People do not voluntarily give up something for nothing unless they are confused about the details of the transaction.⁵¹ Thus, all talk about a zero rate of interest in a time-bound, risk-bound, free market world is nonsense.⁵² In an attempt to achieve such a world, the civil government would have to prohibit all profit-seeking lending and borrowing, including mortgages; but that would not be a world of voluntary exchange. It would also be a world of barbarism: the destruction of all capital by consumption.⁵³

G. Inescapable Interest

The phenomenon of interest is inescapable in any economy. It is not something “extracted” from borrowers by lenders. It is inherent in the very way we all think about the future, whether as borrowers or lenders. We are creatures. We are always time-constrained. We live in the present. Those items which we presently possess are of greater use to us—and therefore of greater economic value to us—right now than the prospect of using those same physical items in the future. We are covenantally responsible now for the use of whatever we presently own or control. We therefore discount future value as against present value. It is this present market discount of future value, above all, which is the reason why there is an interest phenomenon in economics.

51. In the case of making a zero-interest charitable loan, the lender is honoring God. He is thereby building up treasures in heaven (Matt. 6:20), to be received in the future (I Cor. 3:12–14).

52. Rothbard, Man, Economy, and State, p. 382.

53. Ibid., pp. 399–400, 450–51.

1. Perpetual Motion Machine

Any attempt to legislate away the inescapable effects of the rate of interest (discount for time-preference) should be seen as a doomed attempt to escape both time and creaturehood. To put it as bluntly as possible, anyone who argues that an economy can operate apart from the effects of the time-preference factor has adopted the economic equivalent of the perpetual motion machine. Both arguments—perpetual motion physics and zero interest economics—rely on men's obtaining "something for nothing."

In fact, anyone who would recommend civil legislation against all interest payments is far more dangerous than a person who would argue for legislation prohibiting all machines except perpetual motion machines. The second person is instantly recognized as a crackpot whose proposed legislation would destroy civilization, assuming that the civil government would seriously attempt to enforce it. The anti-usurer isn't as readily recognized as a dangerous crackpot, even though his recommendation, if seriously enforced by civil law, would be equally a threat to the survival of civilization. Both forms of legislation, if enforced, would decapitalize society. The crackpot amateur physicist, however, cannot do what the crackpot amateur economist can do and has done in the past: present himself as a defender of "love" in social theory, a protector of society's "bank-oppressed" little people, and a person who has found a long-neglected way to eliminate from this world a group of corrupt money middlemen and their extortionate ways, thereby making everyone else a little bit richer. Even worse, the anti-interest destroyer of nations who would ruin society by making illegal all interest payments can easily present his case in the name of the Bible. The nut (or outright occultist) who would prohibit by civil law all non-perpetual motion machines cannot easily appeal to any body of literature in the history of moral thought. Nevertheless, both types of self-professed reformers—the perpetual motion "physicist" and the zero-interest "economist"—are ultimately appealing to the occult or to magic, but the anti-usurer's appeal is not recognized as such, even by Christians. Usury laws are the destroyer of nations.

2. Let's Make a Deal

To make my point clear—that interest is inescapable—let us assume that you are a potential buyer of my piece of property, a gold mine. I persuade you that you can earn one ounce of gold per year net profit from this land, after all expenses are paid, simply by paying someone to dig the gold ore and selling it to a refiner. Furthermore, we both agree (and all other potential buyers agree) that the mine will probably be able to produce this profit for a thousand years, with the first ounce coming in one year. Then I ask you to pay me one thousand ounces of gold, cash, for the mine.

You, of course, protest. It is not worth a thousand ounces, cash. I counter by showing you that you have already agreed that the land will produce a thousand ounces of gold, so why shouldn't I be entitled to a thousand ounces? We all agree: equal for equal, right? Where is my argument incorrect?

The error has to do with the value to you today of those future ounces of gold. I am asking you to give me gold, ounce for ounce, in advance. But what is the gold mine's thousandth ounce, delivered a thousand and one years from now, really worth to you? Will you give up your thousandth ounce of gold today (and all that it will buy) for that thousandth ounce in the distant future for some unnamed heir of yours? I doubt it. Why won't you? Because you apply a cash discount to that future stream of income. An ounce of gold a thousand and one years down the road isn't worth as much to you today as your thousandth ounce is worth to you today. You will not be here to enjoy that future thousandth ounce; you can enjoy whatever your presently owned thousandth ounce will buy today.

Now, think about this process of discounting for cash. We call this process capitalization. Let us assume that you own an ounce of gold today. An ounce of gold fifty years from now, or twenty years from now, is not worth your ounce of gold today. A future ounce of gold, whether scheduled to be received a year from now or a thousand and one years from now, is discounted in your mind. We have therefore discovered a law of human action (which applies in economics): the present cash market value of expected future goods is always discounted compared with the present cash market value of the identical physical goods.

What is this discount called? It is called the rate of interest. You discount the future value to you of any good compared to what that same good is worth to you immediately, whether it is that automobile or an ounce of gold from that piece of property. For me to get you to hand over the present good today (money), I have to promise to return it to you in the future, plus extra money or other benefit. In other words, I have to pay you interest.

Let us consider another example. You win a brand new Rolls Royce automobile. These cars do not change in styling very often. They actually look more like a 1953 Packard than like a new car. But they are a status symbol. Assume that all taxes are paid by the prize-granter. You are now offered a choice: delivery of the car today or in a year. The style probably will not change (low risk factor). Tastes of the very rich public for Rolls Royces probably will not change. The car will be taken care of, you are assured. Make your choice: the car now or the car in a year. The choice is obvious. Why is it obvious? Because of interest, meaning time-preference. "Better now than later!"

Why do some people believe that your preference is pathological, the product of your morally diseased mind? Because they are utopians.

H. Utopianism: A World Without Scarcity

It would be nice if I did not have to mention any of the following crackpot theories of economics. The reason why this task is unavoidable is that these ideas have spread far and wide in Christian circles. Christian economics has been an ignored topic for centuries. What has passed for Christian economics in the past has either been baptized moralism or baptized humanism. Numerous crackpot schemes have been promoted in the name of Christian economics, and still are being promoted. The closer we get to the question of monetary policy and interest, the more likely we are to discover pamphlets claiming to be Christian.⁵⁴

Anyone who seriously discusses the possibility of judicially compulsory zero-interest loans in a "free" or "wise" economy is a monetary crank, a person with no formal training in economics or social theory, and a person dangerously devoid of understanding regarding the human condition. You know for sure that you are listening to an economic amateur when you hear someone seriously propose the possibility of an economy without any legal debt, meaning an economy without legally enforceable contracts to deliver goods or services in the present in exchange for a greater quantity of goods or services in the future. This would be an economy run exclusively in terms of zero-interest business loans.

There has never been such a phenomenon as a zero-interest business loan. There never will be. Why not? Because time is not a zero-price resource.

54. See Appendix J: "Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney."

1. Crackpot Non-Economists

There have been a lot of these “anti-usury” amateur economists on the fringes of the American conservative movement ever since the days of the “greenback” movement and the politically radical Populist movement of the late nineteenth century. These views on debt were associated with calls for inflation and the free coinage of silver.⁵⁵ Radical conservatives and radical leftists have cooperated for over a century in these Populist-type movements.⁵⁶ The Technocracy movement and the Social Credit movement are contemporary examples.⁵⁷ Both groups gained their prominence during the economic confusion of the 1930s.⁵⁸ Defenders of such views on interest-free debt are also to be found in certain Christian circles.⁵⁹ Very traditional Roman Catholics have promoted such ideas, most notably the notorious anti-Semitic radio priest of the 1930s, Rev. Charles Coughlin.⁶⁰ Today, the “British Israel” or “Identity” movement is filled with tract-writers who offer such 55. Allen Weinstein, Prelude to Populism: Origins of the Silver Issue, 1867–1878 (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1970); Willis A. Carto (ed.), Profiles in Populism (Old Greenwich, Connecticut: Flag Press, 1982). See the three-volume reprint of “Money”: A Monthly Magazine (New York: Money Pub. Co., 1897–1900).

56. The most obvious example of a liberal promoter of such views is Jerry Voorhis, the California Democrat who lost his seat in Congress in 1946 to a young Richard Nixon. He later became associated with the co-operative movement. See his books, Out of Debt—Out of Danger (New York: Devin-Adair, 1943), published by a conservative publisher, and Beyond Victory (New York: Farrar & Rinehart, 1944).

57. The Social Credit movement of Canada (especially in the province of British Columbia) no longer takes seriously the monetary theories of the founder of Social Credit, Major Douglas. The Party may sell Major Douglas’ books or pamphlets based on them, such as Maurice Colbourne’s The Meaning of Social Credit (Edmonton, Alberta: Social Credit Board, 1933). But once in office, Social Credit politicians never mention Social Credit monetary theory.

58. Frank Arkright, The ABC of Technocracy (New York: Harper & Bros., 1933); E. S. Holter, The ABC of Social Credit (New York: Coward-McCann, 1934).

59. Cf. George F. MacLeod, Money: A Christian View (Glasgow: William Maclellan, 1963). In Australia, the Social Credit movement is heavily dependent on support by Christians. Cf. Eric D. Butler, Social Credit and Christian Philosophy (Melbourne: New Times Limited, 1956). The Australian movement, never having achieved any political influence, still takes Major Douglas seriously.

60. Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, The New Deal in Money (Royal Oak, Michigan: Radio League of the Little Flower, 1933); Money! Questions and Answers (Royal Oak, Michigan: National Union for Social Justice, 1936). On his national influence, see Sheldon Marcus, Father Coughlin: The Tumultuous Life of the Priest of the Little Flower (Boston: Little, Brown, 1973). Another Catholic priest whose books have promoted these monetary theories is Rev. Denis Fahey. Cf. Fahey, Money Manipulation and Social Order (Dublin: Browne and Nolan, 1944).

monetary theories, all claiming that their views are Bible-based.⁶¹ Two of the monetary crank paperback books in my library are written by dentists and physicians.⁶² Another was written by a Nobel Prize-winning chemist, Frederick Soddy.⁶³ Few, if any, of these books have been written by a trained economist.⁶⁴ All of them display bad typography, and many of them reprint 1930s-style (or earlier) political cartoons. (Occasionally, they are printed from computer print-outs.)⁶⁵ There is a peculiar combined scent of forgotten used books and fresh mimeograph ink that emanates from the American and Australian Social Credit movement.⁶⁶

2. The Crackpot Economics of J. M. Keynes

I have said that no trained economist has taught such doctrines. There is one glaring exception, which may not be an exception after all: John Maynard Keynes. Mr. Keynes actually earned only a bachelor's degree in mathematics. He never took a graduate degree in economics or any other subject. His father, Cambridge University economist John Neville Keynes, got him a job teaching economics at Cambridge by putting up the money to pay his salary. From that privileged pulpit, he began to make his international reputation.

Mr. Keynes taught that "Interest to-day rewards no genuine sacrifice, any more than does the rent of land. The owner of capital can obtain interest because capital is scarce, just as the owner of land can obtain rent because land is scarce. But whilst there may be intrinsic reas-

61. J. Taylor Peddie, The Economic Mechanism of Scripture: The Cure for the World Crises (London: Williams & Norgate, 1934); C. F. Parker, Moses the Economist (London: Covenant Pub. Co., 1947); C. O. Stadskev, New Money for the New Age (Hopkins, Minnesota: Gospel Temple, 1968).

62. Cf. Edward Popp, D.D.S., Money—Bona Fide or Non-Bona Fide (Port Washington, Wisconsin: Wisconsin Educational Fund, 1970); Charles Norburn, M.D., Honest Money (Asheville, North Carolina: New Puritan Library, 1983).

63. Frederick Soddy, Wealth, Virtual Wealth and Debt: The Solution of the Economic Paradox, 3rd ed. (Hawthorne, California: Omni, 1961).

64. A pamphlet by Georges-Henri Levesque, O.P., Social Credit and Catholicism (Hawthorne, California: Omni, [1936]), seems to be an exception. He taught economics at Laval and Montreal Universities, the pamphlet says. He was a graduate of the School of Social and Political Sciences, Lille, France. To say that he was not a well-known figure is putting it mildly.

65. Richard Kelly Hoskins, War Cycles—Peace Cycles (Lynchburg, Virginia: Virginia Group, 1985).

66. For a critique of these doctrines, see Gary North, Salvation Through Inflation: The Economics of Social Credit (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1993). (<http://bit.ly/gnsti>) ons for the scarcity of land, there are no intrinsic reasons for the scarcity of capital.”⁶⁷ His liberal followers do not want to admit that he believed such nonsense, and the right-wing monetary cranks who do believe it do not want to be associated with him or his ideas. Nevertheless, he is one of theirs, meaning both ideological groups.

Keynes promoted the theories of Major Douglas, who founded Social Credit.⁶⁸ Keynes also recommended Silvio Gesell, a true monetary crank and socialist, whom he referred to as “the strange, unduly neglected prophet.”⁶⁹ He spent several pages of the General Theory praising Gesell. Referring to the preface of Gesell’s Natural Economic Order (1916), Keynes said that “The answer to Marxism is, I think, to be found along the lines of this preface.”⁷⁰ He went on: “He argues that the growth of real capital is held back by the money-rate of interest, and that if this brake were removed the growth of real capital would be, in the modern world, so rapid that a zero money-rate of interest would probably be justified, not indeed forthwith, but within a comparatively short period of time.”⁷¹ But can the money rate of interest be reduced to zero? Of course, Keynes said.

Keynes praised Gesell’s plan⁷² for the government to issue paper money with a date stamped on it; to keep the money legal, the users would have to get their money re-stamped each month. There would be a stamping tax on the money. Keynes highly recommended this scheme. “According to my theory it [the stamping tax] should be roughly equal to the excess of the money-rate of interest (apart from the stamps) over the marginal efficiency of capital corresponding to a rate of new investment compatible with full employment.”⁷³ But Keynes also taught that the marginal efficiency of capital could fall to zero “within a single generation. . . .”⁷⁴ In fact, he said that it would be “comparatively easy to make capital-goods so abundant that the marginal efficiency of capital is zero. . . .”⁷⁵ Thus, when the marginal efficiency of capital falls to zero, then there will be no economic reason 67. John Maynard Keynes, The General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money (New York: Macmillan, 1936), p. 376.

68. Ibid., pp. 370–71.

69. Ibid., p. 353.

70. Ibid., p. 355.

71. Ibid., p. 357.

72. And also Irving Fisher’s, another prominent academic proponent of government-produced fiat money.

73. Idem.

74. Ibid., p. 220.

75. Ibid., p. 221.

for the rate of interest not to do the same. Just tax interest and rents out of existence! In short, under his system of economics, "the rentier would disappear. . . ." ⁷⁶

This is so clearly an example of crackpot economic utopianism that his respectable academic disciples have spent two generations either ignoring this or explaining it away as really meaning something else. But he meant what he said. One reason why the General Theory is so incoherent, in sharp contrast to his earlier economic writings, is that it is an attempted defense of a program to produce the impossible: a world without scarcity, a world where capital is free for the asking, a world without interest.

It is not surprising, therefore, to find that Keynes was also a promoter of the basic monetary theory and policy of Social Credit. Social Credit economics teaches that the government should create fiat money to match the aggregate economic growth of the nation. This, we are told, will keep effective demand high enough to promote full employment. This is what Keynes taught, too: "There will be a determinate amount of increase in the quantity of effective demand which, after taking everything into account, will correspond to, and be in equilibrium with, the increase in the quantity of money." ⁷⁷ Keynes was unquestionably a monetary crank.

I agree with Sir Eric Roll, at least on this one point: the growth of such utopian ideas represented a reaction to the Great Depression of the 1930s, and it also represented a decline in the influence of rational economic reasoning. "In particular, the social and political roots of the monetary doctrines of Major Douglas, of the mystical views on wealth and debt of Professor Soddy, of the 'free land' and 'free money' agitation of Silvio Gesell, would form an interesting subject of analysis. What needs, however, to be pointed out is that the keen discussion which those views evoked and the many adherents which they could claim, particularly in the years immediately after the Great Depression, were both a symptom and an aggravating cause of the decline of relevance and of authority of economic theory." ⁷⁸ I regret only that Professor Roll did not have the academic courage to list Keynes in this menagerie of cranks.

76. Idem.

77. Ibid., p. 299.

78. Eric Roll, A History of Economic Thought, 3rd ed. (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1956), p. 457.

I. Capitalization: Human vs. Non-Human

I fully acknowledge that men, in their quest for autonomy from God, are willing to become slaves of sin, and therefore in principle to become slaves of other men. I recognize the accuracy of the New Testament principle that it is best to owe no man anything (Rom. 13:8a).⁷⁹ I also recognize that modern economics has promoted the ideal of perpetual debt for perpetual prosperity, and that a world so constructed will eventually collapse if, as happens when governments control the issue of money, political pressures from debtors create steady monetary inflation. Long-term debt tends to lure debtors into the illusion that monetary inflation benefits them more than it harms society. In the short run, they may be correct; not in the long run.

Nevertheless, the long-term capitalization of inanimate equipment, agricultural land, and work animals is biblically legitimate. So, in the Old Testament economy, was the capitalization of foreign heathen slaves, although not for resale to foreign nations (Lev. 25:44–46).⁸⁰ The borrower owns an economically valuable asset. The lender may be willing to lend money if this asset serves as collateral for the loan. The borrower owes the lender something, but it is something that he already owns. He can “buy his way out” of the loan contract by turning over to the lender the agreed-upon collateral. He does not place himself in bondage with this type of loan. He can pay off the loan at any time, either by turning over cash or the collateral to the lender.

Thus, the capitalization of long-term rents is legitimate today. In a biblical society, governments would not be allowed to issue money.⁸¹ Neither would fractional reserve banks.⁸² This would eliminate the primary biblical objection against collateralized debt: the subsidy that monetary inflation offers to debtors. They could not pay off their debts with depreciated money.

1. Unsecured Debt

What about unsecured debt? That has to be the decision of the lender. Are the risks worth it? He decides. He should have the legal right to extend credit. The creditor believes that debt is to his advant-

79. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12.

80. North, Boundaries and Dominion, ch. 30.

81. Gary North, Honest Money: The Biblical Blueprint for Money and Banking (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986), ch. 10. (<http://bit.ly/gnmoney>) age. The Bible says that such personal debt is best avoided (Rom. 13:8), but it does not forbid debt. In some cases, debt may actually be to the benefit of the debtor. Debt to finance a higher education is one example. But the debtor must always understand that by taking an unsecured debt, he is risking disgrace. He has in principle become a bond-servant (Prov. 22:7).

82. Ibid., ch. 11.

In a biblical social order, a defaulting debtor would be required to sell everything he owns to pay his creditors. “The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again: but the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth” (Ps. 37:21).⁸³ There must be sanctions against such public wickedness as defaulting on a loan. When a person declares bankruptcy, he is publicly announcing that the total value of his possessions is insufficient to repay his creditor or creditors. He violates the terms of the loan’s contract if he retains any personal assets after declaring bankruptcy. He must turn over everything he owes to his creditor up to the amount specified in the contract. (Some societies may allow him to retain some of his possessions, but this exception was known to lenders beforehand, and the added risk to the creditor was already built into the loan’s risk premium.) He cannot legitimately be sold into indentured servitude unless this was specified in the loan contract, and if it was, then the loan had to be a zero-interest charity loan, as I have argued above (“Defining Poverty by Statute”). There should be little doubt that the abolition of debtors prison in the West during the late-nineteenth century was an act in conformity with biblical law’s standards of debt and repayment.

If such laws were on the statute books, there would be a lot less consumer debt.

2. Collateralized Debt

The lender is permitted to take a poor man’s cloak as collateral, but the cloak must be returned at night. This is a strange form of collateral, because the lender cannot use it when it is most needed. Its purpose is two-fold. First, to restrict loans of charity to local regions whenever possible. Lenders are supposed to be in close contact with borrowers. They should know their character. Lenders are very likely employers. They can distinguish a true emergency from a disguised consumer loan. Second, to reduce multiple indebtedness. While the lender cannot use the cloak during the night, the debtor cannot use it during the day. He cannot use the same cloak as collateral for several loans at the same time.⁸⁴ He is limited in his ability to indebt himself and his future.

83. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 6

A lender is not required to take any form of collateral. This indicates that a major form of collateral for a loan is the lender's perception of the borrower's character and his ability to repay the loan. Character, in fact, is a better form of collateral, because the lender does not have to go to the trouble of returning the cloak each evening. This reduces transaction costs. The less trustworthy the borrower's character, the more likely that a lender would require the cloak, fearing multiple indebtedness.

J. Multiple Indebtedness

There is a very important application of the law of collateral, one that is seldom discussed.

1. The Cloak

Consider the case of a poor man who comes in search of an emergency loan from his neighbor. The neighbor assesses the man's character, and concludes that the man is likely to repay the loan. The lender has made a mistake. The man may visit several people to ask for an emergency loan. If he collects from all of them, he may waste the money. Even if he repays these loans, he has dealt fraudulently with lenders by accepting numerous interest-bearing loans. They have unknowingly borne added risk.

But what if the lender suspects that the borrower is somewhat unreliable? The lender wants to honor God, so he intends to make the loan. But he wants collateral. He wants to give the borrower an economic incentive to repay the loan as soon as possible. The man is poor. He has no collateral of value. But the lender can still demand the man's cloak. He is not allowed to take the widow's cloak (Deut. 24:17).

What good is this cloak to the lender? He must return it in the evening, when the man needs it. It cannot be sold. It cannot be used by anyone in the lender's household. It is a nuisance, for it must be returned each evening. But it has two important economic functions.

84. This was the opinion of the twelfth-century Jewish scholar, Ibn Ezra, citing Saadia Gaon. Nehama Leibowitz, Studies in Shemot, Part 2 (Jerusalem: World Zionist Organization, 1976), p. 418.

First, the borrower has to come back every evening to get it back. This is an inconvenience. He will have an added incentive to repay the loan early. Second, because the garment is in the possession of the lender during the day, it cannot be used as collateral with another lender. One piece of collateral can be used for only one loan at a time, if the lender demands collateral. If the borrower kept it, and simply signed a note saying that it stands as collateral for the loan, he may sign several such notes for several lenders. If he defaults, they cannot all collect their collateral. Therefore, by permitting the lender to demand half a day's collateral, biblical law reduces the temptation on the part of borrowers to commit fraud.

2. Fractional Reserve Banking

Modern banking is based on the flagrant flouting of the prohibition against multiple indebtedness. For every asset a bank owns, there are many legal claims against that asset at any point in time. The bank keeps fewer reserves on hand to meet demands of lenders to the bank—depositors—than the bank has promised to deliver on demand. This is called fractional reserve banking. It is the universal form of banking and has been since the early modern period. It was an invention of the Renaissance.

Depositors believe that their money is available on demand. The banks have promised them that it is available on demand. But it isn't. If every depositor came to the bank one day and began to withdraw his money, the bank would go bankrupt. The bank loaned out the depositors' money in order to earn interest on the loans. Part of this return is paid to depositors as interest on their accounts. The depositors know this, but they all assume (as do the bank's managers) that not all depositors will try to get their money out on the same day. They assume that withdrawals will tend to equal deposits on any given day. Usually, this assumption is correct. On the day when men lose faith in the solvency of the bank—the bank's ability to repay those few depositors who demand their money—a bank run ensues. Everyone wants his money at once. The bank defaults. It has run out of "raiment."

Without the protection of state and federal government agencies, fractional reserve banking would face the prospect of bank runs, as lenders (depositors) would lose faith in overextended (multipally indebted) banks. The most important form of collateral a bank should have is its reputation for honesty and conservative (minimal fractional reserves) investing policies. In a truly biblical society, banks would be required to have 100% reserves.⁸⁵ In the early twenty-first century, however, a commercial bank's most important form of collateral in the United States is the legal backing of the federal government, which stands ready to repay depositors in bankrupt banks—a guarantee that is ultimately backed up by the fiat money of the Federal Reserve System, the nation's central bank.⁸⁶ We have guaranteed inflation by ignoring the warning against multiple indebtedness.

Fractional reserve banking is inflationary, for it creates credit money—money that is backed only by faith. When a person deposits his money on the condition that he can write a check and spend it, the inflation is about to begin. The banker loans, say, 90% of this money to a borrower. The borrower then spends the money. Whoever gets the borrower's money then either spends it or deposits it in his bank, and the process continues. As a theoretical limit (though not always in practice), for every dollar deposited in a banking system with 10% reserves, nine additional dollars will eventually come into circulation.⁸⁷ Thus, fractional reserve banking is inherently inflationary.⁸⁸ It also creates inflationary booms and their inevitable consequences, depressions.⁸⁹

K. Warehouse Receipts

Say that a person brings in ten ounces of gold to a warehouse for safekeeping, and the warehouse issues a receipt for ten ounces of gold. The owner pays a fee for storing the money, but he presumably increases the safety of his holdings. The warehouse specializes in protecting money metals from burglars. The depositor pays for this specialized service. It is somewhat like a safety deposit box in a bank, except that the warehouse issues a receipt.

The receipt may begin to function as money. If people trust the warehouse, they will accept a receipt for all or part of this gold in payment for goods and services. A piece of paper authorizing the bearer to collect a specified amount of gold is just about the same as the actual ounce of gold. Besides, the gold is safer in storage, and paper is a lot

85. North, Honest Money, ch. 7.

86. On the operations of the Federal Reserve System, see North, ibid., ch. 9.

87. The process is described, step by step, in a free book which was published by the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, Modern Money Mechanics.

88. North, Honest Money, ch. 8.

89. Mises, Human Action, ch. 20.

more convenient than pieces of metal.

1. The Great Temptation

But a problem threatens the system. What if the warehouse owner recognizes that people in the community trust him? They know that he has a lot of guards watching everything, and that he has always been scrupulously honest. He then betrays this trust. He issues warehouse receipts for gold for which there is no gold in reserve. He then loans these receipts to borrowers. The receipts serve as money. People accept them in exchange for goods and services. These warehouse receipts are considered “as good as gold.” Why? Because they are always exchangeable for gold upon demand. Just take the piece of paper to the warehouse, and get your gold. No problem!

But now there is a problem. There are more receipts for gold than there is gold in reserve to pay all the potential bearers on demand. These “demand deposits” are now vulnerable to that most feared of financial events, a bank run. Depositors who have receipts come down and demand repayment. There is not enough gold in reserve to meet the total demand.

The warehouse has placed itself in a position similar to that of the poor man who immorally secures loans from a dozen lenders on the basis of one piece of collateral. The warehouse owner has become a banker. He makes loans, for which borrowers agree to pay him interest in the future, along with a return of the principal. But the money, once loaned out, is gone until the day that repayment comes. The warehouse is vulnerable to a run on the deposits. The warehouse owes gold to the depositors. It is indebted to them. The deposits are legal liabilities to the bank. The bank has become multiply indebted.

2. The Creation of Money

The warehouse receipt circulates as if it were gold. Now, if gold serves as money in that society, the pieces of paper will also serve as money.

When these pieces of paper are pure money-metal substitutes, nothing changes. Physical gold is taken out of circulation and put into a warehouse. A piece of paper (a warehouse receipt) substitutes for the physical gold. No new money has come into circulation. No money has been taken out of circulation. Nothing fundamental changes, except for convenience. But if the warehouse owner writes up a warehouse receipt for gold when there is no new gold on deposit, he has thereby increased the money supply in the community. No one has come to the warehouse and deposited gold (taken it out of the day-to-day economy). So, the warehouse receipt is inescapably inflationary. It is an addition of money into the economy. I am defining “inflation” as “an increase in the money supply,” the way dictionaries and economists defined it before 1940. The result is either: (1) rising prices, or (2) prices will not fall as far as they would otherwise have fallen.

Here is what normally would happen. The warehouse receipt circulates as if it were gold. If the warehouse owner is very cautious, and issues only a few extra receipts, probably nobody will find out. He will collect a little interest from borrowers, and everyone will be happy. Prices of goods (as denominated in gold) may rise only a little, or perhaps not at all. But other warehouse owners hear about their competitor. So, he is lending out money, is he? Well, two can play at that game. So can five or six. They all begin to issue their warehouse receipts to borrowers. They get in on the banking game. The money supply now starts to increase.

Prices start to rise, as denominated in paper money. But gold bullion's currency-denominated price does not rise, for all the unbacked receipts to gold are “as good as gold,” and therefore supposedly identical to gold. The increase in circulation of these receipts does not initially push up gold's paper money-denominated price. So, those who hold gold get hurt initially. They see the paper money-denominated prices of other goods rising, but the market price of stodgy old gold is unchanged. It looks as though lots of newly mined gold is coming onto the market. But statistics are available to show that this is not true. So, the increase must be coming from the issuers of warehouse receipts. So, receipt-holders do the rational thing: they start buying goods and services before the price of these goods gets any higher. This puts upward pressure on prices, as denominated in gold receipts. That is to say, the market value of these receipts falls. Holders of these warehouse receipts try to pass them to other people. The decline in their market value continues.

Then what happens? Store owners continue to take a lot of paper receipts. They steadily deposit them with their local banks. Unlike the general public, bankers understand how the fractional reserve system works; at least, they understand the risks associated with issuing more receipts for gold than there is gold to redeem the receipts. Bankers become increasingly suspicious of each other's gold receipts. Too many receipts are being deposited by their customers. Many of the bankers know that there is not this much new gold coming into circulation. What if the public figures this out, too? They think to themselves, "Maybe it would be smart to cash in these receipts and demand delivery of gold, just in case some receipt-issuing competitor is hit with a bank run." They start demanding gold for the receipts issued by suspected banks. This places added downward pressure on the gold-related price of some banks' receipts, and possibly on many banks' receipts. Thus, the bankers have an incentive individually to pull the plug on their own fractional reserve scheme. So do market speculators. Specialist traders suspect that the price of gold will zoom when the deception is discovered, once the general public starts cashing in their warehouse receipts for their hoped-for gold. Thus, bankers and speculators begin the run on the banks' gold hoards—a run that the bankers fear the public will initiate if the bankers do not get in line first. They dearly want to get in line first. They want their gold before their fractionally reserved competitors run out.

This is why bankers and other sophisticated holders of gold receipts eventually go to the warehouses and start demanding their gold. They understand that at least some of the banks are technically insolvent. They are not sure which ones are weakest, so all the banks risk getting hit. Receipt-holders want their gold now, while they can still get it on demand. The run on the warehouses begins. Warehouse receipts for gold continue to fall in value compared to gold. Other people then rush down to get their gold (which is now rising in value compared to the warehouse receipts people are holding). The insolvent banks collapse, or else they are forced to delay repayment to receipt-owners.

This declaration of insolvency (insufficient reserves) is similar to the action of the wicked cloak-owner who has multipally indebted himself, and then leaves his creditors standing out in the cold. Thus, fractional reserve banking violates two biblical principles: (1) honest weights and measures, and (2) no multiple indebtedness. Fractional reserve banking is inflationary while people accept the checks, and deflationary when confidence in the banks finally collapses.

Understand, however, that the evil of fractional reserve banking is not created by the phenomenon of interest (time preference) as such. It is not money-lending as such that is condemned by the Bible; rather, it is borrowing with collateral that you do not have and lending what you do not have (i.e., issuing receipts for commodities not held in reserve).

L. Interest-Seeking Loans

The prohibition against usury only appears in the context of charitable loans. The Bible does not prohibit loans that draw interest in business dealings, as Jesus' parable of the talents indicates (Matt. 25:27).⁹⁰

Consider the problem faced by the person who argues, as medieval theologians argued, that all interest is immoral. What if the banker comes to the potential depositor and makes this offer? "Sir, you have money that you do not need for immediate consumption. I have several prospects for earning money on invested capital. Let us make a bargain. You loan me the money for a year. I, in turn, will see to it that your money gets into the hands of low-risk borrowers who have some excellent business opportunities, if they can only locate some capital at reasonable rates of interest. I will retain a percentage of the money they pay me for having located your money. This is my service fee. But you will do much better on this loan than you could if you loaned the money to people you know. I will save you the time, expense, and trouble of seeking out reputable borrowers. They come to me. That is my job." This sounds good.

"I must make this stipulation, however. For the agreed-upon period of the loan, you won't be able to get your money. The money will be used by the borrowers in their business operations. After all, we can't spend the same money at the same time! So, you forfeit the use of your money for a year; the borrower gets the use of your money for a year; he pays you for the privilege of using your money, and I will take a small percentage for my services. Everyone wins, including consumers who will benefit from the increased production."

This still sounds good. But the lender wants security. "Mr. Banker, I will agree to this on the following condition. I want security for my investment. I will buy an insurance policy from you. If the businessman you loan the money to should go bankrupt and be unable to repay me, then you will pay me the agreed-upon rate of interest anyway. I have to pay for this protection, of course, but you know so many businessmen, and can spread the investments of all depositors over so many different investments, that we all can gain greater security if you act as an insurance agent for our loans."

90. North, Honest Money, ch. 7.

Reasonable? Certainly. It is so reasonable that the medieval prohibition against all interest payments, including business loans, was destroyed by just this kind of insurance contract. Medieval businessmen agreed to finance various maritime enterprises, but only if the shipper guaranteed repayment. Instead of taking a percentage of the profits from a particular ship's voyage, the less risk-oriented investors agreed to a fixed percentage (interest rate), leaving more profits (or more losses) to the adventurer.

Then third parties entered into the transaction, probably beginning in the fourteenth century. They agreed to act as insurers for ship owners who did not want to offer such a guarantee to investors, or who could not because they owned only one ship, and if its voyage failed, there was no way to repay the loans. This third-party loan was called the contractus trinus, and it eventually sank the usury prohibition to the bottom of the historical sea.⁹¹ For what was the "insurer" offering, if not a guaranteed, fixed-interest return on loans? It may have been called shipping insurance, but it was identical to the medieval definition of usury. Yet it took over a century for even one scholastic commentator to spot the problem, and no one paid any attention to him.⁹²

When the insurance feature of non-shipping business contracts was first introduced, it was initially rejected by the theologians. In partnerships, where there was shared risk of failure, interest payments had always been acceptable, but not in contracts where there was a guaranteed rate of return, irrespective of the outcome of the particular business or business venture. But, step by step, the resistance of the church to interest payments in business loans was weakened. By Luther's day, the old prohibitions were almost gone. Incredibly, by the late fifteenth century, the Roman Church had actually approved charitable loans (called "contracts") that paid 5 percent to 6 percent per annum, the montes pietatis.⁹³ The church by the late medieval period had reversed the original meaning of the biblical prohibition, which forbids interest from charitable loans, but which places no restraints on interest from business loans. The church prohibited interest from business loans and itself collected interest from charitable loans.

The prohibition against interest could not be sustained. The future is always discounted. So, when we read in the Bible about loans without interest, we are talking about charitable loans, not business or consumer loans. We are talking about destitute borrowers, not high-flying upwardly mobile lawyers, accountants, professionals, and entrepreneurs.

91. Noonan, Scholastic Analysis of Usury, pp. 202–3.

92. Ibid., p. 203. His name was John Consobrinus.

93. Ibid., p. 295.

M. The Moral Legitimacy of 100% Reserve Banking

While I normally do not insert lengthy expositions of the New Testament in my Old Testament commentaries, it is necessary that I devote considerable space to Jesus' parable of the talents. Christians who have been influenced by the "economists of love" and their zero-interest fantasies need to know that the New Testament teaches clearly that what I have said regarding interest is valid, that there is no biblical rule against interest-bearing loans. The following passage verifies this point:

For the kingdom of heaven is as a man travelling into a far country, who called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey. Then he that had received the five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents. And likewise he that had received two, he also gained other two (Matt. 25:14–17).

This parable is a kingdom parable. It follows the five-point covenant model.⁹⁴ First, the master calls his servants before him (sovereignty). Second, he delegates authority to them as his economic representatives by transferring money to them (hierarchy/representation). Third, while it is not stated explicitly, he commands them to make a profit (law/dominion). We know this because two of the three immediately take steps to obey his implicit economic command. Fourth, he returns and imposes positive sanctions: blessings to the profitable servants. Fifth, the blessings that he gives them involve rulership (inheritance). He then imposes negative sanctions against the unprofitable servant, casting him into outer darkness (disinheritance).

This parable contains several theological messages, but the three main ones are these: first, God owns all things; second, He delegates temporary control over these things to men; third, men are required to increase the value of whatever God has entrusted to them.

94. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Cf. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010).

There are also secondary implications. First, the servants were required to act on their own initiative for a long period. The master was not present to tell them precisely what to do. He imposed a profit management system of control, a bottom-up hierarchy. It was not the management alternative, a non-market, top-down bureaucracy.⁹⁵ He wisely decentralized his investment portfolio before he departed. He allowed his subordinates to make their own decisions regarding the proper use of his capital. He subsequently held them legally responsible for the results.

1. Marxism as Covenant-Breaking

What about the person who takes no risks, buries his talent, and returns to the master only what he had been given initially? This man has produced losses. He is an evil, unprofitable servant. He has not performed according to minimum standards.

Like so many other incompetent, slothful people in history, the servant of the parable tries to justify his poor performance by blaming the master. He accuses the master of being a thief, or at least an unscrupulous exploiter. "Then he which had received one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed. And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine" (vv. 24–25).

What was the slothful servant's accusation of the master? Clearly, he was accusing him of being a capitalist. The master is rich, yet he does not go into the fields to labor. He expects a positive return on his money, even though he goes away on a journey. In short, the servant is an incipient Marxist. He believes, as Marx did, in the labor theory of value. He also believes in Marx's exploitation theory of profits. Anyone who gets money without working for a living is nothing but an exploiter, living on the labor of the poor. The servant calls him "a hard man." (Theologically speaking, this is the covenant-breaker's accusation against God: God is an unfair exploiter.)

The master accepts the ideological challenge. He reminds the servant that he is indeed a hard man, meaning someone who has the lawful authority to establish standards of profitable performance, as well as the authority to hand out rewards and punishments. He admits freely to the servant that as a successful capitalist, he does not personally go into the fields to plant and reap, yet he reaps a profit. “His lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed” (v. 26). Then he tells the servant the minimum that he is entitled to, an interest return: “Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury” (v. 27). Luke 19:23 reads: “Wherefore then gavest not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury?”

95. Ludwig von Mises, Bureaucracy (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1944). (<http://bit.ly/MisesBur>)

2. The Legitimacy of Interest

The King James translators used the English word usury to translate a Greek word that is more accurately translated as interest. This discussion of interest here is very revealing, for two reasons. First, this parable of God’s kingdom acknowledges that interest-taking is legitimate. God eventually comes to every person and demands a positive return on whatever had been entrusted to him by God. The master had done without the use of his funds during his absence. He is therefore entitled to a minimum return: interest.

Second, the parable clearly distinguishes between profits and interest. The other two stewards each produced a profit of 100% on invested capital. They received the greater praise and greater visible rewards. The minimum required performance was an interest payment. The slothful servant had been unwilling to take even the minimal risk of handing the money over to specialists in money-lending, who would seek out entrepreneurs to lend the money to, entrepreneurs who would then pay a competitive return to the money-lenders on this passively managed investment.

In other words, the master’s capital was supposed to become productive. Each steward had to become an entrepreneur, or else had to seek out an entrepreneur who would put the money to economically productive uses. The talent was not to sit in the earth; it was to perform a socially useful function.

3. The Entrepreneur and the Banker

The economic agent who is on the cutting edge of both prediction and production is the entrepreneur. The first two men in the parable were entrepreneurs. They went out and found ways of investing the master's money that produced a positive rate of return. As the parable presents it, this rate of return was higher than what could have been earned by depositing the money with money-lenders. Thus, the entrepreneur is understood to be someone who bears much greater risk than someone who deposits money in a bank. The economist calls this form of risk uncertainty. It cannot be estimated in advance.⁹⁶ It involves guesswork, unlike the depositor who is promised a specific rate of interest when he deposits his money.

The only way that the banker can afford to pay out a promised return is because he successfully seeks out final borrowers (entrepreneurs) who produce an even higher rate of return. The banker makes his living on the difference between the interest payment that the final borrower pays to him and whatever he in turn pays to the depositors. He makes it "on the spread."

The future is uncertain to men. We do not know it perfectly. We barely know it at all. We see the future as though we were peering through a darkened glass. Nevertheless, all of life involves forecasting. There is no escape. We must all bear some degree of uncertainty. But some people are willing to bear more of it than others, and of these, some are more successful in dealing with it. In economic terminology, some produce greater profits than others. Profit is a residual that remains, if at all, only after all costs of the business have been paid, including interest.

4. Banking: Reducing Uncertainty

The banker is able to offer a special service to investors. He can diversify depositors' uncertainty by lending to many people—people who, like the servants in the parable, have performed successfully in the past. They have "a track record," to use the language of horse racing. By lending out money to many borrowers, the banker thereby converts a portion of the depositors' uncertainty into risk, meaning from the statistically incalculable to the statistically calculable. The banker is like an insurer. In fact, in the Middle Ages, the bank was an insurance company, because both church and state had made it illegal 96. Frank H. Knight, Risk, Uncertainty and Profit (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1921). (<http://bit.ly/KnightRUP>).

for Christians to ask or pay interest.⁹⁷ The modern profession of banking grew out of the marine insurance guild, which was legal in the Middle Ages.⁹⁸

What does an insurance company do? Its statisticians (actuaries) calculate the likelihood of certain kinds of undesirable events in large populations. These unpleasant events cannot be statistically calculated individually, but they can be calculated collectively if the population involved is large enough. The seller of insurance then persuades members of these large populations to pay periodic premiums so as to “pool” their risks. When one member of the pool suffers the event that has been insured against, he is reimbursed from the pool of assets. Hence, some of life’s inescapable and individually incalculable uncertainties are converted to calculable risk by means of diversification: “the law of large numbers.”

The same is true of banking. Borrowers will seldom all go bankrupt at once. Most borrowers will repay their debts as specified in their loan agreements. Bad loans are more than offset by the good ones. Thus, the banker can offer a fixed rate of return to depositors. In almost all cases, depositors will be repaid as promised because most of the borrowers repay their loans as promised. The exception is in a depression, when banks fail. Depressions are the result of prior monetary inflation, which in our day means fractional reserve banking.⁹⁹

The master in this parable protects his funds in much the same way. He seeks out a group of potential entrepreneurs. He gives each of them an amount of money to invest. He makes predictions regarding their future performance based on their past performance, and then he allocates the distribution of his assets in terms of this estimation. He protects his portfolio by diversification.

He is not an interest-seeking banker, however. The money he invests is his own. He is not acting as the legal agent of other depositors. He legally claims all of the profits. He does not contract with borrowers who agree in advance to pay him a fixed rate of interest. The entrepreneurs are strictly his legal subordinates, unlike the relationship between banker and borrower.

Yet in the Old Testament era, there was a relationship of economic

97. Jews could legally lend to Christians, which is why Jews from the middle ages onward have been found in banking. It was a near-monopoly granted to them by Christian legislators.

98. Noonan, Scholastic Analysis of Usury, ch. 10.

99. Mises, Human Action, ch. 20.

subordination between lender and borrower: the borrower was servant to the lender (Prov. 22:7). This economic subordination was based on the legal authority of the lender to place the borrower in indentured servitude for up to six years (Deut. 15). Because the borrower today can lose his collateral or his reputation, there is still a mild form of economic subordination in every debt contract. Debt is still a threat, even though it can also be very productive. It is like fire: a useful tool, but a danger if it gets out of control.

5. The Forfeited Productivity of Inaction

The master in the parable is outraged by the coin-burying servant. The parable is intended to show the subordinate (indebted) position of all men before God. The servant was cast into outer darkness because he was an unprofitable servant (v. 30). The parable stands as a warning to all men because the Bible teaches that all people are unprofitable servants (Luke 17:10).¹⁰⁰ Gary North, "Unprofitable Servants," Biblical Economics Today (Feb./March 1983). This is why we need a profitable servant as our intermediary before God, our perfect sin-bearer. But to understand our relationship of indebtedness to God, the parable's language must be taken seriously. We cannot make accurate theological conclusions about the broader meaning of the parable if the symbolic reference points of the parable are themselves inaccurate.

There is no question that the master not only approves of taking interest, he sends the servant to the nether regions for not taking it. This is strong imagery! The interest payment belongs to the master. By having refused to deposit the master's money with the moneylenders, the servant has in effect stolen the master's rightful increase. The servant was legally obligated to protect the master's interests, and interest on his money was the minimum requirement. He failed. The master's judgment of the servant's past performance had been accurate; he was entitled to only one talent initially, for he had not demonstrated competence previously. Had he been given more, he would have wasted more. The idea that the interest return was the master's minimum expectation leads us to the question of the origin of interest. Why did the master deserve an interest return? Because he had possession of an asset that could have been put to productive use, but was not. He had forfeited an economic return that could have been his. This concept of the forfeited return appeared in medieval economic literature as the doctrine of lucrum cessans. The owner of money who could have made a profit by investing it elsewhere, but who loaned the money to someone, was said by some theologians to be entitled to an interest payment from the borrower because of the income he had forfeited. Interest compensated the lender for the opportunity he had missed.

This raises the whole question of cost. What is the cost of any action or any purchase? It is the value of whatever has to be forfeited, i.e., the value of the most valuable foregone use. If I do one thing with my money, I cannot do something else with it. The value of whatever I would actually have done but did not do is what it costs me to do whatever I do.

The lender who transfers to another person the use of an asset, monetary or nonmonetary, has given up whatever other opportunities might have been available to him. There are always other opportunities available. There is therefore always a cost to the lender of lending money.

The master in the parable was being gracious to the servant. He recognized from the beginning that the man was not very competent. The master did not tell the servant that he had failed because he had not made 100% on the money entrusted to him. He told him only that he had failed because he had not earned an interest payment. This is the least that the master could have expected.

The master probably could have doubled his money by entrusting it to either of the first two servants. But he had sought greater economic safety instead. He had adopted the principle of risk reduction through portfolio diversification. You get a lower rate of return but a more sure return. But the master had been cheated. He could have deposited his money directly with the money-lenders instead of giving it to the servant. That would have been safer—greater diversification through the bank—and it almost certainly would have produced a positive rate of return, however low. Instead, he received only his original capital in return.

He had forfeited his legitimate interest payment because he had transferred the asset to the slothful, risk-averse servant. This servant is a model of wickedness, not because he was actively evil, but that he was passively unproductive. He did nothing with that which had been entrusted to him. Doing nothing is sufficient to get you cast into hell, when doing the minimum would at least quench the master's wrath. (Warning: only one man in history has ever performed this minimum: Jesus Christ.)

6. Interest and Capitalization

Is interest-taking morally legitimate? This debate has been going on since at least the days of Aristotle, who called money sterile and interest illegitimate. But if money is sterile, why have men throughout history paid to gain access to its use for a period? How are so many people fooled into paying for the use of a sterile asset? Besides, interest is a phenomenon of every loan, not just loans of money. Modern economics teaches this; so does the Bible.

It is obvious that the phenomenon of interest is not confined to money. Aristotle was incorrect. The phenomenon of interest applies to every scarce economic resource. We always discount future value. Whatever we own in the present is worth more to us than the promise of owning that same item in the future. Promises to repay can be broken (the risk factor), but more to the point, the present commands a price premium over the future.¹⁰⁰

We live in the present. We make all of our decisions in the present. We enjoy the use of our assets in the present. While wise people plan for the future by purchasing streams of future income by buying assets that they expect to produce net income over time, they purchase these hoped-for streams of income at a discount. The rate of discount that we apply to any stream of expected future income is called the rate of interest. Mises called it time-preference.

Thus, the rate of interest is not exclusively a monetary phenomenon. Interest is a universal discount that we apply to every economic service that we expect to receive in the future. We buy a hoped-for stream of rents; we can buy them for cash; but we expect a discount for cash. This purchase at a discount for cash is called capitalization. It is the heart of capitalism. It is the heart of every society more advanced than the utterly primitive.

The person who lends money at zero interest is clearly forfeiting a potential stream of income. He will seldom do this voluntarily, except for charitable reasons. The ownership of the asset offers him an expected stream of income: psychological, physical, or monetary. If it did not offer such a stream of income, it would be a free good. It would not be demanded. It would therefore not command a price. The owner expects to receive a stream of income. He chooses the degree of risk that he is willing to accept, and he then refuses to lend the asset for less than the interest rate appropriate to this degree of risk.

100. Mises, Human Action, ch. 19.

The borrower compensates the owner for the use of the asset, or its exchange value, for a specified period of time. He borrows it only because he values its stream of services more highly than he values its rental fee (interest). He expects to make a profit of some kind on the temporary exchange of control over it.

Summary

Non-fractional reserve banking and the taking of interest are both biblically legitimate. The parable of the talents should be sufficient proof for anyone who is not trying to make an overnight theological reputation for himself based on the promotion of the utterly fantastic. We should take the Bible seriously in preference to Aristotle, and also in preference to the economics of love.¹⁰¹ The capitalization of long-term assets, including human services is biblically legitimate.

Again, I acknowledge that men, in their quest for autonomy from God, are willing to become slaves of sin, and therefore in principle slaves of other men. I recognize the New Testament principle that it is best to owe no man anything (Rom. 13:8a). I also recognize that modern economics has promoted the ideal of perpetual debt for perpetual prosperity, and that a world so constructed will eventually collapse. But to place temporal limits on the judicial enforceability of the discounting of future long-term human services, because the Bible requires that we restrain man's overconfidence about his long-term future, is not the same as denying that there is an inescapable discounting (capitalization) process between the present value of present goods and the present value of expected future goods.

With respect to capitalized debt, if both the lender and the borrower agree that a piece of collateral is acceptable in exchange for the defaulted loan, then the debtor is not in debt, net. He has an offsetting asset. He wants the money in cash; the lender would rather have the money over time. The existence of the collateral reduces the likelihood that the debtor will default. The debtor is therefore not a servant of the lender in this case. Nevertheless, if the loan involves the potential loss of a man's home, meaning his status and his own self-evaluation, then he is in a form of bondage. But if he owns investment assets (a house, for example) with a mortgage on it, and he risks losing the house if he defaults, then this voluntary transaction is merely a shifting of risk to the liking of both transactors. The lender feels better about the future with a stream of income guaranteed by the value of the collateral. The borrower feels better about owning the collateral and paying the money. Neither is a servant; neither is a master.¹⁰²

101. See Appendix J: "Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney."

Conclusion

The confusion throughout the Middle Ages and early modern period concerning the evil or illegitimacy of interest came as a result of not paying attention to the biblical texts, and then mixing in the fallacious economic opinions of Aristotle. The Bible is clear: there is to be no interest return from money loaned to the poverty-stricken neighbor. This applies to money loans or loans of goods. But the definition of poverty must be the willingness of the borrower to serve as a bond-servant of the lender should he be unable to repay the loan. The larger the loan, the longer the term of service that will be required to repay it. Ordinarily, though, charity loans would be small, and the time to repay would probably not be seven years, unless it was for something like the payment of physicians' bills or lawyers' fees. There is no prohibition on interest returns from loans to distant pagans or from business loans. The term translated as "usury" in the King James Bible is narrow and precise in its application: interest derived from morally mandatory charity loans, either from poverty-stricken righteous brothers in the faith or from resident aliens who live alongside believers in nations that are formally covenanted under the God of the Bible. The word does not mean "exorbitant" interest. That usage was the product of the early modern period, and is not the product of biblical analysis. Any interest taken from a loan to the poor brother in the faith is usurious; no maximum rate of interest from other loans is ever mentioned in the Bible. Interest is inescapable. It is not a uniquely monetary phenomenon. It is the discount we apply to future goods as against present goods. This process goes on continually, whether or not there is a money market, whether or not published loan rates are available. We are mortal. We die. We live in an uncertain world. We cannot know the future. Thus, we discount the value of future goods, and we also confront the phenomenon of risk whenever we defer present consumption. If nothing else, we may not live long enough to enjoy the future. Fractional reserve banking is prohibited in the Bible, for two reasons.

¹⁰² Warning: do not take a loan if it is not 100% collateralized by an asset you are willing to lose.

ons: (1) it violates the prohibition against false weights and measures because it creates money, and (2) it violates the principle against multiple indebtedness. But interest-producing loans on a truly deferred basis—no check-writing on money already loaned out are biblically valid.

IMPARTIAL JUSTICE AND LEGAL PREDICTABILITY

Thou shalt not raise a false report: put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness. Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil; neither shalt thou speak in a cause to decline [bend] after many to wrest judgment: Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause (Ex. 23:1–3).

Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause. Keep thee far from a false matter; and the innocent and righteous slay thou not: for I will not justify the wicked (Ex. 23:6–7).

God is the cosmic Judge. “And the heavens shall declare his righteousness: for God is judge himself. Selah” (Ps. 50:6). “A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation” (Ps. 68:5). “But God is the judge: he putteth down one, and setteth up another” (Ps. 75:7). “Arise, O God, judge the earth: for thou shalt inherit all nations” (Ps. 82:8).

Few doctrines alienate modern man as much as this one does. I believe that the doctrine of final judgment, above all others, is the biblical doctrine that most repels the unbeliever. The rise of modern evolutionary science can be traced back to the idea that infinite space and nearly infinite time have shoved God out of the universe.¹ Man wants some other judge besides God: either the heat death of the universe or cosmic crushing, in eternal cycles of creation and contraction.² By default, the modern state becomes the judge for man, substituting its temporal judgments for God’s.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), pp. 359, 381, 391.

2. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

A. No Respect for Persons

When He judges men, God does not respect persons. He respects His covenant law, not the social or economic position of the person being judged, whether rich or poor. This concept of highly personal but even-handed justice is basic New Testament doctrine. “For there is no respect of persons with God” (Rom. 2:11). “And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man’s work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear” (I Peter 1:17). It is also Old Testament doctrine, reflected in the requirement that human judges are to honor God by imitating Him in His capacity as Judge. “Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God’s: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it” (Deut. 1:17). “Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous” (Deut. 16:19). “These things also belong to the wise. It is not good to have respect of persons in judgment” (Prov. 24:23).

There was a time when this doctrine of even-handed justice in terms of biblical law alienated the rulers of the world because they served as agents of the rich, who would not countenance the thought of honest judgment for the poor. James warned against this very temptation within the church:

My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. For if there come unto your assembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: Are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts? Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him? But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment seats? Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called? If ye fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well: But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors (James 2:1–9).³

3. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of the Epistles

Today, on the other hand, there are many rulers and would-be rulers who refuse to tolerate this biblical doctrine, because it sounds as though God is on the side of the rich simply because He will not bend judgment in the name of the poor. Their court theologians and would-be court theologians dutifully reinterpret the biblical texts to fit the rulers' socialist goals: "The God of the Bible is on the side of the poor just because he is not biased, for he is a God of impartial justice."⁴ The fact is, however, it is the idea that rulers are under God and under the obligation to enforce God's revealed law that most antagonizes rulers, not to mention their court theologians. Whether they represent the poor, the rich, or the "middling sort," rulers refuse to represent God's court of justice. To do so would point to God as final Judge, and this doctrine is too repulsive for autonomous man.

B. Judicial Stability

God's justice is the goal for the entire commonwealth, and all members of society are personally responsible before God to meet all of the demands of His law. Exodus 23 provides us with some specific details of what constitutes biblical justice. False reports are prohibited (23:1, 7). Evil acts by men in crowds are banned (23:2). Favoritism of the rich or poor is banned (23:3, 6). Animals that belong to a hated neighbor must be assisted and returned to him (23:4–5). The acceptance of bribes by leaders is banned (23:8). Oppression of strangers is prohibited (23:9). God's law is to rule over the affairs of men, irrespective of anyone's personal emotions concerning the "worthiness" of a man or his cause. All men are worthy to receive God's justice, just as all men are worthy of the wrath to come.

God's justice is constant.⁵ It is constant because it is theocentric.⁶ It reflects the unchanging character of God. God's justice on judgment day will be reliable. Therefore, human judges are required by God to strive to become analogously reliable. They are to render decisions in terms of the fixed principles of biblical law.

This does not mean that the application of the law's principles is essentially a near-mechanical operation. While the principles of biblic-

(Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 34.

4. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1977), p. 84.

5. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), pp. 11–17. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

6. Ibid., pp. 1–3.

al justice do not change, the applications of God's general principles in specific instances can change over time, for history has meaning.⁷ Christ's replacement of the Mosaic ritual ordinances with new ones, baptism and communion, is indicative of the nature of the relationship between God's law and history.⁸ With the coming of Christ, the last and greatest high priest—a member of the tribe of Judah (Matt. 1:2), not Levi—God changed some of the specifics of outward and inward obedience to the permanent principles He set forth.⁹ He annulled through perfect fulfillment the jubilee laws governing land and slaves in Israel (Lev. 25:44–46;¹⁰ Luke 4:18–21¹¹). He transferred His kingdom to a new nation (Matt. 21:43). History is not static. Neither Jews nor Christians worry today about eating from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; that transgression is behind us. Jews and Christians do not worry about the absence of animal sacrifices in the temple. The principle of obedience nevertheless is with us still, and will be throughout eternity, in heaven and hell, in the resurrected new heavens and new earth, and also in the lake of fire.

Men discover new areas of dominion, for good and evil, that were not previously covered by judicial interpretations in courts of law. But this does not invalidate the unchanging judicial principles of biblical law. Men are responsible for the correct matching of the Bible's case laws to specific circumstances, either before they take action as individuals (self-government), or as judges who hear cases after others have taken action and are in court because of it.

C. Personalism and Intuition

The dispensing of justice is not an impersonal activity, meaning a computerized, mathematical operation, because men serve as both judges and judged, and men are not machines. The affairs of men are not purely mechanical or numerical; neither are their formal legal conflicts.¹² fitting case laws to circumstances necessarily involves reason-

7. Ibid., pp. 12–17.

8. Cf. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 2nd ed. (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1977] 1984), ch. 9.

9. Jews no longer sacrifice bulls and lambs to God, indicating that they, too, recognize this relationship between unchanging law and changing history.

10. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 31.

11. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

12. One naive attempt to find an impersonal program for dispensing justice by ing by analogy, frequently an intuitive process—a process beyond the scope of mathematics.¹³ Hayek wrote: “That the judge can, or ought to, arrive at his decisions exclusively by a process of logical inference from explicit premises always has been and must be a fiction. For in fact the judge never proceeds in this way. As has been truly said [by Harvard’s Dean Roscoe Pound], ‘the trained intuition of the judge continuously leads him to right results for which he is puzzled to give unimpeachable legal reasons.’”¹⁴ Nicholas Georgescu-Roegen, perhaps the most brilliant epistemologist that the economics profession has ever seen, described the problem: “And it is because society and its organization are in constant flux that genuine justice cannot mean rigid interpretation of the words in the written laws.”¹⁵

1. Inescapable Intuition

Human reasoning cannot function without intuition. Reason can be progressively disciplined by either covenant-keeping intuition or covenant-breaking intuition, but in either case, reasoning is not a mechanical-numerical process. “Between the plasticity of the brain computer was announced in 1983. General Robotics Corp., a private firm, set up an experiment in 1983 to offer people an “electronic jury.” People send in information concerning pending cases (federal criminal law) and have a computer analyze these cases. The president of the company, an engineer, stated that federal cases are the easiest to quantify. A spokesman for the firm announced: “We are attempting to replace the warm, living, human juries with a cold, dead, robot jury so that citizens may have a plain and speedy adjudication or arbitration of their disputes. Our slogan is ‘Equal Justice Under the Law,’ which will be a welcome relief to anyone who has ever had a trial by jury.” Infoworld (Feb. 28, 1983), p. 1. The experiment failed the test of the marketplace: profit and loss. It had to. Men think analogically; electronic computers do not think at all; computer programs are structured numerically (digitally). As computer programmer A. L. Samuel said so well, computers “are giant morons, not giant brains.” Samuel, “Artificial Intelligence: A Frontier of Automation,” Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, CCCXL (March 1962), p. 13.

13. Higher mathematics, as with all human speculation, also involves the use of intuition. The popular understanding of mathematics ignores this. fitting the aesthetic purity of mathematics to the external world also involves such things as faith, genius, and insight. It is not a predictable, automatic process, and therefore not “mathematical.”

14. F. A. Hayek, Law, Legislation and Liberty, vol. I of Rules and Order, 3 vols. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973), pp. 116–17. Hayek went on to say that “The other view is a characteristic product of the constructivist [top-down planning] rationalism which regards all rules as deliberately made and therefore capable of exhaustive statement” (p. 117).

15. Nicholas Georgescu-Roegen, The Entropy Law and the Economic Process (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, [1971] 1981), p. 82.

and the mechanistic structure of a computer there is an unbridgeable gap. . . .”¹⁶ Intuition is the inescapable element of the incalculable in all human thought and decision-making. Intuition connects the “steps” in the human reasoning process, a process which in fact cannot be shown to consist of a series of discrete, identifiable steps. The process of reasoning is a continuum, and it is applied to change over time, which is also a continuum.¹⁷ Georgescu-Roegen wrote, “The intuitive continuum belongs to that special category of concepts about which we can discourse with each other without being able to define them.”¹⁸ This statement does not go far enough: all logical concepts possess this same quality of not being able to be defined precisely. The human mind is not omniscient; absolutely precise definitions are always elusive to man’s mind. The mathematician-philosopher Alfred North Whitehead said, “As soon as you leave the beaten track of vague clarity, and trust to exactness, you will meet difficulties.”¹⁹ You will meet more than difficulties: you will meet failure. As Georgescu-Roegen noted, “any vocabulary is a finite set of symbols.”²⁰ The structure of vocabulary “does not have the power of the continuum.”²¹ In short, there is an inescapable element of uncertainty in exercising judgment. “A measure for all uncertainty situations, even though a number, has absolutely no scientific value, for it can be obtained only by an intentionally mutilated representation of reality. We hear people almost every day speaking of ‘calculated risk,’ but no one yet can tell us how he calculated it so that we could check his calculations.”²²

Men are not omniscient. They cannot know another man’s heart (Jer. 17:9). Only God knows men’s hearts (Jer. 17:10). “But the LORD said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the LORD seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the LORD looketh on the heart” (I Sam. 16:7). But we do not need to render perfect justice in order to render adequate justice. We render preliminary justice, and leave the rest to God. This is why capital punishment is required by God: it turns over the person immediately to the highest

16. Ibid., p. 90.

17. Ibid., pp. 60–72.

18. Ibid., p. 66.

19. Whitehead, Science and Philosophy (New York: Littlefield, 1948), p. 136; cited in ibid., p. 90.

20. Ibid., p. 73.

21. Idem.

22. Ibid., p. 83.

court of all, the throne of God. God does not wait for a judicially convicted person's "biological time clock" to deliver him into His presence for God's preliminary judgment.²³

2. Inescapable Casuistry

Despite the impossibility of man's ability to declare and impose perfect, comprehensive judgment, judges must not be consciously partial in the inescapable process of fitting biblical law to public facts regarding historical circumstances. Judges must not give men legitimate reasons to complain that biblical law is not a trustworthy guide for rendering judgments in history. God's law alone is trustworthy for rendering judgments in history, for at least three reasons. first, it reflects certain aspects of God's nature, both ethical and ontological (being). His law is permanent. Second, it is constructed to meet the needs of men, who in turn are made in the image of God. God designed the law for men and their circumstances. Third, biblical law fits the creation and therefore serves as man's tool of dominion. *Biblical law links God, man, and the creation in a hierarchical chain of command.*²⁴

The doctrine of creation provides us with a concept of transcendent law. The source of all law is external to the universe. It can therefore be permanent in the face of changes within the universe. This view of law stands in radical contrast to the Darwinian view of law as totally immanent to—immersed in—the creation. Darwin and his intellectual heirs have explained all life in terms of random changes: random mutations and adaptations within a framework of random, or nearly random, impersonal environmental change.²⁵ (Post-Heisenberg science has increasingly abandoned the Newtonian view of a deterministic, predictable environment.)²⁶ All human laws in a Darwinian world

23. This judgment by God is preliminary because God confines a soul either to heaven or hell, both of which are temporary places of residence. final judgment comes at the resurrection, when body and soul are reunited perfectly, and people are sent either into the eternal lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15) or into the final manifestation of the new heaven and new earth (Rev. 21).

24. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), ch. 3:B. See also Ray Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

25. North, Sovereignty and Dominion Appendix A:F, Appendix C:F.

26. German physicist Werner Heisenberg in 1927 announced an important finding of modern physics, the uncertainty principle. An undergraduate college textbook in 1960 described it in language reasonably close to English: "This principle, which is derivable from wave mechanics, says that, irrespective of technical errors of measure-must be relative. Law is part of the overall evolutionary process. Any correspondence between the one (general law) and the many (specific circumstances) may last for no longer than an instant. Darwinism produces process philosophy: the assertion of a world devoid of permanent standards.²⁷ A sea of randomness engulfs Darwin's universe, threatening to overcome islands of permanence. Randomness also engulfs the mind of self-professed autonomous man.²⁸

D. Legal Predictability

Justice is simultaneously personal and impartial. God does not respect persons, a doctrine that is repeated again and again in Scripture, as we have seen.²⁹ Cosmic personalism, meaning God's comprehensive judgment of every fact in the universe, requires judicial impartiality for human law courts. Men are to think God's thoughts after Him, within the limits of their creaturehood. Truth is placed before friend-ment, it is fundamentally impossible to describe the motion of a particle with unlimited precision. We may specify the position of a particle with increasing precision, but in so doing we introduce uncertainty into its motion, in particular into its momentum. Conversely, we may observe the momentum with increasing precision, but then we introduce uncertainties into its position." G. S. Christiansen and Paul H. Garrett, Structure and Change: An Introduction to the Science of Matter (San Francisco: Freeman, 1960), p. 558. This observation about the limits of observation in the world of subatomic physics led to another disconcerting discovery: the light wave that enables the scientist to observe phenomena itself upsets the observation (or makes observation impossible) at the level of subatomic physics. The positions between electrons are far smaller than the smallest light wave, so the light serves as a kind of blanket that covers up what is going on. If smaller gamma rays could ever be employed in a "microscope," these would strike the electrons and "kick" them, thereby changing their momentum. In short, the observer interferes with the observed. "A quantitative analysis of this argument shows that beyond any instrumental errors there is, as stated by the uncertainty principle, a residual uncertainty in these observations." Ibid., p. 559. As a result, the optimism of scientists regarding Newtonian mechanics as a perfect description of the physical universe has disappeared. But this textbook summary for undergraduates avoided the real problem of modern quantum mechanics. The uncertainty of the universe is now said to be fundamental, and not just our uncertainty of measurement. The unobserved "real world" is said to be statistical rather than physical at the subatomic level. See North, Is the World Running Down?, ch. 2.

27. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, pp. 385, 399, 437–38, 448, 50, 451, 451–55, 458–60, 472, 540–41.

28. Cornelius Van Til, The Defense of the Faith, 2nd ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1955] 1967), ch. VII:I. For a detailed defense of this thesis from a humanistic viewpoint, see William Barrett, Irrational Man: A Study in Existential Philosophy (New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1958] 1962).

29. Deut. 10:17; II Chr. 19:7; Job 34:19; Acts 10:34; Rom. 2:11; Gal. 2:6; Eph. 6:9; Col. 3:25; I Peter 1:17.

ship or hatred, class or status. Biblical law is not class law, contrary to Marxists. It is not the product of class conflict. It is accurate to say that the arena of biblical law's application is the historical product of ethical conflict between man and God. Conflicts between men are a result of this ethical conflict between man and God (James 4:1), but these conflicts are not the origin of biblical law. Biblical law, to use Marx's terminology, is not the "superstructure" that has been produced by the "substructure" of class conflict. The legitimacy and eternally binding character of God's law have nothing to do with the success or failure of an economic class. Neither rich nor poor can legitimately claim special privileges under biblical law. Therefore, neither rich nor poor can legitimately claim the right to favorable arbitrary treatment by the judges. Judicial arbitrariness is to be reduced to a minimum.

The characteristic feature of biblical justice is therefore its predictability. Residents in a biblical commonwealth have access to the law. They can understand it. They can exercise self-government in their relationships, for they know what it means to transgress the law. They know what God expects from them positively, and they know the sanctions He will bring against them negatively. This same confidence in, and understanding of, biblical law can be transferred to society's law-enforcement system. Men know that the judges are restrained by the same law that restrains them. They know what to expect from their earthly judges because they know what to expect from their heavenly Judge. He has revealed Himself to them in His law.

1. The Jury System

To insure that the decisions of the courts do not become dependent on professional lawyers and judges, a free society establishes juries. The priesthood of all believers is the theological foundation of juries: every redeemed person is a Levite. The Levites studied the law and gave advice to the courts. In biblical civil society, every citizen is a judge. Citizens can make arrests, and citizens sit on juries, declaring other people's guilt or innocence. In order to insure that common people retain in their possession the authority to interpret and apply civil law (including criminal law), the doctrine of double jeopardy comes into play. Once a person has been declared innocent, he may not be retried. The historic roots of this judicial procedural principle can be found in the Bible.³⁰ The modern practice in American courts of allowing civil suits against people declared innocent of criminal charges is perverse.

30. Greg L. Bahnsen, "Double Jeopardy: A Case Study in the Influence of Christian

Any weakening of the right of trial by a jury of one's peers—including "scientific screening" of jurors by attorneys—is an assault on the integrity of the predictability of the law. It is an attempt to make law the plaything of full-time legal technicians rather than the jury's application to trial court evidence of general laws that can be understood by the vast majority of those who are covenantally under its provisions. This is why judges are to be selected in terms of their reputation for honesty (Ex. 18:21). Ethics, not mental gymnastics by highly trained legal specialists, is God's screening system for judges. This is also why God required that His law be read publicly to all residents of Israel during the year of release, once every seven years (Deut. 31:9–13).³¹ He wants people to know in advance what He requires of them ethically.

2. Judges and Justice

Law enforcement is ideally to be immune to a judge's personal connections to the accused, whether pro or con. Enemies deserve justice. So do close relatives. All men deserve justice, meaning the impartial (but never impersonal) application of biblical law to every aspect of their lives—judgments imposed not just by the state, or even primarily by the state, but by all forms of government, including self-government. The emotions of the judge are not the issue; external justice is the issue. An emotion-filled judge is commanded by God to provide the same impartial judgment which would be rendered by a disinterested judge. The issue is not emotion; the issue is self-government under biblical law. God is emotional. He hates covenant-breakers as passionately as He loves covenant-keepers. How else could He create the eternal lake of fire for His enemies? Out of His love for them? Hardly. Why else would He recommend that we do good deeds to our enemies, so that we might heap coals of fire on their heads (Rom. 12:20)? David could say, "Do not I hate them, O LORD, that hate thee? And am I not grieved with those who rise up against thee? I hate them with perfect hatred: I count them mine enemies" (Ps. 139:21–22). Nevertheless, to render anything less than impartial justice is to impugn

Legislation," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Winter, 1975), pp. 40–54.

31. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 75.

the character of both the law and the Law-giver.

The doctrine of the atonement affirms this principle of impartiality despite emotion. The demands of the law must be met. God the Father spared not His own Son, despite His emotional involvement with His Son. Emotions may be present in certain judicial cases, but they are not to influence the application of God's standards to these cases.

We must distinguish feeling in judicial administration—feeling in the sense of intuition—from emotions regarding the people who are being judged. Feeling is inescapable in the judicial process, meaning the informed yet intuitive “feel” for the connections between permanent law and specific cases which a judge develops after years of studying and hearing cases. This sort of feeling is inherent in the judicial process. Emotion may or may not be present in the mind of a judge during a particular trial, but its influence is to be suppressed by the individual judge. Should his emotions deflect the imposition of the law's requirements, and therefore affect the outcome of the case, the appeals court can overrule him.

E. Oppression and Envy

The law of God protects private property. An enemy's lost animals must be returned by the finder, and the animals must be aided by the one who finds them in trouble (Ex. 23:4–5). Animals are not to run wild, for they are under the dominion of man. Domesticated animals are tools used by man in his dominion assignment. In other words, both man and beast are under law. Neighbors are required by God to forfeit time and effort, suppressing any emotions of vengeance, in order to see to it that the tools of dominion are returned to the lawful owner. finders are not to become keepers unless they become buyers. In one sense this is a requirement of charity; in another sense it is simply respect for the order of creation and its law-based hierarchy of command and responsibility.

No group within the commonwealth may legitimately be singled out for oppression. The context here places “oppression” within the category of legal judgment, not private economic oppression. There must not be false or partial justice. (By “partial,” I mean both “deliberately incomplete” and “not impartial.”) The productivity of those who would otherwise be likely victims of judicial discrimination can flourish when they know that they will be permitted to keep the fruits of their labor. The division of labor increases as a direct result, because men are more willing to cooperate with each other in production. Output per capita increases, and therefore so does wealth per capita. Legal predictability, the product of impartial justice and permanent legal standards, produces greater wealth than any other system of justice.

1. With Justice for All

The court is to be a place of justice for all men, without respect to their economic position. Bearing false witness is described in Exodus 23 as being an aspect of oppression. The innocent are to be protected (v. 7), bribes are to be rejected by judges (v. 8), and the stranger is not to be oppressed (v. 9). When men can have reasonable faith in the content of the law and the reliability of the judges, they can cooperate with each other less expensively. The division of labor increases, along with voluntary exchange. Productivity increases throughout the society. The “miracle of the market,” with its benefits to all individuals who serve their neighbors by responding efficiently to consumer demand, becomes so familiar to the beneficiaries that they may forget the source of their blessings: God and His law-order.

A society that is filled with envy-driven false witnesses who “uphold the cause of the poor” by means of courtroom lies, university indoctrination, guilt-manipulation from the pulpit, and orchestration of the public by the mass media, is a doomed society if it continues in its rebellion. The self-righteousness of the envious will not alter the reality of the economic effects of envy. All the rhetoric about “healing unjust social structures” and “providing justice for the oppressed” will not delay the judgment of God if the content of the promised utopian reformation is founded on the politics of envy.³²

By perverting judgment, men tear down the foundation of their liberties and the foundation of their wealth, especially their freedom to profit from their own ingenuity, labor, and thrift. They find that others are increasingly hesitant to display visible signs of their prosperity. Economic prosperity cannot survive when productive members of a society withdraw from entrepreneurial activities—the uncertainty-bearing, future-oriented, consumer-satisfying quest for profit—and instead become content to consume their wealth (and hide it) rather than face the slander of false witnesses who rise up against them in the name of the poor.³³

32. Gonzalo Fernandez de la Mora, Egalitarian Envy: The Political Foundations of Justice (New York: Paragon House, [1984] 1987).

2. Justice and Productivity

As capital, including human capital, is steadily withdrawn from the marketplace and consumed, almost everyone loses.³⁴ Like the kulaks (successful independent small farmers) of the Soviet Union in the early months of 1930, who killed their livestock and ate them rather than put them into the newly collectivized farms,³⁵ so envy-besieged entrepreneurs are buying Rolls-Royce automobiles and “state of the art” stereo systems. At least they are able to enjoy their depreciating capital base while it lasts. This form of capital consumption is taking place all over the democratic and socialist West,³⁶ although not in the capitalist Far East. The cost to society? All the forfeited opportunities—employment, innovation, and general productivity—that this capital base, if invested wisely, would have produced.

Through their continual false witness against biblically legitimate forms of wealth, the envious promote the destruction of society’s capital base. So do all those who tolerate envy and do not fight it, or who fail to recognize it for what it is. And most incongruous of all are the wealthy victims of envy who indulge their masochism (or their desperate quest for acceptance) by continuing to attend and support envy-preaching churches, and who send money to envy-promoting evangelical associations, colleges, and politicians—all in the name of Jesus!³⁷

Without legal predictability, capitalism as a social system cannot flourish. Max Weber listed calculable law as one of the five major fea-

33. Helmut Schoeck, Envy: A Theory of Social Behavior (New York: Harcourt, Brace, [1966] 1970), pp. 46–47, 88, 290–91.

34. Short-run winners: competitors who no longer feel the heat of competition from the oppressed, productive capitalists who withdraw; government bureaucrats and corrupt judges, who gain access to bribes; and those who are better able to prosper in the black market, which is where the hidden transactions will take place as the civil government becomes debauched.

35. On the forced collectivization of Soviet agriculture, see Lazar Volin, A Century of Russian Agriculture: From Alexander II to Khrushchev (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1970), pp. 224–34.

36. George Gilder, Wealth and Poverty (New York: Basic Books, 1981), ch. 15.

37. See my discussion of this suicidal phenomenon in Appendix 4 in David Chilton’s book, Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators: A Biblical Response to Ronald J. Sider, 4th ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1981] 1986). (<http://bit.ly/dcsider>). For evidence of the theological drift toward liberalism of the major evangelical colleges, see James Davison Hunter, Evangelicalism: The Coming Generation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), pp. 165–80.

tures of the capitalist economic system.³⁸ The bulk of Hayek's legal and economic studies, from The Road to Serfdom (1944) to the trilogy, Rules and Order (1973–80), was devoted to a demonstration of the links between formal, general, predictable law on the one hand, and economic freedom and the market economy on the other. Too many economic resources are wasted under social systems characterized by judicial arbitrariness—scarce resources that might otherwise be used to reduce uncertainty in forecasting uncertain future consumer demand rather than uncertain future judicial decisions. By reducing judicial uncertainty, biblical justice frees up resources that can then be used to increase output per unit of resource input. Nevertheless, biblical law should not be interpreted as the product of capitalistic institutions; on the contrary, capitalism is the historic product of a world-and-life view favorable to the kind of legal predictability which is produced by respect for biblical law.³⁹

F. False Witness and Organized Envy

Individuals are commanded not to raise a false report. This is a specific application of the law against bearing false witness (Ex. 20:16). Raising a false report is the equivalent of slander; God cuts off the slanderer (Ps. 101:5). By raising a false report, men endanger their victimized neighbor, as well as the peace of the community. By misleading the judges, and by luring them into making improper decisions, the man who bears false witness endangers the trust which other men place in the judges and the biblical system of justice. This is why a stiff penalty is imposed on perjurers: the penalty that would have been imposed on the victim of the falsehood (Deut. 19:16–19).⁴⁰

1. Oppressing the Rich

The focus of concern in this passage is with false witnesses, corrupt judges, and the oppressed rich. The “oppressed rich”? Yes. The law warns against upholding the poor man in his cause or lawsuit. But if we are not to uphold the poor as such, then the poor man or men must be bringing a case against someone or some group that is not equally poor. This classification of “non-poor” included successful

38. Max Weber, General Economic History, trans. Frank H. Knight (New York: Collier, [1920] 1961), p. 208.

39. Part 1, Representation and Dominion, especially the Conclusion.

40. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 45.

strangers (v. 9), who were willing to remain as resident aliens in urban areas. Economic success, or the hope of success, motivated the stranger to remain. Once successful, he would be less likely to return to his people and the society governed by the religion of his people.⁴¹ The phenomenon of the successful outsider is a familiar one: Chinese in Southeast Asia and the United States, Indians in Africa, West Indies blacks in New York, and Jews everywhere.⁴²

This raises an interesting question. What if the false witnesses accuse successful people in general of wrongdoing? What if they argue that the rich are inescapably economic oppressors unless they give their wealth, or a major portion of their wealth, to the poor? False witness need not be directed against an individual in order to have evil consequences. It can be directed against any group: religious, racial, national, or class. In this case, false witness against "rich men in general" falls under God's condemnation.

A philosophy or ideology that condemns the rich in general is equally as perverse as a philosophy that condemns the poor in general. If men are rich because they or their entire society have conformed themselves to biblical law (Deut. 28:1-14), they are not to be condemned. To condemn them is to condemn God and His law-order. Conversely, if men are poor because they or their entire society are in rebellion against God and God's law (Deut. 28:15-68), they are not to be upheld. *To uphold them is to uphold Satan and his law-order.*⁴³

41. It is worth considering the possibility that one reason for the economic and academic success of Jews in the twentieth century was the combination of modern secularism and remnants of historic discrimination. Secularism assumes that religious differences that are based on dogma or theology are irrelevant, or should be. This has opened up universities, businesses, professions, and most other institutions to hard-working Jews. At the same time, the lingering sense of being set apart from the society at large has given Jews a sense of covenantal mission: to outperform the gentile majority. If the acids of modernism do their predictable work, economic and social success will tend to produce Jews who no longer have the "outsider's" mentality, and the humanistic quest for unity will undermine the sense of covenantal or family mission. We are seeing this in the United States today, where Jews commonly marry non-Jews, since they come into social contact with each other in the secular universities. As Joseph Schumpeter warned of capitalism, so is Jewish performance likely to fail in the long run because of its success. The very secular institutions that allow Jews to compete without religious, social, or racial restrictions will undermine their sense of "Jewishness."

42. Thomas Sowell, The Economics and Politics of Race: An International Perspective (New York: William Morrow, 1983), Pt. I.

43. R. J. Rushdoony, "The Society of Satan," Christian Economics (July 7 and Aug. 4, 1964); reprinted in Biblical Economics Today, II (Oct./Nov. 1979). (<http://bit.ly/rjr-sos>)

The twentieth century suffered the temporary triumph of many philosophies that advocated state-enforced policies of compulsory wealth redistribution. Generally, these philosophies were promoted in the name of democracy. In effect, advocates of these philosophies propose a revision of the eighth commandment: “Thou shalt not steal, except by majority vote.” Other versions of collectivism are promoted as elitist programs that need to be imposed on the “rich” in the name of the poor, even when a majority of voters are opposed to the programs. These philosophies universally bear false witness against the rich in general, charging that the rich have exploited the poor throughout history. Marxism is only the most successful and most consistent of these philosophies of organized envy. There are many others: Fabian socialism, national socialism (Nazism), the corporate state (fascism), social democracy, populism, liberation theology, Christian socialism, the New World Order, the New International World Order, New Age communalism, and hundreds of variants. These philosophies have produced political movements that have pressured politicians to pass legislation that oppresses the productive: the present rich (though seldom the “super rich”)⁴⁴ and the future rich, meaning all those who would like the opportunity to become rich, i.e., the middle class entrepreneur, the independent businessman, and the potentially productive but presently poor person, whose avenues for advancement are cut off.⁴⁵

Conclusion

Because all men are under God and responsible to God, justice is to be impartial and predictable. It is not to be arbitrary, for God is not arbitrary. Law is both constant and theocentric, although applications of God’s fixed laws can and have changed, as a result of new historical circumstances. The Bible gives us our standards of application, just as it gives us God’s law.

Men are to judge in terms of God’s law. This process of rendering judgment is not mechanical. It is personal and covenantal. It involves the use of intuition, either Bible-based or humanistic. There is no escape from the “humanness” of human judgment. What is needed to restrain men from arbitrariness in rendering judgment is a system of 44. Ferdinand Lundberg, The Rich and the Super Rich (Secaucus, New Jersey: Lyle Stuart, 1968).

45. See, for example, Walter Williams, The State Against Blacks (New York: New Press, McGraw-Hill, 1982).

biblical law which restrains the flights of judicial fancy of intuition-guided judges. But we can never totally eliminate uncertainty from the judicial process. The price of perfectly certain justice is astronomical; it would destroy justice.

Legal predictability is one of the fundamental historical foundations for the development of capitalism in the West. The rise of envy-based political and economic systems is now threatening the productivity and very survival of them. Reason can be progressively disciplined by either covenant-keeping intuition or covenant-breaking intuition, but in either case, reasoning is not a mechanical-numerical process. "Between the plasticity of the brain and the mechanistic structure of a computer there is an unbridgeable gap. . . ." ⁴⁶

46. Georgescu-Roegan, Entropy Law, p. 90.

51

FINDERS SHOULD NOT BE KEEPERS

If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again. If thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden, and wouldest forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help with him (Ex. 23:4–5).

This case law, because it deals with property, is governed by the theocentric principle of God as the cosmic Owner. He has delegated temporary ownership of selected portions of His property to individuals and organizations, so that they might work out their salvation or damnation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12).¹ Because God has delegated responsibility for the care and use of His property to specific individuals or organizations, who are held responsible for its management, others are required to honor this distribution of ownership and its associated responsibilities.

Exodus 23:4–5 requires the person who finds a stray domesticated beast to return it to its owner, an enemy. Why specify an enemy? Because, if a person is obedient to this narrowly defined law, he will also be obedient to the wider implications of the law. It is not that one may lawfully ignore a friend's lost animal, but return an enemy's. The Law-giver assumes that anyone who will do a favor for an enemy will also do a favor for a friend.

There are several beneficial results of such a moral injunction whenever it is widely obeyed. First, it upholds the sanctity of the legal rights of property owners. Second, it reasserts man's legitimate control over the animal creation. Third, it reduces hostilities between enemies. Fourth, the passage of time makes it easier to identify thieves. Fifth, it provides an incentive to develop marks of private ownership. It must be stressed from the beginning, however, that this law is not a civil law, for there is no way biblically to develop a system of compulsory charity or compulsory righteousness through the civil government. Exodus 23:4–5 is rather a moral law to be enforced through self-government.

1. Gary North, Ethics and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Epistles (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, 2012), ch. 20.

A. Owner's Rights

There is a rhyme that English-speaking children chant, "Finders, keepers; losers, weepers." When one child finds a toy or possession of another, he torments the owner with this chant. Yet his very chanting testifies to the fact that the tormenter really does not believe in his ethical position. If he really wanted to keep the object, he would not admit to the victim that he had found it. He would forego the joys of tormenting the victim for the pleasure of keeping the object. The tormenter can always appeal to his own parents, who will then go to the parents of the tormenter. In Western society, most parents know that the discovered object is owned by the loser.

From time to time, someone discovers a very valuable lost object, such as a sack of money that had dropped out of an armored car. When he returns it to the owner, the newspapers record the story. Invariably, the doer of the good deed receives a series of telephone calls and letters from anonymous people who inform him that he was a fool, that he should have kept the money. Again, this is evidence of the West's dominant ethical position: the critics prefer to remain anonymous.

1. Rights of Disposal

From a legal standpoint, the reason why the law requires the finder to return the lost item to the owner is that the owner owns the rights of use and disposal of the property. What is owned is the right to exclude other people from using the property. This "bundle of rights" is the essence of ownership. The capitalist system is not based on "property rights"; it is based on the legal rights to control the use and disposal of property. Nothing inheres in the property that gives these rights.

There is another familiar phrase, "possession is nine-tenths of the law." This is incorrectly stated, if by "possession" we mean physical control over some object. The possession which is nine-tenths of the law is the possession of the legal right to exclude, not possession of the physical object itself. The object does not carry this legal right with it when it wanders off or is lost by the owner.

We can see this easily when we consider the case of a lost child.

The fact that someone discovers a lost child obviously transfers no legal right to keep the child. The child is to be returned to the parents or to the civil authorities who act as legal agents of the parents. Possession is clearly not nine-tenths of the law. If anything, possession of a long-lost child subjects a person to the threat of being charged with kidnapping. Because God is the ultimate owner of mankind, He has delegated the legal right to control children to parents, except in cases of physical abuse by parents that threatens the life of the child. In short, parental authority is nine-tenths of the law, not merely possession of physical control over a particular child.

When someone who discovers another person's property is required by God to return it to its owner, there can be no doubt concerning the Bible's commitment to the private ownership of the means of production. Biblical moral law undergirds a capitalist economic order. Socialism is anti-biblical. Where biblical moral law is self-enforced, and biblical civil law is publicly enforced, capitalism must develop. The reason why most modern Christian academics in the social sciences are so vocal in their opposition to biblical law is that they are deeply influenced by socialist economic thought. They recognize clearly that their socialist conclusions are incompatible with biblical law, so they have abandoned biblical law.²

B. Dominion Through Judgment

This case law extends man's dominion over nature: domesticated animals are not to "run wild." They are under man's care and protection. This reasserts man's place under God but above the animals: point two of the biblical covenant model, hierarchy³—appropriate for the Book of Exodus, as the second book of the Pentateuch.

1. Animals Are Subordinate

A law requiring a man to help an animal that has fallen because of too heavy a burden is similar in intent to the law regarding wandering animals. The owner is present with the animal, however: "thou shalt surely help with him." He has overburdened his animal, and it has

2. A good example of such antinomian socialist reasoning is John Gladwin, "Centralist Economics," in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), ch. 4. See also my response, ibid., pp. 198–203. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>) fallen. The typical response of an enemy would be, "Well, that good-for-nothing has now gone too far. He has broken the back of his own animal. Let him find out just how much trouble it is to set things straight. Let him untie all the packages, lift up the beast, and repack." The problem with this approach is that the beast is suffering for the errors of its owner. The owner is having trouble, but so is the innocent beast. Should the beast suffer needlessly? The law directs a passerby to go over and help lift the beast back to its feet. This is a two-person job: one to help up the beast, and the other to help lift its burden. Man is to be a protector of those under his authority, including animals.

3. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

A lost animal can damage other people's property (Ex. 22:5). It can wander into a pit and get hurt or killed (Ex. 21:33–34).⁴ It can injure men or other animals (Ex. 21:35–36).⁵ To have a domesticated lost animal wandering without any form of supervision testifies against the dominion covenant. It is a sign that God's required moral and hierarchical order has broken down. It is an aspect of God's curse when beasts inherit the land (Ex. 23:29). In short, domesticated animals require supervision by man.

No man's knowledge is perfect. Men can lose control over their domestic work animals. When they do, it becomes a moral responsibility for other men to intervene and restore order. This is done for the sake of biblical social order: (1) for the individual who has lost control over his animal and who is legally responsible for any damage that it might perform, and (2) for the sake of the animal itself.

A domesticated animal is a capital asset, a tool of production. Mankind's development of tools of production is the basis of economic growth. The loss of a trained work animal reduces its owner's ability to subdue his portion of the earth. This sets back the fulfillment of God's dominion covenant with mankind. This loss of production reduces the per capita economic growth of the whole community, even though the loss may not be large enough to be perceived. The person who finds a lost animal is required to restore it to the owner, even though this involves economic sacrifice on his part. In the long run, this implicit sanctioning of privately owned capital will produce increased wealth for all.

The biblical imagery of the lost sheep of Israel is indicative of the central concern of the Bible: the restoration of moral and legal order, the overcoming of sin and its effects. The lost sheep in history need a shepherd. They are wandering toward destruction. God intervenes and brings them home. The New Testament imagery of Jesus as the great shepherd points to the theme of restoration.

4. Chapter 41:B.

5. Chapter 42.

2. Righteous Judgment

A principle of justice visible is here. These verses appear in between verses dealing with civil justice. The first three verses of Exodus 23 deal with impartial justice. Verses four and five deal with the lost or fallen animal. Then verses six and seven return to the original theme of justice: “Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause. Keep thee far from a false matter; and the innocent and the righteous slay thou not: for I will not justify the wicked.” The idea that links these verses is this: if you treat an animal well, you will probably treat other people well. If you will care for your enemy’s helpless beast, you will probably not pervert justice when dealing with a helpless person.

This law is also a way of bringing God’s eternal judgment on one’s enemy. “If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee” (Prov. 25:21–22).⁶ One destroys a covenant-breaking enemy forever by treating him lawfully. Every good deed done to a covenant-breaking enemy, if he remains a covenant-breaker, adds to his eternal agony. This is a basic New Testament doctrine: “Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good” (Rom. 12:20–21).

C. The Reduction of Personal Hostilities

When your enemy goes out of his way to restore a lost asset to you, it becomes more difficult to hate him. He has demonstrated his commitment to God’s law. This identifies him as someone who respects the terms of God’s covenant. This covenant is personal, not impersonal. All those who affirm this covenant are personally bonded to God and therefore to each other. Thus, whatever the dispute may be between them, it becomes more difficult to ascribe comprehensive evil motives to anyone who honors this moral injunction. He has gone to some expense to restore a lost animal to its owner. This is a visible affirmation that the law of God is more important than the personal disputes of life.

6. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 76.

Obviously, it would be close to impossible to gain a court's conviction against anyone who breaks this law. There would have to be witnesses. The accused person could claim that he had never seen the animal or other lost object. It is also difficult to imagine what civil penalties might be attached to this law. We therefore should conclude that the enforcement of this law is based on self-government under God's law. The person who returns a lost object to its owner is demonstrating that he acted out of concern for the law, not out of concern for the civil magistrate. He is a person who exercises self-government under law. Again, it becomes more difficult to entertain suspicions about his overall ulterior motives.

1. Maimonides' Rule and Social Conflict

Moses Maimonides' rule would drastically increase hostilities between Jews and gentiles: "The lost property of a heathen may be kept, for Scripture says, Lost thing of thy brother's (Deut. 22:3). Furthermore, if one returns it, he commits a transgression, for he is supporting the wicked of the world."⁷ In other words, returning lost property to a gentile is primarily a form of economic subsidy, not primarily an honoring of the principle of owner's rights. It is revealing that he cited Deuteronomy 22:3, which refers to the lost property of one's brother, and made no mention of Exodus 23:4-5, which explicitly deals with the lost property of enemies.

He did add this qualification: "But if one returns it in order to sanctify God's name, thereby causing persons to praise the Israelites and realize that they are honest, he is deemed praiseworthy. In cases involving a profanation of God's name, it is forbidden to keep a heathen's lost property, and it must be returned."⁸ In other words, in order to maintain the appearance of honesty, the property should be returned. The problem was, of course, that eventually these rules might become known to the gentile community, and they would learn the truth about those Jews who follow Maimonides' precepts: they are governed by a very different concept of honesty from what the Bible itself establishes. At that point, the rule of expediency would be recognized for what it is, and would therefore backfire, bringing reproach on the Jewish community. This is not the way to increase social peace between hostile religious groups in a community.

7. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, vol. 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1180] 1954), III:XI:3, p. 128.

8. Idem.

If the town is inhabited equally by Jews and gentiles, he said, the Jew must advertise that he has found lost property.⁹ But if the town is less than half populated by Jews, and the lost property is found where heathen generally congregate, or in a highway, the Jew is blameless in keeping it, because “whatever he finds belongs to him, even if an Israelite comes along and identifies it.”¹⁰ Maimonides warned his fellow Jews that if the owner is a Jew, and he claims the property, the Jew who wishes to follow “the good and upright path and do more than the strict letter of the law requires” should return it to him.¹¹ Nevertheless, he is not required by law to do this.

The following rule is literally a corker. “If one finds a cask of wine in a town containing a majority of heathen, any benefit from the wine is forbidden, but the cask may be retained as lost property.” Leave the cork in the cask. Presumably, Maimonides was worried about some sort of ritual pollution problem associated with gentile food. That fear is solved as soon as a Jew asserts ownership of the lost cask: “. . . if an Israelite comes and identifies it, the finder may drink the wine.”¹² What a system! As soon as a Jew identifies himself as the legal owner, he loses ownership. The other Jew gains ownership. This is not the best way to reduce personal hostilities within the Jewish community.

Maimonides provided one rule that makes sense, toward the end of Chapter 11: “If one follows the good and upright path and does more than the strict letter of the law requires, he will return lost property in all cases, even if it is not in keeping with his dignity.”¹³ But this is the strict letter of the law: Exodus 23:4–5. Any form of dignity that is not in keeping with it is a form of pride, and should be eliminated, or at least suppressed through self-discipline. Obeying the law regarding lost property is a good place to begin the process.

D. Identifying Thieves

The person who steals an animal and is immediately arrested

9. Ibid., III:XI:6.

10. Ibid., III:XI:7.

11. Idem.

12. Ibid., III:XI:8.

13. Ibid., III:XI:17, p. 131.

could offer this excuse: “I found this animal wandering in the area, and I was simply returning it to its owner. I did not know who owned it, so I was taking it home until I could make further inquiries.” This might work once or twice. The man could appeal to the case law in Deuteronomy:

Thou shalt not see thy brother’s ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt in any case bring them again unto thy brother. And if thy brother be not nigh unto thee, or if thou know him not, then thou shalt bring it unto thine own house, and it shall be with thee until thy brother seek after it, and thou shalt restore it to him again. In like manner shalt thou do with his ass; and so shalt thou do with his raiment; and with all lost thing of thy brother’s, which he hath lost, and thou hast found, shalt thou do likewise: thou mayest not hide thyself (Deut. 22:1–3).¹⁴

This would not be a suitable excuse three or four times. If a person lives in a society that has developed an information reporting system, he has a legal requirement to report the whereabouts of lost articles to the civil authorities if he does not know who the owner is. Thus, as time passes, the “excuse of the wandering animal” fades. The owner who discovers his animal in another’s possession has a far stronger legal case than if this case law were not in God’s law-order. A lost animal is not supposed to remain indefinitely in another person’s possession, especially after the person who lost it broadcasts its loss publicly. “Thou shalt bring it unto thine own house, and it shall be with thee until thy brother seek after it.”

E. Marks of Ownership and Reduced Search Costs

This case law makes it far more likely that a lost animal will be immediately returned to the owner. Thus, the law increases the economic return from marking property. This is an incentive to promote the spread of owner’s rights that can be legally protected. A person’s property is brought under his own administration through a mark of ownership.

By marking property, the owner reduces future search costs: his search for the animal, as well as the finder’s search for the owner. It reduces search costs for a neighbor whose crops have been eaten or ruined by a wandering beast. He can then gain restitution from the owner (Ex. 22:5). This is an incentive for someone who wants to protect his property (the beast) from thieves or to protect his neighbor's property (crops) from loss by building a fence or by restraining the animal in some way.

14. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 52.

Branding also reduces search costs for the civil authorities if the animal should be stolen. By burning an identifying mark into an animal's flesh, or by attaching a tag to its ear or other flesh, the owner increases risks to the thief. It also increases risks to those who would buy from the thief. The identifying mark makes it possible for buyers to avoid the possibility that they will be charged with having received stolen property. As I mentioned in Chapter 17, English common law recognizes no such crime; it took statute law in the nineteenth century to make it a crime.¹⁵ Biblical law does make it a crime to receive stolen property knowingly, and even when the buyer does not know that the property is stolen, the owner has the right to have it returned to him. The thief never possessed the "bundle of rights" necessary for biblical ownership. God delegates ownership; He does not delegate it to thieves.

God's use of circumcision in the Old Testament era is an obvious parallel to the brand. So was the hole punched in the ear of a slave (Ex. 21:6). These were both marks of ownership. The New Testament practice of baptism leaves no visible mark, but it leaves a legal description in the records of a continuing third party institution, the church. It is also a mark of God's primary ownership. The same is true of property registration generally. Titles, deeds, and other marks of legal ownership have developed over the centuries, thereby extending the dominion of mankind through the development of the institution of private property. By identifying legal owners, society increases the level of personal responsibility. This, too, is a basic biblical goal.

F. Not a Case of State-Enforced Charity

The discoverer must sacrifice time and effort to see to it that the beast is returned to its owner. This might be seen as a form of judicially mandated charity, one of the few examples of compulsory charity in the Bible. Compulsory charity, however, is a contradiction. Charity must always be voluntary. It is governed by the legal principle that the recipient has no judicially enforceable entitlement to the gift. This is why the modern welfare state is careful to label its compulsory wealth-redistribution programs as entitlements. The creators of these programs want to get away from any suggestion of voluntarism, which implies that the donor has the right to refuse to make the gift. Thus, this case law is not related to charity. The owner has a legal claim on the property. He has an entitlement. The person who finds the lost animal is expected to honor this legal claim, even though it costs him money or time to do so.

15. Wayne LaFave and Austin Scott, Jr., Handbook on Criminal Law (Minneapolis, Minnesota: West, 1972), pp. 681–91: "Receiving Stolen Property."

This law requires a form of wealth-redistribution. The one who discovers the lost animal owes it to the owner to return it. This is a positive injunction. So is the law to assist an enemy whose animal has fallen down. Yet biblical civil law, I have argued, does not issue positive injunctions. It does not compel anyone to do good; it merely prohibits people from doing public evil. Thus, I conclude that this law is not a civil law, but is rather a moral injunction. There is no civil sanction attached to it, nor is there any general judicial principle of restitution that would enable the judges to determine a proper sanction. The civil government therefore has no role to play in the enforcement of this law.

The civil government can legitimately become involved if the person who owns the beast discovers it in someone else's possession. The suspicion of theft immediately arises. This threat is an incentive for the discoverer to return it to its owner, in order to avoid future criminal prosecution for theft. But this is a separate issue. The case law in question should be seen as a moral responsibility placed on the individual directly by God, and not as a civil statute.

Conclusion

The righteous person is not to use circumstances to gain revenge on his enemy at the expense of the innocent and helpless. He must do what he can to restore order—economic and moral—in his dealings with his enemies. This means that God's purposes for society are more important than men's short-term personal feuds. This is not to say that society is always more important than the individual is; it is to say that God's purposes are more important than man's purposes, either for society or for individuals.

God's requirement of returning a lost animal or lifting up a fallen domestic animal is imposed in order to restore harmonious relations among enemies, and to help fulfill the dominion covenant. While a short-run burden is placed on the man who comes across a lost or fallen animal, he knows that in the long run his own interests as a property owner are improved when people honor this law. If he refuses to honor it, then others may also refuse. Thus, honoring the terms of the law improves the safety and security of all members of society.

This case law is an example of a biblical injunction that is narrowly circumscribed, but which in fact has wide application. The finder is to return the lost animal to the owner, an enemy. Does this mean that he need not return a lost animal to his friend? No; the focus of the law is on the case where the temptation is greater to keep the animal: the enemy's beast. The law assumes that if you are required to obey it in the difficult case, you surely are required to obey it in the easier case.

BRIBERY AND OPPRESSION

And thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous (Ex. 23:8).

The theocentric issue here is God as a righteous Judge. His judgment cannot be purchased by anyone. He honors His law, not gifts from men. “Wherefore now let the fear of the LORD be upon you; take heed and do it: for there is no iniquity with the LORD our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts” (II Chron. 19:7). He sets the standard for rendering judgment; human judges are to follow it. “Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous” (Deut. 16:19).¹

The context of this law is official judgment rendered by a court. Judges are not to render false judgment in favor of a poor man (Ex. 23:3) or against him (Ex. 23:6). People are not to offer false witness in a court against a righteous person (Ex. 23:7). They are not to oppress a stranger (Ex. 23:9). Such corrupt judicial acts constitute oppression, which points to the most common source of oppression in society: a misuse of God’s authorized monopoly of justice, the courts.² Oppression is therefore primarily judicial: either the court renders false judgment or else it refuses to prosecute a righteous person’s cause. “They afflict the just, they take a bribe, and they turn aside the poor in the gate” (Amos 5:12). The court indulges in official sins of commission or omission. It is supposed to uphold God’s mission by rendering righteous judgment as a means of national and international evangelism.

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD

1. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 40.

2. See Chapter 48.

my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).³

A. Blaming Capitalism

In the analysis of oppression that is offered by modern socialists, the free market is the source. Competition is seen as ruthless, immoral, and man-destroying. Capitalism in this view is not a system governed by the principle of customer's authority,⁴ but rather a system of consumer exploitation by unscrupulous businessmen whose goal is to hold down wages and raise prices. (In fact, free market firms raise wages through their mutual competition for scarce labor services,⁵ and also by investing in capital that increases the productivity of the workers.⁶ They reduce prices in their endless quest for new consumers.⁷ They are forced to do this through the competitive market process, because they are economic agents of the consumers.⁸) Karl Marx concluded volume 1 of Das Kapital (the only volume published in his lifetime) with these words: ". . . the capitalist mode of production and accumulation, and therefore capitalist private property, have for their fundamental condition the annihilation of self-earned private property; in other words, the expropriation of the labourer."⁹ A few pages earlier, he had prophesied the inevitable communist revolution in these envious and apocalyptic terms: "The knell of capitalist private

3. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

4. In earlier editions, I followed W. H. Hutt's usage: "consumer's sovereignty." But this is a legal category. Here, I emphasize economic authority, not legal sovereignty. See W. H. Hutt, "The Nature of Aggressive Selling," Economica, 12 (1935); reprinted in Individual Freedom: Selected Works of William H. Hutt, eds. Svetozar Pejovich and David Klingaman (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1975).

5. Gary North, "Exploitation and Knowledge," The Freeman (Jan. 1982).

6. Percy L. Greaves, Jr., "How Wages Are Determined," The Freeman (July 1970). (<http://bit.ly/GreavesWages>)

7. Gary North, "Price Competition and Expanding Alternatives," The Freeman (Aug. 1974). (<http://bit.ly/gnprice>); Cf. North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 9. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

8. Gary North, "Who's the Boss?" The Freeman (Feb. 1979). (<http://bit.ly/gnwho>)

9. Karl Marx, Capital (New York: Modern Library, [1867] 1906 ed.), p. 848.

property sounds. The expropriators are expropriated.”¹⁰

1. Capitalism's Critics

Such rhetoric has been highly influential in academic circles, including Christian academic circles. Before its embarrassed exit from the public arena after the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991, liberation theology was the most consistent and most visible theological by-product of such a view of the free market. The movement was dominated by extreme leftists, whose ideas were imported from Marxism. The movement collapsed when its social and economic model was abandoned by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, which was disbanded by its leaders. When the USSR lost power, this undermined the legitimacy of liberation theology, which had always been committed to political power as the proper way to manage the economy.

Liberation theology's intellectual legacy of the rejection of capitalism remains quite common in neo-evangelical colleges and seminaries—schools that do not openly adopt liberation theology, for fear of the wrath of the donors and the parents of prospective students. This outlook was dominant prior to 1991. Evidence of this bias was provided by George Grant, who in 1987 and 1988 visited 116 evangelical Protestant colleges, relief and development agencies, missionary groups, and charities in the United States. He asked for copies of their recommended reading lists; at the colleges, he got the required reading texts. After many months of this, he compiled a list of over three dozen of the most common titles. Without exception, they all shared an essentially anti-capitalist outlook. There was not a single openly pro-free market book on the list. Five of these titles were published by Orbis Books, the publishing outlet of the Roman Catholic Maryknoll Order, and the primary liberation theology publishing house in the United States.¹¹

By focusing on what is no more than a secondary source of economic oppression in society, the free market's system of private property, critics of capitalism have misled millions of people. The free market is not a major source of oppression, although the visible manifestations of oppression frequently are found in economic transactions. The source of oppression is the misuse of a biblically legitimate mono-

10. Ibid., p. 837.

11. Good News to the Poor by Julio de Santa Ana, God So Loved the Third World by Tom Hanks, Christ Outside the Gates by Orlando Costas, The Bible of the Oppressed by Elsa Tamez, The Militant Gospel by Alfredo Fierro.

poly: the civil court system. Political oppressors in the West from the medieval period until the late seventeenth century were generally the allies of unscrupulous, power-seeking and rent-seeking¹² agricultural aristocrats, and from the eighteenth century until the Great Depression of the 1930s were allies of unscrupulous, power-seeking and rent-seeking businessmen. Ever since the early 1930s, they have more likely also been the allies of unscrupulous, power-seeking and rent-seeking socialists, Communists, fascists, Keynesian interventionists, and lifetime bureaucrats whose main goal in life is to expand their ability to tell other people what to do.¹³ Long-term economic monopolies, ancient and modern, have almost always been the creation of civil governments.¹⁴

2. Bribes

Why do judges become allies of economic oppressors, thereby making possible continuing oppression? This verse tells us why. Citizens take a portion of their capital and “invest” it. They bribe a court officer to render unrighteous judgment or to look the other way and refuse to prosecute unrighteous public behavior. This verse focuses on direct bribes, but the principle of bribery goes beyond a direct payoff to a personally corrupt official.

Bribes can come in many forms, including promises for financial

12. I use the term “rent” as the so-called “public choice” school of economics does: a stream of income. These streams of income are not limited to real estate investments. Income from government-created economic monopolies is surely a form of rent. The most prominent figure of the public choice school is Nobel laureate James Buchanan. Gordon Tullock, a law professor-turned-economist, was for many years Buchanan’s intellectual partner, and should have been awarded the Nobel Prize in economics with Buchanan in 1986. He told me in 1988 that he had received two votes in the committee. I suspect the fact that he had never taken an economics course proved too embarrassing to the committee. A good introduction to public-choice economics is the textbook by James D. Gwartney and Richard Stroup, Economics: Private and Public Choice (New York: Academic Press, 1979).

13. This is not to say that big business has not also remained the beneficiary of the politicians. Big business has itself become the subsidized ally of socialists, Communists, fascists, and Keynesians. On this point, see Gabriel Kolko, The Triumph of Conservatism (New York: Free Press of Glencoe, 1963); Carroll Quigley, Tragedy and Hope: A History of the World in Our Time (New York: Macmillan, 1966), especially Chapter 17.

14. D. T. Armentano, Antitrust and Monopoly: Anatomy of a Policy Failure (New York: Wiley, 1982); Walter Adams and Horace M. Gray, Monopoly in America: The Government as Promoter (New York: Macmillan, 1955); Mary Bennet Peterson, The Regulated Consumer (Ottawa, Illinois: Green Hill, 1971).

or other support during the next election.¹⁵ Roman Catholic moralist and legal scholar John Noonan's massive and brilliant book, Bribes, lists two pages of bribe prices in history: gold, cash, percentages, etc.¹⁶ Even the definitions of what constitutes a bribe vary widely. Noonan listed four sources of the possible definitions of bribery, "that of the more advanced moralists; that of the law as written; that of the law as in any degree enforced; that of common practice. If one is to say that an act of bribery has been committed, one should know which standard one is using."¹⁷ But whatever the definition, in whatever society, bribes are officially disapproved.¹⁸

This disapproval causes problems for explaining a nation's history. We forget or ignore the fact that some of our greatest heroes have been bribees or bribers. Societies prefer to avoid accusing some great national historical figure with the valid accusation of having been involved in this kind of scandal. Noonan commented: "Francis Bacon, Samuel Pepys, Warren Hastings are not merely respectable; they are heroes—respectively the founders, in the view of their admirers, of British science, the British navy, and British India. Bacon was a bribee by the law as actually enforced; Pepys a bribee by his own measure; Hastings a bribee by the law that was being made. Apologists by the score have hesitated to give their bribetaking its proper name. As for bribers, judgment has always been even more charitable, the underlying assumption being that they are the victims of extortion. When the persons involved have been preeminently just, judgment has often been entirely suspended. Who thinks of Thomas Becket or John Quincy Adams as giving bribes?"¹⁹

B. The Power of the Bribe

The power of the bribe is very great. This passage tells us that wise men are blinded, and righteous men become perverse through bribes. The Bible repeats its warning against bribe-taking judges in Deuteronomy 16:19, Isaiah 1:23, Amos 5:12, Psalms 26:10, and I Samuel 12:3. It was this sin that Samuel's two evil sons practiced (I Sam. 8:3), and it led to the people of Israel calling for a king (I Sam. 8:5), which Samuel warned against (I Sam. 8:11–18). The judges' sin of bribery led step by 15. John T. Noonan, Bribes (New York: Macmillan, 1984), pp. xxi–xii.

16. Ibid., Appendix.

17. Ibid., p. xii.

18. Ibid., p. xx.

19. Ibid., p. xiii.

step to the call for a stronger, more centralized civil government. It was difficult for Samuel to take a stand against the inauguration of the kingship when the judicial failure of his sons was the occasion of the people's demand.

1. Enforcement

Records from the ancient Near East do not indicate any actual prosecutions for bribe-taking. There are no Mesopotamian examples yet translated of any official's being punished for this crime—this, out of a total 100,000 cuneiform tablets in museums.²⁰ Nothing in the records of Egypt indicates that any official was prosecuted for this crime.²¹ Nowhere in the ancient Near East was there a specific civil law against bribery, with punishment specified. This was even true of the ancient Israel. "Reliance is not on human enforcement but on divine assistance."²² But Noonan understood that this is true of biblical history generally: "The enforcement of any law by actually applied human sanctions is not a prominent feature of biblical history. Vengeance is normally divine."²³ Noonan overstated his case with respect to biblical law, however. Deuteronomy 19 specifies that a false witness must suffer the same punishment that he had sought to inflict on his victim (Deut. 19:19).²⁴ There is no reason to believe that a judge and the one who bribed him would be any less subject to this penalty.²⁵ Case laws frequently specify the less obvious infraction in order to affirm the more obvious, e.g., requiring a person to return his enemy's stray animal to him (Ex. 23:4),²⁶ therefore indicating that this should surely be done with a friend's stray animal. If a false witness is to receive punishment on the lex talionis basis, surely a corrupt judge should suffer like-for-like retribution!

The combination of civil monopolistic power and the wealth transmitted by a bribe is too great for even good men to handle, so God prohibits bribe-taking. We never receive something for nothing, 20. Ibid., p. 11. It should be recognized that only a small proportion of these tablets has been translated. Translators seldom translate as much as 15% of existing Near Eastern tablets.

21. Ibid., p. 12.

22. Idem.

23. Ibid., p. 23.

24. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 45.

25. Why Noonan contrasted the Deuteronomic law regarding false witness with the absence of a law regarding bribe-taking is a mystery to me. Noonan, Bribes, p. 24.

26. Chapter 51.

except by God's grace. When a bribe is offered, it is not offered free of charge. A bribe is not a friendly gift; it is payment for services received or hoped for. But these services are usually corrupt.²⁷ When bribery becomes extensive, it is either because the rulers are corrupt already or because the bribers intend to corrupt them. Bribes are therefore a sign of widespread corruption.

This widespread acceptance of bribery as a way of life threatens the social order. When men believe that they can buy the civil judgment they prefer, they lose sight of the true character of God and the looming threat of His judgments, both temporal and eternal. People will eventually lose faith in a bribe-ridden social order, for a social order is sustained by men's faith in the character of God (real or imagined) and the trustworthiness of His sanctions. In a society marked by bribery, the guardians of social order no longer guard in the name of God and by means of His law. They make it appear as though they can sell God's judgment to the highest bidder. In response, God visits His judgment on them and their society. The lex talionis of the civil covenant cannot be annulled by civil legislation. It is basic to God's creation order. Societies will reap what they sow.

2. Beyond Civil Corruption

The corruption of the bribe goes beyond the civil order. It will affect family government, too. Noonan's insight is perceptive: bribery is linked culturally and theologically to adultery.

Metaphors drawn from the vocabulary of sexual sin are used to describe the bribetaker. Since the time of the Roman Republic, "to corrupt" has meant both to seduce a woman and to pay off an officeholder. One "betrays" a lover or an office. One is "faithless" to a spouse or a public trust. The same religions, the same kind of commandments and examples, the same kind of sanctions have addressed acts of bribery and acts of unlawful intercourse. Taken at a certain level of generality, the same substantive goods are protected and promoted by both ethics. Each sets enormous store by fidelity. Each lays down the lines that separate a gift, understood as an identification of one person with another person, from the manipulative or exploitative use of one person by another person. As the sexual ethic disintegrates, or appears to disintegrate, before our eyes, we can ask whether the ethic governing bribes will follow suit.²⁸

27. Not in every case, however; see section D: "The Righteous Bribe."

28. Ibid., p. xvii.

Bribery is also similar to witchcraft, he argued. Both bribery and sorcery are ways of influencing the outcome of an event by illegal means. Both are believed to be widely practiced, though no one admits being involved personally. The formal accusations of both offenses increase during times of moral ambiguity and institutional disruption.²⁹ That adultery in the Bible is also connected to witchcraft and idolatry should come as no surprise. However, the fact that bribery, witchcraft, and adultery are linked in terms of ethics, language, and social function in the history of the West is not intuitively obvious.

C. Bribes and Higher Courts

It should be obvious that local church courts are uniquely vulnerable to being swayed by considerations of money. The local church, unlike the civil government, faces the problem of its dependence on essentially voluntary contributions. Civil courts do not face this problem of voluntarism. Civil governments can compel the payment of taxes by threat of violence, such as confiscation of property. Few people ever voluntarily offer lots of extra money to the tax collector, just to be nice. But people who consistently bring tithes and offerings to the local church, and especially rich people who bring extensive additional offerings on a regular basis, automatically become important figures in that congregation. The more debt that a church carries, the more influential such people become.

In a dispute between a tithing rich person and a tithing poor person, or especially a non-tithing poor person, a local church court may be tempted not to render an adverse verdict against a demonstrably guilty but very rich man. This is one reason why higher church courts are so necessary: to allow a poor man to appeal to a more distant court that is less dependent financially on one rich man's contributions. While a bribe may not have been offered to the church's highest officer, the pastor, the economic equivalent of a bribe may have been offered to him: continued local employment. If the rich man in his dispute in any way threatens to cease giving his tithe, or threatens to stop giving the extra offerings, or threatens to leave the church altogether, then his previous offerings have in fact become retroactive bribes. This is a practical reason why it is imperative for all voting members³⁰ of a

29. Ibid., p. xviii.

30. I am not saying that all communicant members should be forced to tithe as a condition of membership; only the voting members should be. Those members who refuse to pay their God-required share of the ministry should not be given judicial congregation to be required by church law to tithe to the local church. The church's source of income must be wide and deep, in order to reduce the influence of any particular member.

The direct bribe is more likely to be offered to a civil magistrate than to a church officer. Why? First, because it is illegal to offer a bribe to a civil servant. Second, because the civil magistrate receives a guaranteed salary that is relatively independent of competitive pressures. Unlike a pastor whose church could be thrown into a crisis if a disgruntled rich person leaves, the civil judge has considerable coercive power over those who are tried by his court. Those standing before him cannot autonomously walk out and transfer membership to another jurisdiction before the trial begins.³¹ The people in his court are paying their taxes to a third party, the tax collecting agency. The judge will probably not lose his job if he renders an adverse judgment against one of them, unless one of them is a political power broker or a celebrity who is popular with the public. If he is a lifetime judge, nothing but threats of coercion or promises of secret rewards may sway him. Thus, if he is to be influenced by a bribe, it is because he is personally after the money or other economic asset, such as inside information of economic value.³² In short, the bribe to a specific civil officer is far more likely to be obvious to the recipient; the bribe to the church court is more likely to be indirect.

Again, one of the reasons why a civil court of appeal is necessary is to insure honest judgment for those without money or local influence. A more distant higher court is less likely to be swayed by questions of a person's local influence. Also, the person who offers a bribe locally will find it more expensive and more risky to continue to offer bribes to higher courts' officers. Thus, the potential payoff of bribing a local judge is also reduced; on appeal, the favorable local decision may be overturned. The more visibly corrupt the paid-for local verdict is, the more likely it will be overturned on the basis of law.

status in the government of the church. If they refuse to place themselves under the ecclesiastical requirements of God's law, then they should not exercise authority over others in terms of the God's law. They should not hold any ecclesiastical office. Voting is an aspect of exercising citizenship, an office of judge. Gary North, The Covenantal Tithe (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision Press, 2011), ch. 9.

31. A "change of venue" plea can be offered, of course. The accused can request a trial in a different court. But such pleas can be turned down by the local court.

32. Henry Manne [MANee], Insider Trading and the Stock Market (New York: Free Press, 1966).

D. The Righteous Bribe³³

Exodus 23:8 forbids the judge's acceptance of a bribe. A bribe perverts the wise and righteous person. Thus, the judge who is righteous is characterized in part by his refusal to accept a bribe. The law of God is to be applied to each case before the court, irrespective of the personal advantage of a judge. The court has been granted a monopoly by God. It represents God in a covenantal hierarchy.³⁴ A judge is not to seek personal gain through altering justice, either to render a corrupt judgment or a righteous one.

But what of the unrighteous judge who rules in a corrupt society? What can righteous people do about him? If a righteous person is brought before an unrighteous judge or an unrighteous court, how does he gain righteous judgment? What if he is a stranger in some society that expects bribes from those seeking justice? An analogous example is the salesman who seeks to sell military equipment or other goods to nations governed by corrupt state officials. What if that nation's customs regarding state purchases recognize the legitimacy, or at least the necessity, of kickbacks and payoffs to public officials? In other words, what if some nation's traditions would rather have foreign capitalists pay part of the salaries of public officials, even though this means using tax money to buy possibly substandard foreign products? Obviously, to make such payments is to subsidize evil—corrupt officials—to some degree. On the other hand, to allow corrupt officials to continue to make personally profitable but socially bad decisions is also to subsidize evil to some degree. Wouldn't it be better to have a bribe-seeking public official profit from a good decision rather than from a bad decision? The question then arises: Are righteous people allowed to pay bribes, even though officials are forbidden by the Bible to receive them?

Contrary to most people's expectations, the Bible says yes. The Bible recognizes that in order to gain legitimate goals in life, righteous people are allowed to pay bribes to corrupt officials. In the same way that a bribe to a righteous judge is designed to twist righteous justice, a

33. The original version of this section appeared as Appendix 5 in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973). I have yet to receive a single criticism of the thesis. [Note in 2011: I have still received no criticism of the thesis.]

34. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), chaps. 2, 12. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

bribe to an unrighteous judge is designed to straighten out unrighteous judgments.

1. Solomon's Recommended Strategy

Solomon the wise understood this biblical principle of productive bribery:

A gift is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that hath it: whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth (Prov. 17:8).

A gift in secret pacifieth anger: and a reward in the bosom strong wrath (Prov. 21:14).³⁵

Notice the phrase, “a reward in the bosom.” It produces a mental image of a secret gift, one tucked away in one’s cloak. Nevertheless, someone might argue that Solomon did not have civil government in mind when he wrote these two proverbs. Perhaps Solomon had in mind only personal friendship rather than civil justice. But to argue in this fashion makes it very difficult to interpret Solomon’s use of the parallel phrase “a gift out of the bosom” in reference to paying bribes to civil magistrates:

A wicked man taketh a gift out of the bosom [under his cloak—G.N.] to pervert the ways of judgment (Prov. 17:23).

He had in mind a judge, someone who has the power “to pervert the ways of judgment.” Solomon was not talking about gifts of friendship; he was talking about gifts to produce favorable judgments.

It might also be argued that Solomon was simply commenting on the reality of the success of bribery, but not promoting the offering of bribes. If so, then why would he say of a bribe that “whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth”? Does evil always prosper? Not in the long run, certainly. So, he seems to have had in mind the righteous bribe—a gift to an unrighteous judge from a righteous person in order to gain righteous judgment.

2. Other Biblical Examples

When Jacob passed through the land controlled by his brother Esau, he had his servants present Esau with a series of presents, each nicer than the previous gift. He self-consciously decided to buy off his brother's wrath by a systematic program of bribery (Gen. 32:13–21).³⁶ Why was this necessary? Because his brother was a corrupt and present-oriented person. It was better, Jacob decided, to pay bribes to Esau in advance than to risk a military confrontation with him. The bribe, unlike tribute, was offered voluntarily in advance of Esau's rendering of judgment against Jacob. Esau did not impose a military defeat on Jacob and then ask for tribute from him. Instead, Jacob acted in advance of what he wisely expected to be a losing military effort when he passed through his brother's jurisdiction.

35. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 65.

We also have examples of negative bribes: the imposition of unpleasantness on judges, with an implicit offer to stop, once judgment is rendered. Jesus told a parable of an unjust judge and a righteous widow. The judge, first of all, "feared not God, neither regarded man" (Luke 18:2). The widow comes to him to be avenged of her adversary. He refuses to render a decision. So she comes again. And again. She refuses to let him alone. Finally, he can stand it no longer. He announces, in desperation: "Though I fear not God, nor regard man; yet because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me" (vv. 4b–5). Let us not miss the economics of all this: the widow had offered the judge a bribe. "Render judgment," she was saying, "and I will give you peace. I will stop demanding judgment. I will pay you by going away and leaving you in peace." She was entitled to judgment, and she insisted on getting it. It was a reverse bribe: "I will pay you after the judgment is rendered." She did not ask for unrighteous judgment; she merely asked for prompt judgment. She asked for what God says that she was entitled to.³⁷

I realize that Bible commentators are not used to thinking in terms of subtle economic concepts such as reverse bribery. Yet we use a similar approach all the time when dealing with our children. We offer "carrots" for good behavior, and we offer "sticks" for bad behavior. We keep telling them to obey, with the harshest, most fearsome tone of voice we can muster; we make them feel uncomfortable. We implicitly promise to leave them alone if they obey. They dearly want to be left alone. When they do what we tell them, we once again speak pleasantly to them. They want to avoid our harsh words, so we devise a system of negative rewards that uses this desire to our advantage. We also use positive rewards. We offer them payment if they obey. The goal of each kind of reward is the same: gaining their cooperation. The same is true of negative bribes and positive bribes: we seek to gain corrupt officials' cooperation.

36. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 29 "Contingency Planning."

37. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 42.

3. The Sermon on the Mount

Consider also Jesus' recommendations in His famous Sermon on the Mount. He set forth suggestions for daily conduct in a world controlled by unrighteous people.

Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison (Matt. 5:25).³⁸

And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain (Matt. 5:40–41).³⁹

Jesus informed His followers that they should give to those in power over them, i.e., if anyone can compel our cooperation, an extra measure of cooperation. Give him your cloak also, He said. If such a gift were truly voluntary, we would call the extra gift a tip for good service or charity to the needy. What, then, should we call such cooperation under conditions involving the threat of external compulsion? Obviously, this is bribery. A bribe is a gift to a public official over and above what is legally required or officially asked for. Such a bribe enables a Christian to escape the full force of the wrath that, in principle, a consistent pagan ruler would impose on Christians if he realized how utterly at war Christ and His kingdom are against Satan and his kingdom. In other words, a bribe pacifies the receiver, just as Solomon said.

The ethic of the Sermon on the Mount is grounded on the principle that a godly bribe (of goods or services, cloak or walk) is sometimes the best way for Christians to buy temporary peace and freedom for themselves and the church, assuming that the enemies of God have overwhelming temporal power. Jesus was giving suggestions for a captive people who labored under the domination of the Roman Empire.

38. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

39. Ibid., ch. 9.

This is also the context of His famous recommendation to turn the other cheek (Matt. 5:39). His advice should not lead us to believe that the proper Christian attitude under all circumstances should be to agree with our enemies. Perpetual forgiveness and endless toleration of evil should not be our attitude when we are given lawful authority over evil-doers. When we are given the lawful authority to prosecute, convict, and punish evil people in the civil courts, we should do so.

Jesus warned His listeners to “resist not evil” (Matt. 5:39). Is this a universal rule applicable in all circumstances? Not at all. James tells us, “Submit yourselves therefore to God. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you” (James 4:7). Why the difference in the recommended strategies? Because Jesus’ words were directed toward a captive people who were under the heel of frequently evil local rulers who were the agents of Rome. He had in mind civil conduct by a captive nation. His advice? “Do not become violent revolutionaries. Don’t provoke a head-on armed conflict with military power that exceeds yours.” In contrast, James set forth a principle of moral conduct: resist the devil. Sometimes the best way to resist the devil is to cooperate temporarily with his subordinates, the way that Obadiah cooperated with King Ahab in order to save the lives of a hundred prophets (I Kings 18:13). We cooperate with evil-doers for the purposes of subversion. In effect, we become spies for God’s kingdom in a strategy of conquest. We do what Moses did as a young man in Pharaoh’s court, Rahab did in Jericho, Ehud did with Eglon when he brought the king a “present,” and Jael did with Sisera before he slept. We “play ball” long enough to get an opportunity to crush their skulls with the bat.

Does an evil civil ruler deserve obedience? No; he deserves eternal punishment. Is it wise for Christians to render an evil civil ruler obedience? Yes, but only if his judgments cannot be successfully overturned in court by superior magistrates or if he cannot be successfully overthrown by lower magistrates.⁴⁰

To the extent that a Christian’s position in some period of history resembles the plight of the Christians under Roman rule, he should take heed of the Sermon on the Mount. He should remain outwardly cooperative with civil magistrates. Under the rule of a Hitler or a Stalin, the Christian’s proper response is outward subservience. He should bribe the dictator’s lieutenants, join a Christian underground, and continue preaching the gospel, both openly (where legal) and clandestinely (where illegal). Bribes and outward cooperation gain people time and influence. The Christian can then continue his work of reshaping people's religious views, thereby undermining the power base of the tyrant. He should be as wise (and deadly) as a serpent by appearing as harmless as a dove.

40. John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), Book 4, Chapter 20. See also Michael Gilstrap, “John Calvin’s Theology of Resistance,” Christianity and Civilization, 3 (1983), pp. 180–217. (<http://bit.ly/CRtheology>)

This raises the practical question of how to deal with the Christian who insists in advance that he will inform on other Christians who break any civil law, or at the very least will tell the truth to any civil magistrate who asks him a question about someone else's law-breaking. First and foremost, such a compulsive truth-teller has not understood the Bible, especially the case of Rahab the God-honoring liar.⁴¹ Second, in a major crisis where the state threatens the church or obedience to biblical principles, it then becomes the moral responsibility of other Christians to lie to, confuse, and generally misinform any "blabbermouth for Jesus" in their midst. A real-world example of the threat of this sort of self-righteousness would be the case of Christians in Europe who hid Jews in their homes. Immediately after a successful invasion of a country, the Nazis insisted that all Jews report to local police headquarters. It was clear that the Jews were being shipped to concentration camps. Many Christians in the Netherlands, for example, hid Jews on their farms or in other hiding places. It was imperative that informers, Christian and non-Christian alike, not be given evidence of such activities. Lying to Christian informants was as ethical as lying to the state officials who were being served by collaborating Christians as their agents.

4. The Failure of Neutrality

If a bribe offered by a righteous man to an unrighteous court is legitimate in God's eyes, yet an offer of a bribe to a righteous judge is illegitimate, then a problem arises: how to discover a common definition of criminal behavior that encompasses the visible, prosecutable activity of paying off a judge. Can a proper definition be found that allows prosecution without relying on an investigation into the question of demonstrable intent of the briber? Can a biblically sanctioned legal definition of criminal action be imposed that does not raise the question of the legitimacy of the judgment sought by the briber? Can both the briber and the bribee be legitimately convicted, irrespective of the intent of the briber?

41. Gary North, "In Defense of Biblical Bribery," in R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, pp. 838–42. Jim West, "Rahab's Justifiable Lie," Christianity and Civilization, 2 (1983). (<http://bit.ly/CRtheology>)

The Bible's answer is clearly no. No common-ground definition of bribery is possible. There are biblically legitimate bribes as well as biblically condemned bribes. Judges must never accept bribes, the Bible teaches, but bribers are sometimes acting legitimately. Thus, no common-ground, natural-law principle can be invoked to define specific visible acts that invariably constitute criminal bribery. Noonan, as a Roman Catholic defender of natural law principles, searched in vain to provide a single definition of bribery that can be imposed on any society, irrespective of that society's theological roots. It is interesting that Thomas Aquinas did not invoke natural law theory in his discussion of bribery, and in this, Noonan said, "Thomas is representative of the medieval theologians working in the natural law tradition."⁴²

Here is what I wrote in the early 1970s. I have not changed my opinion:

There can be no neutral, universal application of a word like "bribery," for, to make such a universal definition, we would have to assume the existence of some universal, neutral, and completely accepted legal code. That is the basic presupposition of humanism, but Christianity denies such neutrality. Neutrality does not exist. Everything must be interpreted in terms of what God has revealed. The humanistic goal of neutral language (and therefore neutral law) was overturned at the Tower of Babel. Our definitions must be in terms of biblical revelation. Resistance to unjust laws is not anarchy; resistance to just laws is anarchy. Rahab was right, though her apostate state would have regarded her as treasonous; Judas Iscariot was wrong, though an apostate state regarded his actions as exemplary, and rewarded him handsomely. There is no universal definition of a concept like treason. God's law and His specific guidance determine what is or is not treasonous or anarchistic. Rahab was the saint and Judas was the traitor.⁴³

I linked treason and bribery together because they are obvious examples, biblically, of the impossibility of finding a universal definition of crime without any appeal to biblical ethics. What I did not recognize until I read Noonan's book is that treason and bribery are the two 42. Noonan, Bribes, p. 212.

43. North, "In Defense of Biblical Bribery," in Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law, p. 843.

crimes mentioned by name in the United States Constitution.⁴⁴

The legitimacy of certain forms of bribery points directly to the moral necessity of theocracy: the rule (kratos) of God (theos). If God's revealed law in the Bible is not acknowledged by the civil courts as the ultimate standard of civil law, then the state will of necessity convict people who are biblically innocent of any crime, or else fail to convict others who are guilty as charged. Once we recognize this fact with respect to crimes as important as treason and bribery, we also ought to recognize it with respect to the whole of civil law. To fail to recognize this is to continue to deny the moral and civil legitimacy of biblical law itself. Natural law theory is a myth. It is time for Christians to abandon it.

E. Highest Bid Wins: Illegitimate for Governments

We hear of bribes offered to public officials. We seldom hear of bribes offered to businessmen. We expect to hear of businessmen offering bribes, but we do not expect to hear of businessmen being offered bribes. Why not? Because the concept of bribery is linked almost exclusively to the misuse of a God-sanctioned monopoly, a judicial office. A bribe is a payment to an official. When one capitalist makes a cash payment to another in order to gain his cooperation, this is called market competition, not bribery.⁴⁵

1. Free Market Pricing

This illustrates a very important economic principle: different systems of financing govern different sovereign spheres of society. The principle of "highest bid wins" governs the competitive free market. If this principle were not honored, then the auctions (competitive open markets) of the world could not function, as we shall examine in detail below. Men always have expectations of how resources are to be distributed in any social order. If the principle of private ownership is maintained by the civil authorities, then people know that they have the right to exclude others from access to their property. The civil government is expected to uphold ownership boundaries.⁴⁶ Only by offering higher and higher bids can other people hope to gain access to my assets and the key legal right (immunity) associated with ownership, namely, the right to exclude. The principle of highest bid wins is inherent in any society that upholds the private property system. The rules of economic order are known in advance, and people can make economic plans for the future in terms of these judicial assumptions.

44. Noonan, Bribes, p. xvi.

45. An exception: a salesman who pays a bribe to a purchasing agent who is in a position to place a large order using his firm's money. They in effect "split the commission." This is a violation of company policy on the part of the purchasing agent, who is misusing company funds in order to get a personal reward. It is a criminal offense: theft. This must be recognized for what it is: a violation of company policy. It is not inherently a "capitalist act." It is a thief's act.

The difference between the operation of the free market and the operation of the court system is that God has granted a legal monopoly of enforcement to church government and civil government. Courts must serve as the final voice of civil authority.⁴⁷ They are to be neither open nor competitive.⁴⁸ This means that they are not to be governed by the capitalist principle of “highest bid wins.” No man is supposed to be able to pay a court to gain his preferred decision, nor should people be able to “shop around” in search of a court more likely to be favorable to them.

A church government has been granted a unique monopolistic authority over those who have voluntarily covenanted with it (or whose parents have). A civil government has been granted a unique geographical monopoly over those who have covenanted with it (or whose parents have). The state represents God to those within its geographical boundaries, and it possesses an authority defined by constitutional law or custom. Thus, a court is not governed by the principle of “highest bid wins.” To imagine that such a principle governs the courts

46. This is point three of the biblical covenant model: Chapter 28.

47. If a national (or international) supreme court possesses, as a side-effect of rendering judgments in court cases, the constitutional authority to declare an act of the legislature illegal or unconstitutional—a power possessed by the U.S. Supreme Court (though not by many other nations’ courts)—this power should be tempered by the right of the legislature and the executive to combine (if they are divided) in a decision to overturn the supreme court’s decision, if the vote of the legislature is large enough (say, three-quarters of both houses of the legislature). Without this right of appeal beyond the supreme judicial court, a single agency of civil government gains the exclusive voice of authority, a power trustworthy only in the hands of God. On the accelerating power of the U.S. judiciary, see Carrol D. Kilgore, Judicial Tyranny (Nashville, Tennessee: Nelson, 1977).

48. The legitimacy of a system of exclusively private, competitive, profit-seeking, free market civil courts is promoted by Bruno Leoni, Freedom and the Law (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1961); cf. Murray N. Rothbard, “On Freedom and the Law,” New Individualist Review, I (Winter 1962), pp. 37–40; reprinted in one volume by Liberty Fund, Indianapolis, Indiana, 1981, pp. 163–66; Rothbard, For a New Liberty: The Libertarian Manifesto, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1973] 2006), pp. 282–90. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardFANL>) is to imagine that God honors the same principle in His rendering of judgment. It would mean that rich people could buy a decision from God. But they cannot do this, even if they owned the whole world. "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" (Mark 8:36). God honors Himself alone by honoring His law. All men are judged by His law. He does not respect persons, including those who could offer him a higher bid. The basis of rewards in eternity is righteousness.

2. Highest Ethical Bid?

Someone could argue that the principle of "highest bid wins" still operates in God's courtroom of final judgment, in the sense that righteousness should be the true "coin of the realm," and therefore those who pay the most, ethically speaking, will receive the highest rewards (I Cor. 3:13–15). But there is a fundamental difference in the operating principles of the competitive market for goods and the closed monopoly of God's final judgment. The free market for goods operates in terms of objective prices, irrespective of one's relative capacity to pay. In contrast, God's monopoly of final judgment operates in terms of one's objective performance relative to one's gifts. The story of the widow's two mites informs us of this latter principle. Those rich people who gave much into the treasury did not give nearly so much as the poor widow who cast in two small coins, for this was all she possessed. Jesus said, "For all they did cast in of their abundance; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living" (Mark 12:44).⁴⁹ God, unlike man, can search each heart. He knows what we possess and what it has cost us to give up something.

The principles that govern God's final judgment are predictable. They are revealed to everyone in the Bible. The principle of "highest ethical bid wins" does govern God's court: the perfect life of Jesus Christ, and His full payment on the cross. God's wrath is placated alone by this voluntary act of covenantal mercy on the part of Jesus Christ. Those who place themselves under Christ's jurisdiction thereby escape the perfect wrath of God. They then receive rewards in terms of their ethical performance, but only because they have first built on the foundation that Jesus Christ laid at Calvary (I Cor. 3:9–11).⁵⁰ These rewards are granted on the basis of (1) gifts originally given to him by God and (2) the individual's lifetime ethical performance in terms of these gifts. The high bids are relative, not absolute. They are bids in terms of ethical performance, not financial performance.

49. Gary North, Trust and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Mark and John (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 19.

50. Gary North, Judgment and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 3.

A human court cannot search the heart in this way. The judges do not know what is in people's hearts; at best they can estimate. Human courts must render judgment in terms of public evidence regarding people's objective external acts; judges and juries can only indirectly search for a person's motives, for they must rely on objective, corroborated public testimony in the collection of facts. They cannot know what "ethical assets" any person possesses. Thus, a human court must judge human guilt or innocence in terms of people's objective conformity to God's revealed law. Whatever subjective motivations may have existed in the mind of someone who has committed a trespass, these motivations must be ascertainable through public evidence.

3. Financing Human Courts

This leads to definite conclusions concerning the financing of human courts. The principle of the "widow's mite" cannot be invoked to justify any particular financing system for a court. The "widow's mite" principle of sacrificial giving can be legitimately invoked only by God in rendering His judgments, in time and eternity, for He alone can search men's hearts. The Bible informs us of the principle of financing for the local church: the tithe. Samuel informed the Hebrews that the future king would also invoke the requirement of the tithe (I Sam. 8:15, 17). It was the level of civil taxation that Samuel warned against—a level equal to God's tithe—rather than the principle of equal proportional taxation.⁵¹

Human courts should not be financed by requiring all people to pay the same fixed money price, for this would allow rich people to escape their obligations too lightly.⁵² It would also either destroy the finances of the poor or strangle the courts. The principle of the tithe must

51. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

52. The so-called "head tax" of Exodus 30:11–16 was not a civil tax at all, contrary to Rushdoony. It was an atonement payment that was required before the Hebrews marched to war. See Chapter 58. See also James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), Appendix D. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>). Rushdoony's comments are found in Institutes of Biblical Law, pp. 281–82, 492, 510, 719.

govern the two monopolistic human courts, church and state; each person under the jurisdiction of the monopolistic government pays the same percentage of the net increase of his income. This way, the poor person knows that the system is fair. He will receive justice because he has paid as much—a known percentage of his net income—as the rich man. He is therefore entitled to the same impartial justice.

On the other hand, the graduated income tax—making rich people pay a larger percentage of their income than other pay—is as corrupt as the so-called “head tax” system. Coupled with democratic voting privileges, the graduated income tax transfers legal control over one group’s wealth into the hands of another. Karl Marx believed that when a graduated income tax is imposed on a nation, in principle it has taken one of the ten steps toward communism.⁵³ The almost universal acceptance in the twentieth century of the legitimacy of the “progressive” income tax was indicative of just how far the modern world had drifted (or run) from the Bible. Even economists who defend the free market have frequently accepted its legitimacy.⁵⁴ That Christian social thinkers should promote the graduated income tax in the name of Jesus is almost beyond belief; that one of them should call for a “graduated tithe”—a graduated ten percent?—indicates the extent of the moral and intellectual confusion of our day.⁵⁵

Civil courts should be financed through tax revenues raised by equal proportional giving by the rich, the middle class, and the poor, either by a sales tax or an income tax.⁵⁶ The principle of proportionality must govern civil governments, for they are closed monopolies, not open competitive markets. The predictability of the courts’ enforcement of God’s law is the foundation of justice, both civil and ecclesiastical. It is also the foundation of social peace. Taking a bribe corrupts a Bible-based judicial system, for it introduces uncertainty and judicial self-interest into the court. The poor person never knows if he can trust the court, because a rich man may pay a small percentage of his

53. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party (1848) in Marx and Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, [1969] 1977), III, p. 126.

54. Walter J. Blum and Harry Kalven, Jr., The Uneasy Case for Progressive Taxation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953).

55. Ronald J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger: A Biblical Study (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1977), pp. 175–78.

56. The sales tax is far more resistant to a call for graduated taxation, so I favor it. An example of a sensible tax is the tax on gasoline, assuming that all of the revenues generated by it go toward highway maintenance and safety.

assets to a judge—an absolute amount that is far beyond the capability of the poor person to match. A judge should no more take a bribe to pervert biblical justice than God would.

F. Highest Bid Wins: Mandatory for Markets

What I am arguing should be clear to everyone: different forms of sovereignty require different forms of financing. For example, to propose a financing system that is appropriate for the church or state as the proper way to run a competitive market system is to propose the destruction of the free market, as surely as the free market's financing principle would destroy the integrity of the church or state.

To examine how an institution can be destroyed by an inappropriate principle of financing, let us examine the operations of a competitive free market. Those potential buyers who bid the highest amount of money are thereby able to gain, through voluntary transfer, legal access to the sought-after goods, unless a seller for some reason prefers to forfeit money that is available to him in order to deliver the goods to someone making a lower bid. Such a below-market wealth transfer is a form of charity, not a profit-seeking business. While such decisions on the part of sellers are legal, they are not common. The highest bid usually wins. In any case, the highest bid inescapably forces the seller to consider the personal cost of not honoring the highest bid, i.e., forfeited income.

In a free market, auctions (the market process) are conducted in terms of public bids that are legally unconnected to considerations of the size of the bids in relation to the potential buyers' income level (the tithe principle) or net worth (the "widow's mite" principle). They must be separated, if increasing economic output and the competitive performance of producers are to be furthered.

1. Net-Worth Bidding

Consider the alternative. What if a society by civil law required all economic transactions to be conducted in terms of this principle: "the highest percentage of one's net worth offered in exchange will win the auction"—an economy based on the "widow's mite" principle? Bidders would not know who won the auction until a detailed study of each bidder's present net worth was conducted. Producers would be forced by law to sell expensive items and services to people who own almost nothing but who are willing to pay a very high percentage of their assets in order to buy something. Obviously, production would grind to a halt. People would begin to produce only for their own personal use—outside of the open market. They would be afraid to bring their goods and services to sell to “highest percentage” bidders. The division of labor would collapse. So would per capita productivity and income.

An example may help to illustrate this. An automobile salesman would be required by law to sell a car to the person who offered the highest percentage of his present assets. Instead of a price sticker on the car’s window that says so much money, it would list a percentage number. “This week only: 35% of your net worth!” What would be the quickest way to buy the car? Lower your net worth. Instead of competition in terms of the production of assets, we would see competition in terms of destruction of assets. The spendthrifts would inherit the earth.

A poor man who really wanted a car to drive (or park it with an empty gasoline tank in front of his home) might be willing to give up almost everything he owns to buy it. He would therefore willingly come close to making the automobile into an idol. But he would not be pressured by the market to increase his personal productivity in order to buy it. In such a social order, no strictly objective performance is required: exactly so much money in exchange for the car. Instead, the test would be the percentage of his bid in relation to his present assets. This would virtually destroy the predictability of market pricing. A person with greater net worth who wanted to buy the car, either for personal use or business use, would be outbid by the person willing to make the car into a near-idol. Unless the second man was also willing to make the car into his own near-idol, sacrificing nearly everything he owns to buy it, he would not be able to buy the car.

2. Future-Orientation

The competitive free market encourages people to plan for the future, to become productive. It pressures them to use their skills and capital to create value—value registered in terms of competitive bids by potential consumers. To become a consumer, you must first become a producer, unless you are being supported by your inheritance, or by charity, or by the privately wielded sword (criminals), or by the civil government’s sword (welfare recipients). The market steadily pressures participants to become productive because it is governed by the principle of “highest bid wins”—bids usually registered by money, but at least in goods or services (barter). The market also pressures people to become future-oriented. They have to earn money through personal productivity in order to make future purchases.

If the principle of “highest money bid wins” is abandoned, then the economic system becomes intensely present-oriented. People would look only to their present assets as the basis of their ability to buy what they want. They would be able to buy things by becoming poorer. If they can reduce their net worth sufficiently, and can squeeze their living standards down to the near-starvation level, they can buy their one dream item for practically no money, just as long as the purchase price absorbs a very high percentage of their assets. They sacrifice nearly everything they own, once, in order to make that one dream purchase. Attaining their dream impoverishes them. If this is not a form of implicit idol-worship, what is? The principle of the “widow’s mite,” which is appropriate for sacrificial giving, becomes a means of personal and cultural idolatry when it becomes sacrificial buying.

Another very efficient and pleasant way to reduce your net worth is to go deeply into debt for consumer goods and services that depreciate faster than the obligation is reduced. This, too, is counter-productive. It is a decision based on a deeply entrenched present-orientation.

3. The Sellers’ Dilemma

We have been speaking of buyers (sellers of money). What about sellers (sellers of goods)? Consider the car salesman. He sells cars, but he also buys cars. How would he be able to order a replacement car for every car sold? Only by offering the highest percentage of his dealership’s assets. Small, struggling, very high-risk dealerships that order a very small number of cars could get delivery precisely because they have so few cars in inventory, i.e., so little net worth. Obviously, the number of automobile orders would drop as small, struggling dealers became the legally competitive bidders. Fewer orders would lower the factories’ efficiency by increasing the cost-per-unit-produced, thereby reducing output. Reducing output is not the way to national prosperity.

Meanwhile, in the international competition for scarce resources, everyone outside the nation would be operating in terms of highest money bid wins. If you were a resource owner in another nation, to whom would you sell your assets? To residents of a nation governed by highest money bid wins or residents of a nation governed by highest percentage of assets bid wins? Probably you would sell it to whichever bidder brought in the highest price. So, any nation operating in terms of “highest percentage of assets presently owned” would remove itself from the world’s market. Thus cut off, it would grow steadily poorer. It would be a nation characterized by falling production and the consumption of present assets. It would be a capital-consuming society.

4. Privacy

There is another factor to consider. Every transaction would require the seller to examine the assets of every potential buyer. The buyer (seller of money) would have to bring with him a government-authorized statement of exactly what he owned at that moment. It would be like paying your income tax every time you went to the market. It would be worse; it would be like going through an audit by the civil tax collector or ecclesiastical tithe collector every time you went to the market. No shred of financial privacy would remain in the society. It would also lead to the creation of counterfeit asset evaluations, for these would serve as the new currency of the realm. You can see where the principle of “highest percentage of owned assets offered in exchange” would lead to: reduced national competitiveness, reduced savings, falling income, petty tyranny, and massive cheating. In short, it would lead to bankruptcy and national extinction.

What I have described is a topsy-turvy economic world. It makes no sense. It sounds like a scene out of Alice in Wonderland. So, why dwell on the obvious? Because not all people acknowledge the obvious. They seek to operate one sphere of human existence in terms of financing principles appropriate for another sphere. Today we have far too many self-professed Christian social theorists who recommend taxing and financing policies that would drastically hamper or even destroy the free market. It is necessary to demonstrate clearly that the free market operates under a different set of financing principles from those governing a God-ordained monopoly government. The voluntarily accepted principle of “highest money bid wins” governs the free market. The principle of the God-required tithe governs the church. The principle of the coercive fixed percentage of net income (income tax) should govern the civil government, or else a fixed percentage of market purchase price (sales tax or use tax). In short, a monopolistic court is not an open competitive market. Both church and state are monopolistic courts.

Conclusion

Noonan's book on bribery is built around a single theme: that a bribe is a form of reciprocity. Why is it, his book asks, that reciprocity is basic to human life, yet in the case of bribery, it is condemned? His book provides no real answer. The biblical answer is primarily theocentric: God's dual character as Judge and also as Creator-Redeemer. Secondly, it rests on the difference between a monopolistic court and an open market. The court does not operate in terms of economic reciprocity; the market does. The court enforces the law of the God who declares that which is criminal and who specifies appropriate penalties. The reciprocity associated with a court is found in its imposition of a restitution program. The criminal repays his victim. The principle of reciprocity is enforced by the court on those who stand before it, righting wrongs and restoring order. There is no reciprocal economic relationship between the court and those being judged.

Men are wicked if they take bribes to pervert righteous judgment. God's laws are supposed to be every judge's standard. He is not to respect persons. He is not to favor one or the other. The court is to imitate God as the cosmic Judge: "Wherefore now let the fear of the LORD be upon you; take heed and do it: for there is no iniquity with the LORD our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts" (II Chron. 19:7). Yet we are told that God does take gifts: "And many brought gifts unto the LORD to Jerusalem" (II Chron. 32:23a). God never takes a gift or bribe in His capacity as Judge: "For the LORD your God is God of gods, and LORD of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward" (Deut. 10:17).

Noonan wrote, "As a believer in religion, I have asked how prayer and sacrifice to God are different from bribes."⁵⁷ What is the difference? It is the difference between worship and judgment. We do not lawfully ask God to pervert judgment when we pray or bring sacrifices to him. We honor Him as Creator and Redeemer, not as Judge. Civil judges are not to receive gifts because they are neither to be worshipped nor asked to pervert judgment; they serve as representatives of God's justice, not God's character as Creator and Redeemer.

The evil of taking gifts is the evil of threatening unrighteous judgment through respect of persons. Taking a bribe is synonymous with perverting judgment; it is prohibited in the affairs of civil or ecclesiastical judgment. It is not wrong for pastors to receive gifts to the church in the name of God, but to the extent that these gifts are received in order to pervert justice, they are regarded by God as bribes. Thus, church rulers have a more difficult task in identifying bribery than civil judges do. The civil magistrate does not represent God in His capacity as Creator and Redeemer, but only in His capacity as Judge. He is unlikely ever to be given a gift, except in his capacity as judge. This is not true of the church officer, who receives gifts in the name of the church.

57. Noonan, Bribes, p. xvi.

The Bible does not teach that bribe-offering is always wrong. If given by a righteous person who seeks righteous judgment from an unrighteous judge, it is valid. If given by someone to pervert God's law, it is evil. The quest for a neutral definition of bribery which equates both practices is a biblically illegitimate quest.

SABBATICAL LIBERTY

Also thou shalt not oppress a stranger: for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt. And six years thou shalt sow thy land, and shalt gather in the fruits thereof: But the seventh year thou shalt let it rest and lie still; that the poor of thy people may eat: and what they leave the beasts of the field shall eat. In like manner thou shalt deal with thy vineyard, and with thy oliveyard. Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest: that thine ox and thine ass may rest, and the son of thy handmaid, and the stranger, may be refreshed (Ex. 23:9–12).

The theocentric framework of this passage is the prohibition of oppression of the people or the land itself. Like the people, the land deserved its rest. So did the animals. This has to do with sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model. God is Deliverer or Liberator. James Jordan has argued that the theme of the Book of Exodus is God's deliverance of His people from bondage to sabbath rest. "The instructions for the design of the Tabernacle culminate in sabbath rules (31:12–17), and the procedure for building the Tabernacle commences with sabbath rules (35:1–3). The book closes with the definitive establishment of Old Covenant worship on the very first day of the new year. Thus, the book moves from the rigors of bondage to the sinful world order, to the glorious privilege of rest in the very throne room of God."¹ I argue that the placement of the Book of Exodus as the second book of the Pentateuch indicates that its central theme is that of the second point of the biblical covenant, hierarchy.

A. Sabbath Rest

The theme of sabbath rest is one that should have been easily understood by the Hebrews. The rigors of endless toil under Pharaoh's taskmasters had caused them to cry out to God, the true Monarch, and He heard their cries (Ex. 3:7–9). He responded by sending Moses and Aaron with a request to Pharaoh: to allow His people to go three days' journey, to sacrifice to God, and then return—a seven-day round trip, a sabbath week of service to God rather than to Pharaoh (Ex. 5:3), although a week with the day of sacrifice taking place midweek. This was unacceptable to Pharaoh, who piled extra work on them as a punishment by forcing them to produce bricks without straw (Ex. 5:6–19). Thus, they saw the contrast: labor with sabbath rest periods under God versus endless toil under Pharaoh. They could have a feast with God on a day of rest (Ex. 5:1), or else they could remain in a strange land as slaves.

1. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 75. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

Initially, they chose slavery in a strange land, for their hierarchical representatives, the officers of Israel, complained against Moses and Aaron for having stirred up trouble (Ex. 5:19–21). They did not want to bear the responsibility of challenging a state that had attempted to slay their children and that had brought them into slavery to a self-proclaimed divine monarch. They preferred the familiar trials of slavery to what seemed to them to be a high-risk encounter with Pharaoh, not to mention the Red Sea, the wilderness, and the Canaanites.

Nevertheless, the prospect of rest from their labors had to be a tempting one. God offered them a sabbatical week of respite from their lives of unrelieved toil. This sabbatical week was in fact symbolic of their deliverance. Pharaoh fully understood this, which is why he refused to permit it. To grant them a week outside of his jurisdiction meant that in principle he would be acknowledging the sovereignty over him of the God of the Hebrews. This is what he dared not allow, given the theology of theocratic Egypt.² Granting sabbath rest for the Hebrews would have involved acknowledging symbolically his own covenantal subordination to God. The issue of sabbath rest is in fact an issue regarding God's sovereignty, meaning covenantal subordination.³

2. Chapter 10.

3. I have elsewhere argued that the New Testament places the locus of enforcement regarding the sabbath with the individual conscience (Rom. 14:5–6; Col. 2:16). See Chapter 24. To head off arguments that I am now denying my former arguments by making sabbath observance an issue of covenantal subordination, I need to point out that there are five biblical covenants: dominion, personal, familial, civil, and ecclesiastical. The New Testament's covenantal subordination is directly personal under God, meaning that sabbath enforcement is no longer a judicial responsibility of family

B. The Heart of a Stranger

The Hebrews are told not to oppress a stranger because they “know the heart of a stranger.” How can they know this? Because they, too, had been strangers in the land of Egypt. This raises a crucially important issue in philosophy, the issue of epistemology: “What can men know, and how can they know it?”

The question here is the question of empathy. It tells us that because we can look within ourselves, we can make judgments regarding the feelings of others. What they feel is sufficiently close to what we feel to enable us to make ethical judgments. This ability undergirds the so-called golden rule: “Do unto others as you would have others do unto you.” This phrase is one of those famous phrases attributed to Jesus that He never quite said. What He said was this: “Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets” (Matt. 7:12).⁴ It is closely related to Paul’s words: “For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself” (Gal. 5:14). This is the requirement of Leviticus 19:18, which Jesus cited in Matthew 22:39–40: love your neighbor as yourself.

The humanist has a problem with this moral injunction. The problem was best stated in George Bernard Shaw’s play, Man and Superman (1903): “Do not do unto others as you would they should do unto you. Their tastes may not be the same.” There is an implicit lawlessness in this, as he says forthrightly in the same play: “The golden rule is that there are no golden rules.” If each man is autonomous, and therefore utterly unconnected with other men by feelings and interpretations, then life is anarchy. But on the basis of the logic of autonomous man, there is no sure reason to believe that there are such connections. It may be convenient to believe that there are, if only to make sense of reality, but there is no way to prove that empathy serves as a means of unifying mankind.

But there is a link, the Bible tells us: the image of God in man. Man is made in God’s image, and he is therefore responsible to God covenantally (Gen. 1:26–27). There are common emotional and ethical bonds in all men. These bonds can be actively suppressed, in the same way that the knowledge of God is actively suppressed by sinful men (when dealing with legal adults), church, or state. A person should not be disinherited, excommunicated, or executed because of his or her failure to observe the sabbath.

4. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 12.

(Rom. 1:18–22).⁵ Nevertheless, these bonds serve as the basis of social cooperation, which in turn requires people to make ethical judgments.

The Israelites were reminded that they had been strangers in Egypt. They should therefore not imitate their tyrannical captors by imposing unrighteous judgments on those who are under their God-given authority. If they should do so, then God will remove this authority from them and punish them in the same way. To escape God's temporal covenantal judgments, men must obey God's law. They must subordinate themselves to this law in order lawfully to execute righteous judgment on those beneath them. As they do unto others, so will God do to them.

Then what about differing tastes? What about using our feelings as guides for dealing with others? If tastes are ethically random, or even ethically neutral, how can we rely on introspection as a guide to external behavior? The biblical response is clear: tastes are neither random nor ethically neutral. Tastes are inherent in men as God's creatures, although this testimony can be suppressed and twisted to covenant-breaking purposes. Because of sin, tastes must be governed by the standards of God's law. The Hebrews were supposed to remind themselves of what it meant to be an oppressed slave in a foreign land. They were required to eat bitter herbs each year at Passover (Ex. 12:8). Tastes are not random; bitter herbs for one person will taste bitter for others. The memory of the bitterness of slavery would be preserved by the bitter taste in people's mouths each year at the Passover feast.

The memory of their ancestors' years in Egypt was important for the life of the nation. This memory was to stay with them through the history taught to them as children at the Passover feast (Ex. 12:26–27), in the readings from the Torah, and from their instruction in the law. Covenant ethics and covenant history could not lawfully be separated in Israel. Because they shared a common covenant history, they were under covenant law. God had told them centuries before when they were slaves in Egypt not to forget to remind their heirs of this experience.

How could later generations remember? In what way had they been slaves in Egypt? How could God expect later generations to remember what had never in history happened to them personally? Because life is covenantal. In the same sense that all men have rebelled in Eden's garden, so were the Hebrews to regard themselves as having served a term as slaves. That sense is covenantal—personal, hierarchical, ethical, judgmental, and historical. God reminded the generation of the exodus that they had been slaves, and that they, meaning their heirs, would return to slavery in a foreign land again if they disobeyed Him (Deut. 28:64–65). Their heirs were required to remember this, too, long after that first generation had died in the wilderness.

5. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 2.

The stranger in the land wants rest from his labors. He needs hope that at the end of his work, there will be rest. This is the equivalent of saying that at the end of his period of bondage, there will be liberty. This is the message of the Book of Exodus: liberty comes through God's covenant blessings to those who serve God and other men faithfully through dedicated labor. It was the denial of hope in future rest or future liberty that marked Pharaoh's Egypt. It marks every bureaucratic civilization.

C. Sabbath and Providence

The sabbath is an aspect of God's grace to man and the creation. It is the promise of rest and eventual liberty from bondage, primarily the bondage of sin. The Bible is clear: what man hopes to be his external reward from God he must therefore offer to all those under his authority. This includes not just people, but also animals and the land itself. The principle of interpretation goes from the least likely to the more likely. If man is to give even the land rest, then he is surely to give rest to the animals of the land. If he is to give animals rest, then he must surely be required to give strangers rest. If he is to give strangers rest, then surely he must give his servants rest. And if he is to give his servants rest, then he must surely give himself rest.

But how can he afford to give himself rest? Who is to guard the garden while he is resting? Who is to care for the needs of his family, his servants, strangers in the land, animals, and the land itself? Without man as the guardian and administrator, how will civilized life go on? The answer, of course, is theocentric: the sovereignty of God. It is God who gives man rest, for it is God who providentially sustains man's environment and man himself. If God refuses to give man rest, then rest becomes too expensive for man, too dangerous. Accepting rest from God requires a visible commitment to the covenant, faith that things will work out for the best for those who are obedient to God (Rom. 8:28).⁶ Only this faith in God and His covenant blessings can relieve man of the worry that without his own efforts, all will be lost.

6. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 6.

The sabbatical week is designed to persuade covenant man that he can trust God for one day per week. It breaks man of his spirit of self-centeredness. By resting from his labors on the sabbath, man learns to rest his mind and soul as well. He sees, week by week, that life goes on, that the system holds, even though he has not worked for one day in seven. This self-discipline is designed to increase his faith in the sustaining providence of God.

1. From Miracles to Weekly Thrift

For that first generation, the miracle of the daily manna was supposed to persuade them of God's providence. So was the fact that any manna collected beyond a day's use would rot (Ex. 16:20). They were taught to rely on God before they were taught to save for the future. The suspension of the law of rotting manna for the double portion they collected on the morning before the sabbath served as a double witness to God's providence: they had to gather a double portion to sustain them on the sabbath, when the manna would cease (Ex. 16:5). This taught them short-term thrift. But it was thrift within the context of daily miracles. On the day that the miracle of new manna ceased, the miracle of non-rotting manna replaced it.

Once they crossed over the Jordan River, the miracle of the daily manna ceased (Josh. 5:12). They had to transfer their faith in the miracle of the manna to the less visibly miraculous six-one weekly pattern. They would have to get their work done in six days, just as they had been required to collect a double portion of manna on the sixth day. Now, however, they could structure their workweek more rationally. There would be no equivalent of the rotting second portion of manna. They could accumulate the excess production of each day in order to survive the seventh day of rest without a crisis. They learned the principle of thrift by accumulating goods for the future through abstaining from maximum present consumption. They worked a little harder in the present in order to enjoy a period of rest in the future. This future-orientation would have been limited to six days at a time, had it not been for the law of the sabbatical year.

Long-term thrift was forced on them whenever they obeyed this law governing agriculture (Ex. 23:9–12). What they had learned in the wilderness through the miracle of the manna, they were to apply to their daily labors in the land. What they learned in their weekly efforts to save for the future, they were to apply to the God-imposed sabbatical year cycle. One year in seven they were to allow the land to rest.

If the land was entitled to rest, then how much more the animals. If the animals were entitled to rest, how much more strangers within the land, and so on, right up the hierarchical chain of command to the master of the household himself. Everyone could look forward to rest, if each did his labor diligently, and if each saved a portion of his output for that future day.

2. The Psychology of Growth

Each person is supposed to be self-disciplined. As he matures in his Christian faith, he is supposed to operate faithfully under God without prodding from a superior. The sluggard is supposed to abandon his slothful ways.

Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise: Which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, Provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest. How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? When wilt thou arise out of thy sleep? Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: So shall thy poverty come as one that travaileth, and thy want as an armed man (Prov. 6:6–11).⁷

The Hebrews were warned a generation before they entered the land what would be required of them. They would have to rest one day in seven, and rest the land one year in seven. They would have to save enough goods daily to get them through the day of rest, and they would have to save enough goods yearly to get them through the year of rest. The required self-discipline of future-orientation and thrift, coupled with the legal requirement to honor the sabbath, helped to create a particular attitude that leads to increased per capita output and lower interest rates.⁸

Reduced interest rates lead to greater output, for people are more willing to forego present consumption in favor of increased future consumption. This greater output could then be used to lend money

7. Gary North, Wisdom and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Proverbs, (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2007] 2012), ch. 12.

8. Because the rate of interest is a reflection, in part, of individuals' time-preference or future-orientation, with high interest rates stemming from intense present-orientation, the requirement of the sabbatical year fostered greater future-orientation and therefore lower rates of interest.

or goods to non-Israelites, thereby gaining authority over them. This ability to lend is a sign of God's blessings:

The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them (Deut. 28:12–13).

If a nation filled with future-oriented people who are willing to lend money at 5% per annum encounters a more present-oriented society filled with people who are willing to pay 10% to finance their consumption or production, the people living in the first society can easily become the lenders to people living in the second. It is necessary for the lenders to monitor the ability and willingness of the borrowers to pay back the loans, of course. For a safe commercial transaction to take place, the differential between the respective interest rates must not be the product of a high risk premium—fear of outright default—or the product of a price inflation premium: fear of disguised default through loss of purchasing power.

The extension of dominion by lending at interest is legitimate for both lender and borrower. There are always risks associated with dominion, however. Lending to present-oriented consumers may later become a curse for the lender: he trusts in his riches but forgets that he is becoming dependent on present-oriented debtors. But it may also be that the foreign debtors are not consumers, but merely intelligent producers in the other country. In this case, the lender helps future-oriented foreign producers to become more productive by supplying them with capital more cheaply than they can borrow it at home. Dominion is by covenant. Lending to the foreigner at interest brings him indirectly under the sanctions of God, but these sanctions can be either blessing or cursing.⁹ So, it is always a question of intent

9. The possibility of blessing eludes utopian author S. C. Mooney, who refused to comment on Deuteronomy 28:12–13, since it clearly says that it is legitimate to make loans at interest. He insisted that “Usury enslaves. The brethren are not to be enslaved.” S. C. Mooney, Usury: Destroyer of Nations (Warsaw, Ohio: Theopolis, 1988), p. 98. (<http://bit.ly/MooneyUsury>). On the contrary, usury does not always enslave. Becoming a debtor for productive reasons—to go to college, for example, which Mr. Mooney never did—or to start a business, can be liberating. It depends on what the borrower intends to do with the money. Like fire, debt is risky. The older you get, the less you should rely on it. But young men and citizens in pagan nations that are trying on the part of both lender and borrower. What is the goal of the lender, passive escapism or active expansion of his capital? To what purposes will the borrowed money be put, productive or unproductive? The raw numbers do not tell us these things.

D. Gleaning and Liberation

1. Morally Obligatory Charity

“But the seventh year thou shalt let it rest and lie still; that the poor of thy people may eat: and what they leave the beasts of the field shall eat.” This verse makes it clear that the poor were allowed to enter the field and glean whatever grain has come up of its own accord. The same rule applied to the vineyards. This was an extension of the rule prohibiting the owner of the land to reap every nook and cranny of his fields. He had to allow poor people to enter his fields and glean the corners – the areas more difficult to harvest (Lev. 19:9–10). The Bible specifically identifies the poor who were to be invited in: the stranger, the orphan, and the widow (Deut. 24:21). Why was the landowner told to do this? Predictably, it was because of Israel’s years in Egypt: “And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt: therefore I command thee to do this thing” (Deut. 24:22).¹⁰

Was this a form of government-required public welfare? No. There are no negative sanctions mentioned, and it is difficult to imagine how anyone who felt abused could have sued for damages. Where there are no civil sanctions, there can be no crime. None is listed, and it is difficult to imagine the basis by which appropriate sanctions could be devised by the civil judges. Lex talionis? Would he be kept from gleaning for a year? By double restitution? Double what? How much could the potential gleaner have gleaned from the field? How many local potential gleaners could sue? All of them? Does each of them have a lawful claim against the landowner, no matter how small his fields?

God instructed farm owners to allow poor people to glean. The land was His (Lev. 25:23); the whole earth is His (Ex. 19:5; Ps. 24:1¹¹).

to advance themselves economically can legitimately go into debt for productive purposes. Debt is no more of a curse than personal apprenticeship with a master is—a form of personal and professional discipline that Mr. Mooney would have been wise to consider before he wrote his book.

10. The gleaning law was annulled by Jesus’ fulfillment of the Jubilee land laws.

11. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms

As the permanent owner, God could tell his stewards how to administer His property. But God was the disciplining agent. He acted as Kinsman-Redeemer or as Blood Avenger, depending on the obedience or disobedience of the landowner. This law is in the form of a positive injunction, and biblical civil law is negative in scope: forbidding public evil.

This form of morally compulsory charity on the owner's part involved hard work on the part of the recipients. They were be allowed to glean the corners and difficult places only after the "easy pickings" have been gleaned by the hired harvesters. They were invited into the open fields only in the sabbatical year in which there had been no previous season's planting. They had to earn every bit of the produce they collected. This was not a chosen profession for sluggards. But for those who were willing to work, they would not perish at the hands of men who systematically used their competitive advantage to create a permanent class of the poor.

There was another great advantage to this form of morally enforced charity: it brought hard-working, efficient poor people to the attention of potential employers. There is always a market for hard-working, efficient, diligent workers. Such abilities are the product of a righteous worldview and a healthy body, both of which are gifts of God. It always pays employers to locate such people and hire them. In effect, the employers can "glean" future workers. Gleaning appears initially to have been a high-risk system of recruiting, for it required landowners to forfeit the corners of their fields and one year's productivity in seven. Nevertheless, God promised to bless those who obeyed Him. It really was not a high-risk system. Israel's gleaning system made the charity local, work-oriented, and a source of profitable information regarding potential employees. Thus, the system offered hope to those trapped in poverty. They could escape this burden through demonstrated productivity. This was how Ruth, a stranger in the land, began her escape: she caught the attention of Boaz (Ruth 2:5).

2. We Are All Gleaners

Because each person is in bondage to sin, God has made gleaners of everyone. He cursed the ground, making it bring forth thorns and thistles. This in effect has placed us all in the position of people who are not entitled to the best of the field. God removed the "easy pickings” from mankind as a result of mankind’s rebellion. But at least he did not destroy the field (the world). He promises not to interfere directly with it until the final judgment (Matt. 13:29–30, 49).¹² We must work harder than before the curse, but God graciously grants us access to the field. Those who are content with second-best are given an opportunity to escape their economic bondage through faith in the great Gleaner, Jesus Christ, who served God faithfully unto death, buying our way out of spiritual bondage. God observes us, to see who is efficient and who is a sluggard. He uses history as a giant gleaning operation for recruiting servants for eternity. Those who do not demonstrate faithfulness under adversity are not given access to the fields of the post-judgment world, but instead are cast out into the fire.

In a very real sense, biblical evangelism prior to the great millennial outpouring of the Holy Spirit is a form of gleaning. We seem to reap small harvests. We get the spiritual leftovers, after the local tyrants, the humanist school system, the cults, and the drug dealers have passed through the field and have picked off “the best and the brightest.” Successes on the missions field are minor. The biological reproduction of God’s enemies is now becoming exponential. We have few reliable models to imitate. Evangelism seems futile. But to be a gleaner always tempts us to accept second-best as a way of life. The gleaner may not recognize or appreciate his God-given opportunity. He may not see that he is being called into the Master’s field in order to demonstrate his competence in the face of adversity. He may view his plight as something undeserved, not recognizing that after Adam, all that any man deserves is death and eternal wrath. He does not recognize the stripped field as a garden of opportunity. He imagines that all he can hope for is a sack of leftover grain. His time horizon is too short. His future-orientation suffers from a lack of vision, and also a lack of faith in God’s grace. He forgets how few and far between faithful workers are, and how the opportunity to glean the leftover harvest is a God-given way to demonstrate his character as a man with a future precisely because he has confidence in the future.

3. Eschatologies of the Stripped Field

Because the church has seen so few examples of successful evangelism, and because even the successful examples seem to fall back into paganism within a few centuries, Christians have come to adopt eschatologies that deny liberation for gleaners. They see themselves and their spiritual colleagues as people who are locked in a vicious “cycle of poverty,” to borrow the language of paganism’s modern welfare economics. They see no hope beyond the stripped field. Life only offers minimal opportunities for harvesting souls, they believe. “What we have today as gleaners is all that we or our heirs can expect in history.” They lose faith in the ability of the heavenly Observer to identify and hire good workers and to place them in new positions of responsibility. So, Christians have invented eschatologies that conform to their rejection of any vision of temporal liberation—eschatologies of the stripped field. Men with battered spirits preach that nothing Christians can do as spiritual gleaners will ever fill the sacks to overflowing. They see no covenantal cause-and-effect relationship between gleaning and liberation. They preach a new gospel of the kingdom—the kingdom of perpetual leftovers. They do not recognize that there is a valid historical function of gleaning: the public identification of those bondservants who actively seek liberation and who pursue every legitimate avenue of escape.

12. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 29.

E. New Testament Applications

In Israel, the sabbatical year of release was national and simultaneous. It was a negative injunction, and therefore a civil law, for it forbade something that was a positive evil: working the land without a break. We know what an appropriate penalty might have been: double restitution of that year’s harvest, with the produce going to the priests as a payment to God. To pay that, the owner would probably have had to sell himself into slavery: a symbol of the transition from grace to wrath, a symbolic return to Egypt.

Today, there is no common year of release, nationally or internationally. The reason for this lack of a common year of release is because the enforcement of the New Testament sabbath has been decentralized. God now assigns to individuals the responsibility of deciding how to observe the sabbath. This decentralization of the locus of enforcement has led to the abolition of a common sabbatical year in which all fields are required to lie fallow in the same year, and charitable debts are cancelled in that same year (Deut. 15:1–6).¹³

If this land-protecting aspect of the law was enforced by the state, as I believe it was, it rested on the legal status of the land as God's judicial agent, not on the state as an agency of wealth redistribution to the gleaners. This law is no longer in force in the New Testament era because the land ceased to be a covenantal agent after A.D. 70 (Lev. 18:24–29).¹⁴ This law was good for the land and all the creatures great and small that inhabited it. Owners were restrained in their use of God's land. The land, as God's judicial agent, deserved its rest. This law man

13. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 36.

This is not to become a matter of civil law. It is no longer the state's responsibility to enforce sabbath requirements. Owners can do what they please, but God watches closely. Those who own land that is leased to others can certainly require the lease-holders to abide by a fallow-rotation system, so that the land's productivity can be preserved.

This is similar to the injunction that all zero-interest charitable debts be cancelled every seventh year. The state is not to enforce such a requirement. Instead, the state should simply refuse to enforce any charitable debt contract beyond the seventh year. If creditors can collect what is owed to them by poor debtors without resorting to violence, that is their business, but the coercive authority of the state will not be used to enforce a contract that clearly violates the terms of the covenant. The state should no more enforce a morally mandatory charitable debt obligation beyond the seventh year than it should enforce any other kind of inherently immoral contract. There are limits to the legitimacy of voluntary contracts.

We should understand that the gleaning requirement from the beginning applied only to agricultural operations. It was not extended to the cities in the Old Testament, and it should not be extended beyond agriculture today. To the extent that the modern world has become urban, the year of release applies far more to society's debt structure than to its agriculture. Debt slavery is far more common today than agricultural slavery. Today, it is the farmer who has sold himself into bondage in his lust for more land and more comfortable tractors. He has collateralized the present value of his land, and he has prayed for the future value of his land's produce. The process of urbanization continues.

14. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 10.

Conclusion

The stranger in the land was to be the beneficiary of the civil laws of Israel. This was to serve as a testimony to the nations. It was not only those who were born in the land who could experience the external blessings of God.

The land was to be given its rest every seventh year. The gleaners and the animals were not restricted from the unsown fields. Whatever output of value that the land produced in these years became the lawful possession of the propertyless poor who worked to claim it. Landowners rested, while the poor labored.

The sabbath was instituted in order to teach men about the necessity of relying on God to sustain them. Honoring the sabbath revealed to men that God sustains those who obey Him, no matter how improbable that might seem. It also taught people habits of thrift, future-orientation, and diligence. People had to get their work done in six days, not seven; they had to store up necessities out of the excess output of the days of lawful labor. This enforced system of sabbath discipline was intended to reshape the slave mentality of covenant-breakers.

What God taught them first with the miracle of the manna, He later taught their heirs with the weekly sabbath, then the sabbatical year, and finally with the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25). Because the people of Judah did not honor the law of the sabbatical year, God threatened to drive them into captivity for seventy years, that the land might obtain its lawful rest (Jer. 50:34). They did not repent; Judah then fell to Babylon. "To fulfil the word of the LORD by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath, to fulfil threescore and ten years" (II Chron. 36:21).

God enforced His law when men refused to.

FEASTS AND CITIZENSHIP

Three times thou shalt keep a feast unto me in the year. Thou shalt keep the feast of unleavened bread: (thou shalt eat unleavened bread seven days, as I commanded thee, in the time appointed of the month Abib; for in it thou camest out from Egypt: and none shall appear before me empty:) And the feast of harvest, the firstfruits of thy labours, which thou hast sown in the field: and the feast of ingathering, which is in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field. Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord GOD. Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leavened bread; neither shall the fat of my sacrifice remain until the morning. The first of the firstfruits of thy land thou shalt bring into the house of the LORD thy God. Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk (Ex. 23:14–19).

God was the King who owned the Promised Land and who invited His people to join in corporate celebrations with Him. Those who harvested His crops were His judicial subordinates, and they publicly testified to this by their participation in His required feasts. They were to provide God with the firstfruits of the land. Those who refused to attend the required feasts of God are in open rebellion against Him, for they were declaring publicly that they are not under His jurisdiction and that they owed him no firstfruits.

A. God's Sharecroppers

A sharecropping farmer does not own his own land. He may not even own his own tools. The owner provides these capital assets to the worker, who then agrees to share a fixed percentage of the crop with the owner.

The owner gains several advantages through this legal arrangement. He does not have to supervise the workers on a day-to-day basis.¹ The owner can therefore concentrate his attention on more economically profitable tasks, such as marketing the crop. Second, the owner teaches his subordinate independence, which should increase the latter's total productivity. Third, the owner provides incentives for the worker to maximize his output. The lower the percentage demanded by the owner, the greater the economic incentive of the worker to maximize his output, since the latter keeps the lion's share of the product.

God requires a tithe. He also required the feasts of the Old Covenant era. This brought His workers before him on a regular basis. They had to sacrifice time, energy, and money to journey to Jerusalem and eat the required feasts. They had to bring the token firstfruits as a ritual testimony to their faith in God as the true owner of their land: "The first of the firstfruits of thy land thou shalt bring into the house of the LORD thy God" (Ex. 23:19a).

B. The Festivals and Civic Judgment

The feasts reminded them three times a year that the King of heaven requested their presence before Him. It reminded them who owned the land. Yet it was also an honor to attend. It also reminded them that the Creator and Sustainer of the universe protected them. He promised to protect the wives, children, and land during their absence. "Thrice in the year shall all your menchildren appear before the Lord GOD, the God of Israel. For I will cast out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders: neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the LORD thy God thrice in the year" (Ex. 34:23–24).

This passage appears at the end of a longer passage dealing with oppression. Men are warned not to raise a false report or render false judgment (Ex. 23:1–3).² They are warned to return a lost animal to its owner, as well as help an enemy's fallen beast of burden (Ex. 23:4–5).³ Men are again reminded not to render false judgment or testify falsely

1. This was the problem with the American South's slave system prior to its abolition in 1865 after the defeat of the South in the Civil War. On the economic rationality of sharecropping in the post-Civil War American South, see Roger L. Ransom and Richard Sutch, One Kind of Freedom: The economic consequences of emancipation (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1977).

2. Chapter 50.

3. Chapter 51.

(Ex. 23:6–7). They must not take bribes (Ex. 23:8).⁴ They must not oppress a stranger (Ex. 23:9).⁵ They must honor the sabbatical year and rest the land: no harvesting in the seventh year (Ex. 23:10–11).⁶ They must honor the weekly sabbath: no working (Ex. 23:12).⁷ They must not mention any other God (Ex. 23:13). Then they are given the requirement of attending the three annual feasts.

Why bring up the requirements associated with the feasts in a section of the law that deals with civil judgment and economic oppression? Does participation in the feasts have some connection to the rendering of civil judgment? It does. A circumcised male in Israel who failed to attend the required sacramental feasts lost his inheritance in the land and therefore also lost his citizenship. He lost his eligibility to become a civil magistrate in Israel. This chain of judicial events is not immediately apparent from the text in Exodus 23, which is why this chapter is a detailed exposition of implications based on other texts, especially New Testament texts regarding Israel's loss of the kingdom through covenantal rebellion.

C. An Open Invitation to Israel's Closed Feasts

There were three required annual feasts in ancient Israel. This law applied to the circumcised members of the congregation, i.e., the civil nation.⁸ The feasts were open to all those in Israel who were circumcised, including converts from foreign nations and household slaves. The model feast was the Passover:

And the LORD said unto Moses and Aaron, This is the ordinance of the passover: There shall no stranger eat thereof: But every man's servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof. A foreigner and an hired servant shall not eat thereof. In one house shall it be eaten; thou shalt not carry forth ought of the flesh abroad out of the house; neither shall ye break a bone thereof. All the congregation of Israel shall keep it. And when a

4. Chapter 52.

5. Chapter 53:B.

6. Chapter 53:C.

7. Chapter 53:C.

8. Rushdoony wrote: "Congregation has reference to the whole nation in its governmental function as God's covenant people. G. Ernest Wright defined it as 'the whole organized commonwealth as it assembled officially for various purposes, particularly worship.'" R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 85. Wright's statement appears in The Interpreter's Bible, II, p. 468.

stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the passover to the LORD, let all his males be circumcised, and then let him come near and keep it; and he shall be as one that is born in the land: for no uncircumcised person shall eat thereof. One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you (Ex. 12:43–49).

The Passover was originally a household feast that was actually celebrated in the home. This is why hired servants were not allowed to participate. They would have to return to their own households in order to celebrate the feast. They were hired by money, and therefore not under the protection of the hiring family's covenant. The covenant was established by physical birth and circumcision, not by an economic contract. A stranger who was circumcised could participate in Passover, but only if all those under his household jurisdiction were also circumcised. The mark of covenantal subordination had to be on the flesh of every male participant, and it had to be on all those males under his family jurisdiction. (Moses' failure to circumcise his son was what brought God against Moses just before he re-entered Egypt [Ex. 4:24–26].)⁹

1. Sacrificial Offerings

After the Israelites arrived in the promised land, God made certain changes in the Passover ritual. Families were henceforth required to journey to a central location to celebrate the Passover: "Thou shalt therefore sacrifice the passover unto the LORD thy God, of the flock and the herd, in the place which the LORD shall choose to place his name there" (Deut. 16:2). The text makes it plain that the celebration was corporate, and it was not to be in a man's home town: "Thou mayest not sacrifice the passover within any of thy gates, which the LORD thy God giveth thee: But at the place which the LORD thy God shall choose to place his name in, there thou shalt sacrifice the passover at even, at the going down of the sun, at the season that thou camest forth out of Egypt" (Deut. 16:5–6). While the passage in Exodus 23 indicates that only the circumcised males were required to come to the various feasts, in fact the whole family was required to come to the place where the tabernacle was, and later on, where the temple was. The Exodus passage speaks representatively, but the parallel passage in

9. Gary North, "The Marriage Supper of the Lamb," Christianity and Civilization, 4 (1985), pp. 209–26. (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>)

Deuteronomy 16 is more specific:

Thou shalt observe the feast of tabernacles seven days, after that thou hast gathered in thy corn and thy wine: And thou shalt rejoice in thy feast, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy manservant, and thy maidservant, and the Levite, the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are within thy gates. Seven days shalt thou keep a solemn feast unto the LORD thy God in the place which the LORD shall choose: because the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thine increase, and in all the works of thine hands, therefore thou shalt surely rejoice. Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles: and they shall not appear before the LORD empty: Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the LORD thy God which he hath given thee (Deut. 16:13–17).

The men were to appear together at a corporate ritual at some point during each of these three feasts. They were to appear in their official covenantal capacity as judges of their households. Wives and children came to the city, but there must have been a separate ritual “before the Lord” at which only men were in attendance. It was there that the priests or Levites offered the families’ sacrifices, which were required offerings: “they shall not appear before the LORD empty.” In their capacity as household priests, the men were required to bring a sacrificial offering before God. Fathers no longer killed the sacrificial animals and ate them with their families in their own homes, as they had at the first Passover. The priests or priestly aides killed the animals for them representatively. Presumably each father took his portion of the sacrifice and returned to his family to eat it before the night was over: “neither shall the fat of my sacrifice remain until the morning.”

It was during the feast of tabernacles that a week-long total of 70 bulls was sacrificed for the 70 nations, plus one for Israel: $13 + 12 + 11 + 10 + 9 + 8 + 7 + 1 = 71$ (Num. 29:13–36). Israel sacrificed bulls representatively for the nations.¹⁰ Because these sacrifices were priestly and therefore mediatorial, only circumcised males could lawfully participate in the actual ritual. God is only represented by males in the sacrifices, which is the reason why women cannot lawfully be ordained to church offices (I Cor. 14:34–35).

10. James B. Jordan, The Sociology of the Church: Essays in Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1986), pp. 101–2. (<http://bit.ly/jjchurch>). This was what I would call a “common grace” sacrifice. It accomplished ritually what Jesus’s death on the cross fulfilled: a covering for the nations of the earth that allowed them to survive temporally.

2. Every Man a Priest

The Protestant doctrine of “every man a priest” was equally in force in Old Covenant Israel: “Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel” (Ex. 19:5–6). God’s covenant, ownership, kingdom, and priesthood: all are linked together here. The hierarchical subordination of each man under God—a subordination marked physically by circumcision—entitled any man to serve as the priest of his own household. This was why the stranger who wanted to participate in Passover had to have all the males in his household circumcised. “And when a stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the passover to the LORD, let all his males be circumcised, and then let him come near and keep it; and he shall be as one that is born in the land: for no uncircumcised person shall eat thereof” (Ex. 12:48). He had to be marked as a priestly representative of God within his own home. He had to be a member of a judicially marked covenantal hierarchy.

D. Israel as a Sanctuary

This family priestly office, hierarchical in structure, opened the door to another office, that of civil magistrate. To be a citizen in Israel, a man first had to be under the jurisdiction of a family covenant,¹¹ either by physical birth into his own family or by adoption (including a woman’s marriage)¹² into a Hebrew family.¹³ This family-based order of governmental authority and office helps to explain an otherwise difficult exegetical problem. Immediately following the passage in Deuteronomy that deals with the feast of the tabernacles we read: “Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes: and they shall judge the people with just judgment. Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous. That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee" (Deut. 16:18-20).

11. Just as a church officer must first serve as the head of his household (I Tim. 3:2, 4).

12. For example, Rahab and Ruth.

13. Adoptions into Hebrew households took place on a widespread basis during the first century of Israel’s stay in Egypt, which is why their population was growing so rapidly by Moses’s day. See Chapter 1.

Here we find once again that the laws of the festivals are closely associated with the laws of civil justice. The civil judge is warned not to accept a bribe. He shall not render false or perverted judgments. The context is a court of law. The promise is that those who render righteous judgments will live and inherit the land. All three are tied together: required attendance at the festivals, rendering honest civic judgment, and inheriting family-owned land.

1. Sanctuary: Equality Before the Law

Any man who was willing to subordinate himself to God by living in the land of Israel as a stranger was entitled to the benefits of the God's Bible-revealed civil law, including its protection. He had access to civil justice by his very presence in God's geographical sanctuary, the land of Israel.

This sanctuary was man's sanctuary. The land of Israel was every resident's boundary of judicial protection from the civil laws of false gods. The promise of equality before the civil law was the judicial sanctuary offered by God to all those who would voluntarily remain within the geographical boundaries of those nations that formally covenanted with Him. This sanctuary status of a biblically covenanted nation was therefore geographical rather than ritualistic.

Biblical law is quite clear: there is to be one civil law-order governing all people, because everyone is under the jurisdiction of God, who rules by covenant. God holds men and nations accountable for their obedience to His laws. Even though not all men are willing ritually to admit their subordination to God as creatures, all are to be governed by the requirements of the same civil law-order that God established as His representative model in Israel (Deut. 4:4–5).¹⁴ This is God's wis-

14. Some may deny that this was true in the era of the Old Covenant, although they must contend with Greg L. Bahnsen in this regard: Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), ch. 24. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>). But Christians cannot escape the judicial and civil implications of Matthew 21:43: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." When God transferred His kingdom to the church, an international covenantal institution, he brought all nations under the covenantal obligations of his law, including civil law. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Rela- dom for all mankind. Wisdom cannot legitimately be observed by autonomous man on a “take it or leave it basis”; covenantal religion is not smorgasbord religion, picking and choosing in terms of what sounds good to unregenerate minds. Wisdom must be obeyed. Wisdom is part of God’s national covenant: “Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people” (Deut. 4:6).¹⁵ Because pagan nations in the Old Covenant era did not acknowledge their judicial obligations in this regard, God created a geographical sanctuary in Israel for men to flee to when they decided to place themselves under the civil covenant of God.

tions (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

15. In their critique of theonomic postmillennialism, dispensationalists H. Wayne House and Thomas D. Ice argued that the Mosaic Law is not binding today and was never binding on the ancient pagan world, yet the Mosaic Law offers wisdom. “Wisdom differs from law in that law provides the legal stipulations which regulate the covenantal agreement and can be enforced by civil penalties. . . . On the other hand, wisdom is advice with no legal penalties.” House and Ice, Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse? (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah, 1988), p. 186. They argued for wisdom apart from any covenant law or covenant sanctions. Therefore, one has to conclude, outside the narrow geographical confines of ancient Israel, God’s Ten Commandments become the Ten Suggestions. The wisdom of Proverbs becomes a lot of wise sayings. But Solomon was a king whose fame spread because of his ability to impose wise sanctions. After the incident of the two prostitutes and the baby, we read: “And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged; and they feared the king; for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment” (1 Kings 3:28). They were saying that because of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, who suffered the ultimate sanctions, there are no further biblically required covenant sanctions in history (except execution for murder, a Noahic covenant sanction: p. 130) until His second coming. Autonomous man therefore gets to make up his own civil laws as he goes along. If you suspect that this view of civil law without specific biblical sanctions can easily become a license to sin, personally and nationally, and also a license to commit statist tyranny, you have correctly grasped their argument: no biblical sanctions—no biblical crimes. They wrote: “There is a big difference between law and wisdom, though often the net effect will be the same since the regenerate believer will want to apply the wisdom of God’s law” (p. 187). Why should the net effects ever be the same? There are no civil sanctions attached to their view of wisdom. When incentives are different, people’s responses will be different. By invoking an undefined wisdom devoid of civil sanctions, they are trying to avoid the appearance of social antinomianism. This is one last attempt to save dispensational ethics from the acids of antinomianism and ethical dualism—an attempt that clearly comes a century too late. On the morally and theologically devastating antinomianism of modern dispensationalism, see the book by dispensationalist theologian and pastor John MacArthur, The Gospel According to Jesus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1988).

2. Judicial Distinctions

The question then arises: What was the judicial distinction between an uncircumcised resident and a circumcised resident? One distinction was inheritance: rural land reverted back to the original owner's family in the 50th year (Lev. 25:13). But this law did not govern property within walled cities or towns (Lev. 25:31). Does this mean that in walled cities, there was no judicial distinction between Jew and gentile? There must have been some sort of distinction, or else the gentiles could have captured the cities of Israel, including Jerusalem, simply by moving into them, buying up the property, and taking over each city's civil government. The strangers within the gates could thereby have inherited the land.

It was in fact legally possible for strangers in the gates to buy up houses and buildings inside the gates, but this did not make them citizens. Nor would the post-exilic revised terms of land ownership that God instructed Ezekiel to announce to Israel make citizens of strangers in the land: "And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord GOD" (Ezek. 47:22–23).¹⁶ Citizenship in the biblical commonwealth of Israel was not by property ownership as such. Citizenship was by covenant. Citizenship was by circumcision and feast, by covenant mark and covenant renewal.

There was a judicial distinction between circumcised and uncircumcised residents. This distinction was explicitly not a difference in the God-required application of the civil law to different people (Ex. 12:49). This distinction must therefore be found elsewhere than in some supposed inequality before the law. There is to be no inequality before God's civil law.¹⁷ Thus, the difference had to have been in the very definition of citizenship, meaning the exercise of civil rulership. Citizenship was closely tied to one's participation in the three required annual feasts in Jerusalem. As was the case in the ancient world generally, if a man could not legally participate in the religious rites of the city, he could not become a citizen.¹⁸ What made Israel different was the widespread use of adoption, which mirrored God's gracious adoption of Israel (Ezek. 16:3-7). Paul connected God's adoption and God's covenant with Israel when he spoke of his kinsmen according to the flesh, "Who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises" (Rom. 9:4). Thus, unless a resident was a bastard, Moabite, an Ammonite, an Edomite, or an Egyptian (Deut. 23:2-8), he had to be granted immediate access to the feasts: "And if a stranger shall sojourn among you, and will keep the passover unto the LORD; according to the ordinance of the passover, and according to the manner thereof, so shall he do: ye shall have one ordinance, both for the stranger, and for him that was born in the land" (Num. 9:14).

16. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, 2012), ch. 22.

17. Chapter 14.

E. Feasts and Sanctions

The uncircumcised resident male and his household did not gain access to God's sanctuary, the temple. To gain this priestly access, he was required first to accept a visible mark in his flesh, as were all the males under his family jurisdiction. He had to accept God's "brand" on him, God's sign of adoption. God owns all men, and circumcision was a man's acknowledgment of God's lawful claim on him. A man carried this servile mark in his flesh, and he was reminded daily of his judicial condition as a servant to God. For as long as he lived, he bore this mark of judicial subordination.

1. Subordination and Festivals

A circumcised man declared ritually and physically that he was under God's judicial authority; only then was he given access to the three annual feasts. These feasts were held in a central location. Attendance was mandatory for all circumcised men who were residents of the land.¹⁹ A resident male who refused to attend the feasts of the King of heaven came under the king's condemnation. One did not lawfully turn down the King's invitation. This was the message of Jesus' parable of the king's feast.

18. Numa Denis Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City: A Study on the Religion, Laws, and Institutions of Greece and Rome (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1864] 1955), Bk. III.

19. Men could go on journeys and escape this obligation. Passover could be celebrated late by those who had been on long journeys (Num. 9:10-11).

The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his son, And sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the wedding: and they would not come. Again, he sent forth other servants, saying, Tell them which are bidden, Behold, I have prepared my dinner: my oxen and my fatlings are killed, and all things are ready: come unto the marriage. But they made light of it, and went their ways, one to his farm, another to his merchandise: And the remnant took his servants, and entreated them spitefully, and slew them. But when the king heard thereof, he was wroth: and he sent forth his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and burned up their city. Then saith he to his servants, The wedding is ready, but they which were bidden were not worthy. Go ye therefore into the highways, and as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage. So those servants went out into the highways, and gathered together all as many as they found, both bad and good: and the wedding was furnished with guests. And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding garment: And he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither not having a wedding garment? And he was speechless. Then said the king to the servants, Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. For many are called, but few are chosen (Matt 22:2–14).

There is no doubt that Jesus was referring here to Israel. The Pharisees understood His accusation. “Then went the Pharisees, and took counsel how they might entangle him in his talk” (Matt. 22:15).

There were two crimes associated with the festivals of the kingdom: (1) refusing to come when invited and (2) refusing to bear the appropriate mark of subordination: in Israel, circumcision; in the parable, a wedding garment.²⁰ It is an honor to be invited and a curse to refuse to come. It is an honor to attend, but only those who have subordinated themselves publicly to the heavenly King should dare to enter His presence.

The annual festivals of Israel were mandatory for those males who were under God’s ecclesiastical jurisdiction. These were members of the congregation. The question then arises: If it was required that every circumcised male attend the feasts, what were the sanctions for non-attendance? Who imposed them?

2. What Kind of Negative Sanctions?

I have argued throughout this book that biblical civil law does not set forth positive injunctions to do good. It only enforces laws against publicly evil acts, as defined by God's Bible-revealed law. This law of the compulsory feasts initially appears to be an exception to this rule. It is not an exception. Because no negative sanction is mentioned in the various texts dealing with the required festivals, we should initially conclude that this was not a civil law. Only if we can derive appropriate civil sanctions by examining the nature of the crime should we conclude that this was a civil law. I can see no appropriate sanctions. There was no earthly victim of a crime who could bring charges. There seems to be no appropriate fine to be distributed to some future victim of an unknown criminal. Whipping seems inappropriate, since the crime is not a positive assault on public morality.

20. This is clearly symbolic of baptism.

It seems a likely inference that the appropriate negative sanction was excommunication from the priestly congregation. By failing to attend the required feasts, the man had placed himself in the camp of the uncircumcised strangers. He would have been kept from attending future ritual feasts. He would have been barred from attendance at local worship conducted by the priests. If he was an Israelite with an inheritance in the land, he would also have forfeited this inheritance, for he had renounced his family's ownership rights in Israel when he renounced God's ownership rights over Him and His family. Only if his sons or distant heirs later denied their father's rebellion and affirmed the family covenant under God when they became adults could they reclaim the forfeited inheritance. However, this re-covenanting procedure did give them the ability to reclaim what had been legally removed. This was God's promise to the future dispossessed sons of Israel whenever they were removed from the land:

And ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up. And they that are left of you shall pine away in their iniquity in your enemies' lands; and also in the iniquities of their fathers shall they pine away with them. If they shall confess their iniquity, and the iniquity of their fathers, with their trespass which they trespassed against me, and that also they have walked contrary unto me; And that I also have walked contrary unto them, and have brought them into the land of their enemies; if then their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, and they then accept of the punishment of their iniquity: Then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land (Lev. 26:38–42).

A man who was outside God's holy army had no legal access to judicial office. This was another aspect of God's threat of imposing the physical sanction of removing them from their geographical sanctuary in the land. They would become slaves and strangers in a foreign land. Only through extraordinary faithfulness did certain Israelites become leaders in foreign lands, as Joseph had become in Egypt, as Daniel later became in Babylon and Medo-Persia, and as Esther became in Medo-Persia. Israelites would suffer by becoming subordinates to foreign gods whose spokesmen did not respect the principle of equality before the law. They would not again serve as judges in the land, declaring God's civil law, unless they repented.

To be an uncircumcised stranger in Israel was to be someone outside the congregation. Circumcision was a judicial act. It was a physical mark of covenantal subordination, not a magical mark of initiation. A man could make his circumcision null and void by rejecting the terms of the covenant. Refusing to attend the feasts was such a rejection.

3. Family Sanctions

Inheritance was familistic in Old Covenant Israel.²¹ The civil government was supposed to enforce the laws of inheritance, but the seat of family covenantal authority was in the father as the family priest. When a man died, his sons inherited. If he had no sons, his daughters inherited. If he had no daughters, his brothers inherited (Num. 27:8–10). "And if his father have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman that is next to him of his family, and he shall possess it: and it shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment, as the LORD commanded Moses" (Num. 27:11). The kinsman redeemer (ga'al), meaning the blood avenger (Deut. 19:6), inherited the property as his closest next of kin.

What about a man who had voluntarily abandoned the feasts? He had thereby publicly abandoned the covenant. This was a form of covenantal death.²² Covenantally, it was as if the original owner had died. His heirs inherited. But because he had cut off all those who were under his immediate covenantal authority in his family, his brothers immediately inherited, unless his sons broke covenant with him. If he had no brothers, then his next of kin inherited. His brothers or his closest

21. Chapter 25.

22. On covenantal death, see Ray R. Sutton, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Marriage and Divorce (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), chaps 2, 4. (<http://bit.ly/rssecond>) relatives could then go to the civil magistrate and compel the transfer of title to the land, which would presumably go into effect at the time of his physical death or the jubilee year, whichever came first.²³ This confiscation of the man's property was not the sovereign act of the civil government. It was not a negative civil sanction. It was a family sanction that was lawfully enforced by the civil government. The terms of land ownership had been set by God before they conquered Canaan. As the ultimate Owner, God had the legal right to specify in advance the judicial terms of the leaseholds.

Similarly, the removal of the man's status as someone eligible to serve as a civil magistrate was not a negative civil sanction. It was simply a public acknowledgment by the civil government of the individual's change in legal status when he withdrew from the congregation by ceasing to attend the feasts. It was the removal of a covenantal privilege open only to members of the congregation. The state merely confirmed what the former congregation member had publicly announced: he was no longer a citizen or judge in Israel.

4. Jesus and the Disinheritance of Israel

The kinsman-redeemer inherited because of the covenantal death of the covenant-breaker. This was the legal basis for Jesus Christ, the kinsman-redeemer and also the blood avenger of Israel, to inherit the kingdom and to pass this inheritance to those under His covenantal administration. Thus, Jesus prophesied to the Jews of His day: "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43).

Israel had renounced the ethical terms of God's covenant, despite the fact that all the men bore the mark of covenantal subordination in their flesh. "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! For ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone" (Matt. 23:23-24). The Jews crucified their kinsman-redeemer, Jesus Christ, who exercised the office of blood avenger after His resurrection. Jesus destroyed Jerusalem and the temple in 70 A.D., so that never again could they honor

23. He would have been given time to repent. Also, while civil law in Israel had to abide by the terms of ownership, the original terms did not specify that immediately upon the covenantal death of a man he would be eligible to be thrown off his land. The sanction had to do with lawful inheritance. Inheritance was governed by the inheritance laws of Numbers 27 and the jubilee laws of Leviticus 25.

the feasts. The great tribulation came in 70 A.D.²⁴ The days of vengeance came in 70 A.D.²⁵

Never again would the temple sacrifices in Jerusalem serve as a legal covering for the nations. This meant that the Hebrews would never again serve as judges in God's Holy Commonwealth. Once they had lost title to the land, they could be expelled. Once removed from the land of promise, they no longer lawfully imposed biblical law's civil sanctions, either on themselves or on the gentiles.

Talmudic law recognized their new legal status. When the Romans captured Jerusalem and burned the temple, the ancient official Sanhedrin court came to an end. The rabbis, under the leadership of Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai, then took over many of the judicial functions of the Sanhedrin.²⁶ They established as a principle that every Jewish court must have at least one judge who had been ordained by the laying on of hands (semikah), and who could in principle trace his ordination back to Moses. This laying on of hands could take place only in the Holy Land. Legal scholar George Horowitz commented: "A court not thus qualified had no jurisdiction to impose the punishments prescribed in the Torah."²⁷ After the Bar Kokhba revolt was defeated in 135, the Jews were scattered across the Roman Empire in the diaspora. "The Rabbis were compelled, therefore, in order to preserve the Torah and to maintain law and order, to enlarge the authority of Rabbinical tribunals. This they accomplished by emphasizing the distinction between Biblical penalties and Rabbinical penalties. Rabbinical courts after the second century had no authority to impose Biblical punishments since they lacked semikah-; but as regards penalties created by Rabbinical legislation, the Rabbis had of necessity, accordingly, a whole series of sanctions and penalties: excommunications, fines, physical punishment, use of the 'secular arm' in imitation of the Church, etc."²⁸ Thus, by the time of the writing of the Mishnah, which was Rabbi Judah the Prince's authoritative late-second-century compilation of rabbinical laws, Jewish courts had already abandoned any attempt to enforce the Old Testament sanctions.

24. David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

25. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

26. George Horowitz, The Spirit of Jewish Law (New York: Central Book Co., [1953] 1963), pp. 92–93.

27. Ibid., p. 93.

28. Idem.

5. Covenantal Restoration

But there is always a qualification to God's historical judgments, the same one open to the Hebrews who had been scattered before in Babylon (Lev. 26:38–42): the Jews can repent, affirm the terms of the covenant, be adopted by God into His church, and serve as judges again. In fact, they will surely repent, Paul promised in Romans 11. They will be restored to faith.

I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness? For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office: If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them. For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? For if the firstfruit be holy, the lump is also holy: and if the root be holy, so are the branches. And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree; Boast not against the branches. But if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee. Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not highminded, but fear: For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off. And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graff them in again. For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree? For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins (Rom. 11:11–27).

Next time, however, they will not have to settle for restoration of their ownership of tiny Israel. As members of the church, they will inherit the earth. “His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth” (Ps. 25:13).

F. Citizenship by Birth Within the Covenant

On the eighth day, the Hebrew male child was to be circumcised (Lev. 12:3). This gave him the mark of citizenship. Birth gave him access to circumcision, and circumcision gave him citizen’s rights. He could lose his citizenship by violating the terms of the covenant in specific ways, most notably by refusing to attend the required festivals. The feasts were ritual acts of covenant renewal,²⁹ and these acts of covenant renewal had definite political consequences.

In the New Testament, the mark of the covenant is also by birth, but only through personal profession of faith (self-acknowledged new birth) or by parental representation.³⁰ In both cases, the person so marked can lose his citizenship, and in the same way as in the Old Covenant: by breaking God’s laws, by failing to repent and make restitution, and by failing to attend the required feast of covenant renewal, the Lord’s Supper.

1. The Office of Civil Magistrate

The law of the mandatory feasts did not impose negative civil sanctions against those who refused to attend the required feasts, but it did remove a civil privilege: the right to serve as a civil officer. Every civil government in New Testament times is supposed to respect the Bible’s definition of what constitutes a true citizen in the eyes of God: a person under the covenantal discipline of a Trinitarian church. A citizen in a formally covenanted Christian political order, as in ancient Israel, should be a person who lawfully eats God’s communion feast. If he refuses, he thereby removes himself from the jurisdiction of the church’s court, either through resigning church membership or through excommunication. He thereby redefines himself as no longer being a citizen, but rather a stranger in the land. The state acknowledges his renouncing of his citizenship. This is not a negative sanction; it is a judicial response to the former citizen’s voluntarily chosen new covenantal status, namely, that of public covenant-breaker.

Covenant-keepers were the only ones who were entitled to exercise judicial authority in the land of Israel. They could legally serve as judges or as electors of judges (Deut. 1:13; 16:18). How do we know this? Because all men were under the protection of biblical civil law. There was no distinguishing mark based on differing degrees of protection from the civil law; one's presence in the land was a sufficient mark entitling one to full legal protection (Ex. 12:49). Thus, circumcision had to be a mark of judicial authority as well as a mark of judicial subordination. It was a mark of covenantal subordination under God, and therefore a mark of one's authority to be eligible to serve as a judge. This is why Paul could write to the Corinthians: "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? And if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life? If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church" (1 Cor. 6:2-4).

29. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), Appendix 8. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

30. Ibid., Appendix 9.

2. Baptism and Civil Authority

Women were not required to go to all these three feasts each year. They also did not normally serve as judges, although Deborah did (Jud. 4). Women were not to be kept away from these feasts, but they were not under judicial compulsion to attend. This is why the New Testament represents a major break with the Old Testament. Females are baptized in the church; therefore, they are required to take communion. Females (except infants) are not represented by a man—father or husband—in the required ritual feast.

As was the case in the Old Covenant, they are not allowed to become priests, for they cannot lawfully speak judicially in church. God presents Himself to humanity as a Husband, and thus He cannot be lawfully represented in His role as the priestly Lawgiver and sacrificial lamb by women. Women cannot lawfully declare God's law in formal church worship ceremonies (1 Cor. 14:34-35). In this sense, women are analogous to all those attendees at the required feasts of Israel who were also not authorized to become priests.³¹

Covenanted women were and still are eligible to become civil judges in the holy commonwealth. They did and still can lawfully represent God in declaring His judgments in civil courts. In ancient Israel, 31. Women, male children under age 20 (Ex. 30:14), castrated males (Deut. 23:1), plus: circumcised Moabites, Ammonites, and heirs of bastards to the tenth generation (Deut. 23:2-3), and circumcised Edomites and Egyptians to the third generation (Deut. 23:7-8).

women did not bear the mark of circumcision, but their fathers, brothers, husbands, and sons did. Women were circumcised representatively. Thus, they had lawful access to the feasts, though not as actual household priests.³² They could lawfully serve as civil judges, although this was not common practice.³³ Deborah was breaking no civil law when she served as a prophetess and judge. “And Deborah, a prophetess, the wife of Lapidoth, she judged Israel at that time” (Jud. 4:4). She could not serve as a sacrifice-offering priest in her household, but she could serve as a public prophetess³⁴ and judge. She could declare God’s law outside the sanctuary of the temple.

There is no representation with respect to the woman’s covenantal mark in the New Testament. There surely should be no question of the right of women to vote in elections, to serve on juries, and to be elected to political and judicial office in a Christian social order. Baptism is the mark of this judicial civil authority. Baptized women possess the covenantal proof of judicial subordination to God that is also a mark of civil authority in a Christian civil commonwealth.

This doctrine does not authorize universal women’s suffrage, however. Baptism as the basis of rulership is the mark of God’s theocratic order. Nevertheless, there can be no lawful discrimination by the state on the basis of differences in race, color, or sex. Why not? Because of Exodus 12:49: “One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you.” But there must always be civil discrimination with respect to creed, not in the sense of the application of biblical civil law, but with respect to those who have lawful access to the civil offices that apply it.

With respect to the right of baptized women to vote, to hold political office, and to sit on juries, it is clear that such rights were ignored by Christian men from the days that Christians first gained access to

32. It might be argued that a widow with no brothers and no adult son would have been allowed to participate in the required feasts as a recipient of the family’s burned sacrifice. She was clearly the head of her household, and the priestly office was a household office. She could take a vow that was binding before God without having to wait a day for her husband or father to confirm it (Num. 30:9). This points to her position as a household priest. The response to this argument is that the importance of God’s masculinity outweighs even the importance of the office as the head of the household. A Levite could have represented the widow at the actual ritual sacrifice.

33. Those who argue that the Israelite women never ate the Passover must find some way to explain the legitimacy of Deborah’s office as civil judge. He will have to separate citizenship from participation at the feasts. This will make citizenship in Israel very difficult to explain.

34. Philip the evangelist had four daughters who prophesied (Acts 21:8–9).

political power in Rome. This judicial blindness is analogous to the refusal of Christians to liberate their permanent lifetime slaves, and to refuse to pass civil laws liberating them. It took until the mid-nineteenth century to persuade civil governments of the moral evil of refusing to abolish slavery. It took another three-quarters of a century to persuade national governments that all women should have the right to vote. In both cases, Christian scholars and leaders did not take the lead. They followed the lead of the humanists.³⁵

Does this mean that the institutional church learns only slowly how to apply fundamental biblical principles as time goes on? Yes. Does this mean that basic biblical principles of justice have been ignored by the church for many centuries? Yes. Does this mean that if the church refuses to acknowledge the Bible's authority for law, politics, economics, education, and similar supposedly non-ecclesiastical topics that the enemies of God will take the lead in promoting such ideas, but only by universalizing these judicial principles and removing their biblical covenantal content? The historical testimony of the last two centuries certainly indicates that such is the case. For example, Christians in the era of the early American republic sold their birth-right for a mess of judicial pottage in 1788—an historical and judicial fact still vehemently denied by today's disinherited American Christians—and the Unitarian humanists immediately began to collect their newly purchased inheritance. They were able to do this initially by deception: stealing the language of biblical civic and judicial righteousness by substituting the doctrine of Newtonian natural law.³⁶ They continued the transfer after 1788 by capturing Christianity's rhetoric of mission and its vision of victory.³⁷ The final transfer was made by 35. The first women's rights meeting was held in 1848 in Seneca Falls, New York. In 1861, the state of Kansas authorized women to vote in school board elections. In 1890, the state of Wyoming authorized general women's suffrage, the first general civil government to do so. In 1893, New Zealand granted the right to vote to women; in 1902, Australia followed New Zealand's lead. Norway was the first nation in Europe to do so, in 1907 on a limited basis, and full suffrage in 1913. The Nineteenth Amendment (1920) modified the U.S. Constitution to allow women full voting rights: "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." Not until 1928 did English women gain full suffrage.

36. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Part 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

37. If one event best captures the nature of the transfer it was the capture of Harvard College by the Unitarians in 1805, symbolized by Henry Ware's election to the chair of theology. On the transformation, see C. Gregg Singer, A Theological Interpret-

Darwin: the destruction of natural law and the coming of the scientific planning elite.³⁸

G. Humanist Citizenship

The modern humanist wants the political fruits of ritual subordination to God, namely, the right to exercise civil judgment in society, but without the roots: actual ritual subordination to God. He wants the judicial fruits of lawful access to God's required feasts without actually having to attend them. He wants universal suffrage: a guarantee of his continuing access to the office of judge, despite his public denial of God's authority over him. He insists on being allowed to serve as a civil judge despite the fact that he is not under ecclesiastical discipline. If this demand is biblically legitimate, it means one of two things: (1) that he can interpret and apply God's revealed civil law as well as a Christian can, despite the fact that he refuses to honor the counsel of church officers by affirming the church covenant and submitting to church discipline; or (2) that God's revealed civil law—if such even exists—is irrelevant to civil affairs.

We need to understand what this means judicially and politically. The humanists want a different covenant, with a different set of five points: sovereignty (the General Will, the People, The Volk, the proletariat, etc.), hierarchy-representation (the Party, the vanguard of the proletariat, the Führer, the Supreme Court, national plebiscites, etc.), law (majority rule, evolutionary forces, Marxism-Leninism, etc.), judgment (oaths to different sovereignties in order to gain citizenship, welfare rights and entitlements, etc.), and inheritance (political citizenship). They have been successful in persuading voters, including Christian voters, of the supposed judicial necessity of abandoning the biblical covenant model that long undergirded Europe's civil commonwealths.

Humanists have written civil covenants (constitutions) that make citizenship the product of physical birth or of state adoption ("naturalation of American History (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1964), ch. 3; Alice Felt Tyler, Freedom's Ferment (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1944] 1965); Edward McNall Burns, The American Ideal of Mission: Concepts of National Purpose and Destiny (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1957); Albert K. Weinberg, Manifest Destiny: A Study in Nationalist Expansion in American History (Chicago: Quadrangle, [1935] 1963).

38. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A: "From Cosmic Purposelessness to Humanistic Sovereignty."

ized citizenship”) rather than citizenship by ritual subordination to the God of the Bible. In the twentieth century, for example, the suffragettes got their wish: the right to vote. But the suffragettes were radicals and humanists, not Christians. They wanted the right of all women to vote because of their supposed birthright as human beings. They saw political citizenship as a product of physical birth in a modern secular democracy. But the Bible does not teach that men and women have any birthrights, save one. They are born in sin and corruption, and what they are entitled to, apart from God’s special grace, is a legal right to eternal death.

So, universal suffrage is the political demand of those who bear no marks of ritual subordination to God. Biblically, the right of all Christian women to vote is clear from the meaning of circumcision and baptism. The right of all women to vote is denied by the same law that denies the right of all men to vote: the law that authorized circumcised men to attend Passover. “A foreigner and an hired servant shall not eat thereof” (Ex. 12:45).

Conclusion

The Old Testament laws of the feasts specified that the judges of Israel in the broadest sense had to appear before the Lord in Jerusalem three times a year. This reminded them of the magnitude of their blessings: a court appearance in the presence of the King of heaven. It also reminded them that they were under this King’s authority judicially. If they disobeyed this law, they were brought under condemnation: expulsion from the congregation of the Lord. This meant the removal of the condemned man’s office of judge.

Regular rituals of covenant renewal in the house of God were basic to the exercise of citizenship in the Old Testament. This is equally binding biblically in the New Testament. The New Testament covenant mark of baptism and the New Testament feast of the Lord’s Supper have replaced the Old Covenant’s mark of circumcision and Passover.

Women now have the mark of the covenant placed directly on them. Because women receive the mark of the covenant in baptism, they are required to participate in the ritual meal of covenant renewal: the Lord’s Supper. This becomes their legal title to access to the civil office of judge.³⁹ With respect to civil office, “There is neither Jew nor

39. Again, I am not arguing that women were not permitted to exercise judicial au-

Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3:28). But this cannot mean that today there is no civil covenant. The civil covenant is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of "civil covenant vs. no civil covenant." It is always this question: "Which civil covenant, under which God?"

The Hebrews were required to give the firstfruits to God. He was the owner of the land. He was entitled to his percentage of the land's output. The Hebrews were required to declare ritually and collectively that they were sharecroppers on God's property. Only those who acknowledged their position as economic sharecroppers were allowed to serve as judges. Without both ritual subordination and economic subordination to God, they were not allowed by God to exercise justice as officials in the civil commonwealth. Those who are not formally under the ecclesiastical covenant may not bear the sword of judgment as officers of God's civil court. Those who are not under the terms of God's "sharecropping" agreement are to be removed from the congregation, meaning from the list of those entitled by law to become candidates for civil office.

This indicates that those in a church who do not tithe should not be allowed to become voting members. They may be communicant members, but not voting members. In a fully Christian social order, all churches would require tithing for voting membership. Only voting church members would be allowed to become voting members of civil government. The tithe is basic to both social order and political order. But Christians do not believe this today, and we suffer great disorder.

thority in Old Covenant Israel. I am making it clear, however, that there is still a covenant mark of judicial subordination, and this mark must be received by anyone who claims citizenship, meaning rulership, in a biblical commonwealth. It was received representatively by women in the Old Testament through their male relatives.

THE CURSE OF ZERO GROWTH

And ye shall serve the LORD your God, and he shall bless thy bread, and thy water; and I will take sickness away from the midst of thee. There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil (Ex. 23:25–26).

The theocentric issue here is God as the sanctions-bringer. It is related to point four of the biblical covenant model.¹ Given the nature of the announced blessings, there is only one possible source: God. The state is incapable of applying these positive biological sanctions in history.

God is the Judge, both in history and eternity. When God renders judgment, He does at least three things: (1) He evaluates a person's thoughts and actions in terms of the requirements of His law; (2) He pronounces judgment, either "guilty" or "not guilty"; and (3) He imposes the appropriate sanctions, either cursings or blessings.

What is not generally recognized or sufficiently emphasized is that God does this in His capacity as Father. He created man in His own image. The image of God in man brings man under God's sanctions. This is what makes him judicially responsible before God. God puts the work of the law in each person's heart; each person is capable of understanding the ethical standards God lays down. Each person knows enough to condemn him on judgment day. "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: Which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excus-

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

ing one another” (Rom. 2:14–15).²

God the Father disinherited Adam, but He adopts those who have been elect by Him in Jesus Christ before the foundation of the world. “Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love. Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will” (Eph. 1:3–5). The two most fundamental sanctions in time and eternity—inheritance and disinheritance—are imposed by God in His office as the Head of the family. This is why it is the head of the earthly family who is most analogous judicially to God’s role as Judge, not the civil magistrate or church officer.

A. Inheritance and Disinheritance

The exodus was based judicially on Israel’s office as God’s son. God had told Moses: “And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son, even my firstborn: And I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me: and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn” (Ex. 4:22–23). His ability to deliver His people from bondage in Egypt was the sign of His office as Father, and the sign of Israel’s subordination to Him as a son. From that point on, the primary question for national Israel would be: “Am I the son who will inherit?” And the evidence, generation after generation, pointed to the answer: no. Israel was disinherited finally when the true Son, Jesus Christ, came to collect His inheritance, and the Jews refused to honor His claim.

They answered him, We be Abraham’s seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free? Jesus answered them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin. And the servant abideth not in the house for ever: but the Son abideth ever. If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. I know that ye are Abraham’s seed; but ye seek to kill me, because my word hath no place in you. I speak that which I have seen with my Father: and ye do that which ye have seen with your father. They answered and said unto him, Abraham is our father. Jesus saith unto them, If ye were Abraham’s children, ye would do the works of Abraham. But now ye seek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth, which I have heard of God: this did not Abraham. Ye do the deeds of your father. Then said they to him, We be not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God. Jesus said unto them, If God were your Father, ye would love me: for I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me. Why do ye not understand my speech? even because ye cannot hear my word. Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it (John 8:33–44).

2. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 3.

Jesus called the Jews bastards. Bastards were to be cut off from judicial office (“the congregation”) in Israel for at least ten generations (Deut. 23:2).³ This is why Jesus also announced: “Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof” (Matt. 21:43). The Father was about to cut off His son Israel for what Israel had done to His true Son, Jesus Christ.⁴

It is God in His office as heavenly Father who serves as the archetype of the earthly judge. It is the father as head of his household, rather than the church officer or the civil magistrate, who reveals God as Judge most accurately in history.

3. This means that genetic-covenant Israel can be adopted back into God’s family. This is what Paul said will happen in the future: “I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness? For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office: If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them. For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? For if the firstfruit be holy, the lump is also holy: and if the root be holy, so are the branches. And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree” (Rom. 11:11–17). That genetic-covenantal Israel will be brought back into the church is the position of such Presbyterian and Reformed commentators on Romans 11 as Charles Hodge, Robert Haldane, and John Murray. It is also the position of the Larger Catechism of the Westminster Confession of Faith: Question 191. See Ray R. Sutton, “Does Israel Have a Future?” Covenant Renewal (Dec. 1988). (<http://bit.ly/SuttonIsrael>)

4. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation (Ft. Worth: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

B. The Father as Rewarder

The human father hands out punishments and rewards to his children. He treats them as children during their period of dependency and hierarchical training. Jesus announced: “If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent? Or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?” (Luke 11:11–13).⁵ The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews wrote: “But without faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him” (Heb. 11:6). The judicial authority of the earthly father to issue rewards to those who diligently serve him is the primary mark of his unique covenantal authority.

1. Positive Sanctions

God hands out rewards in history. So do earthly fathers. Neither the church nor the state is supposed to hand out rewards when it hands down formal judgments. The judges of these two God-ordained (but God-limited) covenant institutions are supposed to deal with people as adults. They are to settle disputes that arise between legal adults. They are to prepare people to serve as heads of their own households, not treat them as children. For this reason, neither church nor state is supposed to hand out earthly rewards at the end of a trial. They are to declare the legal status of the parties of the dispute—guilty or not guilty—impose negative sanctions on the guilty party, and release the innocent party from further obligations.

What this means is that *judges are not to offer positive sanctions from the government to those declared “not guilty.”*⁶ Why not? Because this would make the judges into tyrants and/or servants of sycophants. Judges would thereby become bribe-seekers: not necessarily seekers of monetary gifts, but seekers of toadies to make them feel important.

5. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 22.

6. This is not to say that judges are not to force the guilty parties to make restitution. Also, victims of unsolved crimes such as hit-and-run driving may be legitimately rewarded out of special trust funds administered by the civil government and financed by fines collected from those who commit “victimless crimes,” such as speeding. But these rewards are not from the government; they are from convicted criminals.

They would move steadily from the dominion religion to the power religion. Judges are not supposed to issue orders and gain loyal followers; they are instead authorized to settle disputes. The biblical commonwealth is not a top-down bureaucracy; it is a bottom-up appeals court.

Judges are placed in the midst of a hierarchy. They are the legal servants of God, and they are also the servants of those who are under their judicial authority. They are servants upward to God and downward to men. In a biblical civil order, those who are under the judges are in fact the sovereign agents in the delegation of covenant authority. "Take you wise men, and understanding, and known among your tribes, and I will make them rulers over you" (Deut. 1:13). "Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes: and they shall judge the people with just judgment" (Deut. 16:18). Thus, there is never to be a final single voice of human authority until Jesus Christ speaks His words of judgment at the final judgment. The Bible divides authority in a series of hierarchies that remove final authority from any single individual or group.

It is the dream of the covenant-breaker either to annul this system of divided authority, and replace it with a top-down centralized order (statism), or else annul all hierarchical order and gain autonomy for himself (anarchism).

2. Contrasting Supernatural Systems of Authority

The visible sign of God's authority is His ability to bring judgments in history: blessing and cursing. He is invisible; His blessings and cursings are visible. Israel was warned: "And thou shalt become an astonishment, a proverb, and a byword, among all nations whither the LORD shall lead thee" (Deut. 28:37). God can deliver His people; He can also lead them back into bondage to a foreign nation.

Satan imitates God when he promises his followers blessings and cursings. But he owns nothing of his own. He is a thief⁷ and a squatter in history.⁸ Neither his threats nor his gifts are to be taken very seriously. His promises and threats are all deceptions that are designed to deflect men's vision of God's true promises and the true threats. Jesus warned people to fear God, not Satan: "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28).

7. Judas was representative of his covenantal master, Satan: "Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment. Then saith one of his disciples, Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, which should betray him, Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor? This he said, not that he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein" (John 12:3-6).

8. Gary North, Inherit the Earth: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth,

God owns the world; thus, He has the power to distribute blessings out of His own capital. Satan can offer no blessings that he has not previously stolen. The mark of Satan's imitation sovereignty is his ability to deceive people into believing in something for nothing on any terms except God's grace. (And even God's free gift of grace to man was paid for by Jesus Christ.) God distributes true gifts; Satan creates the illusion of distributing rewards, net, but in fact he has to collect more than he gives. There is waste, confusion, and deception in his world. Satan always runs a deficit.

God is independent of His creation; Satan is dependent on God's creation and God's unmerited gift of time, knowledge, and power to Satan.⁹ Satan can do only what God permits him to do (Job 1). God therefore tells His servants to serve others because He has the power to renew their strength and their economic resources. Satan tells his followers to compel service from others because he does not have the power to renew their strength and their economic resources. God gives; Satan steals. God's service moves from multiple centers (productivity) to the periphery (the needy). Satan's service moves from the periphery (tax collections) to the center (centralized political power). God's blessings reflect the procession of the Holy Spirit. Satan's blessings reflect the contraction of his kingdom in history. God brings economic growth; Satan brings economic contraction. God expands society's capital; Satan consumes society's capital. These competing systems of supernatural covenantal sanctions are reflected in the rival economic systems that objectify their rival ethical and legal principles: free market capitalism vs. the welfare state, whether Keynesian, socialist, or Marxist.

3. Dominion Through Service

The biblical principle of authority in every area of life is this: the greater the service to others, the greater the authority over others. "And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant" (Matt. 20:27). "But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant" (Matt. 23:11). The servant does not take; the servant gives. This is why Jesus Christ is the greatest servant with the greatest authority: He laid down His life for mankind in general and for His followers in particular (I Tim. 4:10).¹⁰ The satanic version of dominion is the reverse of this biblical principle. Satan teaches that the greater one's authority over others, the greater the services extracted from others.

Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), p. 61. (<http://bit.ly/gninherit>)

9. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), pp. 21, 35, 39-44. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

The biblical principle of service is not manifested in the same way in every institution. What is appropriate service for a father is not always appropriate for a civil magistrate, and vice versa. Both are different from a church officer. Men are to serve and give; but the particular office determines what exactly is to be given and under what conditions.

It is the mark of authority of the messianic State that it hands out rewards to those who diligently serve it. It extracts capital from all groups, but returns the booty (minus at least 50 percent "for handling") to its supporters and clients. The state steadily converts its citizens into lifetime servants (who pay, and may or may not receive anything back) and children (who obey, but also receive something). The bureaucrats, as so-called "public servants," become the actual masters. (Tell the person who stands before the tax collector that the tax collector is a public servant, and that the U.S. Internal Revenue Service is in fact a service.) The messianic state converts its citizens into permanent servants and children, and then this pseudo-parent collects the inheritance for itself from society's true families.¹¹

Because both church and state are agencies that are dependent on those under their jurisdiction for financial support, neither is supposed to hand out rewards to those declared judicially innocent in a trial. Guilty parties are supposed to pay their victims. The court restores the status quo ante as much as possible; this includes restitution. Courts are to administer justice, not administer rewards.

4. Productivity and Judicial Authority

The family, in contrast to both church and State, is an independently productive unit. It is not simply a necessary protective agency whose services make possible economic creativity and economic growth, as is the case with the State. It creates net wealth through the skills and talents of its members. The family's primary productivity stems generally from the father. The senior judge is usually also the primary breadwinner.¹² Fathers therefore can lawfully hand down rewards to those they declare "not guilty," as well as impose sanctions on those they declare "guilty." They can use both the "carrot" and the "stick." Unlike the judges of both church and state, fathers earn wealth through their own labors; they do not rely on either tithe or taxes to fill the family's treasury. Thus, fathers are entitled to distribute rewards in their judicial capacity as judges. They are judges who in this sense are uniquely analogous to God, who also is not dependent on the productivity of those under His jurisdiction. "If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof" (Ps. 50:12).

10. Ibid., ch. 2. Cf. Gary North, Hierarchy and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on First Corinthians, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2012), ch. 6.

11. Chapter 25:E.

When the biblical civil government pronounces judgment through its authorized representatives, it can lawfully impose only negative sanctions. It does not reward those who are declared "not guilty." It simply releases them from bondage or the threat of bondage. It is prohibited from issuing positive injunctions, nor may it lawfully hand out positive rewards to those declared innocent. Why is the biblically mandated state to be a negative sanctioning agency only? Because the state's purpose is not to imitate God as a rewarder of those who diligently search Him and obey Him. It is also not supposed to make people righteous. Its purpose is to protect those under its lawful jurisdiction from the evil acts of others who are also under its jurisdiction. The civil government's functions are exclusively negative—prohibiting specified publicly evil acts—and therefore its sanctions are exclusively negative.

C. History: Cyclical or Linear?

We return now to the sanctions of Exodus 23:25–26: "I will take sickness away from the midst of thee. There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil."

12. The confusion of office in the modern world is the result of a change in religion, but also a change in income sources. When mothers become secondary breadwinners, it is difficult for fathers to maintain the same degree of authority as before. Nevertheless, the judicial status of the office is primary, not the economic foundation of the office. The father still declares final judgment. But the more economically dependent the family is on the wife, the more he will have to listen to her counsel. She possesses a negative sanction: the authority to quit working.

These are positive sanctions in nature.

These sanctions presuppose that nature is not normative; rather, nature is under a curse as a result of man's ethical rebellion (Gen. 3:17–19).¹³ The so-called “balance of nature” hypothesis assumes either an autonomous process of temporary linear developments locally within an overall framework of decay (Darwinism and cosmic entropy), or else an eternal alternating process of development and cosmic decay (cosmic cycles). Both perspectives regarding nature are completely antithetical to the biblical viewpoint. The biblical scientific worldview is based on the theme of death and resurrection.¹⁴

The growth of human population, if directed by God in response to the widespread honoring of God's law, is normative. So is economic growth (Deut. 8). Not cycles of nature or culture, but rather linear development is God's response in history to men's ethical conformity to His law-order. God's law-order is designed to promote the rapid fulfilling of the terms of the dominion covenant. God does not desire nature to remain governed by the law of the jungle, the desert, or the frozen wastes. He wants the ethical obedience of mankind. When they give Him obedience by the means of grace, He promises to extend their rule over nature in history.¹⁵ The extension of man's rule over nature is delayed primarily by the ethics of rebellion, not by innate “limits to growth” in nature. Individual limits can be overcome in a few generations, though not at zero cost.

It was sin and rebellion that thwarted the Hebrews in the attainment of their assigned tasks. They turned to the gods of Canaan—gods of the chaos festivals, the eternal cycles, and the abolition of time.¹⁶ It was not the hypothetical autonomous restraint of biological “negative feedback,” which kept the Hebrews from multiplying and filling the earth; it was instead their adoption of Canaanitic religions of cyclical growth and decay. They began to work out the implications of these rival religions, and God permitted them to sink their culture into the paralyzing pessimism of pagan faiths. He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their souls (Ps. 106:15). Then He scattered them: by the Assyrians, the Babylonians, the Greeks, and finally the Romans. This was the fulfillment of the prophecy of God's negative covenantal

13. North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 12.

14. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

15. Ibid., ch. 6.

16. Chapter 17.

sanctions on the nation in history: “And the LORD shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind” (Deut. 28:64–65).

D. Obedience and Biology

Is dominion essentially biological? Could the Israelites’ growth of population have been even more rapid than it had been in Egypt? In Egypt there had been no guarantee against miscarriages. In short, that which is biologically abnormal—no miscarriages—is declared by God to be culturally and historically normative for His redeemed people. Did God expect them to fill the earth in only a few centuries?

The rate of conception could have been reduced by God, either directly or, as in the modern world, through the development of the technology of contraception. Thus, the birth rate might have dropped in response to the increasing pressures of population growth. It is possible that God would have delayed the external fulfillment of the population aspect of the dominion covenant. We are not told, however, that any such delay was normative. There is no indication in the revelation of God to His Old Covenant people that they would experience anything except large families, zero miscarriages, and high rates of population growth, if they would conform themselves to His law. Certainly, the biological option of rapid population growth was offered to them by God.

1. Biological Blessings

Exodus 23:25–26 speaks of God’s positive sanctions in history. These sanctions are biological. “And ye shall serve the LORD your God, and he shall bless thy bread, and thy water; and I will take sickness away from the midst of thee. There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil.” There is no question what the source of such positive sanctions must be: God the Father. The state is not capable of granting this kind of reward. Thus, by promising biological rewards, God announced His covenantal office of Father.

As slaves in Egypt, the Hebrews had already experienced what has to be the most rapid population growth on record. Using Donovan Courville's estimate of 215 years from Joseph to the exodus, a single family, plus bondservants, had grown in two centuries to as many as two million people (Ex. 12:37). Mathematically speaking, such an increase can be explained only by assuming that during the first century of Israel's residence in Egypt, other tribes and even Egyptians had voluntarily joined themselves with the Hebrews through conversion and circumcision during the era of prosperity in the land of Goshen.¹⁷

Even after the exodus, God told them that their numbers were insufficient to enable them to subdue the land of Canaan all at once. Speaking of the pagan cultures still in the land, God said: "I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land" (Ex. 23:29–30).

This is an extremely important passage. First, it affirms man's authority over land and animals. Even the morally perverse Canaanite tribes possessed God-given authority over the works of nature. Men, not the beasts, are supposed to subdue the earth.¹⁸ Second, this passage warns God's covenant-keeping people against attempting to achieve instant dominion. They must first build up their numbers, their skills, and their capital before they can expect to reign over the creation. Covenant-breakers possess skills and capital that are important to the continuity of human dominion. They can be competent administrators. Their labor can be used by God and society until an era comes when God's people are ready to exercise primary leadership in terms of God's law. At that point, ethical rebels will either be regenerated through God's grace, or else steadily replaced by the new rulers of the land.¹⁹ Until then, God's people must be content to wait patiently, improving their own administrative abilities and increasing their numbers. *Dominion is an ethical process, a process of self-government under God's law.*²⁰

God promised His people a specific reward for covenantal faithful-

17. Chapter 1.

18. The all-too-familiar statement of evolutionists that insects, especially cockroaches, are the true inheritors of the earth, the longest-lived of animals, the creatures that endure throughout history, is fully consistent with Darwinian history. It is also theologically perverse. I call it "cockroach eschatology": the bugs shall inherit the earth.

19. North, Dominion and Common Grace.

20. Sutton, That You May Prosper.

ness (23:25): health, including an absence of miscarriages among both humans and domesticated animals. This conditional promise would have enabled the Hebrews, had they remained faithful as a nation, to have achieved cultural dominion more rapidly. Ultimately, it would have led to the subduing of the whole earth, had the same rate of population growth which they had experienced in Egypt been sustained for a few more centuries.

2. Biological Cursings

God promised to heal them if they remained faithful to Him. But if they refused to obey Him, He promised to bring them under the negative biological sanctions that had plagued them in Egypt:

If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law that are written in this book, that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD; Then the LORD will make thy plagues wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed, even great plagues, and of long continuance, and sore sicknesses, and of long continuance. Moreover he will bring upon thee all the diseases of Egypt, which thou wast afraid of; and they shall cleave unto thee. Also every sickness, and every plague, which is not written in the book of this law, them will the LORD bring upon thee, until thou be destroyed. And ye shall be left few in number, whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for multitude; because thou wouldest not obey the voice of the LORD thy God (Deut. 28:58–62).

These negative national sanctions would be visible symbols of a return to Egypt, a reversal of the exodus, the transition from grace to wrath. The God who brings health as a corporate covenantal blessing is also the God who brings sickness as a corporate covenantal cursing. The text says specifically that plague is a negative sanction used by God to call His people back to Him as a covenant unit. This is why God judged Israel with a plague that killed 70,000 people when He punished David for illegally numbering the people. “So the LORD sent a pestilence upon Israel from the morning even to the time appointed: and there died of the people from Dan even to Beer-sheba seventy thousand men” (II Sam. 24:15). Sickness in general is also a negative covenant sanction. (That some Christians affirm the positive sanction of health as being from God but simultaneously deny the negative sanction of sickness testifies to their hostility to the biblical doctrine of covenantal judgment. We must positively confess Christ as Healer and negatively confess Christ as Plague-master. To refuse to do the latter is the equivalent of preaching heaven but denying hell.)²¹

What God did not promise was covenantal neutrality. He did not promise mere stagnation. These promised biological sanctions take from; they do not simply “fail to add to.”

E. Covenantal Cause and Effect: Life Expectancy

A nation that is characterized by increasing longevity is clearly under the common-grace blessing of God. “Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee” (Ex. 20:12). As Paul reminded his readers: “Honour thy father and mother; which is the first commandment with promise” (Eph. 6:2). Ultimately, as nations conform themselves to God covenantally, God promises to restore something analogous to people’s pre-Flood longevity—a covenantal promise that is the greatest single stumbling stone in the Bible for amillennial eschatology: “There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed” (Isa. 65:20). This promise is found in the midst of a group of promises, mostly economic in scope.

For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed. And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build, and another inhabit; they shall not plant, and another eat: for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands. They shall not labour in vain, nor bring forth for trouble; for they are the seed of the blessed of the LORD, and their offspring with them (Isa. 65:17–23).²²

21. I have in mind here the so-called “positive confession” charismatics who refuse to admit that God brings sickness and plagues as covenantal judgments.

22. Archibald Hughes, an amillennialist, wrote a book called A New Heaven and a New Earth (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1958). He refused to comment on the meaning of this passage, one of only two in the Old Testament that refers to the

1. A Map of Life Expectancy

As recently as 1985, three dozen nations had average life expectancy above age 70. This matched the maximum average life expectancy of Moses' day (Ps. 90:10). These nations included the North American nations of the United States and Canada, Japan, Taiwan, New Zealand and Australia, the United Kingdom and Ireland, Norway and Sweden, Iceland, all continental European nations except Turkey (most of which is in Asia), Chile, Argentina, Uruguay, and the tiny oil kingdoms of Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates.²³ By 2010, 115 nations had average life expectancy of 70 or above, according to the United Nations and reported by Wikipedia. These high rates of life extending breakthroughs have come since the late nineteenth century. No major life extension breakthroughs have been introduced by the medical profession since the mid-1940s, with the development of antibiotics and modern insecticides.²⁴

The improvement in life expectancy has been the result of many factors, most notably rising per capita wealth, better personal hygiene, inoculation against smallpox, vaccines, better sanitation, improved public water treatment, and the development and marketing of the "super drugs" from the mid-1930s to the mid-1940s, including sulpha drugs and penicillin. Without modern technology and modern capital markets, none of these developments would have been likely.

The major extension of human life expectancy has come as a result of falling rates of infant mortality. One estimate calculates that in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, infant mortality among Europe's ruling families was over 200 per 1,000 live births.²⁵ This fell to 70 per 1,000 in the nineteenth century.²⁶ In the United States after 1900, the rate fell by 2.5 percent per annum to 65 in 1930, and similar declines

New Heaven and New Earth, and one of only four in the Bible. The others are Isaiah 66:22, II Peter 3:13, and Revelation 21:1. I can understand his reluctance to do so; the passage has to be denied by an amillennialist. There is a sinner mentioned in verse 20. This means that the verse cannot possibly refer to the post-final judgment world of the resurrection. Thus, the "new heaven and new earth" cannot possibly be relegated exclusively to the post-historical world.

23. Atlas of the United States (New York: Macmillan, 1986), p. 119; data based on the World Bank Atlas, 1985.

24. William Peterson, Population, 2nd ed. (New York: Macmillan, 1969), p. 576.

25. Sigismund Teller, "Birth and Death among Europe's Ruling Families since 1500," in D. V. Glass and D. E. C. Eversley (eds.), Population in History (London: Edward Arnold, 1965); cited by Victor Fuchs, Who Shall Live? Health, Economics, and Social Choice (New York: Basic Books, 1974), p. 32.

26. Fuchs, idem.

were experienced by all nations undergoing rapid economic development.²⁷ By 1961, the rate was down to about 26 deaths per 1,000 in the first five years of life, and by 1980, to about 12.²⁸ Reduced infant mortality is why the statistics show that we live longer in this century. "Comparison of life tables from various countries at various times suggests that as life expectancy rises from 35 to 70, about four-fifths of the increase is contributed by reductions in death rates under 70. . . ."²⁹

What took place in the industrializing nations during the nineteenth century was simply unprecedented since the era of Moses: babies who are allowed by their mothers to survive do survive. (Meanwhile, there are between 35 million and 55 million abortions performed worldwide each year.)³⁰ As population scholar George Stolnitz concluded in 1955, the rise in Western life expectancy during the past century has probably been more far-reaching than the gains of the previous two millennia.³¹ In fact, it is even more remarkable than this: most of the improvement in Western Europe and English-speaking North America came between 1850 and 1900.³² This is additional evidence that the bulk of the West's gain in life expectancy since 1900 has come through the reduction of infant mortality, since this period was marked by rapidly falling rates of infant mortality. There has been a sharp average rise in life expectancy within the West, meaning a remarkable decline of differences within the region.³³ Today, "West" primarily means high technology and low mortality rates, not geography, race, or religion.

Doesn't this deny the premise of Exodus 23:25–26, namely, that God rewards His covenant people with long life? No; it means that He rewards those societies that obey His covenant's external ethical requirements, even if they do not adhere to the formal theological affirmation of Trinitarian faith. Like Nineveh, which avoided God's wrath by repenting of its external sins, despite the fact that it did not affirm the

27. Idem.

28. William A. Knaus, Inside Russian Medicine (New York: Everest House, 1981), chart, p. 375.

29. Fuchs, Who Shall Live?, p. 40.

30. World Population and Fertility Planning Techniques: The Next 20 Years (Washington, D.C. Office of Technology and Assessment, 1982), p. 63.

31. George J. Stolnitz, "A Century of International Mortality Trends," Population Studies (July 1955); reprinted in Charles B. Nam (ed.), Population and Society (New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1968), p. 127.

32. Peterson, Population, p. 547.

33. Stolnitz, op. cit., p. 132.

covenant,³⁴ the modern world has adopted the Protestant work ethic and the Puritan concept of time and thrift with-out accepting Protestantism.

What about the third world? The introduction of DDT and antibiotics into third world nations has received considerable attention from those who try to explain the post-World War II population explosion in these areas. Another reason is the increasing urbanization of many areas and the introduction of modern agricultural techniques. The two most ignored major technological innovations that have extended life expectancy in backward countries, according to economist Peter Drucker, were the invention by an unknown American in the 1860s of wire mesh screens for doors and windows, which poor families adopted to escape flying insects, and the separation of drinking water supplies from latrine areas, a technique known before Alexander of Macedon. These two ignored developments are the primary health care component of the third world's population explosion, he argues.³⁵

2. The USSR: A Third-World Nation Medically

Prior to the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, that nation was the great actuarial exception among major industrial nations. Its reported life expectancy was no higher than Communist China's, which was a vastly underdeveloped nation.³⁶ In recent years, life expectancy has declined in the USSR. Reported infant mortality rose from 22 deaths per 1,000 live births in 1971 to over 31 in 1977. The reported data have declined to about 29 in 1980.³⁷ The age-adjusted death rates of the USSR and the United States intersected in 1966 at about 7.5 per 1,000. After 1966, the Soviet death rate climbed to over 9 per 1,000, while the death rate in the United States fell to about 6 per 1,000.³⁸

But the reported data probably understate the reality. On December 7, 1988, a massive earthquake struck the Armenian region of the USSR. In less than one minute, 400,000 people were left homeless in the middle of winter. The death toll was initially estimated to be as

34. If it had been converted, there would have been signs of covenantal continuity: point five of the covenant. On the contrary, the Assyrian empire conquered Israel and carried the nation into captivity.

35. Peter Drucker, Management: Tasks, Responsibilities, Practices (New York: Harper & Row, 1974), p. 330.

36. Atlas of the United States, p. 118.

37. Knaus, Inside Russian Medicine, chart, p. 375.

38. Ibid., chart, p. 376.

high as 100,000 (later revised downward by the Soviet government to 25,000). The Soviets then called for international aid to the victims, a sign of its third-world status economically.

In the immediate aftermath of the tragedy, a Los Angeles Times wire story revealed the fact that during the previous two years, as a result of Premier Gorbachev's loosening of controls on the Soviet press, the Soviets had admitted that their health care system was in shambles. Soviet medical authorities acknowledged that the quality of medical care had deteriorated since the 1960s, with male life expectancy dropping. The Soviet Union was 51st in male life expectancy in the world, behind the Caribbean island of Barbados. Medical equipment was 1940s and 1950s vintage. "Soviet newspapers now write critically of dilapidated hospitals, corrupt and underpaid doctors who earn less than the average blue-collar worker, and nationwide shortages of antibiotics and other pharmaceuticals. . . ." ³⁹ Yet the USSR had over twice the number of physicians as the United States for a population only slightly larger. ⁴⁰

William Knaus served as a Foreign Service Medical Officer for the United States Information Agency in 1973–74. In his book, Inside Russian Medicine, he offers an appendix: "Taking Care of Yourself in the USSR—An Informal Guide for Tourists." He warns tourists to take two sets of prescription drugs in two separate suitcases. "There is no way for you to have a prescription filled in the USSR." ⁴¹ If you get a toothache, learn to live with it. "Most Soviet dental care is crude and done without anesthetics." If there is a problem with a loose filling, the Soviet dentist will probably just extract the tooth. ⁴²

What was the secret of Soviet medicine? It was free of charge—besplatno—to all citizens. You get what you pay for unless the State pays for it, and the Soviet State since 1917 was far more concerned about military expenditures than public health expenditures.

3. A Tale of Two States

Economist Victor Fuchs included a fascinating section in his book, Who Shall Live? He compares two United States western states that border each other, Utah and Nevada. Utah is the state where the Mormons live. Nevada is the state where everyone comes to gamble and 39. "Soviet health system deteriorating," Dallas Times Herald (Dec. 10, 1988).

40. Knaus, Inside Russian Medicine, p. 378.

41. Ibid., p. 362.

42. Ibid., p. 363.

see the floorshows with the famous entertainers and the infamous semi-nude showgirls. Infant mortality is about 40% higher in Nevada than in Utah.⁴³ It is the same throughout Nevada, and not just in the large cities. Statistically, infant mortality or survival is heavily dependent on the physical and emotional condition of the mother.

The death rates for children ages 1–19 is 16% higher for males in Nevada; it is 26% higher for females. Then the disparity increases: 44% (males) and 42% (females), ages 20–39. It climbs to an astounding discrepancy of 54% (males) and 69% (females), ages 40–49. Then it drops to 20% (males) and 6% (females), ages 70–79.⁴⁴ Fuchs analyzed the differences.

The two states are very much alike with respect to income, schooling, degree of urbanization, climate, and many other variables that are frequently thought to be the cause of variations in mortality. (In fact, average family income is actually higher in Nevada than in Utah.) The numbers of physicians and of hospital beds per capita are also similar in the two states.

What, then, explains these huge differences in death rates? The answer almost surely lies in the different life-styles of the residents of the two states. Utah is inhabited primarily by Mormons, whose influence is strong throughout the state. Devout Mormons do not use tobacco or alcohol and in general lead stable, quiet lives. Nevada, on the other hand, is a state with high rates of cigarette and alcohol consumption and very high rates of marital and geographical instability. The contrast with Utah in these respects is extraordinary.

In 1970, 63 percent of Utah's residents 20 years of age and over had been born in the state; in Nevada the comparable figure was only 10 percent; for persons 35–64 the figures were 64 percent in Utah and 8 percent in Nevada. Not only were there more than nine of ten Nevadans of middle age born elsewhere, but more than 60 percent were not even born in the west. . . .

The differences in marital status between the two states are also significant in view of the association between marital status and mortality. . . . More than 20 percent of Nevada's males ages 35–64 are single, widowed, divorced, or not living with their spouses. Of those who are married with spouse present, more than one-third had been previously widowed or divorced. In Utah the comparable figures are

43. Fuchs, Who Shall Live?, p. 52.

44. Idem.

only half as large.⁴⁵

After studying the data, Fuchs concluded that rising income in the United States will make only marginal improvements in life expectancy. The great strides in life expectancy had little to do with improved medical care until the 1930s, and then only for one decade. Today, it is heart disease, cancer, and other degenerative diseases that kill us. He saw no major gains in life expectancy ahead based on improvements in public health or medical technology. Effective medicine is widely distributed and widely available. Thus, he concluded, the greatest potential for improving the health of Americans is a change in their life-style: diet, smoking, drinking, marriage, and so forth. In short, the fundamental health issues are now ethical.

If he had defined ethics as covenantal, and if he had linked ethics to such matters as invention, capitalization, and the diffusion of technology to the masses, I would agree with him. Ethics has effects far beyond personal life-style. Covenant-keeping and covenant-breaking affect everything, including personal health.

F. Stagnation as Judgment

God's covenants are frequently familistic. So are His blessings: long life for honoring parents (Ex. 20:12), health for general obedience (Ex. 23:25), and large families (Ps. 127:5). Long-term stagnation—economically, demographically, intellectually—is a sign of God's displeasure. Growth must not be seen as inherently destructive. More than this: a static culture cannot survive. It has to change in order to survive. Population growth, like any kind of social growth, can be either a blessing or a curse (a prelude to disaster), depending on the character of the people who are experiencing the expansion. It is ethics, not growth as such, which determines the legitimacy or illegitimacy of any given social growth process in a particular period of history.

Greater numbers of people can and often do result in more efficient ways to fulfill the cultural mandate. The increasing division of labor permits greater specialization and greater output per unit of resource input.⁴⁶ Population growth is specifically stated to be a response of God to covenantal faithfulness, but it is also a tool of dominion.

45. Ibid., p. 53.

46. This does not mean that a growing population is always an economic blessing. Again, it is the ethical character of the people, not rates of biological reproduction, which determines the character of the growth process, either curse or blessing.

God's ethical universe is one of positive feedback: from victory unto victory. This ethical standard has visible effects in history. Ethical development, meaning progressive sanctification ("set-apartness") in terms of God's law, is eventually accompanied by the compound growth process, i.e., positive feedback, in human affairs.⁴⁷

1. Entropy and Its Effects

Negative feedback is a limiting factor in a cursed world. The animals are not allowed to multiply and overcome the land. They are restrained by man or by "the forces of nature," meaning the environment's built-in limitations on the compound growth process. Negative feedback is in part the product of God's curse. There are indeed limits to growth. Growth is not automatic. Growth is not a zero-price process. But negative feedback—sometimes characterized as the so-called "law of entropy"—is not the characteristic feature of the universe. The grace of God through faith in Jesus Christ is the characteristic feature of the universe: redemption, resurrection, and restoration.

Entropy is a fundamental principle of physical science that states that the movement of molecules tends to become increasingly random over time. Less and less usable energy is available to perform work as time goes on. When the idea of entropy—a scientific phenomenon of hypothetically autonomous physical nature—begins to turn the faith of a particular civilization toward pessimism about mankind's long-term future, then that civilization has come under the judgment of God.⁴⁸ It was lack of faith in the future which brought down the ancient city-states, including Rome. When classical civilization finally capitulated to the inherent pessimism of all cyclical history, nothing could save it.⁴⁹ Rome fell: to Christianity in the East (Byzantium), and to the barbarians in the West.

Negative feedback in one's personal life is not necessarily a sign of God's curse. Positive feedback in life is not necessarily a sign of God's grace. There are cases where righteous individuals are judged (Job, for instance). It all depends on one's ethical standing before God. God

47. North, Is the World Running Down?, chaps. 7, 8.

48. See, for example, the book by Marxist critic and New Age commentator Jeremy Rifkin, Entropy: A New World View (New York: Bantam, [1980] 1981). For a detailed refutation, see my book, Is the World Running Down?

49. Charles Norris Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture: A Study of Thought and Action from Augustus to Augustine (New York: Oxford University Press, [1944] 1957). (<http://bit.ly/cnccacc>). This was reprinted by the Liberty Fund.

sometimes “sets up” sinners for destruction—a kind of entrapment (the Pharaoh of the exodus, for instance). But generally, growth is a blessing, and contraction is a curse: “For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that [which] he hath” (Matt. 13:12). The general rule is growth for the godly and contraction for the ungodly. In neither case can people preserve the status quo.

2. Humanism, Paganism, and the Status Quo

A zero-growth philosophy is the product of humanism, both secular and occult. It is a philosophy of the status quo—the preservation of the society of Satan, as if he had not been dealt a mortal wound at Calvary, as if he were not on the defensive internationally against the leaven of Christ’s kingdom (Matt. 13:33). The universe is cursed; its resources are limited; but this reality is not evidence that favors a no-growth philosophy. The biblical doctrine of fallen man does not teach men to believe in a world that is cursed forever. Judgment and final restoration are coming. Time is bounded. Redeemed mankind must fulfill God’s dominion assignment, in time and on earth, before Jesus returns in final judgment.⁵⁰

Humanists and satanists wish to deny the sovereignty of God, and therefore virtually all of them affirm the sovereignty of the entropy process. They wish to escape the eternal judgment of God, so they affirm an impersonal finality for all biological life. Men have sometimes turned to a philosophy of historical cycles to help them avoid the testimony of God concerning linear history. Others have turned to the entropy process when they have adopted a Western version of linear history. They settle for slow decay rather than cycles. The goal is to escape the judgment of God. All of them prefer to avoid the truth: for covenant-breakers, the growth process will be cut short. A new downward cycle will triumph, they argue. Entropy will triumph. Anyway, something will triumph, but not the God of the Bible.

In the 1960s and 1970s, a new phenomenon hit the academic and intellectual world: defenders of no-growth economics.⁵¹ Prior to this, virtually all professional economists had been concerned with foster-

50. Perfect fulfillment is impossible because of sin, but it can be approached as an ethical limit.

51. The most prominent academic economist in the no-growth camp is E. J. Mishan: The Costs of Economic Growth (New York: Praeger, 1967); The Economic Growth Debate: An Assessment (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1977).

ing economic growth.⁵² This was part of an overall attack on growth in general.⁵³ Population growth was the primary target of these attacks.⁵⁴ From 1965 through 1976, governments had poured over a billion and a quarter dollars into programs promoting worldwide population control, and the Rockefeller Foundation and Ford Foundation added another $250 million.⁵⁵ All of this public concern over the population explosion was virtually an overnight phenomenon, beginning around 1965. All of it sprang from anti-Christian roots.⁵⁶

Rushdoony's comments on pagan antiquity's hostility to change is applicable to the zero-growth movement of the modern humanist world:

The pagan hatred of change was also a form of asceticism, and it is present in virtually all anti-Christianity. The hatred of change leads to attempts to stop change, to stop history, and to create an end-of-history civilization, a final order which will end mutability and give man an unchanging world. Part of this order involves also the scientific efforts to abolish death. This hatred of change is a hatred of creation, and of its movement in terms of God's purpose. Unlike the pagan and the humanist, the orthodox Christian is committed to a respect for creation.

This respect for creation gave roots to science in the Christian west. It is not an accident of history that science in other cultures has had a limited growth and a quick withering. . . . The pagan perspective is one of a fundamental disrespect for creation, for the universe. The central problems for the Hellenic mind were change and decay. . . .⁵⁷

52. Bert F. Hoselitz (ed.), Theories of Economic Growth (New York: Free Press, 1960). This book traces economic theories on growth back to the seventeenth century.

53. Dennis Meadows, et al., The Limits to Growth (New York: Universe Books, 1972). See also Mancur Olson and Hans H. Landsberg (eds.), The No-Growth Society (New York: Norton, 1973).

54. Paul Ehrlich, The Population Bomb (New York: Ballentine, 1968). This became a runaway best-seller. See also Gordon Rattray Taylor, The Biological Time Bomb (New York: World, 1968). These books are in contrast to an earlier, more restrained discussion of population issues: Philip M. Hauser, The Population Dilemma (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1963). Then came a Presidential commission report, Population and the American Future (New York: Signet, 1972), a popular paperback version of a government report. The story was the same: the danger of population growth.

55. Julian Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981), p. 293.

56. See my critique in Appendix B: "The Demographics of Decline." See also James A. Weber, Grow or Die! (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1977).

57. R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Coun-

The religion of zero growth is a religion of decay and delay. It proclaims inescapable decay, and offers a short-term social program of delaying the effects on society of this supposedly inescapable decay. The proper response to this religion is to point to God, whose law-order, through grace, offers redeemed man an escape hatch from entropy. The godly response is to promote long-term growth by means of a proclamation and enforcement of biblical law. We must proclaim dominion through long-term growth—a growth process that is the product of progressive ethical sanctification.

Christianity is not a religion of decay, but of life and progress. It is not a religion of delay, but of the return of Christ in judgment, after He has delivered up a developed earthly kingdom to God the Father (I Cor. 15:24), and has put all His enemies under His feet (I Cor. 15:25). Christianity is not a religion of entropy, either cosmic or social; it is a religion of progress, both cosmic and social.

We must not promote growth for its own sake. "Growth for the sake of growth is the ideology of the cancer cell," Edward Abbey once remarked. We are not to pursue the fruits of Christian faith; we are to pursue the roots. Through grace, we are to conform ourselves and our institutions to the requirements of biblical law. The result will be long-term growth. Growth is a reward for righteous living, not a goal to pursue at the expense of righteous living. But we must not be deluded into believing that the fruit of righteousness is zero growth. Far less are we to pursue zero growth as a way of life. Our obligation is to seek first the kingdom of God; all these other things will be added unto us (Matt. 6:33). Added—not subtracted, and not kept the same.

Conclusion

God brings His sanctions in history: cursings and blessings. He delegates to heads of families the authority to dispense positive sanctions to covenant-keeping children. The family unit is the heart of all economic growth, and therefore the head of the family, as the one who lawfully allocates the family's assets, is entitled to grant positive sanctions to those under his authority.

Church and state are not originally creative economically, but only corrective and protective ethically. The state provides the institutional framework of property ownership, which in turn affects economic productivity. The church declares God's ethical standards, and it provides access to the sacraments which alone make possible God's common grace in history. Without common grace, there could be no economic growth for pagans, and there would be a drastically reduced division of labor, which would also reduce the wealth of Christians.⁵⁸ Both church and State are dependent economically on the blessings of God and the productivity of private citizens because these covenant institutions serve both God and private citizens. They possess lawful authority as derived sovereignties—derived from God and man—which means that they must derive their direct economic support from those over whom they rule and therefore also serve. Their authority cannot be separated from their economic dependence on those over whom they exercise authority.

This is one reason why both the tithe and civil taxes are supposed to be proportional to the net output and therefore the net income of those under their jurisdiction. Civil and ecclesiastical judges are supposed to declare and enforce God's law, so that the whole society can prosper. They should be able to expand their income and influence only to the extent that they serve God and man in a covenantally faithful way. The visible manifestation of their success or failure in this task is the performance of the economy, including the ability of the economy to deliver effective medical services.

Dominion requires the mastery of every area of life in terms of God's revealed laws. This in turn requires faithful preaching of the comprehensive effects of God's redemption. Christ bought back everything when He sacrificed Himself. What dominion produces is order and growth, as well as orderly growth.

When God brings judgment on rebellious societies, He brings sickness, disorder, and economic stagnation. The modern no-growth humanists, including baptized humanists who call themselves Christians, are proclaiming a gospel of stagnation. They want order—a top-down, centrally planned order—but they do not want growth. The very complexity of a modern growing economy threatens their ability to promote a growing state-directed order.⁵⁹ Other critics of capitalism want decentralization, a “down on the farm” world of a minimal division of labor and zero growth.⁶⁰ Thus, their ideology is hostile to growth of most kinds.

58. North, Dominion and Common Grace, pp. 53, 58, 76, 245.

59. See the anti-population growth arguments of socialist Bertrand Russell, The Prospects of Industrial Civilization, 2nd ed. (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1959), p. 273. I have reproduced his arguments in the Conclusion to Chapter 1.

God says that such a view of His kingdom is evil, although it is an accurate view of Satan's kingdom. To promote a zero-growth philosophy is to promote historical stalemate—a stalemate between God's kingdom and Satan's, between growth and decay, between good and evil. Satan wants a stalemate if he cannot get a victory. Long-term economic growth is a product of God's grace in response to covenantal faithfulness, itself a gift from God. Long-term economic growth is therefore a denial of stalemated kingdoms. It is a demonstration of God's victory over Satan, creativity over destruction, ethics over power.

60. Art Gish, "Decentralist Economics," in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), Pt. III. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

GOD’S LIMITS ON SACRIFICE

And this is the offering which ye shall take of them; gold, and silver, and brass, And blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats’ hair, And rams’ skins dyed red, and badgers’ skins, and shittim wood, Oil for the light, spices for anointing oil, and for sweet incense, Onyx stones, and stones to be set in the ephod, and in the breastplate. And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them (Ex. 25:3–8).

And they spake unto Moses, saying, The people bring much more than enough for the service of the work, which the LORD commanded to make. And Moses gave commandment, and they caused it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, saying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the sanctuary. So the people were restrained from bringing. For the stuff they had was sufficient for all the work to make it, and too much (Ex. 36:5–7).

God is the Creator of the world. He therefore owns it: “The earth is the LORD’S, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein” (Ps. 24:1).¹ As the cosmic Owner, God demands a percentage of the profits from His subordinates. We are all sharecroppers in God’s world.

A. An Offering for the King

God is also the King of creation. Thus, as a reigning monarch, God is entitled to occasional public manifestations of loyalty from His people. At times of formal covenant renewal, His people are asked by God to bring offerings to Him. This is a continuing theme in the Bible. The word “offerings” appears 265 times in the King James Version.

1. Gary North, Confidence and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Psalms (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, 2012), ch. 5.

The word “offering” appears 724 times. “Sacrifice” appears 218 times.² When a man comes formally into the presence of God, he is expected to bring an offering.

God is present with His people at all times, but there are times of special covenantal presence with His people. There are also special times of God’s covenantal departure from His people. Both instances are times of judgment. This is why God’s presence is associated with peace offerings of various kinds. Man is not to come empty-handed into the presence of the King. A man who brings no offering or a cheap offering does not really expect judgment, either positive or negative. This was God’s warning to Israel through Malachi.

Ye have wearied the LORD with your words. Yet ye say, Wherein have we wearied him? When ye say, Every one that doeth evil is good in the sight of the LORD, and he delighteth in them; or, Where is the God of judgment? Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in: behold, he shall come, saith the LORD of hosts. But who may abide the day of his coming? And who shall stand when he appeareth? For he is like a refiner’s fire, and like fullers’ soap: And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the LORD an offering in righteousness. Then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the LORD, as in the days of old, and as in former years. And I will come near to you to judgment; and I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow, and the fatherless, and that turn aside the stranger from his right, and fear not me, saith the LORD of hosts. For I am the LORD, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed. Even from the days of your fathers ye are gone away from mine ordinances, and have not kept them. Return unto me, and I will return unto you, saith the LORD of hosts. But ye said, Wherein shall we return?

Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings. Ye are cursed with a curse: for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation. Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the LORD of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it. And I will rebuke the devourer for your sakes, and he shall not destroy the fruits of your ground; neither shall your vine cast her fruit before the time in the field, saith the LORD of hosts. And all nations shall call you blessed: for ye shall be a delightsome land, saith the LORD of hosts (Mal. 2:17–3:12).³

2. I am using the handy tallies provided by the Godspeed electronic Bible search program.

B. A Question of Subordination

God's intention is to gain loyalty from His subordinates. The visible sign of their continued subordination is their willingness to bring Him their tithes and offerings. But the ultimate offering is always ethical. "Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Mic. 6:7–8). The ultimate offering is man's own life: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (Rom. 12:1).⁴

In one sense, the sacrifices that men are required to bring are limited: the regular, disciplined tithe on all net increases. In another sense, the sacrifice is unlimited: a lifetime of perfect obedience. This points to the necessity of a substitute payment. Fallen man's gifts are insufficient to meet God's demands, and a man will destroy himself if he attempts to satisfy the perfect demands of God. No matter how hard he works, it is pointless. "But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away" (Isa. 64:6). Yet at the same time, God does demand this total sacrifice. There seems to be a contradiction here, but it is resolved in history by Jesus Christ's sacrifice on Calvary, the only offering that pleases God perfectly, once and for all.

But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us. For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh: How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God? And for this cause he is the mediator of the new testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance (Heb. 9:11–15).

3. Gary North, Restoration and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Prophets (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, 2012), ch. 33.

4. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on the Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Five Point Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 8.

The underlying ethical reason why God does not demand total sacrifice from men is that they do not have the means of placating His wrath or meeting His demands. So, He is gracious to man. He limits His demands on them as a testimony to His grace to them. He calls them to slow, steady, faithful, lifetime service, and He restrains their orgies of self-justifying sacrifice that cannot be sustained emotionally or economically over a lifetime. He announced this to Israel at the beginning of their journey in the wilderness.

C. Covenant Law, Covenant Presence

God brought Moses to Mt. Sinai in the third month after He had brought the Israelites out of the land of Egypt (Ex. 19:1). He first instructed Moses to deliver His commandments and the case-law applications of these Ten Commandments to the people, and these laws fill chapters 20–23 of the Book of Exodus. The Israelites affirmed their allegiance to these laws, promising their obedience (Ex. 24:3). To seal this covenantal promise, Moses then subjected them to a rite of covenant affirmation.

And Moses wrote all the words of the LORD, and rose up early in the morning, and builded an altar under the hill, and twelve pillars, according to the twelve tribes of Israel. And he sent young men of the children of Israel, which offered burnt offerings, and sacrificed peace offerings of oxen unto the LORD. And Moses took half of the blood, and put it in basins; and half of the blood he sprinkled on the altar. And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the LORD hath said will we do, and be obedient. And Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant, which the LORD hath made with you concerning all these words (Ex. 24:4–9).

1. Covenantal Stipulations

The ethical terms of this covenant are eternal and therefore still binding on all who desire to participate in God's covenant.⁵ Half the blood he sprinkled on the altar, and half on the people (Ex. 24:6–8). This bloody sacrifice made by Moses pointed to the necessity of the shedding of blood as the means of gaining God's protection, the same message that had been proclaimed ritually to the Hebrews by the blood on the doorposts on the night of the death of Egypt's firstborn.⁶

Again, God called Moses to return to the mountain. He told Moses that, once again, the people would be given His laws on tables of stone (Ex. 24:12). For six days, the glory of God shone on Mt. Sinai, and the cloud covered it. On the seventh day, God called out of the midst of the cloud to Moses, and Moses went into the cloud (Ex. 24:16–18). The symbolism should be obvious: God is transcendentally distant from man for six days, imaging the original week of creation; then He calls man into His glorious presence on the seventh day, the day of the Lord. The transcendent God brings man into His presence. The day of the Lord is the archetypal day of judgment.⁷

2. Recapitulating the Creation

Meredith Kline wrote that the history of the exodus, which culminates in the building of the tabernacle, is presented to us in such a way that it brings out its character as a redemptive re-enactment of creation.⁸ The building of the tabernacle was a microcosmic imitation of God's original creation week. Both were covenantal events, he said. There is a historical-literary parallelism between the original creation and the exodus re-creation.⁹ In this re-creation event, the tabernacle is important as a visible manifestation of God's transcendence and also His presence in His glory-cloud. The cloud hovers over Mt. Sinai and

5. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 2nd ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1977] 1984).

6. Gary North, "The Marriage Supper of the Lamb," Christianity and Civilization, 4 (1985). (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>)

7. Christians bring sacrifices to God each Sunday on the Lord's Day: tithes and offerings. This is fitting and proper. It is a day of judgment because it is a day of the Lord's presence. But rarely do churches celebrate the Lord's Supper weekly. Why not? The presence of the Lord was manifested at his regular required feasts in Israel. Why is this not also the case in New Testament times?

8. Meredith G. Kline, Images of the Spirit (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1980), p. 37.

9. Ibid., p. 39.

reproduces its likeness below. "At the foot of Sinai the tabernacle appears, made according to the archetypal pattern seen on the mount, designed to be a replica of the Glory-Spirit-temple."¹⁰

The earth-cosmos was made after the archetypal pattern of the Glory-Spirit referred to in Genesis 1:2 and accordingly is viewed in Scripture as a cosmic royal residence or temple.¹¹ Heaven and earth were established as a holy palace of the Creator-King, with the heaven of heavens in particular corresponding to the Glory-cloud as the seat of his sovereignty.

Then, preparing a place for the man-priest who was to be created, the Lord God produced in Eden a microcosmic version of his cosmic sanctuary. The garden planted there was holy ground with guardianship of its sanctity committed in turn to men and to cherubim.¹² It was the temple-garden of God,¹³ the place chosen by the Glory-Spirit who hovered over creation from the beginning to be the focal site of his throne-presence among men.¹⁴

The tabernacle would be God's place of residence within the nation of Israel. His transcendent glory, manifested in the glory-cloud, would reside in the tabernacle. Kline continued: "Thus, in producing the tabernacle as a symbolic image of his Glory-Spirit, the Creator Lord so designed it that it also recapitulated the macrocosmic and microcosmic versions of the Glory-temple which he fashioned in the original creation. And as God crowned the finished Genesis creation with his majestic Glory over Eden, so, when the tabernacle stood complete at Sinai, the Glory-cloud covered and filled it, sealing it as an authentic likeness of the Spirit-temple (Exod. 40:34ff.), the Alpha and Omega of all creation."¹⁵

The first instructions that God gave to Moses after his entrance into God's glory-cloud involved the plans of the proposed tabernacle. The plans for this structure were so detailed that the written account takes up more space in Exodus (chapters 25–28) than the laws that had just been delivered to the people. Then came the detailed instructions concerning the ceremonies to be conducted in the tabernacle (chapters 29–31). Nothing else is recorded about God's instructions to

10. Ibid., p. 37.

11. Rom. 13:14; I Cor. 15:53–54; II Cor. 5:2ff.; Gal. 3:27; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10.

12. Gen. 2:15; 3:24.

13. Isa. 51:3; Ezek. 28:13, 16, 31:9.

14. Ibid., pp. 35–36.

15. Ibid., p. 42.

Moses during the 40 days and nights that Moses spent with God on Mt. Sinai, except for God's warning to the Israelites to keep the sabbath (31:12–17).

D. Covenants and Sacrifice

The importance of sacrifice in all religion cannot be overemphasized. The sacrifices inaugurated by God in these chapters are contrasted with the sacrifice demanded by the Israelites during Moses' absence. Both paganism and orthodoxy require sacrifices from the faithful. Abel brought his sacrifice before God, and Cain brought his. God gave specific instructions to Moses concerning the kinds of sacrifices that He required, just as the people of Israel had instructed Aaron about the kind that their god required.

1. Recapitulating the Fall

The Israelites had "spoiled" the Egyptians before they left, taking with them gold and jewels that had belonged to their former masters. This had been God's gracious restoration to them of the lost capital that the Egyptians had extracted from them and their forefathers.¹⁶ These goods offered them a new beginning economically. To this extent, the exodus was a restoration of Eden.

In Eden, God had departed from Adam and Eve for a while. During his absence, they sinned. Moses also departed, climbing the mountain of God. During Moses' initial absence, the Israelites had insisted to Aaron that they be allowed to sacrifice a portion of this wealth in order to construct gods to go before them (Ex. 32:1). Aaron used their gold to construct a calf, and the people then attributed their victory over the Egyptians to these new gods that were represented by the calf (Ex. 32:8). They re-enacted the fall of man.

It is not surprising that the Hebrews turned to the sculpture of a bull when they sought to represent polytheistic power. The Apis bull was the single most important religious animal in Egypt. The birth and death of each Apis bull were recorded in Egyptian records as faithfully as the ritual ordination and death of each Pharaoh. In fact, only these events were important enough in the eyes of the Egyptians to maintain in official records, dynasty after dynasty.¹⁷ The Hebrews demonstrated by the construction of the calf that their world-and-life view was still dominated by the theology of Egypt. Though they had been delivered physically and geographically from Egypt, they had not yet been delivered spiritually. They still were under the influence of the religion of their former captors. They were still in spiritual bondage. For this reason, that first generation of the exodus did not enter the land of Canaan. They went out of Egypt, but they did not come into the promised land. They could not return to the sin-filled pseudo-garden of Egypt, just as Adam and Eve could not return to the garden. Yet they refused to go forward on God's terms, so they wandered until they died.

16. Chapter 6.

17. George Rawlinson, History of Ancient Egypt, 2 vols. (New York: John B. Alden, 1886), II, p. 2.

2. The Works of Man's Hand

They had cried out to Aaron, "Up, make us gods, which shall go before us" (Ex. 32:1b). Why did they choose to worship gods? The calf represented the polytheistic gods of Egypt. They preferred to worship the defeated gods of their captors rather than worship the victorious God of the exodus. Had they been disciples of power as such, they would have worshipped God, but the power religion necessarily is humanistic: it worships only those gods that manifest themselves through man and the works of man's hand. This kind of hand-crafted god, they recognized clearly, was not the God of the Bible, who had brought judgment on Egypt despite their continual complaints and fears. He was a God who did not need their assistance or their sacrifices in order to manifest His consummate power in history. This God was not yet visibly manifested in their midst, and they were unwilling to wait for His presence—a familiar biblical theme (I Sam. 13:8–14). They had Aaron build a calf as their representative before the gods.

The Hebrews were not naive. They did not believe that the calf had delivered them. They wanted to worship an object that was symbolic of the supernatural powers that they now claimed had delivered them from the bondage of Egypt, and which supposedly communicated with men through the medium of man-created idols. Pagan religion is not the worship of sticks and stones. It is the worship of powerful occult forces that do the bidding of men, if men worship them in a rigorously prescribed manner. Man manipulates his world by manipulating these occult forces. Even the English word manipulates testifies to the theology of idol worship: control is achieved manually, "by hand." This is the theology of magic: "As above, so below." Man believes that he can manipulate the creation in certain ways that force the gods of power to conform to his will. What he does on earth calls forth the man-directed power of the gods. The popular description of the occult voodoo religion is accurate: the person sticking pins into a doll. Sticking pins into a doll is a form of what is called sympathetic magic. What man does to the doll will then be reflected in what happens to the person who is represented by the doll. As below (pins in the doll), so above (power of the gods). As above (power of the gods), so below (the human victim suffers). Man calls down (or calls up) the gods to serve his purposes. He chooses ritual manipulation rather than covenantal faithfulness as his tool of dominion. This is also the theology of modern autonomous science.¹⁸

E. The Creator-Creature Distinction

“As above, so below” is not simply the basis of the power religion, both magic and science; it is also the basis of cause and effect in biblical religion. The error of power religion is to assume that the link is metaphysical rather than covenantal, that the link is based on a chain of being among the gods, man, and the creation.

18. Prior to the 1920s, Western scientists believed that the forces put into the service of man were strictly impersonal. A specially trained priesthood—pure scientists and technologists—was seen as the source of access to these generally unknown powers. The priesthood has not changed, but the theology has shifted. Something far closer to ancient magic now dominates modern thought. The sharp distinction between subject and object, between man and his environment, has become blurred. Simultaneously, man has become more impersonal, while the external world around us has become far more personal, a reflection of man, and even the creation of man. Does this mean that modern humanist thought teaches that it is actually man who creates the orderliness of nature? Increasingly, this is exactly what is being said. Timothy Ferris wrote of Sir Arthur Eddington, the brilliant British astronomer of the early twentieth century: “Eddington believed the laws of nature reside within our minds, are created not by the cosmos but by our perceptions of it, so that a visitor from another planet could deduce all our science simply by analyzing how our brains are wired. In Eddington’s view, we know physical laws a priori, as [Immanuel] Kant maintained, although where Kant conceived part of our a priori knowledge as inborn, Eddington felt it was derived from experience in observation and reasoning.” Ferris, The Red Limit: The Search for the Edge of the Universe (New York: William Morrow, 1977), p. 116. This is radical subjectivism, an obvious development of consistent humanism. See Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

1. A Legal Hierarchy

The Bible rejects all versions of the religion of the chain of being.¹⁹ The Creator-creature distinction is absolute. As Van Til says, "The entire Christian theistic position stands or falls with the concept of the nature of the relation of God to man."²⁰ "The idea of creation makes a distinction of being between God and man. Anyone holding to the idea of creation (we speak of temporal and not of logical creation) must also hold to the idea of a God who existed apart from the world and had meaning for himself apart from the world. . . . If theism is right, all things are at bottom two, and not one."²¹ God is not man, nor is God part of the creation.

The link between the two realms, natural and supernatural, is the covenant. Christ told the disciples to pray: "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven" (Matt. 6:10). The will of God, as revealed in His covenant law, is the standard of what should take place both above and below. Christ also told Peter, after Peter's confession of Jesus as the Son of God: "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. 16:19). It is the law of God which binds and looses; the keys of the kingdom are biblical law.²² Men in their capacity as ordained officers, as God's representative covenantal agents, declare His law and enforce it. The will of God, not the will of man, is absolute. This is why the Creator-creature distinction must be at the foundation of all Christian philosophy, for without it, the chain-of-being theology of autonomous man undermines the revelation of God to man and the law of God for man. As Van Til wrote:

The Christian position maintains that man, as a creature of God, naturally would have to inquire of God what is right and wrong. Originally God spoke to man directly and man could speak to God directly. Since the entrance of sin man has to speak to God mediately. He has now to learn from Scriptures what is the acceptable will of God for him. In opposition to this the non-Christian position holds that man

19. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), pp. 33–39. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

20. Cornelius Van Til, A Survey of Christian Epistemology, vol. II of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (den Dulk Foundation, 1969), p. 16.

21. Ibid., pp. 18, 19.

22. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 619.

does not need Scripture as a final authority. And this is maintained because the non-Christian does not believe that man ever needed to be absolutely obedient to God. Non-Christian ethics maintains that it is of the nature of the ethical life that man must, in the last analysis, decide for himself what is right and what is wrong.²³

2. Broken Tablets, Broken Covenant

Moses' dramatic response to the Hebrews' public demonstration of magical power religion—his response of symbolic ritual—was to break the stone tablets that had been delivered to him by God. These inscribed tablets were not the product of man's hand. God, not Moses, had written His ten laws on the tablets (Ex. 31:18). These laws set forth the basis of God's cooperation with man, a set of ethical principles rather than prescribed rituals. The ethical bond was based on a personal covenant between God and His people, a law-covenant. Moses destroyed the tablets as a ritual response to the people because they had broken the ethical covenant (Ex. 19) by their rebellious ritual response to God. They had chosen to worship a god of their own hands. Moses demonstrated ritually what this really meant: their breaking of the covenant of God the Cosmic Potter, who makes man as a potter forms the clay. They were not willing to acknowledge, as Isaiah later acknowledged: "But now, O LORD, thou art our father; we are the clay, and thou our potter; and we all are the work of thy hand" (Isa. 64:8). God then smashes the rebellious clay in judgment: "Behold, ye are of nothing, and your work of nought: an abomination is he that chooseth you. I have raised up one from the north, and he shall come: from the rising of the sun shall he call upon my name: and he shall come upon princes as upon mortar, and as the potter treadeth the clay" (Isa. 41:24–5).

To dramatize the inevitable judgment of God, Moses then conducted another ritual—from a strictly economic standpoint, probably the most graphic ritual ever recorded in the Bible. He burned the calf in the fire, smashed its remains to powder, put the powder in water, and then commanded the people to drink the water (32:20).²⁴ Biological processes then took over to produce the final, graphic, and memorable ritual disposal of the religious symbol that had consumed so much of their capital. They saw their capital go down the proverbial drain.

23. Cornelius Van Til, Christian Theistic Ethics, vol. III of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1980), p. 33.

24. This was equivalent to the ordeal of jealousy which was required in the Old Testament when a husband brought a charge of adultery against his wife (Num. 5:11–31).

The people had demanded the right to sacrifice part of their wealth to the god of their own hands. The calf had been made quickly by amateur craftsmen working under Aaron, and had been put into immediate service. They sacrificed joyfully, participating in sexual debauchery (Ex. 32:25) as a religious affirmation of their faithfulness to the gods of the chaos festival, the gods of cosmic renewal through ritual lawlessness.²⁵ These were the gods that were familiar to them, polytheistic gods like those of Egypt, from which they had been delivered, and also like those of Canaan, which they believed was about to be delivered into their hands. Here were gods that demanded sacrifice and ritual, but not ethical regeneration. Here were gods of their hearts and hands.

3. Pyramid and Tabernacle

In contrast to the calf that had been crafted by amateurs, with its religion of professional debauchery, God's tabernacle was detailed and magnificent, yet portable. It moved with the people because God moved before the people, guiding them. To build it, the people had to dig deeply once again into what remained of their treasure. It was to be a voluntary sacrifice. They responded enthusiastically (Ex. 35:21–22, 29). The craftswomen contributed the best that they had (35:25–26). Bezaleel, a craftsman, was given special knowledge from God to master the arts (35:31), as well as a special gift of teaching (35:34). He and Aholiab, who also had been given the gift of teaching, became the contractors who directed the building of the tabernacle (35:30–34). God imparted special skills to those who assisted them (35:35). The people brought in their offerings daily (36:3). In fact, they continued to bring in so much that there was an overflow of materials (36:5). Moses had to tell them to cease their labors and to stop bringing in their handicrafts (36:6–7).

A very different structure is the Cheops pyramid of Giza in Egypt. It remains an architectural and technological wonder. It is the last surviving edifice of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Scholars have studied it in great detail. There is even a school of arcane knowledge called “pyramidology,” which attempts to find in its dimensions prophetic truths.²⁶

25. Roger Caillois, Man and the Sacred (Glencoe, Illinois: The Free Press, 1959), p. 164. Cf. Thorkild Jacobsen, "Mesopotamia: The Function of the State," in H. and H. A. Frankfort, et al., The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man: An Essay on Speculative Thought in the Ancient Near East (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1946] 1977), pp. 198–201.

No one knows how it was built, but the usual estimate is that 100,000 slaves and 40,000 skilled craftsmen had to work on it for 20 years.²⁷ Not only is the pyramid a technological wonder—we still have no clear idea of how it was built—it is a mathematical wonder. This has been recognized by Western scholars for over a century. John Taylor, editor of the London Observer, and a gifted mathematician, began playing with the measurements of the Great pyramid reported by Col. Richard Howard-Vyse. This was in the 1850s. Taylor asked why only this pyramid had the angle of 51 degrees and 51 minutes. He found that each of the Pyramid's four faces had the area of the square of its height.²⁸ No other pyramid was so constructed. Then he discovered that if he divided the perimeter of the Pyramid by twice its height, it gave him a quotient of 3.144, which is very close to π : 3.14159+. Peter Tomkins remarked in a footnote that not until the sixth century A.D. was π correctly worked out to the fourth decimal point by a Hindu scholar, Arya-Bhata.²⁹

This was only the beginning. He concluded that the pyramid was a representation of the earth, with the perimeter as the circumference at the equator and the height as the distance from the earth's center to the pole. But what unit of measurement could they have used? He looked for a unit that would retain the π proportion and fit the pyramid in whole numbers.

When he came to 366.1165 he was struck by the similarity of 366 to the number of days in the year and wondered if the Egyptians might have intentionally divided the perimeter of the Pyramid into units of the solar year.

He then noticed that if he converted the perimeter into inches, it came very nearly to 100 times 366. Also he was surprised to see that

26. How it supposedly can do this by means of different measuring systems is indeed a wonder.

27. Peter Tomkins, Secrets of the Great Pyramid (New York: Harper Colophon, [1971] 1978), pp. 227–28. The figure of 20 years comes from Herodotus.

28. This fact later led to the discovery that the Pyramid was designed to incorporate not only π but also the so-called Golden Section, or ϕ , or 1.618. $\phi + 1 = \phi^2$ square. Also, $1 + 1/\phi$ leads to the additive series known as the Fibonacci series. Ibid., pp. 190, 192. They had also figured out the relation between π and ϕ : $\pi = \phi \times 6/5$. Ibid., p. 194.

29. Ibid., p. 71n.

if he divided the base by 25 inches, he obtained the same 366 result. Could the ancient Egyptians have used a unit so close to the British inch? And a cubit of 25 such inches?³⁰

At the same time, the famed astronomer Sir John Herschel had postulated a unit of measurement half a hair's breadth longer than a British inch as the only sensible earth-commensurable unit based on the actual size of the earth. He was critical of the French meter derived from a curved meridian of the earth because of its erratic and variable nature from country to country because the earth is not a true sphere. Each meridian of longitude would be different. (One wonders if this may have been a bit of intellectual British imperialism, a reaction against the revolutionary French with their far more easily computed units of tenths, hundredths, and thousandths.) Herschel argued that the only reliable basis of a standard of measure is the polar axis of the earth—a straight line from pole to pole—which a recent British ordinance survey had set at 7898.78 miles, or 500,500,000 British inches, or an even 500 million inches if the unit was half a hair's breadth longer.³¹ (Do we all have equally wide hairs?)

So what? Fifty of such modified inches would make a yard exactly one ten-millionth of the polar axis, and half that measure would make a useful cubit. This was the unit that Taylor had found to fit the Pyramid in multiples of 366. "To Taylor the inference was clear: the ancient Egyptians must have had a system of measurements based on the true spherical dimensions of the planet, which used a unit which was within a thousandth part of being equal to a British inch."³²

These studies were followed by Charles Piazzzi Smyth, the Astronomer Royal of Scotland, who went to Egypt, made many detailed measurements, and concluded that the Egyptians had computed pi down to 3.14159.³³

Studies by British engineer David Davidson in the 1920s and 1930s revealed that the Pyramid measures all three types of the calendar year: solar, sidereal (star), and anomalistic (orbital-perihelion).³⁴

The base of the Pyramid corresponds to the distance the earth rotates in half a second at the equator.³⁵

30. Ibid., p. 72.

31. Ibid., p. 73.

32. Ibid., p. 74.

33. Ibid., p. 90.

34. Ibid., p. 111.

35. Ibid., p. 210.

The priests could have measured the length of the solar year within a minute, or four points of a decimal.³⁶

I could go on, but it is not necessary. The Egyptian priests and architects were masters of mathematics and geography to a degree unknown in the textbooks. Why did they go to such an effort in building the Cheops pyramid? Because the Cheops pyramid served them well. It was a measuring device as well as a symbol of their mastery of science. But it no doubt also served them as a giant talisman. It was a microcosm of the earth. Magic proclaims: "As above, so below." Here was a device for initiations, for manipulating the world.

In contrast to the pyramid stands—although it no longer stands—the tabernacle, and later the temple. The tabernacle did not rely on sophisticated measurements to put man in contact with cosmic forces. God's law did that, written on tablets at the center of the tabernacle and therefore at the center of society. God's presence with men was not based on their ability to reproduce His world in a model. His presence or absence was established by their covenantal faithfulness. It was the law that was crucial, not measurements in stone. It was man's heart of stone that was his problem, not the design of the tabernacle. The temple no longer stands because God destroyed it when it no longer served His covenantal purposes. He would not tolerate those who treated His temple as a talisman.

Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, Amend your ways and your doings, and I will cause you to dwell in this place. Trust ye not in lying words, saying, The temple of the LORD, The temple of the LORD, The temple of the LORD, are these. For if ye thoroughly amend your ways and your doings; if ye thoroughly execute judgment between a man and his neighbour; If ye oppress not the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, and shed not innocent blood in this place, neither walk after other gods to your hurt: Then will I cause you to dwell in this place, in the land that I gave to your fathers, for ever and ever (Jer. 7:3–7).

The Renaissance, with its fatal attraction to magic, misunderstood this. Frances Yates, who more than anyone else has opened this academically closed door of the Renaissance,³⁷ noted that Isaac Newton, a dedicated alchemist, was fascinated with Solomon's temple. She said that he was "determined to unravel the exact plan and proportions of the Temple of Solomon. This was another Renaissance interest; the plan of the temple, laid down by God himself, was believed to reflect the divine plan of the universe. For Renaissance scholars, the theory of classical architecture was believed to derive from the Temple and, like it, to reflect the world in human proportions."³⁸ Newton even sketched the temple's dimensions.³⁹

36. Ibid., p. 161.

37. Frances A. Yates, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (New York: Vintage, [1964] 1969).

The Renaissance was treating the temple as if it were the Great Pyramid. It was not. The religion of the Bible is covenantal and ethical, not metaphysical and magical. God is not to be manipulated; He is to be obeyed.

F. Man's Need of Limits

Limits were placed by God on their sacrifices. Moses did not ask them to bring in all of their capital in a wave of sacrificial giving, despite their sin in building the calf. Their giving was voluntary, meaning beyond the mandatory tithe. These were what Protestants call "gifts and offerings." So powerful was the motivation for sacrificial giving that the people had to be restrained. They were not to make the same mistake again: believing that the work of their hands could save them from the wrath of God, believing that the greater their giving, the less the wrath. Furthermore, they were to preserve capital for future productive uses.

1. Sacrificing to Gods

Men need to sacrifice to their gods. They insist on it. Their sacrifice links them to a source of power. But God warns men that He is not so concerned about men's material sacrifices; instead, He is concerned about justice, humility, and mercy (Deut. 10:12; I Sam. 15:22; Micah 6:8). He desires the sacrifice of a contrite heart: "For thou desirest not sacrifice; else would I give it: thou delightest not in burnt offering. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise" (Ps. 51:16–17). Only on these terms are burnt offerings acceptable to God. God grants wealth and power, not in terms of ritualistic precision, but in terms of conformity to an ethical law-order (Deut. 8). Righteousness is more important than ritual (II

38. Frances A. Yates, Ideas and Ideals in the North European Renaissance, vol. III of Collected Essays, 3 vols. (London: Methuen, 1984), p. 270.

39. Frank E. Manuel, Isaac Newton, Historian (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1963), plate facing p. 148.

Chron. 30:13–20).

Early Protestantism, especially Puritan and Anabaptist Protestantism, criticized the cathedral builders. They argued that the money spent on cathedrals should have been given to the poor, or used for other purposes. As it has turned out historically, the great cathedrals have become tourist attractions, as the Christian faith of the public has waned. But these magnificent structures still stand as testimonies to the dedication, skill, and sacrifices of men for their God. The cathedrals reflect the builders' and worshippers' conception of the authority and majesty of God. The long-run perspective of the builders is still evident: they expected their work to survive. They expected it to glorify God for centuries. This long-run perspective is an important aspect of serious Christian faith. Men's time perspective is reflected in their architecture.⁴⁰ So is their view of God.⁴¹

2. Sacrificing to the State

Modern man worships the political order as the source of power and meaning. He shares this perspective with ancient man, both classical and Near Eastern.⁴² Throughout the West, since the days of World War I, men have willingly sacrificed their capital, their lives, and their futures to the messianic state, whether democratic, fascist, or Communist. Like God, the State loves a cheerful giver. Unlike God, the statist managers do not tell the people to cease sacrificing when they have given too much. God limits the sacrifices that men are required to offer to any human, earthly institution. God, not institutions, is wholly sovereign. The sacrifice of Jesus Christ was the only sacrifice sufficient to meet God's ethical requirements. Man and his institutions are limited. But the modern salvationist political order places no limits on

40. The cathedral becomes a pyramid rather than a home for God if the faith of the builders has been transferred to another god. The cathedrals of Europe have become tourist attractions. The enormous, unfinished Episcopalian pyramid, the Church of St. John the Divine, is still being built in New York City after a century of labor and fundraising. Meanwhile, the Harlem ghetto has moved almost to its borders, and it is unsafe to visit it at night.

41. Little that is orthodox remains in today's mainline Anglican and Roman Catholic churches, even in their liturgies, although there are pockets of orthodoxy. Nevertheless, their cathedrals have survived. What visible token remains of Cromwell's reign? A creed: the Westminster Confession of Faith. Almost nothing visible remains of Puritanism; its legacy was almost entirely ideological and theological.

42. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), chaps. 3–5. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>) men's sacrifices, for it places no limits on its own sovereignty.

The universal grumbling about taxes that has shaken the revenue structures of every Western, industrial nation since 1970 (or earlier, in the case of European nations) indicates that men are increasingly distrustful about their god, the modern state. A growing tax revolt indicates that a shift in faith is in progress. Socialist humanism is cracking under the strain of increased spending on poverty programs and military hardware, as well as high unemployment and slower economic growth. The old statist faith is dying. Middle-class voters are at long last becoming aware that they have become the sacrificial lambs, not the elusive rich they sought for three or four generations to sacrifice on the altar of envy. They are still humanists, and their faith in individualism is inconsistent, but the ideological pendulum has unquestionably shifted away from the almost unquestioned monotheism of the State toward the mixed polytheism of hedonistic individualism and compulsory retirement subsidies.

Conclusion

Men want to sacrifice to something or some power higher than themselves. This act of sacrifice re-establishes their faith in some sort of cosmic order. The modern world has generally abandoned faith in a cosmic order, but it has affirmed faith in a man-directed earthly order. Thus, the most powerful agency of man, the state, has become the focus of modern man's sacrifice.

Man worships the creation of his own hands, just as Israel did in the wilderness rebellion. Men believe that they must sacrifice to mankind. Some men do this for profit by serving consumers on a free market. Others serve the state. Others serve some other human institution. But the point is, they attempt to offer themselves as a living sacrifice (Rom. 12:1) to the gods of their choice.

God limits such sacrifice. A person is supposed to present himself as a living sacrifice to God, for God owns him and everything else (Ps. 50:10).⁴³ He owes God everything. In baptism, man places himself and everything he owns at God's disposal. But then God returns 90% of whatever is offered. He keeps the tithe as a symbolic token of man's subordination. This is offered to Him through His monopolistic covenantal institution, the church. God limits men's required sacrifices. Men in general cannot be trusted to make such sacrifices, for they make them only to gods of their own hands and imaginations. Thus, God's Old Testament law of sacrifice required only the tithe and three feasts. Today, God requires only the tithe.

43. North, Confidence and Dominion, ch. 10.

Those who deny this formal limit have two motives: (1) to place man under unbearable guilt for not having given enough—"the better to control you with, my dear"—and (2) to escape the sense of personal guilt when they fail to pay what they owe. By refusing to honor the tithe as a minimum required sacrifice, antinomians place man under an open-ended maximum. This is a denial of man's fallen condition. It is also a denial of man's creaturehood. It is a re-enactment of the golden calf incident.

Men are growing weary of the economics of perpetual sacrifice to the State at payment levels far above anything God has required. Today, all men pay at least 40% of their income to various branches of civil government—double the extraction imposed by ancient Egypt (Gen. 47:24–26), the most bureaucratic tyranny of the ancient world. But men must believe in a god, a source of power and meaning. They need to sacrifice to a god. What will they sacrifice next? And to which god? The answers to these two questions will determine the next phase of the history of Western civilization.

THE ECONOMICS OF THE TABERNACLE

And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them. Accordingly to all that I shew thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it (Ex. 25:8–9).

The theocentric focus of this passage is God, the sanctions-bringer: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹

God had promised to provide Israel with a sanctuary, the land of Canaan. This sanctuary would be both geographical and covenantal, an identifiable location where His covenant would be the law of the land. God first required them to build Him a place to serve as His personal sanctuary, which would be physical, transportable, and covenantal. In this tabernacle, God would meet with them in judgment. He would reward or curse them. Without covenant renewal, they could not expect to gain His blessing, yet with covenant renewal, they risked His wrath.

The tabernacle has been a familiar sermon topic for over a century in American fundamentalist circles. This theme allows a preacher to fulfill his annual quota of Old Testament messages without ever coming to grips with the comprehensive ethical and social requirements of Old Testament law. The tabernacle offers seemingly endless opportunities for allegorizing, spiritualizing, internalizing, and discovering secret meanings—all pointing to “great prophetic truths.” The tabernacle is a popular sermon topic, but only to the extent that the specific applications of the sermon’s message can be reduced to cultural irrelevance in New Testament times.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God’s Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

A. The Tabernacle as the Place of Judgment

What preachers seldom mention is that the tabernacle was a place where the people came to God to receive judgment: blessing or cursing. God's judgment was handed down in terms of the people's covenantal faithfulness to the revealed Bible-laws of God. Three times a year the citizens of Israel were required to come before God and offer sacrifices (Ex. 23:14–19). This meant that they had to face God in judgment, as individuals and as a nation. The tabernacle was God's place of judgment and sanctions in history. To preach on the tabernacle is therefore risky business, for it leads straight to the doctrine of the covenant, with its five doctrines that so alienate modern evangelicalism: the absolute sovereignty of a predestinating God; the three hierarchical appeals courts: church, state, and family; the Bible-revealed law of God that is supposed to govern the decisions of the judges of all three courts; God's sanctions in history; and the disinheritation of covenant-breakers and the inheritance of covenant-keepers in history. This also raises the question of the Lord's Supper as the church's covenant-renewing event that brings people into the presence of God to receive His judgments in history.²

1. Tabernacle Sermons

The goal of modern sermons on the tabernacle is to make judicially irrelevant everything associated with the tabernacle in New Testament times. The discontinuity of the cross has supposedly made the tabernacle irrelevant today. As a building, this is unquestionably true, but this was true in Moses' day, too. The building was symbolic; what it symbolized was crucial. What it symbolized was Jesus Christ as the coming Judge in history. "But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us" (Heb. 9:11–12). Thus, every sermon on the tabernacle is supposed to point to the relevance of Christ as Judge today.

Judgments in New Testament history? Ethical cause and effect in New Testament history? Covenantal sanctions in New Testament history? The authority of biblical law in New Testament history? Such thoughts are not pleasant to shepherds who have denied all of this throughout their careers. They have dedicated their lives to the principle that Old Covenant history, with all its visible judgments, no longer operates today. The tabernacle is supposed to become a principle of the church's cultural irrelevance today, for ours is a world supposedly devoid of visible judgments based on covenantal cause and effect.

2. Ibid., pp. 304–13.

2. Kline as the Archetype

Professor Meredith Kline was representative of this ethereal approach to the tabernacle. Unlike the average pastor, he had the footnotes to prove that he had studied the tabernacle in depth, which he displayed in his book Images of the Spirit (1980). Even earlier, in his Structure of Biblical Authority (1975), he argued that there is an architectural aspect of the Bible. The building of God's house, he said, "comes to the fore in the Book of Exodus." House-building is also a familiar theme in the Canaanitic epic poem, Enuna Elish, he added.³ First, God structured the people of Israel into His house by means of His covenant words spoken at Mt. Sinai. Then God told them to build Him a house. "Though a more literal house than the living house of Israel, the tabernacle-house was designed to function as symbolical of the other; the kingdom-people house was the true residence of God (a concept more fully explored and spiritualized in the New Testament)."⁴ Spiritualized indeed!

Kline devoted his academic career to two primary tasks: (1) exploring in great detail the covenantal evidence and implications in the Old Testament; and (2) doing whatever possible to persuade his readers that God has abandoned these implications in the New Testament.⁵ He insisted that any New Testament connection between visible blessings and covenant-keeping is, humanly speaking, random. "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways."⁶ Largely un-

3. Meredith G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1975), p. 79.

4. Ibid., p. 80.

5. Sutton, That You May Prosper, Appendix 7: "Meredith G. Kline: Yes and No."

6. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological predictable? Dr. Kline obviously never considered just why it is that life insurance premiums and health insurance premiums are cheaper in Christianity-influenced societies than in pagan societies. Apparently, the blessings of long life that are promised in the Bible are sufficiently non-random and predictable that statisticians who advise insurance companies can detect statistically relevant differences between societies.

Kline was arguing that the testimony of God's covenant law and covenant sanctions in history was scrapped by God after Christ's resurrection from the dead. The visible sanctions of God do not operate in New Testament times. Ethical cause and effect in today's culture is random. Christianity is therefore culturally irrelevant and progressively impotent. The fact is, Kline's assertion that visible events are covenantally random is a smokescreen that covers up his pessimistic eschatological views. What he really believed was that things will get worse for the church as time goes on. Ethical cause and effect in New Testament history is not merely random; it is positively perverse. This conclusion is basic to Kline's amillennial eschatology.⁷ Once again, we see that eschatological neutrality is impossible.

It should be clear that the tabernacle was not culturally irrelevant or impotent in its day. It was basic to the religious life of Israel for almost half a millennium, until Solomon built the temple, 480 years after the Hebrews came out of Egypt (I Kings 6:1). The tabernacle was the resting place of the Ark of the Covenant, which contained the tablets of the law (Ex. 25:10–22). God appeared at the tabernacle in the form of a cloud-pillar (Ex. 33:9–10; Num. 12:5; Deut. 31:15). The tabernacle was filled with gold, silver, jewels, and the finest artistic accomplishments of the people. It symbolized the majesty of the supernatural King who was in their midst.⁸

B. A Symbol of Covenantal Continuity

These pilgrims in the wilderness were given a symbol of the presence of God—a fundamental aspect of the biblical covenant.⁹ They had a stake in a covenantal society. The tabernacle gave them a place of

Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

7. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

8. Meredith G. Kline, Images of the Spirit (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1980), pp. 35–42.

9. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 1.

sacrifice. God is master of the universe, and men must acknowledge their subordination to Him through sacrifice.¹⁰ The animal sacrifices would take place at a particular place. The tabernacle could therefore serve as a focus for the community's sense of order and permanence. The tribes would be drawn together, overcoming the potential fragmentation of tribal society.

1. Symbol of Permanence

The tabernacle was also a symbol of permanence, but only for as long as they honored the ethical terms of the covenant. While the building itself was portable, the ornaments were permanent and could be used by future generations in the promised land. The very portability of the tabernacle testified against the quest for man-made permanence—the kind of hoped-for stability that was reflected in Egypt's pyramids. *Permanence is ultimately covenantal, and therefore is governed by the ethical terms of the covenant.*¹¹ Permanence is mythical unless it is God-centered.

The tabernacle was evidence that they were pilgrims—people journeying toward a final destination—rather than nomads wandering in a circle. The Israelites never were nomads. Liberal theologians often refuse to accept this. The oft-repeated claim by liberal theologians that the Israelites were nomads is basic to most liberal studies of ancient Israel. Typical is Hans Jochen Boecker's statement: "The Israelites came basically from the eastern or southeastern and southern steppe countries and penetrated the cultivated areas of Palestine. They were not originally inhabitants of cultivated land; they were nomads, and their legal arrangements were typical of nomads."¹² He offered no evidence of these nomadic legal arrangements, for no such evidence exists. He went on to say that "Unlike the CH [Code Hammurabi], for example, the OT laws are still strongly marked by the nomadic view of property, which is characterised by being centered on the group rather than on the individual and so pays less attention to the property of the individual."¹³ The less intelligent liberal can then defend his antinomian rejection of Old Testament law by saying that Israel's law was nomad-

10. Ibid., ch. 2.

11. Ibid., ch. 3.

12. Hans Jochen Boecker, Law and the Administration of Justice in the Old Testament and Ancient East, trans. Jeremy Moiser (Minneapolis, Minnesota: Augsburg, [1976] 1980), p. 28.

13. Ibid., p. 167.

ic, having nothing to do with the modern world. The more clever liberal is less direct in his defense of antinomianism. He can argue that the non-nomadic character of biblical law testifies to a much later date of the authorship of the Pentateuch, thereby denying the Mosaic authorship and calling into question the continuing authority of everything in it, including the law.¹⁴

2. An Eschatology of Victory

The people's economic contributions in constructing the tabernacle served as a ritual means for them to testify to an eschatology of victory. First, their craftsmanship was an affirmation of permanence. Second, their labor on the tabernacle was an affirmation of history. Each man's contribution would be seen by later generations and be appreciated, so long as the community retained its covenantal faithfulness to God. Those who would come later would look back and be thankful to those who had gone before. Finally, the tabernacle would replace the places of worship in the various cities of Canaan. The Canaanites would surely be defeated—an affirmation of the coming military conquest of Canaan. God would bring judgment against their enemies. This pointed to God as cosmic Judge, the fourth aspect of the biblical covenant.¹⁵

The tabernacle was important in reinforcing the doctrine of the covenant. This covenant joined the tribes together into one people. The covenant also extended through time, linking the fathers in the wilderness with the sons who would occupy the promised land. The covenant meant continuity over time, point five of the biblical covenant,¹⁶ and the tabernacle symbolized this future-orientation.

The importance of symbols for society should not be disregarded. Symbols will always exist; the issue is not "symbols vs. no symbols"; rather it is a question of which symbols and whose symbols. Symbols are an inescapable concept, whether linguistic, musical, architectural, 14. Boecker cited Max Weber and a 1927 book by A. Jepsen, both of whom denied any significant nomadic influence in Old Testament law. Ibid., pp. 141–43. Boecker never clearly stated which view of "Israelite nomadism" he held, pro or con, which is typical of someone who has read far more than he can digest intellectually—to the extent that liberal Old Testament studies can be digested intellectually at all. Generally, they are fit only for ingestion and rapid regurgitation in doctoral dissertations and journal articles. It never ceases to amaze me how readily liberal theologians return to their regurgitations.

15. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

16. Ibid., ch. 5.

or whatever. Men need to sacrifice something of value in order to affirm their deeply felt commitments. Men do not choose wedding rings made of iron or brass to give to their wives. If they are committed to orthodox worship, they should prefer beautiful buildings to churches that resemble large shoe boxes.

C. Architecture and Culture

Architecture is closely linked to culture. The tabernacle revealed the centrality of the covenant in Hebrew culture. It was in terms of their confidence in this covenant that they subsequently constructed the other institutions of godly culture. The Israelites began with the tabernacle, for it was the place of God's special judicial presence.

In New Testament times, there is no need to build just one majestic structure as a central point of cultural focus. Ever since the time of Christ's resurrection, the law has been written on the hearts of the faithful (Heb. 8:10; 10:16–18). People no longer need to journey to Jerusalem in order to worship; they worship the Father in spirit and in truth (John 4:23). The law is not written on stone tablets, nor do copies rest in the Ark of the Covenant. There has been a permanent decentralization of authority, worship, and culture in New Testament times.

1. Protestant Decentralization

This requirement of ecclesiastical decentralization in the New Testament era was recognized by Protestants of the sixteenth century, but they did not fully comprehend the importance of the tabernacle principle for the emotional and spiritual life of the families that built churches in local communities. They did not understand how fundamental to every culture is an economics of sacrifice. Men need to affirm and symbolize the permanence of their religious vision of the present and its links to the future.

One of the problems with Protestant architecture during the Reformation was the denial by Protestant leaders of the legitimacy of the cathedrals of Europe. The reformers often displayed a self-conscious rejection of the legitimacy of architectural beauty and community economic sacrifice. The drab surroundings of the Protestant churches, especially in the seventeenth century, denied the eschatology of victory held by many of them. The need for sacrifice was sublimated and transferred to business concerns, charity, and affairs external to the affairs of the institutional churches. This led to historically unprecedented economic growth, but also to social and political instability. The brief reign of Oliver Cromwell, after all, was followed by the restoration to the English throne of Charles II, not by some Puritan republic. Economic growth continued to disrupt traditional social class relationships in Puritan New England.¹⁷

The economic and geographical mobility of modern capitalist society has also worked against the classical ideal of aesthetic permanence. A cathedral is very expensive. If it is constructed in a central city, it will soon find itself surrounded by very a different economic and social environment. A cathedral could be constructed in some distant rural region, but that would not serve the needs of worshippers. Any site within a two-hours' drive or train ride from a central city could become surrounded by urban decay within two generations.¹⁸ In this sense, the modern world has become a tabernacle society rather than a temple society. Cathedrals are not designed, as the tabernacle was, as a prefabricated mobile construction project.

2. Regional Splendor

The church is both local and international. It is tied to local historical circumstances at any stage in history, yet it is always international because it is linked to eternity. There is a tendency within Protestantism to ignore the international and eternal aspects of the church. Protestant pastors often enjoy building large, fancy places of worship, for these testify to the influence of the pastor as a builder. Seldom do these churches reflect long-lasting architectural standards. Architects display little concern with architectural manifestations of the church as a force to be reckoned with over long periods of time at every level of society. Too often the architects selected by churches are deeply humanistic and governed by aesthetic standards that are openly rebellious against beauty. They are committed to an architecture of self-conscious ugliness.¹⁹ Beauty is far more objective than something in the

17. Gary North, "From Medieval Economics to Indecisive Pietism: Second-Generation Preaching in New England, 1661–1690," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VI (Summer 1979), pp. 144–50: "Status and Social Mobility." North, "From Covenant to Contract: Pietism and Secularism in Puritan New England, 1691–1720," ibid., VI (Winter 1979–80), pp. 175–77. For a summary, see Gary North, Puritan Economic Experiments (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), pp. 50–54. (<http://bit.ly/gnpuritan>)

18. This is exactly what happened to the most grandiose of all American cathedral projects, the Episcopalians' Church of St. John the Divine in New York City.

19. Tom Wolfe, From Bauhaus to Our House (New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, eye of the human beholder; beauty is in the eye of the Cosmic Beholder. Architects symbolically deny the Cosmic Beholder by rebelling against all permanent standards of beauty.

Because of the fragmenting of religious denominations, the economic resources necessary for constructing great cathedral and not appear in the twentieth century. The large mainline denominations that might have been able to afford to build them no longer bothered. Central denominational bureaucracies are far more likely to give money to revolutionary causes or bureaucracy-expanding causes. Meanwhile, the smaller denominations concentrate on missions or other spiritual ventures.

There is no architectural representation of the majesty of God that competes today with the majesty of the state. This statist majesty is anything but beautiful. There is a grim, ugly architectural style that is common to government buildings throughout the West: huge stones, few windows, marble or imitation marble. These make men feel insignificant. The buildings dwarf people. This style was pioneered in ancient imperial Rome. A similar theology of empire undergirds today's structures.

The Soviet Union was the most self-conscious empire we have seen in modern times. In the decades following the Revolution, the Soviets produced grand monuments to poor taste. Malcolm Muggeridge's autobiography recalls his stay in Moscow's National Hotel during the 1930s as a reporter for Britain's Manchester Guardian.

The decor was in heavy marble and gilt, rather like the stations in the Moscow underground [subway—G.N.], then under construction, and to become a tourist show-place. Once, sitting with Mirsky in the hotel lounge, I remarked upon its excruciating taste. Yes, he agreed, it was pretty ghastly, but it expressed the sense of what a luxury hotel should be like in the mind of someone who had only stared in at one through plate-glass windows from the cold, inhospitable street outside. This, he said, was the key to all the régime's artistic products—the long turgid novels, the lifeless portraits and landscapes in oils, the gruesome People's neo-Gothic architecture, the leaden conservatory concerts and creaking ballet. Culturally, it was all of a piece. There is no surer way of preserving the worst aspects of bourgeois style than liquidating the bourgeoisie. . . .²⁰

1981).

20. Malcolm Muggeridge, Chronicles of Wasted Time: The Green Stick (New York: Morrow, 1973), p. 245.

3. Restoring Cooperation

The theological and institutional fragmentation of the West's churches is visible today. The original ecumenical impulse of Christianity has dimmed. We should expect a future revival to bring new unity, for the church is now visibly at war with humanist empires, as it was from Christ's day to Constantine's. A revival is more likely to unify Christians than split them, for there is a visible, threatening common enemy. Thus, we should expect to see a new ecumenism of Bible-believing people to rival and offset the collectivist ecumenism of modernism. It will be a bottom-up ecumenism, not a top-down bureaucratic ecumenism.²¹

Thus, rather than expecting huge national cathedrals (a symbol of nationalism) or international cathedrals (a symbol of ecclesiastical empire), we should expect to see new buildings that coordinate the activities of various regional Christian groups. They will have to be functional yet magisterial. Instead of the sports arenas—modern man's urban equivalent of the Roman arenas—we will see artistic, educational, and meeting centers. They will not be primarily denominational, but oriented toward dominion activities. They will represent the activism of Christian civilization, not of the church narrowly defined.

Churches may also build common structures in various regions, comparable in sacrifice to the Mormon temples we find in many cities throughout the world. They will reflect the "best" that a denomination's regional efforts can produce. We will also see national and international architectural efforts, both secular and ecclesiastical. There will be regional, national, and international architectural manifestations of the majesty of God on earth. But there will not be a single center, as there was in Israel, for God has decentralized sacrifice and therefore His kingdom.

Such is my prediction. Yet the very decentralization of Christian culture is a would-be prophet's stumbling-stone. The freedom that Christianity provides invariably unleashes human creativity that defies categorization in advance. What is most significant architecturally is the stylistic freedom that Christian civilization offers within the overall constraints of finances and the restored image of God in redeemed man. What is far less important is the accuracy of the prediction.

21. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for Foreign Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 11. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

Conclusion

Local churches should embody visible elements of personal sacrifice. Modern concepts of long-term debt have reduced the psychological burden of present sacrifice, but long-term uncertainty and the threat of debt servitude have accompanied the increase in church indebtedness. The medieval churches sometimes took centuries to construct, calling forth the sacrifices and talents of many generations. Modern congregations build smaller, less beautiful, more efficient structures, borrow heavily from fractional reserve banks to do so, or sell usurious long-term bonds to church members,²² and then take a generation to pay off the debt. The medieval Christians were closer to the truth in this area of worship. They understood what the Old Testament Hebrews had been told by God: that holy wastefulness has its place in godly worship, as the tithe of celebration indicates (Deut. 14:23–29). Construction costs per square foot should not be the primary consideration in constructing every place of worship. An eschatology of victory should be reflected in an architecture of majesty and permanence somewhere in the Christian community.

22. Gary North, "Stewardship, Investment, and Usury: Financing the Kingdom of God," Appendix 3 in R. J. Rushdoony, Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973).

BLOOD MONEY, NOT HEAD TAX

And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel after their number, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the LORD, when thou numberest them; that there be no plague among them, when thou numberest them. This they shall give, every one that passeth among them that are numbered, half a shekel after the shekel of the sanctuary: (a shekel is twenty gerahs;) an half shekel shall be the offering of the LORD. Every one that passeth among them that are numbered, from twenty years old and above, shall give an offering unto the LORD. The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less than half a shekel, when they give an offering unto the LORD, to make an atonement for your souls. And thou shalt take the atonement money of the children of Israel, and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; that it may be a memorial unto the children of Israel before the LORD, to make an atonement for your souls (Ex. 30:11–16).

The theocentric focus of the passage is God's holy army as an agency of negative sanctions: point four of the biblical covenant model.¹ The members of this army needed a covering, an atonement before God. Why? The text does not say, but other texts tell us.

This was a mustering of the fighting men of Israel. Moses counted them as they left Egypt, on the assumption that they would soon enter into a war against Canaan. Israel had left Egypt as an army: "And it came to pass the selfsame day, that the LORD did bring the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt by their armies" (Ex. 12:51). So God told Moses to number this assembly of tribal armies: "Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, after their families, by the house of their fathers, with the number of their names, every male by their polls; From twenty years old and upward, all that are able to go forth to war in Israel: thou and Aaron shall number them by their armies" (Num. 1:2–3). After the plague that God brought on Israel for their fornication with the Midianite women, God ordered another census. "And it came to pass after the plague, that the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, saying, Take the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, from twenty years old and upward, throughout their fathers' house, all that are able to go to war in Israel" (Num. 26:1–2). Joshua numbered them again for the same reason (Josh. 8:10).

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>). Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, 2010), ch. 4.

A nation has a legitimate need for statistics on its military capability. It must count the costs of war. "Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage, and desireth conditions of peace" (Luke 14:31–32).² This is why the military commander of Israel numbered the people before he took them into battle.

A. Bloodshed and Blood Covering

The people needed an atonement before they marched into battle. The shedding of man's blood must be placed under tight covenantal limits. This is why the numbering of the circumcised males of Israel required their payment of atonement money. This numbering was only to be done in preparation for a war.

One thing is certain about this passage: it does not have anything to do with a civil tax. The State is in no way responsible for taking money from anyone for the purpose of making an atonement for his soul. Making atonement as God's representative is a priestly function, not a kingly function. The recipient of the funds was to be the tabernacle, not the civil government.

The atonement or covering was required by God whenever the adult males were numbered prior to military conflict. If they refused to pay, God threatened them with a plague. When David decided to number the people of Israel despite the fact that no war was imminent, his advisor Joab warned him not to do it (II Sam. 24:3). David refused to listen, and insisted that the census be taken. When he realized that this assertion of his sovereignty was wrong, he admitted his sin to God. The seer Gad was told by God to inform David that he would be given three options: seven years of famine for the nation, three months of fleeing before his enemies, or a plague. David asked God to make the decision, and God sent the plague in which 70,000 people died (II Sam. 24:15).³

2. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary of Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 35.

If the census had been a normal source of revenue for the civil government, it would have been an annual event. It was not an annual event; taking the national census was strictly limited to wartime, and required an atonement payment to the tabernacle. By acting as though the state had the authority to take a census at any time, David sinned against God. To “number” (paqad) the army meant to muster the troops for battle. James Jordan commented: “The word is also used throughout the prophets to mean ‘visit’ or ‘punish.’ There are other words in Hebrew which refer to numbering in the sense of counting up or adding up, as Exodus 30:12 aptly illustrates (“When you take a sum . . . to muster them”). Thus, the numbering spoken of here in Exodus 30 is not a mere counting census, but a visitation or judgment designed to see who is on the LORD’s side. Those who pass over into the camp of the mustered men are thereby declaring themselves to be in the army of God, as opposed to the army of Satan. When the LORD comes, he comes to visit and punish, to muster all men and see who has and who has not passed over into his army.”⁴ Jordan therefore concluded that this was not an annual census.

Jordan argued that it was the presence of God in their midst that threatened those who had not been covered by the payment of the atonement money. God walks in the midst of the army (Deut. 23:14), so the camp must be holy. “The fact that the money is used for the upkeep of the Tabernacle/Temple indicates a connection between the environment of the Temple (God’s House) and that of the army camp (God’s War Camp). Both are especially holy, and thus especially threatening to sinful man. Under the Old Covenant, each had to be especially sanctified, and the men who entered each had to be especially sanctified. . . .”⁵

3. The passage says that God was angry with Israel, so He “moved David against them” by numbering them (II Sam. 24:1). David could have brought the judgment of God on himself had he been willing to accept the curse of fleeing three months from his enemies, but he left the judgment up to God.

4. James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), p. 227. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

5. Ibid., p. 229.

Jordan also pointed out that in the Old Testament, holy war was a priestly function. Torched cities were called “whole burnt sacrifices” (Deut. 13:16; Jud. 1:17, in Hebrew). During a holy war, the soldiers became temporary priests by taking a Nazarite vow.⁶ “This is all to say that the rendering of specific judgments is a sabbatical and priestly function, not a kingly one. The kingly function in the Bible is in the area of leading, cultivating, and shepherding, especially through the skillful serving of one’s subordinates (Mark 10:42–45). The sword of the state executes according to the judgments rendered by the priests. (In the New Covenant age, every believer is a priest, just as the Old Covenant believers became priests by taking the Nazarite vow. In our system, the priests render judgment by sitting on a jury, and then the state executes the judgment.)”⁷

The point should be clear: the covering or atonement payment of Exodus 30 has nothing to do with the civil government. It is not a tax at all. “Thus, the military duty is priestly, and a duty of every believer-priest. Both Church and state are involved in it, since the Church must say whether the war is just and holy, and the state must organize the believer-priests for battle. The mustering of the host for a census is, then, not a ‘civil’ function as opposed to an ecclesiastical one, and the atonement money of Exodus 30 is not a poll tax, as some have alleged.”⁸

Jordan was being polite (or cautious) by refraining from mentioning the target of his exposition, but readers may not fully understand the nature of the theological problem unless they know the specifics of the debate. Jordan’s target was R. J. Rushdoony.

B. Rushdoony’s Theory of the Civil Head Tax

There has been considerable confusion about this in recent years because of Rushdoony’s insistence that this atonement payment became a civil head tax after the construction of the tabernacle. “It was used to maintain the civil order after the tabernacle (the throne room and palace of God’s government) was built.”⁹ He offered no evidence for this assertion. On the face of it, it seems utterly implausible. How did such a shift in the locus of taxing sovereignty take place? How did

6. Ibid., p. 231.

7. Ibid., pp. 231–32.

8. Ibid., p. 232.

9. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 50.

the state become the recipient of an atonement payment, thereby converting a ransom paid to God through the priesthood into a head tax collected by the state? This would implicitly transfer sovereignty from the church to the state, a procedure totally at odds with everything else Rushdoony had written about illegitimate state power.

1. Atonement by the State

He correctly observed that this payment was an atonement payment to the tabernacle which was paid by those going into battle, and he cites other commentators to support his point—a relatively non-controversial point.¹⁰ Problem number one: On what basis did the state become the recipient of this atonement payment? He tried to solve this problem by arguing that the tabernacle was as much a civil center as an ecclesiastical center. Civil taxes, he insisted, were brought to God at His throne room, the tabernacle. “The sanctuary was thus the civil center of Israel and no less religious for that fact.”¹¹ Thus, a “poll tax,” as he calls it, was always brought to the tabernacle.¹² He then stretches the argument to conclude that in Israel, “The basic tax was the poll or head tax (Ex. 30:11–16), which had to be the same for all men.”¹³

Thus, what is explicitly stated in the Bible to be an atonement payment made to the tabernacle, one which most commentators (including Rushdoony) believe was a payment associated with a military census taken immediately prior to a war, later became, in Rushdoony’s interpretation, a normal revenue collection device for the state—indeed, the only source of legitimate revenue for the state. “First, the basic civil tax in Scripture, the only tax, is the poll or head tax, paid by every man twenty years of age and older (Ex. 30:11–16).”¹⁴ “Its purpose was to provide for civil atonement, i.e., the covering or protection of civil government. Every male twenty years old or older was required to pay this tax to be protected by God the King in His theocratic government of Israel. This tax was thus a civil and religious duty (but not an ecclesiastical one).”¹⁵

Problem number two: When did the state become the recipient of these atonement payments? He argued that the head tax “was used ori-

10. Ibid., p. 277.

11. Ibid., p. 281.

12. Idem.

13. Ibid., p. 492.

14. Ibid., p. 510.

15. Ibid., p. 719.

ginally for the construction of the tabernacle (Ex. 38:25–28).¹⁶ The key word here is originally. He implied that after the construction of the tabernacle, the money went to the state to finance its day-to-day operations. He did not explain anywhere in his writings just exactly how the day-to-day expenses of the entire civil government—local, tribal, and national—could have been financed by this one tax payment, one which could be legitimately collected only prior to a war. He did not explain this obvious difficulty because it obviously cannot be explained—not without concluding that Israel was a permanent warfare State. He did not want to make such a conclusion, so he simply ignores the problem.

Why did Rushdoony make this unwarranted leap from an atoning tabernacle payment during wartime to a permanent payment to the tabernacle as a civil tax? Why didn't he see the enormous threat to liberty involved in making the state a tax-collector in the name of atonement? Why did he fail to recognize that if this was the only legitimate tax in Old Testament Israel, that it would have created either an ecclesiocracy or a political tyranny? If the atonement payment was in fact a tax, one collected by the tabernacle's agents, meaning Aaronic priests, to be doled out as they saw fit to the civil authorities, then the church would inevitably be at the top of a single civil pyramid. On the other hand, if the civil magistrates possessed the authority to enter the tabernacle and collect the atonement payment, then the state would be at the top. Yet Rushdoony always argued that there is no single church-state pyramid of power in a biblical commonwealth; church and State are separate sovereign authorities under God and God's law.

2. Rushdoony's Unstated Problem

His unstated problem was that he did not want to face an unpleasant reality: the Old Testament never specifically says anything about what is proper for civil taxation, except in Samuel's warning against the king's collection of as great a percentage of a person's income as 10% (I Sam. 8).¹⁷ This was James Jordan's conclusion.¹⁸ It is also mine. If defenders of biblical law cannot point to any specific biblical laws that govern civil taxation, an apparent gap in their whole hermeneutics is exposed for all to see.

16. Ibid., p. 50.

17. Gary North, Disobedience and Defeat: An Economic Commentary on the Historical Books (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 14.

18. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, p. 239.

Rushdoony preferred not to face this problem directly, although he clearly recognized that it exists. “Commentaries and Bible dictionaries on the whole cite no law governing taxation. One would assume, from reading them, that no system of taxation existed in ancient Israel, and that the Mosaic law did not speak on the subject.”¹⁹ If the Bible is truly silent here, then the theonomist is placed in the seemingly embarrassing position of claiming that the Old Testament’s law-order has specific guidelines and answers for all social and civil policy, yet he is unable to find explicit rules governing what became the central issue of civil sovereignty in the twentieth century, namely, the legal sanction of tax collection. Yet, apart from Samuel’s critique of the king’s collecting a tithe, the only references to compulsory payments in ancient Israel are the various tithes and sacrifices—clearly ecclesiastical—and the census atonement money of Exodus 30.

To overcome this embarrassment, Rushdoony offered a unique theory of Old Testament civil order and its relation to the taxing authority. “This failure to discern any tax law is due to the failure to recognize the nature of Israel’s civil order. God as King of Israel ruled from His throne room in the tabernacle, and to Him the taxes were brought. Because of the common error of viewing the tabernacle as an exclusively or essentially ‘religious,’ i.e., ecclesiastical center, there is a failure to recognize that it was indeed a religious, civil center. In terms of Biblical law, the state, home, school, and every other agency must be no less religious than the church. The sanctuary was thus the civil center of Israel and no less religious for that fact.”²⁰

3. A Question of Sovereignty

He systematically refused to explore the startling implications of this theory of the tabernacle as the only place where the Israelites paid their taxes to God as King of Israel. The issue is clearly not the “religiousness” of the civil order, for as he correctly said, all of society’s institutions are equally religious—state, home, school business, etc. But this is not to say that all institutions are equally covenantal, for only three institutions—family, church, and state—bear the marks of the covenant, namely, the legitimate imposition of a self-maledictory oath.²¹

19. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 281.

20. Idem.

21. Chapter 23.

Church and state collect their lawful payments from those who are covenanted to each institution, though not necessarily to both institutions: churches collect tithes from church members, and civil governments collect taxes from those under their jurisdiction. This has nothing to do with the question of the “religiousness” of either or both of these God-ordained covenant institutions. For example, private businesses are not entitled to collect taxes from anyone, except as agents of the civil government. Yet according to Rushdoony, businesses are inescapably religious institutions.

Rushdoony’s argument throughout his career was that all of life is inescapably religious. Following Van Til, he argued that all men are either covenant-keepers or covenant-breakers. “Neutral man does not exist. Man is either a covenant-keeper or a covenant-breaker, either obeying God in faith, or in revolt against God as a would-be god.”²² Everything man does is therefore religious. This being the case, an appeal to religiousness as such cannot solve the crucial question he is dealing with: To which institution or institutions has God delegated the lawful sovereignty to collect His taxes and His tithes? God was surely both King and Priest in Israel, but that is not the issue here. The issue is: Did He delegate to a single institution the lawful sovereignty to collect payments owed to Him in His capacity as both King and Priest?

It is obvious that King Uzziah violated the temple by going into it to burn incense. God struck him down with Old Testament leprosy as a punishment (II Chron. 26:16–23). Rushdoony used this example to defend the institutional separation of church and state.²³ Speaking of priest and king, he wrote, “The two offices were not to have an immanent union but only a transcendental one.”²⁴ But to allow one of these offices to collect payments owed by people to the other is unquestionably declaring an immanent (earthly) union of the two offices, as surely as Uzziah’s attempt to offer incense in the temple was such a declaration.

The state was not to collect payments owed to the tabernacle for atonement purposes. Similarly, the priesthood was not to collect taxes owed to the civil government. The fact that the tabernacle, and later the temple, was the civil center of Israel was manifested symbolically by the fact that the Ark of the Covenant inside the holy of holies was the center of all Israel, and that inside the Ark were the two tablets (tables or copies)²⁵ of God's law. God's law was the center of life in Israel, and God was present with His law in the holy of holies. This has nothing to do with the institutional details of tax collecting or tithe collecting; it has everything to do with the inescapable religiousness of all life.

22. Rushdoony, “Implications for Psychology,” in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1976), p. 43.

23. R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1968] 1998), p. 58. (<http://bit.ly/rjrfso>)

24. Idem.

4. Ed Powell's Modification

Ed Powell's essay, "God's Plan of Taxation," is an extension of Rushdoony's position, which is why Rushdoony allowed it to appear in his only co-authored book. There is one interesting addition that Powell made, however. He quite correctly pointed out that the Levites were not subject to military conscription (Num. 1:47–49), and therefore they were not required to pay the so-called poll tax. Rushdoony had insisted in the Institutes: "It was paid by Levites and all others."²⁶ Powell argued that the Levites were not part of the civil order, and so were not required to pay any tax to the state, and this was the only tax the state could lawfully collect, according to both Rushdoony and Powell. "This tax went solely for the purpose of supporting the state, and only those who were members of the civil order because of their military service paid it."²⁷ Thus, in Powell's version of political theory, civil citizenship is based on two things, the payment of taxes and participation in the military. He clearly recognized the connection between the "tax" of Exodus 30:11–16 and military service. Would he conclude that in New Testament times, ordained ministers of the gospel should not be allowed to vote or be required to pay taxes? If he denied this, then would he then conclude that they should be subject to military conscription?

What Powell did not recognize is central to Jordan's argument and mine: by becoming a Nazarite during a holy war, the soldier in Old Covenant Israel became a temporary priest. It was the army's very position as a temporary priesthood that made the payment of blood money mandatory if the soldiers were to avoid the plague when God came into the camp. Thus, the requirement to pay blood money to the tabernacle had nothing to do with the supposed status of the Levites as being outside the civil order. It had everything to do with the need for atonement by those who were temporarily set aside (made holy) for God's special purposes during a war.

25. Meredith G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1972), pp. 123–24.

26. Rushdoony, Institutes, p. 50.

27. Rushdoony and Powell, Tithing and Dominion (Fairfax, Virginia: Thoburn Press, 1979), p. 64. The irony here is that it was my "freewill" offering to Pastor Robert Thoburn's church in Fairfax, Virginia, that financed the publication of this book.

The Rushdoony-Powell position leads to innumerable problems, especially in extending into New Testament times the erroneous principle of the head tax as the sole means of state financing. I have dwelt at some length on this explanation of Exodus 30:11–16 only because Rushdoony's Institutes presented the preliminary model of the Christian Reconstruction position. His few remarks on taxation are found in the sections of the Institutes that attempt to explain this passage. Thus, by systematically restricting any discussion of biblical taxation to the supposed civil head tax of the Old Testament, Rushdoony eliminated the possibility of discussing such alternative tax policies as the gasoline tax used exclusively for local roadways, or income taxes lower than 10%, or sales taxes lower than 10%. He has made the head tax as the sole source of civic revenue, a conclusion unwarranted by the text.

Conclusion

The atonement money required from each adult male in Israel prior to a holy war had nothing to do with civil taxation. It was a unique assessment that took place only during the military census, and the taking of such a census was authorized by God only when war threatened the commonwealth. The state was not allowed to conduct such a census under any other circumstances (II Sam. 24). For the civil magistrate to have collected such a blood covering payment as a civil tax would have been an abomination. To have made it the only civil tax in Israel, to be collected on an annual or other regular basis, would have brought the wrath of God on the state. The collection of this mandatory payment was exclusively a priestly function. Thus, any discussion of the methods and limits of lawful civil taxation in Old Testament Israel must be based on passages other than Exodus 30:11–16. This required payment was not a head tax or any other kind of tax; it was a blood covering for warriors-become-Nazarite priests who were about to go into battle.

SABBATH REST VS. AUTONOMY

Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the LORD: whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death (Ex. 35:2).

God's work of creation is the archetype for man: six days of labor and a day of rest, or ceasing from our normal labors. If God rested the seventh day, then we must rest one day in seven. Originally, Adam's day of rest was his first full day of life. His firstday was God's seventhday. He was to have honored his position as a creature by resting the first day of the week, thereby acknowledging God's prior work as the foundation of his life and rest.

Adam pretended that his autonomous labor would bring forth fruits. He pretended that he had not received everything as a gift from God. He therefore imitated God's week, beginning his rebellion on the first day of his week. Because of Adam's sin of autonomy—playing God—God imposed a temporary six-and-one pattern for man's week until the resurrection of Jesus Christ. We now are required as individuals to structure our work weeks in terms of a one-and-six resurrection pattern. God has restored to His church the original pattern.¹

A. Sabbath and Sanctions

This chapter is really more of a summary of the material that I presented in Chapter 24 and Appendix E. This passage is an extension of Exodus 20:8–11, the law of the sabbath. It specifies the sanction: capital punishment.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 6.

1. The Death Penalty

God's designation of a specific sanction is crucial. Dispensationalist Roy Aldrich reminded us: "If the Ten Commandments of the law are still binding then all of the penalties must remain the same. The death penalties should be imposed for Sabbath-breaking, idolatry, adultery, rebellion against parents, etc. To change the penalty of a law means to abolish that law. A law without a penalty is an anomaly. A law with its penalty abolished becomes only good advice."² The fourth commandment was basic to the Decalogue. Thus, this case law specified the appropriate sanction: execution. This was reaffirmed by God in His specially revealed requirement that the stick-gatherer be stoned to death (Num. 15).

I have argued previously that this capital sanction was removed from God's law when the locus of this particular law's enforcement shifted from the civil government to the individual conscience. This is not to say that sabbath rest was abolished by God. It was transformed by the resurrection of Jesus Christ, which is why Christians honor the principle by resting on the Lord's Day, the first day of the week. The individual Christian who operates as a covenantal agent directly under God becomes the sole earthly agent for enforcing the law of the sabbath. There is no longer any civil sanction attached to it. (There was never any ecclesiastical sanction mentioned in the Old Testament.) Paul wrote that some men regard all days the same; other men regard one day as special; each individual is to obey his conscience in this matter (Rom. 14:5). Thus, the transfer of earthly sovereignty in enforcing the sabbath rest principle necessarily removed the capital sanction—the only sanction specified in the Old Testament. This is not to say that this law no longer holds. God will enforce whatever sanctions He believes are appropriate in history and on judgment day. But for all practical judicial purposes, the fourth commandment has been transformed from a civil law into good personal advice.

To argue otherwise is necessarily to call for the re-establishment of the death penalty for sabbath violators. To appeal to the Old Testament—meaning the fourth commandment—necessarily also involves an appeal to this passage, for it specifies the appropriate sanction. Again, let me repeat the theme of this entire book:

No sanctions, no laws; no laws, no social order; no social order,

2. Roy L. Aldrich, "Causes for Confusion of Law and Grace," Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. 116 (July 1959), p. 226.

no civilization; no civilization, no kingdom of God in church history.

2. Sanctions and Sanctification

Let me repeat what I said in the Introduction to Part 3: “What I argue throughout this book is really quite simple: we can legitimately assess the importance of any biblical law by examining its case-law sanction. This simple and seemingly obvious principle of jurisprudence has been implicitly denied for almost two millennia by the church. There has been an ancient tradition on the part of Christian commentators of appealing selectively to Old Testament laws whenever convenient in moral arguments, but almost never to the God-specified sanctions.” Exodus 35:2 seldom appears in any sabbatarian’s discussion of how important the sabbath remains, and what we must do in order to honor it. This is wholly illegitimate exegetically, and it has led to the accusation by consistent critics that Christians who uphold “the moral law of God” apart from God’s specified civil sanctions are hypocritical, that they want all the moral benefits of theocracy without any of the embarrassing theocratic sanctions.

The defenders of the “moral law only” approach inescapably have to agree in principle with dispensationalist Aldrich: “It should be remembered that the Ten Commandments were part of the legal system of Israel as a theocracy. In this Mosaic economy ‘every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward’ (Heb. 2:2b). A law without a penalty is only good advice. The Mosaic penalty for violation of each of the first four commandments was death. For certain overt violations of all the other commandments the penalty was death. Only a theocracy could enforce such laws. No government, or denomination, or society even pretends to enforce them today. This is as it should be for they were given only to Israel and have long been abolished.”³ Defenders of “the moral law only” favor the general law of God but not the specific sanctions. They argue for a general theocracy—a world controlled by God, who judges it continually and finally—yet they deny specific theocracy, meaning civil governments that are legitimately governed in terms of Old Testament laws and their God-revealed sanctions.

What I have argued for many years is this: the covenantal stand-

3. Aldrich, “Has the Mosaic Law Been Abolished?” ibid., vol. 116 (Oct. 1959), p. 332.

ard of progressive sanctification applies to all human institutions, not just to the hearts, minds, and actions of regenerate believers. The Bible unquestionably teaches the concept of progressive sanctification which operates in the lives of redeemed individuals. This doctrine informs us that as redeemed people self-consciously conform themselves progressively to the requirement of God's law as they mature in the faith, they progressively approach (but never achieve in history) the perfect humanity (but never the divinity) of the incarnate Jesus Christ.⁴ Because God brings historical judgment on collectives, meaning human institutions (Deut. 28), especially the three covenant institutions—church, State, and family—progressive sanctification also applies to groups. It is the basis of worldwide dominion.⁵

B. No Salvation by Works

God's grace is the only basis of man's salvation, in the sense of healing (salve) as well as personal regeneration. Men cannot legitimately expect to work their way back into favor with God. Eternal life is by God's sovereign act of adoption (John 1:12). We are made true sons of God by means of adoption. Apart from this act of adoption, we remain disinherited sons through our covenantal (representative) father, Adam.

The sabbath law was designed to remind man that he cannot work his way into a position of authority. To think that the works of man's hand are the basis of success, power, and prosperity is to adopt the religion of humanism, the forbidden religion in the Bible. God warned the people of Israel through Moses against vain imaginations regarding the basis of their wealth: "And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth" (Deut. 8:17). God then warned them about the sanctions He would bring against them in history if they forgot this warning against the concept of man's autonomy.

And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye

4. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), pp. 50–54.

5. Ibid., pp. 82–84. Cf. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 5. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>) would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God (Deut. 8:19–20).⁶

Man is told that he owes his success to God. God gives him the original capital base that man possesses. Then, in response to man's grace-empowered covenantal faithfulness—outward conformity to God's revealed law—God showers man with external, visible blessings. These blessings are designed to become a means of evangelism, both to individuals within the commonwealth and foreigners abroad.

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).⁷

God gave them the law of the sabbath in order to spare them. It was to remind them that they had been hard-pressed servants in Egypt. In the recapitulation of the Ten Commandments in Deuteronomy, this is the reason given for the sabbath: "And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the LORD thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm: therefore the LORD thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day" (Deut. 5:15). They had to give their human and animal servants a day off each week (v. 14). God was gracious in delivering them from bondage; they must also be gracious to those under their authority. This is the hierarchical principle of God's grace. It is appropriate that we find this principle clearly displayed in the second book of the Pentateuch, Exodus, the book that deals with hierarchy, authority, and deliverance.

The man who honors the sabbath by refusing to work at his occupation publicly admits to himself and to those around him that he cannot work his way into prosperity, that is, into the favor of God. God requires him to rest one day in seven if he expects to receive long-term external blessings from God. But Old Testament law went beyond the mere promise of external blessings; it required the state to impose the ultimate civil sanction: execution. Execution is what will happen to the whole society if it disobeys God (Deut. 8:19–20); this is what also happens to individuals now if they disobey Him (Ex. 35:2). The covenantal sanction that was attached to the microcosm (the individual) reflected the covenantal sanction that was attached to the macrocosm (society). Men are not to imagine that they owe their wealth to the work of their own hands. They are to understand that their wealth has come through God's covenant of grace, one which has both types of sanction: blessing and cursing.

6. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 23.

7. Ibid., ch. 8.

Conclusion

The sanction attached to this law was a civil sanction, and it was the ultimate civil sanction. All discussions regarding the continuing legitimacy of the Old Testament sabbath must henceforth begin with a full discussion of Exodus 35:2, and how it applies in the New Testament era. The capital sanction was fundamental to the law as originally given. No appeal to the various Old Testament passages relating to the sabbath can be taken literally if this one is conveniently ignored. The discussion must begin with Exodus 35:2.

The meaning of the sabbath law is clear: man must rest one day in seven. In the Old Testament, it was the last day of the work week, for the day of rest was a national testimony to the sabbath rest to come, the fulfillment of God's covenant promise of salvation and deliverance. This deliverance is wholly the gift of God. Man cannot save himself. Thus, the sabbath law was a testimony to a theological truth: salvation by grace and not by works of the law. The work of autonomous man's hands brings only death, this law affirms. The same is equally true for societies.

THE ABILITY TO TEACH

And he hath filled him [Bezaleel] with the spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship; . . . And he hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he, and Aholiab. . . (Ex. 35:31, 34a).

God is the source of all wisdom and all technical skills. Human civilization is the result of the procession of God's Holy Spirit in history. There is continuity in human culture, generation to generation, only because there is continuity of the work of God's Spirit in history. God uses human instruments in order to achieve the progressive establishment of His kingdom in history. The kingdom of God is best described as the civilization of God. It is both heavenly and earthly.

Architecture is certainly a visible aspect of God's earthly kingdom, and it points to the architecture of heaven. This was understood far better by medieval Christians than it is today. They also understood the need of personal apprenticeship as the best means of training men in building skills. As Christians' time perspective has shortened, so has their sense of architectural aesthetics. The aesthetic link between earth and heaven is not taken seriously by most evangelical Christians, as their church buildings reveal.¹

It is significant that almost nothing remains of Israelite architecture. Neither the first nor second temple survived the invasions of Israel's enemies, nor did the king's palace. God destroyed all traces of Israelite monumental architecture because of their repeated rebellion. The Israelites lost continuity architecturally because they did not maintain continuity ethically.

1. The aesthetic link between earth and hell has been taken very seriously by satanists, as their record album and audio disk covers and posters reveal so blatantly.

A. From Discontinuity to Continuity

This public announcement by Moses regarding the Spirit's connection to the two young architects is a repetition of the assignment given to the young men by God (Ex. 31:1–6). In this case, however, it is specifically stated that God gave Bezaleel and Aholiab the desire and capacity to teach. They became God's temporal intermediaries, as surely as Noah had been. In both instances, someone had to serve as God's aesthetic vessel after the ordeal of water passage—the flood and the Red Sea—from wrath to grace. The leaven of Egypt was not to be brought into the land.

The fact that God specifically intervened in history to give these two young men the ability to design and execute plans for the tabernacle points to the non-evolutionary nature of the Hebrew experience in the wilderness. The Israelites were former slaves. They had all been assigned construction tasks in Egypt that were far less skilled than the requirements of careful craftsmanship necessary to construct an intricate, aesthetically awesome place of religious worship. They were brick-makers, not skilled artisans. But God did not wait for several generations to see His tabernacle built. His people did not rely on the borrowed technologies of Egypt or the surrounding cultures of Canaan in order to design and construct God's tabernacle. It was not to be constructed by means of a slave people's skills and in terms of a slave culture's liturgical preferences. God performed yet another miracle by granting these young men His spirit of competence.

A radical error of all humanistic outlines of human history is their dependence on a view of man which presupposes man's autonomy from God. They also presuppose an evolutionary history. Because the evolutionist erroneously assumes that man was not created "overnight," he also assumes that man's culture must have developed over long periods of time. Mankind as a collective whole supposedly creates culture over great periods of time. That which is undeveloped culturally—by the standards of a later, presumably higher culture—is seen as being chronologically prior. Step by step, the theory goes, mankind learned the arts of civilization. Long eons of time were required for this slow process of cultural development, and humanistic scholars grant to primitive men all the time thought to be necessary for cultural and technological development. Such is the myth of cultural Darwinism.

The Bible teaches another view of human progress. Civilization develops in terms of ethics, not in terms of the advent of private property and alienation (Rousseau and Marx), or sexual sublimation (Freud), or “challenge and response” (Toynbee), or voluntary contracts (Maine), or the “cunning of history” (Hegel), or the survival of the fittest (Spencer), or planning by a scientific elite (Lester Frank Ward), or the development of the volk (Nazism), or the construction of democratic institutions (the “new” American historians), or psychological self-realization (just about everyone else). The story of the Tower of Babel and the continuing testimony of the Cheops pyramid indicate that the early history of man was marked by cultural and technological devolution. Mankind began with remarkable mathematical² and technological skills that were subsequently lost.

B. Educational Capital

Adam and Eve lost the bulk of their computational abilities after the Fall. Adam had named the animals in the garden in less than one day; only after this task was completed did God give Eve to him (Gen. 2:19–23).³ The life of man was shortened, forcing more frequent gaps in human knowledge, as each generation died off. To extend knowledge, over time, each generation must devote considerable quantities of scarce economic resources to the training of the next generation. There is an economic incentive in this, of course: the provisioning of one’s heirs with income-producing skills so that one might be provided for in old age.

The education of one’s heirs is required for the expansion of family capital over time. The familistic focus of the Bible inescapably calls men to educate their children (Deut. 6:6–7).⁴ The passing down of precepts and skills takes time and effort. This is an investment in the future that pays returns not only in one’s own lifetime, but also down through history. But, as with any investment, it requires that we forfeit present consumption and alternative investment possibilities in order to educate our children.

2. Giorgio de Santillana and Hertha von Dechend, Hamlet’s Mill: An Essay on Myth and the Frame of Time (New York: Gambit, 1969); Peter Tomkins, Secrets of the Great Pyramid (New York: Harper Colophon, [1971] 1978).

3. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 7.

4. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012) ch. 8; cf. Robert L. Thoburn, The Children Trap: Biblical Blueprints for Economics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/ThoburnCT>)

God openly intervened in history to bring the Israelites out of Egypt. But leading them out of Egypt was only the first phase of God's program of dominion. He also intended that they learn the skills of building a civilization. The radical discontinuity of the exodus from Egypt was to be followed by a radical discontinuity of conquest. Then a long-term continuity of dominion was to begin.

The Hebrews possessed a minimal educational inheritance. They had learned some construction skills in Egypt. But this inheritance could easily become a snare to them. They needed an infusion of educational capital before they could hope to extend the dominion covenant. Like a parent who educates his children in order to extend his own name in history—the family name, the family vision, and the family power—so God had to educate His people in every area of life. This included architecture and aesthetics.

C. The Need for Aesthetic Discontinuity

The Hebrews had been in bondage in Egypt. They had served as construction workers for at least a generation. To the extent that they knew anything about architecture, they understood the architecture of the Egyptian state. The pyramids and the treasure cities were monuments to empire.

Egypt was a top-down civilization. The pyramids were the architectural representation of this society. The Pharaoh was the divine-human link who mediated between man and the gods. He was the high priest of the society.⁵ The priests possessed specialized knowledge which gave them life-and-death power over the lives of the Egyptians: knowledge of the cycles of the flooding of the Nile. Egypt was the archetype of what Wittfogel has called the "hydraulic society"—a civilization built in terms of a water monopoly by the state or priesthood. Their knowledge of astronomy, the calendar, and the flooding of the Nile gave the priests an unchallenged authority. Without them, the nation starved. They did not rule Egypt, but they were powerful.⁶ The architecture of hydraulic societies is monumental.

This style is apparent in the fortress-like settlements of the Pueblo Indians. It is conspicuous in the palaces, temple cities, and fortresses of ancient Middle and South America. It characterizes the tombs, palace-cities, temples, and royal monuments of Pharaonic Egypt and ancient Mesopotamia. No one who has ever observed the city gates and walls of a Chinese capital, such as Peking, or who has walked through the immense palace gates and squares of the Forbidden City to enter the equally immense court buildings, ancestral temples, and private residences can fail to be awed by their monumental design.

5. Karl Wittfogel, Oriental Despotism: A Comparative Study of Total Power (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1957] 1964), p. 93.

6. Ibid., p. 88.

Pyramids and dome-shaped tombs manifest most consistently the monumental style of hydraulic building. They achieve their aesthetic effect with a minimum of ideas and a maximum of material. The pyramid is little more than a huge pile of symmetrically arranged stones.⁷

In contrast to the pyramid was the tabernacle. It was ornate and magnificent inside (for the priests to view), but it was not monumental. It was transportable. Its builders were wilderness wanderers. There was no possibility of pyramid-building for the Hebrews in the wilderness. The tabernacle's grandeur was visual, but this grandeur was based upon the creation of a sense of subordination in those few who entered it. God taught the Hebrews a sense of awe, but this sense of awe was based on God's actual presence in the tabernacle, not on its shape. The closer they came to the center, the more awesome it became, and only priests were able to get close to the holy of holies, and only the high priest could enter it. Take away God's presence, and the tabernacle became a large, ornament-filled tent; it lost its awesome quality.

The great Cheops pyramid of Egypt is empty and awesome. With the original white limestone exterior, it must have been beautiful.⁸ Its awesomeness is based on its height and immensity, not its communicated sense of God's presence. The tabernacle required constant care, meaning constant devotion; the pyramids stand unattended, monuments to the static civilization that they represented.⁹ They have always served as giant graveyard monuments.

The massive, monumental architecture of Egypt had glorified the State and the static social pyramid. It had inspired the wrong kind of awe. It had been designed by tyrants and built by slaves. The rulers of Egypt paid for such architecture but had not participated in its construction.

7. Ibid., pp. 43–44.

8. An earthquake around 1300 broke this exterior. The limestone remnants were removed in 1356 to make mosques and fortresses.

9. Chapter 2.

The “empire” architecture of almost every national capital—Washington, D. C., the Kremlin, Nazi Berlin—is easily recognizable. Government buildings look alike: huge stones piled straight up to impress anyone who walks by or walks in. They are designed to dwarf men in the presence of the power state. They are also designed to produce massive cost overruns and therefore immense profits for the construction firms that build them. The State requires appropriate sacrifices.

The tabernacle was uniquely suited to the wilderness experience. It was also uniquely suited to the spiritual needs of the Hebrews. They had to develop a wholly new sense of aesthetics. The tabernacle was portable, not a huge imitation of timeless eternity. God’s presence was made visible when Israel moved, in the pillar of fire and the cloud. God is a God of history, they learned.

The Hebrews could participate in the building of the tabernacle, if they were provided with teachers. This is precisely what God gave them. The tabernacle was neither designed by tyrants nor built by slaves. It inspired a sense of God’s presence, not a sense of man’s presence. It did not elevate an elite by humiliating the common man.

The construction of the tabernacle represented a definitive break with the architecture of empire. The psychological and aesthetic discontinuity with Egypt reinforced the covenantal discontinuity with Egypt that God required of them. They were not to bring the architectural leaven of Egypt into the promised land.

D. The Need for Aesthetic Continuity

The two senior craftsmen needed assistants. God gave them the ability to raise up apprentices who could multiply the skills of the masters. Instruction by masters led to an increase of productivity. The skills could be imparted, freeing up the time of the masters. Without this multiplication effect, it would have taken far longer to construct the tabernacle. The people would have been left in the wilderness for many years with memories of Egypt’s awesomeness and confronted by the sight of the architectural greatness of their enemies across the Jordan River. Without a magnificent alternative which testified to God’s ability as a designer, and which also testified to God’s ability to endow His people with the skills to construct such a symbol of God’s presence, the Hebrews would have suffered from an inferiority complex. The splendor of the tabernacle was clearly a psychological implementation of dominion.

Who got inside to see it? The priests. They served as representatives of the people. They shared with God the splendor of the interior. They experienced this splendor as representative agents of the nation. Nevertheless, everyone who read the account in Exodus knew what was inside. The people were called upon to visualize this splendor whenever they heard this section of the Word of God. They learned of a God who enjoys splendor for His own sake.

Man is made in God's image. Why, then, shouldn't a person enjoy the beauties of art for his own sake? Christian art and architecture do not have to serve the needs of State in order to be legitimate. Art must please God, but in a free society, God's delegated aesthetic agents are the patron and the artist, not anyone else. The very fact that the interior of the tabernacle had to be visualized by most Hebrews must have called forth the creative imaging process in the minds of artists.

They needed teachers. The students gained confidence in their ability to build. This gave them confidence concerning the future. They would not be dependent on the architectural capital of the Canaanites after the conquest. They would not be forced to live in the shadow of a rebellious culture's greatness. Apprentices now were present in the Hebrew commonwealth who had been given direction by master teachers who had been filled by God with the spirit of competence. The nation would not be forever dependent on the continuing miracles of architectural revelation and Spirit-filled craftsmen.

Men need self-confidence if they are to perform difficult tasks. If the two master craftsmen had been unable to impart their skills to others, then the society would have been aesthetically dependent on the one-time creation of two God-endowed men whose skills might not appear again. The Hebrews would then have lived in the fear of becoming aesthetic slaves to their experience in the wilderness, unable to take a progressive culture across the face of the globe in confidence.

Once the tabernacle was built, men who were recently trained in creative architecture could pass these skills down to their successors. This would not be easy in a wilderness. The locus of artistic creativity would have to be personal and local. Essentially, the source of demand must have been familial or tribal. The small scale of artistic creativity must have decentralized craftsmanship. This is one reason why we find no examples of magisterial artistry in the archeological digs of Israel.

Another reason was covenantal: they kept rebelling against God, and God kept delivering them into the hands of their enemies. There was a constant dispersion of Hebrew wealth out of the land. The discontinuities of Hebrew ethical life led to discontinuities in Hebrew artistic life. The disastrous cultural effects of these discontinuities are what Alfred Edersheim ignored when he wrote in the late-nineteenth century that "Israel, as a nation, was not intended to attain pre-eminence either in art or science. If we may venture to pronounce on such a matter, this was the part assigned, in the Providence of God, to the Gentile world. To Israel was specially entrusted the guardianship of that spiritual truth, which in the course of ages would develop in all its proportions, till finally it became the common property of the whole world. On the other hand, it was the task assigned to that world, to develop knowledge and thought so as to prepare a fitting reception for the truth. . . ." ¹⁰ This dualism between Israel's spirit and culture was never intended by God, nor did it ever exist. There was a unity between Israel's spirit of rebellion and the continual uprootings that God imposed as His covenantal judgment. There was a unity between these uprootings and the inability of the Israelites to produce anything artistic that survived.

Finally, wood was used extensively both for the temple and Solomon's house. Wood does not survive for eons. Common people in the ancient world used mud-based materials for their homes, or else used animal skins or wood. Only the State could afford to use stone extensively. The self-professed divine State had an incentive to build stone monuments, then as now, as testimonies to their hypothetical eternity. A handful of these monuments survived to become tombstones to dead civilizations.

Conclusion

The teachers provided both discontinuity and continuity. They provided discontinuity with the pagan past by enabling the Hebrews to break with Egypt and the surrounding Canaanite cultures. At the same time, their ability to instruct others provided continuity into a covenantal future, for the nation of Israel would not become stagnant architecturally. They could build a temple which would utilize some of the implements of the tabernacle. They could take the land of Canaan in the knowledge that what they might destroy in battle could be rebuilt, and not through imitation. Architecturally speaking, they had abandoned the monumental leaven of Egypt and had been given a new leaven which would enable the cultural loaf to rise in the promised land. They had abandoned the pyramids.

10. Alfred Edersheim, Bible History: Old Testament, 7 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1890] 1972), V, pp. 70–71.

The presence of teachers enabled the Israelites to make use of the division of labor principle, both in time and across time. Much of the artistry of the tabernacle was eventually transferred to the temple. Later generations continued the work in this way. The teachers brought God's presence to the people, not ritually but instead artistically. The artists were not God, but their skills manifested the instructions of God. There is a reason why artists have been regarded throughout history as special people, even mediatorial between man and God.

CONCLUSION

Tools of Dominion

I have more understanding than all my teachers: for thy testimonies are my meditation. I understand more than the ancients, because I keep thy precepts (Psalm 119:99–100).

Christians should take David's words seriously. He defined personal progress in history in terms of a better understanding of God's revealed laws. He could measure his progress beyond anything achieved by those who had preceded him, not in terms of better study techniques, or improved means of communication, or greater per capita wealth, but in terms of his mastery of God's precepts.

Modern man regards such an idea of historical progress as preposterous. Sad to say, so does the modern Christian. This is why modern society is headed either for an enormous series of disasters or an enormous and culturally comprehensive revival. God will not be mocked. His covenantal sanctions—blessings and cursings—still operate in history.

Part 3 is an exposition of God's covenantal case laws from an economic point of view. This strategy is theologically appropriate in the early twenty-first century, for modern man worships at his own shrine in the hope of achieving unbroken compound economic growth per capita. It was originally published as Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus (1990). It is a work of casuistry: the application of conscience to moral decisions. Conscience needs a reliable guide: biblical law.

Casuistry has not been a popular academic endeavor within Bible-believing Protestantism since the late seventeenth century. The only works I can think of that are anything like this volume in scope are Richard Baxter's enormous study, A Christian Directory, written in 1664–65 and first published in 1673, and Samuel Willard's equally massive commentary on the Westminster Shorter Catechism, A Compleat Body of Divinity (1726). Baxter's goal was basically the same as mine: "I do especially desire you to observe, that the resolving of practical Cases of Conscience, and the reducing of Theological knowledge into serious Christian Practice, and promoting a skilful facility in the faithful exercise of universal obedience and Holiness of heart and life, is the great work of this Treatise; . . ."¹ Unlike Baxter, I had access to my library when I wrote my book; he did not, having been barred from his pulpit by the state (after the Restoration of Charles II in 1660), and having to write most of it from memory, only subsequently checking the original sources.

A. Ignoring the Case Laws

The major problem I had in writing this book is that there are very few books that even explain the case laws, let alone take them seriously. There are at least three approaches to (or, more accurately, justifications for the rejection of) the case laws.

1. The Case Laws as Annulled

This is the standard Christian view. It has been the common viewpoint almost from the beginning of the church. Basically, it boils down to this: a compromise with late classical philosophy's natural law theory began in the early centuries of the church. Christian scholars appealed to universal human reason as the source of rational man's universal knowledge of civil law. This law was seen as natural, meaning that it is implicitly in the common possession of all rational men.

There was an early recognition on the part of church scholars and leaders that an appeal to Old Testament case laws could not be conformed intellectually to natural law theory. They understood the obvious question: "If these laws were universally binding on all men, then why did God have to reveal the specifics of His law to the Israelites, and only to them?" This, in fact, is a very good Christian rhetorical answer to those who declare the universality of natural law. The answer is simple: there is no such thing as a universal system of rational natural law that is accessible to fallen human reason. But this answer was too radical to suit scholars and apologists in the early church, just as it has been too radical for Christians ever since. It involves a sharp break with the doctrine of natural law.

1. Richard Baxter, A Christian Directory: Or, A Summ of Practical Theologie, and Cases of Conscience (London: Robert White for Nevil Simmons, [1673] 1678), unnumbered page: the second page of "Advertisements."

The early commentators were sorely tempted to seek a way out of their common-ground apologetic difficulty by interpreting Paul's language regarding the annulment of the law's eternal death sentence against redeemed mankind to mean that the Mosaic Covenant's legal order is in no way judicially binding on New Testament society. They abandoned the concept of God's historical sanctions as applicable in New Testament history. They lumped together Mosaic civil case laws with the Mosaic Covenant's laws of ritual cleanliness, and then they dismissed both standards of law. This tradition lives on in modern conservative Christian theology.

2. The Case Laws as Antiquarian

Christian Bible commentators pass over these laws on the assumption that they are only of antiquarian interest. Commentators almost never attempt to explain how these laws might have worked in ancient Israel. They never discuss how they might be applied in the New Testament era. Also, the commentators are unfamiliar with even the rudiments of economic theory, so their comments on the economic implications of these verses are almost nonexistent. Their few brief observations are what the reader could readily have figured out for himself.

Another major problem is this: far too often, the commentators compare the biblical text with fragments of the legal texts of the surrounding Near Eastern cultures. This is not an evil practice in itself, but it is when they make the unproven assumption that Israel must have borrowed its legal code from these pagan cultures. They never discuss the possibility that Israel's law code preceded these pagan extracts, which once again raises the question of the need for the reconstruction of biblical and Near Eastern chronologies.²

3. The Case Laws as Mythical

Theologically liberal Bible scholars are so enamored with biblical "higher criticism" that they pay little attention to the meaning of the biblical texts. They prefer instead to spend their lives inventing mulmultiple authors for each text, re-dating subsections in order to make the Book of Exodus appear to be a composite document written centuries after the exodus event (which many of them downplay anyway).³ When commentators believe that the oldest laws are remnants of some “primitive nomadism” or else imports from pagan law codes, they have no incentive to think through how these laws should be applied today. When they view most of the case laws as late developments that were inserted retroactively into older biblical texts for political reasons, they have little incentive to understand them as specific historical applications of permanent general principles. Jews and gentiles alike are afflicted with Bible scholarship that relies on the principles of higher criticism.

2. Appendix A: "The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology."

B. Useless Commentaries

An Economic Commentary on the Bible is not a typical Bible commentary. The typical Bible commentary judiciously avoids the really difficult questions, especially in the area of ethics. It also neglects all but the most obvious of the economic principles involved. It is painful to discover how little practical information is provided by the typical modern Bible commentary. It is understandable why people seldom use them after having bought them. Reality does not meet expectations when it comes to Bible commentaries. Yet people continue to buy them. Most commentaries sit unused on most pastors’ bookshelves. Maybe their primary use is decorative. I gave up on most Bible commentaries early in this project. I use them mainly to keep myself from making major linguistic or textual errors. This is why you will find very few references to Bible commentaries in my footnotes. I long ago stopped wasting my time trying to find economic and judicial information in them. Or, as the economist would say, “the marginal return on each additional invested unit of my time spent in reading them was consistently below the marginal cost.” In short, the information costs were too high per unit of relevant data.

3. In recent years, this has been changing to some degree. The arcane intricacies of the many rival textual reconstructions have led to such a cobweb of complexity that scholars prefer to avoid trying to untangle it. Thus, scholars are sorely tempted to do what was once considered a breach of faith: Treat the text as a unit when searching for its meaning.

1. Jewish Commentaries

If Christian commentaries are unhelpful, what about commentaries written by Jews? They are not much better. I did not find the commentaries written by medieval Jews more than occasionally useful in writing this commentary, including the Talmud. Until the mid-nineteenth century, Jewish scholarship focused almost exclusively on the Talmud, which was completed around A.D. 500, parts of which extended back to several centuries before Christ in the form of oral tradition.⁴ The Talmud was the huge compilation of Rabbinical comments on the Mishnah, the Pharisees' oral tradition of comments on the laws of Moses.

Traditional Jewish commentaries on ethics often deal with highly specific legal cases involving economic disputes between men in a rabbinical court, or academic disputes among the rabbis, but there is seldom an attempt to spell out the general economic principles guiding any decision of a Jewish court. At best, the rabbis may try to explain why certain forms of restitution are imposed in certain cases, but nothing beyond a kind of common-sense view of economic justice. Thus, Jewish religious scholars until very recently did not bring their great skills of erudition and detailed scholarship to bear on the modern world. "Secular" topics did not interest them, and even today, most Jews who have become illustrious academically in so many fields display little or no interest in the Talmud.

There is a very important reason why the writings of Jewish legal scholars and judges prove to be of little assistance: Jewish courts after Bar Kokhba's revolt failed in 135 A.D. were not allowed to impose specifically biblical sanctions. Very few gentiles are aware of this, and I suspect that few Jews are, either. When the Romans captured Jerusalem and burned the Temple in A.D. 70, the ancient official Sanhedrin court came to an end. The rabbis, under the leadership of Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai, then took over many of the judicial functions of the Sanhedrin.⁵ They established as a principle that every Jewish court must have at least one judge who had been ordained by the laying on of hands (semikah), and who could in principle trace his ordination back to Moses. This laying on of hands could take place only in the Holy Land. Legal scholar George Horowitz explained: "A court not thus qualified had no jurisdiction to impose the punishments prescribed in the Torah.”⁶ After Bar Kokhba’s revolt, the Jews were scattered across the Roman Empire in the diaspora. “The Rabbis were compelled, therefore, in order to preserve the Torah and to maintain law and order, to enlarge the authority of Rabbinical tribunals. This they accomplished by emphasizing the distinction between Biblical penalties and Rabbinical penalties. Rabbinical courts after the second century had no authority to impose Biblical punishments because they lacked semikah: but as regards penalties created by Rabbinical legislation, the Rabbis had of necessity, accordingly, a whole series of sanctions and penalties: excommunications, fines, physical punishment, use of the ‘secular arm’ in imitation of the Church, etc.”⁷ Thus, by the time of the Mishnah, which was Rabbi Judah the Prince’s authoritative late-second-century compilation of rabbinical laws, Jewish courts had already abandoned the Mosaic law’s sanctions.

4. See Appendix L: "Maimonides's Code: Is It Biblical?"

5. George Horowitz, The Spirit of Jewish Law (New York: Central Book Co., [1953] 1963), pp. 92–93.

Because they were tied intellectually and ethically to the Mishnah, to the Talmud, and to the judicial literature produced in terms of this ancient tradition, Jewish commentators have never attempted to produce anything like the kind of Bible commentary that mine represents. I am aware of no Jewish compilation of Old Testament case laws that is organized in terms of the Ten Commandments or any other biblical organizational principle (e.g., the covenant model) that is comparable to R. J. Rushdoony’s Institutes of Biblical Law. Furthermore, despite the intellectual dominance of economists who are Jews,⁸ there is as yet no body of scholarship known as Jewish economics.⁹ This is in sharp contrast to the Islamic academic community, which has produced a growing body of self-consciously Islamic economic literature, especially since 1975.¹⁰ With the exception only of Professor Israel Kirzner,

6. Ibid., p. 93.

7. Idem.

8. Murray Rothbard, an agnostic Jew and a defender of free market economics, once made the observation that “The fate of Western Civilization will be determined by whether our Jews beat their Jews.” He presumably had in mind Ludwig von Mises, Israel Kirzner, and Milton Friedman (in his anti-regulatory writings) vs. Karl Marx, Paul Samuelson, Lawrence Klein, etc.

9. The two titles that might be offered as examples of such scholarship are quite recent: Aaron Levine, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law (New York: Ktav Publishing House, Yeshiva University Press, 1980); Meir Tamari, “With All Your Possessions”: Jewish Ethics and Economic Life (New York: Free Press, 1987). Neither study is particularly theoretical or detailed in its practical applications. They are more like introductory surveys of a handful of themes in the Talmud that are related to economics.

10. See Muhammed Nejatullah Siddiqi, Muslim Economic Thinking: A Survey of Contemporary Literature (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1981); Muhammed

I can think of no contemporary academically recognized Jewish economist¹¹ who might agree with Rabbi Chajes' mid-nineteenth-century pronouncement: "Allegiance to the authority of the said [oral] rabbinic tradition is binding upon all sons of Israel, because these explanations and interpretations have come down to us by word of mouth from generation to generation, right from the time of Moses. They have been transmitted to us precise, correct, and unadulterated, and he who does not give his adherence to the unwritten law and the rabbinic tradition has no right to share the heritage of Israel; he belongs to the Sadducees or the Karaites who severed connection to us long ago."¹²

2. Orthodox Judaism

During the twentieth century in the West, Orthodox Judaism almost disappeared from sight in the United States, so widespread was the defection of millions of Jews who were assimilated into modern America. By Chajes' definition, there are today few Jews remaining in the world, except in the State of Israel. Even the term "Orthodox Judaism" indicates the nature of the problem; it was originally a term of de-

Akram Khan, Islamic Economics: Annotated Sources in English and Urdu (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1983). A cursory list of English-language examples of this literature includes the following: Ibnul Hasan (ed.), In Search of an Islamic Economic Model (London: New Century Publishers, 1983); Afzal-Ur-Rahman, Economic Doctrines of Islam, 4 vols. (Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications Limited, 1974-82); Muazzam Ali (ed.), Islamic Banks and Strategies of Economic Cooperation (London: New Century Publications, 1982); Mohammed Muslehuddin, Insurance and Islamic Law (Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications, 1969); Muslehuddin, Economics and Islam (Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications, 1974); Alhaj A. D. Ajijola, The Islamic Concept of Social Justice (Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications, 1977); Muhammed Nejatullah Siddiqi, Banking Without Interest (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1983); Siddiqi, Issues in Islamic Banking: Selected Papers (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1983); Siddiqi, Partnership and Profit-Sharing in Islamic Law (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1985); M. Umer Chapra, Towards a Just Monetary System (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1985); Waqar Masood Khan, Towards an Interest-Free Islamic Economic System (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1985); Raquibuz M. Zaman, Elimination of Interest from the Banking System in Pakistan (Karachi: State Bank of Pakistan, 1985). I do not believe that Shaikh Mahmud Ahmad's book, Economics of Islam (Lahore, Pakistan: Ashraf Press, 1947), is representative of recent Islamic economic thought in general; the book is a socialist polemic in the name of Islam.

11. Kirzner was not a prominent academic figure, but he was the only Austrian School economist who has a solid reputation among academic economists. Kirzner's dual mastery of the Talmud and the works of Ludwig von Mises is not visible in his writings; the two fields were kept by Kirzner in hermetically sealed separate academic compartments. Few professional economists are aware that he was known as a rabbi in Orthodox Jewish circles. See Aaron Levine, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law, p. xi.

riasion used by liberal Jews in the nineteenth century against their traditionalist opponents. Grunfeld wrote: "The word 'Orthodoxy', on the other hand, which was applied by the Reformers to what they called 'Old-Timers' or 'Old-Believers' (Altgläubige), was taken from the sphere of Christian theology and does not fit Judaism at all, in which the main stress is laid on action or law and not on 'faith', as the Greek term orthodox would express. Nevertheless, once the word 'Orthodoxy' had been thrown at Hirsch and his followers in a derogatory sense, he accepted the challenge with the intention of turning that word into a name of honour."¹³ Notice his assertion regarding Judaism that "the main stress is laid on action or law and not on 'faith.'" This is indeed the main stress of orthodox Judaism, which nevertheless has an underlying theology: salvation by law. Robert Goldenberg observed: "Classical Judaism, drawing indirectly on its biblical antecedents, tends to emphasize act over intention, behavior over thought. Righteousness is chiefly a matter of proper behavior, not correct belief or appropriate intention."¹⁴ In contrast, Christianity stresses salvation by faith in Christ. But this faith means faith in Christ's representative perfect obedience to God's perfect law. Christian orthodoxy should never lead to a denial of the validity and moral authority of the perfect law that Christ obeyed perfectly.

C. Revolution and Law

I am convinced that both the West and the Far East are about to experience a major transformation. The pace of social change is already rapid and will get faster. The possibility grows daily of a terrorist attack with a mini-neutron bomb against a government;¹⁵ so does 12. Z. H. Chajes, The Student's Guide Through the Talmud (London: East and West Library, 1952), p. 4. The Karaites were a sect of Judaism established in 767 A.D. by Jews in Babylon. They did not accept the Talmud or the idea of an oral tradition stretching back to Moses.

13. I. Grunfeld, "Samson Raphael Hirsch—The Man and His Mission," in Judaism Eternal: Selected Essays from the Writings of Samson Raphael Hirsch (London: Soncino Press, 1956), p. xlvii.

14. Robert Goldenberg, "Law and Spirit in Talmudic Religion," in Arthur Green (ed.), Jewish Spirituality: From the Bible Through the Middle Ages (New York: Crossroad, 1986), p. 232.

15. Sam Cohen, "The Coming Neutron Bomb Threat," Wall Street Journal (May 15, 1996). Cohen invented the neutron bomb in the late 1950s. He told me that the government's denial of this new technology matches its dismissal of his technology a generation ago. Telephone discussion with Cohen, Sept. 14, 1996.

the possibility of chemical and biological warfare;¹⁶ so does the threat of a pandemic. None of these threats to civilization may prove in retrospect to be devastating, but they are certainly perceived today as threats. Added to these grim possibilities is the much more predictable threat of an international economic collapse as a result of the vast build-up of international debt; this in turn could produce domestic political transformations. Drug addiction is spreading like a plague. Agricultural output may be endangered, long term, by weather changes¹⁷ and also by soil erosion. We are not sure. What Christians should be certain of is this: God has been plowing up the ethically erosion-prone world since World War I, and this process is accelerating.

This has created a unique opportunity for Christian revival, but this time revival could lead to a broad-based cultural transformation. Revival could produce an international revolution: family by family, church by church, nation by nation. For a true social revolution to take place, there must be a transformation of the legal order. This sort of transformation takes several generations, but without it, there has been no revolution, only a coup d'état.¹⁸ There is today an international crisis in the Western legal tradition.¹⁹ This fact testifies to the likelihood of a comprehensive, international revolution—not necessarily violent, but a revolution nonetheless. The Holy Spirit could produce such a revolution without firing a shot or releasing a virus into the atmosphere. This is my prayer. It should be every Christian's prayer.

Harold Berman's point is correct. Without a transformation of the legal system, there is no revolution. This is why I am devoting so much space to explaining the case laws of Exodus. It is these laws, and their amplification in the Book of Deuteronomy, that must serve as the foundation of any systematically, self-consciously Christian revolution. Natural law is a dead mule; it was always a sterile hybrid, and Darwinism has long-since killed the last known living specimens.²⁰ Anti-the-

16. Joseph D. Douglas and Neil C. Livingstone, America the Vulnerable: The Threat of Chemical and Biological Warfare (Lexington, Massachusetts: Lexington Books, 1987).

17. More likely cooling than warming.

18. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), p. 20.

19. Ibid., pp. 33–41.

20. R. J. Rushdoony wrote: "Darwinism destroyed this faith in nature. The process of nature was now portrayed, not as a perfect working of law, but as a blind, unconscious energy working profligately to express itself. In the struggle for survival, the fittest survive by virtue of their own adaptations, not because of natural law. Nature produces many 'mistakes' which fail to survive and become extinct species and fossils.

istic conservative philosophers and a handful of traditional Roman Catholic and Protestant college instructors and magazine columnists still visibly cling to one or another of these taxidermic specimens, each proclaiming that his specimen is still alive. Thus, there is nowhere for Christians to turn for guidance in developing a believable social theory and workable social programs except to the case laws of the Old Testament. Once the myth of neutrality is abandoned—really abandoned, not just verbally admitted to be a myth—then the inevitable question arises: By what standard? Christians who have abandoned faith in the myth of neutrality have only one possible answer: “By this standard: biblical law.”²¹

D. The Conflict Between Two Kingdoms

What I am attempting to do with my life is to publish Christian worldview materials that will lead to the steady replacement of the humanist intellectual foundations of modern civilization. The arena of conflict is nothing less than world civilization. The issue is the kingdom of God, both in heaven and on earth (Matt. 28:18).²²

1. Kingdom as Civilization

There are many books that deal with the kingdom of God, but my view of the kingdom of God as it is visibly manifested in history is simple: it is God’s authorized and morally required civilization. It is simultaneously internal (world-and-life view), ethical (a moral law-order), and institutional (covenantal judicial relationships). Raymond Zorn began his book on the Kingdom of God with these words: “In the broadest sense God’s Kingdom refers to the most extended reaches of His sovereignty. As Psalm 103:19 puts it, ‘The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all.’”²³ The king-

The destiny of the universe is extinction as its energy runs down.” Rushdoony, The Biblical Philosophy of History (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1963] 2000), p. 7. (<http://bit.ly/rjrbph>)

21. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God’s Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

22. Kenneth L. Gentry, The Greatness of the Great Commission (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1990). (<http://bit.ly/klgggc>)

23. Raymond O. Zorn, Church and Kingdom (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1962), p. 1. Zorn, an amillennialist, stressed the kingdom as the reign of God rather than the sphere or domain of His rule (p. 1). Greg Bahnsen’s response to this sort of argument is correct: it is ridiculous to speak of the reign of a king whose kingdom has few if any historical manifestations that are as comprehensive in scope as his

dom of God is all-encompassing, in the same sense that a civilization is all-encompassing.²⁴ I agree in principle with the Jewish scholar, I. Grunfeld, who wrote that “true religion and true civilisation are identical. It is the view of the Torah as the civilisation of the state of God—where Torah is coextensive with life in all its manifestations, personal, economic, political, national.”²⁵

Nothing less than this comprehensive replacement of humanism, Islam, and occultism with Christianity will suffice to please God. We are called to work for the progressive replacement of humanist civilization by Christian civilization, a replacement that was definitively achieved with the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, and manifested by the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. We are to replace Satan’s humanistic kingdoms. “Kingdom” is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of kingdom vs. no kingdom; it is always a question of whose kingdom. Rushdoony was correct in his evaluation of mankind’s inevitable quest for utopia, the final order, which only God can inaugurate and bring to pass. Rushdoony wrote: “The church accordingly has never been alone in history but has rather faced a multiplicity of either anti-Christian or pseudo-Christian churches fiercely resentful of any challenge to their claim to represent the way, truth self-proclaimed sovereignty. Such a limited definition of God’s kingdom and kingship is in fact a denial of God’s kingdom. Bahnsen, “The World and the Kingdom of God” (1981), reprinted as Appendix D in Gary DeMar and Peter J. Leithart, The Reduction of Christianity: A Biblical Response to Dave Hunt (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gdplreduction>)

24. I agree with Geerhardus Vos’ statement: “While thus recognizing that the kingdom of God has an importance in our Lord’s teaching second to that of no other subject, we should not go to the extreme into which some writers have fallen, of finding in it the only theme on which Jesus actually taught, which would imply that all other topics dealt with in his discourses were to his mind but so many corollaries or subdivisions of this one great truth. . . . Salvation with all it contains flows from the nature and subserves the glory of God. . . .” Geerhardus Vos, The Teaching of Jesus Concerning the Kingdom and the Church (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1958), p. 11. I am saying that the kingdom of God is inherently all-encompassing culturally. In fact, I am convinced that the best biblical definition of “kingdom” is civilization. The kingdom of God is the civilization of God—internal, external, heavenly, earthly, historical, and eternal.

25. Grunfeld, “Samson Raphael Hirsch—The Man and His Mission,” Judaism Eternal, I, p. xiv. Obviously, I do not agree with Grunfeld’s next sentence: “This concept is applicable, of course, only when there is a Jewish State, or at least an autonomous Jewish Society, which can be entirely ruled by the Torah.” This statement provides evidence of the accuracy of Vos’ analysis of Jewish teaching concerning the Kingdom of heaven: “The emphasis was placed largely on what the expected state would bring for Israel in a national and temporal sense. Hence it was preferably thought of as the kingdom of Israel over the other nations.” Vos, Kingdom and the Church, p. 19.

and life of that final order. The modern state, no less than the ancient empire, claims to be the vehicle and corporate body of that true estate of man. As the incarnation of that final order, it views family, church, school and every aspect of society as members and phases of its corporate life and subject to its general government. It is in terms of this faith, therefore, that the state claims prior or ultimate jurisdiction over every sphere, and steadily encroaches on their activity.”²⁶

2. Comprehensive Revival

Christian Reconstructionists are self-consciously attempting to lay new intellectual foundations for a comprehensive moral and therefore intellectual, social, political, and economic transformation of the world. Not until at least the preliminary steps in this theological and intellectual transformation are accomplished should we expect God to send worldwide revival. If the coming revival is not comprehensive in its effects, it will no more change the world permanently than earlier revivals have changed it permanently. The regeneration of people’s souls is only the first step on the road to comprehensive redemption. Christian philosopher Cornelius Van Til, who died in 1987, issued a warning: “The temptation is very great for the believers in these times when the Church is in apostasy, and its conquest of the world for Christ seems to be losing out, that they shall spend a great deal of their time in passive waiting instead of in active service. Another danger that lurks at a time of apostasy is that the few faithful ones give up the comprehensive ideal of the kingdom and limit themselves to the saving of individual souls.”²⁷ We need a comprehensive revival that will produce comprehensive redemption.²⁸

The message of the kingdom of God rests on a concept of salvation that is supernaturally imparted, not politically imparted. The kingdom of God is categorically not a narrow political program of social transformation. It is rather a supernaturally imposed salvational program that inevitably produces world-changing political, social, legal, and economic effects. Geerhardus Vos taught at Princeton Theological Seminary from 1893 until 1932. His book on the kingdom was published in 1958. I agree with his assessment regarding the ethical character of Christ's kingdom. "The kingdom represents the specifically evangelical element in our Lord's teaching. . . . Jesus' doctrine of the kingdom as both inward and outward, coming first in the heart of man and afterwards in the external world, upholds the primacy of the spiritual and ethical over the physical. The invisible world of the inner religious life, the righteousness of the disposition, the sonship of God are in it made supreme, the essence of the kingdom, the ultimate realities to which everything else is subordinate. The inherently ethical character of the kingdom finds subjective expression in the demand for repentance."²⁹ But ethics does not begin and end with personal behavior. It extends into every nook and cranny of life—wherever sin exercises influence. The kingdom of God competes with the kingdom of Satan—disguised as the kingdom of man—for control over history. To limit the kingdom of God to the human heart, the Christian family, and the Christian church is to surrender the rest of the world to Satan. This is pre-emptive surrender. Jesus Christ will have none of it. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28:18). God did not give Christ all power on earth in order for Christians to hand it back to Satan.

26. R. J. Rushdoony, Foreword, in Zorn, Church and Kingdom, pp. xix–xx.

27. Cornelius Van Til, Christian Theistic Ethics, vol. III of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1958] 1980), p. 122.

28. Gary North, “Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action” (1976), in North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

The primary need today, as always, is the need for widespread personal repentance before God. We therefore need a Holy Spirit-initiated Christian revival to extend the kingdom of God across the face of the earth. If we do not get this revival soon, my work and the work of those who were involved in the Biblical Blueprints project (1986–87) will remain curiosities, and then become antiquarian curiosities, until the revival comes.

3. Blueprints and Responsibility

Without a bottom-up religious transformation of civilization, the policies that we Christian Reconstructionists recommend will at best have only a peripheral influence on society. We expect the revival and this bottom-up transformation, if not in our own lifetimes, then eventually. The Bible's blueprints for society will eventually be universally adopted across the face of the earth as the waters cover the sea (Isa. 11:9).³⁰ Christian Reconstructionists regard this as historically inevit-

29. Vos, Kingdom and the Church, pp. 102–3.

30. J. A. De Jong, As the Waters Cover the Sea: Millennial Expectations in the Rise

able. This confidence is what makes the theonomic postmillennial worldview so hard-nosed and uncompromising. We annoy almost every Christian who has doubts about the earthly triumph of God's kingdom, which means that we initially alienate just about everyone who reads our materials. Our antinomian Christian critics call us arrogant. Bear in mind that the word "arrogant" usually means "a confident assertion of something I don't approve of."

Christians who doubt the future earthly triumph of God's kingdom tend to be less confident and less sure about the practical reliability of the Bible's blueprints. Sometimes they even deny that the Bible offers such blueprints. If it does offer such blueprints, then evangelical Christians have major responsibilities outside the sanctuary and the family. This prospect of worldwide, culture-wide responsibility frightens millions of Christians. They have even adopted eschatologies that assure them that God does not hold them responsible for anything so comprehensive as the transformation of today's sin-filled world. They do not believe that God offers to His church the tools, skills, and time necessary for such a generations-long project of social transformation. Therefore, they adopt the philosophy that says that Christians should not even try to reform society, for such efforts are futile, wasteful, and shift precious resources from the only legitimate tasks of the church: preaching individual salvation to the lost, and sustaining the converted spiritually in a time of inevitable cultural decline. They equate social reform programs with polishing brass on a sinking ship. As dispensationalist newsletter writer Peter Lalonde remarked concerning Christians who possess such a vision of God's world-transforming kingdom in history, "It's a question, 'Do you polish brass on a sinking ship?' And if they're working on setting up new institutions, instead of going out and winning the lost for Christ, then they're wasting the most valuable time on the planet earth right now, and that is the serious problem. . . ." ³¹ He devoted his career to promoting popular dispensationalism, focussing on prophecies that are supposedly being fulfilled in our day, despite the fact that academic dispensationalism has always taught that the clock of prophecy stopped in A.D. 70 and will not start again until the Rapture. His ministry was overwhelmingly devoted to prophecy, not evangelism or foreign missions. His audience was fun-of Anglo-American Missions, 1640–1810 (Kampen, Netherlands: J. H. Kok, 1970).

31. Tape One, Dominion: A Dangerous New Theology, in Dominion: The Word and the New World Order, a 3-tape set distributed by the Omega-Latter, Ontario, Canada, 1987.

damentalist Protestants who were looking for an escape from this world without having to die.

E. Doubt vs. Dominion

Christians, paralyzed by their own versions of eschatological pessimism, have not taken advantage of the growing self-doubt that is progressively paralyzing their humanistic opponents.

1. The Paralysis of Despair

Christians should recognize the extent of the despair that has engulfed those who have rejected the idea that the Bible is the infallible Word of God. An example of such despair is the following:

We live in a time in which old perspectives informing our understanding of the world have been seriously shaken by events of modern times. In many cases these old perspectives have collapsed; they no longer hold as our centers. . . . Against the backdrop of such events, an erosion of traditional values has taken place—an erosion which has left us feeling that we [are] adrift in a sea of relativity in which anything, including such evils as the holocaust or nuclear war might be rationalized as “necessary.” It is with this experience that we know that the cultural foundations have been shaken. We know that we are no longer guided by a vision of coherence and relatedness concerning our individual existence. We know that we are no longer bound together by a set of values infused with a common sense of destiny. Our sense of destiny, if any, is dominated by an uneasiness and sense of foreboding about the future. The future itself is now feared by many as the ultimate danger to the fragile hold we have on whatever security we have achieved in the present. All of this has left some to question the meaning of their endeavors, while it has left many with a sense of isolation and loneliness. The irony is that this new sense of insecurity has come at a time when the material well-being of those in the advanced industrial nations has reached a height hitherto undreamed of.³²

This is precisely what the Book of Deuteronomy predicts for a society that has covenanted with God, has been blessed with external wealth, and then has forgotten God in its humanistic confidence (Deut. 8:17): “. . . the LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind: And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life" (Deut. 28:65b–66). This sort of widespread pessimism leads either to cultural collapse or revival. The first is taking place visibly, yet revival is also becoming more likely. My mentor, sociologist Robert Nisbet asked this question: "[W]hat is the future of the idea of progress? Any logical answer must be that the idea has no future whatever if we assume the indefinite, prolonged continuation of the kind of culture that has become almost universal in the West in the late twentieth century. If the roots are dying, as they would appear to be at the present time, how can there be shrub and foliage?"³³ But, he then asked, "is this contemporary Western culture likely to continue for long? The answer, it seems to me, must be in the negative—if we take any stock in the lessons of the human past." He made no prophecies—much of his academic career has been devoted to reminding us that such comprehensive cultural prophecies are always overturned by the facts of the future³⁴—but he was correct when he wrote that "never in history have periods of culture such as our own lasted for very long." He saw "signs of the beginning of a religious renewal in Western civilization, notably in America."³⁵

32. Howard J. Vogel, “A Survey and Commentary on the New Literature in Law and Religion,” Journal of Law and Religion, I (1983), p. 151.

2. The Paralysis of Guilt

This should not be a time for pessimism among Christians. Yet it is. They are missing an opportunity that has not been seen since the late eighteenth century, and possibly since the resurrection of Christ. A universal world civilization now exists for the first time since the Tower of Babel. It is disintegrating morally as it grows wealthy. It is ripe for the harvest.

A successful harvesting operation requires tools. To take advantage of this unique historical opportunity, Christians need tools of dominion—blueprints for the reconstruction of the world. But Christians today do not see that God has given them the tools of dominion, His revealed law. They agree with the humanists who in turn agree among themselves, above all, that the Bible offers society no specific legal standards for comprehensive reform and reconstruction. They agree with such statements as the one made by the editor of The Journal of Law and Religion, who was also a professor of Constitutional law at a Catholic law school.

33. Robert A. Nisbet, History of the Idea of Progress (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 355–56.

34. Nisbet, "The Year 2000 And All That," Commentary (June 1968).

35. Nisbet, History, p. 356.

First, I assume that the Bible is not a detailed historical blueprint for American society, and that it does not contain much concrete guidance for the resolution of specific political conflicts or constitutional difficulties such as slavery and racism, sexism and equal opportunity to participate in society. The biblical traditions are not to be viewed as an arsenal of prooftexts for contemporary disputes. Contextual leaps from the situations in which the biblical authors wrote to the situations with which we find ourselves faced are likewise to be avoided.³⁶

Notice that he raised the controversial issue of slavery. So did a professor of Hebrew scriptures at Notre Dame University in Indiana: "Then there is the larger hermeneutical issue of the Christian appropriation of Old Testament law and the binding nature of biblical norms and stipulations in general. Who today, for example, would be prepared to argue that laws concerning the conduct of war or slavery retain their binding authority for the Christian or for anyone else?"³⁷ Who would? I would, and so would those who call themselves Christian Reconstructionists. This is why Christian Reconstruction represents a radical challenge to modern antinomian Christianity and modern humanism.

The enemies of God continue to bring up the issue of slavery in their war against Christianity. They seek to make Christians feel guilty regarding Christianity's theological and historical legacy. Christianity unquestionably condoned and even sanctioned chattel slavery until the nineteenth century. The enemies of Christianity then trace this judicial sanctioning of chattel slavery back to the Old Testament. In this way, they seek to create a sense of guilt and doubt in their targeted victims. They understand that guilt-ridden people are not effective opponents of the prevailing messianic social order. Rushdoony was correct when he said that "The reality of man apart from Christ is guilt and masochism. And guilt and masochism involve an unbreakable inner slavery which governs the total life of the non-Christian. The politics of the anti-Christian will thus inescapably be the politics of guilt. In the politics of guilt, man is perpetually drained in his social energy and cultural activity by his over-riding sense of guilt and his masochistic activity. He will progressively demand of the state a redemptive role. What he cannot do personally, i.e., to save himself, he demands that the state do for him, so that the state, as man enlarged, becomes the human savior of man.”³⁸

36. Edward McGlynn Gaffney, Jr., "Of Covenants Ancient and New: The Influence of Secular Law on Biblical Religion," Journal of Law and Religion, II (1984), pp. 117-18.

37. Joseph Blenkinsopp, "Biblical Law and Hermeneutics: A Reply to Professor Gaffney," ibid., IV (1986), p. 98.

That Christians failed for many centuries to challenge chattel slavery is a black mark in the history of the church. But to lay the blame at the doorstep of the Bible is either a mistake or an ideological strategy. If this book persuades Christians that this doubt-inducing accusation against the Bible regarding its supposed support of chattel slavery is false, then it will have achieved a major success.

F. Embarrassed by God's Laws

What we find in our day is that Christians despise biblical law almost as much as secular humanists do. Christians have begun to adopt arguments similar to those used by the English Deists. For example, they attack the very thought of stoning drunken, gluttonous sons—not young children, but adult sons who are living at home with their parents, debauching themselves—as some sort of “crime against humanity,” when stoning them is specifically a civil sanction authorized by God (Deut. 21:18).³⁹ The very idea of execution by public stoning embarrasses Christians, despite the fact that public stoning is by far the most covenantally valid form of execution, for God's law requires the witnesses to cast the first stones, and it also requires representatives of the entire covenantal community to participate directly, rather than hiding the act in a sanitary room in some distant prison. The Bible is clear: “The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hands of all the people. So thou shalt put the evil away from among you” (Deut. 17:7).

1. Stoning and Personal Responsibility

Stoning was a communal activity, an aspect of the civil covenant: sanctions. It took place outside the town (Lev. 24:14; Num. 15:35–36; I Kings 21:13). “If sentence was passed with the help of eye-witnesses, the witnesses had to begin the execution (Deut. 17:7). This was to discourage frivolous testimony in court."⁴⁰ Boecker argued that it was a form of excommunication, and that those stoned were not entitled to burial in the family plot, but he cited no Scriptural evidence. "For the ancients, the criminal was possessed of a real guilt which jeopardised the community. By covering the evil-doer with stones outside the town, the evil that he could spread was banished."⁴¹ This argument is ridiculous. It is a theological liberal's self-conscious attempt to reinterpret the Bible's covenantal concepts as magical. The execution of the evil-doer was sufficient to stop the spread of his evil. The pile of stones was intended rather to serve as a covenantal reminder. Each pile of stones testified to the reality of covenant sanctions, a monument to God's judgment of cursing in history, just as the stones from the River Jordan were made into a memorial of God's judgment of the deliverance of Israel (Josh. 4:7–8).

38. R. J. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1970] 1995), p. 9. (<http://bit.ly/rjrpgap>)

39. Ed Dobson and Ed Hindson, “Apocalypse Now?,” Policy Review (Fall 1986), p. 20.

Public stoning forces citizens to face the reality of the ultimate civil sanction, execution, which in turn points to God's ultimate sanction at judgment day. Stoning also faithfully images the promised judgment against Satan: the crushing of his head by the promised Seed (Gen. 3:15). Because most people, including Christians, do not want to think about God's final judgment, they prefer to assign to distant unknown executioners the grim task of carrying out God's judgment in private. This privatization of execution is immoral; it is itself criminal. It is unjust to the convicted criminal,⁴² and it is unjust to the surviving victims, who do not see God's justice done in public. The systematic impersonalism of capital punishment is the problem, not capital punishment as such. This deliberate impersonalism has corrupted the entire penal system today.⁴³

40. Hans Jochen Boecker, Law and the Administration of Justice in the Old Testament and Ancient East, translated by Jeremy Moiser (Minneapolis, Minnesota: Augsburg, [1976] 1980), p. 40.

41. Idem.

42. Public stoning would allow a condemned man to confront the witnesses and his executioners. The idea of a private execution where the condemned person cannot have a final word to those who have condemned him is anything but liberal-minded. It was long considered a basic legal privilege in the West for a condemned person to have this final opportunity to speak his mind. The sign of the intolerance of the "liberal" French Revolutionaries was their unwillingness to allow King Louis XVI to speak to the crowd at his execution. The judges had ordered drummers to begin drumming the moment he began to speak, which they did. Leo Gershoy, The French Revolution and Napoleon (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1933), p. 238.

43. Whereas men used to be flogged in public or put in the stocks for a few days, we now put them in hidden jails that are filled with a professional criminal class (as well as with AIDS-carrying homosexual rapists). This impersonalism of punishment

The growth of impersonalism has been a problem for the West from the beginning. Even in the days of public executions, several centuries ago, the axeman wore a face mask. The Bible does not allow the establishment of a professional, taxpayer-financed guild of faceless executioners who, over time, inevitably either grow callous and impersonal toward their awful (full of awe) task, or else grow sadistic. Instead, the Bible imposes personal responsibility on members of society at large for enforcing this ultimate sanction. But people in the Christian West have always refused to accept this God-imposed personal responsibility. They prefer to make a lone executioner psychologically responsible for carrying out the sentence rather than participate in this covenantal responsibility, as God requires. This refusal to accept personal responsibility by citizens led to a crisis in Western jurisprudence in the twentieth century. Decade by decade, the more consistent haters of God's law have become politically dominant. They have used the same kinds of arguments against capital punishment in general that embarrassed Christians had accepted in their rejection of public stoning. Step by step, society eliminates capital punishment. Men's hatred of God's law is steadily manifested covenantally in modern civil law.

It is painfully clear that most Christians today are embarrassed by God. He set forth laws that seem barbaric to modern Christians. The question is: Whose law is barbaric? Also, whose society honors the principles of civil righteousness? Finally, how can Christians answer this accurately if they reject God's revealed law as morally repulsive?

2. Economic Restitution

A considerable percentage of this book is devoted to a defense of the biblical concept of penal restitution. Convicted criminals are supposed to make restitution payments to their victims. This "revolutionary" idea is at last being taken seriously by a few judges in the United States.⁴⁴ But behind the ability of today's civil courts to impose the

has been paralleled by a steady bureaucratization and institutionalization of the penal system. The guards in prisons tend to become as impersonal and callous as their prisoners. Bukovsky wrote of Soviet prisons: "There's no real difference between the criminals and their guards. Except for the uniforms. The slang is the same, the manners, concepts, psychology. It's all the same criminal world, all joined by an unbreakable chain." Vladimir Bukovsky, To Build a Castle—My Life as a Dissenter (New York: Viking, 1978), p. 334.

44. For example, Lois G. Forer, Criminals and Victims: A Trial Judge Reflects on Crime and Punishment (New York: Norton, 1980).

sanction of restitution lies a greater threat to the criminal: imprisonment. This is the “dirty little secret” of those atheists, pietists, and antinomians who ridicule the biblical system of slavery. They have accepted the horror of unproductive imprisonment in place of the biblical institution of penal labor servitude, out of which an industrious slave could purchase his freedom. If the criminal in ancient Israel was financially unable to pay his victim, his sale to a slave-buyer was what provided the victim with his lawful restitution payment. The prison system has always been the Bible-hater’s preferred substitute for the Old Testament’s system of law-restricted labor servitude. In short, in order to enforce the Bible’s principle of economic restitution to victims by criminals, there always has to be a more fearful support sanction in reserve: death, imprisonment, whipping, banishment, or indentured servitude. But only one of these reserve sanctions raises money for the victims: indentured servitude. The critics of biblical law never remember to mention this fact.

G. The Fear of God’s Law

This hatred of God’s law has affected millions of Christians who sing the old hymn, “O How Love I Thy Law.” Even when they do not actively hate it (and most do), they are afraid of it. They have not studied it, and they have been beaten into intellectual submission by humanists, Christian antinomians, and those who fear personal and cultural responsibility.

A discouraging example of this is Dr. James Dobson, whose books, films, and daily radio broadcasts on Christian family issues inspired millions of Americans, and who by 1988 had become the Protestant evangelical leader in the United States with the largest and most dedicated following.⁴⁵ He led the fight against abortion and pornography, and the fight for home schooling and the re-establishment of godly disciplining of children in the home. Nevertheless, in a pamphlet against abortion, he rejected as inapplicable the single most important passage in the Bible that deals with abortion, one which makes abortion a capital crime, Exodus 21:22–25. In response to a preposterous misinterpretation of this passage by a state-licensed, profit-seeking “Christian” murderer (a pro-abortion gynecologist), Dr. Dobson did not refute the misinterpretation, but instead dismissed the Old Testament case laws as inappropriate guides for contemporary Christian righteousness. He asked his critic rhetorically:

45. Pat Robertson, by resigning from the ministry and also from his 700 Club television show in his quest for the Presidency in early 1988, inescapably exchanged his office of religious commentator for that of political activist. After his defeat in the Republican Party primaries, he returned to television, and he retained a large following, though smaller than when he left. His leadership role was probably perceived even by his most admiring followers as being different from what it had been before he entered politics.

Do you agree that if a man beats his slave to death, he is to be considered guilty only if the individual dies instantly? If the slave lives a few days, the owner is considered not guilty (Exodus 21:20–21)[?] Do you believe that we should stone to death rebellious children (Deuteronomy 21:18–21)? Do you really believe we can draw subtle meaning about complex issues from Mosaic law, when even the obvious interpretation makes no sense to us today? We can hardly select what we will and will not apply now. If we accept the verses you cited, we are obligated to deal with every last jot and tittle.⁴⁶

What we see here is an attempt to avoid dealing with “every last jot and tittle” of God’s inspired word. Yet it was Jesus who warned His people: “Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise [way] pass from the law, till all be fulfilled” (Matt. 5:18). Are we to ignore this? Dr. Dobson did. Admittedly, it is possible to argue that “heaven and earth” here mean the Old Covenant order, and that the fall of Jerusalem did fulfil the law. It is also possible to argue, as James Jordan has argued, that the death of Christ buried the law, and that His resurrection restored it in a new form, with the various dietary and ritual cleansing laws fulfilled (and therefore annulled in history) by the resurrection (Acts 10; I Cor. 8). But this does not absolve us from the difficult task that so disturbed Dr. Dobson, namely, selecting “what we will and will not apply now.” To retreat from this task of applied Christianity is to turn over the running of the world to pagan humanists and their theological allies, Christian antinomians. It is to turn the medical world over to the God-hating abortionists who are opposed so vigorously by Dr. Dobson. Yet this is precisely what every publicly visible Christian leader did throughout the twentieth century, and what almost all of them did after the late seventeenth century. It is universally assumed by Christians that the case laws of Exodus are null and void, and should be. It is this assumption that this book is designed to challenge.

46. James Dobson, “Dialogue on Abortion,” in Dobson and Gary Bergel, The Decision of Life (Arcadia, California: Focus on the Family, 1986), p. 14.

The tools of dominion, God's law, sit unused and generally unread by those who call themselves Christians. They are the best weapons that Christians possess for moral self-defense, because the best defense is a good offense, yet they steadfastly refuse to use them. To use God's Bible-revealed law effectively would require them to become intimately familiar with its many subtleties and complex applications, and even less appealing, to discipline themselves in terms of it. They prefer to let it sit unopened, either in their laps or on their shelves. Christians therefore continue to lose the war for civilization.

H. Tom Paine's Demon: The Bible

We know where antinomian (anti-God's law) theology has headed in the past: to Unitarianism, atheism, and bloody revolution. It winds up with the words of Tom Paine: that in consideration of "the obscene stories, the voluptuous debaucheries, the cruel and torturous executions, the unrelenting vindictiveness, with which more than half the Bible is filled, it would be more consistent that we called it the word of a demon, than the word of God."⁴⁷

Is the Old Testament the word of a demon? If not, then why do antinomian Christians—liberals and conservatives, neo-evangelicals and fundamentalists—continue to ridicule Old Testament law? They stick their fists in the face of the God of Psalm 119, and shout in defiance of His law: "Is God really nothing more than the abstract, impersonal dispenser of equally abstract and impersonal laws?"⁴⁸ Yes, He is much more than this. Among other things, He is the Eternal Slavemaster over those who rebel against Him, the dispenser not of abstract law but of personally experienced agony forever and ever. Hell is real. The lake of fire is real. God is therefore not to be mocked. But He has many mockers, and many of these mockers call themselves by His name. They do not fear Him.

Another major alternative to Paine's sort of outright apostasy is some variation of Marcion's second-century heresy of the two-gods theory of history. He said that an evil god operated in the Old Testament, but a nice god runs the world today. (For more details, see below: "The Continuing Heresy of Dualism.") Robert Davison was correct when he said that a “Marcionite tendency may be fairly traced in much modern discussion of Christian ethics, nor is this tendency confined to scholarly discussion.”⁴⁹

47. The Age of Reason, Part I; cited by David Brion Davis, The Problem of Slavery in the Age of Revolution, 1770–1823 (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1975), p. 525.

48. Rodney Clapp, "Democracy as Heresy," Christianity Today (Feb. 20, 1987), p. 23.

The third alternative is dispensationalism: God used the revealed laws of the Bible to govern people before the advent of Christ, but today we have new laws in operation, meaning vague, undefined personal laws, and no specifically New Testament cultural laws at all. The road to cultural impotence is paved with neat (and ultimately unworkable) solutions to difficult biblical problems. Slavery is one of these difficult problems.

We must search for the moral principle that undergirded each Old Testament law. When we find it, we can then begin to discuss how or to what extent God expects the civil government or some other government to enforce it today. Those who begin with the presupposition that a particular Old Testament law or God-required Israelite practice was innately evil have already taken the first step toward Paine’s view: The Bible is the word of a demon.

Christians today are afraid of the laws in the Bible. They are actually embarrassed by these laws. They do not recognize that biblical law is a two-edged sword of God’s judgment: blessing for the righteous, but cursing for the unrighteous (Rom. 13:1–7). They do not understand that God’s law-order for society is merciful. For example, God allows the death penalty for kidnappers (Ex. 21:16).⁵⁰ The death penalty used to be imposed on kidnappers in the United States, and kidnapping was rare. It is no longer imposed regularly, and kidnapping has become a blight. Kidnapping by terrorists in Europe is commonplace in the 1980s in the final stages of European Marxism. Who says that God’s law regarding kidnapping is too harsh? Harsher than kidnapping itself? So it is with all of God’s civil laws. They are merciful compared with the effects of unpunished evil. The modern world is learning just how unmerciful a society can be that is not governed by biblical law.

I. “Theocraphobia”: Fear of God’s Rulership

When, in a court of law, the witness puts his hand on the Bible and swears to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help him God, he thereby swears on the word of God—the whole word of God, and nothing but the word of God. The Bible is a unit. It is a “package deal.” The New Testament did not overturn the Old Testament; it is a commentary on the Old Testament. It tells us how to use the Old Testament properly in the period after the death and resurrection of Israel’s Messiah, God’s Son.

49. Robert Davison, “Some Aspects of the Old Testament Contribution to the Pattern of Christian Ethics,” Scottish Journal of Theology, 12 (1959), p. 374; cited by Walter Kaiser, Toward Old Testament Ethics (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1983), p. 23.

50. Chapter 34.

1. The New Testament and Biblical Law

Jesus said: “Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am come not to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise [way] pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 5:17–19). Christ took the Old Testament seriously enough to die for those condemned to the second death (Rev. 20:14) by its provisions. The Old Testament is not a discarded first draft of God’s word. It is not “God’s word (emeritus).”

If anything, the New Testament law is more stringent than the Mosaic law, not less stringent. Paul wrote that an elder cannot have more than one wife (I Tim. 3:2). The king in the Old Testament was forbidden to have multiple wives (Deut. 17:17). This was not a general law, unless we interpret the prohibition of Leviticus 18:18 as applying to all additional wives, and not just to marrying a woman’s sister, as ethicist John Murray interpreted it.⁵¹ If we attempt to interpret Leviticus 18:18 in Murray’s fashion, the question arises: Why specify kings as being prohibited from becoming polygamists if the same law applied to all men anyway? Possibly to prohibit the system of political covenanting through marriage. Certainly, there is no equally clear-cut Old Testament prohibition against polygamy comparable to I Timothy 3:2, which indicates a tightening of the legal requirements for at least church officers. The New Testament appears to be more rigorous than the Old in this instance. Another alteration in marriage law that we find in the New Testament is the abolition of concubinage that resulted from Christ's fulfillment of the terms of the Old Testament's bride price system.⁵² There are no more second-class wives.

51. John Murray, Principles of Conduct (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1957), Appendix B. Catholic theologian Angelo Tosato agreed with him: “The Law of Leviticus 18:18: A Reexamination,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly, vol. 46 (1984), pp. 199–214. They are not followed in this view by most Protestant commentators, nor by Nachmanides, who said that the verse applies only to a woman’s sister: Rabbi Moshe ben Nachman [Ramban], Commentary on the Torah: Leviticus (New York: Shilo, [1267?] 1973), p. 255.

Dominion Christianity teaches that there are four covenants under God, meaning four kinds of vows under God: personal (individual), and the three institutional covenants—ecclesiastical, civil, and familial.⁵³ All other human institutions (business, educational, charitable, etc.) are to one degree or other under the jurisdiction of one or more of these four covenants. No single human covenant is absolute; therefore, no single human institution is all-powerful. Thus, Christian liberty is liberty under God and God's law, administered by plural legal authorities.

What of the dominion covenant (Gen. 1:27–28)?⁵⁴ It was given to all mankind through Adam. Unlike the other four, the dominion covenant requires no formal oath by man, for the oath was taken by God on mankind's behalf. "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. . . ." The dominion covenant was imposed on Adam before he was created. It defines man as God's covenantal agent. Men cannot escape from its primary legal requirement: to exercise dominion over the creation.⁵⁵ The dominion covenant precedes and is superior to the other four oath-bound covenants, because it defines man's tasks. The other covenants are governed by the dominion covenant's requirements. It had no negative sanctions in its original form, but its specific application did: the penalty for violating the ban on the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.

2. Biblical Pluralism

There is no doubt that Christianity teaches pluralism, but a very special kind of pluralism: plural institutions under God's single comprehensive law system. It does not teach a pluralism of law structures, or a pluralism of moralities, for this sort of hypothetical legal pluralism (as distinguished from institutional pluralism) is always either polythe-

52. Chapter 32.

53. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

54. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), ch. 4.

55. The command to multiply is specifically directed to the family covenant and is limited to history.

istic or humanistic.⁵⁶ Christians are required to take dominion over the earth by means of all three God-ordained institutions, not just the church, or just the state, or just the family. The kingdom of God includes every human institution, and every aspect of life, for all of life is under God and is governed by His unchanging principles. All of life is under God and God's law because God intends to judge all of life in terms of His law.⁵⁷

In this structure of plural governments, the institutional churches serve as advisors to the other institutions (the Levitical function), but the churches can only pressure individual leaders through the threat of excommunication. As a restraining factor on unwarranted church authority, an excommunication by one local church or denomination is always subject to review by another, if and when the excommunicated person seeks membership elsewhere. Thus, each of the three covenantal institutions is to be run under God, as interpreted by its lawfully elected or ordained leaders, with the advice of the churches, not their compulsion.

All Christians are in principle theocrats. All Christians say that God rules the universe. God (theos) rules (kratos). Theocracy means simply that God rules. He rules in every area of life: church, state, family, business, science, education, etc. There is no zone of neutrality. There is no “king’s x” from God. Men are responsible for everything they think, say, and do. God exercises total jurisdiction. Jurisdiction means law (juris) and speaking (diction). God speaks His word. It is a comprehensive word. Anyone who says that God’s law does not apply to some area of life is thereby saying that God does not have jurisdiction in that area: “No law—no jurisdiction.”

3. A Scare Word

The word “theocracy” is a scare word that humanists and frightened Christians use to chase dedicated Christians away from areas of their God-given responsibility. The critics focus on politics and civil government, as if God’s rule in this area were somehow evil. Because almost all humanists today believe in salvation through legislation,⁵⁸

56. Gary DeMar, Ruler of the Nations: The Biblical Blueprints for Government (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gdmruler>)

57. Ibid., ch. 4.

58. The exceptions to this rule are classical liberals and free market economists like F. A. Hayek and Milton Friedman, traditional conservatives like Russell Kirk and William F. Buckley, neo-conservatives like Irving Kristol, and outright anarchists like they necessarily believe that politics is the primary means of social healing.⁵⁹ Marxists have been the most consistent defenders of human transformation through political action: the religion of revolution.⁶⁰ Because Christians are today so used to thinking in these humanistic categories, they seldom think to themselves: “Wait a minute. I know that God rules the family, and the government of my family should reflect this fact. God also rules the church, and the government of my church is supposed to reflect this fact. I know that God rules all civil governments, too. So, why should it be evil for Christians to work hard to see to it that the civil government reflects this fact, just as they do in their families, churches, and businesses?” In short, why should politics be outside the realm of God-honoring Christian action?⁶¹

Humanist critics present Christians with a kind of mental image: a scarecrow that is locked in the stocks of Puritan New England. Every time a Christian walks by this scarecrow, a tape recorded message blares out: “Beware of theocracy! Beware of theocracy!” If the critics meant, “Beware of ecclesiocracy,” meaning civil rule by the institutional church, they would have a valid point, but they mean something different: “Beware of Christians in every area of life who seek to exercise biblical dominion under God by obeying and enforcing God’s holy law.”

What “Beware of theocracy!” really means is, “Beware of God’s righteous rule!”

J. De-Funding the Welfare-Warfare State

Those who reject the theocratic ideal are ready to accuse Calvinists of being tyrants. Historian Ronald Wells of Calvin College wrote an attack on Francis Schaeffer, which appeared in a collection of essays that is best described as a neo-evangelical tirade. He pointed to the unfootnoted and unmentioned links between certain aspects of Schaeffer’s social thought and Christian Reconstructionism, and then observed: “This tendency to promote one’s own view by ‘law’ has always

Murray N. Rothbard.

59. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), chaps. 2–5, 8–9, 11. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

60. Gary North, Marx’s Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos, rev. ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnmrro>)

61. George Grant, The Changing of the Guard: The Biblical Blueprint for Politics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/GrantGuard>)

been the dangerous part of Calvinism: one sees Calvinists in power as triumphal and dictatorial. . . . Calvinists in power have wielded that power oppressively."⁶²

I suspect that we Reconstructionists were Mr. Wells' target, for we are the only Christians on earth calling for the building of a biblical theocracy. What I also suspect is that what really disturbs our neo-evangelical academic critics is that we perceive this theocracy as a system of decentralized power. We call for a vast purging of present-day national power, both political and economic. We call for the dismantling of the welfare-warfare state, most notably every aspect of taxpayer-financing for education.⁶³ I have called for a reduction of aggregate taxes to the level required by I Samuel 8: where all levels of civil government combined are allowed to collect less than 10% of the net increase of annual private personal productivity.⁶⁴ The local sales tax should be the primary local tax. I support the abolition of the local property tax and all state and national direct taxation, which includes the graduated income tax, the Social Security tax, the corporate income tax, the capital gains tax, and all sales taxes of citizens, including tariffs. I recommend the abolition of all direct taxation by any agency of civil government above the local township or county. Every other level of civil government would be forced to seek its revenues by taxing the level of civil government immediately below it. Civil governments above the most local would have to live off the revenues collected from other civil governments. This would decentralize power with a vengeance.

The model here is the church. A local church has a right to require a tithe of its voting members. Those who vote to spend the money should share an equal percentage burden in funding the local church. But what if, after paying their tithes to the local church, the members were required to pay an even larger amount to the bishop? And after paying his office, the denomination's council of bishops required an even larger payment? We would see an exodus from hierarchical denominations and millions of newly converted Baptists, Congregationalists, and Pentecostals. Local congregations may be asked by the hierarchy to fund the hierarchy, but members' direct donations to the hierarchy are voluntary. To argue otherwise is to defend ecclesiastical tyranny. What Christians can easily understand with respect to church government, they reject when applied to civil government: the taxpayer as a sheep to be sheared by separate levels of shearers.

62. Ronald A. Wells, "Schaeffer on America," in Ronald W. Ruesegger (ed.), Reflections on Francis Schaeffer (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1986), p. 237.

63. Robert L. Thoburn, The Children Trap: Biblical Blueprints for Education (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/ThobrunCT>)

64. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), p. 61. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

The Reconstructionists' version of theocracy is a decentralized system of multiple competing governments in which the modern messianic state and its economic subsidies would be dismantled. By modern political standards, such a vision of the shrinking of the centralized power civil government is nothing short of utopian.

In short, if the Reconstructionists' version of theocracy were to be voted into operation, the tenured, subsidized intellectual class to which our academic critics belong would experience the end of its taxpayer-financed bonanza. An entire class would have to enter the competitive free market and seek productive employment. Customers would reward former college professors in terms of what customers want to buy, not what state legislatures want to buy. There would be no more compulsory education and no more tax support of existing schools. This fear, rather than the fear of tyranny, may well be the true underlying concern of our critics.

K. Majority Rule

The Bible does not allow the imposition of some sort of top-down bureaucratic tyranny in the name of Christ. The kingdom of God requires a bottom-up society. The bottom-up Christian society rests ultimately on the doctrine of self-government under God, with God's law as the publicly revealed standard of performance.⁶⁵ It is the humanists' view of society that promotes top-down bureaucratic power.

The basis for building a Christian society is evangelism and missions that lead to a widespread Christian revival, so that the great mass of earth's inhabitants will place themselves under Christ's protection, and voluntarily use His covenantal laws for self-government. Christian reconstruction begins with personal conversion to Christ and self-government under God's law; then it spreads to others through revival; only later does it bring comprehensive changes in civil law, when the vast majority of voters voluntarily agree to live under biblical blueprints.

Let us get this straight: Christian reconstruction depends on major- ity rule. Of course, the leaders of the Christian Reconstruction movement expect a majority eventually to accept Christ as savior. We believe in postmillennialism.⁶⁶ Those who do not share our confidence concerning the future success of the gospel, as empowered by the Holy Spirit, believe that an earthly kingdom must be imposed by force from the top down (premillennialism),⁶⁷ or else they do not believe in an earthly institutional kingdom at all (amillennialism).⁶⁸ Postmillennialists disagree, for several reasons.

65. DeMar, Ruler of the Nations, ch. 2.

Premillennialism and amillennialism both deny that the preaching of the gospel can ever bring a majority of people to faith in Christ, thereby bringing in the earthly kingdom of God in history on a voluntary basis, person by person, culture by culture. Premillennialist author

66. David Chilton, Paradise Restored: A Biblical Theology of Dominion (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/dcpardise>); Roderick Campbell, Israel and the New Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Divinity School Press, [1954] 1981); R. J. Rushdoony, Thy Kingdom Come: Studies in Daniel and Revelation (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2001).

67. The accountant and popular dispensationalist author Dave Hunt wrote: "During His thousand-year reign, Christ will visibly rule the world in perfect righteousness from Jerusalem and will impose peace on all nations. Satan will be locked up, robbed of the power to tempt. Justice will be meted out swiftly." Hunt, Beyond Seduction: A Return to Biblical Christianity (Eugene, Oregon: Harvest House, 1987), p. 250. If Satan is unable to tempt mankind, then any evil that calls forth Christ's justice must be man-based evil. In a taped interview with Peter Lalonde, released in early 1987, Hunt said: "Christ himself is physically here. And He has us, the redeemed in our resurrection bodies, that nobody can kill us. And we are helping Him to maintain order. He is forcing this world to behave, and He gives a restoration of the Edenic state, so that the desert blossoms like a rose, and the lion lies down with the lamb, and you've got paradise on earth, once again, with Christ Himself maintaining it and, even better than the garden of Eden, Satan is locked up for a thousand years." Dominion and the Cross, Tape One of Dominion: The Word and the New World Order, op. cit., 1987. It should be pointed out that Hunt's argument that resurrected saints will return to rule with Jesus during the earthly millennium has long been rejected by dispensational theologians at Dallas Theological Seminary. Resurrected saints will be dwelling in a place called the heavenly Jerusalem, argued J. Dwight Pentecost: "The Relation between Living and Resurrected Saints in The Millennium," Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. 117 (October 1960), pp. 335–37. See also John F. Walvoord, The Rapture Question, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academie, 1979), pp. 86–87.

68. Oddly enough, Hunt also denied that there can ever be an earthly kingdom, even in the dispensational millennium. He said in his taped interview: "What happens at the end of this time, when Satan is loosed? He deceives the nations and like the sand of the seashore, so many—a multitude. They gather their armies and come against Christ in Jerusalem. And, of course, that is when they finally have to be banished from God's presence forever. I believe it's the final proof of the incorrigible nature of the human heart. So, Christ Himself cannot make humanity behave. He cannot by legislation, or by political or military or coercive means, establish this kingdom." Ibid., Tape Two

Dave Hunt went so far as to argue that such a person-by-person extension of God's kingdom is literally impossible for God to achieve.⁶⁹ Thus, in order to produce universal peace on earth, premillennialists have always maintained, Jesus will have to impose a top-down bureaucracy when He comes to reign in person.

In opposition to this view, amillennialists deny the premillennial doctrine that Jesus will ever physically return in history. They insist (as postmillennialism also insists) that Jesus will physically appear only at the end of history at the final judgment. They therefore deny (in contrast to postmillennialism) the possibility of an earthly manifestation of God's comprehensive kingdom of God in history.

Because of their joint denial of the widespread acceptance of the gospel at any point in history, premillennialists and amillennialists alike invariably associate the word "theocracy" with some sort of top-down, power-imposed, widely resisted rule that is imposed by an elite. Premillennialists accept this as a valid system of civil rule, but only if Christ personally and physically runs it from the top of the bureaucratic pyramid. Amillennialists deny that Christ will ever do this in history, so they deny bureaucratic theocracy's legitimacy at any point in the pre-final judgment future.

First, we Calvinistic postmillennialists disagree with both groups concerning the supposed impotence of the gospel in history in changing whole societies, person by person. We believe that the Holy Spirit will impose His will on the recalcitrant hearts of huge numbers of people, just as He has always imposed His will on each recalcitrant heart every time He has saved anyone from his sins. God is utterly sovereign in election and salvation. He changes people's hearts, transforming them so that they can respond in faith to the free offer of the gospel. "The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will" (Prov. 21:1). This is the only way that anyone has ever been saved, for the natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit, for they are foolishness to him (I Cor. 2:14). The natural man does not partially receive the things of the Spirit in his unsaved state; he rejects the very idea that such a wrathful God exists. Thus, he needs to be transformed before he can accept the gospel.

69. He said this: "In fact, dominion—taking dominion and setting up the kingdom for Christ—is an impossibility, even for God. The millennial reign of Christ, far from being the kingdom, is actually the final proof of the incorrigible nature of the human heart, because Christ Himself can't do what these people say they are going to do—New Agers or Manifested Sons." (Verbal emphasis in the original interview.) Dominion, Tape Two.

Second, because we Calvinistic Christian Reconstructionists believe that the Holy Spirit forces hearts to change—the doctrine of irresistible grace—we also believe that human institutions are not allowed to seek to coerce men’s hearts and minds. Such coercion of the human will, meaning its transformation prior to the prior permission of the individual whose will is being transformed, is a monopoly that belongs exclusively to God. We insist that coercion is an inescapable concept in history. It is never a question of coercion vs. no coercion. It is always a question of whose coercion. We affirm the power of the Holy Spirit to change men’s souls—to declare judicially that they are saved, and therefore possess Christ’s righteousness—and to change them ethically at the point of their ethical transformation. Those who deny this exclusive power of the Spirit in transforming the lives of covenant-breakers instinctively expect to find coercion somewhere else: in human institutions—either humanist or “theocratic-bureaucratic”—or in a future personal kingdom ruled by Christ in Person.

Third, because we postmillennialists find it taught in the Bible that there will be a future outpouring of this soul-transforming Holy Spirit—the only possible basis of the Bible’s prophesied millennial blessings—we disagree with premillennialists concerning the limited extent of the Spirit’s work in the future. The kingdom will not be brought in by a bureaucratic, international, theocratic regime imposed by Jesus in person, but by the heart-transforming work of the Holy Spirit. We therefore disagree with them concerning the supposed necessity of defining theocracy as a top-down social transformation. God’s kingdom rule is always bottom-up: self-government under God. So, we do not call for a theocratic bureaucracy, either now or in the future. Such a top-down bureaucracy is not called for in the Bible, is impossible to maintain without unlawful coercion, and is not necessary to impose to bring in the kingdom. Christian Reconstructionists call instead for a decentralized, international, theocratic republic. Such a republic is ethically necessary, now and in the future, and it will be historically possible in the future, when the Holy Spirit begins His visibly triumphant sweep of the nations.

If postmillennialism is incorrect, and the Holy Spirit does not act to bring huge numbers of people to eternal life, then Christians must be content with only partial social reconstruction, and only partial external blessings from God. The earthly manifestations of God’s heavenly kingdom will necessarily be limited. When we pray, “Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven,” we should expect God to answer this prayer. But premillennial Christians teach that God will never answer this prayer before Jesus comes again physically to rule the world in person. If they are correct, then we will not see the pre-second coming advent of a holy commonwealth in which God’s laws are honored. We must content ourselves with less.

It is not possible to ramrod God’s blessings from the top down, unless you are God. Only humanists think that man is God. Christian Reconstructionists are trying to get the ramrod away from them, and then to melt it down. This melted ramrod could then be used to make a great grave marker for humanism: “The God That Failed.”

L. The Continuing Heresy of Dualism

Dualism teaches that the world is inherently divided: spirit vs. matter, or law vs. mercy, or mind vs. matter, or nature vs. grace. What the Bible teaches is that this world is divided ethically and personally: Satan vs. God, right vs. wrong, freedom vs. tyranny. The conflict between God and Satan will end at the final judgment. Whenever Christians substitute some other form of dualism for ethical dualism, they fall into heresy and suffer the consequences. This is what has happened today. We are suffering from revived versions of ancient heresies.

1. Marcion’s Dualism

The Old Testament was written by the same God who wrote the New Testament. There were not two gods in history, meaning there was no dualism or radical split between the two testamental periods. There is only one God, in time and eternity.

This idea has had opposition throughout church history. An ancient two-gods heresy was first promoted in the church about a century after Christ’s crucifixion, and the church has always regarded it as just that, a heresy. It was proposed by a man named Marcion. Basically, this heresy teaches that there are two completely different law systems in the Bible: Old Testament law and New Testament law (or non-law). But Marcion took the logic of his position all the way. He argued that two law systems means two gods. The god of wrath wrote the Old Testament, and the god of mercy wrote the New Testament. In short: “two laws—two gods.”

You would be surprised how many Christians still believe something dangerously close to Marcionism: not a two-gods view, exactly, but a “God-who-changed-all-His-rules” view. They begin with the accurate teaching that the ceremonial laws of the Old Testament were fulfilled by Christ, and therefore that the unchanging principles of worship are applied differently in the New Testament, but then they erroneously conclude that the whole Old Testament system of civil law was dropped by God, and nothing biblical was put in its place. In other words, God created a sort of vacuum for civil law.

This idea turns civil law-making over to Satan. In our day, this means that civil law-making is turned over to humanism. Christians have unwittingly become the philosophical allies of the humanists with respect to civil law. With respect to their doctrine of the state, therefore, most Christians hold what is in effect a two-gods view of the Bible.

2. Gnostic Dualism

Another ancient heresy that is still with us is gnosticism. It became a major threat to the early church almost from the beginning. It was also a form of dualism, a theory of a radical split. The gnostics taught that the split is between evil matter and good spirit. Thus, their goal was to escape this material world through other-worldly exercises that punished the body. They believed in retreat from the world of human conflicts and responsibility. Some of these ideas got into the church, and people started doing ridiculous things. So-called “pillar saints” became temporarily popular in the fifth century, A.D. A “saint” would sit on a platform on top of a pole for several decades without coming down. This was considered very spiritual.⁷⁰ (Who fed them? Who cleaned up after them?)

Thus, many Christians came to view “the world” as something permanently outside the kingdom of God. They believed that this hostile, forever-evil world cannot be redeemed, reformed, and reconstructed. At best, it can be subdued by power (maybe). Jesus did not really die for it, and it cannot be healed. This dualistic view of the world vs. God’s kingdom narrowly restricted any earthly manifestation of God’s kingdom. Christians who were influenced by gnosticism concluded that God’s kingdom refers only to the institutional church. They argued that the institutional church is the only manifestation of God’s kingdom.

70. Kenneth Scott Latourette, A History of Christianity (New York: Harper & Row, 1953), pp. 228, 298.

This led to two opposite and equally evil conclusions. First, power religionists who accepted this definition of God's kingdom tried to put the institutional church in charge of everything, because it is supposedly "the only manifestation of God's kingdom on earth." To subdue the supposedly unredeemable world, which is forever outside the kingdom, the institutional church has to rule with the sword, they concluded. The institutional church must give orders to the state, and the state must enforce these orders with the sword. The institutional church must therefore concentrate political and economic power. What then becomes of liberty?

Second, escape religionists who also accepted this narrow definition of the kingdom sought refuge from the evil world of matter and politics by fleeing to hide inside the institutional church, an exclusively "spiritual kingdom," now narrowly defined. They abandoned the world to evil tyrants. What then becomes of liberty? What becomes of the idea of God's progressive restoration of all things under Jesus Christ? What, finally, becomes of the idea of biblical dominion?

When Christians improperly narrow their definition of the kingdom of God, the visible influence of God's comprehensive kingdom, which is both spiritual and institutional at the same time, begins to shrivel up. The first heresy leads to tyranny by the church, and the second heresy leads to tyranny over the church. Both of these narrow definitions of God's kingdom destroy the liberty of the responsible Christian man, self-governed under God and God's law.

3. Manichaeism

The last ancient pagan idea that still lives on is also a variant of dualism: matter vs. spirit. It teaches that God and Satan, good and evil, are forever locked in combat, and that good never triumphs over evil. The Persian religion of Zoroastrianism has held such a view for over 2,500 years. The enormously popular Star Wars movies were based on this view of the world: the "dark" side of "the force" against its "light" side. In modern versions of this ancient dualism, the "force" is usually seen as itself impersonal: individuals personalize either the dark side or the light side by "plugging into" its power.

There are millions of Christians who have adopted a very pessimistic version of this dualism, though not in an impersonal form. They believe that God's kingdom is battling Satan's, and God's is losing. History is not going to get better. In fact, things are going to get a lot worse externally. Evil will visibly push good into the shadows. The church is like a band of soldiers who are surrounded by a huge army of Indians. "We can't win, boys, so hold the fort until Jesus and the angels come to rescue us!"

That does not sound like Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Gideon, and David, does it? Christians read to their children the children's favorite story, David and Goliath, yet in their own lives, millions of Christian parents really think that the Goliaths of this world are the unbeatable earthly winners. Christians have not even picked up a stone.

Until very recently.

Conclusion

We must not come to the Old Testament with a sense of fear and loathing. The Old Testament provides us with a vision of victory and the tools of dominion, namely, God's Bible-revealed laws. These laws are not a threat to us as Christians; they are the foundation of our efforts to reconstruct society.

Christians have not wanted to think about God's Bible-revealed law. It reminds them of their sins of commission. It also reminds them of their sins of omission. They have failed to press the claims of Jesus Christ in every area of life. They have failed to challenge the sins of this age. They have refused to tell the world that God really does have specific answers for every area of life, including economics and politics. Christians have preferred to comfort themselves as they have sat in their rocking chairs in the shadows of history, rocking themselves back and forth, and saying over and over: "I am not a theocrat. I am not a theocrat." What this phrase means is simple: God does not rule, so neither do I.

But what if God does rule? What if He has given us the unchanging laws by which He expects His people to rule? What if He has given us the tools of dominion, and we have left them in the rain to rust? What will He do with our generation?

He will do just what He did with Moses' generation. He will leave us behind to die in the wilderness.

CONCLUSION

Authority and Dominion

And he [Moses] took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the LORD hath said will we do, and be obedient (Ex. 24:7).

The Book of Exodus is the second book in the Pentateuch. Book 1, Genesis, has to do with the sovereignty of God, who is the Creator. Book 2, Exodus, has to do with God as the Deliverer. God is the supreme monarch in a hierarchy of authority. He possesses the authority (right) to deliver as well as the power (ability). The Book of Exodus, like the exodus event itself, was designed to verify this authority and power.

Most of all, Exodus is what Moses said it is, the book of the covenant. It therefore bears the marks of all five aspects of the biblical covenant model: transcendence/immanence, hierarchy/representation, ethics/dominion, oath/sanctions, and succession/inheritance.¹ The first chapter of Exodus indicates that a war between rival covenants was the heart of the dispute between God and Pharaoh. Pharaoh attempted to impose his own alternative covenant on the Hebrews. It, too, had the same five aspects, and this confrontation reveals all five. This covenant structure appears twice in the first chapter: a double witness.

A. The Pharaoh's Covenantal Program

The first presentation of the Pharaoh's covenantal program appears in the Bible's description of his general rule over the Hebrews. First, transcendence/immanence: the book begins with the advent of a false god, the Pharaoh who had forgotten Joseph (Ex. 1:8). Second, hierarchy: this false god immediately established a tyrannical hierarchy over the people of Israel, with "taskmasters to afflict them with their burdens" (v. 11). Third, law: he forced them to build treasure cities for him (v. 11). But their afflictions led to even greater growth in their population (v. 12), threatening Pharaoh's program of dominion. Fourth, sanctions: he announced a program of infanticide (v. 16). Fifth, inheritance: he was seeking to destroy their inheritance in the land by killing their male children, but allowing the females to survive—an attempt to capture the inheritance of Israel through future concubinage. Egypt would marry Israel, God's bride, steal the bride's God-granted dowry, and declare her a concubine.²

1. Acronym: THEOS.

The second presentation of the Pharaoh's covenantal program appears in the Bible's description of his enforcement of the infanticide decree. To achieve this program of stealing the Hebrews' inheritance, Pharaoh (the self-proclaimed sovereign) assigned this task of infanticide to representative agents, the Hebrew midwives (hierarchy). He gave them a command: destroy the newborn males (law). They disobeyed the command, but instead of being punished by Pharaoh (negative sanction), God blessed them (positive sanction). And the people multiplied (inheritance).

In response to this false Egyptian covenant, the sovereign God of Israel announced to Moses that He was with His people, for He had seen their afflictions and had heard their cries (Ex. 3:7). He then raised up Moses, his representative agent, to serve as the earthly leader of the nation (hierarchy). He gave Moses His laws (law). The people made an oath to God, which they broke, and God brought sanctions against them (oath/sanctions). They then repented, renewed the covenant, and built the tabernacle, which their sons later carried into the Promised Land, the lawful inheritance which had been promised to Abraham (inheritance/continuity).³

B. The Doctrine of Covenantal Representation

The conflict between Moses and Pharaoh was a representative battle between God and Satan. It was a battle over the question of ultimate sovereignty. It was a battle over lawful representation. It was also

2. Chapter 6:D.

3. Critics of Ray Sutton's five-point covenant model can and do continue to deny the appearance of this outline again and again in the Bible. I believe that this blindness testifies to the inability of those who cling to an old paradigm to understand the evidence of the new one. They, of course, will reply that those of us who see the covenant structure clearly in the text are reading our invention into the text. Time and the final judgment will tell whose view is correct.

a battle over the right to impose sanctions and the right to collect the inheritance. But primarily Exodus is a battle over representation: Moses vs. Pharaoh. Who would represent Israel in the court of the gods or God of history, Moses or Pharaoh? Which representative agent would manifest true covenantal authority in the midst of time? The answer of the Book of Exodus is clear: Moses. The Book of Exodus is, above all, a book about representative government in history. It is clearly a book about hierarchy, which all government structures must always be.

Exodus 18 is the best biblical example of a civil hierarchy. Moses' father-in-law suggested that Moses establish a system of hierarchical appeals courts, in order to lessen the load on Moses, and also to reduce the time that people had to wait in their quest for civil justice.⁴ Moses, a wise son-in-law, accepted his father-in-law's excellent advice, and he established just such an appeals court system. Having established a bottom-up appeals court system, Moses then came before the people to proclaim the law, the Ten Commandments. Immediately after the words of the tenth commandment, we read:

And all the people saw the thunderings, and the lightnings, and the noise of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking: and when the people saw it, they removed, and stood afar off. And they said unto Moses, Speak thou with us, and we will hear: but let not God speak with us, lest we die (Ex. 20:18–19).

They clearly understood the doctrine of representation, and they affirmed it. More than this: they insisted on it. They did not want to come into the presence of a holy God. They wanted another person to go before God, to speak with Him, and to return to speak His word to them. They promised to hear, which in the context of affirming a covenant with God meant that they promised to obey. They would obey God by obeying Moses. They would obey the details of the law that Moses brought from God.

Then God announced case laws to Moses, His hierarchical (mediatorial) representative: "Now these are the judgments which thou shalt set before them" (Ex. 21:1). These laws began with the law governing Hebrew indentured servitude. The Hebrews broke these case laws repeatedly. They did not take these laws seriously. God therefore placed them in bondage repeatedly: to the Moabites, Midianites, Philistines, Assyrians, Babylonians, Medo-Persians, Greeks, and finally the Romans. This punishment fit the crime. The sanction against the crime of disobedience to God is bondage. In the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15), the ultimate negative sanction, this bondage is personal, direct (unmediated), and eternal. The protective human and institutional hierarchy is removed. When this non-hierarchical form of judgment comes, unlike judgments in history (which are always mediated and hierarchical), no grace accompanies it. In short, when God's grace is totally removed, all institutional hierarchies are removed. The evidence of this lack of grace is the absence of any institutional hierarchy. Without a mediator between God and man, covenant-breaking men inescapably die. The Israelites fully understood this: “. . . let not God speak with us, lest we die.”

4. Chapter 19.

C. The Doctrine of Covenantal Hierarchy

The case laws of Exodus reflect the position of Exodus as the second book in the Pentateuch. It corresponds to the second point of the biblical covenant model: hierarchy. Thus, the bulk of the case law section deals with God's civil appeals court. The book is related to all five points in the covenant, especially point three (the actual laws) and point four (judgment and sanctions), but the legitimate question of civil law and civil sanctions cannot be separated from the question of the institutional structure of God's civil courts. This structure is hierarchical: a bottom-up appeals court.

The message of the Book of Exodus is deliverance: from slavery to freedom, from Egypt to Sinai, from work to rest, from Pharaoh's kingdom to God's kingdom. Ultimately, it is the story of Israel's deliverance from wrath to grace. It is not, however, the story of Israel's deliverance from institutional hierarchy. There can be no deliverance from hierarchy in history. Hierarchy is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of hierarchy vs. no hierarchy; it is always a question of which hierarchy.

The case laws reflect this fact of institutional hierarchy. They begin with the laws of bondservice: masters and servants.⁵ They continue with laws governing fathers and daughters,⁶ bridegrooms and concubines,⁷ parents and sons,⁸ kidnappers and victims,⁹ fighters,¹⁰ fighters and bystanders,¹¹ restitution,¹² goring oxen and victims,¹³ criminal negligence,¹⁴ thieves and victims,¹⁵ fire-starters and victims,¹⁶ safekeepers and negligence,¹⁷ seducers and seduced,¹⁸ citizens and strangers,¹⁹ creditors and debtors,²⁰ finders and keepers.²¹ All of these relationships are hierarchical. They all involve authority and subordination. They all involve the imposition of power, and power is inevitably imposed hierarchically. A humanist slogan such as “man must take control of man” really means that some men must take control over all the others—C. S. Lewis’ observation in The Abolition of Man.

5. Chapter 31:A.

6. Chapter 31:B.

D. Who Is Our God?

Rushdoony wrote that “in any culture the source of the law is the god of that society.”²² The source of biblical law is the God of the Bible. His moral character is revealed in His laws—all His laws, not just the Ten Commandments. Without biblical law at the center of a society’s legal order,²³ its legal order testifies falsely regarding the true source of all morally valid laws, namely, the God of the Bible. It testifies falsely regarding God. A society is in rebellion against God to the extent that its people refuse to acknowledge in the civil realm the Bible-mandated terms of the civil covenant. There is a specific legal order which God requires the state to uphold by force and the threat of force. God is totally sovereign, as manifested by the presence of His required laws and sanctions. A society that denies the continuing judicial validity of

7. Chapter 32.

8. Chapter 33.

9. Chapter 34.

10. Chapter 37.

11. Chapter 38.

12. Chapter 39.

13. Chapter 40.

14. Chapter 41.

15. Chapter 43.

16. Chapter 44.

17. Chapter 45.

18. Chapter 46.

19. Chapter 47.

20. Chapter 48.

21. Chapter 51.

22. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 4.

23. At the center of Israel was the Ark of the Covenant. In the Ark was the law: the two tablets.

Old Testament civil law in general thereby refuses to acknowledge that this world was, is, and ever shall be a theocracy. God rules. How does a nation testify in history to this fact? God's rules. To the extent that the legal order does not conform to the legal standard that God announces in His Bible, to that extent is a society in rebellion against God.

1. Biblical Law as God's Self-Revelation

This is denied by virtually all Christian denominations and congregations today. They deny that God reveals himself judicially to men in New Testament times as clearly as He did in the Old Testament. Christians should ask themselves: Why would God choose to reveal himself less clearly in the New Testament era by allowing every society except Puritan New England to adopt a law-order that is openly a renunciation of what He has revealed as judicially binding in the Old Testament? The theonomists have an answer to this intriguing question. God allows this in order to reveal the visible failure in history of all rival law-orders compared to the visible success of His revealed law-order. This necessarily implies that at some point in the future, there will be such a visible example. The visible failure of rival civil law-orders, meaning rival gods, can then become a worldwide tool of evangelism.

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).²⁴

Modern Christians do not take these words seriously. They believe that in this New Testament era of gospel deliverance, God has for some unstated reason removed this judicial tool of evangelism from the church's tool kit of legitimate missionary techniques. For some reason, in this New Testament "age of grace," God has removed a major Old Covenant means of grace, namely, the visible testimony of cultural success that a covenant-honoring society possesses. He supposedly has removed His positive visible sanctions from faithful covenant-keepers. Worse; God has supposedly reversed the Old Covenant order of visible sanctions. We are assured by premillennialists and amillennialists—but only when pressed very hard to explain their eschatological position—that God in the “Church Age” rewards covenant-breakers with the earthly blessing of civil authority, and He places the church and individual Christians under this authority. He does this as a witness to Himself. By placing His people under bondage to covenant-breakers, we are assured by pessimillennial theologians, God has not really reversed the exodus order of wrath to grace. It may look this way, of course. In fact, it does look this way. But looks are deceiving. Looks were not deceiving in the Old Covenant era (Deut. 4:4–8), but they are deceiving today. As to why this should be the case, no one wants to say for the public record.²⁵

24. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 8.

2. Biblical Law as a Means of Grace

There are many reasons for this peculiar view of God’s shrinking supply of the tools of grace in history, but the main reason, I suspect, is this: the people of God do not regard God’s Bible-revealed law as a true means of grace, even though Paul affirmed the opposite.

What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid. Nay, I had not known sin, but by the law: for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For without the law sin was dead. For I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died. And the commandment, which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me. Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful. For we know that the law is spiritual: but I am carnal, sold under sin (Rom. 7:7–14).

25. Except, of course, they do say, if pressed hard enough. Their answer is the supposedly legitimate and supposedly irresistible triumph of democracy in history. You know: demos (the people) and kratos (rule). This is not seen by non-theonomic Christians as the judicial substitution of a false god for the Bible’s God. Somehow, the voice of the people has become the voice of God, the only legitimate mediatorial voice of God in the civil covenant. And when modern Christians say “the people,” they mean a majority of voters, which at least so far has meant covenant-breakers. “The voice of covenant-breakers is the voice of God.”

God has allowed this judicial evangelical testimony to fade time after time in the New Testament era because His people have so seldom maintained or enacted His revealed laws whenever they have gained political influence. This does not mean that He has abandoned His judicial standards, which are revealed in the Old Testament. It means that, so far in history, He has repeatedly allowed His people to depart from His law, just as Israel did, only to find themselves as subordinates to their God-hating enemies. God does not renounce His sanctions in history; He continues to enforce them. God still delivers His people from sociological grace to wrath in direct response to their covenant-breaking acceptance of the civil laws of rival gods. He did this in the Old Testament, and He does it in the New. But so thorough has been the training of Christians in the accredited schools of their cultural conquerors that God's people have very seldom regarded this deliverance from civil grace to wrath as God's specific negative sanction for their specific sin of denying the legitimacy of the biblical civil covenant. This punishment fits the crime.²⁶ They do yet not cry out to God in their bondage in the democratic West. They regard their own judicial bondage as true political freedom, as if this bondage were both historically normal and historically normative.²⁷ Pagan taskmasters have done a far better job in educating modern Christians than the Babylonians did with the Hebrew youths (Dan. 1), and so have the ordained Christian collaborators who serve as the paid assistants of the taskmasters, collaborators whose name is legion.²⁸

26. In the late 1960s, I saw a lapel button: "Chastity is its own punishment." I would alter that button as follows: "Pluralism is its own punishment."

27. See, for example, Norman L. Geisler, "A Premillennial View of Law and Government," in J. I. Packer (ed.), The Best in Theology (Carol Stream, Illinois: Christianity Today/Word, 1986). Professor Geisler, then of Dallas Theological Seminary, later of Jerry Falwell's Liberty University, was a dispensationalist and a staunch defender of natural law theology. He received his Ph.D. in philosophy from a Jesuit university, back when Jesuit universities were scholastic rather than Marxist and "liberationist." At least he is consistent; few other opponents of theonomy are willing to admit that natural law is the only logical alternative to God's law on this side of total relativism or tyranny.

28. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>). See also North, Backward Christian Soldiers? An Action Manual for Christian Reconstruction (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), Part II: "The Enemy." (<http://bit.ly/gnsoldiers>)

3. Christianity's Failure

Christianity's historical failure to extend the gospel "as the waters cover the sea" (Hab. 2:14) is in part caused by Christians' systematic and self-assured unwillingness to make effective use of a biblical tool of evangelism, namely, the self-conscious construction of a civil law-order that honors God's revealed civil law by imposing the biblically mandated civil sanctions. They have left the gospel message without a visible witness in civil institutions. Worse; church leaders and theologians have again and again denied that such an institutional testimony is legitimate in the New Testament era. It is legitimate in church affairs, of course, they hasten to affirm; it is also legitimate with respect to the covenantal institution of the family. But God's Bible-revealed standards are not legitimate with respect to the civil government. So Christians have been told for well over a millennium.

The question of questions for Christian applied theology, ethics, and social theory is this one: Why should Christians accept as their long-term earthly goal the establishment of any system of civil law other than the one set forth in the Bible? In other words, why should Christians affirm in principle the acceptability of any law-order other than biblical law, in every area of life? Why should they enthusiastically choose second-best, third-best, or even a totalitarian civil order in preference to biblical law? Why is their last choice for civil judicial standards always God's Bible-revealed law? We could search for answers in psychology, sociology, education, and in any other academic specialties. I prefer to begin looking for the answer in the area of ethics: Christians prefer irresponsibility.

E. A Preference for Irresponsibility

In the Northern Kingdom from the days of Jeroboam's revolt, there were only two publicly acceptable operating religious systems: the worship of Jehovah by means of Baalist icons and practices (the golden calves: I Kings 12:28) and the worship of Baal by means of Baalist icons and practices (I Kings 18). Elijah challenged the representatives of the people of Israel to choose between Baal and Jehovah, but they answered not a word (I Kings 18:21). Even when they at last declared themselves in favor of God (I Kings 18:39), it was only as a result of God's display of greater supernatural but highly visible power, and their commitment did not last longer than Elijah's ability to repeat such displays on a regular, invariable basis. In their deepest apostasy, they became disciples of the power religion. They had returned to Egyptian spiritually.

The Northern Kingdom was worse in this regard than the Southern Kingdom was. Judah did have the temple. It had a ritually acceptable religion. It never adopted pure Baalism. God therefore delivered Israel into captivity to the Assyrians more than a century before He delivered Judah (and Assyria) to the Babylonians. Even so, He had graciously waited several centuries to deliver up Israel to her enemies. The Northern Kingdom's religious practices had been corrupt from the beginning, but there are degrees of corruption. For a time, God graciously delays bringing His negative sanctions in history. It is not that He honors corruption; instead, He honors the absence of fully developed corruption. But corruption, like "incorruption," does not remain idle. Corruption either grows or contracts. Both corruption and righteousness are kingdom principles. It depends upon which kingdom we are discussing: God's or Satan's. Each kingdom seeks extension geographically, temporally, institutionally, and psychologically. Each serves as leaven.²⁹ Each recognizes that, in principle, there can be no neutrality. Each therefore recognizes that as time goes on, there will be less and less cooperation possible between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers.

1. Progressive Ethical Self-Consciousness

Covenant-breakers generally recognize the nature of this ethical and institutional conflict much earlier than covenant-keepers do. They see what will happen when covenant-keepers at last become self-conscious in their commitment to God's Bible-revealed kingdom principles. Like the leaders of the Jews who understood that Jesus had prophesied that He would rise again in three days, and so put a stone and guards at the tomb (Matt. 27:62–66), so are the covenant-breakers in history. Similarly, like the disciples who did not understand what Jesus had said, and who therefore departed in despair, so Christians have been in their misunderstanding of Christ's comprehensive challenge to non-Christian society. They have not understood the comprehensive challenge of the gospel.³⁰ Nevertheless, a few disciples eventually returned to the tomb, only to find it empty. As time went on, a few more recognized that Jesus' words were true. The word of His resurrection spread among the called-out ekklesia. Then the war between the kingdoms began in earnest—earnest in the sense of serious, and also earnest in the sense of God's down payment in history of a future fulfillment. When Christians at last begin to see the comprehensive implications of Christ's ascension to heaven, the war will escalate. (This escalation has been going on since the ascension, but it has been a process marked by many historical discontinuities.)

29. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), pp. 279–82, 287–89.

30. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C: "Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action." (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

Once a new phase of the war begins, both sides become increasingly consistent. This has been going on for centuries. The cultural advantage inevitably swings to the covenant-keepers whenever they honor the external terms of God's covenant. Their obedience brings visible, external blessings (Deut. 28:1–14), while the rebellious receive visible blessings more and more in terms of their public honoring of the kingdom principles announced by the covenant-keepers. If they refuse to adapt, covenant-breakers grow weak and eventually disappear in history. Those who survive become increasingly dependent on the good behavior and good works of covenant-keepers. This dependence tends to persuade them to reduce their per-secution of covenant-keepers. They hire them because covenant-keepers—when the latter are adhering to the external terms of God's covenant—are honest, effective workers. They buy from them for the same reason. Service leads to dominion.

2. External Standards, External Sanctions

The law of God is the primary tool of dominion that God offers to all men, irrespective of their personal faith. He gives the Holy Spirit to His people, but if His people refuse for a season to honor the terms of the covenant, while God-rejecting men willingly adopt the external terms of the covenant, then the latter will prosper externally. The best example of this process in recent history is the reversal of economic power between Japan and the United States after 1945. The Japanese, not being Protestants, nevertheless adopted the Protestant ethic of their American conquerors. The Americans, having become the richest people on earth by their adherence to this ethic, steadily abandoned it in the post-War era. They concluded incorrectly that the might of their hands had gotten them this wealth (Deut. 8:17).

Long-term, it requires that God grant special grace (regeneration) to large numbers of people in order for a society to adhere to the external terms of the covenant.³¹ But in the short run, which can last several generations, the appropriate visible blessings of the covenant can go to those who are committed only externally to particular terms of the covenant. Japan, for example, was the first nation to adopt abortion as a national policy after World War II. In 1988, there were three abortions for every live birth in Japan.³² This reduced the supply of future workers. In 2010, Japan was the most rapidly aging population in the West, and was facing a politically inescapable long-run crisis of a national government budget that will not be able to afford to pay retired people their promised pension fund benefits.³³ Why should the Japanese be uniquely blessed? It is a case of comparative obedience: the Soviet Union and the Chinese also began to promote abortions as national policy; the United States also accepted abortion's legality in 1973, and its intellectual leaders are overwhelmingly pro-abortion. So, God looks at other aspects of the covenant, those related to the economics of dominion: honesty, hard work, precise work, rigorous education, thrift, future-orientation, etc. In these areas, the Japanese excel. They therefore receive the lion's share of the external blessings. If they refuse to convert to faith in Jesus Christ, however, the Japanese will eventually find it impossible to adhere as a nation to the external terms of the covenant. God's negative sanctions will come.

The modern church has abandoned faith in the covenantal cause-and-effect relationship between national external conformity to God's law and His external blessings. The church therefore does not believe in God's sanctions in history. In Old Testament times, yes, but not in New Testament times. The church today implicitly believes that God gave a clearer revelation of His ethical standards before Jesus Christ came to redeem the world. Christians implicitly assert with amillennialist Cornelius Van Til that God's system of visible sanctions in Old Covenant history was a mark of His condescension to His people in an earlier era.³⁴ In short, they conclude that Christians and non-Christi-

31. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 6. (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

32. Christianity Today (Dec. 9, 1988), p. 60.

33. "Future Shock: Japan faces demographic nightmare, International Business Times (July 21, 2010). (<http://bit.ly/JapanDemo>)

34. He wrote: "In the New Testament God expects his people to live more fully into the absolute future than in the Old Testament. He expects of them that they will be able to sustain the unevenness of the present revelation to the day of their death, since they have a clearer revelation of the new heavens and the new earth. In the Old ans do not need visible manifestations of the ethical character of God, so He has removed this revelation of Himself by removing His historical sanctions. Covenant-breakers understandably rejoice at this thought, for this hypothetical removal of God's sanctions in history supposedly leaves Satan's sanctions intact: compound cursings in history for the righteous and compound blessings in history for the unrighteous. Unfortunately, Van Til did not believe that this removal is hypothetical.³⁵ Neither do non-theonomic pessimillennialists generally. Van Til never recognized understood that God's covenantal sanctions in history remain in force today. Because God's servants so far have chosen not to impose His civil sanctions in New Testament history, Satan's servants have imposed his.

3. Ethics and Eschatology

History is not visibly neutral in any eschatological system that is based on the Bible: either the gospel message is blessed progressively over the ages or else humanism is. The Bible is not a dualistic document. It does not teach of an endless conflict between good and evil, between God and Satan. This conflict is bounded by time. It will end at the final judgment. This is why neither ethical dualism nor some version of manichaeism can be successfully defended by means of an appeal to the Bible. The two positions are inevitably connected: eschatology and ethics. The Bible denies both eschatological manichaeism and ethical dualism.

The debate within Christendom over eschatology and ethics has arisen because the majority of those who have ever called themselves Christians have accepted the assertion by the humanists—whether Greek, Newtonian, or Kantian—that there is an inherent ethical dualism in history. There is supposedly no progressive triumph of God's kingdom law over Satan's kingdom law. They have accepted the presupposition that there is a universal system of ethics that is independent of God's revelation of Himself in the Bible, and that it is this universal ethical system which God enforces by means of His sanctions in history. Thus, God's historical sanctions are supposedly not linked closely to the progressive improvements in the church's creeds and its Testament, on the contrary, God condescends to give an external manifestation of the principle that righteousness, holiness and blessedness belong together." Cornelius Van Til, Christian Theistic Ethics, vol. III of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1980), p. 104.

35. For a critique of this view, see North, Political Polytheism, ch. 3.

improving methods of evangelism throughout history. History therefore is not a visible "earnest" (Eph. 1:14) or down payment on the eschatological triumph of God over Satan in eternity. History, the Greek-influenced church has affirmed, is not a tale told by an idiot, signifying nothing; it just looks like it. Or, to cite Meredith Kline: "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways."³⁶

F. Case Laws and Kingdom

Rarely in the history of the church have leaders or laymen taken the Old Testament case laws seriously. (Rarely also have they taken seriously the idea of "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." Fully consistent dispensationalists refuse to pray this "Jewish kingdom" prayer in this, the "Church Age.") Christians have assumed that Jesus' earthly ministry, or at least Paul's, did away entirely with the case laws. Nevertheless, when pressed to defend some traditional practice of any particular denomination, the groups' in-house theologians usually turn to the Old Testament in search of a legal precedent. This is an aspect of what Rushdoony called smorgasbord religion: selectively picking what you like out of a large selection of rules and doctrines. The best example of such selective New Testament shopping is the strict sabbatarian's appeal to every verse in the Old Testament regarding keeping holy the sabbath except one, Exodus 35:2: "Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the LORD: whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death." When it comes to announcing the legitimate imposition of this most rigorous of Old Testament civil sanctions, capital punishment, the church flees in holy terror.

A biblically required sanction clearly identifies God's attitude toward a particular infraction. The severity of the sanction tells us just how important the infraction is in the overall operation of the kingdom of God. Without sanctions, there can be no civil law, and without civil law there can be no civilization, meaning no identifiable kingdom. But there is always some form of civilization. There are no historical vacuums. Thus, we ought to conclude that God has His required sanctions, while self-proclaimed autonomous man has his. God has revealed His required sanctions in His law; man has revealed his required sanctions in his legislation. For as long as there are infractions of a judicial standard, there will be sanctions. The question is: Whose? Whose standards and whose sanctions?

36. Meredith G. Kline, "Comments on an Old-New Error," Westminster Theological Journal, XLI (Fall 1978), p. 184.

The church has not wanted to face the stark contrast between the two kingdoms. It has wanted to find some rationally acceptable position between theocracy and tyranny and also between theocracy and anarchy. Christian scholars have asserted the existence of neutral, "natural" laws that can serve as the church's earthly hope of the ages, an agreeable middle way that will mitigate the conflict in history between the Kingdom of God and the kingdom of man. The victor in such a naive quest will always be the kingdom of man. Theoretical neutrality means practical autonomy: men do not have to consider what God requires or threatens in history.

God brings His sanctions in history, both positive and negative. He can do this either through His people, who act representatively as His agents, or through pagan armies or seemingly impersonal environmental forces. He can choose war, pestilence, or famine. He can even choose "all of the above." But He does bring His sanctions in history. There is no escape from these historical sanctions, any more than there is an escape from His eternal sanctions. The former point to the latter. This is one of the primary functions of historical sanctions: as a witness to the holiness of God.

God's historical sanctions serve as public evidence of His theocratic sovereignty over the creation. This is why Christians who rebel at the idea of theocracy also are tempted to rebel against the idea of God's temporal sanctions.³⁷ The idea of the national covenant repels them, for such a covenant testifies to the existence of a Christian civil hierarchy, Christian civil laws, Christian civil sanctions, and Christian civil conquest in history by means of God's sanctions of blessings and cursings. Thus we find a trio of Christian historians, safe and tenured in their humanist-accredited colleges and universities, who insist on placing the word Christian in quotation marks when they speak of

37. They will also prefer to downplay or even deny God's eternal negative sanctions. Twenty-first-century evangelism is notable for its reluctance to discuss hell and the lake of fire. "Fire and brimstone preaching" is mostly a figment of liberal imaginations in this century.

America's "Christian" origins or "Christian" cultures in general.³⁸ They reject the use of this adjective in describing America.

G. God as Cosmic Torturer

This is a grim concept, one which I have deliberately chosen as a means of shocking Christians and non-Christians alike into recognizing the key offense of the Bible: the assertion that God will torture His enemies without mercy forever if they do not submit to Him covenantally in history. It is the doctrine of God as the cosmic Judge which above all repels the covenant-breaker. Even Christians are today hesitant to say in public that the lake of fire is not a cosmic rehabilitation scheme. God is a cosmic torturer, but to say so in public or in print is regarded by Christians as a faux pas of the highest order. This testifies against them, not God.

It is because history is an earnest on eternity—simultaneously a promise and a warning—that Christians are required by God to affirm the biblical legitimacy of civil sanctions imposed by the state in the name of God, and therefore a state governed in its severity by His revealed law. The covenantally faithful state, as a hierarchical institution, is supposed to be limited by God's law in order for it lawfully to execute God's judgments. In order to establish a Christian culture, there have to be identifiably Christian laws—biblical blueprints, in other words—by which the national covenant could be judged by God and other nations. Only one idea is more repugnant to modern Christian intellectuals than the idea of judicially binding biblical civil blueprints.³⁹ That idea is the doctrine of an inescapably predestined eternity of personal negative sanctions that will be imposed on everyone

38. Mark A. Noll, Nathan O. Hatch, and George M. Marsden, The Search for Christian America (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway, 1983), p. 28. For a refutation, see North, Political Polytheism, ch. 5.

39. That no such blueprints exist in the field of economics was the assertion of all three of the other authors in the book, Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views, ed. Robert G. Clouse (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984). (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>). The fourth view—the explicitly, self-consciously, blueprint-insistent Christian one—was mine. I, of course, challenged all three of the others, calling attention to their self-conscious rejection of any explicitly biblical standards in economic analysis. Not surprisingly, in less than a year, with the book selling well and our royalties adequate, the neo-evangelical liberals who run InterVarsity pulled the book off the market and sold my company the remaining 6,000 copies at 25 cents per copy, just to wash their hands of the whole project. That was when I knew who had won the debate. Liberals would never be so crass as to burn conservative books; they simply refuse to publish them or, once the mistake has been made, they dump them.

God hates. These two hated ideas are linked judicially: sanctions. Men do not like to be reminded by Paul that “the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth” (Rom. 9:17–18). If God did this with Pharaoh, He can do it to anyone. This means sanctions.

The comparatively gentle negative civil sanctions of the Old Testament—whipping, restitution, slavery, banishment, and public execution—are light taps on the wrist when compared to an eternity of screaming agony in the lake of fire. Civil sanctions are limited by time; eternity is forever. Men easily understand this distinction. Thus, in order to banish from their consciousness the thought of eternal torture at the hand of an outraged, implacable, non-rehabilitating God, they feel compelled to banish also the idea that God has established civil covenants in history that authorize and require His lawful civil representatives to apply the Old Testament’s minimal negative sanctions. Instead, they have implicitly adopted two other doctrines, the doctrine of autonomous man and the concomitant doctrine, the autonomous state.

The state becomes the sole agency authorized by autonomous man to impose compulsory sanctions. The only alternative to this view is the doctrine of zero civil government, meaning zero compulsory sanctions, a consistent but seldom articulated viewpoint. This outlook is utopian, for it ignores the obvious: a gang-warlord society always develops. Gangs are private armies that bear all the marks of civil governments: hierarchy, law, physical sanctions, and rites of succession. So, in order to assert his autonomy from God, the covenant-breaker always places himself under the authority of a self-proclaimed autonomous state. He prefers to believe that the state’s sanctions are final. The state’s sanctions must be seen as alternatives to God’s final judgment, not evidence for it. He must assert this if God’s final sanctions are to be denied effectively. In order to make such an assumption believable, the state must be given power to impose sanctions far worse than those authorized by the Old Testament.

You cannot beat something with nothing. A Christian who is unwilling to affirm publicly the inescapability of God’s eternal negative covenant sanctions is also unlikely to insist on the temporal reality of God’s negative covenant sanctions, for such temporal sanctions are an earnest—down payment—on His final sanctions. Such sanctions-denying Christians eventually find themselves under the civil (and also intellectual) authority of covenant-breakers who also deny the continuing validity of biblical law, meaning Old Testament sanctions. You cannot beat something with something less. Those who assert their defiance of covenant law the most insistently are covenant-breakers who affirm the autonomy of man, or who at least deny the existence of the God of the Bible. Thus, in their quest to avoid thinking about God's eternal torture chamber beyond the grave, Christians have willingly submitted in principle to temporal rule by those covenant-breakers who deny the lake of fire with the greatest self-confidence.

On the other hand, those Christians who in history were most willing to affirm God's predestinated, inescapable, eternal sanctions were also the only ones ready to insist on the covenantal necessity of legislating the most feared of God's negative sanctions, public execution, for every crime identified as a capital crime in the Old Testament. I am speaking of the Puritans, who did exactly this when they were given the legal authority in history to do so, in New England: the Massachusetts Body of Liberties (1641). The Puritans understood that civil liberty begins with the civil government's enforcement of God's required sanctions.

H. Sanctions and Civilization

Kingdom means civilization. It means either the lawful or unlawful exercise of authority in history. In short, kingdom means sanctions. God's kingdom can operate with minimal sanctions in history, meaning a minimal state, only because it is authorized by God and accepted covenantally by people who believe in God's horrifying negative sanctions beyond the grave. The widespread belief in hell and the lake of fire is one of the foundations of Western liberty. It made less necessary for social order men's faith in a state that possesses imitation final sanctions.

The case laws provide an alternative to the messianic state, because they provide sanctions that match the magnitude of the crime. The basic penalty for crimes against property and body is some form of restitution. Crimes against the integrity of God are capital crimes: those convicted of such infractions are delivered into God's court for His direct judgment. As history moves closer to the day of final judgment, society will progressively be conformed to these standards. Democratically, meaning a bottom-up movement of the Holy Spirit, voters will enact the whole law-order of God. Thus, what the Puritans attempted to do in England was wrong because it was a top-down imposition of God's law. What the New England Puritans attempted to do was valid; there was general agreement about biblical civil law. But immigration and defections within Puritanism after 1660 changed the circumstances.

The critics of theocracy always assume that it has to be anti-democratic. But if the Spirit of God moves a vast majority of men to confess Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior, and if they return to the Old Testament in search of biblical blueprints, then the resulting theocratic republic will be legitimate in terms of democratic standards, assuming that such standards refer simply and exclusively to techniques of campaigning and voting.⁴⁰

When that theocratic majority appears, you can bet your life that the humanists will then try to subvert it by means of an elitist conspiracy. We read about such a revolt against Moses and Aaron in Numbers 16. It was done in the name of the People: "And they gathered themselves together against Moses and against Aaron, and said unto them, Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy, every one of them, and the LORD is among them: wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the LORD?" (v. 3). We read about the final such attempt in Revelation 20:8–9, at the very end of history. These voices of the People are in favor of democracy for only so long as they can control a majority of voters by means of a hierarchical elite that pretends to listen to the People—an elite far more subtle than the Communists' one-party dictatorship in the name of the people.

A sovereign agent always acts through spokesmen in a hierarchy. There will always be an elite: intellectual, educational, military, and so forth. The question is never elite or no elite. It is always a question of which elite. It is a question of which sovereign agent. The Bible is clear: God is completely, absolutely sovereign over the creation, and men are subordinately, inescapably responsible for their actions. Thus, the goal of covenant-keepers is to work toward a social order in which every institution reflects this dual sovereignty, absolute and delegated. It is the creation of an entire world order that prays, "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven" (Matt. 6:10).

40. Modern democratic theory is far more than a theory of legitimate electoral techniques. It has the character of being a rival religion. Cf. Charles Fergusson, The Religion of Democracy (New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1900).

A subset of this broad social goal is politics. Politically, the only legitimate long-term biblical goal is the creation of a worldwide theocratic republic.⁴¹ It is the creation of a bottom-up political order whose civil courts enforce the law of God, and whose people rejoice, not because such a law-order is natural but because it is supernatural.

I. The Restoration of Biblical Covenantal Order

The primary social function of civil law is to persuade God to withdraw His negative sanctions. The state acts as God's agent in imposing sanctions against sin. This is the biblical rationale of civil laws against so-called victimless crimes. Obviously, this purpose relates to the hierarchical nature of all society: the society is under God, meaning under His temporal sanctions.

There is also a secondary goal of civil law: the restoration of social order among men. This, too, is hierarchical. If a person owns a piece of property, then he exercises dominion over it in terms of his subordination to God. He acts as God's agent in a hierarchical system of ownership, which Christians call stewardship. When a criminal or negligent person invades this hierarchical system of ownership, God calls the civil magistrate to defend His interests, and therefore also His steward's interests. The system of justice in the Bible is geared to restoration of the original God-assigned hierarchical order.

The issues of crime and punishment are inescapably questions of the appropriate hierarchy. The victim has been victimized by someone who has asserted a judicially illegitimate authority over him. The criminal in some way invaded the victim's legitimate, God-given sphere of personal responsibility. The criminal subordinated the victim's goals and property to his own. He intervened in the hierarchy and placed himself between God and the lawful subordinate. He implicitly declared that God's assignment of property and lawful authority was illegitimate. In short, the criminal decided to play God.

This illegitimate assertion of covenantal authority must be punished by the state, which is required by God to act as His representative. The status quo ante must be re-established. The way that biblical civil law achieves this goal is to establish a system of economic restitution. The criminal pays double restitution or even more to the victim, depending on what biblical law has established as the maximum payment, and also in terms of victim's rights: the victim can lawfully reduce the payment. Multiple restitution marks criminal law in the Bible. The negligent caretaker or injurer pays only like-for-like restitution to the victim, what might be called civil law.

41. Gary DeMar, Ruler of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for Government (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gdmruler>); Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

The modern messianic state has imitated the criminal. It, too, has disrupted the social hierarchy. It has placed itself between God and the criminal, as if God's sanctions were not binding. It has declared different sanctions. The state has attempted to become a healer of society and ultimately its savior, not by restoring the previous hierarchy and social order but rather by transforming the individual criminal through techniques of rehabilitation. The modern state has generally ignored the victim and his rights in its selection of appropriate sanctions. It has sought to play God as a savior of men. It has substituted a different set of sanctions from those required in the Bible. In doing this, it has received the tacit acquiescence of Christians, and even their public approval, for they self-consciously deny the legitimacy of God's Bible-revealed sanctions in civil government. They have therefore implicitly and even explicitly denied the judicial foundation of Christian civilization. In short:

No sanctions, no laws; no laws, no social order; no social order, no civilization; no civilization, no kingdom of God in church history.

Final Comment

Having burdened the reader with an enormous amount of detailed biblical exegesis and specific applications based on it, it seems appropriate to end this book on a lighter note. It appears that a bank in Canada has intuitively grasped the logic of the biblical concept of restitution, much to the consternation of one malefactor, Mr. Brian McNeilly. The case of Mr. McNeilly was summarized in the Wall Street Journal (Dec. 21, 1988), page B1, in the lower left-hand corner. This space is reserved daily for humorous economic oddities. I reprint it here without comment or alteration.

He Shouldn't Complain—At Least They Didn't Charge Him Interest

By John Urquhart, Staff Reporter

OTTAWA—Brian McNeilly wants it known that when he holds up a bank, he is stealing money, not borrowing it.

Mr. McNeilly has had a problem getting this point across to the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Last month, he pleaded guilty to robbing a branch of that bank, as well as to nine other heists in the Ottawa area. Following the trial, Commerce decided to treat him like just another delinquent borrower. It deducted 1,500 Canadian dollars (US$1,246) from a savings account he had with the bank to make up for the like sum he'd stolen.

'I Won't Stand for It'

Commerce recovered its funds under a banking law known as "the right of offset," which allows banks to deduct money from accounts when the account holders have fallen behind on loan payments. This may be the first time it has been used to recover funds from a robber, bankers say.

Although he couldn't be reached for comment, Mr. McNeilly was recently interviewed on a radio show here and said he is consulting with his lawyer to see if the bank acted legally. "I don't feel the bank has the right to do that," he said. "I won't stand for it." The money in his Commerce savings account, he added, came from an inheritance, not from the robberies. Mr. McNeilly also noted that the court didn't order him to pay back the C$23,000 he had stolen from the banks. Instead, he was sentenced to six years in jail. So, if the bank had the right to take his funds, he said, "I want some time off my sentence."

The Commerce bank claims that a debt is a debt whether Mr. McNeilly borrowed the money or stole it. "It is just like recovering money owed on an overdue demand loan," says Dan Maceluch, a bank spokesman, who adds that just because Mr. McNeilly was sentenced to jail doesn't mean the debt was forgiven.

Account Closed

Mr. McNeilly has taken steps to ensure that the bank can't relieve him of any more money. He has had his girlfriend close his account at the branch where he banked for six years and where he still has a loan on the books. (According to Mr. McNeilly, the loan is in good standing.)

In the radio interview, Mr. McNeilly also said that since arriving in jail, other bank robbers have told him that they've never heard of banks dipping into robbers' accounts. Ottawa Police Inspector Steve Nadori isn't surprised. "Most bank robbers don't have bank accounts," he says.

End of Volume 4

Volume 5: Appendixes

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON EXODUS

VOLUME 5

APPENDIXES

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

An Economic Commentary on Exodus

Gary North

Volume 5

Appendixes

Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus
Volume 5: Appendixes

Formerly:

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Third Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1: Part 1, Representation and Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Population Growth: Tool of Dominion (Ex. 1:5–7) | 12 |
| 2. Imperial Bureaucracy (Ex. 1:8–12) | 31 |
| 3. Rigorous Waste and Rigorous Socialism (Ex. 1:13–14) | 54 |
| 4. Illegitimate State Power (Ex. 1:15–16) | 67 |
| 5. Envy, Rumor, and Bondage (Ex. 2:11–14) | 73 |
| 6. Cumulative Transgression and Restitution (Ex. 3:21–22) | 83 |
| 7. The Optimum Production Mix (Ex. 5:5–7) | 92 |
| 8. Covenantal Judgment (Ex. 8:19) | 108 |
| 9. Original Ownership (Ex. 9:29–30) | 121 |
| 10. Total Sacrifice, Total Sovereignty (Ex. 10:24) | 129 |
| 11. Separation and Dominion (Ex. 11:7) | 137 |
| 12. Discontinuity and Continuity (Ex. 12:10–11) | 147 |
| 13. Unconditional Surrender (Ex. 12:30–32) | 184 |
| 14. The Rule of Law (Ex. 12:48–49) | 195 |
| 15. The Firstborn Offering (Ex. 13:1–2) | 230 |
| 16. The Psychology of Slavery (Ex. 14:12) | 237 |
| 17. The Metaphor of Growth: Ethics (Ex. 15:17) | 246 |
| 18. Manna, Predictability, and Dominion (Ex. 16:4–5) | 258 |
| 19. Imperfect Justice (Ex. 18:21–22) | 280 |
| 20. The Oath-Bound Kingdom of Priests (Ex. 19:3–6) | 284 |
| Conclusion | |

Volume 2: Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion

| | |
|--|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 289 |
| 21. The God of Liberation (Ex. 20:1–3) | 305 |
| 22. Graven Images and Rival Civilizations (Ex. 20:4–6) | 315 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 23. Lawful Title (20:7) | 343 |
| 24. Rest and Dominion (Ex. 20:8–11) | 359 |
| 25. Family Capital (Ex. 20:12) | 371 |
| 26. God's Monopoly of Execution (Ex. 20:13) | 386 |
| 27. The Yoke of Co-operative Service (Ex. 20:14) | 398 |
| 28. The Rights of Private Property (Ex. 20:15) | 411 |
| 29. The Value of a Name (Ex. 20:16) | 450 |
| 30. Covetousness and Conflict (Ex. 20:17) | 477 |
| Conclusion | 494 |

Volume 3: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 513 |
| 31. Servitude, Protection, and Marriage (Ex. 21:2–4) | 541 |
| 32. Wives and Concubines (Ex. 21:7–11) | 568 |
| 33. Executing a Rebellious Son (Ex. 21:15, 17) | 598 |
| 34. Kidnapping (Ex. 21:16) | 602 |
| 35. The Costs of Private Conflict (Ex. 18–19) | 621 |
| 36. The Human Commodity (Ex. 21:20–21) | 634 |
| 37. Criminal Law and Restoration (Ex. 21:22–25) | 649 |
| 38. The Auction for Substitute Sanctions (Ex. 21:22–25) | 681 |
| 39. Freedom for an Eye (Ex. 21:26–27) | 703 |
| 40. The Ransom for Life (Ex. 21:28–31) | 716 |
| 41. The Uncovered Pit (Ex. 21:33–34) | 745 |
| 42. Knowledge and Responsibility (Ex. 21:35–36) | 755 |
| 43. Proportional Restitution (Ex. 22:1, 4) | 765 |
| 44. Pollution, Ownership, and Responsibility (Ex. 22:5–6) | 800 |
| 45. Safekeeping and Liability (Ex. 22:7–9) | 871 |

Volume 4: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|------|
| 46. Caretaking and Negligence (Ex. 22:10–13) | 895 |
| 47. Seduction and Servitude (22:16–17) | 905 |
| 48. Oppression, Omniscience and Judgment (Ex. 22:21–24) | 932 |
| 49. The Prohibition against Usury (Ex. 22:25–27) | 970 |
| 50. Impartial Justice (Ex. 23:1–3, 6–7) | 1023 |
| 51. Finders should not be Keepers (Ex. 23:4–5) | 1040 |
| 52. Bribery and Oppression (Ex. 23:8) | 1051 |
| 53. Sabbatical Liberty (Ex. 23:9–12) | 1078 |
| 54. Feasts and Citizenship (Ex. 23:14–19) | 1092 |

| | |
|--|------|
| 55. The Curse of Zero Growth (Ex. 23:25–26) | 1115 |
| 56. God's Limits on Sacrifice (Ex. 25:3–8, 36:5–7) | 1140 |
| 57. The Economics of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:8–9) | 1159 |
| 58. Blood Money, not Head Tax (Ex. 30:11–16) | 1170 |
| 59. Sabbath Rest vs. Autonomy (Ex. 35:2) | 1180 |
| 60. The Ability to Teach (Ex. 35:31, 34a) | 1186 |
| Conclusion | 1195 |
| Conclusion to Authority and Dominion | 1231 |

Volume 5: Appendixes

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology | 1255 |
| APPENDIX B–The Demographics of Decline | 1283 |
| APPENDIX C–The Labyrinth and The Garden | 1320 |
| APPENDIX D–The Rule of Law and the Free Market | 1339 |
| APPENDIX E–The Economic Implications of The Sabbath | 1364 |
| APPENDIX F–Timing the Lord's Day | 1442 |
| APPENDIX G–Macaulay on Democracy | 1447 |
| APPENDIX H–The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost | 1453 |

Volume 6: Appendixes

| | |
|--|------|
| APPENDIX I–Pollution in the Soviet Union | 1535 |
| APPENDIX J–Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney | 1543 |
| APPENDIX K–Slavery in the American South | 1556 |
| APPENDIX L–Maimonides' Code : Is it Biblical? | 1573 |
| APPENDIX M–Victim's Rights vs. the Messianic State | 1638 |
| APPENDIX N–Covenantal Law and Covenantal Love | 1679 |
| APPENDIX O–Social Antinomianism | 1695 |
| APPENDIX P–The Hoax of Higher Criticism | 1712 |
| APPENDIX Q–The Restoration of Biblical Casuistry | 1734 |
| APPENDIX R–What is Covenant Law? | 1770 |
| APPENDIX S–What are the Case Laws? | 1795 |

APPENDIX A

THE RECONSTRUCTION OF EGYPT'S CHRONOLOGY

And it came to pass in the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, in the month of Zij, which is the second month, that he began to build the house of the LORD (I Kings 6:1).

This is an important date marker in the Bible. Without this reference and the parallel reference in First Chronicles, it would be much more difficult to establish biblical chronology. Biblical chronology is at war with the chronologies of the textbooks on ancient history. There is no escape from this war.¹

To determine the year in which Solomon began building the temple, we must work backward from a date that we can narrow down to a two-year period: the fall of Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar. A widely accepted date is 586 B.C. The two other dates are 587 and 588. Most scholars choose either 586 or 587.² I have decided to choose 586, in deference to a seeming majority of specialized scholars.³

Ezekiel informs us that it was 390 years from the division of the monarchy under Rehoboam to the fall of Jerusalem. This is another crucial date marker.

Lie thou also upon thy left side, and lay the iniquity of the house of Israel upon it: according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon it thou shalt bear their iniquity. For I have laid upon thee the

1. I agree with Floyd Nolen Jones: biblical chronology is one of the three major battlefields of modern biblical warfare. The other two are higher criticism of biblical texts and Darwinian evolution. Jones, The Chronology of the Old Testament, 15th ed. (Green Forest, Arkansas: Green Leaf Press, 2005), pp. 7–8. I have relied on his book for the presentation in this chapter.

2. Herman H. Hoeh, "When Did Nebuchadnezzar Conquer Jerusalem?" (1976), ed. Paul Finch (2005). (<http://bit.ly/HoehNeb>) years of their iniquity, according to the number of the days, three hundred and ninety days: so shalt thou bear the iniquity of the house of Israel (Ezek. 4:4–5).

3. Jones accepts this date: op. cit., p. 23.

Adding 390 to 586 gives us 976 B.C.⁴ That was the last year of Solomon's reign. Maybe we could argue 977 B.C. It does not matter for this appendix. We know from two passages that Solomon ruled 40 years.⁵ Adding 40 to 976, we get 1016 B.C. for the beginning of his reign. In the fourth year of his reign, he began to build the temple.

Then Solomon began to build the house of the LORD at Jerusalem in mount Moriah, where the LORD appeared unto David his father, in the place that David had prepared in the threshingfloor of Ornan the Jebusite. And he began to build in the second day of the second month, in the fourth year of his reign (II Chron. 3:1–2).

Subtracting three years (fourth year) from 1016, we get 1013 B.C. This is the anchor date.

First Kings 6:1 is specific: the exodus took place 480 years before. Adding 480 years to 1013, we get 1493 B.C. as the date of the exodus, give or take a few years, depending on the date of the fall of Jerusalem and the dating by month of Solomon's coronation. Again, this variation matters little.

Graetz's History of the Jews states that Solomon's reign began around 1015 B.C.⁶ Graetz believed that Solomon began construction of the temple "immediately after his succession to the throne,"⁷ and that it was completed and consecrated in 1007 B.C.⁸ Alfred Edersheim, the late-nineteenth-century Christian convert from Judaism, dated the beginning of construction as 1012 B.C.⁹ Another late-nineteenth-century

4. Jones said it should be 975 B.C. Why? He said this: "inclusive numbering minus 1." Idem. My view is that if an author does not precisely explain what he is talking about—"inclusive numbering minus 1"—the reader is entitled to conclude "case not proven." Chalk it up to the reader's ignorance. If an author is not clear, his reader is entitled to his own opinion. The text says 390. I stick with the text.

5. "And the time that Solomon reigned in Jerusalem over all Israel was forty years" (I Kings 11:42). "And Solomon reigned in Jerusalem over all Israel forty years" (II Chron. 9:30).

6. Heinrich Graetz, History of the Jews, 6 vols. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1891), I, p. 156.

7. Ibid., p. 162.

8. Ibid., p. 166.

9. Alfred Edersheim, Bible History, Old Testament, 7 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1890]), III, p. 10: chart based on Keil's calculations.

Christian commentator believed that construction began in 1010 B.C.¹⁰

Conservative Bible commentators in the late twentieth century revised these dates downward by about 45 years. This revision was the result of the Edwin Thiele's chronological studies of the later Hebrew kings, beginning with Rehoboam and Jeroboam, whose reigns he dates from 931.¹¹ Thiele was wrong.¹² The older commentators were right.¹³

A. Conservatives and Compromise

A representative summary of the dating problem is found in the International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (1982): "The date of the exodus is one of the most debated topics in OT studies because of the ambiguous nature of the evidence. Although the biblical texts seem to require a date early in the 15th century B.C., archeological evidence seems to point to a date in the 13th cent. B.C."¹⁴ The author, W. H. Shea, then went on for eight two-column, small-print pages summarizing bits and pieces of conventional Egyptian chronology and archaeology. He wanted to hold to the fifteenth-century dating, but his defense was weakened because of his presuppositions concerning methodology. His methodology was based on comparative chronology and comparative archaeology. This, we are supposed to believe, is the objective, neutral scholarship we need in order to make sense out of the Bible.

He affirmed that the mid-fifteenth century is "the only date given for it in the Bible." He was wrong. The early fifteenth century is correct. But consider his reliance upon the category of pragmatism in defending the conservative view: "While it is possible that these [biblical] data could have been corrupted in transmission, the most reasonable approach to them is to examine in more detail the historical context in 10. "Temple," in John McClintock and James Strong (eds.), Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, 12 vols. (New York: Harper & Bros., 1894), X, p. 250.

11. Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965). Cf. Thiele, A Chronology of the Hebrew Kings (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1977).

12. James B. Jordan, "The Mysterious Numbers of Edwin R. Thiele," Biblical Chronology, II (September 1990). (<http://bit.ly/jjthiele>)

13. In the first edition of this book, I adopted Thiele's view. Only when I got to my commentary of First Kings did my study lead me back to the nineteenth-century view.

14. "Exodus, Date of the," International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, 4 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1982), II, p. 230. (<http://bit.ly/ExodusDate>) which they [the data] date the exodus. This biblical date for the exodus has a reciprocal relationship with the events described in exodus as related to Egyptian history. A pragmatic approach to this date suggests a period of Egyptian history that should be examined for a possible relationship to the biblical exodus, and considerable agreement of the evidence from Egyptian and biblical sources pointing to that period supports the accuracy of the chronological datum (480 years) from which that search started."¹⁵ He did his best to show why a fifteenth-century date is viable, but he did not begin with the premise that this must be the case, irrespective of modern interpretations of the Egyptian evidence. He appealed to pragmatism instead.

Roland Harrison, one of the ISBE's associate editors, elsewhere argued for a thirteenth-century dating. Harrison's study was based on a survey of the conclusions of the secular archaeologists, who debate endlessly about the proper dating of the various Bronze Ages (Early, Middle, and Late), a humanistic classification system based entirely on nineteenth-century evolutionary social theory.¹⁶ He mentioned the fact that early in the twentieth century, Bible scholars accepted a late-thirteenth-century date for the exodus. In the 1920s and 1930s, excavations in Palestine, especially Jericho, convinced several archaeologists that the traditional early fifteenth-century dating is correct. But he was not convinced: "The question cannot be settled simply by an appeal to the book of Kings in the light of an arbitrary dating for the fall of Jericho."¹⁷ Notice his subtle shift in argumentation: he tried to overcome the explicit teaching of I Kings 6:1 by means of a brief reference to doubts concerning the reliability of certain archeological excavations conducted early in the twentieth century. But I Kings 6:1 does not mention the fall of Jericho; it does specifically mention the exodus. Harrison's argument is muddled. His recommended chronology specifically rejects the testimony of I Kings 6:1. Yet this is all done in the name of Jesus. Such is the fate of ostensibly Christian scholarship which arbitrarily abandons a so-called "simple appeal" to the explicit testimony of the Bible. It is one more sign of just how much in "bondage to Egypt" twentieth-century Christian scholars became.

15. Ibid., p. 237.

16. On this point, see R. A. McNeal, "The Legacy of Arthur Evans," California Studies in Classical Antiquity, VI (1973), pp. 206–20. McNeal and I were in undergraduate and graduate school together. He sent me a copy of his article. He had no idea that it would prove so useful to my work a decade later.

17. R. K. Harrison, Introduction to the Old Testament (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1969), p. 175.

The conservative New Bible Dictionary (1962) did not even mention the possibility of a fifteenth-century date.¹⁸ The author refused to comment on the explicit chronological framework of I Kings 6:1 in relation to the exodus. He tried to confuse the issue by bringing up the problem of possible overlapping judgeships in order to shorten the period of the judges. It is significant, however, that the author argued that the “problem” of the “long” reign of the Hebrew judges can be solved by an appeal to overlapping reigns.

In Near Eastern works involving chronology, it is important to realize that ancient scribes did not draw up synchronistic lists as is done today. They simply listed each series of rulers and reigns separately, in succession on the papyrus or tablet. Synchronisms were to be derived from special historiographical works, not the king-lists or narratives serving other purposes. An excellent example of this is the Turin Papyrus of Kings from Egypt. It lists at great length all five Dynasties, XIII to XVII, in successive groups, totalling originally over 150 rulers and their reigns accounting for at least 450 years. However, it is known from other sources that all five Dynasties, the 150-odd rulers and 450-odd regnal years alike, must all fit inside the 234 years from c. 1786 B.C. to c. 1552 B.C.: rarely less than two series, and sometimes three series, of rulers are known to have reigned contemporaneously.”¹⁹

This theory of overlapping dynasties, as we shall see, is the best solution to “the exodus problem” of the 480 years of I Kings 6:1, which is the real problem, not the so-called “judges problem.” This theory provides a solution the overall problem of Egyptian chronology.

B. The Problem of Egyptian Chronology

In 1886, historian George Rawlinson began his chapter on Egyptian chronology with this statement:

It is a patent fact, and one that is beginning to obtain general recognition, that the chronological element in early Egyptian history is in a state of almost hopeless obscurity.”²⁰ There are several kinds of chronological documents, including the actual monuments. “The chronological value of these various sources of information is, however, in every case slight. The great defect of these monuments is their incompleteness. The Egyptians had no era. They drew out no chronological schemes. They cared for nothing but to know how long each incarnate god, human or bovine, had condescended to tarry on the earth. They recorded carefully the length of the life of each Apis bull, and the length of the reign of each king; but they neglected to take note of the intervals between one Apis bull and another, and omitted to distinguish the sole reign of a monarch from his joint reign with others.²¹

18. The New Bible Dictionary, 2nd ed. (Wheaton, Illinois: Tyndale House, 1982), pp. 191–92.

19. Ibid., p. 192.

20. George Rawlinson, A History of Egypt, 2 vols. (New York: Alden, 1886), II, p. 1.

The chronology of Egypt has been used to “key” the chronologies of the other ancient empires, including pre-Homeric Greece. Art historian Lewis Greenberg sounded a warning about this in a 1973 essay.

As far back as 1897 Tsountas²² warned scholars not to ignore “the unsettled state of Egyptian chronology” when enlisting the aid of Egyptology in dating Mycenaean products. And as recently as 1960 Cook²³ again reminded students of Greek pottery of the difficulties concerning the establishment of relative and absolute chronologies and their “reconciliation.” Unfortunately, the Egyptian chronology is nowhere near as solid as the architectural wonders which are its hallmark. As a matter of fact, our knowledge of Egyptian events is extensively based upon the disjointed reports of Classical authors, damaged and incomplete written records, and chance records of astronomical phenomena. Even the latter factor has been questioned.²⁴

Velikovsky cited the 1921 statement of O. G. S. Crawford²⁵ that “A system of relative chronology can be established by excavation in any country that has been long inhabited, but it is left hanging in the air until linked up with Egypt, whether directly or indirectly through a third region.”²⁶ Scholars have used a supposedly reliable Egyptian chronology based on inconclusive Egyptian sources as a means of criticizing the Bible’s account of the exodus and conquest of Canaan.

21. Ibid., II, p. 2.

22. C. Tsountas and J. I. Manatt, The Mycenaean Age (1897), p. 317n.

23. R. M. Cook, Greek Painted Pottery (1960), pp. 261–70.

24. Lewis M. Greenberg, “The Lion Gate at Mycenae,” Pensée, III (Winter 1973), pp. 26–27.

25. Crawford, Man and His Past (1921), p. 72.

26. Immanuel Velikovsky, “Astronomy and Chronology,” Pensée, III (Spring/Summer 1973), p. 38. This was reprinted in Peoples of the Sea (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1977), p. 205.

C. Velikovsky's Controversial Reconstruction²⁷

In 1952, the brilliant and controversial Jewish scholar, Immanuel Velikovsky, published Ages in Chaos, the first volume of a projected series.²⁸ The later volumes in the series were delayed for a quarter of a century.²⁹ Ages in Chaos offered startling evidence that the accepted chronology of the ancient world is deeply flawed. Specifically, there is a 500–700 year gap in conventional chronologies, a gap that never existed. Because of the centrality of Egyptian chronology, he argued, this gap is inserted into other chronologies of the ancient Near East and classical civilization. He labored long and hard to prove his case, and his researches are awesome. His reconstructed chronology has been verified (though not in the eyes of conventional historians and archaeologists) by several of his followers.³⁰

1. The Velikovsky Affair

It is not appropriate to deal with the whole of Velikovsky's works in this appendix. His Worlds in Collision (1950) created universal outrage among astronomers. So outraged were certain astronomers at Harvard University that they put great pressure on Macmillan, the publisher, to drop the book, despite its best-selling status. This campaign began before the book had been published, and before any of the critics had read it.³¹ Refuse to suppress it, they threatened, and Harvard University's astronomy department will not offer manuscripts to Macmillan's textbook publishing division. Macmillan eventually capitulated and gave the publishing rights of this best-selling book to Doubleday, a company that had no textbook publishing division.

The book eventually went out of print in the United States and remained unavailable until the mid-1960s, when the counterculture's re-

27. "My work is first a reconstruction, not a theory. . . ." Immanuel Velikovsky, "My Challenge to Conventional Views in Science," Pensée, IV (Spring 1974), p. 10.

28. The whole series was to be called Ages in Chaos, with the first volume titled, From the Exodus to King Akhnaton. The book became so well known as Ages in Chaos that the real title never caught on.

29. Velikovsky, Peoples of the Sea; Ramses II and His Time (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1978). These books officially are part of the Ages in Chaos series. But as I said in the previous footnote, the general series' title, Ages in Chaos, became too closely associated with the title of the first volume, From the Exodus to King Akhnaton, a title which nobody except Velikovsky has ever bothered to use.

30. Cf. Israel M. Isaacson, "Applying the Revised Chronology," Pensée, IV (Fall 1974); Lewis M. Greenberg, "The Lion's Gate at Mycenae," ibid., III (Winter 1973).

31. David Stove, "The Scientific Mafia," Pensée, II (May 1972), p. 6.

volution overturned most of the established tenets of every social science and several natural sciences—the era in which the myth of neutrality died on university campuses throughout the world.³² It was republished and once again became a popular book. A short-lived semi-scholarly periodical, Pensée, was begun in the early 1970s to explore his theories in relation to several academic disciplines. Courses in two dozen colleges that relied on some aspects of his research were being taught in 1973, although the colleges were not major universities.³³ A series of small scholarly journals came and went.³⁴ Velikovsky's catastrophism and chronological work are carried on by the Society of Interdisciplinary Studies and several other Websites. This remains a marginal effort in academia. The academic blackout on Velikovsky's work in chronology still exists.

In the early 1950s, outright lies were spread about Worlds in Collision, and they were repeated in major book reviews. It was a classic case of academic suppression.³⁵ Harlow Shapley, the Harvard astronomer who helped launch the anti-Velikovsky campaign, was still sending out letters in the late 1960s that referred to him a "fraud" and a "charlatan."³⁶ "The Shapleyist proscription of Velikovsky and his revolutionary astronomical concepts," Horace Kallen wrote, "extended to all who, even though doubting or questioning the concepts, did take them seriously. One such was Gordon Atwater, fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society, curator of the Planetarium, and chairman of the department of astronomy at New York's Museum of Natural History, who had read the manuscript for Macmillan. Although Atwater was skeptical of many of Velikovsky's findings, and doubted that Venus could have been ejected from Jupiter, he took the records of worldwide catastrophes in historical times to be evidential. He was dismissed from both his positions with the Museum the night before This Week published his review of Worlds in Collision, in which he urged open-mindedness toward the book. James Putnam, for 25 years with

32. Gary North, "The Epistemological Crisis of American Universities," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1976).

33. A list of these courses appears in Pensée, III (Winter 1973), pp. 37–38.

34. Kronos (1974–88), Aeon (1988–2006), Sis Review (1975–98), The Velikovskian (1978–95).

35. Alfred de Grazia (ed.), The Velikovsky Affair (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, 1966). No major publisher would touch this scholarly analysis of the Velikovsky thesis and the protest it produced. (<http://bit.ly/VelikovskyAffair>)

36. Horace Kallen, "Shapley, Velikovsky and the Scientific Spirit," Pensée, II (May 1973), p. 36. Reprinted in Velikovsky Reconsidered (New York: Warner, 1977), p. 53.

Macmillan and the editor who made the contract with Velikovsky, was immediately dismissed from that establishment."³⁷ Yet the book had attained number-one standing on the best-seller list nationally.

I should state at this point that I do not "believe in Velikovsky." I think we need to consider his chronological reconstruction, but I do not take seriously his astronomical explanations—or Whiston's, for that matter—of such Bible events as the parting of the Red Sea (near-collision with Venus), the manna (hydrocarbons floating down from Venus), or the halting of both sun and moon in Joshua's day (another near-collision with Venus). While there may have been astronomical events of unusual magnitude at the time—although the Bible is silent concerning them—they do not explain the historical events. The quest for naturalistic explanations here seems futile, although not necessarily illegitimate. Velikovsky did not show how Venus could have raised the sea, kept the waters high and the walkway dry for hours (Ex. 14:21), and then allowed the split "mountains" of water to crash down just in time to drown the Egyptians. (The evidence from mythology and literature that Velikovsky presents to buttress his case that Venus is a recent addition to the solar system seems plausible to me, but my competence to judge the scientific astronomical matters involved in such a hypothesis is non-existent.) Nevertheless, I regard Velikovsky as one of the most powerful scholars of this or any century, a man whose thorough command of diverse sources in half a dozen arcane scientific and linguistic disciplines bordered on genius or the occult. He is not to be ignored or dismissed lightly.

2. The Need for Reconstruction

Ages in Chaos never received the attention that Worlds in Collision did. It is a less comprehensive theory, limited primarily to chronology and the documentary records relating to chronology. He began with a summary of the obvious: the exodus cannot easily be placed in the dynasty of any Pharaoh whose accepted chronology matches the chronology of I Kings 6:1. The Eighteenth Dynasty, which by conventional dating occurred in the fifteenth century B.C., included pharaohs who were very powerful. The documentary record of their reigns provides no evidence of any successful rebellion of slaves. Scholars have long recognized this problem. If this date cannot be accepted, then what about the period in between the Eighteenth and Nineteenth 37. Ibid., p. 40; Velikovsky Reconsidered, pp. 62–63.

Dynasties? No good, said Velikovsky. "Stress has also been laid on the fact that Palestine was under Egyptian rule as late as the disturbances of-1358 [1358 B.C.-C.N.], which put an end to the reign of Akhnaton. [Quoting Sir W. M. Flinders Petrie:] 'Joshua did not find any such Egyptian hold during his conquest.' . . . No reference has been found that could be interpreted as even hinting at an exodus during the interregnum between the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Dynasties, and only the fact that the situation was such as to make an exodus possible favors this hypothesis."³⁸

The next theory reduces the age of the Exodus further: it has for its cornerstone a stele of Merneptah, in which this king of the Nineteenth Dynasty says that Palestine "is a widow" and that "the seed of Israel is destroyed." This is regarded as the earliest mention of Israel in an Egyptian document. Merneptah did not perish in the sea, nor did he suffer a debacle; he obviously inflicted a defeat on Israel and ravaged Palestine. The circumstances do not correspond with the pronounced tradition of Israel, but since it is the first mention of Israel, Merneptah is regarded by many as the Pharaoh of the Exodus (about -1220), and Ramses II, his predecessor, as the Pharaoh of the Oppression. Other scholars, however, consider the mention of Israel in Palestine in the days of Merneptah not as a corroboration, but as a refutation of the theory that Merneptah was the Pharaoh of the Exodus. They argue that if he found Israel already in Palestine, he could not have been the Pharaoh of the Exodus.

A further obstacle to placing the Exodus in the reign of Merneptah has also been emphasized. If he really was the Pharaoh of the Exodus, then the Israelites must have entered Palestine at least a generation later, about-1190 to-1180; on this theory there remains only a century for the events of Judges.³⁹

Velikovsky then quoted from W. F. Albright, who in turn had been cited by Petrie: "Under any chronological system which can reasonably be advanced, the date of Israel's invasion and settlement falls within the period (1500-1100 before the present era) when the country was ruled by Egypt as an essential portion of its Syrian Empire." Then Velikovsky asked some key questions. "But if this is so, how could the Israelites have left Egypt, and, having left Egypt, how could they have entered Palestine? Moreover, why do the books of Joshua and Judges, 38. Immanuel Velikovsky, Ages in Chaos (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1952), p. 8.

39. Ibid., p. 9.

which cover four hundred years, ignore the rule of Egypt and, indeed, fail to mention Egypt at all?"⁴⁰

These are obvious questions, but few conservative Bible commentators, with only a few major exceptions, have even hinted to their readers that such questions exist, let alone have solutions. They have remained silent because they have no answers. In fact, Velikovsky himself never did come up with a final position. When did the exodus take place? Velikovsky was never sure. What he was sure of was that either the chronology of Egypt was incorrect or the biblical account is flawed. He concluded his book with this summary: ". . . we still do not know which of the two histories, Egyptian or Israelite, must be readjusted. At the same time we observed how the histories of other ancient countries and peoples accord with either the Israelite or the Egyptian chronology; and how the histories of Cyprus, Mycenae, and Crete, in correlating with one side or the other, create confusion in archaeology and chronology."⁴¹

3. The Ipuwer Papyrus

If an event as discontinuous and comprehensive as the exodus took place, then we might expect to find references to it in Egyptian history. The absence of such a document need not automatically be assumed to be evidence against the exodus, for documents that old rarely survive, and we can also imagine that any document testifying to such a defeat of Egypt's gods would be destroyed by subsequent Egyptians. But such a document does exist. It is called the Ipuwer papyrus, also known as The Admonitions of an Egyptian Slave, the title selected by Alan Gardiner for his 1909 translation. It had been acquired by the Leiden Museum of the Netherlands in 1828, and it was translated and studied in the late nineteenth century. This ancient Egyptian document records a series of catastrophes that befell Egypt. Velikovsky offered fourteen pages of parallel references between this document and the account of the judgments in the Book of Exodus. There are some remarkable parallels, including the most startling, a reference to the Nile: "The river is blood" (Papyrus 2:10).⁴²

The Ipuwer document goes on to say: "Nay, but gold and lapis lazuli, silver and turquoise . . . are hung around the necks of slavegirls.

40. Ibid., p. 11.

41. Ibid., p. 338.

42. Ibid., p. 26.

But noble ladies walk through the land, and mistresses of houses say: 'Would that we had something we might eat.'⁴³ I am strongly inclined to agree with Courville and Velikovsky: this document was the product of the exodus. But even if it wasn't, it presents a picture of the shock to the Egyptian mind that such an event must have produced.⁴⁴ The gods of Egypt had been laid low; the order of the universe, which had been guaranteed by Pharaoh, had been overturned.

This document is one of the most important pieces of evidence used by Velikovsky in his reconstruction of Egyptian chronology. It offers evidence of a major discontinuity in the static order of Egypt, a break that deeply affected the writer.⁴⁵ Here is a side-by-side comparison produced by Velikovsky in 1973.⁴⁶

D. SOME PARALLEL TEXTS

Exodus 7:21 . . . there was blood throughout all the land of Egypt.

Papyrus 2:5-6 Plague is throughout the land. Blood is everywhere.

Exodus 7:20 . . . all the waters that were in the river were turned to blood.

Papyrus 2:10 The river is blood.

Exodus 7:24 And all the Egyptians digged round about the river for water to drink; for they could not drink of the water of the river.

Papyrus 2:10 Men shrank from tasting-human beings, and thirst after water.

Exodus 7:21 . . . and the river stank.

Papyrus 3:10-13 That is our water! That is our happiness! What shall we do in respect thereof? All is ruin!

Exodus 9:25 . . . and the hail smote every herb of the field, and brake

Papyrus 4:14 Trees are destroyed.
Papyrus 6:1 No fruit nor herbs are 43. Cited by Henri Frankfort, Ancient Egyptian Religion (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1948] 1961), p. 85. Ipuwer's poem is reproduced by Adolph Erman, The Literature of the Ancient Egyptians, translated by A. M. Blackman (New York: Dutton, 1927), pp. 94ff.

44. The focus of the poem is "the world turned upside down," in effect. The sage complains that slaves and poor people who formerly had nothing are now rich, while the formerly rich are now poor. The slave girls do not appear to have left the nation in a massive exodus. They remain in the land, with the jewels. If this poem is a product of the Hyksos invasion, it indicates that some wealth was still left to the upper-class Egyptians, since they must have had items of value that were later confiscated by poorer people.

45. Velikovsky, Ages in Chaos, pp. 22-39.

46. Velikovsky, "A Reply to Stiebing," Pensée, IV (Winter 1973-74), p. 39.

every tree of the field.

Exodus 9:23-24 . . . the fire ran along the ground . . . there was hail, and fire mingled with the hail, very grievous.

Exodus 7:21 And the fish that was in the river died.

Exodus 10:15 . . . there remained not any green thing in the trees, or in the herbs of the fields, through all the land of Egypt.

Exodus 9:3 . . . the hand of the Lord is upon thy cattle which is in the field . . . there shall be a very grievous murrain.

Exodus 9:19 . . . gather thy cattle, and all that thou hast in the field.

Exodus 9:21 And he that regarded not the word of the Lord left his servants and his cattle in the field.

Exodus 10:22 . . . and there was a thick darkness in all the land of Egypt.

Exodus 12:29 And it came to pass, that at midnight the Lord smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sat on his throne unto the firstborn of the captive that was in the dungeon.

Exodus 12:30 . . . there was not a house where there was not one dead.

Exodus 12:30 . . . there was a great cry in Egypt.

Exodus 13:21 . . . by day in a pillar of found . . .

Papyrus 2:10 Forsooth, gates, columns and walls are consumed by fire.

Papyrus 10:3-6 Lower Egypt weeps . . . The entire palace is without revenues. To it belong (by right) wheat and barley, geese and fish.

Papyrus 6:3 Forsooth, grain has perished on every side.

Papyrus 5:12 Forsooth, that has perished which yesterday was seen. The land is left over to its weariness like the cutting of flax.

Papyrus 5:5 All animals, their hearts weep. Cattle moan . . .

Papyrus 9:2-3 Behold, cattle are left to stray, and there is none to gather them together. Each man fetches for himself those that are branded with his name.

Papyrus 9:11 The land is not light . . .

Papyrus 5:3; 5:6 Forsooth, the children of princes are dashed against the walls.

Papyrus 6:12 Forsooth, the children of princes are cast out in the streets.

Papyrus 2:13 He who places his brother in the ground is everywhere.

Papyrus 3:14 It is groaning that is throughout the land, mingled with lamentations.

Papyrus 7:1 Behold, the fire has a cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light; to go by day and night.

mounted up on high. Its burning goes forth against the enemies of the land.

From the King James Version

From A. Gardiner's translation of the Leiden Papyrus. He did not observe the similarities.

When was the Ipuwer document written? The Egyptologists disagree. Some historians believe that it was written in the period between the Old and the Middle Kingdoms, while Gardiner believed, as Velikovsky also believed, that it was a document from the Hyksos era, at the end of the Middle Kingdom, meaning at the end of the Thirteenth Dynasty.⁴⁷ Non-“Velikovskiyite” John Van Seeters agreed.⁴⁸ Both eras were transitional eras marked by great disruptions.

Is it proper here to use the word “both”? The conventional chronologies of Egypt assume the existence of two great periods of political and economic chaos in Egypt’s early history, one immediately following the Sixth Dynasty, supposedly beginning about 2150 B.C. (late Early Bronze Age) and lasting for perhaps a century,⁴⁹ and the second period, called the Hyksos period, beginning at the end of the Thirteenth Dynasty (or possibly the Fourteenth), also lasting for at least a century, 1670–1570 B.C.⁵⁰ Courville believed that these two chaotic periods were actually the same period: the era of Amalekite domination, which immediately followed the exodus, i.e., after 1492 B.C. Problem: he estimated the Hyksos rule as lasting 430 years, from the exodus almost to the reign of Solomon.⁵¹ This is a very long estimate.

Could there have been an earlier period of political catastrophe? Could Courville’s telescoping of two sets of records into one era be incorrect? We know that the pyramid-building age ended before Moses’ day, and probably before Joseph’s day. There had been a period of feudalism prior to Sesostri III, who Courville believed was the Pharaoh of the oppression. It is easy to imagine some sort of national political disruption that had broken the power of the pyramid pharaohs.

47. Velikovsky, Ages in Chaos, pp. 49–50.

48. John Van Seeters, “A Date for the ‘Admonitions,’” The Journal of Egyptian Archaeology, L (1964), pp. 13–23. Predictably, he omitted any reference to Velikovsky. Cf. Pensée, III (Winter 1973), pp. 36–37.

49. Siegfried Schwantes, A Short History of the Ancient Near East (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1965), p. 67.

50. Ibid., p. 76. Some Egyptologists believe this era lasted two centuries or more.

51. Donovan Courville, The Exodus Problem and Its Ramifications, 2 vols. (Loma Linda, California: Challenge Books, 1971), I, p. 124.

Why not two catastrophic periods? The main reason why not: the Early Bronze Age identification of the Ipuwer Papyrus. This seems to be the period of the exodus.

Another major problem for Courville's thesis is that Ipuwer, who lived in the Sixth Dynasty, addressed his lament to Pepi II. Courville argued that the Sixth Dynasty, the Twelfth Dynasty, and the Thirteenth Dynasty all overlapped, because the kings associated with these "dynasties" often were not pharaohs, but were only officials. Thus, we really should not think of these parallel groupings as dynasties. Courville argues that Pepi II was the last significant king of the Sixth Dynasty, whose personal reign was remarkably long and therefore had to stretch into the era of the Hyksos.⁵² He had to conclude this because conventional historians believe that the evidence from Manetho and the Turin Papyrus indicates that Pepi II reigned from age six to age 100, making him the longest-lived ruler in Egyptian history.⁵³ If the Sixth Dynasty overlapped the Twelfth and Thirteenth Dynasties, then Pepi II's reign must have extended into the Hyksos era, since Ipuwer addressed his poem or lament to Pepi II. Therefore, Courville had to conclude that this king, the son of a very powerful ruler whose monuments are found all over Egypt,⁵⁴ was not the Pharaoh of the exodus, or even a Pharaoh at all. This is a major problem with Courville's reconstruction. Could this powerful man have been a subordinate ruler during the reign of a weak Pharaoh, Koncharis, whose reign ended in the Red Sea? This is another reason why I am not yet fully convinced by Courville's arguments. There may be some other way to unscramble the contradictions of Egyptian chronology. Nevertheless, there is much to be said for his thesis, despite some important problems. Courville's thesis is the place where any self-consciously Christian (i.e., anti-evolutionary) Egyptologist should begin his investigations.

E. Courville's Reconstruction: Overlapping Reigns

Courville was not a well-organized writer. His two-volume work, The Exodus Problem and Its Ramifications, is exasperating. Its index is atrocious, its footnotes are difficult to master, it does not stick to a clear-cut chronological development from the front of the book to the rear, it makes continual references to obscure documents, and it never really summarizes the thesis. As editor of The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, I asked him to produce a summary essay of his thesis for the journal. He submitted an initial manuscript which was barely more organized than his book, but he graciously consented to rewrite it to my specifications, and the result is a good introduction to his research.

52. Ibid., I, p. 225.

53. James Henry Breasted, A History of the Ancient Egyptians (New York: Scribner's, 1908), pp. 127–28.

54. Ibid., p. 119.

1. The Conservatives' Dilemma

The exodus, he pointed out, is the first event in Egyptian history for which there is a chronologically detailed parallel in Hebrew history.⁵⁵ Because of the similarity of names, the Rameses of Exodus 1:11 was linked initially to Rameses II, listed by the pre-Christian Egyptian historian Manetho. This later Rameses was part of the Nineteenth Dynasty of Egypt, which is now conventionally dated 1350–1200 B.C. Rameses II has been assigned dates as late as 1292–1226.⁵⁶ Either date makes the reign of Ramses II too late a date for the exodus, according to I Kings 6:1. Courville dated his reign centuries later yet.

Many conservative scholars therefore switched to the early Eighteenth Dynasty kings. But these were powerful kings, and their tombs and mummies still exist. Furthermore, no king named Rameses is known to be of this dynasty. The kings of this dynasty reigned in Thebes, far south of the Delta region. The Delta region is believed to be the area of the ruins of Pithom and Pi-Rameses, of which Exodus speaks, and the Israelites were enslaved near the king's palace (Ex. 1:15–16). The Pharaoh was close by during all the plagues, indicating that the Delta was his full-time residence area.⁵⁷ Courville wrote:

Both the 18th and 19th dynasty settings suffer from the discovery of the mummies of the pharaohs nominated as the pharaoh of the Exodus. It is thus necessary to either deny the death of the Exodus pharaoh in the Red Sea debacle, which view is contradictory to Psalms 136:15, or to assume that the body was recovered and returned to Egypt for burial. This latter explanation is contradictory to Exodus 15:5. Since the king, above all others in the army, would certainly wear armor, he would be among the first to find his final resting place at the bottom of the sea.

Even more traumatic to the 18th dynasty placement of the Exodus is the failure of the Egyptian inscriptions even to suggest that there was any significant crisis in Egypt at this time. The power and prosperity to which Egypt was elevated in the reign of Thutmose III continued unabated into the reign of Amenhotep II. The attempts to defend this placement of the Exodus have overlooked one important factor—a factor which, standing alone, is adequate to negate this theory as far as meriting serious consideration. This is the well-recognized fact that it would have required far less than the situation described in Scripture to have resulted in a rapid and easy rebellion on the part of the tribute-paying peoples. There would certainly have resulted a complete loss of any empire that Egypt may have controlled at the time.

55. Donovan A. Courville, "A Biblical Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Summer 1975), p. 131.

56. Ibid., p. 132.

57. Ibid., p. 133.

The empire of Thutmose III extended to the widest limits in all of Egyptian history. All the evidence points to the total absence of any such crisis at the death of Thutmose III. . . .⁵⁸

The opponents of an infallible Bible have recognized these problems, and they have forced baffled conservative commentators to reduce the significance of the exodus to an event “of more manageable proportions.”⁵⁹ In short, conservative Christian historians have been forced by their own chronological presuppositions to retreat from the exodus as an event of God’s massive judgment—an event that God Himself said would be a warning and a testimony to the whole world (Ex. 9:16). Courville cited E. Eric Peet: “. . . if the numbers of the [Hebrew] emigrants were nearly 2,000,000, which is a legitimate deduction from Ex. 12:37, the movement was one which would have shaken Egypt to its very foundations, and which, even if it had failed to be recorded in one of the numerous monuments which have survived in Egypt, would at any rate have left some unmistakable impression in Egyptian history.”⁶⁰

Though Courville did not use the following metaphor, it is clear to me that the conservative defenders of the Bible are as trapped in the chains of Egyptian chronology as the Israelites were trapped by Pharaoh’s taskmasters. They, too, are afraid to depart from Egypt, with its leeks, onions, and tenured teaching positions, for the wilderness of an unknown chronology seems too great for them.

Courville is the closest thing to a Moses of biblical chronology that my generation has seen. Rather than making Israel’s history the reference point for the chronologies of the ancient world, humanist scholars have clung to the unquestionably defective chronology of Egypt, a society that rejected the very idea of linear time and meaning for history. They will not subject themselves to the authority of God or His Bible; they prefer the bondage of Egypt. So do most Christian scholars, who are fearful of alienating their methodological masters. But Courville, a retired Ph.D. in chemistry, had nothing to lose. He and Velikovsky, like Moses and Aaron, marched into the camp of the enemy to challenge the priests of their generation. Courville was armed initially only with the "rod" of I Kings 6:1, but it has repeatedly swallowed the chronological snakes of the new Egyptian magicians.

58. Ibid., pp. 133-34.

59. Ibid., p. 135.

60. Idem. Peet, Egypt and the Old Testament (1924), pp. 105-6.

2. The Basis of His Reconstruction

Courville's two-volume reconstruction is incredibly detailed, and it would be beneficial for scholars to study it carefully. But for this appendix, it is only necessary to reprint his two tables that compare the conventional chronology of the dynasties, which are assumed to be consecutive, with his reconstruction which argues that documents that describe Egyptian history describe overlapping reigns and overlapping dynasties. Whole segments of Egyptian history are "counted twice," in other words. The conventional numbering of the dynasties is therefore meaningless, though he retains the conventional numbers for the purpose of making chronological comparisons.

Notice, for example (see the following two pages), that Dynasty XIX was short-lived and was a mere offshoot of Dynasty XVIII. It ended before Dynasty XVIII did. We are now back to the observation made by the contributor to the New Bible Dictionary:

In Near Eastern works involving chronology, it is important to realize that ancient scribes did not draw up synchronistic lists as is done today. They simply listed each series of rulers and reigns separately, in succession on the papyrus or tablet. Synchronisms were to be derived from special historiographical works, not the king-lists or narratives serving other purposes. An excellent example of this is the Turin Papyrus of Kings from Egypt. It lists at great length all five Dynasties XIII to XVII in successive groups, totalling originally over 150 rulers and their reigns accounting for at least 450 years. However, it is known from other sources that all five Dynasties, the 150-odd rulers and 450-odd regnal years alike, must all fit inside the 234 years from c. 1786 to c. 1552 B.C.: rarely less than two series, and sometimes three series, of rulers are known to have reigned contem-

poraneously.⁶¹

Table I
EGYPTIAN CHRONOLOGY Traditional

| Dynasties by Number | Dates and Notes |
|--------------------------------|--|
| I | There are no dates of general agreement. Dates are assigned by individual scholars as each sees best. Some continue to recognize beginnings from 3400 B.C., others from 2850-2800 B.C. The period for the first eleven dynasties ends with the year 1991 B.C., regarded as astronomically fixed. |
| XI | |
| XII | 1991–1788 |
| XIII | 1788–1688 |
| XV with XVI + XIV | 1688–1588 XV and XVI are Hyksos dynasties. XIV is a native line under Hyksos. |
| XVII | 1588–? |
| XVIII | 1580–1350 |
| XIX | 1350–1200 |
| XX | 1200–1090 |
| XXI | 1090–950 |
| XXII | 950–750 |
| XXIII | 750–718 |
| XXIV | 718–712 |
| XXV | 712–663 |
| XXV | 663–525 |

(reprinted from The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, op. cit. pp. 140-41.)

61. New Bible Dictionary, op. cit., p. 192.

Table II
EGYPTIAN CHRONOLOGY
Reconstruction

| Dynasties by Number | Dates and Notes | |
|--------------------------------|------------------------|---|
| I | c. 2125–1880 | III is parallel to late I starting about one century later than I. |
| IV | c. 1880–1780 | First half of II is parallel with IV. |
| V | c. 1780–1640 | Last half of II is parallel with V. |
| XII | 1692–1480 | II and V extend briefly into the era of XII. VI is parallel with XII but starts about 75 years later and extends about 75 years past the end of XII. XIII is composed of subrulers and officials under XII. |
| XVI | 1445–1028 | XVI is Hyksos, ruling parallel with XV, also Hyksos. XIV, VII to X were local dynasties ruling by permission of the Hyksos. XVII was composed of the kings during the war of liberation. |
| XVIII | 1028–700 | The dates are for the recomposed XVIII. XIX is but a brief offshoot from XVIII dated 840-790 B. c. XXIII is a line of usurper kings ruling locally, 776-730 B.C. XX overlaps late XVIII as recomposed and was fragmented after the rule of Rameses III. |
| XXI | 710–? | The fragmented rule of XX was in competition with XXI, composed itself of a dual line of High Priests ruling from Thebes, the other at Tanis. Dynasty XXI soon took over the fragments of XX. XXII was Assyrian and competed for control with XXIV, XXV and early XXVI. |
| XXVI | 663–525 | XXIII to XXVI retain the dates as traditionally held. |

Courville claimed that his reconstruction provides solutions to over one hundred chronological problems that now bedevil conservative Old Testament scholars.⁶² "By the reconstruction, the Exodus incident is set at the point of the Hyksos invasion of Egypt. This setting explains the enigmatic statement of Josephus⁶³ to the effect that the Hyksos were able to take over Egypt without a battle. Egypt had been beaten to her knees by the disasters resulting from the plagues. The slaves were gone, the army was gone, the king was gone, and there was not even an heir apparent to take over the control."⁶⁴

Courville offered a comprehensive comparison of the conventional dates of Old Testament history and his reconstructed chronology. It should be used as a guide to both his book and the work of Velikovsky.

One of the more convincing arguments used by Courville to defend his thesis of a single period of political disintegration relates the destruction of Canaan to the chronology of Egypt. The archaeology of Canaan indicates a universal transformation of the various city-states in the late Early Bronze period, or about the twenty-first century, B.C., according to conventional chronology. This conventional chronology is erroneously dated, Courville argued; the date of the Early Bronze age should be placed in the mid-fifteenth century, B.C. He discussed this in chapter VI of Volume I. There is a correspondence, Courville argued, of archaeological evidence: the end of the Old Kingdom, and therefore the beginning of the "first" period of disruption, came in this same late Early Bronze age, according to conventional chronologies of Egypt. Therefore, he concluded, the period after the exodus is the sole period of disruption.

I have already mentioned a difficulty with this argument. The pharaohs of what scholars have called the Sixth Dynasty, especially Pepi I, were powerful kings, according to Egyptian archaeological evidence. Courville had to argue that these Sixth Dynasty kings were actually subordinate officials under the rule of what scholars have called the Twelfth Dynasty pharaohs—Sesostris I, Sesostris III, Amenemhet III, etc.—and he also argued that the Thirteenth Dynasty paralleled the Twelfth. In fact, he argued that the Sixth Dynasty kings actually survived as subordinate rulers under the Amalekites (Hyksos).⁶⁵ That such powerful kings were subordinates who survived the fall of two 62. "Biblical Reconstruction," p. 143.

63. Josephus, Against Apion, Bk. I, paragraph 14.

64. Courville, "Biblical Reconstruction," p. 144.

65. Courville, Exodus Problem, 1, pp. 225–26.

dynasties, and even the fall of Egypt, is difficult to imagine. We need generations of well-trained Egyptologists and Palestine archaeologists to examine these issues, but without operating a priori in terms of the conventional chronologies, and without the evolutionary assumptions that undergird the “Bronze Age-Iron Age” classification system.

F. The Invasion of Canaan

Stan Vaninger wrote a follow-up to Courville’s reconstruction. He surveyed the evidence, as of 1980, concerning Canaanite archaeology. The dating of numerous “digs”—the holes in the ground that constitute the humanist world’s favorite refutations of biblical history—points to a tremendous disruption in the late Early Bronze Age. In city after city, there are signs of burning and destruction, indicating an invasion of the region by a militarily powerful outside army. The conventional dating of this period is 2300 to 2200 B.C. Thus, the scholars continue to point to this disruption as having taken place at least seven centuries before the earliest date possible for the exodus. Furthermore, there is no archaeological evidence of any disruption in the fifteenth century through the thirteenth century, B. C., the conventional dates of the exodus. Thus, the scholars have concluded, the events described in the Book of Joshua as being a momentous victory for the Hebrews are obviously exaggerated. The invasion was a slow process, with the Hebrews being steadily assimilated by the existing Canaanite cultures. This story is given for Jericho, Ai, and Gilgal.⁶⁶ Archaeologist Kathleen Kenyon, who did the major work on Jericho, summarized the evidence: “The final end of the Early Bronze Age civilization came with catastrophic completeness. The last of the Early Bronze Age walls of Jericho was built in a hurry, using old and broken bricks, and was probably not completed when it was destroyed by fire . . . all the finds show that there was an absolute break, and that a new people took the place of the earlier inhabitants. Every town in Palestine that has so far been investigated shows this same break.”⁶⁷

Even more revealing is a 1983 article in the conventional quasi-scholarly journal, Biblical Archaeology Review: “The Mysterious MBI

66. Stan F. Vaninger, “Historical Revisionism: Archaeology and the Conquest of Canaan,” The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VII (Summer 1980), pp. 123–24, 128. (<http://bit.ly/Vaninger>)

67. Kenyon, Archaeology in the Holy Land (New York: Praeger, 1960), p. 134; cited by Vaninger, ibid., p. 120. He referred to similar statements by G. Ernest Wright and William Dever: p. 120n.

[Early Middle Bronze Age] People.” This period is dated by the author from 2200 B.C. to 2000 B.C. Who were these people? The author, Rudolph Cohen, speculated: “I would suggest that they were a people who migrated slowly, from the south or southwest, into the Central Negev of Palestine. I would further suggest that the dim, historical memory of their journey powerfully influenced the Biblical author who described Israel’s entry into Canaan. In fact, these MBI people may be the Israelites whose famous journey from Egypt to Canaan is called the exodus.”⁶⁸

It is interesting, however, to note that this migratory drift, as I have reconstructed it, bears a striking similarity to that of the Israelites’ flight from Egypt to the Promised Land, as recorded in the Book of exodus. . . . The establishment of the MBI settlements directly over the ruins of the EBII EBIII sites in the Central Negev is consistent with the tradition that the Israelites dwelled in the area previously inhabited by their Amalekite foes (Deuteronomy 25:17–19). The north-eastward migration of the MBI population into Transjordan has parallels in the Biblical recollection that the Israelites remained in Moab before crossing the Jordan River and laying siege to Jericho (Deuteronomy 3:29). In this connection, it is interesting to note that Early Bronze Age Jericho was destroyed by a violent conflagration, and the site was thinly reoccupied by MBI newcomers, who were apparently unaccustomed to urban dwellings.

In the central and northern parts of Israel, the EBIII urban culture flourished. The MBI invaders in the south overwhelmed this urban Canaanite civilization and destroyed their cities but thereafter persisted in a semi-nomadic way of life. This bears a striking similarity to the tradition of Joshua’s devastating campaign against the Canaanite centers in central Palestine and his ban on rebuilding some of them (e.g., Joshua 8:28). Both Jericho and Ai were fortified cities at the end of the Early Bronze Age. According to the Biblical account, they were both destroyed by the Israelites; God specifically instructed that these cities should not be rebuilt. Interestingly enough, after the EBIII destruction of Jericho and Ai, both cities lay in ruins for hundreds of years.⁶⁹

He states that scholars agree that the pottery and other aspects of their culture differ significantly from what went before. These new people were not primarily urban, as their predecessors and followers

68. Rudolph Cohen, “The Mysterious MBI People,” Biblical Archaeology Review, IX (July/August 1983), p. 16.

69. Ibid., p. 28.

(2000 to 1550 B.C.) were. It was William F. Albright, the author reminded us, who concluded that the pottery of these people resembled more closely the Middle Bronze Age people who followed them than the pottery of those who preceded them.⁷⁰

This is not surprising to those who understand that these MBI people were the invading Israelites, and the MBII people were their more urban descendants. Conventional scholars refuse to acknowledge that the solution to these enigmas is found in the reconstructed chronology of Velikovsky and Courville. The conventional chronology has inserted an extra seven centuries into the record. What took place in the fifteenth century before Christ in Egypt and Canaan took place in the late Early Bronze Age (EBIII) era or early Middle Bronze (MBI).

All Cohen could do was to appeal to the memory of these MBI people in the mind of the writer of the biblical account.

The migration of the MBI population from the southwest and their conquest of the Early Bronze civilization evidently made a very deep impression, and the memory of these events was preserved from one generation to the next. The late Yohanon Aharoni made a similar suggestion when he noted that the Biblical tradition concerning the destruction of the two Canaanite cities Arad and Horma could not be placed, archaeologically speaking, in the Late Bronze/Early Iron Age (there were no cities there then)—although this is the period to which the arrival of the Hebrews is normally ascribed—but had remarkable parallels in MBII, when these two strategic outposts in the BeerSheva basin guarded the country's southern approaches. (Aharoni identified Biblical Arad with MBII Tel Malhata and Horma with MBII Tel Masos.) He maintained that the recollection of these two important sites was perpetuated among the local populace and appeared in the Biblical saga of the conquest. The similarity between the course of the MBI migration and the route of the exodus seems too close to be coincidental, and a comparable process may have operated here. The Late Bronze Age (1550–1200 B.C.)—the period usually associated with the Israelites' flight from Egypt—is archaeologically unattested in the Kadesh-Barnea area (as elsewhere in the Central Negev, for that matter), but MBI remains abound and seem to provide a concrete background for the traditions of settlement.⁷¹

70. Ibid., p. 18.

71. Ibid., p. 29.

G. Egypt and Crete

We would be wise to understand how modern archaeologists operate, and the extent to which they are tied to Egypt's chronology by way of Charles Darwin. I have discussed the origin of the labyrinth design in Chapter 2 and in Appendix C. The link between Egypt's labyrinth and Crete's is recognized by informed archaeologists. Sir Arthur Evans excavated the "palace" of Minos from about 1902 to 1930. He was an evolutionist. He used the evolutionary speculations of anthropologists Edward Tylor and Lewis Morgan (as did Frederick Engels) to provide a stage theory of historic development. Both of these scholars became prominent in the 1870s.

This stage theory—savagery, barbarism, and civilization—was first developed in the early nineteenth century by Swedish scholar Sven Nilsson, who wrote in the 1830s.⁷² But where did Nilsson get the idea? From Danish scholar Christian Thomson.⁷³ Thomson came up with the idea of the division of ages by construction materials—stone, bronze, and iron. In 1816, he had been given the difficult task of sorting out huge quantities of artifacts possessed by the Royal Commission for the Preservation and Collection of Antiquities. This collection was jumbled together. What came first? He thought about it for three years, and then came up with the Stone Age, Bronze Age, Iron Age classification. There were few references to iron implements, he knew, prior to 800 B.C. Copper and bronze were mentioned much earlier. So, the bronze age must have come later. Common sense told him that the stone age was earliest of all. The first scholars outside Denmark who accepted this classification scheme were the Swedes and Germans. At mid-century, British scholars still refused to accept it. A decade later, after Darwin's Origin of Species, the idea spread rapidly.⁷⁴

Evans used this assumption of cultural evolution—from primitive to complex, from Bronze Age to Iron Age, from savagery to civilization—to explain the "palace." R. A. McNeal was forthright: ". . . I have said, in effect, that he went out to the hill of Knossos with certain ideas in his head, and that he excavated the site in the light of his previous intellectual commitments. In other words, the objects as they came out of the ground were compelled (by force if necessary!) to fit Evans' prior 72. R. A. McNeal, "The Legacy of Arthur Evans," California Studies in Classical Antiquity, VI (1973), p. 207.

73. Ibid., p. 208.

74. Barry Fell, Saga America (New York: Times Books, 1974), pp. 29–30, 43–44.

ideas.”⁷⁵

By now Evans had made two very important assumptions, first that the civilization of the Cretan Bronze Age was a discreet [typo: he meant discrete—G.N.] entity, and second that it could be considered in terms of youth, maturity, and old age. Thus far little has been said about the artifacts, and one may wonder whether they have not become lost in the metaphorical shuffle. The point is, that Evans fitted the artifacts to his particular organic model of reality, and the way in which he did so was perfectly ingenious. Faced with the necessity of forging a link between the guiding abstraction and the artifacts which could be apprehended empirically, he wove into his synthesis another set of ideas, this time concerned with the nature of Minoan art. Evans looked at the artifacts and divided them into three classes corresponding to the tripartite scheme which he already had in mind. . . . In this way Evans connected the biological metaphor with the archaeological artifacts which he pulled from the ground. The result was a sequence, a relative chronology.⁷⁶

He then divided the types of pottery into a scheme: Stone Age; Minoan: Early Minoan, Middle Minoan, Late Minoan; and Iron Age. He did the same with art. As he excavated, the stratigraphic evidence was lost.⁷⁷ McNeal refused to say that this was deliberate, or that Evans falsified the record. Others have cast doubt on his handling of the evidence and his creativity in reconstructing the “palace,” especially the paintings.⁷⁸ As McNeal said of the early archaeologists, “In their rush to construct elaborate evolutionary sequences, they tended to forget the strata. Or, to put the matter another way, there was a regrettable habit of interpreting the strata in terms of sequences previously constructed on solely evolutionary criteria.”⁷⁹

This practice probably arose from the mistaken idea, already noted, that pottery types could be stacked end-to-end like railroad cars. We know now that pottery does not go in and out of existence in just this way. A new style does not necessarily begin where another leaves off. Evans thought that only one style marked a given period. But quite apart from the existence of gradual transitions between different styles, we find totally different types in simultaneous use.

75. McNeal, p. 209.

76. Ibid., pp. 216–17.

77. Ibid., p. 218.

78. Hans Georg Wunderlich, The Secret of Crete (New York: Macmillan, 1974), pp. 79–82.

79. McNeal, p. 219.

Since potters are both conservative and progressive, old styles can be retained long after new ones are in vogue. There is thus a definite danger of refining the relative sequence too much and of marking off stages where no stages ever existed.⁸⁰

Cottrell, however, praised Evans for his attention to pottery and the finely drawn divisions he makes between styles.⁸¹ In this regard, something else needs to be noted: the dominance of the presumed chronology of Egypt. Cottrell wrote of this achievement, and he used italics to emphasize the point: "Evans' achievement was to mark off the three great periods of Minoan civilization which could be correlated with the three great periods of Egyptian civilization—the Old Kingdom, the Middle Empire and the New Empire."⁸² He immediately cited Evans' own Palace of Minos to show that Evans recognized that this was precisely what he had "proven."

Here is the great irony. Evans did not recognize that the "palace" was not a palace, but was a labyrinth structure for the Cretan cult of the dead. Refusing to recognize that the mummy-preserving air vents were not "indoor plumbing outlets," and maintaining that sarcophagi were "bathtubs," he then argued that this "high technology" civilization was unique, with no previous origins in Greek culture, and one that disappeared almost overnight. After all, no subsequent civilization possessed such high technology. He offered several possible explanations for the disappearance of this unique civilization, such as an earthquake, but geologist Wunderlich showed that the geological evidence indicates that this explanation is highly unlikely, and so are his other explanations.⁸³

Evans tried for decades to decipher the "Minoan" language, and failed because he refused to see that it was related closely to Greek. He literally invented a civilization, "Minoan," where no independent civilization ever existed. In short, Evans didn't have any idea of what he was doing. And then, just to make things complete, he imported the erroneous three-kingdom Egyptian classification scheme used by modern Egyptologists to explain Egyptian history, and thereby helped to "prove" his three-stage theory of "Minoan" history. Such is the fate of those who adopt a cultural version of the paradigm of evolution.

80. Idem.

81. Leonard Cottrell, The Bull of Minos (New York: Rinehart, 1958), pp. 138–39.

82. Ibid., p. 139.

83. Wunderlich, Secret of Crete, ch. 11.

Conclusion

The testimony of the Bible is clear: 480 years before Solomon began to construct the temple, Moses led the Hebrews out of Egypt. The archaeological evidence points to a late Early Bronze Age/Middle Bronze Age conquest of Canaan by a people who invaded from the southwest. The problem for conventional archaeologists and historians is that their dating of the Bronze Age places the archaeological evidence much earlier than fifteenth-century Egypt and therefore fifteenth-century Mediterranean civilization (which is keyed to Egypt).

The Bible is correct; the conventional scholars are incorrect. They have used the flawed chronological reconstruction of Egypt's history to govern their dating of the metallic ages. They have refused to go to the Bible for their chronological keying device. Instead, they use a mistaken chronology keyed to Egypt. It is therefore time for Christian scholars to abandon Egypt at last, and to head for the Promised Land, even if they must wander in the academic wilderness for a generation or two.

APPENDIX B

THE DEMOGRAPHICS OF DECLINE

Thou shalt be blessed above all people: there shall not be male or female barren among you, or among your cattle (Deut. 7:14).

Population stagnation, prior to the fulfilling of the dominion covenant, is a curse. The curse aspect of population stagnation is recognized in almost all societies except the modern humanistic West. As British economist P. T. Bauer pointed out, the word “barren” is universally recognized as unfavorable.”¹ Population stagnation is a restriction on the ability of men to fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant. Christians should not accept the reigning presuppositions of the humanist intellectuals regarding the supposed evils of rapid population growth. If the society in which such growth is taking place is God-fearing and biblical law-honoring, population growth is a sign of God’s favor and should be regarded as confirmation of God’s covenant. It is a blessing.

In contrast to the biblical view of population growth is the message of a fund-raising letter sent out by the lobbying organization, Zero Population Growth, and signed by biologist Paul Ehrlich, author of the best-selling book, The Population Bomb. His letter blamed the social evils of our era on population growth. “To name just a few of these dilemmas: food shortages, polluted air, oil shortages, depleted energy supplies, lowered standards of education, escalating crime rates, excessive bureaucracy, economic instability, housing shortages, and inadequate health care. There is one basic condition that contributes to all these predicaments. It’s this: We’re overpopulated.”²

The assumption of Western intellectuals concerning demographics is that population growth threatens per capita income. “More mouths to feed” means more starvation. But this assumption is not correct. It is not the number of mouths to feed that is significant economically; rather, it is the productivity available to feed those mouths. This was a continuing theme in Bauer’s books. He wrote:

1. P. T. Bauer, Equality, the Third World and Economic Delusion (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1981), p. 62.

2. Cited in Review of the News (August 15, 1979), p. 29.

Rapid population growth has not been an obstacle to sustained economic advance either in the Third World or in the West. Between the 1890s and 1930s the sparsely populated area of Malaysia, with hamlets and fishing villages, was transformed into a country with large cities, extensive agricultural and mining operations and extensive commerce. The population rose from about one and a half to about six million; the number of Malays increased from about one to about two and a half million. The much larger population had much higher material standards and lived longer than the small population of the 1890s. Since the 1950s rapid population increase in densely-populated Hong Kong and Singapore has been accompanied by large increases in real income and wages. The population of the Western world has more than quadrupled since the middle of the eighteenth century. Real income per head is estimated to have increased by a factor of five or more. Most of the increase in incomes took place when population increased as fast as, or faster than, in the contemporary less developed world.³

Bauer’s focus is on character, attitudes, and institutional arrangements, not natural (physical) resources. How else can we explain the spectacular increase in per capita income that residents of Hong Kong have experienced? “The number of people who can live in any area at the specified standard of living is not determined by the extent of land or of other physical resources available there. It depends very largely on the personal qualities, social institutions and mores and political arrangements of the population, on the state of technology and on external market conditions for imports and exports.”⁴

Thus, the guilt felt by the West’s intellectuals concerning population growth in the Third World is valid, but not because “we” taught the Third World about modern medicine and other life-saving technologies. Unquestionably, we did send them key life-saving technologies. Which technologies? I am not referring here to DDT and other pesticides, important as these may be in extending life expectancy by killing disease-bearing insects (at least until the insect species produce pesticide-resistant progeny).⁵ I have in mind the two greatest life-extending technologies that the West has exported to the Third World, the wire-mesh window and door screen (post-1860s) and the elementary public health measure, the separation of latrines from close proximity to community water supplies, a practice known since Alexander the Great,⁶ and one which was required (though without a biological explanation) of the Hebrews, at least with respect to battlefield conditions (Deut. 23:12–13). These technologies should not be the basis of guilt among Western intellectuals. The intellectuals should feel guilty only because they—Western educators, politicians, missionaries, and propagandists—have persuaded Third World leaders that socialism and economic interventionism are the most productive, or at least the most moral, of all forms of social and economic organization. It is socialism, with its denial of personal responsibility—at least the personal responsibility of the poor—that threatened the per capita wealth of underdeveloped nations, not population growth as such.

3. Bauer, Equality, p. 43.

4. Ibid., p. 50.

A. The Ultimate Resources

The ultimate resources for man are God's four gifts: land, life, law, and time. These were God's gifts in the garden, to which regeneration has been added as a gift in the post-Fall world. "All the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye observe to do, that ye may live, and multiply, and go in and possess the land which the LORD swore unto your fathers" (Deut. 8:1). It could not be any clearer. "But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he swore unto thy fathers, as it is this day" (Deut. 8:18).⁷ God's covenant establishes the possibility of positive feedback, or what is also called compound growth.

Population growth is specifically stated to be a covenantal blessing.

5. The "defeat" of malaria-carrying mosquitos by DDT in the mid-twentieth century was apparently only a temporary tactical victory. The disease has bounced back since the late 1960s. It requires a full-time campaign to control the mosquitos. Governments are not always willing to finance such campaigns, especially in Third World nations. Julian Simon argued that the one remedy that may be able to work is high human population density, which reduces the habitat for the mosquitos. Simon, The Ultimate Resource (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1981), p. 253.

6. Peter Drucker, Management: Tasks, Responsibilities, Practices (New York: Harper, 1974), p. 330.

7. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 22.

To deny this is to deny God's word. There can be no compromise here. Therefore, we should expect to find evidence that population growth is, in the long run, accompanied by other economic benefits. Contrary to the assertion of the rebellious former slaves of the wilderness era (Ex. 14:11–12; 17:1–3; Num. 20:3–4), God does not bring His people out into the wilderness to kill them. Contrary to the hand-wringing of ethically rebellious slaves of our day, God does not multiply the seed of righteous mankind in order to bring a population catastrophe upon them.

1. Simon's Thesis

Professor Julian Simon of the University of Illinois wrote an influential book, published by Princeton University Press in 1981, called The Ultimate Resource. What is this resource? Human creativity. Simon examined the statistical and theoretical evidence of the various "doomsday books" published around the world, but especially in the United States, after 1964. He found all of them to be misleading forecasts: the coming famine, the coming pollution catastrophe (dead seas, dead lakes, cancer-producing air), the population explosion, the coming extinction of natural resources (especially "nonrenewable" resources), the energy crisis, and the economic collapse.

What is the evidence? Food is getting cheaper, and has been for centuries under capitalism. Economic catastrophes do happen, but in the modern world they are almost always the product of government planning and mismanagement. An increasing population, if coupled with capitalist institutions, has invariably brought with it economic advance and an increasing per capita income within two generations and often within one generation. The problem, he said, is not that Western populations are increasing, but rather that Westerners are not reproducing themselves. Birth rates in many Western nations are below the reproduction rate of 2.1 children per woman. The bulk of the historical evidence points to the fact that shrinking populations bring with them economic stagnation and declining per capita income.

Here is the main thesis of the book: "It is your mind that matters economically, as much or more than your mouth or hands. In the long run, the most important economic effect of population size and growth is the contribution of additional people to our stock of useful knowledge. And this contribution is large enough in the long run to overcome all the costs of population growth. This is a strong statement, but the evidence for it seems very strong.”⁸ The evidence is very strong—far stronger than anything the zero population growth propagandists have been able to muster. “More mouths” means, eventually, a larger population base from which minds will emerge. More minds mean more creativity, despite the short-run limitation that hypnotizes the doom-sayers: “more births mean more mouths to feed” and therefore supposedly also mean reduced per capita investment, leading to low or zero economic growth.

This latter approach is illustrated by the booklet published by the World Bank, an international organization that gives confiscated tax dollars and borrowed money to Third World nations. The booklet announced: “There may historically have been countries which could have been considered under-populated, in terms of the economy’s ability to make effective use of its natural resources. Perhaps the United States was in this position at some point in the past. However, instances when the addition of more people to the labor force led to increases in labor productivity and income per head must have been few in the past and are virtually nonexistent today.”⁹ The words “may,” “perhaps,” and “must have been” indicate how little evidence the author has for any of his conclusions.

2. Overstating His Case

On occasion, Simon needlessly overstated his case for economic growth. For instance, he argued that progress has been made in controlling “point sources” of water pollution, such as municipal and industrial sewage and chemical waste.¹⁰ This was true, but it is the non-point sources of water pollution, especially agricultural—topsoil runoff, animal urea runoff—that are the biggest problem. Here, there has been little progress.¹¹ But his main point is correct: that with freedom, future-orientation, and capital to finance human creativity, there probably will be economic growth and increases in per capita output (and therefore income).

Does this mean that there are no limits to growth? He argues that there are in principle none. This is clearly incorrect. The post-Fall world is under a curse. We know there are limits to growth because

8. Simon, Ultimate Resource, p. 196.

9. Population Planning: Sector Working Paper (March 1972), p. 17.

10. Simon, p. 133.

11. Jerome W. Milliman, “Can Water Pollution Policy Be Efficient?” Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), p. 190. (<http://bit.ly/MillimanWater>)

there are prices. At zero price, there is more demand for than supply of a scarce economic resource, meaning virtually all resources. To argue for a zero-limits world is to argue for a zero-price world. This was the eschatological argument of the Communists and “radical” political economists.¹² Simon knew this. Yet his language often points to a zero-price world which has been the dream of revolutionary communist visionaries for millennia.

Sometimes Simon guarded his language. At other times he didn’t. For example, in his conclusion, he wrote that “there are no meaningful limits to the continuation of this process,” meaning a rising standard of living.¹³ He rejected the use of the word “finite” because of the misconceptions associated with it. For instance, “finite” is not meaningful because “we cannot say with any practical surety where the bounds of a relevant resource system lie, or even if there are any bounds.”¹⁴ He was correct: we cannot say where the bounds lie. He was also incorrect: we can say that all resources are bounded. This is why we must pay to gain access to them.

3. The Irreplaceable Resource: Time

Simon was a humanist who sought to escape the curse-induced limits to growth. He was attempting to escape the logic of all growth, for it points to a coming judgment and the end of time. A 1% per year expansion of today’s human population would produce over 80 trillion people in a thousand years. There are, in short, limits to growth. There is finitude. We are not God; we are limited creatures. Our creativity is the creativity of creatures, a kind of “re-creativity.”

The Bible says that the primary limit in the post-Fall world is time: God’s final judgment is coming. Simon categorically and foolishly denied this. Speaking of the increase of total resources over time the product of superior insight, better technology, and capital accumulation, he wrote: “But, you ask, how long can this go on? Surely it can’t go on forever, can it? In fact there is no logical or physical reason why the process cannot do just that, go on forever.”¹⁵ In this sense, Simon was “whistling past the graveyard”—the entropy-bound cosmic grave-

12. “The Unorthodox Ideas of Radical Economists Win a Wider Hearing,” Wall Street Journal (Feb. 11, 1972); cf. Business Week (March 18, 1972), pp. 72, 74.

13. Simon, p. 345.

14. Ibid., p. 48.

15. Ibid., p. 217.

yard.¹⁶ The process cannot go on forever, or anything like forever. The universe is bounded. Furthermore, this earth is bounded, and even 1% per annum growth in the world's population will press against these limits within a few generations. Eventually, population growth will end, thereby fulfilling one aspect of the dominion covenant. Other forms of growth will also end.

Simon's book is an intellectual overreaction. Nevertheless, his arguments are correct within the God-imposed and (humanly speaking) indefinite limitations of the creation. We do not live in an infinite environment, but we do live in an indefinitely limited environment. It is not infinite, but its boundaries cannot be known by a government committee. There are limits on men's creativity, but men do not know where these limits are. God does know, and therefore it is incorrect to deny the limitations of finitude. On the other hand, a state bureaucracy does not know, and therefore it is misleading (and state-enhancing) to speak of the need for limiting growth by political action.

B. Biblical Ethics vs. Stagnation

The answer, then, is to allow men's creativity to flow, and to allow profit-seeking investors to seek out previously undetected opportunities. This fusion of inventive genius and private capital accumulation and investment is basic to the institutional framework of the growth process. But most important of all is the ethical framework, which in turn is the source of the institutional framework. Christian economic and social analysis must postulate a relatively close relationship in history between ethics and economic performance. First, there is a relationship between external righteousness and external blessings. This includes population growth. Second, we must never forget the relationship between ethical rebellion and economic stagnation or even "negative income," as the economists like to put it, i.e., between evil acts and falling per capita income for a society. What we should argue, contrary to Simon, is that there are several "ultimate resources": (1) God's gift of life in the creation; (2) His gift to the creation of an assistant made in His image, man, who is subordinately creative (Simon's "ultimate resource"); (3) His gift of land (natural resources)—the creation itself; (4) His gift of time; (5) His gift of law; and (6) His gift of regeneration and sanctification to fallen humanity.

16. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

Simon's thesis, therefore, is flawed by his humanism. Nevertheless, his thesis is not nearly so flawed as his humanist opponents' theory, namely, that compound economic growth is not the proper standard, but is instead some sort of cosmic hubris on the part of man, his defiance of the laws of an entropic cosmos.¹⁷ They assume that finitude is primary rather than ethics, that entropy is the fundamental reality rather than regeneration, sanctification, and blessing. His opponents assume that capitalism is evil because it provides the legal framework for long-term economic growth, and thereby encourages such growth. Capitalism does precisely that, of course, but the Christian response should be that this is one of the reasons why capitalism is a God-ordained and God-required form of economic organization. It is not capitalism that is innately evil, but rather the zero-growth ideology.

C. The Legacy of Malthus

Some have termed the fear of population growth "neo-Malthusianism."¹⁸ Thomas Malthus, a late-eighteenth-century cleric, amateur demographer, and economist,¹⁹ wrote his enormously influential (and originally anonymous) book, An Essay on the Principle of Population, in 1798.²⁰ In it, he made a series of dire analyses and prophecies concerning overpopulation and looming food shortages—prophecies that he revised downward in later editions of his book.²¹ Unfortunately, his nineteenth-century followers ignored his later revisions.²²

The most famous—and erroneous—of Malthus' observations is this: the means of subsistence increases arithmetically ("1, 2, 3, 4, 5. . ."), while all species have a tendency to increase geometrically ("2, 4, 8, 16, 32. . .").²³ There is no evidence for the existence of these numerical relationships.²⁴ Most important, we cannot measure a fixed

17. Jeremy Rifkin, Entropy: A New World View (New York: Bantam, 1980). For a my refutation of Rifkin, see Is the World Running Down?

18. For example, B. Bruce-Briggs, "Against the Neo-Malthusians," Commentary (July 1974).

19. In 1804, he became the very first person to hold a chair in political economy, at the newly founded East India College. He filled this post until his death in 1834. William Petersen, Population, 2nd ed. (New York: Macmillan, 1969), p. 142.

20. Like the Manifesto of the Communist Party (1848), which also became influential, the first edition was published anonymously.

21. Gertrude Himmelfarb, The Idea of Poverty: England in the Early Industrial Age (New York: Knopf, 1984), pp. 113–22.

22. Ibid., pp. 122–32.

23. See Petersen, Population, p. 149.

24. Himmelfarb, p. 127.

“tendency”—and tendencies were all that he ever claimed for his theory²⁵—to geometrical expansion of population in that crucial species, humanity.

Malthus’ theory was refuted in the industrial West by three developments: (1) contraceptive technologies; (2) even earlier, by the very means of restraint he recommended, late marriages; and (3) the rise of scientific agriculture, by which mankind multiplied food even faster than man multiplied himself. Malthus began to recognize this in later editions of his book. He wrote in the final chapter of the last edition: “From a review of the state of society in former periods compared with the present, I should certainly say that the evils resulting from the principle of population have rather diminished than increased, even under the disadvantage of an almost total ignorance of the real cause. And if we can indulge the hope that this ignorance will be gradually dissipated, it does not seem unreasonable to expect that they will be still further diminished.”²⁶ It should also be understood that he was utterly opposed to abortion, contraceptive technologies, and other “mechanical” means of reducing the birth rate. In this sense, “neo-Malthusians” have recommended policies totally at odds with his.²⁷

The influence of Malthus in discussions of population theory has been enormous. Independently, both Darwin and A. R. Wallace came to their theory of “evolution through natural selection” by reading Malthus’ insight that populations are constantly pressing against the means of subsistence.²⁸ In economics, with the exception of Marx,²⁹ the Malthusian perspective led to the “dismal science” (as Carlyle called it). Classical economic theory during the first half of the nine-

25. Antony Flew, “Introduction,” Thomas Malthus, An Essay on the Principle of Population (New York: Penguin, [1970] 1982), pp. 19–21.

26. Cited in Warren S. Thompson, Population Problems, 3rd ed. (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1942), p. 29.

27. Petersen, Population, pp. 150–52.

28. Charles Darwin and Alfred Russel Wallace, The Journal of the Linnean Society (1858); reprinted in Philip Appleman (ed.), Darwin: A Norton Critical Edition (New York: Norton, 1970), p. 83; Wallace, “Note on the passages of Malthus’ ‘Principles of Population’ which suggested the idea of natural selection to Darwin and myself,” The Darwin and Wallace Celebration held on Thursday, 1 July 1908 by the Linnean Society of London (London, 1908), pp. 111–18, cited by Sir Gavin de Beer, Darwin, p. 71n. See also Wallace’s reminiscences at age 75 in The Wonderful Century; cited by Arnold C. Brackman, A Delicate Arrangement: The Strange Case of Charles Darwin and Alfred Russel Wallace (New York: Times Books, 1980), p. 199. For extracts of the writings of both Darwin and Wallace concerning Malthus’ impact on their thinking, see Flew, “Introduction,” op. cit., pp. 49–51.

29. See Flew’s extracts from Marx and Engels, “Introduction,” op. cit., pp. 51–52.

teenth century was firmly grounded on the so-called “iron law of wages,” a corollary to the law of diminishing returns—the belief that the most productive land would be put into production first, and that the demand for food created by an increasing population would be satisfied only at greater and greater cost, as less and less productive land was brought into production.³⁰ This was Ricardo’s intellectual legacy, built on Malthus’ earlier population theory.

Really scientific studies of population came only in the late nineteenth century.³¹ The topic was almost never mentioned in English-language history textbooks until after World War II, if then, and really not until the mid-1950s.³² The scientific study of historical population trends is equally recent. The French have been the pioneers here, yet the discipline of historical demography began no earlier than the early 1950s.³³

Ever since the period after 1960, the neo-Malthusians have dominated the popular press and media. This, too, shall pass. Public opinion concerning the appropriate population growth rate, like the growth rate itself, changes often, and it changes fast. So do opinions concerning optimum family size. Ideas have consequences, however, and the zero population growth rhetoric has had and continues to have serious consequences for the economy of the industrial West and its future. A radically anti-biblical ideology has been adopted by millions of citizens and, from what the evidence indicates, also by a significant percentage of Christian intellectuals and leaders. There is no prominent organization in the United States specifically devoted to persuading people that it is generally beneficial to increase the rate of population growth and the birth rate. In contrast, there are dozens of well-funded organizations that are anti-natalists. There may come a day when the anti-growth promoters will become even more consistent and call for euthanasia—the execution of the “unfit.” Some indications of this exist now, such as the words of pro-abortionist biologist Garrett Hardin:

Pascal wrote: “There is nothing more real than death, nor more terrible.”

To me, there is nothing more false than this statement of Pascal’s.

30. E. P. Hutchinson, The Population Debate: The Development of Conflicting Theories up to 1800 (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1967), esp. p. 395.

31. David Landes, “The Treatment of Population in History Textbooks,” Daedalus (Spring 1968), p. 364. This issue was titled, Historical Population Studies.

32. Ibid., pp. 372–78.

33. Louis Henry, “Historical Demography,” ibid., pp. 390–91.

Who's right, him or me? Undoubtedly, that's a bad question. We are different. There is probably no possibility of bringing two such minds into agreement.

The political problem is one of coexistence. Let those who fear death reject abortion and all forms of euthanasia—for themselves and possibly for the loved ones they control.

Let those who do not fear death act otherwise in their own lives.

With an embryo, it's all promise and no memories.

With the senile, it's all memories and no promise.

Someday, we should be able to find a course of action with respect to the senile that will be acceptable to all non-Pascalians. For the present, I think we are clear only on abortion.³⁴

So far, pro-euthanasia organizations in the United States are not yet openly funded by taxes, the way that the zero population growth "family planning" organizations are. This could easily change.³⁵

D. The Legalization of Abortion³⁶

"Population explosion" was a pejorative phrase in the late twentieth century. Another variant was "people pollution." There will come a day when American historians and social commentators will look back in disbelief and disgust at the billions of tax dollars that were granted to public and private propaganda agencies after 1965 to "spread the word" about the supposed evils that "inevitably" result from the growth of population.³⁷ In industrial nations that are facing literal ex-

34. Garrett Hardin, Mandatory Motherhood: The True Meaning of "Right to Life" (Boston: Beacon Press, 1974), pp. 84–85.

35. In the first edition of this book (1985), I included a detailed critique of Ronald J. Sider's views on government-to-government foreign aid and also his arguments for the wastefulness of eating meat. I called the section "Vegetarian Redemption," (pp. 336–43). (<http://bit.ly/MosesPharaoh>). Sider is no longer a major figure in evangelical circles. He abandoned many of his pro-socialist views in 1997. I have decided to omit the section.

36. For a survey of the history of abortion, from 2050 B.C. (conventional dating), see Part 2 of the essay by Eugene Quay, "Justifiable Abortion—Medical and Legal Foundations," Georgetown Law Review, XLIX (Spring 1961).

37. From 1965 through 1976, governments had spent the equivalent of a billion and a quarter dollars to promote worldwide programs of population reduction. Well over $850 million of this came from the taxpayers of the United States. An additional quarter of a billion had been spent by the Ford Foundation and the Rockefeller Found-tion in the long run because the birth rate of their citizens is below the replacement rate of at least 2.1 children per woman, intellectuals are advocating abortion, mass education programs favoring contraception, and similar restraints on births. As of 1975, nations that no longer had fertility rates above the replacement rate included West Germany, Denmark, Austria, Belgium, France, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Great Britain, and the United States.³⁸ These nations also erected immigration barriers against newcomers who might at least be able to increase the size of the national populations sufficiently to maintain them in the long run.

In 1973, about a decade after the "population dilemma" propaganda began,³⁹ the Supreme Court of the United States overturned all state laws that outlawed "abortion on demand" in the Roe v. Wade decision. Within a few years, between a million and a million and a half now-legal abortions were being performed in the United States each year. Pro-abortionists offer a counter-argument: there were as many as a million illegal abortions in 1960.⁴⁰ Another estimate of the combined legal and illegal abortions in the U. S. in 1972, a year before Roe v. Wade, is 1.25 million.⁴¹ A less radical estimate is 587,000 abortions in 1972.⁴² The number, obviously, was high. But the number of abortions increased after Roe v. Wade. The Roe v. Wade decision, however, led not only to a vast number of abortions but also to a mobilization of Christians and conservatives in opposition.⁴³ By 1976, the number of ation for this same goal. See Simon, Ultimate Resource, p. 292.

38. "People Shortage," Wall Street Journal (Aug. 23, 1979), chart: "West European Fertility Rates." The peak in the fertility rate in the U.S. was 3.7, in 1957. By 1975, it had fallen to 1.8. See Population Estimates and Projections: Estimates of the Population of the United States and Components of Change: 1930-1975, Series P-25, No. 632 (July 1976), p. 2; published by the U.S. Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census.

39. Philip M. Hauser, The Population Dilemma (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1963), copyright by the American Assembly, for whom it was compiled. Trustees of the Assembly included former President Dwight Eisenhower, former Federal Reserve Board Chairman (under President Roosevelt) Mariner S. Eccles, W. Averill Harriman, and Henry M. Wriston (later president of the second-largest bank holding company in the U.S., Citicorp).

40. Garrett Hardin, Mandatory Motherhood, p. 11.

41. Helen Dudar, "Abortion for the Asking," Saturday Review (April 1973), p. 34. The "teaser" copy which introduces the article reads: "It's still not the same as having a tooth pulled, yet few tears are shed."

42. "Another Storm Brewing Over Abortion," U. S. News and World Report (July 24, 1978).

43. Cf. Franky Schaeffer, A Time for Anger: The Myth of Neutrality (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway Books, 1982), ch. 6. The success of Francis Schaeffer's A Christian legal abortions performed by physicians in the United States exceeded the number of tonsillectomies as the most frequently performed surgical procedure.⁴⁴ The number of abortions performed annually finally peaked (possibly only briefly) in 1982.

The speed of the transformation of people's thinking was remarkable. In the early 1960s, the American public favored the right of a woman to elect to have an abortion if the unborn baby was known to be "defective." Still, only 10% approved of abortion on demand simply on request of the woman.⁴⁵ By 1972, a Gallup Poll showed that 65% of Protestants and 56% of Roman Catholics answered "yes" to this question: "Do you agree that the decision to have an abortion should be made solely by a woman and her physician?"⁴⁶

A grim reminder of the judgment which may be in store for today's aborting societies is the fact that Germany was the first modern Western nation to maintain a policy of mass abortions. This campaign to legalize abortion began prior to the coming to power of the Nazis, but it was under the Nazis that a full-scale policy of legalized abortion began. The parallels between Nazi Germany's disrespect for life and the West's disregard for the unborn are chronicled by William Brennan in two books, neither of which is pleasant to read.⁴⁷

1. Abortion in the Soviet Union

It is also interesting that in 1965—precisely the same time that the "population explosion" propaganda began in the West—a debate began on this topic within the Soviet Union. The official Soviet Marx-

Manifesto (Crossway, 1980) and the moderate success of Franky Schaeffer's anti-abortion movie and his father's book, co-authored by Dr. C. Everett Koop, both bearing the title, What Ever Happened to the Human Race? (Old Tappan, New Jersey: Revell, 1976), led to the appointment in 1981 of Dr. Koop as Surgeon General of the United States. This symbolic appointment demonstrated that the Christians had attained at least some degree of influence in national politics by means of this topic. It was the only major appointment during President Reagan's first term that the Christians received. An anti-abortion book bearing President Reagan's name, Abortion and the Conscience of the Nation, was released in early 1984, a Presidential election year, by Thomas Nelson Sons, a Christian publisher.

44. Sullivan, Tietze, and Dryfoos, "Legal Abortion in the United States, 1975–76," Family Planning (May/June 1977), p. 116; cited by William Brennan, Medical Holocausts (New York: Nordland, 1980), I, p. 322.

45. Hardin, Mandatory Motherhood, p. 71.

46. Ibid., p. 7.

47. Brennan, Medical Holocausts, op. cit., and The Abortion Holocaust: Today's Final Solution (St. Louis, Missouri: Landmark Press, 1983).

ist line had been that there could never be overpopulation in a Marxist nation. It was the West that worried about overpopulation because of the inability of capitalism to produce sufficient food and consumer goods. Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev had stated the "hard line" in a 1955 speech: "The more people we have, the stronger our country will be. Bourgeois ideologists have invented many cannibalistic theories, including the theory of overpopulation. They think about how to reduce the birth rate and the growth of population. Matters are different among us, comrades. If we were to add 100,000,000 to our 200,000,000, it would be too few."⁴⁸

Nevertheless, in that same year, a decree legalized both contraceptives and abortions. The official excuse was the large number of illegal abortions⁴⁹—a favorite excuse in Western nations, too. The "hard line" prevailed, however, until Khrushchev's removal in 1964. In 1964, there was not a single demographic research institute in the USSR; two had been shut down. As late as 1970, whatever population research that was being conducted was done in separate departments of other kinds of institutions.⁵⁰ In short, the Soviet line, following Marx's lead,⁵¹ was anti-Malthus. They did not worry about overpopulation.

In the 1920s and the early 1930s, the Party line had favored free love and was distinctly anti-family. This was a fulfillment of Engels' observation: "It is a curious fact that in every large revolutionary movement the question of 'free love' comes to the foreground."⁵² The predominant view was that sexual life was supposed to be outside the regulation of the Party⁵³—the only major activity that was still regarded as 48. Speech to settlers departing to the "virgin lands," as translated in Current Digest of the Soviet Press, VII (Feb. 16, 1955), p. 12; cited in Philip R. Pryde, Conservation in the Soviet Union (Cambridge: At the University Press, 1972), p. 167.

49. Norton T. Dodge, Women in the Soviet Economy: Their Role in Economic, Scientific, and Technical Development (Baltimore, Maryland: Johns Hopkins Press, 1966), p. 24.

50. Ibid., p. 167.

51. Marx and Engels on the Population Bomb, ed. Ronald L. Meek (Berkeley, California: Ramparts Press, 1971). It is interesting that the original title of the 1953 edition was the more prosaic Marx and Engels on Malthus (New York: International Publishers). International Publishers was an exclusively Marxist publishing house, while Ramparts was a "new left" magazine and publishing house, which went out of existence in the 1970s. But the phrase "population bomb," made famous by Stanford biologist Paul Ehrlich, was too good for a profit-seeking radical publishing house to pass up.

52. Cited by Igor Shafarevich, The Socialist Phenomenon (New York: Harper & Row, [1975] 1980), p. 33.

53. H. Kent Geiger, The Family in Soviet Russia (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1968), p. 61.

legitimately autonomous from political control. Easy divorce and free abortions were the rule after 1926.⁵⁴ There were widespread abortions in the early 1930s.⁵⁵ This policy was reversed by law in 1936. At the same time, public money began to be offered for births.⁵⁶ The mid-1930s therefore saw a dramatic reversal in Soviet law toward the family, including a 1934 law against homosexuality.⁵⁷ The anti-abortion law remained on the books until 1955.

Between 1955 and 1965, the total number of legal and illegal abortions increased by a factor of four, according to published Soviet estimates.⁵⁸ A debate over the theory of overpopulation began in the USSR in 1965 and 1966, which indicated a weakening of the older "hard line" position.⁵⁹ A national network of abortion clinics was in operation by the mid-1970s which offered cheap abortions at a price of around $7 each.⁶⁰ Some 8 million abortions were being performed annually by this time.⁶¹ Abortion became the major form of Soviet population control, three to one over contraception.⁶²

The rulers of the Soviet Union in 1965 faced the demographic and political problem of a stagnant "white Russian" (European) population that confronted a growing Muslim and Central Asian Soviet population.

Soviet demographers expected the 1970 census to produce a figure of over 250 million, with a projection of 350 million by the end of the century. In fact the 1970 total fell 10 million short and the 1979 figure produced only 262,436,000, meaning a population of not much over 300 million in 2000 A.D. What the 1970 census revealed for the first time was a dual birth-rate: low in Slavic and Baltic Russia, high in the eastern USSR, Central Asia and the Caucasus. In the 1960s alone the Muslim population leapt from 24 to 35 million, adding another 14 million in the 1970s, giving a total of about 50 million by the beginning of the 1980s. By this point it was clear that at the turn of the century Central Asia and Caucasia would contribute about 100

54. Idem.

55. Dodge, Women in the Soviet Economy, p. 9.

56. Ibid., p. 23.

57. Geiger, Family, p. 94.

58. Gail Warshofsky Lapidus, Women in Soviet Society: Equality, Development, and Social Change (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978), p. 299, note 25.

59. Pryde, pp. 167–68.

60. "Sexual Revolution in Soviet [sic] Straining Strict Morality," New York Times (Sept. 25, 1977).

61. Lapidus, p. 299.

62. Idem., note 25.

million, that is a third, of the total. Even by 1979, the 137 million Great Russians, a markedly ageing population compared to the non-Slavs, felt demographically on the defensive.⁶³

God will not be mocked!

2. Abortion Worldwide

The extent of abortion worldwide is, from a biblical standpoint, horrendously large. A United States government publication cited estimates that, by the late 1970s, about 55 million abortions, legal and illegal, were taking place annually, with half of these in the less developed nations. The United States was at the low end of the scale. "In the United States, the 1978 abortion rate as reported by the Center for Disease Control was 23 per 1,000 women of reproductive age. New estimates of induced abortion in China place that country's rate at 25 in 1978. Eastern bloc countries have very high rates. In the U.S.S.R. Union, there are 180 abortions per 1,000 women of reproductive age in 1970, the latest year for which data are available. There were 88 abortions per 1,000 women of reproductive age in Romania and 68 per 1,000 for the same group in Bulgaria (1979). The latest data from Japan (1975) show an equivalent rate of 84 per 1,000."⁶⁴

Japan, which legalized abortions early, in 1947, had some 12,000 licensed abortionists in 1980. Almost 600,000 abortions were performed annually, as of the early 1980s. One out of every three Japanese women in the 25 to 40 age group has had an abortion, reported one Japanese feminist organization. Temples are selling statues and rituals to families seeking atonement for the guilt produced by the abortions, and the popularity of these rituals is rising.⁶⁵

Beginning in the early 1970s, China's government began putting tremendous pressure on women to have abortions. Infant girls were killed at birth by parents who wanted sons, a fact confirmed by Premier Zhao Ziyang in his remarks critical of the practice in late 1982. But what else would he expect? The new Chinese population law restricts families to one child, and rural Chinese want a son if that is the only child they will be allowed to bring up. Childless couples are required to obtain a "birth quota" in advance. Very heavy fines are levied on violat-

63. Paul Johnson, Modern Times, pp. 711-12.

64. World Population and Fertility Planning Technologies: The Next 20 Years (Washington, D.C.: Office of Technology Assessment, 1982), p. 63.

65. Urban Lehner, "Japanese Ceremonies Show Private Doubts Over Use of Abortion," Wall Street Journal (Jan. 6, 1983).

ors.⁶⁶ The state, a monopoly employer, can enforce its will on recalcitrants, and does.⁶⁷ Newborn third children were being killed in some hospitals, reports indicated in the early 1980s.⁶⁸ (As I wrote in 1985, “the social effects a generation later will threaten the very fabric of Chinese culture: there will be a scarcity of young women eligible for marriage.”)

Romania, virtually alone among nations, saw the light in the late 1970s and outlawed abortions. This policy was reaffirmed in 1984. Romanian leaders feared the effects of a declining population. They showed greater wisdom than Western intellectuals.

The old argument that illegal abortions are risky to mothers is overblown. In the 1958–62 period, fewer than 375 women in the U.S. died each year as a result of both illegal and spontaneous (non-induced) abortions. By 1972, it was under 100.⁶⁹ Some pro-abortionists knew this all along. Mary S. Calderone wrote in 1960 that in 1957 “there were only 260 deaths in the whole country attributed to abortions of any kind.”⁷⁰ But the lure of the “backstreet butchers” argument has always proven strong. It was used repeatedly in Germany during the Weimar years, and it bore its evil fruit under the Nazis.⁷¹ Besides, why shouldn’t murderers be subject to a little risk? The fact is this: in over 99% of all abortions, half the people involved die. The unborn half.

E. “Christian” Abortion

Given the inroads of humanistic thought into the Christian intellectual community, it should not be startling to learn that late twentieth-century Christian intellectuals and physicians were proposing a program of reduced birth rates—yes, even including abortion, though 66. Steven W. Mosher, “Why Are Baby Girls Being Killed in China?” ibid. (July 25, 1983).

67. Steven W. Mosher, Broken Earth: The Rural Chinese (New York: The Free Press, 1983), ch. 9. Mosher was dismissed from the Ph.D. program in anthropology at Stanford University not long after the Chinese government protested Mosher’s reporting of the fact that in some rural districts in the late 1970s, Chinese were administering forced abortions. See the editorial in the Wall Street Journal (July 25, 1983).

68. Michael Vink, “Abortion and Birth Control in Canton, China,” Wall Street Journal (Nov. 30, 1981).

69. World Population and Fertility Planning Technologies, p. 64, Figure 7.

70. Mary S. Calderone, “Illegal Abortion as a Public Health Problem,” American Journal of Public Health, 50 (July 1960); cited in Brennan, Abortion Holocaust, p. 13.

71. Brennan, ibid., pp. 10–11.

not infanticide.⁷² Psychiatrist M. O. Vincent offered this assessment: "... the foetus has great and developing value, but it is less than a human being. It will be sacrificed only for weighty reasons."⁷³ As a psychiatrist—a man of science, you understand—he got to "weigh" these reasons: "I find it hard to know how to 'weigh' these reasons, but weigh them I must."⁷⁴ Ah, the responsibilities of becoming a "weigher" on a set of cosmic scales of value that God forbids men to use.⁷⁵ "To abort or not to abort, that is the question": for men in rebellion against God.

It is the responsibility of Christians to study the effects of population growth, we are informed by a professor of sociology who taught in a state university.⁷⁶ You see, population growth creates "complications for the collectivity."⁷⁷ (Isn't scientific language wonderful?) For example, juvenile delinquency is apparently one result of unwanted children.⁷⁸ Furthermore, the government now provides welfare services (an ungodly coercive redistribution of wealth, which our sociologist fails to mention), so that today "billions of tax dollars are spent in an attempt to cope with the results of over-population. . . ."⁷⁹ (If you detect a bit of racism and middle-class resentment here, you are probably not alone.) He referred to only one remaining hold-out in the ideological war against over-population: the Black Power movement of the late 1960s. The Black Power advocates believed that this zero population growth philosophy is, in the sociologist's words, "the imposition of white middle-class standards on the black community, the white desire to limit the number of 'us beautiful blacks,' and the desire of whites to use birth control as an easy way to solve the basic prob-

72. See, for example, several of the essays in the abominable book, Birth Control and the Christian, eds. Walter O. Spitzer and Carlyle L. Saylor (Wheaton, Illinois: Tyndale House, 1969). This was a symposium held by the Christian Medical Society and Christianity Today. On Christianity Today's co-sponsorship, see Graham A. D. Scott, "Abortion and the Incarnation," Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society, XVII (Winter 1974), p. 30.

73. "Psychiatric Indications for Therapeutic Abortion and Sterilization," in Birth Control and the Christian, p. 213.

74. Idem.

75. This is not a "battlefield" decision on whether to allow a man to die; this is a decision to intervene actively and stop a living person's normal developmental process.

76. Donald H. Bouma, "The Population Explosion: World and Local Imperatives," ibid., pp. 329–39.

77. Ibid., p. 330.

78. Ibid., p. 337.

79. Ibid., p. 335.

lems of society.”⁸⁰ I can only comment: the blacks he described here possessed more common sense (and better tools of sociological analysis) than a lot of professors of sociology who teach in state universities.

1. Evangelical Ethics, 1984

In the appropriate year of 1984, reminiscent of George Orwell’s book title, came the equally appropriately titled book, Brave New People, by a New Zealand professor of anatomy and medical ethicist, D. Gareth Jones, Ph.D. He claimed he was a Christian. His book was published by Inter-Varsity Press, which also claimed to be Christian. The book was a very clever defense of the ethical legitimacy of “therapeutic” abortion.

After spending six chapters discussing the admittedly difficult ethical issues relating to genetic manipulation, the author then introduced his chapter on the not-at-all-difficult moral issue of abortion, the execution of the legally innocent. I call this the “confuse, then corrupt” technique. It has been used successfully by theologically liberal “higher critics” of the Bible for a century and a half. He warned that “there are no slick answers,”⁸¹ which is the typical approach of the morally confused (or morally perverse) but self-proclaimed “honest Christian” who is about to abandon the clear teachings of the Bible.

What does the Bible say about abortion?

If men strive, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart from her, and yet no mischief follow: he shall be surely punished, according as the woman’s husband will lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine. And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life, Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, Burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe (Ex. 21:22–25).⁸²

If it is a capital crime to cause an abortion accidentally, then it is a capital crime to abort a child deliberately.⁸³

Jones wanted Christian parents to make “a responsible decision.”⁸⁴

80. Ibid., p. 339.

81. D. Gareth Jones, Brave New People: Ethical Issues at the Commencement of Life (Downers Grove, Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press, 1984), p. 7.

82. Chapter 38.

83. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 253.

84. Jones, Brave New People.

This decision is, of course, “weighty.”⁸⁵ (We are back to those cosmic scales that pro-abortionists insist we must use in making immoral decisions.) Naturally, “The issues are much more complex than is generally imagined.”⁸⁶ (Be prepared: when Ph.D.-holding Christian “ethicists” start warning you about “complex moral questions,” you are about to be told that you can safely violate the Bible’s clear teachings.) He asked that all-too-familiar question: “When does the fetus become a person?”⁸⁷ When you call an unborn infant a “fetus,” you have already prejudiced the case. You have begun to answer the question. The answer, predictably, was that honest people just cannot agree on the answer to this question, so let us use the alternatives to the Bible that “logic” provides.

2. No Absolutes

He cited the Roman Catholic Church’s absolute prohibition against abortion. “The major attraction of the Roman Catholic position for Christians is its high view of human life. It has the strengths of all absolute positions and it places the unborn directly in God’s will. In practice, however, issues are often not so simple, and while we may wish to believe that abortion is always morally wrong, dilemmas abound.”⁸⁸ In short, moral decisions are sometimes costly, and certain “ethicists” recommend not paying the price.

In a remarkable abandonment of both logic and morality, he then accused the Roman Catholic position of irresponsibility. He summarized the implications of the position: “A fetus, once conceived, has the right to develop; this is an expression of natural forces and is a duty allotted to the mother by nature. Taken to its logical conclusion, this leaves no room for human responsibility. Instead, the erratic and impersonal forces of the natural environment are allowed sway. I do not consider this accords with the biblical emphasis on the responsibility God has bestowed upon mankind to control our environment.”⁸⁹

Raising the issue of natural law theory at this point in his argument was a verbal smoke screen, a cheap debate trick. By misdirecting the attention of his readers to a false issue, “impersonal natural law,” he would have them overlook the obvious issue, namely, the prohibition

85. Idem.

86. Ibid., p. 168.

87. Ibid., p. 162.

88. Ibid., p. 167.

89. Idem.

against murder in biblical law. Jones spent page after page in Chapter 1 to demonstrate that the Bible teaches that all created reality is intensely personal, because God, the Creator, is personal. He denied any impersonality in the universe. “The world God has made is intrinsically personal.”⁹⁰ Then he used a weakness in Roman Catholic epistemology—natural law theory, which is ultimately impersonal—to undermine a great strength in Roman Catholic ethics: the defense of human life.

He argued, incredibly, that by teaching people never to abort the unborn, the Roman Catholic Church has removed the question of abortion from the realm of ethics. On the contrary, the Church has re-affirmed the ethical decision. It is not a question of “to abort or not to abort under which complex, difficult, dilemma-filled situations?” It is a question of “to abort or not to abort, under any situation?” The Church has quite properly called abominable the position defended by D. Gareth Jones, Ph.D., and he felt the heat.

He said that “Abortion for therapeutic reasons demands a serious response by those professing to follow Christ.”⁹¹ Indeed, it does. The serious response is: “Don’t.” The serious reason is: “God says not to.”

3. The “Potential for Personhood”

He said that “each fetus is a human life, representing a potential for personhood from very early in its development. From this early stage it is a potential person, and from about eight weeks onwards has a recognizable individuality as manifested by its circulation and brain activity. It is well on the road to full personhood, and for most practical purposes may be considered to be a person. Nevertheless, I do not wish to draw a line between when a fetus is not a person and when a fetus is a person. Throughout the whole of its development the fetus is potentially an actual person, and deserves the respect and treatment due to a being with this sort of potential.”⁹² This is medical ethics? This is a call to responsible decision-making?

If Mary, a virgin who found herself pregnant, had decided to “take the easy way out” and had aborted her “fetus” in, say, the third month of her pregnancy, would she have eliminated a true Person? Or just a potential Person? D. Gareth Jones offered no principle that would give us a clear indication. Instead, he offered language that would have confused her, had she not understood the ethics of the Bible.

90. Ibid., p. 20.

91. Ibid., p. 183.

92. Ibid., p. 174.

He went on, and it got worse. "A fetus is part of a more extensive continuum, the end-result of which is the emergence of an individual human being manifesting, under normal circumstances, the myriad facets that go to make up full personhood. The processes of this continuum, however, do not begin at conception; neither do they end at birth."⁹³ The continuum: here was a key idea in the biological speculations of D. Gareth Jones. First, "A new-born baby is a very incomplete human person. . . ."⁹⁴ Second, "A corollary of the continuum potentiality argument is that there is no developmental point at which a line can be drawn between expendable and non-expendable fetuses, that is, between non-personal and personal fetuses. It may be preferable to carry out abortions early rather than later during gestation, but that is a biomedical and not an ethical decision."⁹⁵ Not an ethical decision? Strictly a biomedical decision? You mean a strictly technological decision? This is precisely what he meant. The official justification of this monstrous book was that it brings Christian ethics to bear on biomedical technology, but the end result is the imposition of the satanic ethics of abortion on the consciences of Christians in the name of autonomous biomedical technology.

But what about the unstated third but obvious point? What about a definitional "continuum" for personhood that does not "end at birth," to quote Dr. Jones? In short, what about euthanasia, "mercy killing"? Is this, too, strictly a biomedical decision? Dr. Jones was not about to say . . . not in 1984. We know what his answer has to be, if he remains consistent to his stated presuppositions in this book. It is no doubt a "difficult" answer, based as it is on "complex" issues. But whenever he gives his answer, pray that no civil government accepts it, and also pray that you are not 85 years old and no longer fully competent mentally or economically.

The arguments he offered in support of a family's decision to abort a child can be used equally well by a family looking for excuses to murder a senile adult. The person is unable to learn. He is unable to take care of himself. He may create terrible psychological burdens for other family members. In short, caring for him is costly, and there is no economic payoff at the end of the road. Such a person is the economic and psychological equivalent of a highly retarded child. He is, in terms of Dr. Jones' analysis, an expendable elderly fetus. Kill him. But don't do it thoughtlessly, of course. Do it in responsible Christian love. Also, it should be done only after considerable reflection and the "weighing" of costs and benefits. And don't put your finger on either side of the cosmic scales. That would be cheating. You know what God says about false weights and balances. We need to honor God's ethical principles, after all, however vague they may be. So say the abortion-ists.

93. Idem.

94. Ibid., p. 175.

95. Ibid. pp. 175–76.

4. The Quality of Life

He included a section, "Possible grounds for therapeutic abortion." Biomedically possible, yes. Morally possible, no. But this is not what he concludes. What about the mental health of the mother? Maybe. He was not quite sure. This is "a difficult realm."⁹⁶ "These are not easy issues, and I do not believe there are easy answers to them."⁹⁷ "Fetal preservation is generally the course of choice in Christian terms. . . ."⁹⁸ Generally. Meaning, in short, not always. Maybe in 95% of the cases.⁹⁹ Or 93%. Or 82%. He was just not certain.

Then what are the grounds of decision-making? By what measure do we "weigh" the issue of abortion? Not the Bible. Not God's inscripturated word. No, the key issue is that slickest of slick slogans of the late 1960s: the quality of life. He told us this at the beginning of the book. "Biology is power over the living world, and biomedicine is power over human nature. There are numerous consequences of this, and they are already the subject of daily decision-making. These decisions revolve around one crucial issue, namely, the quality of life we demand for the populations of technologically-advanced societies and for individuals within those societies. All other issues, whether at the commencement of life or at the end of life, revolve around this critical

96. Ibid., p. 177.

97. Ibid., p. 178.

98. Idem.

99. This is what one-time conservative neo-evangelical scholar Carl Henry said of Jones: "This is essentially an anti-abortion book. Ninety-five percent of all abortion would be considered immoral by D. Gareth Jones." Christianity Today (Sept. 21, 1984), p. 63. But Jones did not suggest any such concrete figure, nor does his vague ethical system allow such specificity. Henry actually had endorsed this book prior to publication. Known as a Christian conservative, Henry's continual hostility to the legitimacy of biblical law in New Testament times finally led him into the pit of confusion and compromise with evil.

fulcrum.”¹⁰⁰ Therefore, “In making the decision, a balance needs to be attained between the pursuit of biological quality and the potential that a deformed child within a family holds out for that family to be humanized and to grow as a loving, human unit.”¹⁰¹ In short, more loving through chemical abortion. Or to reverse a 1960s advertising slogan of the DuPont Chemical Company, “Better Dying Through Chemistry.” As Jones concluded: “Unfortunately some families cannot cope with such a challenge, and a compromise must be reluctantly adopted, namely, termination of the pregnancy.”¹⁰²

Such is the quality of life when it is not defined by the Bible in terms of the ethics of the Bible. Such is the aesthetics of the self-professed autonomous man.

5. Humanism's Ethics of Sentimentality

The compromise must be adopted, the ethicist tells us, just so long as the decision is made reluctantly. This is the ethics of sentimentality, as Schlossberg called it. “If good and evil are purely a matter of sentiment, then no action can be judged, since sentiments remain opaque to outside certification. Only the motives counts, not the action. In this way sentiment, not reason or law, is determinative of right and wrong.”¹⁰³ Schlossberg identified the source of the ethics of sentiment in our day: humanism. “Humanism thrives on sentimentality because few religions are more dishonest in their doctrinal expressions. Unable to withstand dispassionate analysis, which would reveal its lack of foundation, it stresses feeling rather than thought. That is what makes sentimentality so vicious.”¹⁰⁴

The incomparable hypocrisy of D. Gareth Jones, Ph.D, is found in the closing paragraph of this chapter: “Decisions relating to the handicapped should always be difficult and will prove too onerous for some to bear. This is the knife-edge along which we walk. But as we do we should be encouraged by the prophecy of Isaiah that, ultimately, ‘then will the eyes of the blind be opened and the ears of the deaf unstopped. Then will the lame leap like a deer, and the tongue of the dumb shout

100. Jones, p. 10.

101. Ibid., p. 179.

102. Idem.

103. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation With American Society (Wheaton, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), p. 44.

104. Ibid., p. 46.

for joy' (Isaiah 35:5–6)."¹⁰⁵ Not if their parents aborted them, they won't.

Jones said, "There is no slick solution."¹⁰⁶ Oh, but there is. The slickest of all is the saline solution. It is this solution which burns the unborn to death. But the heat of such solutions is nothing compared to the heat which awaits the biomedical practitioners of abortion and their morally corrupt apologists. Also, the publishers of their tracts.

We can understand Franky Schaeffer's outrage at Inter-Varsity Press. He went on Pat Robertson's 700 Club television show in the summer of 1984 and called attention to what should be obvious, namely, that it was the income from his father's books that created the economic base of Inter-Varsity Press in the late 1960s, and they were using that capital base to spew out books like Ron Sider's Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger and Brave New People.

At the time, I agreed entirely with his response to all the gibberish about complex moral issues. "The real issue is simple. What do we do now? It is a choice, not between competing slogans and word games, right or left, but between godlessness and godliness. Between inhumanity and humanity. Between life and death. Between Joseph Fletcher¹⁰⁷ and Jesus. Between the dignity of the individual (whether handicapped, unwanted, born or unborn) and death as a 'liberal' solution for social problems such as poverty, race, and medical costs. Between a sanctity of life ethic and the bestial gaggle of ethicists, judges, and doctors who cry for the blood of the innocent, all in the name of economics and 'compassion,' not to mention convenience. Between freedom and prosperity, or subservience, slavery, and the ever-expanding power of the welfare state."¹⁰⁸

Of course, no Christian ethicist or Christian physician publicly advocates infanticide. Not yet. Christian physicians will not promote infanticide until the humanist medical profession has accepted the practice for at least five years, and even then not unless the net income per execution is significantly higher than performing an abortion in, say, the third trimester of pregnancy. After all, these are men of conscience

105. Jones, p. 184.

106. Ibid., p. 169.

107. Joseph Fletcher, Situation Ethics: The New Morality (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1966).

108. Franky Schaeffer, Bad News for Modern Man: An Agenda for Christian Activism (Westchester, Illinois: Crossway Books, 1984), p. 84. Schaeffer subsequently rejected his work as a Christian conservative activist. Frank Schaeffer, Crazy for God: How I Grew Up as One of the Elect, Helped Found the Religious Right, and Lived to Take All (or Almost All) of It Back (Cambridge, Massachusetts: DaCapo Press, 2007).

—not as ethical as the Pharaoh of the enslavement, who at least would not have deliberately executed Egyptian infants as he did the Hebrew infants, but good enough in their own eyes.¹⁰⁹

It is gratifying that the Board of Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship overturned the decision of the editor of Inter-Varsity Press to publish the book. They pulled this book off the market in September of 1984. They did so reluctantly, under tremendous pressure and the threat of loss of financial support. Their public relations man said, "We did not publish, nor did Dr. Jones write, the book with the intention of supporting abortion in any way. However, the book is being perceived by the Christian public that way."¹¹⁰ Nonsense; the board capitulated to pressures that came because Dr. Jones' book demonstrates every sign of being precisely what it was perceived to be: a tract written in defense of therapeutic abortion. The fact that a book such as Brave New People was published in the name of Jesus testifies to the theological degeneracy of influential segments of the so-called "neo-evangelical" movement in the final decades of the twentieth century. Only financial pressure from principled Christians and controversy in the media brought the change. As U.S. Senator Everett Dirksen put it, "When I feel the heat, I see the light." The destroyers much prefer darkness because their deeds are evil (John 3:19). (Sadly, Eerdmans republished it in 1985.)

F. Unholy Crusades

1. Medieval Crusades

A standard cliché used against the idea of Christian civilization is this: "What would you do, inaugurate another series of holy crusades?" This sort of comment implicitly assumes that religious warfare is uniquely the product of Christianity, and it also assumes that the crusades characterized Christian medieval civilization. Both assumptions

109. I have included this somewhat lengthy discussion of Christian abortion as part of a consideration of the exodus, because theology must be applied to historical situations, and commentators dare not ignore the theological issues of their eras. Those reading this chapter in a hundred years or a thousand years will not, I trust, be facing anything so preposterous and morally corrupt as Christian abortionism. But in the late twentieth century, it was a problem—one which points to either a coming revival or a coming judgment, or both. God will spew these people out of His mouth, just as He did with the church at Laodicea (Rev. 3:16). He will throw out the baby-killers with the bathwater of humanism.

110. Christianity Today (Sept. 21, 1984), p. 63.

are false.

First, the term “crusade” was never used in the era in which the four major ones took place, 1096–1204. It is a modern term. “People at that time spoke of the road to Jerusalem, the voyage, the journey, the pilgrimage.”¹¹¹ Second, a crusade was perceived as a defensive war against an expansionist Islamic empire.¹¹² Third, the wars were supposed to be battles between professional armies. Except for the outrageous sack of Constantinople, in the fourth crusade of 1204,¹¹³ common people were not deliberately chosen as victims. The feudal judicial order in Europe was essentially military, and a code of military honor governed warfare. It was considered dishonorable for a soldier to battle against peasants or commoners—a violation of the separation of status groups. Finally, the armies were tiny, and so were the ships that carried them. Green’s summary brings things into perspective:

It would be impossible to talk of a nation in arms in the Middle Ages. Most wars were fought by small armies, costly for those who equipped them, but lacking in the total effort which typifies modern warfare. Kings who started wars had no wish to exterminate or unduly spoil their adversary; they wanted to bring the issue to a successful negotiated conclusion. Wars were rarely national in any modern sense of the word, but conflicts over rights and honour. . . . Moreover the numbers involved were small. The Viking raiders (each of whose ships can hardly have carried more than thirty-five warriors) can rarely have had more than 1,000 men at their disposal. When William of Normandy invaded England in 1066 he cannot have had many more than 5,000 men. . . . The Normans who conquered Sicily started their venture in 1061 with some 160 knights and never in any subsequent campaign appear to have had more than 700 at their disposal.¹¹⁴

2. The Twentieth Century

In sharp contrast to the crusades—four limited, brief medieval battles, three of which were battles between small professional armies, 111. Regine Pernoud, The Crusades (New York: Capricorn, 1964), p. 13.

112. Ibid., pp. 15–17.

113. The crusaders had only raised half of their expected troops, so they could pay only two-thirds of their transportation bills to the Venetians, who demanded payment. Finally, they sacked Constantinople to get the needed funds. R. W. Southern, The Making of the Middle Ages (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1953), p. 58.

114. V. H. H. Green, Medieval Civilization in Western Europe (New York: St. Martin's, 1971), p. 238.

Christian and Muslim—the twentieth century became the century of mass executions of civilian populations by the civil governments established by God to enforce His law (Rom. 13:1–7).¹¹⁵ Modern warfare has become total, sparing almost no one and few institutions. In World War II, more civilians were killed than combatants.¹¹⁶ The saturation bombing of civilians was standard operating policy by the Germans and the Allies, culminating in the senseless bombing of Dresden, a German city with no military targets, in the spring of 1945, where at least 25,000 civilians, and possibly 40,000, perished in huge fire storms that were created when 1,300 bombers dropped 3,900 tons of incendiary bombs on the defenseless city.¹¹⁷ “Air raids involving the indiscriminate killing of enormous numbers of civilians were the current step in the natural evolution of the art of war. The very concept of the civilian hardly remained valid. The traditional distinction between men setting forth to risk their lives and those who stayed behind out of range of death disappeared in the first half of the twentieth century.”¹¹⁸ Yet there is little evidence that such indiscriminate area bombing contributed significantly to the defeat of Germany.¹¹⁹

The military defense strategy adopted by the United States government during the Kennedy Administration, “mutual assured destruction” (MAD), involved the threat of massive nuclear retaliation as the only defensive posture—in effect, holding the Soviet Union’s civilians captive to our missiles (aimed at urban targets), and allowing the Soviet Union to hold our civilians captive by doing the same thing with their missiles. The Soviets wisely adopted the more traditional approach: targeting military targets, especially our missile silos, as the chosen objectives of a nuclear first strike.¹²⁰

115. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 17.

116. Carroll Quigley, Tragedy and Hope: A History of the World in Our Time (New York: Macmillan, 1966), p. 661.

117. “Bombing of Dresden,” Wikipedia. <http://bit.ly/DresdenBombing>

118. Peter Calvocoressi and Guy Wint, Total War: Causes and Courses of the Second World War (New York: Penguin, [1972] 1981), p. 489.

119. Ibid., p. 508.

120. One vociferous opponent of MAD was retired U.S. Army General Albion Knight, who was also an ordained Episcopalian minister. He wrote: “. . . we have supported the Soviet march to military superiority by the strategic doctrine called Mutual Assured Destruction (MAD) whereby, should the Soviet Union’s attack, we would respond by destroying a percentage of the Soviet population. The doctrine requires us to strike cities and avoid military strategic weapon systems, while intentionally leaving our own people unprotected from a Soviet bomber or missile attack. The success of the strategy depends on the Soviet Union taking the same approach so as to make us

Warfare was not the only source of civilian deaths in that grim century. Domestic wars against civilian populations were launched repeatedly by national governments established to defend their people from injustice. The Nazi concentration camps are well known, but they are only one example among many.

The numbers of man-caused deaths in the twentieth century were so huge as to defy calculation. Gil Elliot settled on a total of 110 million, through 1969. He admitted that it could be as “low” as 80 million, but as high as 150 million.¹²¹ China was the great unknown.

To set such a figure against the scale of violence in previous times involves the difficulties of comparing like periods and of allowing for population increase. However, every attempt to do so shows the twentieth century to be incomparably the more violent period.

It is possible—in my view, certain—that in a future perspective this explosion of human lives will be seen as the significant ‘history’ of our period. Yet the events which have accumulated to form this history—millions upon millions of individual violent deaths—are often recorded in the historical footnotes or in quickly read and rather meaningless statistics. Many written histories don’t even mention them, although dealing in detail with the events that led up to and followed them.¹²²

Let me cite an example from his book. It is so obscure that it does not even appear in the book’s index. He simply listed it in a chapter on minor conflicts. It is the Chaco War. Have you ever heard of it? Of course not. Neither had I. It was a war between Paraguay and Bolivia that took place between 1928 and 1935. The number of deaths in that war was 500,000.¹²³ That matched the death toll of the Greco-Turkish War of 1919–22, which was going on at the same time as the Russo-Polish war of 1919–21, which claimed 200,000 lives. The Mexican revolution of 1910–20—the first successful socialist revolution in modern times—took 2 million lives.¹²⁴ These were all minor wars in the twentieth century, seldom mentioned in textbooks. On page 155 of his mutually vulnerable. Thus, according to MAD, few weapons, especially defense weapons, are needed.” Predictably, he pointed out, the Soviets rejected the whole concept. The Defense of America: From Assured Destruction to Assured Survival (Houston, Texas: Texas Policy Institute, 1983), pp. 5–6.

121. Gil Elliot, Twentieth Century Book of the Dead (New York: Scribner’s, 1972), p. 1.

122. Idem.

123. Ibid., p. 99.

124. Ibid., p. 98.

book appears the most horrifying statistical chart I have ever seen: “The Death Process”:

| | Individual Identity | | | | | | |
|-----------------------------|---------------------|---------------------------------------|-------------------------------|-------|----|----|----|
| | MEN | MEN WITH SOME WOMEN, say 10% | MEN, WOMEN AND CHILDREN | TOTAL | | | |
| | Millions of Deaths | | | | | | |
| CAMP PRIVATION | 20 | | | | | | |
| Enclosed ghetto | 4.5 | | 1 | 1 | | | |
| Prisoner-of-war camp | | | | 4.5 | | | |
| Concentration Camp | | 2 | 0.5 | 2.5 | | | |
| Labour Camp | | 12 | | 12 | | | |
| CITY PRIVATION | 16 | | | | | | |
| Unenclosed ghetto | | | 1 | 1 | | | |
| Siege | | | 1 | 1 | | | |
| Occupation | | | 6 | 6 | | | |
| City dislocation | | | 8 | 8 | | | |
| DIFFUSE PRIVATION | 26.5 | | | | | | |
| Transit | 1 | | 1.5 | 1.5 | | | |
| Combat | | | | 1 | | | |
| Economic blockade | | | 2 | 2 | | | |
| Man-made famine | | | 5 | 5 | | | |
| Scorched earth | | | 2 | 2 | | | |
| War dislocation | | | 12 | 12 | | | |
| HARDWARE | 47.5 | | | | | | |
| Big guns | 18 | | | 18 | | | |
| Small arms—formal execution | 4 | | | 4 | | | |
| Small arms—massacre | 1 | | | 4 | 6 | | |
| Small arms—combat | 14 | | | | 14 | | |
| Mixed—demographic | | | | 3 | 3 | | |
| Aerial bombs | | | | 1 | 1 | | |
| CHEMICALS—GAS | | | 1.5 | 1.5 | | | |
| TOTALS: | 42 | 16 | 19 | 77 | | | |
| Men | | | | | | | |
| Women | | | | | 2 | 21 | 23 |
| Children | | | | | | 10 | 10 |
| | 42 | 18 | 50 | 110 | | | |

It was only with the political triumph of modern humanism that systematic mass murder began in earnest in human history. When God became irrelevant in the minds of the world's leaders, the carnage accelerated rapidly. This is humanism's chief legacy to the world. It is a fulfillment of God's warning, "all they that hate me love death" (Prov. 8:36b).

3. The French Revolution

The first modern example of a systematic program of depopulation imposed by a civil government on its own people is the case of the French Revolution. It stood as revolutionary humanism's "preferred model" for the twentieth century: from 1789 to 1795, especially in the final three years. The Reign of Terror was part of a wartime measure to eliminate all enemies of the Revolution. It was also an outcome of the satanic religion of revolution, of regeneration through bloodshed and social chaos. At the end, it was scheduled by Robespierre to become a systematic program of depopulation.

Nesta Webster, in her detailed and deliberately ignored study of the revolution,¹²⁵ discussed this program. She cited the reports and memoirs of several of Robespierre's associates. Robespierre, we must remind ourselves, was the head of the famous Committee on Public Safety, which can also be translated "Committee on Public Salvation" [salut].¹²⁶ Courtois' report was seized at Robespierre's house after the latter's downfall in July of 1794. The report said: "These men, in order to bring us to the happiness of Sparta, wished to annihilate twelve or fifteen millions of the French people. . . ."¹²⁷ The population of France at that time was 25 million. A similar story came from Beaulieu, who claimed that a former associate of Robespierre, the Marquis d'Antonne, told him of Robespierre's theory while the two of them were in prison. "He thought, like the greater number of the revolutionary clubs, that, in order to institute the republic on the ruins of the monarchy, it was necessary to exterminate all those who preferred the latter form of government, and that the former could only become democratic by the destruction of luxury and riches, which form the support of royalty; that equality would never be anything but a chimera as long as men did not all enjoy approximately equal properties; and finally, that such an order of things could never be established until a third of the population had been suppressed. . . ."¹²⁸

125. Conventional historian Crane Brinton gave us one of the few references to Mrs. Webster when he contemptuously dismissed her (without mentioning any of her detailed histories of the period) as "frightened Tories like Mrs. Nesta Webster. . . ." Brinton, The Anatomy of Revolution (New York: Vintage, [1938] 1952), p. 56.

126. Robert A. Nisbet, The Sociological Tradition (New York: Basic Books, 1966), p. 34.

127. Nesta H. Webster, The French Revolution: A Study in Democracy (London: Constable, 1919), p. 424. (<http://bit.ly/WebsterFR>)

The most impressive testimony came from Gracchus Babeuf, the communist revolutionary who became a model for Karl Marx.¹²⁹ Babeuf and his disciple Buonarroti were the great promoters of the religion of revolution. "May everything return to chaos," Babeuf wrote in his Plebeian Manifesto, "and out of chaos may there emerge a new and regenerated world."¹³⁰ In 1795, Babeuf gave this account of Robespierre's depopulation scheme in his tract, "Sur le Systeme de la Depopulation, ou La Vie et les Crimes de Carrier": "Maximilien [Robespierre] and his council had calculated that a real regeneration of France could only be operated by means of a new distribution of territory and of the men who occupied it. . . . He thought that . . . depopulation was indispensable, because the calculation had been made that the French population was in excess of the resources of the soil and of the requirements of useful industry, that is to say, that, with us, men jostled each other too much for each to be able to live at ease; that hands were too numerous for the execution of all works of essential utility. . . ."¹³¹

Webster's analysis of the reasons lying behind the socialists' call for systematic depopulation, written in 1919, is as relevant today—the era of the population hysteria—as it was when she wrote it:

But could a nation of 25,000,000 be thus transformed? To the regenerators of France it seemed extremely doubtful; already the country was rent with dissensions, and any scheme for universal contentment seemed impossible of attainment. Moreover, the plan of dividing things up into equal shares presented an insuperable difficulty, for it became evident that amongst a population of this size there was not enough money, not enough property, not enough employment, not even at this moment enough bread to go around; no one would be

128. Ibid., pp. 424–25.

129. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, "Manifesto of the Communist Party" (1848), in Marx and Engels, Selected Works, 3 vols. (Moscow: Progress Publishers, [1969] 1977), I, p. 134. Cf. George Lichtheim, Marxism: An Historical and Critical Study (New York: Praeger, 1963), pp. 61, 89.

130. Cited in James Billington, Fire in the Minds of Men: Origins of the Revolutionary Faith (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 75.

131. Cited in Webster, p. 425.

satisfied with his share, and instead of universal contentment, universal dissatisfaction would result. What was to be done? The population was too large for the scheme of the leaders to be carried out successfully, therefore either the scheme must be abandoned or the population must be diminished.¹³²

An odd aspect of the French Revolution was that it was officially “pro-marriage” (and therefore presumably pro-natalist) at the same time that the guillotine was in full force. This was also true for Stalin’s Russia in the late 1930s, when a pro-marriage reformation of the Soviet law code was passed while he was executing millions, either deliberately or indirectly by putting them into slave labor camps. The French Revolutionary Assembly passed a head tax on unmarried persons over thirty years old. There was even a national celebration to honor husbands and wives.¹³³ The Nazi policies of the 1930s imitated this same schizophrenia: pro-family tax policies and subsidies for births, yet death-producing slave labor camps for millions.

4. The Armenian Genocide

The next major example of a deliberate policy of population extermination is the Turkish persecution of the Armenians. It came in two waves, in 1895–96 and two decades later in 1915–16. Mass murders were conducted in the first period, and again in 1909 under the so-called Young Turks. In the final wave, the number of victims was at least 800,000 and possibly as high as two million.¹³⁴ In this case, the victims were long-term residents of the Ottoman Empire, but were considered religious foreigners.

5. The Soviet Union

The Soviet Union did not use the excuse of “foreign populations” residing in the Soviet empire. The recurring Soviet depopulations were ideologically motivated. The first instances of serious food shortages took place during the First World War. But these were minor compared to the results of the forced collectivization of agriculture, first in the “war communism” phase of the early 1918–22,¹³⁵ and second in the

132. Ibid., pp. 423–24.

133. William Petersen, Population, p. 148.

134. Dickran H. Boyajian, Armenia: The Case for a Forgotten Genocide (Westwood, New Jersey: Educational Books, 1972), p. 1.

135. Lazar Volin, A Century of Russian Agriculture: From Alexander II to Khrush-

early 1930s. The program of forced starvation of small landowners (the "kulaks") in the late 1920s and early 1930s led to resistance by the peasants, and Stalin's response was to starve them into compliance. Historian Paul Johnson quite properly refers to this as Stalin's "colossal exercise in social engineering, the destruction of the independent Russian peasantry."¹³⁶ We do not know how many peasants were executed—or as Stalin said, "liquidated"¹³⁷—during the 1928–31 period, but Stalin once remarked to Churchill that ten million peasants had been "dealt with."¹³⁸ The general estimate is: one-third in concentration camps, one-third murdered, and one-third forcibly transported into Siberia or central Asia. Most of the large-scale violence took place over a few months, from the end of 1929 through early 1930.¹³⁹ In 1929, only about 4% of all peasant households were in collective or state farms. In 1930, this had risen to about a quarter of the peasant population. A year later, it was 53%. By 1937, it was 93%.¹⁴⁰

The peasants, in response, burned their crops and ate their horses and cattle, rather than place this property in the collective farms and state farms. Stalin later admitted that in 1929, the Soviet Union had 34 million horses; only 16.6 million were left in 1934—a loss of 18 million. They also lost 30 million cattle (45% of the total), as well as nearly 100 million sheep and goats, two-thirds of the total.¹⁴¹ Wrote historian Robert Conquest: "The famine can be blamed quite flatly on Stalin. The crop in 1932 was about 12 percent below average. This was far from being famine level. But procurements of food from the peasantry were up by 44 percent. The result was, and could not have been other than, large-scale starvation. It is perhaps the only case in history of a purely man-made famine. It is also the only major famine whose very existence was ignored or denied by the governmental authorities, and even to a large degree successfully concealed from world opinion."¹⁴² (The one report on the famine by a foreign journalist was Malcolm chev (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1970), ch. 7.

136. Johnson, Modern Times, p. 267.

137. Ibid., p. 269. This was the first time that Stalin used the term. It would not be the last.

138. Ibid., p. 271. The reference appears in Vol. 8 of Churchill's Second World War (1964), p. 78.

139. Idem.

140. Volin, Russian Agriculture, p. 211.

141. Isaac Deutcher, Stalin: A Political Biography (New York: Vintage, [1949] 1960), p. 325. He cited Stalin's Problems of Leninism (Moscow, 1945), p. 480.

142. Robert Conquest, The Great Terror: Stalin's Purges of the Thirties, rev. ed. (New York: Collier, 1973), p. 45.

Muggridge's, which appeared in the Manchester Guardian in three installments in March, 1933. He was the only journalist who had been in the famine areas without official supervision. The reaction in Britain to his articles was hostile.)¹⁴³ Volin's estimate of famine-produced deaths is five million.¹⁴⁴

So desperate was Stalin for foreign currency that he began a series of sales of art treasures, including a famous one to capitalist Andrew Mellon in 1930–31; for $6.5 million, Mellon bought twenty-one paintings that became the basis of the Washington National Gallery.¹⁴⁵

Johnson's explanation concerning Stalin's economic motivation is to the point:

There was no theoretical basis in Marxism, or anything else, for what Stalin now did. But it had a certain monstrous logic. There is no point of stability in a state which is socializing itself. It must go either forward or back. If it does not go forward, the power of the market system, which expresses certain basic human instincts of barter and accumulation, is such that it will always reassert itself, and capitalism will make its reappearance. Then the embryo socialist state will collapse. If socialism is to go forward, it must push ahead with large-scale industrialization. That means surplus food for the workers; and surplus food to export to raise money for capital investment. In short the peasants must pay the price for socialist progress. And since they are unwilling to pay this price voluntarily, force must be used, in ever-growing quantities, until their will is broken and they deliver what is required of them. That is the bitter logic of socialist power which Stalin grasped in the 1920s: there was no stable point of rest between a return to capitalism and the use of unlimited force.¹⁴⁶

Despite the repeated connection between socialism and genocide, this urge to mass destruction is more than mere economics. Stalin's purge of up to a million Communist Party members in the late 1930s indicates that some other motive was involved.¹⁴⁷ The Soviet dissident, Sakharov, wrote that between 1936 and 1939, over 1.2 million Party members went into the camps, and only 50,000 regained their free-

143. Malcolm Muggridge, Chronicles of Wasted Time: Chronicle I: The Green Stick (New York: Morrow, 1973), pp. 257–58.

144. Volin, Russian Agriculture, p. 233–34.

145. Johnson, Modern Times, p. 269.

146. Ibid., p. 268.

147. Robert Conquest provides various estimates. that 500,000 to 1,000,000 people were executed: Great Terror, pp. 702, 713. For a profound literary account of the purges, see the novel by Arthur Koestler, Darkness at Noon.

dom.¹⁴⁸ Total arrests of all citizens in 1938 were probably over 7 million, possibly in the 9 million range.¹⁴⁹ This was in addition to the 5 million already in the camps, and this did not include actual criminals.¹⁵⁰ For twenty years of Stalin's reign, 1930–50, at least 20 million people died in the camps or were executed, and this figure is probably too low; it may have been 30 million dead.¹⁵¹ The chapter title of Isaac Deutcher's account of the period is hyperbolic, but more accurate than he really believed: "The Gods are Athirst."¹⁵²

6. Asian Communism

This readiness to execute millions for the sake of Communist doctrine was repeated: in Communist China under Mao and in Cambodia in the 1970s. The Chinese death rate is a mystery. In the first phase (1949–51), as many as 15 million may have died, or as few as a million.¹⁵³ In the second phase, the period of the "Great Leap Forward" (late 1950s), we simply cannot know for certain. Mosher cites evidence that in 1960 alone, the number of famine-related deaths may have been as high as 30 million, or as low as 11 million.¹⁵⁴ In the third phase, the "Cultural Revolution" of the 1966–68, the Red Guards murdered at least 400,000 people.¹⁵⁵ As for Cambodia, a fifth of the Cambodian population, about 1.2 million people, died during the initial Communist take-over, from April of 1975 until early 1977.¹⁵⁶

This has been the application of the biblical truth that all those who hate God love death (Prov. 8:36b). The satanic hatred of the image of God in man leads the most consistent satanic commonwealths to depopulate their own populations. Revolutionary socialism and genocide are linked by common theological doctrines, the religion of revolution and the hatred of God's image in man. The economic issues are relevant to genocide—the "fixed pie" doctrine of wealth and the

148. Ibid., p. 713.

149. Ibid., p. 702.

150. Ibid., p. 708.

151. Ibid., p. 710.

152. Deutcher, Stalin, ch. 9.

153. Johnson, Modern Times, p. 548.

154. Mosher, Broken Earth, p. 264.

155. Johnson, Modern Times, p. 558.

156. Ibid., p. 657. This is the estimate of John Barron and Anthony Paul, Murder of a Gentle Land (New York: Reader's Digest Press, 1977), p. 206. This book provides many anecdotal accounts of the ruthless murders and torturings that went on in 1975 and 1976 in Cambodia.

growing number of “eaters”—but not primary.

Conclusion

The continuing propaganda against population growth is part of a comprehensive program of humanistic social regeneration. The image of God, mankind, is seen as a threat to ethically rebellious men. Population growth is therefore a threat to humanism. First, in a finite universe, such population growth points to the limits of time: a final judgment. Second, in a centrally planned economy, any uncontrolled resource is a threat to the overall economic plan. This creates problems—uncertainty—for the planners. Third, in an economy characterized by zero economic growth or declining output—which socialist economies tend to be—a growing population puts pressure on the total number of available economic resources. This leads to political problems. Nevertheless, the economic arguments are secondary. The primary argument is theological. Satan hates mankind. Those who hate God love death. The war against God ultimately involves the death of God’s image, mankind. Modern humanism, as it has grown more consistent with its own satanic presuppositions, has adopted as an ideal the philosophy of zero population growth and even population decline. Humanism hates God more than it loves man. Its population ideal is spoken of in the Bible as God’s curse.

APPENDIX C

THE LABYRINTH AND THE GARDEN

For Pharaoh will say of the children of Israel, They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in (Ex. 14:3).

A. The Labyrinth in Egypt

The pyramids are one architectural legacy of the death-obsessed religion of Egypt. Another less well known legacy is the labyrinth. The word is derived from the Greek word, labrys, the word for the two-headed axe, the design found throughout Knossos, the massive structure excavated by Sir Arthur Evans on the Island of Crete in the early twentieth century.

S. H. Hooke's study of the history and meaning of the labyrinth traces the origin of this almost universal symbol. It began in Egypt. Specifically, the labyrinth design was used for the plans of palaces, but more importantly, for royal tombs and mortuary temples.¹ The sign appears on mortuary jars and other containers that are found in the tombs.² "The plan of the Old Kingdom seal-sign is also to be found in the pottery 'soul-houses' from the cemeteries at Rifeh of the 9th and 10th dynasties. Some of these 'soul-houses' show a staircase leading to a floor above the tomb-chamber, where there is a throne. These 'soul-houses' indicate that there was an 'abode' above the tomb-chamber, to which the king mounted when he rose from his ritual death."³

It is also highly significant that the Egyptian labyrinths were related to the bull, as was the famous "palace" of Knossos on Crete. The

1. S. H. Hooke (ed.), The Labyrinth: Further Studies in the Relation between Myth and Ritual in the Ancient World (London: SPCK, 1935), p. 4. It is significant that Sir Arthur Evans, who dug up and misinterpreted the "palace" of Knossos on Crete, believed that the labyrinth was "the palace sign." Idem. Evans wrote this in The Palace of Minos, vol. I, p. 359.

2. Idem.

3. Ibid., p. 5.

bull represented the king-god, and was it brought into the sanctuary on ritual occasions and slain there.⁴ Ritual sacrifice and dancing were connected to the bull-god in the Osirian religion, as was also the case in the legend of Crete's King Minos, the deadly Minotaur ("Minos-bull"), and the sacrifices by Minos of the Athenian youths (the legend of Theseus, Ariadne, and Daedalus).⁵ Similar links between dancing and labyrinths also exist in Cornwall, England and also in Scandinavia and Northern Russia.⁶ It is a dance of death and resurrection.⁷

Hooke pointed out that it was very early in the Egyptian dynasties, in the second dynasty, when kings began to protect their burial places. This had not been true earlier. "Some of these chambers contained the bodies of those who accompanied the king to the after-life, his women and his body-guard who were killed and buried at the time of the royal funeral."⁸ The tomb of King Perabsen of the second dynasty was surrounded by a passage, a new feature, according to Sir Flinders Petrie, who excavated it.⁹ But, as Hooke said, there seems to have been no social or military reason for hiding the bodies of the kings.¹⁰ The pyramids were an extension of this desire to protect the bodies of the monarchs.

The motivation was religious and ritualistic, not defensive. Hooke wrote:

While pyramid and temple must be considered as one complex building, the internal construction of the pyramid became elaborate and labyrinthine in character. Nevertheless, the labyrinth name became attached to the temple, and it seems probable that the greater importance of the temple as the place of ritual, associated with Osiris, Amon or Re, as the case might be, would account for this. In the pyramid, and later in the rock-cut tombs, the body of the king was sealed up in his sarcophagus, and the entrances were blocked up and concealed. Nothing more happened there. But in the adjoining temple everything necessary for his welfare in the after-life was attended to. The plan and construction of the oldest known temple of Osiris at Abydos is interesting, therefore, in connection with the ori-

4. Ibid., pp. 7, 22–24.

5. Ibid., pp. 24–27.

6. Hans Georg Wunderlich, The Secret of Crete (New York: Macmillan, 1974), p. 289.

7. Robert Graves, The White Goddess: A Historical Grammar of Poetic Myth, rev. ed. (New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1966), pp. 329–30.

8. Hooke, op. cit., p. 11.

9. Ibid., p. 12.

10. Ibid., p. 13.

ginal meaning of the Labyrinth. Especially as [citing Budge] “it is probable that there was a small temple of Osiris attached to every great temple in Egypt, and there is good reason to think that such temples of Osiris were better and more regularly served by the priests than the larger temples.”¹¹

Both Herodotus and Strabo described a huge Egyptian labyrinth at Hawara. It was a two-storied structure, with 1,500 rooms above and 1,500 below. It was excavated in 1888 by Sir Flinders Petrie.¹² Wunderlich wrote: “The purpose of the costly pyramids and mortuary temples involved in the worship of the dead pharaoh was to propitiate Osiris, to win favor of the god of vegetation. The fifteen hundred burial vaults and dwellings for the dead in the labyrinth [on the bottom or underground floor—G.N.] were meant for provincial sovereigns, princes of the blood and similar highly placed personages of the Twelfth Dynasty of the Middle Kingdom. [This would have been the era of the pharaohs from Joseph to Moses’ youth, according to Courville.—G.N.] The labyrinth, therefore, was not a mortuary temple in the strict sense of the word. By that is meant, in Egypt, a structure for the cult of the dead but not a burial place.”¹³

B. The “Palace” of Knossos

Wunderlich traced the interrelationships between Egypt and Knossos, the so-called “palace” of the legendary King Minos, on the island of Crete. This relationship was recognized by the Roman historian Pliny, whose Natural History (XXXVI, 13) says that Daedalus, the designer of the labyrinth at Crete, took the design from Egypt.¹⁴ The palace of Minos, which was so lavishly described—a better word might be “invented”—and partially reconstructed by the British archaeologist Sir Arthur Evans during the first three decades of the twentieth century, was in fact a giant tomb, not a palace. It was never intended to be inhabited by the living. Its soft gypsum floors that can be scratched by a fingernail, its huge and unmovable pithoi (urns), its dark labyrinthine hallways, its lack of any protecting wall, its distance from agriculturally productive land, its “bathtubs” without drain pipes (sarcophagi), and “indoor plumbing” without drain pipes (circulating vents for mum-

11. Ibid., pp. 14–15.

12. Joseph Campbell, The Masks of God: Primitive Mythology, rev. ed. (New York: Penguin, [1969] 1978), p. 70.

13. Wunderlich, Secret of Crete, p. 248.

14. Hooke, p. 17.

mies) all point to a vast cult of the dead, not the residence of the king. The supposedly happy and free-spirited people who were called the Minoans by Evans were figments of his vivid imagination. The Minoans were an integral part of the Bronze Age culture—a demonic, fearful, death-obsessed culture.

These “Minoans” mummified their dead, as the Egyptians did, for similar theological reasons, at least with respect to the dead person’s passage through the underworld.¹⁵ As Wunderlich showed, they had trading relations with the Egyptians, who called them the Keftiu.¹⁶ The link with Egypt is testified to by the Egyptian-style clothing of men pictured on the walls of the “palace,” as well as by drawings of these “Minoan” people in a tomb in Egypt. Evans dug up an Egyptian statue in the “palace” which was made in the era of Egypt’s Twelfth Dynasty.¹⁷ Conversely, Egyptian ruins contain examples of pottery that look like the “Minoan” pottery.¹⁸ (On Evans’ misuse of the evidence to make it fit an evolutionary model, see Appendix A: “The Reconstruction of Egypt’s Chronology,” under the subhead, “Egypt and Crete.”)

C. Beyond Crete

The labyrinth is an extremely important symbol. It appears in most of the ancient cultures in one form or another. Sir Arthur Evans discovered numerous coins on Crete that had the Minotaur and labyrinth designs on them.¹⁹ These coins were not contemporaneous with the construction of Knossos, of course; coins began to appear about the sixth century, B.C. Hooke reports that examples of labyrinth designs appear constantly on seals from Asia Minor, Palestine, and Mesopotamia.²⁰ Archaeologists have discovered labyrinths drawn in rocks in Britain and Scandinavia. Hooke recognized this as the probable product of trade between the Mediterranean and the Baltic region.²¹ But what Hooke did not know is that the Knossos labyrinth and Minotaur designs have been discovered in pre-Columbus North America and South America.

15. Wunderlich, ch. 21: “A Visit in the Underworld.”

16. Ibid., pp. 148, 174–80.

17. Leonard Cottrell, The Bull of Minos (New York: Rinehart & Co., 1958), pp. 136–37.

18. Ibid., p. 138.

19. Hooke, pp. 9–10.

20. Ibid., p. 10.

21. Ibid., p. 41.

In rock formations in Oraibi, New Mexico and Cuenca, Ecuador, the labyrinth pattern of Knossos appears. The Minotaur—half bull, half man—is the other famous Cretan design that is closely related to the labyrinth. It has also been found in Texas petroglyphs.²² The explanation of how they got there is the same: trade. Barry Fell, whose books constitute a true intellectual revolution, argued convincingly that these rock carvings are reproductions of coins that were in circulation in North and South America several centuries before Christ.²³ This, of course, points to a system of worldwide trade—trade which Fell's Bronze Age America proves was going on in the second millennium B.C., and probably early in the second millennium.²⁴

The labyrinth is likely related symbolically to the garden of Eden, which had the four rivers flowing out of it. It would be a walled or square design surrounding lines resembling a river or rivers. (The wall must have been open only at one place, at the east gate, where God placed the angels: Gen. 3:24.) The later Greek key-pattern of the labyrinth, called a meander,²⁵ is related linguistically to a river in Phrigia, Maiandros, noted for its winding path.²⁶ The English word "meander" is applied to both rivers and labyrinthine passages.²⁷

Pagan versions of the labyrinth imagery include the swastika or twisted cross. Some scholars (along with their native informers) relate the swastika to the tree of life.²⁸ But in the Mediterranean world of the Bronze Age, the labyrinth was associated with death. Wunderlich commented:

... a labyrinth is not a necropolis. By necropolises we mean cities of the dead in which the dead are placed singly or together in dwellings or tombs. Necropolises may be attached to labyrinths. But a labyrinth has, in addition to its primary function of serving as a residence for the dead, quite a few additional functions: it is the spiritual center of the surrounding settlements; a religious site; an assembly point; an arena, an archive and scriptorium; a place of judgment, execution and sacrifice; and so on. The great courts and subsidiary buildings serve these purposes, as well as the prime purpose of holding im-

22. Barry Fell, Saga America (New York: Times Books, 1974), pp. 104–5.

23. Ibid., pp. 113–14.

24. Barry Fell, Bronze Age America (Boston: Little, Brown, 1982).

25. Hooke, p. 7.

26. Oxford English Dictionary: "miander."

27. Idem.

28. Clyde Keller, "Tree of Life and Labyrinth," The Epigraphic Society: Occasional Publications, V (1978), Pt. 2.

pressive funeral ceremonies, which were accompanied by religious dramas and competitive games complete with music, dancing and banquets. In antiquity the usual meaning of a labyrinth as a structure in which the dead rested in the underground rooms was well understood.²⁹

D. Gnostic Salvation

1. Secret Knowledge

Joseph Campbell related another tale of the labyrinth from the Melanesian island of Malekula. As the soul approaches the way of the dead to the Land of the Dead, having crossed the waters of death, the guardian of the underworld meets him. This guardian is female. She has drawn a labyrinth design in the ground in front of the entrance. As the soul approaches, she erases half the design. "The voyager must restore the design perfectly if he is to pass through it to the Land of the Dead. Those who fail, the threshold guardian eats. One may understand how very important it must have been, then, to learn the secret of the labyrinth before death; and why the teaching of the secret of immortality is the chief concern of the religious ceremonials of Malekula."³⁰ The labyrinth's way of salvation is therefore the way of secret knowledge. This is the essence of the heresy of gnosticism: salvation by initiation, meaning salvation by secret knowledge. It is a perpetual alternative to salvation by grace through faith.

Campbell was heavily influenced by the psychological and symbolic theories of C. G. Jung. His assessment of the meaning of the labyrinth is suggestive but not definitive. Nevertheless, the connections that he made are important.

In archaic art, the labyrinth—home of the child-consuming Minotaur—was represented in the figure of a spiral. The spiral also appears spontaneously in certain stages of meditation, as well as to people going to sleep under ether. It is a prominent device, furthermore, at the silent ceremonies within the dark passages of the ancient Irish kingly burial mound of New Grange. These facts suggest that a constellation of images denoting the plunge and dissolution of consciousness in the darkness of non-being must have been employed intentionally, from an early date, to represent the analogy of 29. Wunderlich, p. 249.

30. Campbell, Primitive Mythology, p. 69. Cf. Mircea Eliade, Rites and Symbols of Initiation: The Mysteries of Birth and Rebirth (New York: Harper Torchbook, [1958] 1965), p. 62.

threshold rites to the mystery of the entry of the child into the womb for birth. . . . It is obvious that the idea of death-and-rebirth, rebirth through ritual and with a fresh organization of profoundly impressed sign stimuli, is an extremely ancient one in the history of culture. . . .³¹

We know that the garden of Eden was placed eastward in Eden (Gen. 2:8). When God closed its entrance by placing the cherubim and the flaming sword, they were stationed at the east of the garden (Gen. 3:24). This means that the garden itself must have been an enclosed space. Its walls protected it from those who would enter it on any terms except those established by God. Man was not to gain access to the tree of life by breaking into the closed space (Gen. 3:22, 24). From the day of man's expulsion, the only way to the tree of life is through ethical conformity to God's standards. The standard is perfection. Regeneration, not the scaling of physical or symbolic walls, is the foundation of eternal life.

The walled enclosure is therefore a significant design—one of the most significant in man's history. Pagan cultures again and again return to it. They invest it with many meanings. The heart of the pagan version, the labyrinth, is a closed space in which a winding pathway is dominant. Men who do not know the secret of the pathway are trapped, condemned to wander helplessly. Only by knowing the way out (or in) through the entrance can man attain his eternal goal. The walls, however, cannot be scaled by man.

2. Egypt as Garden-Labyrinth

Egypt was a symbol of the garden. In Abraham's day, it was the place that was spared during the famine (Gen. 12:10). Abraham journeyed to Egypt, but then went back up into Canaan. This was a symbolic resurrection. This was true again in Joseph's day: descent into a "garden," which became a labyrinth or wilderness, and then escape. Jacob wanted his body to be taken up out of Egypt after his death, and buried in the cave in Canaan in which his fathers were buried (Gen. 49:29–32). Joseph wanted his bones dug up and reburied in the promised land (Gen. 50:25). Again, this points to resurrection. So does Joseph's experience in Potiphar's house (the "garden") and his experience in prison ("wilderness-labyrinth"), a walled, enclosed space, from which he was delivered by God into a position of authority.

31. Ibid., pp. 65–66.

Goshen was the best of Egypt, and it was given to Israel by Joseph's Pharaoh (Gen. 47:6). Goshen was a garden. It was partially protected from the plagues of Egypt, at least plagues seven through ten (Ex. 8:22–24; 9:6, 26; 10:23; 12). Goshen was to have served as an Edenic training ground for Israel, a kind of headquarters for dominion. But, by Moses' day, the hearts of the Israelites had been captured by the gods of Egypt, and therefore their bodies had been placed in bondage to the rulers of Egypt. The golden calf in the wilderness testified to their Egyptian faith. They fell once again, just as their father Adam had fallen in his garden environment. The Edenic training ground of Goshen became a wilderness training ground. The Bible's message is clear: a good environment does not necessarily produce good men. Men are not saved by manipulating their environment.

Egypt was not seen as a garden by the Egyptians. A garden is a preliminary training ground for redeemed man's dominion in a future-oriented world. This was not the world believed in by the Egyptians. They believed in a static and magical world. Egypt was understood as a labyrinth by Pharaoh. As the children of Israel were escaping, Pharaoh said to his subordinates, "They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in" (Ex. 14:3). The barrier of the Red Sea was considered to be impenetrable. Egypt was an "enclosed space." The only visible outlet passed through the land of the Philistines. But God warned Moses not to go by that route, for it might have meant a battle, and the Israelites were not ready for a fight. They might have returned to Egypt (Ex. 13:17). Thus, it appeared to Pharaoh that the Israelites were trapped, "entangled in the land."

What Pharaoh did not expect was that God would penetrate the labyrinth's walls. God could knock down the walls of any labyrinth, or create a passageway through the Red Sea. This was also to be His strategy with the Jordan River and the city of Jericho a generation later. It was not necessary for the Israelites to go through the gates of the city or around the river. God's answer was a direct assault on the barrier. The people were led by God's glory-cloud. When the Egyptian army approached, the cloud went behind them. This cloud then served as a barrier to the Egyptians (Ex. 14:19–20), a source of darkness for the Egyptians and a source of light for the Israelites (v. 20). Like the flaming sword of the garden, the flaming glory cloud served as an unpassable barrier to the enemies of God. God created a protective enclosed space of His people. The tabernacle and the temple later symbolized this same sort of enclosed space. At the heart of this enclosed space was ethics. In the case of the tabernacle and temple, the center was the holy of holies, in which the tablets of the law resided.

The last instance we have in the Bible concerning Egypt as a place of refuge prior to a “resurrection unto dominion” is the case of the parents of Jesus. They obeyed the angel which told them to go down into Egypt (Matt. 2:13–14). This was done to fulfill a messianic prophecy (Hosea 11:1), “Out of Egypt have I called my son” (Matt. 2:15b). After Herod’s death, they returned to Israel (Matt. 2:20–21).³² Herod, the “guardian” at the “gate” of Israel, was no longer a threat.

3. The Guardian

Men who would have sought to enter Eden’s garden needed to bypass the angelic guardians. Similarly, in the Melanesian legend of the labyrinth, the supernatural female guardian serves as the destroyer of anyone who does not know the secret of the labyrinth. The Bible teaches that access through the protected gate is not based on secret knowledge; it is based rather on one’s covenantal relationship with the God who assigned the angelic guardians to their place.

Jacob, upon returning from the wilderness experience of labor under Laban, faced a barrier, the Jordan River (Gen. 32:10), and a guardian, his brother Esau. He wrestled all night with a theophany of God who renamed him and gave him a blessing (32:24–29). Moses, upon returning to Egypt with an uncircumcised son named Gershom (from a Hebrew root meaning “driven out”),³³ faced the guardian of the border, an angel, and he was not permitted to pass through until Zipporah circumcised Gershom (Ex. 4:24–26).³⁴ In another Old Testament judicial arrangement, the fugitive from the ga’al (kinsman-redeemer/avenger of blood) who fled to the safety of the enclosed space of a city of refuge had to wait until the death of the high priest before he could safely return home, for the ga’al was the guardian of the route of escape and could lawfully slay him if he passed through the gates of the

32. That they should have traveled to Egypt is not surprising. A thriving colony of Jews had lived in Alexandria since the days of Alexander the Great, who had attracted them by promising them the same legal rights that Greeks possessed. They prospered and helped the city to become a major commercial center. Henri Daniel-Rops, Israel and the Ancient World (New York: Image, 1964), p. 349.

33. Strong’s Exhaustive Concordance, Hebrew and Chaldee Dictionary, p. 28, #1644.

34. For a detailed treatment of this deeply symbolic event, see my essay, “The Marriage Supper of the Lamb,” Christianity and Civilization, 4 (1985). (<http://bit.ly/CAC1985>) city (Num. 35:12–28).

4. Resurrection

The garden is a sabbath resting place, a place of refreshment. From the garden men are to march forward in victory. The garden is the symbol or archetype of paradise. The labyrinth, on the other hand, is the archetype of hell, and was so understood by the ancients. It is a place from which men need to escape. Escape from the labyrinth is resurrection. Thus, the pagan rituals associated with the labyrinth are rituals of death and resurrection.

The night before His death, Jesus went into a garden. Gethsemane was His place of prayer to God. He told His disciples to continue to watch with Him (Matt. 26:38), to watch and pray (v. 41). He instructed them three times, but the disciples fell asleep each time. They were not ready to defend the garden from invaders. Then the garden was invaded by the authorities, led by Judas, Satan's man. Satan had invaded the garden once again. Jesus was then expelled from the garden, as if He had committed the sin of Adam. He was brought before the judges, as Adam had been brought before God the judge. He was executed, suffering death, just as God had promised to Adam. Then came the resurrection. Death and resurrection, given the sin of Adam, is inescapably linked to the garden in biblical imagery and biblical history. The question is: Will it be resurrection unto life or resurrection unto the second death (Rev. 20:14)?

Heaven and hell are temporary locations, just as the garden was. They serve as embarkation points. After the resurrection, the heaven-dwellers are returned to the new earth, while the hell-dwellers are dumped into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14–15). Thus, physical resurrection at the day of judgment is not the basis of escape from the labyrinth. There is no escape after physical death. The only escape is the covenantal-ethical decision made in time and on earth.

5. Barriers

In one sense, the barriers to escape or entry are broken by Christ. The veil of the temple was torn at the death of Christ (Matt. 27:51). The stone barrier placed over His tomb by the authorities was rolled away (Matt. 28:2). Christ spoke of the impending fulfillment and removal of the old covenant's ceremonial barriers with the gentile world when He announced that new wine cannot be contained in old containers (Matt. 9:17). Israel would no longer serve as a geographical recapitulation of the garden, for sin had turned it into a gnostic labyrinth. Schlossberg remarked:

Combining social purpose with expertise sets the stage for a gnosticism in which only the special few have the key to the secrets of the universe. This is not something that can simply be learned from books, although the cognoscenti are almost invariably well-educated. They must also have the requisite "social purpose," for the knowledge required to run society cannot simply be communicated rationally. They are like the Pharisees who taught that God gave Moses not only a written law but also an oral one, handed down through the generations to only the privileged few. This was the key to the power of the Pharisees: they had the knowledge to unlock the meaning of the Pentateuch, to be the recipients of wisdom had by no others. Not possessing esoteric knowledge, the masses have no choice but to turn their lives over to the elite to be managed. Never ask the enlightened ones about their track record, which is a series of disguised disasters; just accept on faith that they have the secret to life.³⁵

The labyrinthine rules and teachings of pre-Talmudic Judaism had made Israel into a place of death rather than life, a labyrinth rather than a garden. The goal was now to escape the labyrinth. The Christians were warned about 40 years in advance by Jesus not to trust in the walls of Jerusalem when the Roman army encompassed the city, but rather to flee to the hills (Luke 21:20–24). It would mean death to remain, and resurrection to escape. Josephus' account of what happened in A.D. 69–70 offers the horrible evidence of the truth of Christ's predictions concerning Jerusalem. Israel remained a 40-year wilderness experience for the early Jewish-Christian church, one from which they were delivered (forced out) just before the fall of Jerusalem.

On the other hand, there will always be enclosed sacred space. The consummated church is described as a walled city (Rev. 21:10–21). Its gates are always open, however (v. 25). There will be no night there, no darkness (v. 25). Today, the church is also a place of refuge, a protected space. We journey weekly to eat with God and be refreshed—what Adam was supposed to have done in the garden. But it is still a dominion training ground, which it does not seem to be in the era after the resurrection. It is a place which points to the resurrection of many in the future, for it points backward to the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

35. Herbert Schlossberg, Idols for Destruction: Christian Faith and Its Confrontation with American Society (Wheaton, Illinois: Crossway, [1983] 1993), pp. 194–95.

E. Wilderness

Moses' career was a three-stage encounter with the labyrinth and the wilderness. For 40 years, he lived in Egypt, which had become a labyrinth for the Israelites. He fled, for he knew his life was doomed in Egypt (Ex. 2:15). For 40 years, he lived as a shepherd in the wilderness. There, in the "backside of the desert," God confronted him at Mount Horeb (Ex. 3:1). He was drawn out of that wilderness back into Egypt. Then he spent 40 years in a new wilderness, having been driven out of Egypt. In each case, the number 40 was associated with a wilderness experience.

In each case, this experience involved training. Noah's world had become a labyrinth, a spiritual wilderness, a place fit for judgment. The death of Noah's world was accomplished by 40 days of rain (Gen. 7:17), but he escaped in a massive enclosed space—a garden experience, where he cared for the animals. The army of Israel was stymied for 40 days on the battlefield by the Philistines under Goliath (I Sam. 17:16). Elijah fled into the wilderness (I Kings. 19:4), and journeyed 40 days until he reached Mount Horeb (v. 8), where he lodged in a cave (v. 16), an enclosed space. Jesus also spent 40 days in the wilderness, in preparation for His ministry (Matt. 4:1–2). Moses' 40 years in the wilderness after the exodus points to the wilderness as both a labyrinth and a garden. For the older generation, it was a wilderness. They would all die there, except Joshua and Caleb. For the young, it was more of a garden, with the manna and springs refreshing them daily. It was a place of wandering for the older Israelites—a labyrinth from which there was to be no escape—and a place of training for the young. The way out was through the barrier, the Jordan River (Josh. 3:14–17).

At Gilgal, they were circumcised (Josh. 5:2–4); they celebrated the passover (5:10); and on that day the manna ceased (5:12). The wilderness was no longer their garden; the land of Canaan was, if they would remain faithful and conquer it militarily in the name of the Lord. The way through the garden was direct confrontation, city by city, culture by culture, cutting each off, one by one. It was not a labyrinth for them, not a place of wandering and indirect excursions. The pathway was direct.

1. Broken Walls and Death

When the Israelites fled Egypt, Egypt died. When they fled the wilderness, the manna ceased, and the wilderness returned to its condition as a place of death. When the Israelites attacked the walled cities of Jericho and Ai, these cities died. The whole culture of Canaan died to the extent that the Israelites remained faithful and conquered the people of the land. But when Israel grew rebellious, various civilizations penetrated their walls (the Book of Judges), and finally Assyria and Babylon completed the process. There was no escape, God through His prophets warned them, no safe way out of the land except through Babylon—to the east. The east was the place of judgment. There would be no escape back into Egypt, Jeremiah warned (Jer. 42:19). Those who disbelieved him perished in Egypt when God delivered the Egyptians into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 44:30; 46).

God closed the Old Covenant era with the fall of Jerusalem. Israel had become spiritual Babylon,³⁶ but in Old Testament times, this meant geographical deliverance. Revelation 12 discusses the fate of ethnic Israel, the “woman” who brought forth the man child who became the deliverer (Rev. 12:5–6, 13–14, 17). Israel had brought Babylon back into the land through the Babylonian Talmud and other eastern practices. The destruction of Israel by Rome was the final judgment on geographic Israel. The Israelites were scattered in all directions. Israel would never again serve as a garden place. God’s garden place today is the institutional church, and only the institutional church. What seems to be a garden place in our era—modern Israel—is a technological imitation of the garden, not the spiritual place prophesied of old.

2. The End of Old Israel

When men rebel against God, they are driven out of the garden. This happened to Adam. It happened to the Israelites when they fled from Egypt. It happened to them again with the invasions of Assyria and Babylon. Finally, it took place under Rome’s dominion in 70 A.D. Biblically, we see that when the dragon invades the garden and men subordinate themselves to him ethically and covenantally, he captures them. The only hope of deliverance is ethical deliverance, but in Old Testament times, this meant geographical deliverance. Revelation 12 discusses the fate of ethnic Israel, the “woman” who brought forth the man child who became the deliverer.

36. David Chilton, Paradise Restored: A Biblical Theology of Dominion (Tyler, Texas: Dominion Press, 1985), ch. 21. (<http://bit.ly/dcpardise>)

And she brought forth a man child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up into God, and to his throne. And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days. . . . And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man child. And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent. . . . And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ (Rev. 12:5–6, 13–14, 17).

It is difficult to view the woman as the Christian church in history, since the dragon makes war against her seed when he cannot touch her. It could conceivably refer to the Jewish-Christian church in Israel during the transitional era from Pentecost to the fall of Jerusalem, with the “seed” referring to gentile Christians, who were persecuted in other parts of the Roman Empire. Garden Israel therefore became a wilderness for the Jewish-Christian church. But the wilderness is a place of temporary residence, a training ground during a period in which dominion is restricted for the sake of the ethically immature. The problem with identifying the “woman” with the Jewish-Christian church is that this church was not historically impotent. Peter and the apostles had been visited by the Holy Spirit in power. That transitional era church was the headquarters for worldwide evangelism. These are not the activities of a wilderness experience. It therefore seems more likely that the “woman” is ethnic Israel. Ethnic Israel will be regrafted into the olive tree of true faith when the era of the gentiles comes to an end (Rom. 11:11–17, 23–32).³⁷ Thus, ethnic Israel is presently in the wilderness—outside the framework of dominion history during the era of the gentiles.

F. Labyrinth vs. Garden

For the pagan, the labyrinth was forbidden space. It was to be dealt with through secret initiation and metaphysical manipulation. It represented the nether world, or hell. For the God-fearing man, the garden is the product of ethics, a future goal toward which faithful people labor, first, by self-discipline under biblical law, and second, by external dominion through the imposition of biblical law over every area of life. The garden is a symbol, not of something foreboding, but of a future paradise. It is heaven on earth, or the new heavens and new earth.

37. John Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1965), II, pp. 75–103.

For the pagan, the labyrinth was marked by its intricate passageways, its endless dead ends, and its enforced wandering. For the God-fearing man, the space within the walls of the enclosed garden is open space. One can go directly to the tree of life, which is in the center of the garden, which is also a city: the new Jerusalem. The garden is the place of righteousness, the place of obedience. "And he shewed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the lamb. In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the trees were for the healing of the nations. And there shall be no more curse: but the throne of God and of the lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him" (Rev. 22:1–3).

Adam had the power to have gone straight to the tree of life in the garden of Eden. He did not. He allowed his wife to sidetrack him ethically. Pagans view this detour as essentially a lack of knowledge. Salvation, they believe, is through knowledge, especially secret knowledge. This is the gnostic heresy. Thus, the labyrinth is essentially mysterious, not ethical. For paganism, if a man knows the magic words, "open sesame," the closed doors will open. The labyrinth is a place of riddles.

G. The Sphinx

The Sphinx, which is found in Egypt (half lion, half man) and Greece (half lion, half woman), is also associated with riddles in Greek mythology, for it was the Sphinx which asked Oedipus the famous riddle of the creature with four legs in the morning (man, who crawls as an infant), two legs in the afternoon (man, who walks as an adult), and three legs in the evening (man, who uses a cane in old age). The Sphinx was a guardian. The Sphinx challenged travellers to Thebes and asked them this riddle. Anyone who failed to answer the riddle was throttled and consumed by the Sphinx. Oedipus answered it, delivered Thebes from its clutches, and was made king.³⁸

The Sphinx in Greek legend is representative of pagan underground demons in general. Jane Harrison commented: "Two special features characterize the Sphinx: she was a Harpy carrying off men to destruction, an incarnate plague; she was the soothsayer with the evil habit of asking riddles as well as answering them. Both functions, though seemingly alien, were characteristic of underworld bogeys; the myth-making mind put them together and wove out of the two the tale of the unanswered riddle and the consequent deathly pest."³⁹ The Sphinx was also a tomb-haunter.⁴⁰

Immanuel Velikovsky identified the historical source of this Greek legend: the Pharaoh Akhnaton. It was not Greece's Thebes that was the original location of these legends; it was Egypt's Thebes. There is strong evidence that Akhnaton committed incest with his mother, Queen Tiy. Furthermore, this queen was associated with the first appearance of a female sphinx. Akhnaton had two sons, Velikovsky speculated, just as Oedipus had. One son, the famous King Tut (Tutankhamen), was buried with great splendor, just as Eteocles was in the Greek legend. The other son, Smenkhkare, was buried ignominiously, just as Polynices was (by his sister Antigone). The uncle of these two sons, Ay, the brother of Queen Tiy, then made himself Pharaoh, just as Creon, the brother of Jocasta, made himself king of Thebes.⁴¹

This is not some crackpot theory. There is no doubt that Akhnaton was incestuous. C. D. Darlington, the geneticist, accepted Velikovsky's basic outline.⁴² So did the distinguished historian, Cyrus Gordon, who called the book a tour de force.⁴³ Three anatomists, using a microseriological method, demonstrated that both Smenkhkare and Tutankhamen belonged to the same rare blood group.⁴⁴ This increases the likelihood that these two were brothers, as Velikovsky suggested. The two mummies also had very similar skull structures, two of the 38. Robert Graves, The Greek Myths, 2 vols. (Baltimore, Maryland: Penguin, 1955), II, p. 10, Sect. 105.e.

39. Jane Harrison, Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion (New York: Meridian, [1903] 1960), p. 207. (<http://bit.ly/Prolegomena>)

40. Ibid., p. 211.

41. Immanuel Velikovsky, Oedipus and Akhnaton: Myth and History (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1960).

42. C. D. Darlington, The Evolution of Man and Society (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1969), pp. 118–20.

43. Cyrus Gordon, "Oedipus and Akhnaton," Pensée, II (Fall 1972), p. 30.

44. Nature, Vol. 224 (Oct. 25, 1969), p. 325.

anatomists, Harrison and Abdalla, have reported.⁴⁵

H. Akhnaton, the Innovator

Recent scholarship on Akhnaton, who was originally named Amenhotep IV (Amenophis IV), has begun to abandon the pre-Velikovsky humanist adoration of the “king who invented monotheism.” Today, we read in utter amazement the early twentieth century assessment of Akhnaton by the otherwise judicious scholar, James Breasted: “In such contemplations he gradually developed ideals and purposes which make him the most remarkable of all the Pharaohs, and the first individual in human history.”⁴⁶ The first individual in history? It gets worse. “. . . he is alike the first prophet and the first wise-man of history.”⁴⁷

Such obvious nonsense could not go unchallenged forever, and hasn’t. Donald Redford’s Akhenaten: The Heretic King (1984) is a hostile account. This worshipper of the sun disc was a failure. His experiment in monotheism was rejected by his successors, who defaced his monuments. He regarded Akhnaton as a totalitarian.⁴⁸

Redford did not stress the king’s incestuous relationship with his mother, Tiy; instead, he hints at his incestuous relationship with his daughter, Meretaten, who was married to Smenkhkare.⁴⁹ If Smenkhkare was Akhnaton’s son, then the genetic line, already visibly weakened in Akhnaton,⁵⁰ must have been jeopardized to a remarkable extent. Akhnaten’s wife Nefertiti—this is in addition to his mother Tiy, who was never acknowledged to be his consort—because of the famous bust of her which is housed in the Berlin Museum,⁵¹ is more

45. Antiquity, Vol. 46 (February 1972), p. 10.

46. James Henry Breasted, A History of the Ancient Egyptians (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, [1905] 1908), p. 265.

47. Ibid., p. 277.

48. Donald B. Redford, Akhenaten: The Heretic King (Princeton University Press, 1984), p. 235.

49. Ibid., p. 188.

50. Ibid., pp. 57–58.

51. The story of how it got there is a classic tale of bureaucracy and bureaucracy-overcoming. After Napoleon’s invasion of Egypt in 1798, the French controlled all archeological exploration in Egypt. This monopoly was retained after 1904 as a result of a British-French agreement. (Thomas Hoving, Tutankhamun: The Untold Story [New York: Simon & Schuster Touchstone Book, 1978], pp. 24–25.) All antiquities exported from Egypt had to be approved by the Egyptian Department of Antiquities. In the 1930s, the Germans filled a room with four decades of uncatalogued junk: broken pottery, fragments, and molds of no value. They had never reported anything of significance in this collection. “Hidden” amongst tables full of junk was the head of Neferfamiliar to most people than he is, although her prominence appears to have been great only during the first five years of his reign, when he had not yet declared his monotheism or moved his capital from Thebes to what is now called Tell-el-Amarna (Akhetaten).⁵² (It turns out that as an infant, she had been wet-nursed by the wife of Ay,⁵³ who was the brother ["Creon," argued Velikovsky] of Queen Tiy.⁵⁴ Nefertiti was not the wife of King Tut, contrary to popular opinion.) Redford also acknowledged that Smenkhkare and Tutankhamen were brothers, but not that they were sons of Akhnaton.⁵⁵

Akhnaton was narcissistic. Despite the destruction of his monuments by his successors, we still have more clay and stone bas reliefs of Akhnaton and his family than we possess of the kings and queens of England, from William the Conqueror (1066) to Queen Elizabeth II. Many of the carvings are so detailed anatomically that they can be described as exhibitionistic—unique in Egyptian history.⁵⁶

Akhnaton, Tutankhamen, and Smenkhkare were late eighteenth-dynasty monarchs. They followed Thutmose III by at least a century. Velikovsky's reconstruction indicates that Thutmose III was the Pharaoh Shishak, who invaded Israel in the reign of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon.⁵⁷ This was in the fifth year of Rehoboam's reign (II Chron. 12:2). Thus, Akhnaton, the great-great-grandson of Thutmose III,⁵⁸ ruled sometime in the mid-tenth century, B.C., not in the mid-fourteenth century B.C., as the conventional histories insist.⁵⁹ In short, this Egyptian "inventor of monotheism" may even have been a contemporary of the prophet Isaiah, at least in the prophet's youth. So much for Breasted's "first prophet" theory.

Breasted's laudatory account of Akhnaton also includes the sculpture of the era. The king's artists were instructed to make the king ap-tit, which the Germans must have known was a true treasure. Then they informed the director of the Antiquities Department that they intended to send it all back to Berlin. No important find had ever been announced in 40 years, so he sent a young subordinate to inspect the collection for anything of value. The young man did not spot the bust, and Berlin Museum got this treasure. The Egyptians have complained, but to no avail. (Velikovsky, Oedipus and Akhnaton, pp. 76-77.)

52. Redford, pp. 78-79.

53. Ibid., p. 151.

54. Ibid., p. 207.

55. Ibid., p. 192.

56. Velikovsky, Oedipus and Akhnaton, p. 78.

57. Velikovsky, Ages in Chaos (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1952), ch. 4.

58. Redford, Akhenaten, genealogical chart, p. 13.

59. Christiane Desroches-Noblecourt, Tutankhamen (Boston: New York Graphic Society, [1963] 1978), p. 105.

pear lifelike, he surmises (correctly, I would guess). "The modelling of the human figure at this time was so plastic that at the first glance one is sometimes in doubt whether he has before him a product of the Greek age."⁶⁰ We are supposed to conclude that in art, as in theology, Akhnaton was also a great innovator. Breasted missed the obvious: the sculptures appear Greek-like because they were contemporaneous with early Greece (Mycenae). Writing of the city of Akhetaton, Velikovsky noted: "Since it was inhabited for only about fifteen years, archaeologists have not had the tedious and often difficult task, encountered in other places, of separating various levels of occupation. Heaps of imported ceramics were found in Akhet-Aton; these came from Mycenae on the Greek mainland, or at least they were of the same manufacture as those found in Mycenae. Archaeologists dubbed a street in Akhet-Aton 'Greek Street' because of the abundance of this ware. On the basis of it, the age of King Akhnaton is established as synchronous with the Mycenaean Age in Greece. . . ." ⁶¹

Conclusion

Egyptian culture was the dominant influence in the ancient Near East well into the era of classical Greece. The cult of the dead, mummification (Crete), polytheism, labyrinths, and ultimately, the divinization of man: all were Egyptian legacies. All were based on the idea that man is saved, not by ethical regeneration, but by the manipulation of his own environment. For the theology of the garden, it is not the knowledge of riddles which saves a person, but rather the knowledge of the Lord. It is covenantal faithfulness which determines access to the garden and the tree of life, not initiatory knowledge. It is ethics, not knowledge, that is central.

The labyrinth was the satanic imitation of the garden. It was a place of terror, a place of confusion. Success in escaping the labyrinth depended on one's initiatory knowledge of its secret passageways. In other words, it was an emblem of metaphysical religion, in contrast to the Bible's ethical and judicial religion. It was a magical device which promised to give the initiate power over the underworld through magical manipulation. It was more a charm or talisman than a real place in which men might dwell. It was Egyptian to the core.

60. Breasted, p. 279.

61. Velikovsky, Oedipus and Akhnaton, pp. 75–76.

APPENDIX D

THE RULE OF LAW AND THE FREE MARKET

By centralizing power, the modern state is re-creating the pyramid society, the top-down system of total control—or attempted total control—that destroys the fabric of society. The caretaker state steadily replaces the biblical concept of the night-watchman state. The most important form of government, responsible self-government under God, is steadily eroded by a new concept of government, the messianic state. Social order also erodes. As the French Catholic social philosopher, Lamennais, wrote in the early nineteenth century, “Centralization induces apoplexy at the center and anemia at the extremities.”¹ Nobody has ever put it more graphically than this.

The biblical social order is utterly hostile to the pyramid society. The biblical social order is characterized by the following features. First, it is made up of multiple institutional arrangements, each with its own legitimate, limited, and derivative sovereignty under God’s universal law. Second, each institution possesses a hierarchical chain of command, but these chains of command are essentially appeals courts —“bottom-up” institutions—with the primary duty of responsible action placed on people occupying the lower rungs of authority. Third, no single institution has absolute and final authority in any instance; appeal can be made to other sovereign agents of godly judgment. Because no society can attain perfection, there will be instances of injustice, but the social goal is harmony under biblical law, in terms of an orthodox creed. God will judge all men perfectly. The state need not seek perfect justice, nor should citizens be taxed at the astronomical rates necessary to sustain the quest for perfect justice.²

1. Cited by Robert A. Nisbet, The Sociological Tradition (New York: Basic Books, 1966), p. 115.

2. Macklin Fleming, The Price of Perfect Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1974). For an analysis of Fleming’s critique of the modern criminal justice system, see my review

F. A. Hayek made a point, which must be taken seriously by those who seek to explain the relationship between Christianity and the advent of free enterprise capitalism in the West. "There is probably no single factor which has contributed more to the prosperity of the West than the relative certainty of the law which has prevailed here."³ Economist Thomas Sowell's comments are especially graphic: "Someone who is going to work for many years to have his own home wants some fairly rigid assurance that the house will in fact belong to him—that he cannot be dispossessed by someone who is physically stronger, better armed, or more ruthless, or who is deemed more 'worthy' by political authorities. Rigid assurances are needed that changing fashions, mores, and power relationships will not suddenly deprive him of his property, his children, or his life."⁴

Hayek quite properly denied the validity of the quest for perfect certainty, because "complete certainty of the law is an ideal which we must try to approach but which we can never perfectly attain."⁵ His anti-perfectionism regarding the rule of law was also in accord with the anti-perfectionism of Christian social thought in the West.⁶ Christianity brought with it a conception of social order that made possible the economic development of the West.

A. Biblical Law and Capitalism

There is no doubt that formal legal predictability was a major factor in the rise of capitalism. By "capitalism," I mean a system of private ownership, which involves the freedom of contract, freely fluctuating prices, and a money economy. I am not speaking of traditional political capitalism, such as the tax-farming capitalism of ancient Rome, or the court-oriented capitalism of Spain in the sixteenth century. This is the distinction used by Max Weber to delineate modern from ancient capitalism.

Weber made a very important observation concerning the relationship between Protestantism and market-oriented capitalism. He sharply distinguished market capitalism from "political capitalism," in of the book in The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Winter 1975–76).

3. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), p. 208.

4. Thomas Sowell, Knowledge and Decisions (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 32.

5. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 208.

6. Benjamin B. Warfield, Perfectionism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1958). This is an abridged version of Warfield's two-volume study, published by Oxford University Press in 1931, and reprinted by Baker Book House in 1981.

which producers sell primarily to the state rather than to a competitive market.

The closest connection between ethical religion and rational economic development—particularly capitalism—was effected by all the forms of ascetic Protestantism and sectarianism in both Western and Eastern Europe, viz., Zwinglians, Calvinists, Baptists, Mennonites, Quakers, Methodists, and Pietists (both of the Reformed and, to a lesser degree, Lutheran varieties). . . . Indeed, generally speaking, the inclination to join an ethical, rationed, congregational religion becomes more strongly marked the farther away one gets from those strata which have been the carriers of the type of capitalism which is primarily political in orientation. Since the time of Hammurabi political capitalism has existed wherever there has been tax farming, the profitable provisions of the state's political needs, war, piracy, large-scale usury, and colonization. The tendency toward affiliation with an ethical, rational, congregational religion is more apt to be found the closer one gets to those strata which have been the carriers of the modern rational enterprise, i.e., strata with middle-class economic characteristics. . . .⁷

The idea of the congregational unit, where men worship God as equals before the law, where God is not a respecter of persons, where the law is read and understood by all members of the group, and where each man receives his calling to labor before God in a holy occupation, produces a mentality favoring personal responsibility and production for a universal market. Men's universal understanding of the civil law reduces the arbitrary decisions of the authorities, and this in turn reduces a major area of uncertainty. This reduction in bureaucratic arbitrariness reduces production costs. Fewer economic resources need to be set aside for bribes or court defense costs.

Yet it is not simply the universality of the legal system that is important. Specific aspects of the legal system, such as the honoring of private contracts, the respect for private property, the nondiscriminatory nature of the tax system, and the restriction of the civil government to the preservation of order, primarily by preserving public peace and preventing private fraud and coercion, have made it possible for capitalism to flourish. All of these aspects are basic to biblical law. Four such principles of biblical law come to mind. First, the concept of the covenant between God and man undergirds the right of private contract. Second, the commandment against theft is basic to the extension of the rights of private property. Third, the tithe, as a fixed percentage of a man's income, preserves the nondiscriminatory nature of taxation. Fourth, the enforcement of honest weights and measures is indicative of the Bible's view of the civil government as essentially a restraining institution, not a positive, initiating force in economic development, and certainly not a coercive agency of wealth redistribution.

7. Max Weber, Economy & Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology (New York: Bedminster Press, [1920] 1968), pp. 479–80; The Sociology of Religion, trans. Ephraim Fischhoff (Boston: Beacon Press, 1963), pp. 93–94.

Hayek's summary of the principles of a liberal economic order reveals how closely nineteenth-century liberalism resembled the view of civil government held by the Protestant congregational churches in the United States, Holland, and Britain in the eighteenth century.⁸ In short, nineteenth-century liberalism was the humanists' version of "work out your salvation with fear and trembling. When humanism's evangelists and social theorists finally persuaded men (especially leaders) to cease fearing God and trembling in His presence, the classical liberal economic order was doomed. Rather than killing God, classical liberalism killed itself.⁹

B. Whose Law Is Sovereign?

A few modern secular scholars still give lip-service to classical liberalism's idea of the rule of law. The advocates of classical liberalism in the nineteenth century, most notably the English economist and social theorist, John Stuart Mill,¹⁰ and the constitutional scholar, A. V. Dicey,¹¹ believed in the idea of the rule of law. The problem that faced

8. Hayek wrote elsewhere (in language as convoluted as Weber's): "The extension of an order of peace beyond the small purpose-oriented organization became thus possible by the extension of purpose-independent ('formal') rules of just conduct to the relations with other men who did not pursue the same concrete ends or hold the same values except those abstract rules—rules which did not impose obligations for particular actions (which always presuppose a concrete end) but consisted solely in prohibitions from infringing the protected domain of each which these rules enable us to determine. Liberalism is therefore inseparable from the institution of private property which is the name we usually give to the material part of this protected individual domain." Hayek, "The Principles of a Liberal Social Order" (1966), in Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), p. 165.

9. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), Appendix A: "From Cosmic Purposelessness to Humanistic Sovereignty."

10. Mill, On Liberty (1859).

11. A. V. Dicey, An Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 8th ed. (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Classics, [1915] 1982). Cf. Richard Cosgrove, The Rule these legal theorists—a problem that they never overcame—was the problem of the content of the law. They frequently accepted the validity of formal rationalism, which meant that they wanted to establish formal “rules of the game” for all participants in society to observe. They wanted legal predictability. On the other hand, they could not agree on the substantive principles of law, meaning the ethical rules and regulations that ought to be imposed on all members of society. They saw the formal rationalism of law as the “universal,” but substantive rationalism—ethics, in other words—resisted treatment by any universally agreed-upon human logic, since the existence of such a universal logic is perhaps the most outrageous myth of human autonomy. It has not existed since the Fall of man. The myth of intellectual or moral neutrality finally died in the final third of the twentieth century, but it enjoyed a long life and a lingering terminal illness.

1. Max Weber

Max Weber, writing of substantive rationality or value rationality, concluded: “There is an infinite number of possible value scales for this type of rationality, of which the socialist and communist standards constitute only one group. The latter, although by no means unambiguous in themselves, always involve elements of social justice and equality. Others are criteria of status distinctions, or of the capacity for power, especially of the war capacity, of a political unit; all these and many others are of potential ‘substantive’ significance.”¹² What is important is that no system of purely formal philosophical inquiry can determine which of these substantive or ethical systems is valid or universal. More than this, Weber concluded: formal rationality (legal predictability) will always be in tension with substantive rationality (ethics). Humanist ethics are always pluralistic. There is no unifying set of ethical principles that will unify mankind’s ethical vision; therefore, formal rationalism can never escape a dialectical tension with substantive rationalism.

Humanist scholars have singled out the operations of the free market as an example of this supposedly inescapable perpetual tension. The market is essentially a huge auction. Producers of goods and ser-of Law: Albert Venn Dicey, Victorian Jurist (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980).

12. Weber, Economy & Society, p. 86. A slightly different translation appears in Weber, The Theory of Social and Economic Organization, trans. Talcot Parsons (New York: Free Press, 1947), pp. 185–86.

vices sell to those who bid highest in terms of the monetary unit, irrespective of moral criteria, Weber said. Weber, as a liberal social democrat during his most productive years (1904–20), was willing to admit that formal rationality and substantive rationality did fit together quite well from the latter decades of the nineteenth century. “The reasons lie in the nature of the incentives which are set into motion by the type of economically oriented social action which alone is adequate to money calculations. But it nevertheless holds true under all circumstances that formal rationality itself does not tell us anything about real want satisfaction unless it is combined with an analysis of the distribution of income.”¹³

This supposed tension between efficiency and ethics has made the free market, both in terms of practice and theory, vulnerable to ethical criticism, and the critics have been both the socialists and the conservative traditionalists, sometimes joining together in their lambasting of the market.¹⁴ Why this two-sided ethical criticism of economic freedom? Tyrrell’s answer is incisive: both the socialist and the reactionary conservative share a hatred for the present. “Today’s socialist is not greatly different, in truth, from the reactionary. The latter idealizes a past that never was. The former idealizes a future that never will be. Both have an unscotchable and irrational yearning to escape the 13. Weber, Economy & Society, p. 109; Social & Economic Organization, p. 212.

14. Gertrude Himmelfarb, The Idea of Poverty: England in the Early Industrial Age (New York: Knopf, 1984), ch. 8: “The Tory Opposition: Paternalism and Humanitarianism”; Nisbet, Sociological Tradition, pp. 25–28. The best example of this is Engels’ use of the famous Sadler Committee’s (1832) criticisms of industrialism’s abuses against children: Condition of the Working Class in England in 1844 (1845). The Sadler Committee was headed by Michael Thomas Sadler, a Tory. On Sadler and the “high Tories,” see Robert Blake, The Conservative Party from Peel to Churchill (New York: St. Martin’s, 1970), pp. 21–25. See also E. P. Thompson, The Making of the English Working Class (New York: Vintage, 1963), pp. 342–43. It was the conservatives under Bismarckian Germany who brought in the first compulsory social welfare programs in the form of insurance schemes for workers, inaugurated in the early 1870s and expanded for almost two decades thereafter: accident insurance funded by employers (1871), sickness insurance (1883), old age insurance (1888): J. H. Clapham, Economic Development of France and Germany, 1815–1914 (Cambridge: At the University Press, 1966), pp. 336–37. This, however, was done as part of an overall anti-socialist program, a means of defusing worker unrest. This anti-socialist program failed to achieve its short-run objectives; the Social Democratic Party continued to grow. In 1890, when Bismarck proposed the desperation policy of abrogating the constitution, shrinking the franchise, and driving the Social Democrats out of existence, the new emperor, William II, threw Bismarck out of office: Geoffrey Barraclough, The Origins of Modern Germany (New York: Capricorn, [1946] 1963), pp. 426–27.

present or to destroy it.”¹⁵ Equally incisive is Clarence Carson’s observation that European conservatives and socialists share a common view of the state, that of a substitute father. The American tradition was originally very different. Not only did the Constitution’s framers separate church from state at the Federal level, they also separated parenthood from state.¹⁶

2. “Ethical” Critiques of the Market

The standard—indeed, nearly inevitable—criticism of the free market offered by socialist and reactionary critics is that, while the free market provides us with inexpensive goods and services, it nonetheless caters to those who have money to spend. Originally, socialists claimed that socialist economic planning is more efficient than decentralized, individualistic market planning. From Marx to the Fabians in Britain, this was their belief. As late as 1949, a British promoter of socialist planning could write of the British experiment in nationalization of industry: “Here at last a practical test of two vast and so far unproven assumptions is taking place. The first is that a planned socialist system is economically more efficient than a private-enterprise system; the second is that within democratic socialist planning the individual can be given broader social justice, greater security, and more complete freedom than under capitalism.”¹⁷ By the 1970s, the proponents of democratic socialism had abandoned the first assumption as erroneous, or at the very least, still unproven. The socialist economies had all failed the test of efficiency in the post-War world. Socialist scholars have grudgingly admitted over the years that free market economic incentives have led to a great outpouring of production. But, they say, this is not enough. They still assert that capitalism necessarily fails the second test, that of social justice. We have to see who gets the wealth. We have to see who is getting rich. We have to see if the needs of the people are being met. Ethics, not efficiency, must be our standard, socialists insist.

This humanistic appeal to ethics is illegitimate. The secular humanist logically cannot appeal to any universal ethical principle in order to criticize any economic outcome of market competition, precisely because there is no universally agreed-upon humanistic ethical system, and also because by the standards of rationalism, we cannot legitimately make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. We cannot legitimately, scientifically add up columns of costs and benefits for whole populations.¹⁸ We cannot subtract the “psychological quantity” (if such a thing existed) lost by one person as the result of some market event from the “psychological addition” gained by another person. I cannot estimate just how much I have gained in an exchange, and then compare it with just how much one of my competitors forfeited by not bidding higher than I bid. Therefore, the attempt of the humanists, whether free market defenders, or economic interventionists, or communists, to make scientifically valid statements concerning the success or failure of any economic system to “deliver the goods” for the benefit of mankind, is an attempt that must inevitably fail as a scientific endeavor.¹⁹ On the basis of scientific economics, no possible comparison of subjective utilities can be made, one participant’s vs. another’s.

15. R. Emmett Tyrrell, Jr., The Liberal Crack-Up (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984), p. 211.

16. Clarence B. Carson, The World in the Grip of an Idea (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1979), p. 289.

17. Francis Williams, Socialist Britain (New York: Viking, 1949), p. 5.

Any supposedly “scientific” evaluation between two rival economic systems is totally deceptive. The evaluator must make several assumptions beforehand about what criteria should be used for evaluating success or failure. Such assumptions are scientifically illegitimate. Why? First, there is no universal set of such standards. Second, if one person disagrees with the proposed standards, science or reason has no way to evaluate which criteria are correct. Third, even if we all agreed about these criteria, we could not be sure our assumptions are correct. Fourth, even if we could agree, and then also discover the truth of our agreed-upon standards, we lack the ability to evaluate the success or failure of any program or system, because we cannot tally up costs and benefits, disadvantages and advantages, losers and winners. Economists cannot make scientifically valid interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. This may not sound like a very important observation, but the problem of interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility has undermined the epistemology of every so-called science of economics or social welfare policy. To defend socialistic or free market programs of taxation, coercive wealth redistribution, free trade, or any other economic policy, economists must first scrap the whole structure of modern scientific economics, and then appeal to intuition or metaphysics as the basis of their proposed reforms.²⁰ They refuse to admit this, because this would not be in their self-interest. The show must go on.

18. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science (New York: St. Martins, 1932), p. 140. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

19. Cf. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

3. Humanistic Formal Law: A Vain Hope

The quest for a system of neutral formal law that also produces universally agreed-upon ethical benefits, and that does not limit the freedom of any of society's members, is a demonic quest. This is why the free market economists and legal theorists can never come to any agreement concerning the extent to which civil governments ought to interfere or refrain from interfering with the operations of the free market. They cannot agree upon the universally valid, or at least universally beneficial, formal legal rules. They certainly have not devised a theory of civil government that preserves the formal freedom of men to change their laws peacefully, yet which simultaneously guarantees full legal predictability to all market participants. This is one reason why nineteenth-century liberalism, which was democratic, decentralist, and free market-oriented, became twentieth-century liberalism, which is bureaucratic, centralist, and interventionist in economic policy. Nineteenth-century liberals wanted to defend political democracy as a means of preserving peaceful transfers of political power, yet they also wanted to preserve legal predictability for market transactions. As the philosophy of Western social philosophers (and then voters) shifted toward man-directing, bureaucracy-managing evolution, and away from man-responding, market-governed evolution,²¹ the formal rules of political democracy allowed the advent of market-disrupting changes in the "economic rules of the game." The formal rules of political democracy overcame the formal rules of legal predictability and equality before the law.

C. Legal Predictability and Judicial Sovereignty

What are some of the basic judicial aspects of a legal order that respects the rule of law? Joseph Raz listed eight convenient guidelines:

20. Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House, 1976). For a similar conclusion by radical economists, see Mark A. Lutz and Kenneth Lux, The Challenge of Humanistic Economics (Menlo Park, California: Benjamin/Cummings, 1979), pp. 67–69, 97–101.

21. North, "From Cosmic Purposelessness to Humanistic Sovereignty," Appendix A in Sovereignty and Dominion.

1. All laws should be prospective, open, and clear. One cannot be guided by a retroactive law that does not exist at the time of action.
2. Laws should be relatively stable.
3. The making of particular laws should be guided by open, stable, clear, and general rules.
4. The independence of the judiciary should be guaranteed.
5. The principles of justice must be observed—open and fair hearings, absence of bias.
6. The courts should have review powers over the implementation of the other principles.
7. The courts should be easily accessible.
8. The discretion of crime-preventing agencies should not be allowed to pervert the law.²²

The emphasis is on legal predictability. However, Raz was overly confident in the courts as protectors of human freedom through the rule of law. What is to prevent the courts from exercising the same sorts of arbitrary rule that are characteristic of legislatures and executives? By establishing the civil court system as finally sovereign, a defender of the rule of law violates the biblical principle of multiple sovereignties. He lodges absolute final sovereignty in a human institution. Freedom can never survive long under such an absolutist system. We have already seen in the United States the creation of what lawyer Carol Kilgore called judicial tyranny,²³ and what Harvard law professor Raoul Berger called government by judiciary.²⁴ As Berger concluded: "Let it not be said of us as Gibbon said of Rome: 'The image of a free constitution was preserved with decent reverence. The Roman senate appeared to possess the sovereign authority, and devolved on the emperors all the executive powers of government.' Here no Senate devolved the policymaking powers on the Court; they are self-conferred only because the American people are unaware that there is a yawning

22. Joseph Raz, "The Rule of Law and Its Virtue," in Robert L. Cunningham (ed.), Liberty and the Rule of Law (College Station, Texas: Texas A&M University Press, 1979), pp. 7–11.

23. Carol D. Kilgore, Judicial Tyranny (Nashville, Tennessee: Nelson, 1977).

24. Raoul Berger, Government By Judiciary: The Transformation of the Fourteenth Amendment (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1977).

gulf between judicial professions and practice.”²⁵

To preserve freedom, there must be constitutional provisions that reduce this grant of sovereignty to the courts. One such reduction specified in the U. S. Constitution is the ability of Congress to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Congress can determine what sort of cases can be appealed to the Court: “In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a state shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make” (Art. III, Sec. 2). Congress has the authority to limit the Court’s jurisdiction—the “exceptions.”²⁶ This has been an exceptional power in U. S. constitutional history, however, and only occasionally used.²⁷

Another important limitation is the jury system. A jury has the ability to decide both the law and the facts in any case. A “not guilty” decision of a jury is irrevocable under the common law rule against double jeopardy.²⁸ Two historians provided background.

The idea of the sovereign authority of the jury dates from the jury’s earliest appearance. During the Middle Ages the English jury replaced a system that included trials by battle or ordeal, by which the judgment of Heaven was thought to be manifest. The jury system

25. Ibid., pp. 417–18.

26. The Court declared in The Frances Wright (1882): “[W]hile the appellate power of this court under the Constitution extends to all cases within the judicial power of the United States, actual jurisdiction under the power is confined within such limits as Congress sees fit to prescribe. . . . What those powers shall be, and to what extent they shall be exercised, are, and always have been, proper subjects of legislative control. Authority to limit the jurisdiction necessarily carries with it authority to limit the use of the jurisdiction. Not only may whole classes of cases be kept out of the jurisdiction altogether, but particular classes of questions may be subjected to reexamination and review, while others are not.” Cited in Congressional Research Service, The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation, Annotations of Cases Decided by the Supreme Court of the United States to June 29, 1972 (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1973), pp. 752n–753n. Cf. H. Hart, “The Power of the Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic,” Harvard Law Review, vol. 66 (1953), pp. 1362ff.

27. One example is Ex Parte McCardle (1869), where Congress removed the Court’s jurisdiction over habeas corpus during Reconstruction. See Alfred H. Kelley and Winfred A. Harbison, The American Constitution: Its Origins and Development, rev. ed. (New York: Norton, 1955), pp. 479–80.

28. On double jeopardy, see Martin K. Friedlander, Double Jeopardy (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1969); Jay A. Sigler, Double Jeopardy: The Development of a Legal and Social Policy (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1969).

put the responsibility of judgment squarely upon the representatives of the community. Its sovereignty was emphasized by the familiar characterization of the jury as a "barrier . . . between the liberties of the people, and the prerogative of the crown" [Blackstone's Commentaries, V, p. 349]. Its almost plenary authority was evident in its familiar power to determine the law as well as the facts. When nineteenth-century judges began giving instructions on the law, formally limiting the jury's function to resolving disputed facts, juries nevertheless continued to exercise control over the law in certain cases by their acknowledged power to return a general verdict of guilt or innocence or without stated reasons.²⁹

Double jeopardy can and should be seen as an outgrowth of Christian legal procedure.³⁰ It represents an important barrier against the messianic expansion of central power. Local juries can always refuse to convict, which is what happened in the years prior to the American Revolution, especially in cases involving smuggling (violations of the British Empire's import restrictions in the colonies).³¹ This created major enforcement problems for the British bureaucracy. From the very founding of the United States, trial by jury was one of the legal pillars of the republic.³² That the Supreme Court in 1970 unilaterally decided that a six-man jury is adequate, thereby reversing 600 years of common law tradition, was no accident.³³ It was one more assertion of judicial sovereignty.

A related restriction on judicial sovereignty is the pardoning power. The U. S. Constitution grants this power to the President with respect to all Federal crimes, except Impeachment (Art. II, Sec. 2). State constitutions very often grant this pardoning power to the governor. Like jury nullification, this power is only exercised on a case-by-case basis; the decisions do not become binding as precedents.

The biblical principle of multiple human sovereignties points to the 29. DaHin H. Oaks and Marvin S. Hill, Carthage Conspiracy: The Trial of the Accused Assassins of Joseph Smith (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1979), p. 211. Cf. Mark De Wolfe Howe, "Juries as Judges of Criminal Law," Harvard Law Review, vol. 52 (1939), pp. 582ff.; Harry Kalven and Hans Zeisel, The American Jury (New York: Little, Brown, 1966), pp. 227-36, 286-97.

30. Greg L. Bahnsen, "Double Jeopardy: A Case Study in the Influence of Christian Legislation," The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, II (Winter 1975-76).

31. Charles M. Andrews, The Colonial Period in American History, 4 vols. England's Commercial and Colonial Policy, vol. 4 (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, [1938] 1964), pp. 224-26.

32. Berger, Government By Judiciary, pp. 399-400.

33. Ibid., ch. 22. The case was Williams v. Florida (1970).

necessity of creating checks and balances on all branches of civil government, including the judiciary. There should be no unitary institutional final court of earthly appeal for every conceivable kind of judicial dispute. For some sorts of cases, yes, by agreement among the other branches, but not for every type of case. Plural sovereignties in civil government are basic to the preservation of liberty. This is the insight of federalism. There must be no Pharaoh in Israel.

D. Law: Man's Discovery or Man's Creation?

The courts have become the law-makers of final appeal. They interpret the law, apply the law, define the law, and overturn the decisions of legislatures and executives. They have become sovereign in the West. They even make new laws retroactively. Legal scholar Gordon Tullock remarked that this writing of new law by the courts is "a bizarre characteristic of Anglo-Saxon law. . . ." ³⁴ He went on to state: "In general, laws should have only future effect, and individuals should not be punished for actions not contrary to the law at the time the actions occurred. The retroactive effect in our law comes from a fact that the judges in mythology were attempting rather to find out what the law actually was than to create new law; hence, when the Supreme Court ruled as to what the law was, this did not create a new rule—it simply made manifest what had already been true. I think this myth is not much longer believed. Unfortunately, the consequence of it—that is, retroactive effect of court decisions—is still with US." ³⁵

Tullock did not discuss the origin of this "myth" of judge-discovered law. The roots of this idea are Christian. Anglo-Saxon common law was originally based indirectly on Old Testament law. Canon law mixed Roman law and Old Testament law extensively. ³⁶ The language of the Old Testament, including Mosaic law, was used to support all the institutions of Christendom. From the very early stages of Anglo-Saxon law, there was a concept of a "higher law," a concept that governed the writing of the U. S. Constitution. ³⁷ Judges and legislators were supposed to search the Bible, and then search the principles of "right reason," in order to find what God requires from the civil gov-

34. Gordon Tullock, "Courts as Legislatures," in Cunningham (ed.), Liberty and the Rule of Law, p. 132.

35. Ibid., p. 134.

36. Berman, Law and Revolution, p. 204.

37. Edwin S. Corwin, The "Higher Law" Background of American Constitutional Law (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1955).

ernment. Rulers were not to make law; they were to discover God-made law—an eternally existing revealed law. This law was believed to be revealed in the Bible and also in the hearts of all men. Rulers were then to apply this law to specific circumstances. But this law was not to be applied retroactively, in the sense of punishing people who had never heard of such law. All men were to know the principles of the law because of their access to instruction in biblical law from priests and magistrates, and also from their own internal reflection based on “right reason.”

Hayek’s account of the origin of “judge-discovered law” indicates that the concept was originally Christian. It was a medieval idea, especially dominant in England. He stated quite openly that “it might also be said that it was because England retained more of the common medieval ideal of the supremacy of law, which was destroyed elsewhere by the rise of absolutism, that she was able to initiate the modern growth of liberty.”³⁸

This medieval view, which is profoundly important as background for modern developments, though completely accepted perhaps only during the early Middle Ages, was that “the state cannot itself create or make law, and of course as little abolish or violate law, because this would mean to abolish justice itself, it would be absurd, a sin, a rebellion against God who alone creates law.” For centuries it was recognized doctrine that kings or any other human authority could only declare or find the existing law, or modify abuses that had crept in, and not create law. Only gradually, during the later Middle Ages, did the conception of deliberate creation of new law—legislation as we know it—come to be accepted. In England, Parliament thus developed from what had been mainly a law-finding body to a law-creating one.³⁹

He might also have added that it was the American colonists’ hostility to the assertion of unlimited Parliamentary sovereignty in making laws that was a major factor in the coming of the American Revolution.⁴⁰ They believed, especially after 1770, that the common law of

38. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 163.

39. Idem.

40. Bernard Bailyn, The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1967), ch. 5; Edmund S. Morgan and Helen S. Morgan, The Stamp Act Crisis: Prologue to Revolution, rev. ed. (New York: Collier, 1963); R. J. Rushdoony, This Independent Republic: Studies in the Nature and Meaning of American History (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1964] 2001), ch. 4: “Sovereignty.” (<http://bit.ly/rjrtir>)

England could make void certain acts of Parliament, a doctrine taken directly from the writings of the early seventeenth-century English jurist Sir Edward Coke [COOK], who had greater influence on this point in the thinking of colonial lawyers before the Revolution than the Commentaries of Blackstone, who was a defender of Parliamentary sovereignty.⁴¹ The American ideal of the doctrine of judicial supremacy and constitutionalism was not invented by Chief Justice John Marshall.⁴²

Hayek traced the origin of Western legal liberty to the struggles between Parliament and Crown in the Puritan revolution or British Civil War, and subsequently in the Glorious Revolution of 1688.⁴³ There was a concerted effort to secure the independence of judges. The debates from 1641 to 1660 focused on the prevention of arbitrary actions by the civil government. Hayek even noted the influence of Puritan Samuel Rutherford's defense of the rule of biblical law: "Throughout, the governing idea was that the law should be king or, as one of the polemical tracts of the period expressed it, Lex, Rex."⁴⁴

This faith in biblical law, and subsequently the faith in independent natural law and right reason, began to wane as a result of rationalism and secularism, especially after Darwin, for Darwin destroyed men's faith in nature, including morality "naturally" in harmony with the forces of nature.⁴⁵ Because there is no longer a doctrine of fixed and infallible revealed law to govern the courts, and no longer any faith in a universal "higher law," the courts have become autonomous law-givers.

"Unfortunately," wrote Tullock, "although legislatures realized a long time ago that they were writing new law, the courts have only very, very gradually come to the realization that they are doing the same thing. Further, when they did realize sometime in the nineteenth century, that they were writing new law, they continued making their decisions retroactive. It is only in the past ten years that the U. S. Supreme Court has begun to act as if it realized it was making retroactive decisions. Up to that time, the Court had always acted as if any de-

41. Randolph G. Adams, Political Ideas of the American Revolution: Britannic-American Contributions to the Problem of Imperial Organization, 1765–1775, 2nd ed. (New York: Barnes & Noble, [1939] 1958), p. 141.

42. Ibid., p. 142.

43. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 169.

44. Idem.

45. R. J. Rushdoony, The Biblical Philosophy of History (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1969] 2000), p. 7. (<http://bit.ly/rjrbph>)

cision was the discovery of a preexisting law rather than the formulation of new law, although surely judges were aware of the hypocrisy of this position for a least a hundred years."⁴⁶

E. Democracy vs. Bureaucracy

Thus, with the abandonment of faith in revealed law that is open to both judge and jury, citizen and legislature, humanistic civil law has become perverse. Judges instruct juries to decide only in terms of the facts, not the validity of the law, when in fact the juries unquestionably have the authority and the power to interpret and apply both. Legislatures write new legislation, but they cannot easily preserve their own sovereignty; bureaucracies "interpret" these laws and are nearly autonomous in applying the laws in whatever way they want, in the name of the legislatures. Elitist law dominates. No layman is supposed to be able to understand the law. He must become subservient to the experts. Democracy, which is supposedly the process of widening the franchise and widening the base of political sovereignty, becomes progressively bureaucratic and elitist. Increasingly, elitist rule is governed by the principle of secrecy, or to reverse President Wilson's dictum, of "closed covenants secretly arrived at." Max Weber described the process well: "Every bureaucracy seeks to increase the superiority of the professionally informed by keeping their knowledge and intentions secret. Bureaucratic administration always tends to be an administration of 'secret sessions': in so far as it can, it hides knowledge and action from criticism. . . . Political parties do not proceed differently, in spite of all the ostensible publicity of all Catholic congresses and party conventions. With the increasing bureaucratization of party organizations, this secrecy will prevail even more."⁴⁷ The triumph of secret societies and secret accommodations in twentieth-century politics, both domestic and international,⁴⁸ was a product of the West's waning faith in God's revealed, open, and universally binding law.

We have come full circle. We are back to the pagan concept of true citizenship, based on membership in a clan that possesses secret knowledge. The pagan clan of antiquity was a bloodline clan, mitigated only by adoption. Citizens possessed the secret knowledge of the sacred rites—including political rites—through initiation into ritual mysteries. There are only formal differences between the two forms of pagan initiation, ancient and modern. Today, access to membership in the clan is also based on a kind of initiation, namely, the possession of specialized academic degrees or a certificate granted to those who have passed specialized examinations.⁴⁹ All of this has been accomplished in the name of the new religion, democracy, the apotheosis of mankind, but it has led to a new servitude, a new bondage, and to governing by arbitrary rules rather than universal law. The rhetoric of democracy—the sovereignty of the people—has led directly to its antithesis, the sovereignty of elites over the people in the name of the people. Weber wrote:

46. Tullock, "Courts as Legislatures," in Cunningham (ed.), Liberty and the Rule of Law, p. 135.

47. Max Weber, "Bureaucracy," in H. H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills (eds.), From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology (New York: Oxford University Press, 1946), p. 233. The same passage appears in Economy & Society, p. 992.

48. Carroll Quigley, Tragedy and Hope: A History of the World in Our Time (New York: Macmillan, 1966).

We must expressly recall at this point that the political concept of democracy, deduced from the “equal rights” of the governed, includes these postulates: (1) prevention of the development of a closed status group of officials in the interest of a universal accessibility of office, and (2) minimization of the authority of officialdom in the interest of expanding the sphere of influence of “public opinion” as far as practicable. Hence, wherever possible, political democracy strives to shorten the term of office by election and recall and by not binding the candidate to a special expertness. Thereby democracy inevitably comes into conflict with the bureaucratic tendencies which, by its fight against notable rule, democracy has produced. The generally loose term “democratization” cannot be used here, in so far as it is understood to mean the minimization of the civil servants’ ruling power in favor of the greatest possible “direct” rule of the demos, which in practice means the respective party leaders of the demos. The most decisive thing here—indeed it is rather exclusively so—is the leveling of the governed in opposition to the ruling and bureaucratically articulated group, which in its turn may occupy a quite autocratic position, both in fact and in form.⁵⁰

Tullock wants something better. He wanted a return to the “good old days” of simple, predictable laws. He knew that he is unlikely to get his wish. “A switch to a system in which the bulk of the law is a code and there is a central body which produces detailed glosses upon it, the whole thing being relatively short and compact, would reduce immense amounts of legal human capital to worthlessness. Thus, the lawyers have the combination of very strong feeling with which they have been indoctrinated, even stronger material grounds for wanting their present position to remain stable, and practically a monopoly of all decision-making posts in our present system. Under the circumstances, I doubt very much if my arguments here will have any political effect.”⁵¹ He blames the economic self-interest of the judicial elite for our plight, but the problem is far deeper. Our problem is the abandonment of Christianity and biblical law.

49. Weber, “Bureaucracy,” pp. 240–44; Economy & Society, pp. 998–1001.

50. Ibid., p. 226; Economy & Society, p. 985.

F. Hayek’s Dilemma: “Social Justice”

F. A. Hayek (1899–1992), whose intellectual roots were in late-nineteenth-century liberalism, produced a series of books dealing with formal law and market freedom. His most famous and influential book, The Road to Serfdom (1944), argued that economic intervention by the civil government would eventually destroy the institutions of political democracy, for the bureaucracies created by socialism would eventually concentrate decision-making powers in the hands of the central economic planners. Central economic planning, he argued, would have to result in central planning for everything, since all aspects of human life involve economic choices.

In his later book, The Constitution of Liberty (1960), Hayek argued for the rule of law. He proposed a system of law that would be universally understood, where the “rules of the game” would be known by all participants in advance, thereby reducing the arbitrariness and unpredictability of the bureaucrats. But he could not guarantee market predictability by means of universally applicable law, as his critics immediately reminded him. Civil law can be changed. The law system may be unfair from the very beginning, discriminating against those who become economically successful.

Hayek devoted the remainder of his distinguished career to the problem of legal order. He asked: How can we insulate the institutions of political democracy from those elements in society that are opposed to formal liberty, formal rationalism, economic inequality, and legal predictability? How can we preserve a working relationship between formal rationalism and substantive rationalism? He never came up with a generally acceptable answer—acceptable to free market defenders, let alone to envy-dominated socialists and Communist revolutionaries. We therefore need to examine his thinking in detail, for if he could successfully defend the humanistic ideal of the rule of law, then Christians should have much greater confidence in a defense of the Christian ideal of the rule of biblical law.

51. Tullock, in Cunningham (ed.), Liberty and the Rule of Law, p. 144.

Hayek did not equate liberalism with formal legalism as such. He said that liberalism also requires specific content to formal rationality, namely, constitutionally limited civil government.⁵² Coercion by the civil government must be restricted by constitutional and statute law. Only this will permit the establishment of what he called the “spontaneous order,” or (less felicitously but more revealingly) the “self-generating order” or “self-organizing structures.”⁵³ He wrote: “But if liberalism presupposes the enforcement of rules of just conduct and expects a desirable spontaneous order to form itself only if appropriate rules of just conduct are in fact observed, it also wants to restrict the coercive powers of government to the enforcement of such rules of just conduct, including at least one prescribing a positive duty, namely, the rule requiring citizens to contribute according to uniform principles not only to the cost of enforcing those rules but also to the costs of the non-coercive service functions of government which we shall presently consider.”⁵⁴

Hayek introduced the concept of “non-coercive service functions of government.” At this point, he made at least formal peace with the welfare state, and therefore with its system of tax-financed social security. He went on: “Liberalism is therefore the same as the demand for the rule of law in the classical sense of the term according to which the coercive functions of government are strictly limited to the enforcement of uniform rules of law, meaning uniform rules of just conduct towards one’s fellows.”⁵⁵ But what if these “uniform rules” discriminate against a particular economic group? The graduated income tax is one example. There are thousands of others, since virtually all of the modern welfare state’s legislation is economically discriminatory.

52. Hayek, Law, Legislation and Liberty, III, The Political Order of a Free People (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979).

53. Ibid., p. xii.

54. F. A. Hayek, “The Principles of a Liberal Social Order” (1966); reprinted in Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967), p. 165.

55. Hayek, Studies, p. 165.

1. The Preservation of Social Order: Market or State?

Hayek was caught in a dilemma. He wanted a social order that actually preserves order. He wanted a society that is rational, both formally and substantively. On the one hand, he wanted legal predictability (formal rationalism). He wanted equality before the law. The problem is, market competition produces economic winners and losers. "From the fact that people are very different it follows that, if we treat them equally, the result must be inequality in their actual position, and that the only way to place them in an equal position would be to treat them differently. Equality before the law and material equality are therefore not only different but are in conflict with each other; and we can achieve either the one or the other, but not both at the same time. The equality before the law that freedom requires leads to material inequality."⁵⁶ The losers can and do use democratic politics to redistribute the winnings in the name of social justice. He then observed, with considerable historical justification, "More than by anything else the market order has been distorted by efforts to protect groups from a decline from their former position; and when government interference is demanded in the name of 'social justice' this now means, more often than not, the demand for the protection of the existing relative position of some group. 'social justice' has thus become little more than a demand for the protection of vested interests and the creation of new privilege. . . ." ⁵⁷

On the other hand, he also wanted the civil government to provide a safety net, so that the social order of capitalism can be insulated against revolutionary shocks. He thought civil government can reduce social disorder by violating his earlier principle of "unequal results from equality before the law." Hayek wanted a minimum welfare state. "The reasonable solution of these problems in a free society would seem to be that, while the state provides only a uniform minimum for all who are unable to maintain themselves and endeavors to reduce cyclical unemployment as much as possible by an appropriate monetary policy, any further provision required for the maintenance of the accustomed standard should be left to competitive and voluntary efforts."⁵⁸

Which of Hayek's two irreconcilable arguments are we to believe?

56. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 87.

57. Hayek, Studies, p. 173.

58. Hayek, Constitution of Liberty, p. 302.

Hayek was stuck. Volume two of Law, Legislation and Liberty is titled, The Mirage of Social Justice. He proclaimed the idea of one law for all men. He proclaimed the benefits of general rules that are written without any attention to the specific individual results of such rules.⁵⁹ As a defender of methodological individualism, he attacked the very concept of social justice. Such a concept presupposes a hierarchy of collective ends. But we cannot as “scientific economists” speak of the “value to society” of any economic good or service.⁶⁰ We can only speak of a service’s value to individually acting men or to an organization. Society is not an organization; it is a spontaneous order. Civil government is an organization; society is not. “And, though the order of society will be affected by actions of government, so long as it remains a spontaneous order, the particular results of the social process cannot be just or unjust.”⁶¹ Thus, it is illegitimate to speak of social justice. Such a concept is anthropomorphic and immature.⁶² Society cannot act for a single purpose.⁶³ To whom can we appeal if we believe that the outcome of spontaneous and therefore unplanned market forces is somehow unjust? There is no answer.⁶⁴ The concept of social justice has meaning only in a command society.⁶⁵ The term itself has become an implement of demagoguery.⁶⁶

Having said all this, he nevertheless called for a state-imposed redistribution of wealth in the name of preserving social order. Yet he opposed socialism and democratic economic interventionism because such coercion is destructive of morality.⁶⁷ And then, as if to confuse everyone (including himself), he denied any belief in absolute morality.

2. Moral Relativism

He rejected the idea of transcendent law, whether “natural” or “personal,” for he was a defender of autonomous man and autonomous spontaneous social evolution. “The evolutionary approach to law (and all other social institutions) which is here defended has thus as

59. Hayek, The Mirage of Social Justice, ch. 7: “General Welfare and Particular Purposes.”

60. Ibid., p. 75.

61. Ibid., p. 32.

62. Ibid., pp. 62–63.

63. Ibid., p. 64.

64. Ibid., p. 69.

65. Idem.

66. Ibid., p. 97.

67. Hayek, Political Order of a Free People, pp. 170–71.

little to do with the rationalist theories of natural law as with legal positivism. It rejects both the interpretation of law as the construct of a super-natural force and its interpretation as the deliberate construct of any human mind.”⁶⁸ There is no overarching morality that governs society. “There can, therefore, be no absolute system of morals independent of the kind of social order in which a person lives. . . .”⁶⁹ He even went so far as to argue that if a Westerner discovers a dying, elderly Eskimo who has been put into the snow to die by his people, according to Eskimo customs, he should leave him in the snow to die. It would be “morally wrong” to do otherwise, unless the outsider is personally willing to support him in non-Eskimo society forever.⁷⁰

Hayek’s moral relativism could not sustain a vision of society without adopting pure anarchism, yet he could not bring himself to adopt anarchism, the logical outcome of full-blown methodological individualism. He still wanted the civil government to provide everyone—presumably even that aged Eskimo—with a safety net. “There is no reason why in a free society government should not assure to all protection against severe deprivation in the form of an assured minimum income, or a floor below which nobody need descend.” Why did he say this? Because he wanted to defend collective self-interest! Because he wanted to defend morality! “To enter into such an insurance against extreme misfortune may well be in the interest of all; or it may be felt to be a clear moral duty of all to assist, within the organized community, those who cannot help themselves.” We are back to two previously forbidden justifications of social justice: collective self-interest and moral duty. “So long as such a uniform minimum income is provided outside the market to all those who, for any reason, are unable to earn in the market an adequate maintenance, this need not lead to a restriction of freedom, or conflict with the Rule of Law.”⁷¹ Question: How is the civil government going to extract the economic resources needed to provide this safety net without interfering with the spontaneous order of the anarchistic free market order?

3. A Self-Contradictory System

He was trapped in a logical and moral dilemma. The state must use coercion to obtain the “safety net” money, he argued. But such tax-

68. Hayek, Mirage of Social Justice, p. 60.

69. Ibid., p. 27.

70. Idem.

71. Ibid., p. 87.

ation is innately immoral, according to Hayek, the anarchist. It also threatens the existence of the spontaneous order.

The predominant view today appears to be that we should avail ourselves in the main of the ordering forces of the market, indeed must in a great measure do so, but should 'correct' its results where they are flagrantly unjust. [This, in fact, is precisely what Hayek himself has argued in the passages I have just cited—G.N.] Yet so long as the earnings of particular individuals or groups are not determined by the decision of some agency, no particular distribution of incomes can be meaningfully described as more just than another. If we want to make it substantively just, we can do so only by replacing the whole spontaneous order by an organization in which the share of each is fixed by some central authority. In other words, 'corrections' of the distribution brought about in a spontaneous process by particular acts of interference can never be just in the sense of satisfying a rule equally applicable to all. Every single act of this kind will give rise to demands by others to be treated on the same principle; and these demands can be satisfied only if all incomes are thus allocated.⁷²

Here is Hayek, the all-or-nothing anarchist, holding forth bravely and decisively against Hayek, the defender of safety-net social justice. He refused to give an inch to the demands of the special-interest groups who would destroy the free market, intervention by intervention, tax by tax, safety net by safety net. But, in not giving an inch here, he could not logically give an inch anywhere else. Yet he did. So, his methodological walls came tumbling down, brick by brick, inch by inch.

The extent to which Hayek's thinking is not just muddled, but self-contradictory, testifies to the innate antinomies of humanist social thought. He had a great mind. He had sixty years to develop his ideas. He was diligent in mastering the scholarly literature relating to these questions. Yet he brought forth a heavily footnoted, self-defeating trilogy, the capstone of his life's work. The third volume is devoted to a classic piece of what he has called "constructivist" rationalism: an historically untested restructuring of the legislative, judicial and executive branches of civil government, complete with a "model constitution" (chapter 17). Here is "Benthamism" at its utopian worst—the same Benthamism that Hayek battled against throughout his long career.⁷³ In the second volume, he proclaimed forthrightly: ". . . we can always only tinker with parts of a given whole but never entirely redesign it.”⁷⁴ In the third, he proposed a total redesigning of every nation’s entire institutional system of civil government.

72. Ibid., p. 142.

73. Ibid. pp. 19–20.

4. Who Decides?

We are back to the age-old problem: The rule of which law-order? The rule of how much civil government? Hayek, in seeking formal rules of civil government—rules that will be applied to all citizens, irrespective of social or economic position—found that the humanistic logic of free market economics cannot be reconciled fully with the humanistic logic of social and political stability.

We are back to Weber’s dichotomy between formal rationalism and substantive rationalism. The ethics of society supposedly demands that the civil government intervene in exactly the way that Hayek says is most dangerous to freedom, namely, to preserve the economic position of a specific special-interest group. How can this protection be denied to all other special-interest groups that possess sufficient political power to rewrite the legislation? This is Hayek’s problem, and he devoted the second half of his illustrious academic career to a study of how to insulate a liberal free market society from the effects of the liberal democratic political order. Human logic did not give him his answer. There are too many logics, too many ethical views, and no way to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility.

Modern liberal democracy has eroded market freedom. Hayek’s eloquent defense of freedom in terms of evolutionary law and evolutionary morality has not retarded this erosion; if anything, it has accelerated it. As J. R. Lucas commented concerning Hayek’s defense, “he comes perilously close to a position of moral indifferentism and makes a great virtue of the market’s unconcern with moral merit. But this is, I shall argue, to expose free institutions quite gratuitously to the moral censure of moral men. The reason why the West has become increasingly critical of its economic arrangements is not that it has failed to deliver the goods—on the contrary, it has been spectacularly successful in doing that—but that the theory of them has failed to accord with our moral sentiments about society and has sometimes affronted our sense of justice.”⁷⁵

74. Ibid. p. 25.

75. J. R. Lucas, “Liberty, Morality, and Justice,” in Cunningham (ed.), Liberty and the Rule of Law, p. 150.

Conclusion

The Bible teaches the rule of law—God’s Bible-revealed law. It teaches that God is sovereign and that all people are under His authority. He has revealed a legal order to men. He enforces sanctions in terms of men’s adherence to these laws. He extends His kingdom by means of grace, but a grace that involves obedience to His law.

The legal order of the West was more committed to the rule of biblical ethics than any other. This produced the legal foundations of the free market social order. But humanists have attempted to explain the advent of the free market social order in terms of a non-revelational idea of civil law. They have stripped civil law of any supernatural origin or sanctions. Having banished God from their cosmos of discourse, they find that are unable to come to any agreement on what constitutes moral law. Without a Creator God, there are multiple gods by default, and most of them want to impose their self-interested law-order on their fellow men. As the fictional Lord Feverstone put it in C. S. Lewis’ novel, That Hideous Strength, “Man has got to take charge of Man. That means, remember, that some men have got to take charge of the rest. . . .”⁷⁶

It is never a question of law or no law. It is always a question of whose law.

76. C. S. Lewis, That Hideous Strength: A Modern Fairy-Tale for Grown-ups (New York: Macmillan, 1946), p. 42.

APPENDIX E

THE ECONOMIC IMPLICATIONS OF THE SABBATH

Six days may work be done; but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest, holy to the LORD: whosoever doeth any work in the sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death (Ex. 31:15).

Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the LORD: whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death (Ex. 35:2).

One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind (Rom. 14:5).

I see no way to avoid interpreting the Old Testament sabbath in terms of the explanatory case-law provided in Exodus 31:15 and Exodus 35:2. If we take these words at face value—and I see no way not to and still remain faithful to the text—then we must come to grips with the rigorous nature of the Old Testament sabbath. There were almost certainly exceptions to this universal prohibition against work, such as milking cows (in effect, giving rest to them) or serving as a law-enforcement officer, but the universal condemnation of working at one's occupation on the sabbath bore the strongest of all sanctions: the death penalty.

I also see no way to avoid interpreting the New Testament Lord's day in terms of Paul's injunction that every man should make up his own mind concerning the equality of, or special nature of, any particular day. More than this: If Paul's words are not to be interpreted as referring to the sabbath (along with other Hebrew days of celebration or fasting), then the death penalty still has to be imposed by the civil government on anyone who fails to observe the New Testament Lord's day as identical to the Old Testament sabbath.

Our explanation of how the sabbath functioned in Israel, and how it should (or should not) be observed today, must be governed by the words of Exodus 31:15 and Exodus 35:2. In short, if we argue that the death penalty is no longer to be imposed on people who work on the Lord's day, as I do, then we must present a case that the requirements of the Old Testament sabbath have been fulfilled by Christ and are now annulled, and that God has substituted new rules to govern the Lord's day, which is what I attempt to do in this appendix. On the other hand, if someone denies that there has been a fundamental break between the Old Testament sabbath and the New Testament Lord's day, then he must demonstrate exegetically how it can be that the God-ordained civil penalty has been abolished, but the moral and even ecclesiastical requirements concerning the observation of the Lord's day have remained essentially the same.

Why did God regard a violation of His sabbath as a capital crime? We have seen the answer in Chapter 24: Violating the sabbath involves a denial of the mandatory nature of rest for mankind. Such a violation involves the implicit assertion of man's autonomy. Such an assertion brings spiritual and eternal death. But why did God wait until after the exodus to announce that working on the sabbath is a capital crime? Probably because He wanted Israel first to understand what it meant to live under the domination of a self-proclaimed god-man who did not allow God's people to rest. In the recapitulation of the Ten Commandments in Deuteronomy, God gave them a different reason for honoring the sabbath: they had been in bondage to Egypt, and God had delivered them from this bondage (Deut. 5:15). He brought death to Egypt's firstborn; He would do the same to them if they failed to honor His covenant with them.

A key question then has to be considered: Why in New Testament times has the church never advocated such a harsh penalty? I hope to answer this question at the end of this appendix. The fundamental answer is that there has been a shift in the locus of sovereignty for sabbath enforcement: from civil government and ecclesiastical government to self-government (the individual conscience).

We have come at last to the really difficult issues, the issues of applied theology. We must consider these preliminary issues:

I. What was the Old Testament Sabbath?

- A. What were men supposed to do on the O.T. sabbath?
- B. What were the economic implications of the Mosaic sabbath, especially with respect to the division of labor?
- II. Is the New Testament Lord's day essentially the same as the O.T. sabbath?

A. Is there N.T. evidence of a shift: sabbath to Lord's day?

B. Is the Lord's day legally enforceable by the state today, as it was in the Old Testament?

C. What are the economic implications of the Lord's day, especially with respect to the division of labor?

Once we have a general idea of the answers to these questions, we can go on to other issues, such as the Old Testament's rescheduling of the Passover, and the possibility of rescheduling the New Testament Lord's day for people employed in unique occupations; the priestly exemptions from sabbath observance and their relationship to rescheduled worship in New Testament times; sabbath enforcement and the creation of a one-state world; proper leisure activities in New Testament times; and several other topics. But first, we need to understand better both the Old Testament sabbath and the New Testament's doctrine of the Lord's day.

I. Old Testament Sabbath

The Bible gives us almost no information about the activities of faithful Hebrews on the sabbath. We know something about what people did not do, but nothing for certain concerning what they did do, except on special sabbaths like the Passover, the day of atonement, and so forth.

The experience with the manna in the wilderness, before the law was given in a completed form to Moses, indicates that there was to be no cooking in Israel on the sabbath. The cakes made from the manna were to be cooked the day before the sabbath (Ex. 16:23). After Israel arrived in Canaan, this anti-cooking law may have been relaxed. The Bible does not say.

They were not to engage in commercial activity (Neh. 13:15–18). We know that evil men did not appreciate the sabbath, because they wanted to cheat buyers seven days a week (Amos 8:5). The man who gathered sticks on the sabbath was executed at God's explicit command (Num. 15:32–36). There is certainly the possibility that a stick-gatherer might be gathering sticks as a commercial venture. Jeremiah warned the people:

Thus said the LORD; Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the sabbath day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem; Neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the sabbath day, neither do ye any work, but hallow ye the sabbath day, as I commanded your fathers. But they obeyed not, neither inclined their ear, but made their neck stiff, that they might not hear, nor receive instruction. And it shall come to pass, if ye diligently hearken unto me, saith the Lord, to bring in no burden through the gates of this city on the sabbath day, but hallow the sabbath day, to do no work therein; Then shall there enter into the gates of this city kings and princes sitting upon the throne of David, riding in chariots and on horses, they, and their princes, the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem: and this city shall remain for ever. And they shall come from the cities of Judah, and from the places about Jerusalem, and from the land of Benjamin, and from the plain, and from the mountains, and from the south, bringing burnt offerings and sacrifices, and meat offerings, and incense, and bring sacrifices of praise, unto the house of the Lord. But if ye will not hearken unto me to hallow the sabbath day, and not to bear a burden, even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the sabbath day; then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched (Jer. 17:21–27).

Kindling a fire on the sabbath was forbidden (Ex. 35:3). If this law was disobeyed, God promised to kindle a fire in the gates of the city, meaning the seat of judgment. The gates, as the place of entry into the city, would be destroyed. The city would fall to a conqueror. God was serious about their not starting fires on the sabbath. His promised judgment—fire in the gates—reflected His rigorous standards in this regard.

A. What Were They Supposed to Do?

But what, specifically, were men required to do on the sabbath? They may have celebrated together at some form of formal worship service. The “holy convocations” described in Leviticus 23:3 may have constituted weekly sabbath worship services, although it is not clear that these services were conducted outside the home. “Six days shall work be done: but the seventh day is the sabbath of rest, an holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein: it is the sabbath of the LORD in all your dwellings" (Lev. 23:3). Israel's various seasonal feasts (holy convocations) are subsequently described in Leviticus 23, and these were unquestionably public feasts. Thus, it can be argued that the local Levitical priests who resided in each community called the weekly convocations together in some sort of public meeting place. But this is not absolutely clear from the text, and the specific details of these public worship services are nowhere described in the Old Testament.

A. T. Lincoln fairly described our present state of knowledge concerning the celebration of the Hebrew sabbath in Old Testament times: "The sabbath was not a day of total inactivity but was meant to provide rest and refreshment from the regular work of the six other days. It is true that this rest provided opportunity for devotion to the worship of God, that the Sabbath was called a 'holy convocation' (Lev. 23:2-3), that an additional burnt offering was required on every Sabbath (Num. 28:9,10), and that since it was done from obedience to God the resting itself could be considered an act of worship, but cultic worship was not a major focus of the Sabbath institution for Israel as this is reflected in the Old Testament."¹ This is my concern: to discern the major focus of the Old Testament sabbath. It was rest, not worship.

The Hebrews were supposed to delight themselves in God. In the oft-quoted words of Isaiah: "If thou turn thy foot from the sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the sabbath a delight, the holy of the LORD, honourable; and thou shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking [thine own] words: Then shalt thou delight thyself in the LORD; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it" (Isa. 58:13-14). They were to acknowledge the God-centered nature of creation.

What did it mean, "doing thy pleasure"? We are not told, except in reference to commercial activities and the common household chores of cooking, gathering sticks, and carrying burdens in and out. Idle talk was forbidden. But what kind of talk, specifically, constituted idle talk, "speaking [thine own] words"? We are not told. As far as the written record indicates, neither were the Israelites.

1. A. T. Lincoln, "From Sabbath to Lord's Day: A Biblical and Theological Perspective," in D. A. Carson (ed.), From Sabbath to Lord's Day: A Biblical, Historical, and Theological Investigation (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academe, 1982), p. 352.

The law said nothing about the legality, or even propriety, of the following activities: napping in the afternoon, walking in a garden (park), listening to music, going for a (non-commercial) swim, floating in a small boat, and having sexual relations with one's spouse. In short, there are no guidelines in the law concerning the limits of recreation and the beginning of work or "thy pleasure."

1. Recreation (Re-Creation)

When we think back to the garden of Eden, we are confronted with the obvious possibility of a walk through the garden, God's gift to man. This is a form of recreation. To forbid recreation in post-Edenic times seems ludicrous, yet certain problems arise as soon as we admit the legitimacy of recreation but deny the legitimacy of commercial activity.

Consider the rich man. He owns a large garden, a lake, and a boat. He chooses to spend his day of rest walking through his garden, going for a swim, and sailing. Has he broken God's law? Then consider the poor man. He owns no garden, but he has access to a nearby profit-seeking park. (In this book, I choose to avoid the question of the morality of tax-supported public parks. It is a relevant question, however.) There is a profit-seeking lake or swimming pool nearby. A firm will rent him a boat on Sunday afternoon. If the ban against profit-seeking activities includes recreation activities, then the poor man is limited. He cannot afford to buy the tools of recreation, yet he is also prohibited from renting them.

Christians cannot escape this problem. We must ask ourselves at least five questions. First, must we ban recreation on the Lord's day for all people, rich and poor, in order to avoid economic discrimination? Second, must we ban the poor or middle-class citizens from the delights of publicly provided recreation? Third, must we ban rentals of recreation services and implements on the day of rest? Fourth, must we see to it that the state confiscates funds through coercion in order to create "free" recreation services for the poor and middle-class citizens? Fifth, may we look upon sabbatical recreation capital of the rich man as a legitimate covenantal blessing that poorer men do not enjoy, and should not enjoy until God showers similar economic blessings on them?

There is also a sixth possibility. What if the rich invite the poor in to enjoy their wealth? What if the rich donate money to the church, or some other private charity, in order to create recreation facilities? This could be regarded as a weekly version of the “tithe of celebration” (Deut. 14:26–29).² Rich men could celebrate the sabbath by inviting all men in to enjoy the fruits of their labor. Charity-supported agencies might offer access to gardens, lakes, and so forth. Labor is donated: lifeguards, physicians, police protection, lost children booths, and so forth. Instead of profit-seeking labor, we find works of mercy.

In a predominantly rural society, most people could enjoy the sight of their fields. They could go for a stroll in the “garden.” In an urban society, people can go for a stroll to view front lawns. They can visit friends for a chat. But then we are back to another bothersome question: What constitutes idle talk? Talk about families? Talk about sports events? Talk about politics? Talk about the stock market? We are not told. Conscience must be our guide. But conscience is difficult to put into concrete legislative proposals. In fact, it is because men have not universally defined “idle talk,” that they resort to the language of conscience or circumstance.

If we take the Old Testament legislation seriously, we are faced with a conclusion that tends to alienate the guilt-manipulated and socialism-influenced Christian: The rich were allowed to enjoy recreation activities that were legally prohibited to the poor, who were not allowed to lease or rent such recreation implements or opportunities on the sabbath. It might be argued that the law allowed a man to buy a “seven days a week” ticket to recreation opportunities, but if someone had to collect tickets on the sabbath, or in some way monitor his profit-seeking operation on the sabbath, then any judge who understood basic economics would have shut down the operation as a sham, an attempt to escape the clear-cut prohibition on commercial activities on the sabbath. It paid to be rich on the sabbath. (Of course, it normally pays to be rich on the other six days of the week, too.)

Carrying burdens in and out of doors was illegal (Jer. 17:22). Profit-seeking work was illegal. But leisure is a consumer good. It must be paid for by forfeited income—income that is not earned during the leisure period. Leisure could be “stored up” in effect. It was legitimate to enjoy leisure on the sabbath, but only that kind of leisure which could be “stored up” in the form of capital goods: private gardens, private lakes, and so forth. This was clearly a subsidy to the rich.

2. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 35.

2. "Works of Mercy" in a Rural Society

Israel was a rural society. Certain daily chores are works of necessity on a farm, such as milking and caring for the animals. But what was done with the milk? Was it thrown away? Was it saved only for other animals? Was it given to the poor? If it was sold at a profit, then milking constituted profit-seeking activity, i.e., engaging in trade. Such sabbath violations would have been difficult to detect.

What about the use of such sabbath-produced milk by the family? This is an important question. If personal family use of the economic output of sabbatical "acts of mercy" (to the cows) is legitimate, then the definition of what constitutes profit-seeking must be narrowed. Engaging in commercial trade would be prohibited, but engaging in intra-household trade would not; one family member milks the cow, another cooks the food, another washes the dishes, and so forth. From the point of view of human action—exchanging one set of conditions for another set—the intra-family exchange seems to be equally profit-seeking, but perhaps not from the point of view of Old Testament sabbath legislation. The milk could be sold the next day. Wouldn't this constitute a violation of the sabbath? It certainly appears that way. But to consume the milk directly thereby increases the family's consumption as surely as the income gained from the sale of the milk would increase it. What is the economic difference, in terms of family income? More to the point, what is the biblical difference, in terms of the specific application of the law of the sabbath?

The strict sabbatarian would have to argue that the milk should be given away. Such a person is a defender of what Lewis Bulkeley called "the marathon sabbath." But is it the sabbath that God required of His Old Testament saints, let alone His New Testament saints? Unquestionably, the Old Testament did not prohibit output of effort as such; cows deserved to be milked, as an act of mercy, an act of giving rest (Ex. 23:12). But what about income that was the byproduct (i.e., unintended product) of such merciful labor? Should it have been given to the poor, or to household animals, but kept away from human family members? Or is giving food to one's own family itself an act of mercy?

If giving milk to one's own family or domestic animals is an act of mercy, then it is an act of mercy that has unintended economic consequences, namely, an increase of consumption that is not paid for by increased output (more milking) or more thrift (reduced consumption) during the days preceding the sabbath. Feeding one's family or animals with milk produced by sabbath milking would then be understood as being fundamentally different from gathering sticks for a fire on the sabbath, for sticks had to be gathered during the workweek and stored up for use on the sabbath. But wouldn't this "anti-stick-gathering" requirement have applied equally to milking, even though milk in this instance was a byproduct of acts of mercy? A strict sabbatarian would clearly have to insist that milk that is produced as a byproduct of an act of mercy be given to the poor, or spilled on the ground, or fed to farm animals, in order to make certain that such merciful work remained exclusively merciful and not an excuse for profit-seeking (cost-reducing) sabbath violations.

Thomas Gouge a contemporary of Owen and Baxter in seventeenth-century England, praised as shining examples three Christian physicians who refused payment for Sunday labor.³ I ask: Should the civil government make it illegal for people to receive payment for emergency services? And if it does, won't this reduce the number of emergency services offered, and thereby render it more dangerous to suffer an emergency on Sundays? This is the question of full pay for "normal" works of mercy or necessity performed by professionals, including people who are paid by the civil government: police, firemen, military forces, etc. Should those who perform such services on the sabbath be paid for that day's work? Christ defended the right of a man to pull a beast of burden out of a ditch, but does this imply that individuals can legitimately operate "beast-retrieval" companies at a profit on the sabbath? These are questions that strict sabbatarians should eventually deal with. They never do.

B. The Division of Labor in Rural Israel

Modern mass production, with its capital-intensive mechanization, is characterized by a high division of labor. Until the late-nineteenth century, agricultural societies were characterized by a comparatively low division of labor. In such societies, production is initially for the family unit. Surplus goods can be traded or sold, but there is not much surplus. Men work primarily for home consumption.

The workweek is scheduled in terms of the needs of the family. Wives can bake extra loaves on the day before the sabbath without disrupting normal production and distribution patterns. Husbands can cut extra wood for the fire on any day of the week. In ancient Israel, people structured their workweek's rhythm in terms of the sabbath. This did not involve a major interruption of supplies of needed goods and services. Where men are not continually serving each other through production for a market, but where they serve themselves and their families directly through labor, it is far easier to restructure the workweek to honor special feast days or sabbaths. A rural family can schedule its activities to include a day of rest.

3. On Gouge, see Richard Schlatter, The Social Ideas of Religious Leaders, 1660–1688 (London: Oxford University Press, 1940), pp. 129, 137.

In a rural society, it is also far easier to identify commercial activities, because there are fewer of them than in a modern, mass-production society. It is therefore easier to identify sabbath violations. A face-to-face society that is dominated by family and tribal ties offers men the opportunity to observe the daily affairs of their neighbors. While families might have hidden certain kinds of indoor commercial labor, it would have been difficult in ancient Israel to conceal agricultural labor in the fields.

Another important aspect of rural societies is the relative absence of 24-hour-a-day capital equipment, whether public or private. Power generation, telecommunications, repair services, hospitals, and similar services became commonplace in rural areas in the twentieth century, but only in industrial societies, or in urban areas of industrializing societies. The continuing dependence of urban society on such services stands in stark contrast to the traditional rural community, which has a lower division of labor, and which is far more self-sufficient. The interruption of "vital services" in a modern city could bring paralysis and breakdown. In a traditional rural community, such an interruption could not take place, because such vital services are not normally available. In other words, services that are vital to a modern urban community are not vital in a traditional rural society. Only in modern rural societies that are fully integrated into urban society through the market and shared public utilities would such services be regarded as vital. The seasonal and even weekly economic rhythm of a traditional rural society is far different from a modern industrial society. Traditional rural societies are not characterized by an extensive, even life-sustaining, division of labor.

The economy of Israel was not highly integrated. In the cities, civil rulers were influenced heavily by the Levites. Profit-seeking activities on the sabbath would have been difficult in cities whose civil rulers were highly influenced by sabbath law-enforcing priests. The cities of ancient Israel did not become dependent on a market order characterized by a high division of labor. I am arguing that God's sabbath requirements necessarily prohibited the creation of such an interdependent society. It is my contention that the annulment of the Old Testament sabbath laws by Jesus Christ was a necessary (though not sufficient) precursor to modern civilization.

If strict sabbatarians believe that I am incorrect in this conclusion, then they have an obligation to show how the authorities today would be able to differentiate between what constitutes an illegitimate sabbath violation and one that is acceptable. It should be clear that the enforcement of strict sabbath legislation in a traditional agricultural society will produce economic effects far different from those produced by such enforcement in a modern industrial economy. Because the effects are different, shouldn't the penalties be different? But the Old Testament did not offer any alternative penalties. It required execution of all sabbath violators—no “ifs, ands, or buts.”

Did the Mosaic law implicitly allow the authorities to redefine a sabbath violation in terms of social settings? Did an act of sabbatical defiance in a rural society become acceptable behavior in an urban setting because of its differing economic effects? Is an act that seems to be visibly (physiologically) the same, but that produces different consequences in different environments, really the same act? Or is it different? And if the act is different, should it be redefined, even though physiologically it is the same act?

If the Mosaic law did implicitly allow the authorities to redefine sabbath violations as non-violations, according to differing economic effects, then what are the distinguishing criteria that officials, whether ecclesiastical or civil, should adopt in order to determine which acts are legitimate, under which circumstances, and where? On the other hand, if the Mosaic law never did permit such redefinitions of a sabbath violation—and I do not believe that it did—then how could the Old Testament economy (meaning the Old Testament system as well as the Old Testament economic order) ever have progressed into the modern industrial West? (For more detailed arguments along these lines, see below: “Mass Production and International Trade.”)

II. New Testament Lord's Day

The various New Testament accounts of Christ's activities on the Hebrew sabbath provide us with evidence concerning the true nature of the Old Testament sabbath. Works of healing were basic to that sabbath, not as exceptional acts, but as acts that were integral to sabbath observance. Christ healed the withered hand of one man on the sabbath (Matt. 12:10–13). He also healed the crippled man who had been waiting for healing near the pool of Bethesda. Again, this was on the sabbath (John 5:1–17). He replied to those Jews who were critical of His action: “My father worketh hitherto, and I work” (John 5:17). They were to give rest. His general principle was this: “The son of man is Lord even of the sabbath” (Matt. 12:8). Again, “It is lawful to do well on the sabbath days” (Matt. 12:12b). (The King James English conveys the wrong message here. The Greek word is better translated to “do good,” not “do well.”⁴ Salesmen do well; servants do good.)

What is meant by Christ’s use of the word “work” in John 5:17? Work as a charitable service is in view, not work in one’s profit-seeking vocation. The Old Testament sabbath was a break from the ordinary routine of profit-seeking labor. Those activities associated with a man’s income-producing occupation were to be avoided.

A. Blameless Profanation

Nevertheless, there were exceptions to this rule. The obvious Old Testament exception was the routine labor of a priest. Christ replied to His critics: “Or have ye not read in the law, how that on the sabbath days the priests in the temple profane the sabbath, and are blameless” (Matt. 12:5). We are not told specifically which activities of the priests profaned the sabbath. They had to sacrifice two yearling lambs every sabbath, along with meal and drink offerings. Also, they had to maintain continual burnt offerings (Num. 28:9–10). Jesus said that they actually profaned the sabbath. This is a strong word to use. It could also be translated “desecrate.”⁵ They violated the requirements of the sabbath in the temple itself. Nevertheless, they were held blameless before God. The importance of their labor in the sight of God made them blameless. They were following a higher command. They were offering the blood sacrifices that were required by God to cover the sins of His people.

The context of Jesus’ remarks on the profaning of the sabbath is important. He and His disciples had been criticized for having walked through fields on the sabbath, plucking grain to eat. This was not theft,

4. Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, trans. by William F. Arndt and F. Wilbur Gingrich, 2nd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), p. 401: “kalose, [3].”

5. Ibid., p. 138: “bebeilao.”

according to Old Testament law; neighbors had legal access to a handful of the fruit of the ground (Deut. 23:24–25).⁶ Jesus was not criticized for having picked the grain. He was criticized for having taken it on the sabbath (Matt. 12:1–2).⁷

What was Christ's answer? He pointed to David's taking of the showbread from the temple on the sabbath (Matt. 12:3–4). Here was a far more culpable act, for it was not lawful for David or his followers to eat the showbread, because it was reserved for the priests (v. 4). The priest himself had suggested that David take the hallowed bread (I Sam. 21:21–24). Yet God commanded that this showbread be set before Him at all times (Ex. 25:30; Num. 4:7). But the needs of men were more important in this instance, a fact recognized by the priest. On the one hand, the priest had to offer sacrifices. On the other hand, David had to flee from the wrath of Saul. Both requirements were cases of necessity. But the priest told David to eat the showbread. How, then, could the priests of Jesus' day legitimately criticize Him?

Jesus' healing of the man with the withered hand was a work of mercy. Traditional Christian sabbatarianism has always made exceptions of these two works, necessity and mercy. But necessity and mercy impose even greater pressures on men's actions than merely offering exceptions to the sabbath requirement against labor. Necessity and mercy require positive action. This is acknowledged by the Westminster Confession of Faith (1646), a pro-sabbatarian document, which forbids men to think "about their worldly employments and recreations," and requires them to take up "the whole time, in the public and private exercises of His worship, and in the duties of necessity and mercy."⁸

The priests of the Old Testament profaned the sabbath, yet they were blameless. The office of priest, coupled with a mandatory assignment from God, permitted the profaning of the sabbath. Indeed, it required it. Yet David was not a priest, nor were his men. This points to the truth of Christ's words, that the "Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath day" (Matt. 12:8). In His incarnation, as the son of man, Christ ruled the sabbath. The account in Mark is even clearer: "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath" (2:27–28). When human life and health are at stake, the sabbath may be profaned without blame. It must be profaned. When an assignment by God to a priest is in question, the sabbath may be profaned without blame. Again, it must be profaned. But then we face some very difficult questions: How can we tell when human health and life are at stake? Who is the true priest? What is a God-given assignment?

6. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 58.

7. Gary North, Priorities and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Matthew, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 26.

8. Westminster Confession of Faith, XXI: VIII.

B. Transformation: The Lord's Day

1. A Different Day

In the New Testament, the first day of the week is called the Lord's day (Rev. 1:10), but it is never called the sabbath. Unquestionably, there was a shift from the seventh day of the week to the first. The evidence also points to a shift from sundown-to-sundown celebration to a sunrise-to-sunrise celebration.⁹ These are very important changes. They involve a radical break with the Hebrew sabbath. F. N. Lee, in his defense of the New Testament sabbath, argued explicitly that the entire system of Mosaic sabbaths and holy days was abolished by Christ. He cited Paul's epistle to the Colossians: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath [days]" (2:16). (The last word, "days," was added by the King James translators; it should read simply, "sabbaths.") Lee concluded:

Now these ceremonial sabbaths, listed in Leviticus 23 together with the Israelite Sinaitic weekly sabbath, are all called "feasts" of holy convocation or "holy days"; and all involve the keeping of a "sabbath" day or a "day of holy convocation" on which "no servile work is to be done," or a "day of solemn rest." They were all a shadow of the things to come, namely the benefits of the New Testament in Christ; and they were all blotted out and nailed to His cross. . . . So Paul means exactly what he says. It is useless to argue (as S.D. Adventists do) that St. Paul here means the ceremonial sabbaths by his words "or the sabbath (days)," for St. Paul has just a few words beforehand (in the very same verse) dealt with such ceremonial sabbaths under the blanket term "holy day"—the same term (heortai) used in the Septuagint of Lev. 23 to refer to all the (Sinaitic) sabbaths—both the ceremonial sabbaths and the "weekly" sabbath of Israel, Lev. 23:2–3. . . . If it is argued that Paul means (only) the ceremonial sabbaths in Col. 2:16 where he refers to "the sabbath day(s)," then which days is he referring to under the blanket term "holy days" just mentioned previously in the very same verse? The two can hardly be synonymous, for Paul would then be repeating himself, saying in effect: "Let no man therefore judge you . . . in respect of a ceremonial sabbath or a new moon or a ceremonial sabbath," when the latter phrase would simply be idle repetition.¹⁰

9. See Appendix B.

Lee argues that the day of rest, or sabbath, is part of God's moral law, and therefore it is still in effect. But the Old Testament sabbath is gone. In other words, the theological justification for switching to the first day of the week is that the older sabbath is absolutely abolished, and a new one is morally binding. There was a total break at Calvary with the Mosaic law's sabbath.

There seems to be no exegetical way to escape Lee's treatment of Colossians 2:16. Paul was not speaking of ceremonial sabbaths, but the Mosaic sabbath. It is gone forever. The fact that the church celebrates a new day should testify to this theological fact. But then a crucial question has to be answered: How much of the Mosaic legislation has been abolished along with the day of the week and the hours of the day? A clean break has been established with respect to the day of the week. On what basis, then, can the church recommend that the Old Testament sabbath law be enforced by the civil government? The testimony of almost 2,000 years of church history provides at least a partial answer: The church has not committed itself to a full-scale revival of the Mosaic sabbath legislation.

The principle of interpretation that is supposed to govern Christian orthodoxy is that Christ came to establish, confirm, and declare the Old Testament law. Only if we find an explicit abandonment of an Old Testament law in the New Testament, because of the historic fulfillment of the Old Testament shadow, can we legitimately abandon a detail of the Mosaic law. But modern Christians reject this principle of interpretation, so they tend to make things up as they go along. Sometimes they just go along, not bothering to make things up.

In the case of the Mosaic sabbath, Paul provides us with full justification for just this sort of abandonment. We no longer enforce the Mosaic provisions, because the Mosaic sabbath ended at Calvary. We have a new day of rest, and we dare not arbitrarily select some of the Old Testament sabbath definitions, restraints, and legal sanctions without taking them all. But we have no exegetical grounds for taking them all, since the very change in the day of celebration, not to mention Paul's explicit teaching regarding the locus of responsibility for enforcement (the conscience), testifies to the break with the past.

10. F. N. Lee, The Covenantal Sabbath (London: Lord's Day Observance Society, 1972), pp. 28–29.

The biblical account of what constitutes a week unquestionably establishes as definitive six days of work and a day of rest or feasting. God's originally creative week was a six-one pattern, while Adam's subordinately re-creative week was supposed to be a one-six pattern.¹¹ Adam's rebellion led to a curse: God's imposition on man of a God-imitating six-one pattern, with rest to come only at the end of man's week.

Jesus Christ, by redeeming His people, annulled the six-one pattern of the cursed week. He did not restore the original (pre-Fall) pattern of one-six, because He changed the day on which the Lord's day is celebrated to the day after the Hebrew sabbath—what Christian commentators for at least 1,800 years have called the eighth day. Therefore, He established a one-six-one pattern—rest, work, and judgment. This judgment comes on the day of the Lord, the archetypal Lord's day. This is why the Lord's day is celebrated in New Testament times on the day following the Hebrews' seventh-day sabbath. It points to the final judgment and the inauguration of a new week, the full manifestation of the New Heaven and the New Earth. The first day of redeemed man's week is now the eighth day after the initiation of God's work, not the seventh day after. It represents a re-creation, a new week that re-establishes a one-six pattern, but that also implies the one-six-one pattern as a herald of the total regeneration and re-creation of all things. The shift to the eighth day testifies to Christ's new creation.

2. Conscience: The New Locus of Enforcement

Paul was concerned with the souls and consciences of his readers. The Colossians passage mentions meat, drink, holy days, and sabbaths. Paul was doing his best to convince his readers that there had been a definitive break from Old Testament law with respect to these four features of Hebrew life. He knew that Judaizers were criticizing the Christian Hebrews for their abandonment of these external tests of faith, and he did not want his readers to feel guilty. No one could legitimately judge them with respect to these four issues. No one could turn to the Mosaic law and confront them with the Mosaic rules, instructions, and regulations regarding meat, drink, holy days, and sabbaths. This did not mean that the old rules had been evil. It meant that the Judaizers had no right to criticize Christians for no longer adhering to the old forms. New applications of the Old Testament's general principles in these four areas are now binding in New Testament times.

11. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 6.

Paul repeated this teaching to the church at Rome. In Romans 14, Paul covers much the same ground. Those who are weak in the faith are not to be distressed by rigid theological criticism. Paul observed that there are debates within the churches concerning the proper foods and the proper holy days. Judgment of each other should not go on in these areas of disputation. Men must decide for themselves which foods to eat or which days to celebrate.

For one believeth that he may eat all things; another, who is weak, eateth herbs. Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth: for God hath received him. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand. One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks. For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and the living. But why dost thou judge thy brother? Or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? For we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ. For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God. Let us not therefore judge one another any more: but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way (Rom. 14:2–13).¹²

The Lord's day, the first day of the week, has been set apart by Christ for His church as a day of worship, fellowship, and communion. This, above all, is the church's testimony to the day of rest. Members are required to attend a worship service with their fellow believers. "And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works: Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is . . ." (Heb. 10:24–25a). We must not forsake other members. We are to help each other.

12. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 14.

Some members may view all days the same. So be it. Good men have taken this position historically. Zwingli was one of them.¹³ But Zwingli attended church on Sunday, because he would not forsake the brethren. The pattern of one day in seven for rest from one's normal labors is formalized in the worship services themselves. We need not badger each other about the specifics of Old Testament law regarding the Lord's day, Paul said, because no one should judge another on this matter. Participation in the required church service or fellowship, which has been on the first day of the week ever since the day of Christ's resurrection, is sufficient testimony.

3. Worship: A New Testament Emphasis

Perhaps strict sabbatarians are unwilling to take Paul's words at face value. Yet the ironic aspect of strict sabbatarianism is this: Without the definitive break with the Mosaic sabbath, the sabbatarian's emphasis on Sunday worship reduces his case's biblical support. How can the sabbatarian consistently argue for full continuity of the Lord's day with the Old Testament sabbath, when the Old Testament sabbath was primarily a day of rest rather than a day of worship? The New Testament Lord's day focuses on the worship requirements, not the rest requirements.

The Old Testament sabbath was primarily a day of rest, of cessation from profit-seeking labor. Sabbath worship, if it is mentioned at all, is only mentioned indirectly (Lev. 23:3). There were no prohibitions against recreation. There were only prohibitions against labor. The modern sabbatarian's emphasis on the Lord's day primarily as a day of worship must be drawn from a handful of references in the New Testament that show that the church met on resurrection day to worship. It is possible to make a case against doing "thy pleasure" on the sabbath by appealing to the Old Testament, but it is not possible to make a case for the Lord's day as a day primarily devoted to worship by appealing to the Old Testament.

To define the sabbath primarily in terms of corporate worship, rather than primarily as a day on which no commercial trade is permitted, raises some exceedingly difficult questions for strict sabbatarians. First, if honoring the first day of the week requires that sabbath violations be prohibited by civil law, then the law is being enforced on all people in a particular society. If this is what the New Testament requires, then any sabbath-enforcing society is thereby admitted to be covenanted under God. This is an inescapable relationship: state-enforced sabbath laws and the existence of a covenant. There are many defenders of various sabbath laws today who categorically deny that any New Testament society is ever covenanted under God in the way Mosaic Israel was—a viewpoint not shared by seventeenth-century Puritans and Scottish Presbyterians. This is especially true in the American South, where “blue laws” that prohibit certain businesses from operating on Sunday, or that prohibit certain products from being sold in supermarkets on Sunday, are voted into law time after time by covenant-denying Southern Baptists, Methodists, and Church of Christ members. I cannot explain this; I only report it.

13. Lee, Covenantal Sabbath, p. x.

Second, there is the problem of the Lord’s day as primarily a day of worship. If the Old Testament’s sabbath-enforcing civil law is still binding in New Testament times, and if the Lord’s day is understood as predominantly a day of worship (as the Westminster Confession and most Calvinistic pastors assert), then the civil magistrate ought to enforce compulsory worship on all members of a (covenanted) society upon threat of death.

The New England Puritans went at least part of the way down this path. They legislated compulsory worship, and they banished sabbath violators from Massachusetts and Connecticut in the early years. Even this half-hearted attempt to imitate the Old Testament only lasted a few years. There were more and more church absentees, until by the middle of the seventeenth century, the churches of New England could not have held the whole population, had everyone decided to visit on some Sunday morning.¹⁴ Eventually, “blue laws” replaced the threat of banishment for failure to attend church in New England.

Modern sabbatarians have refused to become consistent. They do not pressure the civil government to establish a death penalty for

14. Carl Bridenbaugh wrote: “A consideration of the number and seating capacities of village meeting houses and churches demonstrates the sheer physical impossibility of crowding the entire village populations into their houses of worship. At no time after 1650 does it seem possible for the churches of Boston to have contained anywhere near a majority of the inhabitants; in 1690 little more than a quarter of them could have attended church simultaneously had they been so disposed.” Bridenbaugh, Cities in the Wilderness: The First Century of Urban Life in America, 1625–1725 (New York: Capricorn, [1938] 1964), p. 106.

Lord's day desecrations, and they certainly avoid the obvious conclusion concerning the Lord's day as a day of worship, namely, compulsory church attendance, enforced by the civil government.

4. The New Testament Church's Celebration

What Paul was asserting should be clear to anyone who reads Romans 14. Not only do those outside the church have varying opinions concerning a day of rest, or special holidays; even those inside the church have varying opinions. We see in the twenty-first century that the same situation still exists. The debates went on during the Protestant Reformation, too. The Old Testament sabbath laws were absolute in the sanction involved—the death penalty—and they were negative in effect. They told men what not to do, one day in seven. The New Testament's emphasis shifted on the day of resurrection. The first day of the week is now a day of communion between God and His church. It involves a positive, loving corporate celebration. It involves preaching (Acts 20:7–12), singing (Matt. 26:30; Col. 3:16), praying (I Cor. 14:15), and a communion feast (I Cor. 11).

The testimony of the church is that there is indeed a very special day of celebration, of feasting and sharing the blessings of salvation. If the early church in first-century Israel had wanted rest more than the experience of true communion, it would have met for communion on the Hebrew sabbath, because the Roman authorities acknowledged the right of the priests to require a day of rest. But the early church broke with rest on the first day of the week in order to celebrate communion on the evening of that first day. They rested on the Hebrew sabbath, worked on the Lord's day, and gathered together in the evening. They rested—assuming they did rest, which seems reasonable—on a day different from the day of worship, at least in Israel. In gentile cities in the Roman Empire, they probably could not rest even one day in seven. But they celebrated on Sunday evening after work.¹⁵

The historical circumstances of the early church necessitated compromises with the sabbath principle. Had there been no break from the Old Testament requirement of a full day of rest one day in seven, the church would have been bottled up in Israel, because the Roman Empire did not honor the rest principle. Had the legal obligation of resting on the sabbath been the binding obligation, then the early church, dwelling in Israel, would have had to take two days off: the Hebrews' day (legally binding) and the Lord's day (religiously binding). But this would have violated the more important pattern of one day of rest and six days of labor.¹⁶ The church, in short, was forced to break with the Hebrew sabbath. God, in His grace, abolished the Hebrew sabbath on the day of resurrection, so that church members could rest on the seventh day (Saturday) and celebrate on the evening of the first day, which was a working day in Israel. They could do this in good conscience precisely because they knew that God honored their faith. Like the priests who sacrificed on the sabbath, profaning it blamelessly, the early Christians worked on the Lord's day, profaning it, but this was not held against them.

15. "It is certain that the eucharist was at first an evening meal. The name (deipnon) implies this." Wilfrid Stott, in Roger T. Beckwith and Wilfrid Stott, The Christian Sunday: A Biblical and Historical Study (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1980), p. 89.

This is not to say that the ideal situation is not the Lord's day as a day of rest and worship, universally recognized, universally respected, except in cases of emergency or merciful labor. But Paul was careful to warn the church at Rome that it should not burden its new members with rigorous regulations concerning a special day of the week. Yes, they were to commune together. But whatever they did on the Lord's day—and in Rome, most of them must have worked—they were to do it in faith. The sabbath ideal is to grow out of respect for the principle of resurrection, the basis of man's release from sin and eternal death. The institutional church sets the pattern with its special day of worship, which can be made binding on members (Heb. 10: 25). But it cannot legitimately force its members to honor the one-six pattern of rest. That pattern is built into Christ's kingdom, but Paul made it clear that the conscience is to guide men to this conclusion, not compulsion. In fact, he was writing against one man's criticizing another—moral compulsion. If moral compulsion is forbidden, then how much more ecclesiastical compulsion? And how much more than this, compulsion by the civil government?

5. The Early Church Fathers on Rest vs. Worship

This distinction between Sabbath rest and Lord's day worship was unquestionably made by the early church fathers. Until the fourth century, church fathers generally condemned the "idleness" of the Jewish sabbath, and commanded church members to devote Sunday to worship and acts of mercy. Bauckham commented: "For Tertullian, the meaning of the Sabbath commandment for Christians was 'that we still more ought to observe a sabbath from all servile work always, and not only every seventh day, but through all time.'¹⁷ It is entirely clear that for all these writers the literal commandment to rest one day in seven was a temporary ordinance for Israel alone. The Christian fulfills the commandment by devoting all his time to God. The rationale for this interpretation depended, of course, on a wholly 'religious' understanding of the commandment; no writer of the period betrays any thought of its being a provision for needed physical rest. The Jewish form of observance was therefore 'idleness.' The commandment was really about devotion to God. . . . This was the basic principle from which the Fathers argued that literal Sabbath observance was not required of Christians."¹⁸ In short, "It must be stressed that, outside Jewish Christianity, all second-century references to the Sabbath commandment either endorse the metaphorical interpretation or reject the literal interpretation as Judaistic or do both."¹⁹ The church fathers were so adamant about this distinction that they condemned mere abstinence from normal work as idle. "The Fathers could see no value in inactivity and hardly ever recognized in the Sabbath commandment provision for necessary physical relaxation."²⁰ Bauckham cited the Syriac Didascalia (c. 250?): "Daily and hourly, whenever you are not in church, devote yourselves to your work."²¹

16. I am defining "merciful labor" as that activity which gives rest to others, both animals and humans. I argue in this appendix that it is morally and legally valid to sell merciful labor on the Lord's day.

In the fourth century, Christians often began to imitate Jewish customs. Again, citing Bauckham: "This Judaizing tendency was a grass roots tendency that the authorities of the church opposed. The Council of Laodicea (A.D. 380), for example, legislated against a series of Judaizing practices including resting on the Sabbath (canon 29). It seems that while the popular tendency was to imitate the Jewish practice, the authorities often responded by insisting on a specifically Christian kind of Sabbath observance sharply distinguished from the Jewish kind. The Sabbath was not to be observed in 'idleness,' imitating the Jews, but as a day of Christian worship when the New Testament Scriptures were read and as a commemoration of God's creation

17. Tertullian, An Answer to the Jews, ch. IV.

18. R. J. Bauckham, "Sabbath and Sunday in the Post-Apostolic Church," in Carson (ed.), From Sabbath to Lord's Day, pp. 266–67.

19. Ibid., p. 269.

20. Ibid., p. 282.

21. Ibid., p. 286.

of the world through Christ”²² It was Constantine, in 321, who first legislated Sunday rest. He specified Sunday as “the most honourable day of the Sun.” He may have done so to promote sun worship, as well as to placate Christians.²³ As soon as the state got involved in sabbath legislation, there was theological confusion and compromise.

C. Civil Government

1. Negative Sanctions

What is the proper “sabbatarian” role today of the civil government? One very distinct possibility is this: The civil government should declare null and void any labor contract that requires a person to work seven days a week as a condition of employment. This is a contract against conscience, comparable to requiring a woman to commit illicit sexual acts as a condition of employment. Businesses would be compelled to honor the desires of employees to take one day off per week—and that day would probably be the first day of the week. The compulsion here is essentially negative: The state may prohibit economic coercion against people’s consciences, when their consciences are based on an explicit statement of the word of God.²⁴ The Bible is quite explicit about resting from our occupations one day in seven. Nevertheless, Paul acknowledged that some men may not see this, and that apart from required church attendance, they should not be molested or made to feel guilty.

The Bible teaches us about Christian maturity. The Old Testament’s death penalty for sabbath violators was stark and entirely negative. Men were not to be governed primarily by conscience in questions regarding the sabbath. They were to be governed by fear. They were told what could not be done. They were treated as children. With the coming of Christ and the victory He sustained at Calvary, His people have been given positive requirements concerning worship on His day. They are to meet corporately to celebrate and worship (as they may have been required to do in the Old Testament: Lev. 23:3). Overnight, the disciples were given a new vision. Overnight, the com-

22. Ibid., pp. 261–62.

23. Ibid., pp. 280–81.

24. In the summer of 1985, the U.S. Supreme Court overturned state legislation that made it illegal for employers to compel individuals to work on Sunday as a condition of employment. Thus, the Supreme Court has made illegal the one type of Lord’s day legislation that the New Testament implicitly sanctions.

pulsion of the civil government regarding the Lord's day ended. Overnight, the sabbath became primarily a positive requirement of corporate worship, without the civil penalty of execution for working on the sabbath. Overnight, the question of a day of rest on the Lord's day became a matter of conscience. It had to; the Jewish leaders were not about to make the Christian equivalent of the sabbath compulsory as a day of rest.

As the theological insight of men improves over time, they will come to recognize the implications of God's creation week (six-one) and covenant man's re-creative week (one-six). They will recognize the necessity of a day of rest—a moral, physical, and economic necessity. When they do, they will make economic decisions and social decisions that will indirectly pressure recalcitrants into honoring the Lord's day. For instance, if Christians refuse to go out to shop on Sunday, there will be no economic incentive to keep stores open on Sunday, except to sell to non-Christians. If most people in a society are eventually converted, or at least honor the Lord's day externally, then there will be almost no economic incentive to remain open on Sunday. But a person's conscience is the guide in New Testament times, not civil compulsion.

Because the day of the Lord is now a day of communion, Christians will try to see to it that they get time off for Sunday worship whenever possible. They will not work as professional football players. They will not pay money to go to professional football games. They will not watch professional football games on television, nor will they buy the products advertised during Sunday sports events—at least, not because they are advertised during Sunday sports events. Christians will increasingly honor that day as a day of worship for almost all, and therefore of a day of cessation of income-producing labor for almost all. The new Christian sabbath—cessation from normal work—is a byproduct of worship on the Lord's day. Christians will do their best to schedule their jobs to give themselves a day of rest. As more and more people do this, more and more occupations will find it economically profitable to honor the desires of their maturing Christian employees. Sunday will become most people's day of rest, including professional athletes. Only those occupations that serve the needs of resting people—public utilities, emergency services, and restaurants (where wives get a break from the normal work week)—will still be profitable on Sunday.

The state in New Testament times is to leave men free to act positively; its role is to suppress lawless acts of violence and fraud. It is not to make men positively good; it is to restrain them from committing evil, public acts. When the God-revealed emphasis of the sabbath changed from a day of no work to a day on which God mandates corporate worship, the state's role also changed. I am not arguing here that there was unquestionably no public, corporate aspect of sabbath-worship in the Old Testament, but only that whatever the nature of this corporate worship may have been, the specifics of such worship services did not receive any attention in the Old Testament. There is no mention of tithes being collected on sabbath-day meetings, or psalms being sung, or a communion meal being shared, or lectures from a Levite. Such events may have taken place, but there is no direct evidence. In the New Testament, such events are mentioned as taking place in corporate worship on the Lord's day. Thus, I am arguing that there is a change of emphasis in the New Testament, and the specifics of biblical revelation testify to this change. Conscience now is to lead men in the decision to rest on the first day of the week or another day, or not rest at all. The state is not to force men to decide. The state is not to be trusted to tell men to take positive steps toward righteousness, such as worship. If God tells men to do something positive (such as worship Him publicly on a particular day and in specific ways), the state must remove itself from the arena of human decision. This is not because societies are not supposed to be formally covenanted to God, but because they are.

2. Admitted Changes

The church has admitted the following changes in the day of rest: (1) the seventh day to first (eighth) day; (2) the abandonment of sun-down-to-sundown timing; and (3) the abolition of the death penalty imposed by the civil government. A fourth change may be involved in the addition of required church attendance (communion and worship) to what was previously primarily a day of rest. (This was not a major change if Leviticus 23:3 did involve weekly public worship.) Unquestionably, the church has modified its concept of what constitutes legitimate labor, which we will consider in greater detail in Section C.

These alterations are of monumental importance. They represent a sharp break with the Mosaic law. To maintain that such modifications are theologically valid, the church needs New Testament evidence of an announced break. It needs New Testament revelation that specifies that such a discontinuous transformation has been announced by God through His prophets. If the church is unwilling to take seriously the radical break announced by Paul in Colossians and Romans—the abolition of the Mosaic sabbath—then it has only a few scattered references to first-day worship to defend its position. Yet the church has hesitated to use these Pauline teachings to justify the break, because they are so radical in nature. Protestant churches that have clung to at least a watered-down version of the Puritan sabbath—itself a watered-down version of the Mosaic sabbath, because the Puritans did not execute Lord's day violators—have used the Old Testament passages as guides for modern Lord's day-keeping. They have not wanted to admit that such a sharp break with the Mosaic sabbath has been announced, because the New Testament offers no specific guidelines for rest on the Lord's day. Furthermore, the New Testament spells out the requirement of weekly corporate worship, and it mentions a communion meal, celebrated in the evening.

Churches have refused to admit that the kind of rest we choose for the Lord's day is a matter of conscience discipline rather than church discipline. They have not been content to point to the sabbath of Genesis 2:2–3 as a creation sabbath, the one-six pattern for man's week. They have selectively and arbitrarily quoted some aspects of the Mosaic sabbath—but always without the death penalty—as if there were exegetical justification for part of the Mosaic law to be brought into the New Testament era, but not the required Mosaic sanction against sabbath desecration. They often call for some kind of sanctions by the civil government—sanctions never mentioned or contemplated in the Mosaic law—but not the death penalty, which is the civil sanction specifically required by the Mosaic law. To say that the interpretational principles of modern sabbatarian exegetes are muddled is putting it mildly. It is another case of smorgasbord religion: taking this or that aspect of biblical revelation, while leaving others alone, all according to personal taste, familiarity, “reasonableness,” and church tradition.

This is not to say that all Mosaic guidelines to what we should not be doing on the day of rest are permanently abolished. The guidelines are there: avoidance of household chores, no profit-seeking commercial ventures, and no idle talk. It is not the guidelines that have been abolished; it is the locus of the sanctioning agency that has changed. The conscience, not the civil government, is the earthly locus of Lord's day enforcement in New Testament times. It is the individual conscience, not the institutional church, that makes the decision concerning what constitutes idle talk, or a postponable household chore, or the lawful limits of recreation. Pressure can come from sermons, or from patient instruction from the elders. Christians are to be educated concerning the Lord's day principle. They are not to be coerced.

3. No Compulsion

Paul warns us that in the area of diet and the Lord's day, different views exist. Discussions about the Lord's day are not to resort to compulsion, social or institutional, in order to settle the issues. Ostracism is not valid. But refusing on Sunday to eat in a restaurant operated by a "Lord's day-violator" is valid, because the potential meal-buyer has decided that such activities as the purchase of a meal on the Lord's day are against his conscience. He is not seeking to punish the "Lord's day violator"; he is seeking to do the Lord's work in his own life.

The church should not be fearful of the weaknesses of human conscience in the areas of the Lord's day and diet. (Actually, the church is quite willing to allow personal choice in the case of diet, but it resists the authority of conscience in the question of the Lord's day.) If the church is to avoid bothering people in these two areas of life, how much more the civil government! Furthermore, it is incorrect to argue that because the state can legitimately establish pure food and drug standards, it (or the church) can therefore legitimately establish sabbath restrictions. Commentators should not make the mistake of equating restrictions against eating certain ritually prohibited foods with the question of restrictions against the sale of chemically or biologically adulterated food. The state is empowered to restrict the sale of adulterated, dangerous products, not on the basis of the dietary laws, but on the basis of the quarantine (Lev. 13, 14):²⁵ a negative sanction against violence—namely, the violence of microbes or poisons against unsuspecting buyers. The state may not tell people what they must eat, but only what they must not sell, because of injuries that such adulterated food can produce in the victims—injuries that can be proven in a court of law to have resulted from the product in question.

The New Testament does mark off certain areas of life and calls them, in effect, either things indifferent or things that are not a matter of compulsion. A thing indifferent, for example, is circumcision. "Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but keeping the commandments of God" (I Cor. 7:19). Yet it is possible to make a case against circumcision, since the resurrection of Christ has made unnecessary the flow of blood in New Testament times: the sacrifices, the firstborn offerings (eighth-day separation from the dams), and circumcisions (the eighth-day marring of male infants). But Paul does not ask us to make an issue of circumcision or noncircumcision. He wants us to avoid confrontations in this area. The confrontations are divisive in this area, and not worth the trouble they cause. If a medical case were straightforward in favoring circumcision, which it was not in the late twentieth century,²⁶ the question of circumcision could become important again, but not for narrowly theological reasons. The same is true of diet. Most Christians understand this in the case of circumcision and diet. They do not understand it in the case of the Lord's day. They refuse to take Paul's words literally in Romans 14:5.

25. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 9.

It must also be pointed out that we are dealing here with specific injunctions in the New Testament. The proper exegetical principle is this: Mosaic law is still to be enforced, by the church or the state or both, unless there is a specific injunction to the contrary in the New Testament. To place the locus of enforcement concerning Lord's day violations in the human conscience is not a general New Testament principle of social, political, or legal action with respect to Old Testament laws and sanctions. The Bible does not call for a society operated in terms of man-invented sanctions. The reign of conscience is not to become the reign of anarchy. The Bible does not establish antinomianism as a New Testament principle. But in certain specified instances, New Testament writers have removed the locus of enforcement from the church and state, placing it in the conscience. There are not many of these instances, but the Lord's day appears to be one of them.

26. "The Committee on Fetus and Newborn of the American Academy of Pediatrics stated in 1971 that there are no valid medical indications for circumcision in the neonatal period. . . . There is no absolute medical indication for routine circumcision of the newborn. . . . A program of education leading to continuing good personal hygiene would offer all of the advantages of routine circumcision without the attendant surgical risk. Therefore, circumcision of the male neonate cannot be considered an essential component of adequate total health care." Ad Hoc Task Force on Circumcision, reporting its findings in Pediatrics, Vol. 56 (October 1975), pp. 610–11. Cf. Editorial, British Medical Journal (May 5, 1979), pp. 1163–64. For a summary of many medical arguments against circumcision, as well as bibliographical references, see Paul Zimmer, "Modern Ritualistic Surgery: A Laymen's View of Nonritual Neonatal Circumcision," Clinical Pediatrics (June 1977), pp. 503–6.

D. Economic Implications of the Lord's Day

We know that the man caught gathering sticks on the sabbath was tried by God and executed at God's direct command (Num. 15:32–36). This was what was required by Exodus 35:3. The death penalty was indissolubly integral to the Mosaic laws governing the sabbath. The fact that the church historically has acted as though the death penalty has been officially removed by God from His law testifies to the church's confusion concerning biblical exegesis and the rule of God's law. Those who proclaim their allegiance to the Mosaic view of the sabbath must come to grips with the Numbers 15 passage. They must integrate this passage into their understanding of society and economics. I am limiting my enquiry to the question of economics, although the Mosaic sabbath affected far more than just the realm of economics. I here reproduce (with some minor modifications) a section from my essay on the sabbath that was first published in R. J. Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law (pp. 831–36).

* * * * *

The gathering of sticks is a fine example of Hebrew case law as applied in the light of a general requirement of the Decalogue. It shows, perhaps, better than any other instance, the economic implications of the fourth commandment for the Hebrew nation. Consider the economic implications. What was involved in the gathering of sticks? Sticks could be used for at least four purposes:

1. Heating the home
2. Lighting the home
3. Cooking the meals
4. Selling the sticks for uses 1–3

As far as actual use of sticks was concerned, the case-law application in Numbers 15 applied more to the daily life of Hebrew women than it did to the men of the family. It is more often the man and his work that are the focus of modern sabbatarian concern, but this was not necessarily the case in a rural, pre-industrial community. The gathering of sticks was more likely to be the task of children; women were to use the sticks for household tasks, once gathered. Men were to reap the benefits of both the gathering and actual use of the sticks, but in general they would not have much to do with the actual handling of sticks. There could be a few exceptions, of course, but one exception seems to be far more likely, namely, that of the professional stick-gatherer. His work would be most in demand on the sabbath, precisely the day on which the prohibition against work was enforced. A woman who failed to gather sticks earlier in the week could buy some from a professional.

We are not told that the man in Numbers 15 was such a professional, but the severity of the punishment clearly would have made it far more dangerous for such a class of professionals to have come into existence. There was a need for a harsh penalty, men and women being what they are. There is always a delight in violating God's commandments if one is a sinner; if that violation also brings with it certain superficial benefits above and beyond the mere pleasure of defiance, so much the better. Sabbath prohibitions involved heavy costs for the obedient; enforcement of the sabbath required stiff penalties, thus burdening violators with high costs in the form of high risk.

What were the costs of the sabbath? For the man, it was the forfeiture of all income—monetary (less likely in a rural society), psychological, or physical property—for that day. But women also paid. They had to gather all sticks earlier in the week. This meant more work during the week, either in longer days, or by increasing the intensity of the working day, or both. Had the working day not been lengthened or intensified, then other tasks that it was desirable to accomplish would have to have been foregone, and that, as any wife knows, also involves costs (especially if a husband or a mother-in-law notices the failure in question). There would always be a temptation to forgo the gathering of sticks during the week, especially if a professional would come by with a load of wood on the sabbath for a reasonably cheap price. If his price was less than the woman's estimation of the costs involved in gathering the wood earlier in the week, she would set aside funds for a sabbath transaction.

By imposing a rigorous and permanent form of punishment on the violator—death by stoning—the community was able to force up the price of the sticks; risks would be so high that few professionals could survive. How many women could or would pay the costs? It would be cheaper to buy them earlier or to gather them earlier in the week. Stick-gathering was made an unlikely source of profitable employment on the sabbath. Because the market for sticks on the sabbath was restricted because of the high prices for the sticks (due to the risks involved), the opportunities for temptation were thereby reduced to a minimum. It did not pay many people, net after deduction of risk expenses, to violate the sabbath, and it was very expensive to hire someone to violate it.

To the degree that the penalties are weakened in a case like this, to that degree it becomes a matter of conscience as to whether or not someone violates the sabbath or pays someone else to do it. Conscience then stands without the protection of higher economic costs to keep a man acting in a holy fashion. In the mid-twentieth century, rest on Sunday is based primarily on Christian tradition and labor union negotiations; where these restraints are absent, conscience is the only barrier against the violation of the Old Testament application of the sabbath principle. Men who value leisure less than other forms of income will tend to seek out employment on the sabbath.

1. Hiring Others to Sin for Us

If we accept the principle that it is wrong for us to hire another person to commit a crime for our benefit and his profit, then certain implications follow. Sabbath violations were capital crimes. If strict sabbatarians regard Old Testament provisions as binding on Christians, then it is as wrong to hire a man to violate the sabbath as it is to hire someone from Murder, Inc. to kill a neighbor. The execution of the crime and the guilt of the hiring party are in both cases equal. Capital crimes are major ones. If the Hebrew sabbath is legally binding today, then its implications and applications are equally binding.

I have heard Christian people charge their fellow Christians with a violation of the "sabbath" (Lord's day) because the latter have gone out to a restaurant to eat after church services are over. This violation supposedly also holds for those who purchase food in a supermarket on Sunday. Why should this be a violation? Clearly, only on the grounds that it is a violation of the Lord's day to encourage another's violation of the Lord's day by paying him to remain open for business. If the standards of the Hebrew sabbath are still morally binding today, then entering a place of business on the Lord's day is morally a capital crime, and an abomination in the sight of God. Therefore, pastors and elders must tell their flock to refrain from entering into trade of any sort on the Lord's day.²⁷

27. I have worshipped in churches that sold books to worshippers on Sunday, but refused to accept payment until later in the week. To have taken money for the books,

If a man wishes to take seriously the standards even of the Westminster Confession of Faith (a pre-industrial document, it should be pointed out) in all of its pre-industrial rigor, then he should encourage his elders to enforce the provisions. Of course, the provisions of the Confession do not even approach the requirements of Numbers 15, Exodus 31:15, and Exodus 35:2–3, i.e., the true biblical standards in the eyes of a consistent sabbatarian, but at least they are something. If the creeds are valid in their 1646 interpretation, then 1646 standards of enforcement ought to be applied. If such standards are not applied, then it is a clear admission that the church no longer recognizes as valid the 1646 definition of the sabbath.

2. Buying Fuel

Let us pursue the charge against the “restauranters” with rigor. Those same people who make the charge pride themselves on their Lord’s day observance because they do not go out to restaurants on the Lord’s day. They do not shop in supermarkets. They have stored up provisions to eat at home. Prior shopping is quite proper, if one is a sabbatarian, for it is of the very essence of Lord’s day-keeping that one store up provisions in advance of the Lord’s day. But the Old Testament required more than the mere storing up of food. The passage we have referred to, Numbers 15, makes it explicit that not only food but the fuel was to be stored up in advance; fuel for heating the home, cooking the meals, and lighting the room had to be procured in advance. It was a capital offense in the eyes of a righteous and holy God to gather sticks—fuel—on His sabbath.

The modern Puritan-Scottish sabbatarian thinks that his is the way of the holy covenant of God simply because he buys his food early, and cooks it on Sunday, while he regards his brother in Christ as sinning because the latter eats at a restaurant on Sunday. But under the provisions of Numbers 15, both crimes appear to be equally subject to death, for both the restaurant-goer and the meal-cooker have paid specialized fuel producers to work on the Lord’s day. There is this differthe pastors believed, would have violated the sabbath. But the book buyer incurred a debt. He had to pay off this debt later on. What is the difference between this transaction and the purchase of gasoline by means of a credit card? Sabbatarians recognize that credit card purchases are economic transactions, as surely as cash payment purchases are. They would prohibit credit card gasoline purchases on Sunday just as firmly as they would prohibit cash payment purchases. Again, Sabbatarians have not thought through the economic implications of the sabbath.

ence, however: The man who enters the restaurant is not self-righteous about his supposed keeping of the Lord's day, and he has made no charges against his fellow Christians. He would seem to have violated the sabbath provisions of Numbers 15, but that is the extent of his guilt. The modern sabbatarians I have met too often violate the Lord's day and the commandment against gossip, or at least they indulge in the "judgment of the raised eyebrow and clicking tongue." They neglect Christ's warning: "Judge not, that ye be not judged. For with what ye judge, ye shall be judged . . ." (Matt. 7:1, 2a).

The very architecture of our churches is a standing testimony to the unwillingness of contemporary Christians to accept the economic implications of the Lord's day. We fill our buildings with all sorts of electrical appliances; we heat and cool the rooms to a comfortable 75 degrees, winter and summer. We often pride ourselves on the efficiency of modern technology, forgetting that people must go to work and operate the machines that provide the power—the fuel—for our gadgets. These workers are committing sabbatarian capital crimes each Sunday, and every Christian sabbatarian who uses these gadgets, apart from some legitimate emergency, implicitly sends people to hell every Sunday, morning and evening, as he sits in the comfort of his air-conditioned church. If the sabbatarian creeds are correct, then sabbatarians are weekly condemning others to the flames of eternal torment, just so that they can sit in 75-degree comfort.

Naturally, sabbatarians can always defend a 75-degree temperature in the name of "works of necessity." Freezing churches would drive away unbelievers in winter; stifling churches would do so in the summer. Possibly this argument is legitimate, if this really is the reason we heat our churches. Or perhaps our bodies really could not stand what our Puritan forefathers went through to establish Reformed worship in America; perhaps we could not bear churches so cold that communion bread would sometimes freeze solid. Possibly we would die if our present technological comforts were to be taken away from us (as pessimists have asserted may be a prospect in the near future). But if mere comfort is our defense of our power-consuming central heating systems, then we are not giving much thought to our sabbatarian creeds. It has become altogether too fashionable to adapt the interpretation of the Lord's day to each new technological breakthrough; sabbatarians cling religiously to standards written centuries ago, while violating the terms of those creeds regularly. It is schizophrenic. The wording of the creeds should be altered, or else sabbatarians should alter their easy acceptance of a radically non-sabbatarian technology.

3. McCheyne's Accusations

This plea should not be regarded as something new. It was made by one of the strictest and most consistent sabbatarians in the history of the post-Reformation Protestant church, the Scotsman, Robert Murray McCheyne. He minced no words in his condemnation of his fellow Christians: "Do you not know, and all the sophistry of hell cannot disprove it, that the same God who said, 'Thou shalt not kill' said also, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy'? The murderer who is dragged to the gibbet, and the polished Sabbath-breaker are one in the sight of God."²⁸

Andrew Bonar preserved McCheyne's teachings on the sabbath question in his Memoirs of McCheyne, and any self-proclaimed strict sabbatarian would do well to ponder what McCheyne wrote. If the standards of Numbers 15 made no provision for exemptions of specific professions,²⁹ and if these standards are still morally and legally binding in New Testament times, how can a man who proclaims the sabbath escape the thrust of his words? McCheyne saw clearly what the industrial revolution would mean. In 1841, he challenged the right of the railways to run on Sunday, but he was not followed by most of his sabbatarian countrymen in Scotland. They chose, as sabbatarians ever since have chosen, to turn their backs on the implications of their creed, while vainly proclaiming the moral validity of that creed. McCheyne had a word for those who today enjoy, having others work on the Lord's day to provide them with fuel at reasonable prices: "Guilty men who, under Satan, are leading on the deep, dark phalanx of Sabbath-breakers, yours is a solemn position. You are robbers. You rob God of His holy day. You are murderers. You murder the souls of your servants. God said, 'Thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy servant;' but you compel your servants to break God's law, and to sell their souls for gain. You are sinners against the light. . . . You are traitors to your country. . . . Was it not Sabbath-breaking that made God cast away Israel? . . . And yet you would bring the same curse on Scotland now. You are moral suicides, stabbing your own souls, proclaiming to the world that you are not the Lord's people, and hurrying on your souls to meet the Sabbath-breaker's doom."³⁰

28. R. M. McCheyne, "I Love the Lord's Day" (1841), in Andrew Bonar (ed.), Memoirs and Remains of Robert Murray McCheyne (Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, [1844] 1973), p. 599. This is a reprint of the 1892 edition.

29. I argue later in this appendix that there were probably exemptions in specific cases: "Rescheduling Worship," Section D.

Sabbatarians should heed McCheyne's warning. Those who stand in pride because of their sabbatarian position ought to consider the implications of that position. God will not be mocked! When the provisions of the Westminster Confession of Faith are rigorously enforced, then the sabbath debate can take on some meaning other than the playing of theological games. Then, and only then, will the issues be drawn clearly and honestly.

4. Enforcement Should Begin at the Top

When the elders of the church begin at home to follow the sabbatarian standards of the Old Testament, and when they impose such standards on their recalcitrant wives who enjoy their stoves, their hot running water, and their air-conditioning systems, then non-sabbatarians will be impressed. Let them turn off their electrical appliances, or purchase 24-hour power generators (no "lighting fires," please), or install solar-powered cells on their roofs, in order to provide the power. Let them turn off the natural gas, or else purchase butane in advance. Let them cease phoning their friends for "Christian fellowship," so that the lines might be kept open for truly emergency calls. Let them stop using the public mails on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, so that mail carriers and sorters will not have to miss their observance of the Lord's day. Let them, in short, shut their eyes to the offenses of others until the church, as a disciplinary force, begins to enforce more rigorous requirements on all the membership, starting at the top of the hierarchy and working down from there. Let all self-righteousness be abandoned until the full implications of the economics of sabbath-keeping are faced squarely by the church's leadership. Until then, the debate over the sabbath will remain an embarrassment to Christ's church.

Rethinking the sabbath question will involve a rethinking of the whole of Western industrial civilization. It will certainly involve the questioning of the last two centuries of rapid economic growth. Strict sabbatarians should at least be aware of the possible effects of their proposals. If the world should be conformed to Christian standards of biblical law, and if the standards of the Hebrew sabbath practice are, in fact, still the rule for the Christian dispensation, how would these standards be imposed on the population at large? Would it not make impossible our modern version of industrial, specialized society? In other words, if such standards had been enforced for the past two centuries, could this civilization, which most modern Christians accept as far as its technological conveniences are concerned, have come into existence? How much of our economically profitable, efficient, "sabbath-desecrating" technology would we have been forced to prohibit by civil law? The costs, I suspect, would be considerable. It is time for strict sabbatarians to count those costs.

30. Ibid., p. 600. See also his "Letter on Sabbath Railways," (1841), pp. 602–5.

* * * * *

Fire has served as man's major technical tool of dominion, and it was challenged as a primary tool only in the twentieth century, first by electricity and then by the electronic computer.³¹ Lewis Mumford has discussed the three-fold uses of fire: light, power, and heat. His culturally evolutionistic interpretation could easily be reworked to conform to biblical imagery. "The first artificially overcame the dark, in an environment filled with nocturnal predators; the second enabled man to change the face of nature, for the first time in a decisive way, by burning over the forest; while the third maintained his internal body temperature and transformed animal flesh and starchy plants into easily digestible food. Let there be light! With these words, the story of man properly begins."³² Thus, fire has been basic to the dominion covenant from the beginning. That the kindling of a sabbath fire was prohibited in the Old Testament is understandable; it is the very essence of work. To kindle a fire, or to gather sticks for a fire, would have symbolized man's autonomy in the dominion process, the essence of lawlessness. Furthermore, as symbolic of God's glory cloud, fire unquestionably served the Hebrews as a reminder of God's power, in addition to being a primary economic tool. Kindling a fire on the sabbath therefore was illegal for more than one reason.

5. "Strange Fire"

There was a fourth use of sticks on the sabbath: lighting a fire, or expanding the intensity of a fire, as a religious testimony. Exodus 35: 3 prohibits the kindling of a fire on the sabbath. This seems to mean starting a fire.

31. Jeremy Rifkin, Algeny (New York: Viking, 1983), ch. 1.

32. Lewis Mumford, Interpretations and Forecasts: 1922-1972 (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973), p. 425.

The priests of Israel kept a fire burning constantly on the altar (Ex. 29:25; Lev. 1–7). When Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, offered strange fire on the altar, God sent a fire and consumed them (Lev. 10: 1–2). So, it is possible to regard the kindling of a fire on the sabbath as an assertion of sacramental rebellion. For this reason, it has been argued, there was a death penalty for kindling any new fire on the sabbath—an assertion of autonomy from the sacrificial system of Israel.³³ This line of argumentation was pursued by at least one sabbatarian Puritan scholar in the seventeenth century, George Walker.³⁴

One possible piece of evidence for this position is that the Hebrews were not sure what to do with the stick-gatherer in Numbers 15. The law was clear: Violators must be executed. Why didn't they know what to do with him? Why did they seek God's specific pronouncement (Num. 15:34–36)? Doesn't this indicate that they were not sure what to do with him because they had not actually caught him kindling a fire, meaning indulging in a ritual trespass of starting a strange fire? He was working, but he had not kindled a fire. Why didn't they execute him, if merely working on the sabbath was a capital crime? Wasn't their hesitation based on their confusion concerning an unstated warning against strange fire, a confusion that would not have been present if Exodus 35:2 referred to all labor? Gathering sticks was labor, but they nevertheless enquired of the Lord. Doesn't this imply that they did not suppose that God required the death penalty for working in general—the mere gathering of sticks—but that He required it for lighting a fire, something they had not seen him do?

My answer is no, it was not any confusion associated with an unstated but implied warning against false ritual that led them to enquire of God. It was a much more basic problem: confusion over the specific transgression. But before I present my reasoning, I need to point out the obvious: Exodus 35:3 does not speak of strange fire. It speaks only of fire. The “strange fire” interpretation is roundabout and hypothetical, although biblically possible. It relies on an exclusively symbolic interpretation of otherwise plain words. I prefer to interpret the passage as primarily economic but with implicit symbolic overtones.

33. James B. Jordan, “Sabbath Breaking and the Death Penalty,” Geneva Papers (June 1986).

34. George Walker, The Doctrine of the Holy Weekly Sabbath (London, 1641), pp. 121–22; cited by James T. Dennison, Jr., The Market Day of the Soul: The Puritan Doctrine of the Sabbath in England, 1532–1700 (Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1983), p. 111.

It should be clear why a few interpreters have appealed to strange fire as the frame of reference for the imposition of the death penalty for sabbath violations: It gets them out of an embarrassing exegetical problem. With the permanent extinguishing of the temple's fire by the Romans in 70 A.D., the biblical law against kindling a fire on the sabbath ceased to be symbolically relevant. Thus, if the altar's fire was the sole reference point in the discussion of the death penalty for sabbath-breaking—that is, if the death penalty that is required by Exodus 35:2 is to be interpreted exclusively in terms of 35:3, the prohibition against starting fires—then the death penalty cannot sensibly be imposed in New Testament times. This enables the commentators to escape from a highly embarrassing problem, namely, the requirement of the death penalty for working on the sabbath in New Testament times. But this line of reasoning immediately backfires on any “strict sabbatarian.”

If “strange fire” was the sole reference point for the death penalty for sabbath breakers, then what penalty is to be applied today? Excommunication alone? Are we to interpret Exodus 31:14—the cutting off of the sabbath-breaker from the people—as excommunication rather than execution? If this “cutting off” is not the execution demanded by Exodus 31:15—and I argue that it did mean execution for sabbath violators—then an inescapable conclusion results: The civil government has no legitimate sanctions to apply against sabbath-breakers in New Testament times. The only civil sanction specified is execution (35:2), but if this was only for a ritualistic trespass, then there was nothing for the civil government of Israel to do about non-ritual violations. Certainly there is nothing specified for the civil government to do about a now meaningless practice in New Testament times. First, the fires of the temple are long extinguished. Second, hardly anyone in industrial societies gathers sticks to light fires. This highly anti-sabbatarian conclusion concerning civil sanctions is not likely to appeal to modern sabbatarians. Yet so far, this line of reasoning is the only one which any scholar has used in response to my arguments regarding the termination of institutional sanctions against sabbath violators.

Let us return to the problem of why the Hebrews enquired of God about what to do with the stick-gatherer. Why were they unable to decide what to do with him? The text says that it was not declared to them what should be done (Num. 15:34). I interpret this to mean that as a case-law application under either interpretive scheme—either as a work transgression or as a sacramental transgression—it was not clear to them whether stick-gathering constituted a capital crime. God then said that it did. But the text does not tell us which interpretation governed. Either type of violation constituted a capital crime: false worship or sabbath work. If stick-gathering was the latter type of violation (and I think it was), we then need to ask: What constituted unlawful labor on the sabbath? My answer: (1) commercial labor was prohibited on the sabbath (Ex. 31:15; 35:2), and (2) no household labor that could be done beforehand, e.g., kindling a new fire—was permitted (35:3).

Again, it comes back to capital punishment. This is the issue that sabbatarians have refused to face forthrightly. They implicitly accept the reality of the break between the Mosaic sabbath and the New Covenant's Lord's day.

6. Nehemiah 13

What about Nehemiah 13? Here we find a specific case of sabbath-breaking by foreign merchants from Tyre who came into Jerusalem to buy and sell on the sabbath (v. 16). Nehemiah locked the doors of the city on the evening of the sabbath to keep them out (v. 19), but they clustered around the wall. "Then I testified against them, and said unto them, Why lodge ye about the wall? If ye do so again, I will lay hands on you. From that time forth came they no more on the sabbath" (v. 21).

He could have had them executed, in terms of biblical law, but he warned them first. As foreigners, they may not have understood the specifics of the law, and because biblical law had not been enforced in the land for so long, the general public may not have understood the nature of the penalty. In this respect, modern strict sabbatarians are not much different from the people of Nehemiah's day. They proclaim the continuing application of the Old Testament's sabbatarian standards, but they have forgotten about the death penalty. By threatening to lay hands on them, Nehemiah warned them that the full rigor of God's sanctions would be imposed. For good reason, they ceased their violation of the sabbath. This does not testify to a reduced penalty; on the contrary, it shows how great a threat was involved. Once they understood that the civil government was serious about adhering to Exodus 31:15 and 35:2, they ceased selling goods in the city.

The question of strange fire was not raised by Nehemiah. The issue was buying and selling on the sabbath. While stick-gathering could have involved some aspect of outright sacramental rebellion, it didn't need to in order to call down the death penalty on violators. As far as the Hebrews were informed by God, either working on the sabbath or the kindling of a fire could result in execution. The subtleties of biblical theology or symbolism were of no real concern to them. They simply had to avoid working and also avoid kindling a fire.

E. Mass Production and International Trade

Consider the modern metallurgy industry and its consumption of “sticks.” It takes enormous quantities of power to produce steel or aluminum. Power is expensive, and grew more expensive in the 1970s, as a result of oil price hikes. The cost of shutting down a steel mill for one day and then starting it up again the next day would make the production of steel economically prohibitive. It could be done technically, of course, at some astronomical cost. It would be like the proverbial textbook example of growing bananas at the North Pole. Technically, it can be done; economically, it would involve massive losses—waste of scarce economic resources. Such waste is not tolerated by a free market. Steel could not be manufactured under such conditions. The cost of the power required to reheat a steel plant, not to mention the man-hours wasted in supervising such a wasteful operation, would force steel manufacturers out of business.

If the civil government enforced the Puritan-Scottish Presbyterian interpretation of the Mosaic law against Lord’s day violations on the steel industry, there would soon be almost no domestic steel being manufactured. At that point, buyers of steel would begin to pay foreign manufacturers for their steel—manufacturers who do not honor the Mosaic sabbath. This would place the sabbatarian nation at the mercy of foreign manufacturers. The “Lord’s day-desecrating” foreign firms would be rewarded for their violation; the Lord’s day-honoring domestic manufacturers would go bankrupt. Furthermore, because the supply of steel would be reduced worldwide, as a result of the bankruptcy of the domestic firms, the cost of steel would rise, thereby penalizing marginal purchasers and users of steel, who could no longer afford to buy.

The only way to make steel available domestically apart from rewarding the foreign Lord’s day violators would be to erect tariffs against foreign steel. This would force up the national price of steel to levels that would permit the production of six-day-per-week steel, meaning very expensive and specialized steel. The middle class and lower class would be effectively cut off from the enjoyment of many products made of steel. In a modern economy, this could produce a breakdown of the division of labor. It could produce an economic collapse, a return to low-productivity subsistence agriculture.

There is no way that steel can be produced that would not involve profits from Lord's day production. If the civil government required all profits (let alone total revenues) from the seventh day of production to be paid as a fine, or paid to the poor, then the price of steel would rise. The income from the other six days would have to cover the losses of the seventh day. The six-day-per-week revenue limitation would make the nation's steel mills uncompetitive in world markets. Again, tariff barriers would have to be placed on imported steel, and the nation in question would find its foreign markets for steel wiped out. The world consumers of steel would turn to the steel produced by "Lord's day-desecrators."

The modern economy involves the whole world in the international division of labor. Manufacturers of hundreds of thousands of products have been drawn into a worldwide market. Transportation costs have dropped steadily in the modern world, so those products that once satisfied only local needs are now facing competition from similar products produced abroad. Also, products that once stayed in a local district can now be sold abroad. The pressures of world competition force all manufacturers to respect world market prices.

In Israel in Moses' day, a predominantly agricultural and tribal society did not involve itself in extensive world trade. There was trade, or course, but this trade was centered on the major cities and port cities. Consider an undeveloped rural economy. Transportation costs effectively insulate interior rural communities from the benefits and competition of world markets. Trade is overwhelmingly aimed at high-value, low-volume products bought and used by the rich, the powerful, and the well-connected. The division of labor is minimal, and output-per-unit-of-resource-input is low. Per capita productivity is low, and therefore per capita income is low.

The Puritan-Scottish interpretation of the Mosaic sabbath laws could be enforced in ancient Israel without wiping out whole segments of the economy only because per capita income was low, economic expectations were low, and the international market for goods did not affect most of the products in use in rural areas. More than this: If the Puritan-Scottish view of the Mosaic sabbath laws had remained in force, the sabbath-honoring economies of the world would probably still be predominantly rural, characterized by a minimal division of labor. The rhythm of the one-six week is suitable only for rural societies, if that rhythm is mandatory on all citizens on the same day.

Do we want to argue that God has determined that the low division of labor of rural life is a moral requirement forever? Do we want to argue that God has created limits on the development of world trade in the form of a rigid sabbath code that forces all men within a covenantally faithful society into an identical one-six weekly pattern?

As far as I am able to determine, questions like these have not been dealt with by defenders of a New Testament version of the Mosaic sabbath. Those who defend such a view of the Lord's day have seldom been in positions of formulating or enforcing national economic policy. This is why they have been able to avoid the hard reality of sabbatarianism. They have not thought through the economic implications of their position.

When I raised some of these questions in the appendix that appeared in Institutes of Biblical Law in 1973, I expected to see strict sabbatarians respond, to propose answers or at least modifications in their position that would enable them to avoid the obvious implications of their position. I waited twelve years to receive a single letter or see a single refutation in print. None came. Yet Rushdoony's book has been read by many influential theologians and Christian leaders, and critics have attacked its overall thesis concerning the New Testament applicability of Old Testament laws, but sabbatarians have systematically, conscientiously avoided going into print with objections to my original appendix on the Lord's day.

It is now two decades since I wrote this appendix. I have yet to see a published refutation. As I wrote in 1986, the debate has not yet begun. I do not think it will. Strict sabbatarians are few in number. They have chosen not to defend their position. They prefer to maintain the formal language of strictness, despite their inability to assess the fundamental judicial issue: the locus of sovereignty of sabbath enforcement. They also ignore the subsidiary task: identifying the details of exactly which practices must be prohibited by law, i.e., by ecclesiastical and civil sanctions.

Silence is not golden.

F. The Puritan Sabbath

The sabbatarian heritage is unquestionably a legacy of the Puritans. It is just about the only theological legacy of the Puritans that still exercises widespread intellectual influence within the Protestant community. It does not exert widespread practical influence, because few people honor the Puritan vision of the sabbath, even though they may honor it verbally.

The Westminster Confession of Faith, a uniquely Puritan document, states: "This Sabbath is then kept holy unto the Lord, when men, after a due preparing of their hearts, and ordering of their common affairs before-hand, do not only observe an holy rest, all the day, from their own works, words, and thoughts about their worldly employments and recreations, but also are taken up, the whole time, in the public and private exercises of His worship, and in the duties of necessity and mercy" (Chap. XXI: VIII). The Larger Catechism amplifies these words: "The Sabbath or Lord's day is to be sanctified by an holy resting all the day, not only from such works as are at all times sinful, but even from such worldly employments and recreations as are on other days lawful. . ." (A. 117).

We lack a detailed historical study of the Puritan view of recreation. I have never seen even a scholarly article on the topic. I would never advise a doctoral student to adopt such a dissertation topic. The reason should be clear: The Puritans had no doctrine of recreation. It was a topic utterly foreign to them. It is exceedingly difficult to take seriously their view of holy rest when they had no doctrine of worldly rest.

1. The Puritan Obsession

There is a popular picture of the Puritans that says that they were a dour bunch, that they never laughed, or wrote poetry, or wrote plays, or created great works of art, or in any way delighted in the recreations of life. It has become popular in recent years to dismiss this picture of the Puritans as a myth. It is not a myth. It is rooted in reality—at least the reality of the documentary record.

I spent several years working with the primary sources of the colonial American Puritans, especially their sermons and legislative records. If someone were to tell me that the male Puritans were a fun-loving lot because of their fondness for taverns, I would reply: "How do you know they enjoyed taverns?" There is only one reasonable reply: "Because I read all the laws that the colony passed regulating them." In every town and in the records of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, a re-curing legislative concern was the control of taverns: hours they could be open, the kinds of games that could be played in them. Legislators were obsessed with the evils of shuffleboard, and the laws repeatedly took notice of this notorious deviant behavior, restricting access to taverns by apprentices, and so forth. The legislators did their best to minimize the operations of these dens of iniquity.

What about Puritan poetry? There was Milton, whose reputation as a Puritan is somewhat questionable (though I think on the whole he was in the Puritan camp). There was no one else of comparable reputation. Anne Bradstreet, the poetess of North Andover, Massachusetts, had a collection of her poems published without her knowledge in England in 1650, and 28 years later, a larger collection was published in Boston. By this time, she had been dead for six years.³⁵ The other great colonial Puritan poet was Edward Taylor, who forbade his heirs to publish any of his poems, and which did not see publication until 1939. His manuscript book was not even discovered in the Yale University Library until 1937.³⁶ Not until 1968 was a full-length edition of seventeenth-century American poetry published. Meserole's comments as the editor are appropriate: "In New England particularly, there were strictures against too consummate an attention to poetry. 'A little recreation,' asserted Cotton Mather, was a good thing, and one should not contemplate an unpoetical life. But to turn one's mind and energies wholly to the composition of verse was to prostitute one's calling, to risk opprobrium, and most important, to lose sight of the proper balance God envisioned for man on earth. The sheer quantity of verse that has come down to us proves that these strictures were not completely heeded. It is similarly clear that these strictures had their effect not only in the nature and intent of much of the surviving verse but also in the sparse numbers of poems printed in America before 1725."³⁷

There were the two poems by Michael Wigglesworth, The Day of Doom (1662) and God's Controversy With New-England (1662). No copy of the first printing of 1,800 copies of Day of Doom survives. Meserole says that they were literally read to pieces. These two heavy dirges were obsessed with death and judgment. They were wildly popular in New England, and probably had a great deal to do with the shift in perspective in New England sermons from a more optimistic post-millennialism to a new pessimistic sermon form called the Jeremiad by Perry Miller.³⁸ These were formula sermons of imminent judgment that were as predictable as they were ineffective in achieving their goal: repentance and the “affirming of the covenant” by the second and third generations.

35. Hudson T. Meserole, "Anne Bradstreet," in Meserole (ed.), Seventeenth-Century American Poetry (Garden City, New York: Anchor, 1968), p. 3.

36. Ibid., p. 119.

37. Ibid., p. xviii.

There were no Puritan playwrights, no Puritan sculptors, no Puritan painters, no Puritan composers of merit. They were, from start to finish, craftsmen, not artists. Puritans were theologians of artisanship, of diligence in the calling, of self-discipline and lifelong exertions to achieve middle-class output. They achieved their economic goals as no similar group in man’s history ever has. They subdued a howling wilderness in New England, a land of insects, rocky soil, fierce winters, and no minerals of value, a land of which it could truly be said it was devoid of milk and honey. As a substitute, its trees had sap for maple syrup. But New England was a “promised land” of freedom and abundant land. Puritans swapped their way to wealth. “From Puritan to yankee” is a constant theme in history books, for good reason: It was a real transformation.

From beginning to end, they were obsessed with one sin. It was not sexual debauchery, it was not drunkenness, it was not theft or murder or any of the other commandments. It was the sin of idleness that obsessed them. In their sermons, their laws, and their pious diaries, they were obsessed with the fear that they were not working hard enough to please God. They did not believe that they could work their way into heaven, but they took seriously the dominion covenant—took it more seriously than any Christian society before or since. It was through work and thrift that they believed they could turn the wilderness into a paradise. Their efforts helped to prepare the religious soil for the industrial revolution a century later. The Methodists of the late eighteenth century were the true spiritual heirs of the Puritans, for they too adopted a theology of work and thrift. The legacy of Puritanism even bears its name: the Puritan work ethic.

One thing they never learned to do gracefully was to rest. They did not understand how they could rest and also please God. They had no developed theology of lawful recreation. They worked from sunrise to sunset six days a week. The men sneaked out to a tavern occasionally, and felt so guilty about it that for decades they elected and re-elected magistrates who kept writing unenforced laws regulating their beloved taverns. They had no systematic theology of leisure. They could not deal with the prosperity that their great efforts produced.³⁹ They remind me of the medieval Benedictine monasteries that also could not deal with the wealth they produced, and so suffered periods of recurring internal reform every few centuries.

38. Perry Miller, The New England Mind: From Colony to Province (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1953), ch. 2.

2. The Marathon Sabbath

This obsession with work colored their view of the sabbath. The Directory for the Publick Worship of God, published by the Westminster Assembly, specifies this concerning Sunday activities: "That what time is vacant, between or after the solemn meetings of the congregation in publick, be spent in reading, meditation, repetition of sermons; especially by calling their families to an account of what they have heard, and catechising of them, holy conferences, prayer for a blessing upon the public ordinances, singing of psalms, visiting the sick, relieving the poor, and such like duties of piety, charity, and mercy, accounting the sabbath a delight." To which the modern reader replies: "You've got to be kidding! A delight? An ordeal beyond measure after the pressures of a Puritan workweek."

James T. Dennison's polemical defense of the Puritan sabbath (published in the guise of a master's thesis in history) is a detailed account of the debates concerning the sabbath of this period. Summarizing William Gouge's tract, The Sabbaths Sanctification (1641), Dennison wrote: "Duties of mercy consist in those which concern man's soul and those which concern man's body. Ministering to the soul includes: instructing the ignorant; establishing those who are weak in the faith; resolving doubts of the downcast; comforting the troubled; informing those in error; reproving the sinner; and building one another up in the Lord. Ministering to the body includes: visiting the sick and imprisoned; relieving the need; rescuing those in danger; and giving all other succor necessary."⁴⁰ This is in addition to works of necessity: preparing food, washing the body, putting on clothing, putting out fires in houses, closing up flood breaches, fighting in wars, releasing

39. Perry Miller wrote: "... the Jeremiad could make sense out of existence as long as adversity was to be overcome, but in the moment of victory it was confused. ... It flourished in dread of success; were reality ever to come up to its expectations, a new convention would be required, and this would presuppose a revolution in mind and society." Miller, From Colony to Province, p. 33.

40. Dennison, Market Day of the Soul, p. 113.

animals in danger. He admitted that not all sabbatarians took the following strict sabbatarian positions (though some did): no baking or cooking, walking, any kind of work, or gathering sticks for a fire.⁴¹ Thus, we can appreciate Dennison's summary statement: "It is apparent that the Puritan Sabbath was not a day of idleness. There was as much activity, if not more, on the Lord's day as on any other day of the week."⁴²

The question arises: When did these people rest? The answer: they seldom did. When they did, they had no developed theology to tell them when they had rested too much. So, out of desperation, they avoided rest like the plague.

By the early eighteenth century, Puritanism was fading. Newer religious movements arose that were capable of dealing with success—success that came from the Puritan work ethic. The second and third generations of Puritan heirs failed to affirm the covenant, join the church, and take up the "redeemed man's burden" of endless labor. Puritanism literally worked itself to death.

The Jeremiad sermon warned of God's coming negative sanctions against a faithless society. The problem was, the faithless society got ever-richer. Nevertheless, the forms of the Jeremiad were retained, decade after decade. In the 1730s, ministers were still using its outline, even though it was even less relevant as a formal exercise than it had been eight decades earlier.⁴³ Social and literary forms sometimes survive long after the cultural environment that gave birth to them has disappeared. Even longer lived has been the Puritan rhetoric of sabbath-keeping, a rhetoric that is still maintained by a handful of Calvinist churches whose members have never observed the detailed positive requirements for hard, merciful work that Puritan sabbatarian doctrine established, and who would transfer membership from any church that would actually enforce these requirements, and vote out of office any politician who might attempt to legislate them.

The Puritan view of the sabbath (though not its practice) has been maintained unbroken only by the more rigorous Presbyterians in the Scottish tradition. This tradition goes back to the seventeenth century. In Aberdeen, Scotland, in the 1640s, shops were shut on Thursdays, Saturday afternoons, and of course all day Sunday. On Sundays, the highways were watched to identify absentees. In April of 1646, at the height of critical negotiations between Charles I, the Scots and English representative of Parliament, Balmerino, who was travelling to Newark with an urgent message from London, stopped when he was 13 miles from his destination in order not to travel on the sabbath.⁴⁴ The Scottish-Puritan doctrine of the sabbath unquestionably had powerful effects on its adherents—effects that would today be regarded as near-pathological by those who claim that they are still faithfully upholding that very sabbatarian view.

41. Ibid., p. 110.

42. Ibid., p. 113.

43. Miller, Colony, p. 484.

G. General Preaching Creates Specific Guilt

1. Rayburn's Essay

In Presbyterion, a journal published by Covenant Theological Seminary, Robert G. Rayburn offers a standard essay on the sabbath. He defends the idea of a day of rest, and his familiar line of argumentation is that of the Presbyterian elder in the Scottish tradition. There is nothing unique about the essay, and nothing uniquely wrong with it. It is traditionally wrong, familiarly wrong, but not uniquely wrong. It is no different from a thousand other essays on the topic over the last four centuries.

What needs to be pointed out is that in a 15-page essay, he devotes fewer than two pages to the section: "Practical Questions Concerning Sabbath Observance." This, too, is typical. It is traditionally the practical questions that the sabbatarians have avoided dealing with for the last century. From the day the Scots faced the question of Sunday railroads, the commentators (McCheyne excepted) have mumbled. When it comes to public utilities—water, gas, electricity—they do not even mumble. They are stony silent.

Rayburn offered several reasons for the sabbath, all of which are traditional and correct: the dependence of man on God; the glorification of God through worship, especially corporate worship; the biological need for rest in the weekly rhythm. He said that Christ observed the sabbath, and He used it for works of mercy. Equally predictably and equally traditionally, he rejected the clear meaning of Paul's words in Colossians 2:16–17 concerning new moons and sabbaths, arguing that Paul was really concerned about a "teaching which was a mixture of Jewish ritualism and an Oriental Gnostic-type philosophy." He therefore concluded: "So this passage, as well as two others which do not use the word 'sabbath' but speak of observing days (Rom 14:5 and Gal 4:11), obviously do not refer to the observance of the first day of the week as the Lord's Day, the Christian's sabbath, for Paul observed the first day himself and directed others to observe it by setting aside their offerings to the Lord (I Cor 16:2). He was instructing believers not to attach special significance and sacredness to Jewish religious festivals and thus to pass judgment on those who failed to observe them, but rather to rejoice in their wonderful new-found liberty in Christ. As for the observance of the first day as the Lord's Day or Christian Sabbath, all Christians, Jew and Gentile, kept it."⁴⁵

44. Christopher Hill, Society and Puritanism in Pre-Revolutionary England, 2nd ed. (New York: Schocken, 1967), p. 183.

Where should I begin? First, if this really is the meaning of these passages, then why do churches refuse to insist that the civil government execute sabbath-breakers, as required by Exodus 31:15 and 35:2? If the locus of sovereignty of enforcement has not shifted to the individual conscience, then on what basis do New Testament commentators assert (implicitly or explicitly) that the civil government is no longer the responsible agent of enforcement? Why has the church remained silent about the death penalty for two millennia? After two thousand years, the silence has become deafening. Second, it is not true, as Bacchiocchi's Ph.D. dissertation⁴⁶ makes clear, that all Christians, Jew and gentile alike, worshipped on the first day of the week in Paul's day. Third, just because Paul insisted on corporate worship does not explain why the day of the Lord is to be a day of rest. It only shows that corporate weekly worship is required by New Testament law. Paul emphasized this because there was no equally clear-cut requirement for sabbath worship in the Old Testament.

What did Rayburn say is required? We must glorify God by not making Sunday a day of doing our own personal desires and pleasures. There are no definitions, no examples, no study of what is restful or fun, what is allowed and prohibited. In short, he burdens his readers (should they take him seriously) with a mountain of guilt. They are told to be faithful to God, but they are not told how. This, too, is traditional.

We must make the day a day of rest, he said. But rest really does not mean rest; it means . . . ? (Marathon sabbath? What?) “Resting on the Sabbath does not mean staying in bed all day or even most of the day, although some rest for the body is certainly appropriate.” But, we should be moved to inquire: What amount of time in bed is appropriate? He did not say. In short, here is another pile of guilt for the reader. How about a one-hour nap? A two-hour nap? Why all this chatter about staying in bed all day? Who on earth ever recommended staying in bed all day? This is a serious article and a serious topic, yet what we are given is exaggeration and hyperbole rather than specific, God-required guidelines. This is all that we ever get from sabbatarian commentators. This is all we have been given for 400 years. We grow tired. We want rest from guilt. We want specifics. When will the sabbatarian commentators give us rest?

45. Robert G. Rayburn, "Should Christians Celebrate the Sabbath Day?" Presbyterian, X (Spring-Fall 1984) pp. 83, 84.

46. Sameule Bacchiocchi, From Sabbath to Sunday: A Historical Investigation of the Rise of Sunday Observance in Early Christianity (Rome: Pontifical Gregorian University Press, 1977).

Then comes the usual refrain: evil restaurants. “Since the obedient believer is to observe the Sabbath as a holy day of rest, he must be careful not to interfere with others having the same privilege. He must not keep others working that he might not need to work. The waitress or cook at the restaurant and the attendant at the filling station have the right to rest also.”⁴⁷ Restaurants on Sunday: Here is the modern Calvinist’s equivalent of taverns in seventeenth-century New England.

This essay is neither better nor worse than a century of similar essays, which stream endlessly from the pens and word processors of theologians who simply will not take seriously the problems of economics and their relationship to the Bible. They just hammer away at the helpless readers, who desperately need specific, God-required guidelines. Neither do the commentators confront Exodus 31:15 and 35:2. They refuse to deal with the problems of public utilities, yet they criticize those who attend restaurants. It is clear why: they do not attend restaurants on Sunday. It is exegesis based on personal convenience and tradition. Such exegesis is productive of nothing except guilt, and perhaps a late reaction against sabbatarian precepts because of the lack of guidelines. The exegesis never progresses, because it never gets sufficiently explicit in its applications. It still sounds as though it was written in 1825—and even then, such exegesis was running into difficulties with respect to the industrial revolution.

2. Preliminary Conclusion

The New Testament Lord’s day is not the same as the Old Testament sabbath. The shift in the day of the week, from Seventhday (Saturday) to Firstday (Sunday), which is in fact the Eighthday, indicates that there are fundamentally new aspects of the Lord's day. This shift enables us to understand better Paul's warning of a shift in the locus of enforcement of the "day of rest" principle: from the ecclesiastical and civil governments to the conscience of the individual, meaning the head of the household.

47. Ibid., p. 86.

By attempting to impose the workweek rhythms of the sabbath-honoring Old Testament rural society onto a modern industrial economy, the civil government would destroy modern civilization. This fact has been "honored in the breach" by most magistrates and church officials for several centuries, but sabbatarian theologians have yet to present a coherent biblical case that would morally justify this "aversion of the eyes" of civil and ecclesiastical governments. Church leaders see what is going on, yet they remain silent.

It is one thing to say that the conscience governs the selection and enforcement of the day of rest. It is something else to say that the church may not enforce the day of church attendance. The New Testament's emphasis on the Lord's day as a day of worship may have eliminated the role of the civil government in enforcing public rest, but what about the institutional church's unquestioned right to name the day of public worship for its members, and to establish times for worship? Does the church have an obligation to provide alternative times of worship for members who, because of specialized occupations, decide to honor the rest principle by resting on a day other than the first day of the week?

H. Rescheduling Worship

It is not normal in a Christian nation to find that most occupations of necessity involve labor on seven consecutive days. In fact, most of them are five-day occupations, leaving time for goofing off Saturday (that terrible Roman word for Seventhday), to watch televised sporting events all day in violation of God's one-six pattern for the workweek. But a few members are called to occupations that require Sunday work at least occasionally. And, by the grace of God, most pastors say nothing if the practice does not spread.

1. Rescheduling Passover

We find a parallel in the case of the Israelite who was not able to celebrate the Passover in the specified month, the first month of the year.

Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If any man of you or of your posterity shall be unclean by reason of a dead body, or be in a journey afar off, yet he shall keep the passover unto the LORD. The fourteenth day of the second month at even[ing] they shall keep it, and eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs (Num. 9:10–11).

Why would any man be on a journey? What would a Hebrew be doing outside the nation? He might be on some sort of a foreign policy mission, serving as an ambassador of the king. He might have been an evangelist. More likely, he would have been a merchant. His occupation kept him away from Jerusalem in this important month. For those who had a legitimate excuse, the Passover could be celebrated in the second month of the year. Not many people would have had a legitimate excuse. This was no license for missing the Passover feast. “But the man that is clean, and is not in a journey, and forbeareth to keep the passover, even the same soul shall be cut off from among his people: because he brought not the offering of the LORD in the appointed season, that man shall bear his sin” (Num. 9:13). The penalty was excommunication from the congregation. The first-month Passover was normally binding, but those on journeys were exempted.

The law of God provided a means of satisfying the requirement of the Passover in certain instances when, through no fault of the individual, it was impossible or unlawful for him to enter into the celebration. Old Testament law was not perfectionist. It acknowledged the problems men face in complying with its terms. The law was neither perfectionist nor antinomian. Within the framework of the law, there is no temptation facing man which is insurmountable; God offers a way of escape (I Cor. 10:13).

The normal requirement was that each family should celebrate the Passover on the fourteenth day of the first month of the year. There was an institutional arrangement that enabled each man to fulfill the terms of the covenantal celebration. This should convince us that the celebration of the New Testament version of the Passover, namely, the weekly communion feast, normally takes place on the day of rest, but this should not be absolute in every instance.

2. Worldwide Trade: Passover vs. Dominion?

The question then arises: What if the Hebrew were on a distant journey? What if he couldn't return to Jerusalem even for the second Passover? If the journey were limited to the Middle East, there could be time available to return. But what if the Hebrew were visiting North America on a trading mission? They did journey this far in the days of Solomon, although conventional historians refuse to face the evidence.⁴⁸ A remarkable piece of evidence for just such a journey is the Los Lunas stone near Los Lunas,⁴⁹ New Mexico. The alphabet used was a North Canaanite script that was in use as early as 1200 B.C., and would have been no later than 800 B.C. Here is what the inscription says:

I am Yahweh your God that brought you out of the lands of Egypt.

You shall not have any other gods beside me.

You shall not make for yourself any graven image.

You shall not take the name of Yahweh in vain.

Remember the day of the Sabbath, to keep it holy.

Honor your father and your mother, so that your days may be long on the land which Yahweh your God is giving to you.

You shall not murder.

You shall not commit adultery.

You shall not steal.

You shall not testify against your neighbor as a false witness.

You shall not covet your neighbor's wife, nor anything of your neighbor's.⁵⁰

Here we have evidence of a worldwide trading system. Barry Fell's revolutionary books demonstrate how early this trading system exists.

48. Barry Fell, Bronze Age America (Boston: Little, Brown, 1982).

49. This is the correct name, despite the normal Spanish usage of the article "los" as masculine and "as" suffixes as feminine.

50. Jay Stonebreaker, "A Decipherment of the Los Lunas Decalogue Inscription," The Epigraphic Society Occasional Publications, Vol. 10, Pt. 1 (1982), pp. 80–81. Several of the papers in this issue deal with Los Lunas. For a photograph of the stone, see Barry Fell, Saga America (New York: Times Books, 1980), p. 167.

ted, especially his book, Bronze Age America (1982). There is no doubt that the Hebrews were involved in this trade.

What could a distant Hebrew trader have done about Passover? The Bible does not say, but it seems clear that he would occasionally have missed a Passover celebration. There is no specific release provided in the law, but to have required Passover for every Hebrew, regardless of circumstances, would have restricted the spread of Hebrew culture and trade. The Ten Commandments would have been far less likely to have wound up on a rock in New Mexico. Thus, we have to speculate about the rule of God's law as applied by the priests. Was the "dominion mandate" or dominion covenant to be sacrificed on the altar of formal adherence to ritual requirements? Was the celebration of the Passover more important than the subduing of the earth? Should we not conclude that the laws associated with Passover were flexibly applied in cases where Hebrews had legitimate, world-subduing reasons to be absent from the festival?

The same problem faces modern keepers of the sabbath or Lord's day. What should a pastor do in cases where a church member must work on the traditional day of rest to keep his job, because of the nature of that job? Wouldn't the best approach be to go to the member and see whether he is taking another day for his rest? After all, the early church took Seventhday off in Israel, because it was the law of the land. Would it not be proper for the member to do the same? The priests of the Mosaic era must have taken other days off, family by family. Should we not regard modern laborers as priests? "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people . . ." (I Pet. 2:9a). No doubt, most priests rested on the national sabbath day in Israel. No doubt, most Christians rest on the Lord's day. Would it not be proper to acknowledge the legitimate exceptions—profanations of the Lord's day that are blameless?

3. Rural Life Forever?

We have to ask ourselves this fundamental question: Did God establish the self-sufficient rural society as His perpetual societal standard? Is this standard still morally binding on Christian cultures? The Mosaic sabbath was specifically created as a means of preserving an economy that adhered to a six-one rhythm of the workweek. Even the most seemingly trivial violation of the pattern, namely, stick-gathering, was to be punished by death. It is difficult for us to imagine the smooth operation of a modern industrial economy within the stated framework of Numbers 15. But the Mosaic law was not perfectionist. It did allow exceptions with respect to Passover. It is likely that similar exemptions existed for other celebrations for Hebrews with unique occupations. But there is no list of exceptional occupations in the Old Testament that proves that such exceptions did exist, other than for the priesthood itself. It should be clear that anyone appealing to the elders for an exemption would have had to prove his case, namely, that his occupation unquestionably required seven-day operations.

It is true that automation is steadily reducing the number of people who must be employed on any given day, but engineers and emergency servicemen must be there to keep the equipment running. The moral issue of using services that require only a few men to violate the Lord's day, simply because there has been a change in technology, is still a question of right and wrong. In any case, could such a technology ever have developed, had Sunday workers been prohibited from the very beginning in the light and power industry?

What the strict sabbatarian is calling for is a drastically reduced material standard of living one day per week, an alteration of modern life styles so radical that its consequences for the economy can barely be contemplated. The Puritan-Scottish interpretation of the Mosaic standard is undeniably rigorous: no cooked meals, no restaurants, no television, no radio, no newspapers delivered on Sunday or Monday morning (Sunday production), no hot water for showers or shaving (unless produced by wood heat, solar power, or bottled gas), no commercial recreation centers, no air conditioning (unless powered by home diesel electrical generators), no gasoline stations open (except one or two stations on a rotating basis, and only for servicing emergency vehicles or aiding legitimate travellers in an emergency—state-certified legitimate travellers), no supermarkets open for business, and endless forms to fill out in any commercial operation in order to justify the emergency nature of the sale, with fines and warnings for buyers and sellers for first violations, and death for repeated violations.

It should be understood that these conclusions are minimal ones; a strict sabbatarian civilization, if it is to remain true to its professed faith, would have to impose these restrictions, and it might very well find other wide-ranging applications of the sabbath principle. That contemporary sabbatarians, or even most of the sabbatarians since 1825, have refused to discuss the comprehensive specific proposals that follow from their position, has led to confusion on the part of church members. That anything so minimal as not going to a restaurant on Sunday has become the “litmus test” of strict sabbatarianism indicates just how misleading modern sabbatarianism has become. Closing all restaurants on Sunday would be the mere beginning, not the end, of civil legislation in a sabbatarian commonwealth.

I. Proposal for Lord’s Day Reform

What I am proposing is a consideration of the possibility that the Old Testament did make provisions for an alternate sabbath observance schedule for people whose professions, by their very economic nature, require seven-day operations. If so, then the New Testament Lord’s day should also make provision for an alternate day of rest-worship for certain individuals. When some employees must work on the day of normal worship, the church could make another day of the week available for rest and worship. In our era, it would probably be Saturday, when the whole family is at home. If several churches with similar theological views made a single service available for their Sunday workers, the fact that few members per congregation are in need of the alternative day would not be a pressing institutional problem. A few members from several congregations could meet to partake of the Lord’s supper in the evening. In short, the churches should make institutional provisions for those who are required from time to time to work on the day of rest.

Certain professionals, such as policemen and firemen, are already granted a kind of unofficial “Lord’s day-desecration voucher.” They are not brought before the elders for working on Sundays. They are also paid by the civil government for their Lord’s day-desecration activities. But this is an unofficial exemption. Sabbatarian churches, as far as I have been able to determine, make no official institutional alterations for these church members to celebrate communion. These members are simply ignored. Elders “shrug off” the whole problem. Why not face the problem, and rethink the whole question of legitimate employment on the Lord’s day, and legitimate communion meals on other days of the week?

Admittedly, corporations and small firms should see to it that no one employee is stuck permanently with Sunday (Firstday) assignments. This assignment should be rotated, so as not to disrupt men’s worship on a permanent basis. But labor on the Lord’s day is not automatically to be regarded as Lord’s day desecration.

1. Priestly Exemptions

There is always the standard solution to the general problem posed by the steel industry example: the “works of necessity” argument. Perhaps this really is the right approach. The sabbatarian argues that steel is vital to the economy. Such an argument certainly seems reasonable. Then, because there appears to be no way to produce steel on any basis except seven days per week, the steel industry should receive a special dispensation from the church and the state that allows it to go on producing. While the Lord’s day is profaned, the profaners are held guiltless. The owners (share-holding investors), managers, and laborers are treated as Christ said that God treated the priests in the temple. They are held innocent. Those associated with steel production have become “honorary priests.” They are laboring in a vital industry, so this constitutes an assignment from God, comparable to God’s assignment to his priests in Moses’ day. They become exempt from the Lord’s day prohibitions.

The church or state that takes this position has decided to become involved in endless appeals from industries that want to be reclassified as “priestly” in nature: vital to the economy and also innately seven-day operations because of the nature of the markets they face. What predictable, legal criteria would the state use to determine such questions? What constitutes a vital industry? Which industries, now just starting out, will (and should) be allowed by the civil magistrates to become vital? Which industries used to be vital, but are no longer vital? Public utilities? (What about cable television service?) The healing professions? (What about cosmetic plastic surgery?) Should they be allowed to charge a fee for “emergency service”? What is an emergency service?

Having somehow solved the problem of providing legal definitions of vital services and products, the state’s authorities would then have to decide what market pressures really face these industries. Are they really required to operate seven days a week? They may say that they are, but are they? What criteria should be used by civil magistrates to determine the true state of affairs? Which factors determine the economics of any particular profession or industry and its market? Foreign competitors (including competitors across the county line, or state line)? Consumers’ buying habits (including consumers across the county line or state line)?

2. The World State

Perhaps most important, how can we grant such a decision-making authority to the civil government without seeing the creation of a vast, arbitrary, powerful bureaucracy? These questions concerning “works of necessity and mercy” and “true state of market competition” are enormously complex. They cannot even be decided on a local basis, given the worldwide division of labor. They cannot even be decided nationally. They have to be decided by a world state—a state that has the power to enforce its decisions.

The Mosaic sabbath was to be enforced in Israel, whatever its exemptions for specific occupations, despite tribal practices or preferences. With the breaking of the old wineskins of Israel’s economy (taken in the broader sense of “economy”), any church that would impose the Mosaic sabbath laws now faces an enormously more difficult and complex task. How can it define the problem areas? How can it enforce its decisions internationally? And if solutions can be found to these questions, there is always the critical one remaining: How can a world state enforce the Mosaic sabbath without becoming top-heavy, imperial in nature, and a threat to the very idea of decentralized Christian institutions? How can the Mosaic sabbath be enforced in international markets without destroying the legal basis of freedom, namely, predictable law enforced by an impartial civil government?

Will sabbatarians now argue that nations have to come to an agreement on the nature of the semi-priestly offices (e.g., steel workers, physicians, public utility workers) and the nature of the markets facing them? But what if one or more nations will not agree? If there is no enforcement mechanism internationally, will sabbatarians then argue that each nation must decide for itself, in terms of a hypothetical “national conscience”? And once they admit this exception, what is to prevent further extensions of this “conscience” exemption: to the states or provinces, to the counties, to the cities? What about to the churches? And finally, we find ourselves right back where the Apostle Paul began in Romans 14:5, namely, with the conscience of the individual Christian.

If sabbatarians refuse to allow conscience to decide, then the exegetical war will be carried right back up the chain of appeal: to denominational authorities, to the cities, counties, states or provinces, nations, and finally to the world state. Each level of government attempts to impose its view of the Lord’s day on those below it. But the Mosaic law does not tell men what to do on the sabbath, and the New Testament does not tell men how to rest. Will we need a world state to enforce laws against idle talk (Isa. 58:13)? What will constitute, or should constitute, lawful recreation? Is walking through a garden lawful? How about running through a garden? How about running after a ball in a meadow in front of paying spectators? On worldwide television? And if some nation's rulers decide that playing football (soccer) on worldwide television is immoral, then watching it is equally immoral. Will they set up jamming stations to keep out the satellite broadcasts? (Operating state-owned or state-licensed jamming stations would unquestionably be classified as a sabbatical work of necessity.)

J. Leisure

We do not know for certain how Adam and Eve spent their first sabbath, although it seems likely that they ate of the forbidden fruit on this day. We do not know how they spent their second sabbath, though it probably was outside the garden. We do not know how the sabbath operated from Adam and Eve until the Hebrews experienced the manna that would not come on the seventh day. We do not know how the Hebrews spent their sabbaths. We know a little about what they were not to do, but nothing for certain about what they did.

We know what the early Christians did on the Lord's day: They worked for a living. At the end of the day, they went to a meeting and ate the Lord's Supper.

We have sufficient revelation to know that the normal pattern of the week is to rest one day and work for six. Must we always work six days? The Mosaic law said yes, in general, but it also established other feast days and days off. There are problems of applying God's word to specific cases.

These were precisely the problems faced by new Christians in Romans 14:5. They are our problems, too. Which days off are legitimate? Which day should men take off during the week? None? One (Sunday or Saturday)? Two (Saturday and Sunday)? Three (Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, given the trade unions' pressure to create three-day holidays whenever an American national holiday rolls around)? What is the answer? What is the incontrovertible, conscience-binding answer that all Christians must respect, because it is so clear exegetically and historically? Which is the morally and legally binding day for rest?

The answer is not so easy to produce. Sunday (the Roman name for Firstday) is the common day of worship and therefore preferable, although the early church could not always adhere to it as the day of rest. But some members have to work on Sunday, at least part of the day. In practice, the churches tend to acknowledge this economic reality, so long as the individual shows up one Sunday out of three or four. Why make exceptions at all? Why not get every member to quit his job if it requires Sunday labor? Because the church officials are more realistic when they count the tithes than when they read sabbatarian tracts. They do not want trouble. They acknowledge in practice what their tracts deny: Men do have legitimate callings that appear to be seven-day operations by economic necessity. Cows need milking, and churches need tithes.

This raises the question of legitimate leisure. What should men do for leisure? Also—a question virtually never discussed by sabbatarians—what kinds of leisure are legitimate on the other six days of the week? God's law gives no indication that the six days of labor in a normal week were to involve leisure activities. With the exception of national (nonweekly) sabbaths, and the various feast periods (Deut. 14:23–29),⁵¹ men were told to work six days a week. Yet it is obvious that people cannot long sustain a life of zero leisure six days a week—not if they are to maintain their productivity. They sleep, they eat, and they chat. They teach their children (Deut. 6:7).⁵² Presumably, families enjoy some hours of leisure during the day. But the Bible says nothing about such leisure, or when it is legitimate to enjoy it during the week or during the day. It leaves this decision to the individual conscience, within the framework of family schedules and occupational requirements. If idle talk—"speaking thine own words" (Isa. 58:13)—is prohibited on the Lord's day, then is it legitimate on the other six days? If doing "thy pleasure" is prohibited on the Lord's day, then is it legitimate on other days? Or are these things prohibited generally, but especially on the Lord's day?

Bishop J. C. Ryle had answers, or at least strong opinions, in regard to lawful and unlawful leisure on the Lord's day.

When I speak of private Sabbath desecration, I mean that reckless, thoughtless, secular way of spending Sunday, which every one who looks around him must know is common. How many make the Lord's Day a day for giving dinner parties—a day for looking over their accounts and making up their books—a day for reading newspapers or novels—a day for talking politics and idle gossip—a day, in short, for anything rather than the things of God. . . . When I speak of public desecration of the Sabbath, I mean these many open, unblushing practices, which meet the eye on Sundays in the neighbourhood of large towns. I refer to the practice of keeping shops open, and buying and selling on Sundays. I refer especially to Sunday trains, Sunday steamboats, and excursions to sea and country, and the opening of places of public amusement; and to the daring efforts which many are making in the present day, to desecrate the Lord's Day, regardless of its Divine authority.⁵³

51. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 35.

52. Ibid., ch. 15.

This is quite a list of desecrations. But let us add some more. What about watching television on the Lord's day? Not allowed? Then what if we could make video recordings on the Lord's day with our electronically controlled video machines (with automatic timers)? Not even then, by the consistent logic of sabbatarianism, for men and women must labor at power-generating stations and television stations in order to deliver the programs to our lifeless video machines.

What about listening to music? With a church choir, it is obviously legitimate. What about classical music? At the park? Aren't the performers working? What if they are offering their services voluntarily? What if they are amateurs? Possibly legitimate. What if they are professionals who are paid on other days of the week to practice, but who then play on Sunday? Who pays them? The city? This is socialism. A private corporation? This is business (advertising). A charitable organization? Possibly valid.

What about listening to a radio broadcast of classical music? Not if you use public power or public airwaves. Then again, is classical music really valid? Should we regard it as Christian? Would we allow listening to folk music as a Lord's day activity? After all, is folk music or popular music any less secular than Wagner or Beethoven? Choirs sing words, and words are a form of preaching. Choir music is therefore valid on Sunday—music performed “in his sanctuary” (Ps. 150:1); all other music, delivered anywhere but in church, is either suspect or outright illegal, given the Mosaic law.

How do we settle these issues by means of legislation? How do we create an enforcing bureaucracy to police such activities without jeopardizing freedom? How can sabbatarian expositors go on writing tracts without providing plausible biblical answers to these practical, inevitable legal questions? How, in short, can we legitimately remove these questions from the area of human conscience and transfer their enforcing to an agency of institutional government, other than the family, where the father's conscience is given legitimate authority over his children? If men must struggle intellectually and morally to discover concrete answers to Lord's day questions for their own lives, businesses, and families, then how can we expect the institutional church or the civil government to come to recognizably valid, freedom-protecting conclusions? In short, how will we design institutional restraints on the bureaucrats?

53. John Charles Ryle, Lord's Day or the Christian Sabbath (London: Lord's Day Observance Society, n.d.), pp. 17–18. He wrote in the late nineteenth century.

K. Additional Questions

There are other questions that need practical answers. A corporation or business may permit people employed by it to take a day off each week, yet the firm remains open seven days a week. The example of a restaurant is useful here. The restaurant may remain open on Sunday, helping to make a day of rest available to housewives. Some of the employees must work on Sunday, but their labor makes it easier for families to enjoy a meal together without putting burdens on the wives. Most of the employees are given another day off. They take a day of rest on a day other than Sunday, just as members of the early church did.

1. Is a Business a Person?

Here are some fundamental questions. If the firm splits working schedules for Sunday laborers, allowing them to attend morning or evening worship services, has it profaned the Lord's day blamefully or blamelessly? If workers take another day off, has the firm forced its employees to violate the Lord's day? If so, then everyone who spends money in that restaurant on Sunday is as guilty as the proprietor and the employees. Second, is the firm to be treated as a person? Must a firm remain closed one day each week, even when employees are given alternate days of rest?

The problem exists, especially in an urban, industrial society, because of the high division of labor and high specialization of production. Companies serve the needs of large numbers of people. The rhythm of rural, subsistence farming can be more easily geared to a six-day workweek than the rhythm of an industrial society. The work-week's rhythm in an industrial society is necessarily flatter, because its members are far more dependent upon the availability, moment by moment, of services of other citizens than is the case in a low division of labor rural society. Urban dwellers do not produce many goods for their own personal use; they produce specialized services or goods for sale. If we can legitimately buy natural gas or electricity from a public utility in order to cook our Sunday meal, then why is it illegitimate to buy a meal at a restaurant? Either both acts are blameful violations of the Lord's day, or neither, assuming that the selling firm does not require seven days of consecutive labor from individual employees.

2. Cooking on the Lord's Day

The Mosaic sabbath in the wilderness seems to have required the baking of manna on the sixth day; they ate cold cakes on the sabbath. Will strict sabbatarians call for the death penalty of anyone cooking on the Lord's day? If not, why not?

The issue of cooking on the Lord's day is a difficult one. The Hebrew women probably cooked their manna cakes on the sixth day during the period they spent in the wilderness. We are not told specifically in the Mosaic law that cooking was permanently abolished on the seventh day. At the same time, the experience in the wilderness was to have given them indications concerning the cooking schedule preferred by God, and that schedule involved storing up cooked food the day before the sabbath, just as it involved storing up extra firewood.

When we come to the New Testament, we face a more difficult problem. The Lord's day should be timed from morning to morning.⁵⁴ The communion meal in the first-century church was an evening meal. Must we therefore conclude that this communion meal, the central weekly event in the life of the corporate church, prohibited the eating of freshly cooked food? Does the Sunday evening meal have to be cooked on Saturday night or even earlier on Saturday? Would we not expect the wives in the early church to have prepared their best meal of the week for this night? On the other hand, is the Lord's day to become a day of cooking competition? In modern churches, the existence of Sunday evening church suppers stands as a testimony to sabbatarian confusion.

Meals, whether cooked or leftovers, leave messes behind. What are wives to do, leave the crumbs lying on the table for the benefit of rodents and insects? But if they clean up the table and kitchen in their households, haven't they violated the Lord's day? If so, is this a case of Lord's day desecration comparable to the desecration of the priests, that is, blameless? May they use hot water to wash dishes? Can they legitimately (blamelessly) draw such hot water out of the tap? If so, someone is on duty at the local public utility company, serving the needs of the Lord's day-desecrating wives. It takes power to heat water. It also takes a water company to deliver water that is to be heated.

54. Appendix F.

The modern church has given no systematic thought to these issues. The Protestant churches have their Sunday evening covered dish suppers, and no one goes away feeling guilty about having cooked on the Lord's day or having eaten cooked food on the Lord's day. But the ethical question still remains: Is cooking on the Lord's day a sin?

3. Evading the Problems

These are relevant issues. The fact that they are not discussed seriously by modern defenders of the Puritan-Scottish sabbath is an indication of the political impotence of those who defend it. They write their booklets and preach their sermons, but the authors do not address their tracts to those officials who make decisions, or who might possibly make decisions in the future, in the world of business and government. Their tracts and booklets fail to speak to these issues. They are written as if we were still in the deserts of Palestine, as if paper and ink were not produced for international markets, as if the steel in printing presses could be produced in a six-day workweek. These men are rather like the professional ecologists who decry pollution and then climb into their automobiles to be driven to airports, where they fly on mass-polluting jet planes in order to give their emotion-laden speeches.

The writers of sabbatarian tracts would better spend their time in dealing with the real questions, the questions of conscience. What are the guidelines that pastors should use in counselling guilt-ridden congregation members who realize that they have ignored the one-six pattern of covenant man's week? How should pastors and elders teach the Lord's day, in order not to pressure excessively those who have not fully understood the implications in their own lives of the Lord's day, but who still need instruction? How can leaders deal with ignorance without violating consciences? This is the focus of Romans 14:5. Here is where we need tracts, books, and seminars.

L. Sabbatarian Debates in England

After this appendix was typeset in 1985, I went on vacation. In a Church of England book store in London, I found a copy of John Wigley's The Rise and Fall of the Victorian Sunday. This book is a scholarly survey of the debate over sabbatarianism from Puritan days until twentieth century, but focused on the nineteenth century. I decided to add a summary of this little-known history to this appendix.

What I learned from the book is that many of the issues that I had raised in this appendix had been discussed at length throughout the period, 1550–1900, and in many cases, the debates had been taken to Parliament for reconciliation. Parliament never was able to reconcile them. Thus, the seemingly hypothetical arguments found in my theoretical discussion of various sabbath issues were far from hypothetical in English history.

Wigley's book presents evidence that the most decisive changes in English attitudes and manners took place between 1780 and 1830, the period of the early industrial revolution. Wigley cited several authorities, including Charles Dickens, to this effect.⁵⁵ Each social group had different values and manners, and all were subject to changes in the nineteenth century.⁵⁶ He argued that English sabbatarianism was the primary influence on the Victorian sabbath, and that it was an integral aspect of English life and history.

The sabbath debates began long before 1780. Sunday amusements were prohibited by law by the Sunday Observance Act of 1677, which was passed not in the Cromwell era but over a decade and a half into the Restoration era of Charles II. A century later, in 1780, Anglican evangelicals were able to pressure Parliament to pass an Act that made it illegal on Sunday to charge admission to places of entertainment.⁵⁷ They wrote in a loophole for themselves, however, which was to be taken advantage of by their opponents a century later: religious organizations were allowed to charge a fee.

1. Elizabethan and Puritan England

In the mid-sixteenth century, the Church of England had no clear-cut teaching with respect to the sabbath. In 1569, Queen Elizabeth authorized certain sports on Sunday: archery, leaping, running, wrestling, and oddest of all, hammer throwing. In 1574, she authorized other sports, but forbade them during church services. Bear-baiting and bull-baiting were prohibited.⁵⁸ A 1580 law against Sunday plays in London pushed plays into Southwark,⁵⁹ an early indication of the problem faced by all strictly local sabbatarian legislation: geographical escape. Then, in 1595, Nicholas Bownde published his strongly sabbatarian book, The True Doctrine of the Sabbath: no saints days during the week, and no recreations on Sunday. Controversy increased from that time until the Puritan Revolution of the 1640s.

55. John Wigley, The Rise and Fall of the Victorian Sunday (Manchester University Press, 1980), p. 1.

56. Ibid., p. 2.

57. Ibid., p. 3.

In 1618, James I issued his Book of Sports, in which he reaffirmed the legality of Elizabethan Sunday sports. His recommended Sunday was recreation-oriented. The English Calvinists, following Bownde rather than Calvin, were outraged. Many non-Calvinists in the Church of England shared their views. Restrictions on Sunday travel were passed in 1625 and 1627.⁶⁰ The debate accelerated after 1633, when Arminian Archbishop Laud promulgated Charles I's rewrite of his father's Book of Sports, and required it to be read in the churches. Essentially, the debate was between the "marathon sabbath" Puritans and the "recreation sabbath" traditionalists.

During the Puritan era, 1642–1660, the Parliament abolished all remaining saints' days and holy days, along with Christmas and Easter, and substituted the second Tuesday every month as a holiday for apprentices. Why there was a legitimate exception to "six days shalt thou labor" was not explained. This was the Act of 1647.

The problem of technology arose in this era. What about occupations that seem to be seven-day operations? "In 1657 two Acts forbade between them milling, cloth-making, tallow-melting, baking, brewing, soap-boiling and distilling—trades in which natural contingencies, market pressures and technical considerations made it difficult to avoid Sunday work."⁶¹ But, as the author says, Parliament met on Sundays during emergencies. Furthermore, Cromwell was no sabbatarian.

The debates continued. The rival opinions concerning the proper administration of the sabbath proved to be irreconcilable. Many of the same disagreements persist today. "Even before the Civil War disputes

58. Ibid., p. 14.

59. Ibid., p. 15.

60. Ibid., p. 19.

61. Ibid., p. 23.

about the commandment's meaning had raised disconcerting issues of principle. If the Fourth Commandment no longer applied in its full and original force, did the other nine? If it applied to all men, was a servant right to disobey his master's order to work on the Sabbath? Who should judge in such cases? Now extremists claimed that the Sabbath should be kept from sunset on Friday till sunset on Saturday, mystics believed that Sabbath-keeping destroyed true spiritual religion, the Quakers taught that there should be no distinction of days and the Diggers began to cultivate St George's Hill on a Sunday. No less a person than Milton thought that the only true guide and authority in such matters was the individual's conscience."⁶² The question arises: How can society find rest from these interminable disagreements? How can church and state be governed by God and be blessed by God if God-fearing people have discovered no way, at least so far, to come to an agreement about these issues?

2. The Traditional Sabbath

The Puritan era and its legislation lapsed in 1660, when Charles II came to the throne, but sabbatarian pressures continued. The Sunday Observance Act of 1677 was the king's attempt to forestall a more rigorous bill being considered by the House of Commons. It prohibited all Sunday labor except for emergencies and charity, and prohibited all retail trade, except for the general sale of milk and meat for inns and other restaurants. It severely restricted Sunday travel.⁶³ Opposition began almost immediately, for sabbatarian ideas were beginning to lose their popularity. The Act was more closely enforced in rural areas; in the cities, retail sales were overlooked where custom allowed, except during worship services.

What about honoring the sabbath in the home? Would it be a feast day or a fast day? Different groups took differing positions. Some upper class members ate uncooked meals, banished secular reading, newspapers, horseback riding, needlework, and painting on Sunday. Others used the day for huge feasts, toured the kennels and gardens, and ate a light supper, thereby allowing servants to attend the evening meeting.⁶⁴ For most Englishmen, it became traditional to have the best meal of the week on Sunday. The middle classes followed this tradition, but generally avoided recreation. There the matter rested—with regional tradition as the primary guide—for a hundred years.

62. Ibid., p. 24.

63. Ibid., p. 25.

64. Ibid., p. 83.

In the 1780s, sabbatarianism had a revival.⁶⁵ In the 1790s, sabbatarianism was set in contrast to the anti-sabbath ten-day week of the French Revolution. Loyalty to Britain and sabbatarianism became linked.⁶⁶ William Wilberforce, who would soon take up the cause of abolitionism, in the late 1780s became a moderate sabbatarian. Parliament reacted negatively to these views in the 1790s, loosening some of the old requirements of the 1677 law, legalizing bakers' work from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. Sundays, when they could sell puddings and meat pies (the poor man's Sunday dinner). In a very real sense, the home sabbath made itself felt in the marketplace; the law was revised in order to favor an easier celebration of the home feast. Parliament rejected several attempts over the next 30 years to outlaw Sunday newspapers.⁶⁷

In the 1820s, the sabbatarians emerged as a determined group with a strong sense of mission.⁶⁸ Rev. Daniel Wilson preached a series of sabbatarian sermons in 1827. In 1831, he helped found the Lord's Day Observance Society (LDOS), which still exists. (It published F. N. Lee's dissertation, The Covenantal Sabbath, in 1972.) In the 1830s, Sir Andrew Agnew, a one-issue member of Parliament, introduced a sabbatarian bill four times, and it was defeated each time. It is interesting that the bill exempted the labor of servants in households. The fourth commandment, he argued, gave masters complete religious and civil authority over their servants.⁶⁹ This was in defiance of the reason given in Deuteronomy for the sabbath law: The Israelites had been exploited as servants in Egypt (Deut. 5:15). Wigley commented: "The Sabbatarians' distinction between 'private' and 'public' behaviour enabled them to avoid a fundamental challenge to the rights of property. They defended the right of the private property owner to use his servants, his horses and his grounds without any interference; but claimed the right to regulate that which was corporately or nationally owned, such as railways and the Post Office."⁷⁰ This represents a continuing compromise, or at least confusion, among sabbatarians. Is the civil government the enforcer inside the family? If not, then the sabbath principle is not primary but secondary to the rights of private

65. Ibid., p. 26.

66. Ibid., p. 27.

67. Ibid., p. 27.

68. Ibid., p. 30.

69. Ibid., p. 38.

70. Ibid., p. 46.

property, at least in this one area. But if the state can impose no sanctions here, why is it allowed to in “public” property, meaning private property outside the household?

By the 1840s, the 1677 law was close to a dead letter. Fines were small, the authorities preferred not to enforce it, and prosecutions brought by individual citizens did not often lead to convictions.⁷¹

3. Urban, Industrial Society

The 1830s and 1840s were years of rapid development of railroads. The sabbatarians organized politically to keep trains from running on Sundays. Some rail companies tried to honor their wishes. The Liverpool & Manchester restricted Sunday operations and actually inaugurated a scheme whereby sabbatarian shareholders could donate to charity that portion of corporate profits that were generated by Sunday traffic. The North Eastern adopted a similar practice. Most companies restricted traffic during worship hours. Demand was small, so this was reasonable. All refused total closure, however.⁷² This did not satisfy the sabbatarians.

The Post Office Act of 1838 enabled the Postmaster General to compel trains to operate a Sunday mail train, and firms added passenger cars in order to gain some revenues. In 1846, the final attempt to prohibit Sunday rail traffic was introduced into Parliament. It failed.⁷³

The Post Office in 1847 announced its intention to send mail through London on Sundays. The Lord's Day Observance Society began a campaign to reverse this decision, and also to cease Sunday collecting and delivering of the mail. Eventually, Sunday mail delivery ceased, as a result of trade union pressures, long after the sabbatarians had ceased to be a political factor, but the movement of the mail went on. Some Post Office employees, then as now, had to work on Sundays.

Two other sabbatarian societies were formed in this period: the Evangelical Alliance and the Wesleyan Methodists. John Henderson, a Glasgow merchant, began a national essay contest on the benefits of sabbath observance. Other groups followed his lead, and a tradition of annual prizes was begun. Wigley says that these contests and the publication of the essays transformed the controversy. What had been primarily a debate over religion became a debate over practical benefits of the sabbath. The essays did not ask for legislative action; they advocated total abstention from Sunday amusements.⁷⁴ These essays were generally non-theological in nature; they were practical. Understandably, the LDOS took no part in promoting them.

71. Ibid., p. 53.

72. Ibid., p. 54.

73. Ibid., p. 57.

In 1851, the Great Exhibition opened. This monumental exhibition of the wonders of mid-century technology transformed the thinking of a generation. In 1852, a private company took it over as a business venture, and the firm announced its intention to open it on Sunday afternoons. This created a huge wave of protest. Tracts aimed at every sector of society poured off the presses, with different arguments for each class. The government inserted into the firm's charter the language of the 1780 Act, that no money payment could be collected. This was a victory for the sabbatarians.

There was a loophole in the 1780 Act that was exploited in the late 1860s. The Act exempted religious organizations from restrictions on taking in money. One anti-sabbatarian, Baxter Langley, organized his followers into a "free unsectarian church," registered it under the Toleration Act of 1688, and began selling reserved seats to Sunday evening lectures. The government could not prosecute the group successfully.⁷⁵

In 1855, working men protested a Sunday trading bill that would have permitted open shops. A crowd of 150,000 turned out on Sunday, June 24, to protest the support that Chartist radicals were giving to the bill. The shops remained closed.

The next crisis was provoked by a radical M.P., Sir Joshua Walmsley, who in 1855 and 1856 introduced legislation to allow the British Museum to open on Sundays. It was supposed to be an alternative to Sunday drinking. Sabbatarians were outraged. The bills did not pass. Then Sir Benjamin Hall, Commissioner of Works, began promoting military band concerts in the parks. The sabbatarians were again outraged. This was national desecration. Prime Minister Palmerston later stopped the concerts.⁷⁶ So the theoretical question I have raised concerning music in the park is not hypothetical; it became a serious political issue.

74. Ibid., p. 65.

75. Ibid., p. 125.

76. Ibid., p. 70.

4. The Middle Classes

Wigley argued that the appeal of sabbatarian ideals to middle class people gave it great strength. A new appeal, based on practical benefits rather than an appeal to the Bible, became increasingly prominent within sabbatarian circles. He called this social sabbatarianism. "Social Sabbatarianism was of enormous importance. It moulded and enlivened the controversy for almost fifty years. It allowed the Sabbatarians to avoid authoritarianism and to champion the working classes. It allowed Nonconformists to assuage their consciences and to defend the civil observance of the Sabbath. It allowed M.P.'s to reconcile their laissez-faire principles with their religious values, for no legislation was called for, merely the defense of the status quo."⁷⁷ But it was a departure from the earlier sabbatarianism, and on many occasions, defenders of a religious sabbath refused to join with social sabbatarians in "the great cause." As the pragmatic arguments weakened, especially as the century wore on and more leisure time was made available to workers, the religious sabbatarians recognized the epistemological weakness of social sabbatarianism. "Six days shalt thou labor" became five and a half, and in the twentieth century, five; Sunday amusements also appeared to be beneficial, so the pragmatic arguments no longer carried as much weight. But the religious sabbatarians had been preempted by 1900, and few people listened to them any longer.

The leisure of the high-capital late nineteenth century was not characteristic of the low-capital era of the late eighteenth. There is no doubt that the industrial revolution increased the number of working days in the late eighteenth century. For example, the Bank of England (the private central bank) steadily reduced the number of holidays from 46 in 1761 to 4 in 1836.⁷⁸ The 12-hour, 6-day industrial work-week became the norm as the industrial revolution gathered strength. Sabbatarians could appeal to overwork as one reason for a legislated sabbath. But they steadfastly refused to promote a law that would prohibit masters from working servants on Sundays. The theological justification: acts of mercy and necessity.⁷⁹ This was an exemption for rural lords at the competitive expense of the industrial managers.

Wigley presented the interesting case of W. H. Smith, the Christian founder of the giant book store chain. Smith invoked the "acts of necessity and mercy" exemption when he decided to publish the names of the dead and wounded during the Crimean War in 1855. On the other hand, he refrained from walking outdoors on a visit to Canada, to avoid giving the impression of being a sightseer. On the other hand, he complained when his Sunday evening bath was late, blaming the assertive attitudes of Canadian hotel workers.⁸⁰ Convenience, predictably, triumphed over theology.

77. Ibid., p. 72.

78. Ibid., p. 74

79. Ibid., p. 78.

What about the Sunday operation of profit-seeking public utilities? This is not a hypothetical example. In the 1840s, some private water companies had left parts of London without water on Sundays.⁸¹

In the 1870s, numerous secular organizations formed lecture societies. Libraries began to remain open on Sundays. So did free art galleries.⁸² The sabbatarians opposed all such violations. In 1884, Herbert Spencer, the evolutionist and defender of pure laissez-faire, remarked that a dispute over the opening of a reading room on Sunday could split a mechanics' institute.⁸³

By the late 1880s, sabbatarians had generally lost public support. In 1896, the government finally voted to allow the opening of the British museums and national galleries on Sundays.⁸⁴ There was no opposition from the churches or the denominational newspapers. The twentieth century, especially after World War I, saw the end of most relics of the 1677 and 1780 laws.

Wigley's summary is remarkably similar to my own discussion of the economic questions raised by the sabbath in an industrial civilization, especially with respect to the differing rhythms of the workweek, urban vs. rural. "Sabbatarianism was an inappropriate way to provide rest, for it applied a simple, essentially pre-industrial, religious prescription to a complex, essentially urban, social problem. Sabbatarians avoided the difficulties which a complete cessation of labour would have produced for themselves by requiring servants to work and applying the formula 'acts of necessity and mercy,' but failed to appreciate that society at large similarly needed the work of some railwaymen, shopkeepers and the like, whose work rhythm ran counter to that of the rest of the community. Sabbatarianism thus justified some Sunday work, but regarded the unjustified as sin for condemnation, rather

80. Ibid., p. 78.

81. Ibid., p. 82.

82. Ibid., p. 131.

83. Ibid., p. 1.

84. Ibid., p. 147.

than as a problem suitable for social reform.”⁸⁵

5. Self-imposed Irrelevance

It is also revealing that the LDOS refused in 1855 to enter into the political question of the half-Saturday movement, which would have required employers to provide the afternoon off. It merely established a committee to look into the subject, and it was not required to report back. One Presbyterian minister argued that anything less than six full days of work was generosity on the part of employers that went beyond God’s justice.⁸⁶ So, the sabbatarian commitment to one day off seemed to imply no rest for the other six days. When, then, would men receive time for recreation, which was banned on Sunday? The sabbatarians have never faced this issue. Their concern as sabbatarians is not with rest, and their concern as neo-Puritans is with work.

Frederick Peake, the LDOs’ secretary, made the society’s position clear in a statement in 1895, one that summarized three centuries of sabbatarianism. The issue is not rest. The issue is enforced religious behavior. “Anything [on Sundays] that is not distinctly religious is wrong. . . . We should hardly make it purely a question of ‘rest.’ We . . . seek the religious observance of the Lord’s day as the primary thing, and the question of human rest . . . as a secondary matter arising out of that.”⁸⁷

The Sunday school movement had been developed in the late eighteenth century in order to provide religious education for the children of the poor. But some sabbatarians objected when Sunday schools began teaching newly literate children to write, “arguing that it was not necessary to be able to write to understand the Bible, and writing was thus a secular employment, unfit for the Lord’s day.”⁸⁸ The controversy gathered force in the early years of the nineteenth century. The Wesleyan Methodist Conference passed such an anti-writing measure in 1808. This controversy divided sabbatarians. In the 1840s, the sabbatarians had succeeded in most independent congregations in stamping out the practice.⁸⁹

The LDOS became progressively more consistent and progressively out of touch with reality. It criticized Charles Spurgeon for allowing his sermons to be telegraphed to Cincinnati on Sunday mornings.

85. Ibid., p. 79.

86. Ibid., p. 80.

87. Ibid., p. 153.

88. Ibid., p. 81.

89. Ibid., p. 82.

It criticized book sales in church. (At least it did not have to deal with the issue of book deliveries on Sunday with payment coming on a work day; churches were not likely to extend credit in this era.) In 1892, the Quarterly Paper of the LDOS said that Salvation Army bands “have done untold harm.”⁹⁰ The LDOS thereby forfeited the support of Non-conformist leaders. It also opposed the use of automatic vending machines in the 1880s, despite the fact that no labor was involved.⁹¹ In short, the issue was not rest; the issue was the marathon sabbath—self-denial for God, not external convenience and rest. As the Society announced in response to a 1909 attempt to pass a pro-sabbatarian law that had been drafted by the National Hygienic League, “This determination to settle the whole matter on the basis not of Divine Law but of personal convenience, with a flavouring of humanitarian sentimentality . . . a most threatening danger.”⁹²

What the LDOS and strict sabbatarians had accomplished in over a half century of non-cooperation with other “less rigorous” brethren and allies was to demonstrate the political irrelevance of their position. They had taken the “moral high ground”—so high that they were in the heavens and of little earthly use to the cause of restful Sundays. They had adopted the marathon sabbath position of certain segments the non-industrial seventeenth-century English Puritans, and had suffered the consequences.

Conclusion

Several questions should be raised. Did the failure of the Lord’s Day Observance Society come as a result of its political intransigence? If so, was this intransigence biblically valid? Were its leaders correct in refusing to compromise with anything that was not “pure marathon sabbath”? Was the LDOS doomed at the end because of an increasingly secular society? Or was it doomed from the beginning because the “marathon sabbath” is neither biblical nor suitable in an urban civilization?

There really were public debates over the timing of the sabbath, the locus of sovereignty of enforcement (Milton’s locus: conscience), travel on Sunday, feast day vs. fast day, “seven-day-per-week” technologies, railways, public utilities, defining “mercy and necessity,” servants' labor on Sundays ("mercy and necessity" . . . for the masters), mail delivery and shipping, newspapers, museums, bakeries, and the appropriateness of cooking on Sunday. There were debates, but there were no definitive answers. Eventually, people grew tired of debates that could not be resolved, and the honoring of the sabbath became a matter of conscience. Milton's suggestion became a social reality.

90. Ibid., p. 141.

91. Ibid., p. 153.

92. Ibid., p. 165.

The summary provided by Wigley is accurate, but it indicates the extent to which sabbatarianism brought Christians little credit in English history, even though a day of rest was universally acknowledged at least in principle to be a blessing. The marathon sabbath did not survive, and it is understandable why it didn't.

In the depression-stricken countryside of the 1880s no harvest work was done on Sundays, but the migrant Irish labourers were thought to be heathens because they sang and danced after returning from Mass. Protestant English farmers' children were taught to "remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day." Of course the manservant and the maid-servant had to milk the cows, that was necessary work [but]'. . . Nobody ever read a newspaper or whistled a tune except hymns . . . on Sundays.' [Allison Uttley, The Country Child (Penguin ed., 1970), pp. 222, 206.] No wonder the Sabbatarians quoted the Fourth Commandment as given in Exodus and ignored the version in Deuteronomy (5: 14) 'that thy man servant and thy maid servant may rest as well as thou.'

The most characteristic feature of Sabbatarianism and of the Victorian Sunday which it produced was the attempt to proscribe Sunday amusement and recreation, and over the course of the century this had had different effects on each class. By encouraging church and Sunday school attendance, and drawing a picture of domestic comfort, the Sabbatarians had given the lower classes a standard at which to aim. But by doing so they had undermined the festal Sunday tradition in accordance with which the lower classes already cleaned and dressed themselves on Sundays. They wanted a day of abstention, whereas the workers kept a holiday, a feast not a fast.

The abstemious Sunday was better suited to those who spent their week in easy circumstances than to those who labored for their bread. The Sabbatarian standard and the Victorian Sunday were essentially middle class phenomena. They produced a day which had a funeral character, notorious for its symbols—the hushed voice, the half-drawn blind and the best clothes. When adopted by the lower classes these symbols produced the respectable poor. Neville Cardus, the (Manchester) Guardian's cricket correspondent, remembered

William Attewell, in 1912 cricket professional at Shrewsbury School: 'Each Sabbath, after our mid-day meal, he put on a hard stiff collar. I recollect his struggles with it. "Cuss it," he would protest, "but ah mun do it; it's the Lord's day."' ⁹³

Conclusion

Questions concerning the proper form of Lord's day observance, not to mention the proper role of the institutional church and civil government in enforcing Lord's day observance, are extremely complex. This is one reason why Paul assigned to the individual conscience the task of sorting out these problems. They are too complex and too disputed for the institutions of government to apply sanctions. This was not the case in rural Israel, when the sabbath was primarily negative—refraining from normal, profit-seeking labor one day per week—and the civil government's role was also negative, namely, prohibiting commercial trade and restricting most of a family's daily routine. When the Lord's day became both a day of rest and a day of corporate worship, its emphasis changed, and the state's role in protecting the Lord's day was radically altered. When the sabbath day, or the Lord's day, became a day that emphasizes positive worship, the state ceased being a legitimate agency of enforcement.

The Lord's day is essentially a day in which the normal routine of work is broken—a ritual testimony of a man's reliance upon God's grace rather than his own labor. It is a day of inactivity one day in seven with respect to one's source of income and to one's area of daily responsibility for labor. It is an admission that man is not sovereign, that man rests on God's creative work, that man cannot bring his work to completion apart from God, that man's efforts are limited, and that autonomous man cannot, even with a seven-day workweek, expect to prosper. It is a symbolic announcement that man must rest in the grace of God, and that he can rest one day per week in confidence that God honors His covenant with His people. It takes faith to honor the Lord's day—faith in the terms of the covenant, and faith in the ability of God to fulfill His part of the compact.

The Lord's day of rest-worship forces men to schedule their lives more efficiently, to take time for rest. It forces them to order their workweek carefully, buying in advance, storing up goods in preparation for the Lord's day. It forces wives to get their homes cleaned be fore the day of rest. It forces people, in short, to establish budgets, rather like the budgets necessitated by the requirement of the tithe. In this case, however, what is budgeted primarily is time, not money. A family's week is to have a God-honoring one-six rhythm.

93. Ibid., p. 185.

The break from the normal work routine was required of the priests of Israel, but other responsibilities forced the priesthood as a whole to maintain seven-day operations. What was required of individual priests was not required of the priesthood as a whole. The corporate body of priests had to offer sacrifices daily; each individual priest could reschedule his workweek to permit him to rest on another day, if it was his day to offer sacrifices on the sabbath. God distinguishes between organizations and the individuals who make up the organizations. A six-day workweek was required of individual priests and their families, but not the priesthood as a unit.

Modern Christians are priests. They are sometimes assigned tasks on the Lord's day that are vital to the economic survival of the firm. The decision as to whether the seven-day workweek is really crucial to the economic survival of the firm is made in terms of several criteria: the decision of the owners; the decisions of employees and potential employees whether they are violating their consciences in working on the Lord's day; and the decisions of customers who decide whether they are violating the sabbath principle in spending their money on the products or services of the Lord's day-profaning company. We are not told how the priests of the Old Testament worked out the mid-week day of rest for those who had to offer sacrifices on the sabbath. We are not told exactly how the sorting out of the Lord's day issue would be done in modern, industrial, post-resurrection societies. Some men regard all days the same. Others regard one or more days as special. Each man should be convinced in his own mind (Rom. 14:5).

What we must understand is this: Paul assigned to the individual human conscience the task of making the decisions concerning rest, leisure, and employment on the Lord's day. This does not mean that all days are the same during the week. Man's conscience must make the decision for man, but this does not mean that God's revelation is not clear regarding the special nature of the Lord's day. It does not mean that the one-six pattern is invalid in New Testament times. It means only that from an institutional standpoint, Paul removed the civil government and the church courts from the position of decision-makers. With respect to the day of rest-worship, the external sanction of the Old Testament economy, the death penalty, has been abolished.

It has been abolished along with the duty of the civil government to impose sanctions on individuals or firms that choose to work on the Lord's day.

The fact that individual conscience is assigned the task of decoding the limits of the Lord's day activities has not subjectivised the reality of the sabbath principle of rest-worship. The sabbath principle of rest-worship is still intact. But God has determined that the complexity of Lord's day observance is too great for the church or state to enforce. The requirement of honoring one day in seven is still with us, but not all people see this, and hardly any group agrees concerning the exact ways in which any profit-seeking firm or individual must honor the sabbath principle. God will be the final judge, not the earthly institutions of government. There are objective standards, but they must be interpreted subjectively, person by person, in the New Testament era. We have been given specific revelation to this effect with respect to the sabbath, and we must honor this revelation.

It solves few if any concrete sabbatarian problems to read into Leviticus 23:3 an Old Testament sabbath version of the New Testament's requirement of positive worship on the Lord's day. The testimony of the Old Testament is clear: Seventhday was generally (and possibly even exclusively) a day of rest except for a few priests in the temple. It is equally futile to read into Exodus 35:3 a highly symbolic and hypothetical interpretation concerning "strange fire." Clear texts should be used to interpret obscure texts. Even more to the point, clear texts should not be turned into obscure texts. Exodus 35:2 is clear: death for working on the sabbath. Exodus 35:3 is also clear: no kindling of fires. An apologetic for a hypothetical "less rigorously enforced Old Testament sabbath" that is then said to be in continuity with a church government-enforced and state government-enforced New Testament Lord's day—an apologetic based on "strange fire"—is clear to practically nobody, which is why we find no similar line of argumentation in the historic creeds. It also fails to explain the sharp discontinuity that was announced by Paul in Romans 14:5 and Colossians 3:16.

In short, if Paul's words are not taken at face value, a whole series of problems arises. Few churches have been willing to face these problems squarely over the last two hundred years, and none has been willing so far to deal forthrightly with the question of the death penalty in Exodus 35:2. There is no way, biblically speaking, to escape the necessity of imposing the death penalty on persistent sabbath violators, unless we interpret Romans 14 as having changed the locus of enforcement from the civil government to the individual conscience. If Paul was not speaking about the Old Testament sabbath in that passage, then Exodus 31:15 and 35:2 are still morally and legally binding, and Christians must forthrightly call for the civil government to abide by God's sabbatical standards, and to begin executing sabbath breakers.

APPENDIX F

TIMING THE LORD'S DAY

F. N. Lee's book is a comprehensive treatment of the sabbath question. It raises many interesting points. One of them relates to the timing of the sabbath. Three distinct positions have been maintained by Christians historically: the sundown-to-sundown sabbath, the midnight-to-midnight sabbath, which Lee holds,¹ and the sunrise-to-sunrise (approximately) sabbath, which I hold. The inability of commentators to agree on this point obviously poses difficulties for those who might recommend nationwide or civil sanctions against sabbath violators.

The Hebrews celebrated the sabbath of the day of atonement from evening to evening (Lev. 23:32), and we presume that the other sabbaths were similarly celebrated. The sabbath in Jesus' day was begun at sundown (Mark 15:42). The Jews wanted the bodies of the dead to be removed before the evening (John 19:31). Nevertheless, we need not assume that Old Testament practices regarding the sabbath are still binding on the New Testament church, since the change of the day represents a fundamental break with the past. Christian scholars have not generally believed that the New Testament day of rest begins at sundown on Saturday evening, although some, including certain Puritan groups, have argued that it does.

The case for the sundown-to-sundown sabbath is based primarily on Old Testament law.² The case for the midnight-to-midnight sabbath is more problematical, resting on the idea of midnight being the midpoint between evening and morning. Jesus rose before the sun did, since the women came at the dawn to Jesus' tomb (Matt. 28:1; Luke 24:2), and the tomb was already empty. Finally, the firstborn of Egypt were slain at midnight (Ex. 12:29). Deliverance, in other words, was based on an event that took place at midnight.³

1. F. N. Lee, The Covenantal Sabbath (London: Lord's Day Observance Society, 1972), p. x.

2. Ibid., p. 39.

A. Promise and Deliverance

The modern world has cheap clocks. This is one of the main facts of modernity. The mechanical clock changed the West.⁴ In Moses' world, there was sunrise and sunset, assuming that the sky was not cloudy. Any other marker would have been monopoly information of priests. But the farther away from the equator a society is, the more unequal in length days and nights as the seasons approach the two solstices. This makes a sunset or sunrise marker inefficient.

I think the sabbath should be marked by a clock, as Lee does, but I prefer sunrise over midnight as the marker. For one thing, until the advent of home-based clocks with alarm devices, midnight would have had to be announced by the clanging of bells, presumably church bells, at midnight Sunday morning. Kings and nobles would have made that practice highly unlikely. So, instead of sunset-to-sunset as general markers to be used to guide our clock-run society, I suggest a sunrise-to-sunrise New Testament Lord's day. This is based on the theme of promise and deliverance.

The Hebrews were required to begin their celebration of the Passover at sundown. The Passover lamb was slain in the evening (Ex. 12:6), and nothing was to remain by the next morning (12:10). The Passover feast looked in faith to the coming deliverance. The promise of God was sure. The Israelites began the feast in the evening; they had been told that by the next morning, they would be delivered. The basis of deliverance, the death of Egypt's firstborn, came at midnight, but no one could have known this at the time; they had no clocks. The actual deliverance came later, for Pharaoh then called Moses and Aaron by night and ordered the Israelites out of the land. They had to return to the people and convey Pharaoh's message. Then, hastily, the people gathered together their belongings, taking their unleavened (ready for cooking) bread. They had no time for preparing food (12:39). This points to an early morning deliverance.

Long before the exodus, Jacob had wrestled with the theophany of God through the night, fighting for His blessing. They wrestled "until the breaking of the day" (Gen. 32:24). Jacob received the blessing, the thigh wound, and his new name, Israel, at daybreak (32:25–28). Thus, Israel's deliverance (the Day of the Lord) came as the sun rose. But the struggle had begun at night (32:22–24).

3. Ibid., p. 74.

4. David Landes, Revolution in Time: Clocks and the Making of the Modern World (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983).

God's righteousness is equated with the sun in several instances. Perhaps the most forthright is Malachi 4:2: "But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall." Again, "He shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springeth out of the earth by clear shining after the rain" (II Sam. 23:4). "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the LORD is risen upon thee. For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people: but the LORD shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and the kings to the brightness of thy rising" (Isa. 60:1–3). "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the LORD: his going forth is prepared as the morning. . ." (Hos. 6:3a). The righteousness of the faithful is also compared to morning: "The course of the righteous is like the morning light, growing brighter till it is broad day" (Prov. 4:18; NEB; cf. Jud. 5:31). Israel is to be delivered at the rising of the sun, the coming of light when there previously had been gross darkness.

The theme that Israel is delivered with the rising of the sun on the seventh day corresponds with the idea that Adam rebelled on the morning of the seventh day, and that man needs grace early in the morning. The New Testament reveals a similar message. The women came to the tomb at dawn, not at sundown the evening before, when the third day began officially, according to later Hebrew law. Furthermore, the day of Pentecost came seven weeks later, according to Mosaic law (Lev. 23:16). The disciples were meeting together, and the Holy Spirit came upon them (Acts 2:1–5). Speaking in many foreign languages, they communicated the gospel to a multitude (2:6), each in his own language (2:8). Critics charged that they were drunk with "new wine" (2:13). Peter's response is significant: "For these are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day" (2:15). In other words, it was about three hours after the dawn. Peter was saying that these men had not had time to get drunk. People were not gathering to hear the gospel three hours after sundown, for then Peter's words would have been meaningless. Obviously, an evening of drinking might have preceded a nighttime outpouring of the Spirit. If we assume that dawn was around six o'clock in the morning, then "the third hour of the day” would have been about nine A.M. This corresponds to the Roman sun dial, which marked noon as the sixth hour.⁵ The sundial was an appropriate tool during sunlight hours. It was not appropriate in the winter at six a.m.

B. The Communion Meal

There are other pieces of data that point to a sunrise-to-sunrise Lord’s day. Jesus met with His disciples on the evening of His resurrection (John 20:19), eating with them (Luke 24:41–43). This communion meal took place after the sun had gone down. He had already eaten with two disciples at Emmaus, approximately seven miles from Jerusalem (Luke 24:13: Berkeley Version), and this meal took place as the sun was setting (Luke 24:29–30). These two disciples then walked from Emmaus to Jerusalem in order to meet with the other disciples. Then Jesus appeared to the whole group (Luke 24:33–34). Yet this meeting is described as having taken place “the same day at evening, being the first day of the week” (John 20:19a). John was not using the Hebrew day, sundown to sundown, as his measure of the first day.

Paul’s lecture to the church at Troas took place on the Lord’s day. “And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight” (Acts 20:7). He departed at the “break of day” (20:11b).

The evening meeting was a communion feast, as was the first evening of Christ’s resurrection. After the day was spent, men gathered together to partake of the Lord’s supper. We know also that Paul criticized the Corinthian church for its drunkenness at the Lord’s table. “For in eating every one taketh before other his own supper: and one is hungry, and another is drunken” (I Cor. 11:21). They had not been drinking early in the morning, any more than the disciples on the day of Pentecost had been drinking in the morning. The Corinthian church members had been drinking too much in the evening, prior to the communion meal.

We celebrate communion on the Lord’s day. We know that the early church celebrated communion in the evening. There is no evidence that the early church met for communion the night before the Lord’s day, i.e., on “Saturday” evening. The first communion feasts took place on the evening of the Lord's resurrection, at Emmaus and Jerusalem, and in the latter case, the sun must have gone down before the meal. They did not take communion with Christ the day after His resurrection. Communion is taken on the Lord's day. Hence, we should count the New Testament day of rest from sunrise to sunrise ("Sunday" morning to "Monday" morning).

5. Leon Morris, The Gospel According to John (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1971), p. 158n.

Modern churches have not been rigid in this regard. Few of them ever discuss the matter. Among more sabbatarian denominations, the timing of the beginning of the sabbath is left to the discretion of individual members. Nine o'clock, the hour that the Holy Spirit fell upon the church at Pentecost, is about as early as most churches require attendance.

The Passover celebrated by Jesus and His disciples looked forward to deliverance, just as the Passover meal in Egypt looked forward to deliverance. The communion feast of the church looks back, knowing that deliverance has come, and it dates the Lord's day with the risen sun. The communion feast is the capstone of a day of rest. As such, it then looks forward ritually to a week of work beginning the following day, the continuation of men's efforts to fulfill the terms of God's dominion covenant. Passover points to dominion. Christ announced at the Passover, "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Luke 22: 29–30).⁶

Conclusion

We no longer look forward to deliverance from bondage; we look forward to dominion. Dominion begins with our labor on the day following the Lord's day of rest, just as it was supposed to begin for Adam. The communion meal, like the Passover meal, is to be celebrated in the evening. Also like the Passover meal, it looks forward to the next morning. But the victory is behind us. Deliverance came definitively at Calvary. We are strengthened in our faith the night before we are to go forth to exercise dominion, just as the Hebrews were strengthened in body by their Passover meal the night before God delivered them from bondage.

6. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 51.

APPENDIX G

MACAULAY ON DEMOCRACY

Lord Macaulay, the English historian-statesman of the mid-nineteenth century, was a defender of the classical liberal society, meaning a society marked by constitutionally limited civil government and by private property. In 1857, he wrote a letter to an American, H. S. Randall, in which he discussed his doubts about pure democracy in general and Jeffersonian democracy in particular. He made a number of predictions concerning the fate of private property under a rule of universal suffrage. Some of these predictions have come true in the United States. They did so during the New Deal of the 1930s. Other remarks seem more appropriate in describing his beloved England, especially since the 1930s.

The fundamental political issue, he argued, is the question of self-restraint, or as I have put it elsewhere in this book, self-government. He despaired at the ability of the poorer members of society to refrain from using their numerical superiority at the ballot box to extort the property of richer men. His arguments, taken individually, are familiar to anyone who has studied the interminable debate over democracy, taxation, and the franchise. What is remarkable was his ability to articulate them in one place, and then apply them to his own era.

He was convinced that those people without wealth will not restrain themselves in the pursuit of other people's money if they ever got the franchise. The problem with this argument is this: Self-restraint regarding other people's money is not a quality limited to those who already possess money. If anything, the addiction grows, which is why Christ warned against Mammon as the chief rival of God (Matt. 6:24–25). Mammon is the great, insatiable god of more. The prophets of Israel noted repeatedly that the leaders of the nation were economically corrupt—surely as corrupt any modern special-interest group. When it comes to the politics of plunder, every interest group fears the vote-getting abilities of its rivals, and deservedly so.

Because of the difficulty in obtaining copies of the book in which his letter appeared, I reproduce it in full, except for a brief introductory paragraph, in which Macaulay thanked Randall for his gift of some books on the history of colonial New York State, and a concluding paragraph on Thomas Jefferson. The doubts raised by Macaulay are with us still, and will continue to be problems for stable political orders for as long as: (1) all men can vote; (2) some men have little property; (3) the Christian teachings against envy, covetousness, and theft are not universally honored. (I have taken the liberty of breaking this letter into paragraphs; the original constitutes the longest sustained paragraph I have ever come across.)

You are surprised to learn that I have not a high opinion of Mr. Jefferson, and I am surprised at your surprise. I am certain that I never wrote a line, and that I never, in Parliament, in conversation, or even on the hustings—a place where it is the fashion to court the populace—uttered a word indicating an opinion that the supreme authority in a state ought to be entrusted to the majority of citizens by the head; in other words, to the poorest and most ignorant part of society. I have long been convinced that institutions purely democratic must, sooner or later, destroy liberty or civilization, or both.

In Europe, where the population is dense, the effect of such institutions would be almost instantaneous. What happened lately in France is an example. In 1848 a pure democracy was established there. During a short time there was reason to expect a general spoliation, a national bankruptcy, a new partition of the soil, a maximum of prices, a ruinous load of taxation laid on the rich for the purpose of supporting the poor in idleness. Such a system would, in twenty years, have made France as poor and barbarous as the France of the Carolingians. Happily, the danger was averted; and now there is a despotism, a silent tribune [Emperor Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, supposedly the nephew of the more famous Bonaparte—G.N.], an enslaved press. Liberty is gone, but civilization has been saved. I have not the smallest doubt that if we had a purely democratic government here the effect would be the same. Either the poor would plunder the rich, and civilization would perish; or order and prosperity would be saved by a strong military government, and liberty would perish.

You may think that your country enjoys an exemption from these evils. I will frankly own to you that I am of a very different opinion. Your fate I believe to be certain, though it is deferred by a physical cause. As long as you have a boundless extent of fertile and unoccupied land, your laboring population will be far more at ease than the laboring population of the Old World, and, while that is the case, the Jefferson politics may continue to exist without causing any fatal calamity. But the time will come when New England will be as thickly populated as old England. Wages will be as low, and will fluctuate as much with you as with us. You will have your Manchesters and Birminghams, and in those Manchesters and Birminghams hundreds of thousands of artisans will assuredly be out of work. Then your institutions will be fairly brought to the test. Distress everywhere makes the laborer mutinous and discontented, and inclines him to listen with eagerness to agitators who tell him that it is a monstrous iniquity that one man should have a million, while another can not get a full meal.

In bad years there is plenty of grumbling here, and sometimes a little rioting. But it matters little. For here the sufferers are not the rulers. The supreme power is in the hands of a class, numerous indeed, but select; of an educated class; of a class which is, and knows itself to be, deeply interested in the security of property and the maintenance of order. Accordingly, the malcontents are firmly yet gently restrained. The bad time is got over with out robbing the wealthy to relieve the indigent. The springs of national prosperity soon begin to flow again; work is plentiful, wages rise, and all is tranquility and cheerfulness. I have seen England pass three or four times through such critical seasons as I have described. Through such seasons the United States will have to pass in the course of the next century, if not of this. How will you pass through them? I heartily wish you a good deliverance. But my reason and my wishes are at war, and I can not help foreboding the worst.

It is quite plain that your Government will never be able to restrain a distressed and discontented majority. For with you the majority is the Government, and has the rich, who are always a minority, always at its mercy. The day will come when in the State of New York a multitude of people, none of whom has had more than half a breakfast, or expects to have more than half a dinner, will choose a Legislature. Is it possible to doubt what sort of Legislature will be chosen? On one side is a statesman preaching patience, respect for vested rights, strict observance of public faith. On the other is a demagogue ranting about the tyranny of capitalists and usurers, and asking why any body should be permitted to drink Champagne and to ride in a carriage, while thousands of honest folks are in want of necessities. Which of the two candidates is likely to be preferred by a working-man who hears his children cry for more bread?

I seriously apprehend that you will, in some such season of adversity as I have described, do things which will prevent prosperity from returning; that you will act like people who should in a year of scarcity devour all the seed-corn, and thus make the next a year not of scarcity but of famine. There will be, I fear, spoilation. The spoilation will increase the distress. The distress will produce fresh spoilation.

Your Constitution is all sail and no anchor. As I said before, when a society has entered on this downward progress, either civilization or liberty must perish. Either some Caesar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government with a strong hand, or your republic will be as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the twentieth century as the Roman Empire was in the fifth; with this difference, that the Huns and Vandals who ravaged the Roman Empire came from without, and that your Huns and Vandals will have been engendered within your own country by your own institutions.¹

This is an eloquent statement. It is easy enough to pick apart some of his specific arguments. For example, the territory of the United States remains predominantly either rural or wilderness, with a very thin population per square mile. The myth of “open spaces” as a factor in reducing class warfare in the United States is just that, a myth² (and certainly as far as God was concerned when He promised the Israelites even more population growth in an already “overpopulated” nation). Overpopulation theories always paint pictures of starving masses, but in the decade following Macaulay’s letter and continuing into the last decade of the nineteenth century, population in the United States doubled, filling the Eastern seaboard with immigrants who did not speak English, and who had little or no formal education, yet economic output quadrupled in this same era, doubling per capita income and lowering prices by 60%.³ The question of per capita wealth does not

1. G. Otto Trevelyan (ed.), The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1875), II, pp. 408–10.

2. The American historian whose name is generally associated with this theory is Frederick Jackson Turner, a highly influential teacher at the University of Wisconsin and Harvard in the late nineteenth century, and a man who wrote almost nothing. See Ray Allen Billington (ed.), Frontier and Section: Selected Essays of Frederick Jackson Turner (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1961). For critical evaluations, see Richard Hofstadter and Seymour Martin Lipset (eds.), Turner and the Sociology of the Frontier (New York: Basic Books, 1968).

3. Milton Friedman and Anna Jacobson Schwartz, A Monetary History of the United States, 1867–1960 (Princeton University Press and the National Bureau of Economic Research, 1963), charts 3, 8 (pp. 30, 94–95). Population data: Historical Statistics of the United States, Colonial Times to 1957 (Washington, D.C.: Bureau of Commerce, 1960), p. 7, Series A 1–3.

hinge primarily on population growth as such, just as the Hebrews were informed by God. Population growth is a blessing. The relevant factors are such things as the time-orientation of the society, its commitment to biblical law, and its rate of per capita investment. The important question is: What is a society's capital base, which includes above all men's education and ethics?

In this respect, Macaulay misjudged the political life of his own nation, for it was England that first capitulated to the politics of envy, of mass democracy, not the United States. When, on August 10, 1911, the House of Lords voted to abolish its veto power over the House of Commons, under threat of the creation of hundreds of new Liberal Party peerages by the King, the handwriting was on the wall. When, the next day, the Commons passed the Payment of Members Bill, the wall itself collapsed.⁴ No longer would members be required to raise their own funds to serve as politicians. The era of the professional politician had arrived in England.

But Macaulay's warning about the ability of the statesman to withstand the rhetoric of the "tax and spend" demagogue was valid. The history of the twentieth century points to the grim reality of the impotence of any institutional arrangements or formal constitutional restraints, in and of themselves, to reverse the spread of the ideology of socialism. Compulsory wealth redistribution is almost universally accepted in nation after nation, irrespective of the political history of any given society. Furthermore, it has not always been the propertyless masses who have voted to impose socialistic policies; all too often the leadership has come from financially secure intellectuals.⁵ Middle-class voters, simultaneously guilt-ridden and envious, have voted away their own economic futures unknowingly, always in the name of the poor, with the bills supposedly to be paid for by the rich.

So, Macaulay's concern about American institutional arrangements, as distinguished from British institutions, was misguided. Both the British and the American systems capitulated in principle about the same time, from 1900 to the First World War, and both societies experienced increasing collectivism in the 1930s, in the political responses to the Great Depression. After the Second World War ended in 1945, British socialists made far more gains politically than American economic interventionists did.

4. Barbara Tuchman, The Proud Tower: A Portrait of the World Before the War, 1890-1914 (New York: Macmillan, 1966), ch. 7: "The Transfer of Power."

5. Joseph A. Schumpeter, Capitalism, Socialism, and Democracy (New York: Harper & Bros., 1942), ch. 13.

What Macaulay did not perceive was the rise of the middle class. The long-term effect of compound per capita economic growth has been to reduce the percentage of voters who regard themselves as poor. Middle-class voters own their own homes, even though the homes are mortgaged. These voters have a stake in society: property. By the standards of 1850, let alone 1650, the common man today is rich. He thinks of himself as a property owner. He resists additional taxation.

Both nations began to reverse the drift into statism, beginning within a two-year period: Margaret Thatcher in Britain (1979) and Ronald Reagan in the United States (1981). A majority of voters in both nations decided that they had suffered from more than enough from government regulation, bureaucracy, and high marginal tax rates. The welfare state was rolled back at its edges, but not where it counts most, fiscally speaking: the inter-generational redistribution of wealth. In the case of Great Britain, the state-funded National Health Service remains sacrosanct, as does the Medicare program for the elderly in the United States.

The substance of Macaulay's letter has been confirmed in several respects, and in no sense did the twentieth century prove him to be categorically incorrect. The drift toward the welfare state continues, despite intermittent political reversals. Only when the major state programs of inter-generational wealth-redistribution are repealed through the politically concealed bankruptcy of mass inflation or by outright default will this drift be reversed. The West faces this prospect well before the twenty-first century reaches the halfway point.

APPENDIX H

THE EPISTEMOLOGICAL PROBLEM OF SOCIAL COST

Costs and benefits cannot be compared across individuals, even when monetary sums are involved, because of the impossibility of interpersonal utility comparison. This insight is a straightforward application of the defining principle of the Austrian school: radical subjectivism.¹

Since all costs and benefits are subjective, no government can accurately identify, much less establish, the optimum quantity of anything. But even the tort [private law suit over wrongs—G.N.] approach runs up against the immeasurability of costs and benefits: how are damages to be determined?²

Another problem is the lack of a method for calculating the effect of a decision or policy on the total happiness of the relevant population. Even within just the human population, there is no reliable technique for measuring a change in the level of satisfaction of one individual relative to a change in the level of satisfaction of another.³

Introduction

I wrote this appendix in 1989. It appeared in Tools of Dominion: The Case Laws of Exodus in 1990. I published a re-written version of it as a book in 1991: The Coase Theorem. In that year, Ronald H. Coase won the Nobel Prize in Economics. The next year, his disciple Gary Becker won it. I had devoted considerable space in this appendix and my book to Becker's application of Coase's theorem in the area of crime and crime-prevention.

1. John B. Egger, "Comment: Efficiency Is Not a Substitute for Ethics," in Mario J. Rizzo (ed.), Time, Uncertainty, and Disequilibrium (Lexington, Massachusetts: Lexington Books, 1979), p. 121. (<http://bit.ly/BairdPollution>). Italics not in original.

2. Charles W. Baird, "The Philosophy and Ideology of Pollution Regulation," Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), p. 303. Italics not in original.

3. Richard A. Posner, The Economics of Justice (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), p. 54. Italics not in original.

This is the longest chapter or appendix on a strictly economic topic in any of my volumes in An Economic Commentary on the Bible. I regard this chapter as my best single essay on economics. A short version of it was published in The Journal of Libertarian Studies in the fall of 2002.⁴

I have challenged the man who persuaded the entire 21-member faculty of the University of Chicago that he was right and they were wrong. He did this in one after-dinner meeting. They were all opposed to his idea on pollution and harm at the beginning of this meeting. At the end of the evening, they were all in favor. This is recorded in the autobiography of one of the participants, Nobel Prize-winner George Stigler.⁵ In 1960, Coase published what is probably the single most influential academic article in the history of the economics profession, "The Problem of Social Cost," in which he defended his after-dinner theory. I am writing this updated version half a century after its publication. Coase is 100 years old. In late 2009, the law school of George Mason University honored Coase with a special conference.⁶ In July, 2010, the law school of the University of Chicago followed suit.⁷ He was honored for two articles: "The Theory of the Firm" (1937) and "The Problem of Social Cost." No other modern economist is so widely honored who wrote so little.

In this appendix, I apply a fundamental discovery of secular economic theory, made in 1932 by Lionel Robbins, who was later made Lord Robbins: there is no possibility of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility on a scientific basis. This seemingly obvious yet obscure technical discovery undermines all claims of scientific policymaking based on economic theory. It especially undermines the Coase theorem. The unwillingness of economists to admit what they know that their theory of economics teaches constitutes the single most blatant example of willful deception—including self-deception—and arrogance of the economics profession. It relegates the entire profession into the category of self-interested con artists. They admit to self-interest. This is not merely an admission; it is their badge of epistemological honor. But they do not admit to being con artists.

4. Gary North, "Undermining Property Rights: Coase and Becker," Journal of Libertarian Studies, XVI (Fall 2002). (http:// bit.ly/CoaseBecker)

5. George Stigler, Memoirs of an Unregulated Economist (New York: Basic Books, 1988), p. 76.

6. <http://bit.ly/CoaseGMULaw>.

7. <http://bit.ly/CoaseChicagoLaw>.

It is a well-known fact that people find it difficult to follow long chains of reasoning. So, let me present my conclusion up front, in a form that does not require a long chain of reasoning.

You cannot prove, scientifically, that your proposed use for my home is of greater value to society than my uses for my home. Even if you could, you would not thereby establish a legal claim to use my home, forcing me to pay you money in order to keep you out, nor could any judge legitimately authorize your claim.

Let me put it even more succinctly. “No Trespassing. Trespassers will be prosecuted.” Is this clear? Do you believe that the sign is morally legitimate? Yes? Very good. You are opposed to Coase’s theorem. You think: “Who wouldn’t be?” I answer: “At least 21 members of the economics faculty of the University of Chicago, now deceased, and most free market economists.”

The fundamental issue of the Coase theorem is this: the owner’s moral right to exclude access. Coase denied ownership’s moral relevance. He went on to deny its legal authority.

Without the right to exclude, there is no ownership. There is only the private defense of property rights through individual violence. “Trespassers will be shot.” Coase still does not understand this, Milton Friedman did not understand this, virtually the entire Chicago School faction of the economics profession does not understand this, and at least two law schools do not understand this. You are already way ahead of the experts. In this appendix, I show why you are ahead.

The central theoretical issue of Coase’s theorem—as distinguished from both the central ethical issue and the central legal issue—is the question of economic value. Coase persuaded the University of Chicago’s economics faculty, one by one, to switch their collective solution to this question: “How can we—society—maximize economic value when dealing with instances of pollution?” This is a heavily loaded question. To begin to answer it, we must understand what modern economists mean—and do not mean—by “economic value.” So, let us begin an exploration. This will take some time and effort. Stay with me.

A. Value and Price

Economists ask a crucial question: “What is the logical relationship between value and price?” For over two centuries, generations of economists have attempted to discover the answer, and it eludes them today as much as it did in the days of Adam Smith. The difference is, today the lack of any internally consistent answer is covered by far more layers of logical dead ends that were (and are still) described as successful solutions to the problem.

Is value exclusively objective, also known as intrinsic? Or is value exclusively subjective, also known as imputed? The reason why I use the adjective exclusively is because humanistic economic theory has yet to show how value can be both subjective and objective. This dualism goes back to the same either/or exclusivity in Greek philosophy. The Greek philosophers asked: "Is an action morally good because of its intrinsic goodness or because either society or individuals say that it is good?" They never did answer this to each other's satisfaction. It is still a dividing issue in ethics. In medieval philosophy, this dualism was manifested in the battle over realism (intrinsic) and nominalism (imputed).

Let us begin the inquiry. Assume that you are interrogating a humanistic economist. You ask: If all economic value is objective, then why do prices keep changing? What is it that makes them change? The economist answers: Supply and demand change. You then ask: But why does supply change? He answers: In response to changes in demand. But why does demand change? Because people change their minds. Why? Because prices change. Why do prices change? Changing supply and demand.

Wait a minute. We are going in circles. We had better talk about demand apart from price. Sorry; you are not allowed to talk about demand apart from price, or price apart from demand. All right, let me ask this: If the people change their minds about economic value because of changes in demand, then isn't the price of everything really based on subjective value? Yes, that is correct. Personal subjective value? Yes, that is correct. But how is personal subjective value translated into objective value? It isn't; there is no objective value. Well, then, how is personal subjective value translated into objective prices? Through competitive bidding.

But how can we be sure that the outcome of the objective individual bids reflects the true value to society? By denying that there is any true value to society apart from the outcome of the objective individual bids. But what if society disagrees? There is no such thing as society; there are only individuals. But what if individuals vote to change the outcome? That is their legal privilege in a democracy. Are you saying that democracy is a valid way to achieve social goals? I am an eco- nomist; I can only tell you the outcome of events, given certain causes. Should democracies vote to change the outcome of the bids? I am an economist; there is no ultimate "should" for an economist.

That reminds me: What is the value of economics? Sorry; economics does not objectively exist; only economists exist. What is an economist? An economist is someone who does economics. I see. Well, then, what is the value of an economist? That must be determined subjectively. All right, what is the price of an economist? All the market will bear. Are we paying economists too much? The free market will decide that. Do we have a free market in economists today? I'd prefer not to say; I might get fired. I work for a state university. It is not in my self-interest to answer your question.

In my view, the answer is clear: yes, we are paying economists too much. Is my view correct? That is the question.

In this essay, I intend to show that all of modern economics is a gigantic intellectual fraud, an illusion so successful that its practitioners are not aware of the fraud which they are perpetrating. I will show that the procedures that economists say they use are not the ones they actually use, that the presuppositions they say they have adopted are not actually the ones they have adopted, and that their ability to make economic judgments is in fact denied by their very methodology. All you have to do is read the entire essay, paying attention to my arguments as you read.

Am I overstating my case? You cannot know for sure until you read it. Is it worth the risk—the time, energy, and mental effort—to find out? Only you can say.

Therein lies the problem of modern economics.

B. To Read or Not to Read

What will it cost you to read this essay? You will never know for sure. This question is analogous to a far more important question in life, "What will it cost me to marry this person?" Both questions really mean: "What will I have to give up forever?" While the "foreverness" of the marriage decision is more obvious to us—"till death do us part" is a graphic covenant phrase—the "foreverness" of every decision is analogous, though not of the same order of magnitude.

When I choose this rather than that, I forever forfeit that, as well as all the little thats which might have been born later on. Perhaps I can change my mind later on, and buy that, but it will not be the same that which I choose not to buy today. It is a later that. Like a high school sweetheart whom you marry only after your first spouse dies, time has worked its changes on both of you. Everything that a person might have accomplished with that during the period of "this rather than that" is gone forever.

We know this: in making any decision, we must forfeit many things that might have been but will never be—indeed, a whole lifetime of things that might have been—but we never know exactly what. Every decision, moment by moment, is to some extent the proverbial fork in the road. We cannot predict the next 20 moves and counter-moves in a chess game: moves that will become reality in part because of expectations regarding the next move. So, it is safe to say that we cannot know what life has in store for us just because we do one thing today rather than another.

If you read this essay, it is because you think it will be "worth your time." But what is your time worth? What is your time worth right now? It is worth whatever is the most valuable use to which you can put it. What is the cost of spending your time one way rather than another? The value of the most valuable use you must forego. So, what is your decision? "To read or not to read, that is the question!"

Decisions, decisions. Once our decision is made, we put the past irrevocably behind us. "The moving finger writes, and having written, moves on." We then face the consequences of our decision. But these consequences—these costs—are imposed on us after the decision, not before. They are costs, but they are not costs that affected the original action. Expected costs affected the original action, not the actual costs that we in fact subsequently experience. Is this unclear? Ask the person who married the "wrong" spouse to explain the difference between expected costs and resulting costs. James Buchanan distinguished between two kinds of costs: choice-influencing costs and choice-influenced costs.⁹

C. Unmeasurable Costs

Choice-influencing costs are inherently unmeasurable by any scientific standard. The economist insists that, like beauty in the eyes of the beholder, these economic costs exist only in the mind of the decision-maker. They are subjectively perceived, and only subjectively perceived. And yet, and yet . . . there really are beautiful women and ugly women, and just about everyone can discern the difference, including the respective women (especially the women). But how is this possible? How can we deny the objective reality of beauty in the name of a “higher” subjective reality, when we know this: in order for our subjective appraisals to have meaning, there had better be an objective reality undergirding them? After all, two and two make four. Or do they? Does the objective answer depend on the subjective evaluator? The modern mathematician is not really sure.¹⁰

9. James Buchanan, Cost and Choice: An Inquiry in Economic Theory (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969), pp. 44–45. Buchanan won the Nobel Prize in economics in 1986.

1. Buchanan’s Argument

The costs that influence our decisions are always subjective evaluations of future potential consequences. This is Buchanan’s argument. Once we act, however, objective reality takes over, replacing our mental forecasts with cold, hard facts. (And yet, and yet . . . in order to be perceived by us, these cold, hard facts must first be warmed in the microwave ovens of our minds.) Thus, concluded Buchanan: “Costs that are influential for behavior do not exist; they are never realized; they cannot be measured after the fact.”¹¹ The dream becomes reality, but the reality is always different from the dream, at least to this extent: the dream could not be measured; the reality can be. Supposedly. Maybe. We hope.

Buchanan argued that the choice-influenced costs that are subsequently imposed on people as a result of some previous decision are in some sense objective and measurable—so many forfeited dollars of income, for example¹²—but these real-world costs did not affect the original decision in any way. Yet even this doffing of the economist’s cap to objective cost theory may be overly respectful, given the presuppositions of modern subjectivist economics. The meaning of these objective, choice-influenced costs—e.g., accounting costs—must be subjectively evaluated by the person who personally bears them. A number in a ledger is supposed to convey accurate and economically relev- ant information in order for it to be effective as a summary of past events. The individual who pays an accountant thinks he is getting something for his money. What is he getting? A bunch of numbers on a page? Or information? The individual must interpret the significance of this information. There is no escape from subjectivism.

10. Vern Poythress, “A Biblical View of Mathematics,” in Gary North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship: Essays in the Van Til Perspective (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1976), pp. 159–88.

11. Ibid., p. vii.

12. Even here, who can be sure just how many dollars were actually forfeited as a result of the decision? Would the person’s perceived alternative use of his money have been as wise (high return) as the best opportunity the market objectively offered at the time?

2. The Roads Not Travelled

Consider your own situation. You are still reading this essay. You still have faith. Let us consider a hypothetical possibility. With the time you spend reading this essay (assuming you stick with it to the bitter or delightful end), you might be able to think of an investment strategy that would make you rich, but because of something you will read here, you will never think of it or have the courage to risk it. On the other hand, you may also avoid an investment that really would bankrupt you. Unlike the man in the story of the lady and the tiger, you have the option of ignoring both doors; instead, you choose to read this essay. But you could have opened a door. Which would it have been, the lady or the tiger? You cannot know for sure. You will never know. You can only guess. So, what is the true cost of reading this essay? Life with the lady or a brief but colorful encounter with the tiger?

If we take seriously the modern economist's discussion of costs and choices, we may find our world disturbing. We never really know what our actions are costing us, assuming that it is true that there is no way to relate our subjective evaluations before we act with objective costs after we act. This disturbing lack of certainty can be relieved, however: "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28).¹³ But this suggestion is hardly helpful to the modern humanistic economist.

We can of course sit around moaning and groaning about a past cost: the abandoned dream that might have come true. We can worry retroactively about what our decision has cost us. But the cost that really counted—"counted" is in fact misleading, since there was nothing objective to count—at the moment of our decision was imposed at that moment. What is past is past. Paul wrote: ". . . forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before" (Phil. 3:13). This is what the economist says of all decisions. Decision-makers are necessarily forward-looking. The past is gone forever. We must do the best we can with whatever we have today. This is the doctrine of sunk costs.¹⁴

13. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

This is not to say that we do not bear the objective costs that are imposed by a previous decision. We do. Even if we do not perceive these costs, we bear them. A madman may not understand that he is not Napoleon, but he bears the social costs of his delusion when he is placed in an insane asylum. This is why there can be no escape from objective costs, any more than from subjective costs. But whether we accurately foresaw these costs or not, they are the result of that action, not its cause. These costs are borne by us objectively in history, yet they are always subjectively borne. One person may bear his burden in good cheer; another is utterly oppressed by what objectively (i.e., to an outside evaluator) appears to be the same magnitude of burden. Who is to say whose evaluation is correct? Only the omniscient God can do this, and His evaluation is not objectively measurable by the economist. This does not refute its existence. God imputes. God judges. God renders final judgment. There will be a day of reckoning—of counting and evaluating.

D. Some Odd Conclusions

An exclusively subjectivist view of cost and choice can lead to some very odd conclusions. (So, for that matter, can any other exclusive line of human reasoning.) G. F. Thirlby followed the logic of the one-time decision and concluded: "Cost is ephemeral. The cost involved in a particular decision loses its significance with the making of a decision because the decision displaces the alternative course of action."¹⁵ This is Buchanan's view. Thirlby said emphatically that "the cost figure will never become objective; i.e., it will never be possible to check whether the forecast of the alternative revenue was correct, because the alternative undertaking will never come into existence to produce the actual alternative revenue."¹⁶

14. Gary North, An Introduction to Christian Economics (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), ch. 26. (<http://bit.ly/gnintro>)

15. G. F. Thirlby, "The Subjective Theory of Value and Accounting Cost," Economica, XII (Feb. 1946), p. 34; cited by Buchanan, Cost and Choice, p. 31. This essay is reprinted in James Buchanan and G. F. Thirlby (eds.), L.S.E. Essays on Cost (New York: New York University Press, 1981). L.S.E. stands for London School of Economics.

16. Thirlby, "The Ruler," South African Journal of Economics, XIV (Dec. 1946), p. 264; ibid., p. 33.

1. Should You Fire Your Accountant?

What does this mean for the accounting profession? What does it do to the very concept of personal or corporate budgeting? He did not say, but he did not stop, either. Following the persuasive logic of subjectivism, Thirlby concluded that “The cost is not the things—e.g., money—which will flow along certain channels as a result of the decision; it is a loss, prospective or otherwise, to the person making the decision. . . . cost cannot be discovered by another person who eventually watches and records the flow of those things along those channels.”¹⁷ Then of what objective use are accountants? Why was the advent of double-entry bookkeeping such a revolutionary event in the history of civilization?¹⁸ He did not say.

Furthermore, what does such a view of budgeting do to the idea of the free market as a social institution for producing economic order—objective economic order? What does such a view do to the idea of the stock market, since money prices for shares are the means by which decision-makers evaluate the past performance of all other participants in the market? What does the price of a share of corporate stock have to do with expected future performance of that corporation’s management? What is the link, if any, between present share prices and future economic performance? How do we get from subjective value to objective share prices and back again? How do we preserve our capital? For that matter, how do we measure our capital? How can we bridge the gap between the world of purely subjective costs and objective market prices? Buchanan insisted: “Only prices have objective, empirical content. . . .”¹⁹ Then precisely what empirical content does a price possess or reveal, and how do we discover it or make effective use of it—subjectively and objectively, personally and socially?

In short, what does an objective price have to do with individual subjective value? What is the economic meaning of a price—individually and socially, subjectively and objectively? (This is the number-one epistemological problem that has beset modern economics since the 1870s.)

17. Thirlby, “Subjective Theory,” ibid., p. 31.

18. Ludwig von Mises, Human Action: A Treatise on Economics, (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 301. (<http://bit.ly/MisesHA>)

19. Buchanan, Cost and Choice, p. 85.

2. The Realm of Possibility

Another example: Buchanan made this statement: "Any profit opportunity that is within the realm of possibility but which is rejected becomes a cost of undertaking the preferred course of action."²⁰ But Buchanan neglected any consideration of the economics of a rejected opportunity that is not in fact—objective fact—within the realm of possibility. We normally call such an opportunity a loss. Wouldn't avoiding a loss be a benefit of undertaking the preferred course of action? If the decision-maker's first choice is to reject the objectively impossible (i.e., unprofitable) course of action for whatever reason, and also to reject the second, objectively possible, course of action for whatever reason, won't he remain in the profit column overall? I do not want to press this line of reasoning too hard because it bogs us down too deeply in the philosophical problem of available and unavailable information, but we need to recognize at least the nature of the epistemological problem: if everything is completely subjective at the moment of decision, what does "the realm of possibility" have to do with anything? Maybe the decision-maker believes that could achieve something great if he just had the courage of his convictions, when in fact he would have gone bankrupt. Is his true cost the forfeited unattainable greatness or the forfeited inevitable bankruptcy? If all costs at the time of his decision are purely subjective, then his cost must be the forfeited greatness he believed he would attain. This, clearly, is nutty—logical but nutty. So is any theory of cost and choice that is exclusively subjective.

The economist, no matter how hard he tries to tie human decisions exclusively to the action-taker's subjective evaluations, cannot escape the bedrock realm of possibility. Possibility is his measuring rod for discussing cost, a "ruler" without which all economic discussion becomes theoretically impossible. On the other hand, no matter how hard he tries to make objective that realm of possibility, through probability theory and other statistical techniques, he cannot escape the inherent subjectivity of the decision of the acting individual who is responsible for his actions. The economist needs—yes, *needs*²¹—a scientific theory of cost that is both subjective and objective without being eternally dialectical. Such a scientific theory does not exist in hu-

20. Ibid., p. 28.

21. Few concepts are less acceptable to an economist than the concept of need. A need is something which is not negotiable, and for an economist, everything economic is defined as negotiable.

manistic theory. This is the heart of my critique of all previous discussions of the problem of social cost.

E. The Persistent Question of Value

Economists, as self-consciously humanistic social scientists, claim to be defenders of a rational academic discipline. Most of them defend their methodology in terms of the assertion that it allows them to make accurate predictions of human actions under limited, specified conditions.²² These predictions are supposed to enable people to make economic decisions that are more profitable than decisions made by flipping a coin, consulting a fortune teller, or throwing darts at a wall covered with slips of paper, with each slip containing a different suggested course of action.

To make their claim believable, economists have to make a myriad of assumptions about reason, the human mind, the powers of observation, the external world, and the interrelationships between the mind and matter. These assumptions are very seldom spelled out by economists.²³ Epistemology, the fundamental question of all philosophy—"What can man know, and how can he know it?"—is not a popular topic within the economics profession.²⁴

1. The Problem of Measurement

The advent of modern economics is generally dated from the early 1870s, when three scholars independently came to the same conclusion, namely, that economic value is imputed: the concept of subjective value.²⁵ Value, they concluded, is subjectively determined. It is not an objective quantity. The key unit of value is the value (subjective) of the marginal unit. The decision-maker asks himself: "How much (objective) of this must I give up in order to obtain that?" By 1900, virtually all non-Marxist economists had broken with the older objective

22. Milton Friedman, Essays in Positive Economics (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953), ch. 1: "The Methodology of Positive Economics."

23. Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship.

24. Fritz Machlup, "Introductory Remarks," American Economic Review, Papers and Proceedings, XLII (May 1952), p. 34.

25. The three scholars were William Stanley Jevons (England), Carl Menger (Austria), and Leon Walras (Switzerland). See R. S. Hovey, The Rise of the Marginal Utility School, 1870–1889 (Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1960); Emil Kauder, A History of Marginal Utility (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1965).

value theories of the classical economists, such as the labor theory of value or the cost-of-production theory of value. By grounding economics on the subjective valuations of individual decision-makers, economists today believe that they have escaped from the intellectual dilemmas that had arisen as a result of classical economics' objective value theory. (The most famous one was Adam Smith's "water-diamond paradox.")²⁶

They are self-deluded. They have not escaped such problems. They have merely created new intellectual problems for themselves—problems that are inescapable, given their commitment to the ancient ideal of humanism: "man as the measure of all things" (Protagoras).²⁷ (The careful economist would add this cautious corollary, "assuming for the sake of argument that there can be such a thing as a measure in economics.")

If man is the measure of all things, and man himself is a subjective, changing, and ultimately "free spirit," then man cannot serve as a measure of anything. Measures must be fixed, but there are no remaining fixed measures in modern thought—not even the speed of light (at least in quantum physics).²⁸ They are no longer fixed in biology: Darwinism's world of process has triumphed over fixed measures.²⁹ Meas-

26. "The things which have the greatest value in use have frequently little or no value in exchange. . . . Nothing is more useful than water: . . . A diamond, on the contrary, has scarce any value in use; . . ." Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations (1776), end of Chapter IV. The paradox: Why is it that something as valuable to human life as water is worth so little in comparison to diamonds, which are not really crucial to mankind? The marginalist-subjectivist's solution: "We never choose between water in general and diamonds in general. We choose between a specific amount of water and a specific amount of diamonds at a specific point in time. In the middle of a desert, someone might choose a drink of water over a bag of diamonds. Normally he wouldn't. Water is abundant compared to diamonds most of the time. Thus, the decision-maker's subjective evaluation at a particular moment of time is crucial, not the hypothetical (and non-existent) objective value of water in general vs. the objective value of diamonds in general."

27. Assertion 5 of Humanist Manifesto I (1933) stated: "Humanism asserts that the nature of the universe depicted by modern science makes unacceptable any supernatural or cosmic guarantees of human values." Humanist Manifestos I and II (Buffalo, New York: Prometheus Press, 1973), p. 8.

28. I refer here to the startling theory of subatomic physics, verified by numerous experiments, known as Bell's Theorem, which states that at the subatomic level, all events must be simultaneously related to each other across the entire universe. See Nick Herbert, Quantum Reality: Beyond the New Physics (Garden City, New York: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1985), p. 214.

29. Assertion 2 of Humanist Manifesto I stated: "Humanism believes that man is a part of nature and that he has emerged as the result of a continuous process." Humanist Manifestos I and II, p. 8.

ures are no longer fixed in morals.³⁰ They are no longer fixed in epistemology.³¹ They do not exist in economics.³² There are no measures at all. There may be discrete, permanent numbers—even this is highly speculative³³—but there are no measures. Everything is on a continuum, nothing is discrete.³⁴ This absence of measures leads, step by step, to radical subjectivism and radical relativism. Heraclitus' river of flux is at last definitively eroding Parmenides' fixed shore line. Chaos looms.³⁵

Having said this, the economist nevertheless resists making the obvious conclusion regarding the relativity of all measurement: the denial of the possibility of relevant scientific precision. Vainly, he protests: "There are economists who have propounded the relativity of measure. Apparently, they failed to see that this view saps the entire foundation upon which the economic science rests."³⁶ Sap! He, too, is inescapably one of these epistemologically short-sighted economists.

Consider the question of environmental pollution. A consistent economist—an exceedingly rare creature—must conclude: "One man's polluted stream is another man's profit for the fiscal year, and there is no conceivable scientific way to say which is better for society in general, for there is no scientific way of identifying such an entity as society in general." To admit this, however, would be to commit methodological suicide in public. Modern economics has in fact committed suicide, but it has done so in private. Economists do not leap from tall buildings during their lunch hour. They much prefer to do away with themselves in private—through an overdose of qualifications.

30. In 1973, Humanist Manifesto II stated: "Ethics is autonomous and situational, needing no theological or ideological sanction. Ethics stems from human need and interest." Ibid., p. 17.

31. Delwin Brown, Ralph E. James, and Gene Reeves (eds.), Process Philosophy and Christian Thought (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1971).

32. Ludwig von Mises wrote: "The truth is that there are only variables and no constants. It is pointless to talk of variables where there are no invariables." Mises, Theory and History: An Interpretation of Social and Economic Evolution (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1957), p. 13. (<http://bit.ly/MisesTAH>)

33. Poythress, "A Biblical View of Mathematics," Foundations of Christian Scholarship, op. cit.

34. Nicholas Georgescu-Roegen, The Entropy Law and the Economic Process (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1971), ch. 3.

35. James Gleick, Chaos: Making a New Science (New York: Viking, 1987).

36. Georgescu-Roegen, Entropy Law, p. 111.

2. The Great Debate

In my commentary on Genesis, I discussed the problem of objective and subjective value at considerable length. I analyzed the important critique of Cambridge Professor A. C. Pigou by London School of Economics Professor Lionel Robbins, and then the subsequent debate between Robbins and Roy Harrod.³⁷ To review very briefly, Pigou, in his pioneering study of welfare economics, had argued that because each additional monetary unit's worth of income is worth less to a man than the previous unit, the value of one additional unit of income to a millionaire will necessarily be less than its value to a poverty-stricken man. Thus, Pigou concluded, the state can increase the aggregate social welfare of the community by taking a portion of the rich man's income in the high income brackets and transferring this money to the poor man. This tax will not hurt the rich man very much (he puts so little value on the last bit of money he receives), while the marginal income will greatly benefit the poor man (who has so little income to begin with). Net social utility is increased.

Robbins replied in 1932 that the argument is invalid as a scientific statement. Because all economic value is subjective, we cannot, as scientists, make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. There is no objective column of figures to add up when we are talking about subjective value. (If true, then the science of accounting has no logical connection with either the science of economics or the vocation of business. This obvious conclusion, however, is too radical for most economists even to discuss.)³⁸ Therefore, economists cannot legitimately say anything about the increase or decrease of "social value" which is produced by taking a percentage of the rich man's income in the higher brackets and giving this money to the poor man.³⁹ No one in the economics profession has ever proposed a rational answer to Robbins' argument, yet hardly any economist—I would say no economist—has been able to develop a comprehensive economic theory in terms of this argument, including Robbins.⁴⁰

37. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 5.

38. Gary North, "There's No (Autonomous) Accounting for Taste," Biblical Economics Today, XI (June/July 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gntaste>)

39. Lionel Robbins, An Essay on the Nature and Significance of Economic Science (New York: St. Martins, 1932), pp. 136–41. (<http://bit.ly/RobbinsEcon>)

40. Richard Posner wrote: "The 'interpersonal comparison of utilities' is anathema to the modern economist, and rightly so, because there is no metric for making such a comparison." Had he let it go at that, he would have been honest. But he knew what

Roy Harrod⁴¹ complained in his rejoinder in 1938 that if Robbins were really serious about this argument, then he would have to abandon the idea that it is possible for the economist, as a scientist, to make any recommendations concerning proper economic policy, since any state-imposed policy always hurts some participants and benefits others. If it is impossible to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility, then economists must remain forever silent about the aggregate (social) economic benefits and costs of any decision by an individual or the state.⁴²

Robbins was correct in his criticism of Pigou, given the presuppositions of modern, subjectivist economics. Harrod was equally correct in his criticism of Robbins, namely, that his conclusion would destroy all applied economic science. Robbins subsequently backed away from this conclusion concerning the inability of economists to say anything about social welfare or the benefits of social policies in general.⁴³ But he never explained how he could logically back away from this conclusion, and he lived until 1985. Even more inconsistently, he also never publicly backed away from his critique of Pigou's argument in favor of graduated ("progressive") income taxation.

The implications of Robbins' position are radical, and economists have long been unwilling to face them, including Robbins. Buchanan this would mean: the impossibility of formulating any social policy based on truly scientific economics, so he illegitimately added the following unproven and unprovable statement: "But the interpersonal comparison of values, in the economic sense, is feasible, although difficult, even when the values are not being compared in an explicit market." Posner, Economics of Justice, p. 79. Apparently, all the economist needs to do is change the word "utility" to "values," and he goes from the impossible to the merely difficult. Let me tell you something about humanistic economists: they cheat. Maybe not self-consciously, but the resulting confusion is the same. At the very least, the economics profession is self-deceived.

41. Harrod later became Sir Roy Harrod. He was John Maynard Keynes' hand-picked successor as editor of The Economic Journal. Together, they controlled access to England's most prestigious academic economics journal for half a century. Like Keynes, he never received an academic degree in economics. He did study economics with Keynes for one year, 1922–23. Neither of them ever earned a degree above the bachelor's degree: Keynes' was in mathematics and Harrod's was in the humanities. See Don Patinkin, Anticipations of the General Theory? And Other Essays on Keynes (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982), pp. xv, xvi. John Neville Keynes, Maynard's father, and Pigou personally paid for young Maynard's salary when they hired him to teach economics at King's College, Cambridge in 1908. Keynes, Sr. was chairman of the department for many years.

42. R. F. Harrod, "Scope and Method of Economics," Economic Journal, XLVIII (1938), p. 397.

43. Lionel Robbins, "Interpersonal Comparisons of Utility: A Comment," ibid., pp. 635–37.

once wrote that “it is precisely the problems posed in modern welfare economics that force the economist to come to grips with the basic issues of political and legal philosophy.”⁴⁴ These issues also force the more astute economist to come to grips with the fundamental issue of all philosophy: epistemology. But the ranks of the economics profession are filled with men and women who have no training in epistemology and care nothing about it.⁴⁵ They never answer by means of modern subjectivism the fundamental philosophical question: “What can men know, and how can they know it?” They operate in terms of an implicit though hidden dialecticism between objective and subjective value theory.

3. Social Cost

Pigou also raised another issue concerning welfare economics. It is a variant of the earlier problem of wealth redistribution. It has become known in the economics profession as “the problem of social cost.” Pigou argued that there are cases of market failure⁴⁶ in which private benefits from a particular activity impose costs on third parties. Pollution is the obvious example, although there are many others, he said. The benefits to the polluter are immediate and direct, but there is no market-produced incentive for him to cease polluting as long as his costs of operation are less than expected revenues.⁴⁷ Part of these costs are borne by someone else. At most, the polluter bears only part of the costs (stinging eyes, for example), but he reaps all of the rewards (lower production costs). He continues to pollute the environment. Total costs in the community—social costs—are therefore greater than his personal private costs. Followers of Pigou’s analysis frequently argue that the state should redistribute this “stolen” wealth back to the original owners, perhaps through a tax on polluters and tax reductions for victims, so as to balance total social benefits (from production) and total social costs.

There is a hidden problem with this line of reasoning, one which was not discovered for almost half a century. Buchanan pointed to it:

44. James Buchanan, “Good Economics—Bad Law,” Virginia Law Review, LX (1974), p. 488.

45. An exception is the Austrian School.

46. Tyler Cowen (ed.), The Theory of Market Failure: A Critical Examination (Fairfax, Virginia: George Mason University Press, 1988).

47. Yes, yes, I know: “the present value of an expected future stream of income, discounted by the prevailing rate of interest.” But sometimes I prefer to write in English.

"The Pigouvian norm aims at bringing marginal private costs, as these influence choice, into line with social costs, as these are objectively measured. Only with objective measurability can the proper corrective devices be introduced."⁴⁸ The problem is this: choice-influencing costs are exclusively subjective, according to modern economic theory. Only choice-influenced costs can be "objectively measured" (maybe). How can the judges impose objective costs that will be appropriate—scientifically appropriate—to reduce the existing level of pollution to a socially appropriate level?

This raises many other questions. How can the civil judges know what is the socially appropriate level of pollution? How can they preserve the legal predictability of the courts if they cannot specify in advance the appropriate penalties? How can they be even vaguely confident that "the punishment fits the crime" of polluting? But these questions did not get asked for half a century, although they were implied by Robbins' original critique. What finally got scholars to start asking them was an essay by R. H. Coase.

F. The Coase Theorem⁴⁹

Economists freely acknowledge that this is one of the most important economic essays ever written. It is by far the one most widely cited, and the number of citations has been escalating in recent years. Without warning, it hit both the economics profession and the world of legal theory.

Coase had been the author of an important study of the firm, published a generation earlier in 1937.⁵⁰ For the next two decades, he published very little in professional scholarly journals.⁵¹ In 1959, he published a significant article on the Federal Communications Commission.⁵² Then, like a bombshell, came his essay on social cost. Few es-

48. Buchanan, Cost and Choice, p. 74.

49. R. H. Coase, "The Problem of Social Cost," Journal of Law and Economics, III (1960), pp. 1–44.

50. Coase, "The Nature of the Firm," Economica IV (1937), pp. 386–405.

51. Coase, "Business Organization and the Accountant," The Accountant (Oct.–Dec. 1938), a series of a dozen brief essays written for non-economists; a shortened version is reprinted by Buchanan and Thirlby in L.S.E. Essays on Cost; Coase, "The Marginal Cost Controversy," Economics, XII (Aug. 1946). A bibliography of Coase's works appears in "On the Resignation of Ronald H. Coase," Journal of Law and Economics, XXVI (April 1983). The bulk of his academic articles came after 1960.

52. Coase, "The Federal Communications Commission," Journal of Law and Economics, II (1959). This essay is reprinted in Eirik G. Furubotn and Svetozar Pejovich says that appear in scholarly economics journals ever get cited by anyone else, and certainly not by numerous economists. After five years, a scholarly essay in economics, assuming it ever was noticed, ceases to be cited, except for those regarded as classics.⁵³ Yet this one is cited more widely than any other article, half a century later.

Richard Posner went so far as to argue in his widely read textbook on law and economics that Coase's essay and one by Guido Calabresi⁵⁴ were instrumental in launching an entire academic discipline, law and economics,⁵⁵ "the application of the theories and empirical methods of economics to the legal system across the boards."⁵⁶ The Coase Theorem (he capitalized it, indicating his respect for it) "established a framework for analyzing the assignment of property rights and liability in economic terms. This opened a vast field of legal doctrine to fruitful economic analysis."⁵⁷ Two scholarly journals, both published by the University of Chicago, have been heavily influenced by the Coase theorem: The Journal of Law and Economics and The Journal of Legal Studies. This is understandable, given the fact that Coase edited the Journal of Law and Economics for 19 years, 1965–1983, and the Journal of Legal Studies is a sister publication.⁵⁸ As Posner wrote in 1981, "Until recently, then, utilitarianism held sway in legal theory, but overt economic analysis was rare. The position is now reversed."⁵⁹

Coase's essay was perhaps the key one in the revival of interest in the question of pollution and economics, as well as a crucially important contribution to a free market theory of property rights. And, let me say from the outset, it is a dangerously flawed essay. Few economists have seen its flaws. The first professional economist I ever heard even mention a really critical comment against it—essentially, the same cri-

(eds.), The Economics of Property Rights (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Ballinger, 1974).

53. A. W. Coats, "The Role of Scholarly Journals in the History of Economics: An Essay," Journal of Economic Literature, X (1972), p. 42.

54. Guido Calabresi, "Some Thoughts on Risk Distribution and the Law of Torts," Yale Law Journal, vol. 70 (1961), pp. 499ff.

55. A. Mitchell Polinsky, Introduction to Law and Economics (Boston: Little, Brown, 1983).

56. Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1986), p. 19.

57. Ibid., p. 20.

58. For a survey of this literature, see the footnotes in the article by Elizabeth Hoffman and Matthew Spitzer, "The Coase Theorem: Some Experimental Tests," Journal of Law and Economics, XXV (April 1982), pp. 73–98. The rigor of the limiting assumptions made by the authors of this article is much greater than Coase's own formulation; the article is also far less readable or usable.

59. Posner, Economics of Justice, p. 51.

ticism I had also come up with—could not get it published in a conventional professional economics journal, and he had to wait three years after he discussed his criticism with me before he saw it in print.⁶⁰

1. Coase vs. Pigou

Coase summarized the state of the debate—it had long ceased to be debated very much—as of 1960. Pigou's statement of the problem had given the problem of social cost its traditional framework. This discussion was categorized under the general rubric of "externalities." The term refers to the imposition of a firm's costs of operation on those who are not owners of the stream of future income generated by the production process. In other words, these victims are external to the firm or production unit, but not external to its costs of operation. Almost without exception, the economists' discussion of externalities ended with a consideration of what government measures are appropriate to reduce or eliminate these externalities. The conclusions reached by most economists, based on Pigou's analysis in The Economics of Welfare (4th ed., 1932; originally published in 1920), were as follows, Coase summarized: the producer of pollution (smoke, noise, etc.) should (1) pay damages to those injured, or (2) have a tax imposed on his production by the civil government, or (3) have his factory excluded from residential districts.⁶¹ Coase's article broke with this tradition.

Aaron Levine summarized Coase's theoretical breakthrough: "Assuming zero transaction costs and economic rationality, Coase, in his seminal work, demonstrated that the market mechanism is capable of eliminating negative externalities without the necessity of governmentally imposed liability rules."⁶² Furthermore, the theorem leads to the conclusion that "if transactions are costless, the initial assignment of a property right will not determine the ultimate use of the property."⁶³ Free market economists of the Chicago School have increasingly sided with Coase. (What is also rather startling is that traditional Jewish law had adopted the basic features of the Coase theorem many 60. Walter Block, "Coase and Demsetz on Private Property Rights," Journal of Libertarian Studies, 1, No. 2 (1977), pp. 111–15.

61. Coase, "Social Cost," p. 1.

62. Aaron Levine, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law: Aspects of Jewish Business Ethics (New York: Ktav Publishing House, Yeshiva University Press, 1980), p. 59.

63. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law, p. 7.

centuries earlier; English law had not.)⁶⁴

The problem is, of course, that there are and always will be transaction costs.⁶⁵ Or, I should say, this is a problem. The major problem that the Coase theorem assigns zero economic value—and therefore zero relevance—to the sense of moral and legal outrage associated with a willful violation of private ownership. It ignores the economic relevance of the public's sense of moral outrage when there is no enforcement by the civil government of owners' legal immunities from invasion, even if done in the name of some "more efficient" social good or social goal. This is why I conclude that the Coase theorem is one of the most morally insidious pieces of academic nonsense ever to hit the economics profession; worse, it has infected—and I do mean infected—the thinking of a generation of very bright and very glib free market economists and legal theorists. Coase has served as the Typhoid Mary of Chicago School economists for five decades. His essay has drastically compromised the academic case for liberty. It has imposed private costs on those of us who are attempting to make a case for free market economics. In this sense, Coase's theorem is a form of pollution. But because it is intellectual pollution, those injured cannot take him to court and sue for damages. The best we can do is offer a pollution-control system: proof that his whole argument is specious.

Coase fully recognized from the beginning the nature of the technical economic problem he had raised, namely, the impossibility of a world in which there are no transaction costs. The moral issues related to property rights he dismissed without a moment's public hesitation as irrelevant to economic analysis. Therefore, he allowed civil judges to intervene to settle disputes. But there is a problem here: Coase could not escape the nagging problem ignored by Pigou and all welfare economists, namely, the problem of interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. Coase's "scientific" case against Pigou rests on the implicit assertion that men, especially judges, can make such comparisons in their act of formulating social policy.

The only professional response deeply critical of Coase has been made by Austrian School economists, who recognize the weakness of Chicago School presuppositions concerning interpersonal comparis-

64. Yehoshua Lieberman, "The Coase Theorem in Jewish Law," Journal of Legal Studies, X (June 1981), pp. 293–303.

65. For a brief introduction to the question of transaction costs, see Oliver E. Williamson, "Transaction-Cost Economics: The Governance of Contractual Relations," Journal of Law and Economics, XXII (October 1979), pp. 233–61.

ons. They side with Robbins—the 1932 Robbins—against Coase: no interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. If followed consistently, it would become impossible to defend the idea of government penalties against polluters.

2. The Ethical Pea Beneath the Neutral Shell

The astounding fact about the Coase theorem is that every economist knows that there are no cases of exchanges in which there are zero transaction costs. They also know that the Coase theorem applies only where there are zero transaction costs. Yet they do not identify the Coase theorem as an instance of curious but utterly irrelevant academic speculation. Instead, they try to work with his theorem. Richard Posner, an economist and a judge in the U.S. Appeals Court (Seventh Circuit), admitted that the Coase theorem applies only to zero transaction cost situations, yet he devoted most of his academic career to pursuing the economic implications of the Coase theorem in the field of law. Only at age 70 did he abandon all of this and become a Keynesian.⁶⁶ He knew that Coase's initial assumption—that transaction costs are zero—cannot be true in the real world. Posner wrote:

The economist does not merely decree that absolute rights [of ownership—G.N.] be created and then fall silent as to where they should be vested. To be sure, if market transactions were costless, the economist would not care where a right was initially vested. The process of voluntary exchange would costlessly reallocate it to whoever valued it the most. But once the unrealistic assumption of zero transaction costs is abandoned, the assignment of rights becomes determinate. If transaction costs are positive (though presumably low, for otherwise it would be inefficient to create an absolute right), the wealth-maximization principle requires the initial vesting of rights in those who are likely to value them most, so as to minimize transaction costs. This is the economic reason for giving a worker the right to sell his labor and a woman the right to determine her sexual partners. If assigned randomly to strangers, these rights would generally (not invariably) be repurchased by the worker and the woman; the costs of the rectifying transaction can be avoided if the right is assigned at the outset to the user who values it most.⁶⁷

66. Richard Posner, "How I Became a Keynesian: Second Thoughts in the Middle of a Crisis," The New Republic (Sept. 23, 2009). (<http://bit.ly/PosnerKeynes>)

67. Posner, Economics of Justice, p. 71. For a critique of Posner's approach to the law, see Buchanan, "Good Economics—Bad Law," Virginia Law Review, op. cit. See also the biting and incisive essay by Arthur Allen Leff, "Economic Analysis of Law: Some

Posner openly admitted that, in some cases, even where transaction costs are low, the worker or the woman in his example would not (i.e., could not afford to) repurchase these rights of ownership. This follows from his definition of value: "The most important thing to bear in mind about the concept of value is that it is based on what people are willing to pay for something rather than on the happiness they would derive from having it. . . . The individual who would like very much to have some good but is unwilling or unable to pay anything for it—perhaps because he is destitute—does not value the good in the sense in which I am using the term 'value.'"⁶⁸ The conclusion is obvious, and he did not hesitate to draw it: "Equivalently, the wealth of society is the aggregate satisfaction of those preferences (the only ones that have ethical weight in a system of wealth maximization) that are backed up by money, that is, that are registered in a market." In short, people's demonstrated preferences—money on the line—are the only ones that possess "ethical weight" in his definition of wealth-maximization. Does this include marriage? Of course. Does this include games of chance? Of course. "Much of economic life is still organized on barter principles. The 'marriage market,' child rearing, and a friendly game of bridge are examples. These services have value which could be monetized by reference to substitute services sold in explicit markets or in other ways."⁶⁹

Question: Who makes the initial distribution of an ownership right to whomever "values it the most"? How does this sovereign agent know scientifically which potential owners "are likely to value them [ownership rights] the most"? In short: By what standard of value does he make the initial distribution? Dead silence from Chicago School economists. To say anything at this point would be a public admission that economic science is no longer value-free. The Coase theorem must be seen for what it is: an important component in a universal academic shell game. The ethical pea is always concealed beneath the seemingly neutral scientific shell of cost-benefit analysis. Watch what the economist does, not what he says he is doing. He is invariably making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility every time he recommends a policy decision.

Realism About Nominalism," ibid., pp. 451–82. This is a rare and much-needed example of a scholar who recognizes the importance of the late medieval debate over realism vs. nominalism as it applies to the economic issues of objective vs. subjective value theory. Modern economic theory is explicitly nominalist but implicitly realist when it comes to formulating policy.

68. Ibid., pp. 60, 61.

69. Ibid., p. 61.

The debate over social costs raises once again the ancient debate between objective and subjective knowledge. It is one of the persistent antinomies in all humanist thought. The epistemological problem of social cost is an ethical problem, and as such, humanists cannot solve it “scientifically.”

3. Reciprocal Harm

Coase reformulated the terms of the debate over externalities. “The question is commonly thought of as one in which A inflicts harm on B and what has been decided is: how should we restrain A? But this is wrong. We are dealing with a problem of a reciprocal nature. To avoid the harm to B would inflict harm on A. The real question that has to be decided is: should A be allowed to harm B or should B be allowed to harm A? The problem is to avoid the more serious harm.”⁷⁰

To begin with, such reasoning is perverse, if accepted as a methodological standard governing economic analysis in all instances involving economic action. It would be just as easy to say of kidnapping that any restrictions on kidnapping by the state harm the kidnapper, and that a lack of restrictions harms the victims. If we are going to build an economic system in terms of the supposedly “reciprocal nature of harm”—that each economic actor suffers harm when he is restricted from acting according to his immediate whim—then economics becomes positively wicked, not value-free, in its attempt to sort out just how much harm the courts will allow each party to impose on the other.

There are some areas of life—areas governed by biblical morality—in which such “cost-benefit analyses” must not even be contemplated. For example, any attempt to impose cost-benefit analyses on competing techniques of mass genocide, including abortion, is demonic, not scientifically neutral. Whether a genocidal society should adopt either gas chambers or lethal injections for adults, or either saline solutions or suction devices for unborn infants, cannot be solved in terms of comparative rates of cost-efficiency, for the economist always ignores a major “exogenous variable”: the wrath of God. God will efficiently judge those individuals who promote all such cost-efficient systems, as well as societies that adopt them. If legal restrictions against mass genocide harm the potential mass murderers, this is all to the good. Society faces no “reduction in social benefits” whatsoever. Justice does cost something, but the net economic effect is positive, whether the economist sees this or not. There is no reduction in net social benefits as a result of the thwarted goals of the now-restricted (or previously executed) genocidal technocrats.

70. Coase, “Social Cost,” p. 2.

Coase offered the following example of reciprocal harm. What about cattle that stray onto another man’s property and destroy crops? This, it should be noted, is precisely the issue dealt with by Exodus 22:5. Coase wrote: “If it is inevitable that some cattle will stray, an increase in the supply of meat can only be obtained at the expense of a decrease in the supply of crops. The nature of the choice is clear: meat or crops?”⁷¹

This appears to be correct economic analysis, as far as it goes. It forces us to think about the problem in terms of that which members of the society must give up, meat vs. crops. But his next sentence is the very heart of the problem, and he never showed how economists—or anyone else, for that matter—can, as scientists, make an economically rational (i.e., neutral) choice in the name of society: crops vs. meat. Indeed, humanistic economics cannot possibly answer this question because of the inability of economists, as scientists, to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility.⁷²

4. Subjective Value vs. Social Policy

Coase never came to grips with this problem. “What answer should be given is, of course, not clear until we know the value of what is obtained as well as the value of what is sacrificed to attain it.”⁷³ Value? As economists, we need to ask ourselves several questions: Value to whom? Society as a whole? The value to the cattle owner? The value to the farmer? Also, how can we make such estimates of economic value, since economic value is subjective? Questions of economic value are the main problems raised by his paper, yet he could not answer them by means of the “scientific economics” he proclaimed. No economist can. Economist Peter Lewin went to the heart of the matter when he writes in a withering critique of Coase that costs are individual and private and cannot be “social.” The social-cost concept requires the summation of individual costs, which is impossible if costs are seen in utility terms. The notion of social cost as reflected by market prices (or even more problematically by hypothetical prices in the absence of a market for the item) has validity only in conditions so far removed from reality as to make its use as a general tool of policy analysis highly suspect. . . .

71. Idem.

72. In other words, we cannot make scientific comparisons of the utility gained by one person vs. the utility thereby forfeited by another person. There is no unit of “utility measurement” which is common to both. We cannot as neutral scientists legitimately say that one man has gained greater utility (a subjective evaluation on his part) than another man has lost (another subjective evaluation). I discuss this problem in Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

73. Coase, “Social Cost,” p. 2.

The foregoing suggests that any perception of efficiency at the social level is illusory. And the essential thread in all the objections to the efficiency concept, be it wealth effects, distortions, or technological changes, is the refusal by economists to make interpersonal comparisons of utility. Social cost falls to the ground precisely because individual evaluations of the sacrifice involved in choosing among options cannot be compared.⁷⁴

The inability of anyone to make scientifically valid interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility has once again smashed all the hopes of the free market’s humanist defenders to deal “scientifically” with a problem of social policy. The more astute “anarcho-capitalists” have understood this, and have thereby abandoned the very idea of social utility and social costs. They have also abandoned the idea of civil government.⁷⁵ They have not been able to demonstrate how people can deal successfully with the problems created by such technological developments as the internal combustion engine. But at least they are consistent. They do not search for “fools gold” intellectual solutions to “scientifically” insoluble problems. They do not search for pseudo-market solutions—“What would the correct market price be in the absence of a market?”—or solutions involving the hypothetical (and scientifically impossible) ability of judges to make scientifically valid social cost-benefit analyses in settling disputes. There can be no scientifically valid answers to such social problems, given the presuppositions of modern, subjectivistic, individualistic economic theory. Yet the approach used by Coase and his academic followers to deal with these questions assumes that there are scientifically valid answers to them.

Since there are no “neutral, scientific” answers, Coase’s whole es-

74. Peter Lewin, “Pollution Externalities: Social Cost and Strict Liability,” Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), pp. 220, 222. (<http://bit.ly/LewinPollution>)

75. “There is no government solution to pollution or to the common-pool problem because government is the problem.” Gerald P. O’Driscoll, Jr., “Pollution, Libertarianism, and the Law,” ibid., p. 50. (<http://bit.ly/ODriscollPollution>) say is an exercise in intellectual gymnastics: an illusion of scientific precision.⁷⁶ Nevertheless, it is considered a classic essay: a pioneering work that literally created a new approach in both economics and legal theory. What is revealing is that the economics profession as a whole has refused to face up to this problem, and it took over two decades for a critical analysis based on a 45-year-old observation by Lionel Robbins to be applied to the Coase theorem by an assistant professor (untenured) at an obscure university to be published in a new intellectual journal that had no following within the academic community.⁷⁷ Such is academia: academia nuts.

G. Property Rights

The meaning of “property rights” is this: individuals or associations that are represented by individuals possess a legal right to prevent others from stealing, invading, destroying, or otherwise interfering with their property. Owners therefore possess a legal right to exclude others from the use of specified property. This is analogous to covenantal forms of exclusion: the state’s right to exclude non-citizens from voting; the married person’s right to exclude others from sexual access to the partner; and the church’s right to exclude non-members or non-Christians from the communion table. The phrase “property rights” means that there is a legally enforceable “bundle of rights” that is associated with specific forms of property.

Coase’s essay undermines the very concept of private property rights. He offered a detailed, carefully constructed argument concerning the marginal gains to the cattleman vs. the marginal losses to the farmer from a roaming steer. What the essay demonstrates, assuming that the psychological costs to the farmer of the cattleman’s violation of his property rights are never taken into consideration, is this: excluding transaction costs and information costs,⁷⁸ as well as assuming perfect

76. This same illusion of scientific precision is at the heart of virtually every professional journal in economics, every mathematical equation, and every call for scientific policy-making issued by members of the economists’ guild. The day an economist admits to himself that no economist can make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility is the day that his public claims of economics’ objective, scientific precision make him a charlatan. The day before, he was simply ignorant.

77. I refer to Block’s essay. In my 1973 book, An Introduction to Christian Economics, I briefly referred to “R. H. Coase’s clever sophistry,” (p. 94n), but did not have space to pursue his arguments in detail. Some readers may think I should have let it go at that, or devoted the necessary space in some place other than here.

78. “. . . when the damaging business has to pay for all damage caused and the pricompetition (omniscience), the gain or loss to society is the same, whether the cattleman compensates the farmer for the value of the lost crops, should the cattle be left to roam, or the farmer compensates the cattleman for the higher costs of meat production, if the cattle are kept away from the farmer's crops (higher feed costs, costs of fencing, etc.). Again, assuming "conditions of perfect competition," Coase concluded: "Whether the cattle-raiser pays the farmer to leave the land uncultivated or himself rents the land by paying the land-owner an amount slightly greater than the farmer would pay (if the farmer was himself renting the land), the final result would be the same and would maximize the value of production."⁷⁹

Given his initial, unrealistic hypothetical assumptions about free goods—no transaction costs, no information costs, and perfect competition—this conclusion initially appears to be correct, assuming that farmers have no commitment to a sense of justice concerning property rights. It also assumes that members of such a society do not and will not suffer any additional economic losses when the civil government refuses to make cattle owners responsible for the damage their animals cause. Both assumptions are implicit to Coase's thesis, and both are categorically incorrect. Coase began with an unreal world in which transaction costs are defined away, and from this he drew his equally unrealistic conclusions.⁸⁰

His conclusion initially appears to be correct, i.e., that in a zero-cost world, the outcome of the bargaining process would be the same, the value of cattle vs. the value of crops. Yet in a perceptive essay by Donald Regan, we learn that Coase had no warrant for drawing this conclusion. Coase assumed that the bargaining process will produce the same economic results, but why should it? Regan said that Coase offered no model of how this bargaining process would inevitably produce such identical results in the absence of specified and enforceable cing system works smoothly (strictly this means that the operation of the pricing system is without cost)." Coase, "Social Cost," p. 2.

79. Ibid., p. 6.

80. Wrote Jules L. Coleman: "No term in the philosopher's lexicon is more imprecisely defined than is the economist's term 'transaction costs.' Almost anything counts as a transaction cost. But if we are to count the failure to reach agreement on the division of surplus as necessarily resulting from transaction costs (I have no doubt that sometimes it does), then by 'transaction cost' we must mean literally anything that threatens the efficiency of market exchange. In that case, it could hardly come as a surprise that, in the absence of transaction costs so conceived, market exchange is efficient." Coleman, "Economics and the Law: A Critical Review of the Foundations of the Economic Approach to Law," Ethics, 94 (July 1984), p. 666.

property rights. For example, sometimes a bargainer makes economic threats of non-cooperation that must be occasionally enforced in order to persuade the other party that he should take such threats seriously, even if the actual carrying out of the threat may injure the threat-maker in the short run. How could Coase know what the short-run or long-run outcome of a bargaining process will be? He couldn't.⁸¹ This is simply another way of saying that we cannot confidently make social and economic evaluations of real-world events by abstracting economic theory from temporal reality, i.e., by creating a mental world in which there are no costs, no ignorance of present or future opportunities, and no need of threats to achieve our goals.

Coase stated clearly what he thinks the economic problem is. "The economic problem in all cases of harmful effects is how to maximize the value of production."⁸² Furthermore, he was no fool. Later in the essay, he dropped his essay's initial assumption of zero transaction costs, perfect competition, and zero information costs.⁸³ Of course, he admitted, in real life there are transaction costs to settle disputes. For this reason, there is a role for civil government in settling costly disputes.⁸⁴ "All solutions have costs," including solutions imposed by the civil government.⁸⁵ But one underlying presupposition distorts all of Coase's analysis—a presupposition that is all too common (and unstated) in Chicago School economic analysis: the legitimacy of leaving aside issues of right and wrong, of justice, of equity. "Of course, if market transactions were costless, all that matters (questions of equity apart) is that the rights of the various parties should be well-defined and the results of legal actions easy to forecast."⁸⁶ Problem: How can we discuss "the rights of the various parties" if we leave aside questions of equity—questions of right and wrong? In short, how can we discuss 81. Donald H. Regan, "The Problem of Social Cost Revisited," Journal of Law and Economics, XV (October 1972), pp. 428–32.

82. Coase, "Social Cost," p. 15.

83. There is always the nagging suspicion that once these formal theoretical assumptions are dropped, the whole intellectual performance becomes nothing more than a scholarly puzzle game. Will any of the conclusions concerning the world of the theoretical model still remain accurate, let alone applicable, once we begin to discuss the empirical world? And how can we know for sure? Only through intuition—a non-rational, nonlogical category. See Gary North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship, op. cit. See also North, Sovereignty and Dominion, pp. 443–60.

84. Coase, "Social Cost," pp. 15–19.

85. Ibid., p. 18.

86. Ibid., p. 19.

“rights” apart from what is right?

H. Discounting Moral Outrage to Zero

Questions of equity apart: here is a continuing assumption in the “value-free, morally neutral” economic hypotheses of modern free market economists. They apparently think that questions of equity, being questions of opinion and morality, cannot be dealt with scientifically, nor can economists, as scientists, put a price tag on violations of moral principle. They conveniently ignore the inescapable conclusion of subjectivist economics and methodological individualism, namely, that there is no scientific way to “measure” costs and benefits of any kind, since interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility are impossible for mortals to make. They naively believe that there is a neutral, value-free science of economics, but not of morality. They are correct about the impossibility of neutral morality; they are incorrect about the existence of a value-free economics. Economics deals with economic value, and there is no value-free economic value. The moment an economist raises the question of value—social value, personal value, value of Gross Domestic Product—he has left the hypothetical world of value-free science. Such a world is mythical anyway, but economists have invested so much of their intellectual and professional capital in this myth for so long that they find it difficult to abandon it. If they were to abandon this myth as a sunk cost, their peers would not take them seriously, and they would not get their unreadable and unread essays into professional journals any more.

One of Coase’s academic defenders, Yale Law School’s Guido Calabresi, carried the Coase theorem to distant shores of speculation and social unreality. He said that the Coase theorem demonstrates that “the same allocation of resources will come about regardless of which of two joint cost causers is initially charged with the cost, in other words, regardless of liability rules.”⁸⁷ He repeated Coase’s example of the smoke-producing factory that damages the wheat crop of local farmers.

For example, if we assume that the cost of factory smoke which destroys neighboring farmers’ wheat can be avoided more cheaply by a smoke control device than by growing a smoke resistant wheat, then, even if the loss is left on the farmers they will, under the assumptions made, pay the factory to install the smoke control device. This would, in the short run, result in more factories relative to farmers and lower relative farm output than if the liability rule had been reversed. But if, as a result of this liability rule, farm output is too low relative to factory output those who lose from this 'misallocation' would have every reason to bribe farmers to produce more and factories to produce less. The process would continue until no bargain could improve the allocation of resources.⁸⁸

87. Guido Calabresi, “Transaction Costs, Resource Allocation and Liability Rules—A Comment,” Journal of Law and Economics, XI (April 1968), p. 67.

1. My Response to Calabresi

It sounds so precise, so logical. It also sounds crazy. Here is why it really is crazy. First, there are always transaction costs in life. To begin with any other assumption is to begin with utopianism. It makes as much sense as beginning with the assumption of the omniscience of the participants in exchange, which is another familiar assumption in almost all modern economic thought, especially in the professional journals. Without this theoretical ideal of omniscience, economic theory would have no formulas and equations, and professional economists would rather die than give up their formulas and equations. The epistemological problem is this: once the theoretical model is formulated in terms of a hypothetical set of assumptions that cannot exist in the real world, it takes an act of will for the economist to bring the model to bear on real-world problems without importing radical utopianism into his analysis. The debate over the Coase theorem is in my view the classic recent example of an unsuccessful attempt by economists to discard an economic model's utopian initial assumptions, yet still retain it for analytic purposes.⁸⁹ That it should be taken seri-

88. Ibid., pp. 67–68.

89. Calabresi wrote: "Thus, if one assumes rationality, no transaction costs, and no legal impediments to bargaining, all misallocations of resources would be fully cured in the market by bargains. Far from being surprising, this statement is tautological, at least if one accepts any of the various classic definitions of misallocation. These ultimately come down to a statement akin to the following: A misallocation exists when there is available a possible reallocation in which all those who would lose from the reallocation could be fully compensated by those who would gain, and, at the end of this compensation process, there would still be some who would be better off than before." Ibid., p. 68. This is one more application of Pareto's optimality theorem, perhaps the most non-optimal and misleading idea ever to get into the literature of economics. It is conceptually a dead end; it is also quite popular. I agree with Lutz and Lux: if it were buried forever, we could place a tombstone over it bearing these words: "Everybody has been made better off and nobody worse off." Mark A. Lutz and Kenneth Lux, The Challenge of Humanistic Economics (Menlo Park, California: Benjamin/Cummings, 1979), p. 101. Chapter 5 of their book is delightful: "The New Welfare Economously by most economists is evidence of the theoretical bankruptcy of modern economics.

Second, the allocation problem and its solutions are not primarily technical and empirical problems but rather ethical and epistemological. Calabresi posed the problem, and then answered it (as Chicago School economists usually do) in terms of the least costly technical solution, not in terms of any visible ethical principle. "The primary implication is that problems of misallocation of resources and externalities are not theoretical but empirical ones. The resource allocation aim is to approximate, both closely and cheaply, the result the market would bring about if bargaining actually were costless."⁹⁰ In other words, the civil judge must to pretend that he can approximate the allocation that a free market would produce, if free markets were costless. This, it should be mentioned, is a denial of the most important of all theorems in economics: scarcity. A civil judge capable of completing this assigned task would be a scarce resource indeed! Of course, he would possess this great advantage: because the initial limiting condition is impossible—zero transaction costs—nobody could produce a model that could prove that his allocation is off the mark.

How would this utopian task best be accomplished? Calabresi combined the false precision of the economist with the real obfuscation of the lawyer in order to produce this problematical conclusion: "This question depends in large part on the relative cost of reaching the correct result by each of these means (an empirical problem which probably could be resolved, at least approximately, in most instances), and the relative chances of reaching a widely wrong result depending on the method used (also an empirical problem but one as to which it is hard to get other than 'guess' type data). The resolution of these two problems and their interplay is the problem of accomplishing optimal resource allocations."⁹¹ It surely is!

So, the allocation problem for welfare economics is merely an empirical problem. But this so-called empirical problem cannot be solved scientifically, logically, or technically, for there is no way for the scientific economist to deal with the key epistemological problem: the impossibility of making scientific interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. Yet the Chicago School economists babble on in their journals as if more precise measurements could somehow solve what ics: Value-Free or Value-Less?" Sadly, almost no one has ever heard of this book.

90. Ibid., p. 69.

91. Idem.

they admit is the allocation problem. It is as if a gunnery sergeant were attempting to hit a target at the edge of the universe by adding just a bit more gunpowder to the load. It is simply a technical problem, you understand. It is as if a sprinter were trying to reduce his time in the 100-meter race to one second flat by shaving a tenth of a second off his time in each preliminary heat. It is an empirical problem, you understand. If he could just get better shoes or a track with better traction!

Calabresi knew all this. He acknowledged that the decision that a judge would reach if the transactions were costless is an "unreachable goal."⁹² He also acknowledged that "the gains which reaching nearer the goal would bring are not usually subject to precise definition or quantification. They are, in fact, largely defined by guesses. As a result, the question of whether a given law is worth its costs (in terms of better resource allocation) is rarely susceptible to empirical proof. . . . It is precisely the province of good government to make guesses as to what laws are likely to be worth their costs. Hopefully it will use what empirical information is available and seek to develop empirical information which is not currently available (how much information is worth its costs is also a question, however). But there is no reason to assume that in the absence of conclusive information no government action is better than some action."⁹³

Please get his argument clear in your mind: welfare economics is essentially an empirical science, except that empiricism cannot really solve the issues of welfare economics, so the state will have to decide what is the appropriate allocation of resources, but economists nevertheless hope that the bureaucrats will use empiricism as the means of finding solutions to the specific allocation problems, though only an economically efficient quantity and quality of empiricism should be purchased. In any case, the state's decision will necessarily be based primarily on guesswork—guesswork that cannot be verified or disproved scientifically.

If this explanation resembles a walk through a hall of mirrors, that is because it is a hall of mirrors. Yet virtually all essays in welfare economics are little more than guided tours through this conceptual hall of mirrors. The allocation problem of welfare economics cannot be solved by humanist economics, for the economists are overcome by a series of antinomies: the subjective-objective dualism, the individual-society dualism, the problem of fixed law and the endless flux of circumstances, and the overwhelming and unanswered problem of interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. It is all premised on this formula: dialectics plus intuition equals cost-effective justice. This formula does not produce anything except additional scholarly articles for professors' vitae—in short, negative social returns.

92. Idem.

93. Ibid., pp. 69–70.

Third, and far more important for social analysis, there would be a sense of outrage among the victims of the polluting factory if there were no state-enforced liability rules. The initial reaction of one of the victims, if he knows that the civil law does not protect his ownership rights automatically, may be to blow up the factory or murder its owner. The multiplication of acts of violence would be assured under such a non-liability legal order. The issue of economic efficiency therefore cannot be separated from the issue of judicial equity. This is what Chicago School economists and legal theorists never show any signs of understanding. When righteous men are thwarted in their just cause by seekers of local "efficiency" who care nothing about the ethics of the solution, there will be serious social consequences. To discuss the efficiency of any given transaction without also discussing the equity of it is to begin to deliver the society into the hands of socialist revolutionaries. Or, to put it in language more familiar to Chicago School economists, penalizing righteousness in the name of economic efficiency is not a zero-cost decision.

2. Micro-Efficiency and Macro-Revolution

It is not possible to discover an economically efficient solution to just one transaction. We cannot be efficient in just one pricedure. The question of efficiency is not simply a microeconomic issue; it is also macroeconomic. We cannot discover an efficient solution to any economic problem that does not in some way affect the whole social order. In short, we cannot do just one thing efficiently. The system of justice that governs any social order is itself a producer or reducer of both macro-efficiency and micro-efficiency. Equity cannot be segregated from efficiency. If our supposedly economically efficient decision at the micro level calls into question the moral integrity of the prevailing legal system, we have not in fact reached an efficient solution to our micro problem. This is why it is astonishing to find economist and Talmudist Aaron Levine siding with Coase: "While the principle of equity is promoted by the selection of appropriate liability rules, economic efficiency is realized when the negative externality is eliminated by the least-cost method. Hence, should it be less costly to avoid crop damage by growing smoke-resistant wheat than by installing a smoke-control device, the former method should be adopted. Whether the farmer or the factory-owner should bear the additional expense of eliminating the negative externality is entirely irrelevant as far as the efficiency question is concerned."⁹⁴ Charge the farmers for the cost of the factory's smoke abatement, and you have violated the principle of justice that governs Exodus 22:5–6. There will eventually be negative repercussions, whether economists believe in God or not.

These economists are anarchists who are brandishing equations rather than bombs. The reductionism of economic logic, even without the equations, has become so great that it has just about eliminated the real-world relevance of the academic discipline of economics, especially its academic journals. That which is obvious escapes these people. They speak of a world of zero transaction costs and zero rules establishing legal liability as if it would not be a world of turmoil, unpredictability, and violence. It is the establishment of liability rules that makes civil order possible. Social order is clearly too important a matter to be left in the hands of economists, even Chicago School economists.

I. Rothbard's Critique: Pure Subjectivism

One economist who saw at least some of the implications of Coase's position was Murray Rothbard. Rothbard very early recognized the reality of Robbins' complaint against Pigou, namely, that there can be no scientifically valid interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility.⁹⁵ He wrote a critique of the Coase theorem. It underscores some of the points I raised in the original draft of this essay, but before I discovered Rothbard's 1982 essay. He went to the full logical conclusion of the subjectivist school, namely, that there can be no such thing as social cost—not simply that economists cannot measure it, but that it does not exist as a category of economics.⁹⁶

94. Levine, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law, p. 59.

95. Rothbard, "Toward a Reconstruction of Utility and Welfare Economics," in Mary Sennholz (ed.), On Freedom and Free Enterprise: Essays in Honor of Ludwig von Mises (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1956). (<http://bit.ly/SennholzOFAFE>)

96. The Christian economist must reject this thesis. There are indeed social costs and social benefits. This is one reason why the Bible can and does specify certain social policies. They are beneficial for the covenanted community. But Rothbard's logic is correct: in terms of the presuppositions of modern, subjectivist economics, there is no way to add up subjective costs or benefits. In fact, if the economist were really rigor-

He discussed Coase's example of the farmer whose orchard is burned by sparks emitted by a passing train. His analysis focuses on the farmer's subjective costs that are imposed by the railroad's aggression. Should the state solve this dispute by forcing the railroad to pay the farmer the market value of the lost trees?

There are many problems with this [Coase's] theory. First, income and wealth are important to the parties involved, although they might not be to uninvolved economists. It makes a great deal of difference to both of them who has to pay whom. Second, this thesis works only if we deliberately ignore psychological factors. Costs are not only monetary. The farmer might well have an attachment to the orchard far beyond the monetary damage. Therefore, the orchard might be worth far more to him than the $100,000 in damages. . . .

The love of the farmer for his orchard is part of a larger difficulty for the Coase-Demsetz doctrine: Costs are purely subjective and not measurable in monetary terms. Coase and Demsetz have a proviso in their indifference thesis that all "transaction costs" be zero. If they are not, then they advocate allocating the property rights to whichever route entails minimum social transaction costs. But once we understand that costs are subjective to each individual and therefore unmeasurable, we see that costs cannot be added up. But if all costs, including transaction costs, cannot be added, then there is no such thing as "social transaction costs," and they cannot be compared. . . .

Another serious problem with the Coase-Demsetz approach is that pretending to be value-free, they in reality import the ethical norm of "efficiency," and assert that property rights should be assigned on the basis of such efficiency. But even if the concept of social efficiency were meaningful, they don't answer the questions of why efficiency should be the overriding consideration in establishing legal principles or why externalities should be internalized above all other considerations.⁹⁷ ous, he would admit that this conclusion applies even to the measurement of intrapersonal subjective utilities, since such measurements takes place over time, and therefore we again confront that old nemesis, the index number of satisfaction—an impossibility, given the premises of subjective utility. There has been such an economist: G. L. S. Shackle. He had a disciple: Ludwig Lachmann.

97. Rothbard, "Law, Property Rights, and Air Pollution," Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), pp. 58–59. (<http://bit.ly/RothbardPollution>)

1. Rothbard vs. the Idea of Efficiency

In an earlier essay, Rothbard presented perhaps the most comprehensive challenge to the whole economics profession that has ever been written. The reason why I quote him at length is that he is a very clear writer, and he is willing to follow the logic of subjectivist economics to great lengths—not to a biblical reconciliation of objective and subjective value, but at least to the far extremes of subjectivism. In a remarkable essay, “The Myth of Efficiency,” Rothbard rejected not only social costs but the idea of efficiency—an idea second only to the idea of scarcity in the free market economist’s lexicon.

. . . there are several layers of grave fallacy involved in the very concept of efficiency as applied to social institutions or policies: (1) the problem is not only in specifying ends but also in deciding whose ends are to be pursued; (2) individual ends are bound to conflict, and therefore any additive concept of social efficiency is meaningless; and (3) even each individual’s actions cannot be assumed to be “efficient”; indeed, they undoubtedly will not be. Hence, efficiency is an erroneous concept even when applied to each individual’s actions directed toward his ends; it is a fortiori a meaningless concept when it includes more than one individual, let alone an entire society.

Let us take a given individual. Since his own ends are clearly given and he acts to pursue them, surely at least his actions can be considered efficient? But no, they may not, for in order for him to act efficiently, he would have to possess perfect knowledge—perfect knowledge of the best technology, of future actions and reactions by other people, and of future natural events. But since no one can ever have perfect knowledge of the future, no one’s action can be called “efficient.” We live in a world of uncertainty. Efficiency is therefore a chimera.

Put another way, action is a learning process. As the individual acts to achieve his ends, he learns and becomes more proficient about how to pursue them. But in that case, of course, his actions cannot have been efficient from the start—or even from the end—of his actions, since perfect knowledge is never achieved, and there is always more to learn.

Moreover, the individual’s ends are not really given, for there is no reason to assume that they are set in concrete for all time. As the individual learns more about the world, about nature and about other people, his values and goals are bound to change. The individual’s ends will change as he learns from other people; they may also change out of sheer caprice. But if ends change in the course of an action, the concept of efficiency—which can only be defined as the best combination of means in pursuit of given ends—again becomes meaningless.⁹⁸

Two comments are in order. First, we can perceive here the whole corpus of economics steadily slipping through our fingers. If the question of efficiency is meaningless, what have economists been arguing about over the last three centuries? An illusion? The answer must be yes, if we hold to a rigorously subjectivist epistemology. Rothbard went on: “Not only is ‘efficiency’ a myth, then, but so too is any concept of social or additive cost, or even an objectively determinable cost for each individual. But if cost is individual, ephemeral, and purely subjective, then it follows that no policy conclusions, including conclusions about law, can be derived from or even make use of such a concept. There can be no valid or meaningful cost-benefit analysis of political or legal decisions or institutions.”⁹⁹ Rothbard demonstrated the intellectual courage to affirm the validity of the implications that Roy Harrod used to frighten Lionel Robbins away from his own denial of the possibility of making interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. He denied the possibility of policy-making based on economics.

2. The Problem of Exhaustive Knowledge

Second, we discover in Rothbard’s arguments against the concept of efficiency an argument based on the impossibility of using a concept which is only meaningful in an imaginary changeless world. This is a variation of an antinomy (logical contradiction) of humanism that Cornelius Van Til pointed to in several contexts, namely, that for the anti-theist, it is necessary to know everything exhaustively in order to know anything specifically. The heart of the problem, Van Til said, is that there is no way for the anti-theist to integrate his timeless model of reality to the ceaseless flux of historical change.

In contrast to the humanists, Van Til argued, Christians have God’s revelation of Himself and His creation to guide them in making sense of this world, and it is only by stressing the comprehensiveness and the inexhaustible character of the idea of revelation that the process of learning can

98. Murray N. Rothbard, “Comment: The Myth of Efficiency,” in Mario J. Rizzo (ed.), Time, Uncertainty, and Disequilibrium, p. 90.

99. Ibid., p. 94.

have meaning and history have genuine significance. If man is made the final reference point in predication, knowledge cannot get under way, and if it could get under way it could not move forward. That is to say, in all non-Christian forms of epistemology there is first the idea that to be understood a fact must be understood exhaustively. It must be reducible to a part of a system of timeless logic. But man himself and the facts of his experience are subject to change. How is he ever to find within himself an a priori resting point? He himself is on the move. . . . Every effort of man to find one spot that he can exhaustively understand either in the world of fact about him or in the world of experience within, is doomed to failure. If we do not with Calvin presuppose the self-contained God back of the self-conscious act of the knowing mind of man, we are doomed to be lost in an endless and bottomless flux.¹⁰⁰

The economist faces this problem continually; it cannot be overcome logically. Because the Austrian School of economics focuses above all on two fundamental questions—subjective knowledge (e.g., valuations) and purposeful human action (e.g., the market process over time)—Austrian School economists have devoted more space than most economists to discussions of the interrelations between historical change and economic knowledge. Members of the Austrian School understand that the model used to undergird all modern economic theory, namely, the general equilibrium model, hypothesizes a world of perfect foreknowledge, and therefore zero uncertainty, a world in which human action cannot even be conceived.¹⁰¹ As Mario Rizzo put it, “general equilibrium exists in the mind of the economist and not in the real world.”¹⁰² Rothbard agreed: “. . . not only has it never existed, and is not an operational concept, but also it could not conceivably exist. For we cannot really conceive of a world where every person has perfect foresight, and where no data ever change. . . .”¹⁰³

This raises a crucial problem for the economist: the problem of objective cost. Buchanan summarized this problem: “One of the central confusions leading to the false objectification of costs has been the extension of the perfect knowledge assumption of competitive equilibri-

100. Cornelius Van Til, An Introduction to Systematic Theology, vol. V of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1978), pp. 166–67.

101. Mises, Human Action, ch. 14:5. For my comments on Mises, see Sovereignty and Dominion, p. 449.

102. Mario J. Rizzo, “Uncertainty, Subjectivity, and the Economic Analysis of the Law,” in Rizzo (ed.), Time, Uncertainty, p. 82.

103. Ibid., p. 93. Cf. Buchanan, Cost and Choice, p. 98.

um theory to the analysis of nonequilibrium choices, whether made in a market or nonmarket process. Genuine choice is confronted only in a world of uncertainty, and, of course, all economic choices are made in this context.”¹⁰⁴ Take away equilibrium—from men’s thinking, that is; it never has existed in the real world—and you thereby eliminate the economist’s concept of objective cost. Eliminate the concept of objective cost, and you eliminate the possibility of scientifically valid policy-making by economists. Eliminate the concept of objective cost, and you also eliminate that trusty ideological weapon of most free market economists: the idea of the objective efficiency of the free market.

3. Efficiency for Whose Ends?

Here is the problem Rothbard was struggling with: How can we discuss the question of efficiency—the coherence of planning and action—in a context of change, both with respect to a man’s plans and his environment which he attempts to change and yet also must respond to. Rothbard wanted to believe that he could appeal to what he called “proficiency” in learning, but his critique of efficiency applies equally well to proficiency. Why is human action a learning process? Why does anything we learned a decade, a year, or a moment ago still apply in the now-changed world of the present? Humanists have no answer to this fundamental question, at least none which is consistent with their epistemology of autonomous man.

Rothbard argued correctly that “efficiency only makes sense in regard to people’s ends, and individuals’ ends differ, clash, and conflict. The central question of politics then becomes: whose ends shall rule?”¹⁰⁵ He attacked all modern economists, including his mentor Mises, because modern economics is based on utilitarianism—“the greatest good for the greatest number”—a system of ethics which assumes that it is possible to make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. Utilitarianism ultimately asserts that there is a universal common ethical system and a universal hierarchy of values, for if there weren’t, it would be impossible for social planners to devise and enforce social policies. “For utilitarianism holds that everyone’s ends are really the same, and that therefore all social conflict is merely technical and pragmatic, and can be resolved once the appropriate means for the common ends are discovered and adopted. It is the myth of the common universal end that allows economists to believe that they can 'scientifically' and in a supposedly value-free manner prescribe what political policies should be adopted. By taking this alleged common universal end as an unquestioned given, the economist allows himself the delusion that he is not at all a moralist but only a strictly value-free and professional technician."¹⁰⁶

104. Buchanan, Cost and Choice, p. 98; cf. pp. 49–50.

105. Rothbard, “Comment,” Time, Uncertainty, p. 91.

Rothbard gave an example of the problem of social efficiency. What if one group in society wishes to exterminate all members of a rival group? "In these cases of conflicting ends, furthermore, one group's 'efficiency' becomes another group's detriment. So that the advocates of a program—whether of compulsory uniformity or of slaughtering a defined social group—would want their proposals carried out as efficiently as possible; whereas, on the other hand, the oppressed group would hope for as inefficient a pursuit of the hated goal as possible. Efficiency, as Rizzo pointed out, can only be meaningful relative to a given goal. But if ends clash, the opposing group will favor maximum inefficiency in pursuit of the disliked goal. Efficiency, therefore, can never serve as a utilitarian touchstone for law or public policy."¹⁰⁷

Rothbard's conclusion is extremely important for a study of Christian economics. By systematically destroying the epistemological foundation for efficiency as a concept of subjectivist economics, he was then faced with a major question: What is the proper foundation for social policy? As an anarchist, he did not believe in social policy, meaning a state-enforced policy. He wanted the free market's forces to arbitrate in deciding whose plans become dominant at any point in time. But even these plans cannot legitimately be based on questions of efficiency, as he well knew. He then called for a restructuring of economic thought—a reformation based on ethics.

I conclude that we cannot decide on public policy, tort law, rights, or liabilities on the basis of efficiencies or minimizing of costs. But if not costs or efficiency, then what? The answer is that only ethical principles can serve as criteria for our decisions. Efficiency can never serve as the basis for ethics; on the contrary, ethics must be the guide and touchstone for any consideration of efficiency. Ethics is the primary. . . .

One group of people will inevitably balk at our conclusion; I

106. Idem.

107. Ibid., pp. 91–92.

speaking, of course, of the economists. For in this area economists have been long engaged in what George Stigler, in another context, has called “intellectual imperialism.”¹⁰⁸ Economists will have to get used to the idea that not all of life can be encompassed by our own discipline. A painful lesson no doubt, but compensated by the knowledge that it may be good for our souls to realize our own limits—and, just perhaps, to learn about ethics and about justice.¹⁰⁹

This represents a major break from contemporary economics, even from Austrian School economics. Rothbard was no longer willing to affirm, as Mises the utilitarian affirmed, that “when the superior efficiency of economic freedom could no longer be questioned, social philosophy entered the scene and demolished the ideology of the status system.”¹¹⁰

J. Methodology: Ethics vs. Efficiency

1. Rothbard vs. Mises

Rothbard’s straightforward abandonment of the concept of efficiency, and his call to economists to examine ethics as the source of their policy judgments, are significant intellectual developments. They constitute an admission that there is something dangerously wrong with the economists’ reliance on the rational model of equilibrium. If the idea of economic equilibrium cannot be relied upon to illuminate questions of economic efficiency, then in what way can it safely be used by economists? Rothbard called into question the most important intellectual and technical tool that the economist has at his disposal,

108. Rothbard attributed the phrase to George Stigler, but Kenneth Boulding is better known for its use, by which he means “an attempt on the part of economics to take over all the other social sciences.” Boulding, “Economics As A Moral Science,” American Economic Review, LIX (March 1969), p. 8.

109. Rothbard, “Comment,” p. 95. Rothbard was an advocate of a universal ethics based on natural rights. See For a New Liberty: The Libertarian Manifesto, 2nd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1973] 2006), pp. 4, 19, 31–33, 36, 42, 48–49. (<http://bit.ly/mrfanl>). Not all “Austrians” share his confidence in natural rights and natural law as the basis of a universal ethics, as John Eggar pointed out: “Comment: Efficiency Is Not a Substitute for Ethics,” in Rizzo (ed), Time, Uncertainty, p. 119. For critiques of natural law doctrines from a biblical viewpoint, see the essays by John Robbins, Rex Downie, and Archie Jones in The Journal of Christian Reconstruction, V (Summer 1978): “Symposium on Politics.”

110. Mises, The Ultimate Foundation of Economic Science (Princeton, New Jersey: Van Nostrand, 1962), p. 109. (<http://bit.ly/MisesUFES>)

the "ideal type" of the perfectly competitive economy.¹¹¹ Challenge this, and you challenge the epistemological foundation of economic science.

Yet it must be challenged. More than this: it must be scrapped. If economics is to be reconstructed in terms of biblical revelation, economists must at last see the implications of Van Til's rejection of metaphysics in favor of ethics. The search for a timeless rational mental construct as the basis of a science of human action is fruitless. Even the great Mises was partially sidetracked by this quest. What confidence can we legitimately have in an explanation of market processes that argues that as entrepreneurship becomes successful, it "tends toward" the creation of a world in which human action and human choice is impossible, a world of automatons rather than people? Yet this is precisely the explanatory model used by Mises (and almost all other economists). As he said in Human Action concerning his theoretical construct, the Evenly Rotating Economy: "Action is change, and change is the temporal sequence. But in the evenly rotating economy change and succession of events are eliminated. Action is to make choices and to cope with an uncertain future. But in the evenly rotating economy there is no choosing and the future is not uncertain as it does not differ from the present known state. Such a rigid system is not peopled with living men making choices and liable to error; it is a world of soulless unthinking automatons; it is not a human society, it is an ant hill."¹¹² Nevertheless, he stated flatly: "The theorems implied in the notion of the plain state of rest are valid with regard to all transactions without exception."¹¹³ For the modern economist, all human action tends toward a final state in which human beings become omniscient and therefore take on one of the attributes of God.¹¹⁴ The prob-

111. Perhaps the most influential explanation of the use of "ideal types" or hypothetical abstract models in the social sciences was offered by Max Weber. See Weber's book, The Methodology of the Social Sciences, translated and edited by Edward A. Shils and Henry A. Finch (New York: Free Press, 1949), pp. 43–45, 87–105. See also Thomas Burger, Max Weber's Theory of Concept Formation: History, Laws and Ideal Types (Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1976); Rolf E. Rogers, Max Weber's Ideal Type Theory (New York: Philosophical Library, 1969); Julien Freund, The Sociology of Max Weber (New York: Pantheon, 1968), pp. 59–70; Raymond Aron, "The Logic of the Social Sciences," in Denis Wrong (ed.), Max Weber (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1970), pp. 80–89.

112. Mises, Human Action, p. 249.

113. Ibid., p. 246.

114. Mises wrote: "No matter whether this thirsting after omniscience can ever be fully gratified or not, man will not cease to strive after it passionately." Mises, Ultimate Foundation, p. 120.

lem is, their view of God is that He could not possibly act if He existed. He would be a “rule-following automaton,”¹¹⁵ because “A perfect being would not act.”¹¹⁶

2. Timeless Metaphysical Models

Mises relied on this limiting concept of a hypothetical economy filled with soulless people in order to explain the operations of real world market forces. “This final state of rest is an imaginary construction, not a description of reality. For the final state of rest will never be attained. New disturbing factors will emerge before it will be realized. What makes it necessary to take recourse to this imaginary construction is the fact that the market at every instant is moving toward a final state of rest.”¹¹⁷ He called this movement toward (or “tendency toward”) a final state of rest a fact. But this “fact” is precisely what must be demonstrated. It is the ancient pre-Socratic contradiction between Parmenides’ changeless logic and Heraclitus’ ceaseless flow. These two worlds cannot be shown to be connected; they are, however, correlative in the thinking of humanistic scholars.

To explain this intellectual dilemma, Van Til used the delightful analogy of someone who is trying to put together a string of beads, but the string is infinitely long, and the beads have no holes. The imaginary world of timeless logic (Van Til’s “string”), which cannot possibly exist, serves as the limiting concept (to use Kant’s terminology for the “noumenal”),¹¹⁸ or limiting notion (to use Mises’ term)¹¹⁹ for our understanding of the world which does exist—the world of ceaseless flux (Van Til’s “beads”). This world of timeless logic is, in short, a logical backdrop which cannot ever exist in the real world—and which really cannot even be mentally conceived¹²⁰—which is used to explain the world inhabited by men.

Nevertheless, with absolute confidence (even “apodictic certainty,”

115. Buchanan, Cost and Choice, p. 96.

116. Mises, Epistemological Problems of Economics, 3rd ed. (Auburn, Alabama: Mises Institute, [1960] 2003), p. 25. Cf. Mises, Ultimate Foundations, p. 3.

117. Idem.

118. Immanuel Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, trans. Norman Kemp Smith (New York: St. Martin’s, [1929] 1965), B311, p. 272.

119. Human Action, p. 250.

120. How can we imagine a world in which every actor has perfect foreknowledge? Try to explain the meaning of human choice in a world in which everyone knows in advance precisely what the others will inevitably do in the future. We may take such a world on faith; we cannot explain it.

one of Mises' favorite terms), Mises proclaimed that "These insoluble contradictions, however, do not affect the service which this imaginary construction renders. . . ." ¹²¹ Or, even more forcefully: "Even imaginary constructions which are inconceivable, self-contradictory, or unrealizable can render useful, even indispensable services in the comprehension of reality, provided the economist knows how to use them properly." ¹²² That word, "provided," covers a multitude of epistemological sins. So does the word "properly."

Anyone who has ever tried to read an article in such journals as Econometrica and The Review of Economics and Statistics knows how rarified economic logic can become. ¹²³ It reminds me of what little I know about the formal academic debates carried on by the late medieval scholastics. The number of angels dancing on the point of a needle is a down-to-earth problem compared to stochastic analysis applied to a world of perfect foreknowledge. The sophistication of modern econometric analysis is matched ("correlation of at least .9") only by the irrelevance of its conclusions.

3. The Mathematical Games Economists Play

The non-mathematical economist John Kenneth Galbraith, who was formerly the president of the American Economics Association, exposed the way the game is played, at least in the so-called "general" economics scholarly journals, which are very nearly as unreadable as Econometrica. The fact is, hardly anyone in the profession actually reads the highly mathematical essays. "The layman may take comfort from the fact that the most esoteric of this material is not read by other economists or even by the editors who publish it. In the economics profession the editorship of a learned journal not specialized to econo-

121. Ibid., p. 248. He wrote: "The method of imaginary constructions is indispensable for praxeology [the science of human action—G.N.]; it is the only method of praxeological and economic inquiry. It is, to be sure, a method difficult to handle because it can easily result in fallacious syllogisms. It leads along a sharp edge; on both sides yawns the chasm of absurdity and nonsense. Only merciless self-criticism can prevent a man from falling headlong into these abysmal depths." Ibid., p. 237. Question: Self-criticism in terms of what truth, or by what standard? For a critique of this position, see North, Sovereignty and Dominion, pp. 449–50.

122. Ibid., p. 236.

123. I do not have in mind merely the writings of Nobel Prize-winning economist Gerard Debreu, which do not pretend to deal with the real world. I have in mind investigations into the operation of real-world institutions, such as William S. Landes, "An Economic Analysis of the Courts," Journal of Law and Economics, XIV (April 1971), pp. 61–107.

metrics or mathematical statistics is a position of only moderate prestige. It is accepted, moreover, that the editor must have a certain measure of practical judgment. This means that he is usually unable to read the most prestigious contributions which, nonetheless, he must publish. So it is the practice of the editor to associate with himself a mathematical curate who passes on this part of the work and whose word he takes. A certain embarrassed silence covers the arrangement."¹²⁴

From time to time, prestigious economists protest. Paul Samuelson, perhaps the most prestigious of all American economists, 1950–80, and a founder of the highly mathematical “neo-Keynesian synthesis,” remarked in his presidential address to the American Economics Association that the three previous presidents had all criticized the excessive use of mathematical economics, and that the most hostile remarks had elicited a standing ovation of the audience.¹²⁵ But applause is one thing, and a change in habits is another. The professional journals are still mostly exercises in mathematics. Why?

One reason is the success of mathematics in the natural sciences—a correlation which, it should be noted, is so remarkable that there is no rational explanation for it, as a Nobel Prize-winner in physics noted.¹²⁶ There is also the quest for elegance. There is no doubt about it: a mathematical proof appears to be elegant in its precision and sparseness. The problem is, however, that this elegance has a high price attached to it: irrelevance in the real world. The greater the precision, the greater the irrelevance. Furthermore, most of the major advances in economic science since World War II have owed little to mathematical economics, including the Coase theorem.¹²⁷

Galbraith offered another explanation: considerations of academic prestige.¹²⁸ Also, mathematical ability is used as a screening device within the profession, as Galbraith observed.¹²⁹ Screening by mathematics was actually recommended as a legitimate professional goal by 124. John Kenneth Galbraith, Economics Peace and Laughter (New York: New American Library, 1972), p. 44n.

125. Ibid., p. 40.

126. Eugene P. Wigner, “The Unreasonable Effectiveness of Mathematics in the Natural Sciences,” Communications in Pure and Applied Mathematics, XIII (1960), pp. 1–14. (<http://bit.ly/WignerMath>)

127. Alan Walters, “Frameworks for Thinking About Reality,” Cato Journal, VII (Spring–Summer 1987), p. 72.

128. Galbraith, op. cit., pp. 41–42.

129. Ibid., p. 43.

Fritz Machlup, an economist who had been greatly influenced early in his career by Mises, and who was never known as a mathematical economist. He argued that proficiency in mathematics can overcome the inferiority complex of the social sciences.¹³⁰ Yet he also called the over-use of mathematics “mathematosis,” and the assumption that science is primarily a matter of measurement, “metromania.”¹³¹

The widespread use of mathematics is more than just a quest for prestige or a graduate school screening device. It is a religious commitment to the idea that metaphysics is more important than ethics. The use of mathematics in the development of the theoretical propositions of economics is an elegant, seemingly rigorous assertion of scientific man’s neutrality, his “escape from ethics.” God is to be banished from man’s economic thinking through the use of simultaneous equations.¹³²

130. Machlup recommended requiring higher mathematics for all economics students as a screening device. “Even if some of us think that one can study social sciences without knowing higher mathematics, we should insist on making calculus and mathematical statistics absolute requirements—as a device for keeping away the weakest students.” Machlup, “Are the Social Sciences Really Inferior?” Southern Economic Journal, XXVII (Jan. 1961), p. 182. This was Machlup’s presidential address.

131. Machlup, “The Inferiority Complex of the Social Sciences,” in Mary Sennholz (ed.), On Freedom and Free Enterprise, p. 169.

132. Leon Walras, the Swiss economist, was the first economist to offer a comprehensive analysis of economic theory in terms of simultaneous equations (general equilibrium). He did so in 1871. Writing of the simultaneous discovery of subjective value by Walras, William Stanley Jevons (England), and Carl Menger (Austria), Paul Samuelson wrote: “Jevons, Walras, and Menger each independently arrived at the so-called ‘theory of subjective value.’ And I consider it a lucky bonus for my present thesis that Menger did arrive at his formulation without the use of mathematics. But, in all fairness, I should point out that a recent rereading of the excellent English translation of Menger’s 1871 work convinces me that it is the least important of the three works cited; and that its relative neglect by modern writers was not simply the result of bad luck or scholarly negligence. I should also add that the important revolution of the 1870s had little really to do with either subjective value and utility or with marginalism; rather it consisted of the perfecting of the general relations of supply and demand. It culminated in Walrasian general equilibrium. And we are forced to agree with Schumpeter’s appraisal of Walras as the greatest of theorists—not because he used mathematics, since the methods used are really quite elementary—but because of the key importance of the concept of general equilibrium itself. We may say of Walras what Lagrange ironically said in praise of Newton: ‘Newton was assuredly the man of genius par excellence, but we must agree that he was also the luckiest: one finds only once the system of the world to be established!’ And how lucky he was that ‘in his time the system of the world still remained to be discovered.’ Substitute ‘system of equilibrium’ for ‘system of the world’ and Walras for Newton and the equation remains valid.” Samuelson, “Economic Theory and Mathematics—An Appraisal,” American Economic Review, XLII (May 1952), p. 61. Samuelson’s appraisal concerning the importance of Walras vs. Menger is exactly the reverse of mine, and so is his appraisal of the

From the very beginning of modern economics in the seventeenth century, the use of hypothetically value-free arguments by economists has been viewed by them as a way to escape questions of right and wrong, of ethics. William Letwin, historian of this early period of economic thought, was correct when he wrote that "there can be no doubt that economic theory owes its present development to the fact that some men, in thinking of economic phenomena, forcefully suspended all judgments of theology, morality, and justice, were willing to consider the economy as nothing more than an intricate mechanism, refraining for the while from asking whether the mechanism worked for good or evil. . . . The economist's view of the world, which the public cannot yet comfortably stomach, was introduced by a remarkable tour de force, an intellectual revolution brought off in the seventeenth century."¹³³

The problem with this reliance upon mathematics is that, by removing ethics, it removes responsibility. It removes choice. This has been the complaint of the Austrian School for many decades. Buchanan, more an Austrian than a Chicagoan on this point, argued that the reduction of economics to mathematics is the reduction of man to an automaton. For the Austrian, cost is subjective. "This genuine opportunity cost vanishes once a decision is taken. By relatively sharp contrast with this, in the pure science of economic behavior choice is itself illusory. In the abstract model, the behavior of the actor is predictable by an outside observer. This requires that some criteria be objectively measurable, and this objectivity is supplied when the motivational postulate is plugged into the model."¹³⁴ The scientific ideal of prediction runs head-on into the voluntarist's case for freedom. As Van Til described it, this is the Kantian ideal of science against the Kantian ideal of personality.¹³⁵ It is the mathematical ideal against the freedom ideal. It is the world of science against the world of purpose.¹³⁶ It is Kant's phenomenal against Kant's noumenal.¹³⁷ Ethical dualism comparative advantages of subjective value theory and marginalism vs. the concept of general equilibrium.

133. William Letwin, The Origins of Scientific Economics (Garden City, New York: Doubleday Anchor, [1963] 1965), pp. 158–59.

134. James Buchanan, What Should Economists Do? (Indianapolis, Indiana: Liberty Press, 1979), p. 46.

135. Van Til, The Doctrine of Scripture, vol. 1 of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Den Dulk Foundation, 1967), pp. 97–98.

136. Van Til, The Case for Calvinism (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1964), p. 81.

137. Ibid., p. 89.

once again raises its ugly, Janus-faced head.¹³⁸

The Christian economist who acknowledges the validity of Van Til's epistemology (and who also understands its application)¹³⁹ sees no hope in the quest either for a rational ethics—an ethics supposedly derived from value-free presuppositions (which are mythical anyway)—or the quest for a reliable hypothetical mental construct which in any way relies on the idea of man, the omniscient. A wholly rational methodological construct along the lines of Parmenides' unchanging logic—with or without mathematics—is apostate man's attempt to find coherence in a changing world apart from God. General equilibrium theory cannot serve as a reliable "limiting concept" that will in turn serve as a basis for judging the performance of a real-world economy of change, responsible decision-making, and uncertainty. But it is understandable that apostate men wish to believe in the potency of such an intellectual tool. As Ludwig Lachmann wrote as early as 1943: "Economists, not unnaturally, prefer to do their fieldwork in a pleasant green valley where the population register is exhaustive and everybody is known to live on either the right or the left side of an equation. Only on rare occasions—and scarcely ever of their own free will—do they embark on excursions into the rough uplands of the World of Change to chart the country and to record the folkways of its savage inhabitants; whence they return with grim tales of horror and frustration."¹⁴⁰

138. Wrote philosopher Richard Kroner: "The mutual dependence of subjectivity and objectivity rests upon the split of man's consciousness into the consciousness of nature, i.e., the objective world and the consciousness of his own self and the realm of persons. It is because of morality and freedom that this split cannot and must not be overcome. The duality of science and action must be preserved at all costs." Kroner, Kant's Weltanschauung (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1914] 1956), p. 75.

139. I do not think that Douglas Vickers, a Keynesian economist who claimed to follow Van Til's epistemology, understood Van Til's writings or their proper application in the discipline of economics. See his book, A Christian Approach to Economics and the Cultural Tradition (New York: Exposition Press, 1982), a follow-up to his earlier book, Economics and Man (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1976). For a critique of Vickers, see Ian Hodge, Baptized Inflation: A Critique of "Christian" Keynesianism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/Hodge-Bap>)

140. L. M. Lachmann, "The Role of Expectations in Economics as a Social Science," Economica, New Series, Vol. X (February 1943), p. 16. Lachmann was the Austrian School economist who was insistent on the danger of relying heavily on general equilibrium models. "Such smooth transition from one equilibrium (long-run or short-run) to another virtually bars not only discussion of the process in which we are interested here, but of all true economic processes. . . . And all too soon we shall also allow ourselves to forget that what is of real economic interest are not the equilibria, even if they exist, which is in any case doubtful, but what happens between them."

K. A Permanent Ethical Model

In contrast to economic models that are supposedly timeless abstractions from the flux of human existence, God offers His law. This ethical law-order was designed by God to govern His creation. His ethical precepts were given to man as a means of subduing reality, including man himself. A perfect man, Jesus Christ, walked the earth and lived His life in terms of this revealed law. God's law is therefore not strictly "otherworldly," in the sense of applying only to a world beyond the human action, nor is it strictly "this-worldly," in the sense of being the product of human speculation. It is supernatural, yet delivered through revelation by God to mankind. It stands as both an ethical foundation of human action and as a tool of dominion. It explains the operations of the world to us, and it gives us power to exercise dominion over the creation.

1. Sanctification: Three Steps

We say that an individual is saved through God's imputation (judicial declaration) of Christ's righteousness to a sinner. This is called justification. It is a judicial act, God's declaration of "not guilty" by reason of the penalty which was paid by Jesus Christ. But this judicial act also has moral effects. God simultaneously sanctifies a person—sets him apart ethically or morally—in a definitive way at the moment of his regeneration. Christ's righteousness is attributed to him as a whole, perfectly. But this definitive sanctification is to serve as the foundation of his progressive sanctification over time. He is to conform himself to Christ's perfect humanity through progressively adhering to God's law (through God's grace, of course). Then, on the day of final judgment, redeemed man will attain final sanctification—the perfect overcoming of evil. Each redeemed man finally attains the status of perfection which was implicit at the moment of his regeneration. This threefold Lachmann, "The Market Economy and the Distribution of Wealth," in Mary Sennholz (ed.), On Freedom and Free Enterprise, p. 186. Lachmann's expressed hope in 1956 has not come true—in fact, the reverse has taken place: "It is very much to be hoped that economists in the future will show themselves less inclined than they have been in the past to look for ready-made, but spurious, coherence, and that they will take a greater interest in the variety of ways in which the human mind in action produces coherence out of an initially incoherent situation" (p. 187). Nevertheless, his Kantian individualism, with the human mind serving as the entrepreneurial provider of coherence to an incoherent world, was as impotent to deal epistemologically with the realities of God's creation as are the defenders of general equilibrium theory.

aspect of moral sanctification—definitive, progressive, and final—is the basis of ethical progress of both the individual and of a civilization.¹⁴¹

What has not been understood by Christian social thinkers in the past, or at least not explicitly discussed, is that this same pattern of personal sanctification—definitive, progressive, and final—also applies to social organizations whose members have covenanted with God. There is the inescapable original covenant between God and Adam and Eve, which all institutions have violated in the original rebellion of Adam. There are also explicitly covenanted institutions that have been established by self-consciously regenerate believers. The most common examples are the family and the historical church. The same analysis applies also to contractual (though not covenantal)¹⁴² institutions such as schools, businesses, and all other institutions that have been explicitly begun in terms of biblical morality. The perfection of Christ is comprehensive perfection. The salvation that He offers is comprehensive salvation.¹⁴³ It affects every institution. In other words, it affects every area of life in which men have responsibility.

Institutions such as churches and nations are definitively, progressively, and finally judged in history. On what basis? On the basis of God's law. Societies usually refuse to adopt an explicit covenant with God, or if they do, they later break it and fail to ask for its restoration. In both cases, they are judged in history. But if some social organizations are judged in history, isn't it equally true that others are blessed by God in history? The obvious example is the historical church. Isn't it blessed in history? Of course. On what basis? On the basis of its covenant with God, which includes permanent standards of ethical performance: biblical law. The church historical has been sanctified by God, i.e., set apart morally for His purposes. Therefore, we should conclude that certain social institutions in history have also been definitively sanctified, progressively sanctified, and will be finally sanctified at the day of judgment. Without this three-fold model of sanctification, how else could we argue for the continuing and guaranteed existence

141. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision Press, [1980] 2010), ch. 2:D:2; ch. 3:C.

142. The presence of a self-maledictory oath under God identifies a covenantal institution: church, state, or family. There is no such oath in a contract.

143. Gary North, "Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology of Social Action," in Journal of Christian Reconstruction, VIII (Summer 1981). Reprinted in Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>) of the institutional church as a covenantal institution throughout history?

Jesus' perfect fulfilling of the law has effects in history. These effects are personal, but they are also institutional, since institutions, as well as individuals, are under the terms of the covenant. They develop or contract, are blessed or cursed, in terms of the specific terms of God's covenant, which are revealed in biblical law. Institutions, like individuals, cannot "earn" their salvation. They are granted their salvation, or healing, by the grace of God. Men covenant together to perform certain works, and God imputes the moral perfection and moral accomplishments of Jesus Christ to these newly covenanted institutions. How else can we explain the success or failure of families? How else can we explain why God visits the iniquity of certain families onto the members of the third and fourth generations (Ex. 20:5)? People make explicit covenants with God or rebel against His implicit covenants, such as the dominion covenant given to all men through our parents, Adam and Eve, and again with our other parents, Noah and his family. They succeed or fail in terms of covenantal moral standards. They advance or fall away in time, they grow or decay, progressively over time. This process is ethical and covenantal, not biological.

2. Providential Covenantalism

Here is the biblical solution of the question of social change. Here also is the biblical solution to the dualisms of metaphysical speculation: statics vs. dynamics. Deuteronomy 28, with its covenantal structure of social blessings and cursings, is the ethical standard for social science, including economics. This is the biblical alternative to the timeless world of general equilibrium theory, "peopled" with inhuman omniscient beings, passively responding to their nearly infinite number of simultaneous equations. The real world of scarcity, uncertainty, and time is not a world of meaningless flux, but is instead a providential world, personally governed by a changeless God who has issued His sovereign decree.¹⁴⁴ The operational link between ethics and social change is biblical law. The personal link is Jesus Christ, the perfect man and simultaneously the divine Person who created this world.

Man, created in God's image, has access to knowledge, including economic knowledge, through revelation, both "natural" and "personally revealed." Both kinds of revelation are inescapably personal. Van

144. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 1: "Cosmic Personalism."

Til called this Christian-theistic ethics. Correct knowledge of the way the world works comes only from God's revelation of Himself and His law in the Bible. "The distinction between revealed and natural theology as ordinarily understood readily gives rise to a misunderstanding. It seems to indicate that man, though he is a sinner, can have certain true knowledge of God from nature but that for higher things he requires revelation. This is incorrect. It is true that we should make our theology and our ethics wide enough to include man's moral relationship to the whole universe. But it is not true that any ethical question that deals with man's place in nature can be interpreted rightly without the light of Scripture. For these reasons we prefer the name Christian-theistic ethics."¹⁴⁵

This view of man's knowledge is denied by all humanistic scholarship, and also by most forms of Christian scholarship. Christian apologetics has been corrupted by a Greek concept of autonomous knowledge from the days of the early church fathers.¹⁴⁶ When Christians at last abandon this view of natural revelation, a paradigm shift of monumental proportions will take place that will transform the church, and then will transform the world.

L. Inefficient Humanism

The humanistic economist, like scientists of all kinds, rejects a biblical resolution of the "law-flux" problem. Most economists appeal "scientifically" to mechanistic explanations of human action. There are a few notable exceptions, but they are humanistic John the Baptists, crying in the epistemological wilderness.¹⁴⁷ Far more typical is Stephen Cheung, a rigorously empirical economist, and a rigorously naive technician, who titled his book, The Myth of Social Cost. The book is almost as mythical epistemologically as Coase's original essay. He argued that there is no theoretical barrier against making scientifically valid economic settlements where pollution is involved. He admitted that abstracting from transaction costs does lead to problems. "The important conclusion is that the solution becomes mechanical once the nature and magnitude of transaction costs, together with other con- straints, are sufficiently specified."¹⁴⁸ He italicized his words, so he must have regarded them as significant.

145. Van Til, Christian Theistic Ethics, p. 16.

146. Van Til, Christianity in Conflict (Philadelphia: Westminster Seminary, 1962).

147. For example, Prof. Kenneth Boulding. See his presidential address to the American Economics Association, "Economics As A Moral Science," American Economic Review, LIX (March 1969).

What we can and must say, contrary to Professor Cheung, is that no solution in economics is ever mechanical, because all solutions involve comparisons of subjective value—interpersonal in the same period of time or across time, or intrapersonal across time.¹⁴⁹ Admit this, and Galbraith's conclusion is inescapable: "In the name of good scientific method he [the economist] is prevented from saying anything."¹⁵⁰ Thus, the economist is living in an epistemological dream world, a world of hypothetical scientific neutrality, complex formulas, mathematics, and (usually) taxpayer-financed salaries.

Neutrality is the essence of what we might call "economic formalism." Pro-free market economists continually appeal to efficiency apart from equity. How can we maximize value, they ask, questions of equity apart? This is the perhaps the major persuasion problem that pro-free market defenders have: how to overcome the objections of socialists and other critics of the free market, who point to questions of equity and fairness as the crucial ones, rather than questions of efficiency. Until the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991, the free market's defenders failed to convince the socialists and ethicists that the benefits of economic efficiency are greater than the social and personal costs of competition's "heartlessness," and "economic oppression." Inescapably, the decision as to which is more important—efficiency or morality—is a question of value (subjective and objective), a moral question. But free-market economists have so downplayed moral questions in their "scientific" discussions that they are not skilled competitors in any intellectual marketplace of moral ideas. Unfortunately for them, that is the only marketplace of ideas there is. Because they have em- phasized efficiency and have excluded or downplayed questions of morality and value, value-free economists have not been efficient competitors in the intellectual marketplace. The religion of economic efficiency turns out to be woefully inefficient.

148. Steven N. S. Cheung, The Myth of Social Cost (San Francisco: Cato Institute, [1978] 1980), p. 31.

149. On this point—which utterly devastates all humanistic economics, including Austrian subjectivism—see G. L. S. Shackle, Time in Economics (Amsterdam: North Holland Pub. Co., 1958), lecture 1; cf. "The Complex Nature of Time as a Concept in Economics," Economica Internazionale, VIII, No. 4. Shackle pushed the logic of pure subjectivism, pure solipsism, and pure autonomy to a preposterous but consistent conclusion: every point in time is unique, incomparable, and autonomous. He called it the "moment-in-being." For an attempted refutation which fails, see Ludwig Lachmann, Capital, Expectations, and the Market Process (Kansas City, Kansas: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, 1977), pp. 81–86. Lachmann fell back on the epistemologically hopeless concept of "common experience" to escape Shackle's logic: p. 86. The result of this epistemology is nihilism, or as Lachmann called it, kaleidic.

150. John Kenneth Galbraith, The Affluent Society (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1958), p. 150.

M. Max Weber's Critique: Dialecticism

Max Weber,¹⁵¹ the great German social scientist (d. 1920), recognized the tension—a permanent tension, he argued—in all humanistic economic systems between what he called “formal rationality” and “substantive rationality.” It is the heart of the debate between capitalism and socialism. This is the question of efficiency vs. ethics.¹⁵² With respect to economic efficiency (formal rationality), Weber argued, capitalism’s critics very often take offense: “All of these [substantively rational, ethical—G.N.] approaches may consider the ‘purely formal’ rationality of calculation in monetary terms as of quite secondary importance or even as fundamentally inimical to their respective ultimate ends, even before anything has been said about the consequences of the specifically modern calculating attitude.”¹⁵³ In short, Weber concluded, “Formal and substantive rationality, no matter by what standard the latter is measured, are always in principle separate things, no

151. Pronounced Mawx Vayber.

152. Weber wrote: “A system of economic activity will be called ‘formally’ rational according to the degree in which the provision for needs, which is essential to every rational economy, is capable of being expressed in numerical, calculable terms, and is so expressed. . . . The concept is thus unambiguous, at least in the sense that expression in money terms yields the highest degree of formal calculability. . . . The concept of ‘substantive rationality,’ on the other hand, is full of ambiguities. It conveys only one element common to all ‘substantive’ analyses: namely, that they do not restrict themselves to note the purely formal and (relatively) unambiguous fact that action is based on ‘goal-oriented’ rational calculation with the technically most adequate available methods, but apply certain criteria of ultimate ends, whether they be ethical, political, utilitarian, hedonistic, feudal (ständisch), egalitarian, or whatever, and measure the results of the economic action, however formally ‘rational’ in the sense of correct calculation they may be, against these scales of ‘value rationality’ or ‘substantive goal rationality.’ There is an infinite number of possible value scales for this type of rationality, of which the socialist and communist standards constitute only one group. The latter, although by no means unambiguous in themselves, always involve elements of social justice and equality.” Weber, Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, eds. Guenther Roth and Claus Wittich (New York: Bedminster Press, 1968), pp. 85–86. This is a translation of Weber’s posthumous Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, 4th German edition, 1956.

153. Ibid., p. 86. See a slightly different translation of this passage and the one in the preceding footnote in Weber, The Theory of Social and Economic Organization, ed. Talcott Parsons (New York: The Free Press, [1947] 1964), pp. 185–86.

matter that in many (and under certain very artificial assumptions even in all) cases they may coincide empirically.”¹⁵⁴ This dialectical tension is basic to Weber’s sociological analysis.¹⁵⁵

Economists who defend the free market seldom acknowledge the nature of this fundamental debate between the free market’s intellectual defenders and the free market’s critics. Their “value-free” methodology and their methodological individualism blind them to the realities of the debate—a debate over morality, values, and the effects of voluntary economic transactions on society. Free market economists cannot seem to understand those scholars and critics who raise the question of individual morality, let alone social consequences and social values, and who then ignore questions of economic efficiency for the attainment of the economic goals of individuals. The economists dismiss such criticisms as amateurish and irrational; the fact that most people accept the perspective of the critics does not faze the economists, most of whom see this battle as a technical academic debate rather than a life-and-death war for Western civilization. They see all conflicts as in principle resolvable “at the margin, at some price.”

Anti-capitalist critics, of course, really do tend to ignore questions of efficiency, a concept that does have to be considered carefully in any relevant discussion of men’s economic ability to pursue moral goals, both personal and social. Weber recognized this: “Where a planned economy is radically carried out, it must further accept the inevitable reduction in formal, calculatory rationality which would result from the elimination of money and capital accounting. Substantive and formal (in the sense of exact calculation) rationality are, it should be stated again, after all largely distinct problems. This fundamental and, in the last analysis, unavoidable element of irrationality in economic systems is one of the important sources of all ‘social’ problems, and above all, of the problems of socialism.”¹⁵⁶ Thus, Weber pointed to a dialectical tension in all humanistic discussions of social systems. Free market economists and capitalism’s critics do not come to grips with each other’s arguments.

The free market economist does have this working for him: socialism really is inefficient. People around the globe want the fruits of free market capitalism, which are only too visible on television and in imported media, and national leaders are drastically modifying socialist ownership in order to provide access to these fruits. There was a humorous definition in the late 1980s that described the situation in Europe: "Socialist, noun: a capitalist who, for political reasons, cannot admit it publicly." That ended after 1991. Nevertheless, economic pragmatism is not sufficient to serve as the foundation for an entire civilization. Envy still has a large political constituency.¹⁵⁷ There is a desperate need today for a moral and ultimately religious defense of capitalism.¹⁵⁸ It will not suffice to defend the formal efficiency of the free market by means of an appeal to the formal political techniques of democracy. An appeal to formal rationalism from the market to the election booth and back again is little more than the proverbial pair of drunks who lean on each other in order to stay on their feet. Eventually, they tumble together. Weber's dualism between substantive rationalism and formal rationalism is as applicable to democratic theory as to market theory. The spirit of democratic capitalism needs moral content derived from outside market theory and democratic theory.¹⁵⁹ The naked public square needs more than the fig leaf of political and religious pluralism to protect it from the socially destructive elements of revolutionary violence and moral erosion.¹⁶⁰

154. Ibid., p. 108. [Theory, p. 212.]

155. Gary North, “Max Weber: Rationalism, Irrationalism, and the Bureaucratic Cage,” in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship, pp. 141–46.

156. Weber, Economy and Society, p. 111. [Theory, pp. 214–15.]

N. "Weighing Up the Gains and Losses"

Let us return to Coase's arguments—arguments that deliberately ignore the ethical question of private property rights and the losses to those whose rights are violated. "It is all a question of weighing up the gains that would accrue from eliminating these harmful effects against the gains that accrue from allowing them to continue."¹⁶¹ But here is the real "problem of social costs": *the economist, as a scientist, has no way to "weigh up" economic gains and losses.*¹⁶²

157. Gonzalo Fernandez de la Mora, Egalitarian Envy: The Political Foundations of Social Justice, translated by Antonio T. de Nicholas (New York: Paragon House, 1987), Part B.

158. Paul Johnson, "The moral dilemma confronting capitalism," Washington Times (Feb. 21, 1989).

159. Michael Novak, The Spirit of Democratic Capitalism (New York: Touchstone, 1982).

160. Richard John Neuhaus, The Naked Public Square: Religion and Democracy in America (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1984). Cf. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

161. Coase, "Social Cost," p. 26.

162. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, ch. 5.

Coase and all of his followers go on blithely as if all this talk about tallying up costs and benefits—social or individual—had any epistemologically valid theoretical meaning for a methodological individualist, let alone any scientific application. “The problem which we face in dealing with actions which have harmful effects is not simply one of restraining those responsible for them. What has to be decided is whether the gain from preventing the harm is greater than the loss which would be suffered elsewhere as a result of stopping the action which produces the harm.”¹⁶³ But economists cannot measure social costs and benefits, according to the logic of modern economics, since costs and benefits are exclusively subjective categories.

Humanistic economists go about their business as if “equilibrium analysis” were anything more than a teaching device, and very often a misleading one.¹⁶⁴ The assumptions of equilibrium analysis deny the possibility of human action in a world in which these equilibrium conditions exist. There is perfect knowledge for market participants in such a universe, and therefore neither profits nor losses. (Yet, even in equilibrium, there would be transaction costs. There are no free lunches in the land of equilibrium; it is just that everyone knows exactly how much everyone’s lunch will cost.) It is a world of automatons, not humans, as Mises wrote. Yet all of the “rigorously scientific” discussions of economic efficiency and optimal distribution are based on the trans-historical model of equilibrium. Peter Lewin has seen this more clearly than most economists have: “The other important assumption underlying the efficiency approach is the absence of significant distortions elsewhere in the economy. The calculation of social costs and benefits is profoundly affected if this assumption is violated. In a world of distortions, where prices are not general equilibrium competitive prices that reflect marginal costs, the imposition of a Pigouvian tax or a liability that would achieve efficiency if distortions were absent may reduce efficiency. . . . In more general terms, outside of equilibrium there is no way to know if any move is efficiency-enhancing or not.”¹⁶⁵ He went so far as to say—quite accurately with respect

163. Coase, “Social Cost,” p. 27.

164. Debreau’s mathematical analysis of free market equilibrium won him the 1983 Nobel Prize in economics, but it tells us little about how the real world of supply and demand really works. Gerard Debreau, Theory of Price: An Axiomatic Analysis of Equilibrium (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1959). This is wood, hay, and stubble.

165. Peter Lewin, “Pollution Externalities: Social Cost and Strict Liability,” Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), pp. 216–17. (<http://bit.ly/LewinPollution>) to a methodology devoid of the concept of God, revelation, and absolute objective values—that “the notion of efficiency makes little sense outside of general equilibrium.”¹⁶⁶

Coase was unquestionably correct that “In a world in which there are costs of rearranging the rights established by the legal system, the courts, in cases relating to nuisance, are, in effect, making a decision on the economic problem and determining how resources are to be employed.”¹⁶⁷ To the extent that Coase’s article helps judges or others to become more aware of this inescapable reality of economic allocation, it is a useful essay. But how useful is a rarified academic exercise which overlooks that most fundamental of economic costs: the cost of suffering a violation of justice? Never forget: he wanted to limit his discussion to costs and benefits, “questions of equity apart.”

O. Optimal Crime and Optimal Punishment

We see the same sort of “add it up” reasoning in a subdivision of law and economics: crime and punishment. Ever since Gary S. Becker’s pioneering article in 1968, University of Chicago-type economists have been analyzing crime and law enforcement in terms of a model that minimizes social losses from crime. This model treats social costs and optimal social solutions as if such concepts had scientific validity in a world of subjectivist economic analysis. Please forgive the following; it was written by an economist.

Optimal policies are defined as those that minimize the social loss from crime. That loss depends upon the net damage to victims; the resource costs of discovering, apprehending, and convicting offenders; and the costs of punishment itself. These components of the loss, in turn, depend upon the number of criminal offenders, the probability of apprehending and convicting offenders, the size and form of punishments, the potential legal incomes of offenders, and several other variables. The optimal supply of criminal offenses—in essence, the amount of crime—is then determined by selecting values for the probability of conviction, the penalty, and other variables determined by society that minimize the social loss from crime. Within this framework, theorems are derived that relate the optimal probability of conviction, the optimal punishments, and the optimal supply of criminal offenses to such factors as the size of the damages from various types of crimes, changes in the overall costs of apprehending and convicting offenders, and differences in the relative responsiveness of offenders to conviction probabilities and to penalties.¹⁶⁸

166. Ibid., p. 217.

167. Coase, “Social Cost,” p. 27.

This all sounds so scientific, but it is all spurious if economics does not allow the interpersonal comparison of subjective utilities or the aggregating of interpersonal utilities, which it doesn't. But sophisticated, intellectually rigorous analyses such as this certainly do increase the likelihood of academic tenure and personal career advancement—an employment guarantee that some people (myself included) regard as less than socially optimal.¹⁶⁹ Becker won the Nobel Prize in economics in 1992, the year after Coase won it.

The reader should be aware that the practitioners of economics are unhappy with the public's perception of their trade. The economist as a rigorous scientist cannot do without the concept of equilibrium to build his theories, and this concept begins with the presupposition of perfect, zero-cost knowledge. Then he attempts to fit this model onto the error-filled real world, "making appropriate modifications," of course. Problem: the moment he makes any modification, the model disintegrates. At best, the equilibrium model is useful as a platform for making intuitive leaps of faith. Intuitive leaps of faith are inescapable aspects of all economic thought, a fact which economists prefer not to discuss.¹⁷⁰

1. Becker's Breakthrough

Becker insisted that his approach to crime and punishment does not "assume perfect knowledge, lightning-fast calculation, or any of the other caricatures of economic theory."¹⁷¹ He was self-deceived; this is exactly what all discussions of socially optimum decision-making must assume. This attempted caricature is in fact the heart, mind, and soul of modern economics as an academic discipline. Without it, there could be no mathematics or equations in economic analysis, and

168. William M. Landes, in Gary S. Becker and William M. Landes (eds.), Essays in the Economics of Crime and Punishment (New York: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1974), p. xiv. Each of the five authors who contributed the book's six essays was at the time a professor at the University of Chicago.

169. Cf. Robert A. Nisbet, "The Permanent Professors: A Modest Proposal," Public Interest (Fall 1965); reprinted in Nisbet, Tradition and Revolt: Historical and Sociological Essays (New York: Random House, 1968), ch. 12.

170. North, "Economics: From Reason to Intuition," in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship, ch. 5.

171. Gary S. Becker, "Crime and Punishment: an Economic Approach" (1968), in Essays in the Economics of Crime and Punishment, p. 9.

without mathematics, one rarely gets into print in the prestigious scholarly economics journals.¹⁷² Certainly, Becker's essay is made nearly unreadable by page after page of pseudo-scientific equations, as are most of his other essays.

Becker insisted that "This essay concentrates almost entirely on determining optimal policies to combat illegal behavior and pays little attention to actual policies."¹⁷³ In this regard, the essay is representative of virtually the whole field of law and economics. Becker preferred equations and equilibrium to the concept of personal responsibility when it came to suggesting what should be done about crime. He and his colleagues have refused to honor Baird's warning: "Since all costs and benefits are subjective, no government can accurately identify, much less establish, the optimum quantity of anything."¹⁷⁴ Admit this, and 90% of what gets published in the professional academic journals would have to be rejected by the editors. Where, under such academically sub-optimal circumstances, would a career economist publish an essay such as Isaac Ehrlich's representative example, "Optimal Participation in Illegitimate Market Activities: A One-Period Uncertainty Model"?¹⁷⁵

Biblical law is the foundation of optimal social and economic policies—the only foundation that honors God and can therefore produce long-term benefits: covenantal blessings. This is why we need to adhere to the Bible's system of penalties to be imposed by the civil government; without this, we are flying blind. Otherwise, we will fly as blind as Gary Becker did when he wrote: "A wise use of fines requires knowledge of marginal gains and harm and of marginal apprehension and conviction costs; admittedly, such knowledge is not easily attained."¹⁷⁶ Not easily attained! In terms of the logic of subjective economics, such knowledge cannot be attained at all. We cannot make scientific interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility or disutility. Professional economists may shudder at the thought of restructuring civil sanctions to make civil law conform more closely to biblical law, but they have nothing to offer in its place except endless self-deception

172. Galbraith, Economics Peace and Laughter, ch. 2.

173. Essays in the Economics of Crime and Punishment, p. 44.

174. Charles W. Baird, "The Philosophy and Ideology of Pollution Regulation," Cato Journal, II (Spring 1982), p. 303.

175. Actually, this was only a subsection in his influential and equation-filled article, "Participation in Illegitimate Activities: An Economic Analysis," in Essays in the Economics of Crime and Punishment.

176. Becker, in ibid., p. 28.

regarding the scientific possibility of discovering socially optimal levels of crime and punishment.¹⁷⁷

That Becker's essay does not even consider the possibility of restitution payments by criminals to their victims, but instead focuses on the social benefits of fines paid to the state, indicates how far from common sense these scientific economists are. What mainly disturbed Becker was that with imprisonment, "some of the payment 'by' offenders would not be received by the rest of society, and a net social loss would result."¹⁷⁸ He was so concerned with questions of "net social loss" that he neglected the crucial question of the net personal loss suffered by the victim.¹⁷⁹ The word "restitution" does not appear in the index of Essays in the Economics of Crime and Punishment. (The book has approximately 170 pages of equations or parts of equations in its 273 pages, with most of the remainder devoted to charts, graphs, statistical regression analysis, brief bibliographies, and the five and a half page index.)¹⁸⁰ Two decades later, Becker was still humming the same old tune: "deterrence, not vengeance," fines, not restitution to victims. Yet he still had discovered no objective answer to the problem he raised: making the punishment fit the crime: "Obviously, it is hard to estimate damages for many company crimes and even harder to determine the probability of conviction."¹⁸¹ Hard? By the standards of subjective value theory, it is theoretically impossible.

Buchanan was correct in his discussion of the economics of crime: "... any costs which the economist may objectify need bear little relation to those costs which serve as actual obstacles to decisions." He was not correct in his next sentence: "Recognition of this fact need not 177. For example, Nobel Prize-winning University of Chicago economist George Stigler's essay, "The Optimum Enforcement of Laws," ibid, pp. 55–67.

178. Becker, pp. 24–25.

179. He said that criminal law should deal only with crimes in which victims cannot be compensated. "Thus an action would be 'criminal' precisely because it results in uncompensated 'harm' to others." Ibid., p. 33. I have some questions. First, if someone can serve a prison term or pay a fine to the state, why can't he compensate victims instead? Second, why did Becker refuse to discuss the overwhelming majority of crimes in which there are identifiable victims, preferring instead to fill up pages with equations? Was he conveniently defining away the problem of crime and punishment for the vast majority of crimes? Third, why did he feel it necessary to put quotation marks around criminal and harm? Is it because such language smacks too much of objective moral norms?

180. For an equally arcane academic treatment, see David J. Pyle, The Economics of Crime and Law Enforcement (New York: St. Martin's, 1983).

181. Gary Becker, "Make the Punishment Fit the Corporate Crime," Business Week (March 13, 1989).

destroy the usefulness of the economic analysis."¹⁸² Without a scientifically verifiable link between subjective decision-making and objective fines, the economist cannot make a coherent case for any outcome other than judicial chaos. (It should not be surprising that Becker argued that the free market would bring economic order even if all men's decisions were irrational.)¹⁸³ The economist needs a ruler, as Thirlby so accurately identified it. In fact, he capitalized it.¹⁸⁴ The economist does indeed need a Ruler, an "omniscient observer who can read all preference functions," as Buchanan so professionally described Him.¹⁸⁵ But economists have denied His relevance from the beginning of the profession; economics was the first scientific guild to do so. It was this self-conscious separation of economics from both theology and morality that economist William Letwin praised as "the greatest accomplishment of the seventeenth century."¹⁸⁶ (It apparently overshadowed the less significant work of Director of the Mint, Mr. Newton.)

This digression has been necessary in order to demonstrate what the academic field of economics and law is really all about. It is all about making scholarly reputations by making preposterous assumptions. The more preposterous the assumptions, the more scholarly the reputation. And it is all done in the name of optimality: "The main contribution of this essay, as I see it, is to demonstrate that optimal policies to combat illegal behavior are part of an optimal allocation of resources."¹⁸⁷

2. The Social Benefits of Criminal Behavior

A unique component of the Becker thesis on criminal behavior is his thesis that the concern of society in prohibiting criminal behavior ought to be the reduction of net social cost. This is a very important qualification. In calculating the net cost to society of any criminal act, Becker insisted that we must count as a positive benefit the gains made by the criminal by committing the crime. "The net cost or damage to

182. Buchanan, Cost and Choice, p. 93.

183. Gary Becker, "Irrational Behavior and Economic Theory," Journal of Political Economy, LXX (Feb. 1962). For my critique of his position, as well as Israel Kirzner's very different critique, see North, Sovereignty and Dominion, pp. 443–50.

184. Thirlby, "The Ruler," South African Journal of Economics, XIV (Dec. 1946), reprinted in L.S.E. Essays on Cost.

185. Buchanan, Cost and Choice, p. 95.

186. Letwin, Origins of Scientific Economics, p. 159.

187. Becker, "Crime and Punishment," op. cit., p. 45.

society is simply the difference between the harm and gain," he wrote.¹⁸⁸ How could he say this? Because of his thesis—the one which undergirds this whole subdivision of economics—that criminal behavior is no different from any other profit-seeking behavior. Ethics has no role to play in distinguishing crime from other profit-seeking activities. "The approach taken here follows the economists' usual analysis of choice and assumes that a person commits an offense if the expected utility to him exceeds the utility he could get by using his time and other resources at other activities. Some persons become 'criminals,' therefore, not because their basic motivation differs from that of other persons, but because their benefits and costs differ."¹⁸⁹

Notice, first, that he put the word criminals in quotation marks, indicating his fear of making an ethical judgment in a scholarly journal. Second, he hesitated to follow what economists sometimes call the pure logic of choice.¹⁹⁰ He said that some persons become criminals "because their benefits and costs differ" from law-abiding persons. Why not use cost-benefit analysis to explain the actions of all criminals? Why limit it to only some? Why bother to distinguish the non-economic motives of criminals from those of non-criminals? The logic of his argument is that non-economic motives and personal tastes are irrelevant for economic analysis; only costs and benefits are relevant for making predictions regarding people's economic behavior.¹⁹¹ Why not follow the logic of the argument? Why not conclude in print that there

188. Ibid., p. 6.

189. Ibid., p. 9.

190. F. A. Hayek, "Economics and Knowledge," Economica, IV (1937), reprinted in Hayek, Individualism and Economic Order (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), pp. 35, 39, 46–47. (<http://bit.ly/HayekIAEO>). See also Richard Fuerle, The Pure Logic of Choice (New York: Vantage, 1986).

191. This is how professional economists assess Becker's argument. Wrote Paul H. Rubin: "Becker essentially argued that criminals are about like anyone else—that is, they rationally maximize their own self-interest (utility) subject to the constraints (prices, incomes) that they face in the marketplace and elsewhere. Thus the decision to become a criminal is in principle no different from the decision to become a bricklayer or a carpenter, or, indeed, an economist. The individual considers the net costs and benefits of each alternative and makes his decision on this basis. If we then want to explain changes in criminal behavior over time or space, we examine changes in these constraints. The basic assumption in this type of research is that tastes are constant and that changes in behavior can be explained by changes in prices." But we all know that tastes do change. This is economically irrelevant, say the economists. Why? Because economics cannot yet deal with changes in taste. "Tastes are assumed to be constant because we have absolutely no theory of changes in tastes. . . ." Rubin, "The Economics of Crime," in Ralph Andreano and John J. Siegfried (eds.), The Economics of Crime (New York: Wiley, 1980), p. 15.

is no theoretically valid economic difference between profit-seeking activities and criminal acts; there are only differences in net social utility? But he did not go this far. It is almost as if some last remaining trace of common sense and moral values kept Becker from pursuing the logic of his position.

His followers have not been so reticent: "An individual decision to commit a crime (or not to commit a crime) is simply an application of the economist's theory of choice. If the benefits of the illegal action exceed the costs, the crime is committed, and it is not if costs exceed benefits. Offenders are not pictured as 'sick' or 'irrational,' but merely as engaging in activities that yield the most satisfaction, given their available alternatives."¹⁹² Then what of the warning of God in Proverbs? "All they that hate me love death" (8:36b). Of course: just redefine suicidal criminal behavior in terms of the criminal's subjective preference for death, assume the existence of subjective ordinal (or even cardinal) utility in his subjective value preference scale, and economic analysis still holds! Common sense disappears, but economic analysis, like the smile of the cheshire cat, remains. (In all honesty, this kind of economic analysis goes back to the mid-nineteenth century. Jeremy Bentham used a very similar approach based on net pleasure or pain. Mercifully, the academic world had not yet discovered either econometrics or multivariate regression analysis, so his essays were literate and coherent.)

Becker was too timid to pursue his remarkable thesis very far. Let me show you where it leads. What about the net social cost or net social benefit of murder? He wrote that "the cost of murder is measured by the loss of earnings of victims and excludes, among other things, the value placed by society on life itself. . . ."¹⁹³ But this was insufficiently rigorous by the standards of Chicago School economics. He forgot that the victim's ability to earn a living also involves costs. The producer must eat, use public facilities of various kinds, and be a life-long absorber of resources. So, what Becker really meant to say is that the cost of murder is the net loss—discounted by the prevailing rate of long-term interest, of course¹⁹⁴—of the late victim's lifetime earning potential, minus net lifetime expenditures (also discounted). This raises a key question in our era of legalized abortion, which may be a 192. Morgan O. Reynolds, "The Economics of Criminal Activity" (1973), reprinted in ibid., p. 34.

193. Becker, "Crime and Punishment," p. 9.

194. See Posner's discussion: Economic Analysis of Law, pp. 170-81.

preliminary to legalized euthanasia (as it has been in the Netherlands): What if the dead victim had been sick, dying, mentally retarded, or in some other way is a net absorber of society's scarce economic resources? Must we not conclude that the murderer has in fact increased the net wealth of society? Remember Becker's rule: "society's" estimation of net social costs or benefits "excludes, among other things, the value placed by society on life itself." On what economic grounds could a legislator oppose the concept of selective murder, with criminal indictments to be handed down in specific cases only after a retrospective evaluation (by some committee or other) of net costs and benefits?¹⁹⁵ Who is to say? After all, as he says, "Reasonable men will often differ on the amount of damages or benefits caused by different activities."¹⁹⁶

If all this begins to sound like the work of a madman, this is only because it is the work of a technically skilled University of Chicago economist who follows the logic of his position.¹⁹⁷ Bear in mind that Becker's essay on crime is regarded by his peers as a classic in the field, one comparable to (and written with the same presuppositions as) Coase's essay on social cost. One European economist has called Becker's work truly revolutionary. Even more: ". . . Gary Becker is classed among the greatest living American economists."¹⁹⁸

195. Becker also failed to mention the value of life to the late victim, which seems a bit odd, given the fact that Becker also pioneered a subdivision in the economics profession called human capital: Gary S. Becker, Human Capital (New York: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1964). Fortunately, Richard Posner attempted to rectify this gaping hole in Becker's analysis. He did try to make an objective estimation of the economic value of life to the victim, which he concluded is nearly infinite. He used a hypothetical example of rising economic payment that someone would demand to induce him to get involved in death-producing activities: the more likely death becomes, the higher the pay demanded. If death is sure, the price demanded will approach infinity. (Why, then, do men volunteer for suicide missions in wartime?) This was his surrogate for making a subjective posthumous estimation of life's monetary value to the late victim: Posner, Economic Analysis of Law, pp. 182–86. He drew no important conclusions from this analysis, however, and did not include it in his book's index under "death," for which there is no entry, or under the entries for "murder."

196. Becker, "Crime and Punishment," p. 45.

197. For a brief, intelligent, and methodologically rigorous response to Becker, see G. Warren Nutter, "On Economism," Journal of Law and Economics, XXII (October 1979), pp. 263–68. It was in response to Becker's methodology that I wrote my tongue-in-cheek piece, "A Note on the Opportunity Cost of Marriage," Journal of Political Economy (April 1968), in which I concluded that male Ph.D.-holding scholars cannot afford to marry women who are not high school drop-outs. Astoundingly, George Stigler (seemingly straight-faced) replied in a subsequent issue that I had not dealt with Adam Smith accurately.

198. Henri Lepage, Tomorrow, Capitalism: The Economics of Economic Freedom (La Salle, Illinois: Open Court, [1978] 1982), p. 161. The chapter is titled, "The Gary

3. Pin-Stickers and Their Victims

Becker returned to the age-old question of the pin-sticker and his victim.¹⁹⁹ If a person enjoys sticking pins into other people, and if other people resent this, what should society do? Should we try to construct a measuring device to record the joy of the pin-sticker and then compare it to the pain of his victim? Should society base the decision of whether to identify this act as a crime in terms of the pin-sticker's pleasure minus his victim's pain—"net social utility"? If so, what do we do about the masochist who enjoys being stuck? (Yes, I know: sticking him is a victimless crime, and therefore in theory outside economic policy analysis.)

The biblical view of man rests on the presupposition that there are two kinds of people: covenant-breakers and covenant-keepers. There is also such a thing as common grace.²⁰⁰ When God removes it, people become more consistent with their own ethical presuppositions. Increasing numbers of covenant-breakers turn to crime as an expression of their ethical rebellion against God. The economics of crime and punishment no doubt can be discussed in part in terms of criminals' expected costs and benefits, but equally important, if not more important, is the psychological link between crime and certain forms of addiction, especially the addiction to illicit thrills and danger. People's tastes are not stable, contrary to Chicago School economists; people can and do develop an addiction to criminal behavior. They need ever-increasing doses of crime to satisfy their habit. Thus, to analyze all economic actors in terms of the pure logic of expected profit and loss is a fundamental error of modern economic analysis.

Becker disagreed. He wanted to consider only people's perceived costs and benefits, risks and rewards, net. The logic of Becker's position seems to infer the right of a criminal to inflict damage as heavy as murder, just so long as he can demonstrate in court through cost-benefit analysis that the particular murder produced net social utility. Coase, writing eight years earlier, was more judicious in his conclusions. He wanted only to assert the right at some price of an individual to inflict less permanent forms of damage than murder.

Becker Revolution."

199. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, p. 66.

200. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

P. The “Right to Inflict Damage”

Coase considered an example taken from Pigou’s Economics of Welfare. Suppose that it would pay a railroad firm to run a train faster than normal, thereby throwing off more sparks. (The example applies to railroads before the era of diesel engines, but it is still valid as an example.) Suppose also that the sparks set a fire that burns a farmer’s crop. Pigou said that the railroad company should reimburse the farmer for the loss of his crops by paying him the crop’s market value. This, it should be pointed out, is also what Exodus 22:6 says.

1. Net Social Benefits

Coase denied Pigou’s conclusion. “The conclusion that it is desirable that the railway should be made liable for the damage it causes is wrong.”²⁰¹ Why? Because the economic gains to the total economy, as revealed by the value of the crops lost vs. the cost of installing spark-arresters on the engine, or the losses to the railroad company if the train was not run at all, might be greater by allowing the train to emit sparks. (Might be, might be, might be: How can anyone know, given the intellectual tools of modern, subjectivist economics?) The judge should consider the monetary value of the burned crops in relation to the cost of installing a spark-arrester or the monetary losses to the company of running the train more slowly, and then make a decision as to what each party owes the other. In other words, he must consider the value of total production. “This question can be resolved by considering what would happen to the value of total production if it were decided to exempt the railway from liability from fire-damage. . . .”²⁰² Coase argued that it might be better for society in general if the farmer’s property rights are ignored, leaving him free to pay the railroad company sufficient money to install the spark-arrester. After all, the value of the crop may be greater than the cost of the spark-arrester.²⁰³

201. Coase, “Social Cost,” p. 32.

202. Ibid., p. 33.

203. Clearly, the damage inflicted on the crops planted close to the tracks by numerous farmers could be high. The costs would be high to organize the farmers together in order to contribute money to finance the installation of the spark arrester. Each farmer would tend to wait for the others to put up the money. Each would prefer to become a “free rider” in the transaction: paying nothing, but benefitting from the spark arrester. The payment to the railroad firm probably would not be made apart from intervention by the civil government to compel all farmers who are benefitted by

What if the farmer had worked for years to build up the soil or build his family's dream home? This labor was unquestionably a manifestation of the dominion covenant. Perhaps he dimly understood that his labor to build the house was in a unique way a moral act under God, meaning his personal conformity to God's injunction to subdue the earth to His glory. His home is not simply a manifestation of his technical competence as a builder; it may also be a manifestation of his self-conscious fulfillment of the dominion covenant. In other words, this house may be in a very real sense a holy thing—a thing set apart for God by the very act of constructing it. This is why people are sometimes “irrationally” committed to a piece of ground. A spark-emitting train is threatening his home's existence, meaning the work of his hands, meaning his dream or vision. Is he entitled to no compensation? Isn't the railway always liable for damages? Furthermore, if the court decides that the railway is liable—and Coase denied that the court should automatically decide that it is—is the man's shattered dream worth only monetary compensation for the market value of his crops? Maybe he resents the fact that the railway is reducing to mere dollars his right to safety from fire, and market-determined dollars at that? Shouldn't the engines be fitted with a spark retarder, by law? After all, this is not an accidental, occasional incident; this is a daily threat of fire that is a statistically probable event because of the technology involved in running the trains. In short, what about the psychic costs to the victim? Coase's analysis completely ignores this fundamental issue.²⁰⁴

2. “Coase, Get Your Cattle Off My Land!”

What about the farmer who sees the cattleman move in next door? What about the cattleman who sees the sheepherder move in next door to him? If the other man's animals come roaming into his garden or into his pasture, isn't the victim entitled to compensation? What if the “accident” of wandering animals is not an accident, but a regular way of doing business? Shouldn't the offender be required to put a fence around the wandering beasts? Why should the injured party be required by the court to share the costs of fencing? Are the victim's the spark arrester to pay their proportional share. The civil government eventually must decide who pays whom: the railroad firm paying damages to the farmers, or the farmers paying “protection money” to the railroad company.

204. This is Walter Block's main criticism: “Coase and Demsetz on Private Property Rights,” op. cit.

property rights of undisturbed ownership not to receive predictable compensation? What I am arguing, in short, is that the victimized property owner has the right to announce: "Coase, get your cattle off my land!"

My land: there is greater value to me in my right to enjoy my land undisturbed than Coase's reductionist economic analysis indicates. To count the market value of the crops that the cattle trampled, and then to compare that value to society with the meat that someone will put on his table, is to reduce the value of a man's right of undisturbed ownership to zero. Coase's concept of social costs ignores one of the most valuable assets offered to men by a free market social order: the right of the owner to determine who will and who will not have legal access to his property, and on what terms. To think that monetary compensation for damaged goods at a market price is all that matters to an owner is ridiculous. Rothbard is correct, and I cite his statement again: "There are many problems with this theory. First, income and wealth are important to the parties involved, although they might not be to uninvolved economists. It makes a great deal of difference to both of them who has to pay whom. Second, this thesis works only if we deliberately ignore psychological factors. Costs are not only monetary. The farmer might well have an attachment to the orchard far beyond monetary damage. . . . But then the supposed indifference totally breaks down."²⁰⁵

Even more important, there must also be compensation for the loss of security that is necessarily involved in every willful violation of another man's property rights. The Bible says plainly that restitution shall be paid with "the best" of the violator's field, "and of the best of his own vineyard." To argue, as Coase did, that as far as society is concerned, it is economically irrelevant to the total economic value accruing to society whether the victim (farmer) builds the fence at his expense or the cattleman (violation) does at his expense is to place zero price on the rights of ownership. When free market economists place zero economic value on the rights of ownership, they have given away the case for the free market. This is precisely what Coase and the many academic "economics of law" specialists have done. They have preferred the illusion of value-free economics to the ideal of private property—our legal right to exclude others from using our property.

205. Rothbard, "Law, Property Rights, and Air Pollution," op. cit., p. 58.

3. Theft as a Factor of Production

Coase explicitly argued that the ability to cause economic injury is a factor of production. Therefore, the state's decision to deny a person the right to exercise this ability involves a social cost: the loss of a factor of production. "If factors of production are thought of as rights, it becomes easier to understand that the right to do something which has a harmful effect (such as the creation of smoke, noise, smells, etc.) is also a factor of production. Just as we may use a piece of land in such a way as to prevent someone else from crossing it, or parking his car, or building his house upon it, so we may use it in such a way as to deny him a view or quiet or unpolluted air. The cost of exercising a right (of using a factor of production) is always the loss which is suffered elsewhere in consequence of the exercise of that right—the inability to cross land, to park a car, to build a house, to enjoy a view, to have peace and quiet or to breathe clean air."²⁰⁶ Coase simply ignored the crucial free market concept that legal right to exclude others from invading your property is a far more crucial factor of production—the factor of personal confidence in the honesty and reliability of the civil government. Without this confidence, the free market is steadily reduced to little more than black market operations.

Coase wanted us to "have regard for the total effect" of such uses of our so-called capital, namely, the right to pollute the environment.²⁰⁷ But "total costs" are precisely what he has deliberately chosen to ignore: the right to determine whether or not another person can invade my privacy, wake me up at 2:00 A.M., set fire to my crops, send his cattle to eat in my fields, or, ultimately, sell tickets to people to peek through my window at 3:00 A.M. The economic value of my right to say "Keep your cattle off my land!"—and my right to demand restitution for the violation of this right—is simply ignored by Coase and all those economists who take seriously his economic analysis of social costs. He offered economic analysis of the right to inflict damage, but he ignores any economic analysis of the right to deny the damage-producer his so-called right. More than this: *Coase explicitly denied the right of property owners to have their property defended by predictable law, for he said that any consideration of the right to demand compensation depends on "circumstances."*²⁰⁸ If the right of collecting compensation is not predictable, the right of private property loses its status as a right.

206. Coase, "Social Cost," p. 44.

207. Idem.

208. Ibid., p. 21.

By elevating the "right to inflict damage" to the same level as the right to demand compensation for a violation of a property right, Coase effectively compromised the latter right by making a potential right out of the ability to inflict damage. The application of Coase's argument would destroy property rights by attempting to extend the status of property right to a man's ability to damage his neighbor's property. He did not discuss anywhere in the essay the economic costs to society of compromising the injured party's right to demand and receive by law economic restitution from the offending party. He did not even seem to understand the implications of his own argument. Most astounding of all, his arguments have been taken seriously by economists who see themselves as defenders of the free market order. Economic reductionism is a kind of occupational affliction for the Chicago School economists.

4. Transaction Costs at the O.K. Corral

Coase's academic colleague at the University of Chicago, Nobel Prize-winning economist George Stigler, extended the Coase theorem. Coase argued that, in the absence of transaction costs, different initial assignments of property rights will lead to the same economic output. In his authoritative textbook, The Theory of Price, Stigler took this thesis one step further. He concluded that, if there is perfect competition, meaning perfect foreknowledge, market transactions between the polluter and his victim will lead to the production of exactly the same economic output as would have been produced if one firm had owned both the source of pollution and its sink.²⁰⁹ In other words, the rights of private ownership—the legal right to exclude—and the sense of outrage at an invasion of one's property are economically irrelevant. In a world of perfect competition, amazing things happen. The economic significance of the theft involved in polluting a neighbor's environment is zero.²¹⁰

All we need is to reduce transaction costs. That should not be too difficult. The polluter can pick up a gun, walk over to his neighbor, put the gun to his head, and force him to deed over his property. Presto: the "internalization" of pollution costs! It will not alter economic output one little bit, Stigler assured us. This surely is a cost-effective way to reduce transaction costs. Unless, of course, one's neighbor also has a gun. That, of course, is the whole point.

209. George Stigler, The Theory of Price, 3rd ed. (New York: Macmillan, 1966), p. 113.

210. In complete agreement was Warren G. Nutter, "The Coase Theorem on Social Cost: A Footnote," Journal of Law and Economics, XI (Oct. 1968).

What possible objection can a self-proclaimed ethically neutral economist offer to this sort of wealth-transfer? This is the question Leff asked in a perceptive critique of the "economics and law" approach to social theory:

Let us say I am naturally superior to a rich man in taking things, either by my own strength or by organizing aggregations of others (call them governments) to do my will. I am not much of a trader, but I'm one hell of a grabber. That's just the way things are. Is there any way to criticize my activities except from the standpoint of taste (or some other normative proposition)? It would be inefficient to allow violent acquisitions? How can one know that? All of Posner's arguments about the efficiency-inducing effects of private property assume only that someone has the right to use and exclude, not that it be any particular person. If force, organized or not, were admissible as a method of acquisition there is no reason to assume that eventual equilibrium would not be reached, albeit in different hands than it presently rests. After all, as Posner would be the first to tell you, "force" is just an expenditure. If a man is "willing" to pay that price, and the other party is "unwilling" to pay the price of successful counterforce, we have an "efficient" solution.²¹¹

One Nobel Prize-winning economist who did not ignore the transaction costs of an economic approach to law that elevates efficiency over all other considerations was James Buchanan. In a perceptive law review article, he warned the practitioners of both economics and law that the great benefit which the free market offers society is not its efficiency or its maximizing of economic value. What the free market offers is its support for "institutional alternatives which generate less social tension, less evasion of postulated standards of conduct, more general adherence to legal norms."²¹² Yet economists and legal theorists argue that free market economic processes that exist only in an imaginary zero-cost world can and do offer us a cost-effective real-world model: just substitute voluntary market exchanges for enforcement by the state of legal titles. Those who argue this way are not only utopians, they are intellectual arsonists.²¹³ This is the mid-1960s social

211. Leff, "Economic Analysis of Law: Some Realism About Nominalism," Virginia Law Review (1974), op. cit., p. 454.

212. Buchanan, "Good Economics-Bad Law," ibid., p. 486.

213. Dahlman was overstating the case against traditional welfare economics when philosophy of “Burn, baby, burn!” applied not only to the adjacent field but to society itself.

5. The Social Costs of the Coase Theorem

There may be an essay by a professional economist that has inflicted more damage on the case for economic freedom than Coase’s “Problem of Social Cost.” There may be a scholarly essay that has polluted the moral environment of market choice more than Coase’s. I cannot imagine what that essay might be. (Becker’s 1968 essay on “Crime and Punishment: an Economic Approach” comes close, but it is really only an application of Coase’s approach to law.) Coase can always argue that his right to inflict such moral damage is merely a factor of academic production. No doubt this essay advanced his academic reputation after 1960. But for every benefit there is a cost: it surely has inflicted and will continue to inflict damage on human freedom, for it assailed the moral case for private property as no article “within the camp” ever had. It created an intellectually and morally bogus concept of the supposed social economic efficiency of production costs that remain the same irrespective of any initial distribution of ownership. With that seemingly scientific and academically irresistible conclusion, Coase seduced some of the brightest economists and legal theorists of his generation and the next generation. Without a moral case for private property, private property will not survive the attacks, political and intellectual, of its ever-present, ever-jealous enemies.

Q. The Biblical Response

It may seem odd that I have devoted so much space to the obvious. Unfortunately, economists quite frequently spin complex theories and arguments that are internally consistent—to the extent that arguments are capable of internal consistency²¹⁴—but to perform these mental gymnastics, they must ignore, or define away, the obvious. Coase’s essay is regarded by many economists as a classic. It is a classic all right—a classic exercise in rarified and misleading sophistry. Yet it was he said that transaction costs “are at the heart of the matter of what prevents Pareto optimal bliss from ruling sublime. For if we could only eliminate transaction costs, externalities would be of no consequence. . . .” Carl J. Dahlman, “The Problem of Externality,” Journal of Law and Economics, XXII (April 1979), p. 161.

214. I have in mind the layman’s understanding of Gödel’s theorem on the impossibility of arguing both completely and consistently.

taken very seriously by some of those Chicago School economists who had developed the subdiscipline, “the economics of property rights.” It was taken seriously by the committee that awarded him the Nobel Prize in economics in 1991.

The Bible declares exactly who must pay damages: the initiator of the damage. If one man sets a fire, and it spreads to his neighbor’s field, he must compensate the neighbor for the accident. If he is an outright arsonist, he is a criminal, and he must pay double restitution—double the market value of the lost crop and equipment. It is not a matter of indifference to the legal system as to who initiated the “nuisance.” The Bible does not teach that “from an economic point of view, a situation in which there is ‘uncompensated damage done to surrounding woods by sparks from railway engines’ is not necessarily undesirable. Whether it is desirable or not depends on the particular circumstances.”²¹⁵ The Bible teaches that the victims of accidental fires must be compensated for their loss. It also teaches that a deliberate violation of another man’s property rights is a crime. This is where we must begin any discussion of social costs.

Social costs and social benefits cannot be calculated by means of scientific economics. The scientific economist cannot make interpersonal comparisons of subjective utility. We need the Bible to tell us what is right and what is wrong, who pays whom, and whose property should be protected. Society is required by God to adhere to this general principle of justice. The economist has nothing to offer in its place except epistemologically blind intuition.²¹⁶ Neither, for that matter, does the modern legal theorist. Intuition is undefined and undefinable. As the old political slogan says, “you can’t beat something with nothing.” Men cannot legitimately fight the Bible’s definition of property rights with an appeal to circumstances, or to the intuitive ability of men to assess total social costs and total social benefits, especially a total cost package that ignores the right, meaning legal predictability, of compensation to the victims.

In the case of the problem of social costs, Pigou’s analysis of pollution and restitution was generally in accord with the Bible’s discussion of the problem of social cost. The railroad has the legal responsibility to compensate the farmer for any fire it sets. There will undoubtedly be problems for a jury or arbitrator in assessing exactly what the losses were. If the fires continue, then the railroad's officers can be sued for criminal misconduct. Like the man whose ox gains a reputation for goring, but is not penned up by its owner, so are the railroad officers who do not take care to protect people from an identified physical hazard. The formerly docile ox that gores someone to death must be killed (Ex. 21:28).²¹⁷ (The engine would at that point be fitted with a spark-arrester or prohibited from the tracks.) But the ox with a bad reputation that kills a man must die, and so must its owner, unless he makes restitution to the heirs of the victim (Ex. 21:29–30).²¹⁸ (The directors of the railroad could be held responsible in a court of law for criminal actions for not taking care to install safety equipment after the fire threat had been pointed out to them by the authorities.) Biblical case laws are to govern the courts, not the speculative conclusions of economists that are opposed to the Bible's explicit statements. Sometimes very bright economists can come up with outrageous hypotheses. The public adopts these "logical discoveries" at its peril. Coase's essay is regarded by academic economists—at least non-Keynesian and non-mathematical economists—as a landmark essay. What it is, on the contrary, is clever sophistry: a land mine essay.

215. Coase, “Social Cost,” p. 34.

216. North, “Economics: From Reason to Intuition,” in North (ed.), Foundations of Christian Scholarship.

Conclusion

In a brilliant yet almost despairing essay, Arthur Allen Leff described the development of modern legal theory: a war between legal formalism (the "logic of the law") and legal empiricism or positivism ("man announces the law"). The fact is, this debate goes back at least to the Socratic revolution in Greek political thought: the debate over physis (nature) and nomos (convention).²¹⁹ Wrote Leff: "While all this was going on, most likely conditioning it in fact, the knowledge of good and evil, as an intellectual subject, was being systematically and effectively destroyed." What he called the swamp of historical legal studies was replaced by the desert of legal positivism: the "normative thought crawled out of the swamp and died in the desert."

There arose a great number of schools of ethics—axiological, materialistic, evolutionary, intuitionist, situational, existentialist, and so

217. Chapter 40:C.

218. Chapter 40:D.

219. On the rival conceptions of law, see Sheldon Wolin, Politics and Vision: Continuity and Innovation in Western Political Thought (Boston: Little, Brown, 1960), pp. 29–34. On physis, see Robert A. Nisbet, Social Change and History: Aspects of the Western Theory of Development (New York: Oxford University Press, 1969), pp. 21–29.

on—but they all suffered the same fate: either they were seen to be ultimately premised on some intuition (buttressed or not by nose counts of those seemingly having the same intuitions) or they were even more arbitrary than that, based solely on some “for the sake of argument” premises. I will put the current situation as sharply and nastily as possible: there is today no way of “proving” that napalming babies is bad except by asserting it (in a louder and louder voice) or by defining it as so, early in one’s game, and then later slipping it through, in a whisper, as a conclusion.²²⁰

There is no way for either law or economics to be conducted without an appeal to good and evil, yet it is this appeal, above all, which is prohibited by the methodological standards of modern academic scholarship. The appeal to efficiency by the legal theorists is simply another example of seeking meaningful content for the ethically empty box of legal formalism. When the search for meaning turns to the criteria of economic efficiency, the searchers are being lured down one more dead-end trail. As Leff wrote, “while you are now working with is-terms only (you have escaped the dreaded ought), they are, as a matter of fact, very different matters of fact: what indeed is of ‘value’ must be known before one rates the ‘efficiency’ of getting there. Thus it is possible that all you have ended up doing is substituting for the arbitrariness of ethics the impossibilities of epistemology.”²²¹

This is the heart of the problem. Without ethics, there can be no epistemology. This assertion—which is also a dreaded but inescapable conclusion of modern economics—was the theme that Van Til worked with throughout his career. Economics is a blind science. So is its subdivision, law and economics. Again, Leff zeroed in on the problem faced by the law schools:

It is a most common experience in law schools to have someone say, of some action or state of events, “how awful,” with the clear implication that reversing it will de-awfulize the world to the full extent of the initial awfulness. But the true situation, of course, is that eliminating the “bad” state of affairs will not lead to the opposite of that bad state, but to a third state, neither the bad nor its opposite. That is, before agreeing with any “how awful” critic, one must always ask him the really nasty question, “compared to what?” Moreover, it should be, but often is not, apparent to everyone that the process of moving the world from one state to another is itself costly. If one were not

220. Leff, “Economic Analysis of Law: Some Realism About Nominalism,” Virginia Law Review (1974), op. cit., p. 454.

221. Ibid., p. 456.

doing that with those resources (money, energy, attention), one could be doing something else, perhaps righting a few different wrongs, a separate pile of "how ghastly's."²²²

Coase himself admitted as much, though he confined this admission to the narrow confines of the question of transaction costs. "Since property rights can be changed in such a way as to raise as well as lower the costs of transactions, how can one say that a move from regulation to a private property rights system, the use of the market, will necessarily represent an improvement? If the question is put in such a general form, one cannot say that it will."²²³

Christian economists must therefore enter the debate regarding costs, whether social or personal. There is no intellectually consistent way that the humanist economist can legitimately keep Christian economics out of the arena. He has adopted a position of intuitional and arbitrary ethics in the name of value-free methodology. It is all a sham. The more loudly the economist insists that ethics should be left outside the temple of economics, almost as one leaves one's shoes outside a Moslem mosque, the more irrelevant his findings and concealed his own system's ethics. It is better to be open about one's ethics, and the source of one's ethics. The reduction of self-deception is clearly a legitimate intellectual end. The problem is, neither the embarrassed Christian economist nor the self-deceived humanist economist is willing to pay the methodological price. But we should have expected this; it is an ancient problem: "Beware lest any man spill you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ" (Col. 2:7).

End of Volume 5

222. Ibid., p. 460.

223. Coase, "The Choice of the Institutional Framework: A Comment," Journal of Law and Economics, XVII (October 1974), p. 493.

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

AN ECONOMIC COMMENTARY ON EXODUS

VOLUME 6

APPENDIXES

Other Books by Gary North

An Economic Commentary on the Bible, 31 vols. (1982–2012)

Marx's Religion of Revolution (1968, 1989)

An Introduction to Christian Economics (1973)

Puritan Economic Experiments (1974, 1988)

Successful Investing in an Age of Envy (1981)

Government by Emergency (1983)

Backward, Christian Soldiers? (1984)

75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984)

Coined Freedom (1984)

Unconditional Surrender (1980, 2010)

Conspiracy: A Biblical View (1986)

Honest Money (1986)

Unholy Spirits (1986, 1994)

Dominion and Common Grace (1987)

Inherit the Earth (1987)

Liberating Planet Earth (1987)

Healer of the Nations (1987)

The Pirate Economy (1987)

Is the World Running Down? (1988)

When Justice Is Aborted (1989)

Political Polytheism (1989)

The Hoax of Higher Criticism (1990)

Victim's Rights (1990)

Westminster's Confession (1991)

Christian Reconstruction (1991), with Gary DeMar

The Coase Theorem (1992)

Salvation Through Inflation (1993)

Rapture Fever (1993)

Tithing and the Church (1994)

Crossed Fingers (1996)

The Covenantal Tithe (2010)

AUTHORITY AND DOMINION

An Economic Commentary on Exodus

Gary North

Volume 6

Appendixes

Authority and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Exodus
Volume 6: Appendixes

Formerly:

Copyright © Gary North, 2012

Third Edition

Published by:

Point Five Press

P.O. Box 2778

Dallas, GA 30132

All rights reserved. Written permission must be secured from the publisher to use or reproduce any part of this book, except for brief quotations in critical reviews or articles.

Printed in the United States of America.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Volume 1: Part 1, Representation and Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 1 |
| 1. Population Growth: Tool of Dominion (Ex. 1:5–7) | 12 |
| 2. Imperial Bureaucracy (Ex. 1:8–12) | 31 |
| 3. Rigorous Waste and Rigorous Socialism (Ex. 1:13–14) | 54 |
| 4. Illegitimate State Power (Ex. 1:15–16) | 67 |
| 5. Envy, Rumor, and Bondage (Ex. 2:11–14) | 73 |
| 6. Cumulative Transgression and Restitution (Ex. 3:21–22) | 83 |
| 7. The Optimum Production Mix (Ex. 5:5–7) | 92 |
| 8. Covenantal Judgment (Ex. 8:19) | 108 |
| 9. Original Ownership (Ex. 9:29–30) | 121 |
| 10. Total Sacrifice, Total Sovereignty (Ex. 10:24) | 129 |
| 11. Separation and Dominion (Ex. 11:7) | 137 |
| 12. Discontinuity and Continuity (Ex. 12:10–11) | 147 |
| 13. Unconditional Surrender (Ex. 12:30–32) | 184 |
| 14. The Rule of Law (Ex. 12:48–49) | 195 |
| 15. The Firstborn Offering (Ex. 13:1–2) | 230 |
| 16. The Psychology of Slavery (Ex. 14:12) | 237 |
| 17. The Metaphor of Growth: Ethics (Ex. 15:17) | 246 |
| 18. Manna, Predictability, and Dominion (Ex. 16:4–5) | 258 |
| 19. Imperfect Justice (Ex. 18:21–22) | 280 |
| 20. The Oath-Bound Kingdom of Priests (Ex. 19:3–6) | 284 |
| Conclusion | |

Volume 2: Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion

| | |
|--|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 289 |
| 21. The God of Liberation (Ex. 20:1–3) | 305 |
| 22. Graven Images and Rival Civilizations (Ex. 20:4–6) | 315 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| 23. Lawful Title (20:7) | 343 |
| 24. Rest and Dominion (Ex. 20:8–11) | 359 |
| 25. Family Capital (Ex. 20:12) | 371 |
| 26. God's Monopoly of Execution (Ex. 20:13) | 386 |
| 27. The Yoke of Co-operative Service (Ex. 20:14) | 398 |
| 28. The Rights of Private Property (Ex. 20:15) | 411 |
| 29. The Value of a Name (Ex. 20:16) | 450 |
| 30. Covetousness and Conflict (Ex. 20:17) | 477 |
| Conclusion | 494 |

Volume 3: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|-----|
| Preface | xi |
| Introduction | 513 |
| 31. Servitude, Protection, and Marriage (Ex. 21:2–4) | 541 |
| 32. Wives and Concubines (Ex. 21:7–11) | 568 |
| 33. Executing a Rebellious Son (Ex. 21:15, 17) | 598 |
| 34. Kidnapping (Ex. 21:16) | 602 |
| 35. The Costs of Private Conflict (Ex. 18–19) | 621 |
| 36. The Human Commodity (Ex. 21:20–21) | 634 |
| 37. Criminal Law and Restoration (Ex. 21:22–25) | 649 |
| 38. The Auction for Substitute Sanctions (Ex. 21:22–25) | 681 |
| 39. Freedom for an Eye (Ex. 21:26–27) | 703 |
| 40. The Ransom for Life (Ex. 21:28–31) | 716 |
| 41. The Uncovered Pit (Ex. 21:33–34) | 745 |
| 42. Knowledge and Responsibility (Ex. 21:35–36) | 755 |
| 43. Proportional Restitution (Ex. 22:1, 4) | 765 |
| 44. Pollution, Ownership, and Responsibility (Ex. 22:5–6) | 800 |
| 45. Safekeeping and Liability (Ex. 22:7–9) | 871 |

Volume 4: Part 3, Tools of Dominion

| | |
|---|------|
| 46. Caretaking and Negligence (Ex. 22:10–13) | 895 |
| 47. Seduction and Servitude (22:16–17) | 905 |
| 48. Oppression, Omniscience and Judgment (Ex. 22:21–24) | 932 |
| 49. The Prohibition against Usury (Ex. 22:25–27) | 970 |
| 50. Impartial Justice (Ex. 23:1–3, 6–7) | 1023 |
| 51. Finders should not be Keepers (Ex. 23:4–5) | 1040 |
| 52. Bribery and Oppression (Ex. 23:8) | 1051 |
| 53. Sabbatical Liberty (Ex. 23:9–12) | 1078 |
| 54. Feasts and Citizenship (Ex. 23:14–19) | 1092 |

| | |
|--|------|
| 55. The Curse of Zero Growth (Ex. 23:25–26) | 1115 |
| 56. God's Limits on Sacrifice (Ex. 25:3–8, 36:5–7) | 1140 |
| 57. The Economics of the Tabernacle (Ex. 25:8–9) | 1159 |
| 58. Blood Money, not Head Tax (Ex. 30:11–16) | 1170 |
| 59. Sabbath Rest vs. Autonomy (Ex. 35:2) | 1180 |
| 60. The Ability to Teach (Ex. 35:31, 34a) | 1186 |
| Conclusion | 1195 |
| Conclusion to Authority and Dominion | 1231 |

Volume 5: Appendixes

| | |
|---|------|
| APPENDIX A–The Reconstruction of Egypt's Chronology | 1255 |
| APPENDIX B–The Demographics of Decline | 1283 |
| APPENDIX C–The Labyrinth and The Garden | 1320 |
| APPENDIX D–The Rule of Law and the Free Market | 1339 |
| APPENDIX E–The Economic Implications of The Sabbath | 1364 |
| APPENDIX F–Timing the Lord's Day | 1442 |
| APPENDIX G–Macaulay on Democracy | 1447 |
| APPENDIX H–The Epistemological Problem of Social Cost | 1453 |

Volume 6: Appendixes

| | |
|--|------|
| APPENDIX I–Pollution in the Soviet Union | 1535 |
| APPENDIX J–Lots of Free Time: The Existentialist Utopia of S. C. Mooney | 1543 |
| APPENDIX K–Slavery in the American South | 1556 |
| APPENDIX L–Maimonides' Code : Is it Biblical? | 1573 |
| APPENDIX M–Victim's Rights vs. the Messianic State | 1638 |
| APPENDIX N–Covenantal Law and Covenantal Love | 1679 |
| APPENDIX O–Social Antinomianism | 1695 |
| APPENDIX P–The Hoax of Higher Criticism | 1712 |
| APPENDIX Q–The Restoration of Biblical Casuistry | 1734 |
| APPENDIX R–What is Covenant Law? | 1770 |
| APPENDIX S–What are the Case Laws? | 1795 |

APPENDIX I

POLLUTION IN THE SOVIET UNION

Fyodor Morgun, head of the State Committee for Environmental Protection, revealed last year [1988] that air pollution in all Soviet industrial centers now exceeds Soviet safety limits and is more than ten times the permitted level in 102 Soviet cities. He also revealed (at the 19th special Communist Party conference last June) that water from the great rivers of Russia, including the fabled Volga and the Don, is now almost unusable for drinking or irrigation.¹

Until the Chernobyl nuclear power plant accident in 1986, the West's many anti-capitalist critics had assumed that socialist societies, especially the Soviet Union, had somehow avoided the social costs of pollution. This belief was always entirely mythical. Then glasnost opened up the outlets for complaints within the U.S.S.R. In 1991, the Soviet Union's Communist leaders abandoned Communism, shut down the Soviet system, and absconded with the Party's money. The cash nexus proved too alluring. The bloody experiment was over. It had failed economically. It had failed politically. Only then did the Western intelligentsia at last admit defeat. They officially abandoned socialism. The Soviet Union had been their Goliath, and, like the Philistines in David's day, they fled in disarray after their representative was decapitated in full public view.

A. Disappearing Lake

When I wrote this appendix in the final years of the Soviet Union, this information was not widely known. For example, Western reporters had only recently learned of the story of the Aral Sea. This sea in northwest Uzbekistan was steadily disappearing. At one time, it was the fourth-largest inland body of water on earth. It had shrunk by 40% since 1960, leaving behind 10,000 square miles of salty desert. Soviet developers siphoned off into the cotton fields of Uzbekistan and neighboring Turkmenia the waters of the two rivers that feed the Aral Sea, leaving these rivers little more than slow-moving sewers. The fish cannery at Muinak that had been built on the southern shore became landlocked, 30 miles from the water. No matter: the sea's commercial fishing catch had fallen to zero because of the high concentration of salt, fertilizers, and pesticides. The Muinak area remained off-limits to foreigners, including reporters. Reported the New York Times in 1988, "The high concentration of salt and farm chemicals in the rivers and underground water are blamed for universally high rates of stomach and liver disease, throat cancer and birth defects."²

1. "The Ecology Crisis," National Review (April 7, 1989), p. 28.

B. Free Pebbles

Almost two decades before this information, like ideological toxic waste, began leaking out of the Soviet Union, Marshall Goldman, in a book-length study of pollution in the Soviet Union, detailed the devastation of the Soviet Union's environment produced by Soviet managers. Consider the Black Sea. It is the nation's prime tourist region, the warmest region of the Soviet Union, and a region close to a large body of water. There is little room for construction in the narrow coastal area, and few construction materials. "To provide the concrete and other materials needed for construction, the contractors used the pebbles and sand located along the beach. Like the Riviera coastline, much of the Black Sea shore consists of small pebbles which would whet any cement maker's appetite. Because they were free for the taking and easily accessible and because obtaining other construction materials would necessitate the extra expense of transport over the mountains, local contractors used the beach materials."³ When men are given the use of a "free good," they are going to waste it. They mined the beach area, beginning in 1930.

What did they build? Seaports, dams, and resort buildings. The beaches began to erode after 1940. For centuries, the pebbles on the beach had acted as buffers to the power of the waves, Goldman pointed out. Now the waves crash against the shoreline, carrying away parts of the beach. The dams cut the supply of new pebbles that had come in from the mountains. In 1967, a crisis occurred near Adler,

2. "Developers Turn Aral Sea Into a Catastrophe," New York Times (Dec. 20, 1988).

3. Marshall I. Goldman, The Spoils of Progress: Environmental Pollution in the Soviet Union (Cambridge, Massachusetts: M.I.T. Press, 1972), p. 156.

when "resort hotels, port structures, hospitals and (of all things) the sanitarium of the Ministry of Defense collapsed as the shoreline gave way. . . . Elsewhere along the eastern shore in places such as Krinshch at the mouth of the Pshad River, the beach which was 100 meters (109 yards) wide in 1950 had shrunk to 15–20 meters (16–22 yards) by 1960."⁴ Hotels in Pitsunda almost washed out to sea in 1970. "Only by mobilizing all the trucks in the Autonomous Republic of Abkhazia in which Pitsunda is located and diverting them to the task of carrying in rocks and other solid fill were the hotels able to survive the inundation."⁵ Even some streets at Yalta are threatened.⁶

"Belatedly," Goldman wrote, "large sums of money are being spent in an effort to restore a semblance of the natural balance to the area. From 1945 to 1960, the Ministry of Transportation spent 40 million rubles to strengthen the coastline, but to no avail. Some specialists have insisted that as much as three times that amount is needed. Gravel is being hauled in from inland mountains, giant cement slabs are being embedded in the sea coast, walls are being built, and man-sized cement blocks are being dumped along the beach to replace with a buffer what has been washed away. Invariably the waves tear such fortifications apart in six to eight years."⁷

C. The Hole in the Mountain

High in the Caucasus mountains lies one of the Soviet Union's most famed resorts, Kislovodsk. Because it is sheltered on three sides by mountains, it escapes the continental weather of the Russian land mass. It is a warm-weather oasis, according to Goldman. The city has 311 days a year of sun, while another city on the other side of the mountain has only 122.⁸ "Sometime after World War II, an unknown but enterprising bureaucrat from the railroad ministry strode into this idyllic scene. His mission was to increase the volume of railroad freight shipments in the area. He discovered that the mountains and hills in the area were rich in limestone. Without asking anyone, he arranged for the construction of a lime kiln at the Podkumok railroad station near the narrow gorge. 'It was a small operation and in the beginning nobody paid any attention to it. When people finally did ask what was

4. Ibid., pp. 158–59.

5. Ibid., p. 159.

6. Ibid., p. 160.

7. Ibid., pp. 161–62.

8. Ibid., pp. 163–64.

going on, it already appeared to be too late to do anything about it. The railroad and kiln operators met all arguments with, "We are a productive enterprise. Our product is sent all over. We have an assignment and we are fulfilling our plan." (Izvestia, 7/3/66, p. 5.)⁹ Result: the gorge widened, and the winter weather of the north hit Kislovodsk. The dust level has risen drastically: one and a half times the allowable limit in a non-resort city. "On the one hand the state invests millions of rubles in new tourist facilities in Kislovodsk, while on the other hand the state destroys the very thing that makes it attractive. Moreover the destroyers are not only being paid a good salary for their vandalism but they are winning premiums for doing so in the name of 'socialist competition.'"¹⁰

D. Lake Baikal

Lake Baikal is the largest fresh water lake in the world, holding about one-sixth of all the fresh water in the world. It is 45 miles wide and 385 miles long. Until the early 1970s, socialist enterprises used it as a free disposal unit for effluents of all kinds, including human sewage. The fish catch dropped 55% from 1945 until 1957.¹¹ In 1958, a plan to industrialize the Lake Baikal region with pulp and cellulose mills became official. There were a few sporadic pamphlet protests, to no avail. Only in 1962 did these plans become public. Several official agencies protested over the next few years, but the plans went forward. The plants were built, redesigned, and were found uneconomical. They had been built because the lake's water was pure; steadily, this purity dropped. A water treatment facility was built. Costs of construction doubled. The process did not work. Islands of alkaline sewage have been observed floating near the lake's surface—one of them 18 miles long and three miles wide.¹² Russian timber trusts stripped parts of the region bare. Soil washed away. Silt now flows into the lake. No one knows now if this ecological devastation will be reversed. Lake Baikal's crisis was matched by the crisis of the Baltic Sea.¹³

About the time that Goldman's book was published, a serious effort was begun to clean up Lake Baikal. A ban was placed on fishing certain rare fish in the lake, the golomyanka. The result was that two-

9. Ibid., p. 164.

10. Ibid., p. 165.

11. Ibid., p. 182.

12. Ibid., pp. 200–1.

13. Ibid., p. 285.

thirds of the human population around the lake had to move. The fishermen could no longer make a living.¹⁴ The trade-off between employment and ecology was as inescapable in the Soviet Union as it is in a free market economy.

E. Bureaucracy vs. Bureaucracy

Protests against ecologically disrupting practices are almost always made by a government or government-run agency. "When a government newspaper decides to publish a letter to the editor or it commissions a writer to publish such an attack, this usually indicates the existence of an interagency squabble." Goldman said these attacks are quite common, but no one is clear about how officials make a decision to protest.¹⁵ "Moreover, there are no independent conservation groups like the Sierra Club or the League of Women Voters, which scrutinize the country like watchdogs looking for such abuses." When a debate emerges publicly, the bureaucratic feuding must already be intense, or else the consequences must be far-reaching.¹⁶

Goldman's summary of the differences between ownership in the two societies is very important. Private ownership is the first line of defense against pollution.

In a socialist society it would seem that it would be more difficult to stimulate preventive action in both the case of public and private social costs. Because private land ownership is prohibited in the USSR, the individual has less of a vested interest in fighting the construction of a new factory in his neighborhood or the mining of some raw material in the area. Except when a state-owned factory finds that its operating costs are substantially and directly altered by another factory's pollution, protest must depend on social consciousness, and not on the actions of private property holders who respond out of the fear of a private loss. Of course, social consciousness can be very effective, as has been demonstrated by the success of such groups as the Sierra Club and the League of Women Voters. Nevertheless, the elimination of the private property holder and his accumulating instincts often means the elimination of the first line of defense against the expansion of environmental disruption.¹⁷

Geographer Philip Pryde's assessment of the Soviet Union's anti-

14. Associated Press story, Tyler Courier-Times (Feb. 10, 1985).

15. Goldman, Spoils, pp. 185–86.

16. Ibid., p. 186.

17. Ibid., pp. 74–75.

pollution program was less critical than Goldman's, but it still made the fundamental point: Soviet attempts to clean up the environment were late and discoordinated at best, half-hearted generally, and deliberately reactionary in far too many cases.

First, there is only one effective lobby in the Soviet Union, and that is the fully understood and immutable emphasis on industrial expansion. The voices of conservationists, while present, are weak by comparison, and certainly hold no threat of voting an unreceptive Central Committee out of office.

This represents an important distinction between the United States and the U.S.S.R. If, in the United States, private enterprise displays poor conservation practices, there are still two avenues of recourse open for correcting the situation—public opinion and government regulation. But if the Soviet central planning mechanism is lax in these regards, there is no effective avenue of recourse. The Party-government supervision of both resource exploitation and environmental conservation has strong built-in conflicts of interest, and brings to mind the analogy directed by some toward our own Atomic Energy Commission of “foxes guarding henhouses.”¹⁸

The sheer size of the Soviet planning bureaucracy has inhibited the implementation of new, pollution-control technologies, he concluded.¹⁹ Furthermore, Marxist ideology saw pollution as a problem only of capitalist societies. “On the other hand, it is believed that a socialist economy, faced with the obligation to plan centrally the use of all its resource wealth, will necessarily do so in the wisest possible manner.”²⁰ This attitude, coupled with the Marxist emphasis on economic growth, led to a lack of interest in creating institutional mechanisms—economic, legal, or political—to reduce pollution.

F. The Poverty Factor

Goldman did not mention it, but, by keeping people poor, socialist societies create an atmosphere that is more favorable to pollution, for it is only as men's wealth increases that they believe that they can afford the reduction in per capita output that pollution-control usually involves. Were the Soviets really that poor? Yes. Goldman's statistics

18. Philip R. Pryde, Conservation in the Soviet Union (Cambridge: At the University Press, 1972), pp. 162–63.

19. Ibid., p. 163.

20. Ibid., p. 165.

on the availability of running water in homes gave us an indication of the tremendous discrepancy between the productivity of the respective economic systems. In 1960, only about 38% of city housing in the Soviet Union had running water, and 35% had sewers.²¹ By the late 1960s, only 50% of the Soviet Union's urban homes had running water that was supplied by a central community source, as compared to 70–75% of U.S. citizens. Most other Americans had electrically operated water pumps for their homes' running water; these were unheard of in the USSR.²²

The newer apartments in the USSR had running water, which indicated the existence of a policy to force people into apartments—a housing policy that was common in socialist nations.²³ If we include apartment buildings in the “urban housing fund,” then 73% of the residential units had running water, and approximately 70% were connected to sewers in the late 1960s.²⁴ On the collective farms, under 3% had running water, and under 2% on the state farms.²⁵

By the end of the 1980s, the Western press began to report on the sorry condition of the Soviet economy. The Soviet economy was much weaker than Western experts had estimated.²⁶ It ran massive budget deficits that had not shown up in official figures or in Western estimates (with a few exceptions).²⁷ By 1989, Judy Shelton's book appeared, predicting a crash.²⁸ She was almost alone in her opinion. That year, the economy did crash, and it never recovered. Two years later, Soviet Union collapsed. This caught the West by surprise. Especially surprised were the economists.

Years earlier, journalist Richard Grenier's description of the USSR had said it best: “Bangladesh with missiles.” His peers in the West did not believe him. They had wanted so desperately to believe that socialism could compete with the free market. Then the Soviet Union did the unforgivable. It committed suicide.

21. Goldman, Spoils, p. 106.

22. Ibid., p. 107.

23. On this policy in Sweden, see Roland Huntford, The New Totalitarians (New York: Stein & Day, 1972), ch. 12.

24. Goldman, Spoils, pp. 107–8.

25. Ibid., p. 108.

26. Nicholas Eberstadt, “The Soviet Economy: Worse Than We Thought,” New York Times (Nov. 23, 1988).

27. Igor Birman, “Kremlin Red Ink (And You Thought We Had a Deficit Problem),” Wall Street Journal (Nov. 15, 1988).

28. Judy Shelton, The Coming Soviet Crash: Gorbachev's Desperate Pursuit of Credit in Western Financial Markets (New York: Free Press, 1989).

Conclusion

The modern socialist states never did demonstrate that they were capable of dealing with the growing problem of pollution in a technological society. The free market creates incentives for people to protest against those who are transferring part of their production costs to private citizens who do not share in the benefits. It allows the creation of independent knowledge-distribution media that can mobilize people. It allows private citizens to challenge polluters. Socialist monopolies were not so easily challenged by private citizens or associations in socialist commonwealths.

APPENDIX J

LOTS OF FREE TIME: THE EXISTENTIALIST UTOPIA OF S. C. MOONEY

Another popular excuse for usury is that it is no different than rent. It is said that “interest” is merely rent on “money,” and that if rent is assumed to be legitimate, then usury would have to be considered legitimate as well. . . . The economic similarity between usury and the rent of property readily is admitted. However, this close connection does not serve to legitimize usury, as Locke et al suppose; but to condemn rents. . . . [I]t is not lawful for one to sell the use of his property (rent).

S. C. Mooney¹

I this appendix, I shall consider the economic logic offered by a promoter of a zero-interest economy. There are two groups of these promoters. Members of the first group say that a zero-interest economy could be attained if people simply loved one another sufficiently. Interest on loans is an example of oppression and needless cruelty, they say. These people are pure utopians. They cannot point to any society in history in which such an economics of love has ever existed. Members of the second group argue that the civil government ought to intervene and punish those who lend at interest.

I have argued in Chapter 49 that the zero-interest promoter is the intellectual equivalent of a self-proclaimed scientist who insists that a perpetual motion machine is possible. The world generally recognizes such a person as the classic literary mad scientist. The second law of thermodynamics testifies against these poor souls. They are considered harmless cranks in a world in which it takes energy to turn a crank. In contrast, a promoter in the second group of zero-interest enthusiasts is far more dangerous than the lovable mad scientist. He is like a crackpot physicist who insists that only perpetual motion machines should be legal. He is the classic defender of something (the use of an asset over time) for nothing (no rental fee). He says that the world can construct an honest, fair, and productive economy by making interest payments illegal. He says that the state should legislate his utopia.

1. S. C. Mooney, Usury: Destroyer of Nations (Warsaw, Ohio: Thopolis, 1988), pp. 172, 173. (<http://bit.ly/MooneyUsury>). Italics added.

Again, let me apologize in advance for filling up space in this commentary with arguments against nonsense. If this nonsense, or nonsense quite similar to it, had not been offered in the name of the Bible for about a millennium and a half, I would not bother to comment on it. Life is too short, and this book is too long. But the lure of crackpot theories of interest has been with us for a long, long time; first, under the authoritarian rule of ancient and medieval clerics in an era before economics was an intellectual discipline, and second, under the hoped-for rule of amateurs who resent the very thought of economics as an intellectual discipline, and who have therefore never taken an economics course in their lives.²

Before I begin my analysis, let me also say that, in one sense, it is legitimate to call for a restructuring of economics by revising interest theory. In fact, it is imperative. Böhm-Bawerk's path-breaking History and Critique of Interest Theories (1884) certainly set forth economic principles that were instrumental in making possible a major revision of economics. But let me also say that it is insufficient to offer a new theory of interest—or even a revived version of Aristotle's theory, dressed in swaddling clothes—without restructuring all of economics. Like value theory and price theory, interest theory is at the heart of economic theory. In fact, price theory apart from a theory of interest is dead before it begins. It does no good for a self-proclaimed economic revolutionary to offer a wholly new theory of interest and then not explain exactly how his interest theory is to be integrated into the whole of economics. The economist must show that economic reasoning as such is still possible in terms of his proposed interest theory. This is what Böhm-Bawerk did in the late nineteenth century. This is what not even one of the zero-interest theorists has ever attempted.

I wrote the preceding section in 1990. A year later, Mr. Mooney responded in a long, incoherent essay, "Mooney Answers North." I did not see this response until it was posted on the Web. I came across it

2. I suggested to Mr. Mooney in a letter that he had never taken a course in economics in college, and he admitted to me in his written reply that he had not. Some things are obvious on first reading.

sometime around 2008, I think. He ended with these words:

The absence of a comprehensive new economic theory does not prove that my thesis in Usury: Destroyer of Nations is wrong. Rather, the biblical soundness of my thesis proves that a comprehensive theory is needed. Nor do I regard the task of producing one as my own toy exclusively. Any one who is committed to a radically biblical approach to all of theoretical thought is qualified to contribute to this work. I would be happy to interact on the many important issues surrounding this task with any, including Dr. North, who would be so motivated. I thank Dr. North for the challenge, and look forward to an economic theory that finally brings glory to God.³

So do I, but such a theory had better not begin with either of these premises: (1) there is no scarcity; (2) time is free.

It is now over two decades since Mr. Mooney's book appeared. He has yet to explain how his theory fits into a general theory of economics. He is like a Dutchman who recommends blowing up all the dikes, but when asked how he proposes to keep the sea from inundating the land, answers that he has no idea, but he is happy to discuss the topic if anyone has some suggestions.

I do not believe that a person has to earn a Ph.D. in a particular field in order for him to have an academic impact in that field.⁴ I do believe that a person needs to demonstrate the same degree of intellectual self-discipline and accomplishment that a Ph.D. degree requires before he thinks himself competent to restructure the whole world from behind his computer. It is not the formal degree that counts; it is the years of thankless work in the shadows that are required to produce a successful paradigm shift. It is this price that the monetary cranks are not willing to pay. They offer us half-finished blueprints for 80-storey skyscrapers before they have built a tree house, and then they demand that the world's architects give them a polite hearing.

A. Mooney on Rent and Interest

I offer my comments for your consideration, not because the Christian public has ever heard of Mr. Mooney's book, nor because the book is coherent in its analysis, which it is not, but because it is one more primary source documenting a very strange phenomenon: Christians who think they are ready to overturn the modern intellectual world with their very first book by announcing outrageous and undeveloped theories with shock value. They offer “fringe” theories, but without any suggestion about how these theories might become the foundation for governing at the center of a society. They offer fringe theories that are destined to keep their disciples—if any—forever on the cultural, intellectual, and perhaps even emotional fringe. They offer preliminary findings that would require a lifetime of disciplined effort in order to make their conclusions even vaguely plausible, and then they stand back and announce: “The world now must refute me, or else I win by default.” Well, the world does not have to refute them; they will not win by default. However, the sake of argument—and for the sake of intellectually immunizing the reader, who may have a fondness for fringe hypotheses (a weakness I occasionally share)—I will offer a few observations.

3. Posted here: <http://bit.ly/MooneyReply>.

4. Examples: John Maynard Keynes, Roy Harrod, Gordon Tullock.

Mr. Mooney called for an economically just world, one which is devoid of both rents and interest payments, just as John Maynard Keynes did. Since I have responded to the main thrust of Mr. Mooney’s arguments in Chapter 49, there is no need of going over the same material. We need to go right to the “soft underbelly” of his critique of interest. Mooney insisted that, from a biblical perspective, “it is not lawful for one to sell the use of his property (rent).”⁵

1. Rental Income and Interest Income

Say that a person has a sum of money to invest. He sees two possibilities. He can buy a piece of real estate and then lease it out for a decade. Alternatively, he can buy a ten-year bond and get paid by the bond-issuer. Let us say that the rate of interest on the bond is 5%. How much must a would-be renter have to offer him in order to persuade him to rent it to him? Assuming that the property owner expects no entrepreneurial profits from the appreciation of the real estate, the renter will have to offer him something in the range of 5% of the market value of the property. Why? Because in each case, the bidders—the would-be renter and the would-be bond seller—are competing in the market for the use of his wealth. They must offer competitive bids, as with any auction. They bid in terms of a promise: so much future income per annum. This competitive bidding process is why economists have long concluded that the rate of interest on a money loan produces a percentage rate of return that will be competitive with a comparably risky investment in income-producing real estate. In short, interest income equals rental income on a competitive free market.

5. Mooney, Usury, p. 173.

So, Mr. Mooney's argument against the biblical legitimacy of interest income necessarily lives or dies with his conclusion that income from rental property is also prohibited by the Bible. If rental income is allowed, then there seems to be no economic reason why interest income from a collateral-secured loan is not also allowed.

2. The Jubilee Year

Mr. Mooney's conclusion that rent is biblically illegitimate is in direct opposition to the economic terms of the jubilee year, which specified that anyone could lawfully rent his life and his property to another person for a period of time. In other words, a buyer could lawfully contract with a seller for the latter to supply him with a stream of income—labor income or agricultural income. In either case, when a kinsman bought the land or the person out of bondage (the contract), he had to pay the leaseholder a pro-rated price based on the number of years remaining until the jubilee year. This, it should be obvious, was a rental contract. Not only was it legal, it was legal even for unbelieving resident aliens to buy up to 49 years of future labor services from poverty-stricken Hebrews or 49 years worth of agricultural income.

If thy brother be waxen poor, and hath sold away some of his possession, and if any of his kin come to redeem it, then shall he redeem that which his brother sold. And if the man have none to redeem it, and himself be able to redeem it; Then let him count the years of the sale thereof, and restore the overplus unto the man to whom he sold it; that he may return unto his possession. But if he be not able to restore it to him, then that which is sold shall remain in the hand of him that hath bought it until the year of jubilee: and in the jubilee it shall go out, and he shall return unto his possession (Lev. 25:25–28).⁶

And if a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee, and thy brother that dwelleth by him wax poor, and sell himself unto the stranger or sojourner by thee, or to the stock of the stranger's family: After that he is sold he may be redeemed again; one of his brethren may redeem him: Either his uncle, or his uncle's son, may redeem him, or any that is nigh of kin unto him of his family may redeem him; or if he be able, he may redeem himself. And he shall reckon with him that bought him from the year that he was sold to him unto the year of jubilee: and the price of his sale shall be according unto the number of years, according to the time of an hired servant shall it be with him. If there be yet many years behind, according unto them he shall give again the price of his redemption out of the money that he was bought for (Lev. 25:47–51).⁷

6. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 28.

When a kinsman-redeemer paid the leaseholder for the land, he deducted the yearly price paid by the leaseholder so far. He then made a cash payment for the time remaining on the lease. A lease is a form of rent. It is rent tied to a contractual time limit. If there was no biblical right of rent, then why did the kinsman-redeemer owe anything to the person controlling the land? Why did biblical law require him to pay off the contract? This contract was biblically illegal, according to Mr. Mooney. Yet biblical law required the payment of a redemption price. If Mr. Mooney was correct, then biblical law sanctioned the payment of that which biblical law prohibited: rent. Mr. Mooney did not see this when he wrote his book, and in his 1991 reply, he did not explain how this was possible under the Mosaic law.⁸ He argued instead that the lease in Leviticus 25 was not rent in the modern sense, because the person selling his land was in a poor condition, whereas a person renting out land today is in good economic condition. In other words, he defined away the analytically identical payments—money paid in advance for the use of property—in terms of comparative wealth. He wrote in 1991, “What we know of as the rental of real property involves a landowner who is wealthy (that is why he has land to for rent) and a poor tenant, who has no land of his own (that is why he must rent from a “lord.”)⁹ Yet a corporation may lease a fleet of cars or a fleet of anything else. This is quite common. Corporations lease property from owners all the time. Middle-class investors can pool their capital and buy railroad freight cars to lease to a railroad. The railroad locks in the use of the cars over a fixed period of time. The economic fact is this: someone who gives up the use of his wealth without selling it outright asks for payment during the forfeited use period. The economic analysis of this exchange is not affected by the comparative wealth of the participants. In a free market, buyers compete against buyers. Sellers compete against sellers. Similarly, he who rents out property competes with others who rent out property. He who rents the use of property competes with others who do the same.

7. Ibid., ch. 32.

8. Mooney, Mooney Answers North, pp. 24–25.

9. Ibid., p. 25.

This economics of exchange has nothing to do with the comparative wealth of the person who rents out the property vs. the person who rents it from him. One party wants money income; the other wants the use of the property. Yet Mr. Mooney argued that, unless the sale is permanent, there can be no biblically valid exchange of money for use. He then applies this argument to the payment of interest. At least he is consistent, which is why I singled him out in 1990. If a reader sees that Mr. Mooney's argument against the legitimacy of rent is logically unsustainable, he may find it easier to see that Mr. Mooney's argument against the legitimacy of interest is equally unsustainable. Anyway, I hope so.

If a man wants 5% per annum, he can do it in either of these two ways: buy a piece of land and rent it out, or buy a bond, and get paid by the seller. The rate of return is the same. If the first transaction is biblically legitimate—and it is—then so is the second.

3. A Strategy of Selective Quotation

It is worth pointing out that Mr. Mooney's book includes comments on Leviticus 25:2–7, 15–16, 35–37, and 39–45. He scrupulously avoided mentioning verses 25–28 and 47–51—verses that refute his conclusion regarding the supposedly biblically illegitimate nature of rental income. He freely admitted that the economists are correct, i.e., that rental income is the same as interest income: a payment for the use of an asset over time, said Böhm-Bawerk, whom he quoted favorably on the question of the equivalence of rental income and interest income.¹⁰ Then he tried to justify his universal condemnation of interest income by laying down an equally universal condemnation of rental income. The problem is, the Bible clearly honors the legitimacy of rental income: a stream of income, either labor income or land income, which one receives when he purchases an income-producing asset for cash (i.e., capitalization). Mr. Mooney's answer to this dilemma is simple and direct: he refused to cite that portion of the Bible that categorically destroys his argument.

He wrote that it is immoral to collect income from any form of property. While Mr. Mooney was sufficiently astute tactically not to spell out the implications of this statement—in this regard, he followed the lead of his predecessor, Mr. Keynes—what he really meant was that it is illegal biblically to seek a positive rate of return by loaning someone money to buy a house, and it is also illegal biblically to rent him a house. You are morally obligated to give him the use of the loan, interest-free, or the use of the house, rent-free. This is the economics of love.¹¹ It is also a classic crank prescription for creating a society of homeless people.

10. Mooney, Usury, p. 172.

He wrote the book specifically to refute me, as his footnotes and text reveal. He had read (but had not understood) my view of time-preference as the true origin of interest. He recognized that I am following Böhm-Bawerk and Mises on this point: that there is always a discount for cash when you purchase an expected stream of future services. People discount the present value of expected future goods in comparison to the same goods in the present. Because of this, no rational person will pay 1,000 ounces of gold, cash, for a gold mine that is expected to produce 1,000 ounces of gold, net, after mining expenses are deducted, over the next year, ten years, or 1,000 years.

B. The “Present” Is Mostly in the Future

Mr. Mooney argued that there are no future goods but only present goods. In one sense, he was correct. I would put it this way: “The present is all that any man can be certain he has, moment by present moment.” He put it this way: “Future goods do not exist. There are only present goods in external reality.”¹² The author believed that he had somehow refuted the concept of the inescapable discount applied to future goods. He did not.

1. No Future Goods

Future goods are not real in the present, he said; therefore, they do not command a cash price. He did not recognize, for one thing (among many, many others), that this non-existence of future goods is a very good reason why there is always a risk premium in free market interest rates: the promised future goods may not actually be returned to the lender. So, the lender charges an interest payment to compensate him from this risk of default. Instead of acknowledging this obvious fact, the author concluded: “Since the contemplation of ‘future goods’ is characterized by idealism, one may not actually compare ‘present goods’ and ‘future goods’ for purposes of economic calculation. The 11. This is the assertion of Mr. Mooney and his publisher, Mr. Wiley: ibid., pp. iii, 231–34.

12. Ibid., p. 207.

preference that is dictated by the discount of the 'future goods' cannot be avoided because one cannot possibly call upon an idea in his mind to serve a purpose that only a concrete object can serve."¹³ This is the economics of love. It is also the economics of incoherence.

To the extent that I can make any sense of this argument, I think he was saying that future goods, not being physically present, are therefore irrelevant for present decisions. So much for the biblical doctrine of eternal judgment in the afterlife! Mr. Mooney regards the concept of future goods in much the same way as the covenant-breaker regards the concept of eternal punishment. "If it ain't here now, it ain't relevant now." This is a fanatical form of present-orientation, the outlook of the lower-class individual.¹⁴ He made himself as clear as he could on this point: "The point is that 'future goods' vs. 'present goods' presents no real choice. The two cannot be compared in value as though they were different quantities of the same class of goods. In truth, the choice of goods for meeting one's needs is a choice of presently available goods. One present good compares only to other present goods."¹⁵ The clearer he becomes, the more preposterous he sounds.

2. What's the Point?

Fact: the present moment—a "point in time"—is as philosophically and operationally undefinable a phenomenon as a Euclidian point (an infinitesimal, no-dimensional section of a sequential phenomenon, a line). The fact is, we really cannot fully describe the pure instant in time that we call "the present." Anyway, I cannot, and surely Mr. Mooney did not attempt to do so in his book. What we call "the present" is in fact the relatively more immediate future. I cannot do everything I would like to do right now. I have to pick and choose my decisions through time. I must order my choices: first, second, and third in the future, and even this ordering process takes time.

Therefore, when I make a decision regarding the present cash value of any good, I make this evaluation moment by moment as I move through time. I make it in terms of whatever value I place on a future stream of services or pleasures that I expect to receive from the physical or the contractual item.¹⁶ The “front end” of this stream of future services is close at hand; how long it will continue to flow is guesswork. The initial flow of services may in fact be somewhat removed, as indicated by the warning in the fine print on the side of the box, “some assembly required.” The beginning of that expected flow of services may be a day away or a week away or a year away. The point is, there is just barely a “now” in any economic decision. There are only present expectations of varying degrees of the future. So, contrary to Mr. Mooney, who insists that there are no future goods in the present, I insist that from a rational decision-maker’s point of view, there are mostly future goods in the present—and this “mostly” is very, very close to only.

13. Idem.

14. See Edward C. Banfield, The Unheavenly City (Boston: Little, Brown, 1970), pp. 53–54.

15. Mooney, Usury, p. 207.

3. Infinite Interest Rates

If everyone were to conclude that the expected future stream of services provided by physical goods is irrelevant for present economic calculation, as Mr. Mooney insisted that it is, then free market interest rates would approach infinity, for no one would voluntarily give up present goods for the sake of receiving economically “irrelevant” future goods. Also, the price of durable capital goods and durable consumer goods would fall almost to zero, for no one would value them for the sake of their expected future productivity, meaning any expected value three seconds away. Or two seconds away. Or a split second away. In short, we would say goodbye to civilization. This is the “economics of love.” It is also the economics of existentialism: the philosophy of the autonomous moment.

C. Decapitalization

I single out Mr. Mooney’s analysis because he is the only person I have ever seen who so forthrightly confronts the issue of time-preference in his denial of the moral legitimacy of interest. He offered economic nonsense—incredibly naive nonsense—in his attempted denial of time-preference in human action; to oppose the Fetter-Mises view of interest is necessarily to argue nonsense. It is the stark reality of Mr. Mooney's nonsense that is so impressive. He made it clear that if you refuse to go with Mises on the question of time-preference, you logically must wind up with Mooney's view regarding the economic irrelevance of the future.

16. Mr. Mooney tried to argue exclusively from the physical. But I as a lender may not want to own the physical object, such as a farm. I may prefer to own a promise to pay (mortgage) made by the owner of the farm, with the farm serving as legal collateral should he default on his promise. If he defaults, I will probably try to get someone else to buy the farm and make me another promise. Yes, the contract may be based on the productivity of the farm, as administered by someone, but the focus of my concern may be the promise, not the physical asset itself. Perhaps the person decides to get out of farming and use the property as a resort, or as a consumer good. I care only about the promised payment, so long as his decision regarding the use of the land does not reduce its collateralized market value.

If society were to adopt Mr. Mooney's view, and then attempt to enforce it by civil law, it would decapitalize itself. Rushdoony's eloquent explanation of capitalization and his warnings regarding decapitalization should be taken seriously: we must choose between Christianity and existentialism.

Capitalization is the product of work and thrift, the accumulation of wealth and the wise use of accumulated wealth. This accumulated wealth is invested in effect in progress, because it is made available for the development of natural resources and the marketing of goods and produce. The thrift which leads to the savings or accumulation of wealth, to capitalization, is a product of character. Capitalization is a product in every era of the Puritan disposition, of the willingness to forego present pleasures to accumulate some wealth for future purposes. Without character, there is no capitalization but rather decapitalization, the steady depletion of wealth. As a result, capitalism is supremely a product of Christianity, and, in particular, of Puritanism, which, more than any other faith, has furthered capitalization.¹⁷

Today, however, the mood of modern Western man can best be described as existentialist. It subscribes to a philosophy in which the "moment" is decisive. It is not future oriented in that it does not plan, save, and act with the future in mind. The existentialist demands the future now. Some of the causes which concern student rebels may be valid, but their existentialist demand that the future arrive today make them incapable of capitalizing a culture. Existentialism requires that a man act undetermined by standards from the past or plans for the future; the biology of the moment must determine man's acts.

Very briefly stated, existentialism is basically lower class living converted into a philosophy. It is, moreover, the philosophy which governs church, state, school, and society today. The "silent majority” has perhaps never heard of existentialism, but it has been thoroughly bred into it by the American pragmatic tradition of the “public” or state schools.

17. Chalcedon Report (April 1967). R. J. Rushdoony, The Roots of Reconstruction (Vallecito, California: Ross House Books, 1991), p. 591.

Our basic problem today, all over the Western world, is that Western civilization no longer has a true upper class at the helm. Future-oriented men no longer dominate society, politically, economically, religiously, educationally, or in any other way. Instead, dreamers who are basically lower class, who believe that political power can convert today into tomorrow, are in charge. The result is the domination of our politics by an economic policy which is the essence of the lower class mind and which leads to radical inflation. Spending today with no thought of tomorrow is a lower class standard, and this is the essence of our modern scene. The vocal minority and silent majority are both deeply in debt, and they create national economies which are deeply in debt. The growing anarchism of our social life is a product of this same lower class mentality. This popular anarchism is a refusal to submit to law and discipline, and unwillingness to accept any postponement of hopes and dreams. It is closely related to tantrums of a child who demands his will be done now. Every major social agency today, church, state, school, and home is dedicated to creating this anarchistic, lower class mentality.¹⁸

Mr. Mooney’s view of time-preference is existentialist and lower class to the core. He no doubt failed to understand this. His recommended policies would destroy civilization. He no doubt failed to understand this, too. Such is the fate of the compulsory economics of love. The road to economic hell is paved with good intentions.

He said that my views are incorrect because I rely on the Austrian School economists for insights into time-preference. Were he more familiar with the history of economic thought, he would recognize the origin of his own ideas: the worst of Aristotle and the worst—economically, I mean—of John Maynard Keynes.

Conclusion

Every new movement that calls for a transformation of thought or culture will attract its share of fringe figures. The more publishing-oriented it is, the more it will attract people looking for the bogus immortality that the printing press appears to provide. I call this phenomenon the graffiti syndrome. It is the same temptation that persuades people of more limited literary aspirations to carve “John loves Mary” on public school desks, or limericks on the inside of lavatory doors. The Fabian movement in England is a good example of the sometimes fatal attractiveness of publishing: occultists, vegetarians, free love advocates, feminists, and screwballs of all varieties were drawn to the Webbs like midnight moths to a candle.¹⁹ All of them were looking to become part of the “wave of the future.” Only a few of them survived the test of time, to become remembered as the founders of yet another failed social religion.

18. Chalcedon Report (August 1970). Rushdoony, Ibid., pp. 716–17.

Anyone can hang out a sign which announces that he is a Christian Reconstructionist. There is no licensing required. Not many people choose to do this, since to join the tiny band of theonomists today is to become a modern-day John the Baptist, typing in the wilderness. But what should make a reader more than a little suspicious of anyone who claims to be a theonomist is the promoter’s narrow range of concern. Specialization is legitimate, but anyone who claims that he is offering a revolutionary blueprint for this or that aspect of society had better also offer at least a first draft of the overall integrated plan. The old rule of ecology is true: you cannot change just one thing. You cannot reconstruct just one aspect of society, or just one aspect of an economy. For example, if you suggest a zoning code that makes sewers illegal, you had better strongly recommend the installation of septic tanks; otherwise, you can expect considerable overflow problems.

Again, I do not expect any society to adopt Mr. Mooney’s baptized Aristotelianism. If it does, it will not remain productive very long. What does concern me is that a lot of well-meaning Christians will take such nonsense seriously, assume that it is “truly biblical” economics, and then try to “spread the gospel” of crackpottery in the name of Jesus. This would be an embarrassment to the kingdom of God generally and Christian Reconstruction specifically. We Christians are already regarded as otherworldly dreamers. Let us not provide additional ammunition to our enemies.

But if you are not convinced by the logic of my presentation, I would like to borrow some money from you, interest-free, for ten years. Or just let me take control over your house, rent-free, for a decade. Either is fine with me. Drop me a note if you are interested. This is the loving thing to do, according to Mr. Mooney, and I would sure love it if you do it!

19. The most uproarious descriptions of the pontificating Webbs are found in Malcolm Muggeridge’s two-volume autobiography, Chronicles of Wasted Time (New York: Morrow, 1973–74). He was married to Beatrice Webb’s niece.

APPENDIX K

SLAVERY IN THE AMERICAN SOUTH

Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine (1 Tim. 1:9–10).

The Western slave system, beginning in the mid-fifteenth century, was based on kidnapping. Western slave traders paid Africans who lived on the West Coast to send their native troops inland and kidnap members of other tribes. The trade existed because the slave traders sold their kidnapped victims to final buyers. These final buyers were, legally speaking, in receipt of stolen goods. In terms of economic analysis, the customers initiated the trade. Had their been no buyers, the trade would not have existed. As surely as the men who purchase sex from prostitutes are the perpetrators, with or without the presence of pimps, so were the buyers of the slaves.¹

The Mosaic penalty for kidnapping was death (Ex. 21:16).² Paul listed manstealing as one of the crimes of the Mosaic law. It therefore carries into the New Testament. If a Mosaic law carries into the New Testament, then so does its civil sanction. So, in terms of the Bible-revealed law of God, everyone connected with the slave trade should have been executed on conviction: tribal chieftains, slave traders, brokers/auctioneers, advertisers, and of course the owners.

1. It is worth noting that one of the most popular songs of Rolling Stones band, always played at their fabulously profitable world tours, is Brown Sugar, which celebrates an aging slave owner in ante-bellum New Orleans, who uses teenage slave girls as sexual bondservants. Only because Mick Jagger's enunciation has never been able to be understood has this travesty gone on for four decades. At least, I hope this is the explanation.

2. Chapter 34.

Of course, no one was tried for this crime. It continued for four centuries. A culturally and morally revolutionary change of opinion began with the Society of Friends in England around 1755. The institution of private chattel slavery was successively challenged in the United States by means of Christian ethics, then Unitarian ethics, and then civil war (1861–65). The system ended in the United States in 1865 with the defeat of the Confederacy. It ended in the West in 1888, when Brazil abolished it.

A. The Ante-Bellum Debate Over Slavery

The slave system of the American South made no provision for the slaves to earn their freedom, nor did it allow slaves to go free in the seventh year. The Levitical system of inter-generational slavery for foreigners (Lev. 25:44–46) was definitively abolished by Jesus in Luke 4,³ but no abolitionist invoked this passage. The system did not survive, among other things, the onslaughts of the West's evangelical preaching,⁴ New England's Unitarian abolitionist moralizing, South Carolina's self-immolating secessionist hot-heads, the Confederacy's self-destructive hyper inflation,⁵ mass-produced Yankee weaponry, and the North's superior numbers of soldiers.⁶

The debate over the biblical legitimacy of slavery in the South escalated in the mid-nineteenth century.⁷ But this shift toward abolitionism in the thinking of Christians in the North was not originally the result of changes in orthodox Trinitarian theology. As I mentioned earlier, the first group to change its views was the Society of Friends (Quakers), who certainly did not emphasize the Trinity. It would be much easier to defend the argument that the advent of the Industrial Revolution in the late eighteenth century was a far greater factor in the rise of abolitionism than the pioneering efforts of the great theologians

3. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 6.

4. Bertram Wyatt-Brown, Lewis Tappan and the Evangelical War Against Slavery (Cleveland, Ohio: Case Western Reserve University Press, 1969).

5. Richard Cecil Todd, Confederate Finance (Athens, Georgia: University of Georgia Press, 1954), ch. 3.

6. Richard N. Current, "God and the Strongest Battalions," in David Donald (ed.), Why the North Won the Civil War (New York: Collier, 1960).

7. See, for example, Thornton Stringfellow, "A Brief Examination of Scripture Testimony of the Institution of Slavery" (1841, 1850). (<http://bit.ly/BriefExam>) See also Erik L. McKittrick (ed.), Slavery Defended: The Views of the Old South (1963) and John L. Thomas (ed.), Slavery Attacked: The Abolitionist Crusade (1963), both published by Prentice-Hall, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey.

of the world, who never pioneered abolitionism anyway. Cheap mechanical labor no doubt made it less expensive for men whose societies benefitted from these technological developments to consider at long last the possibility of freeing other men's human slaves without suffering substantial decreases in economic production and national wealth. Yet it was the rise of industrialism, especially in the cotton trade, that made Southern slavery vastly more profitable—that, plus the cotton gin.

A team of four historians demonstrated in Why the South Lost the Civil War (1986) that the South's morale began to falter after the military defeats of July, 1863 (Vicksburg and Gettysburg), and then accelerated in the fall of 1864. Preachers began to call into question the original righteousness of the Confederate cause. When, in early 1865, the Confederate government voted to allow slaves to be brought into the army, with the understanding that the slaves would have to be promised their freedom if they served faithfully, the case for any supposed "innate slave mentality of the Negro" collapsed. Nobody wants to be defended militarily by men who are innate slaves.

Even before the war ended, the war to defend slavery had been reinterpreted by its supporters as a campaign to defend states rights or white supremacy or Southern honor. Nobody in the South called for the reimposition of slavery after the war ended.⁸ Military defeat by the anti-slavery North, not slavery's alleged economic inefficiency, was what doomed the South's slave system.⁹

While it lasted, however, slavery had positive educating effects for the slaves. The critics of Western slavery are seldom aware of the overwhelming impact of demonism on individuals and cultures. The close relationship between sub-Sahara Africa's animism and its perpetual poverty is not discussed in university classrooms. This is one reason why humanist scholars have such difficulty in explaining why state-to-state foreign aid programs do not produce long-term economic growth in backward nations. An understanding of the demonism-poverty relationship is fundamental to any valid economic, political, and social analysis of primitive cultures. This relationship is denied by most modern scholars, on those rare occasions when it is even considered. Scholars ignore the obvious: the slaves imported from Africa were savages. They were the victims of kidnapping by other savages, who then sold them to Arab slave traders in Eastern Africa or to Western slave traders in Western Africa.

8. Richard E. Berringer, et al., Why the South Lost the Civil War (Athens, Georgia: University of Georgia Press, 1986), chaps. 13–16.

9. On the continuing profitability of legalized slavery, so long as the soil of the land owned by the final purchasers of slaves did not become depleted, see the classic essay by Alfred H. Conrad and John R. Meyer, "The Economics of Slavery in the Ante-Bellum South" Journal of Political Economy, LXVI (April 1958). It has been reprinted many times, most notably in Conrad and Meyer, The Economics of Slavery (Chicago: Aldine, [1964] 2007).

The high bids of English-speaking slave-owners can be said to have rescued some of these savages from rival tribal slavery. It also can be said, however, that the high bids increased the demand for slaves, which in turn led to more slaves being hunted and taken. In any case, the slave-buyers should have known what they were doing: they were buying slaves from kidnappers. They simply preferred not to think through the economics of customer authority: customers, not sellers, determine prices. Final demand creates intermediate demand. They were buyers of stolen goods. They were the accomplices of kidnappers. As such, they became subject to the death penalty. God imposed this penalty on the South during the war, over half a century after slave imports from abroad had ceased. The South's slave-owners had ceased being the accomplices of kidnappers in 1808, but had instead become slave farmers: raising people as if they were cash crops, which they were, economically speaking. There were no laws protecting slave families from break-up through sales. Like the enslavement of the Hebrews by the Egyptians, it took two centuries for this judgment to be imposed on the South, but eventually God's patience ran out.

B. Academic Hostility to the Protestant Work Ethic

African blacks were savages who were being delivered by Southern slavery from earthly bondage to demons. They were being given the opportunity to improve their religious commitment, improve their skills, and ultimately achieve spiritual freedom. Scholars do not recognize that covenantally faithful people who achieve spiritual freedom by the grace of God in history cannot forever be enslaved. They lose their status as slaves to sin. This new judicial and ethical status eventually is manifested in history. This is a major theme of the Book of Exodus. Spiritual freedom under Jesus Christ eventually produces political and economic liberty, though seldom in a single generation. Conversely, spiritual bondage under Satan eventually produces political and economic bondage, though seldom in a single generation. History is not covenantally neutral. There is ethical cause-and-effect in mankind's institutional history, a covenantal fact denied vehemently by humanists and pietists alike. It is this denial which is the foundation of the operating alliance between humanists and pietists,¹⁰ the defenders of the power religion and the defenders of the escape religion.¹¹

There are five steps in the securing of this institutional liberty. They match the five points in the biblical covenant model. The first step is spiritual: faith in Jesus Christ as the sovereign Lord and Savior, the redeemer of men and institutions in history. The second step is the recognition of God's hierarchical covenants: the requirement of faithful labor under guidance from those who possess authority. The third step is covenantal faithfulness to the ethical terms of God's covenant. The fourth step is self-government (self-judgment) with the hope of God's blessings, both in heaven and in history. The fifth step is confidence concerning the long-run earthly effects of one's efforts. This confidence leads to a more efficient management of time and capital. In short, for any people to become liberated, they must change their perception of God, man, law, judgment, and time. They must then discipline their lives in terms of this covenantal worldview. In short, the way to liberty is by means of the Protestant ethic.

Technically oriented economic historians often not only ignore the capacity for self-transformation that the Protestant work ethic possesses, they openly denied it. One historian of ideas did not ignore it, Daniel Rodgers.¹² He wrote of the fusion of the work ethic and economic growth in pre-industrial America: "By the middle of the nineteenth century, the process had created in the American North an expansive, though still largely pre-industrial, economy and an unequaled commitment to the moral primacy of work.”¹³ But economic historians are usually more skillful technicians than “mere” intellectual historians, so they are more readily cursed with the tendency to believe the myth of value-free economic science.

10. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989), Pt. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

11. Part 1, Representation and Dominion, Introduction.

12. Daniel T. Rodgers was a student of a powerful triumvirate of American historians: Yale University's David Brion Davis, C. Vann Woodward, and Edmund S. Morgan. Rodgers wrote in his Introduction to his book, The Work Ethic in Industrial America, 1850–1920 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978): "This is at bottom a study not of work but of ideas about work. In particular it is a study of those threads of ideas that came together to affirm work as the core of the moral life. By now reiteration of that claim has dulled its audacity. But in the long run of ideas it was a revolutionary notion. In and of itself work involves only an element of burden and, for most people, the goad of necessity. Few cultures have presumed to call it anything more than a poor bargain in an imperfect world. It was the office of ideas to turn the incapable into an act of virtue, the burdensome into the vital center of living. That presumption—the work ethic—begins in a momentous act of transvaluation" (p. xi).

Two skeptics regarding the moral and economic benefits of slaves’ exposure to the Protestant work ethic were economic historians Roger Ransom¹⁴ and Richard Sutch. They reproduced a statement in 1900 by Hollis Burke Frissell, a prominent Southern educator. It is a statement that could hardly be quarreled with, yet they quarreled with it. The first sentence is, admittedly, preposterous: “It is only fair to call attention to the part which the South performed in the education of the barbarous people forced upon her,” but the authors ignored it. Why preposterous? Because the slaves were not educated by “the South,” meaning the vast majority of southerners who were not slave-owners. It is misleading to equate “the South” with the slave system. To some extent these free citizens had the slave system forced on them, or at least “sold” to them by the aristocrats who had always dominated the South. Furthermore, those who did the educating of slaves, prior to 1865, did not have the slaves forced on them; they paid for them, and paid a lot. But the authors did not criticize these words. Instead, they criticized what followed:

The Southern plantation was really a great trade school where thousands received instruction in mechanic arts, in agriculture, in cooking, sewing, and other domestic occupations. . . . The training which the black had under slavery was far more valuable as a preparation for civilized life, than the freedom from training and service enjoyed by the Indian on the Western reservations. For while slavery taught the colored man to work, the reservation pauperized the Indian with free rations; while slavery brought the black into the closest relations with the white race and its way of life, the reservation shut the Indian away from his white brothers and gave him little knowledge of their civilization, language or religion.¹⁵

The critics’ comments reveal a great deal about the attitude of modern scholars towards the Protestant work ethic. “Frissell’s sugges-

13. Ibid., p. xii.

14. One of my graduate school professors of economic history—day in and day out, the best lecturer I ever had in school, and I suffered through a lot of school.

15. Cited by Roger L. Ransom and Richard Sutch, One Kind of Freedom: The economic consequences of emancipation (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1977), p. 20.

tion that slavery imbued the slave with a work ethic indispensable to success as a free laborer has recently reappeared in the work of Robert Fogel and Stanley Engerman. These authors insist that the American slave internalized the 'Protestant work ethic.' Slaves were 'diligent,' 'responsible,' and 'hardworking,' 'virtues' they presumably carried with them into freedom. Upon closer examination, however, Fogel and Engerman's argument has been shown to amount to nothing more than a curious interpretation of the well-known fact that slaves were worked hard."¹⁶ We are once again face to face with reductionism: nothing more than. There is always more than. Lots more.

Even if this were true—nothing more than the fact that "slaves were worked hard"—it would be enough. Learning the rigors of disciplined labor is no minor achievement.¹⁷ Being in a culture that expected people to work six days a week, with few vacations and little idleness, provided a competitive model that had its effects on the post-Civil War black freedmen. It is economic reductionism that leads otherwise sensible and painstaking scholars to write that "freedmen worked hard, not because they had actually been imbued with the Protestant work ethic as slaves, but because of the powerful influence of self-interest. The freedmen were the beneficiaries of emancipation, not of slavery."¹⁸

They forgot that emancipation from demonism is the first step toward long-term economic success. The slaves went through two stages of social emancipation: first, when the original Africans were transported by force to the insufficiently Christian South; second, when their heirs were emancipated from their insufficiently ethical masters. Although the original acts of kidnapping were immoral, their long-term results were to the benefit of those victimized Africans who survived the Atlantic passage and the early years of their enslavement.¹⁹ The

16. Idem. The authors referred in a footnote to another essay co-authored by Sutch, an essay whose title tells all: "Sambo Makes Good, or Were Slaves Imbued with the Protestant Work Ethic?" in Paul A. David, et. al. Reckoning With Slavery: A critical Study in the Quantitative History of American Negro Slavery (New York: Oxford University Press, 1976).

17. The restructuring of the outlook and personal habits of self-reliance of factory workers was necessary to the coming of the Industrial Revolution in Britain. It took a generation for managers and churchmen to accomplish even a rudimentary shift in the habits of the laboring classes. Sidney Pollard, The Genesis of Modern Management: A Study of the Industrial Revolution in Great Britain (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1965), ch. 5: "The Adaptation of the Labor Force."

18. Ransom and Sutch, One Kind of Freedom, p. 22.

19. It would be preposterous to deny the benefits of Solomon's wisdom merely because he was the product of a marital union originally based on adultery and murder. The undeniable evil of the latter does not negate the equally undeniable benefits of the critics also forget that what men regard as economic self-interest varies widely across the globe, culture to culture. Men respond to incentives and opportunities (problems) in different ways. To imagine that the freedmen of 1865–80 responded to their economic environment in approximately the same way that their savage, demon-worshipping, shaman-manipulated forebears would have responded is not only naïve, it is positively denigrating to the economic and spiritual wisdom of the freedmen.²⁰ More to the point, it is all too favorable to their ancestors, not to mention the pagan gods that they worshipped.

Bondage to sin produces bondage in other areas of life, both personal and cultural. Neither judicial emancipation nor slavery is in itself a solution to the bondage of sin. Slavery in tribal Africa would not have solved the black African's spiritual poverty, but slavery in a spiritually compromised Christian culture eventually led to his hoped-for emancipation. Hard work as slaves within the cultural framework of a generally free and generally Christian society was a better training ground for a slave's eventual emancipation than hard work as a slave within some shaman-governed tribe.

Freedom begins with internal regeneration, and then steadily works its effects outward. If spiritual freedom is not allowed by civil rulers to work its way toward political and economic freedom, then God at last breaks the chains of bondage that restrain the covenantal blessings of freedom. This is the message of the Book of Exodus. Antinomian Christians do not believe this, and humanistic scholars do not admit this, but God says that this is the way He runs His world.

C. Economic Self-Interest

A slave is not usually an efficient worker. At times, he must be forced to work. As with draftees, or even volunteers in military service, fear motivates slaves. Yet it is also true that a military unit that is run exclusively by fear is not likely to fight as well as units that also combine honor, loyalty, comradeship, a taste for victory, a sense of purpose, and the possibility of personal advancement up through the ranks, not to mention the prospect of an honorable discharge. An army of perpetual recruits, of perpetual boot camps, is not going to former.

20. I have no doubt that the proportional representation of saints in heaven is much higher for nineteenth-century American slaves than it is for twentieth-century economists. The bulk of the economists will be spending eternity in the same environment as the Shamans who stayed behind in Africa in the eighteenth century.

win many battles. We are back to reductionism: the idea that people respond to nothing more than fear. Societies that are based on the assumption of any kind of reductionism do not survive. Man and society are more than any single characteristic.

Fogel and Engerman, whose evaluation was so despised by Ransom and Sutch, concluded the obvious, something that any sensible observer might have known before the two began their detailed study of slavery—a study that received a firestorm of criticism from the academic and literary world. They wrote: “While whipping was an integral part of the system of punishment and rewards, it was not the totality of the system. What planters wanted was not sullen and discontented slaves who did just enough to keep from getting whipped. They wanted devoted, hard-working, responsible slaves who identified their fortunes with the fortunes of their masters. Planters sought to imbue slaves with a ‘Protestant’ work ethic and to transform that ethic from a state of mind into a high level of production.”²¹

Slavery was the boot camp that God provided for almost half a million African “draftees”; emancipation gave their heirs a discharge out of “the service.” It was the great historic evil of the slave-masters that slaves had been expected to spend their lives as recruits forever—and productive, loyal, hard-working recruits at that. When slaves became Protestants, in faith as well as ethic, the obvious hypocrisy of their masters must have been even more oppressive. Their masters simply did not take seriously biblical law and the Protestant doctrine of the priesthood of all believers. The military defeat of the South, like the defeat of Israel and Judah, should have served as a lesson in Protestant theology, how God uses the “rod” of an invading army—even an army drafted into service by pagan Boston abolitionists²²—to bring His people to repentance.

The abolition of chattel slavery in the South did not end either racism or the South.²³ It launched a new phase in southern history, one which culminated a century later in the civil rights protests of the early 1960s.²⁴ That Karl Marx believed that the end of slavery would not

21. Robert William Fogel and Stanley L. Engerman, Time on the Cross: The Economics of American Slavery (Boston: Little, Brown, 1974), p. 1547.

22. Otto Scott, The Secret Six: John Brown and the Abolitionism Movement (New York: Times Books, 1979).

23. C. Vann Woodward, The Strange Career of Jim Crow (New York: Oxford University Press, 1957); Woodward, Origins of the New South, 1877–1913 (Baton Rouge, Louisiana: Louisiana State University Press, 1951).

24. David J. Garrow, Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King and the Southern only destroy the South but also destroy the United States is just one more piece of evidence that Marx was a third-rate prophet, a level of performance that matched the quality of his economic analysis. In 1847, he wrote:

Direct slavery is just as much the pivot of bourgeois industry as machinery, credits, etc. Without slavery you have no cotton; without cotton you have no modern industry. It is slavery that gave the colonies their value; it is the colonies that created world trade, and it is world trade that is the pre-condition of large-scale industry. Thus slavery is an economic category of the greatest importance.

Without slavery North America, the most progressive of countries, would be transformed into a patriarchal country. Wipe North America off the map of the world, and you will have anarchy—the complete decay of modern commerce and civilization. Cause slavery to disappear and you will have wiped America off the map of nations.²⁵

That man simply did not know what he was talking about, and for over three decades, he never stopped talking.²⁶

D. The American South: No Civil Protection

Slavemasters who symbolically violate this principle by inflicting permanent damage on a slave are therefore supposed to be removed from legal authority over the slave. Slavery in the American South violated this principle. Unlimited authority to inflict punishment was given to slave masters by Southern custom. Just as there was no judicially enforced hope of release for the slave, so was there no judicially enforced limit on physical punishment of the slave. The slave system of the South rested on violence. Every slave system does. In fact, both state and family rest on the threat of violence, but not unlimited violence. Violence is always supposed to be judicially restrained. This was not the case with Southern slavery.

Christian Leadership Conference (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1986); Taylor Branch, Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–53 (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988).

25. Karl Marx, The Poverty of Philosophy (Moscow: Foreign Languages Publishing House [1847]), p. 107. In 1885, Engels added an unconvincing footnote: “This was perfectly correct for the year 1847.” Then what are we to make of Marx’s next statement? “Thus slavery, because it is an economic category, has always existed among institutions and people.” This was over a decade after the abolition of slavery in the British colonies. The man was willfully blind. All that education—so little wisdom or even common sense.

26. Gary North, Marx’s Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1968] 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gnmr0r>)

In plantation management handbook after handbook, owners were told that the slave had to submit unconditionally. John Stuart Skinner's 1840 essay in the American Farmer was representative of the mentality of the Southern slave-owner: "Absolute, unqualified authority is asserted and exercised on the part of the master."²⁷ His focus was on the absoluteness of the relationship. "Whenever the authority of the master becomes qualified—whenever his dominion is relaxed, and the submission of the slave ceases to be absolute, the relation between the two loses its homogeneous [sic] distinctness. The one is no longer master, the other no longer slave, in the sense and degree of absoluteness which produces uniformity of action and feeling between them."²⁸

There is no absolute human authority present in man's institutions. Men are not God. Only God establishes absolute relations with others. Only He possesses absolute authority. Thus, the judicial mark of the inherent perversity of Southern slavery was this assertion of absolute judicial authority of master over slave. The Southern slave-owner was allowed to impose any sanctions he chose for whatever reason he deemed significant. Whatever civil laws may have been on the statute books regarding limits on a master's punishment of slaves, they were seldom enforced, just as the dueling laws in the South were seldom enforced. Social custom sometimes differed from judicial forms, and social custom was the operational law of the region.

E. The Whip

Deuteronomy 25:3 specifies 40 lashes ("stripes") as the maximum allowed. To beat a person with more than 40 lashes would make the person seem "vile," in the language of the King James. The New American Standard translates the word as "degraded."

In other words, it would make him seem less than human, meaning someone not protected by law in spite of his imaging of God. The Massachusetts Body of Liberties (1641) recognized the degrading aspect of whipping, and specifically protected gentlemen from this form of punishment. "No man shall be beaten with above forty stripes, nor shall any true gentleman nor any man equal to a gentleman be pun-

27. John S. Skinner, "Morality among Slaves in Mississippi," American Farmer, 3rd ser. (1840), cited in Dickson D. Bruce, Jr., Violence and Culture in the Antebellum South (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1979), p. 116.

28. Ibid., p. 117.

ished with whipping, unless his crime be very shameful and his course of life vicious and profligate.”²⁹ This fastidiousness about whipping gentlemen violated the second listed liberty: equality before the law (the rule of Exodus 12:49). “Every person within this jurisdiction, whether inhabitant or foreigner, shall enjoy the same justice that is general for the plantation, which we constitute and execute toward another without partiality or delay. . . .”³⁰ Ex-slave Henry Bibb expressed his position well: “I was brought up in the Counties of Shelby, Henry, Oldham, and Trimble. Or, more correctly speaking, I was flogged up; for where I should have been receiving moral, mental, and religious instruction, I received stripes without number, the object of which was to degrade and keep me in subordination.”³¹ Bibb’s eloquence seems to have been influenced at this point by the very terminology of Deuteronomy 25:3: “stripes without number,” “to degrade me.”

It was considered a mark of personal weakness for a Southern slave-owner to rely too heavily on the whip. Certainly, he was warned by social custom and written manuals to be fixed, predictable, and self-restrained in his exercise of plantation discipline. A gentleman was expected to be in self-control at all times. Bruce summarized the social standard: “The plantation was supposed to be a system in which places were known and rules observed. Regularity and order were to be its main features. The slave’s behavior was to be highly predictable and the master, in turn, was to be predictable in his own actions.”³² This was the ideal. In fact, it was the continual complaint of ex-slaves that their masters had not been predictable in imposing sanctions.³³

Other sanctions were available besides the whip: the demotion of household slaves to the status of field slaves; the denial of passes to leave the plantation temporarily; confiscation of crops in the slaves’ personal gardens; time in the stocks; or even solitary confinement in a plantation jail (some plantations were large enough to have a jail).³⁴ But, in the last analysis, the whip was the key to slave discipline. It was the emblem of the master’s authority.³⁵ It could be used in an orderly

29. Massachusetts Body of Liberties (1641), sect. 43.

30. Ibid., sect. 2.

31. Henry Bibb, Narrative of the Life and Adventures of an American Slave, Written by Himself (1849), p. 13. (<http://bit.ly/BibbNarrative>)

32. Bruce, Violence and Culture, p. 118.

33. Ibid., pp. 138–40.

34. Kenneth M. Stampp, The Peculiar Institution: Slavery in the Ante-Bellum South (New York: Vintage, 1956), pp. 172–73.

35. Ibid., p. 174.

manner: more lashes for more serious infractions. Also, there were several kinds of whips, some more painful than others (e.g., rawhide). But the goal of the plantation ethic was to reduce whipping to a minimum.³⁶

F. Limiting Passion

There is no doubt that one of the great concerns of Southern social thought before the Civil War was to place limits on passion. Bruce's book makes this clear. Southerners feared disorder. They wanted limits—judicial, customary, and institutional—placed on men's outward acts of violence. This was one reason why the gentleman class placed such great stress on personal manners. They feared the "natural man," a man of passion and violence. They identified him by his tendency to violence. But when it came to slavery, they defied the fundamental biblical principle of social order: self-government under God's Bible-revealed law. They refused to establish a judicial hierarchy, an appeals court that would bring every person under the rule of law, including slave and master. They made the tight little "family" of the plantation into a sovereign judicial entity. The "children"—slaves—were to remain in the status of perpetual children. Their "father"—the master—would retain perpetual and judicially unlimited authority over them. This was a denial of the very foundation of liberty under God, a fact recognized by Jefferson, Madison, and many other Southern spokesmen, but they could not bring themselves to abandon the institution that denied their first principle of government: self-government under law.³⁷

The defenders of Southern slavery could always insist that brutality on the part of masters was not the norm but rather an exception. This was Southern Presbyterian theologian Robert L. Dabney's argument. "Now, while we freely admit that there were in the South, instances of criminal barbarity in corporal punishments, they were very infrequent, and were sternly reprobated by public opinion."³⁸ Dabney was using rhetoric to make his point. There were no acts of criminal barbarity by slave-masters in the South because there were no criminal sanctions against such acts in the South's judicial code. Such acts

36. Ibid., pp. 177–79.

37. Winthrop D. Jordan, White Over Black: American Attitudes Toward the Negro, 1550–1812 (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1968), ch. 12.

38. Robert L. Dabney, A Defense of Virginia [And Through Her, of the South] (New York: Negro University Press, [1867] 1969), p. 221.

could not be criminal acts, except in terms of a higher civil law than the South's. Dabney was using the word "criminal" in a general moral sense, i.e., criminal in the eyes of God and men, meaning "socially unacceptable." In any case, how could he know how frequent such acts of "criminal barbarity" were? Intuition? There were no published records for Yankees and other "outside agitators" to appeal to. The system's defenders expected slavery's critics simply to accept their word on the matter. How sternly or frequently public opinion "reprobated" floggers was another question that could not easily be settled by an appeal to reliable public records. What is not open to question is the nature of the sanctions of the South's judicial system against the physical mistreatment of slaves: there were none.

G. Formal Sanctions and Deviance

The same kind of defense could be made regarding the splitting up of slave families: an occasional event. Dabney made it, too. Again, he appealed to the integrity of the court of public opinion: "... when the separation was not justified by the crimes of the parties, it met the steady and increasing reprobation of public opinion." The weakness of this defense is that it fails to acknowledge the heart of the matter, namely, that such supposed deviations on the part of slave-owners were legal. There were no judicially enforceable sanctions against such supposedly deviant behavior.³⁹ Thus, the behavior was not in fact deviant by Southern standards, but at most merely exceptional. Without judicial sanctions, a society has no formal way of identifying deviant behavior. There is always a court of public opinion, and its acceptable jurisdiction is more broad than that of civil courts, but if this court is not supported by judicial sanctions, then it is an informal court. The slaves would have found it difficult to make accurate predictions about the degree of safety such informal sanctions could provide. Without a formal court of appeal, the degree of safety would be far more indeterminate.

Deviant behavior requires sanctions to identify it. Sociologist Kai Erikson, in his study of law enforcement in Puritan Massachusetts, offered this useful definition of deviance: the term "refers to conduct which the people of a group consider so dangerous or embarrassing or irritating that they bring special sanctions to bear against the persons who exhibit it."⁴⁰ "The deviant is a person whose activities have moved outside the margins of the group, and when the community calls him to account for that vagrancy it is making a statement about how much variability and diversity can be tolerated within the group before it loses its distinctive shape, its unique identity."⁴¹ Those who defended slavery could and did appeal to the supposedly deviant character of its evils and the common character of its benefits. But the key element in defining deviance is establishing the nature of the sanctions against it. It is not the task of biblical civil government to make men perform moral tasks; its job is to restrict them from performing biblically immoral acts. The benefits of slavery should not be the civil government's legitimate concern; reducing the public evils associated with it is its legitimate concern.

39. Legislation in the American South imposed no penalties on slave owners who physically injured their slaves. Arnold A. Sio, "Interpretations of Slavery," Comparative Studies in Society and History, VII (April 1965); reprinted in Allen Weinstein and Frank Otto Gatell (eds.), American Negro Slavery: A Modern Reader (New York: Oxford University Press, 1968), pp. 316–17.

Massachusetts' legislation during the first full year of the colony's existence (1630) repeated the biblical standard, although with two modifications: "If any man smite out the eye or tooth of his man-servant or maid-servant, or otherwise maim or much disfigure them, unless it be by mere casualty, he shall let them go free from his service and shall allow such further recompense as the court shall adjudge him."⁴² If the injury was clearly an accident, the servant stayed; this provided an escape clause for the owner that the Bible does not mention. On the other hand, if it was deliberate, the servant not only went free but might also receive additional compensation. This went beyond the biblical penalty. The Massachusetts Puritans, at least with respect to their public law code, were concerned about violating the spirit of the law of slave injuries. They understood this law as prohibiting deliberate injuries by the master, so they relaxed the automatic release provision of the law, yet they also tried to honor another important principle of biblical law, economic restitution. They unquestionably placed owners under the threat of civil sanctions.

It was the absence of judicial sanctions against these evils that made the character of Southern slavery judicially perverse.

The South did not impose formal, public sanctions against those 40. Kai T. Erikson, Wayward Puritans: A Study in the Sociology of Deviance (New York: Wiley, 1966), p. 6.

41. Ibid., p. 11.

42. Foundations of Colonial America: A Documentary History, ed. W. Keith Kavenaugh, 3 vols. (New York: Chelsea House, 1973), I, p. 405.

slave-owners who clearly mistreated their slaves. The Bible is clear about the proper response of society to such deviant behavior: for the slave so mistreated, the court's granting him his freedom is the appropriate sanction against the owner.

Because the South's courts refused to impose this biblical sanction on deviant slave-owners within their jurisdiction, God then imposed his sanctions on the courts. The slaves were freed by the courts of the South's conquerors. When self-government fails to produce proper results, external sanctions are appropriate. God brought the South under a kind of temporary servitude that lasted a little over a decade militarily, 1865–77, over half a century politically,⁴³ and just over a century economically, socially, and culturally.

Conclusion

When Martin Luther King, Jr., ended his famous "I Have a Dream" speech at the 1963 "March on Washington" with the words, taken from an old hymn, "Free at last! Free at last! Thank God Almighty, we are free at last!"⁴⁴ he spoke prophetically for the American South, which during the next decade abandoned that distinctive degree of racism, intellectual and judicial, that had kept it separated from the rest of the nation for two centuries. Well could he announce in 1968 in Memphis, Tennessee, in a public speech the night before his assassination: "And He's allowed me to go up to the promised land. I may not get there with you. But I want you to know tonight, that we, as a people will get to the promised land."⁴⁵

The welfare state policies that President Lyndon Johnson imposed on the American political order then undermined the African-American family, which was already disintegrating because of the welfare state system created by President Franklin Roosevelt three decades earlier. Racism's most overt and coercive practices died, 1955–70. The price that the blacks' social order suffered at the hands of the welfare state was a heavy price to pay within the community. The state substituted another kind of dependence for the older, private version. The whites pay a small percentage of their income to support this system. The great losers are the blacks. The slave system did not allow blacks to marry. The welfare state pays them not to marry. The slave system's 43. Woodward, Origins of the New South.

44. Garrow, Bearing the Cross, p. 284.

45. Ibid., p. 621.

unofficial family was more stable than the present non-family.

Sinners have a propensity to establish slave systems. Their forms vary, but the results are similar: dependence, resentment, and failure.

APPENDIX L

MAIMONIDES' CODE: IS IT BIBLICAL?

A heathen who busies himself with the study of the Law deserves death. He should occupy himself with the (study) of the seven commandments only. So too, a heathen who keeps a day of rest, even if it be on a weekday, if he has set it apart as his Sabbath, is deserving of death. It is needless to state that he merits death if he makes a new festival for himself. The general principle is: none is permitted to introduce innovations into religion or devise new commandments. The heathen has the choice between becoming a true proselyte by accepting all the commandments, and adhering to his own religion, neither adding to it nor subtracting anything from it. If therefore he occupies himself with the study of the Law, or observes a day of rest, or makes any innovation, he is flogged, or otherwise punished and advised that he is deserving of death, but he is not put to death.

Moses Maimonides (1180)¹

The typical non-Jew would imagine that Jews throughout history would have rejoiced whenever gentiles² read the Old Testament in

1. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Judges, Book 14 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1949), "Laws Concerning Kings and Wars," V:X:9, p. 237.

2. I do not capitalize "gentile," although the King James translators did, and it is still common for writers to do so. I do not view the gentiles as a separate people in the ethnic or national way that Americans, Mexicans, Chinese, and Jews are. To capitalize the word would imply that gentiles are a separate people, meaning a separate people as contrasted to Jews, who alone are "not gentiles." Such ethnic separation no longer exists in principle: "That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world: But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ. For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us" (Eph. 2:12-13). Jews equate gentiles with heathen, yet they do not capitalize "heathen," for they correctly understand "heathenism" as a spiritual condition rather than an ethnic or national condition. I use "gentiles" in the sense of "not Jews," but not in the sense of a separate ethnic or national group.

search of God's permanent moral and civil standards of righteousness. After all, this would tend to bridge the cultural and judicial gap between Jews and non-Jews. This, however, was precisely the problem in the minds of the rabbis for at least 1,700 years. The rabbis did not want this gap bridged; at most, they wanted external peace and quiet for Jews, meaning they wanted social order in the midst of gentile culture. Sufficient social order within the gentile world is supposedly achieved through their adherence to the seven commandments specifically given to the heathen, meaning gentiles. Six of these laws were first given to Adam, according to Jewish law: the prohibitions against idolatry, blasphemy, murder, adultery, and robbery, plus the command to establish courts of justice. A seventh law was also supposedly given to Noah: the prohibition against eating the limb of a living animal.³ Beyond this minimal list of seven laws, the gentiles—"Noahides" or "Noahites," the descendants of Noah⁴—are not supposed to go in their inquiry into the ethical requirements of Old Testament law, which belongs exclusively to the Jews.

In making this assertion, Maimonides was faithfully following the teaching of the Talmud. He was taking Rabbi Johanan at his word: "R. [Rabbi—G.N.]⁵ Johanan said: A heathen who studies the Torah deserves death, for it is written, Moses commanded us a law for an inheritance; it is our inheritance, not theirs."⁶ Resh Lakish (third century, A.D.) said that a gentile who observes the Sabbath deserves death.⁷ Why should God have forbidden the gentiles to study His law? The Talmud offers this answer:

R. Abbahu thereupon said: The Writ says, He stood and measured the earth; he beheld and drove asunder the nations, [which may be taken to imply that] God beheld the seven commandments which were accepted by all the descendants of Noah, but since they did not observe them, He rose up and declared them to be outside the protection of the civil law of Israel [with reference to damage done to cattle by cattle].⁸

3. Maimonides, Judges, "Laws Concerning Kings and Wars," V:IX:1, pp. 230-31.

4. Ibid., V:IX:2, p. 231.

5. When you see brackets inside a direct quotation from the Talmud, they appeared in the Soncino Press edition. I will note any brackets of my own with my initials.

6. Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 59a. I am using the Soncino Press edition.

7. Sanhedrin 59b.

8. Baba Kamma 38a. Bracketed comments are by the editor.

Lest this position seem utterly outrageous to Christian readers, I need to point out that a similar view of the sufficiency of Noah's covenant for non-Israelite civil law was offered by Calvinist theologian John Murray and also by neo-dispensational theologians H. Wayne House and Thomas D. Ice. In fact, all three of them concluded that there is only one biblically required sanction in Noah's covenant, capital punishment for murder. This, they believed, is the only biblical law that God has required all men to obey throughout mankind's post-flood history.⁹ The Talmud at least adds an additional six laws that God specifically established through Adam and Noah that gentiles are supposed to honor throughout history.

A. How Little Most People Know About Judaism

Maimonides' opinion regarding the immorality of non-Jews who read the Old Testament would probably come as a shock to most Christians, assuming they had ever heard of Maimonides and his Mishneh Torah. It might even come as a shock to most contemporary Jews. The average Bible-believing Christian in the United States knows very little about post-New Testament Judaism. He may be vaguely aware that American Judaism is divided into three theological wings: Reform (liberal), Conservative, and Orthodox. He may also be aware that European Judaism has two great ethnic branches: the Sephardim¹⁰ (those whose ancestors once lived in Spain, Portugal, or the Eastern Mediterranean) and the Ashkenazic Jews¹¹ (those who came west from Russia and Poland), who were the Yiddish-speaking Jews in the late 1800s and early 1900s, prior to their linguistic assimilation into American culture. But as to how these Jewish groups overlap,¹² or which group dominates Judaism either in the U.S. or in the state of Israel today,¹³ the average Christian has no idea. Few Christians have heard that there is a third branch, Oriental or Yemenite Judaism (North African), members of which have long complained that they are discriminated against politically in the state of Israel.

9. John Murray, Principles of Conduct: Aspects of Biblical Ethics (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1957), pp. 118-19; House and Ice, Dominion Theology: Curse or Blessing? (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah, 1988), p. 130.

10. Heinrich Graetz, History of the Jews, 6 vols. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, [1893] 1945), IV, chaps. 10-13. On the influence of the Sephardic Jews in the U.S., see Stephen Birmingham, The Grandees: America's Sephardic Elite (New York: Harper & Row, 1971).

11. Graetz, History, IV, ch. 14; V, chaps. 6, 18; V, ch. 1. See also Bernard D. Weinryb, The Jews of Poland: A Social and Economic History of the Jewish Community in Poland from 1100 to 1880 (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1972). On their influence in the U.S., see Stephen Birmingham, "Our Crowd": The Great Jewish Families of New York (New York: Harper & Row, 1967); Irving Howe, World of Our Fathers (New York: Simon & Schuster, [1976] 1983); Irving Howe and Kenneth Libo, How We Lived: A Documentary History of Immigrant Jews in America, 1880-1930 (New York: Richard Marek, 1979).

Christians are unaware that the medieval Jewish body of literature known as the Kabbalah ("tradition") is not only mystical but closely tied to numerology and occultism.¹⁴ They do not know that the mystical-magical tradition of the Kabbalah had its roots in the Talmud.¹⁵ They have never read anything about the history of Zionism, either pro¹⁶ or con.¹⁷

To the extent that the Bible-believing Christian thinks about Reform Jews generally, he assumes that they are something like Unitarians: politically liberal, skeptical about the Bible, and essentially hu-

12. Thomas Sowell, Ethnic America: A History (New York: Basic Books, 1981), ch. 4: "The Jews."

13. I refer to the "state of Israel" rather than "Israel" out of respect for the terminology of Orthodox Jews, who sharply distinguish the two.

14. "Kabalah," in Lewis Spence (ed.), An Encyclopaedia of Occultism (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, [1920] 1960). An example of popular (though underground) magical literature based on the Kabbalah, which has been reprinted generation after generation, is The Sixth and Seventh Books of Moses. See also Arthur Edward Waite, The Holy Kabbalah: A Study of the Secret Tradition of Israel (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, 1960 reprint); Denis Saurat, Literature and Occult Tradition, trans. Dorothy Bolton (Port Washington, New York: Kennikat, [1930] 1966), Pt. III, ch. 2. The pioneering modern Jewish studies of the Kabbalah are by Gershom G. Scholem: Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism, 3rd ed (New York: Schocken, 1961) and On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism (New York: Schocken, [1960] 1965). The primary source of Kabbalah is The Zohar, 5 vols. (London: Soncino Press, 1934). On the influence of the Kabbalah on the gentile world, see Frances A. Yates, The Occult Philosophy in the Elizabethan Age (London: ARK, [1979] 1983) and A. E. Waite, The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross (New Hyde Park, New York: University Books, 1961 reprint).

15. Gershom G. Scholem, Jewish Gnosticism, Merkabah Mysticism, and Talmudic Tradition 2nd ed. (New York: Bloch, 1965).

16. Walter Laqueur, A History of Zionism (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1972); Ronald Sanders, The High Walls of Jerusalem: A History of the Balfour Declaration and the Birth of British Mandate for Palestine (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1983).

17. Gary V. Smith (ed.), Zionism: The Dream and the Reality, A Jewish Critique (New York: Barnes & Noble, 1974); Rabbi Elmer Berger, The Jewish Dilemma: The Case Against Zionist Nationalism (New York: Devin-Adair, 1945). The major published English-speaking critic of Zionism is Alfred M. Lilienthal: What Price Israel? (Chicago: Regnery, 1953); There Goes the Middle East (New York: Devin-Adair, 1957); The Zionist Connection: What Price Peace? (New York: Dodd, Mead, 1978).

manistic. (Orthodox Jews also view Reform Jews in much the same way.) Christians, however, tend to think of almost all Jews in this way, which turns out to be a statistically correct political assumption; American Jews are consistently liberal in their voting behavior.¹⁸ Conservative Jews are seen by Christians as being somewhere in between Reform and Orthodox: they do not eat pork, but they wear normal clothes; other than this, Christians know little about them.

The Orthodox Jew, in contrast, is assumed by the Bible-believing Christian to be rather like the Christian: he has minority status within the larger Jewish community, he tends to be more conservative politically, pro-family in outlook, and probably anti-abortion. He is in conflict with the Reform Jews, just as the Bible-believing Christian is at war with the liberal defenders of biblical higher criticism. Thus, the Orthodox Jew is assumed to be a kind of Old Testament Christian who wears black clothing and a beard—a quaint, Amish-like figure¹⁹—and who avoids pork. This perception is incorrect. The Orthodox Jew is in fact a self-conscious, self-professed spiritual heir of the Pharisees. His book is the Talmud, the written version of Judaism's oral law, far more than it is the Old Testament.

1. The "Star of David"

Very few people know much about the history of Judaism, including those who identify themselves as Jews. This may seem like an outrageous statement. You can test its accuracy by asking the average gentile or average Jew what the most important symbol of modern Judaism is. He probably will say either the scroll of the Torah or "the star of David," also known as the Mogen David or Magen David. After all, it appears on the state of Israel's national flag. Ask him where the latter symbol originated, and you will get a blank stare. He has no idea.

The fact is, the so-called star of David is a universal pagan symbol, long pre-dating Judaism. It was adopted by Zionists in the late nineteenth century. Before then, it was used as a decoration by Jews, Muslims, and Christians. It was long called the Seal of Solomon. How many Jews, let alone Christians, have ever been informed of the following information, presented by Jewish scholar and art historian Joseph Gutmann?

18. "... Jews in this country have the economic status of white Anglo-Saxon Episcopalians but vote more like low-income Hispanics." Milton Himmelfarb, cited by Irving Kristol, "Liberalism & American Jews," Commentary (Oct. 1988), p. 19; cf. Peter Steinfelds, "American Jews Stand Firmly to the Left," New York Times (Jan. 8, 1989). Steinfelds reported that polls revealed that four times as many Jews belong to the Democratic Party as belong to the Republican Party, compared to about equal numbers of other white voting groups. Almost two to one, Jews believe in the legal right to abortion.

19. This link is featured in a scene in a movie about a mid-nineteenth century Jew, The Frisco Kid, and in a scene in a movie about a modern Amish family, Witness.

The Magen David is a hexagram or six-pointed star. It appears as early as the Bronze Age and is at home in cultures and civilizations widely removed in time and geographic area. Mesopotamia, India, Greece, and Etruria are among the places where it has been found—but without any discoverable meaning. Possibly it was an ornament or had magical connotations. Only occasionally before the 1890s it is found in a Jewish context; the oldest Jewish example is from seventh-century B.C.E. [B.C.] Sidon, a seal belonging to one Joshua ben Asayahu. In the synagogue at Capernaum, Galilee, a synagogue which may date from the fourth century C.E. [A.D.], the Magen David is found alongside the pentagram and the swastika, but there is no reason to assume that the Magen David or the other signs on the synagogue stone frieze served any but decorative purposes.

In the Middle Ages, the Magen David appears quite frequently in the decorations of European and Islamic Hebrew manuscripts and even on some synagogues, but appears to have no distinct Jewish symbolic connotation; it is also found on the seals of the Christian kings of Navarre, on mediaeval church objects, and on cathedrals. As a matter of fact, what is today called Magen David was generally known as the Seal of Solomon in the Middle Ages, especially in Jewish, Christian and Islamic magical texts. In the medieval Islamic world the hexagram was popular and was widely used. Generally known, especially in Arab sources, as the Seal of Solomon, it gradually became linked with a magic ring or seal believed to give King Solomon control over demons. An early Jewish source in the Babylonian Talmud (Gittin 68a-b) already mentions it.

The hexagram and pentagram, it should be pointed out, both carried the designation “Seal of Solomon” and were employed in both Christianity and Islam as symbols with magical or amuletic power. On the parchment of many medieval mezuzot (capsules placed on the doorposts of every Jewish home) the hexagram and pentagram (Seal of Solomon) were written out and also served as a talisman or had magical powers to ward off evil spirits.²⁰

20. Joseph Gutmann, The Jewish Sanctuary (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1983), p. 21. This study is Section XXIII: Judaism, of the Iconography of Religions, produced by the Institute of Religious Iconography of the State University Groningen, Netherlands.

The point is, few Jews or gentiles are aware of any of this. That the flag of the state of Israel bears an ancient pagan symbol is not a well-known fact either to those who respect it or who resent it. In short, the vast majority of Christians and many Jews know very little about the history of Judaism. Jews and Christians are aware that their respective religious practices are quite different, yet not many of them know why, and to what extent, their religions differ. People speak of “the Judeo-Christian tradition,” yet they are not quite sure what this tradition is, or if it even exists.²¹

B. Rival Religions

I agree with the incomparably prolific (950 books) Orthodox Jew, Jacob Neusner, whose studies on Jewish law are as close to definitive as the writings of any one person can be.²² He wrote: “Judaism and Christianity are completely different religions, not different versions of one religion (that of the ‘Old Testament,’ or ‘the written Torah,’ as Jews call it). The two faiths stand for different people talking about different things to different people.”²³ He argued that the key differences center on the two rival programs: salvation (Christianity) vs. sanctification (Phariseeism). It is therefore also a debate over the issue of eschatology: God’s kingdom manifested in world history. Christianity is inherently universalistic; Judaism is inherently particularistic. Neusner wrote:

Salvation, in the nature of things, concerned the whole of humanity; sanctification, equally characteristic of its category, spoke of a single nation—Israel. To save, the messiah saves Israel amid all nations, because salvation characteristically entails the eschatological dimension and so encompasses all of history. No salvation, after all, can last only for a little while or leave space for time beyond itself. To sanctify, by contrast, the sage sanctifies Israel in particular. Sanctification categorically requires the designation of what is holy against what is not holy. To sanctify is to set apart. No sanctification can encompass everyone or leave no room for someone in particular to be holy. One need not be “holier than thou,” but the holy requires the 21. Arthur A. Cohen, The Myth of the Judeo-Christian Tradition (New York: Schocken, 1971). J. H. Hexter, The Judeo-Christian Tradition (New York: Harper & Row, 1966).

22. Jacob Neusner, History of the Mishna Laws, 5 parts, 43 volumes (Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill). He has written 950 books. (<http://bit.ly/JNbooks>)

23. Jacob Neusner, Jews and Christians: The Myth of a Common Tradition (London: SCM Press, 1991), p. 1.

contrary category, the not holy. So, once more, how can two religious communities understand one another when one raises the issue of the sanctification of Israel, and the other the salvation of the world?²⁴

Christianity, by adopting a view of salvation that necessarily encompasses all the nations of the earth, broke forever with rabbinic Judaism. This was the meaning of Jesus' analogy of new wine. "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles: else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved" (Matt. 9:17). Neusner was correct: Christianity is universalistic in scope and vision; Judaism is particularistic.

Neusner also contrasted sanctification with salvation. This is fundamentally incorrect. He missed what should be obvious: the Bible presents salvation as a process that necessarily involves both progressive personal sanctification and progressive institutional sanctification as history unfolds.²⁵ Biblical salvation is a comprehensive process.²⁶ This is a major aspect of its universalism. Christianity's doctrine of salvation (soteriology) is inescapably tied to its doctrine of progressive sanctification. This was especially true of Anglo-American Protestant missionary activity until the late nineteenth century.²⁷ Neusner is not alone in this error, however. The institutional-historical aspect of salvation has also been generally ignored by most Bible-believing Christian theologians in the twentieth century. They have not recognized the extent to which biblical soteriology, ethics, and eschatology are intertwined. By failing to grasp this fact, both rabbinic Judaism and modern fundamentalism have adopted ghetto mentalities.²⁸

If the debate between Jews and Christians with regard to the nature of covenantal society is inherently an ethical debate—ethics' sources and applications in history—then the key book in the history of Judaism is the Talmud. Christians need to be aware of it, but very

24. Ibid., pp. 5–6.

25. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

26. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C: "Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action." (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

27. J. A. De Jong, As the Waters Cover the Sea: Millennial Expectations in the rise of Anglo-American missions, 1640-1810 (Kampen, Netherlands: J. H. Kok, 1970).

28. Modern intellectual evangelicalism has generally adopted the prevailing humanist worldview. It has adopted a "we, too" view of social theory. See James Davison Hunter, Evangelicalism: The Coming Generation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987).

few are. It is not sufficient to go to the Old Testament to learn about Judaism. Judaism and Christianity both claim to go to the Old Testament; so does Islam. These three religions—not to mention their factions, sects, splinter groups, and offshoots—offer radically different interpretations of the Old Testament. We must therefore look briefly at the Talmud in order to get the sense of the theological and historical differences separating Orthodox Judaism and biblical Christianity.

C. The Talmud: A Closed Book, Even When Open²⁹

Most Christians have never heard of the Talmud. I have never met a Christian who claims to have read all of it, all 34 fat volumes. The Christian who may have heard of it but who has never read in it probably believes that it is a large Bible commentary on the Old Testament. I hope to show here that this assumption is incorrect.

The problem Christians face is that there is no work of serious yet forthright scholarship on the Talmud that is written by a Trinitarian, Bible-believing Christian. Alfred Edersheim, the mid-nineteenth-century convert from Judaism who taught at Oxford and who wrote The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah and Old Testament History, could have written such a work, but he chose not to, although his History of the Jewish Nation does include a 21-page section on Jewish law in the Talmud and Mishnah.³⁰ Under the section, "Jewish Theology," he admitted: "In attempting to arrange the doctrinal views of the Rabbins, we are bewildered by a mass of erroneous, blasphemous, and even contradictory statements."³¹ I would add: especially we find contradictory statements, for dialecticism is the reasoning process of the Talmud. Solomon Schechter's restrained comment in 1901 is accurate: "This indifference to logic and insensibility to theological consistency seems to be a vice from which not even the later successors of the Rabbis—the commentators of the Talmud—emancipated themselves en-

29. Israel Shenker referred to David Weiss' leisurely reading of it on vacations, without Weiss' normal line-by-line analysis, "as though it were an open book." Shenker, "A Life in the Talmud," New York Times Magazine (Sept. 11, 1977). Professor Robert L. Wilken of the University of Virginia called the Soncino edition of the Talmud a closed book: Insight (May 16, 1988).

30. Alfred Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation After the Destruction of Jerusalem Under Titus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, [1856] n.d.), pp. 361-81. Edersheim was ordained at age 21 in the Scottish Presbyterian Church, and was later ordained an Anglican. He wrote this book at age 30.

31. Ibid., p. 424.

tirely.”³² Or more impishly, “Whatever the faults of the Rabbis were, consistency was not one of them.”³³ Even today, there are remarkably few serious works on the Talmud in English written by Jews, and none of them that I have read even mentions the disturbing material that I will briefly refer to in this appendix.

1. What Is the Talmud?

The Babylonian Talmud is an immense compilation.³⁴ It has been well described by Jews as “the sea of the Talmud.” (Sargasso Sea is closer to it.) Jews have called it “the Great Labyrinth” and “Sphinx-like,”³⁵ which is getting even closer, given the occult roots of the labyrinth and its connection with the Sphinx.³⁶ R. Travers Herford, the Unitarian master (yet concealer) of the Talmud, described it as “a great wilderness.”³⁷ Few Christians have ever seen a set; almost no one reads it today, Christians or Jews. An unabridged version of the Talmud became available in English only in the early 1950s—about two generations after the vast majority of English-speaking Jews had ceased to pay any attention to it. It is 34 volumes long, plus a large index volume. Prior to the mid-twentieth century, it had been a hidden book to the English-speaking gentile world. As England’s chief rabbi, J. H. Hertz mentioned in his Foreword, “All the censored passages reappear in the Text or in the Notes.”³⁸ Earlier editions, most notably Michael Rodkinson’s (1903), had been voluntarily censored by their editors.

The Talmud is a compilation of the oral teachings of the rabbis from perhaps 200 years before Christ until the end of the second century, A.D. (Mishnah), plus an additional three hundred years of com-

32. Solomon Schechter, Aspects of Rabbinic Theology (New York: Schocken, [1901] 1961), p. 15.

33. Ibid., p. 46. Schechter was a leader in the Conservative movement of Judaism: Joseph Gaer and Rabbi Alfred Wolf, Our Jewish Heritage (Hollywood, California: Wilshire Book Co., 1957), p. 24.

34. The Jerusalem Talmud is much smaller and has never had impact on Judaism comparable to the Babylonian Talmud.

35. Jacob Schachter, “Talmudical Introductions Down to the Time of Chajes,” in Z. H. Chajes, The Student’s Guide Through the Talmud (London: East and West Library, 1952), p. xvi.

36. Appendix C.

37. R. Travers Herford, Christianity in Talmud and Midrash (London: Williams and Norgate, 1903), p. 1.

38. Hertz, “Foreword,” Baba Kamma, The Babylonian Talmud (London: Soncino Press, 1935), p. xxvii.

mentary (Gemara). The total is almost seven (possibly eight) centuries.³⁹ Those who adhere to the Talmud claim that this oral tradition extends back to Moses. They cite Exodus 24 as proof: "And Moses came and told the people all the words of the LORD, and all the judgments" (3a). Then we read, "And Moses wrote all the words of the LORD" (4a). But he did not write the judgments, they say; instead, the judgments became the oral law, taught from rabbi to rabbi down through the ages. An Orthodox Jewish rabbi believes that he can trace his line of teachers back to Moses.

What eventually became the authoritative version of this oral tradition was compiled by several Jewish authorities, but especially by Rabbi Judah, "the Prince," "the patriarch," HaNasi,⁴⁰ or just "Rabbi" (135–210 A.D.). He completed what later became known as the Mishnah sometime around 189.⁴¹ The word "completed" is somewhat misleading. Completed what? Some Jews have insisted that it was not written down in his day because it was considered by the Jews as a crime to do so. Wrote the Jewish historian Graetz: "Christendom had taken possession of the Holy Scriptures as its own spiritual property, and considered itself as the chosen part of Israel. According to the views of the times, Judaism was now possessed of no distinguishing feature, except the Oral Law."⁴² There is obviously some debate about this, however. Hermann Strack, a highly respected gentile German scholar of the Talmud, wrote: "Just how much of it was written by Rabbi himself is a subject of debate."⁴³ He used the verb "written," but he is judicious about referring directly to the writing down of the Mishnah, for that would mean coming to a conclusion, and Prof. Strack avoids conclusions like the plague.⁴⁴ He said that portions of the

39. Schachter, "Talmudical Introductions," in Chajes, Student's Guide Through the Talmud, p. xvi (footnote).

40. The Nasi or Prince was the head of the Sanhedrin. George Horowitz, The Spirit of Jewish Law (New York: Central Book Co., [1953] 1963), p. 628.

41. Graetz, History of the Jews, II, p. 460.

42. Ibid., II, p. 608.

43. Hermann Strack, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash (New York: Atheneum, [1931] 1983), p. 20. This book was first published in English by the Jewish Publication Society of America.

44. Anyone trying to read Strack's book will find how useless it is as an introduction. Only the most skilled Talmudic scholar could follow its reams of names without dates or summaries of their thought (ch. XIII), bibliography without evaluation (ch. XIV), and its lack of conclusions about anything. Here was a man who compiled a mountain of notes, and in five editions achieved little more than pasting this mass of notes together. There is hardly a glimmer of insight in any of it. This is Germanic scholarship at its worst: massive scholarly paraphernalia, little substance, and no con-

Mishnah had been written down both by Rabbi Akiba and his pupil Rabbi Meir in the early second century A.D., but not everything had been written down: "Great stress was laid on memorizing and retaining in memory the enormous material; witness the remark of Dosthai ben Jannai in the name of Meir: 'When a scholar forgets a single word of his Mishna, they account it to him as if he forfeited his life.'" ⁴⁵ He said that there had been earlier codifications than Akiba's. Graetz did not exaggerate when he wrote that "Concurrently with the Bible, the Mishna was the principal source of intellectual activity and research; it sometimes even succeeded in entirely supplanting the Scripture, and in asserting its claim to sole authority. It was the intellectual bond which held together the scattered members of the Jewish nation." ⁴⁶ I can think of another criticism of Judaism even more devastating than Graetz's: the Jews later chose the Talmud over the Mishnah, which at least had been vastly shorter.

2. Pharisees vs. Sadducees

The Pharisees were the Jewish rabbis who embraced the oral tradition as equal to the Old Testament; the Sadducees were priests who accepted the oral law's traditions but rejected the Pharisees' claim that the oral law is equally as binding as Scripture. ⁴⁷ The Jewish historian and former priest Josephus, who was alive at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, summarized the differences between the two, and his summary makes it clear why Jesus rejected both groups.

clusions. He labored mightily all his life, and brought forth a mouse. If you think I am exaggerating, you owe it to yourself to sit down and read it. I warn you: you won't make it through the first four chapters—not if you have any sense. You will never make it past the chapter on the Mishna. I prefer to play the role of the little boy who announced that the emperor had no clothes. Prof. Strack had no ideas. That a man's life could be wasted on such a project as futile as this one is pathetic. Hermann Strack is the one of the few scholars about whose book I can honestly say: "It is less useful than biblical higher criticism."

45. Ibid., p. 22.

46. Graetz, History, II, p. 462.

47. Jacob Z. Lauterbach, "The Sadducees and Pharisees" (1913); reprinted in Lauterbach, Rabbinic Essays (Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1951); J. H. Hertz, "Foreword," The Babylonian Talmud, Seder Nezikin (London: Soncino Press, 1935), p. xiv. Unitarian scholar R. Travers Herford wrote several sympathetic accounts of the tradition of the Pharisees, most notably The Pharisees (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1924); The Ethics of the Talmud: Sayings of the Fathers (New York: Schocken, [1945] 1962). The standard Jewish work on the Pharisees is Rabbi Louis Finkelstein's study, The Pharisees, 2 vols., 3rd ed. (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1963).

What I would now explain is this, that the Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from their fathers, which are not written in the law of Moses; and for that reason it is that the Sadducees reject them, and say that we are to esteem those observances to be obligatory which are in the written word, but are not to observe what are derived from the tradition of our forefathers. . . .⁴⁸

. . . the Pharisees are those who are esteemed most skillful in the exact explication of their laws, and introduce the first sect. They ascribe all to fate [or providence,] and to God, and yet allow, that to act what is right, or the contrary, is principally in the power of men, although fate does co-operate in every action. They say that all souls are incorruptible; but that the souls of good men are only removed into other bodies,—but that the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment. But the Sadducees are those who compose the second order, and take away fate entirely, and suppose that God is not concerned in our doing or not doing what is evil; and they say, that to act what is good, or what is evil, is at men's own choice, and that the one or the other belongs so to every one, that they may act as they please. They also take away the belief of the immortal duration of the soul, and the punishments and rewards in Hades.⁴⁹

The Sadducees' influence faded rapidly after the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70. Herbert Danby, whose English translation of the Mishnah is still considered authoritative by the scholarly world, both Jewish and gentile, commented on the undisputed triumph of the Pharisees after the fall of Jerusalem (which lives on as Orthodox Judaism): "Until the destruction of the Second Temple in A.D. 70 they had counted as one only among the schools of thought which played a part in Jewish national and religious life; after the Destruction they took the position, naturally and almost immediately, of sole and undisputed leaders of such Jewish life as survived. Judaism as it has continued since is, if not their creation, at least a faith and a religious institution largely of their fashioning; and the Mishnah is the authoritative record of their labour. Thus it comes about that while Judaism and Christianity alike venerate the Old Testament as canonical Scripture, the Mishnah marks the passage to Judaism as definitely as the New Testament marks the passage to Christianity." Neusner was correct when he served that "the rabbis of late antiquity rewrote in their own image and 48. Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, Bk. XIII, Ch. X, Sect. 6. William Whiston translation, 1737.

49. Josephus, Wars of the Jews, Bk. II, Ch. VIII, Sect. 14.

likeness the entire Scripture and history of Israel, dropping whole eras as though they had never been, ignoring vast bodies of old Jewish writing, inventing whole new books for the canon of Judaism. . . ."⁵⁰

The supremacy of the Mishnah after A.D. 70 meant the triumph of the Pharisees. Similarly, in the modern era, the waning of the Mishnah in Judaism has meant the waning of the Pharisees' spiritual heirs, Orthodox Jews.

Again, the Mishnah is the written version of the Jews' oral tradition, while the rabbis' comments on it are called Gemara. The Talmud contains both Mishnah and Gemara. The rabbinical comments comprise the bulk of the Talmud. Danby's standard translation of the Mishnah is one long volume. The Soncino Press edition of the Talmud is 34 volumes, plus the index.

3. The Torah

When Jews speak of "Torah,"⁵¹ they do not always mean the Old Testament or even the Pentateuch. Sometimes they mean something much broader. Christians are generally unaware of this broader usage, which leads them to believe that Orthodox Jews are somehow Christians without Christ, or Unitarians who believe in miracles and angels, i.e., people who believe in the Old Testament by itself. They think of Orthodox Jews as undeveloped Christians, theological first cousins who were publicly disinherited in A.D. 70. They have missed the point of Jesus' absolute challenge to the Pharisees.

Orthodox Judaism constitutes a rival religion that developed alongside the early church. The Pharisees insisted that the oral law is equal to the written law, as surely as Christians insist that the New Testament is as authoritative as the Old Testament, the Muslims insist that the Koran is as authoritative as the Old Testament, and the Mormons insist that the Book of Mormon is as authoritative as the Old Testament. Each group really means that its unique post-Old Testament document is more authoritative now than the Old Testament is. No major religion since the fall of Jerusalem has taken the Old Testament as its sole or even primary authoritative document. Only the Karaite sect of Judaism has pretended to.⁵²

50. Neusner, "Two Faiths Talking," World & I, op. cit., p. 690.

51. "Direction, instruction, doctrine, law": Oxford English Dictionary.

52. The tiny Karaite sect, begun in the mid-eighth century, openly opposed the oral law until the nineteenth century, when Reform Judaism began to take hold of Judaism. The Karaites never became influential. For this entire period, Rabbi Chajes'

The rabbinic Torah is very different from the Old Testament. Danby comments: "It includes the Written Law, the laws explicitly recorded in the Five Books of Moses; it includes also 'the traditions of the elders' or the Oral Law, namely, such beliefs and religious practices as piety and custom had in the course of centuries, consciously or unconsciously, grafted on to or developed out of the Written Law; and it includes yet a third, less tangible element, a spirit of development, whereby Written Law and Oral Law, in spite of seeming differences, are brought into a unity and interpreted and reinterpreted to meet the needs of changed conditions."⁵³ In short, there are three elements that comprise the Torah: the Old Testament, the oral law, and casuistry.⁵⁴

The two primary questions that I am raising in this appendix are these: 1) Is traditional Judaism's casuistry even remotely biblical? 2) Is it the product of an anti-Old Testament perspective?

4. Dialecticism and Dualism

Dialecticism is that approach to human knowledge which insists that all truths are inherently opposed to each other. Dialecticism is to human logic what Manichaeism is to cosmology: the assertion of the eternal struggle of opposites. Whenever we discover dialecticism in questions regarding epistemology—"What can man know, and how can he know it?"—we should also begin our search for traces of ethical dualism, the idea that there is one set of ethical standards for the elite, and another set for those on the outside, the "uninitiated." Exodus 12:49 denies the legitimacy of judicial dualism: "One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you." The Old Testament placed everyone in Israel under the same law. God required all the people to assemble one year in seven and listen to a public reading of the whole law: "Gather the people togethmid-nineteenth-century assessment is representative of the preceding seventeen centuries of Judaism: "Allegiance to the authority of the said rabbinic tradition is binding upon all sons of Israel, since these explanations and interpretations have come down to us by word of mouth from generation to generation, right from the time of Moses. They have been transmitted to us precise, correct, and unadulterated, and he who does not give his adherence to the unwritten law and the rabbinic tradition has no right to share the heritage of Israel; he belongs to the Sadducees or the Karaites who severed connection to us long ago." Chajes, Student's Guide Through the Talmud, p. 4.

53. Danby, Introduction, Mishnah, pp. xiii–xiv.

54. For a detailed discussion of these additions to the written law of the Old Testament, see R. Travers Herford, Talmud and Apocrypha (London: Soncino, 1933), pp. 66–69. Herford was a Unitarian scholar; Soncino Press is the Jewish publishing house that published the official and unabridged English-language Talmud.

er, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the LORD your God, and observe to do all the words of this law: And that their children, which have not known any thing, may hear, and learn to fear the LORD your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it" (Deuteronomy 31:12–13). All people were expected to be able to understand the specifics and the principles of God's law, "the letter and the spirit." All residents were equal under God's law.

The judicial principle of equality before the civil law made Israel unique in ancient history. Other nations, including Greece and Rome, did not grant non-citizens equal status under the law. Foreigners and resident aliens were not members of the families and clans that alone could lawfully participate in the rites of the city; therefore, they were not entitled to protection by the civil law.⁵⁵ Not so in ancient Israel.

This judicial principle of equality before the law is basic to the Bible's lex talionis principle of "eye for eye." Rabbinic Judaism denies it. For example, a gentile who so much as strikes a Jew is worthy of death. "R. Hanina said: If a heathen smites a Jew, he is worthy of death, for it is written, And he looked this way and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian. R. Hanina also said: He who smites an Israelite on the jaw, is as though he had thus assaulted the Divine Presence; for it is written, One who smiteth man [i.e. an Israelite] attacketh the Holy One."⁵⁶

This view of the inherent inequality of all men before God's law is a denial of God's command not to respect persons:

Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it (Deut. 1:17).

Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous (Deut. 16:19).

To distinguish different proper penalties for striking Jews as opposed to striking gentiles elevates the Jews to a position of an international elite. This is in accord with Talmudic reasoning. The Talmud 55. Numa Denis Fustel de Coulanges, The Ancient City (Garden City, New York: Anchor, [1864] 1955).

56. Sanhedrin 58b.

offers this doctrine of God's common grace to all men: "All the families of the earth, even the other families who live on the earth are blessed only for Israel's sake. All the nations of the earth, even the ships that go down from Gaul to Spain are blessed only for Israel's sake."⁵⁷

5. Dialecticism vs. Casuistry

The Talmud is just about useless for writing a Bible commentary, not simply because it is such a difficult set of books to use by Jews or gentiles, but also because the large number of comments by the rabbis are so often very brief, and so often contradictory to each other. A self-conscious dialecticism underlies the Talmud: endless debate without authoritative or logical reconciliation. Dialecticism is one aspect of Judaism's tradition of deliberate secrecy, a tradition adopted by Maimonides in the style of his Guide of the Perplexed.⁵⁸

A good example of this Talmudic dialecticism is the debate over whether gentiles should be allowed to read the Torah (the five books of Moses). Consider the saying of Rabbi Johanan, on which Maimonides' assertion cited at the beginning of this appendix is based: "R. [Rabbi] Johanan said: A heathen who studies the Torah deserves death, for it is written, Moses commanded us a law for an inheritance; it is our inheritance, not theirs." Johanan was one of the most prestigious of the rabbis, a disciple of Hillel (late first century B.C.).⁵⁹ Yet in the same paragraph is recorded the saying of Rabbi Meir, an equally prestigious authority, both jurist and preacher, from the second century A.D.: "... even a heathen who studies the Torah is as a High Priest!" So, which is it? Maimonides sided with Johanan, but he could as easily have sided with Meir. This is the main problem in assessing the ethical pronouncements of the Talmud. There is seldom any effective resolution of conflicting viewpoints. This is the characteristic feature of the Talmud: a mountain of brief, sometimes outlandish statements, without any coherent resolution. Paul, a former Pharisee (Phil. 3:5), warned Titus regarding such speculation: "But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are

57. Yehamoth 63a.

58. "... Maimonides deliberately contradicts himself, and if a man declares both that a is b and that a is not b, he cannot be said to declare anything." Leo Strauss, "How to Read The Guide of the Perplexed," in Moses Maimonides, The Guide of the Perplexed, 2 vols., trans. Shlomo Pines (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963), p. xv.

59. Sanhedrin 59a.

unprofitable and vain" (Titus 3:9). Thirty-four fat volumes of this material is wearying to the soul.

The rabbis were often incredibly obscure, in stark contrast to the clear statements of the biblical texts. This was a major point of conflict between Sadducees and Pharisees before the destruction of Jerusalem: the Sadducees believed that the texts of the Torah are clear.⁶⁰ Writes Lauterbach of the Sadducees: "They would not devise ingenious methods to explain away a written law or give it a new meaning not warranted by the plain sense of the words."⁶¹ The Pharisees disagreed with the Sadducees on this method of interpretation, and the Talmud is the book of the Pharisees. Its comments are often contrary to the biblical text. For example, what are we to make of this comment, obviously an application of Leviticus 18:23 and 21:7, the prohibition on bestiality? "R. [Rabbi] Shimi b. [son of] Hiyya stated: A woman who had intercourse with a beast is eligible to marry a priest."⁶² The footnote by the modern Soncino Press commentator makes it even worse: "Even a High Priest." The Old Testament sets forth this rule for the high priest: "And he shall take a wife in her virginity. A widow, or a divorced woman, or profane, or an harlot, these shall he not take: but he shall take a virgin of his own people to wife" (Lev. 21:13–14). Are we being asked by the rabbis to regard as a virgin a woman who has committed bestiality?

Major university libraries will generally have a complete set of the Soncino Press Babylonian Talmud. Because very few English-speaking Christians or Jews have ever even seen a set of the Talmud, let alone read in it, they owe it to themselves to locate a set, open at random in any volume, and carefully read five consecutive pages. Just five pages; that will be sufficient. As they read, they will repeatedly ask themselves this question: "What in the world is this all about?" Then will come a second question: "How can anyone make sense of this?" Most of all, this question: "What has any of this got to do with the Old Testament?"

60. Lauterbach, "Sadducees and Pharisees," Rabbinical Essays, p. 31.

61. Ibid., p. 32. The Sadducees were not "proto-Christians," however. They did not believe in the resurrection of the dead, for example, which is why Paul successfully divided the crowd of hostile Jews by claiming that he was being persecuted simply because he accepted the idea of the resurrection (Acts 23:6–10).

62. Babylonian Talmud, Yebamoth 5gb.

6. "You Have Heard It Said"

Orthodox Judaism is not simply "Old Testament theology without Jesus." It is the religion of "You have heard it said." This was Jesus' repeated response to the erroneous oral teachings of the Pharisees. We can do the same as we read the Talmud. For example:

"You have heard it said that gentiles who oppose Israel spend eternity in the nether world being boiled in semen, while Christians spend eternity with Jesus in boiling excrement,⁶³ but I say unto you that the New Testament teaches of a far worse eternity for covenant-breakers."

Or: "You have heard it said that Adam had intercourse with every beast of the field before cohabiting with Eve,⁶⁴ but I tell you that bestiality is a great sin before God."

Or: "You have heard it said that a homosexual who seduces a boy under the age of nine need have no guilt, while others have argued that age three is the minimum,⁶⁵ but I say unto you that anyone who does

63. Babylonian Talmud, Gittin 56b–57a. The text tells a story of a sorcerer, Onkelos son of Kolonikos: "He then went and raised Balaam by incantations. He asked him: Who is in repute in the other world? He replied: Israel. What then, he said, about joining them? He replied: Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever. He then asked: What is your punishment? He replied: With boiling hot semen. He then went and raised by incantations the sinners of Israel. He asked them: Who is in repute in the other world? They replied: Israel. What about joining them? They replied: Seek their welfare, seek not their harm. Whoever touches them touches the apple of his eye. He said: What is your punishment? They replied: With boiling hot excrement, since a Master has said: Whoever mocks at the words of the Sages is punished with boiling hot excrement."

What has all this got to do with Christ and Christians? Everything. The entry for "Jesus" in The Jewish Encyclopedia says that the name of Balaam refers to Jesus, who was "the prototype of Jesus." It specifically cites this passage in the Talmud, Gittin 56a–57b, and it equates "the sinners of Israel" with Jesus. It says of Onkelos, "He asked Jesus: 'Who is esteemed in that world?' Jesus said: 'Israel.' 'Shall one join: them?' Jesus said to him: 'Further their well-being; do nothing to their detriment; whoever touches them touches even the apple of His eye.'" Jewish Encyclopedia, 12 vols. (New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1904), VII, p. 172.

64. "R. [Rabbi] Eleazar further stated: What is meant by the Scriptural text, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh? This teaches that Adam had inter course with every beast and animal but found no satisfaction until he cohabited with Eve." Babylonian Talmud, Yebamoth 63a. Eleazar was an important scholar of the oral law in the years immediately following the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

65. "Rab said: Pederasty with a child below nine years of age is not deemed as pederasty with a child above that. Samuel said: Pederasty with a child below three years is not treated as with a child above that." Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 54b. The modern commentator's note explains: "Rab makes nine years the minimum; but if one this should be executed, as required by biblical law.”

Did you read the footnotes? This is only the beginning, but it should be sufficient. You now recognize that the Talmud is not a conventional commentary on the Old Testament, although with certain key New Testament concepts missing. On the contrary, the Talmud's contents are only peripherally related to the Old Testament. The Talmud is a giant exercise in finding ways to escape the Old Testament texts. The Pharisees were in rebellion against God's law, all in the name of God's law. This was Jesus' assertion from the beginning:

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves. Woe unto you, ye blind guides, which say, Whosoever shall swear by the temple, it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gold of the temple, he is a debtor! Ye fools and blind: for whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that sanctifieth the gold? And, Whosoever shall swear by the altar, it is nothing; but whosoever sweareth by the gift that is upon it, he is guilty. Ye fools and blind: for whether is greater, the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift? Whoso therefore shall swear by the altar, sweareth by it, and by all things thereon. And whoso shall swear by the temple, sweareth by it, and by him that dwelleth therein. And he that shall swear by heaven, sweareth by the throne of God, and by him that sitteth thereon. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! For ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess. Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them may be clean also. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness (Matthew 23:24–27).

What the average Christian does not suspect is that modern Or-committed sodomy with a child of lesser age, no guilt is incurred. Samuel makes three the minimum.” Rab is the nickname of Rabbi Abba Arika (175?–247 A.D.), the founder of the Jewish academy in the Persian city of Sura [Sora], one of the three great Jewish academies in Persia. Samuel was Mar-Samuel (180–257 A.D.), Rab's contemporary and fellow teacher at Sura, a master of Jewish civil law. See Heinrich Graetz, History of the Jews, II, pp. 512–22.

thodox Jews are the self-conscious and self-proclaimed spiritual heirs of the Pharisees. This is what distinguishes them in their own eyes from Conservative Jews and Reform Jews.

D. Departing From the Old Testament Texts

This tradition of departing from the biblical text was maintained by medieval Jewish commentators. S. M. Lehrman is quite forthright about this: "To the rabbis, it was a trivial criticism that at times their explanations were somewhat remote from the actual literary meaning (peshat) of the text they sought to illuminate. Surely, the thing that mattered most was to make the Scriptures a living book with a message for all times."⁶⁶ If this really is what matters most, then the Talmud failed. Men cannot depart from the original meaning of the text without killing the Torah.⁶⁷

David Weiss, formerly an Orthodox Jew but now a professor at the Conservative Jewish Theological Seminary,⁶⁸ is a master of the Talmud, the model for the character David Malter in Chaim Potok's novel, The Promise. He has devoted his academic career to a detailed study of the various versions of the Talmud in an attempt to piece together the true text. This discipline is what Christians call "lower criticism" when applied to biblical texts. Here is how Weiss describes the effective use of the Talmud: "With one hand you acknowledge God's existence. At the same time, you want to have some maneuverability. Studying critically is contending with God's writ—acknowledging it but using criticism to alter it. Man is powerless vis-a-vis God and powerful vis-a-vis His Torah. There he can assert his independence by offering an interpretation different from the one God intended."⁶⁹

It was this approach to Old Testament law that Jesus publicly challenged. This is the heart and soul of Phariseeism. The rabbinic compilers of Jewish oral law or "Unwritten Torah" (Mishnah) understood 66. S. M. Lehrman, The World of the Midrash (London: Thomas Yoseloff, 1961), p. 11.

67. What makes the Bible unique among all books is its permanent ethical applicability within a world of historical change. This is because it is the word of God. It applies perpetually because it is valid eternally. No other document in man's history has possessed or can possess this characteristic.

68. "Like the Orthodox, the Conservatives accept the Torah; but, unlike the Orthodox, they do not necessarily accept it as of divine origin." Gaer and Wolf, Our Jewish Heritage, p. 25.

69. Israel Shenker, "A Life in the Talmud," New York Times Magazine (Sept. 11, 1977).

what they were doing; substituting the speculations of men for the “low maneuverability” biblical texts. The compilers of the rabbis’ comments on the Mishnah (Gemara) also understood what they were doing. The Talmud is the product of their compiling of Mishnah and Gemara. The fundamental premise of the Talmud is incorrect: that it is more meritorious to read the Mishnah and Talmud than to read the Old Testament. “Our rabbis taught: They who occupy themselves with the Bible [alone] are but of indifferent merit; with Mishnah, are indeed meritorious, and are rewarded for it; with Gemara—there can be nothing more meritorious; yet run always to the Mishnah more than to the Gemara. Now, this is self-contradictory.”⁷⁰ This, by the way, is an example of the dialecticism that is basic to the Talmud.

E. A Most Peculiar Book

Orthodox Jews believe that the Talmud is an inspired book. They do not treat it as “folklore.” They treat it as authoritative.

The Old Testament forbade Molech worship. “And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Molech, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD” (Leviticus 18:21). This is repeated in Leviticus 20:2–5. What does the Talmud say about this practice?

MISHNAH. HE WHO GIVES OF HIS SEED TO MOLECH INCURS NO PUNISHMENT UNLESS HE DELIVERS IT TO MOLECH AND CAUSES IT TO PASS THROUGH THE FIRE. IF HE GAVE IT TO MOLECH BUT DID NOT CAUSE IT TO PASS THROUGH THE FIRE, OR THE REVERSE, HE INCURS NO PENALTY, UNLESS HE DOES BOTH. [The Mishnah is always in capital letters in the Talmud—G. N.]

GEMARA. The Mishnah teaches idolatry and giving to Molech. R. Abin said: Our Mishnah is in accordance with the view that Molech worship is not idolatry. . . . R. Simeon said: If to Molech, he is liable; if to another idol, he is not.⁷¹

R. Aha the son of Raba said: If one caused all his seed to pass through [the fire] to Molech, he is exempt from punishment, because it is written, of thy seed implying, but not all thy seed.⁷² This approach to ethics and civil law has become known as “Talmudic reasoning.”

70. Baba Mezia 33a.

71. Sanhedrin 64a.

72. Sanhedrin 64b.

Much of the Talmud's space is devoted to diet. For example, it says that eating dates makes a person ineligible to render a legal decision. “Rab said: If one has eaten dates, he should not give a legal decision. An objection was raised. Dates are wholesome morning and evening, in the afternoon they are bad, at noon they are incomparable. . . .”⁷³ To cure swollen glands, eat the dust from the shadow of a privy. “To make the flesh close he should bring dust from the shadow of a privy and knead it with honey and eat. This is effective.”⁷⁴ Bladder stones are dealt with as follows: “For stone in the bladder let him take three drops of tar and three drops of leek juice and three drops of clear wine and pour it on the membrum of a man or on the corresponding place in a woman. Alternatively he can take the ear of a bottle and hang it on the membrum of a man or on the breasts of a woman. Or again he can take a purple thread which has been spun by a woman of ill repute or the daughter of a woman of ill repute and hang it on the membrum of a man or the breasts of a woman. Or again he can take a louse from a man and a woman and hang it on the membrum of a man and the corresponding place in a woman; and when he makes water he should do so on dry thorns near the socket of the door, and he should preserve the stone that issues, as it is good for all fevers.”⁷⁵

It offers very specific explanations of the origins of specific diseases. Consider the causes of epilepsy: “And do not stand naked in front of a lamp, for it was taught: He who stands naked in front of a lamp will be an epileptic, and he who cohabits by the light of a lamp will have epileptic children.”⁷⁶

It offers comments on such seemingly trivial topics as the proper disposal of fingernails, and the consequences of ignoring this advice. “Three things were said in reference to nails: One who buries them is righteous; one who burns them is pious and one who throws them away is a villain! What is the reason? Lest a pregnant woman should step over them and miscarry.”⁷⁷

The Old Testament's teaching on how people should deal with sin is very clear: “He that covereth his sins shall not prosper: but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy” (Proverbs 28:13).

73. Kethuboth 11a.

74. Gittin 69a.

75. Gittin 69b.

76. Peshaim 112b.

77. Moed Katan 18a.

"Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil" (Isaiah 1:16). There is no second strategy. The Talmud suggests a second strategy: "For R. Ilai says, If one sees that his [evil] yezer is gaining sway over him, let him go away where he is not known; let him put on sordid clothes, don a sordid wrap and do the sordid deed that his heart desires rather than profane the name of Heaven openly."⁷⁸

The wages of sins not recorded in the Book of Judges: "That wicked wretch [Sisera] had sevenfold intercourse [with Jael] at that time, as it says, At her feet he sunk, he fell, he lay; etc."⁷⁹

A way to get even with one's enemies: "In R. Judah's opinion the snake's poison is lodged in its fangs; therefore, one who causes it to bite [by placing its fangs against the victim's flesh] is decapitated, whilst the snake itself is exempt. But in the view of the Sages the snake emits the poison of its own accord; therefore the snake is stoned, whilst he who caused it to bite is exempt."⁸⁰

Binding, you may bind: "Raba said: If one bound his neighbor and he died of starvation, he is not liable to execution Raba also said: If he bound him before a lion, he is not liable"⁸¹

Their view of women: "ENGAGE NOT IN TOO MUCH CONVERSATION WITH WOMEN. THEY SAID THIS WITH REGARD TO ONE'S OWN WIFE, HOW MUCH MORE [DOES THE RULE APPLY] WITH REGARD TO ANOTHER MAN'S WIFE."⁸² Maimonides' comments do not make the passage any more acceptable: "It is a known thing that for the most part conversation with women has to do with sexual matters."⁸³ This view is consistent with the Talmud's general view of women: "The world cannot do without either males or females. Yet happy is he whose children are males, and alas for him whose children are females."⁸⁴ At least one section of the Talmud questions the wisdom of instructing women in the law: "How then do we know that others are not commanded to teach her?—Because it is written, 'And ye shall teach them your sons'—but not your

78. Mo'ed Katan 17a.

79. Nazir 23b.

80. Sanhedrin 78a.

81. Sanhedrin 77a.

82. Aboth, Chap. I. This is the famous Pierke Aboth, or "Sayings of the Fathers."

83. Cited by Judah Goldin, The Living Talmud (University of Chicago Press, 1957), p. 55.

84. Baba Bathra 16b.

daughters."⁸⁵

1. The Question of Circumcision

Most important of all is circumcision, the Talmud says.

It was taught: Rabbi said, Great is circumcision, for none so ardently busied himself with [God's] precepts as our Father Abraham, yet he was called perfect only in virtue of circumcision, as it is written, "Walk before me and be thou perfect, and it is written, And I will make my covenant between me and thee. Another version [of Rabbi's teaching] is this: Great is circumcision, for it counter-balances all the [other] precepts of the Torah, as it is written, For after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel. Another version is: Great is circumcision, since but for it heaven and earth would not endure, as it is written, *[Thus saith the Lord,] But for my covenant by day and night, I would not have appointed the ordinances of Heaven and earth.*⁸⁶

Contrast these words with Paul's: "But as God hath distributed to every man, as the Lord hath called everyone, so let him walk. And so ordain I in all churches. Is any man called being circumcised? Let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? Let him not be circumcised. Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God" (I Cor. 7:17–19). He warned all men that the issue of life and death is obedience to the God who imposed the requirement of circumcision on the Jews.

For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law: but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision? And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfil the law, judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law? For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God (Rom. 2:25–29).

This is why he could write of Christians: "For we are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. 3: 3).

85. Kiddushin 29b.

86. Nedarim 32a.

It should not be surprising that there has been a conflict of views for almost two millennia between Talmudic Jews and Christians. The two religions are very different. Jesus summarized these irreconcilable differences with His words, "you have heard it said . . . but I say unto you."⁸⁷ Paul, a former Pharisee, was even more blunt:

For there are many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, specially they of the circumcision: Whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake. One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said, The Cretians are alway liars, evil beasts, slow bellies. This witness is true. Wherefore rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith; Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and commandments of men, that turn from the truth. Unto the pure all things are pure: but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled. They profess that they know God; but in works they deny him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate (Titus 1:10–16).

2. Printing Makes a Difference

When a gentile reads the Talmud or Talmud-related writings, he necessarily enters into Talmudforbidden ground. If study by gentiles of the written Torah itself is forbidden by Talmudic law, then surely the once-secret Jewish oral tradition of the Torah is prohibited. But when the Talmud is made available in vernacular languages by those who are still believers in its sacred character, as has been done in this century, the traditional criticisms against gentiles who read it necessarily fade. Perhaps even more obviously to those who have struggled through as few as three consecutive pages of the Talmud, by making available a comprehensive index, its defenders in principle thereby "opened the book." Its English-language translators, editors, and publisher have moved the Talmud from the world of religion exclusively to the world of open scholarship. This has clearly modified the ancient rules.

Of course, this has always been the dilemma of Talmudic Judaism. Maimonides faced it when he wrote A Guide of the Perplexed (1190). Leo Strauss is correct: the Guide is devoted to "the difficulties of the Law" or to "the secrets of the law": "Yet the Law whose secrets Maimonides intends to explain forbids that they be explained in public, or to the public; they may only be explained in private and only to such individuals as possess both theoretical and political wisdom as well as the capacity of both understanding and using allusive speech; for only 'the chapter headings' of the secret teaching may be transmitted even to those who belong to the natural elite. Since every explanation given in writing, at any rate in a book, is a public explanation, Maimonides seems to be compelled by his intention to transgress the Law."⁸⁸ Maimonides was quite forthright about this need for secrecy:

87. I have relied in this section on the summaries and photocopies of 163 passages in the English-language Talmud which was published in Christian News (July 25, 1988 and August 1, 1988), a conservative Lutheran tabloid: P.O. Box 168, New Haven, Missouri.

For my purpose is that the truths be glimpsed and then again be concealed, so as not to oppose that divine purpose which one cannot possibly oppose and which has concealed from the vulgar among the people those truths especially requisite for His apprehension. As He has said: The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him [Ps. 25:14]. Know that with regard to natural matters as well, it is impossible to give a clear exposition when teaching some of their principles as they are. For you know the saying of [the Sages], may their memory be blessed: The Account of the Beginning ought not to be taught in the presence of two men [Babylonian Talmud, Hagigah, 11b]. Now if someone explained all those matters in a book, he in effect would be teaching them to thousands of men. Hence these matters too occur in parables in the books of prophecy. The Sages, may their memory be blessed, following the train of these books, likewise have spoken of them in riddles and parables, for there is a close connection between these matters and the divine science, and they too are secrets of that divine science.⁸⁹

In speaking about very obscure matters it is necessary to conceal some parts and to disclose others. Sometimes in the case of certain dicta this necessity requires that the discussion proceed on the basis of a certain premise, whereas in another place necessity requires that the discussion proceed on the basis of another premise contradicting

88. Strauss, "How to Begin to Study The Guide of the Perplexed," in Maimonides, Guide of the Perplexed, p. xiv. Strauss argues that Maimonides overcame this restriction by adopting literary techniques that made the Guide itself a secret writing: p. vx. It was Maimonides' emphasis on secrecy and rigorous writing that influenced the Jewish political theorist Strauss and his followers, of whom Pines is one. Political philosopher and former U. S. Senator John P. East insisted that Strauss "cast himself in the role of a modern Maimonides"; this can be seen in Strauss' book, Persecution in the Art of Writing (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, [1952] 1973). Cf. John P. East, "Leo Strauss and American Conservatism," Modern Age, XXI (Winter 1977), p. 7; Archie P. Jones, "Apologists of Classical Tyranny: An Introductory Critique of Straussianism," Journal of Christian Reconstruction, V (Summer 1978), pp. 112–14.

89. Maimonides, Guide 3b–4a; pp. 6–7.

the first one. In such cases the vulgar must in no way be aware of the contradiction; the author accordingly uses some device to conceal it by all means.⁹⁰

There may be Orthodox Jews who will criticize me for going to the Talmud and extracting these embarrassing passages for the purpose of public disclosure and debate. They may say that I am misinterpreting these passages because I am not familiar with another oral teaching tradition that somehow explains away these passages. This would imply that there is a still more secret tradition. Even if this criticism is correct—that a consistent, universally agreed-upon secondary secret oral teaching does exist which explains the primary oral (now translated and printed) once-secret tradition—and even if this additional secret oral teaching does offer interpretations that somehow make these passages in the Talmud appear morally acceptable, all of which I sincerely doubt, Orthodox Jews must then face the reality of any appeal to yet another oral tradition. A tradition of secondary oral explanations and glosses on a 1500-year-old written version (the Talmud) of an authoritative ancient oral tradition is not going to be regarded by outsiders (or even Orthodox Jewish insiders, I suspect) as equally authoritative. What is printed eventually becomes authoritative, especially in the field of civil and criminal law. Lawyers and casuists appeal to known written sources. The Talmud stands as written.

Orthodox Judaism by 1952 had at long last provided the English-speaking public with an officially sanctioned, expensively published version of the Talmud: seemingly unexpurgated, fully annotated, and professionally edited. Until the era of the Industrial Revolution, the Talmud was regarded by all Jews except a handful of Karaites as the sacred oral tradition of Judaism. Orthodox Jews should therefore not object when a gentile reads the Talmud, cites it verbatim, and criticizes it whenever he can demonstrate that it is obviously at odds with non-Talmudic morality. What else did they expect when they published it? They should refrain from criticizing gentiles who are critical of the Talmud's ethics unless they are prepared to discuss these issues in public without appealing to the escape hatch of an even more authoritative secret oral tradition which cannot lawfully be revealed.

3. Debating Ethical Standards

Why should Orthodox Jews be surprised or even upset when non-

90. Guide 10b; p. 18.

Jews react strongly against the Talmud's teaching, for example, that it is legitimate for a man to have sexual relations with a little girl, just so long as she is under the age of three? The Mishnah says: "WHEN A GROWN-UP MAN HAS HAD SEXUAL INTERCOURSE WITH A LITTLE GIRL, OR WHEN A SMALL BOY HAS HAD INTERCOURSE WITH A GROWN-UP WOMAN, OR [WHEN A GIRL WAS ACCIDENTALLY] INJURED BY A PIECE OF WOOD [IN ALL CASES] THEIR KETHUBAH IS TWO HUNDRED [ZUZ]; SO ACCORDING TO R. MEIR."⁹¹ Then the Gemara explains: "It means this: When a grown-up man has intercourse with a little girl it is nothing, for when the girl is less than this [annotation: "Lit., 'here', that is, less than three years old"] it is as if one puts a finger into the eye; . . . "⁹² Should Orthodox Jews really expect Christians to accept the moral validity of such a teaching? Surely the vast majority of Jews today would reject it if they knew about it, which they do not.

As I said earlier, it might be argued that the rabbis were not really arguing for such a seemingly grotesque ethical principle, that it was all some sort of hypothetical debate. This particular debate in the Talmud concerned the kethubah. The kethubah was a deed given by a husband to his bride which specified that if he divorced her, she would receive a monetary payment. The minimum payment was 200 zuzim⁹³ for virgins, but only 100 zuzim for non-virgins.⁹⁴ A defender of the Talmud might argue that what the Mishnah really teaches is the perfectly reasonable principle that very young girls who are subjected to the kinds of intercourse described in the text are to be considered as virgins. While it would be possible to argue that this law's ethical concern focuses only on the innocence of the girl under three year old who is sexually abused, and that the words "it is nothing" refer only to her, and not to her abuser, then the question inevitably arises: What about the girl aged three years and older? Why treat a four-year-old sexually abused girl as a willing fornicator for the purposes of establishing her kethubah price? Furthermore, why treat as a virgin an adult woman who deliberately has had sexual relations with a small boy who is "less than nine years of age,"⁹⁵ as the annotator says?

Christians do not ask such questions today. Therefore, Jews do not

91. Kethuboth 11a.

92. Kethuboth 11b.

93. The smallest Jewish coin was the zuz.

94. Cf. "Ketubbah," in The Principles of Jewish Law, edited by Menachem Elan (Jerusalem: Keter, [1975?]), col. 387.

95. Kethuboth 11a.

answer them. The fact is, virtually all modern Christian scholars—at least those who publish—are completely unfamiliar with the passages in the Talmud that I have cited in this essay, and Jews do not try to defend such passages; they remain discreetly silent. There has been a kind of implicit cease-fire agreement regarding the ethical details of the Talmud, and a willingness on both sides to limit all discussions of the ethics of traditional Judaism and especially the Talmud to general ethical principles that have been derived from the less controversial passages. So, over the years, the Talmud has fallen into the shadows. Most Jews do not read it any more. Yet it is only here that we find a detailed account of what Paul calls “the traditions of my fathers” (Gal. 1:14).

4. Concealment and Initiation

Jews for many centuries hid the Talmud from the eyes of gentiles. They correctly surmised that Christian leaders would be shocked and outraged if they thought that such teachings were the basis of the autonomous civil legal order that Jews enjoyed through most of medieval history. From time to time, the authorities ordered the confiscation and burning of copies of the Talmud. Rabbi Trattner provides a list of about two dozen of these edicts, from 1240 to 1757.⁹⁶ But he misleads his Christian audience (his publisher, Thomas Nelson, published and still publishes predominantly Christian books) when he offers these three reasons why Christian magistrates have been so hostile to the Talmud in the past:

1. Since it forms the main teaching of the Jewish religion, it has been regarded as the supreme obstacle in preventing Jews from being converted to Christianity.
2. Since the Talmud interprets the Old Testament by reshaping ancient Biblical laws to meet the needs of post-Biblical times, it has been charged with the falsification of Scripture.
3. Since the Talmud is a non-Christian production, it has been accused of harboring an evil and irreverent attitude towards Christ and the Church.⁹⁷

Would he say that teaching that Jesus Christ and His followers will be boiled in hot semen and hot excrement for eternity constitutes a reverent attitude? Are Christians supposed to believe that this is a reverent "attitude toward Christ and the Church"?

96. Ernest R. Trattner, Understanding the Talmud (New York: Thomas Nelson & Sons, 1955), pp. 200–1.

97. Ibid., p. 198.

He goes on: "For many centuries the Talmud was regarded as mysterious and a source of blasphemous statements against Christianity. This suspicion was not only grossly untrue but it was magnified and distorted by ignorance of the Talmud. The inability of Christian scholars to read the Talmud made matters worse."⁹⁸ An uncensored (as far as we gentiles know) version of the Talmud is now in English. Those few of us who bother to consult it still do not find that these ancient suspicions have been calmed. They have in fact been confirmed.

I do not think that Michael Rodkinson was being any more honest than Rabbi Trattner when he wrote these words in the Preface to his expurgated version of the Talmud: "The Talmud is free from the narrowness and bigotry with which it is usually charged, and if phrases used out of their context, and in a sense the very reverse from that which their author intended, are quoted against it, we may be sure that those phrases never existed in the original Talmud, but are the later additions of its enemies and such as never studied it."⁹⁹ Then came the Soncino edition.

It is my belief that mandatory training in the oral law served covenant-breaking Judaism for at least two millennia as a means of initiating its religious leaders into what was basically a secret society. By requiring its brightest adolescent males to go through long hours of memorization and discussion of such material, year after year, if they wanted to become rabbis, Judaism for almost two millennia side-tracked its best and brightest young men into some very peculiar ethical avenues—peculiar at least to the outlook of Christians.

It is also my contention that the unprecedented economic, intellectual, and cultural strides made by Jews in the West could begin, and did begin, only when their young men at last were allowed to become rabbis and leaders within the community without being required to go through this initiatory process. But a price has been extracted by Western society for this advancement. The price has been the steady secularization of the vast majority of Jews, just as Orthodox rabbis have warned their upwardly mobile brethren from the early decades of the nineteenth century until today. Most Western Jews today have become little more than Karaites without the Pentateuch, or even like Unitarians, though with better business connections.

98. Idem.

99. Michael L. Rodkinson, Editor's Preface, New Edition of the Babylonian Talmud (Boston: New Talmud Pub. Co., 1903), I, p. xi.

F. The Erosion of Orthodox Judaism

The heart and soul of Orthodox Judaism is its evolutionary ethical character, not its explicit theology. It is the world's most detailed and self-conscious example of process theology—dialectical, evolutionary, and ultimately open-ended. So radical is this process theology that Orthodox Jews believe that God Himself is continually engaged in a study of His own law, in association with the souls of deceased Jews. This goes on in the Academy on High—a concept so preposterous that modern Jewish scholars downplay it, describe it as merely a metaphor, and refuse to consider the possibility that Jews once took the Talmud and the Old Testament as literally inspired. (Literalism of ancient texts and ancient religious beliefs is simply not permitted to the founders of still-existing Western religions by those who still want the prestige, communal stability, and tenured security provided by the skeptical heirs of these still-literalistic religions.) The uninitiate—a very important word—cannot easily understand this commitment to process. Rabbi Louis Finkelstein was the head of the Jewish Theological Society of America. In his introduction to the reprint of Solomon Schechter's Aspects of Rabbinic Theology (1901), he writes:

The view that inquiry into the nature and requirements of Torah is more than a human need, being a cosmic process, is even more difficult to communicate to the uninitiate. Doubtless that is why Schechter did not include in his book any discussion of the fundamental Rabbinic concept of the Academy on High. The belief that study of the Torah is one of the Deity's main concerns, and that God Himself is each day expanding the scope and insight of Torah, engaging in this labor in association with the souls of the saints who have departed mortal life, is a theological metaphor; but for the Rabbinic scholars the metaphor represented reality—the profoundest of all realities.

That the Torah is at once perfect and perpetually incomplete; that like the Universe itself it was created to be a process, rather than a system—a method of inquiry into the right, rather than a codified collection of answers; that to discover possible situations with which it might deal and to analyze their moral implications in the light of its teachings is to share the labor of Divinity—these are inherent elements of Rabbinic thought, dominating the manner of life it recommends.¹⁰⁰

Judaism is a religion that historically has spent very little time on systematic theology and philosophy. "Inherent logical unity can be forced on Judaism only at the cost of distortion," writes Finkelstein.¹⁰¹ Maimonides in this sense was a self-conscious exception to this tradition. This is one reason why Orthodox Jewish scholars have been nervous about Maimonides from the beginning: Guide of the Perplexed has always been perceived as just too philosophical for comfort, too Aristotelian for reliability, however tight a grip his Strong Hand has maintained on their thinking.¹⁰² This, despite the fact that he warned the reader, "I adjure—by God, may he be exalted!—every reader of this Treatise of mine not to comment upon a single word of it and not to explain to another anything in it save that which has been explained and commented upon in the words of the famous Sages of our Law who preceded me."¹⁰³

Judaism is overwhelmingly a religion defined by a system of evolving rules of conduct. Again, Christians have not understood this, for they mistakenly equate Judaism with the fixed rules of the Old Testament. Danby is correct in his evaluation: "The Mishnah is not a finally authoritative corpus of the beliefs and practices of Judaism: it is of the nature of Judaism that it can have no such thing. 'The Law', which alone is Jewish doctrine, has in it an inherent principle of development which, while holding fast to the foundations laid down in the Mosaic legislation, makes it intolerant of dogmatic definition or set credal forms."¹⁰⁴

1. Evolving Ethics and Cultural Suicide

It is this anti-dogmatism and anti-credalism that is the inescapable fact of Judaism's history, which today threatens to overwhelm mainstream Judaism, just as a very similar theological relativism has very nearly overwhelmed mainstream Christianity. But Christianity has always had an institutional advantage over Orthodox Judaism: it is both credal and judicial, both dogmatic and ethical. Its doctrine of the cov-

100. Louis Finkelstein, Introduction to New Edition (1961), in Schechter, Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, pp. xix–xx.

101. Ibid., p. xiii.

102. For example, Maimonides insisted that "this divine science cannot become actual except after a study of natural science." Guide 5a; p. 9.

103. Guide 9a; p. 15.

104. Danby, Introduction, Mishnah, pp. xv–xvi.

enant proclaims fixed biblical laws at its third point.¹⁰⁵

The revival of Christian casuistry that is presently taking place¹⁰⁶ proclaims self-consciously the authoritative character of the Old Testament's ethical principles and, as my economic commentary indicates, the contemporary applicability of the letter of Old Testament law as well.

The evolutionary judicial character of Judaism has led to the near-destruction of Orthodoxy's influence in Western Judaism. The dual social forces of Western capitalism and secularism established institutional and philosophical foundations that have steadily undermined Talmudic religion and culture. The more ethically evolutionary any particular worldview has been, the more rapidly it has succumbed to this powerful pair of social forces. Judaism was especially vulnerable.

The factor that most threatened Orthodox Judaism was industrial society's growing toleration. In the mid-nineteenth century, when Jews in Western Europe and the United States began to enter the new industrial capitalist world, they found that the older discriminatory legal barriers had been progressively weakened by the new forces of economic competition. An individual's economic productivity in an open ("impersonal")¹⁰⁷ competitive market is judged apart from considerations of his religious affiliation. To the extent that non-market forms of racial or religious discrimination persist, those who discriminate against economically efficient employees or suppliers (or—much more rare—buyers) must pay a price for their actions: reduced income because of reduced efficiency.¹⁰⁸ The free market penalizes economically all those who discriminate on any basis except price and quality of output. Price competition has always been fundamental to the spread of free market capitalism,¹⁰⁹ and Jews became masters of competitive pricing.¹¹⁰ Jews began to move out of the ghetto. The ghetto's walls, both

105. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

106. I refer here to Christian Reconstruction or theonomy.

107. On the proper and improper use of the term "impersonal" to describe market economies, see Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1982] 2012), ch. 1:E.

108. "The least prejudiced sellers will come to dominate the market in much the same way as people who are least afraid of heights come to dominate occupations that require working at heights: They demand a smaller premium." Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law (Boston: Little, Brown, 1986), p. 616.

109. Max Weber, General Economic History, trans. Frank H. Knight (New York: Collier, [1920] 1966), p. 230.

110. The common phrase, "he Jewed me down," points to this phenomenon of the literal and figurative, came tumbling down.

Jewish legal scholar Menachem Elon has argued that it was the Jews' system of separate civil courts that was crucial to the maintenance of the autonomy of Jews as a people. When judicial emancipation began in eighteenth-century Western Europe, this autonomous character of Judaism began to erode. Jews were increasingly entitled to civil justice in secular civil courts, and they took advantage of this revolutionary development. Jewish commercial law and other areas of "secular world" law began to atrophy. This secularism began to undermine the foundations of Orthodox Judaism¹¹¹—a term which itself was the product of the process of change.¹¹² Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch asked the key question which most Jews have refused to face: "What would you have achieved if you became free Jews, and you ceased to be Jews?"¹¹³ Nevertheless, his own efforts to integrate the techniques and findings of modern science and philosophy with Judaism eventually led to a reduced resistance of Orthodox Judaism to secularism, as surely as Aquinas' analogous efforts had done for Christianity seven centuries earlier.

2. The Faustian Bargain

From the New Testament period to the present, the lure of pagan philosophy has proven irresistible to Jews, as it has also for Christians. Out of Greek philosophy came Hellenism, and Hellenism's influence on early rabbinic Judaism was very great.¹¹⁴ Nevertheless, the impact of Jew as a price-cutter. If one were to say, "he Jewed me up," it would make no sense. The Jew as the price-cutting haggler is universally recognizable, but not the Jew as the price-gouger. He is resented by people in their capacity as producers and retail sellers, not as consumers. Gentiles are always looking for the elusive "Jewish brother-in-law deal."

It is not random that the four ethnic groups that are thought of as price-cutters have had decidedly biblical backgrounds: the Dutch ("Dutch treat" dates are those in which the girl pays), the Scots, the Armenians, and the Jews.

111. Menachem Elon, "Introduction," in Elon (ed.), The Principles of Jewish Law (Jerusalem: Keter, 1975), col. 35.

112. It was Rabbi Samson R. Hirsch who accepted the term "Orthodox" which had been used as an epithet by secular Jews in the mid-nineteenth century. I. Grunfeld, "Samson Raphael Hirsch—The Man and His Mission," in Judaism Eternal: Selected Essays from the Writings of Samson Raphael Hirsch (London: Soncino Press, 1956), p. xlvii.

113. Ibid., p. xxxix.

114. Martin Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenic Period, 2 vols. (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1974). Cf. W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism: Some Rabbinic Elements in Pauline pagan philosophy in Judaism was less direct in the Middle Ages, probably due to the isolation of Jews from the surrounding gentile Christian culture. It is not surprising that the path of Greek philosophy into late medieval Judaism, and then into Christianity, was by way of Islam, especially through Maimonides. Aristotelian Athens came to Paris through Cairo and Spain.

For centuries, Talmudic Judaism resisted the rational categories of pagan wisdom, despite The Guide of the Perplexed. But with Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch in the mid-nineteenth century, the epistemological barriers began to break down.¹¹⁵ This process of cultural and intellectual assimilation accelerated rapidly in twentieth-century America, especially after the Second World War. The most prestigious American universities opened their doors to all those who could compete academically, and Jews surely could compete. They at last gained equal access to the professional schools—law, medicine, architecture—as well as to the Ph.D.-granting graduate schools. The price they were asked to pay, however, was very high. Too high. The universities offered a Faustian bargain to Jews (and also to Bible-believing Christians): “You may go as high as your brains can carry you, just so long as you leave your religion off campus.” Most academically oriented Jews could not resist this offer.¹¹⁶ Inter-marriage with the gentiles whom they met on campus was also nearly inevitable. Cohen’s remarks are on target: “The Jew, in joining the West, no longer joined a Christian West, for he did not join a church wedded to a society. . . . The Jew joined an already de-Christianizing West, and as part of the bargain he agreed—foolishly—to de-Judaize.”¹¹⁷ What Nazi Germany’s politics had not achieved in the 1930’s, Prussia’s earlier export of the academic state certification system did achieve: the suppression of traditional religion through the enthusiastic co-operation of the suppressed. Secular education is the humanist world’s hoped-for “final solution” for both orthodox Christianity and Orthodox Judaism.

In the twentieth century, the tide has rapidly flowed against Theology, 4th ed. (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1980), ch. 1.

115. I. Grunfeld, “Samson Raphael Hirsch—The Man and His Mission,” in Judaism Eternal.

116. A very effective presentation of this post-1940 transformation of Judaism is found in Chaim Potok’s novel and the movie based on it, The Chosen. In the early 1960s, Potok served as editor of the Jewish Publication Society of America’s translation of the Hebrew Bible. Potok, “The Bible’s Inspired Art,” New York Times Magazine (Oct. 3, 1982), p. 63.

117. Cohen, Myth of the Judeo-Christian Tradition, p. 186.

Talmudic Judaism; first the Nazis and then secularism uprooted Orthodox Judaism. Higher criticism of the Bible has produced the same bitter fruit of skepticism and liberalism in Jewish circles that it has produced in Christian circles.¹¹⁸ There was not only bitter fruit but also forbidden fruit to be eaten. By the millions, they have feasted on this forbidden fruit. Solomon Schechter is correct: biblical higher criticism was in fact the "higher anti-semitism," for it obliterated the official foundation of the Jewish experience.¹¹⁹ But this was a case of the hermeneutical chickens coming home to roost, for Judaism had long undermined this original foundation through its everevolving traditionalism.

Traditional Judaism's ethical rules began to change, and therefore the whole religion had to change. Reform Judaism launched a successful intellectual attack on Orthodox Judaism in the early decades of the nineteenth century, leading to the steady isolation of the defenders of old Pharisee tradition, and in the twentieth century, secular Judaism and Conservative Judaism have become the dominant traditions. Orthodox Judaism today retains very little influence outside of the state of Israel. Reform Judaism and conservative Judaism are overwhelmingly dominant in the West. Secular Jews seem to be the norm today, as far as gentiles can discern. (The most memorable description I have ever read regarding the outlook of secular Jews regarding Judaism is Lis Harris' description of her family, "fans whose home team was the

118. The Jewish scholar most responsible for the introduction of higher criticism into Jewish curricula was the extraordinary linguist, Julian Morgenstern, who also served as president of Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, Ohio, after 1921. Born in 1881, he was still writing scholarly essays in the mid-1960s in the Hebrew Union College Annual. ("The Hasidim—Who Were They?" HUCA, XXXVIII, 1967.) Indicative of the extent of his life's work was his four-part study, "The Book of the Covenant." Part I appeared in the 1928 issue; Part II appeared in 1930; Part III in 1931-32; and Part IV in 1962. He was elected president of the American Oriental Society in 1928-29 and president of the Society of Biblical Literature in 1941. "Morgenstern assumed a position of pre-eminence as a philosopher and theoretician of Reform Judaism. . . . Modern developments, he showed convincingly, are only the latest manifestations of the adjustments that have taken place over and over whenever Judaism has come into contact with a superior culture." Morris Lieberman, "Julian Morgenstern—Scholar, Teacher and Leader," Hebrew Union College Annual, XXXII (1962), p. 6. Morgenstern was a dedicated humanist and internationalist. Cf. Morgenstern, "Nationalism, Universalism, and World Religion," in Charles Frederick Walker (ed.), World Fellowship, Addresses and Messages by Leading Statesmen of All Faiths, Races and Countries (New York: Liveright, 1935). This was his address to the second Parliament of Religions, held in Chicago in 1933.

119. Cited in Cohen, Myth of Judeo-Christian Tradition, p. xviii.

Jews.”)¹²⁰ Anti-credalism giveth, and anti-credalism taketh away.

G. Hermeneutics: An Inescapable Concept

Commenting on anything requires a principle of interpretation. This is true of Bible commentaries. Principles of interpretation differ, and sometimes very sharply. This means that rival hermeneutical principles can and do become divisive. That, too, is the price of open inquiry. It is a price that must be paid on both sides. There is no way to reconcile these rival principles of biblical interpretation: 1) Jesus as the sole fulfillment of Old Testament messianic prophecies vs. Jesus as a false prophet and blasphemer, for which He was lawfully executed; 2) the New Testament as the sole authoritative commentary on the Old Testament vs. the New Testament as false prophecy; 3) Christians as the only true covenantal heirs of Abraham vs. Jews as the only true covenantal heirs of Abraham. It is the ancient debate, recently revived politically in the state of Israel, over the question, “Who is a Jew?”¹²¹ It is a debate over the truth of Paul’s assertion: “For we are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh” (Phil. 3: 3). Only theological liberals on both sides of the debate can sensibly play down these differences, since liberals do not accept the truth of either religion’s set of hermeneutical principles.

This essay deals with Orthodox Judaism and its relation with orthodox Christianity. Orthodox Christianity is no longer the dominant stream of Christianity in the West, just as Orthodox Judaism is no longer the dominant stream of Judaism outside of the state of Israel, and which is in sharp political conflict with secular Judaism inside that nation. Always in the background of the life of the orthodox Christian and the Orthodox Jew are the liberals “within the camp.” The Orthodox Christian does not believe that liberal, mainstream Christianity is really Christianity, just as the Orthodox Jew does not believe that mainstream Judaism is really Judaism.¹²² Van Til is correct in his as-

120. Lis Harris, Holy Days: The World of a Hasidic Family (New York: Summit Books, 1985), p. 17.

121. In Judaism, this question is really, “Who is the rabbi?” The rabbi sanctions marriages and therefore the legitimacy of the children.

122. There is a problem here for Bible-affirming Christians. They normally do accept as valid the baptisms of converts out of mainstream churches. They would not accept Mormon baptism as valid. So, to some degree, they do accept mainstream churches as still Christian. For the Orthodox Jew, the determination of who is a Jew is established by examining the training of the Rabbi who circumcised him or circumcised assessment of the theological unity of the liberal Jew and the liberal Christian:

When Jesus says that all power is given to him by the Father in view of his death and resurrection, and that he will vanquish the last enemy which is death, the modern Jew and the modern Protestant consider this mythology. The modern Jew will gladly join the modern Protestant in speaking of Christ as a Messiah if only the messianic idea be demythologized by means of the self-sufficient ethical consciousness. The modern Protestant theologian is ready and eager to oblige the modern Jew.¹²³

The implicit theological unity that modernism creates between mainstream Christians and Jews—the many shades of Unitarianism in no way reduces the explicit theological disunity between orthodox Christians and Orthodox Jews. The battle over the proper interpretation of the Old Testament still divides the orthodox Christian and the Orthodox Jew, even as it divides Jews from liberal Jews and Christians from liberal Christians. At best, the common “battle for the Text” of Torah-affirming Christians and Jews against the higher critics of the Bible within their respective camps has created pressure for a temporary cease-fire between the besieged camps of the Bible-affirmers. But a temporary cease-fire is not a permanent peace treaty. The war over interpretation is great because of the commitment of both sides to the divine origin of the Old Testament. Again, citing Van Til: “When a Christian worships Christ as the Son of God, he is, says the Jew, an idolater. And he sees his mission as that of bringing such an idol-worshiper back to the God of Abraham and of Moses. In seeking to fulfill his mission in relation to Christian idolaters the Jew must, of course, oppose the claims of Christ.”¹²⁴

H. Is There a Judeo-Christian Tradition?

The battle over hermeneutics is inescapable. The question then must be raised: If Western civilization was Christian in the era of the exclusion of the Jews, and today is humanist to the exclusion of Torah-believing Christians and Jews, to what extent is it valid to speak of a Judeo-Christian tradition? This leads immediately to a second quesher father or husband.

123. Cornelius Van Til, Christ and the Jews (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1968), p. 97.

124. Ibid., p. 1.

tion: To what extent are the respective commitments to the divine origin of the Old Testament a unified commitment, and therefore the basis of the Judeo-Christian tradition in Western history? If the two hermeneutics are permanently divided, how can there be a unified tradition?

It is one of the oddest facts of modern Bible-affirming Christianity that the dispensationalist fundamentalists, who categorically deny the continuing authority of Old Testament law in New Testament times, see themselves as the "soul cousins" if not "soul brothers" of Orthodox Jews. They regard any deviation from the West's support of the state of Israel as a theological deviation, not just bad foreign policy.¹²⁵ Yet the only possible basis of a supposed Judeo-Christian tradition would be a mutual commitment to Old Testament legal norms. Yet dispensationalist leaders make statements such as this:

At the heart of the problem of legalism is pride, a pride that refuses to admit spiritual bankruptcy. That is why the doctrines of grace stir up so much animosity. Donald Grey Barnhouse, a giant of a man in free grace, wrote: "It was a tragic hour when the Reformation churches wrote the Ten Commandments into their creeds and catechisms and sought to bring Gentile believers into bondage to Jewish law, which was never intended either for the Gentile nations or for the church."¹²⁶ He was right, too.¹²⁷

Thus, to the extent that there has been a Judeo-Christian tradition in the West, the consistent, well-informed dispensationalist is forced by his theology to deny that such a tradition is judicially valid. It has to be seen as the product of a spurious, deviant form of Christianity.

The question that the defender of Old Testament judicial standards must then ask himself is this: Has there been a sufficient unanimity between orthodox Christians and Orthodox Jews over the interpretation and application of Old Testament legal norms to have constituted a Judeo-Christian tradition? This is the question that I am attempting to answer in this essay.

Before dealing with this issue, let me ask a question: Is there a Moslem-Christian tradition? The Moslems claim to believe in both the Old and the New Testaments as God-inspired. If the Christian answers 125. See, for example, Hal Lindsey, The Road to Holocaust (New York: Bantam, 1989).

126. He cites Barnhouse, God's Freedom, p. 134.

127. S. Lewis Johnson, "The Paralysis of Legalism," Bibliotheca Sacra, Vol. 120 (April/June, 1963), p. 109.

that the Koran (which he has not read) overthrows both the Old and New Testaments, no matter what the Moslem says he believes about the Bible—which in fact is the case—then what about the Mishnah and the Talmud?

1. An Invention of Modernism

Arthur A. Cohen, in his provocatively titled book, The Myth of the Judeo-Christian Tradition, which was published by a respected publishing house that specializes in scholarly Jewish studies, denies that this tradition ever existed. It is an intellectual fabrication, he argues. He has identified the origins of this myth: the Enlightenment and, later, German liberal Protestant scholarship of the late-nineteenth century.¹²⁸ Protestant "higher critics" of the Old Testament were implacably hostile to Old Testament law, so they attempted to disengage the New Testament from the Old. The Jew of the Old Testament was described as being "in bondage to a hopeless legalism. On the one hand the genius of the Hebrew Bible is commended; on the other hand Christianity is set in superior condescension to the traditions of Judaism which survive, like ruins, the advent of Jesus Christ, the new architect of mankind. . . . The Judaism which survives the onslaught of Protestant Higher Criticism is buried under a mountain of historicist formulations, while a pure, virtuous Kantian Christianity—freed from Jewish accretion—is defined. Once more, almost in recapitulation of the Gnostic tendencies of the early Church (though turned this time to a different task), a 'Christo-Jewish' tradition was defined."¹²⁹

This implicit antinomianism of the higher critics was indeed quite similar to the anti-Old Testament perspective of the gnostics. Gnosticism and antinomianism are two sides of the same counterfeit coin. Denying mankind's access in history to a permanent higher law above existing humanist culture, critics of the existing culture face a grim choice: either their absorption into the prevailing culture or their removal from influence, i.e., either assimilation or confinement to a cultural ghetto.¹³⁰ The prevailing culture is seen as the equivalent of ethic-

128. Cohen, Myth of the Judeo-Christian Tradition, pp. xviii, 196-200.

129. Ibid., p. 199.

130. This dualism between the individual and society is a manifestation of autonomous man's philosophical dualism between the one and the many. If autonomous man is part of the one (unity), he in principle loses himself, his personality, and his individuality. But if he maintains his independence (autonomy), he loses any point of contact with any other individual. To use one of Cornelius Van Til's analogies, he is al quicksand; one should not seek to walk through it in the pilgrimage of life. But if men dwell in a self-imposed cultural ghetto, they will be tempted to create a psychological zone of internal retreat in their quest for meaning and significance as they wait for death or eschatological deliverance. What else can they do? They see no way to transform the world, for they have no point of ethical or judicial contact with the world. They do not regard biblical law as a tool of dominion, as a lengthy lever capable of moving the general civilization in the direction of God's permanent standards. On the contrary, they see themselves on the short end of this lever: it is the general culture that threatens to move them by law, not the other way around. Their anti-nomianism—their lack of faith in permanent biblical standards and the empowering of the Holy Spirit¹³¹—inevitably produces cultural impotence. This is the legacy of gnosticism, and it is still influential in modern Christianity.¹³²

I. Talmud or New Testament?

The conflict between Bible-believing Christians and Orthodox Jews today has not changed in principle since A.D. 30. It is a conflict over the proper interpretation of the Old Testament. Jesus said to the Jewish leaders: "Do not think that I will accuse you to the Father: there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me: for he wrote of me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" (John 5:45–47). Because contemporary Christians cannot seem to make up their minds about contemporary Jews—whether they are demonic international conspirators or economic and academic supermen who somehow have the favor of God—they have been ineffective witnesses to Christ when in the presence of Jews. Once Christians recognize what Judaism offers to its adherents—the Talmud, or the mystical-magical Kabbalah,¹³³ or the steady erosion of modern secularization—they will like a bead with no hole that seeks attachment to an infinitely long string. Philosophically speaking, without God's higher law and without man as the created image of God, individuals have no logical point of contact with each other.

131. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), pp. 185–86.

132. Philip J. Lee, Against the Protestant Gnostics (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987), Pt. III.

133. Scholem, On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism; Jacob Z. Lauterbach, "The Belief in the Power of the Word," Hebrew Union College Annual, XIV (1949). See also Joshua Trachtenberg, Jewish Magic and Superstition (New York: Atheneum, [1939] better understand the words of Robert L. Reymond: "The Christian should love the Jew, certainly. But the sooner the Christian realizes that the Jew is as hopelessly lost and as hopelessly blind, if not more so (Rom. 11:6–11), than the Gentile, and that to win the Jew to Christ he must crush any and every hope for salvation which is related in any way to the fact that he is a Jew and a 'son of Torah,' the sooner the Christian will honor his Lord by his witness to the Jew and the more effective will his witness become."¹³⁴ There is no valid message of salvation in the Talmud. This was Peter's message to Israel:

Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole. This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved (Acts 4:10–13).

Orthodox Judaism is at war with the Old Testament. This is the primary thesis of this essay. But, unlike Reform Judaism, which is infected with the same biblical higher criticism that has undermined mainstream Christianity, Orthodox Judaism claims to accept the Old Testament as the inspired word of God. How, then, can anyone rightfully say that Orthodox Judaism is at war with the Old Testament? Only by accepting Jesus' words literally:

I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. How can ye believe, which receive honour one of another, and seek not the honour that cometh from God only? Do not think that I will accuse you to the Father: there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me: for he wrote of me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words? (John 5:43–47).

To demonstrate the accuracy of Jesus' words, I here present a summary of the exegetical methodology of the judicial writings of the most famous and most respected master of the Talmud in the history of Judaism: Moses Maimonides.

1970).

134. Robert L. Reymond, Editor's Preface, to Van Til, Christ and the Jews, p. v.

J. Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon, The Rambam

Few gentile scholars have ever heard of the Mishneh Torah, but all medieval historians and specialists in the history of Western philosophy know of Maimonides. Moshe, the son of Maimon, better known as Maimonides (1134–1204), is by far the most famous Jew in medieval history. He was the Rambam (Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon: RMBM). He lived in Spain and later in Cairo, where he served as the Sultan's physician. He became world-famous as a physician. Copies of at least ten of his medical treatises still survive.¹³⁵ He is best known for his theological-philosophical treatise, The Guide of the Perplexed (a better translation than "guide to the perplexed"), completed in 1190. His native tongue was Arabic. He was familiar with the Arabic translations of Aristotle, and he became a major conduit of the flow of Aristotelian philosophy into the Jewish community in Europe, as well as into the Christian community.

What very few non-Jewish scholars are aware of is that he also became the chief classifier of an immense body of Jewish law, which included the Talmud ("study" or "learning"). He wrote a 14-volume study that systematically arranged the teachings of the Jewish rabbis on every aspect of Talmudic law. It was called the Mishneh Torah (1180), also known as Maimonides' Code.¹³⁶ (It is less well known as "The Strong Hand.")¹³⁷ It has for centuries remained the definitive summary of the commands of Talmudic law.

The words mishneh Torah mean "repetition of the Torah" or law. It is the phrase by which Jews have traditionally identified the Book of Deuteronomy. Deuteronomy restated the Mosaic law for the sake of the children of the generation that had died in the wilderness. Their days of wandering were about to end; they would now face the problems of running God's earthly commonwealth. Lerner writes: "Maimonides' Code has a similar character; in it he restates the laws of the Torah and of the Talmud without limiting himself to those laws that are applicable to life in the Diaspora. Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, like Moses', is concerned with the practical needs of an actual state, that is, the Jewish state prior to the Diaspora and after the coming of the Messiah."¹³⁸ The influence of this work on medieval and subsequent Juda-135. Paul Johnson, A History of the Jews (New York: Harper & Row, 1987), p. 186.

136. Paul Johnson mentions it, but does not cite it directly.

137. Schachter, Talmudical Introductions, in Chajes, Student's Guide Through the Talmud, p. 3n.

138. Ralph Lerner, "Moses Maimonides," in Leo Strauss and Joseph Cropsey (eds.), ism was very great, beginning almost from the day he wrote it.

Jewish legal scholar George Horowitz writes: "The restatement of Maimonides, the Mishneh Torah is still the most orderly and logical classification of the Halakah [Jewish law—G. N.] in existence."¹³⁹ He is not alone in his assessment of Maimonides' Code. Maimonides specialist Isadore Twersky says that "The Mishneh Torah, which was to change the entire landscape of Rabbinic literature, also pushed back the frontiers of Maimonides' sphere of influence and made his fame global as well as imperishable. It transformed him, in the course of a few decades, from the 'light of the East' to 'the light of the [entire] exile.' He almost literally became a major Jewish luminary. . . . In one broad generalization, we may say that the Mishneh Torah became a prism through which reflection and analysis of virtually all subsequent Talmud study had to pass. There is hardly a book in the broad field of Rabbinic literature that does not relate in some way to the Mishneh Torah."¹⁴⁰ Furthermore, "The Mishneh Torah is reputedly second only to the Bible in the number of commentaries and studies it has elicited."¹⁴¹

An incomplete list of 220 major commentaries on the Mishneh Torah was made in 1893.¹⁴² Michael Guttman has written: "The Mishneh Torah became the center of the whole halachic literature. It acquired the place of a new code of general esteem and acknowledgment, like the Mishna a thousand years before, and the greatest halakhic scholars entered into competition with each other in composing commentaries to Maimonides and settling the difficulties, which the lack of indicating sources left to them."¹⁴³ His fame throughout Europe spread even faster than copies of the Code.¹⁴⁴

Why should the Code have had such an impact? For one thing, because copies of any book as massive as the Talmud were scarce in the History of Political Philosophy (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1963), p. 193.

139. Horowitz, Spirit of Jewish Law, p. 16.

140. Isadore Twersky, Introduction to the Code of Maimonides (Mishneh Torah) (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1980), pp. 19–20; cf. 516–18.

141. Ibid., p. 526. Nevertheless, for generations Talmudists refused to mention the Mishneh Torah by name: p. 527. This may have been because it enabled laymen to check the decisions of the judges: Johnson, History, p. 191.

142. Alexander Marx, Studies in Jewish History and Booklore (New York, 1969), pp. 38–41; cited by Johnson, History, p. 191.

143. Michael Guttman, "The Decisions of Maimonides in His Commentary on the Mishna," Hebrew Union College Annual, II (1925), p. 229.

144. Alexander Marx, "The Correspondence Between the Rabbis of Southern France and Maimonides About Astrology," ibid., III (1926), pp. 325–26.

era before modern printing. Maimonides' 14 relatively compact volumes were minuscule when compared to the gigantic Talmud. Furthermore, the Code is structured by judicial topics; the Talmud's structure is highly complex and intimidating.

1. Maimonides' Use of the Old Testament

I have interacted repeatedly with Maimonides' Code in the footnotes of the text of Tools of Dominion. Sometimes he got things correctly, and sometimes he did not. It is my task here to deal with the ways that he got things wrong rather than right, as well as the reasons why. I suppose I would have a much more difficult task in writing a chapter analyzing S. R. Hirsch's commentary on Exodus. I find so often that he got things right.¹⁴⁵ How was this possible, when he, like most Orthodox Jews of his day and earlier, must have relied heavily on Maimonides—not Maimonides the Aristotelian philosopher, who was regarded with suspicion by Jewish scholars from the beginning, but Maimonides the Talmudist?

So, I find that I am critical of many of Maimonides' economic and judicial opinions, and through him, of the Talmud. But how does a gentile scholar say this politely yet effectively, and also avoid the counter-charge of anti-Semitism? I suppose he does this in the same way that a Jewish scholar would discuss Martin Luther's notoriously anti-Semitic book on the Jews,¹⁴⁶ yet remain free of "anti-gentilism." All I

145. Again and again as I wrote this commentary, I found myself turning to Hirsch and citing him. James Jordan has been working on his study of the dietary laws during the period that I have been working on the case laws. He also has noticed this phenomenon: Hirsch frequently makes sense, while the observations in Maimonides' Code often seem archaic, superstitious, and irrational. Hirsch sticks to the biblical text far more closely than Maimonides does. Yet he also cites the Talmud, and the conclusions he draws from these citations seem sensible, whereas Maimonides, if he is in fact being faithful to the Talmud (and I find that he seems to be faithful in the cases that I have studied), frequently makes the Talmud seem unreliable. I leave it to Orthodox Jewish scholars to sort out the discrepancies between these two giants of Jewish thought. I have run out of time to pursue the matter.

146. On the Jews and Their Lies (1543), published over the years in cheap, poorly printed paperback editions for the anti-Semitic masses, as well as in an expensive hardback collectors' edition by Revisionist Press, 1982. It appears as volume 47 of Luther's Works (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971), pp. 137–306. Luther was not alone in his hostility to Judaism. Two years prior to the publication of his book, his arch-rival, Catholic theologian John Eck, published Refutation of a Jew-Book, and two years before this, Calvinist Martin Bucer published On the Jews. Luther, however, was typically extreme. He recommended seven steps to be taken by the civil government: 1) burn down every synagogue until not a cinder remains; 2) raze the homes of all Jews; 3) con-can say is this: what we have here is more than a failure to communicate. It is more than a difference over semantics or semitics. It is a fundamental debate over biblical hermeneutics, and both Orthodox Judaism and orthodox Christianity teach that this ultimate division cannot be overcome in principle. It divides Christians from Jews, and has from the first century, whether A.D. or C.E. Cohen is correct: "I suggest in part, therefore, that the Judeo-Christian tradition is a construct, an artificial gloss of reason over the swarm of fedeist passion. . . . What is omitted is the sinew and bone of actuality, for where Jews and Christians divide, divide irreparably, divide finally . . . is that for Jews the Messiah is to come and for Christians he has already come. That is irreparable."¹⁴⁷

From the day that the English-language translation of Maimonides' Code was completed, the terms of this division came to the surface of the academic waters, and have drifted along ever since. That this debate has not previously broken out stems mainly from the fact that the two sides that presumably care one way or the other about the underlying religious issues and therefore the hermeneutical questions—Orthodox Jews and orthodox Christians—have not debated publicly, primarily because the Christians have never heard of the Mishneh Torah. Very few have read any of the Talmud, either. Maimonides' Code is an unknown book that comments on a closed book.

K. Talmud vs. Torah

Maimonides' Code does represent both the letter and spirit of the Talmud. This is not simply my opinion. Orthodox Jews have long believed that the Code is faithful to the Talmud. The translator of his introduction to the Talmud, which he wrote at the age of 23, is adamant on this point: "Although he utilized the fruits of his time's researches, every statement of Maimonides is securely grounded and borne from the Torah literature. It is extremely important to bear this in mind. The Torah is the means by which the Rambam saw and explained everything."¹⁴⁸ fiscate and destroy their books and the Talmud; 4) forbid rabbis to teach on the threat of execution; 5) revoke all safe-conduct passes on the highways; 6) forbid them to loan money at interest; and 7) require them to work at manual labor. Luther's Works, vol. 47, pp. 268–72. For a study of European life for Jews in the sixteenth century, see Selma Stern, Josel of Rosheim (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1965).

147. Cohen, Myth of the Judeo-Christian Tradition, p. xii.

148. Zvi L. Lampel, Maimonides' Introduction to the Talmud (New York: Judaica

Horowitz begins his detailed, readable, and nearly indispensable study of Jewish law with this assertion: "Though there are in the laws of Moses not a few specific and literal commands which give emphatic expression to the spirit of that legislation, it is the gradual changes against the letter of Scripture which came about in the course of centuries, that offer the most striking manifestation of the true, the humane spirit of Jewish law."¹⁴⁹ But is this really true? Was the "humaneness" of the Jewish legal order truly increased when the rabbis departed from the letter of Old Testament law? I argue that the self-conscious departure on the part of both Christians and Jews from the revealed law of God has decreased the West's humaneness.

The question I am raising in this essay is this: Does the Code represent the spirit of the Old Testament? As we shall see, it clearly does not represent the letter of the Old Testament. But were Maimonides and the Talmudic scholars whose conclusions he summarized and classified able to retain and make practical the spirit of the Mosaic law? My answer is simple: no. But I must prove my case. To provide evidence of my assertion regarding Jewish law, I have decided to provide a kind of lawyer's brief against Moses Maimonides—specifically, against his views of restitution to gentile victims by Jewish criminals.

1. The Double Standard

Maimonides insisted that biblical law's general requirement that the thief make two-fold restitution to his victim (Ex. 22:7) applies only in the case of Jews who steal from Jews. It does not apply if a Jew steals from a heathen (gentile). Incredibly, it also does not apply in the case of sacrilege: stealing an animal from a Jewish household if the animal has been set aside for sacrifice to God; the thief is exempted from making two-fold, four-fold, or five-fold restitution, "For Scripture says, And it be stolen from the house of the man (Ex. 22:6), but not from the house of the sanctuary."¹⁵⁰ This means that it is less of a crime to steal from God than to steal from man—a strange system of ethics on Press, 1975), p. 9.

149. Horowitz, Spirit of Jewish Law, pp. 1-2. This reflects a view quite similar to that expressed by Lauterbach in his criticism of Sadduceism because of its having become "blind slaves of the law without regard for its spirit. It divorced the law from life, in that it made the two absolutely independent of each other." Jewish Essays, p. 38.

150. Moses Maimonides, The Book of Torts, Book 11 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1954), "Laws Concerning Theft," II:II:1, p. 64.

which to build an explicitly theocentric civilization.

A convicted Jew need not pay double restitution to a gentile, either: "If one steals from a heathen, or if one steals sacred property, he need pay only its capital value, for Scripture says, Shall pay double to his neighbor (Ex. 22:8)—to his neighbor, but not to the sanctuary; to his neighbor, but not to a heathen."¹⁵¹

This is an ethical and judicial system based on a double standard. The Talmud is clear on this point: "Where a suit arises between an Israelite and a heathen, if you can justify the former according to the laws of Israel, justify him and say: 'This is our law'; so also if you can justify him by the laws of the heathens justify him and say [to the other party:] 'This is your law'; but if this can not be done, we use subterfuges to circumvent him."¹⁵² In short, the Jewish lawyer must do whatever he can to keep his guilty Jewish client from being convicted. (In this sense, Jewish jurisprudence serves as the model for all modern jurisprudence: the lawyer's primary task is supposedly to use the law in order to see his client go free, guilty or not.)

A dual standard of justice applies to lost property:

R. Bibi b. Giddal said that R. Simeon the Pious stated: The robbery of a heathen is prohibited, though an article lost by him is permissible. . . . His lost article is permissible, for R. Hama b. Guria said that Rab stated: Whence can we learn that the lost article of a heathen is permissible? Because it says: And with all lost thing of thy brother's: it is to your brother that you make restoration, but you need not make restoration to a heathen.¹⁵³

Come and hear: If one finds therein [Soncino Press editor's footnote: "In a city inhabited by Jews and heathens"] a lost object, then if the majority are Israelites it has to be announced, but if the majority are heathens it has not to be announced.¹⁵⁴

WHERE AN OX BELONGING TO AN ISRAELITE HAS GORED AN OX BELONGING TO A CANAANITE, THERE IS NO LIABILITY. WHEREAS WHERE AN OX BELONGING TO A CANAANITE GORES AN OX BELONGING TO AN ISRAELITE . . . THE COMPENSATION IS TO BE MADE IN FULL."¹⁵⁵

151. Idem.

152. Baba Kamma 113a.

153. Baba Kamma 113b.

154. Baba Mezia 24a.

155. Baba Kamma 37b. Cf. 38a. Reproductions of these passages appear in Christian News (Aug. 1, 1988).

In response to such judicial standards, gentiles in the late medieval period over-reacted by forcing Jews into urban ghettos that were surrounded by high walls and locked at night. They did not want to live as geographical neighbors to people who held such a double standard.¹⁵⁶ They chose instead to allow Jews to be governed by their own courts in most matters that involved disputes between Jews. Of course, when it came to Christian rulers (and presumably also private citizens) who defaulted on loans, the Jews may also have occasionally appreciated the walls that protected them from excessive contact with gentiles.¹⁵⁷ (It is also interesting that in the twelfth century, the walled-in Jewish community of Constantinople also had its own wall that separated the 2,000 Talmudic Jews from the 500 anti-Talmudic, "Torah-only" Karaites.)¹⁵⁸

Forced social division is inevitably the curse of a double legal standard in a single society. Neither group trusts the other; both groups seek to exploit the other, or at least tolerate those within their midst who do. This is why the Bible says, "One law shall be to him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you" (Ex. 12:49). This case law appears in the section on the laws regarding strangers and the Passover; it was given to Israel immediately after the exodus itself. This indicates how emphatically God demands that men observe it: even their oppressors, the Egyptians, are entitled to equal treatment before the law.

2. "For the Sake of the Peace"

The rabbis were not fools, of course. They modified this judicial double standard for practical purposes, namely, "for the sake of the peace." Horowitz explains: "Halakot [law] and customs which discriminated against Gentiles and which might, therefore, appear unjust in the eyes of the world, were not to be enforced or practiced though perhaps 'legally' valid, because it might reflect unfavorably on the Jewish people, its morals and its religion. 'For the Sake of Peace' was in effect an equitable principle which modified the strict law, with regard to treatment of Gentiles."¹⁵⁹ This was a belated recognition of the need for a unified legal standard in civil justice and economic dealings. He offers several examples, including this one: "The Talmud seemed definitely to countenance the over-reaching of heathens by Jews in business transactions (Bava Kamma 113b). But later authorities held otherwise. 'It is forbidden,' says Maimonides, 'to defraud or deceive any person in business—Jew and non-Jew are to be treated alike. . . . It is wrong to deceive any person in words even without causing him any pecuniary loss (M. T Sale, XVIII, i)."¹⁶⁰ Centuries later with respect to an error of a Gentile in overpaying eighteen ducats, R. Benjamin b. Mattathiah declared, 'For the sake of sanctifying the Holy Name a Jew should correct and make good the mistake of the Gentile.'"¹⁶¹

156. The social and political results of this policy were evil: forced urbanization, the creation of a permanently alienated political element within the towns, and the eventual subsidizing of nineteenth-century Jewish radicalism, which was far more common in urban settings than in rural ones.

157. In 1306, Philip IV of France evicted the Jews, repudiated his debts to them, and confiscated their property. England drove them out in 1290, after having taxed them heavily and soaked up their capital with forced loans that were then repudiated. In 1370, they were driven from the low countries. Herbert Heaton, Economic History of Europe (New York: Harper & Row, 1948), p. 184.

158. This was recorded by Benjamin of Tudela in his Book of Travels (1168); cited in Johnson, History of the Jews, p. 169.

Maimonides put it this way: "The lost property of a heathen may be kept, for Scripture says, Lost thing of thy brothers (Deut. 22:3). Furthermore, if one returns it, he commits a transgression, for he is supporting the wicked of the world. But if one returns it in order to sanctify God's name, thereby causing persons to praise the Israelites and realize that they are honest, he is deemed praiseworthy."¹⁶² It is revealing that he cited Deuteronomy 22:3, which refers to the lost property of one's brother, but he made no mention of Exodus 23:4–5, which explicitly deals with the lost property of enemies: "If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again. If thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden, and wouldest forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help with him."

Obviously, when the legal system allows a Jew to discriminate ethnically and judicially in terms of religion, and when it also repeatedly requires Jews to ignore this principle of judicial dualism, it becomes almost impossible for the individual Jew to know what to do in specific cases. He is to be guided by his conscience, of course, but a conscience informed by which principle, the principle of discrimination or the

159. Horowitz, Spirit of Jewish Law, p. 100

160. See Maimonides, The Book of Acquisition, Book 12 of The Code of Maimonides, 14 vols. (New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1951), "Laws Concerning Sales," I:XVIII, pp. 63–64.

161. Horowitz, Spirit, p. 101.

162. Maimonides, Torts, "Laws Concerning Robbery and Lost Property," III:XI:3, p. 128.

principle of preserving the peace?

This is the fundamental problem for all casuists: the application of fixed laws to specific circumstances. Horowitz was aware of the problem, at least with respect to biblical law, a problem for which the rabbis have offered no solution: "Thus, paradoxical as it may seem the Rabbis believed that it was their right and duty to make changes in the Biblical law if imperatively required, while maintaining, nevertheless, that the commands of the Torah were unchangeable and might not be added to or diminished."¹⁶³ This is also true with respect to Talmudic law. The key question is this: Which principle of application is dominant in any given case, preserving the peace or allowing a Jewish thief to escape the restitution penalty specified by the Torah? The individual Jew is left without clear ethical guidelines. The rabbis will decide after the fact whether an act is immoral, illegal, or just good business, but that knowledge is of little help to the Jewish decision-maker at the "moment of truth." The predictability of the law and its sanctions—indispensable to social order and also to freedom¹⁶⁴—is thereby drastically reduced.

Nowhere is the double standard more visible than in Maimonides' handling of the crime of murder. He stated categorically in Section One of Chapter One of "Laws Concerning Murder and the Preservation of Life" that "If one slays a human being, he transgresses a negative commandment, for Scripture says, Thou shalt not murder (Exod. 20:13). If one murders wilfully in the presence of witnesses, he is put to death by the sword, for when Scripture says, He shall surely be punished (Exod. 21:20), we have learned from tradition that this means death by the sword."¹⁶⁵ Well and good. But then comes the double standard: "If an Israelite kills a resident alien, he does not suffer capital punishment at the hands of the court, because Scripture says, And if a man come presumptuously upon his neighbor (Exod. 21:12). Needless to say, one is not put to death if he kills a heathen."¹⁶⁶ I do not think any additional comment is needed at this point.

163. Horowitz, Spirit of Jewish Law, p. 94.

164. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960).

165. Maimonides, Torts, "Laws Concerning Murder and the Preservation of Life," V:I:1, p. 195.

166. Ibid., V:II:1, p. 201.

L. Escaping Restitution

Horowitz asserted that the spirit of Jewish law has been humane because the rabbis have departed from the letter of Mosaic law. (Implicitly or explicitly, this is the same defense offered by Christian theologians when they also depart from the letter of the Mosaic law without specific New Testament authorizations.) One problem with Horowitz's argument is that Maimonides' interpretations are frequently opposed to the spirit of biblical justice precisely because he ignored the letter of biblical law.

For example, Maimonides discussed the case of a thief who stole an animal or a vessel, and who then immediately slaughtered the animal or deliberately broke the vessel—perhaps to conceal the evidence of the crime?—and later is convicted of the theft. What if, in the meantime, the market value of the stolen object has doubled? Does the thief pay double restitution based on the value of the item at the time of the theft or based on its market value at the time of the trial? If he has profited from the transaction, Maimonides said, he must pay restitution based on the stolen object's value at the time of the trial. But what if the thief accidentally lost the animal or accidentally broke the vessel? Maimonides stated, though without presenting any justifying argument, that the negligent thief owes restitution only on the value of the object at the time of the theft.¹⁶⁷

1. Undermining Justice

Such a legal principle would undermine biblical civil justice. First, how is the court to determine whether the loss was accidental? The thief obviously has a financial incentive to lie, since the burden of his repayment will be lighter. Second, what of the victim's added economic loss? Who protects the victim's interests? Why should his loss as a result of the time delay between the theft and the trial not be fully compensated by the thief, irrespective of the latter's quality of stewardship over the stolen goods? What Maimonides should have concluded was that the thief must provide multiple restitution to a victim based on the replacement cost at the time of his conviction for the crime. If the animal were still alive, he would be required to return that animal, and the animal would obviously be worth today's market value. Thus, the replacement value for a slaughtered animal is also to be worth today's market value, and so is the equivalent proportional restitution payment. This is obvious, this is fair, and Maimonides ignored it. He departed from both the letter of biblical law and its spirit.

167. "... if, however, the animal dies or the vessel is lost, he need pay only double its value at the time of the theft." Ibid., "Laws Concerning Theft," II:I:14, p. 63.

He concluded all this by stating that two-fold restitution is not required from any thief who is convicted of stealing bonds, land, or slaves, "because Scripture has imposed the liability for double payment only on movable things that have an intrinsic value, for it says, On an ox or an ass or a sheep or a garment (Ex. 22:8)." But aren't slaves movable? Physically, yes, but not legally, he said. "Now slaves are legally regarded the same as land, for Scripture says of them, And you shall bequeath them to your sons (Lev. 25:46). . . ." But aren't bonds as valuable as movable stolen goods? No; "bonds have no intrinsic value."¹⁶⁸

2. Committing Crimes Rationally

Furthermore, if a person is subject to flogging for a crime involving the theft of money, Maimonides insisted that he need not make any monetary penalty payment whatsoever to the victim, "because one is not subjected to both flogging and paying."¹⁶⁹ Why would a thief be subject to flogging in the first place? Possibly because he had stolen for a second or third time. We would imagine that the victim would receive compensation in the form of a monetary penalty payment, and the civil authorities would also flog the thief as a warning. Not in Maimonides' system. But he did make this clarification: the criminal must become subject to the monetary penalty and the flogging at the same time; if he commits two separate offenses, he can be required to suffer both penalties.¹⁷⁰

What, then, is the economically rational conclusion for thieves?

168. Ibid., II:II:2, p. 64. Yet he admitted elsewhere that "if one burns a creditor's bonds, he must pay the full debt recorded in the bond—for although the bond is not intrinsically money, he has caused the loss of money. . . ." Ibid., "Laws Concerning Wounding and Damage," IV:VII:9, p. 185.

169. Ibid., "Laws Concerning Theft," II:III:1, p. 67. He made this one exception: injuring someone, who then becomes eligible for compensation: ibid., "Laws Concerning Wounding and Damaging," IV:IV:9, p. 173.

170. In the case of robbery—stealing openly by threatening the victim—he said that the restitution payment is mandatory, so there can be no flogging, because "any prohibition the transgression of which may be repaired by restitution does not entail flogging." Ibid., "Laws Concerning Robbery and Lost Property," III:I:1, p. 90. If we are to accept this explanation at face value, then why did he ever bring up the parallel issue of crimes that require monetary penalties in relation to flogging? Shouldn't the requirement of restitution always eliminate the possibility of flogging? There is an inconsistency here.

Steal money, not goods, and be sure you commit a trespass at the same time that will involve flogging if you are convicted.¹⁷¹ Habitual thieves should steal only money, if the automatic added penalty is a flogging.

Along this same line is his insistence that thefts committed on the Sabbath are exempt from the requirement of restitution, since working on the Sabbath was a capital offense in the Old Testament, and he insisted that "if one commits a transgression entailing capital punishment and also a monetary penalty, he need not pay even if he has acted through error."¹⁷² But the two crimes must occur at the same time.¹⁷³ "If one steals an animal and butchers it on the Sabbath or kills it as a heathen sacrifice, even through error, he need not pay fourfold or fivefold, as we have explained."¹⁷⁴ "If one borrows a cow and then butchers it on the Sabbath in an act of theft, he is exempt even from paying double, because the breach of the Sabbath and the theft are done at the same time, and where there is no payment for theft, there can be no penalty for butchering or selling."¹⁷⁵ Who then protects the innocent victim from doubly perverse thieves, who are Sabbath-breakers, too? The more corrupt the criminal, the more judicially vulnerable becomes the innocent victim in Maimonides' system.

We see this especially in his treatment of the thief who is sold into slavery to compensate his victim. Biblical law requires that a thief be sold into slavery if he does not have enough money or assets to compensate his victim: ". . . if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for his theft" (Ex. 22:3b). Scripture protects the victim, not the thief. Maimonides said that if the thief steals a second time, and from a different victim, he may be sold into slavery again, as many times as he steals from a new victim, even a hundred times. "But if he steals a second time from the first person, he may not be sold again, rather whatever he has stolen is counted as a debt against him."¹⁷⁶ A truly vicious criminal who repeatedly steals from a truly victimized citizen does not suffer the required biblical penalty, said Maimonides. Once again, the interests of the victim are sacrificed for the benefit of the criminal.

He wrote that a thief who improves a stolen good, such as fattening a stolen animal, needs to make double restitution only of the value

171. Maimonides did not say what kind of crime would bring a person under both penalties simultaneously. This makes it difficult to know what he had in mind.

172. Ibid., "Laws Concerning Theft," II:III:1, p. 67.

173. Ibid., II:III:1, p. 68.

174. Ibid., II:III:3, p. 68.

175. Ibid., II:III:4, pp. 68-69.

176. Ibid., II:III:15, p. 71.

of the item at the time of the theft. He gets to keep any of the improvements. If the owner had abandoned hope of ever having his goods returned to him, the thief even gets to keep any resulting productivity, such as the offspring of a stolen female animal. Thus, the longer the anguish of the innocent, and the greater his loss of hope, the more likely the thief will profit from his crime.¹⁷⁷

There should be no double restitution penalty imposed on those who use false weights and measures, Maimonides insisted. It is unquestionably theft, as he recognized. Why no penalty payment? He never said. "Although one who measures or weighs falsely steals thereby, he need not pay double but need only pay for the deficiency in measure or weight. Nor is flogging inflicted for breach of this prohibition, since there is a liability to pay."¹⁷⁸ Here is another loophole for thieves: judicially risk-free theft. If a man steals and is not caught, he keeps what he has stolen; if he gets caught, he is required to give back only what he stole. Worse: it is risk-free for a form of theft which is extremely difficult for the victims to detect, false weights and measures. In short, the more self-conscious the criminal, and the more vulnerable his intended victims, the less the penalty.

The crime of robbery—theft by force¹⁷⁹—is clearly worse than theft by stealth. The robber steals the object, and he also inflicts fear. True to form, Maimonides exempted the robber from the requirement of making double restitution, which is required from the thief: "If one commits robbery, he must return the very object he robbed, for Scripture says, He shall restore that which he took by robbery (Lev. 5:23). If, however, the object is lost or altered, he must pay its value. But he is liable for the repayment of its capital value only, whether he confesses of his own accord or whether witnesses testify that he took it by robbery."¹⁸⁰ Furthermore, "If the owner has abandoned hope of recovery but the property is unchanged, the robber acquires title to any improvement that takes place after hope is abandoned, and he need pay only its value as of the time of the robbery. This rule is on the authority of the Scribes, enacted for the benefit of penitents."¹⁸¹ If the owner has given up hope of ever recovering it, he forfeits both the earnings the property might have produced for him and any improvements 177. Ibid., II:I:11–12, pp. 61–62.

178. Ibid., II:VII:2, p. 80.

179. "Who is deemed a robber? One who takes another's property by force." Ibid., III:I:3, p. 90.

180. Ibid., III:I:5, p. 91.

181. Ibid., III:II:2, p. 94.

made by the robber.¹⁸² In short, the worse the crime, the less the penalty; the greater the suffering by the victim, the less the compensation due to him.

M. Kidnapping

If any crime sends fear into the hearts of parents, it is this one. God's law makes the penalty clear: "And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death" (Ex. 21:16). But the rabbis could not tolerate this law, so they created a system of judicial requirements that made it virtually impossible to convict anyone. Horowitz wrote: "The crime consisted of four elements: carrying off, detention, enslavement, and selling, which must occur in the order named."¹⁸³ The prisoner must be taken completely from his home. He must be detained on the offender's premises. "If the victim is detained anywhere else, even though he be locked up and completely under the abductor's control, the crime is not made out."¹⁸⁴ He must be made a slave by means of "any service or use however slight which the victim was compelled to render or submit to, e.g. to be leaned on or to be used as a screen against the draft even while he was asleep or unconscious."¹⁸⁵ He must then be sold as a slave, and to strangers rather than kinsmen. He cited Sanhedrin 85b. On this basis, none of the sons of Jacob could have been convicted of kidnapping Joseph, for they did not take Joseph from his home, nor did they use him as a slave.

The term "Talmudic reasoning" is attached to logic like that employed by Maimonides—the splitting of hairs in order to make impossible any judicial sanctions against an offender. Maimonides wrote: "If one abducts another and uses him and sells him, but the kidnapped person is still on his own premises and has not been taken onto the premises of the kidnapper, the kidnapper is exempt. If one abducts another and takes him onto his premises and uses him but does not sell him, or sells him before using him, or uses him and sells him to one of the kidnapped person's relatives—for example, if he sells him to his father or his brother—the kidnapper is exempt, for Scripture says,

182. Maimonides cited the anonymous sages to prove that the victim is entitled to the increased market value of the stolen object, if this increase has not come as a result of improvements made by the robber: ibid., III:II:16, p. 97.

183. Horowitz, Spirit of Jewish Law, p. 196.

184. Ibid., p. 197.

185. Idem.

Stealing any of his brethren . . . and sell him, implying that he must separate him from his brethren and kinsfolk by the sale. Similarly, if one abducts a person who is asleep, uses him asleep, and sells him while he is still asleep, the kidnapper is exempt."¹⁸⁶

Horowitz's concluding remarks are appropriate: "That the Rabbis considered the death penalty too severe for this wrong to society and the individual, seems quite plain from the foregoing rules. But they were bound by the express command of Scripture; hence they devised such requirements as made conviction virtually impossible. There is no record, moreover, that a regular court ever convicted a person of Manstealing."¹⁸⁷ Lest this claim be thought unrepresentative because of a presumed lack of data, bear in mind that the Jewish rabbis from all over the world saved records of their court decisions since the tenth century. Something in the range of 3,000 volumes of these records, with at least 300,000 judgments, have been compiled.¹⁸⁸ While these records until recently were unindexed (they have now been put on computer in Israel),¹⁸⁹ and therefore were usable only by highly trained specialists who possessed astounding memories, the basic conclusions are known. Thus, Horowitz's statement is probably representative of the history of Jewish decisions regarding kidnapping: not one conviction.

Michael Guttman made a similar assessment: "The general principle upon which the Mishnah has to be valued juridically is the endeavor to restrict death punishment to a minimum. The Talmud could not flatly annul the death penalty since a Pentateuchal law could not be abrogated; therefore the requirements pertaining to the giving of evidence and the proof of premeditation were made so severe that a death verdict was almost impossible."¹⁹⁰

One reason for this reticence to impose the penalties established in the Old Testament was that the Jews believed that every Jewish court had to have at least one judge who had been appointed by the laying on of hands (semikah) by a preceding judge. Like the rabbi who supposedly could trace his teachers back to Moses, so was the judge. But there was a problem. This laying on of hands could take place only in 186. Maimonides, Torts, "Laws Concerning Theft," II:IX:3, p. 86.

187. Horowitz, Spirit, pp. 197-98.

188. Elon, "Introduction," in Elon (ed.), Principles of Jewish Law, col. 13.

189. "Computer Digests the Talmud to Help Rabbis," New York Times (Nov. 24, 1984).

190. Michael Guttman, "The Term 'Foreigner' Historically Considered," Hebrew Union College Annual, III (1926), p. 17.

the Holy Land. "A court not thus qualified," wrote Horowitz, "had no jurisdiction to impose the punishments prescribed in the Torah."¹⁹¹

After the Bar Kochba revolt failed in 135, the Romans scattered the Jews throughout the empire; the Diaspora began in earnest. This loss of residence was used as an excuse by the rabbis to abandon the required sanctions of the Old Covenant.

The Rabbis were compelled, therefore, in order to preserve the Torah and to maintain law and order, to enlarge the authority of Rabbinical tribunals. This they accomplished by emphasizing the distinction between Biblical penalties and Rabbinical penalties. Rabbinical courts after the second century had no authority to impose Biblical punishments since they lacked semikah; but as regards penalties created by Rabbinical legislation, the Rabbis had of necessity, the widest powers of enforcement. They instituted, accordingly, a whole series of sanctions and penalties: excommunication, fines, physical punishment, use of the "secular arm" in imitation of the Church, etc."¹⁹²

Thus ended, formally, the Old Covenant. It had ended judicially in God's eyes in A.D. 70, but now there could be no mistaking what had happened. Judaism officially became rabbinic rather than Mosaic. To "preserve the Torah," the rabbis decided to abandon it. That Rabbi Akiba, one of the early compilers of the oral law, had joined with Bar Kochba and died in this revolt,¹⁹³ was fitting; the defeat of Bar Kochba was to make possible the triumph of the Talmud over the Old Testament and its required sanctions.

Without sanctions, there can be no covenant.¹⁹⁴ Without God's specified sanctions, there can be no covenant under Him, except as a broken covenant. This is the dilemma of Judaism. The specified sanctions in the Old Testament are no longer applicable, Orthodox Jews believe, because Jews are outside the land. The specified sanctions of animal sacrifices are also gone. The temple was destroyed in A.D. 70.

191. Horowitz, Spirit of Jewish Law, p. 93.

192. Idem. So serious was being outside the land that one rabbi cited in the Talmud taught that those Jews buried outside the land will not be resurrected. "R. Eleazar stated: The dead outside the Land will not be resurrected; for it is said in Scripture, And I will set glory in the land of the living, [implying] the dead of the land in which I have my desire will be resurrected, but the dead [of the land] in which I have no desire will not be resurrected." Kethuboth 111a.

193. Supposedly he died on the very day of the birth of Judah HaNasi, the compiler of the Mishnah: J. H. Hertz, Foreword, Babylonian Talmud, Baba Kamma (London: Soncino Press, 1935), p. xv.

194. Sutton, That You May Prosper, ch. 4.

Yet without these sanctions—against criminals and against animal representatives—there cannot be Old Covenant religion. There can only be a broken covenant.

N. Mastering a Book

There is no doubt in my mind that opening the Talmud does not really open it. Opening Maimonides' Code, however, does begin to get the Talmud's conclusions into the open, though not its various modes of reasoning. When Jewish scholars co-operated a generation ago in making available an English-language translation of the Code, they performed a service analogous to the translating of the Talmud. But this service, being intellectual in nature, opened the formerly linguistically locked gates. Inquirers today are free to enter the gateway and snoop around at their leisure. They may not do justice to everything they find. Or, from a different critic's perspective, they may do greater justice than some would prefer. But this is the cost of intellectual progress. Debates arise, and they sometimes continue for centuries without resolution. This is especially true of religious debates.

My part-time odyssey through Jewish literature has led me to things that I appreciate (e.g., the exegetical insights of U. Cassuto and S. R. Hirsch) and things that I do not appreciate (e.g., various teachings regarding Jesus and Christians in general that are found in the Talmud). The economic teachings of the Pentateuch are not all that easy to decipher at first glance. I am sure that Jewish commentators have had the same sorts of problems that I have encountered. They have come to their share of inaccurate conclusions. Who is to challenge these conclusions? Jews only? Then are Christians' conclusions equally immune from challenges by Jews? The answer is clear, I think. Anyway, it should be. We must all deal with the texts. If God spoke them, as I believe He did, then we must all seek to understand precisely what He said. Sometimes even higher critics can pinpoint a truth. Surely if they can, then those of us who take the texts seriously as the word of God can comment on them, as well as on each other's comments.

In the Preface to a book on the ethics of Judaism by Unitarian scholar R. Travers Herford, John J. Tepfer lamented: "Over the centuries the many-tomed Talmud, and kindred products of the early Rabbinic mind such as the Midrash, have been subjected to keen scrutiny by numerous learned Christians, mainly, however, with an eye to their value for Christian faith and dogma. The aims of these men being largely apologetic, they drew invidious comparisons between the two faiths, pointing up what they considered to be the absurdities of Rabbinic law and lore, and demonstrating the superior spiritual worth of the authoritative writings of the Church."¹⁹⁵ I clearly would choose to be numbered among these unnamed Christian critics.

The more I read in Maimonides' Code, the more I detect a tendency on his part to give the benefit of the doubt to the thief or the cheat, and therefore to sacrifice the interests of the innocent victim. Consider this example: stealing an animal from a fellow Israelite who has set it aside for a priest. "If one steals heave offering from a (lay) Israelite who has designated it (to be given to a priest), he is not obliged to pay double, for the owner's only right in it is the pleasure of giving it to whom he pleases, and such a right has no monetary value."¹⁹⁶ I should think that any self-respecting Jew would hope that Maimonides was not a faithful compiler and summarizer of traditional rabbinic opinion, for the sake of the reputation of the rabbis, but his defenders insist that he was, and there have been few traditional Jewish detractors of Maimonides who have been visible to gentiles, from his day to the present.

By departing from the letter of the Mosaic law, time after time, the rabbis abandoned the spirit of Mosaic law as well. This is why Jesus began so many of His public lessons with the phrase, "You have heard it said . . . but I say unto you." He was waging war with both the spirit and the letter of Talmudic law, for it violates both the spirit and the letter of biblical law.

This is not to say that Talmudic laws are all corrupt or that the responsa (post-Talmudic case law decisions) based on the Talmud are all corrupt. The Jews at least attempted very early to create a unique, distinctly Jewish, systematic body of laws. By viewing their world in terms of law, they involved themselves and their culture in the task of casuistry: applying fixed laws to specific circumstances. They began this process nearly a millennium before the Christians did, and the Christian law codes (Theodosian's, Justinian's) after the sixth century fell into disuse in the West as feudal society steadily replaced Christian Roman rule.

The huge body of materials that their judges had to master required feats of memory that are astounding to gentiles of this day. Few of us can imagine the ability of the contemporary Talmud scholar David Weiss, who memorized 200 pages of the Talmud at age five, and who earned money by answering such questions as this one: "If I put a pin through word X on page Y, what words would it pierce on the pages beneath?"¹⁹⁷ Yet there have been many Jews with David Weiss' training and abilities over the centuries. The production of such prodigies has been a Jewish academic specialty for at least two millennia.

195. John J. Tepfer, "Preface" (1962) to R. Travers Herford, The Ethics of the Talmud, p. vii.

196. Torts, "Laws Concerning Theft," II:II:5, p. 64.

Because they had to master "a book," and an immense one, Jewish scholars had to discipline themselves intellectually. They set the example for their followers. Because rabbis were frequently involved in business trades, this led to a unique attribute of Jewish culture. Wrote Paul Johnson: "Rabbinical Judaism is essentially a method whereby ancient laws are adapted to modern and differing conditions by a process of rationalization. The Jews were the first great rationalizers in world history. This had all kinds of consequences as we shall see, but one of its earliest, in a worldly sense, was to turn Jews into methodical, problem-solving businessmen. A great deal of Jewish legal scholarship in the Dark and Middle Ages was devoted to making business dealings fair, honest and efficient."¹⁹⁸ But what if they had concentrated their efforts exclusively on the task of explaining the Old Testament without any of the excess baggage of fables, occultism, and judicial interpretations specifically designed to allow criminals to escape the full consequences of their actions? Think of the commentaries they would have produced! Christians could have learned from them (and they from Christians) the things I am spending my life trying to research from scratch. The modern world would be a very different and far more productive place. But they could not do it and still remain Jews, for Jesus had made their dilemma plain: "For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me: for he wrote of me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" (John 5:46–47). The Mishnah and the Talmud are not what we Christians might have hoped for, and what some Christians have mistakenly believed that they are: commentaries on the Old Testament, but with no mention of the 197. Israel Shenker, "A Life in the Talmud," New York Times Magazine (Sept. 11, 1977).

198. Johnson, History, p. 172. Quite properly, he cited Irving Agus' remarkable two-volume study of medieval responsa or legal decisions: Urban Civilization in Pre-Crusade Europe (New York: Yeshiva University Press, 1968), a book I stumbled across in the library in the late 1960s, and recommended to R. J. Rushdoony. He used it in his Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 788.

Trinity.

Conclusion

If Christians and Jews do not agree about the nature of law and the proper approach to and interpretation of biblical legal texts, even when they officially appeal to the same legal sources, then the Judeo-Christian tradition is a myth. There would have to be a common legal tradition, yet such a tradition does not exist. Modern Christians and Jews, because they are modern, do not recognize the hypothetical nature of this academic construct; they no longer take law or religion seriously enough, especially law. The two religions are no longer viewed by their adherents as being inherently judicial in nature. Thus, the two religions have changed radically, yet this change has been disguised by the self-conscious triumphant humanism of modern culture. Both the Jews and the Christians have enthusiastically sent their children into tax-financed secular schools, and their common enemies have transformed the worldview of their children. The covenantal heirs no longer recognize the extent of the former division between the Christian and Jewish legal traditions because they no longer are aware of the legal revolution that has captured the West over the last century. This revolution, legal scholar Harold Berman argued, now threatens our freedom as no other revolution ever has: the rise of secular, bureaucratic, administrative law.¹⁹⁹

Berman made another important observation: law has broken down in the West because religion has been privatized. "The traditional symbols of community in the West, the traditional images and metaphors, have been above all religious and legal. In the twentieth century, however, for the first time, religion has become largely a private affair, while law has become largely a matter of practical expediency. The connection between the religious metaphor and the legal metaphor has been broken. Neither expresses any longer the community's vision of its future and its past; neither commands any longer its passionate loyalty."²⁰⁰

If there were a Judeo-Christian tradition, there would be a common legal order. What this essay has shown is that there has not been any common legal order uniting Bible-believing Christians and Tal-

199. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), pp. 33–41.

200. Ibid., p. vi.

mud-believing Jews, which is why there were Jewish ghettos in medieval European cities and separate Jewish rural communities, especially in Russia. Jews insisted on these separate communities because they insisted on being ruled by their own courts, and Christian rulers gave them their request.²⁰¹ Jews recognized clearly that if they subordinated themselves under the civil laws of Christian states they would lose their covenantal autonomy. In the nineteenth century, they steadily abandoned this view, but only after the gentiles' civil orders ceased being Christian and became secular humanist.

If there were a Judeo-Christian tradition, there would be evidence of a shared legal tradition, especially in the formative years of the Western legal tradition: the eleventh through thirteenth centuries. Berman summarized: "... neither Jewish thought nor Jewish law seems to have had any substantial influence on the legal systems of the West, at least so far as the surviving literature shows."²⁰² One reason for this, he speculates (I think correctly), is what he calls the casuistry of the Talmud. I would call it the dialecticism: "... the intense casuistry of the Talmud may have helped to make it seem alien to Western legal thought, which stressed the systematization of legal principles."²⁰³

We needed to examine some of the legal sources of the Jewish legal tradition in order to determine to what extent there has been or can be a Judeo-Christian tradition. Christian scholars have seldom done this in the past, and the result has been a major intellectual gap and therefore major blind spot in the thinking of modern Bible-believing Christians. But blind spots are not perceived by those who suffer from them unless they are shown to the victims. This essay, I trust, has made this blind spot visible.²⁰⁴

Because I am a Christian Reconstructionist, I am deeply interested in law, specifically biblical law. I am interested in the effects that biblical law and its specific applications have had on Christian civilization. I believe, as Berman does, that there can be no true social revolution

201. Louis Finkelstein, Jewish Self-Government in the Middle Ages (Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, [1924] 1972).

202. Berman, Law and Revolution, p. 589.

203. Idem.

204. The physical blind spot in each eye exists because of the structure of the eye. Discover it for yourself. Get a piece of blank paper, and put an X in the middle of the paper and a dot about two inches to the left. Close your right eye. Keeping your left eye focused on the X, move the paper slowly toward your eye. At some point, the dot will disappear from view. Your brain will continue to "cover" for your eye's failure by filling the visible gap with the color of the paper. The dot disappears.

without a change in a particular society's legal order; without such a transformation, a so-called revolution is merely a coup d'état. It takes more than one generation to consolidate a revolution, and the primary manifestation of this consolidation is always legal.²⁰⁵ If it is true, as Berman believed, that we are approaching the end of an era,²⁰⁶ then it is incumbent on Christians to begin to rethink their covenantal heritage. They must begin to offer an alternative to the present collapsing social order, and this alternative must be self-consciously judicial. Christians must become judicial revolutionaries, not simply defenders of the present legal order.²⁰⁷ If we remain on the deck of this sinking ship, claiming that it is in principle conformable with biblical principles, we shall go down with it.²⁰⁸ Sticking with the status quo means sure death by drowning.

205. Ibid., p. 20.

206. Ibid. p. v.

207. Gary North, When Justice Is Aborted: Biblical Standards for Non-Violent Resistance (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnjustice>)

208. Gary North, Political Polytheism: The Myth of Pluralism (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnpolpol>)

APPENDIX M

VICTIM'S RIGHTS VS. THE MESSIANIC STATE

I begin with a biblical principle: all crime is primarily an attack on God. Only secondarily is crime an attack on an earthly victim. The victim represents God judicially. This is why God requires the civil government to defend the victim. In doing so, the civil government defends God. In this appendix, I will defend this view of crime and punishment.

I begin with the doctrine of hierarchy. This includes the doctrine of representation.¹ This is point two of the biblical covenant model. The Book of Exodus, the second book in the Pentateuch, is primarily concerned with point two of the covenant, for the Pentateuch is itself structured in terms of the biblical covenant's five-point structure. It is appropriate that questions relating to representation should be the focus of several of the case laws of Exodus.

The covenant's representation principle is built into the creation. We know that the visible creation testifies to the existence of the invisible God. "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse" (Rom. 1:20). Men, as creatures, cannot strike at God directly. They must act through intermediaries. Men strike some aspect of God's creation in their attempt to strike at God. Men commit crimes against God-created men and the God-created environment, but always in the creation's capacity as reflecting God. Men are creatures, so they must use the creation as the only available means of any attempted attack on God. As Cornelius Van Til wrote in numerous places, the child must sit on the father's lap in order to slap his face.

1. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, 2nd ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1987] 1992), pp. 46–47. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

A. God Is the Primary Victim

Biblically and covenantally speaking, the earthly victim of a crime is always the secondary victim; God is always the primary victim. Ours is a theocentric universe, not anthropocentric. This means, additionally, that the criminal acts in his own interests secondarily; when committing a biblically prohibited act, he acts primarily as Satan's representative, just as Adam did. This judicial principle—the doctrine of covenantal representation—is not intuitively apparent to those who are not trained to think theocentrically and covenantally. We must learn to think theocentrically and representatively (covenantally) when we think about crime and punishment.

Christians and Jews should therefore begin any consideration of the principles of biblical jurisprudence with this fundamental legal principle: God is always the primary victim of every sin and every crime. This leads to a crucial conclusion: the victims of any crime or unlawful attack become the legal representatives of God. The victim of a crime is authorized by God, the Author of history, to initiate a covenant lawsuit against the suspected criminal. He and he alone is so authorized. While it is legitimate to speak of primary and secondary earthly victims of crime, we must always bear in mind that the primary cosmic victim is always God.

Because of the somewhat intricate nature of my arguments in this chapter, I think it is best if I state my conclusion in advance, so that the reader will be better able to assess the cogency of my argumentation. The conclusion that I have come to after having studied in detail this and other biblical case laws is that the following judicial principle is dominant in the Bible: if the victim of a crime fails to initiate this covenant lawsuit, then the other covenantal agents of God must honor this decision—the civil magistrate, the church officer, and the head of a household. They are not authorized in this instance to step in and prosecute in God's name as God-ordained covenantal judges. They are unquestionably judges.² But because of the principle of victim's rights, they are prohibited from prosecuting if the victim decides to forego bringing the lawsuit, unless they can show that they themselves have become victims because of the original victim's failure to prosecute.

In biblical jurisprudence, it is the victim whose rights must always be upheld, not simply because he was harmed by the criminal, but also because he served as God's surrogate when he became the victim. God is the primary victim, and His rights must be upheld first and foremost. His specified judicial sanctions must be enforced by His designated covenantal representatives. His case laws provide mankind with the proper guidelines of how His honor is to be upheld in various cases.

2. Gary North, When Justice Is Aborted: Biblical Standards for Non-Violent Resistance (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1989), ch. 2. (<http://bit.ly/gnjustice>)

There is another Bible-sanctioned office to consider, the office of witness. The witness is authorized to bring relevant information to one of these covenantal judges, so that the judge can initiate the covenant lawsuit against the suspected violator.³ The witness plays a very important role in the prosecution of God's covenant lawsuits. Without at least two witnesses, it is illegal to execute anyone (Deut. 17:6). Also, the affirming witnesses in a capital lawsuit must be the first people to cast stones (Deut. 17:7).

B. The Biblical Hierarchical Structure

Adam was allowed to do anything he wanted in the garden, except eat from the forbidden tree. There was a specific sanction attached to that crime, a capital sanction. This reveals a fundamental biblical judicial principle: anything is permitted unless it is explicitly prohibited by law, or prohibited by an extension of a case law's principle. This principle places the individual under public law, but it also relies on self-government as the primary policing device. It creates the bottom-up appeals court character of biblical society. Men are judicially free to act however they please unless society, through its various covenantal courts, has been authorized by God's Bible-revealed law to restrict certain specified kinds of behavior.

The bottom-up appeals court structure of the biblical hierarchy is in opposition to the principle of top-down bureaucratic control. Under the latter hierarchical system, in theory nothing is permitted except what has been commanded. The decision-making private individual is tightly restricted; the centralized state is expanded. This is the governing principle of all socialist economic planning. It assumes the omni-

3. The hostility of siblings against "tattle tales" in a family is easily explainable: youthful law-breakers resent judgment. They resent witnesses whose action brings the dreaded sanctions. But what about parents? Parents who side with the critics of "tattle tales" are thereby attempting to escape their God-given role as judges. They are saying, in principle, "We don't want to know about it. We don't want to serve as judges, despite our position as God's designated representative agents in this family."

science and omnicompetence of distant central planners.⁴

A free society needs predictable law.⁵ The maximum sanction for any crime must be specified in written law or at least in traditional legal precedent. A criminal should know in advance the maximum negative consequences of conviction. He is under law, but so are his judges. The state as well as the criminal are restrained under biblical law. The state is placed under tight judicial restraints, and first and foremost among these restraints is the requirement that crimes and their respective sanctions be announced in advance. There must be no ex post facto statutes or sanctions. This reduces the arbitrary authority of judges to apply sanctions or increase sanctions beyond what is specified in the law code. Judges sometimes possess the authority to reduce the specified sanctions, as this chapter argues, but never to increase them. This restriction drastically reduces the growth of arbitrary civil power. By adhering to this biblical principle of responsible freedom under specified law, the West made possible the development of modern capitalism and its accompanying high per capita wealth.

The limits on the biblical state's ability to impose arbitrary sanctions are derived from three case-law principles. First, the God-given authority of the victim to refuse to prosecute, and also his authority to reduce the applicable sanctions upon conviction of the criminal, restricts the power of the civil magistrate. Second, the maximum sanction allowed by existing law keeps the state under restraint. Third, the pleonasm of execution—"dying, he shall die"—inhibits the authority of the judges to subsidize outrageous crimes by imposing reduced sanctions in specific cases: whenever the state has lawfully initiated the covenant lawsuit because there is no earthly victim who could initiate it. To deny any of these principles is to promote the advent of the messianic state.

To describe the working of these three case-law principles, we need to begin with the maximum civil sanction: execution. Because public execution is the maximum civil sanction allowed by God's law, it has the most critics.

4. Gary North, Marx's Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, [1968] 1989), Appendix A: "Socialist Economic Calculation." (<http://bit.ly/gnmrror>)

5. F. A. Hayek, The Constitution of Liberty (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960).

C. Capital Punishment: Yesterday and Today

One of the complaints against the continuing legitimacy of biblical law is that the death penalty is too rigorous to be applied as a sanction against most of the capital crimes specified by the Old Testament. Therefore, conclude the Mosaic law's critics, execution is no longer a valid civil sanction today, except in the case of murder.⁶ This line of argumentation leads to the peculiar conclusion that, in the Old Covenant era, covenantally faithful people were expected by God to be a lot more rigorous about prosecuting criminals, and were therefore expected to be more willing to see God's civil sanctions enforced. This rigorous "Old Testament attitude" toward criminals is no longer valid, it is said, because of the coming of the New Covenant. But if Christians are to be less rigorous regarding crime and its appropriate civil sanctions, then God also must have adopted a more lenient attitude, which is supposedly reflected in His New Covenant law. A major problem with this line of reasoning is the fact that God's New Covenant standards seem to be more rigorous, e.g., the prohibition of easy divorce (Matt. 19:7–9).⁷ With greater maturity and greater revelation, Christians are supposed to be less lenient about sin. After all, more is expected from him to whom more has been given (Luke 12:47–48).⁸ The New Testament gives Christians greater revelation and assigns us far more responsibility than was the case in the Old Covenant era. Christ's resurrection is behind us. The Holy Spirit has come.

It could be argued, of course, that because greater mercy has been shown to us, we should extend greater mercy. With respect to the judicial principle of victim's rights, I quite agree. The victim should be more merciful, so long as his mercy does not subsidize further evil. He must judge the character of the criminal. But this does not answer the question of designated capital crimes. Is it the state's responsibility to adopt the principle of reduced New Covenant sanctions, despite the explicit revelation of the Old Covenant case laws? Should the state adopt a judicial principle different from that which prevailed in the Old Covenant? I answer no. Furthermore, I also answer that civil judges in Mosaic Israel had the God-given authority to reduce the severity of the specified sanctions under certain circumstances. I develop the evidence for this conclusion in this chapter.

6. For example, see John Murray, Principles of Conduct (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1957), p. 118.

7. Section F: "Divorce by Covenantal Death."

8. Gary North, Treasure and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Luke, 3rd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2001] 2011), ch. 28.

Critics of capital punishment also argue that righteous and sensitive jury members today are unwilling to hand down “guilty” verdicts against offenders in many cases, because the death penalty is much too harsh. If the death penalty is kept on the statute books, critics argue, serious criminal behavior is therefore indirectly subsidized by victims’ unwillingness to prosecute and juries’ unwillingness to convict. Thus, conclude the critics, we should ignore the Old Testament’s capital sanction in all but the case of premeditated murder. Some Christian critics would even abandon capital punishment in this instance, following the lead of secular humanist criminologists and jurists.

It is my belief that, in the twenty-first century, there are three affirmations, the denial of which best indicates the presence of Christian heresy. Heresy is easy to conceal in a world of endless qualifications and maneuvering. But three affirmations go right to the heart of the neo-evangelical and neo-orthodox rejection of biblical revelation. The first is the inerrancy of the Bible, as delivered in the original manuscripts. The second is the doctrine of eternal punishment. The third is the doctrine of capital punishment, as specified in the Old Testament case laws (unless modified by a specific New Testament revelation). I think the third is related to the second: God’s merciless torturing of His covenant-breaking enemies, and the state’s merciless delivery of capital crime-committing offenders into the court of the eternally torturing Judge. Therefore, the affirmation of the legitimacy of case-law specified capital punishment is an initial step back on the road to Christian orthodoxy.

I devote much of this appendix to a detailed consideration of the key phrase, “shall surely be put to death.” It requires a lengthy excursion in order to deal with some things not intuitively obvious from the text. I begin my discussion by considering the theological basis of all prosecutions by any court, the covenant lawsuit.

D. The Covenant Lawsuit

Adam and Eve had to serve as witnesses and judges in the garden. There was no escape from these two offices. The serpent had forced their hand. They had heard Satan’s temptation, namely, that they could be as God if they disobeyed God (Gen. 3:5). They had become witnesses. They could not escape from their knowledge of the ser-pent's words. He had spoken in their presence.⁹ They could stand with God and God's law by obeying God's word concerning Himself, the forbidden fruit, and the promised sentence of execution, or they could stand with Satan and his word concerning God, the forbidden fruit, and the promised execution. But when called upon by God to testify in His court, they would be required to testify, either against themselves if they stood with Satan or against Satan if they stood with God.¹⁰ They both sought to escape self-incrimination. Adam blamed Eve, and Eve blamed the serpent. Still, there was no available judicial escape. Their fig leaves testified against them. They knew they were guilty, and their wardrobes testified to their sense of guilt.

They also had to serve as judges. They could issue a condemnation of God by eating the forbidden fruit, or they could issue a condemnation of Satan, either by eating of the tree of life, or by eating from any tree except the forbidden one, or by not eating anything at all. But they could not avoid serving as judges. They had to decide. They had to act. They had to render judgment.¹¹

The two offices, witness and judge, were inherent in their position as God's authorized representatives on earth (Gen. 1:26).¹² Because of Satan's rebellion and his temptation of them, they were forced to decide: Against whom would they bring the required covenant lawsuit, God or Satan? They brought it against God. They served as Satan's agents. They implicitly claimed to be the victims of God's discriminatory restrictions against them, for God had denied them access to the forbidden fruit, and He had obviously lied to them concerning His power to enforce His will. They must have regarded His promised sanctions as a lie. Why else would anyone commit automatic suicide for a bite of forbidden fruit? They brought their covenant lawsuit

9. This assumes that Adam was at Eve's side when the serpent spoke. If he was not, then only Eve heard him speak. She should then have gone to Adam for confirmation, and he would have had to ask the serpent to repeat his claim. As I argue in my study of the incident, in order for Satan to gain the biblically specified pair of witnesses against God, they both had to act against God's law. I think that Adam was next to Eve when the serpent spoke. Adam let her act in his name. He allowed her to test the serpent's claim.

10. This is the theological foundation of the idea of the subpoena. The state has a legitimate right to compel the appearance of an individual in court, as well as compel his truthful testimony. This right is denied by some libertarians. Cf. Murray N. Rothbard, For a New Liberty: The Libertarian Manifesto, rev. ed. (<http://bit.ly/mrfanl>) against God in absentia by partaking of the forbidden fruit in the presence of Satan, thereby indulging in a satanic sacrament, an unholy communion service. They ate a ritual meal in the presence of the prince of demons. This is what Paul warned against: eating at the table of demons (I Cor. 10:21).

11. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1987] 2012), Appendix E: "Witnesses and Judges."

12. Ibid., ch. 3.

From the day that the serpent tempted Adam and Eve by testifying falsely concerning God's revealed word, there has been a designated victim of all criminal behavior: God. Satan needed to recruit human accomplices in his war against God. He needed two witnesses, the required number to prosecute anyone successfully for a capital crime (Deut. 17:6). But the moment that Adam and Eve brought their false testimony into God's court, they became subject to the penalty for perjury: suffering the same punishment to which the falsely accused victim was subject (Deut. 19:16–19).¹³ If their testimony had been true, then God must have lied about who is truly sovereign over the universe. He would have given false testimony against the true god, man. God would have been guilty of calling man to worship a false god, which is a capital offense (Deut. 13:6–9). He would also have been guilty of false prophesying, another capital offense (Deut. 13:1–5). Adam and Eve had sought to indict God for a capital offense; they were subsequently executed by God. So are all their heirs who persist in refusing to renounce the judicial accusations of their parents, who represented them in God's court.

In His grace, God offered them a judicial covering, a temporary stay of execution, which was symbolized by the animal skins (Gen. 3:21). This symbolic covering required the slaying of an animal. God offered them time on earth to repent. He offered them a way to make restitution to Him: the blood sacrifice of specified animals. He did this because He looked forward in time to the death of His Son on the cross, the only possible restitution payment large enough to cover the sin of Adam and his heirs.

His Son's representative death is the basis of all of God's gifts to mankind in history. Grace is an unearned gift, meaning a gift earned by Christ at Calvary and given by God to all men in history. Christ's restitution payment serves as the basis of common grace to covenant-breakers in history and special grace to covenant-keepers in history and eternity.¹⁴ The words of Christ on the cross are the basis of com-

13. Gary North, Inheritance and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Deuteronomy, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1999] 2012), ch. 45.

14. Gary North, Dominion and Common Grace: The Biblical Basis of Progress

mon grace in history: “Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do” (Luke 23:34). Ignorance of the law is no excuse, but Jesus Christ grants grace to the ignorant anyway. He paid God’s price; He suffered God’s sanctions; so, He has the right to grant temporal (common) forgiveness on no terms at all, and eternal (special) forgiveness on His own terms.

E. Criminal and Victim as Covenantal Representatives

Adam and Eve served as Satan’s representatives when they had communion with him, thereby bringing a covenant lawsuit against God. Had they refused to take Satan’s advice, they would have served as God’s representatives against Satan. The point is, representation is an inescapable concept. The issue is never this one: “To serve or not to serve as the covenantal representative of a supernatural being.” The question is rather: “Which supernatural being shall I represent covenantally?” There is no escape from this decision and its consequences.

What does the word covenant mean biblically? God has created a legal relationship to man, one which is based on a legal bond. There is no personal relationship between God and man apart from this legal bond. The covenant structure has five parts:

1. Transcendence yet presence of God
2. Hierarchy (representative authority)
3. Ethics (law)
4. Oath (judgment and sanctions)
5. Succession (inheritance and continuity)

By combining the first letters, we get an acronym: THEOS, the Greek word for God. God’s three covenantal institutions are governed in terms of this five-point structure. These institutions of God-authorized government are: church, state, and family. The covenant structure is an inescapable concept.¹⁵

When a man sins, he thereby brings a covenantal lawsuit against God. His action violates all five points of the covenant. First, he denies that God is who He says He is: the Law-giver and eternal Judge. Second, he declares himself no longer under God’s hierarchical authority. Third, he says that God’s ethical standards do not apply to him. Fourth, he denies that God can or will apply His sanctions, either in history or eternity. Fifth, he asserts that covenant-breakers shall inherit the earth.

(Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gndcg>)

15. Sutton, That You May Prosper, op. cit.

1. Hierarchy

Let us consider in greater detail point two: hierarchy. By rebelling against God, he thereby places himself under the hierarchical authority of Satan. He becomes Satan's representative. This is why Christ spoke to Peter so harshly when Peter denied that Christ would soon go to His death: "Get thee behind me, Satan" (Matt. 16:23a). Men's actions are always representative. This is why God judges between the saved and lost, between sheep and goats, on judgment day (Matt. 25:32). The eternal life-and-death question on that great and terrible day will be: Which sovereign did you represent and serve on earth, God or Satan?

It is clear that Adam and Eve sinned directly against God. More specifically, they sinned against the God who walked in the garden (Gen. 3:8). This is the character of all sin: a denial of God's word, His authority, His ethical character, His sanctions, and His ability to disinherit covenant-breakers. Sin is a representative denial of God's covenant: His transcendence, His authority, His law, His judgment, and His inheritance. Man sins against God covenantally. He would steal the very throne of God if he could. "For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the most High" (Isa. 14:13–14). What will be the result of this attempted theft of God's glory? "Yet thou shalt be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit" (Isa. 14:15).

2. The Trial of Jesus

Jesus Christ was the judicial victim of a corrupt Jewish court, false witnesses, and a corrupt civil government. The Jewish leaders, in their capacity as the God-ordained representatives of the Jewish people, had brought a false covenant lawsuit against Jesus.¹⁶ They had convicted Him of a capital crime: claiming to be God. There were two ways that He could be exonerated: if there were no witnesses who could prove that He had made the claim, or if proof were presented that His claim was true. They had hired false witnesses and had not proved that His claim was false.

16. Part 2, Decalogue and Dominion, pp. xxiii-xxiv.

The Roman state acted as the sanction-imposing agent of the Jewish people. The people had chosen Barabbas as the recipient of their mercy rather than Christ (Matt. 27:21). The Jewish leaders had been faithful representatives of the people's will. Jesus would die on the cross.

Ultimately, there is no escape from a decision either for or against Jesus Christ, Israel's only true messiah and mankind's only true savior. The old truth of Christian evangelism is correct: "No decision is still a decision." Either men vote against Jesus Christ as covenantal representatives of the Jews and Rome, or else they vote with Jesus Christ as their covenantal representative against the Jews and Rome. Either the decision of the Jews and Pontius Pilate represents their views, both intellectually and judicially, or else God's affirmation of His Son represents them. Men bring a covenant lawsuit either against Jesus, as the Jews did, or against those who crucified Him, as Peter did (Acts 3). There is no escape. Men must bring a covenant lawsuit in this life. They must designate both the criminal and the victim at the drama on Calvary. Their designation will reflect their covenant status as either covenant-keepers or covenant-breakers.

F. Divorce by Covenantal Death

I have argued that sin is always a representative act. It is the act of bringing a covenantal lawsuit against God. A crime is a special kind of sin: a publicly verifiable act against God's civil law. It is an act of defiance against God's civil covenant with either an individual or some aspect of the environment as God's representative agent.

We can see the principle of victim's rights more clearly by focusing on marital divorce as a covenant lawsuit. Jesus set forth this law regarding divorce: "It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement: But I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery" (Matt. 5:31–32).

In this chapter, I do not want to cover all the theological ground that Ray Sutton covers in his book, Second Chance: Biblical Blueprints for Divorce and Remarriage.¹⁷ I agree with his argument that divorce is above all a covenantal act, and that any crime listed in the Old Testament as a capital offense constitutes legal grounds for divorce today. Jesus did not abrogate the Old Testament case laws that governed divorce and remarriage, except to make them more rigorous. The principle of New Testament divorce is the same as it was in the Old Testament: divorce by covenantal execution. There may also be physical execution involved, but in both Old and New Testament law, covenantal execution is primary; eternal execution in God's heavenly court is of greater consequence than physical execution by the civil government's court. Biblically speaking, physical execution is simply the God-ordained legal consequence of specific forms of covenantal execution. This has also been argued by R. J. Rushdoony¹⁸ and Greg Bahnsen¹⁹ with respect to divorce. I do not try to prove this argument in this chapter; I begin with the assumption that it is biblically correct. Those who disagree should consult these other sources.

17. Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987. (<http://bit.ly/rssecond>)

This line of reasoning from the Old Testament's case laws raises an important practical and legal issue. When a spouse commits an act that produces covenantal death—judicial death in the eyes of God—and when this is proven in one or more of God's authorized earthly courts, ecclesiastical and civil, either by the injured spouse or by other witnesses, the covenantally dead person becomes subject to covenantal sanctions. In a systematically biblical civil government, the maximum penalty attached to many of these crimes would be death. This would lead to divorce by physical execution because there has already been divorce by covenantal execution.

G. John 8

The standard response from those who reject such a "harsh" (i.e., God-established) penalty is an appeal to John 8, the case of the woman who was taken in adultery. I believe that this passage was in the original Bible text. Biblical "higher critics" and many orthodox Christians deny this, because most of the older Greek manuscripts do not include John 7:53–8:11.²⁰ Most modern translations of the Bible provide a marginal note to this effect. But if this passage is not in the Bible, then surely the Old Testament's capital sanction against adultery has not been altered. If John 8 is not in the biblical canon, then there is no other passage that supports the case for an alteration of the capital sanction against adulterers except Joseph's forgiving Mary, which we will examine in detail later.²¹

18. R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), pp. 401–15.

19. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 2nd ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1984), pp. 105–16.

20. See Appendix P: "The Hoax of Higher Criticism."

1. Adultery

John 8 deals with a woman who was discovered in the very act of adultery (v. 4). Her accusers (witnesses) brought her before Jesus, challenging Him to render judgment. This was clearly an attempted trap on their part, for Jesus was neither a civil nor an ecclesiastical official. The woman's accusers were also judicially corrupt. They were law-breaking deceivers, for they were being highly selective: her partner was not brought before Jesus. (Might he have been one of their ecclesiastical or professional associates?)

Jesus challenged them: "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her" (v. 7b). Then He stooped down and wrote something in the dirt (v. 8)—the only instance recorded in the New Testament of His writing anything. (Might He have written the names of women who were well known—biblically speaking—by the woman's accusers?) We do not know what He wrote. We do know that her accusers immediately decided to leave. Discretion was the better part of valor, in their view. They did not continue to press charges against her. Thus, without the presence of two witnesses, she could not be legally convicted of a capital crime, according to Old Covenant law (Deut. 17:6). The witnesses had to cast the first stones (Deut. 17:7), but they all had departed. So, Jesus asked her an obviously rhetorical question: "Woman, where are those thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee? She said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said unto her, Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more" (vv. 10b–11).

Jesus knew she was guilty as initially accused. He told her to go and sin no more, making clear to her that He knew she was guilty. But adultery is a civil matter. Without witnesses, she could not be lawfully convicted. She acknowledged Him as Lord in her own words; He warned her not to do this thing again.

There are millions of short-sighted, instinctively law-breaking and

21. The loss of this supposed defense of a New Testament alteration in the adultery sanction would be a bitter pill to swallow for neo-evangelicals, far too many of whom are prone to accept the hoax of higher criticism, and virtually all of whom spend their intellectual careers seeking exegetical ways around the Old Testament case laws and their sanctions.

covenant-denying Christians who argue that this incident proves that adultery is no longer a capital crime. They invariably point to Jesus' words, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." They challenge those who affirm the law: "You see, we [meaning you] are not to judge anyone unless we [meaning you] have no sin." This interpretation of Christ's words is utter lunacy. Its implications are preposterous. If pressed, these "he who is without sin" interpreters will admit that the New Testament does allow the state to enforce penalties against criminals (Rom. 13:1–7).²² But then their whole argument collapses. He who is sinful must cast the first stone, for all people have sinned and come short of the glory of God (Rom. 3:23). If their argument is taken seriously, then John 8 prohibits all capital punishment, and probably all punishment by anyone, any time. If true, this principle of interpretation would make all covenantal sanctions impossible to enforce: family, church, and state. It would mean the end of all human government. It cannot possibly mean this.

In the Old Testament, God established the death penalty for various crimes. Were Old Covenant judges and witnesses without sin? Obviously not. So, what did Jesus really mean?

2. This Particular Sin

The most obvious explanation is that He meant "He that is without this particular sin, let him cast the first stone." Then He started writing something in the dirt. The witnesses immediately departed. The biblical judicial principle is this: those who have committed a particular crime, but who have not been tried and convicted by a lawful court, or who have not privately offered to make restitution, and who have therefore not been forgiven by the victim, are not fit to serve as witnesses or judges of those who are accused of having committed the same crime. This is a reasonable interpretation, and a reasonable view of justice. It does not necessitate the scrapping of all civil law, all capital sanctions, and the sanction of death for men who commit adultery with other men's wives.

When Jesus told her to go and sin no more, did He really expect her to be able to avoid all sin for the rest of her life? Of course not. But what He did expect her to be able to do was to avoid the sin of adultery. He did not have sin in general in mind in this passage when He used the word sin, but rather the particular sin of adultery. Thus, it is totally misleading for people to use this passage as a proof text that Jesus established a new civil penalty, or even no penalty at all, for the civil crime of adultery. He did not abandon the Mosaic law in John 8. On the contrary, He followed the Mosaic law's procedural requirements to the letter. She was publicly innocent in terms of the procedural requirements of the Mosaic law. Thus, He did not execute His historical wrath upon her in His capacity as perfect humanity. Only the witnesses were allowed to do that, and they had departed. He would deal with her later as God, the perfect Witness, on judgment day in His court; until then, she was granted time to repent and reform her ways. So are all the rest of us.

22. Gary North, Cooperation and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Romans, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [2000] 2012), ch. 11.

Obvious, isn't it? Yet for several generations, pietists and antinomians (those who reject biblical law) have persuaded Christians that John 8 represents some remarkable break with the Old Testament. Christians who hate God's law also hate the New Testament, so they do whatever they can to distort it and misinterpret it, even when their misinterpretations lead to obviously preposterous conclusions. They do not worry about preposterous conclusions; they worry instead about a sovereign God who threatens individuals and society with judgments in history for sin. They are in principle adulterers themselves, and they are looking for an escape from God's authorized civil sanctions against adultery, should they someday fall into this sin. They are looking for loopholes—civil, ecclesiastical, and psychological.

3. Witnesses as Unauthorized Prosecutors

There is another aspect of this incident that must be considered. Jesus dealt directly with the sins of the witnesses. He did not focus on questions of legal procedure. He did not point out that they should have gone immediately to a civil court. He did not ask them rhetorically, "Who made me a judge over you?" He did not remind them that the other guilty party was missing. It is clear that His main concern was not with the procedural details of the incident; He preferred instead to deal positively with the sinful condition of the accused woman. She was the focus of His concern, not her accusers. He acted to remove them from His presence, so that He might restore her to moral and judicial wholeness. This was His tactic in all of His public confrontations with His accusers. He did this with Israel in 70 A.D. He removed Israel from His presence, so that He might restore the gentiles to moral and judicial wholeness. (When He has accomplished this, He will then redeem Israel: Romans 11.)²³

He could also have asked these two questions: "Where is the victim? Why is the victim not here to press charges?" More to the point, He could have asked: "By what authority have you, the witnesses, substituted your judgment for the victim's? Who made you the authorized prosecutors of this covenant lawsuit? On whose behalf are you acting?" He did not ask these questions, not because they were irrelevant to the situation, but because they were secondary to His main concern: dealing positively with the sin of the woman.

Did the Mosaic law give to witnesses an independent authority to prosecute the covenant lawsuit as agents solely of the state? If so, then the state has the right to prosecute despite the decision of the victim not to prosecute. This would clearly compromise the judicial principle of victim's rights. I am arguing in this chapter that the state possesses no independent authority to prosecute if the victim voluntarily decides not to prosecute, an argument based heavily on Joseph's decision as a just man to put Mary away privately. (See Section K: "The Victim's Decision.") The victim's decision is final until God intervenes directly—sickness, calamity, death, or at His Second Coming—to bring His own covenant lawsuit. Thus, the witnesses in John 8 were violating yet another principle of the Mosaic law. The whole incident was one of utter lawlessness and rebellion, which is the characteristic feature of every challenge to the God-given authority of Jesus Christ.

H. Extending Mercy

As the cosmic lawgiver, God has the right to set the penalties for crimes. Biblical law provides every society with God's specified penalties. What is crucial to understand is that the biblical principle of God as the victim who names the penalty leads to a derivative principle: the earthly victim of the prohibited act is also allowed to name the penalty to be imposed on the criminal, so long as it does not exceed the limits specified by the Bible.

There is one exception to this rule, argue some biblical scholars: if the specified penalty is death, and if a particular phrase appears in the text, then the state must enforce whenever it unilaterally prosecutes and convicts the criminal. The phrase is: "surely he shall die" or "dying, he shall die." This phrase, which biblical scholars call a pleonasm, initially appears to be an identifying mark of infractions of God's law that inescapably require the death penalty. I argue that this is an incorrect interpretation of the use of the pleonasm, but I could be wrong. This is why we need to explore the usage of this pleonasm in the section below, "Dying, He Shall Die." First, however, we must consider the principle of victim's rights.

23. North, Cooperation and Dominion, ch. 7.

We know that sanctions against non-capital crimes are to be imposed by the civil government at the discretion of the victim. He can refuse to accept any restitution payment or a reduced restitution payment. He can lawfully cancel the debt owed to him (Matt. 18:23–35).²⁴ I argue that this principle of forgiveness also applies to capital crimes in which there is an identifiable human victim who is capable of bringing a covenant civil lawsuit against the criminal. We see this judicial principle in action at the crucifixion. Jesus requested that the Father not immediately destroy His executioners. "Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (Luke 23:34a). He extended additional time to them. This was His unmerited favor or gift to them, just as God had extended life to Adam, Eve, and Cain. As both the primary victim (God) and the secondary victim (perfect man), Jesus Christ possessed the right to extend temporal mercy to His enemies, even for this capital crime. His divinity authorized this extension of mercy. So did His perfect humanity, for He was the victim of a rigged trial. I argue that as the victim, He could lawfully extend mercy only before He physically died.

The question is: Are victims allowed to extend mercy in cases where the state appears to be required by the presence of the pleonasm, "surely he shall die," to execute the convicted criminal? We know that in his capacity as a lawful prosecutor of God's covenant lawsuit, the earthly victim does possess the right—the legal authorization from God—to extend mercy to a convicted criminal for any crime other than a capital crime. He can lawfully forgive the restitution payment owed to him. Why not also in the case of a capital crime?

I. The State as God's Prosecutor

In order to answer this question, we need to understand that the victim is not the only one who can lawfully initiate a covenant lawsuit against a suspected criminal. God has more than one covenantal agent in society. Witnesses can bring incriminating information to an authorized agent of covenantal government, and this agent can lawfully institute covenant lawsuit proceedings against any criminal, but only if there is no earthly victim of the crime who is capable of bringing charges.²⁵ If there is an identifiable earthly victim, then he alone becomes the exclusive agent who is authorized to initiate a covenant lawsuit against the suspected criminal. This restriction on state's authority to initiate a covenant lawsuit is an implication of the doctrine of victim's rights. The victim possesses the right to forgive. The state is not authorized to ignore or supersede this right.

24. North, Priorities and Dominion, ch. 37.

The interests of the community are upheld by identifying the criminal or member of the criminal class. Remember, God is the primary victim of crime; He has authorized representatives to defend the integrity of His name. If a community refuses to do this—if church, state, and family governments break down—God threatens to bring His negative sanctions through other agencies: war, pestilence, and famine (Deut. 28:15–68). This is why an unsolved murder in a field required a public blood sacrifice by the nearest city's civil magistrates, not the priests (Deut. 21:1–9).²⁶

1. A Legal Claim

Who acts as God's authorized agent in the bringing of a covenantal civil lawsuit? The victim, the witnesses, or those who are authorized agents of the civil government. If the initiator of the lawsuit is the victim, he is not acting primarily on his own behalf, but as an agent of God because of his position as the victimized intermediary between the criminal and God, the ultimate victim. He is acting secondarily on his own behalf, for any restitution payment will go to him. Similarly, witnesses who bring evidence to the state for use in prosecuting the covenant lawsuit are acting as representative agents of God through the civil government. They do not act on their own behalf, for they have no legal claim on the resources of the person who is being charged with the crime, should he be convicted. Witnesses are not victims. They are acting in the name of God as authorized and oath-bound agents of the state when they testify in a civil court. Where there is no direct legal claim, there is no direct covenantal relationship.

25. For a list of capital crimes and an identification of those cases in which the state is authorized to initiate the covenant lawsuit, see the subhead at the end of this chapter: "Addendum: Cases to Which the Pleonasm Is Attached."

26. Clearly, the Epistle to the Hebrews has annulled this practice in the New Covenant era.

Thus, witnesses are acting as indirect agents of God as participants in the civil commonwealth.

Because crimes are always crimes against God, the state has a law-enforcement role to play, for the state possesses God's authorized monopoly of the sword: the imposition of physical sanctions. The state in turn implicitly delegates the office of witness to those who view a crime or who have information relevant to the state's prosecution of a covenant lawsuit. (This is the judicial basis of what in English common law is known as "citizen's arrest," although it is seldom invoked today.) This is why the state can lawfully compel honest testimony from a witness: the witness is under the authority of the state. It is in fact unlawful to withhold evidence of a crime when subpoenaed. While the state may offer a reward for the capture and conviction of a criminal as a way to privatize prosecution expenses, this is at the discretion of the state. The witness who seeks an announced reward has a claim on the state, not on the criminal.

The most important example in history of a reward-seeking witness is Judas Iscariot, who collected 30 pieces of silver from the Jewish court to witness against Jesus Christ. He later returned the money, not because it is inherently wrong to accept money as an honest witness, but because he knew he had been a false witness in a rigged, dishonest trial. The Jewish leaders self-righteously replied, "What is that to us?" (Matt. 27:4b). They felt no sense of guilt, so why should he? They also recognized the tainted nature of the money, which was the price of blood, and as true Pharisees, they refused to accept his repayment (Matt. 27:6). Committing murder by rigging a court was irrelevant in their view, a means to a legitimate end; getting paid for false witness-bearing, however, was seen by them as a sin. This is the essence of Pharisaism, the classic historical example of Pharisaism in action. They were happy to serve as the most corrupt court in man's history, but they judiciously refused to accept money for their efforts. (What is not recognized by most Christian commentators is that the testimony of a witness in a Jewish court was invalidated, at least by the law of the Pharisees, if he had received payment for testifying.)²⁷

What is my conclusion? Only this: witnesses have no legal claim on the criminal. The authorized agents of God in the prosecution of a covenant lawsuit are officers of one of the three courts—church, state, and family—and the victim of the crime.

27. Bekhoroth 4:6, in The Mishnah, ed. Herbert Danby (New York: Oxford University Press, [1933] 1987), p. 534.

2. The Right of Refusal

If the authorized biblical penalty is economic restitution, then the victim whose covenant lawsuit is successfully prosecuted by the civil government has the right to refuse payment, or the right to take less than what biblical law authorizes. Like the creditor who has the right to take less in repayment, or to extend the debtor more time to repay, or even to forgive the debt, so is the victim of a criminal who has been convicted in a court of law. The nineteenth-century Jewish commentator S. R. Hirsch remarked that the victim of a theft "can renounce altogether his right to repayment by the sale of the malefactor, and content himself with a signed promise to pay as soon as the circumstances of the thief improve."²⁸ He was correct.

What if the victim refuses to prosecute? I see no warrant in most cases for the state then to prosecute. The court can lawfully serve as the agent of the victim in certain exceptional cases. Two examples would be victims who are orphaned minors or mental incompetents. Nevertheless, under normal circumstances, a decision not to prosecute by a victim who is legally competent to initiate a covenant lawsuit is a binding decision. He thereby loses his legal claim on any future restitution payments by the convicted criminal. If he is willing to suffer this loss, then the state must honor his or her decision. The individual, not the state, is the victim; the principle of victim's rights is binding on the state. Only if the criminal act in some way also injured the state or society could the state then prosecute, but only on its own behalf.²⁹

The case of Judah and Tamar is representative. Judah refused to prosecute Tamar for whoredom when she brought tangible evidence that he was the guilty party and that she had merely been claiming her legal right to the levirate marriage (Gen. 38:26). On the other hand, the victim also escapes the threat of a counter-lawsuit from the accused if the latter should be declared innocent by the court. Again, the case of Judah and Tamar is representative. Judah did not want to be convicted of false witness-bearing, for he had committed the crime with her, and he was therefore not authorized to bring accusations against her in his own name. As the head of both his family and the local civil government, he dropped all charges.

28. Samson Raphael Hirsch, The Pentateuch Translated and Explained, translated by Isaac Levy, 5 vols., Exodus, 3rd ed. (London: Honig & Sons, 1967), p. 295: at Exodus 21:6.

29. Treason that also involves theft would be an example. The victim of the theft might not prosecute, but the state could, for treason is an act of attempted murder against the society.

3. Civil Sanctions

Old Testament law specifies that criminals are subject to several types of civil sanctions: corporal punishment—lashings, but with no more than 40 lashes (Deut. 25:3) and the slicing of a woman's hand in one instance (Deut. 25:12)³⁰—economic restitution, banishment, and the death penalty.

The punishment of lashing is curious. No crime in the Bible is specifically said to require lashing. The language of the King James Version indicates an exception to this rule: the required scourging of a bondmaid who is betrothed to one man and who then commits fornication with another man (Lev. 19:20).

However, the Hebrew word translated as “scourge” does not necessarily mean physical scourging; it is better translated as “punishment,” or even “inquiry.” Nevertheless, the lack of any reference to specific crimes with which this physical sanction is associated does not mean that no public crime is subject to lashing, or else there would be no prohibition against imposing more than 40 lashes. This is a sanction to be imposed at the discretion of the judges in cases where there is no identifiable victim who has suffered either economic loss or physical or verbal abuse. Presumably, this sanction is appropriate for such acts as public nudity by adults, prostitution, public drunkenness, repeated disturbances of the peace, and public acts prohibited by God, but for which no identifiable victim can be found. The victim of such “victimless crimes”—God—is entitled to restitution: lashes. Eternal punishment is the model: God is repaid through the suffering of the criminal.

In the Old Testament era, if the restitution payment to the victim was larger than the criminal or his kinsman-redeemer could afford to pay, the criminal was sold into slavery. The purchase price went to the victim. This was the only way that a Hebrew could become an involuntary lifetime slave in Israel, and even in this instance, it was lifetime slavery only if he could not earn enough to meet the restitution payment or if his kinsman-redeemer refused to pay. Non-criminal Hebrew debt slaves were to be released in the seventh, “sabbatical” year

30. The language of the King James makes it appear that the woman's hand is to be cut off. This is incorrect: it is permanently injured, but not cut off: James B. Jordan, The Law of the Covenant: An Exposition of Exodus 21–23 (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1984), pp. 118–19. (<http://bit.ly/jjlaw>)

(Deut. 15); voluntary jubilee year slaves were to be released in the year of jubilee (Lev. 25:39–41).³¹ The criminal became a slave to another person because he had been a slave to sin—specifically, he had committed a criminal act that had seriously damaged someone else's property or body.

4. The Death Penalty

Some crimes are so great that God authorizes the death penalty. This produces the criminal's immediate deliverance into God's court. This in turn leads to his subsequent delivery into permanent slavery in hell and the lake of fire unless he repents prior to his physical execution by the civil government. This removal of temporal life is restitution to God for a criminal's major transgression of God's covenant laws. The death penalty points clearly to God's position as the primary victim. It also points to His status as eternal Judge.

In cases of murder, the state becomes the victim's delegated representative before God. The deceased obviously cannot initiate the covenant lawsuit. The state therefore initiates it on behalf of both the deceased and God. No restitution payment is possible to the deceased; thus, God must judge the criminal directly in His court. The state is required to deliver the criminal's soul immediately into the hands of God, who is the primary victim and also the legal representative of the deceased victim. The state must not allow a murderer to escape immediate entry into God's court—physical execution—by the payment of a fine: "Moreover ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death: but he shall be surely put to death" (Num. 35:31).

Christ's resurrection is the basis of man's escape from God's immediate and direct imposition of the death penalty, both the first death (physical death) and the eternal second death (Rev. 20:14). Because Jesus Christ rose from the dead, His previous grant of temporary forgiveness to Rome and Israel received God's sanction. It was also on the basis of this resurrection that God had granted a stay of execution to Adam and Eve. But judgment eventually comes in history: Adam and Eve died, and Israel and Rome fell. The question then arises: Does the resurrection of Jesus Christ also serve as the basis of a man's legitimate escape from the death penalty from a civil court? If so, in which cases and on what judicial basis?

31. Gary North, Boundaries and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Leviticus, 2nd ed. (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, [1994] 2012), ch. 30.

J. “Dying, He Must Die”

We need to deal with a problem of interpretation that confronts us over and over in Old Testament case laws. It is a phrase that occurs in many passages.³² A person convicted of a specified crime “shall surely be put to death.” As mentioned earlier, the Hebrew phrase is what scholars call a pleonasm: “dying, he shall surely die.” It is emphatic language. We find it in Exodus 21:12: “He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall be surely put to death.” James Jordan commented in 1984: “The emphasis means that the death penalty cannot be set aside by any payment of money.”³³ But because of a series of problems in interpretation, he subsequently changed his mind about the meaning of this pleonasm.³⁴

1. What Is the Problem?

Why should the interpretation of this pleonasm of execution be such a problem? Because the same phrase appears in the case of crimes that we normally would not think would involve automatic capital punishment. These include crimes that have no immediate human victims: sabbath-breaking (Ex. 31:14–15) and bestiality (Ex. 22:19; Lev. 20:15–16). These also include crimes in which no one dies: assaulting parents physically (Ex. 21:15) or verbally (Ex. 21:17), adultery that involves another man’s wife (Lev. 20:10), blasphemy against God (Lev. 24:16), and wizardry and witchcraft (Lev. 20:27). One crime to which this pleonasm is attached is often regarded by modern societies as a capital crime: kidnapping (Ex. 21:16).³⁵

To survey the nature of the exegetical problem, let us consider in greater detail the case of adultery that involves a man with another man’s wife: “And the man that committeth adultery with another man’s wife, even he that committeth adultery with his neighbour’s wife, the adulterer and the adulteress shall surely be put to death” (Lev. 20:10). The pleonasm of execution appears here: “shall surely be put to death.” Capital punishment for both of the adulterers can legitimately

32. These verses are displayed under the subhead at the end of this chapter: “Ad-dendum: Cases to Which the Pleonasm Is Attached.”

33. Jordan, Law of the Covenant, p. 96n.

34. They are not the same objections that I raise in this chapter.

35. Chapter 34.

be imposed at the insistence of the victim, the woman's husband. Why? Because the government of the covenantal family was broken by adultery. The injured party, meaning the head of the household, is the lawful covenantal representative of God. He is authorized to bring charges against the adulterers as the injured party and also as the head of the family unit. Because the Bible specifies adultery as a civil crime, he also brings this lawsuit in civil court.

The victimized husband can lawfully file the covenant lawsuit in up to three covenantal courts: family, church, and state. A covenant lawsuit is first presented by the victimized husband to the suspected partner, and then (at the discretion of the victimized husband) it is presented in the appropriate court or courts. The institutional church has a legitimate role to play if either of the marriage partners is a member. It pronounces the sentence of covenantal death against the offending party. Thus, adultery can sometimes affect all three covenantal institutions. The victim declares that the covenantal bond of marriage has been broken, and that the adulterers have now come under God's wrath. If the suspected adulterous male partner is married, his wife can also file appropriate lawsuits against her husband. Biblical law makes it clear, however, that the husband of the adulterous wife has primary authority to specify the penalty. It is his covenantal household office as the head of the family that has been attacked by the adulterers. If he decides on the death penalty for his wife, as we shall see, the criminal consort cannot escape her fate. As the officer of his family's government, the victimized husband specifies the penalty; the wife of the adulterer cannot stay the hand of the civil magistrate.

Two questions arise. Can the husband legally grant mercy to the wife if she is convicted, that is, can he specify a lesser punishment? Furthermore, if he can, and if he does this, must he show equal mercy to the convicted man?

2. No Respect for Persons

The example of Jesus on the cross indicates that the victim can lawfully spare the criminal. He asked His Father to forgive them, meaning Jews and Romans (Luke 23:34). He spared both of the "adulterers," Israel and her consort, Rome. Israel again and again in Old Testament history committed spiritual adultery with foreign gods and nations, yet God always spared the nation until A.D. 70.³⁶ The

36. David Chilton, The Days of Vengeance: An Exposition of the Book of Revelation

Book of Hosea centers on this theme of the husband's forgiveness of an adulterous wife. Romans 11 indicates that genetic Israel will someday be re-grafted into the church through mass conversion,³⁷ so God has still withheld the death penalty from Israel as a covenantal people (though not necessarily as the modern political unit that we call the state of Israel).

What is the problem here? The pleonasm appears in Leviticus 20:10, "dying, they shall die." If the language of inescapable death is accepted at face value, then the husband of the adulteress cannot lawfully request a reduced penalty, such as the forfeiture of her dowry to him, rather than insist on her execution. But is he so restricted? God spared Israel time after time. It would seem reasonable that the injured husband might prefer a lesser penalty, just as God did with Israel. Maybe he still loves her. Maybe this is her first transgression. He feels deeply injured, but not enough to have her executed. Perhaps she is a good mother. Perhaps he wants to keep her as his wife. Perhaps not. What if he wants a divorce? This would be granted by the state. He could also require her to transfer her dowry to him.

By showing mercy to his wife, he must also show mercy to her consort. In the case of adultery involving another man's wife, the two adulterers must receive the same negative sanction. The judges are not permitted to show partiality to persons in rendering official judgment. The victimized husband who decides to prosecute is acting as a judge, for if the adulterers are convicted, he specifies the penalty. If he wants total vengeance against the man, he must also demand the same penalty for his wife. If he shows leniency to her, he must show the same leniency to him. Why? Because, in their capacity as God-ordained judges, men are not to show partiality, or as the Bible says, "respect of persons" (Deut. 1:17; 16:19; II Sam. 14:14; Acts 10:34). When Joseph decided as a just man to put Mary away privately, he necessarily also decided not to seek civil justice against any suspected consort.

The Bible does not directly discuss the question of leniency by the victim. The pleonasm "dying, they shall die" is attached to this crime of adultery (Lev. 20:10). Nevertheless, I am arguing that the victim can specify a lesser penalty for the adulterers. If I am correct, then in such cases, the criminals do not "surely die" at the hands of the court. But if they are not automatically executed upon conviction, then what does the presence of the pleonasm mean? Why is it found in some biblical texts specifying capital punishment, but not in all of them? The pleonasm is there for emphasis, the lexicographers say.³⁸ Then what exactly does it emphasize? Not the absolute necessity of the death penalty in every case in which it appears, if I am correct in my reasoning. It does not apply in cases where the victim shows leniency. The victim decides.

(Ft. Worth: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dcdov>)

37. This postmillennial position has been defended by such Calvinist commentators on Romans 11 as Charles Hodge, Robert Haldane, and John Murray. The Larger Catechism of the Westminster Confession of Faith also teaches it: Answer 191.

3. The Victimized Wife

The Old Testament specifies the death penalty for wives who commit adultery. It does not specify the death penalty for a husband who commits adultery. Is this an oversight? Or does this indicate that God does respect persons, leaving victimized wives more vulnerable than victimized husbands? Does the Mosaic law in fact show respect for persons, discriminating against victimized wives?

The answer is found in the nature of the lawsuit. The victimized husband brings the lawsuit in his capacity as head of his household. The family is one of God's three covenantal governments. It is marked by a covenantal oath. Thus, the death penalty as the maximum for an adulterous wife places the decision in the hands of a covenant head. It is not that the Bible discriminates against victimized wives. It simply places the primary authority for prosecuting the covenant lawsuit in the hands of the covenantal head of the household.

If the adulterous wife could be executed at the discretion of the wife of her adulterous consort, then the primary authority to impose the penalty would be removed from the head of the household and transferred to the subordinate member of another household. The victimized husband who had decided to keep his wife would lose her if the wife of her consort prosecuted, saw her husband convicted, and asked for the death penalty. Because the court is not allowed to discriminate, it would also have to execute the adulterous wife. Thus, the adulterous wife's husband would lose control over the sanction.

The victimized wife can lawfully sue for divorce. The judges are authorized to grant this. Even if the husband of the adulterous wife does not insist on a divorce, the victimized wife is allowed to gain legal separation. Why, if there must be equality of negative sanctions placed on both adulterers? Because the judges' announcement of the divorce is not the imposition of a negative sanction; it is simply a legal announcement of a broken marriage. The marriage was covenantally broken by her husband's act of adultery; the wife is simply declaring her formal acceptance of her new legal status as an unmarried woman. She asks the court to make this declaration public. Biblical law always protects the innocent party. She is not compelled to re-adopt her husband back into the marriage. But she cannot lawfully insist on physical execution of her adulterous husband. The wife of an adulterous husband has only secondary rights as a victim because in this two-party sin, she is the secondary earthly victim. She is not the head of her household. She cannot lawfully seek the execution of the victimized husband's wife by insisting on the execution of her husband.

38. Genesius' Hebrew Grammar (Oxford, [1910] 1974), sect. 113n, p. 342; cited by Jordan, The Death Penalty in the Mosaic Law (Tyler, Texas: Biblical Horizons, 1988), p. 9.

The Bible is silent regarding the execution of an adulterous husband who commits adultery with an unmarried woman. It is clear, however, that his wife is the primary earthly victim. The wife, as the primary earthly victim, then gains the legal authority to prosecute the two adulterers to the limit of the law. She can require the execution of both partners if they are convicted of adultery by a civil court.

If I am correct about this, then we now know why there is no civil sanction against prostitution specified in the Old Testament, except for the required execution of the daughter of a priest who becomes a prostitute. "And the daughter of any priest, if she profane herself by playing the whore, she profaneth her father: she shall be burnt with fire" (Lev. 21:9). If the victimized wife can have her convicted husband executed for having committed adultery with a prostitute, then the prostitute is required to share his fate. Thus, there is no need for an explicit civil sanction against prostitution. The victimized wife decides. The threat of the capital sanction would tend to confine prostitution to unmarried persons. It would therefore reduce prostitution's assault on marriage.

K. The Victim's Decision

What would it take to get a victim to accept a reduced penalty? The criminal would make a public confession of guilt and repentance, and then offer to pay restitution to the victim. This might work. Then again, it might not. The key to the criminal's escape from death is the decision of the victim. The victim cannot lawfully demand a penalty greater than the one specified in the case law, but he can accept something less.

In a later essay, James Jordan took another look at the pleonasm, "surely he shall die."³⁹ He cited Numbers 35:30–31: "Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses: but one witness shall not testify against any person to cause him to die. Moreover ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death: but he shall be surely put to death." The law specifically says that there can be no substitute payment. The question then arises: Which is more authoritative, the pleonasm's language or the automatic penalty attached to murder? Is murder unique? Is it only in murder cases that the state must invariably impose the death penalty? Or is the death penalty the inescapable consequence of the pleonasm? Does the presence of the pleonasm indicate the idea of "accept no substitutes" wherever it occurs, or is it merely emphasis? If merely emphasis, what exactly does it emphasize?

If adultery always requires the death penalty (Lev. 20:10), Jordan asked, then why did Joseph decide to put Mary away quietly rather than prosecuting her (Matt. 1:19)? My answer: victim's rights. The primary earthly victim always has the legal right not to prosecute. This was Joseph's decision. The civil government was not to intervene, nor was the priestly government. Similarly, the decision to forgive was also Christ's decision at the cross, although He had earlier warned the Jewish leaders that He would eventually bring judgment on them (Luke 21), which He did in A.D. 70.

Joseph forgave Mary. This was clearly a decision made under the terms of Old Covenant law. The New Covenant had not yet been established. Thus, when the text identifies Joseph as a just man, its frame of reference is the Old Covenant law. Joseph was not violating any principle of the Mosaic law when he showed mercy to Mary and refused to prosecute. He chose to put her away quietly in order to avoid having to bring a civil covenant lawsuit against her. In his capacity as the betrothed husband, Joseph decided to break off the betrothal. Only if Mary's family had protested—unlikely, given the apparent circumstances of her pregnancy and the capital sanction involved (Deut. 22:20–21)—would he have been required to pursue his accusation in a civil or ecclesiastical court in order to defend his decision to break the betrothal.

39. Jordan, Death Penalty, p. 9.

The first question is this: If the victim does decide to prosecute, and the person is convicted, can the victim then specify a lesser penalty? I think the answer is yes. I offer this explanation: the principle of victim's rights still applies, but in the case of murder, the victim cannot volunteer to accept a reduced penalty; thus, the state must impose the maximum penalty. This leads me to a general principle: When the state becomes the prosecuting agent of case laws where this pleonasm occurs, it must enforce the death penalty on conviction. There are no exceptions.

The second question is this: If the victim decides not to prosecute, can any other court intervene and prosecute in God's name? The case of Joseph and Mary indicates that Joseph's decision would have been authoritative and final. Her pregnancy would have been visible to all, yet if he had chosen not to prosecute, she could remain free of concern about any other court bringing charges against her. Had she actually been an adulteress, and had her consort been married, then the victimized wife could bring charges against them, but she could gain only a divorce: the court's declaration of a broken marriage. She could not require civil penalties against Mary, and therefore also not against her husband. Joseph, not the victimized wife, was the primary earthly victim and therefore the one who possessed the option of freeing his betrothed wife from any civil penalties.

L. What Does the Pleonasm Emphasize?

The pleonasm identifies crimes that are the highest on God's list of abominations. The normal penalty for these crimes is death; anything less than this that the victim specifies is a manifestation of great mercy. By upholding the principle of victim's rights, biblical law also creates incentives for criminals to deal less harshly with victims during the actual crime. If the victim is not brutalized, he may decide to show leniency if the criminal is later convicted. This protects the victim. Biblical law is designed to protect the victim.

1. Judicial Discretion

Must civil judges impose the maximum penalty allowed by biblical law when the state is the victim, or when by law the state is God's designated agent to protect the community by upholding God's rights and enforcing His sanctions? Not always. The principle of victim's rights governs the imposition of civil sanctions. Judges have the God-given authority to impose a reduced penalty according to circumstances. The only exceptions to this rule are those cases in which the pleonasm occurs; the judges cannot reduce the sanctions in such cases. This is the meaning of the pleonasm: the elimination of judicial discretion in imposing sanctions when the state initiates the lawsuit.

Consider two alternative lines of reasoning. First, if we argue that the judges must impose the maximum penalty in all cases that specify the death penalty, irrespective of the presence of the pleonasm, then the emphasis aspect of the pleonasm disappears judicially. If all capital crimes require the death penalty, of what purpose is the pleonasm? This would indicate that the pleonasm has some function other than judicial emphasis. I cannot imagine what this other function might be. The presence of the pleonasm must indicate the legitimacy of judicial discretion in cases where the pleonasm is missing. By requiring judges to impose the maximum penalty in all cases, judicial discretion disappears. The judicial principle of victim's rights would therefore disappear.

Second, if we argue that the judges can in all cases legitimately impose a lesser penalty, then the emphasis aspect of the pleonasm also disappears judicially. Cases that are governed by the pleonasm would then become indistinguishable from those that are not. The pleonasm would lose its force.

My conclusion is this: if the pleonasm of execution is understood to have any judicial effect in distinguishing capital cases, and if the principle of victim's rights is also to be honored in all cases, then the pleonasm should be interpreted as eliminating judicial discretion in applying sanctions in all cases in which prosecution has been lawfully initiated by the civil government. The judges must not reduce the sanction of execution in any case in which (1) the state lawfully initiates the lawsuit, and (2) the sanction is marked by the pleonasm.

Thus, the pleonasm applies only to a unique set of capital crimes: where there is no identifiable human or institutional victim who could specify a reduced sanction. The victim is God alone. The state therefore is authorized to initiate the covenant lawsuit. There is no earthly victim who has the authority to reduce the sanction. The community through the civil government is called upon to execute the convicted criminal. In short, in the so-called "victimless crimes" in which the pleonasm of execution applies, civil judges have no choice in deciding on the appropriate sanction. The sanction is always execution. "Dying, he shall die" binds the judges in capital crimes where the state acts as the covenant lawsuit's prosecutor without the presence of an intermediary or representative human victim.

The pleonasm is not a denial of the principle of victim's rights, because God, as the primary cosmic victim, has specified the appropriate sanction. This sanction must be imposed by the state in the absence of any secondary victim—a victim who is always authorized to speak in God's name. In the absence of such a representative, the pleonasm takes effect. The pleonasm must therefore not be understood as a limitation on the judicial principle of victim's rights. It limits the discretion of civil judges in those cases where there is no identifiable earthly victim, but it does not limit the discretion of the victim. Biblical law allows the victim, as God's representative, to reduce the penalty.

2. Rabbinic Law

Rabbinic law also recognizes the legitimacy of the victim's option of reducing or forgiving a criminal, as S. R. Hirsch's previous comments indicate, but not in capital crimes. While he did not refer to the pleonasm, Hirsch summarized the principle of Jewish law with respect to capital crimes. "The whole idea of the right to grant clemency or mercy was entirely absent in the Jewish Code of Law. Justice and judgment is [sic] the prerogative [sic] of God not Man. When the very precisely defined Law of God,—giving Man no scope for his own judgment or arbitrary discretion—ordains death for a criminal, the carrying out of this sentence is not an act of harshness to be commuted for any consideration whatsoever, it is itself the most considerate atonement, atonement for the community, atonement for the land, atonement for the criminal. . . ." ⁴⁰

The Christian cannot legitimately speak of atonement through a criminal's execution, but he can and should speak of delivering the

40. Hirsch, Exodus, p. 306: at Exodus 21:14. Hirsch immediately abandoned this rigorous judicial principle in his discussion of kidnapping. The Talmud sets up so many extra stipulations regarding the definition of kidnapping that it is virtually impossible to execute a kidnapper under Jewish law. Hirsch said that the kidnapper is to be executed only "if he has made the man feel that he is being treated as an object, a thing" (p. 306). This sounds more like Immanuel Kant than the God of the Bible. Jewish lawyer and Talmudic scholar George Horowitz commented on the Talmudic view of kidnapping: "That the Rabbis considered the death penalty too severe for this wrong to society and the individual, seems quite plain from the foregoing rules. But they were bound by the express command of Scripture; hence they devised such requirements as made conviction virtually impossible. There is no record, moreover, that a regular court ever convicted a person of Manstealing." Horowitz, The Spirit of Jewish Law (New York: Central Book Co., [1953] 1963), pp. 197–98.

criminal directly into God's court, thereby placing him under God's sanctions rather than placing the community under God's sanctions for its unwillingness to obey God's law. The community that allows a criminal convicted of a capital crime to live is like a community that offers sanctuary to someone who is supposed to be tried in God's court. The community is required by God to extradite him. It cannot legitimately offer the evil-doer sanctuary. The text of Exodus 21:14 is clear: ". . . thou shalt take him from mine altar, that he may die." If a criminal is not to be granted sanctuary from a human civil court at the very altar of God, then surely a human civil court cannot legitimately grant him sanctuary by refusing to extradite him to God's heavenly court by executing him.

M. Noah's Covenant and Execution

Noah's covenant is rarely mentioned by New Testament scholars, for it was a recapitulation of the dominion covenant of Genesis 1:26–28). He and his sons were told to exercise dominion (Gen. 9:1–3). This means that the dominion covenant was not limited to the pre-Fall world. There is continuity in the dominion covenant. It extends into history. It has not been annulled. But what of the death penalty? That was part of God's covenant with Noah.

1. House and Ice

Dispensational authors H. Wayne House and Thomas Ice presented a weak case for their speculations regarding the pre-New Covenant legal order as it applied to the nations. They insisted that "Nowhere in the nations is capital punishment obligatorily extended beyond the penalty for taking human life. . . ." ⁴¹ They asserted, though did not prove, that none of the Mosaic law's sanctions ever applied directly or even was intended in principle to apply to the nations, except the capital sanction for murder. This unique sanction is binding on all men always, they argued, so its authority came from Noah to Moses; it in no way went from Moses to the nations.

This was a clever attempt to escape the suggestion that in the New Covenant era, Christians have a responsibility to pressure civil governments to impose specific sanctions against specific crimes on the basis of biblical revelation. Such a view of "Noahic biblical law," if correct, 41. H. Wayne House and Thomas Ice, Dominion Theology: Blessing or Curse? (Portland, Oregon: Multnomah Press, 1988), p. 90.

would allow Christians to avoid personal responsibility in civil affairs, because they could not speak authoritatively in the name of the Lord when it comes to specifying civil crimes or penalties. The price of such a theological position regarding biblical law is, predictably, the cultural, political, and judicial irrelevance of Christianity. This is why dispensationalism is in principle culturally retreatist and culturally irrelevant, and why no dispensationalist in over a century and a half has published a book on Christian social ethics during the so-called "Church Age."

House and Ice went on to say that "in Israel this penalty [execution] was exacted for various crimes. . . ." ⁴² If they meant merely that in Israel, the maximum sanction of execution could be required by the victim in several capital crimes, then they were correct. If they meant that in those cases where the state lawfully prosecuted in God's name as His designated representative, and where the pleonasm "dying, he shall surely die" was attached to the biblical sanction, then they were also correct. If this is all they meant, however, then they had not said anything very significant. They did not show that God restricted these judicial principles to Old Covenant Israel.

The judicial principle of a maximum allowable sanction for any given crime was also in principle God's requirement for the nations. Without this God-imposed judicial restriction, the state can lawfully become all-powerful, messianic, and therefore demonic. There will always be sanctions imposed by civil government. The only question is: Whose law establishes the specified judicial limits of state-imposed sanctions, God's or self-proclaimed autonomous man's?

To answer, as House and Ice did, that it depends upon when and where you live in God's world, is to abandon the concept of universal biblical ethics and therefore also to abandon the principle of universally restricted civil governments. Any attempted distinction between the Old Covenant nations and Mosaic Israel that is based on a theory of differing judicial sanctions for the same civil crimes is misguided. Civil sanctions are always specified by God because God always wants limits on the state and always wants to see victims protected. In other words, He always wants judicial limits on the pretensions of autonomous man. God killed nations under the Old Covenant, just as He kills New Covenant nations, because they failed to apply His civil sanctions in history. If this was not the message that Jonah brought to Nineveh, what was?

42. Idem.

The principle of victim-imposed sanctions is also God's requirement for all nations in this New Covenant era, now that the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, plus the sending of the Holy Spirit and the creation of the church, have extended God's now-resurrected law-order to the nations. The New Covenant is truly new; its Bible-specified laws and sanctions have been universalized definitively in history by the earthly ministry of Jesus Christ. The resurrection is behind us. Surely the sanctions of God's law for the nations are no less binding today than before Christ arose from the dead and incorporated His church! Yet House and Ice insisted that the Mosaic sanctions are even less binding, for the Mosaic law does not even bind national Israel any longer, and so the law has no visible geographical example and testimony, as it had in the Old Covenant era (Deut. 4:5–8).⁴³

House and Ice did their dispensational best to create a false dichotomy between the God-required social laws of nations and the Mosaic social laws of Israel. They also try to create a dichotomy between New Covenant social laws and the Mosaic social laws. They want to place all Christians under the penal sanctions of the Noahic covenant (as the Calvinist ethicist John Murray sought to do before them),⁴⁴ both in the Old Covenant era and in the New Covenant era.⁴⁵

2. Noah's Covenant: Low Content

Why this preference by modern conservative theologians for Noah's covenant? Because in Noah's covenant only one civil infraction is specified: murder; and only one penal sanction: execution (Gen. 9:5). This absence of judicial specifics allows the civil government to specify as criminal whatever behavior it disapproves of, and also allows it to impose whatever sanctions it wants to, without any mandatory reference to any other biblical law or sanction. This political perspective is basically an application of pre-Darwinian humanism's social contract or social compact theory of the state, pioneered by Thomas Hobbes in

43. North, Inheritance and Dominion, ch. 8.

44. Murray wrote: "It is conceivable that the progress of revelation would remove the necessity for the penal sanction [in the case of murder]. This is the case with the death penalty for adultery. And the same holds true for many other penal sanctions of the Mosaic economy. Does the same principle apply to the death penalty for murder?" John Murray, Principles of Conduct, p. 118. He goes on to argue that the sanction of execution is still valid because "murder is the capital sin." Idem.

45. "The Noahic covenant is perpetual. It serves as a basis of God's relationship and the standards imposed upon the nations." House and Ice, op. cit., p. 127.

Leviathan (1651) and developed by John Locke (1690) and Rousseau (1762). This older viewpoint was originally a secularized version of, and reaction against, the Puritans' biblical covenant theory of civil government.⁴⁶ It imputes primary sovereignty to the people rather than to God and His revealed law.⁴⁷

What is judiciously not discussed by the defenders of the "Noahic covenant theory of the state" is that the pre-Darwin social contract theory relied completely on the concept of natural law, and in Locke's case, natural rights. This epistemologically naive view of civil law has been refuted from two sides: by Darwinism's view of the evolving universe and by Van Til's presuppositional apologetic. Without the doctrine of natural law or some version of natural rights theory to govern their theory of the state, defenders of the "Noahic covenant" theory have implicitly granted judicially unlimited power to the modern state, no matter how much they protest against such a development. They may be political conservatives personally; it makes no difference. Their personal political preferences become just that: personal preferences. Their personal political preferences are self-consciously and explicitly unconnected with any biblical-theological system of social ethics and political theory.⁴⁸

Such a view of Noah's low-content covenant grants enormous authority to self-proclaimed autonomous man and his representative, the messianic state. The power-seeking covenant-breaker is as pleased with such a view of the state as the responsibility-freeing Christian pietist is. This is why there is now and always has been *an implicit judicial alliance between antinomian Christians and humanist statist*s. Here is an ideal way to silence Christians in all judicial matters except murder: insist that "The Bible doesn't offer a blueprint for civil law!" With this judicial affirmation, antinomian, responsibility-fleeing Christians sound the retreat, and secular humanists and other covenant-breaking power-seekers sound the attack. The victim is in principle victimized even further by this view of Noah's drastically restricted covenant, and the messianic state is unchained by it. All this is ac-

46. A. D. Lindsey, The Modern Democratic State (New York: Oxford University Press, [1943] 1959), ch. 5.

47. Rousseau's version of the sovereignty of the General Will might best be described as the Cole Porter theory of the state: "Anything Goes."

48. I studied systematic theology under John Murray. In private, he was an anti-New Deal conservative. In public, he was politically mute. Both Wayne House and Tommy Ice were political conservatives. In terms of a developed social and political theory, however, they were equally mute.

completed in the name of a "higher" view of theistic ethics than the Mosaic law supposedly offered to the Israelites.

This supposed dichotomy between Noah's covenantal sanctions and Moses' covenantal sanctions, and also between Moses' covenantal sanctions and Jesus' covenantal sanctions, cannot survive a careful examination of the biblical principle of victim's rights, which is also the principle of the judicially limited state. The biblical judicial principle is this: victims of criminal acts possess the God-granted legal right to specify no penalty or any penalty up to the maximum limit allowed by God's Bible-revealed law. Neither the state nor the humanistic sociologist is entitled by God to increase or reduce this victim-specified penalty. But in order to keep the principle of victim's rights from becoming tyrannical, God's law specifies maximum penalties. Men must be restrained by law. This includes. To argue that there ever was, ever is, or ever will be a time when men are not under God's specified judicial sanctions is to argue that they are under sanctions imposed by autonomous man, meaning the self-proclaimed autonomous state. In short, to argue this is inescapably to argue also that God has in history authorized either the tyranny of the unchained state or else the implicit subsidizing of criminal behavior through the state's unwillingness to impose God's specified sanctions. In either case, victims lose. This is what antinomians of all varieties refuse even to discuss, let alone answer biblically.

There will always be sanctions. The relevant questions are: Which sanctions? What laws? Who judges? There will always be judicial chains, either attached to Satan (Rev. 20:1–2), his demonic host (II Peter 2:4; Jude 6), and his covenantal earthly representatives, or else attached to the righteous victims of Satan's covenantal representatives (Acts 12:7; 21:33). The modern antinomian Christian and the modern power-seeking statist want to break God's judicial chain, His revealed law. The result is the victimization of the judicially innocent and the expansion of the messianic state.

Conclusion

All sins are against God and God's law. All sinners are criminals in the hand of a temporarily merciful Victim. God sits on His throne as final Judge and even temporal Judge (e.g., He slew Ananias and Sapphira: Acts 5:5, 10). But to sin against God, men usually must sin against something in the creation.⁴⁹ The Bible provides case laws that define those sins against any aspect of the creation which constitute civil, familial, or ecclesiastical infractions. Where a sin does constitute an infraction, the victim must represent God by becoming a plaintiff against the sinner. He upholds the integrity of the injured party and also seeks restitution. In some cases, restitution is made only to the victim; in other cases, it must also be made to God through a payment to His church (Lev. 6:1–7).

The Bible provides five remedies for criminal behavior: (1) flogging (up to 40 lashes), (2) the slashing of a woman's hand; (3) economic restitution, which can be large enough to require (4) up to a lifetime of bondage, and (5) execution. The goals of these penalties include: (1) upholding God's interests by enforcing His law (civil worship)⁵⁰; (2) penalizing criminal behavior, sometimes by removing the criminal from this world (vengeance); (3) warning all people of the eternal judgment to come (evangelism); (4) protecting civil order (deterrence); and (5) protecting the interests of victims (justice). Ultimately, all of these goals can be summarized in one phrase: upholding God's civil covenant.

Notice that there is no mention of imprisonment. Hirsch wrote a century and a half ago: "Punishments of imprisonment, with all the attendant despair and moral degradation that dwell behind prison bars, with all the worry and distress that it entails for wife and child, are unknown in Torah jurisprudence. Where its power holds sway, prison for criminals does not exist. It only knows of remand custody, and even this, according to the whole prescribed legal procedure, and especially through the absolute rejection of all circumstantial evidence, can only be of the shortest duration."⁵¹

Biblical law upholds the victim's interests. The criminal is to make restitution to his victim. The victim has the right to extend mercy, but that is his decision, not the judge's. Judges are to serve as agents of the victim, who is God's primary earthly representative in criminal affairs. The primary goal of criminal justice theory should be to discover and enforce civil penalties that uphold victim's rights within the guidelines established by Scripture.

49. An exception could be mental sins, yet in a sense even these are sins against the creation: a misuse of man's gift of reason.

50. If civil magistrates are ministers, as Paul says they are (Rom. 13:4), then there is an element of worship in their enforcement of God's law. Sanctions are imposed in God's name.

51. Hirsch, Exodus, p. 294: at Exodus 21:6.

When the victim refuses to prosecute, the other covenantal courts are required by God to honor this decision. The criminal is not to be prosecuted by any covenantal court without the co-operation of the victim. When the state is the victim, or when a victim cannot be identified (e.g., a speeding violation), the judges are allowed to impose penalties up to the limit of God's Bible-revealed civil law, or when a penalty is not specified by the Bible, up to the limit of the written statute.⁵² They can also impose reduced penalties, except where the pleonasm occurs. Where the pleonasm occurs, and where the state is not itself the victim, the judges must act as God's agents and impose the penalty that the pleonasm requires. This is the judicial function of the pleonasm of execution: a restriction on leniency by civil judges when punishing "victimless crimes." The judges must execute the convicted criminal without mercy. God requires him to be delivered speedily into His court.

Those who reject my thesis regarding the pleonasm must answer some very difficult questions. First, on what legal basis other than victim's rights did Joseph, said by the text to be a just man, fail to prosecute Mary either in a priestly court or a civil court? Had the law's sanction been changed by God before the birth of Jesus Christ? What is the evidence for such a view of the law's sanctions? Second, on what legal basis other than victim's rights did Jesus announce the temporal forgiveness of those who had crucified Him? Third, on what legal basis other than victim's rights had God refused to execute Israel for her adulteries? Put differently, what was the judicial basis of the Book of Hosea? Fourth, on what legal basis other than victim's rights did God divorce Israel when He transferred His kingdom to the church (Matt. 21:43), yet also allowed her to survive another generation after the crucifixion of Jesus Christ and the incorporation of the church by the Holy Spirit? Not until critics provide consistent, well-developed, Bible-supported answers to these and related judicial questions should they abandon the Mosaic law's principle of victim's rights.

52. The Bible does not specify the amount of a proper fine for a speeding violation. It lays down the general principle of protecting potential victims. The civil authorities must then decide what the fine should be by balancing the risks to people as pedestrians vs. the benefits to people as drivers. Fines should vary according to speed and also according to geographical safety considerations such as school zones. See Chapter 37: "Criminal Law and Restoration," under the subhead, "Fines Should Compensate Victims."

Addendum: Cases to Which the Pleonasm Is Attached

I have put in bold face those case laws in which the state in Old Testament Israel was required to initiate the prosecution, and therefore those cases in which the convicted criminal had to be put to death.

He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall be surely put to death (Ex. 21:12).

And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death (Ex. 21:15).

And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death (Ex. 21:16).

And he that curseth his father, or his mother, shall surely be put to death (Ex. 21:17).

Whosoever lieth with a beast shall surely be put to death (Ex. 22:19).

Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you: every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people (Ex. 31:14).

Six days may work be done; but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest, holy to the LORD: whosoever doeth any work in the sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death (Ex. 31:15).

Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Molech; he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall stone him with stones (Lev. 20:2).

For every one that curseth his father or his mother shall be surely put to death: he hath cursed his father or his mother; his blood shall be upon him (Lev. 20:9).

And the man that committeth adultery with another man's wife, even he that committeth adultery with his neighbour's wife, the adulterer and the adulteress shall surely be put to death (Lev. 20:10).

And the man that lieth with his father's wife hath uncovered his father's nakedness: both of them shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them (Lev. 20:11).

And if a man lie with his daughter in law, both of them shall surely be put to death: they have wrought confusion; their blood shall be upon them (Lev. 20:12).

If a man also lie with mankind, as he lieth with a woman, both of them have committed an abomination: they shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them (Lev. 20:13).

And if a man lie with a beast, he shall surely be put to death: and ye shall slay the beast (Lev. 20:15).

And if a woman approach unto any beast, and lie down thereto, thou shalt kill the woman, and the beast: they shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them (Lev. 20:16).

A man also or woman that hath a familiar spirit, or that is a wizard, shall surely be put to death: they shall stone them with stones: their blood shall be upon them (Lev. 20:27).

And he that blasphemeth the name of the LORD, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the LORD, shall be put to death (Lev. 24:16).

And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death (Lev. 24:17).

I the LORD have said, I will surely do it unto all this evil congregation, that are gathered together against me: in this wilderness they shall be consumed, and there they shall die (Num. 14:35).

For the LORD had said of them, They shall surely die in the wilderness. And there was not left a man of them, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun (Num. 26:65).

And if he smite him with an instrument of iron, so that he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death. And if he smite him with throwing a stone, wherewith he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death. Or if he smite him with an hand weapon of wood, wherewith he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death (Num. 35:16-18).

But if he thrust him of hatred, or hurl at him by laying of wait, that he die; Or in enmity smite him with his hand, that he die: he that smote him shall surely be put to death; for he is a murderer: the revenger of blood shall slay the murderer, when he meeteth him (Num. 35:20-21).

Moreover ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death: but he shall be surely put to death (Num. 35:31).

No instances of the pleonasm appear in the Book of Deuteronomy. I do not think that this has any biblical-theological significance. The biblical hermeneutical principle of the continuity of a God-revealed law is this: unless a law or its sanction is repealed by a subsequent biblical revelation, it is still judicially binding. The pleonasms did not have to be repeated in Deuteronomy in order for them to be binding in the land. God's laws in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers were not exclusively "wilderness laws," with the laws of Deuteronomy alone to serve as the law of Israel in the land. In any case, the severity of God's sanctions tends to increase over time as men's maturity increases. This is a basic principle of biblical jurisprudence: men's knowledge of God increases over time, and so does their personal and corporate responsibility. "The lord of that servant will come in a day when he looketh not for him, and at an hour when he is not aware, and will cut him in sunder, and will appoint him his portion with the unbelievers. And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more" (Luke 12:46-48). Because they were required by God to exercise greater responsibility in the Promised Land, as testified to by the ending of the miraculous agricultural subsidy of the manna (Josh. 5:12), the law's civil sanctions did not decrease in rigor; if anything, they increased. The pleonasm was still judicially binding in Canaan. The equivalent phrase in Deuteronomy is, "so shalt thou put [purge] evil away from you" (Deut. 17:7; 19:19; 21:21; 22:21, 24; 24:7).

APPENDIX N

COVENANTAL LAW AND COVENANTAL LOVE

But when the Pharisees had heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence, they gathered together. Then one of them, which was a lawyer, asked him a question, saying, Master, which is the great commandment in the law? Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets (Matt. 22:34–40).

The New Testament is a commentary on the Old Testament, in the light of the new revelation given by Christ and the Holy Spirit. We need to understand the New Testament by referring to the Old Testament, and we need to look at the New Testament in order to understand the Old Testament. It is not that the New Testament revelation is in opposition to the old. Jesus categorically denied such a possibility (Matt. 5:17–19).¹ What the New Testament does is to specify more clearly the general principles that undergird Old Testament law, and to specify which of the Old Testament's laws were fulfilled by Christ's life, death, and resurrection. Christ did not annul the principles of the law, but in certain cases He annulled the ritual form in which those principles had been set forth by God to His people.

A. Jesus and the Pharisees

We should not expect that Jesus would announce a revision of the Old Testament law's fundamental teachings. The Pharisees clearly did not expect Him to say that the law—meaning the Ten Commandments—is no longer applicable. Had they expected such a statement, they would not have asked Him which one of the laws is most important. What the lawyer probably intended to do was to drag Jesus into a detailed, “Pharisaical” argument over which of the ten was most fundamental. Then, with the skills of a legal professional, the lawyer no doubt believed that he could make Jesus’ answer look incomplete. “What about this other law? And what about still another law? Haven’t you undercut the very law itself, etc. etc.” In short, it was one more example of the Jewish leaders unsuccessfully trying to tie Jesus up in the details of the law. It was another “leading question.”

1. Greg L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics, 2nd ed. (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1984), ch. 2.

Jesus invariably responded to their leading questions in such a way as to expose the spiritual rebellion of those who asked such questions. This is why they fell silent every time He answered one of their questions. In this instance, He shifted the discussion to the ultimate aspect of all biblical religion: the theocentric nature of all true worship. The greatest of the commandments is that commandment which demands that we worship God with every aspect of our being. He cited Deuteronomy 6:5 to prove His point.

He could have stopped right there. He had answered the lawyer’s question. This is the greatest of the commandments. To have denied Jesus’ answer, or quibbled with it in any way, the lawyer would have had to say that some other law is the all-encompassing law, of which this one is simply a partial derivative. But there is no such law. All the laws of the Bible are applications and extensions of this great theocentric principle. We must begin with acknowledging our absolute responsibility to worship God with everything we have as creatures—not just our goods, but with ourselves. Could the lawyer have appealed to one of the Old Testament sacrifices as more important? Hardly; they involve giving up only goods. But the biblical principle which Jesus sets forth here, which Paul illuminated in a different context, is this: “I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service” (Rom. 12:1).

Nevertheless, Jesus went on. He gave the second greatest commandment: to love our neighbors as ourselves. This was Jesus’ way of nailing down the argument. The lawyer was now in no position to respond, “Yes, but what about the specifics of the laws that Moses gave? What about our day-to-day dealings with men?” He might not have asked this. If he wanted to appeal to the crowd, however, he might have. “What about our obligations to man? What law gets our first attention?" Jesus' response headed off all such questions. The second principle is analogous to the first. Men are made in God's image. We should therefore love our fellow man. But how much love is proper? Certainly, not the love we show to God. We owe him everything. But a good test of how much we love another creature is to estimate how much we love ourselves. Jesus assumes that each man wants to do his best for himself. Men are always "looking out for Number One." So, He said, look out for your neighbor just as you look out for yourself. You are a man; he is a man; both of you deserve the same consideration, for both of you are made in God's image.

B. Love and the Law

The question related to the law. The answers spoke of love. Are these two in opposition? Obviously not. Jesus always dealt faithfully with the questions of his questioners. This is why they were always struck dumb. They were incapable of replying, precisely because Jesus' answers were flawless. There was never anything more to say without either agreeing with Him or winding up in opposition to the Old Testament. Therefore, when Jesus answered the lawyer's question concerning the greatest of the laws, He was saying clearly and unmistakably that all the laws of God are a working out of the principle of love—theocentric love first of all, and neighborly love second. If these laws are applications of the principle of love, then how can they be in opposition to love?

The lawyer recognized this. He did not reply. By focusing on the loving aspect of love, Jesus removed the question from the realm of legalistic debate. You love God with everything you are and have; therefore, you also must love your neighbor as yourself. But how do we love our neighbors? Clearly, by treating them as faithfully as we treat ourselves. By giving them the same "benefit of the doubt" in a dispute that we give ourselves. In short, this is the so-called golden rule: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them: for this is the law and the prophets" (Matt. 7:12). This is the biblical version of the more common phrase (which is not found in the Bible): "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you."

1. The Sermon on the Mount

Jesus' sermon on the mount is a commentary on God's "sermon"

on the mount to Moses. This is what modern Christians have failed to recognize. There is a deeply rooted tradition of interpreting Jesus' words as if they stood in opposition to the law which God delivered at Mount Sinai. This tradition is wrong. It is perhaps the most dangerous heresy in twenty-first-century Christianity. It flies in the face of Jesus' warning: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am come not to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise [way] pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:17–20).

Who were the scribes? They were the Jewish lawyers. In Mark's account of the lawyer's question to Jesus, it says that he was a scribe (Mark 12:28). This scribe apparently had not heard Jesus' original statement at the "Sermon on the Mount," or if he had, he had forgotten about it. Jesus did not vary His views. Doing righteously to other men is the essence of biblical law, for we do our righteous acts representatively unto God (Matt. 25:34–40). His first answer to the lawyer did help to clarify the theocentric foundation of the law commanding neighborly love. But the Pharisees should have understood already that it was not, a particular Old Testament law which was the focus of His ministry, but the underlying principle of all God's laws. This, in fact, was what distinguished Jesus' teaching from the common culture's first principles. The common doctrine in Israel was that men should love their friends and hate their enemies.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you. That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh the sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? Do not even the publicans [tax collectors] do the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? Do not even the publicans do so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect (Matt. 5:43–48).

Notice His frame of reference here. Your enemies. Those who use you spitefully. Jesus was not saying that the enemies of God should be allowed to escape the lawful punishment of their crimes against man and God. He was not repudiating the Ten Commandments, which He had affirmed categorically a few moments before (vv. 17–19). What He was saying is this: in your judicial dealings with all men, treat them as you would treat your friends. If your friends violate God's law, you do not repudiate the law. If your friend commits murder, you do not allow that murder to go unpunished, if you have information that would convict him. To do so would be to become an accomplice to the crime. Jesus is taking this principle of law enforcement right to the heart of each man. If you yourself commit murder, you must turn yourself in to the civil authorities, just as you would turn in your worst enemy. You must honor God's law. Paul announced this principle forthrightly when he was in court: "For if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die" (Acts 25:11a). To refuse not to die is to love God, and to love the righteousness of God, more than you love your own life. This is the essence of conversion: "He that findeth his life shall lose it: and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it" (Matt. 10:39).

The New Testament tells us to love our neighbors as ourselves. We are to deal with them in terms of God's law. We owe them such fair dealing. "Love worketh no ill to his neighbour; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. 13:10). But what is "ill"? It is unrighteous dealing. How do we test what is "ill" and what isn't? By the standard of the law of God. This is why love fulfills the law. It is not that love overcomes the law, or annuls the law, or abrogates the law. Love fulfills the law, just as Jesus Christ fulfilled the law. He did not go on to deal unlawfully with men. How could He? He was the author of the law. Nor should we go on to deal unlawfully with men.

Jesus was not denying the legitimacy of biblical law. On the contrary, He was affirming biblical law. We love God first; God commands us to keep His word; therefore, we must enforce the law on ourselves. We start with ourselves because we have more knowledge of ourselves and more responsibility over ourselves. This is the meaning of progressive sanctification. Jesus was not calling us to ignore biblical law; He was calling us to enforce it first on ourselves, before we enforce the same laws on others.

Judge not, that ye be not judged. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and behold, a beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye (Matt. 7:1–5).

Notice what He did not say. He did not say that it is all right to go through life with motes (small chips) in our eye. The eye is the most sensitive organ in the body. A mote in an eye could blind it, or seriously interfere with our vision. Jesus did not condone sin in any form. Sin is a horror; it jeopardizes our very existence. It should not be allowed to remain in your eye, and we are required by God to do what we can to help remove chips from our neighbors' eyes. We are to use biblical law to assist them. What Jesus was saying is that we need to be constantly on the lookout for motes in other people's eyes, so that we can help them remove them. But to accomplish this, we must first get rid of the beams in our own eyes. We must be able to go to the other person and tell him: "Look, I used to have a really bad beam in my eye, and it blinded me. But through the grace of God, I was able to remove it. I see that you're suffering from the same thing. Let me show you how God's word speaks to your minor problem, just as it spoke to my major one." In other words, "I've been there. I know what it is. It leads to blindness and agony."

This is the approach of the most successful alcoholic rehabilitation program, Alcoholics Anonymous. When a man at last chooses to become sober, and is faced with a terrible craving to drink, he calls his sober friends who were former alcoholics. He goes to those who have suffered what he is suffering. He doesn't telephone his Aunt Tilly, who never touched a drink in her life, unless Aunt Tilly has a known prayer life which produces healings and near-miracles whenever she prays. Besides, he probably already asked Aunt Tilly to pray for him, and he still got drunk. So he calls the men who suffered from beams (Jim Beams?) and who successfully solved their problem.

There is a tendency in twenty-first-century fundamentalism, evangelicalism, and pietism for law-hating, responsibility-avoiding Christian people to piously assert, "It is not our responsibility to judge. We must show mercy to everyone. We are sinners, too." This is the worst kind of hypocrisy. What they are really saying is that they judge not, because they do not want to be judged. They want perpetual mercy for their continuing sins, so they therefore avoid criticizing others. But this is evil. The goal of redeemed man's life is ethical perfection (Matt. 5:48). The means by which redeemed people approach this goal is self-government under God's law, what we also call progressive sanctification. We want to be judged by God's law. This is our affirmation of the sovereignty of God. We want the law of God to rule over every man's actions, every institution, throughout history. Such honoring of God's law is the basis of the dominion covenant. But to see God's law universally honored, we must do everything that we can to honor it in our own lives.

The "judge not" verse warns us not to judge others by any standard other than the one we want to be used in judging us. But the converse is equally true: once we have judged ourselves, and have disciplined ourselves in terms of God's standard, it is our moral obligation to begin to apply this same law to every area of life over which we have a God-given authority. This is why the Bible sets forth rigorous standards for becoming an elder or deacon (I Tim. 3). They must achieve self-discipline and then discipline over their families before they are allowed to discipline other church members. Similarly, if we are eligible to vote, we must get registered. If we are registered, we should take time to study the issues. Then we should vote accordingly. The "judge not" passage is not a license for pietistic retreat from the world. The context of the "Sermon on the Mount" shows clearly that the "judge not" passage is a call to dominion. It instructs us to begin with ourselves, so that we can then work to extend the principles and enforcement of God's principles to areas of life over which we have lawful authority.

C. Exercising Judgment

The "judge not" passage is a positive command by implication: a command to judge righteously in terms of biblical law. We are called by God to exercise judgment. This is the inescapable reality of man (Gen. 1:28). Man judged in the garden, but he judged rebelliously. Redeemed men will eventually judge the angels (I Cor. 6:3). If we are never to judge on earth, then when will we get the ability? Will God grant the gift of good and godly judgment to men who have fled this responsibility all their lives? This is unlikely.

If we do not exercise good judgment, then how can we fulfill the terms of the dominion covenant? The historic response of the "judge not” pietists—the defenders of the escapist religion—is to deny the existence of this covenant. But if Christians deny the existence of a law-covenant—if they deny that all men are under God’s dominion covenant—and if they deny that there are eternal laws that serve as standards by which all men are required to perform, then how is the sinner to be confronted with the reality of his sin? If Christians are incapable of helping unregenerate men see their sins, and if they are therefore incapable of assisting newly regenerate men to overcome their newly perceived sins, then what happens to church discipline? The institutional answer of the pietists has been to deny the necessity of church discipline. The consistent ones go so far as to deny the legitimacy of much of civil government, too. They deny the death penalty for capital crimes. Some of them do everything possible to promote the State as a substitute parent, but a parent without a rod of discipline. Others simply deny all civil law whatsoever—and therefore are compelled to deny the continuing authority of the Old Testament.²

The power-seeking religionists understand the centrality of judgment and discipline, but they have substituted the state in God’s place. Thus, they seek to expand the centralized power of the State, and to extend the state’s power over every area of life. They seek to worship their God, human power, by incorporating it into a political monopoly. They understand the fixed relationship between sovereignty, power, and judgment. As agents of collective mankind, they seek to become agents of the power state. They seek ever-increasing opportunities to exercise judgment.

This is why the power religionists always find allies with the escapist religionists. The escapist religionists point to the power of humanist man, who is ultimately satanic man, and they conclude that this power is an aspect of Satan's control over the earth until Jesus comes again. When these escapist religionists are confronted with the responsibilities associated with the dominion covenant, they recoil in horror. Dominion, in their eyes, is too much like autonomous man's power. To adopt such a view of Christianity would mean that they would have to become involved in a head-on, lifetime confrontation with Satan's earthly kingdom of power. They would have to begin to exercise judgment. They prefer to stay in the shadows of history in the name of a "higher spirituality" or a "higher calling" from God. They prefer to avoid the visible, civilizational confrontations. Thus, the power religionists can enlist the retreatists as allies in their war against covenantal religion.

2. Mark McCulley, “Faith and Freedom: A Fifth View of Christian Economics,” Nomos, II (Winter 1984). McCulley called his anti-Old Testament, anti-civil government position the “economics of Christian exile.” This is well-named. Exile is the essence of the escapist religion. He ends his article with a partial citation of John Wesley: “earn all you can; give all you can.” He deliberately ignored Wesley’s third principle, save all you can, which is the foundation of economic growth and linear development unto dominion. McCulley was hostile to such a view, for he understood the thrift principle well enough to see where it leads in principle, and where it has led in the past: to modern industrial capitalism. He did not hate capitalism, unlike so many of his Anabaptist colleagues; he hated growth-oriented industrial production. This is why he praised as followers of Jesus’ New Testament ethic “Ballou, the Hopedale community, and a few ‘come-outers’” in the post-Civil War Christian era. “Down on the farm” communalism has long been the final resting and retreating place for pacifist Anabaptists. The revolutionary Anabaptists have generally headed for the cities, in order to consolidate power.

The standard ploy of the theological liberals in the United States from the late nineteenth century until they consolidated ecclesiastical power in the 1920s and 1930s in the North, and in the 1950s and 1960s in the South, was to criticize all heresy trials—where they were going to be the victims—in the name of institutional peace and toleration. They directed this incomparably successful appeal to the weak-hearted souls in the churches. These people wanted institutional peace above all. Until the liberals gained complete control and shoved them aside, these conservative battle-avoiders had a majority in every major denomination. Decade by decade, the liberals quietly consolidated power: in seminaries, in colleges, and in the churches' various boards, especially the missions boards. When the theologically committed conservatives finally realized what had happened, it was too late. They could no longer gather theologically committed troops for a fight. The theology of a majority of the conservatives was "peace at any institutional price." So they paid the highest possible price: the capture of their churches by the opponents of biblical Christianity. In the churches with a strong hierarchy, the liberals eventually pushed out the orthodox pastors, with the exception of the Missouri Synod Lutherans.³ In the decentralized associations, they simply isolated the orthodox men from the seats of power. This has always been the humanists' strategy. With only a few exceptions, it worked superbly. The archetype was the capture of the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A. (Northern).⁴

3. Kurt E. Marquart, Anatomy of an Explosion: A Theological Analysis of the Missouri Synod Conflict (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Baker Book House, 1977).

4. Gary North, Crossed Fingers: How the Liberals Captured the Presbyterian Church (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1996). (<http://bit.ly/>

D. Social Co-operation

When Christian men treat non-Christians as men deserving of the benefits of biblical law, they become evangelists. The benefits of the law become visible to covenantal outsiders. The law is to be a tool of evangelism (Deut. 4:6–8). But this program of evangelism requires God’s people to keep the law (Deut. 4:9).

Because Jesus made it plain that all men are to be extended the courtesy of the law, as well as the restraining authority of the law, Christianity has become an international leaven. It has risen up in pagan cultures and has replaced many of the worst features of the old paganism. The Old Testament also required God’s people to deal righteously with other men, but the empowering of the Holy Spirit and the church’s first-century exodus out of Palestine universalized the declaration and manifestation of biblical law in a new way.

Consider the concept of the contract. When Christians are commanded to deal with non-Christians righteously, they are placed under the terms of biblical law. To the extent that they obey biblical law, other people can make better predictions concerning the performance of Christians in voluntary associations. The law is an open book. It is easily read and understood. Children are to be taught biblical law (Deut. 6:7; 31:12). It is suitable for children, in other words. Thus, non-Christians should find it less risky to co-operate in economic ventures with Christians, if Christians respect biblical law. By reducing the risk (uncertainty) of working with Christians, biblical law thereby increases the non-Christians’ demand for Christians to associate with. The price of co-operation drops when uncertainty drops. As the price drops, more of the good is demanded. The “good” in question is the honest labor and insight of the covenant man. More people want it.

This is another impetus to Christian dominion. Christians become the people other men prefer to work with and deal with. Their opportunities for increasing their own authority are increased because of this added readiness of non-Christians to work with them. The unbeliever hopes to benefit personally from the relationship. This could be called the “Laban” strategy, or the “Potiphar” strategy: make it beneficial for covenant-breakers to co-operate with covenant-keepers.

This does not mean that Christians are to become “doormats.” They are not to become “pushovers.” They are to honor God’s law, both when it benefits them personally and when it doesn’t. There are times when enforcing biblical law decreases the unbeliever's capital or opportunities—sinful opportunities. In such cases, Christians are to abide by biblical law. The terms of God's covenant must govern the Christian's enforcement of the terms of a contract.

Honesty is the best policy, Ben Franklin said. He was correct. As men perceive that Christians are honest and can be trusted, honest men will seek them out. Those non-Christians who have been given the common grace of honesty will want to work with Christians, if Christians honor biblical law. This puts Christians in association with honest people, who are also following the best policy. This puts dishonest people at a competitive disadvantage, for Christians can take advantage of the increased productivity of the division of labor by working with honest non-Christians. Christians increase their authority and capital by associating with, and learning from, skilled honest people, whether Christian or non-Christian.⁵ This is a major economic benefit of honoring the golden rule.

E. Antinomianism, Anarchy, and Tyranny

What I have argued throughout An Economic Commentary on the Bible is that biblical law is the ideal foundation for social order. Only to the degree that societies conform to the standards of biblical law can they experience the blessings promised by the law (Deut. 28:1–14). This does not mean that a society needs to become explicitly Christian, nor does it mean that all or a majority of its members must be regenerated by the Holy Spirit. It means only that the written standards of God's law be honored.

I have also argued that it is inconsistent for non-Christian societies to retain allegiance to the standards of biblical law. Over time, they will become more consistent with their covenant-breaking presuppositions. Special grace is therefore necessary in the long run to sustain a society's commitment to the standards of biblical law. Nevertheless, during that historical period in which the law's externals are honored in deed, and possibly even in word, the society in question will become the beneficiary of the external power that the law delivers. Examples in the Bible of such external power and blessing are Egypt under Joseph's counsel, Nineveh after the preaching of Jonah, and Medo-Persia under Daniel's counsel. It is true that the law eventually brings death (Rom.

5. Gary North, "Competence, Common Grace, and Dominion," Biblical Economics Today, VIII (June/July 1985). (<http://bit.ly/gnccgad>)

7), for it testifies to man's rebellion and curse, and this is why covenant-breaking societies cannot remain faithful to the externals of biblical law forever. They must either abandon God's law or be converted to the gospel.

We also find examples of Christian societies that steadily abandon the externals of biblical law, and in doing so, grow culturally impotent. Americans have lived in such a society for over a century. We find that those who should proclaim a dominion religion have become adherents of the escapist religion. Meanwhile, the most consistent and ruthless advocates of the power religion in the history of man, the Communists, threaten to overwhelm the West. The Christians have become subservient to one group of law-hating humanists, who in turn have proven to be no match ideologically or militarily for the consistent humanists behind the Iron Curtain. It appears to be a replay of Israel's experience in the era of the judges: when the nation began to worship the gods of the Philistines, God delivered them into the hands of the Philistines. They learned just what it is like to live under foreign gods.⁶

Christian leaders for a century have consistently denied the continuing validity of Old Testament social and political law. This has led Christians to abandon God's tool of dominion, His law. God delivered them into the hands of the progressive educators and Darwinists, the political salvationists, and the welfare statist. Conservative Christians in dispensational churches, liberal Christians in mainline denominations, and Calvinist Christians inside tiny, invisible denominations have stood arm in arm theologically on the question of the authority of biblical law today. It has no continuing authority today, they affirm. Such a doctrine has played into the hands of the humanists, who also affirm this doctrine.

In 1984, the increasingly liberal InterVarsity Press published a collection of four essays and responses, Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics. I was one of the participants, the defender of the free market approach. There was a socialist, a Keynesian, and a socialist who pretended to be a defender of voluntary communalism. His chapter was misleadingly labeled, "Decentralist Economics."

This latter position is the only significant alternative to free market Christianity, either intellectually or theologically, within American evangelical circles. The popularity of Ron Sider's Rich Christians in an

6. James B. Jordan, Judges: God's War Against Humanism (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Ministries, 1985), pp. 40–41. (<http://bit.ly/jjjjudges>)

Age of Hunger (1977), also published by InterVarsity Press, is indicative. (In Roman Catholic circles, especially in Latin America, Sider's brand of Christian socialism was regarded as soft-core and irrelevant; the liberation theologians there were Marxist revolutionaries. Sider was content merely to send the Nicaraguan Sandinistas money through his Jubilee Fund;⁷ he was not yet willing to adopt their rhetoric. Too risky for a Baptist seminary professor.)

Art Gish, the Sider surrogate in the published debate, was forthright in his moral outrage against capitalism and Western Civilization. Why did Gish hate Western Civilization and capitalism? Because he hated biblical law, and Western Civilization and capitalism are the social products historically of biblical law. He was a devout antinomian. "The answer to our problems is not biblical law but God's grace, the saving grace of Jesus Christ expressed in a new order, God's kingdom. The law cannot bring salvation. Neither will the capitalist doctrine of salvation by works lead to life."⁸

The startling aspect of this statement is that it has become the theological "coin of the realm" in Protestant circles. The reason why the old-time fundamentalists have been unable to counter Sider and his followers—the reason why tens of thousands of young Christians have been converted to their view of capitalism—is that the conservatives have adopted the same view of biblical law. Therefore, to counter Sider and the radicals, they have only conservative humanist arguments, and these do not have the emotional and rhetorical appeal for college students that warmed-over liberal rhetoric has. Furthermore, politically liberal students are in rebellion against their socially unconcerned and culturally impotent fundamentalist origins. So they respond positively to Sider and Gish because these "radical Christians" seem to be offering them relevance, but without breaking with the familiar "grace vs. law" theology they have brought with them to college or seminary. The old-time fundamentalists have lost the fight; they simply cannot compete with the radicals in terms of the "grace vs. law" theology.

Gish went on: "In the New Covenant we are offered something much better, the grace of going beyond greed and revenge and therefore the need of law. . . . As Christians, our lives can be governed by

7. The Other Side (September 1979), p. 41.

8. Art Gish, "A Decentralist Response," in Robert Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), p. 75. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>)

God's love and grace instead of law."⁹ At last, he got to the point. Well, not quite. He was not yet ready to go the whole distance. So, he laid down the theological foundation of his unstated but inescapable conclusion: the abolition of all government. This has to be the conclusion, for without law there can be no government.

This conclusion is that same old demonic position which has accompanied radical revolutionaries and anarchism throughout history: the "truly free" man and the "truly free" society is lawless. Mankind has no need of law. In short, the "new mankind" is perfect. There is no need for civil government. There is also no need for church government. The next step, historically, has always been taken by the radicals, though not normally until they set up a local "kingdom of the saints": there is no need for family government.

Gish was an Anabaptist. His theology is the theology of the Anabaptists. In the sixteenth century, Anabaptist revolutionaries began to terrorize Europe. They gathered mobs together, set up city-states, adopted free love (or polygamy for the rulers) and socialism. They tore down churches. They murdered opponents. And they did it all in terms of the freedom of the Holy Spirit. Igor Shafarevich, a Soviet dissenter, wrote a chapter on this revolutionary heritage in his excellent book, The Socialist Phenomenon (Harper & Row, 1980). The chapter is titled, "The Socialism of the Heresies." David Chilton devoted an appendix to the same subject in his Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators. It summarizes Shafarevich and adds more historical data: "Socialism, the Anabaptist Heresy."

Where does such a theology lead? To tyranny. In the name of zero-law, the "saints" impose tyranny. Law is a means of self-government first, and a means of restricting tyranny secondarily. Biblical law, when enforced, restrains sin's public manifestations. Without it, men are left at the mercy of people who categorically deny the need for outward law because they have been "purified" by the Holy Spirit. Thus, the theory of anarchy and antinomianism invariably results in tyranny. This is why it is so misleading to label Gish's position "decentralist economics." It may appear to be decentralist, but it inescapably leads to tyranny by way of antinomianism.

In condemning Gish, I am simultaneously condemning all forms of antinomianism, including the antinomianism of modern dispensationalism and modern pietism. The difference between the typical Baptist preacher's message and Gish's message is a matter of personal taste and financing. It is not a difference in theology. The Baptist minister might be fired if he started preaching sermons that sounded like Gish's chapter. Gish was already safely down on his communal farm (at least until its economic principles drive it into bankruptcy), and he had a constituency of faithful "poverts" who could survive financially and send him money because they were employed by free market institutions or government institutions that are financed by taxes collected from free market institutions. Gish could afford to pursue his Anabaptist heritage somewhat more faithfully than the typical antinomian pastor. In short, the difference between antinomian conservatism and antinomian liberation theology is more a matter of style and constituency than it is a matter of theology.

9 Idem.

What is my thesis? Very simple: anyone who contrasts the love of God with the law of God is an implicit defender of tyranny.¹⁰

Conclusion

This is not the place to conduct an extended discussion of the relationship between grace and law. That topic has been covered in depth by Greg Bahnsen in Theonomy in Christian Ethics and in Part II of my book, 75 Bible Questions Your Instructors Pray You Won't Ask (1984).¹¹ The issue here is the relationship between covenantal love and covenantal law. God saves His covenanted people by grace. This is an act of love. How does He do this? He looks at the law-conforming life, the law-required death, and animal sacrifice-annulling resurrection of Jesus Christ, and He counts Christ's righteousness as the righteousness of Christ's covenant people. He imputes Christ's righteousness to them judicially (definitive justification) and morally (definitive sanctification).¹² In short, God imputes definitively to the regenerate the absolute perfection of biblical law.

As men progressively work out their salvations with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12b), they are to be guided by God's law, since God's imputation to them of Christ's perfect keeping of this law is the only foundation of their salvation. They are to judge their own acts, both internal (mental) and external, in terms of this standard. They are to judge the external acts of other people by this same standard. What other standard could regenerate men possibly use? We must constantly ask ourselves, and endlessly ask the critics of the New Testament authority of Old Testament law: By what other standard? If we love Christ, we will keep His commandments (John 14:15).

10. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985), Part II. (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

11. Tyler, Texas: Spurgeon Press. (<http://bit.ly/75bible>)

12. Gary North, Unconditional Surrender: God's Program for Victory, 5th ed. (Powder Springs, Georgia: American Vision, [1980] 2010), pp. 43–51.

Only if Christ's commandments were different from the commandments God gave to Moses could we legitimately conclude that the love of Christ is different from the love of God. Only then could we conclude that obedience to Christ is different from obedience to God. But there can be no difference; the God who created everything is the divine Logos, who was incarnated as the perfect human, Jesus Christ (John 1). Thus, any attempt to create a dualism between God's Old Testament law and Christ's New Testament law is simultaneously an attempt to offer a two-God theory of history, with the Old Testament God different from a New Testament God. This was attempted by Marcion in the second century, and he was condemned as a heretic. An implicit two-God theory has been proclaimed for centuries by Christian mystics and Anabaptists, and also by modern fundamentalists and evangelicals. The results have been culturally disastrous: the anti-dominion principle in action.

There is no contradiction between the ten commandments and the sermon on the mount. God's love is manifested to us in the law, which is the law of life. There is grace in God's law.

APPENDIX O

SOCIAL ANTINOMIANISM

Antinomianism—the denial of the validity of the concrete application of Old Testament law in this era—has influenced modern Christianity to such an extent that virtually no Christian seminary even teaches a single course against it. Anglo-Israelite sects do pay attention to biblical law, which is, I believe, the reason that Garner Ted Armstrong’s “The World Tomorrow” had such a huge radio audience and why he was more interesting than any orthodox Christian broadcasting in the late 1960s and early 1970s. He could comment successfully on the collapse of modern culture because he had concrete alternatives to offer.

Social antinomianism makes itself manifest in many ways. In the Reformed Protestant circles, the Dutch Calvinist movement associated with the name Herman Dooyeweerd was briefly influential in this regard, 1965–75. Always searching for the “true Christian attitude,” the radical young neo-Dooyeweerdians proclaimed almost complete freedom from the restraining hand of concrete biblical law. Thus, attitude is substituted for obedience to revealed law. The non-Dooyeweerdian churchmen were unable to refute the radicals precisely because they held a similar, though less rigorous, antinomian philosophy. Their instincts may have been conservative, but their operating presuppositions did not allow them to challenge successfully the young radicals. The leaders of the neo-Dooyeweerdians, located primarily at the Free University of Amsterdam and the Institute for Christian Studies in Toronto, combine a preference for government intervention and orthodox Christian language. The following article criticizes this combination. Troost’s answer appeared in the same issue (Oct. 1967) of the International Reformed Bulletin. It did not convince me. Similar terminology and identical antinomianism have become universal in the “radical Christian” Anabaptist circles.

A. My Response to Troost

In the issue of the International Reformed Bulletin for Jan./April, 1966, an article written by A. Troost [TROWST, not TRUEST] appeared, "Property Rights and the Eighth Commandment." Troost, the article informs us, is a professor of social ethics at the Free University of Amsterdam, and as such he seems to be representative of an increasingly large number of Dutch Reformed scholars who claim to be building upon the foundation laid down by Herman Dooyeweerd. It is my belief that the basic implications of Troost's essay are ultimately antinomian, and for this reason it deserves an extended analysis.

The problem which faces the Christian scholar in the area of social philosophy is a very great one: he must make an attempt to outline policies for social reconstruction that are in accord with the biblical framework, and at the same time he must make use of a vast quantity of scholarship which has been produced by non-Christian thinkers. In other words, he must acknowledge that common grace has enlightened the unregenerate scholar to the extent that some of his endeavors may be useful to the Christian, but at the same time the Christian must sift and choose from this scholarship in the light of Reformed, biblical standards. Clearly, it is not a simple task, and some errors are bound to creep into the work of even the most careful Reformed thinker. Yet part of the heritage of the Reformation is the rejection of perfectionism, and the fact that some errors are inevitable does not relieve us of the task of working out the implications of our Christian position.

The Bible, in short, is absolutely fundamental in this work of social criticism. Without it, the Christian is left without a basic frame of reference by which he can evaluate the various proposals for social change. Bearing this in mind, the reader may be able to understand my hostile reaction to Troost's starting point: "As we saw in section 12, the Bible does not provide us with data, points of departure or premises from which to draw logical conclusions relevant to modern society's socio-economic problems, including property relations" (p. 32). The question immediately arises: By what standard are we to evaluate the validity of any particular political or social proposal? If, as Christians, we cannot approach the special revelation presented in the Bible in the hope of finding our standards for social action, then where are we to go? It is Troost's position (and the position of many of his fellow Calvinist scholars) that the Bible gives us no data, no concrete recommendations, by which we can judge political programs; the task of ushering in the Kingdom of God is apparently to be accomplished without the guidelines of special, concrete revelation.

Nevertheless, Troost can assert that "The message of the Bible reveals something to us!" What is it which the Bible reveals? It gives us the story of the coming kingdom, of "the re-establishment of all things, to the total reconciliation, liberation and renewal of life by the person and work of Jesus Christ through his cross and resurrection." Even more than this, "The cross and the resurrection promise to our practice of property relations a complete liberation from the powerful grip of the sins of injustice and lovelessness" (p. 32).

Apparently, there are standards of "injustice and lovelessness." What are they, the Christian must ask, and where do we find them? So far, all that we know is that the Bible cannot provide them, at least not in the socio-economic realm. Troost reaches an impasse at this point. He has proclaimed a vague pietism in the name of Reformed scholarship. Unless he can find concrete standards of judgment that are somehow self-evident and eternally valid apart from the Bible, he leaves us without any basis for decision-making.

In spite of the fact that he has eliminated the Bible from the realm of social affairs, he now refers back to the book of Acts: "These first Christians did not abolish property, nor yet the means of production (e.g., landed estates). No, they put ownership and property rights back into the place where they belong, back into their proper function. 'Not a man of them claimed any of his possessions as his own, but everything was held in common' (Acts 4:32) . . ." (p. 33). Two preliminary observations should be made with regard to the interpretation of this passage. First, the decision to enter into such common ownership was voluntary, and anyone was permitted to hold his private property out of the common stock (Acts 5:4). Peter, in other words, proclaimed the right of private ownership as a perfectly legitimate Christian practice. Second, it is also relevant that the Christians in Jerusalem were expecting the fulfillment of the prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem (Luke 21:20ff.), and any application of the early church's practice of common ownership should be interpreted in this light. In times of social catastrophe (and in times of the confiscation of property by the State), it may be a wise decision for Christians to hold some common property, especially property which is mobile and easily hidden. But is it a general law?

The real issue, however, goes much deeper than either of these two criticisms. Troost argues from this passage in the following manner: "Thus did the practice of this church confirm the preaching of the gospel with signs and powers. Property relations were set free from their natural self-willed self-assertion and employed for loving service of God and neighbor" (p. 33). Now what are we to conclude from all of this? The Bible, Troost has argued, does not give us any "data, points of departure or premises from which to draw logical conclusions relevant to modern society's socio-economic problems, including property relations." Nevertheless, we are now told that the early Christians "put ownership and property rights back in the place where they belong," and Troost obviously expects us to take this example seriously. But on his grounds—on the presuppositions upon which he began his analysis—why should we pay any attention to what the early church did? Troost wants us to make an application of the church's practice in today's world, but why should we, if the Bible is not relevant to present-day economic and social problems? Does he mean that we should create a society in which property is held in common (socialism) and yet at the same time believe that we are not living under socialism (since property, he says, was not "abolished")? The whole argument is vague, but it appears that this is Troost's conclusion. If it is not, then I do not understand what he is talking about.

He refers to the fact that the early church "did not abolish property, nor yet the means of production (e.g., landed estates)." Private property was preserved in the sense that it was not sold to the State, true enough. They sold some of their fixed assets to non-Christians and deposited the wealth in the common treasury. They also gave some of their other goods directly to the Christian community. But this means that in order to follow their example in our day, we must sell our goods to unbelievers, thus making ourselves perpetual wage-earners and salaried laborers. It means that as private individuals, we can no longer own fixed capital goods like land and especially machinery. We are to become, in other words, a sort of huge Christian co-operative movement, at best employed by each other, but more probably employed by the unregenerate world. And if we are not to draw such conclusions, then why did Troost bring up the subject in the first place? Either it is a concrete example to be followed, or else the whole incident is irrelevant. Again, we can admit that under social conditions comparable to those faced by the early church, something like this might be necessary, but as a prescription for all eternity it seems silly, especially in light of the fact that Peter did say that a total contribution to the common treasury was not required. Since Troost does not think that the Bible provides us with concrete data concerning economic affairs, it does not seem logical for him to bring up the matter at all. If he means simply that Christians should, on occasion, be willing to give up some of their private wealth to the Christian community, then he has not said very much.

Troost then mentions the fact that "the New Testament is not socially revolutionary" in the eyes of some Christians. He says that the New Testament, at least on its surface, "does not radically condemn the situation in which its authors preached and wrote" (p. 33). It even accepted slavery as an institution, as Paul's epistle to Philemon indicates. Troost realizes that the New Testament is, in this practical sense, profoundly conservative—it did not attack directly the social fabric of Roman society. This disturbs him, and therefore he returns to his old theme: "It would, however, be entirely at variance with the spirit and intention of the gospel, with the Message, if from the above we were logically to draw up socio-economic conclusions which would then have to be applied in practical politics. Not a few Christians perpetuate in this way an economic and political conservatism. The same goes for progressivist-socialistic conclusions from biblical 'data' . . ." (p. 34). Common property in Acts 4:32 is somehow relevant today; conservative elements in the Bible are not. He reasserts himself once again: "The biblical message of the kingdom of God does not directly address itself to the betterment of human society which includes, among other things, property relations. But, to be sure, it does indeed affect them!" To be sure of what? How does it affect them? In his answer, Troost arrives at a position of total antinomian mysticism: "In order to exercise our property rights in everyday life in the right manner, and to handle our possessions before the face of God in a way pleasing to him, nothing less is required than the merciful intervention of God, from above, through the Holy Ghost. Unless regenerated, common sense will change nothing. Renewal must come from the top down; it will not come up by itself from the bottom. Our natural reason can achieve nothing here" (p. 34).

Consider what Troost is saying. The Bible, he has said, does not provide any concrete data—no applicable kind of special revelation—in the area of economic and political affairs. Yet he is also saying that "Our natural reason can achieve nothing here." Not only is there no special revelation in social affairs, there is no general revelation on which we can rely. And so we must sit quietly and wait for the mystical intervention of the Holy Spirit to guide us in all of our private community decisions; God has seen fit to leave us without any concrete standards in such matters. This, I am compelled to conclude is antinomianism. It is strangely like the mystical brand of Christianity that is called Penielism. I am unable to see how it is even remotely Reformed.

This does not mean that Troost has no recommendations for the contemporary world. Naturally, he does not derive them from the Bible, and apparently the "common sense" of the unregenerate world has given him no aid. In fact, he does not specify any source for his recommendations. Nevertheless, he is able to conclude that "It is part of our religion to engage whole-heartedly in the battle for a just distribution of income (nationally, but also internationally, through foreign aid), for just property relations, and for a just economic order. It is part of our religion because we are called to it by Him who gave his life for this world . . ." (p. 35). Unfortunately, he does not specify which sphere of life is involved here. Does he mean merely that the church should give private charity (a teaching made explicit by the Scriptures), or does he mean that as Christians we are obligated to promote the political projects of land redistribution and foreign aid sponsored by our civil governments? If he means simply private charity, then he is saying nothing new. If he means public projects of political coercion, then he must show us on what grounds such a conclusion is justified; certainly the Bible teaches no such doctrine, and even if it did, Troost does not accept the Bible's testimony in such matters.

He goes on: "The World Council of Churches itself is sponsoring a study on a large scale dealing with society and social problems, in connection with which a book is to appear entitled The Theological Foundation of a Christian Social Ethics. Unfortunately it appears to me that historic Reformation Christianity ('Calvinism') is not making much of a contribution to this study and reflection" (p. 36). Naturally, the World Council can engage in such activities; it is a humanistic organization which is not bound to work within the framework of limits established by the Bible. It has no difficulty in producing all the humanistic, secular documents that it wants to distribute. But given the presuppositions which Troost holds, that the Bible offers no concrete social proposals, and that "common sense" of the fallen world is equally helpless in aiding the thinker in his work, how could we possibly hope that "historic Reformation Christianity" would make any contribution? Troost denies the only two foundations upon which such contributions can be made: concrete special revelation on the one hand, or natural revelation granted by God in common grace. We are left without standards. Troost offers us a classic example of the truth proclaimed by the late C. S. Lewis: we castrate our men and then bid them to be fruitful.

Finally, we are told this truth by Troost: "However, it is plain, inevitable, and imperative that in our society more and more limitations be put on private property rights by social law and economic law, both in the domain of public law as well as in private community law such as internal industrial law" (p. 39). There is absolutely nothing in Troost's essay that would indicate that such a requirement is either plain, inevitable, or imperative. Troost does not seem to be aware of the fact that he is inserting conclusions made by modern, secular socialists and Marxists into his essay, and that he is doing it in the name of "historic Reformation Christianity." It is possible that he does not mean that socialistic legislation is increasingly imperative, although his language certainly implies this. The reason that it is not possible to say for certain what Troost means is that he stops at this point and refuses to elaborate! He gives no examples of concrete cases, and he offers us nothing to show where such limitations on private property are needed.

Troost has attempted to destroy the biblical foundations of conservatism (and, he meekly asserts, of socialism), yet he then proceeds to make what is inescapably a highly socialistic pronouncement in the name of Christianity. Worst of all, he then uses the "disclaimer" approach, so that he will not have to elaborate: he modestly says that he is unqualified to go on. "Here the theologian must stop, for we landed in the thick of concrete socio-economic problems. As a theologian I was allowed to go beyond sections 16 and 18 where I tried to sketch the task of the church and her preaching with respect to our subject. But now I too have come to the limit of my own competence; beyond this I am not qualified to speak" (p. 41). Troost is a professor of social ethics at the Free University of Amsterdam, and in this capacity he has denied the possibility of concrete biblical revelation in aiding us in our task of Christian social reconstruction. Yet beyond this, he says, he is not qualified to speak. He adds, of course, that we must promote some undefined "economic justice," increase foreign aid, and put even more restrictions on private property in an already frighteningly socialistic era. It is as if a professor of engineering were to tell his Dutch students that the dikes should be blown up, but in regard to any substitute for them, he protests that he is not qualified to speak.

He criticizes conservatives thusly: "One of the causes giving the church a conservative mentality—and the same holds for Christian social organizations—can be that her members keep on thinking in traditional, outdated concepts" (p. 39). But in destroying the only possible foundation for concrete Christian alternatives to such "outdated concepts" (i.e., concrete biblical revelation), Troost leaves the Christian world with nothing but mysticism. He offers us in the name of historic Reformed Christianity the whole amorphous, planless, interventionist ethic of the Dutch economy. It is a decision made on the basis of his personal preference, yet proclaimed in the name of God's kingdom; he denies, nevertheless, that those pronouncements can be based upon the special revelation of the Bible. In short, Troost's conception of Christian social ethics is without foundation, either from the point of view of the Scriptures (which he rejects as a source of data concerning social affairs) or from the point of view of modern economics and politics (which is based upon the logic of the unregenerate world, which he also rejects). Yet because this system is totally without a foundation, we are expected to accept it as "modern" and "Christian," and not part of some "traditional, outdated" world. Because it is without roots, we Christians are to call it our own.

The magnificent theoretical criticism of secular thought which Dooyeweerd began has been eroded away. Dooyeweerd cut the intellectual foundations from under all secular thinkers, but Troost and other Calvinists who stand with Troost are unwilling to replace their secular foundations with concrete scriptural examples and requirements. They have left themselves without any foundations at all. But even this is not quite true, since men cannot think or speak without some foundation. Troost and those who support him have brought back the teachings of the secular world (and, more specifically, the socialist secular world) in the name of Dooyeweerd. That such antinomialism in the social spheres can be considered a part of the Reformed heritage testifies to the loss of the Puritan vision in the modern world.

B. Troost's Response¹

In the issue of International Reformed Bulletin which published my critique of Troost's essay (October 1967), Troost was afforded an opportunity to reply. His response was titled, "A Plea for a Creation Ethic." I have waited long enough to respond to his attempt to escape my criticisms. The reason why I am bothering to respond at this late date is that I am trying to point out the flaws in a certain kind of approach to economics. Troost was never a significant figure in the debate, either in the U.S. or in Holland, but several of his arguments and slogans have appeared in recent "liberation theology" books, even though it is highly unlikely that any prominent liberation theologian has ever heard of Troost. It is the so-called "climate of opinion," especially left-wing neo-evangelical opinion, which is the focus of my concern. This climate change began to appear in the mid-1960s, and Troost was one small gust in the hurricane of error.

1. This appeared as an appendix in The Sinai Strategy: Economics, and the Ten Commandments (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1986). (<http://bit.ly/gnsinai>)

One thing annoys me exceedingly. I see Christian scholars who adopt phrases such as "creation law" or "creation ethics," yet they refuse to affirm their commitment to a literal six-day creation, with 24-hour days, hours being measured as we measure them today (give or take a few nanoseconds per day). In short, they wrap themselves in the language of biblical orthodoxy, and then they climb in bed with the evolutionists. They reject explicit biblical laws in the name of a vague "creation law," and then they reject the six-day creation in the name of some sort of vague age-day hypothesis, or "framework" hypothesis, or whatever the latest "creative evolution" buzzwords are in evangelical academic circles. They believe in neither the biblical doctrine of law nor the biblical doctrine of creation. They are, in short, hypocrites. We need to understand this from the beginning. They are compromisers. Their self-appointed task is to deceive the faithful.

Troost begins with the standard response: "In the preceding article of Mr. Gary North there is what appears to me to be a misunderstanding that is as serious as it is tragic." This is the old "misunderstanding ploy." Then he goes on to demonstrate that I understood him only too well.

He rejects my accusation that he is an antinomian. Then he appeals to his defense of the cosmonomic idea to prove that he is a good, law-abiding Dutch Calvinist Christian. In short, he appeals to his membership in the school of Herman Dooyeweerd, the Dutch Calvinist philosopher. This, he supposes, should relieve the fears of his Dutch audience. Understand that his reply was first published in the Dutch Christian newspaper which had run a translation of my critical essay. His essay and mine only later were published in the International Reformed Bulletin.

1. Dooyeweerd's Antinomianism

My response is straightforward: Dooyeweerd was an antinomian, too. This is why his thought was immediately adopted by a group of radical Christians who used his philosophical system to defend the idea of Christian medieval guild socialism, or worse. The "Toronto School" of neo-Dooyeweerdians was, from the mid-1960s onward until it began to fade in the early 1970s, at the center of an anti-capitalist revival. They broke new rhetorical ground that Ronald Sider and other non-Dutch liberation theologians later travelled over. These neo-Dooyeweerdians were subsequently superseded on campus by the neo-evangelicals, but they held very similar ideas. The heart of their critique against the West and the United States in particular was that the West was built in terms of free market competitive capitalism.

Dooyeweerd never publicly broke with his radical North American followers. Thus, they have been able to wrap themselves in the flag of the "cosmonomic idea" school of philosophy, for whatever that is worth. (Outside of very tiny Calvinist intellectual circles, primarily Dutch, it is worth nothing.) At best, this is not much of a protective covering, since from the beginning, Dooyeweerd's system was successful only as a negative critique of humanists who proclaimed neutrality. It was unquestionably a brilliant and detailed critique of this pretended autonomy, but Dooyeweerd was from the beginning a dedicated antinomian, meaning a critic of Old Testament law in New Testament times. He could build nothing positive precisely because his system is strictly a negative critique.² It is revealed as another brand of natural law-common ground philosophy whenever it is used to construct a positive program. Ironically, he and his disciples believed that they were forever destroying the intellectual foundations of all natural law, common ground philosophies.

I was privately arguing along these lines as early as 1965. Subsequently, Dooyeweerd's essay in the collection of essays edited by E. R. Geehan, Jerusalem and Athens: Critical Discussions on the Philosophy and Apologetics of Cornelius Van Til (Presbyterian & Reformed, 1971), revealed just how hostile he was to biblical presuppositionalism. He replied to Van Til's criticism of his work as not going far enough in its confrontation with "natural law" doctrines. He, too, used the same old tactic: ". . . you have misunderstood what I mean . . ." (p. 74).

2. H. Dooyeweerd, A New Critique of Theoretical Thought, 4 vols. (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1953–58). Pronounced: DOUGH-yeh-vehrd.

No, Dr. Van Til understood precisely what Dooyeweerd meant—a magisterial accomplishment, given the frequently obscure nature of Dooyeweerd's verbiage. (I agree entirely with Nash's observation regarding Dooyeweerd: "Good thinking is never complimented by and should not be accompanied by poor communication."³)

Dooyeweerd's system is a collection of philosophically empty "self-attesting" boxes (categories supposedly derived from logic, not the Bible) into which anyone can pour any content whatsoever. This is especially true of the political and economic categories. Nash is correct: "Apart from his presupposition that the cosmos is a divinely created world order, it might be objected that his law spheres are only fabrications of his own mind."⁴ Most of his followers have poured socialism and antinomianism into these empty boxes. In fact, I contend that it was the very emptiness of Dooyeweerd's categories which attracted his followers—and his verbiage, which they have developed into an art. (Doubt me? Take a look at almost any book published in Canada by Wedge Books.)

Van Til put his finger on the problem when he wrote that "the entire transcendental method hangs in the air except for the fact that it rests upon the fullness and unity of truth accepted on the authority of Scripture."⁵ Dooyeweerd's system hangs in the air because it does not begin with the presupposition of the necessity and adequacy of biblical revelation for all philosophical inquiry. In short, argued Van Til, either you start with the Bible as your standard, or you begin with man's mind as the standard. You will inescapably end up with whatever you began with presuppositionally. Dooyeweerd's whole system does not begin with the self-attesting authority of the Bible.

Therefore. . . .

Dooyeweerd was upset by this "therefore." Yet his response shows perfectly well how accurate Van Til's criticism had been. He categorically denied that any critique of humanism's presuppositions should begin with a confession of Christian presuppositions: "... this transcendental critique is obliged to begin with an inquiry into the inner nature and structure of the theoretical attitude of thought and experience as such and not with a confession of faith. In this first phase of the critical

3. Ronald H. Nash, Dooyeweerd and the Amsterdam Philosophy: A Christian Critique of Philosophical Thought (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan, 1962), p. 105.

4. Ibid., p. 104.

5. This criticism appeared in the little-known syllabus by Van Til, Christianity in Conflict, Volume II, Part 3, "Biblical Dimensionalism," a 59-page, single-spaced critique of Dooyeweerd and the Amsterdam school.

investigation such a confession would have been out of place" (p. 76). He begins with the autonomous mind of man. This is why Dooyeweerd was a scholastic in his methodology, despite his attempt to refute all medieval scholasticism by means of his critique. He shared humanism's methodological presuppositions concerning the obligation of good, rational men to begin debating without any reference to the Bible and the God who wrote it. Dooyeweerd's use of a non-biblical concept of the "heart" was the very heart of his humanism and antinomianism.⁶ Van Til's response to Dooyeweerd's essay returns to his original theme, namely, that Dooyeweerd had given away the presuppositional case for biblical truth by his methodological starting point.

Troost argues that he had written his dissertation against the antinomianism of situation ethics. The question is: Did he simply substitute another Iprand of antinomianism? My answer was (and is), "Yes, he did." Either you affirm revealed biblical law as a permanent standard,⁷ or you affirm humanistic laws, of whatever variety. It is this radical dichotomy which humanists, dispensationalists, and Dooyeweerdians prefer not to accept. It is their common ground.

2. Troost's Jargon

The heart, mind, and soul of the Dooyeweerdian brand of humanism can be seen in the following paragraph in Troost's response. Be prepared for the usual incoherent jargon; Dooyeweerdians are incapable of writing, either in English or Dutch, without this jargon. It serves them as “ink” serves the escaping squid: a cover which hides them from their attackers.

6. It is not simply that Dooyeweerd's exposition is incomparably verbose and filled with jargon; it is that it is devoid of revelational content, including biblical law. But Van Til was not concerned about Dooyeweerd's implicit antinomianism; he was concerned about the lack of biblical content for Dooyeweerd's philosophical categories. Sadly, Van Til was himself almost as weak on the question of biblical law as Dooyeweerd was. He was not a theonomist, which is why he was always unwilling to promote publicly the writings of Rushdoony, and why he expressed reservations in private concerning Rushdoony's approach—and, by implication, the approach of the whole Christian Reconstruction movement. Rushdoony was taking Van Til's presuppositionalism into areas that made Van Til nervous; Van Til carefully avoided topics outside of traditional apologetics. Christian Reconstruction did not exist in a finished outline in 1971, when Jerusalem and Athens was published; not until Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law appeared in 1973 did the capstone of the system appear. Van Til was always enthusiastic about Greg Bahnsen's apologetics, but he remained judiciously silent about Bahnsen's Theonomy in Christian Ethics (1977). Van Til's writings were necessary for the creation of the Reconstruction movement (presuppositionalism), but not sufficient (biblical law). In this sense, the Reconstructionists have criticized Van Til in much the same way as Van Til criticized Dooyeweerd: he did not go far enough in his adherence to biblical revelation.

7. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God's Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

As for so-called social ethics, let me explain it in the following way: The question of what justice is in the concrete case and of what love to my neighbor means, cannot any longer be viewed as a meta-physical ‘given’—as all forms of idealistic ethics suggests. However, the content of justice and love in the concrete case hie et nunc is not found literally in the Bible as a recipe for all time. But here the biblical-a[p]riori of faith in the divine creation order must function in the philosophical and social investigation. In so far as this has in broad lines and outline form led to preliminary results in the philosophy of the cosmonomic idea, this philosophy has shown that in the concrete giving of form to justice and love cultural-historical basic possibilities and the regulating function of faith always play roles in a normative way (p. 54).

Got that? Let me assist you. First, there are Troost’s “pre-theoretical presuppositions”:

1. I am a member of a church which believes in the Bible.
2. If the elders suspect that I do not believe in the Bible, I might get myself excommunicated. This would not be good; it would take away my influence.
3. I teach in a humanist institution; so if I go around talking about the eternal standards of biblical ethics, I might get fired, and I would unquestionably be ridiculed. This would also not be good.
4. If I adopt a lot of Dooyeweerdian verbiage, I can get out of my dilemma. After all, he got out of his.

We are now ready for a translation of the verbiage:

1. There are no eternal standards of right and wrong.
2. The Bible does not literally speak to concrete historical situations in terms of fixed ethical standards because there are no fixed ethical standards applicable to concrete historical circumstances.
3. There is a “creation order.” It is an empty box. Into it I am entitled to pour anything that appeals to me, as a respectable, tax-financed intellectual.

4. The “cultural historical basic possibilities” tell me how much socialist drivel I can get unsuspecting Christian laymen to swallow in the name of Jesus.

It should be clear why Troost and the cosmonomic idea enthusiasts have had no influence anywhere outside of a very restricted circle of Dutch readers. Dutch-Christian intellectuals respect academic scholarship, especially pseudo-Germanic scholarship, almost to the point of idol worship. They frequently model their writing style after German pagan scholars. Herman Ridderbos’ orthodox book, Paul (1975), is a good example. Dooyeweerd and his followers have fallen into the Germanic verbal bog. Their style is best described as a form of verbal constipation. They are enmeshed in verbiage which cannot be translated into English, let alone translated into action. They have no consistent economic program. They just have verbiage.

Troost can wax incoherent—he thinks he is waxing eloquent—promoting jumbled economic programs that are borrowed from modern Keynesian socialism, but to what effect? He is unable to distance himself from the run-of-the-mill political liberalism of our era. He is worse than speechless; he is a motor-mouth. Noise keeps coming out, but nothing principled. His program will be swallowed up in the flux of historical change. He offers nothing uniquely Christian, uniquely socialistic, or uniquely anything positive.

Do I exaggerate? Am I unfair? Judge for yourself:

A detailed elaboration of this is not given in my essay. I did cite certain results: i.e., that we, under the guidance of what we learn in Holy Scripture, must see and experience our earthly property rights as relative both in regard to God as well as in regard to our fellow men. In other words, in our ‘unraffling’ we have to maintain a religious distance, or, as it is better phrased, as not possessing our possessions (I Corinthians 7:29–31). However, one cannot deduce from this religious basic attitude any concrete right of property, as many ‘progressive theologians’ think they can do. This can be done neither in civil property rights, nor in public government rights, nor yet in rights of private enterprise. These concrete and temporal relations of justice lie on the niveau [?] of our temporal earthly life in which that which is concretely just hic et nunc and that which is love for neighbor in concreto is co-determined by the normative social, economical and other principles. These principles are not—as the natural law tradition thinks—given as positively formulated prescriptions but must be searched out from the complex normative structures of the situation (p. 54).

Do you remember the story of the king who was led by his own vanity to buy a set of “invisible clothes” by a bunch of “con artists”? Then he went out in his new clothes to lead a parade. No adult in the awe-struck crowd would admit that the king was stark naked. Finally, a little boy asked his father why the king was wearing no clothes. His father saw the light, and yelled, “The king has no clothes!” The king’s vanity was given a decisive blow by the howls of laughter that followed the innocent lad’s remark. Dooyeweerd, for all his competence in exposing the myth of neutrality in humanists, philosopher by philosopher, was the self-deceived victim of his own academic pride. He adopted a non-biblical starting point—a reference point devoid of biblical content, which he called the “heart”—and he also adopted humanism’s hostility to biblical law. So have his followers. Troost is a good example. I prefer to serve as the little boy for the petrified crowd of Dutch Calvinists who stand in awe of the Dooyeweerdian verbiage, and who seem incapable of saying out loud: “These academic con men are naked!”

Conclusion

Troost feels inhibited by Mosaic law. So do all sinners. But instead of repenting, and calling for the reconstruction of society in terms of God’s law, Troost rejects biblical law. It is not normative in his system. “What is normative is the ethical-religio basic attitude of early Christianity, because this is required everywhere in the great love commandment of the Bible, including the Mosaic legislation” (p. 56). A man can get away with murder in the foggy mists of the “ethico-religio basic attitude” of any religion or philosophy. But Troost does not want to get away with murder. He wants to get away with guilt-manipulation: “But in this Bible history we have to do with a fundamental religious attitude of christian mentality which must be ready every day and under all circumstances to make a happy and voluntary renunciation of money and goods on behalf of those who are in need . . .” (p. 56). Under all circumstances? How are we to know when? These proponents of progressive taxation and opponents of the 10% tithe never tell us—the better to manipulate us.

Troost’s original essay is irrelevant. It was irrelevant in 1966, and it is irrelevant today. It was simply symptomatic of a crisis in Western civilization. Those who should be preparing an intellectual and moral framework for comprehensive reform along biblical lines have joined the enemies of Christ, and have marched in the parade of statism. Why? Because they hate biblical law more than they hate humanism. This, above all, constitutes the crisis of twentieth century Christianity. Christians have dressed themselves in the rags of humanism and have imagined themselves in robes of splendor.

Update: 1985

I have included this appendix in order to call the reader's attention to a type of economic analysis which has become extremely popular since 1966. There is almost nothing in Troost's essay which was not implicit or explicit a decade later in Ronald Sider's Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger. The argumentation is almost identical: moralistic, vague, guilt-inducing, statist, and explicitly antinomian. Troost's essay is an example of a genre which has become the standard fare in neo-evangelical circles, whether in The Other Side, Sojourners, or some other pro-state, pro-enforced wealth redistribution magazine published in the name of Jesus.

What should also be apparent is that my response in 1967 is almost identical in approach to David Chilton's response to Sider in Productive Christians in an Age of Guilt-Manipulators (1981). The emphasis is on the specific revelation of God in the Bible, especially in Old Testament law. Troost's rejection of biblical law and of the whole concept of Bible-based blueprints for economics is exactly the line pushed by Sider, Evangelicals for Social Action, and the other neo-evangelical liberation theologians.

It is clear why Troost and his neo-evangelical clones are so hostile to the idea of biblical blueprints: the Bible unquestionably promotes free market institutional arrangements. This is why the three other authors in Clouse's book, Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (InterVarsity Press, 1984)⁸ all agreed that the Bible must not be appealed to with respect to specific social and economic institutional arrangements, and why my essay kept returning to the theme of the ethical requirement of abiding by Old Testament principles. I was derided in the symposium for appealing to the Book of Deuteronomy (p. 66). Anyone who has read Deuteronomy should understand why I was derided: it promises economic and other external blessings to societies that conform to the external requirements of Old Testament law.

8. <http://bit.ly/ClouseWAP>.

In short, the terms of the debate have not changed in four decades, nor are they likely to change in the next two hundred years. The issue is clear: God's word or man's word, God's law or man's law, God's blueprints or man's blueprints. Take your pick. Or as Elijah put it, choose this day whom you will serve. It is clear enough to see who serves God in this century, and who serves Baal. It shows even in the mundane academic discipline of economics.

APPENDIX P

THE HOAX OF HIGHER CRITICISM

For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me, for he wrote of me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words? (John 5:46–47).

It is not just Jews who refuse to take these words seriously; it is also the vast majority of those who graduate from theological seminaries today. With few exceptions, seminaries are staffed by professors of literature rather than professors of Christ. They have adopted a view of the Bible which says that the biblical texts reveal gross errors on the part of the Bible's writers and editors. The critics refer to the Bible as a myth-filled book. These classroom skeptics and their intellectual predecessors have labored for over a century to remove Christians' confidence in the accuracy of the Bible. Their personal goal, above all other goals, is to escape the final judgment of the God who has revealed Himself clearly. They comfort themselves while discomforting their Bible-believing students with this syllogism: "No permanent Bible, no permanent law; no permanent law, no permanent judgment." But this absence of God's judgment must also be asserted with respect to history; higher criticism of the Bible plays a role in this dogma, too.

There is little doubt that the successful assault on Christianity in the late-nineteenth century came from two sources: Darwinism and higher criticism of the Bible. The latter was exported primarily from German universities. The Christian West has been under guerilla attack by German scholarship for about two centuries. Prussians invented the government-supported kindergarten and the Ph. D degree, two of the most insidious inventions of the modern world. (I have long appreciated the observation by literary critic Edmund Wilson regarding the absurdity of the oppressive Ph. D system. The world would be far better off today "if, at the time of the First World War, when we were renaming our hamburgers Salisbury Steak and our sauerkraut Liberty Cabbage, we had decided to scrap it as a German atrocity.”)¹

Academic higher criticism of the Bible was nourished in its maturity in the same European corner of the academic world. It was promoted most successfully by intellectually disciplined German scholars in the nineteenth century. These men were dedicated to the destruction of orthodox Christianity. Their primary goal was to discover defects in the existing texts of Scripture, as well as to discover internal inconsistencies in the Bible’s overall message. This strategy was designed to discredit the Christian world’s faith in a permanent standard of righteousness. Higher criticism was the spiritual legacy of the Enlightenment, as one of its spiritual heirs frankly admits: “The rationalist Enlightenment radicalized the claim of reason and history; as a result it placed the claims of religion outside the realm of reason. In this division Orthodox theology lost its foundations in history. The cleft between reason and history triumphed among the learned—including theologians—and removed the basis of orthodoxy’s epistemology.”²

A. A War for English Civilization

What is not generally recognized, however, is that biblical higher criticism had its origin in the English-speaking world. It was English Deism rather than German scholarship that laid the intellectual foundation of modern higher criticism. Even before Deism, certain aspects of the critical attack on the Bible, especially the Old Testament, had begun with Renaissance humanism.³ R. K. Harrison traced back to mid-seventeenth-century rationalist political philosopher Thomas Hobbes the idea that the Pentateuch was compiled from much earlier sources written by Moses.⁴ Edgar Krentz was an enthusiastic defender of higher criticism against what he describes as the dogmatic church’s “fear of change, fear of losing the basis for certainty of faith, and fear of posing questions in the area of authority.”⁵ He, too, identified English Deism as the source of this intellectual development. “The eighteenth-

1. Edmund Wilson, The Fruits of the MLA (New York: New York Review Book, 1968), p. 20. The MLA is the Modern Language Association.

2. Edgar Krentz, The Historical-Critical Method (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1975] 1977), p. 21.

3. A little-known and unfortunately neglected study of the history of higher criticism is Henning Graf Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World (London: SCM Press, [1980] 1984), Pt. I.

4. Roland Kenneth Harrison, Introduction to the Old Testament (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, [1969] 1974), pp. 9–10.

5. Krentz, op. cit., p. 15.

century Deists treated the Bible with freedom when it did not, in their lights, accord with reason. For example, they argued that Isaiah was composite, the Gospels contradictory, and the apostles often unreliable.”⁶

The Deist’s attack on the divine authority of the Bible was not simply a product of the scholar’s dusty study. It was closely associated with warring social and intellectual movements of the day. James Barr’s observations are very important in understanding the roots of higher criticism and also in understanding the revival of biblicalliteralism as a social force in the United States, especially after 1960. The link between social action and biblical hermeneutics has been missed by most historians. Barr, following Reventlow’s lead, did not make this mistake:

Church and state formed a single continuum, and political and theological questions were seen as interdependent. Questions about power and legitimacy rested in a high degree upon exegetical and interpretative ideas. In this the Old Testament—Reventlow’s own specialism—was of primary importance. Even if the New Testament was the document of the earliest Christianity, the way in which the other collection of books form a yet older age, the Old Testament, was related to it. For it was the Old Testament, as it seemed, that offered guidance about king and state, about a commonwealth organized under divine statutes, about law and property, about war, about ritual and ceremony, about priesthood, continuity and succession. All of this was a disputed area from the Reformation onwards: because these were controversial matters in church and state, they generated deep differences in biblical interpretation. It was precisely because the Bible was assumed on all hands to be authoritative that it stimulated new notions about its own nature. It was because men sought answers to problems of life and society, as well as of thought and belief, that the Bible stimulated ‘critical’ modes of understanding itself.⁷

The heart of English Deism’s attack on Christian orthodoxy was its faith in Newtonian natural law and hostility to Old Testament law and Old Testament prophecy. “If one could write off the Old Testament as testimony to a pre-Christian religion and vindicate the New Testament in another way (e.g. through its accord with the law of nature) Christianity could still be defended, albeit as a pedagogical means to the moral illumination of mankind.”⁸ Once the denial of the indissoluble unity of the Bible became common, the next step was easy: the denial of the need for an infallible New Testament in Christianity.

6. Ibid., p. 16.

7. James Barr, Foreword, in Reventlow, Authority of the Bible, p. xiii.

8. Reventlow, ibid., p. 398.

Reventlow provided evidence of the political aspects of the war for and against the infallibility of the Bible. He provided over 400 pages of text and 200 pages of endnotes to demonstrate, among related themes, that "the political thought of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries continually sought its models and arguments within the Bible, and the approach of each particular thinker in question provided the real criterion for the analogies drawn between the reconstructed biblical model and the principles which were normative for shaping the society of his time."⁹ The Deists launched their war on the Old Testament in an attempt to substitute natural law for biblical law. Anyone who fails to understand the ethical nature of this intellectual conflict does not understand the history of biblical higher criticism. The attack on the Old Testament was a fundamental aspect of the coming of modern humanist civilization.

Only as a result of the attack by Deists on the authority of Scripture (preparations for which were made, against their own intentions, by Latitudinarians, Locke and Newton), an attack which they made step by step, did the legacy of antiquity in the form of natural law and Stoic thought, which since the late Middle Ages had formed the common basis for thought despite all the changes of theological and philosophical direction, remain the one undisputed criterion. This produced a basically new stage both in the history of ideas and in the English constitution. This position already contains the roots of its own failure, in that the consistent development of the epistemological principles of Locke and Berkely [sic] by Hume soon showed that its basic presuppositions were untenable. However, two irreversible and definitive developments remained, which had made an appearance with it: the Bible lost its significance for philosophical thought and for the theoretical foundations of political ideals, and ethical rationalism (with a new foundation in Kant's critique) proved to be one of the forces shaping the modern period, which only now can really be said to have begun.¹⁰

Reventlow pointed out that higher criticism has faded in importance since the end of the Second World War. In the immediate post-war era, biblical criticism was an important aspect of Protestant colleges and seminaries. No longer. "Given a predominant concern with the present and its seemingly urgent practical problems, which claim almost exclusive attention,” he writes, “historical criticism and exegesis have come to take very much a back place.”¹¹

9. Ibid., p. 413.

10. Ibid., pp. 413–14.

B. Burying the Dead

Why, then, should I devote an appendix to this topic? Because of a parallel process: while modern humanism has visibly begun to fragment, taking with it modern liberal theology, there has been a recovery of interest within the evangelical world of real-world questions that are best summarized under the general heading, “Christian worldview.” The implicit dualisms of modern fundamentalism—Old Testament vs. New Testament, law vs. grace, letter vs. spirit, church vs. state, Israel vs. the church, eternity vs. history, heart vs. mind, dominion vs. rapture, culture vs. kingdom—have begun to be either discarded or at least seriously criticized from within the camp.¹² The Christian world’s recovery of a vision of ethical unity, of a comprehensive world-and-life view, is basic to any workable strategy of Christian reconstruction. In this intellectual and emotional process of recovering Christianity’s lost unity of vision, we are required to return to the original source of the problem: men’s loss of faith in the unity of God’s word.

There is an old political slogan, “You can’t beat something with nothing.” Throughout the twentieth century, the Christian world has found itself in the position of battling something—self-confident humanism—with nothing: a philosophy of ethical dualism, a kind of Christian gnosticism.¹³ This was obvious to everyone after the Scopes’ “monkey” trial of 1925.¹⁴ (In the early church, this dualistic philosophy which pitted the Old Testament against the New Testament was correctly identified by the church as heretical: Marcionism.) But the roles are now being reversed. Ever since the assassination of John F.

11. Ibid., p. 1.

12. On the Israel-church dichotomy, see William E. Bell, A Critical Evaluation of the Pretribulation Rapture Doctrine in Christian Eschatology (Ph. D dissertation, New York University, 1968). See also John F. MacArthur, The Gospel According to Jesus (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academie, 1988). This book sold over 100,000 copies in hardback within a year of its publication. The survival of the older dualism is best represented by Dave Hunt, Whatever Happened to Heaven? (Eugene, Oregon: Harvest House, 1988).

13. Douglas W. Frank, Less Than Conquerors: How Evangelicals Entered the Twentieth Century (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1986).

14. George Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth-Century Evangelicalism, 1870–1925 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1980), ch. 10: “The Great Reversal.

Kennedy in November of 1963, Western humanism has steadily lost both its vision and its “can-do” confidence.¹⁵ A similar loss of confidence also appeared in the mid-1980s behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains. The implicit and inescapable dualism of all post-Kantian thought—fact vs. meaning, science vs. ethics, phenomenal vs. *noumenal*¹⁶—became a growing intellectual problem after the 1880s, and it could not, like Humpty Dumpty, be put back together again.¹⁷ The social and political effects of this accelerating intellectual disorientation became clear to most social observers after 1963. Meanwhile, the appearance of Van Til’s presuppositional apologetics in the mid-1940s¹⁸ the revival of biblical creationism after 1960,¹⁹ and the preliminary recovery of the Puritan vision of the earthly victory of God’s kingdom have combined to produce a new intellectual perspective: Christian reconstruction.

Basic to this reversal has been the recovery of confidence by Christians in the reliability of the whole Bible. They have been presented with a growing body of evidence that Darwinism is a hoax. It is time for them to recognize that biblical higher criticism is an even older hoax, though related philosophically to Darwinism.

C. Techniques of Higher Criticism

“Lower criticism” is the technical literary exercise of determining which of the existent ancient manuscripts of the Bible are authoritative and therefore belong in the canon of Scripture. Higher criticism, using similar techniques of analysis, and going mad in the process, argues that nothing in the canon of the Bible is what it appears to be, that the Creator God did not directly or uniquely inspire any of it, and that the scribes who assembled its component parts centuries after the fact were pathetic louts who were unable to follow the logic of any argument, or keep names straight for three consecutive pages, or even imitate the style of the previous lout who first made up some imagin-

15. Gary North, Unholy Spirits: Occultism and New Age Humanism (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986), Introduction. (<http://bit.ly/gnsprits>)

16. Richard Kroner, Kant’s Weltanschauung (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, [1914] 1956).

17. H. Stuart Hughes, Consciousness and Society: The Reorientation of European Social Thought, 1890–1930 (New York: Knopf, 1958).

18. Cornelius Van Til, The New Modernism: An Appraisal of the Theology of Barth and Brunner (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1946).

19. Henry M. Morris and John C. Whitcomb, Jr., The Genesis Flood: The Biblical Record and Its Scientific Implications (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1961).

ary story and included it in an earlier manuscript. All of these “discoveries” are reached by means of supposedly precise literary techniques.

These textual critics regard the Bible as a kind of novel, so they apply to the study of the Bible techniques that are used in the literary criticism of fiction. Again, let me cite Wilson’s comments on the absurdity of these techniques when applied to novels, let alone the Bible. He refers to an edition of Hawthorne’s Marble Faun, edited by the University of Virginia’s specialist in Elizabethan bibliography, Fredson Bowers. He did not spare Mr. Bowers.

But the fourth volume of the Centenary Edition of the works of Nathaniel Hawthorne, which contains only The Marble Faun, is the masterpiece of MLA bad bookmaking. I have weighed it, and it weighs nine pounds. It is 9 x 6½ inches, and 2¾ inches thick. . . . The Marble Faun, since it is mainly Mr. Bowers’s work, embodies the spirit of Mr. Bowers as no other of these volumes does. Of its 610 pages, the 467 of Hawthorne are weighed down by 89 pages of “Textual Introduction” and 143 pages of “Textual Notes.” There are 44 pages of historical introduction preceding the textual introduction. We are told in these introductions, in accordance with the MLA formula, that, in the course of writing the book, the author, as novelists often do, changed the names of certain of the characters; and that many of the descriptions in it—as has been noted, also a common practice—have been taken from his Italian notebooks. This information is of no interest whatever. Nor is it of any interest to be told that Hawthorne’s wife corrected certain inaccuracies in the Roman descriptions and otherwise made occasional suggestions, which Hawthorne did not always accept. It has evidently been trying for Mr. Bowers to find that, in the original manuscript, the author had been so inconsiderate as usually to make his changes “by wiping out with a finger while the ink was still wet and writing over the same space.” But the places where these smudges occur have been carefully noted and listed. (It seems to me that this whole procedure meets an insurmountable obstacle when no corrected proofs survive that show the revisions of the author.)²⁰

Wilson then asked the obvious question: “Now, what conceivable value have 276 pages of all this? Surely only that of gratifying the very small group of monomaniac bibliographers.” He concluded, “The indiscriminate greed for this literary garbage on the part of universities is a sign of the academic pedantry on which American Lit. has been stranded."²¹

20. Wilson, Fruits of the MLA, pp. 18–19.

All of this is both accurate and amusing. But these same techniques of literary and textual criticism, when applied to biblical texts by monomaniacal German pedants and their epigone Anglo-American imitators, have for over a century undermined people's faith in the integrity of the Bible all over the world.²²

D. Criticizing Textual Criticism

The methods used by higher critics are circular: they use their colleagues' reconstructed literary texts to reconstruct the biblical past, and they use their own newly reconstructed biblical past to further reconstruct the biblical texts. On and on the academic game goes, signifying nothing except the futile purposes to which very dull people's minds can be put.

These literary techniques are highly complex, yet amazingly shoddy. The practitioners agree on very little; they reach no testable conclusions; and their required techniques absorb inordinate quantities of time to master. Liberal Bible scholar Calum Carmichael put it mildly when he warns his readers:

Historical and literary criticism is undeniably useful when working with ancient sources, but not only has it limitations, it sometimes leads nowhere. One manifest restriction in its application to most biblical material is that the historical results hypothesized cannot be corroborated. The speculative character of most such results is easily overlooked because the historical method is so deeply entrenched in scholarly approaches. With a little distance, we can see just how shaky the historical method is. . . . The procedure is a dispiriting one, dull to read, difficult to follow, and largely illusory given the paucity of the results and the conjectured historical realities dotted here and there over a vast span of time. Its most depressing aspect is the no doubt unintentional demeaning of the intelligence of the lawgiver who was responsible for the presentation of the material available to us. E. M. Forster, struck by the cavalier way in which we treat the past, attributed the attitude to the fact that those who lived then are

21. Ibid., p. 20.

22. Krentz freely admits of literary criticism that "The four-source theory of Pentateuchal origins and the two-source theory of the Synoptic interrelationships are its major results. Literary (source) criticism has achieved a more sharply contoured profile of the various sources and books, and the authors who stand behind them. It is indispensable for any responsible interpretation of the Bible." Krentz, Historical-Critical Method, p. 50.

all dead and cannot rise up and protest.²³

He was being much too kind. The scholars' "demeaning of the intelligence of the lawgiver who was responsible for the presentation of the material available to us" is all too intentional, for that Lawgiver is God Almighty, who will judge every man on judgment day. Higher critics are determined to deny that such a cosmic Lawgiver exists, and they do their best to make His laws seem like an incoherent collection of disjointed and self-contradictory pronouncements, a judicial jumble compiled by a series of editors who apparently could not keep clear in their minds anything that was written in the text in front of them that was farther back or farther forward than three lines. Somehow, these deceptive ancient masters of language and textual subtleties could not keep any argument straight, or remember the plot line of even a one-page story. Their heavy-handed attempts to revise the ancient texts for their own contemporary purposes were so badly bungled that they succeeded only in so distorting the text that no careful reader could possibly believe that God had revealed the Pentateuch to one man, Moses.

It is not the Pentateuch that is disjointed. It was not the hypothetical "later editors" who could not keep things straight in their minds. Rather, it is the paid professional army of higher critics. I appreciate C. S. Lewis' comments, as a master of medieval and early modern English literature, regarding the ability of textual critics to understand their texts: "These men ask me to believe they can read between the lines of old texts; the evidence is their obvious inability to read (in any sense worth discussing) the lines themselves. They claim to see fern-seed and can't see an elephant ten yards away in broad daylight."²⁴

E. Apostate Deceivers

The higher critics present the Bible as a poorly assembled patchwork of lies and myths, and then they add insult to injury by arguing that their debunking operation somehow elevates our view of the Bible. For example, the internationally respected (unfortunately) Bible scholar G. Ernest Wright and his co-author argue that in the Bible, 23. Calum M. Carmichael, Law and Narrative in the Bible: The Evidence of the Deuteronomistic Laws and the Decalogue (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1985), p. 14.

24. C. S. Lewis, Christian Reflections, ed. Walter Hooper (London: Geoffrey Bles, 1967), p. 157. The essay is titled, "Modern Thought and Biblical Criticism."

“What is important is what this great Lord has done.”²⁵ But as soon as anyone raises the obvious question, “What exactly has God done?” the authors run for the cover of symbolism and supposed myth, in order to escape the Bible’s detailed account of what God has done:

This furnishes a clue to our understanding of the prehistoric material preserved in Genesis 1–11. These traditions go far back into the dim and unrecoverable history of Israel; they are the popular traditions of a people, traditions which in part go back to a pre-Canaanite and North Mesopotamian background. For this reason there is little question of objective history here. We are instead faced with the question of why the old traditions were written down. What was the purpose of the writers who preserved them for US?²⁶

Notice the shift in their argument. They tell us on the one hand that the Bible is a historical book, unique in the ancient world. The Bible’s view of God rests squarely on what God has done in history. But when the key chapters that describe the creation of the universe and the Fall of man are brought up, as well as the Noachic flood and the tower of Babel, the authors immediately shift their focus away from what the Bible says about God; they shift their concern to what the Hebrews came later to believe about God. Their focus shifts from God to man. This is the essence of humanism. The fact is, their focus began with man rather than God-autonomous man.

The humanist scholar insists that we cannot deal with God, who is not an objective fact of history that can be studied. We can only deal with men’s recorded thoughts about God, which are objective facts of history that can be studied. Van Til has summarized this humanistic impulse: “Men hope to find in a study of the religious consciousness something that has never been found before. They hope to find out what religion really is. The claim is made that now for the first time religion is really being studied from the inside.”²⁷ Man’s religious consciousness becomes determinative in history, not the acts of God. Wright and Fuller should have titled their book, The Book of the Surviving Early Writings of Two Religious Groups, Judaism and Christianity, Regarding the Acts of a God Who Does Not Really Interact With History. Had they done so, of course, their academic charade would have been obvious from the beginning.

25. G. Ernest Wright and Reginald H. Fuller, The Book of the Acts of God: Christian Scholarship Interprets the Bible (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1957), p. 36.

26. Ibid., p. 24.

27. Cornelius Van Til, Psychology of Religion, vol. IV of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1971), p. 7.

1. Historical Resurrection and Final Judgment

It is not only the creation of man and his subsequent fall from grace that must be discreetly covered up by the blanket of hypothetically objective history; it is also the resurrection of Christ. Both sin and redemption must be discussed apart from biblical revelation, for if the Bible's account of sin and redemption is taken seriously, then the issue of God's final judgment once again becomes a fundamental problem. This is the problem that autonomous man wishes most of all to avoid. So, the resurrection is relegated to the mythic past, and once again the authors focus on what a small group of people have thought about this non-historical event.

Finally, what shall we say about the resurrection of Christ, as understood in the New Testament? This cannot be an objective fact of history in the same sense as was the crucifixion of Christ. The latter was a fact available to all men as a real happening, and pagan writers like Tacitus and Josephus can speak of it. But in the New Testament itself the Easter faith-event of the resurrection is perceived only by the people of the faith. Christ as risen was not seen by everyone, but only by the few. Easter was thus a reality for those in the inner circle of the disciples and apostles. That is not an arena where a historian can operate. Facts available to all men are the only data with which he can work, the facts available to the consciousness of a few are not objective history in the historian's sense.²⁸

They distinguished the "real happening" of the crucifixion from the "faith-event" of the resurrection, which was an event of a very different character. Only "facts available to all men"—meaning facts that are implicitly possible for all men to have seen—are "real happenings." This means that the resurrection was somehow not a fact that in principle all men might have seen and verified, in the same way that they could have seen and verified the crucifixion. In other words, the resurrection was not a "real happening," although the calculating deivers who wrote The Book of the Acts of God were too wise to say this blatantly, for fear of tipping their hand. They argue that the resurrection was therefore not an objective historical event, not "an objective fact of history."²⁹

28. Wright and Fuller, Acts of God, p. 25.

29. On the anti-historical concept of the resurrection-event or faith-event in mod-

The Bible tells a very different story. The fact of Christ's resurrection was sufficiently objective that Paul appealed to it as a commonly known fact when he defended himself in King Agrippa's court: "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" (Acts 26: 8). He went on to remind skeptical Festus: "For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely: for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner" (Acts 26:26). And when Paul finished, Agrippa said to him: "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian" (Acts 26:28). But the higher critics are not even remotely persuaded. They see their man-appointed task to confuse Christians about the reliability of the orthodox faith, as well as to confuse non-Christians who might otherwise be persuaded.

2. A New Terminology

So, the critics have invented new terminology, the better to muddle the perceptions of their readers. For example, following the lead of Immanuel Kant's Protestant prophet Karl Barth, they substitute a grotesque hyphenated word like faith-event for the decisive and incriminating word, fact. "Hence we have to view the resurrection in the New Testament as a faith-event, unlike other events, which is nevertheless real to the Christian community. It testifies to the knowledge that Christ is alive, not dead. The living Christ was known to be the head of the Church; and his power was real. The process, the how of Christ's transition from death to the living head of the new community, and the language used to describe that transition ('raised the third day,' 'Ascension,' 'going up,' 'sitting on the right hand of God')—these are products of the situation. They are the temporal language of the first-century Christians. To us, they are symbols of deep truth and nothing more, though they are symbols that are difficult to translate."³⁰

Of course these are difficult symbols to translate, meaning difficult to translate into historical categories that are acceptable to liberal humanism, because "raised the third day" and "going up" meant exactly the same thing to a first-century Christian as they mean today. These hell-bound apostate scholars suffer from the problem Felix suffered when he heard the gospel from Paul, fear, for Felix trembled (Acts 24:25). They want to avoid thinking about the Bible's message of salvaern neo-orthodox theology, see Cornelius Van Til, Christianity and Barthianism (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1962), pp. 92–113.

30. Wright and Fuller, Acts of God, p. 25.

tion, for it is also the message of God's inevitable final judgment. The biblical message of salvation is the only alternative to the biblical message of eternal torment.³¹

The higher critics have become the ultimate myth-makers by proclaiming the existence of a set of high ideals that are somehow associated with biblical myths (i. e. , hoaxes). After telling the reader that the early chapters of Genesis are not historical, but simply symbolic, the authors assure us concerning the story of Adam's fall: "But let us not be deceived by the simple story form of presentation. The greatness of this story is its insight into the inner nature of man and the simple manner in which it presents that insight."³² They first present evidence that, if true, any sensible reader—i. e. , any non- Ph. D.-holding higher critic—would recognize clearly as evidence that the Bible is a gigantic hoax, and then they speak as though this "new, improved" understanding of the Bible will lead society to higher ideals and moral righteousness. They are classic examples of C. S. Lewis' description of modern humanist culture: "In a sort of ghastly simplicity we remove the organ and demand the function. We make men without chests and expect of them virtue and enterprise. We laugh at honour and are shocked to find traitors in our midst. We castrate and bid the geldings be fruitful."³³

What the higher critics want us to believe in is the world according to Immanuel Kant, a dialectical realm composed of two utterly separate worlds: the phenomenal world of historical facts—meaningless historical facts apart from man's interpretations of them—and the trans-historical noumenal world of human meaning—utterly timeless, non-cognitive meaning—that is completely distinct from the phenomenal world of measurable cause and effect.³⁴ Autonomous man stands at the intersection of these two dialectical realms, and somehow creates meaning for himself. God is given homage only as the unknown god of the Greeks (Acts 17:23), and even worse, as the inherently unknowable god. An unknowable god is the only god who is acceptable to modern autonomous man, for an unknowable god presumably will not bring final judgment to inherently uninformed and uninformable finite mankind. We must never forget: the primary goal of self-proclaimed auton-

31. Gary North, Publisher's Epilogue, in David Chilton, The Great Tribulation (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/dctrib>)

32. Wright and Fuller, Acts of God, p. 61.

33. C. S. Lewis, The Abolition of Man (New York: Macmillan, [1947] 1965), p. 35.

34. Kroner, Kant's Weltanschauung.

omous man is to escape God's final judgment. So, in order to escape this judgment, the higher critics spin a web of pompous verbiage that they hope and pray—well, at least they hope—will protect them from the eternal consequences of their God-defying rebellion.

3. Who Is the Hoaxer?

Our authors ask three rhetorical questions, and then give their hapless readers a bowl of lukewarm mental mush in reply. First, the questions: "Yet there is always the final lurking question: Is the Bible true? What is truth and what is just symbolic? Cannot I have anything that is absolutely certain?" Then the mush: "The answer must be that the symbol is the truth. We have no other truth. We know it is not literal truth, but we know that the biblical portrayal is the relationship between the unknown infinite and ourselves here and now. No precise dividing line can be drawn between the ultimately real and the poetic symbol, because God has not made us infinite."³⁵ In short, they argue that because I am not infinite, and therefore not God, I need not fear an infinite God, for my very finitude keeps me from knowing God. To which Paul answered many centuries ago:

For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold [back] the truth in unrighteousness; because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse (Rom. 1:18–20).

The Bible of the higher critics cannot possibly be what it says clearly that it is: the revealed word of the Creator and Judge of the universe. Now, if the Bible really isn't what it says it is, then it must be a hoax. Once the implicit though politely unstated accusation of hoaxing is made, the question then arises: Who is the true hoaxer, God or the higher critic? There should be no doubt in our minds: the literary critic is the myth-maker. Literary higher criticism of the Bible is a hoax. No other word does it justice. It is a fraud, a lie, a denial that God's revealed word is what it says it is.³⁶ Wright and Fuller made a classic

35. Wright and Fuller, Acts of God, p. 37.

36. Oswald T. Allis, The Five Books of Moses (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1943] 1949). I appreciate the book's subtitle, reminiscent of the nineteenth century: A Reexamination of the Modern Theory that the Pentateuch Is a Late Compilation.

Freudian slip when they used the word forged for “hammered out” (as in “crucible”), when it is far easier to interpret forged as “falsified” (as in “forged signature”): “It is quite legitimate to use the methods of historical and literary criticism which were forged during the liberal period in order to reconstruct the underlying history.”³⁷ Forged indeed! Higher criticism rests on the presupposition that all morality is relative to historical time and place, and that the laws of the Bible, a strictly historical human document, are also relative. It denies the unity and moral integrity of the Bible.

F. Textual Indeterminacy Equals Ethical Indeterminacy

The real motive of higher criticism is ethical. This, too, has been Van Til’s assertion: covenant-breaking man’s problem is not a lack of knowledge about God; rather, it is his lack of obedience to God. The higher critics seek to confuse men by blurring the universal ethical requirements of God’s holy word. If they were correct, then there could be no final judgment, for God’s sanctions require God’s permanent stipulations. To deny God’s judgment, His stipulations must be presumed to be incoherent, unclear, and limited to the individual conscience, rather than coherent, clear, and universal in every human conscience.

Karl Barth was a defender of just such a radically individual ethics, an ethics which matched his thesis of a radically dialectical, incoherent, creed-denying, God-man encounter—a noumenal encounter beyond nature and history. He denied as “untenable” the assumption of the universality of God’s ethical commands, for “the command of God . . . is always an individual command for the conduct of this man, at this moment and in this situation. . . .”³⁸ In short, on Barth’s basis there cannot be a God-revealed permanent Christian ethics, nor civil statutes that conform to fixed biblical principles. Statutes and creeds ation from Diverse and Conflicting Sources by Authors and Editors Whose Identity Is Completely Unknown. See also Allis, The Old Testament: Its Claims and Its Critics (Nutley, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1972); Robert Dick Wilson, A Scientific Investigation of the Old Testament, with revisions by Edward J. Young (Chicago, Illinois: Moody Press, 1959); Edward J. Young, Thy Word Is Truth (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1957).

37. Wright and Fuller, Acts of God, p. 237.

38. Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics, trans. A. T. Mackay (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1961), Vol. 3, Part 4, p. 11; cited by Walter Kaiser, Jr., Toward Old Testament Ethics (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1983), p. 25.

are supposedly only the inventions of men, not the appropriate human responses to God's fixed and reliable revelation of Himself in a God-inspired historical document. Barth thereby proclaimed the triumph of Kant's noumenal trans-historical realm of randomness over Kant's phenomenal historical realm of scientifically predictable cause and effect, all in the name of higher ethics and higher critical insights. This was Barth's assertion of the triumph of historical and ethical relativism over the Bible. This was his announcement of the triumph of covenant-breaking man over God, and above all, over the final judgment. Autonomous man seeks to impose his temporal judgments on God by denying the historic validity of God's revelation of Himself. This, of course, was precisely what Adam attempted to do in the garden by eating the forbidden fruit in defiance of God's explicit revelation. The results are equally predictable.

1. Permanent Standards for Eternal Judgment

A righteous God who judges men eternally does so only on the basis of a unified ethical system. Only because the ethical standards never change could the punishment never change. If the texts are not ethically unified, then there is no threat to man from the God of the Bible. Thus, the "prime directive" of higher criticism is to affirm the lack of unity in the Bible. This is the "higher" critic's operating presupposition when he begins to study the Bible.

He adopts a five-step process. First, he assumes that the books of the Bible are textually jumbled. Second, he tries to prove that the books of the Bible are textually jumbled. Third, he assumes that through creative myth-making, he himself can produce a meaningful reconstruction of what the ancient authors ("redactors") really wanted to convey to all mankind, despite each one's short-term goals of political or bureaucratic manipulation. Fourth, he tries to present a "deeper" message for modern man that transcends the Bible's unfortunately jumbled texts. Finally, the higher critic offers his version of the Bible's true transcendent ethical unity. Somehow, this newly discovered transcendent ethical unity always winds up sounding like the last decade's political manifesto for social democracy, or else it sounds like Marxism.

A good statement of this operating presupposition of textual disunity is J. L. Houlden's remark that "There is, strictly speaking, no such thing as 'the X of the New Testament'. . . . It is only at the cost of ignoring the individuality of each, in thought and expression, that the unified account can emerge. . . . There can be no initial assumption of harmony.”³⁹ So, it is supposedly illegitimate to speak of “the X of the New Testament.” Well, how about a heavenly Author of the New Testament? How about solving the equation as “X = God.” Sorry, said Houlden implicitly, we cannot begin with any such assumption. Well, then, how about “the grammar of the New Testament”? We will posit “X = grammar.” Houlden was then silent, as befits a man who has implicitly denied the grammatical coherence of New Testament Greek. If he followed the logic of his statement, Greek grammar disappears, and with it, grammar in general. The coherence of the universe of rational discourse disappears, not to mention coherence of the universe itself. Once you play these sorts of verbal games, their self-contradictory nature swallows up your vaunted neutral scholarship.

Contrary to Mr. Houlden, we must begin our Bible studies (and every other kind of study) with the presupposition of the self-contained ontological Trinity and His creation of the universe out of nothing. We must begin with the Creator-creature distinction, as Van Til affirmed throughout his career. We must begin with the assumption of the unity and harmony of God’s expression of Himself in the word of God, the Bible. If we do not begin with this set of presuppositions, we will find ourselves as intellectually impotent as the scholarly higher critics of the Bible, who find it difficult to make sense of anything.

The higher critics are always alert to any hint of defection from the Party’s line concerning ethical relativism. Hans Jochen Boecker criticized the Postscript of another German scholar, H. D. Bracker. Herr Doctor Bracker made an academic gaffe by concluding in 1962 that “Israel’s law by far surpassed the other three [Babylonian, Hittite and Assyrian] in its ethical purity and in its humanity.” Such a conclusion is “highly suspect,” Herr Doctor Boecker assured his readers.⁴⁰ Why is this conclusion “highly suspect”? Because it breaks with the supposed academic neutrality and ethical relativism of modern scholarship, especially modern biblical scholarship.

Young scholars are informed subtly from the outset of their careers as undergraduates that they must always begin with the assumption that all religious faiths are equal (except for fundamentalism, which preaches an infallible Bible), all political systems are equal (except for Nazi Germany's, of course, mainly because the Nazis lost the war, and South Africa's, which is not based on the politics of black Africa: "one man, one vote, one time only"), and all nations are equal (except for the United States, which occasionally dares to call the Soviet Union into question). What this kind of worldview produces is men without spines who cannot distinguish truth from falsehood, righteousness from perversion, or a cause worth dying for from the latest political slogan. It is only by the common grace of God that they can distinguish AIDS from scarlet fever, except that they probably think that people with scarlet fever should be quarantined.

39. J. L. Houlden, Ethics and the New Testament (Middlesex, England: Penguin, 1973), p. 2; cited by Kaiser, ibid., p. 13.

40. Hans Jochen Boecker, Law and the Administration of Justice in the Old Testament and Ancient East, trans. Jeremy Moiser (Minneapolis, Minnesota: Augsburg, [1976] 1980), p. 16.

So, in order to prove all this, higher critics self-consciously spend their myopia-inducing lives searching for internal evidence that denies the unity of that historical document. I agree with Walter Kaiser's observation of the crucial link between higher criticism and men's loss of faith in the unity of the biblical message (including its ethical requirements): "For many it is too much to assume that there is consistency within one book or even a series of books alleged to have been written by the same author, for many contend that various forms of literary criticism have suggested composite documents often traditionally posing under one single author. This argument, more than any other argument in the last two hundred years, has been responsible for cutting the main nerve of the case for the unity and authority of the biblical message."⁴¹

G. Higher Criticism and Evolution

Higher criticism is based on an evolutionary model of human morality and human history. It assumes, and then seeks to prove, that the texts of the Bible, and especially the Old Testament, were self-consciously altered by later scribes and "redactors" in order to make the Bible's message conform to the latest ethical and economic principles of the day. It helped to create the early nineteenth century's intellectual climate of opinion that was so favorable to Darwinism after 1859. Ethical relativism is an idea that has had pernicious consequences. Someday, some enterprising scholar is going to write a monograph tracing at least one of the historic roots of Nazism back to German higher criticism. Nazism has been traced back to just about everything else in German history, but this possibility has been regarded as off-limits by secular historians; it comes too close to home, theologically speaking. D. F. Strauss' Life of Jesus could easily serve as a starting point in such an investigation. Arthur Cohen has suggested this historical connection, and it deserves a detailed study.⁴² Cohen's warning should be taken seriously: it is dangerous to separate ethics from faith, which is what higher criticism did. "Nineteenth-century theologians had, indeed, succeeded: the ethics of the Hebrew Bible were winnowed by the Gospels and the ethics restored to Christian conscience were ethics for the 'between time,' when history awaited the return of Christ. The purge of Christianity of its Jewish elements was disastrous."⁴³

41. Kaiser, Toward Old Testament Ethics, p. 26.

A representative academic example of the spoiled fruits of higher criticism is presented by the economic historian Morris Silver, who spent an entire volume painstakingly trying to collate and make coherent an immense body of archeological, economic, and higher critical textual evidence in order to prove what higher critics assume, namely, that the Book of Deuteronomy was written many centuries after the exodus. "A central hypothesis of this book is that Deuteronomy represents an attempt to revise and expand the old divine-law code and thereby the legal practices of the Israelite state in the light of the circumstances of a much more affluent society."⁴⁴ That his presentation of the evidence is painful to follow, let alone remember, should come as no surprise: he combined a false initial hypothesis with hundreds of disjointed citations from far too disjointed a body of scholarship.

There is another major intellectual goal of higher criticism besides re-dating the giving of God's laws in order to relativize them: re-dating every document in which a specific prophecy later came true. The author of the prophecy must have written it after the prophesied event took place. Thus, the so-called prophecy is regarded as merely a convenient lie on the part of a redactor, i. e. , a myth. Even when this tactic of re-dating is not invoked, higher critics remain skeptical of all future-predicting prophecies. Jeremiah prophesied the death of the false prophet Hananiah, and Hananiah died later that year (Jer. 28:15-17). Silver asked rhetorically: "Does this story represent myth, hypnotic suggestion, coincidence, or political assassination?"⁴⁵ What it could

42. Arthur A. Cohen, The Myth of the Judeo-Christian Tradition (New York: Schocken, 1971), pp. 199-200.

43. Ibid., p. 200.

44. Morris Silver, Prophets and Markets: The Political Economy of Ancient Israel (Boston: Kluwer-Nijhoff, 1983), p. 230.

45. Ibid., p. 140.

not possibly represent, in his worldview, is a fulfilled prophecy.

If a person derives ethics from history, and then scrambles the historical data by means of an erroneous chronological scheme, both his ethics and his historiography will flounder.⁴⁶ He will write such nonsense as this: "... the indispensable agricultural-fertility aspect of Baalism⁴⁷ had long ago become a traditional part of Yahweh worship, taken for granted even by Amos and Hosea. It is a naïve misconception to suppose that the latter had achieved its final form even at the time of Moses and the Exodus. As Morgenstern⁴⁸ well noted, the Jewish religion is the product of historical evolution to meet the needs of the Jewish people 'from the remote desert period to the present day.' The only 'pure Yahwism' is a dead Yahwism."⁴⁹ The book's bibliography is impressive, but its conclusions are trivial on those occasions when they are correct. Such is the endlessly repeated fate of two centuries of higher critical scholarship and historical studies based on higher criticism: the academic trumpets sound, and a mouse marches out, dragging behind him a mountain of jumbled chronologies and footnotes to obscure, unread, and unreadable journal articles, leaving behind him a trail of droppings for other busy mice to follow.⁵⁰

Higher criticism is today a backwater academic discipline that serves the needs of humanism by keeping linguistically skilled but stylistically handicapped scholars fully employed. It also serves to keep educated Christians confused about the legitimacy of their God-given marching orders. Christian scholars pay a great deal of attention to the latest findings of higher critics, filling their own unread academic journals with vaguely conservative modifications of, and an occasional

46. There are few intellectual tasks more pressing on Christian historians of the ancient Near East and classical Greece and Rome than to rethink the various chronologies prior to about 750 B. C. See Appendix A.

47. Citing Ivan Engnell, Studies in Divine Kingship in the Near East (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, [1943] 1967), p. 172.

48. Julian Morgenstern, Rites of Birth, Marriage, Death and Kindred Occasions Among the Semites (Cincinnati, Ohio: Hebrew Union College Press, 1966), p. 64. If any single individual was most responsible for corrupting American Judaism by means of higher criticism, it was the remarkable, long-lived Julian Morgenstern. For a summary of his life, see Morris Lieberman, "Julian Morgenstern—Scholar, Teacher and Leader," Hebrew Union College Annual, XXXII (1961), pp. 1–9.

49. Silver, Prophets and Markets, p. 124.

50. The best definition of modern theology that I have come across is the one given by David Chilton to his seminary professor, Greg L. Bahnsen, when Prof. Bahnsen asked him why he was not taking his class on the theology of Pannenberg: "Modern theologians are like a pack of dogs who spend most of their time sniffing each other's behinds."

refutation of, some unread essay in a higher critical academic journal. In contrast, secular scholars today pay very little attention to higher criticism's methods or its findings. This speaks far better of secular scholars than for neo-evangelical scholars who have succumbed to the siren song of certified academic respectability, and who have adopted an attitude of "me, too, but not quite so radical, at least not yet."⁵¹

Conclusion

Christians have made the mistake of regarding the debates over higher criticism as being the peculiar habit of linguistic specialists and theologians. The fact is, from the very beginning of the rise of humanism, there has been a war between those who defend the Bible, especially the Old Testament, and those who reject this testimony. This debate throughout most of its history involved all of culture, what we call today a conflict between comprehensive world-and-life views. It is only in the hands of modern scholars that the debate has been narrowly focused on the technical issues of textual analysis. Earlier generations recognized that the debate was far more important than modern scholars are willing to admit.

The task of the Christian scholar in defending the Bible as the word of God must not be narrowly focused. The debate did not originate in the university library; it originated in the social conflicts of the day. The participants understood that the outcome of this academic debate over the textual integrity of the Bible would determine who would gain and retain control of the seats of power. This conflict was a life-and-death matter for English culture in the early modern period, and it was recognized as such by the participants.

This perception of the magnitude of the debate has been lost on modern Bible scholars. Humanists have rewritten history in order to downplay the importance of the Bible in Western thought and culture. Evangelical Christians have generally agreed to this view of Western history, almost by default. Members of the evangelical scholarly world have been trained by the humanists who control access to the major 51. I do not deny that an occasional linguistically gifted scholar such as Robert Dick Wilson, O. T. Allis, or Edward Young should devote a lifetime to refuting the best and most influential of the higher critics' presentations. This is a subdivision of apologetics—the intellectual defense of the faith. But surely there is little need for Christians to subsidize the bulk of what passes for academic Old Testament studies today: narrowly focused essays that prove or disprove theses that no one considers relevant, theses that will almost surely be abandoned in less than five years, in those rare instances that anyone adopts them in the first place.

institutions of higher learning (i.e. , trade union certification). At the same time, laymen in the pews have also accepted the humanists' view of the peripheral nature of the Bible's influence in the early modern history because such a view of the Bible's lack of relevance in history conforms to the mind-set of what has been called the left wing of the Reformation: Anabaptist pietism. This tradition has been at war with Old Testament law from the beginning. Indeed, this movement was one of the forerunners of higher criticism, for it contrasted the Bible with the inner testimony of man's spirit, and elevated the latter over the former.⁵² This legacy of the internalization of the word of God triumphed in the modern church through the influence of twentieth-century fundamentalism: grace over law.⁵³ Once again, we see evidence of the implicit alliance between the power religion and the escape religion.

It is time for Christian scholars of the Old Testament to stop their fruitless shadow-boxing with higher critics who will no more listen to Bible-defending scholars than they have listened to Moses and Christ. It is time for orthodox Bible scholars to go to the Pentateuch to find out what it says, not to discover some new bit of evidence that Moses really and truly did say it. There is no doubt a place in the division of intellectual labor for linguistically skilled Christians to defend the integrity of the Bible against the incoherent slanders of higher critics, but this technical task should be put on a low-priority basis. What we do need is a great deal of research on the chronology of the Pentateuch—not on when Moses wrote the Pentateuch, but on what was going on in the surrounding nations at the time of the exodus. We need a reconstruction of ancient chronology, one based on the presupposition that the Bible gives us the authoritative primary source documents, not Egypt or Babylon. Such a project would keep a lot of linguistically skilled scholars productively busy for several generations.

Meanwhile, let the higher critics drown in their own footnotes, the way that Arius died by falling head-first into a privy.⁵⁴ Let the dead bury the dead, preferably face down in a scholarly journal.

52. Reventlow, Authority of the Bible, ch. 3.

53. Reventlow, Frank, Less Than Conquerors.

54. R. J. Rushdoony, Foundations of Social Order: Studies in the Creeds and Councils of the Early Church (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1969] 1998), p. 15. (<http://bit.ly/rjrfs0>)

APPENDIX Q

THE RESTORATION OF BIBLICAL CASUISTRY

I have more understanding than all my teachers: for thy testimonies are my meditation. I understand more than the ancients) because I keep thy precepts (Psalm 119: 99–100).

We need to take David's words seriously. He defines personal progress in history in terms of a better understanding of God's revealed laws. He can measure his progress beyond anything achieved by those who have preceded him, not in terms of better study techniques, or improved means of communication, or greater per capita wealth, but in terms of his mastery of God's precepts.

Modern man regards such an idea of historical progress as preposterous. Sad to say, so does the modern Christian. This is why modern society is headed either for an enormous series of disasters or an enormous and culturally comprehensive revival. God will not be mocked. His covenantal sanctions—blessings and cursings—still operate in history. This book deals with God's covenantal case laws from an economic point of view. This strategy is theologically appropriate in the late twentieth century, for modern man worships at his own shrine in the hope of achieving unbroken compound economic growth per capita.

Authority and Dominion is a work of casuistry: the application of conscience to moral decisions. The conscience needs a reliable guide: biblical law. Casuistry has not been a popular academic endeavor within Bible-believing Protestantism since the late seventeenth century. The only works I can think of that are anything like this series of economic commentaries in scope are Richard Baxter's enormous study, A Christian Directory, written in 1664–65 and first published in 1673, and Samuel Willard's equally massive commentary on the Westminsterster Shorter Catechism, A Compleat Body of Divinity (1726). Richard Baxter's goal was basically the same as mine: "I do especially desire you to observe, that the resolving of practical Cases of Conscience, and the reducing of Theological knowledge into serious Christian Practice, and promoting a skilful facility in the faithful exercise of universal obedience and Holiness of heart and life, is the great work of this Treatise; . . ."¹ Unlike Baxter, I had access to my library when I wrote my book; he did not, having been barred from his pulpit by the State (after the Restoration of Charles II in 1660), and having to write most of it from memory, only subsequently checking the original sources.

A. Ignoring the Case Laws

The major problem I had in writing this book is that there are very few books that even explain the case laws, let alone take them seriously. There are at least three approaches to (or, more accurately, justifications for the rejection of) the case laws.

1. The Case Laws as Annulled

This is the standard Christian view. It has been the common viewpoint almost from the beginning of the church. This is why theonomy appears to be a major break with broad church tradition. Basically, the position boils down to this: a compromise with late classical philosophy's natural law theory began in the early centuries of the church. Christian scholars appealed to universal human reason as the source of rational man's universal knowledge of civil law. This law was seen as natural, meaning that it is implicitly in the common possession of all rational men. There was an early recognition on the part of church scholars and leaders that an appeal to Old Testament case laws could not be conformed intellectually to natural law theory. They understood the obvious question: "If these laws were universally binding on all men, then why did God have to reveal the specifics of His law to the Hebrews, and only to them?" This, in fact, is a very good Christian rhetorical answer to those who declare the universality of natural law. The answer is simple: there is no such thing as a universal system of rational natural law which is accessible to fallen human reason. But this answer was too radical to suit scholars and apologists in the early church, just as it has been too radical for Christians ever since. It involves a sharp break with the doctrine of natural law.

1. Richard Baxter, A Christian Directory: Or, A Summ of Practical Theologie, and Cases of Conscience (London: Robert White for Nevil Simmons, [1673] 1678), unnumbered page, but the second page of Advertisements.

The early commentators were sorely tempted to seek a way out of their common-ground apologetic difficulty by interpreting Paul's language regarding the annulment of the law's eternal death sentence against redeemed mankind to mean that the Old Covenant's legal order is in no way judicially binding on New Testament society. They abandoned the concept of God's historical sanctions as applicable in New Testament history. They lumped together Israel's civil case laws with the Old Covenant's laws of ritual cleanliness, and then they dismissed both varieties. This tradition lives on in modern conservative Christian theology.

2. The Case Laws as Antiquarian

Christian Bible commentators pass over these laws on the assumption that they are only of antiquarian interest. Commentators almost never attempt to explain how these laws might have worked in ancient Israel. They never discuss how they might be applied in the New Testament era. Also, the commentators are unfamiliar with even the rudiments of economic theory, so their comments on the economic implications of these verses are almost nonexistent. Their few brief observations are what the reader could readily have figured out for himself. Another major problem is that far too often, the commentators compare the biblical text with fragments of the legal texts of the surrounding Near Eastern cultures. This is not an evil practice in itself, but it is when they make the unproven assumption that Israel must have borrowed its legal code from these pagan cultures. They never discuss the possibility that Israel's law code preceded these pagan extracts, which once again raises the question of the need for the reconstruction of biblical and Near Eastern chronologies.²

3. The Case Laws as Mythical

Liberal humanist Bible scholars are so enamored with biblical "higher criticism" that they pay little attention to the meaning of the biblical texts. They prefer instead to spend their lives inventing multiple authors for each text, re-dating subsections in order to make the Book of Exodus appear to be a composite document written centuries after the exodus event (which many of them downplay anyway).³ When commentators believe that the oldest laws are remnants of some “primitive nomadism” or else imports from pagan law codes, they have no incentive to think through how these laws should be applied today. When they view most of the case laws as late developments that were inserted retroactively into older biblical texts for political reasons, they have little incentive to understand them as specific historical applications of permanent general principles. Jews and gentiles alike are afflicted with Bible scholarship that relies on the principles of higher criticism.

2. Appendix A.

B. Useless Commentaries

The Dominion Covenant is not a typical Bible commentary. The typical Bible commentary judiciously avoids the really difficult questions, especially in the area of ethics. It also neglects all but the most obvious of the economic principles involved. It is hard to believe how little practical information is provided by the typical modern Bible commentary. It is understandable why people seldom use them after having bought them. Reality does not meet expectations when it comes to Bible commentaries. What is not understandable is that people continue to buy them. They sit unused on most pastors’ book shelves. Maybe their primary use is decorative. I gave up on most Bible commentaries years ago. I use them mainly to keep myself from making major linguistic or textual errors. This is why you will find very few references to Bible commentaries in my footnotes. I long ago stopped wasting my time trying to find economic and judicial information in them. Or, as the economist would say, “the marginal return on each additional invested unit of my time spent in reading them was consistently below the marginal cost.” In short, the information costs were too high per unit of relevant data.

1. Jewish Commentaries

If Christian commentaries are unhelpful, what about commentaries written by Jews? Not much better. I did not find the traditional

3. In recent years, this has been changing to some degree. The arcane intricacies of the many rival textual reconstructions have led to such a cobweb of complexity that scholars prefer to avoid trying to untangle it. Thus, scholars are sorely tempted to do what was once considered a breach of faith: treat the text as a unit when searching for its meaning.

Jewish commentaries useful in writing this commentary, including the Talmud. Until only about a century and a half ago, Jewish scholarship focused almost exclusively on the Talmud, which was completed around A. D. 500, parts of which extended back to several centuries before Christ in the form of oral tradition.⁴ Traditional Jewish commentaries on ethics often deal with highly specific legal cases involving economic disputes between men, or academic disputes among the rabbis, but there is seldom an attempt to spell out the general economic principles guiding any decision of a Jewish court. At best, the rabbis may try to explain why certain forms of restitution are imposed in certain cases, but nothing beyond a kind of common-sense view of economic justice. Thus, Jewish religious scholars until very recently did not bring their great skills of erudition and detailed scholarship to bear on the modern world. "Secular" topics did not interest them, and even today, those Jews who have become illustrious academically in so many fields display little or no interest in the Talmud.

There is a very important reason why the writings of Jewish legal scholars and judges prove to be of little assistance: Jewish courts after the Bar Kokhba revolt of 135 A. D. were not allowed to impose specifically biblical sanctions. Very few gentiles are aware of this, and I suspect that few Jews are, either. When the Romans captured Jerusalem and burned the Temple in A. D. 70, the ancient official Sanhedrin court came to an end. The rabbis, under the leadership of Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai, then took over many of the judicial functions of the Sanhedrin.⁵ They established as a principle that every Jewish court must have at least one judge who had been ordained by the laying on of hands (semikah), and who could in principle trace his ordination back to Moses. This laying on of hands could take place only in the Holy Land. Legal scholar George Horowitz comments: "A court not thus qualified had no jurisdiction to impose the punishments prescribed in the Torah."⁶ After the Bar Kokhba revolt, the Jews were scattered across the Roman Empire in the diaspora. "The Rabbis were compelled, therefore, in order to preserve the Torah and to maintain law and order, to enlarge the authority of Rabbinical tribunals. This they accomplished by emphasizing the distinction between Biblical penalties and Rabbinical penalties. Rabbinical courts after the second century had no authority to impose Biblical punishments since they lacked semikah; but as regards penalties created by Rabbinical legislation, the Rabbis had of necessity, accordingly, a whole series of sanctions and penalties: excommunications, fines, physical punishment, use of the 'secular arm' in imitation of the Church, etc."⁷ Thus, by the time of the Mishnah, which was Rabbi Judah the Prince's authoritative late-second-century compilation of rabbinical laws, Jewish courts had already abandoned Old Testament sanctions. Thus tied intellectually and ethically to the Mishnah, to the massive Talmud (completed around A. D. 500), and to the literature produced in terms of this ancient tradition, Jewish commentators have never attempted to produce anything like the kind of Bible commentary that The Dominion Covenant represents. I am aware of no Jewish compilation of Old Testament case laws that is organized in terms of the Ten Commandments or any other biblical organizational principle (e.g., the covenant model) which is comparable to R. J. Rushdoony's Institutes of Biblical Law, and no apologetic comparable to Greg L. Bahnsen's Theonomy in Christian Ethics. Furthermore, despite the intellectual dominance of economists who are Jews,⁸ there is as yet no body of scholarship known as Jewish economics.⁹ This is in sharp contrast to the Islamic academic community, which has produced a growing body of self-consciously Islamic economic literature, especially since 1975.¹⁰ With the

4. See Appendix L: "Maimonides' Code: Is It Biblical?"

5. George Horowitz, The Spirit of Jewish Law (New York: Central Book Co. , 1963), pp. 92–93.

6. Ibid., p. 93.

7. Idem.

8. Murray Rothbard, an agnostic Jew and a defender of free market economics, once made the observation that "The fate of Western Civilization will be determined by whether our Jews beat their Jews." He presumably had in mind Ludwig von Mises, F. A. Hayek, and Milton Friedman (in his anti-regulatory writings) vs. Karl Marx, Paul Samuelson, Lawrence Klein, etc.

9. The two titles that might be offered as examples of such scholarship are quite recent: Aaron Levine, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law (New York: Ktav Publishing House, Yeshiva University Press, 1980); Meir Tamari, "With All Your Possessions": Jewish Ethics and Economic Life (New York: Free Press, 1987). Neither study is particularly theoretical or detailed in its practical applications. They are more like introductory surveys of a handful of themes in the Talmud that are related to economics.

10. See Muhammed Nejatullah Siddiqi, Muslim Economic Thinking: A Survey of Contemporary Literature (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1981); Muhammed Akram Khan, Islamic Economics: Annotated Sources in English and Urdu (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1983). A cursory list of English-language examples of this literature includes the following: Ibnul Hasan (ed.), In Search of an Islamic Economic Model (London: New Century Publishers, 1983); Afzal-Ur-ahman, Economic Doctrines of Islam, 4 vols. (Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications Limited, 1974–82); Muazzam Ali (ed.), Islamic Banks and Strategies of Economic Cooperation (London: New Century Publications, 1982); Mohammed Muslehuddin, Insurance and Islamic Law (Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications, 1969); Muslehuddin, Economics and Is- exception only of Professor Israel Kirzner, I can think of no contemporary academically recognized Jewish' economist¹¹ who might agree with Rabbi Chajes' mid-nineteenth-century pronouncement: "Allegiance to the authority of the said [oral] rabbinic tradition is binding upon all sons of Israel, since these explanations and interpretations have come down to us by word of mouth from generation to generation, right from the time of Moses. They have been transmitted to us precise, correct, and unadulterated, and he who does not give his adherence to the unwritten law and the rabbinic tradition has no right to share the heritage of Israel; he belongs to the Sadducees or the Karaites who severed connection to us long ago."¹²

2. Orthodox Judaism

During the last century in the West, Orthodox Judaism has almost disappeared from sight, so widespread has been the defection of millions of Jews who have been assimilated into modern society; by Chajes' definition, there are today few Jews remaining in the world, except in the State of Israel. Even the term "Orthodox Judaism" indicates the nature of the problem; it was originally a term of derision used by liberal Jews in the nineteenth century against their traditionalist opponents. Grunfeld wrote: "The word 'Orthodoxy', on the other hand, lam (Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications, 1974); Alhaj A. D. Ajijola, The Islamic Concept of Social Justice (Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications, 1977); Muhammed Nejatullah Siddiqi, Banking Without Interest (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1983); Siddiqi, Issues in Islamic Banking: Selected Papers (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1983); Siddiqi, Partnership and Profit-Sharing in Islamic Law (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1985); M. Dmer Chapra, Towards a Just Monetary System (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1985); Waqar Masood Khan, Towards an Interest-Free Islamic Economic System (Leicester, England: Islamic Foundation, 1985); Raquibuz M. Zaman, Elimination of Interest from the Banking System in Pakistan (Karachi: State Bank of Pakistan, 1985). I do not believe that Shaikh Mahmud Ahmad's book, Economics of Islam (Lahore, Pakistan: Ashraf Press, 1947), is representative of recent Islamic economic thought in general; the book is a socialist polemic in the name of Islam.

11. Kirzner was not a prominent academic figure, but he was the only "Austrian School" economist who has a reputation among academic economists. Kirzner's dual mastery of the Talmud and the works of Ludwig von Mises is not visible in his writings; the two fields are kept by Kirzner in hermetically sealed separate academic compartments. Few professional economists are aware that he is known as a rabbi in Orthodox Jewish circles. See Aaron Levine, Free Enterprise and Jewish Law, p. xi.

12. Z. H. Chajes, The Student's Guide Through the Talmud (London: East and West Library, 1952), p. 4. The Karaites were a sect of Judaism established in 767 A. D. By Jews in Babylon. They did not accept the Talmud or the idea of an oral tradition stretching back to Moses.

which was applied by the Reformers to what they called 'Old-Timers' or 'Old-Believers' (AltgHiubige), was taken from the sphere of Christian theology and does not fit Judaism at all, in which the main stress is laid on action or law and not on 'faith', as the Greek term orthodox would express. Nevertheless, once the word 'Orthodoxy' had been thrown at Hirsch and his followers in a derogatory sense, he accepted the challenge with the intention of turning that word into a name of honour."¹³ Notice his assertion regarding Judaism that "the main stress is laid on action or law and not on 'faith.' " This is indeed the main stress of orthodox Judaism, which nevertheless has an underlying theology: salvation by law. Wrote Robert Goldenberg: "Classical Judaism, drawing indirectly on its biblical antecedents, tends to emphasize act over intention, behavior over thought. Righteousness is chiefly a matter of proper behavior, not correct belief or appropriate intention."¹⁴ In contrast, Christianity stresses salvation by faith in Christ. But this faith means faith in Christ's representative perfect obedience to God's perfect law; Christian orthodoxy should never lead to a denial of the validity and moral authority of that perfect law which Christ obeyed perfectly.

C. Revolution and Law

I am convinced that both the West and the Far East are about to experience a major transformation. The pace of social change is already rapid and will get faster. The technological possibility of a successful biological warfare attack on the Western societies grows daily. So does the threat of a banking crisis. Threats to civilization may prove in retrospect to be devastating, but they are certainly perceived today as threats. Added to these grim possibilities is the much more predictable threat of an international economic collapse as a result of the vast build-up of international debt; this in turn could produce domestic political transformations. Also possible is the spread of terrorism and Marxist revolution. Drug addiction is spreading like a plague. Changes in the weather as a result of the use of fossil fuels (the "greenhouse effect") are in the newspapers because of international drought. Agricultural output may be endangered, long term, by weather changes and also by soil erosion. We are not sure. What Christians should be certain of is this: God has been plowing up the ethically erosion-prone world since World War I, and this process is accelerating.

13. I. Grunfeld, "Samson Raphael Hirsch—The Man and His Mission," in Judaism Eternal: Selected Essays from the Writings of Samson Raphael Hirsch (London: Soncino Press, 1956), p. xlvii.

14. Robert Goldenberg, "Law and Spirit in Talmudic Religion," in Arthur Green (ed.), Jewish Spirituality: From the Bible Through the Middle Ages (New York: Crossroad, 1986), p. 232.

This has created a unique opportunity for Christian revival, but this time revival could lead to a broad-based cultural transformation. In short, revival could produce an international revolution: family by family, church by church, nation by nation. For a true social revolution to take place, there must be a transformation of the legal order. This transformation takes several generations, but without it, there has been no revolution, only a coup d'état.¹⁵ There is today an international crisis in the Western legal tradition.¹⁶ This, far more than the build-up of nuclear weapons or the appearance of AIDS, testifies to the likelihood of a comprehensive, international revolution—not necessarily violent, but a revolution nonetheless. The Holy Spirit could produce such a revolution without firing a shot or launching a missile. This is my prayer. It should be every Christian's prayer.

Harold Berman's point is correct: without a transformation of the legal system, there is no revolution. This is why I am devoting so much space to explaining the case laws of Exodus. It is these laws, and their amplification in the Book of Deuteronomy, that must serve as the foundation of any systematically, self-consciously Christian revolution. Natural law is a dead mule; it was always a sterile hybrid, and Darwinism has long-since killed the last known living specimens.¹⁷ (Anti-theistic conservative philosophers and a handful of traditional Roman Catholic and Protestant college instructors and magazine columnists still visibly cling to one or another of these taxidermic specimens, each proclaiming that his specimen is still alive.) Thus, there is nowhere for Christians to turn for guidance in developing a believable social theory and workable social programs except to the case laws of the Old Testament. Once the myth of neutrality is abandoned—really abandoned, 15. Harold J. Berman, Law and Revolution: The Formation of the Western Legal Tradition (Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983), p. 20.

16. Ibid., pp. 33–41.

17. R. J. Rushdoony wrote: "Darwinism destroyed this faith in nature. The process of nature was now portrayed, not as a perfect working of law, but as a blind, unconscious energy working profligately to express itself. In the struggle for survival, the fittest survive by virtue of their own adaptations, not because of natural law. Nature produces many 'mistakes' which fail to survive and become extinct species and fossils. The destiny of the universe is extinction as its energy runs down." Rushdoony, The Biblical Philosophy of History (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1969] 2000), p. 7.

not just verbally admitted to be a myth—then the inevitable question arises: By what standard? Christians who have abandoned faith in the myth of neutrality have only one possible answer: “By this standard: biblical law.”¹⁸

D. The Conflict Between Two Kingdoms

What I am attempting to do with my life is to publish Christian worldview materials that will lead to the steady replacement of the humanist intellectual foundations of modern civilization. The arena of conflict is nothing less than world civilization. The issue is the kingdom of God, both in heaven and on earth (Matt. 28:18). There are many books that deal with the kingdom of God, but my view of the kingdom of God as it is visibly manifested in history is simple: it is God’s authorized and morally required civilization. It is simultaneously internal (world-and-life view), ethical (a moral law-order), and institutional (covenantal judicial relationships). Raymond Zorn begins his book on the Kingdom of God with these words: “In the broadest sense God’s Kingdom refers to the most extended reaches of His sovereignty. As Psalm 103:19 puts it, ‘The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all.’”¹⁹ The kingdom of God is all-encompassing, in the same sense that a civilization is all-encompassing.²⁰ I agree in principle with the Jewish scholar, I. Grunfeld,

18. Greg L. Bahnsen, By This Standard: The Authority of God’s Law Today (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/gbbts>)

19. Raymond O. Zorn, Church and Kingdom (Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1962), p. 1. Zorn, an amillennialist, stresses the kingdom as the reign of God rather than the sphere or domain of His rule (p. 1). Greg Bahnsen’s response to this sort of argument is correct: it is ridiculous to speak of the reign of a king whose kingdom has few if any historical manifestations that are as comprehensive in scope as his self-proclaimed sovereignty. Such a limited definition of God’s kingdom and kingship is in fact a denial of God’s kingdom. Bahnsen, “The World and the Kingdom of God” (1981), reprinted as Appendix D in Gary DeMar and Peter J. Leithart, The Reduction of Christianity: A Biblical Response to Dave Hunt (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1988). (<http://bit.ly/gdmplreduction>)

20. The reader should not misinterpret what I am saying. I am not saying that the kingdom of God is the primary theme in the Bible, or in the message of Jesus. His primary theme is the same as the whole Bible’s primary theme: the glory of God. I agree with Geerhardus Vos’ statement: “While thus recognizing that the kingdom of God has an importance in our Lord’s teaching second to that of no other subject, we should not go to the extreme into which some writers have fallen, of finding in it the only theme on which Jesus actually taught, which would imply that all other topics dealt with in his discourses were to his mind but so many corollaries or subdivisions of this one great truth. . . . Salvation with all it contains flows from the nature and subserves the glory of God. . . .” Geerhardus Vos, The Teaching of Jesus Concerning the Kingdom

when he wrote that “true religion and true civilisation are identical. It is the view of the Torah as the civilisation of the state of God—where Torah is coextensive with life in all its manifestations, personal, economic, political, national.”²¹

Nothing less than this comprehensive replacement of humanism and occultism with Christianity will suffice to please God. We are called to work for the progressive replacement of humanist civilization by Christian civilization, a replacement that was definitively achieved with the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, and manifested by the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. We are to replace Satan’s humanistic kingdoms. “Kingdom” is an inescapable concept. It is never a question of kingdom vs. no kingdom; it is always a question of whose kingdom. Rushdoony was correct in his evaluation of mankind’s inevitable quest for utopia, the final order, which only God can inaugurate and bring to pass: “The church accordingly has never been alone in history but has rather faced a multiplicity of either anti-Christian or pseudo-Christian churches fiercely resentful of any challenge to their claim to represent the way, truth and life of that final order. The modern state, no less than the ancient empire, claims to be the vehicle and corporate body of that true estate of man. As the incarnation of that final order, it views family, church, school and every aspect of society as members and phases of its corporate life and subject to its general government. It is in terms of this faith, therefore, that the state claims prior or ultimate jurisdiction over every sphere, and steadily encroaches on their activity.”²² and the Church (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1958), p. 11. I am saying only that the kingdom of God is inherently all-encompassing culturally. In fact, I am convinced that the best biblical definition of “kingdom” is civilization. The kingdom of God is the civilization of God—internal, external, heavenly, earthly, historical, and eternal.

21. I. Grunfeld, “Samson Raphael Hirsch—the Man and His Mission,” Judaism Eternal, I, p. xiv. Obviously, I do not agree with Grunfeld’s next sentence: “This concept is applicable, of course, only when there is a Jewish State, or at least an autonomous Jewish Society, which can be entirely ruled by the Torah.” This statement provides evidence of the accuracy of Vos’ analysis of Jewish teaching concerning the Kingdom of heaven: “The emphasis was placed largely on what the expected state would bring for Israel in a national and temporal sense. Hence it was preferably thought of as the kingdom of Israel over the other nations.” Vos, Kingdom and the Church, p. 19.

22. R. J. Rushdoony, Foreword, in Zorn, Church and Kingdom, pp. xix–xx.

1. Comprehensive Revival

Christian Reconstructionists are self-consciously attempting to lay new intellectual foundations for a comprehensive moral and therefore intellectual, social, political, and economic transformation of the world. Not until at least the preliminary steps in this theological and intellectual transformation are accomplished can we expect God to send worldwide revival. If the coming revival is not comprehensive in its effects, it will no more change the world permanently than earlier revivals have changed it permanently. The regeneration of people's souls is only the first step on the road to comprehensive redemption. Christian philosopher Cornelius Van Til, who died in 1987, issued a warning: "The temptation is very great for the believers in these times when the Church is in apostasy, and its conquest of the world for Christ seems to be losing out, that they shall spend a great deal of their time in passive waiting instead of in active service. Another danger that lurks at a time of apostasy is that the few faithful ones give up the comprehensive ideal of the kingdom and limit themselves to the saving of individual souls."²³ We need a comprehensive revival that will produce comprehensive redemption.²⁴

We must understand from the beginning that the message of the kingdom of God rests on a concept of salvation which is supernaturally imparted, not politically imparted. The kingdom of God is categorically not a narrow political program of social transformation; it is rather a supernaturally imposed salvational program that inevitably produces world-changing political, social, legal, and economic effects. The amillennial theologian Geerhardus Vos was correct: "The kingdom represents the specifically evangelical element in our Lord's teaching. . . . Jesus' doctrine of the kingdom as both inward and outward, coming first in the heart of man and afterwards in the external world, upholds the primacy of the spiritual and ethical over the physical. The invisible world of the inner religious life, the righteousness of the disposition, the sonship of God are in it made supreme, the essence of the kingdom, the ultimate realities to which everything else is subordinate. The inherently ethical character of the kingdom finds subjective expression in the demand for repentance.”²⁵

23. Cornelius Van Til, Christian Theistic Ethics, vol. III of In Defense of Biblical Christianity (Phillipsburg, New Jersey: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1958] 1980), p. 122.

24. Gary North, "Comprehensive Redemption: A Theology for Social Action," in North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), Appendix C. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

The primary need today, as always, is the need for widespread personal repentance before God. We therefore need a Holy Spirit-initiated Christian revival to extend the kingdom of God across the face of the earth. If we do not get this revival soon, my work and the work of those who are involved in the Biblical Blueprints project will remain curiosities, and then become antiquarian curiosities, until the revival comes.

2. Blueprints and Responsibility

Without a bottom-up religious transformation of civilization, the policies that we Christian Reconstructionists recommend will at best have only a peripheral influence on society. The reader should understand, however, that we expect the revival and this bottom-up transformation, if not in our own lifetimes, then eventually. The Bible’s blueprints for society will eventually be universally adopted across the face of the earth as the waters cover the sea (Isa. 11:9).²⁶ Christian Reconstructionists regard this as historically inevitable. This confidence is what makes the theonomic postmillennial worldview so hard-nosed and uncompromising. We annoy almost every Christian who has doubts about the earthly triumph of God’s kingdom, which means that we initially alienate just about everyone who reads our materials. Our antinomian Christian critics call us arrogant. Bear in mind that the word “arrogant” usually means “a confident assertion of something I don’t approve of.”

Christians who doubt the future earthly triumph of God’s kingdom tend to be less confident and less sure about the practical reliability of the Bible’s blueprints. Sometimes they even deny that the Bible offers such blueprints. If it does offer such blueprints, then evangelical Christians have major responsibilities outside the sanctuary and the family. This prospect of worldwide, culture-wide responsibility frightens millions of Christians. They have even adopted eschatologies that assure them that God does not hold them responsible for anything so comprehensive as the transformation of today’s sin-filled world. They do not believe that God offers to His church the tools, skills, and time necessary for such a generations-long project of social transformation.

25. Vos, Kingdom and the Church, pp. 102–3.

26. J. A. De Jong, As the Waters Cover the Sea: Millennial Expectations in the Rise of Anglo-American Missions, 1640–1810 (Kampen, Netherlands: J. H. Kok, 1970).

Therefore, they adopt the philosophy that says that Christians should not even try to reform society, for such efforts are futile, wasteful, and shift precious resources from the only legitimate tasks of the church: preaching individual salvation to the lost, and sustaining the converted spiritually in a time of inevitable cultural decline. They equate social reform programs with polishing brass on a sinking ship. As dispensationalist newsletter writer Peter Lalonde remarked concerning Christians who possess such a vision of God's world-transforming kingdom in history, "It's a question, 'Do you polish brass on a sinking ship?' And if they're working on setting up new institutions, instead of going out and winning the lost for Christ, then they're wasting the most valuable time on the planet earth right now, and that is the serious problem."²⁷

E. Doubt vs. Dominion

Christians, paralyzed by their own versions of eschatological pessimism, have not taken advantage of the growing self-doubt that is progressively paralyzing their humanistic opponents. Christians should recognize the extent of the despair that has engulfed those who have rejected the idea that the Bible is the infallible word of God. An example of such despair is the following:

We live in a time in which old perspectives informing our understanding of the world have been seriously shaken by events of modern times. In many cases these old perspectives have collapsed; they no longer hold as our centers Against the backdrop of such events, an erosion of traditional values has taken place—an erosion which has left us feeling that we [are] adrift in a sea of relativity in which anything, including such evils as the holocaust or nuclear war might be rationalized as "necessary." It is with this experience that we know that the cultural foundations have been shaken. We know that we are no longer guided by a vision of coherence and relatedness concerning our individual existence. We know that we are no longer bound together by a set of values infused with a common sense of destiny. Our sense of destiny, if any, is dominated by an uneasiness and sense of foreboding about the future. The future itself is now feared by many as the ultimate danger to the fragile hold we have on whatever security we have achieved in the present. All of this has left some to question the meaning of their endeavors, while it has left many with a sense of isolation and loneliness. The irony is that this new sense of insecurity has come at a time when the material well-being of those in the advanced industrial nations has reached a height hitherto undreamed of.²⁸

27. Tape One, Dominion: A Dangerous New Theology, in Dominion: The Word and the New World Order, a 3-tape set distributed by the Omega-Latter, Ontario, Canada, 1987.

This is precisely what the Book of Deuteronomy predicts for a society that has covenanted with God, has been blessed with external wealth, and then has forgotten God in its humanistic confidence (Deut. 8:17): "... the LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind: And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life" (Deut. 28:65b–66). This sort of widespread pessimism leads either to cultural collapse or relentless bureaucratization, or else to revival. The first is taking place visibly,²⁹ the second is a growing possibility, and the third, revival, is also becoming more likely. Sociologist Robert Nisbet asked this question: "[W]hat is the future of the idea of progress? Any logical answer must be that the idea has no future whatever if we assume the indefinite, prolonged continuation of the kind of culture that has become almost universal in the West in the late twentieth century. If the roots are dying, as they would appear to be at the present time, how can there be shrub and foliage?"³⁰ But, he then asked, "is this contemporary Western culture likely to continue for long? The answer, it seems to me, must be in the negative—if we take any stock in the lessons of the human past." He makes no absolute prophecies—much of his academic career has been devoted to reminding us that such comprehensive cultural prophecies are always overturned by the facts of the future³¹—but he was correct when he says that "never in history have periods of culture such as our own lasted for very long." He saw "signs of the beginning of a religious renewal in Western civilization, notably in America."³²

1. Guilt and Social Paralysis

This should not be a time for pessimism among Christians. Yet it is. They are missing an opportunity that has not been seen since the

28. Howard J. Vogel, "A Survey and Commentary on the New Literature in Law and Religion," Journal of Law and Religion, I (1983), p. 151.

29. Patrick J. Buchanan, Suicide of a Superpower (New York: Duane/St. Martins, 2011).

30. Robert A. Nisbet, History of the Idea of Progress (New York: Basic Books, 1980), p. 355–56.

31. Nisbet, "The Year 2000 And All That," Commentary (June 1968).

32. Nisbet, History, p. 356.

late eighteenth century, and possibly since the resurrection of Christ. A universal world civilization now exists for the first time since the Tower of Babel. It is disintegrating morally as it grows wealthy. It is ripe for the harvest.

A successful harvesting operation requires tools. To take advantage of this unique historical opportunity, Christians need tools of dominion—blueprints for the reconstruction of the world. But Christians today do not see that God has given them the tools of dominion, His revealed law. They agree with the humanists who in turn agree among themselves, above all, that the Bible offers society no specific legal standards for comprehensive reform and reconstruction. They agree with such statements as the one made by the editor of The Journal of Law and Religion, who was also a professor of Constitutional law at a Catholic law school:

First, I assume that the Bible is not a detailed historical blueprint for American society, and that it does not contain much concrete guidance for the resolution of specific political conflicts or constitutional difficulties such as slavery and racism, sexism and equal opportunity to participate in society. The biblical traditions are not to be viewed as an arsenal of prooftexts for contemporary disputes. Contextual leaps from the situations in which the biblical authors wrote to the situations with which we find ourselves faced are likewise to be avoided.³³

Notice that he raised the controversial issue of slavery. So did a professor of Hebrew scriptures at Notre Dame University in Indiana: "Then there is the larger hermeneutical issue of the Christian appropriation of Old Testament law and the binding nature of biblical norms and stipulations in general. Who today, for example, would be prepared to argue that laws concerning the conduct of war or slavery retain their binding authority for the Christian or for anyone else?"³⁴ Who would? I would, and so would those who call themselves Christian Reconstructionists. This is why Christian Reconstruction represents a radical challenge to modern antinomian Christianity and modern humanism.

The enemies of God continue to bring up the issue of slavery in their war against Christianity. They seek to make Christians feel guilty

33. Edward McGlynn Gaffney, Jr., "Of Covenants Ancient and New: The Influence of Secular Law on Biblical Religion," Journal of Law and Religion, II (1984), pp. 117–18.

34. Joseph Blenkinsopp, "Biblical Law and Hermeneutics: A Reply to Professor Gaffney," ibid., IV (1986), p. 98.

regarding Christianity's theological and historical legacy. Christianity unquestionably condoned and even sanctioned chattel slavery until the nineteenth century. The enemies of Christianity then trace this judicial sanctioning of chattel slavery back to the Old Testament. In this way, they seek to create a sense of guilt and doubt in their targeted victims. They understand that guilt-ridden people are not effective opponents of the prevailing messianic social order. Rushdoony was correct when he wrote that "The reality of man apart from Christ is guilt and masochism. And guilt and masochism involve an unbreakable inner slavery which governs the total life of the non-christian. The politics of the anti-Christian will thus inescapably be the politics of guilt. In the politics of guilt, man is perpetually drained in his social energy and cultural activity by his overriding sense of guilt and his masochistic activity. He will progressively demand of the state a redemptive role. What he cannot do personally, i. e. , to save himself, he demands that the state do for him, so that the state, as man enlarged, becomes the human savior of man."³⁵

That the Christians failed for many centuries to challenge chattel slavery is a black mark in the history of the church. But to lay the blame at the doorstep of the Bible is either a mistake or an ideological strategy, as argued in Part 3. If this book persuades Christians that this doubt-inducing accusation against the Bible regarding its supposed support of chattel slavery is false, then it will have achieved a major success.

F. Pietism vs. God's Law

What we find in our day is that Christians despise biblical law almost as much as secular humanists do. These Christians have begun to adopt arguments similar to those used by the English Deists. For example, they attack the very thought of stoning drunken, gluttonous sons—not young children, but adult sons who are living at home with their parents, debauching themselves—as some sort of "crime against humanity," when stoning them is specifically a civil sanction authorized by God (Deut. 21:18).³⁶ The very idea of execution by public stoning embarrasses Christians, despite the fact that public stoning is by far the most covenantally valid form of execution, for God's law requires the witnesses to cast the first stones, and it also requires representatives of the entire covenantal community to participate directly, rather than hiding the act in a sanitary room in some distant prison. The Bible is clear: "The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hands of all the people. So thou shalt put the evil away from among you" (Deut. 17:7).

35. R. J. Rushdoony, Politics of Guilt and Pity (Fairfax, Virginia: Thoburn Press, [1970] 1978), p. 9.

36. Ed Dobson and Ed Hindson, "Apocalypse Now?", Policy Review (Fall 1986), p. 20.

1. Stoning

Stoning was a communal activity, an aspect of the civil covenant sanctions. It took place outside the town (Lev. 24:14; Num. 15:35–36; I Ki. 21:13). "If sentence was passed with the help of eye-witnesses, the witnesses had to begin the execution (Deut. 17:7). This was to discourage frivolous testimony in court."³⁷ Boecker argued that it was a form of excommunication, and that those stoned were not entitled to burial in the family plot, but he cites no Scriptural evidence. "For the ancients, the criminal was possessed of a real guilt which jeopardised the community. By covering the evil-doer with stones outside the town, the evil that he could spread was banished."³⁸ This argument is ridiculous, a liberal's self-conscious attempt to reinterpret the Bible's covenantal concepts as magical. The execution of the evil-doer was sufficient to stop the spread of his evil. The pile of stones was intended rather to serve as a covenantal reminder. Each pile of stones testified to the reality of covenant sanctions, a monument to God's judgment of cursing in history, just as the stones from the River Jordan were made into a memorial of God's judgment of the deliverance of Israel (Josh. 4:7–8).

Public stoning forces citizens to face the reality of the ultimate civil sanction, execution, which in turn points to God's ultimate sanction at judgment day. Stoning also faithfully images the promised judgment against Satan: the crushing of his head by the promised Seed (Gen. 3:15). Because most people, including Christians, do not want to think about God's final judgment, they prefer to assign to distant unknown executioners the grim task of carrying out God's judgment in private. This privatization of execution is immoral; it is itself criminal. It is unjust to the convicted criminal,³⁹ and it is unjust to the surviving vic-

37. Hans Jochen Boecker, Law and the Administration of Justice in the Old Testament and Ancient East, trans. Jeremy Moiser (Minneapolis, Minnesota: Augsburg, [1976] 1980), p. 40.

38. Idem.

39. Public stoning would allow a condemned man to confront the witnesses and his executioners. The idea of a private execution where the condemned person cannot tims, who do not see God's justice done in public. The systematic impersonalism of capital punishment is the problem, not capital punishment as such. This deliberate impersonalism has corrupted the entire penal system today.⁴⁰

The growth of impersonalism has been a problem for the West from the beginning. Even in the days of public executions, several centuries ago, the axeman wore a face mask. The Bible does not allow the establishment of a professional, taxpayer-financed guild of faceless executioners who, over time, inevitably either grow callous and impersonal toward their awful (full of awe) task, or else grow sadistic. Instead, the Bible imposes personal responsibility on members of society at large for enforcing this ultimate sanction. But people in the Christian West have always refused to accept this God-imposed personal responsibility. They prefer to make a lone executioner psychologically responsible for carrying out the sentence rather than participate in this covenantal responsibility, as God requires. This refusal to accept personal responsibility by citizens has led to a crisis in Western jurisprudence in the twentieth century. Decade by decade, the more consistent haters of God's law have become politically dominant. They have used the same kinds of arguments against capital punishment in general that embarrassed Christians had accepted in their rejection of public stoning. Step by step, society eliminates capital punishment. Men's hatred of God's law is steadily manifested covenantally in modern civil law.

have a final word to those who have condemned him is anything but liberal-minded. It was long considered a basic legal privilege in the West for a condemned person to have this final opportunity to speak his mind. The sign of the intolerance of the "liberal" French Revolutionaries was their unwillingness to allow King Louis XVI to speak to the crowd at his execution. The judges had ordered drummers to begin drumming the moment he began to speak, which they did. Leo Gershey, The French Revolution and Napoleon (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1933), p. 238.

40. Whereas men used to be flogged in public or put in the stocks for a few days, we now put them in hidden jails that are filled with a professional criminal class (as well as with AIDS-carrying homosexual rapists). This impersonalism of punishment has been paralleled by a steady bureaucratization and institutionalization of the penal system. The guards in prisons tend to become as impersonal and callous as their prisoners. Bukovsky wrote of Soviet prisons: "There's no real difference between the criminals and their guards. Except for the uniforms. The slang is the same, the manners, concepts, psychology. It's all the same criminal world, all joined by an unbreakable chain." Vladimir Bukovsky, To Build a Castle—My Life as a Dissenter (New York: Viking, 1978), p. 334.

2. Economic Restitution

A considerable percentage of this book is devoted to a defense of the biblical concept of penal restitution. Convicted criminals are supposed to make restitution payments to their victims. This “revolutionary” idea is at last being taken seriously by a few judges in the United States.⁴¹ But behind the ability of today’s civil courts to impose the sanction of restitution lies a greater threat to the criminal: imprisonment. This is the “dirty little secret” of those atheists, pietists, and antinomians who ridicule the biblical system of slavery: they have accepted the horror of unproductive imprisonment in place of the biblical institution of penal labor servitude, out of which an industrious slave could purchase his freedom. If the criminal in ancient Israel was financially unable to pay his victim, his sale to a slave-buyer was what provided the victim with his lawful restitution payment. The prison system has always been the Bible-hater’s preferred substitute for the Old Testament’s system of law-restricted labor servitude. In short, in order to enforce the Bible’s principle of economic restitution to victims by criminals, there always has to be a more fearful support sanction in reserve: death, imprisonment, whipping, banishment, or indentured servitude. But only one of these reserve sanctions raises money for the victims: indentured servitude. The critics of biblical law just never seem to remember to mention this fact.

G. The Fear of God’s Law

This hatred of God’s law has affected millions of Christians who sing the old hymn, “O How Love I Thy Law.” Even when they do not actively hate it (and most do), they are simply afraid of God’s law. They have not studied it, and they have been beaten into intellectual submission by humanists, Christian antinomians, and those who fear personal and cultural responsibility. A discouraging example of this is Dr. James Dobson, whose books, films, and daily radio broadcasts on Christian family issues have inspired millions of Americans, and who by 1988 had become the Protestant evangelical leader in the United States with the largest and most dedicated following.⁴² He led the fight

41. For example, Lois G. Forer, Criminals and Victims: A Trial Judge Reflects on Crime and Punishment (New York: Norton, 1980).

42. Pat Robertson, by resigning from the ministry and also from his “700 Club” television show in his quest for the Presidency in early 1988, inescapably exchanged his office of religious commentator for that of political activist. After his defeat in the Republican Party primaries, he returned to television, and he still had a large follow-against abortion and pornography, and the fight for home schooling and the re-establishment of godly disciplining of children in the home. Yet in a pamphlet against abortion, he rejected as inapplicable the single most important passage in the Bible that deals with abortion, one which makes abortion a capital crime, Exodus 21:22–25. In response to a preposterous misinterpretation of this passage by a state-licensed, profit-seeking “Christian” murderer (a pro-abortion gynecologist), Dr. Dobson did not refute the misinterpretation, but instead dismissed the Old Testament case laws as inappropriate guides for contemporary Christian righteousness. He asked his critic rhetorically:

Do you agree that if a man beats his slave to death, he is to be considered guilty only if the individual dies instantly? If the slave lives a few days, the owner is considered not guilty (Exodus 21:20–21)[?] Do you believe that we should stone to death rebellious children (Deuteronomy 21:18–21)? Do you really believe we can draw subtle meaning about complex issues from Mosaic law, when even the obvious interpretation makes no sense to us today? We can hardly select what we will and will not apply now. If we accept the verses you cited, we are obligated to deal with every last jot and tittle.⁴³

What we see here is an attempt to avoid dealing with “every last jot and tittle” of God’s inspired word. Yet it was Jesus who warned His people: “Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise [way] pass from the law, till all be fulfilled” (Matt. 5:18). Are we to ignore this? Dr. Dobson does. Admittedly, it is possible to argue that “heaven and earth” here mean the Old Covenant order, and that the fall of Jerusalem did fulfil the law. It is also possible to argue, as James Jordan has argued, that the death of Christ buried the law, and that His resurrection restored it in a new form, with the various dietary and ritual cleansing laws fulfilled (and therefore annulled in history) by the resurrection (Acts 10; I Cor. 8). But this does not absolve us from the difficult task that so disturbs Dr. Dobson, namely, selecting “what we will and will not apply now.” To retreat from this task of applied Christianity is to turn over the running of the world to pagan humanists and their theological allies, Christian antinomians. It is to turn the medical world over to the God-hating abortionists who are opposed so vigor-

ing, though smaller than when he left. His leadership role was probably perceived even by his most admiring followers as being different from what it had been before he entered politics.

43. James Dobson, “Dialogue on Abortion,” in Dobson and Gary Bergel, The Decision of Life (Arcadia, California: Focus on the Family, 1986), p. 14.

ously by Dr. Dobson. Yet this is precisely what every publicly visible Christian leader did throughout the twentieth century, and what almost all of them did after the late seventeenth century. It is universally assumed by Christians that the case laws of Exodus are null and void, and should be. It is this assumption which this book is designed to challenge.

The tools of dominion, God's law, sit unused and generally unread by those who call themselves Christians. They are the best weapons that Christians possess for moral self-defense, since the best defense is a good offense, yet they steadfastly refuse to use them. To use God's Bible-revealed law effectively would require them to become intimately familiar with its many subtleties and complex applications, and even less appealing, to discipline themselves in terms of it. They prefer to let it sit unopened, either in their laps or on their shelves. Christians therefore continue to lose the war for civilization.

H. Tom Paine's Demon: The Bible

We know where antinomian (anti-God's law) theology has headed In the past: to Unitarianism, atheism, and bloody revolution. It winds up with the words of Tom Paine: that in consideration of "the obscene stories, the voluptuous debaucheries, the cruel and torturous executions, the unrelenting vindictiveness, with which more than half the Bible is filled, it would be more consistent that we called it the word of a demon, than the word of God."⁴⁴

Is the Old Testament the word of a demon? If not, then why do antinomian Christians—liberals and conservatives, neo-evangelicals and fundamentalists—continue to ridicule Old Testament law? They stick their fists in the face of the God of Psalm 119, and shout in defiance of His law: "Is God really nothing more than the abstract, impersonal dispenser of equally abstract and impersonal laws?"⁴⁵ Yes, He is much more than this. Among other things, He is the Eternal Slavemaster over those who rebel against Him, the dispenser not of abstract law but of personally experienced agony forever and ever. Hell is real. The lake of fire is real. God is therefore not to be mocked. But He has many mockers, and many of these mockers call themselves by His name.

44. The Age of Reason, Part I; cited by David Brion Davis, The Problem of Slavery in the Age of Revolution, 1770–1823 (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1975), p. 525.

45. Rodney Clapp, "Democracy as Heresy," Christianity Today (Feb. 20, 1987), p. 23.

They do not fear Him. For now. But eventually God will stick His fist in their faces. People may choose to ignore God's law; they will not be able to ignore social crises much longer.

Another major alternative to Paine's sort of outright apostasy is some variation of Marcion's second-century heresy of the two-gods theory of history: that an evil god operated in the Old Testament, but a nice god runs the world today. (For more details, see below: "The Continuing Heresy of Dualism.") Robert Davison was correct when he said that a "Marcionite tendency may be fairly traced in much modern discussion of Christian ethics, nor is this tendency confined to scholarly discussion."⁴⁶

The third alternative is dispensationalism: God used the revealed laws of the Bible to govern people before the advent of Christ, but today we have new laws in operation, meaning vague, undefined personal laws, and no specifically New Testament cultural laws at all. The road to cultural impotence is paved with neat (and ultimately unworkable) solutions to difficult biblical problems. Slavery is one of these difficult problems.

We must search for the moral principle that undergirded each Old Testament law. When we find it, we can then begin to discuss how or to what extent God expects the civil government or some other government to enforce it today. Those who begin with the presupposition that a particular Old Testament law or God-required Hebrew practice was innately evil have already taken the first step toward Paine's view: that the Bible is the word of a demon.

Christians today are afraid of the laws in the Bible. They are actually embarrassed by them. They do not recognize that biblical law is a two-edged sword of God's judgment: blessing for the righteous, but cursing for the unrighteous (Rom. 13:1–7). They do not understand that God's law-order for society is merciful. For example, God allows the death penalty for kidnappers (Ex. 21:16). The death penalty used to be imposed on kidnappers in the United States, and kidnapping was rare. It is no longer imposed regularly, and kidnapping has become a blight. Kidnapping by terrorists in Europe is commonplace. Who says that God's law regarding kidnapping is too harsh? Harsher than kidnapping itself? So it is with all of God's civil laws. They are merciful compared with the effects of unpunished evil. The modern world is learning just how unmerciful a society can be that is not governed by biblical law.

46. Robert Davison, "Some Aspects of the Old Testament Contribution to the Pattern of Christian Ethics," Scottish Journal of Theology, 12 (1959), p. 374; cited by Walter Kaiser, Toward Old Testament Ethics (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1983), p. 23.

I. “Theocraphobia”: Fear of God’s Rulership

When, in a court of law, the witness puts his hand on the Bible and swears to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help him God, he thereby swears on the word of God—the whole word of God, and nothing but the word of God. The Bible is a unit. It is a “package deal.” The New Testament did not overturn the Old Testament; it is a commentary on the Old Testament. It tells us how to use the Old Testament properly in the period after the death and resurrection of Israel’s messiah, God’s Son.

Jesus said: “Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am come not to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise [way] pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 5:17–19). Christ took the Old Testament seriously enough to die for those condemned to the second death (Rev. 20:14) by its provisions. The Old Testament is not a discarded first draft of God’s word. It is not “God’s word (emeritus).”

If anything, the New Testament law is more stringent than the Mosaic law, not less stringent. Paul writes that an elder cannot have more than one wife (1 Tim. 3:2). The king in the Old Testament was forbidden to have multiple wives (Deut. 17:17). This was not a general law, unless we interpret the prohibition of Leviticus 18:18 as applying to all additional wives, and not just to marrying a woman’s sister, as ethicist John Murray interprets it.⁴⁷ If we attempt to interpret Leviticus 18:18 in Murray’s fashion, the question arises: Why specify kings as being prohibited from becoming polygamists if the same law applied to all men anyway? Possibly to prohibit the system of political covenanting through marriage (Solomon is a good example here). Certainly, there is no equally clear-cut Old Testament prohibition against polygamy comparable to I Timothy 3: 2, which indicates a tightening of the legal requirements for at least church officers. The New Testament appears to be more rigorous than the Old in this instance. Another alteration in marriage law that we find in the New Testament is the abolition of concubinage that resulted from Christ's fulfillment of the terms of the Old Testament's bride price system (see Chapter 6). There are no more second-class wives.

47. John Murray, Principles of Conduct (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1957), Appendix B. Catholic theologian Angelo Tosato agreed with him: “The Law of Leviticus 18:18: A Reexamination,” Catholic Biblical Quarterly, Vol. 46 (1984), pp. 199–214. They are not followed in this view by most Protestant commentators, nor by Nachmanides, who said that the verse applies only to a woman’s sister: Rabbi Moshe ben Nachman [Ramban], Commentary on the Torah: Leviticus (New York: Shilo, [1267?] 1973), p. 255.

Dominion Christianity teaches that there are four covenants under God, meaning four kinds of vows under God: personal (individual), and the three institutional covenants: ecclesiastical, civil, and familial.⁴⁸ All other human institutions (business, educational, charitable, etc.) are to one degree or other under the jurisdiction of one or more of these four covenants. No single human covenant is absolute; therefore, no single human institution is all-powerful. Thus, Christian liberty is liberty under God and God's law, administered by plural legal authorities.

1. Biblical Pluralism

There is no doubt that Christianity teaches pluralism, but a very special kind of pluralism: plural institutions under God's single comprehensive law system. It does not teach a pluralism of law structures, or a pluralism of moralities, for this sort of hypothetical legal pluralism (as distinguished from institutional pluralism) is always either polytheistic or humanistic.⁴⁹ Christian people are required to take dominion over the earth by means of all three God-ordained institutions' not just the church, or just the State, or just the family. The kingdom of God includes every human institution, and every aspect of life, for all of life is under God and is governed by His unchanging principles. All of life is under God and God's law because God intends to judge all of life *in terms of His law.*⁵⁰

In this structure of plural governments, the institutional churches serve as advisors to the other institutions (the Levitical function), but

48. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987), ch. 4. (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

49. Gary DeMar, Ruler of the Nations: The Biblical Blueprints for Government (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), ch. 3. (<http://bit.ly/gdmruler>)

50. Ibid., ch. 4.

the churches can only pressure individual leaders through the threat of excommunication. As a restraining factor on unwarranted church authority, an excommunication by one local church or denomination is always subject to review by another, if and when the excommunicated person seeks membership elsewhere. Thus, each of the three covenantal institutions is to be run under God, as interpreted by its lawfully elected or ordained leaders, with the advice of the churches, not their compulsion.

All Christians are in principle theocrats. All Christians say that God rules the universe. God (theos) rules (kratos). Theocracy means simply that God rules. He rules in every area of life: church, State, family, business, science, education, etc. There is no zone of neutrality. There is no “king’s x” from God. Men are responsible for everything they think, say, and do. God exercises total jurisdiction. Jurisdiction means law (juris) and speaking (diction). God speaks His word. It is a comprehensive word. Anyone who says that God’s law does not apply to some area of life is thereby saying that God does not have jurisdiction in that area. “No law—no jurisdiction.”

2. A Scare Word

The word “theocracy” is a scare word that humanists and frightened Christians use to chase dedicated Christians away from areas of their God-given responsibility. The critics focus on politics and civil government as if God’s rule in this area were somehow evil. Because almost all humanists today believe in salvation through legislation,⁵¹ they necessarily believe that politics is the primary means of social healing.⁵² The Marxists are the most consistent defenders of human transformation through political action: the religion of revolution.⁵³ Because Christians are today so used to thinking in these humanistic terms, they seldom think to themselves: “Wait a minute. I know that God rules the family, and the government of my family should reflect this fact. God also rules the church, and the government of my church

51. The exceptions to this rule are classical liberals and free market economists like F. A. Hayek and Milton Friedman, traditional conservatives like Russell Kirk and William F. Buckley, neo-conservatives like Irving Kristol, and outright anarchists like Murray N. Rothbard.

52. R. J. Rushdoony, The One and the Many: Studies in the Philosophy of Order and Ultimacy (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2007), chaps. 2–5, 8, 9, 11. (<http://bit.ly/rjroam>)

53. Gary North, Marx’s Religion of Revolution: Regeneration Through Chaos, rev. ed. (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1989). (<http://bit.ly/gnmrnr>)

is supposed to reflect this fact. I know that God rules all civil governments, too. So why should it be evil for Christians to work hard to see to it that the civil government reflects this fact, just as they do in their families, churches, and businesses?" In short, why should politics be outside the realm of God-honoring Christian action?⁵⁴

Humanist critics present Christians with a kind of mental image: a scarecrow that is locked in the stocks of Puritan New England. Every time a Christian walks by this scarecrow, a tape recorded message blares out: "Beware of theocracy! Beware of theocracy!" If the critics meant, "Beware of ecclesiocracy," meaning civil rule by the institutional church, they would have a valid point, but they mean something different: "Beware of Christians in every area of life who seek to exercise biblical dominion under God by obeying and enforcing God's holy law."

What "Beware of theocracy!" really means is, "Beware of God's righteous rule!"

J. The Dismantling of the Welfare-Warfare State

Those who reject the theocratic ideal are ready to accuse Calvinists of being tyrants. Historian Ronald Wells of Calvin College wrote an attack on Francis Schaeffer, which appears in a collection of essays that is best described as a neo-evangelical tirade. He pointed to the unfootnoted and unmentioned links between certain aspects of Schaeffer's social thought and Christian Reconstructionism, and then observed: "This tendency to promote one's own view by 'law' has always been the dangerous part of Calvinism: one sees Calvinists in power as triumphal and dictatorial. . . . Calvinists in power have wielded that power oppressively."⁵⁵

I suspect that we Reconstructionists were Mr. Wells' target, for we are the only Calvinists calling for the building of a biblical theocracy. What I also suspect is that what really disturbs our neo-evangelical academic critics is that we perceive this theocracy as a system of decentralized power. We call for a vast purging of present-day national power, both political and economic. We call for the dismantling of the welfare-warfare State, most notably every aspect of taxpayer-financing for education (except for the national military academies . . . maybe).⁵⁶ I have called for a reduction of aggregate taxes to the level required by I Samuel 8: where all levels of civil government combined are allowed to collect less than 10 percent of the net increase of annual private personal productivity.⁵⁷ I support the abolition of the local property tax, and all state and national direct taxation, which includes the graduated income tax, the Social Security tax, the corporate income tax, the capital gains tax, and all sales taxes. I recommend the abolition of all direct taxation by any agency of civil government above the local township or county; every other level of civil government would be forced to seek its revenues by taxing the level of civil government immediately below it. Civil governments above the most local would have to live off the revenues collected from other civil governments. This would decentralize power with a vengeance. The Reconstructionists' version of theocracy is a decentralized system of multiple competing governments in which the modern messianic State and its economic subsidies would be dismantled. By modern political standards, such a vision of the shrinking of the centralized power civil government is nothing short of utopian.

54. George Grant, The Changing of the Guard: The Biblical Blueprint for Politics (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/ggguard>)

55. Ronald A. Wells, "Schaeffer on America," in Ronald W. Ruegsegger (ed.), Reflections on Francis Schaeffer (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academic, 1986), p. 237.

In short, if the Reconstructionists' version of theocracy were to be voted into operation, the tenured, subsidized intellectual class to which our academic critics belong would experience the end of its taxpayer-financed bonanza. An entire class would have to enter the competitive free market and seek productive employment. Consumers would reward former college professors in terms of what consumers want to buy, not what state legislatures want to buy. There would be no more compulsory education and no more tax support of existing schools. This fear, rather than the fear of tyranny, may well be the true underlying concern of our critics.

K. Majority Rule

The Bible does not allow the imposition of some sort of top-down bureaucratic tyranny in the name of Christ. The kingdom of God requires a bottom-up society. The bottom-up Christian society rests ultimately on the doctrine of self-government under God, with God's law as the publicly revealed standard of performance.⁵⁸ It is the humanists' view of society that promotes top-down bureaucratic power.

56. Robert L. Thoburn, The Children Trap: Biblical Blueprints for Education (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986). (<http://bit.y/ThoburnCT>)

57. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987), p. 61. (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

The basis for building a Christian society is evangelism and missions that lead to a widespread Christian revival, so that the great mass of earth's inhabitants will place themselves under Christ's protection, and voluntarily use His covenantal laws for self-government. Christian reconstruction begins with personal conversion to Christ and self-government under God's law, then it spreads to others through revival, and only later does it bring comprehensive changes in civil law, when the vast majority of voters voluntarily agree to live under biblical blueprints.

Let's get this straight: Christian reconstruction depends on majority rule. Of course, the leaders of the Christian Reconstruction movement expect a majority eventually to accept Christ as savior. We believe in postmillennialism.⁵⁹ Those who do not share our confidence concerning the future success of the gospel, as empowered by the Holy Spirit, believe that an earthly kingdom must be imposed by force from the top down (premillennialism),⁶⁰ or else they do not believe in an

58. DeMar, Ruler of the Nations, ch. 2.

59. David Chilton, Paradise Restored: A Biblical Theology of Dominion (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1985). (<http://bit.ly/dcpardise>); Roderick Campbell, Israel and the New Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Geneva Divinity School Press, [1954] 1981); R. J. Rushdoony, Thy Kingdom Come: Studies in Daniel and Revelation (Vallecito, California: Ross House, [1971] 2001).

60. Dave Hunt writes: "During His thousand-year reign, Christ will visibly rule the world in perfect righteousness from Jerusalem and will impose peace on all nations. Satan will be locked up, robbed of the power to tempt. Justice will be meted out swiftly." Hunt, Beyond Seduction: A Return to Biblical Christianity (Eugene, Oregon: Harvest House, 1987), p. 250. If Satan is unable to tempt mankind, then any evil that calls forth Christ's justice must be man-based evil. In a taped interview with Peter Lalonde, released in early 1987, Hunt said: "Christ himself is physically here. And He has us, the redeemed in our resurrection bodies, that nobody can kill us. And we are helping Him to maintain order. He is forcing this world to behave, and He gives a restoration of the Edenic state, so that the desert blossoms like a rose, and the lion lies down with the lamb, and you've got paradise on earth, once again, with Christ Himself maintaining it and, even better than the garden of Eden, Satan is locked up for a thousand years." Dominion and the Cross, Tape One of Dominion: The Word and the New World Order, op. cit., 1987.

It should be pointed out that Hunt's argument that resurrected saints will return to rule with Jesus during the earthly millennium has long been rejected by dispensational theologians at Dallas Theological Seminary. Resurrected saints will be dwelling in a place called the heavenly Jerusalem, argued J. Dwight Pentecost: "The Relation between Living and Resurrected Saints in The Millennium," Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. 117 (October 1960), pp. 335–37. See also John F. Walvoord, The Rapture Question, rev. ed. (Grand Rapids, Michigan: Zondervan Academie, 1979), pp. 86–87.

earthly institutional kingdom at all (amillennialism).⁶¹ Postmillennialists disagree, for several reasons.

Premillennialism and amillennialism both deny that the preaching of the gospel can ever bring a majority of people to faith in Christ, thereby bringing in the earthly kingdom of God in history on a voluntary basis, person by person, culture by culture. Premillennialist author Dave Hunt went so far as to argue that such a person-by-person extension of God's kingdom is literally impossible for God to achieve.⁶² Thus, in order to produce universal peace on earth, premillennialists have always maintained, Jesus will have to impose a top-down bureaucracy when He comes to reign in person. In opposition to this view, amillennialists deny the premillennial doctrine that Jesus will ever physically return in history. They insist (as postmillennialism also insists) that Jesus will physically appear only at the end of history at the final judgment. They therefore deny (in contrast to postmillennialism) the possibility of an earthly manifestation of God's comprehensive kingdom of God in history.

Because of their denial of the widespread acceptance of the gospel at any point in history, premillennialists and amillennialists alike invariably associate the word "theocracy" with some sort of top-down, power-imposed, widely resisted rule that is imposed by an elite. Premillennialists accept this as a valid system of civil rule, but only if Christ personally and physically runs it from the top of the bureaucratic pyramid. Amillennialists deny that Christ will ever do this in history, so they deny bureaucratic theocracy's legitimacy at any point in the pre-final judgment future.

61. Oddly enough, Hunt also denied that there can ever be an earthly kingdom, even in the dispensational millennium. He said in his taped interview: "What happens at the end of this time, when Satan is loosed? He deceives the nations and like the sand of the seashore, so many—a multitude. They gather their armies and come against Christ in Jerusalem. And, of course, that is when they finally have to be banished from God's presence forever. I believe it's the final proof of the incorrigible nature of the human heart. So, Christ Himself cannot make humanity behave. He cannot by legislation, or by political or military or coercive means, establish this kingdom." Ibid., Tape Two.

62. "In fact, dominion-taking dominion and setting up the kingdom for Christ—is an impossibility, even for God. The millennial reign of Christ, far from being the kingdom, is actually the final proof of the incorrigible nature of the human heart, because Christ Himself can't do what these people say they are going to do—New Agers or Manifested Sons." (Verbal emphasis in the original interview.) Dominion, Tape Two.

1. The Work of the Holy Spirit

First, we Calvinistic postmillennialists disagree with both groups concerning the supposed impotence of the gospel in history in changing whole societies, person by person. We believe that the Holy Spirit will impose His will on the recalcitrant hearts of huge numbers of people, just as He has always imposed His will on each recalcitrant heart every time He has saved anyone from his sins. God is utterly sovereign in election and salvation. He changes people's hearts, transforming them so that they can respond in faith to the free offer of the gospel. "The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will" (Prov. 21:1). This is the only way anyone has ever been saved, for the natural man does not receive the things of the Spirit, for they are foolishness to him (I Cor. 2:14). The natural man does not partially receive the things of the Spirit in his unsaved state; he rejects the very idea that such a wrathful God exists. Thus, he needs to be transformed before he can accept the gospel.

Second, because we Calvinistic Christian Reconstructionists believe that the Holy Spirit forces hearts to change—the doctrine of irresistible grace—we also believe that human institutions are not allowed to seek to coerce men's hearts and minds. Such coercion of the human will—its transformation prior to the prior permission of the individual whose will is being transformed—is a monopoly that belongs exclusively to God. We must recognize that coercion is an inescapable concept in history. It is never a question of coercion vs. no coercion. It is always a question of whose coercion. We affirm the power of the Holy Spirit to change men's souls—to declare judicially that they are saved, and therefore possess Christ's righteousness—and to change them ethically at the point of their ethical transformation. Those who deny this exclusive power of the Spirit in transforming the lives of covenant-breakers instinctively expect to find coercion somewhere else: in human institutions—either humanist or "theocratic-bureaucratic"—or in a future personal kingdom ruled by Christ in Person.

Third, because we postmillennialists find it taught in the Bible that there will be a future outpouring of this soul-transforming Holy Spirit—the only possible basis of the Bible's prophesied millennial blessings—we disagree with premillennialists and amillennialists concerning the limited extent of the Spirit's work in the future. The kingdom will not be brought in by a bureaucratic theocratic regime, but by the heart-transforming work of the Holy Spirit. We therefore disagree with them concerning the supposed necessity of defining theocracy as a top-down social transformation. God's kingdom rule is always bottom-up: self-government under God. So, we do not call for a theocratic bureaucracy, either now or in the future. Such a top-down bureaucracy is not called for in the Bible, is impossible to maintain without unlawful coercion, and is not necessary to impose to bring in the kingdom. Christian Reconstructionists call instead for a decentralized, international, theocratic republic. Such a republic is ethically necessary, now and in the future, and it will be historically possible in the future, when the Holy Spirit begins His visibly triumphant sweep of the nations.

If postmillennialism is incorrect, and the Holy Spirit does not act to bring huge numbers of people to eternal life, then Christians must be content with only partial social reconstruction, and only partial external blessings from God. The earthly manifestations of God's heavenly kingdom will necessarily be limited. When we pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven," we should expect God to answer this prayer. But many Christians teach that God will never answer this prayer before Jesus comes again physically to rule the world in person. If they are correct, then we will not see the pre-second coming advent of a holy commonwealth in which God's laws are honored. We must content ourselves with less.

It is not possible to ramrod God's blessings from the top down, unless you are God. Only humanists think that man is God. Christians are simply trying to get the ramrod away from them, and to melt it down. This melted ramrod could then be used to make a great grave marker for humanism: "The God That Failed."

L. The Continuing Heresy of Dualism

Dualism teaches that the world is inherently divided: spirit vs. matter, or law vs. mercy, or mind vs. matter, or nature vs. grace. What the Bible teaches is that this world is divided ethically and personally: Satan vs. God, right vs. wrong, freedom vs. tyranny. The conflict between God and Satan will end at the final judgment. Whenever Christians substitute some other form of dualism for ethical dualism, they fall into heresy and suffer the consequences. That is what has happened today. We are suffering from revived versions of ancient heresies.

1. Marcion's Dualism

The Old Testament was written by the same God who wrote the New Testament. There were not two Gods in history, meaning there was no dualism or radical split between the two testamental periods. There is only one God, in time and eternity.

This idea has had opposition throughout church history. An ancient two-gods heresy was first promoted in the church about a century after Christ's crucifixion, and the church has always regarded it as just that, a heresy. It was proposed by a man named Marcion. Basically, this heresy teaches that there are two completely different law systems in the Bible: Old Testament law and New Testament law (or non-law). But Marcion took the logic of his position all the way. He argued that two law systems means two gods. The god of wrath wrote the Old Testament, and the god of mercy wrote the New Testament. In short: "two laws-two gods."

You would be surprised how many Christians still believe something dangerously close to Marcionism: not a two-gods view, exactly, but a "God-who-changed-all-His-rules" sort of view. They begin with the accurate teaching that the ceremonial laws of the Old Testament were fulfilled by Christ, and therefore that the unchanging principles of worship are applied differently in the New Testament, but then they erroneously conclude that the whole Old Testament system of civil law was dropped by God, and nothing biblical was put in its place. In other words, God created a sort of vacuum for State law.

This idea turns civil law-making over to Satan. In our day, this means that civil law-making is turned over to humanism. Christians have unwittingly become the philosophical allies of the humanists with respect to civil law. With respect to their doctrine of the State, therefore, most Christians hold what is in effect a two-gods view of the Bible.

2. Gnostic Dualism

Another ancient heresy that is still with us is gnosticism. It became a major threat to the early church almost from the beginning. It was also a form of dualism, a theory of a radical split. The gnostics taught that the split is between evil matter and good spirit. Thus, their goal was to escape this material world through other-worldly exercises that punish the body. They believed in retreat from the world of human conflicts and responsibility. Some of these ideas got into the church, and people started doing ridiculous things. So-called “pillar saints” became temporarily popular in the fifth century, A. D. A “saint” would sit on a platform on top of a pole for several decades without coming down. This was considered very spiritual.⁶³ (Who fed them? Who cleaned up after them?)

Thus, many Christians came to view “the world” as something permanently outside the kingdom of God. They believed that this hostile, forever-evil world cannot be redeemed, reformed, and reconstructed. At best, it can be subdued by power (maybe). Jesus did not really die for it, and it cannot be healed. This dualistic view of the world vs. God’s kingdom narrowly restricted any earthly manifestation of God’s kingdom. Christians who were influenced by gnosticism concluded that God’s kingdom refers only to the institutional church. They argued that the institutional church is the only manifestation of God’s kingdom.

This led to two opposite and equally evil conclusions. First, power religionists who accepted this definition of God’s kingdom tried to put the institutional church in charge of everything, since it is supposedly “the only manifestation of God’s kingdom on earth.” To subdue the supposedly unredeemable world, which is forever outside the kingdom, the institutional church has to rule with the sword. The institutional church must give orders to the State, and the State must enforce these orders with the sword. The institutional church must therefore concentrate political and economic power. What then becomes of liberty?

Second, escape religionists who also accepted this narrow definition of the kingdom sought refuge from the evil world of matter and politics by fleeing to hide inside the institutional church, an exclusively “spiritual kingdom,” now narrowly defined. They abandoned the world to evil tyrants. What then becomes of liberty? What becomes of the idea of God’s progressive restoration of all things under Jesus Christ? What, finally, becomes of the idea of biblical dominion?

When Christians improperly narrow their definition of the kingdom of God, the visible influence of this comprehensive kingdom (both spiritual and institutional at the same time) begins to shrivel up. The first heresy leads to tyranny by the church, and the second heresy leads to tyranny over the church. Both of these narrow definitions of God’s kingdom destroy the liberty of the responsible Christian man, self-governed under God and God's law.

63. Kenneth Scott Latourette, A History of Christianity (New York: Harper & Row, 1953), pp. 228, 298.

3. Manichaeism Dualism

The last ancient pagan idea that still lives on is also a variant of dualism: matter vs. spirit. It teaches that God and Satan, good and evil, are forever locked in combat, and that good never triumphs over evil. The Persian religion of Zoroastrianism has held such a view for over 2,500 years. The incredibly popular "Star Wars" movies were based on this view of the world: the "dark" side of "the force" against its "light" side. In modern versions of this ancient dualism, the "force" is usually seen as itself impersonal: individuals personalize either the dark side or the light side by "plugging into" its power.

There are millions of Christians who have adopted a very pessimistic version of this dualism, though not in an impersonal form. God's kingdom is battling Satan's, and God's is losing. History is not going to get better. In fact, things are going to get a lot worse externally. Evil will visibly push good into the shadows. The church is like a band of soldiers who are surrounded by a huge army of Indians. "We can't win, boys, so hold the fort until Jesus and the angels come to rescue us!"

That does not sound like Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Gideon, and David, does it? Christians read to their children the children's favorite story, David and Goliath, yet in their own lives, millions of Christian parents really think that the Goliaths of this world are the unbeatable earthly winners. Christians have not even picked up a stone.

Until very recently.

Conclusion

We must not come to the Old Testament with a sense of fear and loathing. The Old Testament provides us with a vision of victory and the tools of dominion, namely, God's laws. These laws are not a threat to us as Christians; they are the foundation of our efforts to reconstruct society.

Christians have not wanted to think about God's law. It reminds them of their sins of commission. It also reminds them of their sins of omission. They have failed to press the claims of Jesus Christ in every area of life. They have failed to challenge the sins of this age.

They have refused to tell the world that God really does have specific answers for every area of life, including economics and politics. Christians have preferred to comfort themselves as they have sat in their rocking chairs in the shadows of history, rocking themselves back and forth, and saying over and over: "I am not a theocrat. I am not a theocrat."

What this phrase means is simple: God does not rule, so neither will I.

But what if God does rule? What if He has given us the unchanging laws by which He expects His people to rule? What if He has given us the tools of dominion, and we have left them in the rain to rust? What will He do with our generation?

Just what He did with Moses' generation: He will leave them behind to die in the wilderness.

APPENDIX R

WHAT IS COVENANT LAW?

Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me. that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations. which shall hear all these statutes. and say Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? (Deut. 4:5–8).

These verses teach clearly that the law of God is a tool of world-wide evangelism. The nations of the earth will recognize the justice that is provided by God's revealed law, as well as see the external blessings that inevitably come to any society that covenants itself to God, and subsequently adheres to the ethical terms of God's covenant. It is crucially important to maintain that these blessings will be visible (Deut. 28:1–14). The Bible is insistent: there is an inescapable cause-and-effect relationship between national covenantal faithfulness and national prosperity. Adherence to biblical law inevitably produces visible results that are universally regarded as beneficial. Why do covenant-breakers recognize this? Because all men have the work of God's law written on their hearts (Rom. 2:14–15), so they can and do perceive the blessings of God. This, God promised, would be the visible sign of Israel's wisdom, visible to the ends of the earth.

It is not remarkable that humanists deny the existence of this covenantal and historical cause-and-effect relationship, for such a relationship points beyond history to the existence of a sovereign Creator and Judge who will hold them eternally responsible on judgment day. They hold back the truth in unrighteousness (Rom. 1:18). What is remarkable, however, is that this view of revealed biblical law as presently applicable to society is not widely believed by Christians. They believe that the cause-and-effect relationship between obedience to God's law and His positive blessings in history is just barely true within the socially and culturally narrow confines of the local church congregation and the Christian family. With respect to the authority of God's law in society, fundamentalist Christians deny it, neo-evangelical scholars deny it, and even traditional Reformed theologians deny it, and for the same reason: such a view of God's law makes Christians personally and corporately responsible for obeying God, for receiving the promised external blessings, and for using this real-world capital for the fulfillment of God's dominion covenant¹—extending His kingdom (civilization) across the face of the earth.

In contrast, Christian Reconstructionists loudly affirm biblical law as a means of both evangelism and dominion. Indeed, *the affirmation of a long-term relationship between covenant-keeping and external blessings in history, as well as covenant-breaking and external cursings in history, is the heart and soul of the Christian Reconstructionist position on social theory, its theological identifying mark.*² This overwhelming confidence in the long-term historical efficacy of the biblical covenant is the reason why Christian Reconstructionists self-consciously claim to be the most consistent of all covenant theologians in history. It is also why we are confident that our view of the biblical covenant will eventually be triumphant in history. After all, God blesses covenant-keeping in history, and covenant-believing is surely an integral aspect of covenant-keeping. No doubt our confidence makes us insufferable in other theological circles, but such is always the effect of faith in God's covenant. Pharaoh found Moses insufferable, and he banished Moses from his presence (Ex. 10:28). The Hebrew leaders had earlier tried to do the same thing (Ex. 5:19–21). Bear in mind that Moses refused to leave Egypt until he took the people with him. Christian Reconstructionists have the same attitude.

A. God's Sanctions and Positive Feedback in History

God's visible, external covenantal blessings serve as a means of confirming His people's confidence in the reliability of His covenant.

1. Gary North, Sovereignty and Dominion: An Economic Commentary on Genesis (Dallas, Georgia: Point Five Press, 2012), chaps. 3, 4.

2. There are other marks, of course, but this is its unique mark. No other theological movement proclaims this ethical cause-and-effect relationship in society. Indeed, all other Christian positions explicitly deny it.

Christians are required to affirm the existence of a normative, covenantal relationship of positive feedback in history. God intends His covenant to work this way: “But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day” (Deut. 8:18). In short: more obedience, more blessings; more blessings, more confirmation; more confirmation, greater obedience. This is covenantal positive feedback in history. This is Christianity’s standard of ethical performance, both personally and corporately.³ God brings His sanctions in history, positive and negative, in terms of men’s public conformity to His revealed law.

We have read that the power to get wealth is one of God’s positive covenant sanctions in history.⁴ This is a New Testament teaching, too: “Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning” (James 1:17). How is this steadfastness of God revealed in history? By the predictability of His historical sanctions in response to men’s responses to the unchanging principles of His covenant law. Conversely—much to the outrage of political liberals and most academic neo-evangelicals—long-run poverty is one of God’s negative sanctions in history.⁵ Such a view of history is unacceptable to the Christian world generally, and especially to university-trained Christian intellectuals. Why? Because such a view is utterly hostile to the God-denying worldview of Darwinism, which contemporary Christians have adopted far more than they are aware of. Darwinism teaches that there is no supernatural force in history. Until the advent of man, there was no direction to history, no morality, and no purpose. Only with the appearance of man in history does cosmic personalism appear. Man proposes, and man disposes.⁶ Man extends dominion in the

3. These sanctions apply more clearly to corporate bodies than to individuals, rather than the other way around, contrary to what pietism teaches. We know that righteous individual covenant-keepers can suffer cursings in history, as the Book of Job teaches. What the Bible teaches is that in the aggregate (corporately), and in the long run, God’s covenant sanctions are reliable and predictable.

4. Gary North, “Free Market Capitalism,” in Robert G. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views on Economics (Downers Grove, Illinois: InterVarsity Press, 1984), pp. 27–65. (<http://bit.ly/ClouseWap>)

5. Gary North, Unholy Spirits: Occultism and New Age Humanism (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1986), ch. 8. (<http://bit.ly/gnspirits>)

6. This was actually stated by Frederick Engels, the co-founder of Communism: “. . . man no longer merely proposes, but also disposes. . . .” Engels, Herr Eugen Diihring’s Revolution in Science (London: Lawrence & Wishart, [1878] 1934), p. 348.

name of the human species. Man, and only man, brings meaningful sanctions in history. Autonomous man is the sovereign judge in history, not God. This man-centered theology is the heart of Darwinism, not its technical discussions about genetic or environmental changes.⁷

This view of history is basic to all of modern scholarship, and the vast majority of those teaching social theory and social ethics in Christian colleges have adopted the basic anti-covenantal perspective of this worldview, at least with respect to New Testament era history. The assertion that nations remain poor because they are breaking the external terms of God's covenant outrages the modern Christian intellectual. It was not random that in its hatchet job on the Christian Reconstructionists, Christianity Today ran a clever (though a bit malicious) cartoon of me brandishing a giant dripping pen (blood rather than ink) with my statement nearby: "The so-called underdeveloped societies are underdeveloped because they are socialist, demonist, and cursed."⁸ I really did say this, I have defended it in print,⁹ and author Rodney Clapp cited it because he apparently regarded it as the most offensive statement that he could locate in his rather cursory examination of my writings. He recognized that the neo-evangelical audience of Christianity Today would take great offense at such a statement.¹⁰

What I am arguing here is simple: those people who truly believe that God's multi-institutional covenant is binding also necessarily believe that it is historically and judicially binding with respect to all three covenant (oath-bound) institutions: family, church, and State. Conversely, if people do not believe that God's covenant is historically and judicially binding with respect to nations and local civil governments, then they have denied the relevance of Deuteronomy 4:5–6. They implicitly believe that the biblical doctrine of God's national covenant is some kind of New Testament theological "limiting concept," a kind of theoretical backdrop to history that no longer has any point of contact with the actual realm of historical cause and effect. Such a

7. North, Dominion Covenant: Genesis, Appendix A: "From Cosmic Impersonalism to Humanistic Sovereignty."

8. Rodney Clapp, "Democracy as Heresy," Christianity Today (Feb. 20, 1987), p. 23.

9. North, Unholy Spirits, ch. 8. This chapter also appeared in the original version of this book, None Dare Call It Witchcraft (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House, 1976).

10. Keynensian William Diehl took offense at this cause-and-effect explanation of culture-wide poverty, citing in response Jesus' denial of this relationship in the case on an individual blind man (John 9:1–3): "A Guided-Market Response," in Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty, pp. 71–72. Art Gish was also upset: ibid., p. 78.

view of God's covenant I call antinomian: a denial of the law's effects in history. It reflects what I call halfway covenant thinking.

B. "Pro-nomianism" Defined

What do I mean by the term "antinomian"? To answer this, I need to offer a description of "pro-nomianism," meaning a defense of what God's law is and what it accomplishes, especially in history. I begin with a survey of Ray Sutton's discovery of the five-point biblical covenant model.¹¹ Sutton argues that the biblical covenant model has five parts:

Transcendence (sovereignty), yet immanence (presence)
Hierarchy/authority/representation
Ethics/law/dominion
Oath/judgment/sanctions (blessings, cursings)
Succession/continuity/inheritance

While this terminology is slightly different from that which he adopted in his book, it is an accurate representation.¹² This model has become an integrating framework for the entire Dominion Covenant economic commentary.

I use this model to develop the "pro-nomianism" of Christian Reconstruction. It is the basis of my definition of anti-nomianism. I use the biblical covenant model as the source of definition because I have long maintained that language as well as everything else must be governed by the Bible. As I wrote in 1973, "Neutrality does not exist. Everything must be interpreted in terms of what God has revealed. The humanistic goal of neutral language (and therefore neutral law) was overturned at the Tower of Babel. Our definitions must be in terms of biblical revelation."¹³

As a representative example of the structure of the biblical covenant, I have selected Isaiah 45. From it we can get some sense of how the covenant works in history. We can also discuss the covenant's relation to biblical law.

11. Ray R. Sutton, That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/rstymp>)

12. A correspondent to Sutton sent in the new version because it can be used to create an acronym: THEOS.

13. Gary North, "In Defense of Biblical Bribery," in R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, New Jersey: Craig Press, 1973), p. 843.

1. Transcendence/Immanence

We must begin where the Bible does: the creation of all things by God (Gen. 1:1). We must maintain an absolute distinction between the Creator and the creature. God is the absolutely sovereign Master of all that comes to pass in history. Nothing takes place outside His sovereign decree. "I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the LORD do all these things" (Isa. 45:7).¹⁴ "I have made the earth, and created man upon it: I, even my hands, have stretched out the heavens, and all their host have I commanded" (Isa. 45:12). "For thus saith the LORD that created the heavens; God himself that formed the earth and made it; he hath established it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited: I am the Lord; and there is none else" (Isa. 45:18).

Isaiah uses the familiar (but extremely unpopular) biblical imagery of the potter and his clay: "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd [strive] with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioned it, What makest thou? Or thy work, He hath no hands? Woe unto him that saith unto his father, What begetteth thou? Or to the woman, What hast thou brought forth?" (Isa. 45:9–10).¹⁵ These words became the basis of Paul's argument regarding the absolute sovereignty of God in choosing to save one person and not another. It is the classic argument in the Bible for the doctrine of election. Paul says of Pharaoh: "For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth" (Rom. 9:17). This explains the words in Exodus: 'And he hardened Pharaoh's heart, that he hearkened not unto them; as the LORD had said' (Ex. 7:13). But this means that God keeps some men from responding positively to the universal offer of salvation. This keeps them from obeying His law.

The believer in free will (a degree of human autonomy outside of God's eternal decree) then asks: "How can any sinner therefore be personally responsible for his sin?" Paul well understood this line of reasoning, to which he replied:

14. This does not mean that God is the author of sin. This verse speaks covenantally: God brings evil times to those who defy Him.

15. I have used brackets to indicate the italicized inserted words of the King James translators. Normally, I do not do this, preferring instead not to disrupt the flow of biblical language. But my arguments here are sufficiently controversial that I do not want critics saying that I relied on the translators to make my points.

Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will [have mercy], and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed [it], why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor? (Rom. 9:19–21).

Paul appealed directly to the biblical doctrine of creation—the imagery of the potter and the clay—in order to cut short every version of the free will (man’s autonomy) argument. There is no area of chance or contingency in history. None. It is unlawful even to appeal to this line of reasoning, Paul said: “Who art thou that thou repliest against God?” The doctrine of the moral and legal responsibility of man before God must always be understood in terms of the absolute decree of God; it must never be defended in terms of the idea that man has a zone of uncontrolled decision-making at his disposal. Man’s responsibility must be understood therefore in terms of the biblical doctrine of creation.

The biblical doctrine of creation teaches the sovereignty of God in electing some people to salvation. This is why so few Christians accept the biblical doctrine of the six-day creation, and why they are ready to compromise with this or that version of evolution. They want to affirm the partial sovereignty (partial autonomy) of man. They do so in terms of the pagan idea of chance: a realm of decision-making, of cause and effect, outside of God’s absolute providential control and absolute predestination. They refuse to accept the words of Paul in Ephesians: “According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will” (Eph. 1:4–5).

The biblical doctrine of creation leads directly and inescapably to the biblical doctrine of the absolute providence of God. God creates and sustains all things in history. Speaking of Jesus Christ, Paul writes: “For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are on earth, visible and invisible, whether [they be] thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: And he is before all things, and by him all things consist” (Col. 1:16–17). Nothing lies outside the sovereign providence of God. There is no area of contingency. There is no area of neutrality. There is no area that is outside the eternal decree of God or the law of God. This is the biblical doctrine of creation. Humanists hate it, and so do the vast majority of Christians today.

God as Creator brings all things to pass. When He says, "It shall come to pass," it comes to pass. "Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times [the things] that are not [yet] done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure" (Isa. 46:10). God does not simply know the future that He predicts; He causes the future to take place. There is no element of chance anywhere in the universe.

Consider the greatest crime in history: the betrayal and crucifixion of Jesus Christ. The act of betrayal by Judas was predetermined by God; nevertheless, Judas was still held fully responsible for this act. "And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!" (Luke 22:22). And what of those who unlawfully, defiantly condemned Jesus Christ to death? They were all predestined by God to do it.

The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ. For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together. For to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done (Acts 4:26–28).

So, the Bible teaches man's personal responsibility and God's absolute predestination. If God was willing to predestinate the greatest crime in history, holding the criminals fully responsible, then surely He is willing to bring to pass all the other relatively minor crimes in history, also holding each criminal responsible. God's law touches everything, and each man is fully responsible for his thoughts and actions; he must obey the whole of God's law.

God did not create the world and then depart, leaving it to run by itself until the final judgment (Deism's god). He is present everywhere, but specially present with His people. He delivers them. But He also gives His law to them. He runs everything, yet men are made in His image, and they have the ability to understand the external world. They are responsible to God because God is totally sovereign. He has laid down the law, both moral and physical. His word governs all things. No appeal to the logic of autonomous man (free will) can change this.

2. Hierarchy/Authority/Representation

“Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and [there is] none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth [in] righteousness, and shall not return, That unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear” (Isa. 45:22–23). In these verses we find four points of the covenant: sovereignty (point one), oath (point four), righteousness (point three), and hierarchy. Every knee shall bow. There is hierarchy in this world.

But knees shall also bow to Israel, if Israel remains faithful to God. “Thus saith the LORD, The labour of Egypt, and merchandise of Ethiopia and of the Sabeans, men of stature, shall come over unto thee, and they shall be thine: they shall come after thee; in chains they shall come over, and they shall fall down unto thee, they shall make supplication unto thee, saying, Surely God is in thee; and there is none else, there is no God” [“no other God”: New King James Version] (Isa. 45:14). Israel represents God in history, and the nations will, if Israel remains covenantally faithful, become Israel’s bond-servants.

This means that men who disobey God’s law are required to do what they are told by those officers who declare God’s law as His lawful covenantal representatives. These representatives speak in God’s name through covenantal institutions. There is inescapable corporate responsibility in history. Nations will obey God and His representatives, said Isaiah, even if their citizens must be brought to judgment in chains.

In Israel, civil law was enforced hierarchically: a bottom-up appeals court system (Ex. 18). This is also true of church courts (Matt. 18:15–18). Thus, officers speak representatively: God’s representatives before men, and men’s representatives before God. This doctrine of representation is the basis of mankind’s corporate dominion over nature (Gen. 1:26–28). Men are under God and God’s law corporately; they are to exercise dominion corporately by bringing the whole earth under God’s law. Thus, biblical law is a tool of dominion.

Hierarchical representation is also the basis of covenantal governments’ corporate responsibility before God: church, State, and family. Collective units are given laws to enforce; God holds them responsible to Him through representatives. Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed; Egypt and Babylon were destroyed. Israel and Judah were scattered. Classical Greece and Rome fell. There is both personal and corporate responsibility before God.

3. Ethics/Law/Boundaries

“Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness: let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together; I the LORD have created it” (Isa. 45:8). The whole cosmos is described here as being filled with righteousness. Righteousness is the basis of man’s dominion over the earth.

But righteousness must be defined. This is what God’s law does. It establishes boundaries to our lawful actions. The tree of the knowledge of good and evil was “hedged in” by God’s law. Adam and Eve were not to eat from it, or as Eve properly interpreted, even touch it (Gen. 3:3).

These ethical boundaries are not exclusively personal; they are also corporate. There are biblical laws given by God that are to govern the actions of families, churches, and civil governments. Autonomous man would like to think that God’s law has nothing to do with his institutions, especially civil government, but autonomous man is in rebellion. God’s law is not restrained by autonomous man’s preferred boundaries. It is not man who lawfully declares: “Fear ye not me? saith the LORD: will ye not tremble at my presence, which have placed the sand [for] the bound of the sea by a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass it: and though the waves thereof toss themselves, yet can they not prevail; though they roar, yet can they not pass over it? But this people hath a revolting and a rebellious heart; they are revolted and gone. Neither say they in their heart, Let us now fear the LORD our God, that giveth rain, both the former and the latter, in his season: he reserveth unto us the appointed weeks of the harvest” (Jer. 5:22–24).

Notice the development of God’s argument, which is in fact a covenant lawsuit brought against Judah by His prophet, Jeremiah. God sets boundaries to the sea, the seasons, and the harvest. The implication is that He also sets legal and moral boundaries around people, both as individuals and nationally. Men are to fear this God who sets cosmic boundaries. How is this required fear to be acknowledged? The prophets answered this question over and over, generation after generation: by obeying God’s law.

4. Oath/Judgment/Sanctions

“I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth [in] righteousness, and shall not return, That unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear” (Isa. 45:23). His word is sufficient. He will not go back on His word. He has sworn by His own name. God has therefore taken a covenantal oath that in the future, every human knee shall bow, and every human tongue shall swear. There is no escape from God's authority; and therefore all mouths shall swear—they shall acknowledge His sovereignty, either on earth or in the afterlife. Even in the lake of fire, they must eternally swear that God is who He says He is.

God's law is our standard, both individually and corporately. There are covenantal institutions that are bound by the revealed law of God: church, State, and family. These are the three covenantal institutions that God has established to declare and enforce His law. All institutions must obey, but these are those that are exclusively governed by formal oaths before God.

What is an oath? It is the calling down on one's head the negative sanctions of God. If a person or covenanted institution disobeys the law of God, then God comes in wrath to punish the rebels. He comes in history. This was the warning of the Old Testament prophets. On the other hand, if men repent and obey, God is merciful and will bless them. "Your iniquities have turned away these [things]," Jeremiah warned Judah regarding the rain and the harvest, "and your sins have withholden good [things] from you" (Jer. 5:25). The prophets came in the name of God as covenantal representatives, calling individuals, as well as representative kings and priests, to repent, to turn back to God's law and thereby avoid God's negative sanctions in history.

The passage above all others in the Bible that describes the historical sanctions of God is Deuteronomy 28. Verses 1–14 describe the blessings (positive sanctions), and verses 15–68 describe the cursings (negative sanctions). Understand, these are historical sanctions. They are not appropriate sanctions for the final judgment. In this sense, they are representative sanctions of eternity's sanctions, what Paul called the "earnest" or down payment of God in history on what must inevitably come in eternity (Eph. 1:14).

5. Succession/Continuity/Inheritance

"In the LORD shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall glory" (Isa. 45:25). Because God is the Creator, His people will inherit the earth: "The earth is the LORD's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein" (Ps. 24:1). (This is point one of the covenant.) Psalm 25:12–13 provides the covenantal promise:

What man [is] he that feareth the LORD? Him shall he teach in the way [that] he shall choose (v. 12). His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth (v. 13).

God is to be feared (point one). God teaches man (subordination: point two) the required way (point three). The man's soul shall dwell in ease (point four), and his heirs shall inherit (point five). These two brief verses set forth God's covenant model, and in these verses we can see the outline of God's plan of history for covenant keepers. This is so simple that a child can grasp it. Unfortunately, as we shall see, very few theologians have.

My point is that these verses refer to history. The fear of God is historical. God's instruction to man is historical. The law applies in history. The man is spiritually blessed in history: his soul is at ease. His heirs shall inherit.

Some commentators might agree regarding the historical reference of points one through three, but object to my view of point four. Perhaps the focus of the verse is exclusively internal. After all, the covenant-keeper's soul is what is spoken of. Perhaps the blessings are not visible in history. My response is to ask a question: Why should point four—spiritual ease—be confined to only the inner person? If the inheritance is historical, then the spirit's ease must refer to contentment regarding the past, present, and future. Only if the inheritance will be post-historical could the ease of the soul be legitimately confined to the internal realm. The covenant-keeper is at ease in history because he is confident about the future success of those who share his faith. It is his seed that will inherit.

If the inheritance of the whole earth is merely symbolic of the inheritance of God's resurrected people, then why refer to the inheritance delivered to a man's seed? In eternity, this inheritance will be his, too. In short, the primary focus of the passage is on history, not eternity. Fear God now. Learn from God now. Obey God's law now. Experience spiritual contentment now. Why? Because your spiritual heirs will inherit in the future: in time and on earth.

Yet there are theologians, especially Calvinists in the Continental (Dutch) tradition, and all Lutherans, who insist that this promised inheritance is strictly limited to the post-final judgment world of eternity. The first point—the fear of God—is historical, but personal rather than corporate. The second—being taught by God—is historical, but personal rather than corporate. The third—obeying the law of God—applies in history, but is exclusively personal, familial, and ecclesiastical—never civil. The fourth—spiritual ease—is historical but exclusively internal. Why these restrictions on the first four points? Because the fifth—inheriting the earth—is seen as exclusively post-historical.

Summary

The definition of pro-nomianism must begin and end with the biblical concept of the covenant. All five points of the biblical covenant must be included in any valid definition of biblical law. We should not expect to be able to define biblical law without first considering the Bible's primary revelation of God's law: the structure of the various covenants God has made with men.

Thus, I define "pro-nomianism" in terms of God's covenant model:

The belief that God, the sovereign, predestinating Creator, has delegated to mankind the responsibility of obeying His Bible-revealed law-order, Old and New Testaments, and promises to bless or curse men in history, both individually and corporately, in terms of this law-order. This law-order and its historically applied sanctions are the basis of the progressive sanctification of covenant-keeping individuals and covenantal institutions—family, church, and State—over time, and they are also the basis of the progressive disinheritance of covenant-breakers.

This leads us to the question of the biblical definition of antinomianism, the antithesis of this definition.

C. "Antinomianism" Defined

We have seen that the biblical definition of God's law is governed by the structure of God's covenant. Thus, the biblical definition of antinomianism must also be governed by the structure of God's covenant. If being an antinomian means that you are against the law, then it must also mean that it is God's law that you are against, and God's law is always covenantal.

To understand what antinomianism is, we can do no better than to consider the first revelation in the Bible of the original antinomian: Satan. Satan came to Eve with a proposition: "Eat of the forbidden fruit, and you will become as God" (Gen. 3:5). "Run an experiment, and see if this isn't the case," he tempted Eve. "See whose word is authoritative, mine or God's." He offered her a covenantal argument, a perverse imitation of the biblical covenant:

1. God is not sovereign.
2. You need not obey Him.
3. His law is not authoritative.
4. The promised negative sanction will not come.
5. [implied:] You will keep the inheritance.

I choose to analyze the biblical definition of antinomianism in terms of Satan's temptation of Eve. This line of satanic reasoning is the heart of all antinomianism.

1. Transcendence/Immanence

Who is God? Satan was asking Eve to decide. Who lays down the law? Whose word is authoritative?

Obviously, the Creator is God. Then who is the true creator, man or God? This is what Satan was asking mankind, God's chronological and judicial representatives. If man answered anything but "God is the Creator, and His word alone is authoritative," then Satan would inherit the earth. Man would die unless, of course, God should later send His Son, the second Adam, to inherit it, but Satan chose either to ignore this possibility or to act against what he knew would happen in the future.

The first step in becoming an antinomian is to deny the absolute sovereignty of God. It usually begins with a denial, implicit or explicit, that God created the world. This usually begins with a softening of the doctrine of the six, literal, 24-hour-day creation. This is how the seeds of Darwinism were sown: denying the literal character of God's chronology in Genesis 1.¹⁶

The next step is to deny the obvious implication of the doctrine of Creation: that since God created the world, He also controls the world. In other words, men deny the absolute sovereignty of God or providence of God. They deny the doctrine of predestination.¹⁷

Why is a denial of predestination inherently antinomian? Because it means that events in history come to pass outside of God's decree. They are therefore random events in terms of His decree, what philosophers call contingent events. An element of contingency is thereby brought into the universe. If A takes place, B may not take place. It may or may not. It depends. On what? On something other than what God has decreed.

16. North, Sovereignty and Dominion, Appendix C: "Cosmologies in Conflict: Creation vs. Evolution."

17. Loraine Boettner, The Reformed Doctrine of Predestination (Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed, [1932] 1965).

This means that there must be gaps in historical causation. These gaps are inherently contingent with respect to the decree of God. A providential cause is separated from its eternally decreed effect. God therefore does not bring all things to pass; man brings some things to pass. The more element of contingency there is in history, the greater man's autonomy from God's providential control of the universe. That modern science has steadily adopted chance events as the basis of modern quantum physics is not itself a random historical event.¹⁸ This conclusion of quantum physics is the product of a humanistic worldview that denies any decree of God and His creation of the universe. That chaos has become the "hot new topic" of modern physical science is also not random.¹⁹ The ethical rebellion of humanist man is increasing.

If God does not control everything that comes to pass, then His word is not authoritative over everything that comes to pass. This was the logic of Satan's temptation: to believe that a specific cause (eating the forbidden fruit) would not inevitably lead to a specific event (death). Somehow, Satan was arguing, there is contingency in this world. This is also the argument of all those who would use the concept of contingency to defend the idea of the free (semi-autonomous) will of man. This is why we are morally required to abandon any trace of the free will argument. Nevertheless, most Christians today hold to some version of the free will argument. Hence, most Christians today are in principle antinomians.

2. Hierarchy/Authority/Representation

Satan went to Eve first. He was implying that she, not her husband, was sovereign. God had spoken to her husband regarding the forbidden fruit. Presumably, he had told her, as God's representative. "Obey me, not your husband," Satan said. And by disobeying her husband, she disobeyed God. She ignored the hierarchy of authority over her. She ignored her representative before God: Adam. She acted autonomously.

18. Gary North, Is the World Running Down? Crisis in the Christian Worldview (Tyler, Texas: Institute for Christian Economics, 1988), ch. 1. (<http://bit.ly/gnworld>)

19. James Gleik, Chaos: The Making of a New Science (New York: Viking, 1987).

Who must man obey, God or his own autonomous mind? This was Satan's implicit question. He asked Eve to disobey God, all in the name of a cosmic experiment. What would happen if she disobeyed? Good things, he promised.

"Trust me," Satan said. "Take my word for it." In other words, "I lay down the true law." Man thinks that he is disobeying God on his own account, in his own authority, but in fact, man must serve only one master. Ethically, he subordinates himself to Satan when he refuses to obey God. He comes under the hierarchical rule of another master. Man may think he is acting autonomously, but he in fact is simply shifting masters. God or Baal? This was Elijah's question (I Ki. 18:21). God or mammon? This was Jesus' question (Matt. 6:24).

But neither God nor Satan normally appears to an individual. Each sends human representatives. Men represent God in positions of corporate responsibility. God has established three monopolistic institutions: church, State, and family. The head of each can serve God or Satan, and those under him are sanctified (set apart) institutionally.

Soldiers live or die in terms of decisions made by their superiors. Nations rise and fall in terms of the decisions of their national leaders. An individual's success or failure in history cannot be discussed without reference to the institutional hierarchies above and below him, and their success or failure. Thus, to deny that God's law applies to your covenantal superior is another way of saying that it really does not apply to you. "I was just following orders!" says the subordinate who has sinned. In other words, "I was under someone else's authority—someone other than God."

Uriah the Hittite was a righteous man. He died because he was so righteous. Unrighteous King David told unrighteous General Joab to be sure that Uriah died in battle, and Joab carried out the order (II Sam. 12). In short, covenantal hierarchy is important.

David later decided to number the people. This was against God's law. Joab warned him about this, but David insisted, so Joab carried out the order. God's prophet then came to David and announced one of three judgments: seven years of famine, three months of David's fleeing before his enemies, or a three-day pestilence. Take your pick, the prophet said. David was too proud to accept the mild but personally humiliating second sanction, so he gave God the choice. God sent the worst one, nationally speaking: a plague that killed 70,000 people (II Sam. 24). (Anyone who teaches that God does not send sickness to His people has a real problem in explaining this passage.) In short, covenantal representation is important.

There are theologians today who say that God's law applies only to individuals, that nations are not under God's law. They deny the very possibility of a national covenant in New Testament times. Such a covenant was only for ancient Israel. National leaders are not representatives of their subordinates before God, theologians insist, and national leaders are surely not God's representatives before their subordinates. God's law has nothing to do with politics, they insist. There is no hierarchy of appeal based on God's law. There is no national covenant: this is a basic philosophy of all modern secular political theory, and few Christian scholars disagree. And those few who are willing to affirm the legitimacy of a national covenant gag on the idea of a future international covenant. International covenants are unthinkable for them. Not so for Isaiah (19:18–25).²⁰

3. Ethics/Law/Boundaries

"Forget about the law against eating this fruit," Satan told Eve. "Go ahead and eat."

"Do what thou wilt shall be the whole of the law," announced the self-proclaimed early twentieth-century magician, Aleister Crowley, who also called himself the Beast and 666.²¹ The ethical positions are the same. The results are also the same.

"We're under grace, not law." This is the fundamentalist Christians' version of the same ethical position. So is, "No creed but Christ, no law but love!" They do not mean what Paul meant: that Christians are no longer under the threat of the negative eternal sanctions of the law. They mean rather that God's law no longer applies in any of the five aspects of the covenant, eternally or historically.

Christian social thinkers, especially neo-evangelicals in the Wheaton College-InterVarsity Press-Christianity Today orbit, prefer to muddy the ethical waters by using fancier language than the fundamentalists use. Examples:

The fact that our Scriptures can be used to support or condemn any economic philosophy suggests that the Bible is not intended to lay-out an economic plan which will apply for all times and places. If we are to examine economic structures in the light of Christian teachings, we will have to do it in another way.²²

20. Gary North, Healer of the Nations: Biblical Blueprints for International Relations (Ft. Worth, Texas: Dominion Press, 1987). (<http://bit.ly/gnhealer>)

21. Aleister Crowley, Magick in Theory and Practice (New York: Castle, n.d.), p. 193. A short biography of Crowley is Daniel P. Mannix, The Beast (New York: Ballentine, 1959).

Since koinonia includes the participation of everyone involved, there is no blueprint for what this would look like on a global scale. . . . We are talking about a process, not final answers.²³

There is in Scripture no blueprint of the ideal state or the ideal economy. We cannot turn to chapters of the Bible and find in them a model to copy or a plan for building the ideal biblical state and national economy.²⁴

“Blueprint” is the code word for biblical law for those who do not want to obey biblical law. Second, “God’s principles” is the code phrase for fundamentalists who are nervous about appearing totally antinomian, but who are equally nervous about breaking openly with the teachings and language of dispensationalism, i.e., “we’re under grace, not law.” Finally, “God’s moral law” is the code phrase for the evangelical and Reformed man who does not want to be branded an antinomian, but who also does not want to be bound by the case laws of the Old Testament. In all these cases, the speaker rejects the idea of the continuing authority of the case laws.

It all boils down to this: Satan’s rhetorical question, “Hath God said?” (Gen. 3:1). The proper response is, “Yes, God hath said!” He is the sovereign Creator. He has laid down the law.

4. Oath/Judgment/Sanctions

There are two kinds of sanctions: blessings and cursings. God told Adam that in the very day he ate of the tree, he would surely die. (“Dying, you shall die”: the familiar biblical pleonasm.)²⁵ This means a negative sanction in history. Satan told Eve that she would not surely die. Instead, she would know good and evil, as God does: a positive sanction. Which would it be? “To die or not to die, that is the question.”

Satan was a liar, but not so great a liar as to deny the idea of predictable sanctions in history. He simply denied God’s negative sanction and promised Eve a positive one. Would that modern Christian theologians were as honest as Satan! Instead, they deny the very exist-

22. William Diehl, “The Guided-Market System,” in Robert G. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty, op. cit., p. 87.

23. Art Gish, “Decentralist Economics,” ibid., p. 154.

24. John Gladwin, “Centralist Economics,” ibid., p. 183.

25. Appendix M.

ence of predictable covenantal sanctions in New Testament times. They write such things as: "And meanwhile it [the common grace order] must run its course within the uncertainties of the mutually conditioning principles of common grace and common curse, prosperity and adversity being experienced in a manner largely unpredictable because of the inscrutable sovereignty of the divine will that dispenses them in mysterious ways."²⁶ This muddled prose matches an equally muddled concept of ethics and history. In English, this statement means simply that there is no ethical cause-and-effect relationship in post-crucifixion history.

Biblical case laws are still morally and judicially binding today. This is the thesis of Tools of Dominion. Kline's theology explicitly denies this. Second, Kline's argument also means the denial of God's sanctions—blessing and cursing—in New Testament history. It is the denial of any long-term cause-and-effect relationship between covenantal faithfulness and external blessings—positive feedback between covenant-keeping and visible blessings. It is also the denial of any long-term cause-and-effect relationship between covenantal unfaithfulness and external cursings. Thus, when I refer to "antinomianism," I have in mind the hostile attitude regarding ethical cause and effect in society—social antinomianism²⁷—but also a deeper and more fundamental hostility: a denial, implicit or explicit, of the reliability of the covenantal promises (sanctions) of God in history.

5. Succession/Continuity/Inheritance

If you die, you do not inherit. If you die without children, someone else inherits. Who would inherit in history if Eve listened to the serpent and did what he recommended?

