The basic and indispensable form of social discipline is the preaching of the whole counsel of God. The church must do this, the civil government must proclaim biblical civil law, and the fathers in all the families should proclaim it. Self-government under biblical law is the indispensable means of attaining a sustainable social order. This does not deny the need for appeals courts, but it places such courts in their proper perspective. The individual has the greatest responsibility for conforming to God’s law, since the individual must give an account of his actions, thoughts, and words on the day of judgment (Matt. 12:36; Rom. 14:12). God polices everything and judges everything. He provides perfect justice and perfect punishment. There is no escape. Since the punishment is individual (Luke 12:47–48),³⁸ and the rewards are individual (I Cor. 3:11–15),³⁹ the primary agent of earthly law enforcement is the individual. No one else has comparable knowledge of his own actions. No other earthly authority has comparable incentives to conform a man’s actions to the standards presented in God’s law. The incentive system described by God in His word makes it plain that the most important agency of government is the individual.

For the individual to exercise self-government, as required by biblical law, he must be aware of the terms of the law. He must understand what his responsibilities are before God. This is why every institution ought to proclaim biblical law as it applies to that particular institution. Men should be openly confronted with biblical law, from morning to night to morning, in every sphere of life, for each man is responsible to God, and in some cases to his fellow men, from morning to night to morning, in every sphere of life. There is no neutral zone that is free from the requirements of God's law, no area of lawlessness. There can be conformity to the law of God or rebellion against it, but there can never be sheer lawlessness. The Bible speaks of “lawless” men, but it really means rebels against biblical law.

38. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 48.

39. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 3.

H. Multiple Hierarchies

The Protestants' most important contribution to the social theory of the West was their refinement of the Christian and medieval view of multiple sovereignties and therefore multiple hierarchies.⁴⁰ No man is an island. No man is solely responsible to any single institution, either. There is no divine right of kings, who owe allegiance only to God. There is no divine right of citizens, who owe allegiance only to God. There is no divine right of the free market. There is no divine right of any earthly institution. Each is under God; none is completely independent of all the others. This legal pluralism is one of the sources of Western liberty. But note: Western legal pluralism was not a self-conscious pluralism of law-orders (“polylegalism,” which is implicitly polytheistic), but a pluralism of human institutional sovereignties under a single law-order, God's law. The absolute sovereignty of any human institution is denied by such a doctrine. Church canon law broke decisively with any doctrine of the unitary state. As Rushdoony noted:

To understand the implications of canon law, it is necessary to realize that ancient society was unitary, and it had a single, visible, human sovereignty. It was totalitarian in practice and in faith. A visible “divine” authority governed the whole of life and admitted the existence of no independent order. For the ancient state, the uncontrolled was the enemy, and the controlled was the subject. Neither man nor any of his activities and institutions possessed any free, uncontrolled, or independent domain wherein the state had no jurisdiction. The sovereignty of the state meant that man was the creature of the state and entirely its subject.

40. On the multiplicity of legal jurisdictions in medieval legal theory after 1150, see Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), Pt. II. Berman wrote: “Perhaps the most distinctive characteristic of the Western legal tradition is the coexistence and competition within the same community of diverse jurisdictions and diverse legal systems. It is this plurality of jurisdictions and legal systems that makes the supremacy of law both necessary and possible. Legal pluralism originated in the differentiation of the ecclesiastical polity from secular polities. The church declared its freedom from secular control, its exclusive jurisdiction in some matters, and its concurrent jurisdiction in other matters” (p. 10).

But Biblical faith asserted instead the sovereignty of God and the ultimacy of His decree and law, so that man, the state, and every institution were under God and His law. Instead of the sovereign state providing the overall shelter for all things, the sovereign God is that over-lord, and all of man's institutions are directly under God and His word. Instead of a mediatorial state, Christ is man's mediator. The Bible provides a legal mandate for the institutions, and the state is made the ministry of justice, and the church the ministry of the word and the sacraments. The family is under God's law, as is agriculture, commerce, science, education, and all things else. Neither the church, nor the state, nor any other institution has a legitimate overall power of control. But the state in antiquity, and again today, has played the overall role of God, the sovereign over every realm and with basic and ultimate power over every realm. The state can permit or grant to its children or creatures certain privileges, but it cannot tolerate their denial of its sovereign authority. For the church therefore to issue canons placing Christians under the canons of Christ, under the laws of God, was a denial of the sovereignty of the state and of its canons. It was a shattering of the concept of the totalitarian unitary state.⁴¹

Harold Berman's brilliant and comprehensive history of medieval law concluded much the same concerning the role of canon law, although he did not discuss the theological foundations and implications in the same detail as Rushdoony did. He saw clearly the importance of legal pluralism in the development of Western liberty. "The pluralism of Western law, which has both reflected and reinforced the pluralism of Western political and economic life, has been, or once was, a source of development, or growth—legal growth as well as political and economic growth. It also has been, or once was, a source of freedom. A serf might run to the town court for protection against his master. A vassal might run to the king's court for protection against his lord. A cleric might run to the ecclesiastical court for protection against the king.”⁴²

41. R. J. Rushdoony, The Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House [1969] 1998), p. 110. (<http://bit.ly/rjrfs0>)

Let us consider an example of the legal operation of the principle of multiple sovereignties. A person is found to be an adulterer. This obviously has implications for family government. The authority structure of the family has been broken by the guilty individual. There are lawful ways of handling this problem, at the discretion of the injured party (Matt. 1:19). At the same time, adultery is a matter of church government. The church can bring discipline to the guilty party, by excommunication if necessary. The civil government is also involved. A civil covenant has been broken. The civil government, upon complaint of the injured partner, or on the complaint of citizens who discovered the crime, must step in and bring justice (Lev. 20:10). The penalty for adultery is death. There are legal questions that must be dealt with, questions of evidence. Any decision by any of the governmental units will also have economic implications: the dowry, the custody of the children (if the state fails to execute the guilty party), and so forth. Each of these sovereign agencies has limited but legitimate sovereignty. None is absolutely sovereign.

I. Moral Norms and Market Order

What I am describing is a decentralized social order. Even in the largest city, each man is to be under the rule of some local agencies of governments (plural). This brings to the forefront each man's personal responsibility before God. The law of God is able to provide the norms of righteousness in every sphere of life, since it provides the proper view of man, the responsible creature. We are not describing an autonomous social order, one in which there are no norms other than personal self-interest. Even the free market, which does function well in terms of personal self-interest among market participants, requires a moral foundation. Hayek admitted this, but no economist has defended more eloquently the necessity of moral norms—norms beyond mere market profitability—than Wilhelm Röpke. This is why he is such an important economist. The market system is based neither on violence nor on charity, Röpke argued, but it is never morally neutral. Without the bedrock of morality—essentially Christian morality—the free market cannot be sustained. Most remarkably, this economist even understood that the market is based on a creed.

42. Berman, Law and Revolution, p. 10.

It is certainly true that the competitive market system—the “business economy”—keeps itself at an equal distance from both the ethically negative system of violence or ruse and the ethically positive one of altruism and charity. It reduces both to the common level of a mild standard of commercial good behaviour, but it would be a great mistake to think that that would make the market system an ethically neutral sphere. On the contrary, it is a highly sensitive artefact of occidental civilization, with all the latter’s ingredients of Christian and pre-Christian morality and its secularized forms; and it should not be forgotten that the “economic man” of the classics was really an English gentleman of the eighteenth or nineteenth century, whose normal code was fixed by the church and by tradition. In fact, the market economy is an economic system which cannot exist without a minimum of mutual trust, confidence in the stability of the legal-institutional framework of the economic process (including money), contractual loyalty, honesty, fair play, professional honour, and that pride which considers it beneath one to cheat, bribe, or misuse the authority of the state for one’s own egoistic purposes. Above all, there must be a “creed” in the most general sense of the term, a belief in a definite scale of ultimate values giving sense and purpose to the ordinary doings of all participating in the economic process, and, finally, at least a provisional understanding of the meaning and working of this economic process.⁴³

The free market economy needs a creed—what Rushdoony called a foundation of social order—in order to be maintained by any society. If this creed is not based on an ethical code that is in conformity to the one presented by the Bible, the free market social order cannot survive. God removes the prosperity of that culture by removing the moral foundation of the market, namely, men’s faith in the legitimacy of the market process—a process that is sanctioned by orthodox Christian doctrine. Röpke warned: “Thus the market economy is living on certain psycho-moral reserves, which are taken for granted when everything is going well, and only reveal their supreme importance when they are giving out.”⁴⁴ That these “capital reserves” of morality are running out and not being replenished is increasingly obvious, and it was obvious to Röpke when he wrote this book in the early 1940s.

Röpke made another important point concerning the moral order undergirding the market. There is no doubt that the division of labor is basic to the market order, a point driven home graphically by Adam

43. Wilhelm Röpke, International Economic Disintegration (London: Hodge, [1942] 1950), pp. 68–69. (<http://bit.ly/wried>)

44. Ibid., p. 69.

Smith in his deservedly famous story of the pin-makers with which he begins Wealth of Nations (1776). But the division of labor is a fragile and therefore potentially dangerous feature of modern society. Each of us is dependent on one another's productivity.

We saw that an intensive economic intercourse, which involves a wide scale of division of labour and a high degree of mutual dependence of individuals, is possible only under a number of conditions, which all fall under the head of "socio-political" integration. It is this latter which, in the last resort, sets the limits to the extent and degree of economic integration. There must be a framework of institutions and of a strong legal order, and behind them, there must be a generally observed and undisputed code of moral norms and principles of behaviour. In this way, it is possible to have a society in which all its members may feel sheltered in an atmosphere of mutual confidence, security, and continuity. Only in this way is it possible to reduce and make bearable the enormous risks involved in a high degree of dependence, which is inevitably connected with the division of labour. Every page of economic history proclaims the truth of this statement, which is, indeed, the ultimate principle explaining the rise and decay, the expansion and contraction of economic organization.⁴⁵

If this economic division of labor collapses, which is possible in a program of price and wage controls—which Röpke called repressed inflation⁴⁶—the very survival of modern, industrialized populations is threatened.

Röpke saw what was coming: statism. Political centralization destroys the market. It destroys the whole concept of responsible personal self-government.

The wider the span of proletarianisation, the wilder become the cravings of the uprooted to be guaranteed social services and economic security by the state, the more do the few remaining in possession of a sense of responsibility despair, all the more stringently is the greater part of the national income claimed for and directed by the state; the more oppressive becomes the burden of taxation, a burden heavy enough already and one made all the worse through war, revolution, and public spending, and which will of course have to be extracted predominantly from the pockets of the middle classes. . . . There is no reason to foresee that this process is likely to stop, since this apparatus of insurance and social services is nothing other than a thirst-creating substitute for the anchor of property and can never lead to the real satisfaction of the needs of the unhappy victims of proletarianisation. The total burden will become ever more oppressive, the burden of taxation ever harder and more embittering, the apparatus ever more unwieldy, and the social bureaucracy ever more numerous. Any bits coming to the individual out of the national hotch-pot will become ever more subject to formulae, tickets, reportings on and off, income-tax forms, etc.; the hair-spring of a sense of responsibility cum self-respect which keeps the whole thing going will become ever weaker, the whole economic process will function more and more clumsily, its defects will increase and become ever more tiresome; all in all enough to increase the individual's sense of insecurity and also to put up his demands. The only possible end to all this would seem to be complete catastrophe for nation and society, nor need we go back for examples to the latter period of the Roman Empire.⁴⁷

45. Ibid., p. 72.

46. Röpke, Economics of the Free Society (Chicago: Regnery, 1963), p. 104.

He wrote this in the late 1940s, before the process of bureaucratization had fully accelerated. It was the same process that Max Weber had seen at the beginning of the twentieth century, except that Weber did not even have the hope of economic collapse as a possible way to escape what he called the bureaucratic cage.⁴⁸

J. Natural Law Theory vs. Biblical Law

In the history of Christian social theory, there has been continuing confusion concerning the relationship between biblical law and Greek and Roman natural law theory. Before drawing this chapter to a close, we need to review what the Bible says about law. Christian social theory has been compromised again and again in the past because of errors in thinking about Bible-revealed law and the various aspects of this revelation.

The biblical doctrine of the universality of God's law is not the same as the concept of natural law, a theory developed especially by Greek and Roman philosophers, which passed into Western history through the writings of medieval church scholars.⁴⁹ Natural law is based on the idea of man's universal reason. The minds of men supposedly have in common the powers of reasoning, thereby implying the existence of a universal human mind, and the logic of this universal mind could, if respected, bring all men everywhere to acknowledge identical fundamental principles of law.

47. Röpke, Civitas Humana: A Humane Order of Society (London: Hodge, 1948), pp. 141–42.

48. Gary North, "Max Weber: Rationalism, Irrationalism, and the Bureaucratic Cage," in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1976).

49. Archie P. Jones, "Natural Law and Christian Resistance to Tyranny," Christianity and Civilization, 2 (1983). (<http://bit.ly/CRtheology>)

Aristotle's analytic distinction between particular laws and general laws is an excellent example of natural law philosophy. It rests on a concept of human unity, implying shared viewpoints. "Now there are two kinds of laws, particular and general. By particular laws I mean those established by each people in reference to themselves, which again are divided into written and unwritten; by general laws I mean those based upon nature. In fact, there is a general idea of just and unjust in accordance with nature, as all men in manner divine, even if there is neither communication nor agreement between them."⁵⁰ Such a conception of natural law rests on the assumption of a universal human logic, the universal applicability in history of that logic, and the universal recognition of this logic and its universal applicability by all reasonable men. It assumes, in short, the neutrality of human thought.

1. The Myth of Neutrality

The Bible explicitly denies any such neutrality. Men are divided into saved and lost, keepers of God's covenant and breakers of God's covenant. There is no agreement between the two positions. There is such a thing as the work of the law of God which is written in every human heart—not the law itself, which is a special gift of God to His people (Heb. 8:8–11), but the work of the law (Rom. 2:14–15).⁵¹ Nevertheless, this law serves only to condemn men, for they will not abide by its provisions: "For there is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law: and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law" (Rom. 2:11–12). Human reason, unaided by God's revelation—untwisted by God's grace—cannot devise a universal law code based on any presumed universal human logic. What mankind's universal reason can do is to rebel against God and His law. Ethical rebels are not logically faithful to God.

Biblical law had to be read to everyone in Israel at least once every seven years (Deut. 31:10–13).⁵² God presumed that men would not understand His law unless they heard it (Deut. 31:13). Every resident of the land had to listen to this law. If the whole of biblical law had been ingrained into the consciences of all men from the beginning of time, or if the terms of the law, including the law's explicit penalties, were always available to all men through the exercise of man's universal reason, then the law would not have required the priests to read the Mosaic law before the congregation of Israel every seventh year.

50. Aristotle, Rhetoric, I, 1373b; from The Art of Rhetoric, trans. John Henry Freese (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1926).

51. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 2.

52. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuter-

In our day, why should Christians who have biblical law written in their heart (Heb. 8:9–11) still have to listen to the public teaching of this law? Because the implantation of biblical law at the time of a person's regeneration is definitive, not progressive, and certainly not final. Biblical law is implanted in the believer, but the old sin nature still wars against the law (Rom. 7). Thus, Christians also as sinners tend to hold back the truths of the law in unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18).⁵³ Nevertheless, the definitive implanting of biblical law in the hearts of the regenerate—a definitive event leading progressively through study and application to our final understanding of the law—is different from the work of the law which is in the heart of the unbeliever. What the unbeliever has in his heart is definitive rebellion, in Adam. As he progressively works out the implications of his faith, he loses sight of the work of the law. He works out progressively what is definitively inherited by him, namely, ethical rebellion.

The popularity of natural law concepts has been very great throughout the history of the church. By importing Greek and Roman concepts of natural law into church law, medieval theologians unknowingly mixed together two rival systems of thought. The Greek and Roman concept of natural law rested on the presupposition of man's autonomy. It rested on the presupposition of neutrality in human thought. The Bible recognizes the common heritage of the image of God in man, but it sees this image as twisted and perverse in rebellious man. Thus, the universality of men's perception of certain aspects of biblical law is a universality of condemnation. The Bible requires that we build the kingdom of God in terms of a different universality, the universality of the binding nature of biblical law. The whole of God's law is binding on individual men and corporate associations, not simply this or that dimly perceived, and improperly interpreted, aspect of God's law.

onomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 75.

53. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 1.

2. The Work of the Law

Romans 2:14–15 reads: “For when the Gentiles, which have not the law of God, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another.” John Murray’s extensive commentary on these verses is important in understanding what they do not mean, as well as what they do mean. Murray wrote:

“By nature” is contrasted with what is derived from external sources and refers to that which is engraven on our natural constitution. What is done “by nature” is done by native instinct or propensity, by spontaneous impulse as distinguished from what is induced by forces extraneous to ourselves. The things done by nature are said to be “the things of the law.” It is to be observed that the apostle does not say that they do or fulfil the law and he must have intentionally refrained from such an expression. “The things of the law” must mean certain things which the law prescribes and refer to those things practiced by pagans which are stipulated in the law, such as the pursuit of lawful vocations, the procreation of offspring, filial and natural affection, the care of the poor and sick, and numerous other natural virtues which are required by the law. In doing these things “by nature” they “are the law unto themselves.” This expression should not be understood in the sense of popular current use when we say that a man is a law to himself. It means almost the opposite, that they themselves, by reason of what is implanted in their nature, confront themselves with the law of God. They themselves reveal the law of God to themselves—their persons is the medium of revelation. . . . Hence with respect to those without specifically revealed law three things are true: (1) the law of God confronts them and registers itself in their consciousness by reason of what they natively and constitutionally are; (2) they do things which this law prescribes; (3) this doing is not by extraneous constraint but by natural impulse.⁵⁴

It is not a different law that confronts them in their heart, Murray says; it is not a rival law to the law delivered to God’s people through Moses. At the same time, “Paul does not say that the law is written upon their hearts. He refrains from this form of statement apparently for the same reason as in verse 14 he had said that the Gentiles ‘do the things of the law' and not that they did or fulfilled the law. Such expressions as 'fulfilling the law' and 'the law written upon the heart' are reserved for a state of heart and mind and will far beyond that predicated of unbelieving Gentiles."⁵⁵ So, the work of the law, or the things of the law, written in their hearts, is comprehensive enough to condemn them, but it is not the transforming reworking of the heart that the Bible refers to as regeneration.

54. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1964), I, pp. 73–74. A later edition in one volume replaced the two-volume edition.

There is no dominion apart from the categories of biblical law. All men are called to subdue the earth, and even rebellious men are sufficiently restrained by their own nature, in time and on earth, so that they might exercise dominion. God promised to drive the Canaanites out of the land slowly, so that the land might not revert to wilderness (Ex. 23:28–29). Better unregenerate man in control of Canaan than the wild beasts, God said. The unregenerate are given a restraining knowledge of the law, so that they might exercise dominion. When we find a culture that is in almost total rebellion against the work of the law, we find almost total impotence. Men cannot build societies by means of "natural" law.

Perhaps the clearest statement of the progressive separation of the righteous from the unrighteous over time was made by a character in C. S. Lewis' magnificent novel, That Hideous Strength. The character, Prof. Dimble, describes the effects of the development over time of both the Christian and non-Christian views. As time goes on, they become more and more self-consistent, and therefore less and less compatible. "If you dip into any college, or school, or parish, or family—anything you like—at a given point in its history, you always find that there was a time before that point when there was more elbow room, and contrasts weren't quite as sharp; and that there's going to be a time after that point when there is even less room for indecision, and choices are even more momentous. Good is always getting better, and bad is always getting worse: the possibilities of even apparent neutrality are always diminishing. The whole thing is sorting itself out all the time, coming to a point, getting sharper and harder."⁵⁶ The further in time we get from the garden of Eden, or from Noah's flood, or from the crucifixion, the less that rebellious men will acknowledge or adhere to the testimony of the work of the law written on their hearts. To appeal to natural law is to lean on a weak reed.

55. Ibid., I, pp. 74–75.

56. C. S. Lewis, That Hideous Strength: A Modern Fairy-Tale for Grown-Ups (New York: Macmillan, [1946] 1965), p. 283.

3. The Collapse of Natural Law Theory

In the latter decades of the twentieth century, the West experienced the long-term effects of a revolution that began in the Enlightenment and became institutionally inescapable with the outbreak of World War I. A crisis of confidence has appeared in the West that has undermined the West's confidence in its own legal institutions. Harold Berman's account of this erosion is masterful.

That the Western legal tradition, like Western civilization as a whole, is undergoing in the twentieth century a crisis greater than it has ever known before is not something that can be proved scientifically. It is something that is known, ultimately, by intuition. I can only testify, so to speak, that I sense that we are in the midst of an unprecedented crisis of legal values and of legal thought, in which our entire legal tradition is being challenged—not only the so-called liberal concepts of the past few hundred years, but the very structure of Western legality, which dates from the eleventh and twelfth centuries.

The crisis is being generated both from within Western experience and from without. From within, social and economic and political transformations of unprecedented magnitude have put a tremendous strain upon traditional legal institutions, legal values, and legal concepts in virtually all countries of the West. Yet in the past there have been periods of revolutionary upheaval which have also threatened to destroy basic elements of the Western legal tradition, and that tradition has nevertheless survived. What is new today is the challenge to the legal tradition as a whole, and not merely to particular elements or aspects of it; and this is manifested above all in the confrontation with non-Western civilizations and non-Western philosophies. In the past, Western man has confidently carried his law with him throughout the world. The world today, however, is suspicious—more, suspicious than ever before—of Western “legalism.” Eastern and Southern Man offer other alternatives. The West itself has come to doubt the universal validity of its traditional vision of law, especially its validity for non-Western cultures. Law that used to seem “natural” seems only “Western.” And many are saying that it is obsolete even for the West.⁵⁷

The acids of the West's own humanism and relativism have eroded the foundations of Western legality, which has been one of the chief pillars of Western civilization. If all cultures are equally valid, then their legal traditions are also equally valid as aspects of these competing cultures. Therefore, Hayek recommended that it would be morally wrong to revive a dying elderly Eskimo who has been left to perish in the snow by his peers, unless you are willing to put him in a new society. Otherwise, the Eskimos' legal order should be left alone.⁵⁸ Is it any wonder, then, that Hayek's eloquent plea for a nineteenth-century humanist version of the rule of law has failed to gain the commitment of scholars and social philosophers in the twentieth? His own twentieth-century relativism (implicit in nineteenth-century relativism) eroded his economic and legal prescriptions. Is it any wonder that his logical defense of the free market economy, which rests on the legal foundation of plural legal sovereignties, limited civil government, and equality before the law, has lost its appeal in this age of democratic centralism?

57. Berman, Law and Revolution, pp. 33–34.

Men seek a sovereignty greater than themselves, a sovereignty that can guarantee meaning to their lives and success in their many ventures. If God is not the source of law, and law is not universally valid because it is revealed, biblical law, then only a hypothetical universal power state remains to give man the sovereignty he seeks. If this also fails, then nothing remains to assure mankind that his works have meaning in time and on earth. Then the escapist religion leaves mankind with its only hope: mystical self-transcendence and flight from mundane reality.⁵⁹

The failure of the natural law doctrine was assured when men at last ceased to equate natural law with biblical law. When natural law was at last recognized as "natural" rather than revealed, autonomous rather than created, then it gained its universality only to the extent that mankind is seen as a true universal. But with the rise of relativism as an epistemological principle, the hoped-for unity of man collapsed. Now only power remains, not natural law. Now only the rise of a new source of unity, the world state, can guarantee man's legal order the unity it requires to maintain its claim to "naturalness." Natural law thereby ceases being natural. A universal law can only be imposed by the power state. To summarize: natural law theory abandoned reliance on the revealed law of the God of the Bible in order to assert its autonomy and universality, only to lose both its autonomy and natur-

58. F. A Hayek, Law, Legislation, and Liberty, 3 vols. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976), II, The Mirage of Social Justice, p. 27.

59. This was Max Weber's recommendation in his 1919 lecture, "Politics as a Vocation." (<http://bit.ly/mwpaav>) alness (self-attesting universal validity) to the new sovereignty of the power state.

4. The Primacy of Faith

Because different men and different nations are always in various stages of active rebellion against God—the active restraining of the truth of God that testifies to them in their own natures—we cannot hope to gain agreement about universal principles of law. It is not reason that opens the precepts of the law to rebellious men. They already have such precepts. Their consciences testify to them of the truth, but they restrain the truth, holding it back in unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18).⁶⁰ To believe that reason will reveal to men the universal principles of God's dominion covenant, which is also His treaty of unconditional surrender, is to believe that reason is untainted by the Fall of man. But reason has been as twisted by that ethical rebellion as surely as any other aspect of man's personality. To believe in natural law is to believe in natural reason; to believe in natural reason, or "reason rightly understood," is to believe in the primacy of the intellect.⁶¹ The Bible does not teach the primacy of the intellect; it teaches the primacy of faith.

When men say that "the Bible is not in contradiction to scientific truth," they generally mean that the Bible is not in opposition to the discoveries of the autonomous human intellect. This statement is absolutely false, if such a conclusion is intended. The Bible is opposed to such universally proclaimed "scientific truths" as evolution of one species into another through natural selection, or the eternity of matter-energy, or the doctrine of uniformitarian change. What a consistent Christian must maintain is this: "The Bible is the foundation for human reason, and no conclusion of the human mind which is in opposition to revealed truth in the Bible is scientifically valid." The truths of science, if they are to be accepted, must be in conformity to biblical revelation. There are not two truths—"natural science" and biblical revelation—but rather one truth: science in conformity to biblical revelation. What is true of natural science—the man-interpreted regularities of the observed universe—must also be true of man’s speculation in other areas of life.

60. On this active suppression of the truth, see Murray, Romans, pp. 36–37.

61. The rationalist apologetic methodology of "old Princeton" Seminary is representative of this error. Benjamin B. Warfield wrote of "irrational faith, that is, a faith without grounds in right reason." Warfield, "Introduction to Francis R. Beattie's Apologetics" (1903); reprinted in John E. Meeter (ed.), Selected Shorter Writings of Benjamin B. Warfield—II (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1973), p. 98. He implicitly contrasted such a faith with Christianity, which apparently is a faith which is grounded in "right reason." The problem, of course, is that nobody agrees about the content or standards of "right reason."

Christians should not say that “natural law” and biblical revelation are the same because the truths of human jurisprudence are “naturally” in conformity to biblical revelation. They should say, on the contrary, that the truths of human jurisprudence, insofar as they are true, are true in spite of man’s twisted, rebellious, “natural” reason. This is why the Bible required that Israel assemble once every seven years to listen to the reading of the law of God.

Conclusion

The doctrine of the rule of law is distinctly biblical in origin. A law-order that is universally binding on all men is an idea that had its origins in biblical religion. The same God who judges all men also puts all men under the terms of biblical law. The God who made Adam also made all men responsible to Him through Adam. Thus, when the Hebrews placed foreign residents under both the restraints of biblical law and the benefits of biblical law, they made a fundamental break with paganism. Natural law theory, which was later paganism’s attempt to appropriate the universalism of biblical law, was adopted by the West through the influence of church canon law and other remnants of Hebrew law.

Some fundamental aspects of the rule of law are these:

1. A common set of moral requirements
2. Public proclamation of the law
3. Universal application of these standards
4. Equality before the law (no respecting of persons)

In short, the law is to be predictable and universal. Civil law as it applies to citizens in their daily activities is to be sufficiently simple so that the vast majority of men can understand its general principles and its specific applications (case laws). This is not to deny that specialized applications of biblical law principles are never going to be complex. But those who work in specialized areas of society are to be aware of these specialized applications. It may be that a “jury of one’s peers,” or at least a portion of the jury’s membership, should be composed of people selected randomly from a group of specialists in the particular sphere or calling of the litigants. The crucial issue is legal predictability, not the technicalities of the law. In short, men are to have reasonable expectations concerning the decisions of judges and juries in specific legal conflicts. Most important, men must have confidence in the integrity of the law itself, and not just the institutional agencies of law enforcement, for without confidence in the law itself, men will not believe that their day-by-day adherence to the law is related directly to external benefits, both individual and social. They will lose the major incentive of self-government under law.

Without the rule of law, capitalism could never have developed. It developed in the West precisely because Christianity was the religion of the West. As Christianity's influence has waned, especially in the last hundred years, capitalism has been challenged by increasingly hostile socialist critics. Formal legal predictability, the bedrock of a free market social order, has been abandoned by the intellectuals and the voters. The predictable "rules of the game" that govern capitalism are no longer respected by expansionist civil governments that are propelled by the politics of envy.

J. R. Lucas commented on the relationship between atheism and state-worship: "In an age in which many people find it hard to believe in God, there is a strong tendency to worship the state—or society—as a God-substitute and to refer all our demands and duties to it alone, and then the demand for distributive justice will manifest totalitarian tendencies. The mistake lies in thinking too much of the state, not in seeking justice in our dealings with our fellow man."⁶² As faith in God's law has declined along the greased skids of human autonomy—from Roman law to canon law, to scholastic natural law, to Deism's natural law, and then to the positive law of the state—the state has become increasingly dominant.

Pluralism of the law is the great threat to Western society. What was plural in the Western legal tradition was not the law-order itself, but rather the legal order—the institutions and spheres of application of a universal law-order. It was not the law-order that was plural, but the enforcement mechanisms in the various social and institutional spheres. What is today destroying the Western legal tradition is the pluralism of religious humanism—a pluralism of law-orders. This points to a pluralism of gods, or rather the absence of anyone God as 62. J. R. Lucas, "Liberty, Morality, and Justice," in Robert L. Cunningham (ed.), Liberty and the Rule on Law (College Station, Texas: Texas A&M University Press, 1979), p. 148.

Creator and Guarantor of a single law-order. Men now seek to create a new unified law-order that will testify to a new god. This new god is the same old god of the satanic temptation: the power state, the highest and most powerful representative of the sovereign god of humanism, collective mankind.

The rise of arbitrary government, with its punitive legislation against profits, now threatens the West with a return to pagan barbarism. This was the lesson of the Hebrews in Egypt. It also became the lesson of twentieth-century administrative law, administered by bureaucracies. We must take seriously Berman's warning.

The crisis of the Western legal tradition is not merely a crisis in legal philosophy but also a crisis in law itself. Legal philosophers have always debated, and presumably always will debate, whether law is founded in reason and morality or whether it is only the will of the political ruler. It is not necessary to resolve that debate in order to conclude that as a matter of historical fact the legal systems of all the nations that are heirs to the Western legal tradition have been rooted in certain beliefs or postulates: that is, the legal systems themselves have presupposed the validity of those beliefs. Today those beliefs or postulates—such as the structural integrity of the law, its ongoingness, its religious roots, its transcendent qualities—are rapidly disappearing, not only from the minds of philosophers, not only from the minds of lawmakers, judges, lawyers, law teachers, and other members of the legal profession, but from the consciousness of the vast majority of citizens, the people as a whole; and more than that, they are disappearing from the law itself. The law is becoming more fragmented, more subjective, geared more to expediency and less to morality, concerned more with immediate consequences and less with consistency and continuity. Thus the historical soil of the Western legal tradition is being washed away in the twentieth century, and the tradition itself is threatened with collapse.

The breakdown of the Western legal tradition springs only in part from the socialist revolutions that were inaugurated in Russia in October 1917 and that have gradually spread throughout the West (and throughout other parts of the world as well), albeit often in relatively mild forms. It springs only in part from massive state intervention in the economy of the nation (the welfare state), and only in part from the massive bureaucratization of social and economic life through huge centralized corporate entities (the corporate state). It springs much more from the crisis of Western civilization itself, commencing in 1914 with the outbreak of World War 1. This was more than an economic and technological revolution, more even than a political revolution. If it had not been, Western society would be able to adapt its legal institutions to meet the new demands placed upon them, as it has done in revolutionary situations in the past. Western society would be able to accommodate socialism—of whatever variety—within its legal tradition. But the disintegration of the very foundations of that tradition cannot be accommodated; and the greatest challenge to those foundations is the massive loss of confidence in the West itself, as a civilization, a community, and in the legal tradition which for nine centuries has helped to sustain it.⁶³

The age-old debate among legal scholars that he mentions—whether reason and morality are the source of law, or the ruler—is answered by the Bible. God is the Ruler and therefore the source of both reason and morality. Both morality and the law-order are harmonious and self-reinforcing, because they are both created by God and under God. Because men as philosophers, moralists, and political rulers are in the image of God, their thoughts and acts reflect the God who made them. They may deviate from His thoughts and laws, for they are in various degrees ethical rebels, but man's law-order can never wholly escape God's ultimate standards. God is absolutely sovereign; reason, morality, and kings are only derivatively sovereign.

Christians should also respond to the crisis of Western law with the answers that Berman is unwilling to call for: the restoration of Christianity as the foundation of Western religion, the restoration of this religion as the foundation of morality and reason, and the establishment of biblical law rather than the restoration of natural law theory as the foundation of social order. Nothing else will revive the West. A true religious revival—a comprehensive revival that restructures every human institution in terms of biblical law—alone can establish the West's foundations of long-term social and legal order. A true revival alone can re-establish the long-term institutional foundations of the free market economy.

63. Berman, Law and Revolution, pp. 39–40.

15

THE FIRSTBORN OFFERING

The LORD spake unto Moses, saying, Sanctify unto me all the first-born, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast: it is mine (Ex. 13:1–2).

The theocentric principle here is God's absolute ownership of all things (Ps. 24:1).¹

A. The Symbolism

God set apart ritually the firstborn males of Israel. It was a symbol to the people of Israel of the sovereignty of God. Each family had to regard the precious firstborn son as God's property. "For all of the first-born of the children of Israel are mine, both man and beast: on the day that I smote every firstborn in the land of Egypt I sanctified them for myself" (Num. 8:17). God set them apart—sanctified them—as His special possession.

The symbolism of the firstborn is important in the Bible. Adam was God's created firstborn son (Luke 3:38), and Adam was created to serve God as God's assistant in charge of the earth. Adam's rebellion called forth God's grace in sending Jesus Christ, the second Adam (I Cor. 15:45). Jesus Christ was more than a created firstborn Son; He was the only begotten Son of God, the second Person of the Trinity (John 1:14, 18; Acts 13:33). This only begotten Son was set aside by God as a living, literal sacrifice to God—the second sacrifice that forever removed the first sacrifices (Heb. 10:9)—so that God's people might not taste the second death (Rev. 20:14–15).

The sacrifices of the Old Testament looked forward to Christ's final sacrifice. The owner of the pregnant beast could not profit from the potential productivity of the first male offspring. "All the firstling males that come of thy herd and of thy flock thou shalt sanctify unto the LORD thy God: thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, nor shear the firstling of thy sheep” (Deut. 15:19).² The animal belonged to God. To use a modern phrase, “God took His cut (percentage) off the top.” He received an immediate payment; the owner had to wait until the birth of the second male to reap his profit.

1. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 5.

“The firstborn of thy sons shalt thou give unto me. Likewise shalt thou do with thine oxen, and with thy sheep: seven days it shall be with his dam; on the eighth day thou shalt give it me” (Ex. 22:29b–30). The firstborn male animal was separated from its mother and was eventually sacrificed in Jerusalem; the newborn son was circumcised (Lev. 12:3). In the case of all sons, circumcision was required, but the eighth day was significant. It marked the sign of God’s wrath on all male flesh, the result of Adam’s rebellion. It pointed to man’s rebellion against God on the seventh day, God’s day of rest, and testified to the need of restoration—a new week in which man might reconstruct a fallen order, under God. When man struck out on his own, as a self-professed autonomous being, inaugurating “man’s week,” God cut him off from the garden and from the tree of life. We are not specifically told in the Bible that Adam rebelled on the seventh day of creation, but it seems likely. That day was to have been a day of communion with God, a day that established Adam’s covenantal commitment and religious perspective.³

There is an apparent problem with the thesis of a seventh-day rebellion. Israel’s bloody sacrifice of circumcision was performed on the eighth day. Also, the separation of firstborn male animals from their mothers in preparation for their slaughter (or their redemption) took place on the eighth day. The sorrow of the mothers on the eighth day seems to parallel the sorrow of women in childbirth (Gen. 3:16). (Female mammals suffer similar travails when giving birth, though the Bible does not record a specific curse on them by God.) Problem: If the judgment on Eve came on the seventh day because of her sin on that day, why was the eighth day the day of sorrow for mothers in Israel? Don’t the eighth-day sacrifices point to an eighth-day rebellion—the day after the first sabbath? I deal with this problem below (“Christ, the Firstfruits”).

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 38.

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 6.

B. The Economic Cost of Sacrifice

In the case of sacrificial animals (ox, sheep, goat), redemption was forbidden (Num. 18:17), so the loss of the firstborn male animal was irrevocable. It was a total loss for both its mother and the human owner. It symbolized the total extent of God's wrath against sin. The animal was forever lost; so was the time it had taken to breed the mother and care for her during her pregnancy. By sacrificing the firstborn male animals, the Israelites were admitting that they and all that they possessed were under the threat of judgment, and that only by conforming to the terms of God's covenant could they escape God's total cutting off of man and his works. Apart from God's grace, man's covenantal rebellion brings permanent destruction. Egypt learned this on the night of the Passover meal.

Even an animal that was not allowed on God's altar had to die or obtain a substitute. "And every firstling, of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb; and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break his neck: and all the firstborn of man among thy children shalt thou redeem" (Ex. 13:13; cf. Num. 18:15–17). Just because a profitable donkey could not be sacrificed on the altar, the Israelites were not entitled to make use of it free of charge, as if it were not the Lord's. Either it died away from the altar or a lamb died before the altar. If the lamb was perceived by its owner to be of greater value, then he was allowed to execute the donkey. He could not reap the income available from a firstborn male without sacrificing something of comparable value. He did have some discretion, however. If donkeys were in high demand, and sheep were in relatively low demand, or vice versa, he had his choice. The Bible does not teach a doctrine of fixed or intrinsic market value. It does not teach that a donkey's market price is always equal to a lamb's during the first week of its life. The possibility of wide variations in market prices between the two firstborn animals was always present. The owner made his choice. The animals were symbolically equivalent, but not equal in market value.

It should be obvious, however, that permanent large price discrepancies would have been unlikely. If one or the other firstborn animal was highly valued, men would have begun to slay the other, which would have reduced the supply of the less valuable species. An increased supply of lambs in relation to donkeys, because men were choosing to break the necks of donkeys, would have tended to increase the price of donkeys relative to lambs. Owners would then have had an economic incentive to spare some donkeys and slay more lambs. Each species had a built-in economic protection from excessive losses.

The priests received the burnt offerings. Since they lived in Jerusalem, the animals set aside (removed from their dams) had to be brought to Jerusalem (Deut. 12:6). This indicates that on the eighth day the sacrificial animal was not immediately sacrificed by the father in the household, but set apart—sanctified, in other words—for God. When the family journeyed to Jerusalem for the Passover or other visits, it carried the animal, or its substitute, or its money payment. In the meantime, the beast could not be used for profit (Deut. 15:19). The formal or symbolic separation from the mother took place on the eighth day; to keep it alive, it would have been necessary to let it continue to nurse. This was the case in the dedication of Samuel by Hannah (I Sam. 1:11, 22–23). Perhaps the family devised some mechanical means to feed the newborn animals during the waiting period between the separation and the sacrifice or the redemption.

The firstborn male in each family had to be redeemed by means of a payment to the priests. The family had to pay five shekels (Num. 18:16). This was done one month after the birth of the child. The same payment could be made to save the life of an unclean beast (Num. 18:15). Possibly only the donkey had to be redeemed by means of a lamb; other unclean animals were purchased with money from death, although it may have been that all animals were redeemed with lambs.⁴ The firstborn of cows, sheep, and goats had to die (Num. 18:17).

The language of the firstborn indicates that the firstborn son of every Hebrew family had to be dedicated to God for service. God made the following arrangement: “Take the Levites instead of all the firstborn among the children of Israel, and the cattle of the Levites instead of their cattle; and the Levites shall be mine: I am the LORD” (Num. 3:45). Families then made payment to the Aaronical priesthood instead of dedicating their own firstborn sons (Num. 3:48, 51). At the time of the segregation of the Levitical priesthood, each family with a firstborn son made this initial payment (Num. 3:46–47). From that time on, the payment for firstborn sons went to Aaron’s house.

Egypt had chosen not to substitute the blood offering required by

4. James Jordan suggested that all unclean beasts were “redeemed” by lambs, while humans were redeemed with silver. He cites I Peter 1:18–19: “Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot.”

God to serve as a substitute payment. The firstborn sons of Egypt died. There is no escape from this required sacrifice. God shows mercy to the sons of Adam for the sake of Christ's sacrifice as God's firstborn, the high priest, the one set apart by God to become the firstborn offering.

C. Christ, the Firstfruits

Jesus rose from the dead on the day after the Passover sabbath. It was the first day of the week (Luke 24:1). This day was also the day of the firstfruits offering, the day the lamb of the firstfruits was to be sacrificed (Lev. 23:12). Paul refers to "Christ the firstfruits" (I Cor. 15:23). I argued in the first edition of The Dominion Covenant: Genesis that this firstfruits offering was made on the eighth day (the day after the seventh day), and it covered the sin of Adam, who probably rebelled on the eighth day after God began His work of creation, meaning the day after the sabbath.⁵ I have been persuaded by James Jordan that this explanation needs modification. Adam probably rebelled on the first full day of life, the sabbath. God covered him with the skins of animals on that day, which meant that blood was shed. What about the shedding of blood of the Hebrew male in circumcision on the eighth day (Lev. 12:3), and the separation of the firstborn male from its mother on the eighth day (Ex. 22:30)? Why was this required on the eighth day, if the symbolic ethical covering (animal skins) had been provided by God in the garden on the seventh day, assuming that Jordan is correct concerning Adam's seventh-day rebellion? Jordan argued that the eighth-day rites pointed to the need for a new creation, a coming ethical transformation that would inaugurate a new kingdom and a new dominion. Adam's sin had polluted the sabbath. It had polluted the first day of man's week, a day that is supposed to prepare us for six days of service in the kingdom. This was the day on which he was to have received his marching orders in preparation for his work week. What mankind needed after Adam's rebellion was a new day, a cleansed day, for a new beginning.

"Christ the firstfruits" was resurrected on the eighth day (the day following the sabbath) to inaugurate the new week of redeemed humanity, beginning with a new day of rest. This was the long-expected culmination of the rites of circumcision and firstborn sacrifice, the necessary substitute payment for the sin of Adam, but timed so as to point to a new creation. Christ's resurrection proved that His sacrifice on the cross was sufficient to atone for men's sins, so the Old Testament's annual sacrifices, the circumcisions, and the firstborn sacrifices are no longer necessary (Heb. 7:26–28).

5. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 6:D.

The Book of Nehemiah explicitly links together the firstfruits of the ground, the trees, the dough, the wine, and the firstborn of sons and animals (Neh. 10:35–37). Christ can be seen as both the firstfruits and firstborn offerings. He is the firstborn and only begotten Son of God. His resurrection proves that firstborn sons no longer need to die, that firstborn animals no longer need to be sacrificed, and that firstborn sons no longer need to be circumcised the eighth day. "For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love" (Gal. 5:6). Christ's victory on the eighth day has overcome the need for sacrifices on the eighth day.

Christ's sacrifice transfers capital back to man. No longer are men required to sacrifice the firstborn animals of their flocks. No longer must they journey to Jerusalem to present their sacrificial animals. No longer are the "mothers in Israel" saddened on the eighth day by the loss of their firstborn males (animals) or the marring of their sons' flesh. No longer are fathers required to pay five shekels upon the birth of the first son. Family capital is thereby increased by Christ's sacrifice. Men paid token prices to a holy God in Old Testament times, only because God honored the incomparably costly future sacrifice of His Son. Now, even those token payments have been abrogated. Redeemed men keep their lives and their capital, for God's Son lost both His life and His capital at the cross. Not even a cloak to cover His nakedness was held back by Christ (Matt. 27:35). It cost Christ every earthly possession, including His modesty. His people are the immediate beneficiaries, for they retain a greater portion of their capital than they did before the cross. Our dominion tasks are made less onerous, and our celebrations become that much more splendid, as a result of this New Testament transfer of capital back to His people. The resurrection lightened the financial burdens of His people, forever. The restraints imposed on the outworking of the dominion covenant in the Old Testament have been removed with the coming of the Holy Spirit and the establishment of a new covenant. A righteous culture is now possible. Like the child/slave who matures into an adult (Gal. 4), we no longer suffer the dominical restraints of the ceremonial aspects of the law.

Conclusion

Christ's death and resurrection in principle erased our guilt and our obligation to offer blood sacrifices. It healed the rebellious hearts of God's adopted sons, allowing them to participate in redeemed man's week, which begins with man's rest, because Christ's sacrifice is now behind us chronologically. Thus the Lord's day has been moved to the eighth day, so that the first day of man's week is, as it was in the garden, a day of rest. Redeemed men announce their dependence on God by beginning their work week with rest, a statement of their complete dependence on God's grace and blessings—a ritual declaration of their having abandoned autonomous man's week, which allows no cost-free rest for man. Christians announce their reliance on the work of the second Adam, Jesus Christ, thereby renouncing their reliance on their own efforts, as sons of the first Adam. God restores their capital to them by reducing their former obligation to pay in blood on the eighth day. We rest now, and we have increased wealth to show for it. Let the fathers rejoice, and let all mothers rejoice, too. The blood no longer flows in the new covenant Israel.

16

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF SLAVERY

Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, saying, Let us alone, that we may serve the Egyptians? For it had been better for us to serve the Egyptians, than that we should die in the wilderness (Ex. 14:12).

The theocentric principle here is God's patience with repeated rebellion and loss of faith on the part of covenant-keepers.

A. The Day of Release

The day of the Lord had come to Israel, the long-awaited day of release from bondage. God had manifested His power in a series of mighty acts, culminating in the death of the firstborn of Egypt. If ever there was going to be a day of release, this was it. Remaining in bondage for "a better day to flee, a more opportune moment to escape" would have been preposterous. Pharaoh's will to resist their departure had been temporarily overcome. The Egyptians had encouraged their rapid departure. God had opened the way of escape to them, and the Egyptians had literally pushed them out of the land, paying them to depart.

All the same, neither Pharaoh nor the Israelites had escaped from their basic outlooks. Pharaoh had temporarily capitulated to the demands of Moses. The Israelites had temporarily taken heart at God's mighty acts, and they had even dared to demand restitution (spoils) from their Egyptian captors. But Pharaoh was a self-proclaimed divine monarch, theoretically sovereign over all Egypt, and the Hebrews had been his slaves. The Hebrews were convinced that their position as servants in the land was permanent. They had been slaves in body, and their responses to Moses, time after time, were the responses of people who were also slaves in their souls.

Pharaoh soon became convinced that he had made a mistake in allowing them to leave (Ex. 14:5), and the Hebrews soon became convinced that they had made a mistake in listening to Moses and leaving. The Hebrews could not forget the earthly power of their former master; they seemed unable to acknowledge the awesome power of their new master, Jehovah. Their cry went up to Moses: better to have served as earthly slaves in Egypt than to bear the visible risks and burdens of freedom under God. Neither the Hebrews nor Pharaoh wanted to admit that God does not call His people to be perpetual slaves in body, and that they are never to become slaves of men in spirit. Neither Pharaoh nor the Hebrews could admit that “where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty” (II Cor. 3:17b).

The Bible contrasts two sorts of servitude: slavery to the earthly life and its sinful perspectives, on the one hand, and slavery to God, whose “yoke is easy” and whose “burden is light” (Matt. 11:30), on the other. Slaves unto life or slaves unto death: men cannot escape from subordination. Hierarchy is built into the dominion covenant that defines mankind. Satan lures people to believe that they can achieve freedom from all subordination by asserting their own autonomy and sovereignty—in short, to be as God. The result is temporal ethical subordination to Satan, and eternal judgmental subordination to God. When God’s hand is lowered in judgment on a civilization, ethical subordination to Satan also means destruction, in time and on earth.

God recognized the weakness of these newly freed slaves. When it came time for them to depart from Egypt, He led them east to the Red Sea. Had they gone in a northeast direction, they would have had to pass through the land of the Philistines, although geographically speaking, it would have been a shorter route into Canaan. But God recognized their weakness; they were not ready for a direct military confrontation (Ex. 13:17–18). They might have returned to Egypt had they been challenged from the front. They were being driven from the rear, at first by the Egyptians who implored them to depart, and then by the attacking army of Pharaoh.

This pressure from the rear was accompanied by God’s pillar of fire and cloud in front of them (Ex. 13:21–22). They looked forward toward the manifestation of God which preceded them, despite the fact that their major motivation was rearward. If they were to flee, they had to march forward. They became used to following God’s theophany, the fire and the cloud.

Psychologically, they were still slaves of Egypt, always tempted to look backward at their former home and former masters, but because they had been ejected, they were forced to pay attention to the leadership of God. Psychologically speaking, they were marching out of Egypt more than they were marching toward Canaan. But the discipline of marching was basic to their training: a means of transforming their vision and motivation. (Marching is a universally recognized means of training military recruits.) The King James Version says that they went up “harnessed” out of the land of Egypt, but a better translation is provided by the Berkeley Version: “In martial order the Israelites went up out of the land of Egypt” (Ex. 13:18b). Cassuto translated it: “in orderly array.”¹ James Jordan comments: “When Israel marched out of Egypt, she marched five in a rank. The term translated ‘battle array’ in Exodus 13:18 actually means ‘five in a rank’ (cf. also Josh. 1:14; 4:12; Jud. 7:11; Num. 32:17).”² God was treating them as recruits are treated in basic training: marching them in an orderly fashion, under the leadership of a drill instructor. They were to learn the art of war through the discipline of enforced marching, visible leadership, and a carefully staged “obstacle course.” That obstacle course was the Red Sea. Later, their obstacle course was the wilderness.

B. Three Types of Slavery

Earthly slavery, as manifested clearly in the history of the exodus, involves at least three factors: slavery to food, slavery to the past, and slavery to the present. The Hebrews cursed Moses, for he had served them as a deliverer. He had enabled them to cast off the chains of bondage. They looked to the uncertainty that lay before them (the Red Sea) and the chariots behind them, and they wailed. They had lost what they regarded as external security in Egypt, a welfare state existence, and they resented Moses’ leadership. They had no confidence in God and God’s promised future. Looking resolutely over their shoulders, they stumbled at the very border of freedom, the Red Sea. Fearing death in freedom, this generation died in the wilderness. Better to serve in Egypt than die in the desert, they proclaimed. God then proved to all but Caleb and Joshua, who never believed in this slave slogan, that it was much better to die in the wilderness than to serve in Egypt. Best of all, God showed the next generation, was the conquest of Canaan. But the Israelites of Moses’ day could not see that far into the future; they saw only the past and the present—a present bounded, they believed, by Pharaoh's army and the Red Sea. What they saw as the end of their lives was in fact only an obstacle course.

1. U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus, trans. Israel Abrahams (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, Hebrew University, [1951] 1974), pp. 156–57.

2. James Jordan, The Geneva Papers, No. 25 (Feb. 1984), [p. 3].

1. Slaves to Food

Once they had been delivered from their Egyptian enemies, they were determined to keep their heads riveted to the rear anyway. They were stiffnecked indeed. No longer able to hear the rumble of Egyptian chariots, they were deafened by the rumbling of their stomachs. Better to have died in Egypt, they complained, "when we did eat bread to the full," than to die in the wilderness (Ex. 16:3). They had short memories about their former condition. So, the Lord gave them manna. "Not good enough," came the cries. "We need meat. In Egypt, we had garlic and onions and leeks and melons. Mere manna, even if accompanied by liberty, can hardly compare." So, God gave them meat for a month—so much, He promised them, that it would come out of their nostrils, and they would loathe it (Num. 11:4–6, 18–21).

Their problem was not a protein deficiency. Their problem was a theological deficiency. Their god was their belly (Phil. 3:19). Their stiff necks did not permit them to look up to the heavens and rejoice in the source of their manna.

The fact that man needs food in order to live indicates that he is a creature. Ascetic fasting, designed to free the individual from his dependence on food, is simply one more example of man's blasphemous move to transcend his creaturehood.³ Food and drink in Scripture, from Eden to the New Jerusalem, signify man's dependence on God, the Source of all life. Thus, the mere fact that Israel needed food, and that they asked Moses and God for it, was not sinful in itself, and might otherwise have been an act of faith. What is clear, however, is that they did not see food as a gift of God, and its lack as a token of God's displeasure; rather, they saw food as a thing in itself. Their affections were placed preeminently on the creature, not the Creator. Satisfaction of physical hunger was more important to them than the obtaining of spiritual and eternal life from the life-giver. Repeatedly God withheld food from them. Repeatedly they did not ask for food in faith. Repeatedly they complained against God and Moses, and expressed a preference for Egypt. They never got the message.

3. Several examples of mystics who live virtually without food are offered in Paramhansa Yogananda's popular book, The Autobiography of a Yogi (Los Angeles: Self-Realization Fellowship, [1946] 1971). The most impressive is the case of Roman Catholic mystic and stigmatic Therese Neumann of Konnersreuth: pp. 367–75. Yogananda cited other books about her: Therese Neumann: A Stigmatist of Our Day and Further Chronicles of Therese Neumann, by Friederich Ritter von Lama, and A. P. Schimberg's The Story of Therese Neumann, all published by the Bruce Publishing Co. of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; cf. Johannes Steiner, Therese Neumann (Staten Island, New York: Alba House).

Manna was a special kind of food. It was provided for them supernaturally. It was scheduled to appear predictably. It was also exceedingly plain—the kind of food that is provided to an army in the field. In World War II, the United States Army's all-to-familiar canned C-rations became the objects of scorn and jokes, just so long as they were delivered on time. The U.S. Army was the best-fed army in history up to that time, but the boring food, especially the canned food that was the common fare when men were in the battlefield, was resented by the troops, unless a crisis occurred which cut them off from new supplies.⁴ Israel resented manna, for the Israelites did not see themselves as an army on a battlefield. Their memories of special occasional meals in Egypt chased away their memories of bondage. They had developed a taste for slavery, literally.

2. Slaves to the Past

How could they have forgotten the grinding bondage of their former state? Could they learn nothing from history? In a word, no. Historiography is an intellectual reconstruction that man attempts, and he hopes that his reconstruction resembles the actual events of the past. But, being an intellectual reconstruction, it is dependent upon a philosophical foundation for accurate interpretation. The events of history teach nothing to those who are blind to God's sovereignty over these events. Or more accurately, their interpretation teaches something that is inaccurate.⁵

The Israelites told Moses that death in Egypt would have been preferable to the responsibilities of godly liberty. The pain of dying would have been over by now, they complained. Wouldn't the graves of Egypt have been preferable (Ex. 14:11)? They faced the responsibilities of life, and they grumbled. They were blinded by a false vision of the past. They preferred to live in terms of historical fantasy rather than face the realities of life. They preferred to remember their bondage in Egypt as a golden age by comparison, thereby trading the opportunities of the present for the imaginary comforts of the past. Is it any wonder that God imposed upon them the ritual observance of the Passover? Mouthing words that they did not really understand, the fathers of that generation transmitted a true vision of the past to their children. The mandatory bitter herbs were educational.

4. The United States soldier was also the most heavily laden foot soldier in history: 84 pounds of equipment. William Manchester, The Glory and the Dream (Boston: Little, Brown, 1974), p. 281.

5. C. Gregg Singer, "The Problem of Historical Interpretation," in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976), ch. 4.

3. Slaves to the Present

The laws of the Old Testament recognized the existence of psychological slavery. Restrictions were placed on the administration of that institution. The case laws of the Old Testament begin with the laws of slavery (Ex. 21). Slavery was never intended to be normative for the people of God. Debtors who sold themselves into slavery went free in the seventh (sabbatical) year (Deut. 15:2).⁶ Criminals who went into slavery to payoff the restitution payment owed to the victim could be kept in slavery until the debt was finally paid,⁷ but criminal acts were not considered normative for Israel. It took a special vow, marked by a hole punched in the slave's ear, to place a man in voluntary lifetime slavery (Ex. 21:5–6). The biblical injunction regarding slavery is seen in Paul's assertion that a godly man should accept an offer of freedom from his master (I Cor. 7:21–22).⁸ The exercise of godly dominion under God is made more effective by widespread personal freedom.

There is little doubt that the affairs of this life are burdensome. If getting out of life's burdens were the essence of human life, then death would be preferable to life. Paul recognized this fact even more clearly than the murmuring Hebrews did. Yet he made it clear that the present responsibilities of godly service were more important than his desire to depart from the body to be with Christ (Phil. 1:22–26). As a free man, Paul saw the burdens of the present as an opportunity. He was to serve God as an instrument for the extension of God's kingdom. He did not think it proper to escape prematurely from this earthly service in order to enjoy heaven's rest.

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

7. James Jordan, Slavery in Biblical Perspective (Master's Thesis, Westminster Theological Seminary, 1980), p. 80.

8 Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

C. Slaves to the Future

The Bible tells us that we are to be slaves to the future. Life, despite its petty burdens, is a resource. Free men are not chained to life; they are users of it. Servants of a sovereign God are to be free men, and free men use life as a means of attaining long-run victory, both personally and covenantally, in the final day, and also in time and on earth. Life is like a high-powered rifle that is painful to fire because of the recoil. In the hands of God's servant, life has a specific purpose. It is an instrument of victory. However painful it may be to fire, the godly man knows that it is much more painful for those on the "receiving end." Better to suffer the pain of a recoiling rifle than its projectile. Our task is to aim the weapon and pull the trigger. God will heal our bruised shoulders just as surely as he will guide the bullets to their predestined targets.

To the victors go the spoils. The Hebrews of Moses' day should have learned this on the night of the exodus. Joshua and Caleb learned this lesson well. Their contemporaries were overtaken in the wilderness by death, the event they had feared most, for their fear of the present had blinded their vision of the spoils of Canaan which lay ahead.

Future-orientation marks the free man's perspective. He makes decisions in terms of the future, has confidence in the future, and can happily sacrifice present income for increased income in the future. As a responsible agent in God's kingdom, the redeemed man is motivated more by future successes than by present enjoyments. The uncertainties of life are less of a threat to him than the certainties of the welfare state and slavery. To remain in bondage to Satan, whose destruction in the future is sure, is to remain earth-bound, and ultimately present-bound psychologically. A future-oriented man or culture is operating in terms of a perspective which is innately biblical, for it is Satan's goal to squander his assets in the present, given his inevitable defeat in the future. It is Satan who revels in the present, dreaming of his triumphs in the past. He shudders at his prospects for the future.

Joseph's bondage was external, not mental. The same was true of the three young Hebrews in the court of Nebuchadnezzar. Daniel was a captive, but he continued to wind up in positions of authority. Again and again, external bondage became a training ground for external victory, precisely because the bondage was merely external rather than psychological. Psychological bondage, a reflection of spiritual bondage to sin, is a more powerful form of bondage than physical bondage.

Conclusion

The Hebrews of Moses' day had become slaves psychologically because they had become slaves to sin and slaves to a false religion, the escapist religion. Having abandoned hope in the future, they clung mentally to the past. They hoped continually to return to the bondage of the past in order to escape the burdens of the present.

Joshua and Caleb also resented the burdens of the present, but their focus was the promised victory in Canaan. Their chief burden in the present was the past-orientation of their fellow Hebrews. They had to wait for God to leave that generation in the dust of the wilderness before they could begin to organize the victory of the future. They had learned the lesson of the Red Sea. They had no desire to hear God's words again, the words He had spoken to Moses: "And the LORD said unto Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward" (Ex. 14:15). But their contemporaries never learned that lesson, even after the army of their former masters had perished in the waters. As psychological slaves, they resisted unto the end God's call for them to go forward. The best they could manage was wandering around in a 40-year circle.

We need to recognize the extraordinary power of the psychology of slavery. For at least 80 years, the Hebrews in Egypt had been in physical bondage. When Moses returned from the wilderness, they did not want his deliverance. They did not want God's deliverance. They much preferred life in Egyptian slavery, despite its hardships. Their commitment to sin and slavery was to last an additional 40 years after the exodus. So powerful is the psychology of slavery, which is a manifestation of the escapist religion, that it took at least 120 years to stamp it out in Israel. They were bondservants to a false religion—escapist religion—and also bondservants to sin, bondservants to the Egyptians, and bondservants to fear. They had adopted certain aspects of Egyptian religion and culture—the longing for leeks and onions and golden calves⁹—and their separation from these false gods was not purged out by the first Passover or the 39 that followed. The leaven of Egypt was still with them until the day that all but two of them died in the wilderness.

9. Michael Walzer, Exodus and Revolution (New York: Basic Books, 1985), pp. 56–57.

There is an alliance between power religion and escapist religion. The psychology of tyranny is the other side of the ethically rebellious coin of the psychology of slavery, just as sadism is the other side of masochism. Bullies need victims. The power religionists and the escapist religionists need each other.

THE METAPHOR OF GROWTH: ETHICS

Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O LORD, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the Sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established (Ex. 15:17).

The theocentric foundation of the imagery of agricultural planting is God as the supreme planter of the field. The land serves as God's set-apart sanctuary for His set-apart sanctified people.

A. Nature Reflects Man

The sociologist-historian Robert Nisbet wrote: "There has never been a time in Western thought when the image of social change has not been predominantly biological in nature."¹ Even his use of the English-language phrase, "in nature," is revealing of the influence of the metaphor; he means, as we all do, "in form" or "in essence," or "fundamentally," but we all frequently substitute the phrase "in nature." The power of the metaphor of nature is very great, intellectually and linguistically.

The Bible uses the language of biological processes in order to communicate certain truths concerning the affairs of mankind. Such terms as "planting," "grass," and "seed" are fairly common. The Bible unquestionably describes the processes of social change in the language of biological growth and decay. It does not use the imagery of the machine, which has been the primary alternative metaphor to organic change that has been used by Western humanists ever since the Newtonian revolution. Nevertheless, the Bible does not teach that mankind is a reflection of nature, or that the affairs of man are reflections of nature's processes. The reverse is the case. Man is the arche- type of nature, not the other way around. Nature's processes are analogous to man's.

1. Robert A. Nisbet, Prejudices: A Philosophical Dictionary (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1982), p. 274.

Man's mortality does appear to be analogous to the processes of a cursed earth, of growth and decay, and his certain aspects of man's institutions also resemble living and dying biological organisms. But the essence of man is not his mortality. The essence of man is his position as God's agent of dominion over creation. Man is a creature made in God's image. Man's rebellion led to the curse of nature, for nature is covenantally subordinate to man. Nature is afflicted with the process of growth and decay as a result of man's ethical rebellion. Both man and nature were cursed by God in response to this ethical rebellion (Gen. 3:17–19).² Therefore, we ought to conclude that man's mortality is analogous to the processes of nature, not because nature is normative, but because man is.

B. Social Sanctification

The Bible affirms the existence of social change that advances ideally from spiritual immaturity to spiritual maturity. This process is inescapably ethical. The Bible sets forth ethical standards in the law of God, and the extent to which people approach these standards in their daily activities determines their moral progress. Spiritual maturity is imputed to man at the time of regeneration,³ but working out one's salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12b), in time and on earth, is the basis of a man's progressive sanctification.⁴ Progressive sanctification cannot lead to perfection on this side of the grave.

What is true for the individual is also true for a society. Adherence to biblical law brings beneficial developments throughout the society's institutions. Conversely, widespread departure from adherence to bib-

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

3. The Collected Writings of John Murray, 4 vols. (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1977), II, ch. 21: "Definitive Sanctification." Speaking of the antithesis between moral regeneration and moral bondage, Murray wrote: "There is no possibility of toning down the antithesis; it appears all along the line of the varying aspects from which life and action are to be viewed. In respect of every criterion by which moral and spiritual life is to be assessed, there is absolute differentiation. This means that there is a decisive and definitive breach with the power and service of sin in the case of every one who has come under the control of the provisions of grace" (p. 208). In short, progressive sanctification in the life of an individual begins with definitive sanctification.

4. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), pp. 48–52 See also John Murray, Collected Writings, II, ch. 23: "Progressive Sanctification."

lical law brings God's historic judgment and social contraction. The external blessings are removed by God. Thus, it is not a case of social "birth, growth, senility, death, and decay," but rather grace (external blessings), covenantal faithfulness, added blessings in response to faithfulness, temptation, and then, if Satan's temptation is successful, covenantal rebellion, followed by God's judgment (Deut. 8⁵ and 28⁶).

Thus, there can be no greater contrast between true religion and false religion as it applies to social theory than the distinction between the metaphor of biological growth and the metaphor of spiritual growth from immaturity to maturity. What takes place in man's social institutions is a reflection of the society's adherence or rejection of the terms of the covenant—a covenant that is expressly ethical and judicial. This is one of the most important underlying themes in my entire commentary.

Nevertheless, we do find that the language of agriculture is used by the biblical writers to describe spiritual and institutional development. Paul wrote to the Corinthian church: "I have planted, and Apollos watered; but God gave the increase" (I Cor. 3:6). We need to understand the differences between the Bible's use of such biological language and the seemingly similar use of such terms by pagan social theorists.

C. Planting

"Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O LORD, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the Sanctuary, O LORD, which thy hands have established" (Ex. 15:17). The translators of the King James Version capitalized "Sanctuary," which seems to imply that Moses was speaking of the temple. Psalm 78:53–54 provides evidence that "sanctuary" should not be capitalized, because it refers in this case to the land of Israel itself: "And he led them on safely, so that they feared not: but the sea overwhelmed their enemies. And he brought them to the border of his sanctuary, even to this mountain, which his right hand had purchased." The Berkeley version translates verse 54: "He brought them to His holy domain, to the mountain which His right hand had gained." The passage refers, then, to a special land in which God's people would dwell with Him. God intended to plant His people in this land. The metaphor of planting is a familiar one in the Bible. It is related to the metaphor of growth, which was understood by ancient pagan cultures. While the He-brew metaphor was similar in language to those pagan metaphors of agricultural prosperity, there were important differences in usage. These differences stemmed from the differing conceptions of the creation.

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 18.

6. Ibid., ch. 69.

The Hebrews believed that God created the universe out of nothing. God's sovereignty in the fiat act of creation therefore guarantees His total sovereignty over the affairs of history. The doctrine of creation out of nothing implies the doctrine of God's providence. History is linear—creation, Fall, redemption (incarnation, crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension), partial restoration, final judgment, total restoration—and it is totally personal. The Fall of man was seen as being ethical, an act of man's will in defiance of God. This Fall was not understood as a product of some flaw in nature, for nature had been created good. The Fall of man resulted in the judgment by God of both man and his environment, but the cause was man's ethical rebellion. Ethical restoration, which involves personal repentance and adherence to God's covenant, was promised by God. The original peace of nature will return (Isa. 11:6–9).

Restoration therefore meant to the Hebrews the eventual victory of God in time and on earth. The New Testament's vision is the same (Rom. 8:18–23).⁷

Pagan cosmologies did not share this view of creation. God was not seen as the Creator who brought the creation out of nothing. Matter, whether in the form of raw chaos, or water, or a cosmic egg, was seen as co-eternal with "god." This god's victory over chaos at the time of "creation" (the emergence of "ordered being")—the "original time"⁸—was viewed as a continuous process. God cannot guarantee the outcome of the struggle between order and chaos. He cannot guarantee

7. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

8. The subject of pagan man's concept of "original time," the time of the creation, is treated in most of the books by Mircea Eliade, but especially in Cosmos and History: The Myth of the Eternal Return (New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1959), and in The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1957] 1961), ch. 2: "Sacred Time and Myths." Pagan men in primitive cultures have long believed that they can participate in this original time through special rituals, especially chaos festivals. It is significant that neither Judaism nor Christianity celebrates the creation ritually, nor does it appear in their religious calendars. The creation is understood as exclusively the work of God.

the outcome, because he himself is finite. Historical change is neither linear nor absolutely personal; it is inherently cyclical. The Fall of man was not primarily ethical, but metaphysical. A flaw in nature was involved. Man is now imprisoned in the bondage of time. Covenant-breaking man's goal is therefore self-transcendence through overcoming time—its abolition, generally through ritual chaos. Out of chaos came time, structure, and order; out of the progressive bondage of order will come a new chaos, which will then renew law-burdened order.⁹ The two are eternal equals in many pagan cosmologies.

This dialectical tension between chaos and order is reflected in the natural processes of growth and decay. Eternal repetition swallows up historical development and historical meaning. The seasons of nature therefore become normative, both culturally and religiously. The importance of fertility rituals to ancient paganism was based on a particular view of the origin of being. It was a view not shared by the Hebrews.

D. Grass and Seed

In contrast to the normative processes of nature, which pagan cosmologies proclaimed, stood the Hebrew metaphor grass. David used grass to illustrate the universal extension of God's kingdom: ". . . they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth" (Ps. 72:16b). Yet, in other passages, the wicked are compared to another aspect of grass, something to be cut down (Ps. 37:2, 28). Man's transitoriness, in contrast to God's eternal word, is compared to withering grass (Isa. 40:6–8; cf. I Peter 1:24–25). The uses of the metaphor of grass are ethical in intent.

Another metaphor of growth can be found in the Hebrews' metaphor of the seed. The generations of man are described as seed (Gen. 9:9; 13:16, etc.). Both cultural progress and cultural decline, being functions of man's ethical response to God's law rather than the products of forces in nature, are also characterized by the metaphor of growth and decay. The language of agriculture is used to describe both cultural destruction (Jer. 7:20; 8:13; Ezek. 17:1–10) and cultural restoration (Ezek. 17:23–24; Jer. 17:7–8). Cultural destruction and cultural restoration are God's responses to the ethical decisions of whole nations or populations.

9. In addition to Eliade's books that deal with this theme, see Roger Caillois, Man and the Sacred (New York: Free Press, 1959). On man's attempt to achieve self-transcendence through the abolition of "normal" or "profane" time, see Gary North, Unholy Spirits: Occultism and New Age Humanism (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gnoccultism>)

The New Testament uses the metaphor of the seed in several passages. The parable of the sower focuses on the effects of the various environments on four seeds that are scattered (Matt. 13:3–8).

Another parable using the sower focuses on two different kinds of seeds that are planted by two rival sowers in the same field, the parable of the wheat and tares (Matt. 13:24–30).¹⁰ Obviously, these agricultural metaphors are only metaphors. They are used in varying ways to drive home spiritual points. They point to time's role in the process of maturation.

Paul used the metaphor of domestic agriculture to make his case for the restoration and victory of the kingdom of God. He used the metaphor of the wild olive branch, which is grafted into the root. His goal was to describe the relationship historically between the Jews and the gentiles. The regrafting in of the elect Jews at the end of the era of the gentiles is seen by Paul as the foundation of external reconstruction and victory—the basis of Paul's eschatological optimism (Rom. 11:17–27).¹¹ His usage of the metaphor makes it plain that the whole process is unnatural. God, as the plant domesticator, does not graft the domesticated branch into the wild root, which is the traditional agricultural practice. He grafts the wild olive branch (gentiles) into the original root (covenant Israel).¹² Not the process of growth and decay, but the calculated, purposeful intervention of the active tree-grafter, is Paul's point. Natural or even traditional practices are not normative. God's sovereignty is normative.

E. Classical Culture and Cycles

The possibility of external progress was set before the Hebrew nation very early. This promise involved the possibility of long-term economic development as the product of long-term covenantal faithfulness to God's laws. Pagan cultures, including the Greeks and the Romans, took the cyclical processes of nature as normative, and never were able to develop a progressive philosophy of time.¹³ They were unable to be-

10. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 29.

11. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 7.

12. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965), II, pp. 84–90.

13. Ludwig Edelstein argued in his posthumously published book, The Idea of Progress in Classical Antiquity (Baltimore, Maryland: John Hopkins Press, 1967), that the lieve in the possibility of long-term, cumulative social and economic progress.¹⁴ To believe in such a possibility, they would have had to abandon their commitment to the twin doctrines of cycles and impersonal fate.¹⁵

In the debate over whether classical civilization was or was not committed to the ultimate pessimism of cycles, this much is clear: the historians of classical Greece have not been able to produce evidence of a confident commitment to the idea of inescapable progress, or a doctrine of ultimate victory by man over nature. Nisbet's book, History of the Idea of Progress, presents worthy examples of fragments from classical authors that proclaimed some progress by man over the ages, and the possibility of continuing progress—if not for mankind in general, then at least for the beneficiaries of classical culture.¹⁶ But to maintain that the classical world did not adopt almost completely the idea of historical cycles makes it very difficult to explain the Renaissance's rejection of linear history. Nisbet himself wrote: "From Au-

Greeks and Romans did not all believe in cyclical time, and that some of the prominent philosophers did believe that some linear progress is possible indefinitely. His evidence is weak, however. He had to admit that Plato and Aristotle held to a cyclical view of time, and that rampant skepticism throughout later Greek culture militated against a widespread belief in progress. There is no question that neither the Greeks nor the Romans had any concept of time that is exclusively linear—beginning, meaningful time, and final judgment—or that is necessarily progressive, meaning beneficial to mankind, in the long run. Greek and Roman society maintained the annual chaos festivals until the very end, which Edelstein fails to mention. This points to the cultural and religious commitment of classical civilization to a cyclical view of time. On the cyclical views of Greek science, see Stanley Jaki, The Road of Science and the Ways to God (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), ch. 2.

14. I am here taking exception with Robert Nisbet's excellent book, History of the Idea of Progress (New York: Basic Books, 1980), ch. 1. He followed Edelstein, W. K. C. Guthrie, M. I. Finley, and his own teacher, Frederick Teggart, in arguing that there were philosophers in Greece and Rome who held out the possibility of cumulative increases in men's knowledge, technological improvements, and even moral improvement over time. He rejected the thesis that classical thought was dominated by a notion of cyclical time, as argued by John Baillie, F. M. Cornford, W. R. Inge, R. G. Collingwood, and J. B. Bury, Nisbet's intellectual enemy in this debate. He saw the myth of Prometheus, the god who gave mankind fire, as the archetypal example of human advancement: pp. 17–18.

15. On the collapse of the ancient world's philosophical base, which led to the collapse of classical civilization, see Charles Norris Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture: A Study in Thought and Action from Augustus to Augustine (New York: Oxford University Press, [1944] 1957). Reprinted by Liberty Press, Indianapolis.

16. Cochrane pointed to the Roman poet Vergil as one who believed Rome might break out of the familiar cycle of growth and decay, to become eternal Rome. The Empire's universality might lead to a permanence that other empires had failed to achieve. Ibid., pp. 68–73.

gustine down to the modern world, with the exception of the Renaissance, when cyclical conceptions of history crowded out the linear scheme inherent in the idea of progress, these ideas have been powerful in impact, adhered to by some of the greatest minds in Western history."¹⁷ But the Renaissance was a self-conscious revival of pagan antiquity. How was it, then, that Renaissance scholars so completely misinterpreted the conception of non-cyclical history that Nisbet thought was held by Greek and Roman thinkers? It is easier to believe—and much easier to demonstrate through the primary source documents of classical culture—that Renaissance scholars knew their religious forefathers well.

What no one has yet produced is any evidence that classical culture possessed any concept of dominion, in time and on earth, comparable to that held by the Old Testament authors and New Testament writers. The idea that an exclusive group of people is under the special care of an omnipotent God, and that this God has covenanted with them, guaranteeing comprehensive victory, on earth and in heaven, to His people, simply was absent in classical authors. They had no such view of God's sovereignty. Furthermore, according to Cochrane, "for classical idealism, the very possibility of growth is restricted to individuals; communal or social development in the sense envisaged by modern liberalism is completely beyond its horizon."¹⁸ The end was faith in the superman, the divine Caesar, an idea with its roots in Greek thought,¹⁹ as the figure who could bring permanence to Rome, the long-sought Pax Romana. At best, Rome might not capitulate "to the Great God Whirl, the terror of the 'political' mind."²⁰ Only luck, in its war with inexorable fate and inevitable chance, had made possible the advent of Caesar Augustus.²¹

Thus, the Hebrews and Christians held to a concept of development which was unique in the ancient world. They believed that pro-

17. Nisbet, Prejudices, pp. 239–40.

18. Cochrane, Christianity, p. 103. Cochrane wrote of Livy: "It is hardly necessary to comment upon the intense conservatism implied in such a view of human life. It betrays an utter lack of faith in the goodness of any possible 'world to come' and invites men to conform to established models. . . . One result of this is to engender a fear and hatred of social change, regardless of its character and potentiality; and, with Livy, this manifests itself in a disposition to condemn as pernicious every tendency to innovation." Ibid., p. 104.

19. Ibid., pp. 110–11.

20. Ibid., p. 103. See especially Cochrane's analysis of the crisis of the third century, A.D.: ch. 4.

21. Ibid., p. 160.

gress is inevitable if and when men conform themselves covenantally to the God of the Bible.

F. The Concept of Economic Growth

Redeemed man's hope is in continual internal and external progress, including economic growth (Deut. 8:6–9).²² The promise is ultimate external victory (Isa. 66:22). Even the normal processes of nature will be overcome by the healing power of God's grace, as hostile animals will find peace with each other (Isa. 65:25).²³ The kind of progress which the Bible denies is the progress hoped for by the drunkard, a concept of progress which is autonomous: "Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and tomorrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant" (Isa. 56:12).²⁴ This kind of progress cannot be sustained. God judges it.

Economic growth is always under severe restraints. Compound growth rates of 5% per annum cannot continue for centuries.²⁵ But it is valid to expect continual blessings in response to continued faithfulness to God's laws. Economic growth is not an autonomous process that can be engineered into a society. It is the product of a world-and-life view that can be adopted by a society.

There is an additional problem for humanist economics. The Christian economist believes that the mind of God is comprehensive and normative. God can make plans and evaluate economic growth, and man, who is made in God's image, can also make plans and evaluate aggregate growth, though not perfectly.²⁶ The blessings of God that appear in the form of increased numbers of cattle or other assets are meaningful because of the plan of God. He imputes value to certain material objects, and therefore when individuals increase their holdings of them, they are indeed better off than before.

The subjectivist economist has no consistent way to be sure that economic growth is a blessing. Some economists, such as E. J. Mishan, reject the idea that economic growth is beneficial. But the problem is deeper than simply evaluating the costs and benefits of growth. Is the

22. North, Inheritance and Dominion, chaps. 19, 20.

23. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 16.

24. Ibid., ch. 14.

25. Gary North, "The Theology of the Exponential Curve," The Freeman (May 1970); reprinted in North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>) metaphor of growth even applicable to the economy, given the presuppositions of subjectivism?

26. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5:E.

The extreme subjectivist, Ludwig Lachmann, recommended that economists abandon the whole concept. He did speak of “economic progress,” which he defined as “an increase in real income per head.”²⁷ Yet even this is illegitimate. How can we divide “heads” into “real income,” since we cannot even define “real income” without resorting to aggregates, index numbers, and similar anti-subjectivist concepts. But even if subjectivist economists could define such concepts, Lachmann’s warning should make them hesitate. No model of a uniformly expanding or growing economy is valid. “This model embodies the notion of ‘growth,’ of progress at a known and expected rate. Its significance for the real world, however, is doubtful. Already the metaphor ‘growth’ is singularly inappropriate to the real world, as it suggests a process during which the harmony of proportions remains undisturbed.”²⁸ He asked: How can we be sure that there is harmony? Sometimes capital is malinvested—just before a depression, for example. Some capital is reduced in value by economic change; other capital assets appreciate. How can we “tally up” these changes in the value of capital? Only if there is harmony—a fitting together of personal plans into a coherent whole—can we use the metaphor of growth. But the radical subjectivist does not believe in any such harmonious aggregate. Economic aggregates are mythical in a world of consistent subjectivism. We cannot make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, or interpersonal comparisons of subjective plans, given the tenets of subjective economics. There is no plan of God in their system to provide the necessary unity and coherence. Thus, the metaphor of growth is misleading, Lachmann says. Growth or a tree or plant is orderly. It is governed by a genetic code. An economy has no similar regulative principle, the subjectivist has to say, if he is consistent. Few are.

The Christian can legitimately use the metaphor of growth, precisely because he believes in the sovereignty of God. While his explanation of the origins of growth should be based on ethics rather than the mind of man or some other creaturely source, he can use this universal metaphor to make sense of the world. “More is better,” if it is the product of righteousness, and if it does not become a snare and a delusion.

27. Ludwig Lachmann, Capital and Its Structure (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, [1956] 1977), p. 17. (<http://bit.ly/LLcapital>)

28. Idem.

Long-term economic growth is normative. The cyclical pattern of growth and decay, progress and regress, being hostile to the idea of the ethical covenant between God and man, is not the standard for a godly culture. The possibility of economic, social, military, and agricultural collapse always faces a covenantally faithful people—a warning of what will inevitably happen should they rebel against the terms of God's covenant (Deut. 28:15–68). Nevertheless, the cyclical pattern of prosperity and depression, which denies the possibility of perpetual expansion, is normative only for covenantally rebellious cultures. God nowhere says that all societies will conform historically to the cyclical pattern. Covenantal dominion is expansionist.

Economic growth is the inescapable product of the extension of God's kingdom. That the Protestant Reformation, and especially Puritan Calvinism, produced historically unprecedented economic growth, was not a random correlation.²⁹ Because nature is under the curse, and therefore limited, such compound growth cannot be an eternal process. Such expansion therefore points to an end of time, the end of the limits of our curse-induced scarcity. Such growth therefore points to a coming judgment, a cessation of the processes of the cursed earth. Paganism's attempt to substitute endless cycles of growth and decay is an ancient ploy to blind men to the reality of final judgment. The modern version of this ancient philosophy is the "zero growth" philosophy.³⁰ By abandoning the pagan use of the metaphor of growth—a metaphor which of necessity includes decay—and replacing it with a biblical version, which relates ethical conformity to God's law with external dominion and expansion, godly men remind ungodly men of the coming judgment. Growth will end when time does; growth clearly cannot go on for-ever.

29. On this point, see Max Weber's classic study, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (New York: Scribner's, [1904–05] 1958). For a defense of Weber against those who have criticized his thesis, see Gary North, "The 'Protestant Ethic' Hypothesis," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Summer 1976). For documentation concerning the applicability of Weber's hypothesis in American colonial Puritanism, see my three essays on Puritan economic thought and practice in New England, 1630–1720, in ibid., vol. V, no. 2; vol. VI, nos. 1, 2.

30. The most widely read example of this zero-growth philosophy is Dennis Meadows, et al., The Limits to Growth (New York: Universe Books, 1972). The book is subtitled: A Report for the Club of Rome on the Predicament of Mankind. It was a kind of "media event" in the early 1970s. Another example of this sort of analysis is Entropy: A New World View, by Jeremy Rifkin and Ted Howard (New York: Bantam New Age Book, 1980). The most forceful defense of zero economic growth is E. J. Mishan's book, The Economic Growth Debate: An Assessment (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1977).

Conclusion

God will plant His people in the mountain of His inheritance, which will be the whole earth. This is the ultimate use of the metaphor of growth in the Bible. The individual blades of grass will wither and die, but the grass itself—the fields of grass—will spread. The earth will become the promised garden. “The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose” (Isa. 35:1). “For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the LORD God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations” (Isa. 61:11).

18

MANNA, PREDICTABILITY, AND DOMINION

Then said the LORD unto Moses, Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you; and the people shall go out and gather a certain rate every day, that I may prove them, whether they will walk in my law, or no. And it shall come to pass, that on the sixth day they shall prepare that which they bring in; and it shall be twice as much as they gather daily (Ex. 16:4–5).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God as the supplier of food. God is the sanctions-bringer: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

A. The Slave's Life

As former slaves in Egypt, the Hebrews had become accustomed to certain features of slave life. First, they had been assigned regular tasks by their masters. For the most part, these tasks had involved minimal creativity. The imperial bureaucracy had not been geared to local autonomy and individual responsibility of its slaves. The bureaucratic structure had to be predictable, from top to bottom. Deviations from the central plan had to be minimized.

Second, they had been supplied with tools and raw materials. This had increased their productivity, since it had increased the division of labor. Capital investments had come from the state. Only as a form of punishment did the Pharaoh of Moses' day impose the requirement that they produce bricks without straw (Ex. 5:18). This reduced the division of labor within the slave community, which thereby increased the efforts of the slave population to produce the same quantity of bricks.² Their productivity was therefore dependent on the continuing support of a bureaucratic state.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

Third, they had been supplied with food. This food had been supplied to them on a regular, predictable basis. Some of this food they produced on their own. They owned cattle (Ex. 9:4), sheep (Ex. 12:3), and crops. We presume that they grew crops, since the hail and fire consumed crops in Egypt, but not in Goshen, where the Hebrews resided (Ex. 9:25–26). Despite their own food supplies, they were nonetheless dependent, as all Egyptians were, on the state, for the state owned all the land, except that owned by the priests (Gen. 47:20–22). Furthermore, the predictable waters of the Nile, which were controlled by the state through irrigation projects and canals, made possible agricultural production in Egypt.³ We can surmise that whenever the slaves were engaged on building projects located away from Goshen, the taskmasters must have maintained discipline by controlling access to food supplies. Controlling men's access to food is a traditional means of control in slave societies.

The Hebrews experienced the static world of slavery. It was a society that did not systematically reward individual initiative and creativity. It was a society dominated by the decisions of senior officials. The Hebrew slave society was dependent on the representatives of foreign gods. A man's calling was established by the state. Egypt was governed by the annual cycle of the Nile, which in turn was understood to be under the control of a divine monarch, whose daily ritual observances determined even the rising of the sun. It was a culture that had no doctrine of progress, which built huge public works projects, and which concentrated its attention on death.

B. Deliverance from Slavery and into Freedom

God had called them out of this static world. Their response was predictable for slaves: longing for the past. They lodged their bitter complaints against God, although indirectly (Ex. 16:8). Moses took the brunt of the criticism. They resented the inhospitable world of the wilderness. Their familiar surroundings were gone. The wilderness was a sparse land. No taskmasters supplied them with instructions, tools,

2. Chapter 7.

3. Karl Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism: A Comparative Study on Total Power (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1957), discusses several ancient civilizations that were tyrannies based on the centralized control of water by the state.

raw materials, and food. Constant wandering denied them access to a fixed piece of land. Their new environment was filled with risks. New skills were needed to survive; self-reliance and self-confidence had to be built up over time. Again and again, the Hebrews complained that God had brought them out of slavery in order to kill them (Ex. 14:11; 16:3; 17:3). They had no self-confidence because they had no confidence in the God who had delivered them.

This slave population was not equipped psychologically to assume the heavy responsibilities of godly reconstruction. They lacked two primary requirements of successful reconstruction: (1) optimism concerning the future; and (2) a concept of God-revealed, reliable law. To subdue the earth, they needed a doctrine of law under God's sovereign authority, and the world under God's law. Law is a tool of social reconstruction that involves a progressive reduction in society's reliance upon miracles. Simultaneously, the more predictable fruits of adherence to biblical law elevates to normality the benefits of the miraculous, such as abundance, health, long life, and the absence of disasters. Adherence to the law requires an increase of maturity on the part of those laboring to rebuild, yet it is itself the source of this spiritual maturity. Since the existence of a revealed law-order and the visible external results of the imposition of this law-order have to be understood as a sign of God's presence and ultimate sovereignty, man's need for miraculous intervention—"signs"—is reduced. As slaves, the Hebrews clung to the signs of God's presence, requiring endless miracles by God to protect them. Even with the pillar of fire by night and the cloud by day, they were not satisfied. They kept crying, in effect, "What has God done for us lately?"

C. Manna vs. the Slave Psychology

Manna was necessary to break this psychology of slavery. Manna filled the bellies of the exodus generation, but for the younger generation, the manna served as a means of transforming their minds.

1. Regular Miracles

First, they received their daily bread. It was simple, tasty, and predictable to the point of monotony. Second, its appearance in the midst of a wilderness involved a daily miracle—a phenomenon not normally available to nomads. Their new taskmaster, God, supplied their needs as a display of His sovereignty over them. Furthermore, a weekly miracle was added: a double portion on the sixth day, and nothing on the seventh. The manna, which would rot if kept overnight on the other five days, was preserved for the sabbath meal (Ex. 16:17–26).

The Hebrews could not store up large portions of manna, since it would rot within 24 hours. They had to rely totally on God, even as they had been forced to rely on Egypt's bureaucracy, Egypt's irrigation, and Egypt's gods. Modern "critical" biblical scholarship is intensely hostile to such a view of manna. The element of the miraculous appalls modern scholars. They want the regularities of biblical law, but without God, and certainly without God's alteration of the familiar regularities of nature. A typical statement from the world of secular scholarship is found in F. S. Bodenheimer's 1947 article on manna: "In Exodus 16 and Numbers 11 we find reports of manna in the desert. Some believe that this manna was similar to bread and that it was furnished in quantities large enough to feed a whole people. Others regard it as a natural phenomenon which contributed to the diet of the Israelites in the desert. Only the latter view permits analysis and discussion. Since biblical history often is confirmed by archeology, why not confirm the reports of manna by existing natural phenomena?"⁴ He concluded that the manna was really excretions of two species of insects, one found in the mountains and the other in the lowlands. Predictably, when the biblical account provides information that conflicts with his naturalistic explanation, he concluded that the biblical account is "a late and mistaken interpolation."⁵ He preferred to "prove" modern naturalism by rewriting the Bible. He apparently wanted us to believe that these insects were instinctive sabbatarians: excreting double portions on the day before the sabbath, and refraining from eating or excreting on the sabbath.

2. Predictable God

For 40 years the manna came, and the younger generation could not have failed to appreciate its implications. They began to become confident in the lawful administration of Israel's sovereign monarch. The covenantal relationship between them and their new king—psychologically a new king in their experience—was reaffirmed each morning. A totally supernatural, yet totally regular event reconfirmed the covenant daily. The daily provision of the manna taught the younger generation that God is faithful. At the same time, the prohibition against gathering it on the seventh day, and the double portion on the sixth, taught them that God is holy. A special day of rest was set apart for the people of Israel, even as God had set them apart from Egypt in a display of His sovereign grace. Violations of the prohibition against gathering food on the sabbath were viewed by God as symbolic violations of His law in general: “And the LORD said unto Moses, How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?” (Ex. 16:28).

4. F. S. Bodenheimer, "The Manna of Sinai," The Biblical Archaeologist, X (Feb. 1947); reprinted in G. Ernest Wright and David Noel Freedman (eds.), The Biblical Archaeologist Reader (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, 1961), p. 76.

5. Ibid., p. 79.

The confidence of the younger generation in the whole of the law was built upon the observed regularities of the provision and administration of this seemingly innocuous substance. These were supernatural regularities that were not available to other wanderers in the wilderness. The Hebrews needed faith in God’s ability to overcome the normal regularities of wilderness ecology—an ecology which could not sustain two to three million wanderers—as well as faith in the predictability of His providence. Manna provided a daily and weekly testimony to God’s sovereign power: providential regularity within a framework of ecological abnormality. The curse of the ground was overcome daily, which pointed to the Author of that curse, and the power He possesses to deliver His people ethically and economically from the effects of that curse. A God who can be relied upon to overcome the laws of biology and ecology on a daily basis can also be relied upon to honor His covenantal promises to provide external blessings for those who honor His law-order.

A remnant of the wilderness experience of manna was provided by God in the land of Israel by guaranteeing a triple harvest in the year preceding that sabbatical year which preceded the jubilee year (Lev. 25:21).⁶ There is no subsequent reference to the occurrence of this miraculous triple crop, probably because the Hebrews in the pre-exilic period did not honor the sabbath year principle, which is why God sent them into exile (II Chron. 36:20–21). After their return to Israel they did honor the sabbatical year, according to a non-canonical source (I Maccabees 6:49), but there is no mention of the jubilee year or to its triple harvest. It seems likely that the manna experience was the background for Christ’s multiplying of the loaves in “a desert place” (Matt. 14:15–20), which was part of a ministry that He announced in terms of the jubilee year (Luke 4:18–19).⁷

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 27.

D. Biblical Law and Conquest

This younger generation was being prepared to conquer Canaan. They had to learn two things about biblical law. First, biblical law is personal. Second, it is regular enough to be predictable. They also learned that self-discipline and faithfulness are necessary for survival, because violations of the sabbath requirements had brought criticism from God (Ex. 16:28). They learned of the continuity of biblical law over time (four decades) and over geography (wandering). God's provision of the manna created a psychology of godly dominion. Humble before God, and totally dependent upon His care, they could become totally confident in the face of human enemies. They expected to find a tight relationship between God's commands and God's blessings. They learned humility before God and confidence before the creation. "And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live" (Deut. 8:3).⁸

1. Covenantal Symbol

The manna became a symbol of God's covenant with Israel. "And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a pot, and put an omer full of manna therein, and lay it up before the LORD, to be kept for your generations. As the LORD commanded Moses, so Aaron laid it up before the Testimony, to be kept" (Ex. 16:33–34). The New Testament informs us that the Ark of the Covenant contained the two tables of the law, Aaron's rod, and the golden pot that held the manna (Heb. 9:4). The manna came for forty years, until the people crossed over the Jordan into Canaan. They kept the Passover on that day, and they ate of the old corn of the land. "And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more; but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year" (Josh. 5:12). A new generation crossed over Jordan. On the day they crossed over, God “rolled away the reproach of Egypt” from the nation (Josh. 5:9). They began the process of taking possession of their heritage. They no longer needed the daily bread of manna. Hard fighting, hard work, and hard-headed commitment to biblical law were to replace the manna. Their faith in the welfare state regularity of static Egypt had at last been abolished; the true welfare civilization of advancing dominion could now begin. The regularity of law replaced the regularity of daily miracles. Responsibility under God’s predictable law replaced the predictability of manna, just as predictable manna had replaced the predictability of Egyptian slavery.

7. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

8. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 18.

Slavery is a reproach to God’s people. They are to exercise dominion under God, not be dominated by servants of foreign gods. But to escape slavery, men must switch allegiances. They must make a covenant with the God of freedom. The exodus generation made their covenant, but they barely believed in its God or its terms. They were still mental slaves. They still clung to the supposed benefits of the bureaucratic welfare state. They still hesitated to exercise dominion. God pulled them out of Egypt’s welfare state, but He did not pull the welfare state mentality out of them. The 40 years of wandering slowly pulled the next generation away from the mental chains that bound their fathers.

2. Welfare Through Miracles

There was welfare in the wilderness, but no welfare state. No bureaucracy supplied their daily bread. God was visibly the source of their welfare. This welfare, they learned, was predictable. They could rely on it, which meant that they could rely on Him. They did not need to trust in some bureaucracy for their existence. They could rest in God. And because they could rest in God, visibly, one day each week, they learned that they could rest in God on the battlefield and in the work place. Each family gathered its own manna daily (Ex. 16:16). There was precisely enough for every individual, since God, not man, was the central planner (Ex. 16:18). Once they began to rely on God’s mercy as the source of their prosperity, and on biblical law, which was their tool of dominion, they could abandon the religion of their fathers, the religion of bureaucratic welfarism. Each man could then attend to his own affairs in confidence, even as each man had gathered up his own manna. Each man knew that he was under the direct sovereignty of God, and that his own economic prosperity was not metaphysically dependent on the state and the state's bureaucratic planning. Their fathers had never fully grasped this principle, and their fathers had perished in the wilderness.

They would no longer long for Egypt. The sons would not be burdened by memories of a welfare state existence—unreliable memories—where they supposedly had eaten “bread to the full” (Ex. 16:3). The children would no longer pine away for the food of bondage, “the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick” (Num. 11:5). Instead, they chose the bread of diligence, the fruits of victory.

Conclusion

If there was any universal religion in the second half of the twentieth century, it was the religion of the bureaucratic welfare state. Not since the days of Egypt, said Max Weber in the first decade of the twentieth century, have we seen a bureaucracy like the ones we are constructing, nation by nation.⁹ And, he might have pointed out a century later, not since the days of Egypt have we seen tax burdens like those which are universal today. In fact, neither the system of universal bureaucracy nor the system of confiscatory taxation in Egypt came anywhere near the systems the modern statist priests have imposed on their populations—populations that groan under the burdens, but who cry for more benefits, higher tax burdens on the rich, more coercive wealth redistribution, and more government programs to protect them.

If God should manifest His grace, and deliver us from bondage, we can expect the older generation to murmur against God, and tell their children about the safety in bondage and the onions of Egypt. After all, we even have Christian apologists for the present welfare state who cry out for more state programs, more redistribution, and the universalization of the welfare state system, all in the name of Jesus.¹⁰ When the 9. “Max Weber on Bureaucratization in 1909,” Appendix I in J. P. Meyer, Max Weber and German Politics: A Study in Political Sociology (London: Faber & Faber, [1943] 1956).

10. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1977). This book had gone into its sixth printing by 1979, after only two years on the market. For a few years, its influence was very great in educated American evangelical circles. Sider wrote for the neo-evangelical community, but he was widely accepted in conservative Presbyterian circles, especially on seminary campuses. For a critique of Sider's thesis, see David Chilton, Productive Christians in An Age of Guilt-Manipulators, 4th ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christi-state-educated slaves come before their people to extol the benefits of the bureaucratic slave system, we can expect the slaves and their state-promoting “trusties”—the modern Christian version of the black overseers of nineteenth-century American Negro slavery—to complain against any Moses who calls them out of bondage and into responsible freedom.

an Economics, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>). By the time Chilton’s third edition appeared, the Sider phenomenon had faded. Elected to a second four-year term, President Ronald Reagan spoke for evangelicals in 1985. Sider did not. Sider was a phenomenon of the short-lived leftist neoevangelical fad that faded rapidly after Reagan defeated liberal Baptist Jimmy Carter for President in 1980.

19

IMPERFECT JUSTICE

Moreover thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness; and place such over them, to be rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens: And let them judge the people at all seasons: and it shall be, that every great matter they shall bring unto thee, but every small matter they shall judge: so shall it be easier for thyself, and they shall bear the burden with thee (Ex. 18:21–22).

The Bible is not a perfectionist document. While it lays down a standard of human perfection (Gen. 17:1; I Kings 8:61; Matt. 5:48)—a standard met only by Jesus Christ (Matt. 3:17; Rom. 3:23; II Cor. 5:21)—it nonetheless acknowledges in its very law code that the administration of even a perfect law system designed by God must be understood as fallible, limited, and tainted with sin. As this passage amply demonstrates, the Bible is hostile to the humanists' quest for perfect justice on earth.

A. The Division of Labor

Under Moses' direct rule, God's revelation was instantly available in any given case. Yet there was insufficient time available for Moses to hear every case of legal dispute in the land. Perfect justice was limited by time and space. Men had to come to Moses' tent and stand in (presumably) long lines (Ex. 18:14). The quest for perfect earthly justice from God through His servant Moses was eating up countless man-hours. Not only was Moses' time limited, but so was the time of those who stood in lines.

Jethro warned Moses that the people, as well as Moses himself, were wearing away (v. 18). He recommended the creation of a judicial hierarchy, thereby taking advantage of the principle of the division of labor. Moses could reserve time to hear the cases that were too difficult for his subordinates—"every great matter" (v. 22)—and in doing so, would redeem his allotted time more wisely by exercising leadership in areas of Hebrew life other than the court-room. Furthermore, this system would permit more rapid resolutions of disputes. Justice was to be dispensed continually—"at all seasons"—and speedily.

God gave no explicit revelation to Moses concerning the establishment of a court of appeals. It was an ad hoc decision based on informed common sense. Jethro, who was a priest of Midian (v. 1), must have been familiar with the problems of dispensing divine justice. He could see how large the nation of Israel was. Acknowledging the validity of the principle of scarcity—in this case, the scarcity of time—Jethro came to an obvious conclusion. This conclusion involved the acceptance of man's limitations. Even in this historically unique circumstance of men's access to perfect justice, it was preferable in the vast majority of cases to obtain speedy human justice rather than delayed divine justice. Human justice was at least available to everyone, while Moses' judgments were allocated by means of lining up. No one could be sure that his case would even be considered.

The scarcity of time demands a judicial division of labor. The division of labor allows men to overcome many of the restrictions imposed by scarcity in every area of life. In this case, the judge's office was broken down into many offices, with specialists at each level (one in every ten judges) who could take appeals.

The criteria for admission into the position of judge were moral rather than technical or educational. Uncovetous men (bribe-resistant), fearful of God, with reputations of truthfulness, were the preferred judges (v. 21). Ability was also important, but moral qualities were emphasized.

Consider the available judges. They had grown up as slaves. The whole generation, except for Joshua and Caleb, possessed slave mentalities. Nevertheless, their rule was preferable in most cases to a system which offered perfect justice in individual cases, but which had to ration the number of cases. Conclusion: regular and predictable justice provided by responsible amateurs is better than perfect justice provided on a sporadic or "first in line" basis. The burden of dispensing justice had to be shared (v. 22). This was required in order to permit the people to endure, going their way in peace (v. 23).

B. The Right of Appeal

The right of appeal was limited to “great matters.” Cases involving fundamental principle, and those that would be likely to have important repercussions throughout the society, were the ones that were to be sent up the judicial chain of appeals. In order to limit the number of cases being sent to Moses for a final decision, the judges at each level must have had the right to refuse to reconsider the verdict of a lower court. If the judge did not believe that the decision of the lower court was in error, and if the higher court decided that the case was of relatively little importance as a precedent for society at large, the case was settled. Access to Moses’ supreme court was restricted to great cases, and this required screening by the lower courts. Jethro understood that the limitations on Moses’ time were paralyzing the justice system. Obviously, if every case considered by the lower courts eventually wound up in front of Moses, the hierarchy of courts would have provided no respite for Moses. The screening feature of the court system was fundamental to its success. This meant that the majority of litigants had to content themselves with something less than perfect justice.

Jethro also understood that endless litigation threatens the survival of the system of justice. Losers in a case clearly have an incentive to appeal, if the possibility of overturning the decision of the lower court judge offers hope. So there has to be restraint on the part of higher court judges to refrain from constant overturning of lower court decisions. Furthermore, a society composed of people who always are going to court against each other will suffer from clogged courts and delayed justice. A society, in short, that is not governed by self-restrained people, and which does not provide other means of settling disputes besides the civil government—church courts, arbitration panels, mediation boards, industry-wide courts, and so forth—will find itself paralyzed.

Macklin Fleming was a justice of the California Court of Appeal. His book, The Price of Perfect Justice (1974), documented the increasing paralysis of the legal system in the United States. It is this quest for earthly perfection that has been the legal system’s undoing.

The fuel that powers the modern legal engine is the ideal of perfectibility the concept that with the expenditure of sufficient time, patience, energy, and money it is possible eventually to achieve perfect justice in all legal process. For the past twenty years this ideal has dominated legal thought, and the ideal has been widely translated into legal action. Yet a look at almost any specific area of the judicial process will disclose that the noble ideal has consistently spawned results that can only be described as pandemoniac. For example, in criminal prosecutions we find as long as five months spent in the selection of a jury; the same murder charge tried five different times; the same issues of search and seizure reviewed over and over again, conceivably as many as twenty-six different times; prosecutions pending a decade or more; accusations routinely sidestepped by an accused who makes the legal machinery the target instead of his own conduct.¹

Where have modern secular humanistic courts failed? Fleming cited Lord Macaulay's rule: the government that attempts more than it ought ends up doing less than it should. Human law has its limits. Human courts have their limits. "The law cannot be both infinitely just and infinitely merciful; nor can it achieve both perfect form and perfect substance. These limitations were well understood in the past. But today's dominant legal theorists, impatient with selective goals, with limited objectives, and with human fallibility, have embarked on a quest for perfection in all aspects of the social order, and, in particular, perfection in legal procedure."²

The requirements of legal perfection, Fleming said, involve the following hypothetical conditions: totally impartial and competent tribunals, unlimited time for the defense, total factuality, total familiarity with the law, the abolition of procedural error, and the denial of the use of disreputable informants, despite the fact, as he noted, that "the strongest protection against organized thievery lies in the fact that thieves sell each other out."³ Costless justice theory has adopted the slogan, "Better to free a hundred guilty men than to convict a single innocent man." But what about the costs to future victims of the hundred guilty men? The legal perfectionists refuse to count the costs of their hypothetical universe.⁴

The goal of correct procedure as the only goal worth attaining is steadily eroding both the concept of moral justice and the crucially important deterrent, a speedy punishment. Everything is to be sacrificed on the altar of technical precision. "In this way the ideal of justice is

1. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974), p. 3.

2. Ibid., p. 4.

3. Ibid., p. 5.

4. Ibid., p. 6.

transformed into an ideal of correct procedure.”⁵ But the ideal is impossible to achieve perfectly, and by sacrificing all other goals, the cost has become astronomical. The incredible complexity of perfect procedures has led to a revival of judge-made law—judicial arbitrariness—since judges have been able to pick and choose from the morass of conflicting decisions. Almost total legislative power has therefore been transferred to the courts. And, as Fleming argued, the courts are not efficient in creating law. They have no staffs, little time, too many cases, and too theoretical a knowledge of the law. “Partisans are quick to furnish whatever literature will promote their cause, and a cottage industry has grown up in the preparation of the sociological brief. . . .”⁶

The whole system procrastinates: judges, defense lawyers, prosecutors, appeals courts, even the stenographic corps.⁷ Speedy justice is no longer a reality. Prisoners appeal constantly to federal courts on the basis of habeas corpus: illegal detention because of an unconstitutional act on the part of someone, anyone. In 1940, 89 prisoners convicted in state courts made such an appeal. In 1970, the figure was 12,000.⁸ Thus, concluded Fleming: “The consequence of this expansion of federal power over state criminal procedure through the creation of fiat prohibitions and rigidly ritualistic rules has been to elevate formalism to constitutional right, to complicate every significant phase of criminal procedure to the point where in some instances the system of criminal law has difficulty functioning and in others it turns loose persons who are patently guilty.”⁹

C. Salvation by Law

The quest for perfect justice leads inevitably to arbitrary jurisprudence and public lawlessness. Joseph in Pharaoh’s jail, Daniel in the lions’ den, and Jesus on the cross all testify to the imperfections in human courts of law. Nevertheless, godly men can live with imperfect justice, just as they live with imperfections in all other spheres of human life, because they know that perfect justice does exist and will be made manifest on the day of judgment. Life is too short to demand perfect justice on earth; better by far to have speedy justice handed

5. Ibid., p. 9.

6. Ibid., p. 120.

7. Ibid., p. 71.

8. Ibid., p. 27.

9. Ibid., p. 97. Cf. Richard A. Posner, The Federal Courts (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1985).

down by godly amateurs than the clogged courts of messianic humanism. We need not wring our hands in despair because men's courts, in time and on earth, fail to meet the standards of perfection which will reign supreme in God's court. We are not saved either by the perfect spirit of the law or the perfect letter of the law. We are surely not saved by imperfect imitations of the spirit and letter of the law. We are not saved by law.

Salvation by law is an ancient heresy, and it leads to the triumph of statist theology. Christianity is in total opposition to this doctrine. As Rushdoony wrote: "The reality of man apart from Christ is guilt and masochism. And guilt and masochism involve an unshakable inner slavery which governs the total life of the non-Christian. The politics of the anti-Christian will thus inescapably be the politics of guilt. In the politics of guilt, man is perpetually drained in his social energy and cultural activity by his over-riding sense of guilt and his masochistic activity. He will progressively demand of the state a redemptive role. What he cannot do personally, i.e., to save himself, he demands that the state do for him, so that the state, as man enlarged, becomes the human savior of man. The politics of guilt, therefore, is not directed, as the Christian politics of liberty, to the creation of godly justice and order, but to the creation of a redeeming order, a saving state."¹⁰ Christian jurisprudence cannot adopt a doctrine of the saving state and remain orthodox. The adoption of just such a concept of the state in the twentieth century testifies to the extent to which the modern world has abandoned Christian orthodoxy.

D. Jamming the System

One of the most important aspects of any legal order is the willingness of the citizens of a society to exercise self-restraint. This means that men must emphasize self-government, as well as gain access to court systems that serve as alternatives to civil government. This was a basic feature of the Western legal tradition after the mid-twelfth century, although since World War I, the rise of socialistic administrative states has begun to undermine this tradition.¹¹

Self-government is not a zero-price resource. The emphasis in the Bible on training up children in the details of biblical law must be understood as a requirement of citizens to provide “social overhead capital”—respect for law and therefore self-restraint—for civilization. Another aspect of the public’s respect for civil law is the self-restraint of government officials in not burdening the society with a massive, incomprehensible structure of administrative law. When civil law reaches into every aspect of the daily lives of men, the state loses a very important subsidy from the public, namely, men’s willingness to submit voluntarily to the civil law. Any legal structure is vulnerable to the foot-dragging of the public. If men refuse to submit to regulations that cannot be enforced, one by one, by the legal system, then that system will be destroyed. Court-jamming will paralyze it. This was a familiar phenomenon in the United States in the final decades of the twentieth century.

10. R. J. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995), p. 9. (<http://bit.ly/rjrpgap>)

11. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), Pt. II.

It is possible to bring down any legal system simply by taking advantage of every legal avenue of delay. Any administrative system has procedural rules; by following these rules so closely that action on the part of the authorities becomes hopelessly bogged down in red tape (procedural details), the protestors can paralyze the system. Too many laws can produce lawlessness. The courts can no longer enforce their will on the citizens. At the same time, administrative agencies can destroy individual citizens, knowing that citizens must wait too long to receive justice in the courts. The result is a combination of anarchy and tyranny—the antinomian legacy.

This possibility of bureaucratic paralysis is characteristic of all administrative systems, even a centralized tyranny such as the Soviet Union. A classic example is the case of the Soviet dissident of the 1960s and early 1970s, Vladimir Bukovsky. Bukovsky spent well over a decade in the Soviet gulag concentration camp system. He was arrested and sentenced in spite of specific civil rights protections provided by the Soviet Constitution—a document that has never been respected by the Soviet bureaucracy. But, once in prison, he learned to make life miserable for the director of his camp. He learned that written complaints had to be responded to officially within a month. This administrative rule governing the camps was for “Western consumption,” but it was nevertheless a rule. Any camp administrator who failed to honor it risked the possibility of punishment, should a superior or an ambitious subordinate decide to pressure him for any reason. In short, any failure to “do it by the book” could be used against him later on.

Bukovsky became an assembly-line producer of official protests. By the end of his career as a “zek,” he had taught hundreds of other inmates to follow his lead. By following certain procedures that were specified by the complaint system, Bukovsky's protesting army began to disrupt the whole Soviet bureaucracy. His camp clogged the entire system with protests—hundreds of them per day. He estimates that eventually the number of formal complaints exceeded 75,000. To achieve such a phenomenal output, the protestors had to adopt the division of labor. Bukovsky described the process: "At the height of our war, each of us wrote from ten to thirty complaints a day. Composing thirty complaints in one day is not easy, so we usually divided up the subjects among ourselves and each man wrote on his own subject before handing it around for copying by all the others. If there are five men in a cell and each man takes six subjects, each of them has the chance to write thirty complaints while composing only six himself."¹² The complaints were addressed to prominent individuals and organizations: the deputies of the Supreme Soviet, the regional directors, astronauts, actors, generals, admirals, the secretaries of the Central Committee, shepherds, sportsmen, and so forth. "In the Soviet Union, all well-known individuals are state functionaries."¹³ Each complaint had to be responded to. The camp administrators grew frantic. They threatened punishments, and often imposed them, but it did no good; the ocean of protests grew. Bukovsky's description is incomparable:

The next thing that happens is that the prison office, inundated with complaints, is unable to dispatch them within the three-day deadline. For overrunning the deadline they are bound to be reprimanded and to lose any bonuses they might have won. When our war was at its hottest the prison governor summoned every last employee to help out at the office with this work—librarians, bookkeepers, censors, political instructors, security officers. And it went even further. All the students at the next-door Ministry of the Interior training college were pressed into helping out as well.

All answers to and dispatches of complaints have to be registered in a special book, and strict attention has to be paid to observing the correct deadlines. Since complaints follow a complex route and have to be registered every step of the way, they spawn dossiers and records of their own. In the end they all land in one of two places: the local prosecutor's office or the local department of the Interior Ministry. These offices can't keep up with the flood either and also break their deadlines, for which they too are reprimanded and lose their bonuses. The bureaucratic machine is thus obliged to work at full stretch, and you transfer the paper avalanche from one office to another, sowing panic in the ranks of the enemy. Bureaucrats are bureaucrats, always at loggerheads with one another, and often enough your complaints become weapons in internecine wars between bureaucrat and bureaucrat, department and department. This goes on for months and months, until, at last, the most powerful factor of all in Soviet life enters the fray—statistics.¹⁴

12. Vladimir Bukovsky, To Build a Castle: My Life As a Dissident (New York: Viking, 1979), p. 37.

13. Idem.

As the 75,000 complaints became part of the statistical record, the statistical record of the prison camp and the regional camps was spoiled. All bureaucrats suffered. There went the prizes, pennants, and other benefits. “The workers start seething with discontent, there is panic in the regional Party headquarters, and a senior commission of inquiry is dispatched to the prison.”¹⁵ The commission then discovered a mass of shortcomings with the work of the prison’s administration, although the commission would seldom aid specific prisoners. The prisoners knew this in advance. But the flood of protests continued for two years. “The entire bureaucratic system of the Soviet Union found itself drawn into this war. There was virtually no government department or institution, no region or republic, from which we weren’t getting answers. Eventually we had even drawn the criminal cons into our game, and the complaints disease began to spread throughout the prison—in which there were twelve hundred men altogether. I think that if the business had continued a little longer and involved everyone in the prison, the Soviet bureaucratic machine would have simply ground to a halt: all Soviet institutions would have had to stop work and busy themselves with writing replies to US.”¹⁶

Finally, in 1977, they capitulated to several specific demands of the prisoners to improve the conditions of the camps. The governor of the prison was removed and pensioned off.¹⁷ Their ability to inflict death-producing punishments did them little good, once the prisoners learned of the Achilles’ heel of the bureaucracy: paperwork. The leaders of the Soviet Union could bear it no longer: they deported Bukovsky. Subsequently, according to one Soviet defector, the Soviets had to scrap the Constitution once again (unofficially, of course) in the

14. Ibid., pp. 37–38.

15. Ibid., pp. 38–39.

16. Ibid., p. 40.

17. Idem.

area of protection of free speech.¹⁸ Dissidents were again subjected to long-term incarceration in psychiatric hospitals, just as they were before Bukovsky and other dissidents organized their protesting techniques, both inside and outside the Gulag.¹⁹ As Bukovsky noted, "they wrote a Constitution with a plethora of rights and freedoms that they simply couldn't afford to grant, rightly supposing that nobody would be reckless enough to insist on them being observed."²⁰ Nevertheless, when internal dissidents and external observers put the pressure of formal paperwork on the ruling elite, they sometimes capitulated.

E. Centralization and the Declining Respect for Law

Economist Milton Friedman suggested that the respect for law that prevails in capitalist societies is closely related to the absence of comprehensive, detailed administrative regulations. The British experience of the nineteenth century provides Friedman with a case study of the public's response to civil law.

In the early nineteenth century, British citizens were notorious law-breakers. They were a nation of smugglers, ready to offer bribes, ready to take advantage of every inefficiency in the law-enforcement system. Very little could be accomplished through legal channels. Friedman says that one of the reasons why Jeremy Bentham and the Utilitarians were hostile to civil government and adopted laissez-faire doctrines in the early nineteenth century was because they recognized that civil government was completely inefficient. "The government was corrupt and inefficient. It was clearly oppressive. It was something that had to be gotten out of the way as a first step to reform. The fundamental philosophy of the Utilitarians, or any philosophy that puts its emphasis on some kind of a sum of utilities, however loose may be the expression, does not lead to laissez-faire in principle. It leads to whatever kind of organization of economic activity is thought to produce results which are regarded as good in the sense of adding to the sum total of utilities. I think the major reason why the Utilitarians tended to be in favor of laissez-faire was the obvious fact that government

18. He appeared on the Cable News Network in February, 1984.

19. On the use of mental hospitals as substitute prisons, see Zhores Medvedev and Roy Medvedev, A Question of Madness: Repression by Psychiatry in the Soviet Union (New York: Random House, 1971); Sidney Bloch and Peter Reddaway, Psychiatric Terror: How Soviet Psychiatry Is Used to Suppress Dissent (New York: Basic Books, 1977).

20. Bukovsky, To Build a Castle, p. 239.

was incompetent to perform any of the tasks they wanted to see performed.”²¹ (Friedman’s assertion that Utilitarianism was not philosophically attached to the free market social order is borne out by the fact that many British Utilitarians in the late nineteenth century were ready to advocate government regulation in order to produce “the greatest good for the greatest number”—a reversal of the conclusions of the early Utilitarians, but not a reversal of their pragmatic philosophy.)²²

Friedman went on to make some extremely important observations concerning what he calls the capital stock of people’s willingness to obey the law. First, there must be an increase in people’s respect for civil law through a reduction of the number of burdensome regulations. Second, there is an increase in the number of such laws, since politicians and bureaucrats begin to take advantage of the citizens’ willingness to co-operate with the state. This, in turn, reduces the ability of the state planners to achieve their publicly announced goals. There are therefore limits to centralization.

Whatever the reason for its appeal, the adoption of laissez-faire had some important consequences. Once laissez-faire was adopted, the economic incentive for corruption was largely removed. After all, if governmental officials had no favors to grant, there was no need to bribe them. And if there was nothing to be gained from government, it could hardly be a source of corruption. Moreover, the laws that were left were for the most part—and again, I am oversimplifying and exaggerating—laws that were widely accepted, as proper and desirable; laws against theft, robbery, murder, etc. This is in sharp contrast to a situation in which the legislative structure designates as crimes what people individually do not regard as crimes or makes it illegal for people to do what seems to them the sensible thing. The latter situation tends to reduce respect for the law. One of the unintended and indirect effects of laissez-faire was thus to establish a climate in Britain of a much greater degree of obedience and respect for the law than had existed earlier. Probably there were other forces at work in this development, but I believe that the establishment of laissez-faire laid the groundwork for a reform in the civil service in the latter part of the century—the establishment of a civil service

21. Milton Friedman, “Is a Free Society Stable?” New Individualist Review, II (Summer 1962); reprinted in one volume by the Liberty Press, Indianapolis, Indiana, 1981, p. 245. (<http://bit.ly/FriedmanStable>) chosen on the basis of examinations and merit of professional competence. You could get that kind of development because the incentives to seek such places for purposes of exerting "improper" influence were greatly reduced when government had few favors to confer.

22. Ellen Frankel Paul, Moral Revolution and Economic Science: The Demise of Laissez-Faire in Nineteenth-Century British Political Philosophy (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1979).

In these ways, the development of laissez-faire laid the groundwork for a widespread respect for the law, on the one hand, and a relatively incorrupt, honest, and efficient civil service on the other, both of which are essential preconditions for the operation of a collectivist society. In order for a collectivist society to operate, the people must obey the laws and there must be a civil service that can and will carry out the laws. The success of capitalism established these preconditions for a movement in the direction of much greater state intervention.

The process I have described obviously runs both ways. A movement in the direction of a collectivist society involves increased governmental intervention into the daily lives of people and the conversion into crimes of actions that are regarded by the ordinary person as entirely proper. These tend in turn to undermine respect for the law and to give incentives to corrupt state officials. There can, I think, be little doubt that this process has begun in Britain and has gone a substantial distance. Although respect for the law may still be greater than it is here [the United States], most observers would agree that respect for the law in Britain has gone down decidedly in the course of the last twenty or thirty years, certainly since the war [World War II], as a result of the kind of laws people have been asked to obey. . . . The erosion of the capital stock of willingness to obey the law reduces the capacity of a society to run a centralized state, to move away from freedom. This effect on law obedience is, thus one that is reversible and runs in both directions. . . .

This seems to me an important point. Once the government embarks on intervention into and regulation of private activities, this establishes an incentive for large numbers of individuals to use their ingenuity to find ways to get around the government regulations. One result is that there appears to be a lot more regulation than there really is. Another is that the time and energy of government officials is increasingly taken up with the need to plug the holes in the regulations that the citizens are finding, creating, and exploiting. From this point of view, Parkinson's law about the growth of bureaucracy without a corresponding growth of output may be a favorable feature for the maintenance of a free society. An efficient governmental organization and not an inefficient one is almost surely the greater threat to a free society. One of the virtues of a free society is precisely that the market tends to be a more efficient organizing principle than centralized direction. Centralized direction in this way is always having to fight something of a losing battle.²³

Conclusion

What we can and should strive for is to conform our human law codes to the explicit requirements of the Ten Commandments and the case-law applications of biblical law. The answer to our legal crisis is not to be found in the hypothetical perfection of formal law, nor can it be found in the hypothetical perfection of substantive (ethical) justice. Judges will make errors, but these errors can be minimized by placing them within the framework of biblical law. Before God gave the nation of Israel a comprehensive system of law, Jethro gave Israel a comprehensive system of decentralized courts. By admitting the impossibility of the goal for earthly perfect justice, Moses made possible the reign of imperfectly applied revealed law—perfect in principle, but inevitably flawed in application. The messianic goal of a perfect law-order, in time and on earth, was denied to Moses and his successors.

One of the most obvious failures of the modern administrative civil government system is its quest for perfect justice and perfect control over the details of economic life. The implicit assertion of omniscience on the part of the central planners is economically fatal. The result of such an assertion is an increase of regulations, increased confusion among both rulers and ruled, and a growing disrespect for civil law. The productivity of the West cannot be maintained in the face of such an exponential build-up of central power. It is only because the laws are not consistent, nor universally enforced or obeyed, that the modern messianic state has survived. The price of perfect human justice is too high to be achieved by the efforts of men.

23. Friedman, pp. 245–47. I read it as an undergraduate. I never forgot it.

THE OATH-BOUND KINGDOM OF PRIESTS

And Moses went up unto God, and the LORD called unto him out of the mountain, saying, Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel; Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel (Ex. 19:3–6).

The theocentric principle here is the oath: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

God told Moses to tell the people of Israel that they must covenant with Him. He had delivered them out of the house of bondage. Meredith G. Kline identified this as point two of the Near Eastern treaty model: the sovereign's announcement of his mighty works in history. He called this "historical prologue."² I associate point two mainly with the covenant itself. The Book of Exodus is the book of the covenant. "And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the LORD hath said will we do, and be obedient" (Ex. 24:7). It is the second book of the Pentateuch, which in turn is structured in terms of the five points.

Who was this God who had delivered them? The owner of all the

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Cf. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

2. Meredith G. Kline, Treaty of the Great King (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963). The is reprinted in Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972).

earth: “for all the earth is mine.” Here, God identifies His sovereignty with His comprehensive ownership. Ownership is associated with boundaries: point three of the biblical covenant model. The sanctity of God’s name (third commandment)³ is associated with the commandment against theft (eighth commandment).⁴

Priests are mediators between God and man. They are representatives. It is appropriate that the identification of the Israelites as a kingdom of priests should complete Part 1 of this commentary on Exodus, which is the story of rival claims of representation: God vs. Pharaoh.⁵

Israel would henceforth serve as a representative priesthood for the whole world. This was an aspect of God’s common grace.⁶ God preserved the world for the sake of His people: the division of labor. God’s people are given greater productivity and therefore greater income because of the specialized efforts of people who are outside the covenant of redemption. The general dominion covenant still binds all mankind. At the same time, He preserved his people for the sake of the world: the priestly function. Representation is always hierarchical: upward and downward.

The tribe of Levi was the priestly tribe for the priestly nation. The family of Aaron served as the high priests. They officiated at the sanctuary, i.e., the judicially set-apart place where the sacrifices to God were made.

And the LORD said unto Aaron, Thou and thy sons and thy father’s house with thee shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary: and thou and thy sons with thee shall bear the iniquity of your priesthood. And thy brethren also of the tribe of Levi, the tribe of thy father, bring thou with thee, that they may be joined unto thee, and minister unto thee: but thou and thy sons with thee shall minister before the tabernacle of witness. And they shall keep thy charge, and the charge of all the tabernacle: only they shall not come nigh the vessels of the sanctuary and the altar, that neither they, nor ye also, die. And they shall be joined unto thee, and keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation, for all the service of the tabernacle: and a stranger shall not come nigh unto you (Num. 18:1–4).

An important aspect of this office of priest was the tithe.⁷ The tithe

3. Chapter 23.

4. Chapter 28.

5. I did not see this when I wrote Moses and Pharaoh (1985).

6. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

7. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, is paid by lower priests to higher priests. At the time of Israel's oath, there was not yet a higher priesthood to receive the tithes of the kingdom of priests. God designated this priesthood only after the golden calf incident: the tribe of Levi. After Israel inherited the land of Canaan, members of the other tribes paid ten percent of their agricultural produce to the Levites, who in turn paid ten percent to the priests who officiated at the temple.

And the LORD spake unto Aaron, Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land, neither shalt thou have any part among them: I am thy part and thine inheritance among the children of Israel. And, behold, I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation (Num. 18:20–21).

Thus speak unto the Levites, and say unto them, When ye take of the children of Israel the tithes which I have given you from them for your inheritance, then ye shall offer up an heave offering of it for the LORD, even a tenth part of the tithe. And this your heave offering shall be reckoned unto you, as though it were the corn of the threshingfloor, and as the fulness of the winepress. Thus ye also shall offer an heave offering unto the LORD of all your tithes, which ye receive of the children of Israel; and ye shall give thereof the LORD'S heave offering to Aaron the priest (Num. 18:26–28).

The tithe system applied only to the priests. The world outside the land of Israel did not tithe to Israel. Why not? Because covenant-breakers outside the Promised Land were not priests.

The reason why the requirement to tithe applies to Christians is because God has designated them as priests.

“But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light” (I Peter 2:9). As priests, they are required to pay a tenth to the local church, which represents them before God. The judicial marks of this representation are the sacraments: baptism and the Lord's Supper.

Conclusion

God established a kingdom of priests at Mt. Sinai. The people voluntarily covenanted themselves to God by a formal act of ratification. “And all the people answered together, and said, All that the LORD hath spoken we will do. And Moses returned the words of the people unto the LORD” (Ex. 19:8).

This formal act of covenantal ratification to the God who owns the earth, who was the God who had delivered them, established the national covenant. It also made mandatory a system of tithes.

CONCLUSION

And Moses stretched forth his hand over the sea, and the sea returned to his strength when the morning appeared; and the Egyptians fled against it; and the LORD overthrew the Egyptians in the midst of the sea. And the waters returned, and covered the chariots, and the horse-men, and all the host of Pharaoh that came into the sea after them; there remained not so much as one of them. But the children of Israel walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea; and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left. Thus the LORD saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians; and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea shore. And Israel saw that great work which the LORD did upon the Egyptians: and the people feared the LORD, and believed the LORD, and his servant Moses (Ex. 14:27–31).

When Moses and the Israelites looked behind them from the eastern shore of the Red Sea and saw the army of Egypt overwhelmed by the water, they saw the judgment of God on the power religion and its institutional manifestation, the power state. They had been involved in an historic confrontation analogous to the original confrontation between Satan and God. They had been given visible evidence of the inescapable outcome of this confrontation between these two rival religions: in heaven, in the garden, at the cross, and at the final judgment. The power religion does not have the power to defeat a holy God and His holy people, whenever they conform themselves to the terms of His covenant. Seeking power, the power religionists lose it—in time, on earth, and in eternity.

Nevertheless, the victory of God's people, while assured, is not visibly manifested in every confrontation. Herbert Schlossberg was correct: "The Bible can be interpreted as a string of God's triumphs disguised as disasters."¹ As he said, "We need a theological interpretation of disaster, one that recognizes that God acts in such events as captivities, defeats, and crucifixions.”² It often seems as though the power religionists—the seekers of gnostic salvation, the elite central planners—have all power. They don’t. “Never ask the enlightened ones about their track record, which is a series of disguised disasters. . . .”³ Most of Christianity’s victories have been disguised in the past, and so have most of Satan’s disasters.

1. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American Society (Wheaton, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 304.

The Hebrews’ experience in Egypt testified to a truth summarized by Schlossberg: “When loyalty to God disappears, there is no longer a barrier to an omniscient state.”⁴ But the self-professed omniscient state isn’t omniscient; it is progressively incompetent, as Egypt’s experience reveals. Such a state is simply the chief institutional manifestation of covenant-breaking man’s attempt to imitate, and then usurp, the omnipotence of God. But omnipotence is an incommunicable attribute of God. Therefore, the only possible source of man’s long-term but limited power is biblical ethics. Adherence to biblical law, by grace through faith, is the only means of fulfilling the terms of the dominion covenant.

Thus, there is no need for Christians to become adherents of the escapist religion in order to avoid becoming adherents of the power religion. The dominion religion is God’s authorized alternative. “We do not pretend that the fate of the world is in our hands. That way lies madness, being a burden that no human being can bear. Yet, we are not condemned to resignation and quietism, still less to despair. We are not the lords of history and do not control its outcome, but we have assurance that there is a lord of history and he controls its outcome.”⁵

I cite Schlossberg repeatedly because his book, more than any other in my lifetime, has best stated the theological case against the power religion.⁶ (Solzhenitsyn’s Gulag Archipelago has best stated the historical case.) The idols of covenant-breaking man—history, humanity, mammon, nature, power, and religion—again and again reappear in the civilizations built by self-professed autonomous man. All idols, he asserts, are either idols of history or idols of nature.⁷ Covenant-breaking man asserts his authority over both nature and history, but because

2. Idem.

3. Ibid., p. 195.

4. Ibid., p. 229.

5. Ibid., p. 304.

6. I wrote this in 1985, two years after his book was published. I have not changed my opinion.

7. Ibid., p. 11.

man is a creature, mankind is thereby captured, for mankind is, in the humanist view, both a product of history and a product of nature. By seeking power over both, covenant-breaking people place themselves in bondage to the self-professed masters of the mysteries. By asserting that "man must take control of man," the humanist thereby implicitly asserts that "some men should take control over all the others." By seeking to exercise dominion apart from God, ethical rebels thereby deny their own creaturehood and therefore their status as humans.⁸

Egypt is the archetype of covenant-breaking society. It proclaimed divinity for its leader, the sole link between the gods and mankind. It sought escape from the rigors of nature (drought and famine) and the rigors of history (change). The goal was static power—power over nature, over the netherworld, and over scarcity. But such a static state of existence can be achieved only in death. Thus, the monuments of Egypt were monuments of death: the pyramids, the tombs, and the labyrinths. Their quest for power, meaning freedom from the God-cursed changes in life, led to their cult of the dead. The Egyptians hoped for resurrection, but theirs was a resurrection based on magical manipulation, not a resurrection based on biblical ethics.

Pharaoh manifested this cult of the dead in his attempt to murder the Hebrew males. He could not stand the pressures of social change, particularly the social changes forced upon Egypt by the high birth rates of the Hebrews. He launched a program of genocide. In this respect, he was only marginally different from the humanitarians of the twentieth century. As Schlossberg said:

It is no coincidence that humanitarian policy has reached the zenith of its influence at a time when death propaganda is so much in evidence. The arguments in favor of abortion, infanticide, and euthanasia reveal that the humanitarian ethic wishes to restrict the right to live and expand the right to die—and to kill. Humanism is a philosophy of death. It embraces death, wishes a good death, speaks of the horrible burdens of living for the baby who is less than perfect, for the sick person in pain. It is intolerable to live, cruel to be forced to live, but blessed to die. It is unfair to have to care for the helpless, and therefore merciful to kill. Those who wish to go on living, it seems, are guilty and ungrateful wretches dissipating the energies of 'loved ones' who have better uses for the estate than paying medical bills.⁹

8. C. S. Lewis, The Abolition of Man (New York: Macmillan, 1947).

9. Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction, p. 82.

God confronted the Egyptian religion of death by calling into question its assertion of power. He dealt with Pharaoh, his priests, and his people in terms of their religious presuppositions. He demonstrated publicly for all the world to see that the power religion of Egypt was a fraud. Pharaoh had no choice in the matter. God decided to make a spectacle out of him and out of Egypt. "And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth" (Ex. 9:16).

The Hebrews had this example behind them. They were to remind themselves and their children of the implications of the power religion. This was the educational function of Passover. It was an institutional testimony to the futility of seeking power apart from biblical law. It is therefore futile to seek to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant apart from God. It is equally futile to attempt to escape from the burdens of this covenant. Such an escape leads directly to historical impotence and slavery under some temporarily successful group of power religionists. Better to be Moses herding sheep in Midian than anywhere in Egypt, either as a Hebrew or as a Pharaoh. Better yet to be Moses confronting Pharaoh. Even better, to be Moses on the far side of the Red Sea watching Pharaoh drown. Better yet, to be in the Promised Land, with a copy of God's law in your possession. But, best of all, to be at work in the wilderness, progressively converting it into a garden by means of hard work, in terms of the biblical law which is in your heart, and also in the hearts of all your neighbors (Ezek. 36:26–29; Jer. 31:31–34; Heb. 8:10–11).

End of Volume 1

Volume 2: Decalogue and Dominion

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON EXODUS

VOLUME 2

DECALOGUE AND DOMINION

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2011)

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

Gary North

PART 2: DECALOGUE AND DOMINION

An Economic Commentary on The Ten Commandments

Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus

Part 2: Decalogue and Dominion

Formerly: The Sinai Strategy: Economics and the Ten Commandments

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Third Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1: Part 1, Representation and Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Population Growth: Tool of Dominion (Ex. 1:5–7) | 12 |
| 2. Imperial Bureaucracy (Ex. 1:8–12) | 31 |
| 3. Rigorous Waste and Rigorous Socialism (Ex. 1:13–14) | 54 |
| 4. Illegitimate State Power (Ex. 1:15–16) | 67 |
| 5. Envy, Rumor, and Bondage (Ex. 2:11–14) | 73 |
| 6. Cumulative Transgression and Restitution (Ex. 3:21–22) | 83 |
| 7. The Optimum Production Mix (Ex. 5:5–7) | 92 |
| 8. Covenantal Judgment (Ex. 8:19) | 108 |
| 9. Original Ownership (Ex. 9:29–30) | 121 |
| 10. Total Sacrifice, Total Sovereignty (Ex. 10:24) | 129 |
| 11. Separation and Dominion (Ex. 11:7) | 137 |
| 12. Discontinuity and Continuity (Ex. 20:10–11) | 147 |
| 13. Unconditional Surrender (Ex. 10:30–32) | 184 |
| 14. The Rule of Law (Ex. 12:48–49) | 195 |
| 15. The Firstborn Offering (Ex. 13:1–2) | 230 |
| 16. The Psychology of Slavery (Ex. 14:12) | 237 |
| 17. The Metaphor of Growth: Ethics (Ex. 15:17) | 246 |
| 18. Manna, Predictability, and Dominion (Ex. 16:4–5) | 258 |
| 19. Imperfect Justice (Ex. 18:21–22) | 267 |
| 20. The Oath-Bound Kingdom of Priests (Ex. 19:3–6) | 280 |
| Conclusion | 284 |

Volume 2: Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion

| | |
|--|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 289 |
| 21. The God of Liberation (Ex. 20:1–3) | 305 |
| 22. Graven Images and Rival Civilizations (Ex. 20:4–6) | 315 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 23. Lawful Title (20:7) | 343 |
| 24. Rest and Dominion (Ex. 20:8–11) | 359 |
| 25. Family Capital (Ex. 20:12) | 371 |
| 26. God’s Monopoly of Execution (Ex. 20:13) | 386 |
| 27. The Yoke of Co-operative Service (Ex. 20:14) | 398 |
| 28. The Rights of Private Property (Ex. 20:15) | 411 |
| 29. The Value of a Name (Ex. 20:16) | 450 |
| 30. Covetousness and Conflict (Ex. 20:17) | 477 |
| Conclusion | 494 |

Volume 3: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 513 |
| 31. Servitude, Protection, and Marriage (Ex. 21:2–4) | 541 |
| 32. Wives and Concubines (Ex. 21:7–11) | 568 |
| 33. Executing a Rebellious Son (Ex. 21:15, 17) | 598 |
| 34. Kidnapping (Ex. 21:16) | 602 |
| 35. The Costs of Private Conflict (Ex. 18–19) | 621 |
| 36. The Human Commodity (Ex. 21:20–21) | 634 |
| 37. Criminal Law and Restoration (Ex. 21:22–25) | 649 |
| 38. The Auction for Substitute Sanctions (Ex. 21:22–25) | 681 |
| 39. Freedom for an Eye (Ex. 21:26–27) | 703 |
| 40. The Ransom for Life (Ex. 21:28–31) | 716 |
| 41. The Uncovered Pit (Ex. 21:33–34) | 745 |
| 42. Knowledge and Responsibility (Ex. 21:35–36) | 755 |
| 43. Proportional Restitution (Ex. 22:1, 4) | 765 |
| 44. Pollution, Ownership, and Responsibility (Ex. 22:5–6) | 800 |
| 45. Safekeeping and Liability (Ex. 22:7–9) | 871 |

Volume 4: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|------|
| 46. Caretaking and Negligence (Ex. 22:10–13) | 895 |
| 47. Seduction and Servitude (22:16–17) | 905 |
| 48. Oppression, Omniscience and Judgment (Ex. 22:21–24) | 932 |
| 49. The Prohibition against Usury (Ex. 22:25–27) | 970 |
| 50. Impartial Justice (Ex. 23:1–3, 6–7) | 1023 |
| 51. Finders should not be Keepers (Ex. 23:4–5) | 1040 |
| 52. Bribery and Oppression (Ex. 23:8) | 1051 |
| 53. Sabbatical Liberty (Ex. 23:9–12) | 1078 |
| 54. Feasts and Citizenship (Ex. 23:14–19) | 1092 |
| 55. The Curse of Zero Growth (Ex. 23:25–26) | 1115 |

| | |
|--|------|
| 56. God's Limits on Sacrifice (Ex. 25:3–8, 36:5–7) | 1140 |
| 57. The Economics of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:8–9) | 1159 |
| 58. Blood Money, not Head Tax (Ex. 30:11–16) | 1170 |
| 59. Sabbath Rest vs. Autonomy (Ex. 35:2) | 1180 |
| 60. The Ability to Teach (Ex. 35:31, 34a) | 1186 |
| Conclusion | 1195 |
| Conclusion to Authority and Dominion | 1231 |

Volume 5: Appendixes

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology | 1255 |
| APPENDIX B–The Demographics of Decline | 1283 |
| APPENDIX C–The Labyrinth and The Garden | 1320 |
| APPENDIX D–The Rule of Law and the Free Market | 1339 |
| APPENDIX E–The Economic Implications of The Sabbath | 1364 |
| APPENDIX F–Timing the Lord's Day | 1442 |
| APPENDIX G–Macaulay on Democracy | 1447 |
| APPENDIX H–The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost | 1453 |

Volume 6: Appendixes

| | |
|--|------|
| APPENDIX I–Pollution in the Soviet Union | 1535 |
| APPENDIX J–Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney | 1543 |
| APPENDIX K–Slavery in the American South | 1557 |
| APPENDIX L–Maimonides' Code : Is it Biblical? | 1574 |
| APPENDIX M–Victim's Rights vs. the Messianic State | 1638 |
| APPENDIX N–Covenantal Law and Covenantal Love | 1679 |
| APPENDIX O–Social Antinomianism | 1695 |
| APPENDIX P–The Hoax of Higher Criticism | 1712 |
| APPENDIX Q–The Restoration of Biblical Casuistry | 1734 |
| APPENDIX R–What is Covenant Law? | 1770 |
| APPENDIX S–What are the Case Laws? | 1795 |

PREFACE

Why should you devote the many hours that it will take to read this book, which is over 450 pages long (including the original appendixes)? Here are a dozen possible reasons.

You want to understand the Ten Commandments better.

You want to understand economics better.

You want to know more about the importance of the Ten Commandments in history.

You want to answer theological liberals who attack the Ten Commandments as valid only in an ancient agricultural world.

You want to answer political liberals who insist that Jesus was a socialist revolutionary, or close to it.

You want to see if the Bible sets forth moral and judicial principles that inevitably produce a free market economy if widely obeyed.

You want to answer skeptics (humanists and pietists) who insist that "There is no such thing as Christian economics."

You want to know if the Ten Commandments are an unbreakable unity.

You want to know why Christians take a day off on Sunday rather than Saturday.

You want to know if the civil government should prohibit people from working on Sunday.

You want to know how the Ten Commandments should be applied in the modern world.

You want to know how the Ten Commandments ought to be numbered and why.

This book is part of a project: an economic commentary on the Bible. I wrote the first edition of this volume in 1985, which was titled The Sinai Strategy. The Institute for Christian Economics published it in 1986, I did not have anything like the volume of verse-by-verse exegesis behind me that I have today.

This book had an odd history. In my 1986 Preface, I recorded the following series of events.

The day I finished the final reading (ha!) of the page proofs of The Sinai Strategy, I sat down and began editing a manuscript on the covenant by Ray Sutton. It is an insightful book, one which I suspect may provide Bible students with the fundamental framework for understanding the biblical concept of the covenant, which is the Bible's most important doctrine relating to the relationship between God and man.

As I was reading his chapter on the Ten Commandments, I was stunned. He had entirely missed the most important single piece of evidence for his thesis. So had I. So has every commentator I have ever read. What he had failed to see was that his five-point outline of the covenant, which he had developed independently of the Ten Commandments, fits them like a glove. More than this: It opens up the whole structure of the Ten Commandments.

My immediate thought was: "Here comes a major revision of The Sinai Strategy, and there goes $4000¹ in typesetting charges, plus two week's work on the index I just completed." The indexing upset me most. Above everything else associated with writing a book, I hate to index. Yet if I were to attempt to incorporate my discovery into the text, I would have to rewrite everything.

Or else I could change the Preface by adding a summary of Sutton's outline. So I went back to the page proofs to see how lengthy the Preface was. Guess what? No Preface. Nothing. It was listed right there in the Table of Contents, but there was nothing in the page proofs, nothing in my original manuscript, and nothing in my computer. I had forgotten to write a Preface. It would have been listed in the Table of Contents, but there would have been nothing in the book

So, what I have decided to do is to take the easy way out. I am not going to rewrite this book. I am going to tell you here what the outline should have been, and you can insert it into the chapters mentally as you read. None of my conclusions should need revising, I hope. There is some space left at the end of most of the chapters, so I will add a few comments if necessary. The content of the book should not be affected, but the ability of the reader to "fit the pieces together" might have been easier if I had seen Sutton's manuscript earlier, assuming I would have spotted its applicability to the Ten

1. That would be $8,000 in 2012.

Commandments.

In retrospect, I see that I made the correct decision. I did not know enough to revise the book to the extent that I have revised it in 2006 and again in 2011. In 1985, I was not in a position to re-write this book. I did not grasp the fact that the Pentateuch itself is structured in terms of the five-point biblical covenant model.² I did not recognize that the Book of Exodus is structured in terms of this model.³ I did not recognize that the Book of Leviticus is structured in terms of this model,⁴ or that the five sacrifices in Leviticus are structured in terms of it.⁵ I did not recognize that the Book of Revelation is structured in terms of it, and neither did David Chilton.⁶ I did recognize that Deuteronomy is. Sutton had reminded me of Meredith G. Kline's discussion of this fact in The Treaty of the Great King (1963), following George Mendenhall's discovery in the 1950s.⁷

A. The Covenant's Outline

What Sutton argues is that there is a five-part structure to both the Old Testament and New Testament covenants. This points to the fact that there is continuity between these two covenants. He modified the structure suggested by Kline for the Book of Deuteronomy, substituting "hierarchy" for "kingdom prologue" (point two). I had never carefully considered this structure before, and surely not as a guide to the structure of the Bible. Neither had Sutton. But I recognized instantly the enormous importance of this discovery for a correct understanding of the Biblical covenant and covenants generally. His book, That You May Prosper, was published in 1987. The model:

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012), pp. xxx–xxxiii; North, Leviticus: An Economic Commentary (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), pp. xlii–xlix. (<http://bit.ly/gnleviticus>); North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Introduction to Part 1, Section B.

3. Gary North, Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), p. 93. (<http://bit.ly/gntools>)

4. North, Leviticus, pp. 44–45. Cf. James B. Jordan, Covenant Sequence in Leviticus and Deuteronomy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/jjcovseq>)

5. Ibid., pp. xlix–liv, 45–47.

6. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

7. George Mendenhall, "Covenant Forms in Israelite Tradition," Biblical Archeologist, Vol. 17, No. 3 (1954), pp. 50–76.

1. Transcendence/immanence (redemption)
2. Hierarchy/authority (submission)
3. Ethics/dominion (stipulations)
4. Judicial/evaluational (sanctions)
5. Legitimacy/inheritance (continuity)

This may not seem to be a revolutionary insight, but it is. It is not possible for me to reproduce all of his arguments that support this interpretation, nor discuss all of its applications. Sutton's book is the bare-bones minimum. He had to cut down the manuscript in order to keep the book to 318 pages.

Following Kline, he argued that this same structure is found in the suzerainty treaties of the ancient world. The king (suzerain) would initially announce his sovereignty over a nation, demand loyalty, impose sanctions for disobedience, offer protection for obedience, publish a law code, and establish the rules of succession. Sutton believes that these treaties were simply imitations of a fundamental structure of human government which is inherent in man's relationship with God.

Two decades later, in 2006, I felt compelled to revise this book. Chapter 3 required a complete revision: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless who taketh his name in vain." In 1986, I followed Rushdoony's exposition in Institutes of Biblical Law, which stresses the oath aspect of the third commandment. The hermeneutical problem for my thesis was not clear to me then, namely, that the oath is closely associated with the fourth point of the biblical covenant model. Law is associated with point three. Law and oath are covenantally linked, of course, but the third commandment has to do more with God's title or possession of His name, and therefore His authority over the uses to which His name can be put.

What brought this discrepancy to my attention was a suggested revision that a reader sent to Sutton after the Institute for Christian Economics published his book in 1987. He had more accurately seen the nature of the five points. He suggested this revision:

1. Transcendence/immanence
2. Hierarchy/authority
3. Ethics/dominion
4. Oath/sanctions
5. Succession/inheritance

This creative individual had created an acronym: THEOS, the ancient Greek word for God. But he had done far more than this. He had recognized the importance of the covenantal oath in the fourth point, namely, the self-maledictory oath of every biblical covenant. The oath involves sanctions. This, I did not see clearly in 1986.

With this in mind, I now return to the Preface of 1986, but with the revised scheme for points 4 and 5.

1. Transcendence/immanence (sovereignty)

Some of the highlights include the following. In Genesis 1:1 we read, "In the beginning, God created the heaven and the earth." He is the Creator God. He is not part of the creation. Thus, the Bible announces the Creator/creature distinction. This distinction is fundamental to every aspect of life. God is not to be in any way confused with His creation. He is not part of a hypothetical "chain of being" with His creation. As the Psalmist put it: "For thou, LORD, art high above all the earth: thou art exalted far above all gods" (Ps. 97:9). "The LORD is great in Zion; and he is high above all the people" (Ps. 99:2). Perhaps the crucial verses in the Bible that deal with God's transcendence are Isaiah 55:8–9: "For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the LORD. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts."⁸

God is transcendent, but He is also immanent. He is not so far removed from His creation that He has no contact with it. Genesis 1:2 says that the Spirit of God hovered (moved) upon the face of the waters. This imagery of God as a bird hovering over its brood is found throughout the Old Testament. Deuteronomy 32:11 compares God's deliverance of Israel out of the wilderness to an eagle fluttering over

8. Those who are familiar with the writings of Christian philosopher Cornelius Van Til will recognize that the Creator/creature distinction is Van Til's starting point: the sovereignty of God and therefore the non-autonomy of man. John Frame wrote: "Van Til's apologetics is essentially simple, however complicated its elaborations. It makes two basic assertions: (1) that human beings are obligated to presuppose God in all of their thinking, and (2) that unbelievers resist this obligation in every aspect of thought and life. The first assumption leads Van Til to criticize the notion of intellectual autonomy; the second leads him to discuss the noetic [knowledge] effects of sin. . . . The initial description of presuppositionalism shows insight in the prominent place given to Van Til's critique of autonomy: that is, I think, the foundation of Van Til's system and its most persuasive principle. We must not do apologetics as if we were a law unto ourselves, as if we were the measure of all things. Christian thinking, like all of Christian life, is subject to God's lordship." John Frame, "Van Til and the Ligonier Apologetic," Westminster Theological Journal, XLVII (1985), p. 282.

her young. Psalm 91:4 reads: "He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his truth shall be thy shield and buckler." Thus, the Bible denies both deism and pantheism. God is not like the god of deism who "winds up the universe" as a man winds up a clock, and then goes away, leaving it to its own preordained, impersonal devices. We do not live in a world of cosmic impersonalism. God is also not to be identified with His creation, as pantheism's god is. The creation reflects His glory; it does not participate in God. God is present with His creation; He is not part of it.

2. Hierarchy/authority (representation)

The second principle of the covenant is that of hierarchy/authority. The King of creation comes before men and demands that they submit to Him. God required Adam to obey Him. The relationship between God and man is therefore one of command and obedience. The covenant is therefore a bond. It is a personal relationship between responsible individuals. It is to be a union. But this union is not ontological. It is not a union of common "being." God is not some pantheistic being. Men are not evolving into God (Eastern religion). It is a personal relationship based on authority and submission.

3. Ethics/law (standards)

The third aspect of the covenant is its ethical quality. The terms of submission are ethical. The union between covenant-keepers and their God is an ethical union. The disunion between covenant-breakers and God is equally ethical: They are rebels against His law. Adam's fall into sin did not take place because he lacked some essence, some aspect of "being." He was created perfect. He fell willfully. He knew exactly what he was doing. "Adam was not deceived," Paul writes (I Tim. 2:14a).

This emphasis on ethics separates biblical religion from pagan religion. Man is supposed to exercise dominion, but not autonomous power. He is also not to seek power through ritual, or through any attempted manipulation of God or the universe. Dominion is based on adherence to the law of God—by Christ, perfectly and definitively, and by men, subordinately and progressively. Thus, ethics is set in opposition to magic (what Van Til calls metaphysics).

We are not to misuse God's name in a quest for power over creation. God spoke the creation into existence by the power of His word.

4. Oath/sanctions (evaluation/imputation)

The fourth aspect of the covenant is its judicial character. The essence of maturity is man's ability to render God-honoring judgment. God renders definitive judgment in His word, the Bible, and renders final judgment at the end of time. Man is to render analogous judgment progressively through time. During the creation week, God said "It is good" after each day. He evaluated His own work, and He rendered judgment verbally. God is the supreme King, but also the supreme Judge. When He declares a man innocent, because of His grace to the person through the gift of saving faith, God thereby imputes Christ's righteousness to him.⁹ Without God's declaration of salvation, meaning without the imputation of Christ's righteousness to overcome the imputation of Adam's sin, there is no salvation.

When a covenant is "cut," men are reminded of both the blessings and the cursings attached to the covenant. There are oaths and vows. There are covenant rituals. There are visible signs and seals. We see this in the church (baptism, Lord's Supper), the family (marriage ceremony), and in civil government (pledge of allegiance, oath-taking of officers).

5. Succession/inheritance (continuity)

Finally, there is the succession/inheritance aspect of the covenant. There are covenantally specified standards of transferring the blessings of God to the next generation. In other words, the covenant extends over time and across generations. It is a bond that links past, present, and future. It has implications for men's time perspective. It makes covenantally faithful people mindful of the earthly future after they die. It also makes them respectful of the past. For example, they assume that the terms of the covenant do not change in principle. At the same time, they also know that they must be diligent in seeking to apply the fixed ethical terms of the covenant to new historical situations. They are respectful of great historic creeds, and they are also advocates of progress, creedal and otherwise. They believe in change within the fixed ethical terms of the covenant.

The following material appeared in the 1986 Preface.

9. John Murray, Redemption Accomplished and Applied (London: Banner of Truth Trust; Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1961).

B. The Structure of the Ten Commandments

What Sutton had not seen when he wrote his first draft was that the Ten Commandments adhere to this same structure, even its very numbering. Once we recognize that this structure undergirds the Ten Commandments, we come to a remarkable insight: There really are two “tables” of the law. No, there was not a pair of stones, with five laws written on each. There were two tablets with all ten written on each. They served as copies, one for God and one for Israel, in much the same way as a modern sales receipt, which is implicitly modeled after God’s covenant. But there were two separate sections of the Ten Commandments (literally: ten “words” [Deut. 4:13]). They were arranged along this same covenantal pattern in two separate sections, 1–5 and 6–10.

In the Bible, there is to be a two-fold witness to the truth. Conviction for a capital crime requires two witnesses (Deut. 17:7; Num. 35:30). Satan in the garden sought two human witnesses against God, to test God’s word and therefore challenge it. There are two angelic witnesses for every demon, for Satan only took a third of the angelic host with him (Rev. 12:4). Revelation 8 provides a deeply symbolic description of God’s earthly judgment. He sends angels to judge one-third of trees, sea, creatures, ships, rivers, waters, sun, moon, and stars. In short, two-thirds are spared. This is the testimony to God’s victory, in time and on earth. The double-witness pattern is basic to covenantal law and historic judgment.¹⁰

What we find is that the very structure of the Ten Commandments serves as a two-fold witness to the structure of the covenant. Sutton subsequently concluded that the first five-part pattern deals with the priestly functions, while the second five-part pattern deals with the kingly.

I. First Table (priestly)

The traditional distinction between the “two tables of the law”¹¹ is based on (1) what man owes to God, namely, proper worship (first table) and (2) what man owes to his fellow man (second table).

10. Gary North, “Witnesses and Judges,” Biblical Economics Today (Aug./Sept. 1983). I added this essay as Appendix E of the 1987 edition of The Dominion Covenant: Genesis. It remains in Sovereignty and Dominion.

11. The traditional language of two tables, with five laws on each, is incorrect. The physical tables were not divided this way. But there is a five-five division conceptually.

The problem has always come with the fifth commandment, which requires children to honor parents. This one seems to violate any five-fold division between the God-oriented “first table” and the man-oriented or society-oriented pattern of the “second table.” In fact, as we shall see, the fifth commandment is right where it belongs, on the “priestly side of the table.” Martin Luther’s concept of the priesthood of all believers is applicable here.

This arrangement has implications for the kingly category. It deals with coveting as a comprehensive sin. Coveting in general is prohibited.

1. Transcendence/immanence (sovereignty)

The first commandment begins with a description of who God is. He is the God who delivered Israel out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Therefore, we must have no other gods before Him.

This God is the God of liberation—liberation in history. He is transcendent because he is the God of gods, the one true God who exercises absolute sovereignty. How do we know this? First, He says so in Genesis 1. Second, He offers evidence: His defeat of the gods of Egypt. In fact, because He is transcendent, He must be immanent. He is omnipresent. The Psalmist says: “Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? Or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there” (Ps. 139:7–8). Jeremiah writes: “Am I a God at hand, saith the LORD, and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? saith the LORD. Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the LORD” (Jer. 23:23–24). Not only is He generally present throughout creation, He is especially present with His people. “For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? (Deut. 4:7). He is a universal God, the God of creation, yet He is also the God of history. In short, this most high God is the God of deliverance. Therefore, men are to have no other gods before Him, meaning above Him.

2. Hierarchy/authority (representation)

He then forbids the use of graven images. Men bow down to their gods. This shows their subordination to them. God said that men are not to make graven images for themselves, nor are they to serve them. This would be an act of rebellion: removing themselves from the subordination to God, and substituting a rival god of their choice—their autonomous choice—to worship. There is a warning attached: God is a jealous God who visits (sees) the iniquity of men. There is also a promise: God also shows mercy to thousands (of generations) of those who love him and keep His commandments. Keep His commandments, therefore, and gain His mercy. He is in power over men, and He is in a position as a judge to dispense punishments and mercy. In short, obey.

3. Ethics/law (standards)

Do not take the name of God in vain. In 1986, I made an error of analysis. I wrote:

As I argue in the third chapter, by using the name of a society's god, rebellious men seek to invoke power. It is an attempt to manipulate that god in order to get him to do the will of man. God warns us against using His name in this way. To do so is to use His name in vain.

This does not mean that there is no power associated with God's name. On the contrary, there is immense power. This is why men are not to invoke this power autonomously. God promises to honor His name when it is used lawfully by church authorities, which is his ordained monopoly. The church alone can legitimately declare excommunication in the name of God. Thus, what we call "swearing" (profanity) is an unlawful attempt to manipulate God by rebellious men who assume the position of His ordained monopoly, the church.

This analysis confused point four—sanctions—with point three: ethics. The declaration of sanctions is not what the third commandment is about. The third commandment is about extending God's name in history by extending His kingdom in history. His kingdom bears His name. His name is not to be associated with words or deeds that are not in conformity to His revelation of Himself in His law.

I then went on to apply what I had written about the oath.

The magician believes that "words of power" can be used to manipulate external events. Man seeks power by manipulating his environment. He attempts to become master of the creation by the use of secret phrases or techniques known only to initiates, whether witch doctors or scientists. Men seek power through manipulation rather than by ethics, obedience, and service to others.

The prohibition on the misuse of God's name cuts off magic at the roots. The commandment, being negative, is nonetheless positive: ethical. We are considering the priestly function here, however; the ethical and dominical aspects are more clearly seen in the eighth commandment, which parallels the third.

This is accurate, but it is incomplete. The magician and the power religionist mistake invocation for dominion. This is a fundamental distinction between dominion religion and power religion. Biblical religion establishes dominion by covenant, as Sutton's subtitle affirmed. God's Bible-revealed law is His mandated tool of dominion. Thus, ethics rather than power is the heart of biblical religion. Obedience is central, not the use of God's name as a means to power. Power religion uses magical words in the broadest sense—"word magic"—to extend the power of the manipulating person or group. Power religion substitutes words for ethics. It seeks to imitate God, who spoke the universe into existence. Man does not have creative power, only re-creative power. Obedience to God's law is man's lawful way to extend the kingdom of God outward: subordination.

4. Oath/sanctions (evaluation/imputation)

Sutton argues that the sabbath was the day of evaluation in the Old Testament. As I argue in chapter four, following James Jordan's exegesis, the sabbath was also the day of judgment by God. On that day, Satan tempted man. Thus, there had to be judgment. There was supposed to be judgment of Satan by Adam provisionally, and then by God upon His return that afternoon. Instead, Adam sided with Satan against God's Word, and God returned to judge both man and Satan. But it was indeed judgment day. The sabbath was therefore a day of rendering judgment on the efforts of the previous six days. Men halted their normal labors and rested, as God had rested after His six-day efforts. In the New Testament, the church celebrates the Lord's Supper on the Lord's day, which is analogous to (but not the same as) the Old Testament sabbath. Each church member is to examine himself for the previous week's transgressions, making confession before God before taking communion (I Cor.11:28–32). Paul's words are forthright: "For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world" (vv. 31–32). Those who judge themselves falsely can thereby come under God's earthly judgment, which is why

Paul points to sickness and even death within the Corinthian church (v. 30). In short, the fourth commandment is judicial.

I also argue that the sabbath millennium is coming, and that this will be an era of rest and judgment, when God's people will take dominion by exercising godly judgment, thereby bringing Satan and his host under preliminary condemnation, in preparation for God's return at the end of the millennium to render final judgment.

5. Succession/inheritance (continuity)

Honoring father and mother is required because of the testamental nature of the covenant. Men grow old and need care; they also transfer wealth and authority to successors. To this fifth commandment a promise is attached: long life in the land which God gives to us. This commandment seems to be man-oriented, and also a uniquely positive law, in contrast to the priestly negatives of the first four.¹² Nevertheless, if we see this law as essentially priestly in scope, then it places the family under the overall protection of the church, or in Old Testament times, under the protection of the priests. The priesthood, not the civil government, is the protector of the primary agency of welfare, the family, and therefore the church is the secondary agency of welfare, should the family prove incapable of providing for its own.

This is why Jesus cited the fifth commandment when He criticized the Pharisees for giving alms in public but not taking care of their parents (Mark 7:10–13).¹³ They were being unfaithful to their calling as sons. They were therefore illegitimate sons. Jesus was calling them bastards. He also told them that they were the sons of their father, the devil (John 8:44). Again, He was calling them illegitimate spiritual sons rather than sons of Abraham, which they proclaimed of themselves.

It should not be surprising that the church is required to care for “widows indeed,” meaning 60-year-old women who have not remarried and whose younger relatives refused to support them (I Tim. 5:2–5).¹⁴ This is because the protection of the family is a priestly function. It should also not be surprising that the same passage says that the man who refuses to take care of his family is worse than an infidel (I Tim. 5:8). This is why the church can and should excommunicate such people. They come under the priestly ban.

12. The sabbath law was essentially negative: no work.

13. Gary North, Trust and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Mark and John (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

14. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 7.

It is clear that the civil government is not the economic protector of the family when it breaks down. The church is. The unwarranted growth of the welfare state in the twentieth century was therefore a manifestation of a satanic pseudo-family and a pseudo-priesthood of the modern messianic state. This development paralleled the breakdown of the family, a breakdown which the state in fact subsidizes through tax-financed welfare programs; it has also paralleled the default of the church as the secondary agency of welfare.

II. Second Table (kingly)

There is no question that this second table of the ten is not ecclesiastical and priestly in focus but rather social (familial) and political. On the other hand, the second table is no less religious than the first table of the law. Both tables are inescapably religious. But the two are separated in terms of the primary locus of sovereignty: family and civil government, not church.

6. Transcendence/immanence (sovereignty)

It is illegal to kill men. Why? Because men are made in the image of God (Gen. 9:5–6). They reflect His transcendence in a way that animals and other aspects of the creation do not. Man is uniquely symbolic of God.

God is transcendent. He is untouchable, absolutely sovereign, and beyond challenge. Man, His image, is not equally sovereign or equally protected. To a limited extent, he is protected. Animals, for instance, are afraid of him (Gen. 9:2). Still, he has been vulnerable to attack since Adam's Fall. Thus, to attack man seems to be an indirect way to attack God. This is one reason why Satan tempted man in the first place. To a kill man unlawfully is an affront against the image of God.

I discuss "God's monopoly of execution," the civil government, in chapter six, but I failed to link this commandment with the first commandment. The transcendence of God is the basis of this commandment: The transcendent God must be worshipped, and His image must not be slain.

7. Hierarchy/authority (representation)

Adultery is prohibited. Adultery in the Bible is linked theologically to idolatry. Ancient pagan societies adopted ritual prostitution, sometimes in the temple or at the entrance to the temple.¹⁵ To break the marital covenant is the earthly equivalent of breaking the covenant with God. This was the message of the prophet Hosea. Adultery is the equivalent of worshiping a false god, an idol. This is why it is punished by execution (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22). Like the sixth commandment, which is analogous to and reflective of the first commandment, so is the seventh analogous to and reflective of the second commandment: the worship of graven images. Ultimately, both violations are the worship of autonomous man, the worship of the products of man's rebellion.

The man is head of the household. He represents God before his wife and children. They are to obey him. His authority is analogous to and reflective of God's authority. The wife is functionally subordinate to the husband, just as the Son of God is functionally subordinate to the Father. The wife is not ethically inferior to the husband, just as the Son of God is not ethically inferior to the Father. There is hierarchy in the family, just as there is hierarchy in the Godhead itself. (This is what theologians call the "economical Trinity," to distinguish it from the "ontological Trinity," meaning the co-equal nature of the three Persons. Both doctrines are true, depending on what aspect of the Trinity you are discussing.)

Adultery is a ritual denial of the faithfulness of Christ to His church, which Paul compares to a marriage (Eph. 5:22–33). It is a denial of the permanence of the hierarchical bond between Christ and the church.

Adultery is also a ritual denial of the Trinity. It says that the covenantal bond between marriage partners is breakable. But this bond is analogous to the bond among the members of the Trinity. Thus, it is a denial of the Trinity, for if men can lawfully break the marriage covenant at will, then analogously, so can God break the covenant that binds the Persons of the godhead. This leads to polytheism, which is why polytheistic cultures of the ancient world so often had ritual prostitution. This ritual reflected the theological foundation of these cultures. Adultery is therefore a form of idolatry, and analogous to the idolatry which is prohibited by the second commandment. It is a denial of man's subordination to God.

15. This is still practiced in India.

8. Ethics/law (sanctions)

The eighth commandment protects private property. This is a fundamental aspect of dominion. The third commandment prohibits using the Lord's name in vain. This commandment prohibits any interference with another man's tools of dominion (his capital goods), and it also protects the fruits of his labor, consumer goods. Just as a deceiver deliberately misuses God's name in order to gain people's trust, so does a thief appropriate wealth that was produced by the owner, or bought by the owner, or lawfully inherited by the owner. The deceiver wants to manipulate those around him in order to gain his ends apart from lawful service. The thief has a similar view of life: to enrich himself at the expense of others without voluntary exchange and service to the victim. Both the deceiver and the thief seek to escape the limits God has placed on them. Both seek power without covenantal faithfulness to the laws of God.

9. Oath/sanctions (evaluation/imputation)

The ninth commandment prohibits false witness. This commandment implicitly refers to a law court. It is illegal to harm another person by testifying falsely to his character or his actions. Satan asked Adam and Eve to act against God's law—in short, to deny the integrity of God and the reliability of His Word. God's judgment is imposed in terms of an accurate assessment of all the facts, and then these acts are evaluated by Him in terms of His law. He bears true witness to Himself and to the acts, thoughts, and motives of all men. God does not bear false witness against others. In other words, He evaluates reliably. On the day of judgment, His judgment will be perfect. Meanwhile, in time and on earth, men are to "think God's thoughts after Him." They are to evaluate everything in terms of God's standards, and in terms of an accurate perception of external events. They are to regard history as God's product. To testify falsely against a truthful historical record is to violate the ninth commandment.

The link between the sabbath law and the false witness law is the day of judgment. Just as each person at the end of the week in Israel was supposed to evaluate his work, and whose rest was an acknowledgement of God's sovereignty over all of history, so is the commandment against false witness designed to force men to acknowledge God's sovereignty over history. Man does not create a new story by distorting the past. Man does not create a new future by distorting the past. Man only brings himself under condemnation by attempting such a crime against man and God.

10. Succession/inheritance (continuity)

Coveting another person's goods is to covet the inheritance he will leave to his children. This also prohibits a premature coveting of parents' wealth by the children. Coveting is the first step to theft (eighth commandment). It is also a first step before adultery (seventh commandment, "thy neighbor's wife") and sometimes before murder (sixth commandment, e.g., David's murder of Uriah). Coveting is a denial of the ninth commandment, too: an implicit assertion of the illegitimacy of the present legal order which establishes the owner's rights to his property and his children's legal rights of inheritance. Evil men are tempted to misuse the courts to achieve their goals. Ahab's theft of Naboth's vineyard (I Kings 21) is representative: Coveting led to the corrupting of justice through the hiring of false witnesses and then the murder of a righteous man.¹⁶

The jubilee law in Old Testament Israel was designed to reduce such coveting with respect to land. Land had to be returned to the lawful, legitimate heirs every 50 years (Lev. 25:8–13).¹⁷

In effect, the covetous person regards himself as the true heir to his neighbor's patrimony. He wishes to dispossess the lawful heirs. He plots against history—the history which led to his neighbor's position and goods—in the name of his own autonomy.

Conclusion

The Ten Commandments are divided into two sections of five commandments each. The first section is priestly, while the second is kingly or dominical. Both sections reflect the same five-part aspect of the Deuteronomic covenant structure.

Is this structure permanent? Sutton traces it back to Adam, Noah, and Abraham. He traces it forward to David, Malachi, and Jesus' Great Commission. I find it also in the temptation of Christ by Satan, and in the trial of Jesus by the Jewish leaders.

16. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

17. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 22.

Conclusion

The Ten Commandments are the archetypal summary of the two covenants of God, Old and New. They manifest the five component parts of the Deuteronomic covenant, and they manifest them twice: commandments 1–5 and 6–10. They provide a dual witness to the truth. By identifying all five elements of the covenant, we can better understand God’s legal claims on all men in general and redeemed men in particular. These claims involve economic claims and requirements, as we shall see.

In this revised edition, I have added footnotes that refer the reader to materials that I wrote after 1986, especially my other commentaries. I have also removed two sections from this Preface: “Satan’s Temptation of Jesus” and “The Pharisees’ False Covenant Lawsuit Against Jesus.” Readers who want to read the original version of this book can download a free copy here:

<http://bit.ly/gnsinai>

INTRODUCTION

A standard remark that we hear in Christian circles is this: "The Bible has answers for all of man's problems." This sounds impressive. Problems arise, however, when we begin to ask specific questions about the Bible's answers for specific problems in any one area of cultural or civic life. All of a sudden, people who only moments before had assured us that the Bible has the answers now begin to backtrack. "Well," they say, "the Bible has all the answers for man's spiritual problems."

This is a significant qualification. It is an admission of failure. If the Bible has answers for only narrowly defined spiritual problems, and not for the concrete, day-to-day problems of economics, family relationships, politics, law, medicine, and all other areas of life, then Christians are faced with a terrible dilemma. Either these areas of life are not areas affected by the "spirit"—the so-called "spiritual" concerns—or else the Bible doesn't really have the specific answers that men desperately need in their daily decision-making. Either we live in a dualistic world—a world of totally separated parts: "spirit" and "matter"—or else we have been mistaken about the ability of the Bible to answer man's questions.

But what if we refuse to accept either of these explanations? What if we still want to insist that the Bible does have answers for men's problems? There is a third explanation, namely, that the original statement is correct after all: the Bible really does have answers to all of men's problems. These answers are in the form of first principles. These biblical first principles apply to every area of life. Sometimes they apply specifically, such as this law: "Thou shalt not kill." In other situations, they apply in principle, such as the scientific principle that the universe is orderly. But why is it orderly? Because it is sustained providentially by the absolutely sovereign God who created it out of nothing. Biblical principles do apply, and without them, there can be no accurate explanation for "the way the world works."

There is a fourth possibility. Sometimes the Bible presents very specific laws that modern men mistakenly believe no longer apply to our era. People misinterpret these Old Testament laws as temporary instructions given by God in ancient times—laws that no longer apply to the modern world. But what if God still intends for His people to honor these laws? What if these laws really are valid in modern times? What if the presumed dualism between spirit and matter is false in the case of specific biblical laws, as well as false in theory?

A. Spiritual Problems and Biblical Law

The original statement is true. The Bible does provide the answer for every problem, not just narrowly defined “spiritual” problems. What we need to understand is that all of man’s problems are spiritual problems.

The dualism of spirit and matter is an ancient heresy. It was called gnosticism in the ancient world, and it was a major rival philosophy to Christianity. Forms of it have revived throughout history. We must reject it entirely. We must recognize that man’s so-called “earthly” problems are in reality spiritual problems, because when Adam rebelled, he really rebelled. It wasn’t some Sunday morning rebellion; it was an “all week long” kind of rebellion. He rebelled in spirit, but this rebellion had an outward manifestation: eating the forbidden fruit. Was that forbidden fruit an earthly problem? Of course; Adam was an earthly creature. Was that forbidden fruit a spiritual problem? Of course; Adam was a spiritual creature. Did God’s judgment on Adam involve his flesh, not to mention his environment? Yes. Did God’s judgment involve Adam’s spirit? Yes. And what we say of Adam we also must say of ourselves, and of mankind in general. Every problem is a spiritual problem, for man’s spirit is in ethical rebellion against God’s Spirit.

Modern Christians have had a false view of spirituality because they have had an incomplete view of sin. They have failed to understand how comprehensive the effects of sin really are, and because of this, they have not understood how comprehensive the redemption of Jesus Christ really is.¹ They have failed to understand that the redemption of Jesus Christ involves both the spirit of man and the body of man. It also involves the redemption of the environment of man. In short, Jesus Christ definitively (once and for all) removed the curse of

1. Gary North, “Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action,” The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VIII (Summer 1981). Reprinted in Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

God from redeemed men. Because that curse was comprehensive, so is the removal of that curse. Progressively redeemed men are told to work out their salvations with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12). Finally, God will declare them righteous before all men and angels at the day of judgment, when the removal of the curse will be complete. In short, what was definitive at Calvary—Satan’s defeat—is being progressively revealed in history, and will be finally revealed at the day of judgment and in eternity.

Because Christians in our day have failed to understand these fundamental biblical principles, they have misunderstood the meaning of “spiritual.” David Chilton’s comments are to the point: “When the Bible uses the term Spiritual, it is generally speaking of the Holy Spirit. . . . To be Spiritual is to be guided and motivated by the Holy Spirit. It means obeying His commands as recorded in the Scriptures. The Spiritual man is not someone who floats in midair and hears eerie voices. The Spiritual man is the man who does what the Bible says (Rom. 8:4–8). This means, therefore, that we are supposed to get involved in life. God wants us to apply Christian standards everywhere, in every area. Spirituality does not mean retreat and withdrawal from life; it means dominion. The basic Christian confession of faith is that Jesus is Lord (Rom. 10:9–10)—Lord of all things, in heaven and on earth. As Lord, He is to be glorified in every area (Rom. 11:36). In terms of Christian Spirituality, in terms of God’s requirements for Christian action in every area of life, there is no reason to retreat.”²

But how do we know when we are being Spiritual? By looking to the Bible in order to discover the principles of Spiritual living. What is this system of permanent principles called in the Bible? The law. Modern Christians may prefer to use some other word to describe these fixed, permanent principles—rules, guidelines, blueprints for living—but the Bible calls these principles the law of God. This is why faith in, respect for, and obedience to the law always accompany true Spirituality.

Let us return to the question at hand: Does the Bible speak to every kind of problem that man has? It does. I believe in the third explanation: The Bible provides the only source of true principles of knowledge, with God the Creator as the only source of order. I also believe in the fourth explanation: the continuing validity of many Mosaic laws. We have ignored these laws in modern times, and we have paid a heavy price. We will pay an even heavier price if we continue to discount the laws of God.

2. David Chilton, Paradise Restored: A Biblical Theology of Dominion (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, 1985), p. 4. (<http://bit.ly/dcpardise>)

How do we know that a particular Old Testament law is no longer legally binding, let alone no longer morally binding, in New Testament times? There can be only one legitimate answer: because the New Testament says so. There should be a specific injunction that a particular Mosaic law, or a particular class of Mosaic laws, is no longer binding in New Testament times because Jesus' work of redemption has fulfilled it and also annulled it. If the New Testament does not reveal this, then the law still must be in force.³

If a New Testament principle implicitly annuls a category of the Mosaic law, then that law no longer is in force. But this must be proven through exegesis and theology, not merely assumed. For example, if a Mosaic law was tied explicitly or implicitly to the priesthood, the land of Israel, or the tribes of Jacob, it is no longer in force, because the priesthood, the holy status of the land of Israel, and the tribes of Jacob no longer exist in the New Covenant era.⁴ But a Bible scholar must show that a case law was uniquely tied to one of these three Mosaic Covenant factors in order to make his case that a particular case law was annulled.

Most Christians say that they believe in the Ten Commandments (the Decalogue). A few say that these laws no longer apply in New Testament times, but most Christians refuse to go this far. If we turn to the Ten Commandments, we should expect to find principles, as well as specifics, that give us guidance for evaluating the successes or failures of our own era and civilization. If God threatens a rebellious civilization with temporal judgment, just as He threatens individual sinners with final judgment, then we ought to be able to discover laws that God expects us not to violate. If we turn to the Ten Commandments, we should be able to discover the foundational standards of biblical social order.⁵

3. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 3rd ed. (Nacodoches, Texas: Covenant Media Foundation, [1977] 2002). For a shorter introduction, see Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

4. Gary North, Leviticus: An Economic Commentary (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994), pp. 637–45. (<http://bit.ly/gnleviticus>); North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), Conclusion, Section C.

5. R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1968] 1998). (<http://bit.ly/rjrfs0>)

At the very least, we should find in the Ten Commandments laws that apply to civil government and economics. After all, God delivered these laws to a nation that had experienced many decades of tyrannical slavery. God announced Himself as their deliverer in the very first commandment. Wouldn't we expect to find rules that govern economics and politics in these laws? The answer should be an unequivocal "yes."

Why is it, then, that so few commentators have ever addressed this problem? What are the political and economic laws of the Ten Commandments? Why don't commentators ask the two crucial questions:

1. How did these commandments apply in Old Testament times?
2. How should they apply today?

The reason is fairly simple: They do not believe in the God of the Bible or God's revealed will for mankind, His law. This is especially true of seminary professors.

B. Useful Idiots

A good example of the professional drivel of modern antinomian "scholarship so-called" is a book by Walter Harrelson, The Ten Commandments and Human Rights. This book is as forthright and honest a defense of the Ten Commandments as the late Premier Konstantin Chernenko's book on human rights in the Soviet Union was for human rights in the Soviet Union.⁶ What Harrelson and other academic "experts" on the Ten Commandments really want is to escape from the Ten Commandments. Their faith is clear: better situation ethics than the restraining effects of God's law. As he wrote,

In contemporary, secularized Western society there is a wistful longing for such norms, upon which individual and family could depend in all circumstances. One reason for the rapid growth today of evangelical religion of a fundamentalist nature, or for the growth of charismatic religion, with its rigid personal and communal norms, is that such communities are thought to supply just norms. . . . We should know, however, that if we are to find a way to supply nourishment to meet this hunger, we have to do so with the utmost care. The gains of a contextualist and existentialist ethic are too numerous and too solid to be endangered by facile returns to absolutist norms.

6. Konstantin U. Chernenko, Human Rights in Soviet Society (New York: International Publishers, 1981). This was published just before he became Soviet Premier.

The enslavement of the human spirit in the name of religion is too well known in history. We dare not risk a recurrence of such enslavement out of fear that our society is about to collapse into normlessness. And the misuse of norms for the protection of the privileged is a perennial danger.⁷

Or, as another concerned student of biblical law and authoritarian regimes once asked: "Hath God said?"

But God hath said! God said that Egypt was the tyranny, not Israel. God showed the Israelites that Assyria and Babylon, not His law, were the true threats to human rights. But in the name of Jesus, and in the name of human rights, today's academic specialists in the law of God come before us and warn us of the supposedly frightful risks of asserting the eternal validity of an eternal law-order of an eternal God. They worry about offending the defenders of "a contextualist and existential ethic," meaning their old professors at Yale Divinity School (or wherever). They survey the strongholds of these situation ethicists, and rather than seeing the ongoing crises of humanist civilization as the greatest opportunity in man's history for the triumph of God's law as the only possible substitute for this collapsing moral order, they urge faithful Christians to restrain themselves. Why, such efforts might embarrass these waffling theologians among their peers, and their peers are not the tithing people in the pews who pay their salaries, but the tenured atheists in the prestige divinity schools that awarded them their coveted (and low market value) doctorates. (I've got a Ph.D. myself; I know how little it is worth these days.)⁸

In short, these fearful, obscure, and academically irrelevant drones, with their Ph.D.'s, their tenured seminary positions, and their minimal prospects for future employment if righteous Christian people ever purge the seminaries of heretics, now see what is coming: a revival of interest in God's law, and the rapid development of political skills on the part of those who take God's law seriously. They see their liberal, pleasant, tenured little world on the verge of disaster, for those naive people who have funded their rebellion—the little people in the pews—may soon catch on to their game. The court prophets are once again in trouble on Mt. Carmel. They saw what happened last time, and they are not happy about it.

7. Walter Harrelson, The Ten Commandments and Human Rights (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1980), p. 9.

8. Gary North, "The Ph.D. Glut Revisited," <http://lewrockwell.com> (Jan. 24, 2006). An extract appeared in the New York Times (Feb. 5, 2006): "In Academia, Big Brains, Empty Pockets." (<http://bit.ly/Glut>)

Sadly, they have allies in the conservative camp: those who preach the irrelevance of the Ten Commandments in New Testament times. But pietism's influence is also waning. The ecclesiastical irrelevance of the older pietistic fundamentalism is becoming pronounced. What has taken place in the United States since 1980⁹—really, since 1965¹⁰—has exposed the nakedness of the fundamentalist antinomians. They had no concrete, specifically biblical social answers for the radicals of the late 1960s, and they knew it. They went into retreat in the 1970s, and they are now being ignored into oblivion.

At last, conservative Christian laymen, and even a growing number of pastors, are beginning to see the light. They are beginning to understand the choices laid before them:

God's law or chaos
God's law or tyranny
God's law or God's wrath

C. Proof Texts, Blueprints, and Economic Antinomianism

The Ten Commandments set forth a strategy. This strategy is a strategy for dominion. The general principles of the Ten Commandments summarize the whole of biblical law. The case-law applications of Exodus 21–23 illustrate ways in which the Ten Commandments are to be applied.¹¹ The Decalogue itself is the master plan, the blueprint for biblical social order. These laws have very definite economic implications. This sort of thinking is foreign to virtually all modern Christian social and economic thinkers, whether conservative or liberal, Protestant or Catholic.

If I were to offer a single sentence of warning with respect to the misuse of the Bible by modern scholars, it would be this: Beware of doubletalk and outright gibberish. I will put it even more bluntly: If you cannot understand what a theologian has written concerning a perfectly plain passage in the Bible, trust your instincts; you are probably being conned by a professional. These hypocrites for over three hundred years¹² have made a lifetime occupation out of hiding their radical ideas behind a mask of orthodox language. They want to be low-risk revolutionaries, fully tenured, with their salaries provided by unsuspecting Christian sheep. Furthermore, they are, almost to a man (person?), desperate for public acceptance by secular scholars. They are humanists by conviction, even though they operate inside the churches. If they forthrightly proclaimed the doctrines of the historic Christian faith without compromise, they would be ridiculed by humanist scholars. They fear this above all. So, they write endless reams of convoluted language in order to hide the academic irrelevance of their concepts. (German theology is especially afflicted by this verbal constipation.) Their concepts are dangerous to orthodoxy and irrelevant to humanism, except as a tool of confusing the faithful. Liberal theologians are simply examples of what Lenin called "useful idiots." They are middlemen for the humanists in a great deception of the faithful. They have been described best by David Chilton: "Modern theologians are like a pack of dogs who spend most of their time sniffing each other's behinds."

9. The election of Ronald Reagan.

10. When the counter-culture became visible publicly, and fundamentalists had nothing biblical to offer in place of the establishment's humanist culture, yet also offered nothing explicitly biblical to challenge the counter-culture.

11. Part 3, Tools of Dominion; James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984). (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

1. Roman Catholic Economic Antinomianism

The Lay Commission on Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy was a conservative group whose members were some of the most famous American Catholic conservative social thinkers and political figures. It was formed in 1984 by William Simon, who had served as Secretary of the Treasury under Presidents Nixon and Ford, and Michael Novak, its main theoretician.¹³ The organization's study of Catholic economic thought announced on the opening page: "... Christian Scripture does not offer programmatic guidance for the concrete institutions of political economy."¹⁴ It then cited someone it referred to as "the great Catholic economist Heinrich Pesch, S.J." who proclaimed that morally advanced societies will be better prepared to endure hard times, but "this does not mean that the economist should 12. Henning Graf Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World (London: SCM Press., [1980] 1984).

13. John J. Miller, "When the Flock Takes the Lead," Opinion Journal (Nov. 26, 2004). This is an on-line publication of the Wall Street Journal's editorial page.

14. Toward the Future: Catholic Social Thought and the U. S. Economy (North Tarrytown, New York: Lay Commission, 1984), p. ix.

theologize or moralize in the treatment of his subject matter or, what is worse, try to derive an economic system from Holy Scripture.”¹⁵ This document was written specifically to counter the ultra-liberal proposed first draft of Catholic bishops regarding the United States economy. And what first principle regarding biblical authority governed the liberal bishops? The same as the one adopted by the Catholic lay conservatives: “Although the Bible does not and cannot give us simple and direct answers to today’s complex economic questions, it can and must shape our vision of the meaning of economic life.”¹⁶ The conservatives cited the free market economists they liked, while the liberals cited the anti-free market non-economists they liked. No one invoked biblical law.

2. Conservative Protestant Economic Antinomianism

Conservative Protestant philosopher Ronald Nash is opposed to liberation theology and Christian socialism. His book, Social Justice and The Christian Church (1983), is a ringing defense of capitalism. But not biblical capitalism. It appeals, not to the Bible, but to universal standards of logic, i.e., universal truths that can be recognized by all right-thinking people. He began with the implicit but unstated presupposition that the Bible is not sufficiently self-attesting and clear to provide generally agreed-upon conclusions; an appeal to universal logic is therefore necessary. He wrote:

Chapter 6 considers what the Bible teaches about justice. This book intentionally rejects any proof-text approach to its subject. [But why should we expect to find autonomous proof in opposition to a biblical text?—G.N.] Many other treatments [but not all!—G.N.] of the topic purport to “discover” revealed truth about economic and social theory in the Bible and then deduce the appropriate applications of that truth to the contemporary scene. The great problem with the proof-text method is the extent to which the participants beg the question. [Beg what question?—G.N.] In most cases [but not all!—G.N.], what happens is that the writer finds some passage in the Old Testament that relates to an extinct cultural situation. [Is human reason eternally applicable, and biblical principles that undergirded the “extinct cultural situation” merely temporary?—G.N.] It is often the case [but not always!—G.N.] that such passages are ambiguous enough to give any interpreter problems. [Is human reason never ambiguous, and therefore more reliable than the “ambiguous” Bible?—G.N.] But before the reader knows it, the passage is used to prove the truth of socialism or capitalism. [Are serious Christians unable to determine good from bad exegesis in the case of biblical economic policy, so must we therefore appeal to “unambiguous” logic? And is the Bible equally ambiguous, and readers equally defenseless, with regard to everything else it speaks about? Must autonomous logic also be used to establish theological truths?—G.N.] This book takes a totally different approach. It assumes the unity of all truth. Truth in any area of human knowledge will be consistent with truth in every other area. [So, why not begin, and end, with biblical revelation, since it is unquestionably true, while the speculations of men are unquestionably fallible in part?—G.N.]¹⁷

15. Ibid., pp. ix–x.

16. “First Draft—Bishop’s Pastoral: Catholic Social Teaching and the U. S. Economy,” Origins, Vol. 14 (Nov. 15, 1984), p. 343. Published by the National Catholic News Service, Washington, D.C.

Notice the qualifying phrases: “many other treatments,” “in most cases,” “it often is the case.” Fine and dandy; then why not search for the exceptions to these generalities, and then adopt them when we find them? Why not search out those unique cases in which biblical texts are used properly by expositors, and then follow their lead? The answer is fairly simple: Nash does not believe that any Christian ever has successfully used the Bible to create a coherent, accurate, God-given and man-interpreted biblical economic framework. Furthermore, he obviously did not believe that such an effort should be attempted. He avoids the temptation, certainly. After all, why should we appeal to the Bible instead of appealing to universal human reason, which unlocks “the unity of all truth”? Implicitly, he is arguing that the Bible is not the bedrock universal; human reason is. Some people do not accept the Bible; presumably, all rational people will accept the findings of human reason.

As a devoted follower of the Calvinist philosopher Gordon Clark, Nash rejected the idea of Van Til’s presuppositional, Bible-based (i. e., “proof-text”) approach to the intellectual defense of Christianity. He relied instead on the hypothetical natural, unbiased, and reliable reasoning abilities of natural (unregenerate) man. In short, he appealed to biblically unaided (autonomous) reason because of his personal preference and philosophical commitment. He found what he regarded as inescapably clear free market principles in the conclusions of autonomous human reason. Unfortunately, “radical Christians” somehow have escaped from this inescapably clear set of economic conclusions.

17. Ronald Nash, Social Justice and the Christian Church (Milford, Michigan: Mott Media, 1983), pp. 7–8.

3. Liberal Evangelical Economic Antinomianism

We find the same sort of “anti-proof text” reasoning in the camp of the “radical Christian Protestants,” the left-wing targets of Nash’s book. In a symposium on Christian economics published by the neo-evangelical Protestant InterVarsity Press in 1984, three of the four contributors were defenders of more state planning and authority over the economy. I was the lone critic of the state.¹⁸ All three of the anti-market essayists explicitly denied that the Bible gives us any specifics concerning economics.

The fact that our Scriptures can be used to support or condemn any economic philosophy suggests that the Bible is not intended to lay out an economic plan which will apply for all times and places. If we are to examine economic structures in the light of Christian teachings, we will have to do it another way.¹⁹

The Old Testament gives detailed laws regulating economic relationships. Although we need not feel bound by these laws, the general concern of justice and shalom found there is repeated in the New Testament and is meant for us.²⁰

There is no blueprint of the ideal state or the ideal economy. We cannot turn to chapters of the Bible and find in them a model to copy or a plan for building the ideal biblical state and national economy.²¹

If this is true—if there are no biblical blueprints—then how can we, as Christians, come before a fallen, rebellious society that is threatened by the judgment of God, and announce confidently, “Thus saith the Lord”? How can we criticize specific economic sins with the confidence of Old Testament prophets? How can we call men to repent, if we cannot say for certain what specific biblical laws they are violating? And more to the point, how can we offer biblical alternatives? How can we confidently affirm with Paul: “. . . God is faithful, who will

18. The book was taken off the market in 1985 by IVP, which sold me thousands of copies at 25 cents each. I like to think that it was my uncompromising defense of the free market and my rhetorically robust challenges to the three other authors that led to IVP’s decision. My original article appears as Appendix E in Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012).

19. William Diehl, “The Guided-Market System,” in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), p. 87. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>) not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able [to bear]; but will, with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it" (I Cor. 10:13b)? Are we saying that God offers no specific way to escape? Are we saying that any old way will do, just so long as it feels right, just so long as it conforms to the recommended political and economic outlook of political liberals fifteen years ago (which they discarded five years later)?

20. Art Gish, “Decentralist Economics,” ibid., p. 133–34.

21. John Gladwin, “Centralist Economics,” ibid., p. 183.

David Chilton has called this attitude toward the Bible on the part of economic radicals, "The Case of the Missing Blueprints."²² These "concerned Christians" reject modern free market capitalism in the name of "biblical justice," just as the so-called Social Gospel's promoters did in the first half of the twentieth century.²³ Unlike Social Gospel theologians, who really did believe that the Bible teaches some form of socialism, the more recent evangelical statist tell us that the Bible does not provide a specific blueprint or outline of the godly economic system. The reason for their rejection of the Bible as a guide for economics is clear. They understood what the Social Gospel theologians should have understood but did not, namely, that the Bible categorically affirms legal, moral, and economic principles that lay the foundations of a free market economic system. They stand firm with John Gladwin, who affirmed: "Scripture offers no blueprint for the form of modern government. This means that I will resist any idea that decentralized or privatized versions of management of the economy and the provision of services are necessarily more Christian than the centralized solution."²⁴ He saw that the Bible does teach such a decentralized and privatized view of society, so he rejected from the start any suggestion that this blueprint is still morally or legally binding on Christian societies. (Gladwin later became a bishop in the Church of England.)

InterVarsity Press in 1983 published one of its typically statist tracts in the name of Jesus. The author, a British Ph.D. from Cambridge, who was teaching theology in India, rejected the idea that Old Testament law is still literally binding in New Testament times. "In the economic sphere, the Old Testament paradigms provide us with objectives without requiring a literal transposition of ancient Israelite practice into twentieth-century society.”²⁵ In other words, Old Testament law, which drastically limited the centralization of power by the civil government, is no longer supposed to bind the state.

22. David Chilton, "The Case of the Missing Blueprints," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VIII (Summer 1981).

23. C. Gregg Singer, The Unholy Alliance (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1975). (<http://bit.ly/singerua>)

24. Gladwin, in Clouse, op. cit., p. 181.

Here is the two-part argument which virtually all of these clever fellows have adopted. First, they say they believe that the Mosaic law’s objectives are still binding today, and the state must see to it that its objectives are achieved. Second, the means established by the Mosaic law to achieve these objectives are rejected as being old fashioned or inappropriate for today’s complex society, namely, men acting as individuals or as agents of the church, voluntary charitable societies, or families. In short, Wright proposed what virtually all academic Christian social commentators proposed in the twentieth century: the substitution of the state for society. This has been a common error in the modern world, and an exceedingly pernicious one.²⁶

Wright stated that “there are societies where the conditions of allegedly ‘free’ employees are pitifully more harsh and oppressive than those of slaves in Israel.”²⁷ (He did not mention the giant slave societies created by the Communists.) “In such situations, the paradigmatic relevance of the Old Testament economic laws concerning work and employment can be taken almost as they stand. To introduce statutory rest days and holidays, statutory terms and conditions of employment, statutory protection from infringement of personal rights and physical dignity, statutory provision for fair wages promptly paid, would revolutionize the face of economic life for multitudes of workers in some parts of the world. And all of these are drawn from the economic legislation of God’s redeemed people, Israel.”²⁸

Such statutory actions would indeed revolutionize the face of economic life for multitudes of workers. Such actions would guarantee continuing unemployment in all legal markets. They would, if enforced universally, transfer a monopoly grant of power to industrial economies, and specifically to the state-licensed and protected monopolistic trade unions, whose members cannot stand the wage competition that is offered by Third World employees.

“Statutory” was Dr. Wright’s key word, and it is this word that was not used in the Old Testament. God, not the state, is sovereign. God is-

25. Christopher J. H. Wright, An Eye for an Eye: The Place of Old Testament Ethics Today (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1983), p. 89.

26. Robert A. Nisbet, The Quest for Community (New York: Oxford University Press, 1952), p. 99.

27. Wright, Eye for an Eye, 79–80.

28. Ibid., p. 80.

sued His economic laws, and it is market competition and self-government under God's law, not statutes, that are supposed to govern men's economic actions in the vast majority of cases, as my commentaries on the Pentateuch and the New Testament demonstrate. Those scholars who deny my assessment of the texts have an obligation to show how and where I misinterpreted the texts. They have a great many texts to consider. As of 2011, I have written over 650 chapters of exegesis, plus appendixes and four support books.

What is noticeable is Wright's hostility to the binding character of Old Testament law literally transferred to today's political institutions, for what that law would bind is the messianic state. Predictably, we find antinomianism—hostility to the continuing validity of God's Bible-revealed law—in close association with statism and a mania for legislation. What the Bible warns against—the divinization of man—and what the Bible's law-order undermines whenever it is taken seriously, modern academic antinomians have implicitly accepted. The divinized state that the Bible's law-order militates against is the sacred cow of the intellectuals today. In short, there is a relationship between false gods and high taxes. These armchair socialists proclaim their allegiance to the “paradigmatic principles” of Old Testament law, but not its state-restricting specifics. They proclaim the “principle of the tithe,” and then go on to promote massive compulsory taxation by the state. In short, they are devoted to Old Testament laws only on an ad hoc basis: whenever such verbal allegiance can be misdirected to glorify the authority of the state.

4. Whose Word Is Sovereign?

We discover that contemporary Christian social commentators are agreed: the revealed law of God is not applicable in New Testament times. God's Bible-revealed law-order is somehow out of date. It deals with “an extinct cultural situation.” Antinomians view the Old Testament as some sort of discarded first draft, “the Word of God (emeritus).” These commentators want to avoid the restrictions that God has said must be placed on men, institutions, and governments, if freedom and justice are to prevail. How, then, will freedom and justice be maintained? How will “the word of man (tenured)” establish and defend freedom and justice?

The biblical program is clear: self-government under revealed biblical law, with various aspects of this law enforced by a biblically revealed system of decentralized courts. There is no other valid program for the establishment and maintenance of biblically sanctioned government. All other programs are aspects of false religions. Christians have adopted aspects of false religions for two millennia. Christian social thought has been syncretistic from the beginning. Christians have failed in their attempt to establish freedom and justice for this very reason.

With the publication of Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law in 1973, this syncretism was at long last systematically challenged. Cornelius Van Til's presuppositional apologetic method, when coupled with a renewed interest in (and exposition of) biblical law, has opened the possibility of the establishment of a self-conscious Christian civilization. To accomplish this, Christians must go forward in terms of the law delivered to man at Sinai.

Conclusion

We see the "privatized" nature of the biblical social order in the eighth commandment: "Thou shalt not steal." But we also find the foundational principles of a free market economy in all the other nine commandments. The Ten Commandments are as fine a statement of the principles of liberty, including liberty of voluntary exchange, as we can find anywhere in the history of man. The Old Testament is an anti-statist document. It limits the civil government in the interests of personal self-government. Limited civil government is one of the two political preconditions of a free market economy. The other political precondition is predictable law, which places limits on civil government. This, the Ten Commandments and the Old Covenant's case laws also provide.

The Bible does not teach a doctrine of salvation by law. In both the Old Testament and the New Testament, the doctrine is clear: "The just shall live by faith" (Hab. 2:4). The Bible teaches dominion under God, but it does not teach salvation by law. In contrast, all other religions teach either salvation by law or salvation by mystical escape, with the techniques of asceticism and mysticism serving as the "laws" that save man.²⁹ Humanism teaches salvation by law, and most forms of humanism in the twentieth century were statist, for the state is clearly the highest and most concentrated form of power. Salvation by the state, or by an agency of the state,³⁰ was the common faith of twentieth-century humanists. This is why the Bible was repugnant to twentieth-century humanists. This is not going to change.

29. North, Authority and Dominion, Part 1, Introduction.

In the ten chapters that follow, you will learn more about the relationship between the Ten Commandments and economics. You will also learn more concerning the relation between the Ten Commandments and the dominion covenant.³¹ The Ten Commandments certainly have implications outside of the realm of economics, but they surely have implications at least for economics. When men see how relevant the Ten Commandments are for economics, they should gain new respect for the importance of the laws of God for all of life, but especially for the life of dominion man, the man redeemed by grace through faith in the one true Dominion Man, Jesus Christ.

This book can serve as a model. We need more studies: in politics, education, and social structures.

30. R. J. Rushdoony, The Messianic Character of American Education (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1963).

31. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

THE GOD OF LIBERATION

God spake all these words, saying, I am the LORD thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no other Gods before me (Ex. 20:1–3).

The theocentric issue here is obvious: the sovereignty of God. God mandates absolute devotion. He is number-one. All biblical laws are extensions of this law. All of them rest on this law.

But who is this God? In this passage, God identifies Himself as the God of liberation. He also reveals Himself as the God of the covenant. His self-revelation here invokes four of the five points of the biblical covenant model: sovereignty, hierarchy, law, and sanctions.

A. The Biblical Covenant Model

Sovereignty. God here announces that He has intervened decisively and miraculously in the lives of the Hebrews. This intervention was radically personal. The events of the exodus cannot be cogently explained as a series of impersonal natural events. There could be no doubt in the minds of the Hebrews of Moses' day that God had been the source of their liberation from Egypt. There was certainly no doubt in the minds of the people of the Canaanitic city of Jericho, as Rahab informed the spies a generation later (Josh. 2:10–11).

By identifying Himself as the source of their liberation, God announced his total sovereignty over Israel. A God who intervenes in history is not some distant God. He is a God of power. He had already revealed to them by His deeds that He possesses the power to reshape nations, seas, and history. No other God possesses such power; therefore, the Israelites are required to worship only Him. Sovereignty is point one of the biblical covenant model.¹ Events are controlled by a

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>).

God who can bring His words to pass: cosmic personalism.²

Hierarchy. He was also their king. Eastern kings of the second millennium B.C. used a formula for announcing their sovereignty similar to this and to God's announcement to Moses of His name (Ex. 6:2). Even when their names were well known, they announced them in the introduction to their proclamation.³

Second, it was customary for him to record his mighty deeds. Cassuto summarizes God's announcement: "I, the Speaker, am called YHWH, and I am your God specifically. Although I am the God of the whole earth (xix 5), yet I am also your God in the sense that, in consideration of this sanctification, I have chosen you to be the people of My special possession from among all the peoples of the earth (xix 6); and it is I who brought you out of the land of Egypt, not just bringing you forth from one place to another, but liberating you from the house of bondage. Hence it behooves you to serve Me not out of fear and dread, in the way that the other peoples are used to worship their gods, but from a sense of love and gratitude."⁴ Meredith G. Kline identified this as the second part of the suzerainty treaty.⁵ Hierarchy is point two of the biblical covenant model.⁶

God contrasts life in Egypt with life outside of Egypt. Egypt had been the house of bondage for Israel. Israel's deliverance was a liberating act on God's part. The contrast is between bondage in Egypt and liberty under God. The Israelites were in the wilderness when God revealed this law to them. The wilderness was a place of liberation by comparison with Egypt. The issue is hierarchy—which God will men serve?—not geography. Men are always under authority: point two of the biblical covenant model. The question is: Under whose authority?

Ethics. This God of power is a God of ethics. Ethics is point three of the biblical covenant model.⁷ His power was revealed by His act of

Cf. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1: "Cosmic Personalism."

3. U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, The Hebrew University, [1951] 1967), pp. 76–77.

4. Ibid., p. 241.

5. Meredith G. Kline, The Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963), pp. 52–61; cf. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 53–57.

6. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 2; North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 2.

7. Ibid., ch. 3; North, ibid., ch. 3.

freeing the Hebrews from their Egyptian masters. He therefore has the authority to lay down the law, beginning with the first commandment.

The Hebrews had deliverance as the historical foundation of their faith in God and His law-order. This law-order is summarized in the Ten Commandments. The commandments are the foundation of righteous living. The whole of Old Testament law serves as a series of case-law applications of the ten.⁸ Therefore, the case laws must be regarded as the basis of all social institutions and all interpersonal relationships. Whatever the area of life under discussion—family, business, charitable association, military command, medicine, etc.—biblical law provides the standards that should govern our actions.

Men can choose to ignore the requirements of biblical law. God dealt harshly in Egypt and in the Red Sea with those who flagrantly and defiantly rejected the rule of His law. The Israelites had experienced firsthand the institutional effects of a social order governed by a law-order different from the Bible's. They had been enslaved. The God who had delivered them from bondage here announces His standards of righteousness—not just private righteousness but social and institutional righteousness. Thus, the God of liberation is simultaneously the law-giver. The close association of biblical law and human freedom is grounded in the very character of God.

Sanctions. God had delivered them in history. This involved imposing negative sanctions on Egypt. The positive sanction of God's deliverance of covenant-keepers was inextricably associated with negative sanctions against covenant-breakers. Sanctions are point four of the biblical covenant model.⁹

The only covenantal point not found in this verse is point five: succession.

How does all of this relate to economics? By means of the biblical covenant model. There are numerous systems of economic theory and organizations. Their defenders all come in the name of the liberation of individuals and the society. We must test these claims. But how? By means of the biblical covenant model.

Because God identifies Himself in this commandment as the God of liberation, we should begin our study of economic theory with a detailed study of His comprehensive law-order. The summary of His law-order is found in the Ten Commandments.

8. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973).

9. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4; North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 4.

B. Causation and Providence

Causation is never impersonal. This is the ultimate message of the first commandment. The Israelites were not in the wilderness because of the impersonal forces of history, or the impersonal mode of production, or the impersonal rise of the middle class. They were in the wilderness awaiting the next move of God in history. He had raised up Moses and Aaron to lead them out of Egypt. This was behind them. Now their task was to conquer Canaan. This was the promised inheritance that had been given by God to Abraham. The fourth generation after the Israelites' descent into Egypt would conquer Canaan, God had prophesied. "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. 15:16).¹⁰

The basis of cause and effect is the providence of God. This includes economic causation. The laws of economics are not impersonal. They are not random. They do have purpose. They are reliable as a way to predict the outcome of policies. Economics is covenantal. It involves a sovereign God, man made in His image, economic law, causation, and economic growth. This is taught by the Decalogue as a whole. But it begins here, with the doctrine of the sovereignty of the God of liberation.

The God of liberation does not set forth laws of bondage. The Israelites could safely trust the laws of God because He had delivered them from bondage. The proof of His goodness and also His reliability was His deliverance of Israel out of Egypt.

This means that they could trust His economic commandments. His verbal commandments are consistent with His acts of deliverance in history. He possesses the power to produce the results that He promises in His law. This description encompasses His economic commandments. The structure of the universe and the universal rule of providential cause and effect are not impersonal. They are also not random.

If men are to obey God over the long run, they must have faith that they are placing their trust in a reliable law-order that is backed up by a reliable, predictable God. He must be the God of the biblical covenant model. If God is not reliable, then His law is not reliable. If He is weak or forgetful or inconsistent, then his sanctions are unpredictable. If His sanctions—positive and negative—are unpredictable, then the inheritance of His people is problematical.

10. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 23.

This verse announces that the God of liberation has proven in history that He is sovereign over history. He brought negative sanctions against Egypt and positive sanctions for Israel. He therefore commands His people to worship Him and no other.

What is worship? It is subordination to a sovereign God and obedience to His law.

Can men legitimately have confidence in the law of God in the area of economic affairs? Yes. Why is this confidence justified? Because the same God who delivered Israel from the Egyptians also established the laws of economics. This means that the basis of these economic laws is not man, or random chance, or historical cycles, or the impersonal forces of history, but instead is the sustaining providence of God. The guarantor of the reliability of economic law is a personal Being who delivers His people from those who defy His law.

C. Liberation Economics: True and False

The Bible sets forth the only valid liberation theology, which undergirds the only valid liberation economics. The moral, institutional, and legal foundations of this economic system are found in biblical law.

What was commonly called liberation theology in the latter decades of the twentieth century was very often warmed-over Marxism or some other type of socialistic economics.¹¹ Appeals to the example of exodus were made by self-professed liberation theologians, but few if any references were made to the many Old Testament case-law applications of the Ten Commandments. In fact, the continuing validity of Old Testament laws that deal with economic relationships was denied by liberation theologians; only those laws that seem to expand the economic power of the state—and there are very few of these in the Bible—were cited by them. This “pick and choose” aspect of modern liberation theology—a choice governed by the standards of socialism and revolution rather than by the standards of orthodox theology—undermines the church’s ability to reconstruct social institutions in terms of God’s revealed word.¹²

11. See David Chilton’s review of Jose Miguez Bonino’s book, The Mutual Challenge to Revolution (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1976), in The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, V (Summer 1978).

12. See Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1977); Stephen Mott, Biblical Ethics and Social Change (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982). For a critique of Sider’s book, see David

Biblical economics is liberation economics. Anti-biblical economics is therefore bondage economics. Those who proclaim liberation economics, but who refuse to be guided by the concrete, explicit revelation of God in the Bible concerning economic law, are wolves in sheep's clothing. They were dominant in academia until the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. That historic event made it embarrassing for anyone to admit that he was a socialist, or ever had been.

If theologians proclaim some variant of Marxism, socialism, interventionism, or some other form of state-deifying economics, they are the equivalent of the Egyptians. They are laying the foundations of what Hayek called the road to serfdom.¹³ On the other hand, if they proclaim radical libertarianism—a world devoid of all civil government—they are laying the foundations for an ethical and political backlash, which will aid those who are seeking to expand the powers of the state. Men will not live under anarchy. Civil government is an aspect of the post-Fall world. Hierarchy is mandated by men's quest for power. The world of the victorious warlord becomes the state. There is no escape from this system of hierarchical physical coercion. The question is: Who controls it? Whose law prevails?

Historically, anarchists have allied themselves with statist revolutionaries at the beginning of a revolution, but they have invariably been destroyed after their former allies capture control of the coercive apparatus of the state. Karl Marx and Michael Bakunin initially cooperated in the founding of the First International (International Workingmen's Association), but the two men later split, and Marx and Engels destroyed the organization in the late 1870s—by transferring its headquarters to New York City—rather than allow it to fall into the hands of Bakunin's followers.¹⁴ In the case of the Russian Revolution, the anarchists were among the first dissidents to be arrested by the Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1983). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>); Ronald H. Nash, Social Justice and the Christian Church (Milford, Michigan: Mott Media, 1983).

13. F. A. Hayek, The Road to Serfdom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1944).

14. Franz Mehring, Karl Marx: The Story of His Life (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, [1918] 1962), pp. 484ff. Bakunin hated communism because of its innate statism: "I am not a communist, because communism concentrates and swallows up in itself for the benefit of the State all the forces of society, because it inevitably leads to the concentration of property in the hands of the State, whereas I want the abolition of the State. . . ." Cited by E. H. Carr, Michael Bakunin (New York: Vintage, [1937] 1961), p. 356.

Cheka, Lenin's secret police.¹⁵

D. Darwinism vs. Economic Law

Modern economic theory is grounded on the assumption that mankind is autonomous, that there is no need to invoke the concept of God, that all cosmic law is impersonal, that all social laws are either derived from the state or from the voluntary association of individuals, and that laws evolve over time. All modern economic theory is Darwinian, either statist Darwinian or free market Darwinian.¹⁶

The secular economist must find a way to adjust his theories of causation to an evolving society. If economic law is separate from social conventions, then the economist must find a way to relate conceptually the independent laws of economics to the beliefs and practices of each individual and each society. How can this be done? This is the age-old question of epistemology: "What can a man know for certain, and how can he know it?" In a changing social world (Heraclitus), how can a man's mind find permanent principles of economics (Parmenides)? How can one man communicate his discovery to others?

Darwinism undermines all concepts of permanent law, whether biological or social. It undermines economic theory. If the laws of economics are unchanging, then how can they be relevant for a changing world? If economic laws change, then how does an economist know for sure whether the laws that he thinks are internally consistent really do connect with the evolving world around him? In short, what is the Darwinian economist's principle of final sovereignty? In an evolving world, where everything is moving toward the heat death of the universe, what is sovereign other than the frozen tomb of absolute zero?¹⁷

Exodus 20:1–3 provides the intellectual foundation of epistemology. A sovereign God controls history. He must be worshipped, and He alone. Those who have been delivered from bondage possess legitimate hope that their worship will not result in bondage. They will secure their liberation by worshipping this God.

15. George Woodcock, Anarchism: A History of Libertarian Ideas and Movements (Cleveland, Ohio: Meridian, 1962), p. 219. See Part 8, "Anarchists in Prison," The Anarchists in the Russian Revolution, ed. Paul Avrich (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1973). For an account of the anarchists in the Russian Revolution, see "Voline" (Vsevolod Mikhailovich Eichenbaum), The Unknown Revolution, 1917–1921 (New York: Free Life Editions, [1947] 1975). Voline was an anarchist who participated in the revolution.

16. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Appendix B.

17. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

There is nothing remotely Darwinian about this worldview. It is expressly anti-Darwinian. There is nothing remotely humanistic about it. It begins, not with man, but with the God of the Bible, who is sovereign over history and who controls history for the benefit of those who worship Him and Him alone.

E. Law and Liberation

The Hebrews could not have misunderstood this relationship between God's law and liberation. God identified Himself as the deliverer of Israel, and then He set forth the summary of the law structure which He requires as a standard of human action. The God of history is the God of ethics. There can be no biblical ethics apart from an ultimate standard, yet this standard is fully applicable to history, for the God of history has announced the standard. Ethics must be simultaneously permanent and historically applicable. Permanence must not compromise the applicability of the law in history, and historical circumstances must not relativize the universal standard. The dialectical tension between law and history, which undermines every non-biblical social philosophy, is overcome by God, who is the guarantor of His law and the social order that is governed by this law.¹⁸ He is the guarantor of the law's permanent applicability because his is the deliverer, in time and on earth.

The prophets of Israel repeatedly announced their detailed critiques of Israel and Judah by first recalling that the God in whose name they were coming before the nation was the same God who had delivered them from Egypt.¹⁹ Having made this identification, they would go on to catalogue the sins of the nation—sins that were prohibited by biblical law. Ezekiel wrote: "Wherefore I caused them to go forth out of the land of Egypt, and brought them into the wilderness. And I gave them my statutes, and shewed them my judgments, which if a man do, he shall even live in them" (20:10–11). The New American Standard Version translates this final clause, "if a man observes them, he will live." In other words, the very foundation of life is the law of God, if a man lives in terms of this law. The prophets then listed the sins of the nation which were inevitably bringing death and destruction—the external judgment of God.

18. Cornelius Van Til offered the two pre-Socratic philosophers, Parmenides and Heraclitus, as the supreme examples of this dialectic. Parmenides was the philosopher of static law and logic. Parmenides was the philosopher of historical change. He wrote, "everything flows"—panta rei. He was the original philosopher of "go with the flow."

19. Isaiah 43:3; Jeremiah 2:6; Hosea 13:4.

F. Biblical Law: God's Prescription for Healing

Daniel Fuller provided a helpful analogy of the relationship between biblical law and salvation by grace through faith. He described God as a physician who prescribes a particular health regimen to patients. Jesus likened Himself to a physician with the task of healing mankind's sins (Matt. 1:21). "We avoid legalism to the extent that we acknowledge how truly sick we are and look away from ourselves and, with complete confidence in the Doctor's expertise and desire to heal us, follow his instructions (the obedience of faith!) in order to get well. We should understand that the entire business of our lives is the convalescence involved in becoming like Christ."²⁰ While a physician expects patients to deviate occasionally from his prescribed program, he understands that a patient who consistently rejects his advice has lost faith in the physician and his program. "That is why the Bible emphasizes persevering faith."²¹ This biblical faith looks toward the future, for saving faith is essentially "a confidence directed toward a future in which God will do and be all he has promised in the Bible."²²

It should now be clear why the necessity for obedience in no way clashes with sola gratia ('by grace alone'), for the Doctor is administering his cure just from the sheer joy he has in extending a blessing to others and in being appreciated for what he does. The Doctor does not bless people because they are the workmen who have rendered some necessary service to him which obligates him to reimburse them with medical care. It should also be clear why the obedience of faith is sola fide ("by faith alone"), for obedience is impelled wholly by faith and is not something added on to faith as though it were co-ordinate with it. . . . Finally, there should be no difficulty in understanding how the Doctor receives all the glory (sola gloria), the credit for the cures that are performed, and for the additional patients that flock to his clinic because of the glowing testimonies of those who have already experienced partial healing.²³

Those who worship any god other than the God who reveals His 20. Daniel P. Fuller, Gospel and Law: Contrast or Continuum? (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1980), p. 118.

21. Idem.

22. Ibid., p. 112.

23. Ibid., pp. 119f.

standards in the Bible are worshippers of a false god. No other god, no other goal, no other standard is to replace men's faith in the living God who delivered Israel. God is primary; there is no secondary God. From this it follows that those who proclaim a law-order alien to the one set forth in the Bible are thereby proclaiming the validity of the word of some other god. They have become idolators—perhaps not conscious idolators, but idolators nonetheless. They are aiding and abetting the plans of men who worship another god. A god's personal (or impersonal) attributes are revealed by its law-order. To proclaim a rival law-order is to proclaim a rival god. Religious pluralism is political polytheism.²⁴

Conclusion

God's announcement to His people that He is the God who delivered them from Egypt laid the basis for the next nine commandments. This verse makes the connection between freedom and worship, which in turn requires obedience to God's law, beginning with this law governing worship.

To abandon faith in the sovereignty of the God who delivered Israel from Egyptian bondage is to abandon any reliable foundation for discovering cause and effect in the world, including the world of economics. This confessional-epistemological principle lays the foundation for the next nine. To abandon faith in God's Bible-revealed law-order is to undermine men's faith in the reliability of God's laws of economics. This is to abandon faith in the what the Bible proclaims as the only basis of liberation, namely, liberation under the sovereign power of God, who sustains the universe and calls all men to conform themselves to His ethical standards in every area of life, in time and on earth.

24. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

GRAVEN IMAGES AND RIVAL CIVILIZATIONS

Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments (Ex. 20: 4–6).

The theocentric principle here is stated plainly: the jealousy of God. This law is an extension of the first commandment. The first commandment establishes the principle of God's exclusive sovereignty over history. The second commandment establishes the principle of legitimate authority: no bowing down—physical subordination—to rival gods. It also deals with representation.

A. The Structure of This Commandment

The second commandment is divided into two sections. The first section deals with the prohibition against graven images. The second section deals with the punishment and mercy of God.

It is not initially clear just how these two sections are linked together. Possibly because of this confusion, the Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches combine this commandment with the first commandment, so that the prohibition against worshipping other gods, the prohibition against graven images, and the promise of judgment and mercy are all considered as a single commandment. To get ten commandments, they divide the tenth, the prohibition against covetousness, into two: coveting the neighbor's house, and coveting the neighbor's wife, servants, and work animals.¹ This handling of the tenth looks strained, but the handling of the first two by other Protestant groups also initially looks strained. They do seem to be one unit, rather than a one-part commandment followed by a two-part commandment.

The theological solution to this ancient debate is the five-point biblical covenant model. As I have argued in the Preface and will demonstrate in this book, the biblical covenant model structures the Ten Commandments into a pair of five-five sections, priestly and kingly. This conforms to the traditional Reformed and Anglican division. The Roman Catholic and Lutheran arrangement does not.

The first commandment is clear: People are not to worship any other god. The first part of the second commandment is also clear: Make no graven images. This is an application of the principle governing the first commandment, namely, that no rival gods are allowed. In other words, first there is faith in God and no other god; then there is an application of this faith in action (or better, inaction): no graven images. The second commandment is an application of the principle governing the first commandment. Men must not bow down to the hand-crafted images of rival gods.

One reason why we can legitimately conclude that these are two separate commandments is that both share a common feature: a prohibition and a reason for the prohibition. The first commandment gives a reason for obedience: God delivered Israel out of bondage in Egypt. This was both a positive sanction and a negative sanction. The second commandment also gives a reason for obedience: God is the One who brings judgment against those who hate Him, and who also brings mercy and love to those who love Him.

The third, fourth, and fifth commandments also follow this pattern: command and explanation. The third says not to take the name of the Lord in vain, "for the LORD will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain," (20:7b). The fourth prohibits work on the sabbath. In the Exodus version, the reason offered is that God created the world in six days and rested on the seventh. In the Deuteronomy version, the reason offered is that they had been bondservants in Egypt, and God had delivered them (Deut. 5:15).² The fifth command-

1. "The Ten Commandments," under "Lutheran Creeds," in John H. Leith (ed.), Creeds of the Churches: A Reader in Christian Doctrine (Chicago: Aldine, 1963), pp. 113–14.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deutero- ment, honoring parents, also has a reason for obedience: a promise of long life.

So, the first five commandments reveal a common pattern: commandment and explanation (or motivation). The second five do not. Because of this, it is reasonable to consider the prohibition against graven images as a separate commandment: one of five.

There is a far stronger reason to divide the first two commandments in this way. The first commandment parallels the first point of the biblical covenant model: sovereignty.³ The second commandment parallels the second point of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy/representation.⁴

The issues here are hierarchy and representation. The economic issue dividing biblical religion and pagan religion is the issue of dominion vs. power. Dominion is based on a hierarchy: God>man> nature (resources). It involves the extension of God's kingdom on earth and in history. Power is based on one of three rival theories of hierarchy: (1) Satan>man>nature; (2) Man>nature; (3) Nature> man. Power involves the extension of the kingdom of whichever sovereign is at the top of the hierarchy. In terms of the language of political philosophy, dominion is based on authority because authority is legitimate, while power is illegitimate because it represents a revolt against lawfully constituted authority.

In economics, the dividing issue is ownership vs. theft. To determine the lawful owner of any asset, the court must have a theory of hierarchy, meaning a concept of delegated authority, or as Christianity has used the term, of stewardship.⁵

Thus, every social order requires a theory of authority. To sort out this crucial issue, we must first understand the second commandment. To do this, I offer an analysis of the second commandment as it applies to social theory and then economic theory. Section I applies to social theory and civil government. Section II applies more specifically to economics.

nomy, 2nd ed (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 12.

3. Ray Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

4. Sutton, ibid., ch. 2; North, ibid., ch. 2.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 30.

- I. No Graven Images
 - A. The Theology of Images
 - B. Rival World Orders
- II. The Compounding Process
 - A. The Iniquity of the Children
 - B. Mercy Unto Thousands

B. No Graven Images

The reason offered for this law was God's jealousy. God had delivered Israel; the nation therefore owed Him exclusive loyalty. God had brought negative sanctions against Egypt; the Israelites should therefore fear Him. This was the dual testimony of the first commandment. Loyalty was to be based on gratitude and fear, which were in turn based on historical experience. These were underlying implications of the first commandment. The second commandment made explicit what the first commandment implied. Not only were the Israelites not to honor any god before the true God, they were not to bow down to images that represented rival gods.

1. The Theology of Images

Man is made in God's image. He has authority over the creation as a lawful subordinate to God. But rebellious man is not content to remain a steward to God, i.e., a subordinate creature. He wants autonomy. At least, he wants to operate under some creature rather than God. So, man makes an image, thereby imitating God, who made man, His image. This image is a point of contact between man and the supernatural being associated with the image. The image represents the supernatural being. Man has an integral part in the formation of this being's point of contact. Man believes that he participates in the work of the divinity by giving shape to its image.

Ironically, man worships something less than man when he worships an idol. He worships power—power that is limited to the period of history prior to Christ's final judgment. But man himself is God's image. Redeemed men (the church) will eventually judge the angels (I Cor. 6:3).⁶ Therefore, in an attempt to imitate God's original creativity by making an image—just as God made man in His image—men identify themselves with the eschatological fate of some fallen angel, for the graven image serves as a point of contact with some fallen angel. Men thereby identify themselves with ultimate impotence and death. “Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men’s hands. They have mouths, but speak not. Eyes have they, but they see not. They have ears, but they hear not. Noses have they, but they smell not. They have hands, but they handle not. Feet have they, but they walk not. Neither speak they through their throat. They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them” (Ps. 115:4–8; cf. 135:15–18).

6. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

Fallen man wants a mediator between himself and God. He wants that mediator to be the work of his own hands. This is an attempt to make himself a co-equal with God, or at least a co-participant with God in their “mutual struggle” against the unpredictable forces of nature and history. The idea that there is a God-ordained mediator who was not the product of men’s hands—a “stone cut out without hands” (Dan. 2:34)—is repulsive to fallen man. Such a concept of God denies man’s own sovereignty and places him at the mercy of God exclusively. He would rather worship some other kind of god. As Rushdoony wrote, “the only God they can tolerate is on[e] who is immersed in history, one who is Himself a product of natural process and is working together with man to conquer time and history. God and man are thus partners and co-workers in the war against brute factuality.”⁷

(a) Representing God

God was not to be represented visually by the people of the Old Testament, because He had not yet appeared as the Incarnation, the perfectly human mediator between God and men who perfectly represented God (John 14:9).⁸

7. R. J. Rushdoony, The Biblical Philosophy of History (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1969] 2000), pp. 3–4. (<http://bit.ly/rjrbph>)

8. Can we legitimately represent Jesus in art? Men did see Him. If a camera had been available to one of His followers, He could have been photographed. He was not an apparition. Someone could have made a sculpture of him, or a painting. But no one did. Should we guess concerning His appearance? We make guesses at what other biblical figures looked like. Moses, since the days of Michelangelo, has come to be thought of in a particular way. But Moses was a man, not divine. So, we face a dilemma: Jesus Christ was both human and divine. We can legitimately represent Him in His work on earth. He was an historical figure. On the other hand, representations of Christ with a pagan halo around His head are not historical representations of His humanity, and are therefore illegitimate. On the pagan origins of halos in medieval art, and their relationship to the occult phenomenon of the “human aura,” see “aura,” in Nandor Fodor, Encyclopedia of Psychic Sciences (New Hyde Park, New York: Univer-

Any pre-Christian attempt on the part of man to picture God would have been an assertion of divinity on the part of man, for only Jesus Christ has seen God, because He is of God (John 6:46). It would have meant that fallen man had seen the face of God. But to view God meant death, as the Hebrews had been told (Ex. 19:21). Not even Moses was allowed to see God's face (Ex. 33:23). Men could have painted a burning bush, which was a manifestation of God, or produced a sculpture of Jacob wrestling with the theophany (Gen. 32:24–32), but there was no way they would have been able to represent God in His Person as a divine being. Men violated this prohibition by representing God in the form of animals, worshipping creatures as if they were the Creator (Rom. 1:23).

An idol is a means of negating the Creator-creature distinction. Men believe that they can approach God, placate God, and even control God through bowing to an idol. Yet idols are radically distinct from God, as this passage tells us: men are not to worship any aspect of the creation, whether in heaven, on earth, or under the earth.⁹

Idols are weak. The Hebrews had seen that idols had not protected the Egyptians, and their children would see that the idols of the Canaanites would be equally impotent. At best, idols put men in contact with demonic beings that can manifest power, but nothing comparable to the awesome power of God. Forbidden rites place men in bondage to underworld spirits that can control them, even as men hope to control the spirits and the external environment by means of idol worship.

God forbade the use of tools in the construction of His altar. "Ye shall not make with me gods of silver, neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold. An altar of earth thou shalt make unto me, and shalt sacrifice thereon thy burnt offerings, and thy peace offerings, thy sheep, and thine oxen: in all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee. And if thou wilt make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stone: for if thou lift up thy tool upon it, thou hast polluted it. Neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar, that thy nakedness be not discovered thereon" (Ex. 20:23–26).¹⁰ sity Books, [1934] 1966), pp. 17–18; Lewis Spence, Encyclopaedia of Occultism (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, [1920] 1960), pp. 50–51. Also, any use of icons or paintings that "aid" us in the worship of God—aids that supposedly provide a point of contact between the worshipper and God—are illegitimate.

9. I am indebted to Prof. John Frame's class syllabus, Doctrine of the Christian Life, for these insights.

10. Deuteronomy 27:5; Joshua 8:30–31.

The Hebrews were not allowed to design and build at their own discretion the shape of the place of atonement before God. God provided the raw materials, and they were not to reshape them.

When the early church spread the gospel, the image-makers suffered financial losses. Acts 19 records the confrontation between the evangelists and the silversmiths who made the images of the temple of Diana. The leader of the craft guild, Demetrius, warned his colleagues: “Moreover ye see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they be no gods, which are made with hands” (v. 26). The gospel had negative economic consequences for the pagan craftsmen of idols.

The prohibition of graven images was not a universal condemnation of all religious images. The tabernacle had images of the cherubim (Ex. 25:18–22) and bowls shaped like almonds (Ex. 25:33–34). The cherubim were not “cherubs” in the modern sense—not ruddy-faced children. They had four faces: a man’s, an ox’s, an eagle’s, and a lion’s (Ezk. 1:10). The temple actually had a large basin supported by 12 oxen (I Ki. 7:25), yet bulls were a familiar part of pagan worship. But the permitted likenesses were spelled out by God and limited to the Old Testament house of God. Men were not acting autonomously when they put these likenesses in the tabernacle. In short, these specified likenesses were symbols, not icons. As symbolic of God and His relationship with man, they rested on the doctrine of creation, the absolute distinction between Creator and creation. The icon, in contrast, points to a supposed scale of being, an ontological link between God and the image. This is the theology of magic.

(b) Icons and Magic

Let us consider an Old Testament example of a legitimate use of an image for religious purposes. It is one of the strangest events in the Bible. The setting, however, was only too typical an event in the life of that first generation in the wilderness. God had made a vow with them to deliver a Canaanitic nation into their hands, if they in turn utterly destroyed the city. He did, and they did. The victory was complete (Num. 21:1–4). Then they journeyed around Edom, and once again they grew discouraged. They made their standard complaint: “And the people spake against God, and against Moses, Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? For there is no bread, neither is there any water: and our soul loatheth this light bread" (Num. 21:5).

This time, God responded in anger. He sent fiery serpents among them to bite them. Many of them died (21:6). They repented. Moses then prayed for them (v. 7). God instructed him to make an image of a fiery serpent and place it on a pole. Everyone who looks at it after he is bitten will live, God told Moses (v. 8). Moses made the image, and God's word came true: Merely looking at it saved their lives (v. 9).

Was this magic? No, for God had instructed them on a one-time basis to follow this one-time ritual. The use of the serpent on a pole was not to become part of Israel's worship. Moses had been instructed by God to make such an image. Yet, of all images, this one is the one that we would assume could never be made legitimately. The serpent became a universal symbol in pagan civilizations. The Sumerian god Ningishzida was the son of the healing god Ninazu, and he was represented by a pair of snakes entwined around a rod. This god was worshipped in Babylon in the late Bronze Age era in which the exodus took place.¹¹ In Greece, the symbol of a snake was also associated with divine healing: Asklepios, a snake-god, was their god of healing. He was symbolized as a snake wrapped around a staff.¹² We still see the Sumerian snakes' use as a symbol of healing: the medical profession's symbol is a pair of intertwined snakes on a pole. Yet God instructed Moses to construct a snake image.

Why was this image not an icon? Because it was used in an actual historical event. This is the key that unlocks the New Testament era's standard for the proper use of images. Now that God has come in the flesh and has manifested Himself among men, it is legitimate to represent God by making representations of Jesus Christ. How can such statues or paintings be kept from becoming magical talismans, amulets, or icons? By placing the representations in a Bible-revealed historical setting.

We do not know what Jesus looked like. We know that He was sufficiently nondescript that the Jews paid Judas to identify Him. So, we cannot legitimately represent Jesus apart from recognizable historical settings from the Bible. The historical setting is the identifying 11. E. A. Wallis Budge, Amulets and Talismans (New Hyde Park: New York: University Books, [1930?] 1961), pp. 488–89. "The snake sloughs its skin annually, and so suggested the ideas of renewed life and immortality to the ancients" (p. 489).

12. Jane Harrison, Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, [1903] 1991), p. 341. (<http://bit.ly/jehprol>) mark of who the image represents. It points also to a one-time only event in man's history. In this way, the image does not readily become a continuing incarnation. It does not readily become a link in the present between the worshipper and the object of his worship. Thus, the presence of statues or paintings or stained glass windows in a church need not be violations of the second commandment. But when these images are used as links between the present worship of God in prayer, except as a way to recall the memory of some mighty act of God, they become idols.

The use of icons as mediating instruments between worshippers and God does involve elements of the forbidden practice, but this is not always a self-conscious defiance of the second commandment.¹³ Eastern orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism are marked by practices that are rebellious in this regard, but this may not always be self-conscious rebellion. The leadership of both churches has unquestionably failed in the past to limit the use of images within the worship ceremonies to strictly historical settings. By failing to limit the use of visual representations of Jesus or the "saints"—historical figures from the Bible—to their historical settings, churches have there by implicitly or explicitly encouraged the misuse of images. They have not warned the worshippers that the use of images is to be historical, not ontological. Images are to remind men of the deliverances in history by God of His people. They may be used to remind men of the power of God in history, and therefore to reinforce their faith in God's power in the affairs of this world. They may not be used to link a specific worshipper with a specific mediator who is represented by the image so closely that the very presence of the image is the source of the mediation. In other words, worshippers can easily be lured into substituting magic for Christian faith.

We can understand how easy it is for a believer to make this illegitimate substitution when we examine the case of Moses' tapping of the 13. The iconoclastic controversy in Byzantium in the eighth century A.D. was a war by the emperors against the use of icons in the church. As Ladner noted in 1940, this was a political struggle. The emperors wanted a monopoly over the use of icons. The icons of the emperors in public places were to be the manifestation on earth of material aspects of God's kingdom. In short, "they did not wish to permit on this the imagery of their own imperial natural world." Gerhard B. Ladner, "Origin and Significance of the Byzantine Iconoclastic Controversy," Medieval Studies, II (New York: Sheed & Ward, 1940), p. 135. Cited in R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), p. 188. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>) rock in order to bring forth water for the Israelites. Moses tapped the rock in order to get water out of it. Why? He had once been told by God to smite a rock in order to bring water out of it (Ex. 17:6), and he made a false conclusion: God rewards the man who properly manipulates the talismans or implements of ritualistic power. He concluded that a one-time historical link between tapping a rock and getting water out of it was in fact an ontological link between ritual precision and desired effect. He was lured into heresy. The influence of the power religion of Egypt was still strong in his thinking. He began to think in terms of ritual rather than ethics, of the precise repetition of a familiar formula rather than obedience to God's revealed word. In short, Moses adopted magic in place of biblical religion.¹⁴

God knew that this shift in Moses' thinking had taken place. This is why He tested Moses. He told Moses in the desert of Zin to take the rod and gather the assembly, and then speak to the rock before earth any other but their own image or more exactly their eyes, "and thou shalt bring forth to them water out of the rock" (Num. 20:8). Moses did not believe God. He relied instead on ritual. He concluded that adherence to a form (formula) that had produced results in the past is the key to tapping God's power. So he tapped the rock in order to "tap" God's power. He even added a touch of his own—literally: a second tap of the rod. "And Moses lifted up his hand, and with his rod he smote the rock twice: and the water came out abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their beasts also. And the LORD spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them" (vv. 11–12). This was a high price to pay.

A legitimate symbol reminds us of what God is like by revealing what kinds of physical blessings God has given to His people. Its prohibited pagan equivalent is the amulet or talisman, which commands a god's obedience because of the presence of the object, or because of ritual precisely performed by man. It assumes that both the god and man are under the bondage of ritual, but that man can impose his will on the god through manipulating a talisman or other implement of power. Budge wrote:

The use of amulets dates from the time when animism or magic satisfied the spiritual needs of man. Primitive man seems to have adopted them as a result of an internal urge or the natural instinct which made him protect himself and to try to divine the future. He required amulets to enable him to beget children, to give him strength to overcome enemies, visible and invisible, and above all the EVIL EYE, and to protect his women and children, and house and cattle; and his descendants throughout the world have always done the same. When the notion of a god developed in his mind, he ascribed to that god the authorship of the magical powers which he believed to be inherent in the amulets, and he believed that his god needed them as much as he himself did. He did not think it possible for his god to exist without the help of magical powers. . . . The gods became magicians, and employed magic when necessary, and dispensed it through their priests to man kind.¹⁵

14. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 11.

A legitimate image of a Bible event reminds men of what God has done. An icon is the hypothetical representation of a person out of the Bible—a representation that offers the worshipper power over today's events because it manifests the displayed power that the person represented by the image once possessed. It is an illegitimate device, because the worshipper seeks to appropriate the power that was once revealed historically in the life of the person represented by the image. It is not biblically significant that the person represented by the image once possessed such power. What is significant is that he was placed under grace and received power sufficient to perform his God-assigned task or sufficient to demonstrate God's power in history. The basis of this gift of power was not the precision of his ritual performance, or his special place on the hypothetical (and nonexistent) chain of being between God and man, but rather his position in history, meaning his place in the providentially controlled history of God's people. Worshipers should never forget that the biblical personality represented by the image never used an image to appropriate the power he received. There are no indications that worshipers in the Old Testament or New Testament church used images of historic persons to aid them in their prayers and devotions.

Similarly, our possession of power is not based on our ability to repeat precise rituals, or on our position in some chain of being. Our power is dependent on the providence of God. Thus, it is obedience, not ritual, that is essential. It is ethics, not power, that is our lawful goal. Extending the kingdom of God, not extending the kingdom of man, Satan, or autonomous nature, is our primary goal (Matt. 6:33).¹⁶ Thus, the use of images to enhance our power by bringing us closer to God metaphysically or ontologically is illegitimate. Images are to bring us closer to Jesus Christ ethically. To reduce the likelihood of our misusing images, they must be kept historical in their frame of reference. They must remind us of what God once did for people who verbally and ethically proclaimed biblical religion, not what He did for people who ritually proclaimed the power religion. What God did to the latter is what faithful worshippers wish to avoid.

15. Budge, Amulets and Talismans, pp. xv, xvi.

As I have said, the improper use of icons, candles, or other objects used in worship is not always self-consciously magical. In the world of occultism, on the other hand, we still find a self-conscious acceptance of the old religion of images. The revival of an occultist political order under Nazism in the 1930s indicates that the lingering traces of occultism can be revived at any time. If occultism continues to expand its influence, we can expect to see more examples of the ancient practice of image-worship.

2. Rival World Orders

The image, the god represented by the image, and the social order are always closely linked. Bowing down to an idol means the acceptance of that god's law-order. "Thou shalt not bow down to their gods, nor serve them, nor do after their works; but thou shalt utterly overthrow them, and quite break down their images" (Ex. 23:24). To bow down to any deity means to walk in his ordinances. "After the doings of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwelt, shall ye not do: and after the doings of the land of Canaan, whither I bring you, shall ye not do: neither shall ye walk in their ordinances" (Lev. 18:3). The history of Israel testifies to the inescapable link between gods and their social orders: "They did not destroy the nations, concerning whom the LORD commanded them, but were mingled among the heathen, and learned their works. And they served their idols: which were a snare unto them. Yea, they sacrificed their sons and daughters unto devils" (Ps. 106:34–37).

Making a graven image means to participate in the creation of a new world order. This new world order is in opposition to God's world order. A different god is elevated to a position of sovereignty. In the Old Testament era, this meant that some demonic being became the source of health and prosperity. In modern civilization, which is the historical product of Christianity, most men no longer worship demons explicitly. They attribute sovereignty to impersonal forces of history (Marxism), or forces of the unconscious mind (Freudianism), or the spirit of the Volk (Nazism), or the impersonal forces of nature (Darwinism's explanation of pre-human evolution). Modern man has attempted to become what C. S. Lewis prophesied: the materialist magician.¹⁷ Ultimately, man is the sovereign agent, by means of the proletarian Party (Marxism), economic planning (Fabianism), genetic manipulation (eugenics), conditioned response training (behaviorism), psychoanalysis (Freudianism), the führer (Nazism), higher consciousness techniques (New Age transcendentalism), compulsory public education (progressive education), scientific planning (Darwinism), or scientific management (Taylorism).¹⁸

16. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 15.

Satan did not tempt Adam and Eve to worship him openly; he only asked them to violate the law of God. The violation of God's law was the equivalent of worshipping Satan. Only when he approached Christ did he ask to be worshipped (Luke 4:7).¹⁹ The worship of man and his works is essentially the worship of Satan. In short, man the idol-maker and idol-worshipper is man the Satan-worshipper. Humanism is inescapably satanism, which is why satanism revives during periods of humanistic dominance.²⁰

The construction of a world order that is opposed to the new world order set forth by God is therefore theologically comparable to constructing a graven image. There may be no official graven image at first. Men may not be asked to bow down to it at first. But the substitution of the ordinances of man for the ordinances of God is the heart of idol-worship. It is an assertion of man's autonomy, which ultimately

17. C. S. Lewis, The Screwtape Letters (New York: Macmillan, [1961] 1969), p. 33. These "letters from a senior devil" were published first during World War II.

18. Gary North, "From Cosmic Purposelessness to Humanistic Sovereignty," Appendix A in Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012).

19. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

20. On the occultism of the Renaissance, see Frances Yates, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (New York: Vintage, 1964). On the occult background of nineteenth-century revolutionism, see James Billington, Fire in the Minds of Men: Origins of the Revolutionary Faith (New York: Basic Books, 1980). On the link between humanism and occultism in the United States, especially after 1964, see Gary North, Unholy Spirits: Occultism and New Age Humanism (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/gnoccultism>) results in the subordination of man to the ordinances of Satan. The society of Satan does not need graven images to make it operational.²¹

It is a testimony to the impact of Christianity on Western culture that graven images have all but disappeared. Humanists have adopted faith in the original promise of Satan to Eve, namely, the impossible offer of autonomy to man, but they do not bow down to graven images. To make a profession of faith in man's autonomy is to become ethically subordinate to Satan (under the overall sovereignty of God).²² Men who believe that they worship no god have nevertheless conformed themselves sufficiently to Satan's standards to warrant eternal punishment, and to that extent, Satan is pleased. In worshipping the works of their own hands, they refuse to worship God. Their idols are not explicitly religious or explicitly rebellious ritually. They do not celebrate their faith by adopting the ancient rituals of satanism, namely, by making graven images.²³ Worshipping graven images would make manifest their ultimate theology, so in this respect Christianity has influenced humanism and has also restrained it.

(a) Images and Political Covenants

The prohibition against worshipping graven images was unique in the ancient world. Whenever archaeologists dig up the remains of some ancient city, they find images of all kinds—in temples, in the palace of the king, in graves, and in the homes of the people. Ancient cultures were polytheistic. The proliferation of civic and household images was a universal phenomenon. By prohibiting the use of graven images, God was separating the Israelites from the surrounding cultures. It was always the mark of rebellion when the Israelites began to worship graven images.

Because images were prohibited in Israel, this made political covenants with surrounding nations impossible during the periods in which Israel remained faithful and avoided images. Temporary alliances were allowed (Gen. 14), but not oath-bound covenants. In the ancient world, including the classical civilizations of Greece and Rome, political alliances involved a peace treaty between the gods of the city-states. Politics was fundamentally religious. Citizenship was based on a free man's right by birth to participate in the religious rites of a particular city. He could participate only in the rites of his own city. Dual citizenship was therefore impossible. The gods of the ancient city were jealous gods. Their worshippers were not allowed to participate in the religious rites of other cities.

21. R. J. Rushdoony, "The Society of Satan" (1964); reprinted in Biblical Economics Today, II (Oct./Nov. 1979). (<http://bit.ly/rjrsos>)

22. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, p. 132.

23. C. S. Lewis' insightful novel, That Hideous Strength (1946), presents a literary prophecy of a coming fusion of power-seeking modern science and power-seeking ancient demonism. This experiment ends in the novel with the destruction of the scientists: one by a suicidal but consistent application of modern dualistic psychology (Frost), another as a blood sacrifice to a demonic god-head whose scientific "creator" never suspected (until the moment of his death) that it was anything but a strictly scientific phenomenon (Filostrata).

Where did the local gods come from? A Greek city-state could adopt local gods that were identified with certain families within the city. When a family consented to allow its deity to become the god of a city, it generally retained the hereditary right of priesthood for that deity.²⁴ Different cities would have local deities named Zeus or Athena, but these were not the same gods.²⁵

Warfare between cities was simultaneously warfare between the gods of each city. A conquered city had to be allowed to remain independent, or else it had to be destroyed. "There was no middle course," Fustel de Coulanges wrote. "Either the city ceased to exist, or it was a sovereign state. So long as it retained its worship, it retained its government; it lost the one only by losing the other; and then it existed no longer."²⁶ Understandably, this made warfare total. Soldiers burned crops because the crops were dedicated to other gods. Cattle were slaughtered. The sacred fires of the defeated city and its households were extinguished. There was no sense of duty towards the enemy.²⁷

What about peace treaties between cities? They were established by religious acts. The ceremony of the treaty was conducted by the priests of each city.

These religious ceremonies alone gave a sacred and inviolable character to international conventions. . . . With such ideas it was important, in a treaty of peace, that each city called its own gods to bear witness to its oaths. . . . Both parties tried, indeed, if it was possible, to invoke divinities that were common to both cities. They swore by those gods that were visible everywhere—the sun, which

24. Numa Denis Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] n.d.), III:II:2, pp. 124–25. Reprinted by Peter Smith, Gloucester, Massachusetts, 1979.

25. Ibid., III:VI, p. 150. Cf. Harrison, Prolegomena, ch. 1.

26. Ibid., III:XIV, p. 205.

27. Ibid., III:XV, pp. 205–6.

shines upon all, and the nourishing earth. But the gods of each city, and its protecting heroes, touched men much more, and it was necessary to call them to witness, if men wished to have oaths really confirmed by religion. As the gods mingled in the battles during the war, they had to be included in the treaty. It was stipulated, therefore, that there should be an alliance between the gods as between the two cities. To indicate this alliance of the gods, it sometimes happened that the two peoples agreed mutually to take part in each other's sacred festivals. Sometimes they opened their temples to each other, and made an exchange of religious rites.²⁸

Fustel wrote about Greece and Rome, but similar theologies reigned in the Near East. Thus, it was impossible for Israel to make covenants of peace with the foreign nations and still remain faithful to God. "Thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor with their gods" (Ex. 23:32). The nations of Canaan had to be utterly destroyed (Ex. 23:27), for their altars had to be destroyed (Ex. 34:13). "Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye are passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan, then ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their pictures, and destroy all their molten images, and quite pluck down their high places; and ye shall dispossess the inhabitants of the land, and dwell therein; for I have given you the land to possess it" (Num. 33:51–53). It was also forbidden for the Israelites to intermarry with foreigners who were not under the covenantal authority of God (Deut. 7:3–4).

How could God deny His own sovereignty? He was the God who had delivered His people from Egypt, demonstrating that He was no local god, but a God over all kingdoms. Pharaoh had not conquered God by subjugating His people. Pharaoh had wanted to negotiate with God through Moses, but God had issued a non-negotiable demand to let His people go for one week to worship Him.²⁹ When Pharaoh refused to capitulate, God destroyed him. No self-proclaimed human divinity could come before God as an equal. No common rites were possible between God's people and the foreign gods of pagan cities.

It was this issue that got the early church into a life-and-death confrontation with Rome. Members were willing to be honest citizens, but they could not be citizens in Rome's view. They refused to participate in the rites of the Empire. The Roman pantheon was filled with the gods of the various conquered nations, which was the basis of the peace treaty between Rome and each of its subject peoples, but neither Israel nor the church could conform to the ritual terms of this treaty. Israel was scattered in the diaspora in the second century A.D., and the church was intermittently persecuted until Constantine's era. This is why Fustel could write, "The victory of Christianity marks the end of ancient society."³⁰

28. Ibid., III:XV, pp. 208–9.

29. Chapter 10.

When God told the Israelites they could not make graven images or worship them, He was announcing the terms of the dominion covenant. There had to be religious separation in Israel. They were to be isolated culturally from pagan nations. But this prohibition was more than a means to separate the Israelites culturally from their neighbors. It was a call to conquest. There could be no peace treaties with the people dwelling in the land which God had given to them; God imposes unconditional surrender or ultimate extinction.³¹

C. The Compounding Process

We come now to the reason given for the prohibition against constructing graven images. The reason is that God is a jealous God. What kind of God is that? It is a God who visits the iniquity of the fathers on subsequent generations of ethical rebels. It is also a God who shows mercy to generations of covenantally faithful people. The presence or absence of graven images testifies to the spiritual condition of the two ethically distinct and ritually distinct types of people.

The heart of the description of the jealous God is the covenantal process of compound growth: either growth unto destruction or growth unto dominion. History is linear. It develops over time. What goes before affects what comes after. Nevertheless, it does not determine what comes after. God determines both the "before" and the "after." God is sovereign, not the forces of history. But the criteria of performance are ethical. We know which covenant we are in by evaluating the external events of our lives in terms of God's list of blessings and curses (Deut. 28).³²

1. The Iniquity of the Children

We read: "[F]or I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generations. . . ” (Ex. 20:5b). This verse is frequently misunderstood. It does not say that God punishes sons for the sins of their fathers. The Bible’s testimony concerning the responsibilities of children for the sins of their fathers is clear: “The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin” (Deut. 24:16). This principle was reaffirmed by Ezekiel: “The soul that sinneth, it shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son: the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him” (Ezk. 18:20). We therefore must interpret the unique phrase, “visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children,” in terms of this clearly stated principle of judgment.

30. Fustel, Ancient City, V:III, p. 389.

31. North, Unconditional Surrender.

32. North, Inheritance and Dominion, chaps. 69, 70.

What we have in view here is a covenantal framework of reference. The Hebrews had just come out of Egypt. They and their ancestors had labored under slavery. The year of release had not been honored by their captors. Year after year, the Egyptians had built up their cities by the use of Hebrew labor. This capital base kept expanding. The wages that would have been paid to free laborers, as well as the capital that was to be given to slaves in the year of release (Deut. 15:13–14), was retained by succeeding generations of Egyptians. Thus, the later generations became the beneficiaries of the compounding process.³³ They were richer, they supposed, than their ancestors because they possessed the visible manifestations of labor extracted illegally over decades.

Then came God’s judgment. With the compound growth of the visible benefits came the compound judgment of God. Both had built up over time. The final generation suffered incomparable judgment because they had not repented, made restitution voluntarily, and freed the Hebrews. For God not to have judged that final generation in terms of the benefits they had received illegally—benefits conveyed to them as a continuing legacy from their ancestors—would have been an act of extreme mercy on the part of God.

2. Repeated Iniquities

The iniquities of the fathers were repeated by the sons. The fathers escaped the full temporal retribution of God. In this sense, God showed them mercy, in time and on earth. But the sons also did not repent. They continued in the sins of their fathers. If anything, they enjoyed the luxury of sinning even more flagrantly, because they were the beneficiaries of a larger capital base—a capital base of evil.

33. Chapter 6.

How long will God allow the sins of the heirs to go on? Unto the third and fourth generation. How long had the Hebrews been under the dominance of Egypt? Three generations.³⁴ The historical precedent should have been obvious to any Hebrew in Moses' day. God visits the iniquity for several generations. He punishes iniquity, according to one possible translation. He numbers iniquities, according to another.³⁵ It can also mean remember (I Sam. 15:2).

The sons of the final generation in Egypt indulged in the sins of their fathers. The same sins were popular. God numbered or remembered these sins. This is the meaning of "visiting the iniquity." He visits and sees the sins, generation after generation. A satanically covenantal society becomes skilled in certain sins. There is a systematic specialization in particular evils. Men are creatures. They are limited. Men have to specialize in order to achieve their goals. This is as true of sinfulness (and righteousness) as it is of economic production. As time goes on, the sinners get very good at what they are doing. Their unique cultural sins compound over time. As God put it with reference to the iniquity of the Amorites, their cup had to be filled up before the heirs of Abraham could inherit the promised land (Gen. 15:16b). The cup of iniquity of the Egyptians filled up one generation (40 years) before the cup of the Amorites filled up. Thus, in the fourth generation (Kohath's generation to Joshua's), Israel returned to Canaan, just as God had promised (Gen. 15:16a).

The compounding process that builds up the capital base of iniquity explains Isaiah 65:7: "I will repay your iniquities, yours and your fathers, all at once, says the LORD, because they burnt incense on the mountains and defied me on the hills; I will first measure out their reward and then pay them in full" (NEB). It is not that the sons have broken with the sins of the fathers, but nonetheless are going to be judged in terms of their fathers' rebellion. On the contrary, it is that the sons have become even more efficient in sinning. Mercy had been shown to the fathers in not destroying them. The fathers had been able to pass down a legacy of evil to the sons. Thus, the sons suffer for their own sins, but their sins are more deserving of judgment, for this final generation has not repented in thankfulness for the mercy shown to their fathers by God. The final generation exists only because God had not destroyed their fathers, yet they refuse to repent. God's massive judgment is just, for their sin is greater. Why? Because, first, they did not repent in the face of God's mercy to their fathers, and second, because they have inherited a legacy of evil that has built up over time—a covenantal inheritance of death.

34. Kohath, Moses' grandfather, was alive before the descent into Egypt (Gen. 46:11). His son was Amram (Ex. 6:18), Moses' father (Num. 26:59). For a discussion of the problem of the period of Israel's sojourn in Egypt, see Donovan Courville, The Exodus Problem and its Ramifications, 2 vols. (Loma Linda, California: Challenge Books, 1971), I, pp. 137–41.

35. Numbers 1:44; 4:37, 41, 45, 46, 49.

3. Mercy Unto Thousands

In contrast to the compounding process of evil, which is cut short after a few generations, stands God's promise to show mercy to thousands of those who keep His commandments. Cassuto interpreted this to mean thousands of generations. Nachmanides translated it: "He showeth mercy unto the thousandth generation."³⁶ The contrast is between a few generations and many—so many that it really means eternity. Cassuto cites Deuteronomy 7:9: "Know therefore that the LORD thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations."³⁷ The next verse is also significant, although Cassuto neglects it: "And repayeth them that hate him to their face, to destroy them: he will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him to his face" (Deut. 7:10).

This is one of the most optimistic concepts in the Bible. What God is saying is that the works of evil will be cut short, sometimes after three or four generations, and sometimes immediately. The process of compound growth for the sinners will not go on forever, in contrast to the compounding process for the righteous. The evils of the sinners overtake them; their cup becomes full and they are destroyed. But for the righteous man and the righteous society, the cup runneth over (Ps. 23:5b). Even the now-empty cup of the vanquished wicked—the economic base in which sin was finally filled to the brim—is inherited by the righteous. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov.

36. Ramban, Commentary on the Torah: Exodus (New York: Shilo Publishing House, [1267?] 1973), p. 300.

37. U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, The Hebrew University, [1951] 1974), p. 243.

13:22b).³⁸

Could the Hebrews really have understood all this? In general, yes. Abraham had been told that the fourth generation would inherit the land of Canaan. This was the generation that succeeded Moses' generation. The children of the exodus were told this explicitly by God, with respect to the external blessings that He was about to give them, and were reminded of their covenantal responsibility to obey His law and teach it to their children (Deut. 6:5–9).³⁹

And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildest not, and houses full of good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full; Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage (Deut. 6: 10–12).

The compound growth rate of evil is temporary. Such growth is always brought into judgment by God. The “positive feedback” of growth is always overturned by the “negative feedback” of judgment — sometimes overnight, as in the case of Babylon when it fell to the Medo-Persian Empire (Dan. 5). The compound growth rate of righteousness is long term. More than this: it is perpetual. God shows mercy to thousands of generations, meaning throughout history and (symbolically) beyond history. But this growth process does include history; generations are historical phenomena. There can be intermittent departures from faith by God's covenant people. This interrupts the growth process. But the contrast is between a brief period of three or four unrighteous generations and a stupendously long period of mercy to those who love God and keep His commandments. The magnitude of the growth period of mercy and mercy's works is enormous, compared with the growth period of evil. This fact points to comprehensive dominion by God's people in history. It points to the fulfilment of the dominion covenant in history.

(a) Exponential Righteousness

The implication should be obvious: the capital base of righteous- ness will grow to fill the earth over time. Even a little growth, if compounded over a long enough period of time, produces astronomically large results—so large, in fact, that exponential growth points to an eventual final judgment and an end to time, with its cursed, scarce creation.⁴⁰ The righteous widow's two mites (Luke 21:2–4), if invested at 1% per annum over a thousand generations, would be worth more than all the wealth on earth. In other words, the concept of “a thousand generations” is symbolic; it means everything there is, a total victory for righteousness. Furthermore, this victory is no overnight affair; it comes as all growth processes come for a society: step by step, line upon line, here a little, there a little.

38. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 40

39. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 15.

The sheer magnitude of righteousness' compounding capital base will inescapably overcome the feeble capital structure of iniquity, as surely as God's army will overcome Satan's. Men who work diligently and faithfully in terms of God's law can legitimately have confidence in the snowball effect of their efforts. There can be a comparable snowball effect for rebellious societies, but rebellion's snowball eventually is melted by the heat of God's fury. Four generations of compounding—even “leveraged” compounding—cannot match a thousand generations of compounding.

(b) Kingdoms: Simultaneously Internal and External

It is difficult to interpret Exodus 20:4–6 in terms of the idea that Satan's kingdom grows externally, but God's kingdom grows only internally. If Satan's kingdom is essentially external and cultural, rather than both internal (“spiritual”) and external, then why did Satan demand that Jesus worship him? On the other hand, if God's kingdom is essentially internal (“spiritual”) and not also external and cultural, then why does He demand visible conformity to His commandments? Even more important, why does God promise external blessings to those who conform themselves to his law (Deut. 8:1–13),⁴¹ and warn against the lure of the religion of autonomous man when those blessings tempt men to forget God (Deut. 8:14–17)?⁴² Why should God tell His people not to worship graven images, and then immediately thereafter list all the external blessings—agricultural and military blessings, plus peace—that they can confidently expect if they obey this command-

40. Chapter 17; cf. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, p. 237.

41. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 14.

42. Ibid., ch. 21.

ment (Lev. 26:1–12)? The answer should be obvious. Both kingdoms are simultaneously internal (“spiritual”) and external; the spirit and the flesh are interconnected. Both kingdoms operate in the supernatural realm and in the temporal realm. Both seek dominion over the creation. Both have periods of growth, internally and externally. But Satan’s kingdom is cut down early, “in the midst of its prime,” so to speak, just as Jesus was cut off in the midst of His prime, and the animals sacrificed in the Old Testament were cut off in the midst of their prime,⁴³ so that God’s kingdom might have long life and not suffer the judgment of Satan’s kingdom.

The comparative growth rates are, of course, symbolic. Egypt’s case was literal, and the Hebrews should have recognized the power of God to bring His word to pass. Nevertheless, some pagan societies have gone on in their rebellion far longer than four generations. The Roman Empire is one historical example, although the Pax Romana lasted less than two centuries before the Empire began to be subjected to major crises. The point is, compared to the long-term growth of God’s kingdom, in time and on earth as well as beyond the grave, Satan’s earthly kingdoms are short-lived. The mercy that God shows to pagan kingdoms by not bringing judgment on them the moment they transgress His law is ultimately a form of judgment. They receive common grace, meaning an unmerited and temporary gift of an extension of time without judgment, but this only increases the magnitude of the eventual wrath of God.

We should not expect to see Satan’s kingdom cut down overnight in the future, after having attained a position of universal dominion. The process of growth for Satan’s kingdom is not continuous. The “negative feedback” phenomenon of external judgment repeatedly cuts back the growth of Satan’s external dominion long before it can achieve worldwide dominion. These verses point to a far different future: the steady growth of Christ’s kingdom as the leaven of righteousness overwhelms and replaces the God-hindered leaven of Satan’s kingdom.⁴⁴

43. Young turtledoves or young pigeons (Lev. 5:7), young bullocks (Ex. 29:1; Num. 28:11, 19), a three-year-old heifer, goat, and ram (Gen. 15:9), a virgin heifer which has never been yoked (Deut. 21:3), and the archetype of all sacrifices, the lamb (Gen. 22:7; Ex. 12:3–5; etc.).

44. North, Unconditional Surrender, pp. 283–92.

(c) The Gambler

Satan's kingdom manifests itself intermittently during temporary periods of exceedingly rapid growth, but this growth cannot be sustained for "a thousand generations." The growth rate of Satan's kingdom is the growth rate of the gambler who has a string of successful bets, or the highly leveraged (indebted) investor who predicts the market accurately for a time and multiplies his wealth with borrowed money. Such growth is rapid, but it cannot be sustained. It is the growth rate of a person who has limited time, and who must make his fortune in one lifetime. He requires rapid growth, for he has no faith in long-term growth over many generations. The compound growth rate must be high, and it must be rapid, for it will not last for long.

Paganism and gambling are closely linked, especially in periods of declining social order. Rushdoony writes: "Gambling comes to have a religious prominence and passion in the minds of men, so that it is more than a mere pastime: it is a hope for life. . . . The gambler denies implicitly that the universe is under law; he insists that 'all life is a gamble' and a falling brick can kill you, and totally meaningless events always surround you, because chance, not God, is ultimate. Since chance, not God, rules the universe, causality does not prevail. It is therefore possible to get something for nothing, and the gambler, knowing what the odds are, nevertheless expects chance to overrule law and enrich him."⁴⁵ The gambler believes in law-overcoming chance, or luck. Such an outlook was dominant during the Roman Empire, and it destroyed the foundations of classical civilization.⁴⁶

Such an outlook is also the ideology of the revolutionary. Faith in the great revolutionary discontinuous event, the run of successful bets, or the overnight "killing" in the market marks the short-run view of fallen man.⁴⁷ Continuity holds no promise of victory for him, for he knows that time and continuity are his great enemies. The run of luck for a gambler cannot hold; the law of averages (statistical continuity) eventually reasserts itself. Similarly, the traditions and habits of men (social and ethical continuity) thwart the revolutionary; if the revolutionaries cannot capture the seats of central power overnight, in a top-down transfer of power to the newly captured central government, they fear that all will be lost.⁴⁸

45. R. J. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995), p. 217. (<http://bit.ly/rjrpgap>)

46. Charles Norris Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture: A Study of Thought and Action from Augustus to Augustine (New York: Oxford University Press, [1944] 1957), p. 159. (<http://bit.ly/cnccacc>). Reprinted by Liberty Fund.

47. Karl Marx, who spent most of his life in self-imposed poverty, inherited a fortune in 1864. As the money was being sent in chunks, Marx invested in the stock market. He wrote to Engels on July 15: "If I had the money during the last ten days, I would have been able to make a good deal on the stock exchange. The time has come now when with wit and very little money one can make a killing in London." As his biographer reports, a year later he was again begging for money from Engels. Robert Payne, Marx (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1968), p. 353. Marx was supported entirely by Engels, a successful businessman, from the early 1870s until his death in 1883.

Even a successful revolution is threatened by institutional continuity: lethargy, corruption, bureaucracy. This was the fate of the Soviet Union.⁴⁹ To overcome these results, Communists argued for the necessity of continual revolutions. Trotsky⁵⁰ and Mao⁵¹ both called for a continuing series of revolutions, echoing the instruction given to Communist proletarians by Karl Marx in 1850: “Their battle cry must be: The Revolution in Permanence.”⁵² Billington traced the idea back to the Bavarian Illuminati.⁵³ Thomas Jefferson used similar language: “What signify a few lives lost in a century or two? The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots & tyrants. It is its natural manure.”⁵⁴ He was writing of Daniel Shays’ rebel-

Engels, had sent him money for decades. In contrast to Marx’s profligate, gambling ways was his uncle, Lion Philips, who despised his nephew. Philips’ grandsons founded the Philips Company, which is still one of the largest manufacturing companies in Europe. In the United States, it is known as the North American Philips Company, or Norelco.

48. Lenin wrote a secret message from his hiding place to the Bolshevik Central Committee on Oct. 8, 1917, a few days before the Communists captured Russia. It outlined the tactics for the capture of power. He ended his letter with these words: “The success of both the Russian and the world revolution depends on two or three days’ fighting.” “Advice of an Onlooker,” in Robert C. Tucker (ed.), The Lenin Anthology (New York: Norton, 1975), p. 414.

49. Konstantin Simis, USSR: The Corrupt Society: The Secret World of Soviet Capitalism (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982); Michael Voslensky, Nomenklatura: The Soviet Ruling Class (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1984).

50. The Age of Permanent Revolution: A Trotsky Anthology, ed. Isaac Deutscher (New York: Dell, 1964).

51. “Revolution was the proper occupation of the masses, Mao believed, for only through perpetual revolution could he realize his vision of an egalitarian collective society.” Dennis Bloodworth, The Messiah and the Mandarins: Mao Tse-tung and the Ironies of Power (New York: Atheneum, 1982), p. 187.

52. Marx, “Address of the Central Committee to the Communist League” (1850), in Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, [1969] 1977), I, p. 185. A similar call was made by Tolstoy: “. . . the only revolution is the one that never stops.” Cited by Billington, Fire in the Minds of Men, p. 417.

53. Billington, Fire in the Minds of Men, p. 597, note 309.

54. Jefferson to William S. Smith, Nov. 13, 1787, from Paris; in Thomas Jefferson: Writings (New York: Library Classics of America, 1984), p. 911.

lion (1786–87), the reaction against which became one of the main motivations of the Constitutional convention in 1787.⁵⁵ Yet here was Jefferson, writing: “God forbid we should ever be 20 years without such a rebellion.”

God’s people, on the contrary, should have faith in both time and continuity.⁵⁶ God governs both. The steady efforts of the godly man accomplish much. God’s Word does not return to Him void (Isa. 55: 11). Through the covenantal community, over time, each man’s efforts are multiplied for “thousands of generations.” The regenerate person should expect a long-term return from his efforts: the establishment and steady expansion of the kingdom of God, in time and on earth, and then beyond the grave.

Conclusion

The prohibition against graven images is fundamentally a prohibition against man’s worshipping the works of man. When man worships an image created by man, he does not worship the Creator, whose image man is. He is worshipping something less than man. All men should see this, but only regenerate men do. The prohibition of graven images should therefore be understood as the repudiation of humanism (Ex. 20:4). All forms of idolatry are ultimately variations of self-worship, for it is man, as a self-proclaimed sovereign being, who asserts the right to choose whom he will worship in place of God. Man, the sovereign, decides.

Men are called to exercise dominion over all creatures, but ethically rebellious men worship images of creatures (Rom. 1:22).⁵⁷ Sometimes these images are graven images; sometimes they are mirror images. In either case, men bow down to the creation. What appears to be an act of human autonomy—worshipping the creation of one’s own hands—is ultimately an act of subordination to the dark one who is supposed to be judged by men, not worshipped by men, and who will be judged by God’s people (I Cor. 6:3).

The fulfillment of the dominion covenant is based on simultaneous subordination and rulership.⁵⁸ Men are under God and over the creation. There is no escape from the governing principle of subordination and fulfillment. It is an inescapable concept. The questions are: To whom will men be ethically subordinate, and over what will they exercise dominion? Whose ethical yoke will men wear: Christ's or Satan's? Men cannot operate without an ethical yoke. Whose law-order will they uphold and conform themselves to?

55. Gary North, Conspiracy in Philadelphia: Origins of the United States Constitution (Harrisonburg, Virginia: Dominion Educational Ministries, Inc., 2004), Appendix B. (<http://GaryNorth.com/philadelphia.pdf>)

56. Chapter 12.

57. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

When men worship the creature, including man, they are worshipping Satan, who is temporally and temporarily the most powerful of creatures. They have adopted a religion of exclusively temporal power. Supernatural forces may or may not be invoked, but the goal is the same: the acquisition of temporal power. Anton Szandor LaVey, the founder of the Church of Satan in the mid-1960s, put it well: "Anyone who pretends to be interested in magic or the occult for reasons other than gaining personal power is the worst kind of hypocrite."⁵⁹ This is the heart and soul of all Baal worship. But Satan's rule is doomed. It can grow in influence culturally for short periods, but ultimately temporal judgment comes, as it came to the Egyptians. The capital investment of the idol-worshippers is eventually squandered, destroyed, or inherited by the faithful.

On the other hand, when men worship God, they place themselves within a covenantal framework that is guaranteed for "thousands of generations." They can take dominion over the external realm because they operate in terms of God's tool of dominion, His law. Time and continuity are not the enemies of God's people, for long-term growth eventually brings prosperity to the spiritual, covenantal heirs of the faithful. The continuity of faith over time brings the continuity of expansion over time, spiritually and culturally.

Men are to seek covenantal dominion, not autonomous power. Dominion comes through obedience to God. God possesses ultimate authority. Man cannot escape being subordinate to something ultimate, and this ultimate something is God. By refusing to make graven images, the ancient Hebrews ritually affirmed that their covenantal yoke was imposed by God, not by themselves.

To whom will a man or society be subordinate: God or Satan? Will a man become part of God's hierarchy or, as C. S. Lewis puts it in his Screwtape Letters, part of Satan's "lowerarchy"? Whose covenantal yoke will men wear, Christ's or Satan's? There is no escape from yokes;

58. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 8.

59. Anton Szandor LaVey, The Satanic Bible (New York: Avon, 1972), p. 51.

the question is: Whose? The issue of hierarchy and obedience is crucial in this commandment. God commands men to worship Him, and not to attempt to escape subordination to Him by seeking autonomy. Worshipping anything other than God is an affirmation of autonomy, for man autonomously determines for himself that he will worship something other than God. The second commandment prohibits man from setting up any visible manifestations of a representative of any supernatural authority other than God.

23

LAWFUL TITLE

Thou shall not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain (Ex. 20:7).

The theocentric principle here is God's control over the use of His name. This commandment asserts a property right. This commandment parallels the eighth commandment, "Thou shalt not steal." Both are aspects of point three of the biblical covenant model: boundaries.¹

A. God's Name and God's Covenant

The covenant is a systematic judicial arrangement. The name of God is at the center of the covenant. To deny that God is the God of the patriarchs, Moses, and the conquest of Canaan is to deny His name. When studying the name of God, it is safest to begin where God begins: with what God says about who He is.

1. Sovereignty

God has a name. He is the source of His name. Covenantally speaking, He is the owner of His name because He is absolutely sovereign. Theologians speak of the aseity of God. This means that God is self-existent. So rare is this concept today that standard dictionaries sometimes do not include the word.

When Moses asked God who he should say had sent him to the Israelites, God replied, "I AM THAT I AM: and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you. And God said moreover unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, The LORD God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you: this is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all generations" (Ex. 3:14–15). (The Hebrew can also be translated, "I will be who I will be.") We learn, first, that He is the self-defining God: "I am." Second, we learn that He is the God of Israel's history. So, He is eternal, yet He enters into history. That is, He is both transcendent and immanent. This is point one of the biblical covenant model.²

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3.

Any creature who claims to be the Creator has violated the third commandment. Any agent of such a usurper has identified himself as an interloper. He has profaned God's name. The original name violation was the serpent's.

Now the serpent was more subtil than any beast of the field which the LORD God had made. And he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? (Gen. 3:1).

And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die: For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil (Gen. 3:4–5).

He implied that God's Word is unreliable. He implied that God was envious of Adam and Eve, withholding what was legitimately theirs. The serpent asserted God's ulterior motive: to deny to Adam and Eve their ability right to become gods, knowing good and evil. In other words, the serpent insisted that God is not who He said He is, and what He said would happen to them for violating His command would not happen. This was false testimony about the Creator God who defines Himself and defines reality, rendering judgment on it, both in history and at the final day. "Hath God said?" is the age-old false rhetorical question of covenantal rebels.

Another example of name violation is Ben-hadad's, the Syrian king, whose forces had been defeated by the Northern Kingdom, whose king was the monstrous Ahab. Ben-hadad had even worse counsellors than Ahab had.

And the servants of the king of Syria said unto him, Their gods are gods of the hills; therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they. And do this thing, Take the kings away, every man out of his place, and put captains in their rooms: And number thee an army, like the army that thou hast lost, horse for horse, and chariot for chariot: and we will fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they. And he hearkened unto their voice, and did so (I Kings 20:23–25).

2. Sutton, ch. 1; North, ch. 1.

Ben-hadad invaded again, and again he was defeated. God defended His name and His authority as the universal God, not a god of the local hills. He was willing to let a low-life scoundrel like Ahab have the military victory in preference to Ben-hadad's having the victory in the name of another god. The infraction of the Syrian counsellors was profanity: false testimony about the nature and character of God. Their profanity was not a verbal curse. It had to do with a theological infraction: claiming that God is not who He said He is.

2. Hierarchy

Title sometimes conveys the sense of office. We identify a high official by the title he possesses in the organization. It is a means of ranking. "Let them praise the name of the LORD: for his name alone is excellent; his glory is above the earth and heaven" (Ps. 148:13). Christians affirm: "That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth" (Phil. 2:10). Hierarchy is point two of the biblical covenant model.

Possessing lawful title His own name, God identified Himself with the Israelites. God told Moses, "And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son, even my firstborn: And I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me: and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn" (Ex. 4:22–23). The Israelites owed God worship. This is what Pharaoh denied.

Another aspect of point two is representation. The Israelites would represent God to the nations. The Israelites had the right—in fact, the covenantal obligation—to identify their names with His. By the time God gave the Israelites His law, the Canaanites knew the connection between the Israelites and God (Josh. 2:9–11).

3. Boundaries

Point three involves boundaries or limits on what man can lawfully do. There is a sacred boundary around God and His name. When Moses came before the burning bush, God said: "Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground. Moreover he said, I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. And Moses hid his face; for he was afraid to look upon God” (Ex. 3:5–6). The ground itself was sacred because of its proximity to a theophany of God. God therefore told Moses to remove his shoes. Next, God explicitly identified Himself with the patriarchs. Then He identified Himself with the Israelites. “And the LORD said, I have surely seen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their taskmasters; for I know their sorrows” (v. 7).

God was about to take back His people from Pharaoh, who had stolen them and placed them in bondage. “And I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God: and ye shall know that I am the LORD your God, which bringeth you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians” (Ex. 6:7).

Pharaoh had claimed to be the owner of Israel-Jacob. In doing so, he violated God’s property. He also violated God’s title as the sovereign Lord over Israel. It was an assertion of sovereignty. This was the dividing issue of the exodus.³

God’s revealed law is an aspect of dominion. God’s revealed laws are to serve as a way to evangelize covenant-breakers. Keeping the law is an aspect of honoring the name of God among the nations.

But ye that did cleave unto the LORD your God are alive every one of you this day. Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:4–8).⁴

Moses gave the law to Israel in preparation for the invasion and conquest of Canaan. When the third generation refused to invade (Num. 14), God’s curse on them was four decades of their wandering in the wilderness. When it was time for the fourth generation to invade, Moses recapitulated the law: Deuteronomy. Biblical law is an aspect of dominion.

3. Part 1.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

The third commandment establishes that God possesses title to His name. Title here refers to property. We say that the owner of property possesses lawful title to the property. His name is on the certificate of ownership. This ownership is limited to whatever is described in the title. The property has boundaries. We also speak of entitlement. A person is owed something because he has a legal right to it. Such a person is entitled to something. For example, God is entitled to praise, based on His name. "Let them praise the name of the LORD: for his name alone is excellent; his glory is above the earth and heaven" (Ps. 148:13).

4. Oath

The males of Israel were marked by circumcision: point four, the oath sign.⁵ This was a form of branding. God's mark was on them. Their flesh testified to the nation they belonged to. This branding was crucial for the Abrahamic Covenant. It was a sign of God's ownership of them. Yet this was specifically a covenant mark: a negative sanction brought against the flesh.

When ownership is legally established, there must be witnesses to confirm possession of title. Strict monotheism has no doctrine of original witnesses. Christianity does. There are two witnesses to testify to the ownership rights of each individual owner. "And I subscribed the evidence, and sealed it, and took witnesses, and weighed him the money in the balances" (Jer. 32:10).

Usually, the commentators focus on prohibited oaths as the central issue in this commandment. This would place it under point four. But it appears under point three. This has greatly influenced my exposition of the commandment.

5. Continuity

We say that title can be passed to a new owner. That is, the property described in the certificate of ownership continues to exist. Its boundaries do not change because of the change of ownership. The title changes. In the case of God's name, there is no change of title. In this case, the title is the property. Both the title and the property are continuous. "For I am the LORD, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed" (Mal. 3:6).

5. On circumcision as an oath sign, see Meredith G. Kline, The Treaty of the Great King: The Covenant Structure of Deuteronomy (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1963).

God owned the land of Canaan. He had passed title in Abraham's day to the fourth generation. "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full (Gen. 15:16). Yet this extension of God's kingdom could be maintained only by Israel's obedience to God's revealed law: ethics, point three. "And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God" (Deut. 8:19–20).⁶ This is the covenantal basis of the command not to take God's name in vain.

B. To Take or Misuse

The key verb in the passage is the Hebrew word for "take." Unfortunately for expositors, it is one of the most frequently used words in the Old Testament, and it is used in about 45 different ways. This has led to considerable confusion on the part of commentators.

I believe that the King James Version's translators were correct in selecting "take" to translate the word. To take something is to remove it from its owner's immediate control. This transfer can be according to the terms of a contract between two individuals, one of whom is the owner, or it can be a violation of the owner's property right.

The second commandment is about hierarchy. Man is not to bow down to any god other than the God who delivered the Israelites out of bondage. In this sense, the second commandment re-affirms the principle of stewardship. God is over man. Man is accountable to God.

The third commandment extends the second commandment's principle of delegation. Because this commandment is presented as a prohibition, it implicitly affirms an authorization. The illegitimate use of God's name by man implies a legitimate use of God's name by man. Man is a steward and a priest. God delegates the use of His name to men. But, as with all other aspects of this delegated sovereignty, there are stipulations, meaning terms of use. The third commandment lays down the law of the covenant regarding God's name. It must not be misused. The translators selected "vain" as the modifier.

6. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 22.

What does the Hebrew word that is translated as “vain” really mean? Generally, it refers to something that is false. Later, in the section in Exodus on the case laws, we read: “Thou shalt not raise a false report: put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness” (Ex. 23:1). Even more to the point, in the section of Deuteronomy that re-states the Ten Commandments, the ninth commandment uses the Hebrew word for “vain”: “Neither shalt thou bear false witness against thy neighbour” (Deut. 5:20). Isaiah warned the people regarding the nation: “None calleth for justice, nor any pleadeth for truth: they trust in vanity, and speak lies; they conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity” (Isa. 59:4). Hosea said, “They have spoken words, swearing falsely in making a covenant: thus judgment springeth up as hemlock in the furrows of the field” (Hosea 10:4).

This commandment prohibits the deliberate misuse of God’s name in any formal declaration. The transgression seems to contain an element of deception, something that pays the violator to promote falsehood by using God’s name. The commentators have not agreed on the nature of this declaration. In fact, most of them have not even mentioned it. Another issue fascinates them: profanity.

C. Profanity

Because of a tradition of biblical exposition going back for many centuries, this law is usually interpreted as the misuse of God’s name in a verbal oath. It is usually equated with obscenity: a verbal violation of social standards. But profanity is different from obscenity. It has to do with an oath. It is an oath in a formal sense: a self-maledictory oath.

Most commentators say little about this law, and when they do, they focus on swearing, not in the sense of a false oath in a court, but in the sense of profanity. There is a sense in which profanity does apply to such language, but the commentators rarely explain the underlying meaning of profanity. As I discuss at length in the full version of my commentary on Leviticus, profanity is a boundary violation of a sacred object or sacred space. It is the misuse of something holy in the sense of holiness as something sacred.⁷ God’s name is surely sacred. So, the misuse of God’s name in cursing is a form of profanity. But it is not the only one. Theologically, it is not the main one.

A verbal curse is an aspect of the oath: point four of the biblical covenant model. The oath is associated with sanctions: specifically, the self-maledictory oath of a covenant. An ordained covenantal agent of a local church in an excommunication lawfully curses another person. He calls down God's negative sanctions on the excommunicant. This is the meaning of a covenantal curse. This is not profanity.

7. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: The Economics of Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 6.

Profanity's words may parallel a legitimate verbal oath, but it is performed unlawfully, outside of formal excommunication. The problem with this definition of profanity is that it, too, is associated with point four of the biblical covenant model: oath/sanctions. The commentators usually focus on this narrowly circumscribed aspect of profanity. The common verbal habit of using God's name to emphasize a point is a misuse of God's name. The question here is this: Why is the third commandment, which has to do with boundaries, almost universally associated by the commentators with the judicial issue that point four of the biblical covenant model is concerned with, oath?

Profanity in the context of the third commandment explicitly has to do with false testimony. The text does not mention a curse as an aspect of profanity, nor does it mention loose language. The commentators have ignored this for centuries. They write as if this commandment has as its focus intemperate language rather than false language.

Profaning the name of God has to do far more with disobedience in general than with verbal oaths. "Therefore shall ye keep my commandments, and do them: I am the LORD. Neither shall ye profane my holy name; but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel: I am the LORD which hallow you, That brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the LORD" (Lev. 22:31–33). Under the Mosaic Covenant, profanity also had to do with offering false sacrifices.

And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Molech, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD (Lev. 18:21).

They [priests] shall be holy unto their God, and not profane the name of their God: for the offerings of the LORD made by fire, and the bread of their God, they do offer: therefore they shall be holy (Lev. 21:6).

In the first edition of this book, I followed Rushdoony's exposition in developing my points regarding contracts. He, too, focuses on the oath. Unlike most commentators, he focuses mainly on the oath in its covenantal sense, not its profanity sense.⁸ He devotes only a few pages to profanity⁹ and blasphemy.¹⁰ What I did not see in 1985, when I wrote this book, was that point three of the five-point covenant model is concerned with God's name as a boundary rather than as an oath confirmation or violation. I made the connection between oath-bound covenants and promise-bound contracts. A covenant is not a contract, I argued, because of the self-maledictory aspect of the covenant. This is true enough, but it is not the focus of this commandment. It is an implication of the fourth point of the biblical covenant model, not the third.

I also went into detail about profanity. Because I had not yet written my exposition of Leviticus 5:14–19, which deals with the sacred, the profane, and the common, I did not recognize in 1985 the extent to which the third commandment refers to a boundary violation, i.e., the profaning of God's name. But this is profanity in the sense of a falsehood rather than in the sense of an invocation of God's name as a means of harnessing power, either directly from God directly or through an illegitimate empowering of daily language.

D. Covenants and Contracts

How does the third commandment relate to economics? By way of the covenant. The covenant is a judicial relationship between God and men, which is based on a self-maledictory oath before God. Men promise to obey God's stipulations as the sign of their covenantal faithfulness.

1. Higher Sovereignty

A covenant testifies to the existence of a higher sovereignty. Biblically sanctioned self-maledictory oaths are formally administered by a God-ordained subordinate sovereignty, which possesses more than a contractual sovereignty: church, state, or family. It possesses covenantal sovereignty. This is why the eighteenth-century Enlightenment's explanations of the origins of civil government by the so-called social contract theorists are categorically incorrect. The three governments ordained by God—ecclesiastical, civil, and family—were not the product of a hypothetical historical social contract among sovereign individuals. They were the covenantal creations of the Creator God. They are not organizations that were created by the equivalent of business contracts.

8. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 111–224.

9. Ibid., pp. 106–11.

10. Ibid., pp. 124–27.

There is always a tendency for Satan to imitate God. Satan establishes pseudo-covenants, just as he establishes pseudo-churches. Pseudo-covenants include such pagan associations as crime syndicates and secret societies. These are seen by their members as brotherhoods. They are oath-bound associations, with negative physical sanctions for oath-breakers.

A contract is analogous to a covenant, but without a self-maledictory oath before God. This is a fundamental distinction between contracts and covenants. A contract is made between individuals or organizations on the basis of mutual self-interest. So is a covenant. The terms of a contract are governed by the written and customary laws of the civil government. So is a covenant. A contract may or may not be enforceable in civil courts. So is a covenant. But a private contract does not legitimately involve the use of a self-maledictory oath, implicitly or explicitly, since no God-ordained sovereign institution has initially bound the parties by means of such an oath. Oaths may be required in the future by a sovereign government if a dispute concerning the terms of the covenant or the performance of the contracting parties drives the antagonists into civil court. Originally, however, the two contracting parties are not in possession of God's grant of monopoly authority. A business is not institutionally sovereign in the way that the church or civil government is.

This absence of an oath keeps the contract out of the jurisdiction of point four. A contract is more a matter of name than oath. It is a matter of stipulations more than sanctions. This is what I failed to recognize in the first edition of this book.¹¹

2. The Business Contract

Men can make better use of their scarce economic resources by co-operating in the activities of production. The idea behind a business contract is that such co-operation involves costs, especially unknown future costs. A contract reduces uncertainty by formalizing various responsibilities of the co-operating entrepreneurs. A contract therefore is a cost-reduction device. Men learn to trust one another to fulfill the terms of the contract. Self-government becomes easier, since everyone has a clearer idea of what is expected from him and from others who are parties to the contract. This greater certainty of performance frees up resources that would otherwise have to be expended in policing the venture.

11. Gary North, The Sinai Strategy: Economics and the Ten Commandments (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1986), ch. 3: "Oaths, Covenants, and Contracts." (<http://bit.ly/gnsinai>)

The contract is signed. Two or more people put their names on the contract. This identifies them as people who have made promises. A signer is responsible for the performance of his word. To enter into a contract with a plan to perform otherwise than stipulated in the contract is a form of fraud.

When God's name is on an individual because of his confession and the mark of the covenant, God's reputation is at stake. This is why people who acknowledge their position as covenant-keepers have an obligation not to misuse God's name. It is not merely that they avoid profane language. It is that they do not do in the name of God what will bring a bad reputation on God.

In the Old Testament, no case stands out more clearly of the misuse of God's name than David's adultery and his murder of the man who could have brought charges against him, Uriah the Hittite. Nathan the prophet told David this: "Howbeit, because by this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the LORD to blaspheme, the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die" (II Sam. 12:14). The enemies did not blaspheme by calling David an evil man. Blasphemy is a violation of God's name. In this case, it meant attributing to God the evil behavior of the king who represented Him.

David did this, not as a businessman, but as a king. This was the misuse of the covenantal office of king. His penalty was very great. But, analogously, a corrupt businessman who openly places himself under the authority of a church, and then commits deliberate fraud by means of the trust people have in him as a man of God, has taken the name of the Lord in vain.

A contract may have penalties for non-performance written into it. These are analogous to, but not identical to, the self-maledictory aspect of a covenant. The contract cannot legitimately call upon God to uphold directly the terms of the contract. Depending on circumstances, the ultimate earthly enforcing agency may be the civil government, or an agreed-upon arbitration organization, or even the church

(I Cor. 6:4),¹² but a truly sovereign agency cannot delegate its sovereignty in advance without thereby transferring its character as a sovereign agency to the recipient. For example, the transfer of the seal of government involves also the transfer of governmental sovereignty to the recipient. But this transforms the contract-making ability of the recipient organization into a covenant-making ability.

3. From "Brotherhood" to "Otherhood"

This is a phrase adopted by the sociologist-historian Benjamin Nelson.¹³ He used the so-called "Weber thesis"¹⁴ to provide an interpretation of the transition from feudalism to capitalism. The historical documentation and debates surrounding this thesis are not the main issue at this point.¹⁵ What is important is the concept of the non-covenantal voluntary association. The brotherhood is pseudo-covenantal, but in primitive societies, it sometimes function as a civil government. The otherhood is contractual.

As the West became increasingly Christian during the Middle Ages, men could deal with each other because they belonged to a universal church. Christian associations steadily replaced pagan brotherhoods and tribes. The medieval world was a world of mutualloyalties, often written down. Feudal contracts were military and civil covenants, however. What steadily replaced these covenants was the contract, especially the business contract.

The Protestant Reformation destroyed the ecclesiastical unity of the medieval world, but it did not destroy trade. On the contrary, trade increased.¹⁶ Men who did not share membership in a common church or a common city could still truck and barter with each other, even in the absence of a universal currency, although gold coins minted by the Italian city-states circulated increasingly, especially after 1500. Trade

12. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

13. Benjamin Nelson, The Idea of Usury: From Tribal Brotherhood to Universal Otherhood, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969).

14. The Protestant ethic theses of Max Weber: The Protestant Ethic of the Spirit of Capitalism (1905–6).

15. Gary North, "The 'Protestant Ethic' Hypothesis," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Summer 1976).

16. On the growth of commerce in this period, see the multi-volume study by the French historian, Fernand Braudel, Civilization and Capitalism, 15th–18th Century, 3 vols. (New York: Harper & Row, 1979), and his earlier work, The Mediterranean and the Mediterranean World in the Age of Philip II, 2 vols., 2nd ed. (New York: Harper & Row, [1966] 1973).

was fostered by men's adoption of contracts which partially substituted society for the destruction of a common church covenant.

Consider the benefits provided by the contract. Men whose ends are radically different, or even opposed, can trade in the market place in order to capture the benefits of the division of labor. Because the contract spells out mutual obligations, men can make better plans concerning the future. A contract, because it is not a covenantal document, can bring together people of varying religious beliefs and practices. The division of labor expands, and so does specialization. Per capita output increases. Had men been limited to exchanges within the covenanted "brotherhood," their markets would have remained small. The division of labor is limited by the extent of the market.¹⁷ Therefore, their per capita wealth would have remained small. Contracts allow men to exchange with members of an "otherhood."

E. Deceptive Promises

Consider a person who agrees to perform a specified service for a specified price. "You can count on me. My word is my bond. I agree to perform the service." But what if he escalates his rhetoric? What if he says this? "I am absolutely trustworthy. I swear on the Bible that I will fulfill the terms of our agreement. But I want payment in advance."

He has sworn on the Bible. So what? If he is a God-fearing man, he will avoid such covenant-related rituals as a misuse of God's name. It violates God's property right in His own name in the interest of invoking God's authority. But if the person is a deceiver, he may very well use such a phrase. The Bible becomes just another a tool in his tool kit of deceptive techniques. He enlists God's name, by implication, in this deception. He is able to extract money in advance because the buyer believes that the seller will be too afraid not to perform the promised service. Or perhaps the use of religious-sounding language calmed the buyer into believing that this is a man familiar with God's blessings. In any case, vaguely religious and ignorant people can become victims of those who take the name of God in vain.

Such language involves fraud. A person poses as God-fearing, yet his very language belies his claim. But a theologically ignorant person is deceived. This is a recapitulation of Satan's temptation of Eve in the garden. He used God's name and religious-sounding language in order to calm Eve's sense of insecurity. Because of the misleading use of language, Eve believed that her risks were lower than they really were. In business contracts, the misuse of religious language accomplishes the same thing: a reduction in the buyer's perceived risk. The deal seems less risky than it really is because of the seller's use of religious language, at least less risky in the mind of the superstitious or ignorant person who is unfamiliar with the third commandment.

17. Adam Smith, The Wealth of Nations (1776), ch. 3.

A covenant-keeper should be a lower-risk employee than a covenant-breaker. He believes in God. He believes that God's Word is reliable and sure. He performs his agreed-upon tasks on time and at the level of quality as is customary in his profession, and perhaps above that level. He is not supposed to be an inefficient or unreliable employee. He is supposed to be doing all things for the glory of God, performing his tasks of the dominion covenant.

A Christian's word should be worth more in the marketplace than other men's words. If this is not a characteristic feature of Christian service, then there is a glaring deficiency in the church's level of instruction and discipline. When a Christian says "yea," then the other person can rely on that "yea." The other person can make a budget for the future that includes predictable performance on the part of his Christian suppliers of goods and services. He can more accurately plan for the future. This makes his plans less expensive. There is therefore less waste in the economy. God's resources are allocated more efficiently. In short, there should be less risk when we rely upon the promises of Christians.

Christians since New Testament times have borne the name of Christ (Acts 11:26). They say, "I am of Christ." This is not a violation of the third commandment. But if they attempt to create a market in terms of the name of Christ, they must be ready to sacrifice wealth in order to honor that name. To use God's name explicitly in commercial ventures requires above-average performance, what some have called "going the extra mile." To swear to a contract, verbal or written, explicitly by God's name, is a violation of the third commandment.

Conclusion

The prohibition against taking the name of God in vain has implications for several areas: civil, familial, and ecclesiastical covenants; private contracts, both business and associational (voluntary societies); public language and therefore public law; and literature. The essence of the prohibition is the question of ultimate sovereignty. Who is sovereign: God, man, or rival gods?

A covenant is not a contract. It rests on higher authority, and it invokes a greater penalty for non-fulfillment of terms. Therefore, to swear by God or any aspect of the creation in a contractual situation is to use God's name in vain. To do this is to create the illusion of more reliable performance because of the presence, implicit or explicit, of a pseudo-self-maledictory oath. This involves deception, and should be penalized by civil statutes governing fraud.

These biblical distinctions between covenants and contracts necessarily involve a rejection of any social contract theory of civil (or any other) government. Government is of God, not of men. Only God, as Creator, has absolutely sovereign authority and power. Authority, as distinguished from power, is lawfully delegated sovereignty. Its model is what theologians refer to as the economical Trinity: the hierarchy of authority and responsibility of the Son to the Father and of the Holy Spirit to both the Father and the Son—the Filioque clause¹⁸—in their relationships to men. By upholding the sanctity of God's name, all governments thereby testify to this subordination. One aspect of this upholding is the enforcement of the civil law against the misuse of God's name. The practical problem is to identify those infractions that are a matter of civil law, such as blasphemy and some forms of cursing.

With respect to covenants, the violation of God's name in open verbal profanity is a matter of civil law, according to the Bible. The blasphemer in Leviticus had to be executed. "And he that blasphemeth the name of the LORD, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the LORD, shall be put to death" (Lev. 24:16). But with respect to economic crimes in which the reputation of God is at stake, civil laws governing fraud are sufficient.

This is additional evidence for the jusicial and conceptual distinction between covenants and contracts. A covenant is established through a self-maledictory oath before God, with God as the sanctioning agent. A contract is not judicially established by a covenantal oath. It is based on mutual promises that are sealed by the names of the parties to the agreement. A violation of a contract does not bring into play a self-maledictory oath before God. A contractual violation can be settled through a lawsuit initiated by the injured party or parties. It is not a capital crime.

18. The Filioque clause identifies the Holy Spirit, "who proceedeth from the Father and the Son." It was included in the Council of Toledo (589). R. J. Rushdoony, The Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1968] 1998), pp. 99–100. (<http://bit.ly/rjrfs0>)

A detailed study of the third commandment would break down the commandment into five parts, corresponding to the biblical covenant model. The most detailed section would be point four: oath and sanctions, i.e., curses in a covenantal sense primarily—the invocation of supernatural power—and secondarily as verbal profanity. Verbal profanity is the traditional focus of the commentators on the third commandment. But in the context of the Ten Commandments, the third commandment's primary implication has to do with the misuse of God's name in the sense of His name as a boundary. It is an illicit attempt to use God's name as a kind of brand, in order to further one's goals at the expense of others who are part of a non-covenantal agreement. This is a prohibited appropriation of a property right: God's reputation.

24

REST AND DOMINION

Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: But the seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: For in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the LORD blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it (Ex. 20:8–11).

The theocentric meaning of this law is the positive sanction of rest in God. It is grounded in the original six-one pattern of God's creation of the universe. Here, the basis of the sabbath is said to be God's week of creation. In Deuteronomy, the reason given is Israel's liberation from the tyranny of Egypt, where the Israelites were worked unmercifully (Deut. 5:15).

A. A Major Problem for Bible Commentators

We come now to one of the most difficult of all exegetical and application problems in the Bible: the question of the meaning and enforcement of the sabbath. In economic affairs, only the proper interpretation and application of the tithe principle are equally as difficult and controversial.¹ These economic issues involve the question of what man is required to forfeit in order to honor God: time and money.

Several questions must be considered. First, what is the meaning of "rest"? Second, what is the meaning of "sabbath"? Third, is the Lord's day (Firstday) the same as the sabbath (Seventhday)? Fourth, what was the focus of the sabbath in Old Testament times: rest or worship or both? Fifth, how extensive were the restrictions against working in Old Testament times? Sixth, are these same restrictions still required by God in New Testament times? Seventh, who or what agency is to enforce sabbath requirements in New Testament times? In short, where is the locus of sovereignty for sabbath enforcement? Eighth, if the Old Testament's prohibitions had been enforced throughout the history of the West, could the modern, industrialized West ever have come into existence?

1. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011).

In order to keep this introductory chapter sufficiently short and uncluttered with technical problems, I have decided to add an appendix on the economics of sabbath-keeping. I cover questions four through eight in Appendix D. In this chapter, I devote more space to the meaning of rest and its relationship with dominion, and secondarily, the problem of the sabbath in New Testament times. I argue here that the sabbath principle is related closely to communion with God, and that both are closely related to dominion.

B. Autonomy and Creation

God alone is absolutely sovereign. He is also the Creator. This link between absolute sovereignty and original creation is reflected in man's nature as the image of God. Man is subordinately sovereign and subordinately creative, or we might say, re-creative. He exercises dominion over the creation because he is subordinate to God. He can never be at the top of the pyramid of power. Only God can occupy that position. To attempt to occupy is an attempt to become divine.

When Adam rebelled, he believed that he had the opportunity of becoming as God, knowing (determining) good and evil (Gen. 3:5). His ethical rebellion was an assertion of human autonomy, a conscious decision to substitute his own authority and judgment for God's. Was Adam's word sovereign, or was God's?

That single forbidden tree, with its forbidden fruit, was a symbol of Adam's subordination, meaning his lack of original sovereignty. He did not have authority over that one sphere of the creation. Only God possessed absolute authority over everything, including authority over both Adam and that tree. By asserting his right to eat from that tree, Adam was announcing unilaterally the legitimacy of his quest for total power—the power to control anything and possibly even everything, as if he were God. If he could achieve such control, through autonomous knowledge and autonomous power, then God could not fully control man. Man is therefore truly autonomous and potentially divine, Adam declared by his act of defiance. The sign of his autonomy was his power: the power to eat rebelliously without suffering the predicted consequences. Adam adopted power religion in place of God's required dominion religion—a dominion process based on ethics.

Adam probably ate of the forbidden tree on that first sabbath. The serpent beguiled Eve (II Cor. 11:3), and Adam listened to his beguiled wife. She was deceived; he was not (I Tim. 2:14). Rather than trying and executing the serpent, thereby passing preliminary judgment against Satan, Adam attempted to render autonomous judgment. By asserting such autonomy, he thereby rendered judgment against God's Word and in favor of the serpent's announced estimation of the low or zero likelihood of God's punishment for Adam's disobedience.

Adam and Eve could have refused to accept Satan's evaluation of the effects of eating from the tree. They could have tried and executed the serpent, and then sat down to eat of the tree of life. This communion meal was postponed by their rebellion and their subsequent ejection from the garden. The celebration of Passover and later the Lord's Supper points to a future meal with God after He pronounces final judgment against sin and Satan's forces, but it also points back to the "meal that might have been."

1. Rest: God's and Man's

Adam's rebellion was linked to the question of the sabbath. God had created the world, including Adam, in six days, and He rested the seventh day. The sabbath day was man's first full day of life. This day began with rest, since God's original creation activity had ended the day before. Man was the capstone of God's creation, the final species to be created, but he was nevertheless under God's sovereignty as a creature. The whole creation, except for one tree, had been delivered into Adam's hand. The day after the sabbath, the "eighth day," meaning the eighth day after God first announced, "Let there be light," Adam was to have gone forth to subdue the earth as God's subordinate.

Rest means something different for God than it means for man. God rested on the seventh day, after His work was over, and after He had pronounced judgment on it, announcing its inherent goodness. For God, rest is a testimony of His absolute independence. He created the world out of nothing. It is dependent on Him; He is in no way dependent on it. For creatures, on the other hand, rest means subordination. Rest means that God is absolutely sovereign, and that man is absolutely dependent on God. Man begins with rest, for he is subordinate. God ended with rest, for He is absolutely sovereign.

Adam did not rest in his position of dependence under God. To have accepted the first day of the week as God's gift of rest, to have admitted that the creation was finished, would have meant the acceptance of man's perpetual position as a re-creative sovereign, not an originally creative sovereign. It would have meant that Adam had accepted his position as a creature. The restriction placed upon Adam by God meant that divinity is forever closed to man. Adam refused to accept this. He could not abide in his God-given rest, precisely because it was God-given. He wanted rest on his own terms. He wanted rest as an originally creative sovereign. He wanted his rest at the end of man's week, for God had inaugurated a day of rest at the end of His week.²

2. Resting the Land

On the seventh day, God rested. Adam should also have rested (his first full day). Thus, for one day in seven, the land is to rest. There was to have been no direct personal attention of man or God to the care of the land. The general personal sovereignty of God undergirds all reality, but there was to have been no visible management of the land on that day. It, too, was to have rested. It, too, was to have been free to develop apart from constant direct attention by another. In this sense, nature was analogous to Adam, for God had departed and left him physically alone.

This should have pointed to man that he is not ultimately sovereign over nature. The land continued to operate without man's active supervision. If man rebelled against God, the land would come under a curse, but if Adam remained ethically faithful and enjoyed his rest, the land would suffer no damage from its day of solitude. The forces of nature were never intended to be autonomous from man, but they were nevertheless not entirely dependent on man. This pointed to another source of nature's daily operations: a law-order created by God, which did not require man or God to be physically present for its continued operation.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6. I have come to the conclusion that Adam sinned on the sabbath, rather than on the day following the sabbath, in contrast to the arguments I presented in the first edition of Genesis (1982). I revised this in the second edition of The Dominion Covenant: Genesis (1987). The "eighth-day covering"—the eighth-day circumcision of all Hebrew males (Lev. 12:3) and the eighth-day separation from the animal mother of the firstborn male (Ex. 22:30)—makes sense if we regard the evening of the day as the beginning of the next day. "And the evening and the morning were the first day" (Gen. 1:5b). When God came at the end of the seventh day, He judged them and then covered them, in preparation for their departure from the garden. They would spend the evening and night of the eighth day outside the protection of the garden. Thus, their second full day (God's eighth day) was their first day of labor outside the garden, the curse placed on their assertion of autonomy.

After the Fall of man, nature was cursed (Gen. 3:17–18).³ The Mosaic law imposed an additional form of sabbath on Israel: Every seventh year, the land was not to be worked, for man was not to do agricultural work (Lev. 25:2–7).⁴ It was called a sabbath of the land. Just as in the case of that first day in the garden, the land was to be free from man's care. This pointed to the sovereignty of God over creation.

In that same year, the law was to be read to the assembled nation (Deut. 31:10–13).⁵ All debts of Hebrews were canceled (Deut. 15: 1–10).⁶ All Hebrew slaves (except criminal slaves who were repaying debts, and permanent slaves who had voluntarily covenanted with a family) were to be released (Deut. 15:12–18). Biblical law and freedom go together. They are tied ritually to a sabbath.

C. Defining “Sabbath”

What is the meaning of “sabbath”? Scholars debate this point. The Hebrew term means, at the very least, a cessation from activity. It is an intermission. God ceased from the activity of creation on the seventh day, a sign to man that the environment had been delivered to man in a completed form, though not historically developed. Man would henceforth work with this environment to subdue it, but this environment is a gift of God. The first week's seven-day pattern is to be an eternal pattern—a covenantal symbol of man's subordination to God. Man is to labor six days and rest one day. Man's week began with rest. Adam, however, was not content with this pattern, since it began with God's rest from His labors, which implied that man's labors must begin with an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of God. He wanted to become as God, which meant that he chose to imitate God's week: six

3. Ibid., ch. 12.

4. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 24.

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 75.

6. Ibid., chaps. 36, 37.

days of labor followed by a day of rest. Man would be a creator for six days, and then he would enjoy his rest at the end of the week, after his efforts had been brought to completion by his own hand.⁷ The seventh day of rest would be a man-made sabbath. Man would rest from his autonomous labors.

Adam did not count on God's response to this rebellion: the curse of the ground. He also did not count on the advent of his own mortality, even though God had warned him that he would surely die if he disobeyed. His time on earth was shortened, while his work load was increased. His work was made burdensome, mixed with his own sweat. The ground would supply him with life, but at the same time, his life would be, in effect, poured into the ground. To dust man now returns. Man's rest was taken away; his labor is now cursed. By this curse of the ground and this shortening of man's days, man is made to see that he will never be able to complete his work by himself; completion requires God's grace. Without a God-imposed day of rest—without God's re-creating grace, in other words—dominion-driven man would work himself to death: spiritually, culturally, and historically. Without God's grace, Adam was a dead man. He would never achieve rest, not even in the grave, for there is no spiritual rest for the wicked beyond the grave. There is only impotence and incomparable excruciating pain. The sign of God's grace is the sabbath day, a promise both of re-creation and the eternal rest to come.

7. Meredith Kline wrote: "For on the seventh day God rested from his work of creation, and this Sabbath of God is a royal resting and enthronement on the judgment seat. One indication that God's Sabbath-rest consequent to the finishing of his cosmic house was an enthronement is that the Scriptures present the converse of this idea; they portray God's enthronement in his micro-cosmic (temple-) house as a Sabbath-rest. Thus, when Isaiah makes his challenging comparison between the earthly temple built by Israel and the creation temple of heaven and earth built by God at the beginning, he introduces the Sabbath-rest imagery of the creation history as a parallel to God's throne house: 'The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool: Where is the house that ye build unto me? And where is the place of my rest (menuhafi)?' (Isa. 66:1; cf. II Chron. 6:18; Acts 7:49)." Kline, Images of the Spirit (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1980), p. 111. Man, in his assertion of divine sovereignty, acted as though he himself had created the universe, using it as a throne of his own. He would bring judgment, deciding between God's Word and Satan's word. He, like God, would rest at the end of his creative week. But while man was created to enjoy a seventh-day royal resting—God's seventh day—and to sit at God's table for a royal meal, man was not to do so apart from beginning with the enjoyment of a first-day, creature's, vice-gerent resting. He is to begin his week with rest.

D. Costs and Choice

What are some of the economic implications of a day of rest? Man's world is a world of costs and benefits, of choices made in terms of these costs and benefits. It costs men the forfeited income that a day of rest involves, but it also brings them benefits. Leisure is a consumer good, and it has a market value, namely, forfeited income. A day of rest may increase human efficiency, which then results in increased total weekly production (and therefore increased income). Furthermore, God's covenantal promises are available to those who are faithful to the terms of the covenant, so these promised blessings for obedience must also be added to the visible, immediate blessings of man's external rest. These promised blessings are not always acknowledged by those who are not aware of, or not confident concerning, God's covenant with His people. They tend to underestimate the benefits of honoring one day of rest in seven. In the Old Testament economy under the Mosaic law, the people of Israel were placed under severe restrictions against sabbath violations. The benefits of rest were in force, but God saw fit to raise the costs of disobedience, thereby encouraging men to remain faithful to the sabbath principle. All those who lived under the civic administration of God's covenant had to obey. The penalty was stiff: "Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the LORD; whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death. Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the sabbath day" (Ex. 35:2–3).⁸ This same penalty was later reinforced during the wilderness period, when a man who was caught gathering sticks on the sabbath was executed by stoning at the express command of God (Num. 15:32–41). No one could miss the message: God wants men to honor the sabbath principle.

The death penalty, when enforced, imposed a tremendous cost on sabbath violators. While all men in Israel were expected to understand the nature of the covenant, with external blessings assured for external conformity to the terms of the covenant, nevertheless, God relied on the "stick" as well as the "carrot." The promised benefits were less visible, and therefore more to be taken on faith, than the promised punishment. The punishment was visible and the sanctions were permanent. A man with weak faith still had an incentive to obey.

8. Chapter 63.

E. New Testament Alterations

What about New Testament times? Is the Old Testament sabbath still in force? The church has never given a straightforward answer to this question. The church has generally celebrated the first day of the week as the Lord's day (the Day of the Lord), and Christians have often linked certain Old Testament provisions concerning the sabbath with the New Testament's day of rest. From the church's beginning, God's "eighth day" (Adam's first working day of the week) was honored as the day of worship⁹ (Acts 20:7; I Cor. 16:2a), although it took perhaps a century for the first day of the week to be regarded by most Christians as the sole and exclusive day of worship.¹⁰ This day has also been honored as a day of rest. The church has generally timed the Lord's day from sunrise to sunrise, in contrast to the Old Testament's requirement of sunset to sunset.¹¹ This represents a break from the sabbath. There is another break, far more important judicially.

What about the penalty? Has the church maintained that the death

9. Wilfrid Stott, in Roger T. Beckwith and Wilfrid Stott, The Christian Sunday: A Biblical and Historical Study (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, [1978] 1980), ch. 12: "The Theology of the Christian Sunday: The Eighth Day"; cf. pp. 64–69.

10. Seventh Day Adventist scholar Samuele Bacchiocchi argued that it was only in the late second century that the Christians, especially in Rome, began to celebrate the first day of the week (Lord's day) exclusively as the day of rest, in order to distinguish themselves from the Jews: From Sabbath to Sunday: A Historical Investigation of the Rise of Sunday Observance in Early Christianity (Rome: Pontifical Gregorian University Press, 1977), p. 2. This study is an impressive work of historical scholarship, though far less distinguished as a work of reliable biblical exposition. I would guess that the reason why the Pontifical Gregorian University awarded Dr. Bacchiocchi his doctorate and published his dissertation is that he presented the Roman Church as the source of the change "from sabbath to Sunday," thereby attesting to the historical authority of the Roman Church. Church officials were understandably unconcerned about his arguments against all interpretations of New Testament passages that attest to the first day of the week ("Sunday") as the day of rest and worship. The authority of the Roman Church, rather than the evidence of Scripture, was the crucial criterion in the minds of the churchmen. This, in fact, had been the familiar argument used by Rome against the Reformers: If sola scriptura really is your guide, they asked, why don't you keep the Saturday sabbath? Luther's opponent, John Eck, used this argument with great skill. It was repeated in the Zurich Disputation, the Baden Disputation, and at both the pre-Reformation debates in Geneva in 1534 and 1535: Daniel A. Augsbürger, "Pierre Viret on the Sabbath Commandment," Andrews University Seminary Studies, 20 (Summer 1982), p. 92. Andrews University is a Seventh Day Adventist school. For a brief but penetrating critique of Bacchiocchi's thesis, see R. J. Bauckham, "Sabbath and Sunday in the Post-Apostolic Church," in D. A. Carson (ed.), From Sabbath to Lord's Day: A Biblical, Historical, and Theological Investigation (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan-Acadamie, 1982), pp. 270–73.

11. Appendix F: "Timing the Lord's Day."

penalty should still be enforced on all members of society? The answer is unquestionably no. The church has never required the civil government to execute sabbath violators, although occasionally some commentator does. Examples include the continental Protestant Reformer Heinrich Bullinger in the late sixteenth century and the American Puritan Thomas Shepherd in the mid-seventeenth.¹² The church has enforced its own laws, even excommunication, on sabbath violators. It has also recommended that the civil government fine violators, or punish them in other ways. But throughout the history of the church, the vast majority of expositors and church officials have hesitated to call for the death penalty. They have, by word and deed, admitted that there has been a fundamental transformation of the civil aspects of sabbath law.

Typical of this approach to sabbath law in the New Testament era is John Murray's statement. Mr. Murray was a leading twentieth-century Calvinist scholar and a Scot. He acknowledged the "element of truth" in the statement "by good men, that we do not now under this economy observe the Sabbath as strictly as was required of the people of Israel under the Old Testament." For one thing, they were not allowed to kindle a fire. For another, the death penalty was imposed. "Now there is no warrant for supposing that such regulatory provisions both prohibitive and punitive bind us under the New Testament. This is particularly apparent in the case of the capital punishment executed for Sabbath desecration in the matter of labour. If this is what is meant when it is said that observance is not as strict in its application to us as it was under the Mosaic law, then the contention should have to be granted."¹³ Murray offered no exegesis to explain how the requirement of sabbath observance has survived, but without the civil sanctions attached to Mosaic sabbath law.

F. N. Lee, a South African Calvinist Sabbatarian who, like Mr. Murray, left his country to teach in other English-speaking nations, wrote in his 1966 doctoral dissertation on the sabbath that the capital punishment provisions of the sabbath law have been abrogated. "It is important to realize that these aspects of the weekly sabbath, even though they were ordained by God, were only of temporary ceremonial and/or political significance, and were not intrinsically normative for the permanent weekly sabbath as such, although they were certainly temporarily normative for the Sinaitic weekly sabbath of Israel from Sinai up to the death and resurrection of Christ in which events all these aspects were fulfilled.”¹⁴ (Lee altered his position since the time of publication of his dissertation in the early 1970s. He told me that he believed that Old Testament law is still in force in this age, but he was not yet ready to recommend, categorically, that the death penalty should be imposed in all cases of sabbath violations, although continued willful desecration might be sufficient reason to execute the rebel, he said.)¹⁵

12. Bauckham, "Sabbath and Sunday in the Protestant Tradition," in Carson (ed.), From Sabbath to Lord's Day, pp. 319, 326 (note 98).

13. John Murray, "The Sabbath Institution" (1953), in Collected Writings of John Murray, 4 vols. (Carlisle, Pennsylvania: Banner of Truth, 1976), I, p. 211.

F. The Sabbatical Year

The church has never honored a sabbatical year, nor has any civil government. The land is not rested, debts are not canceled, and the whole law is not read publicly before the gathered nation. Why not?

The New Testament has internalized the locus of sovereignty for the enforcement of the sabbath. Men are to rest the land, but not as a nation, and not simultaneously. The civil government honors Paul’s dictum that some regard one day (or year) as equal to any other, and some regard one as special, to be set apart for rest. A farmer might decide to rest his entire farm for one year in seven. An alternative arrangement would be to rest one-seventh of his land each year. A Dutch-American immigrant informed me that, at the beginning of the twentieth century, it was common in Holland for land owners to lease their agricultural land with a provision that each year, one-seventh of the land would not be planted.

As for debt, the Mosaic laws of debt cancellation applied to two forms of debt: (1) morally obligatory charitable loans in the sabbatical (seventh) year (Deut. 15:1–6)¹⁶ and (2) commercial loans in the jubilee (49th) year (Lev. 25:47–55).¹⁷ The latter law was part of the jubilee laws. These laws were annulled by Christ (Luke 4:16–18).¹⁸ With respect to charitable loans, the state has no authority in the matter.

14. F. N. Lee, The Covenantal Sabbath (London: Lord’s Day Observance Society, 1972), p. 30.

15. Cf. F. N. Lee, Christocracy and the Divine Savior’s Law for All Mankind (Tallahassee, Florida: Jesus Lives Society, [1979]), p. 7.

16. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 36

17. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 32.

18. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 6.

Conclusion

There is a connection between sabbath rest and dominion. *Sabbath rest is a tool of and culmination of dominion.

Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them: but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it. For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world. For he spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all his works. And in this place again, If they shall enter into my rest (Heb. 4:1–5).

There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his. Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief (Heb. 4:9–11).

The sabbath points to the fulfillment of the dominion covenant. The eschatological rest that was long ago promised by God is symbolized in the sabbath. A weekly sabbath is God's "earnest"—His down payment—on the cosmic sabbath to come.

Ours is a Firstday sabbath, or Sunday sabbath, in New Testament times. We begin the week with rest, as Adam was supposed to but did not. Adam wanted to create by his own efforts the conditions of man's rest, and he never rested again.

The economic implications of the sabbath are extensive. This is why of necessity I have added an appendix on the topic. The key question, however, is this: In New Testament times, where is the locus of authority for the enforcement of sabbath law? If I am correct in my conclusion that Paul has lodged this sovereignty with the individual conscience rather than with church government or civil government, then there is no legitimate role in New Testament times for "blue laws," or other Sabbatarian legislation. This conclusion represents a major break with historic Protestantism and should be understood as such. It is a major theological step that needs to be discussed in detail by Christian commentators.

If commentators decide that mine is not a legitimate conclusion from Paul's writings, then the locus of authority issue must be dealt with in detail. Who is to impose sanctions? What sanctions? Under what conditions? How will those who must impose sanctions deal with the multiple economic problems raised by compulsory legislation? These problems are discussed in greater detail in Appendix G. This issue has been skirted for centuries. There has been no consistent answer—Sabbatarian, “continental sabbath” or otherwise—concerning the final locus of sovereignty for sabbath enforcement. Until it is faced and dealt with in a manner sufficiently clear for the writing and enforcement of Sabbatarian statutes, in church or state, the issue will remain muddled and an exegetical embarrassment for Christians. It will not be resolved successfully by the election of Christian politicians. They need guidelines for sabbath legislation, and these guidelines have yet to come forth from the 2,000-year-old church.

25

FAMILY CAPITAL

Honor thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee (Ex. 20:12).

The theocentric basis of this law is God as Father. Parents' represent God in a unique way. They are due special consideration from their children.

A. Population Growth

Paul wrote that this is the first commandment to which a promise is attached (Eph. 6:3). What does it mean, "that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee"? It is a promise given to the nation. It is a collective promise, not an individual promise as such. God does not promise that every single child who shows honor for his parents will enjoy long life, nor does He assure us that every single dishonoring child will die young. Esau went against his parents' wishes when he married Canaanite women (Gen. 26:34–35), yet he lived to be at least 120, for he and Jacob buried Isaac, who had died at age 180 (Gen. 35:29), and they had been born when Isaac was 60 years old (Gen. 25:26). Joseph was alive at this time, and the Bible speaks of Joseph as the son of Jacob's old age (Gen. 37:3). In the case of Esau, a dishonoring child lived into old age. Abel, who honored God, and who presumably honored his parents as God's representatives, was slain by his violent brother, who in turn survived to establish a pagan civilization (Gen. 4).

What God does promise is that a society in which the majority of men do honor their parents will be marked by the long life expectancy of its members. This longer life span will be statistically significant. The society will enjoy, for example, lower life insurance premiums in every age bracket compared with the premiums in cultures that are marked by rebellion against parents. In other words, the risk of death in any given year will be lower, statistically, for the average member of that age bracket. Some will die, of course, but not so many as those who die at the same age in a parent-dishonoring culture.

The promise is significant. It offers long life. The very first promise that is connected to a commandment is long life. This is indicative of men's desire to survive into old age. Men want to live. It is a universal desire, though it is marred or distorted by the effects of sin. All those who hate God love death (Prov. 8:36). Nevertheless, a standard expression of honor in the ancient Near East, especially in pagan civilizations, was reserved for the king: "O king, live forever" (Dan. 2:4; 5:10; 6:21). When God attached this particular blessing to this commandment, He could be assured of its initial attractiveness in the eyes of men. Life is a blessing for the faithful, and it is desired even by the unfaithful. It is not a burden to be borne patiently by steadfast "pilgrims" who are stoically "passing through life." Life is not just something to pass the time away. It is a positive blessing.

We know that the promise to Abraham was that he would have many children, meaning heirs throughout time (Gen. 17:4–6). We know that a large family is a blessing (Ps. 127:3–5). We know that one of the promised blessings for the godly is that miscarriages will be reduced in a nation which is seeking to conform itself to God's law (Ex. 23:26).¹ The demographic implication of the biblical perspective should be obvious: a large and growing population. When godliness simultaneously increases both the birth rate and the survival rate, the godly society will experience a population explosion. What God sets forth in His word is simple enough, although Christians and pagans in my era have refused to believe this: one sign of His pleasure with His people is a population explosion.² It is not a guarantee of His pleasure. Ungodly societies can temporarily sustain a population explosion, especially when they have become the recipients of the blessings of God's law (for example, Western medical technology or the availability of inexpensive wire mesh window screens)³ apart from the ethical foundations that sustain these blessings. Nevertheless, sustained population growth over many generations is one of God's external blessings, and these blessings cannot be sustained long term apart from conformity to at least the external, civil, and institutional requirements of God's law.

1. Chapter 59.

2. Chapter 1.

3. Peter F. Drucker, Management: Tasks, Responsibilities, Practices (New York: Harper & Row, 1972), p. 330.

Long life is a biological foretaste of eternal life. It is an earthly down payment by God. It points to eternal life. It is also a capital asset that enables men to labor longer in their assigned task of subduing their portion of the earth to God's glory. Long life is an integral part of the dominion covenant.

Because the fulfillment of the dominion covenant involves filling the earth, it is understandable why long life should be so important. It is one critical factor in the population expansion that is necessary to fulfill the terms of that covenant, the other being high birth rates. God has pointed clearly to the importance of the family—indeed, the central importance of the family—fulfilling the terms of the dominion covenant. The parents receive the blessing of children (high birth rate), and the children secure long life by honoring their parents. Or, to put it even more plainly, a man gains the blessing of long life, including the ability to produce a large family, by honoring his parents. The way in which the people of a civilization define and practice their family obligations will determine their ability to approach the earthly fulfillment of the dominion covenant. Without a close adherence to this, the fifth commandment, no society can hope to receive and keep the capital necessary to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant, especially the human capital involved in a population explosion.

B. Parental Authority

Parents possess limited, derivative, but completely legitimate sovereignty over their children during the formative years of the children's lives. When children reach the age of civil responsibility, one sign of their maturity is their willingness to establish families of their own (Gen. 2:24). Responsibility therefore steadily shifts as time passes. Eventually, aged parents transfer economic and other responsibilities to their children, who care for them when they are no longer able to care for themselves. The man in his peak production years may have two-way financial responsibilities: to his parents and to his children. Maximum responsibility hits at an age when, because of economic and biological patterns, a man attains his maximum productive capacity. This shift of responsibility is mandatory, given the mortality of mankind. The Bible provides guidelines for the proper transfer of family responsibility over time. These guidelines are necessarily economic.

The requirement that men honor their parents preserves the continuity of the covenantal family, and therefore it preserves the continuity of responsibility. The totally atomistic family unit is probably impossible; where it exists, the culture which has created it will collapse. Mutual obligations bind the family units together. Parents have an obligation to lay up wealth for their children: “. . . for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children” (II Cor. 12: 14b). Parents are not to squander their children’s inheritance. It should also be recognized that each of the children has a legitimate claim to part of the patrimony, unless disinherited because of his rebellion against parents or his personal immorality. The eldest son is entitled to a double portion of the estate (Deut. 21:15–17).⁴ Why does the eldest son inherit this double portion? A reasonable explanation is that he is the person with the primary responsibility for the care of his parents.⁵ The English system of primogeniture, in which the eldest son inherited all of the landed estate, was clearly unbiblical, and the breakdown of that system in the nineteenth century was a step forward for England. Such a system places too much responsibility on the eldest son, leaving the other children bereft of capital, but also psychologically free of economic obligations toward the parents. It cuts off most of the children from the mutual obligations of the covenantal family.

Economic obligations should flow in both directions: toward the children in their early years, toward the parents in their later years, and back toward the children at the death of the parents, when the family’s capital is inherited by the survivors. In short, children inherit, but parents must first be provided for.

C. The Continuity of Capital

The biblical law-order is a unity. Blessings and responsibilities are linked. Without the coherence of comprehensive biblical law, blessings can become curses. We can apply this insight to the fifth commandment. Assume that a son honors his parents during their lifetime. He receives the blessing of long life. Nevertheless, he neglects to teach his own children the requirements of this commandment. He also wastes his own estate in a present-oriented orgy of consumption. He miscalculates his own life expectancy. He runs out of money before he runs out of time. He has nothing to live on in his old age. His fortune is gone, and his own children know it. The break in the family between generations is now a serious threat to him. His children know that he has abandoned them by squandering the family estate, so they in turn abandon him to poverty in his old age, when he most needs assistance. The blessing of long life then becomes a curse to him. He slowly rots away in abject poverty.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 60.

5. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 180.

Capital, if familistic in nature, is less likely to be squandered. In a truly godly social order, the familiar rags-to-riches-to-rags progression of three generations, from grandfather to grandchildren, is not supposed to become typical, despite the fact that the legal possibility of “rags-to-riches-to-rags” is basic to the preservation of a free society. The example of a man who pulls himself up out of poverty, only to see his children squander his fortune, leaving his grandchildren destitute, is neither normative nor normal in a Christian social order. The godly do not lay up treasure for the ungodly; the reverse is true (Prov. 13:22).⁶ Wealth in the long run flows toward provident and productive citizens who exercise dominion in terms of biblical law. Therefore, these dual obligations, from fathers to sons and from sons to fathers, are an important aspect of the biblical tendency toward economic growth over many generations.

Fathers have economic incentives to expand the family’s capital base, and they also have an incentive to train up children who will not dissipate the family’s capital. The continuity of capital, under God’s law, is promoted by the laws of inheritance-honor. This preservation of capital is crucial for long-term economic development.

In order to preserve family capital over time, godly parents must train their children to follow the ethical standards of the Bible. The biblical basis for long-term expansion of family capital is ethical: character and competence. But this ethical foundation for long-term family capital growth is not acceptable to anti-biblical cultures. They want the fruits of Christian culture without the roots. Thus, we find that civil governments often take steps to preserve already existing family fortunes at the expense of those productive families that are ready and willing to make their economic contribution to the production process. A phenomenon that is supposed to be the product of ethics and education—the expansion of family capital over many generations—is temporarily produced by the use of state power. This substitution of power for ethics is characteristic of Satan's religions—not power as the product of biblical ethics (“right eventually produces might”), but power as a substitute for biblical ethics (“might makes right”).

6. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

The pagan imitation of a godly social order frequently involves the use of legislated barriers to entry. Those who have achieved economic success seek political power in order to restrict their competitors from displacing them.⁷ This phenomenon has been described as “pulling up the ladder after you’ve reached the top.” This discriminates against poor people, who are unable to organize politically and who lack capital, especially formal education. Primogeniture was one such restriction, which held together the great landed estates of England for many centuries. So was entail: the legal prohibition against selling a landed family estate.⁸ Other sorts of restrictions prevail in the modern “mixed” economy, all of them hostile to the great engine of progress under capitalism, price competition.⁹ These restrictions include: tariffs or import quotas,¹⁰ prohibitions against price competition (price floors) in the name of protecting market stability,¹¹ protecting the consumer from trusts,¹² minimum wage laws (another price floor),¹³ restrictions against advertising (still another kind of price floor),¹⁴ com-

7. Gabriel Kolko, The Triumph of Conservatism: A Reinterpretation of American History, 1900–1916 (New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1963). Kolko is a “New Left” historian. He argued that the American Progressive movement, which promoted government regulation of the trusts in the name of protecting the consumers, was supported by large businesses that were seeking legislated protection from new competitors. For further evidence on this point, see James Weinstein, The Corporate Ideal in the Liberal State, 1900–1918 (Boston: Beacon Press, 1968); Clarence Cramer, American Enterprise: Free and Not So Free (Boston: Little, Brown, 1972), chaps. 10–14.

8. This restriction could be overcome through debt. An heir would indebted the estate, with the land as collateral. When he defaulted on the debt, the creditor took possession of the land.

9. Gary North, “Price Competition and Expanding Alternatives,” The Freeman (August 1974). (<http://bit.ly/PriceCompetition>)

10. Gary North, “Buy American!” Ibid. (January 1981). (<http://bit.ly/BuyAmer>) The relationship between monopolies and tariffs was explained as long ago as 1907: Franklin Pierce, The Tariff and the Trusts (New York: Macmillan, 1907).

11. Mary Peterson, The Regulated Consumer (Ottawa, Illinois: Green Hill, 1971); Dan Smoot, The Business End of Government (Boston: Western Islands, 1973).

12. D. T. Armentano, Antitrust and Monopoly: Anatomy of a Policy Failure (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1982); Harold Fleming, Ten Thousand Commandments: A Story of the Antitrust Laws (New York: Prentice-Hall, 1951). See also Pierce, Tariffs and the Trusts, op. cit.

13. Walter Williams, The State Against Blacks (New York: McGraw-Hill New Press, 1982), ch. 3. This book also covers occupational licensing, regulation by the states, taxicab licensing, and trucking regulation.

14. Yale Brozen, Advertising and Society (New York: New York University Press, pulsory trade unionism,¹⁵ restrictions on agricultural production,¹⁶ state licensing of the professions,¹⁷ zoning laws,¹⁸ and the most blatant and universally accepted restriction, immigration quotas.¹⁹ All of these statist economic restrictions reduce people's freedom of movement—geographically, economically, and socially. They all involve the misuse of the otherwise legitimate monopoly of state power in order to restrict individual and social progress and personal responsibility.²⁰ The result of such legislation, if continued and enforced, is the universal 1974); George Stigler, "The Economics of Information," Journal of Political Economy, LXIX (June 1961); Yale Brozen, "Entry Barriers: Advertising and Product Differentiation," in Harvey J. Goldschmidt, et al. (eds.), Industrial Concentration: The New Learning (Boston: Little, Brown, 1974); David G. Tuerck (ed.), The Political Economy of Advertising (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute, 1978); Tuerck (ed.), Issues in Advertising: The Economics of Persuasion (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute, 1978).

15. Gary North, "A Christian View of Labor Unions," Biblical Economics Today, I (April/May 1978). (<http://bit.ly/gncvolu>); Philip D. Bradley (ed.), The Public Stake in Union Power (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1959); Sylvester Petro, Power Unlimited: The Corruption of Union Leadership (New York: Ronald Press, 1959).

16. William Peterson, The Great Farm Problem (Chicago: Regnery, 1959); Clarence B. Carson, The War on the Poor (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1969), ch. 4: "Farmers at Bay."

17. Reuben A. Kessel, "Price Discrimination in Medicine," Journal of Law and Economics, I (October 1958). (<http://bit.ly/KesselMed>); Milton Friedman, Capitalism and Freedom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962), ch. 9: "Occupational Licensure."

18. Bernard H. Siegan, Land Use Without Zoning (Lexington, Massachusetts: Lexington, 1972).

19. Gary North, "The Sanctuary Society," The Journal of Libertarian Studies, XIII (Summer 1998), pp. 205–19. (<http://bit.ly/SanctSoc>); Gary North, "Public Goods and Fear of Foreigners," The Freeman (March 1974). (<http://bit.ly/PublicGoods>). An example of special pleading favoring immigration restrictions is Roy L. Garis, Immigration Restriction: A Study of the Opposition to and Regulation of Immigration Into the United States (New York: Macmillan, 1928). Such restrictions, had they been passed into law and enforced prior to 1924, would have greatly reduced American economic growth. On the multiple cultural and economic contributions of several immigrant groups—Germans, Irish, Italians, Jews, Blacks, Puerto Ricans, Mexicans, and orientals—see Thomas Sowell, Ethnic America: A History (New York: Basic Books, 1981). He covered similar material in a condensed way in The Economics and Politics of Race: An International Perspective (New York: William Morrow, 1983), but added new material on the performance of immigrant groups in other societies. On the spectacular economic miracle of the city of Miami, Florida, as a result of heavy immigration from Cuba after 1960, see George Gilder, The Spirit of Enterprise (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984), ch. 5. The political-economic problem today is twofold: (1) new immigrants in a democracy are soon allowed to vote, and (2) they become eligible for tax-financed "welfare" programs. In the Old Testament, it took several generations for members of pagan cultures to achieve citizenship (Deut. 23:3–8), and there were very destruction of freedom, as the state regulators steadily squeeze away the monopoly profits received by the early members of the protected group. This is especially true of state-licensed professionals, such as physicians.²¹ Another result is the reduction of per capita productivity, and therefore per capita wealth.

D. Compound Growth

The importance of the continuity of capital can be seen in any example involving compound interest. Let me say from the beginning that we cannot expect to see this compound interest phenomenon continue uninterrupted in any family forever. We also cannot expect to see annual rates of growth over 1% for centuries at a time. As I pointed out in 1986, the four billion people on earth in 1980 would multiply to over 83 trillion in a thousand years, if the rate of population growth were 1% per annum. But, the fact remains, the longer that the compound growth phenomenon continues, the smaller the annual percentage increase needs to be in order to produce spectacular results.

Let us assume that we are dealing with a given monetary unit. We can call it a talent. A young married man begins with 100 talents. Say that he multiplies this capital base by 2% per annum. At the end of 50 years, the couple has 269 talents. Let us assume that the heirs of the family multiply at 1% per annum, on the average, throughout each subsequent family's lifetime. After 250 years, if the growth rates both of people and capital persist, the total family capital base is up to 14,126 talents. Divided by 24 family units, each family now has 589 talents. This is almost a six-fold increase per family unit, which is considerable. We now have 24 family units, with each family possessing almost six times the wealth that the original family started out with, even assuming that each heir has married someone who has brought few publicly financed charities, the most notable being the third-year tithe (Deut. 14:28–29). Thus, mass democracy has violated a fundamental biblical principle—that time is needed for ethical acculturation of pagan immigrants—and the result of this transgression has been xenophobia: the fear of foreigners, especially immigrant newcomers. Cf. Gary North, “Two-Tier Church Membership,” Christianity and Civilization, 4 (1985). (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>)

20. Walter Adams and Horace M. Gray, Monopoly in America: The Government as Promoter (New York: Macmillan, 1955); George Reisman, The Government Against the Economy (Ottawa, Illinois: Caroline House, 1979).

21. Gary North, “Walking Into a Trap,” The Freeman (May 1978). (<http://bit.ly/WalkTrap>)

no capital into the marriage.

What if the capital base should increase by 3%? At the end of 50 years, the original couple would have 438 talents—over a four-fold increase. This is quite impressive. But at the end of 250 years, the family would possess 161,922 talents, over 1,600 times as large. Even divided by 24 family units, the per family capital base would be 6,747 talents, or over 67 times larger than the original capital base of 100 talents.

Consider the implications of these figures. A future-oriented man—a man like Abraham—could look forward to his heirs' possessing vastly greater wealth than he ever could hope to attain personally. This is the kind of vision God offers His people, just as he offered to Abraham: heirs two or three generations later who will be numerous and rich. God offers a man the hope of substantially increased wealth during his own lifetime, in response to his covenantal faithfulness, hard work, and thrift. But God also offers the covenantal family truly vast increases in per family wealth, if the disciplined economic growth per family is maintained. The covenant community increases its control of capital, generation by generation, piling up ever-greater quantities of capital, until the growth becomes exponential, meaning astronomical, meaning impossible. Compound growth therefore points to the fulfillment of the dominion covenant, the subduing of the earth. It points to the end of cursed time.

It might be appropriate at this point to clarify what I mean when I speak about a covenant society amassing huge numbers of monetary units called talents. If we are speaking of a whole society, and not just a single family, then for all of them to amass 6,747 talents per family in 250 years, there would have to be mass inflation—the printing of billions of “talent notes.” I am speaking not of physical slips of paper called talents; I am speaking of goods and services of value. One hundred talents per family, multiplied by all the families in the society, would not be able to increase in an economy based on a precious metal standard; instead, prices would fall in response to increased production of 3% per annum. Eventually, if the whole society experiences 3% per annum economic growth, given a fixed money supply, prices would begin to approach zero.

But prices in a cursed world will never reach zero; there will always be economic scarcity (Gen. 3:17–19).²² In fact, scarcity is defined as a universe in which total demand is greater than supply at zero price. So, the assumption of permanent compound economic growth is incorrect. Either the growth process stops in the aggregate, or else time ends. That, of course, is precisely the point. Time will end.

22. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 12.

A man whose vision is geared to dominion, in time and on earth, has to look to the years beyond his lifetime. He cannot hope to build up his family's capital base in his own lifetime sufficient to achieve conquest. If he looks two or more centuries into the future, it becomes a conceivable task. Only a handful of men can expect to amass a fortune in a single lifetime. If a man's time perspective is limited to his own lifetime, then he must either give up the idea of family dominion, or else he must adopt the mentality of the gambler. He has to "go for the big pay-off." He must sacrifice everything for capital expansion, risking everything he has, plus vast quantities of borrowed money, on untried, high-risk, high-return ventures. He must abandon everything conventional, for an investor earns only conventional returns (prevailing interest rate) from conventional ventures. The man's world becomes an endless series of all-or-nothing decisions.²³ He "puts it all on the line" time after time.

E. Trusteeship: Which Family?

The continuity of capital is obviously threatened by the rise of the familistic state. It establishes itself as the trustee for all men, from womb to tomb. It therefore demands support from those who receive its protection. Like a father, or better yet, like a distant uncle who guides the fortunes of an orphaned nephew, the state must administer the funds, always taking a large portion of those funds as a necessary fee for services performed.

As men steadily begin to perceive the implications of the familistic state, they seek to hide their assets from its tax collectors. Men try to find ways to pass along wealth to their legitimate heirs, and the state, as the enraged illegitimate heir, relentlessly searches for ways of closing off escape hatches. The new "parent" must not be deprived of its support from every member of the family. And once the capital is collected, it is dissipated in a wave of corruption, mismanagement, bureaucratic salaries, and politically motivated compulsory charity programs. Men see the erosion of their capital, and they seek to hide it away. They recognize what the pseudo-family of the state will do to the inheritance of their children. Still, because of their own entrenched envy, they are unwilling to turn back. They and their parents and grandparents accepted the philosophical justifications of “soaking the rich” by means of the ballot box, but now that price inflation has pushed everyone into higher tax brackets, they are horrified by what they find. They have now been snared themselves, but they seem unable to turn back, for to turn back would involve an admission of the immorality and inefficiency of the “soak the rich” programs of modern democratic politics.

23. This is the world of modern entrepreneurship. Only a few people can make huge fortunes. Still, the rest of us benefit from their initiative and uncertainty-bearing: Gilder, Spirit of Enterprise.

1. Permanent Children

The modern messianic state would like to make permanent wards of its citizens. This is a primary justification for the state's existence today. It must administer the inheritance for the benefit of children. But the children are perpetual servants and a growing army, increasingly dependent upon the coercive wealth redistribution of politics. What we have here is a reversal of the New Testament teaching concerning sons and servants. “Now I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all. But is under tutors and governors until the time pointed of the father” (Gal. 4:1–2). The state's bureaucrats do not recognize what every human parent must eventually recognize, namely, that he is going to become weak, and that he must encourage independence on the part of his heirs if he is to secure safety for himself in his old age. The state, by making men permanent children, guarantees its own demise, for the children cannot forever support the “trustee state,” if the state has, in effect, institutionalized the voters.

The family is a trustee. By acknowledging the legitimacy of the laws of the family, men honor God, although the unregenerate do so unwittingly and in spite of their professed theology of autonomy before God. External blessings flow to those who honor God's laws. By establishing a tradition of honoring parents, sons increase the likelihood that in their old age their own children will protect them from the burdens of old age. The risks that life poses to the old are therefore minimized. The familistic welfare structure is reciprocal and personal. It is undergirded by revealed law and by family tradition. It need not rely heavily on the far weaker support of sentiment—an important aspect of the religion of humanism.²⁴ The growth of capital within the family increases each succeeding generation's ability to conquer nature to the glory of God, including the infirmities and vulnerabilities of old age.

The statist pseudo-family cannot permit this sort of challenge to its self-proclaimed sovereignty. The modern state has therefore laid claim to ownership of the children through the tax-supported public school system. Children are obviously a form of family capital. They are to be trained, which involves costs to the parents. But the parents have a legitimate claim on a portion of the future assets of the children. The relationship involves costs and benefits for both generations. Neither side needs to buy the love of the other, any more than men need to buy the love of God. Each generation gives; each receives. The relationship is both personal and economic. But the modern state intervenes. It provides the children's education. It lays claim to future payments (taxes) by the children when they have reached maturity. Of necessity, it must try to buy the love (votes) of those children when they reach maturity. The children often remain subservient to the state-parent, unwilling to launch independent lives of their own, given the costs of breaking the financial and emotional tie with the welfare office. Children, the covenant family's primary resource, are stolen by the modern state. The state promises old age support. The state promises health care for the aged. The state provides state-financed and state-licensed education for the young. The modern state attempts to replace the benefits of the family, and simultaneously must require the same sort of financial support from the adults during their productive years. The relationship is impersonal and economic. The relationship is, by law, coercive and bureaucratic.

2. Impersonalism and Capital Consumption

This disastrous attempt of the state to replace the functions of the family eventually destroys the productive mutual relationships between generations. It destroys the personal bond, making the young in general legally responsible for the old in general. The family name—so central to the life of a godly social order—is erased, and computerized numbers are substituted. The incentives for families to preserve their capital, whether for old age or for generations into the future, are reduced, for each generation's economic future is no longer legally bound to the success and prosperity of the children. "Eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow there will be government money." But the dissipation of family capital, when it becomes a culture-wide phenomenon, destroys economic productivity, which in turn destroys the tax base of the state. The state cannot write the promised checks, or if it does, the monetary unit steadily grows less valuable, as fiat money inflates the price level.

24. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation With American Society (Wheaton, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), pp. 43–47.

By abandoning the principle of family responsibility, the modern messianic state wastes a culture's capital, destroys inheritance, and makes more acceptable both euthanasia (which reduces the expense of caring for the unproductive elderly) and abortion (which reduces the expense of training and caring for the unproductive young). Lawless men, in their productive years, increasingly refuse to share their wealth with dying parents and squabbling children. They look only at present costs, neglecting future benefits, such as the care that the unborn might provide them in their old age. They have faith in the compassionate and productive state—the great social myth of the modern world. They want its benefits, but they never ask themselves the key question: Who will pay for their retirement years? Not the shrinking number of children, who are even more present-oriented, even more conditioned by the statist educational system, even more unwilling to share their wealth with the now-unproductive aged of the land. With the dissipation of capital, the productive voters will resist the demands of the elderly. The generations go to war against one another—the war of politics.

The pseudo-family state is an agent of social, political, and economic bankruptcy. It still has its intellectual defenders, even within the Christian community, although its defenders tend to be products of the state-supported, state-certified, and state-aggrandizing universities. This pseudo-family is suicidal. It destroys the foundations of productivity, and productivity is the source of all voluntary charity. It is a suicidal family which will pay off its debts with inflated fiat currency. Its compassion will be limited to paper and ink.

The impersonalism of the modern pseudo-family, along with its present-orientation—a vision no longer than the next election—will produce massive, universal failure of the welfare system. It has already done so. The rapid escalation of government-funded anti-poverty programs has created more poverty, except for the middle-class bureaucrats who operate the programs.²⁵ The great economic experiment that was launched in the twentieth century is failing in a wave of government deficits. All the college-level textbooks in economics, political science, and sociology will not be able to justify the system, once it erodes the productivity which every parasitic structure requires for its own survival. Like the Canaanitic cultures of Joshua's day, the end is in sight for the modern, messianic, welfare state economies. They have decapitalized their envy-driven, guilt-ridden citizens. Only to the extent that citizens hide their economic assets or vote to reverse the politics of envy will they escape the clutching hand of today's spend-thrift, senile pseudo-parent.

Conclusion

It is imperative for Christians to abandon the religion of humanism. It is imperative that they fulfill their responsibilities as members covenantal community. It is imperative that they see to it that their old people, as well as their young people, must not become in any way dependent upon the services of a declining welfare state. To become dependent on such an institution is to become a slave. Worse than this: it is to become dependent on a master whose economic resources are almost spent.²⁶ When men and women honor their fathers and mothers—financially, spiritually, and institutionally—they will have begun the painful but mandatory journey out of slavery. They will have begun to amass family capital for yet unborn generations.

The question is inescapable in any society: Who will inherit? The key issue in the fifth commandment is therefore the question of legitimacy. Every institution faces the question of continuity over time. The biblical pattern for the family is to become representative for all other institutions: the legitimate heir is the one who does the explicit will of the righteous parent. God the Father establishes these eternal standards of performance, including the laws of inheritance. We must begin by honoring the laws of family inheritance.²⁷

We must de-capitalize the state. This is a moral imperative. The alternative is for the state to de-capitalize us. If we are dependent on the state for its support, we are necessarily fostering the decapitalization of the family. The first and crucial step in decapitalizing the state is to cease calling for favors from the state. It is to create alternative, voluntary, biblical institutions that will replace the pseudo-compassion of the messianic state. If the covenant communities refuse to accept this challenge, then they will see their capital dissipated by the spendthrift managers of the humanistic state. The archetypal bastard will then inherit the inheritance of the righteous.

25. Charles Murray, Losing Ground: American Social Policy, 1950–1980 (New York: Basic Books, 1984).

26. Jacques Barzun, From Dawn to Decadence: 500 Years of Cultural Life, 1500 to the Present (New York: HarperCollins, 2000), Epilog; Martin van Creveld, The Rise and Decline of the State (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999), Conclusion.

27. For an example of a man who misunderstood inheritance, see Appendix H: "Andrew Carnegie: Social Darwinist."

This will not come to pass. "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13:22). God has made it clear: the bastard should not and will not inherit.

The issue is family capital. The reason why this commandment is found in the first five, which relates to the priesthood, is two-fold. First, the head of the family is a household priest. He was the one who circumcised the newborn males of the household. Second, the church, not the civil government, is the back-up agency of welfare, after the family has either failed to act or has exhausted its resources. To protect the integrity of the Mosaic priesthood, this law made it clear that the family, not civil government, is the primary agency of welfare. Any attempt by the civil government to replace the welfare function of the family is an indirect attack on the authority of ecclesiastical government. It is an attempt to call into question the welfare function of both the family and the church.

Power flows to the agency that takes responsibility for providing aid in a crisis. By placing the family in the front line of welfare, this commandment builds a wall of protection around the church. The civil government cannot lawfully undermine the church by arrogating to itself the welfare function of society. The messianic state seeks both power and legitimacy as the true heir. Thus, it must become a welfare state. This commandment, when obeyed, undermines the legitimacy of the welfare state.

GOD'S MONOPOLY OF EXECUTION

Thou shall not kill (Ex. 20:13).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's protection of His own image, man. God is sacred. This clearly is an aspect of point one of the biblical covenant model: God's sovereignty.¹ Thus, His image is sacred in the sense of being holy. As the Creator, God delegates to civil government the authority to execute murderers.

A. The Image of God

Man's life is protected because he is made in the image of God. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man" (Gen. 9:6). The explanatory clause—"for in the image of God made he man"—can be understood in two different ways. First, it explains the nature of the violation: man's life is uniquely important to God, since man is made in God's image. An assault on man is an assault on the image of God. Second, the clause explains why men, by means of the civil government, are required to execute bloody judgment on murderers. Man is made in the image of God; therefore, as God's image, mankind can bring judgment in the name of God, the supreme Judge who executes final judgment. Man is God's agent who exercises God's delegated authority. He is an agent of the King. He is to exercise dominion over the earth.² Man is a royal agent, and as such, he deserves protection. Christ's parable of the rebellious husbandmen who slew the owner's emissaries, including his son, rests on the principle of God's ultimate sovereignty and the authority which He delegates to all men (Matt. 21:33–40).³ Murder is rebellion, but a special kind of rebellion: lashing out at God's very image, the capstone of His creation. This is the most probable interpretation of the clause in terms of why murder is a capital crime. This explains why man-killing animals are to be executed (Gen. 9:5).⁴

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 1.

2. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 2nd ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1977] 1984), p. 444.

Vengeance belongs to God (Deut. 32:35; Rom. 12:19;⁵ Heb. 10:30). It is His monopoly. He avenges the blood of his servants (Deut. 32:35–43). Individual men do not have the right to act as executioners except by law: "Thou shall not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself (Lev. 19:18). The context of this oft-quoted final clause is clearly the administration of judgment. Because God established His monopoly, transgression brings judgment. This boundary must be respected. We see an example of this—indeed, the example—in the garden of Eden. By challenging God's single, exclusive, and temporary monopoly in the garden, namely, the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, Adam and Eve rebelled, for they were attempting to play God, to usurp His position over creation. It was an attempt to worship an image: the image of God in man.

The prohibition of graven images in the second commandment should therefore be understood as the repudiation of humanism (Ex. 20:4).⁶ All forms of idolatry are ultimately variations of self-worship, for it is man, as a self-proclaimed sovereign being, who asserts the right to choose whom he will worship in place of God. Man, the sovereign, decides.

Critics of capital punishment could argue that men are not to avenge, and that we must view capital punishment itself as a transgres-

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 43.

4. Because of the unnecessary exclusiveness of Bahnsen's interpretation of Genesis 9:6, which I discuss below, I need to stress the point that the right of the civil government to execute an animal should not be surprising, and the biblical defense of this right does not require any detailed exegesis, given the dominion covenant. It is not that the image of God in man uniquely empowers the civil government to execute animals; it is simply that the image of God in man is the reason why it is so heinous an act to kill a human being—so heinous that not even a "morally neutral" animal can escape the penalty. What the passage stresses is the responsibility of the civil government to execute an offending beast, not its authority to do so.

5. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 10.

6. Chapter 22.

sion of God's sole and exclusive monopoly of execution. This argument is dead wrong. The institution of civil government is entrusted with this responsibility. The individual may not execute another man, as if he were an autonomous agent of judgment, but the covenanted political community may do so. In fact, this power reduces the likelihood of blood vengeance by close relatives of the slain: blood feuds.

Why does the state have the right to slay transgressors? Because man is made in the image of God. God executes; so may covenant man. Bahnsen explained:

The reason offered is that man is the image of God: man can accordingly carry out God's judgments on a creaturely level. Thinking God's thoughts after Him, man judges and penalizes after the commandment of God; man is properly like God his Father and Judge when he too judges crimes as God does. . . . Man should do this as well on his level as a creature, not in personal vindictiveness (i.e., such judgment does not apply to interpersonal affairs: 1 Thess. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:9; Matt. 5:39; Rom. 12:17ff.), but as a matter of social justice (i.e., it is the magistrate's duty to punish criminals for the good of society: Rom. 13:1–4). The man created in God's image who has the responsibility of rule in human government (not citizens, not the church) is required to punish violators of God's law for the welfare of his country; he has the right to do this because he is the image of God and has God's law to direct him.⁷

Bahnsen then argued that it is not the death penalty as such that is the focus of Genesis 9:6, but rather the right of the civil government to inflict this penalty. "Instead of smoothly saying 'his blood is to be shed by man' the verse reads 'by man his blood is to be shed.' We stumble over the 'by man' due to its obtrusion and conspicuousness. Man's being made as God's image explains the infliction of the death penalty by man? In other words, "the proper question at Genesis 9:5f. is: what right has man to retaliate against the murderer? Genesis 9:6 gives the rationale: man is God's image."⁸ Bahnsen's interpretation is an attempt to force us to choose between two views: (1) the image of God in man as the cause of the death penalty—the reason why such a harsh penalty must be imposed—and (2) the image as the justification of the civil government's God-given authority to inflict the penalty.

I do not choose between the two interpretations; I choose them both. The image of God in man makes sacred the life of man, assuming that he has not transgressed the law by committing a capital crime, but this image also legitimizes the execution of the transgressor in the case of murder. Both the reason for the death penalty against murderers and the requirement of capital punishment by the civil government are explained by the presence of the image of God. Nevertheless, there is a stronger emphasis on the image of God in man as the reason why murder must be punished by the death penalty, as I have already argued. The execution of man-killing animals required by Genesis 9:5 points more clearly to the magnitude of the crime than it points to the right of the civil government to inflict the supreme earthly penalty. But ultimately it points to both.

7. Bahnsen, Theonomy, p. 443.

8. Ibid., p. 444.

B. Murder and Execution

The usage, though not the grammar, of the Hebrew translated here as “kill” (ratsach) indicates murder or manslaughter. It means “to dash to pieces,” but it is used in Numbers 35 and Deuteronomy 4:42 to indicate accidental manslaughter. The biblical definition of murder is the willful execution of one man by another, unless the execution is sanctioned by the civil government; it is referred to as the shedding of man’s blood (Gen. 4:10). It is an act of man in rebellion against God.

The prohibition against the shedding of man’s blood applies even to murderous animals (Gen. 9:5). Guilty animals are to be stoned to death, the Mosaic law’s most common means of public execution (Ex. 21:28). Because owners are covenantally responsible for the administration of their property, if the owner of the beast had been warned beforehand that the animal was dangerous, he also must be executed. He is permitted to buy his life by the payment of restitution, however (Ex. 21:29–30).⁹ Because all ownership is delegated, economic responsibility is necessarily personal.

There are no exceptions based on idiocy, temporary insanity, temporary anger, or anything else. Unless it can be proved that the death came as a result of an accident—no premeditation—the criminal is to be executed. The willful shedding of man’s blood must be punished by the civil government by execution.

C. Protecting the Division of Labor

Each person in history has been assigned a role by God for extending His kingdom in history. There is no escape from the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:26–28).¹⁰ Man's existence as a creature is defined by this covenant. Therefore, in God's assignment to mankind as a species, each person contributes something to this process of dominion.

9. Chapter 34.

When anyone dies, his or her contribution to this process of dominion ceases. Within the overall providence of God, death plays a role in the process of dominion. Evil is cut short (Ex. 20:6). Its compounding process ceases.¹¹ But it is for God to determine when each person's contribution to the process should cease. No other individual is to intervene to speed up this removal on his time schedule. This includes suicide.

The division of labor is a crucial concept in the history of economic thought. Adam Smith placed it at the heart of his Wealth of Nations (1776). Smith's description of the pin-makers is probably the most famous passage in the history of economic thought. The pin-makers who possessed specialized machinery could produce far more than a comparable number of individual pin-makers, each acting alone.

In modern times, Leonard E. Read's metaphor of the pencil rivals Smith's for its power of communication. In "I, Pencil," Read had a pencil narrate the story of its origin. No one knows how to make a pencil, the pencil says. No one knows all that goes into wood, paint, lacquer, graphite, rubber, and metal, yet all are necessary for the production of a single inexpensive pencil. Without the complex division of labor, a pencil would be impossible to produce. Read wrote:

Does anyone wish to challenge my earlier assertion that no single person on the face of this earth knows how to make me?

Actually, millions of human beings have had a hand in my creation, no one of whom even knows more than a very few of the others. Now, you may say that I go too far in relating the picker of a coffee berry in far off Brazil and food growers elsewhere to my creation; that this is an extreme position. I shall stand by my claim. There isn't a single person in all these millions, including the president of the pencil company, who contributes more than a tiny, infinitesimal bit of know-how. From the standpoint of know-how the only difference between the miner of graphite in Ceylon and the logger in Oregon is in the type of know-how. Neither the miner nor the logger can be dispensed with, any more than can the chemist at the factory or the worker in the oil field—paraffin being a by-product of petroleum.

10. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3–4.

11. Chapter 23.

Here is an astounding fact: Neither the worker in the oil field nor the chemist nor the digger of graphite or clay nor any who mans or makes the ships or trains or trucks nor the one who runs the machine that does the knurling on my bit of metal nor the president of the company performs his singular task because he wants me. Each one wants me less, perhaps, than does a child in the first grade. Indeed, there are some among this vast multitude who never saw a pencil nor would they know how to use one. Their motivation is other than me. Perhaps it is something like this: Each of these millions sees that he can thus exchange his tiny know-how for the goods and services he needs or wants. I may or may not be among these items.

Then Read came to his main point. The point is incorrect, but it lies at the heart of all modern economic theory: the absence of an economic central planner.

There is a fact still more astounding: the absence of a master mind, of anyone dictating or forcibly directing these countless actions which bring me into being. No trace of such a person can be found. Instead, we find the Invisible Hand at work. This is the mystery to which I earlier referred.¹²

But there is a Planner: a sovereign God who oversees all things and events. His is the “invisible hand”—Adam Smith’s famous phrase. But this hand operates through a system of secondary, subordinate causation, which includes responsible acting individuals. The free market, through its pricing system and its system of sanctions—profit and loss—allows the creation of pencils and far more amazing products than pencils.

“No man is an island,” the poet John Donne wrote in 1624. In his famous Meditation 17, he set forth the heart of the matter.

No man is an island, entire of itself.
Every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main.
If a clod be washed away by the sea,
Europe is the less, as well as if a promontory were,
as well as if a manor of thy friends or of thine own were.
Any man’s death diminishes me, because I am involved in man kind, and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls.

12. “I Pencil: My Family Tree as Told to Leonard E. Read,” The Freeman (Dec. 1958). (<http://bit.ly/ReadPencil>)

It tolls for thee.

In the grand division of labor, each person's productive contribution benefits the entire society to some degree, although usually unmeasurable and unperceived. Even though no one knows how to make a pencil, and no one knows the value of a clod of earth, each plays its part. When anyone dies, the wealth of society is reduced. Murder is therefore an assault on the wealth of nations and individuals. It is one man's attempt to play God, an attempt to gain an immediate personal benefit—the elimination of an enemy—at the cost of reduced productivity for society. The murderer treats another person as if the victim were a zero-price resource whose negative impact can be inexpensively removed. Yet no man knows what might have been, what contribution the deceased victim might have made. No man is omniscient. No man can calculate the cost that his victim's death will impose on others.

God protects His image from murderers. He can count the cost of murder. He assesses this cost as being far too high for anyone to be allowed to impose on his own authority. So, He authorizes the civil government to impose a final sanction on murderers.

D. Delegated Monopoly

God has shared His monopoly of execution with men. The final power of death is held by Jesus Christ. "I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death" (Rev. 1:18). It is He who triumphed over death (I Cor. 15). Christ is the go'el, the kinsman-redeemer who is also the family avenger of blood (Num. 35:19). Satan himself could not take Job's life without God's permission (Job 3:6). Only the original Creator of life has the original right to destroy life; only He can establish the standards by which man's life may be legitimately removed, including the standards of execution by the civil government.

The biblical view of the state unquestionably and irrefutably affirms the right and obligation of the state to execute men, for the Bible sets forth God's law. God has delegated this authority to the state. This assignment cannot lawfully be neglected—certainly not in the name of a "higher, more compassionate" interpretation of God's holy law. To deny the legitimate, derived, and ministerial authority of the state in this regard is to deny the original sovereignty of God. It is to call into question (1) God's Bible-revealed law, (2) man as the image of God, (3) the protection this image is entitled to, and (4) the responsibility of state officials under God. The denial of capital punishment is, in a very real sense, an attempt to deny God's right of final execution, i.e., the imposition of the penalty of the second death, eternal punishment in fire (Rev. 20:14). Such a position denies the right of God to offer murderers an earthly, institutional "down payment" or "earnest" that points to and affirms the reality of their future eternal punishment to come. It also denies God's requirement that the convicted murderer be transferred to His supreme court immediately. Furthermore, by denying this right of execution to the state, the opponents of capital punishment are implicitly turning over the power of execution (as distinguished from the right of execution) to murderers and rebels. It reduces their risk of permanent bodily judgment.

Anarchists, rebels, warlords, and criminals all resent the legitimate authority of civil government. Such a authority points to an even higher authority and the final judgment. Man's very image is repulsive to murderers, for it also points to the subordination of mankind's being to a sovereign God. Man's image points to man's subordinate responsibility, but also possessing lawful authority as a ruler over creation. It points to dominion. Satan and his followers loathe this image. They loathe it and love death (Prov. 8:36). But the image of God in man, when regenerate, is a death-defying image.

When the state executes a murderer, it delivers the criminal to God's court. Whenever God establishes execution as the appropriate civil sanction, He declares what legal theorists call a change of venue. The accused is delivered to a court with a more comprehensive jurisdiction.

E. The Question of Deterrence

Do the opponents of capital punishment really play into the hands of the criminal classes? Does a society without capital punishment really transfer power into the hands of the lawless? Consider these historical facts. A murderer in the state of California in 1975 was eligible for parole in seven years.¹³ In Massachusetts in the early 1970s, where no one had been executed since 1947,¹⁴ the median time served in prison for homicide was under 30 months.¹⁵ As Prof. James Q. Wilson noted: "And even in states that practice the death penalty, the chances of a murderer's being executed have been so small that a rational murderer might well decide to take the risk. There were eight thousand murders in 1960, but only fifty-six executions; thus, a murderer's chances of being executed were only about one in one hundred forty. After 1960 the number of executions dropped sharply, thus improving his chances."¹⁶

13. Frank G. Carrington, The Victims (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1975), p. 6.

14. James Q. Wilson, Thinking About Crime (New York: Basic Books, 1975), p. 192.

1. Deterring Crime

Scholars debate endlessly about whether or not the death penalty deters crime. Mafia members apparently have weighed the evidence and have discovered that swift, predictable execution does indeed influence people's behavior. Those who act as informers to the civil authorities wind up dead. This has made it difficult for civil authorities to find witnesses who will testify in court against criminal syndicates. The use of the threat of execution by secret societies of many varieties indicates just how effective the death penalty is in modifying people's behavior. Criminal societies, unlike modern scholars, may not have access to statistical data and complex explanations, but their members think they have adopted an effective approach to the "deviant behavior" problem. They may not have many footnotes, but they are still nearly immune to successful prosecution by the civil government. Capital punishment works well for them.

One of the important factors in designing punishments to fit the crime is the fact that most criminals are lower class. The best definition of class position was provided by Prof. Edward Banfield, in his book, The Unheavenly City (1970). He defined class in terms of future-orientation. An upper-class person is future-oriented. A lower-class person is present-oriented. This is another way of saying that a present-oriented person discounts the future more than a future-oriented person does. Banfield writes: "At the present-oriented end of the scale, the lower-class individual lives from moment to moment. If he has any awareness of a future, it is of something fixed, fated, beyond his control: things happen to him, he does not make them happen. Impulse governs his behavior, either because he cannot discipline himself to sacrifice a present for a future satisfaction or because he has no sense of the future. He is therefore radically improvident: whatever he cannot use immediately he considers valueless.”¹⁷ Future costs and future benefits register less forcefully on a lower-class person. This applies to punishment. He is not deterred by distant punishments when facing near-term benefits from committing a crime.

15. Ibid., p. 166.

16. Ibid., p. 192.

With the death penalty, the future cost is both radical and permanent. While the criminal discounts the future, the magnitude of this sanction is so great that he finds it difficult to discount it to zero, as he does with other forms of negative civil sanctions. This makes the death penalty the most important sanction. Once imposed, there is no escape.

At the same time, the death penalty must not be imposed on criminals who commit crimes of lesser threats to social order. If this sanction is used indiscriminately to fight crime in general, the policy will backfire. One goal of civil law is to reduce the number of serious crimes. If the death penalty were imposed for stealing a bicycle, then bicycle thieves would become extremely dangerous. They would be ready to kill anyone who threatened to expose their crime or take action against it. If the maximum penalty for stealing a bicycle were the same as for murder, the imposition of capital punishment for stealing a bicycle would increase the number of murders. But the goal of the civil law is to reduce the number of murders.

If a sanction is considered by a jury as excessive, the jury will vote not to convict. The criminals will understand that, if captured, they will not be convicted. This subsidizes criminal behavior. This is another reason why the punishment must fit the crime. This is why the Bible requires restitution for crimes against property. Juries will more often convict.

The fundamental principle of biblical civil justice is victim's rights.¹⁸ The victim has the right to prosecute. He also has the right to show mercy. But, in the case of murder, the victim did not survive. The civil government must therefore act on behalf of the deceased victim. It must assume that the victim would have prosecuted.

2. Humanism vs. God's Law

Humanism has steadily eroded the rule of God's law. The humanists have, again and again, substituted alternative punishments for those specifically required by the Bible. They have substituted long-term imprisonment for economic restitution to the victim by the criminal. They have substituted life imprisonment for the death penalty. They have substituted parole in three years for life imprisonment. The results have been disastrous.¹⁹ From 1963 to 1992, crime rates in the United States soared. They also soared in Europe, due to similar causes. They did not soar in Asia.²⁰ There, theories of humanistic criminologists did not influence the civil courts.

17. Edward Banfield, The Heavenly City Revisited (Boston: Little, Brown, 1973), p. 61.

18. Chapter 37. Cf. Gary North, Victim's Rights: The Biblical View of Civil Justice (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/gnvictim>)

People want social order. Without this order, too many scarce economic resources must be assigned to crime prevention and safety programs. Voters want a system of prevention that maintains personal freedom for the innocent, but does not bankrupt the enforcing civil government.

There is little doubt that the vast majority of crimes go unpunished. Very few criminals are apprehended; few of these are brought to trial; few of these are convicted; few of these serve complete sentences. But, eventually, most criminals are caught. When they are "off the market," they are not victimizing the innocent. How can society reduce the number of serious crimes, given the reality of penalty?

Murder is a major crime. Victims are permanently disenfranchised. Thus, societies throughout history have imposed the death penalty. Even when a criminal knows that he may not be caught and convicted, the presence of the death penalty serves as a deterrent. If he is caught—if "his number comes up"—then the punishment is permanent. Those who believe in a chance universe are willing to take chances. All criminals take chances if they believe that the odds are in their favor. But losing a bet against capital punishment is something else. Losers don't get to "play the game" again.

When societies raise the stakes to criminals by imposing capital punishment for capital crimes, they thereby reduce the likelihood of criminals' committing these crimes. Furthermore, those who do murder and who are convicted are not set free to kill again. While any single instance of criminal behavior may not be punished, eventually the professional criminal gets caught and convicted. If he is executed, all future crimes by this specialist in brutality are eliminated.

19. Jessica Mitford, Kind and Unusual Punishment: The Prison Business (New York: Knopf, 1973).

20. Francis Fukuyama, The Great Disruption: Human Nature and the Reconstitution of the Social Order (New York: Free Press, 1999), pp. 31–36.

Society itself must not become brutal. By adhering to biblical law, a society can specify which crimes are capital and which involve paying restitution. But for those crimes that are specified as capital, the biblical commonwealth can reduce their likelihood even in an imperfect penal system which does not operate in terms of perfect knowledge. It raises the stakes so high that risk-taking criminals prefer to commit other sorts of crimes. The imperfection of the legal system is offset by the risk of permanent loss to the murderer.

Conclusion

Man, as the designated agent of the King of kings, possesses lawful authority. He is made in the image of the King, so he is to be protected by civil government. One aspect of this protection is the death penalty. God has delegated the right to execute to the civil government. The civil government can also protect men from kidnapping, a capital crime (Ex. 21:16).²¹ The police power of the state is to serve as one of the foundations of social stability.

The state thereby permits men to apply time and capital to their callings. It offers them legal predictability, which is vital to the flourishing of personal freedom and economic development. Most important, the right of the civil government to take a man's life under specified conditions is apt to remind men of the ultimate Judge who gives the gift of life, but who also retains the right to remove life from those who rebel against Him. The civil government's monopoly of execution testifies to God's absolute hostility against sin, especially the sin of striking out against God's own image.

This is an extremely important point. Man's life is to be protected, not because each man possesses a hypothetical absolute and original right of ownership over his own person (the fundamental assertion of most libertarian and anarcho-capitalist theoreticians), but because God is absolutely sovereign and the absolute owner of all things, including men. He will not permit His image, man, to be mortally wounded without imposing a form of judgment which, in time and on earth, is analogous to that final judgment beyond the grave. Peter speaks of "the grace of life" (I Pet. 3:7); to destroy human life is to reject grace. Murderers have no place in God's inheritance (Gal. 5:21; Rev. 21:8).

21. Chapter 38.

THE YOKE OF CO-OPERATIVE SERVICE

Thou shall not commit adultery (Ex. 20:14).

The theocentric basis of this law is God as the faithful husband of His chosen people, which Israel was in the Old Testament. This clearly is an aspect of point two of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy.¹ The subordinate wife is not to commit adultery against her husband. The hierarchy of marriage must be maintained by both parties.

A. Bondage: An Inescapable Concept

As in all covenantal institutions, marriage necessarily involves the restraining factor of discipline. It is therefore a form of bondage. The Bible teaches that all creatures are bound by God through intermediaries established under His authority. All life is bondage. In Egypt, the people of God were in bondage. God delivered them: “I have broken the bands of your yoke” (Lev. 26:13b). Rebellion against God leads to the reimposition of earthly bondage under God’s enemies—an external manifestation of a spiritual condition (Deut. 28:48). The book of Judges is an account of this process.

When the Israelites fell away from God and began to worship the deities of the surrounding Canaanite nations, they were brought under the domination of these foreign nations. They “had their noses rubbed” in the cultures of God’s enemies, until they cried out for deliverance.² Therefore, men must bear a yoke of some kind: God’s or Satan’s. They are commanded to take up Christ’s yoke, for it is a light

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. James B. Jordan, Judges: God’s War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/jjjjudges>) and easy one (Matt. 11:29–30).³ Men are always in ethical bondage, for they always serve either God or Mammon, the god of this world (Matt. 6:24).⁴ Men must do the work of some master. There is no such thing as a free (autonomous) man. Man is always subordinate.

The yoke of marriage, as with all yokes, is a yoke of labor. This is one reason why Christians are cautioned to shun marriages with someone of another religious faith: labor performed by the partners will ultimately be at cross purposes (II Cor. 6:14).⁵ There is a fundamental ethical separation between believers and unbelievers, so the work of the believing partner is necessarily compromised. The Old Testament prohibition against ethical dualism within covenantal institutions can be seen in the case-law application regarding oxen (clean beasts) and donkeys (unclean): they were not to be yoked together (Deut. 22:10).⁶ If this rule is binding with respect to plowing, how much more binding in marriage!

A yoke provides balance and direction for both laborers. In the case of beasts of burden, the yoke multiplies the output of the two animals, and it also provides the master with a means of guiding their efforts. Neither animal can stray from its master or its partner. Each beast's labor should therefore complement the productivity of the other. The analogy of the yoke holds true for marriage. The seeds of the kingdom are sown in an orderly, productive, efficient manner. Marriage is a yoke of service.

The establishment of the marriage bond is an affirmation of interpersonal communion. Genesis 2:24 presents the concept of two persons' becoming one flesh, which is a distinctly theological description of the marriage bond. The act of physical union is a symbolic affirmation of this personal communion. Fornication (premarital sexual union) and adultery (post-betrothal sexual union with a partner other than one's mate) are both prohibited by God's law. The Bible sets forth explicit theological reasons for this prohibition, namely, God's ownership of mankind, and His specific design of the body for morality rather than immorality (I Cor. 6:13–20). Other implications are easy to discern. Fornication and adultery are symbolic affirmations of the le-

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 25.

4. Ibid., ch. 14.

5. A slogan might be: "Marriage should be for the purposes of the cross, not at cross purposes."

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 55.

gitimacy of communion outside of the marital covenant. Paul cites Genesis 2:24 in his presentation of the analogy between marriage and salvation: Christ's love for His church is like a man's love for his wife (Eph. 5:22–31).

B. Adultery

Adultery is the symbolic rejection of Christ's covenant with His church, an assertion of the impermanence of Christ's love and His commitment to His people. But even more fundamental is the foundation of all interpersonal relationships, the Trinity. The very Godhead is personal: total personalism in mutually self-exhaustive communion. The bond among the Persons of the Trinity is eternal. Adultery is therefore a symbolic denial of the permanence of the Trinity, as well as being a symbolic denial of the permanence of Christ's love for His church. Thus, when Adam and Eve sinned against God, they felt shame with particular intensity regarding their private parts, and they immediately hid them from each other, thereby introducing a symbolic barrier between themselves which reflected the new ethical barrier between themselves and God. It is not surprising that the Bible specifies the death penalty for adultery (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22: 22).⁷ It is also not surprising that pagan nations in antiquity, being polytheistic, were marked by ritual prostitution near or inside the temples: many gods, many covenants, many communions.

Marriage is a covenantal institution. It is established by the exchange of vows, both implicit and explicit. These vows are three-way vows initially: man and wife under God. Relationships with children and parents are also involved. Because of the covenantal nature of these vows, their terms are subject to enforcement by external human institutions: family, church, and civil government. No one who violates these vows can legitimately escape the judgment of these earthly institutions, nor can he escape ultimate retribution (Gal. 5:19–21).

Adultery is a straightforward denial of the legitimacy of God's covenantal yoke. It is a denial of permanent communion, a denial of binding contracts, and a denial of the permanence of God's grace in election. It is ultimately a denial of the Trinity—an assertion of the interpersonal unfaithfulness of the Persons of the Godhead. Adultery affirms the autonomy of man and the impermanence of man's institutions. It affirms that God's special love for His redeemed people is at bottom unpredictable and impermanent. In short, adultery affirms that Christ's love for His church is grounded in chance and lawlessness. Adultery is a symbolic assertion of a radically false theology. The ministry of the prophet Hosea was God's explicit and symbolic refutation of the theology of adultery.

7. This was the maximum penalty authorized, imposed by the civil government at the discretion of the victimized spouse. Chapter, ch. 37, section on "Dying, He Must Die."

Adultery disrupts the covenantal bonds of the family unit. It thwarts the proper administration of God's system of familistic capital. Based on mistrust, unfaithfulness, and a rejection of the restraints of verbal promises, adultery shatters the yoke of service. The result is predictable: the dissipation of familistic capital.

Vows are permanent. They cannot be revoked if they are made to God. "If a man vow a vow unto the LORD, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth" (Num. 30:2).⁸ A woman's vow is binding 24 hours after her father (if she is single) or her husband has heard of it and has not revoked it (Num. 30:3–8). The vow of a widow or a divorced woman stands (Num. 30:9). Because of the covenantal nature of the vow to God, God holds the vow-taker responsible for the fulfillment of the vow. God is sovereign, and He holds men responsible.

Permanent or household slavery in the Old Testament was a vow taken voluntarily. The slave who wished to remain in his master's house beyond the sixth year, or beyond the jubilee year, could do so. The master drove an awl through the slave's ear and into the door (Deut. 15:17). It was a bloody symbol of a permanent relationship, even as the blood on the doorpost at the Passover was a sign of a family's permanent relationship with God (Ex. 12:7). The slave was no longer a chattel slave but rather an adopted son of the house.

Marriage involves the same bloody sign. The "tokens of virginity" of the Old Testament were almost certainly the bloody cloth of the wedding night, which was presented to the wife's father in order to protect her from the charge of premarital sexual activity made by a lying husband (Deut. 22:13–17). The cloth of verse 17 bore the mark of her virginity; it must have been blood. The blood of the circumcised male was also a covenantal sign of permanence.⁹

8. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 16.

9. Gary North, "The Marriage Supper of the Lamb," Christianity and Civilization,

C. Time and Commitment

Yoked beasts clearly belong to someone. The same is true of yoked marriage partners. They serve some master. The marriage is a covenant bond, metaphysically always under God, but ethically under either Satan or God. The partners build for the future: a future under God or a future dominated by Satan. The yokeless beast is a wild beast; the family yoke domesticates each partner, rather like the yoke on beasts of burden.

The efforts of the marriage partners can be directed toward the future, for the family extends into the future through the children and the expansion of family capital. This future-oriented nature of the family adds incentives for thrift, careful planning, hard work, and economic growth. Each partner can rely on the assistance of the other, as well as the compassion of the other in times of crisis. This frees up the minds of both partners, for each knows that the other is there to help. What would otherwise be “uneven plowing” by one is smoothed out by the effect of the “yoke”: the family goes forward, day by day, despite the occasional failings of either of the partners.

While yoked together, neither partner can stray far without the other; neither can go his or her own way without regard for the other. One of the most eloquent affirmations of the social value of marriage comes from George Gilder.

The short-sighted outlook of poverty stems largely from the breakdown of family responsibilities among fathers. The lives of the poor, all too often, are governed by the rhythms of tension and release that characterize the sexual experience of young single men. . . . Civilized society is dependent upon the submission of the short-term sexuality of young men to the extended maternal horizons of women. This is what happens in monogamous marriage; the man disciplines his sexuality and extends it into the future through a woman's womb. The woman gives him access to his children, otherwise forever denied to him; and he gives her the product of his labor, otherwise dissipated on temporary pleasures. The woman gives him a unique link to the future and a vision of it; he gives her faithfulness and a commitment to a lifetime of hard work. If work effort is the first principle of overcoming poverty, marriage is the prime source of upwardly mobile work.¹⁰

Gilder also reported that, when marriages fail, the now-unen-

4 (1985). (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>)

10. George Gilder, Wealth and Poverty (New York: Basic Books, 1981), p. 70.

cumbered husband may revert to the lifestyle of singleness. "On the average, his income drops by one-third and he shows a far higher propensity for drink, drugs, and crime." Thus, he concludes, "The key to the intractable poverty of the hardcore American poor is the dominance of single and separated men in poor communities."¹¹ Crime and social pathology in general increase when family cohesion decreases. This has been documented in literally thousands of sociological studies.¹² The problem for the conventional social scientist is that there are no generally acceptable measures that the civil government can take that will increase the stability of the family. As political scientist James Wilson says, "I cannot imagine any collective action we could take consistent with our civil liberties that would restore a moral consensus. . . ."¹³

There is one step, however, that could be taken without violating civil liberties. In fact, it would increase civil liberties by reducing the size of the state. It is the step that the politicians believe that they dare not consider, yet which must eventually be considered: the abolition of all forms of state welfare payments, especially aid to dependent children. This is the recommendation of Charles Murray, whose 1984 book, Losing Ground, revealed the extent of the moral and social bankruptcy of the Federal welfare programs. Murray made clear what is taking place. The state is subsidizing immorality, and immorality is disrupting the society. In 1960, approximately 224,000 children in the United States were born to single mothers; in 1980, over 665,000 of these children were born.¹⁴ This increase was especially marked within the black community. From 1950 through 1963, just before President Johnson's heralded "War on Poverty" began, black illegitimate births rose slowly from 17% of all black births to 23%. In 1980, 48% of all live births among blacks were to single women.¹⁵ Furthermore, a growing proportion of all illegitimate children are being born to teenagers.¹⁶ This, it should be pointed out, took place during the period in which compulsory "sex education" courses were being established in the government school systems.

11. Ibid., p. 71.

12. Urie Bronfenbrenner, "Origins of Alienation," Scientific American, Vol. 231 (Aug. 1974).

13. James Q. Wilson, Thinking About Crime (New York: Basic Books, 1975), p. 206.

14. Charles Murray, Losing Ground: American Social Policy, 1950-1980 (New York: Basic Books, 1984), pp. 125-26.

15. Ibid., p. 126.

16. Ibid., p. 127.

In 1950, about 88% of white families consisted of husband-wife households, and about 78% of black families did. In a single year, 1968, the percentage for black families slipped from 72% to 69%, and in the next five years, it dropped another six percentage points. By the end of 1980, the proportion was down to 59%.¹⁷ As Murray says, “a change of this magnitude is a demographic wonder, without precedent in the American experience.”¹⁸ “As of 1980, 65 percent of all poor blacks who were living in families were living in families headed by a single female. The parallel statistic for whites was 34 percent.”¹⁹

What about low-income blacks—not just the hard-core poor? These are people with incomes equal to or up to 25% above the defined poverty level. “In 1959, low-income blacks lived in families very much like those of low-income whites and, for that matter, like those of middle- and upper-income persons of all races. Barely one in ten of the low-income blacks in families was living in a single-female family. By 1980, the 10 percent figure had become 44 percent.” This was higher than the percentage common among poor whites.²⁰

Murray’s conclusion is eloquent, and it gets right to the point: The presence of long-term poverty is not primarily a function of family income. It is a function of morality, time perspective, and faith regarding economic causes and effects.

Let us suppose that you, a parent, could know that tomorrow your own child would be made an orphan. You have a choice. You may put your child with an extremely poor family, so poor that your child will be badly clothed and will indeed sometimes be hungry. But you also know that the parents have worked hard all their lives, will make sure your child goes to school and studies, and will teach your child that independence is a primary value. Or you may put your child with a family with parents who have never worked, will be incapable of overseeing your child’s education—but who have plenty of food and good clothes, provided by others. If the choice about where one would put one’s own child is as clear to you as it is to me, on what grounds does one justify support of a system that, indirectly but without doubt, makes the other choice for other children? The answer that ‘What we really want is a world where that choice is not forced upon us’ is no answer. We have tried to have it that way. We failed. Everything we know about why we failed tells us that more of

17. Ibid., pp. 129–30.

18. Ibid., p. 130.

19. Ibid., p. 132.

20. Idem.

the same will not make the dilemma go away.²¹

The dilemma did not go away. In 2006, the rates of illegitimate births in the United States were as follows: whites (non-Hispanics), 26.6%; African-Americans, 70.2%; American Indians, 64.7%; Hispanics, 50%.²² The poverty rate among racial groups and the illegitimacy rate among these groups remained closely correlated.

The defenders of modern socialism—who are far fewer in 2011 than in 1986—and defenders of the welfare state have closed their eyes for three generations or more to the testimony of the Bible, and also to the testimony of the statisticians. They cling to a demonic view of stewardship, with the pseudo-family of the state at the head of the financial household. The result has been the destruction of families and also the productivity and social peace produced by the family.

D. Binding Contracts and Economic Growth

Covenants are binding. If men refuse to accept this truth, the possibilities for economic development in a society are thereby reduced. The historic link between the biblical idea of binding covenants and the West's idea of binding contracts is obvious enough. The covenant of marriage supports the institution that was the first to implement the division of labor. Without the predictability associated with contracts, the division of labor is hampered. Contracts involve the sharing of the fruits of combined labor.

Nowhere is this more apparent than in the family unit. The basis of the idea of a contract, like the idea of a covenant, is personal faithfulness. It begins with the Trinity, extends to the relationship between Christ and His church, undergirds the family, and makes long-term economic co-operation possible. A covenant is binding in the same way that an individualistic vow to God is binding. God is the sanctioning agent. A contract, which does not have the same degree of authority as a covenant or a vow to God, nevertheless is analogous. If the model of permanence for contracts, namely, the vow or the covenant, is denied true permanence, then how much less permanent are contracts!

When J. D. Unwin examined the relationship between monogamy and cultural development, he found that in every society that he studied, the absence of monogamy guaranteed the eventual stagnation or retrogression of that society.²³ The Bible provides us with the information concerning man that allows us to understand why such a relationship between monogamy and culture should exist. The promise of external blessings is held out to those societies that covenant themselves with God, and which enforce the terms of that covenant, biblical law. The archetypal symbol of the rejection of God's covenant is adultery. The old business rule is close to the truth: "A man who cheats on his wife will probably cheat on anybody." It may not hold true in every single instance of adultery by a businessman, but when a society accepts adultery as "business as usual," business will not long retain its character as an enterprise marked by binding contracts. Honest business will become increasingly unusual, and litigation costs will rise, as men seek to enforce contracts. This represents needless waste—needless from the point of view of the dominion covenant. Lawyers prosper and multiply—a sign of a collapsing culture.

21. Ibid., p. 233.

22. Centers for Disease Control, National Vital Statistics Reports, vol. 57, No. 7 (Jan. 2009), Table 18, p. 54.

Thomas Sowell pointed out the importance of rigid, formal, and enforceable rules regarding marriage. His insights are to the point.

Society itself may need to guarantee that certain relationships will remain rigid and inviolate in all but the most extraordinary circumstances. Much socially beneficial prospective action will not take place, or will not take place to the same extent, without rigid guarantees. The heavy investment of emotion, time, and resources necessary to raise a child would be less likely in a society where the child might at any moment, for any capricious reason, be taken away and never seen again. Such behavior is rejected not only for its retrospective injustice but also for its prospective effect on parental behavior. Not only will the state forbear from such behavior; it will use severe sanctions against private individuals who do such things (kidnappers). This rigid legal framework of parent-child relationships provides the protective setting within which the most flexible kinds of parent-child social relationships may develop.²⁴

Sowell immediately proceeds to the questions of property and ownership, "Similar considerations apply across a spectrum of other social arrangements, particularly those involving long and large individual investments of efforts for prospective personal and social benefits. Property rights introduce rigidities into the use of vast amounts of many resources—by excluding all but the legal owner(s) from a serious voice in most of the decisions made about the disposition of the resources—on the assumption that such losses as are occasioned by this rigidity are more than offset by the gains in prospective behavior by people acting under these guarantees.”²⁵ There is a socially indivisible link between rules protecting the integrity of the family and rules protecting private property. The civil government must enforce these rules.

23. J. D. Unwin, Sex and Culture (New York: Oxford University Press, 1934). Cf. Unwin, "Monogamy as a Condition of Social Energy," The Hibbert Journal, XXV (July 1927); reprinted in The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, IV (Winter 1977–78).

24. Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 31.

Christians who are familiar with the commandment against coveting should understand this important link between family and property. “Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour’s house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour’s wife, nor his manservant, nor his maidservant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbour’s” (Ex. 20:17).²⁶ Socialism is the legislated economics of covetousness. It is as much a threat against the family’s integrity as adultery is a threat to the integrity of the free market’s contractual order.

Sowell’s analysis is accurate. If the following paragraph were understood and implemented by societies that regard themselves as Christian—and even by societies that do not regard themselves as Christian—the world would prosper economically.

Someone who is going to work for many years to have his own home wants some fairly rigid assurance that the house will in fact belong to him—that he cannot be dispossessed by someone who is physically stronger, better armed, or more ruthless, or who is deemed more “worthy” by political authorities. Rigid assurances are needed that changing fashions, mores, and power relationships will not suddenly deprive him of his property, his children, or his life. Informal relationships which flourish in a society do so within the protection of formal laws on property, ownership, kidnapping, murder, and other basic matters on which people want rigidity rather than continuously negotiable or modifiable relationships.²⁷

E. Libertarian Contracts

A major theoretical dilemma for the modern libertarian or anarcho-capitalist is the problem of the lifetime contract. Each man is seen as the absolute owner of his own body. He therefore can legitim-

25. Idem.

26. Chapter 30.

27. Ibid., p. 32.

ately make contracts with other men that involve his own labor services. He is absolutely sovereign over his own person. This is the theoretical foundation of almost all libertarian thought. Murray Rothbard wrote: "The central core of the libertarian creed, then, is to establish the absolute right to private property of every man: first, in his own body, and second, in the previous unused natural resources which he first transforms by his labor. These two axioms, the right of self-ownership and the right to 'homestead,' establish the complete set of principles of the libertarian system."²⁸

But then there arises the problem of slavery: the lifetime contract. Man, the absolute sovereign agent, seems to be able to sign away his autonomy in such a contract. To say that man cannot legitimately sign such a contract—that such a contract is not morally or legally binding—is to say that there are limits placed on this autonomous sovereignty of man. This is the libertarian's version of the old question: "Is God powerful enough to make a rock so heavy that He cannot lift it?" The libertarians ask: "Is man sovereign enough to make a contract so binding that he cannot break it?" The theist is not particularly bothered by the real-life applications of the God-rock paradox, but the libertarian faces several paradoxical problems that are only too real. First, how long is a contract really binding, if lifetime contracts are illegitimate? Forty years? Four years? Four weeks? When does the absolute sovereignty of a man to make a binding contract come into conflict with the absolute sovereignty of a man not to be bound by any permanent transfer of his own will? Lifetime slavery is immoral and illegal in a libertarian framework. A libertarian must argue that such a contract should always be legally unenforceable. But what about a ten-year baseball contract? Second, and more to the point, what about marriage?

Rothbard was the most consistent and innovative of the libertarian economists. He stated his position with his usual clarity: "... a man cannot permanently transfer his will, even though he may transfer much of his services and his property. As mentioned above, a man may not agree to permanent bondage by contracting to work for another man for the rest of his life. He might change his mind at a later date, and then he cannot, in a free market, be compelled to continue working thereafter. Because a man's self-ownership over his will is inalienable, he cannot, on the unhampered market, be compelled to continue an arrangement whereby he submits his will to the orders of another, even though he might have agreed to this arrangement previously.”²⁹ In the footnote to this final sentence, he adds: “In other words, he cannot make enforceable contracts binding his future personal actions. . . . This applies also to marriage contracts. Since human self-ownership cannot be alienated, a man or a woman, on a free market, could not be compelled to continue in marriage if he or she no longer desired to do so. This is regardless of any previous agreement. Thus, a marriage contract, like an individual labor contract, is, on an unhampered market, terminable at the will of either one of the parties.”³⁰

28. Murray N. Rothbard, For a New Liberty: The Libertarian Manifesto, rev. ed. (New York: Collier, 1978), p. 39. (<http://bit.ly/RothLib>)

The libertarian concept of absolute self-ownership as the foundation of all economic exchanges sinks into oblivion when it hits the libertarian concept of the illegitimacy of lifetime contracts. The libertarian’s universe could not bind a man to perform any sort of future labor service. It certainly could not require him to love, cherish, and support a recently abandoned wife. She may have given him her youth in the days of her beauty—her “high-yield capital” stage, or her “high exchange value capital” stage—but once this capital is gone, she is without legal protection. Thus, the radical impermanence of libertarian contracts would threaten the social fabric of any society so short-sighted as to adopt this social philosophy as its foundation. The future-orientation provided by the safety of permanent vows in a godly society could not exist in a consistently libertarian society. There would be no institutional means of enforcing the terms of covenants, and this would eventually reduce men’s confidence in the enforceability of shorter-run contracts. A society that rejects the binding nature of covenants will not long retain the economic blessings of binding contracts.

Conclusion

A biblical social order protects a man’s life, wife, and property. The woman is protected, too. The time perspective of such a society will be longer term than a social order (disorder) characterized by adultery, divorce, illegitimate births, and single-parent households. Whenever a social order is marked by successful attacks against private property and also by the removal of stringent sanctions against adultery, the social order in question has departed from the standards set forth in the Bible. It has adopted an anti-biblical religion, whatever the official pronouncements of its leaders, including its church leaders. A survey of 950 religious teachers and counsellors, which was conducted by the University of Houston in 1984, revealed that of the 500 who responded to the questionnaire, 40% did not believe that premarital heterosexual sex is immoral, and that 87% believed that adultery should not be a crime. Sixteen per cent said that adultery is not morally wrong, 9% were uncertain, and 75% said it is morally wrong. But almost none of them thought the civil government has any role in punishing adulterers. Only 53% said that the legal system ought to limit marriage to people of opposite sexes.³¹ When the religious and political leaders of a society begin to wink at adultery, they will soon enough wink at coercive wealth redistribution, confiscatory taxation, and the compulsory retraining of children by statist planners. In fact, we can expect to see these leaders not only wink at such invasions of both the family and property, but also actively pursue these policies. There are too many adulterers in the highest seats of civil government and in the pulpit.

29. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State: A Treatise on Economic Principles, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), p. 164.

30. Idem., footnote 35. Emphasis in original.

In the sixth commandment, we are told that man's life is sacrosanct, for man is made in God's image. In the seventh, we are told that the marriage covenant is also sacrosanct, for it reflects the covenantal bond of Christ with His church, and even the covenantal bond within the Trinity.

The yoke of co-operative service necessarily involves a hierarchy: husbands possess lawful (though biblically specified) authority over their wives. But this possession is mutual, Paul tells us: the man's body belongs to the wife, and her body belongs to him (I Cor. 7:4). The husband's authority is therefore limited. Each of the partners belongs to God, whose ownership is absolute. But God's ultimate authority is reflected in the husband's authority. This hierarchy reflects the hierarchy of God the Father over God the Son. Thus, the seventh commandment parallels the second: there must be authority, hierarchy, and obedience.

31. Associated Press story, Tyler Morning Telegraph (Dec. 28, 1984).

THE RIGHTS OF PRIVATE PROPERTY

Thou shalt not steal (Ex. 20:15).

The theocentric focus of this law is God as the original owner of the creation. Its judicial precedent was God's command to Adam not to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, which belonged exclusively to God. That tree was a symbol of all five points of the covenant: the sovereignty of God, the hierarchical structure of creation, the ownership boundary around property, sanctions—positive (knowledge) and negative (death)—and man's inheritance in history. But the primary judicial issue was boundaries. Boundaries are an aspect of point three of the biblical covenant model.¹ Those people and institutions to whom God delegates temporary ownership of property are to be protected from theft. This law is a requirement of effective kingdom-building.

A. The Number-One Passage

It has long been recognized by Christian commentators that the biblical case for private property rests more heavily on this passage than on any other passage in the Bible. Individuals are prohibited by biblical law from forcibly appropriating the fruits of another man's labor or his inheritance. The civil government is required by the Bible to defend a social order based on the rights of private ownership. The various laws requiring restitution that are found in Exodus 22 explicitly limit the state in its imposition of sanctions against thieves, but there can be no doubt that the civil government is required to impose them.

Rights of ownership mean that God transfers to specific men and organizations the unique authority to use specific property for certain kinds of ends. The state is required to exclude others from the unauthorized use of such property. Property rights therefore refer to legal immunities from interference by others in the administration of property. The duties associated with dominion are more readily and effectively achieved by individuals and societies through adherence to the private property system, which is one reason why the Bible protects private ownership. Private property is basic to effective dominion.

1. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012).

The only conceivable biblical argument against this interpretation of the commandment against theft would be an assertion that the only valid form of ownership is ownership by the state, meaning control by bureaucracies established by civil law. But to argue along these lines demands evidence that the Bible, both Old Testament and New Testament, authorized the public (state) ownership of all goods. There is not a shred of evidence for such a view, and massive evidence against it. The tenth commandment prohibits coveting the property of a neighbor. The state is no one's neighbor. The state has no wife to covet. The social order that is presented as binding in the Mosaic law is a social order that acknowledges and defends the rights—the legal immunities—of private property. This prohibition against theft binds individuals and institutions, including the state. This commandment does not say, "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote."

B. God's Ownership, Man's Stewardship

The foundation of property rights is the ultimate ownership of all things by God, the Creator. God owns the whole world. "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. I know all the fowls of the mountains: and the wild beasts of the field are mine. If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof" (Ps. 50:10–12).² God's sovereignty is absolute. The biblical concept of property rests on this definition of God's authority over the creation. The Bible provides us with data concerning God's delegation of responsibility to men—as individuals and as members of collective associations—but all human sovereignty, including property rights, must be understood as limited, delegated, and covenantal.

Christ's parable of the talents presents the sovereignty of God in terms of the analogy of a loan from a lord to his servants. The servants have an obligation to increase the value of the capital entrusted to them. They are directly responsible to their lord, who is the real owner of the capital. Ownership is therefore stewardship. Men's rights of ownership are delegated, legally enforceable rights. God's "loan" must be repaid with capital gains, or at the very least, with interest (Matt. 25:27).³ This is one of Christ's "pocketbook parables," and while it was designed to illustrate God's absolute sovereignty over the affairs of men, it nevertheless conveys a secondary meaning, namely, the legitimate rights of private ownership. Each man is fully responsible before God for the lawful and profitable administration of God's capital, which includes both spiritual capital and economic capital (Luke 12:48).⁴

2. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

God distributed to Adam and Eve the resources of the world. They were made covenantally responsible for the care and expansion of this capital base when God established His dominion covenant with them. This same covenant was reestablished with Noah and his family (Gen. 9:1–7).⁵ In the originally sinless condition of Adam and Eve, this initial distribution of the earth's resources could be made by God in terms of an original harmony of anyone's interests.⁶ This harmony included hierarchy, for Eve was functionally subordinate to Adam (though not ethically inferior).⁷ The God-designed harmony of interests was never an egalitarian relationship. It is surely not egalitarian in the post-Fall world. The church, as the body of Christ, is similarly described in terms of an organic unity which is supposed to be harmonious, with each "organ" essential to the proper functioning of the whole, yet with each performing separate tasks (I Cor. 12).⁸ All are under Christ, the head of the church (Eph. 5:23).

God's universe is orderly. There is a God-ordained regularity in economic affairs. There is a predictable, lawful relationship between personal industriousness and wealth, between laziness and poverty. "How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? When wilt thou arise out of thy

3. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

4. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

5. Gary North, Sovereignty and dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 18.

6. Ibid., ch. 10.

7. Ibid., p. 123.

8. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 15.

sleep? Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth, and thy want as an armed man" (Prov. 6:9–11). "Wealth gotten by vanity shall be diminished: but he that gathereth by labour shall increase" (Prov. 13:11). This applies to individuals, families, corporations, and nations. Not every godly man or organization will inevitably prosper economically, in time and on earth, and not every evil man will lose his wealth during his lifetime (Luke 16:19–31),⁹ but in the aggregate, there will be a significant correlation between covenantal faithfulness and external prosperity. In the long run, the wealth of the wicked is laid up for the just (Prov. 13:22).¹⁰ This same principle applies to national, cultural, and racial groups (Deut. 8).¹¹ Covenantal law governs the sphere of economics. Wealth flows to those who work hard, deal honestly with their customers, and who honor God. To argue, as the Marxists and socialists do, that wealth flows in a free market social order towards those who are ruthless, dishonest, and blinded by greed, is to deny the Bible's explicit teachings concerning the nature of economic life. It is a denial of the covenantal lawfulness of the creation.

C. The Theology of the Welfare State

Critics of the capitalist system have inflicted great damage on those societies that have accepted such criticisms as valid. Men have concluded that the private property system is rigged against the poor and weak, forcing them into positions of permanent servitude. Historically, on the contrary, no social order has provided more opportunities for upward social mobility than capitalism. The remarkable advance of numerous immigrant groups, but especially of Eastern European Jews, in the United States from 1880 to 1950, is historically unprecedented.¹² Today, the policies of the welfare state are making lifetime dependents out of a substantial minority of citizens.¹³ The modern welfare system is deeply flawed, not simply because it uses coercion to take income from the employed, but because it destroys the will of the recipients to

9. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 40.

10. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

11. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), chaps. 21, 22.

12. Cf. Thomas Sowell, Race and Economics (New York: David McKay Co., 1975), Part II.

13. George Gilder, Wealth and Poverty (New York: Basic Books, 1981), chaps. 6–13.

escape from the welfare system.¹⁴ The politics of welfare is also leading to class conflict. George Gilder's words are eloquent in this regard: "A program to lift by transfers and preferences the incomes of less diligent groups is politically divisive—and very unlikely—because it incurs the bitter resistance of the real working class. In addition, such an effort breaks the psychological link between effort and reward, which is crucial to long-run upward mobility. Because effective work consists not in merely fulfilling the requirements of labor contracts, but in 'putting out' with alertness and emotional commitment, workers have to understand and feel deeply that what they are given depends on what they give—that they must supply work in order to demand goods. Parents and schools must inculcate this idea in their children both by instruction and example. Nothing is more deadly to achievement than the belief that effort will not be rewarded, that the world is a bleak and discriminatory place in which only the predatory and the specially preferred can get ahead. Such a view in the home discourages the work effort in school that shapes earnings capacity afterward. As with so many aspects of human performance, work effort begins in family experiences, and its sources can be best explored through an examination of family structure. Indeed, after work the second principle of upward mobility is the maintenance of monogamous marriage and family."¹⁵

The biblical perspective on marriage, like the biblical perspective on the foundations of economic growth, points to both ideas: the relationship between work and reward, and the central importance of the family bond. Men are told to have faith in the work-reward relationship, which encourages them to take risks and invest time and effort to improve their own personal work habits. The Bible tells us that such efforts will not go unrewarded, whether on earth or in heaven (I Cor. 3:10–15).¹⁶ The habits of discipline, thrift, long hours of effort, investment in work skills, and the instruction of children in this philosophy of life will not be wasted, will not be "capital down the drain." On the 14. Charles Murray, Losing Ground: American Social Policy, 1950–1980 (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984).

15. Gilder, Wealth and Poverty, pp. 68–69. Gilder's book is second only to Murray's Losing Ground as a study of the welfare state and its destruction of the avenues of private economic advancement. It is not equally good on questions of fiscal and monetary policy. For a critique of Gilder's recommended monetary policies, see Gary North, The Last Train Out (Ft. Worth, Texas: American Bureau of Economic Research, 1983), pp. 9–13.

16. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 3.

contrary, the Bible teaches that such an approach to life is the very essence of the dominion covenant.

When philosophies contrary to the philosophy of capital accumulation and private economic dominion are encountered, Christians should recognize them for what they are. When men are taught that the capitalist system is rigged against them, that they have a legal and moral right to welfare payments, and that those who live well as a result of their own labor, effort, and forecasting skills are immoral and owe the bulk of their wealth to the poor, we must recognize the source of these teachings: the pits of hell. This is Satan's counter-philosophy, which is expressly intended to thwart godly men in their efforts to subdue the earth to the glory of God. This radically anti-biblical philosophy is not simply a matter of intellectual error; it is a conscious philosophy of destruction, a systematically anti-biblical framework that is calculated to undercut successful Christians by means of false guilt and paralysis. That such teachings were popular among Christian intellectuals in the latter years of the twentieth century testifies to their abysmal ignorance—indeed, their judicial blindness (Matt. 13:14-15)—concerning both biblical ethics and economic theory. Christian intellectuals by the mid-twentieth century had adopted the politics of envy from the secular humanists, especially in college and seminary classrooms. We live in an age of guilt-manipulators, and some of them use Scripture to persuade unsuspecting Christians of the truth of their anti-biblical worldview.¹⁷ They are either wolves in sheep's clothing or else they are ill-informed to the point that they are dangerous to church and society.

D. Theft and Market Value

Christian commentators have, from earliest times, understood that the prohibition of theft, like the prohibition against covetousness, serves as a defense of private property. Theft is an autonomous, willful act of economic redistribution, and therefore it is a denial of the legitimacy and reliability of God's moral and economic law-order.

17. David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 3rd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1981] 1996). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>). Sider finally abandoned much of his state-expanding economics in the twentieth anniversary edition of Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (Nashville, Tennessee: Nelson, 1997). See North, Inheritance and Dominion, Appendix F. Sider's successor is Jim Wallis, whose book, God's Politics (New York: HarperSanFrancisco, 2005), extends much of Sider's original analysis. I maintain a continuing refutation of Wallis on my Website, www.garynorth.com: Questions for Jim Wallis. See also Joel McDurmon, God versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009), ch. 10.

The immediate economic effect of widespread theft in society is the creation of insecurity. This lowers the market value of goods, since people are less willing to bid high prices for items that are likely to be stolen. Uncertainty is increased, which requires that people invest a greater proportion of their assets in buying protection services or devices. Scarce economic resources are shifted from production and consumption to crime fighting. This clearly lowers per capita productivity and therefore per capita wealth, at least among law-abiding people.

The internal restraints on theft that are provided by godly preaching and upbringing help to reduce crime, thereby increasing per capita wealth within the society. Godly preaching and active church courts are therefore forms of capital investment for the society as a whole (what the economists call "social overhead capital"), for they release scarce economic resources that would otherwise have been spent on the protection of private and public property. Such preaching and church court actions also reduce the necessary size of the civil government, which is important in reducing the growth of unwarranted state power.

What is true about the reduction of theft is equally true concerning the strengthening of men's commitment to private property in general. When property rights are carefully defined and enforced, the value of property increases. Allen and Alchian, in their college-level economics textbook, comment on this aspect of property rights. "For market prices to guide allocation of goods, there must be an incentive for people to express and to respond to offers. If it is costly to reveal bids and offers and to negotiate and make exchanges, the gains from exchange might be offset. If each person speaks a different language [as at the tower of Babel—G.N.], if thievery is rampant, or if contracts are likely to be dishonored, then negotiation, transaction, and policing costs will be so high that fewer market exchanges will occur. If property rights in goods are weaker, ill defined, or vague, their reallocation is likely to be guided by lower offers and bids. Who would offer as much for a coat likely to be stolen?"¹⁸ The authors believe that the higher market value of goods that are protected by strong ownership rights spurs individuals to seek laws that will strengthen private-property rights. Furthermore, to the extent that private-property rights exist, the power of the civil government to control the uses of goods is thereby decreased. This, unfortunately, has led politicians and jurists to resist the spread of secured private-property rights.¹⁹

18. Armen A. Alchian and William R. Allen, University Economics: Elements of Inquiry, 3rd ed. (Belmont, California: Wadsworth, 1972), p. 141.

There is no question that a society that honors the terms of the commandment against theft will eventually enjoy greater per capita wealth. Such a society rewards honest people with greater possessions. This is as it should be. A widespread hostility to theft, especially from the point of view of self-government (self-restraint), allows men to make more accurate decisions concerning what they want to buy, and therefore what they ought to produce in order to offer something in exchange for the items they want. Again, quoting Allen and Alchian: "The more expensive is protection against theft, the more common is thievery. Suppose that thievery of coats were relatively easy. People would be willing to pay only a lower price for coats. The lower market price of coats will understate the value of coats, for it will not include the value to the thief. If the thief were induced to rent or purchase a used coat, the price of coats would more correctly represent their value to society. It follows that the cheaper the policing costs, the greater the efficiency with which values of various uses or resources are revealed. The more likely something is to be stolen, the less of it that will be produced."²⁰ When communities set up "neighborhood watches" to keep an eye on each other's homes, and to call the police when something suspicious is going on, the value of property in the community is increased, or at least the value of the property on the streets where the neighbors are helping each other. By lowering the benefits to criminals, property owners increase the value of their goods.

1. A Critic Responds

When I referred to the passage by Allen and Alchian in my essay in Wealth and Poverty (1984), a collection of four Christian views (the book's cover says)²¹ on economics, one of the three anti-market respondents was horrified. In the name of Jesus, he attacked the idea of the biblical sanction for privately owned property, as well as my defense of the economics of crime prevention, with the following line of argumentation: "The less thievery there is, the more the value of private property increases and the less able the poor are to buy it. In capitalism, the more 'moral' a people are, the more the poor are oppressed."²² He was not joking. He expected readers to take him seriously.

19. Idem.

20. Ibid., p. 239.

21. There were four views expressed by Christians.

The culprit is capitalism, in Mr. Gish's view. Capitalism hurts the poor, he insisted, even when the crime rate goes down. Less thievery means that the poor are exploited under capitalism. First, they are exploited by thieves under capitalism; then they are exploited by capitalists when the thieves go away. Heads, the poor lose; tails, they also lose. If there are any benefits accrued as a result of any reduction in theft, they accrue for the capitalist rich. If this argument is the best that Christian communalists and egalitarians can come up with in their ideological struggle against private ownership, then the intellectual battle is just about over.²³ I cannot resist citing Oscar Wilde's definition of a cynic: "a man who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing." This is Mr. Gish's problem.²⁴

What Mr. Gish did not understand is that thieves reduce the value of everyone's property, both rich and poor, but especially those poor people who live in neighborhoods where crime is rampant. Mr. Gish's comment revealed that he failed to understand the economic reasoning behind Allen and Alchian's conclusion. It is not that prices neces-

22. Art Gish, "A Decentralist Response," in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views on Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter Varsity Press, 1984), p. 75. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

23. This turned out to be the case within five years of the publication of this book in 1986. In 1991, the Soviet Union collapsed, and socialism fell into disrepute overnight among Western intellectuals. Socialism became passé.

24. I single out Mr. Gish, not because he was a serious economist or a serious social philosopher, but because his article and his criticisms of my position were printed in a book published by a company whose targeted market has always been college-educated American Protestant Christians. Within a year of its publication, senior officials with the company decided to suppress the book. The company pulled it off the market, despite good sales, and sold every copy to me for 25 cents each. I like to think that it was my theoretically uncompromising and rhetorically challenging remarks on the anti-market positions of the other three authors that were the cause of this suppression. In the mid-1980s, in Ronald Reagan's second term, when Protestant evangelicals had voted overwhelmingly for Reagan and against the idea of socialism and high marginal tax rates, anti-market opinions were still de rigueur in Protestant evangelical intellectual circles. After the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991, the climate of opinion grudgingly turned around among secular humanists. Therefore, by 1995, it began to turn around in Protestant evangelical intellectual circles. There is an echo effect in Protestant evangelical intellectual circles, who take their cues from humanist intellectual circles.

sarily go up when crime is reduced (although they may), thereby excluding the poor; it is that the value of goods goes up, including the value of property owned by the poor. The poor get richer, not poorer. Mr. Gish confused increases in the value of property with increases in the cost of living. He was so consumed by his hatred of capitalism that he could not understand a simple economic argument. If the poor now enjoy property that is worth more, why are they oppressed under capitalism? They aren't, unless they are eaten up by envy, and hate to see the rich also get richer—hate it with such intensity that they would give up their own increases in order to tear down the rich. Envy is one of the primary motivations of socialists, as sociologist Helmut Schoeck argued in the mid-1960s.²⁵

The decrease in the value of property as a result of theft would also occur in a socialist economy. Official prices might not change—who knows what a socialist planning board might do to prices in response to crime?—but the value of goods would drop. This has nothing to do with the structure of a particular economy; it has everything to do with the effects of crime on people's assessment of the costs of holding goods. If criminals are raising the costs of holding goods, then the value of the goods falls. In other words, costs of ownership rise, so the value of the items owned drops. If I own an item that was worth five ounces of gold before the crime wave hit, but it now costs me three ounces of gold a year to store it or otherwise protect it, the net value of that item to me will drop in my calculations. I may be willing to sell it today for two ounces of gold, or even less. Its price has dropped only because its value to me and to potential buyers dropped first. This is so incredibly simple that only a professional capitalism-hater could miss it. Mr. Gish missed it.

If the crime wave stops, and it costs me only an ounce of silver to store it or otherwise defend it—the same storage fee that I paid before the crime wave hit—its value to me will rise. Now I may not be willing to sell it for under five ounces of gold. Others may offer me five ounces because they, too, see its increased net value to them. The crime wave is over. The price rises because the costs of ownership have fallen. Prices “return to normal,” meaning closer to those that prevailed before the crime wave, because value has “returned to normal.”

The wealth of the poor increases when crimes against property are reduced. The market value of the items poor people own also goes up.

25. Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior, trans. Michael Glenny and Betty Ross (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, [1966] 1970), pp. 149ff, 197, 373.

It may even go up more, since the poor may have been the targets of the criminals even more than the rich were. Burglars tend to live and work in neighborhoods where poor people live, not where rich people live. In any case, the cost of defending their goods, proportional to the market value of those goods, was probably far higher for the poor during the crime wave than the protection costs for the rich were, proportional to the value of their goods. The poor probably will experience a more rapid percentage increase in net worth when theft goes down. The poor suffered more when the crime wave hit, so they gain more when it is reduced. This is so incredibly simple that only a professional capitalism-hater could miss it. Mr. Gish missed it.

The increased value of private property in a society that prosecutes theft would also take place in response to preaching against theft, if hearers take seriously the sermons. Mr. Gish continually moralized against theft (theft by ruling elites) in the passage immediately preceding his outraged protest against capitalism. He blamed capitalism for raising the cost of living to poor people whenever theft is reduced. Implicitly, he was arguing that under socialism (or local communal ownership) reducing theft will not lead to higher prices.

2. Value and Price

Let us consider the effects of a wave of theft on market prices. If we understand what is going on in this scenario, we probably have a firm grasp of economic theory. It can serve as a good example. Under capitalism, any additional self-government and self-restraint against theft will tend initially to raise the market price of goods above that which prevailed prior to the wave of thefts. So will any cost-effective increases in the civil government's war against thieves. Let us look at the sequence of events.

First, the wave of thefts begins. Assume that it is national in scope and horrendous. People are afraid to leave their homes. They reduce the number of shopping trips. They put more money in the bank, since banks are perceived to be safer against bank robbers than homes are against burglars. In other words, they decide to buy fewer stealable goods. Demand for consumer goods therefore drops.

On the other hand, the supply of available goods initially rises. Stolen goods that would not have been offered for sale by their owners at the older, higher prices, begin to enter the resale markets. These goods carry price discounts. Honest producers of goods must compete by lowering their prices. Production of new goods drops. New goods producers begin to go into bankruptcy and start selling goods at huge discounts. Then, after they sell off inventories, some of them stop producing.

In short, prices drop because the value of goods has dropped. Why has the value of goods dropped? Because the costs of ownership have risen. If you raise costs, you should expect reduced demand. This is what we do see. The demand for consumer goods drops. This is especially true for poor people, who are more vulnerable to theft and violence in their communities. The value of their presently owned goods is drastically reduced because the costs of ownership for them have been drastically increased.

As I have already pointed out, Mr. Gish was not used to this sort of economic reasoning, so he resorted to his knee-jerk policy of criticizing capitalism for the evils of both increased crime and decreased crime. In good times and bad times, capitalism is evil. He was not alone in his hostility to capitalism in 1984. It was the characteristic feature of literati everywhere until the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991.²⁶

Second, falling prices are not the end of the story. Prices subsequently start to rise, because buyers can no longer locate sellers of new goods. Too many sellers have gone out of business. The burglars hit them, too. The costs of production rose for them, since producers are owners, too. Furthermore, thieves find that owners have bought burglar alarms, locks, and guard dogs. The costs of being a burglar also rise, so there is less burglary. The availability of stolen goods drops. The initial discounts disappear. Stolen goods start to command higher prices. Fewer goods are bought and sold, but for those necessities that do remain on the shelves, their prices will be higher. Buyers' money will be chasing a smaller number of goods, so prices of these goods tend to rise. If the crime wave persists, prices of goods actually brought to market rise higher than they had been before, since fewer goods are available. Most people continue to be worse off as a result of the crime wave.

We need to ask ourselves: How are poor people benefited if prices are pushed initially lower by criminal behavior (reduced demand coupled with lower prices for stolen goods)? How are they benefited when the uncertainties associated with theft must be dealt with? What benefit is the high rate of theft in, say, New York City's black ghetto,

26. Ludwig von Mises, The Anti-Capitalist Mentality (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1956). (<http://bit.ly/MisesAnti>)

Harlem? I have visited apartments in Harlem, with their expensive doors and intricate locks. Burglary is profitable for sellers of anti-burglary devices, but not for any other law-abiding citizen.

Prices of other consumer goods are initially lowered because of money that must be spent on locks, burglar alarms, and insurance. But they do not remain low. Buyers need to lure sellers into high-risk markets where theft is common. People in Harlem wind up having to pay far higher prices than in other areas of New York City because costs of doing business are high (you might get killed), and it is expensive to lure sellers into the area. Customer choices are drastically limited; there are no supermarkets in Harlem; only small “mom and pop” stores that issue credit and know their customers. Harlem’s problem is not capitalism; its problem is that too many criminals and people with short-run perspectives live (and prey) there.²⁷

What if the crime wave ends? We now come to phase three. There will still be an increase in prices, as buyers seek to lure back potential sellers. Initially, prices will rise, but they will not rise as high as they would have risen had the crime wave not come to an end. It is this phase of the economic process that Mr. Gish singled out and criticized: the recovery phase. He blamed capitalism for high prices. But he ignored phase four.

Fourth, if the criminals are kept out of the crime business, the high prices being offered by buyers will lure manufacturers back into the markets. Manufacturers are given accurate signals about true customer demand. As they target specific markets and their output increases, prices will again fall back closer to where they had been prior to the crime wave. Never forget: Producers need accurate signals concerning true customer demand. This is what the free market gives them. Prices enable producers to assess more accurately the value in the marketplace of all scarce resources. They can then make better decisions about production.

This is what the critics of capitalism simply will not admit, namely, that producers respond to higher consumer prices by producing more goods and services to meet the new demand, unless the costs of production rise as fast or faster. If it becomes safer to own goods, and people want to buy additional goods, then prices may rise initially. But this is not the end of the story, except in books written by socialists and free market critics. The question is: What happens next? What happens next in a free market society is greater output of the newly demanded goods. This new production tends to lower consumer prices.

27. On short-run perspectives in black ghettos and the grim effects, see Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City: The Nature and Future of Our Urban Crisis (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 53–54, 124–28.

3. Socialism's War Against Price Signals

We might ask Mr. Gish: What would be the result of similar self-restraint or civil government restraint against theft in a socialist society that had previously been hit with a crime wave? If government bureaucrats set most prices, and they keep prices fixed during both the crime wave and the recovery phase, which is likely, then the ethics-induced increased value of consumer goods will not send a price signal to producers to produce more goods. Producers will therefore not respond rapidly to the new conditions of higher value for goods, because the bureaucrats hold down official (legal) prices.

True, citizens who no longer are victimized by thieves are benefited. Thus, there is a net social benefit in socialist societies, as in all societies, from a reduction in theft. But far from this crime reduction's leading to an indirect benefit for the poor, it leads nowhere in particular in the official, state-controlled markets. The market value of goods rises in the black market, where prices more closely match true value to buyers and sellers, but not in the state-controlled markets. Only to the extent that poor people have greater skills in entering the black market will poor people be favored by the indirect economic effects of a reduction in theft.

In all likelihood, the poorest members of society will not be well-informed black marketeers. Thus, the reduction of theft by private individuals in a socialist economy tends to augment the flow of consumer goods flowing into an illegal market that is dominated by people with specialized skills in illegal bargaining. The primary beneficiaries are those people who trade in the illegal markets. This is the curse of all socialist economies. Those people who become dependent on the state to deliver the goods become the victims of bureaucratic incompetence, and those who ignore the official markets and who enter black markets become the winners. It is a good lesson in economics. (I am sure my critic's answer would be that socialist governments ought to pass more laws against black markets.)²⁸

28. The economic ignorance that underlies the arguments of my critic is monumental. Yet such ignorance was representative of the published books and essays of "socially concerned," Christian college-educated, seminary-trained social thinkers in the American and British evangelical community in the 1980s.

4. Conclusion

As buyers, we want sellers to respond to our offers to buy goods and services. Yet as producers, we want to know what buyers are willing and able to pay for our goods and services. The better everyone's knowledge of the markets he deals in, the fewer the resources necessary for advertising, negotiating, and guessing about the future. These "released" resources can then be devoted to producing goods and services to satisfy wants that would otherwise have gone unsatisfied. The lower our transaction costs, the more wealth we can devote to the purchase and sale of the items involved in the transactions.

One transaction cost is the defense of property against theft or fraud. God therefore steps in and offers us a "free good": an inescapable system of punishment. To the extent that criminals and potential criminals believe that God really does punish criminal behavior, both on earth and in heaven, their costs of operation go up. When the price of any scarce item rises, other things being equal, less of it will be demanded. What if we can raise the "price" of crime? Less criminal behavior will be the result of a widespread belief in God's judgments, both temporal and final. God raises the risks to thieves. When the commandment against theft is preached, and when both the preachers and the hearers believe in the God who has announced His warning against theft, then we can expect less crime and greater per capita wealth in that society. God's criminal justice system is coherent, and it is also inescapable, so it truly is a free good—a gift from God that is a sign of His grace. *This is one aspect of the grace of law.*²⁹ It leads to increased wealth for those who respect His laws.

E. Theft at the Ballot Box

We have dealt so far primarily with the question of criminal behavior by private individuals or organized criminal societies. But the economic analysis that applies to theft by private individuals also applies to theft by the civil government. The commandment against theft does not read: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote." We need to have private property rights respected, not just by criminals, but also by individual citizens who find that they can extract wealth from others by means of state power. Furthermore, private property rights must be respected by profit-seeking businesses that would otherwise petition the state for economic assistance: tariffs, import quotas, below-market interest rate government loans, and so forth. To violate this principle is to call for the so-called “corporate state,” another form of the welfare state—fascism, monopoly capitalism, or whatever.³⁰ Whenever such a system has been constructed, it has led to reduced productivity and an increase in bureaucracy. The politicians are simply not competent enough to plan for an entire economy.³¹ To promote such a system of state planning and protection of industry is an illegitimate use of the ballot box, meaning democratic pressure politics.

29. Ernest F. Kevan, The Grace of Law: A Study in Puritan Theology (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, [1976] 1983).

1. Property and Voting

Let us consider an example that has been debated from the Puritan revolution of the 1640s until today: the property qualification for voting. At the Putney Debates of Cromwell’s New Model Army in 1647, Ireton, Cromwell’s son-in-law, debated Rainsborough, the representative of the democratic faction, the Levellers. The Levellers were not communists, but they were committed to a far wider franchise. (The communists in the English Revolution were the Diggers, who called themselves the “True Levellers.”)³²

Rainsborough argued that because all men are under the laws of a nation, they deserve a voice in the affairs of civil government. Ireton

30. An example of just such a proposal for the corporate state was a favorably reviewed book by Robert B. Reich, The Next American Frontier (New York: Times Books, 1983). The author recognizes the evils of the hidden subsidies (Chapter 9), but his solution is for more direct collusion between industry and state. Reich became President Clinton’s Secretary of Labor during his first term, 1993–97. A similar book was Felix G. Rohatyn, The Twenty-Year Century: Essays on Economics and Public Finance (New York: Random House, 1983). For examples of the close alliance between monopoly capitalists and the Communists, see Antony Sutton, Wall Street and the Bolshevik Revolution (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1974); Joseph Finder, Red Carpet (New York: Holt, Rinehart, Winston, 1983); Charles Levinson, Vodka Cola (London: Gordon & Cremenosi, 1978). On the relationship between monopoly capitalists and the Nazi movement, see Antony Sutton, Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler (Seal Beach, California: 76 Press, 1976); Charles Higham, Trading With the Enemy: An Exposé of the Nazi-American Money Plot, 1933–1949 (New York: Delacorte Press, 1983). There is little evidence that German big business financed Hitler: Henry Ashby Turner, Jr., German Big Business and the Rise of Hitler (New York: Oxford University Press, 1985).

31. The Politics of Planning: A Review and Critique of Centralized Planning (San Francisco: Institute for Contemporary Studies, 1976). See also Don Lavoie, National Economic Planning: What Is Left? (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Ballinger, 1985), a detailed criticism of the idea of central planning.

32. Christopher Hill, The World Turned Upside Down: Radical Ideas During the English Revolution (New York: Viking, 1972), ch. 7.

countered with a ringing defense of property rights. A man must have some stake in society, he said, meaning property to defend, if he is to be entrusted with the right to vote. Men without permanent interests in the society—property, in other words—are too dangerous when handed the power of civil government. The property qualification is crucial to preserve society in a democratic order. “And if we shall go to take away this, we shall plainly go to take away all property and interest that any man hath either in land by inheritance, or in estate by possession, or in anything else. . . .”³³

Two centuries later, Karl Marx concluded much the same, except that he favored the abolition of the property qualification for voting, precisely because it would destroy private property: “. . . the state as a state abolishes private property (i.e., man decrees by political means the abolition of private property) when it abolishes the property qualification for electors and representatives. . . . Is not private property ideally abolished when the non-owner comes to legislate for the owner of property? The property qualification is the last political form in which property is recognized.”³⁴ His contemporary, the Whig historian and politician Lord Macaulay, offered a similar assessment.³⁵

Yet there is a major theoretical problem that Christian defenders of the property qualification for voting have chosen to overlook or downplay: defining citizenship apart from a Trinitarian confession of faith. Instead, they have generally defined citizenship in terms of a stake in society, and then have defined this stake as possessing some minimal value of property. In opposition to this argument, Rainsborough in 1647 argued that residence in a nation should establish a right of citizenship. The laws apply to all residents. Why should they not be able to have a say in who writes the laws and enforces them? More than a century later, a slogan of America’s revolutionaries was “No taxation without representation.” Sales taxes were extracted from every resident, yet the colonists had no votes in Parliament. This argument left confession of faith out of the debate. It made citizenship a function of economics. Yet the Bible places covenants above economics, for covenants are oath-bound under God.

Protestant churches have adopted Rainsborough’s definition of voting membership. He argued that the ownership of property should not be made a criterion for exercising the vote. Protestant churches argue that every confessing adult member should have the right to vote for church officers in the local congregation. Some churches even allow children to vote, because children are communicant members. This policy transfers judicial authority to those church members who do not tithe to the local congregation. Most church members do not tithe. But Hebrews 7 teaches that tithing to a local congregation is a judicial obligation, for the church collects the obligatory tithe in the name of the high priest, Jesus Christ.³⁶ Those church members who fail to meet the requirement to tithe possess the votes to determine what is done with the money that those who did meet their obligations pay for. The churches do not distinguish between communicant members and voting members. This was Rainsborough's theory of the civil franchise.

33. A. S. P. Woodhouse (ed.), Puritanism and Liberty, Being the Army Debates (1647–9) (London: Dent, 1938), p. 53.

34. Karl Marx, “On the Jewish Question” (1843), in T. B. Bottomore (ed.), Karl Marx: Early Writings (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1964), pp. 11–12.

35. G. Otto Trevelyan (ed.), The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1875), II, pp. 408–10. See Appendix G: “Macaulay on Democracy.”

The biblical solution ecclesiastically is to limit voting membership to adult members of families that tithe. No church does this. No democratic civil government does, either. The church has become the model for the state's franchise system. The result is churches that build large buildings enjoyed by members who do not pay their share of the costs, rather than churches that help poor non-members. Church members are then content to see the civil government assume the task of helping the poor, thereby passing this ancient church obligation onto non-church members. So, the welfare state has replaced the welfare church in Christian and formerly Christian societies.

No respectable political philosopher in the Protestant West today raises this issue: theological confession as the basis of citizenship. If civil government is a covenant established under God, then why should Christians ignore baptism and confession of faith as the dual foundation of citizenship? Modern theories of democracy and political pluralism deny the legitimacy of such a judicial foundation of citizenship, substituting other civil oaths and confessions for theological confession. But there is nothing in the Bible to support political pluralism and much that denies it.³⁷

By insisting on the possession of property as a defining characteristic of citizenship, the Cromwellians undermined the holy commonwealth ideal, which they had fought a revolution to establish. In 1660, Charles II ascended to the throne and relegated the Puritans to second-class citizenship because of their failure to affirm allegiance to the Church of England, over which the king formally ruled. By 1700, theological unitarians and even pantheists—religious dissenters—who traced their political roots back to the Puritan revolution against Charles I, helped to establish Whig political theory, which became Anglo-American Enlightenment political humanism.³⁸ By 1750, the contractualism of Hobbes (1651) and Locke (1690) had replaced the older covenantalism in debates over political theory. The ideal of Christendom no longer commanded respect by the West's intellectuals and opinion-shapers. Then came Rousseau's version of the social contract in 1762: a theory of the sovereign General Will, represented solely by the nation-state, in which the intermediary institutions of Christendom lost all political legitimacy.³⁹ The right wing of the Enlightenment (Scottish) and the left wing (French) were united in their opposition to the ideal of Christendom.

36. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011), ch. 10.

37. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

Today, there is no well-developed political theory from an explicitly Trinitarian and self-consciously biblical point of view that deals with citizenship in terms of these categories: theological confession, church membership, taxation, and oaths of allegiance. Yet it has been two millennia since Jesus was born. Much work remains to be done.

F. Protection

All property is God's. He has established rules for the exchange, transmission, and development of this property. Theft is explicitly prohibited. God's law provides us with the case laws that enable us to define theft biblically. For example, it is not theft if a neighbor picks an apple from someone else's tree and eats it (Deut. 23:24–25).⁴⁰ Furthermore, it is theft if the owner of an agricultural property does not leave fallen fruit on the ground for gleaners (Deut. 24:19).⁴¹ The Bible is our standard of what constitutes theft, not Adam Smith or Karl Marx.

The civil government is required by God to serve as the protector

38. Caroline Robbins, The Eighteenth-Century Commonwealthman (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1959). This has been reprinted by Liberty Press, Indianapolis.

39. Robert A. Nisbet, Tradition and Revolt: Historical and Sociological Essays (New York: Random House, 1968), ch. 1.

40. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 59.

41. Ibid., ch. 62.

of property. It must honor the laws of ownership that are set forth in the Bible. It should not prosecute a man who takes grain from his neighbor's field. Christ and the disciples were not guilty of theft when they did so (Matt. 12:1).⁴² The civil government can legitimately compel a farm owner to respect the gleaning laws. In a biblical society, the threatened negative civil sanction would be the revocation of citizenship, based on a prior revocation of church membership for his defying the gleaning law. But the civil government cannot legitimately say which persons have to be allowed into the field to glean. The owner of the property has that responsibility, just as Boaz did (Ruth 2:3–12).

This view of theft and protection is not in conformity to either modern socialism or modern libertarianism. In the first system (socialism), the state collects the tithe for itself, and many times God's tithe, to be used for purposes specified by bureaucratic and political bodies. In the second system (libertarianism), all coercion against private property is defined as theft, including taxation itself (in some libertarian systems).⁴³ Nevertheless, the Bible's standards are the valid ones, and the Bible is clear: there is no absolute sovereignty in any person or institution. Unquestionably, there are limits on the use of private property. But these limits are minimal. Given the biblical standards of theft, the civil government becomes a legitimate sovereign in the area of theft prevention and punishment—not the only institution, but one of them, and the one that has the lawful authority to impose economic sanctions against thieves.

Nobel-Prize winning economist R. H. Coase stated emphatically: "A private-enterprise system cannot function properly unless property rights are created in resources, and, when this is done, someone wishing to use a resource has to pay the owner to obtain it."⁴⁴ The defense of private ownership by the civil government against theft is, in and of itself, a foundation of capitalism. By defining the limits of ownership, and by defending property from coercive attack from violent men and fraudulent practices, a godly civil government establishes the basis of economic growth and prosperity.

42. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 26.

43. Perhaps the most systematic of the libertarian criticisms of all forms of taxation is Murray N. Rothbard's book, Power and Market: Government and the Economy (Menlo Park, California: Institute for Humane Studies, 1970). It was reprinted as the final section of Man, Economy, and State (1962) by the Ludwig von Mises Institute, Auburn, Alabama, in 2004. This section of the book was originally intended by Rothbard to be in Man, Economy, and State. The Volker Fund, which had funded the book, decided to drop that anti-state section.

44. R. H. Coase, "The Federal Communications Commission," Journal of Law and Economics (1959); reprinted in Eirik G. Furubotn and Svetozar Pejovich (eds.), The Economics of Property Rights (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Ballinger, 1974), p. 82.

One of the most important features of a private property social order is the reduction of uncertainty. The market rewards forecasters (entrepreneurs) for their successful attempts to meet future customer demand at competitive prices. Here is the basis of the power of the customers over the suppliers: the lure of profit. The profit-and-loss system is also the process through which less efficient (more wasteful) forecasters are steadily eliminated from the market, thereby increasing the stability of the market. Customers can rely more readily on the free market for the future delivery of goods and services than they could dare to rely on a bureaucratic delivery system, with its guaranteed jobs for suppliers, its past-oriented rules, and its lack of risk-bearing. Uncertainty is reduced in society by the free, competitive market precisely because the market places such high rewards for overcoming uncertainty, namely, profits. The market's flexibility provides customers with future stability, since the mistakes of producers tend to cancel out, and the more successful producers strengthen their position in the market.

G. Defining Property Rights

If the free market order rests on property rights, then what exactly are they? As with all definitions, the human mind, not to mention language, is imperfect. An absolutely rigorous definition is probably impossible. Harold Demsetz made an attempt.

Crucially involved is the notion that individuals have control over the use to which scarce resources (including ideas) can be put, and that this right of control is saleable or transferable. A private property right system requires the prior consent of 'owners' before their property can be affected by others. The role of the body politic in this system is twofold. Firstly, the government or courts must help decide which individuals possess what property rights and, therefore, who has the power to claim that his rights are affected by others. Secondly, property rights so assigned must be protected by the police power of the state or the owners must be allowed to protect property rights themselves. Presumably the best mix of public and private protection will depend on ethical and other considerations."⁴⁵

45. Harold Demsetz, "Some Aspects of Property Rights," Journal of Law and Economics, IX (1966), p. 62.

Unfortunately, the economics profession, in its self-professed moral neutrality, has not been able to come up with these ethical and other criteria, nor have economists shown exactly how economics would relate to such criteria.

Property, from this perspective, is basically a “bundle of rights.” Again, citing Demsetz: “When a transaction is concluded in the marketplace, two bundles of property rights are exchanged. A bundle of rights often attaches to a physical commodity or service, but it is the value of the rights that determines the value of what is exchanged.”⁴⁶ The control over such rights necessarily involves the right to exclude others from the value of the rights over time. It is here that the civil government must take special care. Rights are not absolute, but they should be sufficiently familiar to acting men that these men can make valid predictions concerning the future—the future actions of competitors, as well as of the civil government. The reduction of uncertainty is of paramount importance. As Cheung wrote: “The transfer of property rights among individual owners through contracting in the marketplace requires that the rights be exclusive. An exclusive property right grants its owner a limited authority to make a decision on resource use so as to derive income therefrom. To define this limit requires measurement and enforcement. Any property is multidimensional and exclusivity is frequently a matter of degree. But without some enforced or policed exclusivity to a right of action, the right to contract so as to exchange is absent.”⁴⁷ The civil government must protect property because it must protect property owners.

H. The Market for Knowledge and Uncertainty

The establishment of property rights is therefore fundamental in any system of voluntary exchange. Men rely on the division of labor to increase their economic output and therefore their income. Of critical importance is the exchange of information, including the voluntary exchange of uncertainty. Those who want to buy more uncertainty, and therefore open up to themselves the opportunity for greater profit, are enabled to do so by purchasing higher-risk property from those who are willing to settle for a more guaranteed return.⁴⁸ Some people want

46. Demsetz, “Toward a Theory of Property Rights,” American Economic Review (1967); reprinted in Economics of Property Rights, p. 31.

47. S. Cheung, “The Structure of a Contract and the Theory of a Non-Exclusive Resource,” Journal of Law and Economics (1970); reprinted in ibid., p. 27.

48. I employ Frank Knight’s distinction between risk and uncertainty. Risk is a bonds, others want stocks, while still others want to speculate in commodities. Farmers may prefer to lock in a price for their future crops, so as to concentrate their knowledge on raising more crops. Speculators who think they understand agricultural markets, even if they know very little about the actual mechanics (or organics) of farming, can contract with uncertainty-avoiding farmers to guarantee them a specified future price for their crop. Those who want uncertainty can buy it; those who want to avoid it can sell it. This helps reduce the mistakes—forecasting mistakes—in those societies that allow voluntary transactions in the marketplace. But a society that does not take care to specify and enforce property rights cannot derive the full benefits of the market in reducing uncertainty. Costs of ownership remain needlessly high. Co-operation is reduced.

Man is not God. Man's knowledge is not God's exhaustive knowledge. Man must seek wisdom and knowledge as one of his tasks on earth (Prov. 1:1–7). He needs the division of labor in knowledge more than he needs the division of labor in any other field, since wisdom is the thing above all which we are told to pursue. *The free market, more than any institutional arrangement in the history of man, facilitates the division of labor in knowledge.*⁴⁹ Men are forced to recognize that knowledge is never free of charge, and that other men put a high price on certain kinds of knowledge. This, predictably, tends to encourage increased production of the high-valued knowledge.

The free market increases men's knowledge, but there must be open competition for knowledge, and there must be legal transferability of that knowledge. Competition assembles knowledge from many potential suppliers. The knowledge here is men's knowledge of all the potential uses for a scarce resource, and all the contractual arrangements possible for implementing this knowledge. Cheung writes that the "transferability of property rights ensures that the most valuable knowledge will be utilized."⁵⁰ When a society allows buyers of know-statistically calculable class of future events, such as the deaths within a particular age group. Mortality tables used by life insurance firms are examples of statistical calculations of risk. In contrast, uncertainty is not subject to mathematical analysis in advance. Correctly forecasting uncertain future events—or at least events not deemed as uncertain by one's competitors—is the source of all profits, Knight cogently argued. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>) ledge to bid against each other, and it also facilitates the sellers' ability to transfer their resources, it thereby reduces the cost of enforcing the stipulated terms of contracts. How? Because competing parties stand by to offer or accept similar terms of exchange. If one participant tries to cheat, others will step in and make legitimate offers. Thus, concluded Cheung, "competition in the marketplace reduces the costs of finding and pursuing the most valuable option in which a resource may be contacted for production."⁵¹ This, of course, reduces waste. People can buy what they want with fewer resources, since all resources tend to be allocated to those uses most highly demanded by customers or their economic agents: entrepreneurs. Producers think they know what lots of people will want to buy, and those customers who want to buy finished products gain their influence over suppliers because the transactions are voluntary, and suppliers are seeking to make a profit. To the extent that the state restricts the profitability of voluntary exchange, buyers lose influence over suppliers, for the whole incentive structure is compromised. The state restricts the buyers' use of "economic carrots."

49. F. A. Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>)

50. Cheung, in Economics of Property Rights, p. 29.

The words "mine" and "yours" are two of the most important words in any society. Biblical preaching has, over centuries, enabled men to appreciate the importance of these two words. When the differences between the two are honored in law, word, and deed, society benefits. Men can better co-operate with each other in peaceful transactions precisely because of the predictability provided by a social order which recognizes "mine" and "yours." This facilitates the division of labor.

Demsetz saw the importance of property rights from the perspective of social co-operation. "In the world of Robinson Crusoe property rights play no role. Property rights are an instrument of society and derive their significance from the fact that they help a man form those expectations which he can reasonably hold in his dealings with others. These expectations find expression in the laws, customs, and mores of a society. An owner of property rights possesses the consent of fellow men to allow him to act in particular ways."⁵² Men can make contracts with each other, and enjoy the fruits of their decisions concerning the stewardship of God's resources. To return to a now-familiar theme, property rights reduce the zones of uncertainty in life. Men see through a glass darkly. Anything that throws light on the subject is a benefit.

51. Idem.

52. Ibid., p. 31.

I. Ownership as a Social Function

What is not understood by many is that private ownership necessarily involves social responsibilities. There can be no escape from the responsibilities of ownership. God always links power and responsibility.

Consider a scarce resource. Being scarce, it commands a price. (A non-scarce resource is any resource for which demand does not exceed supply at zero price.) Therefore, the person who owns it possesses wealth. What will he do with this wealth? Will he use the asset (money, for example) to invest? This makes the wealth available for a period of time to someone else. Will he spend the money on a consumer good? Then he pays for it and thereby forfeits the income that he might have received had he invested the money. Will he give it away? Then he forfeits the use of the investment income or the psychic income that the consumer good would have produced.

Who establishes the price of the asset? Consumers do. A consumer is here defined as the final buyer. He does not purchase the good in order to make a profit by selling it to someone else. Consumers make subjective evaluations of what any asset is worth, and their competitive bids in the marketplace establish the objective price of a particular asset.

Producers compete against producers to sell to customers, who in turn compete against each other. Producers cannot sell assets at prices higher than customers are willing and able to pay. Thus, customers determine what is going to be produced. Entrepreneurs act as their middlemen, buying up producer goods, raw materials, labor, and other forms of capital, and using them over time to meet expected customer demand. If they are successful in their guesses, they will reap profits. If they are incorrect, they will reap losses. But there is no escape from what free market economists call consumers' sovereignty,⁵³ at least not apart from the intervention of the civil government with some sort of coercive protection scheme. This sovereignty is delegated by God to property owners. Delegated sovereignty is the same as authority. It is the legitimate authority to make use of some asset.

This means that every person who owns an asset that commands a price must act as the agent of customers (including himself), or pay the price of failing to serve their needs. If customers want to see assets used in a particular way, and an asset owner refuses to sell, then he pays a price. He cannot ignore customer demand at zero price to himself. Customers or their economic agents (entrepreneurial middlemen) make bids for ownership, as revealed by a market price for the asset. Those owners who refuse to take the offered price thereby forfeit all the uses to which they might otherwise have put the money. There is no escape from this required payment. The owner who says, "I'll use it my way," is saying, "I'll pay for my decision." He turns his back on the money or goods offered by customers for his property.

53. The phrase "consumers' sovereignty" was coined by William H. Hutt as early as 1934: Individual Freedom: Selected Works of William H. Hutt, Svetozar Pejovich and David Klingaman, eds. (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1975), p. 185, and footnote 1 on p. 203.

Thus, ownership is a social function. Owners inescapably act as stewards on behalf of the consuming public, or else pay the price. There is no such thing as a free (gratuitous) lunch. There is also no such thing as cost-free ownership of scarce economic resources. The existence of free markets—institutional arrangements for open, competitive bidding—enables customers to price all economic assets according to their subjective evaluations. Free markets produce objective bids (prices). These bids produce either profits or losses for entrepreneurs. The entrepreneurs are not in charge of the bidding process. Customers are, for they possess money: the most marketable asset. They own what specialized producers desire: money. Producers worry about having large inventories. Few customers worry about possessing too large an inventory of money. Free markets aid customers in establishing their will over producers. Producers are legally free agents, but they are not cost-free agents.

There are two ways to impose your will on another person: reward and penalty, the carrot and the stick. The stick relies on coercion. The coercion of legal adults is a covenantal monopoly of the civil government. Thus, customers must rely on the carrot approach. "Do it my way," they assert, "or suffer the consequences." What are the consequences? Forfeited income.

The market is not some autonomous institution that thwarts the "little guy." It is an institution that promotes the interests of every asset-owning participant. It provides customers with the ultimate institutional carrot: a legal order that allows them to make competitive bids to the owners of the resources they want to buy. The market is a social institution that places daily inescapable burdens of ownership on every resource owner.⁵⁴ As Mises wrote: "Ownership of the means of production is not a privilege, but a social liability. Capitalists and landowners are compelled to employ their property for the best possible satisfaction of the customers. If they are slow and inept in the performance of their duties, they are penalized by losses. If they do not learn their lesson and do not reform their conduct of affairs, they lose their wealth. No investment is safe forever. He who does not use his property in serving the customers in the most efficient way is doomed to failure. There is no room left for people who would like to enjoy their fortunes in idleness and thoughtlessness.”⁵⁵ In a society in which the rights of private property are honored, men can make self-conscious, calculating decisions concerning their assets, which will influence future generations. Family capital is protected by the prohibition against theft. Men’s consideration of time perspective can then focus on the long-term prospects for their capital, just as Abraham’s vision did.

54. Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 28: "Ownership: Free But Not Cheap." (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

Which system of property management tends to be more concerned with the future, private ownership or communal ownership? Demsetz addressed this issue, and he concluded that private ownership tends to be far more future-oriented. By communal ownership, he meant “a right which can be exercised by all members of the community,”⁵⁶ He pointed to a phenomenon made famous by biologist Garrett Hardin, the “tragedy of the commons,”⁵⁷ although he did not use this terminology. “Suppose that land is communally owned. Every person has the right to hunt, till, or mine the land. This form of ownership fails to concentrate the cost associated with any person’s exercise of his communal right on that person. If a person seeks to maximize the value of his communal rights, he will tend to overhunt and overwork the land because some of the costs of his doing so are borne by others. The stock of game and the richness of the soil will be diminished too quickly.”⁵⁸ People may agree to reduce the demands they are

This was published by The Freeman (July 1972). (<http://bit.ly/NorthOwn>)

55. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 308. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

56. Demsetz, “Toward a Theory of Property Rights,” in Economics of Property Rights, op. cit., p. 37.

57. Garrett Hardin, “The Tragedy of the Commons,” Science (13 Dec. 1968); reprinted in Garrett de Bell (ed.), The Environmental Handbook (New York: Ballentine, 1970). Hardin called for more government control over pollution and resource depletion. In contrast, C. R. Batten called for less government control and greater attention to defining private property rights: Batten, “The Tragedy of the Commons,” The Freeman (Oct. 1970). (<http://bit.ly/BatCom>) making, as individuals, on the land, but the costs of negotiating are high, and so are the costs of policing the agreement.

58. Demsetz, in Economics of Property Rights, p. 38.

"If a single person owns the land," said Demsetz, "he will attempt to maximize its present value by taking into account alternative future time streams of benefits and costs and selecting that one which he believes will maximize the present value of his privately owned rights. We all know that this means that he will attempt to take into account the supply-and-demand conditions that he thinks will exist after his death. It is very difficult to see how the existing communal owners can reach an agreement that takes account of these costs."⁵⁹ Then Demsetz offered a stunning insight into the social function of an owner of a private property right: the owner as a broker between generations. "In effect, an owner of a private right to use land acts as a broker whose wealth depends on how well he takes into account the competing claims of the present and future. But with communal rights there is no broker, and the claims of the present generation will be given an uneconomically large weight in determining the intensity with which the land is worked. Future generations might desire to pay present generations enough to change the present intensity of land usage. But they have no living agent to place their claims on the market."⁶⁰

By its very nature and time perspective, family capital is privately owned capital. Privately owned capital necessarily involves the defense of private property. The stewardship of resources should be supervised by the most intensely committed social unit, the family. It is not the only legitimate institution of ownership,⁶¹ but it is unquestionably the most universally recognized ownership institution historically, and it is the social unit to which God originally announced the dominion covenant. By establishing a tight (though imperfect) relationship between costs and benefits, private property rights encourage men to count the costs of their actions. The counting of costs is a biblical requirement (Luke 14:28–30).⁶² If a man overworks his soil, he or his heirs will pay the price. If his animals overgraze the land, he or his heirs will suffer reduced income later. He cannot pass on his costs so easily to those outside his family, which therefore encourages him to examine the

59. Idem.

60. Ibid., pp. 38–39.

61. The corporation is another important institution for holding property, but corporate shares of ownership are held by heads of households primarily, or by agents of heads of households: banks, retirement funds, mutual funds, etc. Thus, these are delegated sovereignties.

62. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 35.

effects, including long-run effects, of his present decisions. He seeks a profit—an excess of income over outgo—so he cannot safely ignore costs. He will waste fewer of God’s resources because of the profit incentive, compared to the waste involved in communal ownership or state ownership systems, where each man is offered direct incentives to waste the common asset while profiting personally from the immediate use of the asset. To avoid the tragedy of the commons, society must actively reinforce the laws and institutions of private property.

There can be commitment to the goals of other social units besides the family, but no institution commands the degree of loyalty that the family has commanded historically. When devising a system of incentives, we should stick with the Bible and “go with the winner,” which is the family. Family capital is private capital.

J. Communal Property and Nomads

Those within the Christian tradition who have been committed to socialism have pointed to the communal property of the Jerusalem church as an example to be followed by all Christians. Several comments are in order. First, communal property in the Jerusalem church was strictly voluntary (Acts 5:4).⁶³ Second, property was shared in common (Acts 4:32), but for a reason: Christ’s prediction of the coming destruction of Jerusalem (Luke 21:20–24). By selling fixed property, such as homes, Jerusalem’s church members made it easier to heed Christ’s warning and flee the city during the crisis. They could convert their fixed capital assets into mobile capital, thereby helping to preserve the value of their capital.⁶⁴ This prophecy concerning Jerusalem was fulfilled in 69 and 70 A.D., when the Romans surrounded the city and starved out the inhabitants.⁶⁵ The Christians fled to Pella, church legend has it, before the final siege of Jerusalem. The Jerusalem church abandoned private property temporarily, but there is no indication that communal property was regarded as morally binding. It was a temporary response to a particular set of circumstances: Christ’s prophecy and Rome's tyranny. The early church in Jerusalem (and only in Jerusalem) prepared to flee by selling fixed property and pooling the funds. Members became, in effect, temporary nomads, for they intended to flee when the time came. As nomads, they adopted transportable property and more communal property ownership. There is no indication that this nomadic system of ownership was ever regarded as a policy for gentile congregations.

63. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

64. Ibid., ch. 3.

65. David Chilton, Paradise Restored: A Biblical Theology of Dominion (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1985), ch. 10: “The Great Tribulation,” and Appendix B of Chilton’s book, which reprints sections from Josephus’ The Wars of the Jews. (<http://bit.ly/dcpardise>). Cf. Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, [1987] 1997). (<http://bit.ly/ChilTrib>)

The nomad is not a builder of civilization. His geographical perspective is too short run. He comes and goes, never staying to establish roots, whether personal or agricultural. The nomadic family concerns itself primarily with transportable assets. Weapons and household utensils are prized, and nomadic law protects them. Both kinds of articles require raw materials, human ingenuity, and time to produce. But far less concern is placed on defining and policing property rights in land. Demsetz wrote: "Property rights in land among such people would require costs for several years during which no sizable output is obtained. Since to provide for sustenance these people must move to a new land, a property right to be of value to them must be associated with a portable object. Among these people it is common to find property rights to the crops, which, after harvest, are portable, but not to the land. The more advanced agriculturally based primitive societies are able to remain with particular land for longer periods, and here we generally observe property rights to the land as well as to the crops."⁶⁶

A godly society seeks to defend the property rights of ever-multiplying kinds of goods and services. An increasing market value of more and more formerly ignored goods is made possible by rising productivity. Civilization can be measured by an increase in the kinds of private property recognized and developed by members of a particular society. As societies advance, they are marked by this extension of protection to new products, new technologies, and new transactions. The division of labor increases.

K. Human Rights and Property Rights

One of the most successful political slogans of economic interventionists in the twentieth century was this one: "We're in favor of human rights over property rights." One of America's most beloved Presidents, the feisty and extremely well-read Teddy Roosevelt, used a variation of this slogan in the early years of the twentieth century: "In every civilized society, property rights must be carefully safeguarded. Ordinarily and in the great majority of cases, human rights and property rights are fundamentally and in the long run, identical; but when it clearly appears that there is a real conflict between them, human rights must have the upper hand; for property belongs to man and not man to property.”⁶⁷ Allen and Alchian’s analysis strikes at the heart of such a contrast: “Exclusivity of control constitutes a basic component of the private-property economic system. We emphasize that property rights are not rights of property, they are rights of people to [the] use of goods. In sum, two basic elements of private property are exclusivity of rights and voluntary transferability or exchangeability of rights. It is silly to speak of a contrast or conflict between human rights and property rights. Property rights are human rights to the use of economic goods.”⁶⁸

66. Demsetz, in Economics of Property Rights, p. 37n.

We can legitimately speak of a misuse of property by an individual. If my factory blows smoke on your house and wears off the paint, I have invaded your sphere of responsibility. I have attacked your property. I have assaulted your sense of justice. When men come to agree, through custom or formal law, that a specific space is to be protected and honored, another man cannot legitimately invade that space for his own personal profit, except with the consent of the owner. But this is not a case of “property rights vs. human rights”; it is a case of a conflict between human rights—a dispute between people concerning the lawful use of privately owned property.

1. Pollution and Economic Competition

There are inevitably problems to be settled in human society, areas that need more research, more understanding. Even theoretically, the defender of the free market has difficulties in defining property rights or an invasion of property rights. For example, free market defenders argue that when the state taxes one quarter of the income of a particular piece of property, it has in effect confiscated one quarter of that property.⁶⁹ Consider, then, this problem (raised by Demsetz).⁷⁰ If my

67. Theodore Roosevelt, “The Man in the Arena,” Speech at the Sorbonne (April 23, 1910). (<http://bit.ly/TRarena>), cited in R. J. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995), p. 179. (<http://bit.ly/rjrrogap>)

68. Alchian and Allen, University Economics, p. 142.

69. Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 39.

70. Harold Demsetz, “The Exchange and Enforcement of Property Rights,” Journal of Law and Economics, VII (1964), pp. 25–26.

factory blows smoke on your property, you expect restitution, or a cessation of smoke production, since it lowers the value of your property. Pollution-control equipment can be defended in terms of this view of property rights. However, if my factory is located a thousand miles away, or across the ocean, and my improvements in methods of production drive out of business a factory in your area, which happens to employ half the town, the market value of your home may drop even more than if my factory were spewing smoke into your neighborhood. Few defenders of the free market would insist that I owe restitution to anyone who has the value of his house wiped out in this manner. Yet the value of your house may be down 25%. Have I really confiscated 25% of your house? Is the argument which is levelled at the tax collector equally applicable to my distant factory? Competition, confiscation, and cooperation are sometimes very difficult concepts to distinguish—not always, or even usually, but sometimes.

The Bible provides us with an example of “spillover effects” and what to do about them. If a man starts a fire on his property, and the fire spreads to his neighbor’s property, the man who started the fire is responsible for compensating his neighbor for the latter’s losses (Ex. 22:6).⁷¹ Obviously, this invasion of property is physical, rather than merely competitive and economic in nature, and therefore the firestarter is liable. The destruction of property in this instance is physical and immediate; the victim actually loses part of his crop. But what about noise pollution, where the man’s house is not burned, but its market value drops as a result of his neighbor’s noisy factory? This would seem to be covered by the case law on fire, since sound waves are physical phenomena, just as sparks are. But when the loss is exclusively economic, without physical invasion, the Bible is silent. There is no biblical law that would require the successful innovator to compensate those who lost money because of the introduction of new production techniques or new products. Alchian’s analysis would seem to apply: “Although private property rights protect private property from physical changes chosen by other people, no immunity is implied for the exchange value of one’s property.”⁷²

71. Chapter 48.

72. Armen Alchian, “Some Economics of Property Rights,” Il Politico (1965); reprinted in The Collected Works of Armen Alchian, 2 vols. (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Fund, 2006), II, p. 55. His conclusion, however, that making pornographic pictures and selling them must be free from legal restraint (p. 55) follows only if we assume that there are (1) no absolute standards of morality, (2) no God, and (3) no social consequences for immoral behavior—in short, no consequences imposed on many

Is it fair, then, to equate the economic effects of the state's collection of taxes and the industrialist's pollution? The answer depends on the level of taxation. If the state attempts to extract taxes greater than 10% of income, thereby equating its sovereignty with God's sovereignty (the tithe), then the answer is yes, the two should be equated. Both forms of economic redistribution rest on illegitimate violence. The tax collector extracts money or goods from the citizen upon threat of imprisonment or outright confiscation of capital assets. Thus, when the state taxes, say, 50% of a present and future stream of income, the present capital value of the asset producing the stream of income is reduced by nearly 50%.⁷³ Because some benefits may flow from the state's laws, such as protection from violence or fraud, the economic loss is not necessarily 100% of the tax. The economic effect is almost the same as if the state had taken almost half the lands or almost half the shares of stock or bonds.⁷⁴ This is destructive.

2. Taxation: Investment vs. Consumption

By confiscating up to 100% of a person's income (in late twentieth-century England and Sweden, for example),⁷⁵ the tax collectors have members of society by God's judgment. Most economists erroneously make all three assumptions. When we speak of the legitimacy of innovation, we must always have in mind this qualification: "... assuming the innovation or transaction is not singled out by the Bible as being defined by God as perverse, and also illegal."

73. Meaning, "reduced from what it would otherwise have been."

74. The economic effect is not precisely the same. It is generally easier for a special-interest group to get tax policies changed than it is for members of the group to get the state to return all the property that had been confiscated from each of them, especially if the confiscated property has been sold in the meantime to other private buyers, who will fight any such legislation. The longer the period after the confiscation, the more difficult it is to get the law changed. Thus, when the state confiscates 50% of the property's income in the form of taxes, this probably does not produce a full 50% drop in the market value of the property, whereas a confiscation of 50% of the property does involve a loss of 50%, unless the new owner does something with the property that enhances the value of the contiguous property that the original owner still owns.

75. In 1975, British citizens in the highest tax brackets paid up to 83% of all "earned" income, and 98% of "unearned" (investment) income. The tax authorities actually assessed Mick Jagger, the leader of the Rolling Stones rock band, 101% of his income (since they have property taxes and capital taxes in addition to income taxes), but settled for 94%. He fled the country to become a resident of France, which had established far lower negotiable tax rates for rich immigrants from high-tax countries. "Taxing the Talent Out of England," U.S. News and World Report (Sept. 8, 1975). It was estimated in 1977 that as many as 100,000 British executives, middle managers, and entrepreneurs had left England to escape confiscatory taxation during the previ-wiped out billions of dollars worth of capital assets, and lowered the public's willingness to invest more in productive capital. Money flows into other kinds of investments in a welfare state: goods that can be used without paying taxes on the psychic income received. These goods include expensive automobiles, beach homes, gold, jewelry, art objects, mistresses, and other forms of user-tax-free, user-satisfying capital.

The Wall Street Journal has provided a classic example of how the state's existing tax policies discourage investment. Say that a very rich man wants to invest a million dollars. He takes the money and invests in a new business—80% of which fail within the first five years. Let us say that he thinks the business will make him 10% on his money in the second year of operation, but nothing in the first year (a reasonable presumption). Let us also say that his estimations were rewarded. At the end of the second year, he had back $100,000 profit for his small corporation. Here is what happened to his corporation in New York City.

Of the hundred thousand dollars in profit, the city clears away roughly $5,700, leaving $94,300. The state clears away about 10 percent of that, leaving $84,870. The IRS, levying at progressive rates, snatches $38,000, leaving $46,870. Our good rich person then pays himself a dividend.

Being rich, our man is of course in the highest personal income-tax brackets, and after paying 4.3 percent to the city ($2,015) has $44,855 left. The state clips him for 15 percent of that ($6,728) and leaves him $38,127. Uncle Sam 'nicks' him for 70 percent of that, which is $26,689, leaving him with $11,438.

Thus, on the investment of 1 million dollars in capital and two years of hard work in assembling the enterprise that is risky to begin with, this lucky fellow who turned a profit of $100,000 has $11,438 to spend. He has given up two years on his yacht to gain $5,719 in annual income.⁷⁶

It may not have been quite this bad.⁷⁷ But the point is clear, despite ous three years. Britain's "revenue loss" was estimated to be a billion pounds in 1976 alone. Bruce Bartlett, "Taxes in Great Britain," Libertarian Review (June 1981), p. 26. In the 1970s, Sweden's world-famous film director, Ingmar Bergman, emigrated when the tax authorities taxed him over 100% of his previous year's income.

76. Wall Street Journal editorial, cited in George Gilder, Wealth and Poverty, p. 174.

77. Federal tax laws in the United States during that period allowed deductions the slight exaggeration of the Wall Street Journal essay: The higher the tax level, the less that people are going to invest in risky, future-oriented, employment-producing capital assets.

Paul Craig Roberts has described a realistic decision facing a rich man in the late 1970s: "Take the case of a person facing the 70 percent tax rate on investment income. He can choose to invest $50,000 at a 10 percent rate of return, which would bring him $5,000 per year of additional income before taxes. Or he can choose to spend $50,000 on a Rolls Royce. Since the after-tax value of $5,000 is only $1,500, he can enjoy a fine motor car by giving up only that amount. Britain's 98% tax rate on 'unearned' (investment) income has reduced the cost of the Rolls in terms of foregone income to only $100 a year. The profusion of Roll Royces seen in England today is mistaken as a sign of prosperity."⁷⁸ The pre-1980 tax policies of England steadily wiped out the capital base of the nation—sacrificing future productivity for present luxury. Given the fact that a Rolls Royce generally appreciates with inflation, and also because the newly rich are always coming into the market, and given the income tax-deductibility of interest payments in the United States in 1985, the rich man could make more after-tax money by buying a Rolls on credit, driving it several years, and paying off the debt in depreciated money—and meanwhile enjoying a tax break on the interest payments to the bank that loaned him the money to buy the Rolls. The price of a Rolls appreciated from 1977, when Roberts wrote his essay, until the recession of 1981, four years later. This is present-oriented investing with a vengeance, and it is a direct, predictable result of envy-inspired confiscatory taxation rates. With tax rates at modern levels, and with theological rebellion loose in the land, we actually find that the systematic decadence of the rich—cocaine parties, sexual deviation, perverse art forms—can in fact be interpreted as a form of tax-free income.⁷⁹ After all, pleasure as a result of spending is taxed only mildly (sales taxes), if at all. Better to spend now, says the from taxable income for taxes paid at the state and local level. Donald Regan, the Secretary of the Treasury under President Reagan, announced immediately after Reagan's successful bid for a second term of office (November 1984) that the Treasury was proposing a new Federal tax rule which would deny the deductibility of local taxes from Federally taxable income.

78. Roberts, "The Economic Case for Kemp-Roth," Wall Street Journal (August 1, 1978); cited in ibid., p. 173. Because of reductions in tax rates in the highest tax brackets in both nations since 1978, the example is somewhat exaggerated.

79. One of the most comprehensive reports on decadence in the United States appeared in the final issue of the now-defunct magazine, New Times (Jan. 8, 1979). The entire issue was devoted to the topic.

present-oriented man, than to invest for the future. Eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we go broke, and can then apply for unemployment benefits and food stamps.

The modern welfare state has imposed tax burdens on the wage-earning, middle-class citizenry that are systematically decapitalizing the modern world. The envy-dominated legislatures and government-financed economic research centers are destroying the capital base of future generations. Economic growth throughout the West began to slow down, 1970–80, as a result of these tax policies. Capital was not being replaced. Investors all over the world were involved in housing speculation during the 1970s, where there were direct benefits (living in a nicer home), and in the United States, at least, there were also major tax benefits (interest-payment deductions from taxable income, as well as depreciation benefits for investment homes, despite the appreciation in value of these investment homes).

This began to change in a remarkable three-year period: 1978–81. In 1978, Deng Xiaoping reversed the communist economic policies in Mainland China, allowing farmers to own their own land. Agricultural output immediately soared. This policy was then transferred to the general economy, which launched the most rapid and comprehensive economic boom in human history, a boom matched only by India's in the 1990s, as a result of similar policy changes. In 1979, Margaret Thatcher became Prime Minister in Great Britain, and in 1981, Ronald Reagan was inaugurated as President of the United States. Thatcher and Reagan succeeded in getting tax reductions legislated, which led to economic booms in both nations.

3. The State vs. Human Rights

So, the answer to the original question—"Are taxes the equivalent of capital confiscation?"—is yes, they are. Taxes are no longer simply the means of supporting the civil government's protection of private property, which enhances the value of capital by protecting it. Graduated taxation is envy-dominated, based on a theology of salvation by statist law. The state is a messianic institution in the modern world, and it is a destroyer of capital. The Moloch state consumes the economic future of its worshippers, and the economic future of its worshippers' heirs. The state, like the polluting factory, is a coercive, capital-destroying agent in the economy. But the polluting factory may provide productive employment for local residents, and it provides the customers with lower-priced goods (lower priced than if the factory had to pay for pollution-control equipment). The state, in contrast, employs only bureaucrats, and uses its funds generally to subsidize the improvident members of society (some of whom may be quite rich),⁸⁰ ensnaring them in a web of promised benefits, and destroying their incentive to work for the benefit of customers. The very poor also suffer a reduction of their opportunities to obtain the work skills they need to advance themselves in modern economic society.⁸¹ The confiscatory state is a far greater threat to property and freedom than some local factory which pollutes the air or water.

The modern state is a threat to human rights, for it is a threat to property rights. The modern state is a destroyer of human rights, for it is a destroyer of property rights. Guilt-ridden intellectuals, politicians, and sons of the rich have promoted an ideology of wealth redistribution that destroys capital and therefore destroys human aspirations. They have used the misleading slogan, "human rights above property rights," to destroy both human rights and property rights.

Conclusion

The eighth commandment parallels the third commandment, which establishes a property right to God's name, a boundary that must be respected by men.

The biblical doctrine of ownership is a doctrine of stewardship. God's property is to be carefully developed and improved by His stewards.⁸² The servants have chosen to ignore God, and they have also chosen to ignore His commandment against theft. Modern man has adopted a new theology, the ownership of property by the state. The state, as the sovereign owner, delegates to its servants the right to ad-

80. By "improvident," I mean "one who wastes his capital, or the capital entrusted to him by others." This certainly applies to senior executives of major industrial companies that apply to the Federal government for financial aid, tariffs, and other stolen economic goods.

81. George Gilder's book shows how this system works to enslave people in the United States. The work of P. T. Bauer has contributed to our understanding of similar disincentives in underdeveloped nations. See especially his book, Dissent on Development (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1972).

82. Though the idea will horrify socialists and egalitarians, the best way to assess the value of an improvement of any property is to compare its price today with its price before the improvement was made. If someone spent a great deal of money to improve a property, but these improvements did not produce a market price greater than the money invested, then that invested wealth was probably misallocated. It might have been better spent elsewhere.

minister the property, but the state gets its cut, its tithe. The tithe principle is built into the creation; the only question is this: Who gets the tithe? The state is collecting its tithe. As Thomas Sowell has summarized it: "Win, and the state wins with you; lose, and you lose alone." This is the rule for the rich and the middle class, in any case. The modern state is a thief. When Samuel warned the nation of Israel against selecting a king to rule over them, he tried to scare them by telling them that the king would extract a tithe of 10% (I Sam. 8:15–17). The greatest bureaucratic dynasty of the ancient world, Egypt, took 20% as its tithe (Gen. 47:26). There is no Western industrial state that extracts as little as Egypt took. In fact, in most instances, substituting a tax rate of one-fifth of a nation's productivity would constitute a tax reduction of at least 50%.

Private property reduces uncertainty. It gives men an incentive to produce. It expands men's time horizons to unborn generations. It encourages economic growth by enabling innovators and workers to capture the value of their increased productivity. It encourages thrift. Being familistic in nature, it promotes the central institution of economic dominion. It allows the transfer of information, the transfer of uncertainty, and the transfer of capital to those who are willing and able to bear the economic responsibilities of ownership. The protection of private property is one of the cornerstones of civilization. The civil government is to protect private property, not steal it.

Private property is basic to God's program of dominion. It is crucial to the success of the Sinai strategy. The dominion covenant requires it. Thieves are not to be allowed to gain access to other men's lawful tools of dominion. They are not to appropriate other men's property except by voluntary contract. This includes thieves who use the ballot box as their weapon.

The rise of the messianic nation-state in the twentieth century threatened Western civilization. It remains the greatest single danger today to the preservation and expansion of familistic capital. The ideologies of wealth distribution through political coercion—Marxism, socialism, Keynesianism, and the "Social Gospel"—captured the minds of the intellectuals and political leaders of the twentieth century. While this outlook began to be reversed after 1980 and accelerated after 1991, the institutional legacy of the state interventionism rests on well-developed political constituencies, especially the elderly, who grew up in the era of the welfare state and came to rely on it for their retirement years.

The intellectual defenders of the ideal of the welfare state today are less confident than they and their predecessors were before the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. But faith in its replacement by the free market and voluntary charities is not yet widespread. Most voters remain convinced that the civil government can and therefore must protect them from major adversity. Until they change their minds regarding the competence of the state to guarantee a society-wide safety net for personal incompetence or improvidence, the masses will continue to defend the legitimacy of the politics of plunder. They will continue to affirm the modification of this commandment: "Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote."

THE VALUE OF A NAME

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor (Ex. 20:16).

The theocentric principle governing this commandment is God's testimony, meaning His imputation of meaning, relevance, coherence, and purpose to His creation. He assessed each day's work of creation, day by day, in the first week (Gen. 1). He will judge all men at the final judgment (Matt. 25:31–46). God has rendered judgment, currently renders judgment, and will render final judgment.

The context of this commandment is a courtroom, where witnesses swear an oath. The covenant oath is point four of the biblical covenant model.¹ Men are not to become false witnesses. Men, who are made in God's image, are required to tell the truth in a court of law, just as God will tell the truth on judgment day. This principle governs men's public judgments in every area of life, including economic life. Men are to make evaluations, moment by moment. Rendering judgment is an aspect of point four of the biblical covenant model. This means imputation: assessing the fit or coherence between God's law and men's actions, beginning with themselves (Rom. 7).

A. The Importance of a Name

The importance of the biblical concept of "name" can be seen in God's response to the builders of the tower of Babel (Gen. 11), when they sought to "make a name" for themselves, i.e., to define themselves and their place in the universe apart from God's revelation concerning (1) Himself, (2) the creation, and (3) His sustaining providence. God

¹ Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

scattered them for their arrogance.²

1. Family Name

Because the family's name is so important in a godly commonwealth, the Bible provides laws regulating the family's name and reputation. The preservation of a man's name through children born to his widow and his brother was the basis of the Levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5–6).³ There was a law in the Hebrew commonwealth that penalized bastardy (Deut. 23:2). This law reinforced the general prohibition against sexual activity outside of marriage (Deut. 22:21). It was unlawful for a newly married man to bring an unsubstantiated charge of non-virginity against a daughter of Israel (Deut. 22:19).

A name in Old Testament times represented power—either magical power or ethics-based dominion power. Very early in the Genesis account, men of God began to call upon His name (Gen. 4:26). Abram, upon entering the land of Canaan, built an altar to God. He moved again, building a second altar unto God, “and called upon the name of the LORD” (Gen. 12:8b). This was in response to God's original command to Abram to leave his country: “And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing” (Gen. 12:2).⁴ God changed Abram's name to Abraham —“father of nations” (Gen. 17:5)—and He changed Jacob's name to Israel (Gen. 32:27–29): the major transition point in each of their lives. A new name emphasized the magnitude of each of these turning points.

In the New Testament, the name of Jesus Christ must be invoked to enter into salvation. Peter's speech at Pentecost makes this clear. Citing Joel 2:32, Peter proclaimed: “And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved” (Acts 2:21). Baptism is performed in the name of Jesus Christ (Acts 2:38). Peter healed the lame man in the name of Jesus Christ (Acts 3:6). He attributed the man's healing to his faith in Christ's name (Acts 3:16). In a ringing affirmation of the centrality of Christ's name, Peter announced: “Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved” (Acts 4:12). To invoke the name of one's god is to invoke the power of that god. This is equally true concerning the God of the Bible.

2. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 19.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 64.

4. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 20.

When we are adopted into the family of God (John 1:12), we take on God's family name, just as Israel was referred to by God as His son (Ex. 4:22). We are called by His name, even by the world. It was at Antioch, a pagan city, that the word "Christians" was first applied to the disciples of Christ (Acts 11:26). God honors His own name. The adoption by God of the sinner, who bears the name of Satan before his adoption, transfers to him a new family name. The confrontation between Christ and the Pharisees in John 8 focused on the claim of the Pharisees to be the sons of Abraham. Christ challenged them defiantly: "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it" (John 8:44). We should not mistake the nature of Jesus' accusation: He was calling them spiritual bastards, and bastards had no place in the congregational worship of Israel (Deut. 23:2). Like father, like son: Here was Jesus' challenge to His enemies. The Pharisees, Christ affirmed, were claiming the name of Abraham illegitimately, for they themselves were illegitimate sons.

2. Character and Reputation

It should not be difficult for a Christian to understand the reason for the inclusion of the prohibition against false witness in the summary of God's law that is provided by the Ten Commandments. Bearing false witness against an individual is the same as bearing false witness against his family name. It is bearing false witness against the man's historical position in the plan of God. It misrepresents God's plan for the ages. It strikes at the key institution, the family, for it misrepresents the individual's family name. For example, when a new husband brought the accusation of non-virginity against his bride, he had to prove it in court. If he could not prove it, he had to pay a fine of one hundred shekels of silver—an immense sum—to her father, "because he hath brought up an evil name upon a daughter of Israel" (Deut. 22:19). The father's reputation could be harmed by the bad reputation of his daughter, and so could the reputation of the covenanted nation of Israel. This reputation was protected by law from false accusations.

In a godly social order, a man's name is one of his most valuable assets. When we speak of "a man's name," we really mean his reputation. His reputation as an honest person, or as a competent workman, or whatever his calling may be, must be protected by law. To impugn his name is to impugn his character. A man's character, for good or evil, must be respected. This was recognized by Shakespeare.

Good name in man and woman, dear my lord,
Is the immediate jewel of their souls:
Who steals my purse steals trash;
'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him
And makes me poor indeed.⁵

The preservation of a man's reputation is not a matter of being polite. Christ was hardly being polite to the Pharisees when he called them sons of someone other than Abraham, namely, the bastard sons of Satan. In fact, it is one sign of a godly social order that men recognize churls for what they are, and the sign of an unjust social order when they are not called what they are. Thus, Isaiah pointed to this aspect of a future reign of justice: "The vile person shall be no more called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful. For the vile person will speak villany, and his heart will work iniquity, to practice hypocrisy, and to utter error against the LORD, to make empty the soul of the hungry, and he will cause the drink of the thirsty to fail" (Isa. 32: 5–6). The American slang expression, "calling a spade a spade," reflects this concern for honest witness. It includes calling the churl a churl. A man's reputation is to be protected, including his reputation for evil, if he is still evil. Anything else lends itself to "confidence games" by "con men." We are asked to have confidence in someone who does not deserve it. The con man steals from the unwary by means of a false reputation. He cultivates this false reputation, even as the Pharisees of Christ's day cultivated a false reputation. The so-called "polite culture" is a culture that is not guided by the law regarding false witness.

We forget that names were descriptive in Bible times. "Abram," for instance, means "exalted father." "Abraham" means "father of nations" or "father of a multitude." This naming process worked negatively as well. The evil man in Judges 9:26 is named Gaal ("Loathsome") the son of Ebed ("the slave"). It is unlikely that his parents gave him this name at his birth. Perhaps Samuel (or whoever wrote Judges) gave him that name for theological reasons.⁶ A similar social phenomenon was found in twentieth-century China. Steven Mosher's fine book on the rural Chinese points this out.

5. Othello, III:3.

Another result of life-long encounters on village paths is an effortlessly acquired and altogether exhaustive fund of knowledge of each fellow denizen's finances and possessions, history and hopes, strengths and weaknesses, allies and enemies. One sign of this intimate communal familiarity lies in the revealing nicknames which Chinese everywhere assign to one another, and which I found to be uncannily accurate appraisals of a person's appearance and character. The best are truly inspired sobriquets. One brigade [Communist] Party secretary surnamed Wang is known to everyone in his village as Toad Wang, which is precisely the image evoked by his squat body and flat, powerful head, as well as by a distasteful deviousness he is known for. Then there is Cherrystone Shen, a tightfisted peddler whom, as many of his neighbors have discovered, it is next to impossible to get the best of in a deal. Some handles are obvious choices, like Big Head Yan for a man whose head is unusually large and dome-like, or Wine Rice Su for a villager who is well known for his habit of scooping only a finger of steamed rice into his bowl and then filling it up to the brim with rice liquor. Others ring unpleasantly, even cruelly, to Western ears, for instance the nickname of one Sandhead brigade official who has a severe speech impediment. He is called Cripple Mouth Lin. But when I asked Comrade Lin, as I carefully addressed him, if his seemingly disparaging appellation had ever made him angry or uncomfortable, he was perplexed. "Why should it have?" he answered mildly. "After all, my mouth is crippled." As he well knew, his nickname carried no hint of taunt or blame, but was simply the public recognition of the obvious fact of an infirmity. More generally, these names stem from the down-to-earth unpretentiousness of Chinese life, where people are seen—and identified—as what they are.⁷

B. Name-Brand Identification

When we recognize the link between reputation and performance, and where the civil magistrate enforces this link by penalizing the false witness, we can understand the economic importance of brand names. Very early in man's history, this link between name and workmanship was established. For example, the two craftsmen who helped supervise

6. I am indebted to James Jordan for these examples.

7. Steven W. Mosher, Broken Earth: The Rural Chinese (New York: Free Press, 1983), p. 33.

the construction of God's tent, the Tabernacle, Aholiab ("a father's tent") and Bezaleel ("the shadow of God"), are mentioned repeatedly in Exodus 31–38 as master craftsmen. They had reputations for competence. God specially called Bezaleel, filling him with His own spirit—in wisdom, understanding, knowledge, "and in all manner of workmanship"—that he might perform this important task in Israel's history (Ex. 31:1–5). Throughout the history of Israel, their names were associated with fine craftsmanship.

1. Maintaining a Reputation

When a craftsman knows that people recognize his work, or at least his name, he has a direct economic incentive to maintain this tradition. It takes great skill and possibly many years of struggle in the competitive marketplace for a craftsman or a producer to develop positive name-identification among his potential clientele. People learn, over many years in some instances, that a particular individual produces quality products that can be relied upon to deliver long-term service. It may take years for buyers to discover this about a man's products, since it takes time to test them in actual use. Buyers invest time and effort and money in their search for bargains. Gathering and evaluating this information is expensive. Mistakes are easy to make. The "school of hard knocks" can be a high-tuition institution for slow learners. Thus, when a product line becomes recognized as a reliable, valuable one, the producer has an incentive not to tamper with quality, since he is now the recipient of customer loyalty for his products. The recognition and acceptance given to his products by the buying public is an important capital asset. Like any capital asset, its value can plummet if the buyers begin to change their assessments. He has an incentive to keep them from changing their buying habits.

This is not to say that name-brand identification cannot be used for short-term gains at the expense of long-term gains. We are all familiar with this scenario: a firm that has developed a reputation for producing high quality goods is taken over by an outside company. The new managers decide to reduce costs by cutting the quality of inputs. The public may not initially recognize that quality debasement is going on. It takes time and experience to convince buyers that such a change in policy has been made by top management. They may conclude that their recent bad experience with a particular product is not representative of the product line in general, since the firm has such a respected name. They may not trust their own judgment. But eventually, buyers learn that the old reliability is no longer available. At that point, they may choose to switch loyalties, or remain buyers only by inducements such as price reductions by the seller. The firm can obtain short-term profits—an excess of revenues over costs—by reducing quality, but only by risking the loss of the positive name identification that the firm previously enjoyed. In other words, this sort of short-run profit comes through a form of capital depletion.

2. Specialization and Marketing

In ancient history, a family that enjoyed economic surpluses (meaning an excess of production over actual expenditures or consumption) was in a position to seek buyers for its products or services. The family could begin to increase its output by specializing. Specialization increases the division of labor, and hence it increases output per unit of resource input. As the buying public began to differentiate one product or service from competing products or services, specialized sellers could begin to invest greater quantities of capital in the enterprise. These family businesses could be more confident of selling into a stable market, since product or service loyalty among buyers was beginning to develop. The high costs to customers of shopping around, of searching for alternative product or service substitutes, make name-brand identification a convenient economic shorthand. This is as true today as it was in the ancient world.

As certain families, especially those engaged in craft production, found ways of differentiating their products from those of their competitors, they could convert this recognition in the marketplace into money or bartered goods. Perhaps a family head possessed a unique skill or special knowledge of marketing. Others may have become known for their sense of honor. These family traditions became capital assets. The family name became an early form of family capital. This was especially true among artists. With greater name identification, customers found it less expensive to identify desirable products. This helped to extend market transactions, for customers could make more purchases because of the savings that resulted from the better information to customers as a result of name-brand identification.

This analysis is a form of “hypothetical history.” We cannot find ancient family budget records that say, “Today, we saved 10% of our monthly budget because we reduced our search costs.” We know that certain craftsmen gained reputations for excellence. We then analyze this fact from the point of view of economics. We know that people want to reduce their costs of searching for bargains. We know that in the Hebrew commonwealth, the preservation of the family name was of paramount importance. Such a concern always has economic implications. We can conclude that buyers understood that producers would want to maintain their names' good reputations. Thus, buyers could adopt the "short cut" of substituting the producer's name for an involved testing of the product or an expensive search for information.

The wider the positive reputation of a seller, the wider is his market. When a product's reputation is high, additional marketing expenditures may be reduced without reducing sales. This makes international trade less expensive, just as it makes domestic trade less expensive. In foreign trade, a reputation for quality counts for even more than it does in local trade, since foreigners may have great difficulty in returning a defective product to the producer for repair or a refund. The local buyer may find it relatively inexpensive to confront the seller directly, since his transportation costs are low. Foreigners, especially in the ancient world, were not the beneficiaries of many of the advantages that domestic buyers possess. They were not citizens of the country where the producer lived. In the ancient world, this made it almost impossible for foreign buyers to gain justice in another nation's legal system, since foreigners had no legal rights, not being part of the civic religion. Thus, the reputation of the producer, or the importer-trader, was important in establishing foreign markets for the products of a nation's citizens.

We can readily understand that a close relationship between morality and the family name, between a sense of craftsmanship and the family name, or between both morality and craftsmanship and an identifying mark on the product, must have made it easier for a nation to gain an international reputation. Foreigners would learn of the high quality products produced by the citizens of some foreign culture. The reputation of that nation would be enhanced. This was true of Israel's laws:

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people (Deut. 4:5–6).⁸

What is true of a law-order is also true for products. When customers can more readily identify products that satisfy them, the efficiency of the market is greatly enhanced. The division of labor is limited by the extent of the market, Adam Smith wrote in Chapter 3 of Wealth of Nations (1776), and by increasing name-brand identification, producers thereby contribute to extending the market. Men become familiar with buying in the marketplace, which is important in the transition between a primitive society, with its low division of labor, to a modern society. Brand names transmit knowledge in an effective, rapid, and summary fashion, and knowledge is what the Bible commends again and again. Brands help customers to economize on knowledge, which is the most important and valuable of all commodities (Prov. 3:13–20).⁹

Another neglected aspect of brand names is that a brand name makes possible scientific testing by independent research organizations. Brands establish an identifiable subclass of goods (a particular product line), which can then be compared scientifically by means of random selection from this and other competing products in that same class. The performance of a randomly selected product from an identifiable company can be compared with the performance of other randomly selected products that are produced by competitors. The results of these tests may be purchased by customers. This helps customers to make cost-effective decisions about which products to purchase.

If potential competitors were allowed to adopt identical identifying marks of successful products, including even the name of the competitor's firm, the customer would find his ability to make cost-effective choices dramatically reduced, and the successful producer would be robbed of a capital asset, namely, his position in the market as a recognizable seller of desirable, familiar products. The costs of knowledge

8. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

9. By far the finest book on the economics of knowledge is Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980). Also useful is the specialized study by the legal theorist, Henry Manne [MANee], Insider Trading and the Stock Market (New York: Free Press, 1966). A bit narrow in focus, but important in dealing with the question of knowledge and the stock market, is the symposium edited by Manne, Economic Policy and the Regulation of Corporate Securities (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute, 1969), especially the essay by Harold Demsetz, "Perfect Competition, Regulation, and the Stock Market." Cf. Frederick G. Klein and John A. Prestbo, News and the Market (Chicago: Regnery, 1974).

would rise. The customer would be poorer, because his knowledge of name-brand product lines, gathered over months or years of reading or comparing brands, would be wiped out. The protection of a name by the civil government is basic to the efficient functioning of a free market society.

The fusion of identifiable product lines with free pricing (open competition) made possible modern economic life. By speeding up customers' decision-making—by lowering the costs of making decisions, in other words—name-brand identification has increased per capita wealth. Customers not only can make more rapid decisions about buying, as a result of their past experience, but advertising also reduces the time and trouble associated with bargaining. The wider the market for information, the narrower the zones of ignorance on the part of buyers and sellers. The buyer knows more concerning the comparative offers of other sellers, while the seller knows more about the offers of competing buyers. Well-publicized prices for specific brands therefore reduce the need for “hard bargaining” between the buyer and seller—bargaining that all too often involves lying, cheating, misrepresentation, and special advantages to one party in the transaction over the other (an advantage based on better knowledge concerning market alternatives).¹⁰

C. Slander and Theft

The prohibition against bearing false witness is theocentric. Men are to give an honest account of God, God's work, and God's plan for history. The commandment requires men to adhere to the God-interpreted facts of history. The existence of this theocentric commandment against distorting the truth concerning God has created a unique property right: the right to a name. A man is entitled to his good name. Slander is therefore a form of theft. The civil government has an obligation to defend the right of an individual to use a particular name, both personal and corporate, both familial and institutional. The civil government must also defend that name against false witnesses. In doing so, the civil authorities thereby reduce customers' search costs, for the property right to a name, trademark, or other identifying mark encourages men to build up their capital by establishing good reputations for themselves. This helps to increase the sale of quality products, or price-competitive products, and it also reduces search costs for the customers. Buyers can make decisions more effectively (less wastefully) because of the availability of brand names.

10. Hard bargaining is not innately evil, but it is fraught with ethical dangers. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 26. By reducing the need for hard bargaining—itself essentially an exercise in competitive knowledge, buyer vs. seller (although force of will is also important)—the wide knowledge of economic alternatives conveyed by a free market pricing system helps reduce men's temptations in economic affairs. Reducing the cost of knowledge reduces conflicts.

The prohibition against an evil report should remind us of the proclivity of rebellious men to listen to evil, false reports, and then to spread such reports to others. The spread of lies within a rebellious, envious culture is far easier (less costly) than the spread of the truth. Men who are in rebellion against God have a vested interest in falsehood about God (Rom. 1:18–22)¹¹ and therefore also about their fellow man. There is greater demand for false rumors than there is for the truth. Men delight in twisting the revelation of God concerning Himself and His creation. There are too many volunteer agents (gossips), and the market for false rumors is wider and more easily accessible than the market for truth, with its greater precision and its comparative lack of rebellion-filled excitement. False rumors are like mistresses: more exciting initially than wives, but more deadly. This is why Proverbs compares false knowledge with harlotry (Prov. 7:6–23), and compares wisdom with the honest woman crying in the streets, ignored by the inhabitants of the city (Prov. 1:20–33).

Because men are evil, the transmission of false reports against morally upright citizens is subsidized. This subsidy by the ungodly—their preference for falsehood—reduces the per capita wealth of a society, for decisions made in terms of false information are far less likely to produce beneficial results at the lowest possible costs.

D. Advertising

Advertising is not well understood by social commentators. There has been a great deal of criticism aimed at advertising in general and the advertising industry in particular.¹² Many sorts of economic evils

11. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

12. Criticism of advertising has been a constant theme in the writings of John Kenneth Galbraith. Cf. The Affluent Society (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1958), pp. 155–58; The New Industrial State, 2nd ed. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1971), pp. 203–9, 273–74. He comments: “The educational and scientific estate and the larger intellectual community tend to view this effort [modern advertising] with disdain” (p. 293). For a self-professed Christian’s similar disdain, see Ronald Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1977), pp. 46–50. I cite it, not are laid at the door of advertising, especially the creation of new wants—wants that become “needs” in the minds of the masses. This is an odd criticism, coming as it does from educated people. What was the university, or the inventor’s laboratory, other than a means of creating hitherto unappreciated opportunities (“wants”) for those who had not previously considered them? How can we imagine the operation of the famed institution, “the marketplace of ideas,” apart from men’s quest for better arguments, more effective presentations, and improved communications? Advertising is grounded in the right of free speech. It is also grounded in the right to one’s name, which is a capital asset whose market value is enhanced by advertising.

1. Property Rights in a Name

Christian commentators have failed to recognize the biblical foundation of advertising. All advertising rests on the commandment that prohibits false witness. This commandment, as we have seen, establishes a situation analogous to a property right in a person’s name. This name can become a means of transmitting information to customers. The name “Rembrandt” on a painting conveys certain information concerning the quality of the painting. The name “Coca-Cola” conveys information concerning the taste of a soft drink. When the company changed the drink’s formula and name to “New Coke” in 1985, it suffered immediate losses. It was pressured by customers to reintroduce the discontinued drink within three months: “Classic Coke.”

Advertising’s critics object to any misuse of this property right. There are many failings of the advertising industry that are singled out. But are they really significant? Here are some of the typical complaints. “The industry creates unnecessary desires for consumer goods in the minds of the public.” (In other words, advertising does convey knowledge of opportunities or benefits that potential purchasers might otherwise have overlooked.) “The industry manipulates the buyers.” (The same way that these same advertising firms manipulate voters who elect politicians who will establish national policies, not just sell car wax. Should we therefore abolish free speech?) “Buyers are helpless to resist these manipulations.” (Just as the buyers must be helpless to decide for themselves the better political candidate. Should we there-because it is the only neo-evangelical book to take such a position, but because it is the representative book.

fore abolish free speech?) “The industry sells dreams, not reality, sizzle rather than steak.” (What else do national political party platforms sell except dreams, and how close to subsequent reality are the pre-election promises of politicians? Should we therefore abolish free speech?) “Advertising misleads buyers continually.” (Apparently, the competition of rival advertising presentations cannot offset such misleading information.) “Advertising reduces human freedom to act rationally.” (Multiple opportunities apparently are bad for human freedom.)

The reality of advertising is simple enough. As with any tool of motivation and communication, it can be misused, fraudulently used, tastelessly used, and illegally used. When a company promises something tangible (as distinguished from dreams and fantasies that no one believes logically), and then fails to deliver, the advertiser has violated the prohibition against false witness. He has promised that which cannot be delivered as promised. He has said that a particular brand offers a certain set of benefits, and it offers no such benefits. That is fraud, and it is illegal. Victims can sue in court. Prosecuting attorneys can bring charges in the name of the victims.

The point should be clear: Any property right, or human skill, or tool can be misused. What is more important is to decide who will have the right to use the tool or technique, under what circumstances, under what penalties, and most important of all, who will decide what is legitimate? No one has stated the problems more intelligently than Thomas Sowell: “The broad sweep of knowledge needed for decision making is brought to bear through various systems of coordination of the scattered fragmentary information possessed by individuals in organizations. . . . The most basic decision is who makes the decision, under what constraints, and subject to what feedback mechanisms. This is fundamentally different from the approach which seeks better decisions by replacing ‘the bad guys’ with ‘the good guys’—that is, by relying on differential rectitude and differential ingenuity rather than on a structure of incentives geared to the normal range of human propensities.”¹³ In other words, two issues—(1) the carrot and the stick, and (2) who has the authority to establish when to use the carrot or the stick—are far more important issues than the appointment of hoped-for moral giants to positions of high authority. How to coordinate knowledge? How to determine which facts are the economically relevant facts? How to devise an incentive system to encourage people to seek the proper facts and use this knowledge efficiently in order to satisfy consumer demand? These are the relevant questions.

13. Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions, p. 17.

2. Motivation

Advertising provides a means of communicating information in an effective, motivating way. Let me offer an example from my own business. When I began publishing my bi-weekly economic newsletter, Remnant Review in 1974, I wrote a promotion letter that was mailed to a specially targeted audience that was familiar with my name and my previous economic work. I received sufficient subscription income to pay for the mailing, and even show a profit. This same letter was reprinted (at zero cost to me) in a local newspaper with a circulation of over 100,000—50 times larger than the select group I mailed to originally. Total response: zero. Name-identification made much of the difference.¹⁴ Because some people knew who I was, they were willing to risk their money and subscribe. I communicated in an effective way to one group, but not to the other. Motivation and name-identification are closely linked.

What about pictures of rugged cowboys (one might say “worn-out cowboys”) that sell cigarettes? Marlboro used “Marlboro Man” (1955–62) and then “Marlboro Country” (western theme: 1963–) ads for five decades to gain and retain a large share of the world’s cigarette market. Consider what went before. From the late nineteenth century until 1954, Marlboro catered to women. In 1954, the cigarette featured a red filter tip. The company dropped this marketing strategy in 1954. The second approach, begun in 1955, was a resounding success. By 1971, the Marlboro brand was number-one in the world, up from 1% in the United States in 1954. Was either advertising approach innately immoral (setting aside the question of whether cigarettes as such are somehow immoral)?¹⁵ Has the public been misled in the latter case, but not in the former? Or are buyers somehow pleased to smoke “he-man” cigarettes rather than “she-woman” cigarettes? They were unwilling to buy red filter tipped cigarettes that attempted to sell to women. But did red filter tips convey “true” information about femininity? Was the early Marlboro cigarette more a women’s cigarette than a man’s? Or were the advertisers simply trying to position the cigarette in the market by a subtle (or not too subtle) appeal to the buyers’ imaginations?

14. Another difference: People do not expect to be asked to buy something when they read what appears to be an information article. They read ads in order to be sold. Thus, the mental switch from “information mode” to “buying mode” is not automatic. It is an expensive switch to make, unless the ad has been specifically designed to activate this switching process.

15. Two of the Marlboro Country models, who really were cowboys, died of lung cancer in the early 1990s. (<http://bit.ly/MarlboroMen>)

Is it wrong to give a customer a sense of belonging to a “special breed” of men, even when nobody believes it? Why do buyers return, year after year, to the companies that offer them illusions—harmless illusions in themselves—that buyers respond to? What possible benefit would the customer or the seller derive from an endless series of ads that announce: “This product is basically the same as all the others, but we want you to buy ours, since we like our present employment opportunities”? How exciting would that be, even though most of us know that such a disclaimer is essentially true, and that free market competition keeps most of the products within any given price range basically comparable (though not identical)?

This point cannot be avoided in marketing: the competitive structure that provides incentives for one company to improve a product, and for others to follow this lead, is heavily dependent on advertising to create the desire to buy in the minds of the readers or viewers. The advertising system, so widely criticized, is itself one foundation of the competitive system that makes “miracles” available to the public at competitive prices. The “evils of advertising,” meaning effective, motivating advertising, are absolutely fundamental to free market sales. The voluntarism that lies at the heart of the market makes necessary the conveying of information concerning new opportunities in effective packaging. Sellers cannot force buyers to buy.¹⁶

Write a newspaper column about a new book, unless it is a book review in a major publication that caters to the book-buying public, and few sales will result. Design an ad written around an extract from this review, and run the ad in the same newspaper or magazine in which the review originally ran, and sales could be considerable. Why the difference? Critics of advertising ignore the obvious: people read ads with minds open to motivation. They seldom read newspaper columns in such a way.

16. The ability of customers to resist the persuasion of advertisers is admired by Galbraith; “The power to influence the individual consumer is not, of course, plenary. It operates within limits of cost. . . . That the power to manage the individual consumer is imperfect must be emphasized.” John Kenneth Galbraith, Economics and the Public Purpose (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1973), p. 138. The title of the chapter, however, tells the story: “Persuasion and Power.”

Then there is the filtering process of the mind. People unconsciously screen out vastly more data than they notice, let alone absorb, or even less often, act upon. Habit screens out new opportunities. So do many other mental processes that we do not understand yet. Some way to “punch through” the mental veil of indifference must be found. This is what advertising is all about. It is not economically sufficient merely to inform people concerning opportunities; advertising must motivate them to act. We are not hypothetical Greek rationalists, who always do the right thing whenever we have sufficient knowledge. We are not saved by knowledge, nor are we exclusively (or even mainly) motivated by sheer intellectual awareness. We are motivated by other aspects of human personality: fear, greed, joy, hope, love, humor, imagination, respect, and the desire to be the first person on the block to own one. We are motivated by altruism, too, but you will receive far more donations to “save the children” if you include a picture of a waif and include a brief description of the waif’s plight. People respond to real-life situations or perceived real-life situations. They respond to emotions, to empathy, to the concrete—not to the abstract. They are not so ready to respond to statistical summaries of disaster-laden foreign nations. They want stories and photographs.

The Bible is the model of effective persuasion. It is not a book of systematic theology. It is a book of stories and practical letters. We read Bible stories to our children. Catechisms are extensions of these stories. The stories of Cain and Abel, Moses and Pharaoh, David and Goliath: these are God’s tools of persuasion.

3. The Non-Primacy of the Intellect

A favorite myth of intellectuals, the primacy of the intellect, is seldom taken seriously by advertisers, because advertisers know that human beings are multifaceted creatures, not just austere, pristine intellects. If you want to help the real-life victims of disasters, and you need money to do this, then you had better be prepared to abandon the doctrine of the primacy of the intellect. You must use advertising techniques that have been successful in selling soap, as well as selling political candidates, if you want to communicate your program to the oversaturated, numbed potential donor. Jerry Huntsinger, one of the most successful direct-mail fund-raisers in the world, says that once the recipient opens the envelope (and it is not easy to get him to open it), he will put it down or throw it away if you have not caught his interest within five seconds. This brief attention span is the statistical reality of direct-mail fund-raising appeals, and no repetitive chanting of the primacy of the intellect can overcome this discovery of the intellect, namely, the statistical results of direct-mail appeals for funds.

Thus, to judge the legitimacy of advertising strictly in terms of the myth of the primacy of the intellect, is to misjudge the validity of advertising. If some statistically significant (meaning revenue-generating) portion of the buying public is responding to a “manipulative” advertising campaign, the proper response is not to call the state in to ban the campaign, but rather to allow the predictable free-market response, namely, for other sellers to enter the market with a similar “manipulative” campaign. Just as the answer to a “manipulative” prosecuting attorney’s presentation is an equally “manipulative” defense attorney’s presentation, so the answer for “manipulative” advertising is open entry to a competing advertising campaign. The important issue is not the presence of supposedly manipulative elements in advertising, but rather the open entry of competitors into the marketplace. The only known alternative is a statist nightmare of regulatory activities by entrenched, monopolistic bureaucrats. This price is too high.

4. Behavioral Economics

Economists are great believers in the final authority of the intellect. The economist’s conception of the model known as economic man, the rational calculator, is at the heart of modern economics. Yet that model is beginning to unravel. When the first edition of this book appeared, that was not true, but in the 1990s, the model began to be challenged by a new school of thought within the profession, called behavioral economics.

Psychologists at long last began to penetrate the thinking of a handful of economists. They began to conduct experiments that undermined a few economists’ confidence in men’s commitment to their own rational self-interest. Here, I must invoke the only known law of sociology: “Some do. Some don’t.” Economists disagree with psychologists, who reciprocate. Also, members of each group do not agree with members of their group. But, as of 2011, some psychologists argue that the brain is divided into the limbic and paralimbic systems, which deal with emotions, and the analytic system, which is centered in the frontal and parietal cortices. The analytic system handles the rules of whatever environment a person finds himself in. It is future-oriented and rules-oriented. The limbic system is present-oriented. In other words, here is scientific physiological evidence of the ancient rational-irrational dualism.

There are experiments by psychologists that do point to physiological causes of this dualism. Certain decisions are accompanied by brain activity that can be monitored through brain scanning techniques, such as magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). Research subjects are offered a choice: $20 now or $23 in a month. Some will take $20 now. Limbic system activity is visible on-screen. But if the choice is between $20 in two weeks and $23 in a month, hardly anyone chooses $20. The limbic system ceases to influence the decision, since both choices are in the future. Those experiments that are economics-oriented have led to a branch of economics called neuroeconomics.¹⁷

Economists are now discovering that such emotions as vengeance, envy, and the fear of betrayal influence decision-making. In repeated experiments, one of two players is given money to divide between both players. Player A makes an offer to divide the money. If player B accepts the offer, each player gets what he has agreed to. If player B rejects the offer, neither player gets any money. In thousands of trials, with different stakes, the results are predictable: player B will reject any offer lower than 30%. The A players sense this, and so they usually offer 40% to 50%. Here is the kicker. If player B believes that a computer has made the offer, he is likely to accept less than 30%.¹⁸ Yet traditional economic theory says that a rational person will accept anything rather than receive nothing. "You can't beat something with nothing." Yet, where envy or resentment at being offered an "unfair" offer is concerned, people do prefer nothing to something. This is real-world economics. This is acting man, not economic man.

Behavioral economists have discovered that the ways in which offers are presented, not simply the net economic return, influence people's choices. They are just beginning to accept the reality that advertisers have known for a century: people respond to emotion. A South African bank ran tests of a series of offers to previous borrowers. The bank offered lower-interest loans. But the bank tested to see what motivated borrowers. It found that by including a photo of a bank employee in the offer, more people took out a loan, even at a rate of interest higher than that offered to people whose offer did not include a photo. If the photo was of a woman, men were willing to borrow at five percentage points higher. This information has stunned economists.¹⁹ It did not stun me. I have written too many direct-response ads.

17. "Neuroeconomics," Harvard Magazine (March–April 2006), p. 54.

18. Craig Lambert, "The Marketplace of Perceptions," ibid., p. 93.

One of the major economists in the field of behavioral economics is Harvard University's Sendhil Mullainathan. He commented on what advertisers and Austrian School economists have always known.

We tend to think people are driven by purposeful choices. We think big things drive big behaviors: if people don't go to school, we think they don't like school. Instead, most behaviors are driven by the moment. They aren't purposeful, thought-out choices. That's an illusion we have about others. Policymakers think that if they get the abstractions right, that will drive behavior in the desired direction. But the world happens in real time. We can talk abstractions of risk and return, but when the person is physically checking off the box on that investment form, all the things going on at that moment will disproportionately influence the decision they make. That's the temptation element—in real time, the moment can be very tempting. The main thing is to define what is in your mind at the moment of choice.²⁰

He defined "purposeful" as "thought-out choices." He still did not escape from the mythology of the primacy of the intellect. His economic analysis did not incorporate purpose as non-financial. His economic theory is only beginning to comprehend man as a decision-maker who is not an analytical calculator devoid of emotion and sin.

He and his colleague Andrei Shleifer wrote a detailed study of financial advertising. They discovered that the ads paralleled the state of the stock market. The advertisers did not try to educate investors; they designed their ads to match the present opinions of the targeted audience. Any advertiser could have told the professors that no one can afford to finance an ad campaign that runs counter to the targeted audience's beliefs.

The two economists recognized that persuasion and rhetoric are linked. They admit in the abstract of their article: "Persuasion is a fundamental part of social activity, yet it is rarely studied by economists." The traditional theoretical model discusses advertising as the presentation of objectively verifiable information. The behavioral model sees persuasion as matching the audience's existing beliefs.²¹ Rhetoric is central, meaning symbolism and emotion. Economists generally have not grasped what I recognized in 1992: The tripartite biblical hermeneutic of grammatical-historical, theological, and symbolical corresponds to the medieval trivium: grammar, logic, and rhetoric. These three factors are at the heart of the direct-response advertising industry. An ad must have a powerful offer that appeals to the buyer's self-interest: grammar. It must offer proof: logic. It must appeal to the emotions: rhetoric.²² To understand mankind, we must move beyond the myth of the primacy of the intellect.

19. Ibid., p. 57.

20. Idem.

21. Sendhil Mullainathan and Andrei Shleifer, "Persuasion in Finance," Third Draft (Oct. 2005).

E. Imputation and Value

To name something is to define it. To define it is to impute meaning to it, to assess its relevance and role in a larger scheme of things. To impute meaning is to evaluate something objectively external in terms of coherent, internally self-consistent objective standards. There must be an objective relationship between historical events and fixed ethical or value-based standards. There must also be a way to discover and then assess this relationship. This is the meaning of imputation. The entire process of imputation is inherently subjective. A person does the naming-assessing-imputing.

1. Realism and Nominalism in Economic Theory

Modern economic theory rests self-consciously on the concept of imputed value. This was not always the case. Following Adam Smith, classical economists explained the relationship between value and price in terms of objective value, either a labor theory of value or a cost-of-production theory of value. Adam Smith taught both, although both cannot be true. We can call this the realist concept of value. Value is explained in terms of something real that goes into a product. The theory could not explain the value of a waterfall. The theory left out all of nature, which is God's creation. Has nature no value? The Physiocrats, contemporaries of Smith, explained value in terms of land. Then what of man's labor? Is it worth nothing?

In contrast to the realists were the nominalists—as always in human philosophy. Three men offered a subjective theory of value, independently and at the same time (1871–73): William Stanley Jevons of England, Carl Menger of Austria, and Léon Walras of Switzerland. They argued that men subjectively impute value to consumer goods. Men's competitive bidding against one another establishes objective prices. Thus, the basis of economic value is subjective. The basis of price is supply and demand. Value and price are related by the process of imputation.

22. Dorothy Sayers' article, "The Lost Tools of Learning" (1947), called for a restoration of the trivium, which she argued corresponds to a child's mental development: childhood, puberty, and early adulthood. Few people know that she was a professional advertiser, not just a writer of mystery novels.

The practical problem for subjective value theory was not recognized until the 1930s. If value is completely subjective, then there is no objective standard—no measure—that applies to all mankind. There is no scientific way to compare one person's value scale with another person's. There is no way for economists, as scientists, to make inter-personal comparisons of subjective utility. This implication of subjective value theory was first developed by Lionel Robbins, who had been greatly influenced by Ludwig von Mises, who in turn was an Austrian economist in the tradition of Menger. Robbins came up with this argument in response to the argument by A. C. Pigou that a case can be made for the graduated income tax on this basis. The value of an extra unit of income is less for a millionaire than for a poor person. There is a gain in total social utility when the state takes away a large portion of rich man's money and gives it to poor people. This concept is the foundation of welfare economics, which Pigou had pioneered. Robbins argued in 1932 that this argument has no epistemological validity. There is no way to measure objectively the value of a unit of income for anyone, let alone cross comparisons among people.²³ Had Robbins chosen to extend this idea, he could have challenged the very concept of an objective unit of income. If a dollar is the unit of income, its subjective value to an individual is not objectively measurable, because each penny's worth of value is subjective, and it is slightly though immeasurably less valuable than the previous penny's worth. And so on, ad infinitum.

To counter Robbins, Roy Harrod, editor of The Economic Journal, argued that if Robbins' theory were true, then it would be scientifically impossible for economists to defend or criticize any economic policy in terms of its expected or retrospective social benefits and costs. It would impossible to make scientifically valid cost-benefit analyses. This would destroy the entire field of applied economics, Harrod said. Robbins admitted in 1938 that Harrod was correct, yet he also affirmed his own faith in the possibility of rendering sound advice to the government. This was a complete retreat from his original opinion. Although he lived for over four decades after this exchange, he never explained why this retreat is epistemologically valid in terms of subjective value theory. He also did not explain why Pigou's argument is incorrect, given his retreat. On the other hand, Harrod did not explain how his view of the "economist as advisor" can be defended scientifically if subjective value theory is true, which all schools of economic theory except for Marxism affirm is true. Most economists remain unaware of this problem. They do not propose a resolution.²⁴

23. Lionel Robbins, The Nature and Significance of Economic Science, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, [1932] 1935), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

This debate within the guild of the economists is merely the application of the realist-nominalist antinomy in all human thought, a radical and (so far) unreconciled contradiction. Reason, which is said by philosophers to be common to mankind, has not yet led philosophers to discover some universal and logically undeniable common epistemological ground between the sadist and his victim. There is no way to measure—to evaluate scientifically—the quantity of pleasure. So, there is no way to ascertain the quantity of pleasure received by a person who gets pleasure by inflicting pain on someone else, compared to the quantity of displeasure of the victim who has this pain inflicted on him. This being the case, is the civil government therefore logically incapable of defending laws against sadism and violence? Scientifically, the answer is yes, if we define science in terms of nominalism, i.e., autonomous men's individual understanding of the truth. There is no way to explain how autonomous individuals who disagree over these elusive first principles can draw accurate conclusions about the wisdom or illegitimacy of any social policy.

On the other hand, if we turn to realism as the basis of a solution to the philosophical problem of corporate incoherence because of individual autonomy, we find that there is no rational way to explain how individuals can discover the objective ethical or utilitarian principles by which the measurement or evaluation of any corporate policy can be made. These objective principles are said to exist, but what is missing is the metaphysical connection between them and the world of flux. What is also missing is a universal methodology for ascertaining these fixed principles.

This is why philosophers, social philosophers, and political philosophers have debated endlessly over the problem of the one and the many.²⁵ So far, neither the ontological nor the epistemological existence of the corporate one has been reconciled with either the ontological or epistemological existence of the autonomous many. Cornelius Van Til spent his career arguing that no reconciliation is possible, given the assumption of each person's autonomy from God.

24. I have covered this debate in North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5, and North, Authority and Dominion, Appendix H.

2. Covenantalism: The Biblical Solution

The biblical solution to this continuing epistemological impasse is theocentric: the ability of a Trinitarian God to impute value to His creation subjectively, an imputation based on His objective handiwork as the Creator and providential Sustainer of the creation. There is no confusion for God. There are no gaps in His understanding. His evaluation is both authoritative and comprehensive.

Christian economic theory solves the antinomy of objective value (realism) and subjective value (nominalism) by affirming covenantalism. A totally sovereign God (point one) created the world out of nothing (point two) and then placed it under law (point three). He then assessed the value of His work (point four). He has sustained the universe providentially (point five).

Man is made in the image of God. God delegates (point two) limited sovereignty to man as a steward over the creation. The individual therefore can make judgments by subjectively applying (point four) God's objective value scale (point three) to the objective affairs of men, including economics. Because the work of the law is written on all men's hearts (Rom. 2:14–15), men can make accurate preliminary evaluations of social utility.²⁶

Value is both individualistic and subjective. Men act in terms of their own value scales and preferences. Their actions are objective. God can and will evaluate these actions in terms of His own standards. "A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things: and an evil man out of the evil treasure bringeth forth evil things. But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned" (Matt. 12:35–37).

Ethical decision-making necessarily begins within a framework of individual responsibility before God. Jesus said that which is defiling in life is that which is subjective and internal, not that which is objective and external. "And Jesus said, Are ye also yet without understanding? Do not ye yet understand, that whatsoever entereth in at the mouth goeth into the belly, and is cast out into the draught? But those things which proceed out of the mouth come forth from the heart; and they defile the man. For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies: These are the things which defile a man: but to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man" (Matt. 15:16–20).

25. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007). (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

26. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 3.

God knows the relationship between what is inside a person ethically and what the person does externally in terms of his ethical first principles. "For every tree is known by his own fruit. For of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes. A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil: for of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh" (Luke 6:44–45).²⁷ Nothing is hidden to God. "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery: But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Matt. 5:27–28).

God makes interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. For example, He accurately compares the subjective value of a coin to a poor woman with the subjective value of great wealth to a rich man or group of men. "And he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury. And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites. And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all: For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had" (Luke 21:1–4).²⁸

What God can do originally, men who are made in His image can do subordinately. God holds each person responsible for evaluating the world in terms of what He has revealed to men objectively in His word, the Bible, and also what He has revealed to them subjectively in their hearts. God also holds entire societies responsible. There is corporate responsibility as well as individual responsibility, which was the message of the prophets and Jesus. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not!" (Luke 13:34).

27. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12.

28. Ibid., ch. 50.

Apart from the doctrines of the Trinity (one/many) and the doctrine of man as the image of God, the antinomy between the one and the many will persist. The imputation of value is based on objective standards of evaluation: the law of God, which is both objective (spoken by God) and subjective (spoken by God). God's law can and does correspond to objective reality, yet it is perceived subjectively. There is objective value, yet it is perceived subjectively. This applies to social theory in general and economic theory in particular. The Bible teaches methodological covenantalism, not methodological individualism (the many) or methodological holism (the one). Covenantalism is the Bible's alternative to both realism and nominalism.

For post-1870 humanistic economic theory, the doctrine of individual subjective imputation is epistemologically central. Christian economics moves the epistemological center to creation. The Creator imputes value subjectively according to His objective law and His objective handiwork. He created the universe day by day, and then imputed value to what He had accomplished at the end of each day. Then He evaluated all that He had done at the end of the sixth day. "And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day" (Gen. 1:31). Men must do the same in their covenantal-judicial capacity as responsible agents of God. Men impute value because God imputes value. Men impute subjectively because God imputes subjectively. Men also impute objectively because God's handiwork is objective. This is the reconciliation of objective and subjective value theory. It is grounded in the activities of God.

Conclusion

The free market social order is the product historically of Christian preaching and Christian institutions. By fostering respect for the family name, Christianity reaffirmed the Hebrew tradition of respect for truth. This created an atmosphere highly favorable to advertising, because producers are permitted to capture the capital value of a good reputation. Advertising in turn extended information to a much wider market. The costs of decision-making dropped, the market expanded, and the division of labor increased, thereby lowering the costs of production.

Information costs are inescapable. Men are not omniscient. The Bible warns men against the sin of presumption, the sin of seeking to be God. A godly society recognizes that information is not a free (gratuitous) good. It recognizes the need for establishing institutions that enhance the spread of accurate, motivating, and self-correcting knowledge. The West overcame this cost barrier more effectively than any society in history, because the West honored the laws protecting property, including the property right in one's name or company mark. The transmission of more accurate information through advertising, independent testing, and brand-name recognition has created the modern marketplace, with its relative lack of "hard bargaining" between buyers and sellers.

The free market transfers the competitive bargaining process to a far more fair and beneficial system: buyers vs. buyers, and sellers vs. sellers. The better the participants' knowledge of market alternatives, the less benefit one bargainer (buyer or seller) has over the other (seller or buyer). Better information protects the weaker party in any economic exchange. The face-to-face hard bargaining that characterizes the Middle Eastern bazaar or other trading areas takes too much time to conduct transactions, and it puts too great a premium on monopolistic psychological manipulation. The average buyer or seller is protected by a broadly based ("impersonal")²⁹ free market, with its highly developed systems for transmitting accurate knowledge concerning available economic alternatives.

A man's reputation must be protected, for good or evil, whether in a court of law or in the court of public opinion. Whether he is righteous or evil, efficient or incompetent, his reputation should reflect his true condition.

The jury, the church, and the free market are all institutions that render judgment. They are required by God to render righteous, accurate judgment. Rendering judgment is basic to the ninth commandment, and parallels the fourth commandment's sabbatical day of judgment by God. Evil men seek continuity not by establishing a righteous family name but instead by means of crime and false testimony. The result is a lack of rest for any society which refuses to judge men by God's standard. Where there is no true judgment, there can be no rest

29. On the proper and improper use of the word "impersonal" as it relates to the operations of the free market, see North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Ch. 1:D.

—none for the wicked, but more to the point, none for the societies that refuse to punish the wicked.

30

COVETOUSNESS AND CONFLICT

Thou shall not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his manservant, nor his maidservant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbour's (Ex. 20:17).

The theocentric issue of this law is God's ownership of the creation and His lawful delegation of ownership to individuals and organizations. As the cosmic Owner, He establishes the terms governing ownership. This is one of them.

As the tenth commandment, it is the fifth in the second pair of classifications of the Ten Commandments: kingly mode. It therefore has to do with inheritance: point five of the biblical covenant model.¹ Any undermining of a man's capital base threatens the inheritance of his heirs. A successful theft of any part of this inheritance reduces the effect of compounding over time. Theft is a way for covenant-breakers to thwart the effect of the inter-generational expansion of capital under the authority of covenant-keepers. It is an attack on this principle: "A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just" (Prov. 13: 22).

The sanctions of point four of the biblical covenant model are translated into kingdom results through inheritance. So, in the battle in history between the two kingdoms, the compounding of a covenant-keeper's capital base is a means of dominion for God's kingdom. Any attempt to thwart this expansion should be regarded as hindering God's kingdom for the sake of Satan's kingdom.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>) Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1988] 2012) ch. 5.

A. Covetousness as Uncontrolled Lusting

Covetousness, biblically speaking, refers to an illicit craving of another person's possession, including his station in life. It can also involve the actual theft of someone else's property, either by force or by fraud. Achen, a thief who stole what belonged to God's temple, explained his actions.

When I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted them, and took them; and, behold, they are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it (Joshua 7:21).

The prophet Micah explained why God was angry at Israel.

And they covet fields, and take them by violence; and houses, and take them away: so they oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage (Micah 2:2).

There is a problem in dealing with the biblical concept of covetousness. The tenth commandment groups together several forms of coveted property: a neighbor's wife, manservant, maidservant, and work animals. The problem here is trade. Why would men come together and trade if they were not desirous of purchasing each other's goods? Not every exchange is preceded by an announcement, "goods for sale." Sometimes men see an item that belongs to another, and they approach the potential seller to offer an exchange. Obviously, when men accept someone's offer to buy, they are acknowledging that they prefer to own the goods being offered by someone else. They were not committed to permanent ownership of their goods.

The sale of a wife is obviously illegal.² A man is not permitted by God to lust after another man's wife. No exchange here is legitimate. But why should the same prohibition restrict the exchange of, say, gold for work animals? Why should it be immoral to offer to buy the services of work animals on a permanent basis? True, the manservant or maidservant may be permanently associated with a particular family. The permanent slave in the Old Testament voluntarily decided to undergo the pierced ear ritual (the shedding of blood) in order to become part of a family (Deut. 15:16–17). He was unsalable. But other servants could be sold. Why, then, the prohibition against coveting these others? Bargains are made constantly, including the sale of Esau's birth-right, which Jacob unquestionably desired.³

2. The practice of selling wives at auction went on in Great Britain until the late nineteenth century. The practice was not sanctioned by the authorities, but it persisted in rural areas. Samuel P. Menefee, Wives for Sale: An Ethnographic Study of British Popular Divorce (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1981).

So, what sense can we make of the commandment? A passage in Micah throws light on the usage of the Hebrew word for coveting. Covetousness involves uncontrolled lusting, a desire that can be satisfied only by possessing the other man's property. It is the kind of lusting that is involved in adultery, where the desire cannot legitimately be fulfilled, yet it persists. It is a desire that results in lawlessness when it is not thwarted, a desire that will not take "no" for an answer. "Woe unto them that devise iniquity, and work evil upon their beds! When the morning is light, they practice it, because it is in the power of their hand. And they covet fields, and take them by violence; and houses, and take them away: so they oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage" (Mic. 2:1–2).⁴ It is the kind of desire that resulted in Ahab's unlawful confiscation of Naboth's vineyard (I Kings 21).⁵ The man with power uses that power, despite the protection given to the original owner by the biblical laws regarding property.

The prohibition against covetousness therefore does not deal primarily with envy, meaning envy in the sense of resentment against the success of others. The covetous person really is intent upon obtaining the other man's property. Covetousness, in the biblical view, is an illicit form of jealousy. The attack against the other man's property is not motivated by a desire only to tear down his property, but to confiscate it.

The covetous person resents his own station in life. Someone else possesses what he wants. He is dissatisfied with the role he is playing in God's plan. Paul condemns this resentment against one's station in life (I Cor. 7:21–22).⁶ One person desires another's good looks, prestige, or worldly possessions. He feels thwarted by his own limitations, and therefore thwarted by his environment. God has thwarted his personal development, the covetous man is asserting. The Bible teaches that the other person is working out his salvation (Phil. 2:2) or

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 26.

4. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 25.

5. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 22.

6. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

damnation before God. His property must be respected. Nevertheless, the covetous man thinks that he can appropriate for himself the fruits of the other man's labor, as if those fruits were unrelated to that man's personal responsibility before God as a steward.

B. Downward Social Mobility

Another aspect of this jealousy is overlooked by most commentators. Covetousness can also be directed downward, toward those who have fewer goods and therefore fewer responsibilities. This can be seen in the social phenomenon known as the drop-out mentality. In the late 1960's, for example, the sons and daughters of the middle classes and the wealthy were on the road, all over the Western world. They hitch-hiked, as if they were poor. They adopted the dress codes of poor people, wearing the faded blue denim jeans of field hands.⁷ They would even bleach their new, dark blue jeans, to give them an instant fade.⁸ Blue jeans became so associated with Western culture that they commanded a high price—a black market price—in Iron Curtain nations, especially the Soviet Union. Young people adopted the life style of nomads—unwashed drifters who refuse to face the responsibilities of dominion. Those with wealth and responsible callings became “primitive,” in an attempt to escape the burdens associated with economic stewardship. They wanted others to take the risks and bear the responsibilities.

The Bible prohibits men from escaping lawful callings, unless they are upgrading their responsibilities. A slave is authorized to take his freedom, if and when it is voluntarily offered by his master, either free of charge or by sale (I Cor. 7:21). The idea is to extend God's rule into every area of life, and men are not to turn their backs on this task simply because a particular calling looks as though it would involve too much responsibility. It is important for each person to evaluate his own capabilities accurately, and then to match these capabilities with his calling before God—his highest, most productive calling. God calls men to be imitators of His son, Jesus Christ, to conform themselves to

7. The original blue jeans were sold by the Levi Strauss Company during the gold rush days in California in the 1850s. Hence the almost generic name, “Levis.” The pants were marketed as being especially durable, a desirable feature in the opinion of gold miners.

8. The 1970s brought a fusion of symbols: “designer” jeans. These were blue denim jeans that bore the name of famous rich people or famous designers, and brought three or four times the price of a pair of normal blue jeans.

Christ's image (I Cor. 15:49). They are to work out the salvation that God gives them, and they are to do this with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12).⁹ This kind of steady improvement involves upward mobility: spiritual improvement above all, but also economic and social mobility. The individual may not see himself advancing economically, but over generations, the spiritual heirs of a man will advance economically. The wealth of the wicked is laid up for the just (Prov. 13:22).¹⁰ Upward mobility must be in terms of God's calling—service to God—and not simply in terms of amassing wealth (I Tim. 6:6–10).¹¹ We are to imitate godly examples (I Cor. 11:1),¹² but we are not to worry about “keeping up with the Joneses” in a purely material sense.

C. Political Covetousness

The commandment against covetousness refers to an individual who looks longingly at his neighbor's property. The beginning of covetousness is clearly the human heart (James 3:14–16). Men want goods that they have neither earned nor inherited. Their relationships with their neighbors cannot possibly be in conformity to God's law when such feelings are present in their hearts. The fact that one man possesses goods that are confiscatable in the eyes of his neighbor will disrupt their relationship. The possessor will be seen by the covetous man as an illegitimate owner, someone who has no right, under God, to maintain control over his possessions.

The commandment has implications beyond the local neighborhood. When covetousness becomes widespread, the next step is political coercion. The very usage of the words, “to covet,” implies violence. The covetous man will not limit his attempt to gain control of another man's property to an offer to purchase. Like Ahab, who was determined to gain control of Naboth's vineyard when Naboth refused to sell, the covetous man seeks to coerce his neighbor. When this cannot be done with the connivance of the police—outright oppression or theft—then he seeks to gain control of the civil government. Covetous men can join forces and encourage the civil government to adopt policies of

9. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

10. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

11. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 10.

12. North, Judgment and Dominion, ch. 14.

wealth redistribution.

The monopoly of legal violence that is possessed by the civil government can then be turned against property owners. Those within the civil government can gain control over people's assets. They can then use them personally, or inside a government bureau, or distribute them to political special-interest groups. Political covetousness is a manifestation of unrestrained desire and the threat of violence. When the civil government becomes an instrument of covetousness, its monopoly of violence increases the danger of theft. A new commandment is adopted: "Thou shalt not covet, except by majority vote." What private citizen can effectively defend his property against unjust magistrates? Naboth died in his attempt to keep that which was his by law—God's law.

The misuse of the civil government in this way is doubly evil. First, it violates the principle of responsible stewardship. Second, it misuses the office of magistrate. The spread of covetousness cannot be restrained by the magistrate when the structure of civil government is deeply influenced by political covetousness. The old warning against putting the foxes in charge of the chicken coop is accurate. When the state becomes the agent of widespread covetousness, the whole society is threatened. Waves of power struggles ensue, for each special-interest group recognizes that it must gain control of the primary agency of wealth redistribution. The more power that is offered to the controllers by means of statist coercive mechanisms, the more ferocious is the struggle to gain access to the seats of power. Central planning rewards ruthlessness. F. A. Hayek spoke plainly concerning the awful implications of unlimited state power: the worst get on top. These two paragraphs are among the most important in the history of political theory. He describes the motivation of those who implement socialist central economic planning.

But while for the mass of the citizens of the totalitarian state it is often unselfish devotion to an ideal, although one that is repellent to us, which makes them approve and even perform such deeds, this cannot be pleaded for those who guide its policy. To be a useful assistant in the running of a totalitarian state, it is not enough that a man should be prepared to accept specious justification of vile deeds; he must himself be prepared actively to break every moral rule he has ever known if this seems necessary to achieve the end set for him. Since it is the supreme leader who alone determines the ends, his instruments must have no moral convictions of their own. They must, above all, be unreservedly committed to the person of the leader; but next to this the most important thing is that they should be completely unprincipled and literally capable of everything. They must have no ideals of their own which they want to realize; no ideas about right or wrong which might interfere with the intentions of the leader. There is thus in the positions of power little to attract those who hold moral beliefs of the kind which in the past have guided the European peoples, little which could compensate for the distastefulness of many of the particular tasks, and little opportunity to gratify any more idealistic desires, to recompense for the undeniable risk, the sacrifice of most of the pleasures of private life and of personal independence which the posts of great responsibility involve. The only tastes which are satisfied are the taste for power as such and the pleasure of being obeyed and of being part of a well-functioning and immensely powerful machine to which everything else must give way.

Yet while there is little that is likely to induce men who are good by our standards to aspire to leading positions in the totalitarian machine, and much to deter them, there will be special opportunities for the ruthless and unscrupulous. There will be jobs to be done about the badness of which taken by themselves nobody has any doubt, but which have to be executed with the same expertness and efficiency as any others. And as there will be need for actions which are bad in themselves, and which all those still influenced by traditional morals will be reluctant to perform, the readiness to do bad things becomes a part to promotion and power. The positions in a totalitarian society in which it is necessary to practice cruelty and intimidation, deliberate deception and spying, are numerous. Neither the Gestapo nor the administration of a concentration camp, neither the Ministry of Propaganda nor the S.A. or S.S. (or their Italian or Russian counterparts), are suitable places for the exercise of humanitarian feelings. Yet it is through positions like these that the road to the highest positions in the totalitarian state leads.¹³

Hayek's book was intended to demonstrate how totalitarian societies develop out of the attempt by socialist planners to mold the economy into a centrally directed framework. He argued that, in socialist theory, nothing must deviate from the central economic plan, since human freedom will thwart any such plan. Thus, the power to redistribute wealth in accordance to some preconceived central plan eventually destroys human freedom and therefore thwarts personal responsibility to act as a steward under God. Covetousness, when legislated, becomes a major foundation of totalitarianism.

13. F. A. Hayek, The Road to Serfdom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1944), pp. 150–51.

Hayek's little book evoked outraged cries of "foul!" from statist intellectuals when it first appeared in 1944. Herbert Finer's Road to Reaction (1948) is perhaps the best example.¹⁴ But, year by year, decade by decade, The Road to Serfdom has grown in stature, until it is now considered a classic. It stays in print. From the beginning, it served as the financial backbone of the University of Chicago Press' paperback division. In contrast, almost no one remembers Herbert Finer.¹⁵ In the mid-1980s, four decades after the Road to Serfdom appeared, and a decade after Hayek won the Nobel Prize in economics, academic opinion leaders began to catch up with the wisdom of the average book buyer, who made Road to Serfdom a best-seller in 1944. (It even appeared in the Reader's Digest in 1945 as a condensed book.)¹⁶ After the fall of the Soviet Union (1991), Hayek's position became part of the conventional wisdom. He died in 1992.

D. Beyond the Tithe

The civil government is to be restrained by biblical law. The warning of Samuel against the establishment of a human kingship stands as a classic statement of what earthly kingdoms involve. The king will draft sons to serve in his armed forces. He will conscript daughters to serve as cooks and confectioners. He will confiscate the best agricultural land. He will impose a tithe on the flocks. In short, the king will collect a tithe for himself (I Sam. 8:11–19).¹⁷ The Hebrew state, Samuel promised, will be such a burden on them that they will cry out to God to deliver them, but He will not do it (v. 18). By denying God and His law-order, the Hebrews placed themselves under the sovereignty of man, and this sovereignty was centralized in the civil government. It is an ungodly state that demands tax payments as large as ten percent, God's tithe, let alone a state that requires more than God's tithe. Such a state has elevated itself to the position of a god. It is a false god. It is demonic.

Civil governments ever since World War I have found that a "mere ten percent" is not sufficient to finance massive programs of domestic and international wealth redistribution. Virtually all modern Western

14. By then, they both taught at the University of Chicago.

15. His Wikipedia entry is a stub (2012).

16. <http://bit.ly/HayekRoadRD>

17. North, Disobedience and Defeat, ch. 14.

civil governments impose taxes of over 40%—national, regional, and local—which is twice that imposed by the tyrannical bureaucracy of Egypt (Gen. 47:23–24). The allocations for welfare programs—wealth redistribution—are at least double the combined allocations for national defense and the law enforcement system. What we saw in the twentieth century was the creation of a universal system of legislated covetousness. Biblical law was ignored, even as Christians have ignored the principle of the tithe.¹⁸ Steadily, political freedoms were removed. The after-tax income of the citizenry has been reduced systematically, leaving men with fewer resources to use in stewardship programs of voluntary charity. The civil government has steadily supplanted churches and voluntary associations as the primary agent of charity—a compulsory charity which is in fact a form of state-operated serfdom. The difference is this: The non-working servants (welfare recipients) are controlled by the state,¹⁹ and the working servants who support them are also controlled by the state. Massive, unrelenting political covetousness has led to universal enslavement.

E. Social Co-operation

When men do not trust their neighbors, it becomes expensive for them to co-operate in projects that would otherwise be mutually beneficial to them. They hesitate to share their goals, feelings, and economic expectations with each other. After all, if a man is known to be economically successful in a covetous society, he faces the threat of theft, either by individuals or bureaucrats. He faces the hostility of his associates. He faces others on a regular basis who are determined to confiscate what he has. The obvious response is to conceal one's success from others. But this also means concealing one's economic expectations. Planning becomes clothed in secrecy. The planning agency of the family limits its goals. Disputes between families increase, since families cannot easily co-operate under such circumstances. The future is a topic of discussion only in vague terms, except in the privacy of family economic planning councils. The social division of labor is thwarted, and the future-orientation of communities is drastically reduced, since men refuse to discuss plans openly.²⁰

18. Gary North, Tithing and the Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1994). (<http://bit.ly/gntithing>). Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2011)

19. Star Parker, Uncle Sam's Plantation (Nashville, Tennessee: WND Books, 2003).

20. What Schoeck wrote concerning envy applies equally well to legislated covet-

Bible commentators are conspicuously vague about the precise meaning of covetousness. They link it with theft, especially Ahab's theft of Naboth's vineyard. They link it with envy in the sense of resentment. But one insight that Charles Hodge offered, which was followed by Herman Hoeksema, is this: above all, covetousness is discontent with one's position in life. Hodge wrote: "Thou shalt not inordinately desire what thou hast not; and especially what belongs to thy neighbor. It includes the positive command to be contented with the allotments of Providence; and the negative injunction not to repine, or complain on account of the dealings of God with us, or to envy the lot or possessions of others." Hodge did not have in mind any other-worldly or mystical rejection of property. As he said in the next section: "The command to be contented does not imply indifference, and it does not enjoin slothfulness. A cheerful and contented disposition is perfectly compatible with a due appreciation of the good things of this world, and diligence in the use of all proper means to improve our condition in life."²¹ He cited Philippians 4:11: "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." He could have continued quoting Paul's words: "I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4:12–13).²² Any external condition is acceptable to the man who is content with his present role in God's plan for the ages. But owning little is usually the condition against which men rebel. Paul is clear on this point: "But godliness with contentment is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment let us be therewith content" (I Tim. 6:6–8). The rich have many temptations (I Tim. 6:9–10).²³

Hodge saw the other aspect of covetousness: envy. Again, I think this aspect is overemphasized in explaining this verse, although the ousness: "Ubiquitous envy, fear of it and those who harbour it, cuts off such people from any kind of communal action directed towards the future. Every man is for himself, every man is thrown back upon his own resources. All striving, all preparation and planning for the future can be undertaken only by socially fragmented, secretive beings." Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior, trans. Glenny and Betty Ross (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, [1966] 1970), p. 50.

21. Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology, 3 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1872] 1960), III, p. 468.

22. North, Ethics and Dominion, ch. 23.

23. North, Hierarchy and Dominion, ch. 11.

fact that commentators have focused on it in the past testifies to the historical importance of Christian preaching against envy, even though in the context of the tenth commandment it is not completely appropriate. Hodge's words show that he fully understood the meaning of envy as resentment, and that he distinguished this aspect of envy from covetousness as the desire to confiscate another man's property for one's own use. "The second form of evil condemned by this commandment is envy. This is something more than an inordinate desire of unpossessed good. It includes regret that others should have what we do not enjoy; a feeling of hatred and malignity towards those more favoured than ourselves; and a desire to deprive them of their advantages. This is a real cancer of the soul; producing torture and eating out all right feelings. There are, of course, all degrees of this sin, from the secret satisfaction experienced at the misfortunes of others, or the unexpressed desire that evil may assail them or that they may be reduced to the same level with ourselves, to the Satanic hatred of the happy because of their happiness, and the determination, if possible, to render them miserable. There is more of this dreadful spirit in the human heart than we are willing to acknowledge. Montesquieu says that every man has a secret satisfaction in the misfortunes even of his dearest friends. As envy is the antithesis of love, it is of all sins that most opposed to the nature of God, and more effectually than any other excludes us from his fellowship."²⁴ It is clear that Hodge regarded envy as the most dangerous of all the sins. It was this kind of preaching, generation after generation, that made possible the economic development of the Protestant West. It was the absence of such preaching in the twentieth century that damaged the economic institutions of Western capitalism—the source of the West's productivity.

Hoeksema also identified covetousness as discontent.

The sin of covetousness is the desire to possess anything apart from God, against His will; anything that he does not give me and that evidently He does not want me to have. . . . If the sin of covetousness could be rooted out of society, most of our economic problems would be solved. Covetousness is the root of all the sinful unrest in society. The same is true of international life and relationships; if the sin of covetousness were not so deeply rooted in the heart of the depraved man, most wars, if not all, would be eliminated. Take covetousness away, and there would be no reason for men to fly at one another's throats, and you could hardly conceive of the possibility of war. . . . Positively, this means, of course, that the tenth commandment enjoins us to be content with what we have. Christian contentment is perfect satisfaction with what one has, for the sake of God in Christ Jesus our Lord, and that, too, in the midst of a corrupt and covetous world.²⁵

24. Hodge, Systematic Theology, III, pp. 464–65.

Hoeksema was correct: Discontent is the heart of sin's problem, beginning with Satan's discontent with God's sovereignty. Discontent is an aspect of all sin, for if men were contented with righteousness and the fruits of righteousness, they would not rebel against God. Covetousness is a specific form of discontent: the desire to possess another's goods at all cost, including the other man's loss. As Matthew Poole, the Puritan commentator, wrote in the seventeenth century, covetousness is the "inward and deliberate purpose and desire of a deceitful or violent taking away of another man's goods; but this is forbidden in the eighth commandment."²⁶ Theft is forbidden; covetousness is the inward desire that leads to theft or fraud. It is the evil desire that overwhelms the law's restraint on the sinner, the desire to have another man's property, whether or not the other man benefits from the transaction. Voluntary exchange offers the other man an opportunity. He may not have known of the opportunity. He may not have known of a person's willingness to part with some resource in order to obtain what he, the owner, possesses. It is not immoral to offer another person an opportunity, unless the opportunity is innately immoral (such as offering to buy his wife's favors). Covetousness is the lawless desire to take the other man's property, whether or not he finds the transaction beneficial. When covetousness is common, men lose faith in their neighbors, in the social and political structure that protects private property, and in the benefits offered by the division of labor. Covetousness threatens the very fabric of society.

The tenth commandment was given to us so that we might enjoy the fruits of social peace and social co-operation. This is equally true of the earlier commandments. The law-order of the Bible is a means of reducing conflict and extending the division of labor. Greater efficiency becomes possible through the division of labor. Whatever contributes to social peace thereby tends to increase per capita productivity, and therefore per capita income. People have an economic incentive to co-operate. The Bible's prohibition against covetousness increases social co-operation by reducing its costs. In other words, more co-operation is demanded because its price drops. One of the social institutions that results from such a prohibition is the free market. It, too, is an institution that furthers social co-operation.

25. Herman Hoeksema, The Triple Knowledge: An Exposition of the Heidelberg Catechism, 3 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Reformed Free Publishing Association, 1972), III, pp. 427–28.

26. Matthew Poole, Commentary on the Whole Bible, 3 vols. (London: Banner of Truth Trust, [1683] 1968), I, p. 160.

It is significant that the prohibition against covetousness begins with the mind of man. There is no means of enforcing any civil law against thoughts, but God's law applies to men's thoughts. Because the very concept of covetousness involves the threat of violence and oppression, the outworkings of covetousness can be controlled by civil law, assuming the civil government has not been corrupted by a philosophy of universal legislated covetousness. The costs of policing the visible manifestations of covetousness are high. By focusing on the hearts of men, the Bible reduces the costs of law enforcement.

Men are to be taught from an early age that covetousness is a sin against God. These instruction costs are to be borne initially by the family (Deut. 6:7). By making men aware of God's hostility to covetousness, teachers of biblical law reduce the need for heavy taxation, either for law enforcement against visible, coercive oppressors, or for programs of legislated covetousness, i.e., "social welfare" programs. By helping to increase the social division of labor, the internalization of the law against covetousness helps to increase per capita output, also reducing thereby the proportion of income going to support law enforcement. The society is blessed in two ways: reduced crime, including the crime of statist wealth redistribution programs, and increased output per capita. Men wind up with more wealth after taxes. They increase their opportunities for responsible action before God and men.

F. The Modern Welfare State²⁷

The twentieth century, after the outbreak of World War I in 1914, abandoned the tenth commandment. Divorce and remarriage of the sinful partner became common events. Men today covet their neighbors' wives. They covet their neighbors' goods. (Coveting a man's goods is certainly less of a threat to the integrity of his family unit than the coveting of his wife.) The rise of massive taxation, including the inflation tax, has led to the spread of covetous political programs. The graduated income tax, with its increasingly burdensome rates of taxation for those with higher income, has been proclaimed in the name of social justice, even Christian social justice.²⁸ Nevertheless, the combination of graduated income taxation, the psychology of debt, and the control of money by the state and its licensed agents, the banks, led to relentless taxation of the middle classes.²⁹ Men are tempted to vote for more wealth redistribution programs, and then they are tempted to pay for them by means of monetary inflation. This enables both individuals and the state to repay loans with depreciated money. "A little inflation" seems to be beneficial in the early years, since it fosters an economic boom.³⁰ It involves the destruction of the creditors' interests, but who cares about creditors?

27. The phrase "welfare state" first attained prominence in 1949, wrote historian Sidney Fine, and has come to be associated in the United States with the administration of President Harry Truman, 1945–53: Sidney Fine, Laissez Faire and the General Welfare State: A Study of Conflict in American Thought, 1865–1901 (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Ann Arbor Paperback, [1956] 1964), Preface.

Yet most middle-class citizens are creditors. When they vote, they may not fully understand this, failing to grasp its implications for their economic futures, but they are creditors nonetheless. They hold paper certificates of ownership for future payments of paper money. They extend mortgages to home buyers, they invest in pension programs, they buy cash-value life insurance, and they buy annuities. Worst of all, at least before the public catches on, they own long-term bonds, especially government bonds. The economist, Franz Pick, called government bonds "certificates of guaranteed confiscation." The result is the universal expropriation of these classes of investors when mass inflation strikes. Everyone is pushed into higher income levels, which means that people are forced to pay a higher percentage of their nominal (meaning their paper money-denominated) incomes to the state. The result of these three features of economic life—graduated income taxes, universal debt, and fiat money—is the eventual de-capitalization of the middle class. Yet it was the middle class in the twentieth century that voted for these programs of legislated covetousness. They set a trap for the rich, but inflation subsequently made them nominally rich. God will not be mocked.

28. John C. Bennett, who taught ethics at Union Theological Seminary in New York, and who served as president of that institution, wrote concerning needed social reforms: "The third reform is changes in the tax system that would close loopholes for the rich and in many ways bring about a more equal distribution of wealth. The adoption of the idea of a progressive income tax was in itself an early breakthrough of great importance." Bennett, The Radical Imperative: From Theology to Social Ethics (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1975), p. 153.

29. James Dale Davidson, The Squeeze (New York: Summit Books, 1980).

30. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. XX. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

Christians will someday read about the twentieth century and will marvel at the unwillingness of Christian intellectuals to challenge the economic policies of the welfare state. Worse: Christian intellectuals all too often defended such policies, or even called for an expansion of them.³¹ Future generations will not understand why programs of legislated covetousness were not decried as violations of the tenth commandment. They will be astounded to learn that spiritual leaders in every nation not only approved of such policies, but actively sought to have them enacted into law. The ethics of anti-biblical humanism permeated the thinking of twentieth-century Christians, so that the opposition to compulsory wealth redistribution programs generally did not come from Christian leaders, but has come from humanists who were defenders of nineteenth-century economic liberalism—a perspective that itself was a secularized and Darwinian version of biblical social ethics.³²

What has been called “the climate of opinion” in any given era is a powerful social force. This is why it is imperative that Christians develop and implement a systematically biblical social philosophy. Because Christians have neglected this critically important task, the secularists have taken the lead in setting the climate of social opinion. This climate of opinion has subsequently influenced the thinking of Christian intellectual leaders. The dominant conclusions of the god of humanism, autonomous mankind, have become the standards for Christian thinkers and policy-makers.

Not all Christian scholars are socialists, of course, but a favorable attitude toward the welfare state is a widely held opinion in Christian circles. Most Christians insist that any economic framework is acceptable to God (other than one based explicitly on biblical law), just so long as Christians have the right to preach the gospel of personal salvation. But they are faced with a theoretical question: By what standard can a Christian legitimately conclude that all economic frameworks are acceptable to Christ? Furthermore, if any and all social and economic frameworks are legitimate before God, then in what way can the preaching of the gospel influence the social institutions of the day? How can these institutions be reformed? And if they do not need reform, how is it that rebellious, sinful men have succeeded in creating social institutions that are not in need of reconstruction? How, in short, can Christians avoid constructing a social order on the shifting sands of warring humanist philosophies, special-interest groups, power-seekers, and contradictory social and political programs? Is the Bible irrelevant to social institutions?

31. See, for example, Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study, 2nd ed. (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity, 1981). For a refutation, see David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 4th ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>). See also the essay by John Gladwin, in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity, 1984), and my response to his essay. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

32. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Appendix B: “The Evolutionists’ Defense of the Market.”

Conclusion

Social peace is a major goal of biblical law—the social peace demanded by the prophet Isaiah: “They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea” (Isa. 11:9). The juridical foundation of such peace is biblical law. The Ten Commandments serve as the basis of long-term, God-blessed social peace.

One important aspect of biblical social peace is the absence of covetousness—in the hearts of men, in the relationships between neighbors, and in the legislation of civil governments. A covetous person’s discontent with his station in life makes it impossible for him to have personal peace. This lack of personal peace spreads to society as a whole when covetousness becomes universalized through the political process. Where political covetousness reigns, there can be no social peace. There also cannot be personal freedom.

The covetous person disrupts social peace, just as the satanic magician and thief do. The sinner covets that which he has not lawfully earned or lawfully inherited. Nevertheless, he wants the other man’s patrimony or inheritance. He may not steal it outright, but he lusts after it.

The tenth commandment is framed in terms of neighboring families. It implies that peace must begin at home. The peace-breaker begins locally. The covetous man wants the other person’s house, wife, and goods. He cannot lawfully have all of these, and even the goods must be bargained for. The jubilee year in Israel guaranteed that the house would eventually return to the lawful family heirs (Lev. 25), and the law against adultery protected every wife. The eighth commandment protected men's goods, although goods could be exchanged. The lawful heirs inherited. The tenth commandment therefore parallels the fifth, which is also concerned with the question of legitimacy and inheritance, although the seventh and eighth commandments also add their force to the tenth.

The dominion covenant requires men to obey God's laws of inheritance. To gain social peace, these laws must be honored. The lack of social peace in the modern world testifies to the unwillingness of men, as mandated through covenantal institutions, to respect God's laws of inheritance. The modern world has institutionalized covetousness politically.

CONCLUSION

Ye shall therefore keep my statutes, and my judgments: which if a man do, he shall live in them: I am the LORD your God (Lev. 18: 5).

The Ten Commandments set forth God's laws of life. They do not provide life, but they set forth the standards of life. This is why Jesus Christ came to earth to fulfill the terms of the law (Matt. 5:17–19).¹ Without His willingness and ability to obey these laws, in time and on earth, God would not have granted eternal life, or even temporary earthly life, to any law-breaker. Jesus Christ's perfect obedience in history is the foundation of God's common grace to the world.²

These ten laws were presented to the Israelites by God in the form of a covenant treaty.³ Men inescapably live in terms of covenants: either before God or before Satan, and always with each other. Thus, these laws of life are necessarily covenantal laws, both social and personal, both general and particular.⁴ What are the covenantal goals of God's laws of life in society? Social peace and economic blessings: "peace and prosperity." There is no other way to interpret Deuteronomy 28:1–14: The list of external and internal blessings is comprehensive. Furthermore, the list of cursings is long and threatening: Deuteronomy 28:15–68. What we need to understand is that God's Bible-revealed law-order is intended to create conditions leading to peace, harmony, and wealth.

The Ten Commandments also lay down the religious, legal, and economic foundations that are necessary for the creation and long-term maintenance of a free market economy. In other words, obeying

1. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), pp. 358–70.

2. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

3. Meredith G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1975), pp. 113–71.

4. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

the basic principles of the Ten Commandments is both necessary and sufficient for the creation of a capitalist economy. Humanistic free market economists reject the first assertion—“necessary”—since they want a free market without God, while “Christian” socialist theologians reject the second—sufficient—since they want God without a free market.

Whenever the Ten Commandments are enforced by all agencies of human government, men will gain freedom. Economic freedom of contract and freedom from excessive taxation and bureaucratic interference produce that social order that we call the market society. This is why the Christian West was the first society to create national and regional economies called capitalistic. This is why long-term economic growth came originally only in the West, and then in those nations that have traded with the West and have imitated some of its institutional and legal arrangements. But if the goal of the Bible is social peace under God’s covenants, and if the free market economy has been not only the logical result of the Ten Commandments but also the historic product of Christianity, then a controversial conclusion follows: Biblical social order and free market capitalism are a “package deal.” Societies cannot attain the kind of long-term, compounding expansion that is required by the dominion covenant without the social, moral, and legal foundations that are established by law in the Ten Commandments. Humanistic free market economists refuse to believe this, and so do “Christian” socialists.

A. The Ten Commandments and Capitalism

The Ten Commandments as a unified whole offer mankind the moral basis of a progressive society. I am not arguing that it is only the eighth commandment, with its prohibition against theft, that sets forth such a view of private ownership. The Ten Commandments have provided mankind with the deeply theological faith that has produced Western prosperity.

God as sovereign over the creation⁵

Faith in the healing power of God’s law⁶

Personal stewardship before God and other men⁷

5. Chapter 21; Chapter 23:A:1,3.

6. Chapter 21:D–F.

7. Pages 317, 350, 424, 198–203, Chapter 28:I.

Legal responsibility for one's actions⁸
 Faith in permanent laws⁹
 Faith in economic cause and effect¹⁰
 Faith in ethical power over magical power¹¹
 Faith in work rather than luck¹²
 Faith in the productiveness of rest¹³
 Faith in the covenantal family (family name)¹⁴
 Optimism concerning the future (linear history)¹⁵
 The possibility of compound economic growth¹⁶
 Defense of the private ownership of both the means of production and the fruits of production¹⁷
 Future-orientation¹⁸
 The sanctity of covenants and the analogous and derivative legitimacy of contracts¹⁹
 Social co-operation through private contracts²⁰
 The illegitimacy of covetousness and envy²¹
 The legitimacy of civil government as a monopolistic agent of law enforcement, but not wealth redistribution²²
 Penalties against slander as theft²³
 Salvation by grace, not law (or legislation)²⁴

When we compare these premises with the underlying premises of backward societies, we find almost a perfect reverse image. The society of Satan also has first principles. A list of the major "tenets of backwardness" was provided by P. T. Bauer, a specialist in developmental economics, and a devout Roman Catholic. He did so in one sentence.

8. Chapter 22:C:1–2.

9. Pages 306, 210–11.

10. Pages 306–8.

11. Pages 322, 324–26, 328–29.

12. Pages 339–40, 421.

13. Pages 363–64.

14. Pages 375–76, 403–6, 444–45, 458–59, 463.

15. Pages 332, Chapter 25.

16. Chapter 22:C, 342–44, 380–85.

17. Chapters 7, 8.

18. Pages 341–43, 397–98.

19. Chapter 23:D–E.

20. Pages 409–12, 439–41.

21. Chapter 20.

22. Pages 383–86, 431–35, 450–54, 488–92, 498–501.

23. Pages 458–59, 467–68.

24. Pages 312, 454.

Examples of significant attitudes, beliefs and modes of conduct unfavourable to material progress include lack of interest in material advance, combined with resignation in the face of poverty; lack of initiative, self-reliance and a sense of personal responsibility for the economic future of oneself and one's family; high leisure preference, together with a lassitude often found in tropical climates; relatively high prestige of passive or contemplative life compared to active life; the prestige of mysticism and of renunciation of the world compared to acquisition and achievement; acceptance of a preordained, unchanging and unchangeable universe; emphasis on performance of duties and acceptance of obligations, rather than on achievement of results, or assertion or even a recognition of personal rights; lack of sustained curiosity, experimentation and interest in change; belief in the efficacy of supernatural and occult forces and of their influence over one's destiny; insistence on the unity of the organic universe, and on the need to live with nature rather than conquer it or harness it to man's needs, an attitude of which reluctance to take animal life is a corollary; belief in personal reincarnation, which reduces the significance of effort in the course of the present life; recognized status of beggary, together with a lack of stigma in the acceptance of charity; opposition to women's work outside the household.²⁵

I have not seen a single sentence that more comprehensively describes the mental outlook of primitivism, whether in Africa or the sociology department of an American university.

1. Haters of the West

When I cited this passage in an essay defending free market capitalism,²⁶ "radical Christian" Art Gish was outraged: "It troubles me then that North expresses an elitist, if not racist, view that Western values are superior to Third World values, that the Third World is poor because of its ignorance. This is not only arrogant; it is also un-biblical."²⁷

25. P. T. Bauer, Dissent on Development: Studies and debates in development economics (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1972), pp. 78–79.

26. Gary North, "Free Market Capitalism," in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views on Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter Varsity Press, 1984). (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>) This essay is reprinted in Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), Appendix E.

27. Art Gish, "A Decentralist Response," ibid., p. 78. I ask: Was Moses arrogant and unbiblical when he instructed the Israelites to kill every Canaanite in the land (Deut. 7:2; 20:16–17)? Was he an "elitist" or (horror of horrors) a racist? No; he was a God-fearing man who sought to obey God, who commanded the Israelites to kill them all. This sounds like a "superior attitude" to me. Of course, Christians have been given

This, of course, is a total misrepresentation of my views. I do not believe that ignorance is the Third World's problem. The Third World's problems are religious: moral perversity, a long history of demonism, and outright paganism—including especially socialistic paganism (post-1960). But I can well understand why Mr. Gish was troubled by my analysis; he himself had adopted the “more-poverty-per-capita program” of the Third World and zero-growth pagans. When he was confronted with the economic curses that God has poured out on such pagans, he was troubled. (He should have been be terrified.)

He correctly criticized my arrogance. When it comes to pagan societies and pagan world views, there is no question about it: I am arrogant about the superiority of Christianity. Mr. Gish then got to the point: “I wonder why North quotes Bauer’s long list of attitudes which are opposed to capitalistic development. He seems unaware of the extent to which Jesus and the biblical prophets stand condemned by that list. I wish North could see the demonic and destructive nature of Western values. . . . I am shocked that North would suggest that we go to the Third World and preach ‘the culture of the West.’ I thought we were to preach Jesus and him crucified. Or is capitalistic affluence the same as the way of the cross? Apparently, North believes thrift, education, development and responsibility will save. I don’t. I believe the biblical vision stands in fundamental opposition to ‘the culture of the West.’”²⁸

Mr. Gish was certainly forthright. He was unafraid of aligning himself with the culture of the Third World. He was not neutral in the slightest. He hated Western civilization. He recognized that the West was originally the civilization of capitalism, and that large sections of it are still capitalistic, and therefore he hated it. He refused to admit that the culture of the West, prior to its secularization in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, was the product of Christianity. He also refused to admit that the poverty of the Third World is the product of its anti-Christian background. In an orgy of guilt, he called us to adopt the poverty-stricken life style of Third World paganism in the name of Jesus.

It is remarkable that self-styled “radical Christians” are surprised no comparable military commandment in New Testament times, but I am trying to deal with the attitude of superiority—a superiority based on our possession of the law of God. This attitude is something Christians must have when dealing with all pagans. God has given us the tools of dominion.

28. Ibid., pp. 78–79.

to learn that God hates ethical rebellion, and that He brings earthly judgments against pagan societies. The God of the Bible sends ethical rebels to the eternal miseries of the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14). What is earthly poverty, sickness, and political oppression compared to eternal damnation? It makes me wonder if these “radical Christian” critics of capitalism and the West believe in a God who sends people to eternal fire. Of what concern is poverty for a few decades compared with perpetual fiery torment? The God of the Bible is the God of incomparable negative sanctions. Why should any Christian imagine that God owes covenant-breaking mankind wealth rather than poverty?

2. Embittered by Guilt

Mr. Gish’s problem was the problem that he shared with a whole generation of Western intellectuals: too much reliance on endless criticism and too much guilt. This attitude is beginning to paralyze the West. Revel’s comments are on target: “Not only do democracies today blame themselves for sins they have not committed, but they have formed a habit of judging themselves by ideals so inaccessible that the defendants are automatically guilty. It follows that a civilization that feels guilty for everything it is and does and thinks will lack the energy and conviction to defend itself when its existence is threatened. Drilling into a civilization that it deserves defending only if it can incarnate absolute justice is tantamount to urging that it let itself die or be enslaved.”²⁹ This guilt-induced self-flagellation is made even easier for humanism-influenced “radical Christians.” By failing to understand and rest upon the doctrines of definitive sanctification and progressive sanctification, they have become guilt-ridden and impotent. Definitive sanctification teaches that Jesus’ perfect moral life is imputed to His followers at the point of their conversion. Progressive sanctification teaches that regenerate people are required by God to work out their salvation with fear and trembling in terms of biblical law, even though they are imperfect in and of themselves. Their imperfect work is accounted righteous because of their definitive sanctification. It builds up over time, until the day of final judgment and final sanctification.³⁰

But “radical Christians” do not understand these doctrines. They are visibly overwhelmed with guilt concerning their own ineffective-ness and the supposed ineffectiveness of “Christianity” in not putting a stop to the “moral evil” of capitalism. They have also been overwhelmed by the seeming impossibility of godly dominion. After all, we live in a sinful world. We are sinful. So how can we—pitiful, guilt-ridden worms that we are—take dominion? Aren’t we sinful perpetrators of injustice? Aren’t we the sinful religious accomplices of the evil elite which rules (and profits from) the greedy and corrupt capitalist system? Oh, let us escape to the communal farm, where the morally polluted efficiency of mass-producing, price-competitive industrialism is kept out of our sight (even though we benefit from it 24 hours a day)! Oh, let us refuse to fight in wars to defend our miserable freedoms, even if a foreign nation should invade.³¹ Oh, let us be delivered from this corrupt and capitalist world! Oh, oh, oh!

29. Jean-François Revel, How Democracies Perish (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1984), p. 10.

30. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), pp. 48–52.

Above all, they crave escape. This is why they are progressively impotent. This is why their movement is doomed intellectually and doomed historically. These people will be bypassed, either by dominion-oriented Christians or power-oriented humanists, but they will be by-passed. They will not determine any civil government’s policy. They will be able only to wring their hands on the sidelines of life, telling everyone how guilty they feel and how guilty we ought to feel for not joining them on the sidelines. At most, they will cheer on the statist politicians every time the latter try to pass a tax increase for the higher income brackets. This is the politics aptly described by Rushdoony as the politics of guilt and pity.³²

B. Capitalism’s Critics Within the Church

There were two major intellectual movements within twentieth-century Christianity that were utterly hostile to capitalism: the Social Gospel movement and the “radical Christianity” or “liberation theology” movement. The first was prominent from the late nineteenth century through the 1950s. The second group came into prominence in the late 1960s and especially in the 1970s. (Art Gish was a representative of the second group.) Both groups hate capitalism with all

31. This was the pacifist recommendation of Ron Sider and Richard Taylor with respect to Russian Communism, even though, as they admitted, “hundreds of thousands, perhaps even millions might die” as a result of nonviolent resistance. Ronald J. Sider and Richard K. Taylor, Nuclear Holocaust and Christian Hope (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1982), p. 281.

32. Rousas J. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995). (<http://bit.ly/rjrpogap>) their hearts—not just the secular version of nineteenth- and twentieth-century capitalism, but every manifestation of capitalism in history. They hate the premises of capitalism. Yet these premises are essentially biblical, derived from the Ten Commandments. Thus, the critics of “capitalism in general are inescapably also haters of the law of God. This is my conclusion, based on long years of study, both of the economics of the Bible and the published manifestos of the Christian socialists.

1. Socialism's Pessimism

With the visible failure of socialist economies to “deliver the goods,” the underlying religious presuppositions of capitalism's critics—including the “secular” critics—have become clearer. In the nineteenth century, capitalism's critics heralded socialism as the next stage in the economic progress of mankind. Capitalism was more efficient and productive than ancient slavery or medieval feudalism, Marx and others readily admitted,³³ but they believed that socialism would escalate the rate of progress and per capita wealth. That vision is now dead, outside of Western universities; it lies buried in the ashes of the socialist experiments of the twentieth century.

The promoters of secular evolutionary socialism were confident people. They believed that they would eventually be victorious. The Social Gospel movement picked up this humanistic optimism. It was therefore future-oriented and optimistic. Its members confronted capitalism as if they were in the vanguard of the next stage of human history. They believed in the state, and they sought to transfer power to the state, especially national government. They saw themselves as social revolutionaries—nice, well-meaning, well-fed, humanitarian, and above all risk-free revolutionaries of the sanctuary. The sanctuary was just that for them: a place of refuge. But it was to serve as headquarters for a co-ordinated program (they hoped) of coercive social transformation.

A good example of this satanic misuse of the sanctuary is provided by Nathaniel Weyl, in a footnote in his book on Karl Marx. In the 1940s, he reported, “when I was the leader of the radical movement on the Columbia University campus, I was invited to become an honorary member of the Atheists' Club at adjacent Union Theological Seminary. I asked rather naively how an honorable man could accept an appointment to the ministry if he didn't believe in God. The reply was that the pulpit provided a captive audience, a position of authority and a regular salary—all most useful to socialist and Communist propagandists. I declined the invitation."³⁴ This is the humanists' strategy that I have called "capturing the robes."³⁵

33. See especially the summary of the economic revolution of modern capitalism in Part I of the Communist Manifesto. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, “Manifesto of the Communist Party” (1848), in Marx and Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, [1969] 1977), I, pp. 109–10.

I wrote the following in the 1986 first edition of this book:

That older optimistic socialism, both secular and "Christian," is pretty well gone today. Its optimism was drained by the experiences of power. The European socialist economies are becoming basket cases.

In 1988, Soviet Premier Gorbachev admitted publicly that the Soviet Union was economically bankrupt. He went begging in foreign banking and government circles for more aid. In 1989, the Berlin Wall went down. The Soviet Union's Eastern European satellites broke free and publicly abandoned Marxism. In 1991, the Soviet Union committed suicide and ceased to exist.

In the United States, the hard realities of the Presidency of Lyndon Johnson—he was crass, calculating, coercive, and above all, unstylish—removed much of the political liberals' hope in the older faith. Furthermore, the rise of alternative theologies undermined the older theological liberalism: politically pessimistic (Reinhold) Niebuhrism, non-rational Barthianism, and New Age transcendentalism. The spiritual odyssey of Harvard theology professor Harvey Cox is representative, though somewhat flamboyant: from outright secular humanism (old liberal-style rationalism) to irrationalism to liberation theology.³⁶ Cox was the leading theological weather vane of the decade, 1965–75, and every four years, he switched positions.

In place of the old secular socialism has arisen a new critique of capitalism. Capitalism is evil, we are now informed by the critics, because it is too growth-oriented. Economic growth is a liability.³⁷ More than this: Economic growth is a sin. We find the “simple life style” people advocating on principle a reduced division of labor and lower per capita income, especially for rich nations—that is, the nations in which guilty readers can afford to buy mass-produced, low-cost paperback diatribes and monthly magazines.

34. Nathaniel Weyl, Karl Marx: Racist (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1979), p. 67.

35. Gary North, Backward, Christian Soldiers? An Action Manual for Christian Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), ch. 7. (<http://bit.ly/gnback>)

36. Harvey Cox, The Secular City: Secularization and Urbanization in Theological Perspective (New York: Macmillan, 1965); The Feast of Fools: A Theological Essay on Festivity and Fantasy (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1969); The Seduction of the Spirit: The Use and Misuse of People's Religion (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1973).

Paralleling the transformation of the secular socialists, the church has produced “radical Christianity,” sometimes known as “liberation theology.” In some senses, these are two different movements. The latter movement tends to be more Marxist; the former is more likely to be made up of Anabaptist pacifists. Sometimes their memberships overlap. The more hard-core liberation theologians tend to be Roman Catholic. The radical Christians are usually Protestants: neo-evangelicals, sometimes Reformed (seminary professors and younger seminary graduates), and especially Anabaptists.

We find so-called radical Christians (who are openly the spiritual heirs of the radical Anabaptist sects of the sixteenth century) espousing the “small is beautiful” philosophy of “neo-Gandhian” E. F. Schumacher, author of Buddhist Economics, as well as Small Is Beautiful. Schumacher’s recommended economic system is consistent with his religious presuppositions. The “radical Christians” are either inconsistent with theirs (Christianity), or else they are consistent with their true presuppositions (anti-Christianity), but dishonest in revealing publicly their true commitment. In any case, what the critics of capitalism—all the critics of capitalism—hate is the thought of a literal, comprehensive application of the Ten Commandments in society.

2. A Two-Gods Theology

These “radical Christians” are invariably implicit defenders of some version of the “two-gods” theory that Marcion and other early church heretics promoted. They contrast the views of Jesus with the views of Moses. They hate Old Testament law with a passion. They argue that there is some fundamental dualism between the Old Testament and the New Testament. They reject the Old Testament and proclaim the New Testament—a New Testament that is now conveniently stripped of its Old Testament foundations. (In this sense, they are not significantly different from modern pietists, dispensationalists, and conservative antinomians, who also assume a radical dualism between the Old and New Testaments.) Then, in the name of this “pure and undefiled” New Testament, they attack anyone who dares to appeal to passages in the Old Testament that sanction private ownership and individual responsibility. The Old Testament, it seems, is only to be used when you are looking for passages that support modern socialist revolutionism or modern pacifism. In credibly, some “radical Christians” support both. “Why is it that conservative Christians have such difficulty with the New Testament?” asked Mr. Gish. “They either ignore it, as North does, or try to explain it away.”³⁸ My relevant but incomplete response would be to throw back this contrast: Why do “radical Christians” have such difficulty with the Old Testament? Why do they ignore it, as Mr. Gish did, or try to explain it away?

37. E. J. Mishan, The Costs of Economic Growth (New York: Praeger, 1967); Mishan, The Economic Growth Debate: An Assessment (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1977).

But the significant answer to Mr. Gish’s rhetorical questions is to point out that the difference between Jesus and Moses was a difference in historical circumstances: Moses was waiting for the younger generation of Israelites to become a military force (so hated by the “radical Christians”). He was waiting to invade Canaan militarily. God had instructed Moses to exterminate the Canaanites and establish Israel’s kingdom in the long-promised territory. In contrast, Jesus established a new set of tactics, because the Holy Spirit would come at last and lead God’s people out of the narrow geographical confines of Palestine and into confrontation—religious confrontation, not military confrontation—with the world.

Jesus, like Moses, was preparing His people for a fight. It is a fight that involves self-discipline. As was true in Moses’ day, it involves multiple covenantal organizations: church, state, and family. Initially, Jesus called on poor men to begin the fight. But Jesus has always called His followers, whether rich or poor, to victory. He has called them to exercise dominion in terms of His Father’s law. This long-term strategy of dominion has never changed. Redeemed mankind’s fulfillment of the dominion covenant is supposed to produce a unique society, simultaneously a garden and a city. This new civilization will operate in terms of God’s law, by means of God’s grace.

The possibility of such a society is rejected by “radical Christians.” The hatred of God’s law by “radical Christians”—from the late medieval peasant and artisan rebellions³⁹ to the Evangelicals for Social Ac-

38. Wealth and Poverty, p. 77.

39. Norman Cohn, The Pursuit of the Millennium: Revolutionary messianism in tion—is so total that they assert as forever binding the low-output Christian lifestyle of rural Israel in A.D. 30. But this has never been the Bible's perpetually normative social order. What Jesus was talking about was precisely what Moses was also talking about: a strategy of long-term dominion—in economics, in politics, in law, in public health, and everything else. This strategy remains the same throughout history. There was a shift in both tactics and geography with the coming of the church, but not a change in strategy. What Jesus was offering was comprehensive redemption.⁴⁰

The Social Gospel's advocates saw correctly that Jesus was a revolutionary, in the sense that He offered a program for comprehensive social change. He did exactly that. But they incorrectly modeled His revolution along the lines of the Fabian socialist movement in Britain.⁴¹ They argued that Jesus was an advocate of economic growth and development, as well as an advocate of external progress. Yet when we read the words of Jesus, we find that He did not discuss such issues.⁴² It was Moses, not Jesus, who proclaimed economic growth as an ideal for society. Only to the extent that Jesus implicitly retained the worldview of the Mosaic law that such a program of economic development can be associated with His ministry. The Social Gospel theologians wanted nothing to do with the Mosaic law. So, they interpreted Jesus' ministry to fit their model of evolutionary socialism.

The failure of socialist policies to produce economic progress has necessitated a change in strategy for the advocates of statist social change. Today, the spiritual heirs of the Social Gospel movement—radical Christians—are calling for the same old sectarian Anabaptist medieval and Reformation Europe and its bearing on modern totalitarian movements (New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1961); Igor Shafarevich, The Socialist Phenomenon (New York: Harper & Row, [1975] 1980), ch. 2.

40. Gary North, "Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VIII (Summer 1981). Reprinted in Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

41. On Fabianism, see Margaret Patricia McCarren, Fabianism in the Political Life of Britain, 1919–1931 (Chicago: Heritage Foundation, 1954) (<http://bit.ly/McCarren-Fab>); Rose L. Martin, Fabian Freeway: High Road to Socialism in the U.S.A., 1884–1966 (Boston: Western Islands, 1966), which was based on the voluminous research in McCarran's unpublished manuscript, The Fabian Transmission Belt. (<http://bit.ly/MartinFab>) revolutions: either some version of common-ownership communalism down on the farm, or else the expansion of power of the state to redistribute wealth by compulsion. What makes their present appeal unique in our day is that both scenarios are defended by a call for this revolution in the name of a vision of poverty, which is the one thing that socialism always produces in abundance. They defend their vision in the name of the simple life style—a life style without a high division of labor, mass production, price competition, computers, automobiles, jet planes, and similar high-technology tools of dominion.

42. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012); Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012).

Richard K. Taylor, who co-authored the InterVarsity Press book with Ronald Sider on why we should disarm the United States of all weapons, unilaterally if necessary, wrote an article in the other side (July-Aug. 1974), a journal of radical Christianity, entitled, the imperative of economic de-development. (The editors at the other side did not use capital letters in the old days.) Taylor concluded: "It is imperative that we de-develop the American economy, while encouraging the growth of the poorer nations economies to a level of ecologically sound adequacy, in which basic needs for food, clothing, housing, and medical care are met." Question: Who will decide for Third World national leaders precisely what ecologically sound adequacy is? Who will tell them, "Stop, you've had enough!" when they reach these predetermined levels? Who will determine just how much state-enforced de-development America needs? Over whose dead body? Here is a proposal guaranteed to produce social war, endless envy and resentment, and perpetual confrontations. In short, here is a proposal that will make Satan proud of his success in turning men's eyes away from the Ten Commandments.

"When I get to dreaming about this," Taylor said, "I see Christians leading a movement of tremendous significance. I see Billy Graham walking from one crusade to another rather than flying in a jet. I see him cutting his wardrobe to one suit, and hear him preaching on Mark 10:23 and I Timothy 6:7–10. I see the church going back to the Gospel ideal of humble poverty." What I see is a bunch of well-fed, pampered, and tenured social utopians out in a field during the day, trying to feed themselves without tools, and spending the evening writing their economic manifesto on papyrus with their goose quills and ink. Radical Christianity is anything but a movement of tremendous significance. It is a temporary phenomenon of guilt-ridden, public school-educated, socialism-peddling, suicidal, retreatist poverts.⁴³ They are self-consciously advocates of zero-growth impotence. As a movement, they will undoubtedly achieve their goal. They are going nowhere, for they are low-capital nomads without a known destination. The radical Christianity of the neo-Anabaptists is a classic contemporary manifestation of escapist religion.⁴⁴ They propose programs that inescapably produce social conflict, but always in the name of social peace and social justice. They propose programs that lead inescapably to cultural impotence, but always in the name of relevance and importance. If they had any serious economic ideas or any likelihood of becoming influential leaders politically or even intellectually, we would call them wolves in sheep's clothing. They are goats in sheep's clothing.

These radical Christians serve the political left in the same capacity that the old fundamentalists⁴⁵ and pietists long served the humanist establishment: as dogmatists of social impotence. They are as hostile to the theonomic vision of capitalist Christianity as the old fundamentalists were hostile to the Social Gospel's vision of socialist Christianity. Both groups come up with the same answer: The Bible offers no economic blueprints. They are equally incorrect.

C. The Ten Commandments and Western Development

The Ten Commandments provide a strategy. I call it the Sinai strategy. It is neither a power strategy nor an escape strategy. It is a dominion strategy. It is a strategy for not staying poor, either individually or socially. It is a strategy that was first delivered by God to a rabble of ex-slaves who were about to begin a 40-year wandering in a wilderness, precisely because they rejected God's strategy of worldwide dominion. It is a strategy based on covenantal subordination under God, both personally and corporately, and calls for dominion over creation, both personally and corporately. A radical theologian of the "old liberalism," John C. Raines, recognized this impulse in John Calvin: "Calvin understood the Christian life not as 'a vessel filled with God' but as an active 'tool and instrument' of the Divine initiative. But this is precisely our point. Active toward the world, the Christian knows 43. Povert ("PAHvurt), noun: "A person who promotes poverty as a way of life for everyone, but with everyone else starting first." The term was coined by Louis Bulkeley.

44. See Part 1, Introduction.

45. North, Backward, Christian Soldiers?, ch. 4: "Fundamentalism: Old and New."

himself as utterly passive and obedient toward God, whose Will it is his sole task to discover and obey."⁴⁶ Unlike Raines, Christians find God's will in the Ten Commandments.

The Ten Commandments, wherever respected, have produced remarkable economic growth and social progress. This includes the much-maligned Middle Ages. The medieval era was a period of remarkable technological change and economic growth.⁴⁷ The earlier transitional period (400 A.D. to 1100 A.D.) to the late medieval era (1100 A.D. to 1500 A.D.) has been labeled the "Dark Ages" ever since humanist Renaissance ("rebirth") scholars invented the phrase. The period came as a result of the collapse of Roman civilization. It was a period of economic growth, though irregular. Economic historian Robert Latouche said that it is incorrect to assume that the Christian world had contracted by comparison to the ancient world, because we always look at the Mediterranean world of Augustus and compare it to northern Europe eight hundred years later. The point is, northern Europe improved its economic position under Christianity compared with what it had been in classical times.⁴⁸ He also noted that one of the elements fostering stagnation was pessimistic millennialism: "By continuing to prophesy that the end of the world was approaching, it created an atmosphere of indifference to the natural and physical sciences which promoted worldly well-being and happiness, and which in the tenth century were still suspected of being inspired by the devil."⁴⁹ He might have added the negative effects of this shortened time perspective on capital accumulation. Such a time perspective raises interest rates by heavily discounting the future.

Furthermore, the progress of medieval civilization was not limited to economics and technology. The Papal Revolution of 1076–1150 created the legal foundations of Western civilization.⁵⁰ In that same period, Christians invented the university.⁵¹ A great revival of learning

46. John C. Raines, "From Passive to Active Man: Reflections on the Revolution in Consciousness in Modern Man," in John C. Raines and Thomas Dean (eds.), Marxism and Radical Religion: Essays Toward a Revolutionary Humanism (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1970), p. 114.

47. Lynn White, Jr., Medieval Technology and Social Change, 2nd ed. (New York: Oxford University Press, [1962] 1966).

48. Robert Latouche, The Birth of the Western Economy: Economic Aspects of the Dark Ages (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1956] 1966), p. 306.

49. Ibid., p. 304.

50. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983).

51. Charles Homer Haskins, The Rise of the Universities (Ithaca, New York: Cornell took place after the year 1100.⁵² The triumphs in architecture, most notably the great cathedrals but also the castle fortresses, are not denied by anyone.

The coming of the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century transformed European thought and culture, politics and economics. Max Weber's thesis, that the Protestant ethic led to the civilization-wide extension of a spirit of capitalism and entrepreneurship, was correct.⁵³ Critics note that there was a spirit of capitalism in late medieval Italian trade cities. There was, indeed, but the attitude that characterizes capitalism did not spread to Europe as a whole. It did under Protestantism. One reason was Protestantism's opposition to holidays. There were about 150 holy days under Mediterranean Catholicism. There were only Sundays and a few prayer days under Calvinism. This made a huge difference in comparative rates of economic growth over the centuries.

Without Christianity, there would never have been modern science, as the voluminous (and generally ignored) researches of French historian Pierre Duhem and American scholar Stanley Jaki have demonstrated.⁵⁴ An large body of scholarly literature has built up that indicates the close relationship between the rise of Calvinism-Puritanism and the rise of modern science.⁵⁵

The Christian worldview created the foundations of Western civilization—foundations that are now being eroded by humanism. The antinomian (anti-biblical law) pietist tradition of withdrawal, non-involvement, and internal "spirituality" cannot withstand this erosion process.⁵⁶ When Christians lose faith in five essential biblical doctrines University Press, [1923] 1965).

52. Christopher Brooke, The Twelfth Century Renaissance (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1970).

53. Attempts to refute Weber have been numerous, but even after a century, the bulk of his thesis holds up well to specific criticisms. See Gary North, "Weber's 'Protestant Ethic' Hypothesis," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Summer 1976). A good general introduction to the question is collection by S. N. Eisenstadt (ed.), The Protestant Ethic and Modernization (New York: Basic Books, 1968).

54. Stanley Jaki, The Road to Science and the Ways to God (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978); Science and Creation: From eternal cycles to an oscillating universe (Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, [1974] 1980).

55. For a survey and analysis of a portion of this literature, see E. L. Hebden Taylor, "The Role of Puritan-Calvinism in the Rise of Modern Science," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VI (Summer 1979); Charles Dykes, "Medieval Speculation, Puritanism, and Modern Science," ibid.

56. Christianity and Civilization, 1 (1982): "The Failure of the American Baptist Culture." (<http://bit.ly/CAC1982>)

—the sovereignty of God, the self-sufficiency of the infallible Bible, the Bible-revealed law of God, the predictable corporate sanctions of God in history, and the victory of God’s people in time and on earth—they find themselves nearly defenseless (intellectually, institutionally, and culturally) against their rivals in every area of life.⁵⁷ When Christians refuse to take the offensive, they become like the Israelites of Moses’ generation: nomads without an earthly future.

Conclusion

How should Christians begin to take the offensive? By means of biblical law. In other words, we must put to good use the grace of God, which has been shown to us in Christ. We are to live by grace in terms of biblical law. We judge ourselves by our fruits, and we judge our fruits in terms of their conformity to God’s law. The Ten Commandments are the starting point today, just as they were in 1493 B.C., and just as they have been at all points in between. What I have tried to demonstrate in this book is that in the field of economics, there is no doubt: The Ten Commandments still apply. More than this: Without the principles laid down by the Ten Commandments, there is no hope for the economic future of man.

A God-blessed economic future is a future based on personal self-government under God, as evaluated by each individual (self-evaluation) and others (market evaluation) in terms of God’s revealed law. Economic justice, like economic progress, is not based on the reign of the king, the politician, or the bureaucrat. Above all, it is familistic responsibility which is the dominant force in economic life. Economic progress ultimately requires future-orientation and faith in a providential world of cosmic personalism—faith in the existence of economic order, faith in economic cause and effect. It was this confidence which created the Western economy, and only this faith can sustain it.

Humanism is losing its self-confidence, and is doomed. The question is this: Is humanism doomed historically? The Bible teaches that it is doomed historically, for Satan is doomed historically, despite the familiar eschatological teachings of the “pessimillennialists.” His defeat at Calvary definitively established his defeat in history. Nevertheless, history requires action. To establish the visible cultural manifestation of Christ’s historic triumph, Christians must first learn the truth of an old political slogan: “You can’t beat something with nothing.” Humanism's visible failures today will not automatically lead to some sort of Christian "victory by default." There is no Christian "kingdom by default." Christians cannot win by default, because men are born into Satan's kingdom (original sin). Sinners must be actively pursued—by God's Holy Spirit and by those who bring the gospel message. If Christians were passive in terms of personal evangelism, Satan's kingdom would remain unchecked and unchallenged. The same is true of cultural evangelism by Christians: no activism—no victory. Once Adam sinned, had Christ's death not atoned for man's sin, Satan could have remained passive and have been historically victorious. Satan would have won by default, had it not been for Calvary. Christ's activism conquered Satan; analogously, Christians' activism will in history conquer Satan's troops, both human and angelic. Ethics, not power, is the critical factor. Biblical law, not state power or magical power, is decisive.

57. Gary North and David Chilton, “Apologetics and Strategy,” ibid., 3 (1983).

What I am arguing is simple: There are no civilizational vacuums. There are no tie scores in the competition to build an external kingdom, whether Satan's or God's. Unless Christianity positively wins, Satan positively wins. Christianity, if it is not accompanied by a program of comprehensive Christian reconstruction, cannot triumph historically. "You can't build something with nothing." There should be no doubt in any orthodox Christian's mind that in the field of economics, the basis of such reconstruction is faith in, and obedience to, the Ten Commandments.

End of Volume 2

Volume 3: Tools of Dominion

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON EXODUS

VOLUME 3

TOOLS OF DOMINION

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

Gary North

PART 3: TOOLS OF DOMINION

An Economic Commentary on Exodus 21–22

Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus

Part 3: Tools of Dominion

Formerly: Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

2nd Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1: Part 1, Representation and Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Population Growth: Tool of Dominion (Ex. 1:5–7) | 12 |
| 2. Imperial Bureaucracy (Ex. 1:8–12) | 31 |
| 3. Rigorous Waste and Rigorous Socialism (Ex. 1:13–14) | 54 |
| 4. Illegitimate State Power (Ex. 1:15–16) | 67 |
| 5. Envy, Rumor, and Bondage (Ex. 2:11–14) | 73 |
| 6. Cumulative Transgression and Restitution (Ex. 3:21–22) | 83 |
| 7. The Optimum Production Mix (Ex. 5:5–7) | 92 |
| 8. Covenantal Judgment (Ex. 8:19) | 108 |
| 9. Original Ownership (Ex. 9:29–30) | 121 |
| 10. Total Sacrifice, Total Sovereignty (Ex. 10:24) | 129 |
| 11. Separation and Dominion (Ex. 11:7) | 137 |
| 12. Discontinuity and Continuity (Ex. 12:10–11) | 147 |
| 13. Unconditional Surrender (Ex. 12:30–32) | 184 |
| 14. The Rule of Law (Ex. 12:48–49) | 195 |
| 15. The Firstborn Offering (Ex. 13:1–2) | 230 |
| 16. The Psychology of Slavery (Ex. 14:12) | 237 |
| 17. The Metaphor of Growth: Ethics (Ex. 15:17) | 246 |
| 18. Manna, Predictability, and Dominion (Ex. 16:4–5) | 258 |
| 19. Imperfect Justice (Ex. 18:21–22) | 267 |
| 20. The Oath-Bound Kingdom of Priests (Ex. 19:3–6) | 280 |
| Conclusion | 284 |

Volume 2: Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 289 |
| 21. The God of Liberation (Ex. 20:1–3) | 305 |
| 22. Graven Images and Rival Civilization (Ex. 20:4–6) | 315 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 23. Lawful Title (20:7) | 343 |
| 24. Rest and Dominion (Ex. 20:8–11) | 359 |
| 25. Family Capital (Ex. 20:12) | 371 |
| 26. God’s Monopoly of Execution (Ex. 20:13) | 386 |
| 27. The Yoke of Co-operative Service (Ex. 20:14) | 398 |
| 28. The Rights of Private Property (Ex. 20:15) | 411 |
| 29. The Value of a Name (Ex. 20:16) | 450 |
| 30. Covetousness and Conflict (Ex. 20:17) | 477 |
| Conclusion | 494 |

Volume 3: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 513 |
| 31. Servitude, Protection, and Marriage (Ex. 21:2–4) | 541 |
| 32. Wives and Concubines (Ex. 21:7–11) | 568 |
| 33. Executing a Rebellious Son (Ex. 21:15, 17) | 598 |
| 34. Kidnapping (Ex. 21:16) | 602 |
| 35. The Costs of Private Conflict (Ex. 18–19) | 621 |
| 36. The Human Commodity (Ex. 21:20–21) | 634 |
| 37. Criminal Law and Restoration (Ex. 21:22–25) | 649 |
| 38. The Auction for Substitute Sanctions (Ex. 21:22–25) | 681 |
| 39. Freedom for an Eye (Ex. 21:26–27) | 703 |
| 40. The Ransom for Life (Ex. 21:28–31) | 716 |
| 41. The Uncovered Pit (Ex. 21:33–34) | 745 |
| 42. Knowledge and Responsibility (Ex. 21:35–36) | 755 |
| 43. Proportional Restitution (Ex. 22:1, 4) | 765 |
| 44. Pollution, Ownership, and Responsibility (Ex. 22:5–6) | 800 |
| 45. Safekeeping and Liability (Ex. 22:7–9) | 871 |

Volume 4: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|------|
| 46. Caretaking and Negligence (Ex. 22:10–13) | 895 |
| 47. Seduction and Servitude (22:16–17) | 905 |
| 48. Oppression, Omniscience and Judgment (Ex. 22:21–24) | 932 |
| 49. The Prohibition against Usury (Ex. 22:25–27) | 970 |
| 50. Impartial Justice (Ex. 23:1–3, 6–7) | 1023 |
| 51. Finders should not be Keepers (Ex. 23:4–5) | 1040 |
| 52. Bribery and Oppression (Ex. 23:8) | 1051 |
| 53. Sabbatical Liberty (Ex. 23:9–12) | 1078 |
| 54. Feasts and Citizenship (Ex. 23:14–19) | 1092 |
| 55. The Curse of Zero Growth (Ex. 23:25–26) | 1115 |

| | |
|--|------|
| 56. God's Limits on Sacrifice (Ex. 25:3–8, 36:5–7) | 1140 |
| 57. The Economics of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:8–9) | 1159 |
| 58. Blood Money, not Head Tax (Ex. 30:11–16) | 1170 |
| 59. Sabbath Rest vs. Autonomy (Ex. 35:2) | 1180 |
| 60. The Ability to Teach (Ex. 35:31, 34a) | 1186 |
| Conclusion | 1195 |
| Conclusion to Authority and Dominion | 1231 |

Volume 5: Appendixes

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology | 1255 |
| APPENDIX B–The Demographics of Decline | 1283 |
| APPENDIX C–The Labyrinth and the Garden | 1320 |
| APPENDIX D–The Rule of Law and the Free Market | 1339 |
| APPENDIX E–The Economic Implications of The Sabbath | 1364 |
| APPENDIX F–Timing the Lord's Day | 1442 |
| APPENDIX G–Macaulay on Democracy | 1447 |
| APPENDIX H–The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost | 1453 |

Volume 6: Appendixes

| | |
|--|------|
| APPENDIX I–Pollution in the Soviet Union | 1535 |
| APPENDIX J–Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney | 1543 |
| APPENDIX K–Slavery in the American South | 1557 |
| APPENDIX L–Maimonides' Code : Is it Biblical? | 1574 |
| APPENDIX M–Victim's Rights vs. the Messianic State | 1638 |
| APPENDIX N–Covenantal Law and Covenantal Love | 1679 |
| APPENDIX O–Social Antinomianism | 1695 |
| APPENDIX P–The Hoax of Higher Criticism | 1712 |
| APPENDIX Q–The Restoration of Biblical Casuistry | 1734 |
| APPENDIX R–What is Covenant Law? | 1770 |
| APPENDIX S–What are the Case Laws? | 1795 |

PREFACE

I write this Preface out of a sense of obligation. In the Table of Contents for Tools of Dominion (1990), there is this entry: Preface. In mid-2011, as I was proofreading the newly typeset Point Five Press edition, I noticed that there was no Preface in that book. The book went through its initial printing of either 3,000 or 5,000 copies. The Institute for Christian Economics published a second edition. I do not recall how many copies: at least 3,000. That was the only book in this commentary series, other than Genesis, that went into a second printing. In 21 years, no one mentioned that it was missing a Preface. This raises a question: How many people who bought it actually read it? Second, if the author did not notice, who should have noticed?

Tools of Dominion is the most intense of all of my commentaries. It covers mainly three chapters: Exodus: 21–23. The original edition filled 1,216 pages of text. The index was 70 pages long. It took me something in the range of 150 hours to compile it. I have never liked to index. That was the most burdensome index in my career. To say that there is a great deal of economic information in these three chapters is not an exaggeration.

A. The Main Issue

The main issue facing the Israelites at the time of the exodus was the conquest of Canaan. Would they or wouldn't they begin the conquest? They decided that they would not. This was the supreme issue of the Book of Numbers. Would they impose negative sanctions on the Canaanites? If not, God would impose negative sanctions on them: wandering. In Numbers 14, when the 12 spies returned, the nation decided that the 10 fearful spies were correct. The land was filled with giants. They tried to stone Joshua and Caleb, who recommended an immediate attack. God then brought a plague on the nation. They also would wander for another 38 years.

This had not taken place when God laid down the law: the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20) and the case laws that threw additional light on how these laws should be enforced (Ex. 21–23). The case laws would govern the nation when they took possession of the Promised Land.

The case laws are short and to the point. My exposition of them indicates how comprehensive they were. They condensed a great deal of economic information into a short text. They did not explain these economic principles. They covered slavery, judicial liability, judicial procedure, penalties on violence, penalties on sabbath violations, and penalties on theft.

There was no law that mandated tax-funded charity. There was no law that mandated wealth redistribution by civil law. There was nothing that could legitimately be used to justify the modern welfare state.

B. A Counterfeit Gospel

What was true of the case laws of Exodus was equally true of the laws of Leviticus and Deuteronomy. If the defenders of the so-called Social Gospel cared about the judicial texts of the Bible, they would either abandon the Social Gospel or else re-position the Social Gospel as having nothing to do with biblical law and biblical ethics. But they want to claim the prestige associated with the Old Testament in Bible-believing churches—where the money is—so they self-consciously argue two mutually exclusive positions: (1) the Mosaic economic laws do not carry over literally into the New Testament; (2) the ethical passion of the prophets is still binding in the New Testament, even though the specific Mosaic economic laws that the prophets called the nation to enforce are no longer binding. Then they present socialism, or the welfare state, or even Marxism (liberation theology) as the “true Christianity” that New Testament prophetic passion demands that Christians strive to implement. They baptize socialism in the name of the Old Testament prophets and Jesus.

This deception has gone on for over a century. It is morally corrupt. The Social Gospel is morally corrupt. There is nothing remotely biblical about the Social Gospel, whether we are discussing the early twentieth-century version¹ or the early twenty-first-century version.² Those who promote such views are wolves in sheep’s clothing.

1. C. Gregg Singer, The Unholy Alliance: The Definitive History of the National Council of Churches and Its Leftist Policies—From 1908 to the Present (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1975). (<http://bit.ly/SingerUA>).

2. Joel McDurmon, God Versus Socialism: A Biblical Critique of the New Social Gospel (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2009).

They have not gained a wide hearing inside American fundamentalist churches. They have gained only marginally more support in evangelical Protestant churches. They have drawn support from a much higher percentage of Christian college professors in the humanities and social sciences than from laymen in the pews. This has been true for over a century. This is because Social Gospel economics is essentially left-wing Progressivism (1885–1920) or far-left Keynesianism (post-1960), which is what most Christian college professors were taught in their years of higher education. Laymen can spot a spiritual counterfeit far more readily than a college professor can. Laymen have not spent their adult years submitting to state-funded and state-accredited universities in order to earn their salaries.

With respect to the Social Gospel, I remind my readers: this, too, shall pass. Liberation theology did. It sank on board the rudderless ship Karl Marx in 1991. When the modern welfare states of the West finally go bankrupt or else default on their promises to elderly voters, there will be a great moral revulsion against the welfare state and its defenders. This will include the antinomian prophets of the Social Gospel movement. I would like to think that my efforts over the last 45 years, and perhaps for another decade, will have something to do with that revulsion when it at last engulfs the promoters of the messianic welfare state.

INTRODUCTION

This is he [Moses] that was in the church in the wilderness with the angel which spake to him in the mount Sinai, and with our fathers: who received the lively oracles to give unto us: To whom our fathers would not obey, but thrust him from them and in their hearts turned back again into Egypt (Acts 7:38–39).

We are witnessing today a recapitulation of Moses' experience with the Jews of his day. Protestant fundamentalist Christians have their eyes on the sky, their heads in the clouds, their hearts in Egypt, and their children in the government's schools. So, for that matter, do most of the other Christian groups. The handful of Christian Reconstructionist authors who are serving as modern-day Stephens with respect to defending the continuing validity of biblical law experienced a response from the various ecclesiastical Sanhedrins of our day somewhat analogous to the response that Stephen's testimony produced: verbal stones. (Prior to 1986, we received mostly stony silence.)

If the modern church were honest, it would rewrite one of the popular hymns of our day: "O, how hate I thy law, O, how hate I thy law. It is my consternation all the day." But the modern church, hating God's revealed law with all its Egyptian heart, is inherently dishonest. It is self-deceived, having no permanent ethical standards to use as an honest mirror. The hearer of the word who refuses to obey, James says, is like a man who beholds his face in a looking glass, walks away, "and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was" (James 1:24b). The modern Christian refuses even to pick up the mirror of God's law and look.

A. Why an Economic Commentary?

I have explained in the Introduction to my economic commentary on Genesis why I began this project in 1973.¹ I presented there my case for the whole idea of a specifically economic commentary. Basically, my reason is this: the Bible presents mankind with a God-mandated set of social, economic, educational, political, and legal principles that God expects His people to use as permanent blueprints for the total reconstruction of every society on earth. Sovereignty and Dominion provides a model of what kind of exegetical materials can and must be produced in every academic field if Christians are successfully to press the claims of Christ on the world. After the publication of the first two commentaries on Exodus, I also edited and published a ten-volume set of books that I call the Biblical Blueprints Series, four of which I wrote.²

1. Initial presentations of my economic commentary on the Pentateuch appeared monthly in the Chalcedon Report, from 1973 until 1981.

What I want to stress from the outset is that writing this economic commentary has been very nearly a bootstrap operation. For almost two thousand years, Bible commentators—Jews and gentiles—have simply not taken seriously the specific details of Old Testament law. Despite the fact that John Calvin did preach about two hundred sermons on the Book of Deuteronomy, including its case laws,³ and that the Puritans, especially the New England Puritans, did take biblical law seriously,⁴ they did not write detailed expositions showing how these laws can be applied institutionally in New Testament times.

I found only two exegetical books repeatedly useful in writing this volume: R. J. Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law (1973) and James Jordan's Law of the Covenant (1984). Both are recent studies, and both were written by people who shared my view of how the Old Testament case laws should be read, interpreted, and applied in New Testament times. This exegetical approach is unquestionably new, especially when coupled with Cornelius Van Til's presuppositional apologetics. This is why the Christian Reconstruction movement does represent a major break with recent church history. On this point—and just about only on this one—Reconstructionism's critics are correct. We represent a discontinuity in church history.⁵ Christian Reconstructionists

2. Published by Dominion Press, Ft. Worth, Texas, 1986–87. I wrote the books on monetary theory, economic theory, foreign policy, and the introductory volume on biblical liberation.

3. John Calvin, Sermons on Deuteronomy (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, [1683, 1685] 1987).

4. Symposium on Puritanism and Law, Journal of Christian Reconstruction, V (Winter 1978–79).

5. I hope that it will be regarded by future church historians as a discontinuity analogous to the appearance of the Wycliffe movement or the advent of the Reformation rather than that other bold discontinuity, the introduction around the year 1000 of the doctrine of transubstantiation.

alone have gone to the Bible's legal passages in search of permanent authoritative guidelines ("blueprints") for what society ought to do and be. In this sense, we Reconstructionists are theological revolutionaries. If our view of biblical law continues to spread to the Christian community at large, as we expect it to do, there will eventually be a social revolution—hopefully nonviolent change, but unquestionably revolutionary. Why revolutionary? Because one of the primary manifestations of the revolutionary character of this change will be a radical and comprehensive alteration of the West's legal order.

This commentary is the foundation of my attempt to reconstruct the entire field of economics in terms of the Bible. If I did not have total confidence in the Bible, I would not even attempt such an outlandish task. It involves too great a break with the past, as well as a break with the fundamental presuppositions of the most methodologically rigorous of all the social sciences, economics. To attempt such a project, a man has to be confident. To do so as part of a movement which seeks to reconstruct every other field also requires confidence.

B. The Question of Confidence

This "Reconstructionist confidence" is frequently misunderstood. Our numerous critics view it as arrogance. Those who accuse theologians of arrogance miss the point: we are totally confident in biblical law. We are also totally confident that without biblical law, there is no way to create a self-consistent intellectual system or academic discipline. On the other hand, we are not totally confident in our specific applications of the law to real-world problems. Thus, while we acknowledge that we may be wrong in our particular interpretations, there is no possibility that we are wrong in our general intellectual strategy. King David said it well: he was wiser than his enemies, his teachers, and the ancients because of his commitment to, and continual study of, the law of God (Ps. 119:98–100). So am I, for the same reason. David had many enemies because of this confidence; so do I. So do Reconstructionists in general. But understand: ours is not self-confidence; ours is confidence in the law. However inferior our minds or intellectual skills may be in comparison to the pagan giants of the age, or even of the past, Christians have the one thing that none of them possessed: covenant theology. The more we understand God's revealed law, the greater our advantage over those who do not understand it. It is not primarily a matter of intellect; it is primarily a matter of ethics.

The task we Christian Reconstructionists have set for ourselves—the reconstruction of every intellectual discipline and social institution in terms of the Bible—has always been the task of the church as ekklesia. The more that Christians have deferred to the humanists in intellectual affairs, the more pressing this task of reconstruction has become. Philosopher Alvin Plantinga was correct: our enemies have established the operating presuppositions in every academic field. “In each of these areas the fundamental and often unexpressed presuppositions that govern and direct the discipline are not religiously neutral; they are often antithetic to a Christian perspective. In these areas, then, as in philosophy, it is up to Christians who practice the relevant discipline to develop the right alternatives.”⁶ What he neglected to mention is that when Christians within the discipline fail to develop the right alternatives—or, in the case of economics, any alternatives—then someone outside the field has to attempt it.⁷

C. Conflicting Hermeneutics

Because of our commitment to the Old Testament case laws, Christian Reconstructionists’ intentions are frequently misinterpreted. For example, Robert M. Bowman, Jr. complained: “One distressing application of theonomy by the Reconstructionists is their charge that all who reject any aspect of theonomy are ‘antinomian’ (against the law) and are pursuing ‘autonomy’ (self-law). According to Reconstructionists, it is either autonomy or theonomy; there apparently is no middle ground.”⁸

6. Alvin Plantinga, “Advice to Christian Philosophers (With a special preface for Christian thinkers from different disciplines),” Truth, I (1985), p. 11.

7. Thomas Kuhn, in his influential book, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1962] 1970), argued that the major paradigm shifts in any discipline are inaugurated by younger researchers who are either very young or very new to the field (pp. 89–90). These breakthroughs are often made by two types of researchers: skilled amateurs operating outside the guild’s disciplinary system and obscure professionals laboring on the fringes of the academic discipline. For example, Darwin was an unknown amateur naturalist who had been laboring for almost three decades outside any academic setting when Origin of Species appeared. He had come to his insights as a young man, but had not had the courage or incentive to publish his thesis until much later. Einstein was an obscure clerk in the Swiss patent office when he made his major breakthroughs in physics.

8. Robert M. Bowman, Jr., “The New Puritanism: A Preliminary Assessment of Reconstructionism,” Christian Research Journal, X (Winter/Spring 1988), p. 26.

1. Autonomy or Theonomy

He was correct with respect to the “either/or” assertion by theonomists, but incorrect regarding our concern over the acceptance of specific laws. Those who have written the major Reconstructionists books have not argued that “all who reject any aspect of theonomy are ‘antinomian’ (against the law) and are pursuing ‘autonomy’ (self-law).” Serious Bible students can, do, and will continue to disagree regarding the proper application of specific Old Testament laws, both in ancient Israel and in the present New Covenant era. Our definition of antinomianism is the principle of biblical interpretation (hermeneutic) which says, in Bowman’s correct description of dispensationalism, that “the commands of the Law are presumed to be no longer binding except where the New Testament repeats or ratifies them.”⁹ We would agree with Bowman when he concluded that “dispensationalism, technically speaking, is antinomian, though more in theory than practice; . . .”¹⁰

This is precisely the Reconstructionists’ point: most of our opponents are antinomian in theory, though not necessarily in practice (i.e., in the specific details of personal ethics).¹¹ It is not the details of the personal ethics of our critics that concern Reconstructionists theologically; rather, it is our opponents’ governing principle of interpretation regarding Old Testament law in New Testament times. Our primary theological distinctives as a movement are judicial and cultural. We do not ignore the question of personal ethics, but personal ethical issues must inevitably be dealt with intellectually on the basis of some general principle of biblical interpretation. Our principle of biblical interpretation is explicit (theonomy); that of our opponents is generally implicit (antinomianism). Our hermeneutical explicitness is now forcing our critics to respond explicitly, and this pressure bothers them. They resent it. They must give up either their antinomianism or their claims to cultural relevance as Christians. They do not want to give up either position, but they no longer have any intellectual choice. They do not like to admit this, however. It disturbs them. But if they had an answer, someone in the evangelical world would provide at least an outline of a comprehensive Christian social theory based neither on biblical case laws nor natural law theory. We are still wait-

9. Ibid., p. 25.

10. Ibid., p. 26.

11. Given the sexual scandals of television evangelists Jim Bakker in 1987 and Jimmy Swaggart in 1988, Christian Reconstructionists are sorely tempted to conclude that dispensationalism tends toward antinomianism in practice, too.

ing. It has been 1,900 years.

Their silence in this time of escalating international crises, in every area of life, in the decades immediately preceding the third millennium after Christ, is an important reason for the growing influence of Christian Reconstructionism. Their silence is costing them heavily, but so will any attempt to respond to us without offering a biblically plausible alternative worldview. You cannot beat something with nothing.

2. Dispensationalism by Any Other Name

Dispensationalists have in the past been ethically explicit, denying God's Bible-revealed law in the New Covenant era. They have been self-conscious theological antinomians. They have argued for decades that a person can be saved eternally by accepting Jesus as Savior but not as Lord, a radically antinomian and widely accepted opinion which one of their number recently criticized quite eloquently.¹² Nevertheless, most of the leading intellectual targets of our theological criticisms have publicly disassociated themselves from dispensationalism. They deeply resent being tarred and feathered by us with dispensationalism's antinomian brush, yet when they reply to our accusations, they adopt the hermeneutic of dispensationalism regarding the Old Testament case laws. This poses continuing intellectual problems for them.¹³

Their original reaction was stony silence. It took two decades for Christian Reconstructionists to gain even a hostile public reception; until the mid-1980s, our theological opponents usually played the children's game of "let's pretend": "Let's pretend that the Reconstructionists are not here, and maybe they will go away soon!" Finally, when they correctly concluded that we were not going away, some of them started their public attacks.¹⁴ Prior to this, most of them had been content with murmuring, plus spreading an occasional nasty rumor.

They adopted the second strategy: publishing hostile but brief reviews. It was too late; by 1985 we had too many books in print and too many names on our computerized mailing lists. The theological 12. John F. MacArthur, Jr., The Gospel According to Jesus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1988).

13. Cf. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Part 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>) paradigm shift was too far advanced, not to mention the paradigm itself. To call attention to us publicly has become increasingly risky, given the voluminous quantity of our books. Too many bright young Christian scholars and activists were already being alerted to our existence, and we are enlisting many of them. Yet not calling attention to us publicly made it appear as though the critics had no coherent answers.

14. I include the various academic Sanhedrins in this observation. Try to find as many as five book reviews of Christian Reconstructionist books in either Bibliotheca Sacra or the Westminster Theological Journal, 1963–88.

There has been a third strategy: attacking a brief outline or caricature of a few of the ideas of the Reconstruction movement, but without naming its leaders or any of our books. This will not work either, although it does delay the day of ideological reckoning. I call this strategy “hide and don’t seek.” The critic hides all specific references to our books, and hopes that his followers will not locate the unmentioned original sources.¹⁵

Our critics would much prefer to live in a world where they are not forced to deal with public issues in terms of a specific definition of Christian ethics, meaning specific Old Testament civil laws with their accompanying public sanctions. They wish that theonomists would go away and leave them in their ethical slumber. We won’t. That is what the 1980s demonstrated: theonomists will not go away. We will not shut up. Our critics can ignore us no longer and still remain intellectually respectable. We have written too much, and we continue to write. Fifteen years after the publication of R. J. Rushdoony’s Institutes of Biblical Law (1973), over a decade after the publication of Greg L. Bahnsen’s Theonomy in Christian Ethics (1977), there was still only one brief book-length academic reply from any critic in any theological camp: Walter Chantry’s.¹⁶ It was apparent that the professional theolo-

15. An example of this tactic is found in Charles Colson’s defense of pluralism and ethical dualism, Kingdoms in Conflict, co-published by William Morrow (secular humanist) and Zondervan (fundamentalist) in 1987. He mentioned the theonomist movement, but never named any of these “utopians,” as he called us (pp. 117–18). Why not name us? If the targets of your attack are “doomed to failure” (p. 117), why not at least identify us? If we are dead, then give us a decent Christian burial!

16. In late 1988, two critical books appeared: Dave Hunt, Whatever Happened to Heaven? (Eugene, Oregon: Harvest House), and H. Wayne House and Thomas Ice, Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse? (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah Press), to which Greg Bahnsen and Kenneth Gentry wrote a reply: House Divided: The Break-Up of Dispensational Theology (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), (<http://bit.ly/gbkgd>). A third critique appeared in 1989: Hal Lindsey, The Road to Holocaust (New York: Bantam), refuted by Gary DeMar and Peter J. Leithart, The Legacy of Hatred Continues (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), (<http://bit.ly/gdplhatred>). Gary DeMar already has co-authored one book replying to earlier criticisms by Hunt: The Reduction of Christianity (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion gians had been playing a game of “hide and go sleep.” This tactic was adopted for a decade and a half, from 1973 to mid-1988. It did not work. I find it amusing that the humanist media paid more attention to Christian Reconstruction in 2011 than the theologians have. The media ran articles on the alleged influence of dominionists, meaning Christian Reconstructionists, on three of the candidates running for the Republican nomination for President. In the case of Ron Paul, this was true, but only in the area of economic policy. I was his staff economist in 1976. Very few of the media’s reporters knew this. The media focused on Michelle Bachmann and Rick Perry. The influence was indirect if it existed at all. A Google search in September 2011 for “dominionists” and “Tea Party” produced 550,000 hits. (<http://bit.ly/DominionTea>.)

3. The Silence Is Deafening

Those few theological critics who have gone into print against us have generally been amateur theologians and imitation scholars.¹⁷ They have read a few of our newsletters and a couple of our books (if that), and then have invented the rest. They have refuted stick men of their own creation. They forget that stick men burn easily, setting aflame those who rely heavily on them. This makes it easy for us to refute them. We cite them word for word, we show that they are either deliberately lying or have failed to read more than a tiny fraction of what we have written, and then we wait for the next willing victim.¹⁸ If a critic cannot accurately summarize what his opponents have said, with direct citations from original sources to prove his point, and then refute what his opponents have said by showing that they are incon-

Press, 1988), (<http://bit.ly/gdplreduction>). A second book replies to issues raised in the April, 1988, debate: Hunt and Ice vs. DeMar and North: Gary DeMar, The Debate Over Christian Reconstruction (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988), (<http://bit.ly/CRdebate>).

17. The exception was Westminster Seminary’s Meredith G. Kline, who made the intellectually fatal mistake of attacking in print Greg Bahnsen’s Theonomy in the Fall 1978 issue of the Westminster Theological Journal. Bahnsen’s reply silenced Kline. Kline got his academic head handed to him on a platter. See Greg L. Bahnsen, “M. G. Kline on Theonomic Politics: An Evaluation of His Reply,” Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VI (Winter 1979–80), pp. 195–221. (<http://bit.ly/BahnsenKlineJCR>)

18. See, for example, my reply to Rodney Clapp’s article, “Democracy as Heresy,” Christianity Today (Feb. 20, 1987): “Honest Reporting as Heresy: My Response to Christianity Today” (1987), reprinted in Gary North, Westminster’s Confession: The Abandonment of Van Til’s Legacy (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1991), Appendix B. (<http://bit.ly/gnwc>)

sistent, ignorant, or intellectually dishonest, the critic is in no position to go into print. Yet this is what our critics have done. It has been amateur night at the critics' typewriters for the last ten years. (They resent it when I say so in print repeatedly.)

Meanwhile, we keep publishing. The longer a competent critic waits to produce a comprehensive, detailed attack on us, the more difficult his job becomes. No intelligent critic wants to become a sacrificial lamb who is subsequently exposed publicly as someone who failed to do his homework. This is why time is on our side. This is also why we are so confident in our theological paradigm. After four decades of either silence or intellectually third-rate published criticisms of our work, we are increasingly persuaded that we have the theological goods, while our critics are holding empty theological bags. This confidence on our part is occasionally visible, and it makes our critics hopping mad, so they rush into print with yet another third-rate, easily answered criticism. The prudent ones still keep their mouths shut and wait for us to go away.

Do not misunderstand me. Far be it from me to say that our critics should remain silent. I have waited for a long time to see a well-thought-out, detailed critical analysis from someone, an analysis that does not rely on lists of ideas that we do not believe and sometimes have specifically attacked (e.g., "Reconstructionists believe that the world will be transformed through political action"). A wise innovator knows the weak points in his own system. There is no man-made system without weak points. If a critic ever appears who can zero in on the weak points of Christian Reconstructionism, he will receive my respect. Better to sharpen one's skills by arguing the basic points with a competent critic than bludgeoning a long series of amateurs. What I am saying, however, is that we have yet to see even one critic who understands our system well enough to go for the theological jugular. In short, we have done our homework; our published critics have not. ("If that be arrogance, make the best of it!")

What Christian Reconstructionists argue is that virtually all schools of biblical interpretation today, and too often in the past (excepting only the Puritans), have been far closer to dispensationalism's hermeneutic principle—"the commands of the Law are presumed to be no longer binding except where the New Testament repeats or ratifies them"—than to the theonomists' hermeneutical principle, also correctly summarized by Bowman: "[T]he commands of the Law are presumed to be binding today except where the New Testament modifies them or sets them aside in some manner. “¹⁹ This is why Christian Reconstructionism does represent a break with traditional Protestant theology, not in the details of theology—our distinguishing theological beliefs have all been preached before within orthodox circles—but in our packaging of a unique, comprehensive system: predestination, covenant theology, biblical law, Cornelius Van Til’s presuppositional apologetics,²⁰ and postmillennialism.

D. Beating Something With Something Better

It is my opinion, stated repeatedly, that you cannot beat something with nothing. This is the strategic and tactical problem facing Christians today whenever they seek to challenge apostate humanism in any sphere of life. This inescapable fact of political life is the major stumbling stone for non-theonomic Christian activists. Christian pietists who self-consciously, religiously, and confidently deny that Christians should ever get involved in any form of public confrontation with humanism, for any reason, have recognized this weakness on the part of antinomian Christian activists. They never tire of telling the activists that they are wasting their time in some “eschatologically futile reform program.” Such activism is a moral affront to the pietists. Those of us who have repeatedly marched in picket lines in front of an abortionist’s office have from time to time been confronted by some outraged Christian pietist who is clearly far more incensed by the sight of Christians in a picket line than the thought of infanticide in the nearby office. “Who do you think you are?” we are asked. “Why are you out here making a scene when you could be working in an adoption center or unwed mothers’ home?” (These same two questions seem equally appropriate for the pietist critic. Who does he think he is, and why isn’t he spending his time working in an adoption center or an unwed mothers’ home?)

Pietists implicitly and occasionally explicitly recognize that the vast majority of today’s implicitly antinomian Christian activists possess no biblical blueprint for building a comprehensive alternative to the kingdom of humanism. The pietistic critics of activism also understand that in any direct confrontation, Christians risk getting the stuffings—or their tax exemptions—knocked out of them. They implicitly recognize that a frontal assault on entrenched humanism is futile and dangerous if you have nothing better to offer, since you cannot legitimately expect to beat something with nothing. They implicitly recognize that neither modern fundamentalism nor modern antinomian evangelicalism has any such blueprint, and therefore neither movement has anything better to offer, i.e., nothing biblically sanctioned by God for use in New Testament times (the so-called Church Age). Fundamentalism and evangelicalism deny the legitimacy of any such blueprint, for blueprints inescapably require civil law and civil sanctions. Fundamentalists have for a century chanted, “We’re under grace, not law!” They have forgotten (or never understood) that this statement inescapably means: “We’re therefore under humanist culture, not Christianity.” When reminded of this, they take one of three approaches: (1) abandon their fundamentalism in favor of Christian Reconstructionism, (2) abandon their activism, or (3) refuse to answer.²¹

19. Bowman, op. cit., p. 25.

20. If there is one major break with traditional Christianity, it is here—apologetics—which is a philosophical break, not a discontinuity in theology proper. Van Til’s apologetic method is unquestionably radical, for it refutes natural law theory.

Worse, those scholars who have accepted the intellectual burden of defending the Christian faith have generally had an abiding hatred for God’s Bible-revealed law. “Hatred” is the proper word. “Indifference” misses the point. “Ignorance” would be misleadingly gentle. There can be no neutrality regarding God’s revealed law, any more than there can be neutrality regarding God’s revelation of Himself. You either accept His authority over you or you reject it. You either accept His law’s authority over you or you reject it. Pietists reject it.

God’s authority over mankind is manifested ethically by His law, and it is manifested judicially by His law’s sanctions. You either affirm God’s law in its specifics, especially its sanctions, or you deny it, especially its sanctions. You either accept the 119th psalm or you reject it. “I will delight myself in thy statutes: I will not forget thy word” (Ps. 119:16). There is no middle ground. Middle ground with respect to anything in the Bible is always deception: either self-deception or self-conscious deception of others.

The general attitude of the modern fundamentalist world—and really, of the whole evangelical world—regarding the authority of God’s law today was stated plainly in 1963 by then-Professor S. Lewis Johnson of Dallas Theological Seminary, in the seminary’s scholarly journal, Bibliotheca Sacra: “At the heart of the problem of legalism is pride, a pride that refuses to admit spiritual bankruptcy. That is why the doctrines of grace stir up so much animosity. Donald Grey Barnhouse, a giant of a man in free grace, wrote: 'It was a tragic hour when the Reformation churches wrote the Ten Commandments into their creeds and catechisms and sought to bring Gentile believers into bondage to Jewish law, which was never intended either for the Gentile nations or for the church.'²² He was right, too."²³ Operationally, all denominations believe this today, but it took Presbyterian Barnhouse and independent fundamentalist Johnson to state the position plainly.

21. Gary North, “The Intellectual Schizophrenia of the New Christian Right,” Christianity and Civilization, No.1 (1982), pp. 1-40. (<http://bit.ly/CAC1982>)

Dispensationalist Roy L. Aldrich also did not flinch from the same conclusion: ". . . the entire Mosaic system—including the Ten Commandments—is done away."²⁴ Again, "the Mosaic ten laws cannot apply to the Christian," although he hastened to affirm that "the New Testament believer is not without the highest moral obligations."²⁵ Problem: these supposedly high moral obligations are unaccompanied by specific biblical content or specific biblical sanctions. That is to say, the Christian is on his own, making up his own rules as he goes along, at best illuminated by the mystical whisperings of the Holy Spirit. (If anyone wonders why Dallas Seminary has experienced student outbreaks of antinomian versions of Pentecostalism, which Dallas' dispensational "no signs in the Church Age" theology explicitly rejects, and even outbreaks within its own faculty,²⁶ he need search no further than Dallas Seminary's antinomian theology. If God does not direct Christians through His law, then only mysticism, antinomian intuition, and inner voices remain to provide uniquely "Christian" guidance.)

This hostility to Old Testament law is also why dispensationalism has always had an unstated working alliance with modern humanism: they both share an antinomian theology that seeks to "liberate" man and the state from the restraints of God's revealed law and its sanctions. Their agreement has been simple: Christians should stay out of politics as Christians. This explicit antinomianism is also why dispensationalism has never developed an explicitly Christian social theory. If it could have, it would have, especially in the crucial years of protest, 22. He cited Barnhouse, God's Freedom, p. 134.

23. S. Lewis Johnson, "The Paralysis of Legalism," Bibliotheca Sacra, Vol. 120 (April/June 1963), p. 109.

24. Roy L. Aldrich, "Has the Mosaic Law Been Abolished?" ibid., Vol. 116 (Oct. 1959), p. 326.

25. Ibid., p. 331.

26. Two Dallas Seminary professors resigned and one was fired in 1987 because of their commitment to the legitimacy of the gifts of physical healing in the "Church Age." See Christianity Today (Feb. 5, 1988), p. 52; Jack Deere (one of the dismissed professors), "Being Right Isn't Enough," in Kevin Springer (ed.), Power Encounters (New York: Harper & Row, 1988), ch. 8.

1965–71. The silence of dispensational leaders and scholars in those years indicated that the movement was incapable of responding to real-world problems. In that era, dispensationalism committed intellectual suicide. By 1990, intellectual rigor mortis had visibly set in.²⁷

E. Natural Law Philosophy and Antinomianism

Some variation of the dispensational hermeneutic has long been adopted by theologians who officially claim they reject the idea of an ultimate ethical dualism between the Old Testament and New Testament. A good example is the statement by Robert Dabney, the Calvinist Presbyterian of the late-nineteenth-century American South. He assured us that the Ten Commandments provide universal ethical standards. “Although the Ten Commandments were given along with the civil and ceremonial laws of the Hebrews, we do not include them along with the latter, because the Decalogue was, unlike them, given for all men and all dispensations.”²⁸ The Ten Commandments were basically the Hebrews’ version of natural law. “It is a solemn repetition of the sum of those duties founded in the natures of man and of God, and on their relations, enjoined on all ages alike.”²⁹

Dabney’s primary presumption is obvious: the whole of the Old Testament civil legal order is a dead letter, because the case laws are no longer judicially binding. His secondary presumption is also obvious: the case laws were not covenantally connected to the Decalogue. They were merely temporary injunctions. Not so the Ten Commandments. “Hence, all the principles of right stated or implied in this Decalogue, are valid, not for Hebrews only, but for all men and ages. They rise wholly above the temporary and positive precepts, which were only binding while they were expressly enjoined.”³⁰ He even argued that Christ’s words in Matthew 5:18 applied only to the Ten Commandments: “Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle of this law shall not pass away.”³¹

27. By 1990, Talbot Seminary in California had quietly departed from original dispensationalism. Its 2011 statement of faith does not mention the Rapture, the Great Tribulation, or the restoration of temple sacrifices. (<http://bit.ly/TalbotRapture>). Dallas Seminary was staffed by a faculty that paid little or no attention to the theological system of C. I. Scofield, Lewis Sperry Chafer, John Walvoord, Dwight Pentecost, and Charles Ryrie (who had long since departed). The “new, revisionist dispensationalism” taught by Prof. Wayne House and others was in fact the repudiation of key dispensational tenets, though not the pre-tribulational Rapture doctrine. Only the faithful donors who no longer read Bibliotheca Sacra remained unaware of what had happened. House’s Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse? was as far from Scofield as John MacArthur’s The Gospel According to Jesus.

28. Robert L. Dabney, A Defence of Virginia [And Through Her, of the South] (New York: Hale & Son, 1867), p. 122. (<http://bit.ly/DabneyVirginia>)

29. Idem.

This has been the ethical argument of Christian commentators almost from the beginning. Without exception, such a dispensationalist ethical argument rests either implicitly or explicitly on some version of natural law philosophy. If you abandon the continuing judicial authority of the Mosaic case laws and their sanctions, you must actively adopt or at least passively accept some other civil law structure to serve as the judicial basis of society. There are no judicial vacuums. Either God’s revealed law is sovereign in society or else autonomous man’s declared law is sovereign. There is no third choice. When a Christian denies the unbreakable connection between the case laws and the Ten Commandments, he must then seek to apply the “general moral principles” of the Decalogue to his own society in order to provide legitimacy to the “common legal order.” Yet he is then forced by his theory of natural law to defend the Decalogue’s highly general principles in terms of their common status among all “right thinking” people.

There is a major problem here: there have been so many wrong-thinking tyrants and societies in history. Christians have suffered under many of them, usually in silence, for they have been taught that there are no specific legal standards of righteousness on which to base a legitimate appeal to God (for example, by corporately praying the imprecatory psalms, such as Psalm 83). Nevertheless, Christians again and again have proclaimed their nearly unqualified allegiance to this or that humanist alternative to biblical social order. They base their allegiance on the supposed “natural conformity” to the Decalogue of their societies’ legal order. Natural law theory then becomes an all-purpose smoke screen for the Christians’ passive (or even active) acceptance of specific social evils.

F. The Problem of Social Reform

The acceptance of natural law philosophy inevitably leads to two possible and recurring evils. First, it paralyzes the Christians’ legitimate efforts to reform society, for it denies that there are specific biblical blueprints for social reform. This is the curse of the pietistic escape re- ligion on Christianity. Second, it enables humanist reformers to enlist Christians in this or that reform effort that is wrapped in the language of the Ten Commandments but which is in fact inspired by covenant-breakers and designed to further their aims. This is the curse of the power religion on Christianity.

30. Ibid., p. 123.

31. Idem.

In American history, no better example exists of both of these processes than the Unitarians' successful enlisting of evangelical Christians in the state-centralizing abolitionist movement.³² The fact is, the Quakers had pioneered the theory of abolitionism in the 1755–75 period, decades before the Unitarian Church even existed. The unwillingness of Trinitarian American Christians to obey the New Testament teachings with regard to the illegitimacy of lifetime chattel slavery allowed the Unitarians to capture the Quakers' issue and fan the evangelicals' moral fervor, 1820–65, which in turn allowed them to capture the whole country for the Unitarian worldview from the 1860s onward.³³ In short, American Christians ignored their social responsibilities by ignoring the Quakers' moral challenge regarding chattel slavery (1760–1820), for they did not recognize or acknowledge the judicial authority of the New Testament on this question.³⁴ As a result, they became institutionally and intellectually subordinate to those who hated Christianity (1820–1865).

Simultaneously, a parallel phenomenon took place with the rise of the state school systems, another Unitarian reform in the United States. Funded by Christian taxpayers, the schools have been operated in terms of an alien worldview.³⁵ The escape religion led to the triumph of the power religion. It always does. Dominion religion invariably suffers. This defeat of dominion religion is the temporal goal of the power religionists and the escape religionists, of Pharaoh and the enslaved Israelites. They always want Moses to go away and take his laws with him.

These two evil consequences of natural law theory—retreat from social concerns and the co-opting of Christians by non-Christian so-

32. Otto Scott, The Secret Six: John Brown and the Abolitionist Movement (New York: Times Books, 1979), reprinted by the Foundation for American Education; Bertram Wyatt-Brown, Lewis Tappan and the Evangelical War Against Slavery (Cleveland, Ohio: Case Western Reserve University Press, 1969).

33. R. J. Rushdoony, The Nature of the American System (1965), ch. 6: "The Religion of Humanity." (<http://bit.ly/rjrns>)

34. See Chapter 4: "A Biblical Theology of Slavery."

35. R. J. Rushdoony, The Messianic Character of American Education (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1963).

cial reformers—have been the curse of natural law theory for almost two millennia. Dabney could have protested until kingdom come—or until Sherman’s army came—against the anti-Constitution agenda of the northern Abolitionists,³⁶ but his own commitment to natural law philosophy undercut his theological defense. He did not understand that when a law-abiding Christian adopts a hostile attitude toward the case laws of the Old Testament, he necessarily also adopts an attitude favorable to natural law theory, which is inescapably philosophical humanism: common-ground philosophy, common-ground ethics, and the autonomy of man.³⁷ Dispensationalist theologian and natural law philosopher Norman Geisler was simply more forthright regarding this necessary two-fold commitment: anti-Old Testament law and pro-natural law philosophy.³⁸ (It is unfortunate that both Cornelius Van Til and Francis Schaeffer were inconsistent in this regard: they ignored or denied the New Testament authority of biblical law, yet also officially denied natural law philosophy. This has produced great confusion among their respective followers.)³⁹

For two centuries, humanists in the United States have been enlisting Christian evangelicals into a seemingly endless stream of “save the world” programs. The humanists cry out, “Baptize us! Baptize us! . . .

36. Defense of Virginia, Conclusion.

37. Archie P. Jones, “Natural Law and Christian Resistance to Tyranny,” Christianity and Civilization, No.2 (1983), pp. 94–132. (<http://bit.ly/CRtheology>)

38. Norman Geisler, “A Premillennial View of Law and Government,” in J. I. Packer (ed.), The Best in Theology (Carol Stream, Illinois: Christianity Today/Word, 1986). Wrote the Fundamentalist Journal (Sept. 1988): “Geisler credits [Thomas] Aquinas with ‘having the most influence on my life,’ and says that if his house were burning he would grab his wife, his Bible, and the Summa Theologiae by Aquinas” (p. 20). It is hardly surprising that he was a professor of philosophy at Baptist fundamentalist Liberty University. The anabaptists, who possess no separate philosophical tradition of their own, have always relied on the philosophy of medieval Roman Catholic scholasticism to defend their cause.

39. See North, Political Polytheism, chapter 2: “Halfway Covenant Ethics,” and chapter 3: “Halfway Covenant Social Criticism.” Van Til’s self-conscious rejection of both dispensationalism and natural law theory left him without any concept of social law or social justice, for he also rejected the continuing authority of the Old Testament case laws by silence in his published writings and explicitly in private communications. Thus, his system was always incomplete, hanging timelessly in the air like a ripe fruit that has just begun its fall to the ground. That the fruit was grabbed by R. J. Rushdoony in the early 1960s did not please Van Til, but there was not much that he could politely do about it. He had to remain silent, for his system is inherently ethically silent: it rejects both forms of law, natural and biblical, which is why he explicitly denied ethical cause and effect in history, and why he implicitly adopted the humanists’ version of ethical cause and effect: the good guys lose in history, and the bad guys win.

and please take up a compulsory collection for us.” For two centuries, well-meaning Christians have been digging deep into their wallets in order to supply the tax collectors with funds to finance a series of supposedly religiously neutral social reform programs that have been created by the messianic state and staffed by humanist bureaucrats. Taxpayer-funded, evolution-teaching government schools have been the most persistent, effective, and representative example of this continuing delusion. Without the spurious supporting doctrine of morally and intellectually neutral natural law, it would not be possible for the humanists to wrap these antiChristian programs in the ragged swaddling clothes of common morality.

G. “Normal Science”

Our critics in 1985 legitimately replied, “All right, let’s see if you can make sense of the case laws. Let’s see how you would apply them to today’s problems. Put up or shut up.” Since I did not intend to shut up, I “put up.” This book is a detailed study of the economic applications of the case laws of Exodus. It offers no grand hypothesis, no major breakthrough in biblical hermeneutics. It is an example of what someone can accomplish if he is willing to spend a lot of time thinking about the specifics of biblical law, comparing his conclusions with contemporary scholarship in several areas. To write this book, I have made a detailed study of modern economics, plus at least a cursory examination of the relatively new academic discipline of law and economics, plus studies of Jewish jurisprudence (Mishnah and Talmud), modern criminology, the history of slavery, and ecology. This effort I regard as basic intellectual trench work, or what Thomas Kuhn called “normal science.”⁴⁰ It is not in the same league with a breakthrough book like Rushdoony’s Institutes of Biblical Law,⁴¹ with its innovative insight that each of the case laws of the Bible can be subsumed under one of the Ten Commandments (even if the thesis is overstated),⁴² and which surveys a wide array of topics—academic, cultural, historical, and contemporary. Tools of Dominion has neither the precision nor 40. Thomas Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, op. cit. Kuhn distinguished normal science from a scientific revolution that produces a major paradigm shift.

41. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973).

42. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), pp. 22–23. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

the relentlessness of Greg Bahnsen's apologetic defense of biblical law in Theonomy in Christian Ethics. It does not have the organizational power of Ray Sutton's five-point covenant model.⁴³ It does not have the innovative insights into biblical meaning that James Jordan's "maximal" hermeneutic offers.⁴⁴ It just plugs along, trying to make economic sense out of the details of the case laws.

Despite these limitations, this book still is part of my overall publishing strategy. If a reader is impressed with my conclusions regarding both the wisdom and the benefits that the case laws of Exodus offer, he will be pulled in the direction of the Christian Reconstructionists' paradigm. If he rejects the paradigm, he will then find himself asking: "Why do the case laws seem to be workable? Why have previous Christian theologians ignored the case laws? What was it in their theological paradigms that kept them from seeing how relevant the case laws are?" When a person starts asking himself such questions, he is approaching a personal paradigm shift.

Unless a whole series of studies like this one come into print, the brilliance of the previously mentioned paradigm-shifting theonomic books will fail to capture the minds of future generations of Christians. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, says an old slogan; similarly, the proof of theonomy is in its judicial applications. If what this book insists regarding the case laws of Exodus is not true—if they cannot in fact be applied productively in New Testament societies—then the brilliance of the theonomic paradigm is like the brilliance of a burning bush that is soon consumed by the fire. The paradigm is wood, hay, and stubble. So, while this book is not intended to be paradigm-shifting, it is unquestionably designed to be paradigm-confirming and paradigm-luring. In 1990, I wrote: "If the reviewers do anything except pan this book, they will have aided the theonomists' cause, but if they pan it without having effectively discredited the case laws themselves, they will have identified themselves to their more perceptive readers as intellectual lightweights." There were few reviewers, 1990–2011.

This is why I did not expect the book to be widely reviewed in 1990. This, plus its size. A reviewer cannot fake a review of a book on the case laws. The subject matter is just too complex. Reviewers will actually have to read the book before reviewing it negatively, something our critics so far have been unwilling to do with our previous books. I expect the silence to continue. This, too, is now in our favor. The word is spreading: our critics have no answers to our paradigm.

43. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

44. James B. Jordan, Judges: God's War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/jjjjudges>)

Yes, this is a fat book. But, like Volume I of Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law, this book is divided into bite-sized portions: compact chapter sections and subsections. To make things as easy as possible for the reader, I have structured it for easy preliminary scanning and easy review. You deal with it as you would eat an elephant: one bite at a time. Chew well; it is occasionally tough.

H. A Final Note to Readers and Critics

Richard Baxter, in 1673, listed seven highly predictable objections to his Christian Directory. I feel compelled to list the first three again, though not his specific answers. (I have also dropped his italics.) I too have heard variations of these objections repeatedly.

Objection I: "You have written too many Books already: Who do you think hath so little to do as to read them all?"

Objection II: "Your Writings differing from the common judgment have already caused offence to the godly."

Objection III: "You should take more leisure, and take other mens judgement of your Writings before you thrust them out so hastily."⁴⁵

In response, I can do no better than to close with Baxter's summary comments. Indeed, if I were to issue a challenge to the critics of me in particular and Christian Reconstruction in general, this would be it:

In summ, to my quarrelsome Brethren I have two requests, 1. That instead of their unconscionable, and yet unreformed custome of backbiting, they would tell me to my face of my offences by convincing evidence, and not tempt the hearers to think them envious: and 2. That what I do amiss, they would do better: and not be such as will neither laboriously serve the Church themselves, nor suffer others: and that they will not be guilty of Idleness themselves, nor tempt me to be a slothful servant, who have so little time to spend: For I dare not stand before God under that guilt: And that they will not joyn with the enemies and resisters of the publication of the Word of 45. Richard Baxter, A Christian Directory: Or, A Summ of Practical Theologie, and Cases of Conscience (London: Robert White for Nevil Simmons, [1673] 1678), unnumbered pages, in Advertisements.

God.

And to the Readers my request is, 1. That whatever for Quantity or Quality in this Book is an impediment to their regular universal obedience, and to a truly holy life, they would neglect and cast away: 2. But that which is truly Instructing and Helpful, they would diligently Digest and Practice; And I encourage them by my testimony, that by long experience I am assured, that this PRACTICAL RELIGION will afford both to Church, State and Conscience, more certain and more solid Peace, than contending Disputers, with all their pretences of Orthodoxness and Zeal against Errors for the Truth, will ever bring, or did ever attain to.

I crave your pardon for this long Apology: It is an Age where the Objections are not feigned, and where our greatest and most costly services of God, are charged on us as our greatest sins; and where at once I am accused of Conscience for doing no more, and of men for doing so much: Being really

A most unworthy Servant of so good a Master.

SERVITUDE, PROTECTION, AND MARRIAGE

If thou buy an Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve: and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing. If he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself: if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him. If his master have [has] given him a wife, and she have born him sons or daughters; the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself (Ex. 21:2–4).

It is a wise course to begin any discussion of the case laws of Exodus by pointing out that these laws are best understood theocentrically. God's relationship to man is the focus of many of these case laws, especially those involving slavery and marriage. The basic theme of this passage in Exodus is protection through covenantal subordination.¹ A secondary theme, closely related to the first, is the right of redemption (buying back). These are fundamental themes in the Book of Exodus specifically and in the Bible generally. God delivers His bride from bondage in the household of a foreign master who has kept her in illegal slavery—slavery without the right of redemption. The pharaohs of the Mosaic period had attempted to do what the Pharaoh of Abram's day had attempted. Like Jacob, Abram had journeyed to Egypt in the midst of a famine (Gen. 12:10). As Abram had expected, Pharaoh captured Abram's bride, Sarai, and brought her to his house (v. 15). God then sent plagues against Pharaoh's household (v. 17). The Pharaoh of Moses's infancy instructed the Hebrew midwives to kill all the male infants but allow the females to live (Ex. 1:16). It is obvious what he intended: the capture of God's bride.

1. On the hierarchical nature of God's covenant, see Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Cf. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

A. Indentured Servitude

Exodus 21:2–4 presents the case law governing indentured servant marriages. God had just delivered a slave people out of bondage. He had removed them from the visible tyranny of Egypt, and He was preparing them for long-term service to Him in the Promised Land. It was not that servitude was being abolished; it was rather that a new Master had appeared on the historical scene. God had delivered them out of Pharaoh's household as intact families. He was now bringing them into His household as His servants. He was making Israel His bride.

The maximum legal period of the most rigorous form of non-criminal indentured servitude in Israel was a little over six years. This was the form of servitude in which the master had the right of corporal punishment, and the form in which the servant had to be provided with capital upon his release. At the beginning of the seventh year, sometimes called the sabbatical year by Bible commentators, these servants went free in Israel, and simultaneously all zero-interest charitable debts were cancelled (Deut. 15:1–6²). Not all debts were cancelled; just the charitable loans which were morally required by God (Deut. 15:9–10). It is noteworthy that the year of release was also the year when the law was read to the assembled nation at the feast of tabernacles (Deut. 31:10–13)³. God's law is to be understood as the means to freedom for those who obey it.⁴

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

3. Ibid., ch. 75.

4. I should mention here that the Jewish scholar Maimonides asserted in 1180 A.D. that a Hebrew can legitimately sell himself to another Hebrew for more than six years, but not beyond the jubilee year. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Acquisition, vol. 12 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1951), "Treatise V, Laws Concerning Slaves," V:II:3, p. 250. On the other hand, if the court sells him into servitude, which Maimonides said can only take place because the man is a thief who cannot afford to make restitution (V:I:1, p. 246), he can be required to work only six years (V:II:2, p. 249). I argue that a criminal who is sold to repay his victims can be enslaved permanently if that period is that is what it takes to raise enough money to repay his victims. A major problem with the Code is its sparse or absent arguments and explanations for controversial assertions. In reading the Code, we must remember that Maimonides distinguished between a code and a commentary: "In a monolithic code, only the correct subject matter is recorded, without any questions, without answers, and without any proofs, in the way which Rabbi Judah adopted when he composed the Mishnah." A commentary records opinions, debates, and identifies sources and persons, he said: letter to Rabbi Phinehas ben Meshullam, judge in Alexandria: reproduced in Isadore Twersky, Introduction to the Code of Maimonides (Mishneh Torah) (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1980), p. 33. The Code was basic to Maimonides' thinking. Twersky wrote: "The Mishneh Torah also

In the national seventh year, these full-scale bondservants went free.⁵ Why the statutory limitation? Probably because this sabbatical week of years pointed back to the symbolic work week that God imposed on man because of his sin. Adam had originally been given a one-six work week, with the first day as his day of rest. He sinned, seeking autonomy, and was then cursed by God with a six-one work week: six days of labor, with the promise of release and rest only at the end.⁶ This new weekly structure was a curse on man, although a curse with the grace of sabbatical liberation promised at the end of the week's period of servitude. Thus, man's position as a debtor to God is manifested in the sabbatical-year system of debt and slavery. God offers covenant-breaking man a means of escaping his debt: faithful labor as a bondservant for a specified period.

B. Marriage and Servitude

Verse three is clear: a married man who goes into indentured servitude, probably because of debt,⁷ takes his wife with him. She therefore departs with him when he goes out. Verse four is the difficult section for moralists. If he had been given a wife during his period of servitude, she and their children must remain behind with the master when the husband leaves.

The key question we need to ask ourselves is this: Where had the becomes an Archimedean fulcrum in the sense that he regularly mentions it and refers correspondents and inquirers to it. The repeated references convey the impression that he wanted to establish it as a standard manual, a ready, steady, and uniform reference book for practically all issues" (p. 18).

5. This was not true of those who had indentured themselves to other Hebrews as permanent hired hands (Lev. 25:25–28), or those who had indentured themselves to resident aliens (Lev. 25:47–54).

6. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 6.

7. Maimonides declared without argument or biblical citation that "One is not permitted to sell himself into servitude and lay the money away or buy merchandise or vessels with it or give it to a creditor. He can sell himself only if he needs the money for food and only after he has nothing left in the house, not even a garment." Acquisition, V:I:1, p. 246. The problem here is that it seems inconceivable that a man could be placed in servitude for over six years in order to raise enough money for his family's food. It seems far more plausible to believe that he was forced into servitude because of debts amassed over a lengthy period. Maimonides did say that the state may legitimately sell a man into bondage to someone who pays the man's unpaid taxes for him: ibid., V:I:8, p. 248. Since he had already argued that the state can sell someone into slavery only for theft, he must have believed that the failure to pay a tax must be a form of theft.

indentured servant received his wife if he originally brought her into the master's household? The answer is crucial to understanding this passage: from her father. He would have had to pay a bride price to her father, thereby indicating his economic productivity, or at least his position as a man possessing inherited capital.⁸ The bridegroom's payment of a required bride price is the key to understanding this case law.⁹

1. To Give a Wife

Jacob wanted to marry Rachel. He had no visible, transferable capital, for he was a fugitive, even though he had received Isaac's blessing. Without an assured inheritance, he had to pay Laban a bride price. That bride price was seven years of labor: "And Jacob served seven years for Rachel" (Gen. 29:20a). His words are significant: "Give me my wife, for my days are fulfilled" (Gen. 29:21a). Give me my wife, he insisted. The father had to give his daughter to the bridegroom, once he had met the terms of the bride price. Rachel now belonged to Jacob. He had paid the price.¹⁰

Exodus 21:4 reads: "If his master have given him a wife, and she have born him sons or daughters; the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself." The language is the same as Jacob's to Laban: He has given her to him. This raises a second crucial question: Where did the master get a woman for his servant in order to be able to give her to him in marriage? Either she was a servant already owned by the master, or else she had been purchased by the master for the servant. Perhaps she had been some other family's servant. Perhaps she had been the daughter of a free man. The point is, the master now lawfully controls her as a lawful father. He can therefore give her to his servant.

8. The bride price would normally have been less than 50 shekels of silver. A man who seduced an unbetrothed virgin was required by law to pay 50 shekels to her father and then marry her, with no future right of divorce (Deut. 22:28–29). Additional evidence of this 50-shekel maximum: the bridegroom who falsely accused a new bride of not being a virgin at the time of their marriage, and who could not prove his accusation, had to pay a hundred shekels of silver to her father (Deut. 22:19). This was double restitution: two times 50. On these points, see chapter 47, "Seduction and Servitude."

9. Chapter 32.

10. This is the covenantal basis of Jesus Christ's exclusive lifetime (eternal) ownership of His bride, the church (Eph. 5:22–24). The church is a true bride, not a concubine. A concubine in Israel was a wife who possessed no dowry. No bride price was paid for her, and no dowry was brought into the marriage by her. Legally, had Christ not died for the church, the church would be a concubine—a second-rate wife. This is why the church knows that she will never be divorced. This is why Paul could ask rhetorically: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" (Rom. 8:35a). Christ paid the required bride price to the Father. The church is not a concubine, even though she brings neither virginity nor dowry into the marriage. The bride price was paid by Christ at Calvary.

If she had been the daughter of a free man, then the master would have had to pay a bride price to her father. This assured the father that the man who was taking legal authority over his daughter was competent financially. The father had been given economic evidence that the requested transfer of authority over his daughter to another man posed no threat to her economic future. The bride price served as evidence of her future husband's ability to support her; as a weaker vessel, she was legally entitled to such support.

If the master paid the bride price, and her father transferred to him the right to give her in marriage, then the master became her new father, covenantally speaking. He would remain legally responsible for her until she married a legally independent man. The master had the legal right to give her as a wife to a servant in his household, but only because she would remain in his household. He could not legally transfer to a servant the economic obligation to support her, for the servant was not a covenantally free agent, either economically or legally. Because the servant possessed no capital, the master remained her father covenantally until such time as the servant purchased her from him, that is, until he paid the master the bride price owed to a father.

This law provided additional assurance to the woman's natural father of the lifetime economic protection owed to his daughter. The master did not have the legal authority to transfer this economic responsibility to a former indentured servant until the latter had proven that he was able to pay the same bride price originally owed to the father. If this law had not been in existence, or if it was unenforced by civil law, then there would be no guarantee to the woman's natural father that the master would not later decide to escape his economic liabilities to the woman by transferring such responsibility to a former indentured servant who had not yet demonstrated his economic competence. The legal requirement that the released servant pay the master the bride price before his wife could leave the household of the master was the natural father's assurance of her continuing protection.

The modern world has pretended that it can somehow ignore the economic aspects of marriage. People assume that the ancient world was primitive,¹¹ and therefore the attention given by ancient law codes to such matters as dowries and bride price payments is evidence of this primitivism.¹² But it is the modern world that is primitive, for it has abandoned a covenantal view of marriage, and has substituted easily broken mutual contracts, where fathers have no responsibilities to investigate the economic competence of prospective sons-in-law, and wives have little legal protection from the courts if husbands decide to break their marriage contracts.¹³ Women have become the economic victims of divorce.

2. The Family as the Primary Protection Agency

Marriage is not lawless. It is a covenantal institution.¹⁴ It is the primary training ground for the next generation. It is the primary institution for welfare: care of the young, care of the aged, and education. It is the primary agency of economic inheritance. The family is therefore the primary institutional arrangement for fulfilling the terms of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:27–28). God honored this crucial

11. Harry Emerson Fosdick, a liberal theologian and an immensely popular preacher for several decades, wrote: "We know now that every idea in the Bible started from primitive and childlike origins. . . ." The Modern Use of the Bible (New York: Macmillan, 1941), p. 11. See also Henry Schaeffer, The Social Legislation of the Primitive Semites (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1915). He began with a consideration of Hebrew marriage. He argued that "the matriarchal clan was the dominant form of social organization prior to the settlement in Canaan" (p. 7). It is astounding the lengths to which people will go to escape the Bible's testimony concerning God and man.

12. The Hammurabi Code devotes considerable space to these matters, paragraphs 128–84. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), pp. 171–74. Not equally detailed are the laws of Eshnunna, paragraphs 17–28: ibid., p. 162; the Middle Assyrian laws, paragraphs 25–48: ibid., pp. 182–84; and the Hittite laws, paragraphs 26–36: ibid., p. 190.

13. In Victorian England, custody of the children automatically went to the divorced husband. This reduced the incentive for divorce on both sides. The husband feared the responsibility of taking care of the children, and the wife did not want to abandon them. As William Tucker commented: "The Victorian system favored neither men nor women: It favored families. . . . They loaded the system against the individual interests of men and women to keep both committed to the family." Only after 1910 did social workers and the courts shift the balance and begin to grant mothers automatic custody of the children. William Tucker, "Victorian Savvy," New York Times (June 26, 1983). The biblical approach is different: children go to the innocent victim of the sinning marriage partner.

14. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 8. The code of Hammurabi specified that an aristocrat who acquired a wife without contracts for her did not have a wife: paragraph 128. Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 171.

dominion function of the family by placing restrictions on it. A servant is expected to defer marriage until he is an independent man. Later, as a husband in a position of authority, he can exercise dominion under God as the head of his family. The model here is Jacob (Gen. 29:20).

Both marriage and labor are normally to be part of the dominion covenant between man and God. Because the servant's dominion over his assigned portion of the earth is not independent of his master's authority, his authority over a wife taken during his term of service is also under his master's authority. There is a human mediator between God and the servant: the master. Therefore, it is the master, not the servant, who is directly responsible to God for the general care of the servant's wife. The servant takes orders from the master.¹⁵

The servant's protection comes from the master. The capital at his disposal comes from his master. He takes orders directly from his master or a representative of the master. If he is a foreman himself, he issues orders only as a representative of his master, because he is acting as an official under the master's general authority. The master is responsible before God for any delegation of authority to a servant, so the mediatorial position of the master is not abrogated simply because he turns limited authority over to the servant.

This law made it clear to any woman who married a Hebrew indentured servant that the ultimate human authority over her, and therefore her legal protector, was not her husband but rather her husband's master. She was fulfilling the terms of the dominion covenant as a wife within a family unit, but the head of her family was her husband's master. Her husband was therefore only a representative of the head of her family. The covenant of marriage was in this instance four-way: (1) God, (2) the master of the house, (3) the indentured servant, and (4) the servant's wife. Because the protection of the wife and children was ultimately the legal responsibility of the master, the servant's wife and the children remained with the master when the husband, now released, departed.

The existence of such a law regarding servant families testifies to the importance of protection for a wife. Economic protection is one of the reasons why a woman marries. If the source of her financial protection is divided, then she faces dual loyalties. The problem of serving two masters arises. Which man possesses authority over her? If the master commands her husband, then her covenantal obligations to both men are unclear. This law forces the couple to recognize her ambiguous position as someone who owes loyalty to two men in the same household. This is a very difficult kind of in-law problem. The covenantal father-in-law actually owns the services of his covenantal son-in-law for a number of years, and literally owns his covenantal daughter until the servant becomes a free man and subsequently presents him with the bride price.

15. A modern application of this biblical principle would be that a wife should remain a member of the Bible-believing church she is covenanted to even if her husband leaves the church and joins a more liberal church, let alone an apostate church. Her spiritual covering is provided by the church, mediated through her husband. Even though he has removed himself from the church's covering for the family, she is still entitled to it.

3. Counting the Costs

This law also forces both the servant and his prospective wife to consider carefully the costs, risks, and responsibilities of marriage. The husband's need for money to pay her bride price will remain a problem for them long after he regains his freedom. She may wind up with a part-time husband, should he decide to accept his independence and leave her behind. In this case, her master will become her day-to-day lord, unless her husband returns, either to buy her freedom or to become a permanent servant. Marriage to a man in bondage should not be entered into lightly. By asking her to marry him, the servant is asking her to subject herself to the covenantal authority of his master. A servant who married a woman was, in effect, acting as an agent of his master. The law testifies to her position of servitude as the wife of a servant. She might never be able escape this bondage. We can assume that the only woman ready to accept such bondage would be a household servant or the daughter of a poverty-stricken family (cf. Ex. 21:9).

Similarly, the servant has to consider the potential costs of marriage during his period of bondage. He may not be able to afford to redeem her and the children. In this case, he will face either a life of servitude or a life without his family. A future-oriented man probably would prefer to wait a few years, working out his term of service before bringing a woman into covenantal servitude under his master. By delaying marriage, he can then insure freedom for his future family. Is freedom worth the delay? This is the question facing a servant who is considering marriage. It is also the question facing his prospective bride.

Jacob's seven years of service for a wife had to be completed prior to his marriage. Similarly, a Hebrew bondservant, if he came into bondage as a single man, was expected to remain single throughout his term of service. He was under another man's administration, and he was therefore less able to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant on his own initiative.

What about an indentured servant's children? The law did not permit law-abiding Hebrews to become involuntary lifetime servants to other Hebrews. A Hebrew could serve another Hebrew or a resident alien for up to 49 years, and he could become a member of the household through the pierced ear ritual, but nothing is said about the bondservant's children. Nothing needed to be said; the decision to become a servant, or even enforced servitude to repay a debt or make restitution, did not bind a man's children beyond the age of their maturity, for they were not permitted to be enslaved without their consent. Thus, it should be clear that the children of the released manservant, upon marriage for daughters or upon reaching the age of 20 for sons (Ex. 30:14), would have gone free. Presumably, an unmarried daughter who reached age 20 would have returned to her father's house or to her oldest brother's house, unless she, too, chose to become a lifetime servant in the master's house. Adult children no longer would have been in need of the legal protection of the master.

The wife, having married in terms of the servant status of her husband, in effect had already become a voluntary lifetime servant to the master, unless her husband came and redeemed her. Either she served her husband or her husband's former master, who remained her covenantal father until the bride price was paid.

The question arises, did the master own her future productivity, or did it belong to her husband? Maimonides wrote: "Though the master must support the wife and the children of his slave he is not entitled to the proceeds of their work. Rather do the proceeds of the wife's work and the things she finds belong to her husband."¹⁶ Then what would be the economic incentive for a master to give the wife to the bondservant? He does not escape the legal and economic responsibilities of supporting her, yet he loses her productivity, which is transferred to the bondservant. Only if the master could escape the costs of supporting her would such a transaction have made sense. But the whole justification of this law regarding wives of bondservants is that it was the master's status as the provider of her protection that made it mandatory that she and the children remain with him upon her husband's departure. Because the responsibilities associated with marriage would be a spur to the bondservant's productivity, marriage was also an incentive to liberty. Thus, contrary to Maimonides, it is difficult to imagine that the Bible would have created an economic disincentive for the master to provide his bondservant with a wife. He retained a portion of her productivity, and the productivity of any children born of the union, until the bondservant could afford to redeem her.

16. Maimonides, Acquisition, "Slave Laws," V:III:2, p. 254.

C. The Release Price

There were two ways of reuniting a broken Hebrew servant family. First, the servant could voluntarily become a lifetime servant. The sign of his bondage as an adopted household servant was a pierced ear (Ex. 21:6). This legal position as an adopted son would have been in effect until the jubilee year, when he would have returned as a free man to take possession of his family's inheritance in the land (unless he inherited land in his adoptive father's legacy¹⁷). Second, he could go out as a free man, returning intermittently for visitation rights with his wife, until such time as he earned funds to purchase his wife and children.

1. The Right of Redemption

Understand, however, that no biblical text explicitly specifies this right of redemption by the husband if the wife was owned by a Hebrew master. Nevertheless, such a legal right is an inescapable conclusion of Exodus 21:7–8: "And if a man sell his daughter to be a maidservant, she shall not go out as the menservants do. If she please not her master, who hath betrothed her to himself, then shall he let her be redeemed: to sell her unto a strange nation he shall have no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her." The Hebrew daughter could be bought and sold as the Hebrew manservant could be. She could become a maidservant (Deut. 15:12). She could also be purchased by means of a bride price, that is, to become a wife. Her father could not legally abolish the God-given judicial, covenantal office of father; he could only transfer this office to another man who was promising to become her future husband or her future father-in-law. This transfer of office was legally possible only because marriage is judicially a form of adoption.¹⁸

17. Hebrew rabbis agreed that the word "forever" in Exodus 21:6 referred to the period remaining until the jubilee, said the medieval Jewish commentator, Rabbi Moshe ben Nachman (Ramban), Commentary on the Torah: Exodus (New York: Shilo, [1267?] 1973), pp. 348–49: Ex. 21:6. We do not know exactly when Nachmanides wrote this section; he did not complete his commentary on the Pentateuch until his arrival in Jerusalem in 1267. Charles B. Chavel, RAMBAN: His Life and Teachings (New York: Philipp Feldheim, 1960), p. 44. He died sometime around 1270, although the date of his death is not known: ibid., p. 66. On "forever," see also Maimonides, Acquisition, "Slave Laws," V:III:7, p. 255.

We know this must have been the case, because of the laws governing vows. A woman could take a vow, but the male head of household, father or husband, had to affirm it within 24 hours in order for it to be judicially binding before God (Num. 30:3–14¹⁹). This law appears, appropriately, in the Book of Numbers, the book corresponding to point four of the covenant: oath. Only a widow could make a judicially binding oath on her own (Num. 30:9). This indicates that a woman, unless a widow, was always legally under the hierarchical rule of a man. She was under a man's judicial authority: the office of household head. This office could not be transferred except through adoption or temporary maidservice. (A daughter could be used as collateral for a charity loan. A minor son could be, too, which is why the widow approached Elisha when the creditor threatened to make her sons into bondservants [II Kings 4]. Elisha did not say that the creditor had broken the law. Instead, as her mediatory kinsman-redeemer [her pastor], he provided a miracle for this widow: oil that could be sold in order to redeem the debt.)

2. Daube's Hermeneutics: From Law to Theology

The prominent Old Testament scholar David Daube went so far as to argue that the original right of self-redemption by the Hebrew bondservant was strictly limited to cases of ownership of Hebrews by resident aliens.²⁰ Daube self-consciously preferred to argue from the legal to the theological,²¹ but he then failed to deal with the actual judicial standards regarding redemption. This is why we need to argue theologically as well as judicially; otherwise, we will miss important aspects of both the theological and judicial character of God's revelation. Daube's hostility to theology was so great that he argued that the priests and prophets who supposedly wrote the Pentateuch in the

18. Chapter 32:B.

19. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 16.

20. David Daube, Studies in Biblical Law (Cambridge: At the University Press, 1947), p. 43.

21. Ibid., pp. 1–3, 43.

eightth century B.C. (or later) actually invented the idea of God's liberating His people from guilt²². Again, he was arguing from the judicial to the theological: a view based on the prior exclusively judicial concept of God as the liberator from physical bondage (the exodus), which in turn was based on the idea of His liberating His people from debt servitude and economic oppression.²³ He refused to acknowledge that liberation from debt, economic oppression, and slavery was first and foremost God's liberation of His people from sin and idolatry. Again, we see a refusal to accept the existence of the Bible-revealed relationship between covenant-breaking and God's negative sanctions in history.

In contrast to Daube, I am arguing from the theological to the legal. We need to explain the Bible's legal texts by analyzing them in terms of the covenant. Covenant theology always governs biblical laws. The legal right of redemption from bondservitude through offering a purchase price is implied throughout the Bible because of biblical religion's equating of personal freedom, economic success, and ethical obedience to God. The biblical theme of national and personal liberation is always grounded in the general commandment of liberation from the bondage of sin. The focus of biblical law is primarily ethical rather than primarily legal, primarily economic, or primarily political.

3. Covenant-Keeping and Prosperity

If a man is economically unskilled, his incompetence is expected to lead him into poverty. This, in turn, tends to lead him into bondservitude, where he can learn the biblical law of liberty—obedience to God—through obedience to a covenantally self-disciplined person. Why is it assumed in the Mosaic law that the owner of a bondservant is covenantally faithful? Obviously, because he had sufficient wealth to purchase the bondservant. Immoral and incompetent men do not gain and maintain control over riches in a commonwealth governed by biblical law (Deut. 28:15–68). This case law rests on the presupposition of a statistically relevant link between covenant-keeping and long-term personal prosperity.

Because ethical behavior is best learned under a covenant-keeping

22. Appendix P, "The Hoax of Higher Criticism."

23. Ibid., pp. 55–56. He wrote: "The result that I wish to stress is that the idea of God or Jesus redeeming mankind from sin and damnation, apparently a purely religious idea, derives from those ancient rules of insolvent debtors and victims of murder, on the preservation of existing clans and the patrimony of clans." Ibid., p. 59.

Hebrew master rather than under a covenant-breaking resident alien, the preferred form of servitude is Hebrew over Hebrew. Thus, contrary to Daube, the law regarding the redemption price would have been applied in cases of Hebrew household bondservice, and not just in cases of ownership by resident aliens. When the bondservant's incompetence is overcome, first by the master and then by himself, he is to be freed upon payment of the redemption price. He is expected to be able to earn the purchase price through faithful service. Here is the ethics-capital link in operation once again. The Bible recommends faithfulness, prosperity, and legal freedom. The Bible teaches that personal responsibility before God is enhanced by a person's legal status as a free man. This is why Paul wrote that Christian slaves should accept freedom if it is made available to them (I Cor. 7:21²⁴).

D. Will Taxpayers Be Enslaved?

There are cases where righteous people fall into poverty or trials through no fault of their own. In order to give them a way back into profitable service as debt-free producers, God makes indentured servitude available to them. It is God's means of grace to them, a means of release from debt bondage. It is clear that the society at large is not supposed to become burdened with extra taxes in order to care for such people. Despite the fact that they may have come into hard times through no fault of their own, bondservice is still a Bible-sanctioned remedy for poverty. The society at large is presumed to be unable to sort out judicially on a case-by-case basis the righteous poor from the unrighteous poor. Thus, the same remedy for both is established by biblical law: indentured servitude. The poor man is expected to bear the unpleasant burden of becoming a bondservant as the means of his restoration economically. The taxpayers are not to become his servants. A welfare state cannot develop when the biblical laws of servitude are honored.

In modern societies where these laws are not honored, the enslavement of taxpayers to the economically incompetent has become the political norm. Debt is seen as a blessing, bondservitude as a cursing, and theft by the ballot box as liberation. The welfare state does put legally innocent, economically competent people into servitude to the economically incompetent. Nevertheless, Christian voters voluntarily resort to ballot-box coercion to care for their own parents (compulsory old age support programs), as well as the distant poor. This testifies to the almost universal spread of antinomianism in our day. When a welfare state goes bankrupt, there are not enough rich to pay the enormous debts. Its unproductive and economically dependent creditors find themselves facing disaster. Bankruptcy cannot be avoided; it can only be deferred by transferring it to others. The bills eventually come due.

24. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 8.

E. Prosperity Is Both the Standard and Goal

The biblical economic standard for a righteous person, as with a nation or other covenantally bound groups, is prosperity.²⁵ Thus, the man who has fallen into poverty needs guidance from someone who is more skilled economically. There is presumably some flaw in the poor man's character or abilities that needs correction.

A physical or other catastrophe may also be the cause of the man's poverty, but the case law's provisions do not differentiate among the causes. The concern of biblical law is moral rehabilitation, which is then to lead to economic rehabilitation, or perhaps vice versa. The two forms of rehabilitation are assumed by the Bible to be connected.

Household servitude is a means of deliverance from bad habits based on personal character flaws. It is the bankrupt person's first step to personal economic liberation. The case of a convicted thief who is sold into slavery to raise the funds to make restitution to his victims is an even more obvious example of being a slave to sin. Servitude is a means of progressive release for him. He is already in bondage to sin; bondservice in a righteous household is the first step in his redemption out of slavery.

1. Hostility to Covenantal Sanctions

The suggestion of any links in history between covenantal faithfulness under God and personal liberty, personal responsibility, and personal economic success is unacceptable to modern political liberals, including the vast majority of today's secular university-trained Christian social theorists. They implicitly understand that if such a covenantal relationship really exists, then biblical religion promotes the idea of the free market society, where individuals are to be held legally and economically responsible for their own mistakes. If the biblical covenant really does establish this connection, then any society that is faithful to the terms of God's covenant, meaning biblical law, will eventually become capitalist. There are few ideas more repugnant to the modern, liberal-minded, humanist-educated Christian social thinker. The Book of Deuteronomy, especially chapter 28, is the great offense, the great stumbling stone, for Christian political liberals.²⁶ On the other hand, dispensational fundamentalists' hostility to the idea of the continuing authority of Old Testament law makes it virtually impossible for them to present a specifically biblical-exegetical case for the free market economy, despite the fact that their instincts are generally conservative politically.

25. David Chilton, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 4th ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1981] 1996). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>)

If this relationship between covenant-keeping and visible prosperity is denied, and poverty is not seen as statistically and covenantally correlated to ethical disobedience and a lack of self-discipline, then Old Testament servitude makes no ethical sense. Why should a man be put into legal bondage just because "random" events made him poor? If people's condition of poverty is in no statistically relevant way connected to their ethical condition, and if other people's condition of prosperity is in no statistically relevant way connected to their ethical condition, then indentured servitude, let alone intergenerational slavery, is ethically monstrous. This is exactly what modern liberal commentators say, because above all they hate the idea of God's covenant sanctions in history.

It is not random that the rise of Unitarianism (which tended to be deistic) and then Transcendentalism (which tended to be pantheistic) in New England were closely connected with the rise of abolitionism, 1820–1860.²⁷ What was common to both theological movements was a

26. It was not an accident that William E. Diehl, a self-professed Keynesian, was so offended by my presentation of the biblical case for the free market economy. What really offended him was the Old Testament. He wrote: "That the author is strong on 'biblical law' is apparent. [What is also apparent is Diehl's hostility to biblical law: he placed the phrase in quotation marks, as if Old Testament law were not really biblical law—G.N.] The essay provides us with thirty-nine Old Testament citations, of which thirty-three are from the book of Deuteronomy. . . . [T]his essay might more properly be entitled, 'Poverty and Wealth according to Deuteronomy.'" Diehl, "A Guided-Market Response," in Robert G. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), p. 66. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

27. C. Gregg Singer, A Theological Interpretation of American History (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1964), ch. 2; R. J. Rushdoony, The Nature of the American System (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1965] 2002), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/rjrnas>)

philosophy of cosmic impersonalism. Both theological systems were inherently anti-Christian and anti-covenantal. A representative statement of this anti-covenantal theology is provided by Unitarian Octavius Brooks Frothingham in his aptly titled book, The Religion of Humanity (1875): "The first sin was the first triumph of virtue. The fall was the first step forward. The advent of evil was the dawn of intelligence, discernment, enterprise, aspiration. Eden was the scene of humanity's birth. The tempter was Lucifer—the bringer of light. Thus even in him is something prophetic of salvation. The fault of Adam was disobedience to spoken law; but disobedience to arbitrary spoken decree, to unreasoning command, what is that but in essence obedience to the unspoken command of intelligence, and what is that but the soul of goodness?"²⁸ That which God is not allowed to do in history in His name—impose covenantal sanctions—the state was expected to do in the name of universal humanity.²⁹

The black slave became a tool in the statist plans of the North's Republican politicians. Congressman William D. ("Pig Iron") Kelley of Pennsylvania announced this messianic humanist vision: "Yes, sneer at or doubt it as you may, the negro is the 'coming man' for whom we have waited."³⁰ Frothingham recalled in 1875 the messianic viewpoint of his theological peers during the Civil War (1861–65): "The army of the North was to them the church militant; the leader of the army was the avenging Lord; and the reconstruction of a new order, on the basis of freedom for mankind, was the first installment of the Messianic Kingdom."³¹ What should have been a biblical moral crusade against illegitimate lifetime chattel slavery became a humanist moral crusade against all forms of private, profit-seeking servitude. The result in the twentieth century was the advancement of universal servitude to the state.

2. Protecting the Weak

The wife and children needed lawful protection. They retained their lawful protection, either from the master or from an industrious, 28. Octavius Brooks Frothingham, The Religion of Humanity (New York: Putnam's, 1875), pp. 299–300; cited in Rushdoony, Nature of the American System, p. 89.

29. See especially the book by Unitarian Moncure D. Conway, The Rejected Stone; or, Insurrection vs. Resurrection in America (Boston: Walker, Wise, 1862).

30. The Old Guard, vol. I, no. IX (Sept. 1863), p. 240; cited in Rushdoony, Nature of the American System, p. 83.

31. Frothingham, Religion of Humanity, p. 20; cited in Rushdoony, idem.

now future-oriented former bondservant, whether we are speaking of voluntary permanent servitude of the ex-bondservant husband or their purchase by him through the payment of a redemption price. But the husband would probably have retained little capital after having paid to buy freedom for his family. Nevertheless, his time orientation and demonstrated industriousness were paramount for the subsequent protection of his family, not his remaining accumulated savings. This was also true, of course, with the bride price. A young man would probably have to give most of his capital to his father-in-law at the time of the marriage, although the father-in-law probably would have passed these assets to his daughter as her permanent dowry, in lieu of her inheritance of a portion of her family's land.³²

Economically speaking, a master who wanted the lifetime services of a man had an incentive to find a man with a short-run time perspective to serve him. He might be able to persuade him to get married during his period of service. That way, the master would have gained the woman as a lifetime servant, or both of them as lifetime servants, or the bride price. But, in doing this, he risked having to take responsibility for servants with short-run outlooks, both husband and wife. He had no choice about accepting the servant as a lifetime servant; that decision was exclusively the servant's. As Mendelsohn pointed out, it was probably less expensive to hire workers part-time as needed than to buy someone's lifetime services.³³

This law does not provide specific details about the redemption of a servant wife and children from a master. What would he have had to pay to free them? We might look at the entry prices governing adoption into the Mosaic priesthood. The woman's price was 30 shekels of silver (Lev. 27:4). The restitution payment for a male or female servant killed by a goading ox was also 30 shekels (Ex. 21:32).³⁴ On the other

32. Chapter 32:B.

33. Isaac Mendelsohn, Slavery In the Ancient Near East (New York: Oxford University Press, 1949), p. 119.

34. Children adopted into a priestly family, from five years old to age 20, required an entry price of 20 shekels for boys and 10 for girls. For young children, a month to five years old, it was five shekels and three shekels (Lev. 27:5–6). Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 36. I presume, however, that no payment would have been required to redeem children, since the master controlled them only as a covenantal grandfather, not as an owner. With the restoration of the covenantally independent family unit, the children would have gone out with their parents. If this was not the rule, and he had to buy his children, then with the birth of every child, the former servant would have been penalized. It is not likely that such a penalty would hand, the compulsory bride price owed to the father of a seduced virgin was 50 shekels of silver (Deut. 22:29). It seems more likely that the price would be the bride price paid by the master to the woman's father.

If the bride price was normally 50 shekels of silver, and the market price of a female servant fluctuated, the servant-master would have been careful not to overpay. He would have preferred to buy a woman in the open market for less than 50 shekels. The servant might also have asked for a wife from the master's household servants, although the number of these servants was probably small in any household, as Mendelsohn's study indicates.³⁵ The servant probably would not have had many opportunities to meet girls outside this narrow household circle. He would have been dependent to a great extent on the servant-master's ability and willingness to locate a bride for him, unless he knew the prospective bride before he became a servant.

Why was the master entitled to payment from the former servant? Because he was still covenantally the wife's father. The man who gives a woman to another man to become his wife is covenantally her father. He was therefore entitled to a bride price—evidence that she will be protected in the new household.³⁶ The servant had taken the wife in advance, just as Jacob took Rachel after the switch had been made, and he owed the servant-master the required payment. In Jacob's case, the agreed-upon price was another seven years of service (Gen. 29:27–30).

How do we know that the husband would have been permitted to buy his family out of servitude? Because of the office of kinsman-redeemer. We know that the kinsman-redeemer was assigned the re-have been in force in a society designed by a God who favors population growth.

35. Mendelsohn, Slavery In the Ancient Near East, p. 121.

36. In the United States, fathers have historically paid for their daughters' weddings and post-wedding receptions. This is biblically foolish in a society in which the sons-in-law pay no bride price to the father. The prospective son-in-law should pay for everything. This is the father's evidence that the young man is thrifty, or at least a person who possesses inherited capital. Like the dowry that once came from the father as a gift, but which was based on the size of the bride price, so today are the presents that come from the wedding guests. The larger the wedding expenditure, the more guests who will attend; the more guests, the larger the number of presents. But the size of the wedding, and therefore the size of the gifts (her dowry) should be determined by the husband's ability to pay for the wedding, not her father's ability. The gifts to the couple are really the bride's, for they constitute her dowry, her economic protection in case she is unlawfully divorced. Should the daughter bring assets of her own to the marriage, they should remain her property in case of a divorce. They are not "community property"; they are her protection. At her death, these assets would normally go to her children.

sponsibility of buying his near-kinsman out of servitude to a stranger (Lev. 25:47–50). We know that the freed husband would have been his wife's kinsman-redeemer, as nearest of kin.

Normally, buying a wife out of servitude would have meant that the ex-servant had to earn these assets personally, unless his own kinsman-redeemer (or perhaps his wife's brother) voluntarily provided him with the funds. His ability to earn the redemption money testified to his capacity as an independent man under God. Capital was the sign of independence and maturity and therefore the means of securing his family's freedom.

F. Jesus Christ as Kinsman-Redeemer

God always allowed His people in bondage to be redeemed. This, of course, testified to the coming redemption of the nation of Israel by Jesus Christ. One way for a man to be reunited with his servant wife was for him to become adopted as a household servant, with the "circumcision of the ear" as the covenantal sign of household adoption. Only by adoption into God's family as a permanent bondservant can any person gain salvation (John 1:12). We become household servants in the family of faith.

Another important aspect of Christ's ministry is highlighted by the second avenue of escape from bondage, the bride-redemption system. Adam placed himself, his wife, and his heirs in spiritual bondage to sin. Eve suffered as a slave because of her husband's rebellious action. Ethically rebellious man still serves as a permanent slave to sin because he cannot pay the release price. But the people of God are referred to repeatedly in both testaments as being God's bride. "For thy Maker is thine husband" (Isa. 54:5a). Ezekiel 16 is built upon this analogy, as is Hosea 1–2. Christ referred to Himself as the Bridegroom (Matt. 9:15). Paul wrote: "I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ" (II Cor. 11:2b). Ephesians 5, which describes Christ's relationship to His church, is built on the analogy of marriage. The final consummation of this marriage comes with the resurrection and final judgment, when Christians shall indeed be spotless.³⁷ But in principle, we are betrothed now.

37. On the symbolic connections of circumcision to baptism, and the Passover to communion, and all four sacraments to the marriage supper, see my essay, "The Marriage Supper of the Lamb," Christianity and Civilization, 4 (1985). (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>)

The Bridegroom, as kinsman-redeemer, has paid our release price.³⁸ He progressively delivers the betrothed bride ethically, though at a distance, helping her to mature in the spiritual independence from sin that He has purchased. The church experiences progressive liberation from sin and bondage in history—a progressive liberation based on the Bridegroom’s definitive redemption payment at Calvary. The Lord’s Supper covenantally represents this communion with the Bridegroom. The church now awaits His return at the final consummation.

We know that we are in principle set free from sin, but in history, our sanctification is not yet complete. Christ has betrothed the church, thereby delivering us legally out of bondage to sin, but the consummation has not yet taken place. We wait for the return of our Bridegroom, who has redeemed us from the household of servitude. He did not betroth the church as a servant betroths. We will not remain in ethical bondage. He completed His work on Calvary. The resurrection testifies to His condition as a free man. We are resurrected in Him in principle—definitively set free judicially and ethically from sin as His lawful bride (Gal. 4:7).³⁹ But in history, we still labor under the bondage of sin (Heb. 2:8–18). Our sanctification in history is not yet complete. We have not yet been presented as a chaste virgin before Christ (II Cor. 11:2). One reason why there is no marriage after the resurrection (Matt. 22:30) is that the church has but one husband, Christ. There will be no divided family loyalties.

The marriage covenant between Christ and His church did not take place before Calvary. He was still laboring to complete His term of service. He would not marry prematurely. It was the error of the Jewish multitudes that they expected liberation—both marriage and the consummation—in history, when they hailed Him as their earthly king and placed palm branches before Him as He entered Jerusalem in the final week of His pre-resurrection ministry (John 12:12–15).

G. The Fulfillment of the Jubilee Year

God’s laws regarding Israel’s land tenure system required that every fiftieth year, each plot of ground in Israel be returned to the heirs

38. The Bridegroom is Jesus Christ. He also holds the office of kinsman-redeemer, the one who has the legal responsibility of buying his nearest of kin out of slavery, if the slave is in bondage to a foreigner (Lev. 25:47–49). North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 32.

39. North, Unconditional Surrender, ch. 2:D:1.

of the original family member who had it allocated to him after the conquest of Canaan (Lev. 25:8–34). This land tenure system was to keep those outside a particular tribe from becoming permanent owners of rural land throughout Israel. This restricted the intermarriage of the tribes (Num. 36),⁴⁰ and it also prohibited the consolidation of rural land by the Levites or the king. It was to keep the nation politically and economically decentralized. This system was also to keep strangers in the land—gentile alien residents—from ever becoming landowners rather than leaseholders, except through adoption into a Hebrew family.

1. Annulment

We know that this land tenure system was both judicially fulfilled and historically annulled by Jesus, for He explicitly transferred the kingdom of God to the gentiles (Matt. 21:43). The “strangers to the land” inherited God’s kingdom. This judicial transfer of ownership of the kingdom to the gentiles is the legal foundation of the inheritance of the earth by Christians.⁴¹ The kingdom of God no longer is uniquely connected to the land of Palestine. The conquest of Canaan by Joshua is no longer judicially relevant to members of the kingdom. The jubilee’s land-release system is therefore no longer judicially relevant in history, except as a type of Christ’s redemptive work in history.

The historical transition from the Old Testament to the New Testament, which was completed with the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D.,⁴² also abolished another law that governed the period of servitude for heathen slaves: the residency requirements for full citizenship in God’s kingdom commonwealth. The law that delayed citizenship for the heirs of bastards for ten generations (Deut. 23:2–3) was annulled with the historic destruction of Moab and Ammon, and also with the inauguration of a New Testament definition of lawful citizenship in God’s kingdom: faith in Christ and covenant membership in the church.⁴³ As the kingdom of God in history becomes progressively manifested in the affairs of men, mankind’s legal institutions are supposed to reflect 40. North, Sanctions and Dominion, ch. 22.

41. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

42. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

43. This, of course, raises a whole host of problems for any theory of universal citizenship and therefore universal suffrage.

God's kingdom. Men's institutions are supposed to be conformed to the principles of biblical law, just as men are supposed to be conformed to the image of God's Son, Jesus Christ (Rom. 8:29). To argue otherwise is to deny progressive sanctification in history, both for individuals and institutions.⁴⁴

In New Testament times, any slave must be regarded legally as an indentured servant. Involuntary lifetime servitude was abolished when Jesus fulfilled the jubilee year; the only other form of servitude authorized by the Bible is indentured servitude. A slave in New Testament times is therefore entitled to be treated as a Hebrew servant was to have been treated in the Old Testament commonwealth, with his release delayed by no more than six years, except in cases of criminal sanctions. His children must be freed upon reaching their maturity at age 20.

2. A Long History of Self-Serving Bible Interpretation

Purchasing lifetime slaves from pagan nations or resident aliens was biblically legitimate prior to Christ's fulfillment of the jubilee year, meaning prior to the abolition of its land tenure provisions. After Christ's death and resurrection, the Christian is to understand that slave-owning is for the purpose of liberating people from bondage, buying them out of demonic covenants. It is illegal to compel any male to remain in bondage beyond six years, except in the case of criminals paying off debts to victims.

This abolition of permanent slavery was long ignored or unrecognized by Bible commentators. It took Christians and Jews over 1,800 years to come to the conclusion that lifetime slavery is illegitimate. The myth that the "curse of the children of Ham" refers exclusively to blacks was adopted by Jews, Christians, and Muslims in the Middle Ages.⁴⁵ There had been a curse: Noah cursed Canaan, the son of Ham,

44. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcrg>)

45. David Brion Davis, Slavery and Human Progress (New York: Oxford University Press, 1984), p. 87. As late as 1867, Robert L. Dabney, the American South's greatest Calvinist theologian in the late nineteenth century, appealed to Genesis 9 and the curse of Canaan to justify the legitimacy of the idea of slavery in general: "... it gives us the origin of domestic slavery. And we find that it was appointed by God as the punishment of, and remedy for (nearly all God's providential chastisements are also remedial) the peculiar moral degradation of a part of the race." He did not argue that blacks are necessarily under this same curse, although he hardly denied it: "It may be that we should find little difficulty in tracing the lineage of the present Africans to but this curse was covenantal, not racial, and it was generally fulfilled by the conquest of the land of Canaan by the Israelites, and the subjection of the remnant as slaves.⁴⁶ Winthrop Jordan identified the source of the idea of Ham's curse as black skin: it first appeared in the Jewish Talmud and the Midrash.⁴⁷ Maimonides ("Rambam")⁴⁸ insisted that slaves should not be taught the Bible.⁴⁹

The medieval church recognized that Christians were not to be enslaved by infidels (Jews, Muslims), although Christians could legally own Christian slaves and non-Christian slaves.⁵⁰ The seventeenth-century Puritans, as dedicated to Old Testament law as any Christian group in history, did not believe that the sabbatical year of release, or any other law of mandatory release, applied to Negro slavery, whether the slaves were Christians or not.⁵¹ The price of slaves was kept high because slave-owners could capitalize the income stream of a lifetime of service, plus the lifetimes of the heirs of the slaves.

The classic example of "Christian" slavery is probably the case of the bequest by Christopher Codrington to London's Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (SPG) in 1710 of a plantation on Barbados with over 300 slaves. Did the SPG release them? Hardly. In 1732, a Codrington attorney suggested that the SPG cease branding the chests of newly purchased slaves with "SOCIETY." On the subject of slave marriage, the SPG was silent. The Society did not even enforce a sab-

Ham. But this inquiry is not essential to our argument." Dabney, A Defence of Virginia [And Through Her, of the South] (New York: Negro University Press, [1867] 1969), pp. 103, 104.

46. Davis appealed to the liberal higher critic Von Rad to argue that "the original Yahwistic narrative had nothing to do with Shem, Ham, and Japheth, and the ecumenical scheme of nations which follows. It was rather an older story, limited to the Palestinian Shem, Japheth, and Canaan. . . ." Davis, "Slavery and Sin: The Cultural Background," in Martin Duberman (ed.), The Antislavery Vanguard: New Essays on the Abolitionists (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1965), p. 5n.

47. Winthrop D. Jordan, White Over Black: American Attitudes Toward the Negro, 1550–1812 (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1968), p. 18. He cited the Babylonian Talmud (Soncino Press edition), tractate Sanhedrin, vol. II, p. 745; Midrash Rabbah (Soncino Press edition), vol. I, p. 293. Reprinted by Bloch Pub. Co., New York.

48. Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon.

49. Maimonides wrote: "It is forbidden for a man to teach his slave the Scriptures. If he does teach him, however, the slave does not become free thereby." Maimonides, Acquisition, "Laws Concerning Slaves," V:VIII:18, p. 278.

50. David Brion Davis, The Problem of Slavery in Western Culture (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1966), pp. 98–103.

51. Ibid., pp. 203–7. Cf. Marcus W. Jernegan, "Slavery and Conversion in the American Colonies," American Historical Review (April 1916).

bath day of rest; the slaves were worked for six days, and allowed to tend to their own plots and work on Sundays.⁵²

Nevertheless, we must recognize that these slaves had been rescued from the culture of demonism. Those who were converted to Christ are unquestionably better off today than they would be if they had remained slaves elsewhere, or even “free men,” worshipping Satan under the fear of the local shaman. They did learn something of the Western, Protestant work ethic.

H. Lifetime Servitude

The only form of non-criminal lifetime servitude authorized today by the Bible is for men who voluntarily become permanent household servants and for women who voluntarily marry these lifetime servants. A servant wife must go free upon her husband’s payment of her bride price, but she is not automatically set free with her husband.

Her potential lifetime of institutional servitude to her husband’s former master is an institutional manifestation of a married woman’s lifetime of covenantal subordination—a subordination that is necessarily involved judicially in every marriage covenant. This idea appalls most modern Christian commentators. They simply refuse to take this law seriously. They have also begun to refuse to take biblical marriage seriously. (When was the last time you heard any Christian scholar call for the imposition by civil government of the death penalty for adultery, as specified by Leviticus 20:10?)⁵³ Christians have begun to think as humanists do. Humanism’s view of Exodus 21:2–4 is matched by twenty-first-century humanism’s view of marriage.

God has imposed laws governing marriage, and therefore He has also imposed laws governing women who marry indentured servants. Humanists reject these laws. This is the reason why wives are regarded today as not being legally entitled to the economic protection that biblical law mandates for wives. Husbands are allowed to break their marriage vows almost at will. They are increasingly permitted by church courts and civil courts to abandon most of their economic obligations to their former wives. Modern humanism’s hostility to the God-imposed legal requirements of Exodus 21:2–4 is generally accompanied by an equal hostility to the idea of marriage as a God-required legal

52. Ibid., pp. 219–20.

53. As to the question of whether the death penalty was automatic, as distinguished from the maximum penalty that the victim (the woman’s husband) could demand, see Chapter 34: “Kidnapping.”

subordination of wives to husbands: the biblical idea of marriage. Humanists take pride in defying God's law regarding servant wives, and then they take pride in ignoring God's laws regarding adultery. Innocent, non-adulterous wives are inevitably the victims.

Israel also defied God's laws regarding servitude. Prior to their captivity, Israel and Judah did not honor the terms of the sabbatical year, at least with respect to the resting of the land. Jeremiah says specifically that their removal from the land was required by God in order to give the land its accumulated sabbaths (Jer. 50:34; cf. II Chron. 36:21). Jeremiah's account also indicates that slaves had not been released, at least in his day (Jer. 34).

The institution of servitude is founded on the existing condition of all mankind as slaves to sin. Because of differences in ethical and moral capacities among men, some men find themselves unable to cope with their environment. Lacking an adequate degree of personal self-government, they need guidance in a disciplined but protected environment. The indentured servant system allows men to overcome their lack of self-discipline and lack of specialized knowledge of the requirements of dominion. For up to six years, a regenerate person can be kept in servitude in order to pay off his debts. A criminal, however, can be kept beyond the sixth year in order to make restitution. Indentured servitude protects the victims, either creditors or victims of crime.

Wives of servants under the Mosaic Covenant were entitled to protection. The husband of a wife married in servitude had not exercised personal self-discipline (or was overcome by his environment) prior to his marriage, and had been forced to become a bondservant. Subsequently, he did not exercise long-term deferred gratification in order to wait for his release before marrying. Thus, his lack of self-discipline and lack of future-orientation was institutionalized by the marriage. His wife was the property of her master until the day that her husband could buy her freedom as her closest relative, meaning her kinsman-redeemer. A relative could always redeem a servant, even one owned by a foreigner (Lev. 25:48–49). She received the protection of one man or another who was capable of dealing successfully with his environment, either her liberated husband or her original master.

The man who paid the bride price to a girl's father in order to provide a concubine⁵⁴ for his son or his servant thereby became her covenantal father. In this sense, the office of father was legally transfer-able. This transfer was based on a legal adoption. Adoption is also the legal basis of marriage; the bride is adopted into the family of her husband.⁵⁵ Thus, the released male bondservant owed the slave-owner a bride price for the wife he had already been given, for the slave-owner had taken the office of covenantal father from her biological father. This is the reason why Jacob owed Laban seven additional years of service for Rachel: she had come to him in advance of any such payment. Until the bride price was paid to her owner, the servant wife would remain the master's legally adopted daughter. She would have to remain in his household. The payment of the bride price to her biological father by her master was the legal basis of her continuing position as bondservant in her master's house, but the payment of the release price by her released husband to her legal owner would be the legal basis of her emancipation. There was always the legal possibility of release from female indentured servitude by means of a payment of a release price or a bride price.

54. A wife whose father had not provided her with a dowry.

Conclusion

The goal of indentured servitude is to impart the economic and self-motivational skills of dominion to people who have in the past not demonstrated their ability to cope with a cursed, resistant environment. The goal is ethical self-government, but the starting point is economic self-government, which is the responsibility of all free men under God. A person who has been broken by some aspect of the external environment is given the tools of dominion—ethical, educational, motivational, and, after at most six years of service, technological—by his close contact with, and subordination to, a competent master.

There was one major danger in this system. The master might decide to gain a lifetime pair of bondservants for himself by taking advantage of the present-orientation of the male bondservant. If he could persuade the man to accept a servant girl as his wife, he might be able to persuade the man later on to become a lifetime bondservant by submitting to the ritual of the drilled ear (Ex. 21:5–6). There are always pitfalls for present-oriented men. But in ancient Israel, a man who wanted a wife or a concubine would have had to pay a bride price anyway. The difference was, a released man might be able to earn this by saving his money for several years after his release. By taking a bride before his release, he might find this too difficult, and so he might have been tempted to sell himself into lifetime servitude. But this was the outgrowth of the moral flaw of the bondservant: his present-orientation.

55. Ray R. Sutton, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Divorce and Remarriage (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), Part 2. (<http://bit.ly/rssecond>)

WIVES AND CONCUBINES

And if a man sell his daughter to be a maidservant, she shall not go out as the menservants do. If she please not her master, who hath betrothed her to himself, then shall he let her be redeemed: to sell her unto a strange nation he shall have no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her. And if he have betrothed her unto his son, he shall deal with her after the manner of daughters. If he take him another wife; her food, her raiment, and her duty of marriage, shall he not diminish. And if he do not these three unto her, then shall she go out free without money (Ex. 21:7–11).

The theocentric issue here is God as the bridegroom of Israel. God first adopted Israel, then married her (Ezek. 16:1–14). He showed grace to an abandoned daughter of Canaan (vv. 3–4). This symbolism was not to serve as a license for incest, which was (and still is) explicitly prohibited by biblical law (Lev. 18:6–7).¹ This symbolism was a defense of the biblical office of husband: he adopts a bride.

The Mosaic servitude laws that governed female bondservants were tied directly to the laws governing marriage. The reason was simple, though not inherently obvious: a Hebrew woman could not be permanently purchased, although she could become a maidservant; she could only be adopted. She could not go out of her father's household "as the menservants do." The theocentric principle illustrated by this law is this: adoption by God is the sole basis of man's deliverance.

These laws governed female bondservants, and they also governed marriage. The marriage of a female bondservant was governed by laws different from those governing the marriage of a free woman. Why should this have been the case? How was marriage to a bondwoman different from marriage to a free woman? Why would God have established two different forms of marriage? Does such a distinction still apply to marriages in New Testament times?

1. This poses a difficult exegetical problem for those who deny the continuing authority of Old Testament law in the New Testament era: On what basis can one biblically and authoritatively deny the legality of incest?

We must begin our analysis with the biblical doctrine of the bride of God, a theme that appears throughout both Testaments. We must begin with the covenantal marriage between God and Israel, for we recognize the theocentric nature of the Bible. God's covenantal relations with men should always be our starting point for any discussion of men's relationships with each other and with the environment. Therefore, before we examine the economics of this slave wife transaction, we must first understand the distinction between a wife and a concubine. A wife came into an Old Covenant marriage with a dowry; the concubine did not.

A. God Married Israel

God speaks of Israel as His bride in Ezekiel 16. The chapter begins with a description of Israel's illegitimacy. God told Ezekiel, "And say, Thus saith the Lord GOD unto Jerusalem; Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother an Hittite" (Ezek. 16:3). The parents had ignored the child, not even cutting its navel or washing it (v. 4). The infant had been cast off by its parents, even as a bastard child is cast off, "to the loathing of thy person" (v. 5). Israel was therefore an orphan as well as a bastard.

God "passed by" Israel, and "saw thee polluted in thine own blood" (v. 6). He caused Israel to multiply, to come to maturity. God again "passed by" Israel, and looked with mercy on the nation. Then God married Israel: "Now when I passed by thee, and looked upon thee, behold, thy time was the time of love; and I spread my skirt over thee, and covered thy nakedness: yea, I swore unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee, saith the Lord GOD, and thou becamest mine" (v. 8). The imagery is very similar to the imagery in Ruth 3, where rich Boaz spread his own cloak over poverty-stricken Moabitess Ruth (v. 10), as a testimony of his covenantal promise to marry her (v. 13).

1. Concubine or Bride?

The question is: Was Israel a concubine or a true bride? Ezekiel 16 assures us that Israel was a true bride. Ezekiel describes God's provision for His bride:

Then washed I thee with water; yea, I thoroughly washed away thy blood from thee, and I anointed thee with oil. I clothed thee also with brodered work, and shod thee with badgers' skin, and I girded thee about with fine linen, and I covered thee with silk. I decked thee also with ornaments, and I put bracelets upon thy hands, and a chain on thy neck (vv. 9–11).

The description continues: God gave Israel a jewel for her forehead, earrings, a crown, fine linen, and the best food (vv. 11–13). "And thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty: for it was perfect through my comeliness, which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord GOD" (v. 14). But then Israel played the whore, trusting in her own beauty (vv. 15–31). "But as a wife that committeth adultery, which taketh strangers instead of her husband! They give gifts to all whores: but thou givest thy gifts to all thy lovers, and hirest them, that they may come unto thee on every side for thy whoredom" (vv. 32–33).

Israel was God's bride, not His concubine. What was the difference between a bride and a concubine? It was the presence of a dowry in the original marriage covenant. The concubine possessed no dowry. Israel had possessed nothing of her own to bring into the marriage. God had discovered Israel as a man discovers a cast-off infant at the side of the road. Upon her maturity, God graciously washed her and "covered her nakedness" with his own garment (v. 8a), a symbolic reference to marriage: "yea, I swore unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee" (v. 8b). There is no question: Israel was God's bride. Her adultery was therefore much worse than if she had been a mere concubine. She had been decked in ornaments, the proof of her status as a wife, yet she had traded them for the pleasures provided by male whores, meaning the gods and rituals of the surrounding nations. Worse than a whore who was in it for the money, Israel was a wife who was in it for the sheer pleasure of covenant-breaking. It was the difference between the low-passion, income-seeking sin of the professional prostitute and the high-passion, self-conscious rebellion of the adulterer. Prostitution was not a capital crime in Israel; had it been a capital crime, there would have been no need for a law prohibiting the high priest from marrying a prostitute (Lev. 21:14). Adultery was a capital crime (Lev. 20:10). This was the heart of Israel's self-conscious perversion: "And the contrary is in thee from other women in thy whoredoms, whereas none followeth thee to commit whoredoms: and in that thou givest a reward, and no reward is given unto thee, therefore thou art contrary" (v. 34). It was Israel's position as a bride with her own assets, enabling her to pay for her consorts, that marked her as uniquely evil.

2. Grace and Marriage

God's marriage to Israel was an act of grace. God recognized that Israel was a bastard nation, an orphan. Ultimately, this is the spiritual and legal condition of all humanity, for humanity is fallen, disinherited by God because of Adam's rebellion. Nevertheless, God singled out Israel as uniquely fallen, uniquely in need of God's grace. Without God's grace, there could be no life, marriage, or future.² Thus, God displays His common grace to all people by giving them life, marriage, and a future. But He displays His special grace to His people by entering into a covenant with them, one so intimate that only the marriage analogy suffices to explain it (Eph. 5:22–23).

If God had not stopped to give life to Israel, the people would have perished. Moses' generation was to learn this lesson again and again in four decades of wandering. If God had not married Israel, the Hebrews would have had neither protection nor hope for the future. God granted them both life and protection. He granted them legitimate hope.

For Israel to become a fully protected bride, she had to receive a dowry. The dowry served the bride as her token of security in case her husband divorced her or in other ways abused her. The dowry was her token of independence. A free woman was a wife who could survive economically even if her husband broke his covenant with her. God provided a huge dowry to Israel in Ezekiel 16 as a visible manifestation of His grace and protection. What husband would endow a wife with such wealth if He intended to divorce her? Thus, the very magnitude of His visible grace testified to her permanently protected legal status under God.

Israel then squandered her dowry in repeated acts of covenantal rebellion. She impoverished herself through idolatry and whoredom. Step by step, she placed herself in the economic position of a concubine: an unendowed wife. But she was far worse than a concubine, who would have possessed no dowry of her own to squander; she was an adulteress who had squandered God's marriage gifts. She was clearly deserving of death (Lev. 20:10). It was only God's grace to Israel in not bringing her before the bar of justice that enabled her to maintain her status as even God's concubine.³

2. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

3. At the end, national Israel pronounced judgment against Jesus Christ and joined with her false lover, Rome, in a fatal affair. Both perished, but national Israel perished first, when she twice proved false to Rome in rebellion, in A.D. 69–70, and in A.D.

What this testifies to is that even the concubine's status is a position that depends on grace. God recognizes that societies and individuals fall into sin, and from sin into poverty (Deut. 28:18). Thus, His law made it possible for a daughter of a poor Israelite to marry into a family that could afford to pay a bride price. In effect, this option of concubinage was a poor girl's way out of poverty. Her father had no way to protect her economically. If every marriage had required a dowry, she might never have been able to marry. Her future as a mother would have been cut off. So, God graciously established a way out: concubinage. This pointed to something that the Bible never says explicitly, but which Ezekiel 16 points to: the biblical requirement of the bride price for a free woman.

B. Bride Price and Dowry

God gave Israel jewels and bracelets. This is reminiscent of the gifts to Rebekah from Abraham's servant: "And the servant brought forth jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment, and gave them to Rebekah: he gave also to her brother and to her mother precious things" (Gen. 24:53). Abraham, as Isaac's father, used his capital to pay the girl and her relatives. The property would ultimately have become Isaac's, however, for it was part of his inheritance. Abraham acted as a representative of his son. He supplied the bride price, and his own agent acted in Isaac's best interests. The gifts from Abraham served as her dowry, and the gifts to the relatives served as a bride price. This indicates that the bride price could be separated from the dowry, meaning that the family could keep part of the total payment without passing the total bride price to the daughter as her dowry. This could become a means of increasing the capital base of the family of the bride. This would clearly have made the daughter an economic asset for her family.

There was a covenantal reason for this economic obligation on the part of a bridegroom. The father of the prospective bride represented God to his daughter. This covenantal authority before God—this position as God's representative to his daughter—had to be lawfully transferred from the father to the bridegroom. By paying the bride price to her father, the bridegroom ritually swore to a lifetime of faithfulness to 132–34 under Bar Kochba. The Jews were scattered throughout the empire by the Romans in 135. See Heinrich Graetz, History of the Jews, 6 vols. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, [1893] 1945), II, chaps. 15, 16.

his wife as God's representative over her, faithfulness comparable to what her father's faithfulness to her had been. This is precisely what Jesus swore to God the Father in His role as the cosmic Bridegroom. He paid the price at Calvary. God then transferred all authority over heaven and earth to Christ as His lawful representative (Matt. 28:18–20).⁴

1. Cancelling the Daughter's Obligation

The dowry functioned in Israel as an alternative to inheritance by daughters. Sons inherited the family land in the Old Testament, not daughters. Sons had the responsibility of caring for aged parents, not daughters and sons-in-law.⁵ To whom much is given, much is expected (Luke 12:47–48). Because the daughter could not inherit, she was not obligated to share in her parents' support. But because she would not share in her parents' support, she was not supposed to receive her dowry from her father's capital, for this would deplete the portion remaining to her brothers. The system was consistent.

Normally, the bride price was used to repay the family for the expense of the dowry. Such a system guaranteed that being a daughter would not be regarded by her family as being an economic liability. The bride price kept daughters from draining the inheritance that normally went to sons. A daughter did not normally remain economically responsible for her parents; she became responsible for her husband's parents. Why? Because legally she was adopted into the family of her husband. Thus, inheritances in Israel went to sons, who later cared for aged parents, and dowries went to daughters, who extended their original family's ethical standards over time, though not the family's name.

To enable a girl to leave her father's household as a free woman—a wife with a dowry—the bridegroom paid the bride price. Most of the bride price or perhaps all of it would have passed to his wife as her dowry. By paying her father the equivalent of the girl's dowry, he was relieving both her and himself from the legal obligation to support her parents in their old age. The girl's father would officially provide the dowry. The daughter would therefore be in a position to take a portion of the family's inheritance now, indicating her future obligation. Then the bridegroom would replace the dowry with the payment of the bride price, thereby relieving her and himself of the future responsibilities associated with supporting her parents. Her brothers lost nothing, she gained a dowry, and he escaped the future obligation of supporting her parents.

4. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

5. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 180.

Whether she brought a dowry into the marriage or not, the bridegroom had to pay the bride price to her father or to her brothers. This indicated that, in principle, he owed the family of the bride some form of service if he was going to be permitted to marry the daughter. He was allowed to substitute a bride price for actual service. In Jacob's case, for example, he actually had to serve Laban for 14 years in payment for Rachel and Leah, for he had no capital to pay the bride price, because he had fled from his father's house without bringing his inheritance (Gen. 29). Why did Jacob owe such service? Because in each marriage, he wanted a wife with a dowry, but if their father had unilaterally paid the dowry each time as their brothers' representative, then in effect the brothers were paying the sisters to leave the family and join themselves to another family. This would have been the economic equivalent of the daughters' taking present family assets, yet also avoiding future family responsibilities.

Without the existence of the bride price requirement, a girl's brothers would have been tempted to regard her as a liability, a potential drain on the family's capital, meaning their own inheritance.⁶ They would have had an incentive to refuse to allow any man to marry her, for her services in the existing household would have been valuable. Why give her up to serve another, and also allow her to take with her present family capital? Who could be sure that she and her husband would support the aged parents in the future? How could her brothers enforce such a requirement? In contrast, with a bride price system operating, there was even a possibility for family gain as well as loss, as the case of Rebekah's family indicates. Old Testament law nowhere specified that all of the bride price would become the girl's dowry. The bride price might sometimes actually exceed the dowry.

6. In India, a Hindu with many daughters is ruined. If he also has sons, they will inherit little. The cost of the dowries will wipe out his capital. This makes daughters a liability. A similar rule prevailed in early modern Europe, where fathers had to supply the dowry to the grooms. "Girls became, in such a system, a liability." Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 177. He cited Iris Origo, The World of San Bernardino (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1962), pp. 52–53.

2. Competitive Bargaining

The final allocation of the bride price would have been established by competitive bargaining of her father and the potential bridegroom or by their representatives.⁷ Shechem's father Hamor dealt with Jacob and Dinah's brothers in the matter of his son's seduction of Dinah, although the text indicates that Shechem was also present (Gen. 34:6–11). In general, bargaining being what it is, the two payments would have been similar in magnitude, except in the case of a seduction. In this unique case, the bride price was far more likely to exceed the normal dowry. Because Shechem was a seducer, he was in no position to bargain: "Ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me: but give me the damsel to wife" (Gen. 34:12).

Why couldn't the father have agreed with the bridegroom on allowing a marriage with neither dowry nor bride price? The girl would not deplete her brothers' inheritance by taking a dowry with her, and the bridegroom would not be required to come up with the bride price. After all, if the size of the bride price was even close to the dowry, the marriage could presumably take place without either of the ritual asset transfers: bridegroom to father, father to daughter. What would have been wrong with this? There are three reasons: (1) the bride price served as a screening device; (2) it served as a ritual sign of subordination; and (3) the dowry served as the woman's protection against the short-sightedness of her husband and perhaps also her father and brothers.

3. Screening Device

By the payment of the bride price, the groom was also acknowledging that he was capable of being as good a supporter of the girl as her father had been. He needed to assure her family of her future eco-

7. This same competitive outlook regarding arranged marriages prevailed in seventeenth-century New England; so did the system of family representation. Edmund Morgan described the process of marriage bargaining: ". . . in many cases the wooing of a lady consisted largely in financial bargaining. In the case of widows and widowers the haggling took place directly between the parties concerned, but in most first marriages the parents fought out the sordid pecuniary details while the children were left to the business of knitting their affections to each other. The latter process, however, was usually supposed to follow rather than precede the financial agreement." Edmund S. Morgan, The Puritan Family: Religion and Domestic Relations in Seventeenth-Century New England, rev. ed. (New York: Harper Torchbooks, [1944] 1966), pp. 56–57.

conomic protection, thereby releasing her father and brothers from this legal responsibility. His ability to follow through on this covenantal guarantee was revealed by his ability to pay the bride price. The bride price was therefore an economic screening device for the family of the girl. The bridegroom's ability to pay a bride price was evidence of his outward faithfulness to the terms of God's covenant.⁸ The parents were transferring legal responsibility to a new covenantal head. They were participating in the establishment of a new family. Thus, the in-laws had to serve as God's agents. Rushdoony wrote that "the Hebrew word for bridegroom means 'the circumcised,' the Hebrew word for father-in-law means he who performed the operation of circumcision, and the Hebrew word for mother-in-law is similar. This obviously had no reference to the actual physical rite, because Hebrew males were circumcised on the eighth day. What it meant was that the father-in-law ensured the fact of spiritual circumcision, as did the mother-in-law, by making sure of the covenantal status of the groom. It was their duty to prevent a mixed marriage. A man could marry their daughter, and become a bridegroom, only when clearly a man under God."⁹

The bride price was also a sign of the bridegroom's future-orientation and self-discipline. Because Jacob came without capital into Laban's household, he first had to work for Laban as a servant for seven years in order to prove his capacity to lead his own household. To lead covenantally, you must first follow. To rule, you must also have served. Dominion is by covenant, and covenants are always hierarchical.¹⁰ This hierarchical structure of the biblical covenant is, above all, the message of the Book of Exodus. Israel was to be visibly under God's administration, not Pharaoh's.

Finally, the bride price was proof of the bridegroom's lawful subordination to his own father, under whom he had probably worked in an agricultural society, or from whom he had received the bride price as part of his inheritance.¹¹

8. Those who deny that there has ever been any relationship between individual productivity and personal faithfulness to the external requirements of the covenant (Deut. 28:1–14) will reject this explanation of the usefulness of the bride price. Those who think it makes sense as a screening device will be led to conclude that there must have been a predictable relationship between economic performance and faithfulness to the covenant's external requirements.

9. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 344.

10. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

11. Christ's faithful service to His Father during His earthly ministry was the basis of His ability to provide a bride price for the church.

4. Symbol of Subordination

The bride price was an extension of the bridegroom's productivity to the girl's household. The bride price was therefore symbolic of the son-in-law's devotion and subordination to her father, as if he were a family member, although this was not an actual contract to become a son who would inherit. The bride price testified to the covenantal requirements that sons-in-law owe to fathers-in-law. It testified that the bridegroom had previously served someone else (probably his father) productively, and he had amassed capital equivalent to what could be accumulated during a period of subordination to the father-in-law. He then transferred this capital to his father-in-law as a ritual sign of his subordination.

The bride price compensated the father for the expense of the daughter's dowry. From a purely economic standpoint, the dowry could have been delivered directly from the bridegroom to the daughter. Why did God require this seemingly unnecessary intermediate step, the payment of the bride price to the father? Because the formal transfer of the bride price to her father pointed to the bridegroom's requirement of covenantal subordination to her father. We see this clearly in the case of Saul's insistence on payment from David, despite the fact that Saul did not ask David to supply Michal's dowry. Saul could require the payment of a bride price. In fact, the killing of Goliath was in effect the bride price. He promised his daughter to the one who defeated Goliath (I Sam. 17:25b). Saul was demanding the payment of an additional bride price, the hundred foreskins of Philistines. Neither the death of Goliath nor the foreskins of the Philistines would have served as an economic dowry for his daughter.

David knew that he could not afford the bride price appropriate to a king's daughter, for he was a poor man (I Sam. 18:23b). Only if Saul fulfilled his promise and supplied David with great riches (I Sam. 17:25b) could David afford the bride price. The king, by implicitly agreeing to supply her with her dowry, was in effect backing away from his original promise to give Goliath's victor great riches. What he insisted on instead was the payment of a second bride price that he believed was in his own interest, though not his economic interest. "Thus shall ye say to David, The king desireth not any dowry, but an hundred foreskins of the Philistines" (I Sam. 18:25a). He hoped to see David killed in an attempt to pay it (I Sam. 18:25b). David delivered the hundred foreskins to Saul in place of the normal bride price, much to Saul's surprise and consternation (I Sam. 18:29). The issue was not economics; it was covenantal subordination. David was obedient to Saul continually.

The passage in Ezekiel 16 does not mention the payment of a bride price by God to Israel's parents. This is because Israel was a bastard. The parents—Amorites and Hittites—had cast out the nation of Israel. Israel was covenantally not only a bastard but also an orphan. So, God intervened and paid Israel's dowry directly to the bride by dressing her. He owed nothing to the Amorites or Hittites. He was in no way obligated to any pagan culture.

5. Protection for the Wife

The dowry was an extension of the father's reputation and his family's reputation to his daughter and her children. It was a sign of future-orientation on his part. The dowry testified to the father's covenantal obligation to future generations born through his daughters, even though they would not inherit his name or his land. It also acknowledged that daughters were not covenantally inferior to sons.

The dowry assured the daughter a degree of economic independence if her future husband proved incompetent or died without leaving her much immediately useful capital, or if he divorced her.

The dowry served as a kind of "incompetence insurance." What if her husband divorced her, and her father and brothers should lose their wealth at the same time? The wife could not easily return empty-handed to her father's household under such conditions. With a dowry she would be protected from this sort of dual calamity.

6. The Concubine

God in his grace protects women. Brides need protection. The Old Testament required payment to the bride's family. This insured at least some degree of competence on the part of bridegrooms or their families. But God also acknowledges the legitimacy of marriage despite a girl's poverty. She was not absolutely required to bring a dowry into the marriage, the way the bridegroom was required to bring a bride price. Her father's improvidence was not to make her marriage impossible; his improvidence was not supposed to trap her in his household if there was a way for her to improve her economic position.

The evidence of a slave marriage's forced status was the fact that her father kept the bride price. By keeping it, he was acknowledging that he had been improvident, and that he either cared little for his daughter's future protection against an unjust husband, or that he simply could not afford to give her the dowry she needed. In either case, his failure to provide her a dowry lowered her future legal status to that of concubine (slave wife). On the other hand, there were economic benefits to compensate her for her lowered legal status.

If a girl's father was so defenseless economically that he decided to sell her, she obviously had very little, if any, choice in the matter. Nevertheless, it was better for her to be provided for in a new household than to live hand to mouth in her father's household. But to improve her economic position by moving out of her impoverished family's household, she had to sacrifice her legal status as a free woman. This would be a marriage of necessity, a slave marriage. This was the legal meaning of concubinage. She was going to be put into the position of a slave. She could not veto this slave marriage (concubinage), any more than a male Hebrew slave could veto a decision by his master to sell him to a new master.¹²

This is indirect evidence that daughters in Israel did have the right to veto conventional arranged marriages. That was part of what it meant to be a free woman: neither completely dependent on an improvident father nor on an improvident or unjust future bridegroom. The dowry system provided this protection, thereby making her a free woman. Wealth revealed her legal status.

C. Marriage and Adoption

The text reads: "And if a man sell his daughter to be a maidservant, she shall not go out as the menservants do. If she please not her master, who hath betrothed her to himself, then shall he let her be redeemed: to sell her unto a strange nation he shall have no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her" (Ex. 21:7–8). What does it mean, "she shall not go out as the menservants do"? This refers to the girl's special position of covenantal subordination. She could not be bought and sold by resident aliens in the same way that sons could be.¹³

12. Maimonides supported half of my contention. On the one hand, he denied that a Hebrew male servant could be sold to any other family. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Acquisition, vol. 12 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1951), "Treatise V: Laws Concerning Slaves," IV:10, p. 262. On the other hand, he did affirm that the young bondwoman could reject the proposed marriage: ibid., V:IV:8, 8, p. 262.

13. Maimonides concluded that the phrase, "she shall not go out as the menses-

1. Protection for Daughters

The text says that “to sell her unto a strange nation he shall have no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her.” Does this mean that female servants who had not been deceived could be sold into a foreign nation, meaning outside the land? It could not possibly mean this, because no Hebrew could be sold lawfully to anyone outside the land. The Hebrews were sojourners with God in the land (Lev. 25:23). The term “strange nation” must be interpreted here as “strange people.” These were resident aliens in Israel. A Hebrew male servant could be sold to any Hebrew inside the land.¹⁴ Normally, the resident alien was not under the limitations of the sabbatical year; he was only under the terms of the jubilee year. Because the resident alien could capitalize up to 49 years of service from a Hebrew male bondservant (Lev. 25:47–52), he was in a position to offer a higher purchase price. This would have created a major source of profit: buying sabbatical-year-release Hebrews bondservants and selling them to pagans. Therefore, we have to conclude that if a Hebrew sabbatical-year bondservant was sold to a resident alien, the stranger would have had to abide in this unique instance by the terms of the sabbatical year. It is illegal to sell what you do not own; a Hebrew who purchased a sabbatical-year Hebrew servant did not own any claim on his services beyond the sabbatical year.¹⁵

What this passage establishes, at the very least, is that a Hebrew girl could not be sold to a stranger.¹⁶ There was a covenantal reason for this restriction: hierarchy. A woman was always covenantally subordinate to a man, except for a widow (Num. 30:9). She was inherently in a position of covenantal subordination. It was therefore illegal to sell her into a pagan household ruled under pagan household deities. This cultural influence was too dangerous for her, compared to the risks for vants do,” meant that if her master knocked out her tooth or blinded her in one eye, she would not become a free woman, although a male bondservant injured this way did go out free. This, in spite of the plain reading of the text: “And if a man smite the eye of his servant, or the eye of his maid, that it perish; he shall let him go free for his eye’s sake” (Ex. 21:26). Ibid., V:IV:6, p. 261.

14. Maimonides denied this: “The Hebrew slave may neither be sold by her master or given away to another man, regardless of whether he is a stranger or a kinsman.” Maimonides, Acquisition, V:IV:10, p. 262. He went so far as to say, “Neither may one sell or give away to another a Hebrew male slave.” Idem.

15. A Hebrew convicted of a crime and sold into bondservice was therefore legal to sell again to a resident alien on the same terms: service for full restitution.

16. Rabbi Moses ben Nachman [Ramban], Commentary on the Torah: Exodus (New York: Shilo, [1267?] 1973), pp. 352–53.

a man. A father could not sell a daughter into a foreign household, for he was her lawful representative before God. His son could lawfully be sold into servitude to a resident alien.¹⁷

2. Adoption

The daughter referred to in the text was someone who had been bought from her father to become a wife, either for the master or for his son. Thus, she was bought by means of a permanent transfer of authority. The master, as either a future husband or future father-in-law, was making a permanent purchase. If he bought her to give to his son, then he was covenantally becoming her father. He would thereby take full responsibility as her covenant father for giving her to his own son, who would guarantee her a lifetime of support. He was in effect adopting her into his household. It was not a six-year or less guarantee, but rather a lifetime guarantee.¹⁸

Consider Ezekiel 16. At first, Israel is described as a discarded infant. God “passes by” her, picks her up, and raises her until she becomes an adult (vv. 6–7). This was clearly an act of adoption. Then the same phrase occurs again, God “passes by” her (v. 8). This time, however, God married her. Thus, with respect to God’s salvation of Israel, covenantal adoption took place before covenantal marriage. This is why Exodus 21:8 says, “If she please not her master, who hath betrothed her to himself, then shall he let her be redeemed.” The master was not allowed to keep her if he did not marry her, assuming some relative would buy her. He was able to buy her only as a bridegroom purchases a wife for himself, or as a father purchases a wife for his son.

The text says, “And if he hath betrothed her unto his son, he shall deal with her after the manner of daughters” (v. 9). He was required to treat her as if he were her father, for covenantally speaking, he had in fact become her father. When Abraham sent his servant to find a wife for Isaac, he was in effect adopting Rebekah into his household. He was taking parental responsibility for her. He was promising to watch over her as conscientiously as her own father or brothers would.

17. The relevant case law in this regard is Exodus 21:7: “And if a man sell his daughter to be a maidservant, she shall not go out as the menservants do.” This implies that sons could be sold.

18. Maimonides viewed her tenure as an espoused bride as ending when she reached puberty, after age 12. Fathers could not sell daughters, he argued, once they reached puberty: Acquisition, “Slave Laws,” IV:1, p. 259. She had to consent to the marriage, IV:8, p. 262. If the master refuses to marry her, either to himself or his son, “she shall go out free for nothing” at puberty: IV:9, p. 262. He was silent about the explicit biblical text, “let her be redeemed” (v. 8). If the master fails to marry her, her father or kinsman-redeemer can redeem her. The text says nothing about going out for free, or her puberty, or any restriction against the sale of daughters beyond puberty.

Similarly, when a bridegroom took a wife, he was becoming her covenantal brother.¹⁹ This is why Abraham was not lying to Abimelech when he called Sarah his sister (Gen. 26:7). This is why the betrothed man in the Song of Solomon exclaimed, “Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse. . . . How fair is thy love, my sister, my spouse!” (Song 4:9a, 10a). The bridegroom promised to care for the woman as if he were her brother. Covenantally, she was adopted into the family of her husband. The Western practice of giving the bride the last name of her husband indicates her adoption into the bridegroom’s family. This is also why both sets of parental in-laws are usually referred to as Mom or Dad by the children. It is a verbal acknowledgment of the covenantal relationship of adoption.

D. The Concubine

Rachel and Leah complained that their father Laban had squandered the inheritance that they and their children were entitled to (Gen. 31:14–16), treating them as if they had been sold into slavery. They had in mind the accumulated earnings of fourteen years of Jacob’s labors to pay their bride prices. Jacob had earned this wealth back from Laban, as they recognized (v. 16), but this meant that it once again belonged to Jacob; they still had no dowries. They were being re-legated by their father to the status of concubines, not wives.

1. Endowing a Daughter

In ancient Israel, keeping the bride price was the economic equivalent of selling a daughter into slavery. When a father in this way sold his daughter to a husband, he was legally making her a concubine. He did not pass on to her any portion of the money he had received from the bridegroom or her future father-in-law. He kept it all. This is why the transaction was a purchase. His daughter was becoming a bondservant inside another man’s household. This bondservice would not be governed by the sabbatical principle of the year of release. Also, her father did not retain the right of redeeming her as her kinsman-redeemer, unless the man who bought her decided before the marriage to return her, and her father could and would repay him his bride price. Thus, a concubine was a permanent bondservant who worked at the discretion of her husband.

19. Sutton, That You May Prosper, pp. 149–51.

Does this mean that her betrothed husband could have sold her to another Hebrew at will? To answer this question, we must first look at the covenantal nature of her position. The text speaks of “her master, who hath betrothed her.” The betrothal constituted a marriage promise, but because she was not a free woman, meaning a woman with a dowry, this was not a totally binding vow on his part. It was not the same legally as a promise to marry a free woman for whom a bride price had been paid, and who brought a dowry into the marriage. We know that it was not the same, because it was not considered adultery for another man to have sexual relations with her. The two would be scourged but not executed, “because she was not free” (Lev. 19:20). If a woman possessed a dowry, then a betrothal was the same covenantally as a marriage vow. Sexual relations with such a woman was a capital crime (Deut. 22:23–24). Thus, there were two kinds of betrothals; they were covenantally and legally different. The covenantal sign that distinguished between them was the dowry. The difference was covenantal—free vs. unfree—but the visible manifestation of this difference was economic.

The question then arises: Which was the determining factor in determining her status, the legal or the economic? The Bible always places the foundational status of all human relationships in the legal sphere, not the physical, intellectual, emotional, or economic sphere. It is this legal relationship that governs all of God’s relationships with mankind, either saved or lost. What was the covenantal basis of her legal status as a wife? Her position as an adopted daughter. Her father allowed her to be adopted by another family. He relinquished his position as her covenantal representative before God.

What about her status as a concubine? Her father determined the economic terms of her adoption. He chose to keep the bride price for himself. In so doing, he placed her in a second-best legal status. His motivation was no doubt deeply tied to his personal or familistic economic goals, but the basis of her status as a concubine was the result of a legal transfer of covenantal authority over her, not economics as such. Her primary status was that of wife, meaning an adopted sister (Song 4:9–10). Her secondary legal status as a concubine stemmed from the nature of the one-step transfer of wealth from the bridegroom to her father. Biblical law recognized her vulnerability and took steps to protect her. Her father determined her legal status; economics was his motivating factor in making this legal determination.

2. Consummation and Legal Protection

Once their sexual union had taken place, the marriage was covenantally complete. It then became a capital crime for another man to take her sexually. Thus, she became a true wife. We now return to the original question: Could her husband then sell her to anyone who would pay him what he had paid to her father? The text does not indicate any such right on his part. He could sell her to another Hebrew during the betrothal period with her family's consent. He could thereby transfer her covenantal position as an adopted woman, though not to a resident alien, who did not have the legal right of adopting Hebrews into his household. But once covenantally bonded sexually before God, she became his wife. He could not divorce her, except insofar as any wife could be divorced. The Bible is silent about any special divorce proceedings available to him under concubinage.

On the other hand, the concubine could divorce him under certain specified circumstances. She had the three rights of any wife: food, clothing, and sexual relations. This meant that she had the right to be given an opportunity to bear children. The text says, "If he take him another wife; her food, her raiment, and her duty of marriage, shall he not diminish. And if he do not these three unto her, then shall she go out free without money" (vv. 10–11). Why list food and clothing here? Any bondservant had the right to food and clothing. Masters could not legally starve their servants, nor force them to go naked. Thus, what the right to food and clothing must have meant in this case was food and clothing comparable to that received by the new wife.

If her husband did not treat the concubine equally, then she could leave his household free of charge. She could not be legally compelled to remain in her husband's household if she could prove to the authorities that she was being treated as a second-class wife. In other words, her legal status as a free woman had been lost when her father sold her, but, once married, she became a wife who could not be overtly discriminated against. Her second-class legal status disappeared upon sexual consummation; only her second-class economic status remained. She could take no economic assets out of the marriage, other than her children, but other than this, she possessed equal status with her husband's other wives. Of course, she was tied to him economically to the extent that her lifestyle outside her husband's care might have looked even worse to her, and she possessed no dowry. Nevertheless, she retained the formal legal right to leave his household. Her father kept the original purchase price, and she went free.

3. Keeping the Children

Would she have been able to bring her children with her? It could be argued that the concubine would have had to leave her children behind, for children of a bondservant wife stayed with the master when the servant left (Ex. 21:4), and the master in this case was her husband. But this would miss the point. The children did go with the concubine when her former slave husband redeemed her. The ex-slave husband's payment of the redemption price (bride price) to his former master made her his wife rather than a concubine, for her children served as her dowry. Hagar took Ishmael when she was forced out of Abraham's household (Gen. 21:9–14). She was not divorcing Abraham because he had refused her anything; rather, he was divorcing her. Sarah's decision to remove Ishmael from Abraham's household and from any inheritance necessarily involved Abraham's divorce of Hagar; otherwise, Abraham possessed no legal authority to send Ishmael out of his household. Abraham disinherited Ishmael. How? By revoking the adopted status of Ishmael's mother. Ishmael then became a member of his mother's household, not Abraham's.

Does this mean that children should today go with their lawfully divorced mother? No. The Old Testament allowed husbands to divorce wives for reasons other than the wives' commission of capital crimes (Deut. 24:1). Jesus said that such a law had been given by Moses because of the hardness of their hearts (Matt. 19:8).²⁰ The new Testament requirement is far more rigorous: only the capital crimes of the Old Testament serve as lawful grounds of divorce—in effect, divorce by covenantal death.²¹ Covenantally dead people should not be allowed to take their children with them. The children should remain with the innocent injured party.

20. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), Appendix A, section on "Jesus vs. the Mosaic Law of Remarriage," subsection on "Matthew 19:3–9."

21. Rushdoony, Institutes, pp. 401–15; Ray R. Sutton, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Divorce and Remarriage (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/rssecond>)

Upon what legal principle could the mistreated concubine have taken her children with her? By an appeal to her own legal status. The legal basis of the marriage had been her adoption into the master's family. By the husband's treating her in such a way that she had legally regained her freedom, she was no longer an adopted member of his family. As the innocent victim, she had reclaimed her former legal status. Biblical law always defends the innocent party. She would therefore keep the children when she left her husband's household. She would then be in the position of a widow who was the head of her own household (Num. 30:9). The legal issues in biblical covenant arrangements are based on ethics, not blood or biology. Her husband had not treated her righteously. If she remained single and outside any man's household authority, she became both father and mother to her children, just as a widow became.²² If she remarried, the new husband adopted her and her children into his family. If she returned to her father's house, he became the true father of her children. Fatherhood in all cases was by adoption, not biology. This legal principle reflects our own covenantal status before God: we are either disinherited children because of Adam's sin, or else we are adopted children in God's household because of Christ's death and resurrection (John 1:12).

22. If the Numbers 30:9 principle governed her, meaning that she refused to return to her father's house, she became both father and mother. She became a daughter of God, which is why a widow was allowed to take a vow before God without getting approval from anyone. Her legal subordination to God no longer required a visible male head of household as her representative. Biblically, Jesus Christ became her intermediary.

4. A Woman Without Capital

Then in what visible way was a former concubine different from a former wife? Only in terms of her capital. She took no dowry with her when she left, for she had brought no dowry to the marriage when she came. A bride price transaction without a dowry for the daughter in fact was a servant purchase price. A concubine had no personally held economic protection. If treated unequally compared to another wife, she could return to her father's household, and she could marry again. She could also remain single and alone, although that was rare in any agricultural society, except for a few urban occupations such as tavern-keeping and prostitution, and the court would probably remove her children from her if she became a prostitute. Nevertheless, an honest, moral woman was legally able to leave her husband's house with her children: her new dowry.

She could return to her father's household without a sense of becoming a needless burden, because her father had been paid. He had kept all of the bride price, which made it more strictly an economic transaction. She had borne the risk of winding up with a husband who mistreated her, so her father could have no legitimate complaints about her returning home.

E. New Testament Applications

Jesus Christ paid the bride price to God through His death at Calvary. This is the basis of His marriage to the bride, the church. It is also the basis of all marriages through God's common grace.²³ Christ paid the bride price for all of humanity, for each individual, for Old Covenant Israel, and for New Covenant Israel. It was the highest price that has ever been paid. Old Covenant Israel looked forward to this payment, while New Covenant Israel now looks backward.²⁴ This is the proper New Testament starting point for any discussion of the bride

23. If we do not maintain that Christ's payment of the bride price is the foundation of all marriages through common grace, then we must conclude that there is still a valid form of concubinage among non-Christians. We would have to argue that only Christian brides are exempt from the requirements of the bride price/dowry system.

24. Self-professed Old Covenant Israelites (the Jews of today), described in Romans 11 as the branches that were cut off (v. 17–19), still look forward to this payment, but God requires them to join themselves to the church and begin to look backward. There is only one bride, the church of Jesus Christ. God is not a polygamist. The old bride, national Israel, was executed for her whoredoms in A.D. 70. See David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>) price.

One conclusion is inescapable: there are no more concubines in the New Testament economy. That institution was done away with by Calvary. If concubinage were still lawfully in force, it would point away from Christ's definitive overcoming of mankind's slavery to sin, the ultimate form of bondage. Permanent servitude, except as a criminal penalty (restitution), is no longer biblically sanctioned as a valid institutional arrangement.

1. Adoption and Legal Status

The concubine's second-class legal status always ended with the consummation of the marriage. It applied only to the betrothal period. The whole imagery of the marriage supper of the lamb²⁵ points to the status of the church as a free woman, a full bride in legal possession of a vast dowry, the whole earth.²⁶ There are no slave wives any more; all lawfully married women are regarded by God as having entered marriage as free women. They gained their status as free women by means of Christ's payment of the bride price at Calvary. This payment serves as the legal basis of God's adoption of His people into His eternal family. The covenantal distinctions between the betrothed slave wife and the betrothed free wife have disappeared. "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3:27–28). Galatians 4 is the chapter above all others in the Bible that deals with spiritual adoption—"the adoption of sons" (v. 5)—and our deliverance out of the family of the bondwoman into the family of the free woman, the "Jerusalem which is above" which is free, "the mother of us all" (v. 26). The church rather than the family is the agency of covenantal adoption in New Testament times. It is the agency that publicly represents the new birth.²⁷

25. Gary North, "The Marriage Supper of the Lamb," Christianity and Civilization, 4 (1985). (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>)

26. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

27. In churches that fully honor this principle, infants are baptized. Parents hand over the infant to the pastor, who then baptizes it, and hands it back. This is the public symbol of the inability of parents in their own strength to give eternal life to their children. The church adopts children publicly, and then hands them back to parents as the designated agents of the church—the covenanted, international, trans-historical institution known as the bride of Christ. This does not guarantee the continuing cov-

The justification of divorce for the concubine was that her husband treated another wife with greater favor. The New Testament's standard is monogamy, for only through membership in Christ's bride, the church, can people find salvation. God is not a bigamist; Israel as a bride has been lawfully divorced because of her rebellion. He has not taken an additional new wife; the church is the replacement for the lawfully divorced wife. Israel must become part of the church if she is ever to regain her status as bride (Rom. 11). Therefore, men are not supposed to be bigamists. Monogamy was the legal standard for Hebrew kings (Deut. 17:17), and this "one wife" standard is explicitly stated as a requirement for church elders (I Tim. 3:2).

Brides can no longer legally be offered for sale by fathers. Fathers are no longer allowed to demand a bride price as a condition of a daughter's marriage. Institutionally, there is no longer any necessity for the bride price, except in cases of criminal penalties imposed by the church or state on offending males in cases of the seduction of a virgin.²⁸ Church symbols and church discipline have replaced the original functions of the bride price/dowry system. First, baptism and church membership have become the screening devices. Second, baptism and church membership also have become the evidence of covenantal subordination to the family of God. Third, various economic contracts and legal provisions for the protection of the innocent victim of a divorce become the proper protective devices. Finally, husbands are not allowed to take extra wives, so there is clearly no purpose in establishing special divorce laws to protect a concubine who is not being treated equally to the new wife.²⁹

2. From Circumcision to Baptism

Because daughters receive the covenantal sign of baptism, the New Testament's position is that in all but biological respects, adult women enantal faithfulness of the children, but it does honor the legal principle that without adoption into the family of God, each person stands condemned before God.

28. See Chapter 47: "Seduction and Servitude."

29. There is this exception to the rule against divorce laws for concubines. If a polygamous culture converts to Christ, the missionaries would be foolish to impose monogamy retroactively on existing polygamous households. The husbands would then throw wives out of their homes, whether they wanted to stay or not. Who would protect or remarry these divorced wives? They would be tempted to become prostitutes. In such mission situations, biblical law would protect concubines who were subsequently treated as second-class wives. They could lawfully leave their husbands if they chose to.

are now covenantally equal with adult men. The only exception is that women are not allowed to speak in church worship services (I Cor. 14:34). Circumcision as a required rite is no longer binding in the New Testament era. It is significant that Paul inserted his famous statement on the irrelevance of circumcision in the middle of his chapter on marriage: "Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing" (I Cor. 7:19a).

The locus of final earthly authority for approving a marriage has shifted from the family to the church. This is manifested symbolically by the fact that baptism has replaced circumcision as the covenantal sign of family membership. The bride's father therefore no longer serves as the "circumciser" of the bridegroom, for the rite of circumcision no longer has any role to play covenantally. The church is the ultimate marital screening agent today for covenant-keepers.

A father who prohibits his daughter from marrying can be overruled by the church or churches to which the communicant prospective partners belong. The idea that a non-Christian father can lawfully and legitimately prohibit his Christian daughter from marrying a Christian man is outrageous theologically. The assertion that the couple is legally defenseless, and that they must confine their efforts to praying that her father will change his mind, is an indirect attack on the legitimate authority of the church.³⁰ Similarly, a father may authorize the marriage of his Christian daughter to a pagan young man, but the church can lawfully before God veto the proposed marriage and place the daughter under discipline if she follows her father's advice. She cannot biblically claim her father's authorization of the marriage as somehow validating it.

The abolition of concubinage did not abolish the covenantal principle of hierarchy. Someone must represent the bride. Who represents the girl in the name of Jesus Christ in today's marriage arrangements? Obviously, the girl's father does, unless the church has intervened to sanction the marriage if her father has immorally denied permission. But the father represents his daughter as the agent of the church rather than as the agent of the bloodline family. The church, as the true covenantal family of the God-adopted believer, retains its sanctioning authority. It is this fundamental transfer of authority from the family to the church, as symbolized ritually by the abolition of circumcision and the substitution of baptism, that has made the bride price and dowry legally optional. Christ has paid the bride price for His church, and His church now has become the locus of primary covenantal authority for conducting marriages, enforcing the terms of the marriage covenant, and screening the prospective partners. The bridegroom submits himself to the jurisdiction of the church.

30. In effect, such an argument makes a father the equivalent of the Pope. It is odd that Protestants sometimes use such arguments, for such a view of paternal authority transforms the New Testament family into a pagan, patriarchal, humanistic institution, one whose standards are autonomous, governed by neither church nor state.

We have seen that the bride price-dowry system was part of a program of inheritance. The daughter received a dowry in lieu of receiving her share of her father's inheritance. Her marriage relieved her of the requirement to support her aged parents. I am arguing that Christ's establishment of His church has made optional this transfer of funds. The church has become the new screening agent. This raises fundamental questions concerning family inheritance. Does this mean that the church becomes the primary agent for the care of older people, replacing the children? No. The church does become the agent of last resort if families fail in their responsibilities. Older widows (age 60 and older) whose families fail to support them are to be supported by the church (I Tim. 5:9–10). Family members of such widows thereby identify themselves covenantally as infidels (v. 8), and would be excommunicated. The church then becomes the covenantal kinsman-redeemer of the widows.

Today, sons and daughters inherit. They both receive expensive educations. Daughters also share in the various responsibilities of caring for aged parents, to the extent that daughters possess independent capital. Their husbands know that they may be called upon to assist aged in-laws. There is no clear line of authority for establishing institutional responsibility for aged parents, nor is there a clear structure of inheritance. It was far easier to establish such responsibility when blood lines and gender determined inheritance. Inheritance in the New Testament is expressly covenantal rather than familistic. This blurs the formal, legal lines of economic responsibility.

Membership in the church is of far greater consequence than membership in the family. Jesus was at war with any view of the human family that elevated it to equality with the church. "For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household" (Matt. 10:35–36). The biblical economic goal is to increase the dominion of Christians, not families as such; the institutional focus is on the kingdom rather than the family. Thus, parents should not leave great wealth to apostate children. Parents should normally leave their wealth to believing children, assuming that the children are economically competent and faithful to the external requirements of the covenant. If they are not, then parents should consider setting up trusts governed by competent church members. The only exception to these guidelines is where the apostate children give evidence that they are lawful, parent-honoring, responsibility-affirming people who are far more competent economically than the family's creed-affirming children, and who appear to be willing and able to support the aged parents. As a matter of self-defense, parents would transfer sufficient wealth to these children to compensate them for the expected future burden of caring for them in old age. Unbelieving children who abide by the external terms of the covenant are to this extent sanctified—set apart—by believing parents.

Parents must use their wealth to endow those who will carry their religious vision into the future, though not necessarily their names. Covenantally faithful daughters should inherit. Christian charities should also inherit. The Christian vision is far broader than family or tribe. The transfer of the kingdom to the "nation" of the church (Matt. 21:43)³¹ testified to this shift in sovereignty away from tribal, regional, and even familial groups.

3. Inheritance or Dowry?

Because of their change in covenantal status in the New Testament, there is no reason to believe that daughters should not inherit, even if they have brothers. Sisters without brothers were allowed to inherit in the Old Testament: the case of the daughters of Zelophehad. Because of the operation of the jubilee land tenure law, daughters who inherited were required to marry only inside the tribe of their fathers (Num. 36:8).³² With Jesus' fulfillment of the jubilee law (Luke 4),³³ and with the destruction of Israel in A.D. 70, these restrictions on inheritance disappeared. Nevertheless, family responsibilities did not disappear just because tribal responsibility did. If daughters can lawfully inherit, then daughters who inherit and their husbands necessarily be- come legally responsible for the care of her aged parents. Thus, the husband of a daughter who prefers to inherit rather than accept a dowry should legally agree in advance to become equally liable for the care of her parents as any of her brothers. Because the West ignores such responsibilities, it has ignored these sorts of legitimate family legal contracts. As a result, families have not been careful to take care of aged parents. This furthered the expansion of the welfare state, for its proponents have successfully appealed to guilt-ridden voters in the name of indigent aged parents. The welfare state has steadily made itself the primary heir.³⁴

31. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), Introduction. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

32. Gary North, Sanctions and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Numbers, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1997] 2012), ch. 22.

33. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

The dowry is legitimate, though not required, as an alternative to inheritance. If a father decides to pay for the education of his daughter, he should tell her in advance the terms of the arrangement. If this is not her dowry, but is instead an advance payment of her lawful inheritance, then he need not seek to collect a bride price from her future husband, but she and her husband will be expected to bear their share of the costs of supporting the parents in their old age. If her education or a very expensive wedding is her dowry, this constitutes a formal admission on her part and on the part of her husband of their obligation to repay him in the form of a bride price—highly unlikely in our day—either before the marriage or in the years following the marriage.

Because the bride price is seldom paid today, daughters and bridegrooms implicitly do become responsible for the support of her parents. Such implicit support is no longer regarded as enforceable by civil law, however. Thus, the state has steadily encroached on the family as the primary agency for the support of aged parents. Taxes have replaced both the bride price and financial support by children. There has been no escape from these biblical economic and legal responsibilities; there is only a shift in institutional authority for collecting and distributing the funds.

4. Alternatives to the Dowry

The economic consequences of divorce are the big economic problem that has arisen from the disappearance of the bride price and/or dowry system. When the husband walks out of the marriage, all he generally is required by law to pay is child support. Alimony payments to wives have become far less common in the United States since the mid-1970s. Divorced wives receive very little, except in cases where there is a major distribution of property. Few families possess that much debt-free property to divide. There is a slogan that says that “the husband gets the mortgage, and the wife gets the house.” Then the husband stops paying on the mortgage, and the lending institution gets the house. At the youngest child’s eighteenth birthday, the father’s responsibility ends. The wife and her parents are cut off.

34. Chapter 25.

If there were not so much debt in society, then community property laws would protect wives far better. By requiring the husband to forfeit half of their property to the divorced wife, the state does act as an intermediary. What should be required, however, is the honoring of the biblical principle of covenantal death. The offending party should take nothing; the injured party should keep everything, including all the children. The offending party should not even be given visitation rights. If biblical law were enforced, the offending party would often be publicly executed. Only because the state has been negligent in its duty to enforce the biblically required standards and sanctions have divorce settlements become a problem. Community property laws—the automatic division of family assets—were the precursor of no-fault divorce, which in a debt-ridden society is another way of guaranteeing the impoverishment of divorced wives.

One way to protect the daughter and her parents would be for the church (which becomes ultimately liable economically for indigent members) to require the prospective bridegroom to agree in writing to give his wife sufficient funds for her to take out a term life insurance policy on his life. The policy would be owned by his wife or owned by a diaconate-managed trust in the name of the wife. He would do the same for her parents, with the premium money being given by the bridegroom to both wife and parents in advance of the wedding. He would sign the policy immediately after the wedding ceremony: no signature, no consummation. A refusal to sign would annul the marriage. He would not own the policy; therefore, he could not name new beneficiaries, or cancel the policies, should he walk out of the marriage. He would subsequently pay additional annual premiums each year, so that the paid-up policies would be extended over time, or new policies be purchased.

Another way to reduce the likelihood of his walking out is to require him to agree in advance to create irrevocable trusts for his wife each time the couple buys any major investment, with her father or the diaconate as the trustee. Everything they buy that costs over, say, five ounces of gold during the first decade of their marriage is placed into this trust. The father-in-law should require the son-in-law to agree in writing to put at least ten percent of his salary into an automatic savings account inside the wife's trust. The husband would be legally allowed only to suggest where this money should be invested. Her brother (or someone covenantally responsible) would be named in the trust as the successor trustee, in case of the father-in-law's death.

All of this today would be regarded as "crass" and "mercenary." So was the bride price and dowry system of the Old Testament. The system offered economic protection to the economically vulnerable.

5. Freedom and Risks

All women in New Testament times have been freed from the Old Testament's requirement of bringing dowries into their marriages in order to avoid the second-class status of concubinage. This testifies to their status as wives whose bride price has been paid. The economic reality of this transformation was not visible in history for many centuries, but only because Western capitalism had not made it economically feasible for most young women and young men to leave home and marry, with or without parental financial support. The growth of highly urbanized capitalism changed this picture in the twentieth century. This development has placed heavy new economic and moral responsibilities on the shoulders of single adult women. With greater authority inevitably comes greater responsibility. They can set the terms of their own marriages. What we have seen is that they have proven to be tragically incompetent bargainers. No one represents them any more. With the rise of no-fault divorce, not even the civil government protects their interests any longer. In the United States in the mid-1990s, one year after a divorce, the woman's standard of living has fallen by about 30%, while her former husband's living standard may have risen by 10%.³⁵

To ignore these economic realities in the name of formal biblical law would be foolish. The dowry is not legally required in order to avoid concubinage, because concubinage is no longer a biblical office, but this does not solve the economic problem of the economic vulnerability of wives, especially in an increasingly humanistic civilization in which divorce is regarded as some sort of opportunity to escape responsibility—an economic subsidy to lawless, irresponsible males if there ever was one. When husbands walk out of a marriage, leaving the care of children to the wives, as well as the wives' support of themselves, the division of labor is restricted. Wives must become self-supporting, even when husbands pay child support, and in millions of cases, they refuse. With this contraction of the division of labor, wives' personal productivity necessarily falls, and therefore their net income falls. The husbands find younger wives to marry, but divorced wives over age 35 with children seldom find husbands. The majority of divorced husbands win; the majority of divorced wives lose. Thus, wives without dowries are still unprotected economically, just as they were in the Old Testament. The difference is, concubines had biblical laws to protect them in the Old Testament. So did their aged parents. Today, these economic problems must be dealt with early by voluntary contract rather than by civil law. They seldom are, except in second marriages³⁶ or in cohabitation.³⁷ In the latter cases, women recognize more clearly how vulnerable they are legally and economically.

35. Associated Press story, St. Louis Post Dispatch (May 18, 1996); reproduced in Christian News (May 27, 1996), p. 3.

Conclusion

The Old Testament authorized two forms of marriage contracts: free marriage and concubinage. The free wife brought a dowry into the marriage; the concubine did not. Both forms of marriage were lawful, but concubinage was less desirable. It left wives far more vulnerable to divorce or neglect by husbands.

The bride price was a requirement for marriage. If the father used the money to endow his daughter, she entered the marriage as a free woman. If he kept the bride price for himself, she entered as a concubine. The system allowed poor girls to escape from a life of poverty in their fathers' households.

The basis of Old Testament marriage was adoption. In effect, it was a symbol of the new birth, which is also a covenantal adoption (John 1:12). The bridegroom adopted the girl into his family. He had to gain the cooperation of her father in this transfer of family membership from her family to his. Fathers used the bride price system to screen out bridegrooms who were more likely to be economically irresponsible. When fathers transferred to bridegrooms their covenantal office as God's representative for their daughters, they wanted some visible sign that the recipient would be responsible. The payment of the bride price was a manifestation of the bridegroom's competence and also a symbol of his subordination to the girl's family.

36. Georgia Dullea, "Prenuptial Agreements the 2nd Time Around," New York Times (June 7, 1982).

37. <http://bit.ly/prenup-cohab>.

The New Testament annulled the bride price system by transferring the marital adoption process to the church. There are no lawful concubines today. Christ's payment of the bride price to God the Father at Calvary marked Him as the Bridegroom to the true bride, the church. The church is today the appropriate agency of the covenantal adoption process of marriage. Like God, who found abandoned Israel as an infant and raised her, and later married her (Ezek. 16), so the church baptizes children and then later sanctions the human marriage bond that reflects Christ's love of His church (Eph. 5:22–33). Christian fathers still screen prospective bridegrooms, but as delegated agents of the church rather than as agents of the extended bloodline family.

The church is the ultimate protector of unlawfully divorced wives. The preaching of the gospel is to lead to the rewriting of the divorce laws. The legal structure should protect the innocent partner and impose heavy sanctions on the offending partner, up to and including the death penalty for capital crimes identified by the Bible. The state should recognize in its statutes that biblical divorce is always and only by death, and this includes covenantal death.

When marriage partners are not Christians, the state should become the judicial sanctioning agency, for its laws also govern marriage and divorce. It becomes the primary agency by default. The state alone possesses the lawful monopoly of violence. It can punish those who disobey certain of God's standards, including certain aspects of marriage. The family no longer possesses any legal authority to marry or divorce couples. Fathers can lawfully prevent marriages under some circumstances, but they cannot perform lawful marriages simply and solely because they hold the office of father.

EXECUTING A REBELLIOUS SON

And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death (Ex. 21:15).

And he that curseth his father, or his mother, shall surely be put to death (Ex. 21:17).

The theocentric principle here is obvious: God the Father must not be attacked by His children. Parents are God's covenantal agents in the family, which is a hierarchical, oath-bound covenantal institution. They are God's covenantal representatives in the family. To strike an earthly parent is the covenantal equivalent of striking at God. It is an act of moral rebellion so great that the death penalty is mandated by biblical law.

In a parallel passage in Deuteronomy 21, Moses laid down the following law. If a son is morally rebellious, and he refuses to obey his father or mother, the parents jointly are required to bring him into civil court. The parents must testify against their son. The son is a glutton and a drunkard. That is, he is a fully responsible adult. The citizens are required to stone him to death (Deut. 21:18–21).

This law had nothing to do with tribal separatism (seed laws) or the inheritance of tribal land (land laws). It was not a priestly law. So, it was a cross-boundary law. Therefore, it is still in force.

It did have impact on inheritance. The biblical principle of inheritance is this: the wealth of the wicked is laid up for the just (Prov. 13:22).¹ A rebellious son should not inherit. This would reverse the biblical order. The wealth of the just is not to be laid up for the wicked.

1. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 41.

A. Agents of Society

Both parents are required by biblical law to bring a covenant lawsuit against their rebellious son.² This double witness is sufficient to convict. As I explain in my comments on this passage, the parents act as agents of God, but also as agents of the holy commonwealth. Their son is a criminal, as defined by biblical law. He is a rebel. The family is not authorized to execute him. This authority belongs to the civil court. So, the parents are required to bring formal charges against him. Not to do this is to transfer onto society the risk of becoming the son's victim. They possess intimate knowledge of his moral character. They are to act as defenders of the community by charging him with a crime. They have a moral and legal obligation to act as covenant lawsuit initiators.³

Because they possess detailed knowledge of his character and behavior, they are the first line of defense against the spread of rebelliousness. They must defend their own authority inside their household, but their responsibility goes beyond the household. They are agents of the court. The court cannot know as much as they do about their son. A court that attempted to gather this degree of knowledge would exercise tyrannical power. So, God has mandated parents to act on His behalf in protecting the society against rebellion. God does not authorize parents to impose capital punishment. Instead, He has announced the parents' responsibility to bring their son before the court.

In other laws to which execution is mandated, the victim decides, if he is an adult and if he is still alive, i.e., not the victim of murder. Yet in this case, the state must execute. Few parents would cooperate on their own authority, meaning on behalf solely of themselves. The existence of capital punishment is evidence that the parents are acting as agents of the court. What the son has done to them is evidence of what he will do to others outside his family. The parents are therefore required to bring him to trial.

What if they refuse to bring a formal charge against their rebellious son? Then they have implicitly subsidized evil behavior. They have implicitly sanctioned it. They know that they are risking the possibility that he will become an incorrigible adult. If he does, they will lose him anyway. Better to bring him before the civil court early. Better to obey

2. On the covenant lawsuit, see Appendix M, Section J.

3. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 51.

God. Better to avoid God's sanctions against the family for the parents' refusal to obey. The son may learn fear of the civil court even though he has no fear of the family court.

If they bring him several times, the court will undoubtedly recommend increased sanctions. He has been identified as an incorrigible youth. The day that he commits a crime against someone outside his family, the court will be able to demonstrate to the victim that leniency is no solution, that this man is a habitual criminal. Thus, by allowing parents to insist on the death penalty, but by also allowing them to be lenient, God encourages parents to identify rebellious sons before the latter become incorrigible criminals. The court can take steps to enforce parentally recommended sanctions before it is too late.

B. Restricting a Criminal Class

The law in Deuteronomy, Rushdoony argued, is a law against the development of a professional criminal class. "But the godly exercise of capital punishment cleanses the land of evil and protects the righteous. In calling for the death of incorrigible juvenile delinquents, which means, therefore, in terms of case law, the death of incorrigible adult delinquents; the law declares, 'so shalt thou put evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear and fear' (Deut. 21:21)."⁴ His mistake was to see this as specifying juvenile delinquents. It was a law against adult sons: drunkards and gluttons.

Such a son was a physical threat to his parents. The law in Exodus 21 refers to violence. This is not a law against a young child who hits a parent. The parent can hit back, and should. The child must learn early that striking a parent is a serious crime. The should point to this case law as evidence. If the civil government has executed a few sons for this crime, the parents can point to this as a warning. The threat of execution is a powerful warning.

The Mosaic case laws were all warnings. This warning was directed against physical rebellion. The son who is willing to injure a parent is a threat to the social order. Biblical society has a moral obligation and the legal authority to remove such citizens from history. The state must execute.

4. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 77-78; cf. p. 188.

Conclusion

A mark of rebellion is this crime: physically striking a parent. This indicates the presence of a hardened criminal. These two case laws provide society with a tool to remove such rebels from their midst. Once rebellion has gone so far that a son strikes or curses a parent, it must be removed. This removal is attained on a permanent basis through public execution.

KIDNAPPING

And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death (Ex. 21:16).

In Appendix M, I present my thesis that the pleonasm, “he shall surely be put to death,” is binding on the civil authorities whenever the state initiates the prosecution of the covenant lawsuit, but it does not bind the victim when he initiates the prosecution solely on his own behalf. We must examine the implications of this principle in the case of kidnapping, a crime that is bound by the terms of the pleonasm.

A. The Nature of the Crime

Before getting to this problem, however, we must search for the theocentric principle that governs the crime of kidnapping. James Jordan quite properly listed kidnapping under the general heading of violence. The nature of violence biblically is that it represents an attempted assault on God, an attempt to murder God by murdering His image.¹ He listed other aspects of violence: the desire of sinful men to play god, the desire to achieve autonomous vengeance, and sado-masochism.² Violence should be understood as a sinner’s rebellious attempt to achieve dominion by power.³ It is a form of revolution. The preaching of the gospel is intended to reduce violence.

Ultimately, this crime and its civil penalty should be understood in terms of the assumption of a theocentric universe. Jordan’s assessment is valid: “The death penalty is appropriate because kidnapping is an assault on the very person of the image of God, and as such is a radical manifestation of man’s desire to murder God. Like rape, it is a deep violation of personhood and manifests a deep-rooted contempt for God and his image.”⁴

1. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 93. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

2. Ibid., pp. 93–96.

3. Ibid., p. 95.

Nevertheless, the crime of kidnapping goes beyond the question of the image of God in man. Kidnapping is more than an assault against God’s image in man. It is not simply man’s blood that is inviolate (Gen. 9:6); it is also his life’s calling. It is not simply his image that commands respect from other men; it is also his God-ordained assignment in life. Perhaps it would be better to argue that man’s imaging also includes the calling. God is revealed in Genesis 1 as a God who works and who judges. Man images this God. Kidnapping is therefore an assault on both of these aspects of man’s imaging.

Who is the true owner of the kidnapper’s victim? God is. God owns the whole world (Ps. 50:10).⁵ Nevertheless, stealing a privately owned animal is not a capital crime (Ex. 22:1).⁶ Why the special case of a man? The answer is found in man’s special position: subordinate under God and possessing authority over the creation. Man is made in God’s image (Gen. 1:26;⁷ 9:6). By interfering with a man’s God-given calling before God, the kidnapper disrupts God’s revealed administrative structure for subduing the earth. Each man must work out his salvation—or, presumably, work out his damnation—with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12).⁸ The kidnapper asserts his presumed autonomy and authority over the victim, as if he were God, as if he possessed a lawful right to determine what another man’s responsibilities on earth ought to be.

B. The Death Penalty

The Bible recognizes that there are two potential criminals involved in kidnapping: the actual kidnapper and the person to whom he sells the victim. The international slave trade did exist. The passage deals with both types of criminal: “And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death.” Both the kidnapper and the recipient of the stolen victim are subject to

4. Ibid., p. 104.

5. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 10.

6. Chapter 43.

7. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

8. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

the death penalty.⁹ Slave traders were at risk.

The obvious problem with a universally mandatory death penalty is that a crime whose effects are less permanent than murder bears the same permanent penalty that murder does. Consider the case of kidnapping. The kidnapper has a strong incentive to kill the victim if he thinks that the authorities are closing in on him. The victim may later identify him as the kidnapper; better to kill the source of the incriminating evidence. After all, the penalty for murder is the same as the penalty for kidnapping. A person can only be killed once by the civil government. Jordan recognized this problem.¹⁰ So do humanist legal theorists.

Then why does the Bible specify the death penalty for kidnapping? Isn't this dangerous for the victim? Other ancient Near Eastern law codes—if we can accurately call them codes¹¹—did not impose such a harsh penalty. The code of Hammurabi specified the death penalty for kidnapping only when an aristocrat kidnapped the young son of another aristocrat.¹² What lies behind the rigorous biblical penalty?

The Bible does not limit the death penalty to cases involving physical harm to the victim. The person who is kidnapped in order to be sold as a slave is not said to have been harmed. If anything, the kidnapper who intends to sell the victim into servitude has an economic incentive not to harm the victim, because an injury would presumably reduce the market value of “the property.” Yet the kidnapper potentially faces the most fearful penalty that society can inflict. Why such a concern for this crime?

9. Dale Patrick, Old Testament Law (Atlanta, Georgia: John Knox Press, 1985), p. 74.

10 James B. Jordan, The Death Penalty in the Mosaic Law (Tyler, Texas: Biblical Horizons, 1988), p. 17.

11. Shalom Paul cited the 1963 warning of his teacher, E. A. Speiser, regarding the famous Code of Hammurabi: “The handful of jurists . . . seem agreed that what we have before us is not properly a code or a digest but ‘a series of amendments to the common law of Babylon’ (Driver and Miles, Babylonian Laws I, p. 41).” Shalom Paul, Studies in the Book of the Covenant in the Light of Cuneiform and Biblical Law (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1970), p. 3n. But Yehezkel Kaufman insisted that Deuteronomy “is unquestionably intended to be a law code in the ancient Near Eastern sense.” The Religion of Israel (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), p. 46.

12. Hammurabi Code, paragraph 14: Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), p. 166.

C. Sacrilege

To steal from God is a sacrilege. Rushdoony made an interesting study of the meaning and implications of sacrilege, and his general comments apply in the case of kidnapping. “Theft is basic to the word, and sacrilege is theft directed against God. It is apparent from this that the idea of sacrilege is present throughout Scripture. . . . The concept of sacrilege rests on God’s sovereignty and the fact that He has an absolute ownership over all things: men and the universe are God’s property. The covenant people are doubly God’s property: first, by virtue of His creation, and, second, by virtue of His redemption. For this reason, sin is more than personal and more than man-centered. It is a theological offense.”¹³ So serious is the crime of sacrilege that it is compared by Paul to adultery and idolatry (Rom. 2:22), both of which were capital crimes in the Old Testament.¹⁴ (The code of Hammurabi specified the death penalty for those who stole the property of either church or state, and also for those who received the stolen goods.)¹⁵

Because sacrilege is theft, it requires restitution.¹⁶ Because sacrilege is theft against God, it requires restitution to God. In this case, the crime is so great that the maximum restitution is the death of the criminal. No lower payment can suffice if the state prosecutes and convicts in God’s name. The implied assertion of autonomy by the criminal, who seeks to play God, represents a form of idolatry, worshipping another God. The kidnapper steals God’s property—a person made in His image—and seeks to profit from the asset. This is the essence of the crime of Adam, to be as God (Gen. 3:5).

D. Future Deterrence

The death penalty is final. Its beneficial effects for society are twofold: it restrains the judgment of God on society, and it provides a deterrence effect—detering the criminal from future crime (he dies), deterring other criminals from committing similar crimes (fear of death), and deterring God from bringing His covenant judgments on the com-

13. R. J. Rushdoony, Law and Society, vol. II of Institutes of Biblical Law (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1982), p. 28.

14. Ibid., p. 31.

15. CH, paragraph 6; Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 166. There was an exception: if the person stole an ox or a sheep from church or state, he paid 30-fold restitution; it was ten-fold restitution if the animal had belonged to a private citizen: CH, paragraph 8, idem.

16. Rushdoony, Law and Society, p. 33.

munity for its failure to uphold covenant law (fear of God's wrath). Capital punishment is God's way of telling criminals, whether convicted criminals or potential criminals, that they have gone too far by committing certain crimes. It also warns the community that biblical law is to be respected.

Obviously, there is no element of rehabilitation for the convicted criminal in the imposition of the death penalty. The state speeds the convicted criminal's march toward final judgment. The state delivers the sinner into the presence of the final and perfect Judge.¹⁷

If we interpret the presence of the pleonasm as making the death penalty mandatory, irrespective of the wishes of the victim, then we create a problem for the victim. A mandatory death penalty may actually increase the risk to the victim, once the criminal act has taken place. First, the victim may have seen the criminal. His positive identification of the kidnapper and his testimony against him can convict him. Second, should the criminal begin to suspect that he is about to be caught by the authorities, he may choose to kill the victim and dispose of the body. By disposing of the evidence of the crime, the victim loses his life, while the criminal reduces his risk of being detected. This is a good reason to suppose that the death penalty for kidnapping is a maximum allowable penalty, one which a victim can impose but need not impose on a convicted kidnapper.

What if the kidnapper has stolen more than one adult person? What if one adult victim asks the court to impose the death penalty, but the other victim asks for leniency? Or, if the kidnapper has stolen more than one minor, what if the parent or legal guardian of one asks for the death penalty, but the parent or legal guardian of the other recommends leniency? The victim who demands execution is sovereign. The extension of mercy is not mandatory. The pleonasm of execution is attached to this law. The presence of the pleonasm indicates that capital punishment is the normal sanction. Anything less than execution is abnormal: a unique sign of leniency by the victim. The victim who specifies execution is adhering to God's written law. He is upholding the sanctity of the sanction against sacrilege. His decision is final.

17. One reason why the torture of a convicted criminal prior to his execution is immoral is that it symbolically arrogates to the state what God reserves exclusively for Himself: the legal authority to torture people for eternity. It is a right that God exercises exclusively. By torturing a person prior to his execution, the state asserts that its punishments are on a par with God's, that the state's penalties are to be feared as much or more than God's. On the state as torturer, see Edward Peters, Torture (London: Basil Blackwell, 1985), ch. 5.

Can the state prosecute if the victim declines? Only if the state is itself a victim. It seems reasonable to allow the state to recover the costs of searching for the victim. The kidnapper has stolen from the state by his criminal act. If the state successfully prosecutes a kidnapper, judges can impose a double restitution penalty payment for the costs incurred. But the judges cannot lawfully impose the capital sanction. They must uphold the principle of victim's rights.

There is the possibility that in other circumstances, the threat of the death penalty may reduce the risk to the victim. A criminal in the Bible is allowed to go to the authorities before he has been caught and make a 20% restitution payment, plus the capital value of the stolen property or unpaid vow (Lev. 6:1–7). The kidnap victim in the Old Testament presumably would have been sold as a servant. The market price of this sort of servant could have been calculated in the Old Testament.¹⁸ The judges could also have used the Bible's fixed price system for a servant killed by a goring ox: 30 shekels of silver (Ex. 21:32). Or perhaps the prices listed for human vows to the temple could have been used by the judges (Lev. 27:3–7). The Bible always offers opportunities for repentance. By allowing the kidnapper to escape the threat of the death penalty by surrendering to the authorities, biblical law reduces the threat to the kidnap victims in those cases where a kidnapper repents before he is arrested.

E. Ransom

But what about the modern form of kidnapping, where the kidnapper demands a ransom? The same principle operates: the repenting but as yet unarrested kidnapper offers to the victim the value of the ransom demanded, plus one-fifth. In most cases, this would mean a lifetime of servitude to repay the debt. Servitude for the kidnapper is better for the victim and society than what the modern criminal justice system imposes. The modern criminal justice system would probably impose a life sentence in jail for the criminal, at the expense of taxpayers, with parole possible (likely) in a few years. The kidnap victim gets nothing.

18. Wrote the mid-nineteenth-century Jewish commentator S. R. Hirsch: "The value of any human life can not be expressed in pounds, shillings and pence. But atonement-money has to be paid in certain cases. This 'atonement-money' the token value of his own life, in the case of a free man, is estimated at the amount he would fetch if sold in the market as a slave. There is no other way of fixing the amount of human life in terms of hard cash." Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch Translated and Explained, translated by Isaac Levy, 5 vols., Exodus, 3rd ed. (London: Honig & Sons, 1967), p. 323; at Exodus 21:32. This ignores another valid means of estimating a kidnapped man's hard-cash value: the ransom payment demanded by the kidnapper (what economists call "reservation value"). Another problem with Hirsch's restricted means of estimating a person's value is that today there is no lawful slave market operating. He must have known that this would complicate things for the judges.

There was a motion picture in 1956 called Ransom. The hero of the film is a rich businessman. His son is kidnapped, and the kidnappers demand a huge ransom. The police tell him that kidnap victims wind up dead about half the time, whether a ransom is paid or not. The father decides not to pay. He goes to his bank and gets the money demanded by the kidnappers. He then calls in the local television station, which broadcasts his announcement. In front of him on a desk is the money, in cash. He says to all those listening that if his son is murdered, he intends to pay every cent of the money to anyone who will tell him the name of the person who kidnapped his son. He offers to pay the accomplices to the crime. He reminds the kidnapper of the risk of relying on the reliability of his accomplices. He then points to the money and declares to the kidnapper, "This is as close to this money as you'll ever get." When he returns home, his neighbors are outraged. They throw rocks through his window. He had not shown filial piety. He deserves to be an outcast. But, at the end of the movie, his son is returned to him. The kidnapper was fearful of being turned in for the reward.¹⁹

What the movie's hero did was to place a greater priority on bringing the criminal to justice than he placed on public acceptance of his act. (The statistical risk to his son, he had been told, was the same, whether he paid the ransom or not.) By using the ransom money in a unique way—as a reward that would increase the likelihood of someone's becoming an informant—the father increased the odds in favor of his son's survival. (The majority of crimes are probably solved as a result of informants.)²⁰ He relied on the threat of punishment more than he did on the good will of the criminal in honoring the terms of the transaction, his son's life for a cash payment. He turned to the law for protection, not to the criminal's sense of honor.

In 1973, the grandson of J. Paul Getty, one of the world's richest men, was kidnapped in Italy. The kidnapping received worldwide attention. The kidnappers demanded over a million dollars as the ransom.²¹ Getty publicly refused to pay. He said that if he did, this would place his 14 other grandchildren in jeopardy. By not paying, he said, he was telling all other potential kidnappers that it was useless to kidnap any of his relatives. The kidnappers cut off the youth's ear and sent it to his mother. Still the grandfather refused. Privately, he lent $850,000 to the boy's father to pay the ransom—at 4% per annum. Getty never missed an opportunity for profit.²² The gamble paid off: the kidnappers released him.²³ No other Getty relatives became victims.²⁴

19. The re-make of the movie in 1996 had a different ending. Only the scene with the money and the television was retained.

20. Edward Powell, "The Coming Crisis in Criminal Investigation," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Winter 1975–76), pp. 81–83.

F. Equal Penalties or Equal Results?

The Bible does not forbid the victim's family to pay a ransom, but the threat of the death penalty makes the risk of conviction so great that few potential kidnappers would take the risk, except for a very high return. The average citizen therefore receives additional but indirect protection because of this biblical law. The penalty to the convicted kidnapper is so high that the money which the middle-class victim's relatives could raise to pay the ransom probably would not compensate most potential kidnappers for the tremendous risk involved. Presumably, kidnappers will avoid kidnapping poorer people.

In effect, the threat of the death penalty increases the likelihood that members of very rich families or senior employees of very rich corporations will be the primary victims of kidnappers. Also, in cases of politically motivated kidnappings, the famous or politically powerful could become the victims. They seem to be discriminated against economically by biblical law: high penalties make it more profitable for kidnappers to target their families. On the other hand, these people

21. The price of gold was then about $100 an ounce.

22. Fellow billionaire industrialist Armand Hammer referred to him as "that tight old weasel." Armand Hammer (with Neil Lyndon), Hammer (New York: Putnam's, 1987), p. 386. Hammer did respect him as an entrepreneur, however.

23 The grandson later suffered a stroke as a result of alcohol and drug abuse, and became paralyzed and blind. Time (March 17, 1986), p. 80.

24. I have instructed my wife never to pay a ransom for me under any conditions. I have also told her that I will not pay a ransom for her or any of our children. The goal is to reduce the risk of kidnapping before it takes place, not to increase the likelihood of the victim's survival. The evil of kidnapping should not be rewarded. It should be made devastatingly unprofitable. The same should be true for terrorist kidnappings. The original policy of the modern State of Israel regarding terrorist kidnappings was correct: a kidnapper-for-victims exchange before any victim is harmed, but no compromise thereafter.

possess greater economic resources, making it more likely that they can more easily afford to protect themselves and their relatives.

From the point of view of economic analysis, the stiff penalty for kidnapping protects society at large, though not always the actual victim of the crime, and it protects the average citizen more than it protects the rich. The law applies to all kidnappers equally; it has varying effects on different people and groups within the society. Because the Bible requires equality before the law, it produces different results. To equalize the results—equal risk for rich families and poor families—the Bible would have to impose the death penalty only for kidnappers of rich people. This, as we have seen, is what Hammurabi's Code did: it imposed the death penalty only on those who kidnapped the sons of aristocrats. The economic payoff would have to be made lower in the case of a kidnapper who steals a poor person. Therefore, in order to put poor families at risk as high as that borne by rich families, the law would have to discriminate between kidnappers of the poor and kidnappers of the rich. But the kidnapper sins primarily against God, so the death penalty can be specified by the victim in both cases. God is not a respecter of persons, meaning those convicted of a capital crime. The question is not the economic status of the victims, but the nature of the crime (sacrilege) and the sanctions specified by the victims (victim's rights). Thus, a consistent application of this law in every case of kidnapping increases the risk of being kidnapped for the rich.

This brings up a very important question relating to the word "equality." When men demand equality, what do they really want? If they demand equality before the law—"Equal penalties for identical crimes, irrespective of persons!"—then they are simultaneously demanding unequal economic results. This is not true only in the case of the variation of risk for different economic groups when a society demands the death penalty for all kidnappers. This is true of the economy in general. When men demand equal economic results, they are simultaneously demanding inequality before the law. Hayek's analysis is correct.

From the fact that people are very different it follows that, if we treat them equally, the result must be inequality in their actual position, and that the only way to place them in an equal position would be to treat them differently. Equality before the law and material equality are therefore not only different but are in conflict with each other; and we can achieve either the one or the other, but not both at the same time. The equality before the law which freedom requires leads to material inequality. Our argument will be that, though where the state must use coercion for other reasons, it should treat all people alike, the desire of making people more alike in their condition cannot be accepted in a free society as a justification for further and discriminatory coercion.²⁵

Biblical law is clear: equality before the civil law is the God-sanctioned concept of equality. Equality of results does not apply to the sanctions that God imposes after a person dies, either positive sanctions or negative sanctions. The principle of positive sanctions is specified in I Corinthians 3:11–15: “For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; Every man’s work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man’s work of what sort it is. If any man’s work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man’s work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.” The principle of negative sanctions is specified in Luke 12:47–48: “And that servant, which knew his lord’s will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more.”²⁶

G. Time Perspective

The establishment of the death penalty is necessary to increase risk to the potential kidnapper—risk that is proportional to the magnitude of his proposed crime. By calculating in advance the permanent nature of the penalty (death), the criminal is forced to come to grips with the future. The criminal presumably is present-oriented.²⁷ Certainly, he ignores the eternal consequences of his acts. He generally

25. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), p. 87.

26. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

27. Edward C. Banfield, “Present-Orientedness and Crime”; Gerald P. O’Driscoll, “Professor Banfield on Time Horizon: What Has He Taught Us About Crime?” in Randy E. Barnett and John Hegel III (eds.), Assessing the Criminal: Restitution, Retribution, and the Legal Process (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Ballinger, 1977).

lives for the moment. His long-term fate is total destruction on the day of judgment. He discounts this, refusing to act in terms of this knowledge. That day seems too far away chronologically, and God is not visible. "Perhaps God is not going to enforce the promised penalty. Maybe God doesn't even exist," the criminal thinks to himself. Therefore, God sets the civil government's penalty so high that even a present-oriented criminal will feel the restraining pressure of extreme risk, even if his psychological rate of discount is very high. The severity of the earthly punishment testifies to the severity of the eternal punishment. It serves as an "earnest" or down payment on eternity.

The Bible teaches us that history is linear. History has a beginning and an end. The Bible also teaches us that our thoughts, as well as our deeds, have consequences in history and also in eternity beyond the grave (Matt. 5:28). It tells men to redeem (buy back) their time (Eph. 5:16), to work while there is still light (John 9:4). If God-fearing people must be educated and motivated for them to believe such doctrines, then we have to come to grips with the reality of a world in which members of a criminal class reject all these doctrines. More than this: members of a professional criminal class self-consciously live in terms of a rival set of attitudes toward time, personal responsibility, and the consequences of human action.

The possibility of the death penalty for kidnapping forces the potential kidnapper to count the cost of his transgression. Remember, a person's perception of total cost (including risk) is affected directly by his perception of time. If men discount the future greatly, as Esau did with respect to his birthright, then they will accept low cash bids for future income.²⁸ Present-oriented men discount future benefits and future curses alike; the distant future is of very little concern to them. As Harvard political scientist Edward Banfield commented:

At the present-oriented end of the scale, the lower-class individual lives from moment to moment. If he has any awareness of a future, it is of something fixed, fated, beyond his control: things happen to him, he does not make them happen. Impulse governs his behavior, either because he cannot discipline himself to sacrifice a present for a future satisfaction or because he has no sense of the future. He is therefore radically improvident: whatever he cannot use immediately he considers valueless. His bodily needs (especially for sex) and his taste for "action" take precedence over everything else—and certainly over any work routine.²⁹

28. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 13:C, cf. ch. 26.

A law-order must recognize present-oriented people for what they are. The kidnapper may be somewhat more future-oriented than the lower-class man. He makes plans, counts costs, and takes risks. But he discounts the long-term consequences of his acts. He does not care about the effects on the victim, his family, or the community. It is this radical lack of concern for the lives and callings of other men that makes him a menace to society. To catch his attention, to convince him of the seriousness of his crime, the Bible stipulates the death penalty. Richard Posner, an economist and also a judge for the U.S. Court of Appeals, acknowledged the validity of relationship between a criminal's time perspective and the need for capital punishment, but only in a footnote: "Notice that if criminals' discount rates are very high, capital punishment may be an inescapable method of punishing very serious crimes."³⁰

The total discontinuity involved in the execution of the kidnapper favors continuity in the lives of the innocent. It is the innocent people of society who deserve continuity, not the kidnappers. The decision to prosecute, or to specify a penalty other than death, is in the hands of the victim or his survivors. The victim is allowed by biblical law to bargain with the kidnapper in order to obtain his freedom. (The kidnapper would have no way to get even with a victim who subsequently changed his mind and called for the death penalty.)

H. Kidnapping and the Slave Trade

The abolition of slavery has made kidnapping less profitable financially. Before slavery was abolished by law, the slave market offered a profit to kidnappers because they could capitalize the entire working lifetime of the victim. There were numerous buyers who were willing to bid against each other for the lifetime output of kidnap victims. Today, only families, major corporations, and civil governments are willing and able to buy back a victim, and very often not primarily because of the victim's earning power.

29. Edward Banfield, The Unheavenly City Revisited (Boston: Little, Brown, 1973), p. 61.

30. Richard Posner, Economic Analysis of Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1986), p. 212n.

1. Free Market Demand

The slave trade existed for many centuries because of the ready market for its victims. The purchase of slaves by slave-buyers created the market price of the slaves, from ancient Greece until the not-so-ancient 1960s. As recently as 1960, in the words of Britain's Lord Shackleton, African Muslims on pilgrimages sold slaves on arrival, "using them as living traveller's cheques."³¹ Slavery was officially outlawed in Saudi Arabia in 1962 and by Oman in 1970.³² Nevertheless, though African slavery declined sharply in the 1960s, "slave-trading continued to flourish in Mauritania, Mali, Niger, and Chad, along the drought-stricken southern fringe of the Sahara."³³ As recently as 1981, the United Nations Human Rights Commission reported that there were 100,000 slaves in Mauritania. Other estimates place the total number of slaves at 250,000 among the nomadic tribes of the drought-ridden Sahel in North Africa.³⁴ The slave-owners are Moors (Islamic), while the slaves are blacks from Senegal. There are no open slave markets because the trade is officially illegal. The biggest part of the trade is in children. They belong to the owners of the mothers.³⁵

A steady economic demand for slaves created the demand for new victims. The slave traders, so hated and despised in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries by "respectable" English-speaking society, including most slave owners, and equally despised by slave-owning writers in the ancient world,³⁶ were, from a strictly economic point of view, nothing less than the paid agents of the buyers. They were performing specialized work as purchasing agents for slave-buyers. The Arab and native African kidnappers were, to that extent, merely the specialized collection agents of the slave-buyers. They were economic middlemen, entrepreneurs. The entrepreneur necessarily serves the wants of customers.

In every free market transaction, the potential customers for any economic good or service are competing with other customers for 31. Cited by David Brion Davis, Slavery and Human Progress (New York: Oxford University Press, 1984), p. 317.

32. Ibid., p. 319.

33. Idem.

34. Roger Sawyer, Slavery in the Twentieth Century (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1986), p. 14.

35. Bernard D. Nossiter, "U.N. Group Gets Report on Slaves in Mauritania," New York Times (Aug. 21, 1981).

36. Thomas Wiedemann, Greek and Roman Slavery (Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1981), pp. 6, 106–7.

control over all scarce economic resources. They compete directly and indirectly for the final output of the economy. The outcome of this competition establishes prices, quality standards, and costs related directly to the production of all economic goods. The middlemen (entrepreneurs) simply serve those customers whose competing bids are expected to produce the highest profits. *Customers ultimately determine prices and therefore also costs.*³⁷ This economic process was no less true of the slave trade. It is one of the peculiar aspects of “the peculiar institution” of American Negro slavery that the “final consumers” refused to recognize their own personal responsibility, as economic actors and political voters, for the operations of the entire slave-delivery system.

What we should recognize here is the relationship between the abolition of compulsory slavery and the reduction of involuntary servitude for citizens in general. By making illegal the market for imported slaves, Western nations reduced the demand for imported slaves in the early 1800s. This in turn reduced the risk of being kidnapped for the average African.³⁸ A policy of state-enforced coercion against slave-buying reduced the profit-seeking private coercive activity of kidnapping Africans thousands of miles away.

This policy worked only because (1) the British navy enforced its regulations against the slave traders after 1807, (2) a majority of citizens in the recipient nations were steadily educated to reject the idea of the legitimacy of involuntary servitude, and (3) slavery’s defenders were defeated on the battlefield, in the case of the American South in the 1860s. The economic lesson: disregarding the needs and preferences of slave-holders (the final users) by outlawing slavery led to the reduction of the entire slave trade. The profitability of the international slave trade was reduced. We learn that there are cases where state coercion is valid, when that coercion is directed against private coer-

37. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 5:8. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

38. This falling demand for imported slaves was offset by an increase in demand for legal, domestically produced slaves. This transformed some plantations into slave-breeding centers, especially in the Virginia tidewater region, where soil-eroding agricultural techniques had reduced the land’s output, and therefore had reduced the regional market value of the human tools who produced the output. This region began to export slaves to buyers who cultivated the fresher soils of Louisiana and Mississippi. See Alfred H. Conrad and John R. Meyer, “The Economics of Slavery in the Ante-Bellum South,” Journal of Political Economy, LXVI (April 1958); reprinted in Robert W. Fogel and Stanley L. Engerman (eds.), The Reinterpretation of American Economic History (New York: Harper & Row, 1971), ch. 25.

cers. The anti-slave trade legislation recognized the complicity of slave-owners (final users) in the coercive international slave trade. The market for slaves was not a free market, for the supply side of the transaction was based on coercion.

2. Monopoly Returns and Reduced Sales

There is a curious myth that laws against evil acts do not reduce the total number of these acts that criminals commit. Some critics even go so far as to argue that the very presence of the law subsidizes evil, in the case of laws against the sale of illegal drugs or laws against prostitution. Somehow, passing a law makes the prohibited market more profitable, and therefore the law leads to greater output of the prohibited substances or services. This is a very odd argument when it comes from people who defend the efficiency and productivity of laissez-faire economics.

A fundamental principle of economics is this: the division of labor is limited by the extent of the market. This was articulated by Adam Smith in Chapter 3 of Wealth of Nations (1776). Another basic principle is this one: the greater the division of labor, the greater the output per unit of resource input—in short, the greater the efficiency of the market. When the market increases in size, it makes possible an increase in cost-effective production. Advertising and mass-production techniques lower the cost of production and therefore increase the total quantity of goods and services demanded. This is well understood by economists.

Nevertheless, there are some people who still believe that laws against so-called “victimless crimes”—sins that they do not regard as major transgressions, I suspect—actually increase the profitability of crime. On the contrary, such laws increase the risk of the prohibited activities, both to sellers and consumers. Prices rise; the market shrinks; per unit costs rise; efficiency drops. Such laws create monopoly returns for a few criminals. But the critics of such laws conveniently forget that monopoly returns are always the product of reduced output. This, in fact, is the conventional definition of a monopoly. Thus, civil laws do reduce the extent of the specified criminal behavior.³⁹ They confine such behavior to certain criminal subclasses within the society. Biblically speaking, such laws place boundaries around such behavior.

39. Cf. James M. Buchanan, “A Defense of Organized Crime?” in Ralph Andreano and John J. Siegfried (eds.), The Economics of Crime (New York: Wiley, 1980), pp. 395–409.

There is no doubt that nineteenth-century laws against the slave trade drastically reduced the profitability of the international slave trade. These laws increased the risks for slavers, reduced their profits, and narrowed their markets. The result was a drop in output (slavery) per unit of resource input.

3. Household Evangelism

Apart from the one exception provided by the jubilee law, the Old Testament recognized the legitimacy of involuntary slavery of foreigners only when the slaves were female captives taken after a battle (Deut. 20:10–11, 14).⁴⁰ To fight a war for the purpose of taking slaves would have been illegitimate, for this was (and is) the foreign policy of empires. It is true that the jubilee law did allow both the importation of pagan slaves and the purchase of children from resident aliens (Lev. 25:44–46),⁴¹ but the purpose of this practice was primarily covenantal: bringing slaves of demon-possessed cultures into servitude under Hebrew families that were in turn under God.

Once the New Testament gospel became an international phenomenon that spread outward from local churches rather than from a central sanctuary in Jerusalem, there was no longer any need to bring potential converts into the land through purchase. Jesus completely fulfilled the terms of the jubilee law, including the kingdom-oriented goals of the imported slave law (Luke 4:16–18).⁴² He transferred the kingdom from the land of Israel to the church international: “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43).⁴³ He abolished the jubilee’s land tenure laws, as well as the slave-holding laws associated with the land of Israel as the exclusive place of temple sacrifice and worship.

40. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 48.

41. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 31.

42. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 4.

43. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), Introduction. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

4. Adoption

Nevertheless, in principle there remains a modern Christian practice that resembles the Old Testament jubilee slave law. This is the practice of adoption. Christians pay lawyers to arrange for the adoption of infants whose pagan parents do not want them. This is true household adoption rather than permanent slavery, but biblical law requires children to support parents in their old age, so the arrangement is not purely altruistic. The practice of adoption is governed by civil law in order to reduce the creation of a market for profit,⁴⁴ therefore discouraging the kidnapping of infants, but the economics of modern adoption are similar to the Old Testament practice of buying children from resident aliens. Adoption is a very good practice. Children are bought out of slavery inside covenant-breaking households.

Rushdoony referred to kidnapping as “stealing freedom.”⁴⁵ He commented:

The purpose of man's existence is that man should exercise dominion over the earth in terms of God's calling. This duty involves the restoration of a broken order by means of restitution. To kidnap a man and enslave him is to rob him of his freedom. A believer is not to be a slave (I Cor. 7:23; Gal. 5:1). Some men are slaves by nature; slavery was voluntary, and a dissatisfied slave could leave, and he could not be compelled to return, and other men were forbidden to deliver him to his master (Deut. 23:15, 16). . . . The purpose of freedom is that man exercise dominion and subdue the earth under God. A man who abuses this freedom to steal⁴⁶ can be sold into slavery in order to work out his restitution (Ex. 22:3); if he cannot use his freedom for its true purpose, godly dominion, reconstruction, and restitution, he must then work towards restitution in his bondage.⁴⁷

44. Actually, the adoption laws have created a profitable market for babies, but only state-licensed lawyers and adoption agencies are legally allowed to reap these profits. This is a legitimate licensing arrangement, similar in intent and economic effect as the licensing of physicians: to control a potentially coercive market phenomenon. Physicians control access to addictive drugs, and lawyers and adoption agencies control access to babies offered for adoption. This reduces the threat of kidnapped babies. By centralizing access to the flow of babies offered for adoption, the civil government can more successfully impose restrictions on the market for babies by guaranteeing that parents make the decision to supply this market, not kidnappers.

45. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 484.

46. Rushdoony obviously did not mean “freedom to steal”; he means a person who “abuses his freedom by stealing,” or “in order to steal.” The use of the infinitive, “to steal,” could lead to confusion.

47. Ibid., p. 485.

Conclusion

Kidnapping is a crime against God, man, and the social order. It steals men's freedom. It asserts the autonomy of the kidnapper over the victim. It substitutes the kidnapper's profit for the calling God gives to each man. It attacks God through His image, man. The kidnapper is therefore subject to the death penalty, at the discretion of his victim.

The potential imposition of the death penalty produces unequal risks for different economic classes. The rich are more likely to be victims in a non-slave society, where the quest for a ransom payment is the primary motivation for the kidnapper. Equality before the law is the fundamental principle of biblical law enforcement; inequality of economic results is therefore inescapable. By imposing a single penalty, death, the law increases the percentage of rich kidnap victims.

The legislated abolition of slavery reduces the market demand for stolen men, thereby reducing the profit accruing to kidnappers, and increasing the safety from kidnapping for the average citizen. To be effective, however, the majority of potential slave-owners must agree with the abolition, or else be fearful of violating the law. A profit-seeking black market in slaves would partially offset the economic effects of this law, namely, reduced demand for slaves. The high penalty imposed on both kidnapper and buyer, if coupled with the moral education of potential buyers of slaves (the final users), reduces the size and therefore the efficiency of the slave market. (Remember Adam Smith's observation: the division of labor is limited by the extent of the market.)⁴⁸

Finally, the death penalty overcomes the short-run, present-oriented time perspective of the potential kidnappers. The magnitude of the punishment calls attention to the magnitude of the crime. A death penalty forces the criminal to contemplate the possible results of his actions.

Rushdoony did not consider the concept of victim's rights in his Institutes of Biblical Law. He wrote that "the death penalty is mandatory for kidnapping. No discretion is allowed the court. To rob a man of his freedom requires death."⁴⁹ I would agree with this statement if it were qualified as follows: "The death penalty is mandatory for kidnapping. No discretion is allowed the court, once the victim has specified the death of the kidnapper as his preferred penalty." To deny the victim the legal right to specify the appropriate sanction is to deny the concept of victim's rights.

48. Smith, The Wealth of Nations (1776), ch. 3.

49. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 486.

THE COSTS OF PRIVATE CONFLICT

And if men strive together, and one smite another with a stone, or with his fist, and he die not, but keepeth his bed: If he rise again, and walk abroad upon his staff, then shall he that smote him be quit: only he shall pay for the loss of his time, and shall cause him to be thoroughly healed (Ex. 21:18–19).

The theocentric principle here is that man is God's image, and that for anyone to strike another person unlawfully or autonomously is an attempt to commit violence against God. It is man as God's representative that places him under the covenantal protection of civil government. The state is required by God to protect men from the physical violence of other men.

A. Reducing Conflict

One of the primary earthly goals of any godly society is the elimination of conflict among its citizens. The establishment of a reign of peace is one of the most prominent promises in the Old Testament's prophetic messages. Peace is therefore a sign of God's blessing and also a means of attaining other blessings, such as economic growth. Men who strive together in private battle testify to their own lack of self-discipline, and a godly legal order must provide sanctions against such disturbances of public order.

The Bible reminds men that they are responsible before God and society for their private actions. Specific costs are imposed by biblical law on the victor in any physical conflict. The eventual loser is to be protected and so is his family, whose rights he cannot waive simply by stepping into the arena. The loser is to be compensated for his loss of time while in bed and also for his medical expenses. In short, the victor must make restitution to the loser. The mere possession of superior strength or combat skills is not to be an advantage in the resolution of personal disputes.

We see a similar perspective in the Hittite laws: "If anyone batters a man so that he falls ill, he shall take care of him. He shall give a man in his stead who can look after his house until he recovers. When he recovers, he shall give him 6 shekels of silver, and he shall also pay the physician's fee. If anyone breaks a free man's hand or foot, he shall give him 20 shekels of silver and pledge his estate as security. If anyone breaks the hand or foot of a male or a female slave, he shall give 10 shekels of silver and pledge his estate as security."¹ Men must pay the costs of restoring the injured party to physical wholeness.

B. Winners and Losers

These economic restraints on victors remind men of the costs of injuring others. There are economic costs borne by the physical confrontation's loser. There are also costs borne by society at large. A man in a sickbed can no longer exercise either his calling or his job. He cannot labor efficiently, and the products of his labor are not brought to the marketplace. If he is employed by another person, the employer's operation is disrupted. By forcing the physical victor to pay for both the medical costs and the alternative costs (forfeited productivity on the part of the loser), biblical law helps to reduce conflict. The physical victor becomes an economic loser. The law also insures society against having to bear the medical costs involved. The immediate family, charitable institutions, or publicly financed medical facilities do not bear the costs.

The Mishnah, which was the legal code for Judaism until the late nineteenth century, establishes five different types of compensation. First, compensation for the injury itself, meaning damages for a permanent injury that results from the occurrence. Second, compensation for the injured person's pain and suffering. Third, compensation for the injured person's medical expenses. Fourth, compensation for the injured person's loss of earnings (time). Fifth, compensation for the embarrassment or indignity suffered by the victim.² Not all five will be found in each case, of course.³

1. "The Hittite Laws," paragraphs 10–12, in Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), p. 189. Paragraphs 13–16 continue the restitution theme: monetary penalties for biting off noses and ears of free men or slaves.

2. Baba Kamma 8:1, The Mishnah, ed. Herbert Danby (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. 342.

The judicially significant point is that the person who wins the conflict physically becomes the loser economically. The one who is still walking around after the fight must finance the physical recovery of the one who is in bed. The focus of judicial concern is on the victim who suffers the greatest physical injury. Biblical law and Jewish law impose economic penalties on the injury-inflicting victors of such private conflicts. As Maimonides put it, “The Sages have penalized strong-armed fools by ruling that the injured person should be held trustworthy. . . .”⁴

C. Games of Bloodshed

The murderous “games” of ancient Rome, where gladiators slew each other in front of cheering crowds, violated biblical law. The same is true of “sports” such as boxing, where inflicting injury is basic to victory. The lure of bloody games is decidedly pagan. Augustine, in his Confessions, spoke of a former student of his, Alypius. The young man had been deeply fond of the Circensian games of Carthage. Augustine had persuaded him of their evil, and the young man stopped attending. Later on, however, in Rome, Alypius met some fellow students who dragged him in a friendly way to the Roman amphitheater on the day of the bloody games. He swore to himself that he would not even look, but he did, briefly, and was trapped. “As he saw that blood, he drank in savageness at the same time. He did not turn away, but fixed his sight on it, and drank in madness without knowing it. He took delight in that evil struggle, and he became drunk on blood and pleasure. He was no longer the man who entered there, but only one of the crowd that he had joined, and a true comrade of those who brought him there. What more shall I say? He looked, he shouted, he took fire, he bore

3. Emanuel B. Quint, Jewish Jurisprudence: Its Sources and Modern Applications, 2 vols. (New York: Harwood Academic Publishers, 1980), I, p. 126. Maimonides wrote: “If one wounds another, he must pay compensation to him for five effects of the injury, namely, damages, pain, medical treatment, enforced idleness, and humiliation. These five effects are all payable from the injurer’s best property, as is the law for all who do wrongful damage.” Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1954), “Laws Concerning Wounding and Damaging,” IV:I:1, p. 160. Maimonides made one strange exception: if a person deliberately frightens someone, but does not touch him, he bears no legal liability, only moral liability. Even if he shouts in a person’s ear and deafens him, there is no legal liability. Only if he touches the person is there legal liability: ibid., IV:II:7, pp. 165–66.

4. Maimonides, Torts, IV:V:4, p. 177.

away with himself a madness that should arouse him to return, not only with those who had drawn him there, but even before them, and dragging others along as well."⁵ Only later was his faith in Christ able to break his addiction to the games.

In the city of Trier (Treves) in what is today Germany, alien hordes burned the town in the early fifth century, murdering people and leaving their bodies in piles. Salvian (the Presbyter) recorded what took place immediately thereafter: "A few nobles who survived destruction demanded circuses from the emperors as the greatest relief for the destroyed city."⁶ They wanted the immediate reconstruction of the arena, not the town's walls, so powerful was the hold of the bloody games on the minds of Roman citizens.

D. Chaos Festivals

Roger Caillois, in his book, Man and the Sacred (1959), argued that the chaos festivals of the ancient and primitive worlds served as outlets for hostilities. These festivals are unfamiliar to most modern citizens, or in the case of the familiar ones, such as Mardi Gras in New Orleans, carnival in the Caribbean, or New Year's Eve parties in many nations, they are not recognized for what they are. He wrote:

It is a time of excess. Reserves accumulated over the course of several years are squandered. The holiest laws are violated, those that seem at the very basis of social life. Yesterday's crime is now prescribed, and in place of customary rules, new taboos and disciplines are established, the purpose of which is not to avoid or soothe intense emotions, but rather to excite and bring them to climax. Movement increases, and the participants become intoxicated. Civil or administrative authorities see their powers temporarily diminish or disappear. This is not so much to the advantage of the regular sacerdotal caste as to the gain of secret confraternities or representatives of the other world, masked actors personifying the Gods or the dead. This fervor is also the time for sacrifices, even the time for the sacred, a time outside of time that recreates, purifies, and rejuvenates society. . . All excesses are permitted, for society expects to be regenerated as a result of excesses, waste, orgies, and violence.⁷

5. The Confessions of St. Augustine, trans. by John K. Ryan (Garden City, New York: Image Books, 1960), Book 6, ch. 8.

6. Salvian, The Governance of God, in The Writings of Salvian, the Presbyter, Jeremiah F. O'sullivan, trans. (New York: Cima Publishing Co., 1947), Bk. VI, Sect. 15, p. 178. Salvian was a contemporary of St. Augustine, in the fifth century. This was probably written around A.D. 440.

It was these festivals, he argued, that in some way drained off the violent emotions inherent in men. (On the contrary, such festivals stimulated violent emotions.)⁸ The festivals, he argues, were therefore basic to the preservation of social peace. Without these ritual celebrations of lawlessness, he argues, there will be an increase of actual wars. In other words, men innately require the tension and release of violence. Prohibit the socially circumscribed ritual chaos of Mardi Gras, carnival, and New Year, and we therefore supposedly risk the outbreak of war. Because modern man has suppressed such ritual chaos, he concludes, we have seen the increase of wars and their intensity and devastation.⁹

In contrast to Caillois's analysis stands the Bible. Leaders in a godly social order should strive to eliminate such chaos festivals and "circumscribed violence." The laws requiring restitution for anyone injured in a brawl are related to the general prohibition against individual violence. Lawlessness is to be suppressed. Man is not told to give vent to his feelings of violence; he is told to overcome them through self-discipline under God. Wars and violence come from the lusts of men (James 4:1). These bloody lusts are to be overcome, not ritually sanctioned. The celebration of communion is God's sanctioned bloody ritual which gives men symbolic blood, but the Bible forbids the drinking of actual blood (Lev. 3:17; Deut. 12:16, 23; Acts 15:20).

E. Biblical Law Confronts the "Honorable Duel"

The Bible informs us that the civil government is to protect human life. Each man is made in God's image, and men, acting as private citizens, do not have the right to attempt to attack God indirectly by attacking His image in other men. Men are not sovereign over their own lives or over the lives of others; God is (Rev. 1:18). God delegates the right of execution to the civil government, not to individual men acting outside a lawful institution in the pursuit of lawful objectives.

7. Roger Caillois, Man and the Sacred (Glencoe, Illinois: The Free Press, 1959), p. 164.

8. It is interesting to note that modern political liberals criticize graphic violence on television because it may produce violent behavior, especially in children. In contrast, they argue that graphic sex in magazines, books, and moving pictures is harmless, and in no way can be shown to produce deviant sexual behavior. In other words, liberals are opposed to violence and favor open sex. Conservatives have a tendency to reverse these two preferences and argue the opposite positions.

9. Ibid., ch. 4.

1. The Duel

The private duel is just such a threat to human life and safety. Fighting is a threat to social peace. It is disorderly, willful, vengeful, and hypothetically autonomous. It poses a threat to innocent bystanders (Ex. 21:22–25).¹⁰ It can destroy property. When a death or serious injury is involved, a duel can lead in some societies—especially those that place family status above civil law—to an escalation of inter-family feuding and blood vengeance.

The premise of the duel or the brawl is the assertion of the existence of zones of judicial irresponsibility. Men set aside for themselves a kind of arena in which the laws of civil society should not prevail. There may or may not be rules governing the private battlefield, but these rules are supposedly special, removing men from the jurisdiction of civil law. The protection of life and limb, which is basic to the civil law, is supposedly suspended by mutual consent. “Common” laws supposedly have no force over “uncommon” men during the period of the duel. Somehow, the law of God does not apply to private warriors who defend their own honor and seek to impose a mutually agreed-upon form of punishment on their rivals.

But the laws of God do apply. James Jordan wrote: “The Bible does not permit the use of force to resolve disputes, except where force is lawfully exercised by God’s ordained officer, the civil magistrate. To put it another way, the Bible requires men to submit to arbitration, and categorically prohibits them from taking their own personal vengeance (Rom. 12:17–13:7).”¹¹

An obvious implication of the biblical law against dueling is the prohibition of gladiatorial contests, which would include boxing. A boxer who kills another man in the ring should be executed. Another implication is the necessity of rejecting the notion of a “fair fight.” There is no such thing as a fair fight. Flight is almost always preferable to private fighting, but where fighting is unavoidable, it should be an all-out confrontation. Should a person “fight fair” when his wife is attacked? Should women under attack from a man “fight fairly”? The answer ought to be clear.¹² Thus, the code of the duel is doubly perverse:

10. Chapter 36.

11. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 110. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

12. Ibid., p. 112.

first, it imputes cowardice to a man who would seek to keep the peace by walking away from a challenge to his honor; second, it restricts a man's lawful self-defense to a set of agreed-upon "rules of the game." Fighting is not a game; it is either an evil assertion of personal autonomy or else a necessary defense of life, limb, and perhaps property.

2. Duel to the Death: Murder

One implication of Exodus 21:18–19 is that a death resulting from a duel or a brawl is to be regarded as murder.¹³ This is a concept of personal responsibility that is foreign to societies that allow private violence. In such societies, the quest for personal power and prestige overrides the quest for public peace. The autonomy of man is affirmed by the ritual practices of the duel and brawl. Wyatt-Brown wrote of the antebellum (pre-1861) American South: "Ordinarily, honor under the dueling test called for public recognition of a man's claim to power, whatever social level he or his immediate circle of friends might belong to. A street fight could and often did accomplish the same thing for the victor. Murder, or at least manslaughter, inspired the same public approval in some instances. Just as lesser folk spoke ungrammatically, so too they fought ungrammatically, but their actions were expressions of the same desire for prestige."¹⁴

Under biblical law, injured bystanders are protected from deliberate violence on the part of other people on an "eye for eye" basis.¹⁵ An

13. Robert L. Dabney, Lectures in Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, [1878] 1972), pp. 404–6. Dabney was by far the most insightful Presbyterian theologian in the nineteenth-century South. He had served for several months, before becoming too ill to continue, as Gen. Thomas "Stonewall" Jackson's chaplain, as well as his Chief of Staff. He later wrote a biography of Jackson, so he cannot be considered a man hostile to military virtues. Cf. Thomas Cary Johnson, The Life and Letters of Robert Lewis Dabney (Richmond, Virginia: Presbyterian Committee of Publication, 1903), ch. 13.

14. Bertram Wyatt-Brown, Southern Honor: Ethics and Behavior in the Old South (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982), p. 353.

15. A somewhat different problem is raised if a person defends himself from another person who has initiated violence. What if, in defending himself, a person injures a bystander? Clearly, it was not the bystander's fault. The person responsible for inflicting the injury should pay damages. Should it be the person who initiated the violence or the defender who inadvertently harmed the bystander? For example, what if a man attacks another man, and the second person pulls out a gun and fires at the attacker, hitting a bystander by mistake? A humanistic theory of strict liability would produce a judgment against the defender, for his defense was misguided, or excessive, or ineffective. But what if the attacker had grabbed the defender's "shooting hand," injured loser who walks again is entitled to full compensation. But in the case where the loser dies, the judges are required to impose a capital sentence on a surviving fighter. When the loser cannot “walk abroad,” the victor must not be “quit.” At best, he would have to pay an enormous fine to the family of the dead man, but even this would seem to be too lenient, because the only instance of a substitution of payment for the death sentence involves criminal negligence, but not willful violence: the owner’s failure to contain a dangerous beast that subsequently kills a man (Ex. 21:29–30). The autonomous shedding of man’s blood, even to “defend one’s good name,” is still murder.

It is clear that if a biblically honorable man refuses to fight because the civil law supports his position by threatening him with death should he successfully kill his opponent, he can avoid the fight in the name of personal self-confidence. He says, in effect, “I know I can probably kill you; therefore, I choose not to enter this fight because I will surely be executed after I kill you.” Thus, he can avoid being regarded as a coward. This breaks the central social hold that the code duello has always possessed: the honorable man’s fear of being labeled a coward. But in order to deflect this powerful hold, the state must be willing to enforce the death penalty on victors.

F. Courts and Vigilantes

Legal predictability is crucial to the preservation of an orderly society. The breakdown of predictable justice in any era can lead to a revival of blood vengeance. Those who are convinced that the court system is unable to dispense justice and defend the innocent are tempted to “take the law into their own hands.” The rise of vigilante groups that take over the administration of physical sanctions always comes at the expense of legal predictability. This is a sign of the breakdown in the legal order, and it is accompanied by a loss of legitimacy by “establish-causing him to fire wildly? The injury to the bystander would seem to be the fault of the attacker. However, if the original attacker was using only his fists, and the defender had pulled out a gun and started shooting—a seemingly excessive response—would this make the original attacker a defender when he attempted to grab the weapon? Judgment is complicated, for life is complicated. The Bible places restraints on violence. The goal of the God-fearing man should be to reduce private physical violence. Thus, if the attacker uses fists, and the defender has a weapon, the attacker should be warned to stop. The victim does have the right to identify the attacker and press charges. The civil government should inflict the penalty. But if the attacker still challenges the person with the weapon, then the person has the right to stop the attacker from inflicting violence on him.

ment” institutions.¹⁶ Eventually, vigilante movements are either stamped out by the existing social order or else they become the foundation of a new social order: the warlord society.

The various vigilante movements of the United States in the nineteenth century arose when the civil authorities would not or could not enforce the law.¹⁷ Vigilantes were common in the American West after the Civil War prior to the establishment of local and regional judicial order. The most famous vigilante group in United States history is the Ku Klux Klan. The original Ku Klux Klan of the American South, 1865–71, was a defensive movement.¹⁸ The organization was self-consciously occult in its regalia. Members wore white sheets with holes cut out for eyes, so that they would resemble the folklore version of ghosts, thereby adding to the terror of superstitious former slaves. The Klan was highly liturgical, its rituals filled with diabolic symbols, hidden signs, and other elements of secret societies, and it predictably degenerated into violence and lawlessness within a few years. It was officially disbanded in 1869, and when local “dens” persisted, it was stamped out by the U.S. military. An imitation of the old Klan rose again to national political prominence in the 1920s,¹⁹ only to fade na-

16. This appears to be beginning in large cities in the United States. Citizen's patrols became common in certain Jewish districts in the New York City area in the late 1960s. A parallel group of inner-city youths sprang up in the late 1970s, the Guardian Angels, initially composed mostly of Puerto Ricans. This group has spread across the United States. By 1988, its leaders claimed 60 chapters and 6,000 members. Citizen's patrols have now spread to black neighborhoods and middle class neighborhoods, especially in response to the advent of “crack” houses: the modern equivalent of the opium dens of the nineteenth century. In some cases, local police departments do cooperate with these citizen's patrols, and to this extent they are not pure vigilante organizations. See “Neighbors Join to Rout the Criminals in the Streets,” Insight (Nov. 28, 1988), pp. 8–21.

17. Richard Maxwell Brown, “The History of Vigilantism in America,” in H. Jon Rosenbaum and Peter C. Sederberg (eds.), Vigilante Politics (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1976); see also Brown, Strain of Violence: Historical Studies of American Violence and Vigilantism (New York: Oxford University Press, 1975).

18. The early twentieth-century trilogy of novels by Thomas Dixon eulogized this early Klan. Birth of a Nation, the epic D. W. Griffith silent film of 1915, was based on Dixon's second novel in this trilogy, The Clansman (1905). This moving picture was the first modern “spectacular,” and was shown to large audiences across the United States. It had the support of President Woodrow Wilson (a college classmate of Dixon's) and the Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, a former Klansman. See David M. Chalmers, Hooded Americanism: The First Century of the Ku Klux Klan, 1865–1965 (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1965), pp. 26–27. The film, unfortunately, led to a revival of the Klan: ibid., ch. 4. (The 17-year-old star of Griffith's movie, Lillian Gish, also starred in The Whales of August in 1987—a long career.)

19. It was the victory of an anti-Klan candidate for governor in the Republican tionally in the 1930s and in the South in the 1940s. Today, numerous local Klan-type groups exist, but they have little influence.²⁰ But the Klan's former power testifies to the fact that when civil courts fail to dispense justice and therefore lose their legitimacy in the eyes of large numbers of citizens, societies will eventually see the rise of private dispensers of "people's justice."

Without a sense of legitimacy, the authority of public courts is threatened. The courts need legitimacy in order to gain the long-term voluntary cooperation of the public, meaning self-government under law, without which law enforcement becomes both sporadic and tyrannical. No legal system can afford the economic resources that would be necessary to gain full compliance to an alien law-order in a society whose members are unwilling to govern themselves voluntarily in terms of that law-order.²¹ If the courts do not receive assent from the public as legitimate institutions, they can maintain the peace only by imposing sentences whose severity goes beyond people's sense of justice, which again calls into doubt both legitimacy and legal predictability.

G. Judicial Pluralism and Social Disintegration

A civil government that refuses to defend a law-order that is seen as legitimate by the public is inviting the revival of the duel, the feud, and blood vengeance. If the public cannot agree on standards of decency, then the courts will be tempted to become autonomous. Widespread and deep differences concerning religion lead to equally strong disagreements over morality and law. Religious pluralism leads to moral and judicial pluralism, meaning unpredictable courts. Religious pluralism is an outgrowth of polytheism. Polytheism inescapably leads to what we might call "polylegalism." Too many law courts decide in terms of conflicting moralities. Only the strong hand of centralized and bureaucratic civil government can enforce a single standard of law

Party's primary in the state of Oregon which led the Klan to jump to the Democratic Party. They elected the Democratic candidate, plus enough members of the legislature to pass a law mandating that all children between the ages of eight and sixteen attend a government-operated school. Chalmers, Hooded Americanism, p. 3. This law was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1925 in a landmark case, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, which has remained the key Court decision in the fight for Christian schools.

20. As one southerner described the Klan: "It is made up mainly of gasoline station attendants and FBI informers. The members can easily spot the informers: they are the only ones who pay their monthly dues."

21. Chapter 19:D.

on a religiously divided public, which is why religious and judicial pluralism ultimately leads to tyranny: the grab for power. Long-term judicial pluralism is a myth: one group or another ultimately must decide what is right and what is wrong, what should be prohibited by civil law and what shouldn't.²²

The myth of judicial pluralism has hidden from the people (including Christians) the reality of the inescapable intolerance of all civil government. There can no more be permanent religious neutrality on earth than in heaven, and as time moves toward that final court decision, the impossibility of pluralism is becoming more obvious. Either God or Satan will execute final judgment; either God's law or man's law will be imposed on eternity. The covenantal representatives of each kingdom will, on earth and in history, progressively present their respective supernatural sovereign's case to the world. There is no way to reconcile these competing claims. Marxism cannot be reconciled with Christianity, and neither system can be reconciled with Islam. The liberal humanist's hope in treaties, arms control, and endless tax-supported economic deals with Communist nations, 1917–1991, was as doomed to failure as the conservative humanist's faith in the peace-promoting reign of neutral natural law.²³ Elijah's challenge is inescapable: "How long halt ye between two opinions? If the LORD be God, follow him: but if Baal, then follow him." Then as now, the people delay making a decision: "And the people answered him not a word" (I Kings 18:21).

They did not remain silent forever. The fire came from heaven and consumed the sacrifice on God's altar. The people saw, understood, and acted: they brought the 850 priests of Baal to Elijah, who killed them (I Kings 18:40). The nation for the moment sided with God's prophet. The "priests of Baal" of any era can delay judgment for a while, but eventually judgment comes in history. Nevertheless, without a change in heart, the people eventually return to their old ways. The Revolution consumes its own children. The prophet is again put on the run (I Kings 19).

The humanist courts of our day appeal to religious pluralism, yet they are creating judicial tyranny.²⁴ The anti-feud, anti-clan,²⁵ anti-duel

22. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

23. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

24. Carrol D. Kilgore, Judicial Tyranny (Nashville, Tennessee: Nelson, 1977).

25. Weber wrote: "When Christianity became the religion of these peoples who ethic of once-Christian Western bourgeois cultures—societies in which social peace has fostered economic growth—is being undermined by judges who are creating lawlessness in the name of a purified humanist legal system. Judicial pluralism must be replaced, but not from the top down, and not from the vigilante's noose outward. The satanic myth of legal pluralism must be replaced by the power of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of men. The Holy Spirit is the enforcer in New Testament times.

Conclusion

Social order requires a degree of social peace. When biblical law began to influence the civil governments of the West, an increase of social peace and social order took place. This, in turn, led to greater economic growth and technological development.²⁶

Christian culture is orderly. The Christian West steadily abolished or redirected the chaos festivals of the pagan world, until the growth of humanism-paganism began to reverse this process.²⁷ Legal systems became predictable, as the “eye for eye” principle spread alongside the gospel of salvation. The unpredictable violence of state power was thereby reduced. In private relationships, men were not allowed to vent their wrath on each other in acts of violence. Those who violated this law became economically liable for their actions.

The duel or brawl is by nature a direct challenge to the authority and legitimacy of the civil government. It transfers to individuals operating outside the state—the God-ordained monopoly of violence—a degree of legal immunity from civil judgment. It transfers sovereignty in the administration of violence from the state to the individual. It is not surprising, therefore, that one program of legal reform recommended by some contemporary libertarian anarchists is the legalization of had been so profoundly shaken in all their traditions, it finally destroyed whatever religious significance these clan ties retained; perhaps, indeed, it was precisely the weakness or absence of such magical and taboo barriers which made the conversion possible. The often very significant role played by the parish community in the administrative organization of medieval cities is only one of the many symptoms pointing to this quality of the Christian religion which, in dissolving clan ties, importantly shaped the medieval city.” He contrasted this anti-clan perspective with that of Islam. Max Weber, Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, eds. Guenther Roth and Claus Wittich (New York: Bedminster Press, [1924] 1968), p. 1244.

26. Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion, Conclusion, D.

27. Peter Gay aptly titled the first volume of his study of the Enlightenment, The Rise of Modern Paganism (New York: Knopf, 1966). The two-volume study is titled, The Enlightenment: An Interpretation (New York: Knopf, 1966, 1969).

dueling. The duel is seen as a private act between consenting adults and therefore sacrosanct. (Sacrosanct: from sacro = sacred rite, and sanctum = holy and inviolable. Also related to sanction = legal and sovereign authority, or a judgment by a legal and sovereign authority.)

The abolition of the private duel in the late nineteenth century was a case in point. While this development came during an era of increasing secularism, it was consistent with a Christian view of civil law. Personal self-control within a social framework of predictable biblical law is to replace physical violence. The failure of Christian culture in the antebellum South to eliminate the imported feudal tradition of duelling in the name of gentlemanly honor eventually was rectified. The Southern duel disappeared with Gen. Lee's surrender to Gen. Grant at the Appomattox Court House in 1865.

Yet even in the South, there were strict limits placed on this code duello. It had been a highly ritualized procedure, as the duelling handbook of the era indicated, a book written by a Governor of South Carolina, John Lyde Wilson's Code of Honor (1838). It is significant that custom recognized the immunity of serious Christians to the formal ritual of the honorable duel. Wyatt-Brown comments: "Of course, among Christians and older men who were not expected to show youthful passions excessive violence was considered inappropriate. As Henry Foote noted, devout churchmen could forgo duels or, in fact, any other form of physical redress without incurring public censure. For other men a different standard prevailed."²⁸ Bruce, also citing Foote's statement, concurred: "Only a known Christian, appealing to religious scruples, could refuse to challenge another gentlemen with public approval. . . ."²⁹ It was only the defeat of the South on the battlefield that finally transformed the model of a Southern gentlemen from a man ready to defend his honor with personal violence into a self-disciplined, soft-spoken person who gains his revenge for an insult to his honor in non-violent ways. A similar transformation of Japanese aristocratic ideals, also closely tied to feudal and military concepts of honor, took place after Japan's defeat in World War II. A military defeat is an expensive way for a society to learn to conform its social standards to the requirements of biblical law.

28. Wyatt-Brown, Southern Honor, p. 354.

29. Bruce, Violence and Culture, p. 28.

36

THE HUMAN COMMODITY

And if a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand; he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished: for he is his money (Ex.21:20–21).

Exodus 21:20–21 clearly teaches that an owner could legitimately beat his permanent heathen slaves (Lev. 25:44–46) and indentured Hebrew bondservants (Deut. 15:12). The theocentric principle here is that the slave-owner is God's representative agent to the slave. God deals with all men hierarchically. This is very clear in the case of master and slave. The slave is in an inferior position institutionally, though not necessarily morally. His servitude may be the result of some flaw in his character or his skills, or it may be because of uncontrollable external circumstances. The case laws do not distinguish between the servant who is a moral failure and the servant who has suffered a temporary but uncontrollable setback. The bondservice laws apply to all bondservants and all masters equally. The bondservant's legal status is judicially binding on the civil magistrates; they are not to make arbitrary exceptions to God's authorized sanctions in terms of their evaluation of the servant's moral condition. In this way, the state is placed under limits, which is even more important than placing masters and slaves under limits.¹ Jesus fulfilled the jubilee laws and thereby abolished the legal foundation of permanent chattel slavery (Luke 4:16–18);² He did not abolish the state. The state is a far more important institution historically and judicially than private chattel slavery ever has been.

1. Critics of competitive free market capitalism sometimes argue that personal wealth can result from "luck" as well as from hard work, from the "accident of birth" as well as from successful entrepreneurship. They want the civil government's bureaucrats to determine whether other men's wealth is morally deserved, and then redistribute wealth by compulsion in terms of the "deserving character" of the recipients. But because civil law must be general in scope, the proponents of compulsory wealth redistribution must then generalize their criticisms of the more economically successful. One legislative result is the graduated ("progressive") income tax, which assumes that all high-income earners have been rewarded disproportionately to their productivity, and all low-income people therefore deserve a share in the high-income people's gains.

A. “He Is His Money”

What did this phrase mean? How was a bondservant the owner’s money? The answer should be obvious: he could trade the servant for assets, just as he could trade money for assets. The bondservant was a commodity, just as money in the ancient world was a commodity. He could sell a bondservant for money. There was a market for these slaves.

This equivalency is basic to understanding labor services as commodities. They possess value. They can be sold for services, commodities, or money that can buy services and commodities. Human labor services have characteristic features of services supplied by commodities. In a slave system, the services of a slave can be capitalized. The slave is a capital good, just as a tool is a capital good. A slave can perform services; so can a tool. There are markets for both forms of capitalized services. The same rules of asset evaluation and pricing apply to both forms of capital. It is only because slave markets are illegal and underground today that we are not more familiar with the pricing of slaves.

Does this mean that a human being is a commodity? Is he a capital good? He is, but he is more than this. He is the image of God. But what of human labor services? Are they commodities? Are they priced in the same way that commodities are priced? Yes. In one of the last remaining forms of labor capitalization, professional athletics, buyers and

The economically successful must subsidize the unsuccessful. Thus, there can be no neutrality with respect to the Bible in tax policy. We should affirm the biblical standard, namely, that civil law must not distinguish between the morally deserving or undeserving nature of income recipients, so long as they did not use force or fraud in gaining their wealth. The alternative is to conclude that civil law must assume that either the successful deserve special treatment at the expense of the less successful, or vice versa. The law must “take sides.” It must discriminate. This makes the state arbitrary and dangerous. If the case laws of Exodus do not distinguish between slaves and masters in terms of their comparative moral stature or their prior outward circumstances, then there is no way biblically to justify the creation of welfare state wealth-redistribution schemes based on people’s comparative moral stature or their prior outward circumstances.

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4

sellers of labor services establish prices for long-term packages of these highly specialized labor services. In this case, the seller benefits from this capitalized value. Under the slave systems in history, he did not. But the principles of asset pricing are the same.

Then in what ways were Hebrew owners of slaves to act differently in dealing with them than they did as owners of beasts of burden? More important, what was the judicial basis of these distinctions? When we understand these principles, we can better understand what modern labor relations should be.

There is another consideration. There is nothing in the New Testament to indicate that indentured servitude is no longer legitimate. The buyer of labor services still has the legal right to offer laborers long-term contracts that cannot legally be broken by either party. If this were not true, then Paul's epistle to Philemon is incomprehensible. Paul sent Onesimus back into slavery to Philemon.

B. Sanctions and Moral Reform

The master is supposed to be an agent of moral reform; his training, support, and example are supposed to serve as the bondservant's pathway back to self-government and productivity. The master therefore exercises lawful discipline in God's name, including physical discipline. He brings covenantal sanctions. Because the servant is made in God's image, there are limits placed on the master's authority. This authority to impose sanctions is not unlimited; it is restrained by civil law and, as we shall see, by economic self-interest.

So severe is a Bible-sanctioned beating that a servant may even die a few days later. This is regarded as a case of accidental death, and the owner is not to be held responsible. It is acknowledged by God that servants can be rebellious to the point that they may be severely beaten. This is the passage that so disturbed Christian family counselor James Dobson: "Do you agree that if a man beats his slave to death, he is to be considered guilty only if the individual dies instantly? If the slave lives a few days, the owner is considered not guilty (Exodus 21:20–21)[?] Do you believe that we should stone to death rebellious children (Deuteronomy 21:18–21)? Do you really believe we can draw subtle meaning about complex issues from Mosaic law, when even the obvious interpretation makes no sense to us today? We can hardly select what we will and will not apply now. If we accept the verses you cited, we are obligated to deal with every last jot and tittle.”³ He is correct; we are required to take seriously every last jot and tittle.

All human authority is limited by God’s law. Man is not autonomous (autos = self; nomos = law). There are therefore God-imposed judicial limits on the master’s lawful authority to impose physical sanctions. What are these limits? The first limit is mechanical. The bond-servant must be punished with a rod, not with a lethal weapon. If the master used a lethal weapon to administer the punishment, such as a rock, and the slave died a few days later, the protection normally afforded to him by this law would become the basis of his conviction for murder.⁴

The second limit is the threat of the execution of the master if a servant dies on the day of the beating. “And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death” (Lev.24:17). The owner is not exempted from this law. He is in a position of authority, and he must not abuse this position of authority. He who exercises dominion is always under lawful authority. Men are not autonomous. It should be noted at this point that this law was unique in the legal collections of the ancient Near East. No other collection even deals with a master who kills a slave.⁵

Obviously, it would be difficult to prove that a master deliberately killed his servant if the servant survived the beating for several days.⁶ Biblical civil justice is concerned with criminal intent, but only to the extent that such intent can be deduced from the external events. The state is not allowed to seek to get inside a person’s mind. This is why lie detector exams must never be made mandatory, nor regarded as anything more than circumstantial evidence.

The third limit is the loss suffered by the servant. If the owner breaks a servant’s tooth or puts out an eye—representative injuries indicating any major permanent disfigurement—the servant goes free (Ex.21:26–27).⁷ Also, if the servant dies a few days later, the owner has just lost a major capital investment. His self-interest instructs him to

3. James Dobson, “Dialogue on Abortion,” in Dobson and Gary Bergel, The Decision of Life (Arcadia, California: Focus on the Family, 1986), p. 14.

4. Walter C. Kaiser, Jr., Toward Old Testament Ethics (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1983), p. 102.

5. Shalom Paul, Studies in the Book of the Covenant in the Light of Cuneiform and Biblical Law (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1970), p. 69.

6. Idem.

7. Chapter 39.

restrain his wrath.⁸ The Bible recognizes this economic self-interest on the part of the owner, when it refers to the servant as “his money” (Ex.21:21). A rational, calculating owner is not going to destroy his own asset needlessly. It is the very fact of the “servant as commodity” that protects him from excessive abuse. It is his commodity status that enables the civil government to leave him in the hands of his owner. Self-government by the owner is encouraged by economic self-interest.⁹

If the economic self-interest of bondservant-owners is biblically legitimate, and even a factor in the self-restraint of owners, as the Bible says is the case, then this implies that men can legitimately be regarded by others in terms of the economic value that their services offer those other people. Bondservants command a price in a market. Thus, they are regarded by purchasers as economic commodities. Workers also command a contract price. Thus, they too are regarded by purchasers as economic commodities. The question then is: To what extent?

C. Marx on Workers as Commodities: A Myth

A familiar criticism of capitalism is that it treats people as if they were commodities rather than human beings. The capitalist order supposedly dehumanizes man by defining him as a thing, a part of the production process, a cog in a great machine. The solution, we are told, is to permit men to organize collectively in labor unions (even Christian labor unions),¹⁰ or to overturn the capitalist order, or to get Christians in labor and management to have prayer meetings together.

You might imagine that such a moralistic argument against capit-

8. Kaiser, Toward Old Testament Ethics, p. 102.

9. None of this provides any insight into the rule of Maimonides regarding the deliberate injuring of other men's slaves: “One's slave is regarded as his own person, but his animal is regarded as his inanimate property. Thus, if one places a burning coal on the breast of another's slave so that he dies, or if one pushes a slave into the sea or into a fire from which he can escape but he does not escape and dies, the injurer is exempt from paying compensation. If, however, one does the same to another's animal, it is regarded as if he had placed a burning coal on another's clothing and burned it, in which case he is liable for payment. The same rule applies in all similar cases.” Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1954), “Laws Concerning Wounding and Damaging,” IV:IV:22, p. 176. The reader is left on his own here; the logic of this analysis is beyond me. I cannot fathom what general principle of jurisprudence Maimonides' case law represents.

10. See the essay by Gerald Vandezande, “On Strikes and Strife: A Critique of the Status Quo,” in John H. Redekop (ed.), Labor Problems in a Christian Perspective (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972).

alism is a variation of Marxism. Such is not the case. Marx's few references to workers as commodities appear only in his youthful and unpublished Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844, which were not translated into English until the mid-1960s, and which had zero influence on traditional Marxist thought.¹¹ Marx was quite matter-of-fact in his published writings concerning human labor as a commodity. In his major theoretical work, Capital (1867), Marx argued that the "free laborer," meaning the wage-earner in a capitalist economy, sells his own commodity, labor power, to the capitalist. He "must constantly look upon his labour-power as his own property, his own commodity, and this he can only do by placing it at the disposal of the buyer temporarily, for a definite period of time."¹² Original Marxist theory presumed that if the legally free laborer can legitimately look at his own labor power as a commodity, then so can the capitalist buyer. Marx argued that the terms of sale involve exploitation by the capitalist, but he did not argue that the item sold, human labor, is somehow not a commodity.

Years earlier, Marx had distinguished between slave labor, in which the worker is a commodity, and free labor under capitalism, in which he isn't. He discussed labor power, not the worker as a commodity. "Labour power was not always a commodity. Labour was not always wage labour, that is, free labour. The slave did not sell his labour power to the slave-owner, any more than the ox sells its services to the peasant. The slave, together with his labour power, is sold once and for all to his owner. He is a commodity which can pass from the hand of one owner to that of another. He is himself a commodity, but the labour power is not his commodity."¹³ Popular Marxism may occasionally have used the idea of "proletarian man, the commodity" to gain converts, but traditional Marxism always focused on Marx's exploitation theory, his surplus value theory, and other more arcane topics. Thus, to criticize capitalism because of its alleged result—workers as commodities—is a most un-Marxist line of reasoning. Marx believed that it was feudalism and especially capitalism that destroyed slavery, the system in which workers supposedly did become commodities.

11. These statements appear in the essay, "Antithesis of Capital and Labor. Landed Property and Capital." Two brief references to workers as commodities from this essay are the only ones listed in Karl Marx Dictionary, ed. Morris Stockhammer (New York: Philosophical Library, 1965), p. 268.

12. Karl Marx, Capital (New York: Modern Library, [1867] 1906), ch.6, pp.186–87. The Modern Library version is a reprint of the Charles H. Kerr edition.

13. Marx, Wage Labour and Capital (1849), in Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, 1969), I, p. 153.

D. Reductionism and Impersonalism: Costly Errors

We need to ask ourselves this question: Is everything that commands a price nothing more than a commodity? The phrase “nothing more than” is crucial. Whenever we encounter it, either explicitly or implicitly, we are encountering a form of economic reductionism.

1. Reductionism

In any sort of scientific analysis, there lurks the threat of reductionism. This is especially true in the case of social science. Man and man’s personal relationships can be reduced to “merely” economics, or “merely” induced responses to stimuli, or “merely” chemical responses, or even nothing more than a figment of his imagination (solipsism). By reducing our explanation of man and his actions to one seemingly all-encompassing model, we become “monocausal” (single cause) thinkers. Monocausal theories invariably become tautological—a repetition of the same concept using different words—and wind up explaining little, throwing little light on most of man’s actions. An otherwise useful explanation of some aspect of man or society becomes a misleading concept when we attempt to explain everything in terms of it.

Economic analysis can easily be misused. Man’s labor is sometimes discussed as nothing more than an impersonal commodity on an impersonal market. The producers of human labor then are formally reduced to nothing more than suppliers of a useful commodity. Man is treated as if he were nothing more than a commodity. But what we find in free market societies is that such attitudes on the part of employers (renters of human labor services) lead to reduced profits. Workers resent being treated as machines or as beasts of burden. They respond to such treatment by reducing their output, sometimes in subtle ways that cannot be easily monitored by their supervisors. Thus, on a free market, economic reductionism is self-penalizing for employers. Those who treat workers better, acknowledging the cosmic personalism of all existence, are more likely to bring forth positive, productive efforts from those who are employed by them. The false assumption of impersonalism therefore pays a price. Those who indulge themselves in the fantasy of economic reductionism and impersonalism pay for the privilege.¹⁴ Reductionism is not a zero-price intellectual resource.

2. The Commodity Factor

At the same time, those who categorically assail the idea that the laborer is in part a commodity, or that man's labor power is in part a commodity, have abandoned both the Bible and economic analysis. Obviously, if a man can exchange his labor services for scarce economic resources, then the person who purchases his labor services must regard these labor services as scarce economic resources. In short, the buyer regards labor services as commodities. Why else would the buyer (employer) give up scarce economic resources (wages) in order to obtain labor services?

Let us take the next step. Why would someone purchase an indentured servant? Why would he forfeit the ownership of present scarce economic resources in order to buy the future services of a person? The answer is obvious: he expects to gain from the transaction. Buyer and seller agree on a present price that they both believe is approximately equal to the discounted (by the relevant interest rate) value of that expected future stream of income, in the form of labor services.¹⁵ The buyer buys the future services of the man by using the same process of economic estimation that he uses when buying the services of any tool of production. To get those future economic services from a machine, he must take delivery of the machine that supplies him with the services. Because indentured servitude is rare today, buyers normally rent the services of laborers for a day, a week, or a month at a time.¹⁶ But under a system of indentured servitude, these labor services

14. A good book on the positive effects of managers treating workers as human beings is R. C. Sproul's Stronger than Steel: The Wayne Alderson Story (New York: Harper & Row, 1980). Alderson took a faltering steel fabrication company that was 24 hours away from bankruptcy and made it one of the top ten in terms of efficiency, in less than two years, and without an infusion of new financial capital, simply by setting up daily prayer meetings open to all employees, and by requiring managers and foremen to show at least some minimal concern about the lives of the workers. He called forth the latent reserves of productivity from previously disgruntled, resentful workers.

15. Technically speaking, the exchange takes place because the present value of the expected future stream of labor services from the servant (minus the costs of maintaining the servant) is more valuable, in the eyes of the purchaser, than the expected future income stream of the asset he gives up in the exchange. The buyer and the seller capitalize the expected future value of the servant.

16. One of the few exceptions to this rule in the United States is the purchase of a are legally capitalized at the time of purchase, and the buyer takes delivery of the person who is to supply them.

Slaves and indentured servants command a sale price. Why? Because their expected labor services are valuable. These services can be capitalized. The purchaser calculates the present market value of this expected stream of income in exactly the same way that he capitalizes the expected future income stream of any commodity. The same rate of interest establishes the discount of the future services of man, land, and machine, and to the same degree. The buyer estimates the proper purchase price of all forms of capital by means of the same statistical techniques.¹⁷ To this extent, the transaction appears to be impersonal, “treating men like machines.” But if we look closer, we find that all such transactions are ultimately personal. The wise (profit-seeking) slave-buyer calculates the expected future services of the slave in terms of how well he will treat the slave. He does the same when he estimates the value of a piece of farmland. He even makes such calculations regarding machinery. We speak of “babying” a tool when we really mean treating it with care by lubricating it, servicing it, and recognizing its limits in service. The rate of interest is itself an impersonal number that is the product of all the highly personal time-preferences (discounts for future goods and services) of the many economic decision-makers in the society. Ultimately, there can be no impersonalism in a universe created and providentially sustained by God.¹⁸

The very fact that bondservants command a price, and owners make rational economic decisions about how much to pay for bondservants, testifies to the reality of the commodity aspect of human labor. The existence of a market for bondservants indicates that men’s labor services can be treated as commodities. In short, expected future labor services can be capitalized—converted into capital goods that can be bought and sold in the present. This is the definition of every professional athlete’s future services. The best amateur athletes usually receive large bonuses in advance when they sign their professional contracts, as well as receiving a guaranteed wage for a specified period of time. They can legally quit the team and forfeit the agreed-upon wage income, but they are legally prohibited from offering their services to a rival team within the same sports league. The bonus capitalizes a portion of their future productivity.

17. If the tax laws recognized indentured servitude, bondservants would probably be depreciated the way a machine or any other depreciating asset would be. The United States tax code allows animals and fruit-bearing trees to be depreciated in this fashion.

18. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

economic commodity: a producer of expected future income that can be priced—bought and sold—today. Present goods (the price) are exchanged for expected future services (income).

If a buyer expects a plot of land to produce a net income of one ounce of gold per year indefinitely, and he also expects a married pair of slaves to produce a net income of one ounce of gold per year, including the value of their children over an indefinite period, then he will pay the same price for the plot of land that he will pay for the slaves, other things being equal. The same estimating process governs both transactions, as does the same rate of interest. Both the land and the slaves are capitalized. Their expected future net incomes, when discounted by the prevailing rate of interest, produce the same sales price.

3. The Image of God

The Bible sets forth laws that regulate indentured servitude. This is another example of God's recognition of the image of God in man. It is immoral to treat men as if they were nothing more than beasts or burden. He allowed the Israelites to suffer under the crushing burden of slavery in Egypt in order to demonstrate to them the way in which rebellious men who worship other gods—demonic spirits—view their servants: as beasts to be sacrificed, as nothing more than commodities. The Egyptian Pharaohs who enslaved them were reductionists. They viewed the Israelite males only as beasts of burden or as potential future military enemies (Ex. 1:10). The Pharaoh was willing to kill all of Israel's male infants (Ex. 1:16), just as he might have slaughtered animals. He refused to acknowledge that there are God-ordained limits placed on bondservant-owners. God warns men not to make such an assumption. Men are more than beasts or machines. The commodity factor in human labor is only one aspect of man. A slave is more than the commodity that Aristotle described as "property with a soul."¹⁹

Nevertheless, the commodity factor is unquestionably one factor. Because the expected income stream produced by human labor can be capitalized according to the rules governing all other expected income streams, there is a potential market for permanent slaves and indentured servants. The Old Testament legitimized a system of private ownership of the human means of production. It has been only during the last two centuries that this outlook has become unacceptable.

19. I am using M. I. Finley's translation of Politics 1253b: Finley, Ancient Slavery and Modern Ideology (New York: Viking, 1980), p. 73. Sir Ernest Barker's translation is less graphic: "an animate article of property." The Politics of Aristotle (New York: Oxford University Press, [1946] 1960), pp. 9–10.

E. The Command to Labor

The second principle of the biblical covenant is "hierarchy."²⁰ The dominion covenant reflects this general covenantal principle: (1) God is over man, (2) man is over his wife, (3) parents are over children, and (4) mankind is over nature. To exercise effective, long-term dominion over nature, men must become subordinate under God.²¹

Modern democratic theory has steadily begun to reject all four points of this hierarchical worldview. First, God is seen as mythical, or at best a distant, powerless uncle. He does not intervene in human history. He does not "take sides" in mankind's disputes (at least not since World War II). Second, marriage is not seen as hierarchical; divorce has been legitimized legislatively for "unreconcilable differences," and the women's liberation movement has asserted equality between the marriage partners. Third, parents are understood as unreliable supervisors generally; a state-operated school system is to be substituted for parental authority. There is also a growing "children's rights" movement, which promotes a program that includes such provisions as self-determination for children, the right to leave home, the right to all information available to adults, the right of self-education, the right of freedom from physical punishment, the right to sexual freedom, and the right to vote and hold political office.²² We should recall Isaiah's words: "And I will give children to be their princes, and babes shall rule over them" (Isa. 3:4). Finally, the more radical of the ecology

20. Ray Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstypm>)

21. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, chaps. 8, 9. Humanist theologian John C. Raines wrote of Calvin: "Calvin understood the Christian life not as 'a vessel filled with God' but as an active 'tool and instrument' of the Divine initiative. But this is precisely our point. Active toward the world, the Christian knows himself as utterly passive and obedient toward God, whose Will it is his sole task to discover and obey." Raines, "From Passive to Active Man: Reflections on the Revolution in Consciousness in Modern Man," in Raines and Thomas Dean (eds.), Marxism and Radical Religion: Essays Toward a Revolutionary Humanism (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1970), p. 114.

22. Richard Farson, Birthrights (New York: Macmillan, 1974); cited by John Whitehead, Parents' Rights (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1985), pp. 24–25. This movement began to be noticed in the mid-1970s: "Drive for Rights of Children," U.S. News and World Report (Aug. 15, 1974).

movement's advocates have denied that men are over nature.²³ They have even argued that the idea of man over nature is a terrible legacy of Christianity, and that it has led to mass pollution.²⁴

1. Unfaithful Servants and Indentured Servitude

Some people are unfaithful servants. They seek to escape the moral and institutional obligations of God's dominion covenant. One of the ways historically that God has put men visibly under the terms of His dominion covenant is through indentured servitude. Some ethical rebels can be made more effective laborers in God's kingdom through indentured servitude. Indentured servitude is an earthly manifestation of the authority-hierarchy relationship. The New Testament reconfirms the Old Testament view of marriage as a covenantal yoke,²⁵ and it reminds men that this yoke is analogous to the relationship of Christ to His church (Eph. 5:21–28). We must become servants of God in order to avoid remaining slaves to Satan.

Human slavery in history testifies to the reality of sin, as well as to the need of some rebels and some weak people for institutional subordination. Private property in slaves therefore testifies to the need for men to learn submission to God, who is the personal Sovereign who owns the universe.²⁶ This thought is repulsive to the modern democratic faith. Modern democratic theory rejects the idea that private property in the form of indentured servants can deal effectively with such issues as depravity, rebellion, laziness, and crime. Democratic theorists refuse to acknowledge the legitimacy of indentured servitude

23. This view of the "autonomous" environment became part of the U.S. Park Service's policies regarding forest fires. Unless a fire was started by a camper or an arsonist, it was left alone to burn itself out "naturally." In the drought-ridden summer of 1988, a series of lightning-induced fires began in Yellowstone National Park. They spread, as the saying goes, like wildfire. By the time winter snows began to fall, these fires had burned about 800,000 acres of land in three states. The President of the United States later admitted that he had not known about this "let it burn" policy. Public outrage forced the government officially to reverse this policy on forest fires. For a highly critical analysis of the National Park Service in general, written before this fire, see Alston Chase, Playing God in Yellowstone: The Destruction of America's First National Park (New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 1986).

24. The key document is Lynn White, Jr., "The Historical Roots of Our Ecological Crisis," Science (10 March 1967). (<http://bit.ly/WhiteRoots>) For a critique of White's thesis, see R. V. Young, Jr., "Christianity and Ecology," National Review (Dec. 20, 1974). For my analysis, see Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 4:A.

25. Chapter 27.

26. Gary DeMar, Ruler of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for Government (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gdmruler>) as a God-ordained private hierarchy that promotes the fulfillment of the dominion covenant. They attack private slavery as the greatest of all evils in history. Then they pass laws that make people slaves to the state. They do not reject the hierarchical structure of slavery; they merely substitute the state for the private slave-owner, and then they rename this relationship with a term more acceptable politically, such as “public welfare” which is to be paid for by “progressive taxation.” They raise taxes above 40% of a family’s income, and they call this “paying your fair share.” Ancient Egypt, which under Joseph suffered from a 20% income tax rate, is called “oriental despotism.”²⁷ Contemporary taxation at twice or three times this level is called progressive democratic fiscal policy.

2. Two Kinds of Ancient Slavery

Democratic theorists make no ethical distinction between the Hebrews’ slave status in ancient Egypt and the enslavement of heathens in ancient Israel. All private chattel slavery is dismissed as evil. “Slavery is an example of an institutionalized evil,” wrote liberation theologian Ronald Sider.²⁸ The Bible, however, does distinguish sharply between permanent slavery that was regulated by God’s law and slavery that was antinomian—unregulated by God’s law. This is why Paul was quite ready to have the escaped slave Onesimus return to the Christian household of Philemon (Phm. 10–12).

Men must serve one of two masters (Matt. 6:24).²⁹ Each supernatural master has used slavery as part of his particular program of kingdom development. We are either under God’s yoke or Satan’s (Matt. 11:29–30). Christ’s yoke is freedom; Satan’s is bondage (Gal. 5:1). The ethical question of slavery—which form is righteous and which form is evil—must be answered by an appeal to biblical law. A retroactive condemnation of all ancient slavery is biblically illegitimate; it reflects the critics’ ethical submission to Satan. When the Bible affirms the legitimacy of any institution, even if only for a millennium or two, then it is sin to call that institution universally evil, without qualification or respect to time. Such an accusation is analogous to calling God

27. Karl Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism: A Comparative Study of Total Power (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1957).

28. Ronald J. Sider, “Words and Deeds,” Journal of Theology for Southern Africa (Dec. 1979), p.38.

29. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

evil. Theologians and social philosophers who call God evil are dancing at the edge of permanent slavery in the lake of fire.

Why would God authorize indentured servitude? Because rebels sometimes seek to escape the requirements of the dominion covenant. They may work in ways prohibited by God. God therefore has placed some men under indentured servitude as a means of evangelism, and also as a means of extracting from them the service due to Him. Men who would otherwise perish are also placed under the care of a godly household. The most famous example in the Bible of this is the case of the Gibeonites, who tricked Joshua into taking them as permanent slaves—hewers of wood and drawers of water (Josh.9:27)—rather than perish at his hand or be forced out of the land of Canaan. Their servitude was voluntary. This was not true of the kidnapped Africans who were brought to North America.³⁰

Conclusion

Men can legitimately be evaluated as commodities, meaning as scarce economic resources that are still in demand at a price above zero. A man whose services are not in demand at zero price—a man who is not a producer of the commodity of labor—is in sorry shape unless he has a great deal of income-producing capital.

The Bible's slave laws confirm this obvious economic truth. So valuable is "man, the commodity," that specific rules that limit the exploitation of this commodity by other men have been established by God. The key limitation is the six-year maximum period of indentured servitude (Deut. 15:12). This limitation keeps down the price of the human commodity by restricting the period of time in which his services can be lawfully capitalized by an owner. Even in the case of lifetime slavery, Old Testament law restricted slave-owners in their dealings with slaves. It is not true, as M. I. Finley asserted, that "The failure of any individual slaveowner to exercise all his rights over his slave-property was always a unilateral act on his part, never binding, always revocable."³¹ In Greece and Rome, perhaps; not in ancient Israel. God, then as now, always warned those under the terms of His covenant that those in authority over men are also under the authority of other men, and that all men are under God and His law.

The Bible uses the economic self-interest of the owner to supplement the self-government and therefore the self-restraint that owners are expected to demonstrate to those under their authority. The bond-servant is a valuable commodity. God tells bondservant-owners, "Handle with care, for these people are made in My image!" If they refuse to listen to God, then perhaps they will listen to the market. If they refuse to listen either to God or to the market, then the civil government must step in and enforce the law of God regarding indentured servitude. If the civil government refuses to obey God in this way, then God imposes other forms of negative sanctions: war, pestilence, or famine. There is no better example of this inescapable covenantal process in New Covenant history than the history of slavery in the American South.

30. Appendix K.

31. Finley, Ancient Slavery and Modern Ideology, p. 74.

Modern democratic theory has denied the legitimacy of biblical indentured servitude, but it has substituted a new form of slavery, which is in fact a very ancient form of slavery: slavery to the state. The state is a slave-owner that wants no private competition. It wants people placed in permanent bondage to the state. It establishes what sociologist Max Weber described as the bureaucratic cage.³² It calls this system democratic freedom.

32. Gary North, "Max Weber: Rationalism, Irrationalism, and the Bureaucratic Cage," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976).

CRIMINAL LAW AND RESTORATION

If men strive, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart from her, and yet no mischief follow: he shall be surely punished, according as the woman's husband will lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine. And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe (Ex.21:22–25).

The theocentric principle here is that man is made in God's image and therefore must be protected by civil law. The husband of the victimized woman represents God the Judge to the convicted criminal. The state is required to impose sanctions specified by the husband. The violent person who has imposed on the woman and the child the risk of injury or death must compensate the family. The judges do retain some degree of authority in specifying the appropriate sanction. The criminal must pay "as the judges determine." In the absence of actual physical harm, there is no rigorous or direct way to assess the value of this risk of injury or death, so the state does not allow the husband to be unreasonable in imposing sanctions.

Where physical damage can be determined objectively, the criminal must pay on an "eye for eye" basis. This is the judicial principle known as the lex talionis. The punishment must fit the magnitude of the violation; the violation is assessed in terms of the damages inflicted.

A. Controversy Over Abortion

Exodus 21:22–25 has recently become one of the most controversial passages in the Old Testament. Prior to the 1960's, when the abortion issue again began to be debated publicly in the United States after half a century of relative silence,¹ only the second half of this passage was controversial in Christian circles: the judicial requirement of “an eye for an eye.” The abortion aspect of the argument was not controversial, for the practice of abortion was illegal and publicly invisible. A physician who performed an abortion could be sent to jail, though not for murder, which abortion is. It was clearly understood by Christians that anyone who caused a premature birth in which the baby died or was injured had committed a criminal act, despite the fact that the person did not plan to cause the infant’s injury or death. The abortion described in the text is the result of a man’s battle with another man, an illegitimate form of private vengeance for which each man is made fully responsible should injury ensue, either to each other (Ex.21:18–19)² or to innocent bystanders. If this sort of “accidental” abortion is treated as a criminal act, how much more a deliberate abortion by a physician or other murderer! Only when pagan intellectuals in the general culture came out in favor of abortion on demand did pro-abortionists within the church begin to deny the relevancy of the introductory section of the passage.

1. Marvin Olasky, The Press and Abortion, 1838–1988 (Hillsdale, New Jersey:

This anti-abortion attitude among Christians began to change with the escalation of the humanists’ pro-abortion rhetoric in the early 1960s. Christian intellectuals have always taken their ideological cues from the humanist intellectuals who have established the prevailing “climate of opinion,” from the early church’s acceptance of the categories of pagan Greek philosophy to the modern church’s acceptance of tax-funded, “religiously neutral” education. As the humanists’ opinions regarding the legitimacy of abortion began to change in the early 1960s,³ so did the opinions of the Christian intellectual community. Speaking for the dispensationalist world of social thought, dispensationalist author Tommy Ice forthrightly admitted in a 1988 debate: “Premillennialists have always been involved in the present world. And basically, they have picked up on the ethical positions of their contemporaries.”⁴ (He defended this practice, it should be noted.) The shift in Christian opinion regarding the illegitimacy of abortion took place Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 1988), ch. 6. This book shows that in the late nineteenth century, the battle over abortion, as revealed in the press, was widespread.

2. Chapter 35.

3. Ibid., chaps. 10, 11.

4. Cited in Gary DeMar, The Debate Over Christian Reconstruction (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988), p. 185. (<http://bit.ly/DebateCR>). The debate was Dave Hunt and Tommy Ice vs. Gary North and Gary DeMar. A pair of audio cassette tapes or a videotape of this April 14, 1988 debate are available from American Vision, Powder Springs, Georgia.

throughout the 1960s and early 1970s.

The moral schizophrenia of contemporary pietism can be seen when anti-abortion picketers confront killer physicians at their offices with some variation of “Smile! God loves you” or “God hates abortion but loves abortionists.” On the contrary, God hates abortionists, and He demands that the civil government execute them. Where are Christian protesters who pray the imprecatory psalms, such as Psalm 83? Where are they calling publicly on God to bring judgment against abortionists and their political allies?⁵ Only when Christian anti-abortionists at last openly and enthusiastically admit that the Bible demands public execution for all convicted abortionists, and also for the women who pay for them, will they at last be proclaiming the Bible’s judicial requirements.

The fact that they draw back from proclaiming this testifies to the appalling lack of biblical thinking that prevails in contemporary Christianity. The vast majority of Christians hate God’s Bible-revealed law far more than they hate either abortion or abortionists. They would far rather live in a political world that is controlled by humanists who have legalized abortion than in a society governed by Christians in terms of biblical law. So, God has answered the desire of their hearts. He has done to modern Christians what He did to the Israelites in the wilderness: “And he gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul” (Ps. 106:15).

B. The Legalized Slaughter of the Innocents

I do not intend to deal in detail with the question of abortion in this context.⁶ There is no doubt that Exodus 21:22–25 does apply to abortion.⁷ The legal issue is clear: victim’s rights. In all cases of public

5. Gary North, When Justice Is Aborted: Biblical Standards for Non-Violent Resistance (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1989), pp. 88–94. (<http://bit.ly/gnjustice>)

6. J. J. Finkelstein pointed out that some variation of this law—the jostled woman who aborts her infant—is found in many of the ancient law sources. Finkelstein, The Ox That Gored (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1981), p. 19n. It is treated at length in Hammurabi’s laws (209–14), Hittite laws (17–18), and Middle Assyrian laws (21): Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), Part II, Legal Texts. Finkelstein argued that the text is probably a literary device rather than legal, since the likelihood of an abortion occurring in this way is minimal. What he did not consider is that as a case law, it was intended to be a minimal application example: if, in this biologically unlikely situation, the one causing harm is fully liable, how much more the liability of an actual abortionist.

7. R. J. Rushdoony, The Myth of Over-Population (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, evil that the Bible prohibits, there must be judicial representatives of God: the victims are the primary representatives, and the various covenant officials are secondary representatives. When the victims cannot defend their interests, then the covenantal officers become the legal representatives of the victims.⁸ The potential victims in this case are the unborn infants whose lives are sacrificed on the altar of convenience. Because they are incapable of speaking on their own behalf, God empowers their fathers to speak for them, or in cases where a father remains silent, God empowers the civil government to speak for them: first to prohibit abortion, and second to impose the death penalty on all those who are involved with abortion, either as murderers (mothers) or as their paid accomplices (physicians, nurses, office receptionists, and so forth).

Exonerating mothers who pay to have abortions is the same as retroactively exonerating slave buyers who bought recently kidnapped Africans from slave traders. The buyers liked to think of the slave traders as beneath them both morally and socially. In fact, the slave buyers were far more morally corrupt. They made the slave trade profitable. The traders were merely hired servants of the buyers. Bringing it closer to home, it would be comparable to arresting pimps and prostitutes, but letting the Johns off the hook. If the police put the buyers in jail alongside the pimps and hookers, there would be howls of protest, but the demand for prostitutes would decline.⁹

1. Christian Academic Spokesmen for Legalized Abortion

All this is conveniently ignored by Christian abortionists and their academically respectable spokesmen.¹⁰ Examples of pro-abortionists, especially physicians, in evangelical churches can be found in a book put out in 1969 by the Christian Medical Society, Birth Control and the Christian: A Protestant Symposium on the Control of Human Reproduction, edited by Walter O. S. Pitzer and Carlyle L. Saylor.¹¹ Bruce K. Waltke, then a Dallas Theological Seminary professor, and briefly a professor at Westminster Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, explicitly stated in that book that Exodus 21:22 teaches that “the fetus is not 1969), Appendix 3.

8. North, When Justice Is Aborted, ch. 2.

9. Legislators will resist this suggestion, who as customers, do not want to risk having pimps and prostitutes testify against them in order to get reduced sentences.

10. Ibid., Appendix A.

11. Wheaton, Illinois:Tyndale House, 1969.

reckoned as a soul.”¹² (He subsequently reversed his pro-abortion stance.) Dr. M. O. Vincent, psychiatrist, reported that the symposium moved him to conclude that “the foetus has great and developing value, but is less than a human being. It will be sacrificed only for weighty reasons.”¹³ Predictably, he refused to spell out in detail what these weighty reasons are. Dr. William B. Kiesewetter, before leading the reader to his conclusion that a Christian physician friend was doing the right thing when he “terminated the pregnancy” (never seen as terminating the baby) of a missionary’s wife, warned against “Rigid, authoritarian evangelicals [who] so often extract from the Word of God precepts which they then congeal into a legalism by which everyone is admonished to live.”¹⁴ (His main problem is not with rigid, authoritarian evangelicals. His main problem is with the rigid, authoritarian God who commanded Moses to write Exodus 21:22–25. This is the main problem faced by all spokesmen who blithely deny the continuing judicial authority of God’s Bible-revealed law, and who then proceed to recommend the violation of God’s law whenever convenient.)

In short, it is supposedly not necessarily immoral to take money for performing an abortion, provided that you are licensed by the medical profession to do so. These self-deluded physicians would bring a non-physician to court for practicing an abortion—an infringement on their state-licensed monopoly—but not a licensed colleague. Such was the state of late twentieth-century medical ethics, including the ethics of self-professed Christians.

A book by D. Gareth Jones, Professor of Anatomy at the University of New Zealand, Brave New People: Ethical Issues at the Commencement of Life (1984), created a national Christian protest in the United States against its neo-evangelical publisher, Inter-Varsity Press. The book promoted a view of the “foetus” that would allow abortion in uncertain, undefined cases. Franky Schaeffer, the son of Francis Schaeffer (Whatever Happened to the Human Race?), mounted a protest in 1984 which led to the resignation of the editor of IVP and the scrapping of the book. Eerdmans republished it the next year. It is still published by IVP in Britain.¹⁵

12. Ibid., p. 11.

13. Ibid., p. 213.

14. Ibid., p. 561.

15. For a critique of this book, see Appendix B:E.

2. A Question of “Barbaric” Sanctions

Christian scholars generally choose to ignore Exodus 21:22–25, and then they spend their time defending mass murder in the name of biblical ethics and “compassion”—compassion for murderous women and their well-paid, state-licensed accomplices. Meanwhile, these critics of biblical law are busy challenging any defenders of the law with criticisms along these lines: “You would reimpose the barbaric principle of poking out a man’s eye or cutting off his hand. This is nothing but vengeance, a return to savagery. What possible good would it do the victim to see the assailant suffer physical damage identical to his own? Why not impose some sort of economic restitution to the victim? To inflict permanent injury on the assailant is to reduce his productivity and therefore the wealth of the community. By returning to Old Testament law, you are returning to the tribal laws of a primitive people.”¹⁶ This line of criticism incorrectly assumes that the lex talionis principle was not in fact designed by God to encourage economic restitution to the victim from the criminal. Chapter 38 demonstrates that lex talionis promotes economic restitution.

Nevertheless, the question remains: Which is truly “barbaric,” mass murder through legalized abortion or the required judicial sanctions revealed in biblical law? The Christian antinomians of our day—that is to say, virtually all Christians—have voted for the barbaric character of biblical law. They are faced with a choice: Minimal sanctions against abortion or the civil enforcement of biblical law? Their answer is automatic. They shout to their elected civil magistrates, “Give us Barabbas!” Better to suffer politically the silent screams of murdered babies, they conclude, than to suffer the theocratic embarrassment of calling for the public execution of convicted abortionists.¹⁷

16. Henry Schaeffer wrote a book called The Social Legislation of the Primitive Semites (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1915). The title is revealing. He did not comment on the “eye for eye” passages.

17. We must not miss the point: the inevitable issue here is theocracy. When a Christian calls for the execution of the convicted abortionist, he is necessarily calling for the enforcement of God’s revealed law by the civil magistrate. This fear of being labeled a theocrat is why James Dobson chose to weaken his response to a pro-abortion physician by not dealing forthrightly with Exodus 21:22–25: “Do you agree that if a man beats his slave to death, he is to be considered guilty only if the individual dies instantly? If the slave lives a few days, the owner is considered not guilty (Exodus 21:20–21)[?] Do you believe that we should stone to death rebellious children (Deuteronomy 21:18–21)? Do you really believe we can draw subtle meaning about complex issues from Mosaic law, when even the obvious interpretation makes no sense to us today? We can hardly select what we will and will not apply now. If we accept the

The babies who are targeted for destruction have only a confused, inconsistent, waffling, squabbling, rag-tag army of Christians to speak for them authoritatively in God's name inside the corridors of political and judicial power. Their defenders are agreed: "Abortion is the lesser of two evils, if the alternative is theocracy."¹⁸

In stark contrast is the tiny handful of Christians¹⁹ who confidently believe in the whole Bible, including Exodus 21:22–25, and who have therefore confidently voted against abortion as the true barbarism and for biblical law as the sole long-term foundation of Christian civilization. But most Christians have self-consciously suppressed any temptation to think about this dilemma, one way or the other. The thin picket lines in front of abortion clinics testify to the thoughtlessness of Christians in our day. (So do the thin shelves of the Christian bookstores.)²⁰

C. Restitution and Vengeance

The "eye for an eye" principle is known by the Latin phrase, lex talionis, or "law of retaliation." The English word, "retaliate," is derived from the same Roman root as "talionis." Today, "retaliate" means to inflict injury, but earlier English usage conveyed a broader meaning: to pay back or return in kind, including good will.²¹ According to one source, the lex talionis was a Roman law that specified that anyone verses you cited, we are obligated to deal with every last jot and tittle." Dobson, "Dialogue on Abortion," in James Dobson and Gary Bergel, The Decision of Life (Arcadia, California: Focus on the Family, 1986), p. 14. I handed him a copy of Tools of Dominion in 1990, and said the book provided the answer to his question. He has yet to respond after 20 years. He knows where I am and who I am. I once raised $50,000 for his ministry in two minutes at a meeting. He remains the single most influential Protestant fundamentalist social commentator in the United States. For him to remain silent for two decades is revealing.

18. Christian anti-abortionists will attempt to find a third choice. It may be natural law. It may be emotion. It may be the will of the people. It may be to some less familiar version of common-ground philosophy, meaning baptized humanism. What it will not be is an appeal to the whole Bible as the sole authoritative will of God.

19. Christian Reconstructionists or theonomists.

20. James Jordan's book, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), was removed from the shelves of a local Christian bookstore in Tyler when the store's owner discovered that Jordan had called for the execution of the aborting physician and the mother. The owner dared not take the heat for selling a book which announced: "Until the anti-abortion movement in America is willing to return to God's law and advocate the death penalty for abortion, God will not bless the movement. God does not bless those who despise His law, just because pictures of salted infants make them sick" (p. 115).

21. See the Oxford English Dictionary: "retaliate."

who brought an accusation against another citizen but could not prove his case in the courts would suffer the same penalty that he had sought to inflict on the defendant.²² (This was a perverted version of the biblical principle of the law governing deliberate perjury, found in Deuteronomy 19:16–21, which concludes with a restatement of the “eye for eye” requirement in verse 21.²³ The law reads: “Then shall ye do unto him [the false witness], as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you” [v.19].²⁴ Only if the innocent person could prove perjury on the part of his accuser could he demand that the civil government impose on the latter the penalty that would have been imposed on him.²⁵)

Not every Bible commentator has seen the “eye for eye” sanction as primitive. Shalom Paul wrote: “Rather than being a primitive residuum, it restricts retaliation to the person of the offender, while at the same time limiting it to the exact measure of the injury—thereby according equal justice to all.”²⁶ W.F. Albright, the archeologist who specialized in Hebrew and Palestinian studies, wrote: “This principle may seem and is often said to be extraordinarily primitive. But it is actually not in the least primitive. Whereas the beginnings of lex talionis are found before Israel, the principle was now extended by analogy until it dominated all punishment of injuries or homicides. In ordinary Ancient Oriental jurisprudence, men who belonged to the higher social categories or who were wealthy simply paid fines, otherwise escaping punishment. . . So the lex talionis (is). . . the principle of equal justice for all!”²⁷ Albright understood some of the implications of the passage for the principle of equal justice for all, meaning equality before the law. Nevertheless, the myth of “primitive” legislation still clings in people’s

22. Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, ed. John McClintock and James Strong (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), vol. X, p. 165: “Talionis, Lex.”

23. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

24. The same rule applied in Hammurabi’s Code: “If a seignior came forward with false testimony in a case, and has not proved the word which he spoke, if that case was a case involving life, that seignior shall be put to death. If he came forward with (false) testimony concerning grain or money, he shall bear the penalty of that case.” CH, paragraphs 3–4: Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 166.

25. A moral judicial system would impose on the accuser or his insurance company all court costs, plus the costs incurred by the defendant in defending himself.

26. Shalom Paul, Studies in the Book of the Covenant in the Light of Cuneiform and Biblical Law (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1970), p. 40.

27. W. F. Albright, History, Archeology, and Christian Humanism (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1964), p. 74; cited in ibid., p. 77.

minds.²⁸ It seems to some Christians to be a needlessly bloody law. In a reaction against the rigor of this judicial principle, liberal scholar Hans Jochen Boecker went so far as to argue that Old Testament law was not actually governed by lex talionis,²⁹ that it only appears in three instances, and that it is a holdover of early nomadic law.³⁰

1. “Vengeance Is Mine”

Vengeance in the Bible is God’s original responsibility. “To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence; their foot shall slide in due time: for the day of their calamity is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste” (Deut.32:35). “If I whet my glittering sword, and mine hand take hold on judgment; I will render vengeance to mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh. . .” (Deut. 32:41–42a). All nations are required to rejoice because of God’s willingness and ability to avenge His people: “Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people: for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful unto his land, and to his people” (Deut.32:43). These passages, and many others in the Old Testament, are the foundation of Paul’s summary statement: “Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord” (Rom.12:19b). “For we know him that hath said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, The Lord shall judge his people” (Heb. 10:30).

God makes it clear that He sometimes intervenes personally in history and brings bloody vengeance on His enemies. The state, under limited and Bible-defined circumstances, possesses an analogous authority. It is therefore highly inaccurate to say that the authority to impose vengeance in history is exclusively God’s prerogative. God has delegated to the civil government its limited and derived sovereignty to impose physical vengeance. The state is allowed, by the testimony of witnesses, to impose the death penalty and other physical punishments. *Perfect justice must wait until the day of judgment; so must perfect vengeance.*³¹ But men do not have to wait until the end of time in order to see preliminary justice done, and therefore preliminary vengeance imposed.

28. Hammurabi’s “code” had similar rules: “If a seignior has destroyed the eye of a member of the aristocracy, they shall destroy his eye. If he has broken another seignior’s bone, they shall break his bone.” CH, paragraphs 196–97. If an aristocrat destroyed the eye of a commoner, however, the lex talionis did not apply: he paid one mina of silver (CH 198). Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 175.

29. Hans Jochen Boecker, Law and the Administration of Justice in the Old Testament and Ancient East, trans. Jeremy Moiser (Minneapolis, Minnesota: Augsburg, [1976] 1980), pp. 171–72.

30. Ibid., pp. 174–75.

Vengeance is a form of restitution. "Vengeance is mine; I will re-pay." This repayment is in the form of punishment and even permanent judgment. God pays back what is owed to the sinner. It is repayment in kind, an original meaning of "retaliate." Capital crimes require the public execution of the guilty person. In the case of crimes less repugnant to God than capital crimes, economic restitution is often paid by the criminal to the victim. But restitution is ultimately owed to God.³² The victim, as God's image bearer, deserves his restitution, just as God deserves His. When repayment in kind is not made, a sense of injustice prevails. The victim, or the family members who survive the victim, understand that a convicted criminal who is not forced to make restitution has evaded justice. Such an escape is seen as being unfair.

2. Fair Warning

God reminds His people that His ultimate justice cannot be evaded. This testimony of a final judgment is provided by the sanctions imposed by the authorities. Historical sanctions are designed by God to fit the crime in order to persuade men that the universe is ultimately fair, for both time and eternity are governed by the decree of God. God's people should not despair because some men escape the earnest (down payment) of the final justice that is coming. Psalm 73 is a reminder of the seeming injustice of life, and how the wicked are finally rewarded according to their deeds. "For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked" (Ps.73:3). David was beaten down by events (v.2), yet he saw all the good things that come to the wicked in life (vv.4–5, 12). He flayed himself with such thoughts, "Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places; thou castedst them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! They are utterly consumed with terrors" (vv.17–19). David finally admits: "So foolish was I, and ignorant: I was as a beast before

31. Chapter 19.

32. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 525–30.

thee" (v.22).³³

The relationship between covenantal faithfulness and external prosperity is clearly taught in the Bible (Deut. 28:1–14). So is the relationship between covenant-breaking and calamity (Deut. 28:15–68). This system of sanctions applies to the whole world, not just in Old Testament Israel. Deny this, and you have also denied the possibility of an explicitly and exclusively Christian social theory. Christians who deny the continuing relevance of Deuteronomy 28's sanctions in post-Calvary, pre-Second Coming history should be warned by David's admission that he had been foolish to doubt these relationships. The concept of slippery places is not often discussed, but it is very important. God sets people high in order to make them slide, visibly, before the world. God said to Pharaoh: "For now I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth. And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth" (Ex.9:15–16). The temporary prosperity of the wicked must not be viewed as evidence that would call into question the long-term relationship between covenant-breaking and destruction.

Vengeance is legitimate, but not as a private act. It is always to be covenantal, governed by God's institutional monopoly, civil government. James Fitzjames Stephen said it best: "The criminal law stands to the passion of revenge in much the same relation as marriage to the sexual appetite."³⁴ The private vendetta is always illegitimate; public vengeance is sometimes legitimate. There are many examples of private vengeance not sanctioned by God: gangster wars, clan feuds, the murder of those who testify against a criminal or syndicate, and murders for breaking the code of silence of a secret society. It is a crime against God Himself to take any oath that testifies to the right of any private organization or voluntary society to inflict physical violence, especially death, for breaking the oath or any other violation of the "code," even if this oath's invoked penalties are supposedly only "symbolic" rather than literal. I refer here to Masonic oaths,³⁵ but also

33. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 17.

34. James Fitzjames Stephen, A History of the Criminal Law in England (London: Macmillan, 1863), II, p. 80. Cited by Ernest van den Haag, Punishing Criminals: Concerning a Very Old and Painful Question (New York: Basic Books, 1975), p. 12.

35. That the Freemasons adopt a covenantal view of the self-maledictory oath is admitted in The Encyclopedia of Freemasonry, a standard Masonic publication. The to any other similar oath. For example, the oath of an Entered Apprentice of the Masonic order ends with these words: “. . . binding myself under no less penalty than that of having my throat cut from ear to ear, my tongue torn out by its roots and buried in the rough sands of the sea at low-water mark where the tide ebbs and flows twice in twenty-four hours, should I ever knowingly or willingly violate this my solemn oath and obligation as an Entered Apprentice Mason.”³⁶ Such an oath affirms the legitimacy of private institutional vengeance—vengeance applied by institutions that have not been assigned the state’s limited sovereignty to serve as God’s agency of vengeance. This sort of physical vengeance is prohibited by biblical law, but the Bible does not condemn all earthly vengeance. The state is an agency of God’s vengeance. So is the church, but the church may not lawfully impose physical vengeance, while the state can. Therefore, no church can legitimately invoke oaths or oath signs similar in form to secret society blood oaths. A church that does this has marked itself as a cult.

D. Limiting the State

The authority to impose vengeance is limited. This authority is too easily abused for God not to place Bible-revealed restraints on it. The officers of the civil government readily overstep their authority. The state has often been seen as divine because it possesses the ability to impose the death penalty and other punishments. What the Bible author of the section on “Oath” discussed the objections raised in the nineteenth century by the Roman Catholic Church and the Scottish seceders to Masonic oaths. He referred to the “sacred sanction” of an oath, and insists on the legitimacy of “the invocation of the Deity to witness” the oath. He cited Dr. Harris’ Masonic Discourses: “What the ignorant call ‘the oath,’ is simply an obligation, covenant, and promise, exacted previously to the divulging of the specialties of the Order, and our means of recognizing each other; . . .” Explaining away the accusation that these secret oaths are taken in religious ceremonies, the author says: “Oaths, in all countries and at all times, have been accompanied by peculiar rites, intended to increase the solemnity and reverence of the act. . . . In all solemn covenants the oath was accompanied by a sacrifice; . . .” He admitted that a Masonic oath may have sanctions attached, even a capital penalty. All oaths do, he insists. This is “an attestation of God to the truth of a declaration, as a witness and avenger; and hence every oath includes in itself, and as its very essence, the covenant of God’s wrath, the heaviest of all penalties, as the necessary consequence of its violation.” Albert G. Mackey, The Encyclopedia of Freemasonry and Its Kindred Sciences, 2 vols., rev. ed. (New York: Masonic History Co., 1925), II, pp. 522–23.

36. King Solomon and His Followers (New York: Allen Pub. Co., 1943); cited in E. M. Storms, Should a Christian Be a Mason? (Fletcher, North Carolina: New Puritan Library, 1980), p. 63.

presents as a limited, derived sovereignty, men have defined as an ultimate, original sovereignty. To combat this false interpretation, biblical law restrains the officers of the state by imposing strict limitations on their enforcement of law. God's law must be enforced, and this law establishes criteria of evidence and a standard of justice. This standard is "an eye for an eye." A popular slogan in the modern world promotes a parallel juridical principle: "The punishment should fit the crime."

1. The Punishment Should Fit the Crime

Why should the punishment fit the crime? What ethical principle leads Western people to believe that the Islamic judicial practice of cutting off a pickpocket's hand is too severe a punishment? After all, this will make future pickpocketing by the man far less likely. Why not cut off his other hand if he is caught and convicted again? People who have grown up in the West are repelled by the realization that such punishments have been imposed in the past, and are still imposed in Muslim societies.³⁷ Why this repulsion? Because they are convinced that the punishment exceeds the severity of the loss imposed on the victim by the thief.

The Bible teaches that the victim must have his goods restored two-fold (Ex.22:4, 7), four-fold (for stealing a sheep), or five-fold (for stealing an ox) (Ex.22:1).³⁸ The passage on restitution in Leviticus 6 indicates that if the thief turns himself in before the authorities identify him as the thief, he must restore the principal (6:4), and must also add a 20% payment—a double tithe—presumably because of the false oath (6:5). The restitution is equal to the value of the item stolen, and the penalty is one-fifth of this.³⁹

37. This is Islam's Shari'a law. It is officially the civil law in Mauritania, where such amputations are still imposed: Roger Sawyer, Slavery in the Twentieth Century (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1986), p. 15. Shari'a was reimposed in Sudan in 1988. Complained M. Ismail of Arlington, Virginia in a letter to the editor: "As a Sudanese, I feel that the previous legal code, which was an adoption of the British secular code, was a colonial yoke that disfigured our national independence." Washington Times (Oct. 3, 1988). Better to disfigure pickpockets than Sudan's national independence, Mr. Ismail was saying.

38. The seven-fold restitution of Proverbs 6:31 appears to be a symbolic statement regarding the comprehensive nature of restitution. The hungry thief who is destitute and who steals food must repay "all the substance of his house," meaning that what little he owns is forfeited when the normal two-fold restitution payment is imposed. A rich man who steals bread would not be made destitute by a two-fold payment. The poor thief has to pay to the limits of his wealth, despite his "extenuating circumstances," while the rich thief who steals for the love of evil-doing is barely touched financially. In short, the law plays no favorites. It does not respect persons. The perverse rich thief is not required to pay any greater percentage than the impoverished thief. The seven-fold vengeance of God against anyone who might persecute Cain is another example of the language of fullness (Gen. 4:15). It means full judgment. Christ's words in Matthew 18 also indicate fullness: "Then came Peter to him, and said, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? Till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until seven times: but, Until seventy times seven" (vv. 21–22).

The Bible does not teach that a convicted man's future productivity should be utterly destroyed by the judges, except in the case of capital crimes. The dominion covenant imposes a moral obligation on all men to labor to subdue the earth to the glory of God. A man whose body has been deliberately mutilated probably will become a less productive worker. He may find it difficult to earn enough wealth to repay his debt to the victim. By cutting off the pickpocket's hand, the state is saying that there is no effective regeneration in life, that God cannot restore to wholeness a sinner's soul and his calling. Because he is a convicted pickpocket, he must be assumed to be a perpetual thief by nature; therefore, the state must make his future labor in his illegal calling less efficient. His hand is not being cut off because his victim lost a hand; it is being cut off simply as an assertion of state power, and as a deterrent against crime.

Boecker correctly observed that "The intention of the talion was not, therefore, to inflict injury—as it might sound to us today—but to limit injury."⁴⁰ But then he got everything confused once again. He said that this law restrained the institution of blood revenge.⁴¹ He never bothered to apply this principle of restraint to the modern state. The Bible teaches that excessive penalties imposed by the state violate a fundamental principle of biblical obedience, both personal and civil: "Ye shall observe to do therefore as the LORD your God hath commanded you: ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left" (Deut. 5:32). Conclusion: neither is the state to cut off the pickpocket's right hand or his left.⁴²

"Seventy times seven" is hyperbolic language; seventy times "fullness" means totality. Such forgiveness is not to be forgiveness apart from biblical restitution, however; the principle of forgiveness is not to be used to subsidize evil: Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 463.

39. The King James translation reads: "he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto" (6:5). The New English Bible is clearer: "He shall make full restitution, adding one fifth to it." The New American Standard reads: "[H]e shall make restitution for it in full, and add to it one-fifth more." The restitution payment would appear to be the penalty payment equal to the item stolen.

40. Boecker, Law and the Administration of Justice, p. 174.

41. Ibid., pp. 174–75.

42. The Hammurabi Code specified death for any thief who had taken an oath that

2. The Punishment Should Benefit the Victim

Societies that are not governed by biblical law do not place the proper emphasis on the principle of economic restitution. The concern of the judicial system becomes punishment of the criminal rather than restitution to the victim. W. Cleon Skousen, a lawyer and former law enforcement official, described the prevailing situation: “Under modern law, fines are almost invariably paid to the city, county or federal government. If the victim wants any remedy he must sue for damages in a civil court. However, as everyone knows, by the time a criminal has paid his fines to the court, he is usually depleted of funds or consigned to prison where he is earning nothing and therefore could not pay damages even if his victim went to the expense of filing a suit and getting a judgment. As a result, modern justice penalizes the offender, but does virtually nothing for the victim.”⁴³ In later stages of the development of humanism, state officials begin to substitute the shibboleth of “rehabilitation” for punishment, although the form this “rehabilitation” takes makes the state’s officers even more arbitrary than before.

Biblical law restrains the arbitrariness of the state’s officers. If the punishment must fit the crime, then the judges do not have the authority to impose lighter judgments or heavier judgments on the criminal. The victim decides the penalty, not the judges.⁴⁴ The criminal is to be given sufficient freedom to repay the victim, even if he must be sold into indentured servitude for a specific period of time in order to raise sufficient funds to pay off the victim. As a servant, he learns the discipline of work, and perhaps sufficient skills to give him a new calling and a new life when his debt is paid. But the debt is always to a private party: to the victim originally, and the slave-owner secondarily. Where a specific victim is involved and can be identified, the debt is not owed as a fine to the state. It is owed to the victim. The man who causes a premature birth in which the baby is not harmed nevertheless pays a fine to the family because of the risk to which he subjected the pregnant woman and her child.

he had not stolen: CH, paragraphs 9–10. There was a 30-fold restitution for stealing animals belonging to the state: paragraph 8. Ancient Near Eastern Texts, p. 166.

43. W. Cleon Skousen, The Third Thousand Years (Salt Lake City, Utah:Bookcraft, 1964), p. 354. Skousen served in the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) for 16 years and also served as Chief of Police in Salt Lake City in 1956. He became Editorial Director of Law and Order in 1960, the leading professional law enforcement journal in the United States.

44. Chapter 33.

3. Fines Should Compensate Victims

This should not be understood as an argument against fines to the civil government for so-called “victimless crimes.” For example, a person is prohibited from driving a car at 70 miles an hour through a residential district or school zone. There are potential victims who deserve legal protection. The speeding driver is subjecting them to added risk of injury or death. Clearly, it is more dangerous statistically for children to attend a school located near an unfenced street on which drivers are travelling at 70 miles an hour rather than 25. The imposition of a fine helps to reduce the number of speeding drivers. Because they increase risks to families, drivers who exceed the speed limit can legitimately be fined, because the victims of this increased statistical risk cannot be specified. These fines should be imposed locally: to be used to indemnify future local victims of crimes that go unpunished.

The state is not to use fines to increase its operating budget or increase its control over the lives of innocent citizens. The state is to be supported by tax levies, so that no conflict of interest should occur between honest judgment and the desire to increase the state’s budget. The proper use of fines is the establishment of a restitution fund for victims of crimes whose perpetrators cannot be located or convicted, analogous to the Old Testament sacrifice of the heifer when a murderer could not be found (Deut.21:1–9). Such a fund is a valid use of the civil law. Even if law enforcement authorities are unable to locate and convict a criminal, the victim still deserves restitution, just as God deserved restitution for an unsolved murder in Israel in the form of a sacrificed heifer. A reasonable way of funding such a restitution program is to collect money from those who have been successfully convicted by law enforcement authorities.

E. Hayek’s Three Principles

Lex talionis binds the state. This so-called “primitive” principle keeps the state from becoming arbitrary in its imposition of penalties. Citizens can better predict in advance what the penalty will be for a specific crime. This is extremely important for maintaining a free society. The three legal foundations for a free society, Hayek argued, are known general rules, certainty of enforcement, and equality before the law. I argue that the principle of “eye for eye” preserves all three.

1. General Rules

First, with respect to general rules, Hayek wrote that these rules must distinguish private spheres of action from public spheres, which is crucial in maintaining freedom: “What distinguishes a free from an unfree society is that in the former each individual has a recognized private sphere clearly distinct from the public sphere, and the private individual cannot be ordered about but is expected to obey only the rules which are equally applicable to all. It used to be the boast of free men that, so long as they kept within the bounds of the known law, there was no need to ask anybody’s permission or to obey anybody’s orders. It is doubtful whether any of us can make this claim today.”⁴⁵ If men must ask permission before they act, society then becomes a top-down bureaucratic order, which is an appropriate structure only for the military and the police force (the “sword”).⁴⁶ The Bible specifies that the proper hierarchical structure in a biblical covenant is a bottom-up appeals court structure (Ex. 18).⁴⁷

Adam was allowed to do anything he wanted to do in the garden, with only one exception. He had to avoid touching or eating the forbidden fruit. He did not have to ask permission to do anything else. He was free to choose.⁴⁸ This biblical principle of legal freedom is to govern all our decisions.⁴⁹ This is stated clearly in Jesus’s parable of the laborers who all received the same wage. Those who had worked all day complained to the owner of the field. The owner responded: “Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny? Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this last, even as unto thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?” (Matt. 20:13–15).⁵⁰ Neither the owner nor the workers had to get permission in advance from some government agency. God leaves both sides free to choose the terms of

45. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), pp. 207–8.

46. Ludwig von Mises, Bureaucracy (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1944), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/MisesBur>)

47. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

48. Milton and Rose Friedman, Free to Choose: A Personal Statement (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1980).

49. Grace Hopper, who developed the computer language Cobol, and who served as an officer in the U.S. Navy until she was well into her seventies, offered this theory of leadership: “It’s easier to say you’re sorry than it is to ask permission.”

50. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 40.

labor and payment.

Because God alone is omniscient, He controls the world perfectly. Men, not being omniscient, must accept judicial restrictions on their own legitimate spheres of action. In doing so, they acknowledge their position as creatures under God. They must face the reality of their own limitations as creatures. They must not pretend that they can foresee the complex outcome of every activity of every person in society. The complexity of life is too great. Men can only make guesses about the consequences of human action. To bring the greatest quantity of accurate knowledge to bear on society at any point in time, men must be allowed great latitude in their personal decision-making. This division of intellectual labor is what provides society with the best available knowledge at a price people are willing to pay.⁵¹ If men pretend that a committee of experts can plan for an entire economy, they have denied God's exclusive omnipotence and omniscience. Hayek was correct: ". . . the demand for conscious control is therefore equivalent to the demand for control by a single mind."⁵² He went on to argue: "Indeed, any social processes which deserve to be called 'social' in distinction from the action of individuals are almost ex definitione not conscious. Insofar as such processes are capable of producing a useful order which could not have been produced by conscious direction, any attempt to make them subject to such direction would necessarily mean that we restrict what social activity can achieve to the inferior capacity of the individual mind."⁵³ Worse; in a socialist society, we restrict what social activity can achieve to what a responsibility-avoiding, government-protected committee can achieve.

By decentralizing decision-making within a system of known rules, and by allowing a competitive system of market-imposed rewards and punishments, society preserves individual freedom, individual and corporate productivity, and personal responsibility. This decentralized decision-making process is what is established by the profit management system.⁵⁴

The principle of "eye for eye" is easily understood. It allows people to evaluate in advance their potential liabilities for actions that inflict physical harm on others. This encourages personal responsibility. It

51. F. A. Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>)

52. F. A. Hayek, The Counter-Revolution in Science: Studies of the Abuse of Reason (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Press, [1952] 1979), p. 153.

53. Ibid., p. 154

54. Mises, Bureaucracy, ch. 1.

also encourages people to make accurate assessments of potential costs and benefits of their actions. This is the biblical principle of counting the cost (Luke 14:28–30).⁵⁵ It is basic to biblical liberty that individuals count the costs of their behavior.

2. Legal Predictability

Second, there is the crucial issue of legal predictability. “There is probably no single factor which has contributed more to the prosperity of the West than the relative certainty of the law which has prevailed here.”⁵⁶ He made a very important point in this regard. The certainty of law is important, not just in cases that come before the courts, but also in those cases that do not lead to formal litigation because the outcome is so certain. “It is the cases that never come before the courts, not those that do, that are the measure of the certainty of the law.”⁵⁷ In the United States, there is seemingly endless litigation, precisely because of the unpredictability of the courts.⁵⁸ Men go into the courts seeking justice because they do not know what to expect from the courts. If they knew what to expect, fewer people would bother to litigate. They would settle out of court or perhaps even avoid the original infraction.

The law of God establishes the “eye for eye” principle. Men can assess, in advance, what their punishment is likely to be if they transgress the law. They can count the potential cost of violence. This is a restraining factor on all sin. A person can imagine the costs to his potential victim of losing an eye or a tooth. If convicted, the criminal will bear a comparable cost.

Rulers ought to be aware that the lex talionis principle is not simply limited to crimes by private citizens. Judgments fall on nations, both blessings and cursings (Judges, Jonah, Lamentations). The list of promised national cursings in Deuteronomy 28:15–68 is a detailed extension of the list of promised blessings in verses 1–14. When nations defy God in specific ways, they will be judged in specific ways—mirror images of the promised blessings to covenantally faithful nations. Instead of going out in war (a national endeavor, not private) and scattering their enemies, they will go out to war and be scattered by their

55. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

56. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 208.

57. Idem.

58. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974).

enemies. Instead of lending to their enemies, they will become debtors to their enemies. The principle of “eye for eye” is essential to all of life. From him to whom much has been given, much is expected (Luke 12:47–48).⁵⁹

3. Equality Before the Law

“The third requirement of true law is equality.”⁶⁰ Equality before the law, as W. F. Albright wrote, is reinforced by the “eye for eye” principle.⁶¹ The rich man, as well as the poor man, wants to avoid the loss of an eye or a tooth. Therefore, the rich man, like the poor man, must avoid inflicting such injuries on other people. There must be equality before the law (Lev. 19:15).⁶² The judges must not impose a tooth’s worth of punishment for an eye’s worth of damage just because the convicted person is rich or famous. People can then trust the law and the courts, for they know that the law is being enforced because God is sovereign over the affairs of men. The law does not become a weapon of oppression to be used by one class over another. The law, to use Marx’s terminology, is not to become a superstructure which is built on the foundation of an economic substructure. The law of God is the substructure in terms of which the economy, the political order, and the pattern of society develop.

Thus, the general legal principle of “eye for eye” in the imposition of civil punishments is a crucial foundation of human freedom, for it binds the civil government in advance. Hayek’s discussion is very useful for understanding the state-binding purposes of the lex talionis. There are three legal principles that undergird a free society, he argues: general legal rules that (1) distinguish private from public spheres of action; (2) provide legal predictability; and (3) provide equality before the law. The judicial principle of lex talionis supports all three.

F. Restoration, Repentance, and Restitution

Men have failed to understand the fundamental goal of biblical

59. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 28.

60. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 209.

61. “So the lex talionis (is). . . the principle of equal justice for all!” W. F. Albright, History, Archeology, and Christian Humanism, p. 74, as cited in Shalom Paul, Studies in the Book of the Covenant, op. cit., p.77.

62. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 14.

law: restoration—restoration of the covenantal relation between God and a formerly rebellious man, and restitution between the criminal and his victim. Rushdoony wrote: “Emphatically, in Biblical law the goal is not punishment but restoration, not the infliction of certain penalties on criminals but the restoration of godly order.”⁶³ The criminal is to make restitution to the victim. This restores the victim’s position prior to the crime, plus it increases his holdings to compensate him for the trouble the crime caused him. He is as fully repaid as the court system can lawfully determine. The innocent members of society can feel more confident about their lives and property because the state is obeying God and punishing criminals in a way that preserves the dominion covenant. They can work hard, knowing that the state is working to reduce crime and help them keep the fruits of their labor. At the same time, the criminal now knows that his debt is paid, and that the burden of guilt is removed. He can then return to a lawful calling and begin to exercise dominion as a free man. This is what Rushdoony meant when he spoke of restoration, of maintaining godly order.

The Bible teaches restitution, repentance, and restoration. The criminal must make outward restitution to the victim, no matter what his feelings are. The state lawfully enforces this. Second, he is morally required by God to repent, and to declare himself at the mercy of God. No human government can lawfully enforce this. Finally, in response to both external restitution and internal repentance, God restores the sinner to wholeness.

The state cannot legitimately require the internal act of repentance; officers cannot know the criminal’s heart. The state cannot legitimately require a public statement of theological faith from all residents in a society. The “stranger within the gates” may believe what he wants about God, man, and law.⁶⁴ The state can legitimately claim only the right to compel outward conformity to the law, including the law of economic restitution. Outward conformity to the law is sufficient to create the conditions of external social order. This is the function of civil government: the preservation of external social order through the administration of justice. At the same time, we must recognize that apart from widespread inward repentance, no social order can be preserved in the long run, for men will chafe at the requirements of God's law, including the law of restitution. Men will not honor God's law indefinitely, apart from widespread conversions. Regeneration ultimately undergirds long-term social order.⁶⁵ Nevertheless, it is not the state's function to seek to enforce inward regeneration. The state is not the Holy Spirit.

63. Rushdoony, Institutes, p.515.

64. This does not mean that the state cannot legitimately require a statement of faith from those who seek citizenship, and therefore the right potentially to serve as judges “within the gates.” In the United States, citizens are required to uphold and defend the Constitution; resident aliens make no such profession of faith. They are required to obey the terms of laws that are based on the Constitution, but they are not required by law to swear that they will uphold and defend it. This is one reason why foreign citizens should be exempt from military conscription: soldiers, as covenanted officials of the national government, are required to uphold and defend the Constitution. They wear the marks of their civil office (uniforms) and carry “swords”: weapons.

1. Concern for the Victim

Concern for the victim rather than with rehabilitation of the criminal often marked so-called "primitive" societies. English common law has also tended to focus on retribution, not the rehabilitation of the criminal. It seeks to punish men in specific ways for specific evil acts. In contrast, modern humanistic theories of jurisprudence, in the name of humanitarianism, to a great extent have promoted a messianic view of the state. Lon Fuller summarized the contrasting views, and the heart of the controversy is the assertion of the ability of the state to re-create man: "The familiar penal or retributive theory looks to the act and seeks to make the miscreant pay for his misdeed; the rehabilitative theory on the other hand, sees the purpose of the law as recreating the person, or improving the criminal himself so that any impulses toward misconduct will be eliminated or brought under internal control. Despite the humane appeal of the rehabilitative theory, the actual processes of criminal trials remain under the domination of the view that we must try the act, not the man; any departure from this conception, it is feared, would sacrifice justice to a policy of paternalistic intervention in the life of the individual."⁶⁶ This fear is well-deserved: continual interventions into the lives of men by a self-professed omniscient paternalistic state is exactly where a legal theory of "trying the man rather than his acts" does lead. A jury can make the criminal "pay for his crime” by paying the victim because members of the jury can make reasonable estimates of the economic effects of the convicted criminal’s acts. On the other hand, jurors cannot read the convicted criminal’s mind. When judges try to read other men’s minds, the result is tyranny.

65. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

66. Lon Fuller (1969), cited by Richard E. Laster, "Criminal Restitution: A Survey of Its Past History and an Analysis of Its Present Usefulness," University of Richmond Law Review, V (1970), p. 97. Laster's study concluded that the role of the victim in criminal law has steadily diminished (p.97).

Restitution by the criminal to the victim is one way of restoring wholeness to the victim. It also reduces the likelihood of private attempts at vengeance.⁶⁷ It is a way of dealing with guilt. In this sense, it is a means of restoring wholeness to the criminal, too.

Israel’s history can legitimately be classified in terms of a series of incidents by which this three-fold relationship—repentance, restitution, and restoration—was illustrated in a covenantal, communal, and national way. Israel’s deliverance from Babylon is a good example of this restorative process. It is also illustrated in the instance of David’s adultery and his murder of Uriah the Hittite. David repented (II Sam. 12:13); the child died (12:18), and so did three of his adult sons—Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah—thereby making four-fold restitution on a “four lives for one” basis.⁶⁸ Four-fold restitution was the required payment for the slaughter of a lamb (Ex. 22:1). Nathan the prophet had used the analogy of the slaughtered ewe lamb in his confrontation with David (II Sam. 12:4). David recognized that the culprit was worthy of death (v. 5). David therefore could not escape making the four-fold restitution payment to God’s sense of justice (adultery and murder are both capital crimes in the Bible). Subsequently, David and Bathsheba were covenantally restored in their marriage, which God testified to publicly by the birth of Solomon (12:24), who became the lawful heir of David’s throne.

We must understand capital punishment as God’s required restitution payment. The death penalty is not a means of revenge alone or deterrence alone. It was imposed on Adam and his heirs, and also on the second Adam, Jesus Christ. For any civil crime too great to be compensated for by a monetary restitution payment to the victim, God requires the civil magistrate to impose the death penalty, God’s restitution payment. Homicide, for example, could not be paid for in Israel by anything less rigorous than life for life (Num. 35:31), a law which is without parallel in the laws of the ancient Near East.⁶⁹ Later rabbinic

67. Laster, ibid., p. 75.

68. Herbert Chanan Brichto, “Kin, Cult, Land and Afterlife—A Biblical Complex,” Hebrew Union College Annual, XLIV (1973), p. 42.

69. Paul, Book of the Covenant, p. 61.

Judaism abandoned the principle that all murderers are subject to the death penalty, in order to reduce the penalty for Jews who kill resident aliens or gentiles. Maimonides was quite open about this: "If an Israelite kills a resident alien, he does not suffer capital punishment at the hands of the court, because Scripture says, And if a man come presumptuously upon his neighbor (Exod. 21:12). Needless to say, one is not put to death if he kills a heathen."⁷⁰

Restitution, repentance, and restoration are equally fundamental concepts in Christian theology. Without Christ's restitution payment to God for the sins of mankind, there could have been no history from the day Adam fell. Without repentance, the individual cannot claim to be free from the requirement to make the restitution payment to God. Eternal judgment is God's lawful vengeance on all those who have not made restitution, meaning all those who have not placed themselves at the mercy of God by claiming to be under Christ's general repayment. The absolute righteousness of God is demonstrated by His eternal punishment of those who have not made full restitution to Him. The punishment fits the crime of ethical rebellion against a sovereign, holy God.

2. Restitution in Practice

Various forms of restitution have been adopted by civil governments for centuries.⁷¹ Experiments by state and local governments in the United States since the mid-1970s also indicated that such a system can provide significant benefits to victims. The state of Minnesota began its experiment in October of 1973. Based on one year's data, researchers made a study of opinions and results. Restitution was a condition of probation of the criminals in one-fourth of all probation cases. "Restitution was used in a straightforward manner by most courts. Full cash restitution was ordered to be paid by the offender to the victim in more than nine out of ten cases. Adjustments in the amount of restitution because of limited ability of the offender were rare. In-kind, or service, restitution to the victim or community was ordered in only a few cases. . . ."⁷²

70. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11, The Code of Mainonides, 14 vols (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1954), V:II:11, p. 201.

71. J. A. Gyls and F. Reidy, "The Case for Compensating Victims of Crime," Atlanta Economic Review, XXV (May/June 1975).

72. Summary Report: The Assessment of Restitution in the Minnesota Probation Services, prepared for the Governor's Commission on Crime Prevention and Control

The program was limited primarily to non-violent criminal offenders who were considered able to pay, which generally meant white middle-class criminal offenders.⁷³ This limits the empirical reliability of the conclusions concerning the overall effectiveness of the program. Also, the amount of restitution was limited to the amount of the economic loss by the victims, not two-fold restitution, as required by the Bible. The original state-level trial program was dropped in 1976, but the principle has been instituted at the local level. Judges in every jurisdiction now impose restitution as a penal sanction.

The Summary Report stated that “Most judges and probation officers favored the use of restitution. Similarly most judges and probation officers expressed the belief that restitution had a rehabilitative effect.” Furthermore, “most victims believed that restitution by the offender to the victim is the proper method of victim compensation. Victims who were dissatisfied tended to be those who felt that they had not been involved in the process of ordering or aiding in the completion of restitution.” And perhaps most revealing of all, “Most offenders thought that restitution as ordered was fair.”⁷⁴ Only ten of the offenders (14.4%) would have preferred a fine or a jail sentence.⁷⁵ It is understandable why we have seen a renewed interest in restitution as a form of punishment.⁷⁶

G. Prisons

The prison as a correctional and rehabilitative institution was the invention of the early nineteenth-century reform movement in the United States. Visitors from all over Europe came to see these correctional “wonders.” The most famous of these visitors was Alexis de Tocqueville, who came from France in 1831 to see our prisons, and who then wrote the most insightful study of American institutions in the nineteenth century, which also became the earliest major work in (Jan.31, 1976), p.1.

73. Idem.

74. Idem.

75. Ibid., p.26.

76. Joe Hudson and Burt Galloway (eds.), Considering the Victim: Readings in Restitution and Victim Compensation (Springfield, Illinois: Charles C. Thomas, 1975); O. Hobart Mowrer, “Loss and Recovery of Community,” in George M. Gazda (ed.), Innovations to Group Psychotherapy (Springfield, Illinois: Charles C. Thomas, 1975). Such interest has never been entirely absent: see Irving E. Cohen, “The Integration of Restitution in the Probation Services,” Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science, XXXIV (1944), pp.315–26.

the discipline of sociology, Democracy in America (1835, 1840). He and his colleague Gustave de Beaumont produced a report on their observations, On the Penitentiary System in the United States (1833).⁷⁷ Parallel tax-supported institutions were developed during this same era: the insane asylum, the orphanage, the reformatory for youthful delinquents, and the large-scale public almshouse.⁷⁸ It was also the era of the first “religiously neutral” (humanistic) tax-supported day schools in the United States.⁷⁹

1. No Prisons

In Israel, there was no prison system. Egypt had prisons; Israel did not.⁸⁰ Why not? Because prisons do not offer adequate opportunities for criminals to repay their victims. A prison restricts the criminal's ability to make restitution, and restitution is the very essence of biblical punishment. Prisons restrict men's ability to repay; they also make it difficult for men to exercise dominion over nature.

In a sense, the prison is analogous to the final judgment. There is no restitution to victims by those in hell or in the lake of fire. There is permanent restitution to God, but not to man. In this sense, hell is outside history and the process of restitution and restoration. Hell is described as a debtors prison in Jesus' parable of the unjust debtor. The debtor is cast into prison until every last payment is made (Matt.

77. Tocqueville and Beaumont on Social Reform, ed. Seymour Drescher (Santa Fe, New Mexico: Gannon, 1968).

78. David Rothman wrote: “Americans in the colonial period had followed very different procedures. They relieved the poor at home or with relatives or neighbors; they did not remove them to almshouses. They fined or whipped criminals or put them in stocks or, if the crime was serious enough, hung them; they did not conceive of imprisoning them for specific periods of time. The colonists left the insane in the care of their families, supporting them, in case of need, as one of the poor. They did not erect special buildings for incarcerating the mentally ill. Similarly, homeless children lived with neighbors, not in orphan asylums. . . . The few institutions that existed in the eighteenth century were clearly places of last resort. Americans in the Jacksonian period reversed these practices. Institutions became places of first resort, the preferred solution to the problems of poverty, crime, delinquency, and insanity.” David J. Rothman, The Discovery of the Asylum: Social Order and Disorder in the New Republic (Boston: Little, Brown, 1971), p. xiii.

79. The two leaders in this self-consciously anti-Christian public school movement were Horace Mann and James G. Carter: R. J. Rushdoony, The Messianic Character of American Education: Studies in the History of the Philosophy of Education (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1963), chaps. 3, 4.

80. Rushdoony, Institutes, pp. 514–16.

18:23–35).⁸¹ The debtor could get out only if someone else paid his obligations. Clearly, this is a picture of Christ's payment of His people's ethical debts to God, as their kinsman-redeemer. This substitute payment is available to mankind only in history. Thus, the prison is illegitimate because it represents a denial of history and its opportunities. That Egypt had prisons is understandable; Egyptians had a static view of time. Israel did not. Old Testament law did not allow imprisonment.⁸²

Western Europe abandoned debtors prison during the decade 1867–77.⁸³ Legislators at last recognized that it did victims no good to see a debtor cast into prison until he paid, because he could not earn his way out. It is not coincidental that Europe passed such legislation in the same era that the United States and Russia abolished slavery, another system that also did not provide a way for people to buy their way out.

The ultimate earthly prison is the concentration camp. While the Soviet camp system had economic functions, the cruelty of long sentences was obvious. Under Stalin, these sentences were incredibly grotesque. As many as 30 million people were sent into the camps, never to return.⁸⁴ The magnitude of the crime against humanity seems irrationally cruel.⁸⁵ They were irrational, according to Solzhenitsyn. The first thought of the arrested person was always, "Me? What for?"⁸⁶ From 1934 on, a soldier captured in wartime was automatically given a 10-year sentence upon being freed from the enemy.⁸⁷ Encircled military units got 10-year sentences after 1941.⁸⁸ Failure to denounce specified evil acts carried an indeterminate sentence.⁸⁹ Quotas for arrests made the diversity of the camps fantastic, he said; there was no logic to

81. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch.37.

82. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch Translated and Explained, translated by Isaac Levy, 5 vols., Exodus, 3rd ed. (London: Honig & Sons, 1967), p. 294: at Exodus 21:6.

83. France abolished debtors prison in 1867; England abolished it by the Debtors Act of 1869. Ireland followed in 1872, Scotland in 1880. Switzerland and Norway abolished it in 1874, Italy in 1877. "Debt," Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th ed. (New York: Encyclopaedia Britannica, Inc., 1910), VII, p. 906.

84. Robert Conquest, The Great Terror: Stalin's Purges of the Thirties, rev. ed. (New York: Collier, 1973), p. 710.

85. Van den Haag, Punishing Criminals, p. 43.

86. Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, The Gulag Archipelago, 1918–1956: An Experiment in Literary Investigation, I–II (New York: Harper & Row, 1974), p. 4.

87. Ibid., p. 61.

88. Ibid., p. 79.

89. Ibid., pp. 67, 363.

them.⁹⁰ A chance meeting with a condemned man could get you 10 years.⁹¹ Owning a radio tube was worth ten years.⁹² In 1948, the average sentence increased to 25 years; juveniles received 10.⁹³

The classic story he told was of a district Party conference in Moscow Province. At the end of the conference, someone called for a tribute to Stalin. A wave of applause began, and continued. Everyone was afraid to be the first person to stop clapping, for fear of being arrested. It went on for eleven minutes. Finally, one man, a factory director, stopped clapping and sat down, then the whole group immediately stopped and sat down. That night the man was arrested, and he then received a 10-year sentence.⁹⁴

There is only one way to explain this: the desire of the state to become God and to impose hell on earth. It became a goal of state policy to destroy men's lives, to leave them without earthly hope in the future. It was easy to go to jail without a trial. The Special Boards attached to the secret police, the OSO's,⁹⁵ handed down "administrative penalties," not sentences. "The OSO enjoyed another important advantage in that its penalty could not be appealed. There was nowhere to appeal to. There was no appeals jurisdiction above it, and no jurisdiction beneath it. It was subordinate only to the Minister of Internal Affairs, to Stalin, and to Satan."⁹⁶ It is not surprising that the camps became the closest thing in recorded history to hell on earth.

2. Bureaucracy

The prison is a bureaucracy, not a market-oriented institution. It is run by the state through taxes. It is a bureaucratic management system, not a profit management system.⁹⁷ Men are trained to follow orders, not to innovate, take risks, and meet market demand. There are many arguments against prisons, as revealed by an enormous bibliography on alternatives to prisons,⁹⁸ but the most important one is that

90. Ibid., p. 71.

91. Ibid., p. 75.

92. Ibid., p. 78.

93. Ibid., p. 91.

94. Ibid., pp. 69–70.

95. Ibid., p. 275.

96. Ibid., p. 285.

97. See Gary North, "Statist Bureaucracy in the Modern Economy," in North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 20. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>) See also Mises, Bureaucracy.

98. James R. Brantley and Marjorie Kravitz (eds.), Alternatives to Institutionaliza- they thwart the biblical principle of restitution.

The prison also creates other horrors, such as homosexuality and training in criminal behavior for the younger inmates by the “skilled” older inmates. It puts too much power in the hands of prisoners, who can commit rape and even murder with their AIDS infections.⁹⁹ It puts too much power in the hands of guards, who can then indulge their tastes in brutality. It puts too much power in the hands of parole boards, who can shorten a man’s sentence irrespective of the crime, thereby making the punishment fit the board’s assessment of the criminal, not the judge’s assessment of the effects of the crime—or more to the point, making the punishment fit the latest humanistic theory of criminal behavior and social responsibility, not the crime.¹⁰⁰

Left-wing humanists have begun to see the threat to justice posed by the indeterminate sentence.¹⁰¹ Mitford described the indeterminate sentence as “a potent psychological instrument for inmate manipulation and control, the ‘uncertainty’ ever nagging at the prisoner’s mind a far more effective weapon than the cruder ones then [in the 1870s] in vogue: the club, the starvation regime, the iron shackle.”¹⁰² Because of doubts regarding the prison as a means of correcting evil behavior, we have seen an increasing resistance by juries and judges to send first offenders or minor offenders to prison. But because restitution has not yet become a common means of punishing criminals, these “minor” criminals receive no punishment, other than having to report occasionally to an overburdened probation or parole officer.¹⁰³ tion: A Definitive Bibliography, published by the National Criminal Justice Reference Service of the National Institute of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice, a division of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, U.S. Department of Justice (May 1979), 240 pages.

99. National columnist Mike Royko recommended prison sentences rather than fines for computer hackers, because intelligent middle-class prisoners will be raped in jail. “If the computer vandals are as bright as they think they are, they’ll decide that they don’t want to be forcibly betrothed to some hulk of a cellmate with a shaved head and 10 tattoos.” Mike Royko, “No software in his heart for hackers,” Washington Times (Nov. 11, 1988). This is a politically conservative newspaper.

100. C. S. Lewis, “The Humanitarian Theory of Punishment,” in Lewis, God in the Dock: Essays on Theology and Ethics, ed. Walter Hooper (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 287–300.

101. Jessica Mitford, Kind and Usual Punishment: The Prison Business (New York: Knopf, 1973), ch.6. Those who have opposed capital punishment have denounced it as cruel and unusual. Mitford’s attack implies that imprisonment is, too. What, then, is legitimate punishment? The Bible gives us guidelines; few humanists do.

102. Ibid., p. 82.

103. Charles Manson, who led the “family” (cult) of murderers who killed actress Sharon Tate and several others in 1969, was on parole from prison at the time. Others

These same humanists look at the “eye for eye” principle, and react in horror. They did not react with equal consternation when they confronted the problem of the late twentieth century’s increase in violent crime. At the end of an age, we expect to see an increase in criminal behavior, as lawlessness becomes a way of life for a dedicated, pathological minority, while religious and cultural relativism and self-doubt render citizens and their elected authorities helpless to stem this tide of consistent lawlessness. Gilbert Murray, the great student of Greek civilization, characterized the last days of Greek religion as “the failure of nerve.”¹⁰⁴ This seems to fit contemporary Western humanism quite well.

3. Emptying Prisons and Stoning Sons

Prisons need to be emptied. The biblical way to accomplish this is to revive the biblical practices of execution for habitual criminals (Deut. 21:18–21), corporal punishment (Deut. 25:1–3), and restitution. It is interesting that the justification for executing habitual criminals rests on that bugaboo of all pietism, the execution of the rebellious son. It is a case of “if this, then how much more that.” If it is mandatory that a man bring his incorrigible adult son before the elders for gluttony, drunkenness,¹⁰⁵ and verbal rebellion, how much more ready will a society be to execute repeatedly violent individuals or members of a professional criminal class! Remove from the law books the law regarding the civic execution of the rebellious son, and you thereby remove the one and only biblical sanction for executing professional criminals. The “three-time loser” penalty of American jurisprudence¹⁰⁶ in his “family” were also on probation. As the prosecuting attorney later wrote: “Manson associated with ex-cons, known narcotics users, and minor girls. He failed to report his whereabouts, made few attempts to obtain employment, repeatedly lied regarding his activities. During the first six months of 1969 alone, he had been charged, among other things, with grand theft auto, narcotics possession, rape, contributing to the delinquency of a minor. There was more than ample reason for parole revocation.” Vincent Bugliosi, Helter Skelter: The True Story of the Manson Murders (New York: Norton, 1974), p. 420. Manson’s parole officer stated in court that he could not remember whether Manson had been on probation or parole; the man was responsible for overseeing 150 persons (p. 419). Manson had actually begged to be allowed to remain in jail when they released him in 1967; at that time, he was 32 years old, and had spent 17 years in penal and reform institutions (p. 146).

104. Gilbert Murray, Five Stages of Greek Religion (1925 edition), reprinted by AMS Press and Greenwood Press.

105. Seven-year-olds are not drunkards; this verse deals with adult rebels.

106. A man convicted of a felony for the third time used to receive life imprisonment without possibility of parole.

has disappeared; in its place has come a criminal class of far more than three felony convictions—and most of these professionals are paroled early.

Incorrigible sons and incorrigible criminals are to be removed from society: “. . . so shalt thou put evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear, and fear” (Deut. 21:21b). Rushdoony identified the importance of this law for society: “Such persons were thus blotted out of the commonwealth. When and if this law is observed, ungodly families who are given to lawlessness are denied a place in the nation. The law thus clearly works to eliminate all but the godly families.”¹⁰⁷ The point here is that if incorrigible sons are to be executed, how much more the members of the professional criminal class. The case law is based on the idea that this maximum sanction, if applied to a seemingly minimal infraction, is surely to be applied in an analogous major infraction. The infraction is repeated lawlessness as a lifestyle: incorrigibility.

The prison is a second-best device. It does keep some habitual criminals locked up for part of their lives. It is sometimes argued that by keeping them out of circulation, the overall crime rate drops. There is only spotty evidence to prove this. The problem is, when one criminal is locked up, others move into the “vacuum” of crime.¹⁰⁸ It may take time for the new entrants to become equally skilled, however.

Still, prison is a threat. If a society refuses to execute professional criminals, then it must impose some kind of sanctions if evil is not to be indirectly subsidized. Biblical law is a package deal. It will not suffice to empty the prisons until the whole of biblical criminal law is on the law books and enforced, especially the death penalty against rebellious sons. Those who are appalled by this law are not sufficiently appalled by professional criminal behavior.

Conclusion

The biblical principle of an eye for an eye protects society from a lawless state that recognizes no limitations on its power. This law establishes the fundamental judicial principle that the punishment should fit the crime. This principle, sometimes called lex talionis, requires that the criminal pay back to the victim whatever was stolen, and in some cases an additional penalty payment is required.

107. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 380.

108. Van den Haag, Punishing Criminals, pp. 53–60.

There is no doubt that this law is based on vengeance, but vengeance is a basic principle of biblical law. God extracts a vengeance payment from evil-doers: perfect vengeance at the day of judgment, and imperfect vengeance through the civil government. Vengeance is a form of restitution to God.

The fundamental goal of biblical law is restoration. Evil people are to be restored by God to righteousness. The state cannot save mankind, except in the sense of healing through enforcing justice, but it can impose external punishments that make social and economic restoration possible. Restitution by the criminal to the victim is an effective way of restoring wholeness to both parties. It upholds a basic principle of civil law: punishment should benefit the victim.

Prisons are a second-best system of punishment. They keep hardened criminals off the street, but they do very little for the past victims. While they should eventually be emptied, except for holding suspects for trial at the local level, this would be too risky before all three biblical sanctions are restored to civil law: the death penalty, corporal punishment, and economic restitution.

THE AUCTION FOR SUBSTITUTE SANCTIONS

If men strive, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart from her, and yet no mischief follow: he shall be surely punished, according as the woman's husband will lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine. And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe (Ex. 21:22–25).

As I stated in the previous chapter, the theocentric issue here is man as God's image. The victim represents God. God requires the civil government to impose a negative sanction on the convicted criminal because of his violation of the victim's rights. The judicial principle governing the sanction is "eye for eye."

Politically left-wing humanists have long ridiculed the legitimacy of this principle of governance. Is their concern about the supposed brutality shown by the Bible's "eye for eye" principle misguided? Shouldn't their concern be focused on the brutality of the criminal against the innocent victim? Is the lex talionis principle not a deterrent to crime, especially repeated crimes by a criminal class? Shouldn't our concern be with the victims of violent crime rather than with the criminals who commit them?

A. Thumb for Thumb, Eye for Eye

We read of Adoni-bezek in the first chapter of Judges. Adoni-bezek (Lord of Bezek) was a Canaanitic king. The Israelites fought him and defeated him. "But Adoni-bezek fled; and they pursued after him, and caught him, and cut off his thumbs and his great toes. And Adoni-bezek said, Threescore and ten kings, having their thumbs and their great toes cut off, gathered their meat under my table: as I have done, so God hath requited me. And they brought him to Jerusalem, and there he died" (Jud.1:6–7). This Canaanitic king's confession reveals that he recognized the justice of the punishment imposed on him by his conquerors.¹ He had cut off the toes and thumbs of kings; now he had suffered the same punishment. He had removed their anatomical "tools of dominion"; now he had his removed.²

This incident raises some difficult exegetical questions. Was the "eye for eye" principle literally applied in ancient Israel after the defeat of Canaan? Did Israel's courts really poke out people's teeth and eyes? If not, why not? Or is it merely that there are no clear-cut biblical records of such physical penalties being imposed by Israelite judges on Israelite citizens?

The incident also raises some difficult historical questions. In the Christian West, judges have consistently refused to impose "eye for eye" physical penalties. In non-Christian societies, permanent physical vengeance is quite common, e.g., Islam's Shari'a law. Why not in the West? What is it about inflicting permanent physical mutilation—in contrast to whippings or other relatively impermanent forms of physical violence—that so repels Westerners?

1. The West's Future-Orientation

The West's impulse toward dominion in history is one possible answer. The West has been future-oriented, as a direct result of its Christian eschatological heritage: a faith in linear history, with a God-created beginning, a God-sustaining providence, and a God-governed final judgment.³ This vision of linear time made possible the development of modern science.⁴ The future-orientation of the West, especially from the seventeenth century onward, and especially in Protestant societies, led to faith in long-term progress, including long-term eco-

1. The Hammurabi Code specified mutilations on an "eye for eye" basis, paragraphs 196–201. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), p. 175.

2. Without a thumb, a person cannot grasp a tool or weapon. Without a big toe, he cannot balance himself easily. See James B. Jordan, Judges: God's War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985), pp. 4–5. (<http://bit.ly/jjjudges>)

3. Karl Löwith, Meaning in History (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1949), ch. 11: "The Biblical View of History."

4. Stanley Jaki, The Road of Science and the Ways to God (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978), chaps. 1, 2; Science and Creation: From eternal cycles to an oscillating universe (Edinburgh and London: Scottish Academic Press, [1974] 1980); "The History of Science and the Idea of an Oscillating Universe," in Wolfgang Yourgrau and Allen D. Beck (eds.), Cosmology, History, and Theology (New York: Plenum Press, 1977).

conomic growth.⁵ Western people have understood the importance to the community of full production from all members. There is (or was) the psychological and social phenomenon called “the Protestant Ethic.”⁶ Begging, for example, has not been favored in Protestant nations. Idleness has been frowned upon. Therefore, the realization that physical punishment can permanently reduce the productivity of any citizen repels the Westerner. The Western judge asks: What happens to the criminal after he has “paid his debt”? Why should the criminal, his family, his future employers, and consumers be deprived of his full future productivity? Why should any man be hampered in working out his own salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12)?⁷ Wouldn’t permanent physical mutilation tend to impair his future employment, thereby luring him back into a life of crime? What if he should experience a moral transformation in the future? Western justice seems to recognize such problems, and so it has rejected physical mutilation as a legal sanction.

2. Figuratively Speaking?

Are we to interpret the “eye for eye” passage figuratively? Jesus said in the Sermon on the Mount, “If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee. . . . And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee” (Matt. 5:29a, 30a). We recognize that He spoke figuratively. He meant that the lusts of the flesh are so dangerous spiritually that even the loss of eye or hand is to be preferred. Therefore, avoid moral contamination; avoid lust (5:28). But the issue in Exodus 21:24–25 is that there has been physical injury inflicted on another person. The eye which the victim has lost is a literal eye. To interpret the “eye for eye” passage figuratively because Jesus interpreted “eye” figuratively in a very different context is not legitimate.

There is no doubt that the “thumb for thumb” penalty was literally applied to Adoni-bezek. He recognized the justice of the penalty. Permanent physical mutilation is legitimate when applied to one who has committed a crime that has produced the same mutilation in another person. Yet the resistance of Western judges against imposing this physical penalty on their own nation's citizens indicates that they have sought other ways to deal with criminals and victims in crimes involving permanent physical mutilation. Question: In cases other than manslaughter—the death of an innocent third party as a result of unwarranted violence—as in the abortion of Exodus 21:22–23, may some other penalty legitimately be imposed, one which meets God's standards of justice, as well as men's sense of justice?

5. Gary North, “Medieval Economics in Puritan New England, 1630–1660,” Journal of Christian Reconstruction, V (Winter 1978–79), pp. 157–60.

6. Max Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (New York: Scribner’s, [1904–5] 1958). See also Gary North, “The ‘Protestant Ethic’ Hypothesis,” Journal of Christian Reconstruction, III (Summer 1976); Daniel T. Rodgers, The Work Ethic in Industrial America, 1850–1920 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978).

7. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 20.

B. Option: Economic Restitution

Say that an ox has been known to gore people in the past. It gets loose again and kills someone. The owner in this instance is held legally liable; in fact, he is to be put to death (Ex. 21:29). However, Exodus 21:30 provides an exception to the requirement that a crime that results in a person's death be punished by the execution of the person responsible. "If there be laid on him a sum of money, then he shall give for the ransom of his life whatsoever is laid upon him." The death penalty is set aside at the discretion of the judges and the victim's heirs. The man pays a ransom for his life. The text does not specifically say that the ransom is paid to the victim's next of kin, but this was the familiar pattern in the Old Testament. The payment would become part of the dead person's estate, as if he were still alive and had been merely injured by the beast. The ransom is a restitution payment. There is no evidence that the ransom would go anywhere else except to the victim's heirs.

The question can be raised: If the death of the owner of the ox does not benefit the victim's heirs, while the ransom does benefit them, does the lex talionis allow a comparable solution to the problem of the physically mutilated person? Instead of physically mutilating the criminal, may the judges legitimately impose a restitution payment?

1. Jewish Commentaries

Traditional Jewish explanations of the lex talionis principle point to a payment in lieu of physical mutilation. Nachmanides wrote in the thirteenth century concerning "eye 'tachath' (for) eye":

It is known in the tradition of our rabbis that this means monetary compensation. Such a usage [of the term tachath to indicate] monet-any compensation is found in the verse: And he that smiteth a beast mortally shall pay for it; life "tacheth" life [Lev. 24:18], [in which case tacheth surely indicates monetary compensation]. Rabbi Abraham ibn Ezra commented that Scripture uses such a term to indicate that he really is deserving of such a punishment, [that his eye be taken from him], if he does not give his ransom. For Scripture has forbidden us to take ransom for the life of a murderer, that is guilty of death [Num. 35:31], but we may take ransom from a wicked person who cut off any of the limbs of another person. Therefore we are never to cut off that limb from him, but rather he is to pay monetary compensation, and if he has no money to pay, it lies as a debt on him until he acquires the means to pay, and then he is redeemed.⁸

Nachmanides's citation of Abraham ibn Ezra indicates that he was disturbed by the literal wording of the "eye for eye" stipulation. By refusing to call for a literal application of the verse in the case of a poor criminal, and also by their refusal to call for indentured servitude as a way to repay the debt, these two Jewish medieval commentators softened the threat of the punishment.

There are difficulties with this interpretation. It is ingenious, but it has no explicit biblical precedent, and it may therefore be incorrect, even though it appears to conform to the implicit meaning of "eye for eye." It involves speculation that relies heavily on the precedent of economic restitution in the case of the ox that gores someone to death (Ex. 21:30)—a separate case law that may not apply to the lex talionis law of Exodus 21:24–25. This view became common in the interpretation of Jewish law. Rabbi Samson R. Hirsch commented on Exodus 21:25 in the mid-nineteenth century: ". . . the taking of this legal canon literally, in the sense of an eye for an eye, would be morally impossible for any idea of equity; . . ." Further, "the whole spirit of the text is what the traditional Halacha [Jewish law] teaches, viz., that here it is only speaking of monetary compensation for the injury inflicted. . . ."⁹

2. Restitution and Equity

In principle, the interpretation of the lex talionis as allowing economic restitution in place of physical mutilation raises some fundamental questions. First, is the requirement of vengeance compromised

8. Rabbi Moses ben Nachman [Ramban], Commentary on the Torah: Exodus (New York: Shiloh, [1267?] 1973), p. 368.

9. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch Translated and Explained, trans. Isaac Levy, 5 vols., Exodus, 3rd ed. (London: Honig & Sons, 1967), p. 315.

by the imposition of a restitution payment? Is there some fundamental aspect of justice, or men's sense of justice, that should allow a man to "buy his way out" of an injury that he has inflicted on another person? If so, what is this long-neglected aspect of justice?¹⁰

Second, does this law, so interpreted, lead to class antagonism? What if the criminal is poor? He cannot pay what a rich man can afford to pay. Is it fair to allow a rich man to forfeit only money, when the poor man must forfeit his eye or tooth or else become an indentured servant to pay off the debt? Will violent rich people become more careless than violent poor people with regard to injuring others? Are the rich being taught to care less for the law of God than the poor do? If the rich can buy their way out, is society thereby allowing the development of resentment among the poor, who feel that the law is working against them? Is society implicitly subsidizing rich criminals?

The most important questions are these: Has the "eye for eye" principle been abandoned when economic restitution is substituted for physical punishment? Will God honor a society that abandons this literal principle?

But what if the economic interpretation of lex talionis is denied? Would the requirement that all criminals pay the full physical price rather than economic restitution really be beneficial to their victims? The victim may need additional capital to compensate for his loss of productivity as a result of the injury. What benefit is it to him that the criminal becomes equally hampered physically?

Furthermore, there are important social consequences of denying the economic interpretation. What benefit is it to society that two people now will suffer from some physical impairment rather than only one? Is the dominion covenant better fulfilled when two men lose an eye or an arm rather than only one man? After he makes economic restitution to the victim, the criminal can work hard and perhaps regain his lost wealth, but he can never regain a lost eye. Society may benefit more in the long run because of the productivity that the convicted man retains. If he repents and becomes a law-abiding member of the community, his greater productivity increases the wealth of all those consumers whom he will serve as a producer.

These questions deserve biblical answers. We can begin to discover answers by examining in detail how the substitution of economic restitution for physical mutilation might work.

10. I argue that three principles of justice lead us to such a view of lex talionis: victim's rights, the criminal's right to seek mercy through making a substitute payment, and the limitation of the judges' authority.

C. Establishing a Fair Payment

Let us begin with the case of a victim who has lost his eye. A partially blinded person could insist on a particular restitution payment from the convicted criminal. He could say to the judges, “Tell that man that he can keep his eye, but only if he pays me 100 ounces of gold.” The judges would then present this option to the criminal: your gold or your eye.

If the criminal values his body more highly than he values the economic restitution demanded by the victim, he pays the money. This is the principle of victim's rights in action. On the other hand, if he values the payment higher, or if he simply cannot afford to pay, then he can forfeit his eye. This is the principle of maximum specified sanctions in action. The criminal could also make payment by selling himself into indentured servitude, with the buyer paying the victim. But perhaps the convicted man would prefer to lose the use of part of his body rather than becoming a bondservant. He could reject the demand of the victim for economic restitution and insist instead on his legal right under biblical law: to suffer the same physical mutilation that he had imposed on the victim.

1. The Right to Punishment

Each of the parties in this judicial dispute has biblically specified legal rights. The victim has the right to insist on the biblically specified maximum physical sanction: eye for eye. He also has the right to offer the criminal an alternative, one that appears to be less severe than the biblically specified physical sanction. If the alternative offered to the criminal is not regarded by him as less severe, then he has the legal right to insist on the imposition of the biblically specified maximum sanction. He therefore possesses the right to be punished by the specified biblical sanction. His punishment is limited by the extent of the injury which he imposed on his victim. The punishment fits the crime.

It is basic to the preservation of liberty that the state not be allowed to deny to either the victim or the criminal his right of punishment. While this principle of the right to punishment is at least vaguely understood by most people with respect to the victim, it is not well understood with respect to the criminal. The right to be punished is a crucial legal right, one which Paul insisted on at his trial: “For if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them. I appeal unto Caesar" (Acts 25:11).

If the state can autonomously substitute other criteria for deserved punishment, such as personal or social rehabilitation, then society loses its right to be governed by predictable laws with predictable judicial sanctions. The messianic state then replaces the judicially limited state. Neither the victim nor the criminal can be assured of receiving justice, for justice is defined by the state rather than by God in the Bible. If punishment is not seen as deserved by the criminal, and therefore his fundamental right, then he is delivered into the "merciful" hands of elitist captors who are not bound by written law or social custom. No one has described this threat more eloquently than C. S. Lewis:

To be taken without consent from my home and friends; to lose my liberty; to undergo all those assaults on my personality which modern psychotherapy knows how to deliver; to be re-made after some pattern of 'normality' hatched in a Viennese laboratory to which I never professed allegiance; to know that this process will never end until either my captors have succeeded or I grown wise enough to cheat them with apparent success—who cares whether this is called Punishment or not? That it includes most of the elements for which any punishment is feared—shame, exile, bondage, and years eaten by the locust—is obvious. Only enormous ill-desert could justify it; but ill-desert is the very conception which the Humanitarian theory has thrown overboard.¹¹

The state represents God in history in His capacity as cosmic Judge (Rom. 13:1–7).¹² When a civil government's leaders say that the state represents any other agent or principle, the state has begun its march toward either tyranny or impotence. Either it will bring judgment on men and other states in the name of its deity, its official source of law,¹³ or else some other state will bring judgment on it and those governed by it in the name of a foreign deity. Only a rare nation like Switzerland can defend its borders for centuries, and then only by renouncing all thought of conquest in the name of defense and international neutrality.¹⁴

11. C. S. Lewis, "The Humanitarian Theory of Punishment," in Lewis, God in the Dock: Essays on Theology and Ethics, ed. Walter Hooper (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 290–91.

12. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

13. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 4.

The mark of this transformation of the state is when the state insists on imposing the punishment in terms of the supposed “needs of society,” meaning ultimately the needs of the state’s officers. When the state collects fines for use by the state rather than to pay victims, when it imposes prison sentences paid for by the taxes of law-abiding citizens, and when it insists that every convicted criminal “pay his debt to society,” then the messianic state has arrived. God has specified that the victim is His representative in criminal cases, not the state, unless the victim is legally unable to represent himself, in which case the state acts as his trustee. Only if the state is the victim can it lawfully demand restitution. When the state presents itself as the universal victim of all crime to which is owed universal restitution by criminals and taxpayers alike, it has asserted its own divinity.

2. Benefits of Alternative Sanctions

The proposed economic solution to the dilemma of the lex talionis offers at least three very real benefits. The first benefit is judicial: the victim has the right to specify the appropriate punishment. This punishment is limited only by the maximum penalty specified by biblical law, eye for eye. The biblical principle of victim’s rights is upheld by the judges. If the victim believes that the criminal’s act was malicious, and if he wishes to inflict the same damage on the criminal which he himself suffered, this is his legal option.

To take this retributive approach, however, he necessarily forfeits all the economic advantages that he might have received from a restitution payment from the criminal. He can exercise his legitimate desire for vengeance—his desire to reduce the criminal to a physical condition comparable to his own—but this desire for vengeance has a price attached to it. He is made no better off financially because of his enemy’s suffering. In fact, he could be made slightly worse off: he, as a member of the economic community, loses his portion of the other man’s lost future productivity, assuming the man cannot overcome the effects of his lost eye or limb. Vengeance in the Bible’s judicial system

14. It had better have high mountains, civil defense, an armed population, and services such as private banking and a geographical “King’s X” facilities for overthrown rulers. See John McPhee, La Place de la Concorde Suisse (New York: Farrar, Strauss, Giroux, 1984).

has a price tag attached to it. This inevitably reduces the quantity of physical vengeance insisted on by victims, for biblical civil justice recognizes the judicial legitimacy of a fundamental economic law: "The higher the price of any economic good, the less the quantity demanded."

The second benefit of this interpretation of lex talionis is also judicial: the criminal who is about to lose his eye or tooth is permitted to make a counter-offer. He has the right to be punished to the limit of the written law, but he also can suggest a less onerous punishment—less onerous for him, but possibly more beneficial to his victim. He can legally offer money or services in exchange for the continued preservation of his unmutilated body. The system puts him in the position of being able to pay in order to retain his limbs. He places a price tag on his body.

This price tag makes it costly for the victim to pursue an emotion that, had there been no crime, would be called envious: the desire to tear another person down, irrespective of the direct benefits to the person who is envious.¹⁵ But because there has been a crime, envy is legitimate in this case. It must be understood that "getting even" with a convicted criminal is a legitimate goal for the victim of a crime. God eventually "gets even" with Satan and his followers who have sinned against Him; He pulls them down from their positions of power and influence. This process of pulling Satan down began with Jesus's ministry, an event which was manifested by the power of His disciples. "And the seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name. And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy: and nothing shall by any means hurt you" (Luke 10:17–19). The victims of violent crime are in an analogous position with God: innocent people who deserve to be avenged. But grace still abounds in history, so the criminal is allowed to make a counter-offer to his victim, just as the sinner can make a counter-offer to God.¹⁶

15. Of course, the desire to gain compensation would be regarded as jealousy, in the absence of a crime: the desire to gain at another person's expense. The crime, naturally, does make a difference: the right of the state to avenge the victim is crucial; pseudo-envy or pseudo-jealousy are just that: pseudo. These are legitimate emotions when a crime has been committed that has cost the victim the use of part of his body.

16. When sick or injured people learn that they are about to die, one common reaction is to make a deal with God: specific service for an extension of the gift of life. Contrary to secular humanists and theological liberals, this makes good sense. The dy-

The third benefit of this interpretation is social: the integrity of the legal system is upheld in the eyes of all the nation. Members of society at large cannot complain that the judges are playing favorites. The judges are not “respecting persons.” If a rich man loses money, while the victim has lost the use of his body, this result has been the decision of the victim, not the judges. What is essentially a private dispute, victim vs. criminal, rather than a conflict between classes, has been settled by the disputants. The victim has made his choice. Outsiders therefore have no valid moral complaint against the judicial system. This keeps the ideology of class conflict from spreading to the general population. This is a very important feature of the justice system in an era of class conflict, meaning an era of rhetoric by competing elites in the name of various classes.

3. Insurance for Criminals?

Should the victim be denied the option of specifying the form of vengeance? Does it thwart justice to set up a judicial system where a rich criminal can offer to “buy his way out”?¹⁷ Worse, what if his rich insurance company can offer to buy his way out?

If criminals could escape the likelihood of physical violence by means of monetary restitution, they might start buying insurance contracts that would enable them to escape the economic penalty of inflicting physical violence. This could be regarded as licensing criminal behavior. No one is going to co-insure another man’s eye with his own eye, but the public has already set up co-insurance for monetary claims. Thus, by allowing economic restitution for crimes of violence, criminal behavior might be made less costly to the criminals.

One answer to this objection is that insurance companies are unlikely to insure a person from claims made by victims if the man is a repeat violator. The risk of writing such contracts is too high. Private insurance contracts are designed to be sold to the general public, and to keep premiums sufficiently price competitive, sellers exclude people known to be high risks. Low-risk buyers do not want to pay for high-risk buyers. Furthermore, insurance policies often specify that the coverage is for civil damages rather than criminal acts. This is true of most ing individual is thereby admitting that God is in control of life and death. This is another reason why dying people deserve to be told that they are dying.

17. If the criminal could “buy his way out” by bribing the judges, then justice would be thwarted. But judges in a biblical system represent the victims, not the state. If they represent a victim who wishes to be “bought off,” where is the injustice?

automobile insurance policies. Policies specify exactly what is to be covered—the famous insurance industry principle of “the large print giveth, but the fine print taketh away.”

Policies actually designed by criminals to co-insure would be extremely unlikely. Violent criminals seldom think ahead. They do not work well with others. They are essentially anti-social people. A system of insurance company-subsidized crime could not last very long without government financial aid.

D. The Auction for Human Flesh

By allowing the substitution of an economic payment for actual physical disfigurement, the judges unquestionably do authorize an auction for human flesh. If a convicted criminal is allowed to pay the victim in order to avoid physical mutilation, he is participating in an auction. Such an implicit auction may sound crass, but so does poking out an innocent person's eye. So does all criminal behavior. Covenant-breaking men may not like to think of criminal behavior in such terms, but this is what the Bible teaches. Sin is the evil, not economic restitution.

1. The Auction Process

We begin our economic analysis of this auction process with a consideration of the victim. Let us assume that he has lost his eye. He tells the judges that he wants to see the other man's eye poked out, just as his was. He offers the criminal no choice between mutilation and restitution. Because the victim initially offers no alternative sanction, the criminal is then allowed to make a single counter-offer, if he wants to. Assume that he makes this counter-offer: 10 ounces of gold instead of losing his eye.¹⁸ Perhaps he is a skilled craftsman who needs both eyes. Perhaps he fears disfigurement. In any case, he places a high premium on his eye. He bids 10 ounces of gold to retain it.

Once the victim receives an offer from the criminal, he may change his mind about his commitment to seeing the criminal disfigured. Perhaps he did not suspect that he could get this much money from the criminal. Perhaps his wife has seen the wisdom of taking the money. He may conclude that he would much prefer 100 ounces of gold to the joy he would receive in seeing (with his remaining eye) his enemy brought low. After all, seeing his enemy part with 10 ounces of gold is also seeing him brought low, and the event brings other benefits, such as all the pleasures or security the 10 ounces of gold can buy. So he accepts the counter-offer. The criminal keeps his eye.

18. As we shall see, this counter-offer is allowed because the victim did not offer the criminal a choice between mutilation and economic restitution. If the victim specifies a choice between mutilation and a money payment, he is not entitled to accept less money, since this would indicate that he had not been honest when he specified the initial conditions. On the other hand, if the criminal should propose a non-monetary payment, the victim would be entitled to consider it, since this would constitute a different kind of offer from that specified by the victim. See subsection below, “Limiting One's Original Demands.”

In this case, the criminal is the high-money bidder. The victim values the gold more than he values the criminal's eye. The criminal places more value on his eye than the gold. Each man gets what he most prefers. The criminal has bought the right to determine what happens to his own body. He has bought the right to avoid mutilation.

Consider the victim's other possible choice. He is still outraged at what has befallen him. He wants the criminal to share the same physical limitation. He is unwilling to accept the financial counter-offer. Now, economically speaking, the criminal had just placed 10 ounces of gold into the victim's lap. He had been willing to pay. The victim is not impressed, or not sufficiently impressed. He figuratively hands the 100 ounces of gold back to the criminal. "Keep your filthy money, you butcher! Keep your only remaining eye on your money." The victim has now matched the money bid of the criminal. He has forfeited the 10 ounces of gold that he might have received. He places a higher value on his legal ability to blind the other man's eye than he does on 10 ounces of gold. So, the victim gets what he values most, the joy of seeing the other man lose his eye. But he pays 10 ounces of gold for this pleasure. The pleasure is biblically legitimate, but it is expensive.

The criminal's 10 ounces of gold did not constitute a high enough bid. The victim might have agreed for more than the 10 ounces, but the criminal had not been willing to pay this much. The criminal keeps what he wants: the 10+ ounces of gold that the victim might have accepted in payment, but which the criminal refused to offer. The criminal would rather have this larger quantity of gold than keep his eye. There is what the economists call "reservation demand" for this money; the criminal pays with his eye for his continued possession of the money.

None of this suggests that the criminal can buy justice. Justice is what the court provides when it tries the case and imposes the victim's preferred sanction, up to the limit of the law. The criminal is buying a specific sanction that he prefers by offering the victim an alternative which the criminal hopes the victim will prefer. It is an auction for flesh, not an auction for justice.

2. The Private Slave Market

To give the criminal access to capital sufficient to make the offer, the state must allow another auction for flesh: a slave market. Deny this, and the criminal is thwarted in gaining what he wants, and so is his victim. The most valuable asset a criminal may possess is his own ability to work. If he is denied the legal right to capitalize this asset, he may not be able to offer a sufficiently high bid to the victim to avoid mutilation.

The modern democratic theorist professes horror at such a thought. Why? Because the modern state's disciples want the state to have a monopoly on the slave market. The state imposes prison as the alternative to both restitution and slavery—an alternative which benefits neither the victim nor the potentially productive criminal.

At this point, we return once again to the basic theme of the Book of Exodus: the choice between slavery to man and service to God. It is therefore the question of representation: Who is represented by the state, God or autonomous man? When autonomous man is represented by the state, then tyranny or impotence is the result. Autonomous man seeks to enslave others, for he seeks to imitate God, just as Satan imitates God. The state becomes the primary agency of this enslavement process. It should not be surprising to learn that the call for the abolition of chattel slavery in the United States began in the 1820s in the Northeast, where the new state prison systems were also being implemented.¹⁹

Slavery may seem brutal. The lex talionis also may seem brutal. Judicially unregulated violence is more brutal. Injustice in the face of crime is more brutal yet. The high penalty imposed on the convicted criminal is intended to impress the criminal, potential criminals, and all ethical rebels of the majesty of God's law, and the high price God will impose eternally on those who break it. This no doubt repels the sense of justice of covenant-breakers, but God is not concerned about the ethical sensibilities of covenant-breakers. He is concerned primarily about His own majesty, which is reflected in His law, including the penalties imposed on those who transgress its provisions.

19. David J. Rothman, The Discovery of the Asylum: Social Order and Disorder in the New Republic (Boston: Little, Brown, 1971). This same era saw Horace Mann's call for the establishment of a "theologically neutral" tax-financed day school movement, meaning a call for social morality without Christian supernaturalism. When American society began to abandon the God of the Bible, it also began to abandon the institutional foundations of freedom.

3. Technological Progress and Restitution

With the advent of modern technology, it might be possible for the victim to secure a replacement eye. He might demand an operation, with the criminal's eye being transplanted as a replacement. Or an exchange might be set up: the criminal's eye goes to an eye bank in exchange for an eye that might be more compatible biologically with the victim's system. Alternatively, the judges could allow the criminal to pay for an operation for the victim, and give the victim an additional payment equal to the value of the operation. The criminal would lose the money, but the victim would see again.

This sort of economic resolution to the problem of "eye for eye" standard is ideal: the victim gains what he had lost, and the criminal pays for it, plus restitution for the victim's pain, fear, and trouble. The technological advances brought by Western—and initially Christian—civilization make possible the best solution for both parties, namely, the restoration of the injured man's sight, but at the expense of the criminal. The technological progress that would be brought by a thoroughly Christian civilization would make possible a better set of options for both victim and criminal. The more faithful a society's commitment to enforcing God's law, the more rapid its technological progress is going to be.

E. Limiting One's Original Demands

The threat of actual physical mutilation for the convicted violent criminal will always be present in a biblical legal order. The victim has lost his eye or tooth; the criminal deserves to lose his. But few criminals would sacrifice an eye if they could make restitution in some other way. They might sacrifice a tooth, but not an eye. The victim can legitimately demand the removal of the other man's eye, but there is not much doubt that he would prefer a large cash settlement to help him recover his lost productivity and forfeited economic opportunities. He might even be able to get a new eye through surgery. The rich man is allowed to "buy his way out," but only at the discretion (and direct economic benefit) of the victim. On the other hand, the victim can demand his "pound of flesh," but only by forfeiting the money that he might have been paid.

What if the victim is really vindictive? What if he demands 1,000 ounces of gold for the other person's tooth? In all likelihood, the criminal would prefer to forfeit the tooth. Under this kind of judicial system, the victim must estimate carefully in advance just what the convicted person might be willing and able to pay. There must be no "fall-back position" after the victim submits his pair of demands to the judges: physical mutilation or a specified financial restitution payment.

Under a biblical system of economic substitution, the victim would be required by the court to specify the minimum amount of money he would be willing to accept in exchange for not having mutilation imposed on the criminal. The victim would not be allowed to present a false estimate about how much of restitution he would be willing to accept. This would be false witness, or perjury. He could not come back a second time, after the criminal has refused to pay the 10 ounces of gold, and say, "All right, I'll accept 5 ounces of gold instead of his tooth." By lowering his new demand, he would be admitting that his initial offer had been higher than his minimal demand. In short, the injured victim must know in advance that by making an excessive initial financial demand, he might "price himself out of the market"; he therefore has to be reasonable if he is really after money. He might wind up with nothing except the pain and disfigurement of the criminal as his reward. He must ask for less money in order to increase his likelihood of collecting anything.

The judges would present the victim's specified choices to the criminal, and the criminal would have the option of refusing to pay the 1,000 ounces. The judges would then have the physical penalty imposed.

The man condemned by the victim to permanent physical mutilation would have the option of making a counter-proposal if the victim had offered no option to mutilation. The victim could then consider it. Again, the criminal would be allowed only one offer; if the victim still says no, and the criminal then makes a higher offer, he can be presumed to have given false witness when he made the first offer. By limiting the victim to presenting the criminal with only one set of options, and by giving the criminal the opportunity to make a single counter-offer only when no alternative option has been offered by the victim, the judges can obtain honest offers from the beginning.

The court would allow only one form of second-chance bids. If the criminal is unwilling to pay the victim the money payment demanded, but he is willing to pay in some other way than money, he would have the opportunity to present the alternative or group of alternatives for the victim to choose from. But if the victim turns this counter-offer down, the criminal will then have to undergo mutilation. He is governed by the equivalent rule that governs the victim: honest bidding. He offers his highest price or best bid. If it is rejected, he must suffer the physical consequences.

F. The Authority of the Judges

The integrity of society's covenantal civil judges is fundamental to the preservation of social order. The Bible warns rulers and judges to render honest judgment. They are forbidden to take bribes (although it is not forbidden for righteous people to offer bribes to corrupt judges).²⁰ Judges are to render honest judgment because the Bible requires it and because God requires it, not because it is made personally profitable for them to do so. When citizens distrust the judicial system, a fundamental weakness exists in the society. Bribes are a sign of such weakness and distrust.

1. Initial Penalty

The judges establish the initial penalty payment in the case of a notorious ox that has killed a person (Ex. 21:30). What about in the case of the crime of mutilation? Shouldn't the judges set the penalty? In the case of a non-injurious, accidental, premature birth caused by another man's violent behavior, the husband establishes the penalty, and the judges then impose it. "If men strive, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart from her, and yet no mischief follow: he shall be surely punished, according as the woman's husband will lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine" (Ex. 21:22). This implies that the judges can overrule the husband if the penalty is thought by them to be excessive. The authority of the judges is supreme in this case.

If it is true that the Bible requires that in the case of bodily mutilation, the judges must assess the penalty, as they do in the case of criminal manslaughter (the owner of the notorious ox), then they must make the decision: economic restitution or physical restitution. Both are legitimate forms of vengeance; both are true forms of restitution. If the judges are solely responsible for making this determination, then sovereignty is transferred to them and away from the victim and the criminal, who might prefer to come to a different, more mutually beneficial transaction. This raises the question of righteous judgment. Why should the victim and the criminal be excluded from the process of the setting of the penalty? After all, in the case of the non-injurious premature birth, the husband has the opportunity of setting a preliminary penalty. Why not in the case of mutilation?

20. Proverbs 17:8; 21:14. Cf. Gary North, "In Defense of Biblical Bribery," in Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, Appendix 5; see also Chapter 52:D, below.

One solution to this dilemma would be to allow the judges to assess the original penalty, estimating what the defense of an eye is worth in the open market, and then make a preliminary announcement of the size of the payment. Then either of the two contending parties could make a counter-offer, which the judges would accept if both parties agree. In this way, the authority of the law would have a visible manifestation—rule by the judges—but the type of restitution could be modified at the discretion of the affected parties. It would be analogous to parents making an arranged marriage: either of the two children can legitimately protest and refuse the other, but initiating the marriage would be the right of the parents.

It is important that collusion between the judges and either the victim or the convicted criminal be prevented. To help prevent such collusion, dual rights are established: the right of the victim to demand different restitution from that set by the judges, and the right of the criminal to make a counter-offer to the victim when he receives notice of the judges' initial proposal.

There is another factor to consider. Economic value is both objective and subjective.²¹ The judges are required by God to attempt to assess the cost to the victim, as well as the cost to the criminal, but they may make a mistake. There is no scientifically or theoretically valid way for judges to assess the comparative costs of injuries, because these costs are based on other people's subjective utilities. For example, if either the victim or the criminal is a right-handed skilled craftsman whose hand is his calling, and he has lost (or is faced with the threat of loss of) his right hand, the penalty is not easily fitted to the crime. Say that the victim has lost his right hand, and he is the craftsman. The criminal is a left-handed lawyer whose right hand is seemingly less crucial to him than the right hand of the victim. Is the loss of the criminal's right hand really a case of "hand for hand"? How can the judges determine what is a really comparable penalty? Hasn't the victim suffered far greater loss? Of course, the reverse could be true: a left-handed lawyer loses his right hand, and the criminal is a right-handed craftsman. Is the physically identical penalty really comparable in terms of the costs to each person?

21. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5.

2. The System in Operation

Consider a hypothetical case. A criminal is convicted for having mutilated another man's hand. Let us consider three possible outcomes. First, the judges determine that the criminal should lose his hand. Why would they impose this penalty? Perhaps the criminal is a known brawler. He used a weapon to bash a victim's hand, making it permanently useless. The judges decide that the best thing for society would be for the criminal to have his hand bashed into uselessness or amputated, so that he could not easily repeat the offense.

The victim at this point might prefer economic restitution. The brawler also might be willing to pay to keep his hand. In such a case, the judges would be placing their perception of the public's need for future social peace above the economic needs of the victim.

The victim would have the option of asking for a different kind of punishment. The victim may want money, so he appeals the decision, and demands monetary compensation. The judges then go to the criminal. Is he willing to pay the victim the proposed monetary restitution? The criminal has three choices: pay the money, accept the judges' original penalty, or offer a third proposal to the victim. If the criminal turns down the request of the victim to be paid, and if the victim rejects the criminal's counter-offer, then the judges' original sentence would be carried out. He would lose the use of his hand.

Second, the judges impose a monetary penalty that is too low in the opinion of the victim. He demands more money. The criminal has a new set of choices: pay the higher penalty, make a counter-offer of something other than money, or lose his hand. He no longer has the option of paying the original penalty established by the judges. The victim has overruled the judges on the question of the appropriate monetary penalty.

Third, the judges impose a monetary penalty. The victim is outraged. He believes that the criminal should lose his hand, just as he lost his. The judges then go to the criminal. You must lose your hand, the victim says. Do you wish to offer the victim more money than we determined originally, or offer something other than money? The criminal makes his decision. If he decides to offer more money or another non-monetary option, he has only one opportunity to persuade the victim. If the victim refuses to accept the counter-offer, the criminal loses his hand.

By allowing the victim to demand different compensation—money or service rather than physical mutilation, or more money than the judges have imposed, or physical mutilation rather than money—the proposed restitution process allows subjective value to assert itself. The victim determines whether or not the judges have really offered him what his loss is worth to him personally. If he thinks he is being cheated, he can demand that his enemy pay more or suffer the same physical loss. The criminal also has the right to substitute the loss of an appendage, if the judges determine that he should lose the appendage, rather than pay what he believes is an excessive economic demand by the victim, if the demand is higher than the judges originally set.

The Bible does not anywhere indicate that the criminal has any legal, formal ability to overturn the final decision of the highest civil court of appeal. If the judges impose a particular penalty—mutilation, for example—and the victim is satisfied, then the criminal has no formal right of appeal. He cannot override the decision of the judges. But in fact he really does have the indirect ability to appeal—an appeal through the victim. He or his representatives can approach the victim with a counter-proposal. “Look, I would be willing to pay 10 ounces of gold if you would appeal the decision of the judges to have me mutilated.” If this is satisfactory to the victim, he then appeals the decision, and the criminal agrees to the new terms of restitution. The judges are not allowed to overturn this mutually agreed-upon form of restitution.

If the court sets an economic penalty, and the victim agrees, the criminal still has a legal, formal ability to substitute his own mutilation for the economic restitution. He can demand the explicit physical sanction of the law: lex talionis. This means that the law upholds his right to demand the punishment specified by God. Bargaining is legitimate, but both the victim and the criminal can insist on the specified penalty. If the victim insists on physical mutilation, the criminal has no choice. If the criminal insists on physical mutilation, the victim has no choice. Bargaining, however, is likely.

By establishing the three-way system of establishing penalties—judges, victim, and convicted criminal—the judicial system receives a means of making objective approximations of the inescapably subjective “eye for eye” standard—subjective to both victim and criminal. By permitting subjective estimations of loss by both the victim and the criminal, the judges find a way to offer compensation to the victim that he believes is comparable to the crime. The criminal, however, is allowed to counter-offer a different, economic form of restitution penalty if he believes that the cost of a physical penalty is too high.

Conclusion

My discussion of the possible outworkings of the “eye for eye” passage should not be understood as the last word on the subject. It is, however, a “first word.” I want readers to understand that the biblical justice system is just, workable, and effective. The lex talionis should not be dismissed as some sort of peculiar juridical testament of a long-defunct primitive agricultural society. What the Bible spells out as judicially binding is vastly superior to anything offered by modern humanism in the name of civic justice.

The problems in dealing with the actual imposition of the lex talionis principle are great. The history of the people of God testifies to these difficulties. We have few if any examples of Christian societies that have attempted to impose the “eye for eye” principle literally. The basic principle is clear: the punishment should fit the crime. By allowing the victim to demand restitution in the form pleasing to him, and by allowing the criminal to counter-offer something more pleasing to him, the penalty comes close to matching the effects of the crime, as assessed by the victim.

Each party gets to make one offer. If the victim offers a choice between penalties, the criminal chooses which one he prefers, or can offer something completely different. If the victim specifies one and only one penalty, mutilation, the criminal is entitled to counter-offer. If the victim specifies only a money payment, but the criminal prefers mutilation on an “eye for eye” basis, then he has the right to choose mutilation.

The judges can establish the original restitution payment, whether physical or economic, but the two affected parties should have the final determination. This places limits on the state. The economic assets involved in this auction process are transferred (or retained) by the person who is more concerned with economic capital than with physical mutilation. In this way, biblical justice is furthered.

The modern Western world has not imposed deliberate, permanent physical mutilation on violent criminals. These criminals, when convicted, have been imprisoned. They have been compelled to pay fines to the state. In very few cases have they been compelled to make monetary restitution to the victims. The result has been escalating violence against private citizens, as well as the escalating power of the state.

Biblical law imposes penalties on violent criminals that tend to reduce the amount of violent crime. Biblical penalties encourage criminals to count the cost in advance. In the case of "crimes of passion," the convicted passionate criminals would be reminded of the benefits of self-lex talionis principle, provides criminals with a glimpse of (or preliminary down payment to) this cosmic principle of justice.

FREEDOM FOR AN EYE

And if a man smite the eye of his servant, or the eye of his maid, that it perish; he shall let him go free for his eye's sake. And if he smite out his manservant's tooth, or his maidservant's tooth; he shall let him go free for his tooth's sake (Ex. 21:26–27).

The theocentric issue here is ownership. God created the world. He owns it. He upholds it by His grace and in terms of His law. He has established laws governing men's ownership of other men.

The law concerning the striking of a bondservant¹ seems to be in conflict with the immediately preceding verses. The “eye for eye” principle of verse 24 does not seem to be upheld in this passage. The master who has blinded his slave is not to be blinded by the judges. This in turn seems to be a violation of the principle of equality before the law: “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you” (Ex. 12:49). If the master may strike a Hebrew bondservant, putting out his eye, why shouldn't he suffer the same physical consequences? Why is he allowed to retain his sight? Is the law unfair?

Whenever we find a variation in the application of some general biblical law, we should search the context to discover which special circumstances of the case have made mandatory the variation. We must bear in mind that in principle, the general law is still in force. God does not change His mind concerning ethics. The ethical terms of His covenant do not change. Nevertheless, in order for the law to apply fairly to those under the terms of the covenant, differences in circumstances must be respected. Some people deserve more protection than others because of their place in society. Young children are one example. Widows and orphans are another. So is the bondservant.

1. Reminder: I use the word “bondservant” rather than slave, except when referring to permanent ownership of non-Hebrew slaves.

A. The Bondservant's Special Position

The Bible recognizes the legitimacy of the institution of indentured servitude. It places this institution under specific laws, and the law governing the injuring of a bondservant is one such law. On the one hand, as we shall see, the master needs special legal protection from the false claims of a disobedient bondservant. On the other hand, the dependent bondservant needs special legal protection against excessive discipline by the master. This law governing physical punishment protects both master and bondservant.

We need to examine the biblical principles that undergird this law. First, the master has legitimate authority over the bondservant. The bondservant is a form of property. The master is allowed to assign tasks to the bondservant that produce profit for the master. In this sense, the bondservant is his property, for the fruits of the bondservant's productivity belong to the master, as if he were a beast or a tool. The master may not mistreat the bondservant, however, as this law indicates. The bondservant is not without legal protection, but he is not a free man. The "eye for eye" principle is applied differently in the case of a bondservant because the legal relationships are different from those governing free men.

Second, ownership is an inescapable social function. We say that ownership necessarily involves stewardship. The ownership of an asset imposes certain inescapable costs on the owner. He must make decisions about how to use an asset, or whether or not to divest himself of ownership. If he uses the asset in one way, he cannot use it in another. By earning income (or attempting to) by using an asset in one productive process, he necessarily forfeits whatever income he might otherwise have produced with the asset.² He must choose what to do with whatever assets he legally controls. This is called allocation.

The bondservant's owner has a capital asset at his disposal. The bondservant can produce income for him. An economically rational purchaser of a bondservant looks at the expected future stream of income—net income, after caring for the bondservant's physical needs—and he then discounts this by the prevailing rate of interest. He will pay no more for a bondservant than he will pay for any other capital asset that is expected to produce the same net output, nor will the seller sell the bondservant for less.³ If he pays more, he will lose money on the investment. On the other hand, he cannot buy the bondservant for less, because the competitive bids of other potential buyers keep the bondservant's price high. The bondservant's market price will be the same as the market price of a piece of land that is leased for the period of his bondage, or a bond, mortgage, or any other productive asset that produces the same net economic return over the same period of time.

2. Gary North, "Ownership: Free but Not Cheap," The Freeman (July 1972). (<http://bit.ly/OwnFree>) Reprinted in An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 28. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

It may bother some people to learn that the market price of the human bondservant is governed by the same economic forces that govern all other economic assets that are expected to produce the same rate of return. This seems to equate people with things. But we also know that buyers and sellers make their economic decisions in terms of economic costs and benefits. Unless the buyers are sadists who love to mistreat people (and who are therefore willing to pay more than the market price of leased land or a bond in order to assure their ownership of a bondservant),⁴ the market price of the bondservant will equal the market price of any economic asset that is expected to produce the same rate of return. As we shall see, this equation of market prices for all equally productive assets is one of the aspects of a market economy that protects the bondservant from abuse.

So, from the point of view of economic return on the investment, the bondservant is not in a special position. But the Bible teaches that he is a human being, not a beast of burden or a machine. He is therefore singled out for special protection by civil law.

B. Self-Interest and Self-Restraint

The bondservant-owner's quest for profit places limits on his relationship with his bondservant. The bondservant is expected to be a producer of net income. The owner risks losing this income, or part of the income, if he permanently mutilates the bondservant. First, there will be the loss in productivity associated directly with the bondservant's physical loss. Second, there could also be loss as a result of the mistreated bondservant's resentment. He will not perform as expected.

3. There is this exception: to the degree that owning a slave is a prestige factor, the buyer will pay more, and the seller will demand more. The value of the slave in this case reflects his position as both a capital good and a consumer good.

4. This really does not invalidate the general rule. The sadist is receiving non-monetary returns psychologically through the suffering he imposes on the slave. Thus, he will pay more to buy the human asset.

The market's forces of profit and loss restrain the bondservant's owner. The civil authorities can presume that the bondservant's owner is not going to mistreat his bondservant physically to the extent that the bondservant's performance will be seriously impaired. Because of the competitive market for the bondservant's economic output, civil authorities can more safely delegate authority to the bondservant's owner. This decentralizes power in the society. The competitive market, through the self-interest of the bondservant's owner, serves as an institution that restrains the illegitimate use of power. The economic costs of lawless behavior are borne by the bondservant's owner. This is true of all capital resource ownership. This is why the bondservant's economic position as a capital asset protects him.

Bondservants are understood to be potentially rebellious. This is clearly true in the case of criminals who are sold to masters in order to raise money for the restitution payment to the victims. But rebellion is not limited to criminals. Men are by nature rebellious. They resist authority, both lawful and unlawful. Adam rebelled against God; bondservants rebel against masters. Without a means of enforcing lawful authority, no form of external government could exist. The bondservant system is an aspect of biblical family government in the Bible. Thus, the bondservant's owner possesses the legitimate authority to inflict limited physical punishment. What the Bible restrains is punishment that inflicts permanent physical damage.

There are five reasons why we can presume for this prohibition. First, men are made in God's image, and therefore they deserve protection. Second, interpersonal relationships between people are threatened when one person has seemingly unlimited power to impose his will on another. Punishment is supposed to increase respect for the law, the master, and God on the part of the bondservant, not foster an urge to revenge because of the outrageous nature of some type of punishment. Evil calls forth evil. Third, permanent injuries generally restrict people's ability to exercise dominion. Punishment is not to thwart the dominion covenant. Fourth, a man's spirit can be broken by continual, ruthless beatings. Without the protection of law, the victim may see himself as exploited and without hope. This also conflicts with the psychology of dominion. The law provides him with an area of safety. He is to increase his dominion by his subservience to God's law. This, in fact, is one of the functions of indentured servitude: to bring men under God's law. If there is no protection, then there is no law. Without law, there can be no dominion. Indentured servitude is supposed to teach this biblical principle of life.

C. Judicially Unrestrained Violence: The Lure of Autonomy

There is a fifth reason why it was illegal for the bondservants' owners to inflict permanent physical damage on their slaves. This reason is more narrowly theological in nature. It is one which contemporary Christians do not want to think about: eternal punishment.

Slavery and bondservice point to man's subordinate relationship to God. This relationship, being covenantal, is governed by the inescapable aspect of all covenants, judgment. There are two forms of covenantal judgment: blessing and cursing.⁵ The blessing side of slavery is the judicially guaranteed prospect of release. A slave who matures and learns to be self-disciplined and productive is to be released, and civil law is to enforce his right to freedom by establishing specific performance standards for slaves. This hope of eventual release must not be destroyed. Thus, slavery points to covenantal blessing. It points to God's final release of covenant-keepers from bondage to sin and death.

On the other hand, slavery also points to the other side of God's final judgment, the eternal curse: the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14). It points to God's position as cosmic Slavemaster. In the lake of fire, the "whipping" never ceases. The physical sanctions are eternal. These physical sanctions have no redeeming value, meaning no redemptive purpose. God whips rebels forever in order to satisfy His own sense of justice. But the inflicting of permanent cursing is exclusively God's decision and activity. Men are never to imitate God in this respect. Men in history are never to be given the power to impose non-redemptive sanctions, either physical or spiritual. Even capital punishment is legally only a change in venue: convicted criminals are transferred to God's court for final trial and sentencing. This is why the Bible provides no authorization for torturing those who have been legally condemned to execution.

D. Freedom: The Best Compensation

Biblical law makes the presumption that a master who is not self-restrained is incapable of exercising responsible dominion over the bondservant. Dominion is always to be in terms of God's law. The master is in a weak position to teach the bondservant the basics of the dominion covenant if he is himself not self-restrained. Self-government is the fundamental level of government in human affairs. God's law promotes self-government.

5. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

The bondservant's owner may misuse his authority by inflicting excessive punishment. The bondservant loses the use of his eye or tooth. How is he to be compensated? By a non-literal application of the "eye for eye" principle. The Bible recognizes the ultimate earthly desire of a God-fearing bondservant who is in bondage to a master who does not exercise self-restraint: freedom. The civil authorities do not put out the master's eye or knock out a tooth. If his master were to lose an eye to match his eye, then the bondservant would be no better off, and the brooding master might attempt to murder the bondservant in order to gain revenge.

The injured bondservant is rewarded with his freedom. This reminds the bondservant of the essential righteousness of God's law. It also reminds the undisciplined former owner of the same thing, as well as the necessity of his exercising self-restraint in the future. The bondservant is taken out of the jurisdiction of a lawless man.

The victim receives compensation for the loss he has sustained. While his physical ability to exercise dominion may be permanently impaired by a physical injury, the increase of the scope of his authority compensates him. The former bondservant's freedom also benefits society, if the bondservant becomes successful in some free market activity. The lure of self-interest which the market provides may offset the loss of productivity which results from the physical injury. Thus, the terms of the dominion covenant are more closely fulfilled. Output increases because of the incentives provided through freedom. The bondservant will now receive the fruits of his labor, not the former master. This increased productivity benefits both the bondservant and consumers.

The bondservant is not compensated in any other way. The law does not require the master to provide him with tools or other capital assets. This indicates that the value of personal freedom is very high—so high, in fact, that the loss of a tooth barely compares with it. Freedom is such an advantage that it can barely be compared with the losses associated with physical impairment. Freedom is the reward for both the loss of a tooth or an eye. It is so valuable in comparison with physical impairment that no additional compensation is granted to the bondservant who has lost an eye, even though an eye is more valuable than a tooth. So precious is freedom that the eye-less bondservant cannot legitimately protest to God or the authorities that he has received the compensation “only” of the tooth-less man.⁶ He does not receive “freedom plus.” Freedom is sufficient.

Biblical law substitutes the bondservant’s freedom for a retaliatory loss of the master’s tooth or eye. This substitution may or may not be to the liking of the master. The economic loss of the bondservant may be greater in the opinion of the master than the loss of his own tooth, but he has no choice in the matter. He must allow the bondservant to go free.

This substitution is evidence of the legitimacy of substitution in other non-capital “eye for eye” crimes. In cases involving free men, the victims can demand compensation other than the literal inflicting of physical mutilation of the criminals. The goal is dominion. Free men are allowed to “get even” with those who have mistreated them, not necessarily by pulling their enemies down to their physically damaged level (although this is the victim’s option), but rather by increasing their own wealth and productivity. This is also how the mistreated bondservant is supposed to “get even.” The guilty party does lose, just as the victim has lost, but the loss is a form of economic compensation to the victim—a grant of capital (freedom) to the victim that may enable him to perform the tasks of dominion more effectively. The criminal is “pulled down,” but the victim is also “raised up.”⁷ The motivation of the bondservant is not to be envy—pulling down the master without any compensating move upward on the part of the bondservant.⁸

6. I had never noticed a curiosity of the English language before I wrote this sentence. “Eyeless” is a term for a totally blind man, not “eyesless.” The same is true of “toothless” rather than “teethless.” We have no convenient terms for “one eye less” and “one tooth less.”

7. We have seen in chapter 37 that “pulling down” the criminal is lawful in the case of the “eye for eye” law between free men (Ex. 21:22–25). The victim can demand physical punishment of the criminal. This prerogative is unlikely to be exercised often. Men generally want capital more than physical revenge. The option of demanding physical vengeance is more important as a device for pressuring the criminal to pay what he really regards as a fair price to the victim—a payment to avoid the same injury. It creates incentive for the criminal to pay the appropriate economic compensation to the victim.

8. On the distinction between envy and jealousy (meaning covetousness), see the classic book by sociologist Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, [1966] 1970).

E. Protecting the Bondservant-Owners

The “freedom for an eye” law also protects the bondservant-owning class. This may not be immediately apparent. Consider an alternative rule: strict eye-for-eye vengeance. Let us say that a bondservant’s owner faces an unruly bondservant. He knows that he must maintain order in his household—defined in the broadest sense—and without his ability to inflict physical punishment, this particular bondservant is unlikely to respond to his commands. Inflicting physical damage on him is always risky. The bondservant might be permanently damaged. The owner might lose the production that the bondservant would otherwise have provided. Additionally, the owner might be convicted by a court of exercising illegitimate brutality, and have his own body mutilated. Nevertheless, the bondservant would not go free.

What if the bondservant finds the owner alone in a field and attacks him? How is the owner to defend himself? If he puts out the eye of his attacker, but there are no witnesses who can testify that his action was in self-defense, the bondservant has him at a disadvantage. The bondservant can claim in a court that he had been thoughtlessly or maliciously mutilated by the owner. This will not gain him his freedom, but the master will lose his eye if the bondservant loses his.

An envious bondservant might accept this loss, to “bring down” a person who possesses authority over him. After all, if the bondservant cannot gain his freedom as a result of his loss, and the master will be punished physically, then an envious bondservant might think to himself: “If I attack this man, I get even. If he defends himself and really hurts me, I can still get even. The power to inflict pain at will is transferred to me, if I’m willing to accept the risk of physical loss. The master may even be afraid to fight back, for fear of injuring himself by injuring me. I have him at a disadvantage. All I need to do is to be willing to risk the loss of my tooth or eye. I will be worse off, but so will he. He has more to lose than I do. I’m only a bondservant. I’m used to hardship. He isn’t. He will be more afraid of me than I am of him. I have the upper hand, for I have the willingness to suffer more physical damage than he does.”

The bondservants’ owners need to maintain their authority. The way that we exercise dominion is to submit ourselves to God’s law. Self-restraint leads to dominion. It is no different for bondservants’ owners. The master must be able to impose his will on the bondservant in external ways. To make more certain that the bondservant is restrained, there must be incentives for the bondservant to comply. The bondservant, no less than the master, needs self-government. The bondservant, no less than the master, needs to count the costs of rebellion. A bondservant who is granted the ability by law to inflict permanent damage on his master merely for the price of suffering the same injury, is a dangerous bondservant. If he is willing to accept the pain, and the master isn't, then the bondservant is given the upper hand. The social order of society is threatened. Power is transferred from those who will not accept pain to those who will. But power in a godly society should be based on moral authority, not the comparative ability to withstand pain. Power should be based on ethical standing before God, not tolerance for pain.

A bondservant-owner in a society whose civil law recognizes the principle of “freedom for an eye” who is attacked without witnesses present knows that he can defend himself to the utmost. If he cannot prove self-defense in the court, then the worst he will suffer is the loss of the bondservant. But at the moment a man is attacked, the thought of the removal of the bondservant from his presence is not really that repugnant to him. The bondservant-owner will not hesitate to defend himself under such circumstances. The bondservant knows this.

The freedom-seeking bondservant might think to himself: “If I attack the man in private, and he mutilates me, I can go free. I will do it. I want my freedom more than I want my tooth. On the other hand, he might punch out my eye. There are risks here. I can go free in a few years anyway. This is not a permanent position of servitude. Is it worth the possible loss of my eye to gain my freedom a few years early? I may not be able to hurt him very much, and he will not hesitate to beat me to a pulp. Is an attack worth the risk?” The bondservant counts the cost. In a Christian society governed by biblical civil law, in which servitude is not permanent, but can extend at most for seven years, will he risk forfeiting his eye for the rest of his life? He must pay a high price for rebellion-based freedom. The court may decide against him anyway and convict him of assault on the owner. Attacking the bondservant-owner in secret is a very risky act. The bondservant is restrained by the threat of physical punishment by the owner, and the court may not impose any penalty on the owner. The master is restrained, at most, by the threat of losing the bondservant. The master has the edge in this case.

F. The Foreign Slave

The foreign slave, like the committed criminal sold into permanent bondage, was in a different situation. He was not guaranteed release after a fixed period of time (Lev. 25:44–46).⁹ He therefore might have been willing to attack the slave-owner in secret, not fearing physical retribution, for the reward would be freedom. Provoking a Hebrew master to excessive punishment might have been to the advantage of a foreign slave. The price of freedom was mutilation—a price that some slaves might have been willing to pay.

1. Separation

This would have been an incentive for masters to avoid being alone with foreign slaves. In the absence of witnesses, the slave could do two evil things. First, he might attack the owner in order to cause the owner to mutilate him in self-defense. Then he could claim to be the victim. Second, he might self-mutilate himself and then claim that the owner had struck him. In the absence of witnesses, the court might decide in his favor, especially if the slave-owner had a reputation for violence. These possibilities increase the risks to an owner of being alone with a foreign slave.

By separating foreign slaves from Hebrew masters, the law also tended to separate the religious rites of foreign slaves from their masters. In the Old Testament commonwealth, there would have been fewer opportunities for Hebrew masters to learn the secret rites of demon-worshipping foreign slaves. An owner would have been more likely to have witnesses present in his dealings with foreign slaves, and therefore capital punishment for his worship of false gods would always have been far more likely. Intimate contacts between foreign slaves and Hebrew masters would have been less likely. In private, the master would have been at a disadvantage to the slave, compared to the advantage he possessed in public. The slave would have had more to gain from such contacts than the master: (1) an opportunity to attack him and provoke a freedom-producing response; (2) an opportunity to fake an attack through self-mutilation; and (3) an opportunity to convert him to the worship of the slave's hidden gods of darkness.

There are other intimacies between master and slave that would have borne great risks to the Hebrew master. Secret encounters with foreign slaves for sexual contact would have been made less likely because of the law that offered freedom to mutilated slaves. The slave might argue in court that the master had attempted to violate her (or him, in the case of sexual deviation), and when she resisted, he attacked her physically. This might actually be true; resistance by the slave might provoke a lawless master to violence. Or it could be a lie—perhaps the lie most easily believed by a court. In either case, secret associations with a foreign slave would be reduced if the “freedom for an eye” law was enforced. Only the most trustworthy foreign slave would have had access to a master in total privacy.

9. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 31.

2. The Jubilee Year

With respect to the jubilee law, which alone authorized Israelites to own permanent foreign slaves, this “freedom for an eye” law served to separate Hebrew masters from their foreign slaves. This was probably more of a protection for Hebrew masters than foreign slaves. Hebrews under the Old Covenant were highly vulnerable to the lure of foreign gods. The Old Testament laws concerning ritual pollution, which included the dietary laws, pointed to the defensive position of the Hebrews spiritually: death contaminated them ritually because theologies of death lured them repeatedly. It was only after Christ’s ministry cleansed the ground, making possible the annulment of the laws concerning ritual pollution,¹⁰ that God’s people could at last be self-confident in their offensive campaign against evil. It was only then that the conquest of the nations became ritually easy.

At that point in covenantal history, however, the jubilee laws were abolished. All of Leviticus 25 became a dead letter. This included the law allowing permanent household slavery. No longer were slaves allowed to be imported from the lands around God's people, for God's people were now enabled to extend the kingdom of God far more easily than before Christ's death and resurrection cleansed the earth ritually. There were to be no more "heathen that are round about you" nationally (Lev. 25:44); heathen would henceforth be immediately round about God's people, because God's people were to enter heathen lands, bringing the gospel and discipling the nations (Matt. 28:19).¹¹ God's people were to be in close contact with racially and culturally foreign household slaves, even in private, sometimes as brothers in the faith. At that point, the law of permanent household slavery had to go, to protect the slave-owner as much or more than to protect the slave.

10. James Jordan wrote: “In the Old Covenant, the land was perpetually defiled, and only provisionally cleansed by a variety of cleansing actions, the most prominent being the annual cleansing on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). Apart from this, the holy land of Canaan would revert to a defiled status. Within this annual provisional cleansing, there was the possibility of local, occasional defilements. . . . In the New Covenant, the land is perpetually cleansed. It is only the occasional defilement which must be dealt with. The ceremony of dealing with it is not the sacrifice of slaying an animal, or the death of a Church leader, but the ceremony of the Church’s declaring a man forgiven and permitting him to partake of the Holy Eucharist, which applies the finished sacrifice to him. Such a ceremony would be an important part of a Christian society.” James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), pp. 101–2. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>). This is why any attempt to revive the ritual slaying of animals, even as a “memorial,” is a return to the heresy of the Judaizers. Baptism and Holy Communion, not the slaying of animals, are the only memorial of rituals of cleansing that remain.

Conclusion

The goal of servitude in the Bible is liberation through self-discipline, dominion through service. This is true for both the master and the bondservant. Each must show self-restraint or else suffer penalties. A lawless, undisciplined, violent master therefore loses legal control over his bondservant. This law reminds us that the exercise of power must be governed by law; he who holds power is supposed to hold it by means of his moral authority as well as by the sword. To the extent that the master is handed the sword by the civil government, as an agent of the civil government, he is under restrictions imposed by God's law through the civil government.

This law protects slaves from lawless tyrants. It also protects masters from cost-calculating, envious, violent slaves. The penalty of losing the slave raises the price of lawlessness to the master. Simultaneously, the inability of the court to impose physical retribution on the owner restrains the envious bondservant in any attempt to "get even" with the master by provoking a physical attack on himself. By limiting the duration of debt servitude to seven years, the incentive to revolt is minimized among bondservants. An act of physical rebellion against a master which might cost the bondservant an eye is less advantageous in a society with a time limit on slavery. If bondservants wait a few years, they will keep their eyes and also gain freedom. Better to bear the rule of the master patiently.

God defines deviant behavior in His law. Individuals and societies that transgress these standards of deviance are eventually placed under God's formal judicial sanctions, in history (Deut. 8:19–20)¹² and beyond history (Matt. 25:31–46). The South was not deviant in terms of ancient historical precedent regarding permanent slavery; the North was. The fact is, the South was deviant in terms of God's written standards, for its legislators and judges honored neither Old Testament laws governing servitude nor Jesus's abolition of permanent slavery in His abolition of Israel's jubilee land tenure laws. It took a long time, but God eventually imposed His sanctions by means of Northern aggression, for the North had more closely approached the biblical norms regarding permanent slavery.

11. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

12. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

THE RANSOM FOR A LIFE

If an ox gore a man or a woman, that they die: then the ox shall be surely stoned, and his flesh shall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox shall be quit. But if the ox were wont to push [gore] with his horn in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and his owner also shall be put to death. If there be laid on him a sum of money, then he shall give for the ransom of his life whatsoever is laid upon him. Whether he have gored a son, or have gored a daughter, according to this judgment shall it be done unto him (Ex. 21:28–31).

The Bible tells us that we live in a universe that was created by God at the beginning of time and history, and that this world is sustained by Him, moment by moment. The doctrines of creation and providence are therefore linked. The universe which God created, He presently sustains. We live in a world of cosmic personalism.¹ God's answer to Job, beginning in chapter 38 and continuing through chapter 40, presents a summary of the total control of all events by God.²

In such a world, men cannot escape full responsibility for their actions. God holds them responsible for everything they think, say, and do. "But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment" (Matt. 12:36). "But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Matt. 5:28). Everything people do is done within a personally sustained, God-ordained universe (Rom. 9). They succeed or fail in terms of

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1.

2. Gary North, Predictability and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Job (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6.

God's decree. They run to God ethically, or they run away from God unethically; they cannot run away from Him metaphysically. God is everywhere; there is no escape: "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? Or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there" (Ps. 139:7–8). "Am I a God at hand, saith the LORD, and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? saith the LORD. Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the LORD" (Jer. 23:23–24).

Human action is always personal, never impersonal. First, it is personal primarily with respect to God. God is the ultimate, inescapable fact of man's environment, not sticks and stones. Second, human action is secondarily personal with respect to oneself: one's goals, choices, and assets. Third, human action is personal with respect to other human actors, both as individuals and as covenantal groups. Fourth, human action is personal with respect to the environment, which God has created and presently sustains, and over which He has placed mankind. Man's responsibility extends upward to God, inward to himself, outward toward other men, and downward toward the environment. It is comprehensive responsibility. When we speak of "responsible men," we should have this four-part, comprehensive responsibility in mind, not just one or two aspects. A person may appear to be responsible in one or two areas of his life, but whether he likes it or not, or whether he is adequately instructed or not, he is covenantally responsible before God in all four ways, and he will be held totally accountable for his thoughts and actions on the day of judgment.

A. Liability for Damages

Although God holds each person fully responsible, no agency of human government has the power to do so. This is why we must affirm as Christians that with respect to the decisions of human governments regarding men's personal responsibility, there must always be limited liability. No agency of human government is omniscient; none possesses the ability of God to read the human heart or to assess damages perfectly. We must wait for perfect justice until the day of final judgment. To insist on perfect justice from human government is to divinize that agency. It will also lead to its bankruptcy and the destruction of justice.³

3. Chapter 19.

The case laws of Exodus function as the groupings under which many different kinds of disputes over liability for damages can be classified. This has been recognized by Jewish scholars for at least two millennia. Later Jewish law created various categories of offenses subject to private lawsuits (“torts”) that were based on the case laws of Exodus. Jewish legal scholar Shalom Albeck wrote:

Four principal cases are considered: (1) where someone opens a pit into which an animal falls and dies (Ex. 21:33–4); (2) where cattle trespass into the fields of others and do damage (Ex. 22:4 [English version, 22:5]); (3) where someone lights a fire which spreads to neighboring fields (Ex. 22:5 [Eng. 22:6]); (4) where an ox gores man or beast (Ex. 21:28–32, 35–6). To those has to be added the case where a man injures his fellow or damages his property (Ex. 21:18–19, 22–5; Lev. 24:18–20). The Talmud calls the cases contained in the Torah primary categories of damage (Avot Nezikin) and these serve as archetypes for similar groups of torts. The principal categories of animal torts are: shen (tooth)—where the animal causes damage by consuming; regel (foot)—where the animal causes damage by walking in its normal manner; and keren (horn)—where the animal causes damage by goring with the intention of doing harm or does any other kind of unusual damage. The other principal categories of damage are: bor (pit)—any nuisance which ipso facto causes damage; esh (fire)—anything which causes damage when spread by the wind; and direct damage by man to another’s person or property. These principal categories and their derivative rules were expanded to form a complete and homogeneous legal system embracing many other factual situations. As a result they were capable of dealing with any case of tortious liability which might arise.⁴

The key issue is personal responsibility. Who is responsible for damages sustained, and what are the appropriate penalties? The case laws provide us with the governing standards for assigning legal responsibility for damages and the appropriate penalties.

B. Responsibility: Upward and Downward

Man’s responsibility outward and downward is seen in this section of Exodus. A man owes protection to his fellow man, which includes women, as the passage at the beginning of the chapter clearly points out. This passage also teaches that “dumb animals” under a man’s personal administration are responsible, through him, for their actions. They are responsible upward to mankind through their master, as well as outward to other beasts through their master (v. 35). Human society enforces sanctions against lawless behavior, whether in the animals or their owners. Domesticated animals are responsible to mankind through their owners, and therefore society holds the owners responsible for those animals under their control. Animals that are not domesticated—neither trained nor tamed—are to be under physical restraint, at the owner’s expense.

4. “TORTS. The Principal Categories of Torts,” in The Principles of Jewish Law, edited by Menachem Elon (Jerusalem: Keter, 1975?), col. 319. This compilation of articles taken from the Encyclopedia Judaica was published as Publication No. 6 of the Institute for Research in Jewish Law of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

1. Domesticated Beasts

The shedding of man’s blood is illegal, either by man or beast. “But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat. And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man’s brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man” (Gen. 9:4–6). The ox that gores a man to death cannot escape the sanctions of biblical law. Neither can other man-killing animals.

In the case of the ox, the animal is presumed to be domesticated, for if it were dangerous, the owner would be required to restrain it. The owner becomes legally liable because what was, in fact, a dangerous animal had been publicly treated by him as if it had been safe. The owner deliberately or inadvertently misinformed the public about the risks. He did not place restraints on it. The victim died because of the owner’s neglect. The owner should have placed restraints on the beast, or else he should have placed warnings for bystanders.

Why shouldn’t bystanders recognize that the animal is dangerous? Why are they considered judicially innocent? Don’t people know that bulls charge people and gore them? They do know, which is why the Hebrew usage, as in English, indicates that “ox” in this case must refer to a castrated male bovine. The castrated beast is not normally aggressive. It is easier to bring under dominion through training. In this sense, a castrated male bovine is unnaturally subordinate.

As an aside, the question of unnatural subordination (lack of male dominion) can also be raised with respect to the prohibition against immigrant eunuchs’ becoming citizens (Deut. 23:1). Presumably, this was because eunuchs could not produce a family, and to that extent they were cut off from the future. Rushdoony wrote (unfortunately using the present tense): "Because eunuchs are without posterity, they have no interest in the future, and hence no citizenship."⁵ This was true enough in ancient Israel, where land tenure, bloodlines, political participation (elders in the gates), and the national covenant were intermixed. The New Testament forever abolished this biological-geographical intermixture. Spiritual adoption⁶ became forthrightly the foundation of heavenly citizenship (Phil. 3:20), and therefore the only basis of church membership. The baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch by Philip the deacon (Acts 8)⁷ indicates that the Old Testament rule lost all meaning, once Jesus, the promised seed, had come and completed His work.

The goring ox is also judicially guilty. It is therefore treated as a responsible moral agent—not to the extent that a man is, of course, but responsible nonetheless. We train our domestic animals. We beat them and reward them. Modern scientists call this training "behavior modification." In other words, we deal with them on the assumption that they can learn, remember, and discipline themselves. Anyone who has ever seen a dog that looks guilty, which slinks around as if it has done something it knows is wrong, can safely guess that the dog has done something wrong. It may take time to find out what, but the search must begin. The dog knows.

2. An Ethically Unclean Beast

The goring ox is to be treated as if it were an unclean beast. It has become an ethically unclean beast. Because of its ethical uncleanness, it is still subject to this punishment in New Testament times, despite the New Testament's abandonment of the category of physical and ritual uncleanness. James Jordan commented on the biblical meaning of unclean animals.

All unclean animals resemble the serpent in three ways. They eat "dirt" (rotting carrion, manure, garbage). They move in contact with "dirt" (crawling on their bellies, fleshy pads of their feet in touch with the ground, no scales to keep their skin from contact with their watery environment). They revolt against human dominion, killing men or other beasts. Under the symbolism of the Old Covenant, such Satanic beasts represent the Satanic nations (Lev. 20:22–26), for animals are “images” of men. To eat Satanic animals, under the Old Covenant, was to “eat” the Satanic lifestyle, to “eat” death and rebellion.

5. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 100.

6. John 1:12; Romans 8:15; Galatians 4:5; Ephesians 1:5.

7. That a deacon performed this baptism, as well as many others in Samaria, creates a presently unsolved theological problem for all denominations that specify elders as the only ordained church officers with a lawful call to baptize.

The ox is a clean animal. The heifer and the pre-pubescent bullock have sweet temperaments, and can be sacrificed for human sin, for their gentle, non-violent dispositions reflect the character of Jesus Christ. When the bullock enters puberty, however, his temperament changes for the worse. He becomes ornery, testy, and sometimes downright vicious. Many a man has lost his life to a goring bull. The change from bullock to bull can be seen as analogous to the fall of man, at least potentially. If the ox rises up and gores a man, he becomes unclean, fallen. . . .

The unnaturalness of an animal’s killing a man is only highlighted in the case of a clean, domesticated beast like the ox. Such an ox, by its actions, becomes unclean, so that its flesh may not be eaten. . . .

The fact that the animal is stoned indicates that the purpose of the law is not simply to rid the earth of a dangerous beast. Stoning in the Bible is the normal means of capital punishment for men. Its application to the animal here shows that animals are to be held accountable to some degree for their actions. It is also a visual sign of what happens when a clean covenant man rebels against authority and kills men. Stoning is usually understood to represent the judgment of God, since the Christ is “the rock” and the “stone” which threatens to fall upon men and destroy them (Matt. 21:44). In line with this, the community of believers is often likened to stones, used for building God’s Spiritual Temple, and so forth. In stoning, each member of the community hurls a rock representing himself and his affirmation of God’s judgment. The principle of stoning, then, affirms that the judgment is God’s; the application of stoning affirms the community’s assent and participation in that judgment.⁸

C. Covenantal Hierarchy and Guilty Animals

“But if the ox were wont to push [gore] with his horn in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in,

8. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), pp. 122–24. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

but that he hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and his owner also shall be put to death." The owner had been warned that the beast was dangerous. (We shall consider in the next section what constitutes valid evidence of habitual goring.) He had withheld this information from the victim. How? By refusing to place adequate restraints on the beast. The victim had every reason to believe that the ox was fully domesticated, meaning that it was self-disciplined under the general authority of its owner. Again, it is self-government under God's law which is the crucial form of government.

The Bible is unique in establishing the judicial requirement of self-government to beasts in general. Any beast is to be held accountable if it kills a human being. (Maimonides made one exception regarding a domesticated beast: it is not responsible if it kills a heathen, meaning a gentile.)⁹ Since the days of Noah, they have had the fear of man placed in them by God (Gen. 9:2). A beast must somehow suppress this fear—an internal warning from God—in order to kill a man. Beasts are responsible creatures; they are to be hunted down and killed for this form of rebellion. Some domesticated beasts are responsible outward to other beasts, upward to man, and, through their masters, upward to God.¹⁰

The Bible deals with the liability problem by making owners personally responsible for the actions of their animals. If their animals cause no problems, there will be no penalties. The more dangerous the animals, the more risky the ownership. Clearly, Exodus 21:30 is a case-law application of a general principle regarding the responsibilities of ownership. The principle can be extended to ownership of other animals besides oxen, and also to related instances of personal financial liability for damages in cases not involving animals.

The law makes it clear that the owner may not profit in any way from the evil act of the beast. He is not permitted to salvage anything of value. The beast is stoned—the same death penalty that a guilty human would receive—and the owner does not receive the carcass. Its flesh may not be eaten (v. 28). The beast is treated as if it were a human being. Its evil act brings death—not the normal killing of oxen, which allows owners to eat the flesh or sell it to those who will, but the death of the guilty. The guilty beast is no longer part of the dominion covenant. It can no longer serve the economic purposes of men, except as an example. It has to be cut off in the midst of time, just as a murderer is to be cut off in the midst of time.

9. "If an ox kills a person anywhere, whether an adult or a minor, a slave or a free-man, it incurs death by stoning whether it is innocuous or forewarned. However, if it kills a heathen, it is exempt in accordance with heathen law." Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1954), "Laws Concerning Damage by Chattels," I:X:1, p. 36.

10. The incomparable biblical example of upward responsibility of an animal toward man is Balaam's ass. "And the ass said unto Balaam, Am not I thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day? Was I ever wont to do so unto thee? And he said, Nay" (Num. 22:30).

1. Why Stoning?

J. J. Finkelstein discussed at considerable length the question of the stoning of the ox. While similar laws regarding the goring ox are found in many ancient Near Eastern law codes, the Hebrew law was unique: it specifically required stoning of the ox that kills any human being, even a slave. Finkelstein concluded that this requirement testified to the ox's crime as being of a different order than the crime of its negligent owner. It pointed to treason, a rebellion against the cosmic order, a crime comparable to a Hebrew's enticing of a family member to worship foreign gods, which was also to be punished by stoning (Deut. 13:6–11). It was an offense against the whole community, and the whole community is therefore involved in the execution.

The real crime of the ox is that by killing a human being—whether out of viciousness or by an involuntary motion—it has objectively committed a de facto insurrection against the hierarchic order established by Creation: Man was designated by God 'to rule over the fish of the sea, the fowl of the skies, the cattle, the earth, and all creatures that roam over the earth' (Gen. 1:26, 28). Simply by its behavior—and it is vital here to stress that intention is immaterial; the guilt is objective—the ox has, albeit involuntarily, performed an act whose effect amounts to "treason." It has acted against man, its superior in the hierarchy of Creation, as man acts against God when violating the Sabbath or when practicing idolatry. It is precisely for this reason that the flesh of the ox may not be consumed.¹¹

Finkelstein traced this biblical law forward into the Middle Ages. In medieval Europe, trials for animals were actually held by the civil government. Defense lawyers in secular courts were hired at public expense to defend accused beasts. Witnesses were called. Guilty animals were destroyed as a civic act. In some cases, they were publicly hanged.¹² Few people know about this side of European history, although specialized historians have known all along. Some of the great minds of Western philosophy, including Aquinas and Leibniz, attempted to explain this practice rationally.¹³ Yet the specialized historians have generally remained silent, and few professional historians have ever heard of such goings-on, nor are they aware that in ancient Athens, the courts tried inanimate objects, such as statues that had fallen and killed someone. If convicted, the object was banished from the city.¹⁴ Why the silence? Why don't these stories get into the textbooks? As Humphrey asked: "Why were we never told? Why were we taught so many dreary facts of history at school, and not taught these?"¹⁵

11. J. J. Finkelstein, The Ox That Gored (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1981), p. 28.

He answered his own question: modern historians can make little sense out of these facts. There seems to be no logical explanation for the way our ancestors treated guilty animals. What is a guilty animal, anyway—a legally convicted guilty animal? How can such events be explained? Finkelstein cited the theory of legal scholar Hans Kelsen that such a practice points to the "animism" of early medieval Europe, because to try an animal in court obviously points to a theory of the animal's possession of a soul.¹⁶ Kelsen said that this reflects early Europe's older primitivism. Finkelstein then attacked Kelsen's naive approach to an understanding of this practice. In contrast to primitive societies, it is only in the West that such legal sanctions against offending animals have been enforced. "Only in Western society, or in societies based on the hierarchic classification of the phenomena of the universe that is biblical in its origins, do we see the curious practice of trying and executing animals as if they were human criminals."¹⁷ Then he made a profound observation: "What Kelsen has misunderstood here—and in this he is typical of most Western commentators—is the 12. A painting of the hanging of a pig in Normandy in 1386 appears on the cover of the 1987 reprint of E. P. Evans's 1906 book, The Criminal Prosecution and Capital Punishment of Animals (London: Faber & Faber). The painting shows the pig dressed in a jacket. The original edition is here: <http://bit.ly/CrimPros>.

13. Nicholas Humphrey, Foreword, ibid., p. xviii.

14. W. W. Hyde, "The prosecution of animals and lifeless things in the middle ages and modern times," University of Pennsylvania Law Review (1916). Finkelstein was somewhat suspicious of these accounts.

15. Humphrey, "Foreword," p. xv.

16. Finkelstein, Ox That Gored, p. 48. He cited Kelsen, General Theory of Law and State (1961), pp. 3–4.

17. Finkelstein, op. cit., p. 48.

sense, widespread in primitive societies (as, indeed in civilized societies of non-Western derivation), that the extra-human universe is autonomous and that this autonomy or integrity is a quality inherent in every species of thing.”¹⁸ Because Western society long denied such autonomy to the creation, it has in the past adhered to the biblical requirement of destroying killer animals; in Europe, they were even given a formal trial.

2. Expiation

What none of the scholars discusses is the need for expiation, a need which is both psychological and covenantal. The animal's owner and the community at large, through its representatives, must publicly disassociate themselves from the killer beast. They must demonstrate publicly that they in no way sanction the beast's murderous act. There is an Old Testament precedent for the need for this sort of formal expiation: the requirement in ancient Israel that civic officials sacrifice a heifer when they could not solve a murder that had taken place in a nearby field (Deut. 21:1–9). “So shalt thou put away the guilt of innocent blood from among you, when thou shalt do that which is right in the sight of the LORD” (v. 9). In New Testament times, we no longer need to sacrifice animals (Heb. 9, 10), but the need for formal procedures for the expiation of the crime of man-killing is still basic. To ignore this need is to unleash the furies of the human heart.

The medieval world understood this to some degree, however imperfectly; the modern humanistic West does not understand it at all, and seeks to deny it by abolishing any trace of such ritual practices. We cannot make sense of the so-called “primitive folk practices” of medieval and early modern Western history that dealt with this fundamental civic and personal need, and so we refuse even to discuss them in our history books. We execute murderers in private when we execute them at all. (In the state of Massachusetts in the early 1970s, the median jail term served by a murderer was under two and a half years.)¹⁹ Humanist intellectuals seek to persuade the public that society is itself ritually guilty for maintaining the “barbarous” practice of capital punishment.

18. Ibid., p. 51.

19. James Q. Wilson, Thinking About Crime (New York: Basic Books, 1974), p. 186.

D. Personal Liability and Self-Discipline

The convicted owner of the habitually goring ox in Exodus 21:28 implicitly misinformed the ox's victim. He had known that the ox had been violent in the past, yet he did not take steps to restrain it. The beast was roaming around as if it had no prior record of violence. The victim did not recognize the danger involved in being near the beast.

The Bible does not reveal in these passages regarding goring oxen the evidence that constituted judicially binding prior knowledge. What kind of information did the owner have to possess in order for the court to declare him guilty? The rabbinical specialists in Jewish law said that the animal had to have gored someone or other animals on three occasions before the owner became personally liable.²⁰

1. Maimonides' Exposition

Maimonides spelled it out in even greater detail: any domesticated animal must first kill three heathen (gentiles), plus one Israelite; or kill three fatally ill Israelites, plus one in good health; or kill three people at one time, or kill three animals at one time.²¹

This is an excessive number of prior infractions in order to activate capital sanctions. Subsequent victims need more protection than these Talmudic rules would provide. It is far more reasonable to conclude that a single prior conviction should suffice to identify the beast as dangerous. What should be obvious in any study of traditional Rabbinic laws regarding killer oxen is the extent to which the rabbis would go in order to exempt the owners. Maimonides's example is remarkable, found in Chapter 10 of the first treatise on torts, "Laws Concerning Damage by Chattels."

11. No owner need pay ransom unless his animal kills outside his premises. But if it kills on his premises, then although it is liable for stoning, the owner is exempt from paying ransom. Thus if one enters a privately owned courtyard without the owner's permission—even if he enters to collect wages or a debt from the owner—and the householder's ox gores him and he dies, the ox must be stoned, but the owner is exempt from paying ransom since the victim had no right to enter another's premises without the owner's consent.

12. If one stands at the entrance and calls to the householder, and the

20. Albeck, Jewish Law, col. 322.

21. Maimonides, Torts, "Laws Concerning Damage by Chattels," I:X:3, p. 36.

householder answers, “Yes,” and he then enters and is gored by the householder’s ox and dies, the owner is exempt, for “Yes” means no more than “Stay where you are until I speak to you.”²²

He even exempted the owner of a notorious ox that has gored a pregnant woman whose child is born prematurely. “For Scripture imposes liability to pay the value of such infants on humans only.”²³ Because the ox did it, and is not a human, its owner is exempt; the transfer of liability upward to the owner is cut short, because the ox cannot be held responsible. He did admit that if the ox gores a pregnant bond-woman, and the same thing happens, the owner is financially liable in this case, “for this is as if the ox gored a she-ass about to foal.”²⁴ Oxen are responsible for damaging other animals, so this responsibility is transferred upward to owners, unlike the previous case.

On the other hand, Maimonides was very hard on the animal associates of a condemned criminal ox. “If its trial has been concluded and it then becomes mixed with other oxen—even with a thousand others—all must be stoned and buried and are forbidden for use, as is the rule concerning any animal condemned to be stoned.”²⁵ Owners of friendly oxen were forewarned by Maimonides: don’t let your law-abiding beasts fall in with bad company!²⁶ (After reading Maimonides’s Code in detail, this gentile begins to suspect that pre-modern Rabbinic reasoning regarding the case laws is very different from his own.)

2. Re-Sold Ox

We know that an ox that had gored another ox had to be sold by its owner to a third party (Ex. 21:35). Thus, to be the owner of an ox that had been convicted of goring, he would have had to go out and repurchase the offending ox, or else he is the person who bought the

22. Ibid., I:X:12, pp. 38–39.

23. Ibid., I:XI:3, p. 40.

24. Ibid., I:XI:4.

25. Ibid., XI:10, p. 41.

26. What Maimonides and the rabbis failed to understand is this: the guilt of a murderous animal is covenantal, not metaphysical. The evil that the animal has committed is not passed to other animals by mere physical contact or proximity. The evil act of the animal was rebellion against the fear of man that God places in every animal’s heart (Gen. 9:2). It had trespassed the moral boundaries that God placed in its heart. Maimonides was more concerned about the boundary between the convicted animal and other animals than with the boundary inside the animal between it and mankind, and the physical boundary between the animal and his last three human victims.

offending ox. In either case, he had taken active steps to buy a known offender. To have done this, and then to have refused to take active measures to restrain it, should make him legally vulnerable to the charge of negligence.

Would other evidence rather than a prior conviction be a sufficient warning? What if neighbors had reported the beast to the authorities? If the authorities had issued a formal warning to the owner, would this serve as evidence of its status as a habitual offender? If we answer yes, then this raises the issue of “innocent until proven guilty.” There had been no proven evidence against the beast. Perhaps neighbors were hostile to the ox’s owner, and reported false information. On the other hand, perhaps they were telling the truth, and the owner was negligent in not taking steps to restrain the ox.

The easiest way to resolve the issue is to rely on the biblical principle of the double witness (Deut. 17:6). If two different witnesses each reports a different infraction—neither of the infractions had a double witness—then the authorities must issue a warning to the owner. This formal warning can then serve as evidence in a future trial.

3. David Daube’s Judicial Subjectivism

David Daube, dazzled by the legerdemain of biblical higher criticism, argued that this law was written much earlier than the law in Exodus 21:35–36. He argued that there was a strict rule of evidence in this instance: a formal warning given to the owner of the ox. “This means that the judge need not examine whether or not you were really clear on the point—which might be difficult for him to discover. He need only examine whether or not the necessary announcement was made to you—a very easy thing to find out. If the announcement was made, you are responsible for everything that has happened since; and it would be no excuse to say that you personally had not believed that the ox was so savage. If no announcement was made, you are not responsible even if you yourself had seen all the time how dangerous the ox was.”²⁷ The decision of the judge is to be made “on a strict, archaic, ‘objective’ kind of proof,” Daube said. Notice his characterization of objective proof as archaic. He contrasted this supposedly archaic legal rule with a supposedly more advanced rule of law that governed the supposedly later law of Exodus 21:35–36.

27. David Daube, Studies in Biblical Law (Cambridge: At the University Press, 1947), p. 87.

The judge does not raise the freer, more advanced, “subjective” question: Did you or did you not know about the nature of the ox? Now in the other, later paragraph, on the case where your ox kills an ox, we do get this “subjective” element. No mention is here made of the necessity of a formal announcement: the responsibility is yours from the moment you are aware, or should be aware, that your ox is not to be trusted. At this more advanced stage of the law, the judge must investigate the affair much more closely; he must, above all, search men’s hearts. If he reaches the conclusion that you knew the beast was dangerous, he will find you guilty even though no announcement was ever made to you in the matter.²⁸

Daube did not discuss the differing criteria of evidence in terms of the differing impact of the crime and differences in the resulting liability: the death of a human being vs. the death of someone else’s ox. He failed to recognize that the formal criteria that govern evidence of liability in the case of an ox that kills another ox are less rigorous, because the crime is less damaging. In a case of an ox that slays another ox, biblical law does not require that a formal warning be given by the authorities to the owner; prior general knowledge is sufficient to convict: “Or if it be known that the ox hath used to push [gore] in time past, and his owner hath not kept him in; he shall surely pay ox for ox; and the dead shall be his own” (Ex. 21:36). Public knowledge rather than a formal complaint to the civil authorities is sufficient to convict the owner in this instance. It can be safely assumed by the judge that if the public knew about the beast’s habits, then the owner must have known. In contrast, the potential liability of the owner is far greater when an ox kills a human being. It is too dangerous to allow the judge to make his ruling in terms of the assumption of general knowledge. By requiring more rigorous standards of evidence, biblical law restrains the discretionary authority of the state’s representative in the more serious cases of negligence. This restrains the state.

Daube ignored this explanation in order to argue that the later rule was chronologically later in Israel rather than merely later in the biblical text. He also argued that the later rule was governed by a more mature concept of legality, a legal development that allows the judge to search the hearts of the disputants. He is a faithful representative of contemporary humanism: a man who weakens men’s confidence in the integrity of God’s revealed word and the reliability of His law, and thereby strengthens the arbitrary power of the state.

28. Ibid.

Daube's view of the state is the modern humanist's view: the state as an agency that possesses the judicial authority and obligation to search men's hearts, and to render formal judgment in terms of its findings. This view of state power asserts that the state possesses an ability that only God possesses: the ability to know man's heart. The prophet Jeremiah asked rhetorically: "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?" (Jer. 17:9). His answer was clear: "I the LORD search the heart, I try the reins, even to give every man according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings" (Jer. 17:10). The human judge can make causal connections based on public evidence, but he cannot search the defendant's heart. Any assertion to the contrary necessarily involves an attempt to divinize man, and in all likelihood, divinize man's major judicial representative, the state.

4. The Economics of Negligence

We know from the text that the ox's owner had been warned about the dangerous ox, yet he did nothing visibly to restrain it. Why would an owner neglect a warning from someone else regarding the threat of his ox to others? There are several possible reasons. First, he may not trust the judgment of the person bringing the warning. The beast may behave quite well in the owner's presence. Is he to trust the judgment of a stranger, and not trust his own personal experience? But once the warning is delivered, he is in jeopardy. If the beast injures someone, and the informant announces publicly that he had warned the owner, the owner becomes legally liable for the victim's suffering.²⁹

Second, the owner may be a procrastinator. He fully intended to place restraints on the ox, but he just never got around to it. This does not absolve him from full personal liability, but it does explain why he failed to take effective action.

Another reason for not restraining the ox is economics. It takes extra care and cost to keep an unruly beast under control. For example, over and over in colonial America, town records reveal that owners of pigs, sheep, and cattle had disobeyed previous legislation requiring them to pen the beasts in or put rings in their noses. Apparently, the authorities were unable to gain compliance, for this complaint was

29. Because a serious penalty could be imposed on the liable owner, the informant would have to have proof that he had, in fact, actually warned the owner of the beast's prior misconduct. Otherwise, the perjured testimony of one man could ruin the owner of a previously safe beast which then injured someone.

continual and widespread throughout the seventeenth century.³⁰ The costs of supervising the animals or maintaining fences in good repair were just too high in the opinion of countless owners. Even putting a ring in the beasts' noses, making it easier for others to put a rope through the ring and pull a beast home or to some other location, was simply too much trouble.³¹ Boston imposed stiff fines on the owners of wandering animals, which helped to reduce the problem.³²

In one case, the unwillingness or inability of a woman to control her wandering pig literally changed the political history of the United States. Litigation over the ownership of a wandering pig between Goodwoman ("Goodie") Sherman and the well-to-do Boston merchant, Robert Keayne, led in 1644 to a deadlock in the General Court (legislature) of Massachusetts between the deputies, who were direct representatives of the people (who favored Sherman, and the magistrates (who favored Keayne). The result was the division of the two groups into separate legislative houses—the origin of bicameralism in America.³³ As Bridenbaugh noted, "The frequency with which the hog appears in town records is mute proof that despite many 'good and sufficient' measures the problem was never solved, and the bicameral legislature of Massachusetts remains a monument to its persistence."³⁴ Passing laws is not sufficient. Sanctions must be imposed that alter human behavior.

E. Limited Liability

The Bible imposes liability on owners of animals known to be dangerous. Penalties are imposed that vary according to the nature of the infraction and the degree of prior knowledge by the owner. These pen-

30. Carl Bridenbaugh, Cities in the Wilderness: The First Century of Urban Life in America, 1625–1742 (New York: Capricorn, [1938] 1964), pp. 19, 167, 323.

31. In my research on my doctoral dissertation on colonial American Puritanism, I came across no case where an owner was executed for the act of his beast, nor do I recall locating an example where heavy restitution was paid to a victim.

32. Bridenbaugh, Cities in the Wilderness, p. 168.

33. On the "sow" incident, see Charles M. Andrews, The Colonial Period of American History, 4 vols., The Settlements (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1934] 1964), I, pp. 450–51. Cf. Gov. John Winthrop, Winthrop's Journal: "History of New England," 1630–1649, ed. James Kendall Hosmer, 2 vols. (New York: Barnes & Noble, [1908] 1966), II, pp. 64–66, 120–21.

34. Bridenbaugh, Cities in the Wilderness, p. 19. I put a question mark in the margin of my book upon first reading it. I had not yet heard of the Keayne-Sherman conflict, and Bridenbaugh never explained what he meant. Scholars can sometimes be too cryptic.

alties are intended to reduce uncertainty about potentially violent beasts. By extending the principle of legal liability, we can derive principles of liability for owners of inanimate objects.

Man is a limited creature. His knowledge is therefore limited. Because his knowledge is limited, God limits man's legal liability. Man is not to be judged by standards that could apply justly only to an omniscient being. If a state seeks to impose perfectionist standards of liability, the legal system will cease to function. It will begin to produce unjust decisions, and there will be an increase of uncertainty and also an increase of arbitrary decisions—precisely what biblical law is designed to prevent. Such judicial uncertainty would make economic decision-making prohibitively expensive. The economy would be threatened.

Consider the case of a potentially dangerous beast that broke its rope or knocked down a restraining fence in Old Testament Israel. The owner would be in the same position as a man who was using an axe which he thought was safe. The axe head flew off and killed someone. This was a case of accidental manslaughter. Immediately, the man would have fled to a city of refuge, in order to escape the dead man's avenger of blood. At that point, the avenger of blood would have demanded a trial, and the elders of the city would have held it. If judged guilty of premeditated murder, the guilty man would have been delivered up to the avenger. If judged innocent, he would have had to remain in the city until the death of the high priest (Num. 35:22–28).

1. A Broken Rope

Consider the dangerous beast in our day. It breaks its restraining rope and kills someone. The victim's heirs sue the owner. They argue that the owner should have used a more sturdy rope. If convicted, the owner then has to prove that the rope's manufacturer was the true culprit. The court then investigates the rope manufacturer. Should he be held liable? To defend himself, he charges the hemp growers with selling a substandard product. Each stage in the case gets more technical and more expensive. The quest for perfect justice is suicidal. It increases the costs of litigation to such an extent that real victims cannot ever afford to attain restitution, for the case never ends. The courts become clogged with expensive cases that can never be resolved by anyone other than God. Only the lawyers profit. God's law does not exist in order to create employment for lawyers.

A state that attempts to impose standards of personal responsibility that imply omniscience and omnipotence will eventually make life impossible. Sometime before civilization grinds to a strangled halt, however, the bureaucrats will back down or else there will be a revolution which removes these messianic standards of personal and corporate responsibility from the law books. The price of perfect liability laws, like the price of perfect justice, or the price of a risk-free society, is death.³⁵ Such justice will be available only at the end of history. At that point, it will not only be available, it will be inescapable.

This passage therefore has implications for the concept so popular in modern economies, that of limited liability. The modern corporation is protected by limited liability laws. In case of its bankruptcy, creditors cannot collect anything from the owners of the corporation's shares of ownership. The corporation is liable only to the extent of its separate, corporate assets.

2. Legitimate Limitations

Certain kinds of economic transactions that limit the liability of either party, should one of them go bankrupt, are valid. For example, a bank that makes a loan to a church to construct a building cannot collect payment from individual members, should the church be unable to meet its financial obligations. It can repossess the building, of course, something that few banks relish doing. It is bad publicity, and a church building is a kind of white elephant in the real estate world: only churches buy them, and almost all of them are short of funds. This is why bankers prefer to avoid making loans to churches, other things being even remotely equal.³⁶

The same sorts of limited liability arrangements ought to be legally

35. It should be understood that the selection of "socially appropriate risk" is like any other selection process: it involves subjective valuation and "aggregation" through politics and market forces of the "socially appropriate" mixture of risk and productivity. See Mary Douglas and Aaron Wildavsky, Risk and Culture: An Essay on the Selection of Technological and Environmental Dangers (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982).

36. A wise banker would recommend to the church's officers that church members refinance their homes or assume debt using other forms of collateral, and then donate the borrowed money to the church. This ties the loans to personal collateral that a banker can repossess without appearing to be heartless. It makes church members personally responsible for repayment. (Co-signed notes are also acceptable from the banker's point of view, but questionable biblically: e.g., prohibitions against "surety.") Members cannot escape their former financial promises by walking away from the church. It also keeps the church out of debt as an institution, which is godly testimony concerning the evil of debt (Rom. 13:8a).

valid for other kinds of associations, including profit-seeking corporations,³⁷ limited partnerships, or other private citizens who can get other economic actors to agree voluntarily to some sort of limited liability arrangement. For example, a “daredevil” who accepts a very dangerous job, such as putting out an oil well fire, is probably willing to release his employer from all legal damages in case he gets killed. He is paid more than a normal wage for his services in order to compensate him for the risk. A normally dangerous job, such as uranium mining or handling radioactive substances, may carry with it an economic obligation to release the employer from any responsibility for injury or death. The very existence of the danger keeps other workers from applying, thereby lowering the competition and keeping economic wages higher than would have been the case, had the job been safe. The laborer is compensated fairly. He gets more money for being willing to bear greater risk. Without the limited liability provision, the employer might not be willing to employ anyone. The dominion assignment might not be completed in this field until some new technological development reduces risk. Some tasks in life cannot be actuarially insured at a profit, but this does not mean that they should not be performed by people who are aware of the risks and who agree to “self-insure” themselves.³⁸

3. Other Cases

On the other hand, consider the case of citizens who once lived

37. Robert Hessen, In Defense of the Corporation (Stanford, California: Hoover Institution, 1979). I disagree with R. J. Rushdoony's condemnation of limited liability. See Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995), Part III, ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/rjrpogap>). What persuaded me that he was incorrect here was a careful consideration of the legal implications of the imposition of unlimited personal liability of church members for the decisions of pastors and church officers. Could the church function if every member were made potentially liable to the limits of his capital for the illegal activity of the church's officers?

38. After the fatal explosion of the launch vehicle of the Challenger space shuttle in January of 1986, it was revealed that the seven military-employed “astronauts” had been required by the government to forego all but minimal life insurance benefits as a condition of participating in the launch. The one civilian, a school teacher, had been given anonymously a one-trip life insurance policy for a million dollars, insured by Lloyd's of London. Months later, the heirs of four of the astronauts received payments totaling $7.7 million, or about $1.9 million per family. (Gold: $350/oz.) The federal government paid 40% of this, and the firm that constructed the rocket paid 60%. This was a political decision; the actual figures paid were kept secret by the government, and only became public 15 months later when legal action was taken by seven news organizations. New York Times (March 8, 1988).

near an atomic bomb test site. They were assured by government officials (who were presumed to be knowledgeable and therefore were legally responsible) that there were no excessive risks involved in remaining where they were, when there is evidence that these officials knew or should have known about the risks. The citizens who sustain long-term radiation-related injuries as a result of the explosion have every reason to sue and collect from the federal government, even if those officials cannot be located today, or are dead. It is the policy of deliberate misinformation (“disinformation”) concerning risks which is the issue. The civil government cannot escape these responsibilities. “I was just following orders,” is no excuse for some bureaucrat’s deliberately misinforming the civilian victims.

There are other cases that are more difficult to assess. A chemical firm buries toxic wastes. It uses means that are at the time of burial believed to be safe by private health experts or government health officials—people whose tasks are part of the quarantine function of the civil government (cf. Lev. 13, 14).³⁹ The firm’s managers have not deliberately misinformed anyone. Neither have public health officials. They acted with good intentions to the best of their ability, according to the best technical knowledge generally available at the time of the decision. They are like a man who ties up a dangerous beast with a rope generally believed to meet standards of strength, but which snaps unexpectedly, allowing the beast to escape and injure or kill someone.⁴⁰ Men are limited creatures; they cannot be held to be liable for every unforeseen act. This was also the conclusion of the rabbinical experts of Jewish law.⁴¹

F. “Ransom” Insurance

The Bible provides only one explicit example of a capital crime that can be punished either by execution or a fine: this one. Murder has to be punished by the death penalty (Num. 35:31). In this case, the ox is executed, so the general principle of “life for life” is maintained. Genesis 9:4–6 is not violated by Exodus 21:28–30. The owner, because he is not directly guilty of committing a capital crime, although fully

39. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 9.

40. Chapter 52.

41. Wrote Shalom Albeck: “The foreseeability test as the basis of liability for damage led the rabbis to conclude that even where negligent the tortfeasor would only be liable for damage that he could foresee.” Principles of Jewish Law, col. 322.

responsible before the law for the actions of his beast, can escape execution. It is not stated that the judges make this decision: death or restitution. The victim's family probably makes this decision. Perhaps both judges and family do.⁴² Restitution is owed to the relatives, as heirs of his estate; legally, the payment is made to the dead victim. The economic incentive of the family is clear: money is more useful than the death of the ox's owner.

The restitution payment normally would be high. A man has to pay. There is no escape. If he cannot pay what is demanded, either through liability insurance, personal capital, or selling himself into slavery, then he dies. Restitution is mandatory.

1. Liability Insurance

The development of personal liability insurance is one way that Western society has dealt with the problem of the catastrophic judgment. The question then arises: Should criminal negligence be covered? The civil government must face the questions raised by economic analysis. If the criminal is criminally negligent, yet covered by liability insurance, can the insurance firm be forced by law to pay, even if its contract with the convicted person says that it must? Is a third-party payment to the victim in the name of the criminal an immoral contract and therefore illegal? Does it reduce the economic threat of personal bankruptcy to such an extent that criminal negligence is thereby subsidized? Is criminal negligence a legitimate event to insure against? Should such contracts be made illegal—not just unenforceable in a court of law, but illegal?

There is another problem. If the “deeper pocket” of the insurance company is available for the victim's family to reach into, will they demand “all the traffic will bear,” irrespective of justice? If the owner were not insured, would the victim's family ever demand such a high restitution payment? In the absence of insurance, the victim's heirs would probably have to limit their demands. Question: Should judgments be based on the merits of the case or the “depth of the pocket” of the insurance company?

2. Limiting the Insurer's Liability

To sell personal liability policies, insurance companies have to limit their liability. They do so by placing maximum monetary limits on all pay-outs. They also limit their liability by insuring people who have reputations for being reliable. High-risk buyers raise the premiums that low-risk buyers are forced to pay. There is an economic incentive for companies to seek out lower-risk buyers for any given type of policy. They can insure a special class of higher-risk people, but only by charging all members high premiums. Eventually, they run out of volume sales when they seek out more and more high-risk buyers. They eventually stop selling policies to the highest-risk people.

42. Finkelstein, Ox That Gored, p. 29.

Personal liability insurance, to be profitable, must be sold to a particular class of insurable people. The very concept of “insurable class” refers to a group of people to whom the actuarial laws of probability apply. Groups to which these laws do not apply cannot be safely and profitably insured by private firms selling voluntary policies. Thus, insurance companies attempt to sell to people who are members of a large, insurable class.⁴³ Insurance firms limit their risk by enlarging the number of policy buyers within a particular large class. They do not want to be bankrupted by one or two large settlements; to avoid bankruptcy, they must sell large numbers of policies. The larger the number of policy holders, the closer the “fit” between the actuarial laws—“laws of large numbers”—and the actual number of cases in which the company must pay victims of negligence.

Liability insurance therefore will cover occasional cases of criminal negligence, for any given policy holder may occasionally be criminally negligent. For example, personal liability coverage on automobile drivers covers those rare cases in which a driver may be criminally negligent.⁴⁴ But the firms will not insure people who have received numerous traffic tickets for speeding, and especially for drunk driving. It is true that high-risk drivers can purchase automobile and liability insurance, but only because state governments require the auto insurance industry to set up high-risk pools for otherwise uninsurable drivers do the companies sell policies to these people. Today’s civil governments are requiring private firms to insure people who are more likely to be regarded by the courts as criminally negligent. These laws reduce political pressures from those classified as criminally negligent; they continue to be allowed to drive. The states also avoid having to set up taxpayer-financed insurance programs for the high-risk drivers—programs that might bring complaints from low-risk drivers who also vote. The legislators require all drivers to carry personal liability policies—“ransoms for lives”—but they also require insurance companies to sell high-risk drivers this coverage.

43. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), pp. 107–9. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

44. Some policies may exclude such coverage. It is in the self-interest of policy-buyers to read the fine print of their insurance contracts before they buy.

If the legal system did not compel the purchase of auto insurance, or strongly encourage it by requiring visible evidence of a driver's ability to self-insure himself, the insurance firms would be trapped. They could not easily pass on to low-risk drivers the added costs of insuring high-risk people. Low-risk drivers are forced by the state to pay higher premiums for their policies than would have been the case had the high-risk drivers been refused coverage and thereby forced off the roads. Without this compulsion, they would not purchase the policies. The companies would then suffer losses because of the reduced sales. In fact, they do suffer some losses; some buyers drop coverage and drive illegally. The sellers cannot pass on all the additional costs to buyers.⁴⁵

Thus, the concern about criminals' being able to escape justice because of private insurance contracts is misplaced. The greater problem is the civil government's demand that people who are more likely to be convicted of negligence be covered by insurance, whether or not they are insurable by private firms on a voluntary basis. It is not that the state allows insurance companies to pay “ransoms for the lives” of negligent people; it is rather that the state compels private firms to sell such coverage to people or firms that are more likely to be convicted of negligence.

G. The State as Insurer

The state even enters as the “insurer of last resort” when no private firms will insure extremely high-risk people or industries. One example in the United States—which is common in Western industrial nations, though not in Japan⁴⁶—is the government-guaranteed cov-

45. Part of these costs are passed on to uninsured or under-insured drivers who would have liked the coverage but who cannot afford the higher premiums. Also, the company's shareholders bear some of these costs. They suffer capital losses because the companies cannot sell policies to all those who would be willing to buy policies if the costs were lower. It is erroneous to argue that higher costs can be passed on to customers indiscriminately or at zero cost to companies. See Murray N. Rothbard, Power and Market: Government and the Market Economy, 4th ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1970] 2006), pp. 110–16. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardPaM>)

46. H. Peter Metzger, The Atomic Power Establishment (New York: Simon &

erage for accidents connected with the generation of electricity through nuclear power. Power companies are government-licensed public utilities that possess regional monopolies. The “Price-Anderson” legislation of the 1957 set relatively low ceilings for financial liability by such firms—$560 million per accident.⁴⁷ The federal government collects the premium money. In 2010, this limit was $375 million to be covered by the plant’s insurance. The company has to insure the next $112 million. The purchasing power of the dollar in 2010 was approximately eight times less than in 1957. Above this payout, the industry must insure $10 billion. Anything above this will be covered by the Federal government. Because of this federal legislation, public utilities were able to expand the use of nuclear power generation. In this sense, today’s nuclear power industry has not been the product of a free market economy; it has been the product of special-interest legislation in the form of liability maximums and compulsory state insurance coverage.⁴⁸

Liability insurance is another example of a free market, scientific development that protects the victims without bankrupting those who are personally responsible. The victims receive more money than the private, uninsured citizen or firm would otherwise have been able to pay. The lifetime income loss suffered by the family of the victim is compensated by the insurance company. The negligent person still could be executed, should the plaintiffs desire it, but it is far more likely that they would prefer to accept money from the insurance firm.

Schuster, 1972), p. 218.

47. Idem.

48. Anti-nuclear power advocates tend to be anti-free market, and usually blame the free market for the nuclear power industry. Nuclear power proponents usually are pro-free market, so they seldom talk about the statist nature of the subsidy. But when the chips are down, the pro-nuclear power people accept federal subsidies to their program as being economically and ideologically valid. Wrote nuclear power advocate Petr Beckman: “Yes, the American taxpayer has paid $1 billion to research nuclear safety, and I consider that a good investment. . . .” Beckman, The Health Hazards of NOT Going Nuclear (Boulder, Colorado: Golem Press, 1976), p. 154. He also argued that the Price-Anderson insurance program makes money for the federal government because power companies pay premiums to Washington, along with money sent to private insurance pools. “You call that a subsidy?” he asks rhetorically (p. 156). Of course it is a subsidy. The premium rates are far below market rates, even assuming private firms would insure against a nuclear power plant disaster, which is doubtful. The maximum liability is fixed by law far below what would be demanded in a court if some major nuclear accident took place in a populated area. This is why the Price-Anderson legislation was enacted in the first place: to subsidize the power industry by reducing its legal liability and its insurance rates.

The “ransom for a life” is higher; thus, the guilty person is more likely to survive. This extends the dominion covenant; the victim’s family carries on, but the guilty man suffers no loss of capital, except possibly his ability to buy insurance subsequently.

Does the state have a biblically sanctioned right to compel people to buy liability insurance or else proof of sufficient capital to make restitution? In the case of drivers’ liability insurance, where death and serious injury to innocent parties are common, and the drivers are using the state’s highway system, the answer is yes. The state can establish rules and regulations for drivers who wish to qualify to use its highways. One of these regulations is liability insurance. Another requirement might be an annual auto safety inspection.⁴⁹ The automobile is like a large beast; if it becomes dangerous through neglect by its owner, innocent people can be killed. Insurance companies can be used as screening agents. They may be able write cheaper policies for those who drive inspected automobiles.

Other forms of liability insurance should not be mandatory, unless the situation is comparable to the “dangerous beast in a state-owned place” analogy, but civil government should recognize the legitimacy of the victim’s heirs to call for the execution of the criminally negligent party. This would encourage people to buy sufficiently large personal liability insurance policies so that the victim’s heirs would have a strong financial incentive to allow the guilty man to live.

H. The Goring of a Slave or a Child

“If the ox shall push [gore] a manservant or a maidservant; he shall give unto their master thirty shekels of silver, and the ox shall be stoned” (Ex. 21:32). Normally, the death penalty could be imposed on the owner of the ox. In this case, however, the penalty was fixed by law: 30 shekels of silver.

The wording here is peculiar. To “push” means, in this instance, to kill. In verse 29, “push” did not mean to kill. “But if the ox were wont to push with his horn in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in. . . .” Had “to push” meant “to kill,” the ox would have been executed upon conviction. An ox that killed

49. This assumes that there is statistically valid evidence that state-mandated auto inspections do in fact reduce accidents and injuries. This evidence is frequently unclear. What is clear is that such legislation provides an initial increase in the net worth of those who are granted the licenses to perform these inspections, and that a continuation of such laws brings a stream of rents to those who possess these licenses.

someone was stoned to death (v. 28). Thus, “push” in verse 29 had to mean something other than killing. But with respect to servants, the word “push” or “gore” is used in the sense of “gore to death.” This is why the ox is executed: a human being has died.

Why the comparatively small penalty?⁵⁰ Why is the death of a servant dealt with less severely? Because the servant’s owner has not suffered a loss comparable to the loss suffered by the heirs of a free man or woman. He has lost part of an investment in human capital—one which he would have had to part with after a set term of years. He has not suffered the loss of a relative. The primary issue is covenantal. The owner has not suffered a covenantal loss; he has suffered only an economic loss. He is not entitled to place penalties on the owner of the goring ox larger than the economic penalty specified by law.

1. Slave

If a male bondservant had brought a wife and children into the household of the owner, they would now go free, which serves them as a form of compensation. The master would have recouped his investment from the owner of the ox, thereby freeing the slave’s heirs from further service.

What if the deceased bondservant had married after becoming a bondservant? In this instance, the heirs probably would have had the option of either remaining as servants in the owner’s household or going free. Whether they would go free or not would depend on the size of the penalty payment to the bondservant’s owner, compared to what he had paid for the bondservant. If the death occurred shortly before the bondservant was to have gone free, then the penalty payment would have constituted an overpayment, and the extra money probably would have functioned as a release price for the wife and children of the bondservant. But if the penalty payment was approximately what the owner had spent to pay off the bondservant’s debt—the original cause of his going into slavery—then the bondservant’s family would have remained with the owner, as specified in Exodus 21:4.

An interesting connection can be seen between the death of Christ on the cross and the death of the gored servant. Jordan commented on this connection:

As we have seen, our Lord Jesus Christ was born into the world

50. Thirty pieces of silver were a lot of money in terms of what they could buy, but not compared to what the victim’s heirs could normally impose.

as a homeborn slave-son, for His incarnation was His ear's circumcision. On the cross, he was made sin for us, and thus came under condemnation of death. He became an abject slave, that we might be elevated into the status of adopted slave-sons. He was killed by the wild beasts, the lions of paganism, and the apostate unclean goring bulls of Israel: "Many bulls have surrounded Me; strong ones from Bashan have encircled me. They open wide their mouth at me, as a ravening and a roaring lion. . . . Save Me from the lion's mouth; and from the horns of the wild oxen Thou dost answer Me" (Ps. 22:12, 13, 21). Thus, the price given for Christ's death was the price of the gored slave, thirty pieces of silver (Matt. 26:15). At His resurrection, however, our Lord overcame the bulls and trampled on the silver for which He was sold: "Rebuke the beasts of the reeds, the herd of bulls with the calves of the peoples, trampling under foot the pieces of silver; He has scattered the people who delight in war" (Ps. 68:30). Thus, Judas found no joy in his silver, and it was used to buy a burying field for dead strangers, pagans destroyed by the wrath of God (Matt. 27:2-10).⁵¹

2. The Goring of a Child

"Whether he have gored a son, or have gored a daughter, according to this judgment shall it be done unto him" (Ex. 21:31). This is an important biblical principle: the imposition of a fine rather than the execution of the ox's owner or his child (a pagan practice of the ancient Near East). The Bible places this example under the general rule that allows the substitution of a fine for the death of the owner. This means that the evil practice of the ancient Near East, killing a man's child if he kills another man's child, is prohibited.⁵² The Hammurabi Code specified: "If a builder constructed a house for a seignior, but did not make his work strong, with the result that the house which he built collapsed and so has caused the death of the owner of the house, that builder shall be put to death. If it has caused the death of a son of the owner of the house, they shall put the son of that builder to death."⁵³ This sharp difference from Babylonian law would appear to be an application of the principle of Deuteronomy 24:16: "The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin.”

51. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, pp. 127-28.

52. Dale Patrick, Old Testament Law (Atlanta, Georgia: John Knox Press, 1985), p. 78.

53. Code Hammurabi, paragraphs 229-30. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), p. 176.

Conclusion

The Bible establishes the principle of cosmic personalism as the foundation of the universe.⁵⁴ There is no way that men can escape their responsibilities before God. Because biblical law recognizes this principle, it establishes the judicial principle of restitution to victims by the negligent. The general rule is: an eye for an eye, a life for a life.

The Bible affirms the principle of limited liability before men. The state is not God. It cannot know every aspect of historical causation. Neither can men. The state therefore cannot lawfully impose unlimited liability on those convicted of negligence, irrespective of their knowledge, decisions, and contractual arrangements.

In this unique instance, the case of a dangerous ox that kills a person, the guilty owner can legitimately escape death, though his beast cannot, because the victim’s heirs are allowed to impose an economic restitution payment on the negligent individual. This law of criminal negligence is much broader than simply oxen and owners; it applies to all cases of death to innocent parties that are the result of negligence on the part of owners of notorious beasts or notorious machinery—capital that is known to be risky to innocent bystanders. Automobiles, trucks, certain kinds of occupations, nuclear power plants, coal mines, and similar examples of dangerous tools are covered by this general principle of personal liability.

This law should not be understood as applying to workers who voluntarily work in dangerous callings and who have been warned in advance of the risks by their employers, nor should it be used as a justification for the creation of a messianic state that attempts to discover criminal negligence in every case of third-party injury, despite the lack of knowledge of risks by the owners or experts in the field.

Personal liability insurance is a development of the West that allows criminally negligent people a greater opportunity to escape the death penalty by means of high payments to the heirs of their victims. Purchasing such insurance is not to become mandatory, except in cases related to the use of state-financed capital (e.g., highways). Nevertheless, the risk is so high—execution—and the cost of premiums so low in comparison to the risk, that personal liability coverage is available to most people. Only the very poor, who would not normally own

54. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 1.

“oxen” (expensive capital equipment), or people convicted repeatedly of criminal negligence or actions that would lead to convictions for criminal negligence (e.g., drunk driving), or people who manage or own businesses that create high risks for innocent bystanders, would normally be excluded from the purchase of such insurance coverage. They would have to learn to handle their “oxen” with care.

41

THE UNCOVERED PIT

And if a man shall open a pit, or if a man shall dig a pit, and not cover it, and an ox or an ass fall therein; the owner of the pit shall make it good, and give money unto the owner of them; and the dead beast shall be his (Ex. 21:33–34).

The theocentric principle here is God's ownership of the world. He has delegated temporary ownership of the portions of world to individuals, families, and institutions. An owner of one piece of land is not to extend his dominion over his portion of the allocated capital at the expense of another person's property. To do so is an attempt to profit at someone else's expense.

Here is another variation of the restitution principle. A man digs a pit for some reason, and fails to cover it. This is negligent behavior. He knows that unsuspecting people or animals could fall into the pit and be harmed. His failure to go to the expense of covering the pit is an example of what economists call "externalities." He imposes the risk of an injured beast on the owner of the beast. By saving time and money in not covering the pit, he thereby transfers the economic burden of risk to someone else. This is a form of theft. Someone who cannot benefit from the use of the pit is expected to pay a portion of its costs of operation, namely, the risk of injury to any animal that might fall into it. This is the meaning of economic "externalities": those who cannot benefit from an economic decision are forced to pay for part of the costs of operation.

Biblical civil law settles the question of property rights and the responsibilities of ownership. Because the Bible affirms the rights of private ownership—meaning legal immunities from interference by either the state or other agencies in the use of one's property—it therefore imposes responsibilities on owners. The law regulating uncovered pits is not an infringement on private property rights. On the contrary, it is an affirmation of such rights. By linking personal economic responsibility to personal, private ownership, biblical civil law identifies the legal owner of the pit, namely, the person who is required to pay damages should another person's animal be killed by a fall into the unsafe pit. He receives some sort of advantage from the pit, and therefore he must bear the expense of making it safe for other people's animals.

A. "Pit" in Rabbinical Literature

"Pit" is a classification used for centuries by the rabbis to assess responsibility and damages. The Mishnah specified that any pit ten handbreadths deep qualifies as deep enough to cause death, and therefore is actionable in cases of death. If less than this depth, the pit is actionable in case of injury to a beast, but not if the beast died.¹ Wrote Jewish legal scholar Shalom Albeck:

This is the name given to another leading category of tort and covers cases where an obstacle is created by a person's negligence and left as a hazard by means of which another is injured. The prime example is that of a person who digs a pit, leaves it uncovered, and another person or an animal falls into it. Other major examples would be leaving stones or water unfenced and thus potentially hazardous. The common factor is the commission or omission of something which brings about a dangerous situation and the foreseeability of damage resulting. A person who fails to take adequate precautions to render harmless a hazard under his control is considered negligent, because he is presumed able to foresee that damage may result, and he is therefore liable for any such subsequent damage.²

Samson Raphael Hirsch, the brilliant mid-nineteenth-century Jewish Torah commentator, analyzed the economics of negligence under the general heading of property, and property under the more general classification of guardianship. "Man, in taking possession of the unreasoning world, becomes guardian of unreasoning property and is responsible for the forces inherent in it, just as he is responsible for the forces of his own body; for property is nothing but the artificially extended body, and body and property together are the realm and sphere of action of the soul—i.e., of the human personality, which rules them and becomes effective through them and in them. Thus is the person responsible for all the material things under his dominion and in his use; and even without the verdict of a court of law, even if no claim is put forward by another person, he must pay compensation for any harm done to another's property or body for which he is responsible."³ The guardian is always responsible before God for the administration of everything under his legal authority.

1. Baba Kamma 5:5, The Mishnah, ed. Herbert Danby (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. 338.

2. "Avot Nezikin: (2) Pit," The Principles of Jewish Law, edited by Menachem Elon (Jerusalem: Keter, 1975?), col. 326. This compilation of articles taken from the Encyclopedia Judaica was published as Publication No. 6 of the Institute for Research in Jewish Law of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Hirsch went so far as to say that our willingness to indemnify a victim is not enough, morally speaking; we must take care not to allow damage in the first place. "Once you have done harm the only thing you are able to do is to pay compensation; you can never undo the harm and wipe out all its consequences."⁴ A righteous person should become a blessing for those around him. "You, with all your belongings, should become a blessing; be on your guard that you and your belongings do not become a curse! Watch over all your belongings so that they do no harm to your neighbour!" And also what you throw away or pour away—see to it that it do no harm; you ought to bring good, so do not bring evil!"⁵ Thus, our economic responsibility is an active responsibility. We must actively seek to avoid harming others. It is within this moral framework that the Bible discusses the uncovered pit.

B. Animals and Children

This case law deals specifically with animals. It does not mention people. Why not? Because the pit is almost certainly located on the land of the person who digs it. An animal that wanders onto the man's property has no understanding of private property rights. Presumably, no fence has restrained it from coming onto the property. If a fence is present, then the animal would have to knock it down to get onto the property. The damage to the fencing would then be the responsibility of the owner of the animal. He should have restrained his animal. The fence in such an instance serves as the legal equivalent of a cover. But unrestrained access to the area of the uncovered pit places the responsibility on the land-owner. An animal is not expected to honor the law against trespassing.

3. Samson Raphael Hirsch, Horeb: A Philosophy of Jewish Laws and Observances, trans. I. Grunfeld (New York: Soncino, [1837] 1962), pp. 243–44, paragraph 360.

4. Ibid., p. 247, paragraph 367.

5. Ibid., p. 248, paragraph 367.

What holds true for an animal is also true for a young child. If the child is not restrained by a fence or a cover over the pit, then the owner is liable. Like an ox with a reputation for violence, so is the uncovered pit. The owner is responsible. The parents of a child who is killed by a fall into an uncovered pit are entitled to the same restitution as the heirs of a victim of an ox that was known to be dangerous.

A responsible adult who comes onto another person's property and falls into a pit has to have a legitimate reason for being there. If the uncovered pit is located on a path over which a visitor might normally pass, and the pit is not easily visible, then the owner becomes legally responsible. The visitor, in this instance, is like a dumb animal: he is not aware of special prohibitions against walking in the vicinity of the uncovered pit. But if the visitor has climbed over a fence and is wandering over the property in the dead of night, where he has no reason to be, then the owner is innocent. If the intruder ignores "No Trespassing" signs, he is also unprotected by the "covered pit" law. He is not to be treated in a literate culture as if he were a dumb animal. Albeck commented: "If the bor [pit] (i.e., the hazard) is adequately guarded or left in a place where persons or animals do not normally pass, such as one's private property, no negligence or presumed foreseeability can be ascribed and no liability would arise."⁶

The pit-digger is required to reimburse the owner of the dead beast. The latter can then buy a replacement for the dead animal. The pit-digger becomes the owner of the dead animal. In Israel, he could have sold it or eaten it, because it died of a known cause; it did not die "of itself," which would have made it forbidden meat for Israelites (Deut. 14:21). The pit-digger does not suffer a total loss.

In modern times, people build swimming pools on their property. These are certainly uncovered most of the swimming season. They are holes in the ground. Are these the modern equivalent of a pit? No. A pit is a hole in the ground that is not expected. It is not readily visible. A swimming pool has a cement deck around it. It may have a diving board. It is plainly visible in the back yard. It is anything but inconspicuous. Besides, if an animal falls into it, it will swim out. If a small child falls into it, liability could be imposed on the owner only under the "railed roof" statute (Deut. 22:8),⁷ not under the "uncovered pit"

6. Albeck, "Pit," Principles of Jewish Law, col. 326.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 54.

statute. The pool is a place of entertainment and recreation, just as flat-roof housetops were in the ancient world. It is not a pit which men stumble into unexpectedly. The so-called “attractive nuisance” problem—a dangerous object to which small children are attracted—falls under the railing statute.

C. Public “Pits”

There are areas of life that are almost always the responsibility of the civil government. Highways are one example. If people are to use the highways, they need protection, both as drivers and pedestrians. The civil government erects stop signs and stop lights; it places other road signs along the highways, so that drivers can drive more safely and make better high-speed decisions. Similarly, residential areas and school zones are restricted to slower traffic. This protects pedestrians and home owners who would otherwise face the continual threat of high-speed vehicles that are difficult to control in tight quarters.

1. Speed Laws

The posting of a speed limit is essentially the same as a private citizen who posts a “no trespassing” sign, or a “beware of dog” sign on his property. The sign serves as a substitute for the “cover for the pit”; the sign, like the cover, is a device for protecting the innocent. Where children in cities are forced to cross busy streets, local governments hire crossing guards to control traffic and help younger children across the street. Sometimes, older students in a grammar school serve as unpaid crossing guards in a safety patrol. In some communities, fenced, overhead ramps are built across busy highways. The fence serves as a means of protection for (1) pedestrians who might fall off the overpass and (2) motorists who face risks from vandals who would drop heavy rocks onto the passing cars beneath. But fences are expensive, and they cannot be built in every residential area. Thus, the civil government establishes speed limits, and it posts signs that warn drivers of these limits.

A philosophy of nearly risk-free existence would impose speed limits of no more than a few miles per hour on all drivers, except perhaps on specially designed highways. But voters, who are both pedestrians and drivers, would not long tolerate such utopian restrictions. In most places in the United States, voters drive far more hours during the day than they walk. So, they will not allow defenders of the rhetoric of risk-free living to have their way. They make judgments as individuals that legislators must respect in the aggregate: speed limits that meet the needs of voters, both as drivers and pedestrians, or the parents of pedestrians. Once the speed limit is posted, people make personal adjustments, both as drivers (by slowing down to approach the legal limit, but letting pedestrians look out more for themselves) and as pedestrians (by reducing their watchfulness about cars, so long as cars are moving at or near the posted limit). Voters compromise: slower speeds close to schools, but faster speeds on highways.

Drivers who violate these limits are increasing the statistical risks of walking in a neighborhood. Residents believe that they have been granted a degree of safety by the authorities—not perfect safety, because automobiles are still permitted in the area, but calculable safety. They use the streets and sidewalks in terms of this greater degree of safety. But pedestrians and other (slower) drivers are threatened by those who refuse to honor the posted speed limit. They have made decisions in terms of a given environment (“25 m.p.h.”), and a law-breaker unilaterally alters this environment. He has, in effect, torn down the protective fencing. He has “uncovered the pit.”

2. Fines and Restitution

What is the proper remedy? Most communities impose fines for excessive speeding, with the fines proportional to the violations: a higher fine for a higher speed. Can a fine be justified biblically? Yes. The fine is imposed because a specific victim cannot be identified. No one was injured by the speeding vehicle. Therefore, the civil government collects a restitution payment in the name of all the victims who had their lives and property threatened by the speeder’s act.

A statistically measurable risk of injury was transferred by the speeder to those in the area of his speeding vehicle. This is another case of “externalities”: people are being forced by the speeder to bear risks involuntarily. The fines should be used to establish a trust fund for future victims of “hit and run” auto accidents, where the guilty party cannot be located and/or convicted. The perpetrator of this “victimless crime” becomes a source of restitution payments for the subsequent victims of this same criminal act by an unconvicted agent. Fines are therefore an acknowledgement by the authorities of the limits placed on their knowledge. If law enforcement authorities were omniscient, all restitution payments in a biblical society would go from the known criminal to the known victim.

Fines should be imposed by local authorities for a specific purpose: to make restitution payments to victims who reside in the same general neighborhood. The civil government acts as a trustee for future victims in cases where the authorities cannot locate or convict the violator. Fines are not to be regarded as a normal source of revenue for the civil government. The civil government must enforce biblical law without prejudice. The bureaucrats' fond hope of collecting municipal operating revenues from fines creates prejudice. In a biblical commonwealth, taxes are supposed to finance civil government—predictable taxes that are collected from every responsible adult in a community. Citizens must know what law enforcement is really costing them. Setting up "speed traps" along the highway so that non-residents can be forced to finance the local government is a gross perversion of the function of the fine. This subsidizes local bureaucrats rather than assisting future victims.

3. Drunk Drivers

An individual who deliberately distorts his own perceptions is implicitly attacking God and his God-created environment.⁸ He is saying by his actions that God has not been fair to him in placing him in such an environment. He then makes decisions under the influence of alcohol or drugs. These decisions can physically damage others because of his self-induced distorted perceptions. Drunk drivers are therefore to be prosecuted as criminally negligent, should their acts cause damage. They have "torn off the pit cover" with impunity. Their injury-inflicting acts are not to be considered as accidents, meaning low-probability events that cannot reasonably be predicted in advance in the life of any specific individual. Their injury-inflicting actions are rather the product of an act of moral rebellion: the implicit denial of their own personal responsibility for their actions.

Drunk drivers impose increased statistical risks on their potential victims. The victim or the heirs must be given the legal option of imposing a heavy restitution payment, under the guidance of the judges. Where there is no victim, the drunk driver must pay the fine.

8. Obviously an exception is the person who has accepted an anesthetic in order to reduce his pain. Thrashing around in agony during a medical operation clearly reduces the likelihood of a successful operation. But such people are always placed under medical observation and supervision. They are not legally responsible agents during their period of distorted perceptions.

Repeated convictions for drunk driving indicate moral rebellion. Here is a person who has the equivalent of a notorious ox: the lawless “beast” is inside him. Worse: he is responsible in a way that a beast is not. He has moral insights concerning the consequences of his acts that a beast does not possess. The authorities can legitimately “tie him up” by revoking his right to operate a vehicle until he has demonstrated his continued sobriety for a fixed period of time. Like a notorious ox that must be fenced until it becomes self-disciplined, so is the drunk driver, or the repeat speeder, or the driver who drives under the influence of drugs. There may not be identifiable victims, but there are certainly statistical victims whose interests need protection.

The same principles of economic analysis that apply to speeding and drunk driving can be applied to other areas of life in which the state is the primary protector of life and limb. Fines to the civil government should be imposed on convicted violators only in cases where the civil government is acting as a trustee for future unknown victims.

D. Political Hypocrisy

The problem today is that society refuses to accept the morally and legally binding nature of Old Testament legal principles of criminal negligence. First, legislators do not consistently make “pit owners” legally liable for damages, as the Bible requires. The most flagrant example is the failure of state and local governments to impose stiff fines on all drunk drivers, and capital punishment on drunk drivers whose unsafe driving leads to someone else’s death. Furthermore, politicians do not impose fines on themselves or city employees for failing to repair public streets with potholes which cause damages to people’s cars or which cause accidents.

Second, politicians pass safety laws (or allow the bureaucracy to define and then enforce earlier laws) whose costs to the general public are not immediately perceptible. Politicians may require automobile companies to install seat belts that buyers do not want to pay for, and which occupants subsequently refuse to use, but politicians are not about to pass a law that would impose fines on families for refusing to install smoke detectors in their own homes. The first piece of legislation would not gain the reprisal of voters; the second probably would. In short, they pass pieces of legislation with minimal political and statistical impact (for good or evil) in terms of the utopian principle of “better to spend millions of dollars than to suffer one dead victim,” but fail to honor it in statistically relevant cases because of the equally relevant (to them) political backlash they would receive from voters. The proclamation of the “better millions of dollars than. . .” principle has been, is, and will continue to be the product of economic ignorance and political hypocrisy.

This is not to say that it is always wrong to require owners to pay more in order to save lives, but the Bible provides us with the proper guidelines, not some hypothetically universal utopian principle that would necessitate the creation of a messianic state. The general principle is simple: those who own a known dangerous object are legally responsible for making it safer for those who are either immature or otherwise unwarned about the very real danger.

Conclusion

Ownership is a social function.⁹ There is a link between the costs and benefits of lawful ownership. He who benefits from the use of private property must also bear the costs of ownership. He cannot legitimately pass on the costs to other people who have not voluntarily agreed to accept these costs. He is also responsible for the risks of physical damage that he imposes on them without their prior knowledge and consent.

The pit-digger must cover the pit or be responsible for the consequences. The owner of an unpenned notorious ox is equally responsible. Beasts are not expected to understand property rights; the owner must fence his property, or cover his pit, or pay restitution to the dead beast’s owner. He cannot legitimately pass on the risks associated with uncovered pits to his neighbors.

The civil government has an analogous responsibility to protect those who use the property which belongs to, or is administered by, the state. Thus, speed limits, crossing guards, and school safety patrols are created. Patrol cars monitor traffic in neighborhoods. Fines are collected from speeders and other traffic violators. Why fines? Because there are limits on the knowledge of law enforcement authorities; thus, fines are used as a way to collect restitution payments from known violators, and to make payments to victims of unknown violators.

Responsibility is personal, and it involves every area of authority exercised by any individual. The civil government has the obligation of setting forth principles of judicial interpretation that will prevail in any civil court. The court will look at the circumstances surrounding the injured party, and determine who was responsible. If the property owner was attempting to pass on involuntarily to innocent third parties the risks of ownership, the court will find the owner guilty. All property owners know this in advance, and they can take steps to reduce their legal risks by reducing involuntary risks borne by innocent third parties.

9. Gary North, “Ownership: Free but Not Cheap,” The Freeman (July 1972). (<http://bit.ly/OwnFree>) Reprinted in Gary North, Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 28. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

The Bible does not warrant the establishment of a huge bureaucracy to define every area of possible risk, promulgate minute definitions of what constitutes unlawful uses of property, and describe in detail every penalty associated with a violation. The Bible certainly does not indicate that the civil government is warranted to step in and proclaim a potentially injurious action illegal, except in cases where the violator could not conceivably make restitution to all the potential victims (e.g., fire codes) or in cases of repeated violations (the “notorious ox” principle). The Bible simply reminds property owners of the consequences of creating hazards to life and limb for third parties who are not consulted in advance concerning their willingness to bear the risks. The property owner is assumed to be competent to make judgments for himself concerning the consequences of his actions, and then take the steps necessary to reduce these risks.

KNOWLEDGE, RESPONSIBILITY, AND THE PRESUMPTION OF GUILT

And if one man's ox hurt another's, that he die; then they shall sell the live ox, and divide the money of it; and the dead ox also they shall divide. Or if it be known that the ox hath used to push [gore] in time past, and his owner hath not kept him in; he shall surely pay ox for ox; and the dead shall be his own (Ex. 21:35–36).

The theocentric focus of this law is God's omniscience. Man does not possess this attribute. Omniscience is a noncommunicable attribute of God. Delegated ownership imposes responsibility in terms of knowledge. The greater is a person's knowledge, the greater is his responsibility (Luke 12:47–48).¹

The crucial fact in these verses is that two different sorts of offending oxen are dealt with: a previously peaceful ox and a notorious ox. Because of these differences, the penalties differ. The question is: Why?

A. A Domesticated Beast

An ox is a domesticated work animal. It is under the dominion of its owner. The owner therefore incurs certain responsibilities for the behavior of his animal. The animal is to refrain from attacking man or other animals of its own species. The owner must take steps to train the animal to respect the life and limbs of others, or else he is to restrain its ability to inflict such injuries.

The concept of a domesticated animal points to the ability of men to train and discipline lower species. Animals are responsible to man, and by implication, to God. The owner of a dangerous beast must see to it that others in the vicinity do not become involuntary risk-bearers as a result of the animal's lack of self-discipline. To create judicial incentives for owners of oxen to train or restrain their beasts, the Bible sets forth principles of economic responsibility.

1. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

Say that a man's previously passive ox gores another ox to death. Because the ox has gored another animal, but not a human, it is not to be killed by the original owner. It is to be sold to a third party. The third party who subsequently buys it may kill it if he wishes; if he does, he reduces his risks of ownership. The ox has become a notorious ox. There are risks associated with the ownership of such a beast. There are costs of fencing it or restraining it in some fashion. The new owner may decide not to keep it alive.

There is also no biblical law that restricts the original owner from making an offer to buy back (redeem) the ox from the third party, but the law requires that the beast be sold initially.

The case of the notorious ox is different. The owner is fully responsible, exactly as the owner of the uncovered pit is responsible. This case law presumes that for the owner to be liable, the notorious beast not be penned in or otherwise restrained, just as in the case of the notorious ox that gores a human (Ex. 21:29). The owner has to pay the full value of the dead beast to the beast's owner. Again, he is allowed to keep the dead animal. He is also allowed to keep the offending animal.

Why isn't the offending animal stoned to death for killing another beast, as would be required in the case of an unpenned notorious ox that gores a man or woman to death? The reason should be clear to anyone who understands the implications of the dominion covenant. An ox is responsible upward, toward man. It suffers the death penalty for killing a man. The innate fear of man, which is in all animals (Gen. 9:2), serves as a restraining factor, a kind of "fence" that the animal knows it must not break through. By killing a man, the ox has demonstrated that it actively transgressed this God-imposed restraint. It is therefore rebellious and deserving of death. It is acting like the serpent of Genesis 3, and therefore it suffers a judicial penalty. But it is not held responsible "to the death" for killing another animal. It is not "responsible outward," toward other beasts. Its owner is responsible for its behavior "outward," not the ox.

B. Who Pays?

Who pays for damages? The owner of the surviving ox pays. Under normal circumstances, the individual who is legally and financially responsible is the owner of the offending ox that initiated the attack. But there is a problem here. Whose beast took the initiative? Can this be determined in a court of law? Were there witnesses? Can we understand the motivation of oxen? These questions are almost self-explanatory. The assessment of which animal “started it” is most problematic. The ox cannot be placed under oath and cross-examined.

The Bible’s solution is to divide the proceeds from the sale of the surviving animal, and to divide the carcass of the dead one. Each owner has an incentive to maximize the proceeds from the sale of the survivor, because both of them gain an equal share of the sale price. The owner of the dead beast cannot come before the judges and claim that his beast was worth ten times as much as it really was worth. The judges do not have to call in specialists in assessing retroactively the value of dead cattle. They can leave it to both owners to settle their differences. Each man has an incentive to get the transaction over with. Neither can trick the other (or the judges) as to the former value of the dead beast. The market then reveals the live beast’s value.

The dead beast is also worth something. The Old Testament rules prohibiting the sale of unclean dead beasts (Deut. 14:21; Lev. 17:15) do not apply in the New Covenant era. Even under the Old Covenant, the beast could be sold to a resident alien gentile (Deut. 14:21b). Today, the beast can lawfully be sold to Jew or gentile if the carcass meets public health standards. Each owner receives an equal share of the returns.

What if a run-of-the-mill bull kills a champion? The owner of the champion suffers the greater loss. But because it cannot easily be determined which bull initiated the violence, the court is not required by God to examine the detailed question of what is owed to the owner of the dead beast. This law implicitly recognizes the limitations on courts in assessing responsibility in the case of the behavior of animals. Owners of prize animals are forewarned to take care of their property.

C. Jewish Law: Whose Ox Is Gored?

The Mishnah makes some exemptions to this law. “If an ox of an Israelite gored an ox that belonged to the Temple, or an ox that belonged to the Temple gored the ox of an Israelite, the owner is not culpable, for it is written, The ox of his neighbour [Ex. 21:35]—not an ox that belongs to the Temple.”² This is most peculiar. One would think that if any ox was to be protected by the threat of damages imposed on the owner of the killer ox, it would be an ox belonging to the temple. Why the word “neighbor” excluded the temple is not explained.

The Mishnah continued: “If an ox of an Israelite gored the ox of a gentile, the owner is not culpable. But if the ox of a gentile gored the ox of an Israelite, whether it was accounted harmless or an attested danger, the owner must pay full damages.”³ Almost a millennium later, Maimonides agreed: he exempted the Israelite owner from being required to pay damages, whether or not he was forewarned about his beast, if his ox gores an ox belonging to a heathen. He added reasons for the Mishnah’s discriminatory law. The “heathen do not hold one responsible for damage caused by one’s animals, and their own law is applied to them.” (This is truly preposterous, and he offers no evidence.) On the other hand, the heathen is fully liable, whether or not he was forewarned, if his ox gores the ox of an Israelite. Why? Because “should they not be held liable for damage caused by their animals, they would not take care of them and thus would inflict loss on other people’s property.”⁴ This is a classic example of different laws for different residents, in open violation of Exodus 12:49.⁵

Maimonides argued that if the ox was unowned at the time of the goring, and is subsequently appropriated by someone else, before the plaintiff can seize it, the new owner is not liable for previous damages.⁶ This would leave the victim without recourse, and it would leave the animal immune from judgment, for it would not serve as payment—ox for ox—for the damages it caused. (Rabbi Judah had early argued that “A wild ox, or an ox belonging to the temple, or an ox belonging to a proselyte who died are exempt from death, since they have no owner.”)⁷

2. Baba Kamma 4:3, The Mishnah, ed. Herbert Danby (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. 337.

3. Idem.

4. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1954), “Laws Concerning Damage by Chattels,” I:VIII:5, p. 29.

5. Chapter 14.

6. Maimonides, Torts, I:VIII:4, p. 29.

7. Baba Kamma 4:7, Mishnah, p. 337. The Talmud also specifies that the ox had to have gored on three previous occasions for the owner to become personally liable: Shalom Albeck, “TORTS. The Principal Categories of Torts,” in The Principles of Jew-

Even more incredibly, Maimonides argued that if the existing owner renounces ownership after the goring takes place, but before the trial, “he is exempt, for there is no liability unless the ox has an owner both at the time it causes the damage and at the time the case is tried in court.”⁸ This would destroy personal legal liability in the most serious cases. The owner would be allowed to separate himself retroactively from the social responsibilities of ownership, as if ownership of a physical object were all that is involved in ownership, and not also the legal immunities and legal responsibilities that are inescapably bound up with possession of the object. Maimonides did not say that the victim may not demand that the beast be destroyed or sold in order to compensate him. He did say that if the owner sells the animal, the victim can collect compensation from the animal, and the buyer must reclaim damages from the defendant.⁹

Maimonides also added that the testimony of certain witnesses is invalid: slaves, shepherds, children, and women. “One must not think that because only slaves, shepherds, or similar persons are generally found in horse stables, cattle stalls, or sheep pens, these should be heard if they testify that one animal has caused damage to another, or that children or women should be relied on if they testify that one person has wounded another or if they testify about other types of damage.”¹⁰

The Christian commentator finds little that he can appeal to in confidence in Jewish laws regarding the goring ox. It is no better in the case of the notorious ox. How many occurrences establish a pattern of habitual action? How many gorings need to take place before the beast is identified as a notorious beast? It was the opinion of Rabbi Meir that the court should identify as an “attested danger” any ox against which three separate proven accusations of damage have been brought in the past.¹¹ Maimonides did not indicate how many accusations were required, unlike the Mishnah and Talmud, but he indicated that it must be more than one. “An animal is called mu'ad, ‘forewarned,’ with respect to actions which it does normally and habitually, and tam, ‘innocuous,’ with respect to actions which it does only exceptionally and which are not normally done by members of its species—as, for ex-ish Law, edited by Menachem Elon (Jerusalem: Keter, 1975?), col. 322.

8. Maimonides, Torts, I:VIII:4, p. 29.

9. Ibid., I:VIII:6, p. 29.

10. Ibid., I:VIII:13, p. 31.

11. Baba Kamma 1:4, Mishnah, p. 333.

ample, if an ox gores or bites. If an animal, having acted abnormally once, makes it a habit to repeat the abnormal action on numerous occasions, it becomes 'forewarned' with respect to the particular action which it has made a habit. For Scripture says, Or if it be known that the ox was wont to gore (Exod. 21:36).¹²

We need better guidelines than this.

D. The Notorious Ox

Responsibility is more easily assessed by a court in the case of an ox that was known in the past to be a violent animal. The owner had been given a previous warning concerning the behavior of the beast under his jurisdiction. Perhaps the court had convicted this beast of a prior violation; perhaps witnesses had independently complained to the civil authorities, who then had issued the owner a formal warning. There is no indication in the text that three warnings are required; one warning should be sufficient to persuade the owner to take additional steps to restrain his beast. From the time of the warning, it becomes the owner's responsibility to keep the beast penned in or in some way restrained from inflicting damage on others.

This case law applied to an owner who chose to keep possession of the beast. Thus, he simultaneously chose to bear the additional risks associated with the behavior of that particular beast. The owner also chose not to take the time and trouble necessary to restrain the beast. This is his lawful decision. No one is sent by the civil government to inspect the quality of the fence or the strength of the rope around its neck. But its owner is prohibited by biblical law from passing on these now-known risks of ownership to innocent third parties. Self-government under law—written laws with specified, predictable sanctions—is the biblical standard, not a legal order based on a top-down bureaucratic enforcement system.

The judicial problem with this rule regarding the notorious ox is its vagueness: How much information is enough? The Bible says that if the ox was known to gore in the past, it becomes for legal purposes a notorious beast. Known by whom? By the owner, certainly. But how can this knowledge be proven in court to have been in the possession of the owner? Only through previous publicly provable complaints registered by neighbors, either to the owner or the public authorities, or by a single prior conviction of the beast. If the owner has publicly provable evidence that the ox gored someone in the past, he becomes legally liable.

12. Maimonides, Torts, I:I:4, pp. 4–5.

Obviously, if the beast has gored on several occasions, it is a known offender. But society needs to defend the property of those victims of the beast in the meantime. This passage of Scripture establishes that the issue of legal liability in the case of the damage-producing actions of a dangerous domestic animal is to be established in terms of the judges' ability to assess comparative knowledge between the plaintiff and the defendant. The owner is presumed to have better information concerning his beast's behavior than an outsider possesses. Thus, a single proven case of previous bad behavior on the part of an ox places its owner at risk judicially.

"Or if it be known that the ox hath used to push [gore] in time past, and his owner hath not kept him in; he shall surely pay ox for ox" (Ex. 21:36). What is the meaning of "ox for ox"? In the previous case of a beast whose dangerous behavior had not been a matter of public knowledge, the owner of the dead beast does not receive a replacement ox. He only receives half of the proceeds of the sale of the live ox and the dead ox's carcass. But this case is different. The goring beast is known to have gored in the past. The owner of the dead ox is to be fully reimbursed, "ox for ox."

Does this mean that the owner of the dead beast is simply to be given the surviving ox? This would be a very unlikely interpretation. First, the surviving ox is now a known renegade. It is a menace, as the owner of the dead ox knows only too well. The owner of the survivor therefore would be transferring ownership of a high-risk beast to the owner of the victim. But a high-risk property always commands a lower sale price than a low-risk property, for obvious reasons. The buyer has to be compensated for the added liability he is accepting by purchasing the high-risk property.

Second, the market value of the dead beast may be far higher than the transgressing survivor, irrespective of the risk factor. Perhaps the dead beast was a prize-winning beast. The victim now can sue for damages. He is to be reimbursed, "ox for ox." In other words, he is to be reimbursed like for like, value for value. On the one hand, as the owner of a champion bull, he has a financial incentive to keep his high-value beast away from any potentially dangerous beast that has not been identified as dangerous. On the other hand, it is the responsibility of the owner of a known renegade beast to keep it away from other bulls, especially champion bulls. The economic burden now shifts to the owner of the killer beast.

What is the difference between the two cases? In both cases, one man loses his beast, and another man's beast survives. The difference has to do with differences in knowledge; by the court, by the dead beast's owner, and by the surviving beast's owner. Greater knowledge establishes greater responsibility (Luke 12:47–48).

This principle of comparative knowledge leads to the conclusion that specific animals are by nature dangerous, and only marginally and sporadically responsive to human training, are automatically considered notorious. Maimonides defined such animals as those that kill by goring, biting, clawing, or similar action. Following the Mishnah,¹³ he listed the wolf, lion, bear, panther, and leopard. He also added snakes, but strangely enough, only those that have bitten in the past.¹⁴ These species would today be classified as "exotic animals." Most communities in the United States place legal restrictions on the private, non-institutional ownership of such animals, and in many cases such ownership is banned by law. To these species should probably be added species of dogs that have been bred to be fighters. The very possession of such breeds places the owners at risk. The individual animal may not be known to be dangerous, but it can be presumed in advance by the owner to be dangerous, and therefore also by the court retroactively.

E. Limited Knowledge

The court's knowledge is limited, yet it has to have evidence to make a judgment. The only evidence sufficiently reliable to allow the court to presume guilt on the part of a beast is the beast's previous public record. Why must the court presume guilt? Because there is no way for the court to determine guilt with the same degree of accuracy that must prevail in deciding human transgressions of the law, where the innocence of the accused is presumed.¹⁵

1. Establishing Value

First, let us consider the case of the goring of a prize-winning beast by a previously peaceful ox. The prize-winning beast's owner has to

13. Baba Kamma 1:4, Mishnah, p. 332.

14. Torts, I:I:6, p. 5.

15. I am speaking here of common law societies. Napoleonic Code societies do presume that the accused is guilty unless proven innocent.

bear the increased risks associated with ownership of a champion beast. He has to assess the risks of putting it in close contact with other beasts. Neither he nor the owner of the previously tame beast had special knowledge of the future behavior of either beast. Neither owner possessed a uniquely inexpensive way to gain such knowledge. Therefore, neither owner is to be assessed by the court with special burdens of responsibility, because the knowledge of each is presumed to be the same. It might have been the champion beast that was the potential killer.

Second, in the case of the owner of a known renegade beast, the court can presume that he had access to better knowledge concerning the behavior of his beast than the dead beast's owner had with respect to either beast. Because the owner of the renegade had greater knowledge concerning his beast's behavior—knowledge that was less expensive for him to obtain than for the owner of the dead beast to have obtained—the law finds him guilty of negligence. He had the responsibility to keep his beast away from other beasts, especially championship beasts. The burden of economic responsibility is different because the costs of obtaining better knowledge are different.

This is why “ox for ox” refers to a replacement of equal value. The owner of the dead beast is entitled to full-value compensation. Nevertheless, championship beasts can become renegades, too. It would not be fair for the owner of a newly vicious beast that is worth, say, 100 ounces of gold, to be forced to sell his beast and split the proceeds with the victim's owner, just because his beast killed a beast worth, say, one ounce of gold. He is required to pay the owner what it will cost him to buy a replacement beast, but no more. Were it otherwise, it would pay owners of average beasts to place their beasts in close proximity to the champion but possibly violent beast, in the hope that a fight would take place in which the less valuable beast is killed. The Bible does not recommend laws that promote profit-seeking violence.

The owner of the survivor gets to keep the carcass of the dead beast. “If the ox hath used to push [gore] in time past, and his owner hath not kept him in; he shall surely pay ox for ox; and the dead shall be his own.” He has paid the owner of the dead beast, ox for ox. But the owner of the dead beast is not entitled to everything. The man who is required to pay at least gets something.

2. Guilt Is Presumed

Again, this recognizes the limitations of judges to make perfect assessments concerning which beast was responsible. The victim does not lose anything, economically speaking, but he is not given a bonus payment, either. Why doesn't the owner of the survivor owe a penalty payment to the victim? Because the courts cannot ascertain that the renegade was completely responsible. Guilt is presumed by the court; it need not be established beyond reasonable doubt, unlike a case involving human behavior. In a legal dispute involving human beings, the present guilt of a previously convicted criminal is not to be presumed by the court; it must be proven. But a decision must be rendered by the court in order to honor God's law and to preserve the juridical foundation of social peace. So the court is required to presume one beast's guilt, and therefore its owner's responsibility.

The Bible is silent with respect to fights between two known renegade beasts, but by an extension of this argument, it can safely be concluded that the first example becomes the standard. The surviving beast is sold and the proceeds are divided. The court cannot presume to know which beast started the fight.

Conclusion

Biblical law favors neither the rich nor the poor. It places a greater burden of responsibility on the owner who has access to better or cheaper information concerning the probable behavior of a domesticated beast under his command. Biblical law implicitly recognizes that knowledge is not a zero-cost resource, and therefore neither courts nor owners should be treated as if they were omniscient.

Where two beasts with clean records fight, and one is killed, the owners split the proceeds. Where the surviving beast was known to be a greater risk, its owner must fully compensate the victim for his economic loss, on the basis of equal value restored. The court is not required to presume which beast was responsible in the first example, but it is required by God's law to make this presumption automatically in cases involving a known renegade. The important thing, however, is that judgment be rendered by the court. Without judgment, social peace cannot long be maintained.

PROPORTIONAL RESTITUTION

If a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep. . . . If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double (Ex. 22:1, 4).

In any attempted explanation of a Bible passage, we must have as our principle of interpretation the Bible's revelation of the theocentric nature of all existence. God created and now sustains all life. Thus, a sin against a person is first and foremost a sin against God. Restitution must always be made to God. God demands the death of the sinner as the only sufficient lawful restitution payment. But God allows a substitute payment, symbolized in the Old Testament economy by the sacrifice of animals. These symbols pointed forward in time to the death of Jesus Christ, which alone serves as the foundation of all of life (Heb. 8). Jesus Christ made a temporary restitution payment to God in the name of mankind in general (temporal life goes on) and a permanent one for His people (eternal life will come).¹ Adam deserved death on the day he rebelled; God gave him extended life on earth because of the atonement of Christ. The same is true for Adam's biological heirs. We live because of Christ's atonement, and only because of it.

Crimes can also be against men. This means that restitution must be made to the victim, not just to God. There is no forgiveness apart from restitution: Christ's primarily, and the criminal's secondarily. As images of God, victims are entitled to restitution payments from criminals. Because crimes differ in terms of their impact on victims, penalties also vary. The biblical principle is a familiar one in Western jurisprudence: the punishment must fit the crime. Because economic restitution is the form that punishment must take in the case of theft, economic restitution must therefore "fit the crime." It must fit the crime in at least three ways: first, by restoring to the victim as closely as possible the value of what had been stolen; second, by compensating the victim for his suffering in losing the item or items; third, by compensating the victim for the costs of detecting the thief.

1. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), chaps. 3, 6. (<http://bit.ly/gnd-cg>) The Bible passage that indicates these two aspects of salvation is I Timothy 4:10: "For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe." Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Timothy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

A. Costs of Retraining: The Traditional Explanation

R. J. Rushdoony's discussion of multiple penalties, which he called multiple restitution, is important for the light it sheds on the first aspect of restitution, the payment necessary to compensate the victim for the loss he suffered as a result of the theft. Unfortunately, Rushdoony followed rabbinical tradition and introduced an extraneous issue which confuses the discussion, namely, the use-value of the animals. He wrote:

Multiple restitution rests on the principle of justice. Sheep are capable of a high rate of reproduction and have use, not only as meat, but also by means of their wool, for clothing, as well as other uses. To steal a sheep is to steal the present and future value of a man's property. The ox requires a higher rate of restitution, five-fold, because the ox was trained to pull carts, and to plow, and was used for a variety of farm tasks. The ox therefore had not only the value of its meat and its usefulness, but also the value of its training, in that training an ox for work was a task requiring time and skill. It thus commanded a higher rate of restitution. Clearly, a principle of restitution is in evidence here. Restitution must calculate not only the present and future value of a thing stolen, but also the specialized skills involved in its replacement.²

Walter Kaiser agreed.³ The Jewish scholar, Cassuto, argued along similar lines: "He shall pay five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep—less for a sheep than for an ox, possibly because the rearing of a sheep does not require so much, or so prolonged, effort as the rearing

2. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 459–60.

3. Walter C. Kaiser, Jr., Toward Old Testament Ethics (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1983), p. 105.

of herds."⁴ This interpretation is quite traditional among Jewish scholars.⁵

This interpretation seems to get support from the laws of at least one nation contemporary with ancient Israel. The Hittites also imposed varying penalties according to which animal had been stolen. Anyone who stole a bull and changed its brand, if discovered, had to repay the owner with seven head of cattle: two three-year-olds, three yearlings, and two weanlings.⁶ A cow received a five-fold restitution payment.⁷ The same penalty was imposed on thieves of stallions and rams.⁸ A plow-ox required a ten-fold restitution (previously 15).⁹ The same was true of a draft horse.¹⁰ Thus, it appears that trained work animals were evaluated as being worth more to replace than the others. Anyone who recovered a stolen horse, mule, or donkey was to receive an additional animal: double restitution.¹¹ The original animal that had received training was returned; thus, the thief did not have to pay multiple restitution.

It seems reasonable to conclude that the Bible's higher payment for a sheep or ox is based on the costs of retraining an equivalent animal. But what seems reasonable at first glance turns out to be mistaken.

B. Discounted Future Value and Capitalization

Consider the argument that the higher restitution penalty is related to the increased difficulty of training domestic animals. No doubt it is true that the owner must go to considerable effort to re-train a work animal. But is a sheep a work animal? Does it need training? Obviously not. This should warn us against adopting such an argument regarding any restitution payment that is greater than two-fold.

It is quite true that the future value of any stolen asset must be paid to the victim by the thief. What is not generally understood by

4. U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus, trans. Israel Abrahams (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, The Hebrew University, [1951] 1974), p. 282.

5. See the citations by Nehama Leibowitz, Studies in Shemot, Part 2 (Jerusalem: World Zionist Organization, 1976), p. 364.

6. "Hittite Laws," paragraph 60. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), p. 192.

7. Ibid., paragraph 67.

8. Ibid., paragraphs 61, 62.

9. Ibid., paragraph 63.

10. Ibid., paragraph 64.

11. Ibid., paragraph 70.

non-economists is that the present market price of an asset already includes its expected future value. Modern price theory teaches that the present price of any scarce economic resource reflects the estimated future value of the asset's net output (net stream of income, or net rents), discounted by the market rate of interest for the time period that corresponds to the expected productive life of the asset.¹² For example, if I expect a piece of land to produce a net economic return (rent) equivalent to one ounce of gold per year for 1,000 years, I would be foolish to pay 1,000 ounces of gold for it today. The present value to me of my thousandth ounce of gold is vastly higher than the present value to me of that thousandth ounce of gold a thousand and one years in the future. When offering to buy the land, I therefore discount that expected income stream of gold by the longest-term interest rate on the market. So do all my potential competitors (other buyers). The cash payment for the land will therefore be substantially less than the expected rental payments of 1,000 ounces of gold.

This discounting process is called capitalization. When we capitalize something, we pay a cash price—an actual transaction or an imputed estimation—for a future stream of income. Capitalization stems from the fact, as Rothbard argued, that “Rents from any durable good accrue at different points in time, at different dates in the future. The capital value of any good then becomes the sum of its expected future rents, discounted by the rate of time preference for present over future goods, which is the rate of interest. In short, the capital value of a good is the ‘capitalization’ of its future rents in accordance with the rate of time preference or interest.”¹³ This is not a difficult concept to grasp; unfortunately for human freedom and productivity, very few people have ever heard about it.

What is most important to understand is that this discounting process applies to all capital goods (including durable consumer goods) in the market; it is not simply the product of a money economy. Monetary exchanges are as bound by the process of discounting expected future income (rents) as are all other transactions. Put a different way, the phenomenon of interest is basic to human action; it is not the product of a money economy.

12. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), ch. 7. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>)

13. Murray N. Rothbard, Introduction; Frank A. Fetter, Capital, Interest, and Rent: Essays in the Theory of Distribution (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, 1977), p. 13. (<http://bit.ly/FetterCIR>)

If economists could persuade people of this fact, there would be less freedom-restricting legislation such as usury laws. Governments sometimes pass usury laws that establish a price ceiling on legal interest rates. These laws are almost always applied only on monetary transactions. As with any price control, a usury law will reduce the number of transactions at the coercively fixed price. It will reduce the supply of loanable funds, because lenders do not wish to loan money at an artificially undervalued rate of return.¹⁴ Usury laws are the destroyers of civilization, for they impede the free flow of capital. Indeed, if they could be fully enforced, usury laws that prohibit all interest payments would make impossible the creation of capital goods, for capital goods are nothing more than human labor (including intellectual insight) combined with raw materials over time.¹⁵ All three must be paid for: labor (wages), raw materials (rent), and time (interest). Usury laws deny the legitimate return of the third component of a capital good.¹⁶

This process of capitalization means that the higher the prevailing interest rate, the smaller the cash payment that a buyer will offer for a piece of land today: the buyer applies a higher discount to its expected stream of income.¹⁷ Always bear in mind, however, that no one knows

14. A low official rate of interest makes it appear as though people are discounting future income at a lower rate than is actually the case. Thus, a legislated (or fiat-money-induced) lower rate of interest will make it appear as though buyers are willing offer higher prices for land bought by means of long-term debt contracts (mortgages). But this is an illusion created by the government's usury law. In the case of property sold by a seller who is willing to finance the sale by accepting a long-term debt contract from the buyer, he will have to accept a lower price if the market's true rate of interest exceeds the official interest rate ceiling; otherwise the buyer will not buy. A usury law, like any price control, is analogous to placing a limit on a thermometer's scale. A cap on a thermometer does not reduce the fever of the sick person; it simply keeps people from assessing the true conditions. A usury law creates an illusion of a lower rate of discount than market transactors voluntarily agree upon.

15. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, ch. 6.

16. There is no surer way to identify a crackpot theory of economics than to examine the economist's theory of interest is. If he denies the legitimacy of interest in morally legitimate profit-seeking transactions, he is not an economist; he is a monetary crank. If he denies interest as a theoretically inescapable tool of economic analysis, he is a true crackpot, as nutty as a man who promotes the idea of the possibility of a perpetual motion machine. But he is far more dangerous: legislators do not listen to "scientists" who would propose making illegal all machines except perpetual motion machines. Legislators have on occasion passed usury laws that are based on the idea that interest is illegitimate. The most precise discussion of interest remains Eugen von Böhm-Bawerk's classic study, History and Critique of Interest Theories (1884), which is volume 1 of Capital and Interest, 3 vols. (South Holland, Illinois: Libertarian Press, 1959).

17. If we expect a lower rate of interest in the future than presently prevails, we for certain what the future value of an asset's output will be, nor does anyone know precisely how much the interest rate will fluctuate over the expected productive life of the asset. Obviously, no one is sure just what the productive life of any asset will be. Market forecasting involves a great deal of uncertainty.

Uncertainty is the origin of what some economists call entrepreneurial or "pure" profit.¹⁸ When the estimates of the various competing entrepreneurs—market forecasters-investors¹⁹—are brought to bear in the capital goods markets, the outcome is a price for any capital asset.²⁰ Today's demand is a composite of demand for present use (shear, kill, and eat a sheep today) and future use (shear a sheep repeatedly over several years and then kill and eat it). Today's price is the product of the competitive interaction between today's demand—which includes an estimation of future demand and an estimation of future supply—and today's supply.

The present price of any scarce economic resource already in-will be willing to pay the prevailing cash price, since the annual rate of return will be discounted subsequently by a smaller number. Thus, we buy today at a nice, fat "discount for cash," and we will be able to sell the property later on for a smaller discount for cash when the rate of discount (interest) drops. If we expect rates to rise, we will only buy at less than the prevailing cash market price, which means, of course, that we will not be able to buy it, since the owner can sell it for more to someone else. The new buyer will then suffer economic losses, if our expectation is correct. He will get a smaller "discount for cash" when he buys today, and if he wants to sell later on, he will have to accept a larger discount, since the rate of interest will have risen. The market value of his land will drop.

18. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty, and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>) See also Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 32.

19. Some economists distinguish between the capitalist owner-investor and the future-predicting entrepreneur. I have not found this distinction particularly helpful. A forecaster who does not invest capital is not a participant in the market. If someone invests in terms of what the capital-deficient forecaster has said, then the investor becomes the significant participant. Like the race track tout who refuses to invest his own money, and who therefore has no effect on the odds at the ticket window unless he gets someone to bet in terms of his forecasts, so is the entrepreneur who is not a capitalist. Both are economically irrelevant in practice. I prefer to avoid distinctions that are irrelevant in practice. For examples of this distinction, see Israel Kirzner, Competition and Entrepreneurship (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), pp. 47–52; Henry Manne, Insider Trading and the Stock Market (New York: Free Press, 1966), pp. 117–19.

20. There can be various prices, depending on market information concerning other buyers and sellers, including substitute producer goods, as well as transportation costs, insurance rates, and so forth. But the tendency of competition is to produce a single market price for a given piece of equipment in a particular geographical region.

cludes its expected future price, discounted by the applicable period's market rate of interest.²¹

C. The Economics of Restitution

Having said this, I now consider the economics of restitution. The task of the judges in estimating a morally legitimate restitution payment is easier than it seems. Judges can safely ignore the question of just how much the future value of a stolen asset might be. The best experts in forecasting economic value—entrepreneurs—have already provided this information to the judges, all nicely discounted by the market rate of interest. The judges need only use existing market prices in order to compute restitution payments.

A restitution payment is normally twice the prevailing market price of the asset. When the stolen ox is returned by the authorities to the owner (the thief neither slaughtered it nor sold it), the thief pays double restitution. "If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double" (Ex. 22:4). Rushdoony followed the traditional rabbinical interpretation when he argued that this 100% penalty above the market price is the minimum amount by which the thief expected to profit from his action.²² The thief must return the original beast, plus his expected minimum "profit" from the transaction, namely, the market value of the stolen beast. He forfeits that which he had expected to gain. Maimonides wrote of the requirement that the thief pay double: "He thus loses an amount equal to that of which he wished to deprive another."²³ Akedat Yizhak concurred: "The thief is treated differently from the one who causes damage. The latter who caused damage through his ox or pit did not intend to deprive his fellow of anything. He is therefore only required to make half or total restitution. The thief who deliberately sets out to inflict loss on his fellow deserves to have a taste of his own medicine—to lose the same amount that he deprived his fellow of. This can only be achieved through double restitution."²⁴ This is ana-

21. The prevailing rate of interest for loans of any given duration, like the prevailing price of any asset, is the product of the best guesses of entrepreneurs (speculators) concerning the future of interest rates of that duration.

22. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 460.

23. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1954), "Laws Concerning Theft," II:1:4, p. 60.

24. Cited by Leibowitz, Studies in Shemot, p. 362.

logous to the perjurer who is subject to the judicial penalty which his lie, had it been believed by the judges, would have imposed on the innocent person (Deut. 19:16–21).²⁵

1. Victim's Rights

“If a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep” (Ex. 22:1). What if a stolen sheep or ox had been sold by the thief? The thief may know where the animal is. If the authorities convict him of the crime, would he be given an opportunity to buy back the stolen animal and return it to the owner, plus the 100% penalty, and thereby avoid the four-fold or five-fold restitution penalty? This would seem to violate the third goal of proportional restitution (see below): increasing the risk for thieves who steal sheep or oxen, and who then dispose of the evidence by destroying them or selling them, thereby making it more difficult to convict them in court. The thief would still have to pay the four-fold or five-fold penalty, unless the victim decides otherwise. The fundamental judicial principle here is victim's rights. The victim decides the penalty, up to the limits of the law.

The victimized original owner should always have the authority to offer the convicted criminal an alternative that is more to the victim's liking. Perhaps he is emotionally attached to the missing ox, especially if he personally trained it. He may even be attached emotionally to the stolen sheep—less likely, I suspect, than attachment to an ox that he had personally trained. What if he offers to accept double restitution if (1) the criminal will tell him where the sold beast is, and (2) the beast is returned to him alive? What if the thief then tells the victim and the civil authorities where the missing beast is? The authorities would then compel the new owner—who, legally speaking, is not truly an owner, as we shall see—to return the animal to the original owner.

The buyer of the stolen beast now has neither beast nor the forfeited purchase price. He has become the thief's victim. The thief therefore owes him some sort of restitution payment. The question is: How much? This is a difficult question to answer. It would be either a 20% penalty or a 100% penalty. I believe that it is a 20% penalty.

25. This section of Deuteronomy is explicitly a case-law application of the “eye for eye” principle.

2. Timely Confession Receives Its Appropriate Reward

Here is my reasoning. Say that the convicted thief confesses his crime of having either sold or slaughtered the stolen beast. The court is not sure which he did, but the penalty is the same in either case: four-fold (sheep) or five-fold (ox) restitution. In an attempt to persuade the original owner to accept the return of his animal plus a 100% penalty, he now confesses that he sold it. Say that the owner agrees to accept two-fold restitution if the thief can get the animal back (the victim need not consent to this). The thief must now return the stolen beast. He goes to the buyer and tells him that the animal was stolen and must be returned to the original owner. He now also owes the victimized buyer the purchase price of the beast, plus a penalty payment of 20% (Lev. 6:2–5).²⁶

If the initial buyer has already sold the beast, then it is the responsibility of the thief, not the buyer, to trace down its present location. The person who has final possession when the state intervenes and requires him to return it to its original owner is the defrauded buyer to whom the thief owes the restitution payment. Because the “bundle of rights” associated with legal ownership could not be transferred by the thief to the various buyers, the final buyer has no legal claim on the animal. He is in receipt of stolen goods.

By cooperating with the original victim, the thief may be able to reduce his overall liability. Instead of paying the original owner five-fold restitution for an ox, he now pays less. First, the stolen beast is returned to the true owner: basic restitution. Second, the thief then must pay that person the equivalent value of the beast. Third, he also owes the defrauded purchaser the return of his purchase price plus a penalty of 20%. Thus, he pays 3.2-fold restitution, plus the cost of locating and transporting the beast, rather than five-fold or four-fold restitution. Obviously, the thief is better off if he cooperates with the true owner, and tells him who bought the stolen ox or sheep from him.

Why assume that the thief only owes the victimized buyer 20%? Because biblical law recognizes that thieves have better information about what they did than other people do. It is best for the law to offer thieves a reduced penalty for confession in order to elicit better information from them before the costs of the trial must be borne. To encourage the criminal to tell the truth, there has to be a threat hanging over him: the possibility that someone with the missing information will come to the judges and present it. Thus, if the thief remains silent about the person who bought the sheep or ox, he bears greater risk.

26. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 7.

3. The Silent Thief

A silent thief faces an additional threat. Assume that the original owner demands four-fold (sheep) or five-fold (ox) restitution. Still, the thief says nothing because he knows that if he admits that he sold the beast, he will also have to pay the victimized buyer 120%, yet the original owner may nevertheless refuse to deal with him, and may demand (as is his legal right) either four-fold or five-fold restitution. Once the thief has sold a stolen a sheep or ox, the victim can legally demand the higher penalty payment. The victim is owed the four-fold or five-fold restitution whether or not the thief locates the stolen beast, buys it back, and returns it to its original owner. The very act of selling a stolen ox or sheep invokes the law's full penalty. It is very much like the crime of kidnapping. The family of the kidnapped victim, or the judge, or the jury can legally insist on the death penalty even if the kidnapper offers to identify the person to whom the victim had been sold into bondage.

Why would the thief remain silent about the whereabouts of the stolen animal? One reason might be his fear of revenge from an accomplice in the crime. Laying this motivation aside, let us consider other possible motivations for the thief's remaining silent. First and foremost, the thief may believe that he will not be convicted of the crime. After all, the beast is missing. It is not in the thief's possession. Second, he may believe that the victim is hard-hearted and will insist on the maximum restitution payment even if the thief can get the beast back by identifying the defrauded buyer and paying him the purchase price plus a penalty payment of 20%.

He remains silent. He may be convicted anyway. If so, he now faces a new problem: he not only owes four-fold or five-fold restitution to the victim, he could also wind up owing the victimized buyer whatever the buyer paid him for the stolen animal. Why? Because the victimized buyer may later discover that he has purchased a stolen beast. If he then remains silent, he breaks the law. He is a recipient of stolen goods. He has become an accomplice of the thief. His silence condemns him. Additionally, he may feel guilty because he is not its legal owner.

How can the defrauded buyer escape these burdens? He can go to the original owner, who has already received full restitution from the thief (or from the person who has purchased the thief as a slave), and offer to sell the animal back to him. Once the victimized buyer identifies himself, the thief now owes restitution to the defrauded buyer: double restitution, minus the purchase price that the defrauded buyer receives from the original owner. The thief has stolen from the buyer through fraud. As is the case with any other victim of unconfessed theft, the defrauded buyer is entitled to double restitution from the thief. Therefore, as soon as the thief gets through paying his debt to the original owner, he then must pay the victimized buyer the penalty payment.

If the original owner declines to buy the beast, the buyer becomes its legal owner. The original owner does not want it back. He has also been paid: restitution from the thief. But the defrauded buyer remains a victim. He keeps the beast, but he is also entitled to restitution from the thief equal to the original purchase price charged by the thief.

If the thief confesses before the trial begins, he can avoid the risk of the extra payment to the defrauded buyer. Even if the victim demands four-fold or five-fold restitution, by paying it, the thief thereby becomes the owner of the beast. *The criminal's act of timely confession, plus his agreement to pay full restitution to the victim, atones judicially for the theft.*²⁶

But what about the defrauding of the buyer? The confessed thief would owe the buyer a restitution payment of 20% of the purchase price, because he had involved the buyer in an illegal transaction. Having repaid both owner and buyer, he has legitimized the new ownership arrangement. The buyer has gained full legal title to the animal plus restitution, so he is no longer a defrauded buyer. He now has no additional complaint against the thief. He may not demand any additional restitution payments.

Without confession and restitution, the thief would owe the buyer at least 100% restitution if discovered, which is an important economic incentive in getting the buyer to identify himself. Thus, the thief's silence at the trial regarding the existence of a defrauded buyer hangs over him continually.²⁷

26. Obviously, I am speaking here only of the earthly court. Atonement means "covering."

27. If the victimized buyer waits for several years before identifying the stolen

Let us assume that he is convicted. He pays his maximum restitution to the victim. He still has an economic incentive to confess. He tells the judges that he had sold the animal. He tells them who the defrauded buyer is. He now owes the defrauded buyer the 20% restitution payment. This is better than paying the defrauded buyer 100% (or two-fold restitution minus any re-purchase price from the original owner), should the buyer learn that the beast was stolen property and decide to confess to the original owner or the judges.

Biblical law puts a premium on timely confession. The criminal who confesses receives a lighter penalty than the criminal who refuses to confess, and who is then subsequently convicted.²⁸ There is an economic incentive for him to confess. There is also an economic threat if he refuses to confess. The possibility of two-fold restitution provides an incentive for a defrauded buyer to reveal the existence of the stolen animal to the original owner. The Bible's penalty structure for theft provides economic incentives for all parties to present accurate information to the civil authorities. The Bible recognizes that accurate information is not a zero-price resource.

4. Considering an Alternative Arrangement

If there were no risk to the thief attached to remaining silent, what would be the thief's incentive to tell the owner that he knows where the stolen beast is? Assume that the thief owes no mandatory penalty payment to the defrauded buyer once he has paid restitution to the victim. He pays full restitution to the owner, and the defrauded buyer then hears about this, realizes that he has purchased stolen property, and comes to the owner. He offers to sell back the missing beast to the owner at the market price the beast was worth to the owner when the beast was stolen (presumably, the price he paid to the thief). If the thief owes nothing to the defrauded buyer, he is still out only five-fold restitution by having concealed evidence.

What is wrong with this interpretation of the restitution statutes?
Answer: the thief has entangled the buyer in an illegal transaction that beast, the court might decide that the stolen beast has aged too much, and that it constitutes half of the payment owed. Still, the thief would have to make the 100% penalty payment to him.

28. In modern American jurisprudence, plea bargaining is used by defense attorneys to reduce their clients' sentences by persuading criminals to confess to milder crimes than they actually committed. In biblical law, the criminal also is given an opportunity to escape a heavier sentence by confessing before the trial; the confessed crime, however, remains the same.

was inherently filled with uncertainty for the buyer. The latter might have been convicted of being a “fence”—a professional receiver of stolen goods. He has therefore been defrauded by the thief. He deserves restitution.

What if the original owner says that he does not want to buy the beast from the defrauded buyer? The buyer has now in effect purchased the beast from its rightful owner. He now owns the “bundle of rights” associated with true ownership. But the thief has nevertheless exposed him to the discomfort of being involved in an illegal transaction. Shouldn’t the thief still owe the seller a 100% restitution payment? My assessment of the principle of victim’s rights leads me to conclude that biblical law does in principle allow the defrauded buyer to come to the judges and have them compel the thief to pay him 100% of the price he had paid the thief. This has nothing to do with whether he has sold the beast to the original owner or whether the owner has allowed him to retain legal possession of it.

5. Transferring Lawful Title

Why must we regard the sale of the animal as fraudulent? Why can the authorities legitimately demand that the purchaser return the animal to the original owner? Because the thief implicitly and possibly explicitly pretended to be transferring an asset that he did not possess: lawful title. The thief did not possess lawful title to the property. This illuminates a fundamental principle of biblical ownership: whatever someone does not legally own, he cannot legally sell. Ownership is not simply possession of a thing; it is possession of certain legal immunities associated with the thing. It involves above all the right to exclude. According economist-legal theorist-judge Richard Posner: “A property right, in both law and economics, is a right to exclude everyone else from the use of some scarce resource.”²⁹ This right to exclude was never owned by the thief; therefore, he cannot transfer this bundle of legal immunities to the purchaser. The purchaser can legally demand compensation from the thief, but he does not lawfully own the stolen item. The civil authorities can legitimately compel the buyer to transfer the property back to the thief, who then returns it to the original owner, or else compel him to return it directly to the original owner.

The explicit language of the kidnapping statute provides us with the legal foundation of this conclusion regarding the transfer of ownership. "And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death" (Ex. 21:16). Even to have a stolen man in your possession was a capital crime, unless you could prove that you did not know that he was stolen. Just because a kidnapper sold you a stolen person as a slave did not mean that this person would remain in your possession as a slave. The same is true of other property.

29. Richard A. Posner, The Economics of Justice (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), p. 70.

English common law does not recognize this biblical standard. Receiving stolen goods was not made a crime by statute until the nineteenth century. Common law had recognized no such crime; it took statute law to make it a crime.³⁰ While it is no doubt true that it is expensive to research every title before making a purchase, especially in a pre-modern society, the responsibility to do so is biblically inescapable if the buyer wishes to reduce his risk of purchasing stolen goods—goods that must be returned to the original owner. Not only is the childhood chant of "finders, keepers; losers, weepers" not biblical, neither is common law's "buyers, keepers; victims, weepers." A far better rule is the traditional caveat emptor: let the buyer beware.

What if the thief has already spent the purchase money, and is unable to repay the buyer? The victim agrees to accept two-fold restitution if the original beast is returned to him unharmed. He owes the restitution payment (the animal) to the original owner, plus the penalty; he also owes double restitution to the defrauded buyer. It will take him years to repay. Who has first claim on the thief's money? The original owner does. He made the offer to accept a reduced payment from the thief. Without this offer, he would have been entitled to four-fold (sheep) or five-fold (ox) restitution. For him to grant legal relief to the thief in exchange for information from the thief, he will presumably want at least double restitution.

The defrauded buyer has had to forfeit both the purchase price and the stolen animal, which must be returned to the true owner. The initial claim to restitution belongs to the owner of the beast, which has now been returned to him, leaving the purchaser with neither money nor beast. The defrauded buyer has now become the primary economic victim of the thief. This position as secondary legal victim but primary economic victim imposes added risks on buyers: they must take special care to see to it that the goods they purchase are accompanied by valid titles. If the original owner is willing to bargain with the convicted thief, the purchaser then becomes the major loser. Legal initiative lies with the initial victim of the theft.

30. Wayne LaFave and Austin Scott, Jr., Handbook on Criminal Law (Minneapolis, Minnesota: West, 1972), pp. 681–91: "Receiving Stolen Property." My thanks to Prof. Gary Amos for this reference.

D. Protecting the Victims

We think of the criminal's victims as being people who have lost their animals or money. But there are other victims: the animals themselves. This is analogous to the crime of kidnapping. The restitution system that the Bible establishes for oxen and sheep reflects this special concern by God for helpless animals. What makes sheep and oxen special is their status in the Old Testament as symbolically helpless animals. So, biblical law protects both the animals and their owners. Let us consider each in turn.

Why the requirement of five-fold restitution for a slaughtered or sold ox? Oxen require training, meaning a capital investment by the owner, in order to make them effective servants of man in the tasks of dominion, but so do other animals, such as horses and donkeys, yet only two-fold restitution is required for them. Also, a thief who is found with a living ox in his possession pays only double restitution. What makes a slaughtered or sold ox different? Answer: the ox is symbolic of the employed servant. This symbolism has more to do with its five-fold restitution penalty than the value of its training does.

The law forbids the muzzling of oxen when they are working in the field (Deut. 25:4).³¹ Paul cited this verse on two occasions: first, to make the point that God cares for His people, and that our spiritual labors will not be in vain (I Cor. 9:9);³² second, to point out that the laborer is worthy of his reward, and that elders in the church are worthy of double honor (I Tim. 5:17–18).³³ It pays to train an ox, just as it pays to train human workers in their jobs. Unquestionably, a trained ox is worth more to the owner than an untrained steer, just as a trained worker is worth more than an unskilled worker, and just as an elder is deserving of double honor (payment). Furthermore, the ox is a dominion beast, but the steer is only a source of food and leather. The ox is productive until the day it is killed by man or beast; the steer is simply fattened for the slaughter.

31. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 63.

32. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 11.

33. North, Hierarchy and Dominion, ch. 8.

Sheep are very different from oxen. They are stupid animals. Shepherds care for them, sheep dogs monitor their movements, but wise men do not invest a lot of time and energy in trying to train them for service. They are not active work animals like oxen, which pull plows; they are far more passive. A sheep is in fact the classic passive animal—an animal whose main purpose in life is to get sheared. They are helpless. For this reason, they are symbolic in the Bible of the poor.³⁴

How do we make sense of the four-fold restitution payment for a stolen sheep that is subsequently killed or sold by the thief? Why is this loss (as indicated by the size of the restitution payment) so great to the owner, compared to the double restitution payment he receives if the stolen sheep is restored to him by the thief? Economic analysis of a sheep's output does not throw much light on this problem, except in a negative sense: there is no strictly economic reason. A beast of burden such as a donkey has to be trained, and was unquestionably a valuable asset in the Old Testament economy. So was a horse. Yet neither slaughtered horses nor slaughtered donkeys are singled out in the law as entitling their owners to four-fold or five-fold restitution. What is so special about a sheep? Is its wool production that much more valuable than the economic output of a horse or donkey? Clearly, the answer is in the negative. We are forced to conclude that the distinguishing characteristic between a slaughtered stolen donkey and a slaughtered stolen sheep has nothing to do with the comparative economic value of each beast's output. Instead, it has a great deal to do with the sheep's symbolic subordinate relationship to the owner.

E. Of Sheep and Men

In the Bible, animals image man.³⁵ Sheep are specifically compared to men throughout the Bible, with God as the Shepherd and men as helpless dependents. The twenty-third psalm makes use of the imagery of the shepherd and sheep. David, a shepherd, compared himself to a sheep, for he described God as his shepherd (Ps. 23:1). Christ called Himself the "good shepherd" who gives His life for His sheep (John 10:11). He said to His disciples on the night of His capture by the authorities, citing Zechariah 13:7, "All ye shall be offended because of me this night: for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad" (Matt. 26:31). He referred to the Jews as "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. 10:6), echoing Jeremiah, "Israel is a scattered sheep" (Jer. 50:17a) and Ezekiel, "And they were scattered, because there is no shepherd: and they became meat to all the beasts of the field, when they were scattered" (Ezek. 34:5). Christ spoke of children as sheep, and offered the analogy of the man who loses one sheep out of a hundred. The man searches diligently to locate that one lost sheep and rejoices if he finds it. "Even so it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish" (Matt. 18:14).

34. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), pp. 267–69. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

35. Animals in men's image: ibid., p. 122. He cited Prov. 6:6; 26:11; 30:15, 19, 24–31; Dan. 5:21; Ex. 13:2, 13. When I use the noun "image" as a verb, I am reminded of one cynic's remark: "There is no noun in the English language that cannot be verbed."

1. Helpless Sheep

It is thus the helplessness of sheep rather than their value as beasts of burden or dominion that makes four-fold restitution mandatory.³⁶ Shepherds regard sheep as their special responsibility. The position of sheep is therefore unique. Sheep are representative of the utter helplessness of men. An attack on the sheep under a man's control strikes at his position as a covenantally responsible steward. David risked his life to save a lamb (or perhaps lambs) captured by a bear and a lion, and he slew them both (I Sam. 17:34–36), taking the lamb, apparently unharmed, out of the mouth of the lion: "I caught him by his beard" (v. 35). Just as God had delivered him out of the paw of both lion and bear, David told Saul, so would He deliver him out of the hand of Goliath (v. 37). Again, David was comparing himself (and Israel) with the lamb, and comparing God with the shepherd. Thus, the recovery of a specific lost or stolen sheep is important to a faithful shepherd or owner, not just a replacement animal.

Perhaps the best example of sheep as a symbol for defenseless humans is found in Nathan's confrontation with King David concerning his adultery with Bathsheba, wife of Uriah the Hittite. Nathan proposed a legal case for David to judge. A rich man steals a female lamb

36. Maimonides ignored all this when he insisted that if a thief "butchers or sells on the owner's premises (an animal stolen there), he need not pay fourfold or fivefold. But if he lifts the object up, he is liable for theft even before he removes it from the owner's premises. Thus, if one steals a lamb from a fold and it dies on the owner's premises while he is pulling it away, he is exempt. But if he picks it up, or takes it off the owner's premises and it then dies, he is liable." Maimonides, Torts, "Laws Concerning Theft," II:II:16, p. 67.

from a poor neighbor, and then kills it. "And David's anger was greatly kindled against the man; and he said to Nathan, As the LORD liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die: And he shall restore the lamb fourfold, because he did this thing, and because he had no pity" (II Sam. 12:5–6). Then Nathan replied to him, "Thou art the man." Uriah had been the neighbor; Bathsheba is the ewe lamb who, biblically speaking, has been killed, the death penalty being applicable in cases of adultery (Lev. 20:10).

David recognized that the four-fold restitution was applicable in the case of stolen and slaughtered sheep. But in fact, Nathan was not talking about a lamb; he was talking about a human being. He used the symbol of the slaughtered sheep for the foolish woman who consented to the capital crime of adultery. The woman had been entitled to protection, especially by the king. Instead, she had been placed in jeopardy of her life by the king. The king had proven himself to be an evil shepherd.

What was the penalty extracted by God? First, the infant born of the illicit union would die, Nathan promised (II Sam. 12:14). On the seventh day, the day before its circumcision, the child died (v. 18). The next section of Second Samuel records the rape of Tamar by David's son Amnon. Absalom, her brother, commanded his servants to kill Amnon, which they did (II Sam. 13:29). Absalom revolted against David and was later slain by Joab (II Sam. 18:14). Finally, Adonijah attempted to steal the throne, but Solomon was anointed (I Kings 1), and Adonijah tried again to secure the throne by asking Solomon to allow him to marry David's bed-warmer. Solomon recognized this attempt to gain the throne through marriage, and had him executed (I Kings 2:24–25). Thus, four of David's sons died, fulfilling the required four-for-one punishment for his adultery and his murder of Uriah.³⁷

2. Shepherds and Sheep

By striking at a man's lawful position of personal stewardship, the sheep-stealer takes an extra risk. It is far less risky to steal gold or silver

37. The Jewish scholar Brichto recognized the connection between Exodus 22:1 and the death of four of David's sons. His comment on the fourth of the four-fold penalty that God imposed on David is pertinent: "The execution of Adonijah, occurring after David's death has, in this context, escaped general notice: even of scholars, who have been conditioned not to count as significant (for biblical man) what happens to a man's son(s) after his demise." Herbert Chanan Brichto, "Kin, Cult, Land and After-life—A Biblical Complex," Hebrew Union College Annual, XLIV (1973), p. 42.

and then sell it than to steal and sell a sheep; he will pay only two-fold restitution if he is captured for stealing and then selling gold. The sheep-stealer strikes at the very heart of a man's dominion assignment, in which a man has invested love and care on helpless, dependent beasts. The shepherd's calling (vocation) is the archetypal calling: it points analogically to the cosmic personalism and providential goodness of God. It is therefore specially defended by biblical law.

We see the archetypal nature of the shepherd's calling in the office of church elder. We call ministers of the gospel "pastors," a word derived from the same root as "pastoral." They are shepherds. Christ three times told Peter that his task would be to feed Christ's sheep (John 21:15–17). Peter later instructed elders of the church to "Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof" (I Peter 5:2a). The shepherd's role as caretaker and protector is analogous to God's care and protection of the world and Christ's care and protection of His church (John 10).

It is significant that the Israelites had been shepherds of cattle and sheep when they came into Egypt. The Egyptians despised shepherds. Because of this, Joseph instructed his brothers to ask Pharaoh for a separate land, Goshen, where the Hebrews would not come into contact with the Egyptians (Gen. 46:33–34). God's law, delivered so soon after their escape from a land in which their calling was despised, dealt with that occupation and its risks and responsibilities.

The Egyptians had despised shepherds, whose task is to care for flocks. These same Egyptians had placed the Israelites in bondage. The Egyptians were repulsed by an occupation that is based on a covenantal model of God's responsibility for the care and protection of His people. They were also repulsed by the concept of a society based on the idea of a ruler's covenantal responsibility for the care and protection of men. This hostility is understandable: Egypt was a bureaucratic, tyrannical state.³⁸ The Hebrews' experience in Egypt was designed by God to teach them that men are not allowed to do to cattle and sheep something that they are unquestionably not to do to other men: treat them unmercifully and carelessly or steal them and illegally slaughter them. Thus, God imposed His four-fold restitution on the Egyptians: He destroyed them.

Sheep, being stupid, are inescapably dependent. They have to trust their master if they are to survive. The shepherd is not to betray this personal trust until it is time to kill the sheep for food or, in Old Testament times, for sacrifice. Christ pointed to the intimate relationship between the shepherd and his sheep: "And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice. And a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers" (John 10:4-5). When removed from the care of their shepherd, forcibly or otherwise, the sheep become lost.

38. Chapter 2.

F. Symbolism or Training?

At this point, I must resort to a somewhat speculative hypothesis in order to make sense out of the four-fold restitution payment for a missing or dead sheep and the five-fold restitution payment for a missing or dead ox. I am arguing that the high penalties are imposed because of the symbolic nature of sheep and oxen, although I cannot prove it textually.³⁹

To make sense of Exodus 22:1, we have to go beyond considerations of strictly financial profit and loss. Economics as such does not provide a clear-cut answer to a fundamental question: Why doesn't God's law impose five-fold or four-fold restitution payments for the slaughter or sale of stolen horses or donkeys or other beasts of burden (dominion)? They require the capital investment of training, just as an ox does. The value of this training is forfeited when the thief cannot return the actual stolen beast to the owner. We might presume that the principle of the four-fold and five-fold restitution payment does, by implication, apply to these other beasts, if they have received training or other capital investments that set them apart from untrained beasts of the same species. Nevertheless, the Bible never says this explicitly. It specifically singles out sheep and oxen. Why?

I see two possible reasons. First, unlike horses, donkeys, and other domesticated animals that might be trainable, sheep and oxen were commonly slaughtered and eaten, as they are today. Thus, they need special protection from thieves. A thief who slaughters an ox or sheep is subject to more stringent penalties. The higher penalty tends to restrain him in his blood-letting. This is a more strictly economic argument, one based on the economic effects of the law. Second, both sheep and oxen are symbolic in the Bible of mankind: oxen for men of power or office, and sheep for dependent, spiritually helpless people. Oxen are normally peaceful, dominion beasts that are used for plowing the fields, never for war. Sheep are passive creatures that require special care on the part of shepherds. Thus, as archetypes of man in his relationship to God—creatures in need of care—oxen and sheep receive special consideration by the law.

39. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, Appendix G. I discussed my thesis in the present chapter with Jordan prior to the publication of his book, and he expanded on the idea.

Why a five-fold restitution payment for oxen? Why not four-fold? Probably because oxen are beasts of burden and therefore living tools of dominion. They are dependent,⁴⁰ though not so dependent as sheep, but they are also symbolic of God's dominion covenant. The number five is associated with the covenant in the Bible. Also, Israel marched in military formations based on the number five.⁴¹ The number five is associated with dominion. By killing a stolen ox, the thief is symbolically sacrificing another person's economic future for the sake of his own present enjoyment. This is what Satan attempted to do to Adam, and only the grace of God in Christ prevented Satan's successful slaughtering of humanity.

This law of restitution singles out oxen and sheep as being special creatures. Other passages in the Bible do the same. What the stringent restitution penalties of Exodus 22:1 point to is a general principle: how you treat oxen and sheep is indicative of how you treat other men. The ox is worthy of his hire; how much more a man! The sheep is helpless, and is deserving of protection; how much more a man! A society whose legal order protects oxen and sheep from thieves who would slaughter them is a society whose legal order is likely also to protect men from oppression, kidnapping, and murder. A biblical social order offers special protection to oxen, sheep, and men.⁴²

40. I believe that the male ox in this case law is castrated and not a bull. Castration reduces its threat to men, yet the animal's strength can still be harnessed for man's purposes. It is more dependent on man than a bull would be.

41. James B. Jordan, The Sociology of the Church (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1986), pp. 215–16. (<http://bit.ly/jjchurch>)

42. David Daube's comments on the four-fold and five-fold restitution requirements acknowledge none of this. Instead, he returned to his favorite theme, like a dog returns to its vomit: the "later addition" thesis. He contrasted the two-fold restitution requirement with the four-fold and five-fold requirements. The higher penalties are evidence of an earlier law. ". . . the older rule makes a rather primitive distinction between theft of an ox and theft of a sheep: for one ox you have to give five, but for one sheep only four. No such distinction occurs in the later rule. Whatever kind of animal you steal, you have to restore two for one." Daube, Studies in Biblical Law (Cambridge: At the University Press, 1947), pp. 94–95. He used a similar line of argumentation to distinguish Exodus 21:28–31 from 21:35–36: ibid., pp. 86–87.

G. Restitution and Deterrence

We are required by God always to begin our analysis of any problem with the operating presupposition of the theocentric nature of all existence. Modern jurisprudence refuses to begin with God. It begins with man and man's needs, and generally progresses to the state and the state's needs. This is why modern jurisprudence is in near-chaos. It is also why the court system is in near-chaos.⁴³

1. Deterring God's Wrath in History

Whenever we speak of deterring crime, we must speak first of the deterrence of God's wrath against the community because of the courts' unwillingness to impose God's justice within the community. The civil government is required by God to seek to deter crimes because all crimes are above all crimes against God. An unwillingness on the part of civil magistrates to enforce God's specified sanctions against certain specified public acts calls forth God's specified covenantal cursings against the community. This threat of God's sanctions is the fourth section of God's covenant; without this covenant, either explicit or implicit, no community can exist.⁴⁴ Only when we clearly recognize the theocentric nature of deterrence—and when we are ready to seek to have it recognized publicly in our civil and ecclesiastical statute books—can we legitimately begin to speak about deterring criminal behavior for the protection of the community.

The Bible does not distinguish between civil law and criminal law. All sins are crimes against God, for they break His law. All public sins must be restrained by one or more of God's covenantal agencies of government: family, church, and state. Certain public transgressions of God's law are specified as acts to be punished by the civil magistrate. In the modern world, we call these acts crimes. (The King James Version uses the word "crime" only twice, and "crimes" only twice.) The civil government enforces biblical laws against such acts. The general guideline for designating a particular public act as a crime is this: if by failing to impose sanctions against certain specified public acts, the whole community could be subsequently threatened by God's non-civil sanctions—war, plague, and famine—then the civil government becomes God's designated agency of enforcement. The civil govern- ment's primary function is to protect the community against the wrath of God by enforcing His laws against public acts that threaten the survival of the community.

43. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974).

44. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

The perverse practice of modern jurisprudence of allowing a person who has been declared legally innocent of a crime to be subsequently sued for damages in civil court by alleged victims cannot be found in the Bible. There is no distinction in the Bible between criminal law and civil law. If the civil magistrates are entitled to enforce a rule or a law, then this rule or law should be classified in the modern world under a criminal statute. Because the state is not omniscient, God allows self-proclaimed victims of lawless behavior to sue other individuals in the presence of a civil magistrate, which we call civil procedure or torts, but if the state is the lawful agency of enforcement, then we are always talking about criminal acts. Continued injustice, if it can be biblically defined and publicly identified in advance through statute or judicial precedent, because it goes unpunished by the civil government, calls forth the wrath of God on the community.

The Bible encourages the legitimate division of labor in identifying all types of criminal behavior, including such acts of injustice as breaking contracts or polluting the environment. The Bible recognizes that the state is not God. It is not omniscient. The initiation of public sanctions against all criminal acts therefore must not become a monopoly of civil officers. Citizen's arrest and torts—where one person sues another in order to collect damages—are modern examples of the outworking of this biblical principle of the decentralization of law enforcement. All government begins with self-government. The bottom-up, appeals court structure of covenant society (Ex. 18)⁴⁵ is protected by not requiring that agents of the civil government initiate all of the civil government's sanctions against criminal behavior. Nevertheless, all disputes into which the state can legitimately intervene and settle by judicial decision must be regarded in a biblical commonwealth as criminal behavior. There is no biblical distinction between criminal law and civil law.

It is therefore preposterous to argue, as liberal scholar Anthony Phillips argued concerning the Mosaic law, that "A crime is a breach of an obligation imposed by the law which is felt to endanger the community, and which results in the punishment of the offender in the name of the community, but which is not the personal concern of the individual who may have suffered injury, and who has no power to stop the prosecution, nor derives any gain from it.”⁴⁶ The argument is preposterous because every transgression of the civil law that goes unpunished by the authorities raises the threat of God’s judgment on the community, which is why unsolved murders required expiation in the Old Testament: (1) the sacrifice of a heifer (Deut. 21:1–7); and (2) the elders were required to pray, “Be merciful, O LORD, unto thy people Israel, whom thou hast redeemed, and lay not innocent blood unto thy people of Israel’s charge. And the blood shall be forgiven them” (Deut. 21:8). The state must regard as crimes against God all public transgressions for which the Bible specifies restitution payments to victims. Such acts are criminal acts against the community. Why? Because if they go unpunished, God threatens to curse the community. Thus, criminal law in the Bible was not enforced “in the name of the community,” but in the name of God, so as to protect the community from God’s wrath.

45. Chapter 19.

2. Restitution to God

Phillips was consistent in his errors, at least; he also argued that Hebrew covenant law was exclusively criminal law, meaning that its goal was solely the enforcement of public morals, rather than civil law (torts), in which restitution to the victim was primary.⁴⁷ This definition, if correct, would remove from covenant law all biblical statutes that require restitution to victims. He was trying to separate the case laws of Exodus from the Ten Commandments. If believed, this argument would make it far easier for antinomians to reject the continuing validity of the case laws in New Testament times, for the case laws of Exodus and other books rest heavily on the imposition of restitution payments to victims. The antinomians could publicly claim allegiance to the Ten Commandments, but then they could distance themselves from the specific applications of these commandments through the case laws, for they have concluded that the case laws are unconnected to the Decalogue because these are “civil” laws rather than “criminal” laws.⁴⁸ Phillips wrote: “But it is the contention of this study that Israel

46. Anthony Phillips, Ancient Israel’s Criminal Law: A New Approach to the Decalogue (New York: Schocken, 1970), p. 10.

47. Ibid., pp. 10–11.

48. Phillips says that the “Book of the Covenant,” meaning Exodus 21–23, was a product of David’s reign, with some of it quite possibly written by David himself. Ibid., ch. 14.

herself understood the Decalogue as her criminal law code, and that the law contained in it, and developed from it, was sharply distinguished from her civil law.”⁴⁹

If true, then all you need to do to escape from the covenantal, state-enforced requirements of the Decalogue is to make the Ten Commandments appear ridiculous. This he attempted in Chapter Two. “Initially only free adult males were subject to Israel’s criminal law, for only they could have entered into the covenant relationship with Yahweh. . . . But women did not enter into the covenant relationship, and were therefore outside the scope of the criminal law. They had no legal status, being the personal property first of their fathers and then of their husbands.”⁵⁰ The Decalogue is clearly preposterous, he implied. Presto: modern man is freed from any covenantal relationship to God. Man is on his own in the cosmos. He is autonomous. He shall be as God.

His case rests, first and foremost, on his distinguishing of criminal law from civil law in terms of the presence of restitution requirements in civil law. Next, he excluded women from the covenant. Then he turned them into chattel slaves. His tactic is obvious: to make God’s law appear ridiculous. But it is Phillips who is ridiculous, not the Bible. Like all humanists, he did not begin with the presupposition of a theocentric universe. He therefore did not begin his discussion of crimes and restitution with the understanding that all crimes are ultimately crimes against God, and all restitution payments belong ultimately to God as the ultimate injured party. It did not occur to him that all of God’s curses are His imposition of restitution payments to Himself as the ultimate Victim. Because covenant-breakers do not voluntarily repay to God what they owe Him as the innocent victim—the ultimate object of their moral rebellion—He therefore repays them with inescapable final judgment. “Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord” (Rom. 12:19b).

All sins are crimes against God. All sins are therefore judged by God: “For the wages of sin is death” (Rom. 6:23a). Each person is a sinner in God’s eyes, and therefore a criminal. The key question that must be answered during each person’s life on earth—acknowledged by him

49. Ibid., p. 11.

50. Ibid., pp. 14, 15. He did say that Deuteronomy later made women full members of the covenant. Ibid., p. 25. This is the standard liberal dismemberment of the Pentateuch into the hypothetical documents of the play-pretend scribes, J, E, D, P, and their as-yet unidentified accomplices.

or not—is this one: Will I allow Jesus Christ’s payment of the God-imposed eternal penalty to serve as my substitutionary restitution payment to God, or will I instead choose to ignore the magnitude of this looming restitution payment and cross death’s threshold autonomously? Anyone who makes the second choice will spend eternity in God’s non-rehabilitative torture chamber.

3. “Victimless Crimes” and Civil Judgment

In the ultimate covenantal sense, it is improper to speak of victimless crimes. Every person who entices another to sin is bringing that person under the threat of God’s negative sanctions, in time and in eternity. God therefore threatens the whole community for its failure to impose civil sanctions against such crimes. If there were no threat of God’s sanctions against the community for the failure of the magistrates to enforce all statutes assigned by the Bible to the civil magistrates for enforcement, then there would be no biblical justification for sanctions against such “victimless crimes” as prostitution, pornography, and homosexuality. Because he rejected the idea of such a covenant, classical liberal economist and legal theorist F. A. Hayek rejected laws against “victimless crimes,” saying that they are illegitimate interventions of the civil government, “At least where it is not believed that the whole group may be punished by a supernatural power for the sins of individuals. . . .”⁵¹ But that is the whole point: such a community-threatening God does exist.

Many actions that are specified in the Bible as sins are not to be tried and judged by the civil magistrate, but this is not evidence of neglect by God; it is instead a restraint on the growth of messianic civil government. The absence of civil penalties against such designated sinful behavior indicates only a postponement of judgment until the sinner’s final and eternal restitution payment to God. Through their public enforcement of God’s law, civil magistrates warn people of the necessity of obeying God, the cosmic Enforcer: “By the fear of the LORD men depart from evil” (Prov. 16:6b). This legitimate fear is to be both personal and national, for God’s punishments in history are imposed on individuals and nations: “If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law that are written in this book, that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD; then the 51. F. A. Hayek, Law, Legislation and Liberty, 3 vols. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), I, p. 101.

LORD will make thy plagues wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed, even great plagues, and of long continuance, and sore sicknesses, and of long continuance” (Deut. 28:58–59).

The necessity of making restitution reminds the covenanted nation to fear the God who exacts a perfect restitution payment to Himself on judgment day, and who brings His wrath in history as a warning of the final judgment to come. He brings His wrath either through lawfully constituted civil government or, if civil government refuses to honor the terms of His covenant, through such visible judgments as wars, plagues, and famines. This is why the nation was warned to fear God, immediately after the presentation of the Ten Commandments: “. . . God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye sin not” (Ex. 20:20b).

Jesus was not departing from the biblical view of judicial sanctions when He warned: “Fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell” (Matt. 10:28b). Eternal punishment is to serve as the covenantal foundation of all judicial sanctions. Civil government is supposed to reflect God’s government. Public punishments deter evil. They remind men: better temporal punishment that leads to repentance (personal and national) than eternal punishment that does not lead to repentance (personal). Repentance is possible only in history.

4. Capital Punishment

Phillips was consistently incorrect when he wrote: “Modern theories of punishment are therefore totally inapplicable when considering reasons why ancient Israel executed her criminals, for the punishment was not looked at from the criminal’s point of view. This extreme penalty was not designed to deter potential criminals, nor as an act of retribution, but as a means of preventing divine action by appeasing Yahweh’s wrath.”⁵² If criminal law was “not looked at from the criminal’s point of view,” then why does the Bible repeatedly refer to the fear of external punishment by the civil authorities as a means of leading men to fear God and to obey His law? “And all Israel shall hear, and fear, and shall do no more any such wickedness as this is among you” (Deut. 13:11).

Deterring future crimes is certainly one of the functions of capital punishment in a biblical law-order. Capital punishment is also an act of retribution and restitution. And, yes, it is also “a means of preventing divine action by appeasing Yahweh's wrath." It is erroneous to argue exclusively in terms of "either-or" when considering the potential social motivations for capital punishment or any other required civil sanction in the Bible.⁵³

52. Phillips, Ancient Israel’s Criminal Law, p. 12.

Capital punishment points to the final judgment as no other civil penalty does. It reminds sinners of the ultimate restitution penalty that God will impose on all those who refuse to accept His Son's payment on their behalf. The civil government acknowledges that its most fearful form of punishment is to speed convicted criminals along into the courtroom of the cosmic Judge. The magistrate announces that there is no way to restore the convicted criminal to fellowship in earthly society. He visibly becomes what he already is in principle: a sinner in the hands of an angry God.

H. Final Judgment

We see the ultimate example of this two-fold aspect of restitution in the final judgment. Satan and his host, both human and angelic, pay for their rebellion with their lives. Their leavening power of corruption in history is reduced to zero. Their assets are transferred to God's people, who inherit the earth. From a biblical standpoint, this transfer of legal title to the world was accomplished by Christ at Calvary.⁵⁴ Then the rebels are thrown into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15).

This eternal, continual restitution payment honors God, while it simultaneously acts as the perfect deterrent to crime—a covenantal warning that remains before God's servants, both human and angelic, throughout eternity. Resurrected people will never sin again, whether

53. I do not want to give the reader an inflated opinion of Phillips' importance. He was just another obscure liberal theologian toiling fruitlessly in the barren wilderness of higher criticism. I have included this brief survey of some of his ideas as an example of just how intellectually sloppy liberal theology can be, not because he is an important thinker. He is simply a convenient foil. He is all too typical of a small army of liberal theologians whose works would be immediately forgotten if they had ever been read in the first place. These scholars will eventually make full restitution to God for their efforts to deceive their readers concerning the Bible. Liberal scholars are always looking for a new angle to justify the publication of yet another heavily footnoted, utterly boring, totally useless book, especially books like Phillips', which is a rewritten doctoral dissertation—the most footnoted, boring, and useless academic exercise of all. Doctoral dissertations should be interred quietly, preferably in private, with only the author and close family in attendance. If such interment must be public, then it should be as a summary published in a scholarly journal, where the remains' entombment will seldom be disturbed again. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust.

54. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gnininherit>)

they are covenant-breakers or covenant-keepers. Righteous people will not choose to sin, and resurrected sinners will not be able to. In the lake of fire there is only impotence. The ability to adhere to any of the terms of the dominion covenant cease when grace ceases, and there is no grace in the lake of fire.

Then why speak of the deterrence effect of eternal damnation? Because God's judgment is covenantal: blessings and cursings (point four of the Biblical covenant).⁵⁵ There are always conditional aspects to God's covenant promises, as well as unconditional aspects. The promises of God are part of the structure of the covenant. There will be promises and blessings in the post-resurrection new heaven and new earth. Cursing and blessing are eternal, which reminds everyone of the covenant's conditions. Thus, the lake of fire can be spoken of covenantally as a perfect deterrent, for it deters all God-defying behavior forever. It also complements and reinforces the perfect obedience of covenant-keepers who know perfectly well about the perfect torment of covenant-breakers, with their perfect bodies that possess the terrifying ability, like the burning bush that Moses saw, of not being destroyed by a perfect fire. God's perfection is manifested in His perfect wrath.

It is not God's grace that keeps alive covenant-breakers, with their perfect bodies that are so sensitive to every subtle aspect of their endless torment; it is instead His uncompromising wrath that keeps them alive.⁵⁶ Covenant promises, conditions, and sanctions are eternally perfect.⁵⁷ The soul and body of every covenant-breaker are reunited per-

55. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

56. On this point, I disagree with John Calvin's reference to God's grace in keeping souls alive: "And although the soul, after it has departed from the prison of the body, remains alive, yet its doing so does not arise from any inherent power of its own. Were God to withdraw his grace, the soul would be nothing more than a puff or blast, even as the body is dust; and thus there would doubtless be found in the whole man nothing but mere vanity." Calvin, Commentary on the Book of Psalms (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Barker Book House, 1979), Baker's volume VI, p. 138: Ps. 103:15. There is no grace shown by God to the souls of covenant-breakers in hell or the lake of fire. Grace is shown only to the souls of covenant-keepers. Calvin's loose language here was misused by Edward William Fudge in his book-long attempt to deny the biblical doctrine of eternal torment: The Fire That Consumes: A Biblical and Historical Study of Final Punishment (Houston, Texas: Providential Press, 1982), p. 74.

57. Fudge attempted to trace Protestantism's doctrine of the immortality of the soul to Calvin, and Calvin's doctrine of the immortality of the soul to Plato. This argument is nonsense, though representative of similar arguments used by heretical theologians to reject Bible doctrines in the name of rejecting Greek speculation, when in fact they have adopted some variation of humanist speculation. The Bible's doctrine of fectly at the resurrection, so that each can experience the eternal torments of covenant judgment as unified and fully human. There is no dualism of body and soul in the lake of fire.⁵⁸

Perfect justice brings with it a resurrection life permanently devoid of sin. Furthermore, the punishment perfectly fits the ethical crime of rebellion against God. It is a punishment whose magnitude God made quite plain from the beginning: "But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen. 2:17). Absolutely proportional restitution at the final judgment creates the conditions necessary to establish a perfect society beyond the final resurrection.

I. Lex Talionis

Throughout the section of Exodus that immediately follows the Ten Commandments, we are given case-law applications of these commandments. In these case laws, we discover an operating principle: "an eye for an eye," the lex talionis. This principle is the theological foundation of all punishment, and therefore serves as the basis of restitution. This is why God required a living sacrifice, life for life, to atone for mankind's sin. A perfect man had to die in order to atone for the sin of another formerly perfect man, Adam. This is why the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews could write concerning the life and work of Jesus Christ: "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins. Wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me: In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou the immortality of the soul and also its doctrine of eternal torment of the wicked are both grounded in the doctrine of the covenant. It is not surprising that Fudge finds in the Calvinist tradition the most tenacious die-hard defense of the doctrine of eternal punishment. Fudge, ibid., pp. 26n, 466. There is a reason for this tenacity. Calvinism, more than any other Christian tradition, is grounded in the doctrine of the covenant.

58. Fudge and several of the drifting theologians whom he cited continually referred to the orthodox doctrine of souls in hell as implicitly dualistic. The doctrine of hell is no more dualistic than the traditional doctrine of heaven. The issue is not heaven or hell, for both are temporary way stations for souls until God's final judgment; the issue is the post-resurrection world, where souls and bodies are reunited. Fudge fudged this issue, as he did so many others. He covered his flanks with a whole series of peripheral issues—theological and historical rabbit trails for non-covenant theologians to pursue until exhaustion. The fundamental issue is the covenant: God's eternal dead-end judgment for covenant-breakers. This is the issue Fudge never discussed in chapter 20, "Focusing on the Issue," with its subsection, "Traditional Arguments Summarized." It is not man who is central to discussions of final judgment, but rather God and His eternal covenant.

hast had no pleasure” (Heb. 10:4–6). Again, “Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us” (Heb. 9:12). This should have come as no surprise to anyone who had read and believed Exodus 21–22. Atonement for sins against God requires more than the slaughter of animals. Slaughtering an animal does not compensate God for man’s sin. The principle of proportional restitution testified from the beginning against the autonomous adequacy of the Mosaic sacrificial system. It pointed to a greater sacrifice to come. A perfect man would have to die, and more than a perfect man: God’s Son.

As history’s pre-resurrection society begins to approach, though never attain, the perfect justice of proportional restitution, it will thereby approach, though never attain, institutional perfection.⁵⁹ In God’s pre-resurrection cultural “earnest” to His people—His down payment or pledge (Rom. 8:19; Eph. 1:14)—which is the earthly beginning of the new heavens and new earth (Isa. 65:17), people will still die, proving that it will be an era prior to the final judgment, but they will normally live extraordinarily long lives (Isa. 65:20). It will be a period of reduced immorality (Isa. 1:25; 4:2–4), more equitable judgment (Isa. 1:26–27), and greater productivity as a result of universal peace (Isa. 65:22–23). There is an earthly relationship between righteous living (progressive sanctification), godly civil justice, and economic growth.⁶⁰

J. Offsetting Reduced Risks of Detection

The thief who steals a specially protected beast must suffer greater risks for stealing it when compared to any other kind of property. The sheep or ox can easily be slaughtered and eaten. This makes it far more difficult for the civil authorities to discover who the thief is and then prove it in court. Thus, the thief who steals an ox or sheep seems to have a greater likelihood of getting away with the crime. The law therefore imposes far higher penalties in cases of ox-stealing or sheep-

59. Perfection is an ethical requirement, for each individual and for all covenant institutions. It is a mandatory goal: “Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). Christ was simply citing an Old Testament principle regarding sanctification, or holiness (Lev. 11:44). Perfection cannot be attained prior to the day of resurrection, however: “If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us” (I John 1:8–10).

60. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3: C–D.

stealing. This offsets part of the self-subsidy—the reduction of the risk of detection—that the thief receives when he slaughters the animal, thereby destroying the evidence.

But what about selling the animals? This is the equivalent of kidnapping, for these particular animals represent man. Thus, there is a higher penalty attached to their theft. This higher penalty relates to the symbolic aspect of the forbidden act of man-stealing. Selling a useful beast that can be taken into a different part of the country makes it easier for the thief to escape detection. The thief does not wear a stolen jewel or use a stolen tool, which would make it easier to detect his crime locally. The animal, which was under the personal protection of its owner, is separated from the owner permanently. Biblical law therefore stipulates that the thief who does sell the beast is placed under greater risk. Should he be proven to be the thief, he will be required to pay four-fold or five-fold restitution to the victim.

This explanation may seem strained, but it is necessary if we are to make sense of Exodus 22:9, which regulates property placed in trust with a neighbor. If the neighbor loses the goods, they both must go before the civil magistrates. If the neighbor is found guilty, he pays double restitution. “For all manner of trespass, whether it be for ox, for ass, for sheep, for raiment, or for any manner of lost thing, which another challengeth to be his, the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbour.”

Why should the neighbor be required to pay only double restitution for a sheep or ox in this case? What about five-fold and four-fold restitution? My answer: because the neighbor cannot conceal the crime in the way that the outsider can when he slaughters or sells the animal. In short, it is easier for the victimized owner to prove his legal case against a neighbor than it is for him to prove his case against an unknown thief who disposes of the evidence. Thus, the penalty imposed on the neighbor is double restitution, which is the standard requirement for the theft of all other goods except slaughtered or sold oxen and sheep. Because the owner faces reduced difficulties in recovering his property, and the thief therefore faces increased risk, the penalty payment is reduced.

Conclusion

What will be the marks of civil justice during an era of biblical justice? Victims will see the restoration of their stolen assets, while criminals will see their ill-gotten capital melt away because of the financial burden of making restitution payments. The dual sanctions of curse and blessing—part four of the biblical covenant model⁶¹—are invoked and imposed wherever the principle of restitution is honored in the courts, both civil and ecclesiastical. Restitution brings both judgment and restoration, which affect individual lives and social institutions.

There are limits to biblical restitution. First, the full value of whatever was stolen is returned by the thief to the original owner. Second, the thief makes an additional penalty payment equal to the value of the item stolen. To encourage criminals to admit their guilt and seek restoration before their crimes are discovered, the Bible imposes a reduced penalty of 20% on those who admit their guilt voluntarily (Lev. 6:2–5).

There are two exceptions to double restitution. The law singles out oxen and sheep as deserving special protection in the form of five-fold and four-fold restitution in cases where the stolen animals are killed or sold. Because oxen and sheep are symbolic of mankind, the law thereby points to the need of protecting men from oppression and slavery. He is given responsibility over oxen and sheep, implying that he is also given responsibility over other men in various circumstances. To thwart a man in the exercise of his lawful occupation is a crime against dominion man, and is punishable by God.

Proportional restitution is imposed by the civil government as God's lawful representative on earth. The three economic goals of proportional restitution are these: (1) restoring full value to the victim; (2) protecting future potential victims by means of the deterrence effect of the penalty payment (Deut. 13:11): (a) animals, especially those symbolic of man's helplessness (sheep and oxen), and (b) property owners; and (3) offsetting the lower economic risks of detection associated with certain kinds of theft—the slaughter or sale of specially protected edible animals.

Biblical restitution also has at least three civil goals in addition to the three economic goals. The first civil goal of restitution is to make life easier for the law-abiding citizen by fostering external social conditions in which he can live in peace and safety. Peace and safety are the fully legitimate goals of all biblical justice, which God has promised to bring to pass in world history through His church during a future period of earthly millennial peace. The nations will come to God's church ("the mountain of the house of the LORD") in search of true justice (Mic. 4:1–5).

61. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

A second civil goal of biblical restitution is to make possible the full judicial restoration of the criminal to society after he has paid the victim what he owes him.⁶² The state is not to concern itself with the psychological restoration of the criminal, the victim, or society in general. The state's jurisdiction is strictly limited to the realm of the judicial: restitution. The psychological state of the criminal is between himself and God, as is the psychological state of the victim. Nevertheless, as in the case of the salvation of any individual by God's grace, judicial restoration is the first step toward psychological restoration.

The third civil goal of biblical restitution is not intuitively obvious, but it may be the most important goal for the modern world. A system of biblical restitution is required in order to reduce the likelihood that citizens will come to view the civil government as an agency that lawfully initiates programs leading to personal or social transformation. The state's task is to assess the economic damage that was inflicted on the victim and then impose judgment on the convicted criminal that will reimburse the victim for his loss, plus a penalty payment. Normally, this means double restitution. The state is not an agency of creative transformation. It is not a savior state. Men should not seek to make the state an agency of social salvation. It is supposed to enforce biblical civil law—no more, no less. The state is not supposed to seek to make men righteous; its God-assigned task is to restrain certain specified acts of public evil. Theft is one of these acts.

Civil government is an agency of visible judgment in history. Justice demands judgment. The judgments handed down by civil government acknowledge the historic judgments of God, as well as point to the final judgment of God. The goal of civil justice is always restoration; restoration through restitution or restoration through execution. This two-fold system of civil judgment also characterizes God's judgments, which are equally judicial.

62. The modern American practice of never again allowing convicted felons to vote is clearly immoral. Under biblical law, a convicted criminal becomes a former convicted criminal when he has made full restitution to his victims. In this sense, he is "resurrected" judicially. After he has paid his debt to his victims, he must be restored to full political participation. To segregate the former convicted criminal from any area of civic authority or participation is to deny judicially that full civil restoration is made possible by means of God's civil law.

When God deals with His people in a harsh way in history, it is a means of restoration: judgment unto restoration, not judgment unto destruction. The atoning work of Jesus Christ at Calvary points the way to a better world in history; restitution has been made to God by the only possible ethically acceptable representative of man, the Son of God. The Christian's expectation of better earthly times is therefore valid. Christ's restitution payment has been made, on earth and in history.

One thing is needed to translate His atonement into social reality: the progressive transformation of the criminal justice system in terms of biblical law, something that cannot take place until the humanistic theology which undergirds the existing system of justice is replaced by biblical orthodoxy. Anyone who denies that such a progressive transformation of the criminal justice system is possible in history is thereby also denying that the atoning work of Christ can be manifested progressively in history. Anyone who denies that such a progressive transformation of the criminal justice system will actually take place in history is thereby also denying that the atoning work of Christ can be manifested progressively in history. People should therefore consider carefully the economic, social, political, and ethical implications of their eschatological views. When they make eschatological pronouncements, they are inescapably also making economic, social, political and ethical pronouncements. Eschatology and ethics cannot be successfully separated.

POLLUTION, OWNERSHIP, AND RESPONSIBILITY

If a man shall cause a field or vineyard to be eaten, and shall put in his beast, and shall feed in another man's field; of the best of his own field, and of the best of his own vineyard, shall he make restitution. If fire break out, and catch in thorns, so that the stacks of corn, or the standing corn, or the field, be consumed therewith; he that kindled the fire shall surely make restitution (Ex. 22:5–6).

The theocentric issue raised by this passage rests on the recognition of each person's legal obligations as a responsible steward over private property (hierarchy: point 2) in a world in which God is the absolute owner of the world (sovereignty: point 1). As part of His providential administration over the world, God establishes boundaries in life (boundaries: point 3). These boundaries are ultimately ethical: the boundaries between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. The existence of these ethical boundaries is reflected in every area of life. Man cannot think or act apart from boundaries of various kinds. These ethical boundaries are reinforced by legal boundaries that separate the use of property. Boundaries are therefore inescapably tied to the legal issue of personal responsibility before God and man. To enforce these boundaries, God imposes penalties for their violation: (point 4: sanctions). This structure of biblical authority is basic to the extension of the kingdom of God in history (point 5: inheritance).

This passage deals with fire. Fire is a form of pollution. In this case, it has a source. It has a victim. It spreads across legal boundaries. This boundary violation calls forth sanctions: restitution. This simple legal relationship is the biblical starting point for a discussion of pollution in general. This legal relationship has economic effects. It provides the proper conceptual framework for an analysis of the economics of pollution.

A. God Allocates Property and Responsibility

God parcels out property to his subordinates. The very phrase, parcels out, reflects the noun, a parcel. God places specified units of land under the administration of specific individuals, families, and institutions. This division of authority is an aspect of God's overall system of the division of labor. Responsibility for the administration of specific property units can therefore be specified by law. The allocation of legal responsibility matches the allocation of property. God holds specific people responsible for their stewardship over specific pieces of property. This enables owners to evaluate their own performance as stewards, and it also allows the free market and God-ordained governmental authorities to evaluate owners' specific performance. The ultimate economic issues are these: (1) each person's stewardship over property in history and (2) God's judicial response in history and at the final judgment to their administration of His property (Matt. 25). The temporal institutional issues of ownership-stewardship are covenantally related to these ultimate issues.

1. Property Rights

These verses make plain at least three facts. First, the Bible affirms the moral and legal legitimacy of the private ownership of the means of production. Fields and cattle and crops are owned by private individuals. Second, private property rights (legal immunities from action by others) are to be defended by the civil government. The state can and must require those people whose activities injure their neighbor or their neighbor's property to make restitution payments to those injured. Third, owners are therefore responsible for their own actions and for the actions of their subordinates, including wandering beasts.¹

This combination of (1) privately owned property, (2) personal liability, and (3) predictable court enforcement of private property rights is the foundation of capitalism. It surely was a major aspect of the West's long-term economic growth.² But, as I argue in this chapter,

1. Hammurabi's Code penalized a man who neglected to repair a dike on his property, which in turn broke and allowed his neighbor's property to be flooded: CH, paragraph 53. If he allowed water to flow through his canal and onto his neighbor's property, he was liable: CH, paragraph 55. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), p. 168.

2. Nathan Rosenberg and L. E. Birdsell, Jr., How the West Grew Rich: The Economic Transformation of the Industrial World (New York: Basic Books, 1986), ch. 4.

this property ownership arrangement is also important for both the reduction and the allocation of pollution.

2. The Wandering Domestic Animal

We begin with the case of the wandering animal. It wanders from its property and invades another man's corn field. It eats some of this corn. The owner of the beast owes the victimized neighbor the equivalent of whatever has been destroyed.³ The owner of the beast must not short-change the victim; he pays from the best of his field. The legal principle is that the injured party is entitled to the replacement of his damaged goods by the best of the responsible party's possessions. What is the theocentric principle that this legal principle reflects? It is this: God, in imposing an appropriate restitution payment from rebellious mankind, is entitled to the best that man has to offer. This is why man was not allowed under the Old Covenant to bring to God's sacrificial altar any injured or blemished animal (Lev. 1:10). "But cursed be the deceiver, which hath in his flock a male, and voweth, and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing" (Mal. 1:14a). When Ananias and Sapphira brought only part of their pledged money to the church, but claimed that they were bringing in all of it, God killed them (Acts 5:1–10).⁴ They had violated a fundamental biblical principle. They became publicly cursed deceivers. "And great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things" (Acts 5:11).

3. Restitution to God

This theocentric principle governing restitution to God points to the ultimate principle governing the atonement: only a perfect offering for sin can placate the God of perfect wrath. Anyone who attempts to bring a blemished sacrifice to the altar of God will be destroyed. This, of course, is the underlying soteriological requirement that made necessary the incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ. Only a perfect man, God's own Son, can serve as an acceptable sacrifice for sinful mankind (Heb. 2:14–18; 9:12–14). A sinful man will perish eternally if he attempts to short-change God by offering anything on judgment day in place of exclusive faith in the true mediator and high priest, Jesus Christ.

3. Maimonides made this peculiar exception: "If an animal eats foodstuffs harmful to it, such as wheat, the owner is exempt because it has not benefited." Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1954), I:III:3, p. 12. That the victim must suffer an economic loss just because his neighbor's animal did not profit biologically from its invasion of the former's property is a principle of justice that needs a great deal of explaining. Maimonides provided no further discussion; he just laid down this principle of Jewish law, and went on.

4. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 4.

Initially, Exodus 22:5–6 may seem self-explanatory. Nevertheless, when we consider the passage in the light of the many intellectual and institutional problems related to the whole question of pollution and ecology, its application in society becomes an enormously complex judicial task. Without the legal guidelines established by the passage, we could not deal effectively with the pollution problem.

B. Pollution: Socialistic and Free Market

Contrary to many of the twentieth-century critiques of both capitalism and pollution, socialist commonwealths did not produce reasonable, cost-effective, workable solutions to the pollution problem.⁵ Think of Poland's Katowice region, in which the sulphuric and nitric acids released into the atmosphere by coal and steel plants so corroded the railway tracks that the trains were not allowed to go over 25 miles per hour.⁶ Think of the workers in Cracow's steel plant, where in 1980, 80% of those leaving the plant received disability payments, and 7.5% died while still employed.⁷ The problem is inherent in the state's ownership of the means of production; the means of production necessarily must include the workers. The state owns their labor. Ultimately, the radical socialist and Communist states assert actual ownership of the workers, disposing of them however the bureaucrats see fit. It is "common ownership"—bureaucratic ownership—which creates most of the economic incentives to pollute and exploit the environment, because leaders within the civil government's hierarchy become the unnoticed beneficiaries of the increased output of lower-cost industrial processes that produce the pollution. The plant managers meet their state-assigned output quotas less expensively (for their local plants) by transferring some of the costs of production to the public: smoke, noise, chemical wastes, etc. Politically acceptable solutions to wide-

5. Fred Singleton (ed.), Environmental Misuse in the Soviet Union (New York: Praeger, 1976).

6. Lloyd Timberlake, "Poland—the most polluted country in the world?" New Statesman (22 October 1981), p. 248.

7. Ibid., p. 249.

spread pollution have never been successfully implemented in socialist societies because it is the private ownership of the means of production that serves as a key element in any successful program of pollution control.⁸

At the same time, free market economists have not been able to produce theoretically acceptable solutions to the problem of pollution that do not rest heavily on the idea of the necessity of government intervention into market operations. The problem then becomes: How much intervention is appropriate in any given case? There is no theoretically acceptable answer to this problem. In fact, because of the very nature of modern economic theory, there never will be a theoretically acceptable solution that is consistent with contemporary economics. I have added Appendix H to prove this assertion. It deals with the crucial, neglected, and somewhat technical problem: determining social cost. I have added it in order to demonstrate that conventional humanist economic theory is epistemologically incapable of dealing with the problem of pollution—or any problem of applied economics, for that matter—because there is no self-consistent way for the economist to go from modern economics’ methodological individualism to collective decision-making in terms of the presuppositions of modern economic theory. The economists almost never discuss this embarrassing fact, although the more sophisticated members of the economics profession have been aware of it since at least 1938,⁹ but it is nonetheless a fact.

Thus, both collectivism and free enterprise face a growing problem, the problem of minimizing the negative effects of pollution without simultaneously destroying the benefits of economic growth. Neither variety of secular economic theory has a scientific answer to this problem. This is why Christian economics is needed. This is why we must begin our economic analysis with Exodus 22:5–6.

C. Capturing Economics for Christ

The theoretical and practical problems associated with the pollution question are numerous. The problems are ethical, technical, theoretical, and ultimately philosophical. Economists do not like to admit that all problems in applied economic theory have inherent and ines-

8. See Appendix I: “Pollution in the Soviet Union.”

9. The debate in The Economic Journal between Lionel Robbins and Roy Harrod. I discuss this in Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5.

capable ethical and philosophical aspects, so they tend to ignore or even suppress these aspects of applied economics when discussing them in their scholarly journals. This is why modern economics to a great extent is fraudulent—a mental contrivance to conceal fundamental ethical issues, a series of rarified mental exercises devised for agnostics by agnostics. But the agnostics maintain monopoly control over the professional journals because they control the funds, the academic institutions, and the certification of younger scholars. This epistemological agnosticism must change if economics as a discipline is to be saved, but only self-consciously Christian scholars can redeem it.

How should Christians go about redeeming any academic discipline? By beginning with the whole Bible as academically and professionally authoritative. Christians must begin to tackle those intellectual problems for which the humanists have no consistent answers. In the case of economics, Christians must follow the lead set by Cornelius Van Til in philosophy. Van Til did not ask: “Is Christian philosophy valid?” He started with the premise that there is no valid philosophy except Christian philosophy. That is what I have asserted with regard to Christian economics. The humanists have run out of internally consistent answers. In fact, they never had accurate answers that were not implicitly based on biblical presuppositions, and the further away the economists get from the Bible, the fewer accurate answers they provided.

We can see this drift away from theoretically consistent answers by a study of a specific problem of applied economics, pollution. This chapter can serve as an introduction to the kinds of theoretical and practical problems that face professional economists, and that also face Christians who are intent upon redeeming economics for Christ. It is a scaled-down study, not overly technical (except for Appendix H, on social costs). It is only an introduction. Nevertheless, the topic’s complexity may scare off Christian laymen. Because of this complexity, I need to list in advance some of the basic themes in this lengthy chapter. The reader should be prepared to think through some fundamental ethical issues. This is the price of the first phase of Christian reconstruction.

- How to assess true costs and benefits
- Overusing “free” resources
- Private property vs. disputes
- Fire as pollution
- Damage and restitution

Restitution in advance (discounts)
 Allowing prior pollution to continue
 Voluntary contracts that allow pollution
 Pollution and the varying costs of knowledge Risks that can be insured against Undiscovered risk and legal liability
 Retroactive penalties vs. innovation
 Externalities: forcing you to pay me
 How to allocate pollution regionally
 A pollution auction
 Wastes and stewardship: Who pays?
 Pollution as trespassing
 The problem of moving fluids: liability
 Automobile emissions: noise and exhaust
 Fire codes: Are they biblical?
 Organizing injured victims
 Exchanging risks voluntarily
 Increased wealth and pollution complaints
 Localism and pollution control
 Subsidizing the politically skilled
 The anti-dominion impulse
 Claims of future generations
 Incentives and sanctions
 Pollution and responsibility
 State officers as surrogates
 Information and pollution: Who knew?
 Incentives and sanctions to stop
 Zero pollution: a messianic quest

D. The “Tragedy of the Commons”

A fundamental economic problem in any system of common ownership is the problem of assessing true costs and benefits.

1. Common Land

Historically, one of the most familiar of these systems of common ownership has been commonly held land. From the Middle Ages through at least the late seventeenth century, these property units were known as “the commons,” and the term still persists in some regions of the United States, referring usually to city parks.

Where the community allows citizens to place their grazing animals on the commons, a whole series of difficulties emerges. The economic benefits accrue directly to the man who places his animal on the “free” land, but the costs are borne by everyone in the community who would like to use the property for any other purpose. In Puritan New England in the seventeenth century, roaming animals uprooted plants and overgrazed pastures. Townspeople cut down trees in the night for firewood or fencing.¹⁰ Similar problems have plagued the commons in every culture. This is the direct result of a system of ownership in which economic gains go to individual users and costs are borne by non-users.

Such a system inevitably produces economic waste and personal disputes over the proper use of the common property. Those who benefit directly from their personal use of the commons have few direct economic incentives to conserve the commons’ scarce economic resources, for these resources are obtained at nearly zero cost to the private users. The cost of running one additional animal on the commons is minutely felt by any single taxpayer-owner, but he receives the full benefits immediately. Individual benefits are high; per capita costs are low. There is an economic incentive to overgraze the commons, for economic restraints are minimal (e.g., taking your animals to the pasture), while the benefits are direct. This creates a system of “positive economic feedback” rather than “negative feedback.” It leads to a situation described by some scholars as “the tragedy of the commons.”¹¹ It involves such phenomena as overgrazing, soil exhaustion, and pollution. J. H. Dales correctly observed: “The economic effect of making common property available for use on a no-rule basis, so that it may be freely used by anyone for any purpose at any time, is crystal clear. Common property will be over-used relative to both private property and to public property that is subject to charges for its use or to rules about its use; and if the unrestricted common property resource is depletable, over-use will in time lead to its depletion and therefore to the destruction of the property.”¹²

10. Gary North, “The Puritan Experiment in Common Ownership,” The Freeman (April 1974); reprinted in Puritan Economic Experiments (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gnpuritanecon>)

11. Garrett Hardin, “The Tragedy of the Commons,” Science (13 Dec. 1968). (<http://bit.ly/HardinCom>) Hardin called for greater government intervention rather than an expansion of private property rights. A refutation is C. R. Batten’s “The Tragedy of the Commons,” The Freeman (Oct. 1970). (<http://bit.ly/BatCom>). See also Robert J. Smith, “Resolving the Tragedy of the Commons by Creating Private Property Rights in Wildlife,” Cato Journal, I (Fall 1981), pp. 439–68, and “Comment” by Walter N. Thurman, pp. 469–71.

12. J. H. Dales, Pollution, Property, and Prices: An Essay in Policy-Making and Economics (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1968), p. 63.

2. Private Ownership

The private ownership of property drastically reduces these problems. Private costs are more readily, accurately, and inexpensively assessed than public or social costs, precisely because private owners directly face the effects of their own economic decisions. The cost of adding another animal to the land is borne directly by the man who expects to profit from the decision, if the owner of the animal is also the owner of the land.¹³ When the expected private costs of adding one more animal to the land exceed expected future benefits, owners will stop adding new animals. Private costs and private benefits tend to balance over the long run. The better the knowledge that owners have about costs and benefits, the more rapidly these costs and benefits will be balanced. Scarce economic resources are thereby better conserved in a legal system that affirms and enforces private ownership of the means of production, i.e., the free market system.

Nevertheless, men are continually tempted to pass on their costs of operation to their neighbors, while retaining personally all the benefits of production. In private affairs, this quite properly is called theft. One man may sneak his animals into another man's field. The other man is harmed economically—robbed of a portion of his land's productivity. The injured party has an immediate economic incentive to put a stop to his neighbor's practice of transferring production costs to him. His incentive as an injured private owner to stop the practice is far greater than it would be in a system of common ownership, where the injury is spread over the entire population of so-called owners. (Do we really own common property? If a man cannot disown a piece of property, it is difficult to see how he can be said to own it.¹⁴ At best, the costs of "disownership" are high; they involve political mobilization, not simply a private offer to sell.)

13. In the case of land which is rented or leased, the renter may attempt to pass some of these costs to the owner. He may allow his animals to overgraze, or he may allow the soil to be depleted or damaged in other ways. Profit-seeking owners need to consider these costs when they draw up the terms of the lease. The original lease contract may impose penalties on renters who damage the property, or it may include incentives so that he will care for it. These economic-legal problems plagued Irish tenant farming during the centuries of absentee English ownership: Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1986), pp. 63–65.

14. "The corollary of the right of ownership is the right of disownership. So if I cannot sell a thing, it is evident that I do not really own it." F. A. Harper, Liberty: A Path to Its Recovery (Irvington-on-Hudson, New York: Foundation for Economic Education, 1949), p. 106. (<http://bit.ly/HarperLiberty>)

The desire to reduce costs is strongly felt on both sides of the fence that separates privately owned properties. In fact, the very existence of the fence testifies to a man's desire to keep outsiders from transferring their costs to him. Of course, a fence also testifies to people's desire to avoid having their "benefits" wander off, especially if they might cause damage to another person's property, assuming restitution is the law of the land. As the American poet Robert Frost put it in his poem Mending Wall, good fences make good neighbors. What we need is a system of law that encourages people to mend their own fences. We need to do better than Talmudic Judaism, which simply forbade Jews to breed cattle, sheep, and goats anywhere near towns or settlements. These animals could be legally bred only in desert areas.¹⁵

3. Fences Reduce Conflicts

The Bible affirms that those who violate fences or property lines must make full restitution to the economically injured neighbor. The assessment of harm is easier to make than under common ownership. "His cows ate this row of corn in my cornfield." The owner of the damage-producing animals is responsible. Responsibility and ownership are directly linked under a system of private property rights. Under a system of private ownership, property lines are in effect cost-cutting devices, for they serve as cost-assessing devices. Without clearly defined property rights, and therefore without clearly defined responsibilities, the rights of "property"—God's living creatures and a created environment under man's dominion (Gen. 9:1–17)¹⁶—will be sacrificed.

Carefully defined property rights also help to reduce social conflicts. Dales wrote:

Unrestricted common property rights are bound to lead to all sorts of social, political, and economic friction, especially as population pressure increases, because, in the nature of the case, individuals have no legal rights with respect to the property when its government owner follows a policy of "anything goes." Notice, too, that such a policy, though apparently neutral as between conflicting interests, in fact always favours one party against the other. Technolo-

15. Aaron Levine, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law: Aspects of Jewish Business Ethics (New York: Ktav Publishing House, Yeshiva University, 1980), p. 68. He cited the Talmudic book, Baba Kamma, 79b, 80a. He also cited numerous rabbinic sources: Maimonides, Karo, etc. (p. 194, note 42).

16. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 17.

gically, swimmers cannot harm the polluters, but the polluters can harm the swimmers; when property rights are undefined those who wish to use the property in ways that deteriorate it will inevitably triumph every time over those who wish to use it in ways that do not deteriorate it.¹⁷

Common ownership of large bodies of water, when coupled with an opportunity to pass on private costs of polluted production, increases the extent of water pollution. This is a bad system for the swimmers of this world.

In questions of pollution and environmental quality, there can be no neutrality. There are always winners and losers, although net winners may suffer some losses (air polluters breathe, too), and net losers may gain some benefits (asthmatics may earn high incomes by working for firms that sell raw materials to local polluting factories). It is the task of biblical exegesis to establish the ethical and legal foundations that enable civil judges to do the following: (1) identify the winners and the losers; (2) adjudicate cases properly in the sight of God; and (3) determine what is fair compensation to the losers from any unauthorized winners. One thing is certain: we cannot hope to attain a zero-pollution environment. All life is a form of pollution.

E. Fire and Pollution

Each owner is also responsible for whatever actions that his animate or inanimate objects do that injure others. A fire that a man kindles on his land must be kept restrained to his property. If the fire spreads to his neighbor's field, he is fully accountable for all the damages. Men therefore have an incentive to take greater care when using potentially dangerous tools or techniques.

The problem of pollution should be subsumed under the general principle of responsibility for fire. A fire is a physical cause of physical damage. From the case-law example in Exodus 22:5, it is clear that a fire that a man starts is his responsibility. He cannot legally transfer risks to his neighbor without his neighbor's consent.

The Bible is not talking here about some shared project in which both men expect to profit, such as burning fields to get rid of weeds or unwanted grass. In such a mutually shared project, the case-law example of the man who rents his work animal to a neighbor, but who stays with the animal the whole time, is applicable. The neighbor is not required to pay anything beyond the hiring fee to the owner (Ex. 22:14–15).¹⁸ If the animal is hurt or killed, the neighbor owes nothing. (If the two men start a fire that spreads to a third party's property and damages it, English common law holds both of them responsible, though not necessarily in equal economic portions, because the victim can collect more money from one than another¹⁹—what we might call “deeper pockets jurisprudence.” Such a legal tradition makes joint activities between rich men and poor men less likely; the rich person, if he is aware of the law, knows that he will be required by the court to pay the lion's share of any joint restitution, simply because he can pay it more easily.)

17. Dales, Pollution, p. 67.

There is no doubt that the fire-starter is responsible for all subsequent fires that his original fire starts. Sparks from a fire can spread anywhere. A fire beginning on one man's farm can spread to thousands of acres. Fire is therefore essentially unpredictable. Its effects on specific people living nearby cannot be known with precision. I adopt the principle of uncertainty, meaning the unpredictability of the specific, individual consequences of any fire, as the governing principle of my discussion of restitution for damage-producing fires, as well as laws relating to the regulation of fire hazards.

What about pollution? Specifically, what about the uncertainty aspect of pollution? A Christian economist should argue that a man must not pollute his neighbor's property without making restitution to him for any new damaging effects. If existing pollution is discovered to be more harmful medically or ecologically than had been understood before, the polluter should be required to reimburse those who are subsequently affected adversely by the pollutant after the information concerning the danger is made public by the state or becomes known within the polluting industry. (I will consider the legal and economic problems associated with retroactive responsibility in a subsection of this chapter, F:3: “Undiscovered Risk.”)

1. Land Discounts: Restitution in Advance

But what if the complaining neighbor had purchased his land knowing all about present nuisance effects (as distinguished from subsequently discovered nuisance effects) of the pollution process that was going on next door to his property? Does he now have the legal right to sue his neighbor, who is doing exactly what he was doing before the contiguous property was sold? After all, the buyer bought the property at a discount as a result of the depressing effect on local land prices produced by the pollution. There is no doubt that there is an inverse relationship between the damage caused by pollution and land rents (and therefore the market price of land): the greater the pollution, the lower the rents.²⁰ The purchase price of land—the capitalization of expected net returns over time—reveals this inverse relationship.

18. Chapter 47.

19. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law, pp. 171–73.

Economic analysis informs us about the costs and benefits of biblical morality, and biblical law tells us who should bear these costs and receive these benefits. As potential buyers, we look at the discount in the purchase price of the land next door to a polluting production process, and we can conclude that this discount serves as an advance payment of restitution to the buyer. It is an advance payment for specified, known kinds of expected future “spillovers.” The nuisance effects of these spillovers from the property next door are implicitly agreed to by the buyer when he receives his discount from the seller. Any subsequent attempt by the buyer to demand financial compensation from the polluter under such circumstances is simply a demand for a statist, compulsory redistribution of private property. So is any legislation that would force the polluter to reduce pollution, unless new information regarding the dangers of the pollution is discovered. It would be a demand for restitution in addition to the discount already received by the buyer when he bought the property.

Murray Rothbard used the concept of the “homesteading principle” to defend the legal right of a polluter to continue to pollute. By developing a previously unused piece of land, the polluter has created an easement right to whatever polluting processes he adopts, just so long as these processes do no physical harm to those people who owned nearby property when he bought or discovered his land. He “owns the right” to emit noise or other forms of pollution, assuming his original neighbors were unaffected. In the case of pollution, he called this a pollution easement.²¹ This is comparable to the right to start a fire on property you own.

20. T. D. Crocker, “Externalities, Property Rights, and Transaction Costs: An Empirical Study,” Journal of Law and Economics, XIV (Oct. 1971), p. 452.

21. Murray N. Rothbard, “Law, Property Rights, and Air Pollution,” Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), p. 77; reprinted in Rothbard, The Logic of Action: Two (Cheltenham, UK: Edward Elgar. (1997), pp. 146–47. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardLPRAP>)

The Christian economist could also argue that a protesting “pro-environmentalist” who demands that the civil government put a stop to his neighbor’s pollution is seeking to achieve a less polluted lifestyle at his neighbor’s expense, despite the fact that he bought the property at a discount because of the pollution. Would the protester be willing to pass on to the polluter any increase in the value of his property that results from the reduction of pollution, to help defray the costs of reducing the pollution? Or would he be willing to return an amount of money equal to the increased property value to the original seller, who had to take a discount in order to sell the property? If not, why not? Economically speaking, he is demanding double compensation: initially from the seller, who took a discount, and then from the polluter. Is this fair, even in the name of ecology?

2. Sewers and Property Value

Perhaps we can better understand the economic issues that are involved here by examining the economics involved in the installation of water or sewer lines in a region of town that had previously been dependent on wells and septic tanks. The municipal government could make an offer to local residents who are about to see their property values rise as a result of the new municipal service. The city says: “If you want to hook up to the new lines, you must pay a high hook-up fee to the municipal water company—a fee closer to the full value of the resulting increase in your property’s value.” In short, the resident who receives the increase in the value of his land must pay for this appreciated value. This is the way that new sewer projects should be financed, not by assessing all taxpayers in the community. Those who benefit directly and immediately should bear the full costs of the project, or at the minimum, should be required to pay the equivalent of the immediate increase in the value of the property, perhaps in the form of higher assessments per month for a fixed period of time. If sewers were financed this way, there would probably be less political resistance from local taxpayers to local growth.²²

What is the economic principle involved? Simple: one person should not be compelled by the state to finance the exclusive increase in value of another person’s property. The taxpayer whose property is unaffected by the increased benefits associated with a new water or sewer line should not suffer economic losses (higher property taxes or water bills) because he has to pay for another resident's economic windfall (waterfall?). The beneficiary should pay for the benefit.

22. Gary North, “Public Goods and Fear of Foreigners,” The Freeman (March 1974). (<http://bit.ly/PublicGoods>)

So it is with pollution. The beneficiary of the improved environment—a benefit extracted through compulsion by the civil government—should pay for this improvement. He should compensate the neighbor for the costs borne by the neighbor in reducing the existing level of pollution.

3. Private Contracts

Why should the civil government get involved in the dispute at all? Why shouldn't the benefit-seeker approach the polluter directly and offer him direct compensation? The beneficiary knows approximately what it would be worth to him to escape from the pollutant. The polluter knows approximately what the value of being able to pollute means to him. If the benefit-seeker's price is high enough, he can persuade the polluter to sign a contract guaranteeing to reduce or eliminate the polluting activity. In effect, the benefit-seeker pays to the polluter part or all of the discount he initially received from the seller.

The polluter may reject the offer. Under the assumptions of this hypothetical example, this is his legal privilege. But it costs him to reject the offer. He forfeits the economic benefit offered by the pollution-avoider. His cost of continuing to pollute has just risen appreciably. He can no longer pollute at zero cost. He has an economic incentive to stop polluting the environment.

I am speaking here of pollution that was known in advance, and for which the buyer of the adjacent property received a discount. I am not speaking of new pollution or an older pollution process which, through improved scientific knowledge, is now understood to be more of a physical hazard than had been understood before.

Summary

By assigning to individuals the economic and legal responsibilities of ownership, God imposes on individuals the burden of assessing the costs and benefits of their actions. There is no escape from this economic responsibility. "No decision" is still a decision. If an asset is squandered, the owner loses.

The chief failure of what is commonly referred to as collective ownership is that no individual can be sure that his assessment of the costs and benefits of a particular use of any asset is the same assessment that those whom he represents economically would make. The tendency is for individuals who are legally empowered to make these representative decisions to decide in terms of what is best for them as individuals. There is also a tendency for the decision-maker to make mistakes, because he cannot know the minds and desires of the community as a whole.

The common property tends to be wasted unless restraints on its use are imposed by the civil government. The “positive feedback” signals of high profits for the users are not offset by equally constraining “negative feedback” signals. Users of a scarce economic resource benefit highly as immediate users, yet they bear few costs as diluted-responsibility collective owners. Thus, in order to “save the property from exploitation,” the civil government steps in and regulates users. This leads to political conflicts.

The biblical solution to this problem is to establish clear ownership rights (legal immunities) for property. The individual assesses costs and benefits in terms of his scale of values. He represents the consumer as an economic agent only because he has exclusive use of the property as legal agent. He produces profits or losses with these assets in terms of his abilities as an economic steward. The market tells him whether he is an effective agent of the competing consumers.

The legal system simultaneously assigns responsibility for the administration of these privately owned assets to the legal owners. It becomes the owners’ legal responsibility to avoid physically damaging their neighbors through the use of their privately held property. The specific biblical classification of fire damage governs pollution in general.

There is no doubt that living close to a source of pollution increases the risk of suffering economic losses. The market reveals this by forcing sellers of polluted or nearly polluted land to offer discounts to buyers. This leads us to conclude that if a person has bought a piece of property at a discount because of its proximity to a known source of pollution, the buyer has no legal claim against the polluter unless the latter adds to the level of pollution or else new dangers regarding the pollution itself are subsequently discovered.

The civil government should not tax one group in order to reward exclusively some other group. Thus, individuals should pay to gain access to a cleaner environment if they are the only (or primary) beneficiaries of the cleaner environment. Each person should assess the costs and benefits of living in a cleaner environment. Nevertheless, when someone begins to damage his neighbor's physical environment, the victim should be able by law to put a stop to the polluter's activity or else be compensated by the polluter.

F. Pollution and the Costs of Knowledge

If pollution is really equivalent to fire's damaging effects, and because we see that the Bible makes all fire-starters legally liable for damages, then is this economic analysis of pollution and damages—the concept of the purchase price discount as a form of restitution payment—ethically biblical? Shouldn't all damage-inflicting pollution be banned, whether or not the buyer next door knew in advance about it? After all, he may also have known that the man next door started fires regularly, but he would also know in a biblical commonwealth that the fire-starter is personally liable for all future damages that his fire might cause. Why should the polluter be allowed to go on with his polluting without paying damages, yet the fire-starter be required to pay for all damages, irrespective of the neighbor's discount? Are the two cases ethically the same or different?

1. The Economics of Uncertainty

They are the same cases in principle, but they are different in application. To explain the differences in application, I must return to the issue of uncertainty. Specific effects of noise and smoke are known by the general public. They are nuisance effects. They are effects that buyers can estimate, at least to the extent that discounts are offered by sellers to buyers for agreeing to live next door to smoke and noise pollution. In contrast to the known effects of a familiar form of pollution, the specific effects of any given fire are uncertain. They can be negligible or catastrophic. A fire may affect people distant from the point of origin. Thus, the fire-starter is warned: be extremely careful. Biblical law warns all fire-starters: "You are legally responsible for all damages caused by your actions. We all know how dangerous fires are; do not attempt to transfer the side-effects to a neighbor." Under biblical law, society is partially protected from essentially unpredictable catastrophes, because those who light the fires are restrained by the threat of full financial responsibility for damages that the fires inflict.

The difference between "traditional" polluters—smoke, noise, smells—and fire-starters is primarily a difference in men's knowledge of each action's future effects. The specific local effects of a familiar form of pollution are approximately known in advance to those who choose to live near pollution. The specific effects of specific fires caused by local fire-starters are not well known to nearby residents. Whether specific sparks from a specific fire will be harmless or will ignite this or that field, or this or that neighborhood, cannot be known in advance. I must focus my exegetical attention on these specific effects.

2. Insurable Risk

The existence of fire insurance does not invalidate this analysis of "the economics of specific effects." While it is often possible for a person to buy fire insurance, the reason why fire insurance is available at all is because companies insure many different regions, thereby taking advantage of "the law of large numbers." They can insure specific properties economically only because fires have known effects in the aggregate. If there were no known statistical pattern to fires in general, insurers would not insure specific properties against fire damage.

This is not to say that the following arrangement should be prohibited by law. A person who wishes to begin a business that is known to be dangerous approaches others who could be affected. "I'll make you a deal," he says. "I will pay for all increases in your insurance coverage if you let me begin this business in the neighborhood." If they agree, and if the insurance companies agree to write the policies, then he has met his obligations. He has made himself economically responsible for subsequent damages. Instead of paying for damages after the fact, he has paid in advance by providing the added insurance premiums necessary to buy the insurance.

What if some resident says "no"? The prospective producer of danger can then offer to buy him out by buying his property. If the offer is accepted, the prospective danger-producer can then either keep the property or sell it to someone who is willing to live with the risk, if the discount on the land's selling price is sufficiently large. But if the original owner refuses to sell, and if he also refuses to accept the offer regarding insurance premiums, then the first man should not be allowed to force out the original owner. If he begins the dangerous production process, the existing property owner can legitimately sue for damages. The court may require a money payment from the danger-producer to the potential victim. If it does, then many other people may sue for damages. This threat will inhibit the dangerous production. The court need not necessarily prohibit the activity altogether.

Judges must do the best they can in estimating the costs and benefits to the community, including the perceived value to citizens everywhere of the preservation of private property rights by the state. They cannot estimate perfectly, for they cannot know the psychic costs and benefits involved in the minds of the conflicting parties. But they can make general, “unscientific” estimations, given the image of God in all men, and given the created environment in which all men live. This is an important application of biblical revelation to economics: if there is no universal humanity (no universal human nature) and no Creator who serves as the basis for man’s image, and no creation governed by the Creator in terms of His value and His laws, then it is impossible for the judges legitimately to have confidence in their estimation of social costs, social benefits, private costs, and private benefits. Without our knowledge of objective economic value provided by God’s plan and His image in man, objective economic value becomes epistemologically impossible.²³ Judges would then be blind in a sea of exclusively subjective economic values in which it is philosophically impossible for men to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility.²⁴

3. Undiscovered Risk

If the case of the polluter and the fire-starter is essentially the same case ethically, then we have another legitimate question to deal with. Should the polluter be held fully responsible for any yet-to-be-discovered effects of his pollution? Should judges require polluters to make retroactive penalty payments to victims if dangerous effects of the pollution are discovered? After all, a man who starts a fire cannot escape responsibility for the damage his fire inflicts on others. Why should the polluter escape? Again, the ethical principle is the same, but the application is different. Again, the difference in application relates to the question of knowledge.

Men know about fire’s general potential for creating damage. It is a dangerous tool. In contrast, a particular form of pollution may not be known to be dangerous generally, although it is known to be a nuisance specifically. The nuisance factor is what provides the victim with his discount when he buys the neighboring property—a discount appropriate to the known side-effects of the polluting process. The limited but known effects of the polluting activity can be dealt with by the victims. They receive compensation in advance in the form of discounted land purchase prices for relatively predictable damages.

23. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

24. See Appendix H: “The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost.”

The problem of uncertainty concerning pollution has increased since the end of World War II. The development of the petrochemical industry has created new problems associated with toxic wastes. The physiological effects of today's forms of pollution may not be well known. Uncertainty increases, making some forms of pollution more like the example of uncontrolled sparks than like smoke, whose effects are not lethal. The modern legal system has struggled with the implications of the new technology:

However, modern chemicals are suspected of causing physical injuries, such as cancer, and certain emotional dysfunctions having etiologies that are little understood by science or medicine. One of the most significant characteristics of the development of these types of diseases is their latency, the time between exposure and expression of the disease. For example, a few types of cancer have a latency period of 20 to 30 years while some mutagenic diseases may take a generation or more to become evident. Moreover, chemicals suspected of causing such diseases often function at low concentrations, e.g., parts per billion, or perhaps a single molecule. In addition, pollution injuries, unlike common traumatic injuries, may be inflicted on many persons located far from the pollution source.

Particularly baffling is their unpredictability. If a heavy beam falls upon a worker, the injury will be much the same regardless of who is struck. Exposure to identical concentrations of a given pollutant, however, may produce reactions varying from no observable ailment to a life-threatening emergency.

These characteristics create unprecedented uncertainty, thereby challenging the ability of the judicial system to perform its traditional role of balancing the availability of compensation for individual injury against the social benefits of the injury-causing agent.²⁵

25. Robert K. Best and James I. Collins, "Legal Issues in Pollution-Engendered Torts," Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), pp. 104–5. (<http://bit.ly/PollutionTorts>) See also Peter Huber, Liability: The Legal Revolution and Its Consequences (New York: Basic Books, 1988), pp. 67–70, 112–14.

4. Retroactive Payments vs. Innovation

The question of a retroactive payment in the future for late-appearing medical or ecological harm that was produced by the pollutant before the pollutant was regarded as dangerous is a controversial topic. Polluting when the specific effects are not presently regarded as dangerous seems to be a case of accidental harm without personal liability. Men are not omniscient. They should not be held personally liable for harm that results from seemingly harmless activities or activities that were known to be nuisance-producing, but for which the victims had received compensation, either directly (e.g., restitution) or indirectly (e.g., a discount on land purchase price).

This is an aspect of the judicial problem of negligence. Traditional Jewish law recognized that where no foreseeability was possible, individuals should not be held legally liable for damages that result from their actions. "Cases where the defendant is entirely exempt from liability because he was in no way negligent are of two kinds: (1) the plaintiff himself was negligent because he should have foreseen the possibility of damage, i.e., where the defendant acted in the usual way and the plaintiff acted in an unusual way and the damage was therefore unforeseeable; (2) neither party could have foreseen the possibility of damage and therefore neither was negligent."²⁶ These conditions are theoretical; seldom are real-life situations able to be defined this clearly. In the older common law tradition, if the courts determine that both parties are negligent, the victim must pay for his own losses—the doctrine of contributory negligence.²⁷ The point is clear, however: a legal system must not be constructed that rests on the operating presupposition that people can be expected to possess perfect foreknowledge.

If civil law does hold innovators financially responsible for possessing knowledge before even specialists have it, then innovation will be inhibited. Developers of potentially dangerous production methods will be afraid to produce anything new. The more rigorously the law links long-run damage to a particular new technology, the more that any given innovation will be regarded by producers as potentially dangerous. The costs of testing all possible effects could conceivably wipe out most innovation. (By requiring perfect testing, and by enforcing this requirement perfectly, the civil government could wipe out all innovation perfectly.) At the very least, newer, more innovative but undercapitalized firms would be forced out of the market, which is one reason why large, bureaucratic, lawyer-filled, conventional, and heavily capitalized firms tend to favor government rules and regulations that make the introduction of a new technology expensive. If such legislation is passed, existing firms can then buy up innovative processes at prices lower than those that would otherwise have prevailed.

26. Shalom Albeck, "TORTS. The Principle Categories of Torts," The Principles of Jewish Law, edited by Menachem Elon (Jerusalem: Keter, 1975?), col. 321.

27. In recent years, a new doctrine has emerged: comparative negligence. It examines "relative fault" in accidents. It is a means of forcing some people or businesses to provide insurance for negligent accident victims. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law, pp. 156–57. See also Huber, Liability, pp. 78–79.

The costs (forfeited opportunities) borne by many members of society as a result of the innovation that is not introduced could easily be far greater than the damage inflicted by a mistake in the early stages of a production process. A classic example of just this sort of retarded technology is the American pharmaceutical industry, which is hemmed in by extremely expensive testing requirements—requirements that are designed more to protect the careers of the federal bureaucrats who are empowered by law to regulate the industry than designed to protect the public.²⁸

Common law recognizes a category of activities called ultrahazardous. The legal principle of strict liability applies to them. Those who are involved with them are held fully responsible, no matter what. Such things as blasting with explosives are included, as well as the ownership of wild animals. But “ultrahazardous activity” is a vague concept. There is a tendency to affix the label to new activities. Posner argued that because we do not know much about their effects, the best way to prevent damage may be to take greater care. This means imposing the law of strict liability until society gains more knowledge about them. This is a means of accident control.²⁹ The proper biblical response to this state-enforced limitation of innovation is to allow contracting parties to waive their right to sue in case damage results. The case of a terminally ill patient who is willing to try an experimental drug is an obvious example. Needless to say, this is rarely allowed by the bureaucrats.

I began with the premise that men are not omniscient; therefore,

28. Sam Peltzman, Regulation of Pharmaceutical Innovation (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute, 1974); Peltzman, “The Benefits and Costs of New Drug Regulation,” in R. Landau (ed.), Regulating New Drugs (University of Chicago Center for Public Policy Study, 1973); Robert B. Helms (ed.), Drug Development and Marketing (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute, 1975).

29. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law, pp. 163–64.

knowledge is not a free good. A society generally should not make an increase of knowledge a retroactive liability on those who make a discovery and implement it. Retroactive compensation statutes would put too great a liability on polluters who discover a dangerous effect from the effluent that their company produces. The firm's officers would have too great an incentive to hide the results of their findings. It is better to encourage them to admit the existence of the problem and then remove the offending product or manufacturing process, or remove it geographically, in order to avoid any future judgments against them. Penalties could legitimately be imposed in cases where prudent research—"prudent" ultimately being defined retroactively by a jury—into the dangerous effects of a production process or a product was deliberately avoided by the producer. But from the standpoint of passing legislation in the United States, Article I, Section 9 of the United States Constitution prohibits ex post facto laws that declare some action illegal, and then retroactively impose damages on those who broke the law before it became a law—a wise, state-restraining provision of the Constitution.

Summary

Men are not omniscient; therefore, information must be paid for. Accurate information is even more expensive. Any approach to economics that does not honor this principle from start to finish will be filled with errors.³⁰

Individual sparks from a fire are unpredictable in their effects. We can make guesses about the overall effects of a fire, but an area of uncertainty is inescapable. Thus, when we analyze pollution damage in terms of the damage produced by a fire, we must be careful analytically. There are differences of available knowledge in the two types of cases, and therefore different solutions to the respective threats.

Living next door to a fire-starter may be tolerable. Farmers start fires to burn grasses or timber, for example. We do not call for a complete banning of all open fires. We do make people responsible for damage produced by fires that they start. The greater the danger of fire, the more concerned nearby residents must be. Sometimes, the public bans fires altogether.

The same is true of pollution. Sometimes polluters are allowed to continue to pollute the environment, especially if they have been polluting it for a long time, and those nearby have purchased land at a discount. But with respect to newly discovered dangers, the polluter is warned: continue polluting, and you will be required to make restitution to victims. This is analogous to the warning to fire-starters if the wind shifts or increases. What was acceptable before may be unacceptable now.

30. Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980).

Because no one can know everything, it is impossible to preserve life by eliminating every possible danger before taking any action. It would make human action impossible. We are not God; society must not expect people to perform as if they were God. Thus, there must always be limited legal liability in life. Nevertheless, for those actions that are known to be dangerous, people must be made legally responsible for their actions. This does not justify holding people fully responsible for actions made in terms of earlier knowledge. With greater knowledge comes greater responsibility (Luke 12:47–48).³¹ If society tries to impose damages retroactively on actions that were taken yesterday based on yesterday's information, it would destroy the legal foundation of progress.

There can be no life without pollution. There can be no life without risk and uncertainty. We must not strive to build a zero-pollution, zero-risk world. What we must do is to restrain those who would impose added known risks in the lives of neighbors without the latter's permission. We find the legal rule that provides this restraint in Exodus 22:5–6.

G. Externalities

A man should not be prosecuted for polluting his own land, so long as the form of pollution does not have measurable, physical, and undesired effects on anyone else's life, health, or property. Because it is his own land, he has internalized the costs of pollution. (By "internalize," I do not mean simply a mental calculation; I mean that his property alone suffers from his actions.) He risks starting a fire on his own property, or he runs a herd of cattle on his own property. The man making the estimate of benefits is the same person who makes the estimate of costs; it is the same man who will reap what he sows.

Once he sells a section of his land, he no longer internalizes costs and benefits on the section that was sold. Another person is now involved: his neighbor. The first man must not be allowed to pass on to his neighbor the risks of living next door to a person who sets fire on his property. The fire-starter cannot legally transfer to his neighbor the generally known but highly unpredictable specific, individual production costs of fire. Economic analysis must begin with the Bible's assessment of personal responsibility for a man's actions. It must begin with the presupposition of the rights (legal immunities) of private property. These rights must be protected by civil law and custom.

31. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 28.

The act of polluting someone else's environment is a crime in cases where either production costs or consumption costs³² (including risks) that are known to a polluter but unknown to the victim are deliberately imposed on the victim. It is also a crime when someone begins a new and previously unpredicted polluting process without getting permission from future victims. In both cases, it is an attempt on the part of a beneficiary to "externalize" his costs of production or consumption by passing them along to others who do not profit directly from the production process or consumption activity. He lowers his costs by transferring a portion of these costs to innocent victims.

We can grasp the economics of pollution quite easily in the case of a manufacturer. Polluting allows him to retain a greater net income when he sells the goods, and it eventually allows him to increase output until his personally borne marginal costs equal his personally received marginal revenues, i.e., until he arrives at that level of output at which he loses money by producing one more item. But the total costs of production are higher than his personally borne marginal costs. These additional costs—costs above his personally borne costs—are involuntarily borne by the victims of his pollution. So, he continues to expand production above the level of output that he would have produced had he borne the full costs of his production process. If he is not required by law to share these marginal benefits with victims (restitution), and if he is also allowed to continue to pass on some of his production costs to them, then the law has created an incentive to over-produce this particular product.

There are many beneficiaries of this overproduction—overproduction that is subsidized by the victims of the pollution. Obviously, the owner of the firm benefits. Another group of beneficiaries is his customers, who can buy more goods at the same price, or the same number of goods at a lower price, than before the pollution process began.

32. An example of a consumption cost that produces net losses for a neighbor would be the keeping of pets that bark or bite or otherwise disturb the neighbor.

Third, there are employees of his company.

These groups of beneficiaries can become allies of the polluter in any political dispute concerning the continuation of the polluting practices. Edwin Dolan's comment is applicable.

If he has to clean up he may pass part of the cost along to his customers in the form of a price increase, so his customers may testify on his behalf before the city council. If less of the product can be sold at the higher price, he may have to lay off some of his workers, and thus his employees may join the propollution faction. The addition of these allies does not alter the normative analysis of the situation, for if the act of pollution itself is a crime then these allies are nothing but partners in crime. The customers of the firm are in a position analytically identical to the recipient of stolen goods. The producer kept his price low only by forcing the residents adjacent to his establishment involuntarily to subsidize the cost of production, by permitting their lungs and noses to be used as industrial waste disposal units, substituting for the mechanical units which should have been installed at the plant. The customers no more deserve to benefit from this tactic than the owner himself.³³

Dolan explicitly used normative economic analysis. He did not ignore ethics. To ignore ethics as a matter of methodological objectivity, as most humanistic free market economists claim that they must,³⁴ is to subsidize immorality. They are importing immorality into their "neutral" economic analysis, all in the name of scientific objectivity. There are always unrecognized and uncompensated victims of "neutral" economic analysis, at least in those cases when policy-makers take seriously an economist's suggestion (sometimes called "a conclusion of scientific economics").

H. Allocating Pollution

Dolan's analogies are both clever and graphic: consumers as "recipients of stolen goods," and nearby residents as "unpaid organic pollution-absorption devices." We need to pursue the analogy of the consumer as a receiver of stolen goods.

33. Edwin G. Dolan, TANSTAAFL: The Economic Strategy for Environmental Crisis (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1971), pp. 42–43. TANSTAAFL, the book's cover tells us, stands for: "there ain't no such thing as a free lunch."

34. In fact, they sneak in their ethical views through the back door of applied economics—evaluating economic policies—and also through aggregation. See Appendix H: "The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost."

1. Shifting Costs

If a buyer of a domestically produced consumer good is enabled to make the purchase at a lower price than would have been possible, had the producer not been a polluter, then he has benefitted at the expense of the residents who have “absorbed” the pollution. The customer is a participant in the pollution process, even if he is unaware of the reason why he has been offered an opportunity to buy a product at a low price. The customer has transformed his private costs into social costs, for he in effect “hires” the polluter as his production agent when he makes the purchase. He provides the seller with money, which in turn encourages the producer to continue producing the product.

Should the customer be held legally responsible and economically responsible? No. He must assume that the producer is violating no laws in anyone’s community. He cannot investigate every instance of lower-than-normal prices. He must act in terms of what is presented before him—product and price—and not become a full-time, one-man investigative agency. He assumes that the local civil government in the producer’s region is serving as the agent of any injured local victims of pollution. The state should not attempt to impose on consumers all the producers’ costs of knowledge in every economic transaction.

If the civil government in the producer’s community steps in and requires the producer to install pollution-control equipment, and if the producer then discovers that he is in a position to pass these costs along to the buyer, at least temporarily, the buyer may begin to shop for a cheaper substitute. In this sense, the pollution-control equipment is essentially a tax. Contrary to popular opinion, taxes cannot be shifted forward to customers, at least not without uncertainty, precisely because customers may begin shopping around for cheaper, untaxed goods.³¹ What if some “foreign” producer—in a foreign nation, or a

31. Rothbard stressed this. “It is generally considered that any tax on production or sales increases the cost of production and therefore is passed on as an increase in price to the consumer. Prices, however, are never determined by costs of production, but rather the reverse is true. The price of a good is determined by its total stock in existence and the demand schedule for it on the market. But the demand schedule is not affected at all by the tax. The selling price is set by any firm at the maximum net revenue point, and any higher price, given the demand schedule, will simply decrease net revenue. A tax, therefore, cannot be passed on to the consumer. It is true that a tax can be shifted forward, in a sense, if the tax causes the supply of the good to decrease, and therefore the price to rise on the market. This can hardly be called shifting per se, however, for shifting implies that the tax is passed on with little or no trouble to the producer.” Rothbard, Power and Market: Government and the Economy, 4th ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1970] 2006), pp. 110–11. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardPM>)

“foreign” state or province across the nation, or in a “foreign” city across the state—is in a position to get the authorities in his region to allow the production of a comparable product at a more competitive price, by using the same polluting methods that the authorities in the first community banned? The foreign producer is allowed to pollute—to externalize production costs without getting permission from the victims.

2. Voting for Pollution

What if a majority of the “victims”—local townspeople—want jobs more than they want clean air or water? What if they agree, implicitly, with the decision of their civil authorities to allow the pollution? In other words, what if most residents in a different community are willing to receive income in the form of wages rather than in the form of a clean environment? The polluting process will then be transferred to the new region where this form of pollution is not so great a concern. The free market allocates pollution through competition.³² The manufacturer in the first region, where voters prefer a cleaner environment to higher monetary income for local firms and higher income for those servicing those firms, will lose his share of the market to the producer in the second region.

Is the buyer of legalized higher pollution goods still “a receiver of stolen goods,” economically speaking? (At no time is the consumer morally or legally guilty of receiving “stolen” goods. It is only a question of formal economic analysis—the economist’s attempt to show who wins, who loses, and why, in terms of economic theory.) No, he is not guilty. Why not? Because a majority of voters in the manufacturer’s community really are not deeply worried about the particular form of pollution involved in the specific manufacturing process, possibly because local air currents or water flows disperse the pollution effectively. The voters have announced, in principle: “Go ahead and buy our local manufacturer’s lower-priced goods, for we are willing to accept the costs that his manufacturing process imposes on us as ‘pollution absorbers.’”

32. There is a problem here with majority rule. What if one person in the community objects to the polluting factory? If social policy by civil governments always had to attain unanimous consent in order to be implemented, there could be no civil government. The economic goals of a few people sometimes must be sacrificed for the sake of the majority. There are obligations and benefits for both the “one” (the society) and the “many” (individuals). The problem for humanistic economists is that if unanimous consent is not achieved within the electorate, then there is no way for economists to know whether a particular intervention by the state has maximized social welfare: John Burton, Epilogue, in Steven N. S. Cheung, The Myth of Social Cost (San Francisco: Cato Institute, [1978] 1980), pp. 62–63. The Bible gives us guidelines for establishing the necessary balance between the two. In the case of the anti-pollutionists in a community, they can sell their property to others who want to take advantage of a better “environment for jobs.” Higher pay scales will tend to offset declines in property values that result from pollution. If a property owner believes that his losses are too great, he can sue the polluting company. Local legislation should not make such law suits impossible; it should only reflect a community’s consent concerning the approximate level of pollution which a particular facility is permitted to emit. If one man’s property is damaged excessively (wind patterns, etc.), then he should be allowed by law to take his claim before a jury of his peers.

The consumer cannot be held accountable, economically speaking, because he cannot know the local opinions of the townspeople. He has to assume that the goods are being produced lawfully. If residents are willing to put up with the pollution for the sake of the local economy, then in effect they are being compensated by the polluter. The higher wages or other economic benefits accruing to local residents as a result of the employment opportunities offered by the polluting company are, economically speaking, the equivalent of restitution. Victims are being compensated for their suffering. Therefore, the goods are no longer “stolen.”

3. The Pollution Auction

Most people in the economically developed nations live in urban areas. These urban centers are noted for their smog-filled air, the noise of trucks rumbling down highways, traffic jams, noisy power lawn mowers, and other “spillover” effects. Yet people in the United States refused to move back to small towns until the 1970s, and even then, the move out of the major cities amounted to little more than a trickle. Few people in Western nations are moving to the small town or farming community. For that matter, few people in any nation are moving to small towns; the phenomenon of urbanization is international. A nation’s major economic opportunities are generally concentrated in cities. Yet there is little doubt that industrial pollution is nonexistent in most of these rural areas.

What is a legitimate conclusion regarding this fact of urbanized life? Simple: most people do prefer clean air and quiet streets, but they want them at very low prices. The demonstrated preference of the vast majority of Western citizens is for the city, with all its pollution. The polluted environment of the city is preferable to the differently polluted environment of the rural countryside. It may have something to do with rural insects, dust, or pollen; it may have more to do with loneliness or the hard work of subduing a rural environment. It almost certainly has a lot to do with comparative opportunities for monetary income. But it is a fact that most people have chosen to live in the industrially or mechanically polluted environments that a vocal minority decries publicly. Most people prefer an urban type of pollution to a rural type, given today's array of prices. Change the array of prices, and people may well move out of the city.³³

In effect, people in various regions are involved in a giant auction—a pollution auction. Some people bid high. They announce, in effect, “We’ll put up with a lot of smog for the sake of high incomes to match our sunny climate” (Southern California). Or they say, “We’ll put up with noxious fumes from wood pulp mills in order to live in the green outdoors” (western Oregon). People in particular regions are more concerned about one form of pollution than another. This preference may be strictly aesthetic, or it may be due to special problems posed by the fluid in question. For example, a region’s stagnant air but free-flowing, aerated streams may make liquid effluents more acceptable than smoke effluents. In another region, the reverse may be the case. What we find, then, is that voters in regions “buy” the quantity and kind of pollution they most prefer.

There will always be some pollution where there is life. Francis Schaeffer wrote a book called Pollution and the Death of Man. I much prefer the title, Pollution and the Life of Man. Pollution is inescapable. We are all polluters. We are all exhalers and excreters. What we need are legal and institutional arrangements that allow us as individuals to make our own decisions concerning what kind of pollution we are willing to put up with, and at what price.

This is the legal and institutional framework that is produced by biblical law and free market economics. Each region selects a particular form of pollution in the quantity it can tolerate at prices it is willing to pay. Each community is forced to give up particular forms of a clean environment in exchange for other benefits. There are no free lunches in life; there are also no pollution-free environments. Scarcity is ines-

33. If people presently dwelling in American cities should become convinced that a terrorist group plans to attack cities with biological weapons next year, the array of prices would shift. The same would also be true if people became convinced that some deadly plague is specifically urban and expected to become an epidemic.

capable (Gen. 3:17–19).³⁴ At zero price, there is always more demand for clean air and pure water than there is available supply.

4. The Mobility of Capital

The free market's mobility of capital allows communities to make the choice among various mixtures of pollution and economic benefits, but local regulations also force polluters to participate in this choice. Production can shift, industry by industry, to those regions of the globe where the particular form of pollution involved is most acceptable. The free movement of capital combines with competitive markets for consumer goods to make it possible for regions to make effective "bids" for the "pollution-income package" they prefer. At the same time, local legislation that restricts certain kinds of locally less desirable pollutants forces plant managers to come to grips with the true costs of production in that region. They can then decide if it would pay to shut down the factory and relocate elsewhere. And even if they simply shut down the factory and go out of business, another firm using the same production methods can always go to a community where the firm's polluting is acceptable at some price. So, customers, by responding or failing to respond to offers by sellers, force a redistribution of pollution from one region to another. But to do this, consumers in effect work with local civil governments.

Anthony Koo remarked that two countries with identical economic resources and technologies could engage profitably in trade if the two populations had different environmental preferences. He also warned against the danger of globally enforced, uniform environmental standards. People in underdeveloped nations will be suspicious about the imposition of Western standards. "The movement could be construed as an attempt to impose pollution controls that will prevent them from taking full advantage of comparative cost. . . ." ³⁵

Summary

Pollution is a side effect of production (including life). What is a side effect? It is an effect that the affected people do not like. Effects are effects; the "side" aspect of an effect is an assessment made by observers.

34. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 11.

35. Cited in James C. Hite, et al., The Economics of Environmental Quality (Washington, D. C.: American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, 1972), p. 35.

In any production process, there are costs to be borne and benefits to be reaped. The economic goal of a biblical legal order is to create an institutional order that will allocate costs and benefits fairly. What is fair? The Bible is clear: a man reaps what he sows. Those who seek the benefits must bear the costs. But men are advantage-seekers. If they can pass on costs of operations to others, their net return on their property increases. Thus, the legal order must see to it that costs are paid by those who can legally claim the benefits of any action. In short, costs (“side effects”) must be allocated, just as benefits (“effects”) must be.

There are inescapable costs involved in achieving the benefits of reduced pollution. Production involves costs; therefore, the production of a cleaner environment produces costs. We speak of externalities, but there are two kinds of externalities in any production process: cursings (costs) and blessings (benefits). A person who is not an owner of a firm may suffer from its pollution, but he may also make a living by selling goods or services to people employed by the polluting firm. Thus, for him to see the reduction of the costs (pollution), he may also find the reduction of the benefits (income). Non-owners who are affected will differ in their personal cost-benefit analysis regarding the effects of the local production process. Some of them will seek economic restitution or political allies in stopping the pollution; others will bear the costs and even organize politically to defeat those who have organized a zero economic growth—clean air lobbying group.

The allocation of pollution is in part political and in part economic. The free market requires a legal order to protect it (benefit). One of the costs of obtaining this legal order is the risk that the owners of a particular production process will lose wealth when the production process is either hampered by regulations or else is legally shut down by those who have become “pollution absorbers” in the community.

The civil government is one institutional means through which the competing individual assessments of costs (“side effects”) and benefits (“effects”) are weighed and acted upon. The decision may be made in terms of “one man—one vote,” or it may be made representatively by a council or a judge; it may be made representatively by a jury. Civil governments also compete against each other, bidding for or against polluting industries.

The other institutional means of assessing costs and benefits is the free market itself: “high bid wins.” Customers vote with their money (productivity). The interaction of these competing assessments results allocates pollution. The owner of the production facility then responds to the highest bid: market plus civil government. He may close the factory, or install pollution-control devices, or pay the fines, but it is the owner who is ultimately responsible. This is why ownership is ultimately a social function, an aspect of representative government. The owner is inescapably a steward.

I. Identifying the Polluter

We cannot live in a pollution-free world. We pollute the environment simply by being alive. Even when we die, we “pollute” as we rot; but one species’ pollution is another species’ life-support system. The question is: How can we see to it that pollution is distributed according to the needs of individuals, social units, and the non-human environment? How can we best adhere to our responsibilities under the ecological covenant?³⁶

Some forms of industrial pollution may be illegitimate. Permanent or near-permanent toxic wastes, including radioactive waste and waste from burning coal, may place such a burden on future generations and future environments that toxic waste-producing processes should be abandoned until cost-effective disposal methods are developed. The problem is, the public has been misled about the risks. Waste from radioactive materials is a legitimate problem. The major creator of radioactive wastes in the United States has been the United States government, which was involved in the production of nuclear weaponry. Both the production and (of course) the ultimate use of these weapons are sources of such waste. Second, the risks of peacetime radiation are not overwhelmingly great, compared to coal wastes. The waste-disposal problem is a real one; there are real economic costs involved in solving this problem. Nevertheless, scientific evidence points to the ability of radioactive waste-producers to reduce risks to a minimum, especially cancer risks. Even in the much-feared and highly improbable case of a core meltdown of a nuclear reactor, the risks are not that great, especially compared to the very real risks of dying from pollution from coal-fired plants.³⁷

The public is not aware of the huge waste-storage problems associated with coal-fired electricity. Coal ash is being disposed of in land-

36. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 17.

37. For a carefully argued presentation of the evidence in this regard, see Bernard L. Cohen, “Radiation Pollution and Cancer: Comparative Risks and Proof,” Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982). (<http://bit.ly/RisksProof>) fills. A 1,000 megawatt plant must dispose of 36,500 truckloads a year. A professor of electrical engineering offered this assessment:

The tens of millions of tons of ash generated by U.S. coal-fired plants every year are dumped in landfills. . . . There are no provisions to prevent the poisons in coal ash being leached out by rainwater (they are dumped close to the surface) and creeping into aquifers. . . . The radioactivity of the radium and thorium isotopes in coal ash exposes the public to [up to 50] times³⁸ the dose received from nuclear plants of equal capacity and would violate NRC [Nuclear Regulatory Commission] standards if the NRC were responsible for coal-fired plants, but it isn't. The radionuclides contained in coal ash are chemically active and soluble in water; yet the stuff is dumped close to the surface without strict control and without even any monitoring.³⁹

The best way to achieve increased safety from toxic waste is for the state to establish safety criteria for dumping sites and then to require producers to bear the full costs of waste disposal.⁴⁰ This includes the cost of dismantling nuclear power plants after their economic life is over.⁴¹ The state has increasingly begun to require this, but two problems have appeared. First, organized crime has moved into the "midnight waste disposal business." Highly toxic wastes are being dumped at below-market prices by criminals who pick up the liquid wastes in

38. In the 1976 book, the author used the figure "at least 180 times," but has revised this downward as of 1988: letter to me.

39. Petr Beckmann, The Health Hazards of NOT Going Nuclear (Boulder, Colorado: The Golem Press, 1976), p. 107. Beckman was a professor of electrical engineering at the University of Colorado.

40. Cohen wrote: "One important aspect of the high-level waste disposal question is the quantities involved: The waste generated by one large nuclear power plant in one year is about six cubic yards. This waste is 2 million times smaller by weight and billions of times smaller by volume than wastes from a coal-burning plant. The electricity generated by a nuclear plant in a year sells for more than $200 million, so if only one percent of the sales price were diverted to waste disposal, $2 million might be spent to bury this waste. Obviously, some very elaborate protective measures can be afforded." Cohen, op. cit., p. 266.

41. The important economic and political argument against the commercial use of nuclear power is that the state, because of the military applications of nuclear power, and because of its declared monopoly over the supply of nuclear materials, has an implicit monopoly over electricity generated by nuclear power. This centralizes the production of electricity. The free market solution should be a decentralized distribution system. Free market power generation should be as localized and independent of the state as economically feasible, such as power produced by cost-effective solar energy, with rooftop solar panels. The sooner consumers can "unplug" from municipal power companies—or at least can sell back excess power their panels produce during the day—the better it will be for the cause of freedom.

tank trucks and deposit these effluents in public sewers or on private property.⁴² The civil government is almost helpless in the face of this activity. It is an evasion of the problem to blame the government for imposing compulsory waste-disposal costs on private firms, as one libertarian economist does.⁴³ If the government has imposed too many regulations, then economists need to show what an appropriate program would be. But anarchist economists reject this responsibility. They simply announce: "There is no government solution to pollution or to the common-pool problem because government is the problem."⁴⁴

The second problem arises when the state and its licensed agencies are the prime polluters. This is especially true in the case of water pollution. Municipalities have saved money by reducing expenditures on sewage treatment facilities. How can the state compel itself to be responsible to God, men, and the non-human environment? Jerome Milliman, a specialist in the field of the economics of water distribution and environmentalism, commented on this problem.

In 1972 Congress established the Federal Water Pollution Control Act in which the Environmental Protection Agency was given responsibility to "restore and maintain the chemical, physical, and biological integrity of the nation's waters." Two national goals of "swimmable and fishable" in 1983 and "zero-discharge" in 1985 were set forth. . . .

As of 1980, EPA reported that the industrial dischargers had a compliance rate of 80 percent. By contrast, municipal dischargers have been slow to comply despite being eligible for construction grants, with a compliance rate of 40 percent with the 1977 requirements. In February 1980, EPA estimated that 63 percent of major municipal treatment facilities were not yet in compliance with the original July 1977 deadline. By the end of 1979, EPA had obligated $24.4 billion in construction grant appropriations (75 percent of construction costs) to municipalities for sewage treatment plants. Construction had begun on 6,623 projects but only 1,552 were in operation. EPA inspections of operating municipal sewage plants reveal

42. Michael Brown, "Toxic Waste: Organized Crime Moves In," Reader's Digest (July 1984). The problem of toxic wastes from commercial manufacturing processes appeared only after the Second World War, with the development of the petrochemical industry.

43. "Already existing regulations and laws make it too costly for honest firms to dispose legally of these wastes." Gerald P. O'Driscoll, Jr., "Pollution, Libertarianism, and the Law," Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), p. 51.

44. Ibid., p. 50.

that less than one half perform satisfactorily because of operation and maintenance problems. Apparently, EPA is in a poor bargaining position with reluctant municipalities to require compliance because of lack of effective sanctions.⁴⁵

Milliman also pointed to another problem—a problem that no one so far has been able to deal with successfully, either theoretically or institutionally: non-point sources of water pollution. All our energy and effort has been lavished on the question of how to reduce point sources, such as manufacturing plants, municipal sewage treatment centers, and other “piped” effluents. But what about agriculture? What about topsoil runoff and livestock urea runoff? In the cities, what about storm water runoff? Over half of all pollutants coming from non-point sources were uncontrolled, as of the early 1980s, and over half of all pollutants entering surface waters came from non-point sources.⁴⁶ As he said, “In contrast to the limited progress that has been made in cleaning up point discharges, progress with nonpoint sources is almost negligible.”⁴⁷

Christians must insist that this world is God’s, and men are His stewards. When certain forms of pollution are beyond our ability as creatures to deal with effectively, we should abandon the production processes that leave the uncontrollable wastes. But this also means that we have a responsibility to develop economically and institutionally workable allocation systems to dispose of the wastes that we can control. A combination of private ownership, private responsibility, public sanctions, and the free flow of capital makes possible an efficient spreading of pollution into those communities that can deal with them most effectively. There is a division of labor in the world. There are different environments in different regions of the earth. We need a cost-effective allocation of pollutants in order to protect the earth’s entire environment. More specifically, we need a program of market incentives and state sanctions to distribute pollution in such a manner that concentrated and dangerous pollutants are rendered harmless, either by safety packaging or by dilution through geographical dispersion. Without the free market, it is unlikely that the earth’s total pollution will be allocated efficiently. Civil government alone cannot do it.

45. Jerome W. Milliman, “Can Water Pollution Policy Be Efficient?” ibid., pp. 165–66.

46. Ibid., pp. 166, 190.

47. Ibid., p. 190.

J. Moving Fluids

Dolan linked the crime of pollution with the crime of trespassing.⁴⁸ Pollution is therefore an invasion of the rights of private ownership. This explains why it is legitimate to bring in the civil government to reduce "pollution invasions" in a neighborhood. By placing pollution within a moral framework, his study avoids a sense of unreality, something that too many other economists have not avoided.

1. Private Property

What do we mean by "private property"? Wrote legal theorist, economist, and later Federal judge Richard Posner: "A property right, in both law and economics, is a right to exclude everyone else from the use of some scarce resource."⁴⁹ Professor Steven Cheung agreed, but added two important qualifying aspects of this legal right to exclude: a property right is the right to exclude others from using an asset, the right to benefit from an asset's productivity, and the right to transfer either or both of these two rights to others.⁵⁰ This is an ideal definition, as he admitted. In practice, exclusivity and transferability are matters of degree.

It should be clear why questions of pollution arise more readily in cases where private property rights have not been (or cannot be) established. The great area of pollution is the area of moving fluids, namely, air and water. Who owns the air? Who owns the oceans? Who owns the river? Everyone? No one? Economically, it makes little difference which we conclude, everyone or no one. There is a tendency for men to waste resources under either assumption. As Dales said, "There is an old saying that 'everyone's property is no one's property,' the inference being that no one looks after it, that everyone over-uses it, and that the property therefore deteriorates. History bears out the truth of this saying in many sad ways. Property that is freely available to all is

48. Dolan, TANSTAAFL, p. 69.

49. Richard A. Posner, The Economics of Justice (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), p. 70.

50. "A good or an asset is defined to be private property if, and only if, three distinct sets of rights are associated with its ownership. First, the exclusive right to use (or to decide how to use) the good may be viewed as the right to exclude other individuals from its use. Second is the exclusive right to receive income generated by the use of the good. Third, the full right to transfer, or freely 'alienate,' its ownership includes the right to enter into contracts and to choose their form." Steven N. S. Cheung, The Myth of Social Cost, p. 34.

unowned except in a purely formal, constitutional sense, and lack of effective ownership is almost always the source of much mischief.”⁵¹ There is an economic incentive to convert private costs (smoke, heat, effluents, noise) into social costs—costs borne by others in society.

2. Automobile Emissions

The problem is especially acute when there are multiple and basically unidentifiable polluters. Very often those who pollute the environment also suffer from the pollution. For example, a man starts an automobile engine. He becomes a polluter of the air (exhaust emissions, noise). His car’s contribution to the overall level of exhaust emissions pollution is infinitesimal—probably unmeasurable from five feet away, unless the car is old and smoking. Yet 13 million internal combustion-engine registered vehicles in a trapped-air basin like California’s Los Angeles county region create pollution that is all too measurable: smog. If total air pollution in a particular region is to be reduced, then all the permanent polluters in that region—e.g., people whose automobiles are licensed locally, but not visitors from outside the region—must be restrained by civil law.

Economically speaking, the emissions-control device on a car is no different from the exhaust muffler, although the latter is more readily understood. Both devices raise the price of the car, reduce its engine’s efficiency, and increase gasoline consumption. Both protect innocent bystanders: less noise, less bad air. Both protect the owner of the car: less noise, less bad air. The protection of the innocent bystander is the focus of biblical law, however. If the owner were the only person affected, the law would not be legitimate. He should be allowed to do what he wants with his own eardrums and lungs.

Neither of these emissions-control devices will be paid for entirely by the automobile manufacturers, for manufacturers are not the only ones involved in the pollution process. Pollution-control or noise-control devices are, economically speaking, a kind of sales tax that is paid by consumers, despite the fact that the “collection” of the sales tax is made by the auto companies when they sell the cars. Drivers are the local polluters; auto manufacturers are their accomplices. Drivers usually prefer to convert private costs (lower performance, the cost of the device) into social costs (noise and air pollution), especially if they believe that other drivers are allowed to do the same thing. Car buyers are therefore required by law to pay for pollution-control devices when they purchase the cars. But, in most cases, pollution-control devices are not required for older model cars; the laws only apply to current production models and future models.

51. Dales, Pollution, pp. 63–64.

The automobile companies also lose, as the new car drivers' "accomplices," for they cannot automatically "pass along" the added costs of production to buyers. Some buyers may decide to keep driving older, "hotter" performance cars, especially if new car prices rise. This raises the question of who pays. If the public insists on buying new cars, and if all new cars must be fitted with the equipment, then the companies will more readily attempt to "pass on" the extra costs to the buyers. But this is always risky. If buyers have acceptable substitutes—mass transit, for example, or keeping older model cars—then the car manufacturers may not be able to pass on costs without losing buyers. Substitutes or not, total sales of cars could drop as a result of higher prices, and total revenues might fall. The auto manufacturers cannot be certain in advance. So, they tend to resist any new legislation that would raise their costs of production because of this uncertainty.

Managers do not want to risk the threat of the wrath of the legal owners of the automobile companies. Who are the legal owners of these firms? Those people who own shares of ownership. How can they retaliate against the senior managers? By selling their shares, thereby depressing the price of the shares and reducing the value of the capital owned by the senior managers. We know that a very important form of compensation to the senior managers of a firm is the appreciation of their shares of stock in the firm.⁵² They do not want to risk seeing the price of the shares drop. Why would the share owners start selling? Because of the very real possibility that the company's total net revenues will drop in response to reduced sales of the now higher priced cars. Therefore, the costs of pollution-control devices cannot be passed on by the company to the customers at zero price (zero risk) to the company—its managers, workers, and share owners.

Mandatory pollution-control devices, biblically, are like spark-retarding devices: they protect other people's property. Where there are multiple polluters, only the civil government can effectively restrain a significant number of polluters, for all are bound under civil law. The civil government protects property owners

52. Henry Manne [MANee], Insider Trading and the Stock Market (New York: Free Press, 1966), ch. 8.

Summary

There are always problems in identifying polluters, because all of life is a pollution process. The media have focused on nuclear power plants, but they have generally ignored waste materials produced by coal-fired plants. The politicians studiously ignore the pollution produced by the state's own production facilities. Also, there are non-point sources of pollution that cannot be regulated effectively by law. There are limits to bureaucratic regulation, in other words. If self-government fails, then civil government will fail, too.

The world is under a curse. This curse cannot be escaped, only modified. The land brings forth thorns (Gen. 3:18)—“side effects,” in other words, meaning unwanted effects. Pollution can be reduced through self-discipline, better scientific knowledge, market incentives, and the threat of punishment. It cannot be eliminated, however, because man's knowledge is limited, and so is his power over the many known effects of human action. The best that we can hope to accomplish is to identify major sources of known dangerous pollution, to study the effects of legislation in reducing the production of such pollution, and then persuade voters to impose workable sanctions against polluters. When criminals are convicted for illegally dumping known toxic wastes into public sewers, and then sold into lifetime servitude to pay the fines, we will see less toxic waste dumped into sewers. There will always be some, however.

All government begins with self-government. Self-government must become more important in regulating pollution, for it is not possible to identify all polluters, and it is also not possible to eliminate every known form of pollution. When polluters know that they will suffer economic sanctions and public ostracism when convicted, they will modify their behavior. They will not modify economically profitable behavior until the public is willing to impose civil sanctions, however. We can see this in the case of abortion. If physicians are willing to get rich by aborting babies, we should not be surprised to find that ordinary businessmen are willing to dump effluents into rivers, even dangerous effluents. If the voting public and its judges cannot distinguish between the effects of abortion (legal) and the effects of the agricultural use of DDT (illegal), then we should not expect to see the spread of self-restraint by industrial polluters.

K. Legitimate State Coercion

In the case of a single violator or a few potential violators, there are two reasons justifying the coercive intervention of the civil government.

1. Fire

To use the biblical example of fire, a man who permits a fire to get out of control may see an entire town burned to the ground. There is no way, economically, that he can make full restitution. In fact, it would be almost impossibly expensive to estimate the value of the destroyed physical property, let alone the loss of life, or the psychological anguish of the victims. Therefore, in high-risk situations, the civil government can legitimately establish minimum fire prevention standards. (Analogously, the civil government can also legitimately establish medical quarantines to protect public health: Lev. 13, 14.)⁵³

Carl Bridenbaugh, in his study of urban life in seventeenth- and early eighteenth-century colonial America, discussed this problem in detail. "The specter of fire has ever haunted the town-dweller. This necessary servant may, amidst crowded town conditions, buildings of inflammable construction and the combustible materials of daily housekeeping and commerce, become his deadly enemy. Even in Europe the means of fighting fire were very crude in the seventeenth century, and only towards its close did the great cities, driven by a series of disasters, begin to evolve a system for combatting it."⁵⁴ Such measures infringed on personal freedom, and they increased costs on citizens, but they were necessary to help protect people from each other's mistakes—mistakes that the person responsible could not have paid for. In fact, it could easily be argued that the very inability of anyone to pay for them is in itself an incentive for people to take such risks. As Posner wrote, "An injurer may not have the resources to pay a very large damages judgment; and if not, his incentive to comply with the law will be reduced. . . ."⁵⁵

53. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012) ch. 9.

54. Carl Bridenbaugh, Cities in the Wilderness: The First Century of Urban Life in America, 1625–1742 (New York: Capricorn, [1938] 1964), p. 55.

55. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law, p. 344.

2. Marginal Damages and Profit Centers

A second reason for allowing state coercion, though far less relevant, is that there may be cases of identifiable polluters who injure many neighbors in a minor, though measurable, way. The costs of assembling all the injured parties—search costs, lawyer fees, delays in court hearings, injury assessments—into one or more legitimate complaining units may be too high for each member of the group to bear. Another way to gain restitution is the establishment of fines for polluters, including graduated fines as the levels of pollution increase. Least desirable, probably, is the outright abolition of the pollution-producing activity, although the costs of pollution abatement may in effect serve as outright prohibitions for marginally profitable firms.

The buyers of a particular product may save a few cents or many dollars because the costs of producing it are passed along, involuntarily, to residents living close to the plant, but this does not justify polluting, nor do considerations of the comparative wealth of buyers and injured parties. Coercion in the form of unforeseen and injurious pollution can legitimately be met by coercion from the civil government.

On the other hand, as we have seen earlier in this chapter, such pollution is not necessarily evil, if those who are injured have voluntarily assented to the injury. For example, consider the “company town,” a town whose houses and public facilities have been built by a profit-seeking company that employs most of the town’s residents. The firm’s employees are given access to low-cost housing as part of their pay. They breathe the fumes of the factory, but they also gain the benefits of employment. A required anti-pollution program might make production costs skyrocket and force the closing of the factory. The benefits of employment at that location would then disappear. Workers may very well prefer noxious fumes to unemployment. Even in a normal community, where employees and non-employees live side by side and breathe the same foul air, a majority of voters may prefer the fumes to the economic effects of unemployment. This is especially true if the factory, or industry in general, is a primary employer in a particular region. Bad air may be preferable to most local residents, compared to the firm’s bankruptcy. The poorer a community—the fewer economic and employment alternatives available to people—the more likely it is that people will choose bad air to unemployment.

If specific physiological dangers exist because of the fumes that are dumped into the atmosphere, or some water-carried effluent that is dumped into the public water supply system, then those affected must be warned. The problem of toxic wastes is a real one. When the victims do not have the technical expertise to discern a measurable, statistically relevant danger to people's health, the civil government can legitimately require the polluter to warn them. But smoke is a familiar fact of life. So is smog. So is noise. If people choose to put up with these nuisances for the sake of employment or for a stronger local economy, then they should be allowed to do so.

3. Permitting Voluntary Exchange

Suppose, for example, that there is a very desirable piece of land overlooking a lake that is in the path of a proposed runway for jet planes. The land sells at a discount because of the expected noise. Potential buyers are warned in writing of the proposed airport. The buyer takes a risk. He buys his land less expensively, assuming that he will get used to the noise (which most people do). Perhaps the runway will never be built. Then he may find himself the owner of a far more valuable piece of property. Or perhaps the airport will be built, and the land appreciates anyway. (Empirical research indicates that almost without exception, land adjacent to proposed airports rises in value after the construction of the airport.)⁵⁶

Question: Should the civil government forbid such a transaction if the seller has warned the buyer in writing concerning the risk? Why should the civil government be given such power? Perhaps a potential buyer cannot afford to buy a piece of land near a lake in any area not subject to a negative factor like noise. Wouldn't an outright prohibition on land sales be harmful to potential buyers and potential sellers? Wouldn't such legislation be discriminatory against poorer members of the community? Why should men be forbidden to trade off money against noise? On the other hand, should the airport be shut down by law because people who bought the land at a discount later decide that they want a noise-free environment, and then decide that a lawsuit is the way to get it? Is this not another case of theft, a coercive redistribution of wealth from the airport and airlines to the buyers of discounted land?

This example should not be construed to validate the case of a person who buys land at a high price and then is informed that the city council has voted to build the runway. Here is a case of a violation of his property rights. The Bible says that he must be compensated for any resulting loss. The beneficiaries of the council's action, i.e., the airlines that use the airport facility, should pay the victims either directly or indirectly, through taxes collected by the city and passed on to the victims. What should the compensation be? A payment equivalent to any drop in the market value of the property caused by the airport, plus moving costs, if owners decide to leave.

56. Cheung, Myth of Social Cost, p. 20.

Something else should be considered. One reason why Western industrial nations have become so concerned with pollution is that they are wealthy.⁵⁷ As people's per capita income rises, they tend to worry less about where the next meal is coming from and more about their "quality of life," meaning their physical environment. The West does pollute the environment, but as people get richer, they tend to buy more services than goods. As national wealth increases, capital shifts to the service sector, and to high-technology, low-pollution production. Yet as the level of pollution may be dropping—or shifting from, say, horses to autos, from manure-filled streets and flies to smog and stinging eyes⁵⁸—people's concern about pollution may be rising. As they become financially capable of reducing pollution levels, they demand action, even in the face of less dangerous forms of pollution than before. The smoke-filled skies of the great steel towns of the late-nineteenth century are sometimes smog-filled today. Are we so confident that we suffer from more pollution today? Women can safely hang clothes out to dry on a clothes line in Pittsburgh today; in the 1930s, the clothes—and even curtains in their homes—would be covered with soot in a few hours.⁵⁹ (Of course, most women use clothes driers today, which were not available to consumers in the 1930s.) The main reason why Pittsburgh's air is cleaner today is that so many steel mills have shut down due to foreign competition.

57. Lester Lave, "Health, Safety, and Environmental Regulations," in Joseph A. Peckman (ed.), Setting National Priorities: Agenda for the 1980s (Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution, 1980), pp. 134–35.

58. Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in 1907 had a population of 350,000 people and a horse population of 12,500. The city had to dispose of 133 tons of horse manure daily. In 1908, when New York City's population was 4,777,000, it had 120,000 horses. Chicago in 1900 had 83,300 horses. This was in the early era of the streetcar and automobile. There were still 3.5 million horses in American cities and 17 million in the countryside. Joel A. Tarr, "Urban Pollution—Many Long Years Ago," American Heritage, XXII (October 1971). (<http://bit.ly/TarrPollution>)

59. Ted O. Thackery, "Pittsburgh: How One City Did It," in Marshall I. Goldman (ed.), Ecology and Economics: Controlling Pollution in the 70s (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1972), pp. 199–202.

L. Regional Standards

When it comes to the problem of reducing the costs (increasing the efficiency) of assessing the effect of injuries, local civil governments are best equipped to enforce pollution (cleanliness) standards. The larger the administrative or geographical unit, the more difficult it is to assess costs and benefits. Only when conflicts across political or jurisdictional boundaries are involved—county vs. county, state vs. state—should higher levels of civil government be called in to redress grievances. Local conditions, local standards of cleanliness, silence, or whatever, involve local conflicts. These are best settled by local governmental units.

If a national civil government imposes general pollution-control standards for clean air, local communities could be damaged economically. A community may have a polluting factory as its primary employment base. The factory is bankrupted by the newly applied national standards. Its owners, or rival producers of similar goods, may choose to move capital into a foreign nation whose political leaders are more anxious to create jobs than to avoid pollution. The pollution is simply shifted “off shore.” This may be a good thing, overall; perhaps this particular sort of pollution will be less of a problem in some other geographical environment that is blessed with pollution-reducing wind patterns. Or a foreign nation may have a less dense population. The first question is: Who knows best? Is some political body or bureaucratic agency thousands of miles away from the affected areas sufficiently informed about local effects of such decisions?

A second relevant question is: Who pays? Rich voters in some regions of a country may be making political decisions that adversely affect poorer voters in different regions whenever national environmental standards are imposed. Are such national standards really that crucial to the survival of the environment? Can local geographical regions really destroy the ecology of the entire nation? What kind of proof can the defenders of national pollution-control standards present to defend their conclusion that such standards are exclusively a matter of national self-interest?

1. Subsidies to the Politically Skilled

One reason why we get national ecology or pollution-control standards is because of the costs of political mobilization. It is less expensive for special-interest groups to lobby a few hundred politicians in the nation's capital or to gain control over a Washington bureaucracy than it is to conduct a lobbying campaign in every regional legislature and local town council. The national civil government then preempts the regional units of civil government. This centralizes political power, which leads increasingly to a reduction of everyone's political freedom.

Why should residents of Los Angeles, California, or Denver, Colorado, who live in peculiar geographical environments (stagnant air currents, breeze-reducing surrounding mountains) impose their environmental standards on drivers in wide-open Texas or Wyoming? Why should they lobby for national auto pollution emission standards that will necessarily reduce the performance and increase the purchase price of all cars produced in the United States? They are demanding a subsidy: lower costs per unit for required pollution-control equipment (as a result of higher production of regulated cars), but increased costs for most other drivers whose communities are not in need of such devices. In this case, national pollution-control legislation is a politically acceptable wealth-redistribution scheme. If people in southern California want mandatory pollution-control devices for cars registered in their region, they can vote accordingly. Indeed, given the vast number of cars in this region, they must vote for emission standards if they are to improve the quality of the air they breathe. But they should not insist on a subsidy from car buyers and operators in other regions of the country.⁶⁰

Why should those who worry about pollution be allowed to extract a subsidy from those who do not worry so much? Those who hate pollution are allowed to move to a less polluted region of the country. But they prefer to achieve their goal of living in a cleaner environment at the expense of local factory workers, whose jobs are "up in the air." How many factory workers are enthusiastic and dedicated supporters of the ecology movement, or were in its early days in the late 1960s? Aren't the movement's white-collar supporters better paid, more highly educated (at taxpayers' expense), and more mobile than the blue-collar working people whose jobs are at stake? The leather goods-selling "street people" with university degrees in sociology were more likely to be at the forefront of the ecology movement in 1968 than the average employee with General Motors. As one book pointed out, "Preliminary studies indicate in fact the opposite result from that expected by critics; that is, wealthy people tend to be lovers of [ecologic-

60. To some extent, this principle is honored. Emissions-control standards have in the past been far more stringent for California than for other states in the U.S.

al] purity while the very poor are more interested in other problems.”⁶¹

Some readers may think I am exaggerating. Not so. The Sierra Club is perhaps the most active lobbying organization for ecology in the world, along with Friends of the Earth. The group took out an advertisement in Advertising Age magazine, to attract advertisers for their magazine, Sierra. Why advertise in Sierra? Money! “Sierra readers have very good taste. Each month 81 percent serve domestic or imported wines, 27 percent serve bottled mineral water and 42 percent offer their guests imported beer.”⁶² In other words, they say of their readers, here are the educational and financial elite. Kevin Phillips, the political commentator, referred to environmentalists as “the wine and cheese belt.”⁶³ The same theme was pursued brilliantly by William Tucker, in his 1982 book, Progress and Privilege: America in the Age of Environmentalism.⁶⁴ We should ask ourselves: To what extent is the concern about pollution a concern of the highly educated, higher-income intellectuals who have more skills in media manipulation and political manipulation than those who are not equally skilled, or who do not trust in salvation by political action?

Economist Thomas Sowell, who grew up in rural North Carolina and the Harlem “ghetto” of New York City in the depression and war years,⁶⁵ has identified the problem: the majority poor have too much money in the aggregate for the minority rich to compete against them successfully in a confined geographical region. The poor have more money. “There are infinitely more of them, and real estate dealers and developers would rather get $10 million from 10,000 people than get $1 million from one millionaire.”⁶⁶ You will not see economic analysis like this in Sierra magazine:

In the natural course of economic events, the non-rich would end up taking more and more land and shore away from the rich. Spectacular homes with spectacular views would be replaced by mundane apartment buildings with only moderately pleasant vistas.

61. James C. Hite, et al., Economics of Environmental Quality, p. 34.

62. “Briefing,” I (Nov. 8, 1982).

63. Idem.

64. Garden City, New York: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1982.

65. Thomas Sowell, Black Education: Myths and Tragedies (New York: David McKay, 1972).

66. Thomas Sowell, Pink and Brown People and Other Controversial Essays (Stanford, California: Hoover Institution Press, 1981), p. 104. This essay appeared originally in the Los Angeles Herald Examiner (March 23, 1979): “Those Phony Environmentalists.”

A doctor or movie mogul who can now walk the beach in front of his house in splendid isolation would be replaced by whole families of ordinary grubby mortals seeking a respite from the asphalt and an occasional view of the sunset.

The climax of the story is when the affluent heroes are rescued by the government. In the old days, this used to be the cavalry, but nowadays it is more likely to be the zoning board or the coastal commission. They decree that the land cannot be used in ways that would make it accessible to the many, but only in ways accessible to the few. Legal phrasing is of course more elaborate and indirect than this, but that is what it all boils down to. This is called “preserving the environment” (applause) from those who would “misuse” it (boos).⁶⁷

2. The Anti-Dominion Impulse

James Jordan was correct: biblical law is essentially antiaristocratic in the field of economics. An aristocracy of birth finds it difficult to retain its position at the top of the economic hierarchy in a free market society, which biblical law produces when it is enforced. The main antiaristocratic feature of biblical economics is the familistic aspect of capital. The reason for the anti-aristocratic provisions is dominion.

If language is the first stage and prerequisite of dominion, property is the second. Adam was given the garden to beautify and protect (Gen. 2:15). He was to name it, get power over it, and creatively remold it. The eighth commandment protects private property, as do other provisions in the law of God (cf. esp. Lev. 25:13; and see I Ki. 21). Every man is to have his own garden. His marriage and his garden (work) are the major axes around which the ellipse of the temporal life is drawn. In pagan aristocratic societies, few men have gardens, and many men are slaves. Moreover, such aristocrats often exercise only minimal dominion, preferring to war or entertain themselves.

Under the influence of Christian concepts of familistic property, the free market has acted to break up such large aristocratic holdings. The industrious poor eventually buy out the lazy rich, and anyone with thrift can eventually obtain his own garden. Dominion is multiplied.⁶⁸

67. Idem.

68. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 133. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

Public concern, meaning media headlines, for both the “population explosion” and the “ecology crisis” hit overnight, around 1967. As Marshall Goldman commented in 1967, “Today’s news media devote almost as much attention to air and water pollution as to the problems of poverty. Virtually overnight pollution seems to have become one of America’s major issues.”⁶⁹ The rapid rise and fall of both issues as “media events” indicate that a deeply felt concern over these issues in the minds of large numbers of voters was never present. Can we be sure that much of the motivation behind the once loudly proclaimed “concern for the environment” was not really a hatred of free enterprise, a hatred of economic growth as such?⁷⁰ Is a major underlying (and unstated) intellectual impulse behind the ecology movement an anti-dominion, anti-progress, anti-Christian Eastern mysticism, or a “back to nature” ideology that hates modern industrialism?⁷¹

It is difficult to take seriously anyone who writes, as the leading anti-growth economist, E. J. Mishan, wrote in a purportedly scholarly work: “The private automobile is, surely, one of the greatest, if not the greatest, disasters that ever befell the human race. For sheer irresistible destructive power, no other creation of man—save, perhaps the airliner—can compete with it. . . . One could go on, for the extent of its destructive powers is awesome to contemplate. Criminal success, especially of robbery and violence, has come to depend heavily on the fast get-away car.”⁷² (The get-away car? He must have been watching too many late-night gangster movies on television. Besides, the police have cars, too.) He should write a book called The Sinister Ambulance.

Mishan’s radical elitism is clear enough in his discussion of the terrible effects of jet planes. They have allowed hordes of middle-class people to travel to the former pleasure spots of the rich: “. . . the airliner has conspired with the automobile to create a tourist explosion that, within a few years, has irrevocably destroyed the once-famed

69. Marshall I. Goldman, “Pollution: The Mess Around Us,” in Goldman (ed.), Ecology and Economics, op. cit., p. 3. This book was first published in 1967 under the title, Controlling Pollution: The Economics of a Cleaner America.

70. See, for example, two books by Prof. Ezra J. Mishan, The Costs of Economic Growth (New York: Praeger, 1967) and The Economic Growth Debate: An Assessment (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1977).

71. Ayn Rand argued that the ecology movement is intensely anti-progress: “The Anti-Industrial Revolution,” in her book, The New Left: The Anti-Industrial Revolution (New York: Signet, 1971), ch. 8. A similar thesis is presented by John Maddox, the editor of the British scientific journal, Nature, in his book, The Doomsday Syndrome (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1972).

72. Mishan, Economic Growth Debate, pp. 122–23.

beauty spots of the Mediterranean coastline.”⁷³ In the name of “the good life” and “the quality of life,” the supposedly democratic and equalitarian academic scribblers are proclaiming the wonders of a world in which the middle class and the poor will not have the economic opportunity to “dirty up the environments” of the rich. “No growth” means less competition from the “unwashed masses” for those who have already arrived at the top.

Are there objective scientific standards of pollution? Yes. Are the physiological, ecological and economic effects of these pollutants universally agreed upon by scientists and other professionals? Seldom. Can economists assess the costs and benefits of pollution or anything else scientifically? No. As Dales wrote,

The important question is how much “better quality environment” we would be willing to buy at different “prices” in terms of higher taxes and higher costs of goods, and most of us are not sure about this. As was suggested in the last chapter, the only way to answer the question may be to have the politicians start charging us for better quality air and water and then keep “upping the ante” until we say “Enough! No more!” The trouble is that when we call a halt about half of us will think that we are already spending too much to improve the environment, and about half of us will want to spend more; therefore very few of us will be very happy with the outcome.⁷⁴

A perfect environment will not come from political pressure.

Few people are aware that the whole debate over carcinogens (cancer-producing substances) in the environment has been conducted with virtually no evidence. In her 1984 study of 15,000 scientific papers and books, Edith Efron reported that the scientific community has identified very few clear threats to human health in the modern environment. The public discussions of carcinogens in the environment had been conducted primarily by special-interest groups, political propagandists, social scientists, and a handful of scientists, often those employed by government regulatory agencies whose survival is dependent on continuing public funding. As she said, “the government has systematically fed the public the views of one faction in the academic world while the views of others have been largely withheld.”⁷⁵ She correctly pinpointed the underlying problem: a commitment to a particular view of man and nature by modern scientists. Rachel Carson, whose apocalyptic book on the environment, Silent Spring (1962), launched the modern political ecology movement, operated in terms of a view that man is an invader in nature. Efron was correct: "... the apocalyptic approach to cancer rests, fundamentally, on the 'axiom' of a largely benevolent nature—on a vision of a largely noncarcinogenic Garden of Eden now defiled by the sins of pride and greed."⁷⁶ This deeply religious perspective has produced faith in a political solution: "... the 'axiom' of nature's minimal role in cancer causation led to a political conception of the disease of cancer and to a political solution. . . . The underlying 'axiom' of nature's virtual noncarcinogenicity was tacitly accepted, and the little packet of ideas that followed from that 'axiom' soon became the conventional wisdom: 'Man,' not nature, was responsible for the evil. . . . 'man' meant the men who made and used chemicals. . . . 'man' meant industry. . . . cancer was fundamentally a political disease."⁷⁷ The scientific facts prove otherwise: man's natural environment is itself carcinogenic.⁷⁸

73. Ibid., p. 123.

74. Dales, Pollution, pp. 71–72.

75. Edith Efron, The Apocalypstics: Cancer and the Big Lie (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984), p. 12.

What is the biblical perspective? The Bible teaches that man is cursed, and so is nature. Neither man nor nature is normative, ethically or biologically. Man sickens and dies because he is under a curse, but no one environmental source is the primary cause of man's condition. To assume that nature is not carcinogenic is an exercise in fantasy.

Summary

There are certain kinds of damage that can become so widespread that those who produce them endanger too many people. In the case of some form of pollution that is known to be so damaging that the producer could not possibly make restitution to those injured, the state possesses the lawful authority to prohibit or isolate the activity. The example of fire codes is representative. Similar codes for polluting processes can and should be worked out by experts who are hired by the government, with the politicians invoking the required regulations. The legal justification for outright prohibition must be the known inability of damage-producers to pay their victims, should a crisis take place. The more widespread the production process is, and the more widespread its spillover effects, the less likely that a single producer could afford to make restitution. Thus, the civil government restricts the process.

76. Ibid., p. 127.

77. Ibid., p. 128.

78. Ibid., pp. 125–75.

The civil government is the necessary agent for settling disputes that cannot be worked out voluntarily and peaceably. It is an agent of last resort, for it uses coercion, a very dangerous monopoly to be invoked by anyone. The public should be willing to permit people to settle disputes over pollution on a mutually profit-seeking basis. The most obvious example is to allow people to accept known environmental defects in order to gain discounts on land purchases.

The assessment of risks (costs) and rewards is a cultural phenomenon.⁷⁹ Cultural preferences are expressed locally. They are more identifiable and distinct. Thus, the regulation of pollution should be limited judicially. The judicial authority to which voters assign the tasks of regulation should be closely restricted to the geographical region in which that type of pollution is being produced. There will therefore be less distorting of the pollution allocation preferences of the people who are involuntarily affected by the particular pollutants.

A major reason why regional pollution preferences are ignored is that those who are politically skilled in imposing their views on politicians prefer to concentrate their efforts and resources at the national level. A region-by-region political fight is expensive and essentially open-ended; the results will not be clear cut, for many regional politicians will resist the arguments of the anti-pollution forces. It is cheaper for the anti-pollution lobby to risk losing nationally on any particular vote and then try again than it is to try to win each region separately.

Dominion involves costs and risks. Those who want anything like a perfectly safe environment are calling for the extinction of the human species—a very high-risk program. It is ultimately a religious program. This anti-dominion religion is not Christianity. The biblical goal is the progressive sanctification of the environment as an effect of the progressive sanctification of a growing number of individuals through God's grace. The environment must be progressively healed as a result of God's judgment of blessing on covenant-keeping men, for it was first polluted as a result of God's judgment against covenant-breaking 79. Mary Douglas and Aaron Wildavsky, Risk and Culture: An Essay on the Selection of Technical and Environmental Dangers (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982).

mankind (Gen. 3:18).⁸⁰

M. Brokers Between Generations

All government is representative. Each individual represents God, for better or worse. Each person is responsible before God. We are all stewards. There is no escape. The final judgment is sure. The question then arises: Why should the civil government be a better long-run steward of resources than individual or corporate owners? The fact is, if ownership becomes political, then the only true ownership is the ability of the politician to maintain himself in political office. If ownership is bureaucratic, then it is based on considerations of tenure and bureaucratic advancement. If it is private, familial, or corporate, then ownership is governed by competitive market considerations. The public is always represented by owners, just as God is; the question is: Which form of representation is appropriate? Which form is most responsive to God and to the public in any given instance?

R. H. Coase quite properly called attention to the problem of state enterprise and responsibility for damages. He remarked that "it is likely that an extension of Government economic activity will often lead to this protection against action for nuisance being pushed further than is desirable. For one thing, the Government is likely to look with a benevolent eye on enterprises which it is itself promoting. For another, it is possible to describe the committing of a nuisance by public enterprise in a much more pleasant way than when the same thing is done by private enterprise. . . . There can be little doubt that the Welfare State is likely to bring an extension of that immunity from liability for damage, which economists have been in the habit of condemning. . . ." ⁸¹

A proper analysis of ownership, pollution, and responsibility quite properly begins with libertarian economist F. A. Harper's observation that if I do not have the right to disown an asset, I do not really own it.

80. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 11.

81. R. H. Coase, "The Problem of Social Cost," The Journal of Law and Economics, III (Oct. 1960), pp. 26–27. A classic example of this unwillingness of the federal government to police its own agencies is the case of the radioactive waste disposal sites that are believed to be leaking wastes into local environments. Seventeen of these nuclear weapon production facilities in 12 states are owned by the U. S. Department of Energy. Congressman Albert Bustamante of Texas admitted: "Anytime we get into a problem like now, nobody on the committee knows what is what. We just delegate things to the Department of Energy." Fox Butterworth, "Trouble at Atomic Bomb Plants: How Lawmakers Missed the Signs," New York Times (Nov. 28, 1988).

Murray Rothbard extended Harper's comment and applied it to the question of who really owns "public" property. Very important, Rothbard concluded, is the short-run perspective of politicians, who face re-election battles every few years.

While rulers of government own "public" property, their ownership is not secure in the long run, since they may always be defeated in an election or deposed. Hence government officials will tend to regard themselves as only transitory owners of "public" resources. While a private owner, secure in his property and its capital value, may plan the use of his resource over a long period of time in the future, the government official must exploit "his" property as quickly as he can, since he has no security of tenure. And even the most securely entrenched civil servant must concentrate on present use, because government officials cannot usually sell the capitalized value of their property, as private owners can. In short, except in the case of the "private property" of a hereditary monarch, government officials own the current use of resources, but not their capital value. But if a resource itself cannot be owned, but only its current use, there will rapidly ensue an uneconomic exhaustion of the resource, since it will be to no one's benefit to conserve it over a period of time, and yet to each owner's advantage to use it up quickly. It is particularly curious, then, that almost all writers parrot the notion that private owners, possessing time preference, must take the "short view" in using their resources, while only government officials are properly equipped to exercise the "long view." The truth is precisely the reverse. The private individual, secure in his capital ownership, can afford to take the long view because of his interest in maintaining the capital value of his resource. It is the government official who must take and run, who must exploit the property quickly while he is still in command.⁸²

Harold Demsetz argued that the private owner serves as a broker between generations. "In effect, an owner of a private right to use land acts as a broker whose wealth depends on how well he takes into account the competing claims of the present and the future. But with communal rights there is no broker, and the claims of the present generation will be given an uneconomically large weight in determining the intensity with which the land is worked. Future generations might desire to pay present generations enough to change the present intensity of land usage. But they have no living agent to place their claims on the market. Under a communal property system, should a living, person pay others to reduce the rate at which they work the land, he would not gain anything of value for his efforts. Communal property means that future generations must speak for themselves.”⁸³

82. Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), pp. 956–57.

Because private owners can personally capitalize their efforts to conserve resources (“land”), and pass this asset on to children, or sell it to other private parties who will want to pass the capitalized assets on to future generations, the property’s future value can be estimated by a private owner—the demand by future consumers for the output of the resource in question, discounted by the prevailing rate of interest. The lower the rate of interest,⁸⁴ of course, the higher the present value of the capitalized asset. Why? Because the rate of interest discounts the present market value of the expected future stream of income (including personal use value) of a capital asset. The higher the discount, the less the asset is worth in the present. A future-oriented society has a lower rate of interest than a present-oriented society. A lower rate of interest therefore allows future generations to “shout their bids” more effectively to this generation’s “brokers” or “auctioneers.” It generally takes private, profit-seeking “auctioneers” to hear those bids clearly and act in terms of them. In short, the more that a society conforms itself to the biblical concept of private ownership and a biblical concept of time, the higher the capitalized value of privately owned assets, as a result of the greater attention that profit-seeking owners will pay to the perceived demand of future owners and users.

Summary

The question of resource conservation is intimately tied to the question of time perspective. When we ask ourselves questions concerning resource conservation, we are asking questions regarding conservation for future consumption.

The debate over ecology has been dominated by people who believe (or say they believe) that the civil government has the most responsible view of the future. They do not raise the obvious question: What motivates the individuals who control the various agencies of 83. Harold Demsetz, “Toward a Theory of Property Rights,” American Economic Review, LVII (May 1967); reprinted in Furubotn and Pejovich (eds.), Economics of Property Rights, pp. 38–39.

84. Lower interest stems from: (1) a lower risk premium (to compensate for debtors’ defaulting), (2) a lower price inflation premium (to compensate lenders for the loss of purchasing power of the monetary unit), and (3) a lower social rate of time preference (the more citizens are future-oriented).

civil government? What is their motivation regarding pollution and resource conservation compared to the motivation of private owners?

Free market economists stress the long-range motivations of those who own property. When a person sells an asset, he is capitalizing in the present the expected future net productivity of that asset. The individual who can sell an asset owns it. The government bureaucrat cannot legally sell it and pocket the money, so he does not own it. Thus, his motivation is to use the asset in such a way that his income or prestige is increased. He is not paid to represent future generations of users; the private owner is paid to represent those living in the future, for an asset's present price depends heavily on the expected stream of net income it will generate over time.⁸⁵

What we find is what economics predicts concerning the motivation of managers under socialist ownership of the means of production. Managers in socialist nations tend to pollute the environment, use state-owned resources, and ignore the complaints of the politically impotent public. This was especially true of the Soviet Union.⁸⁶ Managers used the state's resources to benefit their own careers, which meant meeting state-assigned production quotas. The subtle pressures and rewards of private ownership were missing; socialist plans are crude and focus on aggregate output. Little else matters to the manager, except possibly laying up hidden reserves to barter with or steal and then sell into the black market. He must make his factory's quota (plus a few percentage points more, to earn his bonus). The environment suffers as a direct result.

Pollution is controlled by a combination of widespread private ownership, and local and regional civil government enforcement of Exodus 22:5–6. Socialist ownership is guaranteed to produce pollution because it places at the top of the list the goals of non-owning factory managers.

N. Solutions to Pollution

The first step is to recognize that men are responsible for their actions. The man who pollutes the environment in such a way that it infringes on the way of life of his neighbors must be made to pay restitution. He is responsible; he must pay.

85. The other major considerations are selling costs and the prevailing rate of interest.

86. See Appendix I: "Pollution in the Soviet Union."

There are always problems in applying this rule. Here are some basic ones. First, it may be impossible to identify a single polluter as the major source of pollution. An entire region may be filled with polluting industries. In this case, the local civil government or governments will have to begin to formulate general policies that encourage all polluters to reduce their polluting activities, even though each polluter cannot be matched precisely with all those who are harmed by the pollution.

This raises some very hard legal questions. The main one is that of strict liability.⁸⁷ If a plaintiff cannot prove that a specific polluter hurt his property in a specific physical way, and that he thereby suffered a specific economic loss, then how can he legitimately receive restitution from a supposed polluter? Is a defendant presumed innocent until proven guilty or not? Paul Downing wrote: "Currently, a party who has been damaged by air pollution must prove in court that emitter A damaged him. He must establish that he was damaged and emitter A did it, and not emitter B. This is almost always an impossible task."⁸⁸ Murray Rothbard, a proponent of a zero-civil government society, responded: "If true, then we must assent uncomplainingly. . . . Are defendants now to be guilty until they can prove themselves innocent?"⁸⁹ Rothbard preferred to live with pollution rather than live with a civil

87. Richard Epstein, an articulate defender of strict liability, contrasted his position with what he called a negligence theory of law. "The development of the common law of tort has been marked by the opposition between two major theories. The first holds that a plaintiff should be entitled, prima facie, to recover from a defendant who has caused him harm only if the defendant intended to harm the plaintiff or failed to take reasonable steps to avoid inflicting the harm. The alternative theory, that of strict liability, holds the defendant prima facie liable for the harm caused whether or not either of the two further conditions relating to negligence and intent is satisfied." Epstein, A Theory of Strict Liability: Toward a Reformulation of Tort Law (San Francisco: Cato Institute, 1980), p. 5. He distinguished four cases governing private tort (law suit) action: A hits B; A frightens B; A coerces B to hit G; and A creates dangerous conditions. He advocated the adoption of a rigorous concept of causation. Because he relied so heavily on the nearly absolute nature of private property rights, Epstein's position has become the foundation of the legal theory most popular with anarcho-capitalists of the Austrian School of economics. It should be noted that he admitted that in actual cases, the same outcome is reached by judges who adopt either of the two approaches. "Hence the choice between these two systems comes down to the few, but still important, cases where the outcome will rest upon choice of theory." Ibid., p. 135.

88. Paul B. Downing, "An Introduction to the Problem of Air Quality," in Downing (ed.), Air Pollution and the Social Sciences (New York: Praeger, 1971), p. 13; cited by Murray N. Rothbard, "Law, Property Rights, and Air Pollution," Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), p. 88. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardAir>) government that does not honor the principle of strict liability in courts of law.

89. Idem.

The proper biblical response is that the officers of the state must act as surrogates for injured citizens in this instance. The state must of course prove its case, namely, that the physical effects of the polluting substances are harming specific people in a specific region, or, in the case of noisy automobiles, that the pollutant—“noise”—in almost all known cases involves an infringement on the property rights of citizens who will never be able to locate and prosecute all violators of their rights (legal immunities). Civil law should not ignore the effects on existing property rights that are produced by such social changes as new technology, the crowding of residential areas, the high costs of proving specific damages in a multipolluter environment, and the desire of people to reduce the assault on their bodies and their property.

No perfect system of pollution control (or allocation) can be devised, either by the free market or the state. But to leave the polluters free to pollute just because there are a lot of them to prosecute will only lead to a growth in their numbers and the amount of pollution. Civil law should not subsidize pollution's involuntary transfers of wealth by adhering to man-made legal principles that were not designed to deal with every conceivable technological problem—legal rules that have never been applied perfectly anyway.

Nevertheless, there is a definite legal problem here, and Christians should not ignore it. The state can become over-zealous in its prosecution of every known form of pollution. The messianic state is a greater menace to civilization than pollution has ever proven to be. People can at least move away from polluters. Also, the polluters generally live in the local environment, so they have an incentive to restrict the polluting processes. The messianic state is not equally self-limiting or limited by the direct response of the public, especially a public that has lost faith in the God of the Bible and His law.

The main restraint on the advent of a messianic state in a Christian commonwealth will be the inability of the state financially to expand its influence, since the taxing powers of the combined levels of civil government, local to federal, will be limited to less than 10% of national income (1 Sam. 8),⁹⁰ and it will not have the legal ability to debase the currency, either through debasing precious metals (Isa. 1:22)⁹¹

90. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

91. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the or by fractional reserve banking (Ex. 22:26).⁹² This general restraint on the growth of state power limits the state specifically in the area of pollution control (and in all other areas).

A second problem of enforcing responsibility for pollution is that there may be no way for victims to organize on a costeffective basis in order to gain restitution. The costs of organizing and proving damages in a court of law may exceed the actual, or at least demonstrable, injuries from the pollution.⁹³ Crocker called these “informational, contractual, and policing costs.”

Third, the complexity of the situation may make it difficult for a court to determine just what is fair with respect to compensation. Which firm’s smoke hurt what home owner in exactly what proportion of the total pollutants in a valley? And how much was he hurt? Contrary to the rarified discussions found in professional economics journals, there is no known scientific way to come up with an answer to the question of damages.⁹⁴ There is a lot of guesswork or intuition involved. (Economists should not object too strenuously, since intuition is the bedrock foundation of all humanistic economics anyway.)⁹⁵

Nobody can use the complex mathematical and logical formulas found in the scholarly journals to solve the “externalities” problem.⁹⁶ There are other issues to consider. First, did the property owner know in advance about the pollution, and did he buy the property at a discount? In short, has he already been compensated economically for his suffering? Second, has new information on the danger of a particular Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 3.

92. Chapter 49:J. See also Gary North, Honest Money (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/gnmoney>). Cf. North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 1: “The Biblical Critique of Inflation.” (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>). For an even more detailed analysis, see North, “Isaiah’s Critique of Inflation,” The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VII (Summer 1980).

93. For an instance of just such a situation, see T. D. Crocker, “Externalities, Property Rights, and Transaction Costs: An Empirical Study,” The Journal of Law and Economics, XIV (Oct. 1971), pp. 461–62.

94. See Appendix H: “The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost.”

95. Gary North, “Economics: From Reason to Intuition,” in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976).

96. For an example of such unrealistic and utterly useless mathematical models, see S. A. Y. Lin and D. K. Whitcomb, “Externality Taxes and Subsidies,” in Lin (ed.), Theory and Measurement of Externalities (New York: Academic Press, 1976). The authors’ model assumes that: (1) private firms and the civil government have perfect and costless information; and (2) the costs of policing are zero. See John Burton’s comments, Epilogue, in Cheung, Myth of Social Cost, p. 60.

form of pollution recently become available? If so, did the victim pay too much for the property, even with the discount, and is he entitled to more compensation? Third, is the danger so great to the whole community that the pollution should be stopped entirely? Fourth, if regulations need to be passed to control regional pollution, will the enforcement mechanism be too powerful and arbitrary to preserve freedom, or will it be too weak to achieve its goals? Who decides? What kinds of self-compliance incentives can be built into the law to encourage the polluters to discipline themselves?

1. Incentives and Sanctions

The economists debate about incentives and sanctions. There are several recommended approaches. First, an outright ban on polluting. This is seldom wise. The costs are too high: costs of lost freedom and capital to producers, costs of lost jobs for employees, costs of forfeited tax revenues to the civil government, and lost economic growth when new factories fail to move in for fear of arbitrary, retroactive decisions by regional authorities. Also, it transfers too much power to enforcing agencies.

Second, tax credits (deductible against taxes owed to the community or civil government agency that is imposing the law) for installing pollution-control equipment. This gives the polluters an incentive to install the pollution-control devices. It also puts pressure on civil governments to reduce their expenditures to compensate for falling revenues—almost always a desirable political effect. If the civil government raises taxes from other sources, it risks a tax revolt. If it succeeds, however, taxpayers are then forced to pay for cleaner air or water. But if they had bought land under the older conditions—at a discount because of the pollution—they are going to be compensated by rising property values and a more pleasant way of life. This makes higher taxes more bearable.

The problem with the tax credit approach, on the face of it, is that polluters are not penalized. The Bible's rule that the victims should be compensated by the trespassers is seemingly not being honored. The best answer is that the rising concern for ecological purity is placing new environmental standards on producers—standards that did not prevail when they moved into the region to start business. The local residents got the benefits—more jobs, lower-priced land, perhaps a lower property tax rate—and are not entitled to direct restitution, except by the better environment they will receive. Thus, if residents want less pollution, they have to pay for it. One way to pay for this is to allow profitable manufacturers the right to pay fewer taxes.

Third, progressive fines for polluters: the more pollution, the higher the fines. In effect, this allows polluters to “buy” the right of polluting. They must assess the value to them of continuing to pollute. They get no more “free lunches” in the form of an open sky or stream. The fines can be experimented with by the local civil government to reduce the worst kinds of pollution without bankrupting local businesses. If the money is used to reimburse victims directly or indirectly by lowering tax rates, this follows the biblical injunction.

If the fines are used by the bureaucrats and politicians to expand the civil government, then this is not what the Bible requires. There is always a great temptation by the civil government to use the fines to expand their power. The tax credit approach seems to be a better way to restrict the expansion of civil government. Higher taxes unquestionably act as an incentive to make changes as the output of pollutants increases. If the goal is to “put a lid on pollution, a graduated fine system is effective. But there are problems with defining legitimate fines or charges for any given level of pollution. There is no science of appropriate fines.⁹⁷

Fourth, in the case of a localized polluter that is affecting only land close by, the civil government can establish specific pollution standards, such as parts per million. The company can then be given a choice: meet the standards, or buy the lands that are being affected. This was done in Polk County, Florida, in the late 1950s when phosphate producing plants were reducing the value of adjacent cattle land and citrus properties. The companies could then decide which to do: pay for more pollution-control equipment or pay for the land. Increasingly, they bought the land, as the marginal cost of each additional increase in pollution control climbed much higher. In the mid-1950s, the companies had owned 50% of the affected land; by 1964, they owned 80%.⁹⁸

There are other possible solutions, but any workable long-term solution will have to be at bottom voluntaristic. We need greater decentralization of our population. It is the concentrated population of the modern city that is the great burden to the environment. The advent of decentralized power-generation systems would enable people to move to less expensive land in presently less populated regions. The strain on the environment will be reduced. With the advent of a low-cost system of international telecommunications through the Internet, another barrier to small town and rural living is gone. Because we can now educate and entertain ourselves without hooking up to wires, “wireless” living is capable of making possible lower-pollution living. If technologically advanced societies continue to sell information rather than manufactured goods, substituting high-technology, low-pollution manufacturing for older steel mills and automobile plants, then we can escape both big government and pollution. Something approaching the kind of decentralized utopia outlined by Tofler may not be that far away, technologically speaking.⁹⁹

97. Peter Lewin, “Pollution Externalities: Social Cost and Strict Liability,” Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), pp. 214–15; Jerome Millimen, “Can Water Pollution Policy be Efficient?” ibid. (<http://bit.ly/CatoPollution>)

98. Crocker, “Externalities,” pp. 456–59.

All talk in scholarly economic journals about the ability of science to discover socially “optimal” levels of pollution is as far-fetched as science’s ability to come up with socially optimal anything (especially an optimal investment of scarce economic resources in scientific reports). Because humanistic economists cannot scientifically make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, it is illegitimate to assert the ability of any economist or other scientist to offer advice or data on how to achieve socially optimal anything. All the equations in the world will not add one iota of knowledge that will prove useful to any economist who relies exclusively on subjective economic theory in his search for socially optimal levels of pollution. (If the equations are sufficiently elegant to be utterly irrelevant, they could, on the other hand, win the developer a Nobel Prize in economics.)

The modern state is becoming messianic. Its supporters believe that salvation is essentially political. Thus, they promote state action in their efforts to heal the environment. Instead, we should begin with the issue of legal responsibility. Individuals are to be held accountable for their actions—by God, by the civil government, and by the free market.

When many polluters are harming many people, the state must intervene and impose sanctions against all producers of the particular type of generally unwanted pollution. But in doing so, the officials must count the costs to society of the intervention’s effects of people’s faith in private ownership. The intervention must be made in terms of a defense of private property rights, not its abolition. The rise of the messianic state is a greater threat to liberty than pollution is. Pollution is a recognized evil; the messianic state is the agent of a rival religion.

99. Alvin Tofler, The Third Wave (New York: Random House, 1980).

A whole system of incentives and sanctions is available: fines, tax credits, pollution control standards, and even outright prohibition. What must be recognized is that the quest for zero pollution is messianic. It is a program that covers the real intent of its promoters: salvation by legislation. If men do not restrain themselves voluntarily as both polluters and pollution-fighters, the social order will be torn apart by the messianic quest for the perfect environment. Such an environment is available only after the final judgment, when the curse is removed (Rom. 8:19–22).

O. The Messianic Quest for Zero Pollution

The question of pollution, ultimately, is a question of stewardship, meaning personal responsibility. The Bible affirms that each man is responsible for his actions. No man is to pass along the costs of his activities to his neighbor, apart from the latter's consent. Where there is ownership (legitimate sovereignty), there must also be responsibility.

Perfect justice in this regard is impossible, and any attempt to create a completely pollution-free environment is doomed to failure. After all, men exhale—a form of pollution that unquestionably has some environmental consequences. Furthermore, it is not possible to assess the full costs of pollution, since estimating costs necessarily requires men to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, and such comparisons can be made only imperfectly.¹⁰⁰ Arbitrary estimates must be made by judges, arbitration committees, or administrative bureaucracies in charge of pollution-control programs. These will not be “scientific” estimates, for such measurable estimates cannot be made in economics. As Dales admitted, “the economist is quite unable to draw up a neat table showing all benefits and all costs of all anti-pollution policies that are proposed (or that might be proposed); he is therefore quite unable to say that one policy is demonstrably superior to all others. . . . At the moment, the subject is humility.”¹⁰¹ Perfection here cannot be achieved at any cost.

The example of the phosphate companies of Polk County, Florida, is representative. Achieving 95% efficiency in controlling emissions

100. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

101. Dales, Pollution, pp. 39, 40.

was economically possible. The last 5 percent would have bankrupted the companies. "Once an efficiency level of 95 per cent has been attained, it is clear that further increases in efficiency become relatively unresponsive to additional capital outlays. For plants at least ten years old in 1965, it is unlikely that the 97 per cent efficiency level can even be reached. The plant less than ten years old required an outlay of almost one-half million dollars to move from a 98 to a 99 per cent level of efficiency. Two two-year old plants needed a quarter million dollars to increase their control efficiency from 99.1 to 99.2 per cent."¹⁰² In 1968, the Pennsylvania Power Company of Newcastle, Pennsylvania spent $2 million on a facility to reduce fly ash and suspended particulates discharged by the plant. To attain 99% removal, the firm had to spend an additional $4 million.¹⁰³

Citizens must use self-discipline in their quest for a better world. If every citizen is forever suing his neighbor for each perceived infringement on his environmental lifestyle, society will perish. This is the great danger of class-action suits by one person in the name of an unspecified number of others in a supposed "class" of victims. Each person can sue a company, which may be operating within the law, thereby imposing endless legal fees on the firm. This could tie up a firm's legitimate operations. Such suits could be brought by anyone for almost any perceived infraction: automobile safety, national defense, and on and on.¹⁰⁴ Those who bring class-action suits that are determined by a jury to constitute unwarranted harassment of a business must be put "at risk" for their actions. Everyone must become responsible for his actions, not just producers.¹⁰⁵

Ours is not a perfect world, and any attempt to impose perfect standards on it, without acknowledging the limits imposed by scarcity, and therefore the costs involved, is demonic. The whole community will be harmed. "As costs rise for persons who must treat more and more of their wastes so that other persons can enjoy more and more purity, it will become apparent that the party who wants pure water is hurting the environment for the party who wants food, clothing, and shelter."¹⁰⁶

102. Crocker, "Externalities," p. 458.

103. Hite, Economics of Environmental Quality, p. 25.

104. Ibid., p. 91.

105. On the legal problems associated with class-action suits, see the critical comments by Murray N. Rothbard, "Law, Property Rights, and Air Pollution," op. cit., pp. 93–97. See also Huber, Liability, ch. 5.

106. Hite, Economics of Environmental Quality, p. 91.

Any civil government that attempts to reduce pollution to anywhere near zero is messianic. The results of a quest for zero pollution will be similar to the results of a quest for perfect justice: bankruptcy of the treasury, bankruptcy of producers, judicial arbitrariness, and an increasing number of economic disruptions.¹⁰⁷

The following piece of legislation, Senate Bill 2770, passed by the United States Senate by a vote of 86 to 0 in 1971, is indicative of this sort of messianic role for the state: "This section establishes a policy that the discharge of pollutants should be eliminated by 1985, that the natural chemical, physical, and biological integrity of the Nation's waters be restored, and that an interim goal of a water quality allowing fish propagation and suitable for swimming should be reached by 1981. The states are declared to have the primary responsibility and right to implement such a goal.¹⁰⁸ At least the Senate was wise enough to pass along "primary responsibility" to achieve these unattainable goals to the state governments. Since these goals were not attained, should someone ever remind the politicians about this bill, the Senate can blame someone else for its failure. Should the national government decide to impose sanctions in a futile attempt to achieve zero water pollution, it will mean the end of personal freedom for United States' citizens.

Summary

The Bible tells us to count the costs of our actions (Luke 14:28–30).¹⁰⁹ We cannot avoid the inescapable reality of scarcity in our cursed world. We are creatures who labor under a curse, and our environment is also under a curse. It is therefore as messianic to expect to be able to achieve a zero-pollution world in history as it is to expect to be able to achieve a sinfree world in history.

The pollution that we experience is simply a "side effect" of man's sin—the thorns and weeds with which God has cursed us (Gen. 3:18). We are told to be perfect, even as our Father in heaven is perfect (Matt. 5:48). Perfection is the standard by which we are judged by God in both time and eternity. We are to strive toward this goal, but never in the hope of being able to achieve it in history, and never by means of political power alone. The same standard of perfection exists for our environment. Mankind is supposed to dwell in a pollution-free environment that matches his sin-free environment. When God's curse is removed from the creation after the final judgment, sin will no longer be a problem for mankind. Neither will pollution. But that perfect environment will be trans-historical.

107. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974).

108. Cited in Hite, op. cit., p. 92.

109. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 35.

To devote scarce resources to reduce sin is legitimate judicially and morally mandatory. To devote resources to reduce pollution is equally legitimate judicially and morally mandatory. Nevertheless, the task of reducing sin is not God's monopoly assignment to the state; neither is the reduction of pollution. We must avoid perfectionism and its institutional concomitant, the messianic state.

Conclusion

The Bible provides us with moral and legal guidelines that will permit those who abide by biblical law to serve as stewards of God's resources. As in any stewardship activity, sin reduces our ability to achieve perfection. The earth is cursed. We cannot legitimately expect to achieve perfect results. Nevertheless, we can expect God's blessings on our activities if we faithfully apply ourselves to the terms of the dominion covenant.

The free market allows us to estimate individual costs and benefits. A combination of political authority and free market allocation is needed to allocate the disposal of waste products. It is sometimes impossible to allocate private property rights, including waste disposal responsibilities, and the civil government has a role to play in this allocation process. The local civil government, governed by the value preferences of local residents, should have the primary responsibility in this regard. Larger units of civil government are to enter into the allocation process only because there are disputes between local units of government. The goal is to assign responsibility for cleaning up waste products to private beneficiaries of waste production (lower-cost producers and their clients), or when this proves too costly for them to remain in business, then to allow community standards of the majority to allocate the production and distribution of pollution in order to retain the local economic benefits that these polluters also produce.

Without market pricing of resources, underpriced resources tend to be overused by profit-seeking (cost-reducing) users. This has led to the so-called tragedy of the commons. Commonly owned property is treated as a cost-free resource. The individual users overgraze, overpollute, or generally abuse it because they receive the immediate benefits (lower costs of production) and share in the liabilities only as members of a large, diffused group—the “owners.”

1. Spillover Effects

We must treat the pollution issue as a “spillover” effect. The Bible’s case law regarding fire is applicable to pollution in general. One man’s actions impose costs on other people, and this should not be allowed without their express or implicit permission. He who imposes damage must make restitution to the victims. But we must recognize that buying property at a discount because of existing pollution constitutes “restitution in advance.” It is often legitimate under such circumstances to allow polluters to continue polluting.

Pollution is not always harmful (e.g., a bakery’s scent). Sometimes some form of pollution is harmful, but people may not recognize this. To hold men accountable retroactively for the recently recognized harmful effects of prior pollution is to treat people as if they were omniscient. If such penalties were automatically imposed as a matter of law, innovation would be stifled.

The civil government enters as an indirect allocator of pollution when markets fail to allocate pollution efficiently. This is necessary in most instances because property rights cannot be assigned to moving fluids. The state protects victims of unauthorized pollution. But this task is generally a local responsibility, for people in different communities may be willing to tolerate more pollution than others, if the economic payoff is high enough. The market then allocates pollution, given the state-enforced liability system. The state creates a kind of auction for pollution where the “high bid” (high tolerance) wins.

Pollution should be seen as a form of trespassing. It is an invasion of private property. The state has a responsibility to enforce property rights against trespassers; similarly, it has a responsibility of enforcing laws against polluters. This would include legislating fire codes (pre-pollution restrictions) and automobile emissions and noise-reduction devices.

We must recognize, however, that many of the most vocal opponents of pollution are in fact wealthy people who are attempting to keep less wealthy people from invading “their” common property. The ecology movement is dominated by upper-middle class people and the rich. They are articulate. They are threatened by the combined eco-conomic bidding of poorer people. They have mobilized people to pressure the politicians to pass laws that favor a narrow special-interest group. By passing such all-encompassing legislation, especially at the national level, politicians are subsidizing the politically skilled minority whose interests frequently are at odds with the less skilled majority. The language of environmental ethics can be easily misused. In our day, the ecology movement has reflected a general attitude that is hostile to dominion. It has proclaimed the sovereignty of nature over covenant man.

2. Biblical Intuition vs. Humanist Science

Nevertheless, it is not possible to make a valid biblical case against all pollution legislation. Some defenders of the autonomous free market deny that the civil government has any responsibility in the area of pollution control. This clearly is a policy recommendation. When these intellectual defenders of the free market are challenged to answer one crucial question—the question of how economists can scientifically formulate social policy if they cannot make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility—they are forced by the logic of their position to affirm a sort of intellectual agnosticism. As scientists, they must remain silent about social policy. They cannot possibly tell us as citizens or tell society's judges just how much pollution is "socially optimal," or how much restitution is "efficient" in the reduction of pollution. They do not accept the idea that God-directed and biblical law-affirming civil judges have the ability to make these intuitive judgments, but if economists are intellectually honest, they must also admit that all such judgments are necessarily intuitive, not "scientific."¹¹⁰ There can be no "scientific" economic judgments regarding social policy in a world in which it is impossible to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. I keep stressing this point throughout this commentary series because it is the Achilles heel of modern subjectivist economics. Nowhere is this epistemological problem more crucial or less solvable than in the field of pollution control.

The Christian knows that God can and does make such interpersonal comparisons. God knows how much pollution is optimal in any society at any point in time. His law-order is designed to enable God-fearing and biblical law-honoring societies to approach this optimum level of pollution, though not attain it perfectly. Christians who understand and believe Deuteronomy 28:1–14 also know that God has promised great blessings to those who seek to conform themselves to His law. These blessings presumably include reduced pollution, both as a benefit to man and the environment, but also because man is responsible for this environment. Such blessings are the product of a property rights system that honors the Bible's guidelines. The Bible gives us moral and legal guidelines, and biblical economics alerts us to the costs and benefits involved in the resolution of disputes concerning the proper level of pollution.

110. Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship.

Our long-run goal is perfection, of course: ethical perfection. But we know that we are cursed sinners living in a cursed world. We aim at perfection as an ethical ideal, but we do not wring our hands in despair because we cannot attain perfection, in time and on earth. We know the costs associated with state-enforced programs that promise perfection and establish sanctions against those who do not achieve it. Those costs are too high.

SAFEKEEPING, LIABILITY, AND CRIME PREVENTION

If a man shall deliver unto his neighbour money or stuff to keep, and it be stolen out of the man's house; if the thief be found, let him pay double. If the thief be not found, then the master of the house shall be brought unto the judges, to see whether he have put his hand unto his neighbour's goods. For all manner of trespass, whether it be for ox, for ass, for sheep, for raiment, or for any manner of lost thing, which another challengeth to be his, the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbour (Ex. 22:7–9).

The theocentric issue here is man's stewardship to God, point two of the biblical covenant model.¹ God delegates control over His property to men for safekeeping. Men are to do the same. Delegation is basic to dominion.

Part of ancient Israel's concept of neighborly hospitality² involved taking care of the neighbor's property from time to time. Exodus 22:7–9 deals with inanimate property as well as animals. Exodus 22:10–13 deals exclusively with animals entrusted to another's care.³ The existence of case laws governing safekeeping testifies to the fact that it was considered socially acceptable for an Israelite to ask his neighbor to safeguard his goods temporarily. This should also be true for modern Christians. Neighborly safekeeping is clearly a benefit to a man who is taking his family on a journey. He needs someone to watch over his possessions.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

2. James B. Jordan, "God's Hospitality and Holistic Evangelism" (1981), in Jordan, The Sociology of the Church: Essays in Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1986), pp. 207–20. (<http://bit.ly/jjchurch>)

3. Chapter 50.

The neighbor is expected by both God and man voluntarily to accept this caretaking responsibility. Why? Because God accepted this same responsibility in ancient Israel. God promised to serve the Israelites as the safekeeper of their goods when they journeyed to Jerusalem to celebrate the feasts. "For I will cast out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders: neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the LORD thy God thrice in the year" (Ex. 34:24). Men are therefore to imitate God by guarding their neighbors' property when the latter go on journeys. God the cosmic Safekeeper and Caretaker is the theocentric frame of reference for these verses. Covenant-keeping man must be like God.

Adam was entrusted with the task of guarding God's property in the garden. God told Adam that the tree of the knowledge of good and evil was off-limits to him. Then God departed from Adam's presence, as if He was going on a journey—the theme of the New Testament's parable of the talents (Matt. 25:15).⁴ God tested Adam's faithfulness in a particular way: to see if Adam would protect God's property from an invader during His absence. Instead of defending God's property from this invader, the serpent, Adam and Eve listened to the invader and did what he suggested: join in a covenantal alliance with him by sharing a covenant meal in his presence at the forbidden tree. God also tested Adam to see whether he would "put his hand unto his neighbour's goods." God was Adam's neighbor, which was a special privilege for Adam. But to maintain good relations with this cosmic Neighbor, Adam and Eve had to pass the test of hospitality. They failed the test. Thus, they owed God double restitution: death in history and death in eternity.

A. Representative Laws

Because God tested Adam's covenantal faithfulness by testing Adam's commitment to be an honest safekeeper, we should conclude that the Exodus case laws governing safekeeping have broad implications for the life of man. The caretaking laws are therefore representative laws. Samson Raphael Hirsch, the nineteenth-century Jewish commentator, wrote that verses 7–15 (6–14 in the Hebrew Torah) deal with "responsibilities which are incurred in the case of duties which are voluntarily undertaken." He divided the cases in terms of four participants: the unpaid custodian, the paid custodian, the borrower, and the hirer. “In working out the different responsibilities incurred, and in the laws laid down regarding them, many general basic laws of civil law and justice are incidentally laid down, laws which have far-reaching application.”⁵

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

This passage covers criminal behavior: theft. It specifically refers to a trespass. In contrast, Exodus 22:10–13 deals with the caretaker’s negligence. The requirement here that double restitution be imposed by the judges indicates that this law deals with a criminal trespass. Not so in the case of Exodus 22:12: “And if it be stolen from him, he shall make restitution unto the owner thereof.” Double restitution is the penalty for criminal theft; value-for-value restitution is the penalty for negligence.

This passage does not indicate that the neighbor who receives the goods is given any kind of payment for his trouble. The rabbis so interpreted it.⁶ Hirsch said that this passage deals with “a custodian who is not responsible if the object left in his charge is stolen from him,” whereas the custodian in verses 10–13 is “one who has to pay compensation in such a case . . . and who is only free from responsibility if the property is lost in a manner which could not possibly have been prevented.” Citing the Talmud,⁷ he added: “A non-paid custodian in accepting custody, implicitly undertakes to give the entrusted goods the same care that he normally gives to his own property e.g., that at night time he places them in a securely closed place. But a paid custodian (unless of course, special conditions are agreed) implicitly accepts the duties of a watchman, so that even if he leaves it out of his personal surveillance he would be responsible even if it were stolen by thieves breaking in to properly closed premises.”⁸ I am not persuaded that Hirsch was correct about the legal distinction here being based on paid vs. unpaid custodianship, because I believe that the dividing issue is theft vs. negligence, but his comments indicate that he and the rabbis had given considerable thought to the meaning and application of these verses. He devoted ten pages to expositing just Exodus 22:7–9, more than he devoted to almost any other passage in the case law section of Exodus.

5. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch Translated and Explained, trans. Isaac Levy, 5 vols., Exodus, 3rd ed. (London: Honig & Sons, [1870?] 1967), p. 348.

6. Rabbi Moses ben Nachman [Ramban], Commentary on the Torah: Exodus (New York: Shilo, [1267?] 1973), pp. 378–79.

7. Baba Kamma 57a; Baba Metzia 93b.

8. Hirsch, Exodus, p. 348.

B. Preserving Godly Social Order

It is not specified in the text just why the owner would transfer his assets to a neighbor, although an obvious reason would have been an upcoming journey. The fear of thieves would have motivated a man to entrust his capital to a neighbor.

1. Reducing Crime

The nature of the liabilities imposed by this and the related safekeeping passage (Ex. 22:10–13) indicates that the primary intent of the laws governing safekeeping was to reduce crime. Members of the covenant community are expected voluntarily to take on certain limited responsibilities in order to place the criminal at a disadvantage. The maintenance of godly social order is the goal of these laws.

A thief, then as now, would have looked for telltale signs of an abandoned house. When houses are empty, they are vulnerable to invasion: a boundary violation. The motif of the “empty house” is found throughout Scripture, most notably in the threat of God to abandon the House of Israel, symbolized by His departure from the temple, should Israel rebel against Him (Ezek. 8–11). Covenantal emptiness is a spiritual condition to be avoided. It cannot be maintained; something will always fill a covenantally empty place, whether an individual soul or a social order. In Jesus’s parable of the swept house, He compared a house to man’s heart, and then to the spiritual condition of the Jewish culture of His day. When a man “sweeps” out an evil spirit, but then leaves his “house” empty, the spirit returns with seven other spirits, all worse than the first, and reoccupies the house (Matt. 12:43–45). In short, from a spiritual standpoint, “you can’t beat something with nothing.” The covenantal “house” is not to be left empty. There can be no ethical or spiritual vacuums in life.

2. Stewardship and Dominion

The case laws governing safekeeping point to this important covenantal truth. Valuable property must be under someone’s administration if it is to be protected. It must be cared for. The thief who finds an empty house is more likely to be able to commit his crime undetected. Guarding private property is therefore an important aspect of the dominion covenant. Because all property belongs to God, the steward is required to be faithful in caring for whatever property has been assigned to him by God to guard, just as Adam was to care for God's garden. The steward must seek to preserve it intact. In cases when a person needs to go on a journey, and cannot carry all of his property with him, or fears to carry it because of highway robbers, he must locate a local guardian. Keeping thieves from breaking in and taking property is very important.

Because ownership is inescapably covenantal, and because neighbors are involved in a civil covenant with each other, the owner transfers limited and temporary control over his property to his neighbor. Neighbors have an incentive to reduce crime in the neighborhood. This was especially true in agricultural ancient Israel. Rural neighbors are more dependent on each other than urban neighbors are. There is less commerce with those outside the local community than there is in a city, which is a trade center. In other words, there is a reduced division of labor in a rural area. Rural residents are therefore more dependent on each other's productivity than residents of a city are. This was especially true before the revolutionary development of mail-order catalogue marketing.⁹ Rural residents have a unique economic incentive to preserve the wealth of their neighbors, for it is always better to have a prosperous neighbor nearby, because a wealthy neighbor has more goods to exchange with his neighbors, and more assets to help them in a crisis.

Additionally, wealthier neighbors are a social asset. This is why the influx of richer neighbors into the neighborhood has a tendency to increase the market value of local real estate.¹⁰ Envy and jealousy against those with greater wealth are evil impulses that threaten the covenantal integrity of a neighborhood, for they make the wealthier residents secretive and distrustful of their neighbors.¹¹ These twin evils

9. Peter Drucker, Management: Tasks, Responsibilities, Practices (New York: Harper & Row, 1974), ch. 5: "Managing a Business: The Sears Story."

10. The best example of such a process in the United States in recent years is the movement of upper-middle-class whites into crime-ridden urban ghetto areas, especially in Washington, D.C. Crime decreases, housing is improved by the new owners, and then unimproved local property values rise. This does lead to the displacement of former residents, however. But "movement in" usually involves "movement out" in real estate transactions.

11. The sociologist Helmut Schoeck argued that envy—the desire to tear down someone simply because he is better off—is always a phenomenon of social proximity. Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behaviour (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, [1966] 1970), pp. 20, 40, 62, 121, 189, 220, 237, 273, 349, 355. Social proximity is commonly very closely related to geographical proximity, at least in modern urban societies.

therefore reduce voluntary local cooperation and planning.

When neighbors can be trusted to care for each other's goods, a society probably has a strong covenantal bond. Residents see the thief's threat to the neighborhood, and they cooperate in order to make the thief's task more difficult. A similar bond is seen in the urban "neighborhood watch" societies, in which residents of a neighborhood join together in a voluntary agreement to keep an eye on each other's homes, and to report anything suspicious to the police. The social atomization of the typical modern urban neighborhood, in which people do not know the names of their next-door neighbors, or the neighbors two houses down the street, favors the thieves.¹²

C. Accepting Responsibility

So common was the entrusting of goods to neighbors in Israel that the case laws established rules governing the practice. The case laws' provisions still govern similar relationships today. When a man accepts the task of guarding his neighbor's property, he thereby accepts a considerable degree of personal liability. Control is inescapably tied to ownership.¹³ Yet, in this case, the controller is not the legal owner. This places certain disadvantages on him.

1. Legal Responsibility and Economic Responsibility

We must distinguish here between legal responsibility and economic responsibility, lest there be any confusion about the nature of the responsibility of the safekeeper. Ownership is inescapably connected to economic responsibility. Ownership is a social function; it is a

12. A profitable tactic for thieves in urban America is to buy, hire, or steal a large moving van, paint counterfeit company symbols on its sides, drive up to a house while the family is away, load the van with the family's household goods, and drive away. So impersonal are most American neighborhoods that the neighbors seldom report this activity to the police as it is taking place. They simply assume that the family is moving away. They do not regard it as remarkable that the departing family never said good-bye to anyone. American families seldom say hello to anyone living next door or across the street, year after year.

13. This is why the fascist states of the 1930s were really socialist economies. Ownership of industry was officially retained by private individuals, but control over industrial assets was placed in the hands of state bureaucrats. Cf. Guenter Reimann, The Vampire Economy: Doing Business Under Fascism (New York: Vanguard, 1939). This has been reprinted by the Mises Institute. (<http://bit.ly/VampEcon>) This was the only detailed English-language book on the German economy under the Nazis until Adam Tooze, The Wages of Destruction (New York: Viking, 2006). That is over 65 years—an astounding academic oversight.

stewardship function.¹⁴ Owners must decide, moment by moment, what to do with the assets they own. Moment by moment, others are bidding in the market for the services, animate and inanimate, that each person owns. The moment this bidding process ceases, the price of the asset in question falls to zero, and therefore it ceases to be a scarce economic resource. The existence of a price testifies to the existence of the competing bids for ownership. There is no escape for a property owner from these God-imposed economic functions and responsibilities. Arrangements can be made to distribute these ownership functions among those who are willing to bear certain kinds of risk, such as through insurance contracts, but with the ownership of legal titles to property inevitably comes a “bundle of rights” (legal immunities from specified kinds of physical interference) and therefore a “bundle of responsibilities” (economic obligations to the market).¹⁵

Exodus 22:7–15 is not speaking about inescapable, God-imposed economic responsibilities of ownership. It speaks instead about certain legal responsibilities that pass to the safekeeper even though he is not the owner of the property. Biblical law spells out these legal responsibilities. A neighbor can be held accountable in a court of law for his actions. In the case of missing goods, the man to whom the property has been entrusted must give an account for the missing property. “For all manner of trespass, whether it be for ox, for ass, for sheep, for raiment, or for any manner of lost thing, which another challengeth to be his, the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbour” (Ex. 22:9). This is the case of suspected trespass. It involves a suspicion of criminal behavior. Double restitution is therefore the penalty upon

14. Gary North, “Ownership: Free but Not Cheap,” The Freeman (July 1972). (<http://bit.ly/OwnFree>) Reprinted in North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 28. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

15. These economic responsibilities stem directly from the legal immunities of others in the marketplace. Owners of assets in a free society possess a legal right to bid for ownership of other people’s property. This is sometimes called consumers’ sovereignty. An early use of this term is found in W. H. Hutt, “The Nature of Aggressive Selling,” Economica, 12 (1935); reprinted in Individual Freedom: Selected Works of William H. Hutt, eds. Svetozar Pejovich and David Klingaman (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1975), p. 185. The concept of consumer’s sovereignty is incorrect. Sovereignty is an aspect of civil law: legal title. Authority is an aspect of economics: economic stewardship. The phrase should be “customer’s authority.” In this case, the present owner is also a consumer: he holds the property for himself. The interaction of the bidders determines the price of the good. Responding to these offers is the inescapable economic responsibility of the present legal owner: no response is in fact a response of “no.”

conviction (Ex. 22:4).

2. Why Only Double Restitution?

Notice that the passage specifies double restitution for a stolen sheep. Clearly, the convicted caretaker has either eaten the sheep or has sold it; otherwise, there would be no court case: the animal would be in the caretaker's herd. The suspected neighbor would simply return the animal to its owner. Then why only double restitution in this instance? Four-fold restitution is imposed on the thief who kills or sells a sheep (Ex. 22:1). The answer is that one of the reasons why there is a higher penalty imposed for stealing and destroying a sheep or ox (specially protected because of their symbolizing mankind) is that it is difficult to locate and convict the unknown thief.¹⁶ In the case of a neighbor, there is greater ease (i.e., less expense) of conviction; the owner knows who had possession of it last. Because there is lower risk of detection for a stranger who commits the theft, there are increased criminal penalties to offset this lower risk.

There are risks for both of the disputants when they go to court to settle the conflict. The neighbor who brings a false accusation, as distinguished from a mistaken accusation, risks being condemned by the judges. He would then be required to pay double restitution to the falsely accused victim, the same penalty that the latter would have suffered (Deut. 19:18–19).¹⁷ Bringing a false accusation is a form of perjury, and the law of perjury applies: forfeiting to the victim what the victim would have been required to forfeit as a result of the false testimony (Deut. 19:19). Understand, however, that the victim would have to prove that the accuser had knowingly accused him falsely.

3. Implied Trust and Presumed Innocence

Because of the implied trust that the first man had in the character of the second person, it becomes difficult for the judges to convict the second man for theft, a criminal act. The owner's original decision to trust the neighbor indicates that he believed the person to be honest. The judges must therefore operate with the presumption of the innocence of the accused, just as the owner had originally operated. This difficulty of gaining a conviction adds to the risk borne by the accuser

16. Chapter 17.

17. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

if he decides to charge his neighbor with criminal trespass (Ex. 22:7–9) rather than mere negligence (Ex. 22:10–13).¹⁸

The property owner is unwilling to bear the full legal responsibilities and costs of ownership by paying someone to perform this service. He therefore decides to transfer some of this legal responsibility to a neighbor. By leaving, the owner must bear an added degree of risk. His neighbor may turn out to be a criminal negligent. If his neighbor is willing to lie to the judges, it will be very difficult to prove criminal action. “If a man deliver unto his neighbor an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast, to keep; and it die, or be hurt, or driven away, no man seeing it: Then shall an oath of the LORD be between them both, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbour’s goods; and the owner of it shall accept thereof, and he shall not make it good” (Ex. 22:10–11). Thus, there is shared risk: the owner imputes trustworthiness to the neighbor, and the neighbor takes on added legal responsibility. The requirement of the oath reduces risk to the property owner, however, if the safekeeper believes in God. (The modern loss of faith in God has unquestionably increased the level of risk in society, as well as having increased the difficulty of gaining judicial convictions.) The compulsory oath is an important biblical device for promoting civil justice.¹⁹ The accused may remain silent, but if he speaks, he is required to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. He is not to place his accusers under the risk of loss through his false testimony.

D. Compulsory Judicial Oaths

1. Reducing State Power

Why should the Bible authorize the civil government to require covenant oaths from all witnesses? Why should the accused be required to testify under oath, and therefore be under the threat of both civil and ecclesiastical sanctions? Because the state is not allowed by God to attempt to read the mind of any witness. Far from being a means of enhancing state power, the compulsory oath is a device that is intended to restrain state power. By making it possible for the state

18. Chapter 51.

19. Is the state authorized by God to compel testimony from the oath-taker if he is the accused? Yes, except in cases when the accused is being charged with the sin of blasphemy against God or treason against the state, as Jesus was. He refused to answer Herod (Luke 23:9) and Pilate (Matt. 27:14). His silence was the fulfillment of Isaiah’s messianic prophecy (Isa. 53:7). This was not a case involving alleged damages suffered by another oath-taking individual, as in Exodus 22:1.

to impose sanctions against convicted perjurers, biblical law removes from the judges any presumed authority to read the mind of a witness. The witness' false public testimony against the accused can later be used against him (perjury).

To render justice, the court needs accurate information. The court is legally entitled to accurate information from all third-party witnesses who are called by law to testify. The compulsory oath is God's authorized means of lowering the court's cost of attaining such knowledge. The accusing witness is not allowed to hide his thoughts because the state is not allowed to imitate God by claiming to be able to search the hearts of men. For instance, testimony based on "lie detector" tests or on such occult arts as mind-reading, hypnotism, and information revealed in dreams or trances is biblically invalid.

The court is God's agency of justice and temporal judgment. Civil judges represent God in history. A witness is no more allowed to testify falsely to a lawful civil court than he is allowed to testify falsely to God.²⁰ A third-party witness is required to reveal every-thing he knows about the facts of the case when asked specific questions under legitimate cross-examination.

The witness is required to swear an oath before God, and not just before the earthly judges. He invokes God's name and therefore invokes God's sanctions. The civil court-imposed oath is therefore a true covenantal oath, for all covenantal oaths are self-maledictory under God.²¹ By invoking God's sanctions by taking a judicially valid oath, the witness faces negative sanctions, not just from the court in case his perjury is detected, but from God who knows all hearts. The witness is reminded by the oath that God will condemn him if he gives false testimony, for God knows the thoughts of men. This is why offering false testimony under oath places a man under God's sanctions, and why the sinner owes a trespass offering to the church, God's agency of excommunication, rather than to the state, God's agency of the sword: "And he shall bring his trespass offering unto the LORD, a ram without blemish out of the flock, with thy estimation, for a trespass offer-

20. False testimony is legitimate when the court is illegal, or is demanding information that it is not entitled to. For example, Pharaoh's "court" was not entitled to accurate information from the midwives regarding the birth of male Hebrew children. They could legitimately lie to Pharaoh because they were under covenant to a different God who was in the process of bringing Pharaoh and his society under judgment. See chapter 4.

21. Chapter 23.

ing, unto the priest” (Lev. 6:6).²²

2. Hammurabi’s Code

The oath was also used in Hammurabi’s Babylon. Speaking of the seignior, or aristocrat, the law states: “If a seignior deposited grain in a(nother) seignior’s house for storage and a loss has then occurred at the granary or the owner of the house opened the storage-room and took grain or he has denied completely (the receipt of) the grain which was stored in his house, the owner of the grain shall set forth the particulars regarding his grain in the presence of god and the owner of the house shall give to the owner of the grain double the grain that he took.”²³ The one who was said to have stored the grain was assumed to be guilty, once the accuser had made an oath in the presence of a god. Whether theft was involved or simply negligence, the granary owner paid double. But this was not a case of voluntary safekeeping. This was a commercial transaction. The law imposed a fixed price for storing grain.²⁴

The Code of Hammurabi did not rely exclusively on an oath before a god in every case. It also relied on written contracts and witnesses. There is no reason to believe that this was not also true in ancient Israel. But in an illiterate culture, not everyone can afford such written documents. The Code of Hammurabi was almost entirely concerned with laws governing the oligarchy. This was not the case with biblical law. Thus, Old Testament rules of evidence were based on verbal promises and oaths, because it set down general laws that governed all people in Israel. Anyone who wished to have someone else store silver, gold, or anything else for safekeeping had to show witnesses what was being entrusted to another. Contracts were drawn up.²⁵ “If he gave (it) for safekeeping without witnesses and contracts and they have denied (its receipt) to him at the place where he made the deposit, that case is not subject to claim.”²⁶ On the other hand, if there were witnesses, the person who accepted the property for safekeeping paid the depositor

22. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 7.

23. Hammurabi Code, paragraph 120. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), p. 171.

24. Ibid., paragraph 121.

25. Ibid., paragraph 122.

26. Ibid., paragraph 123.

double.²⁷ There is no reason to doubt that the same sorts of evidence could be used in a Hebrew law court, but the case law does not mention types of formal evidence.

If the safekeeper's house was broken into, and both his property and the depositor's stored property were missing, he was presumed by law to be careless. The law declares: he "shall make (it) good and make restitution to the owner of the goods, while the owner of the house shall make a thorough search for his lost property and take (it) from its thief."²⁸ First, the language indicates that the safekeeper did not pay double, but only restored what was lost, making good the loss. This corresponds to the provision of Exodus 22:12: "And if it be surely stolen from him, he shall make restitution unto the owner thereof." Second, this law indicates that any property subsequently returned by the thief to the safekeeper who had paid restitution to his neighbor would be kept by him as compensation for his loss.

The most interesting section of the Code refers to a man who claimed that his property was lost, when it was not lost. The law says that he has deceived the city council. The council set forth the facts of the case "in the presence of god," and he then paid double restitution to the city council, not to the person who was falsely accused.²⁹ This is in stark contrast to biblical law, which makes the false accuser liable for damages he sought to impose on a private party. It is much closer to modern concepts of jurisprudence, where fines are paid to the state.

The other major difference between Hammurabi's Code and the Bible is that these laws applied only to aristocrats. Nothing is said about the legal relations between aristocrats and commoners. The law protected aristocrats in their relations with each other, but no legal protection was guaranteed for other classes.

3. Escaping an Erroneous Accusation

Once the accuser has made his accusation, the accused has a lawful way of escape: the oath.³⁰ "Then shall an oath of the LORD be

27. Ibid., paragraph 124.

28. Ibid., paragraph 125.

29. Ibid., paragraph 126.

30. Boecker made the observation that oaths were taken only by the accused in Israel's courts. There is no case in the Bible that an oath was taken by a witness, he says. Hans Jochen Boecker, Law and the Administration of Justice in the Old Testament and Ancient East, trans. Jeremy Moiser (Minneapolis, Minnesota: Augsburg, [1976] 1980), p. 35. This seems to be true with respect to formal oath-taking, but Boecker's observation is also irrelevant. The witness who gave his testimony in a Hebrew court was im-between them both, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbour's goods; and the owner of it shall accept thereof, and he shall not make it good" (Ex. 22:11). If the accused takes this oath, the court must declare him innocent. But if he refuses, the court can lawfully declare him guilty. The accused is legally obligated to take the oath.³¹ As we shall see, added economic penalties were imposed by the civil magistrates and also by ecclesiastical officers on a man who offered false testimony under oath.

Hirsch argued that the double restitution penalty is to be imposed only after the thief has sworn falsely.³² I disagree. Once the trial has begun, the convicted thief owes double restitution, with or without the oath. Only if he confesses before the trial can he escape double restitution, in which case he pays to the victim full value restitution plus 20%.³³ It is not simply that theft is to be penalized; false oaths must also be penalized. The Book of Leviticus specifies that a trespass offering to God must be made by anyone who makes a false oath. The Old Testament trespass offerings for swearing falsely (Lev. 5:4) involved ritual animals: lambs, turtledoves, or pigeons (Lev. 5:6–7). The priest made atonement for the guilty person (Lev. 5:6).

In New Testament times, such ritual atonement offerings have not been applicable (Heb. 9). This does not mean that there are no valid penalties against false oaths. A payment must go to the church as a means of restitution to God (Lev. 6:6). This also reminds the civil court licitly under an oath, for he was under the threat of civil covenant sanctions. Perjury on the part of the witness, when discovered and proven, subjected the lying witness to the punishment that would have been imposed on the victim (Deut. 19:15–21). Where there are covenant sanctions, there is inevitably a covenant oath, either implicit or explicit.

31. The Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits the federal government from forcing an individual to testify in court against himself in a criminal case. This provision is clearly opposed to the requirement of biblical law that a person swear before God that he is innocent: he may not remain silent. Until the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868, the first eight amendments did not apply to the states. Chief Justice John Marshall articulated this position in his famous decision, Barron v. Baltimore (1833). See The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation, Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1973), pp. 889–90. The Committee of Eleven, to whom the Bill of Rights (first ten amendments) had been referred by Congress in 1789, rejected any suggestion that these amendments be applied to state governments as well as to the federal government: Raoul Berger, Government by Judiciary: The Transformation of the Fourteenth Amendment (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1977), p. 134n.

32. Hirsch, Exodus, p. 349.

33. Chapter 47.

that it is not the only valid court in society. The church, as God's representative court over the individual's moral conscience, is entitled to a payment, although the civil judges are to specify the size of this payment. "And he shall bring his trespass offering unto the LORD, a ram without blemish out of the flock, with thy estimation, for a trespass offering, unto the priest" (Lev. 6:6).

E. Confession and Restitution

I argue in this commentary that once a person commits a theft, he automatically owes the victim at least a 20% payment in addition to the return of his principal. The case does not have to come to trial for this penalty payment to be owed by the thief. I derive this conclusion from the case law's texts regarding theft, but also from the example of the archetypal theft: Adam and Eve's stealing of God's forbidden fruit.

1. Adam's Trial

The moment they touched it, they were guilty. They owed God at least a ritual apology. In the Old Testament, anyone who touched a forbidden (unclean) thing was himself unclean until evening (Lev. 11:24–25). I think this was because God had originally returned in judgment to the garden in the cool of the day" (Gen. 3:8), meaning at evening. It may not have hurt God's net asset value for them to have merely touched the fruit, but it was a violation of His law, His ethical boundary.

They went beyond mere touching; they stole the fruit and ate it. This was theft. It was corrupt caretaking. It was also the equivalent of eating a forbidden sacrifice, for it was a ritual meal eaten in the presence of the serpent. The penalty for this in ancient Israel was separation from God's people: "But the soul that eateth of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, that pertain unto the LORD, having his uncleanness upon him, even that soul shall be cut off from his people. Moreover the soul that shall touch any unclean thing, as the uncleanness of man, or any unclean beast, or any abominable unclean thing, and eat of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, which pertain unto the LORD, even that soul shall be cut off from his people" (Lev. 7:20–21). This penalty pointed back to the garden, where God separated Adam and Eve from Himself by casting them out of the garden.

God, however, is merciful to sinners. Why else would He have created the sacrificial system? Thus, had Adam and Eve come to God as He entered the garden, admitting their sin and pleading for mercy, He would have spared mankind the ultimate penalty of eternal separation from Him. In fact, had they prayed a prayer of confession rather than spending their time sewing fig leaves for themselves, they would have escaped the death penalty—full restitution payment to God. This very act would have constituted a pre-trial confession of guilt. It would have been an act of symbolic communion with God—a judicial, sanctions-governed act of repentance. But instead they tried to cover their own guilt through their own efforts: sewing fig leaves. God therefore announced His sentence of death against them: dust to dust. Those who wait until the end of the trial must make full (multiple) restitution.

My conclusion is that a pre-trial confession of guilt by the criminal is punished less rigorously than a crime in which the criminal is convicted on the basis of the judges' inquiry. A person is always encouraged by God to confess his sins. If these sins are public sins, then his confession must also be public, if not to a court, then at least to the victim. For example, if a worker steals cash from his employer, but later replaces it before the theft is discovered, he still must confess his crime to the owner. The fact that no human being detected the crime does not affect the question of guilt and sanctions in God's eyes. The thief did impose the risk of permanent loss on the victim, even though the victim suffered no known loss; the victim therefore deserves compensation. This upholds the biblical principle of victim's rights. The victim, like God, should strive to be merciful, but biblical law teaches that he is entitled to be informed that mercy is now in order.

2. Leviticus 6

Biblical law subsidizes public confession. If a man confesses, he can escape the multiple restitution requirement: he is required only to repay the stolen principal, plus 20%.

If a soul sin, and commit a trespass against the LORD, and lie unto his neighbour in that which was delivered him to keep, or in fellowship, or in a thing taken away by violence, or hath deceived his neighbour; or have found that which was lost, and lieth concerning it, and sweareth falsely; in any of all these that a man doeth, sinning therein: Then it shall be, because he hath sinned, and is guilty, that he shall restore that which he took violently away, or the thing which he hath deceitfully gotten, or that which was delivered him to keep, or the lost thing which he found, or all that about which he hath sworn falsely; he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto, and give it unto him to whom it appertaineth, in the day of his trespass offering (Lev. 6:2–5).³⁴

There appears to be an inconsistency here. The penalty for theft is here stated to be 20%, yet in other verses, restitution for theft in general is two-fold, and sometimes four-fold or five-fold. Why the apparent discrepancy? We know that Leviticus 6 is dealing with cases in which the guilty person has sworn falsely to the authorities. Later, however, he voluntarily confesses the crime and his false oath. I conclude that the double restitution penalty is imposed only in cases where a formal trial has begun. The provision in Leviticus 6 of a reduced penalty is an economic incentive for a guilty person to confess his crime before the trial has begun, or at least before the court hands down its decision.

The thief has testified falsely to the authorities, either before the trial or during it. This is why he owes a trespass offering to the priest (Lev. 5:1–13; 6:6). I argue here that he can lawfully escape the obligation to pay double restitution if he confesses after his initial denial, but before the trial begins. He cannot lawfully escape paying double restitution and making the trespass offering if he swears falsely during the trial. He has to confess before the oath is imposed and the trial begins.

As always, we should search for a theocentric principle lying behind the law. There is one in this case: the correlation between this reduced criminal penalty for voluntary, public confession of sin, when accompanied by economic restitution, and God's offer of a reduced (eliminated) eternal penalty for people who make public Christian confession of sin prior to their physical death, if this confession is also accompanied by economic or other kinds of restitution.³⁵ If we wait for God's formal trial at the throne of judgment, we are assured of being forced to pay a far higher restitution penalty.

Why do I believe that Leviticus 6 refers to a pre-trial voluntary confession? Because of the context of Leviticus 6. Leviticus 5 deals with sins against God that must be voluntarily confessed: "And it shall be, when he shall be guilty in one of these things, that he shall confess that he hath sinned in that thing” (Lev. 5:5). The sinner in Israel then brought a trespass offering to the priest (Lev. 5:8). This made atonement for the trespass: “And he shall offer the second for a burnt offering, according to the manner: and the priest shall make an atonement for him for his sin which he hath sinned, and it shall be forgiven him” (Lev. 5:10). Why would he make such a public confession? Because of his fear of the ultimate penalty that God will impose on those who offer false testimony in His courts.

34. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 7.

35. I am not arguing that salvation is by works. It is by grace (Eph. 2:8–9). But let us not forget Ephesians 2:10: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." I am arguing that without obedience, our faith is dead. James 2:18 says: "Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works." And in James 2:20, we read: "But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?" The outward obedience of the criminal is supposed to be demonstrated by his willingness to make restitution to his victim.

We then note that Leviticus 6 also deals with trespasses against God. It is specifically stated in Leviticus 6:2 that the 20% penalty payment applies to “a trespass against the LORD” in which the sinning individual has lied to his neighbor about anything that was delivered to him by the neighbor for safekeeping. The context indicates that the sinner has voluntarily confessed his crime against God and his neighbor, just as he voluntarily confessed his trespass against God in Leviticus 5.

The question is inevitable: Are there two penalties of 20% implied in Leviticus 6, or only one? In other words, is there a 20% penalty only for making a false oath, with the payment going to the victim, and with a trespass offering also going to the church court, or is there also a 20% penalty to the victim in cases of pre-trial confession?

3. Restitution Plus a Trespass Offering

Here is the problem the commentator faces. The text in Exodus 22 states that the court is to require double restitution from the neighbor who has “put his hands to” his neighbor’s goods. He is therefore to be treated as a common thief. But if double restitution is the required penalty, then what is the 20% penalty of Leviticus 6:5 all about?

It has been argued by some Jewish commentators that the 20% penalty in Leviticus 6:5 is to be imposed only in cases where there has been a public oath before a rabbinical court. They argue that the penalty payment does not apply to cases of voluntarily confessed theft as such, meaning secret or even undetected thefts, but only to cases of forcible robbery in which the thief is identified, arrested, and brought before an ecclesiastical (i.e. synagogue) court, where he gives a false oath of denial, and later admits this lie. Wrote Jacob Milgrom: “Since the point of this law is to list only those cases that culminate in the possessor’s false oath, it would therefore be pointless to include the term 'theft' which assumes that the possessor-thief is unknown."³⁶ He went so far as to argue that the Leviticus passage deals only with religious law, not civil law. "All that matters to the priestly legislator is to enumerate those situations whereby the defrauding of man leads, by a false oath, to the 'defrauding' of God. The general category of theft in which the thief remains unidentifiable is therefore irrelevant to his purpose."³⁷ Eight centuries earlier, Maimonides wrote that the thief who confesses of his own accord owes only the value of the asset he stole, not double restitution. He did not mention the 20% penalty.³⁸

If Milgrom's view were correct, this would mean that there would be no court-imposed restitution penalty payment from criminals to victims in (oathless) cases of pre-trial, self-confessed theft. Why wouldn't there be such compensation? Because the one-fifth penalty was assumed by Milgrom to be applicable only in cases where there has been a false oath. This interpretation therefore eliminates the 20% penalty payment for pre-trial, self-confessed crimes.

While this judicial implication follows the premise, it is not in accord with the biblical principle of victim's rights. The victim has been deprived of his property, and he has suffered a sense of loss, assuming that he had actually discovered that the stolen item was missing, yet the Bible supposedly makes no provision to compensate him for these obvious burdens. On the face of it, this conclusion seems highly unlikely, yet it follows inevitably from the initial claim that the 20% penalty only applies to cases where there has been a false oath to a court.

Why do I believe that this interpretation is unlikely? Because the Bible is emphatic that victims are to be protected, and that criminals are to suffer losses in proportion to their crimes. The thief who confesses before a trial is not on a par judicially with a neighbor who has, through negligence, lost or inadvertently ruined an item placed in his safekeeping. The negligent neighbor pays only for what he lost; the self-confessed thief has to pay more. The principle of lex talionis applies here as elsewhere: the penalty must fit the crime.³⁹ To argue that the penalty is the same for theft and negligence—merely the return of the stolen item or its equivalent value—is to deny lex talionis.

36. Jacob Milgrom, Cult and Conscience: The "Asham" and the Priestly Doctrine of Repentance (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1976), p. 100.

37. Ibid., pp. 100–1.

38. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1954), "Laws Concerning Theft," II:1:5, pp. 60–61.

39. Chapter 41.

If thieves were granted the legal option of returning stolen goods whenever it appeared to them that they might be discovered, but before they are put under oath, then it would be far less risky to steal. If there is a 20% penalty only after a false oath is given, but before a trial, then a theft that is confessed before the oath is administered would become virtually risk-free for the thief. He could escape any penalty simply by confessing his crime and by returning the stolen property. The option of self-confession would remain as an escape device whenever the authorities began to close in. If God's law did not impose penalties on theft, it would implicitly be subsidizing criminal behavior. God does not subsidize rebellion.

The express language of the passage militates against Milgrom's interpretation of Leviticus 6. After listing all sorts of theft and deception, the text says, "he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto" (v. 5). To whom must this penalty payment be paid? To the victim: "Or all that about which he hath sworn falsely; he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto, and give it unto him to whom it appertaineth, in the day of his trespass offering" (Lev. 6:5b). While the passage does mention a false oath, this does not render null and void a penalty for each of the crimes that preceded verse 5.

The sense of the passage is not that a false oath must accompany each of the list of transgressions in order for the penalty to be invoked. On the contrary, each of the victims of these crimes is to be compensated by a 20% penalty payment. The crimes are separate acts; thus, translators used the English word "or" in listing them, indicating that any one of these criminal infractions automatically invokes the 20% penalty, not merely the taking of a false oath. The false oath invokes its own independent penalty payment: the trespass offering, a ram without blemish (Lev. 6:6). So, the criminal must pay the victim 20%, with or without a false oath. The false oath makes the trespass offering to the priest an additional requirement.

Leviticus 6 is not in opposition to Exodus 22:9. Exodus 22:9 requires double restitution either from the false accuser who perjured himself (Deut. 19:16–19) or from the criminal neighbor (thief). Assume that the criminal neighbor swears falsely before the judges in order to avoid having to pay double restitution to his victim. If successful in his deception, he escapes the penalty. But what if the accuser is convicted of making a false accusation? The lying neighbor collects double restitution from the victim. He now owes him four-fold restitution.

What if he then repents of his false oath before it is discovered? He still owes the original double restitution, plus the return of the falsely collected double penalty, plus a 20% penalty payment on everything (Lev. 6:1–6). Thus, if the stolen object was worth one ounce of gold, the restitution payment owed to the victim by a now-confessed perjured thief would be 4.8 ounces of gold: 2 ounces (the original double restitution payment), plus 2 ounces (the falsely extracted penalty) plus .2 times 4 ounces, meaning .8 ounces = 4.8 ounces.

What about the perjured thief who refuses to admit his guilt and who is later convicted of this perjury? Because he had been paid double restitution by his victim (Ex. 22:9), he now owes him six-fold restitution: double whatever he had stolen (2 X 1) plus double whatever he had unlawfully collected (2 X 2). This threat of six-fold restitution serves as an economic incentive for the perjured thief to confess to the court that he had offered false testimony earlier. We see once again that biblical law rewards timely confession.

Exodus 22:9 establishes double restitution for stolen sheep and oxen, not four-fold or five-fold. This is because neighbors are involved. What if the court does not have proof that the accuser testified falsely against his neighbor, yet also does not have sufficient proof to convict the neighbor? The thieving neighbor escapes paying two-fold restitution. What if he then repents and confesses? He owes his neighbor a 2.4 restitution penalty (2 X 1, plus 2 X .2). What if his crime is discovered later? He owes four-fold restitution for perjury: double what he would have owed if he had been convicted originally.

What would he have owed to the temple in the case of unconfessed perjury? If the trespass offering was one animal if he had confessed after having made a false oath or oaths, presumably the penalty was double this.⁴⁰ This follows from my thesis that there is an escalation of penalties. At each step of the legal proceedings, he can confess and bear a reduced penalty. For each level of deception, there are increased sanctions.

God is honored by the very act of self-confession, when such confession has a penalty attached to it. Oath or no oath, the two primary goals of laws governing theft are the protection of property and the compensation of the victim. Earthly civil courts are therefore to safeguard the property rights of the victims, making sure that the appropriate penalty is extracted from the criminal and transferred to the vic-

40. It could be argued that the penalty was death: a high-handed false oath that was not confessed.

tim. There is no requirement of an additional money penalty payment to the civil court because of a false oath regarding theft. A trespass or guilt offering must be paid to the church.⁴¹

The false oath before God invokes the threat of the ultimate penalty: the eternal wrath of God, preceded by the physical death of the criminal. Unless a person confesses his false oath in this life, makes appropriate restitution to his victim and brings a transgression offering, God will collect His own restitution payment, and it is far greater than 20%. Ananias and Sapphira lied to church authorities concerning the %age of their economic gains that they had voluntarily donated to the church. When asked individually by Peter if what they had told the authorities was true, they lied, and God struck each of them dead on the spot, one by one (Acts 5:1–10). This served as a very effective warning to the church in general (v. 11). Presumably, they could have confessed their crime at that point, paying all the money from the sale into the church's treasury, because God was the intended victim of their lies (Acts 5:4). They chose instead to lie. So, God imposed His more rigorous penalty.⁴²

4. After the Accusation, but Before the Trial

What if the thief stole an animal, especially a sheep or an ox, and then sold it? If the civil authorities have brought the thief to trial, but the trial has not been held, would he be given the opportunity to confess to the victim, and then go to the buyer, confess his crime, buy it back at the purchase price plus 20%, and return it to the true owner, plus 20%? This would seem to be a reasonable conclusion. His confession would reduce the cost of prosecuting him and convicting him. Understand, however, that the thief has committed two crimes: the original theft and the defrauding of the buyer. The buyer was led to believe that the thief possessed the legal right of ownership, which was being passed to the new buyer.⁴³ Thus, the defrauded buyer is also entitled to a 20% penalty payment, as well as the return of his purchase price. This would make the total penalty 40%, because he had de-

41. The question arises: Which church? To the church that the convicted thief belongs to, since it suffers the public humiliation. If he belongs to no church, then it should probably go to the victim's church, or if he also does not belong to a church, to a local church selected randomly or in predictable sequence by the civil judges.

42. Gary North, Sacrifice and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Acts, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 5.

43. Chapter 43:C.

frauded two people: the first by means of the theft and the second by means of his lie.

The thief's confession reduces the possibility that a guilty man will go free and an innocent victim will be defrauded. Apart from this admission, the judges might make a mistake, especially if the thief commits perjury during the trial. His confession eliminates this judicial problem.

The modern judicial system has adopted an analogous solution: plea bargaining. A criminal confesses falsely to having committed a lesser crime, and the judge accepts this admission and hands down a reduced penalty. This is the way that prosecuting attorneys unclog the court system. The Bible rejects this approach. Plea bargaining leaves the main crime officially unsolved, and it allows the guilty person to appear less of a threat to society than his behavior indicates that he is. The Bible does recognize the institutional problem, however: the risks and costs of gaining a conviction. Instead of having the criminal plead guilty to a lesser crime, it encourages him to plead guilty to the actual crime before the trial, and thereby receive a reduced penalty.

F. Who Pays What?

The judges must determine the nature of the negligence, and therefore the size of the restitution payment. A thief pays double (v. 7). If the neighbor is the thief, he pays double (v. 9). But verse 12 speaks of "restitution," not a double payment: "And if it shall be stolen from him, he shall make restitution unto the owner thereof." In this case, "restitution" means "making good the loss." We can see this in verse 13, where it says that when he can produce the torn remains of the animal, "he shall not make it good." "Making it good" and "restitution" are identical words in Hebrew, and should be regarded as equivalents here.

Restitution in the context of the obligation of the negligent safekeeper is a payment equal to the value of what had been lost. The responsible neighbor did not intend to profit from the theft. Indeed, he voluntarily took on added responsibilities by agreeing to serve as a protector. Negligence on the part of the safekeeper is not the same as criminal intent on the part of the thief; therefore, the penalties are different. The thief pays the victim an extra penalty equal to his hoped-for profit: double restitution. There is no additional penalty payment imposed on the safekeeper, for he had not hoped to profit by the transaction. To make safekeepers responsible for large restitution payments associated with criminal action would be to break down the covenantal bonds of the community, because too high a risk factor would be transferred to safekeepers. Men would no longer be so willing voluntarily to accept the liabilities of safekeeping. This reduction in voluntary safekeeping activities would tend to subsidize the criminal class, which is certainly not the intent of biblical law.

The “hospitality of safekeeping” is designed to make theft more difficult for professional thieves. Clearly, it makes theft easier for previously honest neighbors. Nevertheless, the law has been given by God. So, the focus of judicial concern has to be on the professional thief. A man delivers his inanimate goods to a neighbor, above all, to keep them from being stolen. The recipient therefore must take care to see to it that the property is not stolen. He cannot guard against every conceivable loss, but he is required to make life more difficult for thieves. The law makes this responsibility inescapably clear: “And if it be stolen from him, he shall make restitution unto the owner thereof” (v. 12). The safekeeper has to repay the depositor. This motivates the safekeeper to seek to capture the thief.

If subsequently apprehended and convicted, the thief must pay the victimized safekeeper double. The safekeeper has already had to repay the depositor. It should be obvious that if the safekeeping neighbor has been assessed a compensating restitution payment, he has “bought” the missing beast from the original owner. Therefore, half of what the thief has returned to him serves as compensation for the loss he incurred by repaying the depositor. The other half of the double restitution payment is his compensation for having been put into a bind by the thief’s actions.

The principle of ownership does not change in the case of the stolen ox or sheep. If the thief had stolen and killed or sold a sheep or an ox, and therefore must make a five-fold or four-fold restitution payment, the safekeeper receives the total restitution payment. He has become the victim, not the original owner, who has been compensated by the safekeeper; therefore, the safekeeper should receive the four-fold or five-fold restitution payment.

Conclusion

Accepting the responsibilities associated with safekeeping is a voluntary act that affirms the existence of covenantal bonds. There are judicial bonds with the neighbor, with the community, and with God. By acting as a steward of another man's property, the safekeeper becomes an agent of the neighbor, the community, and God. He must do his best to keep thieves at bay. He is not responsible for every possible loss that might befall these entrusted goods, but he is responsible to see that thieves do not break in and take them. He is responsible up to the value of the stolen goods, beast for beast, good for good.

The neighbor who is a thief jeopardizes covenantal social order. He is to be brought before the judges by the victim. This passage refers exclusively to criminal behavior. This is why double restitution is imposed in each case. Double restitution is biblical law's sanction against criminal intent: an additional restitution payment is imposed that is equal to the gross return that the thief hoped to gain from the transgression. If the case comes to trial, the accused must take an oath before God and the court that he is innocent. The thief takes great risks in giving a false oath. A false oath involves him in a second theft: the attempt to avoid paying the victim his lawful restitution. If he later admits his false oath, he will have to make an additional payment of 20% of the required double restitution to the victim, plus a trespass offering to the church. If he never admits it, and his false oath is subsequently proven in court, he will have to make quadruple restitution to the victim, or six-fold restitution, plus at least a double trespass offering to the church.

End of Volume 3

Volume 4: Tools of Dominion 2

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON EXODUS

VOLUME 4

TOOLS OF DOMINION

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2011)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

Gary North

PART 3: TOOLS OF DOMINION

An Economic Commentary on Exodus 22–35

Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus

Part 3: Tools of Dominion

Formerly: Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Second Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1: Part 1, Representation and Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Population Growth: Tool of Dominion (Ex. 1:5–7) | 12 |
| 2. Imperial Bureaucracy (Ex. 1:8–12) | 31 |
| 3. Rigorous Waste and Rigorous Socialism (Ex. 1:13–14) | 54 |
| 4. Illegitimate State Power (Ex. 1:15–16) | 67 |
| 5. Envy, Rumor, and Bondage (Ex. 2:11–14) | 73 |
| 6. Cumulative Transgression and Restitution (Ex. 3:21–22) | 83 |
| 7. The Optimum Production Mix (Ex. 5:5–7) | 92 |
| 8. Covenantal Judgment (Ex. 8:19) | 108 |
| 9. Original Ownership (Ex. 9:29–30) | 121 |
| 10. Total Sacrifice, Total Sovereignty (Ex. 10:24) | 129 |
| 11. Separation and Dominion (Ex. 11:7) | 137 |
| 12. Discontinuity and Continuity (Ex. 12:10–11) | 147 |
| 13. Unconditional Surrender (Ex. 12:30–32) | 184 |
| 14. The Rule of Law (Ex. 12:48–49) | 195 |
| 15. The Firstborn Offering (Ex. 13:1–2) | 230 |
| 16. The Psychology of Slavery (Ex. 14:12) | 237 |
| 17. The Metaphor of Growth: Ethics (Ex. 15:17) | 246 |
| 18. Manna, Predictability, and Dominion (Ex. 16:4–5) | 258 |
| 19. Imperfect Justice (Ex. 18:21–22) | 267 |
| 20. The Oath-Bound Kingdom of Priests (Ex. 19:3–6) | 280 |
| Conclusion | 284 |

Volume 2: Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 289 |
| 21. The God of Liberation (Ex. 20:1–3) | 305 |
| 22. Graven Images and Rival Civilization (Ex. 20:4–6) | 315 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 23. Lawful Title (20:7) | 343 |
| 24. Rest and Dominion (Ex. 20:8–11) | 359 |
| 25. Family Capital (Ex. 20:12) | 371 |
| 26. God's Monopoly of Execution (Ex. 20:13) | 386 |
| 27. The Yoke of Co-operative Service (Ex. 20:14) | 398 |
| 28. The Rights of Private Property (Ex. 20:15) | 411 |
| 29. The Value of a Name (Ex. 20:16) | 450 |
| 30. Covetousness and Conflict (Ex. 20:17) | 477 |
| Conclusion | 494 |

Volume 3: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 513 |
| 31. Servitude, Protection, and Marriage (Ex. 21:2–4) | 541 |
| 32. Wives and Concubines (Ex. 21:7–11) | 568 |
| 33. Executing a Rebellious Son (Ex. 21:15, 17) | 598 |
| 34. Kidnapping (Ex. 21:16) | 602 |
| 35. The Costs of Private Conflict (Ex. 18–19) | 621 |
| 36. The Human Commodity (Ex. 21:20–21) | 634 |
| 37. Criminal Law and Restoration (Ex. 21:22–25) | 649 |
| 38. The Auction for Substitute Sanctions (Ex. 21:22–25) | 681 |
| 39. Freedom for an Eye (Ex. 21:26–27) | 703 |
| 40. The Ransom for a Life (Ex. 21:28–31) | 716 |
| 41. The Uncovered Pit (Ex. 21:33–34) | 745 |
| 42. Knowledge and Responsibility (Ex. 21:35–36) | 755 |
| 43. Proportional Restitution (Ex. 22:1, 4) | 765 |
| 44. Pollution, Ownership, and Responsibility (Ex. 22:5–6) | 800 |
| 45. Safekeeping and Liability (Ex. 22:7–9) | 871 |

Volume 4: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|------|
| 46. Caretaking and Negligence (Ex. 22:10–13) | 895 |
| 47. Seduction and Servitude (22:16–17) | 905 |
| 48. Oppression, Omniscience and Judgment (Ex. 22:21–24) | 932 |
| 49. The Prohibition against Usury (Ex. 22:25–27) | 970 |
| 50. Impartial Justice (Ex. 23:1–3, 6–7) | 1023 |
| 51. Finders should not be Keepers (Ex. 23:4–5) | 1040 |
| 52. Bribery and Oppression (Ex. 23:8) | 1051 |
| 53. Sabbatical Liberty (Ex. 23:9–12) | 1078 |
| 54. Feasts and Citizenship (Ex. 23:14–19) | 1092 |

| | |
|--|------|
| 55. The Curse of Zero Growth (Ex. 23:25–26) | 1115 |
| 56. God's Limits on Sacrifice (Ex. 25:3–8, 36:5–7) | 1140 |
| 57. The Economics of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:8–9) | 1159 |
| 58. Blood Money, not Head Tax (Ex. 30:11–16) | 1170 |
| 59. Sabbath Rest vs. Autonomy (Ex. 35:2) | 1180 |
| 60. The Ability to Teach (Ex. 35:31, 34a) | 1186 |
| Conclusion | 1195 |
| Conclusion to Authority and Dominion | 1231 |

Volume 5: Appendixes

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology | 1255 |
| APPENDIX B–The Demographics of Decline | 1283 |
| APPENDIX C–The Labyrinth and The Garden | 1320 |
| APPENDIX D–The Rule of Law and the Free Market | 1339 |
| APPENDIX E–The Economic Implications of The Sabbath | 1364 |
| APPENDIX F–Timing the Lord's Day | 1442 |
| APPENDIX G–Macaulay on Democracy | 1447 |
| APPENDIX H–The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost | 1453 |

Volume 6: Appendixes

| | |
|--|------|
| APPENDIX I–Pollution in the Soviet Union | 1535 |
| APPENDIX J–Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney | 1543 |
| APPENDIX K–Slavery in the American South | 1557 |
| APPENDIX L–Maimonides' Code : Is it Biblical? | 1574 |
| APPENDIX M–Victim's Rights vs. the Messianic State | 1638 |
| APPENDIX N–Covenantal Law and Covenantal Love | 1679 |
| APPENDIX O–Social Antinomianism | 1695 |
| APPENDIX P–The Hoax of Higher Criticism | 1712 |
| APPENDIX Q–The Restoration of Biblical Casuistry | 1734 |
| APPENDIX R–What is Covenant Law? | 1770 |
| APPENDIX S–What are the Case Laws? | 1795 |

CARETAKING AND NEGLIGENCE

If a man deliver unto his neighbour an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast, to keep; and it die, or be hurt, or driven away, no man seeing it: Then shall an oath of the LORD be between them both, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbor's goods; and the owner of it shall accept thereof, and he shall not make it good. And if it be stolen from him, he shall make restitution unto the owner thereof. If it be torn in pieces, then let him bring it for witness, and he shall not make good that which was torn (Ex. 22:10–13).

The theocentric issue here is stewardship to God, point two of the biblical covenant model.¹ God entrusts property to men, who serve as His agents. This law is an extension of the issue raised in the previous case law, Exodus 22:7–9, which dealt with property that has been put in safekeeping with a neighbor. The property is then stolen from the neighbor, or is said by the neighbor to have been stolen.

The present passage begins with the same phrase as verse 8 does: “If a man deliver unto his neighbour. . . .” If verse 8 refers to a non-commercial transaction, as it seems to,² then so does this passage.³ There is no indication that the neighbor is a professional who is hired for a fee. The relationship is neighborly, not commercial. If this were a commercial transaction, it would necessarily involve the transfer of much greater responsibility for taking care of the animals. The owner is paying the professional to become his delegated surrogate, someone who is therefore to protect the animals from danger.⁴ The person renting the skills of a shepherd or a cattle drover expects this hired professional to do his job responsibly.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 2.

2. Rabbi Moses ben Nachman [Ramban], Commentary on the Torah: Exodus (New York: Shilo, [1267?] 1973), pp. 378–79; Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch Translated and Explained, translated by Isaac Levy, 5 vols., Exodus, 3rd ed. (London: Honig & Sons, [1870?] 1967), p. 348.

3. Hirsch said that this section does involve a commercial transaction, but he offered no evidence from the biblical text: Exodus, p. 348.

If the thief cannot be located, the neighbor immediately may fall under suspicion and can be brought before the judges (Ex. 22:9). The Hebrew word here translated as “judges” is transliterated as elohim, one of the names of God (Gen. 1:1). Some commentators translate the word in Exodus 22:9 as “God,” arguing that suspects were actually brought before God in expectation of a divine judgment. But the verb used here with elohim is plural, indicating men who serve as God’s authorized judicial representatives rather than God Himself as the immediate Judge. The meaning is comparable to the meaning of elohim in Psalm 82:6: “I have said, Ye are gods. . . .”⁵ The judges must determine which of the contending parties is lying and therefore who owes restitution to whom. The principle of “eye for eye” also applies to cases of false witness (Deut. 19:17–21).⁶

A. Animals

This case law focuses exclusively on animals. An inanimate object remains where it was placed until someone or something moves it. An animal is mobile. The problems of taking care of an animal are greater, generally, than the problems of guarding inanimate objects. The animal has to be cared for as well as protected from thieves and wild animals. There is greater expense involved in taking care of an animal, and greater risk of its getting in trouble.

The punishments vary for the deliberate theft of an animal. Two-fold restitution is required in the case of most stolen animals and all

4. The Hammurabi Code specified that if a hired shepherd lost a sheep or ox, he had to restore the equivalent animal to the owner: CH, paragraphs 263–64. If he sold an animal or switched its brand, and the owner proved it, he had to restore ten-fold: 265. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), p. 177.

5. DeMar and Leithart pointed out that virtually all Protestant commentators interpret “gods” of Psalm 82:6 as “judges.” They cited Charles H. Spurgeon, H. C. Leupold, Thomas Scott, F. S. Delitzsch, J. J. Stewart Perone, David Dickson, Joseph Addison Alexander, William S. Plummer, John Calvin, Matthew Henry, Matthew Poole, and Woodrow Michael Kroll. Gary DeMar and Peter J. Leithart, The Reduction of Christianity: A Biblical Response to Dave Hunt (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988), pp. 78–81. (<http://bit.ly/gdplreduction>) stolen inanimate property. Five-fold restitution is required for a stolen ox, while four-fold restitution is sufficient in the case of a stolen sheep. These high penalties were imposed only when the animal had already been killed or sold by the time of the thief's capture (Ex. 22:1). Double payment was required from the man who still had the living animal in his possession when caught by the authorities (Ex. 22:4). Contrary to commentators who argue that the differences in the size of the fines were based on the difference in cost of training certain animals, the differing penalties were probably imposed because of the special symbolism of sheep and oxen—symbols that represent mankind—and also because of differing levels of difficulty in apprehending and convicting the thief.⁷

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012) ch. 45.

Cases of known theft (Ex. 22:1–4), as well as cases of carelessness concerning fire or pollution (Ex. 22:5–6)—the coercive transfer of operating costs to one's neighbor—are easier for the authorities to adjudicate than those cases in which the responsibility for someone's loss is hidden. Verses 7–15 deal with several of these more difficult cases involving loss: (1) the safekeeping or storage of inanimate objects; (2) caretaking of animals; (3) borrowing goods; and (4) renting goods.

These passages indicate that it was a common practice among the Hebrews to ask their neighbors to act as temporary guardians for their property, thereby transferring to their neighbors the risks of supervision. This was one of the costs of "neighborliness," and the law established legal limits of responsibility, risk, and restitution. One of the advantages of this safekeeping system was the greater physical mobility it permitted to Hebrew families.

B. Passover

When would such mobility have been most important? At Passover and at the other celebrations in Jerusalem. There is no way that families could have left their flocks and herds at home without supervision. At the same time, it is inconceivable that they could have brought the animals with them to Jerusalem. Thus, neighbors would have taken turns in caring for the animals of their neighbors.

Wasn't Passover absolutely required for all Hebrews every year? Not necessarily. It was required for all adult males who were numbered (Num. 1:1–4). It was not required of all women. For instance, Jesus and His disciples met together for Passover; there is no indication that women or children were present (John 13–17). Furthermore, men on very distant journeys probably were not required to attend. A second Passover celebration was established a month after the first one for those who legitimately missed the first one, either for having been in contact with a dead body or for having been on a journey (Num. 9:10–11). While caretaking for a neighbor's animals was not listed as one of the reasons for missing the Passover legitimately, it must have been one of them.

7. Chapter 47.

If we argue that Passover was required for every Hebrew at one time, then the only explanation of who kept the animals would seem to be permanent foreign slaves, meaning that Passover was a major economic incentive for every Hebrew family to become owners of permanent foreign slaves, and to place all the mobile property of the land into their hands at least once a year. This seems to be an unlikely ritual incentive in biblical law.

C. Restitution, Risk, and Knowledge

The case of a dead or lost animal is different from the case of a stolen animal. The caretaker has to swear before God that he did not steal it, destroy it for his own use, or sell it. If he is willing to swear this, he is not required to restore the missing animal. The owner has to accept this oath as binding (Ex. 22:10–11). The sacred nature of the oath has to be recognized; the original owner thereby acknowledges his faith in God's final judgment and His perfect restitution. Vengeance belongs to God, and He will impose judgment (Rom. 12:19). Social peace is therefore far easier (cheaper) to attain in a community of men who believe in a living God who serves as perfect Judge. The judges will have fewer cases to adjudicate, for self-discipline increases in such a society. The likelihood of blood vengeance and clan feuds is also reduced. Socially disrupting suspicions and accusations can be put to rest.

The caretaker cannot escape his responsibility for the stolen animal. He only escapes the additional penalty for criminal activity (Ex. 22:11b). If the animal has been stolen from him, he has to make a restitution payment to the original owner (Ex. 22:12). This payment is equal to the value of the goods stolen or lost.⁸ Exodus 22:12 indicates that if the thief is found, he must make proportional restitution to the caretaker, who is now the economic victim, because the caretaker had made the restitution payment to the owner.

8. Chapter 49.

1. The Wild Beast

One kind of negligence is not penalized: a loss imposed by a wild beast. Verse 13 provides the details: “If it be torn to pieces, then let him bring it for witness, and he shall not make good that which was torn.” If a bear, wolf, lion, or a pack of dangerous animals rips apart a beast that has been entrusted to a neighbor, he is not liable. He is not required to risk his life trying to save the animal from wild beasts.

Why should he escape his obligation in the case of an animal carried away by a beast? Why should he be less liable? After all, the animal is gone. The loss to the owner is just as great as it would be if the animal had been stolen. If the loss is as great, why shouldn’t the restitution be equal? One answer relates to comparative risks to the life of the caretaker. He is under no pressure judicially to challenge a bear or other dangerous beast in order to protect his neighbor’s property, any more than he has a legal obligation to challenge a dangerous beast in order to defend his own property.⁹ There are limits on his responsibilities as a neighbor. Second, men in general cannot be expected to know the habits of another man’s animal. Perhaps it can lift a latch with its nose, or maybe it runs away as soon as it gets outside its pen. If it exposes itself to danger in this way, it has to bear responsibility for its actions. If it removes itself from the protection of the caretaker, it is not the caretaker’s fault.

An animal can kill itself or injure itself in many ways. A man cannot be expected to provide free caretaking services for every contingency. He is dealing with an unfamiliar animal, and the animal is in unfamiliar surroundings. The predictability of its behavior is reduced, compared to its predictability under the dominion of its owner. The owner may recognize certain patterns of behavior that point to injury or sickness that a neighbor would probably ignore. The neighbor does not have equally accurate background information on the animal.

2. The Witness

Why is the safekeeper responsible when something inanimate is stolen, but not in the case of animals that are torn apart? Verses 10 and

9. Challenging a criminal, or at least doing what is necessary to bring him to justice, is a different situation. The law-abiding citizen is to take risks to restrict evil people. They are a greater threat to social order than wild beasts are.

11 provide the solution: "If a man deliver unto his neighbor an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast, to keep; and it die, or be hurt, or driven away, no man seeing it, then shall an oath of the LORD be between them both, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbour's goods; and the owner of it shall accept thereof, and he shall not make it good."¹⁰ Verse 10 deals with the death, injury, or driving away of an animal. If no one has seen what happened to the missing animal, then there is no way to prove that some wild animal did not do it, or that the protected beast did not hurt itself. Wild animals might drive away or carry away a sheep; they might drive away an ox or donkey. The presumption is that a wild animal dragged away the animal that was being guarded.

The dead carcass of the animal serves as a witness to the honesty of the safekeeper, so in this case there is no need to go before the judges and swear an oath. There is a witness in this case: the carcass itself. The carcass is evidence that a wild beast destroyed it. The safekeeper did not profit from its death, nor did any thief. There is no human being to be held accountable for the loss. This allows the safekeeper to escape legal liability for the return of the animal or its equivalent value.

When it comes to defending against thieves, however, men are expected to possess approximately the same information. Men understand the ways of other men. Locking or blocking a door at night to restrict access to the home is a universal practice. So is listening to animals, because they tend to cry out, bark, or stamp around when strangers approach. The absent neighbor wants to reduce the likelihood of theft by placing his animal under someone else's protection, so as to avoid the "empty house" problem. The neighbor's house is a safer place for his animals. He expects his neighbor to provide him with safety from thieves.

How could the complaining neighbor prove that the other man should be held economically responsible? He would have to prove that the safekeeper sought to profit from the loss of the animal, or failed to do his duty in stopping a thief. To prove the latter case, he would have to have a witness. The key phrase is, “no man seeing it” (v. 10). Some witness would have to come forward and testify that he saw someone snooping around the home of the safekeeper during the night of the theft, and that he had warned the safekeeper (indicating that he, the witness, was not an accomplice or a guilty, silent onlooker), or that he saw the beast penned in the night before it disappeared (indicating that a thief had released it).

10. Maimonides argued that in cases where there are witnesses, the oath is not to be imposed. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Civil Laws, vol. 13 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1949), "Hiring," I:III:1, p. 12. This would seem to eliminate the use of the oath between the disputing parties in any courtroom where there are witnesses available to testify. God is called upon through the oath only when there are no "normal" sources of resolving the dispute.

The safekeeping neighbor has to spend time and capital in making sure that his neighbor’s property is protected. This is his voluntary contribution to his neighbor, the neighborhood, and God. He acts as a steward to keep the property protected from the criminal class.

3. Inanimate Goods

Inanimate goods are a less difficult case. They are not “driven off.” They are stolen by a criminal or lost by the safekeeper. The man who accepts his neighbor’s goods in trust must be willing to take precautions to protect these goods from theft. If he cannot honestly swear that the goods had been lost, or if a witness can point to signs that the man was negligent—negligent in failing to protect the property against criminal action—then he has to pay. This gives him added incentive to take some risks in stopping a thief who breaks into his home. He will bear the penalty if the thief gets away with the crime. Thus, in the case of a thief who breaks in, he has both the legal right and the economic incentive to stop the thief, even to the point (at night) of killing him (Ex. 22:2). Again, the focus of concern of these case laws is the reduction of criminal activity in the local community, namely, the prevention of theft. A thief must be specially guarded against.

D. Borrowed Property

In the case of borrowed property, any loss or damage is not the responsibility of the borrower if the owner accompanies his property when it is being used. “And if a man borrow ought of his neighbour, and it be hurt, or die, the owner thereof being not with it, he shall surely make it good. But if the owner thereof be with it, he shall not make it good: if it be an hired thing, it came for his hire” (Ex. 22:14–15).¹¹ The owner retains his oversight over it, and therefore bears the full responsibility for its proper use. He can see how the borrower is

11. Chapter 47.

using the property when the accident occurred.¹²

On the other hand, if he does not accompany his property, then the borrower has to pay simple “like for like” compensation, not double or quadruple restitution, for criminal activity is not involved in the loss, only carelessness. James Jordan wrote:

Since this is the kind of thing that happens every day, a few comments are in order. Let us assume that you borrowed your neighbor’s punchbowl and broke it. How should you make compensation? First, don’t tell her in advance that you broke the punchbowl, unless you have to. That only gives her an opportunity to say she doesn’t need a replacement. People say things like, “Oh, well, forget it. It’s not important,” but in fact they don’t forget. Second, don’t just give her the money. She is likely to refuse to take it. Also, why should she have to go to the trouble of purchasing a new bowl, when you are the one who broke it? Third, don’t buy a more expensive punchbowl. It may not match her set. Let her use the receipt and exchange it if she wants to. Fourth, don’t neglect the opportunity to witness for Christ. You are not doing this because it seems nice and neighborly. You are doing it because Christ your Lord tells you to. Let her know that.

If someone wants to make compensation to you, don’t despise him by refusing to accept it. Accept it graciously as from the Lord.¹³

Finally, in the case of rented property, the borrower is not legally responsible for loss, for the property “came for his hire.” The risk premium or insurance premium is included in the rental fee.¹⁴ The owner-renter is self-insuring his own property. (The translation of the Hebrew in the second half of Exodus 22:15 is disputed, however; it may refer to a hired servant who accompanies his master’s property as the owner’s representative, in which case, no restitution is owed.)

What is in focus in these laws is the particular “bundle of rights” that is transferred along with the physical property. With rights of

12. Maimonides cited the Jewish oral tradition as saying that the lender needed to be present with the borrower only when the property was transferred, but not afterwards, in order for the lender to escape liability. Even more peculiar, “if the lender was not with him at the time of the borrowing, though he was present at the time of the death or capture, the borrower is liable.” Maimonides, Civil Laws, “Treatise I, Laws Concerning Hiring,” I:I:3, p. 5. This makes the law difficult to interpret from an economic standpoint. The focus of the passage is on the risk borne by the owner-lender because, being present with his property, he has the legal authority to call a halt to some high-risk use of it.

13. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 143. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>) ownership come certain responsibilities for preserving the quality of the goods loaned out. All property is God's; He delegates certain rights and responsibilities to specific people. The goal of this delegation of this stewardship system is to extend God's dominion on earth. Thus, ownership has inescapable legal implications, that is, covenantal implications. There cannot be ownership without legal responsibility. These laws set forth the limits of the "bundle of rights" in three types of lending transactions: (1) when the owner or his agent accompanies his property, (2) when he does not accompany his property, and (3) when he rents his property for a fee. In the first case, the rights and therefore responsibilities of ownership remain with the owner. In the second, they shift to the borrower. In the third, they remain with the owner.

14. Chapter 47.

There is a system of strict liability operating here. The borrower assumes risks when he borrows a work animal. He is asking another person to give him something free of charge. He is asking for grace. The borrower becomes responsible for the proper administration of the other person's property. If the animal dies of natural causes, the borrower has to repay the owner. Who can be sure what killed it? Was it overworked or not? When the borrower asks for grace from his neighbor, he must not expect unlimited grace. Biblical law establishes the limits of his responsibility.¹⁵

Conclusion

This section of the case laws refers to the voluntary, charitable care of a neighbor's animals. Rules are established regarding the extent of personal responsibility for the caretaking of animals. There is no penalty imposed on the caretaker if an animal is carried off when no one sees it, if he swears before the judges that he has not stolen the animal.

15. Maimonides argued that if the animal died of natural causes during normal work activities, the borrower is exempt: Civil Laws, II:I:1, p. 52. Incredibly, he argued that if a man asks another man for a drink of water and also to borrow his work animal, no matter what happens to the animal, he owes the lender nothing. Why? Because this is a case of "the owner thereof be with it" (Ex. 22:13). "Whether the commodatary borrowed the services of the owner or hired them, whether he borrowed the services for the same work, or for other work, or for anything in the world . . . it is a case of borrowing with the owner and the commodatary is quit. If, however, he borrowed the animal first, and then the owner gave him water to drink, it is not a case of borrowing with the owner. And so it is in all similar cases." Ibid., II:II:1, p. 55. This sort of reasoning places barriers of extreme legalism in between neighbors. Legal technicalities can overwhelm personal relationships.

He is responsible for restoring, like for like, any animal that is stolen from him. If the beast's torn carcass is located, the caretaker is not held responsible.

Charity is basic to social order. Property needs protection when owners are away from their homes. Men's geographical mobility would be heavily restricted if they could not occasionally trust their neighbors to look after their property. But there are legitimate limits to people's willingness to bear risks. By establishing rules in advance that govern the judges' assessment of responsibility in the case of theft or loss, the Bible allows neighbors to estimate more precisely the extent of the risk they are being asked to bear in these instances. This assists them in making an estimate concerning the amount of charity they are willing to extend, for that is what caretaking involves: extra work and extra responsibility.

The costs of litigation are lowered by the fear of God and the fear of the restitution payment owed to God because of false oaths. The fear of having to make equal restitution increases the costs of carelessness. As I pointed out in Chapter 47, the fear of double restitution increases the costs of theft when the animals are not immediately sold or killed, or when the stolen property is inanimate. Restitution and the fear of God are basic to social order.

SEDUCTION AND SERVITUDE

And if a man entice a maid that is not betrothed, and lie with her, he shall surely endow her to be his wife. If her father utterly refuse to give her unto him, he shall pay money according to the dowry of virgins (Ex. 22:16–17).

The theocentric principle that governs this case law is the defense of God the Father's covenantal authority over the family of man. This case law governs a man's seduction of an unmarried and unbetrothed (unengaged) virgin. This is not a capital crime. Adultery, in contrast, is a capital crime (Deut. 22:22). Why is there a difference in the punishments? Because the seduction of a virgin does not break a covenant vow. In fact, it involves taking a covenant vow: the physical bonding associated with the consummation of a binding marriage vow. In biblical law, physical consummation is itself the mutual vow of betrothal.

Adultery was involved in the sins in the garden of Eden. Eve's spiritual seduction by Satan was an adulterous attack on her existing covenantal bond with her husband Adam. She had been given by God to Adam. It had been an arranged marriage, one to which both partners had freely consented. She was therefore "spoken for" covenantally at the time of her temptation, either as a betrothed woman or as a consummated bride. She was Adam's wife. Satan intervened and lured her into disobeying God, her husband's master. This was a capital crime, even though she, unlike Adam, was deceived into sinning (1 Tim. 2:14). She could not claim ignorance of God's law as justification of her crime. Because Adam consented to this act of adultery, and participated in it, he also came under God's condemnation of death. He became, in effect, a covenantal pimp for his own wife.

A. The Age of Lawful Independence

Fornication by unmarried and unbetrothed partners was a crime in the Old Testament if the daughter was still living in the household of her father. The question arises: At what age did the father's authority legally cease or become drastically reduced? The Bible is silent on this point. Sons in the Old Testament became subject to a military draft at age 20 (Ex. 30:14). This "age of independence" may also have applied to a daughter who lived outside her father's home, although the Bible does not say so explicitly. The dividing line of authority seems to have been her presence in her father's house: "These are the statutes, which the LORD commanded Moses, between a man and his wife, between the father and his daughter, being yet in her youth in her father's house" (Num. 30:16). If she was outside his house, unmarried, yet economically self-sufficient—highly unlikely, given the ancient world's agricultural economy and Israel's jubilee land tenure system (Lev. 25)—she would have been beyond his legal responsibility over her. She would have been free to conduct her life as she saw fit, for good or evil, without calling his judgment into question, although he could have disinherited her by refusing to provide any dowry for her.¹

In the New Covenant era, seduction remains an attack on the covenantal authority of the girl's family. There is no indication that the legal terms have changed. Fornication is behavior that covenantally faithful families should seek to impair, and the civil government is required to back up the family with the threat of sanctions against the seducer. The father becomes the lawful prosecutor of the seducer, and the state supports him in his decision. In this sense, the father becomes a lawful agent of the state, the state's representative. This is why the seduction is a crime.

The state enforces all sorts of contracts, but this case is different. The magnitude of the potential penalty is so great, as we shall see, that in order to impose it, the state must number the transgressor among felony criminals, such as major thieves. In the case of a seduction, biblical law transfers to the girl's father a monopoly position in setting the terms of the bride price.² The magnitude of the sanctions against seduction is such that only the state could enforce them without risking

1. I do not take seriously the comment by Nachmanides, who said that the father's authority over her decision to marry lasts only from age twelve and one day to twelve and a half, and that after this, she is lawfully able to decide for herself to accept a marriage proposal, with or without fornication's having preceded the marriage. Nachmanides, Commentary on the Torah: Exodus (New York: Shilo, [1267?] 1973), p. 388.

2. As we shall see, there is a judicial distinction between the bride price, which is paid by the bridegroom to the girl's family, and the dowry, which is paid to the girl by her family.

a clan war or other violence. The act of seduction therefore came under the jurisdiction of Israel's criminal statutes.

Consenting to a girl's marriage is normally a family responsibility, not primarily a civil government or church responsibility, except in those rare cases when the couple appeals the negative decision of the father to the church or churches to which they belong.³ The father does not have a final say, for no single human agent ever possesses an absolutely final say in any legal decision, including the state,⁴ but he has the primary responsibility to sanction the marriage of his daughter. His decision can lawfully be appealed to the church, but in general his decision stands. In the case of dealing with the seduction of a virgin, however, the father's authority is supplemented by civil authority, according to biblical law.

B. Consummating the Vow

A lawful marriage normally requires three things in the following order: a mutual vow of the proposed marriage partners, a public transfer of covenantal authority from the girl's father to the bridegroom, and sexual consummation. A verbal vow (betrothal) is to precede the formal ritual of public, covenantal marriage; physical consummation follows. But when private physical consummation itself becomes the form that the vow takes, then a public act must follow: either the seducer's payment to her father (or brother)⁵ of an unspecified bride price plus a marriage ceremony, or his payment of "the dowry of virgins" without a marriage ceremony. The physical consummation constitutes covenantal betrothal. It is a binding oath. It is a bond. Her father then determines whether a marriage will consummate the vow, or whether

3. The case of a pagan father who refuses to sanction the marriage of his Christian daughter to a Christian man would be a case that the couple could lawfully appeal to the church or churches that possess covenantal sovereignty over them. To deny this right of appeal would be to absolutize the father's word, and to designate him as the sole authorized agent under God over the daughter. This would elevate the father's word to a sovereign position comparable to the Roman Church's view of the Pope.

4. The father can appeal this decision to the civil magistrate. The decision of the civil magistrate would then confirm either the father's decision or the church's. The state serves only as a settler of disputes between lawful authorities, not as the initiator of laws regarding marriage, except when public health considerations are involved, e.g., compulsory testing of both parties for disease. The state's word is not autonomously final; it simply confirms the decision of one of the disputants in the case.

5. Abraham's servant dealt with Rebekah's brother Laban and her mother (Gen. 24:29, 53, 55) even though her father Bethuel was alive (v. 50). The sons of Jacob set the terms of Shechem's dowry, even though Jacob was present with them (Gen. 34:13).

the payment of the formal bride price, the “dowry of virgins,” will alone consummate it.⁶ But payment of some sort is necessary to consummate the vow.

1. Seduction and Betrothal

The consent of the girl to her seduction is the equivalent of her private betrothal. She takes a binding covenant vow with the seducer by means of her body. The seducer does the same with his body. She implicitly agrees to marry the seducer, and he implicitly agrees to marry her. Neither of them has the option of breaking the vow. Only her father does. An unmarried girl has no independent authority to take a vow if her father refuses to accept it (Num. 30:3–5). Numbers 30:3 refers to a binding vow as “a vow unto the LORD.” Thus, this passage in Exodus informs us that her father, as God’s covenantal agent over her until her marriage, has the authority to deny the consummation of his daughter’s vow through marriage.

The girl must immediately inform her father of the act-vow. If she refuses, she has identified herself before God as a promiscuous woman, a prostitute. She has accepted the legitimacy of sexual union outside of marriage, the essence of prostitution. She has thereby become an idolater. If she marries later on, and neither she nor her father formally informs her suitor prior to the betrothal, her discovered lack of virginity could lead to her public execution (Deut. 22:20–21). Also, should she become pregnant, she would soon be publicly identified as a prostitute. If she was the daughter of a priest in Israel, she would be stoned to death, with her body burned after (Lev. 21:9; see Josh. 7:25), but only after the birth of her child. This, of course, drastically increased the risks of fornicating with the promiscuous daughter of a priest. If she knew she was pregnant from an earlier act, she might immediately seduce some other young man—as Eve seduced Adam by means of the forbidden fruit—and then announce the act to her father, as if the night before had been her first time, in order to get herself a husband or a bride price, and thereby avoid the death penalty.

2. The Father’s Status

Why does the seducer owe money to the father, rather than to the

6. In the United States, it has long been a crime to seduce a woman by promising to marry her later, and then refusing to marry her. The crime is called “breach of promise.” It clearly parallels this biblical case law. It is seldom enforced today.

girl? Because the father is legally liable for the girl and for his family's reputation. But this liability is limited by the extent of his knowledge. He cannot know everything she does. He always needs better information. Biblical law creates incentives for the transfer of appropriate knowledge to those who are God's legally responsible representatives.

The daughter's original consent to the act of seduction does not itself constitute whoredom. Her failure to tell her father immediately of the seduction is what constitutes her whoredom, for whoredom (as distinguished from adultery) is defined biblically as sexual bonding apart from a marriage vow.⁷ If she accepts the legitimacy of her sexual union apart from a marriage vow, then she has become a whore. She had taken the vow implicitly by her consent to the act, but her unwillingness to tell her father of the act that constituted her vow thereby establishes her covenantally as a whore.

She remains "in her father's house" (Num. 30:16), and under his covenantal jurisdiction, yet she is no longer a virgin. The presence of this unannounced non-virgin daughter brings disgrace on her house and on Israel when she is discovered. Because she has willfully broken her covenantal bond with her father, but has refused to acknowledge her implicit vow with her seducer, biblical law considers her a whore. The capital penalty can subsequently be imposed if she marries another man who has been asked to pay a bride price to her father, if the new husband immediately prosecutes her (Deut. 22:13–19).

If the father had known of her act, yet took no steps to receive payment from the seducer, he thereby consented to the theology of legitimate sexual bonding without covenantal bonding. He has also become an implicit idolater. He has no legal excuse. He has identified himself as a pimp for his own daughter. To avoid this humiliation, there must be a consummation of the marriage vow by the seducer, either through marriage plus payment of the bride price or payment without marriage. Thus, the father's insistence on receiving the bride price is a legal announcement of his rejection of whoredom in his household and in Israel. His daughter is declared not to be a whore, for he has received the bride price. Without payment of the bride price by the seducer, the father's house and his family's name are polluted.

7. This indicates that Jesus' announcement that divorce is legitimate only because of fornication (porneia) must have been based on a far broader definition of porneia than mere sexual bonding. The King James translators too narrowly defined the word as fornication. Under Old Testament law, once a marriage had taken place, fornication was always defined as adultery, a capital offense. Obviously, divorce through execution was possible, and Jesus would not have had to raise the issue. He would have used the term for adultery rather than fornication. R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 406–14; Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 2nd ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1984), pp. 105–9.

Once the bride price has been paid, the father cannot legitimately collect it from another man. Thus, if someone else lies with the woman, he is protected from a forced marriage. He has identified himself as a whoremonger, but not as a compulsory bridegroom. She identifies herself as a prostitute as soon as she identifies the second seducer. She has no legal claim on any man who does not voluntarily agree to marry a non-virgin, nor does her father have any economic claim on him, even if the seducer decides to marry her. A daughter is entitled only to one dowry per marriage, and her father is entitled to one bride price per marriage. (Negotiations between a father and a prospective bridegroom are legitimate, though not mandatory, for a widow who wishes to remarry, for she is taking on another set of responsibilities, and is in need of economic protection from potentially bad decisions of the next husband. The reason why negotiations are not mandatory is that she no longer is required to have her vows authorized by her father [Num. 30:9].)

C. The Formal Bride Price

The payment of a bride price by the bridegroom is a sign of his subordination and obligation to the bride's family.⁸ This text discusses "the dowry of virgins." The text does not specify how much this was. The reason for this omission is that this payment was negotiable between families within each economic class. The Bible could not specify a particular price without either placing it out of reach for most Israelites or else trivializing it for the rich. The price was not set so high that the poor would be forced to adopt concubinage—marriage without a dowry—or so low that the rich could dismiss it as nothing more than a mere ritual. Also, if a poor man wanted to marry a rich girl, her father could set a bride price lower than his intended dowry for her. Why? In order to test the willingness of the prospective bridegroom to work hard to earn what for him would be a large sum, but which would nevertheless be a pittance for the father. This was the problem David faced (I Sam. 18:23). The bride price was, first, a ritual sign of subordination; second, it was a screening device for the girl's parents; and third, it was a means of compensating the girl's family for the expense of the dowry. The first two aspects were more important than the third. Thus, a fixed bride price was not set by biblical law. The existence of its requirement was far more important than the actual money involved, with only two judicial exceptions: the case of seduction (Ex. 22:16–17) and the case of accused harlotry (Deut. 22:13–19).

8. Chapter 36.

1. Seduction

Let us consider the case of seduction. There is no doubt that the father, under the jurisdiction of the judges, was allowed to establish a bride price requirement for the seducer, and even prohibit the marriage after having collected it. Obviously, only the state could have lawfully enforced such a penalty.

When the state enters the picture to enforce a private decision, there must be upper limits on the punishment if liberty under predictable law is to be preserved. At the same time, the penalty must be high enough to deter the immoral behavior. Thus, the maximum bride price that could be imposed by the father with the consent of the judges could and would be different from normally negotiated bride prices. We know what that upper limit was: 50 shekels of silver. I call this compulsory maximum the formal bride price, in contrast to the normal or negotiated bride price, in which the state was not involved. It is specified in Deuteronomy 22:28–29:

If a man find a damsel that is a virgin, which is not betrothed, and lay hold on her, and lie with her, and they be found; then the man that lay with her shall give unto the damsel's father fifty shekels of silver, and she shall be his wife; because he hath humbled her, he may not put her away all his days.

The formal bride price of 50 shekels of silver specified here was far higher than the common dowry in Israel. This was a great deal of money. It was not required of every suitor. The Old Testament did not establish a fixed price so high that only a few women could have become wives, with most of them being forced by a government-imposed price floor to settle for status as concubines (wives without dowries) instead. What the Mosaic law did was to establish a penalty price so high that it discouraged seduction. It also discouraged false accusations of whoredom.

The threat of the imposition of the formal bride price was designed to restrain the present-orientation of the couple – in this case, the lure of instant sexual gratification. The bride price jumped automatically to 50 shekels of silver in such instances. This economic threat forced marriage arrangements into specific patterns as family-authorized covenants, with the parents and older brothers of the girl as the agents with primary authority to inaugurate or veto her decision. This threat also forced irresponsible, short-sighted young men to save for the future, to develop good character traits. The normal bride price was a covenantal screening instrument; the formal bride price was a covenantal disciplining instrument.

The seducer placed himself outside the normal competitive position of a suitor. He was in no legal position to bargain effectively with the girl's father. Shechem pleaded: "Ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me: but give me the damsel to wife" (Gen 34:12). The father of a seduced girl was in a position to demand up to 50 shekels of silver from the young man, which probably would have involved many years of servitude on his part, unless his family was rich. The seducer could even be required to pay her father the 50 shekels of silver, and then not be allowed to marry the girl.

D. Establishing the Formal Bride Price

Rabbinical commentators agree that it was 50 shekels of silver, although they do not always precisely explain their line of reasoning. They connect this passage to Deuteronomy 22:19.⁹ This passage provides rules for penalizing a bridegroom who falsely accuses his new bride of not being a virgin. A new husband in Mosaic Israel who falsely accused his new wife of not being a virgin at the time of marriage was obviously after two things: (1) permanent separation from the girl; and (2) the return of his bride price. He may also have been after an additional penalty payment of 50 shekels from her father. I am assuming here that a bride price had been paid before the marriage; if not, then by his accusation, he was trying to avoid paying it. I believe, however, the bride price was normally paid before the marriage, which is why Jacob worked seven years for Laban before Laban was required to give him Rachel (Gen. 29:18–20).

9. Nachmanides, Exodus, p. 256; Haim H. Cohn, "Sexual Offenses," The Principles of Jewish Law, ed. Menachem Elon (Jerusalem: Keter, [1975?]), col. 485.

1. Why 100 Shekels?

The required penalty owed to the father of a falsely accused girl was 100 shekels of silver (Deut. 22:19). The question then is: Does this provide evidence that confirms my suggestion concerning the size of the original bride price? We know that the Old Testament's authorized penalty payments were double damages, quadruple damages (a slaughtered sheep),¹⁰ and quintuple damages (a slaughtered ox). In this case, double damages were required. Half of a hundred is 50. Why 50 shekels? Because this was the maximum bride price that could be imposed by law. We must think through the issue with 50 shekels as the starting point.

Notice that the girl was executed if she was convicted, but her bridegroom was not executed if she was exonerated. This seems to be opposed to the principle of Deuteronomy 19:15–21, which states that the false witness must suffer the penalty that the falsely accused person would have suffered if convicted.¹¹ Instead, the seducer paid a heavy penalty to her father. All he owed his bride was a lifetime guarantee of no divorce. What he owed her father, however, was a lifetime of servitude, unless he was very rich. He became a slave to her father twice over, for the formal price of the lifetime slave for purposes of making a sanctuary vow was 50 shekels of silver (Lev. 27:3).

This is the only instance in the Bible of a false witness who is not subject to an equal penalty, as required by Deuteronomy 19:16. The falsely accused bride was to receive lifetime economic support from him rather than making her a divorcé by means of his execution. This exception to Deuteronomy 19:16 may be because of the difficulty in proving for certain either that she had or had not lost her physical evidence of virginity by some means other than copulation. The circumstantial nature of the required evidence—"tokens of virginity"—reduced the penalty for the false accuser, but it also made it possible for the wife to escape the death penalty if she had not broken her hymen during a previous sexual liaison. The threat of the death penalty was great; a bride who suspected that the "tokens" would not appear would have warned the bridegroom in advance, and this could have led to his offering her father a reduced bride price, because he could not be sure of her explanation affirming her virginity. This reduced bride price would then have served as a substitute for her lack of the "tokens."

10. David insisted on the four-fold restitution payment when he heard Nathan's story, but in this case, the "ewe" was another man's wife (II Sam. 12:6). His "slaughter" of Bathsheba was the result of their adultery, not his seduction of a virgin as an unmarried man.

11. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

But if he owed his father-in-law 100 shekels, then in some way the father-in-law would have owed him 50 shekels if the accusation had been confirmed by the court. The text does not say this, but it is implied by the double restitution provisions of the case laws. We need to search for an implied theft of 50 shekels from the bridegroom on the part of the father-in-law, had the girl been guilty as charged.

2. Defrauding the Bridegroom

Let us assume that the bridegroom's accusation was accurate: she had not been a virgin at the time of marriage. The father-in-law was entitled only to one bride price per vow and marriage; whether collected by him or voluntarily forfeited, it could not be collected a second time, unless the girl was a widow, and the bridegroom agreed to pay it. (Because a widow would bring her original dowry into the subsequent marriage, she was not legally a concubine.) This payment was the formal bride price. The second man had owed her father nothing. By collecting a normal bride price from him, her father had cheated him.

Her father could have collected up to 50 shekels from the original seducer, but he failed to do so, either through ignorance of her condition, or through misplaced pity for the seducer, or through fear of the seducer's family, or because he knew that his daughter was promiscuous and not truly entitled to the first discovered seducer's bride price. In the last case, he had willfully allowed whoredom in his house, or, if he really had not known about it, then the daughter had to pay the maximum penalty for her deliberate concealment: execution. In any case, the bridegroom would have been entitled to the return of his bride price. The text is silent about this, but it is implied; if this were not the case, then the father-in-law would have profited from his daughter's whoredom at the expense of the injured party, the bridegroom. Biblical law does not subsidize evil. It protects the innocent.

If the bridegroom had been informed of the girl's loss of virginity, then he would not have paid her father a bride price. The bride price would have already been paid by the seducer, even though her father had not consented to their marriage. I am arguing that the bride price owed to the father by the seducer was 50 shekels, the settlement price of a lifetime male slave in formal judicial disputes (Lev. 27:3).¹² This compulsory bride price should have been passed on to the daughter as her dowry, but passed on in a specific formal way, as I discuss below: first to the bridegroom, then back to her father, and then to the girl. If her father had not collected the money from the seducer, assuming that he knew of the seduction, he nevertheless owed a dowry to the daughter; otherwise, she would become a concubine. Without a dowry from her father, she was a concubine, yet only her father could pay for it this time; no subsequent bridegroom could be asked to pay a second bride price for a non-virgin non-widow.

The bridegroom had been forced to pay a bride price to the girl's father. Her father had either kept the 50 shekels that had been paid to him by the seducer, thereby making his daughter a concubine, or, if he had not collected the 50 shekels, he then owed the 50-shekel dowry out of his own assets. Again, the bridegroom had believed he was marrying a free woman who was bringing a dowry to the marriage, not a concubine. He was not legally required to pay the bride price because of her status as a non-virgin, so the father must have been required to pay it. Her father had not paid it. The bridegroom paid a bride price. This constituted fraud. Although the actual fraud involved whatever his negotiated bride price payment had been, for judicial settlement purposes, the fraud was assumed to be the maximum required formal bride price, and therefore the required dowry, of 50 shekels.

3. How Much Had He Actually Paid?

I am assuming for the sake of argument that the bridegroom was in fact the victim of a conspiracy between the girl and her family, or else at least the victim of the girl, who had kept her status a secret from her father. After the marriage, the bridegroom then decided to get rid of the wife on the official grounds that she was not a virgin. He had not been informed of her status. How could he prove this? Because he had paid the bride price, which would not have been required of him in the case of a non-virgin; her seducer should have provided the bride price. Her father had not delivered the required 50 shekels to her as her dowry; he had delivered only the bride price unjustly collected from the bridegroom. If the bridegroom could prove that he had been defrauded by the girl, or by her and her father, he could get back his bride price that had been unjustly extracted from him.

12. An exception: the owner of a slave killed by a goring ox always was reimbursed by payment of 30 shekels of silver (Ex. 21:32).

He had paid something for the girl, but probably not 50 shekels of silver. Why would the court not have returned whatever bride price he had paid? What has precisely 50 shekels got to do with it? The bridegroom was saying in effect that 50 shekels should have been given to him by her father as a ritual sign of her family's dependence on his merciful willingness to marry a non-virgin. There was mutual subordination involved, so her father should have provided this bride price to the bridegroom, and then the bridegroom would have ritually returned it to her father. Just as the bride price was a ritual sign of his subordination to the father-in-law, so was the father-in-law's provision of a bride price to the bridegroom a ritual sign of his dependence on the bridegroom. It was a sign that her father was in no position to bargain under such circumstances, because of his daughter's defiled status. But her father had been unwilling to pay him the 50 shekels that would have served as his bride price payment, so that the bridegroom could in turn pay the 50 to the father, who would then endow the daughter. The symbolism of the bridegroom's dependence was basic to the bride price-dowry transaction. Even without the formal double transaction, the father's payment of the daughter's dowry was implicitly a form of his dependence on the bridegroom. I believe that the double formal transaction would have been carried out, as a public manifestation of the daughter's lack of virginity. Such a formal public transaction would have secured her from future prosecution by her husband.

The bridegroom was saying that he had never been informed of the girl's covenantal status. Her father had treated him unjustly, defrauding him of whatever bride price he had been asked to pay. Thus, from a strictly economic standpoint, her father owed him at least the return of the original bride price that he had paid. Her father may also have owed the 50 shekels that should have been given to him by the seducer. The text does not say this, and I may be reading too much into it. It may be that the death of the daughter was regarded by the court as a sufficient penalty on her family. The death of the daughter may have replaced the implicit 50-shekel payment owed by the father. The father lost his daughter forever, and the bridegroom regained his original bride price payment.

What is clear is that in these formal judicial proceedings, the court was implicitly using 50 shekels as the formal penalty that would have been implicitly or actually owed to the bridegroom if the wife had been convicted. Why? Because the payment owed to the father by the original seducer was 50 shekels, the judicial price of an adult male slave.

4. Restitution: Double or Triple?

If the bridegroom lost the case, he was required to pay to the father-in-law the formal restitution penalty of the 50 shekels he had sought to collect through divorce by execution, plus another 50 shekels as a penalty. The court recognized the bridegroom as someone involved in intent to defraud the girl's father, whose reputation (and possibly 50 shekels) was at stake.

Thus, I conclude that the penalty payment from the false accuser was directly related to the compulsory formal bride price of the seducer. The new husband had accused his father-in-law of having cheated him out of the bride price. He never legally owed it, he insisted, yet his father-in-law had taken it. The court denied his accusation, so he was then forced to pay 100 shekels to his father-in-law.

The bridegroom had paid a negotiated bride price to the girl's father. Her father had transferred all or a part of this to her as her dowry. She was now formally accused by her husband of being a whore. If she was convicted, her father would probably have been forced to pay the bridegroom the formal (50-shekel) bride price; the bridegroom would also have kept her dowry, as her lawful heir after her execution. If she was declared innocent, the bridegroom owed double restitution to the father-in-law: twice the amount of the formal bride price that the father-in-law would have owed to him upon her conviction. The wife of course kept her dowry.

To repeat: because the court's decision in this example went against the bridegroom, he had to pay the father 100 shekels of silver, meaning that he returned the maximum bride price of 50 shekels, plus an additional 50—double restitution. Furthermore, he could never divorce her in the future (Deut. 22:19), except by her public execution for a capital crime. This indicates that the maximum formal bride price was 50 shekels of silver. It also indicates that any husband bringing such an accusation against his bride believed that he had a good case. His wife and father-in-law did not possess the required tokens of virginity, and he imagined that the court would uphold him.¹³

13. If corrupt, the father-in-law might have faked the blood stains on the cloth. To prevent this, the bridegroom would normally have insisted on a formal presentation in the presence of some authority. In case of his suspicion regarding his new wife, the young man would have had to complain immediately to the authorities. He would

This indicates that for purposes of establishing public restitution payments, a very high initial bride price would have been established by law. Once the dispute became a matter of public decision by the court, the formal penalties became very high. In this case, a price of 50 shekels was assumed as binding.

5. A Very Costly Penalty

We know that the price for an adult woman to be brought into a priestly family through adoption was 30 shekels (Lev. 27:4). What does 50 shekels have to do with 30? Nothing. If, as I argue, the 100 shekels constituted double restitution, then restitution must have been 50 shekels: the judicial bride price. It was the adult male who paid the entry price of 50 shekels (Lev. 27:3). This was the entry price for a man's lifetime of service to God and tithe income from the Levites as a priest. It was set this high in order to serve as a major barrier to entry, thereby keeping men with a welfare mentality out of the priesthood.

We begin to understand the magnitude of the penalty for seduction. The seducer could be required to pay the girl's father 50 shekels of silver. This would have constituted a judicial sentence of potentially lifetime bondservice against him. It was the sort of sentence handed down to major thieves with a lifetime of restitution payments to make to victims.

It was very risky for a bridegroom to accuse his new bride of non-virginity. His false accusation was a crime. The magnitude of the penalty payment was enormous: double what it cost to be adopted into the priesthood.¹⁴ He had to pay 100 shekels of silver as double restitution to his father-in-law, the equivalent of two lifetimes of priestly service. Few young men could have afforded this. To come up with that kind of money, he would have had to sell himself into servitude as a criminal—presumably lifetime servitude. Out of mercy, his father-in-law might have accepted a lifetime of service from him as payment of the 100 shekels. The young man would have lost his position as an independent head of household. His wife would have gone with him into servitude. She had subordinated herself covenantally to a man who had have had to keep his wife under close surveillance, to keep her from faking the tokens and presenting them to the authorities. On the other hand, a corrupt husband might have tried to destroy the evidence that defended her. Thus, it would have become a formal public matter the day after the wedding, under public supervision.

14. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 36:D.

poor judgment, and she could not escape the consequences of her decision. She had subordinated herself covenantally to a man who had poor judgment, and she could not escape the consequences of her decision. It paid girls to judge accurately the character of prospective husbands before the marriage took place.

6. Purchasing Power

What was the value of 50 shekels of silver? We cannot know for sure, because at different times in the ancient world, silver's value would have fluctuated, just as it fluctuates today. We know that the atonement money paid by Israelite adult males when they were numbered for military service was half a shekel (Ex. 30:16).¹⁵ If this was half a shekel of silver, then the judicial bride payment was a hundred times this large. An ox that killed another person's bondservant brought a payment of 30 shekels of silver to the owner of the servant (Ex. 21:32). As I have already mentioned, an adult male's entry price into the priesthood was 50 shekels (Lev. 27:3). This was the price of priestly servitude to God.¹⁶ We know that the ownership of slaves was sufficiently expensive so that very few families could afford them in the ancient world.¹⁷

The price of 20 shekels of silver for a male adoptee under age 20 (Lev. 27:5) corresponds with the 20 shekels paid to Joseph's brothers by the caravan that bought Joseph (Gen. 37:28). This indicates a remarkably stable monetary system throughout the Middle East, from Joseph's day at least until the giving of the Mosaic law over two centuries later.¹⁸ Mendelsohn provided slave prices in the surrounding cultures, and these are reasonably commensurate with the prices listed in Leviticus 27.¹⁹ The purchase of a slave gained the buyer the net return from a lifetime of service from a slave. We are not talking about merely a Hebrew's seven-year term of service, for the caravan bought

15. Chapter 62. Cf. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), Appendix D. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

16. When I wrote the first edition of Tools of Dominion, I did not understand that Leviticus 27:1–5 was a system of priestly adoption entry prices. I came to this conclusion as a result of my work on Leviticus. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 36. These prices constituted priestly servitude, not servitude as such.

17. Isaac Mendelsohn, Slavery In the Ancient Near East (New York: Oxford University Press, 1949), pp. 119–21.

18. Appendix A: "The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology."

19. Mendelsohn, Slavery In the Ancient Near East, pp. 117–18.

Joseph for resale into permanent servitude. Thirty shekels of silver must have been a lot of money; 50 shekels was that much more.²⁰

E. Lifetime Servitude

Would the seducer have come under the provisions of the debt-release provisions of the sabbatical year (Deut. 15)? Probably not. If these sabbatical year provisions had applied to this crime, they would have subsidized seductions in the years immediately preceding a year of release by lowering their financial risk. To avoid this implicit subsidy of sin, the young man would probably have been regarded by the court as the equivalent of a thief who had to make full restitution to his victims, even if it meant lifetime servitude. He could not escape the payment of the bride price.

In effect, the young man would have come under his father-in-law's jurisdiction for many years. This would have been an appropriate form of judgment for his having lured the girl into making a covenant vow autonomously. They would both be brought under the jurisdiction of the girl's father as a punishment, but also as a way to bring them greater respect for his authority in the future.²¹

All or most of the bride price eventually came to the daughter, and from her to her children. It was her protection against an incompetent husband. It was administered on her behalf by her father. It was held in trust by him in her name, unless he delivered it to her at the time of her marriage as her dowry. In this case, her father would have collected the bride price, year by year, in the form of wages from the son-in-law, unless the son-in-law sold himself into bondage to another buyer, with the money going to his father-in-law. If he sold himself to his father-in-law, this would have built up his heirs' capital indirectly. He would learn future-orientation (deferred gratification) the hard way.

20. There is a hidden danger in one account of a purchase in the Old Testament, David's apparent purchase, for 50 shekels of silver, of the threshing floor that later became the site of the temple (II Sam. 24:24). This was a very desirable location on a mountain top in the midst of the capital city of the nation. How could he have purchased this for the price of a slave? The answer is that he actually paid 600 shekels of gold (I Chron. 21:25). The 50 shekels probably bought only the oxen used in the sacrifice.

21. United States Senator Daniel Moynihan (New York) proposed a sweeping reform of the national welfare system. One of these reforms would make mandatory that unmarried parents under the age of 18 years old be required to live with their own parents, or in a foster home or a maternity home, if they receive welfare payments. The system presently encourages a teenage mother to move away from her home by paying her more money if she moves out. Suzanne Fields, "Welfare Reincarnate: Seeking new life for a gasping system," Washington Times (July 28, 1987), Sect. D, p. 1.

Thus, the risk of seducing a virgin was very great, even if the father accepted the seducer as a son-in-law. Seduction had tremendously negative consequences. There were heavy economic sanctions against seduction. The worst sanction, however, was a father's refusal to allow her to marry him. He would still have to pay the bride price. The girl's father could extract the full penalty, up to 50 shekels of silver. If the father was vindictive, or if he believed that the young man was morally corrupt or an economic incompetent, he could choose to get him away from his daughter by selling him into lifetime slavery. Then the young man could marry only at the discretion of his new master. If kept by the girl's father, he faced the prospect of a life without a wife, if the man was vindictive and refused to provide a wife for him.

All this risk for a few moments of unauthorized ecstasy. Unauthorized ecstasy carried a high price under the Old Covenant.

1. The Seducer's Legal Right to Pay

The fundamental legal principles of this case law are still in force. Consider this law's implications. The seducer was not entitled to the girl, but he was entitled (and required) to pay her father. Being "entitled to pay" the equivalent of a large fine may seem a peculiar way to describe his legal position, but the right of payment was important to the judicial standing of the seducer. If he was to be regarded by God and the community as one who stands behind his vows, he had to be allowed to pay the formal bride price. Otherwise, it would seem to the community that he was a man who willingly visited prostitutes (promiscuous women). Such evil men prefer paying token fees for sexual favors rather than paying a large bride price once.

The implicit vow of the seducer was not rendered null and void just because the girl's father denied her permission to marry him. He was required by God to consummate his vow, not in marriage, but through the payment of the formal bride price to the father. The adult male, as the initiator of the vow, had to fulfill its terms. In this case, any male old enough to seduce a woman was considered an adult whose vow was binding.

If he had not been required to pay her father, it would then have appeared as though her father had no legal ground to collect the formal bride price, meaning that he recognized that his daughter was a whore, and also that he had been implicitly or explicitly consenting to the fact. A whore is not simply a woman who charges money for sexual favors. A whore is anyone who experiences sex outside of marriage, except the first time through an implicit vow, which is then consummated either in marriage or the payment of the formal bride price. If her father knew that she was no longer a virgin, and still consented to her repeated contacts, he was thereby identifying his own household as a house of prostitution.

How would a young man who fornicates with a non-virgin, believing her to be a virgin, subsequently defend himself against compulsory marriage to a promiscuous woman if she then goes to her father and claims that this young man is her first seducer? He is very nearly defenseless judicially. To escape marrying her, he must either prove in court that she is promiscuous or else pay the 50 shekels to her father and hope that he refuses to allow the marriage. How can he prove that she is a promiscuous woman? Only by identifying a previous seducer. This would probably be very difficult without the earlier consort's willingness to identify himself voluntarily. What would be another man's incentive to admit this? Only to satisfy his sense of righteousness—a moral sense that previous fornicators might not possess in abundance. While her father could no longer compel any man to marry her, because she would be publicly identified as promiscuous, the confessed seducer would lose his reputation. Furthermore, had he been a married man at the time of the seduction, his wife could legally insist on his execution. Thus, seducing a presumed virgin was a highly risky activity in Old Covenant Israel: a man could wind up in debt servitude, married to a retired whore.

Could the average young man have afforded a bride price of 50 shekels of silver? Only by selling himself into lifetime service to someone. This is the amount of money appropriate to the purchase of a criminal who was being sold into lifetime servitude in order to raise enough money to repay his victims. Obviously, it was not the intention of God to force each bridegroom into slavery in order to marry. Thus, the 50-shekel payment indicates an extreme.

Why would this penalty be imposed? Because the young man unilaterally arrogated to himself the right to lure her into making a vow that only her father could rightfully sanction. He acted as her advisor, as if he possessed the authority of her father. Thus, he becomes responsible for paying the bride price that may serve as her future dowry for marriage to another man. He acted in place of her father; he now pays her dowry in place of her father.

F. The Bridegroom's Covenant Lawsuit

The girl now is no longer a virgin. In a God-honoring society, any future suitor would have to be informed of this fact before a betrothal. If the marriage takes place, she will be discovered by the bridegroom not to be a virgin. If he has not been informed of her status, he can break the marriage through divorce, including divorce by execution, “because she hath wrought folly in Israel, to play the whore in her father’s house” (Deut. 22:21). He does not have to have her executed, for Joseph decided to put Mary away quietly for her perceived unfaithfulness (Matt. 1:19), but in a biblical commonwealth, the bridegroom would have the legal option of requiring her death. He would not know if the violation had taken place after the betrothal unless he had been informed of her condition before the betrothal.

1. The Two Victims

Notice that the law in Deuteronomy does not say that she has sinned against the bridegroom, although he surely had been deceived. He had paid the bride price to her father, yet she had implicitly taken a vow to another. The Bible says that she has sinned against her father and against Israel, the priestly nation. Then why does the bridegroom bring formal charges against her? Because the bridegroom has become the lawful covenantal agent of Israel and her father.

The bridegroom is the only one who can legally discover her lack of biological evidence attesting to her own virginity.²² If he does not present the biological tokens of her virginity to her father or an agent of civil or church government, then her father cannot subsequently prove that his daughter had not played the whore under his household administration.²³ Her father is therefore legally powerless to defend

22. Today, a gynecologist could also legally discover this. This raises the legal question of the authority of the physician to remain silent. Biblically, the daughter who is still living at home is not an independent legal agent. An unmarried daughter living at home is under her father's covenantal administration. The physician's contractual obligation to provide information is with her father, not with her. Thus, biblically speaking, the physician has an obligation to inform her father of the lack of evidence of her virginity, including her pregnancy. This principle also governs the covenantal obligation of anyone dispensing contraceptives to an unmarried male or female minor to receive written permission from the head of household first.

23. If her lack of physical evidence for her virginity was the result of something other than previous sexual intercourse, then she would have to inform her father, who would in turn warn the prospective bridegroom before the betrothal, and get from him a signed statement or other suitable courtroom evidence of his acceptance of this ex-her life. In fact, only by remaining silent can he demonstrate publicly that his household is free from the bridegroom's accusation of whoredom, and that he is not a pimp. The bridegroom is the covenantal agent of the holy community and also the covenantal agent of a righteous father's household. His public accusation allows her father to preserve his family's good name by implicitly supporting his charge by not coming to her defense. He has replaced her father as the covenantal head over her. He brings a covenant lawsuit against her as a whore in the name of her father and the priestly nation.

2. Jesus Christ, the Bridegroom

Biblically speaking, Jesus Christ brought a covenantal lawsuit when He charged Israel with spiritual whoredom. He was Israel's divine Bridegroom, sanctioned by Israel's Father, yet He caught Israel worshipping false gods. He publicly called the rulers of Israel "sons of your father, the devil" (John 8:44).

Whoredom had been Israel's problem from the beginning, which the entire Book of Hosea was written to illustrate, and which Ezekiel 16 was devoted to explaining. In God's eyes, as Israel's Father, His daughter was deserving of death as a whore. But Jesus Christ came to pay the bride price for all mankind, including Israel. He paid it to God the Father, as required. This restored God's reputation among His enemies as the cosmic Judge.²⁴ Without this payment, God's authority as cosmic Judge would have been compromised, for He would be viewed as a God who cannot bring His word to pass in history. He would be viewed as a Father who cannot control the actions of his promiscuous or adulterous daughter. His only other option would have been to bring His daughter to the authorities for burning, as the fornicating daughter of a priest (Lev. 21:9). This is what God did with national Israel in 70 A.D.

Israel needed the payment of this bride price by the Bridegroom in order to be married. Without His acceptance of her, He could have had her executed. The period from Christ's resurrection to the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. was the period in which Israel could accept this bride price, and covenant with Jesus. But to do this, Israel had to align planation in lieu of the physical tokens.

24. The family name of God is always the key motivation in God's decision to bring judgment. Moses appealed to God to spare the Hebrews by appealing to God's reputation among His enemies (Ex. 32:11–14). Nathan reminded David that his adultery and murder had given the enemies of God a cause to blaspheme (II Sam. 12:14).

herself with the gentile church, the new bride of Christ. This implication is what the Jews and the Judaizers in the church resisted.

It was clear what it meant if the church really is God's new bride. If Jesus was the true Bridegroom, and if Israel was truly promiscuous and in need of acceptance by the Bridegroom, then Old Covenant Israel was about to be publicly burned by God. Jesus had identified Israel as a whore, a spiritual adulteress. Israel was doomed to certain death. The daughter of a priest was under special restraints.

It is quite likely that the Judaizers who kept infiltrating the early church understood what was coming. If Israel was truly required to covenant with Christ, becoming His bride through church membership, then it meant that the old bride, Old Covenant Israel, would be cut off by divorce, making the consummation of Christ with His new bride legitimate. God would consummate His marriage with the church, the new wife, through divorce by execution. Thus, the Judaizers worked hard to bring the gentiles under the covenantal signs of the older covenant. The gentiles had to be made members of the Jewish bride. Not to do so would have been to admit that covenantal judgment was coming to the nation of Israel.

Israel's destruction can be viewed symbolically in several ways: first, as God the Father's burning of her as the promiscuous daughter of a priest; second, as Jesus Christ's successful prosecution of her as the Bridegroom of a non-virgin bride; third, as God's adulterous bride (Hosea). The Father would have burned her, but He offered her one last possibility: marriage to the Bridegroom who knew of her fornication, but who was willing to pay the bride price, as if she were righteous. When Israel rejected this offer of marriage, God the Father had His Son serve as the instrument of His wrath. Israel was publicly burned. Fire from heaven is what was poured forth symbolically on Israel in 70 A.D., the comprehensive judgment of God.²⁵

The Bridegroom, in His mercy, still has left alive a remnant of the old bride: genetic Israel. He offers full covenantal restoration to fallen Israel, and He promises to bring her into union with Him when the fullness of the gentiles has come (Rom. 11).²⁶ But Israel will come in only as part of the church, not as a separate body. God publicly divorced Israel by execution in 70 A.D. Once a covenantally valid divorce

25. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

26. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 7.

has taken place, and one partner has remarried, there can never be a remarriage between the lawfully divorced partners (Deut. 24:4). Genetic-covenantal Israel as genetic-covenantal Israel can never again become God's bride. Only by joining new covenant Israel can genetic-covenantal Israel be reunited in marriage to God.²⁷

G. New Testament Applications

I already explained how the principle of the bride price and dowry could apply in New Testament times.²⁸ What about the possible applications of the laws regarding seduction? Are they still mandatory in New Testament times? If so, have they been modified in any way?

1. Dowries

What would be the equivalent of the mandatory bride price for seducers? It would be at least the economic equivalent of a girl's dowry from her father. Most Western nations have abandoned formal dowries, but the principle of endowing a daughter is still recognized. Instead of jewelry or land, a daughter receives an expensive formal education and a wedding paid for by her parents. Friends bring presents to the wedding, but parents pay for it.

The Old Testament principle was far better: the bridegroom paid the father, who then either paid the daughter in capital goods (not presents), or else he held the assets for her and the grandchildren.

The collections of laws from the ancient Near East devoted considerable space to discussing dowries and obligations. Hammurabi's Code from paragraph 128 through 184 deals with dowries, the longest section in the Code.²⁹ These rules were generally well thought-out and sensible. Examples: "If, when a seignior acquired a wife, she bore him children and that woman has then gone to (her) fate, her father may not lay claim to her dowry, since her dowry belongs to her children" (paragraph 162). All right, what if she died, leaving no children? Should the son-in-law inherit the dowry? That depends on who keeps

27. This line of argumentation based on Deuteronomy 24:4 rejects the teaching of dispensationalism that the ritual signs and symbols of the Old Covenant will be the basis of membership in the New Covenant during a future millennium. This is the underlying theology of the Judaizers.

28. Chapter 3.

29. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the New Testament, ed. James B. Pritchard, 3rd ed. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969), pp. 171–74.

the bride price. “If a seignior acquired a wife and that woman has gone to (her) fate without providing him with children, if his father-in-law has then returned to him the marriage-price which that seignior brought to the house of his father-in-law, her husband may not lay claim to the dowry of that woman, because her dowry belongs to her father’s house. If his father-in-law has not returned the marriage-price to him, he shall deduct the full amount of her marriage-price from her dowry and return (the rest of) her dowry to her father’s house” (paragraphs 163–64). It was all spelled out in advance. Each party knew where he stood.

2. The Absence of Monetary Specifics

In the Old Testament era, 50 shekels of silver was a great deal of money, the vow price of an adult male slave (Lev. 27:3). Today, because of the vast increase in mining, 50 one-ounce silver coins are not worth much: the equivalent of two months’ wages in a low-age job in the United States. Thus, the imposition of a 50-shekel bride payment would not be meaningful in an advanced society.

What is the basis for arguing that in principle, the obligation of the bride price is still in force, yet the specific penalty is no longer in force? Can the spirit of the law be maintained while violating the Old Testament letter of the law? If so, on what basis?

With the death in 70 A.D. of national Israel, the harlot daughter and harlot wife, God removed the specific monetary penalties attached to the land. Christ’s payment fulfilled the specific terms of the law, as did the death of the law-breaker, national Israel. Penalties that involve physical pain (whipping, for example), or the loss of life (capital punishment), or percentages forfeited (proportional restitution) retain their permanent character as punishments to be avoided irrespective of time or place. This is comparable to the principle of the tithe: the required percentage remains constant, but the currency unit is not specified by biblical law.

On the other hand, punishments that were tied to Israel’s land and the nation’s historical role are no longer binding, such as specific money prices for a slave gored by an ox, or the bride price, or the military atonement price (the erroneously named “head tax”),³⁰ or the sacrifices of specific animals for specific transgressions, or specific ritual washings. The common latrine in a military camp is now the technical substitute for going outside the camp and using a personal spade to dig an individual hole (Deut. 23:13).

30. Chapter 62.

The Old Testament, unlike the law collections of contemporary nations, did not impose many specific monetary fines. There were also no price controls in Israel, unlike the laws of Eshnunna, which is basically a listing of fixed prices for goods, services, and fines,³¹ or Hammurabi's Babylon,³² or the Hittites.³³ Thus, with very few exceptions, the Mosaic law avoided detailed monetary penalties. It did not presume to interfere with competitive bargaining. Only in a handful of instances were specific prices mentioned, and these were in the context of ritual payments to the temple and restitution payments to victims. Percentages, not specific amounts of metal, were the rule for imposing punishments. This makes it more difficult to understand in retrospect the magnitude of a handful of specified monetary penalties, but it also made it possible for biblical law to stand without revision until 70 A.D.

3. Modern Equivalents

Let us consider what the ideal situation would be, when enforced by family, church, and civil authorities. A man seduces an unmarried woman. They immediately go to her father and admit their physical bond. He then decides whether to allow the marriage. If he is willing to listen to the man, he demands a bride price, probably high. The man has no choice in the matter. He may have to sell everything he has, or even accept bondservice to the father for a period of time. The civil government would enforce the father's decision. The father retains the option of denying them the right to marry. If he is supported in this decision by church and state—which would be normal—he can impose on the man the equivalent of her dowry.

What is the modern dowry? A monetary payment equivalent of a college education or other formal training, plus the cost of a wedding. This would probably involve the equivalent of many years of net income, after minimal support for himself. If the girl had received no advanced education, he would pay for it. If she had been sent to private high school and college by her father, the father would be reimbursed for the expenses, plus interest from the time of the seduction until final payment. The seducer would pay for her dowry.

31. Ancient Near Eastern Texts, pp. 161–63.

32. Ibid., pp. 167–77: paragraphs 17, 24, 51, 88, 90, 111, 114, 116, 121, 156, 203–4, 207–9, 211–17, 220–24, 228, 234, 239, 241–43, 251–52, 257–61, 268–77. End of text: 282.

33. Ibid., 189–97: paragraphs 4–18, 20, 22–25, 26(B), 42, 77–78, 81–89, 91–97, 101–5, 107–9, 119–48, 150–62, 164–65, 167–68, 170, 172, 177–86 (extremely detailed price controls), 200. End of text: 200.

The next potential bridegroom could not be asked to pay something. She has become a liability. In a God-honoring society, her lack of virginity would be an initial liability, depending on the circumstances of her rebellion. A righteous young man would fear a flaw in her moral character. But if she brings skills and money into the marriage, plus several years of righteous behavior, he may be willing to consider her.

In our day, all this sounds very old fashioned, even archaic. These days, so does chastity. This marks the moral decline of the West, not its moral maturity. With Christ's payment behind us, all sins can be covered in each person's experience, but this does not obliterate the need for visible evidence of progressive sanctification. The words of moral warning of the father to his son in the first nine chapters of Proverbs are still valid.

Conclusion

This case law indirectly brings up the threat of slavery. This is the integrating theme of the case laws of Exodus 21–23. The penalties of public sinning are always of such magnitude that flagrant public sinning could and probably would involve a return to slavery for most publicly condemned sinners. This, of course, is the central message of the Book of Exodus: God delivers His covenant people from slavery, but He threatens them with a return to slavery if they should continue to break His covenant. Ultimately, He threatens them with public execution.

The bride price paid to the father by the seducer is a classic example of this return to slavery. The short-run perspective of the seducer is essentially the time perspective of Satan and his followers: a few moments of ecstasy in defying God, and eternity in bondage to repay Him. These forbidden moments of ecstasy began in the garden and will end at the final judgment.

In the Old Covenant era, the seducer might be allowed to become a righteous husband, but only at the discretion of the seduced girl's father. He became a righteous husband—with or without a bride—through the public payment of a very high bride price. The maximum of 50 shekels of silver points to a lifetime of bondservice to repay. If the father allowed the marriage, the heirs of the sinner would inherit, but he himself paid the price. Wealth was transferred from the older generation to the younger.

This was Israel's lesson in the wilderness. The fathers were still mental and moral slaves. They rejected God when they tried to stone Joshua and Caleb (Num. 14:10). They were forced to wander in the wilderness until their children could inherit the land. Even Joshua and Caleb suffered, just as Jacob had suffered at the hand of Laban, for the unrighteousness and cowardice of their covenantal peers. They had to wait for an extra generation before they could enter the land. God extracted the bride price from that seducing and adulterous generation, so that their heirs might inherit it. God gave them sufficient capital to raise the next generation, and then they died in the wilderness. Delivered by God's grace from Egyptian slavery, they nevertheless remained in lifetime bondservice to God in the wilderness.

The New Testament standard is analogous, not identical. The land of Israel has lost its covenantal relevance. The price of silver has changed. But the judicial principle has remained the same: the seducer must pay for the bride's dowry, whether her father allows the couple to marry or not. The civil government is supposed to enforce this penalty. Seduction is not to be indirectly subsidized by the removal of negative economic sanctions.

OPPRESSION, OMNISCIENCE, AND JUDGMENT

Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt. Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child. If thou afflict them in anywise [any way], and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; and my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless (Ex. 22:21–24).

The theocentric principle here is the office of God as the kinsman-redeemer, and therefore the blood avenger (the same office): the ga'al. “Speak unto the children of Israel, When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the LORD, and that person be guilty; Then they shall confess their sin which they have done: and he shall recompense his trespass with the principal thereof, and add unto it the fifth part thereof, and give it unto him against whom he hath trespassed. But if the man have no kinsman to recompense the trespass unto, let the trespass be recompensed unto the LORD, even to the priest; beside the ram of the atonement, whereby an atonement shall be made for him” (Num. 5:6–8). In lieu of a family kinsman-redeemer, God serves in this office.

A. Protecting the Vulnerable Members of Society

God protects the vulnerable members of His covenant family when they have no one to act in their behalf. So should we. Men’s treatment of the helpless reflects their willingness or unwillingness to serve as representatives of God in His capacity as the defender of the oppressed. How men treat other people indicates their attitude toward God, for man is made in God’s image. How they treat others tells God how He would be treated by them if they got the opportunity. Speaking of the final day of Judgment, Jesus said:

Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me (Matt. 25:34–40).

If one's protection of the weak testifies to one's willingness to honor God, then God in turn will protect those who offer protection. Men are weak in the sight of God. They need His protection. How they treat the weak in history will determine how God treats them in history. "And he said unto them, Take heed what ye hear: with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you: and unto you that hear shall more be given" (Mark 4:24).

B. Restraint and Protection

Strangers, widows, and orphans: these three representative examples, along with the poor, are seen in the Bible as being especially vulnerable to oppression.¹ "Also thou shalt not oppress a stranger: for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Ex. 23:9). They deserve protection.

1. Faithfulness and Liberty

If the Hebrews remained faithful to God in this matter of dealing with strangers, God promised, they would retain their own civil liberties. If the judges of the land remained so committed to the ethical terms of God's covenant that they would restrain the oppression of strangers, widows, and orphans by fellow Hebrews, then all righteous Hebrews could safely retain confidence in their judges. On the other hand, if a system of bribes or special favors corrupted the judges, and they began to show favor to the interests of Hebrews in their legal disputes with resident aliens, widows, and orphans, then this would be a preliminary manifestation of looming tyranny, domestic and then foreign. “Your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless” (v. 24).

1. Charles F. Fensham, "Widow, Orphan and the Poor in Ancient Near Eastern Legal and Wisdom Literature," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, XXI (1962), pp. 129–39.

Why does God single out the widow, the orphan, and the resident alien? Because they are representative of a general class of people. If we search for the distinguishing characteristic of all three—their representative feature—we find that there is only one: their lack of covenantal representation. It is appropriate that this should be the focus of the law in the Book of Exodus, the premier book in the Bible and in the Pentateuch on hierarchical representation. The widow has no husband; the orphan has no parents; the resident alien has no tribe and no legal status in the assembly. The first two have no family head above them; the third has no ecclesiastical or judicial place in the hierarchy. No earthly agent speaks for the resident alien in the assembly. No one listens to the widow and orphan. No one has a major cultural incentive to protect them.

Nevertheless, they are not covenantally defenseless. Their lack of a covenantal intermediary between them and God does not leave them without judicial recourse. Prayer can bring them before the judgment seat of the King. Their prayers indicate that they honor God in their hearts by subordinating themselves to Him. Prayer testifies to a person’s faith in the hierarchical nature of the universe. God will therefore listen to them. “If thou afflict them in anywise [any way], and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry.” God will protect them. They have honored His sovereignty and His hierarchy through their prayers. In contrast, their oppressors have ignored His revealed law. He will therefore uphold His law. He will intervene, acting on their behalf: “And my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless.” He will bring judgment in history, on the basis of lex talionis: an eye for an eye, a dead husband for the victim’s dead husband, dead parents for the victim’s dead parents. The invisible God of the Bible will intervene in history as their representative agent. He becomes their kinsman-redeemer, and in doing so, He becomes the wicked oppressor’s blood avenger. He cuts off the oppressor’s inheritance. In short, God defends all five points of His covenant.

2. God’s Negative Sanctions in History

God says that Biblical law is to be honored by individuals and their courts above all considerations of race, family, or other personal relationships. Judges are required to uphold its terms without respect to persons. "Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it" (Deut. 1:17).² If for any reason the civil courts should fail to uphold the law, God warned the Israelites, then the nation as a whole would be held responsible for having broken the terms of His covenant. God would bring His negative sanctions against the whole nation.

But if ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments; And if ye shall despise my statutes, or if your soul abhor my judgments, so that ye will not do all my commandments, but that ye break my covenant: I also will do this unto you; I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart: and ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it. And I will set my face against you, and ye shall be slain before your enemies: they that hate you shall reign over you; and ye shall flee when none pursueth you. And if ye will not yet for all this hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins. And I will break the pride of your power; and I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass: And your strength shall be spent in vain: for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruits. And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me; I will bring seven times more plagues upon you according to your sins. I will also send wild beasts among you, which shall rob you of your children, and destroy your cattle, and make you few in number; and your high ways shall be desolate. And if ye will not be reformed by me by these things, but will walk contrary unto me; Then will I also walk contrary unto you, and will punish you yet seven times for your sins. And I will bring a sword upon you, that shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant: and when ye are gathered together within your cities, I will send the pestilence among you; and ye shall be delivered into the hand of the enemy (Lev. 26:14–25).³

The decision to ignore God's law by the civil and priestly representatives of a nation is inescapably a covenantal decision, God has always insisted. Citizens under the judges' authority in ancient Israel were held responsible by God for the injustice of the judges, for they possessed the power to replace the judges for unrighteousness (Ex. 18:21). Furthermore, their long-term public consent to the faithless decisions of Israel's civil magistrates meant that God would hold them responsible as a nation. There could be no lawful appeal to God by any private citizen that "I was only following orders." There could be no successful appeal by the citizens as a covenantal unit that "our leaders did these things against our will." The existence of a covenantal cause-and-effect relationship between the moral character of a nation's rulers and the moral character of a majority of its citizens is why we know that evil, incompetent, and cowardly leaders are a curse brought by God on self-consciously evil citizens. Those who prefer to be ruled by the laws of men rather than the laws of God shall be given their heart's desire: tyranny and high taxes (I Sam. 8).⁴

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 4.

3. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 35.

3. Protection

If the people of Israel oppressed strangers, they could do this only by ignoring God's law. God's Bible-revealed law was designed by God to be the judicial means of civic righteousness throughout history. It was designed to protect men. But in ancient Israel, men soon learned that if they were compelled by the civil government to obey God's law, they could not effectively oppress the stranger, the widow, and the orphan. Yet exploiting these victims proved so profitable in the short run that short-run thinkers decided to abandon God's law. Short-run thinkers always do.⁵ They think that God will not see what they do.

They break in pieces thy people, O LORD, and afflict thine heritage.
They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless. Yet they say, The LORD shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it.
Understand, ye brutish among the people: and ye fools, when will ye be wise?
He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see?
He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? He that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?
(Ps. 94:5–10).

4. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

5. Today, however, a strange transformation has taken place. Humanists and pietists agree: God's revealed law is tyrannical, inherently a source of oppression. They have abandoned God's revealed law in the name of universal principles of "right reason" and "religiously neutral civil justice." Because they view God's revealed law as the source of oppression rather than its cure, they call for the extension of humanist civil law. They cannot seem to understand why oppression multiplied in the twentieth century, but they know what is needed to cure it: more of the same.

The spiritual advisors of every era who come before God's people and tell them not to pay any attention to the specifics of God's revealed law are sure that God will not impose His negative sanctions in history. "Then said I, Ah, Lord GOD! behold, the prophets say unto them, Ye shall not see the sword, neither shall ye have famine; but I will give you assured peace in this place" (Jer. 14:13). They lie. They are the apologists for oppression, the watchmen who are asleep.

C. Evangelism Through Law

The treatment that Hebrew judges displayed officially to the resident alien was the primary civil symbol of the nation's honoring of the terms of God's covenant. The uncircumcised stranger was outside the ecclesiastical covenant, but he was not outside both the restraint and the protection of the civil law. Everyone inside the geographical boundaries of the nation of Israel was bound to the judicial terms of the civil covenant. Each resident was therefore compelled to affirm his subordination to God, not necessarily as a member of God's ritual household, but as one who was nevertheless under God's visible authority.

1. Aliens and the National Covenant

To achieve the comprehensive external blessings of the covenant, aliens were required by God to place themselves inside Israel's geographical and covenantal boundaries. Isaiah predicted that one sign of Israel's covenantal faithfulness would be that the nations would pour into the land to worship at Mt. Zion (Isa. 2:2–3). When this happens, Isaiah said, the Lord will judge the nations and turn swords into ploughshares (Isa. 2:4). This did not mean that every person on earth was to take up permanent residence in tiny Israel. It meant that the borders of Israel were to be extended covenantally to cover the whole earth. The sign of this geographical expansion would be the willingness of the nations to covenant with the God of Israel. They would accept His law and His sacrifices as their own. They would replace their false gods with the God of the Bible. To say that they were not to do this is to say that God's salvation was in principle offered only to the Israelites. It would mean that there was supposed to be no evangelism prior to the ministry of Jesus Christ, no preaching of God's word and the need for repentance outside the geographical boundaries of Palestinian Israel. Does any Christian want to maintain such a view of

1,400 years of biblical religion in Old Testament Israel? (Officially, no; practically, yes.)

How could the gentile nations learn of the wonders of God's judgment and His blessings (Deut. 4:6–8)?⁶ One way would be through the information sent back from fellow countrymen living in Israel. Placing resident aliens under the protection of God's civil law was therefore to be a preliminary stage of international evangelism.

2. Greek Mythology: Justice for All

This was an evangelism program unique to ancient Israel. It was common in the ancient world to regard resident aliens as outside the protection of civil law. This was true even of "enlightened" Greece and Rome.⁷ To be a citizen meant that you had to participate in the religious rites of the city. Only those born into or adopted by families that had been "present at the creation" of the city-state had lawful access to these civil sacrifices; only they were citizens.⁸ This is why exile was so devastating to an ancient citizen; he was permanently cut off from his family's religious rites as well as his city's rites, yet he could not participate in the rites of his new residence. Fustel wrote:

We can easily understand that, for the ancients, God was not everywhere. If they had some vague idea of a God of the universe, this was not the one whom they considered as their providence, and whom they invoked. Every man's gods were those who inhabited his house, his canton, his city. The exile, on leaving his country behind him, also left his gods. He no longer found a religion that could console and protect him; he no longer felt that providence was watching over him; the happiness of praying was taken away. All that could satisfy the needs of his soul was far away.

Now, religion was the source whence flowed civil and political rights. The exile, therefore, lost all this in losing his religion and country. Excluded from the city worship, he saw at the same time his domestic worship taken from him, and was forced to extinguish his hearth-fire. He could no longer hold property; his goods, as if he was dead, passed to his children, unless they were confiscated to the

6. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

7. Numa Denis Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Bk. III, ch. XI, pp. 192–93.

8. Ibid., III:III. Occasionally, citizenship was granted to an individual who had served a city faithfully or to skilled immigrants in times of acute labor shortages, but this was rare.

profit of the gods or of the state. Having no longer a worship, he had no longer a family; he ceased to be a husband and a father. His sons were no longer in his power; his wife was no longer his wife, and might immediately take another husband. . . . It is not surprising that the ancient republics almost all permitted a convict to escape death by flight. Exile did not seem to be a milder punishment than death. The Roman jurists called it capital punishment.⁹

3. Israel Was Different

The unbreakable link between the family's religious rites and the possession of civil rights did not prevail in Israel's holy commonwealth. Adoption was required for access to the nation's religious rites, but this adoption was open to all people, irrespective of the decision of a particular Hebrew family to adopt an alien son or daughter. God adopted individuals into His family, just as He had adopted Israel as a nation. The sign of God's adoption was circumcision. First, a person could gain access to civil and ecclesiastical rites through circumcision (Ex. 12:48). Access to membership in the biblical covenant in Old Testament Israel was not achieved through incorporation into one of the nation's founding families. Circumcised foreigners and their families were outside the jubilee land redistribution law (Lev. 25), but they or their heirs could nevertheless become full citizens (Deut. 23:3–8), although they would have had to live in the cities, where this law did not apply, or else live as renters or long-term leaseholders in rural areas. Second, resident aliens who chose not to be circumcised were under the civil law of Israel (Ex. 12:49), for the God of Israel is a universal God.

It was His assertion of universality that made the claims of the God of the Hebrews unique in the ancient world. For example, the theology of ancient Israel taught, in contrast to the theologies of rival pagan civilizations, that the defeat of His people militarily did not mean that the gods of Israel's military conquerors had triumphed over the God of Israel (Isa. 9–11). The Israelites could be scattered geographically, yet still remain under the terms of God's covenant law (Deut. 28:64–68). Why? Because God is a universal God who judges all men wherever they are in terms of His law or the work of the law written in their hearts (Rom. 2:14–15).¹⁰ All of the ancient world was therefore under the ethical requirements of God's revealed law. The ancients were supposed to conform themselves to the Ten Commandments and the case laws that applied these commandments in daily living. Foreign nations were supposed to see the application of the legal principles outlined in the Ten Commandments in the actual daily operations of Israelite society, and they were supposed to imitate Israel. The resident alien was able to acknowledge this fact in a more visible way than those living outside the land of Israel.

9. Ibid., III:XIII, pp. 200–1.

10. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

4. Resident Aliens Deserve Legal Protection

Any attempt on the part of the judges of Israel to place the resident alien outside the protection of God's law would have represented an attempt to pervert God's universal standards of justice. By not honoring God's law in every dispute between a Hebrew and a resident alien, the judge was in effect announcing: "God's law is binding only in terms of circumcision. Those outside this blood covenant are therefore not under the law's protection. This means that they are outside any general covenant that God has established with mankind. This in turn means that mankind is not required by God to honor the judicial terms of His covenant. God imposes no final claims on those outside the covenant, which is marked exclusively by physical circumcision of male heads of households. He is, therefore, a God of Palestine rather than the cosmic Creator. There is no universal covenant."

Obviously, such a view of God is foreign to everything God teaches regarding His absolute sovereignty as the Creator. To respect persons in rendering judgment, the judges would be denying God's holiness, His general covenant with mankind, the universality of His civil laws, and the absolute claims He places on all mankind. Thus, the uncircumcised stranger was entitled to full protection under the law, even though he could not become a citizen, meaning that he could not become a judge or own land permanently inside the nation (Lev. 25:11–17).¹¹

Furthermore, if the judges refused to succumb to pressures by Hebrews to favor their cause just because of their racial characteristics, as marked by their circumcised flesh and their families' permanent ownership of land inside Israel, then they would probably not succumb to other pressures to withhold justice. The law of God made it clear that a Hebrew's treatment of bondservants, strangers, widows, orphans, the poor, and animals represented his treatment of all mankind. These weaker people and creatures were frequently under his authority, just as he was always under God's authority. As he treated those under him, so would God treat him. This is a very common theme in both Testaments, but especially in the case laws of Exodus, which is why so much space is devoted to setting forth the legal principles governing bondservants, maidservants, widows, the poor, and animals. God reminds them again and again that they had been strangers in Egypt. They needed the protection provided by righteous judgment, and so did the strangers in the land.

11. Chapter 14. Cf. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 25.

This is why their years as slaves in Egypt were so important covenantally. They had suffered at the hands of lawless judges who refused to honor God's law. Such is tyranny throughout history: civil courts that deny the specific terms of God's revealed covenantal law. To avoid tyranny, God told them, render righteous judgment regardless of race, color, or creed. Place all people dwelling inside the geographical boundaries of Israel under the ethical boundaries of God's civil covenant. This was to remind residents of Israel that all men are born under the ethical terms of God's covenant, and they will all be held accountable in time and eternity for their disobedience. Thus, any refusal by the judges of Israel to honor God's law would inescapably damage God's testimony to the sanctity of His law, which necessarily meant His sanctions: blessing and cursing.¹²

If a Hebrew judge cursed a publicly righteous stranger in order to bless a publicly law-breaking Hebrew, then that judge was implicitly testifying to the partiality of God regarding the enforcement of His law, a false god who respects persons more than he respects the integrity of his law. This is false testimony to a false and unjust god who had been invented by the corrupt judge, and Jehovah God promises to bring judgment against any nation that continues to promote such false testimony through civil injustice.

5. Christian Antinomians Deny This

Those today who deny that the Old Testament case laws also applied judicially to the ancient world as far as God was concerned must therefore take the position that: (1) the Ten Commandments were never intended by God to be more than a local, temporary, tribal legal code; or (2) the Old Testament's case laws were not connected judicially to the Ten Commandments; or (3) both of the above. I have several questions for those who maintain such a position. Didn't God want pagans to worship Him? Didn't He want them to avoid worshipping idols, avoid using His name in vain, and avoid breaking the sabbath? Didn't He want them to honor father and mother, avoid murder, avoid adultery, avoid stealing, avoid bearing false witness, and avoid covetousness? Which of the Ten Commandments didn't apply to the ancient pagan world? And I would also ask this: Which of the case laws has nothing to do judicially with one or more of the Ten Commandments?

12. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

Christians really do not want to maintain such a position publicly, yet their endlessly repeated statements against the legitimacy of biblical law forces them to take this position. "Should the Nations Be Under the Mosaic Law?" ask two dispensationalists, theologian H. Wayne House and pastor Thomas D. Ice.¹³ They answer their question clearly: no. "The nations surrounding Israel were never called to adopt the law of Moses; rather Israel's obedience to the law would attract nations. Deuteronomy 4:6–8 says that the surrounding nations would be attracted to Israel and consider it wise."¹⁴ This is the theological equivalent of saying: "The people surrounding the church are never called to adopt the religion of Christianity; rather Christians' obedience to the Christ should attract people. Matthew 28:18–20 says that the surrounding nations will be attracted to the church and consider it wise." That the authors' logic is internally schizophrenic should be clear to anyone who can follow an argument. To put it bluntly, this line of reasoning is utter nonsense. It is the argument that the specifics of God's revealed law are wise but they are not now nor were they ever in any way judicially binding on those outside of tiny Israel.

What can it possibly mean to argue that the law of God is wise but not morally or judicially binding? It means only this: those who argue this way prefer not to obey God's revealed law, except when they can prove to themselves and others that any particular biblical law is "wise." Their implicit (but always undefined) universal standard for wisdom is therefore something other than God's revelation of Himself in His law. But then the nagging question arises: On what other basis than God's revealed law are men and nations condemned by God, in history and at the final judgment? By what other standard will the sheep be separated from the goats? “And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left” (Matt. 25:32-33). To put it in terms that even a dispensationalist can understand: Is it wise to want to avoid eternal damnation? If so, then isn’t it also wise to have faith in Jesus Christ? Isn’t it wise to obey Jesus? “If ye love me, keep my commandments” (John 14:15). “And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments. He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him” (1 John 2:3-4). Faith requires obedience to validate its reality. “Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone. Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works. Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble. But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?” (James 2:17-20).

13. H. Wayne House and Thomas D. Ice, Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse? (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah Press, 1988), ch. 7.

14. Ibid., p. 128.

One of these faithful works is to avoid oppressing the weak.

D. Economic Oppression

The question then arises: Is economic oppression a matter of civil action? Is it a criminal offense to oppress a stranger, widow, or orphan? In my comments on Exodus 22:1, 4, I wrote, “The general guideline for designating a particular public act as a crime is this: if by failing to impose sanctions against certain specified public acts, the whole community could be subsequently threatened by God’s non-civil sanctions—war, plague, and famine—then the civil government becomes God’s designated agency of enforcement. The civil government’s primary function is to protect the community against the wrath of God by enforcing His laws against public acts that threaten the survival of the community.”¹⁵ The language of Exodus 22:24 surely indicates that God will avenge the oppressed by bringing curses on the community. “My wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword.”

Should the state pass specific legislation against economic oppression? Should the courts enforce legal precedents against economic oppression? The answers depend on whether the laws and penalties can be formulated clearly and interpreted predictably on the basis of biblical revelation. I also wrote this regarding the legitimate jurisdiction of civil government: “Continued injustice, if it can be biblically defined and publicly identified in advance through statute or judicial precedent, because it goes unpunished by the civil government, calls forth the wrath of God on the community, so there is ultimately no Bible-based distinction between civil law and criminal law.”¹⁶ Can a specific law against oppression be “biblically defined and publicly identified in advance through statute or judicial precedent”? This is the key judicial problem facing the civil magistrate. It is also the key judicial problem facing a free society: the problem of the messianic state, whose mark of oppression is its judicial arbitrariness.¹⁷

15. Chapter 17.

Economic theory provides no definition of the concept of “economic oppression” in the case of voluntary transactions. Only where coercion is involved—the threat of physical violence—can the economist be confident that oppression is involved. This does not mean that a definition of oppression is impossible, but it does mean that no appeal to modern humanistic economic theory can provide a clear-cut definition. The use of the coercive power of the civil government to extract resources from other people can be regarded as oppression in most instances, but there are no clearly defined criteria of oppressive voluntary transactions made in a free market. The mere presence of competitive bargaining between unequally rich or unequally skillful bargainers does not constitute economic oppression, as the bargain between Jacob and Esau indicates (Gen. 25:29–34).¹⁸ Nevertheless, there are acts of economic oppression, even if conventional economic theory cannot state the criteria scientifically (neutrally).¹⁹

Oppression and affliction are related concepts. The translators of the King James Version translated the Hebrew word for “oppression” (lah-gahtz) as “affliction” in I Kings 22:27: “bread of affliction” and “water of affliction.” The word is translated as “crush” in Numbers 22:25: “and crushed Balaam’s foot.” The Hebrew word for “affliction” (guh-nah) is also translated as “humble” in several instances.²⁰ Oppres-

16. Chapter 17.

17. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960).

18. See Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 26: “Competitive Bargaining.”

19. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 26.

20. Ex. 10:3; Jud. 19:24, Ps. 35:13, etc.

sion can be judicial oppression (Ex. 23:7–9). Examples of this would be rendering false judgment or testifying falsely. It sometimes carries the meaning of sexual abuse of a defenseless woman.²¹

E. Protecting Women

One of the complaints of the American “women’s liberation movement” of the 1970s and 1980s has been that women in the work force are frequently told by their supervisors or employers that they must compromise themselves sexually in order to retain their jobs or to advance their careers. This practice of “sexual harassment” is unquestionably an instance of affliction, as defined by the Bible. Women have called for legal penalties on men who resort to such tactics.²²

It might be argued by defenders of pure laissez-faire capitalism that such a request by an employer may (or may not) be immoral, but that there should be no law against it. “After all, the woman does not have to submit. If she chooses not to prostitute herself, it could cost her dearly in terms of her career, but this is the free market’s way: if you are not willing to pay the price demanded by the seller—in this case, the seller of the job—you have no valid complaint. After all, any attractive woman who decides not to become a prostitute thereby gives up the economic income that she might have earned. The only strictly economic difference between this woman and the woman who has been solicited by her employer is that she may not have been asked to become a prostitute by some man. But the economics of the two examples are the same: forfeited income for lack of consent. Each woman pays to retain her moral integrity. But the civil government should have nothing to say in either case.”

The Bible prohibits prostitution. “Do not prostitute thy daughter, to cause her to be a whore; lest the land fall to whoredom, and the land become full of wickedness” (Lev. 19:29). To profane or pollute the land morally was a sin in the Old Testament. Today, it is a direct sin against Christ, who now spews out evil (Rev. 3:16), as the land was said to do in the Old Testament (Lev. 18:25). To pressure a woman to become a prostitute is itself an act of defilement. If either the woman or the employer is married, then the demand that she submit is also a call to commit the capital crime of adultery, for which both parties could be executed if discovered and convicted in a civil court, if the woman's husband so insists (Lev. 20:10). While there is no civil penalty attached to the command not to afflict the weak, it is clear that the judges have the authority in this instance—sexual harassment—to penalize the offender. Oppression as such is not penalized, but this specific form of oppression is, because biblical civil law deals with it.

21. Deut. 21:14, 22:24, 29; II Sam. 13:22; Lam. 5:11; Ezk. 22:10–11.

22. Men who find themselves employed by women who make the same demand would be equally entitled to protection by civil law.

Without the civil government's authority to inflict a penalty, this crime of demanding the performance of a capital crime could not easily be exposed to the civil authorities by the victim. The employer would suffer no civil penalty, and the woman would probably lose her job for having complained publicly. Thus, the enforceability of the law of God would be compromised. Sin would encounter less restraint. The enticement to commit a sin to which a civil penalty is attached is therefore itself a civil crime, punishable by civil law, analogous to the case of someone who secretly enticed a family member to worship a god other than the God of the Bible, a crime punished by the authorities (Deut. 13:6–11). The judges might use public flogging as a first-time penalty, and execution for the second infraction.

The question at hand, therefore, is this: To what extent is the practice of oppression or affliction a matter of civil jurisdiction? What is the responsibility of the civil government in suppressing economic oppression by means of its legal monopoly of violence? Furthermore, is an ecclesiastical court responsible in some way to step in and call a halt to economic oppression? Will the criteria used by ecclesiastical courts be different from those used by civil courts? Such questions have baffled Christian commentators for centuries.

F. Criteria of Oppression

What, precisely, are the criteria of economic oppression? The medieval scholastic theologians struggled long and hard with questions relating to the “just price,” and “usurious loans.” What is a “fair profit”? Without exception, the analytical attempts of the scholars failed to survive the test of applying the criteria. The late-medieval scholastic theologians actually defined the “just price” as the competitive market price, as long as the market price was not the result of price fixing by public or monopolistic concerns.”²³

23. Marjorie Grice-Hutchinson, The School of Salamanca: Readings in Spanish Monetary Theory, 1544–1605 (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1952) (<http://bit.ly/MG-H>); Joseph Schumpeter, History of Economic Analysis (New York: Oxford University Press, 1954), pp. 98–99; Raymond de Roover, “The Concept of the Just Price: Theory

The same problem disrupted the attempts of the early New England Puritans to establish formal standards of economic justice. A famous instance was the trial of Capt. Robert Keayne, a Boston merchant, who was convicted in 1639 of having taken unjust profits on the sale of foreign commodities (specifically, above 50% in some instances, and above 100% in others).²⁴ The fine was set by the deputies (the "lower" court, or lower chamber of the legislature-court of the Massachusetts Bay Colony) at 200 pounds; the magistrates ("upper" court) reduced it to 100 pounds.

He was punished, Gov. Winthrop argued, because the colony's leaders were determined to take action. "For the cry of the country was so great against oppression, and some of the elders and magistrates had declared such detestation of the corrupt practice of this man (which was the more observable, because he was wealthy and sold dearer than most other tradesmen, and for that he was of ill report for the like covetous practice in England, that incensed the deputies very much against him)." The politics of envy seems to have been in full force against Capt. Keayne. Gov. Winthrop's five-point explanation of why the magistrates showed leniency to him is revealing, especially the fifth: (1) because there was no law on the statute books prohibiting his rate of profit; (2) because merchants all over the world raised prices when market conditions allowed them to do so; (3) because he was not alone in this fault; (4) because all men throughout the colony were guilty of "like excess in prices" in the sale of cattle, corn, and labor; and (5) "Because a certain rule could not be found out for an equal rate between buyer and seller, though much labor had been bestowed in it, and divers laws had been made, which, upon experience, were repealed, as being neither safe nor equal."²⁵

The Colony had passed and repealed just price and maximum wage laws on numerous occasions during its first decade (1630-39), without being able to solve the theological and economic problem of and Economic Policy," Journal of Economic History, XVIII (1958), pp. 418-34; Murray N. Rothbard, "Late Medieval Origins of Free Market Economic Thought," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Summer 1975); Alejandro A. Chafuen, Christians for Freedom: Late-Scholastic Economics (San Francisco: Ignatius, 1986), ch. 7.

24. The account of his conviction is found in the diary of Gov. John Winthrop: Winthrop's Journal: "History of New England," 1630-1649, ed. J. Franklin Jamison, 2 vols. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, [1908] 1966), I, pp. 315-16. (<http://bit.ly/Winthrop1>)

25. Ibid., I, p. 316.

defining economic injustice.²⁶ After 1676, the legislators capitulated: there was virtually no “just price” legislation in Massachusetts for a century, until the American Revolution’s wartime controls.²⁷

The decision to specify a maximum price or rate of profit as universally evil is clearly arbitrary. Legislators, judges, and defendants all can point to “special circumstances” that supposedly justify or invalidate the charge of economic oppression in any specific instance. By what specific, authoritative, predictable, and generally agreed-upon standard can the civil or ecclesiastical authorities render judgment? This is the problem of formal law: the establishment of a written standard relating to ethics which does not rest on some appeal to external circumstances (as interpreted by the judges) or human conscience.

In the case of voluntary economic transactions, the Bible gives no specific guidelines as to what constitutes economic oppression, apart from oppression in the form of commands to perform a civil crime (e.g., adultery). There are laws that prohibit false weights and measures or other crimes involving fraud, but these are general rules for the whole population. They are not laws designed specifically to protect widows, the fatherless, and strangers. Apart from the law regarding weights and measures, the Bible does not authorize legislation or court decisions against perceived cases of economic oppression.²⁸ There are no biblical (or economic) guidelines that define “price gouging” or “rent-racking,” or similar unpopular practices. The attempt of governors and judges, whether civil or ecclesiastical, to go beyond the enforcement of specific laws against fraud is necessarily an expansion of arbitrary rule. Legal predictability suffers, and therefore human freedom also suffers. The power-seeking state expands at the expense of individual freedom.

This is not to argue that such evil economic practices do not exist. No doubt they do exist. The question is: What, if anything, is the civil government or a church court supposed to do in any formal case of alleged oppression? The problem that freedom-seeking Christian societies must deal with is the preservation of the judicial conditions necessary for maintaining personal liberty. How can a society avoid oppression by unjust civil magistrates if the legal system offers great latitude for civil judges to define arbitrarily and retroactively what constitutes an economic crime? Civil government is a God-ordained monopoly of violence. Allow arbitrary and unpredictable power here, and the entire society can be placed under the bondage of oppressors—oppressors who legally wield instruments of physical punishment. In contrast, economic oppression is an individual act by a specific person against a handful of people locally. It is a temporary phenomenon, limited at the very least by the continuing wealth of the oppressor, the continuing poverty of the victims, and the lifespans of both the oppressor and the oppressed. There are no comparably effective restraints on oppression by those who control the administration of civil justice. Society-wide, monopolistic, state-enforced sin is generally a far greater threat to potential victims of oppression than localized, privately financed sin.

26. See Gary North, “Medieval Economics in Puritan New England, 1630–1660,” Journal of Christian Reconstruction, V (Winter 1978–79), pp. 171–77.

27. Gary North, “From Medieval Economics to Indecisive Pietism: Second-Generation Preaching in New England, 1661–1690,” ibid., VI (Summer 1979), pp. 165–70. See also North, Puritan Economic Experiments (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), pp. 35–39. (<http://bit.ly/gnpuritanecon>)

28. The laws requiring gleaning and prohibiting interest-bearing charitable loans to fellow Hebrews had no civil penalty attached to them.

Despite this limitation on the sanctions that can be legitimately imposed by the civil government, individuals are warned against oppressing the weak. Men are told in this passage that God will make widows of their wives if they are themselves oppressors. The lex talionis principle of “eye for eye” undergirds the principle of doing unto others what you would have others do unto you and your family. God, not the civil government, knows men’s hearts. God is the Enforcer.

Judges possess lawful authority to impose sanctions against law-breakers. Civil magistrates possess a legal monopoly of violence. Ecclesiastical authorities possess the lawful authority to keep covenant-breaking people from lawfully partaking of the sacraments. Because they possess these monopoly grants of power—monopolies granted by God (Rom. 13:1–7)—judges must be restrained by law from acting arbitrarily, in order to avoid widespread, monopolistic oppression (Isa. 1). In short, “oppression” is not a monopoly of private individuals; it is also a temptation open to men who hold the office of judge. Indeed, the ability to oppress the defenseless is far easier for a judge, for he possesses a God-ordained monopoly of power, or at least an “oligopoly” of power (because men can usually appeal to other judges). Nevertheless, each participant in a voluntary transaction must take care not to exercise his civil or institutional freedom to the detriment of the defenseless, and ultimately to the detriment of himself and his own family.

G. Defending the Institutionally Defenseless

The Bible singles out three representative groups as being uniquely defenseless: widows, the fatherless, and strangers. Strangers in the Hebrew commonwealth were politically at the mercy of the rulers and those citizens who were upheld judicially by the rulers. Widows and the fatherless were economically disadvantaged, having lost a reliable source of family income. The division of labor which prevails in a covenantal family unit had been broken by the death of the husband. The per capita productivity of the other members of the family normally drops under such circumstances because of a reduction in the family's division of labor. Thus, the biblical concept of oppression encompasses both forms of weakness, political and economic. The weak are not to be afflicted. They are not like Esau, who was in a position of presumed defenselessness only because of a flaw in his character.²⁹

All three disadvantaged groups were entitled in Old Testament times to their portion of the feast of weeks and the feast of tabernacles (so were the landless Levites: Deut. 16:11, 14), as well as to the third-year tithe (Deut. 14:28–29).³⁰ These injunctions would have been enforced by the priests.

1. Positive Injunctions

To protect these groups, biblical law imposes morally mandatory forms of charitable giving on the part of neighbors. But there is no civil sanction attached to this moral obligation. Biblical civil law does not compel people to do good things for others; it imposes sanctions on those who do evil things to others. Biblical civil law is therefore a barrier to the creation of a state-funded, state-mandated welfare system.

Interest payments (usury) are prohibited in the case of a morally obligatory loan to a poor brother in the faith.³¹ Thus, because usury—defined very strictly in the Bible as a charitable loan with an interest payment attached—is prohibited, the oppressed victim can sue a lender in a civil court and recover double damages upon the lender's conviction, meaning twice the judicially prohibited interest payment. Such a lawsuit is legitimate because there are civil sanctions against specified activities. What the state cannot lawfully do is compel

29. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 26.

30. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 35.

31. On the other hand, usury is permitted in loans to religious strangers (Deut. 23:20). Ibid., ch. 57.

lenders to make charitable loans. God is the enforcer in this instance. He brings positive sanctions to those who obey His positive injunction. "Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou putteth thine hand unto" (Deut. 15:9–10). The state is not authorized by God to bring positive sanctions.

It is not lawful to ask for the cloak of a widow as collateral (Deut. 24:17), but it is legal to ask for a cloak as collateral from a poverty-stricken Hebrew man (Ex. 22:26).³² The Bible recognizes degrees of vulnerability and degrees of responsibility. Farmers are told to permit strangers, widows, and the fatherless to glean the fallen fruit and unharvested corners of their fields (Lev. 19:9–10;³³ Deut. 24:19–21³⁴), but being a positive injunction, it is not a judicially enforceable law in civil court. Because this is a moral injunction, religious leaders can advise people to obey God. A church court cannot lawfully impose physical sanctions, but it can teach people to obey God's positive injunctions. Can it also legitimately impose the sanction of excommunication against those who are morally stiffnecked? Biblical law places great restrictions on those who bear the sword, but what about church discipline? The same rule seems to bind an ecclesiastical court: no arbitrary law enforcement. There have to be written rules, or at least known rules that are predictable. Men need to govern their actions in terms of their expectations regarding the decisions of courts, including church courts.

If the mark of the messianic state is arbitrary law, what of the church? The threat is far less. First, the state controls everyone within a geographical territory. The church does not. Second, there are competing churches locally; there are not competing civil governments, at least not in the same sense. Third, the state taxes people by force; the church does not. Fourth, the state inflicts physical punishment; the church does not. Thus, moral persuasion is far safer in the hands of a church court than a civil court. But the problem still remains: What is to restrain the judges in a church court? What is to make their decisions predictable? I can see only one answer: predictable written law, including case law precedents, announced in advance. Without this, the rule of moral persuasion must serve as the church's tool of discipline. The church is not to enforce God's positive injunctions apart from the specifics of Bible-revealed law.

32. Chapter 49:C

33. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 11.

34. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 62.

The reason given to the Israelites for these morally (but not judicially) mandatory forms of individual charity—the state, it must be stressed, is not God's authorized agency of charitable wealth redistribution—was straightforward: God had delivered the Hebrews from bondage and oppression, and their acts of charity were to serve as reminders and symbols of their total dependence on God for their wealth and freedom (Deut. 16:11–12; 24:22). To oppress the weak, therefore, is equivalent to throwing off the covenant, reproaching God, and returning to the bondage of sin: "He that oppresseth the poor reproacheth his Maker: but he that honoreth him hath mercy on the poor" (Prov. 14:31). Isaiah charged the rulers of the land with just this crime: refusing to render lawful judgment to the widows and the fatherless (Isa. 1:23). Judah's rulers had become oppressors.

The decline of charitable giving is one sign of an increase in economic oppression within a society. The law of gleaning and the law of the tithe are to be upheld by ecclesiastical law. There is no New Testament evidence that either tithing or gleaning has been abolished as a moral and ecclesiastical requirement. Gifts to the poor, we are told, are made to God, and He promises to repay them (Prov. 19:17). He brings positive sanctions to those who obey His positive injunctions. He leaves to the priests the task of imposing moral sanctions for His positive injunctions. For example, the church enforces the tithe, and it grants a positive sanction to those who pay: the right of voting membership. The church also supports poor widows when relatives cannot or refuse to do so (I Tim. 5:3–10). It excommunicates relatives who can support widows but refuse, for they are worse than infidels (I Tim. 5:8).

2. Limited Knowledge

A voluntary exchange can be oppressive to a weaker party, biblically speaking, even though economic analysis does not provide the civil or ecclesiastical authorities the guideline, and therefore the ability, to render lawful judgment in specific cases. Why is the institutional government limited? Because there are limits on the knowledge available to observers of any economic transaction. Each party entered the transaction hoping to benefit. Sometimes men may cry “oppression” when they are secretly pleased with the bargain: “It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth” (Prov. 20:14). No man can measure another man’s subjective benefits; no man or committee of men can compare the gains of each party in a voluntary exchange.³⁵ But God can make such estimations, as Jesus demonstrated when He assessed the extent of the economic sacrifice of the widow who gave away her two “mites,” or small coins (Luke 21:1–4).³⁶ The fact that the authorities are not omniscient does not relieve sharp bargainers from their obligation of being alert to the weak position of the defenseless, and to make adjustments in favor of the weak in their exchanges with them.

By not seeking maximum profits in such transactions, strong bargainers thereby grant a non-humiliating form of charity. A good bargainer always seeks to guess what the other man is willing and able to pay. If he is confident in his ability to make this exceedingly difficult estimation, then he should have comparable confidence in his ability to make an estimation of how much the other, weaker bargainer may need.

H. Biblical Law or Revolution

The quest for a zero-oppression society in history is demonic. It implicitly denies that mankind is burdened by sin and the effects of sin throughout history.

1. The Question of Sovereignty

When we ask questions regarding the proper means of bringing healing to social relations and institutions, we need to be clear about the fundamental question of sovereignty. Who is to heal man in history, God or the state? This raises the question of the Messiah. Who is this Messiah, Jesus Christ or the state? Who are the Messiah’s chosen representatives? What are the Messiah’s designated means of achieving this reduction of oppression: biblical law or violent revolution? What is the goal of this social quest: the kingdom of God or the kingdom of man? Is this goal of perfection to be approached as a limit in a

35. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

36. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 50.

historically sin-filled world, or to be achieved in history by a scientific program of remaking man? As Rushdoony warned: “There is thus a dimension of victory in history, Jesus Christ. The alternative plan of victory is social science, and history as a social science. This means the totalitarian socialist state, the world of 1984. For the Christian this is rather the dimension of hell, not of victory; . . .”³⁷

Those who proclaim the legitimacy of such a quest apart from the preaching of the gospel and the extension of biblical law into every area of life want to lodge absolute sovereignty in the centralized “scientific” state. They begin their quest with the presupposition that there is no God who applies visible sanctions in history, either blessings or cursings. If there is a God, they assume, He reveals Himself only at the final judgment, and few of them assume that there will be even a final judgment. He is a God outside of history, they believe. This was exactly what the Pharaoh of the oppression assumed, as did the Pharaoh of the exodus. “Who is the LORD, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go?” he asked rhetorically (Ex. 5:2). Similarly, Nebuchadnezzar rhetorically asked the three Hebrew youths: “Who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?” (Dan. 3:15b). Pride goeth before destruction (Prov. 16:18), and pride before God is the ultimate form of pride. These kings in their rebellion had become opponents of covenant theology, which teaches that God imposes visible sanctions in history.³⁸

2. Christians vs. the Covenant

One reason for the growth of (1) private oppression, (2) messianic movements against private oppression, and (3) statist tyranny in the name of relieving oppression is that Christians in the twentieth century for the most part accepted implicitly the anti-covenantal view of God that is proclaimed by the humanistic defenders of the messianic state. Most Christians believe that historical affairs will get progressively worse and worse for righteous people until Jesus comes again, either to establish a bureaucratically enforced millennium in which He will rule from the top in person (premillennialism), or to impose the final judgment (amillennialism). Such a view of God in pre-Second Coming history agrees with the pessimistic conclusions of humanists

37. R. J. Rushdoony, The Biblical Philosophy of History (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1969] 2000), p. 21. (<http://bit.ly/rjrbph>)

38. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

and liberation theologians who say that God does not reveal Himself in history.³⁹

Christian eschatological pessimists do admit one minor exception to the absence of God's covenant sanctions in history: representative acts of voluntary private charity by Christians that do assist a handful of people to survive a little longer or in a little more comfort. Prior to the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, liberation theologians also admitted an exception: representative acts of revolutionary violence against the innately oppressive social institutions of capitalist society. Nevertheless, both groups are agreed: God will not redeem society through His church's preaching of the gospel and the extension of Bible-revealed law enforcement across the face of the earth. They are agreed that God will not impose in history His dual sanctions of external blessings for covenant-keepers and external cursings for covenant-breakers. They are agreed that the Old Testament civil covenant of God is irrelevant in New Testament times, and therefore God's sanctions in history are today either nonexistent or confined exclusively to the hearts and minds of men. They insist that the visible authority of God's law and His church is steadily removed from history, and His kingdom is steadily shoved into the historically impotent realm of undefinable spirit.⁴⁰

Such a view of God is implicitly or explicitly a denial of both the creation and the resurrection. This view leads to a world-denying pietism. Rushdoony pointed to the anti-pietistic implications of covenant theology.

The purpose of Biblical history is to trace the victory of Jesus

39. Gary North, Millennialism and Social Theory (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gnmast>)

40. God will be victorious in history, premillennialists claim, only when He returns physically in awesome power to judge the nations in history for a thousand years. But this is the direct imposition of judgment; it is not based on representative judgment in history by God's elect people in His name, while He is in heaven and His people are on earth. This rulership only takes place after the church—meaning you and I—are physically dead and gone. Premillennialists and amillennialists are agreed: the church is impotent in history to change history through the preaching of the gospel and through covenantal faithfulness to God's law. As dispensationalists House and Ice insist: "Because the Bible speaks of things progressing from 'bad to worse,' of men 'deceiving and being deceived' (2 Timothy 3:13), we look out at our world and see how bad things really are. . . . Common grace is on the decline, especially God's restraint of evil. This accounts for the rising apostasy and the decline of Christianity. North is wrong and Van Til [an amillennialist] is right on this issue." House and Ice, Dominion Theology, p. 183.

Christ. That victory is not merely spiritual; it is also historical. Creation, man, and man's body, all move in terms of a glorious destiny for which the whole creation groans and travails as it awaits the fullness of that glorious liberty of the sons of God (Rom. 8:18-23). The victory is historical and eschatological, and it is not the rejection of creation but its fulfillment.

This victory was set forth in the resurrection of Jesus Christ, Who destroyed the power of sin and death and emerged victorious from the grave. As St. Paul emphasized in I Corinthians 15, this victory is the victory of all believers. Christ is the firstfruit, the beginning, the alpha and omega of the life of the saints. Had Christ merely arisen as a spirit from the grave, it would have signified His lordship over the world of spirit but His surrender of matter and history. But by His physical resurrection, by His rising again in the same body with which He was crucified, He set forth His lordship over creation and over history. The world of history will see Christ's triumph and the triumph of His saints, His church, and His kingdom. History will not end in tribulation and disaster: it will see the triumph of the people of God and the manifestation of Christian order from pole to pole before Christ comes again. The doctrine of the resurrection is thus a cornerstone of the Biblical dimension of victory.

The doctrine of the resurrection, however, does not last long in any church or philosophy which surrenders or compromises the doctrine of creation. Creationism asserts that the world is the creative act of the triune God, Who made it wholly good. Sin is a perversion of man and a deformation of creation. The goal of the Messianic purpose of history is the "restitution of all things" (Acts 3:21), their fulfillment in Jesus Christ, first in time and then in eternity.⁴¹

Because modern Christians have abandoned the biblical doctrine of the six-day creation, they have failed to understand the biblical doctrine of God's providential control over history in terms of His covenant. Because the vast majority of the handful of scientists who teach the six-day creation have been either premillennialists or amillennialists, their defense of creationism has been based on humanistic science's theory of entropy (the second law of thermodynamics), which rests on the inescapability of God's curse of the cosmos in Genesis 3:17–19, rather than the doctrine of Christ's definitive restoration of all things by His resurrection, and the progressive (though imperfect) restoration of the pre-Fall world through the power of the Holy Spirit and the extension of biblical law. Thus, modern Bible-affirming Christians have found it difficult to refute by an appeal to the Bible the modern messianic quest for socialistic perfection⁴². They cannot successfully defend the idea of the free market economy as an institutional manifestation of the fourth point of the biblical covenant, the principle of judgment-sanctions: blessing and cursing, profit and loss.⁴³

41. Rushdoony, Biblical Philosophy of History, pp. 19–20.

I. The Free Market's Auction Process

The pricing principle enunciated by the villain in Frank Norris' early twentieth-century, anti-capitalist novel, The Octopus, is a morally valid principle for commercial transactions: "All the traffic will bear." At an auction, the highest-bidding buyer gets the sought-for asset. This principle reigns at every auction: the high bid wins. Yet, there is hardly any principle of capitalism that is more hated and more criticized than this one. The only one that receives greater criticism is the free market principle of the legitimacy of economic inequality, especially inequality of inheritance at birth. But the right (legal immunity) of unequal inheritance is the legal manifestation of point five of the biblical covenant, inheritance-disinheritance.⁴⁴ In short, capitalism is hated because visible institutional manifestations of God's covenant are hated.

The free market economic system is essentially a giant auction. If potential buyers at an auction were repeatedly frustrated when low-bidding competitors were favored by the auctioneer, it would eventually destroy the auction. Similarly, if sellers of goods and services in a free market economy were unwilling to honor this principle of "high bid wins" most of the time (though not necessarily in every case), they would destroy the market as an institution for producing and allocating scarce economic resources. By refusing to honor the "high bid wins" principle, sellers of goods ("auctioneers") would thereby force potential sellers of money (buyers or "bidders") to search out another, less preferable system of allocating scarce economic resources. Alternatively, new sellers of goods and services would appear who would honor the auction principle of "high bid wins," and thereby recapture the buyers. In coercive societies, such alternatives are called black markets.

"All the traffic will bear" is simply another way of saying "the high

42. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

43. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>) bid wins.” This arrangement benefits those customers who at any point in time are willing and able to pay the highest price offered by all known buyers. It also benefits all other customers—the “excluded buyers”—who learn the rules of the free market, and who can plan their own economic futures accordingly. They can enter other markets next time where they will be the highest bidders. The fact that some customers are excluded from ownership on any given day is the fact of scarcity: at zero price, there is greater demand for scarce economic resources than there is supply of those resources. Every economic system must face the fact of scarcity, not just capitalism.

44. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 5.

“All the traffic will bear” is a rational response of sellers to competitive bids by all known buyers. It honors the principle of customer authority. When we affirm that sellers of goods and services have the right (legal immunity) to request “all the traffic will bear” from competing buyers (sellers of money), we are simultaneously saying that buyers have the right to make “the lowest bid possible.”⁴⁵ If the final bid for an item is one ounce of gold, the state should not insist that the buyer pay the seller two ounces of gold “because the seller deserves it,” or because “stable markets for sellers is a benefit to the economy,” which is precisely what civil governments do when they legislate tariffs, import quotas, and other monopoly-producing restraints on voluntary trade. “All the traffic will bear,” “high bid wins,” and “final bid wins” are three ways of expressing a single principle of market competition: the right (legal immunity) of free people to agree upon a familiar standard for conducting voluntary exchange.

Civil and ecclesiastical governments should respect the lawful authority of men to operate in terms of this auction principle when making their voluntary exchanges. There is no way for judges to distinguish “oppressive” transactions from “just barely oppressive” transactions and “not quite oppressive” transactions by means of an appeal to percentages, such as 8% profit per sale or 15% profit on invested capital (both of which are at least 50% above the normal rate of before-tax profits in the United States).⁴⁶ To make lawful judicial decisions,

45. It must also be understood that “sellers” are also buyers in every transaction. Each party gives up something in order to get something. But we normally do not speak of “sellers of goods and services” as “buyers of money.” As “buyers of money,” we all try to offer the lowest price (in goods and services) that we can get away with. Thus, we all make the lowest bid possible, and still get what we want: sometimes we make the lowest bid possible in money (when we are “buyers”), and sometimes we make the lowest bid possible in goods and services (when we are “sellers”).

46. What is not understood by most Americans, as a poll taken annually by the judges need moral constants; but economic percentages change over time. Consider the question: "How much of anything should be universally illegal?" This question has baffled moral philosophers for millennia. Only in rare instances, such as the tithe of 10%, does the Bible give a specific answer to a question regarding a legal minimum percentage⁴⁷.

J. The Lawful Domain of Conscience

Conscience is a valid, though not exclusive, guide to individual action. It is self-government which regulates the overwhelming majority of all human actions. Men must not be burdened with unnecessary guilt, nor should they become libertines, sinning against themselves because some other agency of government is not authorized by God to step in and call a halt to their activities. The question is: What are the proper standards for men to use in determining whether or not a specific transaction is oppressive, biblically speaking?

The Bible mentions strangers, widows, the poor, and the fatherless as the representative examples of people who are easily exploited. In dealing with these people, what questions should the sharp bargainer ask himself? What kinds of offers would be innately immoral?

1. An Immoral or Illegal Act

The request that the economically weaker party perform an immoral or illegal act is a form of oppression. The civil government can enforce sanctions against anyone who entices another person into illegal acts, but enticement is both difficult and expensive to prove in a court of law. Nevertheless, no such enticement is legitimate, for the charge will be easy to prove in God's court of law on judgment day.

Opinion Research Corporation reveals year after year, is that the average rate of net after-tax profit on sales in the United States is about 5% or less. See, for example, "Public Attitudes Toward Corporate Profits," ORC Report to Management (Aug. 1981). The average rate of before-tax profits on invested capital (excluding banks and savings & loan associations) is around 10%. In 1964, the profit rate was about 16%. This figure declined steadily in the United States, 1964–80, corresponding to the coming of inflation and the vast expansion of the welfare state. After taxes, of course, it is substantially less. See Dale N. Allman, "The Decline in Business Profitability: A Disaggregated Analysis," Economic Review, Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City (Jan. 1983). Employee compensation varies between 85% and 90% of after-tax business income, year after year.

47. Then the experts debate over the question, "10% of what?" They also debate: "Does the Bible require a third-year additional tithe?"

2. Forestalling

Forestalling is the act of holding goods off the market in order to drive up the price. “He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him: but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it” (Prov. 11:26).⁴⁸ It should be noted that the people will curse the forestaller, but the state is not authorized in the Bible to be a price-setting agency or a confiscating agent “in the name of the people.” Also, it is God, not the state, who is the rewarder of those who sell.

The man who is criticized here for holding the corn off the market in expectation of a higher price is obviously holding back sufficient quantities of food to make a difference in price in the market. There is no implication in this passage that someone who buys food for his own use, who has a refrigerator full of food or a freezer full of beef, is in some way an exploiter. (This is not a hypothetical argument on my part. Ronald J. Sider has criticized Christians who eat beef because it takes twice as much grain to produce the same quantity of protein in a steer as in a chicken. Christians should eat more chicken, he says. This is a moral imperative, he says.⁴⁹ His vegetarian socialist peers no doubt would regard this as a woefully weak argument, smacking—perhaps even lip-smacking—of capitalist exploitation.) The exploiter is a person who is holding back the sale of a great deal of food—so much, in fact, that the market price would be affected if he brought it to market. Not many farmers or sellers have this much food at their disposal, given the huge size of the international grain markets. This is one of the strongest arguments in favor of free markets and against tariffs and import quotas of any kind: economic freedom reduces the possibility of successful local or regional forestalling.

In a godly society, no honest man curses the entrepreneur (risk-taking forecaster) who “buys low” during the bounty of the harvest and plans to “sell high” in the winter. Rational people understand, for example, that fruits and vegetables in the off-season are more expensive: supplies are limited, and they must be imported. Distant sellers must be lured into the local market through the hope of receiving higher prices for their produce than they can receive locally. In short, someone has to store the food, harvest season through off-season; few users have the storage facilities. The economic function of allocating food across the seasons and across regions has to be performed by someone.

48. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 32.

49. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1977), p. 43.

Profit-seeking (uncertainty-bearing) entrepreneurs are the most responsible, least bureaucratic people for this task.⁵⁰ Why? Because if they guess wrong, they lose. If they charge too little, they run out of food before they run out of buyers. They lose sales that they could have made, and therefore they lose money. On the other hand, if they charge too much, they lure in competitors who take away potential buyers and leave them sitting on a lot of unsold food. They lose sales that they could have made, and therefore they lose money. Conclusion: they have an economic incentive not to overcharge or undercharge the customers.

3. A Government-Enforced Monopoly

Any offer that lacks a competitive alternative offer because of interference by the civil government in the market is potentially immoral, unless the civil authorities are regulating the market as a “public utility.” Even if they are regulating the market in the name of the customer, such a monopoly may still be exploitative, for collusion between the regulators and the regulated is not only possible, it is predictable.⁵¹ If the seller of a good or service is protected by the judges from other competitors who might otherwise enter the market and make the buyer a better (lower price) offer, then the seller is oppressing the buyer. He may not have approved of this legislation or judicial interpretation, but he is now the beneficiary. If such restrictive legislation is in force, then the seller must do his best to sell his product or service to the buyer at a price that would prevail if there were open competition.

50. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 32: “The Entrepreneurial Function.”

51. This is understood by representatives of the far left wing of American politics: e.g., Gabriel Kolko, The Triumph of Conservatism: A Reinterpretation of American History, 1900–1916 (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1963); Robert C. Fellmeth, The Interstate Commerce Commission: The Public Interest and the ICC, The Ralph Nader Study Group Report on the ICC (New York: Grossman Publishers, 1970). It is also recognized by free market economists: e.g., Milton Friedman, Capitalism and Freedom (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962), ch. 9: “Occupational Licensure”; Friedman, Free to Choose (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1980), ch. 7: “Who Protects the Consumer?”; Mary Bennett Peterson, The Regulated Consumer (Ottawa, Illinois: Green Hill Publishers, 1971); Thomas Gale Moore, Trucking Regulation: Lessons from Europe (Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute-Hoover Institution, 1976); Yale Brozen, Is Government the Source of Monopoly? and Other Essays (San Francisco: Cato Institute, 1980); Harold Flemming, Ten Thousand Commandments: A Story of the Antitrust Laws (New York: Prentice-Hall, 1951).

The problem, of course, is that *in the absence of a free market, no one can really be sure just what such a free market price might be.*⁵² Without the information made available through market competition, buyers and sellers are left without reliable indicators of the true conditions of supply and demand.⁵³ Moral decisions concerning “fair” pricing are therefore made more difficult—more expensive to solve—by the state’s interference with the flow of economic information. The prevailing price in a government-regulated market raises moral questions concerning fairness precisely because it is not a competitive market price. Moral dilemmas for honest sellers are created by the state’s interference because this interference creates opportunities for sellers to extract monopoly profits from buyers. The “non-monopoly” price can only be guessed at by judges, buyers, and sellers.

4. Better Information

The economically stronger party in a transaction may have better information at his disposal. How much of this is he morally required to give to the economically weaker seller? If he asks a lower price, then he is, economically speaking, transferring the value of his information to the other party in the exchange.

The civil government should not compel the transfer of such information. If such a law were passed, it would inhibit the quest for better information on the part of all participants, which would eventually harm all people in the society.⁵⁴ Besides, judges would face that age-old problem, defining exactly how much of his information the economically stronger seller (or buyer) is required to give up to the other person before a voluntary exchange is legal. For that matter, how can the economically stronger party be precisely determined? The question, “How much stronger?” is closely related to the other question, “How much information?”⁵⁵

52. Ludwig von Mises, “Economic Calculation in the Socialist Commonwealth” (1920), in F. A. Hayek (ed.), Collectivist Economic Planning (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, [1935] 1963). (<http://bit.ly/MisesCalc>). Cf. T. J. B. Hoff, Economic Calculation in the Socialist Society (London: Hodge, 1949). (<http://bit.ly/HoffCalc>); Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), chaps. 7–9. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>)

53. Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980), ch. 8.

54. Gary North, “Exploitation and Knowledge,” The Freeman (Jan. 1982). (<http://bit.ly/Exploit>)

55. There are other questions, of course: “How much capital does each participant have in reserve?” “What are the living expenses that each participant incurs while he is

What governing principle does the Bible offer to the individual conscience? If the economically weaker party would be able to locate someone who would make a better offer if it were not for the particular circumstance—pressures on a widow or orphan, legal discrimination against a stranger, etc.—then the economically stronger party should offer a price comparable to what the person might reasonably expect to receive. A person who finds “a pearl of great price” on another person’s property has a moral right to sell what he has and offer to buy that property in order to get ownership of the pearl (Matt. 13:44).

But what if the seller is blind, and would never have had an opportunity to find that pearl? There is no explicit biblical law here, but the discoverer should remember that God is not blind. The buyer of the field might choose to give, say, half of the net profits in the transaction to the economically weaker party, in order to avoid inflicting economic oppression. (Again, there are no fixed rules available to us, but a 50-50 split is a good operating principle.) Nevertheless, the Bible is silent with respect to any state prohibition against such a transaction, either retroactively or in advance. To write a legal code that would attempt to cover every similar transaction would become a nightmare of confusion and uncontrolled state power in a short period of time. The behavior of monopolistic bureaucrats is not noticeably superior to profit-seeking buyers of hidden pearls. At least such oppression by private entrepreneurs is not subsidized by the taxpayers.

There are those who deny the legitimacy of a “pearl of great price” type of transaction under any circumstances. They do not understand (or choose to deny) the inescapable fact of man’s lack of omniscience. They assume, consciously or unconsciously, that accurate knowledge is (or ought to be) a zero-price resource—a resource that really ought to be available free of charge to all, either naturally or through the intervention of the state.

K. The Pearl of Great Price

This kingdom parable is important for a proper understanding of entrepreneurship—forecasting the economic future and efficient (low waste) planning in terms of the forecast. Jesus said: “Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a waiting to complete the transaction?” “How much time does each participant have to complete the transaction?” “What are the transaction (exchange) costs incurred by each participant?”

man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field” (Matt. 13:44).⁵⁶

1. The Shopper’s Discovery

Consider what the buyer in this parable is doing. He stumbles across an important piece of information: there is a valuable treasure hidden in a field. He is not sure just who it was who hid it there, but now he knows where it is. He presumes that the person who hid it was not the present owner of the field.⁵⁷ He hides the treasure, and then goes out and sells everything he owns in order to buy the field. Notice that he does not steal the treasure. He is not a thief. He is simply the possessor of information.

He may have done some preliminary investigating, just to see if the present owner of the field is willing to sell it. Still, the present owner may change his mind before the sale is completed. Perhaps the owner may sell it at what he knows is a higher-than-normal market price, because he knows that the treasure has been left there by a vicious criminal who stole it. Perhaps the stolen treasure will be confiscated by the police and turned over to the victim, or the victim’s insurance company, as soon as it appears on the market. It is even possible that the treasure is a fake: the owner may have placed a phony treasure on his land just to lure in some ecstatic discoverer.⁵⁸ The discoverer cannot be sure. But he takes a chance, meaning that he decides to bear some uncertainty in hope of economic profit. He sells what he owns and buys the field.

Now he owns the treasure. Assume that the police do not confiscate it, and some criminal does not return to collect it. The new owner did take advantage of a special situation: his knowledge of this treasure in his newly purchased field. He took a risk and sold everything. Now he has his reward. He has benefitted himself, and he has given the original owner of the field all that he asked for. If the treasure is worth

56. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 31.

57. If the owner of the field hid the treasure, then before he sells it, he will go and search for it. When he does not find it, he can report it lost to the authorities. At that point, the discoverer is required by biblical law to return it to the owner (Ex. 23:4). The Bible does not teach “finders-keepers, losers-weepers.”

58. In the gold rush days of the American West, mine owners would sometimes place grains of gold in a shotgun and fire at one of the mine’s walls. This was called “salting a mine,” and buyers could be lured into paying a high price for the mine, in order to profit from the perceived ignorance of the seller.

selling, then someone who buys it will gain access to his heart's desire. Who loses?

Clearly, the original owner might have stumbled across that treasure. On the other hand, he might never have found it. Is it a moral obligation on the discoverer to run to the owner of the field and tell him? Jesus did not indicate that it was. The discoverer has a potentially valuable asset: information. He lacks ownership of the field. The owner of the field also has a potentially valuable asset: title to the treasure. But he lacks knowledge of its presence on his property. Each man possesses something of potential value, but neither man can make personal use of his potential asset: the owner of the field has no knowledge of the pearl, and the man who knows where the pearl is has no economic incentive to make this knowledge public unless he owns the field. Society gets no use of it until the potential asset is translated through market exchange into a known asset. The opportunity for profit is what translates that potential asset into a marketable asset. The discoverer buys the field. In this way, potential assets become market assets.

The modern socialist is outraged at this parable. The entrepreneur (uncertainty-bearing forecaster) who discovered the treasure is seen by the socialist as immoral. First, the land he was on should have been owned by "the people" through the state. Second, he had no business being on the land, because he had no official papers entitling him to be on the state's property. Third, he should never have hidden the treasure again. It belonged to the state. Fourth, if the land was not yet the property of the state, then he should have notified the present owner of the field about the existence of this newly discovered treasure. Fifth, failing to do this much, he was immoral in making an offer to buy the field. He was really stealing from the owner of the field. Sixth, should he attempt to sell the treasure, the state ought to tax his profits at a minimum rate of 50%, and probably more. Seventh, if he refuses to sell, the state should impose a capital tax or property tax in order to force him to sell.

2. Socialists Resent Limitations

What the socialist-redistributionist objects to, in the final analysis, is mankind's lack of omniscience. The socialist believes, implicitly or explicitly, that the economy should operate as smoothly, as efficiently, and as profit-free as a hypothetical economy in which each participant has equally good knowledge—perfect knowledge—as all other participants. Knowledge, in a “decent” social order, should be a zero-price resource, equally available to all, and equally acted upon by all. Socialist arguments implicitly assume that it is only the temporary existence of such factors as private property, personal greed, and people’s willingness to exploit the poor, that has created a world of scarcity, profits, and losses. Knowledge concerning the future should be regarded as a free good, they implicitly assume. Profits are therefore evil, not to mention unnecessary, in a sound economy. This has been the underlying line of reasoning for centuries of all those who equate economic profits with exploitation.

Men are not omniscient. This angers the socialists. They strike out in wrath against the free market institutional order that encourages men to seek out better information, day by day, so that they might profit individually from its application in economic affairs. The socialists prefer to create legislative barriers that interfere with the operation of the market’s “auction for information.”

It should be clear why so little innovation takes place in socialist economies. The development—or rather, the lack of development—of commercial technology in the Soviet Union is a representative historical example.⁵⁹ Innovation is not a service that people normally offer free of charge to others. It involves creativity, capital, and the willingness to take risks. In a socialist commonwealth, the entrepreneur who is willing to bear uncertainty cannot legally receive payment for the full economic value to society—as determined by market forces—of his innovation. For entrepreneurs to receive full value for services rendered, the socialist commonwealth would have to abandon the collective ownership of the means of production-distribution.⁶⁰

Those who discover treasures in “collectively owned” fields, meaning state-controlled and bureaucracy-administered fields, have these choices: (1) provide information, free of charge, of the treasure’s whereabouts to bureaucratic officials of the state; (2) say nothing and

59. Antony Sutton’s three-volume study of Soviet technology, 1917–1965, indicates that almost none of the Soviet Union’s industrial technology (as distinguished from its military technology) originated in the U.S.S.R. Out of 75 different major technologies surveyed, the percentage of Soviet technology was zero, 1917–30, 10%, 1930–45, and 11%, 1945–65. “It should be emphasized that this is the most favorable interpretation possible of the empirical findings.” Sutton, Western Technology and Soviet Economic Development, 1945 to 1965 (Stanford, California: Hoover Institution Press, 1973), p. 370.

60. Svetozar Pejovich, “Liberman’s Reforms and Property Rights in The Soviet Union,” Journal of Law and Economics, XII (April 1969).

save themselves a lot of trouble; (3) work out an illegal deal with some official; or (4) steal the treasure. In the Soviet Union, predictably, the final three possibilities were the ones people choose; the first choice was simply not taken seriously as a sensible alternative.⁶¹

Conclusion

The Bible forbids economic oppression, but only vaguely defines it. Economic theory provides even fewer guidelines than the Bible. About all that economic theory can say is that when the threat of violence is imposed on someone, there is oppression. But violence must not be defined as a market participant's threat of refusing to trade with someone else, unless the violation of an existing contract is involved, or unless someone is being asked to commit a crime or immoral act. Sharp bargaining is not automatically considered oppressive, either in the Bible or economic theory.

Without specified infractions, it is very difficult to develop a system of civil law. The law must specify the action that is being prohibited. It must be sufficiently clear that juries can make judgments, and that their judgments can be predicted with better than 50-50 accuracy by most people, especially potential criminals. If the decisions of juries are random, then the law will not protect innocent people on a predictable basis. This means that civil law no longer serves its God-given purpose of providing social order.

Defining oppression clearly is very difficult. Oppression must be defined in such a way that the courts do not easily become tyrannical or arbitrary in their decisions. But, as I have said, a definition of economic oppression that is both equitable and tyranny-resistant when it is applied to a large number of cases over time has not yet been discovered. This is why economic oppression rarely can be legislated against without creating more harm than benefits for the potential victims of oppression. The legislation itself becomes a major source of oppression.⁶² The medieval notion of the "just price" is one of the best examples of this problem in history, especially when interpreted centuries later by civil magistrates who were not familiar with the late-medieval Scholastic theologians' distrust of government price-fixing.

This points to the fact that human conscience must rule over all

61. Konstantin Simis, USSR: The Corrupt Society (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982).

62. Chapter 50.

pricing decisions in voluntary exchanges, not because the individual conscience is in any way autonomous, but because only God is legitimately sovereign over the minds of men. He alone, not human authorities, can make accurate comparisons of interpersonal subjective utility. He alone knows precisely how much one person has benefitted from a transaction, and to what extent the magnitude of his gain was based on the defenselessness of the other participant in the exchange. Therefore, penalties against those who are suspected of acting oppressively in economic transactions—apart from those cases specified in Scripture—are not to be imposed by human institutional governments, precisely because omniscience is God's monopoly. This is why men can rest assured that God's penalties against cases of economic oppression are utterly certain and will be applied precisely by God, according to the magnitude of each oppressive act. The self-governed individual under God, not institutional governments, is the proper agent of earthly enforcement. If this human agent fails to render God-honoring judgment, then God will bring him under judgment.

The Bible does mandate certain forms of charity to relieve oppression, including morally mandatory interest-free loans to the deserving, covenanted poor, gleaning, and the prohibition against asking a widow for her cloak as collateral. But there are no specified penalties for violating these laws, and the civil government is not specified as the enforcing institution. In the case of hoarding goods in order to increase the market price of the particular good, the Bible says that the penalty is public censure: "He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him: but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it" (Prov. 11:26).⁶³ The people can lawfully curse him, but no physical violence or fines are to be imposed on the culprit.

God is the Enforcer. He brings judgment in history. Because modern man refuses to acknowledge this, he seeks to become his own God by making the state an enforcer. He does not believe that God enters into the historical affairs of men to bring judgment. Because many Christians today have adopted this same "God is beyond history" theology—God as Judge only on the day of final judgment, or only during a future millennial reign of Christ in person—they have fallen into the same state-expanding worldview. They want an enforcer. More than this: they want a near-omniscient enforcer. But, in calling for such an enforcer, they are denying the very basis of civil freedom: civil law that is biblically specific as to what constitutes illegal behavior, and biblically specific as to what constitutes appropriate punishment.

63. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 32.

When such an enforcer is constructed by antinomian man, economic oppression will become universal.

Those who argue today that God's law does not and should not apply to all men have in mind the restraining aspects of civil law. Christians today insist, alongside the humanists, that God has not entrusted Christians with the responsibility of "telling other people how to live." Christians do not understand that biblical civil law never was intended to tell men how to live; it tells them how not to act in public. What modern antinomian Christians systematically ignore is this: if God's law does not restrain the stranger as well as the believer, it therefore does not protect either the stranger or the believer. Christians forget all about the protective benefits of God's civil law. They have implicitly accepted humanism's lie: that biblical law is inherently tyrannical, and that "true" humanist law is beneficent. (Problem: no one ever seems to be able to discover what this beneficent "true" humanist law is.)

Christians today hate the law of God as surely as the humanists do. They hate the idea of God's judgments in history. But God's judgments are always both positive and negative, blessings and cursings. Christians today much prefer to live under the negative civil sanctions of humanism and thereby forfeit the positive sanctions of God's law rather than suffer the embarrassment and personal responsibility of enforcing biblical law. The result is that Christians have become strangers in their own land.⁶⁴ And the astounding fact is this: they prefer it this way. It provides them with the psychologically necessary self-justification for their own cultural impotence.

64. Martin E. Marty, Pilgrims in Their Own Land: 500 Years of Religion in America (Boston: Little, Brown, 1984).

THE PROHIBITION AGAINST USURY

If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury. If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? And it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious (Ex. 22:25–27).

The context of these verses indicates that they are an extension of the immediately preceding verses: “Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt. Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child. If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; And my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless” (Ex. 22:21–24).¹ The general category of all these verses is affliction or oppression. In the first case, the law singles out a particular judicial category of victims: people without covenantal representation. In this case, the law singles out another class of potential victims: poor people. They, too, are vulnerable. They, too, deserve sympathy and protection—in this case, economic protection.

What is the category that links all of these people? Not their legal status, for the poor brother in Israel had full legal status, unlike the stranger in Exodus 22:21. There must be some other link. There is: their status as economically vulnerable. The presumption is that they share one thing in common with the previous three: they are economically vulnerable through no fault of their own. They are the “victims of circumstances” rather than the victims of their own evil behavior. The poor man here is presumed by God to be a sober, righteous person, not a drunk who drinks up his family's substance, and not a previous oppressor of the vulnerable who has now come under God's promised sanctions. The Bible is clear: we are not to subsidize evil. Charity that deliberately subsidizes visible moral evil or failure that is the product of moral failure is itself morally corrupt.

1. Chapter 48.

In Exodus 22:21–24, the theocentric principle is that God is the kinsman-redeemer. How we treat the judicially most vulnerable people in the commonwealth reflects our covenantal response to God. This identifies those who will and who will not act voluntarily as kinsmen-redeemers for the helpless. The issue in Exodus 22:21–24 is the legal status of the oppressed as covenantally unrepresented. Because the legal status of the poor Hebrew in Exodus 22:25–27 is different from the legal status of the widow, orphan, or resident alien, we need to search for some theocentric principle other than God as protector and judge, kinsman-redeemer and blood avenger.

A. God Is the Owner

Because this case law is tied directly to economics, the theocentric category must also be economic. The foundational biblical economic principle is always this one: God is the owner of all the earth. “The earth is the LORD’s, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein” (Ps. 24:1).² “For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills” (Ps. 50:10).³

God delegates ownership to mankind in terms of a leasehold contract. Men deeply resent their position as subordinate stewards. They would rather become murderers than remain rent-payers. Because they cannot kill the true Owner, they seek to kill His lawful representative. Instead of collecting their rent in the Owner’s name, his highest representative will collect their vengeance. This is the message of Jesus’ parable of the vineyard.

Hear another parable: There was a certain householder, which planted a vineyard, and hedged it round about, and digged a winepress in it, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country: And when the time of the fruit drew near, he sent his servants to the husbandmen, that they might receive the fruits of it. And the husbandmen took his servants, and beat one, and killed another, and stoned another. Again, he sent other servants

2. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 5.

3. Ibid., ch. 10.

more than the first; and they did unto them likewise. But last of all he sent unto them his son, saying, They will reverence my son. But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance (Matt. 21:33–38).⁴

God judges a person's attitude toward Him by judging his attitude toward His servants. Sometimes these servants are in positions of authority, as in the parable of the vineyard. Sometimes they are in positions of weakness (Matt. 25:34–40). A good steward must be obedient to those over him and merciful to those under him. God judges our performance as stewards in terms of this upward and downward covenantal responsibility.

This brings us to the topic at hand: the prohibition of interest payments from a poor fellow believer. God establishes a rule with respect to loans to poor fellow believers: no interest payment may be imposed on charity loans. The lender who violates this law is violating the terms of God's leasehold arrangement.

B. God-Mandated Charity

By prohibiting an interest return on charitable loans, the Bible requires a form of charitable giving on the part of lenders, namely, the forfeited use of their present goods over the life of the loan. It is one of the very few examples in the Bible of God-required wealth redistribution.

What are the predictable results of such a moral (though not civil) law? When it is obeyed, there will be fewer loans available for other kinds of investments, other things remaining equal. But God promises that things will not remain equal in such a society; things will get better. "For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee" (Deut. 15:6).⁵ So, there will be more wealth, and faithful commonwealths will have money to lend to foreigners—and at a profit. This distinguishes the biblical view of progressive history from the cyclical classical Greek view. There is a covenantal relationship between obedience to God's revealed law and economic growth, something that the

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 43.

5. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

Greeks ignored or even denied.⁶

1. Disobeying This Law

People may choose not to obey God's directive, of course. Potential lenders can simply refuse to make loans to brothers in distress, and there is nothing in biblical law that allows the authorities to take any kind of legal action against them. Poor people can only appeal to a lender's conscience. Lenders can get around the prohibition in many ways, such as by unofficially requiring the borrower to perform some sort of service, or requiring the borrower to buy goods or services that the lender sells. Nevertheless, God's law is clear: all such subterfuges are immoral, and the victims will cry out to God, who will hear their complaints (Ex. 22:27).

Another product of this prohibition against usury would be political pressures from lenders in a money economy to reduce prices by reducing the money supply. If the money supply is stabilized, or even lowered, this will tend to reduce prices. Thus, a return of the same amount of gold, silver, or paper money will in effect grant lenders increased wealth. They can buy a greater quantity of goods and services when the loan is repaid. Should this political pressure fail to achieve its goal, and should monetary inflation continue, then lenders will prefer to loan goods rather than money, with repayment denominated in goods of equal quality. They will at least regain an equal quantity of goods that have appreciated in value (as denominated in the depreciating monetary units).

2. Loans to Christians

The prohibition on usury clearly and absolutely prohibits interest payments on all charitable loans to other Christians. This includes loans to churches and other non-profit institutions that come to Christians in the name of Christ. The church is not a business. The Christian who loans the church anything, at any time, for which he requires an extra amount in repayment, is violating the law against usury. Any leader in a church or charitable Christian organization who encourages Christians to make interest-bearing loans to it is involving its supporters in the sin of usury. This restriction on "church bonds" is almost universally ignored by denominational leaders today. They ig-

6. As do premillennialists H. Wayne House and Thomas D. Ice: Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse? (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah Press, 1988), ch. 8; cf. p. 183.

nore the prohibition against usury. The Bible is clear on this point: usury is a terrible crime (Jer. 15:10). The prophet Ezekiel announced that it is actually a capital crime in the eyes of God, and will not go unpunished (Ezek. 18:8–9,⁷ 13). Yet church and Christian school leaders in almost every denomination can be found offering “Christian stewardship” (usury) contracts to their people. They come in the name of charitable, kingdom-building projects and promise to pay interest.⁸

A church may lawfully request a loan from a bank or other thrift institution. This is unwise, given the fact that the borrower is servant to the lender (Prov. 22:7).⁹ Nevertheless, the bank is not wrong in taking an interest return from a church. The bank is not a Christian. It is not a member of a church. It does not face damnation or salvation. The church does not approach it in the name of Jesus, or with the promise of future rewards in heaven. The bank is strictly a commercial lending institution. The bank is the agent of depositors of all religious faiths.

But is the zero-interest loan exclusively a charitable loan? Some expositors deny this.¹⁰ We need to examine the biblical texts to learn the truth.

C. Charitable Loans

The text is clear: “If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury” (v. 25). This verse does not compel a person to make a loan to the poor person, but if the lender decides to make such a loan, he may not ask the recipient to pay interest. The text in Leviticus 25, the chapter on the jubilee year, is equally clear: “And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him: yea, though he be a stranger [geyr], or a sojourner [to-shawb]; that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee. Thou

7. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 19.

8. Gary North, “Stewardship, Investment, and Usury: Financing the Kingdom of God,” in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), Appendix 3; reprinted also in Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 31. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

9. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 66.

10. For example, S. C. Mooney, Usury: Destroyer of Nations (Warsaw, Ohio: Theopolis, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/MooneyUsury>) shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase" (Lev. 25:35–37).¹¹ It begins with the determining clause: "If thy brother be waxen poor."

1. Two Kinds of Strangers

The interpretation of the Leviticus 25 passage initially seems difficult because of the King James translation of Deuteronomy 23:20: "Unto a stranger [nok-ree] thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it." We must begin with the presupposition that God's revealed law is not inconsistent. But here we have what appear to be two rules regarding the stranger: you may not lawfully charge the stranger interest, yet you may lawfully charge him interest. How can we reconcile these two statements?

The answer is that the Hebrew word used in Leviticus 25:35, transliterated geyr [gare], is not the same as the Hebrew word in Deuteronomy 23:20. Similarly, "sojourner" [to-shawb] is related to yaw-shab,¹² meaning "sit," and implying "remain," "settle," "dwell," or even "marry."¹³ To-shawb therefore means resident alien. The stranger [nok-ree] referred to in Deuteronomy 23:20 was simply a foreigner.¹⁴ Two different kinds of "stranger" are referred to in the two verses. Thus, if the resident alien was poor, and if he was willing to live in Israel under the terms of the civil covenant, then he was entitled to a special degree of civil legal protection. What was this legal protection? If he fell into poverty, he was not to be asked to pay interest on any loan that a richer man extended to him. With respect to usury, he was to be treated as a poverty-stricken Hebrew. Not so the foreigner.

The economic setting is clearly the relief of the poor. The recipient was any poor person who had fallen into poverty through no ethical fault of his own, and who was willing to remain under God's civil hierarchy.

There is a parallel passage in Deuteronomy 15. Deuteronomy 15

11. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 29.

12. Strong's Concordance, Hebrew and Chaldee Dictionary, p. 123.

13. Ibid., p. 52.

14. This is the translation given in the Revised Standard Version, the New American Standard Bible, and the New International Version. The alien and the sojourner were equivalents judicially in Old Covenant law. The NIV translates Leviticus 25:35 as "an alien or a temporary resident."

lists the economic laws governing Israel's national sabbatical year. In this national year of release, the text literally says, all debts to neighbors are to be forgiven: "At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD's release" (Deut. 15:1–2).¹⁵ The text is clear: the neighborly loan is the focus of the law.

At least one kind of loan was explicitly exempted by the text: loans to non-resident foreigners: "Of a foreigner [nok-ree] thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release" (Deut. 15:3). This could have been a traveller or foreigner who owned a business locally. It could have been a business contact in another country. It was not a poverty-stricken resident alien, who was treated by biblical civil law as a neighbor.

2. Who Is My Neighbor?

Because all debts to a neighbor are to be forgiven, the legal question legitimately arises: "Who is my neighbor?" This was the question that the lawyer asked Jesus (Luke 10:29). Jesus answered this question with His parable of the good Samaritan. The Samaritan finds a beaten man on the highway. The man had been robbed. He looked as though he was dead. He was in deep trouble through no fault of his own. He was on the same road that the Samaritan was traveling. The Samaritan takes him to an inn, pays to have him helped, and goes on his journey. He agrees to cover expenses. He is the neighbor. He showed mercy to the man. The lawyer admitted this (Luke 10:37).¹⁶

So, the context of the parable is not simply geographical proximity in a neighborhood. It is proximity of life. Samaritans did not live in Israel. They had very little to do with the Israelites. But this Samaritan was walking along the same road as the beaten man, and he was in a position to help. He saw that the man was a true victim. The latter was in trouble through no visible fault of his own. He therefore deserved help —morally, though not by statute law—but the priest and the Levite had refused to offer him any help. The Samaritan was being faithful to the law.

15. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 36.

16. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 21.

This parable was a reproach to the Jews. They knew what Jesus was saying, namely, that they were too concerned with the details of the ceremonial law to honor the most important law of all, which the lawyer had cited: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself" (Luke 10:27). What they also fully understood was that Jesus was predicting that the gentiles (Samaritans) who did obey this law of the neighbor would eventually rule over the Jews, for this is what Deuteronomy 15 explicitly says. He who shows mercy to his neighbor will participate in his nation's rule over other nations. "Only if thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day. For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee" (Deut. 15:5–6).¹⁷ Notice also that the means of exercising this rule is through extending them credit.

This is a very significant covenantal cause-and-effect relationship. If a nation is characterized by the willingness of its citizens to loan money, interest-free, to their poverty-stricken neighbors, including resident aliens, the nation will eventually extend its control over others by placing them under the obligation of debt. "The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender" (Prov. 22:7).¹⁸ This is why it was legal to take interest from the foreigner who was living outside the land. It was a means of subduing him, his family, and his God-defying civilization. It was (and is) a means of dominion.

3. Moral Compulsion

Because these charitable loans were supposed to be cancelled in the seventh year, the national sabbatical year, there was an obvious temptation to refuse to make such loans as the sabbatical year approached. God recognized this temptation, and He warned against it.

If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in thy land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother: But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth. Be-

17. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 37.

18. North, Wisdom and Dominion, ch. 66.

ware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto (Deut. 15:7–10).

This indicates that God placed a moral obligation on the heart of the more successful man. He was supposed to lend to his neighbor. But this was not statute law enforceable in a civil court. God would be the avenger, not the state.

The context of the obligatory loan of Deuteronomy 15, like the zero-interest loan of Exodus 22:25–27, is poverty. There will be poor people in the promised land, Moses warned. Because of this, these special loans are morally mandatory. There must be a year or release, “Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it” (Deut. 15:4). Does this mean that these loan provisions would eventually be annulled? No. “For the poor shall never cease out of the land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land” (Deut. 15:11). Everything in Deuteronomy 15 speaks of poverty and biblical law’s means of overcoming it. Deuteronomy 15 is not dealing with business loans; it is dealing with charity loans.

But let the reader be forewarned: biblical law is a broader category than biblical civil law. There was no statute law that imposed sanctions on anyone who refused to make an interest-free loan.

4. Defining Poverty by Statute

Why was this not a statute law? Because biblical civil law presents only negative injunctions. It prohibits publicly evil acts. Biblical civil law does not authorize the Dallas to make men good. It does not authorize the state to force men to do good things. It does not authorize the creation of a messianic, salvationist state. The state cannot search the hearts of men. God does this, as the Creator and Judge, so the state must not claim such an ability. The state is only authorized by God to impose negative sanctions against publicly evil acts. It is not authorized to seek to force men to do good acts. In short, the Bible is opposed to the modern welfare state.

There is no way for biblical statute law to define what poverty is apart from the opinions of those affected by the law, either as taxpayers, charitable lenders, or recipients of public welfare or private charity. "Poverty" is too subjective a category to be defined by statute law. The state needs to be able to assign legal definitions to crimes, in order that its arbitrary power not be expanded. Yet economic definitions of wealth and poverty that are not arbitrary are not available to the civil magistrates for the creation of positive legal injunctions. Thus, God's civil law does not compel a man to make a loan to a poor person.

Nevertheless, the civil law does prohibit taking interest from poor people. How can it do this without creating the conditions of judicial tyranny through arbitrariness? If the magistrates cannot define exactly what poverty is for the purpose of writing positive civil injunctions, how can they define what a charitable loan is? How can the state legitimately prohibit interest from a charity loan if the legislators and judges cannot define poverty with a sufficient degree of accuracy to identify cases where a charity loan is legally obligatory for the potential lender?¹⁹

The lender decides who is deserving of his loan and who is not. This is his moral choice. God, not the state, will judge him. However, once the lender grants this unique, morally enjoined charity loan, he may not extract an interest payment. This is a negative injunction—not doing something which is forbidden by law—and therefore it is legitimately enforceable by civil law, as surely as the civil magistrates in ancient Israel were supposed to enforce the release of debt slaves²⁰ in the seventh (sabbatical) year (Deut. 15:12–15). The requirement to lend to the brother in need under the terms specified in biblical law, being a positive injunction, therefore comes under the self-government provisions of the conscience and the negative sanctions of God. This positive injunction is not under the jurisdiction of the civil courts. On the other hand, the prohibition against interest on these unique loans, being a negative injunction, does come under the enforcement of both civil courts and church courts.

19. This is the question that S. C. Mooney raised in his attempt to remove any distinction between charity loans and business loans. Mooney, Usury, pp. 123–27.

20. A debt slave was a person who had asked his neighbor for a morally mandatory, zero-interest charity loan, and who had then defaulted. He was then placed in bondage until the sabbatical year, or until his debt was paid.

The key to understanding the Bible's civil definition of poverty is the loan's contract. There must be a mutually agreed-upon contract, explicit or implicit, in order to establish a legally enforceable loan. If the borrower comes to the lender and calls upon him to honor Deuteronomy 15:7–8, then the borrower admits that his is a special case, a charity loan, and it is governed by the civil law's terms of the sabbatical year and the prohibition against interest. The borrower makes his request a matter of conscience.

In so doing, he necessarily and inescapably places himself under the terms of biblical civil law. If he cannot repay his debt on time, he can be legally sold into bondservice. This is not a collateralized commercial loan. The borrower is so poor that he has no collateral except his land. He chooses not to use his land as collateral. He therefore chooses not to become a landless man, meaning landless until the next jubilee year. Yet he is still in dire need. All he can offer as collateral is his promise, his cloak, and his bodily service until the next sabbatical year should he default. Thus, the borrower admits that he in principle has already become a bondservant. He admits through the loan's contractual arrangement that the borrower is servant to the lender. If he cannot repay, he will go into bondservice until the next sabbatical year, or until his debt is repaid, whichever comes first.

How would the civil magistrate in Israel know which kind of loan was in force, commercial or charitable, and therefore whether interest was valid or illegal? By examining the nature of the loan's collateral. If a loan went to an individual who, if he should default on the loan, would be placed in debt slavery, then this was a charitable loan governed by the provisions of Deuteronomy 15. This is why the year of release applied to both kinds of servitude: debt servitude and bodily servitude that arose because of a man's default on a charity loan.

Furthermore, if it was a loan with the individual's cloak as security, then it was also a zero-interest loan. The collateral described in Exodus 22:25–27 insured little more than that the individual was a local resident—he had to come to the lender to get it back each evening—and that the loan was temporary. (It also made multiple indebtedness more difficult.)²¹ It would have been a very small loan. This is clearly not a business loan. A business loan would have a different kind of collateral: property that was not crucial to personal survival on a cold night. If the borrower defaulted on a commercial loan, he would forfeit the property specified in the loan contract. He would not forfeit his freedom or his children's freedom. In short, the Old Testament biblical texts governing lending specify that certain kinds of loans would have certain kinds of collateral, and wherever specific forms of collateral appeared, the lender could not legally demand an interest payment.

21. See below: "Multiple Indebtedness."

Biblical civil law is exclusively negative law—prohibiting evil public deeds—not positive law, which enjoins the performance of righteous public deeds. An example of this distinction is the enforcement of the tithe: church courts can legitimately require voting members to tithe as a condition of maintaining their voting church membership. In contrast, the state cannot legitimately require residents to tithe to a church or other organization on threat of civil punishment.²²

Once the contract is agreed to, the lender is placed under the limits of the civil law. He could not extract interest from the borrower, even a resident alien. But the borrower also was placed under limits: if he defaults, he could be sold into bondservice. Each party was under limits. Each had decided that this is a true poor loan situation. Each agreed to a unique set of contractual obligations by entering into this arrangement.

Thus, once the contract was made, either implicitly or explicitly, the state had a legal definition of poverty. If the borrower was legally subject to the possibility of being sold into bondservice for defaulting on the loan, then the lender could not lawfully extract interest from him. On the other hand, if the borrower was unwilling to place his own freedom in jeopardy, then he was unwilling to define himself as a poor man for the sake of the civil law's definition. Thus, he has to pay interest on the loan, and his obligation to repay the loan extended beyond the sabbatical year. If he was not under the threat of bondservice, he was not under the protection of the sabbatical year or the zero-interest provisions against usury.

D. Revising Past Mistakes

No one likes to admit publicly that he was wrong in the past, but honesty requires it. For two decades, I followed R. J. Rushdoony's lead on the question of the sabbatical year of debt release. I taught that no debt should be contracted by the debtor that is longer than seven years

22. North, Covenantal Tithe.

(Rushdoony said six years).²³ I adhered to this in my own finances. It cost me a great deal of money. I sold a rapidly appreciating investment property I wanted to keep because my seven years had run out, and I did not want to pay $45,000 cash to pay off the loan. I paid off other real estate investment loans in the seventh year. I stayed out of other real estate investments I really should have made. I did my best to honor in practice what I had taught in theory. God holds us responsible for obeying our own interpretations of His law, even when we have misinterpreted the law. This is how we learn to obey. This is also how we show Him that we are serious about being covenantally faithful. But now I realize that I was wrong in my interpretation. I no longer wish to mislead people.

1. Mooney's Challenge

I was forced to rethink my position by S. C. Mooney. Mr. Mooney wrote a truly misguided book on usury. He said that interest on all loans is immoral and should be illegal in a Christian society. He also correctly concluded that this law against all forms of interest would have to apply to all rents, something that previous critics of interest had been unwilling to say in print. Thus, he concluded, no Christian can lawfully collect either interest or rent on his investment capital. This is economically preposterous, as well as biblically unwarranted. This was also the official position of the Roman Catholic Church until the sixteenth century, and it collapsed of its own weight.²⁴ It collapsed because it was not biblical.

Mr. Mooney's book offered a challenge to me. He observed, correctly, that I had previously argued that the interest-free loans of the Bible were (and are) charitable loans. I have always argued that business loans were (and are) loans of a completely different ethical and judicial character, and therefore lenders can legitimately ask for an interest payment. But I had also said that no loan beyond seven years is valid. He quite properly called me to account. If Rushdoony and I appealed to Deuteronomy 15 in order to defend the seven-year (or six-year) maximum on all loans, yet Deuteronomy 15 is also the basis of

23. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 510.

24. For a very clear summary of the transition in the Church away from the medieval position, see John T. Noonan, "The Amendment of Papal Teaching by Theologians," in Charles E. Curran (ed.), Contraception: Authority and Dissent (New York: Herder & Herder, 1969), pp. 41–75.

our arguing that morally compulsory charity loans—zero-interest loans—are unique, then we were mixing our judicial categories. He asked: “Why do they not hold that only the debts of ‘poor’ brethren are to be cancelled, and [thus] infer from this that it is lawful for one to continue to exact the debts of the ‘rich’? The present writer agrees with their views concerning the remission of debts, particularly as cited above.”²⁵

When I read that, I instantly changed my views. In the twinkling of an eye, I abandoned my old argument that there must be a seventh-year debt cancellation by civil law.²⁶ Mooney was correct: either Christians must accept the fact that there is no biblically valid judicial distinction between charity loans and profit-seeking loans, and therefore no biblically legitimate economic distinction, or else we must interpret Deuteronomy 15 exclusively in terms of charity loans. Either all loans are to be zero-interest loans, or else charity loans alone are under the temporal restrictions of the sabbatical year principle. Thus, from this point on, I will argue, to cite Mr. Mooney, that “it is lawful for one to continue to exact the debts of the rich.”

2. Who Are the Rich?

Who are the “rich,” judicially speaking? Those who are not judicially poor. We have seen what constitutes poverty judicially: those who go to the potential lender and (1) remind him of his moral obligation to lend to the deserving poor (2) at zero interest, and (3) offer to go into bondage for as much as seven years to pay off the note if they should default on the loan.

This formula therefore tells us who the rich are, judicially speaking: all those people who are willing to sign a strictly voluntary, interest-bearing debt contract that is collateralized by something other than the threat of placing them in bondservice if they should default on their obligation. If the lender extends them credit on the basis of their signatures, or because they have offered him other collateral, including their real estate, then they are not considered poor people judicially. They come to him on the basis of a business opportunity, not on the basis of his moral obligation to lend them an interest-free loan.

What about the jubilee year? The jubilee law has been completely

25. Mooney, Usury, p. 131.

26. This was not a paradigm shift, but it surely was a sub-paradigm shift. They can take place very rapidly.

fulfilled in history by Jesus (Luke 4:16–21).²⁷ This that the Old Testament's ten-generation slave system for foreigners has been legally abolished. It also means that the land tenure laws of ancient Israel are legally abolished. There is no longer any legal obligation to return a piece of rural property to the original owner or his heirs. Thus, a debtor can legitimately collateralize a loan with his property. If he defaults on the loan, he loses his property unless he buys it back later on. (While this revision of my views did not please Mr. Mooney, it satisfied Greg Bahnsen, who once wrote that he did not agree with "Gary North's view of home mortgages."²⁸)

This is not to say that the debtor should do this. It is a great embarrassment to a man if he loses ownership of his family's property—his home—even in an urban society. If he is evicted from his home, he loses face. It is best if a man can own his home debt-free. He then does not face the threat of eviction and the embarrassment associated with eviction. But it is his legal right biblically to sign a debt contract to buy or refinance a home.²⁹

E. A Millennium of Misinterpretation

Medieval Roman Catholics and early modern Protestants misinterpreted these verses. They interpreted them as if they were prohibitions against all forms of interest, rather than prohibitions against interest earned from charitable loans to fellow believers, as the Exodus 22 text explicitly says: "If thou lend money to any of my people that is [are] poor. . . ." The church's hostile view of interest had its origin in the teaching of Aristotle. Aristotle's economic analysis, rather than the explicit teaching of the biblical texts, always was the unstated intellectual foundation of the church's prohibition on interest-bearing business loans.

27. North, Treasure and Dominion, ch. 6.

28. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 2nd ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1984), p. xix.

29. This does not mean that the state should subsidize this practice, as the U.S. government does, by offering deductions from total income, for income tax reporting purposes, for interest paid on mortgages. It also does not mean that the government should create (or promise) deposit insurance for those who put their money in savings institutions, with the legal right of immediate withdrawal, when the institutions then use this money to lend on 30-year mortgages. The length of the loan must be the same for both lender and debtor. Otherwise, the demand for immediate repayment by lenders threatens the solvency of the lending institution, which cannot demand repayment by the debtors.

1. Aristotle on Interest

Aristotle taught that money is sterile—that it cannot increase by moving from person to person over time—and therefore undeserving of any return beyond the principal. Economist Joseph Schumpeter wrote this of Aristotle: “He condemned interest—which he equated to ‘usury’ in all cases—on the ground that there was no justification for money, a mere medium of exchange, to increase in going from hand to hand (which of course it does not do). But he never asked the question why interest was being paid all the same. This question was first asked by the scholastic doctors. It is to them that the credit belongs of having been the first both to collect facts about interest and to develop the outlines of a theory of it. Aristotle himself had no theory of interest.”³⁰ Neither did the early church.

From the beginning, the West’s view of interest was clouded by the association of interest rates and physical production. They are not linked in economic theory. It was also clouded by the association of interest with money. Furthermore, the Greeks were hostile to the idea of long-term progress.³¹ They believed that time does not bring economic growth to society as a whole. This view was basic to all Greek thought. This pessimism about the economy dominated Western social thought until the Protestant Reformation. In this sense, the Greeks were not future-oriented, and Aristotle’s analysis of money was clouded by this view of time. Only with the Reformation, and especially the Calvinist branches, did men begin to abandon this pessimistic view of the earthly future, and also begin to abandon medieval interest theory.

Early medieval theologians were unaware of Aristotle’s specific arguments; copies of his manuscripts were not available until the eleventh century.³² Later, Aquinas did follow Aristotle in condemning interest.³³ On the other hand, some of the late-medieval scholastic theo-

30. Joseph A. Schumpeter, History of Economic Analysis (New York: Oxford University Press, 1954), p. 65.

31. On this point, I have always been in opposition to the opinion to the contrary of my teacher Robert Nisbet. See Nisbet, Social Change and History: Aspects of the Western Theory of Development (New York: Oxford University Press, 1969), ch. 1; History of the Idea of Progress (New York: Basic Books, 1980), ch. 1. I wrote “The Metaphor of Growth” for him personally (not a class) in 1967 or thereabouts as a rebuttal to his position. See Chapter 17.

32. John T. Noonan, The Scholastic Analysis of Usury (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1957), p. 12.

33. Mooney recommended both Aristotle and Aquinas in this regard: Mooney, Usury, pp. 43–45.

logians broke with Aristotle on this point.³⁴ With or without Aristotle, however, the Roman Church remained officially hostile to usury throughout the medieval period. We still find a few isolated Roman Catholic theologians who try to defend the view of those medieval Scholastic theologians who opposed all interest as usury.³⁵ Sadly, we occasionally find Protestant non-theologians and non-economists who say the same thing.³⁶

2. Not Interest as Such

There has been a great deal of confusion over the years regarding the “true meaning” of the English word usury, and how usury relates to interest, and how both words relate to the Bible. It is common for those without training in either economic theory or biblical studies to go rummaging around in 200-year-old English dictionaries in search of the “true meaning” of usury and interest. They have the illusion that what “Webster says”—any Webster—is somehow authoritative in economics or biblical studies. They may even pick up a Bible dictionary or two. Anyone who has looked up a word in the Oxford English Dictionary knows that there may be dozens of uses of the word. For example, look up “fix” or “set.” The same is true of any other dictionary, including a Hebrew or Greek dictionary. Usage varies.

The Bible expositor must look at the uses of words in the actual texts, sorting out how the words and the meanings they convey can be conformed to each other. It is long, hard work. This commentary is a good example of what the expositor must do. It is surely not accomplished in a short paragraph in a Bible dictionary. Why, then, do otherwise literate people think that a Bible dictionary—perhaps one written a century ago—is the last word on the meaning of a hotly disputed word? I think it is because they never took a graduate school course in anything. When the college student gets beyond the textbook level of 34. Alejandro A. Chafuen, Christians for Freedom: Late-Scholastic Economics (San Francisco: Ignatius, 1986), ch. 7.

35. Patrick Cleary, The Church and Usury: An Essay on Some Historical and Theological Aspects of Money Lending (Hawthorne, California: Christian Book Club of America, [1914] 1972). This publishing house was closely related to Omni Books. They were the primary publishers in the United States of “greenback” or “populist” tracts: defenses of fiat money controlled by the Federal government. For my critique of this movement, see Gary North, Gertrude Coogan’s Bluff: Greenback Populism as Conservative Economics (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, 2010). (<http://bit.ly/CoogBluff>) learning, he finds out how difficult words and meanings are in texts as recent as half a century ago—or in specialized disciplines with extensive jargons, the day before yesterday.

36. Mooney is a good example. See Appendix J: “Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney.”

Where do the writers of textbooks and dictionaries go in search of meanings? They go to fat academic studies, such as this one. They have no time to research the meaning of every word. They rely on specialists. It is strange, then, to find that critics of a book like this will offer as supposedly serious evidence against it the fact that several dictionaries do not agree with the specialist's findings.

A common error historically has been the idea that usury in the Bible means high (undefined) interest, but not interest as such. Such an interpretation first appeared in the Christian era, and is not supported by any Hebrew text.³⁷ This definition of biblical usury obviously cannot be reconciled with Deuteronomy 23:19, which prohibits any interest return whatsoever: "Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals [food, or "vittles"], usury of any thing that is lent upon usury." The question of the rate of interest is irrelevant; any charge above zero is prohibited.

The question then must be raised: Does this prohibition apply to every type of loan? The biblical answer is no. The Bible does indeed prohibit any increase from charitable loans to the impoverished neighbor or brother, if he is willing to live in terms of the biblical civil covenant, and if he is not in poverty because of laziness or rebellion. It is not the moral obligation of the Christian to subsidize laziness or evil. The impoverished person must be part of the deserving poor. All four of these qualifications must be present in order to qualify someone as a candidate for a morally mandatory, interest-free loan. Deuteronomy 23:19–20 does not mention poverty. The other texts do, including Ezekiel 18, which warns against a son who "Hath oppressed the poor and needy, hath spoiled by violence, hath not restored the pledge, and hath lifted up his eyes to the idols, hath committed abomination, Hath given forth upon usury, and hath taken increase: shall he then live? he shall not live: he hath done all these abominations; he shall surely die; his blood shall be upon him" (Ezek. 18:12–13). The specific texts that detail the limiting conditions should be used to interpret Deuteronomy 23:19–20.³⁸

37. Walter C. Kaiser, Jr., Toward Old Testament Ethics (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academie, 1983), p. 215.

38. Those who would place a universal ban on all interest-bearing loans interpret all Old Testament verses regarding usury in terms of the general, unqualified prohibi-

The Bible allows other types of interest payments. First, it does not prohibit interest payments on business loans, as Jesus' parable of the talents indicates (Matt. 25:27).³⁹ Second, the Old Testament specifically exempted the foreigner from the protection of the prohibition against interest. It was legal to charge him interest (Deut. 23:20). Thus, any attempt to argue that the Bible always prohibits interest payments is untenable.

3. Positive Injunctions

Any attempt to argue that interest payments are inherently illegitimate because they involve demanding "something for nothing," and therefore necessarily involve cheating, is inescapably an attempt to deny the universalism of the ethics of the Bible. The Bible specifies that certain kinds of positive charity are appropriate for believers to provide in certain circumstances, but are not required to provide in their dealings with unbelievers in the same circumstances. On the other hand, the Bible never allows the judicial oppression of anyone; all people under the jurisdiction of a God-covenanted civil society are entitled to equal protection of the law. "One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you" (Ex. 12:49).⁴⁰

Thus, if interest payments truly involved collecting something for no service received in return, then interest payments for every kind of loan would fall under the general biblical prohibitions against fraud and theft. Why would interest be allowed from loans to foreigners if interest involves taking something for nothing? Why would people be so foolish as to pay something for nothing, millennium after millennium? Interest does not involve collecting something for nothing, as I shall explain.

F. Interest: Time, Risk, and Price Inflation

The prohibition against interest payments for charitable loans was not limited to money loans; "usury of anything that was lent" was pro-tion of Deuteronomy 23:19–20. They also are forced to deny the plain teaching of Jesus' parable of the talents in Luke 19:23: "Wherefore then gavest not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury?" See below: "Interest-Seeking Loans."

39. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Books, [2000] 2012), ch. 47.

40. Chapter 14.

hibited (Deut. 23:19b). By refusing to make any distinction between money loans and loans “in kind” (goods or services), the Bible avoids a very serious analytical error. The Bible announces clearly that the phenomenon of interest is not confined to money loans. Had the church fathers understood the implications of this from the beginning, perhaps the church would have avoided over a millennium of error, 300 to 1550.

Confusion over the two forms of loans—money loans and loans in kind—for centuries kept incipient economists and other intelligent observers from coming to grips with the phenomenon of interest as a universal aspect of human action. Only with the writings of Eugen von Böhm-Bawerk in the late nineteenth century, and the writings of Ludwig von Mises and Frank Fetter in the early twentieth century, did modern economists at last unravel this aspect of interest. These economists classified interest payments under the general economic phenomenon of time-preference.⁴¹ Time-preference is an inherent aspect of human action; it is therefore inescapable. This explanation denies the Aristotelian idea that the phenomenon of interest is solely a function of money.

The prevailing market rate of interest is a component of three factors, modern economics informs us: (1) time-preference, or the originary rate of interest (as Mises calls it); (2) a risk premium; and (3) the inflation (or deflation) premium. Few economic textbooks ever explain this, and no proponents of zero-interest free market loans ever discuss it.

1. Time-Preference

The originary interest rate, or time-preference factor, is the least understood and yet the most fundamental aspect of the phenomenon of the market rate of interest.⁴² Other things remaining equal, a given

41. Eugen von Böhm-Bawerk, History and Critique of Interest Theories, vol. 1 of Capital and Interest, 3 vols. (South Holland, Illinois: Libertarian Press, [1921 ed.] 1959), (<http://bit.ly/B-Binterest>); Frank A. Fetter, Capital, Interest, and Rent: Essays in the Theory of Distribution, ed. Murray N. Rothbard (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, 1977) (<http://bit.ly/FetterCap>); Ludwig von Mises, The Theory of Money and Credit (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1912] 1953) (<http://bit.ly/MisesTMC>); Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), ch. 19. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>); Murray N. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1962] 2009), chaps. 5–7 (<http://bit.ly/RothbardMES>).

42. Mises, Human Action, ch. 19.

quantity and quality of future goods is worth less in the free market (and in people's minds) than the same basket of goods today. This is not because, in the words of an old proverb, "a bird in hand is worth two in the bush." I am not speaking here about comparative risks of obtaining ownership, "in hand" vs. "in the bush," meaning present vs. future. I will discuss the risk factor later on. I am speaking here about interest as a fundamental category of human action.

We live in a universe that is structured by the category of time. We necessarily live and act in the present. We cannot escape the constraints of time. We prefer satisfaction now. A brand-new automobile (or anything else) is more valuable to me right now than the delivery of an identical car a year from now (other things—public tastes, market value, gasoline prices, etc.—being equal). I act in the present. I choose to do in a sequence of events those things that I am capable of doing with whatever assets I possess. I plan for the future, but I am not immediately responsible for the future, for I have no control over it. I am responsible only in the present. Thus, what happens in the present is more relevant for me than what I expect in the earthly future, because I must live in the present in order to get to the future. I am responsible in the here and now, not in the there and then.

Let us consider all this in more general terms. Biblically speaking, an individual is responsible to God in the present. He cannot escape this covenantal responsibility. As a person created in God's image, he must place higher value on action in the present than action in the future. He is not yet responsible for what he will do in the future. Thus, an individual does those things first that he rates as most important in a calculated sequence of events. He places higher value on present goods and services than on future goods and services, because he has a proposed plan of action: first, second, third, etc. in a plan of sequential events. He does not control future goods; he controls only present goods. He must act in the present. Thus, the goods that he owns in the present are worth more to him than those same physical goods in the expected future. There is a premium for present goods over identical future goods in the world of human action because of the time-constrained nature of covenantal responsibility before God. "Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof" (Matt. 6:34).⁴³ Also sufficient unto the day are the pleasures thereof.

43. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 15.

A lender will always require an interest return on a loan in order to compensate him for the loss of his use of his present goods. The borrower should not expect to get something for nothing. Critics of interest claim that the lender gets something for nothing. On the contrary, if there is no interest return on the loan, the borrower gets something for nothing.⁴⁴ The borrower is offering the lender nothing for something when he asks the lender to transfer to him something worth more (a presently owned good, e.g., money) in exchange for something worth less (that same or a comparable good in the future). The rate of interest expresses the difference in present market value between present goods and physically identical future goods. It does not matter whether a loan is made in the form of money or any other commodity; the same discount on the market price of future goods exists for all commodities.

The more future-oriented the lender is—the more he values the future in relation to the present—the lower the rate of interest he will require in order to persuade him to make the loan. This is why future-oriented cultures experience greater economic growth per capita than present-oriented cultures. It is easier to obtain capital loans in such societies, meaning that at any given rate of interest, more loans are available. This is another aspect of consumer sovereignty. If consumers in one society value future wealth more highly than consumers in another society do, both groups “buy” the future they prefer. How? The former save more (defer consumption) at any given rate of interest than the latter do.

Consider the case of two societies, each possessing capital equipment and land of equal value. If consumers in Civilization A place higher value on future goods (low time-preference) than the people of Civilization B place on future goods (high time-preference), it therefore means that Civilization A places lower value on present goods than Civilization B does. If people in both societies plan production equally accurately—if their respective entrepreneurs and laborers are equally skilled—then the consumers in Civilization A who prefer future goods will get what they want if they plan accurately: higher future income. They must pay for that higher future income by forego-

44. Obviously, I am assuming here that market competition has eliminated differences in the retail price of the goods. Some sellers will offer goods or services on the basis that the buyer does not have to pay any interest on the loan for a month, three months, or whatever. The economically literate buyer knows better. There is a concealed interest rate in the selling price.

ing present income. They save more. They allocate more present goods for increased future consumption than citizens of Civilization B do. Citizens of Civilization B also get what they want: higher present income than the future-oriented citizens Civilization A enjoy, but lower future income. They save less. The free market interest rate is the economic indicator that both reflects and guides the respective concerns of consumers, present goods vs. future goods.

If there were no market rate of interest, it would be impossible for anyone to make rational economic plans. It would be irrational to expect anyone to be able to plan rationally if all prices were compelled by law to be the same. It would be equally irrational to expect anyone to be able to plan rationally if the price of future goods were compelled by law to be the same as the price of present goods. Future goods are less valuable than present goods. Passing a law does not make them of equal value.⁴⁵

What is really being said by those who pass “usury laws” is that capital is free of charge. (“Capital” = land + labor over time.)⁴⁶ Thus, when capital’s rental price is lowered by law below the market rate—or worse, to zero—the supply of this supposedly free good dries up.

Interest is not the “product” of capital. Interest does not originate with the productivity of capital. Economic rent is the stream of income which is produced by a capital asset. The interest rate (people’s time-preference) is applied to the future value of this expected stream of income. A better way to put this is to say that the prevailing rate of interest discounts the future expected value of this expected stream of income.⁴⁷

Similarly, interest is not the “product” of a loan. It is simply the discount applied to the future stream of income called repayment. Interest arises from the present-orientation of human beings as creatures of the present; it is applied to the future as a discount. Murray Rothbard writes: “The time market is therefore not restricted to the loan market. It permeates the entire production structure of the complex economy.”⁴⁸ This is such a simple concept, yet it took over two millennia for anyone to figure it out. Not many people understand it even

45. The only reason the Bible’s law against interest can be expected to function is to admit that such loans are charitable loans. Such a moral (though not civil) law requires the lender to give the borrower something for nothing.

46. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, ch. 6:5.

47. Fetter, Capital, Interest, and Rent, pp. 192–221: “The Relations between Rent and Interest.”

48. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, p. 378.

today.

2. Risk Premium

The market rate of interest also contains a risk premium. The risk that a particular borrower will not repay his loan must be shared among all borrowers within any particular class of borrowers—class in this case referring to a statistical grouping of borrowers according to lending risks. Toyota will pay a lower rate of interest to borrow money than a buyer of a used Toyota car will have to pay. A nation of people who believe that the wicked borrow and do not repay (Ps. 37:21),⁴⁹ and who believe that God judges the wicked, will experience lower rates of interest than a nation of “devil-may-care, but God doesn’t” borrowers.

If the national government is trusted by the public, then its debt will be able to be sold at the lowest rate of interest. Major corporations will enjoy the privilege of paying rates slightly higher than the national government. At the bottom of the pile are those who are least credit-worthy. They will be able to get only small loans from pawn shops that demand collateral (highly discounted, in case the lender defaults), or, worst of all, from “loan sharks” who charge very high rates, and who are willing to accept this risk of default only because they are also willing to impose physical violence on those who refuse to pay on time. They do not “re-schedule” loans without rearranging faces.

3. Price Inflation Premium

The inflation premium becomes an increasingly important factor in the market rate of interest in a society which permits or encourages monetary debasement, including fractional reserve banking. Loans will contain an inflation premium component—interest rates higher than the mere ordinary rate, or “present goods vs. future goods” component. The lender of money will lose if money of less purchasing power is returned to him. Inflation raises long-term interest rates.⁵⁰

One way around price inflation is to make loans in kind. The lender loans gold coins, for example, and demands repayment of both principal and interest in gold coins. Or perhaps the loan is made in a comparatively stable foreign currency. The loan’s price inflation premium then disappears.

49. North, Confidence and Dominion, ch. 6.

50. Monetary inflation can temporarily lower short-term interest rates: Mises, Human Action, ch. 20.

Summary

The reason why interest rates never fall to zero is that a lender does not need to transfer an asset to anyone else merely to have that same asset returned to him in the future. He can hold onto the asset and achieve the same economic return in the future. Meanwhile, he has the asset ready for immediate use, should a profitable opportunity arise. Therefore, should someone voluntarily lend any asset at a zero rate of interest, it is because the person is making a charitable loan, or else he is buying safer storage for the asset. In the latter case, he is then paying an implicit fee for storage; the interest that he is forfeiting that the borrower will receive by re-lending the asset, or the immediate access to the asset that he is forfeiting. A negative interest rate, should it ever appear on a voluntary market, is clearly evidence of a storage fee.

