen, there are unreliable definitions: creationists' definitions). "Nor shall I here discuss the various definitions which have been given of the term species. No one definition has satisfied all naturalists; yet every naturalist knows vaguely what he means when he speaks of a species." (This is vaguely reminiscent of the old line, "I can't define art, but I know what I like." Unfortunately, Darwin is regarded as the Newton of biology.)

We are no better off when we seek his definition of that other crucial term, "variety": "The term 'variety' is almost equally difficult to define. . . ."¹⁵⁹ In short, to clear things up once and for all: "From these remarks it will be seen that I look at the term species as one arbitrarily given, for the sake of convenience, to a set of individuals closely resembling each other, and that it does not essentially differ from the term variety, which is given to less distinct and more fluctuating forms. The term variety, again, in comparison with mere individual differences, is 156. Irvine, Apes, p. 88; Ghiselin's recommendation: p. 8.

157. This is comparable to Karl Marx's refusal ever to define "class."

158. Darwin, Origin, ch. 4, p. 82.

159. Ibid., ch. 2, p. 38.

also applied arbitrarily, for convenience' sake."¹⁶⁰ Got that? Excellent!

The biblical account of Genesis 1:24–25 indicates one very good definition: reproduction. Buffon's definition corresponded with this one fairly closely: no infertile progeny. A perfect definition may no longer be possible in a post-Fall age; the ground has been cursed, and "nature" is no longer normative, even as a fool-proof pointer to the truth. But Buffon's position is so vastly superior for operational purposes in day-to-day experiments that one can only conclude that the professional preference for Darwin's indeterminate definition rests on a deeply religious commitment: evolutionary change in an indeterminate universe. When a variety is simply an "incipient species,"¹⁶¹ and species is undefined, it is no feat of genius to conclude that it is possible for varieties to vary and species to change. Everything is in flux.

5. Continuity

Darwin was a theologian of the continuity of life. While he never faced the issue squarely, later evolutionists have concluded that organic life stemmed from inorganic matter. Thus, Darwinism is the theology of the continuity of everything. All "being" is basically one. Huxley was quite correct when he called Darwinian evolution "the revived thought of ancient Greece."¹⁶² This is the old Greek denial of a fundamental difference between God and the creation. This doctrine of continuity destroyed the semi-creationism of the early nineteenth century. There could be no special creations in the world's history. To argue that such events could have occurred was to argue against the logic of uniformitarian science. Modern "Theistic evolutionists" and "successive creationists" may not grasp this fact, but Darwin and his followers did. God's activities could no longer have any measurable effect in time. Eiseley made his point forcefully:

As one studies these remarks, and many like them, one can observe that the continuity in nature which had been maintained by Sir Charles Lyell against the catastrophists in geology has now been extended to the living world. The stability of natural law, first glimpsed in the heavens, had been by slow degrees extended to the work of waves and winds that shape the continents. Finally, through the long cycles of erosion and the uneasy stirring of the ocean beds, it was beginning dimly to be seen that life itself had passed like a shifting and ephemeral apparition across the face of nature. Nor could that elusive phantom be divorced from man himself, the great subject, as even Darwin once remarked. If fin and wing and hoof led backward toward some ancient union in the vertebrate line, then the hand of man and ape could be scanned in the same light. Even had they wished, the scientists could not stop short at the human boundary. A world, a dream world which had sustained human hearts for many centuries, was about to pass away. It was a world of design.¹⁶³

160. Ibid., ch. 2, p. 46.

161. Ibid., ch. 2, p. 51.

162. Huxley, "On the Reception of the 'Origin of Species,'" Life & Letters of Darwin (ed.), I, p. 534.

The continuity of change was as dear to Darwin as the continuity of being. Uniformitarianism pervaded all of his writings. Nature, he asserted, "can never take a great and sudden leap, but must advance by short and sure, though slow steps."¹⁶⁴ Admittedly, "The mind cannot possibly grasp the full meaning of the term of even a million years; it cannot add up and perceive the full effects of many slight variations, accumulated during an almost infinite number of generations." But even though the mind cannot grasp this, we are expected to drop our unwarranted prejudices against what we cannot grasp, and accept it. "Whoever is led to believe that species are mutable will do good service by conscientiously expressing his conviction; for thus only can the load of prejudice by which this subject is overwhelmed be removed."¹⁶⁵ We should not "hide our ignorance" by using terms like "plan of creation" or "unity of design." Instead, we should stand firm alongside those "few naturalists, endowed with flexibility of mind, and who have already begun to doubt the immutability of species," and wrap our newly flexible minds around a concept of uniformitarian change which no mind can grasp.¹⁶⁶ This, you understand, is the scientific method.

6. Cosmic Impersonalism

The third feature of Darwin's thought is cosmic impersonalism. Obviously, this is the product of both his philosophy of indeterminacy and uniformitarianism. They are intertwined. There is no personal God in Darwin's system who can in any way affect the operations of random variation and statistical natural law. In general, this is regarded as the heart of the system. Biology, the last refuge of a personal God, was finally cleared of this embarrassing influence.

163. Eiseley, Darwin's Century, p. 194.

164. Darwin, Origin, ch. 6, p. 144.

165. Ibid., ch. 15, p. 368.

166. Idem.

While he regarded nature as wholly impersonal, Darwin was never able to escape the language of personification in describing natural processes. The very phrase “natural selection” implied an active power, as he admitted, but he reminded his readers that this was simply a metaphor. But metaphors are powerful devices, however candid Darwin’s admission may have been. It made the transition from cosmic personalism to cosmic impersonalism that much easier. “So again it is difficult to avoid personifying the word Nature; but I mean by Nature, only the aggregate action and project of many natural laws, and by laws the sequence of events as ascertained by US.”¹⁶⁷ The obvious conclusion is that his doctrine of natural law is completely nominalistic: we humans make the laws, since we observe and interpret the data of observation. We hope that the regularities “out there” conform to our vision of them, but how do we know? As he had written to his old teacher, Henslow, after five months at sea on the Beagle: “One great source of perplexity to me is an utter ignorance whether I note the right facts, and whether they are of sufficient importance to interest others.”¹⁶⁸ And how do we know our theories are correct, once we have selected the facts? Furthermore, “it is lamentable,” as he wrote to Wallace, “how each man draws his own different conclusions from the very same facts.”¹⁶⁹ Charles Darwin had a naive view of law, or else a grimly skeptical estimation of the public’s ability to bother about its intellectual nakedness, one way or the other.

To erase God from the universe of phenomena, he had to erase teleology, the doctrine of final causation. He went as far as the following admission to sweep away any trace of final cause: “There is no evidence, as was remarked in the last chapter, of the existence of any law of necessary development.”¹⁷⁰ No necessary law of development; no necessary anything: the whole universe is random. How long should a species survive? “No fixed law seems to determine the length of time during which any single species or any single genus endures.”¹⁷¹ We are quite ignorant concerning the laws of variation within species.¹⁷² (He need not have been so ignorant; Mendel’s famous paper on genetics was available in 1865, prior to the sixth edition of the Origin, but none of Darwin’s contemporaries ever saw the significance of it, al-

167. Ibid., ch. 4, p. 64.

168. Darwin to Henslow (May 18, 1832), Life & Letters, I, p. 208.

169. Darwin to Wallace (May 1, 1857), ibid., I, p. 453.

170. Darwin, Origin, ch. 12, p. 281.

171. Ibid., ch. 11, p. 259.

172. Ibid., ch. 6, p. 147.

though reprints were sent to many scientific men. This truly great advance in biological science was not spectacular enough to be visible amidst the evolution controversy.) Darwin's view of nature's laws was indeterminate, however much he disliked the implications. He suffered with indeterminacy in order to maintain his cosmic impersonalism.

He was convinced that chance governs the variability of any genetic (he did not use the term, of course) inheritance.¹⁷³ Time, he said, is important only to give scope to selection.¹⁷⁴ And, wonder of wonders, "We have almost unlimited time. . . ."¹⁷⁵ (He was forced to give up his open checkbook of time when Lord Kelvin, the physicist, offered his theory of heat loss for the earth, which Darwin thought he had to accept: 300,000,000 years of organic life in the first edition of the Origin disappeared in later editions. Instead, we read: "Unfortunately we have no means of determining, according to the standards of years, how long a period it takes to modify a species...."¹⁷⁶) Yet it appalled him to argue for an indeterminate universe, with or without unlimited quantities of time in which chance could operate. To Asa Gray, who never abandoned his faith in God's design in nature, he confessed: "I am conscious that I am in an utterly hopeless muddle. I cannot think that the world, as we see it, is the result of chance; and yet I cannot look at each separate thing as the result of Design. . . . Again, I say I am, and ever shall remain, in a hopeless muddle."¹⁷⁷ And so he remained. To abandon a non-teleological universe would have meant abandoning his life's work.

How did he view his labors? What did he think was the significance of those years in the laboratory and the study? In his autobiography, written in 1876, he was forced to reflect upon the meaning of his life. What impressed him was his victory over Rev. William Paley, whose Natural Theology had influenced him so greatly before his voyage on the Beagle. First, he took Paley's argument from the regularity of the universe and reversed it; for once, he returned to a vision of impersonal, totally sovereign natural law—in contrast to his former doubts, which favored the randomness of nature. He had long ago abandoned faith in the miracles of Christianity, for "the more we know of the fixed laws of nature the more incredible do miracles become."

173. Darwin to Hooker (Nov. 23, 1856), Life & Letters, I, p. 445.

174. Idem.

175. Darwin to Gray (Sept. 5, 1857), ibid., I, p. 479.

176. Darwin, Origin, ch. 11, p. 239. On Lord Kelvin's criticism, see Eiseley, Darwin's Century, ch. 9.

177. Darwin to Gray (Nov. 26, 1860), Life & Letters, II, p. 146.

Nevertheless, he admits, "I was very unwilling to give up my belief. . . . Thus disbelief crept over me at a very slow rate, but was at last complete. The rate was so slow that I felt no distress." (Even his loss of faith was uniformitarian, in his recollections!) This was sent just one year after the publication of the Origin. At last he was free from Paley: "The old argument from design in Nature, as given by Paley, which formerly seemed to be so conclusive, fails, now that the law of natural selection has been discovered."¹⁷⁸ What little cosmic personalism that still remained in Paley's rationalistic universe was now officially rejected.

When challenged by Asa Gray to defend his anti-teleological attitude, Darwin did not call forth his notes on barnacles or some new theory of coral reef formation. He replied from his heart, and his heart was exceedingly religious. What he really hated was the Christian doctrine of a totally sovereign God. He hated this God more than he feared a random universe.

With respect to the theological view of the question. This is always painful to me. I am bewildered. I had no intention to write atheistically. But I own that I cannot see as plainly as others do, and as I should wish to do, evidence of design and beneficence on all sides of us. There seems to me too much misery in the world. I cannot persuade myself that a beneficent and omnipotent God would have designedly created the Ichneumonidae with the express intention of their feeding within the living bodies of Caterpillars, or that a cat should play with mice. Not believing this, I see no necessity in the belief that the eye was expressly designed. On the other hand, I cannot anyhow be contented to view this wonderful universe, and especially the nature of man, and to conclude that everything is the result of brute force. I am inclined to look at everything as resulting from designed laws, with the details, whether good or bad, left to the working out of what we may call chance. Not that this notion at all satisfies me. I feel most deeply that the whole subject is too profound for the human intellect. A dog might as well speculate on the mind of Newton.¹⁷⁹

He could not believe that the eye was designed, despite the incapable difficulty that it is a totally complex element of the body that needs to be complete before it can function at all. How could this organ have evolved? What good was it during the countless millennia before it was an eye? Darwin was familiar with this objection, but he could not believe in specific design. However, in order to save his hypothetical universe from the burden of total randomness—from “brute force”—he was willing to admit that natural laws had been designed, a conclusion wholly at odds with his own theoretical methodology. But he was not satisfied with this conclusion, either.

178. Ibid., I, p. 278.

179. Darwin to Gray (May 22, 1860), ibid., II, p. 105.

So, he feigned modesty. These questions are beyond human intellect. Questions of biology, factual and theoretical, are answerable, but not questions that are raised as a direct product of the biological answers. This has been a tactic of “neutral” scientists for years: challenge the conclusions of a culture’s presuppositions by referring to neutral science, but claim honest ignorance when discussing the presuppositions of the methodology of neutral science. As he wrote to W. Graham, two decades later, contradicting his earlier defense of designed natural laws: “You would not probably expect anyone fully to agree with you on so many abstruse subjects; and there are some points in your book which I cannot digest. The chief one is that the existence of so-called natural laws implies purpose. I cannot see this.” Here is the dilemma of modern, Kantian philosophy: Law or no law? When defending the total reliability and stability of “autonomous” natural science against the claims of Christians in favor of God’s miraculous interventions, natural law is absolute. But when faced with the totalitarian implications of absolute natural law—a law so complete and systematic that it indicates design rather than randomness as its foundation—the “neutral” scientist throws out “so-called natural laws.” God may neither thwart absolute natural law, nor claim credit for the existence of such law, because it really is not absolute after all. Absolute randomness is therefore a philosophical corollary of absolute, impersonal law, and Darwin was uncomfortable with both horns of his dilemma. So, he appealed once again to ignorance, since he had to agree that chance is not sovereign:

But I have had no practice in abstract reasoning, and I may be all astray. Nevertheless you have expressed my inward conviction, though far more vividly and clearly than I could have done, that the Universe is not the result of chance. But then with me the horrid doubt always arises whether the convictions of man’s mind, which has been developed from the mind of the lower animals, are of any value or at all trustworthy. Would anyone trust the convictions of a monkey’s mind, if there are any convictions in such a mind?¹⁸⁰

180. Darwin to W. Graham (July 3, 1881), ibid., I, p. 285.

Notice Darwin's implicit faith. He has absolute confidence in his "monkey-descended" (or, for the purists, "ancestor-of-monkey-descended") mind when it concluded that his mind had, in fact, descended from some lower animal. But when the implications of this religiously held belief came into direct conflict with a belief that man's mind can be relied upon precisely because man is made in the image of God, then he doubted the capacity of his monkey-descended mind to grapple with such abstract questions. We are intelligent enough to know that we are not intelligent enough to know; we can have sufficient confidence in our minds to rest assured that we can have no confidence in our minds. God is locked out of His universe by man's simultaneous confidence and lack of confidence in his own logic. Neither doubt nor confidence is allowed to point to God. Cosmic impersonalism is thereby assured; autonomous man is defended by his supposedly autonomous science. Like the universe around man, his own thought processes are simultaneously absolute (man is descended from lower animals; no other theory is valid¹⁸¹) and contingent (man cannot trust his own speculations when they concern absolutes).

Anyone who imagines that the implications for philosophy of Darwinism are not both widespread and important in modern life is embarrassingly naive. It was not the details of the Darwinian system that captivated European thought—Darwin had to repudiate much of his system anyway. He once admitted to his earliest supporter, J. D. Hooker, that he was proficient "in the master art of wriggling."¹⁸² Few biologists could follow all of his arguments; if they had done so, they would have grasped the fact that his retreat into the categories of "use and disuse" represented a revival of Lamarckianism. But they did not read his works that closely. Liberated men scarcely question the logic or fine points of their liberator's scriptural canon. What did capture the minds of intellectuals, and continues to captivate them, is Darwin's rejection of meaning or purpose; the Darwinian universe has no traces of final or ultimate causation.

A marvelous statement of the Darwinian faith was presented in the Britannica Roundtable (Vol. I, #3, 1972), a slick magazine which was on the intellectual level of the Sunday newspaper's magazine insert, but which paraded under the banner of high culture. C. P. Snow, widely ballyhooed in the early 1960s because of his propaganda favoring the fusion of the "two cultures"—autonomous rational science and 181. Darwin, Origin, ch. 11, p. 268; quoted earlier.

182. Darwin to Hooker (Dec. to, 1866), Life & Letters, II, p. 239.

the equally autonomous humanities—offered us his personal credo in “What I Believe.”

I believe life, human life, all life, is a singular chance. A fluke, which depended on all manner of improbable conditionings happening at the same time, or in the same sequence of time. Between ten and twenty billion years ago there was a big bang, and the universe started. Before that, time did not exist: this is something our minds are not able to comprehend. . . . It has all been a very unlikely process, with many kinds of improbability along the way. . . . If any asked me on what basis I make these assumptions, I have no answer. Except to affirm that I do. Some will say I am making them because, under all the intellectual qualification, I am a residual legatee of the Judeo-Christian tradition. I doubt that. I have a nostalgic affection for the Anglican Church in which I was brought up, but for me its theological formulations have no meaning. Nor have any theological formulations of any kind.

“Nobody in here but us non-theologians,” Snow affirmed. His little credo went out to those who purchased their Encyclopedia Britannicas in the hope of upgrading their minds and their children’s social position. In fact, I would guess that it is likely that they read through this slick magazine more often than they looked up references in their dust-covered set of encyclopedias. Sooner or later, ideas have consequences.

Most modern commentators, both philosophers and professional scientists (Himmelfarb excepted), see Darwin’s denial of teleology as his most important intellectual contribution. It is not simply that science can see no traces of purpose or design in the universe; science now affirms that it has shown that there is no design or purpose in the universe. If there is, it is wholly internal to the non-rational recesses of the human personality, and the behaviorist psychologist B. F. Skinner did his best to reduce that noumenal realm of mystery. George Gaylord Simpson, the world-famous Darwinian paleontologist, stated quite forthrightly that “Man is the result of a purposeless and natural process that did not have him in mind. He was not planned.”¹⁸³ You just cannot make it any plainer than that.

Darwin’s work, wrote Loren Eiseley, “had, in fact, left man only one of innumerable creatures evolving through the play of secondary forces and it had divested him of his mythological and supernatural trappings. The whole tradition of the parson-naturalists had been overthrown. Mechanical cause had replaced Paley's watch and watch maker."¹⁸⁴ Man has to view this mechanical cause as essentially random, however, since man's mind is finite. Nevertheless, in spite of this lack of omniscience, man can see the random universe as sufficiently orderly and absolute to remove God from the premises. So we are now at last set free from God: "The evolutionists discovered that nature 'makes things make themselves' and thus succeeded in apparently removing the need of a Master Craftsman."¹⁸⁵ Impersonal, random biological variation within the framework of an impersonal, random, passively pruning environment is the key to all purposeful, orderly life. But man now makes his own purpose; or, as C. S. Lewis warned, some elite men now seek to define and impose purpose and meaning for all the others.¹⁸⁶

183. George Gaylord Simpson, The Meaning of Evolution (New Haven: Yale University Press, [1949] 1967), p. 345.

7. Darwinian Man

The cosmic impersonalism, the indeterminacy, and the continuity of natural processes have all combined to produce a remarkably discontinuous leap: Man. Man now is to take over the direction of the processes of evolution. Man is now to make the cosmos personal; he shall determine it. As Simpson said, "Plan, purpose, goal, all absent in evolution to this point, enter with the coming of man and are inherent in the new evolution, which is confined to him."¹⁸⁷ Julian Huxley said the same thing.¹⁸⁸ Cosmic impersonalism is now transcended. Man, the product of nature (immanence), now takes control of nature (transcendence). Freed from God's sovereignty by nature's random, impersonal sovereignty, man now affirms his own sovereignty, to impart meaning and purpose to the formerly random forces of evolutionary process. Our first true god has come at last!

Darwinian man is simultaneously transcendent and immanent with respect to nature, just as orthodox Christian man has been. But there is this fundamental difference: Christian man gained his claim of transcendence over some of nature's physical processes only by maintaining his meekness under God and His laws. He achieved limited

184. Eiseley, Darwin's Century, pp. 195–96.

185. Ibid., p. 198.

186. C. S. Lewis, Abolition of Man, ch. 3.

187. Simpson, Meaning of Evolution, pp. 345–46.

188. J. Huxley, "Evolutionary Ethics," (1943): in Appleman (ed.), Darwin, pp. 406– sovereignty over nature by means of his complete dependence on God's total sovereignty. But Darwinian man has dispensed with God's sovereignty in order to grant such sovereignty (temporarily and as a theoretical limiting concept) to random, impersonal nature. Once this transfer of sovereignty has taken place, Darwinian man reclaims his sovereignty, as the legitimate heir of nature. Man then becomes the official king of nature, and like Napoleon Bonaparte, he has been careful to place the crown on his own head (not relying on the Pope or any other theological agent).

Eiseley was quite correct when he said that Darwin's work destroyed the labors of the parson-naturalists. This did not keep the parsons from flocking to him in droves, bearing symbolic frankincense and myrrh, in his later years. This typical yet pathetic development only served to intensify his hostility to religion. His cousin remarked that he was far more sympathetic to religious critics than the fawning ecclesiastics who lauded his work.¹⁸⁹ Preposterously,

The religious managed to find in Darwinism a variety of consolations and virtues not dreamed of even in natural theology. One distinguished botanist bewildered Darwin by declaring himself a convert on the grounds that the theory finally made intelligible the birth of Christ and redemption by grace. A clergyman was converted on the grounds that it opened up new and more glorious prospects for immortality. And theologians declared themselves ready to give up the old doctrine of "the fall" in favor of the happier idea of a gradual and unceasing progress to a higher physical and spiritual state.¹⁹⁰

Himmelfarb hit the nail on the head when she wrote that *the Darwinian controversy was not between theists and evolutionists, but between the reconcilers and irreconcilables on both sides of the controversy.*¹⁹¹ In our century, the irreconcilable Christians (and, I gather, Orthodox Jews) have diminished in number. The new evolutionists do not care enough one way or the other whether Christians do or do not rewrite their religion to conform to the Darwinian universe. The historian, John C. Greene, bent over backward to say nice things about the various theological compromises of men like Russell Mixter and James O. Buswell III, but he was only stating an inescapable fact (from the consistent Darwinian point of view) when he concluded:

189. Himmelfarb, Darwin, p. 386.

190. Ibid., p. 394.

191. Ibid., p. 397.

These theories may help to conserve belief in the inspiration of the Bible, but it is difficult to see how they can be of much scientific value. . . . [When Greene referred to the inspiration of the Bible, he had in mind the heretical Barthian variety, as he said two pages later.] As science advances, moreover, the maintenance of what these writers call "verbal inspiration" is likely to prove possible only by continual reinterpretation of the Bible. In the long run, perpetual reinterpretation may prove more subversive of the authority of Scripture than would a frank recognition of the limitations of traditional doctrines.¹⁹²

The compromisers are trapped.

The best summary was made by Richard Holt Hutton back in 1879, and the fact that hardly a pastor in the conservative churches today sees the truth of this statement constitutes one of the most chilling facts of contemporary religious life. "The people who believe today that God has made so fast the laws of His physical universe, that it is in many directions utterly impenetrable to moral and spiritual influences, will believe tomorrow that the physical universe subsists by its own inherent laws, and that God, even if He dwells within it, cannot do with it what He would, and will find out the next day, that God does not even dwell within it, but must, as Renan says, be 'organized' by man, if we are to have a God at all."¹⁹³ From the natural law of the parson-naturalists, to Robert Chambers' "Christian" evolution, to Charles Darwin's autonomous law, to Julian Huxley's evolving human master of the evolutionary process: the development has seemed almost irreversible. It has led us into three cultural quagmires: the modern chaotic world of impotent existentialism, the modern bureaucratic world of the planners, and the modern retreatist world of visionless, compromised religion.

G. Christianity and Evolutionism

There is only one accurate doctrine of creation: creation out of nothing. All other systems partake either of pantheism or deism, both implying a finite Creator. The Bible's account avoids both pitfalls. A totally sovereign God created the universe out of nothing in six days, according to His own trinitarian counsel. He then placed man, His subordinate representative, in authority over the creation. Man rebelled against the Creator, thereby bringing the wrath of God upon himself and, to some extent, on the creation itself. But, in His grace, God revealed Himself to men, both in the creation (the testimony of which is always rejected by rebellious men) and in His verbal, written word, the Bible. He has informed men of His creative acts in bringing all things into existence in six days—a period of time identical to the six days in which men are to labor at their vocations. Men are to subdue the earth to the glory of God and in terms of His natural laws, as interpreted by His written word. Man is subordinate to God, operating entirely in terms of His ethical laws, and he is both under and over laws of nature. Nature responds to mankind's authority in terms of mankind's ethical relationship to God, especially with respect to man's obedience to the external laws of God. God's law, both natural and revealed through the Bible, is man's tool of godly subduing.

192. John C. Greene, Darwin and the Modern World View (New York: Mentor, 1963), p. 34.

193. Cited in Himmelfarb, Darwin, pp. 398–99.

All other systems place man in a position either of total impersonal autonomy (transcendence), or total impersonal passivity (immanence), or—as in the case of Darwinian thought—both simultaneously. The deist's god is on vacation, leaving man in full control of the semi-autonomous world machine. The pantheist's god is indistinguishable from the organic, living creation. In either case, God is silent concerning ethics. The deist's god ignores the world; the pantheist's god is impotent to speak in a voice separate from the world. Thus, man is seen as rationally autonomous from God (eighteenth-century Continental deism) or irrationally immersed in and part of God. In neither case is there a final ethical judgment by a self-contained, sovereign, personal God in whose image man is created. Man either rules over nature as a totalitarian despot, or else he is completely subservient to nature, like some oriental slave. The universe is closed to any judgment outside itself in both pantheism and deism; man has no higher court of appeal than nature itself. In both cases, nature ignores ethics. As Simpson put it: "Discovery that the universe apart from man or before his coming lacks and lacked any purpose or plan has the inevitable corollary that the workings of the universe cannot provide any automatic, universal, eternal, or absolute ethical criteria of right or wrong."¹⁹⁴

H. Rival Methodologies

What should be inescapably clear by now is this; there is no doctrine of ultimate origins that is not intensely religious. Similarly, there is no philosophical system that does not possess a doctrine of creation—the origin of all things and the constitution which presently sustains all things. For Christians to tamper with the plain meaning of the Bible in order to make it conform to the latest findings of this or that school of evolutionary thought is nothing short of disastrous. It means an amalgamation of rival and irreconcilable religious presuppositions. Neither Darwin nor the orthodox Christian can escape the philosophical and theological implications of methodology. Both Darwin and the compromising Christians tried to push questions of philosophy and epistemology (knowledge) into the background, as if there could be some universally shared scientific methodology that is independent of philosophical presuppositions. But when the chips were down, Darwin always sided with atheism; he refused to acknowledge that the God of the Bible could have created or influenced the world in the ways explicitly affirmed by the Bible. Evolutionism is methodological atheism, whether Hindu, or Buddhist, or Lamarckian, or Darwinian. It always was; it always will be.

194. Simpson, Meaning of Evolution, p. 346.

Darwinian thought is fundamentally Greek paganism. This was recognized very early by Darwin's hatchet-man, Thomas Huxley. In Huxley's assessment of the impact of Darwin's thought, which Huxley wrote for the Life and Letters of Charles Darwin in 1887, he expressed his opinion:

The oldest of all philosophies, that of Evolution, was bound hand and foot and cast into utter darkness during the millennium of theological scholasticism. [Actually, scholastic philosophy lasted only from the twelfth century through the fifteenth as a cultural force in Europe, but Huxley means simply medieval Christian thought in general—G.N.] But Darwin poured new lifeblood into the ancient frame; the bonds burst, and the revived thought of ancient Greece has proved itself to be a more adequate expression of the universal order of things than any of the schemes which have been accepted by the credulity and welcomed by the superstition of seventy later generations of men.

Indeed; all three of the accepted "scientific" evolutionary cosmologies today are simply footnoted revivals of Greek cosmological thought.

First, consider George Gamow's "primeval atom" or "big bang" theory—the exploding "ylem" of matter-energy that created all the elements of the universe in the first half-hour of its existence. Plato's theory of creation outlined in the Timaeus dialogue was its analogue in Greek thought. Second, there is the so-called steady-state theory (Fred Hoyle, the famous British astronomer, used to believe in this one). Matter and energy are continuously being created out of nothing. Everything continues today as it always has. This is the Aristotelian outlook, and it undergirded the geology of Hutton and Lyell. It is the uniformitarian theory. Finally, there is the theory of the oscillating universe: big bang, explosion outward, slowing, imploding inward, crash, and new big bang. Marx's partner, Engels, held this faith. It is quite similar to the Stoic theory of a cyclical cosmos. As Toulmin and Goodfield noted: "The disagreement between supporters of these views today is just about complete. Nor does there seem to be any real hope of reaching an accommodation without abandoning elements which are regarded as indispensable to the theories."¹⁹⁵ In short, rival pagan faiths are no less in opposition to each other, despite their unity against cosmic personalism. It was true in the days of Greece; it is equally true today.

"Details apart," wrote Toulmin and Goodfield, "the general resemblances between twentieth-century cosmology and its ancestors are no mere coincidence. Rather, they prompt one to look for an equally general motive." There is not sufficient evidence today to prove any theory of the earth's history, so the same old a priori refrains are repeated, generation after generation. As the authors concluded, "cosmological theory is still basically philosophical," and certain "obstinate and insoluble" problems and objections "still face us which cannot be evaded by dressing them up in twentieth-century terminology."¹⁹⁶ Either time had an origin, thereby making discussion of what happened "before" impossible; or else time is infinite in both directions, thus forcing us to ask forever, "Before then, what?"

Secularists, who too often spend little or no time thinking about the internal contradictions of their own presuppositions, like to ridicule Christians with stupid questions like "Who created God?" or "Where did God get the 'stuff' to build the universe?" as if they had some non-theistic answer to these questions. They do not. They have a tendency to ignore their own rootless systems of philosophy, however, which gives them great confidence in challenging the revelation of the Scripture. They prefer to have faith in the impersonal "ylem" or impersonal, infinite, steady-state time or impersonal cosmic cycles; a personal Creator God is too preposterous for their sophisticated tastes.

195. Toulmin and Goodfield, Discovery of Time, p. 255.

196. Ibid., p. 258.

Yet if we are compelled to regard secular opponents of the biblical doctrine of the six-day creation as naive, then those Christians who try to amalgamate Genesis 1 and one (or all) of the secular cosmologies are doubly naive. Philosophically, the concept of process undergirds the secular positions. Toulmin and Goodfield recognized this. R. J. Rushdoony, in his study, The Mythology of Science, recognized this. Instead of the fiat word of God—a discontinuous event which created time and the universe—we are expected to believe in the creativity of impersonal process. As Rushdoony argued, “the moment creativity is transferred or to any degree ascribed to the process of being, to the inner powers of nature, to that extent sovereignty and power are transferred from God to nature. Nature having developed as a result of its creative process has within itself inherently the laws of its being. God is an outsider to Nature, able to give inspiration to men within Nature but unable to govern them because He is not their Creator and hence not their source of law.”¹⁹⁷ Is it any wonder, then, that the first modern cosmological evolutionist, Immanuel Kant, was also the premier philosopher of the modern world? Is it any wonder that his theory of the two realms—autonomous external and random “noumena” vs. scientific, mathematically law-governed “phenomena”—is the foundation of modern neo-orthodox theology, which has eroded both Protestantism and Catholicism? Is it any wonder that Kant’s “god” is the lord of the noumenal realm, without power to influence the external realm of science, without even the power to speak to men directly, in terms of a verbal, cognitive, creedal revelation? This is the god of process theology, of evolution, of the modern world. It is the only god that humanists allow to exist. The God of Deuteronomy 8 and 28, who controls famines, plagues, and pestilences in terms of the ethical response of men to His law-word, is not the God of modern, apostate evolutionary science. He is not the god of process theology. The Christian with the Ph.D. in geology who says that he just cannot see what process has to do with the sovereignty of God is telling the truth: he cannot see. Had he been able to see, no “respectable” university would ever have granted him a Ph.D. in geology, at least not in historical geology.¹⁹⁸

The Bible does not teach the theology of process. It does not tell us that an original chaos evolved into today’s order, and will become even more orderly later. That is the theology of the Greeks, of the East, and 197. Rushdoony, The Mythology of Science (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1967] 1995), p. 53.

198. Davis Young, Westminster Theological Journal (Spring 1973), p. 272.

the modern evolutionist. It is not a part of the biblical heritage. Even the so-called “chaos” of Genesis 1:2—“And the earth was without form and void”—does not teach a “chaos into order” scheme. Prof. Edward J. Young offered considerable proof of the fact that the Hebrew phrase translated “without form and void” should be rendered, “desolation and waste.” It signifies that “God did not create the earth for desolation, but rather to be inhabited. . . . Such an earth has not fulfilled the purpose for which it was created; it is an earth created in vain, a desolate earth.”¹⁹⁹ Young cited Isaiah 45:18, which contains the same Hebrew words: “For thus saith the LORD that created the heavens; God himself that formed the earth and made it; he hath established, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited: I am the LORD; and there is none else.” What is described in Gen. 1:2 is a great primeval sea, which was uninhabitable and therefore desolate. (See verse 9: “let the dry land appear.”) The “chaos” factor, so heavily relied upon by compromising biblical expositors, not only does not conform to Greek speculation, but is intensely anti-modern: the desolation implies purpose, that great bugaboo of modern science. Any attempt to view Gen. 1:2 in terms of some original chaos plays into the hands of the Darwinians, for it compromises the element of purpose in the creation.

One popular variation on this theme is the so-called “gap hypothesis,” which argues that in Gen. 1:1 God created the earth, only to shake up the elements in Genesis 1:2 as a result of Satan’s fall. He then created the new, six-day earth in Genesis 1:3–27. There are three things wrong with this view, at the very least. First, the Bible does not teach anything like this; it is obviously a jerry-built interpretation that has become popular in order to give an explanation for the apparent age of the uniformitarians’ earth. Second, the uniformitarians are entitled to dismiss it, since a true “chaos” would have been a complete erasure of the previously existing earth, thus removing the “precious” traces of age that the “gapologists” so desperately desire. Third, as already mentioned, it compromises the explicit traces of purpose in the creation’s original desolation. A fourth reason is at least possible: Satan fell on the seventh day, after God had pronounced the whole creation “good.”

The step-by-step retreat of Christian thinkers from the six-day creation—universally acknowledged in 1725, and generally believed until 1800—has been a disastrous, though temporary, setback for Christian orthodoxy. Sadly, Christians were not usually dragged, kicking and screaming, into Lyell's uniformitarian and Darwin's purposeless evolution. They accepted each new scientific "breakthrough" with glee. At best, each resistance attempt was a three-stepped process: (1) it is not true; (2) it is not relevant, anyway; (3) we always knew it was true, and Christianity teaches it, and teaches it better than any other system. No wonder Darwin was irritated; a good, purposeless universe could not be left in peace by these silly people!

199. Edward J. Young, Studies in Genesis One (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1964), p. 33. See also pp. 13, 16, 34.

The battle lines should be clear: Christianity or error, the six-day creation or chaos, purpose and meaning or cosmic impersonalism and randomness. It is not hard to understand why the religion of modernism clings to Darwinian thought. It is also not surprising why occultist Max Heindel could write The Rosicrucian CosmoConception or Mystic Christianity: An Elementary Treatise upon Man's Past Evolution, Present Constitution and Future Development (1909). But why Christians should give one second's consideration of the possibility of evolution—ancient or modern, occultist or scientific—is a mystery.

The compromise with uniformitarian principles has been a steady, almost uniformitarian process within Christian circles. Gillispie, describing the steady capitulation of early nineteenth-century Christian naturalists, shows how disastrous the retreat was for orthodoxy. At each stage, the Christians, copying the mythical act of King Canute, shouted "thus far and no farther" to uniformitarianism. "And at every stage except the last, progressives admitted that a further step, the possibility of which they disavowed while they unwittingly prepared it, would indeed have had serious implications for orthodox religious fidelity."²⁰⁰ But each new uniformitarian "discovery" was assimilated into the supposedly orthodox framework nonetheless, despite the fact that at every preceding capitulation, the proponents of that compromise admitted that the next step (now greeted passively or even enthusiastically) would be unnecessary, impossible, and utterly wrong. (Any similarity between nineteenth-century Christian progressives and today's Christian progressives is hardly coincidental.) The progressivists of the 1840s, like the compromisers of today, would not face up to reality. They could not admit to themselves or their few orthodox opponents the fact that Robert Nisbet has called to our attention: "It is hard today to realize the degree to which the attack on Christianity obsessed intellectuals of rationalist and utilitarian will. Christianity had much the same position that capitalism was to hold in the first half of the twentieth century. It was the enemy in the minds of most intellectuals. Uniformitarianism, above any other single element of the theory of evolution, was the perfect point of attack on a theory that made external manipulation its essence and a succession of 'catastrophes' its plot."²⁰¹

200. Gillispie, Genesis and Geology, p. 221.

Conclusion

Thomas H. Huxley, the scientist who helped spread the gospel of Darwinism more than any other man in the second half of the nineteenth century, was vitriolic in his hostility to orthodox Christianity, with its insistence on the doctrine of creation. He knew there could never be any compromise between Darwinism and creationism. He announced in his important defense of Darwin in 1859:

In this nineteenth century, as at the dawn of modern physical science, the cosmogony of the semi-barbarous Hebrew is the incubus of the philosopher and the opprobrium of the orthodox. Who shall number the patient and earnest seekers after truth, from the days of Galileo until now, whose lives have been embittered and their good name blasted by the mistaken zeal of Bibliolators? Who shall count the host of weaker men whose sense of truth has been destroyed in the effort to harmonise impossibilities—whose life has been wasted in the attempt to force the generous new wine of Science into the old bottles of Judaism, compelled by the outcry of the same strong party?²⁰²

Huxley was totally confident in the long-term success of Darwinism. In fact, he believed that this victory of science (which he dutifully capitalized, as one should do when spelling out the name of any divinity one worships) had already been secured. He viewed this triumph as the result of an intellectual war.

It is true that if philosophers have suffered, their cause has been amply avenged. Extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science as the strangled snakes beside that of Hercules; and history records that whenever science and orthodoxy have been fairly opposed, the latter has been forced to retire from the lists, bleeding and crushed if not annihilated; scotched, if not slain. But orthodoxy

201. Nisbet, Social Change and History, p. 184.

202. Thomas Huxley, "The Origin of Species," (1859), in Frederick Barry (ed.), Essays (New York: Macmillan, 1929), pp. 105–6.

is the Bourbon [referring to the French monarchy, the House of Bourbon—G.N.] of the world of thought. It learns not, neither can it forget; and though, at present, bewildered and afraid to move, it is as willing as ever to insist that the first chapter of Genesis contains the beginning and the end of sound science; and to visit, with such petty thunderbolts as its half-paralyzed hands can hurl, those who refuse to degrade Nature to the levels of primitive Judaism.²⁰³

His next paragraph begins with this unforgettable sentence: "Philosophers, on the other hand, have no such aggressive tendencies." Why not?

The majesty of Fact is on their side, and the elemental forces of Nature are working for them. Not a star comes to the meridian of their methods: their beliefs are 'one with the falling rain and with the growing corn.' By doubt they are established, and open inquiry is their bosom friend. Such men have no fear of traditions however venerable, and no respect for them when they become mischievous and obstructive; . . .²⁰⁴

He knew his contemporary enemies well. He realized clearly, as they did not, that their hypothesis of continuing special creations "owes its existence very largely to the supposed necessity of making science accord with the Hebrew cosmogony; but it is curious to observe that, as the doctrine is at present maintained by men of science, it is as hopelessly inconsistent with the Hebrew view as any other hypothesis."²⁰⁵ Darwinian scientists from Huxley's day to the present have been able to make the same criticism of later attempts of Christian scholars to compromise the teachings of Genesis 1 and evolution. Sadly, Huxley's barb applies quite well to these professional academic compromisers: they are like the Bourbon kings. They never seem to learn that there can be no successful compromise between the rival cosmologies.

The six-day creation is not a narrow cosmology. It is as broad as the creation itself and the revelation of that creation given by its Creator. Evolution and uniformitarian geology (however modified the uniformitarianism may be) may appear very broad-minded, but only in the sense of Matthew 7:13: "Enter ye in at the strait [narrow, tight] gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat."

203. Ibid., p. 106.

204. Ibid., pp. 106–7.

205. Ibid., p. 108.

Appendix D

BASIC IMPLICATIONS OF THE SIX-DAY CREATION

Christian churches seldom lack an issue that can serve as a means of internal disruption and conflict: the mode of baptism, the age of one's first communion, the form of government, the role of the institutional church in non-church realms. The conflict between evolution and creation has not been one of these major and continuing sources of contention within the vast majority of Christian churches.

Prior to 1800, the concept of biological evolution had not been widely considered. A few secular philosophers—for example, Immanuel Kant—had argued for some form of cosmic evolution, but Christians were generally uninformed about, or unimpressed by, such speculation. Yet, after 1900, outside of a few so-called fundamentalist groups, the question of the time and mode of God's creation was no longer considered intellectually or ecclesiastically respectable as an important topic. People have been expected to “agree to disagree” as Christians; specifics concerning creation are officially relegated into the realm of adiaphora, that is, things indifferent to salvation or the life of the church. “Theistic evolution” or the “gap theory” or “progressive creation” or the “literary framework hypothesis” have served as alternatives to the six-day creation within those circles that still concern themselves with the question of biblical inerrancy.

Ever since 1900, we have witnessed a strange phenomenon inside the evangelical churches. Pastors have been dismissed by their congregations or their hierarchical superiors for mismanaging budgets, changing their minds about the mode of baptism, softening their views concerning the sabbath, or disrupting the autonomy of the choir director. But a heresy trial for a pastor who holds some variant of theistic evolution would be unthinkable in evangelical churches today. As a means of institutional confrontation, the choir is a far more potent issue than the doctrine of creation. So powerful have been the forces of religious syncretism, philosophical pragmatism, and academic respectability inside the churches, that this crucial foundation of the faith has become operationally secondary—or less.

If pastors, clutching desperately at their advanced academic degrees from accredited colleges, have abandoned the defense of the faith, why should the layman think that he has any right to call the churches to repentance? How can a layman challenge the official expertise of certified scholarship and ordained respectability? This was Moses' question to God, basically, in Exodus 4:10. God's answer was straightforward: "Who hath made man's mouth? or who maketh the dumb, or deaf, or the seeing, or the blind? have not I, the LORD?" (Ex. 4:11). God is the source of all valid theories and all valid footnotes, not the geology department of Harvard University. His revelation of Himself in the Bible is the standard of accuracy, not the latest discovery (which will be refuted in five years by someone else) of hypothetically neutral science. If intelligent, devoted, and necessarily self-taught laymen do not make use of the services of the various creation research organizations in their efforts to call Christians back to the explicit revelation of the Bible and the historic faith of the orthodox churches, then a major battle will have been lost. The status quo in the churches today is our visible defeat; orthodoxy demands reconstruction. Assistance from the pastors in this struggle would be appreciated, but as it stands today, the laymen are necessarily the strategists and generals.

A. Here I Stand

Why take a stand here? Why should the doctrine of the six-day creation be a rallying issue? First, because it is the one issue that has established itself in the minds of many orthodox Christians as a necessary and legitimate area of confrontation between apostate science and Christianity. Men who would not be confident in challenging secular thought in the realms of psychology, politics, economics, or other academic disciplines, nevertheless do understand the false nature of the claim of scientific neutrality concerning evolution. As a result, the intellectual division of labor is greater in the areas of biology and geology than in any other Christian endeavor.

More people are already involved in the battle. Thus, it is tactically a solid place to take a stand. More important than tactics, however, is the centrality of the doctrine of creation to Christian faith. Langdon Gilkey, a neo-orthodox theologian who does not believe in the verbal, plenary inspiration of the Bible, nonetheless saw the issue more clearly than most supposedly evangelical theologians. He announced forthrightly:

It is quite natural, of course, that Christian devotion and Christian thought should concern themselves most with God's redeeming activity in Jesus Christ, for upon this our knowledge of God as loving Father, and so of our hope for salvation, most directly depends. Nevertheless, the centrality of God's redeeming activity to our life and thought should not blind Christians to the divine work of creation, which, if not so close to our hearts, is just as significant for our existence and just as important if we are to think rightly about God. Through God's redeeming works we know that He is supremely righteous and supremely loving. But when we ask who is supremely righteous and loving, the answer comes in terms of God's original activity, creation: the Creator of heaven and earth, the Lord, is He who judges and redeems us. The transcendent "Godness" of God, what gives Him deity and so ultimate significance to our lives, is most directly manifested to us through His creative activity as the transcendent source of all being and of all existence. Without this transcendent aspect of "deity," the judgment and love of God would be ultimately unimportant to us, and the redemption promised by them impossible for God. The idea of creation, therefore, provides the most fundamental, if not the most characteristic, definition of God in the Christian faith. Among all the activities of God, creation is that activity or attribute which sets him apart as "God."¹

The doctrine of the Trinity—the eternal, infinite, fully self-revealing and communing holy God who is three persons—has always been the starting point for Christian theology. But insofar as God has any relationship with men, the doctrine of creation is central. The fact that Gilkey, who is not orthodox, can see this, and evangelicals do not, testifies to the disastrous effects of syncretism. Christianity and antitheism cannot be successfully fused without destroying Christianity.

B. Creation Defined

The Bible testifies to the fact that a personal God created all things—matter and energy, structure and motion—out of nothing: creatio ex nihilo. The opening words of the Bible are concerned with the question of origins: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. 1:1). God repeats this fact to us again and again: "Yea, before the day was I am he; and there is none that can deliver out of my hand: I will work, and who shall let it?" (Isa. 43:13). We read in the New Testament concerning God the Son: "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist" (Col. 1:16–17). There is no more comprehensive statement in Scripture concerning the creation. Christ our savior is identified with God the Creator; were He not the Creator, He would not be the Savior. We would still be dead in our sins (Eph. 2:5). The Gospel of John, the most explicitly evangelistic of the gospels (John 20:30, 31), begins with the affirmation that Christ, the Word of God, is the Creator: "All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made" (1:3). God precedes all things: "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God" (Ps. 90:2). He is therefore sovereign over all things: "Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men" (Ps. 90:3).

1. Langdon Gilkey, Maker of Heaven and Earth: The Christian Doctrine of Creation in the Light of Modern Knowledge (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1959] 1965), pp. 83–84.

No knowledge of God as Creator could penetrate the minds of rebellious men sufficiently to bring them to repentance were it not for God's gracious self-revelation in the Bible, by means of the Holy Spirit. Men willfully hold back the knowledge they have of God as Creator (Rom. 1:18–23).² The saving knowledge of God comes only by means of His special revelation and special grace to His people. Therefore, all men are required to believe that God is the Creator, and not the creator devised by the rebellious human imagination, but the Creator as revealed in the Bible. Any old kind of creation will not do; we are not to adopt a doctrine of creation in the same way as we select salads in a cafeteria. The words of Genesis 1 inform us of the fact that God created all things in six days. This is repeated in the Decalogue (Ten Commandments): ". . . in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day. . ." (Ex. 20:11). The creation was out of nothing, in response to the sovereign word of God: "By the word of the LORD were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth . . . For he spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast" (Ps. 33:6, 9). Therefore, the Apostle Paul wrote: "For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen" (Rom. 11:36).

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2; Cf. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1959), I, p. 37.

Modern translators of the Bible have sometimes sought to revive the theology of the pagan ancient world, since a similar theology undergirds all modern apostate rationalism. They have translated Genesis 1:1–2 as follows: "When God began to create the heaven and the earth—the earth being unformed and void, with darkness over the surface of the earth. . . ."³ The language, while grammatically possible, is theologically perverse. The translation is governed by the premises of apostate man rather than by the explicit teaching of the Bible. It is the Bible, not the presuppositions of rebellious men, which is to interpret the verbal revelation of God (II Tim. 3:16; II Pet. 1:20). Modern translators believe, far too often, in the co-existence of the material (or energetic) universe with the being of God. This assumption of the ancient cosmologies, contemporary "primitive" cosmologies, ancient philosophy (Aristotle, Physics, VIII), and modern evolutionism, is erroneous. When this pagan god began to mold the eternally existing "stuff" of the universe, he found that he was not sovereign over it, because he had not created it. He, like the "stuff" in front of him, behind him, above him, and beneath him, was governed by the independent laws of probability and chance. "Lots of luck there, God! We're pulling for you!"

In contrast to this is the Creator of the Bible. At best, the pagan god is Dr. God, while we humans are only Mr. But the Epistle to Hebrews testifies of another God altogether: "And, thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands: They shall perish; but thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment; And, as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail" (Heb. 1:10–12). God dwells in eternity (Isa. 57:15). He creates the new heaven and new earth (Isa. 65:17–18; II Pet. 3:9–13; Rev. 21:1). The Creator is the Savior: "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath: for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they

3. The Torah (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1962). For a scholarly refutation of this approach to Genesis 1:1, see Edward J. Young, Studies in Genesis One (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1964), pp. 1–7. Young's study also offers refutations of the so-called "gap theory"—eons of time between Genesis 1:1 and 1:2—and the literary or framework hypothesis, which argues against the chronological succession of the six days of creation.

that dwell therein shall die in like manner: but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished" (Isa. 51:6). He who dares to tamper with the doctrine of creation compromises the revelation of the Creator concerning His own activity. If the latest finding of science—based, as it is, on the oldest antitheistic philosophy of creation—should be permitted to undermine the explicit revelation of God concerning one aspect of His relationship to His creation, there is no logical reason to draw back in horror when science also undermines the doctrine of salvation. Without the doctrine of creation there can be no doctrine of salvation—not, at least, an orthodox doctrine.

God is eternal and unchanging (Mal. 3:6). His words will not pass away (Matt. 24:35); His counsel is immutable (Heb. 6:17). "The LORD by wisdom hath founded the earth; by understanding hath he established the heavens" (Prov. 3:19). God's wisdom founded the world; the fallen world's wisdom cannot accept this. God's wisdom is foolishness to the world (I Cor. 1:20), and God warns His people not to be beguiled by the vanity of apostate philosophies (Col. 2:4–9). God is the standard of reference, the unchanging measure of all truth. Thus, the Bible rejects the pagan idea of creation through self-generated process, and it affirms the fiat creation by the word of God. Creation was a discontinuous event—the discontinuous event prior to Christ's incarnation. Process theology is the remnant of Adam's thought; by stressing the continuity between man's truth and God's truth, it relativizes God's truth. The shifting opinions of scientists replace the verbal revelation of God. Time, not God, becomes the framework of creation; chance, not God's eternal word, becomes the creative force in history. Evolution, the most consistent and most dangerous form of process theology, cannot be made to fit the categories of Christian faith.

C. Providence

The definition of creation goes beyond the concept of the original creation which ended on the sixth day. It simultaneously affirms the sustaining hand of God in time. It is Christ, "who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power" (Heb. 1:3), maintains the earth and the stars. "He hath made the earth by his power, he hath established the world by his wisdom, and hath stretched out the heaven by his understanding. When he uttereth his voice, there is a multitude of waters in the heavens; and he causeth the vapors to ascend from the ends of the earth: he maketh lightnings with rain, and bringeth forth the wind out of his treasures" (Jer. 51:15–16). Psalm 104 is a lengthy presentation of God's creative, sustaining providence in history. This applies equally to matters spiritual and physical: "Fear thou not; for I am with thee: be not dismayed; for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness" (Isa. 41:10; cf. 42:5–6). The doctrine of providence reveals the total sovereignty of God.

D. Creator-Creature Distinction

Is God wholly removed from the world, as an eighteenth-century deist would have argued? Is God wholly identified with the world, as the pantheists have argued? As far back as we have written records, men have answered both ways. Sometimes, as in the case of the philosopher Plato and the neo-orthodox theologian Barth, secularists have held both positions simultaneously.⁴ Aristotle's "thought thinking itself," deism's watchmaker god, and Plato's For-ms or Ideas are all wholly transcendent, wholly aloof gods. Eastern religious monism and Western pantheism are examples of the god who reveals himself wholly in his creation. The first god has no point of contact with life and change; the second god cannot be distinguished from life and change. Neither is therefore truly personal.

The Bible affirms the existence of a personal Creator who is simultaneously transcendent and immanent. This is not held, as in the case of neo-orthodoxy, on the basis of modern philosophical dualism, but rather on the basis of a personal God's verbal and therefore understandable revelation of Himself to those creatures made in His image. God is not to be identified with His creation, yet the creation testifies to His existence. There is no uniform being that in some way links God and the creation—some ultra something that both God and creation participate in. There is no scale of being between the devil and God, with God as the possessor of more being than anyone else, and the devil drifting into non-being. The God of the Bible is personal and sovereign, unlike the secular transcendent God (who is too different or too removed to care about the world) or the secular immanent God

4. On Plato's position, see Cornelius Van Til, A Survey of Christian Epistemology, vol. II of In Defense of the Faith (den Dulk Foundation, 1969), ch. 3. (This was published originally in 1932 as The Metaphysics of Apologetics.) On Barth's dualism between God as wholly revealed, yet wholly hidden, see Van Til, Christianity and Barthianism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1962), ch. 6.

(who is too similar and too close to the world to influence it). We are informed by Psalm 90:1–2 that God is our dwelling place (immanence), yet He existed before the foundation of the world (transcendence). The universe is therefore personal; in contrast to all forms of paganism, at bottom a personal God controls all His creation. Christianity affirms cosmic personalism.

1. Transcendence.

“For thou, LORD, art high above all the earth: thou art exalted far above all gods” (Ps. 97:9; cf. 135:5; Isa. 46:9). The Psalms are filled with the language of transcendence. “The LORD is great in Zion; and he is high above all the people” (Ps. 99:2). “Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens: and thy glory above all the earth” (Ps. 108:5). While we do not need to accept the conclusions of the so-called higher criticism of the Bible, that is, the multiple authorship of many individual books of the Bible, there is no doubt that Isaiah 40–66 does stress the idea of the transcendence of God far more than Isaiah 1–39. Perhaps the crucial verses in the Bible dealing with God’s transcendence are Isaiah 55:8–9: “For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the LORD. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts.” Yet God’s transcendence is not impersonal; He is on high, but He cares for His people: “For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones” (Isa. 57:15). This same connection between God’s transcendence and mercy is found in Jeremiah 32:17–18. But the most comprehensive statement of God’s absolute transcendence is presented in Job, chapters 38–41.⁵ No created being can challenge the creative hand of God.

It is therefore insufficient to argue merely for the separation of God and the creation. As Cornelius Van Til wrote: “The transcendence concept of theism is not clearly stated, if it is merely said that God is independent of the world. According to the ordinary use of the word, that would not exclude the possibility that the world would also be independent of God. And it is this dependence of the world upon

5. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

God that a theist is interested in as much as the independence of God apart from the world. In fact God would not be truly independent of the world unless the world were dependent upon God. No one is absolutely independent unless he alone is independent.”⁶ The doctrine of creation prevents the appearance of a deistic view of transcendence, for the Bible’s account of creation also teaches the doctrine of providence. God sustains the world. It is only in terms of His eternal decree that the world has existence or meaning.

2. Immanence.

The transcendence of God the Creator implies His immanence. “But will God indeed dwell on the earth? behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded?” (I Kings 8:27). God is omnipresent; He cannot be contained in heaven alone. He dwells throughout His creation and far beyond infinity. Psalm 139:7–8 is the archetype passage: “Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there.” God asks Jeremiah: “Am I a God at hand . . . and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? saith the LORD. Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the LORD” (Jer. 23:23–24). Near and far, God is present. “For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for?” (Deut. 4:7). God’s words are very clear in this regard. As Paul proclaimed before the pagans in Athens, “For in him we live, and move, and have our being. . . .” (Acts 17:28a). Our physical bodies serve as the temple of the Holy Spirit (I Cor. 6:19; II Cor. 6:16).

Man is made in the image of God (Gen. 1:26–27). Man’s inner being calls him to repentance and worship. Man’s environment also calls him to worship the Creator: “The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork” (Ps. 19:1). Therefore, concluded Paul, every man is totally without excuse:

For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse: Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, And changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things. Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves: Who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen (Rom. 1:20–25).

6. Van Til, Survey of Christian Epistemology, p. 16.

There is no escape from God's revelation of Himself; the whole creation proclaims His majesty. There is not sufficient natural revelation to save people from destruction, but there is natural revelation sufficient to condemn them for all eternity. The "work of the law" is written in every man's heart, "conscience also bearing witness" to his own evil nature (Rom. 2:15). Men seek desperately to escape this testimony. Again, quoting Van Til:

The main point is that if man could look anywhere and not be confronted with the revelation of God then he could not sin in the Biblical sense of the term. Sin is the breaking of the law of God. God confronts man everywhere. He cannot in the nature of the case confront man anywhere if he does not confront him everywhere. God is one; the law is one. If man could press one button on the radio of his experience and not hear the voice of God then he would always press that button and not the others. But man cannot even press the button of his own self-consciousness without hearing the requirement of God.⁷

In short, "Psychologically there are no atheistic men; epistemologically [knowledgeably] every sinner is atheistic."⁸ For this reason, the evil man in Jesus' parable of Lazarus asked to be allowed to return from hell to warn his lost brothers—not because he had a trace of goodness or compassion for the lost, but because if he could get God to admit that His revelation to the brothers was not sufficient to warn them, then God would have no cause to judge any man, including Dives. God, understandably, turned the request down flatly: though one rose from the dead (Jesus Christ), they would not be persuaded (Luke 16:27–31). Men's problem is not their lack of revelation; it is their willful rebellion against that revelation. God's creation reveals Him.

7. Van Til, Common Grace and the Gospel (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1973), pp. 176–77.

8. Ibid., p. 54.

E. The Sovereignty of God

Job 38–41 is an important testimony to the sovereignty of God.⁹ God, who created all things and sustains all things, rules all things. Nothing happens outside the decrees of God; Satan had to ask permission in order to harass Job, and God set limits to everything he did (Job 1:12; 2:6). Everything is known to God beforehand, of course: “Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world” (Acts 15:18). In Isaiah 45 we learn of the extent of God’s total direction of all events:

I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the LORD do all these things. Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness: let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together; I the LORD have created it. Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands? . . . I have made the earth, and created man upon it: I, even my hands, have stretched out the heavens, and all their host have I commanded (Isa. 45:7–9, 12).

God is not the author of confusion (I Cor. 14:33), yet He controls and directs all things. There is no solution to this seeming intellectual dilemma in terms of the logic of autonomous man.

The image of the potter and his workmanship is a recurring one in the Bible. “But now, O LORD, thou art our Father; we are the clay, and thou our potter; and we all are the work of thy hand” (Isa. 64:8). Jeremiah 18, God’s confrontation with Israel, is constructed upon this analogy: “O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the LORD. Behold, as the clay is in the potter’s hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel” (Jer. 18:6). But in Romans 9, the great chapter in the New Testament dealing with the total predestination of the world by God, Paul used the potter analogy to stifle the apostate and illegitimate conclusion of those who would argue that God’s predestination is opposed to human responsibility. Paul’s use of the potter analogy had no meaning except in terms of such an illegitimate use of human logic; he answered that issue, and only that issue, in these words:

Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, a man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour? (vv. 18–21).

9. North, Predictability and Dominion, ch. 6.

God therefore has set explicit limits on the exercise of human logic. God is good, and He created all things good in the beginning, yet He uses evil and rebellion to fulfill His plan of history. Man is totally predestined by the Creator (Rom. 8:28–30; Eph. 1), yet man is wholly responsible for his actions. We are required to affirm both points. We are the vessels; God, the Creator, is the potter. Men are reminded that “The secret things belong unto the LORD our God: but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law” (Deut. 29:29). Creatures are not permitted knowledge as exhaustive as God’s is, whether of outward affairs or of the heart (I Sam. 16:7). Godly humility requires every Christian to submit to the sovereignty of God, acknowledging His total predestination as well as man’s total responsibility. Anything less than this affirmation—any quibbling concerning possible zones of human autonomy to make decisions respecting anything, including their salvation—involves men in outward rebellion. “The king’s heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will” (Prov. 21:1). “A man’s heart deviseth his way: but the LORD directeth his steps” (Prov. 16:9).¹⁰

F. Meekness and Dominion

Because God is sovereign over the creation, which exists only because of God’s decree, and because man is made in the image of God, man therefore has a legitimate, though subordinate, right of dominion over the creation. This is man’s cultural mandate: “And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth” (Gen. 1:26–28).¹¹ This cultural mandate was reaffirmed with Noah and his sons (Gen. 9:1).¹² Man’s meekness before a Creator God is the foundation of man’s inheritance of the earth, for the meek shall inherit the earth (Matt. 5:5).¹³ Christ, who claimed to be meek (Matt. 11:29), was the one who drove the money-changers from the temple (Matt. 21:12)¹⁴ and called the Pharisees sons of the devil (John 8:44). Meekness before God gives man dominion over nature.

10. For a more detailed introduction to these issues, see the chapter on God in my book, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010). This appendix is basically a summary of Unconditional Surrender.

When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him? For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet: All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas. O LORD our LORD, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! (Ps. 8:3–9).¹⁵

Now we are made a little lower than the angels, but not forever. “Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?” (I Cor. 6:3). Christians who retreat from the affairs of this world are, by their very actions, acknowledging the devil’s view of God’s sovereignty: Man does not have legitimate rule because God, in whose image man is made, does not have legitimate sovereignty. It should come as no surprise that as the doctrine of evolution has invaded the churches, the idea of meekness before God has departed. With it has departed the idea of man’s legitimate rule over earthly affairs. Christians today are in full retreat almost everywhere.

I have noted that God is transcendent to, yet immanent to, His creation. Man, created in God’s image, occupies an analogical position in the creation. He is under many of nature’s laws, yet he is simultaneously above nature as God’s subordinate sovereign. Gilkey, the neo-

11. Chaps. 3, 4.

12. Chapter 18.

13. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

14. Ibid., ch. 42.

15. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

orthodox theologian, has called attention to this dual position of man.

History takes on meaning, then, when man not only sees himself as a creature in a “good” nature, but, more importantly, has distinguished himself from nature. He must realize that he alone among God’s creatures is not completely dominated by nature; he must become conscious of his own unique capacity for self-direction and meaning, and therefore of being in some sense transcendent to the repetitive natural order in which he participates. . . . If man is understood as totally out of relation to nature because he is regarded as purely soul or mind, or if man is understood as totally immersed in nature and so as purely creature, then no understanding of history arises. Greek idealism lost a sense of history because it could not understand the value of the natural world and of time [pure transcendence -G.N.]; Greek naturalism never achieved historical consciousness because it understood existence only in terms of the cycles of natural life [pure immanence—G.N.].¹⁶

Man’s tool of dominion over nature is law. God has established patterns of regularity in the mind of man (logic) and in the creation (natural law). He has also established ethical and social laws by His revealed word. Rebellious man cannot acknowledge the fact that God’s sovereign word undergirds natural law, human logic, and ethical (revealed) law. The self-proclaimed autonomous man cannot even explain the relationship between the logic of his own mind—especially mathematical logic—and the external universe he perceives, although his science demands that such a relationship exist.¹⁷ The work of the law is in men’s hearts (Rom. 2:15).¹⁸ God established His covenant with men, and His ordinances are continual (Jer. 33:25–26; Heb. 8:10–12; 10:15–17). Our universe is orderly (Prov. 30:24–28). It is orderly because God is its Creator (Ps. 136:6–9; Prov. 8:22–31). Therefore, He calls us to repentance: “Now therefore hearken unto me, O ye children: for blessed are they that keep my ways” (Prov. 8:32). “Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man” (Eccl. 12:13).

This is God’s universe; He does as He pleases with it. Here is the 16. Gilkey, Maker of Heaven and Earth, pp. 203–4. Cf. Stanley L. Jaki, The Road of Science and the Ways to God (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), ch. 1.

17. Cf. Eugene Wigner, “The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences,” Communications on Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>) Cf. Van Til, Christian-Theistic Evidences, Vol. VI of In Defense of the Faith (Den Dulk Christian Foundation, 1975), chaps. 6, 7.

18. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 3.

primary lesson from the book of Job. Nevertheless, men are to gain power over earthly affairs through the godly exercise of biblical law (Deut. 8). God covenants with men in terms of His law; though men violate His statutes, yet He still shows mercy to many, as chapters 5–8 of the epistle to the Romans indicate. God’s covenant, through grace, is sure, for man can safely trust in God’s word. Because of Christ’s sacrifice on the cross, God’s wrath is placated (Rom. 5:8). Men can therefore subdue the earth in confidence through God’s law (Gen. 9:1–7), for “the earth hath he given to the children of men” (Ps. 115:16).

G. Fall and Restoration

By breaking the law of God, Adam brought destruction to humanity (Rom. 5:12–21). Deny this historic event, and you deny the doctrine of original sin. Deny the doctrine of original sin, and man is left without an understanding of his desperate plight. He will think that his own efforts can bring him eternal life. Without a comprehension of the effects, both in time and eternity, of the ethical rebellion of man, it becomes impossible to appreciate the extent of Christ’s atoning sacrifice on the cross. Theological modernism, so closely linked with an evolutionary cosmology, has produced precisely this state of disbelief.

Man’s ethical rebellion took place in time and on earth. The death and resurrection of Christ also took place in time and on earth. The firstfruits of the new heaven and new earth are now manifested and will continue to manifest themselves in time and on earth. As men subdue their own hearts in terms of God’s law, they work out their gift of salvation (Phil. 2:12).¹⁹ God’s gift of sanctification, personal and social, is added unto His great gift of personal justification. God gives the increase (I Cor. 3:7). Every good gift is from God (James 1:17).²⁰ The possibility of the restoration of the external world is set before God’s people (Deut. 8; 28; Isa. 2; 65; 66).

The Fall of man involved a false claim of divinity on the part of man. Man, following the devil’s lead, came to the conclusion that his own word, rather than God’s, is ultimately creative. He made himself the judge of the reality of God’s word. He would stand between God and the devil to test which one was telling the truth. He made his own hypothetical neutrality as the standard of judgment. He wanted to determine good and evil (Gen. 3:5), for knowledge is always preliminary to the exercise of power. This was the sin of pride (Isa. 14:12–15). Such a path leads to destruction (Isa. 14:16–23). Man is supposed to think God's thoughts after Him, not attempt to be an autonomous creature. When man becomes humble in all his ways before God, victory is within his grasp, in time and on earth: "And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth: And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God" (Deut. 28:1–2). Or, in other words, "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6:33).²¹ Christ is given all power (Matt. 28:18).²² He gives power to us.

19. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

20. Ibid., ch. 35.

H. Time and Development

"And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. 9:27–28). History has meaning; it determines the place of each man in eternity. "Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (I Cor. 3:13–15).²³ History had a beginning (Gen. 1:1), and the fallen earth shall have an end (I Cor. 15).²⁴ Therefore, in absolute opposition to ancient pagan philosophies, the Bible teaches that time is linear. It is also limited. Only after the final judgment shall the burden of time be removed from this world (Rev. 10:6). God is the ruler of time.

Sanctification in a personal sense is a progressive process, after God has imparted the perfect sanctification of Christ to us at the moment of regeneration. Paul spoke of running the good race (I Cor. 9:24) and fighting the good fight (II Tim. 4:7). As with the individual

21. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 15.

22. Ibid., ch. 48.

23. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

24. Ibid., ch. 16.

who strives against sin in his own life (Eph. 6:10–18), so it is with Christian institutions and nations. The earth is to be subdued to the glory of God, not just in eternity, but in time—not just after the final judgment, but before it, when sinners are still alive on earth (Isa. 65:20).²⁵ History has purpose, direction, and meaning, precisely because God’s decree controls all events. Ours is a personal universe, not an impersonal, chance multiverse. Ours is a providential world. As Gilkey wrote: “Now in a world created by a transcendent and purposive God, such an ultimate coherence and significance is possible. . . . The belief that existence finds its ultimate origin in God sets each creaturely life in a context of coherence and significance impossible on any other terms. . . . And the sole basis for such a faith is the knowledge of the Creator. Without such knowledge, there is no basis for this context for coherence and significance, and without that context the meaning of life quickly evaporates.”²⁶ If a neo-orthodox theologian can see this so clearly, why is the doctrine of creation so neglected in the pulpits of the supposedly evangelical churches? This optimism concerning God’s decree in history made modern science possible.²⁷ Without faith in the possibility of progress, science loses meaning. By destroying the faith in creation, apostate science has almost entirely eroded the foundation of its own existence.²⁸

Because God’s eternal decree undergirds time, and because in His grace He assures His people that “all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose” (Rom. 8:28),²⁹ Christians need not fear time. Time brings with it the curses imposed by God as punishment for the rebellion of man, and not until death is finally subdued and the new heavens and new earth appear will time lose all of its characteristic burdens, but Christians are not time’s prisoners. Our citizenship is in heaven (Phil. 3:20). Unlike the pagans, whose chaos festivals like Mardi Gras and Carnival have symbolized a desperate attempt to escape time,³⁰ Christians are

25. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

26. Gilkey, Maker of Heaven and Earth, pp. 188–89.

27. Ibid., pp. 65–66. See also Jaki, Road of Science, chaps. 1, 6, 19, 20.

28. Cf. Gunther Stent, The Coming of the Golden Age: A View of the End of Progress (Garden City, New York: Natural History Press, 1969).

29. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 6.

30. For various examples of this attempted “escape from time,” see the works of the comparative anthropologist, Mircea Eliade, such as Patterns in Comparative Religion (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1958), pp. 399–407; Myth and Reality (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1963] 1968), chaps. 3, 5; Cosmos and History: The Myth of the told to walk circumspectly, redeeming the time, that is, buying it back, prolonging it, conserving it, and using it diligently (Eph. 5:16). It is a tool for one's calling, a gift of God to His people. It is a resource to be used efficiently for the glory of God, and not a burden to be escaped by means of ritual debauchery or bloody revolution.³¹ Time is therefore a means of production, not the justification for destruction.

I. Knowledge and Interpretation

I have already noted the scriptural instruction concerning God's wisdom as the foundation of the creation (Prov. 3:19–20). The revelation of God to man is the source of all human wisdom. Psalm 119, the longest chapter in the Bible, stands as the great passage dealing with the close relationship between wisdom and God's holy law: "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path" (Ps. 119:105). "Deal with thy servant according unto thy mercy, and teach me thy statutes. I am thy servant; give me understanding, that I may know thy testimonies" (Ps. 119:124–25). But it is in Job that we find most succinctly stated the basis of our knowledge: "But there is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding" (32:8).

Elihu, the youthful fourth companion who came to visit Job, challenged Job and the other three "comforters" for their failure to consider the ways of a totally sovereign God.³² Apart from God the sovereign Creator, no knowledge is possible. He has made all things, directed all events, and He comprehends all facts. We, as God's images, are to think God's thoughts after Him: "Behold, I am according to thy wish in God's stead: I also am formed out of the clay" (33:6). It is only by God's grace, Elihu announced, that we are given knowledge: "Why dost thou strive against him? for he giveth not account of any of his matters. For God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not. In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumberings upon the bed; Then he openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction, That he may withdraw man from his [man's] purpose, and hide pride from man" (33:13–17). God, through His gracious revelation, restrains the hands of evil men who are bent on destruction. He is not compelled to do so; His mercy is unearned by the recipients.

Eternal Return (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1954] 1959).

31. Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnmrro>)

32. North, Predictability and Dominion, ch. 5.

God finally replied to Job as Elihu had, announcing that He alone possesses original knowledge. He drove this point home by referring back to the creation; He is God the Creator:³³

Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding. Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? or who hath stretched the line upon it? Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened? or who laid the cornerstone thereof; When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy? . . . hast thou perceived the breadth of the earth? declare if thou knowest it all. Where is the way where light dwelleth? and as for darkness, where is the place thereof, That thou shouldst take it to the bound thereof, and that thou shouldest know the paths of the house thereof? . . . Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven? canst thou set the dominion thereof in the earth? Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds, that abundance of waters may cover thee? Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are? Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts? or who hath given understanding to the heart? (38:4–7, 18–20, 33–36).

The lessons of these latter passages in the book of Job were repeated by Paul: “For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counselor? Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen” (Rom. 11:34–36). As the Creator, He controls; as the Redeemer, He reveals. All things are known to Him: A Psalmist wrote: “I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvelous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them” (Ps. 139:14–16). God knows all things because He creates all things; His book sets forth what is or is not possible and actual. And in grace He redeems: “He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? he that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know? The LORD knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity. Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, o LORD, and teachest him out of thy law; That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity, until the pit be digged for the wicked” (Ps. 94:10–13). God has revealed Himself preeminently through His Son (John 1).

33. Ibid., ch. 6.

“Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me: for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world” (John 17:24).

Men are not autonomous from God; they are analogous to God. Their knowledge should therefore be analogical to God’s knowledge, that is, in conformity to His revelation concerning Himself, man, and the creation. Men are told that they are not the source of knowledge, because they are not the source of the creation. They have knowledge only to the extent that they think God’s thoughts after Him. Even in their rebellious thought, sinners can be said to see the world only in terms of borrowed capital. To use Van Til’s analogy, the child must sit on his father’s lap in order to slap his face. He wrote, “Christianity is the only reasonable position to hold. It is not merely as reasonable as other positions, or a bit more reasonable than other positions; it alone is the natural and reasonable position for man to take.”³⁴ Apart from God’s revelation, all men are blind. God, in fact, deliberately blinds the minds of some men, so that they will not see the truth and be converted; Christ specifically said that this is why He spoke in parables (citing Isa. 6:9–10 in Matt. 13:10–15). Sinful men want to believe lies, so God sends them lies (Ezek. 14:9–11; II Thess. 2:11–12). “All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works” (II Tim. 3:16–17). In all true knowledge there is grace. God the Redeemer is God the Creator. What He reveals is true because He created and sustains all things. Were He not the Creator, He could not be the Redeemer; His revelation could always be suspect—another possible interpretation in a random multiverse. In fact, His revelation of what He is and does would have to be false, since it is not compatible with a random multiverse. A God who is not the Creator is not the God of the Bible.

J. Ownership and Stewardship

God, as Creator, is owner of the universe. This is stated throughout the Bible, but especially in the Psalms. “The earth is the LORD’S, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein. For he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods. Who shall ascend into the hill of the LORD? or who shall stand in his holy place?" (Ps. 24:1–3).³⁵ "The heavens are thine, the earth also is thine: as for the world and the fulness thereof, thou hast founded them" (Ps. 89:11). Perhaps most famously: "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills" (Ps. 50:10).³⁶ This being true, then man, as God's image-bearer, possesses subordinate ownership: "The heaven, even the heavens, are the LORD'S: but the earth hath he given to the children of men" (Ps. 115:16). The foundation of ownership on earth is God's creation of the earth.

34. Van Til, Common Grace and the Gospel, p. 62.

1. Limited Rights

God places limitations on the exercise of the rights of property. Secularists, whether Marxists, Keynesians, or anarchists, do not acknowledge these restrictions. God requires a system of tithes, and the whole book of Malachi is devoted to an exposition of the ethical and social impact of tithe-rejection.³⁷ In the Old Testament economy, God placed restrictions on the practice of lending money, prohibiting the taking of interest from a poverty-stricken fellow believer (Ex. 22:25–27).³⁸ There is no indication that this restriction is no longer binding.³⁹ During the time that Israel served God as His throne, containing the tabernacle and the Holy of Holies, it was also illegal to sell the family's land for a period longer than 49 years; in the jubilee year, all land was to revert to the original owner or his family (Lev. 25:23–28).⁴⁰ "The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me" (Lev. 25:23). With the rending of the veil of the temple, which had separated the Holy of Holies, at the point of Christ's death (Matt. 27:50–51), this unique position of the land of Israel departed from God's economy, but the general ownership of the whole earth by God still holds true. Ownership is never autonomous. It is always covenantal.

35. North, Confidence and Dominion, ch. 6.

36. Ibid., ch. 11.

37. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

38. Gary North, Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1990] 2012), ch. 53.

39. Gary North, "Stewardship, Investment, and Usury: Financing the Kingdom of God," in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), Appendix 3. This is also reprinted in my book, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 31.

40. For an analysis of the Hebrew restrictions on the sale of land, see Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 28.

2. Personal Stewardship

Ownership thus involves personal stewardship. The use of property is bounded by the laws governing the various possessors: individuals, civil governments, private corporations, families, churches. Each has its own rules and regulations set by the Bible. None can ever be the exclusive owner, for no human or earthly sphere of life is exclusively divine. As Proverbs 20 through 29 indicates, men are to be charitable, industrious, honest, just; in short, they are to be faithful stewards of the goods that God loans or leases to them. Each institution or individual has some legitimate rights of ownership that may not be infringed upon by another human sovereignty. Ahab was not acting legally when he killed Naboth to steal his vineyard (I Kings 21:18–19),⁴¹ even though he was the king. God is the source of all wealth, not men, states, churches, or the devil (Deut. 8:18;⁴² James 1:17⁴³). Thus, when the devil offered Christ the world in return for Christ's worship of him, he was making an impossible offer (Matt. 4:9).⁴⁴ It was not his to give.

The cosmic personalism of the Bible's universe is obviously in total opposition to the autonomous multiverse of modern man. This is God's universe. He brings blessings and curses as He sees fit (Job 38–41),⁴⁵ but He has covenanted Himself to bring earthly blessings and troubles to communities (though not necessarily to individuals) in terms of their covenantal responses to Him. Deuteronomy 8 and 28 outline this relationship: blessings for obedience; curses for rebellion. All human sovereignties are derivative. All attempts to escape the limitations set by God on the exercise of property rights are therefore self-defeating.

K. The Good Creation

“And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day” (Gen. 1:31).⁴⁶ The creation was originally good. This included even Satan himself. At a point in time he rebelled. He then led Adam and Eve into

41. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

42. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

43. North, Ethics and Dominion, ch. 35.

44. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 3.

45. North, Predictability and Dominion, ch. 6.

46. Chapter 5.

this same path of destruction (Gen. 3). As Van Til pointed out so well, our parents in Eden were tempted to think of themselves as determiners of reality. They would test God's word to see if it would hold true. They placed their own logic and interpretation of the universe above God's interpretation. Thus, they viewed the universe as problematical and therefore God's word as problematical. They denied the absolute sovereignty of God's word over history and nature. It was this that constituted the Fall—knowing (determining) not only good and evil, but also knowing (determining) the possible and impossible.⁴⁷

1. Adam's Sin

Through Adam, sin entered the world (Rom. 5:12). Man's rebellion, like Satan's, was therefore ethical. It was not metaphysical, i.e., having to do with some abstract "being" or essential reality. It was not some flaw in man's being, but a willful rejection of God's sovereignty. It was an attempt to play God. It was a matter of purpose and will, not a defect in creation. Man did not slide into a lower realm of "Being in general"; he simply rebelled. Sin, therefore, is not a built-in eternal aspect of the creation. The fault was in the will of Satan and man: "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man: But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death" (James 1:13–15).

Man's ethical rebellion led God to curse the world (Gen. 3:17–18).⁴⁸ Men are now ethically blind and willfully rebellious (Rom. 1). But this evil is restrained, as in the case of the Tower of Babel (Gen. 11:6).⁴⁹ It must not be regarded as a permanent phenomenon. The final end of rebellion is the lake of fire, into which hell, death, Satan, and all his followers will be dumped on the day of judgment (Matt. 25:41; Rev. 20:13–14). It is a place of true existence—the eternal reminder of the results of ethical rebellion, eternally glorifying God and His justice—but a place of utter impotence. But even as hell is only a temporary dwelling place of disembodied rebellious souls, so is heaven an equally temporary dwelling place for disembodied regenerate souls. Heaven is not a place of total bliss and perfection, just as hell is not a place of total desolation, for final bliss and final desolation come only after souls and bodies are reunited on the day of judgment (I Cor. 15:39–57). The souls of the slain saints of God are in heaven, John wrote, crying, “How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?” (Rev. 6:10). Yet even this scene is temporary, for evil is limited in time, however strong it may appear prior to the final judgment.

47. Van Til, Survey of Christian Epistemology, pp. 19–20.

48. Chapter 12.

49. Chapter 19.

2. Restoration in History

God has promised a final restoration of edenic bliss for His elect (Rev. 21; 22). Yet He graciously gives us a foretaste of this ultimate internal and external victory as an “earnest”—down payment—on our blessed hope. Isaiah 65 and 66 tell of a preliminary manifestation of the new heavens and new earth, prior to the day of judgment, for in these promised days of earthly peace, there shall be sinners still alive (Isa. 65:20).⁵⁰ Similarly, Ezekiel 37 presents us with the famous vision of the valley of dry bones. The dead shall be resurrected. But this passage can be interpreted in terms of spiritual death as well as physical death. In fact, it must be seen as applying to both forms of death and both forms of resurrection. Ezekiel was called to “Prophesy upon these bones”; it was a preaching ministry to the spiritually dead people of Israel. Men are spiritually dead (Luke 9:60); he who believes in Christ “is passed from death unto life” (John 5:24). Ezekiel 37 therefore promises an age of spiritual rebirth as well as a day of judgment and resurrection. “For this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit” (I Peter 4:6). Spiritual death is the foretaste of physical and eternal death; spiritual life is the foretaste of physical and eternal life. God promises to raise up the dead bones of the valley, spiritually and physically. The image loses its impact if either aspect is ignored.

Chapters 8–10⁵¹ and 12–14 of the book of Zechariah are deeply imbued with the spirit and language of external victory over evil. The restoration of godly rule is prophesied in all of its force and clarity. Restoration shall be in time and on earth; the rule of the saints on earth is a preliminary of the day on which men shall judge the angels (I Cor.

50. North, Restoration and Dominion, ch. 16.

51. Ibid., ch. 33.

6:3).⁵² The nations and their false gods will be utterly defeated, wrote Jeremiah (Jer. 10:10–11). These false gods “shall perish from the earth, and from under these heavens” (vs. 11). In Daniel’s explanation of King Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, we learn of the great kingdom stone of God: “. . . the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth” (Dan. 2:35b). Restoration is the promise of the prophetic vision.

How does God intend to bring this about? Not by some discontinuous political event, or some miraculous intervention into the daily processes of the world, but by steady spiritual progress. “For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?” (I John 5:4–5). The day of judgment itself is not a discontinuous event in the midst of some steady, relentless spiritual decline, but rather a discontinuous event which will have been preceded by long ages of spiritual and social sanctification (I Cor. 15:25–28), and which will have been briefly interrupted at the end by a rebellion of a tiny minority (“remnant”) of Satan’s host (Rev. 19:19–21). Then the whole creation will be restored.

For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us. For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope: because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body (Rom. 8:18–23).⁵³

3. Blessings in History

Outward ethical conformity to God’s Bible-revealed law brings God’s covenantal blessings. The very blessings will tempt those who are only outwardly obedient to forget God and violate His statutes. But the regenerate community will use His blessings to further His glory and expand His kingdom into all areas of life. Thus, special grace is necessary to maintain common grace's blessings. (By common grace, theologians mean—or should mean—the unearned gifts of God to all men, including the unregenerate. All men deserve death as a result of Adam's sin [Rom. 5]; life itself is a sign of common grace, that is, an unearned gift.) We learn in Deuteronomy 8 and 28 that the external world of nature responds in terms of a community's outward conformity to or rejection of God's law. Thus, as always, ethical questions are primary, not metaphysical questions of being. The creation itself is closely linked to man's ethical response to God. It was cursed when man sinned, and it will be restored progressively as men are conformed once again to God's legal requirements.

52. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 6.

53. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 5.

God makes it plain that His requirements are ethical rather than metaphysical. Magic is therefore rejected as a means of pleasing God. Men do not manipulate God by manipulating some aspect of the creation. The magical formula, "as above, so below," which undergirds astrology, divination, and other forms of ritualistic manipulation, is a false formula. Man is only analogical to God, not a participant with God in some universal "being." God requires ritual, but not ritual devoid of spiritual content. "Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Mic. 6:7–8). This is why God can promise external restoration; it will have been preceded by personal regeneration in the elect, and by outward conformity to the law of God by both the regenerate and the unregenerate.

L. Fatherhood and Adoption

As far as man is concerned, no more crucial distinction in the Bible exists: created sonship and adopted sonship. Men's eternal destinies rest upon this distinction. God has created all men. Paul, preaching to the Athenians, announced that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth" (Acts 17:26a), and therefore all men are brothers in the flesh. This constitutes the equality of all men in Adam—absolute total depravity, regardless of race or color—and it serves as the sole point of contact in all men for the message of the gospel, since all men are created in God's image. There can be no other point of contact, certainly not in hypothetically “neutral” logical proofs of God.⁵⁴ Paul preached to the pagans of Athens, not using logical proofs of God, but using an appeal to their common, but sinful, humanity.

The Christian goal is not the universal brotherhood of man on earth and in time. We already have the brotherhood of man; we have had it since Cain and Abel walked on earth. What the Bible calls for is the adoption of the elect into the family of God. It is no accident that the Gospel of John begins with a call to adopted sonship: “He came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God” (John 1:11–13). The regenerate “have received the Spirit of adoption” (Rom. 8:15). This is God’s greatest gift to individual men: ethical adoption by the imputation of Christ’s righteousness into God’s holy (set apart) family. “Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world; But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons” (Gal. 4:3–5).

Adoption is exclusively in terms of God’s total sovereignty and total predestination. “According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will” (Eph. 1:4–5). It could not be made any plainer than this. The children of God by adoption were chosen before the foundation of the world, even as God chose Jacob and hated Esau, before either was born or could do evil (Rom. 9:10–13). (The amazing fact, it should be noted, is that God loved Jacob, not that he hated the unregenerate, though unborn, Esau. Secularists and Arminians would paint the picture as a mirror image to the Bible’s: it seems astounding to them that God could hate Esau.) In short, wrote Paul, “They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed” (Rom 9:8).

54. For a Christian refutation of the so-called “proofs of God,” see Van Til, The Defense of the Faith, 4th ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: P & R, [1955] 2008), pp. 332–44; cf. Christian-Theistic Evidences. Van Til asserted that the premise of all human thought must be the sovereign, trinitarian, Creator God of the Bible. Anything other than this as an operating presupposition is simply argumentation from a void to a void.

God imposes a basic division between men. There is no universal gift of peace on earth, good will toward men. Jesus' own account of His ministry could not be any plainer: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household" (Matt. 10:34–36).

There are therefore two distinct brotherhoods, for there are two fatherhoods: God the Father-Creator of all men and God the Father-Redeemer of some men. God disinherited the sons of the first Adam; He adopts sinners because of the work on the cross of His own Son, the second Adam (I Cor. 15:45). All men are brothers metaphysically, a fact which, were it not for God's saving grace (Eph. 2:8–9), would unite all men in destruction. Not all men are brothers ethically; the brotherhood of the promise of grace is limited to God's predestined elect.

M. Creation and Covenant

The Fall of man was ethical, not metaphysical. The creation therefore was originally good. The concern of the gospel of God's grace through Jesus Christ is with adoption. This means that God's concern is exclusively covenantal. God covenants Himself with a chosen and exclusive people. He will be their God; they will be His people. He acts on their behalf as their sovereign monarch. He delivers them from evil. He intervenes in a special way in the history of His people. The so-called "two tables of the law" given by God to Moses were not separated in terms of two sets of five commandments each (with the second half—social laws—somehow less crucial than the first half, or spiritual commandments). The two tables were almost certainly two sets of the same ten laws, one serving as a copy for God the King, and the other serving as a copy for His covenanted people. This was the standard practice of kings in the second millennium, B.C.⁵⁵ God the sovereign monarch sets forth the terms of His treaty with His people; His people must respond in obedience, or else suffer the wrath of the monarch's hand upon them. (This is the meaning of both circumcision and baptism; an oath sign promising blessings to the faithful or wrath to the unfaithful.)⁵⁶

55. Meredith G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963), ch. 1.

56. Meredith G. Kline, By Oath Consigned (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1969). Kline is as superb in his studies of the meaning of covenant as he is appalling in his "frame-

The prophets, time and again, confronted the people of Israel with the claims of God. They recapitulated His dealings with them. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who delivered the captive people out of the bondage of Egypt, who led them into a promised land, now calls His people to repentance. The focus is on the history and provisions of the covenant. Stephen, in his testimony before his accusers, began with God's call to Abraham to leave pagan Mesopotamia (Acts 7:2). In terms of the rituals of the chosen people, God is primarily the God of the covenant. Ritually, He is only marginally the God of Creation. In only one biblical passage, Psalm 136, is the creation mentioned as part of the otherwise familiar recapitulation of God's covenant history.

This aspect of Bible history is in stark contrast to virtually all pagan and "primitive" (that is, degenerate) cultures. Pagans pay exclusive attention to the creation in their accounts of God's activities. The primary Christian and Hebrew festivals are associated with the Passover, that is, the exodus from Egypt. The first communion service held by the Christians was during the Passover (Matt. 26: 17–35). Paul wrote, "Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us: Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (I Cor. 5:7–8). The Passover feast was covenantal and ethical. The pagan creation festivals are exclusively metaphysical. They assume a common bond between God and man—a common bond of pure being. The Passover assumed a covenantal and ethical bond between God and His people; in the communion service, this is symbolized by the eating of bread and the drinking of wine. Christ's body and blood are symbolized, and men participate in His perfect humanity. They hope for the day when they shall be recreated and dressed in perfection like His body (Phil. 3:21). But we can never participate in Christ's divinity. God is fundamentally different from man.

The pagan festivals have basic similarities. They all are based on the idea that the world was created by God in a massive struggle with chaos. Creation was not out of nothing; it was the triumph of order over chaos. God therefore is said to confront chaos. The implication is that God, no less than men, faces zones of pure chance and unpredictability. He faces a world that is only partially known to Him. In other words, we are like God, only less powerful and less knowledgeable, relatively speaking. By reenacting the original creation, men believe that they can participate in the original pre-time event. Men can share the act of creation, thereby escaping ritually (and, some cultures believe, actually) the bondage of time. Saturnalia, Mardi Gras, and Carnival are all chaos festivals. Laws are broken, mores are violated, masks are worn, and men are revitalized from below. They become co-creators, co-participants with God in the act of original creation.⁵⁷ The creation, since it was not an absolute creation out of nothing by the fiat word of a sovereign God, can therefore be thought of as just one more finite event, however important. Paradise is to be reestablished through ritual chaos—total moral discontinuity—which brings back the age of gold.

work hypothesis" concerning the creation.

The biblical promise of the new creation is based upon the grace of a totally sovereign Creator. He restores men ethically. He puts His law in their hearts. This was the promise in Jeremiah 31:31–34; it was fulfilled by Christ (Heb. 8:9–13; 10:16–17). God's promises and His prophecies are being fulfilled or have been fulfilled in this age, the age of the church, the body of Christ. We can thus celebrate the covenant of God with the people of Israel, for we are called "the Israel of God" (Gal. 6:16).⁵⁸ Our celebrations are not disorderly, for they deny the existence of some metaphysical chaos confronting a limited God. Our rule is simple: "Let all things be done decently and in order" (I Cor. 14:40).

The celebrations of the church call us to acknowledge our total dependence, metaphysically and ethically, on the Creator God. He has covenanted with us out of mercy. We therefore do not celebrate the creation, for that act was exclusively God's as sovereign Creator. We had no part in it, due to the fact that we are the work of His hands. We do not participate in the acts of divinity, for there is an unbridgeable gulf between our being and God's being. The Son of God, through the incarnation, once walked on earth, perfectly human and perfectly divine, two natures in union but without intermixture. This is the foundation of our faith. Only through the greatest discontinuous event of all history—the incarnation of the Son of God—is man restored to wholeness. Christians therefore neglect the celebration of the creation, not because our God is not the Creator, but because He, and He alone, 57. See the references to the works of Mircea Eliade, footnote #30.

58. Roderick Campbell, Israel and the New Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Divinity School Press, [1954] 1982).

is the Creator. We do not attempt through ritual to participate in His divine acts or His divine being. We acknowledge the greatest of all distinctions, the Creator-creature distinction. And we announce, in confidence: "My help cometh from the LORD, which made heaven and earth" (Ps. 121:2).⁵⁹

Conclusion

The doctrine of the six-day creation lies at the heart of biblical wisdom. God initially revealed Himself as the Creator who created all things in six days. Christians can accept this or not, but if they do not accept it, they lose access to a worldview that is provided only by God in His Bible. This worldview offers them unique insights into the way the social and economic world works. Without this worldview, Christians wind up baptizing this or that humanist outlook. They find themselves ensnared in the contradictions of humanism.

59. This essay first appeared in The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, I (Summer 1974), published by Chalcedon, P. O. Box 158, Vallecito, California, 95251. At the time that I wrote the original version of this essay, the crucially important works of the Benedictine scholar, Stanley Jaki, were not yet in print: Science and Creation: From Eternal Cycles to an Oscillating Universe (Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, [1974] 1980); The Road of Science and the Ways to God (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978); and Cosmos and Creator (Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 1980). Jaki argued that without a concept of God, the Creator, and without faith in man's mind as competent to study the externally existent, orderly universe—faith in man as the image of God, in other words—there can be no scientific progress. Without a concept of linear history, there can be no scientific progress. Jaki, as a Thomist, was a philosophical realist. He accepted as valid the proofs of God, something Van Til effectively refuted, at least insofar as such proofs begin with the assumption of the validity of neutral, autonomous reasoning. Nevertheless, Jaki's extraordinary scholarship makes plain one fact: that all modern science rests on presuppositions concerning nature's regularities and also on the interpretive ability of men's minds that are "borrowed premises." Only by assuming the validity of an essentially Christian view of man and the creation have Western scientists advanced their disciplines. And where these premises have not been accepted, there has been no scientific progress. Jaki's studies, along with those of the French scholar, Pierre Duhem, constitute some of the most remarkable works in historical revisionism that have ever been written. Anyone who is not thoroughly familiar with them cannot be taken seriously as an historian of science. This, it should be understood, in 2012 includes the vast majority of those who call themselves scientists. They are abysmally ignorant of the historical and philosophical roots of modern science.

Appendix E

WITNESSES AND JUDGES

And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die (Gen. 2:16–17).

Good judgment. The Bible calls it wisdom. What is it worth to a godly man? This is what Solomon asked for (I Kings 3:9), and what the Book of Proverbs says is the most valuable asset that a person can seek (Prov. 1).

Adam was called upon by God to render good judgment. He was to exercise good judgment in three senses. The first sense was economic or dominical judgment, in the sense of technical and leadership skills, as a dominion man. Second, he was to exercise judicial judgment: to declare God's word in condemnation of God's enemies. Third, he was to exercise moral judgment. Most commentaries dwell exclusively on the moral aspect of Adam's fall, but the dominical and judicial are equally important considerations.

The development of good dominical judgment as a godly subordinate was basic to Adam's calling before God. It is basic to humanity, for basic to humanity is the dominion assignment (Gen. 1:28).¹ Adam was placed in the garden temporarily in order to develop his dominion skills and judgment: managerial, agricultural, aesthetic, technological, etc. Later, he was to begin the conquest of the whole earth. The garden of Eden was a training ground for him. It was not to become a permanent residence. He could not stay there forever. He was to move out of the garden and into the world at large, bringing it under dominion. The garden was only a temporary residence.

The essence of good judgment in both the economic and judicial sense is the ability to "think God's thoughts after Him" as an ethically dependent subordinate. Men are to exercise dominion over nature by remaining ethically subordinate to God. Men are creatures. They are not to strive to attain exhaustive knowledge, which is an incommunicable attribute of God. They are to strive to organize the knowledge they possess in terms of the presuppositions and explicit revelations that God has given to man concerning the creation. God holds men responsible for such intellectual and moral subordination. He rewards them for obedience. Thus, the starting-point of good judgment is man's affirmation of the reliability and ethically binding nature of God's word. When men do not start with this presupposition, they cannot hope to exercise good judgment for very long.

1. Chapter 4.

A. Bearing False Witness

The serpent tempted mankind in a very specific way. He first raised doubts in Eve's mind concerning the reliability of her husband's testimony to her concerning God's word. "Hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?" the serpent asked (Gen. 3:1). He quoted only part of God's word. Hadn't God opened up the entire garden to them?

Initially, she answered him properly. She told him of God's warning that they would die if they ate of one tree. So, the serpent escalated his attack: he denied that God's word is reliable. "Ye shall not surely die" (3:4). Then he made the accusation that God had a secret ulterior motive in establishing the prohibition: "For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil" (3:5). In other words, God is jealously monopolizing His position as the Lord of creation, a position that can and should be shared with others. Man, of course, should share in this lofty position, the serpent implied on behalf of Satan. He misled her, for Satan was the one with the ulterior motive: he believed that ultimately he should occupy God's position monopolistically.

Satan made a three-part claim: God's word is not what He says it is, God's position is not what He says it is, and the results of eating the forbidden fruit are not what God says they will be. In short, God is a liar. The heart of Satan's accusation against God was this: God bears false witness concerning Himself and the creation.

The phrase, "to know good and evil," implies power greater than mere intellectual comprehension. It implies the ability to determine good and evil, as Rushdoony has pointed out.² This is a God-like ability, and Adam and Eve desired it. So did Satan. Man hoped to make his own law, carrying out his will without interference from God or other men, and certainly without resistance from the creation. So did Satan. Neither man nor Satan achieved this goal.

Eve saw that the tree was good for food, for aesthetic pleasure ("pleasant to the eyes"), and for wisdom. She did not seek to confirm her new understanding of God's word with her husband. She sought autonomy of interpretation. She would test God's word for herself. She ate, and she gave her husband fruit to eat. The subordinate in the family took control of the situation. The results were predictable for those governed by God's word. Adam and Eve did not predict them.

Why did Satan begin by calling God's word into question? Because this was the essence of the temptation. The fruit was only the symbol; the reliability of God's word, and His authority to bring that word to pass, were the ultimate issues. Satan was challenging both. He was calling God a liar. He also was saying that God is not omnipotent: He cannot bring His word to pass. In short, Satan was saying that he was telling the truth, and that God was a false witness. Man had to decide. He had to make a judgment: Who was the false witness?

B. Two Witnesses

What modern commentators fail to emphasize, or even to recognize, is this: The temptation in the garden was fundamentally a judicial proceeding. Satan's agent was bringing a formal charge against God. The charge was bearing false witness. Yet this was more than bearing false witness; it was the charge of bearing false witness concerning God almighty. The serpent charged that God was not telling the truth about the "real" God. God later revealed to Moses that it is a capital crime to teach a family member to worship a false god (Deut. 13:6–11). Adam and Eve were the children of God was therefore deserving of death. But who would listen? To bring a charge of this magnitude against anyone, the accuser needs two witnesses (Num. 35:30). To begin his rebellion, Satan needed two witnesses to testify against God.³

Furthermore, who had the right to execute the death sentence?

2. R. J. Rushdoony, Genesis (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 2002), p. 35.

3. This is why Satan's rebellion probably began in the garden, not in heaven days before or even before time began.

Not the accuser. The witnesses have this responsibility: "The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hands of all the people. So thou shalt put away evil from among you" (Deut. 17:7). Satan needed at least two witnesses who had knowledge of the actual words of God before he could see his goal achieved, namely, the death of God.

Adam had been given God's instructions concerning the forbidden tree. He was the witness whose word was fundamental to the trial. Eve knew of God's instructions, but only because Adam had told her. She had not been present when God had spoken these words to Adam. Her testimony would have been based on "hearsay evidence."

Judicially speaking, God's word could not be legally challenged in this court, for there were not two witnesses. But Satan proceeded as if he were in a position to bring charges. He appealed to Eve, who then acted autonomously, and who subsequently brought her husband into the court as an implicit witness against God, for she gave him fruit to eat, and he ate. Adam never verbally confirmed Satan's charge. He did not verbally lie. He simply acted out his rebellion. But his act of rebellion constituted his testimony, for implicit in his eating of the fruit was a denial of the binding authority of God's word.

The Christian view of God is Trinitarian. God is three Persons, yet also one Person. Each Person always has the corroborating testimony of the others. Therefore, God's word cannot be successfully challenged in a court. Two Witnesses testify eternally to the validity of what the other Person declares. Each has exhaustive knowledge of the others; each has exhaustive knowledge of the creation. The truth of God's word is established by Witnesses. As the supreme Witness, God casts the first stone on the day of final judgment, and then His people follow Him in executing judgment.

The doctrine of the two witnesses also throws light on the New Testament doctrine of the rebellious third. In Revelation 8, we are told that one-third of the trees are burned up (v. 7), one-third of the sea becomes blood (v. 8), and a third part of the creatures and ships in the sea are destroyed (v. 9). A third part of the rivers are hit by the star from heaven (v. 10), and a third part of the sun, moon, and stars are smitten (v. 12). In Revelation 9, we read that angels in judgment work for a time to slay a third part of rebellious mankind (v. 15), to testify to the other two-thirds of the coming judgment, yet they do not repent (v. 21). A third of the stars (angels) of heaven are pulled down by Satan's tail (Rev. 12:4).

Why these divisions into thirds? Because for every transgressor, there are two righteous witnesses to condemn him. God's final judgment is assured, for in God's court, there will always be a sufficient number of witnesses to condemn the ethical rebels.

C. Instant Judgment

What was the primary lure of this particular fruit? It would make men wise. But what kind of wisdom was this? It was the wisdom given to Solomon by God: the ability to make wise judgments. Satan's promise was that men would be able to determine good and evil and then act upon the information. On the other hand, God had told man that he was to avoid the tree, and by implication, to avoid the quest for instant illumination, meaning instant authority as a judge. But man did not obey. He did not want to wait.

How was man to achieve good judgment? By conforming himself to God's word. Man was and is required first and foremost to obey God's word. This requirement applied both to his role as a judge, declaring good and evil, and in his role as a dominion man, working out the implications of God's word, in time and on earth. In terms of his role as a subordinate sovereign over nature, he was to attain good judgment by bringing the whole world into subjection to God. When we are speaking of making economic judgments, we say that over time—possibly a lengthy period of time—man's skills in conforming his actions to God's standards would have progressively developed in him the judgment he needed.

In his role as a judge, on the other hand, man's field of testing was limited by God: to stay away from just one tree during a period of testing. Do this, the test implied, and you will eventually attain good judgment. Adam should have joined with Eve in trying and executing the serpent. That was his role as judge: to render judgment. Instead, they rendered judgment against God. They ate the forbidden fruit.

Adam could have achieved a position as a law-abiding, God-appointed judge by the end of the day, for he had another option: to eat of the tree of life. This would have served as a visible, public affirmation of man's belief in God's word. Eternal life is attainable only from that tree. By eating of the tree of life, man would have declared ritually that he was subordinating himself wholly to God, relying wholly upon God's word concerning the true way of life. Eating a meal from the tree of life would have meant communion with God—a ritual communion meal, eaten in faith while God was physically absent.

The moment that Adam and Eve had eaten from that tree, the ethical test—the test of Adam as a judge—would have been over. The possibility of death would have been removed. On the day that they ate of the tree of life, they could not have died. The penalty of eating from the forbidden tree would have been removed. Without a penalty, there is no law.

In all likelihood, God would have returned to judge Satan at this point. Adam's test would have been over. God would have declared the forbidden tree "on limits." Satan's trial would have been held on this day of judgment. There would have been no need for God to have retained His prohibition after His return to the garden and after the trial, for their ethical temptation would have been over. But as the final Judge, He would have had to declare His acceptance of their provisional judgment against Satan and Satan's interpretation of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.

By conforming themselves ritually to God's word concerning eternal life, they would have attained man's assigned goal of rendering judgment against the serpent. But then they could not have attained their preferred goal: autonomous judgment. The issues were autonomy, the question of the reliability of God's word, and the authority to render final judgment concerning that word.

D. Witness: An Inescapable Office

The drama in the garden was a courtroom drama. We commonly speak of the garden as a "trial" for Adam, in the sense of a test; it was also a trial in a judicial sense. There was an intruder in the garden. He was tempting them to commit a capital crime—in fact, a crime doubly capital in its offensiveness: eating the forbidden fruit and perjuring themselves in a court of law regarding another person's commission of a capital crime. The penalty for committing perjury is the punishment that would have been imposed on the innocent victim (Deut. 19:16–19).⁴

Satan's charge, had he been able to prove it, would have required the death of God. This would have left Satan as the most powerful being in the universe, the one who renders final judgment. It was their responsibility to avoid all further contact with this intruder until they could bring formal charges against him when God returned. He had tempted them to deny the word of God and become false witnesses. He deserved death.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

Inevitably, they would have to testify. They were witnesses. Adam had witnessed God's word, and Eve had witnessed the serpent's. Eve should have gone to her husband and openly asked him what God had said. If she still had doubts, she should have waited for God to return to repeat His law. Had Eve remained faithful to her husband's word, she would have joined with him to try, condemn, and execute the serpent.

Had Adam served as a righteous witness, he would have asked the serpent to repeat the interpretation of God's word, which it had given to Eve (unless Adam had been silently present with her during the temptation). Then Adam would have issued judgment against the serpent and crushed his head.

They could testify against God or against Satan, but they could not escape testifying. God subpoenas all witnesses. From the moment of temptation, man became a witness. This is the heart of the experience in the garden: man had to serve as a witness against Satan before he could serve as a judge of the angels (I Cor. 6:3). This is also the experience of mankind throughout history, with some men testifying for Satan and against God, hoping to become autonomous judges, and others testifying against Satan and for God, hoping to become subordinate judges. Before becoming judges, men must first exercise judgment concerning which kind of witness they will be. They must also decide whose court it is, and who the prosecutor is. Most important of all, who is the presiding judge: God, Satan, or man?

If they testified against the serpent, and he was convicted, they would also have to execute justice against him. They would crush his head. It is clear why God established stoning as the normal mode of execution in a covenantal commonwealth. Stoning is the symbolic equivalent of head-crushing. To crush the convicted person's head is to destroy him. Also, the witnesses for the prosecution must take full responsibility for their testimony. This is the requirement of God for human courts, and it was the requirement in Eden. Bringing charges against Satan, they would have to execute the Judge's judgment.

There was no escape from the ethical obligation to witness against Satan and for God. There still isn't. There is also no escape from the ethical duty of crushing the head of the serpent (Gen. 3:15). It is done progressively, through cultural dominion. Man will eventually judge the angels.

Man is to crush the head of the serpent, and redeemed man does so as he witnesses against Satan, but now man is vulnerable to the bite of the serpent (Gen. 3:15). This would not have been true if Adam and Eve had executed the serpent. They should have then celebrated a communion meal at the tree of life. They should have awaited God's return, when they should have served as witnesses against Satan, telling God of the testimony of Satan's agent, the serpent.

Final judgment was delayed. They had to wait for God to return in order to obtain judgment. There had to be a trial. This delay was part of what repelled them. They wanted to declare instant judgment, and they believed that they could do this only by siding with Satan and eating from the forbidden tree immediately. They ate, thereby becoming witnesses for Satan. Their eyes were immediately opened, as promised by Satan—his partial word of truth—but they still had to wait on God. They wanted to become autonomous judges instantly, but they could not achieve their goal. They had to wait for God to return, for only God can declare final judgment.

E. Judicial Robes

Their immediate response to their new condition—at this point, an ethical condition, not yet a physical condition—was to sew fig leaves together to cover themselves. They needed a covering because of their shame. They could no longer work together without coverings. Their sin had interfered with the division of labor between them. I suspect that they worked separately, not as a team. This is an explanation which is most consistent with the nature of their rebellion: they hid from each other until their coverings were in place. Their sin alienated them ethically from God and from each other, as God's images. They sewed fig leaves together; they were probably not working together. Their ability to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant in the God-designed division of labor was compromised by their perception of their nakedness.

It took time to sew these fig leaves together. They worked, not to subdue the earth, but to cover their shame. Rather than working together in their first joint project on their first day of independent labor, in all likelihood, they worked separately. It was each for his own glory—or at least lack of shame—that they worked. Man's imitation glory is simply a make-shift covering, a hoped-for lack of shame.

Why did they think they needed clothing? Shame is specifically mentioned in the text. But shame over what? Vulnerability? What kind of vulnerability? Was it their fear of God? If they were afraid of God, they needed protection. They still had access to protection: the tree of life. What seems astounding in retrospect is that they did not make a mad dash for the tree of life. God later closed the garden to them, and set a flaming sword in front of it, specifically to keep them from eating from the tree of life and gaining immortality (Gen. 3:22). The tree of life still retained its life-giving power. Why did they refuse to eat during God's physical absence?

We come to the heart of man's sin when we answer this question. Man would have had to subordinate himself to God's word in order to receive eternal life. They saw that they were naked. Their eyes had been opened. The serpent's word was partially fulfilled. God had not told them about this aspect of the tree of knowledge, and now the serpent was apparently vindicated. However, the second half of the serpent's word had yet to be fulfilled, namely, that on the day that they ate, they would not surely die. But God had said that they would die. So, the partial fulfillment of Satan's word—having their eyes opened—was insufficient to prove the case. This was merely the serpent's additional information vs. the silence of God. The crucial test was still undecided. What would be the outcome of the two antithetical words? Would the rebels die before the day was over?

The serpent had said that they would not die. Why would they believe such a thing? Because God is immortal. By implication, becoming as God would mean that they, too, were immortal. Would they not participate in the very being of God? Would not His attributes become theirs, including immortality? This temptation, James Jordan said, is the origin of the chain of being philosophy.

They were still clinging to their false witness. They would not admit that the serpent was lying, that God's word was sure. They did not go directly to the tree of life while there was still time remaining prior to the judgment of God. They refused to admit ritually that the day was not yet over, that God would surely come in judgment and slay them as He had promised. Instead, they spent their time making coverings for themselves. It was a question of saving their skins or covering their hides. They chose to cover their hides. Their pride condemned them.

Jordan argued that they sensed their need for coverings because they understood a judge's need for a robe. The robe in the Bible is a robe of judicial office. Joseph's long, sleeved robe (sometimes translated "coat of many colors") from Jacob was just this kind of robe (Gen. 37:3). It signified his authority over his brothers. When he told them of his dream that they would bow down to him (37:5–11), they stripped him of his robe (37:23) and tore it up (37:32). They refused to tolerate his authority over them. They cast him into a pit, and the pit was in the wilderness (37:22)—another familiar Bible theme.

Robes are given by God or those who are God's lawful subordinates. Adam and Eve wanted to manifest their self-appointed authority as judges, but without robes, they were visibly usurpers. They had judged God's word. By implication, they had to judge God and execute the sentence. Yet they were naked. A naked judge is not in a position to render judgment.

Adam and Eve were naked, not because they were sinless, but because they were children. As they matured, they would have been given clothing by God as a sign of their maturity, and as a sign of their authority as judges. Now that they had autonomously and prematurely grabbed judicial authority, they felt compelled to sew coverings for themselves. They were the image of God, and God wears clothing. He wears the glory cloud. In Daniel 8:9, the Ancient of Days is adorned in a white robe. In Revelation 1:13, the son of man has a robe that covers his feet. But God is not a sinner in need of covering. He is a judge who wears a robe. They, too, wanted to wear such robes.

It is significant that God in His mercy killed animals and made coverings for them. He simultaneously saved their skins (temporarily) and covered their hides, but only by sacrificing the life of an animal whose hide became man's covering. They were covered physically because of the shed blood of one or more animals. Their physical shame was temporarily removed from sight. (Ultimately, the shame of death can no longer be successfully hidden by clothing.) But this act of slaying the animal pointed to the necessity of the death of an innocent victim to cover man ethically.

Perhaps they were too ashamed to be seen running for the tree of life. They may have decided to clothe themselves before heading in the direction of the tree. They may have believed that, with their coverings, they would not be ashamed in front of each other or the serpent; they could eat of the tree of life after their coverings were in place. "First things first."

Prior to the judge's rendering of final judgment, witnesses can change their testimony. If they have perjured themselves, they must admit their guilt, but they can avoid the penalty by throwing themselves before the mercy of the court. They incur shame, but they avoid the penalty for perjury. But Adam and Eve would not accept shame. Rebellious man never does. They preferred to risk the penalty. Rebellious man always does.

They could have gone to the tree of life. They could have had a ritual communion meal with God. They could have attained eternal life. They refused. It was more important to cover their shame.

They had another option. When they heard God walking in the cool of the day, they could still have run to him and admitted their guilt. Instead, they hid from him, thereby abandoning their last opportunity to escape the penalty.

F. The Judicial Process

Immediately upon His return, God began His investigation. He looked at the evidence. They were wearing fig leaves. He concluded that their eyes were open. This meant that they had eaten from the forbidden tree (3:11). Adam admitted that he had eaten, but first he blamed his wife. He refused to take the blame by himself. Misery loves company. He wanted the “bone of his bone” to suffer the penalty, too.

Then God asked Eve about what she had done. She blamed the serpent. In effect, both Adam and Eve blamed their environment, which God had made. They blamed God indirectly. But neither wanted to suffer the penalty alone.

This is the response of ethical rebels. It is not a godly response. What did Christ say? “Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends” (John 15:13). He accepted the full punishment. This is what Isaiah said the messiah would do for Israel: “Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed” (Isa. 53:4–5). What is rebellious men’s response? Isaiah points to shame: “He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not” (52:3). Men hide their faces in shame, just as our parents did in the garden.

God judged the serpent without asking him to testify. No cross examination was necessary. Adam had admitted guilt; Eve had blamed the serpent. He had lured them into sin. The serpent had nothing to say in his defense. The serpent stood condemned. Soon he would crawl condemned. God had seen and heard. But God did not declare final judgment against the serpent. He declared definitive judgment and announced a provisional penalty: the serpent would crawl on its belly and eat the dust of the ground. Eventually, its head will be crushed by the promised man (Gen. 3:15). There will be a final judgment. But Satan now has no response to give in God's court. He has been definitively condemned along with his covenantal agent.

What we see in the story of the garden is that God gives men time to repent and become faithful witnesses to the validity of God's word. But, once the final verdict is rendered, there is no escape. Men are cast out of the garden and away from the tree of life. They cannot attain eternal life through a return to the physical garden and a physical tree. Once God pronounces judgment, man's destiny is sealed.

The day in the garden is symbolic of each man's life on earth, as well as mankind's stay on earth prior to the final judgment. There is still time to repent of the act of bearing false witness against God. There is time to eat the tree of life. This is what the communion meal means: a ritual meal eaten in the spiritual presence of God, before He returns physically to render final judgment. When He returns physically, it is the time of final judgment, just as when He draws near spiritually (for example, in the glory cloud in Old Testament times), it is a time of provisional judgment. Ungodly men hide; godly men rejoice. God delays rendering final judgment for mercy's sake. He did so in the garden, and He does so today. But He will eventually return. The time of mercy will end.

G. Rendering Provisional Judgment

Man wanted to render autonomous judgment. He also wanted to render instant judgment. Eve had the authority to kill the serpent, who was an invader. She could have gone to Adam to tell him to render judgment. They had the authority to crush its head. They were to defend the garden's boundaries.⁵ They chose not to do their duty as

5. In the 1987 edition of this book, I argued that they should have waited for God to return before rendering judgment against the serpent. But, as guardians of the garden, they had the authority to crush the serpent's head. They could lawfully render instant judgment against Satan's agent. They would have to wait until God's return in order to serve as witnesses against Satan by justifying their crushing of the serpent's head.

God's delegated agents. They refused to act as His agents. They instead chose to test His word.

Had they done their duty, God would have rendered judgment against Satan. They could have testified that the serpent told them to eat of the tree. They possessed lawful authority to crush its head. But they had neither the authority or the power to crush Satan's head. That was God's authority and power to execute. They were witnesses to what the serpent had said. They would have to wait on God to testify against Satan in God's court.

God spared the serpent's life. He spared Satan's life. He spared Adam's life and Eve's. The drama of the garden would be repeated again and again in history. More temptations would come. Men would serve as witnesses and judges, executing either God's judgment or their own.

The reason why man today can execute judgment provisionally is because he is made in God's image (Gen. 9:5–6). God has declared His judgment against sin in His word. This was a definitive declaration. He brings His judgment to pass in history. This is His progressive judgment. He will declare and execute judgment at the end of time. This is His final judgment. Men can therefore render provisional judgment because God has declared His judgment and His standards of enforcement in His law. He declared Himself definitively to Moses, as He had to Adam. Men are therefore called to render earthly, provisional judgment in God's name, as His lawful subordinates. But they must render honest judgment in terms of His law.

The temptation in the garden was in the form of a judicial proceeding. So is all of life. We are to render provisional, subordinate judgment in every area of life. We are to master God's Bible-revealed law so that we can render honest judgment, just as Adam and Eve should have rendered provisional judgment against the serpent in the garden by avoiding him and the forbidden tree before God returned physically to render final judgment.

Man wanted to be able to render autonomous, instant judgment. He ate of the forbidden tree. What he found was that final judgment is delayed. It is delayed against him, but it is also delayed against Satan. Satan remains man's enemy, bruising man's heel. God threw Adam and Eve out of the garden and banned their return to it physically, in time and on earth. But He offered them grace and a promise: Man will eventually crush the head of the serpent by steadily overcoming Satan's kingdom in time and on earth. Redeemed men will witness against him formally, in the court of life, and then execute judgment against him. But now the delay in God's physical return is more than one afternoon. Rebellious man declared instant judgment against God and for Satan; redeemed man must now struggle against Satan and the works of Satan's people, developing his good judgment over time.

Man must serve as a judge in history. He must declare judgment progressively in terms of God's definitive judgment and the promised final judgment. Man is now outside the garden, which was to have served as his training ground before he entered the world at large. Now the garden is closed to him, and the earth is cursed. This cursing of the ground also delays man's judgment, under God. It takes longer to render judgment as he works under God to build up the kingdom of God, in time and on earth. He struggles ethically against Satan and physically against the thorns. Adam had hoped to be an instant judge, but only Satan was willing to promise him that option, and then only if he testified against God.

So, man's dream has been turned against him. Hoping to render judgment autonomously and instantaneously, he has had to render judgment subordinately and progressively. His dream of autonomy has also been thwarted. He can declare judgment against God under Satan, or he can declare against Satan under God. But he is a provisional judge, not a final judge. He is always under the overall sovereignty of God, but ethically he places himself under the judicial sovereignty of either God or Satan.

H. Standards of Judgment

What God has declared definitively must serve as man's standards provisionally, for man will be judged in terms of these standards finally. This points inescapably to the continuing validity of biblical law. Rebellious man will attempt to adhere to the dominion covenant by rendering judgment, but as he grows more consistent with his condition as a covenant-breaker, he will seek to declare his own standards, and to render final judgment.

There are two humanistic standards that covenant-breakers substitute in place of biblical law: natural law and positive law. Natural law theorists declare that man, as judge, has access to universal standards of righteousness that are binding on all men in all periods of time. These standards are therefore available to all men through the use of a universal faculty of judgment, either reason or intuition. In fact, to declare judgment in terms of such a law-order, the judge must exercise both reason and intuition, in order to “fit” the morally binding universal standard to the particular circumstances of the case. What is therefore logically binding becomes morally binding in natural law theories. What is logical is therefore right.

Positive law does not appeal to universal standards of logic in order to discover righteousness. It appeals to the particular case. Circumstances determine what is correct. In the United States, the legislature (Congress) declares definitively what the law is, and this becomes the morally binding code of justice. But the legislature has a rival: the judiciary. The judge interprets the law in terms of a written Constitution and also previous judicial declarations. In other societies, there is no such authority of the courts. Judgment finally becomes the true law, if “the people” (or the executive) are willing and able to enforce what the judge declares. In short, what the state can enforce is therefore right.

Neither the legislature nor the courts can escape the need to declare some sort of coherent (logical) standard, and neither branch of civil government can avoid the use of some non-logical human facility (intuition) to apply the law to specific cases. “Circumstances” do not speak with a universally clear voice, nor does “reason.” Both must get an answer to this question: By what standard? Autonomous positive law and autonomous natural law rely on each other. As Cornelius Van Til has said, each side makes its living by taking in the other side’s laundry. Both natural law theory and positive law theory are apostate. Both cry out together against the universally binding nature of God’s Bible-revealed law. Both sides define justice in terms of what man can discover and enforce, not in terms of what God has declared, has enforced, and will bring to final judgment.

It is more common for self-styled Christian social, political, and legal theorists to declare the doctrines of natural law. Natural law seems at first glance to be closer to a concept of eternal law made by God. Natural law theorists can also appeal to the fatherhood of God (Acts 17:26) as the foundation of their universal valid categories of law. But the fatherhood of God is a doctrine that condemns man, for it points to fallen man’s position as a disinherited covenant-breaker, not an ethical son. How can a disinherited son agree with an adopted son about the nature of their mutual responsibilities to themselves and to the Father, let alone agree about the final distribution of the inheritance? Did Isaac and Ishmael agree? Did Jacob and Esau agree? Did

Cain and Abel?

What was the “natural law” aspect of God’s prohibition against eating of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil? The serpent at first tried to lure Eve into eating by an appeal to what appeared to be a universal law. Hadn’t God said that they could eat of every tree in the garden? In other words, why not eat of this one tree? Eve replied appropriately: God has forbidden us to eat of this particular tree. This was a specific revelation to her husband. If she had stuck with her initial resistance, Satan would have thwarted his plans. If man had relied on natural law theory to guide his actions, he would not have offered even this token resistance to the temptation. The general law—eat from every tree—would have prevailed. It took God’s verbal revelation to warn them about the prohibited tree.

It is not surprising to find that those Christian scholars who have been most open in their denial of the continuing applicability of revealed Old Testament law have also been vociferous promoters of some version of natural law theory. Natural law theory offers them a time-honored, man-made covering for their shame, for they fear being exposed as unfashionably dressed in the eyes of their humanist colleagues. Natural law theory is the conservative antinomian Christian’s fashion preference in the world of fig leaf coverings. The “bloody skins of God-slaughtered animals”—the forthrightly biblical morality of Bible-revealed law—are just not adequate for him.

There was also an element of positive law in the temptation. The serpent denied that God’s sanction would come true. So, he was asking them to test the reliability of God’s word with respect to the sanctions. “Go ahead and test this. You’re in charge. See if I’m correct about the outcome.” Adam and Eve attempted to establish an alternative legal order by eating. They sought to impose a different outcome in history from the one God had declared.

Conclusion

The development of a godly sense of judgment takes many years. The emphasis of the Bible on the importance of training in the law is central to the question of godly judgment. “And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: And thou shalt teach them unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up” (Deut. 6:6–7). The mastery of God’s Bible-revealed law is fundamental for rendering righteous, provisional, subordinate judgment, just as it was on that first working day in Eden.

One of the main reasons why Christians are culturally impotent today is that, for well over two centuries, they have been taught alternative theories of law. They have been told that Christianity can survive under any system of law. The accent is on mere survival. There is supposedly no prospect of Christians' exercising godly rule in every area of life. Of course, we are told, Christianity cannot be expected to flourish under any system of law, not because of specific kinds of flaws in humanistic law systems, but because the church is supposedly impotent by nature in history. For many of those who believe that Christianity is doomed to historical impotence, there seems to be no reason to call forth ridicule, let alone persecution, on themselves by declaring that all humanists are wearing fig leaves, and that Bible-revealed law is the only way that God wants us to cover our nakedness, through grace. Meanwhile, they can buy an "off the rack" fig leaf wardrobe from the latest humanist collection—well, maybe not the latest, but a discount version that is only ten years out of date. "Better to be trendy ten years late than never to be trendy at all!"

Fig leaves do not stand up to the howling winters of a cursed world. When Christians finally learn this lesson, they will be ready to begin to exercise godly judgment.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(1982)

Economics

It is difficult to recommend a list of books on Christian economics, since the thesis lying behind my writing of this book is that the Christian world has neglected the whole question for three centuries. There is nothing on a par with Adam Smith's Wealth of the Nations or Ludwig von Mises' Human Action. The best we have available are collections of essays, monographs on certain topics, and one very introductory textbook.

The textbook is Tom Rose's Economics: Principles and Policy from a Christian Perspective (Mott Media). He co-authored (with Robert Metcalf) The Coming Victory (Christian Studies Center, Memphis, TN 38111).

I compiled a collection of 31 essays, An Introduction to Christian Economics, published by Craig Press in 1973. It is presently out of print. It is scheduled to be reprinted by the Institute for Christian Economics. I wrote these essays for several magazines and newspapers from the late 1960s through the early 1970s.

For those interested in Marxism, my out-of-print book, Marx's Religion of Revolution: The Doctrine of Creative Destruction (1968) might be useful. No one who makes a detailed study of socialism can afford to miss Ludwig von Mises' classic refutation, Socialism: An Economic and Sociological Analysis (1922), which is available from Liberty Classics (7440 N. Shadeland, Indianapolis, IN 46250). It was published in the United States by Yale University Press in 1951.

I offer a critique of the epistemology of modern schools of economic thought in my essay, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship (Ross House Books, P.O. Box 67, Vallecito, CA 95251). Two humanist books criticize the assumption of value-free economics: Walter E. Weisskopf, Alienation and Economics (E. P. Dutton, 1971) and Mark A. Lutz and Kenneth Lux, The Challenge of Humanistic Economics (Benjamin/Cummings), published in 1979.

Two issues of The Journal of Christian Reconstruction are devoted to the topic: "Christian Economics" (Summer, 1975) and "Inflation" (Summer, 1980): P. O. Box 158, Vallecito, CA 95251.

Books on economic development by the British economist, P. T. Bauer, are important: Dissent on Development (1972) and Equality, The Third World and Economic Delusion (1981), Reality and Rhetoric (1984), all published by Harvard University Press. He is the co-author (with Basil Yamey) of The Economics of Under-Developed Countries (Cambridge University Press, 1957). Bauer stresses the importance of freedom, the attitudes of citizens, people's willingness to sacrifice for the long run, and similar issues. He says that without the proper attitudes toward economic success and the freedom to pursue personal goals, long-term economic growth is unlikely.

Complementary to Bauer's books are Helmut Schoeck's Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (Harcourt, Brace, 1970) and Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City Revisited (Little, Brown, 1974). Both books point to the importance of the future-orientation of economic actors for the success of the economy. Banfield argues that economic classes should be defined in terms of future-orientation, not income or capital. My book, Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981), applies the insights of Schoeck and Banfield to the economy and politics.

The works of Wilhelm Röpke are very important, not simply because he was a fine economist (greatly influenced as a young man by Mises), but because his perspective was far more broad than virtually all other free markets economists. He asked the tough questions about the effects of market freedom on social institutions. He was interested in the moral foundations of freedom, not just in questions of economic efficiency. Most important are his books, A Humane Economy (1957), distributed by the Intercollegiate Studies Institute, 14 S. Bryn Mawr, Bryn Mawr, PA 19010; Economics of the Free Society (1963), published originally by Henry Regnery Co., Chicago; Against the Tide (1969), a posthumously published collection of his essays, distributed by I.S.I.; Civitas Humana (1948); The Social Crisis of Our Time (1950); and International Economic Disintegration (1942); all published in London by William Hedge & Co. (British books are most easily ordered through Blackwell's, Broad Street, Oxford, England.)

The books written by Murray Rothbard, the anarcho-capitalist, are all very clear, well documented, and powerfully argued. They include Man, Economy and State (1962), America's Great Depression (1963), and What Has Government Done to Our Money? (1964), available from the Foundation for Economic Education, Irvington, NY 10533. His book denying the legitimacy of all civil government is very good on the economic effects of various kinds of government regulation and taxation: Power and Market: Government and the Economy (1970).

F. A. Hayek's books are basic to any understanding of the free market. The most important are: The Road to Serfdom (1944), The Constitution of Liberty (1960); Individualism and Economic Order (1948); Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (1967); and the trilogy, Law, Legislation and Liberty (1973–80), all published by the University of Chicago Press. Also important is his study of the rise of socialist thought, The Counter-Revolution of Science (1952), which has been reprinted by Liberty Press.

By far the best book on the economics of information is ex-Marxist economist, Thomas Sowell: Knowledge and Decisions (Basic Books, 1980), which provides more unique insights, page for page, than any economics book I have ever read. His Race and Economics (David McKay Co., 1975) is also very good, as are Markets and Minorities (1981) and Ethnic America (1981), both published by Basic Books.

Two books by Bettina Greaves are suitable for an introduction to free market thought: Free Market Economics: A Syllabus and Free Market Economics: A Basic Reader, published by the Foundation for Economic Education. FEE also publishes the monthly magazine, The Freeman (subscription by request, free). Address: Irvington, NY 10533.

Very important are the works of R. J. Rushdoony, which are related to questions of economics: The Institutes of Biblical Law, Vol. I (Craig Press, 1973), and Vol. II (Ross House Books, P.O. Box 67, Vallecito, CA 95251); Politics of Guilt and Pity (1970) and The One and the Many (1971), both published by Thoburn Press, P.O. Box 6941, Tyler, TX 75711. Also important for political and social theory is The Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (1969), also published by Thoburn Press.

The sociologist Robert Nisbet has written many books that are important for social theory, including The Quest for Community (Oxford University Press, 1952), The Sociological Tradition (Basic Books, 1966), Tradition and Revolt (Vintage, 1969), Social Change and History: Aspects of the Western Theory of Development (Oxford University Press, 1969), The Social Philosophers: Community and Conflict in Western Thought (Crowell, 1973), Twilight of Authority (Oxford University Press, 1975), and History of the Idea of Progress (Basic Books, 1980). Nisbet is a pluralist and decentralist, in marked contrast to so many sociologists. His essay, "The Year 2000 and All That," Commentary (June, 1968), is important for its investigation of the fascination of the coming of the third millennium, A.D., in Enlightenment thought.

Evolution

Gertrude Himmelfarb's book, Darwin and the Darwinian Revolution (1959) created a kind of revolution itself. It is very good on mid-nineteenth-century British thought, and why Darwin appealed to that culture. Reprinted by Peter Smith, Gloucester, MA 01930.

Philip Appleman's Darwin: A Norton Critical Edition (Norton, 1970), is very important because of its extracts from Darwin's major works, as well as contemporary criticisms and evaluations of Darwin. It also includes modern evaluations. Conclusion: man must now take control over the evolutionary process.

Henry Morris' book, The Troubled Waters of Evolution (C. L. P. Publishers, P.O. Box 15666, San Diego, CA 92115), ch. 2, has many citations from modern evolutionists who have adopted the "man, the animal, becomes man, the predestinator" paradigm. It becomes obvious, after reading pages of these citations, that evolutionism is a religion.

On the coming of Darwinism, see the biography of William Irvine, Apes, Angels, and Victorians (McGraw-Hill, 1955); Charles Coulston Gillispie, Genesis and Geology: The Impact of Scientific Discoveries Upon Religious Beliefs in the Decades Before Darwin (Harper Torchbook, [1951], 1959); Francis C. Haber, The Age of the World: Moses to Darwin (Johns Hopkins University Press, 1959); and Stephen Toulmin and June Goodfield, The Discovery of Time (Harper Torchbook, 1965). Also useful is Robert Nisbet's book, Social Change and History (Oxford University Press, 1969). He deals with "development" as an idea and an ideal in Western thought. Loren Eiseley's Darwin's Century: Evolution and the Men who Discovered It (Anchor, [1958] 1961) is important, especially for the chapter on Alfred R. Wallace, the co-discoverer of natural selection, who concluded that man's mind could not have evolved by slow, steady steps.

On the humanistic implications of evolution, see George Gaylord Simpson, The Meaning of Evolution (Yale University Press, [1949] 1967) and This View of Life (Harcourt, Brace, 1964). Simpson gives us most of the clichés of modern humanism. Any he may have neglected are provided by Sir Julian Huxley, in Knowledge, Morality, and Destiny (Mentor, 1957), and his essay, "Evolutionary Ethics," in Touchstone for Ethics, 1893–1943 (Harper & Bros., 1947). Theodosius Dobzhansky's The Biology of Ultimate Concern (New American Library, 1967) offers a clear introduction to man, the new divinity.

Indispensable, of course, is anything written by Lester Frank Ward, especially his 1883 classic, Dynamic Sociology (Greenwood Press). He used the idea that man has transcended animalistic evolution to promote the idea of a planned society. The new evolution will be a man-directed evolution.

On the importance of the doctrine of creation in the development of modern science, the works of Stanley Jaki are indispensable. Jaki argues that it was only in the Christian West, where men believe in linear time, that science ever developed. Cyclical time, which is the almost universally shared view in pagan societies, never has been conducive to scientific progress. Jaki's erudition and documentation are extraordinary. His works have been neglected by all but a handful of specialists in the historiography of science. His more easily available books include The Road of Science and the Ways to God (University of Chicago Press, 1978), a book that is slow reading but overwhelming in its impact; The Origin of Science and the Science of Origins (Gateway Editions, 120 W. La Salle, Suite 600, South Bend, IN 46624); and The Milky Way: An Elusive Road for Science (New York: Natural History Press, 1975). Extremely important is Science and Creation: From Eternal Cycles to an Oscillating Universe (Scottish Academic Press, 33 Montgomery St., Edinburgh, Scotland EH7 5JX) and the small book, Cosmos and Creator (Scottish Academic Press).

Also important are the works by the French scholar, Pierre Duhem. His 10-volume Système du monde, published from 1913 through the 1950s, presents a similar thesis to Jaki's books. English-language readers can read translations of two books by Duhem, The Aim and Structure of Physical Theory (Atheneum, 1962) and To Save The Phenomena: An Essay on the Idea of Physical Theory from Plato to Galileo (University of Chicago Press, 1969).

End of Volume 2

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON EXODUS

VOLUME 1

REPRESENTATION AND DOMINION

Other Books by Gary North

- An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)
Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)
An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)
Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)
Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)
Government by Emergency (1983)
Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)
75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)
Coined Freedom (1984)
Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)
Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)
Honest Money (1986)
Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)
Dominion and Common Grace (1987)
Inherit the Earth (1987)
Liberating Planet Earth (1987)
Healer of the Nations (1987)
The Pirate Economy (1987)
Is the World Running Down? (1988)
When Justice Is Aborted (1989)
Political Polytheism (1989)
The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)
Victim's Rights (1990)
Westminster's Confession (1991)
Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar
The Coase Theorem (1992)
Salvation Through Inflation (1993)
Rapture Fever (1993)
Tithing and the Church (1994)
Crossed Fingers (1996)
The Covenantal Tithe (2011)

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

Gary North

PART 1: REPRESENTATION AND DOMINION

An Economic Commentary on Exodus 1-19

Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus

Part 1: Representation and Dominion

Formerly: Moses and Pharaoh: Dominion Religion vs. Power Religion

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Third Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book is dedicated to Julian Russell
the most rhetorically gifted pastor I ever had.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1: Part 1, Representation and Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Population Growth: Tool of Dominion (Ex. 1:5–7) | 12 |
| 2. Imperial Bureaucracy (Ex. 1:8–12) | 31 |
| 3. Rigorous Waste and Rigorous Socialism (Ex. 1:13–14) | 54 |
| 4. Illegitimate State Power (Ex. 1:15–16) | 67 |
| 5. Envy, Rumor, and Bondage (Ex. 2:11–14) | 76 |
| 6. Cumulative Transgression and Restitution (Ex. 3:21–22) | 83 |
| 7. The Optimum Production Mix (Ex. 5:5–7) | 92 |
| 8. Covenantal Judgment (Ex. 8:19) | 108 |
| 9. Original Ownership (Ex. 9:29–30) | 121 |
| 10. Total Sacrifice, Total Sovereignty (Ex. 10:24) | 129 |
| 11. Separation and Dominion (Ex. 11:7) | 137 |
| 12. Discontinuity and Continuity (Ex. 12:10–11) | 147 |
| 13. Unconditional Surrender (Ex. 12:30–32) | 184 |
| 14. The Rule of Law (Ex. 12:48–49) | 195 |
| 15. The Firstborn Offering (Ex. 13:1–2) | 230 |
| 16. The Psychology of Slavery (Ex. 14:12) | 237 |
| 17. The Metaphor of Growth: Ethics (Ex. 15:17) | 246 |
| 18. Manna, Predictability, and Dominion (Ex. 16:4–5) | 258 |
| 19. Imperfect Justice (Ex. 18:21–22) | 267 |
| 20. The Oath-Bound Kingdom of Priests (Ex. 19:3–6) | 280 |
| Conclusion | 284 |

Volume 2: Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 289 |
| 21. The God of Liberation (Ex. 20:1–3) | 305 |
| 22. Graven Images and Rival Civilization (Ex. 20:4–6) | 315 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 23. Lawful Title (20:7) | 343 |
| 24. Rest and Dominion (Ex. 20:8–11) | 359 |
| 25. Family Capital (Ex. 20:12) | 371 |
| 26. God’s Monopoly of Execution (Ex. 20:13) | 386 |
| 27. The Yoke of Co-operative Service (Ex. 20:14) | 398 |
| 28. The Rights of Private Property (Ex. 20:15) | 411 |
| 29. The Value of a Name (Ex. 20:16) | 450 |
| 30. Covetousness and Conflict (Ex. 20:17) | 477 |
| Conclusion | 494 |

Volume 3: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 513 |
| 31. Servitude, Protection, and Marriage (Ex. 21:2–4) | 541 |
| 32. Wives and Concubines (Ex. 21:7–11) | 568 |
| 33. Executing a Rebellious Son (Ex. 21:15, 17) | 598 |
| 34. Kidnapping (Ex. 21:16) | 602 |
| 35. The Costs of Private Conflict (Ex. 18–19) | 621 |
| 36. The Human Commodity (Ex. 21:20–21) | 634 |
| 37. Criminal Law and Restoration (Ex. 21:22–25) | 649 |
| 38. The Auction for Substitute Sanctions (Ex. 21:22–25) | 681 |
| 39. Freedom for an Eye (Ex. 21:26–27) | 703 |
| 40. The Ransom for a Life (Ex. 21:28–31) | 716 |
| 41. The Uncovered Pit (Ex. 21:33–34) | 745 |
| 42. Knowledge and Responsibility (Ex. 21:35–36) | 755 |
| 43. Proportional Restitution (Ex. 22:1, 4) | 765 |
| 44. Pollution, Ownership, and Responsibility (Ex. 22:5–6) | 800 |
| 45. Safekeeping and Liability (Ex. 22:7–9) | 871 |

Volume 4: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|------|
| 46. Caretaking and Negligence (Ex. 22:10–13) | 895 |
| 47. Seduction and Servitude (22:16–17) | 905 |
| 48. Oppression, Omniscience and Judgment (Ex. 22:21–24) | 932 |
| 49. The Prohibition against Usury (Ex. 22:25–27) | 970 |
| 50. Impartial Justice (Ex. 23:1–3, 6–7) | 1023 |
| 51. Finders should not be Keepers (Ex. 23:4–5) | 1040 |
| 52. Bribery and Oppression (Ex. 23:8) | 1051 |
| 53. Sabbatical Liberty (Ex. 23:9–12) | 1078 |
| 54. Feasts and Citizenship (Ex. 23:14–19) | 1092 |
| 55. The Curse of Zero Growth (Ex. 23:25–26) | 1115 |

| | |
|--|------|
| 56. God's Limits on Sacrifice (Ex. 25:3–8, 36:5–7) | 1140 |
| 57. The Economics of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:8–9) | 1159 |
| 58. Blood Money, not Head Tax (Ex. 30:11–16) | 1170 |
| 59. Sabbath Rest vs. Autonomy (Ex. 35:2) | 1180 |
| 60. The Ability to Teach (Ex. 35:31, 34a) | 1186 |
| Conclusion | 1195 |
| Conclusion to Authority and Dominion | 1231 |

Volume 5: Appendixes

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology | 1255 |
| APPENDIX B–The Demographics of Decline | 1283 |
| APPENDIX C–The Labyrinth and the Garden | 1320 |
| APPENDIX D–The Rule of Law and the Free Market | 1339 |
| APPENDIX E–The Economic Implications of The Sabbath | 1364 |
| APPENDIX F–Timing the Lord's Day | 1442 |
| APPENDIX G–Macaulay on Democracy | 1447 |
| APPENDIX H–The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost | 1453 |

Volume 6: Appendixes

| | |
|--|------|
| APPENDIX I–Pollution in the Soviet Union | 1535 |
| APPENDIX J–Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney | 1543 |
| APPENDIX K–Slavery in the American South | 1557 |
| APPENDIX L–Maimonides' Code : Is it Biblical? | 1574 |
| APPENDIX M–Victim's Rights vs. the Messianic State | 1638 |
| APPENDIX N–Covenantal Law and Covenantal Love | 1679 |
| APPENDIX O–Social Antinomianism | 1695 |
| APPENDIX P–The Hoax of Higher Criticism | 1712 |
| APPENDIX Q–The Restoration of Biblical Casuistry | 1734 |
| APPENDIX R–What is Covenant Law? | 1770 |
| APPENDIX S–What are the Case Laws? | 1795 |

PREFACE

This book was originally the first section of volume 2 of my series, An Economic Commentary on the Bible. The focus of this volume is on those aspects of Exodus 1–19 that relate to economics. Nevertheless, it is broader than a narrowly defined economic analysis, for biblical economics is broader than strictly economic analysis. The early nineteenth-century term, “political economy,” is closer to the biblical norm for economics; the late eighteenth-century term, “moral philosophy,” is closer yet.

It would be unwise for me to repeat the foundational material that I covered in Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis. In that book, I made the strongest case that I could for the existence of a uniquely Christian economics, especially with respect to epistemology: “What can we know, and how can we know it?” This volume is based on the epistemological foundation laid down in Sovereignty and Dominion. For those who are uninterested in epistemology—and there are a lot of you in this category—I can only restate my original position: it is not that there is a meaningful Christian economics among all other economic schools of thought; it is that there is only Christian economics. There is no other sure foundation of true knowledge except the Bible. The only firmly grounded economics is Christian economics. All non-Christian approaches are simply crude imitations of the truth: imitations that cannot be logically supported, given their own first principles concerning God, man, law, and knowledge. Biblical economics is therefore at war epistemologically with all other economic systems.

We can see this in the conflict between Moses and Pharaoh. This conflict was a conflict which involved every aspect of life, including economics. We need to understand the theological issues that divided Egypt from Israel in order to understand similarly divisive approaches to economics and political theory today. Economic disagreements today are closely related to the same theological divisions that separated Moses from Pharaoh.

There is no doubt that Pharaoh knew some things about economics. If we do not assume this, we can make no sense of his actions. He also knew a great deal about biblical law. But this knowledge only led to his condemnation, just as it does in the case of all other forms of non-Christian knowledge. The anti-Christians have enough knowledge to condemn them eternally, but not enough to construct a progressive long-term civilization. They have occasionally constructed long-term static civilizations, most notably Egypt and China, but only through the imposition of tyranny.¹

A. Using Humanists to Defeat Humanism

Similarly, modern economists have considerable knowledge about the workings of the market and the failures associated with all forms of central economic planning. But again and again, the officially neutral, value-free economists appeal to biblical notions of peace and prosperity. The idea of value-free science is a myth. So, it is time to take up where Moses left off: with a challenge to humanistic economics.

Readers will find that I cite the writings of many economists and social thinkers. I use their insights—insights that are stolen from the Bible when they are correct. When men come to conclusions that are also the conclusions of the Bible, we should use their discoveries. These discoveries are our property, not theirs. God owns the world; the devil owns nothing. We are God's adopted children; they are God's disinherited children. Therefore, I am quite willing to cite secular scholars at length, since I know that most readers have neither the time nor access to the sources to follow up on every idea. I do not expect the majority of my readers to master the intricate details of every scholar's argument, nor master my refutations or applications of their insights.

When we read Christian refutations of this or that writer in books written a generation ago, let alone a century or a millennium ago, we find that the reading is slow going. "Why did the authors spend so much space dealing with such dead issues?" we ask ourselves. The answer is simple: because when the books were written, those issues were not dead. Similarly, a hundred years from now, any readers who may stumble across this book will skim over most of its extended quotations. Few works of scholarship in one generation survive into the next, and the writers I cite or refute will be long-forgotten for the most part. Indeed, many of them are not well-known today. I am not devoting time simply to refute every erroneous idea in sight; I am using these citations as examples, as springboards to introduce explicitly biblical interpretations. The scholars I cite are very often foils for me; I want readers to know that such ideas exist and need refuting or reinterpreting.

1. Karl Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism: A Comparative Study of Total Power (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1957).

The most important thing is how well I integrate such humanistic insights into my biblical reconstruction of economics, without (1) losing the importance of these insights or (2) becoming a slave of the humanist presuppositions which officially undergird such insights. But this is the most important task in any field. Every Christian faces this problem. We buy and sell with pagans in many marketplaces, and one of these marketplaces is the marketplace for ideas. We must use their best ideas against them, and we must expose their worst ideas in order to undermine men's confidence in them. In short, in God's universe, it is a question of "heads, we win; tails, they lose."

B. The Outrage of the Christian Classroom Compromisers

It is important to understand from the beginning that the perspective expounded in this book is unpopular in academic Christian circles. Two economic ideas dominate the thinking of the modern world: the idea of central economic planning, and the idea of the "mixed economy," meaning interventionism by the civil government into the economy: Keynesianism, fascism, or the corporate state. Men have had great confidence in the economic wisdom of the state, at least until the 1970s. Most Christian academics in the social sciences still go along enthusiastically with some variant of this statist ideology. Thus, when they are confronted with what the Bible really teaches in the field of political economy, they react in horror.

Most amusingly, one of these interventionists has accused me of holding Enlightenment ideas,² not realizing that he and his associates are the true heirs of the dominant Enlightenment tradition, the tradition which exalts the state. When these "radical Christian" critics think "Enlightenment," they think "Adam Smith." They obviously do not understand the Enlightenment. When we look at the historical results of the Enlightenment, we should think “French Revolution, Russian Revolution, and President Franklin Roosevelt’s New Deal.” We should think “the glorification of the state.”

2. Ronald Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger, rev. ed. (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, [1977] 1984), p. 102.

The Enlightenment had its right wing, of course, and Adam Smith was in it, but he was heavily influenced by the moral ideals of Deism, which were in turn a pale reflection of Christian theism.³ But this individualistic tradition barely survived the revolutionary and statist Enlightenment heritage. What the successful bearers of the torch of the Enlightenment did was to set Europe on fire—in the name of liberty, fraternity, and equality. James Billington’s book has described it well: Fire in the Minds of Men (1980). It was the left wing of the Enlightenment which triumphed. When men deify mankind, they almost always wind up deifying the state, the highest collective of mankind, the apotheosis of man’s power. They become adherents of the power religion.

I reject all Enlightenment thought. This is why I reject most of what is taught in your typical Christian college. The baptized humanism of the modern Christian college classroom, especially in the social sciences and humanities, has led many people astray. This is one reason why I wrote my little book, 75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won’t Ask (1984). It is subtitled, “How to Spot Humanism in the Classroom and the Pulpit.” There is a lot of it to spot. The book is an antidote to baptized humanism.

What the typical Christian college course in the social sciences teaches is left-wing Enlightenment thought: naïve Kantianism, warmed-over Darwinism, armchair Marxism (especially his theory of class consciousness and the innate disharmony of interests), and the discarded economic policies of some Presidential administration of a decade and a half earlier. It is all taught in the name of Jesus, in the interests of “Christian social concern” and “relevant Christianity.” They fight that great bugaboo of 1880–1900, Social Darwinism (which hardly anyone has ever believed in), in the name of Christianity, but they do so by means of the same arguments that the founders of the dominant intellectual stream, Darwinian central planning, used against the Social Darwinists.⁴ They peddle the conclusions of the really dangerous brand of Darwinism—the Darwinism of the planning

3. Adam Smith, The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759), with a new introduction by E. G. West (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Classics, 1976).

4. The best introduction to the history of this subject is Sidney Fine, Laissez Faire and the General-Welfare State: A Study of Conflict in American Thought, 1865–1901 (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1956).

elite⁵—in the name of Christianity.

The hue and cry against my explicitly revelational Christian economics has been raised in the unread little journals of the Christian academic community.⁶ What has offended them most is the heavy reliance I place on Old Testament law. On this point, they are in agreement with the antinomian pietists: all such laws are no longer binding.⁷

Why this hostility to Old Testament law, or even New Testament “instructions”? Because Old Testament law categorically rejects the use of taxes to promote statist social welfare programs. It categorically rejects the idea of state power in coercive wealth-redistribution programs. Samuel warned the people against raising up a king, for the king would take 10% of their income (I Sam. 8:15, 17). He promised that the state would, in short, extract the equivalent of God’s tithe from the hapless citizenry. Today, most modern industrial civil governments extract four to five times God’s tithe. The tax policies of the modern welfare state are therefore immoral. More than this: they are demonic.

“Proof texting, proof texting!” cry the church-attending Darwinists of the college classroom. (“Proof texting” apparently means citing a biblical passage which undercuts their position.) These men think that John Maynard Keynes’ General Theory (which, in fact, they have never read, since practically no one ever has, so convoluted are its language and arguments) is the essence of permanent truth, on a par with Newton’s Principia (which they also have never read). On the other hand, they regard the Old Testament as “the Word of God (emeritus).”

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A.

6. See, for example, the essay by Thomas E. Van Dahm, professor of economics at Carthage College (which I had never before heard of), “The Christian Far Right and the Economic Role of the State,” Christian Scholars Review, XII (1983), pp. 17–36. He peddled another diatribe, this time against the biblical case for the gold standard, to The Journal of the American Scientific Affiliation, XXXVII (March 1984): “The Christian Far Right and Economic Policy Issues.” This journal originally devoted its space to essays critical of the six-day creation position, but then it branched out, publishing articles that deny the legitimacy of applying Old Testament biblical standards in many other academic areas besides geology and biology.

7. Van Dahm wrote: “This article did not deal with the basic issue of whether Old Testament laws and even New Testament ‘instructions’ are binding on Christians—and others—in contemporary society. A recent treatment of this issue, offering a definite ‘no’ answer I found persuasive is Walter J. Chantry’s God’s Righteous Kingdom . . .” p. 35, footnote 44. Here we have it: the defenders of power religion (statist planning) join hands with the defenders of escapist religion (antinomian pietism) in their opposition to dominion religion (biblical law).

Perhaps the most notable example of this sort of thinking is the “Keynesian-Christian” economist, Professor (emeritus) Douglas Vickers. He adopted Keynes’ economic theories in the name of Jesus, but he did not adopt Keynes’ economy of language. He did his best to refute my approach to economics with arguments such as this one: “. . . it is the economist’s task so to understand the deeper determinants of economic conjectures and affairs that his policy prescriptions can be intelligently and properly shaped toward their proper ordering, or, where it is considered necessary, their correction and resolution. This should be done in such a way as to accord with the demands of both those deeper causal complexes now perceived in the light of God’s word and purpose, and the requirements and basic desiderata of economic thought and administration.”⁸ This is what he substituted for “Thus saith the Lord!” His book did not go into a second printing. I can understand why not.

These scholars regard the Old Testament as a kind of discarded first draft. Now that God has wisely seen fit to revise it (that is, now that He has completely replaced it), they argue, it is wrong to appeal to it as the basis for the construction of a Christian social order.⁹ But Christian Reconstructionists continue to appeal to all Old Testament laws that have not been explicitly revised by the New Testament. So, the classroom scholars are outraged; they are incensed; they threaten to hold their breath until they turn blue if Reconstructionists keep writing books like this one. They have sounded the alarm. But nobody pays much attention to them. This enrages them even more. Their temper tantrums probably will get even worse. It is best to ignore them. They have bet on the wrong horse—the welfare state—and they resent anyone who tries to embarrass, let alone shoot, this aging horse.

C. The End of an Era

The fires of the Enlightenment are beginning to burn low. The civilization of the Enlightenment is losing confidence in its own principles. Perhaps even more important, it is beginning to lose faith in the future. The American historian-sociologist Robert Nisbet put it well:

It was belief in the sacred and the mythological that in the beginning of Western history made possible belief in and assimilation of

8. Douglas Vickers, Economics and Man: Prelude to a Christian Critique (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1976), p. 90.

9. See, for example, Vickers’ remarks to this effect: ibid., pp. 47–48.

ideas of time, history, development, and either progress or regress. Only on the basis of confidence in the existence of divine power was confidence possible with respect to design or pattern in the world and in the history of the world. . . .

But it is absent now, whether ever to be recovered, we cannot know. And with the absence of the sense of sacredness of knowledge there is now to be seen in more and more areas absence of real respect for or confidence in knowledge—that is, the kind of knowledge that proceeds from reason and its intrinsic disciplines. From the Enlightenment on, an increasing number of people came to believe that reason and its works could maintain a momentum and could preserve their status in society with no influence save which they themselves generated. But the present age of the revolt against reason, of crusading irrationalism, of the almost exponential development and diffusion of the occult, and the constant spread of narcissism and solipsism make evident enough how fallible were and are the secular foundations of modern thought. It is inconceivable that faith in either progress as a historical reality or in progress as a possibility can exist for long, to the degree that either concept does exist at the present moment, amid such alien and hostile intellectual forces.¹⁰

The leaders of this staggering humanist civilization have now adopted the strategy of every dying civilization which has ever lost the confidence of its citizens: they resort to the exercise of raw power. This was the strategy of the Roman Empire, and it failed.¹¹ This substitution of power for ethics is the essence of the satanic delusion. It is the essence of the power religion. It also is the essence of failure.

What will replace this phase of humanist civilization? Some version of the society which Solzhenitsyn called the Gulag Archipelago? As a form of judgment, this is possible. God used Assyria and Babylon as rods of iron to bring Israel to repentance. Or will it be the steady grinding down of freedom by the West's massive bureaucracies? This was Max Weber's vision of the future of the West, and it is not a pretty picture.¹² It has also come progressively true ever since he wrote his warnings from 1905 to 1920. Or will it be a new society based on a religious revival? Nisbet saw this as a real possibility: "Much more probable, I believe, is the appearance of yet another full-blown 'awakening,' even a major religious reformation. For some time now we have been witnessing what might properly be called the beginnings of such a transformation, beginnings which range from popular to scholarly, from eruptions of fundamentalism, pentecostalism—and, even within the Jewish, Roman Catholic and Protestant establishments, millennialism—all the way to what has to be regarded as a true efflorescence of formal theology."¹³

10. Robert Nisbet, History of the Idea of Progress (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 355.

11. Charles Norris Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture: A Study of Thought and Action from Augustus to Augustine (New York: Oxford University Press, [1944] 1957). (<http://bit.ly/cnccacc>). Reprinted by Liberty Fund.

12. Gary North, "Max Weber: Rationalism, Irrationalism, and the Bureaucratic Cage," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1976).

The time has come for a program of Christian reconstruction. Something new must replace humanism, from the bottom up, in every sphere of human existence. The dominion religion must replace the power religion. Humanism's world is disintegrating, both intellectually and institutionally, and it will drag the compromised Christian academic world into the abyss with it. That is where they both belong. Weep not for their passing. And if you happen to spot some aspect of humanism which is beginning to wobble, take an appropriate action. Push it.

D. Liberation from the State

Liberation theologians in the 1970s and 1980s kept appealing to the Book of Exodus as their very special book. Michael Walzer's study of Exodus called this assertion into question. Walzer's earlier studies of the Puritan revolution established him as an authority in the field. His study of Exodus argues that this story has affected politics in the West, especially radical politics, for many centuries. But it is a story which does not fit the model used by liberation theologians, whose enemy is the free market social order. As he said, the Israelites "were not the victims of the market but of the state, the absolute monarchy of the pharaohs. Hence, Samuel's warning to the elders of Israel against choosing a king. . . . Egyptian bondage was the bondage of a people to the arbitrary power of the state."¹⁴

The misuse of the exodus story by liberation theologians is another example of the misuse of the Bible generally to promote anti-biblical social, political, and economic views. This is why practical commentaries dealing with specific disciplines are needed. The Bible still commands great authority, and this public perception of the Bible's authority is increasing, especially regarding social issues. This willingness on the part of social critics to appeal to the Bible is itself a major break with the recent past, yet a return to a more distant past.

13. Nisbet, op. cit., p. 357.

14. Michael Walzer, Exodus and Revolution (New York: Basic Books, 1985), p. 30.

Prior to 1660, it was common for conservatives and radicals to appeal to the Bible to defend their visions of a righteous social order. Almost overnight, in 1660, this appeal to the Bible ended. Defenders of the free market appealed to logic or experience rather than “debatable” religious or moral views.¹⁵ Socialists and reformers also dropped their appeal to the Bible after 1660, again, almost overnight. Shafarevich wrote: “The development of socialist ideas did not cease, of course. On the contrary, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, socialist writings literally flooded Europe. But these ideas were produced by different circumstances and by men of a different mentality. The preacher and the wandering Apostle gave way to a publicist and philosopher. Religious exaltation and references to revelation were replaced by appeals to reason. The literature of socialism acquired a purely secular and rationalistic character; new means of popularization were devised: works on this theme now frequently appear under the guise of voyages to unknown lands, interlarded with frivolous episodes.”¹⁶

The exodus was a time of liberation—liberation from the statist social order that had been created by adherents of the power religion. The spiritual heirs of those statist Egyptians are now coming before the spiritual heirs of the Israelites with a new claim: the need to be liberated from the institutions of the once-Christian West. They offer chains in the name of liberation, bureaucracy in the name of individual freedom, and central economic planning in the name of prosperity. They offer men a return to power religion in the name of the God of the Bible. What this commentary offers, in contrast, is a call for men to return to dominion religion—the religion of biblical orthodoxy.

E. How to Read this Book

There is an old line that asks: “How do you eat an elephant?” The answer: “One bite at a time.” That rule should be applied to this book.

This is a detailed book. Some of its chapters are lengthy, but they are broken down into convenient sections and subsections. The idea is not to memorize each chapter. The idea is to get a general sense of what happens in the field of economics when rival religions clash: power religion vs. dominion religion. If you want to follow up on any particular idea, footnotes are provided at no extra charge at the bottom of the page, so that you will not spend extra time flipping to the back of the book. Footnotes are there to help you, not to intimidate you.

15. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1963), ch. 6.

16. Igor Shafarevich, The Socialist Phenomenon (New York: Harper & Row, [1975] 1980), pp. 80–81.

Read the conclusions of each chapter before you read the chapter. Then skim over it rapidly. If it seems worth your time, reread it more carefully. You can read this book a chapter at a time, since it is a commentary. It deals with one or two verses at a time. The book develops its chain of arguments only insofar as the verses show a progression. I think they do reveal a progression, but not so rigorous a progression as you would find in a logic textbook, or even an economics textbook (Keynes' General Theory excluded, since it substitutes confusion for progression).¹⁷

Subsequent sections of this commentary on Exodus will cover the Ten Commandments and the biblical case laws that apply the principles of the Ten Commandments to society.¹⁸

17. One of the reasons why I am sure that his General Theory is a classic example of deliberate "disinformation" is that most of Keynes' other books are models of logic and clarity. But the General Theory is nearly unreadable. He was writing nonsense, and the book reflects it. For a good introduction to this classic example of jargon-filled nonsense, see Henry Hazlitt's book, The Failure of the "New Economics" (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1959). (<http://bit.ly/HazlittKeynes>) Hazlitt never went to college, so he was not fooled by Keynes, something two generations of Ph.D.-holding power religionists cannot say for themselves. For more technical scholarly critiques, written quite early in response to Keynes by economists who were not power religionists, see Hazlitt (ed.), The Critics of Keynesian Economics (Van Nostrand, 1960). (<http://bit.ly/HazlittCKE>)

18. See also James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984). (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

INTRODUCTION

This book is about a clash between two religions, with believers in a third religion standing on the sidelines, waiting to see the outcome of the clash. The Bible presents the story of Moses and Pharaoh as the archetypal clash in history between these two religions: dominion religion vs. power religion. This confrontation has been going on ever since the garden of Eden.

The first of the conflicting religions was power religion, the religion of Pharaoh, who was Satan's representative in the battle. The second was dominion religion, the religion of Moses, God's representative in this mighty battle. The testimony of the Book of Exodus is clear: first, those who seek power apart from God are doomed to comprehensive, total defeat. Second, those who seek God are called to exercise dominion, and they shall be victorious over the enemies of God. But this victory takes time. It is not achieved instantaneously. It is the product of long years of self-discipline under God's authority. The power religionists do not want to wait. Like Adam in his rebellion, sinners choose to dress themselves in the robes of authority, so that they can render instant autonomous judgment.¹ They do not want to subordinate themselves to God.

The third form of religion is what I call escapist religion. This religion proclaims the inevitability of external defeat for the corporate people of God. The defenders of temporal corporate impotence for covenant-keepers thereby become the allies of temporal power-seekers. This religion was dominant in the lives of the Hebrew slaves. They became easy prey for the power religionists. But when the power manifested by dominion religion overcame the pagan power religion, they grudgingly followed the victors.

Before discussing the specifics of the clash between Moses and Pharaoh, it is necessary to survey briefly the first principles of these three religious outlooks.

1. Gary North, "Witnesses and Judges," Biblical Economics Today, VI (Aug./Sept. 1983), pp. 3–4. Reprinted in Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix E.

A. Power Religion

This religious viewpoint affirms that the most important goal for a man, group, or species is the capture and maintenance of power. Power is seen as the chief attribute of God, or if the religion is officially atheistic, then the chief attribute of man. This perspective is a satanic perversion of God's command to man to exercise dominion over all the creation (Gen. 1:26–28).² Power religion is the attempt to exercise dominion apart from covenantal subordination to the true Creator God.

What distinguishes biblical dominion religion from satanic power religion is ethics. Is the person who seeks power doing so for the glory of God, and for himself secondarily, and only to the extent that he is God's lawful and covenantally faithful representative? If so, he will act in terms of God's ethical standards and in terms of a profession of faith in the God of the Bible. The church has recognized this two-fold requirement historically, and has established a dual requirement for membership: profession of faith and a godly life.

In contrast, power religion is a religion of autonomy. It affirms that "My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17).³ It seeks power or wealth in order to make credible this very claim.

Wealth and power are aspects of both religions. Wealth and power are covenantal manifestations of the success of rival religious views. This is why God warns His people not to believe that their autonomous actions gained them their blessings: "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).⁴ God's opponents also want visible confirmation of the validity of their covenant with a rival god, but God warns them that "the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22b).⁵ The entry of the Hebrews into Canaan was supposed to remind them of this fact: the Canaanites had built homes and vineyards to no avail;

2. Ibid., chaps. 3, 4.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012) ch. 21.

4. Ibid., ch. 22.

5. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

their enemies, the Hebrews, inherited them (Josh. 24:13).

Those who believe in power religion have refused to see that long-term wealth in any society is the product of ethical conformity to biblical law. They have sought the blessings of God's covenant while denying the validity and eternally binding ethical standards of that covenant. In short, they have confused the fruits of Christianity with the roots. They have attempted to chop away the roots yet somehow preserve the fruits.

B. Escapist Religion

This is the second great tradition of anti-Christian religion. Seeing that the exercise of autonomous power is a snare and a delusion, the proponents of escapist religion have sought to insulate themselves from the general culture—a culture maintained by power. They have fled the responsibilities of worldwide dominion, or even regional dominion, in the vain hope that God will release them from the requirements of the general dominion covenant.

The Christian version of the escapist religion is sometimes called “pietism,” but its theological roots can be traced back to the ancient heresy of mysticism. Rather than proclaiming the requirement of ethical union with Jesus Christ, the perfect man, the mystic calls for metaphysical union with a monistic, unified god. In the early church, there were many types of mysticism, but the most feared rival religion which continually infiltrated the church was gnosticism. It proclaimed many doctrines, but the essence of gnostic faith was radical personal individualism—personal escape from matter—leading to radical impersonal collectivism: the abolition of human personality through absorption into the Godhead. It proclaimed retreat from the material realm and escape to a higher, purer, spiritual realm through various “Eastern” techniques of self-manipulation: asceticism, higher consciousness, and initiation into secret mysteries.

Gnosticism survives as a way of thinking and acting (or failing to act) even today, as Rushdoony pointed out. The essence of this faith is its antinomianism. Gnostics despise biblical law. But their hatred of the law of God leads them to accept the laws of the state. Rushdoony put it this way.

Gnosticism survives today in theosophy, Jewish Kabbalism, occultism, existentialism, masonry, and like faiths. Because Gnosticism made the individual, rather than a dualism of mind and matter, ultimate, it was essentially hostile to morality and law, requiring often that believers live beyond good and evil by denying the validity of all moral law. Gnostic groups which did not openly avow such doctrines affirmed an ethic of love as against law, negating law and morality in terms of the 'higher' law and morality of love. Their contempt of law and time manifested itself also by a willingness to comply with the state. . . . The usual attitude was one of contempt for the material world, which included the state, and an outward compliance and indifference. A philosophy calling for an escape from time is not likely to involve itself in the battles of time.⁶

Their denial of the continuing validity of biblical law has led them to deny the relevance of earthly time. By denying biblical law, they thereby forsake the chief tool of dominion—our means of using time to subdue the earth to the glory of God. The basic idea that undergirds escapist religion is the denial of the dominion covenant. The escapist religionists believe that the techniques of self-discipline, whether under God or apart from God (e.g., Buddhism), offer power over only limited areas of life. They attempt to conserve their power by focusing their ethical concern on progressively (regressively) narrower areas of personal responsibility. The “true believer” thinks that he will gain more control over himself and his narrow environment by restricting his self-imposed zones of responsibility. His concern is self, from start to finish; his attempt to escape from responsibilities beyond the narrow confines of self is a program for gaining power over self. It is a religion of works, of self-salvation. A man first “humbles” himself by admitting that there are limits to his power. He then insists that there are major limits to the range of his responsibilities. He does this in order to elevate himself to a position of hypothetically God-like spirituality: a being unconcerned with dominion or power.

Escapist religion proclaims institutional peace—“peace at any price.” Ezekiel responded to such an assertion in the name of God: “. . . they have seduced my people, saying, “Peace; and there was no peace” (Ezek. 13:10a). Patrick Henry’s inflammatory words in March of 1775—“Peace, peace—but there is no peace”⁷—were taken from E-

6. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), pp. 136–37. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

7. Norine Dickson Campbell, Patrick Henry: Patriot and Statesman (Old Greenwich, Connecticut: Devin-Adair, 1969), p. 130. The substance of Henry’s famous St. John’s Church speech, which mobilized the Virginia Assembly, was reconstructed by a later historian, William Wirt, but is generally considered representative. This was zekiel and also Jeremiah: “They have healed also the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, peace; when there is no peace” (Jer. 6:14). This rival religion proclaims peace because it has little interest in the systematic efforts that are always required to purify institutions as a prelude to social reconstruction.

In short, escapist religion calls for flight from the world, and because man is in this world, it calls for a flight from humanity.⁸ Its advocates may hide their real concern: the systematic abandonment of a world supposedly so corrupt that nothing can be done to overcome widespread cultural evil. They invoke their moral responsibility of “sharing Christ to the world” or “building up the Church” rather than also rebuilding civilization. Their ultimate concern is personal flight from responsibility. This is a revolt against maturity.⁹

C. Dominion Religion

This is the orthodox faith. It proclaims the sovereignty of God, the reliability of the historic creeds, the necessity of standing up for principle, and the requirement that faithful men take risks for God’s sake. It proclaims this testimony: “Through the exercise of saving faith, and through ethical conformity to biblical law, regenerate men will increase the extent of their dominion over the earth.” It is a religion of conquest—conquest by grace through ethical action. The goal is ethical conformity to God, but the results of this conformity involve dominion—over lawful subordinates, over ethical rebels, and over nature. This is the message of Deuteronomy 28:1–14. It is also the message of Jesus Christ, who walked perfectly in God’s statutes and in God’s Spirit, and who then was granted total power over all creation by the Father (Matt. 28:18).¹⁰ I am not speaking here of Christ’s divine nature as the Second Person of the Trinity, who always had total power; I am speaking of His nature as perfect man, who earned total power through ethical conformity to God and through His death and resur-

Henry’s famous “Give me liberty or give me death” speech, one of the most famous speeches in United States history.

8. R. J. Rushdoony, The Flight from Humanity: A Study of the Effect of Neoplatonism on Christianity (Vallecito, California: Chalcedon, [1973] 2008). (<http://bit.ly/rjrffh>)

9. R. J. Rushdoony, Revolt Against Maturity: A Biblical Psychology of Man (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 1987). (<http://bit.ly/rjrram>)

10. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press [2000] 2012), ch. 48; Kenneth L. Gentry, Jr., The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

rection.

Dominion religion recognizes the relationship between righteousness and authority, between covenantal faithfulness and covenantal blessings. Those who are faithful in little things are given more. This is the meaning of Christ's parable of the talents (Matt. 25:14–30).¹¹ The process of dominion is a function of progressive sanctification, both personal-individual and also institutional (family, church, business, school, civil government, etc.: Deut. 28:1–14).

D. Moses vs. Pharaoh

Pick up any commentary on the Book of Exodus. Read its account of the first 15 chapters. You will find a lot of discussion of Hebrew vocabulary, Moses' theology, and the sovereignty of God's power. But you will not find a detailed discussion of Egypt. You will not find an analysis of the theology and culture of the society that placed the Hebrews under bondage. You will not find a discussion of the relationship between Egypt's theology and Egypt's economic and political institutions.

These are remarkable omissions. It is not that commentators have no knowledge about Egypt. Rather, it is that they have failed to understand the theological and political issues that were inherent in this confrontation. Sufficient information is available to construct at least an outline of Egyptian society. While Egyptology is a highly specialized and linguistically rigorous field of study, there are numerous scholarly summaries of the religion and social institutions of Egypt. I am no specialist in this field, and I have no immediate access to a large university library of books and manuscripts relating to Egypt, but the World Wide Web, interlibrary loans, and normal intelligence are sufficient to "open the closed book" of at least the bare essentials of Egyptian thought and culture. The bare essentials are sufficient to enable anyone to draw some simple conclusions concerning the differences between the gods of Egypt and the God of the Israelites. Furthermore, it is not that difficult to make other comparisons: socialism vs. market freedom, bureaucracy vs. decentralized decision-making, the omniscient state vs. limited civil government, static society vs. future-oriented society, stagnation vs. growth. Yet the commentators, as far as I have been able to determine, have systematically refused to discuss such issues. They have been blind to the all-encompassing nature of the confrontation. To a great extent, this is because they have been blind to the implications of biblical religion for both social theory and institutions.

11. North, ibid., ch. 47.

E. Chronology

There are other topics that need to be discussed. One of the most important is the problem of chronology. You can find Bible commentaries that attempt to deal with this issue, but I have yet to find one which openly faces the overwhelming difficulties posed by the almost universal acceptance of the conventional chronology of Egypt.

What these commentaries never admit is that Egyptians did not believe in chronology. The historical records that modern (and even classical Greek) historians have used to reconstruct Egypt's chronology are woefully deficient. The Egyptians simply did not take seriously their own history. They did not believe in the importance of linear time. The records they left behind reflect this lack of concern. A century ago, historian George Rawlinson began his chapter on Egyptian chronology with this statement: "It is a patent fact, and one that is beginning to obtain general recognition, that the chronological element in early Egyptian history is in a state of almost hopeless obscurity."¹² He was incorrect, however, concerning the coming "general recognition" of the problem. Only the most scholarly and detailed monographs on Egypt bother to warn readers about the problem.

There are several kinds of chronological documents, including the actual monuments. "The chronological value of these various sources of information is, however, in every case slight. The great defect of these monuments is their incompleteness. The Egyptians had no era. They drew out no chronological schemes. They cared for nothing but to know how long each incarnate god, human or bovine, had condescended to tarry on the earth. They recorded carefully the length of the life of each Apis bull, and the length of the reign of each king; but they neglected to take note of the intervals between one Apis bull and another, and omitted to distinguish the sole reign of a monarch from his joint reign with others."¹³

Commentary readers are also not informed of this crucial fact: virtually all chronologies of the ancient Near East and pre-classical Greece are constructed on the assumption that the conventional chro-nology of Egypt is the legitimate standard. modern scholars believe that the chronology of Egypt should be imposed on the chronologies of all other civilizations of the ancient Near East, including the biblical chronology of the Hebrews. Thus, when the Bible says explicitly that the exodus took place 480 years before Solomon began to construct the temple (I Kings 6:1),¹⁴ historians interpret this information within the framework of the hypothetical Egyptian chronological scheme. When they even admit that the pharaohs of the supposed dynastic era of the fifteenth century before Christ were extremely powerful kings—men like Thutmose III—whose mummies still exist,¹⁵ they are tempted to ignore these difficulties, or even to ignore the clear teaching of the Bible. Many of them date the exodus centuries later. They allow a hypothetical chronology of Egypt to dictate their interpretation of Scripture. This is not the way that Christian scholarship is supposed to be conducted.

12. George Rawlinson, A History of Egypt, 2 vols. (New York: Alden, 1886), II, p. 1.

13. Ibid., II, p. 2.

In the early 1950s, Immanuel Velikovsky, a genius (or fraud, his critics say) began to publish a series of studies that reconstructed (among other things) the chronologies of the ancient world. Velikovsky began his reconstruction with a discussion of an ancient Egyptian document, long overlooked by historians, which contains references to a series of catastrophes that look remarkably similar to those described in early chapters of the Book of Exodus.

Then, in 1971, an amateur historian named Donovan Courville published a book that was based in part on Velikovsky's work, but which went far beyond it. Courville's book has been systematically ignored by Egyptologists and Christian scholars alike. I know of one case where a seminary professor absolutely refused to discuss the book with his students, either publicly or privately, when asked about it. Why the hostility? Because Courville's book, like Velikovsky's books, offers a frontal assault on the reigning presuppositions of historians regarding the reliability of Egyptian records and the reliability of the conclusions based on them. In Courville's case, the affront is worse: he was saying that Christian specialists in the field of ancient history have accepted the testimony of humanist (Darwinian) scholars and humanist (Egyptian) records in preference to the clear testimony of the Bible. Conservative scholars resent the implication that they have compromised their scholarship in order to seek recognition from (or avoid confrontation with) the conventional, dominant humanist academic community. Thus, I have seen no commentary on the Book of Exodus which refers to (let alone promotes) either Velikovsky or Courville, nor do the standard Christian encyclopedias.

14. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

15. Photographs of the mummies of Thutmose III and Amenhotep II appear in Donovan Courville, The Exodus Problem and Its Ramifications, 2 vols. (Loma Linda, California: Challenge Books, 1971), I, p. 37.

This commentary is the exception. For this reason, it represents a break with prevailing scholarship concerning the circumstances of the exodus. It may be incorrect, but it is incorrect in new ways—ways that do not begin with the presupposition that conventional humanist historical scholarship is binding, or the presupposition that the biblical account of history is inferior to the Egyptian record. My position is clear: it is better to make mistakes within an intellectual framework that is governed by the presupposition of the Bible's infallibility than it is to make mistakes that are governed by the presupposition that Darwinian scholarship is the eternal standard of truth.

F. Confrontation

The first 15 chapters of the Book of Exodus deal with the confrontation between God and Egypt. This confrontation was comprehensive. It involved a dispute between two radically different worldviews. It involved a war between the God of the Hebrews and a false god called Pharaoh. Every aspect of civilization was at stake. It was not “merely” a war over theology as such. It was a war over theology as life. This commentary brings into the open several areas of confrontation that previously have not been discussed. These subordinate areas of confrontation were inescapably linked to the main confrontation between God and Pharaoh. Amazingly, the terms of even this primary confrontation are seldom discussed.

Essentially the same confrontation has continued from the beginning, meaning from the garden of Eden. It has manifested itself in many ways, but the essential question never changes: Who is God? Secondly, what is the relationship between God and His creation? The answers given by the rulers of Egypt were essentially the same answer proposed to man by Satan by way of the serpent: “ye shall be as gods” (Gen. 3:5). Because the modern world has come to a similar theological conclusion—that, in the absence of any other god, man must be the only reliable candidate—the modern world has come to similar social and economic conclusions.

The rise of totalitarian bureaucracies in the twentieth century can and should be discussed in relation to the rise of a humanistic variation of Egyptian theology. It is not that humanists have adopted Egypt's polytheism (though modern relativism sounds suspiciously like polytheism), but rather that they have, as Darwinians (or worse), adopted Egypt's theology of the continuity of being, with the state, as the most powerful representative of "collective mankind," serving as the primary agency of social organization. The remaining chapters in the Book of Exodus describe the continuation of this same confrontation with Egypt. In this case, however, the departing slaves of the now-smashed Egyptian civilization replaced their former rulers as the defenders of the old order. God dealt with them in very similar ways, though with greater mercy, as a result of Moses' prayer on behalf of the integrity of God's name and God's promises (Ex. 32:9–14; Num. 14:13–16).

Therefore, it should not surprise us that there are still many Christian defenders of that same old statist order in our current wilderness wanderings, especially in the barren wastes of the college and seminary classroom. These people are slaves who have not yet recognized the freedom that God has offered to His people through His Bible-revealed law-order. When covenant-keeping people sit too long as household slaves beneath the table of the Satanists, hoping for a few crumbs (or academic degrees) to fall from their table, they find it difficult to imagine that it is the enemies of God who are supposed to sit beneath the table of the righteous, begging for scraps until the day of judgment provides them with no further opportunities for repentance. Let us not forget that it was a Canaanite woman, not a ruler of Israel, who first articulated this principle of biblical government.

And, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us. But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Then came she and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me. But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs. And she said, Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table. Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour (Matt. 15:22–28).¹⁶

Israel's leaders were sitting at the table of the Romans, begging. Some things have not changed. Christian leaders sit at the table of the humanists, begging.¹⁷ Some things have not changed.

Conclusion

Three and a half millennia ago, Moses was commanded by God to confront the Pharaoh. The result was the exodus, the archetype historical event in the life of Israel, the event to which the prophets appealed again and again in their confrontations with the rebellious Hebrews of their day. This same confrontation goes on in every era, and the contemporary Christian critic must be equally willing to confront the pharaohs of his day with the same theological distinctions: sovereign God or sovereign man, God's revelation or man's revelation, biblical society or the bureaucratic State, God's law or chaos. "Choose this day whom ye will serve." Serve God or perish.

16. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 34.

17. The most egregious form of this institutional begging in my day is the request by Christian seminaries to be accredited by the God-hating humanist liberal theologians who control the seminary accreditation system.

1

POPULATION GROWTH: TOOL OF DOMINION

And all the souls that came out of the loins of Jacob were seventy souls: for Joseph was in Egypt already. And Joseph died, and all his brethren, and all that generation. And the children of Israel were fruitful, and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them (Ex. 1:5–7).

The theocentric principle here is dominion through biological multiplication. This passage is an extension of the dominion covenant. “And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth” (Gen. 1:28).¹

The words relating to growth are repeated in verse 7: fruitful, increased (teemed), multiplied, waxed (numerous), with exceeding strength, strongly, and filled—a seven-fold representation.² Bible-believing commentators have seldom focused much attention on these verses, possibly because they are so difficult to explain by means of their usual assumption, namely, that only 70 people originally descended into Egypt. How could it be that 70 people and their spouses multiplied to 600,000 men, plus women and children, by the time of the exodus (Ex. 12:37)? A probable explanation is this one: the 70 were not the only source of the original population base. Presumably, they brought with them many household servants who had been circumcised and who were therefore counted as part of the covenant population. We do not know for certain how many of these circumcised household servants came, but it may have been in the thousands.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

2. U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus, trans. Israel Abrahams (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, Hebrew University, [1951] 1974), p. 9. He said that the “seven expressions for increase are used in this verse, a number indicative of perfection. . . .”

We should also bear in mind that “70” is a significant number in Scripture, in terms of age, chronology, and also in terms of numbering people. In Genesis 10, 70 peoples of mankind are listed, 14 from Japheth, 30 from Ham, and 26 from Shem.³ At the feast of tabernacles in the seventh month, beginning on the fifteenth day, the priests were to begin a week of sacrifices. For seven days, a descending number of bullocks were to be sacrificed: 13, 12, 11, 10, 9, 8, and 7, for a total of 70 bullocks. Then, on the eighth day (the beginning of the next week), one final bullock was to be sacrificed (Num. 29:12–36). Presumably, these were sacrifices for all the nations of the world, plus Israel. There were 70 elders in Israel at the time of God’s confirmation of the covenant at Sinai (Ex. 24:1). God at one point took His Spirit from Moses and gave it to the 70 elders (Num. 11:16). Also, when the Israelites defeated Adoni-Bezek after the death of Joshua, he confessed that he had slain 70 kings (Judges 1:7), presumably a number referring symbolically to the whole world. Seventy men were sent out by Jesus to evangelize southern Israel (Luke 10:1, 17).⁴ In Christ’s day, there were 70 members of the Sanhedrin, plus the President.⁵ So the number “70” meant for the Hebrews something like “a whole population,” although this does not deny the validity of 70 as the number of lineal heirs who came down into Egypt.

The growth of the Hebrew population has to be considered a remarkable expansion. How long did it take? This question has also baffled Bible-believing commentators. When did the exodus occur? When did Jacob’s family enter Egypt? Were the Israelites in Egypt a full 430 years? Donovan Courville, the Seventh Day Adventist scholar, called this chronology question “the exodus problem.”⁶

3. Frederick Louis Godet, Commentary on the Gospel of Luke, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, [1887]), II, p. 17. Godet discussed the problem of 70 vs. 72, which occurs in this estimation, and also in the differing New Testament references to the 70 or 72 sent out by Jesus (Luke 10:1).

4. Some manuscripts read 72. Godet argued that 70 is the correct reading: idem.

5. Alfred Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1886]), II, p. 554. Cf. “Sanhedrim,” in McClintock and Strong, Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), IX, p. 342.

6. Donovan A. Courville, The Exodus Problem and Its Ramifications, 2 vols. (Loma Linda, California: Challenge Books, 1971). Courville’s original insight concerning the need for a reconstruction of Egypt’s chronology came from Immanuel Velikovsky’s study, Ages in Chaos (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1952), which presents the

A. The Problem of Chronology

Exodus 12:40 reads as follows in the King James Version: "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years." Fact number one: a sojourn of 430 years. The Samaritan Pentateuch and the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the Old Testament dating from the second century B.C.) both say "Egypt and Canaan,"⁷ rather than just "Egypt," which indicates the likely solution to the exodus problem.

We can see the nature of the problem in Stephen's testimony, just prior to his martyrdom. It includes this statement: "And God spoke on this wise [in this way], That his seed should sojourn in a strange land; and that they should bring them into bondage, and entreat them evil four hundred years" (Acts 7:6). Fact number two: bondage of 400 years. This was also the period promised by God to Abraham: "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not their's, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; And also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance" (Gen. 15:13–14). Fact number three: deliverance in the fourth generation. "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16).⁸ Did God mean the fourth generation of captives? If the period of bondage was 430 years, how could only four generations have filled up the entire period assigned to them?

Paul provided additional crucial information: "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. . . . And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect" (Gal. 3:16a, 17). Fact number four: it was 430 years from the covenant to the exodus. This further complic-case against the traditional chronologies of the ancient world. Velikovsky identified the Hyksos rulers ("shepherd kings") of Egypt as the invading Amelekites. He argued that modern scholars have inserted a 500–700 year period into all the histories of the ancient world (since all are based on Egypt's supposed chronology), a period which must be eliminated. Velikovsky wrote that "we still do not know which of the two histories, Egyptian or Israelite, must be readjusted" (p. 338). Courville's book shows that it is modern scholarship's version of Egypt's chronology which is defective, not the chronology of the Old Testament. See Appendix A: "The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology."

7. Note in the New International Version (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1978), p. 83.

8. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 23.

ates the problem: the entire period, from Abraham to the exodus, was 430 years—a period which encompassed Isaac’s life, Jacob’s, Joseph in Egypt, the arrival of the brothers and their families, the years of prosperity and population growth in the land of Goshen in Egypt, Moses’ birth, his departure at age 40, his 40 years in the wilderness, and the exodus itself. Paul’s language is unambiguous. What, then, are we to make of the other three accounts?

1. The Patriarchal Era: 215 Years

The best place to begin to unravel this problem is with the chronology of Abraham’s family. We are told that he was called out of Haran when he was 75 years old (Gen. 12:4). Isaac was born 25 years later, when Abraham was a hundred (Gen. 21:5). Jacob and Esau were born 60 years later, when Isaac was 60 years old (Gen. 25:26). Finally, Jacob died at age 130 in Egypt (Gen. 47:9). Therefore, from Abraham’s entrance into a foreign land until the Israelites’ descent into Egypt, about 215 years elapsed (25 + 60 + 130). If we assume that the establishment of the covenant took place in the first year or so of Abraham’s sojourn in Canaan, with 25 years in between the covenant (Gen. 15) and the birth of Isaac (Gen. 21), then we can begin to make sense of the data. God said that Abraham’s heirs would be in bondage for 400 years, while Paul said it was 430 years from the Abrahamic covenant to the giving of the law. If we subtract 25 from 430—from the covenant to the birth of Isaac, the promised son of the covenant line—we get 405 years. This is very close to the 400 years of the “affliction” promised in Genesis 15:13–14 and mentioned by Stephen in Acts 7:6. We are now arguing about only five years, from the birth of Isaac to the period in which the captivity “in” Egypt—under Egypt’s domination—began. Genesis 21 says that it was only after Isaac was weaned that Ishmael mocked him—“laughing” in the Hebrew (vv. 8–9). This can be understood as the beginning of the period of Egyptian persecution, for Ishmael was half Egyptian.⁹ It was the time of Isaac’s youth, perhaps about age five. Abraham then expelled the Egyptian woman and her son, who travelled into the wilderness (21:14). Thus, it was not the bondage period in geographical Egypt that God had in mind, but the entire period of pilgrimage, during which they were afflicted by strangers.

9. I am indebted to James Jordan for this insight. If it is incorrect, then we would have to adopt Courville’s approach, namely, to argue that it seems legitimate to understand the 400 years of Genesis 15:13 as a rounding off of 405.

2. Residence in Egypt: 215 Years

The culmination of this period of rootlessness, or life in foreign lands, was the final era of outright bondage in Egypt (Gen. 15:14). Courville's comments are appropriate, that the period of affliction began back in the time of Abraham and not with the descent. Actually, the affliction in Egypt did not begin with the descent but only with the rise of the king "who knew not Joseph." That the "sojourn" also began back in the time of Abraham is clear from the statement in Hebrews 11:9, which reads:

By faith he [Abraham] sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise.

Others of the ancients than Paul thus understood the 430-year sojourn. The translators of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek have added a phrase to make clear the meaning of Exodus 12:40 as they understood it. The Septuagint reading of the verse is:

The sojourning of the children and of their fathers, which they so journeyed in the land of Canaan and in the land of Egypt. . . .

Josephus, as a Hebrew scholar of antiquity, thus understood the verse:

They left Egypt in the month Xanthicus, on the fifteenth day of the lunar month; four hundred and thirty years after our forefather Abraham came into Canaan, but two hundred and fifteen years only after Jacob removed into Egypt.¹⁰

This citation from Courville's book indicates that it was long ago understood that the 430 years of Exodus 12:40 must be interpreted in terms of the entire pilgrimage experience, Abraham to Moses. The reference to "the children of Israel" must be understood as Hebrews in general, not simply to those born of Jacob. It includes Abraham and Isaac. This means that Palestine was an Egyptian vassal region throughout the Patriarchal era of Exodus 12:40. It also helps to explain why Abraham journeyed to Egypt during the famine (Gen. 12:10). Egypt was the capital.

10. Ibid., I, p. 140. For Josephus' statement, see Antiquities of the Jews, II:XV:2, in Josephus: Complete Works, William Whiston, translator (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Kregel, 1960), p. 62.

Consider Courville's chart of his proposed reconstructed chronology of Egypt and Israel.¹¹ Understand that Courville's book remains almost unknown in Christian circles, and even less known in academic circles. His reconstructed chronology is not taken seriously by archaeologists and historians, any more than Velikovsky's chronology in Ages in Chaos was (or is) taken seriously.

Correlation of Scriptural Incidents with Egyptian History by the Traditional and Reconstructed Chronologies

| Incident or Era | Traditional Background or Date | Reconstruction Background or Date |
|-----------------------|--|--|
| Noachian Flood | Not recognized as factual. The proper background for the immediate post-diluvian period is the Mesolithic period, dated c. 10,000 B.C. or earlier. | The Mesolithic background for the immediate post-diluvian period is accepted, Date c. 2300 B.C. |
| Dispersion from Babel | If recognized at all, the incident is set far back in the pre-dynastic. | Dated 27 years before the unification of Egypt under Mena. Date, c. 2125 B.C. |
| Abraham enters Canaan | Commonly set in early Dynasty XII dated c. 1900 B.C. Earlier dates are entertained. | Dated very soon after the beginning of Dynasty IV; 1875 B.C. |
| Famine of Joseph | No famine inscription datable to the era of Joseph as placed in the Hyksos period. | Equated with the famine inscription in the reign of Sesotris I of twelfth dynasty. Dated 1662 B.C. |
| Enslavement of Israel | Eighteenth dynasty theory of Exodus must recognize an early king of this dynasty as the pharaoh initiating the enslavement. This would be Amenhotep I or Thutmose I. | Enslavement initiated by Sesotris III of Dynasty XII. Date, c. 1560 B.C. |
| The Exodus | Eighteenth dynasty theory must recognize the position either at the end of the reign | The reconstruction places the Exodus at the end of the five year reign of Koneharis, second |

11. Taken from The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Summer 1975), p. 145.

| | | |
|-----------------------------|---|---|
| | of Thutmose III or early in the reign of Amenhotep II. Date c. 1445 B.C. | primary ruler of Dynasty XIII, but 26th in the Turin list. Date is 1446–1445 B.C. |
| Period of the Judges | Encompasses the period of Dynasty XVIII from Amenhotep III, all of XIX as currently composed, and the first half of XX. Dates: 1375–1050 B.C. | Falls in the Hyksos period, c. 1375–1050 B.C. |
| United Monarchy of Israel | Background is in Dynasties XX and XXI. Dates, 1050–930 B.C. | Background is in early Dynasty XVIII ending near the beginning of the sole reign of Thutmose III. Dates, 1050–930 B.C. |
| Sacking of Solomon's Temple | Shishak identified as Sheshonk I of Dynasty XXII. Date is 926 B.C. in fifth year of Rehoboam. | Shishak identified as Thutmose III of Dynasty XVIII. Date 926 B.C. |
| Fall of Israel to Assyria | Must be placed in the background of Dynasty XXIII to retain the established date 722–721 B.C. | Falls in the fifth year of Merneptah dated 721 B.C. Synchronism indicated by inscription of this year telling of catastrophe to Israel. |
| Fall of Judah to Babylon | In Dynasty XXVI. Date c. 606 B.C. | In Dynasty XXV, Date c. 606 B.C. |

Courville produced a creative reconstruction of Egypt's chronology in terms of the 215–215 division. He pinpointed the famine as having begun 217 years before the exodus.¹² Using this estimate in conjunction with my dating calculations, with I Kings 6:1 as a date marker,¹³ this was 1710 B.C. He provided evidence from Egyptian inscriptions of a famine in this era, and he even identified the Pharaoh of this era, Sesostri I. He thought that references to a vizier of Sesostri I, Mentuhotep, refer to Joseph.¹⁴ The fact that a tombstone exists does

12. Courville, Exodus Problem, I, p. 151.

13. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

14. Ibid., I, p. 141. George Rawlinson wrote of Mentuhotep: "This official, whose tombstone is among the treasures of the museum of Boulaq, appears to have held a rank in the kingdom second only to that of the king. He filled at one and the same time not necessarily mean that the bones of “Mentuhotep” were still under it when it was discovered. Joseph’s bones were removed from Egypt and taken to Israel (Ex. 13:19). It is possible that the Hebrews decided to leave the tombstone behind as a reminder to their former taskmasters, and that the Egyptians, in the confusion of the Amalekite invasion, subsequently neglected to dispose of it. Later Egyptians may not have remembered who this official really was. The possibility exists, of course, that Courville was incorrect concerning the Joseph-Mentuhotep identity.

His thesis is simple, though complex in its demonstration: the three conventional lists of kings—Manetho’s list, the Turin list, and the Sothis list—are in error when they assume that each king’s reign followed another. Courville demonstrated that many of these “kings” were not kings at all, but lower officials whose rule overlapped the reign of the true pharaohs. In short, the conventional histories of Egypt have overestimated the age of Egypt’s kingdoms because they have relied on a false assumption, namely, that the kings on the various lists did not frequently have overlapping reigns. Thus, among other problems, Courville’s reconstructed chronology solves the problem of the conventional dating of the origins of Egypt thousands of years prior to a Bible-based estimate of the date of the Noachian flood. In short, Courville’s book indicates that Christian scholars are still in bondage to Egypt. He offered them a methodological exodus. But, like the slaves of Moses’ day, they cry out against the proposed deliverance. They prefer to remain in bondage. The leeks and onions of Egypt—Ph.D. degrees, tenured teaching positions, and intellectual respectability among their heathen masters—still entice them.

B. Jacob’s Heirs

Unquestionably, the growth of the Hebrew population was rapid. If the sons of Jacob, which included each family’s circumcised bondservants, came down to Egypt 215 years before Moses led their heirs out of Egypt, then the Hebrews experienced long-term population growth unequalled in the records of man. Remember, however, that the offices of minister of justice, home secretary, chief commissioner of public works, director of public worship, and perhaps of foreign secretary and minister of war. [He cites Brugsch’s History of Egypt.] ‘When he arrived at the gate of the royal residence, all the other great personages who might be present bowed down before him, and did obeisance.’ He was judge, financier, general, administrator, artist.” George Rawlinson, History of Ancient Egypt (New York: John B. Alden, 1886), II, p. 83.

people lived longer in Joseph's era. Kohath, Moses' grandfather, lived for 133 years (Ex. 6:18). Levi, Kohath's father, died at age 137 (Ex. 6:16). Moses' brother Aaron died at age 123 (Num. 33:39). Moses died at age 120 (Deut. 34:7). Nevertheless, Moses acknowledged that in his day, normal life spans were down to about 70 years: "The days of our years are threescore and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away" (Ps. 90:10). (Again, the number "70" appears, in this case to describe a whole lifetime, rather than a whole population.) Caleb boasted about his strength for a man of 85 (Josh. 14:10–11), indicating that in his generation life spans had shrunk.

These years of long life were reduced after the exodus. Men seldom survived beyond 120. One exception was Jehoiada, the high priest, who lived to 130 (II Chron. 24:15). The supreme exception was Job, who lived 140 years after his confrontation with God (Job 42:16), making him the oldest man after Abraham. If, during the years in Egypt, they begat children from an early age and continued to bear them until well into their eighties and nineties, as Jacob had done before them, then we can understand how such a tremendous expansion of numbers was possible. As I explain below, foreigners in large numbers covenanted themselves to Hebrew families. It is also possible that Hebrew men married Egyptian wives in the first century of prosperity, as Joseph had done (Gen. 41:45). This would have greatly expanded the number of children born into Hebrew families, since the Hebrew husbands would not have been limited exclusively to Hebrew women. A family of five boys and five girls could have become a family of 100 Hebrew grandchildren within the grandparents' lifetimes. Of course, not every family could have seen this happen, since some Hebrew men would have had to marry Hebrew wives (along with Egyptian wives) in order for the daughters of all the families to have remained inside the covenant lines. On the other hand, Egyptian men may have converted to the faith, especially during the period of Israel's preeminence in Egypt (e.g., Lev. 24:10). Even apart from the assumption of multiple wives (some Egyptian), it is obvious that long lives, high birth rates, and low death rates could have produced a huge population within two centuries.

1. Household Servants

We should also understand that the 70 direct heirs of Jacob described in Exodus 1:5 were lineal heirs, “out of the loins of Jacob.” But the total number of households under each lineal heir would have been far larger. Servants who were circumcised were part of the families, and they would have come down into Egypt with the direct lineal heirs. These servants would have participated in the blessings of Goshen, which was the best land in Egypt (Gen. 47:6). The Pharaoh of the famine gave his best land to Joseph’s relatives, but this included their entire households. The size of the land indicates this: the land needed administration. Pharaoh even wanted to place his own cattle under the administration of “men of activity” among the households (Gen. 47:6b). He expected them to care for the best land of Egypt (Goshen), but this would have required more than 70 men and their immediate families.

Therefore, when the households of Israel went into bondage under a later Pharaoh, the descendants of the servants were counted as the covenantal heirs of Jacob.¹⁵ They also went into bondage. When the exodus from Egypt freed the Israelites, all those who had been part of the families of Jacob went free. The multitude that swarmed out of Egypt included the heirs of the circumcised servants of the 70 lineal heirs of Jacob.

How many people actually came down into Egypt during the famine? It could have been as many as 10,000. One estimate of Abraham’s household is 3,000, given his 318 fighting men (Gen. 14:14).¹⁶ We are not told how many servants were still under the administration of Jacob. It is likely that most of Isaac’s servant families went with Esau rather than Jacob. But Jacob had recruited servants during his stay with Laban (Gen. 32:16), although we do not know how many. We do know that Pharaoh wanted his best land to be taken care of by Jacob’s family, and he would have recognized the covenantal relationship between the lineal heirs and their servants. The servants would have been responsible administrators because they were under the authority of Jacob’s heirs. Any relationship between the God of Jacob and his lineal heirs would have included the household servants. Pharaoh, as a king, would have understood this covenantal principle, especially since 15. See Numbers 1:4–18 and 7:2–11 for an indication that the princes of each tribe were the physical descendants of the twelve patriarchs.

16. Folker Willeson, “The Yalid in Hebrew Society,” Studia Theologica, XII (1958), p. 198.

the theology of Egypt asserted the divinity of the Pharaoh. All Egyptians were his servants; any relationship between him and the gods of Egypt was therefore also a relationship between the gods and the Egyptian people.¹⁷ It seems safe to conclude that the 70 households included non-lineal heirs.

C. Exponential Growth

We need to understand the remarkable aspects of compound growth. If as few as 3,000 came into Egypt in Joseph's day, then the rate of population growth over the next 215 years was 3.18% per annum in order to reach 2.5 million by the time of the exodus. Had this rate of increase been maintained after their settlement of Canaan, there would have been over two billion of them 215 years later, not counting the "mixed multitude" (Ex. 12:38) that went with them out of Egypt. Two hundred and seventy five years after the settlement of Canaan, there would have been 13.8 billion, roughly equivalent to three times the world's population in 1980. In short, they would have spread across the face of the earth.

If there were more than 3,000 people in the families of the Israelites who came down to Egypt in Joseph's day, then the rate of growth was under 3% per annum over the 215-year period in Egypt. A lower rate of growth would have lengthened the time necessary to reach 13.8 billion people, but the speed of increase would still have been startling. If there were 10,000 who entered Egypt in Joseph's day, then to reach 2.5 million people 215 years later, the annual rate of increase would have been 2.6%. Had this "low" rate been maintained after their entry into Canaan (assuming no population growth during the 40 years in the wilderness and in five years of fighting to conquer Canaan), the Hebrews would have multiplied to 620 million people 215 years after settling the land, 2.9 billion in 275 years, 5.5 billion in 300 years, 10 billion in 325 years, and 13.8 billion in 335 years. But God told them that there would be no miscarriages or diseases if they obeyed His law (Ex. 20:10; 25:25–26), implying a more rapid rate of population growth than they had experienced in Egypt.

We get some idea of just what kind of growth was implied by a 2.6% annual increase when we consider that Solomon began building the temple 480 years after the exodus (I Kings 6:1). Subtracting the 40 years in the wilderness and five years spent in conquering that part of Canaan which was on the far side of the Jordan River (Josh. 14:10),¹⁸ we get 435 years after the settlement of Canaan. If 2.5 million Hebrews began to reproduce when the land was settled, and the rate of increase was 2.6% per annum, 435 years later there would have been 176 billion Hebrews. The land of Israel was about 7 million acres. The population density by Solomon's time would have been 15,143 Hebrews per acre. An acre is a square about 210 feet per side, or 44,000 square feet. Obviously, either the rate of population increase would have fallen well before Solomon's day, or else they would have spread across the face of the earth. Even with a nation of high-rise apartment houses, 176 billion Hebrews would not have squeezed into the land of Israel. More than this: a population of 176 billion Hebrews implies that the earth would have been filled well before Solomon's day. It therefore implies that the requirement of the dominion covenant relating to multiplying and filling the earth would long since have been fulfilled.

17. This covenantal relationship proved to be the undoing of the Egyptian people at the time of the exodus. Their Pharaoh's rebellion against God brought them low, just as the obedience to God by the Pharaoh of Joseph's day brought them the external blessing of survival.

These numbers should lead us to question the whole scenario of compound growth of over 2.5% per annum for many centuries on end. Nothing like this has ever taken place in man's history. Only since the Industrial Revolution in the late eighteenth century has anything like it taken place in recorded history. We need to examine some of the statistical relationships before we can make valid conclusions concerning what happened in this 215-year period.

D. The 2.5 Million Hebrews

The standard estimation of how many people left Egypt at the exodus is 2–2.5 million Hebrews, not counting the “mixed multitudes.” Why is this figure reasonable? The best answer relates to the number of Hebrews a generation later, after the deaths of all of the members of the adult Hebrews who fled, with only two exceptions: Joshua and Caleb.

The generation in the wilderness entered Canaan with approximately the same number of men who had left Egypt 40 years earlier. There were 600,000 men who left Egypt (Ex. 12:37), and one year later (Num. 1:1), there were 603,550 fighting men (Num. 1:46), plus 22,273

18. Actually, part of Canaan began to be conquered 38 years after the exodus (Deut. 2:14). The first generation of Hebrews had all died by this time (Deut. 2:15–16). Seven years later, all of Canaan was under Israel's control, except for those pockets of resistance that never were conquered (Jud. 1:27–2:4).

Levites (Num. 3:43). The number of adult males was only slowly increasing. When the second census was taken before they entered the land, 40 years later, the population of the tribes had decreased slightly, to 601,730 (Num 26:51), plus 23,000 Levites (Num. 26:62).

This points to population stagnation. More important, it points to at least two generations of stable reproduction: one male child and one female child per family. Why do I say this? Because populations that are growing experience the after-effects of prior high birth rates, even in later periods when the birth rate in the society falls below the bare minimum reproduction rate of 2.1 children per woman. This is what most Western industrial nations are facing today: birth rates below the reproduction rate. Nevertheless, the populations are still growing. The reason is that in previous periods, there were higher birth rates, and women who were born up to 45 years earlier are still in the child-bearing ages. As these women marry and begin to have children, the upward curve of population continues to rise, although it is slowing down. Women may be having fewer children than their mothers did, but there are lots of women still within or entering the child-bearing ages. It takes decades of below reproduction-rate births to begin to bring down the aggregate number of people in a society, as middle-aged women cease having children, and the very old members of society continue to die off.

What is abnormal at any time in history is for a population to remain stable for a full generation. A steady-state population is far more common on islands or in very small nations, where emigration is possible or where abortion or even infanticide is practiced as a means of population control. In the ancient world, steady-state populations were common because of high death rates for children, but this had not been the experience of the Hebrews during the years of rapid growth. Their population growth rate had been sufficiently high so that the Pharaoh of the oppression issued his edict concerning infanticide.

Sometime in between this edict and the exodus, the Hebrew population became a steady-state population. Thus, the fathers of the exodus generation were succeeded by almost exactly the same number of sons. This points to the fact that their fathers had also reproduced at close to a steady-state level, since there was no "bulge" of women entering the child-bearing years—women who had been produced 20 years earlier by a higher fertility culture. Just about the same number of males arrived in the wilderness years, just barely replacing their dying fathers. This points to a figure of 2.5 million at the exodus: 600,000 men, about 600,000 women, and 1.3 million children. The average Hebrew family was therefore the replacement rate family of about 2.1 children per family. (It is assumed that about 5% of the children—one in 21—will not marry or at least will not bear children: ill health, mental or physical defects, infertility, or just an unwillingness or inability to marry.)

The stable population of the wilderness experience points to a total population of 2.5 million at the time of the exodus. Only with high death rates in the wilderness could we imagine that significantly more than 2.5 million Hebrews departed. With the exception of the judgments against adult rebels, totalling about 40,000 (Num. 16:35, 49; 25:9), there are no records of high death rates for Israel during the wilderness years. We can safely conclude that the steady-state reproduction rate of the wilderness generation points back to approximately 2.5 million Hebrews involved in the exodus.

If the exodus generation averaged two children per family, this reveals a “mature” or zero-growth population in the generation prior to the exodus. But since there were only four generations from the descent into Egypt and the conquest of Canaan (Gen. 15:16), and the generation of the exodus was already into the steady-state growth phase, the growth to 2.5 million had to take place in the first two generations. There is simply no way that this could have been accomplished by biological reproduction alone.

If we examine the age distribution of a growing population, age group by age group, we find that the numbers get larger as the age group gets lower. Those under age 15 constitute the largest single segment of the population. While it was biologically possible for 3,000 Hebrews and their circumcised servants to have reached 2.5 million in 215 years (3.18% increase per annum), the departing Hebrews would have had very large families. There could not have been 600,000 adult males. There would have been fewer men and far more children in the total population of 2.5 million.

We now must make sense of the data. It is not conceivable, biologically or mentally, that the 3,000 or 10,000 people who came at the descent had multiplied to 600,000 adult males at the exodus. Then where did the 2.5 million Hebrews come from? There is only one possible explanation: from conversions. The number of circumcised servants must have grown rapidly until the era of the oppression, at least 80 years before the exodus. Thus, for about 135 years (215–80), the Hebrews and their circumcised servants experienced high birth and survival rates. The Pharaoh feared their fertility. But their fertility was not sufficient to explain the 600,000 males who departed at the exodus. There must also have been foreigners who covenanted with the favored Hebrews who lived in the choice land of Goshen. They became Hebrews by circumcision.

We can now better understand Moses' words to the Hebrews: "The LORD did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of people" (Deut. 7:7). Their growth was due primarily to conversions to the faith. The external blessings of God enabled them to multiply, but especially to multiply by conversion. The majority of those who conquered Canaan were not the biological descendants of Abraham, but they were the covenantal descendants.

This has enormous implications for Judaism. The religious issue of "who is a Jew?" is not primarily the question of physical birth; the issue is the covenant. When Jesus warned the Pharisees that God could raise up descendants of Abraham from the stones (Matt. 3:9), He was speaking of vast conversions of gentiles. This was about to happen through the ministry of the church. The true heirs of Israel, Paul wrote, are the spiritual heirs of Abraham, the heirs of the promise of Abraham (Rom. 9:7–8). But what must be recognized is that this had been true in the sojourn in Egypt. It was the promise, as transferred through the covenant, which was the essential mark of the Hebrew. The mark in the flesh only testified to this more important mark, which was spiritual and covenantal. Their numbers had not come from biological generation alone, but from the dominion process of conversion and circumcision. It was not biology which was fundamental, but faith.

E. The Uniqueness of Hebrew Fertility

We can begin to perceive the magnitude of the judgment against Egypt, which was probably also a steady-state population. Zero population growth was an aspect of their static religion and static social theory. In the ancient world, populations did not grow rapidly as they do in the modern world. Thus, the deaths of all the firstborn males in a steady-state population was tantamount to the destruction of that population. Children normally died in their youth. It might take the birth of ten or more children to maintain a two-child legacy. Adam Smith, as late as 1776, remarked that it was common knowledge that poverty-stricken Highland Scot women would bear 20 children in their lifetimes, yet only two or fewer would actually grow to adulthood.¹⁹ After the death of the firstborn Egyptian males, there was no assurance that there would be replacement male children who would reach adulthood and marry.

We know that the Egyptians were facing something uniquely threatening in the population growth of the Hebrews. It is understandable why the Egyptians had been terrified of the Hebrews. With such a growing population in servitude, it would not be long before their sheer numbers would have overpowered the Egyptian guards. Furthermore, chattel slaves are notoriously unproductive, and the Egyptians had to feed them. The vast bureaucratic projects that the pharaohs were building by means of chattel slave labor were by nature unproductive and resource-absorbing. How much longer beyond Moses' era would they have been able to feed and control the Hebrews? The Pharaoh's policy decision was the oppression.

The oppression shocked the Hebrews. The drowning of the male infants must have had cataclysmic psychological effects on all the Hebrews, and we can easily understand why few if any converts subsequently presented themselves for circumcision. This explains why, in their final 80 years in Egypt, the Hebrews (which meant all circumcised males and their families) experienced a steady-state population rate, that is, zero population growth. The dead males, coupled with the oppression's negative psychological effects, brought population stagnation overnight to the Hebrews.

F. Limits to Growth

A growing population is a tool of dominion, as are all the blessings of God. The humanists' hostility to population growth, beginning in the final third of the twentieth century, was part of a growing suspicion of all forms of economic growth. Growth points to an eventual using up of finite resources, including living space. This, in turn, points either to the end of growth or the end of time. The thought of an end of time within a few centuries is not acceptable to humanists. Therefore, they have instead attacked the concept of linear growth, since growth—especially population growth—cannot be linear indefinitely in a finite universe.²⁰ (See Appendix B: "The Demographics of De-

19. Adam Smith, The Wealth of Nations (1776), Ch. VIII, p. 79 (Modern Library).

20. This hostility to population growth compromised even Wilhelm Röpke's eco-cline.”)

Until these attitudes are seen by large numbers of Christians for what they are—aspects of paganism—Christians will continue to labor under a modern version of Egyptian slavery. This slavery is both religious and intellectual. It cannot be limited to the spirit and the intellect, however; ideas do have social consequences. Christians cannot legitimately expect to conquer the world for Jesus Christ in terms of the ideology of zero-growth humanism. Such a philosophy should be handed over to the humanists as their very own “tool of subservience,” the opposite of dominion. Even better would be population decline for the God-haters. They would simply fade away as an influence on earth. This is the long-term implication of a birth rate below 2.1 children per woman. It is a birth rate below 2.1 children per woman which alone is fully consistent with the Bible’s description of the God-hating ethical rebels: “all they that hate me love death” (Prov. 8:36b). It is this suicidal birth rate which presently prevails in all Western industrial nations. This is the population program which Pharaoh hoped to impose on his enemies, the Hebrews. He was not sufficiently stupid, or so utterly perverse, to have sought to impose it on his own people.

Pharaoh saw the necessity of protecting his nation’s resources from the prolific Israelites. Three and a half millennia later, fearful and defensive socialists have similar concerns. Bertrand Russell, the British socialist philosopher and mathematician, saw clearly the dilemma of socialism: to produce rising per capita wealth, low-productivity socialism requires zero population growth. Socialism also still requires the imposition of harsh penalties against rival populations that continue to grow, just as it did in ancient Egypt. He wrote:

Socialism, especially international socialism, is only possible as a stable system if the population is stationary or nearly so. A slow increase might be coped with by improvements in agricultural methods, but a rapid increase must in the end reduce the whole population to penury, and would be almost certain to cause wars. In view of the fact that the population of France has become stationary, and the birth rate has declined enormously among other white nations, it may be hoped that the white population of the world will soon cease nomic analysis. His fear of “mass society” overwhelmed his otherwise good sense. He never understood that it is not sheer numbers of people that create “mass society,” but rather the rebellious ethical and religious assumptions of the population that create “mass society.” Röpke’s anti-population growth theme appears in several of his books, but especially in International Order and Economic Integration (Dortrecht, Holland: Reidel, 1959), Pt. II, ch. IV. (<http://bit.ly/RopkeIOEI>) to increase. The Asiatic races will be longer, and the negroes still longer, before their birth-rate falls sufficiently to make their numbers stable without the help of war and pestilence. But it is to be hoped that the religious prejudices which have hitherto hampered the spread of birth control will die out, and that within (say) two hundred years the whole world will learn not to be unduly prolific. Until that happens, the benefits aimed at by socialism can only be partially realized, and the less prolific races will have to defend themselves against the more prolific by methods which are disgusting even if they are necessary. In the meantime, therefore, our socialistic aspirations have to be confined to the white races, perhaps with the inclusion of the Japanese and Chinese at no distant date.²¹

The more progressive modern socialist ideology appears, the more satanically backward it becomes. The spirit of Pharaoh still lives. The anti-dominion defensive spirit of modern socialism has its roots deep in the past, as well as deep in hell.

Conclusion

The historically unprecedented growth of the Hebrew population in Egypt startled the Egyptians. It took 215 years for the 70 lineal heirs of Jacob and their circumcised servants, plus circumcised converts who were adopted into Jacob's family line during the first 135 years in Egypt, to grow to 600,000 men, plus women and children.

Rapid, long-term population growth in response to covenantal faithfulness is one of the promised blessings of biblical law. A potentially greater blessing waited for them in the land of Canaan: no miscarriages, long lives, reduced sickness (Ex. 20:12; 23:25–26). These blessings did not occur; the continuing ethical rebellion of the Hebrews led instead to population stagnation, a curse.

A growing population is a tool of dominion. The humanists' hostility to population growth in the final decades of the twentieth century is part of a growing suspicion of all forms of economic growth. Growth points to an eventual using up of finite resources, including living space. This, in turn, points either to the end of growth or the end of time. The thought of an end of time within a few centuries is not acceptable to humanists. Therefore, they have instead attacked the concept of linear growth.

21. Bertrand Russell, The Prospects of Industrial Civilization, 2nd ed. (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1959), p. 273. First edition: 1923. He did not change his views enough to warrant a revision of this passage.

2

IMPERIAL BUREAUCRACY

Now there arose up a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joseph. And he said unto his people, Behold, the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we: Come on, let us deal wisely [shrewdly] with them; lest they multiply, and it come to pass, that, when there falleth out any war, they join also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and so get them up out of the land. Therefore they did set over them taskmasters to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Raamses. But the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew. And they were grieved because of the children of Israel (Ex. 1:8–12).

Who was this new Pharaoh? Old Testament scholars are divided, but Donovan Courville's reconstruction of Egyptian chronology points to Sesostris III.¹ A major transformation of the Egyptian system of rule was imposed by this Twelfth Dynasty Pharaoh. The political centralization of the pharaohs of the Pyramid Age had disintegrated. Egypt had become a feudal state. Courville wrote:

During the period preceding Sesostris III, Egypt had existed as a feudal system, and historians speak of this period as the "feudal age." Under this arrangement, the territory of Egypt was divided into numerous local areas called nomes, over each of which was a prince or governor. He was not a servant of the Pharaoh and was permitted to rule undisturbed so long as he contributed his allotted quota to the king's treasury and perhaps to the army in case of need. . . . Under the reign of Sesostris III, this situation was changed. For the most part, these local princes were stripped of their power and stripped of their excessive possessions. For the first time in a hundred years or more, Egypt was now under the immediate and direct dictatorship of the pharaoh. . . . From this time on, we find no more of the tombs of these princes nor of the prolific inscriptions which they had previ-

1. Conventional historians date him as 1878–1843 B.C. (<http://bit.ly/SesotrisIII>)

ously left.”²

His centralization of political power was accompanied by an extensive building program. Courville argued that this program had to have been accomplished by means of slave labor. Furthermore, “Unlike the structures of the huge building program in the Pyramid Age, and again unlike that which occurred later in the XVIIIth Dynasty, this building was of brick and not of stone.”³ This corresponds with the account in the Book of Exodus: the Hebrews used bricks to fulfill their assignments (Ex. 1:14). Another important historical correlation is this: the building programs of Sesostri III and his successor, Amenemhet III, were in the eastern Delta region, which included the land of Goshen, where the Hebrews lived. The cities of Pi-Raamses and Pi-Thorn have been discovered in this region, but modern scholars have attributed the bulk of these ruins to Rameses II, a king of a much later date.⁴ Courville argued also that the list of the Ramessides kings in the Sothis list correlates to the earlier line of kings,⁵ which would explain why the land of Goshen was described as “the best in the land, in the land of Rameses” (Gen. 47:11).⁶

If Courville’s identification of the Pharaoh of the oppression is incorrect, then what can we say with confidence? First, he did have an extensive military force at his disposal. He put into slavery a nation of formerly independent people. Second, he was financially capable of building treasure cities. This would have required an extensive and

2. Donovan A. Courville, The Exodus Problem and Its Ramifications, 2 vols. (Loma Linda, California: Challenge Books, 1971), I, pp. 146–47. Rawlinson commented on the career of Sesostri III (Usurtasen III): “At the head of disciplined troops he gained repeated victories over the half-armed and untrained races, in part negro, in part Ethiopic, of the south. By a continued merciless persecution, he so far intimidated them, that they were induced to submit to Egyptian supremacy, and to endure the loss of freedom and independence. As he understood the value of fortresses as a means of establishing a dominion, of riveting a detested yoke on a proud nation’s neck, and of making revolt hopeless, if not impossible. He was also so far ambitious, so far desirous of posthumous fame, that he took care to have his deeds declared in words, and graven with an iron pen in the rock forever. But in this respect he merely followed the previous traditional practice of the Egyptian kings, while in his conquests he only a little exceeded the limits reached by more than one of his predecessors.” George Rawlinson, History of Ancient Egypt (New York: John B. Alden, 1886), II, p. 86. This description certainly seems to fit the personality of the man who enslaved the Hebrews, though of course Rawlinson did not believe that Sesostri III was the Pharaoh of the oppression.

3. Ibid., I, p. 147.

4. Ibid., I, p. 148.

5. Ibid., I, p. 149; cf. p. 120.

6. Ibid., I, pp. 24, 33, 45.

well-developed taxation system. Third, he was ruthless, as his attempt to execute the Hebrew male infants indicates.

A. Egypt's Theology: The Continuity of Being

The religion of ancient Egypt, like all religious systems of the ancient Near East,⁷ viewed history as a struggle between chaos and order. Our world had its origin in the primordial waters of the underworld, the Egyptians believed.⁸ Atum, the original god, created two other gods (male and female), which in turn created two more, and these two created Osiris (male sun god) and Isis, who gave birth to Horus, the falcon god of the sky.⁹ John A. Wilson concludes that chaos was not overcome by Re-Atum, the creator god, since the god of the underworld and the god of darkness continued to live, "but they continued in their proper places and not in universal and formless disorder."¹⁰

The Egyptians lacked a specific mythological account of the creation of man.¹¹ However, as Wilson made clear, basic to Egyptian mythology was the concept of continuity. "To be sure," wrote Wilson, "a man seems to be one thing, and the sky or a tree seems to be another. But to the ancient Egyptian such concepts had a protean and complementary nature. The sky might be thought of as a material vault above earth, or as a cow, or as a female. A tree might be a tree or the female who was the tree-goddess. Truth might be treated as an abstract concept, or as a goddess, or as a divine hero who once lived on earth. A god might be depicted as a man, or as a falcon, or as a falcon-headed man. . . . There was thus a continuing substance across the phenomena of the universe, whether organic, inorganic, or abstract."¹² There was no absolute distinction between creator and creature; in-

7. Joseph Fontenrose, Python: A Study of Delphic Myth and Its Origins (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959), pp. 218–19, 473.

8. John A. Wilson, "Egypt," in Henri Frankfort, et al., The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man: An Essay on Speculative Thought in the Ancient Near East (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1946] 1977), p. 45. Penguin Books published a version of this book called Before Philosophy.

9. Rudolph Anthes, "Mythology of Ancient Egypt," in Samuel Noah Kramer (ed.), Mythologies of the Ancient World (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, 1961), pp. 36–39. Anthes thought that the cosmology of Heliopolis, which was only one of the religious centers of Egypt, and only one of the Egyptian cosmologies, was more concerned with establishing the divinity of the king than with the actual details of creation: p. 40.

10. Wilson, "Egypt," op. cit., p. 53.

11. Ibid., pp. 54–55.

12. Ibid., p. 62.

stead, there was a continuity of being.

The doctrine of the continuity of being has a tendency to become the doctrine of the divinization of man. Furthermore, the divinization of man has an equally distinct tendency to become a doctrine of the divine State, or the divine Church, or the divine Church-State. The state, as the most concentrated power in human affairs, becomes the mediating institution between the gods and evolving mankind. We can see this in the history of Egyptian kingship. Wilson's summary is to the point: "The king of Egypt was himself one of the gods and was the land's representative among the gods. Furthermore, he was the one official intermediary between the people and the gods, the one recognized priest of all the gods. Endowed with divinity, the pharaoh had the protean character of divinity; he could merge with his fellow-gods and could become anyone of them. In part this was symbolic, the acting of a part in religious drama or the simile of praise. But the Egyptian did not distinguish between symbolism and participation; if he said that the king was Horus, he did not mean that the king was playing the part of Horus, he meant that the king was Horus, that the god was effectively present in the king's body during the particular activity in question."¹³ The Pharaoh deputized priests to perform religious duties, just as he deputized bureaucratic functionaries to perform administrative duties, but state theory maintained that these deputies acted for him as the supreme incarnation of the gods. Egyptian theology was polytheistic, but it was also monophysite: ". . . many men and many gods, but all ultimately of one nature."¹⁴

To understand the enormous significance of the Hebrews' stay in Egypt, we have to understand the central position of the Pharaoh. Joseph's ability to interpret the king's dream and then to administer the collection and distribution of grain elevated the Pharaoh's position, reinforcing the traditional Egyptian state theology. Then, two centuries later, Moses smashed the very foundations of Egypt by smashing men's faith in their king's position as a divine figure. Again, citing Wilson: "The gods had sent him forth to tend mankind, but he was not of mankind. This is perhaps the most fitting picture of the good Egyptian ruler, that he was the herdsman for his people. . . . The herdsman is primarily the pastor, the 'feeder,' and a first responsibility of the state was to see that the people were fed. Thus the king of Egypt was the god who brought fertility to Egypt, produced the life-giving waters, and presented the gods with the sheaf of grain which symbolized abundant food. Indeed, an essential function of his kingship was that of a medicine man, whose magic insured good crops. In one of the ceremonies of kingship, the pharaoh encircled a field four times as a rite of conferring fertility upon the land."¹⁵

13. Ibid., p. 64–65.

14. Ibid., pp. 66.

God blessed Sesostri I through Joseph. The arrogance of power led Sesostri III, his great-grandson, to enslave the heirs of Joseph.¹⁶ Within a century, Egypt was in ruins, under the domination of foreign invaders, the Hyksos (Amalekites). In the light of all this, we can better appreciate God's words to the (probable) Pharaoh of the exodus, Koncharis: "For now I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth. And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up, for to shew in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth" (Ex. 9:15–6).

B. Slavery

The Pharaoh of the enslavement followed a pattern which had become familiar in the lives of the Hebrews. Like Laban in his dealings with Jacob, and Potiphar in his dealings with Joseph, the Pharaoh recognized the economic value of the Hebrews. At the same time, he resented certain concomitant aspects of Hebrew productivity, in this case, their fertility.¹⁷ Yet he was unwilling to take the obvious defensive step, namely, to remove them from the land. He wanted to expropriate their productivity, to compel their service. It was not enough that they were in Egypt, bringing the land under dominion, filling the nation with productive workers. Their productivity was a threat to the Egyptian theocratic state. These foreigners did not serve Egyptian gods, nor did they acknowledge the divinity of the Pharaoh, the link between the gods and mankind. They were foreigners in Egypt, and they threatened to fill up the land, making the Egyptians a minority population in their own nation. How, then, could the Egyptian state appropriate their obvious productivity without surrendering sovereignty to a foreign

15. Ibid., pp. 78, 79–80.

16. Courville, Exodus Problem, I, p. 218.

17. Demographer William Peterson wrote: "The terms fecundity and fertility, originally used synonymously, were differentiated from one another only gradually. In 1934 the Population Association of America officially endorsed the distinction between fecundity, the physiological ability to reproduce, and fertility, the realization of this potential, the actual birth performance as measured by the number of offspring." William Peterson, Population, 2nd ed. (New York: Macmillan, 1969), p. 173.

people and a foreign God? The answer, so familiar in the history of the ancient world, was slavery.

It is a fact of economic life that people always want to buy goods and services on more favorable terms than are presently available. They want “more for less,” in other words. The Egyptians wanted a better deal. They hoped to gain the economic benefits of a godly people’s productivity by offering (commanding) terms of employment that were hostile to long-term productivity. They hoped to enslave the Hebrews, making it impossible for them to revolt, or to replace Egyptian sovereignty, or to flee. Yet they also expected these slaves to remain as productive as before. The Pharaoh of the exodus even accused them of being lazy, and he burdened them with the task of gathering their own straw to manufacture bricks (Ex. 5:6–19). He wanted “more for less,” or better stated, he wanted the same output for reduced expenditures. He hoped to pay less for his non-labor inputs and no more for labor inputs.

The Egyptians wanted the fruits of godly behavior and God’s visible blessings without having to humble themselves before that God and His laws. They believed that, by capturing God’s people, they could enslave God Himself. By enslaving the Israelites, they believed that it was possible to bring the God of the Israelites under subjection. This was a common belief of the ancient world: when a nation defeated another nation in battle, or otherwise subdued it, the gods of the defeated nation were themselves defeated.¹⁸ The Egyptians thought that they could trap the God of the Hebrews, as someone might ensnare a wild stallion, by capturing its “harem.” They would use the Hebrews as living amulets or talismans—magical devices that could be manipulated in order to call forth powers of the gods. They understood that the Hebrews had a special relationship with a God who provided them with wealth and knowledge. They knew that it was better to enslave such a people (and such a God) than to destroy them.

The Pharaoh of Joseph’s day acknowledged Joseph’s access to accurate secret knowledge, and he honored him and his family, transferring the sovereignty of the state to Joseph. He placed his own ring on Joseph’s hand, arrayed him in fine linen and gold, and placed him in the second chariot after his own (Gen. 41:42–43). That Pharaoh bowed to God’s sovereignty and to God’s dream-mediated word, and his kingdom was blessed by God.

18. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Bk. III, ch. 15.

In contrast, the Pharaoh of the oppression wanted Jacob's heirs to produce on Egypt's terms, without the transfer of any of the king's sovereignty. He expected to be able to control and even reduce that fertility, while appropriating the fruits of their labor. He was wrong; their fertility continued, and he was forced to attempt the murder of all the male infants in order to stop this Hebrew population explosion (Ex. 1:15–19). He, like the Pharaoh of the exodus, found that he could not control God through His people. Laban had discovered the same thing in his dealings with Jacob.¹⁹

God's plan, not the plans of the pharaohs, was sovereign over Egyptian history. The Pharaoh of Joseph's day had recognized this, and Egypt had prospered because he was wise enough to transfer the symbols and prerogatives of state sovereignty to Joseph. His successors sought to reassert their self-proclaimed divine sovereignty over the Hebrews, and the Pharaoh of the Exodus saw Egypt's wealth and military power swallowed up.

C. The Bureaucratic Megamachine

It was not only the Hebrews who were enslaved. Sesostri III re-centralized the Egyptian social and political order. He began to construct treasure cities, indicating that he had begun to use tax revenues in order to strengthen the visible sovereignty of the central government. Centuries earlier, pharaohs had used state revenues to construct the giant pyramids, which were monuments to a theology of death and resurrection for the Pharaoh (and later, of the nobility). The Pharaoh of the oppression settled for less grandiose displays of his immediate sovereignty. By Joseph's day, the pharaohs no longer built pyramids. The total centralization of the Pyramid Age had disintegrated. Nevertheless, the theology of the continuity of being was still basic to Egyptian theology, and the lure of centralized power in the person of the Pharaoh was still ready to find its political expression. Although it is true that Joseph had bought all the land of Egypt, excepting only the land belonging to the priests (Gen. 47:20–22), in the name of the Pharaoh (Sesostri I), the visible and institutional manifestation of that

19. "Thus have I been twenty years in thy house; I served thee fourteen years for thy two daughters, and six years for thy cattle: and thou hast changed my wages ten times. Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac, had been with me, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty. God hath seen mine affliction and the labour of my hands, and rebuked thee yesternight" (Gen. 31:41–42).

implicit centralization (public works pyramids) did not take place until a century later. When Sesostrius III abolished the prerogatives of the regional princes, simultaneously placing the Hebrews in bondage, he thereby asserted the sovereignty of theocratic monophysitism, with the Pharaoh as the link between heaven and earth. He formally reversed the special position of the Hebrews, which Sesostrius I had acknowledged in return for special knowledge of the future—a special revelation that Joseph had stated came from God (Gen. 41:16), thereby placing the Pharaoh under God's control. Joseph had announced, "What God is about to do he sheweth unto Pharaoh" (Gen. 41:28), making plain the true source of history and agricultural productivity. Sesostrius III attempted to deny any sovereignty other than his own, and in a massive centralization of political power, he cancelled the special position of both the Hebrews and the regional princes.²⁰

1. Pyramids and Power

The Pyramid Age had demonstrated the degree to which a political order could be bureaucratized. Max Weber, the influential German historian-sociologist, devoted the last 15 years of his life to a series of studies on the West's tendency to rationalize and bureaucratize itself. In 1909, he wrote: "To this day there has never existed a bureaucracy which could compare with that of Egypt."²¹ Lewis Mumford, who specialized in the history of architecture, concluded that nothing short of total bureaucratization would have enabled Egypt to construct its pyramids. More than this: it required the creation of a social machine. Egypt became the first megamachine, to use Mumford's terminology.²² Egyptian society had to be molded along the lines of a pyramid—a hierarchy, with the divine Pharaoh as the capstone.

The divinity of the king had to serve as the universal faith, given the magnitude of the undertaking.

20. Courville, Exodus Problem, I, p. 146.

21. "Max Weber on Bureaucratization" (1909); in J. P. Mayer, Max Weber and German Politics: A Study in Political Sociology (London: Faber and Faber, [1943] 1956), p. 127.

22. Lewis Mumford, "The First Megamachine," Daedalus (1966); reprinted in Mumford, Interpretations and Forecasts: 1922–1972 (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1972), ch. 24. It is an oddity of history that an essay on the Egyptian pyramid society should appear in a journal named after Daedalus, the legendary figure of Greek mythology who built King Minos' famous labyrinth on Crete. He supposedly learned the secret of the labyrinth from the Egyptians. See Appendix C: "The Garden and the Labyrinth."

This extension of magnitude in every direction, this raising of the ceiling of human effort, this subordination of individual aptitudes and interests to the mechanical job in hand, and this unification of a multitude of subordinates to a single end that derived from the divine power exercised by the king, in turn, by the success of the result, confirmed that power.

For note: it was the king who uttered the original commands: it was the king who demanded absolute obedience and punished disobedience with torture, mutilation, or death: it was the king who alone had the godlike power of turning live men into dead mechanical objects: and finally it was the king who assembled the parts to form the machine and imposed a new discipline of mechanical organization, with the same regularity that moved the heavenly bodies on their undeviating course.

No vegetation god, no fertility myth, could produce this kind of cold abstract order, this detachment of power from life. Only one empowered by the Sun God could remove all the hitherto respected norms or limits of human endeavor.²³

The construction of the pyramids required a reliable organization of knowledge, both supernatural (priesthood) and technological (bureaucracy). The great Cheops (Khufu) pyramid contains at least 2,300,000 stone blocks, each weighing two and a half tons, on average.²⁴ These stone blocks, if cut into cubes one foot on each side, would circle two-thirds of the earth's surface at the equator. Such a construction task could not have been carried out without a bureaucratic transmission belt. It would not have been possible to build the pyramids apart from a significant depersonalization of the people who made up this massive human machine. Mumford summarized the nature of this bureaucratic machine:

The removal of human dimensions and organic limits is indeed the chief boast of the authoritarian machine. Part of its productivity is due to the use of unstinted physical coercion to overcome human laziness or bodily fatigue. Occupational specialization was a necessary step in the assemblage of the human machine: only by intense specialization at every part of the process could the superhuman accuracy and perfection of the product have been achieved. . . . These human machines were by nature impersonal, if not deliberately de-

23. Ibid., p. 263.

24. Charles F. Pfeiffer and Howard F. Vos, The Wycliffe Historical Geography of Bible Lands (Chicago: Moody Press, 1967), p. 69.

humanized; they had to operate on a big scale or they could not work at all; for no bureaucracy, however well organized, could govern a thousand little workshops, each with its own traditions, its own craft skills, its own willful personal pride and sense of responsibility. So the form of control imposed by kingship was confined to great collective enterprises."²⁵

2. The Bureaucratization of Life

What kind of society emerges from an economic and political system that is determined to construct pyramids to glorify the eldest sons of a kingly line, and to glorify each one's transition from the god Horus to the god Osiris (at death)?²⁶ Such a bureaucratic society infringes upon the ability and responsibility of individuals to extend dominion across the earth. Such a concentration of capital in a single bureaucratic enterprise absorbs the resources that could otherwise be used to finance smaller, decentralized businesses. It also concentrates so much responsibility into the hands of a single monarch or bureaucratic regime that an error on the part of the hierarchy can threaten the survival of the entire social order. This is the kind of centralization, though on a less intense level, which brought down Egypt at the time of the exodus. Egypt lived or died in terms of one man's decisions: Joseph's Pharaoh (life) vs. Moses' Pharaoh (death).

Another important danger of bureaucracy is its lack of creativity. "Now the important part about the functioning of a classic bureaucracy," Mumford wrote, "is that it originates nothing: its function is to transmit, without alteration or deviation, the orders that come from above. No merely local information or human considerations may alter this inflexible transmission process—except by corruption. This administrative method ideally requires a studious repression of all the autonomous functions of the personality, and a readiness to perform the daily task with ritual exactitude. Not for the first time does such ritual exactitude enter into the process of work: indeed, it is highly unlikely that submission to colorless repetition would have been possible without the millennial discipline of religious ritual."²⁷ From top to bottom, in the massive Church-State of Egypt, ritual was dominant over ethics. This kind of bureaucracy produces a static social order which eventually disintegrates from external pressures, or disintegrates from its own costs and its inability to generate productive resources. Both events took place in Egypt: an early disintegration into feudalism, and then a revival of centralization during what conventional historians call the Twelfth Dynasty (from Joseph to the fleeing of Moses), which was followed by national defeat immediately after the exodus. Then, after a century or more under the Hyksos (Amalekites), Egypt experienced a brief rise of power under the Eighteenth Dynasty,²⁸ and then further decline.

25. Mumford, Interpretations and Forecasts, p. 265.

26. Wilson, "Egypt," p. 74; E. O. James, The Ancient Gods (London: Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1960), p. 117.

27. Mumford, Interpretations and Forecasts, p. 266.

Egypt could not throw off the static rule of the pharaohs, for the Egyptians remained faithful to their monophysite theology, the continuity of being. The only major change, late in Egyptian history, long after the Exodus, was an extension of the process of divinization to the common man, so that he, too, might become Osiris after his death, as the pharaohs had before him.²⁹ Egyptian culture was remarkably stable; it was the longest-lived of all the ancient kingdoms, but it was "life through institutional death." E. O. James was correct when he referred to Egypt's characteristic feature as the cult of the dead, one which assumed "gigantic proportions."³⁰ The pyramids are the most visible, most impressive, and most representative monuments to Egyptian religion and society.³¹

D. The Cult of the Dead

The Egyptian cult of the dead was, in fact, a religion of death and rebirth. It was also a fertility cult. The voluminous and painstaking researches of E. A. Wallis Budge in the early years of the twentieth century made this clear. "The central figure of the ancient Egyptian religion was Osiris, and the chief fundamentals of his cult were the belief in his divinity, death, resurrection, and absolute control of the destinies of the bodies and souls of men. The central point of each Osirian's religion was his hope of resurrection in a transformed body and

28. Velikovsky argued cogently that the Egyptian king Shishak, mentioned in II Chronicles 12:2–4, was Thutmose III of the Eighteenth Dynasty: Velikovsky, Ages in Chaos (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1952), pp. 152–55. The invasion of Israel by Shishak was in the fifth year of King Rehoboam: sometime around 969 B.C. This dating is over 500 years after the conventional dating of Thutmose III's dynasty, which is commonly placed in the early or mid-fifteenth century, B.C.

29. James, Ancient Gods, p. 61.

30. Ibid., p. 57.

31. The other major Egyptian design was the labyrinth, discussed in greater detail in Appendix C: "The Labyrinth and the Garden."

of immortality, which could only be realized by him through the death and resurrection of Osiris.”³²

Budge tried to reconstruct the basics of Egyptian religion without too extensive a reliance on the native Egyptian literature, since “we find that in no portion of it does there exist a text which is not associated with magic, that no text contains a connected statement of the purely religious beliefs which we know the Egyptians certainly possessed. . . .”³³ But magic was basic to Egyptian religion, as Moses’ confrontation with the court magicians indicates. It will not do to attribute such “base characteristics” of Egyptian religion to later developments, as Budge did, and to link them with foreign gods.³⁴ The Egyptians believed in a power religion, in contrast to the ethics religion of the Hebrews.

The gods of the Egyptians remind us of the nature gods of the American Indians. Like the Amerindians, the Egyptians were polytheistic. Budge said in 1911 that Egyptologists knew then of at least three thousand different names of their gods. But he could not resist adding, as so many anthropologists add to their accounts of pagan polytheism, “the Egyptians believed in the existence of One Great God, self-produced, self-existent, almighty and eternal, Who created the ‘gods,’ the heavens and the sun, moon and stars in them, and the earth and everything on it, including man and beast, bird, fish, and reptile. They believed that he maintained in being everything which He had created, and that He was the support of the universe and the Lord of it all.”³⁵ In short, the Egyptians supposedly believed in the same sort of distant, impotent god that late-nineteenth-century nominal Anglicans believed in, and this god was just about as important to the Egyptians in their daily lives as the Anglicans’ god was to the English in 1900.

According to Budge, the Egyptians seldom even mentioned this god’s name, “Neter.” “No proof of any kind is forthcoming which shows that the Egyptians ever entirely forgot the existence of God, but they certainly seem to have believed that he had altogether ceased to interfere in human affairs, and was content to leave the destinies of men to the care of the gods and spirits.”³⁶ In short, Budge implied, they were all basically Deists when it came to formal theism, and polytheists 32. E. A. Wallis Budge, “Preface,” Osiris: The Egyptian Religion of Resurrection (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, [1911] 1961), p. xi.

33. Ibid., p. xiii.

34. Ibid., p. xiv.

35. Ibid., pp. xxvii–xxviii.

36. Ibid., pp. xxviii–xxix.

when it came to ritual. But ritual was the heart and soul of Egyptian religion.

Ethics vs. ritual: here is the heart of the difference between the Egyptians' religion of death and resurrection and the Hebrews' religion of death and resurrection. Biblical religion places ethics above ritual. In the Book of Micah, we read: "Wherewith shall I come before the LORD, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Micah 6:6–8). In contrast, consider Budge's summary of the Egyptians' concern over resurrection, and their attempt to achieve this exalted state through the manipulation of physical means.

Theirs was a world filled with demons that could be controlled only by magic, especially word magic. They were obsessed with the physical signs of death. He writes of the dynastic-era Egyptians that they attached supreme importance to the preservation and integrity of the dead body, and they adopted every means known to them to prevent its dismemberment and decay. They cleansed it and embalmed it with drugs, spices and balsams; they annointed it with aromatic oils and preservative fluids; they swathed it in hundreds of yards of linen bandages; and then they sealed it up in a coffin or sarcophagus, which they laid in a chamber hewn in the bowels of the mountain. All these things were done to protect the physical body against damp, dry rot and decay, and against the attacks of moth, beetles, worms and wild animals. But these were not the only enemies of the dead against which precautions had to be taken, for both the mummified body and the spiritual elements which had inhabited it upon earth had to be protected from a multitude of devils and fiends, and from the powers of darkness generally. These powers of evil had hideous and terrifying shapes and forms, and their haunts were well known, for they infested the region through which the road of the dead lay when passing from this world to the Kingdom of Osiris. The "great gods" were afraid of them, and were obliged to protect themselves by the use of spells and magical names, and words of power, which were composed and written down by Thoth. In fact it was believed in very early times in Egypt that Ra, the Sun god, owed his continued existence to the possession of a secret name with which Thoth provided him. And each morning the rising sun was menaced by a fearful monster called Aapep which lay hidden under the place of sunrise waiting to swallow up the solar disc. It was impossible, even for the Sun-god, to destroy this “Great Devil,” but by reciting each morning the powerful spell with which Thoth had provided him he was able to paralyze all Aapep’s limbs and rise upon this world.³⁷

Theologically, it was the Egyptians who were in bondage. It was they who needed deliverance: ethical, political, and social. Instead, they enslaved those people whose God could alone grant Egypt the deliverance which all men need, the God who had granted them preliminary manifestations of His power and mercy under Joseph.

1. Death and Resurrection: The Contrast

The significant point here is the difference between the biblical and pagan views of death and resurrection. The places of the dead did not become centers of religion or culture for the Hebrews, nor were these locations considered the dwelling places of spirits, human or otherwise. They were just the caves or burial places of those who would one day be resurrected, either to life or death (Dan. 12:1–3). Death and resurrection were central concerns of both pagan and biblical religion, but the heart of biblical religion is ethics, not ritual. The center of the tabernacle and the temple was the Ark of the Covenant, and inside this Ark were the two copies of God’s covenant with Israel, a covenant of ten “words” or commandments. It is this summary of God’s laws of life, not the physical remains of death, which is primary in biblical religion.

The periodic celebrations of social renewal by the ancients—the chaos festivals—were their attempt to achieve metaphysical renewal. The very cosmos itself was to be reborn periodically through men’s acts of ritual chaos. They believed in a religion of revolution. By ritually recreating the “time before time”—the time of the creation, meaning the advent of order out of disorder—pagans celebrated their concept of death and resurrection. In these festivals, of which the Caribbean’s carnival and New Orleans’ Mardi Gras are pale imitations, regeneration comes from below during a temporary cultural and ritual overthrow of all normal ethical and social standards.³⁸ They wanted power

37. E. A. Wallis Budge, “Preface,” The Book of the Dead (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, [1920] 1960), pp. xi–xii.

38. Mircea Eliade, Cosmos and History: The Myth of the Eternal Return (New York: Harper Torchbook, 1959), surveys many aspects of this theology, the religion of revolution. Eliade was correct in linking Marxism and chaos festivals: p. 149. Cf. Gary from below.³⁹ (A similar theology undergirded nineteenth-century and twentieth-century revolutionary movements of both the “right” and the “left.”⁴⁰

These chaos festivals find no parallel in Israel. Instead, Israel's social renewal was covenantal, when the people gathered annually for the Passover and other festivals, and judicial, when they gathered every seventh year for a national abolition of debt (Deut. 15:1–4),⁴¹ the release of bondservants (Deut. 15:7–1), and the reading of the whole law to all people, including strangers (Deut. 31:10–3).⁴² It was covenantal renewal, not a ritual renewal of the cosmos, which was paramount. They did not celebrate the creation, which was solely the work of God; instead, they celebrated their deliverance from Egypt by the power of God, in which they had participated historically. They were to look backward toward a real historical event of ethical and national deliverance, so that they could look forward in confidence to the coming of the Messiah-deliverer, who in turn would make possible the ultimate deliverance, their resurrection from the dead, so graphically revealed to Ezekiel in the vision of the resurrection of the dry bones of Israel (Ezek. 37).⁴³

The theme of life after death is basic to most religions, and certainly to Egyptian religion. But there was a radical distinction between the Egyptian view and the Bible's. Life after death—the resurrection—for the Egyptians, as for those ancient pagan societies that imitated the Egyptian cult of the dead, was seen as a metaphysical extension of this life. The doctrine of the continuity of being from man to God on this side of the grave implies that there will be a continuity of existence between man's life now and man's life in the resurrection.

Therefore, ethical regeneration was not seen as being necessary

North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989), ch. 4: “The Cosmology of Chaos.” (<http://bit.ly/gnmror>)

39. R. J. Rushdoony, “Power from Below,” The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, I (Winter 1974).

40. James Billington, Fire in the Minds of Men: Origins of the Revolutionary Faith (New York: Basic Books, 1980).

41. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

42. Ibid., ch. 76.

43. Partial fulfillment of this vision took place immediately after Christ's resurrection from the dead: “And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many” (Matt. 27:52–53).

now in order to make possible participation in the life of the renewed world beyond the grave. In such religions, there is only one kind of final resurrection: resurrection unto life. If a man can evolve into God, either on this side of the grave, or in the shadows of death, or through successive reincarnations, then God cannot require man before death to meet ethical standards that are appropriate to man as the image of God—an image that never can become God because of the absolute Creator-creature distinction.

In other words, the cult of the dead rested on the assumption that the kind of existence which men now enjoy is the same sort of life that they will enjoy beyond the grave. This is why pagan tombs have their walls covered with paintings of hunters, or dancers, or people involved in sexual debauchery.⁴⁴ This is why Egyptian kings were buried with their gold and other valuables, including (sometimes) the bodies of their ritually executed wives.

The essence of such a religion is metaphysics, not a final judgment based on God's specially revealed ethics. There is no ethical transformation required of man, no regeneration of man by God's grace, this side of the grave. Ritual and magic—man's manipulation of the cosmos, man's manipulation of God—are substituted for ethics as the basis of the man's transition from this life through death to resurrection. Man's departed spirit must draw the labyrinth pattern to perfection, or utter the proper words to the guardian of the gate, or greet the guardian with the proper handshake. Man needs to be wearing the proper clothing or amulet at the time of death, or be buried according to tradition, or have the proper prayer prayed over him by the priest (just before death or soon thereafter), or have the ancient rites performed on schedule by the family's future priest-patriarchs down through the generations. Such practices testify to a religion's adherence to aspects of the satanic delusion.

The conflict between Moses and Pharaoh involved the clash between two radically different concepts of death and resurrection, of salvation and final judgment. One was overwhelmingly ritualistic and metaphysical; the other was distinctly ethical and judicial. One was linked to salvation through ritual chaos; the other was linked to regeneration through faith and adherence to revealed, fixed, ethical law. One deified man; the other did not. One venerated the dead; the other did not. One was a fertility cult; the other was not. As Wunderlich remarked: "The idea of a link between veneration of the dead and a fertility cult runs counter to our modern ways of thinking. But there is a close connection, so close that we might almost speak of the cult of the dead as a form of fertility magic. . . . It is based on an ancient belief that the dead know the future. Ancestors are also responsible for providing for the continuation of the race."⁴⁵

44. The paintings on the walls of the so-called "Palace of Minos" on Crete probably are tomb paintings. It was not a palace. It was an elaborate grave. See Hans George Wunderlich, The Secret of Crete (New York: Macmillan, 1974).

Such a view of the legitimacy of consulting the dead is utterly foreign to biblical religion. The one example in the Bible of a Hebrew leader consulting the dead was Saul's use of the witch of Endor—a "medium" with a familiar spirit (I Sam. 28:7)—who called up Samuel from the dead. This was in direct violation of Leviticus 19:31. God cut Saul off the very next day, as Samuel told him (I Sam. 28:19), thereby fulfilling the law's warning: "And the soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people" (Lev. 20:6). The use of the word "whoring" points to the fertility cult aspects of the cult of the dead.

Neither system could be reconciled with the other. There could be a temporary truce between them, but ultimately one or the other had to triumph. The confrontation between Moses and Pharaoh was to determine which system would surrender to, or be defeated by the other. God made it clear in advance to Pharaoh just which system would lose: "For now I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth. And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth" (Ex. 9:15–16).

2. A Digression on Greece

It is revealing that Wunderlich, whose intellectual reconstruction of the Egypt-influenced supposed palace of Knossos—the Bronze Age, labyrinth-based mausoleum venerating the cult of the dead on the island of Crete—recognized that only sterility and stagnation could result from the cult of the dead. But instead of looking to Christianity for an answer as to how the ancient world eventually escaped from this cult, he looked to the classical Greeks. He saw the classical Greeks as the inheritors of Knossos. It was they, he argued, who converted the rituals of death, including funeral plays, into a celebration of life. He asserted that this transformation was the origin of Western civilization.⁴⁶

45. Ibid., pp. 294–95, 295–96.

He failed to acknowledge just how oppressed Greek culture was by the fear of spirits, departed souls, and demons. He looked to Olympus for his explanation of the Greeks, rather than to the underground gods that dominated their lives.⁴⁷ He looked to a political religion, the Olympian gods and Olympian myths, rather than to demonology, which was the real religion of Greece.

Olympic mythology temporarily unified some of the city-states of Greece, and it bonded local families to particular city-states. Today it still unifies humanist historians and anthropologists. That fleeting century of Athenian democracy in the fifth century, B.C. continues to hypnotize Western scholars. It was a century of war and the reckless expansion of Athenian political power, which ultimately led to the downfall of Athens (when their gold ran out) to Sparta, and later to the fall of Greece to the Macedonians. Periclean Athens was a massive welfare state in which the state built huge public works projects, organized public assistance, offered pensions to the disabled, subsidized bread purchases, established price controls on bread, imposed export controls, established free theater programs for the poor, and regulated corn merchants.⁴⁸ The “bread and circuses” political religion of Athens ended in an enforced inter-city alliance, war with Sparta, defeat, tyranny, and finally the loss to Macedon. That is the fate of all bread and circus religions.

Athens worshiped politics with all its being, on a scale barely understood by most historians. It was understood by Glotz.

Five hundred citizens were to sit in the Boule for a whole year. The heliasts, whose functions were originally confined to hearing appeals against awards made by the magistrates, were now to judge in first instance and without appeal the increasingly numerous cases in which citizens of Athens and the confederate towns were involved: they formed a body of six thousand members of which half on an average were in session every working day. There were ten thousand officials within the country or outside, five hundred wardens of arsenals, etc. Thus public affairs did not merely demand the intermittent presence of all the citizens of the Assembly; they required besides the constant exertions of more than a third of them.⁴⁹

46. Wunderlich, ch. 25: “The Origin of Western Civilization.”

47. Jane Ellen Harrison, Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, [1922] 1991); Epilogomena to the Study of Greek Religion (London: Cambridge University Press, 1921) (<http://bit.ly/jehetsgr>), and Themis: A Study of the Social Origins of Greek Religion, 2nd ed. (London: Cambridge University Press, [1912] 1927). See also John Cuthbert Lawson, Modern Greek Folklore and Ancient Greek Religion: A Study in Survivals (London: Cambridge University Press, 1910). (<http://bit.ly/jclmgfaagr>)

48. G. Glotz, The Greek City and Its Institutions (New York: Barnes and Noble, [1929] 1969), pp. 131–32.

Consider this: one-third of all the estimated 35,000 to 44,000 resident male citizens of Athens in the year 431 B.C. were in state service.⁵⁰ At least 20,000 were “eating public bread,” meaning that they were either on the payroll or on the dole.⁵¹ The legend of Pericles, the legend of Athenian democracy, and the legend of Olympus constitute the basis of the legend—a Renaissance legend—of the glory that was Athens and the greatness that was Greece. It is the most enduring of all Greek myths.⁵²

E. The Denial of Time

What kind of society was early dynastic Egypt, the Egypt of the Pyramid Age? Mumford’s words ring true.

Bureaucratic regimentation was in fact part of the larger regimentation of life, introduced by this power-centered culture. Nothing emerges more clearly from the Pyramid texts themselves, with their wearisome repetitions of formulae, than a colossal capacity for enduring monotony: a capacity that anticipates the universal boredom achieved in our own day. Even the poetry of both early Egypt and Babylonia reveal this iterative hypnosis: the same words, in the same order, with no gain in meaning, repeated a dozen times—or a hundred times. This verbal compulsiveness is the psychical side of the systematic compulsion that brought the labor machine into existence. Only those who were sufficiently docile to endure this regimen at every stage from command to execution could become an effective unit in the human machine.⁵³

The culture denied linear time. It substituted endless repetition for

49. Ibid. p. 126.

50. Alfred E. Zimmern, The Greek Commonwealth: Politics and Economics in Fifth-Century Athens (Oxford: At the Clarendon Press, 1915), p. 172. (<http://bit.ly/ZimmernGC>)

51. Ibid. pp. 172–73.

52. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Appendix D.

53. Mumford, “First Megamachine,” Interpretations and Forecasts, p. 266.

progress, monotony for hope.

While the re-centralization of power by the Pharaoh of the oppression did not revive the enormous capital outlays of the Pyramid Age, it did reflect more accurately than feudalism Egypt's theology of the continuity of being. It did establish slavery, and it did involve the construction of state-worshipping public works projects. In the era of the oppression and the exodus, Egypt's presuppositions concerning the true nature of God, man, and law were manifested in the new bureaucratization.

Here was a culture devoid of any concept of progress, a culture which ignored its own history, except insofar as it built monuments to the dead. It did not even have an accurate chronology of its own kings, as Courville's study demonstrates. The Greeks paid more attention to Egypt's dynastic chronology than the later Egyptians did. Egypt was a society without a future, so it was not particularly concerned about its past. As Wilson wrote, "For the Jews the future is normative. For the Egyptians, on the other hand, the past was normative; and no pharaoh could hope to achieve more than the establishment of the conditions as they were in the time of Re, in the beginning."⁵⁴ The state would, at best, be able to preserve the status quo. Static peace, not any fundamental alteration, was the ideal, despite the fact that certain kings—Sesostris III, Thutmose III—were able to expand the dynasty's limits at least as far as Asia Minor.

The Egyptians believed that the creation originated in chaos. Here is the reigning cosmological vision of all pagan thought, from Egypt to Darwin, from Babel to Marx: order developed from chaos and is in perpetual tension with chaos. Mircea Eliade's voluminous studies surveyed this theme in dozens of pagan cosmologies, and Egypt was no exception. Rushdoony summarized this theme in ancient religion: "True social order requires peace and communication with both chaos and deity, and society either moves downward into chaos or forward into deification. The significance of the Tower of Babel is thus apparent: it denied the discontinuity of God's being and asserted man's claim to a continuity of being with God and heaven. The Tower was the gate to God and gate of God, signifying that man's social order made possible an ascent of being into the divine order. The Egyptian pyramid set forth the same faith."⁵⁵ Egyptian culture was inescapably statist. "The 54. Wilson, "Egypt," Intellectual Adventure, p. 26.

55. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2008), p. 43. (<http://bit.ly/>

one and the many were brought together in the person of the king. The Egyptian language had no word for 'state.' For them, the state was not one institution among many but rather the essence of the divine order for life and the means of communication between heaven, earth, and hell. Life therefore was totally and inescapably statist. In this perspective, anything resembling liberty and individuality in the contemporary sense was alien and impossible. . . . Deification was entry into the oneness of the divine order, and membership in the state in this life was similarly participation in the divine oneness manifested in the pharaoh and protection against the horror of chaos and meaningless particularity."⁵⁶ The product of such a theology was imperial bureaucracy.

The Pharaoh of Moses' day looked at the remarkable growth of the Hebrew population, even in the face of affliction, and he grew fearful. What if these people allied themselves to an invading army? How was it that they could multiply like this? What would stop their growth? This population growth, promised to Abraham four centuries before (Gen. 17:2), was a threat to all the plans of the Pharaoh—an uncontrolled factor in a human megamachine. Growth, in a static culture represents a frightening challenge, something beyond the calculations of the planning agencies. Uncontrolled growth—growth outside the bureaucratic plan—is a destabilizing factor for planned economies. Pharaoh knew that it had to be thwarted. Yet he was powerless to call it to a halt.

Conclusion

Imperial bureaucracy is one of the two major political manifestations of the society of Satan.⁵⁷ The other is anarchism. Imperial bureaucracy is a top-down system of central planning. It inescapably rests on the presupposition (stated or implied) that the planners are near-gods, that they have sufficient imagination and a God-like comprehensive knowledge to set forth their decrees, and that their words shall come to pass. Imperial bureaucracy is produced whenever men believe that at least some men—the central planning elite—are essentially divine, or what is the same thing, that they have no god above them to rjroam)

56. Ibid., pp. 47–48.

57. The best account I have ever read on this subject is R. J. Rushdoony's 1964 essay, "The Society of Satan," reprinted in Biblical Economics Today, II (Oct./Nov. 1979). (<http://bit.ly/rjrsos>) whom their subjects (slaves) can successfully appeal.

The idea of imperial bureaucracy therefore rests on the idea of the continuity of being: from God to the planning elite, who are the representatives of the people (who may or may not be considered part of this continuity of being).

The Egyptian state created a bureaucracy so vast, so all-encompassing, that nothing in man's history rivaled it until the rise of the modern industrialized socialist commonwealths. The state enshrined the cult of the dead in a desperate attempt to achieve life beyond the grave.⁵⁸ Life was seen as static, something that possesses unchanging continuity with life after death, at least for the Pharaoh. This static culture was statist to the core.

When the exodus came, it did not simply free an enslaved population from physical bondage. It freed them from a static, hopeless society that was doomed, even if economically successful for the kings and nobles, to endless boredom—a kind of living death. The “living” death of a Pharaoh’s mummy was mirrored in the living death of the society. God delivered Israel from a society that was based on the theology of the divine State. No king in Israel ever claimed to be divine, for only God has that right of absolute sovereignty. The people of Israel, even under the worst of Israel's kings, were never again to live within the imperial bureaucracy of a centralized divine order, except when they were again in bondage to foreign rulers.

The freedom that God provided for them was comprehensive, and the heart of this freedom was religious: the denial of absolute sovereignty any place on earth except in God's “holy of holies” in His temple, the center of which was the ark which contained the summary of His law. There is sovereignty only in God's word, not in the secret labyrinth recesses of some dead man's pyramid.

58. In the Soviet Union, Lenin's tomb became the national shrine. They kept his embalmed body in a glass case for the masses to visit. The body remains on display in 2012.

3

RIGOROUS WASTE AND RIGOROUS SOCIALISM

The Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigour: And they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field: all their service, wherein they made them to serve, was with rigour (Ex. 1:13–14).

A. Slavery and Waste

The Egyptians subjugated the Israelites. The language of this passage indicates a grinding servitude, for it lists a seven-fold subjection: serve, rigor, bondage, slavery, service, serve, and rigor.¹ Unquestionably, the Egyptians were able to extract extensive labor services out of these captives. This period of servitude may have lasted over a century; certainly, it lasted from Moses' birth until the exodus, 80 years later. Given the Old Testament's familiar 40-year period of servitude and "wilderness wandering," I believe that 80 years is more likely. Therefore, we might be tempted to conclude that the Egyptians were the beneficiaries of the Hebrews' labor services. Nevertheless, in retrospect, the Egyptians (through the decisions of their sovereigns, the pharaohs) made a disastrous error in their estimate of costs and benefits. They overestimated the benefits of the Hebrews' productivity, and they underestimated the costs of enslaving them. As they learned after the exodus, if Courville's reconstructed chronology is correct, a nation is defenseless without its army. The invading Amalekites, meaning the

1. U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus, trans. Israel Abrahams (Jerusalem: Magnes Press, Hebrew University, [1951] 1974), p. 12. The word for "slave labor" occurs five times, and the word "rigor" appears twice. A seven-fold emphasis appears also in verse 7, which lists seven aspects of Israel's population growth. If Cassuto is correct in his assertion that the number 7 is "indicative of perfection" (p. 9), then Egypt's oppression was perfectly horrible.

Hyksos, who are identified by conventional historians as the shepherd kings, were able to conquer them. They lost their Hebrew labor force, and they became the servants (slaves).²

It is hard to understand how so valuable an economic resource as human labor might be wasted in a slave system, yet economics informs us that excessive waste is characteristic of any slave economy which is not closely linked to a free market. It is the institution of a competitive market which enables slave owners to assess the productivity of the slaves. The South's slave system of the United States prior to the Civil War (1861–65) appears to have been a profitable institutional arrangement for the slave-owning planters,³ but they operated within a free market, and they produced cash crops, especially cotton, which were sold in worldwide markets. Slaves were sold at price-competitive auctions, and a re-sale market existed. The output of the slaves could be calculated rationally. Owners and renters (slaves were sometimes rented out) could make estimates of costs and benefits within the framework of a money economy that possessed a high degree of economic specialization.

The Egyptians used the Hebrews to construct treasure cities, or storehouse cities, made of brick. They also used them in the fields. However, we must recognize that treasure cities were huge public works projects built for the Pharaoh. They were statist enterprises, not market enterprises. Furthermore, there was almost certainly no open market for the bulk of these Hebrew slaves, as if all branches of the Egyptian government were competitively pitted against each other in an open auction for slaves' services. This is not to say that all the slaves were held by the state, but it is likely that the majority of them were. When the Pharaoh imposed the punishment that they gather their own straw for brick-making, he was acting as a political sovereign. The punishment made sense only as a political-theological-military decision, not as a profit-seeking economic measure (Ex. 5:5–7). Such a restraint on productivity made sense only within the framework of a state-operated construction program in which the slaves were an instrument of state power.

2. . Immanuel Velikovsky, Ages in Chaos (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1952), ch. 2.

3. Alfred H. Conrad and John R. Meyer, "The Economics of Slavery in the Antebellum South," The Journal of Political Economy, LXVI (April 1966); reprinted in Robert W. Fogel and Stanley L. Engerman (eds.), The Reinterpretation of American Economic History (New York: Harper & Row, 1971). Cf. Fogel and Engerman, "The Economics of Slavery," ibid., and Yasukichi Yasuba, "The Profitability and Viability of Plantation Slavery in the United States," The Economic Studies Quarterly, XII (Sept. 1961), in ibid. For a general introduction to the question of the profitability of slavery in the American South, see Harold D. Woodman (ed.), Slavery and the Southern Economy: Sources and Readings (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1966). The essays in this collection are older, written before the advent of the "new economic history," with its statistical techniques and econometric market models.

The Pharaoh, in any case, was the owner of all Egypt (Gen. 47:20). He was the official source of meaning in the cosmos. He was responsible for allocating scarce economic resources for the benefit of the state. The economic estimations of the Pharaoh, not the estimations of acting buyers and sellers in free markets, were the standards of economic value. It was incumbent on the Pharaoh to make accurate cost-benefit estimates if the nation was to prosper. “The king,” wrote Frankfort, “is not only instrumental in producing the ‘fat of the land’; he must also dispense it. Only then is there evidence that he functions effectively. If his bounty proves that he disposes, as a king should dispose, of the earth and its produce. . . . But the king also keeps alive the hearts of all those subjects who do not directly partake of his bounty. For he exercises a never ending mysterious activity on the strength of which daily, hourly, nature and society are integrated.”⁴ The king was understood to direct the very forces of nature. It was the king, and only the king, whose judgments concerning economic production were sovereign.

B. Economic Calculation

When the Pharaoh enslaved the Hebrews, he made a cost-benefit analysis. He concluded that the risks in allowing them to remain free were too high (Ex. 1:10). He concluded that the risks of breaking Egypt’s covenant with the Hebrews—and, by implication, with their God—were minimal. He decided that any loss of productivity on their part could be compensated for, assuming his taskmasters used whips and other coercive measures to compel their hard labor. In other words, he concluded that sheer force, and not the profit opportunities of a free market, was the best means of extracting valuable labor services from them. He forfeited the productivity of a profit-seeking people who willingly bore the costs of their own actions. He concluded that coercion was more efficient in extracting their services, despite the necessity of having to feed them, supervise them constantly, and continually pressure them to greater output. In short, he underestimated the productivity-engendering features of a free market, and he overestimated the benefits of coercion. When they left Egypt triumphantly, after God had reduced Egypt's economy by means of plagues and spoils, the Egyptians learned just what kind of economic losses a nation can sustain as a result of kings' errors in cost-benefit analysis.

4. Henri Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods: A Study of Ancient Near Eastern Religion as the Integration of Society & Nature (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1948] 1962), pp. 59–60.

The Hebrews worked very hard. Did this ensure their productivity? Can we conclude that hard work is efficient work? How do we measure or calculate efficient labor? How could the Egyptians have made such estimations? How did they know when they were getting "their money's worth" out of these slaves?

If we accepted the labor theory of value, we would have to conclude that no matter what they were assigned to achieve, their rigorous efforts must have produced profitable results. This is a good argument against the labor theory of value. But how can anyone measure efficiency if there are no profits? A socialist economy has no profits and losses to compare. A divine monarch does not permit a free market in labor services, once he enslaves a people.

Slavery in Egypt in Moses' day meant hard labor in constructing treasure cities. Hard work led to waste on a massive scale. The slaves' efforts benefited the king, and the Egyptians paid for their king's public works projects in many ways: lost labor that the Hebrews might have provided the general population, lost raw materials that went into the projects, and the greatest cost of all, the growing wrath of God, which would culminate in the destruction of the economy, the Pharaoh, and the army. The enslaving kings no doubt were satisfied with the transaction; the people, governed by a false theology, temporarily may have approved; but the end result was unmitigated destruction.

The mere expenditure of human effort on state public works projects does not guarantee a return on the investment that is positive. Without a free market, in which the competing bids of buyers and sellers of resources determine the allocation of scarce resources, there is no way for the state's officials to calculate economic value accurately. They can only make estimates, but there is no self-correcting information system available to inform them of the accuracy or inaccuracy of their judgments.

Egypt had a theology that asserted the ability of the Pharaoh to make such judgments, which is precisely the theology a consistent socialist commonwealth must have if it is to be a valid substitute for a market economy. The integration of all economic plans can be furthered by the market, or it can theoretically be accomplished by an omniscient agency; in Egypt's case, this agency was supposedly the Pharaoh. "He was a lonely being, this god-king of Egypt," wrote Wilson. "All by himself he stood between humans and gods. Texts and scenes emphasize his solitary responsibility. The temple scenes show him as the only priest in ceremonies with the gods. A hymn to a god states: 'There is no one else that knows thee except thy son, (the king), whom thou causest to understand thy plans and power.' It was the king who built temples and cities, who won battles, who made laws, who collected taxes, or who provided the bounty for the tombs of his nobles."⁵ Egypt possessed the necessary theology for a consistent socialist commonwealth, but this theology was wrong, as the Egyptians learned in the year of the exodus. The king did not possess omniscience; he did not know what the true costs of enslaving the Hebrews really were.

The pharaohs who constructed the mighty pyramids of the Old Kingdom had weakened the Egyptian economy drastically. Wilson described these structures quite accurately: huge, non-economic construction projects that were supposed to last for eternity, but which had to be followed by more of them in each generation.⁶ The brick pyramids of the later pharaohs were not equally majestic, but their construction involved comparable problems. Were they cost-effective? Only the Pharaoh could decide, since there was no free market available for men to use as a means of evaluating the true costs involved. The Hebrews were forced to work rigorously, but this could not guarantee that they were working efficiently. The wit's definition of modern commercialism applies to the Pharaoh's pyramids and cities: something done magnificently which should not have been done at all. The Pharaoh, as a divinity, was supposed to know what ultimate value really is, but he was not divine, so he faced the inescapable economic problem that has baffled all central planners, namely, the impossibility of making rational economic calculations in an economy without competitive free markets. This is the problem described by Ludwig von

5. John A. Wilson, "Egypt," in Henri Frankfort, et al., The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man: An Essay on Speculative Thought in the Ancient Near East (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1946] 1977), p. 77.

6. John A. Wilson, The Burden of Egypt: An Interpretation of Ancient Egyptian Culture (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1951] 1967), p. 98.

Mises as the problem of economic calculation in a socialist commonwealth.⁷ An economy with-out competitive markets is an economy without rational economic guidelines. It is an economy which is “flying blind.”

The central planner does not know what slave labor is really worth, for such labor commands no free market price. He does not know what the true cost of his capital equipment is, since there is no competitive market for capital goods. The Pharaoh, like any other socialist planner, could only guess. All he could do was to make intuitive judgments about what his cities were worth to him and what the actual costs of production really were. The larger the scope of the projects, and the larger the slave labor supply, the more difficult it was to make such intuitive estimates apart from fully competitive prices. But competitive pricing is precisely what socialist economic planning denies.

C. Socialism’s Economic Miscalculation

Mises commented at some length on this problem of economic calculation in his book, Socialism (1922).

Let us try to imagine the position of a socialist community. There will be hundreds and thousands of establishments in which work is going on. A minority of these will produce goods ready for use. The majority will produce capital goods and semi-manufactures. All these establishments will be closely connected. Each commodity produced will pass through a whole series of such establishments before it is ready for consumption. Yet in the incessant press of all these processes the economic administration will have no real sense of direction. It will have no means of ascertaining whether a given piece of work is really necessary, whether labour and material are not being wasted in completing it. How would it discover which of two processes was the most satisfactory? At best, it could compare the quantity of ultimate products. But only rarely could it compare the expenditure incurred in their production. It would know exactly—or it would imagine it knew—what it wanted to produce. It ought therefore to set about obtaining the desired results with the smallest possible expenditure. But to do this it would have to be able to make calculations. And such calculations must be calculations of value. They could not be merely ‘technical,’ they could not be calculations of the objective use-value of goods and services. . . . The economic administration may indeed know exactly what commodities are needed most urgently. But this is only half the problem. The other half, the valuation of the means of production, it cannot solve. It can ascertain the value of the totality of such instruments. That is obviously equal to the satisfactions they afford. If it calculates the loss that would be incurred by withdrawing them, it can also ascertain the value of single instruments of production. But it cannot assimilate them to a common price denominator, as can be done under a system of economic freedom and money prices.⁸

7. Ludwig von Mises, “Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth,” (1920), in F. A. Hayek (ed.), Collectivist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1935] 1963), ch. 3. (<http://mises.org/econcalc.asp>) Cf. Mises, Socialism: An Economic and Sociological Analysis, 2nd ed. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1922] 1951), Pt. II. (<http://mises.org/socialism.pdf>) This has been reprinted in both hardback and paperback editions in 1981 by Liberty Classics, Indianapolis, Indiana. See also Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), chaps. 7–9. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIEO>); T. J. B. Hoff, Economic Calculation in the Socialist Society (London: Hodge & Co. 1948). (<http://bit.ly/HoffCalc>)

Mises was too generous here to his ideological opponents, the socialists. Unless the state is defined as the desires of one man, which is what the Pharaoh could claim, it is not possible for socialist planners to “know exactly what commodities are needed most urgently.” They cannot possibly ascertain “the value of the totality of such instruments,” precisely because no planning agency can ever estimate “the satisfactions they afford.” The satisfactions afforded to a multitude of citizens by any single mix of consumer goods cannot possibly be known; they can only be guessed at. Furthermore, there is no way for the socialist planners to judge the failure of their estimations outside of massive revolution by the victimized consumers—a contingency made less likely by the systematic repression by the police and military leaders of most socialist commonwealths. They know that they cannot possibly make such calculations accurately, and so they spend great quantities of sorely needed capital on the suppression of potentially violent consumer dissatisfaction.

Rothbard’s summary of Mises’ argument is illuminating: “In short, if there were no market for a product, and all of its exchanges were internal, there would be no way for a firm or for anyone else to determine a price for the good. A firm can estimate an implicit price when an external market exists; but when a market is absent, the good can have no price, whether implicit or explicit. Any figure could then be only an arbitrary symbol. Not being able to calculate a price, the firm could not rationally allocate factors and resources from one stage to another.”⁹ In fact, Rothbard concluded, a universal monopoly by one great corporation is theoretically impossible, because a universal monopoly would have no market-determined array of prices to guide its production decisions. “As the area of incalculability increases, the degrees of irrationality, misallocation, loss, impoverishment, etc., become greater. Under one owner or one cartel for the whole productive system, there would be no possible areas of calculation at all, and therefore complete economic chaos would prevail.”¹⁰ Nevertheless, this kind of universal ownership was precisely what the pharaohs had attempted to create ever since Joseph’s day. Only to the extent that a particular pharaoh would turn his back on his theoretical ownership of Egypt, and would allow independent buyers and sellers to produce for a free market in goods and services, could the Egyptian economy reverse its drift into economic chaos.

8. Mises, Socialism, pp. 120–21.

9. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama:

1. Lange’s “Refutation” of Mises

There was an attempt by a Polish Communist economist of the 1930s, Oskar Lange, to refute Mises by arguing that socialist economies can use prices to allocate production rationally.¹¹ These would be hypothetical prices, established initially on a purely arbitrary basis by the central planners. If supplies cleared the markets, the price structure would be left unchanged. If not, prices would be changed until production did clear all markets.¹²

This argument ignores many things, such as the possibility of any central planning agency’s establishing an initial array of prices for mil-

Ludwig von Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), p. 613. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

10. Ibid., p. 614.

11. Lange wrote: “Socialists have certainly good reason to be grateful to Professor Mises, the great advocatus diaboli of their cause. For it was his powerful challenge that forced the socialists to recognize the importance of an adequate system of economic accounting to guide the allocation of resources in a socialist economy. Even more, it was chiefly due to Professor Mises’ challenge that many socialists became aware of the very existence of such a problem. And although Professor Mises was not the first to raise it, and although not all socialists were as completely unaware of the problem as is frequently held, nevertheless, that, particularly on the European Continent (outside of Italy), the merit of having caused the socialists to approach this problem systematically belongs entirely to Professor Mises. Both as an expression of recognition for the great service rendered by him and as a memento of the prime importance of sound economic reasoning, a statue of Professor Mises ought to occupy an honorable place in the great hall of the Ministry of Socialization or of the Central Planning Board of the socialist state.” Lange, in Oskar Lange and Fred M. Taylor, On the Economic Theory of Socialism (New York: McGraw-Hill, [1938] 1956), pp. 57–58.

12. Ibid., pp. 70–98. For a refutation of Lange, see Hoff, Economic Calculation.

lions of consumer goods and services, or even the basic raw materials and capital, both human and physical, that would be needed to produce these goods. Second, if there is no private ownership, especially of capital goods, how can customers enforce their preferences on the planners? So what if markets do not clear? So what if some firms do poorly? Since no one owns them, how can the central planners act as surrogates for customers and persuade all managers to produce the proper number and quality of goods? Third, why would central planners want to enforce the preferences of customers on managers? After all, we are speaking of self-conscious slave-holding societies. What was the Soviet Union's Gulag Archipelago of labor camps, with its millions of inmates, if not a system of slavery?

It is revealing that no socialist economic commonwealth has ever adopted Lange's hypothetical "solution" to the objections raised by Mises. Lange returned to his native Poland after the Communists took over the country in 1945. He became Poland's minister of economics. He never attempted to implement his theory. What is even more revealing is that the myth of Lange's supposed "refutation" was still found in textbooks on comparative economic systems in 1985, when this book first appeared. Mises' 1920 essay and his book, Socialism, were never cited; only brief references are made to Lange's supposed answer. Only in 1990, as the Soviet Union was collapsing economically, did one prominent socialist economist admit in public that Mises had been right. He admitted that socialism is not as efficient as the free market is. He admitted that the economics profession had ignored Mises and praised Lange for over half a century. He did so, not in a scholarly economics journal, but in a literary magazine, The New Yorker.¹³

2. Flying Blind

The socialists may believe that the systematic planning of specialized agencies will lead to a huge increase in productivity. They may believe that the co-ordination of all segments of a nation's economy can be achieved only by central planning. They may believe that people will work rigorously and therefore effectively only when compelled to do so in the name of the sovereign political order. What we learn from

13. Robert Heilbroner, "After Communism," The New Yorker (Sept. 10, 1990). Heilbroner, who became a multimillionaire from royalties on his book, The Worldly Philosophers, a study of the major economists, did not even mention Mises in his book.

Israel's experience in bondage is the opposite. Men can serve the state rigorously, but the centrally planned state is economically blind. The state may indeed overcome the so-called "anarchy" of an unregulated free market, but this in no way assures the triumph of economic rationality. As Mises wrote in 1922: "Instead of the economy of 'anarchical' production, the senseless order of an irrational machine would be supreme. The wheels would go round, but to no effect."¹⁴ Without the ability to calculate the value of any resource's contribution to the economy, and its economic burden on the economy as it is used up, the socialist central planning agency is "flying blind." Without a free market, especially a free market in capital goods, it is impossible for central planners to make any more than woefully uneducated guesses concerning economic costs and benefits. No economically rational prices exist to guide them in their task. The longer they do without a market economy, the less educated are their guesses.

A fine summary of the problem of economic calculation in a socialist commonwealth was provided by I. Borovitski, a disgruntled enterprise manager in the Soviet Union, in 1962. He complained in the newspaper, Pravda (Oct. 5, 1962):

The department of Gosplan [the Soviet central planning agency—G.N.] which drafts the production program for Sovnarkhozy [regional economic councils—G.N.] and enterprises is totally uninterested in costs and profits. Ask the senior official in the production program department in what factor it is cheaper to produce this or that commodity? He has no idea, and never even puts the question to himself. He is responsible only for the distribution of production tasks. Another department, not really concerned with the costs of production, decides on the plan for gross output. A third department or sub-department, proceeding from the principle that costs must always decline and labor productivity increase, plans costs, wages fund and labor on the basis of past performance. Material allocations and components are planned by numerous other departments. Not a single department of Gosplan is responsible for the consistency of these plans.¹⁵

14. Mises, Socialism, p. 120.

15. Cited by Alec Nove, The Soviet Economy: An Introduction, rev. ed. (New York: Praeger, 1966), p. 207. Cf. Gary North, "The Crisis in Soviet Economic Planning," Modern Age, XIV (1969–70); reprinted in North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 22. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>). See also Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989), Appendix B: "Soviet Economic Planning." (<http://bit.ly/gnmror>)

Furthermore, if such a department existed, it would still be helpless. It would possess no reliable information concerning competitive prices by which to estimate economic costs.

D. Oppression and Misallocated Resources

When the Pharaoh enslaved the Hebrews, he reduced the economic rationality of the Egyptian nation. When he and his successors began to use the labor of the Hebrews to construct treasure cities, they took another step in the direction of economic irrationality and tyranny, for they were extracting these labor services from the customer-oriented markets and redirecting them into statist projects. These projects were state monopolies; there was no way to calculate the benefits they conveyed to Egypt, except insofar as Egypt was defined as the state, and the state was equated with the Pharaoh. This enormous transfer of productive wealth—human capital—from the market to the bureaucratic state benefited the pharaohs in the short run, but it made the Egyptian economy less productive and less rational economically. The value of the labor services of an individual Hebrew could easily be calculated on a free market. The value of the labor services of all Hebrews could not be calculated in the state's public works programs.

The Hebrews were forced to work rigorously. This was significant as a means of oppression; it was not necessarily significant as a testimony to the rationality of the Egyptian economy. By transferring their labor services to statist building projects, the Egyptian taskmasters reaffirmed the commitment of the state to its own deification at the expense of national per capita wealth. The state would collect its huge "tithe" on a permanent basis. Yet it could not guarantee that this "tithe" would be used efficiently. As the Egyptians learned in the year of the exodus, there had been far better uses for Israel's labor than the construction of treasure cities and coerced work in the fields. The state could, for a time, extract labor from the Hebrews; it was unable to escape the inevitable costs. It was also unable to escape the necessity of making accurate cost-benefit analyses, despite the fact that the pharaohs believed that they had done so. The Hebrews worked rigorously, but at the time of the exodus, Egyptians learned how expensive this labor had been, and how wasteful the expenditure had been. The Pharaoh of the exodus was no longer able to enjoy his treasure cities; he was at the bottom of the Red Sea, and the treasures were gone.

A drowned Pharaoh, it should be noted, renders questionable the simultaneous belief in two possibilities: (1) the conventional dating of the powerful Eighteenth Dynasty in the fifteenth century (whose pharaohs' mummies still exist); and (2) the dating of the exodus in the fifteenth century. If you assume the former, you cannot easily hold to the latter. Yet virtually all Christian historians accept the fifteenth-century dating of the Eighteenth Dynasty. Thus, with the exception of amateur historian Courville, they have wound up arguing for both positions simultaneously, or worse, arguing for a later date for the exodus. Such is the power of humanist scholarship in our day that well-meaning Christian scholars have surrendered themselves to the humanists.

Anyone who argues for a thirteenth-century date of the exodus has sold out the case for biblical inerrancy by denying the truth of I Kings 6:1.¹⁶ This is far more serious than making yourself look ridiculous by arguing for the doubtful proposition that the exodus really did take place in the fifteenth century, but somehow it left no trace—not even a hint of a minor regional dislocation—in the records of the Eighteenth Dynasty, and furthermore, that the Pharaoh's body was somehow retrieved from the sea, mummified, and buried honorably.

It is the initial assumption which must be rejected—the fifteenth-century dating of the early Eighteenth Dynasty—because I Kings 6:1 makes it impossible to date the exodus in any other century except the fifteenth. It was not some powerful early Eighteenth Dynasty Pharaoh, whose mummies have all survived, who died in the Red Sea. Some other Pharaoh, whose mummy did not survive, and who was a member of some other dynasty, was the Pharaoh of the exodus. The Eighteenth Dynasty is therefore improperly dated by conventional historians, Christian and non-Christian. This is why we should take seriously Courville's reconstructed chronology, at least as a preliminary step for a thorough reconsideration of the chronology of the ancient Near East.

Conclusion

The pharaohs, claiming omniscience, abandoned the free market for labor—a market that offers men at least some means of evaluating economic value. They claimed omnipotence, yet the Pharaoh of the exodus was totally vanquished. They extracted rigorous service from the Israelites, yet they had no way of knowing whether or not such service from the Israelites was a national benefit. They believed that slavery was a national benefit, yet one of them finally learned that it was a national disaster. The arrogance of a sovereign central planning system was shattered in the year of the exodus. What several pharaohs had believed was rigorous service to the Egyptian State turned out to be rigorous waste on a scale undreamed of by the Pharaoh who first enslaved Israel. It was Egypt, finally, which paid the price for this waste.

16. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

The modern version of the pharaohs' economy, socialist economic planning, also rests on an implicit assumption of near-omniscience of the central planning agencies. Like the pharaohs, socialist planners are "flying blind." They cannot accurately calculate true costs and benefits because they do not have access to the information which is produced on a competitive free market. Centrally planned economies are wasteful, tyrannical, and ultimately self-destructive, just as the pharaohs' economy was. Socialist economic planning is an updated application of the religion of ancient Egypt.

4

ILLEGITIMATE STATE POWER

The king of Egypt spake to the Hebrew midwives, of which the name of the one was Shiphrah, and the name of the other Puah: And he said, When ye do the office of midwife to the Hebrew women, and see them upon the stools [birthstools]; if it be a son, then ye shall kill him: but if it be a daughter, then she shall live. But the midwives feared God, and did not as the king of Egypt commanded them, but saved the men children alive (Ex. 1:15–16).

The theocentric principle here is the legitimacy of deceiving covenant-breaking tyrants when their actions threaten God's covenant people. Covenant-keepers are to use deception in the same way that God did. God later told Ezekiel:

For every one of the house of Israel, or of the stranger that sojourneth in Israel, which separateth himself from me, and setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumblingblock of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to a prophet to enquire of him concerning me; I the LORD will answer him by myself: And I will set my face against that man, and will make him a sign and a proverb, and I will cut him off from the midst of my people; and ye shall know that I am the LORD. And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the LORD have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel. And they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity: the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him (Ezek. 14:7–10).

A. Population Control

The goal of every imperial bureaucracy is control. No factor in the economy is supposed to be left to chance. This includes the population factor. Because human labor is one of the most basic of all economic inputs, a central planning agency which would leave population growth to “chance”—the natural fertility rate of the population’s sexual partners—would be abdicating its responsibilities. The Hebrews were therefore an “unknown quantity” economically. The very presence of their growing numbers in the face of deliberate oppression was a denial of the sovereignty of the Egyptian bureaucracy.

There was also a religious issue at stake. Here was a significant portion of the total population of Egypt that was clearly out of favor with the ruler. The Pharaoh was in theory a divine figure; his protection was given to his subjects in the name of the gods. Egypt was extremely polytheistic. Yet one of the primary symbols of blessing, population growth, was present to a startling extent among this foreign, enslaved people. The literal fulfillment of God’s covenantal promise to Abraham (Gen. 17:2–6) before the eyes of the Egyptians was a standing testimony to the sovereignty of a God other than the gods of Egypt, a universal God whose power and authority were not limited to the original homeland of these displaced people. Here was a God who showed His presence among a defeated people, in stark contrast to the theory of pagan antiquity that gods are local in their sovereignty and are themselves defeated when their people are defeated by troops of another state. (See the disastrously erroneous but typical arguments of the king of Syria in this regard: I Kings 20:23–25.) The fertility of the Hebrew slaves was a visible contradiction of the theology of the imperial bureaucracy. The Egyptians were determined to call a halt to the extraordinary population growth of their newly enslaved Hebrew servants, and they were willing to resort to infanticide to achieve their ends.

The unprecedented population growth of the Hebrews served as a major threat to the sovereignty of the Pharaoh, who was the embodiment of the Egyptian state. They posed a potential military threat, since they might ally themselves to an invading foreign army (Ex. 1:9–10). They might succeed in displacing the Egyptians, since such population growth, if continued over several centuries, would fill up the land. Furthermore, the very presence of a growing population constituted an economic factor of great magnitude. How was such a factor to be incorporated into the state economic plan? How could they be controlled? How could the state supply them with basic necessities? How could the state be certain that their labor was being used in an efficient, productive fashion? How many imperial cities could the Pharaoh afford to build? How long would the resources of Egypt be absorbed by the Hebrews in their status as public works employees? The Egyptians made them work rigorously (Ex. 1:14), but this could not guarantee that their efforts would be productive.

B. The Lying Midwives

In response to the Hebrews' multiplication, Pharaoh called in two Hebrew midwives. He ordered them to kill all male infants born to the slave women. Two women acting alone would not have been able to kill more than a fraction of the male children born on any day; therefore, many commentators have concluded that these two midwives were the leaders of a midwives' guild. As representatives of the guild, they would have been required by Pharaoh to pass along the order to the other midwives. The midwives refused to participate in these evil plans. They made a moral decision. They refused to obey the king. Then they lied to him about the reason for their supposed inability to obey: "And the midwives said unto Pharaoh, Because the Hebrew women are not as the Egyptian women; for they are lively, and are delivered ere [before] the midwives come into them" (Ex. 1:19).

This passage has bothered far too many orthodox commentators. One person who could not accept the obvious—that God was pleased with their successful lie—was John Murray. His chapter on "The Sanctity of Truth" challenges their actions, just as it challenges Rahab's famous lie to the authorities of Jericho concerning the whereabouts of the Hebrew spies. "Let us grant, however, that the midwives did speak an untruth and that their reply was really false. There is still no warrant to conclude that the untruth is endorsed, far less that it is the untruth that is—in view when we read, 'And God dealt well with the midwives' (Exodus I: 20). The midwives feared God in disobeying the king and it is because they feared God that the Lord blessed them (cf. verses 17, 21). It is not at all strange that their fear of God should have coexisted with moral infirmity. The case is simply that no warrant for untruth can be elicited from this instance any more than in the cases of Jacob and Rahab."¹

I have commented elsewhere at some length on the legitimacy of Jacob's lie to Isaac.² I have also commented on the legitimacy of Ra-

1. John Murray, Principles of Conduct: Aspects of Biblical Ethics (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1957), pp. 141–42.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 27: "The Uses of Deception."

hab's lie to the Jericho authorities.³ Many of the same arguments apply here. First, what else could the Hebrew midwives have done to save the lives of the children, except lie? Second, did Pharaoh deserve to be told the truth? Did the Nazis in World War II deserve to be told where Jews were being hidden? If those Dutchmen or Germans who hid Jews in their homes to protect them in World War II had been approached by the Nazis and asked if they had Jews hidden in their homes, knowing that all Christians are somehow morally bound to tell the truth at all times, no matter what, there would have been a lot of condemned Christians and captured Jews. Silence under such circumstances would have been regarded as an admission of guilt, and searches would have been conducted. Third, what is spying, other than a lie? (This is why the rules of Western warfare sanction the execution of spies during wartime, but men who are captured in foreign territory wearing their nation's uniform are supposed to be treated as prisoners of war.) Fourth, what is wartime camouflage, other than a lie?

This last question bothered Murray, a veteran of the First World War. When teaching a children's catechism class, he criticized the lie of Rebekah and Jacob to Isaac. Then he asked the class about camouflage. He denied that camouflage is a form of lying. It is only concealment, not deception, and concealment is legitimate under certain conditions. We are allowed to conceal something from so-meone "when that person has no right to know. . . ."⁴ But that, of course, is the whole point. Did the authorities at Jericho have a "right to know," since they had been marked out by God for total destruction? Did Pharaoh have a "right to know," when he was seeking the destruction of God's people? So desperate was Murray to maintain his position of the universal immorality of lying that he speculated about the possibility that the midwives' tale really might have been the partial truth. "We need not suppose that the midwives' reply to Pharaoh was altogether void of truth. There is good reason to believe that the Hebrew women often bore their children without aid of the midwives. We may therefore have an instance of partial truth and not total untruth, and partial truth relevant to the circumstances."⁵ But he did not tell us why "there is good reason to believe that the Hebrew women often bore their children without the aid of midwives.” If this was the case “often,” then how did the midwives survive as a guild? This, in fact, is precisely the question Pharaoh should have asked them. He did not think to ask: “What have you midwives been doing all these years? Why is it that the Hebrew wives have only recently begun to deliver their babies so rapidly?” That he failed to ask them this question indicates that God had blinded him. That Prof. Murray also failed to ask this question indicates that his false presupposition blinded him.

3. Gary North, "Appendix 5," in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 838–42. Cf. Jim West, "Rahab's Justifiable Lie," Christianity and Civilization, 2 (1982–83). (<http://bit.ly/CRtheology>)

4. John Murray: A Memorial with Tributes (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1975), p. 46.

5. Murray, Principles of Conduct, p. 141.

The Pharaoh’s decision was clearly ad hoc in nature. He immediately imposed a new policy of extermination: drowning, or at least abandonment (1:22). This new policy also obviously failed, since younger men participated in the exodus—Joshua and his generation—and someone in Moses’ generation must have fathered them. The extermination policy was clearly an interim measure, and it was unsuccessful. Whether the original Pharaoh’s intent was the ultimate extermination of the Hebrew slave population, or merely a short-run population control device, it failed.

Conclusion

The midwives lied directly to the Pharaoh. Given the preposterous nature of the tale, they lied baldly and shamelessly to him. The Bible is very clear concerning God’s opinion of such outright lying: “Therefore God dealt well with the midwives: and the people multiplied, and waxed very mighty. And it came to pass, because the midwives feared God, that he made them houses” (1:20–21).

By no bending of the Scriptures can legalistic commentators find the slightest trace of condemnation by God in the midwives’ act of defiance against the constituted authority of Egypt. The state had spoken, and the midwives dealt with it in devious defiance. A biblical principle is hereby demonstrated. The illegitimate laws of a civil government may be legitimately skirted when they come into direct conflict with a fundamental biblical principle. This principle was announced clearly by Peter in Acts 5:29: “We ought to obey God rather than men.”⁶ In this case, the principle being upheld by the midwives was the morality of resisting the genocide of God’s covenant people. Godly men must obey God, not the illegitimate demands of an apostate bureaucratic state.

6. For a symposium on the question of the right of Christian resistance against tyranny, see Christianity and Civilization, 2 (Winter 1982–83). op. cit.

Had the midwives been contemporary legalists, the infants would either have been slaughtered, or else the lying, “compromising” legalists would have had guilty consciences and no new houses. But the midwives were neither legalists nor moralists. They honored God’s law in preference to the state’s law. In doing so, they acknowledged the absolute sovereignty of God, as well as the limits that God places on the authority of the state.

Addendum

A neglected document relating to the historicity of Shiprah, or at least someone bearing this name, is provided by a papyrus that is held by the Brooklyn Museum. It is a document from the Thirteenth Dynasty. It lists 90 slaves, 30 of whom had Northwest Semitic names. Shiprah was one of these names. The conventional dating of this document is about the eighteenth century B.C. However, according to Courville’s reconstructed chronology, the Thirteenth Dynasty was the dynasty of the exodus. Though the attempted execution of the Hebrew males took place at least 80 years before the exodus, in the Twelfth Dynasty, Shiprah could still have been alive in the new Pharaoh’s household. At least, Shiprah was a name that could have been used both in the era of the oppression and the exodus. This lends further support to Courville’s chronological reconstruction.⁷

7. Donovan A. Courville, “A Biblical Reconstruction of Egypt’s Early Chronology,” The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Summer 1975), p. 152. On the papyrus, see Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1959), pp. 93–94; John J. Davis, Moses and the Gods of Egypt (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1972), pp. 49–50.

5

ENVY, RUMOR, AND BONDAGE

And it came to pass in those days, when Moses was grown, that he went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens: and he spied an Egyptian smiting an Hebrew, one of his brethren. And he looked this way and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand. And when he went out the second day, behold, two men of the Hebrews strove together: and he said to him that did the wrong, Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow? And he said, Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian? And Moses feared, and said, Surely this thing is known (Ex. 2:11–14).

The theocentric principle here is the authority of God's agent of protection to intervene in order to protect the defenseless. Moses was God's agent of protection four decades before he returned from the wilderness to lead the Israelites out of bondage.

This passage raises several difficult points of interpretation. First, was Moses a murderer? Second, why was he resented by the Hebrew who had initiated the wrong? Third, what was the motivating force behind the rumor? Fourth, what were the results when this rumor became widespread?

A. Was Moses a Murderer?

Was Moses a murderer? Biblically, a murderer is a person who fatally wounds another individual, but who has not received the sanction of legitimate civil or divine law for carrying out the violent act. "Thou shalt not kill" (Ex. 20:13)¹ refers to the autonomous act of one individual against another. It does not refer to capital punishment by the civil government, since the law of God singles out crimes that must be punished by execution (cf. Ex. 22:18–20).² Also, self-defense is a legitimate excuse; a biblical case law authorizes the slaying of a thief if he breaks in at night, when his intentions—thief, violence, or murder—cannot be readily known (Ex. 22:2–3). By implication, we can legitimately slay a life-threatening (or potentially life-threatening) attacker in defense of an innocent third party, just as Moses did. An unsanctioned slaying constitutes murder. A man takes the law into his own hands; it has not been placed there by God or society. Murder is an act of self-proclaimed autonomous man against another man, created in God's image, who is entitled to protection by the law of God.

1. Chapter 26.

Moses was not sanctioned by Egyptian law to execute the Egyptian taskmaster. But this man had no biblically legitimate authority over the defenseless Hebrews. Their land had been stolen, and they had all been kidnapped—a capital offense (Ex. 21:16).³ He deserved death, as did all the taskmasters in Egypt. The New Testament affirms that Moses was a faithful man in the decision to stand with his fellow Hebrews and then in his flight from Egypt (Heb. 11:24–27).

Why did he do it? In part, because he made a miscalculation concerning the hearts of his brethren. Stephen testified to his executioners: “And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian. For he supposed his brethren would have understood now that God by his hand would deliver them: but they understood not” (Acts 7:24–25). The Pharaoh sought to kill Moses, despite Moses' position in the Pharaoh's family, when he learned of Moses' act (Ex. 2:15).⁴

Moses was clearly the most highly placed Hebrew of his day. No other Hebrew resided in the king's household. No other Hebrew had access to the highest authorities in the land. No other Hebrew had grown up under the instruction of Egyptian tutors, possibly even to serve as a ruler in the state. If Moses' act was not murder, then we have to view him as a judge of Israel comparable to Samson, Deborah, Ehud,

2. Chapters 35, 36.

3. Chapter 34.

4. Donovan Courville speculated that the daughter of Pharaoh was Sebek-nefrure, the daughter of Amenemhet III, and the last of the kings of Dynasty XII. He also speculated that she married Kha-nefer-re, the twenty-fourth king on the Turin papyrus. There is a legend that Chenephres (Greek transliteration) was the foster father of Moses, but prior to Courville's chronological reconstruction, it was not believed possible, given this king's placement on the Turin papyrus. Courville, The Exodus Problem and its Ramifications, 2 vols. (Loma Linda, California: Challenge Books, 1971), I, pp. 155–57.

and other judges who defended Israel from conquering enemies.

Israel was a captive people. The Hebrews had been unlawfully thrown into slavery. The covenant between the Egyptian state of Joseph's day and the Hebrews had been broken by Egypt. They had become captives in a foreign land. Moses, who was used to the trappings of authority, witnessed a criminal act by an Egyptian against a Hebrew brother. Moses took action, thinking there were no witnesses. He brought judgment against a representative of the Pharaoh, who had enslaved the Hebrews illegitimately. He acted as a judge of Israel.

Immediately, the rumor spread. The man who had been defended by Moses must have spread the word. When Moses confronted two striving Hebrews, the guilty initiator of violence resisted Moses' intervention into the case. He challenged Moses' right to rule by threatening him. He reminded Moses of his own act, and by implication he threatened Moses with death, since the Egyptian authorities were ready to execute any slave who killed an Egyptian. Moses instantly recognized the threat, and he fled Egypt.

The guilty man who had been challenged by Moses did not want judgment by another Hebrew. He preferred to act immorally against a Hebrew brother, striking him, if necessary, while remaining in bondage to the Egyptian state. He was ready to call the wrath of the Egyptians down upon Moses, who represented Israel's best hope and highest placed representative. He wanted to remain free to commit violence against another Hebrew, even if this freedom to act immorally would continue to cost him his opportunity to live as a free man. He preferred bondage under Egypt rather than the rule of biblical law. He preferred slavery under pagan law to freedom under biblical law. This was to be the continuing theme for many years: biblical law vs. slavish Israelites.

The speed with which the rumor spread astonished Moses, and he knew that it would be hopeless to call its further transmission to a halt. In only one day, the story had spread to one of the combatants, and possibly to both of them. Moses recognized his vulnerability. He was highly placed. He was not a slave. He was a Hebrew, yet he did not share the trials and tribulations of the Hebrews. If he could remain in his station as the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter, he could escape the rigorous service that was the expected fate of the other Israelites. But he had already decided to cast his lot with the Israelites (Heb. 11:24), and so, as the rumor spread, he knew that he would be brought down, possibly even executed. The rumor spread, which is to say that people actively spread the rumor.

B. The Envy Factor

What could have been their motivation? If Moses was brought low, what possible benefit could this have brought the Israelites? Was it not a benefit to have a Hebrew in the house of the Pharaoh? It certainly was beneficial centuries later, when Esther was the wife of the Persian king. In fact, her high position saved the lives of her fellow Hebrews. Would it not have been a wise policy for every hearer of the rumor to caution the tale-bearer against spreading it further? Wouldn't such gossip threaten the one person in high places who might mitigate the burdens of their slavery? And if Moses tumbled from power, what Hebrew had anything to gain from his loss of influence and wealth?

The answer should be obvious: no Hebrew would have been helped by Moses' fall. Yet the rumor spread like wildfire, forcing him to flee. Someone must have told an Egyptian, who carried the story to Pharaoh. The joy of acting as a tale-bearer was too intense.⁵ It was not covetousness that motivated them; it was envy. It was not the expectation of increased personal wealth as a result of Moses' fall, but rather an intense excitement from contemplating Moses' loss as such. It was Moses' very position that grated on the Israelites. It was his ability to escape their daily lifestyle that angered them. It was the sheer joy of seeing Moses brought low that helped to fan the flames of resentment and spread the rumor.

Helmut Schoeck's study of envy brings out the tremendous social consequences of this universal sin. It is the root of socialism, he argued. We cannot understand socialism as strictly the product of covetousness (which Schoeck called 'jealousy'), that is, the desire of one group of voters to legislate for themselves a portion of another group's assets. These voting patterns are also maintained by envy: the desire to destroy those who are perceived to be better off, better looking, more privileged, or whatever. Wrote Schoeck:

It is anguish to perceive the prosperity and advantages of others. Envy is emphatically an act of perception. As we shall see, there are no objective criteria for what it is that stimulates envy. And herein lies the error of political egalitarians who believe that it is only necessary to eliminate once and for all certain inequalities from this world to produce a harmonious society of equals devoid of envy. Anyone who has a propensity for envy, who is driven by that emotion, will always manage to find enviable qualities or possessions in others to arouse envy. . . . One begrudges others their personal or material assets, being as a rule almost more intent on their destruction than on their acquisition. The professional thief is less tormented, less motivated by envy, than is the arsonist. Beneath the envious man's primarily destructive desire is the realization that in the long run it would be a very demanding responsibility were he to have the envied man's qualities or possessions, and that the best kind of world would be one in which neither he, the subject, nor the object of his envy would have them. For instance, an envy-oriented politician regards a lower national income per capita as more tolerable than one that is higher for all and includes a number of wealthy men.⁶

5. On the sociology of secrecy, see The Sociology of Georg Simmel, trans. Kurt H. Wolff (New York: Free Press, 1950), Pt. 4: "The Secret and the Secret Society." Simmel was an early twentieth-century sociologist.

The Hebrews of Moses' day were envious, more arsonists than thieves, more hostile to his outward success than desirous of personally replacing him in his position of authority. They were fleeing responsibility, and they did not want to be judged by a man who would force them to adhere to God's specially revealed law, to stand up against their unlawful captors, and to take risks associated with full personal responsibility. They preferred to remain slaves and to delight in gossip against their perceived superiors.

Another point stressed by Schoeck is that envy is primarily a product of social proximity. The closer someone is to the successful person—not geographically, but socially—the more likely it is that envy will spring up. "Envy plays a negligible part where it is a question of restraining a prince, a head of state or a tycoon from absurd expenditure, but it plays an important part when one among almost equals has got out of step."⁷ This was Moses' problem. He was socially and racially a Hebrew, but he had escaped the burdens of his people. The envy of the Hebrews was not directed against the Pharaoh or his vizier; it was directed against a Hebrew who was enjoying the external comforts of Pharaoh's household. The Pharaoh was seemingly beyond a downfall; he was the incarnate god, the state walking on earth. Moses, on the other hand, was uniquely vulnerable: a Hebrew in an Egyptian court, a judge who had executed an Egyptian, and a member of an enslaved race.

6. Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, [1966] 1970), p. 19. This has been reprinted by Liberty Press, Indianapolis.

7. Ibid., p. 349.

The slaves viewed Pharaoh as a legitimate monarch, although by God's standards, he had broken a covenant between Egypt and Israel. Moses was not seen as being a legitimate judge. "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?" taunted the Hebrew offender.

Wasn't Moses trying to elevate himself over his own people? How dare he? He could be cut down to size! The Pharaoh had unassailable power; Moses had completely assailable power. Moses was envied; the Pharaoh was not. Social proximity was a threat to Moses. As a rich man among envious people, he was too close for comfort. He fled.

Modern democratic societies are especially threatened by envy, just as slaves within a slave society are. The similarity is this: men are officially alike within a democratic social order; so are slaves in a slave society. The official social proximity of the members of a democratic society makes envy far more likely than in a caste society or traditional or feudal society, with their supposedly innate class or status hierarchies. What is resented is not luxury as such, but relative luxury on the part of people who are regarded by the envious as being essentially on a par with them.⁸ This is why it is futile and even dangerous to pursue political programs of coercive wealth redistribution in an age of envy. The closer society comes to the egalitarian goal, the more envious that men will become.

Moses seemed to be "lording it over" the Hebrews. He was a lord, as the adopted son of the daughter of Pharaoh, but socially (racially) he was a Hebrew. He was close to them racially, and therefore he was vulnerable. He could be brought low—back down to the level of his fellow Hebrews—by the information they possessed. Even if it might mean his life, they were willing to spread the tale.

Moses was not a murderer; he was a judge. Yet he was forced by the murderous envy of the Hebrews to seek safety in a strange land, where he married (Ex. 2:21). He was not accepted as a judge by the Hebrews of his generation. He was like Joseph, whose envious brothers sold him into slavery. He, too, went to a strange land, and he also married the daughter of a foreign priest (Gen. 41:45). In both instances, the key role God gave to each—the delivery of his kinsman from a crisis—could be achieved only by geographical separation and social separation. Moses would return from Midian as an 80-year-old man whose old enemy, the Pharaoh, had died (Ex. 2:23). He had been forgotten by his brethren, who still groaned for deliverance. For a full generation, the Hebrews remained in bondage, while the one who might have delivered them, had it not been for their intense envy, lived in the wilderness. They paid dearly for their envy. And later, when they refused to forsake envy after the exodus, they paid with another 40 years of sufferings.⁹

8. Ibid., p. 220.

C. Envy vs. Economic Growth

Another aspect of envy is its inhibiting effect on social and economic advance. The successful man who struggles to raise himself above the common denominator faces envy because of his success. Because those around him are socially close to him, every sign of success raises the threat of envy. It then becomes imperative to conceal the extent of one's success, to keep others from discovering one's plans for the future.¹⁰ Those who would advance themselves will resort to deception. (The other alternative: moving away. This removes success symbols and successful role models and skills from the community.) Shared social goals in such circumstances must be of a sort that do not involve the kind of economic or social change that might elevate one man or a few families above the average. But elites induce economic change by testing new processes and new products. Only later, when the success of the venture has been proven, will capital be made available widely to finance an extension of its benefits to the masses. Inequality is basic to human progress. Elites always are important in the development of new ideas, new products, and new technologies. The question is this: On what basis will the elites gain access to capital? By political power? By an ecclesiastical monopoly? Or by productivity that is valued by customers, as demonstrated on the free market? We cannot escape the process of innovation by elites. The key area of innovation is knowledge. Hayek commented:

The growth of knowledge is of such special importance because, while the material resources will always remain scarce and will have to be reserved for limited purposes, the uses of new knowledge (where we do not make them artificially scarce by patents of monopoly) are unrestricted. Knowledge, once achieved, becomes gratuitously available for the benefit of all. It is through this free gift of the knowledge acquired by the experiments of some members of society

9. On envy in the wilderness, see Numbers 12 and 16.

10. Ibid., p. 50.

that general progress is made possible, that the achievements of those who have gone before facilitate the advance of those who follow. At any stage of this process there will always be many things we already know how to produce but which are still too expensive to provide for more than a few. . . . If we, in the wealthier countries, today can provide facilities and conveniences for most which not long ago would have been physically impossible to produce in such quantities, this is in large measure the direct consequence of the fact that they were first made for a few. A large part of the expenditure of the rich, though not intended for that end, thus serves to defray the cost of the experimentation with the new things that, as a result, can later be available for the poor. . . . The path of advance is greatly eased by the fact that it has been trodden before. It is because scouts have found the goal that the road can be built for the less lucky or less energetic. What today may seem extravagance or even waste, because it is enjoyed by the few and even undreamed of by the masses, is payment for the experimentation with a style of living that will eventually be made available to the many. The range of what will be tried and later developed, the fund of experience that will become available to all, is greatly extended by the unequal distribution of present benefits; and the rate of advance will be greatly increased if the first steps are taken long before the majority can profit from them. Many of the improvements would indeed never become a possibility for all if they had not long before been available to some. If all had to wait for better things until they could be provided for all, that day would in many instances never come. Even the poorest today owe their relative material well-being to the results of past inequality.¹¹

Compulsory, state-enforced programs of wealth redistribution are inimical to the social and economic progress of civilization. So is envy. Envy leads to a present-oriented society. This is a lower-class society, in Edward Banfield's definition.¹² Why should this present-orientation be

11. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), pp. 43–44. Chapter 6 of Hayek's book, "The Common Sense of Progress," is invaluable.

12. Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City Revisited (Boston: Little, Brown, 1973), pp. 53–54, 61–62. In the original book, The Unheavenly City (Little Brown, 1970), he included a more hard-hitting analysis of the lower-class, present-oriented individual: pp. 217–23. Wrote Banfield in Revisited: "The implication that lower-class culture is pathological seems fully warranted both because of the relatively high incidence of mental illness in the lower class and also because human nature seems loathe to accept a style of life that is so radically present-oriented" (p. 63). He was incorrect on one point: it is not "human nature" as such which is loathe to accept present-oriented, lower-class culture. It is Christianity which finds it loathsome.

the product of envy? Schoeck elaborated:

The future, the only field where the fruits of any development are to be reaped, lends itself to a co-operative approach, to exploitation by men able to exchange and co-ordinate their ideas, knowledge and desires. But this is conceivable only when fear of the other's envy, of his possible sabotage or malicious sorcery, has to some extent been overcome. No one can even begin to have rational aspirations for the future unless he has a realistic view of what the future may be; but no such prognosis can be made so long as each member of the group carefully keeps hidden his view of the future. Nor can a view that is conducive to social and economic development be formed within a group until its individual members are able, in frank discussion, to compare, weigh and synchronize all their different pictures of the future. It is precisely this, however, which more than anything else is impeded by the ever-present fear that basically everyone, more especially our near neighbour, is potentially envious and that the best defence against him is to pretend complete indifference about the future.¹³

D. Envy vs. Deliverance

This analysis throws light on Moses' experience. How could he serve as a leader of his people, given their entrenched envy? How could he conspire with them to co-ordinate their efforts? He knew within 24 hours of his execution of the Egyptian that his position as a judge of Israel had been rejected by the Israelites. The best approach was immediate flight. He would wash his hands of them. God refused to allow him to wash his hands of them. For decades, he was able to concentrate on his own affairs, independent of his brethren, developing his talents as a shepherd—skills that he would subsequently put to use during the final 40 years of his lifetime—but at last God called to him out of the burning bush. Moses resisted, but eventually he went back to Egypt. This time, he came as a stranger. This time, he came as an independent outsider from another land. This time, he was not easily envied, since few Hebrews could look upon him as a social equal who had somehow been elevated to a position of vulnerable authority. This time, he came with signs and wonders to demonstrate his position as a judge, one who came in the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This time, he would confront the Pharaoh directly, not intervene secretly to eliminate one Egyptian persecutor. This time, he would not be in a position to be ruined by the envy-motivated gossip of a slave population. This time, a God-inspired future-orientation would motivate him, and the Hebrew slaves followed out of awe, fear, and hope. This time, he came as God's acknowledged agent, not as a social equal. This time, his continual victories over Pharaoh would demonstrate just who it was who had raised him up. This time, it was Pharaoh, not a Hebrew slave, who would ask him who he thought he was. No Hebrew in Egypt would again taunt him with the words, "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?" This time, they knew. This time, most important of all, they went free.

13. Schoeck, Envy, p. 46.

Conclusion

Moses was the victim of envy when the Hebrews of his youth refused to subordinate themselves to his rule. They spread the rumor of his execution of the Egyptian. He fled into the wilderness for 40 years, leaving his brethren in slavery for an additional 40 years. Gossip placed a whole generation in needless bondage. Bondage was God's judgment on them.

The sin of envy strikes the sinner. It restricts his ability to cooperate with his fellow man. It rankles in his heart and can lead to slower or even zero economic growth. In the case of the Israelites, it led to an additional 40 years of bondage. The Hebrews preferred to live in bondage to a socially distant, cruel, self-proclaimed divine monarch rather than subordinate themselves under a man of their own covenant. They preferred to be slaves than to be under God's representative, Moses. They preferred the delights of rumor-spreading to the delights and responsibilities of freedom. They preferred to tear down Moses from his pedestal rather than elevate themselves, under Moses' leadership, to freedom. They received what they wanted: another generation of servitude.

6

CUMULATIVE TRANSGRESSION AND RESTITUTION

And I will give this people favour in the sight of the Egyptians: and it shall come to pass, that, when ye go, ye shall not go empty: But every woman shall borrow of her neighbour, and of her that sojourneth in her house, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment: and ye shall put them upon your sons, and upon your daughters; and ye shall spoil the Egyptians (Ex. 3:21–22).

The theocentric principle here is restitution, which God requires of all transgressors against Him and His people

God's promise to Moses was explicitly and completely fulfilled at the time of the exodus. Plague after plague had come upon the Egyptians. They could stand no more after the final plague, the death of the firstborn child of every house. "And the Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out of the land in haste; for they said, We be all dead men" (Ex. 12:33).

In order to speed the Hebrews along their way out of the land, the Egyptians gave them what they requested: spoils. God's promise to Moses had not been a mere prophecy; it had been a command. "And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment" (Ex. 12:35). The Hebrew verb translated as "borrow" is the normal, everyday Hebrew word for "ask."¹ This was a form of tribute, like military spoils. The Israelites incurred no debt to repay. Both the Egyptians and the Israelites understood this.

The language of the Bible is peculiar here. First, the Israelites were told that they would find favor in the eyes of the Egyptians. This is an odd use of the word "favor." It did not signify love on the part of the

1. U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, The Hebrew University, [1951] 1974), p. 44.

Egyptians. Their favor was the product of extreme fear. They feared the Israelites, for the God of these slaves was too powerful and dangerous. The Egyptians were not converted to this God; they did not choose to worship Him. They chose instead to remove His people from their midst, to put the fearful arm of God into a different nation. They hoped to escape the earthly wrath of God by encouraging the Israelites to leave as rapidly as possible, even though the Israelites possessed the “borrowed” wealth. Pharaoh did not even wait until morning to call Moses and Aaron before him (Ex. 12:31). The favor of the Egyptians was a fear-induced favor.

The second peculiarity of language is the use of the word translated by the King James translators as “borrow.” It clearly means “ask,” but here it implies “to extract under threat of violence.” It meant tribute—in this case, tribute to a departing army rather than to an invading one. The Israelites had not tried to invade Egypt militarily, but the Egyptians had created a hostile nation within the boundaries of Egypt by having placed the Israelites in bondage.

A. Slavery

It is not clear just how long the Israelites had been in bondage. By the year of the exodus, they had been slaves for at least 80 years, since Moses was born during the reign of the Pharaoh of the infanticide edict, and he led the nation out of Egypt when he was 80 (Ex. 7:7; he died at age 120 [Deut. 34:7], and Israel spent 40 years in the wilderness [Num. 14:33–34]). Courville’s reconstruction indicates that the daughter of Pharaoh who brought up Moses was the daughter of Amenemhet III, who succeeded Sesostri III.² Sesostri III, concludes Courville, was the Pharaoh who first enslaved the Israelites.³ Therefore, the Israelites were in actual bondage for perhaps a century, possibly one or two decades longer. I believe they were in bondage for 80 years: two 40-year periods. It would depend on the point of time in the reign of Sesostri III that he placed the Israelites in bondage. If Courville’s reconstruction is incorrect, or if he has not accurately identified the proper kings of Egypt, then all we can say in confidence is that the enslavement was at least 80 years. This conclusion rests on the additional assumption that the Pharaoh of the enslavement was the same as the

2. Donovan Courville, The Exodus Problem and Its Ramifications, 2 vols. (Loma Linda, California: Challenge Books, 1971), I, p. 157.

3. Ibid., I, pp. 147–48.

Pharaoh of the infanticide edict, and that the edict was made at the same time as the enslavement, and that Moses was born in that year. Because none of these correlations is mandatory, it is possible that the enslavement was longer than 80 years.

Slavery is a valid form of economic activity, according to the Bible, but only under very specific limitations. The maximum term of a brother's service for defaulting on a zero-interest charitable loan is six years (Deut. 15:12). Even if a Hebrew were to sell himself to a foreigner, he retained the right of redemption, as did his relatives (Lev. 25:47–55).⁴ No Hebrew could be enslaved under any circumstances for more than 49 years, for all of them belonged to God (Lev. 25:54–55). The only perpetual slaves were those of the conquered local tribes of Canaan, and only after Israel had taken possession of her land, and also slaves purchased from caravaners (Lev. 25:44–46).⁵ The Hebrews had been given the land of Goshen, for Joseph had saved the lives of all Egyptians (Gen. 47:11). The Egyptians had stolen Israel's freedom. They had executed Hebrew children (Ex. 1). They had stolen generations of Hebrew labor. They had asserted illegitimate sovereignty over God's people. They had not set them free in the seventh year. In 1491 B.C., the bills came due.

B. Restitution

If Israel could be punished by God for ignoring His laws regulating slavery, it is not surprising that Egypt should be forced to offer restitution. The years in Egypt were to serve as a reminder to Israel of the horrors and injustice of unregulated slavery: the terrors of being a stranger. The experience was supposed to move them to justice (Ex. 22:21;⁶ 23:9;⁷ Deut. 10:17–19; 15:15). Jeremiah spared no words when Israel violated the laws regulating slavery. He promised them the sword, the pestilence, and the famine; he promised them captivity (Jer. 34:8–17).⁸ His words were fulfilled. The Israelites did not take the preferred form of escape.

Neither did the Egyptians. The Egyptians had sinned for several

4. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press [1994] 2012), ch. 32.

5. Ibid., ch. 31.

6. Chapter 36.

7. Chapter 54.

8. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 18.

generations. God had spared their fathers, but in Moses' day, God extracted restitution from the sons. He visits the iniquity of the fathers upon later generations of those who hate Him (Ex. 20:5).⁹ Not that the sons are punished for their fathers' sins (Deut. 24:16); every man is to be put to death for his own sin. But the iniquities of fathers in a society tend to be the iniquities of the sons. There is historical continuity in life. Some of the fathers and grandfathers had escaped external, cultural judgment, and their sons continued in the same sin. But there came a time when the restitution came due. All the sabbatical years of release that had been ignored, and all the capital goods that had been required for them to give to the released slaves (Deut. 15:14),¹⁰ had to be paid, plus a penalty for theft (Lev. 6:5), by that final generation. They themselves went into bondage to the invading Amalekites (Hyksos, called the shepherd kings by conventional historians) for at least a century.¹¹ The glory of Egypt was removed.

If the sons are not to be punished for the sins of their fathers, why should the Egyptian generation in the year of the exodus have been required to bear such a heavy economic burden? The explanation that is most consistent with biblical law is the argument from the concept of familistic capital. The heirs of earlier generations of enslaving Egyptians had become the beneficiaries of the labor of earlier generations of Hebrews. The fathers and grandfathers had extracted labor from the Hebrews at below-market prices. Had below-market pricing not been in effect, they could have hired the Hebrews to construct the cities. However, they wanted something for nothing: rigorous labor without competitive wage rates. They had sunk their capital into monuments for the Egyptian state. They had escaped the taxation levels that would have been necessary to hire the services of the Hebrews, had there been a free market for labor services. Their heirs had become the beneficiaries of all the capital that had been retained within the families—capital that would have gone to the Pharaoh in the form of additional taxes to finance his self-glorifying public works projects.

Furthermore, we can conclude that such capital could have been invested in growth-producing activities. We have no idea what the compound rate of economic growth was in that era, but some growth in capital was possible. Therefore, the sons who saw their riches “borrowed” by the Hebrews were simply returning the compounded capital that they and their ancestors had coercively extracted from the Hebrews. The Hebrews had been forced to pay homage, in the form of taxes in kind (labor services, forfeited freedom), to the Egyptian state. Now the heirs of Joseph were collecting on past accounts that had finally come due. They were collecting capital that lawfully belonged to them. The Egyptians were simply paying restitution. God had prospered the pharaohs by giving one of them a monopoly over the grain supplies in an era of famine. God’s representative, Joseph, had provided the necessary agricultural forecast and the efficient administration of the program.¹² Then the heirs of the Pharaoh enslaved the Hebrews, who had been promised the land of Goshen as a permanent reward (Gen. 45:8–10; 47:6). The state, in the person of Pharaoh, had broken its covenant with Israel. That covenant was a civil covenant with God, since it had been established with His people. God, in the day of the exodus, collected His lawful tribute. They had broken their treaty with His people, and as the Hebrews’ lawful sovereign, He intervened to bring judgment upon the Egyptians.

9. Chapter 22.

10. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press [1999] 2012), ch. 37.

11. Siegfried Schwantes, A Short History of the Ancient Near East (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1965), p. 76. Other historians believe that the period of the Hyksos may have been two centuries. Courville believed that the Hyksos period was over four centuries: from the exodus to Solomon. Courville, Exodus Problem, I, pp. 124–25.

There is no escape from the laws of God, either individually or socially. God held the Egyptians fully responsible for upholding their covenant with the Hebrews. The Egyptians had profited from Joseph’s warning. They had also profited from the labor provided by generations of Hebrews. They were held fully responsible for decisions made by the pharaohs. They paid for their sins, and because of the additional capital possessed by the Egyptians of the exodus period—as a direct result of the reduced taxes paid by their ancestors—they also paid for the sins of their fathers. After all, the Egyptians of the exodus period were the beneficiaries of the sins of their fathers. They had been bound by the terms of their fathers’ promise to Israel that the land of Goshen would belong to Israel, and they had broken this covenant.

The Egyptians paid more than jewels to the Hebrews. They paid their firstborn. God had told Moses that this would be the price extracted from them if they did not repent through their representative, the Pharaoh: “And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my firstborn. And I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me: and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn" (Ex. 4:22–23). The Egyptians had enslaved God's firstborn. They had, in effect, kidnapped them. The penalty for kidnapping is death (Ex. 21:16).¹³ By refusing to allow the Israelites to go and sacrifice to their God, the Pharaoh was admitting that he was guilty of kidnapping, for he was stating clearly that the people of Israel were his, when in fact they belonged to God. When the Egyptians made restitution, it was expensive beyond their wildest imaginations. The heirs (firstborn) of the slave-owners were slain.

12. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 33.

C. Tribute

The Pharaoh, as a self-proclaimed divinity, was viewed as the only incarnate representative on earth of the Egyptian gods. It was the king who brought the crucially important annual flood of the Nile. Frankfort commented on this: "Even as late an author as Ammianus Marcellus [late 4th century, A.D.—G.N.] knew that the Egyptians ascribed plenty or famine to the quality of their king—not, in a modern sense, to his quality as an administrator, but to his effectiveness as an organ of integration, partaking of the divine and of the human and entrusted with making the mutual dependence of the two a source of 'laughter and wonder.'"¹⁴ It was the king who, as a divine being, brought moral order to the whole world. Thus, when the Pharaoh of the famine established policies that assured Egypt's survival during seven years of famine, thereby reestablishing his ownership of all Egypt, his followers could interpret his acts as inspired. The Pharaoh could be understood as having reemphasized his own divinity, and the power of the Egyptian gods, before his people.

By enslaving the Hebrews, the later Pharaoh was elevating the gods of Egypt above the God of Joseph. The ancient world interpreted a military victory by one nation or city-state as the victory of its gods over the gods of the defeated people. Thus, by enslaving the Hebrews, the Pharaoh was announcing the sovereignty of Egypt's gods over Joseph's God. By bringing Egypt to its knees at the time of the exodus, God was ritually announcing His sovereignty in the most graphic way possible. The Egyptians had lost their prosperity, their children, and now their jewelry. The gods of Egypt had been brought low. Only the outright destruction of Egypt's army, followed by an invasion and conquest by foreigners, could have made the picture any more graphic, and these events were shortly to follow. The Pharaoh-god would perish with his army.

13. Chapter 34.

14. Henri Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods: A Study of Ancient Near East Religion as the Integration of Society & Nature (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1948] 1962), p. 58.

The gods of Egypt paid tribute to the God of Israel. This tribute was paid by the representative of Egypt's gods, Pharaoh, as well as his subordinates, the nobles and wealthy people who had amassed great capital. It was paid to servants who represented the God of Israel. The humiliation in such a transaction is easily understood.

D. The Slave Wife

The exodus can be seen from another perspective, that of a man who rejects his slave-wife. Exodus 11:1 has been translated in the King James Version as follows: "And the LORD said unto Moses, Yet will I bring one plague more upon Pharaoh, and upon Egypt; afterwards he will let you go hence: when he shall let you go, he shall surely thrust you out hence altogether." An alternative reading throws more light on the concluding clause: ". . . after that he will let you go hence; as one letteth go a slave-wife shall he surely expel you hence."¹⁵ Exodus 21 begins the detailed presentation of the laws of God, immediately after the presentation of the ten commandments, or general principles of God's law. What is significant about Exodus 21 is that it begins with the laws applying to slavery, the social and economic condition from which God has just freed His people. It was a topic which was eminently familiar to them.

Exodus 21:7–11 provides the laws dealing with the slave wife.¹⁶ If a man sold his daughter to be the wife of a master, with the purchase price going to the father rather than to the wife as her dowry, then she needed protection. The dowry was permanently forfeited by the husband if he unlawfully divorced her, or did not deal with her as a lawful wife. Rushdoony has commented on the function of the dowry: "The dowry was an important part of marriage. We meet it first in Jacob, who worked seven years for Laban to earn a dowry for Rachel (Gen. 29:18). The pay for this service belonged to the bride as her dowry, and Rachel and Leah could indignantly speak of themselves as having been 'sold' by their father, because he had withheld from them their dowry

15. David Daube, The Exodus Pattern in the Bible (London: Faber & Faber, 1963), p. 56. He relied heavily on the work of Reuven Yaron's article in the Revue Internationale des Droits de l'Antiquité, 3rd Series, Vol. IV (1957), pp. 122ff.

16. Chapter 32.

(Gen. 31:14, 15). It was the family capital; it represented the wife's security, in case of divorce where the husband was at fault."¹⁷

The girl who was sold to a master did not personally possess a dowry; it belonged to her father. She had the legal status of a concubine: a wife without a dowry. Biblical law nevertheless protected her. If the master decided not to marry her after all, he was required to allow her to be redeemed (bought back); he could not sell her into a foreign nation, "seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her" (Ex. 21:8).¹⁸ "And if he have betrothed her unto his son, he shall deal with her after the manner of daughters. If he take him another wife; her food, her raiment, and her duty of marriage, shall he not diminish. And if he do not these three things unto her, then she shall go out free without money" (Ex. 21:9–11). In other words, her family, which had received payment for her, owed the master nothing under such circumstances. She did not have to be bought back.

Israel had not been treated justly in Egypt. Her Egyptian "husband" had not dealt with her as a lawful wife. She deserved her freedom, but the Egyptians had refused to let her go. Furthermore, Israel had never been a slave-wife. Joseph had increased Egypt's wealth, and Pharaoh had granted Israel the land of Goshen. The value of that good land, the best in Egypt (Gen. 47:11), had been transferred to Israel. This was Israel's dowry. Now Israel was being cast out, as if she were a slave-wife. A real wife is entitled to her dowry. Instead of a mortgage on the land of Goshen, which the Egyptians should have paid to Israel, the Israelites took the jewels (female adornment) of the Egyptians. Egypt could not legitimately treat Israel as a slave wife, sending her out without her lawful dowry. The verse following God's revelation that Pharaoh would expel Israel as a slave-wife reads: "Speak now in the ears of the people, and let every man borrow of his neighbour, and every woman of her neighbour, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold" (Ex. 11:2).

Conclusion

Egypt could not escape the principle of restitution. Restitution extends to the cross. God required payment by His Son, Jesus Christ, to atone for the sins of mankind, both collectively (common grace) and individually.¹⁹ This transaction should also be understood as the pay-

17. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 176–77.

18. Chapter 32.

19. Gary North, "Common Grace, Eschatology, and Biblical Law," The Journal of

ment of a dowry, thereby making the church, Christ's bride, a lawful wife, not just a concubine. Egypt made restitution. Egypt offered her sacrifice, the firstborn, to God, since no Egyptian was willing to make restitution by the shedding of a lamb's blood, "for there was not a house where there was not one dead" (Ex. 12:30b). God required restitution for the years of servitude beyond the maximum permitted, six. In fact, Egypt even owed Israel for the first six years, since the six-year slave contract was a debt-slavery contract, and Israel had not been in debt to Egypt. Egypt had acted as though Israel had been a lawful captive in wartime, or a debtor to Egypt. Israel was neither. Furthermore, Egypt owed restitution for having kidnapped Israel. Egypt owed Israel for having treated Israel as less than a full wife, trying to expel her without returning her dowry, as though she had been a slave-wife. Egypt paid dearly for these acts of long-term lawlessness.

The cost of the pharaohs' brick pyramids and brick treasure cities turned out to be far higher than any Egyptian, especially the various pharaohs, had dared to calculate. Any intuitive cost-benefit analysis in the mind of a pharaoh—so many benefits, in time and eternity, from a new pyramid or city versus so many expenditures in feeding and controlling the Hebrew slaves—turned out to be catastrophically erroneous. The pharaohs drastically overestimated the benefits of their construction projects, and they underestimated the real costs of enslaving the Hebrews.²⁰ The pharaohs had abandoned their most important pair of guidelines for making accurate cost-benefit analyses, namely, the free market, which establishes prices through competitive bidding, and the law of God, which establishes God's justice. All the pharaohs, from the enslaving Pharaoh to the Pharaoh of the exodus, ignored the principle of restitution in their dealings with the Israelites. When the final bills came due, ancient Egypt collapsed.

Christian Reconstruction, III (Winter 1976–77). Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

20. Chapter 3.

THE OPTIMUM PRODUCTION MIX

And Pharaoh said, Behold, the people of the land now are many, and ye make them rest from their burdens. And Pharaoh commanded the same day the taskmasters of the people, and their officers, saying, Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore: let them go and gather straw for themselves (Ex. 5:5–7).

The theocentric issue here is God's three omnis: omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence. He is not affected by scarcity. The creation is limited. God is not. To maximize output, men need a plan to coordinate the factors of production, including other men. God has a plan: subjective and objective. His plan is the basis of all human plans. He imputes meaning and order to the creation.

A. The Confrontation Begins

God witnessed the oppression of His people by the Egyptians for at least 80 years (Ex. 3:9). He sent Moses and Aaron before the Pharaoh. God did not instruct Moses to ask for an immediate and permanent release of His people from bondage; Moses was only to request a time of religious sacrifice for them (Ex. 3:18; 5:1). However, given the theology of Egypt, this would have to be regarded by the Pharaoh as blasphemy.

The Pharaoh was believed to be the sole divine-human link, the god Horus walking on earth, who would become Osiris at his death, and who was also the descendant of Re, the sun god. Frankfort has summarized this doctrine of divine kingship: "Egyptian kingship emerged at the end of the predynastic period. Of this the Egyptians were well aware; they recognized a first king of the first dynasty, Menes. Tradition named as his predecessors the 'semi-divine spirits' who had succeeded rule by the gods. These in their turn had been preceded by the Creator, Re. Monarchical rule, then, was coeval with the universe; the Creator had assumed kingship over his creation from the first.”¹

Moses’ request to allow the Israelites to sacrifice to a foreign God was an affront to this Pharaoh. This Thirteenth Dynasty king²—weak dynasty—was not ready to admit the existence of any rival to his self-professed divine status. His answer was the answer of a supposed cosmological sovereign: “And Pharaoh said, Who is the LORD, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not the LORD, neither will I let Israel go” (Ex. 5:2). Like Nebuchadnezzar after him (Dan. 3:15), Pharaoh saw himself as the divine-human link, the capstone of a bureaucratic pyramid in a divine state, beyond which there could be no appeal. Also like Nebuchadnezzar, he was cut down in the midst of his kingdom.

Pharaoh was so enraged at the request of Moses, that he decided to impose a punishment on the Israelites. He forbade the taskmasters to deliver straw to the Hebrews for the construction of bricks. Their work load would therefore increase, since the size of the bricks would remain the same, and presumably also the numerical quotas. “And the tale of the bricks, which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon them; ye shall not diminish ought thereof: for they be idle; therefore they cry, saying, Let us go and sacrifice to our God” (Ex. 5:8).³

This punishment was calculated to accomplish several ends. First and perhaps most important, it was to discourage Moses and Aaron from challenging his authority as a divine master. If they did it again, their people would be injured even more. Second, it was an effective means of alienating the people from these two leaders. If, every time they came before Pharaoh in the name of their God, the two leaders would draw the wrath of Pharaoh upon the Israelites, the Israelites would presumably seek to disassociate themselves from the pair. They would bring pressure on them to cease and desist. This would tend to discourage all future leaders from rising up in the name of the slaves,

1. Henri Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods: A Study of Ancient Near Eastern Religion as the Integration of Society & Nature (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1948] 1962), p. 15.

2. I am assuming the correctness of Donovan Courville’s reconstructed chronology of Egypt.

3. Prof. A. S. Yahuda argued that the use of the Hebrew word for “tale” is so specific that it demonstrates that Exodus was not written by some post-exilic priest. The “tale” was a specific measurement, not a numerical quantity. He pointed to the discovery of a tomb picture which shows a man measuring the bricks. The writer of Exodus was therefore familiar with this specific usage. Yahuda, The Accuracy of the Bible (New York: Dutton, 1935), pp. 76–77.

or in the name of their God. The slaves, without leadership, would remain slaves. Third, the Pharaoh would be able to reduce the costs of construction of his cities. The output of the slaves would remain constant, but the state's input costs would be reduced. No longer would Egyptians be expected to supply the Israelites with straw. This labor service would henceforth come from the slaves. Fourth, the slave population would be scattered (Ex. 5:12), thereby reducing the potential military threat to Egypt.

Pharaoh removed one of the crucial factors of production from the brick-making process, yet he required that the daily output of bricks be maintained. His edict reduced the division of labor, since it forced the Hebrews to search out and collect straw, in addition to producing the bricks. Specialization was reduced. The edict required the same output despite a reduction in raw material costs. Given the inescapable reality of scarcity, the edict therefore required a compensating increase in labor inputs from the slaves. These would be unpaid labor inputs. Previously, the slaves had been allowed to concentrate on the task of producing bricks from the raw materials supplied by the Egyptian state. Now their time would also be expended in achieving an additional step in the production process. They would have to work longer hours, or work more intensively, or both, in order to produce the same quantity and size of bricks. Specialists in straw-gathering may have been recruited from within the Hebrew community and trained. They would have been removed from the normal work force, thereby increasing the labor burden on those who remained in close proximity to the construction projects. The edict by Pharaoh placed a great burden on the backs of an already heavily burdened slave population.

B. Reduced Efficiency

The punishment was fully consistent with the nature of the sin of the slaves, as perceived by Pharaoh. He said that they were idle, since they wanted time off to sacrifice to their God. Such a waste of time could not be tolerated. It was idleness to substitute the worship of God for brick production. "Let more work be laid upon the men, that they may labour therein; and let them not regard vain words" (Ex. 5:9).

Obviously, there was no day of rest for these slaves. It was a life of almost unending drudgery, one which provided little hope. The Hebrews were destined to spend their lives working on public works projects that honored a false god, the Egyptian Pharaoh, and by implication, the Egyptian state. Only the god of the state might be legitimately honored, and its service was a heavy yoke, one devoid of hope. The static empire of Egypt would, if the Pharaoh had his way, require the compulsory service of the Hebrews until the end of the world. For them, life would be a hell on earth. There would be no rest, no progress, and no escape.

The scattering of the slaves was also important to Pharaoh. Like Christ, who told his enemies that anyone who does not gather with Him scatters abroad (Matt. 12:30), the Pharaoh wanted his enemies scattered. He no doubt recognized, as had the Pharaoh of the enslavement, that the concentrated population of Hebrews in the land of Goshen constituted a potential military threat to Egypt (Ex. 1:10). The Hebrews were scattered by the king's edict (Ex. 5:12), for they were no longer the recipients of straw imported from outside Goshen. Obviously, in these massive building projects, the supplies of straw in the immediate vicinity would have been depleted rapidly. In all likelihood, the supplies had been depleted long before the edict of Pharaoh, since it would have been less expensive for the Egyptian suppliers to have collected the straw close to the construction sites, which were in the region around Goshen. The cost of transporting straw to the construction sites would continually rise, and the Pharaoh transferred this economic burden to the Hebrews. They would have to send more and more of their straw-gatherers out across the Nile valley in order to find this necessary factor of production.

Predictably, the better quality resource, straw, was depleted, and the Hebrews found it economically advantageous to substitute a less efficient—technically less efficient—resource: stubble (Ex. 5:12). The cost of locating and transporting straw grew too great; they had to use stubble, working harder to produce as high a quality of bricks as before. This was economically more efficient, given the “rising cost of using straw, even though the straw was more efficient technically. The Hebrews were forced to “cut corners” with stubble.

Pharaoh used the innate restraints of the land's productivity as a means of disciplining the Hebrews. This decision to misuse a fundamental law of economics—the God-imposed scarcity of nature—turned out to be a disastrous one for Egypt. This was a deliberate misuse of the phenomenon of scarcity. Instead of encouraging trade and economic specialization, which scarcity is intended to encourage—a curse which can become a blessing⁴—Pharaoh’s edict reduced both trade and specialization. Instead of reducing the costs of production, Pharaoh’s edict deliberately increased the costs of production, simply as a punishment. He was misusing God’s laws of economics in order to humiliate His people and to keep them from worshiping the true God. For this, Pharaoh subsequently paid dearly, as did his people.

The nature of the punishment testifies to Pharaoh’s understanding of the issues involved: theological, political, and economic. He also grasped at least some of the implications of the law of the optimum mix of production factors. This law of the optimum production mix is a corollary to the law of diminishing returns. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the law of the optimum production mix is really another way of stating the law of diminishing returns.⁵ The existence of the optimum factor mix is the conclusion we reach when we acknowledge the existence of the law of diminishing returns. What do economists mean when they speak of the law of diminishing returns?

C. Complementary Factors of Production

We note that when two or more complementary factors of production are combined in the production process, output per unit of resource input rises initially as we add the “sub-optimum” factor of production, and then output begins to fall after the formerly “sub-optimum” resource passes the point of optimality. This economic law might better be described as the law of variable proportions.⁶ One person, for example, cannot efficiently farm 800 acres, unless he has specialized equipment. Facing the task of farming 800 acres, he adds additional labor. He hires another man to help him work the land. By combining the labor of two workers, the worker-owner sees the value of his farm’s total agricultural output increase by more than the cost of hiring the extra laborer. So, he adds more laborers and/or equipment. Output value increases even faster than input costs increase, initially. But at some point, the law of diminishing returns (variable proportions) tells us, the increases in output value will begin to lag behind the increases

4. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

5. Wrote Murray Rothbard: “The law of returns states that with the quantity of complementary factors held constant, there always exists some optimum amount of the varying factor.” Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), p. 35–36.

6. Joseph Schumpeter, History of Economic Analysis (New York: Oxford University Press, 1954), p. 260.

in factor input costs. There will be too many workers on the fixed supply of 800 acres. They will get in each other's way, or spend too much time loafing, or fighting, or whatever. Output will actually decline if the owner adds still more laborers without buying or leasing more land. In other words, it will pay him to dismiss some workers. He will either have to dismiss workers (the now excessive complementary production factor) or add more land (the now "sub-optimum" production factor) to the existing number of workers.

There is, in this agricultural example, an optimum mix (optimum proportions) of the complementary factors of production: more land or fewer workers. To produce a product at this optimum point minimizes waste and maximizes income. The existence of such an optimum point therefore pressures the resource owner to release one factor of production—in this case, labor—so that this scarce factor can be used in some other industry or on some other farm, thereby increasing total output and maximizing consumer satisfaction with a given quantity of resource inputs. The former resource renter is a beneficiary of this decision: he no longer needs to pay for the freed-up resource input. Other resource users also become beneficiaries, for a new source of the scarce resource has now been made available. The consumer is also a beneficiary: competition among producers will tend to reduce the cost of final output and will also eventually reduce the consumer price of the product.

We can examine this topic from another angle. If the law of diminishing returns were not true, then by taking a fixed supply of one factor of production and adding to it a complementary factor, eventually the proportion of the first (fixed) factor in the production mix would approach (though never quite reach) zero percent. After you reach the point of diminishing returns, the original (fixed) factor of production is increasingly "swamped" by the second (variable) factor. (Both factors are actually variable in practice; this is only an illustration.) To use an analogy from mathematics, the "swamped" factor of production is like a fraction with an increasingly large denominator, and therefore a decreasing value. One-to-two becomes one-to-three, and then downward to, say, one-to-five billion. One five billionth is obviously a lot smaller than one half. The value of the fraction approaches zero as a limit. By fixing the numerator and increasing the denominator, the "percentage contribution" of the numerator to the "value" of the fractional number is reduced.⁷

To return to the example of the 800-acre farm, as we add more and more men, we will eventually overwhelm the productivity of the resource factor which is in fixed supply, namely, land. If, by adding men continually, but without adding more land (the “swamped” fixed production factor), we could increase output forever, then land and labor in this example are not really complementary factors of production. They do not really “work together” in the production process, since we can endlessly increase the value of output by adding units of only a single factor. This is the same as saying that the production factor that we keep adding is, in fact, the consumer product we are producing. There really is no production process in this example; our variable resource input is, in fact, the final output.

Let us consider this argument from another angle: subtracting resources. If we could get an increase in the value of output by continually adding a variable resource, then we could also get a decrease in the cost of inputs without lowering the value of output simply by subtracting the previously “fixed” resource input. After all, why pay for a resource that really is not contributing anything of value to the production process? To use the subtraction example, assume that land is now the variable resource and labor is the fixed resource. (Maybe a labor union contract has made labor the fixed resource.) The value of output will not decline as we steadily reduce the land component of the production mix. But in such a situation, we really never had a production mix; the factors of production were not really complementary.

To summarize: if we can forever continue to increase the value of output by adding one factor of production, or (alternatively) if we can maintain the value of output by continually removing the other “complementary” factor, then there is no production process. There is no true combination of production factors. The factors are not really complementary.

We need not limit our discussion to land and labor. Land and water are equally good examples. If you take away all the water in agricultural production, you produce a fruitless desert. If you add water continually, you produce a lake. Neither is a farm. There is, in theory, an economically optimum production mix, in which the value of the water (cost of providing it) and the value of the land (cost of leasing or buying it) are combined to maximize net income, where one additional drop of water or one additional grain of dirt would reduce total net income if either were added (paid for) in the production process. Remember, we are talking about income, not technology as such. We are not talking about maximum numbers of goods, but about net income (revenues minus costs). We are, in short, discussing economics, not plant biology or engineering.

7. The analogy is imperfect because there are no “optimal” fractions. You never get increasing returns by adding to the denominator. The analogy applies only to the case where the optimum production mix has been passed.

The law of diminishing returns (variable proportions) applies to every area of production, not just agriculture.⁸ It is an aspect of the creation. It existed even before the Fall of man and God's curse of the ground.

D. Scarcity Before the Fall

Even in the garden, there were diminishing returns—if nothing else, in the fields of genetics, aesthetics, and technology. Adam had to work in the garden. He had to make it more productive. He had to combine factors of production in order to produce anything new. Perhaps he had to plant one species in one spot rather than another, for aesthetic effects. More likely, he would have begun to cross-breed within certain species to produce flowers or edible fruits that did not occur “naturally.” We are not told. What we are told is that he had a responsibility to make the garden bloom. He needed to understand technology and aesthetics in order to produce a fruitful environment.

What about economics? Did Adam face an economic law (constraint) of variable proportions, rather than just technological and aesthetic constraints? I believe that he did. If we define scarcity as “greater demand than supply at zero price,” then Adam seems to have faced a world of scarcity. If nothing else, his time had to be allocated. If he had worked on one job, he could not simultaneously have worked on another. He would have faced the decision to invest time and natural resources in producing one capital good (tool of production). This would have been a true decision; he could not simultaneously have used these resources to produce a different sort of capital good. The very concept of an economic production decision implies an optimum production mix. Only if there was no scarcity (including a scarcity of time) before the Fall could Adam have escaped the constraints of an economically optimum production mix. Then the production constraint would have been exclusively technological, genetic, or aesthetic.

8. Schumpeter, History, p. 261. See also Gary North, Sovereignty And Dominion, ch. 31: “The Law of Diminishing Returns.”

1. Knowledge

We need to focus on that most scarce of all resources, knowledge. Was Adam omniscient? The Bible teaches that God alone is omniscient. Omniscience is an incommunicable attribute of God. There is a special knowledge which belongs only to God: "The secret things belong unto the LORD our God: but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children forever, that we may do all the words of this law" (Deut. 29:29). Adam therefore faced limits on his knowledge. He had to learn. He faced a world which required an educational process based on trial and error. Eventually, there would have been children and descendants. He could not perfectly have known the mind of any other human being. Thus, he could not perfectly have known other people's wants, needs, and ability to pay in order to attain their goals. He would have needed a source of publicly available information (a price system) in order to learn about the kinds of economic demand that other people placed on the available resources, including the demand for knowledge in its broadest sense, and also the demand for time. He would have needed knowledge concerning just exactly what resources were available. His incentive to discover this would have been dependent on the economic demand for resources in the marketplace. Thus, the very concept of the incommunicable attribute of God's omniscience points to the inescapable concept of scarcity. Man has to give up something in order to gain certain kinds of knowledge.

The Fall of man came, in part, because man was unwilling to pay for a specific resource: righteous judgment. He refused to render righteous judgment on the serpent when he heard the tempter's offer. Adam did not immediately judge the serpent provisionally and then wait for God to return to render final judgment on the serpent and Satan. Adam did not wait for God to render this final judgment and then invest him and his wife with the judge's robes of authority before he ate from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.

Adam therefore faced a universe governed by scarcity, even in the garden. He faced scarcity of good judgment and scarcity of time. He was unwilling to "pay the price," meaning the judgment price and the time price. He wanted instant gratification.⁹ But he could not escape paying a price. The price he actually paid was a lot higher than he had estimated.¹⁰ He therefore faced the restraint of scarcity.

9. Gary North, "Witnesses and Judges," Biblical Economics Today, VI (Aug./Sept.

2. Management and Specialization

The creation has built into it incentives for management. The very genetic structure of plants and animals makes management by man technologically productive. Men can master the art of breeding animals and plants, a subordinately creative skill which is analogous to God's original creative act. The genetic structure of man also makes management by man more productive, but not the kind of management possessed by the breeder. Man is not given that kind of authority over God's image. The genetic reality of mankind is that people are different in terms of their inborn capacities, despite being members of a single species. In this respect, mankind reflects the Trinity, for God's three Persons have varying functions in relationship to the creation, despite being equal in essence and glory. Men become more productive individually by co-operating with each other. The most important aspect of this social co-operation is ethical.

The curse of the ground has made co-operation even more imperative, for the creation's original scarcity is accentuated by increasing costs as a result of the curse on both man and the ground.

The fact that in God's creation there are complementary factors of production implies that for any given output, there is a structure of production. The planner must actively combine factors of production. Complementary factors of production must be combined in terms of a plan. One plan meets the requirements of the planner better than all other possible plans. This plan is both personal and objective, because God's personal and objective plan undergirds all human planning, and gives meaning to all human planning. *The existence of an omniscient God with a perfect plan is what makes possible human planning.*¹¹ Thus, we must conclude that there is a law of diminishing economic returns, even without the curse; the curse has only increased the need to plan production carefully because of the effects of entropy. The importance of allocating resources is magnified in a cursed world, but there was still an allocation problem in the garden.

1983), pp. 2–3. Reprinted as Appendix E in North, Sovereignty and Dominion.

10. Ibid., ch. 11.

11. Ibid., ch. 5: "Economic Value: Objective and Subjective."

E. Epistemology and Optimum Production

We must recognize the reality of the economic implications of the fact of scarcity. If there were no optimum production mix, then Pharaoh's punishment would make no sense. It would have been no punishment at all. The Hebrews would have been able to manufacture just as many bricks as before with no additional inputs, including labor. But the punishment really was a punishment, as the Hebrews complained to Moses. The Bible therefore draws our attention to economic theory at this point. There is an optimum production mix. There is a law of diminishing returns. We achieve greater output per unit of resource input by means of the division of labor and the consequent specialization of production. For any given process of production, at any point in time, the economist tells us that there is some theoretically optimum mix of production factors.

There is a major epistemological problem here: a "point in time" is a theoretically discrete unit of time that is in fact immeasurable and is therefore outside of time. A point in time is therefore timeless. It is analogous to a theoretically discrete point in a line which is also autonomous and immeasurable. A point in time is a theoretical (and indescribable) period in which human action is not possible—"no time for action"—and if human action is not possible, it becomes problematic (self-contradictory) to speak of such phenomena as market-clearing prices, knowledge, and responsibility. We are dealing here with innate contradictions or antinomies in all human thought, so at best we can only approach the idea of the optimum production mix, just as we can only approach the idea of economic equilibrium. If we lean too heavily on the weak reed of autonomous human logic, the reed collapses.

While men can never have perfect knowledge of this economically optimum production mix, either in theory or in practice, especially in a world of constant change (including technological change), they still must try to approach this optimum mix if they wish to minimize waste and maximize income. Biblical economics informs us that there is an objective plan in the mind of God. "This objective plan serves as a theoretical foundation for the assertion of the existence of this economically optimum mix. Maximum economic output (and therefore maximum income) requires specific co-operation in terms of a plan.

Understand, however, that approaching this optimum is not easy, even as a theoretical matter. What are the success indicators that enable planning agents to determine whether or not they are approaching the optimum production mix? The existence of profit and loss indicators in a competitive free market is the preliminary answer. Nevertheless, these indicators have built-in limits, both in practice and in theory. Modern economic theory is officially individualistic. But methodological individualism, if pursued to its logical conclusion, does not allow us to conclude anything about optimum aggregates. Once again, the problem of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility reappears to haunt the humanistic economist.

We cannot legitimately, as “neutral” humanistic economists, make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. This means that civil government cannot make such comparisons scientifically. “Since all costs and benefits are subjective, no government can accurately identify, much less establish, the optimum quantity of anything.”¹² But neither can any other organization. According to the principles of methodological subjectivism, individuals can only make comparisons of the subjectively interpreted results of their own subjectively constructed plans, and even here, there is the epistemological problem of making intertemporal comparisons.¹³ After all, I may have forgotten today what I really intended to achieve yesterday. Or my tastes may have changed in the meantime. Furthermore, the purchasing power of the monetary unit may have changed, yet I cannot measure the extent of this change without constructing an aggregate index number of prices, including the subjective importance or “weighted average” for me of each price change. I need permanent standards—ethical standards above all, but also aesthetic and economic standards—to make such comparisons over time. I need an objective personal “index number” by which to measure economic change. But by the logic of methodological individualism, there are no such fixed reference points, no unchanging standards. There are no objective standards by which I can formulate my subjective standards, nor can I measure economic changes over time. There are no such scientific measures.

In short, modern economic theory is incapable of discovering what this optimum production mix is, either in the case of a private firm or in the case of a society. The concept of optimum necessarily involves the use of aggregate value, including value aggregates that must be compared over time. But pure subjective value theory, if pressed to its logical conclusions, cannot deal with interpersonal value aggregates, nor is it possible for “scientific” economics to compare intrapersonal subjective utility over time. Thus, the more consistent economists have admitted that no one can scientifically determine the optimum quantity of anything.

12. Charles W. Baird, “The Philosophy and Ideology of Pollution Regulation,” Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), p. 303.

13. Ludwig Lachmann, Capital, Expectations, and the Market Process: Essays on the Theory of the Market Economy (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed, Andrews & McMeel, 1977), pp. 83–85. Lachmann appealed to the epistemologically suspect “common experience” in a desperate and ill-fated attempt to refute Prof. G. L. S. Shackle’s assertion that an individual cannot make intertemporal comparisons.

This is why God’s revelation of His permanent law structure is an imperative concept for the very existence of truly logical economics. Without such a permanent standard, simultaneously personal and objective, economics is logically impossible. In a subjective universe without an authoritative God who reveals Himself to man, who in turn is made in God’s image and can therefore understand God’s revelation to man, there can be no permanent objective standards that are relevant or meaningful for human action, including economics.

F. Other Things Never Remain Equal

One critic of the concept of the law of diminishing returns was Julian Simon. He argued that economists have erred in attempting to apply the concept in the case of mineral extraction.

The concept of diminishing returns applies to situations where one element is fixed in quantity—say, a given copper mine—and where the type of technology is also fixed. But neither of these factors apply to mineral extraction in the long run. New lodes are found, and new cost-cutting extraction technologies are developed. Therefore, whether the cost rises or falls in the long run depends on the extent to which advances in technology and new lode discoveries counteract the tendency toward increasing cost in the absence of the new developments. Historically, as we have seen, costs have consistently fallen rather than risen, and there is no empirical warrant for believing that this historical trend will reverse itself in the foreseeable future. Hence there is no “law” of diminishing returns appropriate here.¹⁴

Simon also applied this interpretation of the law of diminishing returns to the field of population theory. He argued that classical economic theory followed Malthus and held that additional people would reduce the per capita share of fixed economic resources. “The more people using a stock of resources, the lower the income per person, if all else remains equal.”¹⁵ But new people coming into the community have the effect of changing the responses of other people, especially their parents. Fathers start working harder, or longer hours, or both.¹⁶ Parents become more future-oriented in many instances. They begin saving a larger proportion of their income. In short, the honeymoon is over when Junior arrives. “more mouths to feed” means more food to feed them in nations that are future-oriented and whose people possess what is known as the Protestant (or Puritan) work ethic.

14. Julian Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1980), p. 53.

These observations, however, must not be taken as refutations of the existence of the law of diminishing returns. On the contrary, such evidence points directly to the existence of such a law. If it is true, as it so often appears to be, that “necessity is the mother of invention,” then from whence comes the perceived necessity? If additional mouths to feed call forth ever-greater exertion and creativity to feed them, how is it that these mouths produce the desirable stimulus? Isn’t it because there was an optimum production mix under the old conditions that was disturbed by the new mouths? Isn’t it because the new conditions changed the thinking of the former honeymooners, giving them new incentives to mature and become more responsible? Isn’t it the very pressure of the optimum production mix that calls forth better efforts to find new combinations of resources (new plans) in response to new economic conditions?

The law of diminishing returns (optimum production mix) is an aspect of the creation which can, given the proper ethical and institutional circumstances, lead to human progress. Sinful men need to be pressured into greater self-discipline, more effective thinking, and better strategies of innovation. One of the means of calling forth these better efforts is scarcity. While the law of diminishing returns would have prevailed in the garden, the direct economic incentives to overcome scarcity in a cursed world augment this original aspect of the creation. Thus, it is unwise to de-emphasize the importance of this law of human action, as Simon appeared to do. But the concept should not be misused, either. It should not lead men to conclude that the price of raw materials will necessarily rise if population grows. The concept should not be used to justify a zero population growth ideology.

What we should understand is that the existence of an optimum production mix is what lures entrepreneurs, inventors, and economists to seek out better (less wasteful) ways to accomplish their goals in the midst of endless change. Discover this better way, and then persuade the customer to spend his money on your service or product because you have, in fact, discovered this better way, and you, the producer, will prosper. So will the customers. Profit in a free market is the success indicator that reveals the better way, meaning a more optimal mix of scarce economic resources.

15. Ibid., p. 257.

16. Ibid., p. 260.

G. Success Indicators and Relevant Information

Men are supposed to co-operate. This is an ethical requirement, but it is also an economic imperative, if men wish to increase their per capita output. In almost all cases, the intervention of the state into the market reduces this co-operation, since such intervention thwarts the voluntary transfer of accurate, self-correcting economic information. State interference reduces the division of labor in most cases, although it can also lead to overspecialization when it encourages technical developments that are, from the point of view of the market, uneconomical.¹⁷ It is significant that Israel had no laws that discriminated against “strangers in the land.” No laws against immigration or emigration exist in the Bible. A free market in labor services is established by biblical law. The “city on a hill” in the Bible has no barbed wire around it, to keep foreigners out or citizens in. It is the modern humanist societies that erect barbed wire barriers: the West to keep out “undesirables,” and the East to keep in “desirables.” To prevent both overspecialization and underspecialization, producers need the continual feedback of economic information provided by the market’s pricing system. This means that they need private ownership, for without this, there can be no rational assessment of profit and loss, meaning no economic calculation. Without private ownership, it becomes difficult or im-

17. An example of such “forced” technological innovation is the development of capital-intensive, labor-saving equipment that has been adopted by producers because of the artificially high cost of hiring trade union laborers. The producers substitute expensive labor-saving equipment when the cost of labor gets too high. If the government had not granted to the trade union the right to keep employers from firing strikers and hiring replacements (“scabs”) during a strike, the employers would have been able to hire laborers at a market price. The above-market price of unionized labor encourages employers to search for labor substitutes. Laws against “illegal aliens” push up labor costs by restricting the supply of legal laborers; this encourages over-investment in labor—substituting equipment—meaning over-investment compared to what economic freedom would have produced.

possible for future-predicting entrepreneurs to collect profits that are the residual of accurate forecasting.¹⁸

An enslaved population is unable to make full use of the information which is available to producers, for the source of the continual correcting of this information must come from a bureaucratic agency—an agency that does not offer employee incentives comparable to employee incentives in a free market for the collection of accurate and economically relevant information, or incentives for affected institutions to respond appropriately to new information. If a society relies heavily on the output of an enslaved population, then its non-slave members are also unable to make the most efficient use of the available resources, for the society's information-delivery system is made increasingly unreliable. Neither the slaves nor the taskmasters know what scarce economic resources really should cost. Without a competitive market, the planners are flying blind. Those who fly blind eventually crash.

Conclusion

Pharaoh decided to tighten the screws on the Israelites. In doing so, he reduced the freedom of a productive people to increase the per capita wealth of the Egyptian nation. He imposed new costs on them that could only reduce their productivity, either by reducing the division of labor or by grinding them into despair, both of which would ultimately waste Egyptian resources. He abandoned a free market in goods and services. He increased the authority of his bureaucratic state. He brought his judgment on the people of God, merely because their representatives asked for time off to worship God. Because of Egypt's heavy reliance on the slave system, neither Pharaoh nor the nobles knew what the cost of any resource really was. The more rigorously he enslaved them, the less reliable was the economic knowledge available to the planners. Pharaoh thereby proclaimed his faith in Egypt's theology: the sovereignty of Pharaoh and the bureaucratic state that was incarnate in his own person. The result was the destruction of both the Egyptian state and his person.

18. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 32: "The Entrepreneurial Function."

8

COVENANTAL JUDGMENT

Then the magicians said unto Pharaoh, This is the finger of God: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and he hearkened not unto them; as the LORD had said (Ex. 8:19).

The theocentric issue here is God as the cosmic Judge.

The supernatural contest between the representatives of God and the magicians of Egypt escalated from the beginning. In the first confrontation, Aaron cast down the rod that God had presented to Moses. It became a serpent. The magicians matched this display of supernatural transformation, but then Aaron's serpent swallowed the serpents of the Egyptians. This presumably did not help the magicians to persuade Pharaoh that their magic was stronger than the supernatural power available to these two Hebrews (Ex. 7:10–12).

A. Access to Power: Plagues

The second display of power involved the Nile's water: plague number one. Aaron stretched out the rod, and the waters of Egypt turned to blood. The magicians matched this supernatural act (Ex. 7:19–22). In this instance, their magic seemed comparable to Aaron's. However, this was no consolation to Pharaoh; now he had even more bloody water than he had before the contest.

Third, this same "victory" of Egyptian magic was repeated in the coming of the frogs (Ex. 8:5–7). This was the second plague. We can almost imagine Pharaoh's consternation, how he must have said to himself, "No, you idiots, not more frogs; fewer frogs! Show me how powerful you are by removing these frogs."

Fourth were the lice: the third plague. "And the LORD said unto Moses, Say unto Aaron, Stretch out thy rod, and smite the dust of the land, that it may become lice throughout all the land of Egypt. And they did so; for Aaron stretched out his hand with his rod, and smote the dust of the earth, and it became lice in man, and in beast; all the dust of the land became lice throughout all the land of Egypt. And the magicians did so with their enchantments to bring forth lice, but they could not: so there were lice upon man, and upon beast" (Ex. 8:16–18). At this point, they made their confession: "This is the finger of God."

His magicians were determined to prove their mastery of the black arts by matching Aaron, plague for plague, thereby reinforcing God's judgment on Egypt. But there is no indication that they brought additional blood, frogs, and lice to the land of Goshen, where the Hebrews lived. They simply multiplied the burdens of Egypt. The Egyptians were worse off as a result of the nation's magicians. The arrogance of the magicians had made things even less bearable.

The first three plagues afflicted Goshen: blood, frogs, and lice. Only with the fourth plague, flies (or insects), did God declare that Goshen would be spared (Ex. 8:22). As slaves, the Israelites were under the covenantal rule of the Egyptians, both for good (the economic benefits of living in an extensive empire) and evil. Like the animals who were cursed because of man's sin in the garden, or draftees in an army ruled by an incompetent Commander-in-Chief, so are the slaves of a rebellious culture. In the case of the ethical condition of the Israelite slaves, their subsequent behavior indicated that they were not wholly innocent victims of a society whose first principles they should have utterly rejected. The leeks and onions of Egypt had their appeal in Goshen, too.

That God should bring frogs to curse Egypt as the second plague was fitting. The frog was an important fertility deity in Egypt. The frog-goddess Heqet at Abydos was pictured as sitting at the bier of Osiris, a god of death and rebirth. Frog amulets were popular as symbols of new life and new birth. "The 'matlametlo,' a great frog over five inches long, hides in the root of a bush as long as there is a drought, and when rain falls, it rushes out. It comes with the rain as the beetle with the rising of the Nile; both are symbolic of new life and growth."¹ Just as the Nile, Egypt's life-bringer, became the death-bringer, so did the frogs become a plague.

After the frogs came the third plague, when the dust of the ground became lice. Again, we can almost imagine Pharaoh's thoughts, as he stood scratching himself: “Look, I don’t need any more proof of your mastery of magic. If you can’t get rid of the lice, then just sit quietly. Who needs magical powers like yours at a time like this?” The magicians tried to match this event and failed (Ex. 8:18). At this point, they capitulated. If they could not make the nation even more miserable than it already was, if they were unable to louse up Egypt even more, then their opponent must be God. “This is the finger of God,” they said, using the same term which Jesus used to describe the Spirit of God in tasting out demons (Luke 11:20: “finger of God”; Matt. 12:28: “Spirit of God”). They recognized that they were dealing with supernatural power that was greater than their own, meaning a God who was more powerful than the gods of Egypt. By telling Pharaoh that the finger of God was the source of the power facing him, they were advising him to capitulate. We are told that he hearkened not unto them, and that his heart was hardened. He understood what they meant, and he refused to listen.

1. Jane E. Harrison, "Introduction" to E. A. Wallis Budge, Osiris (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, [1911] 1961), p. vii. The introduction actually first appeared as an essay in The Spectator (April 13, 1912), and was included in the 1961 edition.

B. Comparative Wealth

Then came seven other plagues: swarms of insects (the King James Version inserts the words “of flies” after swarms, but the Hebrew is not specific), the death of all the cattle of Egypt, pestilence, boils, hail, locusts, and darkness. In the final seven plagues, the Egyptians were afflicted, while the Israelites were not. Because of this protection, the Israelites were increasing their per capita wealth in comparison to the Egyptians. They were growing steadily richer—not just comparatively, but absolutely. How could this be? If the Israelites were not actually increasing the size of their herds, how could the plagues have increased their per capita wealth? Because demand for cattle in the marketplace was now focused on the only available local supply, and the Israelites possessed this local monopoly. The market value of their cattle rose, meaning that the exchange value of their cattle rose. Furthermore, their fields had not been struck by the hail, so their crops had survived. The kinds of wealth held by the Egyptians after the plagues—gold, jewels, etc.—always drop in value relative to survival goods during a major catastrophe. The “coin of the realm” during a famine is food, not pieces of metal or shining stones (Gen. 47:15–16).² The Hebrews possessed food, and all the demand for food would have been concentrated on their possessions. They had what the Egyptians needed in order to survive. The market value of their assets increased.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 35: “The Misapplication of Intrinsic Value.”

C. The Problem of the Cattle

We face a difficult problem in explaining this economic event. The plague on the cattle of Egypt destroyed them all (Ex. 9:6). Then came the pestilence of the boils, which struck Egyptians, their other animals, and even the priests (Ex. 9:11). (Fortunately for the Egyptians, the magicians had by this time given up any attempts to match God's plagues, boil for boil.) Finally, Egypt was struck with a mighty hail. Some of the Egyptians believed Moses this time: "He that feared the word of the LORD among the servants of Pharaoh made his servants and his cattle flee into the houses: And he that regarded not the word of the LORD left his servants and his cattle in the field" (Ex. 9:20–21). The problem: Where had they purchased these new herds of cattle?

They could either have bought or confiscated cattle from the Hebrews, since the Hebrews had not lost their cattle in the plague (Ex. 3:6). The Hebrews had cattle after the hail, since the hail did not strike Goshen (Ex. 9:26). It is also possible that cattle were imported from Canaan. We are not told. If the Egyptians bought cattle from the Hebrews, it meant that they were unwilling to confiscate the Hebrews' cattle. It would have been possible for them to have marched in and taken cattle out of Goshen. They did not confiscate all the cattle, nor did they buy all the cattle, since the Hebrews still had cattle when the hail began. Perhaps they never sought the Hebrews' cattle. We know that the Hebrews took large herds of cattle with them when they left Egypt (Ex. 12:38). This indicates that the Egyptians did not confiscate their cattle after the plague, and probably not after the hail. Conceivably, they did confiscate the cattle after the hail, and gave back the cattle at the time of the exodus, but the text does not say that this happened.

When the hail stopped, the Israelites had all the cattle still alive in Egypt. Did the Egyptians buy from them? It is not easy to say. The Hebrews requested precious metals and jewels from the Egyptians at the time of the exodus, which might be interpreted as a unique event, indicating that they had not owned any jewels before. Did the Egyptians buy their cattle from the Hebrews without paying in jewelry? We do not know. What we do know is that the Israelites had crops and cattle, the key resources, immediately following the hail. The slaves were now rich.

Of course, if the Israelites had been facing starvation, then their position would not have risen absolutely. They would have been better off than the Egyptians, but they would have had to consume their resources, making it impossible for them to have profited from their position of relatively greater wealth. But they were being protected by God; they were not going to starve. They might have traded their cattle and crops for the surplus gold and jewels of the Egyptians, had God decided to let them remain in Egypt. They would have collected the valuables of the Egyptians in exchange for their surplus food. However, God had even better plans; they would keep the food and also collect the jewels of the Egyptians. God's protection had already made them the beneficiaries of rising per capita wealth, even before they "borrowed" from their former masters. They had monopoly ownership of the crucial survival resources in a time of great shortages. They had what the Egyptians needed. Not only had their masters lost the necessities, they would shortly have to forfeit their luxuries, either in exchange for the Israelites' food or in restitution for the generations of bondage.

D. The Sovereign Who Failed

The Egyptians had been wiped out economically by the plagues. They had been ruined. Their ruler, who was theoretically divine, was stubborn and arrogant. He was the protector of Egypt, yet he had led Egypt into an economic disaster. He was the ruler of the Nile, and it had been turned to blood, killing the fish. Walter Brueggemann's comments on the significance of this judgment against the Nile are to the point: "We cannot grasp the trouble fully until we recall that the Nile River is not only a geographical referent. It is also an expression of the imperial power of fertility. It is administration of the Nile which permits the king to generate and guarantee life. The failure of the Nile and its life system means that the empire does not have in itself the power of life (cf. Ezek. 29:3). It is for this reason that the plague of the Nile is so crucial (Ex. 7:7–22). An assault on the Nile strikes at the heart of Pharaoh's claim to authority."³

Pharaoh was also the controller of the seasons, yet the nation's agricultural system had been disrupted by hail—hail in a land where it seldom rained! He was the shepherd of the nation's flocks, and the cattle had been struck with sickness and then with hail. Wilson wrote, concerning the social function of the Pharaoh: "The herdsman is primarily the pastor, the 'feeder,' and a first responsibility of the state was to see that the people were fed. Thus the king of Egypt was the god who had brought fertility to Egypt, produced the life-giving waters, and presented the gods with the sheaf of grain which symbolized abundant food. Indeed, an essential function of his kingship was that of a medicine man, whose magic ensured good crops."⁴ This Pharaoh had failed in every respect to measure up to the theological system of Egypt. God had hardened his heart, thereby increasing his innate stubbornness, in order to display the power of a true God. Speaking of the Pharaoh, God said: "And in very deed for this cause I raise thee up, for to shew in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth" (Ex. 9:16). God would continue to demonstrate before other kings just how sovereign the Pharaoh really was.

3. Walter Brueggemann, Genesis (Atlanta: John Knox Press, 1982), p. 327.

Except possibly for a brief period under Joseph, the Egyptians had clung to their theology of the continuity of being for centuries. They had placed themselves under the sovereign power of a god, they believed. Their prosperity was guaranteed by a divine man, and their future life beyond the grave would be analogous to their life on earth: under the jurisdiction of the Pharaoh. Again, citing Wilson: "Since the central factor in this world was the divine nature of the king, who owned and controlled everything within Egypt, the next world would be based on the same absolute authority. Life after death, independent of the Pharaoh, would thus be out of the question for this early period."⁵ Everything in Egypt took place under the supposed sovereignty of a king-god. What the Egyptians assented to when the pharaohs put the Israelites in bondage was this: a king-god on earth had lawful, sovereign power over the representatives of the God of the Bible. No king reigns apart from a concept of legitimate rule, and the assent of the Egyptians to the decisions of their ruler brought them into conflict with the God of the Bible.

E. Covenants and Representative Government

There are covenants on earth. The Egyptians were under a coven-

4. John A. Wilson, "Egypt," in Henri Frankfort, et al., The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1946] 1977), pp. 79–80.

5. John A. Wilson, The Burden of Egypt: An Interpretation of Ancient Egyptian Culture (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1951] 1967), p. 65.

ant with their king. This covenant had been reaffirmed when they sold their lands to the Pharaoh of the famine (Gen. 47:20–26). They had entered into another covenant when that Pharaoh gave the land of Goshen to the family of Joseph (Gen. 47:1–6). This covenant was broken by a later Pharaoh, and the Egyptians were under his rule by choice, by the prior sale of their lands, and by the theology of Egypt. His covenant was their covenant; the breaking of his covenant with the family of Joseph was also the breaking of their covenant with the family of Joseph. Men are judged in social orders in terms of the decisions made by their legitimate covenantal rulers.

This is an important concept. The Bible teaches the doctrine of representative government. This refers to all government, not just civil government. Representative government applies to churches, corporations, trusts, and families. Adam, our representative before God, sinned, and we are under a curse. This “federal headship” of Adam was based on a concept of representative government under a covenant. So was the “federal headship” of Pharaoh.

Pharaoh was the federal head of Egypt. Egypt’s theology recognized this; he was seen as the divine-human link, the representative of the Egyptian gods. When the judgment of God began, it struck the Pharaoh’s house first. His magicians’ serpents were consumed by Aaron’s. Then the escalation carried the conflict into the rivers and fields and homes of the whole land. Goshen was protected after the initial three plagues because God’s people resided there, and because they were captives, not fully assenting citizens, of Egypt. Egyptians far removed from the seat of power were afflicted with the insects, pestilence, boils, and hail. They knew nothing of the conflict between Moses and the Pharaoh. They had never heard of Moses or Aaron. Yet their crops were destroyed, their waters turned to blood, their land filled with the stench of death. When they reclined on their beds or walked through their homes, the squishing of frogs was continual. Egyptians who had never personally owned, controlled, or punished a Hebrew slave were scratching lice day and night. Poor farmers, who lived on the edge of starvation, saw their milk cows die. What had they done to deserve this? They had believed in a false god. Now that this god was at last being brought under judgment by the true God, they became recipients of that judgment. Their self-proclaimed god had stood in terms of his sovereign kingdom and its prosperity to challenge God’s own representatives. To demonstrate the true source of sovereignty, God smashed Pharaoh and his kingdom, including his people.

F. Methodologies

To imagine that the judgments of God, in time and on earth, are limited to personal, individualistic penalties, is to misread the Bible. If anything, the reverse is true, in time and on earth. God's collective curses, like His collective blessings, are proclaimed in the Bible. God does not promise that every good man will prosper economically, or that every evil man will be brought low. What the Bible promises is that covenantally faithful societies will prosper in the long run, and that covenantally rebellious ones will be crushed eventually.

This brings up the question of methodological individualism. The Bible teaches methodological covenantalism, not methodological individualism. When we speak of "society," we have in mind an association of men which is under the law of God, and through which men and institutions are blessed or judged by God. A social covenant does exist, whether explicit or implicit in human documents or institutions. Thus, methodological covenantalism conflicts with the anarchism of the methodological individualist. Rothbard's libertarian view of society is not conformable to the story of God's judgment of the Egyptian masses. "We have talked at length of individual rights; but what, it may be asked, of the 'rights of society'? Don't they supersede the rights of the mere individual? The libertarian, however, is an individualist; he believes that one of the prime errors in social theory is to treat 'society' as if it were an actually existing entity. 'Society' is sometimes treated as a superior or quasi-divine figure with overriding 'rights' of its own; at other times as an existing evil which can be blamed for all the ills of the world. The individualist holds that only individuals exist, think, feel, choose, and act; and that 'society' is not a living entity but simply a label for a set of interacting individuals. Treating society as a thing that chooses and acts, then, serves to obscure the real forces at work."⁶

In terms of the history of Western philosophy, Rothbard was a nominalist. He did not believe in the independent reality of collectives. He argued that collectives are merely names that people apply to relationships among individuals. Individuals are sovereign; collectives are not. Most free market economists are nominalists. As an anarchist, Rothbard was more self-conscious about this than his limited-government peers. In contrast, those social theorists who declare their commitment to the independent existence of collectives are part of the realist tradition. Nominalists and realists had done battle from the beginning. Both groups—whether real or merely named—are opposed to biblical covenantalism.

6. Murray N. Rothbard, For a New Liberty: The Libertarian Manifesto, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1973] 2006), p. 45. (<http://bit.ly/mrfanl>)

Rothbard rejected methodological holism (collectivism), which sees the evolution of society as a force independent of human will and human action. But methodological covenantalism is not methodological holism; it does not view society as a personal entity separate from men. It sees men as being represented by others before God in various institutional relationships. Men suffer and prosper, not only by what they do as individuals, but also by the decisions of those in authority over them. Methodological covenantalism teaches that there are law-governed arrangements by which God deals with people—not impersonal natural law, or the law of karma (reincarnation), or evolutionary law, but God-ordained law. The biblical view categorically rejects the utilitarian view of law presented by classical liberals, e.g., Mises and Hayek.⁷

G. Mises vs. the Covenant

Mises' rejection of this covenantal outlook, which he equated with holism, was characteristically uncompromising.

According to the doctrines of universalism, conceptual realism, holism, collectivism, and some representatives of Gestaltpsychologie, society is an entity living its own life, independent of and separate from the lives of the various individuals, acting on its own behalf and aiming at its own ends which are different from the ends sought by the individuals. Then, of course, an antagonism between the aims of society and those of its members can emerge. In order to safeguard the flowering and further development of society it becomes necessary to master the selfishness of the individuals and to compel them to sacrifice their egoistic designs to the benefit of society. At this point all these holistic doctrines are bound to abandon the secular methods of human science and logical reasoning and to shift to theological or metaphysical professions of faith. They must assume that Providence, through its prophets, apostles, and charismatic leaders, forces men who are constitutionally wicked, i.e., prone to pursue their own ends, to walk in the ways of righteousness which the Lord or Weltgeist or history wants them to walk.⁸

7. For a critique of Hayek, see Appendix B, "The Evolutionists' Defense of the Market," in North, Sovereignty and Dominion.

8. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 145. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

In other words, Mises rejected the epistemological significance of the fact that God converts men. Sometimes, these men become representative agents before God for other men whom God places under their jurisdiction, whether those represented approve of it or not (as in the case of the Israelites who wanted Moses and Aaron to go away and leave them alone). Mises rejected this explanation of human affairs.

This is the philosophy which has characterized from time immemorial the creeds of primitive tribes. It has been an element in all religious teachings. Man is bound to comply with the law issued by a superhuman power and to obey the authorities which this power has entrusted with the enforcement of the law. The order created by this law, human society, is consequently the work of the Deity and not of man. If the Lord had not interfered and had not given enlightenment to erring mankind, society would not have come into existence. . . . The scientific theory as developed by the social philosophy of eighteenth-century rationalism and liberalism and by modern economics does not resort to any miraculous interference of superhuman powers. . . . Society is a product of human action, i.e., the human urge to remove uneasiness as far as possible. In order to explain its becoming and its evolution it is not necessary to have recourse to a doctrine, certainly offensive to a truly religious mind, according to which the original creation was so defective that reiterated superhuman intervention is needed to prevent its failure.⁹

In other words, “a truly religious mind” is the mind of an eighteenth-century Continental European deist, whose silent, distant God is sufficiently irrelevant to human affairs to satisfy a generous and broad-minded humanistic economist (assuming he is not a follower of Ayn Rand’s atheistic “objectivism”—and few economists are).¹⁰

For Mises, a confirmed utilitarian, “Law and legality, the moral code and social institutions are no longer revered as unfathomable decrees of Heaven. They are of human origin, and the only yardstick that must be applied to them is that of expediency with regard to human welfare.”¹¹ His methodological individualism was grounded in human expediency, which somehow (he could not say how) is understood by all men, or at least all reasonable men who recognize the value of free

9. Ibid., pp. 145–46.

10. Rothbard once remarked concerning the Randians: “They hate God more than they hate the state.” For a comprehensive critique of Rand’s thought, see John Robbins, Without a Prayer: Ayn Rand and the Close of Her System (Unicoi, Tennessee: Trinity Foundation, [1974] 1997).

11. Mises, Human Action, p. 147.

market economics and economic growth. In short, economists—true economists, meaning defenders of the free market—“have repeatedly emphasized that they deal with socialism and interventionism from the point of view of the generally accepted values of Western civilization.”¹² Even a methodological individualist sometimes finds collectives—“the values of Western civilization”—epistemologically indispensable. Sadly, Mises never admitted what should have been obvious, specifically, that he was partially dependent on the epistemological holism that he vociferously rejected.¹³

The idea of representative civil government was basic to nineteenth-century liberalism. Defenders of classical liberalism wanted limited civil government and a free market economy. But there are few strict defenders of the old faith today. Mises and Hayek have few followers in the academic world. Their intellectual heirs are either Christians or outright anarchists. Neither group (a holistic noun) accepts the viewpoint of nineteenth-century classical liberalism.¹⁴ Christians base their views on the Bible, and the anarchists want no civil government—certainly not one which is supported by compulsory taxation.

The empirical or “positive economics” of the Chicago School defends the limited-government viewpoint. These scholars do not appeal to hypothetically universal rights of man that are based on natural law. They explain economics strictly in terms of economic self-interest, and they use scientific tools of “empirical,” value-free economic analysis,

12. Mises, Theory and History: An Interpretation of Social and Economic Evolution (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1969), p. 33. Published originally by Yale University Press in 1957. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTAH>)

13. Gary North, “Economics: From Reason to Intuition,” in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1976), pp. 87–96.

14. It is one of the ironies of recent history that the two main groups that continue to read and quote Mises both reject his utilitarianism. The anarcho-capitalists, led by Rothbard, are defenders of natural law theory, and they explicitly reject utilitarianism as a legitimate foundation of social and economic theory: Rothbard, For a New Liberty, p. 19. They are anarchists, and Mises explicitly rejected anarchism. He even said that a military draft is sometimes legitimate. In the 1966 Regnery edition of Human Action, he wrote: “He who in our age opposes armaments and conscription is, perhaps unbeknown to himself, an abettor of those aiming at the enslavement of all.” Mises, Human Action, p. 282. The anarcho-capitalists seldom go into print against Mises by name, since they are self-professed followers of Mises and Austrian economic theory, but they have abandoned much of his epistemology (he was a self-conscious Kantian dualist, as well as a utilitarian) and his philosophy of limited (rather than zero) civil government. The other group that uses Mises’ economic arguments is the Christian Reconstruction movement, whose members reject his humanism-agnosticism and his methodological individualism.

especially mathematics, which implies some sort of holism (economic aggregates). Mises categorically rejected such holism as an invalid tool for understanding human action. Therefore, the old classical liberalism, with its strict commitment to methodological individualism, is today a shadow of its former moral self.

Conclusion

The Pharaoh's court magicians warned him. They told him that he was facing God almighty. He did not accept their evaluation, or at least he chose to challenge the God of Moses anyway. Did this protect the families of the magicians? Did they avoid the plagues? Did they escape the death of their firstborn? Not without the blood on the doorposts. Not without an outward covenantal sign indicating that they had placed themselves under the sovereignty of God. They gave the king good advice, but he did not take it, and they did not escape.

When God brought judgment on Egypt, the seemingly innocent Egyptians were not spared. This was because there were no innocent Egyptians. They were all under the Pharaoh's covenant, they all operated in terms of his divinity, and they all felt the wrath of God, in time and on earth. They were doomed because he was doomed. He was their representative in a great confrontation with God, almost as the Philistines were represented by Goliath. The result was the same in each instance: death for the representative, and scattering and defeat for the represented.

Covenants cannot be avoided. Man cannot serve two masters; he serves only one (Matt. 6:24).¹⁵ The system of representative government has been with mankind since the beginning. Adam's heirs cannot escape the results of Adam's choice in the garden. He served as our representative head; his loss was our loss. The Pharaoh's loss was the Egyptian peasant's loss. Men do not stand alone, as independent, totally autonomous entities, facing a cosmos which is impersonal. Though covenant-breaking man would like to believe its conclusion, William Ernest Henley's late-nineteenth-century poem, Invictus, proclaimed a false doctrine of man's autonomy. Its concluding lines: "It matters not how strait the gate, How charged with punishments the scroll, I am the master of my fate: I am the captain of my soul."

Henley is forgotten today, as is his poem, but the last two lines of this stanza are part of the English language, familiar to millions who have never heard of him. Its sentiments were basic to the twentieth century, in which more people died as a result of disastrous decisions by national leaders than in any previous century, with the possible exception of Noah's generation, depending upon the size of that population.

15. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

9

ORIGINAL OWNERSHIP

And Moses said unto him [Pharaoh], As soon as I am gone out of the city, I will spread abroad my hands unto the LORD; and the thunder shall cease, neither shall there be any more hail; that thou mayest know how that the earth is the LORD'S. But as for thee and thy servants, I know that ye will not yet fear the LORD God (Ex. 9:29–30).

The theocentric principle here is the absolute sovereignty of God, from which is derived absolute ownership by God.

This is not the first statement in Scripture concerning the ownership of the earth. Melchizedek blessed Abram, who was “of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth” (Gen. 14:19b), and Abram used the same phrase, “possessor of heaven and earth” (Gen. 14:22b). In that instance, Abram refused to accept any gifts from the king of Sodom, lest the king should say, “I have made Abram rich” (Gen. 14:23b). God’s total sovereignty over the earth required Abram to tithe, in this case to the priest Melchizedek (Gen. 14:20).¹ Abram understood that God could legitimately extract His portion from Abram, the steward, even though Abram believed it would be wise to forego the gifts from the king of Sodom. God was to be honored, not Abram. God was to receive the tithe, not Abram. Yet Abram was rich, and he took care to keep the king of Sodom from receiving the credit. God was the source of Abram’s wealth, not a pagan earthly king.

A. A Defiant Pharaoh

It was different in the case of Pharaoh. He did owe a payment to the Israelites. He had challenged Moses and Moses’ God. He came before God under a curse. He and his people had enslaved God’s people, had broken their covenant with the Israelites, and had burdened them with the requirement to make bricks without straw. Pharaoh had changed his mind repeatedly, breaking each successive promise to Moses concerning the Israelites. Egypt would pay restitution to the Israelites before the exodus. It was not a question of making the Israelites rich. Pharaoh would receive no credit in this regard. The restitution payment was being extracted from the Egyptians by a series of external judgments. Abram refused Sodom's payment, while God demanded Egypt's. Egypt's payment was no gift.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 21.

Moses' message to Pharaoh was clear: God owns the world. He also controls its operations. Moses reminded Pharaoh of the source of his miseries. The land was in ruins. Egypt had been overtaken by a series of disasters. But Moses' point was that these had not been "natural" disasters. They had been supernatural disasters. To prove his point, he promised to pray to God, and God would then halt the hail and thunderstorms. The proof of God's ownership is God's word. He made the world, He made man, and He is sovereign over both man and the world. But to demonstrate His ownership before Pharaoh, God stopped the hail.

His word was sufficient proof. He did not need to verify His word before Pharaoh. Nevertheless, God provided the additional evidence. Yet Moses told Pharaoh that he would not fear God, despite the evidence. Pharaoh's heart was hardened. The evidence did not matter. If he would not listen to God's prophet, he would not assent to the evidence of his eyes. If God's word was insufficient, then the absence of hail would not be sufficient. He would still not fear God. In this sense, he resembled Satan, whom he represented.

Pharaoh never did believe the testimony of his eyes. Right up until the moment when the waters of the Red Sea closed over him, he refused to assent to the obvious. He raced into the arms of death, shouting his defiance against God, breaking his word, and taking the Egyptian state with him. He refused to believe God's word, so the testimony of his eyes meant nothing. His operating presupposition was that he, the Pharaoh, was god. God is not the being He claims to be, nor could such a being exist, Pharaoh presupposed. No sovereign, absolute being can lay claim to total control, and therefore original ownership of everything, he believed. He died for his beliefs. He did not die alone.

God's claim is comprehensive. He possesses absolute property rights to every atom of the universe. He created it, and He owns it. He, unlike man, does not operate in terms of a definition of ownership that requires the right and ability of an owner to disown the property at his discretion.² His ownership is original. No other being is absolutely sovereign, so therefore no other being can claim original, uncontested rights to any aspect of the creation. No other being owns any economic asset that he did not receive from God. Therefore, no other being can bargain with God to buy any part of the creation. All property is held by means of a transfer of rights from God to the new owner. It is held in terms of a covenant. Men or demons can break their covenant with God, denying the terms of subordinate ownership, but they cannot thereby achieve their goal of final sovereignty. Whatever rights (legal immunities and protections) they possess to buy or sell property, or even to confiscate property, are derivative rights. Absolute ownership is an incommunicable attribute of God.

B. Ownership and Sovereignty

God's statement that He owns the earth is an announcement of His total sovereignty. It is therefore a denial of all of the claims of rebellious man against the plan of God. Jesus' parable of the vineyard owner who hired the laborers throughout the day elaborates on the implications of God's ownership. The land owner hires men all day long, at an identical agreed-upon wage, and at the end of the day, each man receives his wage, one penny. The ones who had labored all day complained: those who came late to work received the same wage for a shorter day's work. They ignored the fact that they had no guarantee when they signed on in the morning that the owner would offer anyone employment later in the day. Neither did those who could not find employment that morning. The complainers were ignoring the effects of uncertainty on contractual obligations. The owner answers them with questions. First, hadn't they agreed to work for this wage (Matt. 20:13)? Second, "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?" (20:15).³ Here is the doctrine of God's absolute sovereignty, but conveyed by Jesus in an economic parable that could be understood by His listeners. God has the right to do what He wants with the whole creation. He owns the earth, just as the owner of a field owns that field. He is sovereign over it. This is one of the key passages in the New Testament which defends the ethical and legal legitimacy of private property. If the owner in the parable did not have the right to do what he wanted with his own property, then the meaning of the parable is lost. An individual's personal, private ownership is analogous to God's personal, private ownership of the earth, in eluding the souls of men. Private ownership, not state ownership, is the foundation of the parable. To challenge the legitimacy of God's delegated sovereignty of private ownership of the means of production is to challenge the doctrine of the original sovereignty of God. Socialism is therefore an innately demonic and evil doctrine. It is not surprising that the rise of socialism and statism in the West was also accompanied by the rise of philosophies hostile to the sovereignty of God.⁴

2. F. A. Harper wrote: "The corollary of the right of ownership is the right of dis-ownership. So if I cannot sell a thing, it is evident that I do not really own it." Liberty: A Path to Its Recovery (Irvington, New York: Foundation for Economic Education, 1949), p. 106. (<http://bit.ly/HarperLiberty>)

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40.

C. Pharaoh's Assertion

Pharaoh recognized the implications of this doctrine of God's absolute ownership, and he rejected it. He refused to humble himself before the God of the Israelites. He had no fear of this God, despite God's control over the forces of nature. He rejected the doctrine of God's sovereignty over the affairs of Egypt. He, as a legitimate god, according to Egyptian theology, possessed at least some degree of autonomous sovereignty. He was entitled to the lives and labors of these Hebrews. Any attempt by their God to impose non-negotiable demands on Egypt had to be resisted. To capitulate on this issue would have implied a moral obligation on Pharaoh's part to conform his economic decisions to the law of God. If God owns the whole earth, then each man is merely a steward of God's property, and is therefore morally obligated to administer the original owner's property according to His instructions. Pharaoh would have had to acknowledge his position as a subordinate ruler under God, a prince rather than a king. He would not do it.

4. On the rise of revolutionary socialism and equally revolutionary nationalism—both philosophies of State sovereignty—as religious and extensively occult phenomena, see James Billington, Fire in the Minds of Men: Origins of the Revolutionary Faith (New York: Basic Books, 1980). I regard this as the single most significant work of historical scholarship to be published in the United States in the post-World War II era. Volume 1 of Solzhenitsyn's Gulag Archipelago was the most important work overall, in terms of its impact on the thinking of Western intellectuals, forcing them to confront the reality of Soviet civilization. It is not, strictly speaking, a work of historical scholarship, since it forgoes the historian's paraphernalia of footnotes and extensive documentation, although I regard the work as accurate historically. The author has subtitled this work, "An Experiment in Literary Investigation."

As Moses had predicted, as soon as the hail and thunder ceased, Pharaoh and his servants resumed their resistance (Ex. 9:34). Their theology acknowledged the possibility of the appearance of a powerful god to challenge Egypt. Any war between states in the ancient world was believed to involve the gods of both nations. The idea that God might own part of the world, or might legitimately have some claim on the Hebrews as a form of His personal property, could be accepted in theory by the Egyptians. What was repugnant to them was the idea that He owned everything, “lock, stock, and barrel,” in the traditional English terminology. That left them no bargaining room.

The Hebrews belonged to God, the Egyptians belonged to God, and Egypt belonged to God. God’s assault against Egypt was not a form of competition for temporary advantage, God against Pharaoh. His victory was not an instance of a temporarily sovereign invader who might be overcome later, when conditions changed. The same event—the withdrawal of visible judgment—was interpreted differently by Moses and Pharaoh. Pharaoh acted as though he believed that God’s withdrawal of the plagues was a sign of His weakening, as if cosmic forces or the gods of Egypt had finally begun to repel this invader. He grew arrogant each time a plague ended. Moses had told him that the removal of the hail and thunder was proof of God’s continuing sovereignty, proof that the forces of nature are not autonomous, but under the direct administration of God.

D. The Marxists’ Dilemma

This incident points to a fundamental problem for all secular economic theory, namely, the establishment of a point of originating (and therefore final) ownership. The modern socialist movement, especially Marxism, asserts that all ownership should be collective, and the tools of production should be lodged in the state. Marx’s words in Part II of the Communist Manifesto (1848) do not explicitly establish state ownership, but they deny the rights of private ownership: “In this sense, the theory of the Communists may be summed up in the single sentence: Abolition of private property.”⁵ Again, “Capital is a collective product, and only by the united action of many members, nay, in the last resort, only by the united action of all members of society, can it be set in motion. Capital is, therefore, not a personal, it is a social power.”⁶ At the end of Part II, he argued that under pure communism, class antagonisms will disappear, and therefore the state, as an organ of repression used by the ruling class to suppress the lower classes, will finally disappear. “When, in the course of development, class distinctions have disappeared, and all production has been concentrated in the hands of a vast association of the whole nation, the public power will lose its political character. Political power, properly so called, is merely the organised power of one class for oppressing another. . . . In place of the old bourgeois society, with its classes and class antagonisms, we shall have an association, in which the free development of each is the condition for the free development of all.”⁷ The “vast association” replaces the state.

5. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, “Manifesto of the Communist Party” (1848), in Marx and Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, [1969] 1977), I, p. 120.

This may sound as though Marx was not really in favor of the state as the owner of the tools of production. But how will the “vast association of the whole nation” allocate scarce economic resources, unless either the state or free markets order the decisions of producers? Marx’s comment in The German Ideology (1845) is of little use: “Modern universal intercourse can be controlled by individuals, therefore, only when controlled by all.”⁸ Murray Rothbard, an advocate of the zero-state economy, called attention to this confusion in Marx’s thinking: “Rejecting private property, especially capital, the Left Socialists were then trapped in an inner contradiction: if the State is to disappear after the Revolution (immediately for Bakunin, gradually ‘withering’ for Marx), then how is the ‘collective’ to run its property without becoming an enormous State itself in fact even if not in name? This was the contradiction which neither the Marxists nor the Bakuninists were ever able to resolve.”⁹

E. The Anarchists’ Dilemma

On the other hand, the libertarians, or anarcho-capitalists, argue

6. Ibid., I, p. 121.

7. Ibid., I, p. 127.

8. Karl Marx, The German Ideology (London: Lawrence & Wishart, [1845] 1965), p. 84.

9. Murray N. Rothbard, “Left and Right: The Prospects for Liberty,” Left and Right, 1 (1965). (<http://mises.org/daily/910>) For a discussion of this problem in Marxism and socialism, see my book, Gary North, Marx’s Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989), pp. 155–59. (<http://bit.ly/gnmrro>)

that the individual is absolutely sovereign over property. Even the settlement of disputes over property rights is to be solved by private organizations. There must be no political authority—no agency possessing a legal monopoly of violence—to suppress private violence. There must be only profit-seeking law courts, meaning courts without the legal authority to issue a subpoena to compel anyone to testify,¹⁰ plus voluntary arbitration organizations and insurance companies.¹¹

This raises an important question: How would this mythical libertarian society be different from Marx's mythical association? Neither one is supposed to be a political body, yet both seem to have important attributes of lawful authority. Why wouldn't For a New Liberty become Volume I of For a New Tyranny, should a warlord society ever be constructed on the original legal foundation of the privatization of violence? How would "purely defensive, profit-seeking" armies be restrained from tearing a libertarian society apart in their quest for even greater short-run profits than peaceful competition can provide? These questions have proven to be equally as unsolvable, even in theory, as the socialists' problem of allocating scarce economic resources apart from either the state or the free market.

Conclusion

Ultimate sovereignty over economic resources is possessed by God, who delegates to men certain responsibilities over property. Some of these rights are delegated to individuals, who co-operate voluntarily in exchange. Other rights are delegated to the civil government. Associations also possess limited sovereignty: churches, corporations, clubs, charitable associations, educational institutions, and so forth. The law of God recognizes the legitimacy of limited sovereignty in many forms of organization, but none of them is regarded as absolutely sovereign overall spheres of life, or even in any given sphere. Fathers may not legally murder infants; churches may not embezzle funds; civil governments may not confiscate private property without due process of law. God, however, can do anything He wants, as the experiences of both Pharaoh and Job indicate. God's total control is correlative to God's absolute ownership.

10. Murray N. Rothbard, For a New Liberty: The Libertarian Manifesto, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1973] 2006), p. 107. (<http://bit.ly/mrfanl>)

11. Bruno Leoni, Freedom and the Law (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1961). (<http://bit.ly/LeoniLaw>). Rothbard's review of the book criticizes it for not going far enough: "While Leoni is vague and wavering on the structure that his courts would take, he at least indicates the possibility of privately competing judges and courts. . . . Similarly, while in some passages Leoni accepts the idea of a governmental supreme court which he admits becomes itself a quasi-legislature, he does call for the restoration of the ancient practice of separation of government from the judicial function. If for no other reason, Professor Leoni's work is extremely valuable for raising, in our State-bemused age, the possibility of a workable separation of the judicial function from the State apparatus." Rothbard, "On Freedom and the Law," New Individualist Review, I (Winter 1962), p. 38. (<http://bit.ly/NewIndRev>). This short-lived journal of the 1960s has also been reprinted in one volume by Liberty Classics. Rothbard went into greater detail concerning his theory of a judicial system in a society without a civil government with the power to impose sanctions, in his book, For a New Liberty, pp. 275–90.

To unravel the complex intertwining of the various spheres, in order to obtain the proper idea of the limits on the sovereignty of any or all of them, we need to search out the terms and implications of biblical law. Without the concrete examples of Old Testament law, which are seen as morally binding throughout history, men are left without any reliable guide to balance competing claims of all the self-proclaimed sovereign owners, or even admittedly derivative owners, assuming no one knows which group is sovereign in any given instance.

Those who reject the idea that biblical law governs property rights, and who also recognize the evil of attributing absolute sovereignty either to the civil government or the autonomous individual, have a distressing tendency to substitute platitudes for analysis. We hear phrases like, "We're neither socialists nor free market capitalists." Fine; then what are they? Medieval guild socialists? Keynesian interventionists? Social credit advocates? Henry Georgists? "Ordo" liberals (followers of Wilhelm Röpke)? What analytical tool kit do they use to interpret the economy? What are their first principles and logical developments?

It is the task of Christian economists to discover basic biblical principles and case-law applications that offer a framework of responsible, subordinate ownership. They must discover biblical laws of stewardship. They must discover a means of analysis that enables people to understand economic causation.

Pharaoh could not, or at least he did not, and the Egypt of his day perished.

10

TOTAL SACRIFICE, TOTAL SOVEREIGNTY

And Pharaoh called unto Moses, and said, Go ye, serve the LORD; only let your flocks and your herds be stayed: let your little ones also go with you (Ex. 10:24).

The theocentric principle here is God as totally separate from His creation: transcendence, point one of the biblical covenant model.¹ He establishes a series of separating covenants with those whom He chooses to become His representatives: point two of the biblical covenant model. This system of judicial representation is hierarchical.²

A. Negotiations

Pharaoh at this point was a battered despot. His original inflexibility was becoming more pliant, at least on the surface. When Moses first came before Pharaoh to request a time for sacrifice to God, Pharaoh absolutely rejected his request (Ex. 5:2). He denied knowing the God whom Moses spoke about. He punished the Hebrews by withdrawing the state-supplied straw for their brick-making. He retained his self-confident prohibition through four plagues: the Nile's transformation into blood, the frogs (after which he temporarily capitulated), the lice, and the swarms of insects.

Pharaoh then called Moses and informed him that it would be all right if the Israelites sacrificed in the land of Egypt (Ex. 8:25). Moses rejected the offer with the argument that lawful sacrifice involved the sacrifice of an animal that was an abomination in the sight of the Egy-tians (Ex. 8:26). This probably meant sheep, since the profession of shepherd was an abomination to the Egyptians (Gen. 46:34). So, Pharaoh backed down some more: they could go into the wilderness, but not too far away (Ex. 8:28). He would not permit them to travel a full three days' journey, as Moses requested (Ex. 8:27). Pharaoh again reversed himself and refused to allow them to go (Ex. 8:32). Then came three more plagues: dying cattle, boils, and hail (Ex. 9).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch.1.

2. Sutton, ch. 2. North, ch. 2.

At this point, Moses came and announced the imminence of another plague: locusts. Pharaoh's response to Moses and also to his own advisors was a compromise that was, in reality, the same old stubbornness. The New American Standard Bible's translation is far more clear than the King James: "And Pharaoh's servants said to him, 'How long will this man be a snare to us? Let the men go, that they may serve the LORD their God. Do you not realize that Egypt is destroyed?'" So, Moses and Aaron were brought back to Pharaoh, and he said to them, "Go, serve the LORD your God! Who are the ones who are going?" And Moses said, "We shall go with our young and our old; with our sons and our daughters, with our flocks and our herds we will go, for we must hold a feast to the LORD." Then he said unto them, "Thus may the LORD be with you, if ever I let you and your little ones go! Take heed, for evil is in your mind" (Ex. 10:7–10).

God then brought the plague of locusts upon Egypt. Pharaoh repented, asked Moses to remove them, and then once again forbade them to depart. Next, God brought thick darkness upon Egypt. "And Pharaoh called unto Moses, and said, Go ye, serve the LORD; only let your flocks and your herds be stayed: let your little ones also go with you" (Ex. 10:24). Moses again rejected this compromise: "Our cattle also shall go with us; there shall not an hoof be left behind; for thereof must we take to serve the LORD our God, until we come thither" (Ex. 10:26). The next verse repeats the familiar theme: "But the LORD hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he would not let them go." Pharaoh then sent Moses and Aaron away permanently (Ex. 10:28).

What was in Pharaoh's mind? A probable explanation is this: Pharaoh wanted to tie the Hebrews to an anchor. At first, he did not want them to travel anywhere or sacrifice to any other God. Then he was willing to have them travel a little distance, just out of sight of the Egyptian people (Ex. 8:28). This way, Egypt's army could put them under surveillance, and if they tried to escape, the army could easily get to them in time to pull them back. A three days' journey would have given them too great a head start. Moses was unwilling to capitulate.

So, Pharaoh and his counselors came up with the idea of letting only the males go to sacrifice. Again, Moses was uncooperative. So, Pharaoh counter-offered: "All right, how about this? All the people go, but not the animals. Leave your capital here." Unacceptable, said Moses.

B. Non-Negotiable Demands

What we see is a conflict between two very stubborn men. Pharaoh appeared to be the more "reasonable." After all, hadn't he retreated from his original prohibition? Hadn't he tried his best to work out a solution? True, it took two or three plagues each time to convince him to make a counter-offer to Moses, but he always seemed to repent. But Moses—what an ideologue! He refused to budge. He had to have it all. He kept making non-negotiable demands. All the people had to go. All the animals had to go. They had to go three days' journey away from Goshen. They had to be out of sight of the Egyptians. Moses, as God's representative, did not choose to work out a compromise. It was "all or nothing" with Moses: all for the Israelites and, if Pharaoh remained obstinate, nothing for the Egyptians. Pharaoh's advisors saw this clearly: "Egypt is destroyed," they reminded Pharaoh. Little did they suspect just how destroyed Egypt would shortly become.

The Bible's account is equally uncompromising: it was Pharaoh, not Moses, who had his heart actively hardened by God. Yet Moses appears to be the uncompromising representative in this battle of the wills. Why should Moses seem so rigid to modern readers? The modern world, with its presupposition of relativism, has a tendency to regard compromise as an almost universal benefit. "You go along to get along," is an old saying in the United States Senate.³ Speaker of the House of Representatives Sam Rayburn made it famous.⁴ You compromise. You rise above your principles. You make a deal.

Moses stood with God. He asked for a few days to sacrifice to God—a comprehensive sacrifice that would have involved the whole of Israel: men, women, children, and animals. All of them would be separated from their earthly captors. All of them would be outside the direct sovereign control of the Egyptian state. In short, they would be utterly under the dominion of God, and visibly so.

They did not propose to escape. When Moses asked Pharaoh to

3. William Safire, Safire's Political Dictionary (New York: Ballentine, 1978), p. 303.

4. Anthony Champagne, Congressman Sam Rayburn (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1984), p. 161.

“let my people go,” he was not asking him to give up control of God’s people. At least, Moses did not ask this directly. But when he came to a self-proclaimed god, the ruler of a supposedly divine state, there could be no question about what was implied by his request. He was asking Pharaoh to revoke an area of his self-proclaimed total sovereignty in Egypt. He was asking Pharaoh to announce that the continuity of being between him and the gods of Egypt was in fact not a divine continuity at all, that there is a God who is higher, and who commands the sacrifices of a slave population. Moses was asking Pharaoh to make a symbolic commitment to God. Pharaoh was to admit to everyone that he held power over the Israelites by permission from the God of Israel, and that this foreign God had the authority to compel Egypt to suspend all signs of its sovereignty over Israel for several days, perhaps a week. (The phrase, “three days’ journey,” may have meant a round-trip of three days, or three days out and three days back, although the latter seems more plausible: Ex. 5:3.) Pharaoh had to put the Israelites on their “good behavior,” relying on their sense of justice to return to bondage. To have done so would have meant abandoning his role as absolute sovereign.

What if he had agreed to Moses’ request? The Israelites had not requested freedom. God had not instructed Moses to call for a permanent release from Egypt. God had told Moses that He intended to lead them out of Egypt on a permanent basis (Ex. 3:8), but He did not instruct Moses to demand their release. Moses was only to request a week or less of freedom. God promised: “And I am sure that the king of Egypt will not let you go, no, not by a mighty hand” (Ex. 3:19), or as the New English Bible puts it, “unless he is compelled.” Why was God so certain? Because He intended to control Pharaoh’s decisions: “. . . and the LORD hardened Pharaoh’s heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go out of the land” (Ex. 11:10). God’s active hardening of Pharaoh’s heart was basic to His promise to deliver Israel permanently: “And I will harden Pharaoh’s heart, and multiply my signs and my wonders in the land of Egypt. But Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you, that I may lay my hand upon Egypt, and bring forth mine armies, and my people the children of Israel, out of the land of Egypt by great judgments” (Ex. 7:3–4).

C. The Question of Sovereignty

God demands absolute commitment from all creatures. Pharaoh, who was believed by the Egyptians to be an absolute sovereign, only needed to proclaim his partial sovereignty in order to challenge God's claim of total sovereignty. All he needed to do was to retain a token sovereignty over Israel to make his claim valid. If the children stayed, or the wives stayed, or the animals stayed, then the Israelites were symbolically acknowledging the legitimate divine sovereignty of the Egyptian state. If they would sacrifice inside Egypt's borders, or at least not too far into the wilderness, then God's claim of total sovereignty would be successfully challenged. If Pharaoh could extract even the tiniest token of symbolic sovereignty, then God's claim to the whole of the lives of all the Israelites would be invalidated. In other words, if Pharaoh, as a self-proclaimed divinity, could extract a sign of his sovereignty from another self-proclaimed divinity, then neither of them could claim full sovereignty.

Pharaoh's strategy implicitly admitted that he was not fully sovereign. Full sovereignty had been his initial claim, but the plagues had beaten him down. By now, he was willing to accept partial sovereignty, for that would pull the God of the Israelites down to his level, or at least low enough to re-establish the theology of the continuity of being. He could acknowledge that the God of the Israelites was a powerful God, even more powerful than Pharaoh, at that point in time. Both of them would then be gods, both striving to overcome the external world, both with limitations, both willing to deal with each other as sovereign beings possessing the same fundamental being. This would preserve Egypt's theology of the continuity of being. This would sanction Pharaoh's position as the highest representative in Egypt of the gods. If Moses would compromise, as the authorized representative of his God, then Pharaoh could achieve a theological victory in principle: the God of the Israelites would thereby cede him lawful authority, in time and on earth, as a full-fledged god, who possessed the right to demand and receive concessions from Israel's God. Had Moses capitulated, with God's acquiescence, Pharaoh would have successfully challenged God's claim of total sovereignty, His claim that He was the only God to whom Israel owed total obedience, and who therefore had the right to demand total sacrifice from His people, leaving no outward symbol of original, primary sovereignty over them for Pharaoh to display.

D. Implicit Statism

Pharaoh, at the end of his attempts to bargain with Moses and

Moses' God, was hoping to extract at least token control over the terms of Israel's sacrifice. He wanted to retain at least one sign of his sovereignty over their worship. If God had capitulated to Pharaoh on this point, He would thereby have acknowledged Pharaoh's lawful authority to grant to the Israelites their right to worship. The Egyptian state would then have become the earthly, institutional source of religious rights, because God Himself had been compelled to accede to at least one of the terms Pharaoh had laid down. This would have made the state the final institutional authority on the question of the nature of legitimate worship. The needs of the state would have become the criteria for external worship. By extracting from God even the tiniest compromise, this self-proclaimed god of a divine state would have been sanctioned as the final earthly authority concerning religion, and also the source of the rights of religion. God would thereby have acknowledged the legitimacy of Egypt's prior claim of lawful authority over the religious affairs of the Israelites. God would thereby have acknowledged the right of Pharaoh to retain at least token authority, which meant the right of Pharaoh and his heirs to compete with God at any time in the future for total authority. The God of the Hebrews might eventually be compelled to give back to the state what the state had originally claimed.

Pharaoh had rejected Moses' initial request because he had believed that he possessed total authority. At each stage, he gave up something, but he never was willing to give up everything. He was willing to relinquish some of his authority temporarily, for as long as God brought the plagues. However, should God change His mind, or lose power, or forget the Israelites, then Pharaoh might be able to re-establish his claim of total sovereignty. Pharaoh viewed this contest as a sort of cosmological "tug of war," in which he retained lawful authority of at least one end of the rope. God might pull him close to the line temporarily, but one end was rightfully his. If God would simply acknowledge Pharaoh's right to his end by allowing him the right to set any of the terms of Hebrew sacrifice, then Pharaoh's case would not be completely destroyed. If he bided his time, the God of the Hebrews might go away, leaving Pharaoh with the whole rope.

If the state can establish a foothold—even a temporary toehold—of autonomous sovereignty, then it has established a lawful claim to as much sovereignty as it can gain through the imposition of raw power. God's claim to absolute, uncompromised sovereignty is successfully challenged by man whenever God is forced to surrender even token autonomous sovereignty to man. Only if God's sovereignty is absolute can God claim to be the sole source of meaning and power in the universe. It is fallen man's goal to share some of that sovereignty. It is also Satan's goal, even if man becomes, temporarily, the holder of any fraction of this original, autonomous sovereignty, for if Satan can demonstrate that man has any final (or original) sovereignty whatsoever, then God's claim of total sovereignty collapses, which is the very essence of Satan's challenge to God. Satan can collect from man whatever sovereignty man might snatch from God, given the fact of Satan's greater power; but he must first place man in the same continuity of being with God. This attempt is always futile, from Genesis to Revelation.

E. No Compromise

God refused to grant Pharaoh anything. He rejected the seemingly reasonable compromises offered to Him by this self-proclaimed god, this ruler of a supposedly divine state. God hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he might not capitulate and let the Israelites journey into the wilderness to sacrifice to God. Pharaoh is the great historical example in Scripture of Proverbs 21:1: "The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will." Yet Pharaoh was totally responsible for his acts. In great wrath, he challenged God, and God killed the firstborn of Egypt. Then the Egyptians expelled the Israelites in great fear, allowing them not merely a week of freedom to sacrifice to God, but permanent freedom to sacrifice to God. The Egyptians fulfilled God's promise to Moses, that the whole nation of Israel would go free and claim the land of Canaan (Ex. 3:8). God gave them total victory, yet Moses had officially requested only, at most, a week's freedom to sacrifice. However, this sacrifice was comprehensive: every man, woman, child, and beast had to go three days' journey into the wilderness.

Pharaoh, unwilling to acknowledge the validity of this claim upon the whole of Israel, because it would have denied absolute sovereignty on his part and on the part of the Egyptian state, resisted unto death. He could not allow Israel a week of freedom, a week of rest, a week in which no tokens of subservience to Egypt's gods would be adhered to by the Israelites. He realized that all the claims of absolute authority on the part of Egypt would be refuted by such a capitulation on his part. Therefore, he hardened his heart, hoping to preserve the theology of Egypt and the autonomous sovereignty of man. When the Israelites left triumphantly, he lashed out against them, in a suicidal attempt to destroy them or drag them back. God had not compromised with him; the all-or-nothing claim of God could not be sacrificed by some token acknowledgment of lawful Egyptian sovereignty.

Pharaoh recognized the nature of God's total rejection of his claims to divinity, the absolute denial of the continuity of being. God had cut away his claim to divinity in front of his people and the kings of the earth, just as He had promised (Ex. 9:16). Pharaoh preferred to risk his own death, the destruction of his army, and the captivity of Egypt, rather than submit meekly to the triumph of the Israelites. He bet and lost. As such, Pharaoh's experience is archetypal for all the societies of Satan. They all make the same bet; they all lose. The only exception in the Bible was the case of the Gibeonites. They tricked the Israelites into making a covenant with them. By becoming permanent slaves to the Hebrews, they thereby acknowledged the sovereignty of God (Josh. 9).

Conclusion

The state is not absolutely sovereign. There is no divine right of kings, irrespective of what they say or do. There was no way for Moses to deal with Pharaoh on Egypt's terms without compromising the sovereignty of God. Moses refused to compromise. The state is not the source of the right (duty) of religious worship; God is. The state may acknowledge the right (duty) of men to worship God by providing a legal code or bill of rights, but the state is not the source of this right. This right cannot be revoked unilaterally by state officials without bringing into play the vengeance of God. To acknowledge the permanent right (duty) of men to sacrifice to God is to acknowledge the comprehensive and absolute sovereignty of God—an original sovereignty, a final sovereignty, and a primary sovereignty, which is all one fundamental sovereignty. All human sovereignty is secondary; it is a derivative sovereignty. It is, above all, a completely accountable sovereignty, in terms of which every individual will be judged, and in terms of which every institution is also judged, in time and on earth (Deut. 8; 28).

11

SEPARATION AND DOMINION

But against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue, against man or beast: that ye may know how the LORD doth put a difference between the Egyptians and Israel (Ex. 11:7).

God announced that there was a radical covenantal difference between the Hebrews and the Egyptians. This difference was about to be manifested in a sharp break historically: the exodus. So great was this difference, that no dog would lick its lips (literal translation: sharpen its tongue) at the Hebrews upon their departure from Egypt. No dog would eat any Hebrew, as dogs later ate Jezebel, the result of God's special curse (II Kings 9:36). The Egyptians now respected them and their leader, Moses. "And the LORD gave the people favour in the land of Egypt, in the sight of the Egyptians. Moreover the man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh's servants, and in the sight of the people" (Ex. 11:3). The meaning was clear: the Hebrews would leave victorious, having seen their enemies so thoroughly defeated, that not one of them would raise a cry against them. No jeering crowds would force them to "run the gauntlet," throwing rocks or garbage at them as they departed. The Egyptians believed in the continuity of being, and Moses had vanquished the representative of Egypt's gods, who himself was believed to be divine. Were not the Hebrews linked to that victorious God, through Moses?

A. Egypt vs. Israel

Consider the exodus from the point of view of a citizen of Egypt or one of the Canaanitic nations. A slave population had successfully challenged the dominant political order of its day. Egypt's wealth and power, even in decline (if Courville's chronology of the dynasties is correct), were recognized throughout the ancient world. Yet Egypt could not bring these Hebrews into submission. The ancient world viewed a military defeat as a defeat for the gods of the vanquished city-state. What a defeat for the gods of Egypt! A slave population had risen up, under the very noses of the Egyptians, and had smashed the political order. So complete was this victory, that the invading Hyksos (Amalekites) swept over Egypt without encountering military resistance. God had been so victorious over Egypt that His people did not even bother to remain in the land as conquerors. So contemptuous of Egypt were the Hebrews that they marched out, leaving the spoils of war to the Amalekites, who were being replaced in Canaan by the Hebrews.¹ Here was a God so great, that He did not even bother to subdue the land of Egypt. And now, the Canaanites knew, these people were coming for them. Is it any wonder that they trembled for a generation (Josh. 2:9–11)?

The division between Egypt and Israel was assured. The Hebrews could not be tricked back into submission. Egyptians would not be able to subdue them, as vanquished populations sometimes do, by intermarrying, nor would the Hebrews absorb Egyptian religion and culture by intermarrying. The religious and linguistic separation would be maintained permanently, since God was taking them out of Egypt and was preparing to displace the Canaanites. The Canaanites knew what was in store for them (Josh. 2:9–11). Israel took no prisoners (Josh. 6:21). Israel, if the people remained faithful to their God, would annihilate the Canaanites.

When the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and mightier than thou; And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them: Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son. For they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods: so will the anger of the LORD be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly. But thus shall ye deal with them; ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire. For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God: the LORD thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth (Deut. 7:1–6).²

1. Immanuel Velikovsky, Ages in Chaos (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1952), ch. 2.

There was a difference between the Egyptians and Israel. That difference was God. He had made a covenant with them. They had been a tiny nation; now they would be victorious. They had already been so victorious over Egypt that Egypt's dogs recognized it; they would not lick their chops at Israelites. Yet it had not been their strength which had led them to freedom. "The LORD did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people: But because the LORD loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn unto your fathers, hath the LORD brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen, from the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt" (Deut. 7:7–8). It was God's choice, not theirs, to redeem them—to buy them back by destroying their enemies. It was God's choice when He had promised the land of Canaan to Abraham for his seed. It was God's choice when He had selected Moses as their leader. It was God's choice to harden Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not compromise and permit the Hebrews to go and sacrifice to their God. God had done it all, and God would continue to do it all, if they remained faithful to His covenant.

God's covenant with Israel was the great dividing sword. It was the dividing line between Israel and Egypt. Israel received its blessings; Egypt received its curse. It was also the dividing line between Israel and the nations of Canaan. It separated Egypt from Israel, and it was to serve as a means of destruction in Canaan. God had separated Israel from Egypt geographically; He planned to separate Israel and the tribes of Canaan biologically: the Canaanites would all die. The Canaanites recognized this, according to Rahab (Josh. 2:9–11).

Among the Hebrews of Moses' day, only Joshua and Caleb recognized the commitment of God to give His people total victory, in time and in Canaan (Num. 14).³ The Hebrews of Moses' era did not recognize the inevitability of their impending victory. They had not recognized the nature of their victory over the Egyptians. They did not understand the nature of the God who had given them freedom, nor did they understand the nature of the ethical covenant which He had set before them. They had to serve Him continuously. They chose to serve other gods intermittently. They were supposed to exercise dominion continuously. They chose to exercise dominion intermittently. They were supposed to be victorious continuously. They were defeated intermittently.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 17. It should be obvious that pacifism as a moral philosophy has no support in the Bible. The same God who was incarnate in Jesus Christ ordered the Hebrews to annihilate the Canaanites. Any discussion by God-fearing people of the legitimacy of warfare from a biblical standpoint must begin with a consideration and moral acceptance of these verses.

3. A similar incident took place a millennium and a half later, when the Jews and Romans had a stone rolled across Jesus' tomb, in order to keep His disciples from taking His body and claiming that His prophecy concerning His resurrection had been fulfilled; meanwhile, the disciples scattered to the winds in self-imposed defeat.

B. The Covenant and Separation

The covenant is the means by which God separates His people from the world. It is supposed to be the means by which his people bring the world into conformity with biblical law. He shows grace to His people and gives them the tool of dominion, His law-order. This separation finally results in the permanent separation between God and His enemies, on the day of judgment. Eternity is marked by this covenantal separation.

God separated His people from the surrounding cultures in the Old Testament era. He separated Noah from the pre-flood world. He separated Abram from both Ur of the Chaldees and Haran. He separated Israel from Canaan during Israel's sojourn in Egypt. He separated Israel from Egypt's masses by putting them in Goshen. He separated Israel from Egypt completely at the time of the exodus. All of these separations were essentially separations from pagan gods and pagan cultures. But these separations did not imply retreat and impotence. These separations were established by God in Israel's history in order to give God's people confidence concerning Israel's future. The covenantal separation from other nations established the possibility and the requirement of Israel's dominion over those nations. Israel wiped out most of the Canaanites, and Israel was supposed to wipe out, or drive out, all of them. God had prepared for His people a new training ground, a type of paradise, a land flowing with milk and honey (covenant feast), which pointed back to the garden of Eden and forward to the new heavens and new earth. This land had been cleared of wild beasts, except for relatively few of them (Ex. 23:28–29), and Israel's victory cleared the land of most of the wild cultures.⁴ It was to have been a theological, cultural, and political clean sweep. Israel was to take the land by force, and this land was to become the base of operations in a mighty conquest, fueled by a population explosion and compound economic growth, which was to have carried God's dominion across the face of the earth. To fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant, God's redeemed people must separate themselves ethically from Satan's unredeemed people.

4. Joshua 10:21 reads: "And all the people returned to the camp to Joshua at Mekkedah in peace: none moved his tongue against any of the children of Israel." Lit-

The separation of God's people from ethical rebels is a permanent separation. Heaven does not eventually fuse with hell. The new heavens and the new earth do not eventually merge into the lake of fire. The residents of the new heavens and new earth rule eternally (Rev. 21; 22); the residents of the lake of fire are subjected to endless defeat (Rev. 20:14–15). The people of God are separated from the ethical rebels on a permanent basis after the final judgment, and this final separation brings with it absolute dominion. It is the final victory of God over Satan, and it involves the permanent dominion of man over the creation. The rebels are killed, for they suffer the second, permanent death (Rev. 20:14). Covenantal separation therefore implies covenantal dominion.

This necessary relationship was never meant to be postponed until the day of judgment. It is supposed to be progressively worked out, in time and on earth.⁵ God's separation of Abram from his people, of Abraham's seed from the other nations, of Israel from Egypt, and of Israel from all the religious traditions of Canaan, all required action by His covenanted people, in time and on earth. Abram left Ur and Haran, and he circumcised Isaac. Similarly, Moses challenged Pharaoh. Israel did not stay in Egypt. Israel did not wander in the wilderness forever. Israel fought and won, in history, in terms of God's separating covenant, which is a dominion covenant. These mighty acts of God were designed to convince Israel of the necessity of remaining true to the covenant. The prophets kept returning to these historical acts of God in the life of Israel, especially the delivery from Egypt (I Sam. 8:8; Isa. 11:16; Jer. 2:6; Hos. 13:4). So did Stephen in his sermon (Acts 7). Men's separation from Satan and his works is to bring them dominion over Satan and his works: in politics, economics, military affairs, art, medierally, this can be translated: "Not (he) sharpened (his) tongue against a man." It seems to refer back to Exodus 11:7, meaning that no Israelites died in battle.

5. I use this phrase repeatedly in my writings. It refers to human history prior to the second coming of Christ at the final judgment) and therefore prior to the establishment of a sin-free world after the resurrection. It is easier to use the phrase than continually search for substitute phrases.

cine, science, and every other area of human action.

C. Ancient Humanism's Separation

Basic to many of the ancient cultures was the distinction between "the people," the group to which a citizen belonged, and "the others," or "barbarians," who were outside the covenantal membership. Egypt was no exception. Wilson commented: "In their feeling of special election and special providence, the Egyptians called themselves 'the people' in contrast to foreigners."⁶ So deeply embedded in Greek and Roman thought was the division between peoples, that classical legal theory recognized no common law within the city.⁷ Fustel wrote:

No one could become a citizen at Athens, if he was a citizen in another city; for it was a religious impossibility to be at the same time a member of two cities, as it also was to be a member of two families. One could not have two religions at the same time. . . . Neither at Rome nor at Athens could a foreigner be a proprietor. He could not marry; or, if he married, his marriage was not recognized, and his children were reputed illegitimate. He could not make a contract with a citizen; at any rate, the law did not recognize such a contract as valid. . . . The Roman law forbade him to inherit from a citizen, and even forbade a citizen to inherit from him. They pushed this principle so far, that if a foreigner obtained the rights of a citizen without his son, born before this event, obtaining the same favor, the son became a foreigner in regard to his father, and could not inherit from him. The distinction between citizen and foreigner was stronger than the natural tie between father and son.⁸

There was also the linguistic difference. The very term "barbarian" has its origins in Greek grammar. The Greeks spoke Greek, of course, while foreigners' languages all sounded like "bar bar"—incoherent, in other words. This, at least, is the standard explanation of the term, and it is repeated by the influential British historian of classical culture, H. D. F. Kitto, in the introduction to his book, The Greeks (1951). Both Kitto and C. M. Bowra argued that "barbarian" did not have a pejorative sense in Homer, but later the term came to mean inferior status.⁹

6. John A. Wilson, The Burden of Egypt: An Interpretation of Ancient Egyptian Culture (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1951] 1967), p. 112.

7. Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Bk. III, ch. XI, pp. 192–93.

8. Ibid., III:xii, pp. 196–97.

9. H. D. F. Kitto, The Greeks (Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin, [1951] 1962), pp. 8–

Gilbert Murray, whose Five Stages of Greek Religion (1925) is regarded as a classic, said that we can mark the origin of classical Greece with the advent of the cultural distinction between the Greek and the barbarian, when the Greek historian Herodotus could write that “the Hellenic race was marked off from the barbarian, as more intelligent and more emancipated from silly nonsense.”¹⁰ By the middle of the fifth century, B.C., the difference between Greek and barbarian, in the minds of the Greeks, was enormous.

We see the linguistic origin of the word “barbarian” in Paul’s comments on tongues in the church. “Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me” (I Cor. 14:11). Again, in Romans 1:14: “I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians. . . .” Paul, however, did not distinguish between Greeks and barbarians in terms of their innate differences, but only in terms of linguistic differences.

D. The Ethical Disunity of Man

The unity of man, which was assumed and announced architecturally at the tower of Babel, had been shattered by God when He confounded their language and scattered them. God’s restraint on the creation of a one-state world brought freedom to men—freedom to develop personally and culturally. Yet it also brought audible distinctions between men. Linguistic distinctions, at least in literate cultures, resist alterations, and even when linguistic changes occur, the written records of the past draw men’s thoughts and commitment back to a once-distinct past. It was no accident that the perceived international unity of the Roman Catholic Church was maintained for centuries by the Latin Mass, and it was also not accidental that the historically unprecedented disruptions within that church, which took place from the mid-1960s onward, were intimately related to the successful efforts of the church’s religious liberals in abolishing the use of the Latin Mass.

Religious humanists sometimes have attacked this kind of division between men. Ludwig Feuerbach was one example. His book, The Essence of Christianity (1841), created a sensation, and converted a whole generation of European intellectuals to atheism. Frederick Engels, Marxism's co-founder, remarked once that "One must himself have experienced the liberating effect of this book to get an idea of it. Enthusiasm was general; we all became at once Feuerbachians."¹¹ In this book, Feuerbach attacked Christianity's concept of saved and lost. Such a view of man separates men from other men. Yet man is a unified whole, a species being. In fact, Feuerbach said, God is really nothing more than man's own thoughts, projected into the religious consciousness of men. "God is the human being; but he presents himself to the religious consciousness as a distinct being."¹² The Christian denies that man is God, and this is unforgivable. Even worse, Christians say that some men will be saved by God, and others will not be saved. "To believe, is synonymous with goodness; not to believe, with wickedness. Faith, narrow and prejudiced, refers all unbelief to the moral disposition. In its view the unbeliever is an enemy to Christ out of obduracy, out of wickedness. Hence faith has fellowship with believers only; unbelievers it rejects. It is well-disposed towards believers, but ill-disposed towards unbelievers. In faith there lies a malignant principle."¹³

10; C. M. Bowra, The Greek Experience (New York: Mentor, [1957] 1964), p. 26.

10. Gilbert Murray, Five Stages of Greek Religion (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1925] 1955), p. 38.

Marx and Engels, his most famous converts, rejected Feuerbach's brand of non-divisive humanism. They saw the "illusion" of God as a product of a deliberate lie: a weapon used by capitalists to suppress the proletariat. The problem is class divisions; the solution is class warfare, with the proletariat finally emerging victorious over the bourgeoisie.¹⁴ They called for unconditional surrender by the bourgeoisie; they called for all-out warfare. They predicted absolute victory. They saw that true victory over evil involves triumph, in time and on earth.¹⁵ They saw that there must be a self-awareness on the part of the "vanguard" of history, the proletariat, concerning the irreconcilable differences between them and their class enemies, the bourgeoisie.¹⁶ They substi-

11. Frederick Engels, "Ludwig Feuerbach and the End of Classical German Philosophy" (1888), in Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, [1969] 1977), III, p. 344.

12. Ludwig Feuerbach, The Essence of Christianity, trans. George Eliot (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1841] 1957), p. 247.

13. Ibid., p. 252. Emphasis in original.

14. Marx and Engels, "Manifesto of the Communist Party" (1848), in Selected Works, I, pp. 125–26.

15. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010).

16. "All previous historical movements were movements of minorities, or in the interests of minorities. The proletarian movement is the self-conscious, independent tuted the forces of dialectical, materialistic history for the providence of God, thereby preserving an eschatology of victory.¹⁷ They saw that there must be separation in order to achieve victory. To that extent, Marxism adheres to a humanistic variant of a fundamental doctrine of the Bible. It is one reason why the Marxists have been so successful in promoting their imitation gospel in the twentieth century.

Conclusion

It was Israel's continuing refusal to break with the theology and culture of Egypt as such which condemned that first generation to a life of wandering in the wilderness. It was not the covenantal separation from Egypt which resulted in Israel's wilderness journey. God did not bring Israel into the wilderness to die. This was the accusation of the rebels against Moses, time after time (Ex. 14:11–12; 16:3), so they all died in the wilderness. Their children, led by Joshua and Caleb—two men who had understood the nature of God and His covenant—took possession of the land. It was Satan's lie that covenantal separation from "establishment civilization"—first from Egypt, and later from the remains of the Canaanitic cultures meant historical defeat and impotence for Israel. This same lie was one of the most important factors in Satan's success against the church in the twentieth century. Whenever this lie becomes the dominant opinion among God's covenanted people, they can expect to die in the wilderness, just as the complainers and defeatists of Moses' day also died in the wilderness.

Christians must also recognize that the defeat of complainers and defeatists in one generation does not necessarily condemn the next generation to a similar defeat. When men recognize the optimistic nature of God's separating covenant, and when they seek to work out the terms of God's law-order in their various spheres of influence and responsibility, they will discover the impotence of God's enemies, even as Joshua and 85-year-old Caleb discovered it. Their separation by God implies their victory with God, in eternity but also in history. Fur-movement of the immense majority, in the interests of the immense majority. The proletariat, the lowest stratum of our present society, cannot stir, cannot raise itself up, without the whole superincumbent strata of official society being sprung into the air." Communist Manifesto, in ibid., I, p. 118.

17. F. N. Lee, Communist Eschatology: A Christian Philosophical Analysis of the Post-Capitalistic Views of Marx, Engels, and Lenin (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1974).

thermore, with respect to the enemies of God, their separation from God leads directly to their defeat by God, not only throughout eternity, but in time and on earth. Their eventual defeat by the people of God—those who honor the terms of God’s separating covenant—in time and on earth is an earnest (down payment) of their coming eternal defeat. *Without biblical law, men become progressively impotent culturally.*¹⁸

When God separates His people from the world by means of His separating covenant, He provides them with the means of external victory, not simply their individualistic internal victory over personal sin. As God progressively separates His people in terms of their conformity to His law, He thereby gives them their tool of dominion.

The dogs of Egypt had more understanding of this fact than did the fleeing slaves of Moses’ day. The dogs of Egypt had a better understanding of the implications of God’s covenantal partition than fundamentalism’s hordes of self-proclaimed experts in biblical prophecy. The dogs of Egypt may have whetted their tongues, but if they ate anyone, it was dead Egyptians, not dead Hebrews.

18. Gary North, “Common Grace, Eschatology, and Biblical Law,” The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Winter 1976–77). Cf. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

12

DISCONTINUITY AND CONTINUITY IN SOCIAL CHANGE

And ye shall let nothing of it remain until the morning; and that which remaineth of it until the morning ye shall burn with fire. And thus shall ye eat it; with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste: it is the LORD'S passover (Ex. 12:10–11).

The theocentric principle here is the centrality of God's deliverance of His people in history. Deliverance is always hierarchical: God delivers His people. This is point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy.¹ The deliverance of the exodus was a manifestation of the principle of discontinuity, which is an application of the biblical doctrine of sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.²

A. Social Progress

Any social philosophy that does not contain an explicit concept of social progress is incapable of producing the kinds of cultural transformations that are required by the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28).³ Without faith in the possibility of escape from an individual's familiar failures in the present, a person has no legitimate hope in the future. Extending this principle of faith from the individual to the social order, without a belief in the possibility of social progress, people are left without one of the fundamental motivating factors necessary for building and maintaining a civilization.⁴ Faith in the possibility of both personal and social deliverance in history, as well as final deliverance out of history, must be widespread if history is ever to be re-shaped by the gospel, as required by the Great Commission (Matt. 28:18–20).⁵ *There is no neutral safety zone for sin or sinners anywhere in time and on earth. Redemption is comprehensive.*⁶

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Sutton, ch. 4. North, ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

Is social progress possible? If so, is it attained through a series of revolutions, or is it marked by slow, organic change? In short, is progress discontinuous or continuous? Or is it some mixture of the two? This fundamental question has divided social philosophers in Western history.⁷ This question was the crucial philosophical dividing line between the revolutionaries of France in 1789–94 and the conservative doctrines of Edmund Burke.⁸ Modern conservatism can be dated from the publication of Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790). The question of continuity vs. revolution was also the heart of the 150-year dispute between Marxism and all non-revolutionary social philosophies.⁹

The Bible provides the basis of the correct answer to this fundamental social question. The key factor is ethics: point three of the biblical covenant model.¹⁰ But ethics in biblical theology is always linked to God's sanctions, both in history (Deut. 28)¹¹ and eternity (Rev. 20). Whether a society experiences long-term progress or catastrophic external judgments that produce discontinuous social change depends on the ethical condition of those who compose the society, especially

4. See Robert A. Nisbet, History of the Idea of Progress (New York: Basic Books, 1980), especially the Epilogue.

5. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission: The Christian Enterprise in a Fallen World (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

6. Gary North, "Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology of Social Action," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VIII (Summer 1981). Reprinted in Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

7. It was not a topic of discussion in classical philosophy, for neither the Greeks nor the Romans believed in long-term progress. They debated the nature of social change, but not social progress.

8. Russell Kirk, The Conservative Mind: from Burke to Santayana (Chicago: Regnery, 1953), ch. 2; Nisbet, The Social Philosophers: Community and Conflict in Western Thought (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1973), pp. 265–80.

9. Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnmror>)

10 Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 3.

11. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 69.

the religious and political leaders.

The Book of Exodus provides the archetype of all discontinuous social events, which is why the story of the exodus initially appeals to revolutionaries, “liberation theologians,” and other proponents of humanistic confrontations between “the exploited poor” and the “exploiting rich.”¹² But the revelational ethical framework that the Bible presents gives no support for the dreams and schemes of social revolutionaries.

B. Promise and Deliverance

To understand the biblical concept of social change, we must understand the theology of Passover.

God promised to pass over all the households in Egypt that had blood sprinkled on the doorposts (Ex. 12:13). He would allow the destroyer (Ex. 12:23) to enter all other homes, bringing death to the first-born male of both man and beast.¹³ This was the avenger of blood, who was about to avenge the land of Egypt for the pollution caused by the murder of the Hebrew males at least 80 years before.¹⁴ Any family that did not acknowledge its need for a sacrificial substitute would make its sacrifice with its firstborn son. There was no escape from this sacrifice; it was only a question of which kind of firstborn sacrifice a family would choose to offer to God: human or animal.

The Egyptians chose to cling to their faith in Pharaoh’s divinity, in the hope that this final plague would not come upon them. Not one Egyptian family took its stand with the God of the Hebrews, “for there was not a house where there was not one dead" (Ex. 12:30b). Once again, the gods of Egypt failed them. God had executed judgment upon all the gods of Egypt, including the Pharaoh, the self-proclaimed divine-human link on earth.

12. The anti-capitalist Christian social critic Ronald Sider wrote this: “The God of the Bible cares when people enslave and oppress others. At the Exodus he acted to end economic oppression and bring freedom to slaves. . . . The Exodus was certainly the decisive event in the creation of the chosen people. We distort the biblical interpretation of this momentous occasion. unless we see that at this pivotal point, the Lord of the universe was at work correcting oppression and liberating the poor.” Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1977), pp. 60–61. The book was a best-seller.

13. This destroyer may have been an angel, possibly the angel of the Lord. Hebrews 11:28 personifies the destroying agent: “he that destroyed,” in the King James Version; “the destroying/one” in the Greek. James G. Murphy, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Exodus (Minneapolis, Minnesota: James Publications, [1868] 1976), p. 128.

14. The avenger of blood was the judge of all the inhabitants of Egypt, including the Hebrews and the mixed multitude. He was avenging the land at last for the murder of the Hebrew infant males, who had been drowned in the Nile (Ex. 1:22). The first judgment had been against the Nile, turning it into blood (Ex. 7:17–21). Now the death of the firstborn male children would cleanse the land of its pollution.

The Egyptians had seen Pharaoh fail to protect the nation; plague after plague came upon them, yet they did not recognize the imminence and inescapability of this final judgment. Egypt had long seemed immune to foreign invasion and foreign domination; now the slaves of Egypt would alone be protected from judgment. Goshen, the home of God's people, would alone receive protection, but only because of the willingness of these people to recognize judgment and take steps to avoid it.¹⁵

The Hebrews had been in Egypt for at least two centuries. They had worked on Egypt's monuments and cities for at least two generations. The Egyptians expected this slave population to remain subservient on a permanent basis. So did most of the members of that population. God's promise to Abraham had been forgotten. Even with Moses' words before them, and the Passover meal required of them, they did not really expect deliverance. "And they baked unleavened cakes of the dough which they had brought forth out of Egypt, for it was not leavened; because they were thrust out of Egypt, and could not tarry, neither had they prepared for themselves any victual" (Ex. 12:39). They had prepared no food for the journey. Why had they made no preparations for their imminent journey? The answer seems obvious: they really did not expect God's overnight deliverance. The Passover ceremony pointed to just such a deliverance, but they did not really believe it. They did what they were instructed by Moses and Aaron (Ex. 12:50), but no more. Their religion was a minimal religion, as their actions demonstrated repeatedly for the next 40 years.

After at least two centuries in Egypt, the Hebrews had grown accustomed to their environment. The envy of the Hebrews against

15. It could be objected that God never did offer a way of escape to the Egyptians. There is no explicit evidence that God did tell them of the blood on the doorposts, but there is little doubt that Egypt's representatives by this time were monitoring everything the Hebrews did or said. They must have known. These people were not ignorant of God's law; they had been placed under the administration of Joseph two centuries before. Also, the confrontations between Moses and Pharaoh indicate that Pharaoh knew exactly the crimes Egypt had committed against the Hebrews. Finally, I argue that the free offer of the gospel must not be denied: John Murray, "The Free Offer of the Gospel," in Collected Writings of John Murray, 4 vols. (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1982), IV, pp. 113–32.

Moses 40 years earlier had kept them in bondage, for they had not been content to be judged by Moses. They had preferred to bring Moses low, even though this meant that their Egyptian rulers would remain dominant over them. They had been willing to remain slaves rather than risk standing up with the young Moses. When Moses returned to challenge Pharaoh, their sons complained bitterly to Moses that his troublemaking had brought new burdens upon them (Ex. 5:21). They preferred to trust the continuing tyranny of Egypt rather than trust the promise of God or His servants, Moses and Aaron. They put their faith in the Egyptian state rather than God. To that extent, they agreed with the religion of their captors. As Joshua warned their children, “Now therefore fear the LORD, and serve him in sincerity and in truth: and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt; and serve ye the LORD” (Josh. 24:14). Notice the words, “in sincerity and in truth”; they are important for understanding the apostle Paul’s references to unleavened bread, discussed below.

The familiarity of present troubles makes men hesitate to seek risky improvements in their condition. The risks of change seem too high, and the benefits seem too few or too far removed. Men choose today’s horrors in preference to tomorrow’s unfamiliar problems, even if those problems will be accompanied with the personal freedom to deal with them. Personal responsibility is too great a burden for slaves. The slave becomes passive toward his environment, content to accept what the world brings, so long as he can avoid life’s hard decisions. What keeps slaves in bondage, even when freedom is possible? Their willingness to put up with a harsh environment, just so long as it is a familiar one that brings few opportunities for personal initiative and therefore personal responsibility. Joseph was in bondage, but he did not evade responsibility. Such a slave usually does not remain in bondage permanently, for he is not mentally a slave. The willingness of some men to bear the burdens of responsible choice eventually makes them too valuable, or too powerful, for their masters to keep in servitude. Fully responsible men are difficult to enslave.

The Hebrews preferred low-risk institutional continuity. They preferred a life of little or no personal responsibility. This was a great asset for their masters, who could then devote more of their resources to things other than the suppression of rebellion. Fewer taskmasters and guards were needed, for the prisoners were docile. Even after their deliverance, that generation continued to complain to Moses about the rigors and dangers of the wilderness, despite the fact that God provided them with manna, clothing that never wore out, and feet that did not swell or blister (Deut. 8:3–4;¹⁶ Neh. 9:21).

Unquestionably, institutional continuity under most conditions is a valid goal in life. We want marital continuity when we exchange vows with our mates. We want continuity in our legal system, so that when we drive at the posted speed limit, for example, we are not issued a traffic citation by a police officer who has autonomously and arbitrarily made up new rules. At the same time, most of us want our marriages to develop, since maturity is basic to a successful life. And if we find that the existing speed limit is no longer adequate to protect life and limb, then we want legal procedures for having the speed limit changed. Therefore, institutional continuity should be understood in terms of a framework of potential change, except for changes in certain areas that are governed by God's Bible-revealed law. Even here, God reserves the right to make changes in His laws, or suspend external judgment for a time. A good example is God's retroactive suspension of a law that prohibited Passover to ritually unsanctified Hebrews. Because some members of the nation under Hezekiah had not been ritually purified when they ate the Passover,¹⁷ Hezekiah prayed that they be forgiven. God healed them retroactively, thereby overlooking the written requirements of the Mosaic law (II Chr. 30:17–20).¹⁸ If we seek the continuity of the Medes and the Persians, where the king's word was absolutely inviolable, then we may face potential disasters, as Darius did when he was forced to sentence Daniel to the lions' den (Dan. 6:14). Life's conditions change, and men's survival and prosperity depend on quick and competent reactions to changed conditions. Static continuity—the complete predictability of a familiar and dependable future—is an illegitimate goal. It is the world of the grave.

C. Structure and Change

We are here dealing with the inescapable problem of structure and

16. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 18.

17. The nature of this lack of purification is not stated.

18. The priests had begun to cleanse the temple in the first month of the first year of his reign, which was also Passover month. Passover had to be celebrated by the fourteenth day, but they did not complete the cleansing of the temple until the sixteenth (II Chr. 29:17). It was too late to celebrate Passover normally. But the second month was legitimate for travellers or people defiled by a dead body on the normal day of Passover (Num. 9:9–11). Hezekiah called for the Passover to be celebrated the next month, but all of the people were still not purified.

change, which is a variation of the traditional philosophical problem, the one (structure, unity) and the many (change, diverse conditions). Men want predictable law and predictable environments, yet they do not want to be strangled by our laws or our environment. In every science, in every field of human thought, we face the problem of structure and change, of law and flux.¹⁹

In the field of modern historiography, scholars tend to be divided into two camps: the revolutionists and the consensus historians.²⁰ One group sees man's history as a series of revolutions, or at least major conflicts. Karl Marx is perhaps the most prominent of the revolutionists; he was a proponent of violent revolution. "Revolutions are the locomotives of history," he wrote.²¹ Yet revolutions take place within a framework of continuity. They do not totally destroy the past. In contrast to the revolutionists are the consensus historians, who see history in terms of progress by means of agreement and compromise: social evolution.

The conservative American sociologist Robert Nisbet articulated a theory of social change that opposes both social revolutionism and social evolutionism as valid explanations of "inevitable" historical development. "That things should continue in time, persist, hold stable, is not to be doubted. Given such persistence, changes, however far apart, however random, discrete, and disconnected they may be in themselves, are nonetheless given the semblance of a continuity by the persisting identity itself—by the persisting kinship system, social class, religion, or whatever it may be. But, as a moment's reflection tells us, there is no continuity of change here; only continuity in the sense of persistence, punctuated, however, by the changes which occur from time to time."²² Without a consensus against which revolutionaries can

19. I used a chemistry textbook in college called Structure and Change, by Gordon S. Christiansen and Paul Garrett (San Francisco: W. H. Freeman, 1960). The problem is basic to every academic discipline.

20. See, for example, Conflict or Consensus in American History, ed. Allen F. Davis and Harold D. Woodman (Boston: D. C. Heath, 1966). They wrote in the introduction: "Has there been real conflict in American history between classes, sections, and interest groups, or has the story of the American past been primarily one of general agreement or consensus? This theme, expressed either explicitly or implicitly, may be found in virtually all major interpretations of our country's past" (p. vii). Cf. James P. Young (ed.), Consensus and Conflict: Readings in American Politics (New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972).

21. Karl Marx, "The Class Struggles in France, 1848 to 1850" (1850); in Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, [1969] 1977), I, p. 277.

22. Robert A. Nisbet, Social Change and History: Aspects of the Western Theory of rebel, all revolutions would become mere chaos, without meaning or direction.²³

In contrast to the revolutionists, consensus historians are defenders of the idea of continuity. Wherever they look, they cannot find "true" revolutions: the industrial revolution really was too slow to be called a revolution, as was the agricultural revolution, the American Revolution, the French Revolution, and possibly even the Russian Revolution. Because every revolution retains elements from the past, it is possible to focus on the elements that have remained stable, and then conclude that the supposed revolutions, in and of themselves, really do not change societies very much in the long run. "The more things change, the more things stay the same," says a French proverb.

Then when is a revolution really a revolution?

D. Ethical Continuity

Pharaoh did not really grasp the revolutionary nature of the crisis he was facing. He believed in the continuity of being between his own nature and the power gods of Egypt. He therefore believed in the eternality of Egyptian power. These upstart Hebrews, he knew, could be brought to heel. Their God was not really a totally sovereign being. Their God was not really able to deliver them out of his hand.

To a great extent, the Hebrew slaves shared his view. They also did not believe that Moses was representing a sovereign God who would deliver them from bondage. Not even after the plagues on Egypt had brought their Egyptian masters low did they believe that their external conditions would change. Institutional continuity was still dominant in their thinking, for ontological continuity between God and man was Development (New York: Oxford University Press, 1969), pp. 288–89.

23. Gunther Stent, a molecular biologist, commented on this problem with respect to artistic revolutions. They are eventually self-defeating, he argued. "As artistic evolution unfolds, the artist is being freed more and more from strict canons governing the method of working his medium of creative expression. The end result of this evolution has been that, finally, in our time, the artist's liberation has been almost total. However, the artist's accession to near-total freedom of expression now presents very great cognitive difficulties for the appreciation of his work: The absence of recognizable canons reduces his act of creation to near-randomness for the perceiver. In other words, artistic evolution along the one-way street to freedom embodies an element of self-limitation. The greater the freedom already attained and hence the closer the approach to the random of any artistic style for the percipient, the less possible for any successor style to seem significantly different from its predecessor." Stent, The Coming of the Golden Age: A View of the End of Progress (Garden City, New York: Natural History Press, published for the American Museum of Natural History, 1969), p. 98.

still dominant in their thinking. They trusted more in the theocratic power of Egypt's gods than they did in the God of Moses. They believed that they would still remain slaves in Egypt, as their fathers had been. And if the gods of Egypt were what Pharaoh claimed, then there could never be a radical break with the past.

The history of the patriarchs should have warned them against such a view of history. The creation was itself an incomparably radical break—a break into history, or better stated, the advent of history out of nothing. The creation of the species, the creation of Adam, and the creation of Eve were all radical breaks. Adam's rebellion was a break, and the signs of that break are with men still, since the creation labors under a curse (Gen. 3:17–18;²⁴ Rom. 8:19–22²⁵). The flood in Noah's day was a startling break with the past—a clean sweep of unimaginable proportions. The scattering at Babel, the calling of Abraham, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the famine of Joseph's day were all discontinuities in history.

On the one hand, historical continuity is guaranteed by the transcendent plan (decree) of God over history, which is unshakable in its permanence. Because of the centrality of biblical law and its sanctions, historical continuity rests on ethical continuity. Men and societies are totally responsible before God, who sustains the entire creation and whose decree is inescapable. On the other hand, actual historical events are sometimes sharp breaks from the historical continuities that preceded the breaks.

Passover was meant to teach the Israelites three things: (1) God judges kings and commoners in terms of His law and its historical sanctions; (2) the foundation of human freedom and human progress is ethical; (3) God's grace delivers His people. This raises two fundamental questions. First, which divinity will men worship, God or some idolatrous representation of another god, either natural or supernatural? Second, which law-order will men attempt to conform to, God's or some idol's?²⁶ The continuity that relates covenantal faithfulness to institutional blessings (Deut. 8:18;²⁷ 28:1–14²⁸) is contrasted with the institutional discontinuities produced by God's judgment against ethical

24. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 12.

25. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

26. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American History (Wheaton, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993).

27. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

28. Ibid., ch. 71.

rebellion (Deut. 8:19–20;²⁹ 28:15–68). The exodus was the archetypal event in Israel's history that revealed the relationship between faithfulness and institutional continuity, and also the relationship between ethical rebellion and institutional discontinuity.

E. Passover: Deliverance and Conquest

When Moses announced to his people that the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was about to lead them out of bondage, they did not believe it. They had lost their faith in God's providence, which necessarily involves a concept of cosmic personalism.³⁰ God had given a promise to Abraham, their patriarch. That promise involved the unfolding of history. But the promised unfolding was not a garment without wrinkles. It was inevitable, but it involved visible alterations of historical patterns. The years spent in captivity were not normative. The years spent under the gods of Egypt were not to become static standards for future events. God told them that He was about to shake the very foundations of Egypt. Just as He had promised, they were about to be led into the land of Canaan. The famine had driven the Hebrews into Egypt in Joseph's day; now God would lead them out.

1. Discontinuity and Redemption

They had to be driven out. The Egyptians implored them to leave on the night of the death of the firstborn. "And the Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out of the land in haste; for they said, We be all dead men" (Ex. 12:33). These slaves might otherwise have remained in Egypt; indeed, they later begged Moses to allow them to return to Egypt (Num. 14:3). The plagues were brought to Egypt not merely to convince the Egyptian Pharaoh to allow the Hebrews to go and sacrifice for a week. They were not imposed merely to convince the Egyptians to let the Hebrews leave permanently. They were imposed as a means of making it impossible for the Hebrews to stay right where they were, in a position of irresponsible subservience to foreign gods. The plagues forced the Hebrews out of Egypt and into the wilderness.

Passover was designed to impress the Hebrews of Moses' day, as well as all succeeding generations of Hebrews, with the stark reality of rapid historical change in a culture that comes under the visible judg- ment of God. They were to eat unleavened bread. There was no time for the yeast to do its work: unleavened bread was the only kind allowed. Unleavened bread is quicker to bake. Everything about Passover pointed to haste: the unleavened bread, the roasted lamb that was to be completely consumed by morning, and even the eating: “And thus shall ye eat it; with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste: it is the LORD’s passover” (Ex. 12:11). Everything in Passover pointed to God’s deliverance of His people from bondage—literally, an overnight deliverance. The lamb was consumed in one night. The people were to stand, staffs in their hand, shoes on their feet, ready to march. Ready to march: out of Ur, out of Haran, out of Sodom, out of Egypt, and into the Promised Land. God’s people were to celebrate a feast as an army celebrates a victory, for their feast pointed to the coming victory—over Egypt, over Canaan, and especially over sin (Eph. 6:10–18). It was a pre-victory feast, celebrated before marching orders were officially given.

29. Ibid., ch. 23.

30. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 1.

Passover reminds all future generations of God’s people of the miraculous discontinuity of God’s redemption in history. God passed over the houses of the Hebrews, and the destroyer passed through the houses of His enemies, taking as a lawful sacrifice the firstborn. Then Israel passed through the Red Sea and finally through the Jordan River. Had they remained faithful to God, they would have passed through the wilderness in much less than 40 years. When God “passes through” a rebellious culture, judgment is at hand. The Hebrews became instruments of His judgment in Canaan.

2. Marching Orders

The Passover feast was to remind them of both life and death. It was to remind them of the need for immediate marching at the command of God. There was no time to waste. A shattering of Egypt’s foundations was about to begin. The Israelites were being called out of Egypt. Yet this also meant one of two things: being called into the wilderness for the remainder of their lives, or being called into Canaan. Leaving meant going. Going where? The wilderness or the Promised Land? We can never leave without going. Even our departure from the world demands that we travel to a final destination: the new heavens and new earth, or the lake of fire. (Heaven and hell are “holding areas” or “embarkation points,” not permanent resting places: Rev. 20:12–14.) The Hebrews knew what leaving Egypt meant: a radical break with their immediate past and all of its familiar aspects—a break that would inaugurate a new era of personal responsibility. Their complaints in the wilderness demonstrated that they preferred not to remain there, and their refusal to enter the land of Canaan immediately indicated that they chose not to go there, either.³¹ They preferred “Canaan at zero price.” They could not get God to agree on the price they were willing to pay. Yet God would not permit them to return to Egypt. It was Moses’ pleading on their behalf that kept them from departing from this world immediately—the obvious alternative for this complaining nation (Ex. 32:9–14).

Passover necessarily pointed to conquest. They could not leave Egypt without marching to war. Passover pointed to a new life) and this new life requires full personal responsibility before God. It pointed to dominion. The land of Canaan had to be subdued by military force if God’s promise to Abraham was to be fulfilled. The Passover feast was to be eaten in haste, for God was about to mobilize an army, where only 70 lineal heirs and their households had come down into Egypt two centuries before. Egypt had served as a recruiting depot; the wilderness came to serve as boot camp; and the army, under Joshua, won the battle.

The Hebrews believed Moses enough to sprinkle the blood and eat the Passover feast. That is all God required of them in order for them to avoid making the costly sacrifice that the Egyptians paid. Yet the Hebrew slaves did not believe Moses beyond that minimal commitment. They did not believe they could escape through the Red Sea. They did not believe they would find food and water in the wilderness. They did not believe they could defeat the cities of Canaan. They did not truly believe that Egypt, with all its tyranny, was really that terrible. They believed only that God would take their firstborn if they refused to participate, and that was sufficient. Their children, whom they did not sacrifice to God’s wrath, became the firstfruits in the wilderness; it was they who conquered Canaan. The firstborn sons were preserved by the ritual conformity of their parents’ minimal covenantal faithfulness. The parents did not save anything else. Their faith extended this far, and no farther; that was also the limit of their blessing. God kept them alive in the wilderness for the sake of their children. The covenant blood line was preserved (Gen. 49:10), and the tribes were preserved. Their own skins were preserved, but only to rot after death in the wilderness they dreaded.

31. It could be argued that the Israelites simply feared to enter Canaan, but they did not specifically choose not to go in. This argument is misleading. The concept of choice necessarily involves selection among alternatives. It involves giving up one set of conditions in exchange for another set. The Israelites chose not to exchange the perceived safety of wandering in the wilderness for the perceived danger of confronting the people of Canaan in battle. In short, they chose not to enter Canaan.

God had called an army into battle that was not ready to fight. All it was ready to do was to save its firstborn and then leave, under the intense pressure of their former captors.

F. The Peace Treaty

The New Testament Passover is Christ (I Cor. 5:7). When Christ celebrated Passover, He sat down with the disciples (Luke 22:14). They did not stand with staffs in their hands, ready to march out of Egypt and into Canaan. They had at last arrived; they could rest in confidence.³² Christ's sacrifice transferred all power to Himself (Matt. 28:18).³³ Those who drink His cup and eat His bread are judges and ambassadors (Eph. 6:20). "And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Luke 22:29–30). The world has been conquered in principle: "I have overcome the world" (John 16:33b).

God's judges carry His law to the defeated kingdoms of Satan, just as they carried His law to Israel in the years before the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D.³⁴ The new Israel, the Israel of God (Gal. 6:16), is to be judged by the law (Rom. 2:12). But, as an army that in principle has already conquered, this new Israel must sit in judgment of the world. The whole world is Canaan now, and Christ announced His victory over it. As judges, in time and on earth, Christians are to make manifest that victory by imposing the terms of the treaty of the great King.³⁵ Armies stand, for they must be ready to march. Judges sit, ready to dispense judgment. Christians are not warriors whose primary assignment is to physically destroy nations that are not yet ethically subdued; they are instead ambassadors—an army of ambassadors who come before a defeated population to announce the terms of peace. But this peace treaty involves surrender; it is imposed by a victor. The enemy's commander was defeated at Calvary; it is our task to convince his subordinates to lay down their weapons and sign the peace treaty.³⁶ The decisive battle was won at Calvary; the mopping-up operation is still going on (Rom. 16:20; I John 3:8).

32. Alfred Edersheim, the late-nineteenth-century historian, reported that even before Christ's celebration of the Last Supper, the Hebrews had abandoned the original Passover requirement that they remain standing. "As the guests gathered around the Paschal table, they came no longer, as at the first celebration, with their 'loins girded,' with shoes on their feet, and a staff in their hand—that is, as travellers waiting to take their departure. On the contrary, they were arrayed in their best festive garments, joyous and at rest, as became children of a king. To express this idea the Rabbis also insisted that the Paschal Supper—or at least part of it—must be eaten in that recumbent position with which we are familiar from the New Testament. 'For,' say they, 'they use this leaning posture, as free men do, in memorial of their freedom.' And, again, 'Because it is the manner of slaves to eat standing, therefore now they eat sitting and leaning, in order to show that they have been delivered from bondage into freedom.'" Edersheim, The Temple: Its Ministries and Services (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1874] 1975), p. 234.

33. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

34. For a grim account of the fall of Jerusalem, see the primary source document written by Josephus, a Hebrew zealot who defected to the invading Roman army before defection became impossible. Wars of the Jews, Books V and VI, in Josephus, Collected Works, trans. William Whiston (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Kregel, [1960] 1977).

There has been a shift in assignments ever since the days of Passover. The Hebrews were commanded to annihilate their Canaanitic enemies. God planned to make a clean sweep of the land of Canaan. He intended the total devastation of those nations. The Hebrews were to spare no one (Deut. 7:16–24). Dominion was to be by means of military might initially, and later by settling the land. While there was eventually to be evangelism, as the Book of Jonah indicates, the Hebrews were first to establish the kingdom in Israel on a firm basis, and then God's promised blessings were to bring a particular response on the part of Israel: expansion.

Ever since the resurrection, Christ has been planting His kingdom by means of the sword of the gospel. The word of God, we are told, is sharper than a two-edged sword (Heb. 4:12). We possess “the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God” (Eph. 6:17). The prophecy of Isaiah is progressively coming true: “He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked” (Isa. 11:4). Those who bring the message of Christ are ethical soldiers. Their main task is to judge the world, subduing it by means of the Holy Spirit, but in terms of His Bible-revealed law. God's kingdom has been removed from genetic Israel and given to those who bring forth its fruits (Matt. 21:43). The fruits produced by righteous living manifest the kingdom. Lawful living, in time and on earth, verifies a man's claim to the kingdom (Matt. 7:15–20).³⁷

35. The phrase is Meredith Kline's: Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963).

36. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010).

The entry into Canaan was a preliminary battle. God's title to the land was made manifest by the success of His people on the battlefield. In Egypt and in Canaan, He demonstrated His sovereignty for all to see. The victory over Satan at Calvary has released an army of judges who spread the message of salvation throughout the world. These ambassadors rest in Christ's victory. They know the mortal blow has been delivered by Christ; Satan roars like a dying wild beast—dangerous to those in his path, but nonetheless vanquished.

Christians no longer celebrate Passover standing up, as if we were a literal army about to receive marching orders. We have already received our marching orders. They are in fact on the march, as agents of a victorious commander, calling out the terms of surrender as judges. Men must sign the peace treaty now, before they meet the church's commander. Christians are the emissaries of a mighty commanding officer, who sends them to the enemy with an offer of peace, as required by biblical law (Deut. 20:10). To refuse to surrender means total defeat, eternal defeat.

The New Testament soldier is a judge. We are to establish a new civilization based on God's law. Rushdoony wrote:

In brief, every law-order is a state of war against the enemies of that order, and all law is a form of warfare. Every law declares that certain offenders are enemies of the law-order and must be arrested. For limited offenses, there are limited penalties; for capital offenses, capital punishment. Law is a state of war; it is the organization of the powers of civil government to bring the enemies of the law-order to justice. The officers of the law are properly armed; in a godly state, they should be armed by the justice of the law as well as weapons of warfare, in order to defend society against its enemies. Friends of the law will therefore seek at all times to improve, strengthen, and confirm a godly law-order. Enemies of the law will accordingly be in continuing warfare against the law. . . . Men cannot seek co-existence with evil without thereby declaring war against God.³⁸

Christ's peace treaty involves surrender to Him, but the promise of victory, in this world, as well as in eternity. His law will triumph, for

37. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 18.

38. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 93–94.

His kingdom has been established on the battlefield at Calvary.³⁹

G. Continual Warfare

Paul wrote, concerning the internal warfare of regenerate men, “But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members” (Rom. 7:23). He also wrote: “For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places” (Eph. 6:12). Yet we also know that Christ, having spoiled principalities and powers, “made a shew of them openly, triumphing over them in it” (Col. 2:15b). So, the chief battle is behind us. The mopping-up operation in our own hearts continues. Our weapon of personal self-dominion is the law of God. It is a lifetime battle against sin and its effects.

1. Judicial Continuity

There is continuity in Christians’ warfare today—a step-by-step process of conquest. First of all, it is internal ethical warfare: “Whom shall he teach knowledge? And whom shall he make to understand doctrine? Them that are weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts. For precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little” (Isa. 28:9–10). Second, it is external cultural warfare: “But the word of the LORD was unto them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken” (Isa. 28:13). Line upon line, law upon law, institution by institution, nation by nation: the whole earth is subdued to the glory of God.

The Hebrews marched out of Egypt victorious. That victory had been won by a series of 10 radically discontinuous events: blood, frogs, lice, swarms, cattle plague, boils, locusts, hail, darkness, and the death of Egypt’s firstborn. Then they marched across the dry path cleared through the Red Sea. A generation later, their children, under Joshua, marched through a path in the Jordan River, and one by one, the cities of Canaan fell. Like the walls of Jericho, they all (or almost all) came tumbling down. God's miraculous delivery of Israel demonstrated His control over the realm of human history. The prophets reminded their listeners of this radically discontinuous history—a history marked by the miracles of God—when they came before them to call the people to repentance.

39. David Chilton, Paradise Restored: A Biblical Theology of Dominion (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/dcpardise>); Roderick Campbell, Israel and the New Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Divinity School Press, [1954] 1982).

At the same time, the Israelites were to rely increasingly on the regularities of biblical law. The manna ceased when they crossed into Canaan (Josh. 5:12).⁴⁰ In Hebrews 9:4 we are told that the Ark of the Covenant contained the tables of the covenant, a pot containing manna, and Aaron's rod. These were manifestations of God's dealings with them, and they involved discontinuous events in Israel's history. But Aaron's rod no longer has power, and the manna has ceased. It is God's law-order, proclaimed on the tablets of stone, and empowered by the Spirit, which remains powerful.⁴¹ It is the continuity of God's law, not the implements of God's previous miraculous discontinuities in history, that is the tool of dominion in New Testament times. It was the primary tool even in Old Testament times.

2. New Testament Revisions

Christians do not celebrate Passover in the way prescribed by Moses in Exodus 12. We are not to wait for the earthly appearance of the Messiah. He has already appeared. He has won His victory. The chief battle is long over.

We are in the land of Canaan. We have crossed over the Jordan River. There are still cities to conquer, but the sharp discontinuities of the past are not to become our standards of conquest for today. It is the steady preaching of the gospel, the subduing of sin in each man, and the continuous extension of God's law over human culture, that constitutes the New Testament's program of conquest. That is why we can sit with Christ at His communion table, knowing that we will sit with him on thrones. We are presently symbolically seated with Him on thrones of authority, even as the Hebrews were symbolically standing with, Him, ready to march. The difference is based on the historical position of the chief military victory, the cross. That victory is behind us, so we can take it for granted. The battle is now spiritual and cul- tural: subduing our spirits and our environment to the Lord, by means of His law.

40. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 2.

41. Obviously, it is not the tablets of stone which are powerful, but the laws proclaimed on them. It is God's law, written in the hearts of His people (II Cor. 3:3; Heb. 8:10), which is the proper tool of dominion, both internal and external.

The revolution was.⁴² We no longer look for a future radical discontinuity that will establish our earthly dominion. The next major discontinuity is the coming of Christ in final judgment.⁴³ This takes place after God's rule has been manifested, but prior to the final judgment. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. 15:24–26). Yet Christ's victory is in principle behind us: "For he hath put all things under his feet" (I Cor. 15:27a). Christ has all power right now (Matt. 28:18). The four great discontinuities of God's New Covenant history are past: Christ's incarnation, crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension. The arrival of His Spirit at Pentecost gave us our official papers as His ambassadors, our commissions as His judges. There are only two great discontinuities remaining: Satan's final rebellion (Rev. 20:7–8) and defeat (Rev. 20:9–10), and the final judgment (Rev. 20:12–15). (Some commentators might call these two discontinuities the last continuity, since they take place close together.) In between, there are the daily struggles between the two armies, the ebb and flow of the mopping-up operations, and the progressive extension of God's kingdom, in time and on earth.

It is a mistake, then, to expect what Israel was told to expect. It is a mistake to expect the delivery of our marching orders. It is a mistake to expect visible, direct, cataclysmic interventions of God on earth. Miracles still occur, but not the pillar of the cloud and the pillar of fire. God's law is still in force, but we no longer need to have its terms delivered to us on tablets of stone actually written by God. There are still spiritually Canaanitic cities to be conquered, but not by the blast of trumpets on our seventh day of marching around them. We sit at the Lord's victorious table. We no longer stand, staffs in hand. The lamb has been consumed already. We need not offer it again. The blood is on our doorposts. We need not sprinkle it on them again (Heb. 9). The continuity of God's law, not the discontinuities of God's military vic-

42. The phrase comes from a 1938 essay by Garet Garrett, who wrote of the economic and political revolution of President Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal (1933–54). (<http://bit.ly/RevWas>)

43. The conversion of the Jews, forecast in Romans 11, lies ahead. This will lead to the expansion of Christianity as never before. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 7.

tories or miracles, is our standard.⁴⁴

H. Unleavened and Leavened Bread

The unleavened bread that the Hebrews were commanded to use during the Passover feast (Ex. 12:15) was a symbol of the impending discontinuity, their deliverance from Egypt. They had to cook and eat in haste. It was not to symbolize affliction as such, for as Edersheim wrote in the late nineteenth century, “the bread of the Paschal night was not that of affliction because it was unleavened; it was unleavened because it had been that of affliction. For it had been Israel’s ‘affliction,’ and a mark of their bondage and subjection to the Egyptians, to be driven forth in such ‘haste’ as not even to have time for leavening their bread. . . . The Passover, therefore, was not so much the remembrance of Israel’s bondage as of Israel’s deliverance from that bondage, and the bread which had originally been that of affliction, because that of haste, now became, as it were, the bread of a new state of existence. None of Egypt’s leaven was to pervade it; nay, all the old leaven, which served as the symbol of corruption and of death, was to be wholly banished from their homes. They were to be ‘a new lump,’ as they were ‘unleavened.’”⁴⁵

They did not have time to allow the yeast of Egypt to leaven their bread. This symbolized God’s overnight deliverance of His people from Egypt, another reason why the lamb was to be eaten in one night, with nothing left over (Ex. 12:10). Here was the greatest discontinuity in Israel’s history. Here was the discontinuity that they were to teach to their children (Ex. 12:26–27).

Paul, as a Pharisee, was thoroughly familiar with the meaning of Passover. He did not require us to eat unleavened bread, nor are the bitter herbs required. His own teacher, Gamaliel (Acts 22:3), taught the meaning of the lamb, bitter herbs, and unleavened bread, and his words have become authoritative in Jewish law: “Whoever does not explain three things in the Passover has not fulfilled the duty incumbent on him. These three things are: the Passover lamb, the unleavened bread, and the bitter herbs. The Passover lamb means that God passed over the blood-sprinkled place on the houses of our fathers in Egypt;

44. It is one of the major weaknesses of revivalism in general, and the Pentecostal movement in particular, that Christians have relied so heavily on miraculous manifestations of the power of God, rather than relying on the continuous power of the law of God as a tool of dominion.

45. Edersheim, Temple, pp. 249–50.

the unleavened bread means that our fathers were delivered out of Egypt (in haste); and the bitter herbs mean that the Egyptians made bitter the lives of our fathers in Egypt."⁴⁶ Christians no longer eat bitter herbs, because Christ has delivered us from sin; the bitterness of Egypt is no longer to be part of our worship. It is the Lamb that was slain, not the deliverance from Egypt, which is our central celebration as Christians. Christians are on the offensive now, carrying redeemed Canaan's leaven back into Egypt (Isa. 19).

1. Leaven

The progress of Christ's kingdom is to be like the leavening of bread. "Another parable spake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened" (Matt. 13:33).⁴⁷ Leaven is not a symbol of sin. Yes, the leaven of Egypt was evil. The corrupting effects of Egyptian culture and Egyptian religion no doubt burdened the Israelites. They were to purge away all their leaven in the week before the exodus (Ex. 12:15). This meant that none of Egypt's leaven was to be carried into Canaan with them, to serve as the source of corruption in the promised land. Egypt's leaven was perverse, but not leaven as such. The Hebrew term for leaven in Exodus 12:15, "put away leaven out of your houses," and in Exodus 12:19a, "Seven days shall there be no leaven found in your houses," is transliterated se'or. It was leavened dough, and a bit of it was retained in an unbaked form, so that it could be used to "start" the next batch of dough. Leavened bread, the finished product, was also forbidden: none of the actual products of Egypt's leaven would go into Canaan. Neither the "starter" nor the finished product would leave Egypt with the Hebrews. Egypt's leaven stood for sin, but there can also be holy leaven. In fact, there must be holy leaven. Modern expositors who follow a dispensational-premillennial outline fail to recognize this distinction,⁴⁸ but the ancient Hebrews understood it quite well.

How do we know this? Because leavened bread was offered as the firstfruits of the Lord, meaning that leavened bread was the best of a family's productivity: "Ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave 46. Gamaliel, cited by Edersheim, ibid., p. 237.

47. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 30.

48. The standard view is that of the Scofield Reference Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1909): "Leaven, as a symbolic or typical substance, is always mentioned in the O.T. in an evil sense. . . ." Note 4, p. 1016: Matthew 13:33.

loaves of two tenth deals: they shall be of fine flour; they shall be baked with leaven; they are the firstfruits unto the LORD" (Lev. 23:17). Leaven is the best bread man has to offer, the bread he eats with pleasure. It is man's best grain offering to God. Leaven, in short, is a symbol of growth, maturation, continuity, and prosperity. But such leaven must be the leaven of the promised land, the leaven of redeemed Canaan. It must not be the leaven of Egypt.

It is important to understand the general peace offerings made by individual Israelites, as well as the nationally observed ritual of the firstfruits. The peace offerings of unleavened bread were also accompanied with unleavened cakes mingled with oil, and unleavened wafers anointed with oil (Lev. 7:12). The priests and offerer ate the peace-offering, which was a unique feature of the peace-offering. In this sense, concluded Andrew Jukes, this offering shows communion: God, priest, and offerer.⁴⁹ Christ was our offering, yet He was the offerer; He was also the High Priest and God.⁵⁰ He was the firstfruits (I Cor. 15:23), from which the peace-offering had to be made.

Leavened dough could not be burned lawfully on the altar (Lev. 2:11). It had to be brought already baked, ready for eating. Leavened bread was offered as a finished work, the fully-risen product of the "starter." It was not to be burned on God's altar, not because it was "corrupted" or "sin-laden," but because it was a finished loaf.⁵¹ Burning it would have ruined it. It was not the "corrupted" nature of leaven that kept it off God's fiery altar, for honey was also prohibited (Lev. 2:11). There was nothing corrupt about honey. Honey, like leavened bread, is a finished product, the product of labor, capital, and time.

49. Andrew Jukes, The Law of the Offerings (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Kregel, 1968), pp. 115–21. The book was first published in the late nineteenth century.

50. Ibid., pp. 118–19.

51. Rushdoony's assessment of the meaning of leaven is incorrect. He wrote: "Leaven is taken by some as a symbol or type of sin; it is rather a symbol of corruptibility. . . . Man's obedience to the law is a leavened offering, clearly corruptible, yet when faithful and obedient to God's authority and order, a 'sacrifice' well-pleasing in His sight and assured of His reward." Institutes of Biblical Law, p. 83. I am arguing that leaven symbolizes neither sin nor corruptibility; leaven is a symbol of the continuity of development, meaning maturation over time. All of men's offerings are corruptible; focusing on leaven as a uniquely corruptible offering misses the point. Leaven as a symbol of continuity fits Rushdoony's postmillennial eschatology far better than leaven as a symbol of corruptibility.

2. Pentecost

It is extremely important to note that this compulsory offering of the firstfruits, which included the leavened bread offering, came on the day of Pentecost. The Greek word, “pentekostos,” means fifty. The firstfruits offering was made on the fiftieth day after the sabbath day of the Passover week, the feast of unleavened bread (Lev. 23:15–16), meaning 49 days after the wave offering. On the day after the sabbath of Passover week, the priests brought a sheaf of grain offering and waved it before God. Then, 49 days of maturation later, came the baked bread of the day of Pentecost. At Passover, the people were required to use unleavened bread, the symbol of religious, cultural, and historical discontinuity. At Pentecost, they were required to offer leavened bread, the symbol of continuity and completion. At Passover, Israel found its release from bondage. At Pentecost, they experienced full blessings.

Cassuto believed that the law was given to the Israelites seven weeks after the exodus. Exodus 19:1 reads: “In the third month [new moon], when the children of Israel were gone forth out of the land of Egypt, the same day came they into the wilderness of Sinai.” Cassuto commented.

The mention of the third new moon is not unintentional. Since the exodus from Egypt, the last two weeks of Nissan and four weeks of Iyyar had passed, and we are now in the seventh week. Since seven was considered the number of perfection, seven days constituted, according to the customary conception of the ancient East, a given unit of time, while seven weeks formed a still higher unit; and just as after six days of labour the seventh day brought rest and the enjoyment of the results of that labour, so after six weeks of the travails of journeying, the seventh week brought a sense of exaltation and of drawing nearer to the word Divine. Although the Torah does not state the exact day on which the Revelation on Mount Sinai occurred, and only the later tradition connects the Festival of Weeks with the commemorative of the giving of the Torah, yet it is obvious that this tradition corresponds to what, if not expressly stated in Scripture, is at least alluded to therein by inference.⁵²

The firstfruits offering on the day following the sabbath of Passover week was marked by the wave offering of the sheaf of grain—the unbaked offering (Lev. 23:10–11). At Pentecost, or the Feast of Weeks, 49 days later, the wave offering was a pair of leavened loaves (Lev. 23:17). In the interim, the grain had been harvested, ground into flour, allowed to rise by means of yeast, and baked as a completed offering to God. This symbolism of discontinuity, followed by continuity, should be clear enough.

52. U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus, trans. Israel Abrahams (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, The Hebrew University, [1951] 1974), p. 224.

3. New Testament Symbolism

The same parallelism is present in the New Testament events: the Passover meal of Christ and the disciples, followed by His death and resurrection.⁵³ Then, 49 days after Christ's resurrection, came the day of Pentecost. The break with the old covenant was established by Christ's death and resurrection, when He inaugurated a new era. He gave the Holy Spirit to His disciples on the day of resurrection (John 20:22). The manifestations of power of the Holy Spirit came seven weeks later, at Pentecost (Acts 2). The church, Christ's body (1 Cor. 12:12–27),⁵⁴ was established as a visible unity at Pentecost. "For we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread" (1 Cor. 10:17). Yet Christ equated His own body with bread (1 Cor. 11:24). The New Testament parallels with Passover and Pentecost in the Old Testament should be obvious. The coming of God's Spirit at Pentecost was God's presentation of the newly leavened loaf of the church—a presentation to the Son (Dan. 7:13–14). The day of Pentecost in the New Testament was God's presentation of the risen bread of the church, which paralleled the risen Lord Jesus (an event

53. There are some difficult problems associated with the dating of Christ's Passover meal with the disciples. The most convincing presentation is Hoehner's: they met on Thursday night, Nisan 14, which was the Pharisees' practice. The Passover lamb was slain between 3–5 P.M. that afternoon by the Pharisees and Galileans. The Judean dating, used by the Sadducees, was different. They slew the lamb that year on Friday afternoon, since they dated Nisan 14 from Thursday evening. This explains why Jesus and the disciples ate their Passover meal the night before Jesus was crucified, and why the Jews did not enter the Praetorium when they took Jesus to Pilate, "lest they should be defiled; but that they might eat the Passover" (John 18:28b). This confrontation between Jesus and His accusers took place on Nisan 15, as reckoned by the Pharisees, and on Nisan 14, as reckoned by the Sadducees. Jesus died at about 3 in the afternoon, at precisely the time that the Judeans were slaying their Passover lamb, 24 hours after the Pharisees and Galileans had slain theirs. See Harold W. Hoehner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1977), ch. 4, especially the chart on p. 89. Jesus died on Friday (sixth day) and arose on Sunday (first day) morning.

54. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

that took place 49 days earlier), who is called "Christ the firstfruits" by Paul (I Cor. 15:23). Leaven is a product of resurrection: Christ's, the church's, and the day of judgment's. The great discontinuity at Calvary has produced a new continuity: the civilization of the kingdom of God.

Paul speaks of the leavened and unleavened bread. "Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us. Therefore, let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened [bread] of sincerity and truth" (I Cor. 5:6–8). Paul was contrasting the old leaven (evil) with unleavened (a new ethical beginning). (The King James translators added the word "bread.") He was speaking of Christ our Passover. In the Passover feast, unleavened bread was eaten in order to purge away the leaven of Egypt, the leaven of sin. Christ, like the unleavened bread of Passover, represented a discontinuous break with normal historical development, a break with the maturation of the principle of evil. This is what unleavened bread always symbolized: a new beginning, a break with the evil maturation principle (leaven) of the past. This is what Joshua meant when he told the Israelites to serve God in sincerity and truth (Josh. 24:14). Evil leaven does not mature into a holy loaf; it must be purged out. It must be replaced. Replaced with what? A new, holy leaven.

Christ was quite specific about this. "How is it that ye do not understand that I spake it not to you concerning bread, that ye should beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees? Then understood they how that he bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees" (Matt. 16:11–12). The leavening process of unsound doctrine leads to evil acts; it is the maturation process of evil yeast. It must be purged out from the beginning. Purge out the old leaven. This purging is ethical, intellectual, and theological. It means becoming a new creation (II Cor. 5:17). It means being born again, or born from above (John 3:3–8). God replaces the old unethical leaven with a new, holy leaven.

John Calvin recognized the ethical focus of Paul's words regarding leaven and unleavened. "Now, in the solemnity of this sacred feast we must abstain from leaven, as God commanded the fathers to abstain. But from what leaven? As the outward passover was to them a figure of the true passover, so its appendages were figures of the reality which we at this day possess. If, therefore, we would wish to feed on Christ's flesh and blood, let us bring to this feast sincerity and truth. Let these be our loaves of unleavened bread. Away with all malice and wickedness, for it is unlawful to mix up leaven with the passover. In fine, he declares that we shall be members of Christ only when we shall have renounced malice and deceit.”⁵⁵ Calvin did not say that we must eat unleavened bread at the communion table. He said only that we must not bring malice and deceit in our hearts when we come to the Lord’s Supper. God’s people must be set apart as unleavened—free from the religious leaven of rebellion against God and His law. This is the symbolism of discontinuity. It is the symbolism of Christ the Passover. But Christ is also the firstfruits, both unleavened (waving the sheaf) and leavened (waving the loaves). The discontinuity from sin is supposed to lead to the continuity of dominion—ethical, ecclesiastical, social, political, and cultural.

4. The Process of Maturation

Leaven is not a symbol of sin. Leaven is a symbol of rising up, the process of maturation. But there must first be a discontinuous act of implanting the original leaven. Adam, yielding to Satan’s temptation, brought forth the leaven of evil, and implanted it into man’s history. Christ, the second Adam, removes the old Adamic leaven, implants His new leaven, and creates a maturing Christian kingdom that steadily replaces Satan’s older leaven. Immediately following the unleavened bread is the beginning of the new leavening process, the rising up. Israel was brought up out of Egypt (Ex. 17:3). On the third day, Christ rose from the dead. On the day of Christ’s resurrection, many saints rose from the dead (Matt. 27:52–53). On the day of Pentecost, the Holy Spirit presented the risen (leavened) bread offering, the church. The discontinuous event of redemption is supposed to be followed by the ethical leavening process, a rising up in victory, in time and on earth. Christ does not simply remove the old leaven. He is not content with unleavened bread, the symbol of deliverance. Christ produces the new leavened bread, the leavening process of victory. It is not enough to escape from Egypt; Canaan must be conquered. It is not enough to remain in a spiritually unleavened condition, the condition of “not being leavened with evil.” We must become fully leavened as God’s individual saints and also as His gathered church. Where this leaven is absent, there is no life, no growth, and no dominion.

55. John Calvin, Commentary on the Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Corinthians, trans. John Pringle, Vol. I, which appears as Vol. XX of Calvin’s Commentaries (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1979), p. 189.

I. No Leaven on the Old Testament Altar

Neither leaven (yeast) nor the products of leaven' (leavened loaves) could be placed on God's fiery altar during the Old Testament era (Lev. 2:11). We are not told specifically why not. We also are not told why honey was also prohibited. There are two possible explanations that seem to make sense of the prohibition.

1. Full Development

Leavened loaves and honey are finished, fully developed products. They are fully matured. No further development is possible. They are both the products of time. Neither is hastily produced. They symbolize the end of the maturation process, the fruits of thorough labor. What was offered on God's altar in the Old Testament economy was that which had not had time to mature fully. The animals were yearling lambs (Num. 28:3, 9), young bulls (Num. 28:11), a young goat, or kid (Num. 28:15), and young pigeons (Lev. 1:14; 5:7). The day of atonement required young animals (Num. 29:1–5). These animals had not yet begun their work. The red heifer, which was used to make the ashes for the water of purification, had to be unblemished, three years old, and never yoked (Num. 19:2). The sacrifices required an animal cut down in its prime, with its productive life ahead of it. This animal forfeited both the joys and labors of the bulk of its adult life. Unquestionably, this symbolism pointed to Jesus Christ, the lamb of God slain in the midst of His prime. In time and on earth, He forfeited a life of dominion. He forfeited the joy of eating the fruits of His labor. He forfeited the leavened loaves and the honey. He forfeited the blessings of long life, despite His perfect keeping of the law of God. He forfeited all this, so that His people might receive these blessings. Christians are to exercise dominion, in time and on earth. They are to labor. They are to eat the firstfruits, symbolized by Pentecost. They are also to eat the honey and the baked leaven loaves.⁵⁶ They are to serve, in short, as

56. Churches do not celebrate the communion meal with honey, yet many of them use leavened bread. This is inconsistent. The use of leaven points to the use of honey. The completed work of Christ's sacrifice is behind us historically. The completed offering of Christ at Calvary points both to the use of leaven (the formerly prohibited completed baked bread) and honey (the formerly prohibited completed sweetener). Honey ought to be substituted for the bitter herbs. The church has not been consist-

God's leaven, "incorrupting" Satan's former kingdoms, causing the kingdom of God to rise up. They are given what Christ forfeited: visible dominion, in time and on earth. God does not burn up the leaven before its time, before it has matured, before it is fit for communion's joyful eating. A leavened offering, like honey, is not burned on God's altar.

But what about Satan? Isn't Satan eventually burned? Aren't Satan's followers burned, as salted offerings? Haven't they been given time? This points to the removal of the devil's ability to continue to develop. He will be cut down in the midst of his rebellion against God's church (Rev. 20:9). The very essence of leaven—its ability to spread through the dough—will be removed from Satan. He will be like unleavened dough, fit only for burning, cut down in God's final discontinuous event, just as Pharaoh was cut down. The "leaven of Egypt" will be purged out, finally, at the end of time. It will be leaven that can no longer do its work. It is finally made useless, like savorless salt, fit only for being ground underfoot (Matt. 5:13).⁵⁷ Satan's leaven is purged at the end of time when the leaven of God's finished loaf has fully matured. Christ's leaven will have done its work. The fire of the last day bakes this bread, for it is ready for the oven, but Satan's partial leaven is left on the altar forever, never fit for consumption, never fit for God's blessed communion feast. Satan's cultural leaven never fully rises, in time and on earth, since his leaven eventually is replaced by God's leaven.

2. Living Sacrifices

There may have been an additional reason for prohibiting leaven from God's altar. The leaven, until baked, was a living thing. No living thing was ever lawfully sacrificed on the altar. Animals were killed at the door of the tabernacle (Lev. 1:3). Then they were brought to the altar for burning. In the case of Satan and his followers, they will be placed in the lake of fire only after they have been slain (Rev. 20:14).

ent with its symbolism; bitter herbs were never incorporated into the Christian Passover, yet honey has not replaced the Mosaic law's required herbs—an obvious lack of consistency. Passover was to be tasted. What was bitter is now sweet. The contrast has not been made visible symbolically. Deliverance has not been consistently symbolized. The taste of victory implied in honey's sweetness has not been a feature of the church's sacraments. When the church's eschatology changes to a more optimistic view of the role of the church in history, and its victory over creation is made progressively clearer, churches will then adopt the use of honey in the communion service.

57. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 13.

This burning is referred to as the second death. No living being was to be burned on the altar, according to Old Testament law.

The one legitimate exception in history was Jesus Christ. As a perfect creation, a perfect human who had fulfilled the terms of the law, Christ was allowed to become a living sacrifice. God accepted this living sacrifice as a substitute. No other living being was suitable. All other beings are subject to death. Christ was not, yet He gave up His life for His friends (John 15:13). The sacrificial animals were cut down in the prime of life, but they all faced death eventually. Jesus Christ was cut down in the prime of life when, in terms of His perfect fulfilling of the law, He had not been faced with death.

Christ was a leavened offering—an ethically fully developed offering—on the symbolic altar, the cross. Christ was a living sacrifice, too. In neither case was He violating the laws of the offering. He was instead fulfilling them. The leaven offering (unbaked leavened loaves) and the final baked leavened loaves were not to be burned, but Christ, as a living man, and as a fully developed perfect humanity, did die on God's altar. Christ, being perfect, was God's own leavened, living sacrifice to God's own holiness.

Christ was also a honey offering, thereby completing the symbolism. He is said to be the word of God (John 1:1), and the word of God is equated with honey (Ezek. 3:1–3; Rev. 10:9–10). “How sweet are thy words unto my taste! Yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth” (Ps. 119:103). The completeness of God's word, the completeness of Christ's work, and the completeness of honey as a sweetener come together in Christ's complete sacrifice on Calvary. His perfect honey was acceptable to God as a legitimate offering in this one instance in man's history. These three offerings, which had previously not been allowed on God's altar—leaven, living animals, and honey—completed and ended the Old Testament sacrifices. Only Christ, and not man's leavened imitations, or nature's (honey), was ethically fit for God's altar. His perfect offering was the culmination of the sacrificial system, as the Book of Hebrews teaches. His ethical perfection was always the goal of the sacrificial system. The law's prohibition against the use of leaven and honey was there to keep imperfection from claiming the perfection that only Christ legitimately could claim and did claim.

Christians are told to offer themselves as living sacrifices (Rom. 12:1).⁵⁸ The sacrificial system is now straightforwardly ethical. The old sacrifices of rams and goats are over; Christ has replaced them, once and for all, as the true living sacrifice, the only living sacrifice suitable for God's altar. His last words were, "It is finished" (John 19:30). This marked the end of the Old Covenant, the end of the sacrificial system, and the end of Christ's work, in time and on earth, in fulfilling the terms of the Mosaic law. He would no longer appear before men, angels, or God as a man under the curse; the final discontinuity had come to Him as a suffering servant. There could be no remaining potential ethical development for mankind, as a creature. Christ had fulfilled all of mankind's ethical potential, in time and on earth. Ethically perfect humanity had been fully realized, in time and on earth. Christ was, in this sense, a leavened offering, for He was fully matured, ready for eating, the ultimate development of humanity. Christ, and Christ alone, could become a suitable living sacrifice, a living blood offering, as well as a legitimate leavened offering. None of Egypt's leaven was in Him.

58. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 8.

What Christ is, man is told to become: not a member of the Trinity, but a perfect man. This is why the church is called His body (I Cor. 12:12–27).⁵⁹ This is why it is called bread: "For we being many are one bread and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread" (I Cor. 10:17). The principle of maturation has a goal: full development. Christ, the head of the church, has already attained this goal. The discontinuity is behind us. The lamb has been sacrificed. The fully developed, fully leavened bread, without a trace of Satan's leaven, has conquered our satanic foe, and has served as redeemed mankind's peace offering, and also as our thank offering. Christ was both unleavened (free from Satan's leaven) and leavened (fully developed perfect humanity). He was both our discontinuity (the definitive break from the sin principle) and our continuity (the full development of human perfection).

J. The Kingdom as Leaven

The kingdom of God is like leaven. Christianity is the yeast, and it has a leavening effect on pagan, satanic cultures around it. It permeates the whole of culture, causing it to rise. The bread produced by this leaven is the preferred bread. In ancient times—indeed, right up until the advent of late-nineteenth-century industrialism and modern agricultural methods—leavened bread was considered the staff of life,

59. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 15.

the symbol of God's sustaining hand. "Give us this day our daily bread" (Matt. 6:11)⁶⁰ Christians have prayed for centuries, and they have eaten leavened bread at their tables. So did the ancient Hebrews. The kingdom of God is the force that produces the fine quality bread that all men seek. The symbolism should be obvious: Christianity makes life a joy for godly men. It provides men with the very best.

Leaven takes time to produce its product. It takes time for the leaven-laden dough to rise. Leaven is a symbol of historical continuity, just as unleavened bread was Israel's symbol of historical discontinuity. Men can wait for the yeast to do its work. God gives man time for the working of His spiritual leaven. Men may not understand exactly how the leaven works—how the spiritual power of God's kingdom spreads throughout their culture and makes it rise—but they can see and taste its effects. If we really push the analogy (pound it, even), we can point to the fact that dough is pounded down several times by the baker before the final baking, almost as God, through the agents of Satan in the world, pounds His kingdom in history. Nevertheless, the yeast does its marvelous work, just so long as the fires of the oven are not lit prematurely. If the full heat of the oven is applied to the dough before the yeast has done its work, both the yeast and the dough perish in the flames. God waits to apply the final heat (II Peter 3:9–10). First, His yeast—His church—must do its work, in time and on earth. The kingdom of God (which includes the institutional church, but is broader than the institutional church) must rise, having "incorrupted" the satanic dough of the kingdom of Satan with the gospel of life, including the life-giving reconstruction of all the institutions of culture.

What a marvelous description of God's kingdom! Christians work inside the cultural material available in any given culture, seeking to refine it, permeate it, and make it into something fine. They know they will be successful, just as yeast is eventually successful in the dough, if it is given sufficient time to do its work. This is what God implicitly promises us in the analogy of the leaven: enough time to accomplish our individual and collective assignments. He tells us that His kingdom will produce the desirable bread of life. It will take time. It may take several poundings, as God, through the hostility of the world, kneads the yeast-filled dough of men's cultures.⁶¹ But the end result is guaranteed. God does not intend to burn His bread to a useless crisp by prematurely placing it in the oven. He is a better baker than that.

60. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 12.

61. I am using the analogy of pounding the dough to apply to historical circumstances. It is a suggestive analogy, not necessarily an inescapable implication of the biblical text.

1. The Symbolism of Communion

Christians should not eat unleavened bread exclusively at their celebrations of the Lord's Supper. They should eat large chunks of leavened bread, delighting in the flavor and its ability to fill them. This is what God says His kingdom is like. The leavened bread is a symbol of God's patience with us, a symbol of His restraint. As Peter wrote, concerning the fiery judgment to come at the last judgment, God is not slack concerning his promise, "but is longsuffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance" (II Peter 3:9b). He delays the application of fire to the earth (II Peter 3:10). As Christians celebrating the Lord's Supper, we look toward the future, toward the effects of our labors, in time and on earth. We are God's yeast, inevitably permeating the whole loaf, until the risen dough is ready for the final fire. God does not intend to throw the dough into the fire prematurely. He does not intend to burn up the work of His hands. He allows us to make our peace offering. Christ was the firstfruits offering (I Cor. 15:20), yet so are we, every man in his own order (I Cor. 15:23).⁶²

It could be argued that we should eat both unleavened and leavened bread at the communion table. The symbol of discontinuity may still be ritually legitimate: the decisive break with sin at the cross, when the lamb was slain. But a communion table with only unleavened bread conflicts with the symbolism of Christ's church (His body), which has the task of building His kingdom. "This is my body," He said (Matt. 26:26). But if the church is His body (I Cor. 12:12–14),⁶³ then how can this body remain flat (unleavened) in history, if it is to replace Satan's evil leaven? Churches must strive to make the symbolism of the Lord's Supper clear to Christ's people, and unleavened flat bread, if eaten without leavened bread, conveys the symbolism of historical and cultural impotence.⁶⁴ To use both unleavened and leavened bread, un-

62. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 16.

63. Ibid., ch. 15.

64. It is true that Jesus ate unleavened bread at the Last Supper. It is also true that He had not yet suffered and died, thereby fulfilling the ethical demands of the Old Testament's sacrificial system, and thereby also abolishing it for all time. He had also not yet risen from the dead. The day He rose from the dead, the historical and cultural impotence of ancient Israel was at last definitively broken, even as new wine breaks old less the congregation has sophisticated instructors and members with a taste for biblical theology and biblical symbolism, is to risk confusion. If we eat one type of bread only, let it be leavened bread.

“Unleavened wine,” meaning grape juice, never had a place in the symbolism of the Old Testament offerings. Contrary to the opinion of some commentators, wine is fermented. Jesus’ metaphor of the wine and wineskins makes this clear: new wine breaks old wineskins (Matt. 9:17). To break wineskins, it has to be fermenting. There is no ritual significance for grape juice in the New Testament. It is not a symbol of discontinuity, as unleavened bread is. It is not a biblical symbol at all. Grape juice may, however, be the symbol for the church that is most preferred by Satan, symbolizing the historical impotence of the church—a new wine that breaks nothing because it is not wine at all.

Let us eat sitting down. Let us eat no bitter herbs. Instead, let us spread our leavened bread with honey. The basis of our victory is past; let us look forward with confidence. Victory is sweet. Let Satan’s troops eat bitter herbs, not Christ’s troops. The church has never eaten bitter herbs at the Lord’s Supper.⁶⁵

Some churches still insist on unleavened bread exclusively. Those who argue that the communion feast should be celebrated with unleavened bread point to I Corinthians 5, which I cited earlier, where Paul writes:

Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us. Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth (I Cor. 5:6–8).

Several comments are in order. First, Paul was dealing with sin in the Corinthian church. When he speaks of purging out the old leaven, he is referring to a specific individual, a man who was practicing incest (I Cor. 5:1–5). Second, the word “bread” was added by the translators wineskins. Pentecost pointed to this definitive break with the old covenant’s defensive mentality and rituals.

65. Why were the Israelites required to eat bitter herbs? To remind them of the horrors of cultural bondage to a foreign, anti-God power. The threat of another period of bondage was always before them. But from the day of Christ’s resurrection, the old geographical and cultural wineskins were broken. The church is on the offensive internationally, for the ethical requirements of God have been met, in time and on earth. Definitive ethical victory is behind us, once and for all.

of the King James Version. It is not in Paul's text. Third, he tells us to celebrate the Lord's Table with the unleaven of sincerity and truth—a definitive, discontinuous break from Satan's insincerity and lies. This "unleaven" is the starting point of ethical and cultural maturation. It is the "old leaven" that is forbidden. This is the same imagery that was basic to Passover. It was the old leaven of Egypt that was forbidden. Israel had to make a symbolic break with the religion and culture of Egypt before leaving Egypt for the land of Canaan. Unleavened bread in this instance symbolized the discontinuity with sin that God's deliverance represents. (I have already referred Calvin's comments on this passage. He did not use the passage to advocate the use of unleavened bread during communion. He used it to drive home the ethical implications of the communion feast.) The fourth comment is simply that Paul also refers to Christ as the firstfruits, and this involved a leavened offering. Paul held to both images. Thus, to insist on unleavened bread as alone symbolically valid for the communion table is to claim too much. To the extent that churches want the communion celebration to point forward to victory, leavened bread is far more preferable.

K. The Final Revolution

There will be another great discontinuity, in time and on earth. It will come on the heels of long years of continuity. This next revolution of prophetic significance is Satan's final attempt to throw off godly rule (Rev. 20:3). It will be grounded in a continuity of despair. Satan's despairing forces will vainly attempt to throw off the continuity of godly rule. It will be a perverse image of the exodus. The Hebrews had experienced generations of ungodly servitude to the gods of Egypt, through the representatives of the gods, the pharaohs. They were pushed into rebellion after generations of despair. Neither they nor their Egyptian masters had expected this revolt to be successful. Satan's rebellion will come in much the same way, except that it will be an active rebellion perversely directed against the visible manifestations of the benefits of godly rule. Unlike the Hebrew rebellion, it will be cut short in rapid order (Rev. 20:9).

The forces of Satan will acknowledge as binding the terms of the peace treaty, but they will secretly resist them. They will organize their forces for the final rebellion. Their sins will be that much greater, for they will heap coals upon their heads by rebelling in the face of the visible blessings of God (Pr. 25:21–22;⁶⁶ Rom. 12:20⁶⁷). It is our responsibility, as agents of the victorious commander, to dispense justice, thereby calling forth the external blessings that will condemn the rebels to their well-deserved punishment. The steady extension of godly rule will have its long-term effects, in time and on earth. These effects will have implications throughout eternity: training for dominion by the saints, and training for defeat by the rebels.

We should not expect a great discontinuity in training for either camp. We should not expect endless external defeat for the spiritual army of a victorious commander, Jesus Christ, only to have victory handed over on a silver platter to troops that have proven themselves totally incompetent for thousands of years. We should also not expect to see endless victories for Satan, only to have victory snatched away from his troops in the final moments of the ancient contest. Our victory is past: Calvary. Their defeat is past: Calvary. History is a progressive working out of the implications of Calvary's crucial discontinuity. We should not expect to see the progressive historical defeat of the implicit victors, members of Christ's church, nor should we expect to see the progressive historical victory of the implicit losers.⁶⁸ What we should expect to see is the Satanists' equivalent of the exodus: a desperate rebellion by a people who had experienced generations of rule by their enemies.⁶⁹

Let the Satanists celebrate their communion standing up, staffs in hand. Those staffs were broken at Calvary. We are seated on the thrones of judgment in history, and we shall dispense continual justice, making their final revolt all the less justified, all the more culpable, and all the more unsuccessful. The continuity of the word of God will bring external cultural victory, step by step. "But the word of the LORD was unto them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken" (Isa. 28:13). The enemies of God cannot survive the steady onslaught of God's people,

66. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 75.

67. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 10.

68. Gary North, "Common Grace, Eschatology, and Biblical Law," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Winter 1976–77). Cf. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

69. North, Unconditional Surrender, pp. 300–2 as the latter progressively fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant.⁷⁰

Conclusion

Passover points to a radical break with evil. The leaven of the world—sin, death, and corruption—is not to be the ethical foundation of God's kingdom. Unleavened bread symbolized this radical ethical discontinuity with Egypt and Egypt's gods and culture. Bitter herbs symbolized the grim reality of life under the dominion of Satan and his representatives. God called the Israelites to obey His law. Obedience to God's law was to become the foundation of a new civilization. At the feast of Pentecost, they were to celebrate the founding of this new civilization, and they were to use leavened bread in this ritual.

To accomplish the liberation of Israel from the bondage of sin, represented by Egyptian civilization, God destroyed Egypt. The avenger of blood gained vengeance for the blood-stained land on Passover night. A radical historical discontinuity was the event that drove the Israelites out of bondage and toward the land of Canaan. This, in turn, was designed to bring the continuity of the maturation process. Ethical conformity to God over time produces this continuity of growth, both personally and culturally.

The ethical discontinuity of sin brings the historical discontinuity of God's judgment. Adam learned this lesson when God expelled him from the garden; the people of Noah's day learned it; and so did Pharaoh, though only in his last minutes in a watery grave. God cuts off the leaven of sin in history, so that the leaven of righteousness can develop and become the dominant cultural force.

The biblical concept of social change is therefore grounded in the doctrines of creation, ethical rebellion, redemption, dominion, and final judgment. In short, the Bible teaches a doctrine of linear time. We are both pushed and pulled through time, and not by impersonal forces, but by a personal God. God's declared and inescapable future draws us through present history, but always by way of the past. What has gone before has its influence over us, but so also does all that is yet to come. The link between past and future is responsible decision-making, primarily by God and secondarily by men.

The exodus was a discontinuous event, yet the covenantal life of Israel was to be renewed annually by a continuing series of Passover meals down through the ages. The great discontinuous event (for it is essentially one event) of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ took place once and only once, yet the Communion meals that announce His definitive triumph over death and evil are to be continually celebrated by His people through the ages. In short, a definitive and completed past event—a discontinuity—is to be celebrated continuously through history, for it points to a definitive final event in the future: the final judgment. This next great discontinuity becomes the foundation of the great future continuity: the New Heavens and New Earth (Rev. 21, 22).

70. Ibid., ch. 10.

History is therefore equally influenced both by discontinuities and continuities, the “one great event” and the “many little events.” History is simultaneously one and many. In this sense, history reflects the being of God, which is simultaneously one and many. But above all, historical change is personal: God proposes, God disposes, and men are fully responsible (Rom. 9:10–24).

In a world of cosmic personalism, the “great men” theory of history is valid. Great men do produce historical discontinuities that are crucial. But they make these changes within a framework of historical continuity. They become crucial as pivotal characters precisely because there is a broad historical milieu that is ready to be pivoted. The “great man” is nothing without the “little men,” past and present, who have participated in the development of the historical setting that at last makes a radical break with the past.

The continuity of biblical law is an important aspect of historical continuity. It is man’s tool of dominion, and the measure by which man is either blessed or judged. It speaks to men in all eras because man is still made in God’s image in all eras. Thus, it true, as the French proverb says, that “the more things change, the more they stay the same.” It is also true that as things stay the same—man’s creaturehood, God’s law—the more things are able to change.

The radical discontinuity in a person’s individual life is ethical: from death unto life, from the old creature to the new creature, from condemnation to blessing, from rebellion to obedience, from covenant-breaking to covenant-keeping. Without this discontinuity, every man stands condemned by the original discontinuity of Adam’s ethical rebellion. Adam inaugurated a continuity of death by his act of rebellion. The continuity of spiritual death will otherwise prevail in each person’s life apart from the discontinuity of regeneration.

The discontinuity of regeneration has been the same discontinuity that has prevailed from the day of Adam’s sin. It has created a rival continuity: the continuity of life. This continuity has many institutional forms, but the chief one is the church. The basis of this regenerative discontinuity has always been the grace of God, which in turn is made possible by the greatest of all discontinuities: the incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ.

As this regenerative discontinuity takes place in more and more lives, the continuity of growth in the kingdom of God is revealed. In short, a series of radical ethical discontinuities in individual lives produces Christian cultural and civilizational continuity. Biblical revival is therefore radically different from revivalism. Revivalism promotes an emotional personal break from an existing social order, but not the transformation of that order. Biblical revival is a comprehensive, all-encompassing, civilization-transforming revival.⁷¹ It comes by means of a series of rapid multiple ethical discontinuities—personal ethical discontinuities—that combine to create a historic civilizational discontinuity. Biblical revival lays the foundation of Christian civilization's continuity. It lays the foundation, in short, of the visible manifestation of the dominion covenant.

71. Gary North, "The Pressing Need for Revival," Christian Reconstruction, VI (Nov./Dec. 1984). (<http://bit.ly/gnpnfr>)

13

UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER

And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he, and all his servants, and all the Egyptians; and there was a great cry in Egypt; for there was not a house where there was not one dead. And he called for Moses and Aaron by night, and said, Rise up, and get you forth from among my people, both ye and the children of Israel; and go, serve the LORD, as ye have said. Also take your flocks and your herds, as ye have said, and be gone; and bless me also (Ex. 12:30–32).

The theocentric principle here is the absolute sovereignty of God in the affairs of men.

A. The Final Confrontation

The Pharaoh and his people had been subjected to the final humiliation, they believed. They had suffered plague after plague, and their priests had been impotent to combat them. The Pharaoh himself, the great god of Egypt, had now lost his son, heir to divinity. The gods of Egypt had been decisively defeated by the God of Moses and Aaron. Surely their defeat was total. The Israelites had won.

The Israelites then took their belongings, packed them up, and made ready to depart. They collected the tribute of the Egyptians, who pressed them to leave. The tribute money was paid; restitution was made. The slaves were now officially free men. They had been visibly returned to bondage under God, which is the sole the basis of human freedom.

This capitulation on the part of Pharaoh was not to last long. His defeat was not yet total. He still had his life, his army, his chariots, and his authority. Egypt still had sovereignty over the land; possibly Egypt still maintained considerable sovereignty in Canaan, although Courville's dating of the exodus, coupled with his reconstruction of the dynasties, indicates that the Pharaoh of the exodus was much weaker than the Pharaoh of the late Twelfth Dynasty who had first enslaved the Hebrews. Pharaoh was once again about to reverse himself and seek a victory over the departing slaves, and this proved to be the final humiliation for him, and also for Egypt, which was defeated by the invading Hyksos (Amalekites) and subjugated for at least a century, and possibly four—about twice the duration of Israel's stay in Egypt.

Pharaoh knew precisely what his surrender implied. The gods of Egypt had been decisively defeated. Pharaoh had been driven to capitulate completely to the demands of Moses and Moses' God. This God had demanded that Pharaoh allow the whole nation of Israel to journey three days in order to sacrifice to Him. Now God had been able to extract His demands from Pharaoh. Pharaoh was implicitly admitting that the Egyptian theology was a myth, that there is no continuity of being between man and God, that there is a God so great and so powerful that He can extract His every demand from mighty Egypt, the center of the earth. Here was a God unlike any ever encountered by Pharaoh or.

Pharaoh also understood what Egypt's sin against the Hebrews had been. They had enslaved Israel, breaking their treaty with Israel and Israel's God. They had treated Israel as a concubine, a slave wife. They had stolen Israel's dowry, the land of Goshen. There was restitution to pay. Pharaoh, however, did not want to pay all that he owed. He wanted one last admission on the part of the Hebrews that he was not really guilty. He wanted Moses to bless him.

How could this man have hoped for one moment that the God of Israel might bless him? How could he have imagined that God would regard him as anything but a lawless rebel? Was Pharaoh at last asking for mercy? Was he at last humbling himself before the God of the Israelites? Was his request for a blessing a sign of his repentance? The answer is unconditionally no to all these questions. What was Pharaoh really asking for? He was asking for God's seal of approval on his actions as a monarch, the master of Egypt. He was asking for God's sanction as a lawful former master over Israel. He was trying to justify his tyranny and his continual lying. He was trying to cover himself with the protecting law of God, but without humbling himself before that law. He was trying to get God to acknowledge publicly that Pharaoh's acts of charity—which were in fact tribute payments extracted by God's awesome power—entitled him to God's protection.

B. The Year of Release

The law of God respecting Hebrew slaves placed specific requirements on the Hebrew masters. Pharaoh must have understood the basic principle of lawful slave ownership. "And if thy brother, an Hebrew man or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee. And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty. Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock and out of thy floor, and out of thy winepress: of that wherewith the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him" (Deut. 15:12–14). It is revealing that the justification of this law was the bondage they had experienced in Egypt: "And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee: therefore I command thee this thing today" (Deut. 15:15).

1. Blessing for Evil

Pharaoh wanted to be recognized as a lawful master, for he was giving liberally of Egypt's wealth. Was he not treating the Hebrews honestly, as a brother might treat them? In fact, it was God's responsibility to bless him, for he was adhering to the law: "It shall not seem hard unto thee, when thou sendest him away free from thee: for he hath been worth a double hired servant to thee, in serving thee six years: and the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all that thou doest" (Deut. 15:18). The blessing, Pharaoh insisted. Where is the blessing?

Pharaoh the slavemaster, Pharaoh the kidnapper, Pharaoh the treaty-breaker, Pharaoh the slave-wife-divorcer, and Pharaoh the divine ruler was once again demanding to be recognized as a sovereign. He was arguing that he and his predecessors had possessed the right to violate all of the laws concerning lawful servitude, enslaving the Israelites unlawfully, just as surely as Potiphar threw Joseph into prison unlawfully. He had conducted himself lawfully, he implied, and now his payment to the Israelites testified, he wanted God to admit, to his position as a covenant-keeper. Facing a victorious slave population and their victorious God, Pharaoh wanted to be justified by works: his liberality in giving the Hebrews their seventh-year payment. This was not tribute. This was not restitution. This was not the restoration of the stolen dowry. This was simply lawful payment for lawful slaveowning, which had been conducted by a well-meaning brother in the faith. He wanted all the promised benefits of the law, the blessing in "all that thou doest,” in return for this final payment to Israel. If he could get God’s blessing, his payment would wipe the slate clean. God would be testifying to the legitimacy of Egypt’s past rule over His people.

Pharaoh was not offering unconditional surrender to God. Once again, he was bargaining with God. This time, he used the law of God to try to justify his actions. Instead of flatly denying the right of Israel to sacrifice to God, or denying Israel the right to take along wives, or children, or cattle, he was now denying the legitimacy of any judicial case that God might bring against him as a rebellious, law-denying sovereign. He was asking God to sanction all of his past transgressions, including his unwillingness to grant the Hebrews the right to worship their God. But if these earlier transgressions were not really illegitimate, then God would have to sanction Pharaoh’s original argument, namely, that he had been a lawful sovereign during the period of the subjugation. In fact, he was asking for God’s sanction on the whole era of enslavement. He wanted his blessing; he was paying for it “fair and square.” God owed him this blessing.

2. Restitution

God did not grant him a blessing. Pharaoh was paying restitution, and he was paying it under extreme duress. He would gain no blessing from God; he would have no stamp of approval on his actions as a self-proclaimed divine monarch. He was not going to be able to buy his way out of judgment. He still had not recognized the nature of the God he was dealing with.

God warned Moses as they were leaving Egypt: “For Pharaoh will say of the children of Israel, They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in. And I will harden Pharaoh’s heart, that he shall follow after them; and I will be honoured upon Pharaoh, and upon all his host; that the Egyptians may know that I am the LORD. And they did so. And it was told the king of Egypt that the people fled: and the heart of Pharaoh and of his servants was turned against the people, and they said, Why have we done this, that we have let Israel go from serving us?” (Ex. 14:3–5).¹

Pharaoh covenantally represented his subordinates well. The Egyptians were not innocent victims of a misguided leader who did not represent them ethically and spiritually. They advised him to pursue the fleeing Hebrews. They had not learned, and they had not humbled themselves before God for their generations of sinful dealing with the Israelites. They had not yet received God's final verdict on the assertion of Egypt's continuity-of-being theology. They had not yet surrendered unconditionally.

1. The phrase, “entangled in the land,” is expressive of the labyrinth concept which dominated Egyptian and ancient pagan thought. The Hebrews’ wandering in the wilderness did become an entanglement—an ethical entanglement, rather than a physical entanglement. On the labyrinth, see Appendix C: “The Labyrinth and the Garden.”

C. Dominion and Surrender: Unconditional but Progressive

God requires unconditional surrender from mankind. He does not offer terms of permanent peace on anything other than full, unconditional surrender.²

1. Terms of Surrender

God's dealings with the Egyptians and the Canaanites were about to demonstrate, for all the world to see, just how unconditional His terms of surrender are. Egypt faced at least a century of submission to foreign rulers, and most of the cities of Canaan faced absolute annihilation. The Canaanites understood this when Israel crossed the Red Sea, as Rahab told the spies (Josh. 2:9–11). Men must submit themselves to God as their lawful, absolute master, or else they perish. The terms of surrender are stated in His covenant of law: ethical perfection.³ However, because no one except Jesus Christ is perfect before God, a sacrifice has been prepared, so that those relying on it might be

2. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010).

3. It is misleading to redefine the Bible's definition of ethical perfection to mean simply spiritual maturity. Maturity implies ethical progress through time, and progress implies movement toward a fixed ethical standard. This standard is perfection. The perfection of the Bible is definitive as well as progressive. It is important to consider usage when we read that Noah was perfect (Gen. 6:9), or most notably of all, that Job was perfect and upright (Job. 1:1). The Bible does not teach perfectionism that men can attain ethical perfection in time and on earth. But it does teach that Jesus Christ did attain ethical perfection in time and on earth. Christ's perfect conformity to the law of God, in time and on earth, is the foundation of the regenerate person's definitive sanctification, as well as his progressive sanctification. On this point, see North, Unconditional Surrender, pp. 51–52. Any discussion of perfection as either exclusively definitive or exclusively progressive is incomplete. On the heresy of perfectionism, see B. B. Warfield, Perfectionism, either the abridged one-volume version published by Presbyterian and Reformed (1954) or the two-volume set published originally by Oxford University Press in 1931, and reprinted in 1981 by Baker Book House, Grand Rapids, Michigan.

justified by God and adopted back into God's family (Rom. 8:29–30; Eph. 1:4–5). The passage of His people out of bondage and through the Red Sea was symbolic of the salvation offered by God to His people. The failure of the Egyptians to prevent their escape testified to Canaan and to all the nations of the futility of challenging God by challenging God's people.

Dominion comes through adherence to the terms of God's covenant of peace. Pharaoh attempted to achieve dominion over Israel by defying God and denying the terms of unconditional surrender. He tried to buy God's acceptance by offering tribute money to the Hebrews, but also by implying that this was nothing more than a lawful payment, voluntarily given to lawfully enslaved brothers. Pharaoh wanted God's blessing on Egypt's statist order, for he still believed that He was the divine-human link. Not so, God declared. There would be no blessing on the terms laid down by Pharaoh. Pharaoh once again failed to gain any sort of compromise from God. The God of Israel was implacable except to those who acknowledged His lawful authority as a true slave-master. When Israel later refused to acknowledge this from time to time, God gave them into the hands of other slave-masters, like the archetypal slave-masters of Egypt. Pharaoh could not obtain what Israel, God's own people, could never obtain: an admission from God of the legitimacy of partial surrender to His authority.

God's requirement of unconditional surrender is ethical. "And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the LORD appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect" (Gen. 17:1). "Thou shalt be perfect with the LORD thy God" (Deut. 18:13). "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). The standard of perfection is the standard met by Jesus Christ and imputed to His people by grace (Rom. 5:13–19). There can be no compromise here: perfection means definitive perfection.⁴

What about progressive perfection, or the process of spiritual maturation? God, by His grace, honors this process. The terms of the covenant are unquestionably conditional: if men do this, then God will give that. He honors the terms of His covenant, not because men have performed innately righteous acts perfectly, but because Jesus Christ did, and by seeking to imitate Christ and Christ's perfect humanity (but not His divinity), men become the recipients of God's blessings, in time and on earth.

4. See footnote #3.

Covenant-keeping men cannot command God's blessings in the way that a magician thinks he can command blessings from occult forces, namely, on the basis of some precisely performed ritual. God is not bound by some autonomous cosmic order to respond automatically to the requests of men, including covenant-keeping men. Whatever men receive from God is by God's grace, since fallen men cannot claim to be in absolute and unconditional subordination to God, that is, totally righteous. But God's moral universe is orderly (common grace), so there are cause-and-effect relationships between righteousness (covenant-keeping) and prosperity. This orderliness is no less a matter of grace than God's imputation of Christ's perfect righteousness to His people. It is a world-ordering grace.

God instructed Israel to destroy utterly the Canaanites (Deut. 7:16–24). It was failure on Israel's part that resulted in the failure of their mission (Jud. 1:21–36). They did not utterly destroy the cities of Canaan. Why was this total destruction required by God? Because God was establishing a new base of operations for Israel, one which was to have been unpolluted by foreign gods. Once established in the land, however, the Israelites were not to demand the unconditional and immediate surrender of every pagan nation. They were to offer terms of peace, which might involve perpetual servitude, to nations far away from Canaan (Deut. 20:10–15).⁵ Furthermore, Israel was not supposed to have a standing army, meaning a king who multiplies horses, which are too easily used in offensive military operations (Deut. 17:16).⁶ Conquest was by means of God's word, as Jonah the prophet was instructed to deliver to Nineveh. The "clean sweep" in Canaan was unique in Israel's history, and even here, the terms of God's unconditional surrender were not successfully imposed, for these terms required totally faithful servants. The imposition of the terms of unconditional surrender by God's people demanded unconditional faithfulness on their part. They failed.

Christ, however, was unconditionally faithful to God, and therefore He was able to impose these terms on Satan at the cross. The extension of His terms of surrender is what the New Testament era is all about. The steady encroaching on Satan's fallen kingdom is what the preaching of the gospel and the establishment of Christian institutions, governed by God's law, are intended to accomplish. God's terms are still unconditional; men must surrender totally to God, either before they die (or, in the case of the final generation, before Christ comes in judgment), or else after they die (or after Christ comes in judgment). Eventually, all mankind will surrender unconditionally. "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:9–11). In time and on earth, however, not every knee will bow, and among those who formally bow themselves before Christ, not every heart will bow. The principle of unconditional surrender is nonetheless valid even before the final judgment. It will not be consummately extended in history by fallen men, but as the followers of Christ progressively conform themselves to Christ's image, to a greater and greater extent, the preaching of the gospel and the construction of institutions based on the full application of biblical law will extend Christ's kingdom: progressive unconditional surrender, the working out in history of the definitive unconditional surrender of Jesus Christ to God the Father.

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 48.

6. Ibid., ch. 42.

2. Pharaoh's Negotiations

It is part of Satan's imitation kingdom that he, too, requires unconditional surrender. He wants men to bow to him and worship him, which is what he demanded of Jesus in the wilderness (Matt. 4:9).⁷ Pharaoh seemed to compromise with Moses, but at no stage was he asking for anything less than unconditional surrender from God, for Pharaoh asked God to sanction the idea that Pharaoh had some trace of divinity in him, that he represented true divinity in the continuity of being between God and man. God refused to compromise, for anything less than total sovereignty on His part is a denial of who He is and what He is. Satan wants "just a speck" of sovereignty, so that he can successfully deny that God is who God says that He is. This is not unconditional surrender to God, for it requires that God deny Himself. In effect, it would be the unconditional surrender of God to Satan, for by having testified falsely concerning both Satan and Himself, God would thereby have sinned against Satan. He would have borne false witness concerning the nature of divinity and false witness against His maligned (not malignant) neighbor. False testimony concerning the nature of God is a capital offense. This challenge to the validity of God's self-testimony was the very heart of Satan's temptation of Adam and Eve: an assertion that God had testified falsely concerning God, man, and reality.⁸

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

After Pharaoh finally allowed the Hebrews to depart in total triumph, without maintaining a shred of original sovereignty for himself or the Egyptian state, he raced after the Hebrews in a rage. Why had he let them go? Didn't they know who he was? Didn't they know what Egypt was? Didn't they know that he represented man's divinity in this world? He would show them. He would bring them low. Every Hebrew knee would bow to him, for they had not allowed him even a trace of sovereignty. They had wanted him to surrender unconditionally to their God and therefore to them, given the Egyptian theology of the continuity of being, although God allowed him to keep his kingdom. But it was the principle of the thing that concerned him. If they were going to demand unconditional surrender by him to their God in principle, then he was going to demand visible unconditional surrender from them once again. He was going to drag them back. They would not go free. They would not sacrifice to any God who would not acknowledge at least a degree of independent sovereignty to Pharaoh and his state. It would be a fight to the finish. It turned out to be just exactly that.

Pagan kingdoms implicitly want unconditional surrender from their enemies. Lawless men want the same. As men grow more arrogant, as they attempt to divorce themselves from the concept of lawful dominion under the restraints of God's law, they adopt policies of unconditional surrender, in time and on earth. They launch sneak attacks, in violation of Deuteronomy 20:10–15, as the Japanese did against the Russians in 1904 and as they did against the United States in December of 1941. Pagan governments demand unconditional surrender, as the Allies demanded from Germany, Italy, and Japan in the Second World War.⁹ In short, they want "a fight to the finish," just as Pharaoh wanted when he pursued the Israelites into the Red Sea. They seek to be free of the restraints of God's law in order to impose a law-order which violates God's law.

8. Gary North, "Witnesses and Judges," Biblical Economics Today, VI (Aug./Sept. 1983). Reprinted in Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), Appendix E.

9. Ann Armstrong, Unconditional Surrender (Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1961).

Conclusion

Unconditional surrender is an inescapable concept: the question is, "Surrender to whom?" Will it be surrender to God, progressively through time, until the final day of judgment, when surrender will be absolute and unconditional? Or will it be surrender to Satan's kingdom, in time and on earth, through Satan's radical breaks in the continuities of history, the wars and conquests of his earthly kingdoms, all of which are at war with God's kingdom and His law? Satan wants a final break with history in history, a radical break with the sovereignty of God. He wants the abolition of history, for history testifies to his failure, in time, at the cross. He wants the unconditional surrender of time to revolutionary chaos or static timelessness, where the progressive, linear extension of God's kingdom will be overcome. Satan imitates God by demanding total, immediate, temporal surrender.

The argument favoring discontinuous breaks in history was valid when the static kingdoms of the ancient world faced the discontinuity represented by Israel. But now the church is bringing God's peace treaty to the nations. There are minor discontinuities, as nations rise and fall, but the next biblically significant discontinuity is Satan's final rebellion and Christ's return in judgment. At that point, unconditional surrender will be required. The kingdom will be delivered, in completed form, to the Father (I Cor. 15:24). The history of fallen, rebellious man will end. Until that time, it is the continuity of God's progressive dominion, through the preaching of the gospel and the construction of institutions imposing God's law, that is the criterion of historical change. It is the steady extension of Christ's kingdom, not the desperate discontinuities of Satan's kingdoms, with their treaties of immediate unconditional surrender, that is the basis of historical change.

There will be one final, all-out attempt by Satan to avoid total surrender. Then will come the return of Christ in full power and judgment. It will be the death knell of Satan's kingdom, in time, on earth, and in eternity (Rev. 20). All satanic imitations of this great discontinuity of God's final judgment will wind up as Pharaoh's attempted discontinuity in covenantal history wound up: buried in the depths of the sea.

Satan's theology is the religion of revolution, and it cannot survive the steady, implacable onslaught of God's theology of progressive dominion. It is not the minor discontinuities of history that serve as our criteria of victory, but the steadiness of the word of God: "But the word of the LORD was unto them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken" (Isa. 28:13). God used discontinuities in history to smash the kingdoms of the ancient world: "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it: and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it to him" (Ezek. 21:27). Give what? The diadem of power (Ezek. 21:26). God still overturns Satan's kingdoms, but by the steady expansion of the gospel age, the progressive dominion of God's law and God's people, in time and on earth. Christians' task is to lay the groundwork for a new kingdom, built on the foundation of God's law—which is to govern every human institution—by God's grace, which is applied to the heart of every Christian (Heb. 8:7–13). The New Testament does not teach a religion of social revolution, but a religion of ethical regeneration, restitution, and repentance.

While Christianity preaches the tactics of social continuity during its "minority religion" phase—go the extra mile with your enemy, turn the other cheek—it nevertheless is a religion of social transformation. The Christian revolution takes place in the hearts and minds of men—the place where all revolutions begin. The opponents of Christianity recognize that Christianity is indeed a religion of total transformation. To them, the ethical discontinuity between the Old Adam and the New Adam represents a revolutionary doctrine. It threatens them with the destruction of their anti-Christian civilization.

The Roman emperors launched a series of bloody, though intermittent, persecutions against the early church because they recognized the all-or-nothing nature of the confrontation. It was either Christ or Caesar. The Roman state was quite willing to tolerate any religion which acknowledged the divinity (or genius) of the emperor. Christians refused. They paid a heavy price. But Rome paid a heavier price in the long run. So did Egypt.

14

THE RULE OF LAW

And when a stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the passover to the LORD, let all his males be circumcised, and then let him come near and keep it; and he shall be as one that is born in the land: for no uncircumcised person shall eat thereof. One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you (Ex. 12:48–49).

The theocentric focus of this passage is the authority of biblical law: the third point of the biblical covenant model.¹ Access to Passover was by confession of faith and circumcision. The circumcised stranger and his household had access to Passover.

A. Subordination to Biblical Law

The Passover was closed to outsiders who had not been circumcised. A man's slave, if he had been purchased with money and subsequently circumcised, had the obligation of participating in the Passover rites (Ex. 12:44). He had a place in the family and was under the sovereignty of God, through his master. The mark of subordination was in his flesh. In contrast, the foreigner and hired servant were excluded from Passover, since they had not visibly (physiologically) humbled themselves before God, and were therefore not part of the covenant: "There shall no stranger eat thereof: But every man's servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof. A foreigner and an hired servant shall not eat thereof" (12:43b–45). No foreigner could eat leavened bread anywhere in Israel during Passover week (12:19). Any stranger who wished to participate in Passover could do so, if he and all the males of his household were circumcised (12:48). This indicated his subordination to God and His dominion in the name of God over his own household. A circumcised stranger was to be treated as one born in the land, although it is unclear how he could ever have lawfully owned rural land permanently, because of the redistribution back to the original family owners, which was required at the Jubilee year (Lev. 25:10).²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

The rites of circumcision and Passover were simple enough. Biblical law in Israel was public. In fact, it had to be read in its entirety every seventh year in front of the assembled nation:

And Moses wrote this law, and delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and unto all the elders of Israel. And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles, When all Israel is come to appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing. Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the LORD your God, and observe to do all the words of this law: And that their children, which have not known any thing, may hear, and learn to fear the LORD your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it (Deut. 31:9–13).³

The God of the Old Testament is the God of the New Testament. He is the Creator. As such, He owns the whole world. He commands respect from all men, and the terms of His law are binding on all men. The stranger within Israel's gates, no less than the priests, had to honor the law. There was no mystery about the law. While some things are known only to God (Deut. 29:29), these secret matters are as closed to the priests as to the stranger. Public law was in principle open to every resident in the land of Israel. The law had to be an open book for everyone to understand and observe, including the children of strangers (Deut. 31:13). The Hebrews were not to make a mistake concerning the universality of God's rule. He is not confined to one city, one nation, or one people. His rule is universal. So is biblical law, which is the judicial manifestation of His sovereign rule.

2. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 25.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch 75.

B. Access to Citizenship

God's law for Israel did not permit every circumcised stranger to become a full citizen immediately upon being circumcised. There were exceptions. Certain nations had been especially evil in their treatment of Israel, indicating a cultural perverseness that might take several generations to overcome in the lives of family members. The strong bond of the family covenant was acknowledged. It had taken the death of Israel's exodus generation to cleanse their families of the cultural legacy of Egypt; such a legacy remained a potential threat to Israel from newly circumcised pagans. Thus, it took three generations for circumcised Egyptians and Edomites (the heirs of Esau) to become full citizens (Deut. 23:7–8). Second, it took ten generations for Ammonites and Moabites:

An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of the LORD; even to their tenth generation shall they not enter into the congregation of the LORD for ever. Because they met you not with bread and with water in the way, when ye came forth out of Egypt; and because they hired against thee Balaam the son of Beor of Pethor of Mesopotamia, to curse thee (Deut. 23:3–4).

The language here is incomplete. We need other passages to help us understand. Does it say that they could become citizens in the tenth generation or does it say that they are banned forever? Was “forever” understood to mean a nearly permanent ban against them—to the tenth generation—or was it in fact permanent?

We read in Nehemiah 13: “On that day they read in the book of Moses in the audience of the people; and therein was found written, that the Ammonite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of God for ever; because they met not the children of Israel with bread and with water, but hired Balaam against them, that he should curse them: howbeit our God turned the curse into a blessing” (vv. 1–2). I believe that this use of “forever” was figurative; it meant ten generations. We are given an analogous prohibition in the case of bastardy. Bastards were also prevented from entering the congregation of the Lord to the tenth generation (Deut. 23:2). The most conspicuous example of the enforcement of this restriction is seen in the adultery of Judah and Tamar (Gen. 38), which produced Pharez and Zarah. They were bastards in terms of God's law. David was the tenth in the line of those born of Pharez.⁴ He became king.

Despite this prohibition against Moabites, Ruth became a respected member of the covenant, though not a full citizen; she was a woman of humility and faithfulness. She even became the great grandmother of David and an ancestor of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:5). The grace of God is our standard; full ethical conformity to God's covenant, through faith in God's grace (Hab. 2:4), overcomes the general restrictions against the greatest sinners. Ruth's covenant was secured in a three-fold manner: through her marriage to her first husband, a Hebrew; through her faithfulness to her mother-in-law, Naomi; and through her marriage to her second husband, Boaz. She was in subjection to him, as she had been in subjection to the other two. Her children were counted as Israelites, although not as members of the congregation, because of Boaz's position as an heir of Pharez.⁵ But her great grandson—the third generation—became the king; therefore, any general prohibition on her heirs from serving as judges to the tenth generation was overcome by her marriage to Boaz.

It might be argued that Ruth is not an adequate example, since as a woman, she could never have exercised political or judicial office. Possibly; but the ban would have applied to her male heirs. Furthermore, it is instructive that this was a marriage between a politically restricted Moabite and an equally restricted heir of a bastard. It was part of the most important covenantal line in Israel—indeed, the most important in all history. It produced David, and it eventually produced Jesus (Matt. 1; Luke 3). Therefore, the crucial issue is ethics, not genetics. The covenant is fundamentally ethical. Those who were under the ban were under it because of the transgressions of their forebears. But this ban could be overcome through righteousness over time. Time is a means of testing covenantal faithfulness and external performance

4. The named generations were: Pharez, Hezron, Ram, Amminidab, Nahshon, Salmon, Boaz, Obed, Jesse, and David (Ruth 4:18–22). The listed line of Judah was Pharez, Hezron, Ram, Amminadab, and Nahshon. Nahshon was a contemporary of Moses (Num. 1:7). Thus, only four generations are listed in between Nahshon and David: Salmon, who married Rahab (Matt. 1:5), Boaz (who married Ruth), Obed, Jesse, and then David. This list is clearly incomplete. It is symbolic. The time between Pharez and David was over six centuries.

5. A member of the congregation could serve as a judge or elder. It is fitting that the restoration of this family, through God's grace, came with David, the most powerful ruler in Israel's history. This tends to support the idea that being cut off from the congregation did not mean religious excommunication—prohibiting participation in the rituals of Israel—but rather separation from rulership, meaning separation from dominion through service in the civil government.

across generations.

Neither genetics nor time was ever determinative in the covenant structure. The covenantal grafting in of the gentiles through faith in Christ alienated the Pharisees who failed to understand this fundamental principle of the covenant (Rom. 11).⁶ The administrative period of ethical testing—even ten generations—had its limits. “Forever” thus was figurative in the case⁷ of citizenship for Moabites and Ammonites.

C. Covenantal Citizenship

The concept of citizenship in the Old Testament was unquestionably covenantal. This is because God had established the nation by His sovereign act of grace, and had placed all the Israelites under the rule of His covenantal law-order.

1. Restrictive Covenants

Covenants are always restrictive; they exclude even as they include. The civil covenant is also restrictive. Rushdoony commented on Israel’s civil covenant.

In Biblical law, neither equalitarianism nor an oligarchy have [sic] any standing. God as the source of law established the covenant as the principle of citizenship. Only those within the covenant are citizens. The covenant is restrictive in terms of God’s law; it is also restrictive in terms of a bar against membership, which appears specifically, naming certain kinds of groups of persons. This aspect of the law is usually overlooked, because it is embarrassing to modern man. It needs therefore especial attention. In Deuteronomy 23:1–2, eunuchs are barred from citizenship; bastards are banned through the tenth generation. Ammonites and Moabites were banned through the tenth generation, or they are totally excluded, depending on the reading of the text. Edomites and Egyptians were eligible for citizenship “in their third generation”; the implication is that they are eligible after three generations of faith, after demonstrating for three generations that they believed in the covenant God and abided by His law. The throne being the ark in the tabernacle, and the tabernacle being also the central place of atonement, membership in the nation-civil and in the nation-ecclesiastical were one and the same.⁷

6. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 7.

7. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press,

There is therefore a covenantal relationship between the kind of god a society believes in and the kind of citizenship that the society creates. The foundation of both the theological covenant and citizenship is faith.

Citizenship rested on faith. Apostasy was treason. The believing alien had some kind of access to the sanctuary (II Chron. 6:32–33), at least for prayer, but this act did not give him citizenship. The alien[s]—Egyptian, Babylonian, Ethiopian, Philistine, Phoenician, and any others—could be citizens of the true or heavenly Zion, the city of God (Ps. 87), but the local Zion, Israel, was not to admit the banned groups except on God's terms. . . . Thus, it would appear from the evidence of the law that, first, a restrictive membership or citizenship was a part of the practice of Israel by law. . . . Second, the predominant fact in Israel was one law for all, irrespective of faith or national origin, that is, the absolute requirement of justice for all without respect of persons.⁸

Non-citizens were protected by God's law. This meant protection from citizens who might use their possession of citizenship as a means of exploiting strangers. It therefore meant protection from oppression by the civil government.

The legal protections ("rights") granted by biblical law to non-citizens were so comprehensive that it is difficult in retrospect to specify exactly what privileges citizens enjoyed that non-citizens did not. One possibility: not being members of any tribe, the non-citizens could not have served as judges. Foreigners were not automatically prohibited from serving in Israel's army, for David's officer, Uriah, was a Hittite, or at least his family background was Hittite (II Sam. 11:6). No privileges of citizenship are spelled out in the Old Testament that are explicitly restricted to Israelites, although there must have been such privileges, since Deuteronomy 23:3–8 provides a list of those nations whose members are prohibited from joining the "assembly" (civil, not ecclesiastical). A circumcised stranger could, however, participate in Passover (Ex. 12:48). So, it is not a simple matter to determine just what protections were not available to strangers.

2. Differing Applications

There were a few cases where the law was applied differently be-1973), p. 99.

8. Ibid., pp. 99–100.

tween strangers and Israelites. Two of these dealt with slavery. First, a stranger could become a debt slave as a result of some economic crisis. It was not legal for a Hebrew to make interest-bearing loans to a fellow Hebrew who was in need of a charitable loan. “Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury. Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury” (Deut. 23:19–20a).⁹ This prohibition was against interest-bearing loans to the needy poor, not against loans for business endeavors in which the lender shared some of the risk. The defining factor for usury was poverty. “If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury” (Ex. 22:25).¹⁰ Strangers, however, were regarded as slaves to foreign gods, and therefore as slaves to sin. The Hebrew was allowed to charge them interest. The Hebrew also owed his tithes and offerings to God, including God’s portion of any interest payments received, so the stranger in this way paid at least a portion of what he owed to God. Second, heathens could be purchased as permanent slaves (Lev. 25:44–46),¹¹ or taken as captives in war (Num. 31:9; Deut. 20:10–14).¹² The Gibeonites, by tricking the Israelites, became permanent servants to Israel (Josh. 9). A Hebrew bondservant went free in the jubilee year (Lev. 25:39–41).¹³ The stranger did not go free; he and his children remained in the Hebrew family as permanent capital assets (Lev. 25:45–46).

Third, strangers could worship foreign gods in the privacy of their households (though not publicly), but it was a capital offense for a Hebrew to do so (Deut. 13; 17:2–7). Apostasy—breaking the theological covenant—was a capital offense, but being unconverted wasn’t.

Fourth, strangers could legally eat the meat of beasts that died naturally; Hebrews couldn’t (Deut. 14:21).¹⁴

What could the purposes of the exceptions have been in the case of slavery? James Jordan’s analysis is illuminating.

Why does the law differ in regard to the unbelievers? Is this merely to symbolize the difference between a covenant people and

9. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 57.

10. Chapter 49.

11. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 31.

12. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 48.

13. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 30.

14. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 34.

those outside it? Not so. As the earlier chapters of this monograph demonstrated, the psychology of the unregenerate man is radically different from that of the regenerate man at the most basic level. The unbeliever is by nature an anti-dominion man, and thus lazy and unproductive. He is suicidal as well, and a rebel against all authority. He is a murderer. The Bible is realistic about this, and makes slavery a provision for the unbeliever, both for his own protection and well-being, and for the protection of society. Additionally, the enslavement of the heathen is, as has been noted before, an excellent means of evangelization and acculturation. There is to be one law and one standard for the believer and unbeliever (Lev. 24:22); the differences in application of this one law are due to the differing psychological situations of the believer and the unbeliever.¹⁵

God requires one legal standard, for all men are held accountable to Him. His law specifies differences in application, and these differences must be respected. Nevertheless, the law did not give the Hebrew rulers the right to multiply exceptions to a straightforward application of the law. Debt and slavery were the main exceptions with respect to strangers in the land, plus the privileges and duties of citizenship, most notably (and possibly only) serving as a judge.

3. No Respect for Persons

Again and again in the books of the law, the warning and reminder is given by God concerning the rule of law for strangers: "I am the LORD your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, to give you the land of Canaan, and to be your God" (Lev. 25:38). He redeemed (bought back) Israel from oppression; therefore, Israel is not to become an oppressor. "Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Ex. 22:21; cf. 23:9; Lev. 19:33; and Deut. 10:19). The prophets also repeated this warning against oppressing strangers (Jer. 7:6–7; Zech. 7:10; Mal. 3:5).¹⁶

15. James Jordan, Slavery in Biblical Perspective (Master's Thesis, Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, 1980), pp. 95–96.

16. One of the continuing themes in the writings of "liberation theologians" is the evil of oppression. They always equate oppression with economic oppression, and economic oppression with free market capitalism. What is important to consider here is the implicitly statist nature of oppression: Israel was oppressed in Egypt precisely because the Egyptians did not honor God's law. Hebrews are to honor God's law and enforce it throughout the land. The state is to be restrained by biblical law. This makes it very difficult for anyone to gain oppressive powers over others. Potential oppressors cannot gain the co-operation of public officials in applying the state's monopoly of vi-

The rule of law is established unmistakably: “Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God’s: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it” (Deut. 1:17). This was Moses’ recapitulation of his decision to create a hierarchy of judges over Israel (Ex. 18).¹⁷ The judges must not respect persons, for they act as God’s agents. God does not respect persons: “For the LORD your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible [God] which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward. He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger, in giving him food and raiment. Love ye therefore the stranger: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt” (Deut. 10:17–19). This is the biblical doctrine of judicial love: we are required to render honest judgment and to bring the rule of law over all men, including the stranger. The very next verse tells us why we must love all men in this way: “Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God; him shalt thou serve, and to him shalt thou cleave, and swear by his name” (Deut. 10:20).¹⁸ Those who love God, who cleave to His name,¹⁹ and who swear (give a binding oath) by His name, are to love His law and apply it without prejudice of persons.

The universality of God’s law implies the universal responsibility of all men to obey His law. Both principles are based on the idea of the total sovereignty of God. By establishing a unified law code for all residents of Israel, God thereby announced His kingdom. No one was exempt. It was not a person’s participation in family rites, as in Greece and Rome, which opened the courts of law to him—courts to which strangers could therefore not appeal with hope of receiving justice. The principle of justice for all is based on the principle of God’s final judgment on all. This was seen first within the geographical confines of Israel, and all nations were to stand in awe of the legal system built on the principle of justice for all (Deut. 4:5–8).²⁰ The biblical principle is olence against certain economic groups or organizations. When the civil government refuses to enforce God’s law on all people, the result is oppression. The whole of the law must be enforced in order to avoid oppression. The liberation theologians are universally unwilling to recommend that the civil government enforce the whole of Old Testament law. Thus, they are advocates of oppressing institutions.

17. Chapter 19.

18. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 27.

19. The Hebrew word translated here as “cleave”—dawbak—means “to join to” or “cling to,” the same word used in Genesis 2:24: “cleave unto his wife.” It refers to a covenant.

20. Ibid., ch. 8.

clear: one God, one law-order. Deny the universality of a single law-order, and you thereby deny a universal God. This is precisely what ancient paganism denied.

D. Pagan Citizenship

One God, one law-order: here is a principle that stood in stark contrast to the law structures of the ancient world. The pagan kingdoms of the ancient world made it exceedingly difficult for foreigners to gain citizenship, for this meant the right to participate in the religious rites of the city. Religious exclusion meant political exclusion. It also meant exclusion from courts of law. It meant, ultimately, exclusion from justice. Polytheistic societies recognized the biblical principle in its reverse form: many gods, many law-orders. They understood that they could have no legal standing in another city's courts, for the same reason that foreigners could possess no legal standing in theirs: they worshipped different gods.

Let us consider the "democratic" city-states of the classical world, since they represent the "best case" of ancient pagan politics. Fustel de Coulanges' book, The Ancient City (1864), remains the classic in the field. He wrote about the link between classical (Greek and Roman) religion and politics. Religion and politics were inseparably linked. Because classical religion was essentially initiatory and mystery oriented, politics was equally based on secrecy and participation in closed rites. Unlike the closed rite of Passover, classical religion and politics were closed rites based on blood lines, meaning family lines. "As law was a part of religion, it participated in the mysterious character of all this religion of the cities. The legal formulas, like those of religion, were kept secret. They were concealed from the stranger, and even from the plebeian. This was not because the patricians had calculated that they should possess a great power in the exclusive knowledge of the law, but because the law, by its origin and nature, long appeared to be a mystery, to which one could be initiated only after having first been initiated into the national worship and the domestic worship."²¹

This meant that residence in a city was not the same as citizenship. This is a universal distinction: residency vs. citizenship. But it is possible for residents to receive the protection of civil law. This was the case in Israel, the only example in the ancient world of a political order that granted comprehensive legal protection for religious aliens. Not so in classical civilization, where there were many gods and many law-orders.

21. Numa Denis Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), III:XI, p. 192.

To live in a city did not make one subject to its laws and place him under their protection; one had to be a citizen. The law did not exist for the slave; no more did it exist for the stranger. . . . These provisions of ancient law were perfectly logical. Law was not born of the idea of justice, but of religion, and was not conceived as going beyond it. In order that there should be a legal relation between two men, it was necessary that there should already exist a religious relation; that is to say, that they should worship at the same hearth and have the same sacrifices. When this religious community did not exist, it did not seem that there could be any legal relation. Now, neither the stranger nor the slave had any part in the religion of the city. A foreigner and a citizen might live side by side during long years, without one's thinking of the possibility of a legal relation being established between them. Law was nothing more than one phase of religion. Where there was no common religion, there was no common law.²²

Fustel had a tendency to exaggerate the impact of family religion in later Greek culture, although its influence never died out. There were important modifications in Greek political religion, especially in Athens, from the sixth century before Christ until the conquest of Greece by Macedonia, late in the fourth century, B.C. Early in the sixth century, Solon revised the laws of Athens and began to encourage immigration.²³ Foreign craftsmen were promised citizenship if they came to dwell permanently in Athens. Alfred Zimmern saw this as an important innovation in ancient Greece, for "the states of the Greek world had not been trained by generations of competition to regard the foreigner as a unit of labour. They were in their nature select and exclusive corporations, rigidly subdivided into lesser and still selecter circles; and there was no place in them for outsiders. Solon's policy, therefore, marks the beginning of a far-reaching change of attitude. Henceforward newcomers are no longer to be despised, as in the old days, as 'cityless vagrants without hearth-fire or lands,' but welcomed as useful comrades and helpers in the work of the community. In other words, Athens was now willing to accept new blood on its merits,

22. Ibid., III:XI, pp. 192–93.

23. H. D. F. Kitto, The Greeks (Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin, [1951] 1962), p. 100.

quite apart from questions of religion and nationality.”²⁴ Better put, Athens found ways to enroll skilled foreign craftsmen onto the lists of the civic religion.

Nevertheless, Athens was unique, and even this uniqueness had limits. In the law of 451–450 B.C., Pericles, who is regarded as the consummate Athenian democrat by modern scholars, had a law passed that limited citizenship for outsiders to those whose parents were both Athenians, thereby closing citizenship to outsiders, including the sons of Athenian men with foreign-born mothers.²⁵ Glotz’s statement is representative of the Greek city-states: “Within each city aliens had only very limited rights, even if their position were established not only by law but also by a treaty, and even if they were permanently domiciled in it as metics. These principles persisted to the end; but their severity was tempered, in international and public law alike, without, however, infringing on the sovereignty of the State.”²⁶ Foreigners could become citizens, but the practice was always rare. Women, slaves, freedmen, and foreigners were not given the rights of citizenship. Greek political religion excluded them.

E. Dominion, Law, and Citizenship

Why the difference in access to citizenship between Israel and classical civilization? It was the difference between metaphysical and ethical religion, between ritual religion and judicial religion, between power religion and dominion religion. The difference is found in the differing conceptions of man that were proclaimed by the two religions.

The biblical view of mankind is simultaneously universal and particular (both one and many). There is unity: all men are made in God’s image, and all men (apart from grace) are ethical rebels, disinherited by their Father in heaven. There is also disunity: some men have been regenerated and put under a new household covenant, which is the household of faith, meaning God’s household. In contrast to pagan religion, the meaningful differentiation is not between those born in one geographical area versus those born in another. The differentiation is between birth in Adam’s flesh versus moral rebirth by God’s spirit. It is the “old birth” versus the “new birth” that ultimately divides men.

24. Alfred E. Zimmern, The Greek Commonwealth: Politics and Economics in Fifth-Century Athens (Oxford: At the Clarendon Press, 1915), p. 136.

25. G. Glotz, The Greek City and its Institutions (New York: Barnes & Noble, [1929] 1969), p. 270.

26. Ibid., p. 263.

There is, on the one hand, a divisive aspect in biblical religion, as in every religion. It is the division between saved and lost, between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. In short, this division is ethical, not geographical. The new creation is equally ethical, not the product of civic rituals of chaos, or the family religion of placating dead ancestors. On the other hand, there is also a universal aspect of biblical religion, which in turn creates a universality of biblical civic order. The link between all men, saved and lost, is the fact that all men are made in God’s image, and all men have been assigned the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28).²⁷ This, in turn, implies the universality of God’s law, for God’s law is the primary tool of dominion. Since all men are in rebellion against God, all men need the restraint that biblical law offers. Biblical law provides social and political order. Thus, the covenantal law structure of Israel is morally binding on all men. This law-order is essentially ethical. All men are to live righteously and exercise dominion; therefore, all men deserve the protection of biblical civil law.

Aliens in Israel were to see the beneficial effects of the law and report back to their own nations concerning the rule of righteousness in Israel—a righteousness that was not confined to citizens only. Therefore, biblical civil law was and still is a means of evangelism.

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).²⁸

1. The Medieval City: Covenantal

Max Weber, the German historian-sociologist, devoted considerable space to a study of the differences between the oriental city and the medieval city, especially the city in Northern Europe. He accepted

27. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

28. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

Fustel's analysis of the clan-based ancient city. The primary difference between the two cities was the basis of citizenship: clan vs. oath. The personal covenantal oath of the individual was the basis of access to citizenship in the medieval city. Jews were excluded from citizenship, not because they were members of an outside clan, but because they could not swear allegiance to Christianity's God. "The medieval city, after all, was still a cultic association. The city church, the city saint, participation of the burgher in the Lord's Supper, the official celebrations of the church holy days—all these are obvious features of the medieval city. But the sib [brotherhood—G.N.] had been deprived of all ritual significance by Christianity, for by its very nature the Christian congregation was a religious association of individual believers, not a ritual association of clans."²⁹

The city became the focal point of the advent of industrialism, free trade, and the accumulation of financial resources. The Western city was instrumental in the coming of capitalism, meaning rational production and distribution that is monitored by means of rational (monetary) calculation methods. The medieval city was originally a Christian institution, a corporation based on a common oath and common law-order. It was, in short, a covenantal association based on a shared confession of faith. This corporate faith Was not clan-based but oath-based.

F. The Foundation of Social Order

The foundation of all social order is God. It is not the state. It is not the will of the majority. It is not the king. It is not any human institution. Biblical law provides us with the only reliable long-term program for the establishment of sustainable social order.

God created the universe, created man, and made man in His image. He assigned to man the tasks of dominion. Man therefore was endowed by God with the ability to interpret and classify the creation. Adam named the animals of the garden (Gen. 2:20). After man's rebellion, God gave men verbal instructions, and in our day, we possess written instructions in His word. Man, in short, has access to an integ-

29. Max Weber, Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, eds. Guenther Roth and Claus Wittich (New York: Bedminster Press, 1968), p. 1247. This is the English-language version of Weber's never completed and posthumously published Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, 4th edition (1956). He died in 1920. This section on the city also appears in Weber, The City, translated and edited by Don Martindale and Gertrude Neuwirth (New York: Free Press, 1958), pp. 102–3.

rating principle that links God, man, human institutions, and the creation within one ethical order. Understand: this order is ethical; it is not ontological. We are not unified with God's being, nor is God an aspect of the creation. But we can achieve ethical union with God through Jesus Christ, who is both God and a perfect man, two natures in union but without mixture in one Person. The link between God and man, between time and eternity, is Jesus Christ, and only Jesus Christ.

1. Biblical Law, Biblical Order

We can say with confidence that the enforcement of biblical law provides man with the social order he requires for efficient dominion. This efficiency is present precisely because it is in harmony with the moral law. In other words, formal rationalism and substantive rationalism are in harmony under the terms of biblical law. We can attain economic efficiency at the same time that we attain valid ethical ends. We find in God's law the link between the letter of the law (formal rationalism) and the spirit of the law (substantive rationalism). We know that the common good of mankind is promoted by biblical law, not because we claim the ability to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility,³⁰ and not because we believe that the "general will" of man is expressed by majority vote,³¹ but because we have faith in the reliability of God's law to integrate each man with other men and with man's environment. The law is designed to fit the creation, including man's institutions. The law did not evolve, nor did man evolve. We can have confidence in biblical law, not because it has been useful up until now in promoting the dominion of evolving man, but because it is established by God as the tool of dominion and the foundation of social peace.

This perspective relieves us of the philosophical contradictions of the humanistic concept of natural rights or human rights. It shifts sovereignty back to God and away from man, whether individual man or collective mankind. Natural rights theory, like its philosophical corollary, natural law theory, cannot give us specifics that are supposedly agreed upon by all rational investigators.³²

30. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

31. Robert A. Nisbet, Tradition and Revolt: Historical and Sociological Essays (New York: Random House, 1968), ch. 1: "Rousseau and the Political Community."

32. Section J, below.

2. God's Judgment of Collectives

What the humanist always neglects to consider is the response of God to continuing public moral evil that is not suppressed by governments, including the civil government. God brings visible judgment on evil societies (Deut. 28:15–68). The refusal to recognize this fact was (and is) a major weakness in all versions of eighteenth-century and nineteenth-century classical liberalism. The liberals look only at what men do to other men, ignoring what evil men do in association with other evil men. F. A. Hayek wrote concerning “victimless crimes”: “Since for a case to come before a judge a dispute must have arisen, and since judges are not normally concerned with relations of command and obedience, only such actions of individuals as affect other persons, or, as they are traditionally described, actions towards other persons . . . will give rise to the formulation of legal rules. . . . At the moment we want merely to point out that actions which are clearly not of this kind, such as what a person does alone within his four walls, or even the voluntary collaboration of several persons, in a manner which clearly cannot affect or harm others, can never become the subject of rules of conduct that will concern a judge.”³³ Examples of “victimless crimes” are such “capitalist acts between consenting adults” as the sale and use of hard drugs, prostitution, homosexuality, and so forth.

Such acts are assumed by classical liberals and modern libertarians to be harmless to other people; they are matters “which clearly cannot affect or harm others.” Hayek was honest enough to put in this qualifying sentence: “At least where it is not believed that the whole group may be punished by a supernatural power for the sins of individuals, there can arise no such rules from the limitation of conduct towards others, and therefore from the settlement of disputes.”³⁴ The heart of the matter is here: there is a supernatural God who promises the destruction of societies that permit immoral, though voluntary, acts between consenting adults. If these acts are public, or if they are contracted in a public manner (soliciting, in other words), then they should be punishable by civil law.

The Bible says that strangers are under the law in a biblical commonwealth. The fact that they are strangers in no way exempts them from the requirements of the law. They are a part of the social order, so they must abide by the legal foundation of that order, biblical law. Christians have unfortunately adopted variations of Greek and Roman concepts of natural law and natural rights in order to convince the humanists, pagans, and other “strangers within the gates” of the advantages and moral necessity of accepting biblical laws.³⁵ They long ago adopted the language of “right reason” and “human rights” to defend the common law, that was heavily influenced by biblical law. In adopting incompatible judicial doctrines, Christians relinquished their claim to the only law-order that is universally valid and universally binding: biblical law.

33. F. A. Hayek, Law, Legislation and Liberty, 3 vols., Rules and Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), vol. 1, p. 101.

34. Idem.

God’s law-order cannot be successfully defended intellectually in terms of natural law, because no system can be defended successfully in terms of natural law. The strangers within the gates have the work of the law written on their hearts, but they actively and willfully suppress this testimony.³⁶ They need the protection of biblical law, which has been revealed to us in God’s word. God’s people also need the protection of biblical law to protect them from the evil deeds of others. Every man needs biblical law; and every man had better acknowledge his need for a substitutionary sacrifice because of his own transgression of at least some of the requirements of biblical law.

G. Self-Government Under Biblical Law

When biblical law is enforced without respect to persons, society is given the legal structure that favors economic development and external blessings. Men are told of their moral and legal responsibilities before God. Self-government under God’s law is the primary form of government in every sphere of life: civil government, family government, church government, economic government. There is to be a means of settling disputes: an appeals court that enforces biblical law without respect of persons. There is an appeals court in the church (Matt. 18:15–20; I Cor. 6:1–10³⁷) and the civil government (Ex. 18:13–26). No earthly government can possibly afford to police every aspect of human action. No human court possesses sufficient economic resources to do so. Any court that would attempt this seeks to impose a top-down bureaucracy that is antithetical to personal initiative, personal responsibility, and economic development. Such a concept of government is the pyramid view, where the state is god, an omniscient directing agent staffed by automatons who simply carry out orders to the letter. The pyramid society is self-defeating; it is parasitic, uncreative, and stifling. It destroys self-government.

35. Gary North, “The Intellectual Schizophrenia of the New Christian Right,” Christianity and Civilization, No. 1 (1982). (<http://bit.ly/CAC1982>)

36. Section J, below.

37. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

The biblical form of government is a system of multiple sovereignties (“authorities” we read in Romans 13:1), with multiple hierarchies (the appeals court structures), and with none universally sovereign over all other human institutions. This is a system of decentralized government, competing institutional sovereignties, and limited civil government. It is a system of government that rejects absolute human sovereignty. It recognizes the implicit total depravity of man—the definitive depravity of man—apart from God’s common or special grace—and therefore the explicit total depravity of any absolutely sovereign human institution, assuming that any institution could ever be free of God’s restraints, which is not possible.

